The Middle East Council of Churches (affiliated with the World Council of Churches) formed in 1927 near Beirut, and it includes four Syrian-based churches. After the Arab-Israeli wars, the Council has been active in helping with resources for the 340,000 displaced persons, mainly Palestinian refugees, who are stateless. There are another 300,000 people who have been internally displaced throughout the political and religious strife. The World Council of Churches has subsidized much of the work done to help these homeless people, who have a substandard quality of life, maintain their integrity under duress.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Alevism; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Chaldean Catholic Church; Church of the Nazarene; Druze; Eastern Orthodoxy; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Hanafite School of Islam; Hanbalite School of Islam; Ismaili Islam; Maronite Catholic Church; Melkite Catholic Church; Middle East Council of Churches; National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Shafiite School of Islam; Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; United Church of Christ; Wahhabi Islam; World Council of Churches; Yezidis.

References

Abd-Allah, U. F. The Islamic Struggle in Syria. Berkeley, CA: Mizzen, 1983.

Bliss, Frederick. J. The Religions of Modern Syria and Palestine. New York: Scribner, 1912.

Fact, M. A. "The Alawis Community of Syria: A New Dominant Force." Middle Eastern Studies 20, no. 2 (1984): 133–153.

Haidallah, I. A. The Legal Status of Non-Moslem Communities in the Near East, and Especially Syria and Lebanon. Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1965.

Moaddel, Mansoor. Jordanian Exceptionalism: A Comparative Analysis of State-Religion Relationships in Egypt, Iran, Jordan, and Syria. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East

During the fifth century CE, the Christian church was struck by what was termed the Monophysite controversy, a stage in the Christian movement's development of the orthodox definition of the Trinity and the divinity of Christ. In 451 the Council of Chalcedon promulgated the position that Christ was of one substance with the Father as regards his Godhead and at the same time of one substance with humanity as regards his manhood. The Monophysite position spoke to the nature of Christ and suggested that Jesus' human nature had been taken up and absorbed into his divine nature. They did not ascribe to the Council of Chalcedon, though they did follow the findings of previous councils and use the standard creed promulgated earlier by the Council of Nicaea in 325.

Monophysite exponents led in the formation of several churches that separated from Eastern Orthodoxy and the Roman Catholic Church. Among the last to form was the Syrian church, which is generally dated to the consecration of Jacob Baradeus (500–578) as bishop of Edessa in 542. Edessa was then a major center of the Christian church in its movement into Asia. Bishop Jacob was both a fervent Monophysite and possessed of the favor of Empress Theodosia (of the Byzantine Empire). He was able to use his position to travel through the empire from Turkey to Egypt and eastward to Persia, founding Monophysite congregations. His initial work was continued by his followers until inhibited by the emergence of Islam in the seventh century. They spread the church as far east as India and China.

The church uses a Syriac liturgy and a Syriac translation of the Bible, which has been available since the second century. As the church has spread, other languages have been introduced over the centuries.

The church's history has been marked by several disasters in the modern era. It suffered greatly when the Mongols passed through in the 14th century. It lost many members when the Roman Catholic Church established the Syrian Catholic Church as a Syrian affiliate in the 18th century. At the beginning of the 20th century, many of its members were killed by the Turks. During the 20th century, some reversal of the downward trend was made when it accepted many Orthodox in India under its umbrella, and in 1964 the Syrian patriarch consecrated and re-established the office of the Catholicate of the Orthodox Syrian Church of the East in India.

For many years, beginning in the 13th century, the church had been headquartered at Mardin, Turkey, but it moved to Homs, Syria, in 1933 to escape Turkish violence and then in 1957 relocated to Damascus. In 2000 the church changed its name from Syrian Orthodox to Syriac Orthodox, indicating its use of the Syriac language rather than any ties to the current nation of Syria. The Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East (popularly known as the Syrian Orthodox Church or the Jacobite Church) is now under the leadership of His Holiness Ignatius Zakka I. Iwas, its patriarch. The church has bishops in Iraq, Lebanon, Jerusalem, Turkey, the Netherlands (for parishes in Europe), Sweden (for Scandinavia), the United States, Australia, and Brazil (for South America). The largest number of members associated with the church (14,000,00 in 2006) are in India, where more than 700,000 reside. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East
PO Box 22260
Bab Tooma
Damascus

Syria

<http://www.syrianorthodoxchurch.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Syrian Catholic Church; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; World Council of Churches.

References

- Chaillot, Christine. The Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch and All the East: A Brief Introduction to Its Life and Spirituality. Geneva: Inter-Orthodox Dialogue, 1998.
- Orthodoxia*. Regensburg, Germany: Osrkirchliches Institut (issued annually).
- Ramban, Kadavil Paul. The Orthodox Syrian Church: Its Religion and Philosophy. Vadatampady, Puthencruz, India: Pathrose, 1973.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Syrian Catholic Church

The Syrian Catholic Church emerged in the 17th century out of missionary activity launched by missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church in Aleppo in northwest Syria. At the time, the majority of Christians in the area were affiliated with the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, the so-called Jacobite Church, which had not affirmed the teachings of the Ecumenical Council held at Ephesus in 431 concerning the nature of Christ. The Council affirmed that Christ had both a human and a divine nature, while the Syrians generally held the Monophysite position that Christ had only a divine nature.

The Catholic mission had spectacular success through the 1650s, and in 1662 a patriarch with Catholic leanings, Andrew Akhidjan, was elected head of the Syrian Orthodox Church. Following his death, however, a split occurred, and the two factions (one pro-Rome and one independent of Rome) each elected a patriarch. However, the authorities of the Ottoman Empire supported the Orthodox faction, and no successor to the Catholic bishop was elected.

Iraqi Christians light candles after attending Christmas mass at the Syrian Catholic church in al-Karrada, central Baghdad, December 2007. (AFP/Getty Images)

Those Syrians who followed the Syrian-Antiochene liturgy and practice but were oriented on the authority of the bishop of Rome continued to exist but found themselves in an increasingly precarious position. In the 18th century, they were forced underground. Then in 1782, the Syrian patriarch declared his allegiance to Rome and fled to Lebanon, where he established Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery. He began a new line of Syrian Catholic patriarchs. Finally in 1828, the Ottoman government granted recognition to the Syrian Catholic Church. In 1850 the headquarters of the church was moved to Mardin, in southwestern Turkey.

The church expanded during the last half of the 19th century but fell victim to the massacres of Syrians that occurred during World War I. As a result of those massacres, many Catholics fled to Lebanon, and in the 1920s the patriarchate moved to Beirut. Like every patriarch, the current patriarch, Ignatius Joseph III Younan (b. 1944), who took office early in 2009, has added Ignatius to his patriarchal name. There are some 132,000 Syrian Catholics (2008), most residing in Lebanon, Syria, Turkey, Egypt, and Iraq. There are parishes in the Sudan and Israel, and the faithful in North America are organized into Our Lady of Deliverance Syriac Catholic Diocese. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches.

The church oversees two religious orders, both named for Ephraem the Syrian, a fourth-century saint-theologian. A publishing house and seminary are located at Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery. Worship is conducted in Syrian, though most members now speak Arabic.

Syrian Catholic Church
Rue de Danms
BP 116-5087
Beirut
Lebanon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Middle East Council of Churches; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar

The year 1653 can be considered the founding of the modern Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, while its history leads us to a time period between the first and third centuries CE. The church traces its origins to the Apostle Thomas. As a result of a synod in the year 2000, the church refers to itself as the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; previously it had been the Malankara Jacobite Syriac Orthodox Church.

The Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar considers itself the church of the Syrian Christians of India, whose presence can be documented from the third century. To support this claim, the church refers to individual documents that suggest that the Syrian Christians of India stood under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch. But there is more historical evidence that India's Syrian Christians were members of the Apostolic Catholic Church of the East prior to the arrival of the Portuguese. Along with all other jurisdictions of Mar Thoma of India, the church is convinced that its origins can be traced to the presence of the Apostle Thomas in India. After the Portuguese forced the church to unify with the Roman Catholic Church under Menezes at the synod of Diamper in 1599, it took decades until the local Syrian opposition, led by Archidiacon Thoma Parambil (Thomas de Campo), made intensive efforts to acquire a Syrian bishop. But Mar Atallah, the former Syrian-Orthodox archbishop from Damascus, who arrived in 1652, was captured by the Portuguese and taken to Europe. Thereafter the Thomas Christians took an anti-Latin oath, and 12 priests were consecrated by the Archdeacon Thomas (d. 1673) in an emergency ceremony. As a result, a faction of the Indian Thomas Christians came into being, the members of which have since been referred to as the Malankars.

In 1655, Thomas I received help and apostolic succession from the Metropolitan Gregorios Abdalgilil of Jerusalem and other bishops of the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East who traveled to India. As a result of the presence of these bishops, the Syrian Christians took on, under Thomas I, the West-Syrian liturgy and recognized the synod of Ephesus.

Once again, in the middle of the 18th century, problems arose surrounding the consecration of the church's leader, with the transition from Thomas IV to Thomas V and then Thomas VI. However, a delegation from the Syrian Orthodox bishops once again ordained validly and without conflict Thomas VI, later referred to as Dionysios I the Great (1761–1808).

In 1836 the general assembly of the Malankars strengthened their ties to the Syrian Orthodox Church in order to resist the Anglican Church Missionary Society, which was intent on reforming the Orthodox Syrians. With the synod of Mulanthuruthy in 1876, the Syrian Orthodox patriarch Petros IV (d. 1894) reorganized the Church of the Malankars, for which he had a full mandate. The reform Malankars were excommunicated and left the church (they formed the present-day Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar). But as early as 1911 there was a conflict between the Syrian Orthodox patriarch Abdallah II (1909–1915) and the Metropolitan Dionysios VI. This conflict arose when Abdallah tried to replace the Metropolitan Dionysios VI, who wanted more autonomy, with one of his own hierarchs. But with the help of the former Syrian Orthodox patriarch Abdalmasih II (who was deposed of his office in 1905 by the sultan), the Malankars managed to re-establish the Office of the Maphrian in India, which had been eliminated in the 19th century and had been united with the Office of the Metropolitane of Malankara since 1934. As a result, there were two opposing Malankarian Syrian Orthodox jurisdictions: the so-called Catholicos faction and the Patriarch faction. While the autonomists called for Indianization, those loyal to the patriarch sought to preserve old traditions. In 1975 the autonomist Augen I was suspended by the Syrian Orthodox synod in Damascus and was replaced by Katholikos Basileios Paulos II (d. 1996). Since then, the Malankars have once again appeared permanently divided—despite a decision of the Supreme Court of India in 1995 that aimed at unifying the Malankars.

The faith and the liturgical tradition of the Syrian Orthodox Church in India are similar to those of the Syriac Orthodox Church. The church approved the first three ecumenical councils (Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus) and denies the addition of the Filioque clause in the Apostles' Creed. They do not accept the concept of the Immaculate Conception of Mary. The liturgical language of the Syrian Orthodox Church is Syriac.

Membership in the Syrian Orthodox Church is estimated at approximately 650,000 people. The leadership of the church is part of the Syriac Orthodox episcopal synod. The leader is the Malankara Metropolitan and Chatholicose, respectively, and is supported by the Managing Committee of the church, the secretary of the church, and the trustees of the church. The church is divided into ten dioceses.

The Syrian Orthodox Church is also present outside India, primarily in expatriate/diasporic communities in Europe and North America. His Greatness Thomas Mor Themotheios is in charge of dioceses outside of Kerala, and His Greatness Joseph Mor Gregorios is in charge of the United Arab Emirates and European dioceses.

The Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar has a theological seminary in the state of Kerala at Udayagiri (near Mulanthuruthy). The seminary also functions as a center for the ecumenical activities of the church. In Kerala, ardent theological dialogues are taking place between the Syrian Orthodox Church and the Catholic Church (the foundation being a joint statement presented by Patriarch Yakub III and Pope Paul VI in 1971). As a result a draft resolution was prepared, and both churches have agreed in principle to allow marriages between its members. The Syrian Orthodox Church is also an active member of ecumenical organizations such as the World Council of Churches, the Christian Conference of Asia, and the National Council of Churches in India.

Syrian Orthodox Church
c/o H.G. Thomas Mor Dionysius Metropolitan Mount Senai Bishop's House
Kothamangalam
Kerala 822101
India

Martin Tamcke

See also: Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Christian Conference of Asia; Roman Catholic Church; Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; World Council of Churches.

References

- Kaniampampil, Kurian Corepiscopa. The Syrian Orthodox Church of India and Its Apostolic Faith. Tiruvalla, India: 1989.
- Madey, Johannes. "Background and History of the Present Schism in the Malankara Church." Oriens Christianus 60 (1976): 95–112.

Paul, Daniel Babu. The Syrian Orthodox Christians of St. Thomas. Ernakulam, India: Cochin, 1968.

Philip, E. M. The Indian Church of St. Thomas. Kottayam, India: 1951.

Williams, Raymond B. Christian Pluralism in the United States: The Indian Immigrant Experience. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Syro-Malabar Catholic Church

The Syro-Malabar Catholic Church emerged in the 15th century when Portuguese Roman Catholics discovered the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar (which now exists in two branches, the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar). The Malabar church traced its origin to the legendary ministry of the Apostle Thomas in the years after the death and resurrection of Jesus. As the Portuguese established their authority in India, Catholic missionaries began to impose a variety of Roman Catholic liturgical changes and practices upon the church. A number of these were formally adopted at a synod in 1599 held at Diamper. Portuguese were appointed as bishops, clerics were required to adopt a celibate existence, and the Inquisition was established to deal with heretics.

Over the next generation opposition to the new order grew, and in 1653, at another synod at Diamper, the majority of the church broke with Rome. They returned to their pre-Catholic practices. Pope Alexander VII subsequently appointed the Carmelites to rectify the problems in India. They arrived a short time later, and over the next decades many of those who had broken with Rome returned. The Carmelites held the leading positions in the church through the 19th century. By the 1680s a Syro-Malabar Catholic Church and a reordered Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar emerged, and both have continued to the present. The Syro-Malabar church is in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church.

For the next 200 years, the Latin-rite Catholic churches and Syro-Malabar congregations with their heavily Latinized liturgy remained part of the same jurisdiction. Then in 1887, Pope Leo XIII separated the two groups. In 1896 the Vatican erected three vicariates apostolic for the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church and placed indigenous bishops in charge. A fourth diocese was created in 1911. Through the 20th century, these four dioceses grew into five provinces, each headed by an archbishop and each including additional dioceses. As of 2008, there were 26 dioceses, 13 of which are in Kerala. In 1923 the vicariate apostolic of Ernakulam was elevated to an archdiocese, and in 1992 it was named the major archdiocese of Ernakulam-Angamly. The current archbishop, Cardinal Varkey Vithayathil (b. 1927), is the head of the Syro-Malabar Church.

The Syro-Malabar Catholic Church has an estimated four million members. That figure represents the remarkable growth since the 1930s, when there were fewer than half a million members. The church sponsors two major seminaries at Bangalor and Ujjain, and a number of religious orders. The several congregations in the United States and Canada have been organized into the one diocese of the church with jurisdiction outside of India.

As early as 1934, Pope Pius XI authorized a study of the Syro-Malabar liturgy with the aim of possible restoration of its pre-Latinized format. A revised liturgy was finally published in 1957, but it has not proved a popular format in India, where the Latinized liturgy had been used for several centuries.

Syro-Malabar Catholic Church
Major Archbishop's House
PB No. 2580
Kochi, Kerala 682 031
India
<http://www.smcim.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Roman Catholic Church; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar.

References

- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody, 1975.
- Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1, Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.
- Neill, S. C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984, 1985.

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church

The Syro-Malankara Catholic Church originated in 1926 out of disagreement within the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church in southern India. The Malankara church traces its beginning to the ministry of the Apostle Thomas, who, it is claimed, came to Kerala soon after the resurrection of Christ and founded several churches prior to his martyrdom. In the 15th century Indian Christians came in contact with the Roman Catholic Church. Missionaries who arrived with the Portuguese began to exert considerable influence over the church, and in 1599, at a synod at Diamper, imposed a variety of practices from the Latin rite on the church. In 1653 the majority of the Indian faithful rejected Roman authority and returned to the Syriac liturgy that they had previously used.

The re-established Orthodox Church then turned to the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, often called the Jacobite Church, for the episcopal orders lost during their years affiliated with Rome. In the 19th century, the Church of England, which had come to India with British rule, began to exert its influence on the Malabar church. Some suggestions for reform were accepted by parts of the church, leading it to split into two branches, the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar and the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church. The Mar Thoma Church accepted the reforms suggested by the Anglicans and has established formal communion with the Church of England.

The Malankara Church continued with its traditional practice and its communion with the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East. However, in the 1880s, a dispute developed with the patriarch of the Syrian Orthodox Church, who began to assert his ownership of the property of the Malankara Church. That dispute would continue in several phases until the 1950s. In the midst of this controversy, five Malankara bishops opened negotiations with Rome. They asked that their liturgy be retained and that they remain as bishops of their diocese. Originally, on September 30, 1930, two of the five made their profession of the faith. The next day, they were joined by two more of their episcopal colleagues. They and those priests and laypeople received with them constituted the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, a church in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church. In 1932, Mar Ivanios visited Rome. He was named archbishop of Trivandrum, and along with his archeparchy, the Eparchy of Tiruvalla was established. The new church drew significant support from the Malankara Church, and by 1960 it claimed more than 68,000 members.

At the time of its founding, the Roman Catholic Church already recognized a Syro-Malabar Catholic Church operating in the same area; however, this church uses a very different liturgy and has a variety of practices adopted from the Portuguese in the 1600s. With minor changes, the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church maintains the Syriac liturgy that had been used prior to the arrival of Europeans in Kerala.

Besides the archeparchy (archdiocese), there are six exarchies (dioceses) in India. The church has 413,000 members (2008). Its current leader is Major Archbishop Isaac Clemmis Thottunka (b. 1959), who took office in 2007. There are scattered congregations across North America, but no diocese.

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church
Archbishop's House
Trivandrum 695 004
Kerala
India
www.malankaracatholicchurch.net

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Roman Catholic Church; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar.

Reference

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

T

Tabernacles, Feast of

See Sukkot.

T'aego Pou

1301–1382

T'aego Pou, to whom most practitioners of Korean Son Buddhism trace their lineage, carried out a reorganization of the Son community a little more than a century after Chinul (1158–1210) had succeeded in reforming it.

T'aego was born in Kwangju, in southern Korea. The religious life was presented to him as a child and he was but 13 when initially ordained as a monk. He attained his first awakening six years later, and, after more than a decade of practice, he attained his deeper enlightenment when he was 37. Several years later he settled at Mount Samgak (near modern-day Seoul) at Chungheungsa Temple, where he built Sosolam Hermitage east of the temple. Here he would complete his first major writing, the Gailpyeon, and here he would attract many students. During this time he would also become known as an accomplished poet.

T'aego's visit to China for two years (1346–1348) became a watershed event for him. While in China, he met a spectrum of Buddhist Chan leaders, among them Shi Wu, the patriarch of the Linji Chan School. Shi Wu verified T'aego's awakening and commissioned him to spread the Linji (termed in Korea, Imje, and in Japan, Rinzaï) teachings through his homeland. T'aego returned home with the idea that he would remain at Sosolam the rest of his life. Changes in the Korean political situation, however, altered his plans.

Korea entered a tumultuous period as the Chinese Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), which had hegemony over Korea, moved into its last years. In 1351, the Korean king Kongmon (1351–1374) asserted Korea's independence and the next year invited T'aego to his court in the role of the king's teacher. Once established, T'aego used his position to obtain the king's backing for a broad program of uniting the several Son groups into which the Son community was divided into a single organization. Because of his study and authorization from China, his popularity was quite high. In 1356, the king showed his support for the reorganization plan by naming him as the teacher of the nation.

It took a decade to complete the reorganization of the Korean Son centers, after which T'aego retired from public life. Following his death in 1382, he was honored with the title Son Master of Perfect Realization. His relics now reside in a granite stupa on Mount Samgak.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Chinul; Rinzaï (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam); Zen Buddhism.

References

- Cleary, J. C., trans. T'aego Pou: A Buddha from Korea. Boston: Shambhala Publications, 1992.
- Kim, Jaihiun J., trans. Poems by Zen Masters. Seoul, Korea: Hanshin Pub. Co., 1988.
- Soeng, Mu. Thousand Peaks: Korean Zen—Traditions and Teachers. Cumberland, RI: Primary Point Press, 1991.

Taiwan

See China: Taiwan.

Tai Shan

Tai Shan is one of five sacred mountains in China associated both with ancient Chinese indigenous religion and with Daoism and which have remained sacred sites to the present. Traditional veneration of mountains in China differs somewhat from that in the West, where mountains have been considered places of encounters with the divine (Mount Sinai) or the abode of deities. They have assumed the role of a deity themselves. Of the various mountains considered sacred, Tai Shan is the most sacred of all. The Shu-ching, a classic text of Chinese traditional history, compiled around the fifth century BCE, related the story of pilgrimages of the ruler Shun (2255–2206), who traveled to the four mountains that defined the boundaries of his realm every five years. Of the traditional sacred mountains of China visited by Shun, Tai Shan is the only one mentioned by name.

Through the centuries, the Chinese emperors thought of Tai Shan as the actual son of the Emperor of Heaven, from whom they received their own authority to rule the people, while for the people, the mountain functioned as a point of communication with the god who oversaw the affairs of humans. It stood long before the construction of Tiantan, the Temple of Heaven in Beijing, where annual rituals were carried out to stabilize Chinese prosperity. The mountain was also the home of Taishung fujan, the mountain lord who served as the ruler of souls. Tai Shan was also seen as the residence of the deceased. When the emperor made his visit to the five mountains, Tai Shan would be the first stop. Earthly emperors were required to annually present themselves before the heavenly emperor, validate their right to ruler, and offer a ritual sacrifice.

Many of the ancient emperors are believed to have come to Tai Shan, but the first documented visit occurred in 219 BCE. The Emperor Shih-huang, best known for having built the Great Wall, left a rock carving noting his pilgrimage. Subsequent accounts of imperial visits note the large retinue that would accompany the emperor, including courtiers, soldiers, and the merely curious. On such occasions, the six-mile route from the top to the bottom of the mountain would be packed with people, and over the years they have left evidence of their visits by inscribing poems and passing thoughts on the rock lining the 7,000 steps to the mountain's peak.

Upon reaching the top, pilgrims find two temples dominating the site—the Temple of the Jade Emperor (the Emperor of Heaven), the ruler of this world in traditional Chinese religion, which houses a bronze statue of the deity; and the Bixia, a temple dedicated to the Princess of the Azure Clouds, one of the Jade Emperor's daughters. Women are especially drawn to the Bixia. Women who have had trouble having a child and their mothers yearning for a grandchild make their way to the Bixia to prayer for children and grandchildren. Also, accompanying the image of the Princess are two goddesses known for their miracles, one believed especially attentive to eye ailments and the other to the ailments of children.

On the way up and down the slope, pilgrims will find several smaller temples and a variety of services— inns, eateries, and souvenir shops—established over the centuries to assist the pilgrims (and more recently the many tourists). Numerous additional temples are located in Tai'an and Jinan, the two cities located at the base of the mountain at either end.

For the Daoists, each of the sacred mountains represented a different direction (which coincided with their role of marking the extent of the country). Tai Shan anchors the east, between the cities of Tai'an and Jinan in Shandong Province, between Beijing and Shanghai. The government has taken steps to improve transportation to Tai Shan and has added a cable car for those not up to climbing the 7,000 steps. The government now views the mountain in terms of Chinese history and culture rather than as posing any kind of religious threat. It rises abruptly 5,069 feet above the plains that surround it. In 1987, it was added to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization's (UNESCO) list of World Heritage Sites.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Heng Shan; Song Shan; Temples—Buddhist; Tiantan.

References

- Baker, Dwight C. Tai Shan—An Account of the Sacred Eastern Peak of China. Taipei: Ch'eng Wen, 1971 (originally published 1925).

Einarsen, John, ed. The Sacred Mountains of Asia. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.

Hahn, Thomas H. "Daoist Sacred Sites." In Daoism Handbook, edited by Livia Kohn, 683–708. Leiden: Brill, 2004.

Mt. Tai Shan Landscape. House of Shandong Province: People's Publishing, 1982.

"Sacred Mountains of China." Places of Peace and Power. http://www.sacredsites.com/asia/china/sacred_mountains.html. Accessed May 15, 2009.

■ Tajikistan

Formed in 1991 as the Soviet Union was dissolved, Tajikistan is a Central Asian country surrounded by Afghanistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and China. As part of its territory was taken from Uzbekistan early in the 20th century, Uzbeks form a significant minority group in the country. As of 2008, 7,212,000 citizens inhabited the country's 55,250 square miles of land. The Tajiks of Tajikistan are distantly related to the Tajiks who inhabit the Tashkurgan Tajik Autonomous County in northwest China.

The area that composes the modern state of Tajikistan was inhabited by the sixth century BCE, and within its territory several important trading centers for the ancient Central Asian world arose. The land was first overrun by the Persians, and then in the fourth century BCE by Alexander the Great (356–323). In the millennium after Alexander, the region was occupied by various invading armies. In the sixth and seventh centuries CE, Turkish peoples moved onto the land, only a short time before the Arab Muslim Empire incorporated Tajikistan into the caliphate. Islam was introduced at this time and soon became the dominant religion of the people. During the years of the succeeding Tahirid and Samanid kingdoms, the Tajik people emerged as a separate ethnic group (in the ninth and 10th centuries). Their language is a dialect of Persian.

Tajikistan was part of a series of kingdoms through the next centuries, finally falling into a set of fiefdoms in the 17th century. Some of these were subservient to the Bukhara Khanate based in Uzbekistan. Then in the 1860s the Russians moved into Central Asia, and through the 1870s they annexed the northern half of

Entrance to a mosque in Tajikistan. (Radist/Dreamstime.com)

Tajikistan. The Khanate of Bukhara retained some degree of independence, and much of western Tajikistan was reorganized as the Province of Eastern Bukhara.

Soviet power in the region was established in stages, but in 1924 the Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic of Tajikistan was incorporated into the new Soviet Socialist Republic of Uzbekistan. It was separated from Uzbekistan in 1929 and remained in the Soviet Union until independence in 1991. Following independence old tensions between Tajiks and Russians flared, and many Russians bearing needful skills returned to their homeland.

Through the 1990s the new government faced a somewhat unstable adjustment to post-Communist life, including a civil war led by a former prime minister (1997). The government has been especially concerned about conservative Islamic groups, and in 1998 a treaty with Uzbekistan was reached out of common concern about terrorists being trained in Afghanistan. In 1999 the Parliament passed a law banning religious organizations from having a direct relationship with any political party.

TAJIKISTAN

The majority of Muslims follow the Sunni Hanafite School. This community came under sharp attack during the Stalinist years, but the attempts to suppress it relaxed in the decades following World War II. Soviet authorities returned control of the community to local leadership, and even placed the imams on government salaries through the Muslim Board of Central Asia (1943). Russian became the language of discourse, and Muslim leaders tried to picture Russian culture as more attractive than the Turkish one that had become popular in the 19th century. Imams for this officially sanctioned Muslim activity were trained at the two seminaries in Uzbekistan.

Besides the Hanafite majority, there is also a visible Wahhabi presence, with their main support being in the Kurdistan region in the southern highlands. The

Tajikistan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,856,000	6,003,000	85.0	1.22	8,208,000	10,249,000
Agnostics	570,000	820,000	11.6	1.14	500,000	300,000
Atheists	421,000	120,000	1.7	1.09	100,000	80,000
Christians	82,500	101,000	1.4	0.60	97,300	97,500
Orthodox	62,200	87,000	1.2	0.31	77,000	68,000
Protestants	20,300	9,500	0.1	1.81	12,000	15,000
Independents	0	2,500	0.0	4.56	5,000	10,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	6,600	0.1	1.20	7,000	8,000
Buddhists	0	5,000	0.1	1.19	8,000	14,000
Baha'is	0	3,200	0.0	1.22	5,000	8,000
Zoroastrians	0	2,400	0.0	1.20	2,400	2,400
Jews	12,000	950	0.0	-0.61	900	900
Total population	2,942,000	7,062,000	100.0	1.19	8,929,000	10,760,000

Wahhabis gained strength from those Muslims opposed to Soviet intervention in neighboring Afghanistan. There is also a Shia community, centered in the Gorno-Badakhshan Autonomous Oblast, and a group of Ismaili, known as Pamiris, that originated in the 10th century and currently reside in the remote Pamir Mountains. There is a popular folk Islam that undergirds all of the various Muslim groups and lends special support to the Naqshbandīya Sufi Brotherhood.

Christianity, in the form of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), was introduced with the arrival of the czar's forces in the 1860s. The church grew as Russians moved to the region both before and after the Soviet era. Today its several parishes have been incorporated into the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. St. Nicholas Cathedral in Dushanbe is the center of the Orthodox community.

In the 1920s, Soviet authorities deported two Baptist pastors and their wives to Dushanbe, Tajikistan's capital. They became the core of the first Protestant church in the region, and through the rest of the decade they were joined by other Baptists who migrated and settled in Dushanbe or nearby. In 1930 the church chose I. Ya. Danilenko as its first minister. A second congregation was formed by the closely related evangelical Christians. The two small groups united in 1936, but the next year authorities closed the church. When it was allowed to reopen in 1944, some 35 members remained. It experienced slow but steady growth through the next half-century, and at the time of independence it had more than 800 members; in addition, other congregations had been formed throughout the country. The church suffered greatly from independence and the civil war that followed. Many of its members (especially the Russians and the German-speaking) chose to leave, and by the middle of the 1990s, only some 350 members could be found.

Besides the Baptists there are small numbers of Lutherans and Pentecostal believers in Tajikistan. The small number of members of the Seventh-day Adventist Church has been incorporated into its Asian-Caucasian Conference, which additionally includes members in five other counties. There is a small Armenian community that adheres to the Armenian Apostolic Church. The attempts to rebuild the Protestant community in the years since independence have met obstacles in the new regulations imposed by the government. The Jehovah's Witnesses have been completely banned (as of 2010).

The Judaic community of Tajikistan is closely related to the one in Uzbekistan. They speak a distinct dialect of Tajik, called Judeo-Tajik. They are found primarily in Dushanbe. Jews may have arrived in the region as early as the sixth century BCE. They were the only people in the region who did not accept Islam in the seventh and eighth centuries CE. Attempts at forced conversion by Muslims in the 17th century led to the existence of secret Jews, not unlike the Marranos of Spain. At the end of the 18th century, a Moroccan rabbi, Joseph Maman (Mamon) Maghribi, settled in Bukhara. He led a revival of Jewish life and introduced the Sephardi prayer rite that replaced the Persian rite previously used in most synagogues.

As early as the 1880s, Jews began to move to Israel, and in the 1970s some 8,000 of the 30,000 Jews believed to be living in Tajikistan and Uzbekistan migrated. By the beginning of the new century, most of Tajikistan's Jews had migrated. In 2008, the government ordered the demolition of the country's last active synagogue as part of a planned renovation of the capital city.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Etchmiadzin); Hanafite School of Islam; Ismaili Islam; Judaism; Naqshbandiya Sufi Order; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Atkin, M. Tadjikistan: Nationalism, Religion, and Political Change. Washington, DC: National Council for Soviet and East European Research, 1992.
- Harris, Colette. Muslim Youth: Tensions and Transitions in Tajikistan. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2006.
- Jonson, Lena. Tajikistan in the New Central Asia: Geopolitics, Great Power Rivalry and Radical Islam. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Khalid, Adeeb. Islam after Communism: Religion and Politics in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- Muriel, A. The Subtlest Battle: Islam in Soviet Tajikistan. Philadelphia: Foreign Policy Research Institute, 1989.
- Samuels, T. B. "Tajikistan and the Islamic Revival." M.A. thesis, University of Virginia, 1987.

Taliban

The Taliban, the "Students of Islamic Knowledge Movement," the organization that controlled the largest part of Afghanistan as the 21st century began, got its start among youth that were attending madrasas, religious schools, which had been set up in Pakistan by Afghan refugees during the 1980s, at which time the Russians occupied much of the country. Most of the southern part of Afghanistan was inhabited by people who were ethnically Pashtuns and speakers of a distinctive language, Pashti. This same ethno-linguistic group was dominant in that part of Pakistan adjacent to Afghanistan. The Pashtuns were traditionally followers of the Hanafite School of Sunni Islam. The new movement among the students, a primary expression of Islamism, placed an extremely conservative interpretation on their tradition, much as the Wahhabis did in Arabia, and found inspiration from the Pakistani-based Jamaat-e-Islam and its founder, Sayyid Abul al-Mawdudi (1903–1979).

By the early 1990s, the Taliban had evolved into a formal organization under the leadership of a council (ulama, literally a community of learned men) and the council's leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar. Movement leaders spread through the Pashtun areas of Afghanistan and quickly gained a large following. Formed as a militia, in 1996 the Taliban moved on Kabul, the capital, and quickly took over from the divided ruling elite, who had been drawn from the Uzbek and Tajik ethnic groups whose strength lay in the north (many of whom were either Shia Muslims or secular Marxists). The defeated leaders quickly formed an alliance against the Taliban and remained in control of the northern third of the country. (Through the 1990s, the United Nations and the United States did not recognize the Taliban, considering Afghanistan a land without a government. They recognized instead the government of Shia leader Burhanuddin Rabbani, of the Northern Alliance, as the rightful leader of Afghanistan. Only Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates recognized the leadership in Kabul.)

Once in control of the capital, Taliban leaders instituted a strict interpretation of Islamic law that included traditional modest dress for women, restrictions on female education, and denying access to male physicians. It also reintroduced various forms of punishment that have largely been banished from the West (flogging, amputation of limbs, and execution by stoning). They moved to end the lawlessness that had come to many parts of the country in the wake of the Russian withdrawal, and found televisions and video cassettes offensive to Islam. Although those actions made the Taliban unpopular in many quarters, it was the destruction of large Buddhist statues, considered by many as art treasures, in March 2001 that brought widespread denunciations from around the world.

Members of the Taliban pose with AK-47 assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades in Zabul province, south of Kabul, Afghanistan, October 2006. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1996 the leaders of the Taliban invited Osama bin Laden (b. 1957) to re-establish his organization, al-Qaeda, in Afghanistan. Subsequently, al-Qaeda was charged with a series of attacks upon U.S. citizens and property, culminating in the attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001. The Taliban was implicated in these attacks because of its harboring bin Laden in Afghanistan. In October 2001, the United States began military actions in Afghanistan aimed at capturing bin Laden and his associates and destroying al-Qaeda. Secondarily, the attack has been on the Taliban as an accessory to the terrorism perpetuated by the al-Qaeda network. The attack destroyed the Taliban government but by no means destroyed the organization. It retreated into the rural areas of the country and has continued to put up resistance.

As the attempt to establish a post-Taliban government proceeded, the United States continued to house forces in the country even as it diverted attention to its invasion of Iraq. Hostilities have continued in Afghanistan to the present, with the fortunes of the Taliban alternately waxing and waning. It has also become entrenched in Pakistan, the mountainous area immediate adjacent to the Afghanistan border.

In 2009, the United States moved to reduce its commitments in Iraq and simultaneously began to build its forces in Afghanistan to stop any possibility of a revival of support for the Taliban.

In the 1990s, the Taliban had developed a presence in the United States, but it disappeared following the bombing of the Pentagon and World Trade Center in 2001. By early 2002, their Internet site, <http://www.taleban.com>, was no longer functioning and no pro-Taliban site remained.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hanafite School of Islam; Islam; Islamism; Jamaat-e-Islam; Shia Islam; Statues—Buddhist; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Anderson, Jon Lee, and Thomas Dworzak. Taliban. London: Trolley, 2004.
- Bick, Barbara. Walking the Precipice: Witness to the Rise of the Taliban in Afghanistan. New York: Feminist Press of CUNY, 2009.
- Maley, William, ed. Fundamentalism Reborn? Afghanistan and the Taliban. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Matinuddin, Kamal. The Taliban Phenomenon: Afghanistan, 1994–1997. Karachi: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Rashid, Ahmed. Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Zaidi, Syed Manzar Abbas. The New Taliban: Emergence and Ideological Sanctions. Hauppauge, NY: Nova Science Publishers, 2009.

Tamil Shaivism

Tamil Shaivism (or Saivism) refers both to a broad category that may include any type of Shiva-worship in the 2,000 years or more of its existence in the Tamil-language region of southern India, and to a specific system of devotionism that developed in this region. In the latter case, Tamil Shaivism typically denotes Shaiva Siddhanta, an organized sect that promotes a distinct theology, articulated in Tamil and Sanskrit texts that also inform Shaiva temple rituals today.

Shiva-worship appears in the Tamil literary record from the early centuries CE. In the Purananuru (ca.

first–third centuries CE), a king is advised to circumambulate a temple of “the three-eyed god,” a common epithet of Shiva. By the fifth century, the Silappadigaram epic shows that Shiva’s mythology, iconography, and worship were well known. Beginning from the sixth to ninth centuries, Shiva’s popularity spread when devotees called nayanmar, “leaders,” made pilgrimages to local sacred places and celebrated Shiva’s manifestations there. Through accessible Tamil songs, poet-saints like Appar, Sambandhar, Sundarar, and Manikkavachagar promoted bhakti, the ecstatic, loving devotion to a personal deity, and helped create an enduring temple-centered religious culture.

This popular devotional movement grew alongside—and soon intertwined with—a school of Shaivism that came to be called Shaiva Siddhanta (“perfected” or “fully concluded”). It apparently originated in northern India sometime before the eighth century CE among monastic communities in what is now Madhya Pradesh. Between the 10th and 13th centuries, monastic lineages spread throughout India. The school emphasized the liberating role of ritual, a dualistic philosophy, and respect for conventional caste and gender distinctions. It also tended both to accept the legitimacy of the Veda and to assert the superiority of Shaiva Siddhanta over it, as stated in texts said to be revealed by Shiva and transmitted in Sanskrit in oral and written forms. The tradition eventually lost its all-India spread, but became and remains the normative form of organized Shaivism in Tamil Nadu.

Shaiva Siddhanta was originally based on 28 primary Agamas, said to be knowledge of Shiva first revealed by the Lord himself and eventually written down; more than 200 subsidiary Agamas exist as well. The earliest of these Sanskrit works are datable to the eighth century CE, but they must have existed in oral or written form for some time before that. These texts focus primarily on rules for ritual worship, doctrinal exegesis, and rites of initiation and funerals; some, not all, add guidelines for correct conduct and yogic practices. Many Agamas also provide information on iconography of divine images, temple architecture, and guidelines for conducting festivals.

The dualist doctrine of Shaiva Siddhanta’s Agamas accepts three fundamental and separate realities: Shiva (pati), souls (pashu), and fetters (pasha). Shiva is the ultimate God who is omniscient, omnipotent, and eternally liberated. Souls, too, have most of the same inherent qualities, but, caught in a state of spiritual bondage, they do not realize their true nature. Out of his grace, Shiva creates the universe through the agency of divine beings in order to provide the conditions for souls to find release from the shackles of ignorance, karma, and materiality. Ritual plays a crucial role in the soul's spiritual progress. A qualified guru, who acts as Shiva's representative, removes most of the disciple's fetters through the "liberating initiation" (nirvanadiksha). The disciple should also ritually worship Shiva every day in order to remove new karmic bonds that he continues to generate after initiation. The ultimate goal is to become like or equal to Shiva.

Later Shaiva Siddhanta texts developed the Agamas's teachings in new ways. Medieval preceptors, first from northern India and later from the Tamil-speaking south, composed Agamic commentaries, doctrinal syntheses, and manuals of ritual instruction, all in Sanskrit. Many of these writings sought to unify the teachings of the Agamas. Then, from the 13th to 14th centuries, philosophical works in Tamil were composed and canonized as the Meykandasastiram, authoritative texts composed by the author Meykandar and later writers. Unlike the Sanskrit works, the texts of this collection heightened the importance of devotion and understood liberation as the merging of the soul into Shiva.

Shaiva Siddhanta's dualist stance has faced serious competition from the non-dualist philosophy of Advaita Vedanta. Although non-dualist ideas appear even in a few Agamas, important thinkers like Aghorashivacharya (12th century) and Umapati Shivacharya (14th century) vigorously defended the fundamental separation of Shiva and souls. But later authors such as Shivagrayogin and the Appayadikshita (both 16th century) helped promote a non-dualist understanding of Shaivism that continues today. The popular Tamil idea that the highest goal for devotees is to "melt" or merge with Shiva also contributed to the shift away from dualism.

Shaiva Siddhanta religious professionals are of two main types, distinguished by caste and function. Male priests of the Adishaiva Brahman subcaste perform the rituals in most Shiva temples for the welfare of the lay public and the state. High-caste, non-Brahman male ascetics residing in monastic institutions compose the other group of professionals. Their lineages were established by the 16th century in the Tanjavur region as centers of Shaiva learning and private religious practice.

Today, Shaiva Siddhanta in India is organized most strongly at the local level. Training schools for priests, temple and monastic administrative structures, and caste and kinship networks provide institutional support, while ascetic leaders and respected priests offer limited leadership. The sect extends membership to the four varna social classes, but excludes the lowest castes, for whom social and legal redress began only in the 1940s and remains far from complete. Women may receive initiation as lay members but are barred from priestly and monastic ranks and may not perform ritual worship in the elaborate manner of initiated males.

Outside India, the tradition appears mostly among expatriate Tamil communities, as in Sri Lanka, Malaysia, Singapore, and North America. One exception is the Saiva Siddhanta Church, based in Hawaii. The late Sivaya Subramuniaswami, a convert of American origin, founded this international organization in 1949. The organization aims to propagate a form of non-dualist Shaiva Siddhanta around the world.

It is not easy to calculate Shaiva Siddhanta membership, let alone that of Tamil Shaivas in general. Although formally initiated practitioners are no doubt few, Shaiva Siddhanta's ritual tradition has exerted great influence because its priests conduct the rites at most Shiva temples in Tamil-speaking Hindu communities. In India notable Siddhanta worship centers include the great temples of Madurai, Tiruvannamalai, and Rameshwaram. Important monastic institutions include Dharmapuram and Tiruvavatuturai.

Ginette Ishimatsu

See also: Asceticism; Hinduism; Pilgrimage; Tirumala/Tirupati; Yoga.

References

- Davis, Richard H. Ritual in an Oscillating Universe: Worshiping Siva in Medieval India. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, 1991.

- Dunuwila, Rohan A. Saiva Siddhanta Theology. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1985.
- Fuller, C. J. Renewal of the Priesthood: Modernity and Traditionalism in a South Indian Temple. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Good, Anthony. Worship and the Ceremonial Economy of a Royal South Indian Temple. New York: Edwin Mellen, 2004.
- Koppedrayar, K. I. "Are Sudras Entitled to Ride in the Palanquin?" Contributions to Indian Sociology 25, no. 2 (1991): 191–210.

Tantrism

Tantrism is a term used by scholars of South Asian religions to describe ritual and theological traditions that aim at spiritual liberation (moksha) as well as the attainment of supernatural powers by means of certain ritual practices that will lead to the cosmic reintegration with the deity, who is conceived as identical with supreme power. As such Tantrism does not refer to a particular group or sect, but to a set of elements and influences that are found to varying degrees in Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain textual, theological, and ritual traditions.

The word tantra encompasses a group of post-Vedic Sanskrit texts, composed between the eighth and 11th centuries, and associated body of ritual practice that have had significant impact in the development of the Hindu tradition. Tantras belonging to the Shaiva traditions are called Agamas (tradition), while those that those affiliated with Vaishanva traditions are called Samhita. These Tantric traditions probably have had a much longer tradition of transmission and preservation that predates collected and redacted texts in the form in which they are available today. Tantric texts generally present a systematic programmatic search for liberation (moksha) and spiritual power centered on Vishnu, Shiva, or the Goddess as the focus of theological speculation.

It is often difficult to distinguish specific traditions—Vaishanava, Shaiva, or Shakta—in part due to the esoteric nature of these traditions. These traditions of ritual exegesis were restricted to those had been initiated (diksha) and became members of the spiritual lineage (parampara) of a specific teacher (guru). The guru would reveal the teachings only to his students. The trope of secrecy was expressed both in the method of teaching and in the texts, which often state that the Tantra (as a book) should never be recited or even housed among non-initiates. Some Tantras not only claimed to be revelation (shruti) and thus intimately linked to the Vedas, but some claimed to surpass the truth revealed in Vedas. Others implicitly acknowledge the status of the Veda as sacred by attributing their ultimate origin to the verbal tradition, which was revealed by Shiva, and as such were the culmination of Vedic revelation.

Taking into account the context of the Tantras as we have them, it is probable that Tantric traditions originated among particularly marginalized ascetic groups, especially those who practiced some form of cremation-ground asceticism. These ascetics, who lived in cremation grounds, were probably mostly members of the lower-caste groups, and their ritual and ascetic practices transgressed the standard Brahmanic orthopraxic concern for ritual purity. These ascetic traditions practiced cremation-ground asceticism, as is noted in the Pali Buddhist sources. However, it is also clear that Tantric texts incorporate various stands of mainstream Vedic thought, especially the system of correlations or identities (bandhus) between the cosmic, ritual, and human order of reality. As in the Vedas, Tantric texts understand cosmic processes to have counterparts in the microcosmic plane. Indeed, much of the esoteric speculation in Tantric texts regarding the bipolar, bisexual nature of the Absolute, the creative nature of sound (shabda) and word, and the complex mapping of the cosmos unto the human body is based on the type of speculation about the nature of Vedic sacrifice and ritual carried out by orthodox Brahmans of the Vedas. Thus, rather than thinking about Tantric movements as having originated from popular, extra-Vedic contexts, the texts indicate that many Tantric texts were an outgrowth of the same intellectual system of thought as that of the religious specialists of the time, the Brahmans. Tantra does not refer to a particular tradition or ritual system, but rather to a body of practices and concepts that have had an impact on the development of various Hindu traditions and systems of thought. Thus, beyond specific Tantric texts, it is not possible to historically identify traditions or groups that can be classified as exclusively Tantric.

Tantric texts generally address four general topics: doctrine (vidya), ritual (kriya), yoga, and behavior (carya). It is by means of ritual, yoga, and behavior that the Tantric adept (tantrika or sadhaka) seeks to control his or her body to manipulate the various levels of reality in order to attain liberation. Tantric ritual achieves this goal through the hierarchical identification of an elaborate geography of the body with its cosmic counterparts. By establishing these identities, oppositions are overcome in unity. Tantric practice includes recitation of mantras and the construction of complex geometric designs (mandalas, yantras) used for meditational practice, which require special initiation. The spiritual practices of the left-handed (vamacara) Tantras seek to overcome duality by complete immersion into all aspects of the world, which is conceived as completely pervaded by shakti. The adept undertakes the pañcatattva ritual, in which he or she ritually partakes of the five forbidden truths, the so-called five m's—alcohol (madya), meat (mamsa), fish (matysa), parched grain (mudra), and illicit sexual intercourse (maithuna). By completely embracing those things and acts that transgress accepted orthopraxy, the adept overcomes the duality of clean and unclean, sacred and profane, and shatters the bondage to the world.

Tantric traditions are monistic, with a focus on a singular essence or godhead that is understood as being polarized into male and female aspects. The female dimension of this singular essence is shakti, the energy without which the male god cannot act. It is this feminine aspect of the godhead that is conceived as the active force responsible for the cosmic process of creation.

By the 11th century, Tantric practices and metaphysical doctrines had become popular beyond the restricted circles of cremation-ground ascetics and had spread in Brahmanic circles, especially in Kashmir, where Tantric rituals and philosophic ideas had made their way into courtly circles. In Kashmir as in other areas, Tantric rituals and practices were incorporated not only into the elite circles, but also into the wider householder (grihastha) society. Mantras that were originally used to coerce and control supernatural forces and powers were domesticated mantras and identified as manifestation of the gods. Early Tantric ritual practices, which involved engaging in generally unaccepted, antisocial practices, came to be understood as purely symbolic in nature, only to be used as a tool for meditational practice. Puranic traditions absorbed and re-interpreted many Tantric elements and eventually incorporated them into the corpus of classical Hindu art, practice, and thought.

Carlos Lopez

See also: Asceticism; Meditation; Sacred Texts; Shaivism; Vaishnavism; Yoga.

References

- Flood, Gavin D. The Tantric Body: The Secret Tradition of Hindu Religion. London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Gourdiaan, Teun, and Sanjukta Gupta. Hindu Tantric and Shakta Literature. Wiesbaden, Germany: O. Harrassowitz, 1981.
- Harper, Katherine Anne, and Robert Brown, eds. The Roots of Tantra. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2002.
- Padoux, Andre. Vac: The Concept of the Word in Selected Hindu Tantras. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
- White, David Gordon. Kiss of Yogini: "Tantric Sex" in Its South Asian Contexts. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

■ Tanzania

Tanzania is an eastern African nation of some 364,898 square miles located on the Indian Ocean between Kenya and Mozambique. The country also shares borders with Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Zambia, and Malawi. It is home to 40,200,000 people (2008). Most of Tanzania consists of the former British colony of Tanganyika, but in the 1960s the islands of Zanzibar, and the fabled Zanzibar City, joined in the formation of the new nation.

Tanzania's Rift Valley has been inhabited for a million years, and it is the site from which some of the oldest human fossils known have been extracted from rock strata. However, in much more recent times it was settled by Bantu people, now divided into more than 120 separate ethnic groupings. Tanzania entered modern history in 695 CE, when Prince Hamza of Oman, the first of a number of losers in various political struggles on the Arabian peninsula, settled on the East African coast. Hamza chose Zanzibar as his new home. He was followed by a group from Mecca who founded Mogadishu (Somalia). Later immigrants founded Mombasa (Kenya) and Beira (Mozambique). The Arabs intermarried with the Zandi, or blacks, creating a new trading culture along the coast that tied East Africa to Arabia and eventually to India and lands farther east.

A Christian church in Tanzania. (Janis Jansons/Dreamstime.com)

The Portuguese arrived at the beginning of the 16th century and by the 1520s had taken control of the East African coast. They destroyed the Zandi culture and economic structure. They remained in control until 1688, when the sultan of Oman recaptured Zanzibar, part of a lengthy effort to drive the Portuguese out of the region. The sultan settled in Zanzibar, and his family remained in control into the 18th century. During this time, the slave trade flourished. Toward the end of the century, Zanzibar was lost to rival Arab leaders. The movement of the British into the region in the early 19th century stopped the movement of slaves out of Zanzibar and turned the rulers' attention to the mainland and the development of plantations that absorbed the slaves. Cloves became the new cash crop.

The weakening power of the sultan in the face of European encroachments came to a head in 1884, when a German arrived and annexed land on the mainland. His actions were backed by German warships. In 1886 the European powers gave Tanganyika, Burundi, and Rwanda to Germany, and Zanzibar became a British protectorate in 1890. Following Germany's defeat in World War I, the British took control of Tanganyika. It remained a colony until 1961, when the modern nation of Tanzania was proclaimed.

TANZANIA

The settlers from Oman who developed Zanzibar brought with them the Ibadi Kharijite form of Islam that predominates in Oman. Kharijism is usually distinguished by its lack of allegiance to the Arab caliph and by its belief that leadership in the Muslim community should not be limited to descendants of the Prophet Muhammad. Rather, leaders should be chosen on a merit system. It developed prior to the emergence of the four schools of Sunni Islam and the split between Sunnis and Shias. It places much more emphasis on the Koran in making legal decisions than on the hadith, the traditions concerning Muhammad.

The movement of Muslims from other parts of the Arabian peninsula to become an integral part of Zandj culture ensured that the Kharijite sect did not gain control of the culture, which eventually was ruled by the Sunni Shafiite School, the dominant segment of the Tanzanian Muslim community except on Zanzibar

Tanzania

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,000,000	23,690,000	54.4	2.92	34,625,000	51,666,000
Roman Catholics	2,807,000	12,380,000	28.4	2.75	17,900,000	26,000,000
Protestants	1,068,000	8,450,000	19.4	3.28	12,500,000	17,350,000
Anglicans	386,000	3,350,000	7.7	2.17	5,000,000	7,500,000
Muslims	4,211,000	13,250,000	30.4	2.60	18,200,000	25,700,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,300,000	5,820,000	13.4	1.49	6,000,000	6,000,000
Hindus	21,000	375,000	0.9	2.60	520,000	740,000
Baha'is	41,000	190,000	0.4	2.60	280,000	440,000
Agnostics	18,000	110,000	0.3	2.60	200,000	300,000
Buddhists	0	60,000	0.1	2.60	85,000	115,000
Atheists	3,000	24,000	0.1	2.60	40,000	60,000
Sikhs	3,000	12,800	0.0	2.60	20,000	25,000
Jains	800	10,000	0.0	2.60	18,000	30,000
Jews	100	300	0.0	2.58	400	600
Zoroastrians	100	120	0.0	2.43	150	150
Total population	13,598,000	43,542,000	100.0	2.60	59,989,000	85,077,000

Island. Islam spread dramatically in the period between the two World Wars. In the 20th century, the community was enlarged by a number of Indo-Pakistanis, mostly Shias.

The cosmopolitan nature of modern Dar es Salaam has permitted the diversity of the Muslim community to manifest, and today there are centers of Ismaili, Bohras, and Ithna-Asharis. The Ahmadiyya Muslim movement arrived in 1934, and it now has more than 40 branch centers. Approximately 32 percent of Tanzanian's residents are Muslims.

Christianity originally came to Tanzania in the 16th century with the Portuguese, but its presence was superficial and short lived. Then, in 1860, several priests moved to Zanzibar. The Holy Ghost Fathers arrived three years later and eventually developed their first center at Bagamoyo, founded as a settlement for freed slaves. When the White Fathers arrived in 1878, they used Bagamoyo as their point of departure into the interior. Other orders followed. The dioceses of Dar es Sallam and Tabora (two of the now four archdioceses) were designated in 1887.

Tanzania was part of the famous exploratory travels of David Livingstone, a missionary of the London Missionary Society. His visit to Oxford and Cambridge in 1857 led to the formation of the Universities'

Mission to Central Africa, a High-Church Anglican sending agency, and to the launching of the first mission to Tanzania, in 1860. That same year, the London Missionary Society, which was already at work in Rhodesia (Zambia), pushed northward into Tanzania around Lake Tanganyika. The Church Missionary Society, a Low-Church Anglican sending agency, arrived in 1886. The Anglican work would eventually mature into the Church in the Province of Tanzania.

The German colonial advent into Tanzania led to the arrival of several Lutheran missionary societies, beginning in 1886 with the Berlin Mission at Dar es Salaam. The expanded Lutheran work was turned over to several American churches, including the Augustan Lutherans, after World War I. Eventually, German missionaries were readmitted, but they were forced out again during World War II; American churches (now merged into the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) and the Church of Sweden filled the vacuum. In 1937 the Federation of Lutheran Churches of Tanzania was created and became a step to the formation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania in 1961. With more than 2 million members each, the Anglican and Lutheran churches are by far the largest churches (other than the Roman Catholic Church) in the country.

Beginning with the African Inland Mission in 1908, a spectrum of churches and missionary sending agencies began work. Among the more successful have been the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the Moravians, the New Apostolic Church, the Assemblies of God, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Baptist Convention of Tanzania (affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention). The extensive Pentecostal growth in Tanzania has been aided by the effort begun by Swedish (Pentecostal Churches in Tanzania) and Canadian (Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada) missionaries. In the 1990s, several Korean groups became active in Tanzania, including a mission team from Yoido Full Gospel Church.

In spite of its proximity to Kenya, Tanzania has had relatively fewer indigenous churches formed within its bounds. The larger African Initiated Churches—such as the African Israel Church, Nineveh, and the Legion of Mary—have come into the country from adjacent states.

The larger mission churches formed the Tanganyika Missionary Council, which evolved into the Christian Council of Tanzania, an affiliate of the World Council of Churches. More recently, several of the more conservative missionary agencies formed the Tanzania Evangelical Fellowship, loosely associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Within the context set by the two dominant religious communities, Tanzania has become home to a spectrum of religions, many originally brought into the country through the international trading center of Zanzibar. At various times the country was open to immigrants from India, the rest of southern Asia, and the South Pacific. The Hindu community, with approximately 250,000 members, is the largest religious community apart from Christianity and Islam. Most Hindus are Asian Indians. Sikhs and Jains have also come from India. Foguangshan is one form of Buddhism (from Taiwan) that has spread through Tanzania from its anchor in the Chinese community, and Soka Gakkai International is active. The largest of the alternative groups, however, is the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Israel Church, Nineveh; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith;

Church in the Province of Tanzania; Church Missionary Society; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of Sweden; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania; Foguangshan; Holy Ghost Fathers; Ibadhi Islam; Legion of Mary; London Missionary Society; New Apostolic Church; Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; White Fathers; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Yoido Full Gospel Church.

References

- Becker, Felicitas. Becoming Muslim in Mainland Tanzania, 1890–2000. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Fiedler, Klaus. Christianity and African Culture: Conservative German Protestant Missionaries in Tanzania, 1900–1940. Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 1997.
- Green, Maia. Priests, Witches and Power: Popular Christianity after Mission in Southern Tanzania. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Ludwig, Frieder. Church and State in Tanzania: Aspects of Changing in Relationships, 1961–1994. Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 1999.
- Mukandala, Rwekaza Sympho. Justice, Rights and Worship: Religion and Politics in Tanzania. Dar es Salaam: E & D Ltd., 2006.
- Nimtz, August H. Islam and Politics in East Africa: The Sufi Order in Tanzania. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1980.
- Ranger, T. O. The African Churches of Tanzania. Nairobi, Kenya: East African Publishing House, 1972.
- Stefano, J. A. Missionary Work in the Church of Tanzania in the Past and Present. Erlangen, Germany: Evangelical Lutheran Mission Publishing House, 1990.
- Von Socard, S. Islam in Tanzania. CSIC Papers—Africa, no. 5. Birmingham, UK: Centre for the Study of Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, 1991.
- Wright, M. German Missionaries in Tanganyika, 1891–1941. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.

Taoism

See Daoism.

Taoist Tai Chi Society

The Taoist Tai Chi Society (TTCS), together with its religious affiliate, the Fung Loy Kok Taoist Temple, is perhaps the largest Daoist group in the Western Hemisphere. TTCS was founded in 1970 in Toronto, Canada, and maintains its headquarters there. Centers exist in most Canadian cities, and there are several in the United States, notably in Tallahassee, Florida, and Boulder, Colorado. They have a growing presence in Europe and the Caribbean as well.

Moy Lin-Shin, the founder and spiritual leader, was born in Guangzhou (Canton) in southern China in 1931. He moved to Hong Kong in 1948 to escape the revolution. There he trained at the Yuen Yuen Institute, which was established by Daoist monks from Canton who were part of the Longmen sect of the Quanzhen School of Daoism. Moy immigrated to Canada in 1970, ostensibly to teach martial arts but also as a Daoist missionary. He modified standard Yang-style Tai Chi and coined the term “Daoist Tai Chi.”

As Moy’s original students left Toronto, Daoist Tai Chi clubs sprang up around Canada and later in the United States. Moy’s teachings attracted a graduate student from Hong Kong, Eva Wong, who went on to become the in-house intellectual of the TTCS until her break with Moy in the late 1990s. She has published a series of popular books on Daoism with Shambhala Press.

Today the TTCS has “grown to thousands of classes in over 400 locations on four continents,” and there are some 10,000 dues-paying members worldwide. Fung Loy Kok Temple, dedicated in 1981, is the religious arm of the Moy organization. Temple spaces, which vary in size, are located upstairs from or in rooms adjoining the Tai Chi studios.

Fung Loy Kok Taoist Temple “observes the teachings of the three great religions of China: Daoism, Buddhism and Confucianism.” They are represented by the central triad of the temple altar as Lu Dongbin, Guanyin (Goon Yam in Cantonese), and the Jade Emperor, respectively.

Today, the Society is registered as a charitable organization and is led by a board of directors. Master Moy retired from his official leadership roles in 1995 and died in 1998. Religious activities are performed by lay members, who, at least in Canadian branches, seem to be divided equally into white Canadians and Cantonese immigrants (mainly elderly women). Chanting is performed in Cantonese, which is transliterated phonetically for the non-Chinese members.

The TTCS also owns and operates an international retreat center an hour’s drive north of Toronto. There, ground will soon be broken on a Cultivation Center with architecture inspired by the traditional Daoist monastery. This will be the largest Daoist building outside Asia.

The TTCS raises awareness by emphasizing the health benefits of practicing Tai Chi and the service aspect of belonging to the Society. It runs an old-age home and a soup kitchen. Later, Tai Chi students will be introduced to the chanting practice of Fung Loy Kok. The organization does not emphasize philosophy, mysticism, or “spirituality.”

The TTCS remains far better known in Canada (not to mention England, Australia, and Poland) than it is in the United States, in part because they have no presence in the American Daoist centers of New York, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. In 2008, the Society reported centers across Canada and the United States and in 23 countries worldwide.

Taoist Tai Chi Society
134 D’Arcy St.
Toronto, ON M5T 1K3
Canada
<http://www.taoist.org/>

Elijah Siegler

See also: Daoism; Quanzhen Daoism.

References

Wong, Eva, trans. Cultivating Stillness: A Taoist Manual for Transforming Body and Mind. Boston: Shambhala, 1992.

Wong, Eva, trans. Lieh-Tzu, a Taoist Guide to Practical Living. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.

Wong, Eva, trans. Nourishing the Essence of Life: The Outer, Inner, and Secret Teachings of Taoism. Boston: Shambhala, 2004.
 Wong, Eva, trans. Taoism. Boston: Shambhala, 1997.

Temples—Baha’i Faith

The Baha’i temple—known as a Mashriqu’l-Adhkar, literally the “Dawning Place of the Praise [of God]”—is one of the institutions conceived by Bahá’u’lláh, the founder of the Baha’i Faith. Mashriqu’l-Adhkar is a term with several meanings, depending on context, and can variously refer to: (1) a gathering of Baha’is engaged in devotion to God, especially at dawn; (2) any building dedicated to such worship (as in Iran and the Transcaspian Territory in Russia, where many Baha’i communities designated ordinary houses in their local communities as Mashriqu’l-Adhkar); (3) the complex of institutions surrounding a central house of worship that Bahá’u’lláh ordained to be at the very heart of every Baha’i community; or (4) the central house of worship itself. The only Baha’i temples that exist at present are continental temples. National and local Baha’i houses of worship will, in successive stages, be built in the future, as circumstances and resources allow.

In the Baha’i book of laws, The Most Holy Book (Kitáb-i Aqdas), Bahá’u’lláh ordained that a temple be raised up in every city, town, and village throughout the world: “O people of the world! Build ye houses of worship throughout the lands in the name of Him Who is the Lord of all religions. Make them as perfect as is possible in the world of being, and adorn them with that which befitteth them, not with images and effigies. Then, with radiance and joy, celebrate therein the praise of your Lord, the Most Compassionate.” While it was Bahá’u’lláh who instituted the Baha’i temple, it was ‘Abdu’l-Baha (1844–1921)—Bahá’u’lláh’s eldest son, interpreter, and successor—who further elaborated on its essential architectural character and social purposes. ‘Abdu’l-Baha encouraged Baha’is to establish Mashriqu’l-Adhkar in every “hamlet and city.” If not possible due to persecution, then a Mashriqu’l-Adhkar could even be “underground.”

Baha’i temple and gardens in Haifa. (Hitmans/Dreamstime.com)

Baha’i temples are not the only places of Baha’i worship. Several occasions for collective worship are ordained in the Baha’i writings, such as morning prayers, Nineteen-Day Feasts, Baha’i Holy Day observances, and devotional meetings, not to mention private worship.

Linking worship to service to humanity, the Baha’i house of worship takes on greater social significance in that it is not just spiritual in character, but is dedicated to medical, charitable, educational, and scientific pursuits as well. ‘Abdu’l-Baha wrote that the Baha’i temple “is one of the most vital institutions in the world,” for, in its full development, “it is also connected with a hospital, a drug dispensary, a traveller’s hospice, a school for orphans, and a university for advanced studies” and “other philanthropic buildings”—such as a home for the aged—open to people of all races, religions, and ethnicities. Thus the Baha’i temple is part of a grand vision of community building and urban planning, universally conceived and locally planned. In the words of Shoghi Effendi, Bahá'u'lláh's grandson and "Guardian" of the Baha'i Faith from 1921 to 1957, each house of worship and its dependencies "shall afford relief to the suffering, sustenance to the poor, shelter to the wayfarer, solace to the bereaved, and education to the ignorant."

Also associated with each Baha'i house of worship—although not part of the temple complex, strictly speaking—is a center for Baha'i administration, known as a Haziratu'l-Quds (an Arabic term meaning "Sacred Fold"), although it is not to be connected to the Baha'i temple as such. An institution complementary to the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar, the Haziratu'l-Quds may consist of a council chamber, secretariat, treasury, publishing trust, archives, library, and assembly hall, and may be situated near the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar, although this is not a requirement, as is already the case in Wilmette, Illinois, where the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar—as the headquarters of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States—is located in Wilmette and in nearby Evanston.

The basic design for a Baha'i house of worship is distinctive in that each temple requires three essential elements: (1) a nine-sided, (2) circular shape, (3) surrounded by nine gardens with walkways. In Baha'i thought, the number nine symbolizes completion, perfection, and the unity of religions in their pure form. Nine likewise represents the numerical value of the Arabic word, "Bahá," from which the words "Bahá'u'lláh" and "Baha'i" (follower of Bahá'u'lláh) are derived. While a dome is not an essential requirement, it has so far been a structural feature of all Baha'i temples, as Shoghi Effendi advised in 1955 that "at this time all Baha'i temples should have a dome." Beyond these essentials, a Baha'i temple is typically designed to be culturally distinctive, often incorporating indigenous architectural influences in the design. Each design is selected for its intrinsic merit, irrespective of whether the architect is Baha'i or not. Two houses of worship—in Frankfurt and Panama—were designed by architects not affiliated with the Baha'i Faith, while other non-affiliated architects have collaborated in perfecting the designs in Ishqabad and Sydney.

The doors of all Baha'i houses of worship are open to people of all religions, races, and nations. No sermons may be preached nor rituals performed. Sermons and rituals, as commonly understood, are not part of Baha'i practice anywhere, and the Baha'i Faith has no clergy. Use of pulpits is expressly forbidden in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, not just in the temples. No fixed speaker's platforms or altars are allowed, although readers may read sacred scriptures from behind an unadorned, portable lectern. During devotional programs, invited readers—of any faith—recite or chant, in any language, the sacred scriptures of the Baha'i Faith and of other religions. Bahá'u'lláh exhorts parents to teach their children to memorize passages from the Baha'i writings, so that they may chant or recite them in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar. In the Baha'i house of worship in Wilmette, devotional services are currently held at 12:30 p.m. daily.

Music is regarded as a vital part of worship. Prayers and readings set to music may be sung by choirs or soloists a cappella, as only the human voice, with no accompaniment by musical instruments, may be intoned during worship. This restriction applies only to worship in the Temple Auditorium, not to Baha'i worship generally, which includes music of all kinds. Instruments may be played in the vicinity of the Baha'i temple, however. On November 22, 2000, in New Delhi, India, for instance, the opening ceremony of the international "Colloquium on Science, Religion and Development" featured a concert of classical Indian music performed, with traditional instruments, on the grounds of the Baha'i Lotus Temple in New Delhi, India. In the Wilmette temple, instrumental music has been performed in the meeting room below.

At present, there is a Baha'i house of worship on each continent of the world, with the construction of national and local houses of worship reserved for the future, as resources permit. The resources, or funds, necessary to erect and maintain these institutions comes from the regular or earmarked contributions of Baha'is only. Accepting donations from outside sources is strictly forbidden, as only Baha'is have the privilege of contributing to the Baha'i funds. While each Baha'i temple is administered and maintained by the national Baha'i council (known as a National Spiritual Assembly) of the country in which the temple is located, the ultimate oversight of the continental Baha'i houses of worship is by the international governing Baha’i council, called the Universal House of Justice, established in 1963. There are now seven Baha’i temples, with a eighth under construction, although the first Baha’i temple, which no longer exists, would bring the number to nine.

The first Baha’i temple was built in Ashgabat (Ashkhabad) in Russia’s Transcaspian Territory (now Turkmenistan). It was first planned during the ministry of Bahá’u’lláh. This temple was designed by Ustad ‘Alí-Akbar Banna of Yazd, under the direct supervision of ‘Abdu’l-Baha, during the former’s visit to ‘Akká in 1893. Construction began in October 1902. Because Banna was killed during an anti-Baha’i pogrom during his visit to Yazd in 1903, a Russian engineer named Volkov was then hired to oversee the construction, which was completed in 1919. In 1928, the temple was expropriated by the Soviet regime, and was then rented back to the Baha’is for two five-year periods. It was finally converted into an art gallery in 1938. In 1948, the temple was damaged by violent earthquakes and further weakened by the heavy rains in the following years. In 1963, Soviet authorities demolished the remaining edifice and converted the site into a public park.

The second Baha’i house of worship was built near the shore of Lake Michigan in Wilmette, north of Chicago. On May 1, 1912, ‘Abdu’l-Baha laid the cornerstone, which remains in a special room beneath the main floor of the temple itself. On that historic occasion, ‘Abdu’l-Baha explained that “the original purpose of temples and houses of worship is simply that of unity—places of meeting where various peoples, different races and souls of every capacity may come together in order that love and agreement should be manifest between them . . . that all religions, races and sects may come together within its universal shelter.”

The principal architect, Louis J. Bourgeois (French-Canadian), who originated the exterior design in 1919, likened the Wilmette house of worship to a “Great Bell, calling to America.” Alfred Shaw of Shaw, Metz, and Dolio, designed the exterior and interior cladding, made of white Portland cement concrete with both clear and white quartz aggregate. The temple was dedicated on May 1, 1953. In 1978, it was added to the National Register of Historic Places and has received prestigious design awards. “This unique edifice,” wrote

Shoghi Effendi, is “the noblest structure reared in the first Baha’i century, and the symbol and precursor of a future world civilization.”

The third Baha’i temple is located in Africa, on Kikaya Hill on the outskirts of Kampala, Uganda. It was designed by Charles Mason Remey, who worked closely with Shoghi Effendi in refining the design. Building commenced in May 1957, and the temple was dedicated on January 15, 1961. Standing at nearly 124.7 feet in height, the temple was the highest structure in East Africa at the time of its construction.

A landmark on the scenic northern coast of Sydney, Australia, the fourth Baha’i temple is located in Ingleside on the Mona Vale Hilltop, in the hills and bushland overlooking the beaches below. Also designed by Remey, excavations began in December 1957, and the completed temple was dedicated on September 16, 1961. Like the Wilmette temple, the Sydney house of worship is distinguished by its innovative use of crushed quartz concrete. The temple is topped by a lantern set in place by a helicopter—an innovation in Australian construction. The temple is often used by aircraft and ships for navigational purposes, since the site of approximately nine hectares is the highest point in the area.

The fifth Baha’i temple was designed and built by Frankfurt architect Teuto Rocholl at Langenhain, in the Taunus Hills near Frankfurt-am-Main, West Germany. Its foundation stone was laid in November 1960 and the temple was dedicated on July 4, 1964, by Rúhíyyih Rabbani—distinguished Hand of the Cause of God (an appointed dignitary whose mission is to promulgate and protect the Baha’i Faith) and wife of the late Shoghi Effendi (d. 1957)—representing the Universal House of Justice. All existing Baha’i temples were dedicated by Rúhíyyih Rabbani, in fact.

The sixth Baha’i temple was built on Cerro Sonsonate, a mountain seven miles north of Panama City, Panama. The cornerstone was laid on October 8, 1967. Designed by English architect Peter Tillotson, construction commenced on December 1, 1969, and the temple was dedicated on April 29, 1972. The temple’s parabolic dome is built on the principle of a shell. Adorning the dome’s supporting walls are abstract designs, in red marble chips, that evoke the decor of temples of the ancient Americas. Mahogany seats, set on a terrazzo floor, complete the interior space, which seats 550 people.

The seventh Baha’i temple was built in Western Samoa, in the Pacific Ocean, at Tiapapata, in the hills behind Apia. Designed by Hossein Amanat, the foundation stone was laid on January 27, 1979, by His Highness Susuga Malietoa Tanumafili II, Head of State of Samoa—the first ruling head of state in the world to become a Baha’i—and by Hand of the Cause, Rúhíyyih Rabbani, representing the Universal House of Justice. Both dignitaries also were prominent in the dedication of the house of worship on September 1, 1984.

The eighth Baha’i temple, known as the Lotus Temple because of its shape, was built near Nehru Place, at Bahapur, in New Delhi, India. Designed by Fariburz Sahba, a Canadian of Iranian birth, the Lotus Temple was conceived as a lotus that appears to float in a series of nine reflecting pools. There are three rows of nine petals each on the outside of the temple—that is, 27 exterior petals on the outside of the temple—and 2 interior rows of 9 petals, which comprise the interior dome of the Lotus. So there are five rows of nine petals each, representing the sacred names, the “Báb” and “Bahá’”—commemorating the two prophet-founders of the Baha’i Faith. Described by one commentator as having the “the grandeur of a palace and the peace of a monastery,” the design of Lotus Temple was originally inspired after Sahba had visited several holy places in India, when he realized that the symbol of the lotus blossom was revered by all the religions of the Indian subcontinent. Construction began on April 21, 1980, and the Lotus Temple was dedicated on December 24, 1986.

The Lotus Temple has enjoyed international renown and critical acclaim, having received prestigious awards from architectural and engineering societies. In 1987, the Lotus Temple received a “Structural Award” from the Institution of Structural Engineers of the United Kingdom (the world’s leading professional body for structural engineering) for excellence in structural engineering (excellence, creativity and innovation, sustainability, value, and buildability). In that same year, Sahba was honored with the “First Honor Award—Excellence in Architecture” from the Interfaith Forum on Religion, Art and Architecture Affiliate of the American Institute of Architects. In 1988, Sahba was given the “Paul Waterbury Special Citation for Outdoor Lighting” by the Illuminating Engineering Society of North America for what was described as “the Taj Mahal of the Twentieth Century.” In 1990, the American Concrete Institute recognized Sahba with its “Finest Concrete Structure in the World” award.

The ninth Baha’i temple, near Santiago in Chile, is the last of the continental Baha’i temples. Designed by Siamak Hariri of Toronto, Canada, this temple is conceived of as a translucent “temple of light.” It will, in the words of the architect, be “both monumental and intimate, subtly structured and ordered yet capable of dissolving in light.” This temple is constructed of a dome of glowing, translucent stone, and is notable for its absence of straight lines. The structure is created by nine alabaster (translucent stone) and cast-glass “wings,” allowing sunlight to filter through during the day, and emitting a warm glow from the interior lighting at night. Gracefully torqued, these wings wrap around the interior of the dome, creating a nest-like structure. Each wing is made of two delicate skins of semitransparent, subtly gridded alabaster, with a steel structure enclosed in curving glass in between, with its primary structural members intertwining with secondary support members, like the structural veining within a leaf. The primary purpose of the nine surrounding ponds is to reflect the temple.

In its April 2001 message, the Universal House of Justice announced that the completion of the continental houses of worship would pave the way for the next stage of Mashriqu’l-Adhkár development: the construction of national houses of worship, as circumstances permit. Wherever possible, each National Spiritual Assembly has purchased a temple site for its national house of worship. In northeast Tehran, Iran, for instance, a two-square mile parcel of land, named Hadíqa, on the slopes of Mount Alburz, had previously been procured for the eventual construction of the first Baha’i house of worship in the birthplace of the Baha’i Faith. As of 2007, a total of 148 temple sites around the world had been acquired for future national Baha’i houses of worship.

It was Shoghi Effendi who heralded the Baha’i house of worship in Wilmette as “the symbol and precursor of a future world civilization.” If their respective charitable, humanitarian, educational, medical, and scientific missions are progressively implemented, then the sacred purpose of the Baha'i houses of worship—continental, national, and local—will have been realized, and the concept of worship transformed into one of service to humanity.

On July 8, 2008, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) World Heritage Committee designated two Baha'i shrines in Israel—the Shrine of the Báb on Mount Carmel in Haifa, Israel, and the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, located near Old Acre on Israel's northern coast—as World Heritage sites. They were the first modern religious edifices to be added to the UNESCO list. Not only are these Baha'i shrines places of commemoration for the Báb (1819–1850) and Bahá'u'lláh (1817–1892), the prophet-founders of the Baha'i Faith, but each of the eight existing Baha'i houses of worship also attracts international attention as well.

In 2007 the state of Illinois announced that the Baha'i house of worship in Wilmette (north of Chicago) had been popularly voted, in an online poll, as one of the “Seven Wonders” of Illinois. On the other side of the world, in New Delhi, India, the Baha'i Lotus Temple, with more than 4.6 million visitors in 2007, is one of the world's most popular tourist attractions today. All of the houses of worship are open to people of all faiths for prayer and meditation, reflecting the Baha'i belief that the world's great religions have come from the same God in critical moments throughout history, as part of a process called “Progressive Revelation.” Beyond their popularity and critical acclaim, Baha'i temples have an added significance, in that each is a nucleus for future institutions not typically associated with places of worship.

According to Shonghi Effendi, the Baha'i house of worship in Wilmette, Illinois, is “the symbol and precursor of a future world civilization.” Plans call for associating with each Baha'i temple a university, hospital and pharmacy, school for orphans, and traveler's hospice, among administrative and other ancillary institutions. As part of a grand vision, Baha'i temples—as embryonic multipurpose institutions—not only provide spiritual renewal, but are endowed with scientific, medical, educational, and charitable purposes as well. For now, it is their architectural magnificence that has attracted popular and international attention.

Christopher Buck

See also: Baha'i Faith; Bahá'u'lláh.

References

- Badiee, Julie. An Earthly Paradise: Baha'i Houses of Worship around the World. Oxford: George Ronald, 1992.
- Badiee, Julie, and the editors. “Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.” Baha'i Encyclopedia Project. <http://www.bahai-encyclopedia-project.org>. Accessed September 5, 2009.
- Bahá'u'llah. The Kitab-i-Aqdas: The Most Holy Book. Wilmette, IL: Bahai Pub Trust, 1993.
- Flint, A. R., D. I. Cooper, and S. Naharoy. “The Structural Design and Construction of Two Baha'i Houses of Worship.” The Structural Engineer 65, no. 3 (1987).
- Rafati, V[ahid] and F[ariburz] Sahba. “Bahai Faith IX. Bahai Temples.” In “Bahai Faith Part 2.” Encyclopedia Iranica, edited by Ehsan Yarshater. <http://www.iranica.com/newsite/index.isc?Article=http://www.iranica.com/newsite/articles/unicode/v3f4/v3f4a100.html>. Accessed September 4, 2009.
- Sahba, Fariburz. “Art and Architecture: A Baha'i Perspective.” Journal of Baha'i Studies 7, no. 3 (1997): 53–82. http://www.bahai-studies.ca/journal/files/jbs/7.3.Sahba\(scanned\).pdf.pdf). Accessed September 6, 2009.
- Vegh, Petr, and Greg Hildebrand. “The New Baha'i Mother Temple for South America: Some Aspects of the Façade Design.” 11th Canadian Conference on Building Science and Technology, Banff, Alberta, 2007. <http://bricks-and-brome.net/03c11.pdf>. Accessed September 6, 2009.
- Whitmore, Bruce W. The Dawning Place: The Building of a Temple, the Forging of the North American Baha'i Community. Wilmette, IL: Baha'i Publishing Trust, 1984.

Temples—Buddhist

Buddhism emerged initially as a monk-centered faith, whose members itinerated though most of the year. Once they began to settle in one place for the rainy season, temples and monasteries began to emerge.

Early Places of Worship What were the earliest Buddhist gathering places like? Some were located near stupas, a building form that predated the monastery. A stupa (or pagoda) is a structure in which the relics of the Buddha or other holy persons are entombed. Stupas were reportedly built immediately after Gautama Buddha's death, though the oldest structure that has survived dates from a later period, the third century BCE—the Great Stupa at Sanchi, India.

The early gathering places were probably settings for meditation. They often began as simple rooms (often a cave or hut, to house a single monk) and later grew into communal gathering places with multiple single rooms for an emerging monastic community. Along with the first rooms (cells) for monks, the first worship centers, caityas, were also simple spaces carved out of rock in caves or simply constructed from available building materials. To this day, many monks choose to model their practice and lifestyle on what they know of the Buddha and his early followers, which includes living close to nature in forests, mountains, and/or caves.

The earliest caityas were in India, and hundreds are known from their presence along the ancient trade routes that followed the Western Ghats, an Indian mountain range stretching from Gujarat to Kerala. These were constructed beginning in the second century BCE. Decoration of the caityas was simple, especially before Buddhist art—paintings and sculptures of the Buddha—began to appear in the third century BCE. Over the centuries, the caityas evolved into separate temples, some serving as the center of monastic complexes, others standing independently and serving a largely lay community.

The caitya at the Karla Caves in Maharashtra, India, was erected in the second century CE. One of the larger of the caityas of the period (125 feet by 46 feet), it was carved out of the hillside and contained an apse at one end where a stupa was placed. The interior featured a central aisle and columns placed to facilitate circumambulation within the space.

Temple Development in East Asia When Buddhism was transmitted to China, some of the early structures followed the design of the rooms for monks and ca-ityas found in western India. As Buddhism spread and developed a significant lay following, temples were built in and adjacent to villages, towns, and urban centers. This process was spurred by the religion's alignment with ruling authorities, who were often known to dictate the placement of temples.

In China, Buddhism had a creative encounter with Daoism, one manifestation of the encounter being the new temples that were erected in urban areas. These were developed along a north-south axis with an entranceway in the south (following Daoist geomancy). Typically, the visitor initially encountered a stupa/pagoda behind which other buildings would be lined up—most noticeably the Buddha hall (where an image of the Buddha would be kept) and the lecture hall (where people gathered for talks on Buddhism), and residences for the monks.

The oldest Buddhist temple in China is the White Horse Temple originally erected in 68 CE in Luoyang, then the capital of the Eastern Han dynasty under Emperor Ming (28–75 CE). The temple faced south, and one entered through a large gate. After entering the visitor came face to face with the Hall of Heavenly Kings, the Buddhist guardian figures, and the Hall of the Great Buddha. From this original temple, others would grow and spread and as Buddhism was transmitted to Korea and Japan temples would be planted there and then adapted to the local culture. As Buddhism evolved, differences especially in the temple interior would emerge.

In China, Korea, and Japan, temple complexes would be built around three structures—the hall of Buddhas, where statues of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas were kept; the meeting (or lecture) hall, where the community could gather to hear teachings; and the stupa or pagoda, where relics of honored ones, from the Buddha himself to local exemplars of the faith, would be kept. In more modern temples, these structures and their functions could be combined in various ways.

Theravada Temples As the temple evolved in southern Asia (Sri Lanka to Vietnam), the temples of Theravada lands remained relatively simple. Though temples can be architecturally elaborate, built from expensive marbles, and decorated with gold and even expensive gems, they remain essentially a simple hall, void of furniture, focused on a single statue of the Buddha. The statue is considered a most sacred object and, in the older and more important temples, may be made of fine marble or precious metal and decorated with jewels.

Kiyomizu temple complex in present-day Kyoto, Japan, originally built in the eighth century CE. (iStockPhoto.com)

Theravada temples have various relationships with stupas. They may be part of a stupa complex and on occasion dwarfed by the most prominent stupa. They may have a stupa located in a prominent place on the temple grounds, such as in front of the entrance to the temple, or have a stupa as just another item on the temple grounds.

Mahayana Temples The main hall at Mahayana temples houses the many Buddhas and bodhisattvas that are the objects of devotion and veneration. Typically, three statues will dominate Pure Land temples—Amitabha (or Amida) Buddha, with Guan Yin (aka Avalokitesvara) and Mahasamaprapta—the three main bodhisattvas that Pure Land devotees invoke. Guan Yin's compassion and Mahasamaprapta's wisdom lead to Amitabha's enlightenment. There are numerous Mahayana bodhisattvas, of course, and different traditions may have temples whose statuary may be centered on other than the most popular three, while the number of temples focused primarily on Guan Yin (aka Kannon or Kwan Yin) are numerous.

As the lecture hall is usually the place for the community to gather to hear talks, the main hall will be for individuals to approach the representations of the bodhisattvas with their requests or for thanksgiving over a request that has been granted. Halls are often long and narrow, with the front entrance placed in the middle of one of the longer walls and the deity figures against the back wall. Such halls are designed so that the visitor who enters is immediately face to face with the central bodhisattvas, and may quickly move to either their right or left to visit the others.

The main hall may also be the center of various worship services and holiday celebrations. In the modern age, especially in the West, the main hall and lecture hall are frequently combined into one building, with enough space added in front of the main altar to accommodate a seated group.

Vajrayana Temples Vajrayana temple complexes generally follow Mahayana examples. The stupa, which may contain the relics of honored lamas, often assumed a prominent place either as a stand-alone building or a prominent site within the main hall or lecture hall. In larger temples of monastic complexes, there may be multiple stupas.

The main hall of a Vajrayana temple will have the most deity figures with multiple Buddhas and bodhisattvas represented. Frequently dominating the temple will be statues of the five dhyanī Buddhas. Also representations of the major Vajrayana Buddhas and bodhisattvas will be seen including but not limited to Amitabha (Amida); Manjusri; Avlokitesvara (the male form of Guan Yin); Ksitigarbha (aka Jozo in Japan); Medicine Buddha; Vajrapani; Maitreya; White Tara; and Green Tara. In addition, there will be a variety of additional beings, especially protective figures known as the Dharma Guardians.

In addition to the figures represented in the front wall of the main hall, usually in the form of statues, the other three walls of the hall will be decorated with thankas, large paintings on cloth (not unlike icons in Eastern Orthodox churches) that most often picture one, a few, or even a large assembly of Buddhas and bodhisattvas or a mandala, a representation of the Vajrayana universe. The thankas not only make beautiful decorations, but are designed to facilitate meditation on the subject of the painting.

Japanese Vajrayana (or Shingon) temples always provide prominent space, usually on each side of the main altar, for two mandalas, the Womb Realm mandala and the Diamond Realm mandala, both of which picture major aspects of the spiritual realms as presented in Vajrayana teachings. Some Vajrayana ceremonies involve the use of fire and many temples will be equipped with open fire pits where a variety of objects may be burned as offerings during worship gatherings.

As with modern Mahayana temples in general, newer Vajrayana temples, especially in the West, have tended to combine the functions of a main hall for the housing of the deity figures with a lecture hall where the teachings are presented to the assemblies of members.

Temples Today In the land of Buddhism's birth, abandoned temples and Buddhist ruins remain in different parts of the country from the era prior to Buddhism's suppression in India in the 13th century. Some of these have been reactivated in the modern world and new temples have been built and opened, most notably adjacent to the pilgrimage sites associated with the historical Buddha. Across the Buddhist world, multiple temples in each country have become the sites of pilgrimages (and tourists) because of their historical and/or architectural significance, or their housing of Buddhist relics or outstanding art work. The old imperial cities of Nara and Kamakura, in Japan, have become the sites at which a spectrum of the Japanese Buddhist sects established prominent temples.

During the Cultural Revolution in China, especially Tibet, many temples and monasteries were destroyed, though a few notable ones, such as the Potala, in Lhasa, escaped. Beginning in the 1990s, there has been an increasing effort to rebuild those monasteries/temples on sites adjacent to a continuing worshipping community.

In parts of the world, temples are placed according to principles of sacred geography and geomancy. In China, the placement of temples relative to mountain settings, also seen as the earthly abode of various bodhisattvas, has been notable. The most famous mountain temples are those found clustered around the four sacred Buddhist mountains—Emei Shan, Jiu Hua Shan, Putuo Shan, and Wu Tai Shan. In Japan, temples have been clustered along pilgrimage routes.

Buddhist temples also serve as gathering places for the celebration of various Buddhist holidays, Wesak or the Buddha's birthday being the most ubiquitous.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Emei Shan; Mahayana Buddhism; Putuo Shan; Relics; Sanchi; Shingon Buddhism; Statues—

Buddhist; Temples—Hindu; Theravada Buddhism; Wesak; Wu Tai Shan.

References

- Akhtar, Malik. A Survey of Buddhist Temples and Monasteries. New Delhi: Anmol Publications, 2007.
- Dohring, Karl, and Walter E. J. Tips. Buddhist Temples of Thailand: An Architectonic Introduction. Bangkok: White Lotus Co. Ltd., 2000.
- Goodwin, Janet R. Alms and Vagabonds: Buddhist Temples and Popular Patronage in Medieval Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1994.
- Hsing, Fu-chuan. Taiwanese Buddhism and Buddhist Temples. Taipei: Pacific Cultural Foundation, 1983.
- Kapleau, Philip. A Pilgrimage to the Buddhist Temples and Caves of China. Rochester, NY: Zen Center of Rochester, 1983.
- Malandra, Geri Hockfield. Unfolding a Mandala: The Buddhist Cave Temples at Ellora. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.
- McCallum, Donald F. The Four Great Temples: Buddhist Archaeology, Architecture, and Icons of Seventh-Century Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2008.
- Suhnim, Doh Yurng. Guide to Korean Buddhist Temples. Seoul: Jogye Order of Korean Buddhism, 1995.

Temples—Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Within the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the temple is primarily seen as a place for worship. As the only place where a set of the most sacred rites of the church are performed, however, the temple takes on a special sanctity. The Latter-day Saints temple operates somewhat apart from the normal geographically oriented structure of the church. The basic unit of the church is the ward, comparable to a Protestant congregation or Catholic parish. Each ward has a meeting-house where members gather for weekly worship and is the center of a variety of educational, social, recreational, and cultural activities. Each ward is headed by a bishop. Wards will affiliate with up to a dozen neighboring wards to form a stake. Stakes are then grouped into areas, the largest sub-units within the church.

Temple of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (widely known as the Mormon Church) in Salt Lake City, Utah. (iStockPhoto.com)

In contrast to the ward, which serves a limited constituency with a large variety of activities, the temple serves a widespread constituency and is used for a small number of rites. Those attending any event at the temple must be baptized and confirmed members in good standing. Males must be ordained into the lower level of the priesthood (termed the Melchizedek priesthood). Prior to attending a temple function, members must also have a meeting with their bishop, who determines whether they are living by the precepts of the church, including the law of tithing. Being assured of a member's worthiness, the bishop issues a temple recommend, a document that allows the person to enter the temple. The interview also prepares the person to participate in the temple ordinances.

The temple is the site of several basic ordinances. Some of these rites have their origin in the Latter-day Saints' understanding of heaven. According to them, the afterlife will find people in one of three levels of glory according to the laws they obeyed on Earth. The great majority of people will go to the Terrestrial Kingdom. This is for good people who did not come to the truth of God and Jesus during their earthly lives. The highest, or Celestial Kingdom, is for those who believe the gospel and follow its basic ordinances of baptism by immersion and receive the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands (that is, they have become members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints). Within the Celestial Kingdom, there are also levels. The highest level is for those who fully participated in the temple ceremonies.

The basic ordinance performed in the temples is termed the receiving of one's endowments. In specific rooms in the temple that are decorated with pictures depicting the Latter-day Saints' understanding of the cosmos and creation, members participate in a ritual that includes an explanation of the requirements for living in God's presence in the celestial world. Integral to the ritual is the making and receiving of a set of promises. The reception of one's endowment is believed to empower the Christian to overcome all circumstances in life.

Mormons take marriage very seriously and believe that marital relationships will continue in the life to come. One is initially married for this life, but in the temple couples are sealed together for all eternity. In the 19th century, sealing was intimately tied to teachings about polygamy, but under pressure from the outside world these teachings have been dropped. The Mormon Church, however, does continue to teach that a couple's sealing in the temple is a necessary requirement for entrance into the highest levels of the Celestial Kingdom.

Finally, the Church also believes in the baptism for the dead. Those who founded the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1830 saw it as a recovery of the apostolic church. Over the centuries, they believe, the essence of the true church had been lost, and thus people, including Christians, who lived in the period between the apostolic age and the founding of the church would not be eligible for the higher levels of heavenly glory. Thus, in each temple is a large baptismal font at which baptisms of those who died outside of the church may be conducted by proxy. Periodically, the church has been cited in the news for the baptism of some famous historical character or has had to deal with related controversies, most notably the rejection of such baptisms by the Jewish community.

Church founder Joseph Smith, Jr. (1805–1844), oversaw the erection of the first Latter-day Saints temple in the mid-1830s in Kirkland, Ohio. He also laid the cornerstone for a future temple in Independence, Missouri. After only a brief time, the church had to leave behind both the Kirkland temple and the temple lot in Independence. Then a third temple was constructed in Nauvoo, Illinois, in the mid-1840s, but it had to be abandoned following Joseph Smith's assassination and the relocation of the church to Utah. A permanent temple was constructed in the center of Salt Lake City, and additional temples opened in St. George, Manti, and Logan, Utah.

As the Mormon movement expanded beyond Utah, the first temples were constructed in Arizona, California, and Idaho. It was not until 1955 that a temple was opened outside of the United States, in Bern, Switzerland. The Swiss temple heralded the phenomenal church growth that would take place in the decade after World War II. In 2009, the church completed the 129th temple, and 17 are in various states of construction. In addition, in 2002, a reconstructed Nauvoo temple was rededicated. Temples now exist on every continent.

Upon completion, temples undergo an elaborate consecration ceremony. In recent years, it has been the church's practice to allow people who are not church members to visit and see the inside of a Latter-day Saints temple, which they would not be able to do once it is consecrated. Each temple has a Endowment Room, a Celestial Room, a Bride's Room (to prepare for the sealing ceremony), and a Sealing Room.

The practice of allowing non-members to visit about-to-be-consecrated temples has reduced the level of secrecy surrounding Mormon temples. Much of the secrecy has been taken away by the revelations of former church members who have both published the ritual texts and commented at length on the temple ceremonies. Also, Latter-day Saints scholars have furthered the discussion of temple rituals by exploration of their origin in traditional Freemasonry. Meanwhile, Latter-day Saints authorities have staunchly opposed any revelations concerning the secrets of temple activities.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Temples—Baha’i; Temples—Buddhist; Temples—Hindu.

References

- Buerger, David John. The Mysteries of Godliness: A History of Mormon Temple Worship. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 2002.
- Cowan, Richard O. Temples that Dot the Earth. Salt Lake City, UT: Bookcraft, 1989.
- Homer, Michael W. “Similarity of Priesthood in Masonry: The Relationship between Freemasonry and Mormonism.” Dialogue 27, no. 3 (Fall 1994): 1–113.
- “The House of the Lord.” Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. <http://www.lds.org/temples/>. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Larsen, Dean L. Mormon Temples (Setting the Record Straight). Brigham City, UT: Brigham Distributing, 2008.
- Packer, Boyd K. The Holy Temple. Salt Lake City, UT: Bookcraft, 1980

Temples—Hindu

Worship by Hindus is not exclusively congregational and may take place out in nature, inside the home, at a simple roadside shrine, or in a temple. Temple worship may have been an ancient phenomenon in India, but the currently identified remains of temples date back only to about the fifth century of the Common Era. This leaves the unanswered question: where did Hindus (or their predecessors) conduct community or large-scale ritual activities before then? Vedic rituals were performed under the open sky or in temporary enclosures that were dismantled after the ritual was completed. Temples constructed of wood or other impermanent materials may have been in existence before the fifth century, but we have no conclusive record of them. Therefore, the classical Hindu temple, in the form of a large stone building or a complex composed of several buildings, seems to be a medieval and modern phenomenon.

A reliable food supply, population growth and urbanization, and stable governments in local kingdoms in much of the subcontinent of India from the sixth century on made it possible for the prosperous to endow local priests with resources to undertake major construction projects. Records that remain from the medieval period, inscribed on rocks or metal tablets, indicate that royalty and landed nobles made generous donations and that temple wealth was accumulated and redistributed in ways that materially enriched the town and region of major temples. One factor in that circulation of wealth was food. It has a central role in Hindu worship as an acceptable offering to installed images of divine beings. Leftovers from the food prepared for ritual offering was given either freely or in return for a small donation to devotees who visited the temple deity. Endowments of agricultural produce or productive land generated ongoing income for the temple institution and for those who served it. The late Burton Stein analyzed the circulation of resources at the Tirupati temple complex in Andhra Pradesh in southern India, and his report on it has become an influential classic.

In addition to their secondary function as economic centers and engines of prosperity, large Hindu temples are primarily centers of learning, repositories of artistic and cultural artifacts, and sites for ritual activity. Traditional temples may be entered by Hindus at almost any time of the day, perhaps preparing by taking a ritual bath and changing clothes, passing through a gateway, leaving footwear, stepping carefully over a threshold and ringing a bell, and then moving clockwise toward the central shrine room in which the main image of the temple’s presiding deity has been installed. Some major temples even today reserve the right to refuse admission to non-Hindus or otherwise unqualified persons, so it is important to investigate local rules and expectations in advance.

Whether passing through a temple individually or as a participant in corporate worship such as a morning or evening arati ceremony in which one or more designated participants will slowly wave an oil lamp clockwise in front of an installed image, the key interaction is between the divine being as mediated through the image and the individual devotee who is privileged to experience the sight, or darshan, that manifests the qualities of divine power and grace. As a token of the divine-human encounter, a temple functionary is likely to present the devotee with a portion of the food that has been offered to the deity or else a flower, fruit, or coconut that has been blessed by proximity to the image. This is called prasad. Some visitors may eat the edible portion while still at or near the temple site, but others will carry it away to share with family members or acquaintances that were not able to accompany them to the temple.

Vishwanath Temple in Khajuraho, India, built in the early 11th century CE. (Shutterstock)

With emigration from India, Hindus for centuries have been building community centers and temples outside of India, very early in Southeast Asia and from the last half of the twentieth century in Australia, Europe, and the Americas. Economic opportunities that attract Hindu emigrants to those distant lands also provide the means and motivation to reaffirm their link to the old country and to their traditional religious and cultural identity by making certain that a temple would be built in their new location and that design and construction would be carefully supervised to assure that it conforms to the standards preserved in ancient Hindu manuscripts.

Gene R. Thursby

See also: Hinduism; Temples—Buddhist.

References

- Daniélou, Alain. The Hindu Temple: Deification of Eroticism. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions, 2001.
- Kurien, Prema A. A Place at the Multicultural Table: The Development of an American Hinduism. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2007.
- Mitchell, George. The Hindu Temple: An Introduction to Its Meaning and Forms. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.
- Narayanan, Vasudha. "Alaya." In The Hindu World, edited by Sushil Mittal and Gene Thursby, 446–477. New York and London: Routledge, 2004.
- Stein, Burton. "The Economic Function of a Medieval South Indian Temple." Journal of Asian Studies 19, no.2 (1960): 163–176.

Temples—Jewish

The temple in Jerusalem was the center for many centuries of Jewish religious life. It was here that the priests carried out the designated sacrifices on particular occasions. The Holy of Holies in the temple represented the most important site in the world for Jews and only the high priest was allowed to enter it, and only on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The First Temple was destroyed by the Babylonians and the Second Temple by the Romans, but its memory has been kept alive in the Jewish liturgy. The only physical remnant of the Second Temple today is the Western Wall, which Jews are now able to pray in front; it has become the custom to leave notes in the chinks in the wall, in the hope that their messages reach God. There were other temples for Jews, in Egypt, and for the Samaritans on Mount Gerizim.

King David had wanted to build a temple but was told by God that having shed blood this would not be appropriate (1 Chronicles 28:3). Solomon constructed it and the effort was obviously huge, since he forced his subjects to work on the building and was obliged in the end to cede 20 towns in the Galilee to repay King Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 9–11). Prayer, but particularly sacrifice, took place in the building, and it lasted for around 400 years until destroyed by the Babylonians, and then a second temple was built, greatly enlarged by King Herod and destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE. In the First Temple the small area called the Holy of Holies contained the two tablets of the Law given to Moses on Mount Sinai, we are told, but these disappeared with its destruction, and on the Day of Atonement the high priest would enter this room, and only then, to carry out a ritual to atone for the sins of the community as well as for himself and his family. The Bible commanded Jewish men to appear, with a sacrifice, in the temple three times a year—Passover, Shavuot, and Sukkot—which came to be called the Pilgrim festivals accordingly.

During the Muslim occupation of Jerusalem two mosques were built on the site of the temple and only the Western Wall remains, being widely regarded as connected to the original building. Many Jews regard walking on the original temple site to be forbidden since it might involve trespassing on the Holy of Holies, which is strictly forbidden. Some Muslims deny the existence of any temples in Jerusalem in order to try to weaken the Jewish claim on the site, and have even suggested that the kotel, the Western Wall, is really part of the al-Aqsa mosque and should be known as the Buraq wall, since Muhammad tethered his mount al-Buraq there while ascending through the heavens on his night journey. On the other hand, the reference in the Koran to a masjid (17:7) in what is taken to be Jerusalem at a time before there were any mosques suggests that the most plausible translation is sanctuary or temple. It is also referred to in the account of Suleiman ordering the jinn to build it (34:13) and of course in the night journey of the Prophet from Mecca to what is presumably taken to be Jerusalem (17:1).

Orthodox Jews pray three times a day for the restoration of the temple, and the ceremonies that took place there are still much discussed and remembered today. It is worth pointing out though that just as in the Koran there is no direct reference to Jerusalem in the Torah, and this left scope for other groups of Jews or those closely linked with the Jews like the Samaritans to prioritize other locations such as Mount Gerizim. There was also a temple at Leontopolis about 200 BCE, north of modern Cairo, and the second is the Temple of Elephantine dating to 300 years earlier, to about 500 BCE, in Upper Egypt close to Aswan. They seem to have been set up by Jewish soldiers who were working as mercenaries in the area.

Wailing Wall in old Jerusalem, Israel. (PhotoDisc, Inc.)

The capture of the Old City of Jerusalem in 1967 allowed Jews once again to pray at the Western Wall, and this has become a popular venue. The plaza in front of the wall is now hotly contested by different Jewish groups, some disapproving of women mixing with men or of particular variations in traditional Jewish religious services. Although a majority of Jews in Israel are secular, there is a reluctance to relinquish Jerusalem to a Palestinian state partially due to the strong attachment by most Jews to what remains of the temple and the idea that this should remain as part of the capital of the state of Israel.

The destruction of the Second Temple encouraged the creation of synagogues as houses of prayer, although there had surely been such institutions in existence even while the temple existed. In contemporary America many Reform Jews call their houses of worship temples.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Gerizim, Mount; Jerusalem; Muhammad; Orthodox Judaism; Passover; Reform Judaism; Shavuot; Sinai, Mount; Sukkot; Yom Kippur.

References

- Albright, William F. Archaeology and the Religion of Israel. Louisville, KY: Fons Vitae, 2006.
- Coogan, Michael D., ed. The Oxford History of the Biblical World. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Kenyon, Kathleen M. Digging up Jerusalem. London: Benn, 1974.

Tenri City

Tenri City, the official headquarters of the Japanese new religion called Tenrikyo, is located about 10 miles from the old Buddhist center of Nara. As it has grown, it has incorporated into itself the small village of Shoyashiki, where, on October 26, 1838, the religion's founder, Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), first began to speak about the revelations she had been experiencing (and would continue to experience over the next half century). One element of the revelations concerned a plot of land near the village she been shown upon which was the Jiba, which she was told was the center of the universe. On this land, she saw to the erection of Oyasato, the Parental House, the residing place of Tenri-O-no-Mikoto, God the Parent, who created the universe. From this location, God awaits humanity's return.

As Nakayama's teachings spread, and believers found their way to Shoyashiki, new buildings arose and eventually a city emerged. The movement was eventually recognized by the government and survived the Meiji era (1868–1912) as a part of sectarian Shinto.

In the main temple at Tenri City, believers gather to re-enact the creation story as related by Nakayama in a musical dance-rite called mi-kagura-uta. This ritual is performed with the expectation that the present world can be transformed and humans can move from the present social order into the Joyous Life World. In the center of the main temple is the kanrondai, a sacred pillar-like structure that marks the exact place of Nakayama's revelation about the origins of human creation.

Following World War II, with the arrival of religious freedoms, Tenrikyo separated from the other Shinto groups. It began a process of reviewing and purifying its teachings to clean out any distortion introduced from the years of close association with the sectarian Shinto groups. In the next decades the movement expanded rapidly. Followers took the opportunity offered by the time of relative success to construct a university, an orphanage, a hospital, a museum, a library, and a publishing house, all at Tenri City.

Among the many buildings at Tenri City, Nakayama (also known as Oyasama) is believed to continue to live and work at one called the Foundress's Sanctuary. Their belief in her continued presence is heralded by their preparation of three meals and hot baths for her every day. Priests, rotating shifts every half-hour, guard the door of the sanctuary as part of their duties, which also include performing rituals of "perpetual veneration."

The city is visited by many annually, and all who come to the city are seen as "returning to Jiba." To mark their pilgrimage, they are given an amulet. It contains a small piece of clothing formerly worn by Oyasama. When they get back home, believers can present this amulet as proof of their "return." It is also worn as a protective device.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Pilgrimage.

References

- The Doctrine of Tenrikyo*. Tenri City, Japan: Tenrikyo Church Headquarters, 1995.
- Ellwood, Robert S., Jr. Tenrikyo: A Pilgrimage Faith. Tenri City, Japan: Oyasato Research Institute, 1982.
- Straelen, Henry Van. The Religion of Divine Wisdom, Japan's Most Powerful Religious Movement. Kyoto, Japan: Veritas Shoin, 1957.
- The Teachings and History of Tenrikyo*. Tenri City, Japan: Tenrikyo Overseas Mission Department, 1986.

Tenrikyo

One of the very first of what have come to be known as Japan's new religions, or shin shukyo, Tenrikyo (Religion of Heavenly Wisdom) was founded in 1838 by Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), a farmer's wife with shamanistic attributes from a village close to Tenri City, which is situated in the Yamato basin only a short distance from the historic city of Nara. In 1838, Tenri-O-no-Mikoto (God of Heavenly Reason), also known as Oyagami (God the Parent), is believed to have taken possession of Nakayama Miki, also called Oyasama (Worthy Parent), for the purpose of revealing to her his divine plan and her role therein, and to bestow upon her the gift of healing.

Nakayama Miki's mission was to consist of delivering people from suffering in preparation for the coming of a perfect divine kingdom (kanrondai sekai) in which human beings would enjoy the joyous and blissful life (yoki-gurashi) in union with Tenri-O-no-Mikoto. On becoming the shrine of Tenri-O-no-Mikoto, Nakayama Miki was also provided by this same deity with a plot of ground known as the jiba, believed to be the place of origin of the human race and its spiritual home (oyasato). On this land stands the principal place of worship (Shinden) at the center of which is the kanrondai, or sacred pillar. Both the Shinden and the Kyosoden, the sanctuary of the foundress, are centers of pilgrimage. It is believed that Nakayama Miki continues to dwell in the Kyosoden, where she is attended to as if still physically present by devotees who dust and clean her bedroom, prepare her food, and look after her every need.

As in the case of other Japanese new religions founded by women, Nakayama Miki was greatly helped by a dedicated male disciple in the person of Iburi Izo, a poor carpenter whose wife she had healed of childbirth fever. Iburi Izo displayed his gratitude for this cure by dedicating himself to hinokishin, or volunteer work for the church, including the construction of a model of the first kanrondai in 1873 and a sanctuary for Tenri-O-no-Mikoto. Iburi Izo became the joint leader of Tenrikyo on the death of Nakayama Miki in 1887, and in his capacity as honseki, or oracle, he spoke through the spirit of the foundress to God. His pronouncements were written down and came to constitute a set of sacred writings known as the Osashizu. These supplement the two most important sacred scriptures, the Ofudesaki (Tip of the Divine Writing-pen), transmitted by God to Nakayama Miki, a transmission that was not completed until 1882, and the divinely inspired Mikagura-uta, or poems that are used as the text of Tenrikyo's worship.

The major Tenrikyo sacred ritual, the dance of creation, the kagura tsutome, takes place around the kanrondai and is performed by dancers in masks led by the head of the church, known as the shimbashira, a descendant of the foundress. The masks represent figures in the cosmogonic myth developed by Tenrikyo. This dance, performed on the 26th of each month, is believed to hasten the fulfillment of God's plans and is given as the main reason for Tenrikyo's existence. On the day prior to the performance, the Shimbashira "ordains" (in a brief ceremony known as the honseki) those who have completed the course of besseki lectures (the nine lectures required for initiation) and the shuyoka course (three months' intensive training) and taken the besseki vow. They are given by the Shimbashira the sacred grant of osazuke, or healing, and these graduates, or yobuku (literally timbers), are now empowered to perform healing rites using a particular form of hand gesture known as teodori, or hand dance, the gesture used in Tenrikyo worship.

The major festival for members from all over the world is the birthday of the foundress, celebrated at the Oyasato, or headquarters, on April 18. Other important services include the Tai-sai, or great services, held on January 26 and October 26. There are memorial services for the dead on March 27 and September 27, as well as a monthly service, the Tsukinami-sai. Three times a month there is the popular sacramental rite of obiya yurushi, or easy childbirth, which involves the consecration of white rice that is then placed on the Kanrodai during the obiya tsutome service in which the creation is ritually re-enacted.

Regarded as a dissident religious movement, Tenrikyo suffered increasing government probes and harassment, and the foundress, while proud of her country, was critical and at times even scornful of its ruling elite—as were other female founders of Japanese sects, including Deguchi Nao (of Omoto). Nakayama Miki was frequently interrogated, and she was imprisoned on 17 occasions for, among other things, blasphemy and obstructing the public highways by performing elaborate ritual dances at the corners of the village. The movement's fortunes changed, however, and in 1908 it was recognized as one of the 13 Sect Shinto organizations, autonomous organizations authorized by the government between 1868 and 1945.

In 1947, Tenrikyo, believing that its teachings had become distorted by State Shinto, launched the campaign for the Restoration of the Original Teachings (Fukugen). In 1970 it withdrew from the Association of Shinto Sects and had itself placed in the category of "Other Religions." It is one of the largest movements in that group, with a membership of more than one million in Japan. Tenrikyo is also present in many countries outside Japan, including Korea, Taiwan, India, Nepal, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the United States, France, and Great Britain, but in every case with the exception of Korea it has remained numerically small.

Tenrikyo operates a number of important cultural and educational institutions, including Tenri University, founded in 1925, and the very valuable Tenri Library and Tenri Sankokan Museum. It has also established a publishing house and a hospital. In the latter both spiritual and scientific methods of healing are used.

The structure and organization of Tenrikyo, while formally bureaucratic, is essentially based on the principle of the ie, or family system; the honbuin, or central administration, consists of descendants of the families of Nakayama Miki and Iburi Izo, or of families very close to theirs. The headquarters are in Tenri City (near Nara), Japan, and are known as Oyasato, or Village of the Parent.

<http://www.tenrikyo.or.jp/>

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Omoto; Possession; Shinto; State Shinto; Tenri City.

References

- Clarke, Peter B. A Bibliography of Japanese New Religions. Eastbourne, UK: Japan Library, 1999.
- Elwood, Robert S., Jr. Tenrikyo: A Pilgrimage Faith. Tenri City, Japan: Oyasato Research Institute, 1982.
- Ofudesaki: Tip of the Writing-Brush*. Tenri City, Japan: Tenrikyo Church Headquarters, 1971.
- Oyasato Research Institute, Tenri University. The Theological Perspectives of Tenrikyo. Tenri City, Japan: Tenri University Press, 1986.

Tensho Kotai Jinguiko

Tensho Kotai Jinguiko, the Religion of the Mighty God of Heaven (Tensho refers here to the sun goddess, Amaterasu), was founded in July 1945 by a farmer's wife, Sayo Kitamura (1900–1967), from the village of Hizumi in Yamaguchi Prefecture in the western part of Honshu. Sayo Kitamura, after one of a series of possessions by Tensho, became a living goddess, or ikigami, in July 1945. She proceeded to inform her listeners that global catastrophe was imminent. She also announced that the Kami Tensho, who had taken complete possession of her whole being, had commanded her to perform a dance as a means of restoring harmony and peace at that very moment, when the present order of the world was about to collapse into complete anarchy and chaos. From that point, observers referred to the new movement as the Dancing Religion (Odori Shukyo). The dance is also important in securing release from evil spirits and in bringing relief where there is misfortune. In the thinking of the Dancing Religion, as in numerous other Japanese religions (for example, Agonshu), ancestral spirits are seen as bringing suffering to their descendants and the living generally when they themselves have not been redeemed.

A charismatic leader who broke innumerable conventions in relation to style of dress, use of language, and customary forms of greeting, among other things, Sayo Kitamura, known to her followers as Ogamisama (Great God), preached continuously of impending calamity and, in particular, of the devastation that awaited the world on account of the development and use of the atomic bomb. There would, however, emerge in the course of time a new world order in which peace and happiness would reign unchallenged, and this would be brought about by spiritual means, by fulfilling the commands of the absolute deity Tensho Kotai Jingu.

The main teaching of the movement is that misfortune and unhappiness are the result of desires and attachments, and that the only way out of this unhealthy and harmful condition is through prayer that leads to the state of non-ego, or muga. The main practice is the ecstasy dance, or muga-no-mai, the dance of selflessness. A prayer known as oinori is said by members prior to starting this dancing ritual, and it ends with the recitation of the formula na myo ho ren ge kyo, a phrase that is regarded as untranslatable and whose meaning and power to transform and purify are in the sounds. This formula and improvised songs (muga-no-uta) are sung continuously, each time with ever-increasing intensity and volume as the dance gets underway.

It is believed that the dance bestows on participants the gift of divine insight into the innermost secrets of the universe. Followers believe, further, that this dance will give them spiritual control over the world and purify the souls of all human beings. It is also thought that once they have achieved this high emotional state, followers' prayers gain the power to redeem all evil spirits, including those that might be in possession of the living. A form of speaking in tongues during this selfless dance is not unknown, the different languages heard being those of souls who have entered the participants' bodies to express their gratitude for having been saved.

Other practices include mutual soul polishing meetings known variably, depending on their form, content, and size as tomomigaki, migaki-no-kai, and komigakai.

The movement's headquarters, or honbu—regarded as the spiritual home of the people of the world—is located in the village of Tabuse in Yamaguchi Prefecture, close to the village where the founder was born and reared. The present spiritual head is Himigamisama, her granddaughter, the daughter of her son, known as Wakagamisama. The latter performs the role of administrative head of the movement.

Overseas branches exist in the United States, the largest center being in Hawaii, where the active membership is less than 1,000.

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Agonshu; Shinto.

References

- Clarke, Peter B. "Modern Japanese Millenarian Movements." In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 129–182. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 2000.
- Hamrin, Tima. "Illness and Salvation in Tensho Kotai Jinguiko." In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 240–257. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 2000.
- Nishiyama, Shigeru, and Fujii Takashi. "The Propagation and Spread of Tensho Kotai Jinguiko within Japanese American Society on Hawaii Island." In New Religions: Contemporary Papers in Japanese Religions, edited by Inoue Nabutaka, 125–161. Tokyo: Kokugakuin University, 1991. <http://www.kokugakuin.ac.jp/ijcc/wp/cpjr/newreligions/nishiyama.html>. Accessed April 15, 2009.
- The Prophet of Tabuse*. Tabuse, Japan: Tensho Kotai Jinguiko, 1954.

Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition

The Terapanth Svetambara tradition of Jainism was founded by Muni Bhikhan (1726–1803), who was later called Acarya Bhiksu. Bhikhan was born in India in the village of Kantaliya near Jodhpur. His parents were Bisa Osvals of the Sankleca gotra and followed the Murtipujak Jain tradition. After the death of his wife, Bhikhan renounced the world and became initiated into the itinerant mendicant order of Acarya Raghunath (1706 or 1708–1790) of the Dhanna Dharmadasa Sthanakavasi tradition in 1751. However, on June 28, 1760, he split from the "lax" Sthanakavasis with four other monks and founded his own mendicant order in Kelva near Rajsamand. In the beginning, his group had only 13 male members, and his opponents scorned it as the path of the 13, or terah panth. Bhiksu later paraphrased terah panth as tera panth, or your path, and interpreted the number 13 in terms of the principal rules of conduct for Jain ascetics—the 5 great vows, or mahavratas; the 3 restraints, or guptis; and the 5 comportments, or samitis—which he attempted to follow by the letter.

The cause of the schism was a disagreement over a technical point of Jain karma theory. The Jain canonical scriptures teach that the soul can be liberated from its karmic fetters only through the renunciation of all violence—that is, all action. The Dharmadasa Sthanakavasis, like most extant Jain traditions, also propagate compassion, or anukampa, as a religious value and emphasize the positive karmic consequences of charity (dana-daya) and the protection of life (jiva daya). In contrast, Bhiksu argued that because ultimately both bad karma (papa) and good karma (punya) obstruct the liberation of the soul, a salvation seeker must avoid both. Because he privileged this perspective, he regarded acts of compassion performed for the purpose of accumulating punya even as sinful (papa). The most concise discussion of this issue from the Terapanth point of view can be found in Bhiksu's treatise Anukampa Ri Caupai, written in 1787 in the local Marvari language. Bhiksu distinguishes there (and elsewhere) between relative or worldly compassion (laukik daya) and absolute or religious compassion (lokottara or dharma daya)—that is, absolute nonviolence. He argues that although material acts of charity are positive from the social point of view (vyavahara naya), they are negative from the religious point of view (niscaya naya). In his conception, punya can be gained only as a side effect of acts of renunciation, not independently through acts of material help or other “mixed” actions. His criticism of the laxity of the Sthanakavasi mendicants and other Jain traditions is directed against their non-recognition of the difference between religion and worldly morality.

The terminology of Acarya Bhiksu’s teaching of absolute renunciation is influenced not only by the writings of the Digambara Acarya Kundakunda (ca. second to third centuries CE) and the Digambara commentaries of Umasvati’s Tattvartha-sutra (ca. third to fifth centuries CE) but also by the tabbas, or vernacular commentaries, of the Acarya Dharmasinha (1599–1671), the founder of the Dariyapuri Sthanakavasi tradition. Dharmasinha also taught the futility of compassionate help and nonintervention on the grounds that from the absolute point of view the moment of death of every living being is predetermined by its life-span (ayusya) karma, even if the causes of death appear to be accidental, and therefore preventable, from a conventional point of view. For other Sthanakavasis the name Terapanth indicates that Acarya Bhiksu’s views are akin to those of the proponents of the image-worshipping lay movement of the Digambara Terapantha (which should otherwise not be confused with the aniconic Svetambara Terapanth Order), whose adherents also claim to practice Jainism from an absolute perspective—or niscaya naya. The denial of the necessity of the practical point for a non-omniscient living being is, for them, a form of ekanta-vada (theoretical absolutism) that contradicts the “Jain theory” of anekanta-vada (non-absolutism).

Although the principal outlook of the Terapanth has not changed during its 240-year history, its forms of application and its institutions have changed. To prevent schisms and laxity, Acarya Bhiksu made the rule that there should be only one acarya, or teacher cum group leader, and that he should be chosen by his predecessor. On that basis, the fourth acarya, Jitmal (Jayacarya) (1803–1881), created an elaborate institutional framework for the growing monastic order from 1852 on. The ninth acarya, Tulsi (1914–1997), ruled the order from 1934. He modernized the Terapanth and turned it from a world-negating mendicant order into a world-transforming religious movement by emphasizing the significance of education, worldly morality, and social reform. In 1949 he created the “nonreligious” anuvrat, or small-vow, movement for the implementation of nonviolence and morality in social life. In 1952 he abolished the dogma of non-accidental death and later promoted “worldly” charity for his educational projects. The communal goodwill movement in 1954 was followed in 1960 by the naya mod, or new turn, initiative that sought to eradicate “outdated” social customs among the Terapanth laity, such as rituals, casteism, and female purdha. In 1970 the Jain Visva Bharati was opened and gained the status of a “deemed to be University” in 1971. It is located in Ladnun, the birthplace of Acarya Tulsi, and functions today as the physical center of the Terapanth, though all important decisions are taken by the permanently itinerant acarya. In 1980, Acarya Tulsi introduced a new category of novices, the saman(i)s, who are permitted to use public transport and to travel abroad on missionary tours. For many Jains living outside India, the *saman*s and samanis are the only Jain mendicants they can meet. The present leader of the Terapanth is Acarya Mahaprajna (b. 1920), who was inaugurated in 1994. Mahaprajna contributed greatly to the Terapanth edition of the canonical scriptures, or agama (1974–), and the publication of the Terapanth literature in Rajasthani. Under the impression of the success of Goenka’s vipassana classes in Rajasthan, he introduced a Jain version of insight meditation, preksa dhyana, in 1975. And in 1980 he introduced the science of living program, jnana vijnana, a step-by-step guide for a non-violent way of life for children and adults, intended for schools and universities in particular. The chosen successor of Mahaprajna is Yuvacarya Mahasraman (b. 1962).

At present, the Terapanth has about 250,000 followers all over India (including non-Jain members of the anuvrata movement); several thousand in Nepal, the United Kingdom, and the United States; and a few families in many commercial centers around the world. Most Terapanth lay followers belong to the traditional business families of the Osva castes. Because of the influence of the missionary tours of the *saman*s and samanis, the influence of the Terapanth is currently spreading worldwide, though primarily among expatriate Jains. The principal religious practices of the Terapanthis are fasting, meditation, and study. Because image-worship is rejected, laypeople venerate the mendicants of the Terapanth order as symbols of Jain ideals.

Jain Vishva Bharati
Ladnun-341 306
Rajasthan
India

Peter Flügel

See also: Jainism; Meditation

References

- Budhmal, Muni. Terapanth Ka Itihas. Pratham Khand: Terapanth Ke Pratham Car Acarya. 4th rev. ed. Calcutta: Jain Svetambar Terapanth Mahasabha Prakasan, 1964, 1995.
- Flügel, Peter. "The Ritual Circle of the Terapanth Svetambara Jains." Bulletin D'Etudes Indiennes 13 (1995–1996): 117–176.
- Mahaprajna, Yuvacarya. Preksha Dhyana: Theory and Practice. 2nd rev. ed. Ed. by Muni Mahendra Kumar. Ladnun, India: Tulsi Adhyatma Nidam, 1992.
- Nathmal, Muni [Acarya Mahaprajna]. Acharya Bhiksu: The Man and His Philosophy. Translation of Bhiksu Vicar Darsan by N. Sahal. Curu, India: Adars Sahity Sangh Prakasan, 1959, 1968.
- Tulsi, Acarya. Anuvrat: A Shield against Immorality. Ladnun, India: Jain Vishva Bharati, 1989.
- Tulsi, Acarya, ed. Bhiksu-Granth Ratnakar. Khand 1–2. Sanghrahakarta: Muni Cauthmal. Prabhandh Sampadak: Sricand Rampuriya. Calcutta: Jain Svetambara Terapanth Mahasabha, 1960–1961.
- Tulsi, Acarya, and Yuvacarya Mahaprajna, comps. Terapanth: Maryada Aur Vyavastha. Sampadak: Muni Madhukar. Jayacarya Series Vol. 9. Ladnun, India: Jain Visva Bharati, 1983.

Thai Forest Monks

The second half of the 19th century in Thailand witnessed an efflorescence of ascetic forest-dwelling monks dedicated to the practice of meditation. These monks led an eremitic life—sometimes alone, sometimes in small groups. They were heirs to a classical division within the Theravada sangha (monastic order) between forest dwellers (Pali: araññavasi) and town dwellers (Pali: gamavasi). This division correlates loosely with a further categorization of monks into those who devote themselves to meditation (Pali: vipassanadhura) and those whose vocation is more inclined toward studying texts (Pali: ganthadhura).

Austere activities undertaken in addition to the monks' rules (Pali: vinaya) came to be associated with the path of meditation. Thirteen in number, these practices are known as dhutanga, and they include the practice of sleeping in forests or cemeteries. In Thailand monks who follow all or some of the dhutanga practices are known as thudong monks.

Scholars propose that the revitalization of the thudong tradition can be regarded as a reaction to 19th-century ecclesiastical reforms and the emergence of a new monastic fraternity (Pali: nikaya), the Thammayut, promoted by the royal monk and eventual monarch, Mongkut (1851–1868). The Thammayut reformers engineered a more standardized and bureaucratic form of state Buddhism, commensurate with moves toward the consolidation and modernization of the state.

Many of the most noted of the thudong monks of the revival were to be found in the northeast region of the country, especially those who belonged to the lineage of the meditation teacher Phra Ajaan Man Phuurithatto (1870–1949). Man was universally acknowledged as an especially holy monk who achieved the highest level of spiritual attainment (Pali: arahant). Narratives of Man's life and those of other venerated forest monks became popular and are nowadays printed for distribution as gifts at funerals.

The forest monks served as teachers, healers, and community leaders to the villagers who supported them. From the outset the wandering monks established temporary hermitages during the rainy season. Under pressure from the centralized authority of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and with the encouragement of local patronage, the hermitages gave way to permanent monasteries whose members continued the thudong tradition by undertaking pilgrimages.

Most recently, organized tours have become popular among prosperous urban folk who seek to acquire religious merit through offering requisites to the forest monks, who are regarded as particularly pure and so unusually productive of merit. The funerals of forest meditation masters have attracted huge crowds, including high-ranking members of the Thai royal family. Such attention has, however, done little to safeguard the independence of forest monks, who are often in conflict with officials of the Forest Department. In 1987 the Thai Sangha Council ordered all monks, except those living in designated monasteries, to leave the forests. Furthermore, forested areas are shrinking. Decades of land clearance and logging have wiped out up to 80 percent of Thailand's forests. Monks from forest monasteries are active in a struggle to conserve what remains.

One famous forest monk and disciple of Ajaan Man was Ajaan Chah. Ajaan Chah (1924–1993) established an international monastery, Wat Pah Nanachat, as a center for the increasing numbers of Buddhists from Europe, Australia, and America who traveled to Thailand to ordain as monks. In 1977 he visited Britain and founded what came to be known as the British Forest Sangha. A branch monastery was established in the 1990s in northern California named Abhayagiri Buddhist Monastery; similarly, branch monasteries exist in Switzerland, Italy, New Zealand, and Australia.

Wat Pah Nanachat
Bahn, Bung Wai
Amper Warin
Ubon Rajathani 34310
Thailand

Sandra Bell

See also: Meditation; Monasticism; Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Chah, Ajahn. Reflections. Ed. by Dharmma Garden. Taipei, Taiwan: Corporate Body of the Buddha Educational Foundation, 2007.
- Cummings, Joe. Thai Meditation Temples of Thailand: A Guide. Bangkok: Wayfarer Books/Trasvin Publications, 1990.
- Rajavaramuni, Phra. Thai Buddhism in the Buddhist World. North Hollywood, CA: Wat Thai of Los Angeles, 1984.
- Tambiah, Stanley J. The Buddhist Saints of the Forest and the Cult of Amulets. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.

Taylor, J. J. Forest Monks and the Nation-State: An Anthropological and Historical Study in North-eastern Thailand. Singapore: Institute of South-east Asian Studies, 1993.

Tiyavanich, Kamala. Forest Recollections: Wandering Monks in Twentieth-Century Thailand. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1997.

■ Thailand

Thailand is a Southeast Asian country sandwiched between Burma to the west and Laos and Cambodia to the east. The southernmost part of the country is a peninsula that lies between the Andaman Sea and the Gulf of Thailand. On the southernmost part of the peninsula lies the country of Malaysia. Thailand has some 66 million people (2009) residing on its 198,000 square miles of territory.

The most prominent religion in Thailand is, and for many centuries has been, Buddhism. Individual Thai people may take Buddhism very differently, that is, as an intellectual religion, a normative religion, a popular religion, a doctrinal religion, or an engaged religion. No matter what type of Buddhism, as long as it is harmful neither to an individual nor to the public, it is supported by the people and by the government. All Thai Buddhism that complies with the policy of the Thai government, the Sangha Act of 1962, and that is administrated by the Sangha Supreme Council, is considered orthodox Buddhism and, according to the Thai Constitution, is supported by the government.

Some Buddhist movements, for example, the Santi Asoka, are self-governed, reject the authority of the Sangha Supreme Council, and establish their own ways of life and religious practices. They are considered unorthodox and gain no governmental support. In contrast to the Santi Asoka, another influential reformist Buddhist group, the Dhammakaya Foundation, submits itself to the Thai Sangha, and thus is protected by some of its elders. Thailand is also the home of the international headquarters of the World Fellowship of Buddhists, which has its main offices in Bangkok.

According to Basic Religious Data for the year 2007, there were 55,480,000 Buddhists. Thai Buddhism is predominantly Theravada, and thus it places a great deal of emphasis upon the support of the monastic order. Monks cannot work to earn their living. They are supported by laypeople and the government. In 1998 there were 265,791 Buddhist monks and 97,875 Buddhist novices. In 1999 there were 31,111 Buddhist monasteries throughout the country. Food is donated to monks during their alms rounds, or they are invited to lead a ceremony. That is held to yield more merit to the doer than donating to “ordinary people,” as monks are considered holy.

Wat Phra Singh Temple in Chiang Mai, Thailand. (William Casey/Dreamstime.com)

Apart from Buddhism, other religions in Thailand supported by the government are Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism. These religions are subject to the Department of Religious Affairs and under Thai law. Following the Thai Constitution, all religions whose beliefs and practices are harmful neither to an individual, society, nor the Thai nation are allowed to spread throughout the country. Thais are free to profess any religion. Besides, the Thai king, though himself a Buddhist, is the Great Upholder of All Faiths. On the king’s birthday each year, leaders of all major religions in Thailand (Buddhism, Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism) express their well-wishes to the king on television.

According to statistics from each religious center there are approximately a million Muslims, 496,898 Christians, and 30,000 religious followers of Hinduism and Sikhism. There are also religious followers of other minor traditions, such as the Baha’i Faith and Confucianism. They are, however, unable to gain support from the Thai government because of their small number of members.

The Islamic community in Thailand is Sunnite (of the Shafiite School) led by the chula-raja-montri (chief imam) whose office is in Bangkok. The Islamic law is used in Muslim courts in four major provinces in southern Thailand, where a number of Malay people reside.

Christianity in Thailand represents two basic groupings: Catholic and Protestant. In 1998 there were about 2,200 Christian clergy. In 1999 there were about 1,500 Protestant churches and 700 Catholic churches in Thailand. All were supported financially by the Thai government. The Protestant community was pioneered by Dutch and British missionaries, the latter representing the London Missionary Society. They were soon joined by Americans from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. A number of the Protestant church groups (Baptists, Presbyterians, Christian Churches [Disciples of Christ], and Lutherans) united in 1934 to form the Church of Christ in Thailand, currently the largest Protestant body. Since World War II, significant growth has been shown by the New Apostolic Church and the indigenous Thai Ezra Churches, the latter a movement that began in northeast Thailand in the early 1980s and by the end of the century had claimed more than 100,000 members.

THAILAND

Christianity has found its support primarily among Vietnamese, Chinese, Karen, and Montagnard ethnic

Thailand

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Buddhists	34,405,000	56,497,000	86.8	0.75	59,057,000	57,108,000
Muslims	1,392,000	4,115,000	6.3	0.76	4,500,000	4,700,000
Ethnoreligionists	250,000	1,500,000	2.3	0.45	1,550,000	1,500,000
Agnostics	80,000	1,150,000	1.8	0.77	1,500,000	1,700,000
Christians	372,000	849,000	1.3	1.75	1,025,000	1,112,000
Roman Catholics	154,000	340,000	0.5	3.34	390,000	420,000
Independents	137,000	270,000	0.4	1.75	350,000	400,000
Protestants	78,900	260,000	0.4	1.83	320,000	350,000
Chinese folk	640,000	555,000	0.9	0.76	600,000	600,000
Confucianists	0	235,000	0.4	0.76	265,000	275,000
Hindus	60,000	60,000	0.1	0.76	60,000	60,000
Baha'is	6,400	60,000	0.1	0.76	90,000	120,000
Sikhs	10,000	55,000	0.1	0.76	85,000	100,000
Atheists	30,000	33,000	0.1	0.80	40,000	50,000
New religionists	1,600	16,000	0.0	0.76	30,000	50,000
Shintoists	0	400	0.0	0.76	700	1,200
Jews	70	90	0.0	0.72	100	100
Total population	37,247,000	65,125,000	100.0	0.76	68,803,000	67,376,000

groups residing in China, and to only a small degree among the Thai proper.

Hinduism or Brahmanism plays significant roles in the Thai Royal Court and popular traditions. For most Thais the king is semi-divine. Although he himself is a Buddhist, his power is held to be supported by deities, in both Buddhist and Hindu traditions. All auspicious royal ceremonies, such as the First Ploughing Ceremony, the Royal Inauguration, and the Golden Jubilee of the Royal Enthronement, are partly performed by Brahmins (Hindu priests). Moreover, as Indian civilization with Hinduism has pervaded Thai society since the old days, many Thais believe that their lives are predestined by a Hindu God, especially God Brahma. Although most Thais are Buddhists, they nevertheless believe in the supernatural power of deities.

Sikhism is confined to some Thais of Indian blood living particularly in downtown Bangkok. Confucianism prevails among Thais whose ancestors are Chinese. The Thai people have refrained from waging wars against one another based upon their religions.

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Baha'i Faith; Christian Church

(Disciples of Christ); Church of Christ in Thailand; Confucianism; London Missionary Society; Monasticism; New Apostolic Church; Shafite School of Islam; Theravada Buddhism; World Fellowship of Buddhists.

References

- Keyes, Charles F. Thailand: Buddhist Kingdom to Modern Nation-State. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1987.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. Kwam Roo Phuen Than Thang Sasana. 3rd ed. Bangkok: Thammasat University Press, 1997.
- Smith, A. G. "A History of Church Growth in Thailand: An Interpretive Analysis, 1816–1980." Ph.D. diss., Fuller Theological Seminary, 1980. Thai Department of Religious Affairs. Yearbook of Basic Religious Data. Bangkok: Government Printing Office, 2000.

Thelema

Thelema is a magical teaching enunciated by English ceremonial magician Aleister Crowley (1875–1947).

Crowley's Thelemic cult of sex magick (Crowley's unique spelling) derives specifically from a transformative spiritual event that occurred during his visit to Cairo in 1904. Crowley would come to believe that the revelatory communication itself emanated from the ancient Egyptian gods, via an entity named Aiwass (or Aiwaz) whom Crowley believed to be a messenger from Horus. Crowley's personal revelation would also come to acquire a quasi-biblical orientation for it led him to regard himself henceforth as the Beast 666 referred to in the book of Revelation—an association possibly related to his unhappy Plymouth Brethren (now Christian Brethren) upbringing as a child. Following his revelation from Aiwass, Crowley's life and career as a ceremonial magician would subsequently focus on the ongoing personal quest to find the ideal Whore of Babalon (Crowley's variant spelling) or Scarlet Woman, with whom to enact the philosophy of Thelema, or magical will. According to the doctrine of Thelema, Crowley's sex-magick encounters with his Scarlet Women—there would be many more than one throughout his magical career—were sacramental acts confirming Crowley's role as Lord of the New Aeon.

On March 17, 1904, Crowley performed a magical ceremony in his apartment in Cairo, invoking the Egyptian deity Thoth, god of wisdom. Crowley's wife, Rose, who had accompanied him on his trip to Egypt, appeared to be in a dazed, mediumistic state of mind and, the following day, while in a similar state of drowsiness, she announced that Horus was waiting for her husband. Crowley was not expecting such a statement from his wife but according to his diary she subsequently led him to the nearby Boulak Museum, which he had not previously visited. Rose then pointed to a statue of Horus, or Ra-Hoor-Khuit, and Crowley was intrigued to discover that the exhibit was numbered 666, the number of the Great Beast in the Book of Revelation.

On March 20, 1904, Crowley received a mediumistic communication through Rose stating that “the Equinox of the Gods had come” and he arranged for an assistant curator at the Boulak Museum to make notes on the inscriptions from Stele 666. Rose continued to fall into a passive, introspective state of mind and advised her husband that precisely at noon on April 8, 9, and 10 he should enter the room where the transcriptions had been made and for exactly an hour on each of these three days he should write down any impressions received. The resulting communications, allegedly dictated by a semi-invisible Egyptian entity named Aiwass—said to be a messenger of Horus—resulted in a document that Crowley later titled Liber Al vel Legis (The Book of the Law).

The pronouncements contained in Liber Al vel Legis became a turning point in Crowley's magical career. Crowley was specifically commanded by Aiwass to put aside the Kabbalistic ceremonial magic he had learned in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and was instructed to pursue the magic of sexual partnership—acts of “love under Will”—with his Scarlet Woman. Liber Al vel Legis was also completely dismissive of earlier religious traditions that had preceded the 1904 revelation. “With my Hawk's head,” proclaims Ra-Hoor-Khuit (Horus) in stanzas III: 51–54, “I peck at the eyes of Jesus as he hangs upon the Cross. I flap my wings in the face of Mohammed and blind him. With my claws I tear out the flesh of the Indian and the Buddhist, Mongol and Din. Bahlasti! Ompedha! I spit on your crapulous creeds.”

Liber Al vel Legis summons the Scarlet Woman to “raise herself in pride!” and calls for uninhibited sexual freedom. Accordingly, Crowley came to believe that the so-called Great Work—sacred union, or the attainment of Absolute Consciousness—would be achieved through the sexual union of the Great Beast with the Whore of Babalon: “The Beast, as the embodiment of the Logos (which is Thelema, Will) symbolically and actually incarnates his Word each time a sacramental act of sexual congress occurs, i.e., each time love is made under Will.” A review of Crowley's subsequent career shows that he would spend much of his life from this time on seeking lovers and concubines who could act as his Divine Whore. While he would be frustrated in his numerous attempts to find a suitable and enduring partner, there were many who filled the role temporarily.

Liber Al vel Legis also contained instructions relating to ceremonial offerings associated with sacramental sex magick, specifically in the preparation of what later came to be known as “cakes of light.” The magical ingredients were derived from sexual congress itself: semen from the male, gluten from the woman's vagina, and preferably fresh menstrual blood, as specified in stanza 24 of Book III of Liber Al vel Legis. These ingredients were then consumed by participants as a ritual offering to Ra-Hoor-Khuit.

Nevill Drury

See also: Christian Brethren; Crowley, Aleister; Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

References

- Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Ed. by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill and Wang, 1970.
- Crowley, Aleister. Liber Al vel Legis. In The Magical Record of the Beast 666, edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. London: Duckworth, 1972.
- Crowley, Aleister. Magick in Theory and Practice. Paris: the author, 1929. Reprinted in various editions.
- Sutin, L. Do What Thou Wilt: A Life of Aleister Crowley. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Theology

From a historical perspective it can be said that in general every religion has been characterized by a theology. At the same time however, it is necessary to affirm that the theologies associated with their corresponding religions are quite varied, since, throughout the centuries, there has been an important development of the concept of theology to reach the currently accepted understanding.

The term is from a Greek root, theologia. It is possible to schematically divide the history of the concept, beginning from the elements of theos and logos that compose it, in light of the importance they have assumed throughout time. Three phases can be distinguished in this schema: (1) the origin related to natural religions; (2) the philosophical elaboration of the concept; (3) the development tied to revealed religion.

The context in which the first theology was born is that of natural polytheistic Greek religion, presumably circa the sixth century BCE. It was characterized by a recourse to myth, that is, to narrations, themselves common to the various archaic religions, through which poets, such as Orpheus, Homer, and Hesiod, expressed the ancient traditions about the gods of Olympus in written word. They theologized, in the sense that they spoke of gods, that is, of the forces that rule nature and the origin of the world, while providing an essential instruction for life. In this period, logos was understood in a largely human sense, as the word that transmits ancient secrets. The word of the poet at once transmitted traditions and praised the divinities (theoi), personifying the cosmic forces. Greek theology arose as a history of gods and the world. It is thus a theology understood at once as theogony and cosmogony, in the expressive form of narration. The divinities and the world are presented as indissolubly united in a common submission to Fate and necessity. Hesiod is a classic example of this first form of theology, which has as starting point mystery and the experience, at times dramatic, that man has of it.

Beginning with the fifth century BCE, philosophical reflection, which in its origin has an essentially religious nature, adopts the term in question. Plato and Aristotle transformed the meaning of theos, moving from mythological polytheism to ontology. These philosophers reacted before the Sophistic criticism, which denied the value of myth, and thus forced the foundations of Greek society into crisis. The strategy consisted of distinguishing the form from the content of myth, in order to show the value of their hidden meaning. This meaning is accessible to reason and universal, because it is based in the Good and the Beautiful. In this perspective, theos is understood in the singular, and identified with the First Principle and with Being itself. Logos thus is primarily understood as reason, that is, as the capacity that man has to understand the order of the cosmos, apprehending the eternal and immutable laws that unite the world and the realm of the divinity. In a certain manner, this theology is tied to a conception of the relationship of the world and God as a continuous ontological ladder that man can climb through his thought, rising from the sensible realm to that of the divine. This ladder leads the goods of this world, and life in particular, back to their source. Nevertheless, at the same time this unitary conception implies a dimension of necessity. From the experience of mystery there is a movement to rational reflection on it, often marked by an excessive trust in man's capacities, or better, in the capacities of the philosopher.

Thus, among the texts that have reached us, Plato (Republic, 378.e.7–379.b.1) will be the first who, as far as we know, employed the term “theology.” Aristotle will then divide philosophy into three types, mathematics, physics, and theology, according to the relationship with matter and movement of the studied causes (Metaphysics, 1026.a.18–21; 123). In this sense, he identifies theology and metaphysics. Thus it can be said of theology that: “It was the people of the Greeks, the founders of philosophy and science, who contributed to the intellectual life of mankind this new form of rational approach to the superhuman world” (Jaeger 1947, 46).

It is in the Hebrew world that theology for the first time assumes the meaning that is actually attributed to it, no longer founded on a generical experience of mystery or in the reflection that comes from this, but on the particular form of experience that is itself revelation of mystery. In this context, God is seen as absolutely distinct and separated from the world. It is this radical separation that awakens the absolute wonder of the Hebrew who encounters God who speaks to him. This is an encounter between he who can be neither seen nor named and man. It is an encounter that is configured as pure gift and that man survives only through the strength that God communicates to him.

This allows Philo, for example, to reinterpret theos in reference to the unique transcendent God. Logos is still understood in a literal sense, as the word of God who speaks and reveals himself. The concept of theology is close to that of prophecy, where the divine element is preponderant: the principal movement is that from God to man. For example, in commenting on the revelation of the name of God, Philo designates Moses as Theologian (De vita Moysis, 115, 1–2). Philo’s choice to use terminology from, as has been seen, the philosophical domain to speak of YHWH will have profound consequences.

In a properly Christian context, Clement of Alexandria opposes the theology of the poets, the followers of myth, and the true theology of philosophers, who in their search for Logos acquired many elements of truth (Stromata, 1, 22, 150, 4, 2). In this manner Christianity is placed in continuity with Greek philosophical research. Christ is presented as the true master and identified with the unique transcendent Theos, who not only initiates a covenant with his people, but even becomes incarnate to take the faults of his sons upon himself.

In his reflection, Origen will specify the fundamental difference between the theology of natural religions and that founded in revelation through the confusion that characterizes the first, between the world and its Creator. He will thus explicate what will become the fundamental characteristic of theologia after the third century, that is, the reference to the Trinity, which is identified with the Theos, which is one of its composing terms. This theology is possible only because it is Christ himself who speaks of the Father and reveals the one and triune God (Contra Celsum, 2, 71, 5–7). In this sense Jesus is the unique true Theologian. For this reason the Logos that is an element of the term “theologia” is no longer presented as only a human word, nor only as a word of God addressed to men, but is essentially the divine Word, that is, the Word who is God, the second Person of the Trinity, who becomes incarnate for the salvation of man. Word and Reason are now at the interior of God, and are God. Thus, the proper act of the theologian becomes the recognition of the divinity of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, itself configured as praise and religious worship.

Based on Origen’s work, theologia will become a technical term in the debates with the Arians of the fourth century. It will assume a signification of divine immanence—that is, it will indicate God in himself, in his Unity and in his Trinity. The domain of being will thus be distinguished from that of activity, in particular from the actions and events tied to the suffering of Christ in his humanity. For the Cappadocian fathers in particular, theologia will be understood as a direct reference to the mystery of God who is Father from all eternity, in that he has a Son that he eternally engenders in his Spirit.

At the conclusion of this historical outline, it is important to note that in the patristic passage to Theos understood as the one and triune God, the transcendence of the mystery imbues the logos that is a component of theologia with two significations: on one hand it refers, as noted, to the divine Logos, but on the other hand it also implicates human reason, to whom revelation is given. The mystery remains mystery, since man cannot penetrate it because it is transcendent, but revelation permits a knowledge of something, specifically, the gift of God. This reference to mystery must be remembered while considering the historical development that led the term to have the signification of “doctrine about God,” which is the most common meaning today.

At the end of the patristic period, the medievals will attempt to build a holistic vision of the world upon the richness of the tradition received from the first Christian thinkers. As the medievals referenced their writings and their authority, there was a risk involved in moving from the level of the being of the mystery to that of its representation. These authors in fact aspired to a representation of every element of the life of man ordered toward God, on the model of the cathedral, or of the summa. They thus strove for a synthesis that could offer, at a glance, the position of every aspect of man’s life in reference to its center, that is, his Creator. In this process however, the attention moved toward representation, and thus losing the sense of mystery and forgetting the primary character of revelation and gift in reference to that which reason can attain and comprehend. Thomas Aquinas’s criticisms of Anselm of Canterbury or Richard of Saint Victor are to be read in this sense. Thomas auspiciously left his Summa unfinished at the end of his life, due precisely to the (mystical) perception of the abyss between the representation and the mystery of God.

With nominalism, the confusion between the levels of language and reality was further aggravated. The birth of modernity pushed theology to define itself ever more in a doctrinal sense, modeling itself on philosophy. This is in contrast to the development of the first centuries of the Christian era, when it was philosophy that was transformed by the thought that arose from the experience of God who revealed himself. The project of the illuminationist encyclopedia and the requirement from the religious side to situate itself dialectically in reference to it also contributed to the movement in this direction.

In correction, the 20th century in the Western world was marked by a return to a theology tied to mystery and life, as well as to the sources: biblical, liturgical, and patristic. The theologies that accentuate action or theologies “of the genitive” are situated in this tendency. Theologies “of action” unite religion and life in such a way as to configure the world according to the will of God: Liberation Theology and Feminist Theology are two examples. Theologies “of the genitive” arise from the need to read the various aspects of human reality in a religious sense, for example, the theology of the body, that of work, and that of history.

Looking at the various contemporary religions, the three phases of the formation of the term “theology” can be useful to understand in what sense it is used to speak of Hinduism (the chapter “Hindu Theology and Philosophy” in Flood 1996), or Buddhism (Jackson and Makransky 1999). One can definitely observe a tendency to indicate the doctrinal dimension of various religions with the term “theology,” which leads some to recommend a metatheology (Hiebert 1994, Bosch 1991), analogous to how metaphysics is understood in relation to physics. This proposal, developed in the framework of the missionary movement, aims to take into account the different contexts in which each theology is developed. At the same time, a greater attention to the history of how theology has been situated in its development from the religious mystery is to be recommended. The analysis of René Girard is a good example, as he does a properly “theological” work according to the original sense of the term, using literary analysis and critical study of the history of religion.

Giulio Maspero

See also: Arius; God, Existence of; Moses.

References

- Batiffol, Pierre. “Theologia, Theologi.” Ethology 5 (1928): 205–222.
- Bosch, Donald. Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1991.
- Flood, Gavin D. An Introduction to Hinduism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Hiebert, Paul. G. Anthropological Reflection on Missiological Issues. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 1994.
- Jackson, R., and John Makransky, eds. Buddhist Theology. London: Routledge Curzon, 1999.

- Jaeger, Werner. Humanism and Theology. Milwaukee WI: Marquette University Press, 1943.
- Jaeger, Werner. The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1947.
- Kattenbusch, Ferdinand. "Die Entstehung Einer Christlichen Theologie. Zur Geschichte der Ausdrücke: Theologia, Theologein, Theologos." Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 11 (1930): 161–205.
- Smith, W. Cantwell. Towards A World Theology: Faith and the Comparative History of Religion. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1981.
- Stietenron, H. Von. "Theology." In The Brill Dictionary of Religion, edited by K. Von Stuckrad, 1879–1889. Leiden: Brill, 2006.
- Williams, J. G., ed. The Girard Reader. New York: Crossroad/Herder, 2000.

Theosophical Society (Adyar)

The Theosophical Society (Adyar) is an international organization whose main purpose is to promote primarily the oeuvre of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891) and secondarily those among its members who adhere to her teachings. This body of work and perspective serve as the bases of the three objects of the Society: (1) to form a nucleus of the Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, without distinction of race, creed, sex, caste, or color; (2) to encourage the study of comparative religion, philosophy, and science; and (3) to investigate unexplained laws of nature and the power latent in man.

The impact of the Theosophical Society (Adyar) prior to its numerous fissures beginning in 1895 and of those Theosophical societies that arose in the years following that have retained their loyalty to the Blavatsky canon—examples being the Theosophical Society (America), the United Lodge of Theosophists, and the now defunct Theosophical Society in America, with headquarters in New York City—has been profound. Rather than discussing the impact of the Theosophical Society, it would be more accurate to assert the direct impact of Blavatsky on the Theosophical Society (Adyar) and other Theosophical societies and then to argue the impact on movements and associations not directly connected to or descended from the original Theosophical Society. Many teachings within non-Theosophical organizations that share a similar worldview that may be termed Western Esoteric arose either directly from Blavatsky's writings or indirectly through the propaganda of numerous societies that emphasize her teachings, most notably the New Age.

It must also be stated, however, that as important as Blavatsky's contributions were, there were two important disciples of her teachings who helped to popularize what was often an obtuse teaching set forth by Blavatsky. A. P. Sinnett (1840–1921) was an early admirer when Blavatsky arrived in India from New York in 1879; Charles Webster Leadbeater (1854–1934) was a close colleague of the leading propagandist of the early Theosophical Society and later its president. Annie Besant (1847–1933) and Leadbeater made lasting contributions to the Society and the cause of Theosophy, but not, in the opinion of some, always in a positive manner. Sinnett is perhaps most responsible for creating the perception, through his book Esoteric Buddhism (1883), that modern Theosophy is predominantly derived from Hindu and Buddhist esotericism. Although Blavatsky writes extensively of this form of esotericism, she also included in her writings other forms of esotericism, such as Jewish Kabbalah. Leadbeater helped to popularize the formidable and often opaque explanations of Blavatsky. It is very likely that newcomers to Theosophical teachings were introduced through Leadbeater's books.

The Theosophical Society, with international headquarters in Adyar (Chennai), India, was founded in New York City in 1875 by a number of individuals, the most important of whom were Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) and Blavatsky. Olcott became the first president of the Society (1875–1907), helping in its spread and organization and popularizing its teachings. Blavatsky was responsible for the restatement, according to the Theosophical interpretation, of those teachings that became synonymous with the teachings of the Theosophical Society. Most of the teachings are contained in her two most important works, Isis Unveiled and The Secret Doctrine. Blavatsky retains special standing for most Theosophists because of her status as disciple, or chela, of highly evolved beings—Masters or Mahatmas—who dwelled in an “Occult Brotherhood” and who were the ultimate source of the teachings known as the Ancient Wisdom, the Secret Doctrine, the Wisdom Religion, or Theosophy. This Wisdom existed from the dawn of humanity—a prisca theologia or philosophia perennis—and was preserved and transmitted through the ages by great teachers and initiates (Pythagoras, Buddha, Krishna, Jesus, Zoroaster, Plato, Porphyry, Proclus, and Patañjali). Furthermore, it was conserved, however imperfectly, in the various religious traditions (Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, Judaism, Islam, and Zoroastrianism) and their sacred scriptures (the Veda, the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita, the Puranas, the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, the Zohar, the Buddhist canon, and the Avesta), all of which purported to disclose, in the words of Blavatsky, “the ‘deepest depths’ of the Divine Nature, and show . . . the real tie which binds all things together.”

Because of this conviction, the original objects of the Society as stated in its by-laws of 1875 were “to collect and diffuse a knowledge of the laws which govern the universe.” Nonetheless, the comparative study of religion and philosophy was not its only aim. There is enough evidence to suggest that the Ancient Wisdom was to be practiced. Indeed, the very word first employed by Blavatsky to refer to this Wisdom was “Magic”—a term that was synonymous with the post-1870s popularization of “Theosophy” as defined and elaborated by her in her later writing career—and which suggests both a combination of practice and understanding. For this reason, members of the Theosophical Society at various periods in its history placed greater emphasis on striving to arouse one’s latent powers rather than merely investigating the laws of nature from a theoretical perspective. This was especially true in the early years of the Society to the early 1880s and during the presidency of Annie Besant (r. 1907–1933). One type of training that more advanced members sought to achieve in the early years of the Society was astral projection, or the out-of-body experience.

Since there is no official dogma recognized by the Society, Theosophists possess a diversity of views according to their understanding of Theosophy. One position that is universally accepted, however, is the “Brotherhood of Humanity,” the first of the three objects of the Society quoted above. In addition to these objects, the body of teachings generally associated with the Society has been articulated by Blavatsky, especially in her greatest work, The Secret Doctrine. Among the teachings are: (1) the notion that religions have both exoteric and esoteric elements, with the Ancient Wisdom or Wisdom Religion (Theosophy) synonymous with the esoteric body of wisdom, taught and preserved by initiates in all the great religions and philosophies; (2) the recognition of the diversity and universality of sources containing the Ancient Wisdom, thereby including not only elements of Western Esotericism—neo-Platonism, Christian Kabbalah, Hermetism, and Hermeticism—but also Eastern components, notably Hindu and Buddhist philosophies; in brief an “Eclectic Theosophy” as opposed to the theosophy of Western Esotericism; (3) the three propositions contained in the introduction of The Secret Doctrine: (a) the existence of an infinite and unknowable Absolute, (b) the cyclic nature of the universe and all it comprises, and (c) the identity of the soul with the Universal Soul (of the Absolute) and the need for all souls to progress through the cycle of reincarnation to realize this identity.

As is evident in many movements, disagreements over teachings and authority have led to the formation of new organizations that arose out of the original Theosophical Society. The Hermetic Society was founded in 1884 due to the disagreement with the Orientalist flavor of Sinnett’s version of Theosophy as presented in his Esoteric Theosophy. In the same vein, the conflict arising over authority led to the 1895 separation of the American Section of the Theosophical Society under William Quan Judge (1851–1896), one of the original founders. Today, the Judge Society continues under the name the Theosophical Society (Pasadena). Furthermore, two controversies severely damaged the reputation of the Theosophical Society and its leaders. The first was the Hodgson Report of 1885, written on behalf of the Society for Psychical Research, which charged Blavatsky with fraud for claiming that her Masters or Mahatmas actually wrote letters to her and to others within the Society. The second surrounded the controversy of the coming World Teacher (Maitreya or the Christ) who would overshadow the body and personality of Jiddu Krishnamurti, the latter expected to serve as the Vehicle for the Teacher. Krishnamurti (1896–1986) spent 20 years preparing for this role, until 1929, when he abdicated his role as Vehicle and abandoned the Theosophical Society, to the great distress of many of its founders. These two episodes severely damaged the reputation of the Society and led to a decline in its membership rolls. From that period to the present, the Society never recovered the notoriety that it enjoyed prior to Krishnamurti's quitting the Society.

In the ensuing years, the Society has maintained a relatively low profile, but has made contributions to the intellectual world by maintaining a research library at its headquarters in Adyar that contains more than 20,000 palm-leaf manuscripts and more than 250,000 volumes, with a focus on Orientalia. It also maintains the Theosophical Publishing House in Adyar and Wheaton, Illinois, the home of the Theosophical Society in America. The Society also performs work for the welfare of poor and disadvantaged children through the Olcott Memorial School and Olcott Memorial High School, which offers free education to its students.

The Theosophical Society (Adyar) continues as the largest of Theosophical organizations with an approximate membership of 30,000 spread over 60 countries, with India and the United States possessing the most members (12,852 and 4,676, respectively).

The contributions and influence of Theosophical teachings to alternative esoterically based movements are numerous. Among these contributions are the following:

1. The Masters or Mahatmas, highly evolved beings such as Koot Hoomi and Morya, neither "Spirits" nor "some other kind of supernatural beings" according to Blavatsky in her Key to Theosophy, are men of great learning, especially pertaining to the Ancient Wisdom. These Masters constituted a Brotherhood according to Sinnett, and later the "Great White Brotherhood" according to Leadbeater. The notion of a Master did not originate with Blavatsky or modern Theosophy. It is a concept found in ancient religions such as Christianity and Judaism (angels), Buddhism (bodhisattvas), and early modern Esoteric movements such as Rosicrucianism and its later offshoots. It is likely, however, that Blavatsky's Theosophy influenced later organizations such as the Agni Yoga Society, the I AM Religious Activity of the Ballards, the Church Universal and Triumphant, individuals such as Baird T. Spalding and Frederick Oliver, the amanuensis of Phyllos the Tibetan, and most certainly Alice A. Bailey's Djwhal Khul.

2. Reincarnation was popularized through the publications of Theosophical literature. Although Blavatsky did not place great emphasis on the concept prior to the 1880s, it was given an important role in Sinnett's Esoteric Buddhism, serving as part of a grand scheme of spiritual evolution. Furthermore, reincarnation was viewed in much the same way as that contained in Allan Kardec's (1804–1869) Le Livre des Esprits: the soul progressively improves with no regression into lower forms such as animals.
3. Theosophists have contributed much to the popularization of the teaching of karma in the West. From the Mahatma Letters, Sinnett's Occult World (1881) and Esoteric Buddhism, Blavatsky's writings beginning in the 1880s, the Society's co-founder William Q. Judge's articles and Ocean of Theosophy, the numerous publications of Annie Besant and C. W. Leadbeater, and innumerable Theosophists who followed, it is almost impossible to avoid its mention in any segment of Theosophical literature. It was the Theosophists who introduced the phrase "law of karma" according to Australian scholar Eric J. Sharpe in his Universal Gita, and indeed it does appear in the writings of Blavatsky, W. Q. Judge, C. W. Leadbeater, and Annie Besant.

Although karma is associated with the individual, other forms of karma were introduced or at least popularized. National, racial, and family karma was discussed by Blavatsky in a late article ("Forlorn Hope," 1890) and by Judge in his Ocean of Theosophy and more recently as the "karma of a planet" by G. Farthing in his Deity Cosmos & Man. One cannot argue that karma derived from Hindu and Buddhist teachings, but such notions as national, racial, and family karma is not likely to be located in either religion.

4. Theosophical teachings have had an impact on the arts and literature. In art, it is certain that Wassily Kandinsky (1866–1944) was influenced by Theosophical ideas, especially concepts of color and of the higher world. Especially influential were Leadbeater's Man Visible and Invisible and Annie Besant and Leadbeater's Thought-Forms. Other artists include Piet Mondrian (1872–1944), Paul Klee (1879–1940), and the artists of the Transcendental Painting Group (founded in 1938) consisting of Raymond Jonson (1891–1982), Agnes Pelton (1881–1961), and Lawren Harris (1885–1970). Dutch architect, engraver, illustrator, and designer K. P. C. de Bazel (1869–1923), architect J. L. M. Lauweriks (1864–1932), and H. J. M. Walenkamp (1871–1933) actually joined the Theosophical Society in Amsterdam in 1894.

In the field of music, two composers who had direct contact with Theosophical teachings were Jean Sibelius (1865–1957) and Alexander Scriabin (1870–1915). Notable examples in literature include William Butler Yeats (1865–1939), George W. Russell (1867–1935), and Talbot Mundy (1879–1940). Finally, the author of the Oz works, Lyman Frank Baum (1856–1919), was a Theosophist who adopted many ideas from the genre.

To conclude, although the Theosophical Society consisted of relatively few members (never more than 50,000, usually under 30,000 members), with membership spread over 60 countries, its impact in these areas was significant.

James A. Santucci

See also: Bailey, Alice Ann; Besant, Annie; Blavatsky, Helena P.; Church Universal and Triumphant; I AM Religious Activity; Krishnamurti Foundations; Reincarnation; Spiritism; Theosophical Society (America).

References

Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna. The Secret Doctrine. 2 vols. in 1. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, 1974. (A facsimile of the original 1888 edition.)

Gomes, Michael. The Dawning of the Theosophical Movement. Wheaton, IL: Theosophical Publishing House [Quest Books], 1987.

The Mahatma Letters to A.P. Sinnett from the Mahatmas M. & K.H. 2nd ed. Transcribed, compiled, and with an introduction by A. T. Barker. London: Rider and Company, 1948 (originally published in 1923).

Olcott, Henry Steel. Old Diary Leaves. 6 vols.

Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1900–1941.

Santucci, James. La Società Teosofica. Torin, Italy: Elledici, 1999.

Theosophical Society (America)

The Theosophical Society (America) is also called the Theosophical Society (Pasadena) or simply the Pasadena tradition of Theosophy. It is one of several Theosophical societies. The first Theosophical Society began in 1875 in New York City under the leadership of Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) as an organization that would investigate Spiritualist phenomena and other occult practices and ideas as well as the world's religions. Blavatsky and Olcott left the United States for India in 1878. For several years the Society floundered; then, in 1883, William Quan Judge (1851–1896), one of the original members of the Society, began to recruit members and hold public meetings. He published a magazine, The Path, beginning in 1886. In that year he dissolved a Board of Control established by Olcott to govern Theosophists in the United States and created an American Section of the worldwide Theosophical Society that Judge himself headed as general secretary.

Judge was a charismatic leader, personally inspiring many middle-class Americans interested in Esoteric matters and disillusioned with Christianity. His published work conveyed Theosophical teachings in a popular, accessible style. His skills as an organizer, manager, and communicator contributed significantly to the rapid expansion of Theosophical work in the 1880s and 1890s. By the time of his death in 1896, Theosophical lodges could be found in most major, and many smaller, American cities, and membership numbered in the thousands. Theosophy was a household word, appearing in numerous discussions of religion and culture in the popular print media. It also was targeted by Christian clergy. Many who joined the Theosophical Society were spurned by their friends and families in much the same way that adherents of new religions in the 1960s and later were ostracized by loved ones.

When Blavatsky died in 1891, Judge became the head of the Esoteric School of Theosophy, an elite group composed of individuals thoroughly committed to Theosophical principles. Later he suggested that he and Annie Besant (1847–1933), head of the European Section after Blavatsky's death, share leadership of the Esoteric School. For the next few years controversy ensued, as Besant first sided with Judge, then opposed him. This series of events, often referred to in Theosophical history as the Judge case, remains a controversial chapter in the evolution and development of the movement. As a result of continued attacks on Judge, in 1895 the American Section, while recognizing Olcott as president-founder, declared its autonomy, electing Judge president-for-life of the Theosophical Society in America. Olcott withdrew the branch charters and revoked the membership of those in the United States, Europe, and elsewhere who followed Judge, thus splitting the worldwide Theosophical movement in two.

The next year Judge died and was succeeded by Katherine Tingley (1847–1929). This succession was marked by controversy. Some members of Judge's inner circle accused her of manipulating events and people to make it appear that Judge gave his blessing to her leadership, while other leaders supported her without reservation. She remained a controversial figure, among Theosophists and in the public eye, throughout her tenure. Her name frequently appeared in newspaper articles associated with various legal battles, the earliest major one involving a libel suit that she brought against the owner of the largest Los Angeles newspaper. Within the Society, she inspired members to focus on philanthropic and educational activities, expanding an agenda that emerged in nascent form during Judge's final years.

In 1898, Tingley was named leader and official head of the Theosophical Society, and the organization was renamed the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society (UB and TS). The UB and TS sponsored various reform efforts aimed at improving the Society and individuals through its affiliate, the International Brotherhood League (IBL). Women joined in significant numbers after Tingley became the leader, and much of the IBL's work dealt with issues traditionally associated with women, especially raising and educating children. Under Tingley, a home for orphans and unwed mothers opened in Buffalo, New York, medical assistance was provided for soldiers returning from Cuba following the Spanish-American War, and war relief was provided to the poor and homeless in the Cuban city of Santiago de Cuba.

In 1900 Tingley led an exodus of Theosophists to Point Loma, located on the peninsula west of San Diego, California. Three years earlier, in 1897, at the end of a worldwide tour, she laid the cornerstone of the School for the Revival of the Lost Mysteries of Antiquity there. At Point Loma, Theosophists constructed numerous dwellings and educated young children. They also operated three schools in Cuba patterned after the style of education, called Raja Yoga, which evolved at Point Loma. Educational efforts were the focus of community life at Point Loma, based on the Theosophical conviction that they lived in the dawning of a new era in cosmic history. They believed that reincarnated souls entering the world as newborns were exceptionally amenable to spiritual and moral training. Tingley also worked for the abolition of capital punishment, for prison reform, and for international peace. She emphasized music, the arts, and drama, building the first open-air Greek theater in the United States in 1901.

Theosophists believe that humanity reincarnated many times, according to grand cosmic cycles of ascent and decline that last for millions of years. The progress of waves of life-forms or souls is watched over and helped by the Masters, or advanced beings. Masters supposedly gave Blavatsky the teachings she passed along to other Theosophists, including those found in her magnum opus, The Secret Doctrine (1888), and numerous other publications. Point Loma Theosophists read and adhered to Blavatsky's teachings, often filtered through the published writings of Judge and Tingley. The published works of those latter two leaders did not depart substantially from Blavatsky, but recast her teachings in an idiom and vocabulary more accessible to American readers.

Point Loma Theosophists, however, departed from Theosophists elsewhere in their belief that the earthly succession of leaders following Blavatsky was through Judge rather than Besant. They linked the validity of Theosophical teachings to this succession, the Masters supposedly granting each earthly leader in this succession credibility and authority, and sometimes working in and through those leaders in a bicameral relationship in which the personality of the leader was melded with the esoteric power and wisdom of the Master. That was the case with Judge, and later with Tingley's successor, Gottfried de Purucker (1879–1942), a self-taught polymath who devoted many years of study to Theosophy, ancient languages, mythology, and comparative religion.

During his tenure as leader, Purucker lectured on numerous occasions, and his lectures were later transcribed and published. The result was “technical Theosophy,” a complex body of teachings based on those of Blavatsky, Judge, and Tingley, but using the teachings of Purucker's predecessors as points of departure for deep and creative reflection. He led the Point Loma Theosophists through the lean years of the Depression, returning their foci to those of Judge: printing and distributing Theosophical literature and encouraging growth among local lodges. He also initiated the Fraternization movement, encouraging contact with various Theosophical organizations and the renewal of brotherly feeling among Theosophists everywhere. Near the end of his administration, during World War II, Purucker moved their headquarters from Point Loma to Covina, California, near Los Angeles.

No clear successor could be agreed upon after Purucker's death, and a Cabinet governed for three years. In 1945, Colonel Arthur L. Conger (1872–1951), a retired officer in the U.S. Army, became the leader. Many lifelong Theosophists did not agree with Conger's selection and left the Society. Most networked informally, although one group found a semblance of an organizational center in Point Loma Publications, Inc., founded in 1971 by Iverson Harris, Jr. (d. 1979) and W. Emmett Small (1903–2001). Conger expanded the Theosophical Society's publishing program and emphasized local public work, particularly in postwar Europe. Shortly before his death he began moving the headquarters to Pasadena, California. He was succeeded as head of the Theosophical Society (Pasadena) by James Long (1898–1971) in 1951. Long oversaw moving the headquarters, library, and archives of the Theosophical Society to their present location in Altadena, California. Long emphasized living Theosophical teachings and expressing the Theosophical philosophy simply in each person's own words. He founded Sunrise magazine in 1951 as a bridge between Theosophy and the public.

Long was succeeded in 1971 by Grace F. Knoche (1909–2006), a Raja Yoga student from birth. The current leader is Randell C. Grubb. The Theosophical Society (Pasadena) includes sections in the United States, Australia, the Czech Republic, Finland, Germany, Austria, the Netherlands (the largest section outside the United States), Nigeria, and South Africa. At their headquarters facility in Altadena, staff members publish Theosophical classics through the Theosophical University Press and hold regular meetings for members as well as inquirers at their library. Such meetings, usually discussions of Theosophical writings by Blavatsky and others, constitute the rituals practiced by most Pasadena-affiliated Theosophists.

In this Theosophical tradition, Theosophy is a matter of inward transformation through mental and spiritual discipline. Meditative practices that alter mind and body, such as hatha yoga, are suspect. So Theosophists in the Pasadena tradition emphasize moral refinement and advance in daily living, coupled with deepening understanding of Theosophical principles through the diligent study of texts. In recent years the Pasadena Society participated in efforts to find common ground among all Theosophical movements, especially the United Lodge of Theosophists and the International Theosophical Society, headquartered in India. Annual conferences for Theosophists from all Theosophical organizations began in 1994 in Brookings, Oregon, and are held annually. At these conferences, speakers address current issues in science, culture, and society as these relate to Theosophy. Participants seek ways to find unity among various Theosophical traditions, perspectives, and groups. Finally, efforts have been made to heal the divisions within the Pasadena Theosophical tradition, although Point Loma Publications and others who left the Theosophical Society (Pasadena) in the 1940s are not likely to return.

Theosophical Society
PO Box C
Pasadena, CA 91109–7107
<http://www.theosociety.org/>

W. Michael Ashcraft and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Besant, Annie; Blavatsky, Helena P.; Theosophical Society (Adyar); United Lodge of Theosophists.

References

- Ashcraft, W. Michael. The Dawn of the New Cycle: Point Loma Theosophists and American Culture. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2002.
- Greenwalt, Emmett A. California Utopia: Point Loma: 1897–1942. Rev. ed. San Diego: Point Loma Publications, Inc., 1978.
- International Theosophy Conferences, Inc. <http://www.theosconf.org>.
- Judge, William Quan. The Ocean of Theosophy. Covina, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1948.
- Point Loma Publications. <http://www.wisdomtraditions.com>.
- Purucker, Gottfried de. Fountain-Source of Occultism. Pasadena, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1974.
- Ryan, Charles J. H. P. Blavatsky and the Theosophical Movement. 2nd and rev. ed. Pasadena, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1975.
- Tingley, Katherine. Theosophy: The Path of the Mystic. 3rd and rev. ed. Pasadena, CA: Theosophical University Press, 1977.

Theravada Buddhism

Theravada Buddhism is the designation for the various Buddhist traditions prevalent in South and Southeast Asia. Theravada, or Southern, Buddhism, with its local cultural variations and specific ordination lineages is the dominant religious tradition in Sri Lanka (69 percent of the population), Burma/Myanmar (85 percent), Thailand (94 percent), Cambodia (88 percent), and Laos (58 percent). With the global spread of Buddhism in the 20th century, substantial numbers of migrants from these countries have come to live in North America and Europe. Alongside, Western converts have taken up Theravada meditational practices and the study of canonical texts.

The Theravada tradition is the only surviving tradition of some 30 different schools of early Buddhism. Translatable as the “sayings or doctrine of the elders,” the school claims to be nearest to the original word and teaching of the historical Buddha (sixth–fifth century BCE). The precursor of the Theravada School had been the Sthaviravada (Sanskrit: doctrine of the elders), which split with the majority fraction of the Mahasanghikas in North India in the fourth century BCE. A century later, the Indian-Sanskrit Sthaviravada came to Ceylon and became the Theravada. Some five centuries after Buddha’s death, the teachings were written down in Pali on palm leaves. The numerous texts were collected in three baskets. From that stems the designation of Tipitaka (three baskets)—that is, the text collections of the Vinaya Pitaka (basket of monastic discipline), Sutta Pitaka (doctrinal teachings), and Abhidhamma Pitaka (philosophical investigations). These voluminous collections form the canon of the Theravada tradition. There also exist commentaries to the canon and ancillary literature, especially the Visuddhimagga (The Path to Purity), composed by the Ceylonese monk Buddhagosa in the early fifth century CE.

The focal point of Theravada tradition is constituted by the order of monks (bhikkhu sangha). Although originally there also existed an order of nuns (bhikkhuni sangha), that order dissolved later as the line of nuns’ ordination broke. The monk represents the Theravada ideal of a person’s nonattachment to worldly relations and affairs, concentrating on practicing the Buddhist path of renunciation in order to extinguish one’s delusion, hatred, and greed. The main task of a monk is to live up to that ideal, to hand on the Buddhist teachings and practices, and to instruct the lay Buddhist followers. The laity supports the sangha (monks’ order), donating food, shelter, and clothing. A clear hierarchy of religious virtuosi and lay followers is basic to the Theravada.

Although Theravada tradition can be considered outspokenly conservative regarding doctrinal interpretation and forms of life, it has unmistakably changed in the course of time. Following the period of early Buddhism, during the period of traditional Theravada (late third century BCE to the 18th century CE), the sangha established close relations with the ruling powers. Strongly supported by feudal kings, the monasteries became wealthy landlords. In religious terms, monks became preoccupied with conducting ceremonies of chanting pirit or paritta (texts designed to improve a layperson's material and physical state; however, also of importance to the sangha itself) and presiding at funerals. Considered as "fields to gain spiritual merit," monks functioned mainly as ceremonial priests. This role, its form and content, was strongly criticized, much as in the period of reformist or modern Theravada (19th and 20th centuries), when urban monks and educated middle-class lay Buddhists interpreted Buddhism as scientific, modern, and universal. Confronted by imperial power, Western concepts, and missionary Christianity, this English-educated elite stressed rationalist elements in the Buddhist teachings. They devalued the "cultic" and "ritualistic" practices and emphasized a scripturalist approach to achieving nibbana (extinction, liberation; Sanskrit: nirvana). Although this modern, or "Protestant," Theravada Buddhism has remained a minority—the vast majority of both monks and laypeople continuing to hold to traditional Theravada concepts—it is this modernized version of Theravada Buddhism that is considered representative of Theravada Buddhism as a whole. An important element of the reinterpretation of Theravada Buddhism is a revival of meditation practices. Practices such as vipassana (penetrative seeing) and sati-patthana meditation (application of mindfulness) have gained a growing interest in South Asia and in the West, in particular.

Martin Baumann

See also: Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Monasticism; Sacred Texts.

References

- Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus, Staat und Gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravada-Buddhismus. 3 vols. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Schriften des Instituts für Asienkunde and Wiesbaden, Harrassowitz, 1966–1973. Rpt.: Göttingen, Germany: Seminar für Indologie und Buddhistuskunde, vol. 1, 1988; vol. 2, 2000.
- Bond, George D. The Buddhist Revival in Sri Lanka: Religious Tradition, Reinterpretation and Response. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.
- The Books of the Pali Canon*. Oxford: Pali Text Society, 1881–.
- Cadge, Wendy. Heartwood: The First Generation of Theravada Buddhism in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.
- Gombrich, Richard. Theravada Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo. London: Routledge, 1988.
- Gombrich, Richard, and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Numrich, Paul David. Old Wisdom in the New World: Americanization in Two Immigrant Theravada Buddhist Temples. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1996.

Thomas Aquinas

ca. 1224–1274

Thomas Aquinas was a member of the Dominican Order who emerged in the 13th century as a prominent theologian best known for his use of Aristotelian philosophy as a framework for doing Christian theology and the thoroughness of his theological inquiry. He lived and taught at Paris, Naples, and Rome and wrote the Summa Theologiae, which has come to be seen as the foremost theological work of the Middle Ages. He would later be named a Doctor of the Church, a title bestowed on a very few theological writers who have been designated a saint and who in addition have written theological works from which the whole church has derived great advantage. Doctors of the Church are seen as people who have integrated outstanding intellectual accomplishments with noteworthy sanctity.

Thomas was born around 1224 as the youngest son of Landulfo d'Aquino, who sent Thomas to live among the monks at the prominent Benedictine abbey of Monte Casino with the expectation that he would rise to the position of abbot. He studied theology and philosophy at the University of Naples, recently established by his uncle Frederick II, the king of Sicily (r. 1296–1337). Thomas rejected his parents' plans and at the age of 19 he left the Benedictines for the recently founded Dominican Order. While taking the traditional monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the friars of the Dominican Order rejected the more internal focus of the Benedictines and offered a more outward focus on community service. It was organized as a preaching order and the friars were trained in vernacular languages (rather than exclusively emphasizing Latin). Rather than earning their living on the monastery's property, usually in agricultural pursuits, Dominican friars survived from the gifts of those who supported their work.

Thomas's family was horrified by his decision, and they kidnapped him and attempted to lure him back to his father's plan. He resisted the enticements and would later write against those who attempted to force young men to leave the new orders (that would also include the Franciscans and Augustinians). He ultimately escaped his kidnappers, and his superiors sent him to study theology at the Dominican priory in Paris. In 1248, he moved on to Cologne, where for a brief period he became the student of his fellow Dominican Albertus Magnus (1193–1280).

Thomas's education occurred just as the lost works of Aristotle were being introduced into the educational curriculum of Western institutions of higher learning following their rediscovery in the Middle East by the Crusaders. Prior to this time, almost all theology in the West was based on Platonic philosophy.

Upon his return to Paris, he completed his bachelor's degree in scripture and lectured on the Bible and the Sentences, written by Peter Lombard (ca.1105–ca.1164), the primary theological textbook of the era. He also began to pen commentaries on the major works of Aristotle, study tools on Aristotle being as yet nonexistent. He soon received his master's of theology degree and began work on his first major theological text, the Summa contra gentiles (Summa against the Gentiles), an apologetic treatise aimed at missionaries who were evangelizing non-Christians. Thomas was primarily concerned for his Christian brothers working among Spanish Muslims. Thomas used his knowledge of Aristotle and the several prominent Muslims whose works were circulating in the West (most notably Averroes and Avicenna) to attack the overreliance on reason they demonstrated. He observed that the truth that was, in fact, found in Islam was mixed with much falsehood. He also wrote in defense of the Dominicans and their lifestyle from those who attacked the Order.

In 1259 Thomas began a decade of teaching at various Dominican sites in Italy. During this time he wrote the liturgy for Corpus Christi, the Roman Catholic festival honoring the Eucharist, and compiled the Catena aurea (Golden Chain), a set of biblical commentaries by the early church fathers. He also began the work on his monumental magnum opus, the Summa Theologiae, which would consume most of his energy until 1273.

Upon his return to Paris in 1268, he continued his most active intellectual life. He argued with the more extreme Aristotelians; he wrote commentaries on the New Testament books of Matthew and John; he commented on Dionysius the Areopagite's Divine Names; he penned works on the Christian creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Hail Mary prayer; and he composed hymns and delivered sermons.

His life was radically altered on December 6, 1273. That day, while celebrating the Mass, he had an intense mystical vision. He would afterward observe, "Everything I have written seems like straw in comparison with what I have seen and what has been revealed to me." He stopped his writing, and essentially left the Summa Theologiae unfinished. He died four months later, on March 7, 1274, while journeying to the Church Council that was about to convene in Lyon. He was buried at the Dominican church in Toulouse, France.

Thomas's Thought Thomas's great work, the Summa Theologiae, is constructed around a series of topical theological questions, beginning with the status of theology as a science (in the Aristotelian sense of that word). Parts 1–3 discuss the existence and triune nature of God, creation, how all beings move toward God as an end, and the incarnation of Christ that provides the means by which creatures move toward God (Part 3). In Part 1.2, Thomas discussed the beatific vision of God in terms of human destiny (his own intellectual career culminating in such a vision). He covered the Christian life in Part 2.2, where he expounds upon the theological virtues (faith, hope, and charity), the cardinal virtues (prudence, justice, courage, and temperance), and the charisms or gifts of the Spirit. He also discusses the relative merits of the contemplative versus the active patterns for living one's life. In Part 3, Thomas covered Christology, the understanding of Jesus Christ and his salvific work and the sacramental life.

The Summa ended abruptly after Part 3. Following Thomas's death, his secretary Reginaldo de Piperno attempted to complete it by using material from Thomas's other writings, most notably his commentary of the Sentences of Peter Lombard, even though they had been written some 30 years previously. Most modern editions of the Summa omit the supplement.

Thomas in Context Though it would take some time to see it, Thomas essentially moved Christian theology away from its domination by Platonic (and neo-Platonic) philosophy. He did so by mastering the intellectual stream and gently moving it into the Aristotelian camp rather than attempting a harsh break with the past. He emphasized his alignment with all that had preceded him and moved forward into an emerging work that would value science, technology, and urban life.

At the same time, Thomas made a crucially important shift in Christian thinking. Plato had pointed beyond the ultimately unreal world of the manifest world observed by the senses to the superior reality of the realm of ideas. Christian Platonists tended to subordinate time, space, and the physical world to an eternal spiritual realm. Disciplines of study, which allow us to master the social and physical, are devalued relative to theology. Thomas's theology gave an enlarged place for the empirical arts and sciences (law, medicine, natural science, architecture, and engineering), and a new level of legitimacy. Following Aristotle's lead, Thomas provided a place for empirical observation as a proper, natural, and necessary human endeavor.

Thomas's theology also supplied the church with a new philosophical language. Since the end of the centuries of persecution and its quick emergence as the dominant religion of the Roman Empire in the fourth century, the Christian church's major thinkers had relied on Platonic thought forms. Plato had provided the background for the discussions at the Ecumenical councils at which the basic statements of Christian orthodoxy had been hammered out and from which the Nicene and Chalcedonian creeds promulgated. As Thomas turned to the subject of Christology, he aligned himself fully with the church councils and ancient creeds, while presenting a new emphasis on God's action. In Christ, God entered the world not only to save humanity from sin, but to lift it up to the divine. Also, in entering the world, God reasserts the primal creative pronouncement that the created world is good—further basis for the legitimacy of the human arts and sciences.

The last section of the Summa that Thomas completed dealt with the sacraments. Catholicism is a sacramental religion, and the sacraments are given for the redemption from sin, and also, as Thomas emphasizes, as tools to assist the individual believer on his or her pilgrimage toward sanctification (holiness). In the process of writing about the sacraments, Thomas would also offer an explanation of the essential action that took place in the Eucharist when the elements of bread and wine were transformed into the Body and Blood of Christ. Drawing on the philosophical distinction between an object's essence or substance and its particular attributes (appearance, texture, taste, color, smell) observed by the five senses, he suggested that in the Mass, the essence/substance of the bread and wine became the body and blood of Christ while the attributes remained unchanged. This change became known as transubstantiation.

Thomas Aquinas Today Thomas's views were not immediately accepted in his own day, though he found strong support. Just five years after Thomas's death, the general chapter of the Dominicans pronounced penalties against any of their number who would speak irreverently of Thomas or his writings, and subsequent chapter gatherings expressly required the brethren to follow his teachings. In the church's seminaries, the Summa gradually replaced Lombard's Sentences as the primary textbook for theology, especially after his canonization by Pope John XXII (r. 1316–1334) in 1323 ended any remaining open opposition.

Thomas's thought took an upward trajectory at the Council of Trent, called in large part to deal with the growth of Protestantism. The Council relied heavily on Thomas in its deliberation and the Catechism of the Council of Trent (1545–1563), prepared for the use of parish priests, can be seen as essentially a summary statement of his theology. In 1567, Pope Pius V named him a Doctor of the Church, after which the Summa Theologiae came to replace Lombard's Sentences as the chief text for teaching theology in Catholic seminaries.

By the 19th century, the use of Thomas's writings had declined, but a revival occurred during the pontificate of Pope Pius IX (r. 1846–1878), who presided over the First Vatican Council (1870–1871). Then in one of his first actions after becoming pope, his successor, Pope Leo XIII (r. 1878–1903), called for a continuance of the revived interest in his 1879 encyclical Aeterni Patris. He recommended the study of Thomas by all Catholic theological students throughout the world, though not to the exclusion of others. Leo also led in the formation of the Leonine Commission, which produced new critical editions of many of Thomas's works.

The centrality of Thomas's place in the theology of the Catholic Church was challenged by the Second Vatican Council and many believed his period of dominance had ended. He has, however, shown a significant resiliency and continues to remain a key force in Catholic theological discourse.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Augustinians; Benedictines; Dominicans; Franciscans; Roman Catholic Church; Theology.

References

The Summa Theologiae is available on the Internet at <http://www.newadvent.org/summa> and a printed version is the Blackfriar's edition (London, 1964–1981); the complete edition of Thomas's works is the Leonine edition (Rome, 1882–).

- Chenu, Marie-Dominique. Toward Understanding St. Thomas. Chicago: Regnery, 1964.
- Copleston, Frederick C. Aquinas. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1955.
- Gilson, Etienne. The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Pieper, Joseph. Guide to Thomas Aquinas. New York: Pantheon, 1962.
- Selman, Francis. Aquinas 101: A Basic Introduction to the Thought of Saint Thomas Aquinas. Orleans, MA: Christian Classics, 2007.
- Torrell, Jean-Pierre. Saint Thomas Aquinas: The Person and His Work. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2005.
- Weisheipl, James. Friar Thomas d'Aquino. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1983.

Three-Self Principles

The three-self principles, guidelines that became a goal of Christian missions across denominational lines in the late 19th century, suggested that missions should strive to become self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating. The goal of making mission fields in Africa and Asia especially free of support from Europe and North America and under the guidance and administration of local leaders was a major step in the transformation and indigenization of missions in the 20th century.

The three-self ideal was originally articulated by three prominent Protestant missionaries—Henry Venn (1796–1873), Rufus Anderson (1796–1880), and John L. Nevius (1829–1893). For more than 30 years, Venn served as the honorary secretary of the Church Missionary Society (1841–1872). He hammered out his views in the context of the mid-19th-century emergence of the High-Church wing of Anglicanism. He saw missionary activity as an extremely indigenous concern, the goal of which was the raising up of Native churches that would be “self-governing, self-supporting, and self-extending.” His ideas opposed the establishment of missionary dioceses, headed by a bishop, prior to the actual development of a local following. He argued that foreign missionaries should quickly turn over control of missions to local leadership.

Operating as an executive for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Boston, Rufus Anderson arrived at essentially the same ideas as Venn. Anderson argued for a focused and purposeful missionary program whose only goal was the creation of a scriptural, self-propagating Christianity. Missionaries were to seek the conversion of the lost, organize them into churches, train a competent local ministry, and lead the congregations to a stage where they become self-propagating. Any other purposes of missionary activity were superfluous and even distracting. By the end of the 1860s, he was clearly articulating the three-self principles.

John Nevius was a Presbyterian missionary who further developed the three-self idea while working in China and Korea. He believed the key to making the three-self principles work was teaching converts to become a witness for Christ among their neighbors and co-workers. The building of local leaders meant that churches were not dependent on foreign funds for their survival and growth.

Churches were often reluctant to give over control of their missions to local leaders—for a variety of reasons. However, the basic thrust of the three-self principles took on additional importance by the middle of the 20th century with the changes brought by World War II, the subsequent establishment of the United Nations, and the end of colonialism. During the war, churches were forced into self-sufficiency and most demonstrated their readiness for self-governance. After the war, the end to colonization was frequently accompanied with a transformation of missions into autonomous churches.

As a philosophy, the three-self principles survived most visibly in China. The post-revolutionary government expelled all of the foreign missionaries in 1950 and forced the Protestant churches to merge into a single body. At the first National Christian Conference, held in 1954, the government forced the organization of the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic movement in China. Ostensibly formed to break the Chinese churches' reliance on foreign money, influence, and leadership, the movement became the instrument for training leaders in patriotism (support of the Chinese government) and to facilitate communication between the government and the Christian community. In 1966, as the Cultural Revolution began, and the government attempted to destroy the church, the Three-Self movement was disbanded. It was reorganized in 1980 and has since become an organization to articulate new government policies regarding religion. On a more positive note, it has been an effective organization in creating an image that the contemporary Chinese Protestant church is an indigenous body and no longer a branch of a foreign institution.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council; Church Missionary Society.

References

- Anderson, Gerald H, ed. Mission Legacies: Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1998.
- Anderson, Rufus. Foreign Missions: Their Relations and Claims. New York: Charles Scribner and Co., 1869.
- Nevius, John L. "Historical Review of Missionary Methods—Past and Present—in China, and How Far Satisfactory." In Records of the General Conference of the Protestant Missionaries of China. Held at Shanghai, May 7–20, 1890, 171–176. Shanghai: American Presbyterian Mission Press, 1890.
- Nevius, John L. The Planting and Development of Missionary Churches. New York: Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, 1899.
- Sunquist, Scott W., ed. A Dictionary of Asian Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2001.
- Wickeri, Philip L. Seeking Common Ground: Protestant Christianity, the Three-Self Movement and China's United Front. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1988.

Tian Dao

Tian Dao (Yiguandao) is arguably the most significant Chinese religious response to modernity to result from that period of extended turmoil, the 20th century. Tian Dao temples and congregations spread rapidly throughout urban China in the 1930s and 1940s, only to be effectively eliminated after the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949. Some leaders managed to leave China, however, and new networks took root in Taiwan, Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, and other areas of Chinese migration.

Tian Dao owes its initial success to Zhang Tianran (1889–1947), from Jining, Shandong Province, in eastern China, and a senior leader in what was then a minor Daoist group known since the late 1800s as Yiguandao, the Way of Pervading Unity. (Members abandoned the term Yiguandao in the late 1940s and now universally refer to themselves as Tian Dao, the Way of Heaven, or Zhenli Tiandao, the Heavenly Way of True Principle.) After assuming leadership in 1930, Zhang initiated reforms that made Yiguandao more attractive to prospective new members. For example, he allowed meat eating, although vegetarianism remained the preferred goal. Members were no longer required to maintain celibacy. Lengthy rituals were simplified. Most important, new emphasis was given to proselytization.

Yiguandao emerged as a way for common people to fulfill both obligations to family and the traditional realm of deities, and also maintain a strong sense of community in uncertain times. Temple networks spread throughout urban China, but particularly in such rapidly industrializing cities as Tianjin and Shanghai. Missionaries established new temples and moved to incorporate existing temple networks and other associations under Zhang's leadership.

Tian Dao experienced a growth phase during World War II. During the Japanese occupation (1937–1945), a puppet Chinese government was set up under Wang Jingwei in Nanjing. Zhang and many of his lieutenants enjoyed free passage throughout much of the occupied areas and had close ties with leaders in the Wang Jingwei government. With the end of the war those ties became a liability, and Tian Dao leaders quickly cultivated new connections with the Nationalist government that briefly reoccupied the cities before the Nationalists' final defeat in 1949. Zhang died in 1947. By cooperating with the regimes in control of urban China, Tian Dao had bet on two losing sides in succession. Unsurprisingly, the incoming Communist regime lost no time in suppressing Tian Dao along with similar groups in the anti-superstition campaigns of the 1950s. Although Zhang's third wife, Sun Yuehui, managed to leave China and settle in Taiwan, the group was essentially leaderless; it could have disintegrated as quickly as it had grown.

In exile, Tian Dao reinvented itself and spread the hard way: from the ground up. Those leaders who had managed to leave mainland China in 1949 settled in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and, in a few cases, in Southeast Asia. Pioneers in Taiwan began to recruit new members and establish home temples despite having few sources of outside funding. Some leaders combined business with their religious efforts.

Recalling Tian Dao's support of the Wang Jingwei regime during the war, the Taiwan government now also suspected Tian Dao of harboring Communist spies, and saw its beliefs as a rival ideology. Tian Dao was actively suppressed by the police in several campaigns between 1963, when it was outlawed, and 1987, when it was finally legalized. Spies infiltrated meetings, and several leaders were arrested and sent to prison. Despite the harassment, Tian Dao flourished in Taiwan and grew to become the largest organized religious group there. It allied itself with local entrepreneurship, and as Taiwan underwent an economic boom between the 1960s and the 1980s, Tian Dao leaders recruited factory owners and workers alike. It provided a sense of community for displaced workers moving into industrial zones, and it actively promoted adult education in the Chinese classics and Buddhist sutras.

By the 1980s most of the Tian Dao temples were generally grouped into eight major sublineages, the largest being the Wen Hua, Bao Guang, Ji Chu, and Xing Yi. The first three of these traced their establishment to pre-1949 mother temples in Shanghai, the fourth to a temple lineage in northeast China. According to a 1981 survey, each of these sublineages had hundreds of subsidiary temples; the total temple count went from approximately 600 in 1981 to 1,200 in 1991. Since the 1980s, Tian Dao groups have spread around Southeast Asia, China, Europe, and America. A reasonable estimate of worldwide membership today is between 5 and 10 million. That number is impossible to confirm, however, since sublineages do not always cooperate, and many temples make no distinction between people initiated yet inactive and those who, once initiated, continue as active members.

Within Tian Dao, proselytization is a means by which members may gain merit that can then be transferred to family members. A member who recruits 100 initiates can request a rite whereby the soul of a deceased relative, such as a parent, can be promoted, or pulled up (chaoba), into heaven. The opportunity to make amends for past non-filial acts, and save one's parents, exerts a strong pull on Tian Dao members. Initiation in Tian Dao ensures an individual's own entry into heaven and release from the endless cycle of rebirth in which all humans are trapped. To reflect this significance, each new initiate is given a small passport recording date and temple name; entry to heaven is barred without this passport. Misspelled names or dates on the passport will, it is believed, similarly block one's entry.

Tian Dao ritual performances involve the assembly gathering before the altar and following two ritual assistants and a presider; all three are usually dressed in formal ritual robes (liyi). Core rituals in Tian Dao practice include the lighting of the incense, the presentation of offerings, and the invitation of deities to the altar. Rituals include the performing of repetitive koushou, bows and salutes, to each of the various deities in the pantheon; Tian Dao is most familiar among people in Taiwan as a bowing religion. Tian Dao congregations also regularly attend communal meals—invariably vegetarian—and lectures. The lectures are the prime means of transferring Tian Dao doctrine.

Tian Dao's extensive pantheon of deities is centered on Ancient Mother veneration. Worship of the Ancient Mother (Lao Mu, also called Wusheng Laomu, the Unborn Ancient Mother) formed in the mid-Ming dynasty (1368–1644) and spread especially throughout the region south of the Yangtze River area. Lao Mu is believed to have created her human children, only to have them lose their way because of the enticements of materiality. In a grand gesture of compassion, she orders Maitreya to return to Earth to save these lost souls and allow them to enter heaven and sit at her side.

The Ancient Mother is said to be present in the flame generated by an oil lamp placed in the center of the altar. Effigies of additional major deities are arrayed behind this light, usually including a smiling, seated Maitreya Buddha in the center; a Guan Yin bodhisattva, the popular deity of compassion and childbirth, to Maitreya's left; Ji Gong Huofo (living Buddha), a popular deity based on a monk from the Song dynasty (960–1279), on Maitreya's left; and, on either ends of the altar, images of Lyu Chunyang and Guang Gong, two popular Chinese deities based on legendary figures. In addition, ceramic figurines or black-and-white photographs of the founder, Zhang Tianran, and, in many temples, his third wife, Sun Yuehui, are sometimes placed at the far ends of these main altars.

Tian Dao groups put little relative emphasis on textual sources. Tian Dao teachings borrow a limited palette of ideas and terms from such Buddhist, Daoist, and Confucian sources as the Maitreya Sutra, the Heart Sutra, the Dao De Jing, and the Analects. Also, spirit writing remains common in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Southeast Asian Chinese communities. Tian Dao practice involves writing on a sand-filled tray by a team of three selected members, often teenage girls. One of the team, said to be under the direct influence of a deity, writes Chinese glyphs in the sand with a stylus as the second member smoothes the sand with a squeegee and recites what is written. The third team member then records this with pen and paper.

Tian Dao today exists as one of many well-organized international religious groups active in Chinese culture. An umbrella organization, the Tian Dao General Assembly, was established in Taiwan in 1987, but only some 70 percent of Taiwan-based groups belong. Tian Dao groups tend to view other subjects with suspicion.

Today Tian Dao faces two paths into the future. It can redefine and reorient itself as an international movement relevant to people of all backgrounds, or it can focus instead on regaining its previous prominence as a significant movement in China. Either way, Tian Dao is likely to continue as a force among world religions. There are numerous Tian Dao sites in Chinese on the Internet. An English-language periodical, Golden Voice of Maitreya, is available.

Tian Dao
12th Fl.
No. 31, Ming-Sheng E. Rd.
Sec. 3, Taipei
Taiwan

Edward A. Irons

See also: Ancestors; Vegetarianism.

References

- Introduction to Dao*. Taipei: Tsu Kwang, n.d.
- Jordan, David D., and Daniel L. Overmyer. The Flying Phoenix: Aspects of Chinese Sectarianism in Taiwan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Song Guanyu. Tiandao Chuan Deng—Yiguan yu Xiandai Shehui. Taipei: San Yang, 1996.
- Song Guanyu. Tiandao Gouchen: Yiguandao Diaocha Baogao. Taipei: privately printed, 1983.

Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism

Tian Tai (T'ien-t'ai), one of the more important schools of Chinese Buddhism, developed as a recognizable way of doing Buddhism within the larger Chinese Buddhist community in the early Tang dynasty (618–907). As it emerged into a distinctive school of Buddhism, it became known for its ability to synthesize variant strands of thought into an overarching system or philosophy of phenomena. Tian Tai was thus an early Chinese reaction to the many varieties of Buddhist doctrine that had been transmitted to China from India by that time.

Tian Tai Buddhism received its name from the Tian Tai Mountains in eastern Zhejiang, China, a place of rolling if not dramatic mountain ranges and many rivers. The area is filled with spiritual significance. One mountain is the site of one of the 10 Daoist caves, and reputedly the area is the location where the popular Chinese deity figure Ji Gong (or Duke Ji) was born. And here, the founder of Tian Tai, Zhi Yi (538–597), built the Baoguo Si (Temple of Protecting the Nation), an idea that came to him in a dream. He was later able to receive support for his project from the Sui emperor, his main sponsor. This temple continues to function to this day.

Zhi Yi moved to Tian Tai for the last years of his life, where he concentrated on writing and teaching. All of his thoughts were recorded by his disciple Guan Ding.

Tian Tai was just coming into its own when a Japanese priest, Saicho, sent to study in China by his emperor, arrived. He studied for a year at Mount Tian T'ai and returned with a number of Tian Tai texts. The founding of the Tendai (as Tian Tai was known in Japan) School he established at Mount Hiei not far from Kyoto is marked by the emperor's agreeing to allow two priests trained by Saicho to be formally ordained each year. At this time, the emperor had control of all of Japanese Buddhism, and keeping ordination in the former imperial city of Nara and limiting the number of newly ordained priests was one means of exercising that control.

Saicho, later known by the honorific title Dengyo Daishi, continued the Tian Tai perspective that classified the spectrum of Buddhist sutras and approaches to Buddhism on a four-fold scale: the Hinayana teachings; the teachings common to all Mahayana Buddhism; the teachings unique to Mahayana as opposed to Hinayana; and the perfect teachings, as contained in the Lotus Sutra. He antagonized the Buddhist leadership at Nara by suggesting that they basically taught Hinayana Buddhism.

Saicho saw the Lotus Sutra as above all other Buddhist sutras and texts. Based on his appropriation of the sutra, Saicho began to advocate the idea that all beings had the potential for full Buddhahood. This idea contrasted starkly with the view of the Buddhist leadership at Nara, who generally believed that only some people were able to arrive at enlightenment while only a few could reach complete Buddhahood. This basic disagreement served as the foundation for Saicho's several petitions to the emperor that step by step established the independence of the Tendai community from the Nara officials.

Saicho's belief that all partook of Buddha nature also led the Tendai to show great respect toward the spectrum of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the larger world of Mahayana Buddhism. Tendai temples came to be distinctive by their tendency to include a large number of bodhisattva images. It also led to an essential teaching that all believers should seek self-perfection and act for the benefit of others (that is, manifest the bodhisattva ideal) in their outward life.

Enryaku-ji Temple of Mount Hiei, Kyoto, Japan. (Paskee/Dreamstime.com)

In China, Saicho had studied esoteric Buddhism, though he focused on the Lotus Sutra upon his return to Japan. Tendai was open to esotericism and that aspect of its thought and practice would be developed by two of Saicho's disciples, Ennin (794–864) and Annen (ca. 841–ca. 901). Ennin went to China in 838 and began nine years of studying esoteric practices. Along the way, he encountered meditation upon and invocation of the bodhisattva Amitabha (known as Amida in Japan). The addition of the veneration of Amida Buddha at Mount Hiei would later become a major source of Pure Land Buddhism, which turned the veneration of Amida into its focal activity.

Ennin also studied the secret meditations and rituals relative to the Vairocana Buddha as represented in two mandalas, the Diamond Realm mandala and the Womb Realm mandala. In the end, Ennin tended to favor the esoteric teachings above those related to the Lotus Sutra, though it was left to Annen to clearly state the revised perspective. He would come to see mandalas pictorially: presenting the spiritual world coupled with proper actions relative to them invited the believer to partake of the spiritual realm.

With the rise of Amida veneration and esotericism within Tendai, several sub-groupings emerged throughout the Tendai leadership, each following a variant lineage of practice. In later centuries, these lineages led to the formation of the separate Tendai sects of which there are more than 20 in contemporary Japan.

The year 966 was a landmark for the Tendai community. A fire destroyed Enryaku-ji, the Tendai headquarters temple complex on Mount Hiei. The abbot Ryogen (912–985) had to step forward to raise the funds for the reconstruction. As the funds were collected, he also used the opportunity of a new beginning to place a renewed emphasis on education. Ryogen is remembered most for initiating an era of Tendai learning and expansion.

Of the 20 divisions of the Tendai community, the largest is the one that still controls the headquarters at Mount Hiei. Its many associated temples across Japan are divided into 25 districts. It co-sponsors Taisho University (in cooperation with the Jodo-Shu and Shingon Buddhism). It has some 600,000 adherents in Japan, and a small but growing number of centers outside of the country.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Jodo-shu; Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Nara; Pure Land Buddhism; Shingon Buddhism; Zhi Yi.

References

- Buddhist Denominations and Schools in Japan.* Tokyo: Bukkto Dendo Kyokai, 1984.
- Groner, Paul. Ryogen and Mount Hiei: Japanese Tendai in the Tenth Century. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2002.
- Groner, Paul. Saicho: The Establishment of the Japanese Tendai School. Berkeley, CA: Berkeley Buddhist Studies Series, 1984.
- Kasahara, Kazuo. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Company, 2001.
- Kashiwahara, Yūsen, and Kōyū Sonoda. Shapers of Japanese Buddhism. Trans. by Gaynor Sekimori. Tokyo: Kōsei Pub. Co., 1994.
- Pruden, Leo M., and Paul L. Swanson, trans. The Essentials of the Vinaya Tradition: The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School. Berkeley, CA: Numata Center for Buddhist Translation & Research, 1996.
- Saso, Michael R. Tantric Art and Meditation: The Tendai Tradition. Honolulu: Tendai Educational Foundation, 1990.
- Swanson, Paul L. Foundations of T'ien-T'ai Philosophy: The Flowering of the Two Truths Theory in Chinese Buddhism. Fremont, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 1995.
- Takeshi, Umehara. "Saicho." In Buddhist Spirituality: Later China, Korea, Japan, and the Modern World, edited by Takeuchi Yoshinori, James W. Heisig, Paul L. Swanson, and Joseph S.

O'Leary, 164–173. New York: Crossroad Publishing, 1999.

Tiantan

Tiantan, the Temple of Heaven, is the largest temple complex in China. Though today it is no longer used as a worship center, it stands as a major reminder of the traditional Chinese (pre-Buddhist) religion that was a force in the land into the early 20th century. Tiantan was the primary site at which the emperor made the annual thanksgiving for past prosperity and pleaded for an abundant harvest for the next year, a process that climaxed in December at the Winter Solstice.

The first major part of the complex was erected to the southeast of central Beijing. It was begun in 1410 by Emperor Yongle (r. 1403–1424), who had also constructed the Forbidden City. Yongle's finished work was known for the next century as the Temple of Heaven and Earth. Then, in 1530, the Emperor Jiajing (r. 1522–1567) built a separate Temple of Earth on the northern edge of the city, as part of a major building program in Beijing. His work also included greatly expanding the facilities at Tiantan. When completed, the entire complex covered 675 acres. Integrated into the overall structure were numerous squares, representing Earth, which were always located at a lower level than the round structures symbolic of heaven.

Tiantan consisted of three main parts laid out along a north-south axis. The entrance was at the Western Gate, and on ceremonial occasions the emperor would make his first stop near there at the Zhaigong, the Fasting Palace. The emperor initiated the annual winter ceremony with three days of fasting during which time he partook of no meat or wine, refrained from sexual activity, and handled no official matters that had to do with criminal cases. He also took periodic ritual baths.

Fasting and purification completed, the emperor would next move to the far north of the complex. This area was originally dominated by the Dasidian or Big Worship Hall. This building was later (1538) replaced with the Qiniandian or Big Enjoyment Hall. Today this part of the complex also includes the Huangqian-dian or Heavenly Emperor Hall and the large circular

Temple of Heaven, Beijing, China. (J. Gordon Melton)

Qigutan or Altar of Prayer for a Rich Crop. Inside the Huangqiandian, at an altar table, the emperor stopped to burn incense.

A thoroughfare called the Danbi Bridge connects the Qiniandian in the north to the rest of the Tiantan complex in the south. Separate pathways along the thoroughfare were laid out for the Heavenly Emperor, the emperor, and the courtiers who attended the annual ceremonies. Immediately across the bridge stands the Imperial Vault of Heaven, and inside this circular building the emperor could find the memorial tablets for the Heavenly Emperor and his own ancestors. On the Winter Solstice, the emperor started the day in this hall, during which time he read prayers and invited those memorialized to participate in the upcoming ceremonies.

The Heaven-Worshipping Altar, a large circular structure at the southern end of the complex, was completed in 1530. From that time forward, the main event of the ritual year would occur within it. A large outdoor structure, it was precisely constructed utilizing multiples of nine in its measurements and decorations. Its structure proclaimed the belief that the Heavenly Emperor resided in the ninth tier of heaven. The human emperor, who represented the Heavenly Emperor to the people, came here on the Winter Solstice, and the main ceremonies occurred in and around this altar. The ceremonies were focused on the emperor's report to the Heavenly Emperor on the past year's abundance and his intercession for the country as a whole with prayers for a new year of prosperity and peace.

Accompanying the several main buildings are a number of lesser structures, including side halls at the Qiniandian where the Sun, Moon, stars, wind, clouds, thunder, and rain were worshipped, and the Butcher Pavilion where the sacrificial animals killed during the ceremonies were actually killed. On the edge of the Danbi Bridge there is a platform where the emperor changed into clothes especially provided for his participation in the sacrifice of the animals.

The worship of Tian (heaven) did not, of course, begin with the construction of Tiantan in the 15th century. It had been carried out for many centuries with growing elaborateness. And the Winter Solstice was but one of many ceremonies acknowledging heaven on behalf of the nation. The emperor would, for example, come to the Heaven-Worshipping Altar to pray for rain each year at the Summer Solstice.

Today, the very secularized government of the People's Republic of China recognizes the historical importance of the ceremonies that took place at Tiantan and considers the key buildings to be among the most important architectural treasures of the country. They are prized, among other reasons, for both their beauty and architectural innovation.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Chinese Religions.

References

- Naquin, Susan. Peking: Temples and City Life, 1400–1900. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
- Tiantan—Temple of Heaven*. Beijing: China Esperanto Press, 1998.

Tibet in Western Religious Imagination

The image of Tibet and of Tibetan Buddhism in Western literature has over time undergone profound transformations. Not infrequently, 19th- and early 20th-century writing saw Tibet as a thoroughly backward country, whose superstitious population was dominated by ignorant priests and monks. This was the opinion voiced by Francis Younghusband (1863–1942), who conquered Lhasa in 1903–1904, and by Sven Hedin (1865–1952), who traveled through the closed land around the turn of the 20th century. Scholarly ideals prevalent at that time saw Buddhism as a religion that had once existed in a pure form, but had become increasingly corrupt. “Lamaism” was often singled out as a particularly degenerate form of the Buddhist tradition. The then influential work of British explorer L. Austine Wadell (1854–1938) thus presented the religion of Tibet in terms of the “strange cults and creeds” that had infiltrated original Buddhism.

Most Western present-day conceptions of Tibet are, of course, the very opposite. A number of writers from the late 19th century up to our own time have contributed to presenting Tibet in a sympathetic light, as a land of mystery, and as a source of a profound spirituality that Westerners can tap into. Rudyard Kipling, for instance, crafted a thoroughly positive portrait of a Tibetan lama in his widely read novel Kim, published in 1899–1900. Tibet was presented as a land of mystery in a variety of literary genres, including travelogues (Alexandra David-Néel's Voyage d'une parisienne à Lhasa, published in 1927; Lama Anagarika Govinda's The Way of the White Clouds, 1956), utopian novels (James Hilton's 1933 novel Lost Horizon with its description of the utopian valley of Shangri-La), and fictional autobiographies with occult themes (Cyril Henry Hoskin's 1956 best-seller The Third Eye, written under his assumed Tibetan name Lobsang Rampa).

If the above genres present Tibet as a land to be read about, other authors, typically representing various currents of Western Esotericism, explored a partly imaginary Tibet for the wisdom that its most enlightened inhabitants might impart to an audience of spiritual seekers. The founding figure of the Theosophical Society, Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), played a significant role by suggesting that the superior spiritual insights that she was able to relay originally came from the trans-Himalayan realm and from her journeys there. Although Blavatsky's writings drew on many other sources of inspiration than Tibet, later authors in the Theosophical tradition gave Tibet a more central role. Walter Evans-Wentz (1878–1965) produced a Theosophically inspired commentary on a translation of the Tibetan Book of the Dead, a work that has continued to be in print up to the present day. Alice Bailey (1880–1949) wrote a large corpus of Theosophical works that she suggested had been telepathically received from a Tibetan spiritual master by the name of Djwal Khul.

Carl Gustav Jung (1875–1961) represents a different stream of Western Esoteric approaches to Tibetan religion. He wrote, inter alia, a psychological interpretation of the Tibetan Book of the Dead and commentaries on Tibetan religious art. Some followers of Jung, such as Radmila Moacanin (Jung's Psychology and Tibetan Buddhism, 1983), have expanded significantly on the themes mentioned by Jung, and on the similarities that they perceive between Tibetan Buddhism and Jungian psychology.

Among the many other (and often quite radical) reinterpretations of Tibetan religion, mention can be made of UFO contactee George Adamski's occultist movement Royal Order of Tibet; Timothy Leary's psychedelic retelling of the Tibetan Book of the Dead, published in 1964; Chris Kilham's book The Five Tibetans (1994), which introduced a set of five yoga exercises of purported Tibetan origin into the New Age milieu; and James Redfield's New Age novel The Secret of Shambhala (1999).

Such literary depictions and Esoteric appropriations certainly continue to flourish also in the present day, but have in recent decades, especially due to the Chinese takeover and the ensuing diaspora situation, been complemented by other types of publications and other channels of information. The scholarly output on Tibetan Buddhism, once a mere trickle, has grown to massive proportions. Tibetan teachers have since around 1970 established schools in Western countries, attracting converts. Some, such as Chogyam Trungpa (1939–1987), became internationally famous—and controversial—representatives of Tibetan Buddhism in the West. A few North American and European converts into these traditions, such as the Dane Ole Nydahl (b. 1941), have in turn begun to establish themselves as Western lamas.

Whereas formally converting to Buddhism is a step taken by few, large audiences in the West have a less committed but thoroughly sympathetic view of Tibet and its religious heritage. This positive interest has in particular focused on the charismatic figure of the 14th Dalai Lama. A person who embodies many distinct roles, he is prized for his global, ecumenical outlook; for his interest in finding a common interface between Buddhism and modern science; for his function in the ongoing conflicts with China; and for his image as a trans-confessional spiritual leader. He is the author of numerous books, some of which have achieved best-seller status. The fact that the Dalai Lama has become an icon of popular culture can also be gauged by the fact that Martin Scorcese's 1997 film portraying his life, Kundün, was distributed by Walt Disney Productions.

At present, Westerners interested in Tibet thus have options as diverse as perusing scholarly or more popular literature on the topic, joining a Tibetan Buddhist group, reading Jungian or Theosophical interpretations of Tibetan religion, or—in characteristic New Age fashion—creating their own individual amalgam of these and other sources.

Olav Hammer

See also: Bailey, Alice Ann; Blavatsky, Helena P.; China: Tibet; Tibetan Buddhism; UFO Religions.

References

- Bishop, Peter. Dreams of Power: Tibetan Buddhism and the Western Imagination. London: Athlone, 1993.
- Bishop, Peter. The Myth of Shangri-La: Tibet, Travel Writing and the Western Creation of Sacred Landscape. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Dodin, Thierry, and Heinz Räther. Imagining Tibet: Perceptions, Projections and Fantasies. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2001.
- Lopez, Donald S. Prisoners of Shangri-La: Tibetan Buddhism and the West. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Tibetan Buddhism

Following its initial introduction in the seventh century CE, Buddhism became the dominant religion in the Tibetan cultural area—which includes the central provinces of Ü and Tsang (now composing the “Tibet Autonomous Region” of the People's Republic of China), the eastern provinces of Kham and Amdo, Mongolia, Bhutan, parts of Russia, and several republics of the former Soviet Union, as well as large areas of northern India and Nepal. Traditional histories trace the beginning of the “first dissemination” (chidar) of Buddhism to the reign of King Songtsen Gampo (ca. 618–650).

Three prayer wheels and Buddhist pilgrims, Sakya Monastery, Tibet. (Corel)

Royal patronage continued during the reign of King Trisong Detsen (ca. 740–798), who together with the Indian scholar-monk Santaraksita and the Tantric master Padmasambhava founded the first Buddhist monastery at Samye in 775. The two Indian masters represent competing paradigms of Buddhism, both of which became influential in Tibet: a monastic and clerical stream that emphasized cenobitic monasticism; and lineages often centered on charismatic lay Tantrics. The former was transmitted mainly from north Indian monastic universities such as Nalanda, while the latter was centered in Bihar and Bengal and generally existed well apart from the monastic establishments.

The early Tibetan dynasty came to an end with the assassination of King Relbachen (r. 815–836), whose death was followed by a brief persecution of Buddism. This marked the end of the “first dissemination.” The “second dissemination” (ngadar) began with the arrival in Tibet of AtiŶa in 1042.

Following the ascension of the fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), to power in the 17th century with the backing of Mongol troops, Tibet was ruled by successive Dalai Lamas (who are believed by Tibetan Buddhists to be physical manifestations of the Buddha Avalokiteshvara). This ended with the Chinese invasion and annexation of Tibet in the 1950s, which began a period of widespread persecution of Buddhism and resulted in the destruction of thousands of monasteries. In 1959 the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (b. 1935), fled to India, where he subsequently formed a government-in-exile in Dharamsala. Hundreds of thousands of Tibetans have since followed him into exile.

Many of the monasteries that were destroyed by the Chinese in Tibet have been rebuilt in exile, and today tens of thousands of monks and nuns continue to study the traditional monastic curricula. In Tibet, however, the Chinese government is deeply suspicious of monastics because many have been at the forefront of anti-Chinese agitations. As a result, the number of monks and nuns is severely restricted, and many are forced to spend several hours each day in “patriotic re-education classes,” in which they are taught Marxist dogma. Many monasteries have Chinese secret police in residence, and little time is allowed for study of traditional Buddhist curricula.

Main temple at Yong-He-Gong Lamasary in Beijing, China. (J. Gordon Melton)

There are four main orders in Tibetan Buddhism: Nyingmapa, Sakyapa, Kagyupa, and Gelukpa. Nyingmapa means Old Order; it is so named because it relies on older translations of Buddhist texts, and it traces itself back to Padmasambhava. The latter three are collectively called New Orders (Sarma) because they rely on translations prepared during the second dissemination. All four orders have both scholastic and Tantric traditions, but they differ in the relative emphasis they place on study or meditative practice. In addition, each bases itself on particular Tantric texts and traces itself to particular lineages.

John Powers

See also: Gelugpa; Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan, Buddhism; Meditation; Monasticism; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Padmasambhava; Sakyapa; Tantrism.

References

- Coleman, Graham, comp. and ed. A Handbook of Tibetan Culture. Boston: Shambhala, 1994.
- Gyatso, Tenzin (Dalai Lama XIV). The World of Tibetan Buddhism. London: Wisdom, 1995.

- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1995.
- Samuel, Geoffrey. Civilized Shamans: Buddhism in Tibetan Societies. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1993.
- Shakya, Tsering. The Dragon in the Land of Snows: A History of Modern Tibet since 1947. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Tibetan Nyingma Institute

The Tibetan Nyingma Institute was founded in Berkeley, California, in the early 1970s by Tarthang Tulku Rinpoche (b. 1935). Tarthang Tulku was one of the first Tibetans to teach in the United States and arrived in 1969 from India with his French Egyptian wife, Nazli. The following year he founded Dharma Publishing, which is perhaps the first dedicated Tibetan Buddhist publishing house in the West. Over the past 40 years it has launched many books on Tibetan art, teaching, and practice.

Shortly after his arrival Tarthang Tulku and his students purchased a large fraternity house near the University of California in Berkeley and converted it into a major place of teaching and practice, thus laying the foundation for the Tibetan Nyingma Institute. In 1975 the organization broke ground for their rural retreat center, Odiyan. Tarthang Tulku's success in establishing a solid institutional base was remarkable. While Buddhism was not unknown in the West, even in the 1960s and 1970s, it lacked dedicated communities and teaching facilities (other than some serving the Japanese American community). For a Tibetan refugee who was only a decade out of Tibet, the establishment of a significant and enduring Dharma center was an important accomplishment.

Tarthang Tulku was raised in eastern Tibet (Kham) and moved to India in 1959 following the Chinese takeover. His father was a Nyingmapa lama and astrologer, and he had received teachings in all four principal Tibetan Buddhist schools while in Tibet. As a young man in Tibet, Tarthang Tulku's principal teacher was Dzongsar Khyentse, Chokyi Lodro (1893–1959). After arriving in India, he taught at the Sanskrit University in Varanasi (Benares) and reprinted Tibetan texts. In Berkeley Tarthang Tulku emphasized meditation practice, the recitation of the mantra of Padmasambhava, Om Ah Hum Benza Guru Pema Siddhi Hum, and lived the life of a ngags-pa (householder-yogi or lama—a dedicated religious practitioner who resides not in a monastery but in a family situation). He took on the pioneering work of articulating the sophisticated insights of the Tibetan path into modern language and modern life. His writing is characterized by an applied approach to Buddhist spirituality. Books such as Gesture of Balance, Skillful Means, and Time, Space and Knowledge introduced a meditation format that engages with the ordinary world. His work Kum-Nye Relaxation was a fresh approach to Tibetan yoga. Dharma Publishing continues to produce translations of Tibetan classics and has reprinted the entire Tibetan Buddhist canon, the bKa'-gyur (the spoken word of the Buddha) and bsTan'-gyur (the authoritative commentaries [Kanjur and Tanjur]), as well as thousands of other texts.

Through the late 20th century, Tarthang Tulku's work led to the founding of centers around the world, the principal ones being in California, the Netherlands, Germany, and Brazil, though there are numerous smaller centers throughout the world. He also established the Tibetan Aid Project (TAP), which supports traditional monastic life in India, Nepal, and Bhutan and the rebuilding of monasteries in Tibet. TAP also funds the free distribution of Buddhist texts and important ceremonies conducted by all four principal traditions of Tibetan Buddhism.

Tibetan Nyingma Institute
1815 Highland Place
Berkeley CA 94709
<http://www.nyingmainstitute.com/index.htm>

Dharma Publishing
35788 Hauser Bridge Rd.
Cazadero, CA 95421
<http://www.dharmapublishing.com/p-25-Home.aspx>

Tibetan Aid Project
2425 Hillside Ave.
Berkeley, CA 94704
<http://www.tibetanaidproject.org/>

Diana Cousens

See also: Meditation; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Padmasambhava; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Crystal Mirror*. Vols. 1–4. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1971–1977.
- Fields, Rick. How the Swans Came to the Lake. 3rd ed. Boston: Shambhala, 1992.
- Nyingma Edition of the Tibetan Buddhist Canon, Kanjur and Tanjur*. 128 vols. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1981.
- Tarhang Tulku. Kum-Nye Relaxation. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1978.
- Tarhang Tulku. Skillful Means. Emeryville, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1978.

Tijaniyya Sufi Order

The Tijaniyya is a Muslim brotherhood or Sufi order (Arabic: tariqa) named after its founder, Ahmad b. Muhammad al-Tijani (1737–1815). The sources—the most important being Jawahir al-ma’ani by ‘Ali Harazim Barada, a disciple of al-Tijani—allow us to establish 1782 as the year when the Tijaniyya was established in the Algerian desert. In 1798, Ahmad al-Tijani moved to the city of Fez (Morocco), where he spent the rest of his life. By the time of his death, the new Sufi order had already reached areas such as Mauritania to the south and Tunisia to the east.

During the 19th century, the Tijaniyya expanded farther in sub-Saharan Africa: the areas of present-day Senegal, Guinea, Mali, and northern Nigeria came to be included within the sphere of influence of the Tijaniyya. A key figure of this development was al-Hajj ‘Umar b. Sa’id Tal (d. 1864), who, in the 1850s, launched a jihad against the “Pagan” Bamana rulers and later against the French, who had attempted to include the West African hinterland in their colonial state. Although the military activities of al-Hajj ‘Umar earned the Tijaniyya the reputation of being anti-colonial in Africa south of the Sahara, the contrary was the case in its original homeland: the leaders of the order at ‘Ain Madi and Temasin (Algeria) were on good terms with the French rulers, and there is evidence that they gave their support to French missions that were to explore the northern and central Sahara. When Morocco became a French protectorate in 1912, the colonial administration tried to use the Tijaniyya to increase its acceptance among the local Muslim population.

The 19th century saw the continuation of the rapid spread of the Tijaniyya in sub-Saharan Africa. However, after the final military defeat (1890–1893) of the Tijani state established by al-Hajj ‘Umar against the French colonial army, a new generation of Tijani leaders emerged who worked for the spread of their Sufi order by peaceful means. With regard to the French presence, these leaders followed the “accommodationist” approach of their Northern African counterparts. Some prominent Tijanis, such as the Senegalese shaykh al-Hajj Malik Sy (1855–1922) or Seydou Nourou Tal (ca. 1880–1980, a grandson of al-Hajj ‘Umar), became close allies of the French administration. The only significant exception to the new approach was Shaykh Hamallah from Niore du Sahel (present-day Mali), the founder of a distinctive branch of the Tijaniyya whose followers clashed repeatedly with French forces. Hamallah died in exile in Montluçon (France) in 1940, and his movement continues to exist in some regions of Mali, Burkina Faso, and the Ivory Coast.

Among the most visible figures of the Tijaniyya in the 20th century were Ibrahim Niasse (d. 1975) from Senegal, Muhammad al-Hafiz b. ‘Abd al-Latif (d. 1978) from Cairo, and Ahmad Skiraj (d. 1944) from Morocco. Niasse established a movement known as Jama’at al-fayda (Congregation of the Spiritual Overflowing) within the Tijaniyya in the 1930s. In the following decades, the fayda movement expanded rapidly in West Africa and even reached such distant areas as Darfur (Republic of Sudan). When Niasse died in 1975, the number of his followers was estimated at 20 to 30 million. The proselytizing activities of Muhammad al-Hafiz were concentrated on the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan (and later the Republic of Sudan). In addition, he acquired the reputation of being the most distinguished defender of Tijaniyya doctrine, together with Ahmad Skiraj. Both scholars published numerous books and pamphlets with the purpose of explaining the mystical teachings of Ahmad al-Tijani to a larger audience. For more than 25 years Muhammad al-Hafiz edited the Cairo-based journal Tariq al-haqq (The Way of the Truth), which dealt not only with Tijani doctrine but also with a wide range of issues such as the exegesis of the Koran, legal opinions (fatwas), the history of Islam, and current debates within the Muslim world.

Right from the outset, the Tijaniyya became the target of strong criticism by other Sufis and non-Sufi Muslims. According to Jawahir al-ma'ani, Ahmad al-Tijani—who had been affiliated with several Sufi orders before—founded his own brotherhood after a personal encounter with the Prophet Muhammad (d. 632). Moreover, al-Tijani claimed to be in permanent communication with the Prophet and justified his teachings by pointing to what the Prophet told him during those meetings. However, the authenticity of the alleged sayings of the Prophet was contested by non-Tijanis. Although Sufis usually accepted the possibility of meeting the Prophet even after his death, other Muslims denied such a possibility completely. Controversial statements made by al-Tijani concerned his claim to be the “seal of the saints” (khatm al-awliya'), the notion that one recitation of a short prayer formula known as salat al-fatih was equivalent to 6,000 recitations of the whole Koran, or the prohibition against visiting any Sufi shaykh who is not affiliated to the Tijaniyya, to mention but a few examples. Al-Tijani is even quoted as having said, “Whoever sees me on a Monday or on a Friday will surely enter paradise and will not be punished.”

Not surprisingly, such tenets were unacceptable to many non-Tijani Sufis and non-Sufi Muslims. Tijani doctrines have thus been at the root of countless controversies since the Order's foundation. Compared with other Sufi orders, the Tijaniyya is distinguished by its exclusiveness, its outspoken sense of superiority to other orders, and the high degree of confidence of salvation among the followers, because Ahmad al-Tijani gave them the guarantee that they will enter paradise on the Day of Judgment, provided that they comply with the Order's rules. Apart from the severe opposition evoked by such teachings, the Tijaniyya also managed to gain staunch support, particularly among Muslims in West Africa. Membership in this Sufi order always transcended adherence to particular social status groups. Tijani doctrine seems to be attractive to both scholars and the illiterate, nobles and former slaves, peasants and the emerging Muslim urban middle class, the rich and the poor. Every member is supposed to perform daily recitations, some being on an individual basis (awrad, sing. wird), while the wazifa (duty) and the Friday dhikr have to be performed in a group.

At the top of the Order's hierarchy is the eldest living male descendant of Ahmad al-Tijani. The present head is Sidi 'Abd al-Jabbar from 'Ain Madi (Algeria). Generally, all descendants of the Order's founder are considered to be the highest authorities within the Tijaniyya. But other shaykhs can also occupy a high position in the hierarchy when they are granted the title khalifa. Below the khalifa is the so-called muqaddam, who is allowed to initiate others into the recitation practices of the brotherhood. The Tijaniyya is nowadays the most influential Sufi order in West Africa. Its main areas of influence are Senegal and northern Nigeria, followed by countries such as Mauritania, Gambia, Ghana, Mali, Niger, and Cameroon. The Order also has a significant presence in some regions of Guinea, Burkina Faso, the Ivory Coast, Togo, Benin, and Sierra Leone. More to the east, important Tijaniyya communities can be found in Chad, the western and central regions of the Sudan, and in some regions of Ethiopia. As for North Africa, it seems that the influence of the Tijaniyya has declined over the course of the 20th century. However, the Order is still active in parts of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Egypt. Since the first half of the 20th century, the Order has also managed to make inroads into Southeast Asia (Indonesia, Malaysia). This expansion was possible primarily through the contacts established in Mecca by Tijani leaders from West Africa and Egypt with pilgrims from Southeast Asia. Tijaniyya centers also exist in Albania, and there seem to be small communities in Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, and even in Iran. In a more recent development, the Tijaniyya Order has started to recruit members among North American Muslims. The proselytizing activities in the United States are coordinated by Shaykh Hasan Cissé from Kaolack, Senegal, a disciple of the above-mentioned Ibrahim Niasse.

As there is no statistical data available, it is impossible to provide the number of followers of the Tijaniyya. For West Africa—nowadays the Tijaniyya heartlands—estimates run as high as 60 million. However, the number of 20 million followers worldwide seems to be more realistic, and the number of those who participate in the Order's rituals on a regular basis is certainly much lower.

At present, the most active centers of the Tijaniyya include Fez (Morocco), where the shrine of al-Tijani is located; Tivaouane and Kaolack (Senegal); Niore du Sahel (Mali); Kano and Maiduguri (Nigeria); and Kiota (Niger), to mention but a few.

Tijaniyya

Son Excellence Sidi 'Abd al-Jabbar

Khalife des Tijaniyya

'Ain Madi

Cercle de Laghouat

Algeria

<http://www.geocities.com/Athens/9189>

<http://www.crosswinds.net/~tijanicissesa>

<http://home.earthlink.net/~halimcisse/index.html>

Ruediger Seesemann

See also: Muhammad; Sufism.

References

- Abun-Nasr, Jamil M. The Tijaniyya: A Sufi Order in the Modern World. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.
- al-Sa'ih, Muhammad al-'Arabi. Bughyat al-mustafid li-sharh munyat al-murid. Cairo: Mustafa al-Babi al-Halabi, 1959.
- Barada, 'Ali Harazim. Jawahir al-ma'ani wa-bulugh al-amani fi fayd Sayyidi Abi l-'Abbas al-Tijani. Parts 1–2. Beirut: Dar al-Fikr, 1963.
- Brenner, Louis. West African Sufi: The Religious Heritage and Spiritual Search of Cerno Bokar Saalif Taal. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.
- Hunwick, John O. "An Introduction to the Tijani Path: Being an Annotated Translation of the Chapter Headings of the Kitab ar-rimah of al-Hajj 'Umar." Islam et sociétés au Sud du Sahara 6 (1992): 17–32.
- Robinson, David. The Holy War of Umar Tal: The Western Sudan in the Mid-Nineteenth Century. Oxford: Clarendon, 1985.
- Robinson, David, and Jean-Louis Triaud, eds. La Tijaniyya: Une confrérie musulmane à la conquête de l'Afrique. Paris: Karthala, 2000.

■ Timor Leste

The eastern half of the island of Timor, once part of the nation of Indonesia, became a separate nation in 2002, following a referendum in which more than 70 percent of the people voted for independence. The western portion of Timor remains part of Indonesia. The island is located north of Australia from which it is separated by the Timor Sea. Timor Leste's (East Timor's) 5,790 square miles of territory is home to some 1,109,000 people (2008).

When the Dutch took control of most of Indonesia, the Portuguese retained control of the eastern half of Timor and colonial rule continued into the 1970s. After the Portuguese revolution of 1974, the government moved to allow East Timor to determine its own future. The transition was handled poorly, however, and facing a civil war, the Portuguese administration suddenly abandoned the island in October 1975. One group seeking immediate independence, the Frente Revolucionaria de Timor Leste Independente, or FRETILIN, seized the capital, Dili.

East Timor farm village high in the mountains. (iStockPhoto.com)

TIMOR LESTE

At that point, Indonesia sent troops into Timor Leste, and the civil war reached a climax in December 1975, when a coalition of groups opposed to FRETILIN captured the capital. They formed a provisional government and moved to incorporate the island into Indonesia. The president of Indonesia designated East Timor as an Indonesian province in July 1976. In the meantime, the FRETILIN forces retreated into the mountainous interior and conducted a guerrilla war that continued into the late 1990s. The United Nations called for the Indonesians to withdraw.

Indonesia finally changed its policy on East Timor in 1989. However, the 1990s became a time of increased violence, and it was only with the change of governments in Indonesia (and the resignation of long-time President Suharto) that a move to respond to East Timor's aspiration for independence occurred. In the meantime, in 1996 the Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Timorese liberation activists Jose Ramos-Horta (b. 1948) and Catholic bishop Carlos Ximenes. In 1999 the United Nations oversaw a referendum on Indonesia's autonomy proposal. After the great majority voted for independence, the United Nations oversaw the transition and the first elections in 2001. Candidates associated with FRETILIN won the majority of seats in the new legislature.

Timor Leste is home to a vast array of Native peoples, all of whom developed their own particular culture and religion. There are a dozen ethnic groups in East Timor. One important group, the Tetum, contributed their language as a common language in the capital city during the days of Portuguese rule. Tetum subsequently spread throughout East Timor, and today

Timor Leste

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	210,000	1,077,000	84.8	5.90	1,776,000	3,134,000
Roman Catholics	207,000	1,035,000	81.4	5.87	1,683,000	2,954,000
Protestants	22,000	53,000	4.2	3.57	104,000	192,000
Ethnoreligionists	384,000	134,000	10.6	2.38	134,000	150,000
Muslims	1,000	47,900	3.8	5.45	80,000	140,000
Agnostics	0	4,900	0.4	5.45	9,000	17,500
Buddhists	6,000	2,400	0.2	5.46	4,000	7,500
Chinese folk	3,000	2,000	0.2	5.45	3,600	7,000
Baha'is	200	1,200	0.1	5.47	2,500	4,000
New religionists	0	600	0.0	5.46	1,000	1,600
Hindus	0	400	0.0	5.40	600	800
Total population	604,000	1,271,000	100.0	5.45	2,011,000	3,462,000

it is spoken by about 60 percent of the residents. Common to many of the groups was the belief in a Lord of the Upper World, various lesser spirits, and, what is very important, ancestral figures. Different religious functionaries (diviners or medicine men) worked to discern the cause of any misfortunes and treated illness (which was believed to be caused by sorcery or the displeasure of spirits). Ancestor worship was focused at the different ceremonies marking the lifecycle. The traditional religions have largely been replaced by Roman Catholicism.

The Roman Catholic Church came to Timor with the Portuguese in 1511. The Dominicans took the lead in evangelizing the people and had an early success when the island's principal ruler was converted in 1561. However, with the coming of the Dutch, the work of the Dominicans was largely disrupted. In 1816 the Oblates of Mary Immaculate reorganized the weakened Catholic community. The work was placed under the Diocese of Macao, but a bishop, the suffragan to Goa, India, was placed in Dili in 1940.

Since the end of World War II, the Catholic Church has made rapid progress in converting most of the island. Membership went from 66,000 in 1956 to more than 700,000 by 1996. It now includes more than 90 percent of the population. It was the case, however, that during the 1980s, Indonesian law required everyone to be aligned with a "monotheistic" religion. Traditional Timorese religions did have legal status, but Catholicism had absorbed various traditional practices and accommodated to traditional indigenous belief systems.

Timor is one of only two Asian countries with a Catholic majority (the other being the Philippines). Much of that growth has been attributed to the church's ability to operate with some degree of independence during the 1980s as the people struggled for independence. The church was attached to Gao rather than aligned with the rest of Indonesian Catholicism, and its bishop took actions that directly opposed Indonesian authority and identified with the people.

Although the country is dominated by Catholicism, there is a small Protestant presence, the Assemblies of God having the largest following. Also, Muslim traders have brought Islam (of the Sunni Shafiite School) to Timor Leste, primarily in the coastal towns. With rapid growth during the years of Indonesian rule, Islam now counts the allegiance of some 3 percent of the population. There are several Baha'i Faith spiritual assemblies and a marginal number of Buddhists of Chinese extraction.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam.

References

East Timor: A Christian Reflection/Timor Oriental: Une reflexion Chri tienne. London: Catholic Institute for International Relations, 1987.

Gunn, Geoffrey C. East Timor and the UN: The Case for Intervention. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press, 1997.

Smythe, Eric. The Heaviest Blow: The Catholic Church and the East Timor Issue. Münster, Germany: Lit Verlag, 2004.

Webb, R. A. F. "The People of the Book: Christians and Muslims in Indonesia: A Brief Survey of Nusa Tenggara Timur." Indonesia Circle 35 (1984): 59–69.

Tirumala/Tirupati

Tirupati is a town approximately 85 miles northwest of the Indian city of Chennai (formerly known as Madras) on a plain in the state of Andhra Pradesh. Few Westerners have heard of it or of the Tirumala Mountains, though together these places constitute the most frequented pilgrimage site in the world, more frequently visited than Jerusalem, Rome, or Mecca. The mountain range is seen by many as Adishesha, the divine serpent upon which the Hindu deity Vishnu reclines, with its seven peaks making up the serpent's seven heads. Tirupati lies at the foot of the seventh peak, upon which the main temple of the region stands at an elevation of about 2,000 feet.

According to Hindu mythology, Vishnu's mate, Lakshmi, left his side to incarnate on Earth as Princess Padmavati. Vishnu took human form as Venkateshvara and came to Earth to search for her. Her earthly father agreed to allow his daughter to marry Venkateshvara after the god provided proof that he was a man of great wealth.

Today, pilgrims are attracted to three major sites: Sri Venkateshvara's temple on Tirumala, one of the seven peaks; the shrine of Padmavati, located at Tiruchanur about three miles south of Tirupati; and the shrine of Govindaraja in the town of Tirupati. The present Venkateshvara temple dates to the ninth century CE, but it did not emerge as a major center for pilgrimages until the 15th-century Vijayanagara dynasty. The main statue of Sri Venkateshvara (also popularly called Balaji) is believed to have been found at the site (rather than carved by human hands) and the temple later constructed around it. References to the statue date to the first century CE and an original structure protecting the statue may have been built around that time. In 966 CE, King Saktivitarikata presented a silver image of Venkateshvara to the temple. The sage Ramanuja (1077–1157) visited the site in the 11th century and did much to increase the worship there and build up the town of Tirupati.

The main tower of the temple was built in 1260 CE. The eight-foot statue of Venkateshvara is considered a most sacred object, and it is not known even of what material it is made—stone or wood. Ramanuja is credited with settling the dispute over who the statue actually represents by declaring it an incarnation of Vishnu. He is also believed to have fixed the symbol of Lakshmi to its chest. Since this time the common markings of a Vaishnava ascetic, vertical lines on the nose and forehead, are periodically applied to the statue.

Pilgrims to Tirumala believe that they can attain mukti (bliss) by worshipping Sri Venkateshvara. Because of the story of Venkateshvara's search for his mate, the temple is popular with couples about to be married. Worship is primarily done by circumambulation.

Sri Venkateshvara's temple is reportedly now the richest temple in the world. It is the home of a significant collection of rare and precious ornaments and receives many gifts from people who attribute their healing or good fortune to Lord Balaji. Some 331 pounds of pure gold was used to cover the granite canopy over the most holy part of the main temple.

The temple to Venkateshvara is by no means the only noteworthy temple in the area. The Govindaraja temple in Tirupati is dedicated to Krishna, another incarnation of Vishnu. It contains an older shrine to Govindaraja (who is seen in a reclining position) that dates to the ninth century and a new shrine erected by Ramanuja in the 11th. The main temple dedicated to Padmavati is located about three miles from Tirupati at Tiruccanur. Like Venkateshvara, she is shown with four hands, two of which hold lotus flowers and two of which are positioned in mudras that depict her granting of favors and her offering of protection to those who come to see her.

The primary annual festival at Tirupati recalls the story of Padmavati's marriage to Venkateshvara. Her statue is removed from the temple in Tiruccanur and carried on an elephant to the main temple on the mountain. As it arrives, Venkateshvara is thought to come out to greet her (his statue not being moved from its permanent resting place).

In 1933 the administrative affairs of the temples in the Tirupati area were turned over to an autonomous body established by the government in Chennai: the Tirumala-Tirupati Devasthanam (TTD) Committee. Meanwhile, since 1965, tens of thousands of South Indians have moved to North America. Here they have built several replicas of the Sri Venkateshvara temple, most notably in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; Bridge-water, New Jersey; Cary, North Carolina; Aurora, Illinois; and Agoura, California. There is also a large Sri Venkateshvara temple in Tividale (West Midlands), England.

Constance A. Jones

See also: Jerusalem; Mecca; Rome/Vatican City; Vaishnavism.

References

- Chetty, P. M. Muniswamy. Tirumala-Tirupathi: Sri Venkateswara's Story and Mahatyam. Harshananda, Swami. Hindu Pilgrimage Centres. Bangalore: Ramakrishna Math, 2005.
- Krishna, Nandith. Balaji, Venkateshwara, Lord of Tirumala-Tirupati—An Introduction. Mumbai: Vakils Feffer & Simons, 2000.
- Rao, Velcheru Narayana, and David Shulman. God on the Hill: Temple Poems from Tirupati. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Sitapati, Pidatala. Sri Venkateswara: The Lord of the Seven Hills—Tirupati. Mumbai: BVB, 2001.
- Smith, H. Daniel, and M. Narsimhachary. Handbook of Hindu Gods, Goddesses, and Saints. New Delhi: Sundeep Prakashan, 1997.

Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World

In northern Angola, several movements associated with the Kimbanguist Church movements started after the prophet's arrest in 1921. The first significant African Initiated Church began there under the prophet and former Baptist teacher and choirmaster Simbo Toco (1918–1984): the Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ in the World, also known as the “Red Star” after the church's symbol. This movement started in 1949 in the western Congo in a decisive Pentecost of its own, with trembling and speaking in tongues. Toco was arrested by Belgian officials and handed over to the Portuguese government at the Angolan border in 1950, together with 82 Angolan followers. The movement was severely repressed, but it had 10,000 adherents by 1965 and had become multiethnic, thanks to the Portuguese practice of exiling Tocoists to distant provinces. Toco himself was exiled to various parts of Angola and eventually in 1963 to the islands of the Azores, where he worked as a lighthouse keeper until 1974. During the Angolan civil war, Toco, who then lived in Luanda, was in a precarious position because of his origins in an area that supported an antigovernment party.

A leadership struggle in the church followed Toco's death in 1984, and the government did not include the Tocoist Church in its list of 12 recognized churches. The dispute was resolved in 1988 when Luzaisso Antonio Lutango was elected leader of the church and the government lifted its suspension of the church's activities. There were many remarkable similarities between the careers of Simbo Toco and Simon Kimbangu, besides their first names. Like Kimbanguism, the church requires monogamy and forbids pork and alcohol. Tocoist members must wear white in worship, and they are thought to regard Toco as the second member of the Trinity.

The headquarters of the church is in Luanda, Angola.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Kimbanguist Church.

References

- Estermann, Carlos. “O tocomsomo como fensmeno religioso.” Garcia de Orta 13, no. 3 (1965): 325–342.
- Grenfell, F. James. “Simbo Toco: An Angolan Prophet.” Journal of Religion in Africa 28, no. 2 (1998): 210–226.

■ Togo

Modern Togo originated as a small West African country on the Gulf of Guinea sandwiched between the Gold Coast (Ghana) and Dahomey (Benin). It is bordered on the north by Burkina Faso. Its 21,000 square miles of territory is home to its 6,500,000 residents (2007).

The area has been the home of the Ewe, a people related to the Ashanti (of Ghana) and the Ibo and Yoruba (of Nigeria). The Kabye and Mina are also among the more important of the more than a dozen peoples who reside in the country. Through the mid-19th century, the land was a semiautonomous region, ruled by several African chiefs, that became a buffer between the British Gold Coast and French Benin. Then in 1884, at a conference of European powers, Germany asserted its rights to a share in Central Africa. This land was then given to Germany, which named it Togoland. The German commissioner for West Africa, Gustav Nachtigal, signed a treaty with several of the more powerful Togo chiefs.

German control of the area was short lived. During World War I, Britain and France closed the gap between their territories. In 1957 that part of Togo under British control was annexed and merged with the Gold Coast to create modern Ghana. However, the French part remained a separate territory that finally attained independence in 1960. It is that former part of Togo under French control that constitutes the present state. Independence was followed by a period of national unrest that included political assassination and several coups. The 1967 coup brought in Etienne Eyadema, who has remained in power ever since, in spite of periods of strong protest and an abysmal human rights record. He has regularly been re-elected as the leader of the only legal political party.

Traditional African religions remain strong in Togo, claiming the allegiance of as much as half of the population. Among the Ewe, the Supreme Deity is named Mawu. Mawu is feminine, thought of as mother, creator, judge, and law-giver, and temples managed by priests may be found throughout Ewe country, where sacrifices are made to her regularly.

Although the Portuguese had worked the coast of the Gulf of Guinea gathering slaves, and had visited the coast of Togo from the 16th into the 19th century, it was not until 1871 that the Roman Catholic Church established its first mission, at Agouyé. A second station was opened in 1886, established by the Society of African Missions, a French order from Lyon. Togo became a prefecture in 1892 and a vicariate in 1924. German Catholic priests were active during the days of German rule, but they were forced to leave in 1918. Priests from the Society of African Missions took their place. The ordination of the first Togo priest signaled the beginning of the indigenization process. The Diocese of Lomé was erected in 1955. The Roman Catholic Church is now the largest Christian body in Togo.

In Togo, West Africa, the Salinkrang village of the Dagomba tribe maintains this animist fetish to ensure prosperity. (iStockPhoto.com)

As early as 1847, the North German Missionary Society, which drew much of its support from the Pietist element in the Lutheran churches of northern Germany, sent missionaries into Togo to work among the Ewe people. At the time that the missionaries were expelled in 1918, the mission had been divided, with part in British territory and part in French territory. In 1922 the mission constituted itself as the Evangelical Ewe Church. It developed a congregational polity with a general synod that met triennially. Through the 1920s the United Free Church of Scotland sent in personnel to assist the congregation in British territory, and the Paris Mission did likewise for the remaining congregations. Increasingly, in spite of efforts to prevent it, the church divided. The church in French territory began a theological school in 1929.

In 1955 the United Church of Christ (through its United Church Board of World Ministries) added its support to the church and expanded its work to include the Kabye people in the northern reaches of the country. Then in 1959, the church in French territory became an autonomous body as the Evangelical Church of Togo (Église Évangélique du Togo). The following year, the North German Missionary Society returned, and the Evangelical Church was able to further expand. At the time that Togo became an independent country, the Evangelical Church was already the largest Protes-

Togo

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	590,000	3,245,000	45.6	3.26	5,099,000	7,805,000
Roman Catholics	428,000	1,660,000	23.3	2.11	2,737,000	4,080,000
Protestants	66,700	800,000	11.2	4.45	1,322,000	2,195,000
Independents	33,300	155,000	2.2	2.69	250,000	500,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,256,000	2,435,000	34.2	2.37	2,389,000	2,499,000
Muslims	289,000	1,385,000	19.4	3.13	2,342,000	3,600,000
Baha'is	2,100	36,000	0.5	2.92	56,000	80,000
Agnostics	500	16,000	0.2	2.92	30,000	50,000
New religionists	600	3,500	0.0	2.92	5,000	8,000
Atheists	0	1,900	0.0	2.92	4,000	8,000
Total population	2,138,000	7,122,000	100.0	2.92	9,925,000	14,050,000

tant church, and it has remained so. Its present name, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo, reflects its replacement of the congregational polity it had at its beginning with a presbyterial organization.

As early as 1843, Thomas Birch Freeman, the missionary of the British Methodists (now the Methodist Church in Great Britain), visited Togo. He met with the chief in Anécho and gained his friendship. More important, he gained permission to locate a preaching point and a school in Anécho, from which Methodism was able to begin its spread along the coast communities inhabited by the Mina people. The church has maintained its strength among the Mina people and has been largely unable to transcend that base.

The Assemblies of God, the Pentecostal church from the United States, began work in Togo in 1937 and expanded to the northern part of the country in 1940. In the years after World War II, the church expanded rapidly and soon surpassed the Methodists as the third largest religious group in Togo. Various other American-based Free Churches also came to Togo: the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Jehovah's Witnesses. However, by far the largest number of churches contributing to the growing pluralistic environment of the country either came from other nearby countries, especially Ghana, or, in a few cases, originated within Togo.

Among the African Initiated Churches founded by Togo believers is Église du Christ, founded by an Ewe pastor in 1962, and the Ordre Sacre de Deliverance (Sacred Order of Deliverance), founded among the Ewe in 1968. Ghana has contributed a number of groups, such as the Église de la Guérison Divine du Togo (the Divine Healer's Church of Togo), which came to Togo around 1960, and the Société de la Croix Blanche. Nigeria contributed the Church of the Lord, Aladura, and Benin the Heavenly Christianity Church.

Islam of the Sunni Malikite School was introduced into Togo in the 18th century. The first mosque was built in 1820 at Sokodé and found its major support among several of the peoples living in the extreme northern part of the country. In 1973 the Muslims organized the Muslim Union of Togo, which has struggled to block the development of the Sufi brotherhoods and the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, the Pakistani revivalist movement that opened work in 1960 and that some consider heretical; the Baha'i Faith first appeared in 1955. Muslims now constitute some 15 percent of the population.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of the Lord; Evangelical Church of Togo; Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo; Jehovah's Witnesses; Malikite School of Islam; Methodist Church; Paris Mission; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church of Christ; United Free Church of Scotland.

References

Delval, R. Les musulmans au Togo. Paris: Publications Orientalistes de France, 1980.

Religieuses au Togo. Lomé, Togo: Archevêché de Lomé, 1991.

Sossah, K. Panorama sociologique des sectes religieuses au Togo: Etude et documents. Lomé, Togo: Institut National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1976.

■ Tokelau Islands

The Tokelau Islands consist of three South Pacific atolls with a total land area of less than 4 square miles located between Kiribati and Samoa, with a total population of approximately 1,400 people (2008).

The islands have been inhabited for several thousand years by Polynesians who had their first contact with Europeans in 1765. Explorer John Byron found the islands to possess little to interest his government. Only in 1877 did Great Britain move to name the islands a British protectorate. In 1916 they were formally annexed and incorporated in the Gilbert Islands and Ellice Islands colony. Administration was transferred to New Zealand in 1925.

The present name of the islands appeared in 1946, and New Zealand assumed full sovereignty in 1958. However, in the post–World War II decades, the United States also claimed hegemony over the islands, which claim it did not drop until 1980. From 1960 to 1972, New Zealand encouraged immigration of Tokelau Islanders to New Zealand, but in 1972 reversed that policy for one of supporting the retention of cultural life and traditions. Since the 1980s, the United Nations has monitored the ongoing desires of the residents concerning their relationship to New Zealand, but they have continued to enjoy their semiautonomous state. New Zealand has placed its Tokelau Affairs Office on Samoa.

The London Missionary Society, which had been operating in the South Pacific for a half-century, finally sent a missionary to Tokelau in 1861. The early missionaries were extremely aggressive toward the traditional religion, and by the late 20th century it had all but disappeared. Approximately 70 percent of the residents are members of the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa, created in 1962 and based in Western Samoa.

The Roman Catholic Church established work immediately after World War II in 1946. That work was attached to the vicariate headquartered in Samoa in 1955 and eventually grew into the Diocese of Apia (Western Samoa) in 1966 (now the Diocese of Samoa-Apia). It was separated from the diocese as an independent mission in 1992. The only other religious activity in the islands is a small Baha'i Faith community.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Congregational Christian Church in Samoa; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Boardman, D. W. "Religion as a Factor in the Adjustment of Immigrants: Tokelau Island Community in the Wellington Area." Social Compass 26, no. 1 (1979): 73–85.
- Hooper, A., and J. Huntsman, trans. Matagi Tokelau: History and Traditions of Tokelau. Apia, Western Samoa: Office of Tokelau Affairs, Institute of Pacific Studies, University of the South Pacific, 1991.

Tokelau Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,500	1,300	93.6	–1.69	1,300	1,200
Protestants	1,000	1,000	71.4	–0.20	980	960
Roman Catholics	400	500	35.7	–0.40	550	530
Marginals	0	20	1.8	0.00	30	80
Baha'is	60	70	5.0	–1.56	100	140
Agnostics	0	20	1.4	14.87	40	60
Total population	1,600	1,400	100.0	–1.58	1,400	1,400

TOKELAU ISLANDS

Thomas, Allan. New Song and Dance from the Central Pacific: Creating and Performing the Fatele of Tokelau in the Islands and in New Zealand. Hillsdale, NY: Pendragon Press, 1996.

Turner, George. Samoa: A Hundred Years Ago and Long Before. Together with Notes on the Cults and Customs of Twenty-three Other Islands in the Pacific. Chestnut Hill, MA: Adamant Media Corporation, 2005.

■ Tonga

Tonga, whose name means “south,” is an island archipelago of 169 islands in the far South Pacific between Fiji and American Samoa. A total of 289 square miles of land are available for its 119,000 residents (2008). The islands are unique in that their local governance was never lost and today the islands retain the only monarchy in the South Pacific.

Tonga was settled more than a millennium ago by Polynesians who arrived from those two island groups. The islanders developed a complex social system headed by the Tui Tonga (ruler), later replaced by local leaders (divided among religious and secular leaders) on the main islands. The Dutch explorer Jakob Lemaire visited Tonga as early as 1616, but it was Captain James Cook who in the 18th century gave them their early name among Westerners, the Friendly Islands.

In the mid-19th century, a civil war broke out. A young leader, Taufa’ahau Tupouin, was victorious and unified the islands under his rule, which lasted until 1893. An admirer of British ways, he called himself George I and introduced a parliamentary system of governance. The British established a protectorate over Tonga in 1890 but did not disturb the local system of government. In 1918 the youthful great granddaughter of George I was crowned Queen Salote. Tonga was never transformed into a colony, and in 1970 it became independent of British oversight under King Taufa’ahau, who continues as head of state.

Missionaries from the London Missionary Society attempted to evangelize Tonga in 1797, but they withdrew after three of their number were killed in 1799. They were succeeded by Australian Methodist Walter Lowery, who arrived in 1822. The work bore little fruit until the mid-1830s, but it suddenly spread rapidly over Elder Liki from Utah reads religious writings to villagers in Ha’alaufuli Village on April 19, 2007, in the Vava’u island group of Tonga. These visits are part of his two-year proselytizing and missionary work in Tonga for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. (Getty Images) the island of Vava'u in 1834 and then spread through the archipelago. King George I, who finally unified the islands, was a Methodist, and in the decade after he established his rule the great majority of the islanders converted. The older Polynesian religion was virtually wiped out.

TONGA

George I also became the source of the first schism within the Christian community. He developed issues with the Australian Methodists and with the aid of Reverend Shirley W. Baker (1836–1903), a British Methodist and local head of the Australian mission, he established the independent Wesleyan Free Church

Tonga

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	97,200	97,400	95.5	0.20	105,000	114,000
Marginals	16,000	55,000	53.9	1.51	58,000	60,000
Protestants	38,700	45,500	44.6	0.24	45,000	45,000
Independents	14,300	21,700	21.3	0.79	25,000	28,000
Baha'is	1,100	3,800	3.8	1.37	6,000	8,000
Agnostics	0	500	0.5	5.46	800	1,000
Buddhists	0	120	0.1	0.17	180	250
Hindus	30	100	0.1	0.20	150	200
Atheists	0	10	0.0	0.00	10	20
Ethnoreligionists	0	10	0.0	0.00	10	20
Total population	98,300	102,000	100.0	0.26	112,000	123,000

and ordered his subjects to join it. The two bodies remained bitter rivals until 1924, when, under a new ruler, a plan of union was worked out. The majority of the Free church, the larger body at this time, united to form the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga. However, some 6,000 members refused to join the union and continued as the Free Church of Tonga. The Free Church of Tonga has subsequently experienced two schisms, with members leaving in 1929 to form the Church of Tonga and in 1962 to form the Church of the Red Coats. Through these four churches, the Methodists remain the majority church grouping on Tonga, though they declined proportionately as the population has grown and new missionary groups arose in the last half of the 20th century.

The second church to establish itself on Tonga was the Roman Catholic Church. After several unsuccessful attempts, dating back to 1837, to create a mission, Catholic work began in earnest following an 1855 treaty between Tonga and France proclaiming religious freedom as the law of the land. The church grew to the point that a vicariate was erected in 1937 and a diocese in 1976. The first indigenous priest was ordained in 1933. The bishop resides in Nuku'alofa, the capital.

Anglicans arrived fairly late in Tonga (1902) but had little success. Anglican work is part of the Diocese of Polynesia within what is now known as the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia. Somewhat earlier (1895), the Seventh-day Adventist Church began its mission on Tonga, which was formally organized as the Tonga Mission in 1921, a year before the creation of the church's South Pacific Division.

The Assemblies of God entered in the 1930s but did not experience real success until 1966, when they held a Good News Crusade to which hundreds responded. Like the Assemblies of God, the Jehovah's Witnesses arrived in Tonga in the 1930s and experienced a heightened growth in the 1960s, though they have not been as successful in gaining members. More successful than either has been the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which entered Tonga in 1891. It grew rapidly after World War II, the publication of the Tongan edition of the Book of Mormon in 1946 being a significant factor. Beginning with 2,400 members, by the end of the century the church reported more than 40,000 members in a population of approximately 120,000. It is the second largest religious body on Tonga.

Tonga remains one of the most thoroughly Christianized of the South Pacific countries, which has meant that few newer evangelical churches entered through the last decades of the 20th century, and that the community of people who follow other faiths is small. There is a small Baha'i Faith community, as well as a group of immigrants from India who continue to worship as Hindus.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Harris, D. P. "Missionaries in the Last Kingdom." M.A. thesis, Harvard University, 1989.
- Rutherford, Noel. Shirley Baker and the King of Tonga. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1996.
- Swain, Tony, and Garry Trompf. The Religions of Oceania. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Tippett, A. R. People Movements in Southern Polynesia: Studies in the Dynamics of Church-Planting and Growth in Tahiti, New Zealand, Tonga and Samoa. Chicago: Moody, 1971.

T'ongdo-sa Temple

T'ongdo-sa, or Pass into Enlightenment, Temple is the largest Buddhist temple in the republic of (South) Korea. Built to house relics of the Buddha, it emerged through the centuries as one of the Three Jewels Temple, each temple emphasizing one of the Buddhist central loyalties to the Buddha, the Dharma and the Shangha. T'ongdo-sa represents the Buddha.

Tongdo-sa dates to 646 CE, during the reign of Queen Sondok (r. 634–647), the queen of Silla, one of the two southern Korean kingdoms during the era before the three Korean kingdoms were unified (668). Among her policies, Queen Sondok worked to strengthen Silla's ties to China and one means to doing that was to send monks to study. Among those she sent to China early in her reign was Chajang, a young monk of noble birth and obvious skill. Sondok's father had on several occasions tried to convince him to join his court. Chajang spent a decade in China and before leaving, according to the legends about him, he brought relics of the Buddha he received from the bodhisattva Manjurshi on his return from China.

Chajang initially built a small hermitage on Yongjuk-san Mountain that became his headquarters for the erection of T'ongdo-sa. The completed complex had several unique features. First, the entrance was by a bridge that led one into a forest of pine trees, symbolic of the purification the visitor should be undergoing as he or she steps into sacred space.

The primary structure at the temple was the Main Hall. An aesthetically pleasing building, its ceiling, for example, is decorated with chrysanthemums, but that is not its central feature. The central feature is not what is present so much as what is absent. There is no representation of the Buddha to be seen. Instead of the statue, there is only a window looking out to a bell-shaped stupa, which one reaches by a set of stairs that lead to the platform upon which it rests. The stairs lead to the entrance gate, decorated with dragons, clouds, and two protector guardians. Four protective deities stand at the corners of the platform. The stupa enshrines the relics of the Buddha that Master Chajang brought from China, including Buddha's bones, teeth, 100 relic stones, and a robe. As the stupa houses the relics, there is no need for a mere statue in the Main Hall. The original Main Hall, along with all but one of the more than 100 additional buildings, was destroyed during the Japanese invasion of the peninsula at the end of the 1590s, but it and the Great Hall of Light were quickly rebuilt. They are the two oldest structures at T'ongdo-sa Temple, and have been designated a national treasure by the Korean government.

Among the many buildings now making up T'ongdo-sa are its museum, the memorial shrine to Chajang built in 1727, and the Great Hall of Light, dedicated to Vairocana Buddha, originally built in the 15th century. Vairocana Buddha is usually identified with Dharmakaya, the primordial Buddha, the same Buddha installed in the great Buddha hall at Nara, Japan. Other Buddhas and bodhisattva are honored in the other buildings in the complex.

Today, T'ongdo-sa consists of some 35 buildings and pagodas. Outside the Main Hall, next to the stupa, is a place where the Chogye Order conducts its ordination ceremonies. T'ongdo-sa is located in Yangsan, South Kyongsang Province.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chajang; Haein-sa Temple; Korean Buddhism; Songgwangsa.

References

- Mohan, Pankaj N. "Wōn'gwang and Chajang in the Formation of Early Silla Buddhism." In Religions of Korea in Practice, edited by Robert Buswell, Jr., 51–64. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- T'ongdo-sa: The Temple Without a Buddha Statue." Buddhapia. http://eng.buddhapia.com/_Service/_ContentView/ETC_CONTENT_2.ASP?pk=0000766182&sub_pk=&class_cd=0002154278&top_menu_cd=0000000750&menu_cd=&menu_code=0000008786. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Toraja Church

The people of the Toraja region of the central highlands of Sulawesi, one of the larger Indonesian islands, resisted incursions into their territory by the Dutch government, Muslims, and Christians. However, in 1906 the Dutch established their authority in the area, and in 1912 the Reformed Church began a mission that in 1913 resulted in the first baptisms. That same year, the Gereformeerde Zendiingsbond, a very conservative Calvinist missionary society based in Holland, assumed responsibility for the mission. The church grew quickly, and through the 1930s a planned development toward independence was put into place. In 1941 the first congregation was declared independent of the mission and called its pastor. There were approximately 15,000 people affiliated with the mission at that point.

The church's plans were interrupted by the Japanese invasion of Indonesia. However, in 1947 an independent Toraja Church with a presbyterian polity was constituted. Then, as Indonesia moved toward independence, an Islamic revolt developed across Sulawesi. Many Muslims opposed the new government and fought a guerrilla war into the 1960s. The revolt forced many Torajans to choose between Christianity and Islam. By the time the revolt had ended, more than 70 percent of the Toraja people had joined the church. The church also founded congregations in other parts of Sulawesi and on Kalimantan and Java, where Torajans had immigrated.

Through the 1970s, the church gave considerable time to rethinking its relationship to the local culture, toward which it had developed a positive stance. One result was a new confession of faith adopted in 1981. In 1988, women were accepted into the ordained ministry. Although retaining a cordial relationship to the founding mission, the church has asserted its independence and joined both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

In 2005, the church reported 350,000 members in 891 congregations. It sponsors two hospitals, an orphanage, and a rural training center for female leaders.

Toraja Church (GT)
Jalan Jenderal Ahmad Yani 45
Rantepao—Tana Toraja 91831
Sulawesi Selatan
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship

The Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship (TACF) is the church base for a famous Charismatic renewal movement known as the "Toronto Blessing" that began on January 20, 1994. TACF, founded by John and Carol Arnott, a husband-wife team, was originally a part of the California-based Association of Vineyard Churches, founded by John Wimber (1934–1996). TACF separated from the Vineyard in late 1995–early 1996 after serious disagreements over aspects of the renewal connected with the Toronto church.

The Blessing renewal began under the ministry of Randy Clark, a Vineyard pastor from St. Louis, who was holding a revival campaign at the former Toronto Airport Vineyard in early 1994. Clark outlined his own experience of spiritual awakening through the work of evangelist Rodney Howard-Browne, a Pentecostal evangelist from South Africa, who now heads Revival Ministries International in Tampa, Florida. Howard-Browne gained fame through manifestations of “holy laughter” that characterized his revival meetings.

The initial campaign in Toronto continued after Clark returned to St. Louis. The Blessing gained international attention as news spread throughout the Charismatic and Pentecostal Christian world about a supernatural “Holy Ghost” revival in Toronto. By the summer and fall of 1994 thousands were flocking to Toronto for the meetings held six nights every week. Toronto Life magazine billed the “Blessing” the top tourist attraction of 1994. Visitors continued to come to Toronto by the thousands from every part of the globe throughout 1995 and early 1996. Since then TACF has given more focus to special conferences and traveling to various countries to export the renewal around the world.

From the outset of the renewal, evangelical Christian critics like Hank Hanegraaff, author of Counterfeit Revival, accused TACF leaders of using hypnotism and psychological control to manipulate the crowds into frenzied bouts of laughter, shaking, rolling on the floor, moaning, groaning, crying, and falling down (known as being “slain in the Spirit”). What drew particular concern from Vineyard leader John Wimber were episodes of people acting or sounding like animals during the worship services, though this was not a common occurrence.

In early 1996, TACF formed Partners in Harvest, a nondenominational organization that seeks to unite Charismatic ministries and churches influenced by the revival. There are now more than 100 participating churches from the United States, Canada, and a dozen other countries, including South Africa, Norway, Israel, Brazil, and Australia. There is also a looser affiliation of church groups known as Friends in Harvest who unite in common passion for renewal in the Holy Spirit.

TACF became the target of fresh criticism in 1999 following reports that God was filling people’s cavities with real gold during worship services. TACF released a video about the alleged miracles called “Go for the Gold” and their website featured pictures from people who claimed that God had performed dental work on them. Attendance increased as reports circulated about the supernatural claims. The focus on dental miracles diminished after investigation by TACF leaders proved that some of the cases involved routine dental work.

TACF leaders were involved in further controversy in 2008 over the ministry of Todd Bentley, a Pentecostal revivalist from British Columbia, Canada. Bentley had been a visiting speaker at TACF. On April 2, 2008, Bentley started a five-night speaking engagement at Ignited Church in Lakeland, Florida. The campaign was prolonged and by mid-May 10,000 people were attending every night. The revival became known as the “Florida Outpouring” and was featured nightly on God TV. Bentley was interviewed by major print and TV media and he received endorsements from John and Carol Arnott and other Charismatic/Pentecostal leaders.

Bentley was also attacked over his appearance, teachings, and wild behavior and some major Pentecostal leaders, including J. Lee Grady, editor of the prominent Charisma magazine, expressed concerns. In August 2008 it was announced that Bentley and his wife were separating and that he was involved with a female staff member. Bentley resigned from the ministry and the revival meetings ended shortly after. He has since remarried, but as of 2009 is receiving spiritual counseling from a colleague.

Apart from the unusual spiritual manifestations, the Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship adopts a doctrinal framework consistent with evangelical Christian norms. The church views God in a Trinitarian perspective and adopts a high view of scripture. TACF continues to have enormous worldwide outreach through its media portal (Revive TV), renewal magazine, international conferences, and school of ministry. The church has been visited by several million people since 1994 and maintains links with some of the most prominent leaders in the Charismatic and Pentecostal world, including televangelist Benny Hinn.

John and Carol Arnott have become well-known figures in the international Charismatic and Pentecostal communities. TACF is now led locally by Steve and Sandra Long, who oversee the main airport site and nine other campuses in greater Toronto.

Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship
272 Attwell Drive
Toronto, ON M9W 6M3
Canada
<http://www.tacf.org>

James A. Beverley

See also: Charismatic Movement; Pentecostalism.

References

- Arnott, John. The Father's Blessing. Lake Mary, FL: Creation House, 1995.
- Beverley, James A. Holy Laughter and the Toronto Blessing. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1995.
- Hanegraaff, Hank. Counterfeit Revival. Dallas, TX: Word, 1997.
- Paloma, Margaret. Main Street Mystics: The Toronto Blessing and Reviving Pentecostalism. Lanham, MO: Alta Mira Press, 2003.

Traditional Anglican Communion

The Traditional Anglican Communion is an international ecumenical body of conservative churches in the Anglican tradition. In the mid-1970s a significant conservative reaction developed in the Episcopal Church in the United States, occasioned by the ordination of the first female priests and the authorization of a new Prayer Book. Several new jurisdictions were established in the United States that became catalysts for Anglicans in various Anglican churches worldwide to leave those churches in fellowship with the archbishop of Canterbury and to form independent dioceses. In the 1980s such churches emerged in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom.

In 1992 the Anglican Catholic Church, the Anglican Catholic Church of Canada, and the Anglican Catholic Church of Australia, including their member dioceses in New Zealand, Hong Kong, and Latin America, formed the Traditional Anglican Communion. Subsequently, the Traditional Anglican Church was formed in England, and it affiliated. As the Communion was being formed, in 1991, the American Episcopal Church merged with the Anglican Catholic Church to form the Anglican Church in America. Some bishops rejected the merger and continue as the Original Province of the Anglican Catholic Church. The bishops of the Original Province had signed the original concordant establishing the Traditional Anglican Communion, but have since withdrawn their support for it. The bishops of the Anglican Church in America continue their support of the Communion.

Additional members included the Church of Ireland (Traditional Rite), the Anglican Church in America, and the Anglican Church of Southern Africa (Traditional Rite), the Anglican Church of India, the Orthodox Church of Pakistan, the Church of Umzi Wase Tiyopiya (South Africa), the Traditional Anglican Church–England, the Church of Torres Strait, the Continuing Anglican Church in Zambia, and the Nippon Kirisuto Sei Ko Kai (Japan). The United Anglican Church was a member for a period but has since withdrawn.

The Traditional Catholic Communion is a minuscule relative to the Church of England and its affiliates, but has assembled a communion of some half million members worldwide. Most of the churches that resulted from the schisms that began in 1976 have chosen not to affiliate with it, but it does represent a growing alternative for those unsettled by the ongoing changes within the larger Anglican world.

In 2002, Archbishop John Hepworth of the Anglican Catholic Church in Australia succeeded Louis Falk as the primate of the Traditional Anglican Communion. Falk, who leads the Anglican Church in America, had been the driving force in the merger of the Anglican Catholic Church and the American Episcopal Church and in the formation of the Traditional Anglican Communion. The Communion formed the International Anglican Fellowship as its missionary arm and charged it with the task of raising money for those churches around the world that were finding it difficult to survive in their effort to maintain traditional faith and worship.

Traditional Anglican Communion
PO Box 746
Blackwood
South Australia 5051
Australia
<http://www.acahome.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Episcopal Church.

Transcendental Meditation

See Global Country of World Peace.

■ Trinidad and Tobago

The religious plurality of Trinidad and Tobago’s 1.3 million people stems from its colonial history and ethnic diversity, making the land a “rainbow nation.” During colonial times (1498–1962), the indigenous Arawak population was wiped out by the Spanish. In the late 18th century, French settlers were invited to set up plantations to grow sugar and cocoa. The settlers brought with them Roman Catholicism and slaves from West Africa. The Roman Catholic Church since then has represented Trinidad’s religious norm, despite the British takeover in 1802 and the introduction of the Church of England and other Christian denominations later. Anglicans in the Diocese of Trinidad and Tobago were incorporated into the Church of the Province of the West Indies in 1883.

The religious traditions of the West Africans became blended into Catholic African syncretic cults, such as the Shango/Orisha and Spiritual Baptists (“Shouters,” with Protestant elements). With the British abolition of slavery in 1834, the need for cheap plantation laborers was fulfilled through indentured workers from India. From 1845 to 1917, more than 140,000 Indians from various regions and religious backgrounds were brought to Trinidad. The diversity of Hindu ritual practices and doctrinal beliefs became standardized during the 19th and early 20th centuries into a homogenized and Brahman (priestly) monopolized “Caribbean Hinduism.” The religion aspired to acquire a more respected place in Trinidadian society; thus Hindu folk traditions were purged and marginalized and “official” Hindu worship aligned to Christian patterns. Nevertheless, certain healing practices, evil-eye ceremonies, sorcery, and divination rituals persisted. Interestingly, those practices cut across the generally highly segmented, exclusive, and stratified population of Trinidad and Tobago (the latter having been administratively joined with Trinidad in 1889), that being especially so in the working-class population.

Indians and Africans also brought with them Islamic traditions. Among the Indian segment, Muslims constituted some 12 to 16 percent. As with the African peoples, Indians were subjected to Christian missionary programs, the Presbyterian Church of Canada being most active in attempting to convert the so-called heathen brothers and sisters. Proselytization efforts among Indian Muslims more or less failed. However, among the Indian people, evangelists from

Trinidad and Tobago

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	672,000	844,000	62.6	0.23	850,000	786,000
Roman Catholics	363,000	385,000	28.6	−0.06	350,000	275,000
Protestants	119,000	280,000	20.8	1.18	315,000	320,000
Anglicans	150,000	80,000	5.9	−1.14	80,000	70,000
Hindus	220,000	328,000	24.3	0.66	340,000	320,000
Muslims	60,200	97,000	7.2	0.35	104,000	100,000
Agnostics	1,000	31,000	2.3	0.58	50,000	60,000
Spiritists	4,000	19,500	1.4	0.35	21,000	20,000
Baha’is	6,000	16,200	1.2	0.35	22,000	25,000
Chinese folk	4,000	5,200	0.4	0.35	5,200	4,800
Buddhists	2,000	4,100	0.3	0.35	5,000	6,000
New religionists	1,000	1,800	0.1	0.35	2,000	2,000
Jews	300	640	0.0	0.33	700	700
Atheists	0	570	0.0	0.36	700	800
Total population	971,000	1,348,000	100.0	0.35	1,401,000	1,325,000

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad, and later the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglicans, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and, most recently, several Pentecostal churches, count some 22.2 percent as members. Thus Hindu and Muslim traditions remain the religious backbone of Trinidad and Tobago's Indian population.

Afro-Trinidadians and Indo-Trinidadians, each with about 40 percent of the population, form the two largest segments. The 2000 census specifies that some 50 percent of Trinidad and Tobago's population regarded themselves as belonging to one of the Christian denominations (having lost since 1990 significantly), whereas 22.5 percent were Hindu, 10 percent were Jewish, 5.8 percent were Muslim, and 5.4 Spiritual or Shouter Baptists (traditional Caribbean with African roots). Among the Christian traditions, Roman Catholicism remained strongest, with 26 percent, followed by Anglicanism (7.8 percent), rapidly growing Pentecostal (6.8 percent), Seventh-day Adventism (4 percent), and Presbyterianism (3.3 percent). Many of the older Christian churches are members of the Christian Council of Trinidad and Tobago, which is in turn affiliated with the World Council of Churches. A strong inroad at the expense of Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism has been made by evangelical and Pentecostal groups since the 1970s. Although the public domain had long been dominated by Christian traditions, since the 1990s a more balanced representation of non-Christian faiths has come to the fore.

Martin Baumann

See also: Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of England; Presbyterian Church in Canada; Presbyterian Church in Trinidad; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritual Baptists; World Council of Churches.

References

- Brereton, Bridget. A History of Modern Trinidad 1783–1962. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Heinemann, 1981.
- Henry, Frances. Reclaiming African Religions in Trinidad: The Socio-Political Legitimation of the Orisha and Spiritual Baptist Faiths. University Press of the West Indies, 2003.
- Houk, James T. Spirits, Blood, and Drums: The Orisha Religion in Trinidad. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.
- Simpson, G. E. Religious Cults of the Caribbean. 3rd ed. Rio Pedras, Puerto Rico: Institute of Caribbean Studies, University of Puerto Rico, 1980.
- Vertovec, Steven. Hindu Trinidad. London: Macmillan, 1992.

Yelvington, Kevin A., ed. Trinidad Ethnicity. London: Macmillan, 1993.

Trinidad and Tobago, Hinduism in

The Hindu population in Trinidad and Tobago is significant for being the largest community of Hindus in the Caribbean region. They support more than 200 temples on an island about the size of the state of Delaware in the United States. Like other communities of South Asian origin in the region, they have drawn largely on northern Indian ritual traditions to form their contemporary, Caribbean Hindu practice of this ancient faith system.

Indians from South Asia, often in the Caribbean referred to as East Indians, migrated to Trinidad as indentured labor for cane and cacao estates between 1845 and 1917. What began as a system to meet an acute labor shortage in the wake of slave emancipation was maintained as a system that depressed local wages, thus dramatically increasing the total number of immigrants (more than 145,000). The vast majority of laborers were Hindu (87 percent) and came from the middle Gangetic Plain, although a relatively small number were recruited from the Madras Presidency. Despite the hardships and difficulties they found in Trinidad, many Indians remained, and, according to the 2000 census, they now compose 40 percent of the total population. Indians of the Hindu faith currently represent 56 percent of the Indian population and 23 percent of the total population—or approximately a quarter of a million adherents. The majority of migrants were lower caste, although those reputed to have “soft hands” (that is, Brahmins) also migrated in substantial numbers.

Hindu immigrants carried with them religious practices, many of which have been synthesized and transformed by the migration experience and socio-cultural milieu of colonial Trinidad. Caste distinctions have become muted, though not fully ignored in Trinidad today. Also, the majority of Hindus subscribe to their own ritual orthodoxy (that is essentially, but not exclusively, a Vaishnavite, Puranic, bhakti, and congregational-centered amalgam of practices) as defined by the Sanatan Dharma Maha Sabha—the strongest Hindu organization on the island. In addition, adherents of the Divine Life Society, the Sahya Sai Baba Movement, Vishwanath Parishad, Arya Samaj, and others can be found. One of the clearest examples of a Trinidadian Hindu culture can be seen in their temple architecture.

Children from Hindu schools throughout Trinidad take part in the Sanatan Dharma Maha Sabha 24th annual children's phagwa celebration at the Tunapuna Hindu School on March 7, 2004. Phagwa is the festival that signifies the beginning of spring on the Hindu calendar. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Hindu temple architecture in Trinidad has its clearest roots in the small priest-owned temples of the central Gangetic Plain during the middle of the 19th century. Essentially, Hindu migrants first depended on holy books, plants, and small statues of the deities (murtis) that they brought with them. Since folk deities are generally propitiated under trees throughout India, it is safe to assume that Hindus in Trinidad also continued that practice from the earliest time. Eventually, home shrines gave way to specially constructed traditional-style temples in the house yard or garden. The earliest known temples in Trinidad were erected by the 1860s and were mainly of bamboo wattle and daub construction with a thatch roof. By the 1880s more substantial structures were established in “clay brick” and stone. These traditional temples can still be found in Trinidad’s landscape and are relatively small (about 100 square feet) with a pyramidal or rounded dome (sikhara) enshrining the deities.

During the 1920s a new type of temple was introduced called the koutia. This is derived from a Bhojpuri Hindi term (kutia) that indicates a hut or simple hermitage. The architectural form derives from the Bhojpur region (central Gangetic Plain) of India, where the koutia’s significance lies in housing the person who takes care of the temple (pujari). In Trinidad, the koutia took on the function of an assembly hall (mandapa) when it was added to a traditional temple. Throughout the 1920s and 1930s itinerant swamis (invited from India) traveled from village to village. The koutia was ostensibly built to house them temporarily and as a meeting place in which to sing bhajans or read scripture after they left. Villages without a temple also built koutias to attract a swami’s visit. Afterward, villagers could use the koutia as a temple with the simple installation of a deity’s image. Eventually it became a temple in and of itself, though it is difficult to determine exactly when and where this first took place. Koutias are rectangular, rather than square, and have a flat, shed roof or low-angled gable roof. They rarely have sikharas, except in a few cases in which a dome was added to the front porch of the structure for decorative purposes. By this time, many different deities (primarily Sanskritic) might be installed in the same temple, thus making it possible to worship Mahadeva and Krishna in the same place. In this way, villagers need not travel to different locations to worship a specific deity.

The koutia temple evolved into the Trinidadian temple by the 1950s. The addition of a dome where the deities were enshrined successfully merged the traditional form with the koutia. Thus, the Trinidadian form is also rectangular, with a raised platform and dome at one end, and the rest of the structure extending away from it with space to seat several hundred people in the larger versions. Trinidadian temples always have a sikhara and an assembly hall attached to the domed area. Today it is common to see Trinidadian temples, Koutia temples, and traditional temples with or without a koutia attached. Often on Sundays a community-based ritual called satsang is held. Puja is performed, scripture is read and interpreted, and bhajans are sung by the group. In addition, yearly events called yagnas are held. This is a seven- to nine-day affair sponsored by a family or a village. In all cases, whether through temple architecture or congregational ritual, a very strong sense of Trinidadian Hindu identity is created and maintained.

Carolyn V. Prorok and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Arya Samaj; Divine Life Society; Sathya Sai Baba Movement; Vaishnavism.

References

- Khan, A. Callaloo Nation: Metaphors of Race and Religious Identity among South Asians in Trinidad. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2004.
- Laurence, K. O. A Question of Labour: Indentured Immigration into Trinidad and British Guiana, 1875–1917. London: James Currey, 1994.
- Prorok, C. V. "Evolution of the Hindu Temple in Trinidad." Caribbean Geography 3, no. 3 (1991): 73–93.
- Prorok, C. V. "Hindu Temples in Trinidad: A Cultural Geography of Religious Structures and Ethnic Identity." Ph.D. diss., Louisiana State University, 1988.
- Vertovec, S. Hindu Trinidad: Religion, Ethnicity and Socio-Economic Change. London: Macmillan Caribbean, 1992.

True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece

The True Orthodox Church of Greece was organized as a reaction to the adoption in 1924 of the New or Gregorian calendar by the Orthodox Church of Greece. In spite of pockets of opposition to the change, no priest rejected it until an extraordinary event, the appearance of a cross in the sky on September 14–15, 1925, the day celebrated as the Feast of the Elevation of the Holy Cross according to the Old, or Julian, calendar. As a result of that event, two priests announced their adherence to the Old calendar. However, it was the monks from Mount Athos who provided the strongest opposition to the New calendar and who took the lead in founding Old calendar churches. By 1934 there were some 800 such churches, in all parts of Greece.

As of the mid-1930s, no bishop had appeared in support of the Old Calendarists, but in 1935 three bishops left the Church of Greece and adhered to what had become known as the True Orthodox Church of Greece. They immediately consecrated four additional bishops, though two of the three original bishops then returned to the state church. Metropolitan Chrysostomos of Florina emerged as the leader of the True Church.

In 1937, Metropolitan Chrysostomos made a statement that while the state church had erred in adopting the New calendar, it had not lost the supernatural presence of God, and its sacraments were still valid. His statements were rejected by two of his bishops, both of whom formed separate factions, though most of their supporters returned to Chrysostomos's jurisdiction by 1950. At the same time, however, the state church launched a systematic, repressive effort that included an attack upon Old calendar priests, who were deprived of their clerical clothing and often beaten and shaved. Chrysostomos was sent into exile for a year in 1951. Released in 1952, he now was the only bishop left, and he died in 1955 without an episcopal successor. Orders for a new bishop were finally obtained in 1960 from the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia.

Archbishop Akakios headed the church from 1960 until his death in 1963. He was succeeded by Archbishop Auxentios. New controversy developed in 1974, when Archbishop Auxentios suggested, contrary to Metropolitan Chrysostomos, that the state church's sacraments were without grace. In response, two of the bishops adhering to Chrysostomos's more favorable moderate view consecrated a set of new bishops. Those who accepted Auxentios's position also consecrated more bishops, and two separate synods came into existence. Each synod itself split into two factions, leaving the Old calendar movement divided into at least five factions (including the group that had originally separated from Metropolitan Chrysostomos in the 1930s). Two of these factions merged, leaving the four factions (each with its separate synod) that exist today.

Three of the factions believe that grace has been removed from the sacraments of the state-supported Orthodox Church of Greece. Of those, the largest is led by Metropolitan Chrysostomos II. The moderate faction, which believed that the state church retained grace in its sacraments, eventually looked to Metropolitan Cyprian of Oropos and Fili as its leader. That branch of the Old calendar movement has been able to garner the support of the Old Rite Orthodox Church of Romania and the Old Calendar Church in Bulgaria. This faction is second in size to that led by Metropolitan Chrysostomos II, and in 1994 it entered into full communion with the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia. This branch is now known as the Old Calendar Orthodox Church of Greece, Holy Synod in Resistance. It has the largest American following of the several branches, its American diocese being based in the St. Gregory Palamas monastery in Etna, California.

In spite of the existence of the various factions, the members and clergy of the True Orthodox Church consider themselves as one body united by their disagreement with the stance of the Church of Greece regarding the calendar, and by their general opposition to the participation of the state church in various ecumenical endeavors. They claim some 200,000 adherents, about 120 parishes, and a number of monastic communities. Their churches have no electric lights or pews. Associated parishes are found in Australia and Canada. Each of the four factions also has congregations as well as a diocesan structure based in the United States.

Old Calendar Orthodox Church of Greece, Holy Synod in Resistance
c/o Holy Monastery of St. Cyprian
PO Box 46006
133 10 Ano Liosia
Greece

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church; Orthodox Church of Greece; Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia.

References

Chrysostomos, Archimandrite, with Hieromonk Ambrosios and Hieromonk Auxentios. The Old Calendar Church of Greece. Etna, CA: Center for Traditionalist Orthodox Studies, 1986.

Cyprian of Oropos and Fili, Metropolitan. The Heresy of Ecumenism and the Patristic Stand of the Orthodox. Etna, CA: Center for Traditional Orthodox Studies, 1998. http://www.synodinresistance.org/Publications_en/EBookB-4.pdf.

True Buddha School

The True Buddha School is a Vajrayana Buddhist organization founded by Master Sheng-Yen Lu (b. 1945), who was born and raised in Taiwan. As a young man he attended the military college and after graduating spent 10 years in the Taiwanese army as an officer. Just as he was beginning his army career, he had a spiritual awakening at a Daoist temple that led to his being able to travel into spiritual worlds, receive messages from the host of both Daoist and Buddhist deities, especially Guan Yin, and become psychically aware. Along with his work in the army, he became an avid student of religion.

Through the years of his army career, he had numerous spiritual encounters that, along with his studies, led to his becoming an Enlightened Master. He also founded a Daoist temple in 1975 and began to build a following. Many who found their way to him did so from his many popular books (some 200 titles by 2008). Lu also found himself on a spiritual pilgrimage that took him from Daoism to Pure Land Buddhism to Vajrayana Buddhism. He would eventually inherit a Gelugpa Tibetan Buddhist lineage that passed through the Venerable Gon Zhu, a Mongolian lama who became the first Vajrayana teacher to settle in Taiwan. After completing his army service, Lu began for the first time to allow his followers to formally take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha through him. Today, the True Buddha School offers standard Tibetan Buddhist teachings but also continues some of Daoist and Pure Land teachings and practice reflective of Lu's early spiritual pilgrimage.

In 1982, Lu moved to Washington state, in the United States, and built a large temple in suburban Seattle. Two years later he was able to announce his enlightenment and he formally reorganized his following as the True Buddha School. Within a short time he had named the first masters (teachers) and chartered the first chapters. His followers consider him a Living Buddha: an emanation of the White Padmakumara (later revealed to be Amitabha Buddha). Master Sheng-Yen had traveled spiritually to the Pure Land, where he realized that he is an emanation of Padmakumara incarnated in the present as a human being in order to assist the liberation of sentient beings.

The True Buddha School teaches a form of Gelugpa Buddhism that begins for members in their taking refuge in the Three Gems of Buddhism—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha (that is, Buddha, Truth, and Fellowship)—and additionally in the guru, their teacher. Members are taught a form of Buddhist practice that includes a daily cultivation through the recitation of Buddhist sutras, the calling upon the name of Amitabha Buddha (as in Pure Land Buddhism), and visualization of their receiving empowerment from the pantheon of Buddhist deities. This practice is believed to lead individuals to Buddhahood (enlightenment).

Those seeking to follow the Dharma are advised to seek initiation from a true guru (Master Sheng-Yen). To take refuge in the Living Buddha and become a student of the True Buddha School, one may come to the school's headquarters, now located in the state of Washington in the United States, and receive direct Initiation Empowerment, or one can, on the 1st or 15th of any lunar month, at 7:00 a.m., recite the Fourfold Refuge Mantra ("Namo Guru bei, namo Buddha ye, namo Dharma ye, namo Sangha ye") while prostrating oneself. On those same days each month, Master Sheng-Yen Lu performs a ceremony of "Remote Initiation Empowerment." One may also go to a True Buddha School center and receive initiation. Those who receive initiation are instructed in the daily practice that is expected of a True Buddha School member.

The True Buddha School has become a global institution with more than 300 local chapters and some 30 major temples in more than 20 countries, from Japan to Australia, Brazil, and the United Kingdom, most found in Southeast Asia—Taiwan, Malaysia, and Indonesia. In Indonesia, the movement has made contact with a number of villages in central Java that have practiced Vajrayana Buddhism for many centuries. Leadership is vested in a hierarchy of monks and nuns and volunteer workers. Heading the leadership are the masters, most of whom (all but a few named in the early years of the movement) are monks or nuns.

Temples are locally owned, and they and the many chapters associate with the larger movement by recognizing Grand Master Lu as their guru. International coordination is provided by the True Buddha Foundation, which is headed by a board of masters elected by their peers. Twice annually in the spring and fall, large international gatherings are held at the main temple in suburban Seattle.

The True Buddha School is one of a half dozen new Buddhist groups to emerge in Taiwan in the last generation, but is unique in adopting a Vajrayana perspective—a fact that has set it in opposition to some of the Taiwanese-based Chan and Pure Land organizations. Some five million people have taken refuge in Grand Master Lu, though only a minority of those have gone on to become active members of the school and attendees at one of its centers.

True Buddha School
17012 NE 40th Ct.
Redmond, WA 98052
<http://www.tbsn.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Enlightenment; Pure Land Buddhism; Tantrism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Lu Sheng-Yen. A Complete and Detailed Exposition on the True Buddha Tantric Dharma. Trans. by Janny Chow. Union City, CA: Purple Lotus Society of USA, 1996.
- Lu Sheng-Yen. The Inner World of the Lake. Trans. by Janny Chow. San Bruno, CA: Amitabha, 1992.
- Lu Sheng-Yen. Introduction to True Buddha School. 2d ed. Trans. by Yuan Zheng Tang. Singapore: Yuan Zheng Tang, 1993.
- Lu Sheng-Yen. An Overview of the Buddhadharmas. Trans. by Janny Chow. Union City, CA: Purple Lotus Society of USA, 1996.
- Melton, J. Gordon. The Affirmation of Charismatic Authority: The Case of the True Buddha School." The Australian Religious Studies Review 20, no. 3 (Summer, 2007): 286–302.

Tam Wai-lun. "Integration of the Magical and Cultural Discourses: A Study of the New Religious Movement Called the True Buddha School." Monumenta Serica 49 (2001): 141–169.

Tam Wai-lun. "Re-examining the True Buddha School: A 'New Religion' or a New 'Buddhist Movement'?" Australian Religion Studies Journal 20, no. 3 (Summer 2007): 303–316.

True Jesus Church

The True Jesus Church was an early product of the introduction of Pentecostalism into China. Among the pioneers was Alfred Goodrich Garr, Jr. (1874–1944), and his wife, Lillian Anderson Garr, who had received the baptism of the Holy Spirit in Los Angeles in 1906 and soon afterward left for China believing that Lillian spoke Chinese when speaking in tongues. They arrived in Hong Kong in October 1907 and were soon disappointed to discover that Lillian could not speak a word of Chinese. The disconfirmation of his wife's xenoglossia led Garr to conclude that tongues speaking was primarily (if not exclusively) for self-edification, an idea he left behind in China when the couple soon returned to the United States. Pentecostalism subsequently spread from Hong Kong to other Chinese cities.

Among the first people to find their way to the early community of Pentecostals in Shanghai was Lin-Shen Chang (b. 1863), a Presbyterian deacon, who in 1909 began a quest for the baptism of the Holy Spirit. After associating with the fledgling Pentecostal community for several weeks, he returned to his hometown, Tienjin, where on December 21, 1909, he was baptized with the Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues. At about this same time, he reported that God had also revealed to him the importance of observing the seventh-day Sabbath.

Several years later, Paul Wei (aka Wei Enbo, d. 1919), an adherent of the mission begun by the London Missionary Society (British Congregationalists) in Beijing, became seriously ill and found his health through the prayer and the laying on of hands at the local Pentecostal fellowship. Subsequently, like Chang, while praying at his home, he also received the baptism of the Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues. The experience led him to found a house church. At a later date, while engaged in a period of fasting, Wei received an additional revelation about water baptism—it should be in the name of Jesus Christ, "head bowed in the living water." After his revelation, Wei began preaching services under the name International Reformed Jesus True Church. In 1917, the name was shortened to simply True Jesus Church.

In 1918 Lin-Shen Chang (b. 1863) made his way to the True Jesus Church, where he met and convinced Wei that the church should observe the seventh-day Sabbath. Wei, Chang, and another early co-worker, Barnabas Chang (or Zhang Banaba, 1882–ca. 1960), founded the True Jesus Church. Barnabas Chang had been converted by Lin-Shen Chang in 1912 and later ordained by Paul Wei in 1919. Paul Wei died in 1919, only a year after the True Jesus Church was constituted, and Barnabas Chang defected from the movement in 1929 and created a rival organization in Hong Kong.

The True Jesus Church emerged as a unique body within the larger Pentecostal movement—Sabbatarian and non-Trinitarian. But as the church developed, other unique elements were incorporated into its life. Like most Protestant groups, it accepted the two ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, but also included the third ordinance of foot washing. It also taught that the act of baptism, done in response to God's command, cleanses the believer of his or her sin, a position known as baptismal regeneration, which is still taught in some Baptist and Restoration church groups. The truth of the regenerating power of baptism was confirmed to the True Jesus Church leaders by the many accounts of healing miracles that occurred to people as they were baptized.

The proper mode of baptism is full immersion while the believer's head is bowed. The True Jesus Church makes room for infant baptism, citing as biblical justification the Hebrew practice of circumcision on the eighth day after birth (baptism taking the place of circumcision for Christians) and Jesus welcoming the children (Matthew 13). Communion is closed, and only those who have been baptized can receive the Lord's Supper, or holy Communion.

Congregation of the True Jesus Church, East Malaysia. (J. Gordon Melton)

The True Jesus Church practice of speaking in tongues is unique within the larger Pentecostal movement. In most Pentecostal churches, only one person will speak in tongues at any one time, and only a few people will speak in tongues during any given worship service. In stark contrast, in the True Jesus Church, speaking in tongues usually occurs as a group act, with all engaging in prayer at the same time (as long as 15 to 20 minutes or more). To the True Jesus Church, prayer in tongues is directed to God and does not need interpretation. Since, following Garr's lead, the primary function of tongues is self-edification, and no interpretation follows, there is no need to limit those who speak.

The True Jesus Church message spread rapidly. From the Chinese mainland the movement found its way to Taiwan (1927), throughout Southeast Asia (1927), and to Hawaii (1930). Headquarters of the church moved first to Nanjing (1926), and then to Shanghai (1927).

The True Jesus Church was one of the largest Christian denominations in China at the time of the Chinese Revolution and the establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949. In the 1950s, communication between members inside and outside of China became difficult and the church was suppressed during the Cultural Revolution. In the 1980s, it began to make a comeback, as a fellowship within the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement (the main Protestant church body within China). Today it reports an estimated one million adherents.

Members outside of China established headquarters in Taiwan and continued to operate throughout the Chinese diaspora. Gradually, the leadership accepted the fact that it might be some time before contact was reestablished with their brothers and sisters within China. In 1975, delegates to the church's World Conference in Taiwan created the International Assembly of the True Jesus Church. In 1985 leaders relocated the principal office of the International Assembly to Los Angeles, California. Subsequently, four evangelical centers have been established for America, Europe, Northeast Asia, and Southeast Asia.

The True Jesus Church sees itself as the restored Apostolic Church of the End Time that has received the divine revelation of Truth through the Holy Spirit. That Truth has been confirmed through various signs and miracles. The name is also assigned spiritual meaning: God is "True" (John 3:33, 17:3; 1 Thessalonians 1:9) and "Jesus" designated himself the "Truth" (John 14:6), or the "true Vine" (John 15:1). The author of the Gospel of John called him the "true Light" (John 1:9). God called and established the "Church" (Acts 15:14–18). It is believed that the church should bear God's name—that is "Jesus" (Matthew 1:21; John 17:11, 26). The True Jesus Church thus exalts the name of God and considers itself the Christ.

The church's doctrinal position is quite similar to the non-Trinitarian, Apostolic, or "Jesus Only" perspective. It teaches that the reception of the Holy Spirit is necessary for entering the kingdom of God, and that speaking in tongues is the sign of that reception.

In 2008 the church reported 1.5 million members residing in 48 countries, the majority of those being in China. The church had 23 congregations in the United States and 5 in Canada.

True Jesus Church
314 S. Brookhurst St., #104
Anaheim, CA 92804
<http://www.tjc.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council; London Missionary Society; Pentecostalism; Sabbatarianism.

References

The Five Biblical Doctrines. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1995.

Liu, Garland. "The Role of the True Jesus Church in the Communal Development of the Chinese People in Elgin, Scotland." In The Last Half Century of Chinese Overseas, edited by Elizabeth Sinn, 425–446. Aberdeen, Hong Kong: Hong Kong University Press, 1998.

Return to the True Church. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1995.

Rubenstein, Murray. "Evangelical Spring: The Origin of the True Jesus Church on Taiwan, 1925–1926." Society for Pentecostal Studies Annual Papers (1986).

Speaking in Tongues: A Biblical Perspective. Garden Grove, CA: Words of Life Publishing House, 1996.

Yang, John. Essential Biblical Doctrine. Garden Grove, CA: Word of Life Publishing House, 1997.

Tsong Khapa

1357–1419

Tsong Khapa was a reformer credited with revitalizing the philosophical, ritual, and meditative practice of Buddhism and recognized as the founder of the Gelugpa School of Tibetan Buddhism. The Gelugpa School is the dominant school in Tibetan Buddhism and the one to which the Dalai Lama belongs. Tsong Khapa, however, is recognized by all schools and sects of Tibetan Buddhism as one of the foremost exemplars in their shared history. He is known to devotees as "Je Rinpoche" (Precious Master), and is regarded as an enlightened being.

Tsong Khapa was born in the Amdo Province of eastern Tibet in 1357, but according to his traditional spiritual biography, his life story begins long before his birth. According to his hagiography, in a previous life, Tsong Khapa lived in the time of Gautama Buddha (563–483 BCE), the founder of Buddhism. As a boy, he offered a crystal rosary to the Buddha, who gave him a conch shell in return and prophesied that in a future life he would be a great teacher born in Tibet named Losang Drakpa—the name given to Tsong Khapa when he took his novice monastic vows at seven years of age. Further, it was reported that Tsong Khapa's birth was heralded by the auspicious dreams of his mother and father. Followers acknowledge him as the emanation of two divine personages, the Bodhisattvas of Compassion and Wisdom—Avalokitesvara (aka Guan Yin) and Manjusri.

As a young monk, Tsong Khapa assumed a broad approach to Buddhism and studied under the best teachers of his day from the several different lineages. He was ordained as a child by the fourth Karmapa of the Karma Kagyu School and his main teacher was the master, Rendawa, of the Sakya School. In the end, his own study and mature understanding led him to establish a new school of Buddhism in Tibet, the Gelug, which means “System of Virtue.” He established the center of his reformed movement at Ganden Monastery near Lhasa. Ganden is the Tibetan name for the heavenly realm in which Maitreya (the Buddha of the future) resides as he waits for the right moment to take birth.

Tsong Khapa rose to prominence in his day because of his profound understanding of Buddhist teachings, his skill in debate, and his accomplishments in meditation practice. He completed a number of long retreats lasting for four and five years at a time. On one such retreat he is said to have prepared himself by doing three and a half million prostrations. The stone floor with grooves worn into it where he performed the prostrations has survived to the present and still inspires Gelugpa followers as they undertake their practice. Of Tsong Khapa’s writings, the most important are The Golden Rosary of the Good Explanations, a commentary on the Perfection of Wisdom sutras; The Great Exposition of Secret Mantra (Ngakrim Chenmo); and the work that forms the foundation practice of the Gelugpa School, The Great Exposition of the Stages of the Path (Lamrim Chenmo). Tsong Khapa focused his reformation on the restoration of pure monastic discipline and the reconciliation of the Tantric practices, which includes esoteric sexual practices, with monastic vows.

Four great deeds mark Tsong Khapa’s life: (1) the restoration of a Maitreya statue in Lhasa carried out at the end of a four-year retreat in which he and eight disciples received a vision of Maitreya; (2) a clear and profound teaching on the rules of the monastic discipline; (3) the offering of a golden crown to a statue of Gautama Buddha in Lhasa when he inaugurated the Monlam Great Prayer Festival that begins the Tibetan New Year; and (4) the building of the great hall of Ganden Monastery.

Tsong Khapa died at the age of 62 in his bedroom, now known as Tri Thok Khang, one of the Buddha halls at Ganden Monastery. That room still houses some of Tsong Kapa’s clothing. It is said that he died sitting in meditation and that his body appeared to his disciples as a body of rainbow light. Subsequently, his body was placed in the nearby Holy Stupa Hall in a silver pagoda. Eventually the 13th Dalai Lama covered the pagoda with gold.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Gelugpa; Guan Yin’s Birthday; Meditation; Tantrism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Hopkins, Jeffrey. Tsong-Kha-Pa’s Final Exposition of Wisdom. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion Publications, 2008.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion Publications, 1995.
- Thurman, Robert A. F., ed. The Life and Teachings of Tsong Khapa. Dharamsala, India: Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, 1982.

■ Tunisia

Tunisia, a North African county on the Mediterranean Sea, lies between Libya and Algeria. Its 63,200 square miles of territory offer a varied geographic landscape from a mountainous northeast, to the desert south, to the lengthy coast line. It is home to some 10,400,000 people (2008).

Tunisia was originally the home of the Berbers; later it became the base from which a series of very different cultures reached out through the Mediterranean Basin. The ancient city of Carthage (located not far from modern Tunis) was established by the Phoenicians around 800 BCE. It became the center of a sizable empire that eventually fell to Rome. In 146 BCE, Rome razed the city. The Vandals overran the Romans in 439 CE. They were in turn driven out by the expanding Byzantine Empire in 533. Finally, in 670, the

Great Mosque of Kairouan, Tunisia. (Evgeniapp/Dreamstime.com)

Arabs moved across North Africa, bringing with them Islam.

Tunisia was incorporated into the Almohad Empire based in Morocco in the 12th century. As that empire fell apart, the Berbers reasserted themselves, and Tunisia subsequently remained independent until the coming of the Ottomans in the 16th century. After centuries of control by various Muslim forces, Tunisia was invaded by the French, who in 1882 overran Tunisia and made it a protectorate. French control of the area was acknowledged by Britain in return for their loss of a role in the Suez Canal.

As early as 1925, Tunisians organized to demand independence. Only after three years of armed conflict (1952–1955) did France relent and in 1956 recognize Tunisia’s autonomy. A year later a republic was proclaimed and a president representing the Destur Party elected. Tunisia was transformed into a Socialist state until financial problems forced a more open economy.

The country has since moved toward a more democratized, secularized, and Westernized position.

Islam is both the dominant and official religion of the country. The great majority of the population follow the Sunni Malikite School. The legal structure of the country demands that the president be a Muslim, and it prevents attempts at proselytization by representatives of other religions.

Although most believers follow the Malikite School, there is a significant number of Kharjites on the island of Djerba. In the 1980s a strong fundamentalist movement emerged to oppose the further Westernization and secularization of the country. Included in the critique of the country was a protest of the un-Islamic role assumed by women and the immorality of tourists who flocked to the country’s Mediterranean beaches. In 1992, Tunisia’s president, Zina El Abidene, denounced the fundamentalists to a gathering of Arab government ministers in Tunis.

TUNISIA

Before the arrival of Islam, Tunisia had been the home of a vital Christian community. It was there at the beginning of the fourth century that the Donatist controversy erupted over the role of those who had betrayed their faith during times of persecution. The Donatists rejected the appointment of such people to positions of leadership. They argued that the efficacy of the sacraments depends upon the purity of the priest who delivers them. In reaction to Donatism, Augustine, the bishop of Hippo (354–430), developed arguments for the use of state power to suppress heretical ideas. An episcopal structure existed in Tunisia until at least the 11th century.

The Roman Catholic Church attempted to re-establish itself in Tunisia at various times but did not build a real following until the 19th century, and that among expatriates. In 1843 a prefecture was erected, and a new archbishop of Carthage was named in 1884. The church grew through the first half of the 20th century, primarily among the French and others who had moved to the country. In like measure, following independence, with the emigration of most Europeans who had lived there, the church suffered considerably. In 1957 the church turned over 65 of its 70 church buildings to the state. Today the church is led by a bishop who resides in Tunis.

Tunisia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	5,077,000	10,604,000	99.4	1.11	12,090,000	13,062,000
Christians	33,400	29,300	0.3	−0.59	28,900	30,500
Roman Catholics	25,000	19,500	0.2	−1.89	17,000	16,000
Independents	7,100	8,100	0.1	3.02	10,000	12,000
Protestants	630	700	0.0	2.31	900	1,500
Agnostics	3,000	22,000	0.2	1.06	40,000	70,000
Atheists	1,000	3,500	0.0	1.03	5,000	7,000
Baha'is	400	2,200	0.0	1.10	4,000	6,000
Jews	12,000	2,500	0.0	−1.00	2,500	2,500
Total population	5,127,000	10,664,000	100.0	1.11	12,170,000	13,178,000

Anglicans entered Tunisia in 1829 with a mission directed toward the Jewish community, which at the time was 100,000 strong. The mission opened two schools for Jewish children that soon were also serving the Muslim community. Today the work continues under the direction of the Diocese of Egypt of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. In 1881 the North African Mission began work in Tunis, and over the next decades it expanded to seven centers. Its work was significantly disrupted by World War II, and most of its centers were closed. In 1962 the mission started a popular Bible-study correspondence course that enrolled some 20,000 people before the government became aware of it and forced its withdrawal in 1964. Subsequently, the mission moved its work to France. The same year that the Mission began, the Reformed Church of France began its work serving French Protestants in Tunisia. The Reformed Church in Tunisia still maintains one congregation of 100 members in Tunis.

During the years of French rule, the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1905), Methodists (1908, from America), and Pentecostals from the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1911) established work. A short time later the Greek and Russian Orthodox churches organized a parish for their members who had moved to Tunis to work.

Jews had resided in Carthage prior to the coming of the Christians, and their community survived the changing of governments through the years. In 1881 they had been granted equal rights with the Muslim community, and they had been promised that those rights would be guaranteed by the independent government established in 1957. When they were not, many Jews decided to leave. Over the next decade, the population of the community dropped from 100,000 to 25,000. Many moved to France, others moved to Israel. As the century came to an end, only 3,000 remained. They were found in Tunis, Sfax, and Sousse. There is also a group of Jews on Jerba Island, where an ancient synagogue, El Ghriba, is located. The community is headed by the Grand Rabbinate of Tunisia, located in Tunis.

Like other North African countries with an established Muslim faith, Tunisia has proved unattractive to the many new religions that arose through the 20th century. There are, however, a small number of Baha'is.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Malikite School of Islam; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Clancy-Smith, Julia A. Rebel and Saint: Muslim Notables, Populist Protest, Colonial Encounters (Algeria and Tunisia, 1800–1904). Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Cooley, J. K. Baal, Christ and Mohammed: Religion and Revolution in North Africa. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1965.
- De Sainte-Marie. La Tunisie chrétienne. Lyon, France: Bureaux des Missions Catholiques, 1878.

Fluehr-Lobban, C. Islamic Society in Practice.

Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.

Perkins, Kenneth. A History of Modern Tunisia.

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Shahin, E. E. A. The Restitution of Islam: A Comparative Study of the Islamic Movements in Contemporary Tunisia and Morocco. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University, 1990.

Udovitch, A. Last Arab Jews: The Communities of Jerba, Tunisia. London: Routledge, 1986.

■ Turkey

Turkey, known in ancient times as Asia Minor, is technically an Asian country with a small part of its land west of the Bosphorus Strait in Europe. It lies south of the Black Sea and north of the Mediterranean Sea. To the east it borders Syria, Iraq, Iran, Armenia, and Georgia. The European portion of the country borders Greece and Bulgaria. Modern Turkey includes 301,400 square miles of territory, which is home to 75,200,000 residents (2007). Kurds, who make up about 20 percent of the country's citizens, form the largest minority group within the dominant Turkish population.

Asia Minor has been home to civilizations reaching back to Pagan times and Anatolia (modern-day Turkey) remains the homeland of numerous cultures, mostly of mixed ethnic origin. Theories indicate a link between Sumerians, Hittites, and Turks because they spoke agglutinative languages and are believed to have come into southern Mesopotamia more than 6,000 years ago from Central Asia. Western culture associates Turkey with the Troy of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, as well as tales of the fabled kings Midas (725–696 BCE) and Croesus (560–547). By the sixth century, Turkey was home to the philosophies of Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, who were natives of Miletus. Before Athens emerged, Hellenic culture flourished in Anatolia until the invasion of Cyrus the Great (550–530), who drove the culture to Athens. The conquests of Alexander the Great (334) helped revive Hellenic thought through the Middle East, and during the Roman era, Anatolia had enormous libraries that rivaled Alexandria's in Egypt. The last Anatolian king bequeathed his kingdom to Rome (133), which established a capital at Ephesus from which it ruled fairly peacefully for six centuries.

Rooftops and minarets of Istanbul, Turkey. (PhotoDisc, Inc.)

Turkey played a key role in the development of Christianity. Its foremost proponent was Paul, a Jew from Tarsus. He trekked the excellent Roman road system to spread the new religion. His first journey took him to Antioch, Perga, Iconium, Derbe, Attalia, and other cities in Anatolia. His Epistle to the Galatians, the ninth book of the Christian New Testament, was addressed to people of the Galatian region, where descendants of the Gauls (Celts) had pioneered the interior. He took three missionary trips (recorded in the book of Acts) and ran into difficulty in Ephesus, where silversmiths engaged in creating statues of Diana/Cybele/Astarte felt that he threatened their livelihoods. Other figures, such as John the Apostle, were reported to have taken Mary, the mother of Jesus, to Ephesus, where a small chapel to her celebrates Mass on August 15, which is believed to be her Ascension Day. The author of the biblical book of Revelation, writing from the Isle of Patmos off the Turkish coast, addressed his words to the seven churches of Asia, all in Anatolia: Ephesus, Izmir, Pergamum, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and Thyatira.

TURKEY

The Ecumenical Council of Nicaea of 325 CE proved a major milestone in developing Christian doctrine. Five years later, the Emperor Constantine dedicated the city of Byzantium as a new Rome. He was a deathbed convert to Christianity, and his new holy city, Constantinople, would be the seat of the Roman Empire. Eventually, the metropolitan of Constantinople would be given a higher status than those in other Mediterranean cities (Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome), thus foreshadowing the Great Schism of 1054, when the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy split. While the barbarians across the Mediterranean were laying siege and weakening Rome, Constantinople thrived. Emperor Justinian (527–565) reconquered the Balkans, Italy, Anatolia, Egypt, and North Africa, while embellishing the architectural structures of the Byzantine Empire. The Church of Holy Wisdom, or St. Sophia, in Constantinople became the most highly acclaimed church in Christendom, unrivaled for 1,000 years.

By the late 13th century, Byzantine rule had declined in power. Within 50 years of the Prophet Muhammad's death, a new religion founded in Saudi Arabia, Islam (submission to God's will), had conquered all of Anatolia and threatened the walls of Constantinople (669–678). Muhammad, the prophet of this new religion, died, and was succeeded by caliphs (deputies) whose job was to oversee the welfare of Islam. Two great dynasties emerged: the Umayyads (661–750), based in Damascus, and the Abbasids (750–1100), who ruled from Baghdad. Both challenged the Christians of Byzantium.

For a brief time the Great Seljuk Turkish Empire (1037–1109), based in Persia, hammered away at Anatolia. In 1071, Seljuk armies defeated the Byzantine force at Manzikert and captured their emperor. They subsequently took most of Turkey and established a capital near Nicaea. They ruled what are now Iran, Iraq, and Turkey, developed beautiful architectural designs, and produced the noted poet Omar Kayyam (d. 1123). Celaleddin Rumi (1207–1273), or “Mevlana,” founder of the Mevlana Whirling Dervish order of Sufis, made the century's outstanding contribution to religious poetry and mysticism.

Byzantine culture was weakened by the assertion of Islam. However, the fatal blow to its glory occurred from fellow Christians during the Fourth Crusade (1202–1204). A disheveled European Christian army invaded and plundered Constantinople, doing irreparable damage. While the Byzantines were attempting to recover, legions of Turks running before the Mongols took over areas of the Marmara and Aegean coasts. Under Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent (1520–1566), these Turks finally conquered Constantinople (1453) and made it the capital of their new Ottoman Empire. Suleiman also initiated efforts to incorporate Europe in the Ottoman Empire. After overrunning the Balkans, his successors were finally turned back at Vienna in 1529. As they conquered new territories, the Ottoman sultans placed the non-Muslim religious leadership of each community (including the Orthodox patriarch in Constantinople and the chief rabbi) in political positions responsible directly to the sultan.

During the early 19th century, subject peoples revolted against Ottoman rule. In 1832, the Kingdom of Greece was formed as the Romanians, Bulgarians, Armenians, Arabs, and Albanians successfully agitated for their freedom. European powers watched as the debilitated empire began to come apart. France and England stood ready to occupy and annex the Ottoman territories, using religion as the excuse: to protect Catholic, Protestant, or Orthodox subjects from the Islamic Turks.

The empire sided with Germany in World War I and lost. The last blow to the weakened dynasty was dealt when Greek armies invaded Turkey and the Turkish War for Independence (1920–1922) began. Turks repelled the invading armies under General Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938). The charismatic Kemal took control as the empire collapsed. He abolished both the sultanate and the Islamic caliphate. Treaties from World War I were renegotiated. As a result, 1.5 million Greeks in Turkey returned to Greece, and Turks in Greece were brought back to Anatolia. Earlier turmoil (1915–1917) had seen 600,000 Armenians and Chaldeans massacred before they could leave the country. Now the survivors emigrated rapidly, and the number of Christians in Turkey dropped drastically.

Kemal established a republic in 1923, and a secular Constitution was adopted in 1924. The new republic abandoned Islam as the state religion and ordered the abolishment of all mystical orders. Both the wearing of the fez and the practice of polygamy were also outlawed. A new Latin alphabet was designed, and Persian and Arabic words purged from the Turkish language. The Gregorian calendar replaced both the Muslim lunar and the older Julian calendars. In 1930, Constantinople was renamed Istanbul. In 1934, the government granted women the right to vote. By then, Kemal had adopted the name Ataturk, or Father Turk. He ruled by fiat through the Republican People's Party until his death on November 10, 1938.

Turkey remained neutral during World War II. Years of postwar turmoil finally led the military to intercede in 1980 to stabilize the situation. Two major trajectories have continued to clash in modern Turkey: the secular understanding of Ataturk and continuing Islamic ideals that look to the union of religion and state. These tensions remain as a modern Turkish state supplanted the traditional religiously ruled empire. These tensions were heightened following the introduction of Western global and technical cultures. Modern Turkey exists between modernity and traditionalism.

Republican secularists abandoned the Islamic world and condemned the practices in the popular folk religion deemed superstitious or unscientific. Authorities also removed economic, political, and social roles from mosques. Religion was limited to personal choice instead of imposed by government mandate. Traditionalists viewed these actions, especially the change to the Western calendar, as an immediate danger to the supremacy of Islam. On a social level, cooperation and integration have not occurred between secularists and non-secularists, leaving Turkey straddling two worlds and thus offering the appearance of cultural instability.

Since Ottoman times, Sunni Islam, of the Hanafite School, has been the religion of the Turkish people, and it continues to be the most noticed and supported religious practice. Hanafite precepts remain the unifying factor in a strident cultural identity. Concurrently, paradoxical practices of folk Islam include fortune telling, astrology, divination, manipulation of spirits, sorcery, the wearing of amulets such as the Mediterranean eye, the circumcision of boys, and praying at the tombs of saints. Despite these deviations from the orthodox, Muslims acknowledge the primacy of an enduring piety in orthodoxy. It is paradoxical that even as Turkish secularism attempts to divorce religion and government, the Department of Religious Affairs (Diyanet) promotes Sunni Islam. About 15 percent of the population are Shia Muslims, considered heterodox by the Sunni majority, as are the small group of Yezidis near Diyarbakir.

Islam is not systematically organized in the manner of Western churches. There are no membership lists or formal bodies to petition for membership. Everyone born into a Muslim family is considered a Muslim unless they deny it. Turks carry national identity cards, and 99 percent of them state Islam as their religion. Secularists rarely change them. An inner sense of belonging is the criterion for inclusiveness. Turks normally do not ask about personal religious beliefs. Male circumcision is non-canonical, but it is ritually practiced with boys between the ages of 7 and 12.

A major factor in the social, ethnic, and political turmoil in Turkey is the question of what to do about the Kurds who live in eastern Turkey and in the mountains bordering Iraq. Kurdish populations wish to maintain their language, social customs, and mores. The official position of Turkey for some years was that these people are mountain Turks and that they should abide by the rules and laws of Turkey. Genocide and mass migration to Europe have caused their numbers to dwindle. The Kurds are primarily Sunnite, but many are Shias of the Alevi tradition. Turkey has no accurate statistics on these minority religious and ethnic groups who do not subscribe to mainstream Turkish tradition. There are also small numbers of Tahtacis and Ahl-el-Hak who are separatist groups but usually pass for Muslim.

Islam is widely manifest in the form of folk piety. For example, Turks generally keep their Korans in high places, as they are believed to provide protection against evil thoughts. Some time ago it was believed that to carry a small Koran would also ward off bullets.

Today, those who carry them do so above the waist. Many write and then sew verses from the Koran into their clothing for spiritual healing. Reciting a verse before bedtime may protect the home from burglars, and before traveling is considered a good omen. Children recite verses to protect them when alone or finding themselves in atypical situations.

There are pious expressions peppered throughout Turkish speech patterns. Inshallah means “if Allah wills” and can be used in the positive as a salutation or departure term, or when negativity is present. Mashallah praises Allah and means “O, what Allah has willed” and is used consistently in daily life. The bismele—“I begin in the name of Allah, the most merciful, the most compassionate”—is normative for canonical prayer and is used before any day-to-day activities. Every call to prayer starts with the tekbir phrase Allahu Akbar: “It is Allah who is magnificent.” The expression Ya Allah—“O, Allah”—is used when changing position from something passive to active. Today, some secularists attempt to strip the Turkish language of religious connotations, while others consider greetings such as aley kum selam—“May the peace, health, and security of Allah be with you”—to be normative for verbal interchange.

Prayer beads are widely used, especially with Sufi groups. Other groups use them also as “worship using the fingers.” The repetitive verses calling on Allah, zikir, find confirmation that each prayer has been recited 33 times. Some people carry beads to handle when worried, and that cultural routine is not religious but comforting in a secular way.

Some people wear the blue “evil-eye” bead or attach it to Turkish belongings. At times, the Mashallah, which means “O, what Allah has willed,” accompanies it. The bead is a form of folk religion that wards off the evil eye. Some people are thought to have the propensity to gaze at others and inadvertently harm them, although they themselves are well-meaning people. Villagers cover the faces of beautiful babies, or tie sacks around the udders of milk cows when outdoors to protect the production of milk from the evil eye. This evil-eye figure predates Islam and the immigration of Turkish-speaking peoples in the Middle East.

Where folk traditions predominate, one also finds shamans. The shaman, or hodja, is believed to be gifted with metaphysical powers. When Islam is used as the format for divining procedures, the hodja is called a Muslim shaman. People for whom contemporary medicine and psychology have failed frequently turn to the hodjas.

The idea of receiving knowledge about a certain circumstance through dreaming is believed to have been taught by Muhammad. There are Muslims who live by their dreams and perform acts of ablution as preparation for dreaming, because ritual impurity negates the authenticity of the dreamer. Ataturk took severe action against hodjas and mediums, sometimes jailing them. Today, folk practices are common, and there are many secularized people who take horoscopes, evil eye beads, and the work of hodjas quite seriously.

At the beginning of World War I, Christians made up about 20 percent of the Turkish population. In 1914 the Roman Catholics had 4 archdioceses and 16 dioceses. The shuffling of populations, emigrations, and especially the mass execution of Armenians significantly reduced the Christian presence. The majority of Christians are Orthodox, though they are scattered in different jurisdictions. The see of the Ecumenical Patriarchate is in Istanbul. He has status and prestige but is without power to intervene in Turkish matters. He has few followers in Turkey proper, his status coming from his far-flung international jurisdiction, which includes the Greek Orthodox in all of the non-Orthodox countries of Europe, the Greek islands of the Aegean Sea, Mount Athos, Crete, and the Americas.

The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East has five congregations in Turkey; the Bulgarian Orthodox Church has two churches and an ex-arch in Istanbul; the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) has a congregation in Istanbul; and the Serbian Orthodox Church has a small membership in the country. Non-Chalcedon Oriental Orthodox are separated into two distinct communities, the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin) and the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East (Syro-Jacobite). Together they make up the bulk of the Christian population in Turkey, about 225,000 people. There is also a minuscule Turkish Orthodox Church, the result of a largely unsuccessful attempt to create an indigenous national Orthodoxy separate from the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

Turkey

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	35,747,000	75,670,000	97.4	1.38	86,919,000	95,727,000
Agnostics	30,000	1,500,000	1.9	1.42	2,000,000	2,500,000
Christians	290,000	214,000	0.3	0.28	222,000	224,000
Orthodox	222,000	115,000	0.1	−0.89	100,000	90,000
Roman Catholics	26,500	31,000	0.0	−0.30	26,000	22,000
Anglicans	2,000	22,000	0.0	0.00	22,000	22,000
New religionists	64,000	136,000	0.2	1.37	160,000	177,000
Atheists	10,000	68,000	0.1	1.52	100,000	115,000
Buddhists	5,000	40,000	0.1	1.37	60,000	80,000
Jews	37,000	24,000	0.0	1.37	24,000	24,000
Baha'is	3,700	24,000	0.0	1.38	35,000	55,000
Chinese folk	5,000	14,000	0.0	1.37	22,000	24,000
Ethnoreligionists	15,000	12,600	0.0	1.37	15,000	20,000
Total population	36,207,000	77,703,000	100.0	1.37	89,557,000	98,946,000

The Roman Catholic Church has diocese representing its several rites—Latin, Armenian, Chaldean, Syrian, and Byzantine. Most Latin Catholics live near Istanbul, Izmir, and Ankara. Most of the Chaldeans are clustered near the Iraqi border. Small numbers of Catholics of the Byzantine rite are divided between Rome and the patriarchal vicariate of Istanbul. There are about 28,000 Catholics in Turkey.

A new wave of Protestant Christian missionary work began with the arrival of William Goodall of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Istanbul in 1831. However, most Turkish converts came not from Islam but from the older Christian populations. The Church Missionary Society, the Basel Mission, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts had abandoned Istanbul by the 1870s on account of an inhospitable environment for religious conversion. Later the American Baptists, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), the Church of the Brethren, British Quakers, and the London Jews Society retired from missionizing indigenous Turks. In 1970 the United Church had 84 missionaries in Turkey attempting to help the people without proselytizing. Most of the missionaries are based in Istanbul. The American Academy for Girls has about 18 missionaries assigned to the American College at Izmir. The British and Foreign Bible Society were responsible for translations of Scripture into Turkish. The American Congregationalists established Roberts College, north of Istanbul, in 1871; in 1961 it was given over to the Turkish government, renamed Bosphorus University, and today is a premier institution of higher education and flagship for the Turkish university system.

German Lutherans and British Anglicans (under the Church of England's Diocese of Europe) have parishes in Ankara, Izmir, and Ankara. They have a very small presence of 2,000 people. They serve expatriates, the U.S. military, and diplomatic communities. Turks do not have memberships in these groups. Various Protestant and Free Church groups opened missions in Turkey through the 20th century. However, their success has been marginal.

An indigenous Jewish population of 35,000, most of them Sephardic Jews, live near Istanbul. There has been a Jewish community in Turkey since ancient times, though its makeup was changed by the addition of a number of Jews who were expelled from Spain and Portugal at the end of the 15th century. Their numbers have dwindled since 1948, when many decided to immigrate to Israel. Unity for the Jewish community is provided by the Great Rabbi, who resides in Istanbul.

The number of spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith has expanded rapidly through the 1990s, and Baha'is now number about 1,000. There is a small Buddhist presence, but Islam remains the majority religion, with more than 85 percent of the population; those who profess no religion approach 10 percent. Little shift in these numbers is expected in the near future.

Gail M. Harley

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Basel Mission; Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of the Brethren; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Hanafite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Serbian Orthodox Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Yezidis.

References

Atasoy, Yildiz. Turkey, Islamists and Democracy: Transition and Globalisation in a Muslim State. London: I. B. Tauris, 2005.

Caqaptay, Soner. Islam, Secularism and Nationalism in Modern Turkey: Who Is a Turk? London: Routledge, 2006.

Frazer, C. A. Catholics and Sultans: The Church and the Ottoman Empire, 1453–1923. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Garnett, L. M. J. Mysticism and Magic in Turkey. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1912.

Howe, Marvine. Turkey Today: A Nation Divided Over Islam's Revival. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Tapper, R., ed. Islam in Modern Turkey: Religion, Politics and Literature in a Secular State. London: St. Martin's, 1994.

Tepe, Sultan. Beyond Sacred and Secular: Politics of Religion in Israel and Turkey. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2008.

■ Turkmenistan

Turkmenistan, a central Asian republic on the Caspian Sea between Iran and Kazakhstan, is also bordered by Afghanistan and Uzbekistan. A relative lowland, compared to its southern neighbors, much of the country's 188,500 square miles of land is a sandy desert. It is home to 5,200,000 citizens.

Since ancient times, Turkmenistan has been a reward of numerous conquering states, from Alexander the Great to the Arabs. Modern Turkmens are a relatively later product of the mixing of the Oguz Turks with several of the groups that had moved into the region. That mixing occurred in the 11th through the 15th centuries.

Turkmenistan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,304,000	4,575,000	88.6	1.48	5,703,000	6,536,000
Agnostics	444,000	436,000	8.4	1.18	235,000	118,000
Christians	117,000	79,400	1.5	0.44	67,100	63,100
Orthodox	108,000	64,000	1.2	0.38	46,000	34,000
Marginals	0	5,600	0.1	1.55	8,000	12,000
Independents	0	4,000	0.1	−0.26	6,000	8,000
Atheists	320,000	66,000	1.3	1.01	55,000	52,000
Jews	3,000	3,000	0.1	1.43	3,000	3,000
Baha'is	0	1,200	0.0	1.44	2,000	4,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	860	0.0	1.43	1,000	1,200
Buddhists	0	740	0.0	1.44	900	1,200
New religionists	200	670	0.0	1.42	850	1,000
Total population	2,189,000	5,163,000	100.0	1.43	6,068,000	6,780,000

Mosque in Ashkhabad, Turkmenistan. (Olga Buiacova/Dreamstime.com)

In the 19th century, Turkmenia was conquered by Russia and was incorporated into Bukhara and Khuva, two Russian protectorates. Resistance to Russian domination was fierce, and only in 1881 was all the country pacified. In spite of efforts to break with Russia at the time of the revolution, Turkmenistan was incorporated into the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Socialist Republic of Turkmenistan was created in 1924. The republic actually brought some political unity that had often been denied as parts of the country changed hands and fell under various regimes over the centuries.

Turkmenistan finally emerged as an independent country in 1991. It was the least democratic of the governments of the former Soviet republics, existing under the leadership of strongman Saparmurat Niyasov until his death in 2006. It has since moved toward a more democratic structure. In 1994 the government created the Council on Religious Affairs to provide oversight of the religious (primarily Muslim) community.

Islam came to Turkmenia in the 650s, when the Arab caliphate expanded into Central Asia under Uthman (644–656) and remained a part of the subsequent Umayyad and Abbasid caliphates. The Mongols invaded early in the 13th century, and over the next 100 years they were converted to Islam. Suppressed through the Soviet years, the Islamic community was revived in the 1980s and has done well under the independent government established in the 1990s. From four mosques operating in the country in 1987, several hundred opened during the 1990s.

Beginning in the mid-1990s, the government took steps to ensure that Muslim organizations did not become centers of political protest. It began by taking control of the Muslim schools for clergy training, blocked efforts to form an Islamic political party, and restricted the printing and distribution of religious literature. The government was especially attentive to any suggestion that an Islamic government should replace the present secular one. In 2000, Niyasov order the burning of 4,000 copies of the Koran, copies that the government had paid to have printed, ostensibly because of the inaccuracy of the translation, but following the translator's having made some public criticisms of Niyasov's un-Islamic activities.

A small Christian presence was established in Turkmenistan during the years of Russian dominance, and a Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) presence remains. It is part of the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tadjikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. There are a number of Armenians who reside in Turkmenistan, and they have organized the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin). Protestants entered the country in the 1890s when I. K. Saval'ev, a Baptist, moved from Vladikavkas (Russia) and F. S. Ovsyannikov, a Mennonite, moved from Samatria Province to Ashkhabad. Two years later the two established a village, Kuropatkinsky, some 12 miles from Ashkhabad, where the first church was erected. Later a church was opened in Ashkhabad. This church became the target of Soviet authorities in the 1930s. The Baptist movement remains small in Turkmenistan, there being only three congregations in the 1990s. These congregations have joined with the Union of Evangelical Christian-Baptists of Central Asia, an association founded in 1992 that also includes the churches in Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

The secular government maintains hegemony over religion in the country. Groups must register before holding meetings and are subject to periodic raids by officials to check upon compliance with the laws. A spectrum of groups that have surfaced since the country's independence, including the Jehovah's Witnesses, have been unable to obtain such registration.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Jehovah's Witnesses; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

Blackwell, Carole. Tradition and Society in Turkmenistan: Gender, Oral Culture and Song. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2001.

Edgar, Adrienne Lynn. Tribal Nation: The Making of Soviet Turkmenistan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.

Hayit, B. Islam and Turkestan under Russian Rule. Istanbul: privately printed, 1987.

Khalid, Adeb. Islam after Communism: Religion and Politics in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.

Wingate, Reginald. The Steep Ascent: The Story of the Christian Church in Turkestan. London: British and Foreign Bible Society, n.d.

■ Turks and Caicos Islands

The Turks and Caicos Islands are two Caribbean island chains located north of Haiti and southeast of the Bahamas. Though separated by some distance, they were earlier a part of Britain's Jamaica colony. Together the islands include a mere 166 square miles of land that serve as home to their 22,400 residents.

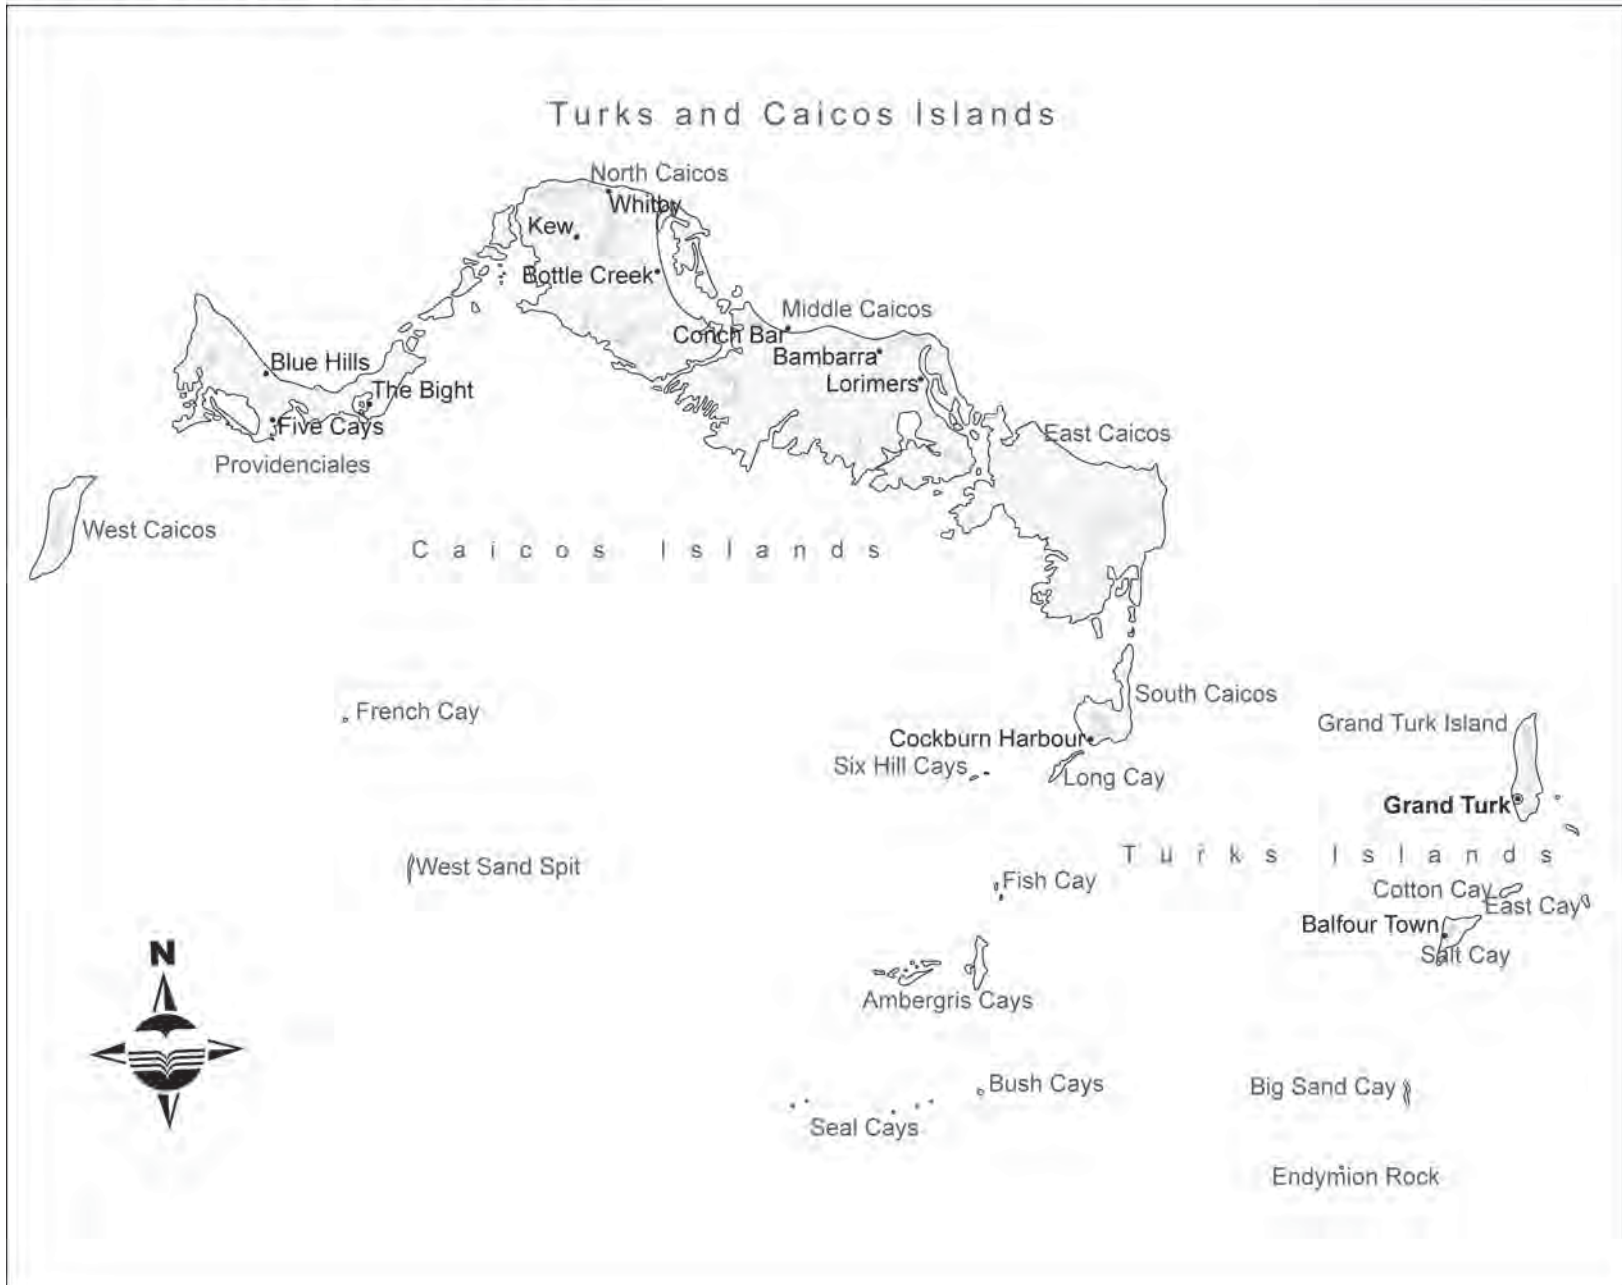

The islands were originally inhabited by the Arawak people, and there is research to suggest that it was on one of these islands that Columbus first touched the soil of the New World in 1492. The islands did not face European colonization until 1678, when the British moved in. During the next century the islands faced a common history of the destruction of the Arawak society, the importation of slaves to work plantations, and battles with the French and Spanish. British dominion was firmly established by 1787. Rule was administered from the Bahamas until 1848. Then, in 1874, the islands became a dependency of Jamaica until 1962, after which they again became a separate British colony. They became autonomous by steps, with direct involvement of the British government ending in 1988. The islands remain in the British Commonwealth.

The traditional religion of the Arawak people was destroyed with the people in the 18th century. Christianity entered the islands as the Church of England followed British settlement. It was established in the middle of the 18th century and now claims approximately 20 percent of the islands' relatively small population. The churches are included in the Church in the Province of the West Indies.

Turks and Caicos Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,600	24,100	92.1	5.20	26,700	28,000
Protestants	3,800	11,000	42.0	3.24	12,100	13,000
Independents	450	3,700	14.1	-1.96	4,700	4,500
Anglicans	1,100	2,400	9.2	2.38	3,500	3,800
Agnostics	0	1,200	4.7	8.17	2,000	2,500
Spiritists	0	680	2.6	5.34	920	1,000
Baha'is	30	160	0.6	5.42	250	400
Atheists	0	10	0.0	4.56	60	80
Total population	5,600	26,200	100.0	5.33	29,900	32,000

TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS

The historic first cathedral in Turks and Caicos situated on Grand Turk Island. (Ramunas Bruzas/Dreamstime.com)

Baptists have had the most success, their work having originated from the British Baptist Union's missionary activity in Jamaica. Baptists from the Jamaica Baptist Union came to Turks and Caicos in the middle of the 19th century. They soon outstripped the Methodists, now the second largest group in the islands, who had come in 1800 as part of the last stages of their spread through the islands that began in 1787. Their work was later incorporated in the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas.

Through the 20th century, a spectrum of Protestant/Free churches came to the islands (Baptist Bible Fellowship International, Church of God of Prophecy, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church). The Church of God in Christ, an African American Pentecostal church, has established a small presence, as have the enthusiastic Spiritual Baptists. The Roman Catholic Church has a minimal presence.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of God in Christ; Church of God of Prophecy; Jamaica Baptist Union; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritual Baptists.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Kennedy, Cynthia. "The Other White Gold: Salt, Slaves, the Turks and Caicos Islands, and British Colonialism.” The Historian 69, no. 2 (June 22, 2008): 215–216.

Sadler, H. E. Turks Island Landfall: A History of the Turks and Caicos Islands. N.p.: the author, 1997.
 Smith, Hosay. A History of Turks and Caicos Islands. Hamilton, Bermuda: the author, 1968.

■ Tuvalu

Tuvalu is a South Sea island republic located between Fiji and Kiribati. Though it covers a massive area of ocean, the total land area of this the fourth smallest country of the world’s nations is but nine square miles. It is home to 12,200 people (2008), most of Polynesian ancestry.

Tuvalu was settled by Polynesians several thousand years ago, most likely by migration from Tonga and Samoa. The Tuvaluans first came into contact with Europeans as early as the 16th century, and at some point they were named the Ellice Islands. However, between 1850 and 1875 they were targeted by slavers, and the majority of the islands’ residents were taken to Peru and Chile to work in the mines. The slave trade was stopped only upon effective settlement by the British and the establishment of a Christian mission. In 1892 the British established a protectorate over the islands, and in 1915 incorporated them into the new colony of the Gilbert (now Kiribati) and Ellice Islands.

The islands began the process of independence with a referendum in 1974. Independence became a fact in 1978. A parliamentary system modeled on the United Kingdom was installed. The new nation retained close ties to England.

The London Missionary Society launched a very successful mission in Samoa, and in 1861 Samoan missionaries arrived in the Ellice Islands. They were joined by J. S. White, an LMS missionary in 1870. Over the next three decades, the 3,000 island residents were converted to Congregational Christianity. As a result, the traditional religion (already severely weakened by the losses to the slave trade) disappeared. This work matured into the Church of Tuvalu, which retains the allegiance of more than 90 percent of the islands’ residents.

The only other churches operating in the islands are the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which began work in the 1950s in the Gilbert Islands, and the Roman Catholic Church. The Catholic Church had been prevented from operating in the islands until 1964, but today it has several congregations. There is also a small Baha’i Faith presence in Tuvalu.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha’i Faith; Church of Tuvalu; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

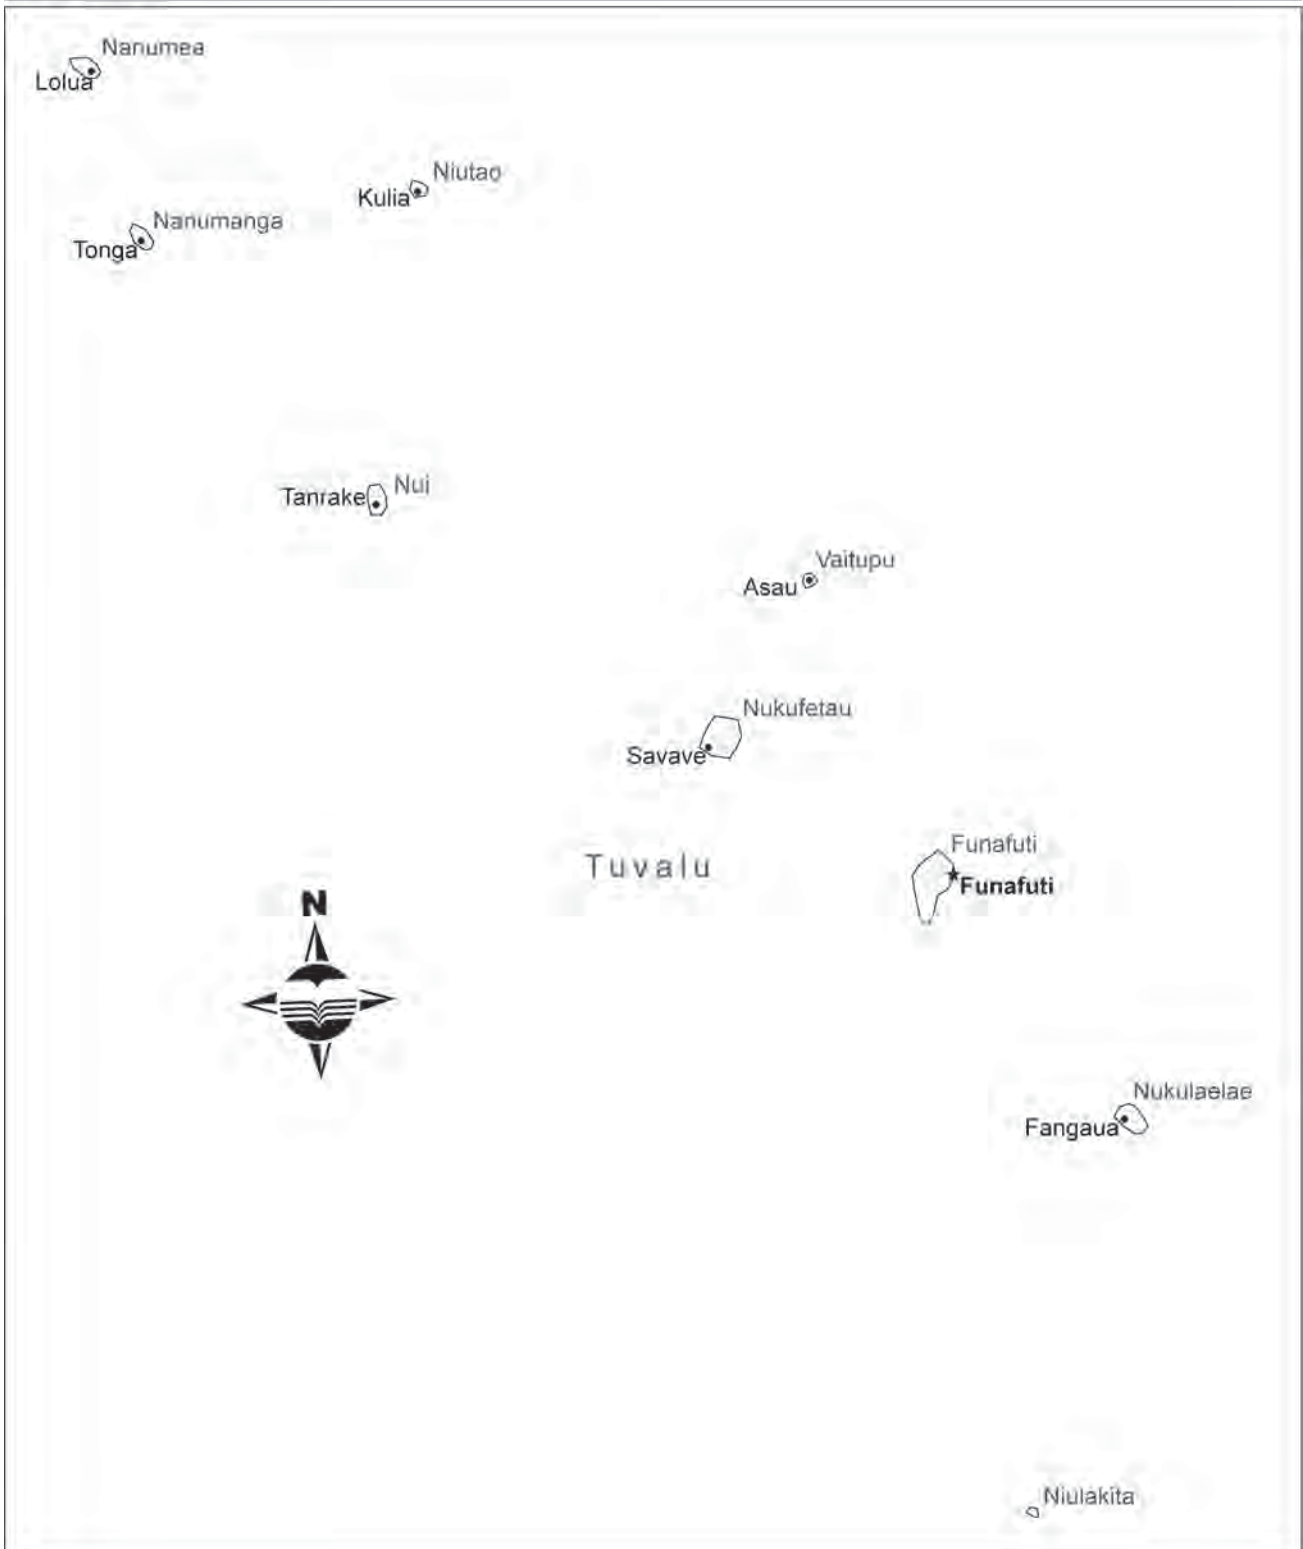

References

Chambers, Keith, and Anne Chambers. Unity of Heart: Culture and Change in a Polynesian Atoll Society. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press, 2001.

Tuvalu

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	7,200	10,100	94.2	0.44	10,600	10,800
Protestants	7,100	9,500	88.9	−0.11	9,800	9,900
Marginals	20	300	2.8	5.64	450	500
Independents	0	220	2.1	4.56	250	300
Agnostics	0	320	3.0	2.60	400	550
Baha’is	100	230	2.1	0.57	300	400
Atheists	0	40	0.4	0.51	70	90
Buddhists	0	20	0.1	1.61	30	40
Muslims	0	10	0.1	0.00	20	30
Total population	7,300	10,700	100.0	0.50	11,400	11,900

TUVALU

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century.

Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Kofe, L. The Tuvalu Church: A Socio-historical Survey of Its Development towards an Indigenous Church.

B.D. project, Pacific Theological College, 1976.

Laracy, Hugh. Tuvalu: A History. Suva, Fiji: University of the South Pacific, 1983.

Twelve Tribes

The Twelve Tribes started out as a Christian communal fellowship that emerged from the Jesus People Revival in 1972 under the leadership of Elbert Eugene (“Gene”) Spriggs, whom community members consider an apostle, and his wife, Marsha. Through the years the community has evolved into a Hebrew “tribe.” It has often changed its name to reflect these developments. It has been known as The Vine Christian Community Church, the Northeast Kingdom Community Church, and the Messianic Communities.

Members of the Twelve Tribes adopt Hebrew names and consider themselves as part of the Commonwealth of Israel forming in the last days, bound together by the New Covenant in the Messiah’s Blood (Ephesians 2:12). The communities have evolved a distinct culture around their craftsmanship and handiwork. They also have evolved their own devotional music and dance forms.

Spriggs, the son of a factory quiller and scoutmaster, was born in Chattanooga, Tennessee, and grew up in the Methodist Church. In 1971 he became involved in the Jesus Movement through Marineth Chapel and Center Theater in Glendale, California. Returning to Tennessee, he and his wife opened their residence in East Ridge, a suburb of Chattanooga, and attracted a variety of young spiritual seekers. As a group formed, they copied the early Christian pattern of sharing all things in common (Acts 2:37–47). The group also opened the Yellow Deli, a health food bakery and sandwich restaurant. They prepared whole-grain bread, which symbolized the Gospel of Jesus—the real spiritual food in contrast to the lifeless “White Bread Jesus” found in mainline churches. Eventually they rejected conventional religion and began developing their own worship, gathering on Friday evenings to welcome the Sabbath and on Saturday to break bread and celebrate the Messiah’s resurrection.

They made contact with a Christian fellowship in Island Pond, Vermont, that wished to emulate their communal life, and in 1979 the group sold their property and moved north. In Chattanooga the households had been centralized, but in Island Pond they formed independent communes, each household specializing in its own cottage industry. Many members left after the first winter, but the group opened up the Common Sense Restaurant and attracted new members.

The Twelve Tribes accept the basic affirmation of traditional Christianity, but also include various theological innovations concerning communal living, marriage, and eschatology. They also have been influenced by the Sacred Name movement and have adopted the Hebrew designation for Jesus (Yahshua). As their theology has developed, more has been discerned concerning the community’s role in the last days, their relationship to Yahshua, and levels of salvation after Judgment. The communities define themselves as the lost and scattered tribes of the ancient Jews undergoing restoration in preparation for eternal life. They believe that their community is undergoing a process of purification as the “pure and Spotless Bride” awaiting her Bridegroom, and that it will probably take three generations to be ready for the Second Coming. By increasing their ranks through conversions and childbearing, they are “raising up a people” in preparation for the Jubilee horn that heralds the return of Yahshua. The group condemns abortion and homosexuality and supports monogamy, premarital chastity, and home schooling.

Since relocating in Island Pond the group has also developed an elaborate ritual life. Public “gatherings” are held on Friday and Saturday night (the Jewish Sabbath and the eve of the First Day) that feature circle dancing, devotional songs, spontaneous speaking, and stories for the children. The public is also invited to their weddings, which dramatize the community’s millenarian expectations: the Bride, representing the Community, prepares herself for the call of the groom, her “King.”

Some 1,500 people are involved with the movement, of whom roughly half are children. There are 14 associated communities in the United States and additional communities in Argentina, Brazil, France, Germany, Spain, Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, and Canada. The majority of members still reside in New England, mainly in Vermont or in the Boston area. In 1993 the community in Island Pond, Vermont, numbered 15 households. By 1994 it had shrunk to five, as families moved to Bellows Falls, Rutland, and Burlington in Vermont, as well as to Rhode Island and Hyannis, Massachusetts, in order to set up new communities.

Each local community is “covered” by a council of male elders (one from each household). Under the elders is an informal hierarchy of teachers, deacons, deaconesses, and shepherds. Women wear head scarves “in church” or at the “gatherings” and meetings to demonstrate their submission to their husbands and the male elders, who, in turn, are “covered” by “Our Master.” The Spriggs, childless and with no fixed abode, travel among the communities offering counsel and inspiration. Evangelism is carried on by contact with individuals whom they meet through their businesses and the distribution of their periodical, The Twelve Tribes Freepaper.

The Twelve Tribes have been attacked by anti-cultists ever since the founding of communes in Chattanooga, but they experienced a new level of conflict beginning in 1984 with accusations of child abuse in the community. In that year the Vermont State Police, armed with a court order and accompanied by 50 Social Services workers, raided the Island Pond community homes and took 112 children into custody. Several days later a district judge ruled that the search warrant issued by the state was unconstitutional, and all the children were returned to their parents. Child custody disputes and investigations by Social Services continue, however, partly because of the influence of the anti-cult movement and several former members.

The group’s commitment to their biblically based disciplinary practices is the primary focus of concern. Parents are instructed to discipline children who do not obey upon “first command” with a thin, flexible “reed-like” rod (as mentioned in Proverbs 23:13) so as to inflict pain but not injury. No evidence has been produced to substantiate the accusations of child abuse against the group, though these have been repeated for years.

Since the raid the group has attempted to cooperate with state authorities and has made efforts to reach out to neighbors in trying to foster better understanding. On June 25, 1994, the church held a 10-year anniversary celebration “to commemorate [our] deliverance from the 1984 Island Pond Raid.” Many of those 112 children, now in their teens and twenties, shared their traumatic memories of the raid, again denied allegations of abuse, and declared their allegiance toward their parents and their community.

Twelve Tribes
2243 Dorchester Ave.
Lower Mills, MA 12124
<http://www.TwelveTribes.com>

Susan Palmer

See also: Communalism; Homosexuality; Messianic Judaism.

References

- Nori, Don. “Persecution at Island Pond.” Charisma 10, no. 4 (November 1984).
- Palmer, Susan J. Moon Sisters, Krishna Mothers, Rajneesh Lovers: Women’s Roles in New Religions. Syracuse, NY: University of Syracuse Press, 1996.
- Swantko, Jean A. An Issue of Control: Conflict between the Church in Island Pond and State Government. Palenville, NY: privately printed, 1998.

U

UFO Religions

The term “UFO Religions” refers to a group of extremely diverse, predominantly but not exclusively small Western, religious groups with one thing in common: they have a distinctly religious understanding of what may be broadly termed “the myth of the flying saucer,” and the accompanying legends of human intercourse with extraterrestrial beings.

In essence little can be said about these religions that does not apply to most religions in general. Religious leadership, rituals, sacred texts, myths, social structures, and the like are typologically no different from what we find in most spiritual groups outside society’s larger religious tradition(s). Sometimes the UFO aspect appears simply as an attachment to well-known religious representations—for instance, when UFOs are considered vehicles of Theosophical Masters from Venus who, in traditional Theosophy, live in Tibet and do not use that kind of transportation. In general, the UFO perspective forms a part of syncretic belief systems.

No UFO cult predates the flying saucer rumors that hit the public imagination around the beginning of the Cold War in the summer of 1947. As it appears, the strange aerial objects that were allegedly seen by more and more people could not be explained to everyone’s satisfaction. At a certain point it was suggested that they were spaceships from other worlds, and soon the first “contactee,” George Adamski (1891–1965), who claimed to have met with space people in the Californian desert, met his audience. He was soon to be followed by numerous major and minor UFO prophets, each with his (and occasionally her) special message from beings from other planets.

It is debatable whether the general belief in extraterrestrial visitation should be considered a religious idea. However, it is quite obvious that this belief very often takes the shape of genuine religious faith. It is therefore appropriate to distinguish between the broader public imagination and the beliefs expressed in the actual UFO religions.

UFO religions are directly inspired by dominant features of the modern, technologically advanced world. Science, technology, space travel, fears of atomic war, computers, pollution of the natural world, and the like are among the themes incorporated, and thus dealt with, in religious UFO narratives. The occupants of the UFOs are understood to be super-human beings, bringers of all good to people on Earth. The UFO cults are distinctively modern in the sense that they interpret typical aspects of the modern world into their religious apparatus.

UFO religions are usually inspired by ideology perpetuated through the Theosophical Society, and most leaders of such groups are known to have been engaged in different kinds of modern spirituality prior to their UFO-related work. Well-known examples are George King (1919–1997), who founded the Aetherius Society in 1954; Ruth (1900–1993) and Ernest Norman (1904–1971), who headed Unarius (established 1954); Charles Boyd Benzel, the original founder of Mark Age (1960); George Van Tassel (1910–1970), who founded the Ministry of Universal Wisdom; and on the fringe of what may be termed religious UFO groups, George Adamski, who built up the International Get Acquainted Program (IGAP) in 1958.

The basic idea in these groups is the need for humans on Earth to grow spiritually and eventually to align with peoples from other worlds who are already

A car encouraging people to welcome extraterrestrial beings and topped with a model spacecraft sits on property near Jamul, California, October 15, 2000. The property was purchased by the Unarius Academy of Science to serve as a future landing site for “space brothers” from other planets. (Getty Images) united in a Cosmic Brotherhood. The leader(s) of the group will usually claim to be in personal contact with the space people or higher beings, either man to man (being to being) or by means of telepathy. Other groups, though, have quite a different heritage. The Raelian movement, for instance, draws heavily on Jewish-Christian traditions, claiming that what the Bible recollects in fact is the story of how a group of extraterrestrials some 22,000 years ago created life on Earth by means of hyperadvanced biotechnology. The leader of the group, Rael (born Claude Vorilhon in France in 1945), who was allegedly approached by the extraterrestrials in 1973, is identified as a prophet and a messiah succeeding the biblical characters. Another UFO cult, Heaven’s Gate, which met its sad destruction in a collective suicide in San Diego in 1997, had developed its own rare belief system urging believers to aim at “The Evolutionary Level Above Human” (TELAH).

In all, some 25 different UFO religions may be active today. Further, a line of other religions have incorporated beliefs in UFOs into their theologies. Certain evangelical groups, for instance, believe UFOs to represent Satanic forces, while other Christian groups, such as The Family International, believe them to be associated with angels. UFO-like notions are also found in the Church of Scientology’s belief system. Finally, of course, religious interpretations of the UFO-narrative are important to the New Age movement.

Mikael Rothstein

See also: Church of Scientology; Family International, The; New Age Movement; Raelian Movement, International; Unarius.

References

- Clarke, David, and Andy Roberts. Phantoms of the Sky: UFOs—A Modern Myth. London: Robert Hale, 1990.
- Evans, Hilary. From Other Worlds: The Truth behind Aliens, Abductions, UFOs and the Paranormal. London: Carlton, 1998.
- Lewis, James R., ed. The Encyclopedic Sourcebook of UFO Religions. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2003.
- Lewis, James R., ed. The Gods Have Landed: New Religions from Other Worlds. New York: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Partridge, Christopher. UFO Religions. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Reece, Gregory L. UFO Religion: Inside Flying Saucer Cults and Culture. London: I. B. Tauris, 2007.

■ Uganda

Uganda, a Central African nation, is completely landlocked, but its southern border sits on Lake Victoria and its western border is partially formed by several of the large lakes of the Rift Valley. It is otherwise surrounded by Kenya, Tanzania, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Sudan. Its territory includes 77,000 square miles of land. Its 31,400,000 people are among the most ethnically diverse of the African nations south of the Sahara, representing a number of distinct African peoples. Because of the many languages spoken by the various groups, English has become the common language for government and business.

Inhabited for millennia, Uganda emerges on the historical stage in the 10th century CE with evidence of an urban civilization. In the 13th century the area was invaded by Bacwezi people, who subdued the resident Bantu people. After settling in, they created a number of fortresses that protected their cattle, the key to their wealth and power. Through succeeding centuries, some of the groups of the region were oriented eastward toward Zanzibar and others northward through the Nile Valley to Sudan and Egypt. In the 17th century, Islam began to spread into Uganda.

The national mosque in Kampala, Uganda. (iStockPhoto.com)

The history of the region was changed by the movement through the area of David Livingstone (1813–1873), the fabled missionary of the London Missionary Society. Out of communication with the West for some years, in 1870 he became the object of a highly publicized search by reporter Henry Stanley (1841–1904). Upon his return to England, Stanley denounced the spread of Islam farther south, and he occasioned the sending of missionaries. In 1888 the Imperial British East Africa Company set up a trading enterprise.

British influence in the area was solidified in 1886, when it received European recognition for the establishment of a protectorate, formally put in place in 1893. British control lasted until 1962, when independent Uganda came into being. The land reform program of the new government met opposition from the

Uganda

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	6,425,000	28,923,000	85.0	3.22	46,114,000	79,526,000
Roman Catholics	3,395,000	13,700,000	40.2	2.95	21,900,000	38,285,000
Anglicans	1,291,000	12,100,000	35.5	3.51	19,500,000	33,702,000
Protestants	111,000	1,800,000	5.3	3.82	2,900,000	5,000,000
Muslims	588,000	3,857,000	11.3	3.61	6,250,000	10,900,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,130,000	743,000	2.2	1.95	700,000	700,000
Hindus	65,000	275,000	0.8	3.23	465,000	850,000
Agnostics	1,000	130,000	0.4	3.23	250,000	500,000
Baha'is	226,000	92,000	0.3	3.23	200,000	400,000
Atheists	0	12,100	0.0	3.23	20,000	40,000
Jews	500	3,200	0.0	3.23	5,000	8,000
Jains	1,000	3,000	0.0	3.24	5,000	8,000
Sikhs	5,700	1,500	0.0	3.24	2,000	3,000
Total population	9,442,000	34,040,000	100.0	3.23	54,011,000	92,935,000

40,000 Indian expatriates in the country who controlled much of the commercial activity. Following the coup that brought Idi Amin (ca. 1924–2003) to power in 1971, many of the Indians were expelled from the country. Amin's bloody regime was ended when he prompted war with neighboring Tanzania by attempting to annex some of their territory. Unfortunately, the regime of his successor, Milton Obote (1925–2005, r. 1980–1985), was almost as bloody.

The return of economic and political stability in the 1980s was hindered by a guerrilla-led civil war that ended only after a coup at the end of 1985. After seizing power, Yoweri Museveni (b. ca. 1944) attempted to re-create an orderly situation in a country that was heavily in debt and is still beset with poverty. He has stood for election on several occasions. Prior to the 2006 elections, he abolished provisions in the country's laws concerning term limits.

Traditional religions are still practiced in Uganda, but they now can count less than 5 percent of the people among their adherents. Among the groups that have retained a sizable percentage of traditionalists are the Ganda, the largest group in the country. The Ganda have a sophisticated theology that poses the existence of a pantheon of deities headed by a Supreme Being (Katonda) and his family, including Nalwanga (wife), Wanga (grandfather), Mususi (father), and Kibuka (brother). The many deities that surround Katonda serve as intermediaries between him and human beings, and each is given charge over an aspect of the cosmos of importance to human life (from childbirth to hunting).

The meaningful push of Islam into Uganda began in the mid-19th century. It flowed in from the north (Sudan) and east (Tanzania). Inadvertently, the British encouraged Islam by their use of Muslims as bureaucrats and translators. The community was expanded by the inclusion of Muslims among the Indians who assumed responsibility for developing Uganda's commercial life. Indian Muslims brought Shia Islam, especially in its Ismaili, Ithna-Ashari, and Bohra forms.

The Ahmadiyya Muslim movement arrived in 1921. Considered heretical, it nevertheless attempted to evangelize the Ugandan public, with some response. However, in the middle of the century it divided into three factions that have yet to reunite.

During his 1875 visit to Africa, Henry Stanley met a Ugandan ruler, Kabaka Mutesa I, who requested Christian missionaries to assist him in throwing back the encroachments of Islam, a distorted tale if not an outright fabrication. The Church Missionary Society's first missionaries arrived in 1877. They found Dallington Maftaa, an African preacher commissioned by Livingstone. All of the team, except its leader Alexander MacKay (1849–1890), died within their first two years. Mackay continued to work alone, and his stead-fastness eventually paid off with converts and additional missionaries, who arrived in the 1890s. The Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society bolstered the CMS's efforts in 1921.

UGANDA

The Anglican work became the largest in the country, not counting that of the Roman Catholics, and it is structured today as the Church of the Province of Uganda, set aside as an independent province in 1961. In 1965 the province elected Erica Sabiti as its primate, the first African to assume such a post. The African Inland Mission had added its strength to the small Anglican community in Uganda in 1918. It worked closely with the Church of England, and eventually its missions/churches were integrated into the new province as its West Nile Diocese.

The Roman Catholic Church was introduced into Uganda in 1879. The brothers of the White Fathers found their way to the court of Kabaka Mutesa. Their subsequent missionary endeavor had an immediate impact. By 1912 there were more than 136,000 members, and the church now has more than 7 million members. The first Ugandan priest was ordained in 1911, and the first bishop in 1939. In 1969 the church was encouraged by the visit of Pope Paul VI, whose talk emphasized the need to develop a truly African Christianity. Today the Catholic Church numbers in excess of 9 million, more than 40 percent of the country's population.

The development of Christianity in Uganda has been marred by a number of horrendous events, beginning with the persecution of Muslims in 1875 and 1876 in which some 70 Muslim leaders were killed. In 1885 and 1886, between 200 and 300 Anglican and Catholic Christians were killed (an event marked by the Church of the Martyrs at Namugongo, erected by the Catholic Church). Most recently, in 2000, the Catholic Church was embarrassed when a group of former members who had formed a new organization, the Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, committed a mass murder/suicide in the rural village of Kanungu. Some 780 died (including a number of members who had been murdered at other locations). The group was built around messages received by its leaders from the Virgin Mary.

Pentecostalism was introduced into Uganda in 1935 by the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. Their mission (now known as the Pentecostal Assemblies of God) spread; other Pentecostal churches established missions, and new Uganda Pentecostal bodies (such as the Church of the Redeemed) were created. Several hundred African Initiated Churches now are active in Uganda, including the Charismatic Church of Uganda (founded by former Anglicans), the African Israel Church, Nineveh (from Kenya), and the Society of the One Almighty God.

The MRTC incident brought to light several obscure Ugandan apocalyptic and millenarian movements heretofore known only locally. For example, the Holy Spirit movement led by Alice Lakwena (1966–2007) had engaged the government in a war that lasted more than a decade (from 1985 to 1996). Lakwena eventually fled Uganda and spent her last years in exile in Kenya. The Lord's Resistance Army, led by Joseph Kony (b. 1962), a distant relative of Lakwena's, is closely related to a rival group founded by Lakwena's father, Severino Lukoya. In the light of problems encountered among these groups, the government has moved to suppress what it perceives as prophetic movements: most recently, in 1999, the World Message Last Warning Church, founded by Wilson Bushara. Bushara reorganized his group in 2002 and has since sought dialogue and recognition by the government.

Apart from these smaller and more controversial groups, more traditional Christian bodies have entered Uganda and garnered a significant response, including the New Apostolic Church, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana). There is also an Orthodox presence that originated in a schism among the Anglicans in the 1920s, now under the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa. The Orthodox Church joined with the Anglicans and Catholics to found the Uganda Joint Christian Council in 1963. It is now affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More conservative churches have formed the Uganda Association of Evangelists, loosely associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Hinduism was brought to Uganda by the Indian businessmen who settled in Africa throughout the 20th century. They have built temples in Kampala and, though suppressed during the years of Idi Amin, have returned in strength and have spread throughout the country. There are close to a million adherents following a spectrum of Hindu forms. There are a very small number of Jains and Sikhs.

The Baha'i Faith has had some of its greatest African response in Uganda. It had formed more than 1,500 spiritual assemblies, and Kampala was chosen as the site of its first African temple. However, Amin banned the movement, and the subsequent years of civil war and unrest almost destroyed it. Less than 100 spiritual assemblies were active through the 1990s. The movement has begun a rebuilding process in the new century.

Among the more interesting of Uganda's newer religious movements is the Abayudaya, a group who has practiced Judaism since 1919, when their leader, Semei Kakungulu (d. 1928), after his study and consideration of the Torah, began to observe the Mosaic law, including circumcision. In the intervening years, Western and Israeli Jews have visited Uganda and offered Kakungulu and his followers information on contemporary Judaism. The 500 Abayudaya survived Idi Amin's conversion to Islam and anti-Semitism, and today they reside in four villages outside Mbale, Uganda.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Israel Church, Nineveh; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Baha'i Faith; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of the Province of Uganda; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Ismaili Islam; London Missionary Society; Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, The; New Apostolic Church; Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

Abidi, S. A. H., ed. The Role of Religious Organizations in the Development of Uganda. Kampala,

- Uganda: Foundation for African Development, 1991.
- Anderson, W. B., ed. Christianity in Contemporary Africa: Uganda. Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies and Philosophy, Makerere University, 1973.
- Behrend, Heike. Alice Lakwena and Holy Spirits: War in Northern Uganda 1985–97. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2000.
- Hofer, Katharina. Implications of a Global Religious Movement for Local Political Spheres: Evangelicalism in Kenya and Uganda. Baden/Baden, Germany: Nomos Publishers, 2006.
- King, N. Q., A. Kasozi, and A. Oded. Islam and the Confluence of Religions in Uganda, 1840–1966. Tallahassee, FL: American Academy of Religion, 1973.
- Knighton, Ben. The Vitality of Karamojong Religion: Dying Tradition or Living Faith? Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2005.
- Langlands, B. W. Studies on the Geography of Religion in Uganda. Kampala, Uganda: Department of Geography, Makerere University, 1967.
- Rutiba, E. T. Religions in Uganda, 1960–1990. Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies, Faculty of Arts, Makerere University, 1993.
- Taylor, John V. The Growth of the Church in Uganda: An Attempt at Understanding. London: SCM, 1958.

Uisang

625–702 CE

Master Uisang Sunim is a major figure in the transmission to Korea of Hwaom Buddhism (the Korean version of Chinese Hua Yan Buddhism, also known in Japan as Kegon Buddhism). Hua Yan Buddhism is often called the Flower Garland School for its emphasis on the teachings of the Avatamsaka, or Flower Garland Sutra, in which the bodhisattva Manjusri is a primary object of worship. Hwaom Buddhism would become important on the Korean peninsula just as the three kingdoms of Silla, Koguryo, and Paekche were being brought together into the United Kingdom of Silla (660).

Uisang initially emerges out of obscurity as the companion of Wanhyo (617–686). In 650, the pair left to travel from Koguryo (the northern Korean kingdom) to China to study, but were mistaken as spies and arrested at the border. Eleven years later, they made a second attempt, this time planning to sail from a port city in Paekche. As the story goes, on their way to study with a famous monk, they were caught in a rain storm. Taking refuge in an underground shelter for the night, they discovered on awakening that they were in an old tomb. Before the rain ceased, Wanhyo had an intense spiritual experience that led to enlightenment, of sorts, in which he concluded from it that within the correct state of consciousness, a person experiences no difference between a temple sanctuary and a tomb. The experience led to his eventual abandonment of his monk's status and spending the rest of his life spreading Buddhism among the masses.

Uisang traveled on to China, where he would reside for the next decade, the most important part of his time being spent in study with Zhiyan (or Chih-yen, 602–668), the second patriarch of the Hua Yan School. He returned home, according to one source, because he became privy to a plot of the Chinese to launch a surprise attack on his homeland, which had just gone through a lengthy period of warfare that united the peninsula into the former kingdom of Silla (668). Beginning in 671, Uisang gathered many disciples around him, and even influenced his former companion Wanhyo, who adopted Hwaom perspectives to argue for the uniting of the different Korean Buddhist schools. Receiving the patronage of Silla's King Munmu, Uisang would establish the headquarters for Hwaom Buddhists at Pusok Temple, originally constructed in 676.

Uisang would spend the rest of his life establishing Hwaom Buddhism across Korea. He would have three decades to make it the most important school of Korean Buddhism, which it would remain until the 12th century. The Hwaom School emphasized a doctrine of the interpenetrability of all of the phenomena of the universe. All phenomena arise from the original One Mind, or Buddha Nature. He gave popular expression of this doctrine in his book, Ocean Seal of Hwaom Buddhism, "In one is all, in all is one, one is identical to all, all is identical to one.” Uisang is now also viewed as the founder of the Korean Buddhist philosophy.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Bodhisattva; Enlightenment; Korean Buddhism; Monasticism.

References

- Chung, Sae Hyang. “The Silla Priests Uisang and Wanhyo.” Korean Culture 3, no. 4 (December 1982): 36–43.
- Ishii Kosei. “The Synthesis of Huayan and Chan in Uisang’s School.” In Korean Buddhism in East Asian Perspective, edited by Geumgang Center for Buddhist Studies, 265–267. Seoul: Jimoon-dang, 2007.
- The Korean Buddhist Research Institute, ed. Buddhist Thought in Korea. Seoul: Dongguk University Press, 1994.
- Lee, Peter H. “Fa-tsang and Ŭisang.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 82 (1962): 56–62.
- McBride, Richard D., II. Domesticating the Dharma: Buddhist Cults and the Hwaom Synthesis in Silla Korea. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2007.

■ Ukraine

During the pre-Christian period, in what is now Ukraine, various forms of Paganism dominated among the Slavic and non-Slavic tribes that inhabited the region. Animism and belief in a goddess-mother was the main faith of the Cimmerians (ninth to seventh centuries BCE); the gods Tabi, Papa, and Api were the primary deities in the pantheon of the Scythians (seventh to third centuries BCE); the cult of the Sun, fire, and the Great Goddess Astarta was deeply extended among Sarmatians (second century BCE to fourth century CE); and a belief in ghosts and a variety of natural and social forces was characteristic of the faith among the Goths and the Gunnys (third to fifth centuries CE).

The distinctive Paganism of the local Slavic population had developed on its own basis but in close interaction with non-Slavic influences. A few dozens of gods and innumerable ghosts had formed the polytheistic system of Eastern European Slavs, in which Perun

Saint Andrew’s Church in Kiev, Ukraine. (Rashevskaya/Dreamstime.com)

(the god of lightning and rain), Dazhboh (the god of the Sun), and Svaroh (the god of heaven and fire) headed the pantheon. Before the adoption of Christianity, Slavic polytheism appeared to be making a smooth transformation into henotheism with the most intensive worship directed toward Perun.

The first attempt to evangelize the Kyivan Rus’ was realized in 866 (or one or two years later) during the time of princes Ascolt and Dir. Although this event did not leave any serious effects in the religious history of Ukraine, it was the first direct meeting with Byzantine Christianity (though previously the Kyivan Rus’ had had sporadic acquaintances with other Christian branches—Aryanism, Armenian Monophysitism, Manicheanism, and even Nestorianism).

The official conversion of Eastern European Slavic tribes to Christianity started after the mass baptizing

Ukraine

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	28,400,000	37,991,000	84.1	−0.14	36,102,000	28,927,000
Orthodox	25,191,000	31,562,000	69.9	−0.81	29,844,000	23,288,000
Roman Catholics	1,667,000	4,630,000	10.3	1.41	4,100,000	3,500,000
Independents	1,102,000	1,200,000	2.7	2.72	1,400,000	1,500,000
Agnostics	10,558,000	4,904,000	10.9	−3.10	2,431,000	1,086,000
Atheists	7,536,000	1,100,000	2.4	−6.83	300,000	100,000
Muslims	250,000	960,000	2.1	−0.80	840,000	650,000
Jews	572,000	175,000	0.4	−4.33	160,000	120,000
Buddhists	0	20,000	0.0	0.17	25,000	30,000
Sikhs	0	8,200	0.0	0.37	8,500	9,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	6,400	0.0	−0.81	6,000	6,000
Hindus	0	5,000	0.0	0.37	6,000	7,000
Baha'is	0	250	0.0	−0.75	600	800
New religionists	0	120	0.0	−0.74	200	300
Total population	47,317,000	45,170,000	100.0	−0.81	39,879,000	30,937,000

of Kyivans in 988 under Great Prince Volodymyr (980–1015), who was later canonized and became one of the most popular local saints. As the conversion resulted from the efforts of priests from Constantinople, subsequent church history flowed out of the context of Eastern Christianity in general and the Byzantine tradition in particular. Since that time Eastern Orthodoxy has been the main spiritual institution in Ukraine. Its history can be divided into three main periods. For seven centuries (988–1686), the Kyivan metropolis was under the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople; in 1696 it was incorporated into the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). In 1918 it began a period of struggle for independence from the Moscow Patriarchate.

During the first centuries following the official conversion of the Kyivan Rus', although influences of Paganism had remained strong, Orthodoxy extended through all the land. The Orthodox Church became an obligatory and official institution in the country. It promoted the development of writing, education, law, architecture, social and political life, the strengthening of family values, and the transformation of interpersonal relations. It also started its own monastic tradition. The Kyiv-Cave monastery from the second part of the 11th century is the most famous monastic center from that time.

Following the Mongol invasion, for a time (1240–1458) the Kyivan metropolitans did not have a permanent place of residence. They transferred the actual place of their see to the northern part of the country (Vladimir, Suzdal, and, finally, Moscow), while keeping their old title—Metropolitan of Kyiv [Kiev] and All Rus'. As a result, the bishops moved to create a new identity (separate from the Kyivan heritage) of a northern-Rus' national self-image, centered on Moscow. At the same time, there was an aspiration to keep all the privileges of the Kyivan church in the southern (Ukrainian) part of the former Kyivan Rus'.

The Moscow metropolis declared its autocephaly from Kiev in 1458, and 10 years later it announced its complete separation. It still existed as an independent body when, in 1596, a number of its clergy, including bishops, signed the Brest Union by which a number of them moved into the Roman Catholic Church. Many of the Orthodox and the Eastern-rite Catholics were forced into the Russian Orthodox Church beginning in 1686. Moscow and Kiev were reunited, but this time the Moscow Patriarchate was in control. Over the next centuries, the Ukrainian church lost many of its unique ecclesiastical features.

Through the 20th century, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church alternated between two quite opposite positions, first as a jurisdiction within the Moscow Patriarchate, which took the form of an exarchate (1921–1942, 1945–1990), and then as a formally autonomous church (1918–1921, 1942–1944, 1990–2001). Following the Russian Revolution, Ukrainian leaders began an attempt to exist as an autonomous jurisdiction, though as yet unrecognized by other canonical Orthodox communities (1919–1934, 1942–1944, 1989–2001).

Although the Ukrainian Orthodox Church remains the dominant religious body, relatively strong influences from other Christian churches are also experienced in Ukraine. The Roman Catholic Church's mission to Ukraine began late in the first millennium CE. As early as 960, King Otton I established a mission to Kyiv under the leadership of the monk Adalbert as the first "bishop of Rus'." A permanent presence by the Roman Catholic Church started in the 12th century with the settlement of the Dominicans. New Episcopal sees (including Lviv, Lutsk, and Kamjanets-Podilskyj), which continue to exist, were established in the western Ukraine after successful Polish and Hungarian conquests in the 13th century. Later, especially during the period when Ukraine was a part of the Polish-Lithuanian state, some conversions into the Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church were recorded, though Catholicism has primarily remained a religion of the national identity of Polish, Slovak, and Hungarian minorities in the country. As the new century begins, there are 7 Roman Catholic dioceses with 807 parishes and 50 monasteries in Ukraine. The head of the church, Archbishop Marjan Javorky of Lviv, was nominated as a cardinal in January 2001.

The second branch of the Catholic Church in Ukraine is the Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church, established in 1596 following the Brest Union, in which five of the seven Ukrainian Orthodox bishops accepted papal supremacy and the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church. They were allowed to preserve the Orthodox liturgy and rite. The new church was tolerated and even supported when Ukraine was part of the Polish-Lithuanian (until the end of the 18th century), Austrian-Hungarian (1772–1914), or Polish (1920–1939) states. But it was declared an anti-national institution and was opposed by the Cossacks (the main national force in the 17th and 18th centuries); later it was completely prohibited in that part of Ukraine that became part of the Russian Empire in the 18th century, and subsequently in the Soviet Union after World War II. In 1946 all seven bishops and hundreds of monks and priests were imprisoned, and all parishes were converted to the Russian Orthodox Church. The Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church continued to function outside Ukraine, and it finally restored its activity in Ukraine after 1989. In the 1990s it became the second religious body in Ukraine according to number of parishes (3,317). These are now organized into nine dioceses and three exarchates. There are, additionally, 17 dioceses and exarchates of the church around the world.

A Mukachiv Greek-Catholic diocese (established after the separate Uzhhorod Union with Rome in 1646) functions in Ukraine autonomously from other structures of the church. It is ruled directly by the Vatican and in close relationship with the Ruthenian Catholic Church, which was established in the United States by Ukrainians and Ruthenians from the Carpathian region. The visit to Ukraine by Pope John Paul II in June 2001 was an extremely important event for both branches of the Catholic Church.

Unlike Orthodoxy and Catholicism, Protestantism has never been really influential in Ukrainian society, in spite of two periods of closer acquaintance with Protestant ideas and even some planting of Protestant denominations. In the 16th and 17th centuries, classical Protestantism appeared in Ukraine in the form of Calvinism (the Reformed Church), Anti-Trinitarianism, and Socinianism. Some 200 Protestant congregations appeared in Galicia, Volyn, and central Ukraine, but owing to strong opposition to Protestantism from the Cossacks and official state prohibitions, Protestantism had almost completely disappeared by the beginning of the 18th century.

In the middle of the 19th century, the Baptists moved into the southern and central regions of Ukraine under the influence of German colonists. Over the next decades, approximately 5 percent of the Ukrainian population became members of the Baptist Church. At the same time, lesser numbers of Adventist, Pentecostal, and Jehovah's Witnesses congregations (the latter in western Ukraine) arose during the first half of the 20th century and continue to exist.

Protestantism today has become increasingly important in Ukraine, with almost 50 Protestant denominations combining to include 27 percent of existing religious communities (approximately 6,800 organizations). In several regions, the number of Protestant congregations is larger than the number of parishes of more traditional churches. Judging by the number of adherents, the Baptist Church of Ukraine is currently the largest Baptist body in Europe.

Ukraine has also traditionally been home to adherents of non-Christian religions. Judaism was established in the 10th century, and extensive immigration of Western European Jews through Poland took place in the 15th and 16th centuries. They established 79 towns scattered through the country. Then, in the 18th century, Ukraine became the motherland of one of the most influential Jewish movements of modern times, Hasidism. Its founder, Baal Shem-Tov (Besht) (1698–1760), was born in Ukrainian Galicia and spent most of his life in the region near the Carpathian Mountains and in the town of Medzhybizh. Other famous Hasidic thinkers—Josef Koen, Levi Itshak, and Hershon Kurtover—as well as founders of the scientific study of Judaism—Solomon Pappoport and Nahman Krohmal—have worked in Ukraine.

The Jewish community also suffered much through the years. Three hundred local Jewish communities with their inhabitants were annihilated during the Ukrainian war for independence under the leadership of Bohdan Hmelnytskyj in the mid-17th century. Many additional Jews were killed during anti-Jewish pogroms at the beginning of the 20th century. However, the Holocaust during World War II became the most significant tragedy, with 98 percent of the Jewish population being systematically annihilated. Today, following mass emigration in the 1970s and 1990s, fewer than a half-million Jews remain in Ukraine. They have created 230 communities (including Hasidic and Reform synagogues) and several dozen Jewish organizations.

The continuous history of the Muslim community starts in the 11th century, when Kyivan princes invited Muslims into the country for war service. As a result small Islamic communities were created in various cities, though the most intensive spread of Islam was on the Crimean peninsula, where the local Tatar population accepted Islam in the 14th century under Khan Uzbek. From 1475 to 1774, a Crimean-Tatar Islamic state was under the protection of the Ottoman Empire. Attacks on Ukrainian Christians set the Cossacks in permanent opposition to Crimean Tatars. From the time of the incorporation of Crimea into the Russian Empire in 1783 until the Revolution of 1917, Islam continued its development without major conflict with other religions, but it was seriously disrupted in the 1930s by the atheistic policies of the Soviet Union. It completely disappeared after Stalin's deportation of all Crimean Tatars from their ethnic motherlands in 1944. Crimean Tatars began returning to the Crimea in the 1980s, and through the 1990s Islamic traditions have started to revive in Crimea and all of Ukraine. Four hundred Moslem communities (305 of which are in the Crimea) exist now in Ukraine under the supervision of three separate spiritual centers.

Armenian colonies have existed since the fourth century in Crimea and along the northern coast of the Black Sea. Additional Armenians moved to Ukraine (mostly to Galicia and Volyn) during intensive migration in the 11th, 13th, and 14th centuries. In 1365 the head of the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin) appointed a bishop for Ukrainian Armenians with the see in Lviv. In 1630 this bishop (Michael Torosovych) signed the union with Rome and started the Lviv archbishopric of the Armenian Catholic Church. All the institutions of both churches were destroyed in 1945, however, during the post-Communist period; some 16 communities of the Armenian Apos-tolitic Church and one of the Armenian Catholic Church have restored their activity.

Crimea particularly and Ukraine in general have been among the most famous centers of development of the Karaites, the Jewish group that rejects the Talmud and recognizes only the authority of the Torah. Ukrainian believers have added some Pagan practices and become a new religion, without direct correlation to other Karaist branches in the world. Karaites have been in Crimea since at least the eighth century; in the 13th century, they created new settlements in several cities of western Ukraine. In the late 19th century, Crimea was the world center of Karaism. Fully prohibited during the Soviet time, Karaites have opened eight communities in the post-Soviet era.

Reflecting a trend in the religious world internationally, Ukraine became a place of intensive growth of New Religious Movements (NRMs) through the 1990s. Although there are many NRMs of all types, they do not have a large number of followers. Among newly arrived Christian groups are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the New Apostolic Church, the Salvation Army, the Churches of Christ, the Swedenborgian movement, and many Charismatic groups (some 300 congregations). There is one group with Eastern Christian roots—the Church of Transfigurative God's Mother, a Russian Marian Church.

Eastern religions are represented by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, neo-Buddhists (including several Tibetan Buddhist communities), adherents of Sri Chinmoy, Transcendental Meditation, Sahaja Yoga, and many other small groups. Several groups that seek a universal synthesis of religions include the Unification movement, the Baha'i Faith, and the specifically Ukrainian Great White Brotherhood. Leaders of the brotherhood became known far beyond Ukraine when they predicted the end of the world for November 1993, at which time they also attempted to occupy and worship in the most famous Christian sanctuary of Ukraine—Sophia Cathedral (dating from 1037) in Kyiv.

As in many European nations, the past decade has seen a revival of neo-Paganism, which in Ukraine has included a search for Old Slavic roots. There are two major representatives in the country, the Native Faith, which focuses upon the mainly monotheist idea of Dazhboh, and the Native Ukrainian National Faith, which accepts polytheism.

There are a wide range of Western Esoteric groups, including the Theosophical Society (as founded by Helena Blavatsky, who was born in Ukraine) and the Brotherhood of Holy Grail. American representatives of the tradition now active in Ukraine include the Church of Scientology, the Church of Christ, Scientist, and Religious Science (Science of Mind).

Although the number of communities of new religions is relatively high, Ukraine still remains a country in which traditional religious priorities and affiliations prevail. According to the most recent sociological surveys, 61 percent of the population define themselves as Orthodox, 8 percent as Greek Catholic, 2 percent as Roman Catholic, 3 percent as Protestant, and only 1 percent as adherents of an NRM; meanwhile, 25 percent are atheists or do not relate to any religious group.

Andrij Yurash

See also: Adventism; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Armenian Catholic Church; Baptists; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Churches of Christ; Eastern Orthodoxy; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Great White Brotherhood; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Karaites; New Apostolic Church; Pentecostalism; Religious Science; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Ruthenian Catholic Church; Sahaja Yoga; Salvation Army; Sri Chinmoy Centres; Swedenborgian Movement; Theosophical Society; Ukrainian Catholic Church; Unification Movement.

References

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Blazejowskyj, Dmytro. Hierarchy of the Kyivan Church (861–1990). Rome: Univ. Cath. Ucr. Clementis Papae, 1990.
- Himka, John Paul, and Andriy Zayarnyuk, eds. Letters from Heaven: Popular Religion in Russia and Ukraine. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2006.

- Kolodny, A. M. Religion and Church in the Democratic Ukraine. Kiev, 2000.
- Millennium of Christianity in Ukraine: A Symposium*. Ottawa, Canada: Saint Paul University, 1987.
- Mueller, Alfred. In the Name of God: Rhetoric, Religion, and Identity in Post-Soviet Ukraine. Bloomington, IN: AuthorHouse, 2004.
- Sorokowski, A., ed. A Century of Christian Culture in Ukraine. London: Ukrainian Millennium Committee in Great Britain, 1988.
- Ukrainian Orthodox Calendar*. South Bound Brook, NJ: Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the U.S.A., issued annually.

Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in

As a unique phenomenon of Eastern Christianity, Ukrainian Orthodoxy (UO) has been shaped by many, sometimes controversial, influences. From the time of the baptism of the Kyivan Rus' (988 CE) until the end of the 17th century, it developed in interaction with the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople, and since the middle of the 17th century, it has been in close communication with the Moscow Patriarchate (that is, the Russian Orthodox Church [Moscow Patriarchate]). During its entire existence, contact with Western Christianity has been very important for its identity. And finally there are many features that testify to the distinctive character of the church's tradition, such as some Pagan traces, unique local practices, specific combinations of saints, openings to different traditions, unique canonical law, the experience of conducting local councils, its own monasticism, and numerous Western adoptions. The church has been a point at which Constantinople Orthodox, Western Roman, and Russian Orthodox traditions converge.

In spite of its diverse past, any actual pluralism in the UO was suppressed while Ukraine was a part of the Russian Empire (1654–1917), and especially after the UO was subordinated to the Moscow Patriarchate (from 1686). The first attempts to establish liberal values in the society after the Russian revolutions in 1905 and February 1917 caused strong demands from Ukrainian clergy and adherents to separate the Ukrainian church from the Russian one. Prior to 1919, the separation movement had expressed only a general desire to translate all of the church's books and liturgy into Ukrainian. After publishing a decree of the government of the Ukrainian People's Republic (an independent state in 1917–1920) about autocephaly of the UO (January 1, 1919), the exponents of separation divided into two ideological directions that with variations and some changes have existed until the present. One group argued for full separation from Moscow and the creation of an independent autocephalous church, while the other favored the preservation of the organizational connection with the Russian Orthodox Church (ROC) in the form of an exarchate or autonomous church.

In March 1919 the supporters of autocephaly founded the first parishes that declared their full independence from their former religious center, and in October 1921 they conducted an All-Ukrainian Council in which the creation of the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC) was announced and its hierarchy consecrated. This new church was not recognized by any traditional Orthodox church, as none of the then-current Orthodox bishops took part in the ordinations. In spite of canonical law, a new bishop for the UAOC was consecrated from among and by parish priests (only the Russian Living Church faction of the Russian Orthodox Church recognized the UAOC, in 1923). The UAOC was most active in central, and to some extent northern and southern, Ukraine, where until the end of the 1920s almost 3,000 parishes were within its jurisdiction. In 1929, Stalin had initiated suppression of the UAOC, which he accused of nationalism. Twenty-six of its bishops and thousands of its priests and active members were arrested and killed in the concentration camps. By 1934 all of the institutions of the UAOC were destroyed.

The UAOC revived in February 1942, following the German occupation of Ukraine, when three former bishops of the Orthodox Church of Poland (OCP) declared the second birthing of the UAOC and ordained new bishops (who were from the canonical point of view quite legitimate). In 1944, before the Soviet army reoccupied Ukrainian territory, the hierarchy of the UAOC, the majority of its priests, and hundreds of thousands of adherents left Ukraine and established the church's institutions in diaspora (until 1949 in Western Europe and, after 1950, mainly in the United States, Canada, and additionally in Australia and South America).

Responding to demands of the Ukrainian clergy concerning more independence for UO, in 1918 the ROC had agreed to proclaim the autonomy of the Orthodox Church in Ukraine. However, practically speaking, that independence was never realized. In 1921 the Moscow patriarch Tikhon appointed an exarch to Ukraine, which in effect converted the autonomous church into an exarchate.

Before 1917 the ROC had had 11,753 churches in Ukraine: during the 1920s some 3,000 of those recognized the jurisdiction of the UAOC; some 2,000 (after 1920) found themselves in Polish territory and became a part of the OCP; and fewer than 7,000 churches remained under the authority of the ROC. Initially, parishes of the ROC dominated in the eastern and southern Ukrainian regions, but its infrastructure was almost completely destroyed by the middle of the 1930s as a result of the Soviet state's antireligious policy: fewer than 100 churches remained open. The church in connection with the ROC renewed its structure during World War II, and in 1942 it announced its return to its previous autonomous status, which was transformed again into an exarchate in 1944 when the Soviet Union restored its control over Ukrainian territory. The majority of the bishops of the Autonomous Church left Ukraine.

From 1944 until 1989 the Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC was the only Orthodox religious structure that was permitted by the Communist regime. Immediately after World War II, it brought together 21 dioceses with more than 7,000 parishes. All of the parishes of those churches that were then prohibited in the Soviet Union were included in the ROC's Ukrainian exarchate, including the parishes of the former UAOC, the OCP (in the territories that moved back to the Soviet Union), and the Ukrainian Catholic Church. The number of parishes was further decreased, to 15 dioceses and approximately 5,000 parishes, at the beginning of the 1960s as a result of Khrushchev's antireligious campaign.

The monopoly of the ROC over Orthodoxy in Ukraine was demolished after the beginning of liberal changes in the Soviet Union. In 1989 the third revival of the UAOC in Ukraine was proclaimed by a group of Orthodox clergy in Galicia. The priest Volodymyr Yarema from L'viv was its ideological leader, and Bishop Ioan Bodnarchuk, formerly with the ROC, led the new movement. The revival of the autocephalous church was strongly opposed by the ROC in general, and especially by Metropolitan Filaret, the head of the Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC, which included at that time almost 70 percent of all Orthodox parishes in the country (approximately 5,000 out of fewer than 7,000).

In the early 1990s, three separate church structures appeared in Ukraine. The Ukrainian Orthodox Church under the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate (UOC MP) represents a pro-Russian direction in the Ukrainian Orthodoxy. It was created in January 1990 from the former Ukrainian exarchate of the ROC. After the declaration of Ukraine's independence (August 1991), Metropolitan Filaret signed a request to the ROC requesting autocephaly. The ROC deemed the request inexpedient. Two other bishops did not agree with that decision and joined Filaret in creating the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Patriarchate (UOC KP). Volodymyr Sabodan became the new Ukrainian metropolitan of the UOC MP. In 1996 the UOC MP officially refused the idea of its granting autocephaly in Ukraine.

Parishes of the UOC MP now prevail in most sections of the country. It is the largest religious body in Ukraine (with 36 dioceses) according to the number of religious organizations (9,246 in total), monasteries (122, with 3,519 monks and nuns), brotherhoods (24), and clergy (7,507); its headquarters and main cathedral are on the territory of the most ancient and famous Ukrainian monastery, the Kyiv-Cave Lavra.

The strictly autocephalous direction within UO is represented by two churches—the UOC KP and the UAOC. Neither structure is recognized by any autocephalous Orthodox Church, owing to the strong opposition of the ROC. After 1998 the Ecumenical Patriarchate manifested special interest in UO. Patriarch Bartholomew I has proposed a way to unify the several Orthodox branches and grant autocephaly to the unified UOC.

The Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Kyivan Patriarchate was founded in June 1992 with an eye toward the unification of the whole of the UAOC (which had existed in Ukraine from 1989) and smaller parts of the UOC MP, which, under Metropolitan Filaret, had not agreed with the refusal of the ROC to give autocephaly for UO. It was founded by Patriarch Mstyslav Skrypnyk, who was at the same time the head of the UOC in the United States. The UOC KP is now led by patriarchs Filaret and Denysenko. It includes under its jurisdiction 30 dioceses in Ukraine and 6 dioceses abroad (Russia, Germany, France, Greece, and the United States). It has 16 seminaries and academies, 22 monasteries, 10 brotherhoods, and 18 missions. The main cathedral of the UOC KP is the Church of Saint Volodymyr in Kyiv.

The third Orthodox body, the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC), was created in 1993 by the small group of former UOC KP clergy, which until June 1992 had been in the UAOC that had existed from 1989 to June 1992. These clergy disagreed with the leadership of the UOC KP of Metropolitan Filaret. The charismatic leader of this group, Volodymyr Yarema, was ordained as a bishop in 1993 and subsequently elected the patriarch of this new UAOC. He was succeeded in September 2000 by the present metropolitan, Mephodij Kudriakov. The UAOC has 11 dioceses, 1,015 religious organizations, 1 monastery, and 6 seminaries. More than 90 percent of its parishes are located in Galicia, though its headquarters have been stationed in Kyiv.

In addition to the three large churches, a variety of smaller Orthodox communities, most with ethnically Russian roots, are also present, including the two branches of the Old Believers Russian Orthodox Church, one with clergy (58 religious organizations) and one without (12 religious organizations). Also visible are the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia (7 religious organizations), the Russian True Orthodox Church (35 organizations), the Apocalyptic Orthodox Church (4 organizations), the Greek Orthodox Church (2 organizations), the Innocentian Church (1 organization), and several independent parishes (4 organizations).

After the intensive movement of Ukrainians through the 20th century, Ukrainian Orthodox structures were established abroad: in America, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the U.S.A. was founded in 1924; it now has 3 dioceses and 95 parishes. It was unrecognized until 1995 but has since been in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. The Ukrainian Orthodox Church in Canada, founded in 1918, has 3 dioceses and 260 parishes. Also unrecognized for many years, in 1990 it came into communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. There are also separate dioceses in Western Europe, Australia, and South America. Orthodox communities of Ukrainians have also created structures in Romania (the Ukrainian decanate of the Romanian Orthodox Church) and Poland (several dioceses of the OCP in which Ukrainians are in the majority). An independent and informative Internet site devoted to Ukrainian Orthodoxy can be found.

Sociological data show that 61 percent of the Ukrainian population recognize themselves as adherents of Orthodoxy; however, only 35 percent (57 percent of Orthodox believers) are sure concerning their concrete church affiliation (indicative that many people see Orthodoxy more as an abstract historical tradition than as their actual religious practice). The UOC MP, which unites 37 percent of the all-Ukrainian religious organizations (70 percent from the Orthodox organizations), is supported by 12 percent of the population; the UOC KP, which unites 12 percent from the general number of communities (22 percent among Orthodox churches), has 22 percent of the adherents among the all-Ukrainian population; the UAOC (representing 4 percent of all-Ukrainian organizations and 8 percent of Orthodox ones) has 1 percent of the supporters. These figures show that the real jurisdictional priorities of the population do not coincide with existing church infrastructures. They also indicate that the thrust toward an autocephalous structure has significantly stronger support in the society than the pro-Russian position. The likelihood of a unified autocephalous church that will be recognized by the other Orthodox patriarchates is high.

Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Kyivan Patriarchate
Church of Saint Volodymyr in Kyiv 36 Pushkina St.
Kyiv
Ukraine
<http://www.ukrainian-orthodoxy.org/index.asp>

Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church
1 Entrance
8-A Triokhsviatytel's'ka St.
Kyiv
Ukraine

Andrij Yurash

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Orthodox Church of Poland; Romanian Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

References

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Pavlyshyn, M., ed. One Thousand Years of Christianity in Ukraine: Papers from a Symposium at the Australian National University, Canberra, 15 August 1987. Melbourne: Department of Slavic Languages/Monash University, 1988.
- Ukrainian Orthodox Calendar*. South Bound Brook, NJ: Ukrainian Orthodox Church of the U.S.A., issued annually.
- Zinkewych, O., and A. Sorokowski, eds. A Thousand Years of Christianity in Ukraine: An Encyclopedic Chronology. New York: Smolokypb Publishers and the National Committee to Commemorate the Millennium in Ukraine, 1988.

Ukrainian Catholic Church

Christianity came to what is now Ukraine at the end of the first millennium CE, and following the division between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy in 1054, the Ukrainians adhered to the latter. The church in Ukraine was under the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate residing in Constantinople. In the 14th century, Lithuania, a Roman Catholic nation, invaded the region, and much of the national and ethnic identity of the Ukrainians was developed in opposition to the imposed Lithuanian authority.

In 1439 the Orthodox metropolitan of Kiev, Isidore, attended the Council of Florence, a gathering of the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, and agreed to the union of the Ukrainian Orthodox with the Roman Catholics. Many Ukrainians accepted the union, but many rejected it and remained Orthodox in faith. Then in 1569, following the union of Lithuania and Poland, control of the region passed to Poland. Catholic leaders made a new effort to unite Catholic and Orthodox structures as a means of stopping the growth of Protestantism.

Interior of a Ukrainian Greek Catholic church in Nadvirna, Ukraine. (Chernetskiy/Dreamstime.com)

In this context, a number of Orthodox began to see a union with Rome as a means of saving their church from absorption into the Latin-rite Roman Church, which was expanding rapidly. Thus in 1596, at a gathering of Orthodox bishops, a new union of Ukrainian Orthodoxy with Rome was proclaimed. Over the next century the majority of Ukrainians accepted it. It survived until the 19th century, when Russia expanded its control in the region. Russian authorities suppressed the Roman Catholic Church and incorporated both the Ukrainian Catholic Church and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church into the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). The Ukrainian Catholic Church survived in Galicia, western Ukraine, which had by this time come under Austrian control.

The Ukrainian Catholic Church flourished during the early 20th century under the brilliant leadership of Andrew Sheptyckyj. Beginning in the late 19th century, Ukrainians had started to migrate worldwide, and Catholic parishes began to emerge in the United States, Canada, South America, Australia, and Western Europe. These parishes played an important part in keeping Ukrainian identity alive during the years after World War II, when the Soviet Union annexed Galicia, Poland deported most Ukrainians in Poland to the Soviet Union, and the Soviet government suppressed the Ukrainian Catholic Church. All of the bishops were arrested, and all but one died in prison. Believers were forced to choose between the Russian Orthodox Church and the Latin-rite Roman Catholic Church, though in fact the Ukrainian Catholic Church survived as an underground church.

Only with the weakening of the Soviet Union at the end of the 1980s was a distinctive Ukrainian Catholic Church re-established, when in 1989 a new bishop of Przemyśl was named. In 1991, Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky (1931–2000) was able to move into his residence in Lviv. By the end of the year seminaries were established at Lviv, and Ivano-Frankivsk and religious orders were revived. In 2000, Cardinal Lubomyr Husar succeeded Cardinal Lubachivsky as head of the church.

In 2001, Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) visited Lviv. While there he beatified 28 Ukrainian Greek Catholics, 26 of whom had died during Soviet persecutions. Soon afterward, in 2005 Cardinal Husar moved the headquarters of the archdiocese from Lviv to Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, and his title was changed to Major Archbishop of Kiev and Halych. Headquarters of the church will be in the Patriarchal Cathedral of the Resurrection of Christ in Kiev, which remains under construction as of 2010.

Meanwhile the church in diaspora continued on. There are five dioceses in Canada and four in the United States. There are also dioceses in Australia, Brazil, and Argentina. Apostolic exarchates have been appointed for France, Germany, and the United Kingdom. Ukrainian Catholic seminaries are located in Washington, D.C.; Stamford, Connecticut; Ottawa, Ontario; and Curitiba, Brazil. There is a Ukrainian college in Rome. There were a reported 4,224,000 members worldwide in 2008, making the Ukrainian church the largest of the several Eastern Catholic churches.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Dyrud, Keith P. The Quest for the Rusyn Soul: The Politics of Religion and Culture in Eastern Europe and in America, 1890–World War I. Philadelphia: Balch Institute, 1992.
- Himka, John-Paul. The Greek Catholic Church and Ukrainian Society in Austrian Galicia. Cambridge, MA: Ukrainian Studies Fund, Harvard University, 1986.
- Kuzio, Taras. Ukraine: Perestroika to Independence. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000.

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman, 1960.

Sianchuk, John. Blessed Bishop Nicholas Charnetsky, C.Ss.R., and Companions: Modern Martyrs of the Ukrainian Catholic Church. Liguori, MO: Liguori Publications, 2002.

Ullam-bana

Ullam-bana is a Chinese festival celebrated in China, Korea, Japan, and throughout the Chinese diaspora. Though most developed in China, Ullam-bana originated in India, where it was tied to the rainy season. Indian monsoon retreats traditionally lasted from the 16th day of the 4th lunar month to the 15th day of the 7th month. Buddhist monks ceased their largely wandering life and generally spent the time in company with others. For the monk, the time allowed for growth and regeneration, but popular speculation suggested that the travel restrictions actually provided protection for newly arisen life forms who might be harmed by traveling monks. Ullam-bana derived from the last day of the retreat period, traditionally referred to as the Buddha Happiness Day, as the monks would have made progress in their cultivation (practice) from their retreat.

Ullam-bana was transferred to China quite early—the first recorded instance dating to 538 CE, when it was noted that the Emperor Liang carried out a fast on the 15th day of the 7th month. Over time the festival was also conflated with the Daoist Zhong Yuan festival of the 15th day of the 7th month, in which officials in the lower realms forgive sins. The combined version of the Daoist and Buddhist celebration meant that the seventh month was the time when the gates of hell would be opened and the suffering ghosts could wander freely in the realm of humans. The souls of those trapped in the underworld, whose descendants have made no offerings for them, would be free to cross the boundaries where the underworld and the visible world meet. These souls are known as pretas (the “hungry ghosts” seen in many Hong Kong “vampire” movies) and if unchecked may cause a variety of mischief and evil. Thus Ullam-bana also came to be known as the Festival of Hungry Ghosts, and the entire month as the “ghost month.”

For the Buddhist, the observance of Ullam-bana derives its content from the Ullam-bana Sutra, a Mahayana text, which tells the story of the arhat (enlightened person) Maudgalyayana (or Mulian). Mulian discovered that his deceased mother was trapped in a realm of pain and suffering most characterized by an inability to eat. He made his way to the netherworld in hopes of ameliorating her situation, but all his efforts proved futile. Finally, he appealed directly to the Buddha, who informed him that by himself he could do nothing to relieve his mother’s suffering. The Buddha told Mulian that he had to make offerings of various items to the sangha (the monks and nuns), and then join them in prayers for his mother’s liberation from hell. His action would affect his mother, but also be advantageous for all of his other deceased relatives.

Ullam-bana marks the day on which Mulian performed what the Buddha had told him to do. On this day, the Buddhist faithful will offer prayers for the souls of their ancestors going back seven generations, but focus especially on deceased parents. They will also visit local temples with offerings for the monks and nuns. The prayers and offerings of the day are believed to alleviate the suffering of ancestors and shorten the time before they are able to enter the heavenly realms. At the same time, those who follow traditional Chinese religion (and there is not a strict line demarking them from Buddhists) may burn spirit money for their ancestors to use in their present spirit life, and will attempt to appease the hungry ghosts by offering them food, drink, and entertainment, and use the occasion to also imbibe of the same.

In Japan Ullam-bana is known as Obon and celebrated on the same day, though with slightly different emphases.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancestors.

References

- Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.
- Robinson, Richard H., and Willard L. Johnson. The Buddhist Religion: A Historical Introduction. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing Company, 1997.
- Stepanchuk, Carol, and Charles Wong. Mooncakes and Hungry Ghosts: Festivals of China. San Francisco, CA: China Books & Periodicals, 1992.
- Thompson, Laurence G. Chinese Religion. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing Company, 1996.

Umbanda

Umbanda, a Brazilian-based religion closely related to Candomblé, integrated Afro-Brazilian and kardecistic-spiritistic doctrines and practices, along with various indigenous elements. With its desire to magically manipulate the empirical world according to the sorrows and necessities of its adherents, Umbanda has remained loyal to the Afro-Brazilian tradition. At the same time it has excluded blood sacrifice, and, compared with Candomblé, initiation into Umbanda is considerably less costly, in terms of both money and preparation time. Like Spiritism, Umbanda focuses on an altruistic morality and charity.

As an institutionalized religion, Umbanda emerged in the 1930s, when a far-reaching process of urbanization and industrialization began, and the political context supported the ideological integration of a new society. Hence Brazilian scholars of religion point out that the consolidation of Umbanda reflects the search by a still disintegrated population for a national identity, capable of harmonizing internal contradictions, including racial tensions. Umbanda established itself on a larger scale in the 1950s, especially in Rio de Janeiro, Porto Alegre, and Sao Paulo. Until today the urban character remains a key element. As the Datafolha survey showed, 69 percent of all Umbanda members in 1991 were inhabitants of major Brazilian cities, and 56 percent were white.

People prepare offerings to Yemanjá, the Goddess of the Sea of the Afro-American religion Umbanda, on February 2, 2010, at a beach in Montevideo, Uruguay. (Getty Images)

Brazilian scholars subsume both Umbanda and Candomblé in the category of “mediumistic religions.” The 1991 census treated Candomblé and Umbanda as a statistical unit, with 648,463 members (0.44 percent of the total population). According to the 1994 Datafolha study, about 1 percent of Brazil’s adult population were associated with Candomblé, and 1 percent with Umbanda, a figure also in high tension with the results of the last national census that counted 416,930 “Ubandistas” (0.28 percent of the population). The Federação Nacional de Tradição e Cultura Afro-Brasileira projected a very different picture, with an estimate that 70 million Brazilians are participants in either Candomblé or Umbanda. Among several Umbanda organizations is the Initiatic Order of the Divine Cross, an Umbanda temple established in 1970 by the medium F. Rivas Neto.

Initiatic Order of the Divine Cross
Rua Chebl Massud, 157
Bairro Água Funda
São Paulo
Brazil

http://www.umbanda.org/conce_e.htm
<http://www.jornalumbandahoje.com.br/>

Frank Usarski

See also: Candomblé; Spiritism.

References

- Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of the Interpenetration of Civilizations. Trans. by Helen Sebba. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2007.
- Brown, Diana DeGroat. Umbanda: Religion and Politics in Urban Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Colombia University Press, 1994.

Unarius

Unarius, one of several religions to emerge out of the claims of contact with advanced beings from outer space, emerged out of the spiritualist work of Ernest Norman (1904–1971) and his wife, Ruth Norman (1900–1993). Unarians believe that the Normans have been reincarnated a number of times, on occasion together. For example, Ernest appeared as the Egyptian pharaoh Amenhotep, and Ruth as the pharaoh’s mother. Most important, Ernest is believed to have been Jesus and Ruth his betrothed. Ruth was also believed to have been the woman who sat as a model for Leonardo da Vinci’s Mona Lisa. Unarius is seen as the return of Jesus and the renewal of his work, which was so abruptly stopped by his untimely death.

Unarius (“universal articulate interdimensional understanding of science”) was organized in 1954, and during its early years it was built around the channeling of Ernest Norman, who claimed contact with beings on a variety of planets. Following his death in 1971, Ruth emerged as a channel and over the next 20 years produced a number of texts. She also produced a basic set of lesson materials, which became the curriculum for new Unarius members. These lessons, “The Psychology of Consciousness” and “Self-Mastery, the Infinite Concept of Cosmic Creation,” concentrate on bringing forth the latent potentials in each individual.

The original materials channeled from beings on the planets Venus, Mars, Hermes, Eros, Orion, and Muse related information on life in other worlds, their advanced science, and, most important, information on spiritual development and healing. Healing may occur utilizing energy directed from the great intelligences on other worlds.

Building on her husband's earlier works, Ruth Norman offered an integrated picture of the many planets that she asserted were combined into an Intergalactic Federation. These advanced planets contacted Ruth and invited Earth into the confederation through her. A joining occurred in 1973, with Ruth (spiritual name, Ioshanna) as the principal contact. Since that time, Earth has been seen as progressing so that in the future it can become a full member of the confederation.

Following Ruth Norman's death, Unarius was led by Charles Spiegel (1921–1999). It is currently led by a board of senior students. Members are scattered across North America and study groups operate in Mexico, Austria, and Nigeria (2009).

In 1988, on the occasion of the release of the film directed by Martin Scorsese, The Last Temptation of Christ, Ruth Norman issued a claim that she was the reincarnation of the biblical character Mary of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus. She authored a book, The Bridge to Heaven: My 2,000-Year Psychic Memory as Mary of Bethany—13th Disciple to Jesus of Nazareth, in which she suggested that Mary of Bethany was the betrothed of Jesus of Nazareth, and was later identified with Mary Magdalene (a prostitute) by Jesus' disciples. In the middle of the first decade of the new century, as Dan Brown's novel The Da Vinci Code became a best-seller, Unarius's current leadership reasserted Norman's claim.

Unarius
143 S. Magnolia
El Cajon, CA 92022
<http://www.unarius.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reincarnation; UFO Religions.

References

Ioshanna [Ruth Norman]. A Space Woman Speaks from Outer Space. El Cajon, CA: Unarius, n.d.

Norman, Ernest L. The Voice of Venus. Santa Barbara, CA: Unarius–Science of Life, 1956.

Pathway to Light: An Introduction to the Unarius Science of Life. El Cajon, CA: Unarius Academy of Science, 1995.

The Universal Hierarchy. A Pictorial Tour of Unarius. El Cajon, CA: Unarius Educational Foundation, 1982.

◆ Unbelief

The term “unbelief,” as used in this encyclopedia, refers directly to the modern community of people and organizations who advocate those philosophical/ideological positions that do not include a belief in God, either in the singular or plural, and have no use for various supernatural realities, often seen as the essence of religion, including prayer, miracles (in the sense of divine intervention in the natural order), revelation, or life after death. Such philosophical positions go under a variety of names—atheism, humanism, agnosticism, Freethought, rationalism, secularism, and so forth.

Through the centuries, numerous individuals, and even religious groups, have espoused positions that formally could be called unbelief. In the ancient West, unbelief has been ascribed to those philosophers who challenged various supernatural assumptions commonly held within Greek society, such as the belief in demonic inspiration and divination. In the East, Jainism and Theravada Buddhism developed extensive religious systems without the need of positing a God as a focus of worship.

However, modern unbelief does not encompass every form taken by alternatives to theism and polytheism; rather, it refers to the critical approach taken to Western Christianity that emerged in post-Reformation Europe in which unbelief was unbelief in Christian theism (and to a lesser extent, Judaism). Attacks upon the belief in God as irrational and lacking evidential support began to be made in the 18th century, but a foundation for these attacks had been laid by the events of the previous centuries.

At the beginning of the 16th century, Western Europe was united religiously by the Roman Catholic Church. Although its power varied considerably from country to country, the challenges to its hegemony were relatively localized and were dealt with by the power of the state. However, the attack on the church's power that began with Martin Luther (1483–1546) in the second decade of the new century would by the end of the century remake the religious map of Europe significantly. Different countries would emerge with Lutheran, Reformed-Presbyterian, or Anglican establishments in power, and additional space would be provided for Mennonites, Socinians (non-Trinitarians), and various small mystical groups such as the Schwenfelders.

Relative to the time, the champion of unbelief was Michael Servetus (1511–1553), the Spanish physician who wrote a book comparing the Christian Trinity to the three-headed hound of hell. For this and other opinions expressed in his 1553 work on the restitution of Christianity, he was first imprisoned by the Inquisition. Escaping, he fled to Geneva, where Reformed Church leader John Calvin (1509–1564) saw to his arrest and execution. Although Lutherans, Calvinists, and Anglicans had challenged a set of Roman Catholic beliefs, they did not disagree concerning the doctrine of God (and that unanimity would quickly push the Socinians from their brief ascendancy in Poland).

Protestantism, while still operating within an orthodox Christian world, did begin the process of criticism of popular supernaturalism that had become institutionalized in Roman Catholicism. It challenged the nature of the Eucharist, the central Christian sacrament, and offered alternatives to the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, which holds that the bread and the wine once consecrated are transformed in substance into that of the Body and Blood of Christ (although their appearance remains unchanged). Protestants also challenged the use of numerous relics and the doctrine of purgatory (and the accompanying system of rewards and punishments associated with it).

A next step, the challenge to some of the pervasive views shared by both Protestant and Roman Catholic Christians alike, emerged in the 17th century. Deism affirmed the existence of God but generally denied its miraculous or supernatural elements. Such belief generally saw Jesus as a great moral teacher but denied that as the Christ he was the second person of a Triune

God. Deism was often seen as a natural or reasonable religion (as opposed to revealed religion). According to its initial advocate, Edward Herbert, Lord Cherbury (1583–1648), Deism focused on five affirmations: the existence of a supreme being; the need for worship; piety and virtue as the primary forms of worship (rather than prayer and ritual); the need to repent of shortcomings; and a set of rewards and punishments awaiting individuals in the afterlife. The Deist worldview undercut belief in God's activity in the world, apart from maintaining the system through natural law and the validity of prayer.

Deism became popular among the educated elite as science developed. Although affirming the existence of God, it supplied a worldview that did not interfere with scientific experimentation and investigation, and a theology that did not answer scientific questions in a way that blocked further inquiry. Deism tended to adopt the view of God as the watchmaker who created the world, wound it up, and left it to run according to natural laws. Deism also included an anticlerical element, and many Deists attacked the church and the authority of its priests and ministers in secular matters, and publicized immoral acts attributed to church leaders in centuries past.

While arising in the 17th century, Deism became a significant movement in the 18th century. British Deist leaders included Lord Shaftsbury (1621–1683), Alexander Pope (1688–1744), Anthony Collins (1676–1729), and Thomas Woolston (1669–1732). In France, Voltaire emerged as the leading Deist spokesperson and used his literary abilities to attack religion in general and the Roman Catholic Church in particular. In the British American colonies, Deism emerged as the faith of the most prominent revolutionaries—Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, John Adams, and George Washington.

Atheism As Deism was gathering a wide following, a next step was taken away from the dominant religious sentiments in Western society with the development of perspectives that dispensed with the notion of a deity as an ultimate point of reference. Because of the need to establish itself within a society in which the overwhelming majority profess theism, the non-theistic perspective struggled to find space to exist in reference to the larger community; it was commonly perceived as a negative position, simply a denial of God and religion. To the contrary, atheists have generally insisted that their position is not so much a denial of God as the development of a perspective on life after having found no convincing evidence that something called God exists, and of creating a lifestyle in which God is unnecessary either as a moral authority or an object of worship.

Portrait of Voltaire, French Enlightenment-era author and philosopher famous for his crusades against social injustice and religious intolerance. (Library of Congress)

Atheism thus includes a variety of belief systems that lack any belief in a God or in multiple gods. Some go even further and say that the very term “God” has no meaning to them. The assertion of such a perspective has put atheists at odds with the mainstream of religious thought as it has existed in the West since the 17th century. Although hinted at in earlier works, atheism was first openly asserted in the modern West in 1772 in a book by Paul Henri Holbach (1723–1789), The System of Nature, though his position had been implied in several earlier texts in which he criticized the church and Christian theology.

As atheism developed, it did so under a variety of names, each indicating a major theme and a slightly different emphasis in thought—Freethought, rationalism, secularism, and Humanism being the most popular. The concept of Freethought developed in the 18th century to describe systems of dissent from specific religious propositions. As science was emerging as a relatively secular endeavor, Freethought insisted that science be free from various theological debates and conclusions, and be allowed to develop its own vocabulary and methodology as it pursued its investigation of the world—that scientists be freed to follow the paths opened by the logic of their thoughts. Inasmuch as scientific conclusions offered dissenting views on what most considered religious issues, from the sanctity of the human body to the age of the universe, Freethought became identified with non-Christian views and eventually with atheism.

Rationalism refers to any one of several philosophical positions characterized by the elevation of reason to the level of a dominating metaphysical or epistemological principle. In one sense, rationalism has a significant philosophical history, as the philosophical school begun by René Descartes (1596–1650). In the more popular sense, however, rationalism refers to a position adopted by many unbelievers suggesting that religious beliefs and practices be subjected to a rational examination and accepted or rejected on the same basis as one would accept or reject other matters. In examining religions, rationalists tended to reject theological supernaturalism and practices such as worship and prayer, which they tended to condemn as “irrational”—that is, contrary to reason as they used it.

Secularism is a perspective on the world that begins with the division of the world into two realms, the sacred and the secular—that is, the realm of the divine and the religious, and those aspects of life that may be considered apart from either. As originally proposed in the mid-19th century, secularism had a special concern for ethics and the development of ethical systems apart from theology. Secularism thus came to mean the practical process of improving humans and society without reference to religion or religious institutions. Secularism has also taken on special connotations with regard to the single issue of the separation of church and state, in its more absolutist sense—namely that not only should government not interfere with religion, but that religious ideas should not be injected into governmental processes.

Humanism, a term that covers a variety of philosophical perspectives, arose anew in the early 20th century as a renewed attempt to build a human-centered worldview and ethic that by implication rejected supernatural understandings of the operation of the universe and an ethic based upon pragmatic human values and love.

France has been particularly important in the development of unbelief. The term “atheism” was coined in France, where it was often used in conjunction with the term “libertine” (freed man). The latter term came to be used almost exclusively for sexually liberated individuals, but originally it included those who were intellectually and theologically free. Deism flowered in France in the 18th century, Voltaire (1694–1778) emerging as its champion. Denis Diderot (1713–1784) was possibly the first true French atheist.

The revolution in France, as in the American colonies, was led by Deists, but because of the power exercised by the Catholic Church included a strong element of anticlericalism. Atheism was present in post-revolutionary France and produced some outstanding lights, such as pioneer sociologist August Comte (1798–1857), but it found its major expression over the next century in various anti-Catholic events, including the secularizing of the schools in the 1880s. Church and state were separated in 1905. French Freemasonry also created a non-theistic form of its esoteric teachings. In the 20th century, atheism has found expression in various Freethought groups (La Libre Pensée being the largest national organization), and atheists have taken to promoting the national policy against minority religions.

In the last half of the 19th century, throughout the Western world, people who identified themselves as atheists, freethinkers, rationalists, secularists, or Humanists began to create organizations and movements to support their various tendencies, now grouped under the umbrella of unbelief. Among the earliest and most important of the 19th-century organizations were the First Society of Free Enquirers (founded by Abner Kneeland [1774–1844] in Boston in 1834); the Bund freier religiöser Gemeinden Deutschlands (founded in Germany in 1859); and the National Secular Society (founded by Charles Bradlaugh [1833–1891] in England in 1866).

The Issue of Marxism In the West, unbelief has generally distinguished itself from what was arguably the most successful non-theistic system to arise in the modern world, Marxism. Marxism has been tied in the public consciousness with totalitarian governments in the Soviet Union and post-revolutionary China.

The philosophy of Karl Marx (1818–1883) was much more anticlerical than atheistic, and he felt that most religion (as experienced in the state-aligned religions of the 19th century) was, as expressed in his most famous quotation, the “opiate of the people”: it lulled people into accepting their exploited status in the lower levels of the social order and acquiescing to rule by the few. He had positive views of some Christian movements, but he argued that both Judaism and Christianity were expressions of stages in human development that had to be surpassed if progress were to occur. Marx felt that religions are a human product that, like other human ideologies, reflect the social systems that perpetuate them.

Marx’s economic critique of history took form primarily in political parties that went on to participate in the governmental systems of different countries. The atheism that was implicit in his thought became operationalized in the Communist Party. However, it was largely assumed in the 20th century that to be a Communist was to be an atheist, and the support for atheism and the resultant disparagement of religion became embedded in the national policies of those countries in which Marxism became the ruling philosophy—the Soviet Union, the People’s Republic of China, North Korea, Vietnam, and the countries of Eastern Europe. Albania was the only country, however, that formally (in 1967) proclaimed itself an atheist nation and acted on that proposition by outlawing all forms of religion, closing all of its churches and mosques, and imprisoning many of the clergy. Only in 1991 was freedom of religion restored.

In the Soviet Union atheism became institutionalized in a succession of organizations: the League of the Godless, the League of the Militant Godless, and the Institute of Scientific Atheism (which continues into the post-Soviet era). Initially the Soviets focused upon efforts to marginalize religion and end the institutional authority of the church. The formation of the League of the Godless, however, represented the emergence of active promotion of atheism through the press, social institutions, and specialized organizations. Through succeeding decades religious policy periodically shifted its emphases between the promotion of atheism and the forceful suppression of religion.

Karl Marx, the 19th-century German philosopher and socialist revolutionary who founded modern communism. (Library of Congress)

In China, the critique of what were seen as various systems of exploitation reached out to include religion. Chinese policy led initially to the cutting of the ties between religious groups and any foreign leadership, especially in the case of Christianity, the complete reorganization of the various religious communities into five approved religious organizations, and the imposition of an ideology that was more aligned to the new Marxist Maoist government. While this reorganization was occurring, many government leaders, representing the Chinese community, argued that religion and Marxism were incompatible. Chinese Communist antagonism toward religion reached its zenith during the period of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). Since that time a much more accommodationist policy has been adopted, though government attacks on religion have continued.

As the new century begins, religion in China survives, and an official policy of freedom of religious belief has been written into the law. It is also the case that the Chinese Communist Party is officially atheist and that membership in the party and belief in religion are considered mutually exclusive. In between those people who are members of officially accepted religions and the party is a mass of unofficial religious activity that is still subject to periodic suppression by the atheist government. It remains the strong belief in those countries still ruled by Marxism that religion and belief in God will eventually pass away. In the world, the spread of Marxism accounts for the great majority of unbelief, which includes some 55 percent of the North Koreans, 42 percent of the Chinese, 31 percent of the Czechs, and 27 percent of the Russians.

Modern Western Unbelief Through the 20th century, as Marxism rose and then faced the crisis of the fall of the Soviet Union, non-Marxist forms of unbelief emerged as a popular movement that competed for the support of the public with religious groups. Groups professing non-theistic philosophies supported many values commonly offered by religious groups, including answers to the three main religious questions: Where did we come from? Why are we here? Where are we going? Answers to these questions were given without reference to God or the supernatural. Atheist groups also offered moral systems devoid of supernatural authorities and communal fellowship in their various local gatherings, national and international conventions, and even ritual life.

Non-Marxist atheism as a positive philosophy, as opposed to simple irreligion or concern with ultimate questions, enjoyed its greatest response in Europe and European outposts in North America, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. It has not fared well in South America, although it found some support in India, where a movement critical of Hinduism attacked many of the supernatural powers ascribed to various Indian spiritual teachers. As early as 1875, the Hindu Freethought Union appeared in Madras. It survived for two decades. Through the 20th century a succession of Indian organizations appeared, the most successful being the Indian Rationalist Association, founded in 1960.

In the West, organized atheism has proceeded country by country. In the United States, popular leadership was provided by organizations such as the National Liberal League, the Freethinkers of America (Joseph Lewis), the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, the American Humanist Association, American Atheists (Madalyn Murray O’Hair), and the Council for Secular Humanism (Paul Kurtz). Similarly, across Europe a number of national rationalist, humanist, Freethought, and atheist groups have been organized.

As early as 1880, the International Federation of Freethinkers (since 1936 the World Union of Freethinkers) was organized. The more substantive International Humanist and Ethical Union was formed in 1952. It now includes member groups from around the world. A specifically Jewish form of unbelief emerged in the 1960s and eventually gave birth to the International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews.

Although the different communities of unbelief have generally reached a consensus on the issues of God and the supernatural, they have disagreed on the issue of religion. Humanists, in particular, have expressed positive approaches to religion and have developed (or continued) religious structures that they feel contribute to ameliorating the human condition or provide a ritual dramatization of the important events of the life cycle—birth, coming of age, marriage, death. Secular Judaism perpetuates synagogue life under the leadership of rabbis. The American Humanist Association “ordains” celebrants (Humanist ministers) who lead celebration services (analogous to Protestant worship services). Operating in a somewhat different context, the Norwegian Humanist organization Human-Etisk Forbund, one of the largest in Europe, has worked for a secular alternative to Christian confirmation (through which most Norwegian youths have traditionally passed). As the new century begins, these “civil” confirmations are celebrated annually in some 90 locations throughout Norway with some 4,000 young people, approximately 10 percent of the relevant age group, taking part.

In response, many atheist and Freethought groups eschew any form of religious activity. They see themselves as over against religion rather than providing a non-theistic or non-supernatural alternative to it. The Council for Secular Humanism is among those groups opposed to associating unbelief in any way with religion.

In the first decade of the new millennium, neo-atheism, a new aggressive atheism, made its appearance in the wake of a rising belief in creationism as a pseudo-scientific hypothesis challenging the teaching of evolutionary biology in the public schools in America. The leading voice of the new movement, which differs from older non-Marxist forms of atheism more by its aggressive attempts to proselytize for atheism than any content in its stance, is Richard Dawkins, (b. 1941), a professor of biology at Oxford University. He has been joined by writers such as Sam Harris and Christopher Hitchens (b. 1949), who lecture widely on evolution and atheism.

During the 1990s, a small cadre of scholars had also proposed a new argument that they felt both challenged current Darwinian approaches to understanding biology while avoiding the issues of religion inherent in creationism. The new position, called intelligent design, appeared to be a way to overcome issues of separation of church and state, especially after several school districts had installed intelligent design in their school’s curriculum. Such actions were challenged almost immediately and the case in Dover, Pennsylvania, proved decisive. In the 2005 court decision Kitzmiller v. Dover Area School District, the judge ruled that the religious nature of intelligent design was readily apparent to any objective observer. The intelligent design movement, which had become an early target of neo-atheists, largely collapsed after the court ruling.

While atheists accepted the collapse of intelligent design as a victory, the forces mounted against it were far broader than the relatively small atheist or unbelief community. In the United States, at about the same time, they faced a major crisis when in 2004 British philosopher Antony Flew (b. 1923), a prominent atheist through the 20th century, announced that he had become a theist.

Pseudoscience Increasingly associated with unbelief is the crusade against pseudoscience. A pseudoscience is a set of related ideas based on theories put forth as scientific but which upon examination lack any scientific base. The ideas may be based on an inadequate methodology, false or fraudulent information, or supernatural claims. During the 19th century, occult and Esoteric claims revived, claiming to have scientific support from movements like mesmerism, and then as science expanded, found confirmation in a variety of scientific findings.

At the end of the 20th century, a variety of people examined and debunked the claims of Spiritualist mediums to contact the dead and produce various physical phenomena. As claims of paranormal phenomena proliferated in the years after World War II, including the obvious popularity of astrology, some humanists, led by Paul Kurtz, then a leader in the American Humanist Association, took the lead in the founding of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP), since 2006 known as the Committee for Skeptical Inquiry.

The leadership of the Committee saw the rise of interest in the paranormal, psychic phenomena, alternative forms of healing, UFOs, and related phenomena as dangerous to society and representative of a general decline in critical thinking. The Committee promoted the development of a “skeptical” movement designed to debunk what it saw as pseudoscience, gave rise to local affiliated chapters across North America, and led to the formation of several like organizations, such as the Los Angeles–based Skeptical Society. It also became the model for several similar organizations now found in more than 30 countries around the world. The Committee now nurtures an International Network of Skeptical Organizations with affiliated chapters in some 41 countries (2009) and a regional organization for Europe.

Agnosticism Arising along with atheism was a slightly different position of unbelief, agnosticism. The term was coined by Thomas Henry Huxley (1825– 1895) in 1869 to indicate a methodology of refusing to assert knowledge about things that are not demonstrated or even demonstrable. Huxley’s position, as later expanded and popularized, has identified agnosticism as the position that God or the origin of the universe is unknowable, and hence it is best to refrain from opinions on the subject.

The agnostic position has generally assumed a certain methodology in looking at the world and coming to conclusions about matters that could be labeled as “true.” Most have found in scientific methodology the way to truth, and hence they rely primarily on reason and the empirical method as the proper way of knowing the universe. Belief in a deity (and many related theological realities) pushes the individual beyond the confines of scientific methodology. Hence, for the person who assumes such a methodology, discourse on God and divine realities is beyond the realm of knowledge. The agnostic chooses to withhold judgment on such matters.

European Council of Skeptical Organizations
Postfach 1222, D-64374
Rossdorf
Germany

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Agnosticism; American Atheists; Atheism; Calvin, John; Council for Secular Humanism; Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge; Humanism; International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews; International Humanist and Ethical Union; Jainism; Luther, Martin; Roman Catholic Church; Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Angeles, Peter A., ed. Critiques of God: Making the Case against Belief in God. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 1997.
- Dawkins, Richard. The God Delusion. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 2006.
- Flynn, Tom, ed. The New Encyclopedia of Unbelief. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2007.
- Harris, Sam. The End of Faith: Religion, Terror, and the Future of Reason. New York: W. W. Norton, 2005.
- Hitchens, Christopher. God Is Not Great: How Religion Poisons Everything. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 2007.

- Howlett, Duncan. The Critical Way in Religion. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1980.
- Husband, William B. Godless Communists, Atheism and Society in Soviet Russia, 1917–1932. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University, 2000.
- Johnson, B. C. The Atheist Debater's Handbook. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1982.
- Kurtz, Paul, ed. The Humanist Alternative. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1973.
- Lamont, Corliss. Humanism as a Philosophy. New York: Philosophical Library, 1949.
- Larue, Gerald A. Freethought across the Centuries: Toward a New Age of Enlightenment. Amherst, NY: American Humanist Press, 1996.
- O'Hair, Madalyn Murray. Atheist Primer: Did You Know All the Gods Came from the Same Place? Austin, TX: American Atheist Press, 1978.
- Robertson, J. M. A History of Freethought, Ancient and Modern to the Period of the French Revolution. 2 vols. London: Watts and Co., 1936.
- Shermer, Michael. Why People Believe Weird Things. New York: W. H. Freeman and Company, 1997.
- Smart, J. J. C., and J. J. Haldane. Atheism and Theism. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers, 1997.
- Smith, George H. Atheism: The Case against God. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 1989.
- Stein, Gordon, ed. The Encyclopedia of Unbelief. 2 vols. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1985.
- Thrower, James. Western Atheism: A Short History. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.

Unification Movement

The Unification Movement (UM) refers to the messianic religious and social movement led by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon (b. 1920). It consists of a complex network of religious, media, industrial, commercial, cultural, and educational enterprises worldwide. Many of these organizations, such as The Washington Times and the University of Bridgeport, function independently and include only a few individuals who accept the messianic teachings of the movement. Nevertheless, all of these entities are in one way or another identified with Rev. Moon.

The Unification Church (UC)—formally, the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity (HSA-UWC)—stands at the center of the movement. It was founded May 1, 1954, in Seoul, Korea, but was not legally recognized by the government of the Republic of (South) Korea until 1963. Highly conversionistic, the UC sent its first missionaries to Japan and the United States in 1958 and 1959. The movement was largely dormant in the United States during the 1960s and had only 300 or so members in 1971. However, there was more dynamism in Japan, and in the early 1970s, Rev. Moon decided to concentrate the resources of the movement in America. He conducted a series of evangelistic tours that substantively increased the church's membership and visibility. By 1974, UM sources claimed that members in the United States had increased tenfold to 3,000. The movement filled New York's Madison Square Garden for a highly publicized speech by Rev. Moon on "The New Future of Christianity" in late 1974. He later spoke to large audiences at New York's Yankee Stadium (1975) and the Washington Monument (1976).

In 1975 the church sent out missionaries to 120 nations but still focused much of its activity in the United States. With the close of the evangelistic campaigns, the UM proliferated a variety of nonprofit and business organizations that extended well beyond the confines of the church. By the early 1970s, Rev. Moon had initiated an International Conference on the Unity of the Sciences (ICUS) that brought together numerous scientific luminaries annually. The movement also funded the Professors World Peace Academy (PWPA), which in 1992 gained a controlling interest in the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut. The movement operated Sung Hwa, later Sun Moon, University, in Korea, as well as the Little Angels Arts School. It also established the Bolshoi Ballet Academy in Washington, D.C. The Unification Theological Seminary (ca. 1975) served as the base for a broad-ranging ecumenical program, and during the mid-1970s the movement established its first two metropolitan daily newspapers, Sekai Nippo (1975) in Tokyo and The News World (1976) in New York City. The movement expended millions in founding The Washington Times (1983), which became its flagship media enterprise. In 1989 it established a major daily, Segye Ilbo, in Korea, and in 1996 it set up Tiempos Del Mundo, a Latin American hemispheric daily, in Buenos Aires. The movement's business operations in Korea—including its major holding, Tong-il Industries—were reported to have net assets worth nearly $200 million. The movement focused on maritime ventures in the United States, purchasing shipbuilding yards and fish-processing plants in Norfolk, Virginia; Bayou La Batre, Alabama; Gloucester, Massachusetts; and Kodiak, Alaska, during the late 1970s and 1980s.

Newly wed couples raise their hands in cheering during a mass wedding, January 23, 1996, in Manila, Philippines. The ceremony was initiated by Rev. Sun Myung Moon, founder of the South Korean Unification Movement. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Apart from these undertakings, the UM was known for its fervent anti-Communist activities. It set up chapters and training centers for “Victory Over Communism” in Korea and strenuously opposed Marxist advances on Japanese college campuses during the late 1960s and early 1970s. It funded Radio of Free Asia and the Freedom Leadership Foundation (FLF) in the United States during the same period. In 1973–1974, Rev. Moon initiated a highly publicized National Prayer and Fast for the Watergate Crisis (NPFWC) in support of President Richard Nixon, and he circulated an “Answer to Watergate” in most of the nation's major newspapers. During the 1980s the movement attempted to arm the West ideologically through various organizational affiliates, most notably CAUSA (Confédération des Associations pour l'Unification des Sociétés Américaines), which sponsored high-tech multimedia conferences for conservative leaders and clergy throughout the Americas. The Washington Times played an important role and was reportedly the newspaper of choice in the Reagan White House. At the same time, the movement took advantage of perestroika by assiduously cultivating contacts in the Communist world. Rev. Moon invited Soviet journalists to participate in annual World Media Conferences and, importantly, invested heavily in mainland China. These initiatives and others gained Rev. Moon private audiences with Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev (1990) and North Korean premier Kim Il Sung (1991).

With the collapse of the Eastern Bloc and Soviet Communism, the UM entered what it regarded as an era of messianic fulfillment, or what Rev. Moon termed the “Completed Testament Age.” The movement established innumerable Federations for World Peace and conducted high-profile sisterhood ceremonies between women from formerly enemy nations and peoples. However, the true gateways to the Completed Testament Age were massive International Holy Weddings over which Rev. and Mrs. Moon officiated in 1992, 1995, 1997, 1998, 1999, and 2000. The UM already had conducted record-breaking weddings for 1,800 couples (1975), 2,075 and 6,000 couples (1982), and 6,500 couples (1989). During the 1990s these numbers soared into the hundreds of thousands and even hundreds of millions as members under the auspices of the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification (FFWPU) campaigned worldwide to rededicate marriages and distributed holy wine, holy grape juice, and eventually holy candy on a mass basis. In addition to the globalization of the Blessing, the UM embarked upon an effort to reclaim a “restored and purified” Garden of Eden in the South American outback, acquiring vast tracts of land primarily in the Brazilian state of Mato Grosso do Sul after 1995.

All of these efforts were animated by the conviction that Rev. and Mrs. Moon are “the True Parents of all humanity . . . the Savior, the Lord of the Second Advent, the Messiah,” a declaration that Rev. Moon made publicly in 1992. This declaration brought to completion a series of experiences, which began on Easter morning, 1935, when Rev. Moon was praying alone on a mountaintop. Rev. Moon received what he understood to be “a special mission from Heaven through Jesus.” Afterward, according to his testimony, he “spent years searching precisely how to bring salvation to humankind.” In 1952 he completed a handwritten version of Wolli Wonbon (Original Text of the Principle). This was followed by Wolli Haesul (Explanation of the Principle, 1957) and Wolli Kangron (Exposition of the Principle, 1966), which has served as the movement’s definitive theological and holy text.

The latter was translated into English as Divine Principle (1973) or Exposition of the Divine Principle (1996), and Unificationists regard it as “the new expression of God’s truth” that unlocks the secrets of the Bible. It contains chapters on the creation, the Fall, the consummation of human history, the advent of the Messiah, resurrection, predestination, Christology, and an elaborate account of dispensational history, which concludes that the messiah was born as a Korean between 1917 and 1930. The text interprets the human fall in sexual terms and maintains that the crucifixion of Jesus was not God’s original will but the result of human ignorance and disbelief. After 1996, Rev. Moon instituted Hoon Dok Hae (gathering for reading and learning), utilizing passages from his many volumes of sermons. Some consider Hoon Dok Hae to have displaced the Principle. Others view it as a complementary and more universal expression of the “Completed Testament Word.” In 2004, a new authoritative set of Rev. Moon’s words, known as the Cheon Seong Gyeong (Heavenly Scripture), was prepared that ran to more than 2,000 pages.

The UM has not been subject to the apocalyptic configurations that have afflicted and destroyed other movements. Nevertheless, the broad scope and duration of negative reactions accompanying its emergence rendered it one of the most controversial new religious movements of the latter 20th century. The Communist regime in North Korea jailed Rev. Moon in 1948 for, among other things, “bringing disorder to society.” The South Korean government jailed him for draft evasion in 1955, and unsubstantiated rumors of church sex orgies swirled in Korean society. During the 1960s, Japanese media referred to the UM as “the religion that makes parents weep,” and in 1971 the practice of kidnapping and deprogramming began. During the 1970s, in the United States, the movement was widely regarded as a brainwashing cult that exploited members, known as “moonies,” and that practiced “heavenly deception.” Alternatively, the UM was depicted as a subversive group abridging the separation of church and state and influencing U.S. policy in behalf of the South Korean government. During the 1980s, the U.S. government jailed Rev. Moon on charges of tax evasion, and during the 1990s there were exposés and allegations leveled against Rev. Moon’s family. During the first decade of the new century, controversy erupted over Roman Catholic Archbishop Emmanuel Milingo's participation in a Unification-sponsored "International Marriage Blessing of Religious Leaders" in 2001. Additional irritants were the movement's call for Christian clergy to remove crosses from their churches in 2003 and a "coronation" of Rev. and Mrs. Moon as King and Queen of Peace at the U.S. Dirksen Senate Office building in 2004. Similar patterns of response have been prevalent elsewhere, notably in Europe, the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), South-east Asia, and Latin America. Still, in the United States and many countries, the Unification Church has gained acceptance as a bona fide religion; related movement components operate as legal entities, and it has been able to extend constitutional protections to members.

The UM's organizational structure is charismatic, with Rev. Moon exercising authority over the movement's direction and major operations. Immediate supervision is delegated to trusted elders, mainly Koreans and some Japanese, who form a spiritual hierarchy extending from senior to new members. The Unification Church has incorporated numerous national churches and maintains missions in more than 100 nations. However, leadership is often rotated and membership dispersed to forestall premature institutionalization. The literally hundreds of UM-related nonprofit and commercial organizations have led some to describe the UM as a religious multinational. For many years, the Unification Church maintained a World Mission Center in midtown Manhattan. However, the UM's international headquarters generally have been wherever Rev. Moon resides. During the 1970s and 1980s, that was Irvington, New York. During the 1990s, he resided for substantial periods in South America and South Korea. The movement has constructed a substantial religious shrine north of Seoul at Chungpyung Lake Training Center, where Rev. Moon frequently went for prayer and meditation. The site, which includes a "heavenly palace" with seating for several thousand as well as sacred trees and healing springs, is understood to be the meeting place of heaven and Earth.

Reliable membership totals are difficult to ascertain. During the 1970s, both the movement and its critics exaggerated its size, claiming between 2 and 3 million adherents worldwide. During the 1980s observers tended to downplay the movement's numbers, given a leveling off of conversions in the West. However, this was compensated by growth elsewhere. The number of marriage ceremony participants is the most reliable indicator of UM membership totals. Since 1960 Rev. Moon has "blessed" approximately 100,000 church couples, suggesting an adult UM membership population approaching 200,000. The UM would appear poised to build on these totals, given the favorable age, sex, and geographical distribution of its members and its encouragement of large families.

Unification Church in America

4 W. 43rd St.

New York, NY 10036

<http://www.unification.org/>

<http://www.etl.co.at/uc/europe/> (in Europe)

<http://www.etl.co.at/uc/index.htm> (multilanguage)

Michael L. Mickler

References

Barker, Eileen. The Making of a Moonie:

Choice or Brainwashing? London: Blackwell, 1984.

Chryssides, George. The Advent of Sun Myung Moon.

New York: St. Martin's, 1991.

Introvigne, Massimo. The Unification Church. Salt

Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 2000.

Mickler, Michael L., and Michael Inglis. Forty

Years in America: An Intimate History of the Unification Movement, 1959–1999. New York: HSA-UWC, 2000.

Sontag, Fredrick. Sun Myung Moon and the Unification Church. Nashville: Abingdon, 1977.

Unified Buddhist Church

The Unified Buddhist Church (UBC) of Vietnam is important for two related but distinct reasons. First, during the war in Vietnam, it was from 1964 to 1975 the vehicle of the Buddhist antiwar movement, a highly activist, pacifist movement with widespread popularity in South Vietnam and sufficient power to bring down several South Vietnamese governments. Second, from 1969 to the present it has been the institutional home of the Vietnamese Buddhist monk Thich Nhat Hanh, himself an important leader of the Buddhist antiwar movement in Vietnam, one of the most important leaders of the socially and politically activist Engaged Buddhism movement, and one of the most popular Buddhist teachers in the West today.

Vietnamese Buddhist monks in a procession for a Great Chanting Ceremony at Vinh Nghiem Pagoda in Ho Chi Minh City, southern Vietnam, March 16, 2007. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Shortly before the founding of the UBC, the South Vietnamese government of Ngo Dinh Diem had been favoring the Catholic Church and repressing Buddhism. The UBC was founded in South Vietnam in January 1964 in order to create a unified (Theravada and Mahayana) Buddhist church through the merging of the various Buddhist sects of South Vietnam. At the time, it represented 80 percent of the population of South Vietnam. The UBC was founded in order to protect Buddhist interests, to encourage Buddhist engagement with Vietnamese society, and to work for peace. It quickly became the voice of the Buddhist “Third Way” or “Struggle Movement” that was trying to end the war in that country. As such, it many times brought thousands of monks, nuns, and laypeople into the streets to demonstrate for peace and free elections and played a key role in bringing down several pro-war governments. In addition to its antiwar work, the UBC engaged in many actions for relief, healing, and reconstruction. They evacuated villagers caught in the crossfire; reconstructed villages destroyed in battle; arranged care for war orphans; helped develop rural villages with new agricultural methods, basic medicine, and sanitation; and helped prevent bloodshed as the war ended and the government changed hands.

In 1966 a splinter group opposed to the politics of the UBC broke off from the main body; the South Vietnamese government then removed legal recognition from the UBC and transferred it to the splinter group. Thereafter the UBC lacked legal standing in South Vietnam, though it continued its activities. The Ky and Thieu governments of South Vietnam and the postwar government of Vietnam severely suppressed the UBC and imprisoned many of its activists.

The Venerable Thich Nhat Hanh (b. 1926) re-established the UBC in France in 1969 as the Eglise Bouddhique Unifiee; present affiliates of the UBC stem from that re-establishment and recognize Thich Nhat Hanh as their spiritual teacher. In 2005 the government of Vietnam for the first time allowed Nhat Hanh to return to Vietnam and to teach openly.

Thich Nhat Hanh entered Tu Hieu monastery in Hue (central Vietnam) at age 16 and was ordained into the Lam Te (Lin-chi, Rinzai) Zen sect. His studies included both Mahayana and Theravada traditions, emphasizing mindfulness, gatha (short verses), and koan. Later he studied religion in the United States at Princeton University and lectured on religion at Columbia University.

Returning to Vietnam in 1964, Nhat Hanh, together with others, founded Van Hanh University in Saigon and the School of Youth for Social Service, one of the primary vehicles of Engaged Buddhism during the war in Vietnam and the main training center for Buddhist peace activists. In 1965 Nhat Hanh founded the Tiep Hien Order (the Order of Interbeing), a new branch of the Lam Te School and another manifestation of Engaged Buddhism; the Order consists of laypersons as well as monks and nuns and consists of those who have taken the Order's 14 precepts.

During the years of the Vietnam War, Nhat Hanh was one of the primary theoreticians and spokespersons of the Struggle movement, the Buddhist effort to bring peace to Vietnam while siding with neither North nor South. After his 1966 international speaking tour to publicize the Vietnamese Buddhist perspective he was banned from returning to Vietnam, whereupon he made his headquarters in France. In 1967 Nhat Hanh was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize by Martin Luther King, Jr., whom he had convinced to publicly repudiate the war. Nhat Hanh led the Buddhist delegation to the Paris Peace Talks on behalf of the UBC; while the delegation was not seated at the talks, they advocated for the Buddhist pro-peace perspective.

Since the war, Nhat Hanh has traveled the world leading workshops and retreats emphasizing mindfulness (cultivating awareness in the present moment) and the nonviolent engagement of Buddhism with society's problems. For Nhat Hanh, to practice Buddhism is to cultivate love and understanding, which will naturally be expressed in all aspects of life. Nhat Hanh's approach is typified in the title of his most famous book, Being Peace: one must be peace in order to make peace. His five Mindfulness Trainings are his socially engaged version of the Buddhist five lay precepts—for example, not only does one do no harm oneself, but one also finds ways to prevent others from causing harm, that is, one tries to prevent one's government from going to war. He has published some 85 books of both poetry and prose, more than 40 of these in English.

Today the headquarters of the Unified Buddhist Church, and of Thich Nhat Hanh's community of practitioners, is in Plum Village, France. In Vietnam, Tu Hieu Temple and Bat Nha Monastery are affiliated with Thich Nhat Hanh and the UBC. In the United States, two monasteries with residential monks and nuns belong to this lineage. There are home- and community-based practice groups in most countries of Western Europe, plus Argentina, Australia, Bermuda, Brazil, Canada, China, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, India, Israel, Japan, Malaysia, Mexico, Netherland Antilles, New Zealand, Poland, Puerto Rico, Russia, South Africa, Thailand, the United States, and Vietnam. This loose-knit lay organization is called the Community of Mindful Living. These all recognize Thich Nhat Hanh as their spiritual teacher. Parallax Press is the publishing division of the UBC and publishes materials on Engaged Buddhism.

Nhat Hanh considers as his students the monks and nuns whom he has ordained and those laypersons who have taken the 14 Precepts of the Order of Interbeing or the five Mindfulness Trainings from him. Nhat Hanh himself does not encourage Westerners to convert to Buddhism; he encourages them, if they are Christians, to "be good Christians"; if Jews, to "be good Jews." He does encourage everyone to take the five Mindfulness Trainings, in an ecumenical spirit, as guides for mindful living. He sees no reason why members of other religions should not engage in Buddhist practices such as mindfulness meditation.

Plum Village
New Hamlet
13 Martineau
33580 Dieulivol France
www.plumvillage.org

Sallie B. King

See also: Meditation.

References

- Forest, James H. The Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam: Fifteen Years for Reconciliation. Hof van Sonoy, Netherlands: International Fellowship of Reconciliation, 1978.
- Hunt-Perry, Patricia, and Lyn Fine. "All Buddhism Is Engaged: Thich Nhat Hanh and the Order of Interbeing." In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 35–66. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2000.
- King, Sallie B. "Thich Nhat Hanh and the Unified Buddhist Church: Nondualism in Action." In Engaged Buddhism: Buddhist Liberation Movements in Asia, edited by Christopher S. Queen and Sallie B. King, 321–363. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1996.
- Nhat Hanh, Thich. Being Peace. Berkeley, CA: Parallax Press, 1987.
- Nhat Hanh, Thich. Vietnam: Lotus in a Sea of Fire. New York: Hill and Wang, 1967.

Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada

The Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada unites French-speaking Baptists in eastern Canada, being one of the oldest Protestant bodies in a predominantly Roman Catholic area. It is a covenanting partner in Canadian Baptist Ministries.

The Union's roots are in the Grand Ligne Mission that was founded as a school by Mademoiselle Feller (1800–1868) with Louis Roussy (1815–1883) in 1835. In 1849 it became Baptist and by 1855 there were 20 preaching points and more than 3,000 converts. After Feller's death in 1868, nine churches organized as the Union des Églises Baptistes de Langue Françaises while remaining part of the Grande Ligne Mission.

At the beginning of the 20th century there were several thousand members in the churches in the Ottawa-Montreal area and as far east as Nova Scotia and as far west as Manitoba. Against the rising French nationalism, however, the mission was seen as a tool of the English. By 1960, when the Quiet Revolution flourished in Quebec, the decline was clear, with only one in nine of the pastors being French Canadian.

Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada received a federal charter in 1966. Reverend Maurice Boillat (1925–1986), a Swiss-born pastor, became the first full-time general secretary who broke down barriers between the Union and the Quebecois culture. It developed headquarters in Montreal; a radio and television studio; a Bible College; and, in 1982, the Centre d'Études Théologiques Évangéliques (1994, à Faculté de théologie évangélique).

In 1970 it became the fourth body in the Baptist Federation of Canada with 8 churches and 398 members. It now has 32 churches and preaching stations and 1,300 members in Quebec and New Brunswick that provide both inspiration and completion to Canadian Baptist Ministries.

Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada
2285 Papineau
Montreal, Quebec H2K 4J5
Canada
<http://www.unionbaptiste.com/>

Robert S. Wilson

See also: Baptists; Canadian Baptist Ministries; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation; 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College, 1998.
- Priestley, David. "Introduction." In Memory and Hope: Strands of Canadian Baptist History. Waterloo, ON: Wilfred Laurier University Press, 1996.

- Renfree, Harry. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Wilson, Robert S. "History of Canadian Baptists." In Baptist History Celebration, 2007: A Symposium on our History, Theology, and Hymnology. Springfield, MO: Particular Baptist Press, 2008.
- Wilson, Robert S. "Patterns in Canadian Baptist Life." Global Baptist History. Paper presented at the Second International Conference on Baptist Studies, Wake Forest University, July 19–22, 2000.
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Baptists in Canada: Search for Identity Amidst Diversity. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1980.
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1988.

Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon

The Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon (Union des Églises Baptistes du Cameroun) traces its history to the British Baptist Missionary Association, which began work in West Africa utilizing converts from among the recently freed Africans residing on Jamaica. In 1843, 42 Jamaicans and 4 European couples established a mission station on Fernando Po (now Bioko), an island off the coast of Cameroon. In 1845, Joseph Merrick, a Jamaican, moved to West Cameroon and began learning the language of the Usubu people. One of the Europeans, Alfred Saker, moved to Cameroon Town (now Duala), where he founded the first Baptist church in Cameroon in 1849.

The Baptist work grew slowly until 1884, when Germany assumed authority in Cameroon. The Baptists turned their work over to the Basel Mission, a Swiss missionary society that drew support primarily from Reformed churches in Germany and Austria. The new workers agreed to respect the Baptist faith of the converts, but many did not like the manner of the Basel missionaries or their introduction of non-Baptist practices such as infant baptism. Those who retained their Baptist distinctives rejected the Basel leadership and turned to German Baptists in Germany and the United States for support. Baptist missionaries arrived to assume control of the mission, and in 1898 they formed the Mission Society of German Baptists.

The German missionaries were expelled during World War I, and the work of the Mission Society was largely turned over to the Paris Mission (of the Reformed Church of France), which agreed to respect the Baptist beliefs and practices. This Mission continued to develop with the assistance of the Paris missionaries, and in 1952 it reorganized as the Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon. The Union became fully autonomous in 1957.

In 2005, the Union reported 75,000 members in 360 congregations. The Union is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Baptist World Alliance.

Union of Baptist Churches
BP 6007
New Bell, Douala
Cameroon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Basel Mission; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; World Council of Churches.

References

- Allégret, E. La Mission du Cameroun. Paris: Evangelical Missionary Society, 1924.
- Kwast, Lloyd E. The Discipling of West Cameroon: A Study of Baptist Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1971.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia

The Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia, founded in 1979, is the largest organization of Baptist Christians in Russia. The Union also carries the tradition of Baptists in the country, a tradition that has a severely broken organizational presence because of the periodic repression of religion in Russia. In the last decade, with the relative religious freedom of post-Soviet life, Russian Baptists have become known for their allegiance to traditional Baptist standards, including the pious life expected of present members and the testimony of repentance and faith of new members prior to their baptism by immersion.

The Baptist entrance into what was then the Russian Empire had at least three different points of origin. First, in 1855, a man named Plonus, a tailor, moved from Memel (then in Germany but today in Lithuania) to St. Petersburg, where he distributed Christian tracts and gathered a small circle of believers. Three years later, Gottfried Alf (1831–1858), a German Lutheran residing in Poland, was baptized and went on to found Baptist churches in Poland and Ukraine. The German-led Baptist movement spread throughout the empire from the Transcaucasus to Siberia. In some cases, German-speaking communities in various parts of Russia served as the originating point from which Baptist perspectives were disseminated to the surrounding communities.

Toleration was granted to Baptists in those areas in which Lutheranism was the dominant religion, but such toleration was not granted in predominantly Orthodox areas. In Ukraine and Russia proper, the abandoning of the Russian Orthodox Church was not permitted. In spite of this obstacle, in 1887 the German Baptists in the Russian Empire founded the Union of Baptist Churches of Russia and formally separated from the Baptist Union of Germany (now the Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations [Baptist]).

A second Baptist movement began in Ukraine in the 1860s with the spread of Ukrainian Bibles and literature. One Ukrainian, Efim Tsymbal, raised in the Orthodox Church, received a believer's baptism from a group of Mennonite Brethren living in Ukraine and went on to launch a Baptist movement among the Ukrainian citizenry. He and two evangelists he discovered and baptized, Ivan Ryaboshapka (1831–1900) and Mikhail Ratushni (1830–ca. 1915), found an opening among the Stundists, followers of a movement who gathered for an hour (Stunde) of devotion every day. In Ukraine, most Stundists became Baptists.

A movement similar to that in Ukraine began in 1862 in Georgia when Martin Kalweit (1833–1918) baptized Nikita I. Voronin (1840–1905). This movement drew considerable strength from the Molokans, a Protestant-like group that had rejected the sacramentalism of the Russian Orthodox Church. The new Baptist movement soon spread throughout the Caucasus and in the early 1880s ran into Ukraine. The two groups formed a single united front in 1884 with the founding of the Russian Baptist Union.

In 1874, Lord Radstock, a member of the Church of England with leanings toward the Plymouth Brethren (now the Christian Brethren) teachings of John Nelson Darby, began to preach in St. Petersburg. His work attracted Colonel Vasili A. Pashkov (1831–1902), who would lend his name to the movement that resulted from Radstock's effort. The movement spread as a spiritual revival among Orthodox believers and was thus able to grow to some extent free of government interference. It survived until 1905 and the granting of religious toleration, and then it went public with the founding of two congregations in St. Petersburg. They called themselves Evangelical Christians. After a brief association with the Russian Baptist Union, Pashkov and the Evangelical Christians separated and in 1909 formed the All-Russian Union of Evangelical Christians.

The Russian Revolution brought significant change, beginning with a period of rapid growth only to be followed by decades of persecution and restriction. By the end of the 1930s, most churches were closed and many pastors and other church leaders arrested on various charges. Finally, in 1944 the government allowed/forced the Baptists and Evangelical Christians to form the All Union Council of Evangelical Christians—Baptists, which was to be the single organization for all Protestants who accepted adult believer's baptism. The Union would eventually become home to Pentecostals and the Mennonite Brethren.

In the years after World War II, the All Union Council was allowed some freedom. It published a periodical; in 1955 it participated in the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance; and in 1962 it was accepted into the World Council of Churches. Then in 1960, during the presidency of Nikita Khrushchev, the Union was forced to sign a letter of instruction to its member congregations limiting evangelism. That letter led to a schism, with the new group taking the name Council of Churches of Evangelical Christians—Baptists. The Council, popularly known as Reform Baptists, accused the Union of cooperating too closely with the state.

Some relief came in 1988 with the reforms that began under Mikhail Gorbachev, but a reunion between the two groups has not been worked out. Then in 1992, a significant change occurred in the wake of the fall of the Soviet Union and the emergence of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The All Union Council of Evangelical Christians—Baptists gave way to the Euro-Asiatic Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians—Baptists uniting Baptists in 10 independent Baptist Unions. The bulk of the membership remained in the Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia, which in the 1990s reported 79,000 members in more than 1,000 churches. The Pentecostal members, always in an uneasy position in the Union, left and organized separately in 1989.

The Union's new five-story headquarters building also houses the headquarters of the federation and the Moscow Baptist Seminary. The Union cooperates in the issuance of the federation's two periodicals. The Union has launched a vast evangelism effort throughout the country and has nurtured the formation of Sunday schools with each of its congregations. In 2008 the Union reported 80,000 members in 1,309 congregations. The Union has withdrawn from the World Council of Churches, but continues its membership in the Baptist World Alliance.

Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia
International PO Box 171

Moscow

Russia

<http://www.baptist.org.ru/> (in Russian)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Christian Brethren; Darby, John Nelson; Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist); World Council of Churches.

References

Sawatsky, Walter. Soviet Evangelicals since World War II. Kitchener, ON: Herald, 1981.

Steeves, Paul. The Russian Baptist Union, 1917–1935. Lawrence: University of Kansas, 1976.

Wardin, Albert W., Jr. Evangelical Sectarians in the Russian Empire and USSR: A Bibliographical Guide. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Ukraine

The Baptist Church originated in Ukraine with the movement of Germans who happened to be Baptists into the territory. They formed two churches, in Horzick and Soroczin, in 1864. Simultaneously, other tendencies toward the Baptist position appeared among others of German background in the country, including Mennonites and those independent Pietists called Stundists. The government and the Orthodox Church allowed little room for religious deviance, and persecution began. However, in 1884, a Russian Baptist Union was formed.

Ukrainian Baptists formed an All Ukrainian Baptist Union in 1918, following the Russian Revolution. They were allowed to exist and met regularly through the 1920s. In 1926 they began a periodical to further spread their message. The relative freedom of the 1920s gave way to a period of persecution and repression of the 1930s. They were forced into the All Union Council of Evangelical Christians—Baptists in 1944 but maintained some autonomy through the retention of their own senior presbyter and other presbyters for different sections of the church in the region.

In 1992 the Ukrainian Baptists formed an independent union, though one that retains fraternal relations with similar organizations in Russian and other countries formerly a part of the Soviet Union. Three years earlier they once again had been able to begin a periodical. The Ukrainian Baptists, with more than 142,000 members in its 2,419 congregations, now claim more than half of all the Baptists that once resided in the Soviet Union.

The Union is a member of both the Baptist World Alliance and the Euro-Asiatic Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians—Baptists.

Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Ukraine
3-a Tolstoi St.

252004 Kiev 4
Ukraine

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia.

References

- Tolbet, Robert G. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson, 1955.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist)

The Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist), or Bund Evangelisch-Freikirchlicher Gemei-nden, continues the thrust of the Baptist movement in Germany that originated in the 1830s. German-born Johann Gerhard Oncken (1800–1884) grew up in Scotland, where he encountered some evangelical Christians and experienced a personal conversion. In 1823 he returned to Germany to distribute Bibles and Christian literature. Along the way, his own Bible study convinced him of the truth of the Baptist belief that limits baptism to adult believers. The story of his change of belief was eventually called to the attention of American Baptists then still in the early stages of their organization. One of their leaders, Barnas Sears, traveled to Germany in 1833 and contacted Oncken. The following year he baptized Oncken and seven others, who then formed the first Baptist Church in Germany, in Hamburg. This church would become the mother church not only for German Baptists but also for much of Europe. In 1835 Oncken was appointed as a missionary for the American Baptist Triennial Convention (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.).

Georg Jansen, right, leader of the youth of the Free Evangelical Church baptizes Julian Kruse in the water, Muenster, Germany, 2008. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Baptists suffered persecution in their early years, but in 1842 their response to a fire that swept Hamburg gained them the respect of the city. Then legal changes in 1848 and 1850 provided some greater degree of religious freedom. In 1848, Oncken founded a periodical, Das Missionblatt. He also began to hold regular classes for ministerial students that grew into the Baptist seminary in 1880. He traveled widely and brought together the groups that became the nucleus around which Baptist churches emerged throughout German-speaking Europe.

Oncken attracted a number of talented assistants, among them Julius Wilhelm Köbner and Gottfried Wilhelm Lehmann. Köbner, the son of a Danish rabbi, established the first Baptist churches in Denmark, and Lehmann led in the organization of German Baptists. In 1848, Lehmann called together representatives of the churches in Germany and created the first association. That led to the formation the next year of the Union of Associated Churches of Baptized Christians in Germany and Denmark.

In the 1870s, Baptists had to struggle to assert their freedom from Oncken who, as the patriarch of the movement, had increasingly wanted to see the many churches in Germany as mere branches of the Hamburg church. The German union was threatened but survived through the end of Oncken's career. The movement continued to grow through the 1930s. In 1936 the Baptist Union accepted the Elim Congregations, a Pentecostal fellowship, into membership, and in 1940 the Baptists merged with the Plymouth Brethren to form the Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations.

The Union was hard hit by the war; it lost many members and leaders. Half of their buildings, including the seminary and printing facilities in Hamburg, were destroyed. Following the war, the country was divided. For a while the Union held together, but in 1970 the East Germans withdrew and formed a separate union. Meanwhile, the Pentecostals and some of the Brethren congregations withdrew from the Union, and the term "Baptist" was added to the Union's name. Then, in 1991, after the reunification of Germany, the East and West German congregations were reintegrated into a single union.

In 1974 the Baptists of German-speaking Europe came together to create a confession of faith—"An Account of Our Faith"—finally accepted in 1977. The confession affirms the basics of the Reformed faith, the belief in baptism by immersion for adult believers, and the nature of the Christian life.

In 2008 the Union reported 85,000 members in 845 churches. Besides the seminary in Hamburg, many German-speaking Baptists attend the seminary in Rüschtikon, Switzerland. The Union is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist)

Friedberger Str. 101
Postfach 1262
61282 Bad Homburg v.d.H
Germany

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; Baptists.

References

- Balders, Günter, ed. Ein Herr; ein Glaube, eine Taufe. Wuppertal/Kassel, Germany: Oncken, 1984, 1989.
- Der bund Evangelisch-Freikirchlicher Gemeinden in Deutschland*. Wuppertal/Kassel, Germany: Oncken, 1992.
- McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville: Broadman, 1987.
- Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate, 1923.

Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches

The Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches (Gebungan Gereja Baptis Indonesia) began with the closing of China to foreign religious leadership in 1949. In 1951 three former China missionaries arrived in Jakarta, the capital of the newly independent country of Indonesia. They were assisted by Ais Pormes, an Indonesian trained in Australia and the United States, who soon became pastor of a growing Baptist church in Jakarta.

Growth of the church was slow, though a Baptist presence was built during the next 15 years through the formation of a seminary, a publishing house, and a hospital on Java, with support from the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. Thus the mission was in place when, following an attempted government coup in 1965, there was a sudden move to Christianity that the missionaries could only describe as phenomenal. The Union was established in 1971.

During subsequent years, Baptists connected with the Union established work on Sumatra, Bali, and several of the other Indonesian islands. It established a hospital on Sumatra and pursued a rural development program. Korean and Japanese Baptists also added their resources to the expansion of the church.

In 2008, the Union reported more than 47,000 members in 222 churches. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches
PO Box 2474
Jakarta 10001
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Baptists; Southern Baptist Convention.

References

- Nance, John Irvin. "A History of the Indonesian Baptist Mission: 1950–1960." M.A. thesis, Baylor University, 1969.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

Union of Messianic Congregations

See Messianic Jews/Jews for Jesus.

Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East

The Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East began as a reform movement within the Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia) but was established as an independent Protestant community in Istanbul in 1846. It grew through the 19th century to include more than 60,000 members scattered throughout the Ottoman Empire. However, during World War I, the Turks turned on the Armenians and massacred more than two million of them. That event and the subsequent movement of Armenians out of the Turkish-controlled territory decimated the Union.

In the 1920s, the Union reorganized in Lebanon and Syria. Today (2005) it includes some 25 congregations with approximately 9,500 members. It is organized as a union of organized churches who elect a committee of 12 members that carry on the work of the Union. It is related through the Supreme Council of the Evangelical Community in Syria and Lebanon with the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon and the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon. Together the three churches support the Near East School of Theology in Beirut.

The Union sponsors Haigazian University College and cooperates with the Armenian Apostolic Church in co-sponsoring a hospital and two nursing homes. It is a member of the Middle East Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East
PO Box 11–377
Ibrahim Pasha Mar Mikhael
Beirut
Lebanon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia); Middle East Council of Churches; National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Chopourian, G. H. The Armenian Evangelical Reformation: Causes and Effects. New York:

Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1972.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Union of Welsh Independents

Wales, a separate country with a separate language, was united with England in 1536. English became the official language, and as Henry VIII began the Reformation, English replaced Latin as the official language of worship for the church in Wales (Anglican). Although many adopted English as their primary language, voices continually arose requesting worship in Welsh, and in 1588 a Welsh edition of the Bible was finally published.

As a whole, the dissenting traditions (Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and so forth) had less problems with the Welsh language, though dissent in Wales carried the same social disapproval and legal restrictions as it did in England. Independency experienced a revival in Wales as a result of the Evangelical Awakening in the middle of the 18th century, and numerous informal religious societies emerged across the land. Many supported the London Missionary Society (formed in 1795) and joined with the Congregational Union of England and Wales (formed in 1832).

The Union of Welsh Independents (Undeb yr Annibynwyr Cymraeg) formed among Congregationalists in Wales in 1872. It continued the tradition of the Puritan movement of the 17th century but has emphasized the preservation of Welsh culture and language. Within that concern, the Union has participated in various ecumenical endeavors and was early in accepting women into ministerial orders (1925).

In the 1990s the Union reported more than 31,000 members in its 490 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It also joins in the conferences sponsored by the International Congregational Fellowship.

Union of Welsh Independents
11 St. Helen Rd.

Abertawe—Swansea
Wales SA1 4AL
United Kingdom

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church in Wales; International Congregational Fellowship; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Unitarian Universalist Association

The Unitarian Universalist Association (UUA) is the primary carrier of the several strains of the liberal religious tradition that developed in 19th-century America in dissent from the orthodox Christian faith. Since the time of the Protestant Reformation, teachers have appeared who advocated non-Trinitarian approaches to theology. However, in the United States a new challenge appeared among the Congregational Churches (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ) in the person of Joseph Priestly. Response to his preaching in the 1790s led to the founding of the first Unitarian churches. Then in 1819, William Ellery Channing (1780–1842) preached a famous sermon that became a catalyst for the formation of a Unitarian movement. In this sermon he called for an emphasis on the oneness of God and the role of Christ as a moral exemplar. The American Unitarian Association was founded in 1825, and the Congregational churches were called upon to choose between the Trinitarian and Unitarian positions.

Even earlier, in the 1760s, John Murray (1741–1815) had been expelled from the London Tabernacle founded by George Whitefield (1714–1770) because of his belief that hell was not the destiny of unbelievers and his preaching that eventually all would be saved. He moved to the American colonies and then became an itinerant preacher. By the time of the American Revolution the first Universalist congregations had begun to appear. These churches came together in 1786 to issue the Articles of Association for Universalist Churches. The association was short-lived, but Murray was succeeded by Hosea Ballou (1771–1852), who accomplished a more permanent organization in 1790.

The Universalist Church of America and the American Unitarian Association grew up side by side through the 19th and 20th centuries. Although they saw themselves as the more liberal wing of the Protestant churches, many felt that they were far more than just another Christian sect. They felt that in denying the Trinity and the doctrine of hell, both groups had placed themselves beyond the boundaries of the faith. Neither group was invited to participate in ecumenical organizations.

The Unitarian Association and Universalist Church merged in 1961 to form the Unitarian Universalist Association. Although the Association acknowledges its roots in Christianity, in the decades since the merger it has steadily moved away from those roots in the acceptance of a broad spectrum of religious perspectives within its membership. Not only are Humanism and other non-theist perspectives acceptable but, in addition, Eastern religious systems have taken root among the members. Possibly the most interesting of recent developments has been the growth of neo-Pagan Witchcraft (or Wicca) in the Association, which has been given structure through the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans (CUUPs). Christian Unitarians continue to exist as one caucus among many.

The Association is organized congregationally. Congregational representatives gather annually for a national meeting. In 2000 the Association reported 155,000 members in North America. In the new century, the Association has reported spectacular growth (reporting more than 200,000 members as of 2008), much of it seen as the largely New England–based church has become a national denomination in the United States and spread across Canada. It currently has 1,041 congregations (2008) worldwide.

American Unitarianism was exported by missionaries to India and Japan in the 19th century. As a result of its work in India, the Unitarians became aware of the Brahmo Samaj and the similarity of their beliefs. Eventually the Unitarians withdrew from India and have continued their fraternal ties to the Brahmo Samaj. Through the 20th century, the Association developed followings among expatriate communities in Europe. Universalists, meanwhile, developed a missionary program in Japan.

Unitarians also became aware of their Reformation roots in the teachings of Fausto Socinius (1539–1604), who had great success in spreading non-Trinitarian beliefs in Poland, and Francis David (d. 1579), who propagated Unitarian beliefs in Romania. Their work continues in the Unitarian Church in Romania, with whom the American Association developed a fraternal relationship. In 1995, American Unitarians led in the formation of the International Council of Unitarian and Universalists, to nurture those of a similar persuasion around the world. Through the 19th century some cooperative activity had been carried out through the International Association for Religious Freedom.

Unitarian Universalist Association
25 Beacon St.
Boston, MA 02108
<http://www.uua.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Brahmo Samaj; International Association for Religious Freedom; International Council of Unitarians and Universalists; United Church of Christ; Wiccan Religion.

References

- Alstrom, Sydney E., and Jonathan S. Carey. An American Reformation. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1985.
- Mendelsohn, Jack. Being Liberal in an Illiberal Age: Why I Am a Unitarian Universalist. Boston: Skinner House Books, 2004.
- Miller, Russell E. The Larger Hope. 2 vols. Boston: Unitarian Universalist Association, 1979, 1985.

Sinkford, William. Unitarian Universalist Pocket Guide. Boston: Skinner House Books, 2004.

Tapp, Robert B. Religion among the Unitarian Universalists. New York: Seminar, 1973.

Vetter, Herbert. Notable American Unitarians 1936–1961. Cambridge, MA: Herbert F. Vetter, 2007.

Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Universalism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1946.

■ United Arab Emirates

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is an Arabian country that lies along the southern coast of the Persian Gulf between Saudi Arabia and Oman. A part of the country reaches eastward to the Gulf of Oman and divides Oman into two geographically separate areas. To the northwest along the Gulf Coast lie Qatar and Bahrain. UAE exists as a federation of seven emirates, including Sharjah, Ajman, Umm al-Qaiwain, Ras al-Khaimah, Fujairah, and most notably Abu Dhabi and Dubai. It occupies some 32,300 square miles, the southern four-fifths of which is desert. The great majority of the country’s 4,600,000 people reside along its lengthy coast.

The area was little populated until it became the home of pirates who attacked traders moving between Mesopotamia and India. It was not until the 19th century, when the British moved into the area in strength, that the piracy was controlled. Under continuing British influence, the various local rulers in the region (called emirs) were brought together in a truce (1835) and then as a British protectorate (1892).

Oil exploration and production began in the region in 1958; it flourished, especially around Abu Dhabi. In 1971 the British withdrew, and seven emirates (of which Dubai and Abu Dhabi are the most powerful) united to form the present United Arab Emirates. Bahrain and Qatar, which also had the opportunity to join the union, decided to remain independent nations. The UAE is one of the top oil-producing countries in the world at present.

The United Arab Emirates is a very conservative Arab country. The area converted to Islam in the seventh century CE, and at one point what is now the UAE was the center of the Carmathians, a dissident Muslim movement. The sheikdom at the heart of the movement grew powerful, to the point of conquering Mecca. The fall of the sheikdom led the surviving residents to turn to piracy as a means of livelihood. More recently, the UAE has become a country of hundreds of thousands of immigrants from other Muslim countries, attracted by jobs in the oil fields. The population of the country went from around 360,000 in 1975 to 1.5 million in the mid-1990s. Immigrants have brought a spectrum of Sunni Islamic schools to the area. As in Arabia and Oman, there are substantial numbers of Wahhabis, and immigrants have established mosques

United Arab Emirates

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	208,000	3,591,000	75.9	4.80	4,638,000	6,237,000
Christians	13,600	597,000	12.6	4.80	852,000	1,167,000
Roman Catholics	2,400	463,000	9.8	5.60	670,000	920,000
Orthodox	5,700	62,000	1.3	1.42	70,000	90,000
Independents	520	26,000	0.5	2.92	45,000	70,000
Hindus	1,000	320,000	6.8	4.80	450,000	650,000
Buddhists	0	95,000	2.0	4.80	130,000	180,000
Baha'is	1,000	60,000	1.3	4.80	90,000	130,000
Agnostics	1,500	48,000	1.0	4.80	75,000	110,000
Sikhs	0	11,500	0.2	4.80	18,000	25,000
Atheists	0	7,200	0.2	4.80	12,000	17,000
New religionists	0	2,400	0.1	4.79	3,500	5,000
Total population	225,000	4,732,000	100.0	4.80	6,268,000	8,521,000

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

of the Hanbalite, Shafiite, and Malikite schools. There are also Shias from Pakistan, India, and Bangladesh.

The UAE understands itself to be an Islamic state and has made that a matter of law. Since 1975 all proselytizing has been outlawed, and those who violate the law are fined or imprisoned. The primary Christian evangelization effort is through international radio broadcasts.

Christianity attempted to build work in the area in the 19th century but had little success. As early as 1841 a Roman Catholic priest of the Servites traveled through the region. In 1889 the vicariate of Arabia was erected at Aden. South Yemen expelled the vicariate, which relocated to Abu Dhabi. In the 1970s the vicariate had 11 parishes and 15 chapels, 2 of which were in the UAE. Both parishes were founded in the 1960s and serve expatriates. Additional vicariate worship centers are presently located in Bahrain, Oman, Qatar, and Yemen.

Protestantism entered the area in 1890 in the person of Samuel M. Zwemer (1867–1952) of the Reformed Church in America; Zwemer eventually settled in Bahrain. The Church of England established work once the British acquired some hegemony in the Gulf. Parishes in the region emerged only in the 1960s and were limited to expatriates from the British Isles. The primary Anglican parish, St. Andrew's Church in Abu Dhabi, is now attached to the Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf, a diocese within the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. Other Protestant/Free church groups with work include the Christian Brethren, The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), and the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Evangelical Synod. The small work of the Seventh-day Adventist Church is attached to the Gulf Section in the Middle East Union Mission. Also, members of various Orthodox churches have relocated to the UAE.

Sheikh Zayed Mosque in Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates. (Orhan Çam/Dreamstime.com)

There are a small number of expatriate Hindus in the UAE, and a set of assemblies of the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Church of England; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Hanbalite School of Islam; Malikite

School of Islam; Reformed Church in America; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Wahhabi Islam; Zwemer, Samuel Marinus.

References

- Fenelon, K. G. The United Arab Emirates: An Economic and Social Survey. London: Longman, 1976.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.
- Hurriez, Sayyid. Folklore and Folklife in the United Arab Emirates. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.
- Vine, P., and P. Casey. United Arab Emirates: Profile of a Country's Heritage and Modern Development. London: Immel, 1992.

United Baptist Church (Mozambique)

The United Baptist Church (Igera Uaiiao Baptista) of Mozambique dates its beginning to a mission established by the Church of Scotland in 1913 at Mihecani, Mozambique. During the 1930s support for the mission dried up, and it was turned over to the Nyassa Mission, which also had trouble with sustaining support. In 1939 the work was transferred to the South Africa General Mission (now known as the Africa Evangelical Fellowship). The South Africa General Mission was closed by the government in 1959, at a time when the missionaries were out of the country on furlough. They were refused re-entry, and the Free Baptist Union of Sweden assumed oversight.

The Free Baptist Union had originally come into Mozambique from South Africa in 1921, when it had assumed responsibility for another independent mission. It had established further missions in the southern part of the country by the time it accepted responsibility for the Mihecani mission in the north. The Africa Evangelical Fellowship was able to return to Mozambique in 1985.

The work progressed until 1975, when it began to suffer from the repression of the Marxist regime. During the next seven years, churches were closed, missionary personnel imprisoned, and religious activities severely limited. The United Baptist Church, formally organized in 1968, began a period of spectacular growth, however, following the change of governments in the early 1980s, and by the end of the 20th century it had reported more than 200,000 members. In 1998 the Africa Evangelical Mission merged into the SIM (the Society for International Ministries, originally the Sudan Interior Mission).

The United Baptist Church supports a seminary at Mihecani. The church is a member of the Christian Council of Mozambique, which in turn is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. The church also has a relationship with the United Baptist Church in Zimbabwe, which also grew out of the work of the Africa Evangelical Fellowship.

United Baptist Church
c/o SIM Southern Africa
PO Box 30027

Tokai
Cape Town 7966
South Africa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; World Council of Churches.

References

Hansson, Eric, and Barbro Wennbergs, ed. Mission genom hundra år. Tidaholm, Sweden: Fribaptist-samfundets Förlag, 1991.

SIM. <http://www.sim.org/index.php/country/MZ>. Accessed December 29, 2008.

Thompson, Phyllis. Life out of Death in Mozambique. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

United Board for World Ministries

See American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands

The United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands dates to the first notice of Presbyterians who were among the Protestants that gathered for worship at Hampden Trelawn, Jamaica. However, organized missionary activity did not start until representatives of the Scottish Missionary Society arrived in Jamaica at the beginning of the 19th century. They quickly extended their activity to Grand Cayman, also the home to some Scottish settlers. Along with establishing worship services, they began schools for the children of Africans. In the 1830s they joined the forces demanding the end to slavery in Jamaica, and following abolition in 1838 they actively participated in evangelical activity among the freedmen. They had already founded the Jamaica Presbytery and the Presbyterian Academy (to train ministers) by 1836. As early as 1846, some graduates of the academy were sent to Calabar, thus initiating what became the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria. They also began a mission among East Indians residing in Jamaica that led to the sending of missionaries to Rajputana in northwest India

The London Missionary Society, representing British Congregationalists, arrived in 1834. The Congregational Union of Jamaica was formed in 1977, but because of continuing financial problems in the land, they remained dependent on the Congregational Union of England and the International Congregational Council.

In 1965 the Congregational Union of Jamaica and the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica merged to form the United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands. In 2005 it reported 60,000 members. It is a member of the Jamaica Council of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Council of Churches.

United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands
PO Box 359
12 Carlton Crescent
Kingston 10
Jamaica

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; Presbyterian Church of Nigeria; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Church in Papua New Guinea

The London Missionary Society (LMS) joined the effort to bring Christianity to the residents of Papua New Guinea in 1871, and missionaries established stations along the coast. They were joined by Methodists from Australia, who opened work on the Bismarck Archipelago in 1875 and the islands to the south and east of the main island. Their primary effort was among the Dobu people. The work grew slowly but steadily with relatively few incidents, the most memorable being the killing of one LMS missionary and 11 of his converts in 1901.

After World War II, it became increasingly evident that the church should be prepared to become autonomous. Thus in 1963 the LMS helped to form the Congregational Church in Papua New Guinea. Then in 1968 the Congregationalists and Methodists, along with two congregations attached to the United Church of North Australia, merged to create the United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. At the time of the United Church's formation, the leadership was already largely indigenous, and the transition of authority was smooth. In 1996 the congregations in the Solomon Islands separated to become the United Church in the Solomon Islands.

In the mid-1990s the United Church in Papua New Guinea reported 600,000 members in 2,600 congregations. The church has a congregational polity and an assembly as its highest legislative body. Work continues in the different languages spoken among Papua New Guinea's residents. It cooperates with several other churches in sponsoring the Theological Seminary at Rabaul. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and cooperates with the Council for World Mission.

United Church in Papua New Guinea
PO Box 1401
United Church Assembly Office
Port Moresby
Papua New Guinea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:

William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Church of Canada

The United Church of Canada has been since its founding the largest Protestant denomination in Canada. A leader in ecumenical activity both nationally and internationally, it was a charter member of both the Canadian Council of Churches in 1944 and the World Council of Churches in 1948. It has retained membership in the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Methodist Council.

The United Church of Canada was created in 1925 by bringing together the Methodist Church (Canada, Newfoundland, and Bermuda), the Congregational Union of Canada, all but a third of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and a number of local congregations that had been operating as union churches. The hope of the founders that this union would be the first of more to follow has gone largely unrealized. The celebration of the union with the Evangelical United Brethren was quickly followed by disappointment when discussions with the Anglicans to create the Church of Christ in Canada were terminated in 1975.

The denomination's articles of faith were adopted in 1925 as part of the Basis of Union. A "Statement of Faith" was approved in 1940, and what is referred to as the "New Creed" has been in use since 1968. Responding to calls for a new confession of faith that would honor the church's theological diversity and acknowledge its place in a pluralistic world, a statement called "Song of Faith" was prepared and approved when presented to the General Council in 2006. The United Church's receptivity to biblical criticism and its progressive theological orientation have also been evident in educational projects, notably the "New Curriculum" introduced in the 1960s.

Metropolitan United Church, Toronto, Canada. (Ferenz/Dreamstime.com)

The worship practices of the uniting congregations were shaped initially by The Hymnary (1930) and The Book of Common Order (1932). A new Service Book was published in 1969. The Hymn Book, published jointly with the Anglican Church of Canada in 1971, was followed a generation later by Voices United in 1996, a work that has received a more enthusiastic reception than its predecessor. More Voices was published in 2007 as a supplement featuring contemporary and ecumenical music from Canada and around the world. The United Church Observer is a denominational publication that since 1986 has been independently incorporated and sets its own editorial policies.

Some of the major events in the denomination's history are intertwined with its controversies. Church union was accomplished only after a long and bitter round of negotiations, drawn out over a period of nearly three decades. After a congregational vote was held in each Presbyterian congregation to determine whether it would join the new church, about a third continued as the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Since then the church has regularly taken positions on political and social issues viewed at the time as risky or controversial. It was the first denomination in Canada to ordain women (Lydia Gruchy, in 1936) and has since elected women to other prominent positions. In 1980, Lois Wilson became the first woman to serve as moderator. Some decisions, such as its positions on remarriage of divorced persons in the early 1960s and ordination of gay and lesbian persons in 1988, generated controversy at the time but have been adopted with less fanfare by others. It continues to study, issue statements, and make efforts to influence governments and other agencies responsible for shaping policy on such issues as abortion, capital punishment, racial equality, land use, refugees, poverty, and same-sex marriage. It is currently grappling with the financial and moral implications of its involvement in helping the federal government to operate residential schools for Native Canadians.

The United Church of Canada is organized at four levels: local congregations or pastoral charges; district presbyteries that exercise oversight of pastoral charges in their jurisdiction; regional conferences that meet annually; and the national General Council, which meets on a biennial or triennial basis. The denomination relates to 12 theological school programs, 4 education and retreat centers, and 6 liberal arts colleges and universities. The educational work of the denomination is also carried on in congregations through organizations for children, youth, and gender-specific associations for adults such as the United Church Women, renamed Women of the United Church of Canada in 2000.

The United Church of Canada operates primarily in Canada, although a few Methodist congregations in Bermuda relate to the Maritime Conference. The churches that merged in 1925 had established missions in such places as Angola, China, India, Japan, Korea, and Trinidad. That work continued and at first expanded after union. The denomination now works under the direction and at the request of indigenous ecumenical partners to provide funds and personnel for projects.

Its development has followed a trajectory similar to mainstream churches in the United States over the same period: it suffered a decline in membership and financial resources during the Depression years; experienced a postwar revival of religious interest; and has recently seen lower rates of membership and participation, reporting the first loss of membership in 1966. It reports (2007) the number of confirmed members as 545,462 and 1,463,128 under pastoral care, while the most recent census data (2001) indicate that 2,839,125 Canadians consider themselves affiliated with the denomination.

United Church of Canada
3250 Bloor Street W.
Etobicoke
Toronto
<http://www.united-church.ca>

Phyllis D. Airhart

See also: Presbyterian Church in Canada; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Chambers, Steven. This Is Your Church: A Guide to the Beliefs, Practices and Positions of the United Church of Canada. 3rd ed. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1993.
- Grant, John Webster. The Canadian Experience of Church Union. London: Lutterworth, 1967.
- White, Peter Gordon, ed. Voices and Visions: Sixty-five Years of the United Church of Canada. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1990.

United Church of Christ

The United Church of Christ (UCC), founded in 1957, continues and combines several Reformed Church traditions from Europe in the United States. One of these traditions, that of the Congregational churches, was also responsible for a significant part of the worldwide spread of Protestantism in the 19th century through its vast missionary program.

Worshippers leave the Trinity United Church of Christ following services on June 1, 2008, in Chicago, Illinois. (Getty Images)

The Congregational churches originated with the British Puritans, who came to the American colonies in 1620. Possessed of a Reformed theology, once in the colonies they adopted a congregational form of church governance. Unlike the Pilgrims who had preceded them and settled at Plymouth, Massachusetts, the Congregationalists were not separatists. They held to the autonomy of the local congregation, but that congregation was intimately tied to the township government of the community in which it was located. Heresy and actions opposed to church order were punishable by the town authorities, and harsh treatment would be handed out to the likes of Roger Williams (ca. 1603–1683), a minister expelled from Massachusetts who would later found the Baptist Church in neighboring Rhode Island, and the Quakers (members of the Society of Friends). The Congregational establishment in Massachusetts would continue through the American Revolution but eventually be lost as state governments conformed to the policy of separation of church and state in the new United States.

At the beginning of the 19th century, the Congregationalist churches assumed a leading role in the emerging world missionary movement pioneered by the Moravian, Methodist, and Baptist churches in the previous century. Representatives of the churches formed the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM) and began an aggressive program of recruiting and sending missionaries to Hawaii and the South Pacific, then to Africa and Asia. The ABCFM became one of the major instruments for turning Protestantism into a global movement through the century.

The Congregationalists were also oriented toward learning and education, and as such they were the founders of many of America's finest institutions of higher learning, such as Harvard and Yale universities. They also became the battleground in which new theological currents could emerge and be tested. Thus, in the 19th century, Unitarianism would arise and split the church. A number of congregations would eventually leave to form the American Unitarian Association (now an integral part of the Unitarian Universalist Association). In the 20th century, prominent ministers would become leading exponents of liberal Protestant perspectives, and the Congregationalists would take the lead in the modern ecumenical movement. Their attachment to the ecumenical ideal would lead them into a series of church mergers.

The Christian Churches originated in the revivals that swept the new United States in the decades following the American Revolution. The founders were attached to two basic ideas. First, they advocated an extreme form of democratic church government based in the local church; they were suspicious of leadership beyond and above the local church. The most prominent of the several groups that created the Christian Churches were the Republican Methodists, led by James O'Kelly. O'Kelly had been a prominent minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church), but he had rejected the episcopal governance of the church that placed authority to assign ministers in the hands of a bishop. The Christians also challenged the division of the church into various sectarian groupings and felt that the followers of Christ should be known simply as "Christians."

In 1931 the National Council of the Congregational Churches and the Christian Churches united to form the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches.

At the time of the Protestant Reformation, while most German Protestants adhered to Lutheranism, there was a significant minority who preferred the Reformed Church. Following the founding of the colony of Pennsylvania, many members of the German Reformed Church accepted William Penn's offer to move to the new land where they would be allowed to worship as they pleased. It is estimated that as many as 15,000 were in America at the time of the Revolution. As early as 1725, a schoolteacher who had begun to lead worship services was ordained by the Dutch Reformed Church (now the Reformed Church in America); subsequently, the German churches developed a close relationship with the stronger Dutch Church. In several stages, the German Reformed Church organized as part of the Dutch Reformed Church. It finally became independent in 1793.

The German Reformed Church founded its foreign mission board in 1838. For the next 28 years it worked through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but after 1866 it began to develop independent work.

The Evangelical Synod of North America had its origins in Prussia, where in 1817 the ruler had created the Church of the Prussian Union by encouraging the merger of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in his realm. The church was seen as a bulwark against rationalism and pietism, and personal spirituality was emphasized. Significant attention was given to foreign missions as manifest in support for several missionary societies, most prominently the Basel Mission Society. Beginning in 1833, the Society sent more than 280 missionaries to the United States to work among German Americans. In 1840, under the leadership of Joseph A. Rieger (1811–1869) and George Wendelin Wall (1811–1867), a group of ministers met in St. Louis, Missouri, to form the German Evangelical Church Society of the West.

The Society (after 1866, the Synod) was a loosely organized body designed to serve the congregations. It encouraged the use of the several catechisms that had been developed in Germany that combined Lutheran and Reformed elements. Shortly after the Society formed in St. Louis, two similar organizations arose, in the Northwest and Northeast. In 1872 these three synods merged to form the German Evangelical Synod of North America (the word "German" being dropped in 1927). Like its German counterpart, the Synod developed a strong missionary program both at home among Native Americans and abroad. Additionally, it gave support to higher education and medical facilities.

In 1934 the Evangelical Synod and the Reformed Church united to form the Evangelical and Reformed Church. A short time later, the new church initiated talks with the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches. That merger was consummated in 1957, occurring at the height of ecumenical enthusiasm in the United States; it was seen as a model for other churches to follow. It also gave hope to those who wished to see a U.S. version of a united Protestant church that would bring together not only the church making up the United Church of Christ but also various Methodist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, and other churches.

The United Church is organized congregationally with denominational affairs placed in the hands of the General Synod. As with most Protestant churches, relationships with a number of mission churches were reoriented into partnership relations with new independent ecclesiastical bodies. The fabled American Board united with the mission board of the Evangelical and Reformed Church as the United Church Board of World Ministries.

In 2006 the church reported 1,218,541 members in 5,452 churches. The UCC has a strong commitment to ecumenical relations and is a prominent member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It is also one of the most liberal of church bodies and has shown leadership in the ordination both of women and professed homosexuals. Its ministers and lay leaders have been prominent in a range of social causes, from peace to race relations. The church maintains an extensive program of higher education that includes support for a number of colleges and seminaries.

The church continues support for many of the churches that originated as missions of the UCC's several constituent groups. It has a special partnership relationship to the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), the Evangelical Church in Germany, the Pentecostal Church of Chile, the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, and the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea.

United Church of Christ
700 Prospect Ave., E.
Cleveland, OH 44115–1100

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Evangelical Church in Germany; Friends/Quakers; Pentecostal Church of Chile; Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea; Reformed Church in America; Unitarian Universalist Association; United Church of Christ in the Philippines; United Methodist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Gunneman, Louis H., and Charles Shelby Ro. The Shaping of the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 1999.
- Johnson, Daniel L., and Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe, eds. Theology and Identity: Traditions, Movements, and Polity in the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 2008.
- Paeth, Scott R. Who Do You Say That I Am?: Christology and Identity in the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 2008.
- Youngs, J. William T. The Congregationalists. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1998.

United Church of Christ– Congregational in the Marshall Islands

The United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands began with the arrival in 1857 of missionaries, both U.S. and Hawaiian, connected with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM). As the work grew, in 1865 the administration of the Micronesian Mission was placed in the hands of the Congregational Church of Hawaii's Board of Missions. The work was immensely assisted by the Hawaiian leadership, who developed indigenous leadership and used local leaders to extend the work to new islands. Although some of the American Board's missionaries were Presbyterian, Congregationalism dominated, and the Marshall Islands work developed a Congregational polity.

The work continued under the guidance of the American Board until 1957, when the Congregational Christian Churches in the United States merged with the Evangelical and Reformed Church to create the United Church of Christ. At that time the American Board was superseded by the United Church Board of World Ministries. This change also signaled the beginning of a process of maturing of the Micronesian mission.

In 1979 a referendum was held through Micronesia (then a UN trust assigned to the United States). Although the Caroline and the Marianas Islands voted to become the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshalls voted to remain in the trust relationship with the United States. They became a separate entity and were granted local autonomy. In 1986 they became a Free Associated State with a continuing special relationship to the United States. In 1990 the Marshall Islands were admitted to the United Nations.

As the country was moving toward independence, so the mission moved toward becoming independent as the United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands. It adopted the polity and theological perspective of the United Church of Christ.

In 2005, the United Church reported 40,225 members (out of a population of 59,000). It is the largest Protestant church in the country and a member of the World Council of Churches. It also retains a relationship with the other churches that have grown out of the ABCFM's Micronesian Mission and participates with them in the United Church of Micronesia.

United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands
PO Box 75
Majuro
Marshall Islands 96960

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; United Church of Christ; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Church of Christ in Japan

In 1940 the Japanese ordered all Protestant churches united into a single body, the United Church of Japan, generally called the Kyodan. Most churches complied, and the few who refused to join lost any legal standing. The majority of those who affiliated with the Kyodan remained together when the government changed following World War II, and the church remains the largest Protestant body in the country.

Protestantism entered Japan in 1859 after the Townsend Harris Treaty had cleared the legal hurdles to its presence. Missionaries of the Episcopal Church, John Liggins and Channing M. Williams, were the first to arrive, in May 1859. James C. Hepburn, representing the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, arrived in the fall. He pioneered the work of Bible translation. Then in November, Samuel R. Brown and Guido F. Verback of the Dutch Reformed Church (now the Reformed Church in America) landed. All except Verback had been reassigned from China. Although the treaty had allowed their entrance, the government restricted their activities to Yokohama and Nagasaki, and largely confined them to operating schools and clinics. Attempts to evangelize in conventional ways were considered an offense.

The first convert was baptized in 1864, but the first church was not organized until 1872 in Yokohama. A second church was opened in 1873 in Tokyo. The missionaries also took steps to organize their work without reference to their respective denominations. However, they had to deal with the arrival of additional missionaries representing other churches. The Church Missionary Society (of the Church of England) sent people in 1869, and the first American Baptist missionary came in 1872. Then in 1873, the government removed the restrictions, and the number of missionaries and the groups they represented rose sharply, among them being the Methodists.

The translation of the New Testament was completed and published in 1880. The Old Testament was completed seven years later. With the new Bibles and the legal restrictions gone, the churches entered a growth phase. By this time Japanese leadership had arisen who began to create an indigenous presentation of the faith. By the end of the 1880s, the number of missionaries had almost doubled (from 145 to 383). Then in 1890, the government issued a document declaring its rejection of Christian beliefs and defining Japanese personhood in terms of Shintoism. This document was to be read with great ceremony in all the schools on all public holidays. This action explains the difficulty that met many members of the independent evangelical missionary agencies as they began to enter the country around the turn of the century.

The spirit of cooperation that was present in most of the missionary groups led to a union of the mission of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., the Church of Scotland, and the Dutch Reformed Church in 1877 as the United Church of Christ in Japan (the word “United” was dropped in 1890). In 1887 the three Anglican missionary thrusts from England and America came together as the Japan Episcopal Church. In 1907 the two American and one Canadian Methodist groups united as the Japan Methodist Church. Several of the Baptist groups came together in 1957 as the Japan Baptist Union. Lutheranism entered Japan in 1892 with the opening of work at Saga on the island of Kyushu. Subsequently several churches and a spectrum of Lutheran missionary societies started missions.

In 1913, following the visit of U.S. missionary executive John R. Mott (1865–1955), many of the missions joined together in a “Cooperative Campaign of Evangelism.” A new growth spurt followed but finally ground to a halt as Japan geared up philosophically and militarily for World War II. During the 1930s pressure was put upon Christians to engage in shrine attendance, during which time one was expected to bow before a picture of the emperor. The churches rejected the attempt to have Shintoism redefined as nonreligious.

Then in 1939, the Religious Bodies Law was passed that ordered all Protestant Christians to come together in a single organization, or Kyodan. Among the churches that refused to come together in the Kyodan were the Salvation Army, the Anglicans, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Holiness Church. Some 32 groups affiliated with the Kyodan. During the war, missionaries and Christian leaders were suspect. The Holiness Church suffered the most, with 250 of its pastors arrested.

After the war, the U.S. government imposed U.S.-style freedom of religion on Japan, and General Douglas MacArthur made a personal plea for 1,000 missionaries to come to the newly opened land. Those denominations whose missions had come together in the Kyodan sent more than 400 missionaries. However, the many evangelical churches and independent sending agencies sent even more. Most of the churches forced into the United Church of Christ in Japan remained. By the beginning of the 1980s, they had some 200,000 members in 12,600 congregations. Although growth was slight in the last decades of the 20th century, it remains the largest Protestant church in the country.

In 2005, the church reported 195,851 members. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches. The United Church has issued its own ecumenical statement of faith. It is organized congregationally, with a general assembly as its highest legislative body. Its congregations across the country are organized into 16 districts.

United Church of Christ in Japan
Room 31
Japan Christian Center
3-18 Nishi-Waseda
2-chome, Shinjuku-ku
Tokyo 169
Japan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of Scotland; Reformed Church in America; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Church of Christ in the Philippines

The United Church of Christ in the Philippines was founded in 1941 and combined the missionary history of the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, United Brethren, and Disciples of Christ. The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) was the first church to launch a missionary thrust in the Philippines following the Spanish-American War and the U.S. annexation of the islands at the end of the 19th century. Dr. James B. Rodgers (1865–1944) arrived in April 1899. He was quickly followed by James Thobum (1832–1922), a missionary bishop for the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), who left the Reverend Nicolas Zamora in charge of work until a group of U.S. women landed at Manila the following year. In 1901 the Reverend Homer C. Stuntz arrived as the superintendent.

The Presbyterians founded the first Protestant college, Silliman University, in 1901, and the two churches cooperated in the founding of Union Theological Seminary in 1907. Both churches also faced the religious side of the desire of the Filipinos for self-rule. In 1907, Nicolas Zamora, the first Filipino ordained as a Protestant minister, led a group of Methodists to form the independent Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands. A short time later, the Presbyterians lost a group who formed the United Evangelical Church of Christ. And even later the Methodists had a second split that led to the founding of the Philippine Methodist Church.

The Women's Missionary Association of the Church of the United Brethren (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) voted to begin missionary activity in the Philippines at its 1901 meeting. The first missionaries, Sanford B. Kurtz and Edwin S. Eby, landed in the islands later that year. They settled on Luzon in the northwest. The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) missionaries also arrived in 1901 and also established their initial station on the northern part of Luzon, at Laoag. Both missions grew steadily until the beginning of World War II. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which already had a work in the South Pacific, having worked out a comity agreement with the other churches, began work on Mindanao in 1902. The Reverend R. F. Black and his wife settled at Davao and began work among the rather diverse population of Roman Catholics, Muslims, and followers of indigenous religions.

Soon after the first Protestant missions had been launched, an effort to cut competition and duplication of efforts had occurred. As the missions became established, some began to project the vision of a united Protestant church. A first step in that direction occurred in 1929, when the Presbyterians and Congregationalists merged their work into the United Evangelical Church in the Philippines. In 1943 the United Brethren and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) merged to form the Evangelical Church in the Philippines. The Evangelical Church and the United Evangelical Church then came together in 1948 with the Philippine Methodist Church and several small independent churches to form the United Church of Christ in the Philippines. Of course, in the midst of this process, the churches experienced the years of Japanese occupation during World War II and the resulting complete disruption of Christian life throughout the islands.

The United Church adopted a new confession of faith reflective of its varied past and the Reformed theological tradition that now dominates its life. It has also become known for its advocacy of justice issues within the country, especially concerning issues of human rights. The church manages a system of secondary schools, several colleges and universities, and four hospitals. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the World Methodist Council, the Reformed Ecumenical Council, and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It was a charter member of the Philippine Federation of Christian Churches. The church reported 950,000 members in the 1990s.

United Church of Christ in the Philippines
PO Box 718
C.P.O., EDSA
Quezon City, Ermita Manila

Quezon City 1099
Philippines

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Reformed Ecumenical Council; United Methodist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Aoanan, Melanio de Guardia. Ecumenical and Prophetic: The Witness of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines. Chicago: Claretian Publications, 1998.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Rodgers, James B. Forty Years in the Philippines: A History of the Philippine Mission of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America 1899–1939. New York: The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, 1940.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe

The United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe began with the arrival of Congregationalist missionaries representing the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions into the eastern part of Zimbabwe in 1893. The initial stations were set up in Chikore and at Mount Silinda. The mission experienced steady growth through the next century, and in 1973 it became independent.

The church has a congregational polity, with its synod being the highest legislative body. It ordained females to the ministry from the beginning of its existence as an independent church. It is an ecumenically oriented church and holds membership in the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, as well as being a founding member of the Zimbabwe Council of Churches.

In 2005 the church reported 30,000 members. It co-sponsors the United Theological College and the Rusitu Bible Institute.

United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe
30/32 Second Street, Park Town
PO Box CY 2785, Causeway
Harare
Zimbabwe

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Church of God, an International Association

The United Church of God, an International Association, is by far the largest of the more than 400 offshoots of the Worldwide Church of God (WCOG) formed since the death of WCOG founder Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986).

Following the Christmas Eve 1994 sermon by Armstrong's successor as pastor general, Joseph W. Tkach, in which he announced that the WCOG had abandoned the founder's teachings and had moved firmly toward an evangelical Protestant theological perspective, many ministers left Worldwide, taking their congregations with them. In 1995 some 150 elders convened to form “a collaborative organisation” with an avowedly more collegiate form of governance than had been traditional in Worldwide, or than was found in the two previous large breakaways, the Philadelphia Church of God (1989) and the Global Church of God (1992). Many individual congregations that had left the WCOG before the mass exodus that resulted in United, joined the newly formed United Church of God.

In its teachings and practices, the United Church of God is the most moderate of the major offshoots from Worldwide. Although it holds to Armstrong’s teachings, it has deliberately re-examined all of them to “prove the truth,” rather than accepting them “on faith.” This has led to a softening of some attitudes, though the major teachings still follow those formerly held by the Worldwide Church of God: Sabbatarian and millenarian, with a belief in the literal rule of Christ on Earth, a watch on world events that presage the end times, and conservative morality.

The name “United” has proven to be a little embarrassing for the church. A number of individual churches that joined because of what they perceived to be United’s “hands-off” attitude to governance have since seceded in protest over decisions by the church’s headquarters, particularly over centralized imposition of ministers on churches.

A major split occurred within the United Church in early 1998, when the council of elders removed the church’s president, David Hulme, from his post. Hulme left and founded the Church of God, an International Community. A considerable number of individual ministers and congregations within United, including most of those in Britain, followed him. The Church of God, an International Community publishes a quarterly magazine, Vision, which is very different in style and content from the magazines of all the other offshoots from WCOG. It claims 2,500 members.

The United Church of God remains the largest of the offshoots in the “Worldwide family,” with more members than the next five largest churches taken together. Initially it had between 15,000 and 17,000 members, and in 2008 claimed just over 20,000 in attendance at the annual Feast of Tabernacles, though the actual membership is probably a little less than that. It has congregations in more than 50 countries. With its leadership by an elected council of elders rather than by one man, as in most of the other offshoots, it has avoided both the benefits and the problems associated with strong charismatic leadership, including the inevitable and often difficult issue of succession. In that sense it has become denominationalized quite successfully.

As well as the usual selection of books and booklets the United Church of God publishes a magazine, Good News, and has a cable TV program, Beyond Today.

United Church of God
PO Box 541027
Cincinnati, OH 45254-1027
www.ucg.org www.gnmagazine.org
www.beyondtoday.tv

Church of God, an International Community
476 S. Marengo Avenue
Pasadena
CA 91101
www.church-of-god.org www.vision.org

David V. Barrett

See also: Living Church of God; Philadelphia Church of God; Sabbatarianism; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Church of God News*. Pasadena, CA.
- The Journal: News of the Churches of God*. Big Sandy, TX: JMC.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah, 1997.

United Church of the Solomon Islands

The United Church of the Solomon Islands began as a missionary effort of Australian Methodists. John Goldie (1870–1954) arrived in the Western Solomons Province in 1902 and established a base at Munda Point on New Georgia. He was assisted by missionaries from the Methodist churches in Fiji and Samoa. In 1913, with additional assistance from New Zealand Methodists, the work moved to Bouganville, formerly under German control.

Solomon Islanders attend the Wesley United Church service, 2006. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1955 the British began to relocate a number of people from the Gilbert Islands to Wagina in the Western Solomons. Many of those people had been members of the mission of the London Missionary Society (Congregationalist) (LMS). The LMS worked out an agreement with the Methodists to receive these people into the Methodist Church.

In 1968 the Methodist Church in the Solomons merged with the Methodists in Papua New Guinea and the Papua Ekalesia (the independent church that developed from the LMS mission in Papua) to form the United Church of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. Then in 1978 the Solomon Islands became an independent nation. In the 1980s, secessionists on Bouganville demanded independence from Papua New Guinea. This disruption created a communication problem between important segments of the church, and in 1996 the Solomon Islands and Papua New Guinea segments of the church decided to go their separate ways.

The United Church of the Solomon Islands reported 50,000 members in 2005. It is a cooperating partner with the Council on World Mission and a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. Leslie Boseto, a former bishop of the church, was elected president of the World Council of Churches in 1992.

United Church of the Solomon Islands
PO Box 82
Kokeqolo, Munda Western Province
Solomon Islands

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Church of Zambia

The United Church of Zambia (UCZ) has brought together a variety of Christian missions formed in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The oldest strain of UCZ history can be traced to 1885 and the entrance of a group of missionaries led by François Coillard of the Paris Mission (associated with the Reformed Church of France). They had support from Lesotho. Their beginning was inauspicious, as they were arrested and maltreated soon after their arrival in what is now Zambia (formerly Northern Rhodesia). However, they persevered with their work, initially among the Lozi people, and in 1964 the work grew into the independent Evangelical Church of Barotseland.

The London Missionary Society (LMS) started work in 1883 in the northern part of the country at Niamkolo, among the Lungu people. They were soon joined by Presbyterians.

In 1894 a missionary from the Church of Scotland, Alexander Dewar, and a Christian from Tonga, John Banda, came into Rhodesia from Malawi and established themselves at Mwenzo, not far from the border with Tanzania. Their work was supplemented through the early 20th century by teams of students from Malawi who made trips into Zambia to evangelize the population. Among these students was David J. Kuanda, the father of Kenneth D. Kuanda, who would lead the country in the years immediately after Zambia's independence. In 1894 the Primitive Methodists (now a constituent part of the Methodist Church [U.K.]) opened a mission in central Zambia among the Ila people.

In the 1920s, the rich copper deposits in the country began to be mined, and several churches opened a mission station at Copperbelt, a community that arose near the mines. In the 1930s those missions (including centers of the LMS and the Presbyterians) came together as the United Missions of the Copperbelt. This united mission became a catalyst for the LMS and Presbyterians to unite across the country in 1945 as the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod) in Rhodesia. In 1958 they were joined by another group of missions in the Copperbelt that had formed the Central Free Church Council to create the United Church of Central Africa in Rhodesia.

In the 1960s, Northern Rhodesia moved toward independence as Zambia, a move that culminated in 1965. That same year the United Church of Central Africa merged with the Methodists and the Church of Barotseland to form the United Church of Zambia. It included members from seven different Zambian peoples.

In 2005, the United Church reported 3 million members in 1,060 congregations. The church sponsors a hospital, several secondary schools, and a farm college. The church has a presbyterian organization with a synod as the highest legislative body. It follows a Reformed theological perspective but acknowledges only the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed as its doctrinal standards. The church is ecumenically active and has affiliated with the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It also cooperates with the Council for World Mission.

United Church of Zambia
PO Box 50122
15101 Ridgeway
Lusaka
Zambia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod); Church of Scotland; London Missionary Society; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Congregational Church of Southern Africa

Johannes van der Kamp came to the Cape of Good Hope as a missionary representing the London Missionary Society (LMS) in 1799. His goal was to open a mission among the Bantu-speaking people of the region. A missionary station was founded at Kuruman, and the first congregations at Graaff-Reinet (1801) and Bethelsdorp (1802). With the assistance of other missionaries, the most famous being David Livingstone and Robert Moffat, the work spread across the colony. In the meantime the British took control, and British settlers began to flood into the Cape. Among them were some of Congregational background who also began to form new churches.

In 1854 the LMS withdrew from the Cape in order to pursue opportunities in the interior of Africa. In 1859 the LMS churches and those of independent origin united to form the Evangelical Voluntary Union. The Union became the Congregational Union of Africa in 1877.

Alongside the British Congregationalists, Americans came to the Cape in 1835. Missionaries representing the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions initiated work among the Zulu people in Natal and then moved into Mozambique to work among the Batswa people. The mission grew to become the Bantu Congregational Church. In 1967 the Congregational Union and the Bantu Church united to form the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa. By this time its work had moved beyond South Africa and Mozambique to Namibia, Botswana, and Zimbabwe.

In 2005 the United Church reported 450,000 members. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. In 1972 the South African Association of the Disciples of Christ merged into the United Church.

United Congregational Church of Southern Africa
PO Box 96014
150 Caroline St.
Brixton, Johannesburg 2019
South Africa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Wing, Joseph. As One People: Commemorating the Tenth Anniversary of the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa, 1967–1977. Johannesburg: United Congregational Church of South Africa, 1977.

United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion of Angola

See Anglican Diocese in Angola.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church

The United Evangelical Lutheran Church (UELC) traces its origin to the early 20th century and the work in Argentina of the Augustana Lutheran Church. The Augustana Lutheran Church had been formed by Swedish Americans who participated in the various mergers that led in the 1980s to the present Evangelical Lutheran Church in America. During the second decade of the 20th century, however, one of the Augustana ministers became the pastor of the Swedish Lutheran congregation in Buenos Aires. While there, Emil Cedar began work in Spanish, including the translation of literature. Following the formation of the UELC, one of the steps in the American merger process, the new church assumed responsibility for the Buenos Aires congregation and sent Edward H. Mueller (d. 1923) to head the work. During the brief five years of his ministry, he founded four additional congregations.

In 1948 the Argentine congregations formed a synod and were formally received into the UELC as an associate synod. In 1951 it joined the Lutheran World Federation (LWF). LWF membership also served as a catalyst, calling attention to the variety of war refugees that had found their way to Argentina, especially from Eastern Europe and the Baltic states. In cooperation with the LWF it assisted refugees from Hungary, Slovakia, Latvia, and Estonia to form congregations. In 1953 the UELC became an autonomous body. It then engaged in a process of assisting their new members to adjust to their new home.

The UELC is headed by its president and the synod, its highest legislative body. It has a membership of approximately 11,000 members. The church sponsors a system of parochial schools and supports the Instituto Superior Evangélicos de Estudios Teológicos, an interdenominational seminary for the training of ministers. It is ecumenically active and a member of the World Council of Churches. Women have been admitted to the ministry since 1981.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church
 Marcos Sastre 2891
 1417 Buenos Aires
 Argentina

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India

Functioning as both a denomination and an ecumenical body, the United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India (UELCI) was founded in 1926 as the Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches. It embodies the major thrust of Lutheran missions in India that began in 1706, when Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg (1682–1719) and Heinrich Plutschau (1677–1752) arrived from Denmark as representatives of the Danish-Halle mission with the support of the Church of Denmark and the Danish king. They settled Tanquebar (a Danish colony) and quickly learned Tamil. Before the end of the decade, Ziegenbalg had produced a Tamil translation of the Christian New Testament, and along the way a Tamil grammar and dictionary. Their work would set a pattern frequently followed by pioneering Protestant missionaries worldwide of concentrating on reducing languages to writing and producing translations of the Bible.

The work of making the most substantive gains in spreading Lutheranism is generally credited to Christian Freidrich Schwartz (1817–1870), who dominated the mission in the late 18th century. The 50,000 converts would become the core of what would later be known as the Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church.

The early 19th century was a time in which the British limited missionary access to India, and interest among European Lutherans was at its lowest. However, at the end of the 1830s, British authorities developed a new attitude, and Lutherans launched a new wave of missionary activity.

In 1840 the German Leipzig Mission began work in Tamil that was later passed to the Swedish Lutherans. In the 1870s this work was assumed under the new missionary society directly sponsored by the Church of Sweden. The mission would later mature as the Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church. In 1842, Father C. F. Heyer (1793–1873) arrived in Madras as a representative of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania (now a constituent part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) and the very first foreign missionary commissioned by any American Lutheran body. The North German Missionary Society at Bremen sent missionaries two years later, but their work was absorbed by the Americans in 1850. The American work would mature at the Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, one of the largest Christian bodies in India.

Subsequently, missionaries would arrive from the Gossner Mission (1844), the Danish Missionary Society (1863), the Hermannsburg Mission (1865), the Swedish Evangelical Mission (1877), and the Schleswig-Holstein Evangelical Lutheran Mission headquartered in Breklum, Germany (1882). From these efforts no fewer than 10 Lutheran churches serving different language groups and different parts of the country would emerge.

In 1926, in part because of encouragement from the Lutheran World Convention held in 1923, the various Lutheran churches in India formed the Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in India. It developed support for the All-India Theological College and Research Institute in 1953, a major symbol of the hoped-for Lutheran unity. More recently, the churches have expanded their level of trust and the closeness of their fellowship by reorganizing the Federation in 1975 as the Lutheran Churches in India and in the 1980s dropping the plural “Churches” for the singular “Church.” Over the years the UELCI has assumed more denominational functions, not the least of which is its serving as the representative body holding the membership of the member churches with the World Council of Churches. Interestingly, the church is not a member of (though it cooperates with) the Lutheran World Federation (LWF). Most of the member churches of the UELCI are members of the LWF.

The UELCI represents more than 1,500,000 church members worshipping in 3,000 congregations (2005).

Churches represented in the UELCI include the Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, Arcot Lutheran Church, Evangelical Lutheran Church in Madhya Pradesh, Gossner Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chotanagpur and Assam, Good Samaritan Evangelical Lutheran Church, India Evangelical Lutheran Church, Jeypore Evangelical Lutheran Church, Northern Evangelical Lutheran Church, South Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, and Tamil Evangelical Lutheran Church.

United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India
Gurukul Campus
94 Purasawalkam High Rd.
Kilpauk 600 010 Chennai
Tamil Nadu
India

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church; Church of Sweden; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Directory—Handbuch*. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, issued annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Evangelical Mission

See Rhenish Mission.

United Free Church of Scotland

The United Free Church of Scotland continues the tradition of the Free Church of Scotland (now a constituent part of the Church of Scotland). In 1900 the Free Church merged with another splinter group from the Church of Scotland, the United Presbyterian Church, to form the United Free Church of Scotland. In 1929

The signing of the Act of Separation and the Deed of Demission during the first General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland at Tanfield in Edinburgh, May 23, 1843. From the painting by D. O. Hill, RSA. (Getty Images) the United Free Church of Scotland merged into the Church of Scotland. However, a minority segment of the United Church did not concur with the merger and decided to continue under their previous name and administration.

The church has continued to advocate freedom from state control and support. It has also argued for religious equality, which led to its early openness to women in the ordained ministry. Doctrinally it is like the Church of Scotland, that not being at issue in the debates that led to the church's formation.

The highest legislative body in the church is its General Assembly. The church is a relatively small body, with only 4,400 members, but it carries on an active world ministry in Cambodia and, in cooperation with the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa, in Botswana. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

United Free Church of Scotland
11 Newton Pl.
Glasgow G3 7PR

United Kingdom
<http://www.ufcos.org.uk/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; United Congregational Church of Southern Africa; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

■ United Kingdom

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (UK) is separated from continental Europe by the North Sea and the English Channel, being at the closest point 21 miles north of the French coast. It consists of four countries: England, Scotland, and Wales (which make up Great Britain) and the six counties of Northern Ireland, which remained part of the UK when Ireland became independent in 1922. The history, especially the religious history, of each of these countries is inextricably bound with that of the others, and yet, at the same time, a story in its own right. While London is the English and UK capital, Edinburgh is the capital city of Scotland, Cardiff of Wales, and Belfast of Northern Ireland.

By mid-2007, the resident population of the UK was estimated at 60,975,000 (England 51,092,000; Scotland 5,144,000; Wales 2,980,000; Northern Ireland 1,759,000). Although English is spoken throughout the UK, Wales has two official languages, English and Welsh (Cymraeg, which is taught in most schools and in which over a fifth of the Welsh population are fluent). Other Celtic languages, such as Scots, Irish, Manx Gaelic, and Cornish, are still spoken in parts of the UK and are, to a greater or lesser degree, officially recognized as minority languages. There are also numerous immigrant languages spoken, more than a million British Asians (2.1 percent of the population) speaking Punjabi, for example. According to the 2001 national census, 92.1 percent of the UK population was white, the rest being largely black Caribbean and Africans and Asians. In response to an optional question in the British part of the census, 71.8 percent said they were Christian (Anglican, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist); 2.8 percent Muslim; 1.0 percent Hindu; 0.6 percent Sikh; 0.5 percent Jewish; 0.3 percent Buddhist; 0.3 percent “any other religion”; 5.4 percent “no religion”; and 7.8 percent did not respond. As the result of a media campaign, 0.7 percent (390,000) said they were Jedi, making it the fourth largest reported religion). In Northern Ireland, which had a different census question, 53 percent stated they were Protestant (mainly Presbyterian and Church of Ireland) and 44 percent Catholic, with 3 percent being “other” or “none.”

The United Kingdom is a constitutional monarchy with Queen Elizabeth II (b. 1926) as head of state, as well as being head of the British Commonwealth, supreme governor of the Church of England, and “Defender of the Faith.” In 1973 the UK joined the European Economic Community, and it was a founding member of the European Union in 1992. It is a member of the G8 and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and it has a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council. The UK does not have a codified Constitution, but a legal system consisting of statutes passed (and revocable) by Acts of Parliament, case law, and international treaties. Although there is a devolved Parliament in Scotland and devolved assemblies in Northern Ireland and Wales, the ultimate legislative authority of the UK is the Westminster Parliament, consisting of an elected House of Commons and a House of Lords, which consists of hereditary and appointed life peers, including 26 “Lords Spiritual” (the 2 archbishops and 24 senior bishops of the Church of England).

There are two Established Churches in the UK: the Anglican Church of England and the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, to which both privileges and restrictions apply, with the question of disestablishment under constant review. Unlike many other European countries, there is no legal definition or official registration of religions. Those who wish to do so may apply for charitable status, which can confer certain financial and status benefits. There have been a few restrictions placed upon some of the newer religions and their adherents (mainly, though not exclusively, with regard to immigration), but generally speaking the only laws that control members of any non-Established religion are those that apply to any other citizens of the country.

Because Britain was more affected than Southern Europe by the Ice Ages, fewer evidences of the early culture remain than is the case in what are now southern France and Spain. It is, however, assumed that there would have been similarities in a belief in an afterlife: a shallow grave found in Wales containing a young man buried with bracelets of ivory and covered with red ochre is estimated to date from roughly 25,000 BCE (shortly before the last great period of glaciation), making it the oldest recorded British burial. The earliest evidence of religion in Britain is archaeological, going back to at least the fourth millennium BCE. Some elaborate tombs, and monuments such as Stonehenge (begun between 3100 and 2100 BCE

United Kingdom

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	49,325,000	49,325,000	80.2	0.24	49,528,000	50,192,000
Anglicans	29,059,000	25,900,000	42.1	0.07	25,000,000	25,000,000
Roman Catholics	5,516,000	5,600,000	9.1	−0.47	5,600,000	5,600,000
Protestants	7,713,000	4,200,000	6.8	−0.89	4,200,000	4,200,000
Agnostics	4,400,000	7,820,000	12.7	1.51	10,179,000	11,750,000
Muslims	635,000	1,680,000	2.7	0.92	2,300,000	2,850,000
Atheists	300,000	880,000	1.4	1.47	1,100,000	1,400,000
Hindus	220,000	639,000	1.0	2.11	680,000	850,000
Sikhs	200,000	420,000	0.7	3.83	575,000	750,000
Jews	450,000	280,000	0.5	0.07	275,000	250,000
Buddhists	30,000	195,000	0.3	0.45	250,000	300,000
Spiritists	20,000	75,000	0.1	0.46	85,000	100,000
New religionists	50,000	66,500	0.1	0.42	78,500	85,000
Chinese folk	15,000	60,600	0.1	0.46	45,000	52,000
Baha'is	13,600	36,000	0.1	0.46	40,000	60,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	17,400	0.0	0.46	18,000	20,000
Jains	4,000	18,000	0.0	1.96	30,000	50,000
Zoroastrians	0	4,800	0.0	0.46	6,000	8,000
Total population	55,663,000	61,517,000	100.0	0.46	65,190,000	68,717,000

and believed to have been used for ceremonial purposes), suggest that gods and divine powers played an important role in the Neolithic and Bronze ages.

The oldest surviving mythologies tell of successive invasions from Ireland. Later, trade with the Gallic Celts resulted in a pagan Celtic culture becoming well established in the southeast of England by the fourth century BCE. By the time of the Roman invasion in 55 BCE, the Druids were in a position of considerable power and were suppressed by the Romans for political rather than religious reasons. There is disagreement about how Romanized British Paganism became, but many of the local deities became fused with, or at least were joined by, the gods and goddesses of Rome. Isis and other Egyptian gods also made their way to Britain, which was still a Pagan country in the late Roman period.

Pockets of Christianity are thought to have been introduced to Britain in the second century, but it seems unlikely that it existed in any substantial form much before the middle of the third century. Saint Ninian (ca. 360–432), the first known Christian missionary in Scotland, built a stone church at Whithorn in 379. Other missionaries (often by way of Ireland) contributed to the establishment of the Celtic Church in the fifth century, with a number of the early monasteries, such as Iona and Lindisfarne, remaining places of pilgrimage to this day. In 597, Saint Augustine (d. 604/605)—not to be confused with Saint Augustine of Hippo—was sent to Britain by Pope Gregory I (ca. 540–604) and became the first archbishop of Canterbury after the conversion of King Ethelbert of Kent (d. 616). During the next centuries, the Celtic Church was gradually absorbed into the mainstream of Western Christianity based in Rome.

After the Norman Conquest of 1066, Roman canon law (the chief agent of papal control in the Western church) became increasingly powerful (and corrupt), provoking the Reformer John Wyclif (1330–1384) to condemn practices such as the selling of indulgences. His followers, known as the Lollards, were suppressed after an unsuccessful uprising in 1414 but are seen as the precursors to the Reformation in the 16th century, by which time England's King Henry VIII (1491–1547) could muster sufficient support to break away from Rome over the question of the dissolution of his marriage to the first of his six wives, Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), and proclaim himself head of the Church of England in 1534. Henry's daughter, Mary Tudor, attempted during her reign (1553–1558) to restore Catholicism but merely succeeded in fanning the flames of the Reformation. One of the first actions of Mary's half-sister, Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603), was to secure a Protestant future for England, and since 1559 the Church of England has been "by law established."

Allegorical illustration regarding the breaking of ties between England and Rome. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

The Church in Wales had been legally part of the Church of England when it was still part of the Roman Church, and thus it found itself established as a Protestant church. It became disestablished in 1920. Despite Elizabeth I's officially reforming the church of Ireland, most Irish Christians remained loyal to Rome. In 1869 the statutory union between the Anglican churches of Ireland and England was dissolved, and the Church of Ireland ceased to be established by law. There has never been an established church for Northern Ireland.

Once established, the Church of England was opposed not only by Roman Catholics but also by Protestants who wanted to purify the church even further. Some of these Puritans worked for reform within the Anglican Church, others formed small separatist movements, later known as the English Independent or Congregationalist movement. The Separatist Puritans led by Robert Browne (ca. 1550–1633) found a more tolerant reception in the Netherlands, and the Pilgrim Fathers emigrated from Leiden, via Plymouth, to New England in 1620 under the leadership of John Robinson (ca. 1576–1625).

Scotland's Reformation owes much to the persistence of the Calvinist John Knox (1505–1572), with the Reformed Church of Scotland becoming established along Presbyterian lines in 1560. Subsequent pressure from Stuart kings to make the church episcopal came to a head in 1638 when the Covenanters, revolting against Charles I's attempt to introduce the Scottish Prayer Book of 1637, became embroiled in the Civil Wars (1642–1646; 1648–1651) that were fought between the Royalist Cavaliers and the Puritan Roundheads, led by Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658).

The UK has survived a continuing history of religious dissent. The early English Baptists had settled in London in the first half of the 17th century; in 1650 the name "Quaker" was applied to George Fox (1624–1691) and his followers, who were later known as the Society of Friends. With the turbulence of the Civil Wars, there was a mushrooming of relatively short-lived millennial movements (such as the Ranters, the Levelers, and the Fifth Monarchy Men). Around the 1730s, a surge of revivalism (the Awakening) was witnessed in Wales, England, and, slightly later, in Scotland—it was in 1738 that John Wesley (1703–1799), the Anglican priest who was to found the Methodist movement, experienced a profound spiritual conversion that reinforced his evangelical fervor. In 1843, 474 Disruption Dissenters, constituting nearly a third of the ministry of the Church of Scotland, seceded to form the Free Church of Scotland. The 19th century also saw the arrival of a number of new sects, some of which (such as the Plymouth Brethren [Exclusive] and the Salvation Army) were homegrown; others (such as the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Church of Christ, Scientist, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and the Jehovah's Witnesses) came from the United States of America. Toward the end of the century, one or two other movements, such as Madame Blavatsky's Theosophical Society, began to introduce ideas from the East to sections of upper-middle-class England. The National Secular Society was founded by Charles Bradlaugh in 1866, and the British Humanist Association appeared in 1928; but Britain has not experienced the virulent anticlericalism found in some other parts of Europe.

The early 20th century witnessed the arrival of several Pentecostal sects from the United States (by way of Norway), followed by the further appearance of “foreign” religions. Successive waves of migrants (particularly West Indians in the 1950s and people of Asian origin from the 1960s onward) changed not only the ethnic but also the religious composition of England. By the 2001 census, Indians were the largest minority group (1.8 percent), followed by Pakistanis (1.3 percent), those of mixed ethnic backgrounds (1.2 percent), black Caribbeans (1 percent), black Africans (0.8 percent), Bangladeshis (0.5 percent), “other Asian” (0.4 percent), Chinese (0.4 percent), “black other” (0.2 percent), and “other” (0.4 percent). While the major denominations were undergoing a steady decline in church attendance and membership, there was a growth (which by no means compensated for the loss in the traditional churches) in Charismatic and Pentecostal Christianity, especially among Afro-Caribbeans who found themselves unwelcome in predominantly white churches. Sunni, Shia, and Ahmadiyya mosques, Hindu and Buddhist temples, Sikh gurdwaras, and a few Shinto shrines have become increasingly visible as part of the UK landscape. The distribution of the minority ethnic groups has, however, been very uneven. In England, they made up 9 percent of the total population compared with only 2 percent in both Scotland and Wales and less than 1 percent in Northern Ireland. They have, moreover, tended to concentrate in the large urban centers. Nearly half (45 percent) of the total minority ethnic population (and well over half the black and Bangladeshi populations) live in the London region, where they comprise 29 percent of all residents, with the second largest proportion (13 percent) of the minority ethnic population being found in the West Midlands.

A further development has been the emergence of both indigenous and imported new religions, which became increasingly visible from the late 1960s. Among those originating in the United Kingdom were the Aetherius Society, the School of Economic Science, the Emin, the Jesus Army, and the Findhorn Foundation in the north of Scotland, which is visited by New Age seekers from around the world. By 2009, Inform (a government-supported organization providing information about alternative religions) had records on well over 1,000 different groups in the UK—as well as a number of anti-cult and counter-cult movements that had been set up to warn the population about the perceived theological and practical dangers of heresies and alien religions.

A law decreeing the burning of heretics remained in force in England until 1676, although the last persons burned at the stake for heresy in England were two Anti-Trinitarians in 1612. In Scotland an 18-year-old student, charged with denying the Trinity, was hanged at Edinburgh as late as 1697. Witches had been burned or, more frequently, hanged in Britain from the time of the Middle Ages, but the witch hunts reached a peak in the 17th century. The last witchcraft trial in England was held in 1712 (1722 in Scotland).

In 1689 the Act of Toleration had granted freedom of worship to Nonconformists or Free Churches (that is, Protestants refusing to conform to the doctrines or authority of the Established Church), who were then allowed their own ministers and places of worship—subject to their taking an oath of allegiance to the Crown. However, the act did not apply to Roman Catholics or Unitarians, who remained subject to civil and religious constraints until the 19th century. Furthermore, the earlier Test Acts, barring anyone who was not a member of the Established Church from holding public office, remained in force until the second half of the 19th century—religious tests for academics in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham were abolished in 1871. The Roman Catholic hierarchy was eventually restored in England and Wales in 1850 (giving rise to a “no popery” furor over “Papal Aggression”)—but not until 1878 in Scotland. Ironically, although discrimination on grounds of sex or race became illegal in the 1970s, Northern Ireland was the only part of the UK in which discrimination on religious grounds was an offense until the introduction of the Human Rights Act in October 2000 allowed cases concerning rights given under the European Convention of Human Rights to be dealt with in British courts.

UNITED KINGDOM

So far as British Jewry is concerned, a small community had settled in England after the Norman Conquest, was expelled by Edward I (1239–1307), and then was readmitted during Cromwell’s Protectorate (1653–1659). Confessing Jews were sufficiently integrated into British society to be admitted to Parliament in 1858—Disraeli had converted to Christianity 10 years before he entered Parliament in 1837, but although Lionel de Rothschild had been elected a member for the City of London from 1847, he had been unable to submit to the required Christian oaths and had not been permitted to take up his seat. Although making a notable contribution to British society, even the influx of Jewish refugees exiled by the Russian pogroms in 1881, and those fleeing from Nazi persecution in Central and Eastern Europe during the first half of the 20th century, have never resulted in the community’s becoming statistically very significant, this being due partly to a high rate of intermarriage. On a few isolated occasions outbreaks of anti-Semitism have hit parts of Britain: anti-Semitic riots occurred, for example, in the Welsh valleys in 1911 and in several large English towns in 1947.

While, generally speaking, Britain has enjoyed a relatively peaceful coexistence among its many religious communities during the past century, there have been some serious clashes, the most critical of which have been in Northern Ireland, where tensions have existed between the Protestant majority, which has enjoyed relative economic and political advantage, and the Catholic minority, which has wanted to be reunited with the rest of Ireland. The conflict erupted into violence in 1968, and well over 3,000 “troubles-related deaths” resulted from terrorist activities by paramilitary organizations such as the Irish Republican Army, the Ulster Defence Association, and the Ulster Volunteer Force. After a series of short-lived cease-fires throughout the mid-1990s, a fragile peace agreement was eventually brokered in 1998. This has resulted in a generally nonviolent situation in the six counties, despite occasional eruptions by small schismatic groups.

In England, toward the latter part of the 20th century, several tense (including a few violent) situations have developed in relation to the diversity of beliefs and practices associated with ethnic minorities, one of these being triggered by the placing of a fatwa upon Salman Rushdie (b. 1947) in 1989 after the publication and public burnings of his book Satanic Verses. A rumbling Islamophobia was fanned by the destruction of the World Trade Center in New York in 2001, and became even more pronounced when four British Islamist suicide bombers killed 52 commuters and injured hundreds more on London’s transport system on July 7, 2005. Despite various measures being taken by the government and moderate religious leaders of all faiths to defuse the situation, there remains at the end of the first decade of the 21st century considerable distrust between sections of the religious communities.

While in the earlier part of the 20th century the Church of England was referred to as the Conservative party at prayer, from around the 1960s it appeared to become less compliant to the establishment (with a small “e”), both theologically and politically. The publication of Honest to God in 1963 by the Bishop of Woolwich, John Robinson (1919–1983), the introduction of the Anglican Alternative Service Book in 1980, and a series of provocative statements by David Jenkins (b. 1925), who was the bishop of Durham from 1984 to 1994, all led to acute anxiety among traditionalists about the undermining not merely of the Established Church but also of the very fabric of British society. Tensions between church and state—as represented, respectively, by then Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie (1925–2000) and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher (b. 1925)—were exacerbated when Runcie commissioned a report on urban poverty (published as Faith in the City in 1985) and insisted on praying not only for the British but also for the relatives of Argentines who died in the 1982 Falklands War. The final crunch for some Anglicans came when, in 1992, the General Synod agreed to the ordination of women to the ministry, and then Bishop of London Graham Leonard (b. 1921) led a small exodus of clergy into the Roman Catholic Church. Yet further tensions have erupted over various incidents involving homosexuality among the clergy.

Another development in the 21st century has been associated with the biologist Richard Dawkins, who, through a television series and a best-selling book, The God Delusion, has presented a militant atheism to the British public. This has resulted, on the one hand, in a strong reaction from theologians such as Alister

McGrath, and, on the other hand, in the establishment of the Richard Dawkins Foundation for Reason and Science along with a revivalism in organizations such as the British Humanist Association, resulting in such high-profile campaigns as the Atheist Bus Advertisements, with posters on buses throughout Great Britain proclaiming There's probably no God. Now stop worrying and enjoy your life in response to the Jesus said: . . . ads running on London buses in June 2008.

It is difficult to give an accurate statistical analysis of trends in the religiosity of the UK. This is partly due to the fact that not only does the wording of survey questions vary over time, but the understanding of what each question means to respondents also varies. It is not unusual for apparently contradictory results to emerge; for example, while 72 percent of the population claims to be Christian, several polls have found less than half the UK population saying that they believe in God. However, a slightly more penetrating question has revealed that while 23 percent believed in a God with whom one can have a personal relationship, 38 percent believed in God as something within each person, rather than out there, 16 percent believed in an impersonal spirit or life force, another 16 percent said they do not really know what to believe, and only 9 percent said they did not believe in any kind of God, spirit, or life force. Roughly a third of Britons claim to pray at least once a week, believe that Jesus was both man and God, and think that their religious beliefs have a great deal of influence on their daily life.

If such concepts as “religious disposition” and “Christian community” are used, the UK is still predominantly (roughly two-thirds) Christian—but hardly fervently so, with only a third of the population calling themselves religious (and just 6 percent saying they are “very religious”), while nearly half claimed that they were “not religious.” One survey (on religious and moral pluralism) found that 45 percent of Britons said they had no religious affiliation, but there were fewer people (26 percent) who were formally members of a religious group than there were those who, while not formally a member of any religious group, nonetheless felt that they were a member. Allegiance to (although not necessarily membership of) religious organizations in the UK as a whole has been estimated as follows: Anglican (43 percent); Roman Catholic (10 percent); Presbyterian (4 percent); Methodist (2 percent); other Trinitarian (4 percent); non-Trinitarian (2.2 percent); Muslim (2.4 percent); Sikh (1 percent); Hindu (0.8 percent); Jewish (0.5 percent); “other” (0.7 percent); and “non-religious” (29 percent). So far as formal membership in Britain is concerned, just over 1.5 million persons are Anglicans, with 1.7 million Roman Catholics, 1 million Presbyterians (including the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom, which was an amalgamation in 1972 of Congregationalists and English Presbyterians), 0.5 million Methodists, 0.25 million Baptists, and a further 0.5 million belonging to various Independent churches. It should, however, be pointed out that these membership numbers can be misleading, as some religions (such as the Roman Catholic Church) include children, while others include only those who have undergone adult baptism.

Data concerning attendance at a place of worship have also produced a mixture of results. Except in Northern Ireland, involvement in institutional religion is closely related to age, and those over 50 account for well over half the adult church attendance. There is also a noteworthy difference between the countries in self-reported church attendance, the rate in Northern Ireland being roughly twice that in Scotland, which in turn is roughly twice that in England, with Wales having dropped from a rate similar to Scotland’s to one similar to England’s over the latter quarter of the 20th century. One national survey by Tearfund in 2007 found that 10 percent of the UK adult population went to church at least weekly, 15 percent at least monthly, 26 percent at least yearly, whilst 59 percent never or practically never went to church. Other surveys have put the weekly attendance figure as low as 6.3 percent.

Whatever the actual rate, there is no doubt that, despite short-term variations, Sunday attendance at the traditional churches has fallen dramatically over the past decades. There are, however, commentators who suggest that while institutional religiosity is on the decline, what is sometimes referred to as “the new spirituality” is on the increase, and more than a third (13 percent of whom had denied being “religious”) report that they have a spiritual life. As the result of a study of the English town Kendal, Heelas and Woodhead concluded that, while congregational life is undoubtedly declining and is likely to decline still further over the next 40 or so years (possibly down to 3 percent—or less—of the British population), the evidence does not support the claim that a spiritual revolution has overtaken traditional religion. While they found that “holistic activity” in Britain had certainly increased (especially among middle-aged women) to just under a million participants during a typical week, it had by no means caught up with the congregational activity of just over 4.5 million churchgoers on a typical Sunday. They did contend, however, that the evidence supports the “subjectivization thesis”—that contemporary British culture promotes a shift from one’s life being governed by external obligations and objective roles (such as the dutiful wife or successful businessman) to a life that is lived by reference to one’s own experiences, which are as much relational as individualistic.

Throughout the centuries the land that now comprises the United Kingdom has undergone many changes as new religions have been introduced and more established religions have undergone numerous changes. It can be plausibly argued that the UK will witness an increasing religious diversification over the foreseeable future. This is likely to be closely, though not entirely, associated with ethnic distinctions. It is also likely that demographic changes, such as differential fertility rates and the influx of new members of the European Community (such as Catholics from Poland), will affect the relative distribution of the different religions. The extent to which such changes will be seen to enrich and the extent to which they will be seen to threaten the United Kingdom, and the outcome of such perceptions, remains to be seen.

Eileen Barker

See also: Augustine of Hippo; Church in Wales; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of Ireland; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scotland; Elizabeth I; Free Churches; Friends/Quakers; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom; Theosophical Society (America); Wesley, John.

References

Badham, Paul. Religion, State, and Society in Modern Britain. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1989.

- Bebbington, D. W. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s. London: Unwin Hyman, 1989.
- Brierley, Peter. UK Christian Handbook: Religious Trends 7. British Religion in the 21st Century: What the Statistics Indicate. London: Christian Research, 2007.
- Brierley, Peter, and Heather Wraight, eds. UK Christian Handbook. London: Christian Research, issued annually.
- Brown, Callum. The Death of Christian Britain: Understanding Secularisation 1800–2000. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Bruce, Steve. Religion in Modern Britain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Burghart, Richard. Hinduism in Great Britain: The Perpetration of Religion in an Alien Cultural Milieu. London: Tavistock, 1987.
- Davie, Grace. Religion in Britain since 1945. Oxford: Blackwell, 1994.
- Davies, Charles Maurice. Heterodox London: or, Phases of Free Thought in the Metropolis. 2 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers, 1874.
- Davies, Douglas, Charles Watkins, and Michael Winter. Church and Religion in Rural England. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991.
- Dawkins, Richard. The God Delusion. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2006.
- Forster, Roger, ed. Ten New Churches. Harrow, UK: British Church Growth Association/MARC Europe, 1986.
- Gay, John D. The Geography of Religion in England. London: Duckworth, 1971.
- Gilley, Sheridan, and W. J. Sheils, eds. A History of Religion in Britain: Practice and Belief from Pre-Roman Times to the Present. Oxford: Blackwell, 1994.
- Green, Miranda J., ed. The Celtic World. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Heelas, Paul, Linda Woodhead, Benjamin Seel, Bronislaw Szerszynski, and Karin Tusting. The Spiritual Revolution: Why Religion Is Giving Way to Spirituality. Oxford: Blackwell, 2004.
- Hornsby-Smith, Michael P. Catholics in England 1950–2000: Historical and Sociological Perspectives. London: Cassell, 1999.

- Hutton, Ronald. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles: Their Nature and Legacy. Oxford: Blackwell, 1991.
- Matthews, Ronald. English Messiahs: Studies of Six English Religious Pretenders, 1656–1927. London: Methuen, 1936.
- McGrath, Alister, with Joanna Collicutt McGrath. The Dawkins Delusion: Atheist Fundamentalism and the Denial of the Divine. London: SPCK, 2007.
- McLeod, Hugh. Religion and the Working Class in Nineteenth Century Britain. Basingstoke, UK: Macmillan, 1984.
- Oliver, Ian P. Buddhism in Britain. London: Rider, 1979.
- Reynolds, Arthur. English Sects: An Historical Handbook. London: Mowbray, 1921.
- Smith, Warren Sylvester. The London Heretics, 1870–1914. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1968.
- Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1973.
- Thomas, Terence, ed. The British: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices 1800–1986. London: Routledge, 1988.
- Weller, Paul, ed. Religions in the UK: A Multi-Faith Directory. Derby, UK: University of Derby/Inter Faith Network for the United Kingdom, 1993.

United Lodge of Theosophists

The United Lodge of Theosophists grew out of the challenge to the Theosophical movement posed by Robert Crosbie (1948–1919). Crosbie was a longtime Theosophist who rejected what he saw as organizational distractions and formalities, especially the polemics that occurred in the 1890s with the changes of leadership following the death of the co-founder of the Theosophical Society (Adyar), Madame Helena Blavatsky. The American lodges had separated under William Q. Judge. Through the first decade of the 20th century, rivalries in the Theosophical movement were focused in the personalities of Annie Besant, who headed the international movement from India, and Katherine Tingley, who headed the American Society.

In forming the United Lodge, Crosbie posed the vision of a nonsectarian Theosophical grouping. It would be loyal to the founders of Theosophy but not show preference for any individual opinions. The United Lodge was formed in 1909 without a constitution, by-laws, or officers. Members, called associates, sign a statement of sympathy with the “Declaration,” and any one of them may found an independent associated lodge.

The United Lodge teaches that there is but one life, a spirit/consciousness that is constantly evolving toward a greater understanding and realization. This evolution proceeds along a course that is native to humanity. The mind is the place of realization and growth, and humans are in a continuous process of growth and development.

The United Lodge has a primary periodical, Theosophy, published in Los Angeles, and The Theosophical Movement, published in Bombay, India. Seven affiliated lodges are scattered across the United States, and there are 16 others in Europe and India (2009).

United Lodge
245 W. 33rd St.
Los Angeles, CA 90007
<http://ult.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Besant, Annie; Blavatsky, Helena P.; Theosophical Society (Adyar).

References

- Crosbie, Robert. The Friendly Philosopher. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, 1934.
- The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950*. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.
- The United Lodge of Theosophists, Its Mission and Its Future*. Los Angeles: Theosophy Company, n.d.

United Methodist Church

The United Methodist Church is the primary body continuing the Wesleyan Methodist tradition in the United States. It is, as of the beginning of the 21st century, the third largest religious body in the country.

Hennepin Avenue United Methodist Church in Minneapolis. (Aliaksandr Nikitsin/Dreamstime.com)

The crises experienced by John Wesley (1703–1791) during his brief work as an Anglican minister in the colony of Georgia (1735–1738) led to the founding of Methodism as a revivalist movement within the Church of England soon after his return to England. By the 1760s, Methodists had joined the migration of other British citizens to the American colonies. Early groups emerged in northern Virginia, Baltimore (Maryland), Wilmington (Delaware), Philadelphia, and New York City. Wesley sent unordained preachers to guide the work. As with the Anglicans, the American Revolution proved a turning point for the movement. All but one of the preachers returned to England, and the remaining Methodists, with John Wesley's consent and guidance, decided to reorganize as an independent denomination.

To facilitate the establishment of the American church, in 1784, Wesley sent the Reverend Thomas Coke (1747–1814), whom he had appointed superintendent, to America to establish the church. At a conference during the Christmas season of that year, the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) was founded. Francis Asbury (1745–1816), the one preacher who had not returned to England, was elected the church's first bishop. He would lead the church for the next 40 years. The church's basic organization was the conference of ministers who met annually under the bishop. At the end of the annual gathering, the bishop announced their pastoral assignment for the coming year. With the bishop assigning ministers to their work, a national strategy for evangelizing the country could be developed. Wesley also edited the Church of England's Thirty-nine Articles of Religion and presented Twenty-five Articles, which the Methodist Episcopal Church accepted as its doctrinal statement. After the war the church grew significantly, and by the 1830s it had become the largest religious organization in America.

In the first decades of the church, it faced and resolved several issues that had led to schisms. As the church grew, many African Americans, especially in the non-slave states in the North, became members. However, African American members were segregated in worship and not welcomed into the ordained ministry. Beginning in the 1790s, a set of schisms occurred among the African American members that led to several new denominations being established, most notably the African Methodist Episcopal Church and African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. At about the same time, a number of German-speaking immigrants in the new nation were affected by the Methodist revivals. However, Asbury decided that Germans had no future in America, and he declined to set up German-speaking parishes. This led to the establishment of several new “Methodist” denominations, the Evangelical Association (after 1922 the Evangelical Church) and the United Brethren in Christ. In 1830 the Methodist Episcopal Church experienced the first of several schisms, by ministers and congregations who founded the Methodist Protestant Church (MPC). The church had no bishops and allowed congregations a voice in hiring their minister and lay members a role in the national church leadership.

The most significant break occurred in 1844, when the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) voted to divide, slavery and the nature of episcopal leadership being the prime issues. The southern conferences reorganized as the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS). At the time of the split, the Roman Catholic Church replaced the Methodist Episcopal Church as the largest religious body in the United States, though both the MEC and MECS continued to grow through the rest of the century.

Not only did Methodism spread across the United States, but by the middle of the 19th century it had fully joined the world missions movement that the British Methodists had helped to initiate. The several Methodist churches sent missionaries to all parts of the globe, and the scope of foreign work increased as more countries were opened to the missionary enterprise.

In the 20th century, the various branches of Methodism began a process of reversing the fragmentation of the previous century. In 1939 the MEC, MECS, and MPC united to form the Methodist Church (1939– 1968). In 1946 the Evangelical Church and the United Brethren merged to form the Evangelical United Brethren. In 1968 the Evangelical United Brethren and the Methodist Church united to form the United Methodist Church.

The United Methodist Church does not have a central headquarters, though the headquarters of its Council on Ministries serves some of those functions. Additional offices of its national boards and agencies are located in Nashville, Tennessee (the headquarters of the former MECS); Washington, D.C.; and Evanston, Illinois. The highest legislative body in the church is the General Conference, which meets quadrennially. In the United States the church is divided geographically into five jurisdictions, and each jurisdiction into conferences. Jurisdictional conferences meet quadrennially, during which time elections are held to fill any vacancies in the episcopacy, and bishops receive their assignments for the next four years. Bishops preside over one or two annual conferences and appoint the ministers to their parish assignments. Conferences outside the United States are grouped into seven central conferences that function much as jurisdictional conferences, at which bishops are elected.

At the time of the formation of the United Methodist Churches, the constituent bodies were already participating in the international move to grant autonomous status to foreign churches that had resulted from earlier missionary endeavors. In 1968 a number of the former mission churches took the occasion of the formation of the new church in the United States to assume their autonomous status. Most of these churches have continued a fraternal relationship with the United Methodist Church through the World Methodist Council. The United Methodist Church is also a member of the World Council of Churches. Since the 1990s, the United Methodist Church has been in active conversations with representatives of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church, looking toward greater alignment and cooperation and possible union.

In 2006 the church reported 7,995,456 members. It supports a massive program of higher education, social service agencies, and medical facilities, both in the United States and abroad.

United Methodist Church
Council on Ministries
601 W. Riverside Ave.
Dayton, OH 45406

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; Christian Methodist Episcopal Church; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- The Book of Discipline*. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 2004.
- Frank, Thomas Edward. Polity, Practice, and the Mission of the United Methodist Church. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2006.
- Jones, Scott J. United Methodist Doctrine: The Extreme Center. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2002.
- McEllhenney, John G., ed. United Methodism in America: A Compact History. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1992.
- Richey, Russell E., Kenneth E. Rowe, and Jean Miller Schmidt. The Methodist Experience in America: A Sourcebook. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2000.
- Tuell, Jack M. The Organization of the United Methodist Church, 2005–2008 Edition. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2005.
- Yrigoyen, Charles, Jr., and Susan E. Warrick, eds. Historical Dictionary of Methodism. 2nd ed. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2005.

United Methodist Church in Ivory Coast

The United Methodist Church in Ivory Coast (formerly the Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire) dates to the arrival in 1924 of a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, Jon Platt, from Dahomey (Ghana) and Togo, where the Wesleyans (now the Methodist Church in Great Britain) had established work as early as 1842. It is the case that prior to that time, beginning in the first decade of the century, African prophet William

Wade Harris (1865–1929), a former Methodist, had established his church in Côte d'Ivoire and neighboring countries. He had predicted the arrival of white missionaries, and many saw in the Methodists the fulfillment of his prophecy.

As the Wesleyans' work in Côte d'Ivoire developed, it was an integral part of the work in Dahomey and Togo. In 1947 it had grown to the point that it was detached from work in the neighboring countries and organized as a district directly attached to the British Methodist Conference. The work in Côte d'Ivoire was given independent status in 1963, and the reorganization was completed the following year. At that time, the first indigenous leader, Samson Nandjui, was selected as the mission's chairman.

In 2001, the Methodists in Côte d'Ivoire, while remaining autonomous, affiliated with the United Methodist Church and changed their name to the United Methodist Church in Ivory Coast.

Although Methodism has become a national movement, with a membership and constituency of approximately one million (2005), the major centers are in the capital, Abidjan, and in Dabou, where the church opened a hospital in 1968. Ministerial education is supported through the Protestant University of West Africa (formerly the School of Protestant Theology), located in Porto-Novo in Benin, and the Protestant faculty of Yaoundé and the Center for Evangelical Literature, both located in Yaoundé, Cameroon. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council. It has formed a structure to handle issues of Christian-Muslim relations.

Protestant Methodist Church in Côte d'Ivoire
41 Boulevard de la République
B.P. 12
Abidjan, 01
Côte d'Ivoire

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2006.

United Pentecostal Church International

The United Pentecostal Church International (UPCI), the largest Oneness Pentecostal organization, traces its beginning to the founding of the New Testament church on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). It affirms the experience, doctrine, and practice of the Apostles. It emerged within the modern Pentecostal movement with the activity of Charles F. Parham (1873–1929) and his distinctive message concerning the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the initial evidence of speaking in tongues. The ministry of William J. Seymour (1870–1922), a onetime student of Parham’s and also a Holiness minister, was equally significant for the founding of the movement. His Azusa Street Mission in Los Angeles, California, was the site of a three-year revival (1906–1909) that resulted in the worldwide spread of Pentecostalism.

The Pentecostal movement experienced a division in 1910, when William Durham (1873–1912), a Baptist pastor in Chicago, dissented on the doctrine of sanctification. A second division occurred when ministers such as Canadian Baptist Frank J. Ewart (1876–1947), Glenn A. Cook (1867–1948), African American pastor G. T. Haywood (1880–1931), and Iranian immigrant Andrew D. Urshan (1884–1967) started baptizing “in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ” instead of with the Trinitarian formula.

On April 15, 1914, Ewart and Cook rebaptized each other in Jesus’ name—the decisive act that launched Oneness Pentecostalism as a distinct movement. Soon, they and many other ministers began rebaptizing people, and they adopted a non-Trinitarian explanation of the Godhead. Many members of the Assemblies of God (AG), which had formed in 1914, embraced this teaching, including two prominent ministers, Howard A. Goss and E. N. Bell. Then in 1916, the AG adopted a Trinitarian statement of faith, forcing the Oneness ministers to withdraw. Some 156 of 585 ministers left the Assemblies.

Pentecostal reverend Isaias Mercado prays with parishioners during the Spanish-language service at the La Casa del Carpintero (the Carpenter’s House), in Chicago, July 29, 2007. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1917 leading Oneness ministers organized the General Assembly of Apostolic Assemblies. In 1918 it merged with a small pre-existing group called the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World (PAW), which had embraced the Oneness message. The uniquely organized PAW was forced to hold all of its conferences in the North, on account of segregationist regulations in the South. As a result, few of the southern ministers could participate fully, and in 1924 most of the whites withdrew from the PAW. They formed three regional organizations, two of which soon merged. The desire for inter-racial unity was so strong, however, that in 1931 the merged group joined with the PAW again, creating the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ. Initially its governing board was required to be 50 percent black, but later its racial composition was adjusted to be the same as that of the ministry. Again, the pressures of society worked against this new effort. By 1938 most of the blacks had left and returned to the PAW, which a few ministers had kept alive.

At this point, there were two relatively large, predominately white Oneness Pentecostal organizations—the Pentecostal Church, Incorporated, and the Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ. On September 25, 1945, these two groups merged in St. Louis, Missouri, forming the United Pentecostal Church. In 1972 the word “International” was added to the official name. The first general superintendent was Howard Goss, who served from 1945 to 1951. Following him were Arthur T. Morgan (1952–1967), Oliver F. Fauss (1967, interim), Stanley W. Chambers (1968–1977), and Nathaniel A. Urshan (1978–). In 1946 a Canadian Oneness group, the Full Gospel Pentecostal Church, joined the new organization.

The UPCI shares many key beliefs with other conservative Protestants, including the existence of one true God; the creation of the universe by God; the inspiration, authority, and infallibility of the Bible; the existence of angels, the devil, and demons; the fall and sinfulness of humanity; the incarnation (Jesus Christ is God manifested in the flesh, the Son of God, and born of a virgin); the atonement (the substitutionary death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ); salvation by grace through faith in Jesus Christ; water baptism; the New Testament church as the people of God; the priesthood of all believers; the rapture of the church; the premillennial Second Coming of Jesus Christ to Earth; the millennial kingdom of Jesus Christ; the last judgment; eternal punishment for the unrighteous; and eternal life for the righteous. The UPCI observes the Lord’s Supper and practices foot washing as an ordinance.

Like all other Pentecostal groups, the UPCI teaches the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the initial sign of tongues; miraculous, spiritual gifts for today; and divine healing. In addition, the UPCI embraces three important Oneness Pentecostal distinctives. First, it affirms the Oneness view of the Godhead. God is absolutely and indivisibly one (Deuteronomy 6:4), and in Jesus Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily (Colossians 2:9). In order to redeem fallen humanity, God has revealed himself as the Father (in parental relationship to humanity), in the Son (in human flesh), and as the Holy Spirit (in spiritual action) (see Malachi 2:10; Luke 1:35; Genesis 1:2.) These three titles identify manifestations of the one God, not three distinct persons or centers of consciousness in the Godhead. Jesus is fully God and fully man.

Second, the church affirms the plan of salvation according to Acts 2:38. In the new covenant, the application of God’s grace and the expression of saving faith come as humans repent of sins, are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38). Following the pattern of the Apostolic church, water baptism should be administered by immersion in the name of Jesus Christ, for Jesus is the only name given for salvation (Acts 4:12).

Third, the church affirms the necessity of holiness of life. The UPCI teaches that sanctification is a process that begins at the new birth. Citing Hebrews 12:14 and other scriptural passages, the UPCI Articles of Faith emphasize the need for holiness both inwardly (attitudes and thoughts) and outwardly (behavior and dress).

UPCI church services are characterized by demonstrative, spontaneous worship. Important elements of public worship are preaching, singing, testifying, and praying. Evangelistic services typically end with an altar call, extended prayer by the congregation, and the laying on of hands.

The basic form of church government is congregational. The local body controls its own affairs, and the pastor is the leader under Christ. There is a strong district and national organization for the sake of ministerial standards, fellowship, and world evangelism. The organization is governed by its annual general conference. When the conference is not in session, the highest governing body is the Board of General Presbyters. The general board consists of the general superintendent, the general secretary-treasurer, two assistant general superintendents, six divisional directors, the district superintendents, and the regional executive presbyters. A global council, composed of representatives from around the world, coordinates the international efforts of the various national bodies affiliated with the UPCI. The UPCI ordains both men and women. It recognizes women as evangelists, missionaries, and pastors, but it reserves the top executive offices for men.

The work of the church is organized into the following divisions: church administration, editorial, education, foreign missions, Harvestime (radio), home missions (United States and Canada), ladies ministries, Sunday school, youth, and publishing.

The organization owns the Pentecostal Publishing House, which prints materials under the imprints Word Aflame Press and World Aflame Publications. Among the institutions operated or endorsed by the church are the World Network of Prayer, Harvestime radio ministry, the Urshan Graduate School of Theology, 7 Bible colleges in North America and 80 overseas, the Historical Center, Tupelo Children's Mansion (an orphanage), Lighthouse Ranch for Boys (a rehabilitation center), Spirit of Freedom (a ministry to alcohol and drug abusers), and Compassion Services International (a relief agency). The official periodical is the Pentecostal Herald.

In 2008, the UPCI reported 4,358 churches (excluding daughter works) in the United States and Canada, and 28,351 in 175 other countries. It reports a total worldwide constituency membership of more than 4 million of which 1 million is in North America. The UPCI is the only Oneness organization to have a large missions program in all areas of the world, with high concentrations of adherents in Louisiana; Mizoram, India; Ethiopia; and New Brunswick, Canada.

United Pentecostal Church International World Evangelism Center
8855 Dunn Rd.
Hazelwood, MO 63042-2299
<http://www.upci.org>

David K. Bernard

See also: Assemblies of God; Parham, Charles Fox; Pentecostalism; Seymour, William J.

References

Bernard, David K. The Apostolic Life. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 2006.

Bernard, David K. A History of Christian Doctrine. Vol. 3, The Twentieth Century. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1999.

Clanton, Arthur L., and Charles E. Clanton. United We Stand. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1995.

Foster, Fred. Their Story: 20th Century Pentecostals. Rev. ed. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1981.

Hall, J. L., and David K. Bernard, eds. Doctrines of the Bible. Hazelwood, MO: Word Aflame, 1990.

United Presbyterian Church of Brazil

The United Presbyterian Church of Brazil began in the 1970s when the more theologically liberal and socially active leaders in the Presbyterian Church in Brazil were alienated by some of the more conservative and anti-ecumenical policies instituted by the church. In 1972 a number of the ministers and laypeople left to form a separate church that in 1973 became the United Presbyterian Church. They found that some ministers and churches of like mind had previously left the Independent Presbyterian Church and formed the National Federation of Presbyterian Churches. The two groups made common cause, and in 1978 they merged to form the United Presbyterian Church of Brazil.

Although it is a relatively small body on the Brazilian landscape, the United Presbyterian Church has become well known for its protests of social injustice and its activities on behalf of the poor. Its theological statements include not only several of the historic Reformed statements of faith but also two more recent documents, the Barmen Confession, adopted by German Christians in protest against Nazism, and the Confession of 1967, originally promulgated by American Presbyterians (now united in the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). In the 1990s the church reported 4,762 members. Its 51 congregation are organized into 8 presbyteries.

The church is ecumenically active at the national and regional levels. Internationally, it is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

United Presbyterian Church
 CP 01-2 12, Av. Princesa Isabel
 Salas 1210-1211
 290 10-260 Victoria, ES
 Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church in Brazil; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

United Protestant Church of Belgium

The United Protestant Church of Belgium continues the movement of the 16th-century Reformation into the area now known as the Low Countries. As in the Netherlands, the Reformed Church found support in Belgium, but as a result of the settlement of the struggle for control over the Low Countries in the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), Belgium continued as a predominantly Roman Catholic region. Those Reformed churches that survived were organized under either the Reformed Church in the Netherlands or the Reformed Church of France. There were some 40 Protestant congregations in the land as World War I began in 1914.

Following the war, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) began a relief movement in Belgium that also led to the formation of congregations. In 1922 a Methodist Belgian mission was formally initiated, and a school, orphanage, and hospital opened. The Belgian annual conference was created in 1930. The growth of the church through the 1930s was accompanied by a general growth in Protestantism. Through the 1930s, more than 200 Protestant congregations of all types were formed.

Protestants suffered greatly during World War II. The Methodist Church lost much of its property, and many of its leaders were arrested. After the war, American Methodists launched an eight-year rebuilding program. Integral to the program was the erection of a new theological school in Brussels. In 1952 the Belgium Conference was incorporated into the Central and Southern European Central Conference, whose bishop resided in Zurich.

Through the 1960s, various parts of Belgian Protestantism began to look toward organic union. In 1963 the Methodists united with the Evangelical Protestant Church (a work supported by Swiss Protestants) to form the Protestant Church of Belgium. Then in 1978, the Belgian congregations of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands and the Belgian Christian Missionary Church united with the Protestant Church of Belgium to form the United Protestant Church.

In 2005, the United Protestant Church reported 50,000 members. Although it is a relatively small body, the church has responsibility for teaching Protestantism in the public schools, and it administers a chaplaincy program in the prisons and hospitals. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Methodist Council.

United Protestant Church
 5 rue de Champ-de-Mars
 B-1050 Brussels
 Belgium

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church of France; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands; United Methodist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:

William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles

The Netherlands Antilles include six islands, three of which are off the coast of Venezuela (Curacao, Bonaire, and Aruba) and three across the Caribbean, east of the Virgin Islands (St. Maarten, Saba, and St. Eustatius). The Netherlands Reformed Church was introduced as early as 1635, primarily through chaplains that accompanied the employees of the Dutch Indies Company, but it had little influence until after the dissolving of the Dutch Indies Company (1791) and the Napoleonic era. The church had tried to convert the original inhabitants of the islands, but with virtually no success, and there was little interest in converting the African laborers until slavery was abolished in 1863. The Roman Catholicism of the original settlers continues as the dominant religious force.

The Dutch language died out on St. Maarten, Saba, and St. Eustatius, and with it the Dutch Reformed Church, whose members were absorbed into the Methodist and Anglican churches. However, in 1825, King William I, the ruler of Holland, decreed the formation of a United Protestant Church in his Caribbean possessions. This church brought together the members of the Netherlands Reformed Church with the minority of members of what is now the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Three units of this church have survived, the churches on Curacao, Aruba, and Bonaire. At the time of their formation, each of these churches was quite small (the one on Bonaire, for example, having a total of 71 members).

The most successful of the churches was on Curacao. It was serviced by ministers from Holland, some of whom made periodic trips to Aruba. It grew several congregations, but lost some strength in 1931 when a group of members left to found the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated) in Curacao. In churches where no minister was available, lay readers delivered sermons from texts approved by the Netherlands Reformed Churches. The first minister was permanently stationed on Aruba in 1858. It was not until 1947 that a second minister was assigned. There are now three congregations.

Bonaire's congregation was not organized until the 1840s. The minister also took a different course and began to baptize the children of the African residents. The island's second congregation was organized in 1934.

The United Protestant Church has seven congregations on the three islands (though the churches on Aruba have a more independent status), and in 2005 reported 5,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches. Services are held in Dutch, English, and Papiamentu (a new language composed of elements of Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, and English that predominates among the population). Although it is relatively small, the church provides the main Protestant presence on the three islands.

United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles
Fortkerk
Fort Amsterdam
Willemstad
Curacao

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Churches of the Netherlands; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom

The United Reformed Church, formed in 1972, is the primary vehicle carrying the 17th-century Puritan movement in England. In Scotland, Presbyterianism gained the ascendancy in 1560, with Parliament's acceptance of the Scots Confession. With the establishment of the Church of England under Elizabeth I (1533–1603), who assumed the throne in 1558, those who followed the reformed ideas espoused by John Calvin (1509–1564) in Geneva, and who hoped eventually to further reform the church along Presbyterian lines, emerged as one wing of the Puritan movement. Puritans sought to purify the church further, and they fell along a range of opinions.

The Puritans had their opportunity in the 1640s, when they gained control of Parliament. In 1643 the Westminster Assembly of Divines met to advise Parliament, and in the process they drew up the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Westminster Catechism. More than any other, these documents define British Presbyterianism. Presbyterianism had always to contend not only with the Church of England but also with Independents (Congregationalists) and Baptists. Although Presbyterians wished to take control from bishops and place it in the hands of church elders (presbyters), the Congregationalists and Baptists opted for authority in the hands of the congregations.

The Puritans reigned supreme during the brief period of the Commonwealth (1643–1660), but with the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, the episcopally led Church of England returned to power. The various Puritan groupings were forced to organize as dissenting churches. Legal restrictions tended to decrease support, though there was some relief with the Toleration Act of 1689. Beginning in the 1740s, England experienced what was known as the Evangelical Awakening, a national revival that had as its main product the Wesleyan Methodist movement. However, both Presbyterians and Congregationalists experienced new life, and one wing of the Methodists remained loyal to a Calvinist theological perspective. It would organize as the Calvinist Methodist Connexion.

Toward the end of the 18th century, dissenting Puritan groups began to take on new organizational expressions. As early as 1783 the presbytery of Northumberland brought Presbyterians in the north of England together. The Presbyterian Church in England was formed in 1836, following the movement of a number of Scots south. The Scottish expatriates also formed the English Synod of the United Presbyterian Church (a Scottish body) in 1863. In 1876, these two groups united to form the Presbyterian Church of England.

Congregationalism in England had taken definite form in 1649 with the issuance of the Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order, which accepted the Reformed theology that underlay the Westminster Confession but opted for congregational church polity. Congregationalists took on new responsibilities with the formation in 1795 of the London Missionary Society, which would send missionaries and Congregationalism around the world. The Society preceded the formation of the Congregational Union of England and Wales in 1832.

The Congregational Union and Presbyterian Church became leading forces in the shaping of Protestantism as a worldwide phenomenon in the 19th century and assumed leadership roles in the ecumenical movement that led to the consolidation of so many churches in the 20th century. The Congregational Union (renamed the Congregational Church of England and Wales in 1966) merged with the Presbyterian Church of England to form the United Presbyterian Church in 1972.

In the meantime, in 1833, Peyton Wyth had brought to England the ideas of radical Presbyterian minister Alexander Campbell (1788–1866), whose work in the United States had led to the formation of a new revivalistic movement that would later lead to the formation of several new denominations, such as the Churches of Christ and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Wyth led in the formation of the new British group called the Churches of Christ. Over the first century it formed some 200 congregations.

In the mid-1970s, the majority of the Association of the Churches of Christ voted to join with the new United Reformed Church, but not by the two-thirds majority needed to effect a merger. Hence, in 1979 the Association dissolved, and two new associations formed. One of these combined in 1980 with the United Church. The other continues as the Churches of Christ. The merger led to a name change, the United Reformed Church of England and Wales becoming the United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom.

The United Reformed Church's 85,000 members (2005) are grouped into 11 regional synods in England, with an addition synod in both Scotland and Wales. With the addition of the Churches of Christ congregations, the church now has a few congregations in Scotland. The former London Missionary Society has been reorganized by merger with the various other missionary societies operating in the Presbyterian and Congregational world, and in 1977 it completed a thorough theoretical realignment that now envisions its work as a partnership arrangement with churches worldwide. It has re-emerged as the Council for World Mission.

In 1972 the United Church published a new Confession of Faith, which it saw as a contemporary restatement of the Reformed theological tradition. That confession reflects the church's participation in contemporary theological dialogue. The church is a leading member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and also is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. The church retains special relationship to the 30 partnership churches associated with the Council for World Mission.

On April 1, 2000, the Scottish Congregational Church brought some 50 congregation into the United Reformed Church and reorganized as its Scottish synod. Congregationalism had come to Scotland at the end of the 18th century with the appearance of the two laymen Robert (1764–1842) and James Haldane (1768–1851), who began to advocate the cause of world mission within the Church of Scotland. The church was slow to respond, and in reaction the brothers began to form independent churches that would support a missionary program. The Reverend Greville Ewing (1787–1841) came to their aid and began classes for the training of ministers in 1799. He was the major voice calling the congregations to form the Congregational Union in 1812.

Although it was small, the church would have an important role in world missions. Among its members would be the immortal David Livingstone (1813–1873), who pioneered Christian missions in central Africa. It cooperated with the London Missionary Society formed by the British Congregationalists.

In 1897 the Congregational Union merged with the Evangelical Union. This latter union had arisen as a protest against the Calvinist emphases in one of the splinters of the Church of Scotland, the Synod of the United Secession. The leader of the Union was a follower of Arminian theology (similar to that espoused by the Methodists). The Union after 1897 was a decidedly more eclectic body. It had an evangelical piety, emphasized social programs, and developed a liberal theology relative to the predominant Presbyterian/Reformed theology that dominated Scotland early in the 20th century. The Union was always a non-creedal church. The Union was a pioneer in ecumenism, partially a product of their missionary work.

Congregationalism in Scotland had emerged around three separate structures: the Congregational Union, the Scottish Congregational College (founded in 1811 in Edinburgh), and the Congregational Women's Union. Each of these functions as an independent organization. In the 1990s, supporters of each responded to a plan to link the three organizations more closely into what was termed a "voluntary church." This move to give a more coordinated and united existence to the Congregational community met with widespread support, and in 1993 the three entities united as the Scottish Congregational Church.

United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom
86 Tavistock Pl.
London WC1H 9RT
United Kingdom

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church of England; Church of Scotland; Churches of Christ; Elizabeth I; London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and

- International Organizations*. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Cornick, David. Under God's Good Hand: History of the Traditions Which Have Come Together in the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom. London: United Reformed Church, 1998.
- Lewis, Tracey. From Streams to Oceans: Celebrating 25 Years in the United Reformed Church. London: United Reformed Church, 1997.
- United Reformed Church Yearbook*. London: United Reformed Church, published annually.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

United Religions Initiative

The United Religions Initiative (URI) was conceived in the mid-1990s by the Right Reverend William E. Swing, the Episcopal bishop of San Francisco. His vision pictured a global interfaith community that could work toward ending religiously motivated violence and replacing such violence with structure based on healing, peace, and justice. Over the next five years the ideals of that vision were spread internationally, and, beginning in 1996, a series of annual Global Summit conferences were convened in San Francisco.

Among the first actions of those who identified with the Initiative was the sponsoring of a 72 Hours of Peace program that began on December 31, 1999. The conferences also considered and initiated some 40 projects in countries around the world that attracted the attention of prominent religious leaders such as Desmond Tutu of South Africa and the Dalai Lama. These initial efforts led to the organization of a variety of local groups (termed "cooperating circles") in different countries, an interim Global Council, and a formal inaugurating conference held in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in June 2000. At the opening of the conference on June 26, people from 39 religious traditions and 44 countries signed the charter and formally established the United Religions Initiative.

It is the task of the URI to promote enduring daily interfaith cooperation that will in turn lead to its ultimate goal of ending violence caused by religious conflict, and lead to a culture characterized by peace, justice, and healing. The first task of the cooperating circles on the various continents of the world was to elect representatives who would form the first Global Council. At the time of its founding, some 75 cooperating circles had been recognized. Although the URI is a new interfaith organization, it has made cooperation with other interfaith groups part of its standard operating format. Peace building remains in the forefront of the Initiative's concerns, and it has published a 300-page guide to the subject available for downloading from its website.

The URI is organized around hundreds of local cooperating circles that act locally on the global vision of the URI. The circles in each region elect trustees who sit on the Global Council, the international decision- and policy-making body whose task is to assist the circles in realizing the vision and values of the URI's preamble, purpose, and principles. The Council also oversees the staff, which includes an executive director, people in charge of various program divisions, and regional coordinators.

The Initiative now includes an unnumbered community of people dedicated to interfaith cooperation and activism, the more active core being organized into 398 Cooperation Circles in 67 countries and representing more than 100 religious groups, spiritual expressions, and indigenous traditions.

United Religions Initiative
PO Box 29242
San Francisco, CA 94129-0242
<http://www.uri.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Episcopal Church.

References

- Swing, William E. The Coming United Religions. Grand Rapids, MI: Conexus Press, 1998.
- United Religions Initiative. <http://www.unitedreligions.org/newsite/index.htm>. Accessed August 15, 2001.

United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel

See Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing

The United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing (Shakers) is a Christian sectarian community of English origins with a distinctive theology and lifestyle, a community that has existed for more than two and a half centuries. The fortunes of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing have included times of remarkable success as well as periods of violent persecution. Although only a handful of Shakers remain today at one location in America, Shakerism continues to attract a wide variety of followers who find the history, the religious perspective, and the material culture of the community attractive.

The Shakers, known initially as "Shaker Quakers" because they trembled or shook when in ecstasy, first coalesced in England in the 1740s around two tailors, James and Jane Wardley. Leadership of the small group of religious enthusiasts later passed on to Ann Lee Standerin (1736–1784), an uneducated charismatic and visionary who participated in public demonstrations against the established churches. In 1774 Ann Lee (as she came to be known) led a handful of followers to America, where they eventually took up residence in New York near Albany. These English immigrants were accused of being British sympathizers during the Revolutionary War, and some, including Lee, were imprisoned for a time. The Shakers emerged on the religious scene in 1780, when they began to attract American converts. Lee, known to her followers as Mother Ann, traveled throughout eastern New York and New England on a missionary journey. The sites where she was successful in attracting followers often subsequently became the locations of Shaker villages. Lee was regarded by her followers as a gifted prophet, a miracle worker, and their spiritual parent.

An emotional meeting of the Shakers, a utopian community in New York state founded by Anne Lee in 1774. (Library of Congress)

Following Lee's death, successive leaders, known as "the ministry," gathered believers into separate communities where life was organized around several fundamental principles, including celibacy, communal property, acceptance of the ministry's authority, organization of new "families," and separation from the "world" outside the villages. Between 1784 and 1826 20 Shaker villages were established, located from Maine in the East to Kentucky in the West. The Shakers reached their numerical height in the 1840s, when approximately 4,500 believers inhabited the scattered villages. The Society's strenuous work ethic resulted in economic success in both agriculture and light manufacturing.

Among distinctive Shaker beliefs are the concept of God as involving both a male and a female aspect (Father and Mother), the association of sin with lust and sexual relations, the identification of Ann Lee with the Christ Spirit (Ann the Beloved Daughter of God parallel with Jesus the Beloved Son of God), and the possibility of Christian perfection. Worship within the community included physical exercises, such as dances and marches, as well as song, testimony, and exhortation. The years following 1837 witnessed a wave of spiritualistic activity in the Society during which time abundant "spiritual gifts" and messages were received by Shaker "instruments," or mediums.

Following the Civil War the Society experienced steady numerical and economic decline. In particular, it failed to recruit and successfully retain male members. The Believers divided over the best strategy to follow in these circumstances, some arguing for accommodation to modern American life, others resisting it in the name of tradition. Villages were closed, resources consolidated or sold off, and by the 1980s only two villages remained in New England, each with a mere handful of Believers. In the year 2000 seven Shakers resided in the last village, Sabbathday Lake, Maine, a site founded in 1794. By 2008 the number of Shakers in Maine had declined to three. Despite the declining numbers, the contemporary Shakers exhibit a measure of confidence about the future. They are surrounded by a large circle of friends, spiritual colleagues, and patrons who admire the believers' religious values, their distinctive culture, and the material objects associated with their history.

Stephen J. Stein

References

- Burks, Jean M., ed. Shaker Design: Out of this World. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008.
- Duffield, Holley Gene. Historical Dictionary of the Shakers. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2000.
- Kirk, John T. The Shaker World: Art, Life, Belief. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1997.
- Stein, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Whitson, Robley Edward, ed. The Shakers: Two Centuries of Spiritual Reflection. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

■ United States of America

The United States is the centermost of the three large countries that dominate North America. It lies between Canada and Mexico. The United States is a federal republic made up of 48 contiguous states, 2 additional states, Alaska and Hawaii (in the north Pacific), and the District of Columbia. The country's 3,790,000 square miles make it the world's third largest country in land area. As of 2008, its population in excess of 305,000,000 makes it the third largest country in population (behind only China and India). Included in the population count are an estimated 11 million undocumented residents.

The original inhabitants of what is now the United States of America arrived at least 30,000 years ago from Asia, most likely over a land bridge now submerged beneath the Bering Straits. They spread across the continent, and by the 15th century CE some 500 different groupings, now usually referred to as nations, arose. Some groups were small, occupying a relatively confined niche. Others adopted a nomadic lifestyle that saw them roaming over a large territory and living off the land. In still other climes, a settled agricultural life

United States of America

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	190,970,000	257,311,000	81.8	0.85	277,162,000	301,962,000
Independents	34,702,000	72,700,000	23.1	0.94	84,000,000	100,000,000
Roman Catholics	48,305,000	70,550,000	22.4	1.52	80,000,000	90,000,000
Protestants	58,568,000	58,000,000	18.4	−0.15	60,000,000	60,000,000
Agnostics	10,270,000	36,738,000	11.7	2.35	51,150,000	66,400,000
Jews	6,700,000	5,220,000	1.7	−0.31	5,000,000	5,000,000
Muslims	800,000	5,150,000	1.6	1.90	7,000,000	10,000,000
Buddhists	200,000	3,300,000	1.0	2.25	6,000,000	8,000,000
New religionists	560,000	1,600,000	0.5	1.31	2,000,000	2,600,000
Ethnoreligionists	70,000	1,450,000	0.5	1.30	1,350,000	1,500,000
Hindus	100,000	1,445,000	0.5	1.57	2,100,000	3,000,000
Atheists	200,000	1,250,000	0.4	0.31	1,500,000	1,800,000
Baha'is	138,000	500,000	0.2	2.52	750,000	1,000,000
Sikhs	10,000	300,000	0.1	2.43	400,000	500,000
Spiritists	0	158,000	0.1	1.03	175,000	200,000
Chinese folk	90,000	92,000	0.0	1.53	120,000	150,000
Jains	3,000	85,000	0.0	1.42	120,000	180,000
Shintoists	0	62,200	0.0	1.03	70,000	85,000
Zoroastrians	0	17,500	0.0	1.03	18,000	18,000
Daoists	0	12,400	0.0	1.03	15,000	20,000
Total population	210,111,000	314,692,000	100.0	1.03	354,930,000	402,415,000

developed. Possibly the largest single settlement was at Cahokia, Illinois, where a city with upward of 40,000 inhabitants once existed.

Each nation had its own religion that was exclusive to it, though they often resembled those of bordering nations. Across the continent, religious life and ritual expressions varied widely but were related intimately to the land, its animal inhabitants, and the climate. Religion and the secular order were intertwined, and while religious functionaries—shamans, magicians, healers—were present, they often shared spiritual authority with the chiefs. Once the Europeans arrived, the Native peoples began to absorb insights from Christianity, and it often became difficult to distinguish those elements that had been absorbed from those that had been originally present.

The first Europeans to discover North America and possibly land in American territory were the Vikings, but significant contact began early in the 16th century as the Spanish expanded northward from their original settlements in the Caribbean. Initial settlements were in Florida and New Mexico, but later expanded to include the Southwest from Texas to California. Meanwhile, the French expanded up the St. Lawrence River into the Great Lakes region and southward through the Mississippi Valley to New Orleans. Relatively late, with the landing of the settlers in Massachusetts and Virginia at the beginning of the 17th century, the British began to make their all-important settlement of the Atlantic seacoast. Both Dutch and Swedish settlements would be established amid the British colonies, but these eventually gave way to British control.

The arrival of the Europeans would lead to the establishment of most of the state churches. Roman Catholicism was planted in the Spanish and French colonies, the Church of England in most of the British colonies. The congregation of the Church of Sweden (Lutheran) in Delaware and of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands in New York and New Jersey continued under British rule. More important for the future of the land, however, were the colonies formed by various groups of religious dissenters. Congregationalists, losers in the power struggle between the Puritans and Anglicans in 17th-century England, colonized Massachusetts in 1620. They wished to establish a land in which the Congregationalists were the state church, and they proved most intolerant of other dissenters. Earlier, a small group of the most radical Puritans had settled at Plymouth, Massachusetts. These Pilgrims shared the Reformed faith of the Congregationalists but dissented on the idea of establishing a state church.

The intolerance of the Puritans would lead to the banishment of one of their ministers, Roger Williams, who would settle in Rhode Island, where he would found the first Baptist church in the colonies and create a state that allowed broad religious liberties. Farther south, a member of the Society of Friends created a colony in which the beleaguered sectarian groups from across Europe were welcome. Not only did the Quakers make Philadelphia their home, but Mennonites, Brethren, and members of several mystical groups made their way to Pennsylvania. Finally, Roman Catholics from England, where Catholicism was feared by both Puritans and Anglicans, settled and attempted to establish a colony in which religious freedom reigned. The colony would eventually be taken over by Anglicans from neighboring Virginia and the period of religious freedom curtailed.

The changes brought by the War for American Independence (1776–1781) led to a dramatic change in the religious community. In the new nation, two churches existed in strength, the Congregationalists in New England and Anglicanism in the southern colonies. Anglicanism was identified with the defeated British regime, and few south of New England would tolerate a Congregational establishment. Leading figures in the Revolution—Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin included—were both pragmatic politicians and Deists. The most liberal religious thinkers of their day, they opted for an experiment in creating a country without a state church. They left the option for a state church up to the individual states, and Massachusetts kept its establishment into the early 19th century. Soon all of the states wrote an anti-establishment clause into their constitutions.

At the time of the founding of the United States, most of the several hundred Native American nations remained intact, though some had been destroyed by disease and war brought by the Europeans. A few of the Native Americans had become the objects of attempts by Christians to convert them, the most successful mission being established by the Roman Catholics in Maryland. Through the 19th century, a variety of churches would open missions among Native Americans; however, their efforts would be continually undermined by their identification with the U.S. government, whose policy of war, breaking treaties, and removal of Native Americans to less attractive lands in the West continued to sour the possibilities for full participation of Native peoples in American life.

The other factor determining the uniqueness of the new nation was the introduction of slavery into the southern colonies and the adoption of a set of laws inhibiting the integration of African Americans into the other colonies. Following the American Revolution, slavery expanded in the South, and anti-black legislation was adopted by most free states. The country fought a Civil War in the 19th century (1860–1865) that resulted in the ending of slavery but did not deal with many of the special laws related to African Americans, including a set of laws adopted in the southern states at the end of the century. Continued unrest because of the legal restrictions on African Americans (and by the middle of the 20th century on other minority groups) led to the passing of broad civil rights legislation in the 1960s.

When George Washington, the first president of the United States, was inaugurated in 1789, there were, apart from the Native American religions, some 17 religious groups, 16 Christian denominations, and a set of Jewish synagogues. The country defined its borders as extending to the Mississippi River, and expansion of settlements into the land of the Native Americans to the west began immediately. In the early decades, the Anglicans, reorganized as the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. (now the Episcopal Church), tended to dominate the political scene, and most of the country's early presidents were drawn from its ranks. The Congregationalists, soon allied with Presbyterians who moved to the United States in large numbers following the Restoration of the monarchy in England in 1660, dominated in education and were responsible for the founding of many of the nation's most respected universities, including Harvard, Yale, and Princeton. As a result, the churches of the Reformed tradition also tended to produce the majority of the nation's leading theologians.

As the nation expanded westward, the Baptist Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Roman Catholic Church were the winners. The Baptists and Methodists, in numbers both minuscule at the time of the American Revolution, moved onto the frontier and experienced great success with evangelizing the largely irreligious settlers. They developed the use of revivals and camp meetings that would evolve and continue to be widely used into the 20th century. By the 1830s the Methodists had become the largest church in the nation. Through the 19th century, the Baptists would eclipse the Methodists, though they would divide into a number of separate denominations.

In the 1840s the Methodists divided into the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. That act left the Roman Catholics, who were able to remain undivided by the issues fast moving the country to civil war, the largest single church in America. It has remained so to the present. The church grew both by evangelizing the public and as a result of the steady stream of Roman Catholic immigrants. It also grew as Roman Catholic believers residing in the former French and Spanish colonies were added to the nation.

Through the 19th century, to some extent because of the continued immigration from Europe, the number of religious groups multiplied decade by decade. Without a controlling state church, religious debates were often resolved by one side departing to found a new church. Innovation led to new religions, and through the century the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the Spiritualist movement, the Theosophical Society, the Church of Christ, Scientist, and the New Thought movement would emerge and become established on the religious landscape. The Latter-day Saints would pioneer the settlement of the Rocky Mountain states, and they remain the majority body in Utah and the surrounding region. By the end of the 19th century, there were more than 300 Christian denominations.

One of the most important movements in American religion in the 19th century was launched by the predicted return of Christ in 1843–1844 by William Miller, a Baptist lay preacher. When his prophecy failed, the movement built around him splintered. New dates would be set and doctrinal divergences would emerge. Out of the pieces of a failed movement would come two of the most successful 20th-century religious groups, the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Jehovah's Witnesses. It would also produce the Worldwide Church of God, which, after a successful half-century, splintered when the main body dropped its unique doctrines and converted to an orthodox Christian position.

Jews had been present in the American colonies, the first synagogues having been built in New York and Rhode Island by immigrants from Brazil who had fled when the Portuguese recaptured Recife from the Dutch in the 1650s. By the time of the American Revolution, there was a modest string of synagogues from Savannah in the South to New England. The Jewish community expanded greatly in the early 19th century, especially through immigration from Germany. In America it would experience a division that also swept through much of the community worldwide. In the West, Jewish leaders would begin to advocate reform and call for the dropping of much of the ritual and legal tradition in favor of an approach that favored the essential ethical and spiritual core of the faith. In response, those who rejected the Reform platform would organize as Orthodox Jews. The arrival of several million Eastern European Jews in the country at the end of the century would not only greatly enlarge the Jewish community but also lead to the emergence of still another perspective, which would take form as Conservative Judaism, in the space between the Orthodox and Reform factions.

With the end of slavery, African Americans were free to develop their own religious institutions. The first African American churches had been formed soon after the American Revolution by Methodists in Philadelphia, New York, and several other northern cities. Two groups emerged as large national bodies in the late 19th century, the African Methodist Episcopal Church and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. After the Civil War, the scattered Baptist churches began to organize nationally, and by the end of the century they had formed the National Baptist Convention,

San Miguel Catholic Church, Santa Fe, New Mexico. Built about 1610, it is the oldest church structure in the United States. (J. Gordon Melton)

U.S.A. Out of that original organization two other national bodies, the National Baptist Convention of America and the Progressive National Baptist Convention, have been formed.

The introduction of so many divisions within the religious community ensured that not one religious organization would dominate; however, many Protestants saw themselves as the leading religious force in the country, and during the last half of the 19th century they joined Protestants worldwide in seeking means to overcome their disunity. Their efforts resulted in the formation of the Federal Council of Churches, which included among its membership most of the older and larger denominations. It also promoted the merger of its closely related member bodies, and major unions took place within the Lutheran, Presbyterian/Reformed, and Methodist family of denominations.

Although one group of churchmen looked to the development of a united Protestantism, another group became concerned about the changes in church life—especially the theological changes—that had occurred in the larger denominations as a result of the attempt by many church leaders to respond to the social and intellectual challenges of contemporary culture. Conservatives accused the Modernists of rejecting the fundamentals of the faith, including the authority of the Bible, the Trinity, the deity of Christ, and the doctrine of creation. That concern would be focused in the 1920s in the arguments over the biblical account of creation, which the fundamentalists insisted should be taken literally. The Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy split the Protestant community into three factions, which have remained to the present.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The largest group, which retained control of most of the larger denominations, was the Modernists, who saw the need to develop the tradition within the contemporary context. The evangelicals wished to engage culture, but without giving up on what they saw as the essentials of the faith. The Fundamentalist core not only wanted to remain true to the essentials of the faith but also to separate from all association with Modernists, and even from other conservatives who associated with Modernists. These three groups eventually organized their own ecumenical bodies: the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., the National Association of Evangelicals, and the American Council of Churches, the World Evangelical Alliance, and the International Council of Christian Churches.

The process of merging closely related churches that became noticeable during the decades of the Federal Council of Churches continued under the aegis of the National Council. During the late 20th century, a number of the largest churches presently existing in America were formed by new unions resulting in the formation of the United Church of Christ (1957), the Council of Churches (1968), the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) (1983), and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (1988). The largest Baptist churches, the Southern Baptist Convention and the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A., had drifted to opposite ends of the theological perspective and have not seriously considered merger.

As the Protestant community was reorganizing itself in new structures, and the Roman Catholic Church was feeling its way into becoming an American church, another change was occurring in American religion, the emergence of communities of the world's religions. In 1893, Chicago had hosted the Parliament of the World's Religions, out of which the first Hindu and Muslim organizations would be founded in America. Chinese Buddhist temples had first emerged on the West Coast during the Gold Rush that began in 1849, but Buddhist organizations, especially Japanese Zen and Shin groups, now began to proliferate. A steady growth would be halted in 1924, when a new federal act stopped immigration from Asia and most countries outside of Western Europe.

The laws preventing immigration from Asia and the Middle East were revised in 1965, and a sudden rush of immigration from India, Japan, Korea, and other parts of the world led to the sudden influx of Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims. Their numbers were additionally swelled by the arrival of teachers and missionaries who began to build new religious movements that would go on to become global religious organizations. Such groups as the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the Unification Movement, Soka Gakkai International, the Transcendental Meditation movement (World Plan Executive Council), and the Divine Light Mission (now Elan Vital) entered the country at this time. At the same time the African American community became particularly open to Islam, and they now constitute a significant portion of its American membership.

As the Asian religions were spreading, a number of new home-grown movements also began a growth phase, primarily among young adults in the larger urban complexes. These included the Children of God (a communal group now known as The Family International), the Church of Scientology, The Way International, and the Church Universal and Triumphant. These were either variations on Christianity or representatives of Western Esotericism. The sudden proliferation of new and unfamiliar groups led to a reaction by both the older, more conservative churches, which saw the United States as a Christian nation, and the parents of the youthful converts to many of the more high-demand religions. Their concerns fell on deaf ears until the suicide/murder deaths in 1978 of 900 members of the Peoples Temple. Although that group did not fit the profile of the new religious movements in most respects, the deaths led to the expansion of an anti-cult crusade built around the practice of deprogramming, which included the detention of members of new religions by their parents and by people hired to convince the young person to renounce the new faith. That practice ended only in 1995, after a young man who had been kidnapped and detained won a large judgment against the major organization promoting deprogramming, the Cult Awareness Network.

Among the groups that have taken their place in the religious leadership of the post–World War II religious scene have been the Eastern Orthodox churches. These emerged in the 19th century as non–English speaking groups, the largest being from Russia (the Orthodox Church in America) and Greece (the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese [under the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate]). Americanizing through the 20th century, they found common cause in the plight of their mother churches, especially those living under Communist or Islamic governments, and most recently have become significant voices in the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches. Like several groups whose patriarchs came under the control of a Marxist government, the Orthodox Church in America (formerly the Russian Orthodox Church) withdrew its administrative connection with the Moscow patriarchate.

As the wealthiest if not the largest Christian country in the world, the United States has contributed immeasurably to the spread of Protestantism, which carried it around the world in the 19th century. Beginning with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, most denominations large and small established mission boards and sent missionaries around the world. Out of their efforts have come thousands of new churches (many described elsewhere in this volume). In the 20th century, the missionary effort was bolstered by the Pentecostal movement, which not only grew into an important new segment of the American religious scene but also was among the most missionary-minded of movements. Within a decade of the seminal event in its origin, the revival at the mission in Los Angeles in 1906, it had founded missions on every continent and gone on to become a force in most countries of the world. Its largest representatives in the United States include the Church of God in Christ, the Assemblies of God, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), and the Church of God of Prophecy. A new wave of interest in Pentecostalism among members of the older Protestant bodies brought hundreds of thousands of new adherents into the movement, many of whom formed a host of new Charismatic denominations.

Through the first decade of the 21st century, more than 2,500 distinct religious communities had emerged in the United States. They represented the spectrum of the world's religions, though the majority were Christians. About half of the population belongs to the more than 1,000 Protestant churches. Slightly more than 20 percent are Roman Catholic, and the Roman Catholic Church is the single largest religious body in America. It is followed by the Southern Baptist Convention, the United Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), the Church of God in Christ, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, the Episcopal Church, and the United Church of Christ. There are some 25 additional groups, including the 3 large Jewish congregational associations, which report a million or more members, and some 75 groups, most Christian denominations, with at least 100,000 members. The rest are spread through the many other religions. There is a small but vocal atheist/humanist community, but less than 10 percent of the public count themselves as unbelievers or irreligious.

Hardest to define are the many groups that have grown out of the Western Esoteric tradition. Making up some 3 to 4 percent of the population, the Esoteric and metaphysical community consists of several hundred mostly small religious groups; only a very few (for example, the Church of Christ, Scientist, the Unity School of Christianity) have as many as 100,000 members.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Assemblies of God; Christian Brethren; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God in Christ; Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church Universal and Triumphant; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Episcopal Church; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Family International, The; International Council of Christian Churches; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; National Baptist Convention of America; National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.; Orthodox Church in America; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Progressive National Baptist Convention of America; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Theosophical Society (America); Unification Movement; United Church of Christ; Unity School of Christianity; Way International, The; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Albanese, Catherine. American Religion and Religions. 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2006.
- Albanese, Catherine. A Republic of Mind and Spirit: A Cultural History of American Metaphysical Religion. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008.
- Butler, Jon, Grant Wacker, and Randall Balmer. Religion in American Life: A Short History. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Carroll, Brett E. The Routledge Historical Atlas of Religion in America. New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Flynn, Tom, ed. The New Encyclopedia of Unbelief. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2007.
- Gill, Sam D. Native American Religions: An Introduction. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1982.
- Hall, Robert L. An Archeology of the Soul: American Indian Belief and Ritual. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.
- Hudson, Winthrop S. Religion in America. 6th ed. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1998.
- Marty, Martin E. Pilgrims in Their Own Land. Boston: Little, Brown, 1984.
- Melton, J. Gordon. American Religion: An Illustrated History. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.
- Melton, J. Gordon, with James A. Beverley. Melton's Encyclopedia of American Religion. Detroit: Gale/Cengage Learning, 2009.
- Murphy, Larry G., Jr., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. Encyclopedia of African American Religion. New York: Garland, 1993.
- Nimer, Mohamed. The North American Muslim Resource Guide. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Williams, Peter W. America's Religions: From Their Origins to the Twenty-first Century. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002.

Uniting Church in Australia

The Uniting Church in Australia was formed in 1977 by the merger of the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches. The new church became the third largest religious body in Australia, behind the Roman Catholic Church and the Anglican Church of Australia, a position it retains to the present.

Methodism began in Australia with the arrival of Samuel Leigh, a minister appointed by the Wesleyan Conference in Great Britain. His presence in Sydney was a symbol of the intention of the Conference to create a presence throughout the South Pacific. As other ministers arrived the work grew, and in 1855 the Australasian Conference was organized. In 1873 further growth (including the development of missions in several of the South Pacific islands) led to favorable reaction to a plan to divide the churches into several conferences, to be united by a general conference that would meet triennially. In 1974 the New South Wales and Queensland Conference, the Victoria and Tasmania Conference, the South and West Australia Conference, and the New Zealand Conference were established. Missions in Tonga, Fiji, and the other islands were attached to the New South Wales and Queensland Conference.

Through the 19th century, several smaller Methodist churches had been founded, but in 1902 they merged with the larger Wesleyan group to form the Methodist Church of Australasia. New Zealand was set apart as an independent church in 1913.

The first Presbyterian minister arrived in Australia in 1923, but by that time the first Presbyterian settlers, who had arrived in 1802, had built a church (1809) in Ebenezer. John Dunsmore Lang settled in Sydney and organized the Scots Church. As the work grew, in 1840 the Synod of Australia in Connection with the Established Church of Scotland was created. Almost immediately this church found itself playing out the same debates that split the Church of Scotland, and in 1846 a group separated to form the Free Presbyterian Church of Victoria. In addition, at about this same time, other Presbyterians from Great Britain began to establish work in Australia.

Through the last half of the 19th century, a desire to unite all of the Presbyterians manifested in a series of mergers at the state level. Finally a national assembly met in 1901 to form the Presbyterian Church of Australia.

Uniting church in Brisbane, Australia. (Dannywaters/Dreamstime.com)

The Congregationalist Church of Australia grew out of the London Missionary Society (LMS), which had selected the South Pacific as its first area for concentrated missionary activity. W. T. Cook, an LMS missionary, settled in Sydney in 1809. Additional churches would be founded by other missionaries across the subcontinent, with particular strength in Melbourne and Sydney.

Initial negotiations looking toward a merger of the three churches occurred in the second decade of the 20th century. At the time it was finally consummated in 1977, the Methodists represented about 60 percent of the merged body, the Presbyterians another 30 percent, and the Congregationalists around 10 percent.

One-third of the members of the Presbyterian Church declined to enter the merger, and they continue today as the Presbyterian Church of Australia. Dissenting elements in the Congregationalist Church formed the Congregationalist Federation of Australia.

Congregations of the Uniting Church in Australia are organized into seven synods, all in Australia proper, all of the former missions in the islands having matured into independent churches in their own right. The National Assembly is the highest legislative body for the church. In the late 1990s, the church reported 1,380,000 members.

The church is ecumenically active and holds membership in the World Methodist Council, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Council of Churches.

Uniting Church in Australia
 222 Pitt St.
 PO Box A2266
 Sydney South, NSW 1235
 Australia
<http://www.uca.org.au/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of Australia; London Missionary Society; Presbyterian Church of Australia; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Bentley, Peter, and Philip J. Hughes. A Yearbook of Australian Religious Organizations. Kew, Australia: Christian Research Association, 1997.
- Humphreys, Robert, and Rowland Ward. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantima, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa

The Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa was formed in 2000 by the merger of the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa. The Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa traces its beginnings to a Calvinist Society formed among Scottish soldiers in South Africa in 1806. The work progressed, but units split off to affiliate with the Congregationalists. However, in 1924, a specifically Presbyterian effort went forward, connected with the United Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the Church of Scotland), with newly arrived settlers from Scotland as the heart of the congregation. An initial church building, St. Andrew's Church in Cape Town, opened its doors in 1828, and subsequently congregations were opened in British settlements across the land. The church spread to Zimbabwe in 1896 and shortly thereafter to Zambia.

The various congregations were organized as the Presbyterian Church in 1897. By the end of the 20th century, approximately two-thirds of its 90,000 members were white. The remainder were Native Africans, and a few were of Indian extraction.

The Reformed Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa, formerly the Bantu Presbyterian Church, was the product of missionary activity among Native Africans by different Scottish churches. It became an independent body in 1923. Its primary strength was in Natal and the region around the Cape of Good Hope. It brought some 50,000 members into the new Uniting Church.

The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. The Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa had opened the ordained ministry to women in the 1970s. In 2001 the Uniting Church elected the Reverend Diane Vorsteras as moderator of its General Assembly, the first time a woman has headed a major South African Christian denomination.

Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa
Joseph Wing Centre
150 Caroline St.
PO Box 96188
Brixton
Johannesburg 2019
<http://www.presbyterian.org.za>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa

One of two large churches claiming the Dutch Reformed heritage within South Africa, the Uniting Church is the result of the spread of the Reformed Church within the nonwhite population of South Africa. As early as 1859 a mission began in Burgersdorp and Middleburg in the northeast corner of the Cape. Then five years later, Henru Gonin began a mission among the Kgatla people residing near Saulspoot. That same year, another missionary began work in Zoutpansberg at Kranspoort in the Transvaal. In the 1870s work spread to the Orange Free State.

As the work spread, synods were established successively in the Orange Free states (1910), Transvaal (1932), the Cape (1951), and Natal (1952). The General Synod of what was known as the Dutch Reformed Church (South Africa) was organized in 1963. The church had developed primarily among the Sozho and Nguni peoples.

In the meantime, in 1881, the Dutch Reformed Church formalized its basic segregationist stance by setting apart its nonwhite congregations into the Dutch Reformed Mission Church in South Africa. It began with four ministers, two elders, and a seminary donated by the parent body. This church grew into a large body that would become a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC). In 1982, as racial turmoil in South Africa was growing, the WARC passed a declaration condemning apartheid and labeling the theological defense of the practice a heresy. As a result of this statement, the Dutch Reformed Mission Church wrote, and in 1986 adopted, a new confession of faith, the Belhar Confession, which was placed beside the traditional Reformed statements as a standard document (much as the Barmen Confession directed at the Nazi situation was adopted by the Confessing Church in Germany).

The adoption of the Belhar statement led to the development of a plan to reunite all of the Reformed churches in South Africa. This process culminated in the 1994 union of the Dutch Reformed Mission Church and the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa as the Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa. The new church has reported 1,200,000 members.

The Uniting Church is headed by its general synod. A multiethnic church, there are 11 official languages spoken within it. It is a member of both the WARC and the World Council of Churches.

Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa
Private Bag 1
Belhar 7507
South Africa
<http://www.vgksa.org.za/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dutch Reformed Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Unity School of Christianity/ Association of Unity Churches

Unity began in Kansas City, Missouri, in 1889, when its co-founders, Myrtle (1845–1931) and Charles (1854–1948) Fillmore, dedicated their lives to the study and teaching of what they referred to as “practical Christianity.” The catalyst to its founding was Myrtle Fillmore, whose recovery (from tuberculosis) was precipitated by a lecture on mental healing in 1886. Its earliest expressions were a periodical, Modern Thought, later renamed Unity, and a prayer ministry, the Society for Silent Help, later renamed Silent Unity. Silent Unity, with a little over 2 million contacts annually (ca. 2000), continues to be a primary focus of the Unity School, and its round-the-clock prayer ministry is well known throughout the entire New Thought movement.

Originally established as a ministry of healing and publication, by the early 20th century Unity had assumed a sectarian character. Institutionalization began in 1903 with the incorporation of the Unity Society of Practical Christianity, which evolved into the Unity School of Christianity, the movement’s best known organization. Over the latter half of the 20th century, Unity progressively reduced its once extensive periodical outreach, with the pocket-size daily devotional magazine, The Daily Word (1.3 million subscribers), its most representative periodical today. In the 1990s it discontinued publication of Wee Wisdom (begun in 1893), which had been the longest continually published children’s magazine in the world. Unity magazine, which was recently changed from a monthly to a bimonthly cycle, has 23,000 subscribers. Unity School appears to remain strongly committed to book publishing, with the works of Charles and Myrtle Fillmore and numerous other authors continuing to be printed and distributed.

Unity School is located at Unity Village, Missouri, just outside Kansas City. The village is an impressive complex made up of many large buildings constructed in a generic Mediterranean style, an expansive array of fountains spanned by a “bridge of faith,” ornate landscaping, and walking paths, all dominated by a massive tower, 150 feet in height. The complex is the spiritual center of the Unity movement and serves primarily as a religious education and retreat center. It houses all Unity School operations, including Silent Unity, and functions as a shrine and pilgrimage destination for the more devout of Unity followers. The school is directed by a self-perpetuating board of directors. Its current president and CEO, Charlotte Shelton, is the second leader in the 117-year history of Unity to not be a part of the founding Fillmore family. The last member of the Fillmore family to lead Unity was Connie Fillmore Bazy, the founders’ great-granddaughter. Under the direction of Shelton, the current leadership is developing the Unity Institute with the goal of establishing an accredited center of higher learning.

Unity's second major branch is the Association of Unity Churches (AUC), founded in 1966. The Association is independent of Unity School and serves as the ecclesiastical arm of the movement. Under the leadership of a president and CEO (James Trapp), who is appointed by a board of trustees, AUC ordains and supervises ministers, sanctions churches, and coordinates expansion activities. Members of the board of trustees are elected by representatives from member churches at annual conferences. Membership statistics are not available, but increases in the number of ministries in recent years suggest steady growth. As of 2008 there were 969 active ministers and 1,047 licensed teachers serving in 939 ministries (of which 87 are Alternative ministries) and 48 affiliated study groups in 51 countries. Most notable is Unity's strong presence in Africa, especially Nigeria, where there are 63 affiliated groups.

Unity does not publish membership statistics, but increases in the number of churches indicates sustained growth over the past several decades. Total membership in Unity churches is most likely in the 100,000 range, although the number of participants is probably much higher.

Unity is the largest movement in the New Thought family and distinctive among New Thought groups in its Christian self-affirmation. It uses the Bible as a primary text, recognizing it as a "divine book of life" that "bears witness" to the word of God. Unity was once the trendsetter in the revitalization of allegorical Bible interpretation, but it has done little to advance this type of study since the 1960s. The allegorical method, called "metaphysical" interpretation in Christian Science and New Thought, approaches the text as a symbolic document, in which persons, places, and things represent elements in consciousness. Charles Fillmore's exhaustive lexicon, Metaphysical Bible Dictionary (1931), represents the fullest expression of this distinctive New Thought method of exegesis. In addition to the Bible, Unity's other primary religious text is H. Emilie Cady's Lessons in Truth, first published in 1894.

Like other early New Thought groups, Unity emerged in the context of Christian Science (as embodied in the Church of Christ, Scientist), through the work of the independent Christian Science teacher Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), a former protégé of Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910). The Fillmores were students of Hopkins, receiving their ordination from her in 1891, and the theology of the movement shows her influence. Unity is, thus, best considered a reaction against traditional Christian Science, rather than a further extension of Eddy's system. Mental healing (or "prayer treatment"), once a prominent feature of Unity, seems to be less of a focus in the movement today, with mainstream pastoral counseling and alternative healing methods having equal or greater popularity in many churches.

As part of the New Thought movement, Unity is an expression of popular religious idealism; as such it affirms that the basis of reality is mental (not material) and that mental states determine material conditions. Characteristic of New Thought as a whole, Unity recognizes that God is Mind. Unity is non-doctrinal, although several foundational teachings are notable: (1) the absolute goodness of God and the unreality of evil; (2) the innate divinity of humanity; (3) the omnipotently causative nature of consciousness; (4) freedom of individuals in matter of belief. Unity accepts Christian doctrine, idealistically interpreted, as normative. Unity's distinctive symbol is a winged globe.

Unity School

1901 NW Blue Parkway
Unity Village, MO 64065-0001
<http://www.unityworldhq.org>

Association of Unity Churches
401 SW Oldham Parkway, Ste. 210
Lee's Summit, MO 64081
<http://www.unity.org>

Dell deChant and Natalie Hobbs

See also: Church of Christ, Scientist.

References

- Albanese, Catherine L. A Republic of Mind and Spirit. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2007.
- Bach, Marcus. The Unity Way. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1982.
- Braden, Charles. Spirits in Rebellion: The Rise and Development of New Thought. Dallas, TX: SMU Press, 1963.

- Cady, H. Emilie. Lessons in Truth. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1975.
- deChant, Dell. "New Thought." In World Religions in America, edited by Jacob Neusner. 4th ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2009.
- Freeman, James Dillet. The Story of Unity. Unity Village, MO: Unity Books, 1978.
- Mosley, Glenn R. New Thought, Ancient Wisdom: The History and Future of the New Thought Movement. Philadelphia: Templeton Foundation, 2006.
- Vahle, Neal. The Spiritual Journey of Charles Fillmore: Discovering the Power Within. West Conchohochon, PA: Templeton Foundation Press, 2008.

Universal Church of the Kingdom of God

The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus [IURD]) is a large (possibly the largest) Brazilian Pentecostal body that became controversial and a target of the anti-cult movement in the 1990s and 2000s in several European countries.

In July 1977, Edir Macedo, a Brazilian governmental employee who had subsequently joined a number of Pentecostal denominations, felt called to devote his life to full-time evangelism. With the help of four friends, he bought a former funeral home in Abolição (in Greater Rio de Janeiro) and converted it into a chapel. In the first years, Macedo did not attract more than 100 followers, but success ultimately came through the medium of radio. He first bought 10 minutes' broadcasting time from both Rádio Metropolitana in Rio de Janeiro and Rádio Cacique in Sao Paulo, both popular commercial networks. The ensuing success enabled him to establish his own radio channels, followed by daily newspapers and TV networks. In 1990 he was able to purchase the popular TV Record network, thus becoming the owner of a media empire extending from Brazil to Africa and Europe. Paralleling the media growth, Macedo's church, known as the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (IURD), drew more than 6 million members with 2,000 places of worship in 46 countries. Its largest constituency outside Brazil is in South Africa.

IURD roots are in Brazilian Pentecostalism in general, although several themes come from the Faith Movement and from popular Brazilian religiosity. It insists on demonization (against which it offers exorcisms), with demons being held responsible for most illnesses, unhappiness, and poverty. Macedo's theology has been called "post-Pentecostal" by Brazilian scholars, and it exhibits a strong degree of anti-Catholicism. In October 1995, Sérgio Von Helder, the IURD bishop of Sao Paulo, kicked a statue of the Virgin Mary during a TV show, and caused a national outcry. Macedo made an official apology to the Roman Catholic Church, but the incident had already added fuel to the fire of the controversy. IURD's TV network, TV Record, is the main rival of the powerful Brazilian network TV Globo, which has emerged as Macedo's most vocal critic. Accused of tax evasion, Macedo spent several days in jail, although he subsequently won most of his court cases.

IURD's worship style is quite noisy, and the calls for money offerings, which are often repeated several times during the same service, have elicited further criticism. IURD neither builds nor uses chapels or churches. It normally purchases movie theaters (including the historic One Million Dollar Theater in Hollywood) and converts them into chapels. In Europe, especially, local residents have complained that movie theaters are being converted into centers for what has been called a "Brazilian cult." In Porto, Portugal, for instance, mass protest led to the cancellation of a deal between IURD and the owners of a large movie theater. In Paris, as part of the current French anti-cult crusade, it was the city's own mayor who led the protest. All this, however, has not stopped the phenomenal growth of Macedo's church. Some Brazilian scholars have also noticed a gradual "Protestantization" of the church, and a cautious dialogue has been started with other Pentecostals and evangelical Protestants.

<http://www.igrejauniversal.org.br/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Macedo, E. Aliança com Deus. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1993.
- Macedo, E. Apocalipse hoje. 3rd ed. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1990.

Followers and supporters of the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God raise their arms in prayer as they march down a Rio de Janeiro street, January 6, 1995, protesting the government’s investigation of fraud charges against the church. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Macedo, E. Vida com abundância. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Gráfica Universal, 1990.

Ruuth, Anders. Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus: Gudsrikets Universella Kyrka, en brasiliansk kyrkobilgning. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1995.

Universal Faithists of Kosmon

The Universal Faithists of Kosmon are dedicated to the teachings of Oahspe, an alternative Bible channeled by Dr. John Ballou Newbrough (1828–1891). Newbrough, a New York City dentist and Spiritualist medium, rose before dawn every morning for 50 weeks during 1881, and through the process of automatic writing he produced Oahspe. The book was published in 1882. Oahspe tells the history of humanity’s life on Earth from the viewpoint of “highly evolved intelligent beings,” and it adapts spiritual truths for the “New Kosmon Age.”

Oahspe (according to the book itself, a compound word from the ancient Panic language meaning Earth, O; sky, AH; and spirit, SPE) claims “to teach HOW TO ATTAIN TO HEAR THE CREATOR’S VOICE, and to see HIS HEAVENS, in full consciousness, whilst still living on the earth.” The creator, Jehovih, sent nine demigods to rule over periods of the Earth’s history. These periods provide the structure of Oahspe. The history of humanity and religion involve the attempts of 11 prophets—including Zarathustra the Persian, the first prophet to give written revelations; Chine of China; Eawahtah of North America; and Joshu (Jesus)—to teach truth to humanity. Oahspe teaches that we are now in the Kosmon Era, in which Jehovih's kingdom will be established on Earth, bringing peace and prosperity to all.

Among the first events associated with Oahspe was the founding of a commune in New Mexico to care for orphans, the Shalam Colony. Newbrough had met a wealthy Quaker named Andrew Howland. Howland eventually purchased nearly 1,500 acres of land in the Mesilla Valley, and there the Shalam Colony began. Howland poured money into the colony, and for a short time it apparently flourished. However, a combination of drought, financial difficulties, the death of Newbrough in 1891, and floods proved to be too much, and Howland left the colony in 1901. He finally sold the property in 1907. Despite these difficulties, small groups of people known as Faithists persisted in their devotion to Oahspe, and the book has managed to stay in print ever since.

A notable development on the international front is the work of Faithists in Britain to keep in print a book of ritual and liturgy, The Kosmon Church Service Book, for followers of Oahspe. The book details liturgies for weddings, baptisms, and funerals, in addition to the forms for regular worship. The British Faithists also offer ministerial training. Other groups of Faithists are found in Canada, Holland, Australia, New Zealand, Nigeria, and Ghana, in addition to the United States and Britain.

Networks of the faithful seem to be mostly informal, and the Internet and email have emerged as the primary means of communication among Oahspe enthusiasts. The total number of adherents among the various groups is not known. The Universal Faithist of Kosmon website has disappeared and contact is primarily through several Yahoo groups: <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/faithist> society and <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/ufkchurch>. Surveying the few remaining Oahspe sites on the Internet as of 2009 indicates that as many as a dozen may be active. Besides the several versions of Oahspe that are currently in print, several Internet sites have the full text of Oahspe available for downloading.

Universal Faithists of Kosmon
c/o C. Vostek, Secretary

3439 Grand Valley Canal Rd.
Clifton, CO 81520
<http://OahspeResources.mccooknet.com>
<http://www.angelfire.com/in2/oahspe3/oindex.html>
(text of Oahspe)

Jeremy Rapport

References

- Horst, Laura. A Condensed Version of Oahspe. Amherst, WI: Palmer, 1977.
- Oahspe: A New Bible*. Los Angeles: Kosmon, 1942.
- Simundson, Daniel Nathan. "John Ballou Newbrough and the Oahspe Bible." Ph.D. diss., University of New Mexico, 1972.
- Wentworth, Jim. Giants in the Earth: The Amazing Story of Ray Palmer, Oahspe and the Shaver Mystery. Amherst, WI: Palmer Publications, 1973.

Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches

The Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches is the only intercontinental religious community especially designed to serve the gay/lesbian/bisexual/transgender (GLBT) community that emerged in the last decades of the 20th century. The fellowship began out of the experiences of Troy Perry, a former pastor in the Church of God of Prophecy, a prominent Pentecostal denomination. Perry discovered his homosexuality as a young man, but he repressed it and became a husband and father and a Pentecostal minister in Southern California. However, in the mid-1960s, his homosexuality became public; he was forced to resign his ministry, and his marriage ended in divorce.

Having accepted his homosexuality, Perry was still a Christian with a call to the ministry. In 1968, with the support of a few friends, he placed an advertisement in The Advocate, then the most popular periodical within the lesbian and gay community in Los Angeles, inviting people to worship with him in his living room, which served as the first Metropolitan Community Church. From this point on, the church experienced what to many was surprising growth, as laypeople who no longer felt at home in the church of their childhood adhered to the new congregation. The church then spread to other cities, as clergy whose homosexuality had become public left their denominations and aligned with the Metropolitan Community Church. Perry began the church as a Pentecostal congregation, but as other ministers with different backgrounds joined him, the fellowship took on a more ecumenical stance. As the church gained the trust and support of the gay community, it gained a new level of visibility, especially after the publication of Perry's autobiography in 1987.

Members of the Metropolitan Community Church of Los Angeles wave to the crowd while carrying a large rainbow flag as they make their way down Santa Monica Blvd., June 22, 1997, in West Hollywood, California. Thousands of people lined the parade route to celebrate the closing day of the Christopher Street West Los Angeles Gay and Lesbian Pride Festival. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Although the fellowship generally acknowledges the central affirmations of Christianity, the keystone of its theology is God's love and acceptance of all people, especially those who have a minority self-identification as gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender. Almost from the beginning, the church has blessed the union of gay and lesbian couples who are living in a long-term committed relationship, analogous to traditional marriage. Just as mainline Protestants have reinterpreted as cultural accretions the biblical statements seeming to approve slavery and the subjection of women, so the Metropolitan Community churches treat the biblical anti-homosexual passages as expressions of human, not divine, judgment.

The emergence of the Metropolitan Church has followed the rise of a visible gay community in most urban centers in the West. The history of the developing GLBT community has been marked by resistance, and the church's congregational buildings have on several occasions been targets of antigay forces, who burned them. The church was also hit by the AIDS epidemic, and in 1985 it launched a special ministry to people with AIDS. A major component of this ministry has involved alerting other churches to the seriousness of the problem.

Through the 1990s the church became a global fellowship, currently organized into 7 regions, and the more than 300 congregations are now found in 24 countries around the world. After many years of leading the church, Troy Perry formally retired as moderator in 2005. Reverend Nancy Wilson was elected as the new (and current) moderator. Soon afterward, the church moved its headquarters from Los Angeles to Texas.

The issue of acceptance has been a constant part of the church's existence. It applied for membership in the National Council of Churches in the U.S.A. (1992), but was refused both membership and observer status, though it has been admitted to several councils of churches at the state level. It was granted observer status by the World Council of Churches in 1991. More recently (2002), it was authorized to provide chaplains for the various facilities of the U.S. Veterans Administration. Members have yet to be considered for slots among the chaplains of the armed services.

Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches
PO Box 1374
Abilene, TX 79604
<http://www.ufmcc.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of God of Prophecy; Homosexuality.

References

- Eastman, Donald. Not a Sin, Not a Sickness: What the Bible Does and Does Not Say. Los Angeles: UFMCC, 1990.
- Perry, Troy. Don't Be Afraid Anymore. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Perry, Troy, with Thomas L. P. Swicegood. The Lord Is My Shepherd and He Knows I'm Gay. New York: Bantam Books, 1978.
- Perry, Troy, and Thomas L. P. Swicegood, eds. Profiles in Gay and Lesbian Courage. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Troy Perry: Pastor and Prophet*. Los Angeles: Metropolitan Community Churches, 2005.
- Wilcox, Melissa M. "Of Markets and Missions: The Early History of the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches." Religion and American Culture 11 (Winter 2001): 83–108.
- Wilson, Nancy L. Our Story Too: Lesbians and Gay Men in the Bible. Los Angeles: UFMCC, 1992.

Universal Great Brotherhood

The Universal Great Brotherhood (UGB) was founded in Venezuela in 1948 by Serge Raynaud de la Ferriere (1916–1962) and his student, Jose Manuel Estrada (1900–1982). De la Ferriere developed an interest in Esotericism as a young man. Among his early experiences, he traveled to Egypt, where he underwent a mystical initiation as the "Sublime Crowned Cophto and Great Priest Khediviari." He also was active in the Theosophical Society in both England and France. At one point he had an encounter with a being known as Master Sun Wu King, who gave him his mission to present the initiatic principles to the public. He founded the Universal Great Brotherhood as World War II was drawing to a close and spent the postwar years traveling and establishing UGB centers.

At one point his travels took him to Venezuela, where he met Estrada, who had for almost a decade been proclaiming the imminent coming of an avatar (an incarnation of God) and who had gathered a group to await his arrival. Estrada identified de la Ferriere as that avatar and became his disciple. In 1948 the pair reopened the Great Universal Brotherhood as a new public organization. Two years later de la Ferriere retired to spend the rest of his life engaged in Esoteric work. Estrada became the director general and began to build the organization internationally.

The Brotherhood is an initiatic association designed to assist the transition of society into a new age (the Aquarian Age). This new age will be born in the Western Hemisphere. To facilitate the coming new age, the Brotherhood carries on a two-part program. It offers various programs for the general public of preinitiates. It sponsors healthcare services; advocates vegetarianism; and teaches yoga, astrology, martial arts, and meditation. It invites people to a program of mystical initiation, in which initiates become parts of ashrams that are seen as centers of physical and spiritual mastery and people learn to live in harmony with natural law. Members form a nucleus of those who work for harmony and world peace, and the ashrams become training grounds for the commissioning of missionaries who will go out in the world to spread the word of the coming new age.

The Brotherhood has spread to most of the Spanish-speaking countries of South and Central America and beyond to the United States, Canada, Japan, Australia, Europe, and Israel. The UGB has been named as an associated nongovernmental organization by the United Nations. In 1962, leadership of the Brotherhood passed to Jose Manuel Estrada, and following his death in 1982 the order has evolved into a more decentralized network of students of Serge Raynaud and Estrada who now function as gurus (teachers) including Guru Pedro Enciso, Guru Juan Victor Mejias, Guru Carlos Elias Michan, and Guru Domingo Dias Porta.

Universal Great Brotherhood

Box Postcard 3987

Caracas 1010-A

Venezuela

<http://www.maestre.org/english.htm>

<http://www.aquarius-studiesenter.no/e/ugbnorway.html> (Norwegian center, in English)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Astrology; Meditation; Theosophical Society (America); Vegetarianism; Yoga.

References

Biography, the Sublime Master, Sat Guru Dr. Serge Raynaud de la Ferriere. St. Louis, MO: Educational Publications of the I.E.S., 1976.

Montero-Campion, Anita. My Guru from South America: Sat Arhat Dr. Jose Manuel Estrada. St. Louis, MO: privately printed, 1976.

Universal Life

Universal Life (Universelles Leben) is a German new religious movement that claims to re-enact the original Christianity of the Apostles in the modern world, on the basis of the Ten Commandments and Jesus' Sermon on the Mount. Members are persuaded that the Holy Spirit is speaking again, through a new prophet, Gabriele Wittek, who was born in 1933 near Augsburg, Germany, and raised as a traditional Roman Catholic. In 1970 her mother's death precipitated in her a spiritual crisis of some impact. Later, we are told, Wittek's deceased mother started to appear to her daughter, until on January 6, 1975, Gabriele began to hear the "internal word." Within this "word" she received instructions from "Brother Emmanuel" and Christ himself. They asked her to spread their teachings (increasingly at odds with Wittek's early Catholicism), at first to small groups and then in large meetings in Europe's main cities, the first being held in Nürnberg on January 22, 1977. In 1976 her followers founded the Heimholungswerk Jesu Christi (Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ), which in 1984 was renamed Universal Life.

Wittek teaches what she calls an "internal way," rooted in the idea of the soul's pre-existence in the spiritual world. Based on karma, the soul should experience several incarnations, until it becomes purified and able to escape the wheel of reincarnation. In Wittek's universalist theology, mainline Christian notions of eternal punishment and hell are also rejected. Because of their pride, the original souls fell outside the divine realm, thus generating the material world. In order to remind the souls of their divine origin, the Son of God incarnated as Jesus of Nazareth, and will soon become incarnate again. According to Wittek, all these teachings were originally included in the Bible, but they have been corrupted by the churches throughout the centuries, thus making it necessary for the Holy Spirit to speak again in our time through Universal Life.

Some 700 members of Universal Life live communally near Würzburg, Germany, in a large community complex including a school, two hospitals, retirement homes, as well as manufacturing and agricultural facilities. This community is regarded as the first seed of Christ's future kingdom of peace on Earth. Several thousand members, however, do not live in the Würzburg community but regularly visit some 80 centers throughout Germany, other parts of Europe, and the world. Universal Life also owns several radio networks worldwide.

Universelles Leben

Postfach 5643

97066 Würzburg

Germany

<http://www.universelles-leben.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Reincarnation.

References

Healing by Faith—The Holistic Healing. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2000.

This Is My Word, Alpha and Omega: The Gospel of Jesus—A Christ-Revelation which the World Does Not Know. 2nd English ed. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2001.

The Word. Guilford, CT: The Word, 2001.

Universal Soul

Universal Soul is an Italian new religious movement headquartered in Leinì, near Turin, Piedmont. Its founder was Roberto Casarin, born in Turin on April 9, 1963. As a young man, Casarin was a pious Roman Catholic who became well known for his mystical visions and for his gift of healing. Thousands of Catholics congregated in Turin to hear Casarin pray the Rosary, in the hope of being healed by the young visionary. The local Catholic hierarchy, on the other hand, was quite hostile to his success, culminating in the declaration by Anastasio Alberto Cardinal Ballistrero (1913–1998), archbishop of Turin, on June 15, 1982, that Casarin’s meetings would henceforth be banned. They continued, nonetheless, and on February 26, 1984, an independent organization was founded known as Associazione Cristo nell’Uomo—Centro di Elevazione Spirituale (Christ in Man Association—Center for Spiritual Elevation).

Casarin’s teachings evolved toward the idea of a “God for all people,” with a critical view of organized religion as a divisive and controversial factor. From 1985 on it became evident that Casarin’s was an independent religious movement, with no remaining links with the Roman Catholic Church. Some of the most active members of Casarin’s association later created Comunità Impegno (Community Engagement), which in turn led to the establishment of the Church of the New Jerusalem in 1989. The final separation of the movement from the Catholic Church was confirmed by a declaration published on March 21, 1990, by Ballistrero’s successor as archbishop of Turin, Giovanni Cardinal Saldarini. Catholic critics, as well as a former priest of the Church of the New Jerusalem turned vocal opponent, provoked a media campaign against Casarin, centering inter alia on his teachings on sexual ethics, including his tolerance of homosexuality. In fact, these themes play no particularly important role in Casarin’s preaching and writings. In 1996, in order to prevent confusion with other movements with similar names, the Church of the New Jerusalem changed its name to Anima Universale—Movimento di Unione Spirituale (Universal Soul—Movement for Spiritual Union), a name also regarded as conveying the essence of the movement’s teachings.

As the new century began, Casarin developed a quite eclectic approach. He asserts that humans have forgotten their divine origin and are living under the veil of material illusion. Universal Soul’s rituals remind humans of their true divine nature, thereby developing their love toward God and to all their fellow human beings, as well as developing their spiritual awareness. Rituals include baptisms, weddings, funerals, collective meditations and prayers, “rituals of the elements,” and “celebrations of mantras.” The rituals are led by the priests and priestesses of the Universal Soul, known as Ramias, all of whom are full-time members living communally in the Universal Soul Centers. A particular feature of the Universal Soul is its ability to raise substantial funds for charitable activities, which are then given to humanitarian groups and Third World charities (mostly Roman Catholic, in Africa and India) that are not associated with Casarin’s movement. This massive humanitarian effort has received some grudging acknowledgment even by some of the movement’s critics. From the original centers, all located in the Italian region of Piedmont, the movement spread to the Venetian area and to the Province of Ancona in central Italy. The construction of a temple in Poggiana di Riese Pio X (in the Italian province of Treviso, Venetian region) generated, in 1999 and 2000, new controversies. The local Catholic Church and some local politicians opposed the construction, calling the movement a “cult.” The conflict between the Universal Soul and the Roman Catholic Church appears, at times, paradoxical. Without always acknowledging it, in fact, Casarin and his Roman Catholic critics seem to agree on the one essential issue—that Universal Soul is a new religious experience and not part of Roman Catholicism.

Universal Soul
Via Enrico Mattei 60
10060 Leinì (Torino)

Italy

<http://www.animauniversale.it>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Casarin, Roberto. Ascoltando il Maestro. Insegnamenti di Swami Roberto. 2 vols. Leinì (Turin): Anima Universale, 2003 and 2007.
- Casarin, Roberto. In questa parte di Eternità Dio si fa tempo per me. Preghiamo insieme. Turin: CAST, 1997.
- Casarin, Roberto. La Missione dell'Uno. Unione Energetica d'Amore. Turin: CAST, 1999.
- Conti, Paolo. Un personaggio scomodo. Roberto Casarin. Intervista ad un Maestro della Nuova Era. Volpago (Treviso): Tipografia Volpaghese, 1994.
- Roldán, Verónica. La Chiesa Anima Universale di Roberto Casarin. Leumann (Turin): ElleDiCi, 2000.
- Zoccatelli, Pier Luigi. "Symbols in the Church of Universal Soul." Paper presented at the 14th International Conference of the Center for Studies on New Religions (CESNUR), Riga (Latvia), August 29–31, 2000. <http://www.cesnur.org/conferences/riga2000/plz.htm>. Accessed March 1, 2009.

URANTIA Foundation, The

The URANTIA Foundation exists to promote The URANTIA Book, a work believed to have been received from an advanced group of beings known as the Orvonton Commission in order to clear up confusion about the nature of God, divinity, and deity on Urantia, the beings' name for Earth. The book claims to tell an "alternate" history of Christianity, the Earth, and the universe. The URANTIA Book is divided into four major parts: Part I, "The Central and Superuniverses," describes the nature of the ultimate God and the organization of the universe. Part II, "The Local Universe," describes the immediate vicinity of our planet, Urantia. The history of Urantia, the Earth, is the subject of Part III, and Part IV retells the story of Jesus. Jesus' real name is Michael. He was born on August 21 in the year 7 BCE, was well educated, and became a skilled carpenter. He conducted a ministry around the Mediterranean for three years beginning in 27 CE and was then crucified and resurrected. According to the Foundation's website, the book's message is that "all human beings are one family, the sons and daughters of one God, the Universal Father." The URANTIA Book also reveals "new concepts of Man's ever-ascending adventure of finding the Universal Father in our friendly and carefully administered universe."

According to the Foundation's own account, the origins of The URANTIA Book lie in the early 20th century, when a Chicago physician, William S. Sadler (1875–1969), announced that he was the head of the Contact Commission. The Contact Commission transcribed the contents of the book and then presented them to the Forum, a group meeting at Sadler's house that critiqued the papers and presented questions to be answered. The final text of The URANTIA Book incorporates the answers to the questions of the Forum. The group that made up the Forum became the core of believers committed to bringing The URANTIA Book to all humans. The URANTIA Foundation, a nonprofit, educational foundation operating under a Declaration of Trust, was established in 1950 to be the custodian of the book and to help spread its teachings. The first printing of The Urantia Book appeared in 1955.

Fully staffed offices affiliated with the Foundation can be found in Canada, Australia, Finland, Chile, France, England, and Russia. Smaller offices may be found in 18 other countries, including Argentina, Brazil, Belgium, Colombia, Ecuador, Greece, Korea, Mexico, Senegal, and Venezuela. According to The URANTIA Book, "The religious challenge of this age is to those farseeing and forward-looking men and women of spiritual insight who will dare to construct a new and appealing philosophy of living out of the enlarged and exquisitely integrated modern concepts of cosmic truth, universal beauty, and divine goodness." The various Foundation offices help to foster this goal in many ways, including facilitating local study groups. The study groups are the primary means of disseminating the teachings of The URANTIA Book.

In addition to the 400,000 paperback copies of the book in circulation, the URANTIA Foundation has made extensive use of the Internet. The Foundation's website is large and very well organized. The URANTIA Book is available online through the Foundation's website. The Foundation operates an Internet correspondence school, and it is putting a great deal of work into further translations of The URANTIA Book. Currently (2009) French, Finnish, Spanish, Russian, Dutch, Korean, Lithuanian, Portuguese, and German versions of the book exist, with further translations into Arabic, Bulgarian, Chinese, Croatian, Estonian, Farsi, Indonesian, Italian, Lithuanian, Polish, Romanian, and Swedish in the process of completion.

An important milestone in the Foundation's work was reached in 2006, when the international copyright to the original English text of The URANTIA Book (published in 1955), though not the copyrights of the book in languages other than English, expired. Following that event, the Trustees of the Urantia Foundation have moved to delete the 1955 copyright notice from the English text of The URANTIA Book on the Foundation's website, and it will not appear on future published editions.

The URANTIA Foundation
533 Diversey Parkway
Chicago, IL 60614
<http://www.urantia.org>

Jeremy Rapport

References

- Gardner, Martin. Urantia: The Great Cult Mystery. New York: Prometheus Books, 1995.
- Moyer, Ernest P. The Birth of a Divine Revelation: The Origin of the URANTIA Papers. Hanover, PA: Moyer Publishing, 2000. <http://www.world-destiny.org/birth/cvrF.pdf>. Accessed April 24, 2009.
- Sadler, William S. "A History of the URANTIA Movement." <http://www.urantia.org/pub/ahotum.html>. Accessed April 24, 2009.
- The URANTIA Book*. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1955.
- The URANTIA Book Concordance*. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1993.

Ursulines

The Ursulines, officially the Order of Saint Ursula, one of the more important orders that assisted the spread of the Roman Catholic Church in the modern world, was founded at Brescia, Italy, in 1535, by Angela Merici (1474–1540), with an initial purpose of providing education for young girls. Saint Ursula, considered the patroness of education, was chosen as the protecting saint. Angela began with 28 associates as an informal company, and the members continued to live at home. A primitive rule was accepted by the pope in 1544. Then in the 1580s, Charles Borromeo, the bishop of Milan, requested a change in the rule: that the members of the company begin to live in a community and accept a vow of poverty. That rule change was accepted in 1585.

The new rule was first adopted by the sisters in France, where the group experienced its greatest response. In 1612 the community in Paris was recognized as being in a monastic state. By the end of the century, there were 350 Ursuline monastic communities in France with 9,000 residents. They remained strong in France even with the disturbances of the French Revolution.

The Order began to expand internationally from its bases in Paris and Bordeaux. In 1639, Marie of the Incarnation and two other sisters became the first Ursulines in the Western Hemisphere when they landed in Quebec and opened a convent and school for girls. A second beginning was made in New Orleans in 1727, from which the Order spread to Cuba and Texas. From this beginning convent schools were opened at various locations in the United States and around the world in Indonesia, Brazil, India, the Belgian Congo, and Australia. In the meantime, the Order had found its way across Europe, where they pioneered female education in many areas.

Angela Merici was canonized in 1807. Her feast day was added to the church's calendar of saints in 1861. The usual date would have been her death day, January 27. That day was, however, already designated as the feast day of Saint John Chrysostom. Saint Angela was assigned May 31. Then in 1955, Pope Pius XI (r. 1939–1958) designated May 31 as the new feast day for the Blessed Virgin Mary, Queen. Saint Angela's day was moved to June 1. Finally in 1969, it was moved to her death date, January 27, by Pope Paul VI (r. 1963–1978).

Sister Teresita Rivet, of the Order of St. Ursula, helps Lauren Songy, five, with her French counting lesson in New Orleans, 2006. (AP/WideWorld Photos)

The loosely organized Ursulines underwent a significant reorganization in 1900, when Pope Leo XIII (r. 1879–1903) unified the work under a new corporation headed by a superior general. The new corporate title was the Roman Union of the Order of Saint Ursula. The motherhouse was established in Rome. The Order was divided into national provinces. The prioress general and the other international officers are elected at the meeting of the general chapter, held in Rome every six years.

There are more than 200 houses (convents) in more than 25 countries. The more than 7,000 sisters oversee not only primary and secondary schools for girls but also several colleges for women.

There are also a variety of smaller groups that are known as Ursulines, which either did not participate in the formation of the Roman Union or have been organized apart from it. Among these are the Ursuline Union of Eastern Canada, which originated with Sister Marie of the Incarnation and the original Ursuline convent in North America. They are organized in a fashion similar to that of the Roman Union, but did not affiliate with it. Their superior general resides in Quebec. The Ursulines of Belgium began in 1831 at Tildonk and spread across the country in the middle of the 19th century. During the last half of the century, the groups spread to England, the Netherlands, South Africa, and Indonesia. An American house opened in New York in 1924. Headquarters are now at Haecht, Belgium. Work in South Africa and Indonesia has been replaced with centers more recently established in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and India.

Order of St. Ursula
Via Nomentana 236
I-00162 Roma
Italy

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Aron, Marguerite. Les Ursulines. Paris: Grasset, Les grands ordres monastiques et instituts religieux, 1937.
- Caraman, Philip. St. Angela: The Life of Angela Merici, Foundress of the Ursulines. London: Longman, 1963.
- Clark, Emily. Masterless Mistresses: The New Orleans Ursulines and the Development of a New World Society, 1727–1834. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Kane, Harnett T. The Ursulines, Nuns of Adventure: The Story of the New Orleans Community. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1959.
- Mazzonis, Querciolo. Spirituality, Gender, and the Self in Renaissance Italy: Angela Merici and the Company of St. Ursula (1474–1540). Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2007.

■ Uruguay

The Oriental Republic of Uruguay is located on the Atlantic Coast of South America, at the mouth of the Río de la Plata, between Argentina and Brazil. This small country only has 68,039 square miles of land with a population of approximately 3.4 million (2008). The terrain of Uruguay is similar to that of the Argentina pampas, where raising livestock (cattle and sheep) is the principal activity. A continuing problem is that, in reality, there are two Uruguays, not one. One is the Montevideo metro area, with about one-third of the population and with most of the services and privileges of civilization. The other Uruguay is the back country where life is rough and hard, and where the public services are meager and distant.

The inhabitants of Uruguay are predominantly white (about 88 percent) and largely of European origin, mostly Spanish and Italian, but some are descended from Portuguese, English, or other European nationalities. Mestizos (mixed white and Amerindian) represent about 8 percent of the population, and mulattoes and blacks about 4 percent. The indigenous Charrúa were virtually wiped out early in the Spanish colonial era.

Originally identified as a Roman Catholic country, the church and state have been separate since 1919, and the 1966 Constitution guarantees freedom of religion to all inhabitants. The number of Catholic adherents in Uruguay has declined noticeably since 1900. Today, Uruguay is considered the second most secularized nation in Latin America, after the Socialist Republic of Cuba.

According to the 2006 National Housing Survey conducted by the Uruguayan National Institute of Statistics, only 47.1 percent of the population identified themselves as Roman Catholic, while 40.4 percent professed no religious faith whatsoever; the latter includes those who “believe in God but without religion” (23.2 percent) and those claiming to be atheist or agnostic (17.2 percent). Only 11.1 percent identified as “non-Catholic Christians” (includes Eastern Orthodox, Protestant, and others); 0.6 percent as followers of Umbanda or other Afro-Brazilian religions; 0.3 percent as Jewish; and 0.4 percent as adherents of “other religions.” However, it should be noted that most prac-

Uruguay

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,903,000	2,155,000	63.9	−0.08	2,138,000	2,117,000
Roman Catholics	2,115,000	2,300,000	68.2	−0.72	2,218,000	2,117,000
Marginals	24,600	120,000	3.6	1.66	150,000	180,000
Protestants	57,100	110,000	3.3	2.35	140,000	180,000
Agnostics	791,000	950,000	28.2	0.35	1,100,000	1,180,000
Atheists	57,000	213,000	6.3	0.05	250,000	280,000
Jews	52,000	41,000	1.2	0.05	41,000	41,000
Baha'is	3,400	7,500	0.2	0.04	10,000	11,500
Spiritists	1,500	4,700	0.1	0.04	5,500	6,300
New religionists	500	2,000	0.1	0.04	3,000	3,500
Muslims	300	530	0.0	0.04	800	1,000
Buddhists	0	70	0.0	0.00	100	150
Ethnoreligionists	0	40	0.0	0.00	60	100
Total population	2,808,000	3,374,000	100.0	0.05	3,548,000	3,641,000

tioners of Afro-Brazilian religions also self-identify as Roman Catholics due to the syncretistic nature of “popular Catholicism.”

According to Latinobarómetro (a public opinion polling organization based in Santiago, Chile), the evangelical proportion of the Uruguayan population increased from 6.8 percent in 1996 to 9.4 percent in 2006.

Archaeological evidence points to the habitation of the eastern shore of the Uruguay River, which marks the boundary between modern Argentina and Uruguay, for at least 10,000 years. Modern history, however, begins in 1527, when Capitan Sebastián Gaboto (or Caboto, ca. 1484–1557) and his Spanish crew sailed up the Uruguay River. At that time, three Amerindian groups—the Charrúa, the Chanaes, and the Guaraní—dominated the area. The Spanish arrived in the territory of present-day Uruguay in 1516, but the Amerindians’ fierce resistance to conquest, combined with the absence of gold and silver, limited settlement in the region during the 16th and 17th centuries.

The Spanish paid little attention to this region until, in 1603, the governor of Asunción (Paraguay) introduced cattle into what proved to be good pasture land. The addition of cattle and horses to the native habitat proved a major step in its transformation—cattle, in particular, drove out other mammals and the conversion of the natural habitat to grazing land altered the local flora. The Spanish founded their first permanent Spanish settlement in Uruguayan territory in 1624 at Soriano on the Río Negro, while the Portuguese founded their first settlement at Colonia del Sacramento in 1680.

Increased Portuguese settlement on the lower coast of South America led the Spanish to assert their hegemony over the area. In 1724, Spanish authorities founded a military fortress at the entrance of the Río de la Plata, where the city of Montevideo now exists, and the territory of Uruguay was incorporated into the Viceroyalty of Peru. In 1776, the Spanish created the Viceroyalty of Río de la Plata, which included the territory now comprising Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Bolivia.

The decision to create a fourth viceroyalty was a result both of the Spanish Crown’s desire to decentralize the rule of his Spanish-American empire and of a recognition that the area south of Brazil required greater military defenses in view of Portuguese encroachments along the northern shore of the Río de la Plata. Spain also wanted to curtail contraband trade between Portuguese ports in Brazil and the Spanish port of Buenos Aires in Argentina.

In 1811, José Gervasio Artigas (1764–1850), who became Uruguay’s national hero, launched a successful revolt against Spain, defeating Spanish forces on May 18 in the Battle of Las Piedras. Addressing the 1813 Constitutional Convention, Artigas stated that he openly favored religious liberty for all. In 1814, Artigas formed the Federal League of which he was declared Protector. However, Uruguay did not win its final independence until 1828, following a three-way armed struggle between Spain, Argentina, and Brazil for control of its territory, called the Eastern Province. The nation's first Constitution was adopted on July 18, 1830. During the remainder of the 19th century, Uruguay experienced a series of elected and appointed presidents; interventions and conflicts with neighboring states; political and economic fluctuations; and large inflows of immigrants, mostly from Europe.

Uruguay's political landscape was divided between two parties, the Conservative Blancos (wore white armbands) and the Liberal Colorados (wore red armbands). The Colorados were led by José Fructuoso Rivera (1789–ca. 1854), the nation's first president (r. 1830–1834, and again 1839–1843), who represented the business interests of Montevideo; the Blancos were headed by Manuel Oribe (1792–1857, president between 1835 and 1838), who looked after the agricultural interests of the countryside and promoted protectionism. The Uruguayan parties became associated with warring political factions in neighboring Argentina. The Colorados favored the exiled Liberal Argentine Unitarios, many of whom had taken refuge in Montevideo, while Oribe was a close friend of the Conservative Argentine ruler, Juan Manuel de Rosas.

In 1838, President Oribe was forced to resign by former President Rivera, but Oribe organized a rebel army and began a civil war, called La Guerra Grande, in 1839 that lasted until 1852. After a nine-year siege of Montevideo, Oribe was defeated in 1852 with help from Brazil and Argentine rebels who opposed Oribe's principal supporter, Manuel de Rosas in Argentina. Rosas was a conservative politician who governed Argentina's Buenos Aires Province from 1829 to 1832, and again from 1835 to 1852. Rosas was one of the first famous caudillos (strongmen) in Latin America. During his rule, he united Argentina, provided an efficient government, and strengthened the economy.

The economy greatly improved after the La Guerra Grande, due to livestock raising and export. Between 1860 and 1868, the number of sheep in the country rose from 3 to 17 million, because of improved methods of husbandry introduced by European immigrants.

Montevideo became a major economic center for the Río de la Plata region. Thanks to its natural harbor, Montevideo became a major port for the trans-shipment of goods to and from Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay.

Economic development accelerated during the latter part of the 19th century as increasing numbers of immigrants established businesses and bought land in Uruguay. Partly through their efforts, sheep were introduced to graze together with cattle, ranches were fenced, and pedigreed bulls and rams were imported to improve the quality of livestock. Earnings from the export of wool (which became the leading export in 1884), hides, and dried beef encouraged the British to invest in railroad construction and in the modernization of Montevideo, notably in its public utilities and transportation system, which encouraged additional immigration.

The Liberal Colorado Party, representing both Liberal and Social Democratic traditions, is responsible for developing Uruguay as a welfare state financed by cattle export revenues; it has governed the nation during most of its history since independence. Its roots are in the port city of Montevideo, the new immigrants of Italian origin, and the backing of foreign commercial interests. The Conservative National Party (Blancos), later affiliated with the Christian Democrat movement, represents the interests of the nation's large agricultural producers, the Catholic clergy, and commercial interests.

José Batlle y Ordoñez (1856–1929) of the Colorado Party governed as president from 1903 to 1907 and again from 1911 to 1915. He is credited with creating the modern Uruguayan state and redistributing much of the land previously controlled by a small group of large landowners. His leadership coincided with a period of economic prosperity, and the immigration of a large number of Europeans led to the spread of democratic values. He and his newspaper, El Día, were frankly anticlerical, and Batlle was responsible for severing the ties between church and state in 1916, and for banning clerics from controlling public schools. As a result, the active Catholic sector of the population is small and the majority of the people seem quite indifferent to religion.

The nation's economic growth slowed between 1955 and 1961 because Uruguay consumed 87 percent of its national income, which left a scant 13 percent for investment in the nation's infrastructure. The public payrolls were overloaded by the mid-1960s: government agencies and state-owned corporations were burdened with one-fourth of the country's jobs and under constant pressure from labor unions and politicians to multiply jobs without regard to efficiency. By the late 1960s, Uruguay began experiencing serious economic problems, which included inflation, mass unemployment, and a sudden drop in the workers' standard of living, partly because of a decrease in demand in the world market for agricultural products.

President Jorge Pacheco Areco (r. 1967–1972) of the Colorado Party, upon assuming office, immediately implemented price and wage freezes in an attempt to control inflation, and enforced a state of emergency in June 1968 due to growing student militancy and labor unrest. Constitutional safeguards were repealed during his term in office, and the government allegedly used torture during interrogations, brutally repressed demonstrations, and imprisoned political dissidents.

In response to the constitutional crisis and human rights abuses by the government, and increasing inflation and corruption in the business sector, a group of students formed the Tupamaro revolutionary movement, also known as the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional (MLN)—National Liberation Movement—and instituted a campaign of urban guerrilla warfare. The Tupamaros kidnapped and later released several foreign nationals, robbed banks and distributed food and money in poor neighborhoods, freed political prisoners, attacked public security forces, and assassinated police officials. Their efforts succeeded in first embarrassing, and then destabilizing, the government, which responded by imposing modified martial law during a period of civil war, from June 1968 to March 1969.

The U.S.-trained police force and the Uruguayan military unleashed a bloody campaign of mass arrests and selected disappearances (as part of Operation Condor), which diminished the strength of the guerrilla movement. The use of torture by security forces was particularly effective, and by 1972 the MLN's principal leaders had been arrested and imprisoned under terrible conditions for the next 12 years.

In 1971, a truce was declared between the government and the Tupamaros, which led to a relatively quiet atmosphere for the November 1971 national elections, in which Pacheco wanted to run for a second term but was prohibited from doing so by the Constitution. A referendum was held to change the Constitution to allow for re-election, but it was defeated. Consequently, Juan María Bordaberry became the Colorado Party's candidate and won the election for the presidential term 1972–1976.

However, in 1973, President Bordaberry dissolved the General Assembly and began ruling by decree as a military-sponsored dictator until disagreements with the military leadership led to his deposition before his original term of office had expired. During the period 1973–1981, several civilian political leaders participated in the civilian-military administration before General Gregorio Conrado Álvarez took over the reins of government and ruled from 1981 to 1985. Free elections were finally allowed in 1984, and the new democratic government began a process of recovering from a troubled political climate and a negative economic situation.

Meanwhile, many opposition parties began to unite, drawing support from the two traditional parties—the Colorado Party and National Party—and created a new coalition, named the Frente Amplio (Broad Front). After democracy was restored to Uruguay in 1985, the Tupamaros returned to public life as part of a political party, the Movement of Popular Participation (Movimiento de Participación Popular [MPP]).

Today, the MPP comprises the largest single segment of the ruling left-wing Frente Amplio coalition. Between March 1985 and March 2005, there was a democratic transition of power. The national election of 2004 brought the Frente Amplio—a broad coalition of Socialists, former Tupamaros, Communists, and Social Democrats, among others—to power, with majorities in both houses of parliament, under the leadership of President Tabaré Vázquez (2005 to date), who won by an absolute majority.

Roman Catholic Church Christianity was introduced into Uruguay in 1616 with the arrival of two Roman Catholic religious orders, the Franciscans and the Jesuits. The Jesuits took the lead in missionizing the Native population, and Uruguay became a primary region for the development of “communal villages”

URUGUAY

(reducciones) into which their converts were relocated. The mission system thrived until 1767, when the Jesuits were expelled by the pope, as part of an international disaster that befell that religious order. The communal villages largely disappeared during the next decade after being taken over by the civil government and other religious orders.

In the meantime, the Roman Catholic Diocese of Buenos Aires (established in 1620) extended its hegemony to the small colonial city of Montevideo in 1726. The Vicariate Apostolic of Montevideo was established in 1830 and upgraded to the Diocese of Montevideo in 1878; it was elevated to archdiocesan status in 1897.

The Uruguayan Catholic Church was greatly affected by large-scale immigration from Europe that began in the 19th century and gave the country its unique character today, with 94.6 percent of the population being of European extraction. Although the immigrants were largely from Catholic countries, many were nominal believers or irreligious, which helps explain the highest percentage of nonreligious persons in the country today.

According to the Reverend Miguel Ángel Pastorino, director of Uruguay's Service for Study and Advice on Sects and New Religious Groups and a member of the Roman Catholic Bishops' National Commission of Ecumenism and Interreligious Dialogue, "in Uruguay there are many nominal Christians, because 54 percent say they are Catholic, but only 2.3 percent attend Mass; and of those who attend Mass, not all are committed to the faith of the Church and its mission." The growth of Protestant denominations and other non-Catholic religious groups in Latin America is due to the "pastoral vacuum" that the Catholic Church has suffered in recent decades, together with its own internal conflicts.

Several diverse tensions arose within the Uruguayan Catholic Church in Uruguay during the 1960s and following years, resulting from challenges posed by the Latin American Bishops Conference in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal. These new movements polarized Catholic bishops, parish priests, religious workers, and the laity into various factions: traditionalists, who wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (late 1960s); reformers, who supported the church's modern stance; progressives, who sought to implement the new vision for "a preferential option for the poor" through social and political action aimed at transforming Uruguayan society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means; radicals, who adopted Marxist ideology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the oligarchy and creating a Socialist state that would serve the marginalized masses; and charismatic agents (priests, nuns, and lay members) who sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the "baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues").

Since the mid-1960s, the Uruguayan Catholic Church—influenced greatly by papal calls for a refocus of attention on the needs of the urban poor—has directed significant resources toward assisting the lower classes and empowering the laity in the church. However, only about half the national population identifies as Roman Catholic today, and weekly church attendance is reported to be very low.

Since 1950, overall, there has been a serious decline in available pastoral services, especially in the nation's largest urban area, the Archdiocese of Montevideo, where the average priest was responsible for twice as many parishioners in 2004 (1:3,483) as compared to 1950 (1:1,709). Between 1950 and 2004, the number of priests (diocesan and religious) in the archdiocese declined from 547 to 244. During this same period, the number of Catholic adherents declined from about 70 percent of the population in the Archdiocese in 1950 to about 63 percent in 2004.

In the midst of this general decline in Catholic demographics, a renewal movement occurred that revitalized the faith of many Catholics and made their lives more meaningful. Diocesan priest Julio César Elizaga (b. 1929) was a pioneer in the Catholic Renewal Movement (CRM) in Uruguay, and one of the few priests in the country who was authorized by the Vatican to conduct exorcisms. In addition, the Reverend Juan Carlos Ortiz, who was a pastor with the Assemblies of God in Buenos Aires, played an important role in the early development of the CRM in Argentina and Uruguay, along with the Trappist monks, during the late 1960s and early 1970s.

According to a 1969–1970 study by CLAR (Confederación Latinoamericana de Religiosos), there were 693 members of male religious orders in Uruguay, of which 64 percent were native-born, 3.3 percent were born in other Latin American countries, and 32.7 percent were born in other countries. Regarding the 1,592 members of female religious orders in Uruguay at that time, 43.4 percent were native-born, 22.6 percent were born in other Latin American countries, and 33.4 percent were born elsewhere. This study revealed that Uruguay had a very high number of native-born male religious workers compared to other Latin American countries; only Colombia, Ecuador, and Mexico had a higher percentage, with 82.1, 76.4, and 87.1 percent, respectively.

In 2004, the Uruguayan Catholic Church reported 10 dioceses with 228 parishes, which were served by 215 secular priests and 271 religious priests (486 total), assisted by 63 permanent deacons and 398 male religious and 1,281 female religious workers. The Archdiocese of Montevideo is led by Monsignor Nicolás Cotugno Fanizzi, S.D.B., appointed in December 1998.

Nuestra Señora de los Treinta y Tres is the patron of Uruguay, whose annual festival is celebrated on the second Sunday of November at the Santuario Nacional de Nuestra Señora de los Treinta y Tres in the city of Florida, Department of Florida, located in the center of the nation. The small image of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary (only 14 inches tall) was first noted in 1779 in a Jesuit mission in the town of Pintado; the image was later moved to the town of Florida and dedicated to 33 heroes of the Uruguayan Independence movement who appealed to the statue of the Virgin Mary for assistance in time of crisis.

The Protestant Movement The first Protestant churches in Uruguay were formed early in the 19th century. American Methodists (now the United Methodist Church) made their initial probe of Uruguay in 1835, and missionary work was established in Montevideo in 1839. Methodist work was closed in 1842 because of the civil war then raging (1839–1852), and it was not until 1870 that a permanent work was re-established. The affiliated churches became the independent Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay in 1969. Early Methodist success in Uruguay is attributed to the missionary labors of Dr. Thomas B. Wood (1844–1922) and to the conversion of a young Italian immigrant, Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), who went on to become a prominent evangelist across the continent and an agent of the American Bible Society.

The Evangelical Church of the River Plate dates to 1840 with the arrival of German Lutheran and Reformed immigrants in Argentina, Paraguay, and Uruguay. Later, they were joined by others from Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Russia, Brazil, and Romania. Many had in common the German language, and in 1899, they created the German Evangelical Synod of the River Plate, as part of the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKD), with which it became officially affiliated in 1934. In 1965, the synod approved a new constitution and was renamed the Evangelical Church of the River Plate (IERP), and it became independent of the EKD. About 70 percent of the IERP members live in Argentina, the others in Uruguay and Paraguay. Twenty-two Lutheran, Reformed, and United regional churches (Landeskirchen) form the Evangelical Church in Germany (Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland [EKD]).

Members of the Waldensian Church (followers of Peter Waldo, a pre-Reformation French schismatic leader in the 12th century) were among the immigrants from Italy who began to arrive in 1856, but it was not until 1877 that an ordained pastor was assigned to provide clerical leadership. Although, today, this is the fifth largest Protestant denomination in the country, many of its congregations continue to be served by lay leadership. New immigrants also began to establish colonies in the Argentine provinces of Santa Fe and Entre Ríos, and at the beginning of the 20th century the Waldensians in Uruguay began to expand their work into the Argentina provinces of Buenos Aires and Las Pampas. In 1895, the Waldensian congregations in the Río de la Plata region began to hold annual conferences, but it was not until 1934 that a formal denominational structure was organized in both countries as the Federation of Waldensian Evangelical Churches of the River Plate. Until 1965, the Federation was an integral part of the Italian Waldensian Church, but in that year it held its own synod for the first time. Over time other Reformed immigrants from Europe arrived in Uruguay and helped strengthen the membership of the Waldensian Church in the Río de la Plata region.

A wood altar with a statue of Jesus crucified inside of Montevideo Cathedral, Uruguay. (Alexandre Fagundes De Fagundes/Dreamstime.com)

The first Anglican missionaries arrived in 1866 to serve British immigrants and later established the Anglican Church of Uruguay, which is now part of the Anglican Province of the Southern Cone (established in 1981, encompassing Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Argentina). Arriving later in the century were the Christian Brethren (1882) and the Salvation Army (1890) from England, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1895) from the United States.

The relative freedom of religion throughout the 20th century was conducive to the establishment of a variety of Protestant and Free Church denominations in Uruguay, mostly from the United States, which includes the following: the Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board (1911), Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (1936), Evangelical Church of Uruguay (founded by the Fred Dabold family in 1946), Church of the Nazarene (1948), United Lutheran Church in America (1948), Mennonite Brethren Church (1948), Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (1950), Mennonite Brethren Missions and Services (1950), Augustana Lutheran Synod (1952), independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ (1952), Mennonite Board of Missions (1954; Uruguayan Mennonite Conference established in 1956), Armenian Missionary Association of America (1954; founded in Worcester, MA, in 1918), Church of God of Prophecy (1957), Baptist Bible Fellowship International (1958), the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1960), Freewill Baptist Association (1961), Baptist World Mission (1968), Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) (1970), Gospel Mission of South America (1970), Church of God (Anderson, Indiana, 1984), and the Baptist General Conference (1991).

Uruguayan Pentecostalism began with the arrival of U.S. missionaries from the United Pentecostal Church in 1930, followed by the Swedish Assemblies of God in 1938, the U.S. Assemblies of God in 1944, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) in 1945, and the Church of God of Prophecy in 1957. During the 1980s, about 70 Pentecostal denominations existed in Uruguay and their total membership surpassed that of all the non-Pentecostal denominations. As in Brazil and Argentina, Uruguayan Pentecostals have engaged in spiritual warfare against Afro-Brazilian religious cults, which are considered to be Satanic. In addition, the more traditional Pentecostal denominations have opposed the arrival in the 1980s of Brazilian missionaries of the God is Love Pentecostal Church and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, which are considered to be contaminated with Afro-Brazilian Spiritism.

Between 1948 and 1951, about 1,200 Mennonites from West Prussia and Poland arrived in Uruguay as refugees after World War II, and had been living in displaced persons camps in Denmark. The Mennonite Central Committee in the United States helped make arrangements for them to be relocated in Uruguay, at first housed in old army barracks and vacant warehouses in Paysandú and Arapey. Being eager to work and earn their own livelihood, individuals and small groups immediately took whatever work they could find, from skilled laborers and factory workers to farm hands and domestic servants. The first permanent agricultural settlement was begun in April 1950 on a 2,900-acre ranch at El Ombu, located about 180 miles northwest of Montevideo, near the small town of Young. The El Ombu ranch was divided into 75 homesteads of varying sizes. The farmers immediately organized an agricultural cooperative and began to develop the land and improve their housing conditions.

By the end of 1955, two additional agricultural colonies had been established: the second was a 4,500-acre ranch located near Tres Bocas, now known as the Gartental settlement; and the third was named Delta and established on 3,600 acres of land in San José Department, about 60 miles northwest of Montevideo. The cooperative practices of the German-speaking Mennonite colonies were a modern adaptation of the historical Mennonite Brotherhood economic principles of mutual aid. These practices made it possible for the colonies to survive economically, whereas individual efforts would not have been successful. There are at least four Mennonite church associations in Uruguay: the Council of Mennonite Brethren Congregations in Uruguay, which was organized among Polish immigrants in 1948 aboard ship before reaching Uruguay; the Conference of Mennonite Churches in Uruguay was established in the mid-1950s, which is affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America and with the Union of German Mennonite Congregations in Germany; also, the Mennonite Church U.S.A. established a mission in Montevideo in 1954 to serve the larger community. In addition, the Mennonite Central Committee has maintained a service center in Montevideo since 1948 as a coordinating agency between Mennonites in Uruguay and those in North America. The Mennonite Biblical Seminary was established in Montevideo in 1956 as a bilingual institution (German and Spanish), with the support of North American Mennonite mission boards. The seminary was replaced in 1974 with the Mennonite Study and Retreat Center in Montevideo to facilitate leadership training.

According to Brierly (1997), in 2000, the largest Protestant denominations in the country were the following: the U.S.-based Assemblies of God (with an estimated membership of 10,200), the Seventh-day Adventist Church (8,020), the Baptist Convention (4,500), the Swedish Assemblies of God (4,320), the Waldensian Church (3,200), the Evangelical Church of the River Plate (2,050), the Evangelical Pentecostal Church (from Chile, 1,790), and the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1,397).

About a dozen Uruguayan Protestant denominations have united in the Federation of Evangelical Churches of Uruguay, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC). It grew out of the Uruguay Committee of the Confederation of Evangelical Churches of the River Plate, originally founded in 1939. The more conservative evangelical churches have come together in the Christian Association of Evangelical Churches in the Republic of Uruguay, which is affiliated with the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA) and the World Evangelical Alliance (WEF).

Historically, the Protestant population of Uruguay has been the smallest of the Southern Cone countries, and one of the reasons for this can be found in the long secular tradition of the country. According to the 1908 census, 61.2 percent of the total population was Roman Catholic; 37.2 percent described themselves as atheistic, agnostic, or evolutionist; and only 1.6 percent considered themselves Protestant. In the 1980 national census, Catholics were 59.5 percent, Protestants were 1.9 percent, followers of other religions were 3.6 percent, and those who declared themselves to be “not religious” were 35 percent. In the 2006 census, only 47.1 percent identified as Roman Catholic; 40.4 percent professed no religious faith whatsoever; 11.1 percent identified as “non-Catholic Christians,” which includes Eastern Orthodox, Protestant, and marginal Christian groups); and only 1.3 percent were adherents of “other religions.”

Other Christian Groups There are several Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions in Uruguay. Immigrants from Greece, Russia, Ukraine, and Armenia have established their several branches of the Orthodox Church. The Greeks are part of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America under the Ecumenical Patriarchate; the Russians with the Russian Orthodox Church (Patriarchate of Moscow) and with the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad, Diocese of South America and Buenos Aires; the Ukrainians with the Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church of North and South America and the Diaspora (under Archbishop Odon of Manizales, Eparch of All Latin America, Spain, and Portugal and his superior, Metropolitan Mefodiy of Kyiv and All-Ukraine); and the Armenians are affiliated with the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin, Armenia).

Several U.S.-based non-Protestant religious bodies are present as well, the largest of which are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (arrived in 1944 and reported 90,292 members and 162 congregations in 2007) and the Jehovah's Witnesses (with 156 congregations and 10,951 members in 2005). Also present are controversial quasi-Protestant bodies, such as Growing in Grace Ministries International (followers of Miami-based Apostle José Luis de Jesus), the People of God (founded in Paraguay in 1963), the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, and the God is Love Church (from Brazil). The Seicho-No-Ie, founded in Uruguay in 1978, is a Japanese New Thought group.

The New Apostolic Church International is difficult to classify, but it arrived in South America around 1920 when a number of New Apostolic families from Europe settled near the mouth of the Rio de la Plata in Argentina and Uruguay. This religious group was originally named the Catholic Apostolic Church and was founded in England in 1830; it has roots in Presbyterian, Congregational, and Anglican theology and church polity. It is a pre-Pentecostal body that believes in and practices the charismatic gifts of healing, prophecy, and speaking in tongues. Today, its international headquarters are located in Zurich, Switzerland. According to Brierly (1997), this church body had an estimated 19,300 members in 2000.

Additional Religious Groups Jewish immigration to Uruguay began early in the 10th century and peaked in the 1920s and 1930s, when some 10,000 Jews fled the Nazis. With continued immigration after World War II, some 40,000 Jews eventually came to reside in the country. There are three significant groupings of Sephardic, Hungarian, and German background, which are organized into the Comunidad Israelita Sefardi, Comunidad Israelita Húngara, and the Comunidad Israelita. The Israelite Central Committee of Uruguay in Montevideo provides some unity to the Jewish community, which today is estimated at 25,000. According to local Jewish leaders, since 2002 the number of Jews has declined due to emigration.

The Muslim population lives primarily near the border with Brazil, with an estimated 300 to 400 Muslims in the country, but the majority were reported to be minimally active in religious activities. Although there are no mosques in Uruguay, there are two Islamic centers, in Canelones and Montevideo. Also, Subud, a Sufi-related movement founded in Indonesia in the 1920s by Muhammad Subuh Sumohadiwidjojo, has been present in Uruguay since 1958. The small Baha'i community is concentrated primarily in Montevideo.

In April 2006, approximately 850 families practiced Buddhism in Uruguay, some of whom were affiliated with the Diamond Way and Karma-Kagyupa Buddhist organizations.

There is a small Asian-Indian community in Uruguay but most Hindu-related groups are composed of non-Asian Indians, including the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), the International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization, the Shivaprem-ananda Ashram of the Divine Society (also known as Centro Sivananda Yoga Vedanta), and Transcendental Meditation (known as TM, and organized as the Global Country of World Peace).

The Afro-Brazilian religions of Umbanda, Quimbanda, and Batuque began to appear in the 1940s near the Uruguay-Brazil border and later in Montevideo. Local centers of these religions, such as Templo Afroumbandista Ile Oxalá Oxalufâ Pâe Dario de Oxala, have spread rapidly, primarily among Brazilian immigrants and Uruguayans of African descent. These Afro-Brazilian religions had approximately 5,000 adherents in Uruguay in 2000. The Afro-Umbandista Federation of Uruguay (Federación Afroumbandista del Uruguay [FAUDU]) was founded in 1994 in Montevideo.

Afro-Uruguayan is the term used to refer to Uruguayans of African ancestry; today, they are primarily located in Montevideo. Also present in Uruguay is Candomblé, another variation of Afro-Brazilian religions associated with the Orixás; for example, the Ketu-Orthodox Apostolic Church (Ilé Oxossi Ataré Oni-Alaketu) is located in Soriano, Cardona Province.

Other small religions include a few in the Western Esoteric tradition, such as: Freemasonry (Logía Masónica del Gran Oriente de Uruguay, founded in 1856 in Montevideo), the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), the Grand Universal Fraternity (founded in Venezuela), the Universal Gnostic Movement (1977), the Wiccan Community of Uruguay, the Pagan Society of Uruguay, and the Satanist Church (founded in 2006 by “Hermano Andrex” in Minas, Lavalleja Department).

Several Western Esoteric organizations were founded in Uruguay between 1896 and 1925: the Center of Occult Sciences (1896–1897), the Theosophical and Occult Center (1896), the Occult Lodge (1905), and Rama Hiranya (1905). Interest in Theosophy was kindled in Montevideo by Annie Mennie Gowland, an English resident of Buenos Aires, who made periodic visits to Uruguay, where she offered conferences on the subject and disseminated Theosophical principles, which led to the formal establishment of the Theosophical Society in Uruguay in January 1925, under the authorization of its international founder, Mrs. Annie Besant.

The Psychic-Spiritualist–New Age groups include the Uruguayan Spiritist Federation, the Uruguayan Spiritist Center, the Church of Scientology, Ishaya Techniques, the Silvan Method, and the Unification Church. The latter is formally known as the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity and was founded by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon in Korea in 1954. This group is very active and has major property holdings in Uruguay, including a daily newspaper. Since 1980, Uruguay has become a major center for the dissemination of Unification Church literature throughout Latin America.

The New Acropolis Cultural Center was founded by Jorge Ángel Livraga and his wife, Ada Albrecht, in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1957. A break-away group of this organization was founded by Ada Albrecht after she left Livraga and moved to Uruguay, where she established Hastinapura Uruguay (literally, “city named after the elephants”) in 1981. Both of groups are considered post-Theosophical movement organizations.

Also, present in Uruguay is a 30-hectare estate, called Casa Redención (Redemption House) or the Planetary Center of La Aurora, which was founded by Elisabeth César (known by her followers as “Shimani”) during the 2000s near La Aurora, and the Shrine of Padre Pío de Pietrelcina (built in 1987) in the Department of Paysandú, located on the southern bank of the Río Daymán about 16 miles from the city of Salto. The region is well known for alleged sightings of flying saucers and extraterrestrials. Shimani is a disciple of the famous Brazilian mystic José Hipolito Trigueirinho Netto (b. 1931), who has authored dozen of books such as Esoteric Dictionary (1999) and Calling Humanity (2002).

Padre Pío was a Roman Catholic Capuchin Franciscan priest, born as Francesco Forgione in southern Italy in 1887, who is an alleged mystic and miracle worker, venerated worldwide for the stigmata he claimed to have received from an angel; the “stigmata” were open wounds in his hands that reportedly bled for 50 years, from 1918 until he died in 1968.

In July 2005, according to the Reverend Miguel Ángel Pastorino, director of Uruguay’s Service for Study and Advice on Sects and New Religious Groups and a member of the Roman Catholic Bishops’ National Commission of Ecumenism and Interreligious Dialogue: “Not only is there [in Uruguay] an exodus to different Gnostic and esoteric proposals, Afro-American cults, para-Christian sects, spiritualism, and ‘flying saucer’ sects [those who believe in UFOs], but there is also a silent turn to religious indifference, a product of the advanced secularization of our large cities.”

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Assemblies of God; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Besant, Annie; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church of the Nazarene; Diamond Way Buddhism; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Evangelical Church in Germany; Evangelical Church of the River Plate; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Karma-Kagyupa, Tibetan Buddhism; Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mennonite Church, U.S.A.; Moon, Sun Myung; New Apostolic Church; Pentecostalism; People of God; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; Salvation Army; Sathya Sai Baba Movement; Seicho-No-Ie; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Theosophical Society (America); United Methodist Church; Umbanda; Unification Movement; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Waldensian Church; Wiccan Religion; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Bazzano, Daniel, et al. Breve visión de la historia de la iglesia en el Uruguay. Montevideo: OBSUR Librería San Pablo, 1993.
- Brierly, Peter. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Burgess, Stanley M., ed. "Uruguay." In The International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, 277–278. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2001–2002.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/diocese/dmovi.html>.
- Dieros, Pablo Alberto. Historia del Cristianismo en América Latina. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Fraternidad Teológica Latinoamericana, 1992.
- Fretz, J. Winfield, and Milka Rindzinski. "Uruguay." In Global Anabaptist Mennonite Encyclopedia Online. Undated 1990. <http://www.gameo.org/encyclopedia/contents/U76.html>.
- Geymonat, Roger, ed. Las religiones en el Uruguay. Montevideo: Ediciones La Gotera, 2004.
- Herring, Hubert, and Helen Baldwin Herring. A History of Latin America, from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Uruguay: 1838–2004." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ury/uruguay-chron.pdf>.
- Holland, Clifton L. Toward a Classification System of Religious Groups in the Americas by Major Traditions and Family Types. San José, Costa Rica: PROLADES, 2008. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/clas-eng.pdf>.
- Lapadjián, Pedro. Huellas de una iglesia: La Iglesia Evangélica y su desarrollo en Uruguay. Montevideo: Ediciones Trilce, 1994. http://books.google.es/books?id=_VFdS1E0aI0C.
- Monti, Daniel P. Presencia del Protestantismo en el Río de La Plata Durante el Siglo XIX. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Editorial La Aurora, 1969.
- Oro, Ari Pedro, and Pablo Semán. "Pentecostalism in Uruguay." "Pentecostalism in the Southern Cone Countries: Overview and Perspectives." International Sociology 15, no. 4 (December 2000): 605–627.
- PROLADES-RITA (Religion-In-The-Americas) database. "Religion in Uruguay." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ury/ury-rd.htm>.
- Red Iberoamericana de Estudio de las Sectas. "La Iglesia Católica de Uruguay alerta sobre la secta Shimani, un grupo platillista." Boletín Electrónico Info-RIES. August 12, 2009. <http://info-ries.blogspot.com/2009/08/boletin-info-ries-n-145.html>.
- Secretariado General de la CLAR. Estudio sociográfico de los religiosos y las religiosas en América Latina. Bogota, Colombia: Secretariado General de la CLAR (Confederación Latinoamericana de Religiosos), 1971.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report 2007: Uruguay. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90270.htm>.
- Weber, Linda J., and Dotsy Welliver, eds. Mission Handbook of U.S. and Canadian Christian Ministries Overseas (2007–2009). Wheaton, IL: Evangelism and Missions Information Service, 2007.

Your Catholic Voice website. “Miguel Pastorino on the State of Religion in Latin America.” July 8, 2005. <http://yourcatholicvoice.com/insight.php?article=2338>.

■ Uzbekistan

Uzbekistan is a landlocked Central Asian country surrounded by Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan. Much of the 173,000 square miles of territory is desert with mountains rising in the east. The population is 27,000,000 (2008).

The Uzbek people trace their lineage to a Turkish people in Siberia. These people settled in what is now central Kazakhstan. Meanwhile, in the seventh and eighth centuries CE, in what is now Uzbekistan, a Turkish khanate was created. However, the khanate was quickly replaced by Arab rule, which came to Central Asia along with the subsequent spread of Islam. A prosperous Islamic civilization developed in the next centuries as Buchara, Samarkand, and Urgenc became important centers for trade and education. This era of prosperity was cut short by the invasion of the Mongols early in the 13th century.

In the 15th century, the Uzbek people residing in Kazakhstan gained a new level of unity, and in the 16th century they moved into present-day Uzbekistan; in 1512 the Khanate of Kiva came into existence. Subsequently, several other Uzbek khanates were created, and a set of rival states emerged.

The Russians developed plans for the region late in the 19th century. In 1860 Russian forces entered the area and seven years later created the province of Turkistan, with its capital at Tashkent. Over the next two centuries, the Russians succeeded in reconciling the different khanates to their presence in the region. There was some attempt to create an independent Uzbek government after the fall of the czar, but forces of the new Soviet government crushed that effort. In 1924, Central Asia was reorganized along ethnic lines, and an entity closely resembling the present nation of Uzbekistan was designated as the Soviet Socialist Republic of Uzbekistan. What is now Tajikistan was originally part of Uzbekistan, but separated in 1929.

Uzbekistan was placed in a difficult position during the Gorbachev era, at the end of the 1980s. The government opposed Russian attempts to invade Afghanistan, and a hostile climate led to attacks upon Russian expatriates residing in the region. Uzbekistan moved quickly to separate from Russia in 1991 and form an independent nation. That new government is a democracy, but only in a limited sense. Parties in opposition to the present administration have not been

Uzbekistan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	6,003,000	24,328,000	85.1	2.29	30,476,000	35,466,000
Agnostics	3,000,000	3,104,000	10.9	−2.37	2,500,000	2,000,000
Atheists	2,022,000	623,000	2.2	−1.20	450,000	300,000
Christians	872,000	371,000	1.3	0.28	378,000	428,000
Orthodox	833,000	240,000	0.8	−0.53	200,000	200,000
Independents	26,000	80,000	0.3	2.76	100,000	120,000
Protestants	7,400	40,000	0.1	0.39	60,000	80,000
Jews	66,000	50,000	0.2	−0.85	45,000	40,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	56,400	0.2	1.47	50,000	55,000
Buddhists	10,000	44,300	0.2	1.47	60,000	90,000
Zoroastrians	0	1,000	0.0	1.47	1,000	1,000
Baha'is	0	900	0.0	1.48	2,000	4,000
Hindus	0	800	0.0	1.47	1,200	1,500
New religionists	40	140	0.0	1.35	200	300
Total population	11,973,000	28,580,000	100.0	1.47	33,963,000	38,386,000

UZBEKISTAN

allowed to form, and there are imposed limitations on free speech and association.

Two laws regulating religious liberty were passed in 1998. The Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Organizations, while granting a spectrum of freedoms, restricts religious rights that conflict with national security, prohibits proselytizing, bans religious subjects in school curriculums, prohibits the private teaching of religious principles, forbids the wearing of religious clothing in public by anyone other than clerics, and requires religious groups to obtain a license to publish or distribute materials. The law also requires that all religious groups and congregations register. To register, a group must have at least 100 Uzbek citizen members. The second law revised the criminal and civil codes and provided punishments for a spectrum of activities, such as organizing a banned religious group, persuading others to join such a group, and drawing minors into a religious organization without the permission of their parents.

Like much of Central Asia, Uzbekistan is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the Hanafite School. In 1843 the Russians created the Muslim Spiritual Board of Central Asia, with headquarters at Tashkent, whose authority reached out to neighboring countries. All imams had to register with the board, and it controlled the two seminaries for the training of religious leaders. In the brief period of lessening Russian authority, an Islamic revitalization movement, Jahid, attempted to reform what they saw as the corrupt leadership and tie Islam more closely to the religion's center in the Middle East. The movement founded a number of new schools that emphasized traditional values and taught classical Arabic as a means of reintroducing the Koran. As the movement gained a high profile, however, the Russians suppressed it.

The great Registan Square in the heart of Samarkand. (Corel)

During the years of Soviet rule, Islam was suppressed by a government openly hostile to religion. However, late in the 20th century, a new revitalization movement appeared, emphasizing Islamic morals and calling people's attention to the sharia (Islamic law). Some 80 mosques remained open during the Soviet era, and a reported 4,000 were opened soon after the country gained independence. As economic conditions dipped in the 1990s, during which time the country was making the transition to a market economy, many were drawn to new conservative Muslim movements, especially the Wahhabi movement, which has been generously supported by Saudi Arabia. At the same time, Turkish spokespersons have been supportive of a pan-Turkish approach to Central Asia. The new government operates as a secular state but has granted special status to the Islamic leadership. It both supports and exercises control over the Islamic community through the Spiritual Directorate for Muslims (the Muftiate).

The new 1998 law demanding registration of religious organizations appears to have been largely directed at exercising some control over Muslims worshipping at independent mosques. Since the law went into effect, 1,831 religious congregations and organizations, 1,664 of which were Muslim, have been registered. However, an additional 335 applications were denied, of which 323 were from Muslim groups.

Although the Sunni Muslims dominate religious life, by 2000 the Government's Committee on Religious Affairs had registered some 167 minority religious groups (congregations), including 32 of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), 23 Baptist, 26 Pentecostal or Full Gospel, 10 of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, 47 Korean Christian, 8 Jewish synagogues, 5 of the Baha'i Faith, 2 kingdom halls of the Jehovah's Witnesses, and 2 temples of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. Regular news reports continue as the struggle of different groups to register or recover a lost registration continue. Among the groups not registered as of 2000 was the Roman Catholic Church, though its registration was pending.

Christianity essentially entered Uzbekistan in the 19th century, with the coming of the Russians. It operates primarily within the continuing community of Russians (some 10 percent of the population), and its parishes are now part of the single diocese that covers Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, and Kyrgyzstan.

Baptists from Siberia and central Russia settled near Tashkent in 1898 and began to hold prayer meetings in their homes. The first congregation was established adjacent to the Russian fort at Tashkent and included soldiers among those in attendance. Later in the decade, German Baptists moved into the area. The Tashkent church was closed in 1932 and did not reopen until 1944. During its first decade after World War II, it grew from 65 to more than 1,300 members. During the last decades of the Soviet era, a number of Koreans moved into the country, among whom were some Baptists. By the end of the 20th century, there were more than 20 Baptist churches, the largest number of which were associated with the Union of Evangelical Christian-Baptists of Central Asia, an association founded in 1992 that also includes the churches in Turkmenistan and Tajikistan.

Seventh-day Adventist work includes the Asian-Caucasian Conference, which also takes in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Turkmenistan, and Tajikistan.

The Jewish community of Uzbekistan traces its history to the fifth century CE, when exiles from Persia arrived seeking a greater degree of religious freedom. The present communities in Samarkand and Buchara have persisted through the many government changes over the centuries. In the 19th century, Jews from Russia moved to Uzbekistan and settled in Tashkent. Besides the concentration of Jews in the three main cities, there are also Jews scattered throughout the country. During the Soviet era, the Jews of Uzbekistan had a relatively easier time than their fellow believers in other parts of the Soviet Union; however, they are now threatened by the new laws that demand religious leaders be Uzbekistan citizens.

Uzbekistan has been the source of numerous reports of religious suppression by the state, most reports coming from the Christian community, but Jews and even Muslims have not been exempt, while Jehovah's Witnesses have been especially singled out for attention.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Hanafite School of Islam; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Allworth, Edward A. The Modern Uzbeks. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1990.
- Kalter, Johannes, and Margareta Pavaloi. Uzbekistan: Heirs to the Silk Road. London: Thames & Hudson, 2003.
- Melvin, Niel J. Uzbekistan: Transition to Authoritarianism on the Silk Road. New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Muslims of the Soviet East*. English ed. Tashkent, Uzbekistan: Muslim Religious Board of Central Asia and Kazakhstan, 1968–?
- Rand, Robert. Tamerlane's Children: Dispatches from Contemporary Uzbekistan. London: One-world Publications, 2006.

V

Vaishnavism

Vaishnavism is a major sectarian tradition within Hinduism that is focused on the worship of Vishnu in his various forms and incarnations (avatars) as the highest manifestation of the divine. The rise of theistic traditions of Hinduism can be traced to earliest Upanishads, such as the Isha and Shvetasvatara, which conceive of a personal supreme deity as the creator of the world and as the ultimate source of liberation (moksha). In the Vedas, Vishnu is a minor deity, as can be deduced from the limited number of hymns dedicated to him. He is frequently mentioned in the context of his friendship with Indra in many of the latter's heroic battles against demonic forces, including Vritra. The most important act for which Vishnu is praised in the Rig Veda is as the wide striding one, whose three strides measure out and encompass the Earth, intermediate space, sky, and beyond.

The Bhagavata tradition, the earliest historical manifestation of Vaishnavism, is attested in several inscriptions from the second century to the first century BCE, which indicate that this religious cult was associated with Narayana, Vasudeva, and Samkarshana. During the Gupta period (ca. 320–550 CE), the term bhagavata appears in epigraphic materials as part of epithets of Gupta monarchs and rulers, such as paramabhagavata (“supreme bhagavata”) and mahabhagavata (“great bhagavata”). Their primary scripture was the Bhagavata Purana.

The connection of Vishnu to various avatars is found as early as the Mahabharata, where Krishna is identified as Vishnu. In the Bhagavad Gita, we find the earliest expression of avatara doctrine, as Krishna states that when world order (dharma) declines and chaos threatens the world, he creates himself to re-establish it. In the Epics and Puranas, Vishnu has numerous avatars, but by the eighth century, a common list of 10 avatars (dashavatars) is found in nearly all Vaishnava puranas: Matsya (fish), Kurma (tortoise), Varaha (boar), Narasimha (Man-lion), Vamana (Dwarf), Parashurama (Rama with the axe), Rama, Krishna, the Buddha, and Kalki, the messianic avatara who will appear to usher in the end of the Kali Yuga. By far, the most popular avatars of Vishnu are Rama and Krishna, who have become the focal point of major Vaishnava sampradayas (lineages).

Vaishnavism is the result of the amalgamation of four main textual and theological currents that crystallized into a textual corpus that has come to characterize the various Vaishnava sampradayas: Bhagavatas, Pancaratra, Vaikhanasa, and Alvars. In addition to the puranic corpus focused on Vishnu and his various avatars, the 12 Alvar, Tamil saint-poets, who composed devotional poetry from the sixth to the ninth centuries, greatly influence the theological vision of Vishnu as transcendent and formless, who also manifests as the consecrated image (arca) in the temple. The early Alvars extol the mystical union with Mayon (Krishna), which can be attained only through meditation and temple worship (puja).

The Pancaratra tradition associated with the worship of Narayana is another stream of Vaishnavism, which can be traced to sections of the Mahabharata and perhaps as early as the Shatapatha Brahmana. The Pancaratra presents a theology of emanation (vyuha) in which Narayana, sometimes called Vasudeva, manifests in four forms: Krishna-Vasudeva (the supreme soul beyond qualities), Samkarshana (the soul and knower of the field), Pradyumna (the mind of all beings, into which all beings disappear at the time of dissolution), and Aniruddha (the ego, agent, effect, and cause from whom all sentient and insentient beings come into existence).

Standing Vishnu statue with eight arms under an umbrella at Angkor Wat temple, Angkor, Cambodia. (Otmár Winterleitner/Dreamstime.com)

The Vaikhanasa tradition is a Vedic shakha (a sub-school of Taittiriya tradition of the Yajur Veda) that is closely associated with Vaishnavism. Their Vedic ritual (shrauta) sutras and smarta sutras (ca. fourth to eighth centuries) reveal a strong devotional and meditative focus on Vishnu/Narayana as part of their ritual practices. Vaikhanasa smarta sutras describe the ritual of the installation of the sacred image, which is accompanied by recitation of two mantras—om namo narayana and om namo bhagavate vasudevaya—as well as the invocation of the four aspects of Vishnu (purusha [spirit], satya [truth], acyuta [imperishable], and aniruddha [self-willed]).

The several streams under the umbrella of Vaishnavism consist of various ritual and meditative practices as well as different philosophical or theological perspectives. Historically, the Hindu tradition has recognized four Vaishnava sampradayas—Sri Vaishnavas of Tamil Nadu; the Gaudiya Vaishnavas located primarily in Bengal, Orissa, and Mathura; the Nimavats; and the Pushti Marga founded respectively by Ramanuja (11th century), Madhva (11th century), Nimbarka (13th century) and Vallabha (15th to 16th centuries).

Sri Vaishnava tradition of South India is a synthesis of the northern Indian Pancaratra and puranic tradition with the southern India tradition of the Alvars creating a theological vision in which Vishnu, as the transcendent cause and sustaining power of the universe, is the focus of emotional devotion. Liberation (moksha) from the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth (samsara) and karma is understood as the loving relationship between the individual soul and the god in Vaikuntha, Vishnu's heaven. Liberation, which is attained at death, is achieved through the cultivation of attachment to Vishnu and the simultaneous detachment from the world through devotional practices, including puja, and service (seva) to god. Total self-surrender (prapatti) and abandonment to Vishnu's saving grace also lead to liberation. Sri Vaishnava tradition has split into the Vatakalai (northern) and Tenkali (southern) branches, which disagree, for example, on their understanding of the nature of caste distinction and how strictly they are to be regarded.

Gaudiya Vaishnavism is the form of devotion to Vishnu that developed in the traditional region of Bengal (Gaudiya), including the modern-day region of Mathura and Vrindavan. Theologically, Gaudiya Vaishnavas share much with Sri Vaishnavas, but differ in the form and expression of devotional practice. The inspirational exemplar for Gaudiya Vaishnavas is Vishvambhar Mishra (1476–1533), who would come to be known as Sri Krishna Caitanya, the name given to him upon taking initiation into renunciation. According to the tradition, Caitanya is believed to be the divine as Krishna and Radha in inseparable embrace. As such, Caitanya is often depicted as Krishna and Radha in one body, half-male and half-female. It is the language of devotion developed by Gaudiya Vaishnavas that distinguishes them from other Vaishnava groups. Gaudiyas elaborate essential Vaishnava doctrines using the terminology of Sanskrit poetics, in which aesthetic experience (rasa) takes priority. In the 16th century, Rupa Goswami systematized the devotional passion of the devotee for Krishna into five lasting feelings or moods of the divine (sthayibhavas): the feeling of tranquility (shanti), the love experienced by the servile devotee (dasya), the love experienced by a friend (sakhya), the love experienced by a parent (vatsalya), and the erotic mood of love (shringara). Each of these aesthetic moods aims to discover the kind of love that matches the devotee's emotional aptitudes. In each bhava, the distance between devotee and Krishna as object of devotion is progressively broken down until the highest most intimate experience of the divine is reached. In shringara, the devotee experiences love for Krishna through the joy of union, the anguish of separation (viraha), and the ecstasy of love in re-union with god as expressed by Radha, Krishna's consort, in Jayadeva's famous 10th-century poem the Gita Govinda. The Gaudiya devotee attains liberation through the constant, ecstatic experience of the divine love-play between Radha and Krishna attained by repeatedly reciting the names of Krishna (namajapa), remembering (smarana) and savoring the deeds of Krishna as narrated in the Bhagavata Purana, performing puja to the temple murti or to the sacred tulsi (basil) plant, living in the company of sadhus, and living in Mathura, the land of Krishna.

Vaishnavism in its multiple manifestations is very much alive in the contemporary world. It has been transported as the Hindu community has dispersed around the globe and numerous Vaishnava temples have been built outside India. Furthermore, a variety of more recent Hindu movements grounded in the Vaishnava theology and practice have become international organizations, including the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) and the several divisions of the Swaminarayan International.

Carlos Lopez

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Gaudiya Math; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Meditation; Reincarnation; Swaminarayan Hinduism.

References

- Bryant, Edwin. F. A Sourcebook on Krishna. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Carman, John B. The Theology of Ramanuja: An Essay on Interreligious Understanding. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974.
- Gonda, Jan. Aspects of Early Vaishnavism. Utrecht: N. V. A. Oosthoek's Uitgevers Mij, 1954.
- Haberman, David. Journey through the Twelve Forests: An Encounter with Krishna. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Narayana, Vasudha. The Way and the Goal: Expressions of Devotion in the Early Sri Vaishnava Tradition. Washington, DC, and Cambridge: Institute for Vaishnava Studies and Center for the Study of World Religions, Harvard University, 1987.
- Williams, Raymond Brady. An Introduction to Swaminarayan Hinduism. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

■ Vanuatu

Vanuatu is a relatively new South Pacific island country located off the northeast coast of Australia, between Tuvalu and Kanaky. The more than 80 islands that compose the country have but 4,710 square miles of land. Its 215,000 citizens (2008) are primarily Melanesians.

The islands were originally settled, possibly as early as 1400 BCE, by Melanesians probably migrating there from present-day Indonesia. Those who resided on the islands had their first contact with Europeans when the Spanish explorer Pedro Fernandez de Quiros visited in 1605. Captain James Cook mapped the islands and named them New Hebrides for the Hebrides Islands in Scotland. They were known by that name through the mid-20th century.

Lacking most of the natural resources desired by Europeans, the islands became a major source of slave laborers as the French and British moved into the area. The continuance of the slave trade long after it had been outlawed caused an intense dislike of Europeans among the Vanuatuans, who often took out their anger on missionaries.

Vanuatu

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	78,600	230,000	94.4	2.55	309,000	431,000
Protestants	37,000	155,000	64.0	3.29	212,000	295,000
Roman Catholics	13,200	35,800	14.7	2.27	45,000	57,000
Anglicans	10,000	36,000	14.8	2.21	44,000	55,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,000	8,400	3.5	2.57	10,000	10,000
Baha'is	100	2,800	1.2	2.56	5,000	7,000
Agnostics	200	1,500	0.6	6.31	3,000	4,500
Buddhists	70	480	0.2	2.55	700	1,100
Atheists	0	150	0.1	2.52	300	500
New religionists	0	120	0.0	2.65	100	200
Total population	86,000	243,000	100.0	2.57	328,000	454,000

British and French vied for control of the islands through the 19th century, but at the beginning of the 20th century they worked out an agreement to govern the islands jointly. An independence movement developed in the 1970s and gained the overwhelming support of the people by the end of the decade. Overcoming various efforts to subvert it, Vanuatu gained its freedom in 1980.

The indigenous religion, popularly called Custom, survived in strength through World War II. It was especially strong on the islands of Tanan and Aniwa, with a significant presence also on Santo and Vao. It should be noted that there were almost 20 languages spoken in the islands, and a similar number of variations on the indigenous religion existed. Following World War II, the New Hebrides were the site of the original and primary manifestation of what became known as cargo cults. These groups, of which at least eight were identified, recognized a mythical figure called John Frum as the founder and expected him to return to the islands, bringing the same material abundance that islanders saw come out of the cargo planes that brought supplies for troops in the early 1940s. Remnants of the Cargo Cults can still be found, though, like the traditional religions, they have been opposed by the Christian community.

The introduction of Christianity into Vanuatu began with John Williams and James Harris of the London Missionary Society (LMS) and several Samoan Christian teachers who visited Tanan and Erromanga in 1839.

Leaving the Samoans on Tanna, Williams and Harris left for Erromanga, where both were killed soon after they landed. Other missionaries returned the following year and, finding their Samoan brethren safe, began a new work on Aneityum. Their work was hindered by several outbreaks of disease, which the islanders blamed upon the missionaries. The missionaries suffered the most from the continued taking of islanders into slavery, and more missionaries were killed in the New Hebrides than anywhere else in the South Pacific.

The work of the LMS was absorbed into the Presbyterian mission to the islands that began in 1848 with the arrival of Nova Scotian John Geddie. The Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland became the major force in Vanuatu with the arrival of John G. Paton, one of the more famous of the missionaries in the South Sea Islands. He had his first success on Aniwa, which became nominally Christian in the 1860s. The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand added their support in 1869, and eventually Presbyterians from Canada and Australia added their support. In 1948 the Presbyterian work was united and reorganized as the independent Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu. It now includes approximately one-third of Vanuatu's citizens.

Part of the significant work of the Presbyterians was the translation of the Bible into the indigenous languages. Thanks primarily to the two Gordon brothers from Scotland, the scriptures had been translated into the four main languages by 1870. By 1901 the Bible had been published in 21 languages.

VANUATU

The Roman Catholic Church established an initial presence in the New Hebrides in 1839, when a missionary arrived on Erromango; however, their major push did not begin until 1887, as the British and French began to work out their cooperative arrangement for the islands. Over the next decades, the church had great success, especially on the islands of Vao, Atchin, and Wala. A prefecture was established in 1901 and a vicariate three years later. The Diocese of Port Vila was erected in 1966.

Bishop George A. Selwyn of the Anglican Church of Australia, with the cooperation of his colleagues in New Zealand, initiated missionary work in the northern New Hebrides in 1848. They limited their work to the northern islands in order to avoid head-on competition with the Presbyterians. For the first century of its existence, the mission actually was manned and guided by New Zealand Anglicans. Then in 1975, the Church in the Province of Melanesia was established as an independent entity, and Vanuatu became a diocese in the province, which is headquartered in the Solomon Islands.

The Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental), a free church with Baptist roots, began work in the New Hebrides in 1903 after its representatives had been deported from Kanaky. Their work took hold on Aiba, and they subsequently built a substantial following on Pentecost and Maewo. More recent arrivals include the Apostolic Church (from Australia), the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1912), and the Jehovah's Witnesses (1933).

With the continuation of the traditional religions of the New Hebrides, it is not surprising to find a variety of indigenous churches. The interaction of Christians with the cargo cults has led to several new Christian congregations. The Voice of Daniel was formed by Daniel Tambe, a former Anglican priest on Pentecost Island, as the result of a vision he had in the early 1930s. The Free church derives from a schism within the Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands, imported from Kanaky.

Anglicans, Roman Catholics, and Presbyterians came together in 1967 to form the New Hebrides Christian Council, with the Adventists and Apostolics as observer members. That Council evolved into the Vanuatu Christian Council, now affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

There are only a few religious groups that exist apart from the larger Christian community. The Baha'i Faith began building their work in the 1960s, and Buddhism has been brought to the islands by immigrants from Vietnam.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of Australia; Baha'i Faith; Church in the Province of Melanesia; Churches of Christ; Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Prior, Randall, ed. Gospel and Culture in Vanuatu. 5 vols. Hindmarsh, South Australia: ATF Press, 2007.
- Rice, Edward. John Frum He Come: A Polemical Work About a Black Tragedy. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Company, 1974.
- Trompf, G. W. Cargo Cults and Millenarian Movements: Transoceanic Comparisons of New Religious Movements. Berlin: Mouton De Gruyter, 1990.
- Trompf, G. W. Melanesian Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Vedanta Societies

The Vedanta Societies are the products of the missionary outreach of swamis (Hindu monastics) in the order inspired by the Indian saint Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886), considered an avatar; an incarnation of God. Ramakrishna's mystical experiences are regarded as proving that there is truth in all of the world's religions, and this continues to be an emphasis of the Vedanta movement. Vedanta means "end of the Vedas," and it refers to the later Vedic texts, the Upanishads, and the philosophical schools based on those texts. The basic Vedantic doctrine is that reality is non-dual and unitary, and that we are all part of the one divine reality. Vedanta was introduced to the United States in 1893, when Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902) spoke at the World Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in conjunction with the Columbian Exposition. His presentation of Hindu thought to the American public was so well received that he remained until 1896 to give lectures in the Midwestern and Eastern United States and in Europe, to instruct students, and to inspire the founding of the first Vedanta Society, in New York City in 1896. Vivekananda returned to the United States in 1899–1900 to lecture in California.

Additional swamis in the Ramakrishna Order came to the United States and founded Vedanta Societies in major cities. Abhedananda (1866–1939) was based in New York City and taught in the United States from 1897 to 1921. Trigunatita led the San Francisco Vedanta Society, which built the first Hindu temple in America in 1906. Paramananda (1885–1940) arrived in 1906 and established centers in Boston and Los Angeles, and lectured all over the United States. In 1923 he founded a spiritual community, Ananda Ashrama, at La Crescenta, California. Prabhavananda (1914–1976) founded a center in Portland, and he established an influential Vedanta Society in Hollywood in 1930. This center grew to become the Vedanta Society of Southern California, with several monasteries, a convent, and the well-known Vedanta Press. In the late 1930s, the British writers Gerald Heard (1889–1971), Aldous Huxley (1894–1963), and Christopher Isherwood (1904–1986) became Prabhavananda's disciples. Nikhilananda (1895–1973) founded a center in Manhattan in 1933 and was a prolific writer and speaker;

A statue of Swami Vivekananda, one of the most influential spiritual leaders of the philosophies of Vedanta and Yoga. He was the chief disciple of Ramakrishna Paramahansa and the founder of Ramakrishna Math and Ramakrishna Mission. (Nilesh Bhange/Dreamstime.com) his disciples included Joseph Campbell, the comparative mythologist.

The Vedanta Societies continue to be headed by male Indian swamis, although they have trained American swamis as well as women monastics. The original Vedanta Societies in the United States remain under the spiritual (though not the administrative) authority of the Ramakrishna Order, headquartered in India, and are now part of a worldwide fellowship of autonomous Vedanta Centers. The Ramakrishna Math and Mission oversees a number of centers and institutions across the country. Centers within the United States may be found in New York City, Berkeley, San Francisco, Sacramento, Hollywood, Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, Portland, Providence, and Seattle. The Vedanta center of Southern California maintains an extensive Internet site at <http://www.vedanta.org/>, which includes a worldwide directory of Vedanta Societies.

Controversies have arisen over keeping talented swamis obedient to the Ramakrishna Order in India and on how women should relate to the male Indian monastic order. From 1910, Swami Abhedananda lectured independently of the control of the Ramakrishna Order, and when he returned to India he founded a separate organization. When Swami Paramananda died in 1940, his disciples, who included a number of monastic women, decided that his niece, Gayatri Devi, should succeed him as leader, instead of accepting a new swami from India. In 1941 the Ramakrishna Order decided that the centers founded by Paramananda were no longer its affiliates. In the early years, the Indian swamis had to cope with American racism and prejudice against their Hindu religion. Today, the Vedanta Societies have succeeded in being accepted in interfaith interactions in their respective areas.

Ramakrishna Math and Mission
PO Belur Math
District Howrah 711 202
West Bengal
India

Catherine Wessinger

See also: Hinduism; Monasticism.

References

- Burke, Marie Louise. Swami Vivekananda: His Second Visit to the West: New Discoveries. Calcutta: Advaita Ashrama, 1978.
- Burke, Marie Louise. Swami Vivekananda in America: New Discoveries. 2 vols. Calcutta: Advaita Ashrama, 1958.
- Jackson, Carl T. The Oriental Religions and American Thought: Nineteenth-Century Explorations. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981.
- Jackson, Carl T. "The Swami in America: A History of the Ramakrishna Movement in the United States, 1893–1960." Ph.D. diss., University of California, 1964.
- Wessinger, Catherine. "Hinduism Arrives in America: The Vedanta Movement and the Self-Realization Fellowship." In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, 173–190. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Vegetarianism

The term "vegetarianism" refers to a spectrum of diet regimens that significantly cut back or altogether eliminate the use of any animal products from one's diet. Veganism refers to a diet that does not use any animal products in the diet, while most vegetarians will ingest foods such as eggs, milk, and cheese, that is, animal products that do not require the death of the animal from which they are taken. Popular variant vegetarian diets include the several programs emphasizing raw food and the Macrobiotics diet.

Vegetarianism appears to have first gained a following among the Jains, who had developed a doctrine of ahimsa, or harmlessness, by which they meant non-killing. By around 800 BCE, Jains were teaching that the killing of any animal life and even some forms of plant life accumulates karma (consequences), which must be neutralized before one can escape the rounds of reincarnation (samsara). As this idea developed, within Jain circles, monks developed the practices of sweeping their pathway with a broom to prevent the inadvertent killing of any insects or other small creatures and wearing a mask to prevent their being inhaled. Some abandoned agriculture as it required the harm or death of animals in the process of raising crops.

The Jains' concept of ahimsa penetrated Buddhism, but Buddhists generally avoided some of the more extreme expressions of it. Buddhist monasteries consumed a vegetarian diet, but the average Buddhist monk might accept meat when offered to him as he begged for food. The Vinaya, the guidebook for Buddhist monastic life, did not forbid meat, the only exception being an admonition to refrain from partaking from animals specifically killed to feed the monks. A strict vegetarianism arose primarily among the monks of East Asia. Wesak, the Buddha's birthday, was a time for feasting often with vegetarian meals donated to the monks, and communal vegetarian meals for laypeople.

In Japan, moves toward adopting an ethical system based on ahimsa made some penetration of the culture during the Nara era (eighth century CE), as Buddhism moved into the country from China. The adoption of nonviolent ideas included the development of a Japanese vegetarian diet, but both the ahimsa perspective and the diet were soon abandoned as the government moved to co-opt Buddhism for its own ends.

From Jainism and Buddhism, vegetarianism seeped into the larger Hindu community. Jains attacked certain Hindu practices such as animal sacrifice and the consuming of meat. By the beginning of the first millennium BCE, those in the Brahmin class, which included most priests and many cultural influentials, adopted the idea of ahimsa and as a corollary adopted a vegetarian diet. One step in this direction was to make an exception that allowed the eating of meat from animals that had been sacrificed. This exception was made after defining the death of animals in sacrificial ritual as not himsa, or killing.

With the exception of animal sacrifice, which has to a large extent been abandoned in India, the ancient practices of vegetarianism have continued to the present, and even expanded. Animal sacrifice was an integral part of Vedic religion, but in the modern era moves were made to replace it in the light of intense criticism from the West. In 1950, animal sacrifice in Hindu temples was outlawed in the state of Madras in southern India. By this time new rituals had been developed to replace the sacrificial procedures. The primary place where it now continues is in Bengal among worshippers of the dark goddess Kali.

One group, the followers of Tantrics, opposed vegetarianism and integrated the consumption of meat into their rituals, which attempted to reach the divine through the world rather than by withdrawal. The monks (sanyassins) had developed an elaborate process of withdrawing from the world—worldly possessions, society, family connections, and the like—which in some cases mixed with the idea of ahimsa and produced a commitment to vegetarianism. Vegetarianism also began to be identified as a step toward spiritual purity and hence the proper attitude of a Brahmin. Finally, one began to see the phenomenon of a whole caste adopting the practice as a means of moving up in the overall social structure.

Vegetarianism was not prominent in the West until the modern age. While one finds the prohibition of certain foods (such as pork), the major Western religious traditions had no problem with eating meat or other animal products. What anti-meat dietary prohibitions emerged were based on the reputed “impurity” of the forbidden foods. Prohibitions primarily centered on pork products and some forms of seafood. The Jewish prohibitions were rejected by the early Christians and the issue became a characteristic separating the two communities. The Islamic community, however, picked up and continued the Jewish prohibitions and Islamic dietary rules generally follow Jewish kosher practice. The rise of vegetarianism in the West appears to have been a result of the influx of ideals from the East that began with the British move into India and China, new sectarian Christian impulses, and the rise of new “scientific” schools of health as predecessors to modern medicine.

The first vegetarian organization in the West was the small Bible Christian Church founded by the Reverend William Cowherd in 1809 in Salford, England. Cowherd, a former Anglican clergyman, had come to believe that abstinence from meat was necessary if a person was to progress spiritually. In 1817, with 41 church members, Cowherd moved to Philadelphia, thus becoming the fountainhead of future vegetarian practice on both sides of the Atlantic. Though a relatively small body, it is noted as influencing a number of reformers who chose to deal with issue of diet. Directly influenced by the church was Sylvester Graham (1794–1851) who invented the still popular graham cracker and lectured widely on the vegetarian diet he had developed. The first secular vegetarian organization was the Vegetarian Society founded in 1847 in Manchester. The American Vegetarian Society was founded three years later. Its first president was William Alcott (1798–1859), a disciple of Graham’s perspective. Graham himself became the vice president. They were joined in their endeavor by some of the leaders of the water cure movement, Joel Shew, Russell Trall, and William Metcalfe. Though always a small minority movement, vegetarianism had spread through Europe to the point that a still-existing International Vegetarian Union could be formed in 1908.

At the beginning of the 19th century, vegetarianism was tied to a new issue that would become increasingly important, the protection of the rights of animals and the crusade to end all forms of animal cruelty. The first organization dedicated to these goals, the Millennial Guild, appeared in 1912.

The Christian sectarian support of vegetarianism and the new scientific approaches to diet reform came together in the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Church founder and Prophetess Ellen G. White was interested in health reform, the subject of a number of her prophetic messages. She found cutting-edge support in the form of the Kellogg brothers, John Harvey (1852–1943) and Will Keith. In 1875, John Kellogg became the superintendent of the Western Health Reform Institute supported by the fledgling church in Battle Creek, Michigan, and three years later opened the famous sanatorium where he was able to develop the new diet he proposed built around cereals and other vegetarian food. The brothers went on to found the company that still bears their name, though the company has long since abandoned their founder's health priorities.

Theosophy became a major force injecting Eastern ideas into the West, and vegetarianism became one of its themes. Annie Besant (1847–1933), who succeeded Henry S. Olcott (1832–1907) as the president of the Theosophical Society, became a vegetarian and used the Society effectively to urge diet change on the members and spread vegetarian ideals beyond its boundaries. She argued that mass slaughter of animals for food demeaned humanity and picked up Cowherd's basic notion that vegetarianism was a prerequisite for spiritual progress. As the Society splintered, the vegetarian perspective was carried into many of the more than 100 new Theosophically inspired organizations like the Liberal Catholic Church and the Rosicrucian Fellowship.

In the United Kingdom the cause of the animals would be picked up by the Spiritualist movement, which gave its backing to organizations like the Anti-Vivisection League, a precursor to contemporary organizations like PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals). Support for the Indian teaching of ahimsa and the vegan philosophy it espoused was given by the American Vegan Society founded in New Jersey in 1960. Founder H. Jay Dinshah (1933–2000), an Indian American, lifted the banner for ahimsa, which he termed “dynamic harmlessness.” Vegetarianism had waned in North America and most had not grasped the connection between it and the nonviolent approach of the highly respected Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948). Dinshah argued for a comprehensive vegan lifestyle that excluded from one's diet all animals (meat, fish, fowl) and animal products (milk, eggs, honey, and so forth) as well as animal by-products in such things as shoes, clothing, and toiletries.

Dinshah was but one of the people to emerge in the 1970s to espouse vegetarianism and to found a large socially relevant movement that welcomed critiques of the majority society in Europe and America—the New Age movement. The movement provided a vehicle for small movements like the Vegans to reach far larger audiences than they otherwise could ever hope to influence, and they formed a natural alliance with emergent coalitions built around concerns for organic foods without additives; alternative and holistic approaches to health; and the overuse of animals for medical and scientific experimentation.

Contemporaneously with Dinshah, Ann Wigmore of the Hippocrates Health Institute emerged as the great champion of the raw food movement. Possibly no one had the impact of George Ahsawa and Michio Kushi, who became the champions of the Macrobiotic diet. Built on the same principles as Asian martial arts and healing techniques like acupuncture, the Macrobiotic diet started with a selection of cereal grains, of which unpolished brown rice was the most important, and advocated an inexpensive humane and healthy alternative to meat-centered diets. Macrobiotics found a popular audience, as it emphasized a more positive approach to rebuilding a tasty and comprehensive diet, and went far beyond what was often seen as simply abandoning meat in one's diet.

The New Age movement in Europe and America revealed the existence of a number of groups in which vegetarianism predominated, from the Unity School of Christianity to numerous Esoteric groups and many of the new Eastern groups that flooded the West after America changed its immigration laws in 1965. Vegetarianism remains very much a minority practice in the West, but has grown to the point that vegetarian restaurants are now found in almost all large cities and non-vegetarian restaurants go out of their way to have vegetarian options on their menus. While an increasing number accept vegetarianism as a way of life based on scientific and social ethical concern (and even a dislike of the taste of meat), religious ideas remain the foundation of its growth.

American Vegan Society
56 Dinshah Lane
PO Box 369
Malaga, NJ 08328-0908
<http://www.americanvegan.org>

Hippocrates Health Institute
1443 Palmdale Court
West Palm Beach, FL 33411

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Besant, Annie; Blavatsky, Helena P.; Jainism; New Age Movement; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Theosophical Society (America); Unity School of Christianity; White, Ellen G.

References

Besant, Annie. Vegetarianism in the Light of Theosophy. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1984.

Bodhipaksa. Vegetarianism. Living a Buddhist Life Series. Cambridge: Windhorse Publications, 2004.

Bollee, William. The History of Vegetarianism and Cow-Veneration in India. London: Routledge, 2009.

Dinshah, Freya. The Vegan Kitchen. Malaga, NJ: American Vegan Society, 1970.

Dinshah, H. Jay. Out of the Jungle. Malaga, NJ: American Vegan Society, 1995.

Lappe, Frances Moore. Diet for a Small Planet. New York: Ballantine Books, 1971.

Numbers, Ronald L. Prophets of Health. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

Stuart, Tristram. The Bloodless Revolution: A Cultural History of Vegetarianism: From 1600 to Modern Times. New York: W.W. Norton, 2008.

■ Venezuela

Venezuela is located in northeastern South America on the Caribbean Sea between Colombia to the west and Guyana to the east. Its southern border, which reaches into the Amazon River basin, is shared with Brazil. Geographically, Venezuela is a land of vivid contrasts, with four major divisions: the Maracaibo lowlands in the northwest, the northern mountains (the most northeastern section of the Andes) extending in a broad east-west arc from the Colombian border along the Caribbean Coast, the savannas of the Orinoco River Basin in central Venezuela, and the Guyana highlands in the southeast.

The 1999 Constitution changed the name of the Republic of Venezuela to the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. The nation is composed of 20 federal states and a federal district, which contains the capital of Caracas. The country has an area of 352,144 square miles and approximately 85 percent of the national population lives in urban areas in the northern portion of the country, near the Caribbean Coast. Almost half of Venezuela’s land area lies south of the Orinoco River, which contains only 5 percent of the total population.

According to the National Statistics Institute, the nation’s total population on January 31, 2007, was

Venezuela

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	10,317,000	27,443,000	94.5	1.82	32,857,000	38,717,000
Roman Catholics	9,775,000	24,870,000	85.6	1.32	28,721,000	32,716,000
Protestants	148,000	1,300,000	4.5	4.04	2,200,000	3,300,000
Independents	131,000	976,000	3.4	2.47	1,500,000	2,200,000
Agnostics	49,000	667,000	2.3	2.53	1,300,000	1,800,000
Spiritists	100,000	305,000	1.1	1.84	370,000	440,000
Ethnoreligionists	200,000	205,000	0.7	1.84	230,000	260,000
Baha’is	24,900	170,000	0.6	1.84	250,000	350,000
Muslims	500	95,000	0.3	1.84	150,000	200,000
Atheists	10,000	60,000	0.2	2.23	85,000	115,000
Jews	12,000	57,000	0.2	1.84	72,000	85,000
Buddhists	2,000	36,000	0.1	1.84	50,000	70,000
Chinese folk	5,000	5,900	0.0	1.84	7,000	9,000
New religionists	500	1,200	0.0	1.84	2,000	3,000
Total population	10,721,000	29,045,000	100.0	1.84	35,373,000	42,049,000

27,750,163 inhabitants. About 60 percent of the population are mestizo (mixed races: Caucasian, African, and Amerindian), 29 percent Caucasian (mostly Spanish, Italian, German, and Portuguese), 8 percent Afro-Venezuelan, 1 percent Asian-Middle Eastern (Chinese, Japanese, Vietnamese, Korean, and Middle Easterners), and 2 percent Amerindian. The national and official language is Spanish, although 31 indigenous languages are spoken. Immigrant communities and their descendants commonly use their own native languages.

The Venezuelan people have a combination of ethnic heritages. The Amerindians, Spanish colonists, and Africans were joined by European groups and others from neighboring countries of South America during waves of immigration in the 20th century. There are various communities of Eastern Europeans. Some Venezuelans trace their ancestry to 10,000 expatriates from the southern United States who arrived after the Civil War (1865). The multiracial/ethnic combination is evident in Venezuelan culture: food, music, clothing, holidays, and the mestizaje identity.

Immigration since World War II has not only increased the spectrum of Christian denominations in the country, but also brought many of the world's religions to Venezuela. The 1961 Constitution guaranteed freedom of religion to all faiths; church and state are separate, although the majority of people still refer to themselves as Roman Catholic.

According to government estimates in 2006, 76 of the population was Roman Catholic, 29 percent was non-Roman Catholic Christians (includes Eastern Orthodox, Protestant, and other marginal Christian groups, such as Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses), and the remaining 1 percent were "other religions" or claimed no religious affiliation. However, the Evangelical Council of Venezuela estimated that evangelical Protestants constituted approximately 10 percent of the population.

In 2008, the Constitution provided for freedom of religion, on the condition that its practice does not violate public morality, decency, or public order; and other laws and policies contributed to the generally free practice of religion. The government generally respected religious freedom in practice; however, there were some efforts by the Chávez government, motivated by political reasons, to limit the influence of religious groups in certain geographic, social and political areas.

The government continues to prohibit foreign missionary groups from working in indigenous areas. In 2005, the Ministry of Interior rescinded permission for the New Tribes Mission (NTM) to conduct its social programs among indigenous tribes; NTM appealed to the Supreme Court, and the case is still pending. The NTM withdrew more than 100 missionaries from indigenous areas in compliance with the government's order. In 2005, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons) withdrew 219 missionaries, citing difficulties in obtaining religious visas from the government. Some Mormon missionaries working with indigenous peoples were expelled from those areas, while the others departed voluntarily.

The territory known today as Venezuela was inhabited by an array of Amerindian groups in prehistoric times. The Carib (including the Tamaques, Maquiritares, and Arecunas) settled along the Caribbean Coast, while other Native American groups, mainly Arawaks, settled in the mountains and in the Orinoco River basin of the interior.

The coast of Venezuela was discovered by Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) during his third voyage to the New World, on August 1, 1498. Its name, meaning "Little Venice," was given by reason of the fact that Alonso de Ojeda, who first explored the coast in 1499, found a small aboriginal village built on stilts in the region of Lake Maracaibo. Modified into Venezuela, the name afterward served to designate the whole territory of the captaincy general. Spanish settlements were established on the Caribbean Coast at Cumaná in 1520 and Santa Ana de Coro in 1527. The Spanish conquest was complete by 1600. By the end of the first century of Spanish rule, about half of the Amerindian tribes that existed previously in Venezuela had become extinct.

The Spanish settled and began to build an agricultural colony based on cacao (chocolate) production, for which they later imported slaves from Africa. Since then Venezuela has developed a regularly organized society with peculiar ethnic characteristics and a distinctive national culture. Venezuela was Spain's most successful agricultural colony, first with cacao production and export, and then, toward the end of the 18th century, with coffee.

VENEZUELA

As a result of the racial mixtures, Venezuelan society from its very beginnings displayed a more homogeneous ethnic makeup than most other Latin American colonies. The large group of freedmen worked mostly as manual laborers in the emerging cities or lived as peasants on small plots of land. Blacks, mulattos, and mestizos occupied the lower rungs on the social ladder, but they still enjoyed a number of rights and guarantees provided by Spanish law and customs.

The colony of Venezuela was under the administration of governors and captains general during the 17th and 18th centuries. In 1718, Spanish colonial authorities organized the Viceroyalty of New Granada, with Venezuela as its easternmost region under a captaincy general.

Much of the movement for the independence of northern part of South America from Spain originated in Venezuela. The battles for independence were fought between 1749 and 1830, during which Simón Bolívar became a national hero and built his dream of Gran Colombia (from what is today Ecuador, Colombia, Panama, northern Peru and Venezuela). An independent New Granada (Colombia, Ecuador, and Venezuela) finally emerged in 1819 as the Republic of Gran Colombia. The War of Independence finally ended with the Battle of Carabobo, won by the Liberator Simón Bolívar in 1821. When the Republic of Gran Colombia was dismembered, the Republic of Venezuela was established in 1830.

Thereafter, the country was ruled by an oligarchy under the leadership of an authoritarian leader (caudillo) well into the 20th century. The era of the caudillo began with 16 relatively peaceful and prosperous years under the rule of General José Antonio Páez (r. 1830–1835, 1839–1843). Using funds earned during the coffee-induced economic boom, he oversaw the building of fledgling social and economic infrastructures. Generally considered second only to Bolívar as a national hero, Páez (a mestizo) ruled in conjunction with the criollo elite (Venezuelan born of pure Spanish ancestry), which maintained its unity around the caudillo as long as coffee prices remained high.

In the 1840s, however, coffee prices plunged, and the oligarchy split into two factions: those who remained with Páez called themselves Conservatives, while his rivals called themselves Liberals. The Liberals first came to prominence in 1846 with Páez's surprising selection of General José Tadeo Monagas (1847–1851) as his successor. Two years later, Monagas ousted all the Conservatives from his government and sent Páez into exile, which precipitated a decade of dictatorial rule shared with his brother, José Gregorio. In 1857 they introduced a new Constitution in an obvious attempt to install a Monagas family dynasty. The regime was ousted the following year in a revolt that included elite members of both parties.

The elite factions failed to agree on a replacement for the Monagas, however, which produced 20 years of intermittent and chaotic civil war. Between 1858 and 1863, local caudillos engaged in a power struggle known as the Federal War, because the Liberals favored federalism. In the end, the Liberals triumphed and General Juan C. Falcón was named president. Central government authority was finally restored in 1870 under Falcón's chief aide, Antonio Guzmán Blanco (r. 1870–1887), who established a dictatorship that lasted for 20 years. During his term of office, strife and bloodshed continued, and Venezuela suffered from despotism such as the nation had not known until this time.

During the 20th century, Venezuela emerged as one of the wealthiest nations in South America because of the development of its petroleum industry in and around Lake Maracaibo, in the northwestern region, near the Colombian border. Since 1918, Dutch, British, and American companies have developed the rich oil fields found in several regions of the country. Many immigrants have assisted in the development of its industries.

This transformed the Venezuelan economy, and today this nation is the third largest producer in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), with particularly large reserves of heavy bitumen in the southeastern Orinoco River basin. The extra revenue meant that the road system could be developed to become the envy of South America, and Caracas and other central cities were virtually rebuilt.

The dependence on oil revenues has meant that other sectors such as agriculture and tourism have been underdeveloped and with the late 1970s' fall in oil prices inflation has risen somewhat from the previous 10 percent levels, as successive governments realized they must diversify the economy. The discovery of very rich iron ore deposits, as well as gold, diamonds, and nickel, has meant that the mining sector has been the most buoyant part of the economy since about 1984.

General Juan Vicente Gómez ruled the nation from 1908 to 1935, alternating between the posts of president and minister of war. Gómez justified his harsh dictatorship as the form of government (caudillismo) preferred by the predominantly mixed-race Venezuelans. The Gómez regime coincided with a protracted period favorable to Venezuelan exports, and the economy boomed.

Rómulo Ernesto Betancourt Bello (1908–1981), known as “The Father of Venezuelan Democracy,” was president of Venezuela from 1945 to 1948 and again from 1959 to 1964, as well as leader of Acción Democrática, which became Venezuela’s dominant political party in the 20th century. Betancourt became president in 1945 by means of a military coup d’état and, during his time in office, completed an impressive agenda. His accomplishments included the declaration of universal suffrage, the institution of social reforms, and securing half of the profits generated by foreign oil companies for Venezuela. His government worked closely with the International Refugee Organization to aid European refugees and displaced persons who could not or would not return home after World War II; his government assumed responsibility for the legal protection and resettlement of tens of thousands of refugees inside Venezuela.

Carlos Delgado Chalbaud became chairman of the military junta that governed Venezuela during 1948–1950. He was kidnapped and assassinated in November 1950, allegedly by his fellow junta member Marcos Pérez Jiménez, who began a brutal dictatorship that delayed the establishment of representative democracy in the nation until 1958. Since then, and continuing to the present, relatively free elections have been held every five years.

Hugo Rafael Chávez Frías (b. 1954), the current president of Venezuela, is the leader of the Bolivarian Revolution (named after the Liberator Simón Bolívar), which promotes a political doctrine of participatory democracy, socialism, and Latin American and Caribbean cooperation. He is also a strong critic of neoliberalism, globalization, and U.S. foreign policy. A career military officer, Chávez founded the left-wing Fifth Republic movement after orchestrating a failed 1992 coup d’état against President Carlos Andrés Pérez (r. 1989–1993, under Democratic Action).

Chávez’s policies have evoked strong controversy in Venezuela and abroad, and have received everything from vehement criticism to enthusiastic support. The U.S. government under the George W. Bush administration claimed that Chávez was a threat to democracy in Latin America; however, many other governments sympathize with his ideology and welcome his bilateral trade and reciprocal aid agreements. In 2005 and 2006, Chávez was named one of Time magazine’s 100 most influential people.

The Roman Catholic Church Catholicism was introduced to Venezuela by Franciscans and Dominicans in 1513. They created some of the first cocoa plantations and also taught the Amerindians the arts of domestic husbandry. The Jesuits operated within the vast savannas of the Orinoco River basin from 1628 until their expulsion in 1767. The Capuchins arrived in 1658 and over the next century spread out in the region around Caracas, where many of the settlements were founded by them.

The Diocese of Santa Ana de Coro was founded in Venezuela in 1531, which was transferred to the City of Santiago de León de Caracas and became the Diocese of Caracas in 1637; in November 1803 this diocese became the Archdiocese of Caracas, Santiago de Venezuela.

By 1662, the Catholic authorities had established five official zones for evangelization of the Amerindians: Llanos de Caracas, from the mouth of the Tuy River to Lake Maracaibo; Alto Orinoco Río Negro; Guyana, in the extreme eastern part of Venezuela; Trinidad; and Maracaibo. In 1734, the territory of Alto Orinoco was divided among the Capuchins, Franciscans, and Jesuits. Venezuela’s independence from Spain was a disaster for the church, which had identified with the Spanish colonial leadership. The church suffered a great loss of property and mission stations during the drawn-out War of Independence.

Conflicts between the church and civil authorities occurred in the earliest period of the republic’s existence. The first of these arose out of the refusal of the archbishop of Caracas to swear allegiance to the 1830 Constitution. This refusal, based on the absence of any explicit recognition of Catholicism as the state religion, resulted in the exile of the archbishop along with four bishops. Their exile lasted 16 months, after which the clerics (with the exception of the archbishop, who died in November 1831) returned in April 1832 upon reaching an understanding with the government.

Catholic church on Isla Margarita in Venezuela. Ninety-six percent of Venezuela's population is Roman Catholic. (iStockPhoto.com)

During the 1870s, President Antonio Guzmán Blanco poured out his wrath on the whole church and its more prized institutions, in an attempt to destroy the influence of the clergy and their criticism of his despotism. He expelled the last religious communities of nuns left in Venezuela and suppressed the seminaries, despoiling them of their possessions and destroying the budding revival of religious education in the country. He also destroyed churches, took possession of church-owned buildings, abolished revenues for the church, secularized the cemeteries, and defamed the clergy.

Finally, Guzmán decreed the total suppression of convents in the country and prohibited their future restoration. His attempt to establish a national church independent of the Vatican, however, was not popular among the Venezuelan citizens and he was forced to show some restraint. Nonetheless, during Guzmán's administration, civil marriage took precedence over the religious ceremony, the law being a constant source of demoralization among the Catholic faithful.

Guzmán's fall created a general reaction among the populace in favor of the church, which brought certain advantages for the clergy and for the advancement of the church. In 1886, the government itself invited the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph of Tarbes to provide needed services in the nation's hospitals. Later the Sisters of Charity were able to establish educational and charitable centers in many cities, where they were joined by another congregation of Sisters of Charity, those of Saint Anne (Spanish). Other female religious orders were established to provide charitable work and catechistic instruction: the Little Sisters of the Poor of Maiquetia, the Servants of the Most Holy Sacrament, and the Franciscan Sisters.

In 1891, the government invited the Capuchin monks to work among the Amerindians in the Orinoco River basin, and they were allowed to establish residences in Caracas and Maracaibo. In 1894, the Salesians arrived and dedicated their efforts to the education of youth. The Augustinian Recollects arrived in 1899 to begin parochial work in the Archdiocese of Caracas and the dioceses of Guyana and Zulia. In 1903, also at the invitation of the government, the Sons of Mary Immaculate (French fathers) established themselves in Caracas, where they founded a college and provided needed assistance to the secular clergy. That same year, the Dominican fathers were allowed by the government to take possession of the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in Caracas, and later engaged in teaching at the seminary of Caracas.

In 1910, the Archdiocese of Caracas administered 82 parishes, in addition to 22 affiliated churches and private chapels; it also operated 2 seminaries for training the local priesthood. At that time, there were only a total of 35 male religious and 242 sisters. The archbishop of Caracas, Monsignor Juan Bautista Castro, founded the Congregation of Servants of the Most Holy Sacrament in Caracas in 1911.

The Catholic Church adopted a conservative theological and social stance throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, and it had great difficulty in recruiting national priests and religious workers. For example, in 1969, only 19 percent of religious priests and 43 percent of female religious were native Venezuelans. Seventy-nine percent of the resident priests were born outside of Latin America and 2 percent were born in other Latin American countries. Forty-one percent of the resident nuns were born outside of Latin America and 16 percent were born in other Latin American countries.

During the 1960s and following years, diverse tensions and conflicts arose within the Venezuelan Catholic Church, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the General Conference of Latin American Bishops in Medellín in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal.

These new movements polarized Catholic bishops, parish priests, religious workers, and the laity into various factions: traditionalists, who wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (late 1960s); reformers, who supported the church’s modern stance; progressives, who sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Venezuelan society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means; radicals, who adopted Liberation Theology, based on Marxist ideology, and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the oligarchy and creating a socialist state that would serve the marginalized masses; and charismatic agents (priests, nuns, and lay members), who sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”).

Since the mid-1960s, the Venezuelan Catholic Church—influenced greatly by papal calls for a re-focus of attention on the needs of the urban poor—has directed significant resources toward assisting the lower classes and empowering the laity in the local parishes.

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) in Venezuela traces its origin to 1973, when the first Charismatic Conference was held at the Salesian retreat center in Los Teques, Miranda state, not far from downtown Caracas. Thereafter, the CCR became established and prospered in many locations throughout the country. In 1988, the CCR National Coordination Office was relocated from Maracaibo to Barquisimeto. In October of that year, 28 priests, 13 laypersons, and 5 bishops from Venezuela participated in the international Catholic Charismatic Renewal Conference held in Monterrey, Mexico. Leading this delegation were Monsignor Tulio Manuel Chirivella and Monsignor Carmen de Rúa, the national CCR advisor and the national CCR coordinator, respectively, in Venezuela. In April 1989, the National Day of Prayer was celebrated in Valencia, Carabobo state, with the participation of 10,000 people, under the leadership of a team of Catholic charismatic priests and nuns.

In the mid-1970s, the principal male religious orders in Venezuela were Augustinians, Benedictines, Capuchins, Claretins, Dominicans, Eudistas, French PP, Jesuits, Passionists, Paulists, Redemptorists, Salesians, Salle Brothers, Marists, and Brothers of Saint John of God. Female religious orders founded in Venezuela include Hermanitas de los Pobres, Franciscanas, Siervas del Santísimo Sacramento, Lourdistas, Agustinas, Dominicans, and Carmelitas.

In 1995, Monsignor Ignacio Antonio Velasco García (b. 1929) was appointed the archbishop of Caracas by Pope John Paul II. The current archbishop of Caracas (Santiago de Venezuela) is Cardinal Jorge Urosa Savino (appointed in 2005). The Venezuelan Episcopal Conference (CEV), composed of the nation’s archbishops, bishops, and auxiliary personnel who meet periodically to manage church affairs, was first created in 1973.

The current CEV president is Monsignor Ubaldo Ramón Santana Sequera, the archbishop of Maracaibo. Presently, there are nine archdioceses in Venezuela: Barquisimeto, Caracas, Calabozo, Ciudad Bolívar, Coro, Cumaná, Maracaibo, Mérida, and Valencia. The Venezuelan Catholic Church administers 36 dioceses (including 4 Apostolic Vicariates) with a total of 1,256 parishes. In 2004, these jurisdictions were served by 1,493 diocesan and 1,064 religious priests (a total of 2,557) and assisted by 138 permanent deacons, 1,628 religious brothers, and 3,775 religious sisters.

Overall, there has been a decline in the number of priests and religious workers providing pastoral care and support services, which has weakened the church’s ability to retain adherents in Venezuela since the mid-1970s. For example, the Archdiocese of Caracas reported the following statistics in 2006: 140 diocesan and 419 religious priests (down from 160 and 600, respectively, in 1976), 730 religious brothers (down from 757 in 1976), and 1,332 religious sisters (down from 1,500 in 1976).

The Protestant Movement Agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) were the first to attempt the introduction of Protestantism into Venezuela, but as with the rest of South America, there was a gap of more than a half-century between their first arrival (1819) and the entrance of permanent Protestant missionaries (1883). In the meantime, the Church of England established a chaplaincy to serve British nationals, beginning in 1832. That work, never large, would eventually be attached to the Church of the Province of the West Indies. In 1976, it became an independent diocese and then became affiliated with the Episcopal Church.

The first Lutheran pastor arrived in 1865 to minister among German and English expatriates, and a Protestant Council was formed in 1870 among foreign residents. In 1878, Messiah Methodist Church was established in Caracas, which later became affiliated with the Presbyterians. In 1886, American Bible Society agent Francisco Penzotti (an Italian Uruguayan) arrived in Caracas and established local depots for Bible distribution throughout the country.

Missionary work was begun in 1889 by representatives of the British and Canadian “Open Brethren” branches of the Christian Brethren. During the 1890s, several other Protestant missionaries arrived: the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1890), the Evangelical German Lutheran Church (1893), the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (1897), the Hebron Institute and Missionary Association (1897), the Swedish Evangelical Free Church (1898), and the Evangelical Mission of South America (1899, which established a national church body, known as Asociación de Iglesias Evangélicas Libres de Venezuela [ADIEL]).

During the early 20th century (1900–1939), at least a dozen additional mission agencies arrived from Europe and North America: the Scandinavian Alliance Mission (1906, later renamed The Evangelical Alliance Mission [TEAM]); the first Pentecostal missionaries (1910, who later affiliated with the Assemblies of God in the U.S.A.); the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1910); the Orinoco River Mission (1915, which established a national church body, known as Asociación de Iglesias Evangélicas del Oriente [ASIGEO]); Bethel Pentecostal Assembly (1919); independent Pentecostal missionaries began church work in Barquisimeto (1919, which became part of the United World Mission in 1947); the Evangelical Free Church of North America (1920, which established Asociación de Iglesias Evangélicas Libres de Venezuela [ADIEL]); Baptist Mid-Missions (1924); independent Baptist missionaries began work in Carúpano (1926, which later became part of the Southern Baptist Convention); the Apostolic Missionary Evangelical Christian Church / Bethel Evangelical Church (1927, also known as Iglesias Nativas Venezolanas de Apure, founded by Arístides Díaz); and independent Pentecostal work in El Tocuyo (1929, which later became part of the United World Mission).

The Assemblies of God Foreign Mission board first arrived in Venezuela in 1940 and built on the pioneer work begun by Mr. and Mrs. Gottfried F. Bender and Hilda Meyrick in Barquisimeto (1910). The Reverend Irvin Olson founded a central church in Caracas that became known as the mother church of this denomination in Venezuela. However, a major schism occurred in 1957 that led to the founding of the Venezuela Evangelical Pentecostal Association, which also has become a large denomination. In addition, during the 1950s, the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel and the United Pentecostal Church International arrived and developed very successful missionary efforts. Pentecostalism has given birth to a host of national church bodies. By decades, the minimum number of Protestant denominations, national church associations and service agencies founded since 1940 were the following: 1940s (5), 1950s (15), 1960s (5), 1970s (8), 1980s (11), and 1990s (7).

In 1965, the total Protestant membership nationally was only 47,000 and, up to this time, the accumulative growth of the Protestant community was not very impressive. A generation later, in 2000, sociologist Timothy Steigenga estimated that the Protestant population of Venezuela was somewhere between 7 and 10 percent.

In 2005, the largest Protestant denominations were estimated to be the following: the Seventh-day Adventist Church (235 churches with 63,100 members), the International Trinitarian Light of the World Pentecostal Church (480 churches with 56,900 members), The Evangelical Alliance Mission-related churches (900 churches with 29,200 members), the Assemblies of God (315 churches with 25,200 members), the Southern Baptist Convention (245 churches with 20,800 members), the United Pentecostal Church (240 churches with 19,300 members), Ebenezer Pentecostal Churches (100 churches with 12,000 members), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (60 churches with 7,250 members), and Bethel Evangelical Church of Apure (55 churches with 5,500 members). All other denominations had fewer than 5,000 members each.

In 2009, more than 180 Protestant denominations, independent churches and service agencies were affiliated with the Evangelical Council of Venezuela (Consejo Evangélico de Venezuela [CEV]), founded in 1972, which in turn is associated with the World Evangelical Alliance. Many leaders of these associations are also members of the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA). Groups affiliated with the ecumenical Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI) include the Anglican Episcopal Church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Presbyterian Church of Venezuela, and the Venezuelan Pentecostal Evangelical Union. There are no Venezuelan-based churches that are members of the World Council of Churches, though the Latin American Council of Churches is affiliated.

Other Christian Traditions Approximately 2 percent of the population is affiliated with “other religions,” which includes the following traditions.

Eastern Orthodox and Independent Western Catholic There are two kinds of Eastern Orthodox groups in Venezuela, those in communion with the Vatican and those that are not. The latter are represented by the Greek Orthodox Church (Greece), the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad (under Bishop Alexander in Los Angeles, California), the Orthodox Church in America (also Russian Orthodox but affiliated with the Archdiocese of Moscow), the Romanian Orthodox Church (Romania), the Armenian Apostolic Church (Lebanon), the Byzantine Catholic Church (Mar Markus, Hungary), and the Orthodox Apostolic Catholic Church of Antioch (patriarch of Antioch in Damascus, Syria: Antiochian Orthodox Archdiocese of Mexico, Venezuela, and Central America–Caribbean). Those in communion with the Vatican are the Greek Melkite Apostolic Exarchate under Bishop Georges Kahhalé Zouhairaty, established in Caracas in 1990; and the Syrian Catholic Apostolic Exarchate under Bishop Iwannis Louis Awad, established in 2001 in Maracay, Aragua state. In addition, the Apostolic Orthodox Old Catholic Church (founded by Monsignor Jorge Rodriguez, Chicago, Illinois) and the Reformed Catholic Church of Venezuela (under the jurisdiction of Bishop Leonardo Marín Saavedra of Ontario, Canada), with headquarters in Ciudad Ojeda, state of Zulia, are independent churches in the Western Catholic tradition that are not in communion with the Vatican.

Additional Christian Groups These groups are considered “marginal” because each one rejects other branches of Christianity, usually claiming that their group is the only “true church.” Because each of their doctrinal statements reject certain basic tenets of the Eastern Orthodox, Western Roman, and Protestant traditions, these groups are considered outside the mainstreams of Christianity. The Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society of New York (known as Jehovah’s Witnesses) began work in Venezuela in 1936, and in 2005 reported 1,297 congregations with 98,785 members. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (known as Mormons, Salt Lake City, Utah) entered Venezuela in 1966; in 2001, this church reported 210 wards and branches with a total of 89,484 members. The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (also known as Strong Prayer to the Holy Spirit—Stop Suffering!), in 2004, reported 81 worship centers in Venezuela.

Also, the following organizations are reported to have work in Venezuela: The Children of God (now called The Family International, headquartered in Florida), the Light of the World Church (Guadalajara, Mexico), Mita Congregation (Puerto Rico), The Voice of the Cornerstone (Puerto Rico), Growing in Grace International Ministries (Miami, Florida), the Philadelphia Church of God (Oklahoma), and the Church of Christ, Scientist (Boston, Massachusetts).

Additional Religious Traditions Immigration since World War II not only increased the spectrum of Christianity in Venezuela, but also brought many of the world's religions as part of the immigrants' cultural heritage.

Buddhism Chinese immigrants first introduced Buddhism into Venezuela, although a large portion of the Chinese community is Roman Catholic. Later, Westernized Buddhist groups were founded, including International Zen Association (with headquarters in Paris, France) and Friends of Western Buddhism (FWBO, London); as well as Asian Buddhist groups: Soka Gakkai International (Japan), Soto Zen School (Japan), and Karma Thegsum Choling—Diamond Way (Tibet).

Hinduism A few Hindu-origin groups exist in Venezuela, including the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON, Florida), Swami Sivananda School of Yoga (affiliated with the Divine Life Society), Sri Chaitanya Saraswat Mandal (India), Sri Rupanuga Sridhar Ashram (India), International Sri Sathya Sai Baba (India), Transcendental Meditation, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace (Lebanon), Gaudiya Vaishnava Society (California), and Grace Essence Fellowship (United States).

Sant Mat Sant Mat includes the Divine Light Mission now known as Elan Vital (India) and the Movement for Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA, California).

Islam There are approximately 125,000 Muslims in Venezuela today, predominantly citizens of Lebanese, Syrian, and Palestinian descent, who mainly reside in Nueva Esparta state, Margarita Island, and the Caracas metropolitan area. The Al-Ibrahim mosque in Caracas is reportedly the largest in Latin America. It was constructed with funds from the Ibrahim bin Abdul Aziz Al-Ibrahim Foundation under the planning of world-renowned architect Oscar Bracho.

Other notable mosques and Islamic organizations include Isla Margarita-Caribe La Comunidad Islámica Venezolana, Centro Islámico de Venezuela, Mezquita al-Rauda in Maracaibo, Asociación Honorable Mezquita de Jerusalén in Valencia, Centro Islámico de Maiquetía in Vargas, and Asociación Benéfica Islámica in Bolívar.

Baha'i Faith In January 1953, the Baha'i community of Caracas began with 17 adults in Caracas, plus a few more believers in the interior of the country. During the period 1960–1961 three other Local Assemblies were formed (Sucre district de Caracas, Maracay, and Barquisimeto), which made possible the election of the First National Spiritual Assembly in Venezuela, in April 1961. During the period 1963–1964 many Amerindians joined the Baha'i community, which reported 1,218 Baha'is in 1965, of which 1,001 were members of Indigenous tribes. In 2000, there existed a National Baha'i Institute, a Moral Education Institute, a strong and growing youth movement, a solid and stable community of believers (more than 20,000), an Office of Foreign Affairs dedicated to the peace process, and 90 Local Assemblies.

Judaism Currently, more than 35,000 Jews live in Venezuela, with more than half in the Caracas metropolitan area. The majority of Jews are members of the middle and upper classes, which are divided almost equally between Ashkenazim and Sephardim. Most of the country's 16 synagogues are Orthodox: The Israelite Union of Caracas represents the Ashkenazi tradition and the Israelite Association of Venezuela represents the Sephardic tradition. There is one Conservative synagogue (Congregation Shalom, founded in 1990) and one Messianic synagogue (Bet El Shadai Congregation).

Animists—Native Americans or Amerindians According to the 2000 Venezuelan national census, there were 511,784 Amerindians (about 2 percent of the total population), mainly concentrated in the states of Amazonas (61.4 percent), Delta Amacuro (26.6 percent), and Zulia (10.6 percent). About 84 percent spoke Native indigenous languages and less than 50 percent also spoke Spanish. The major linguistic groups are Arawakan, Caribe, and independent (without any known linguistic affiliation to other groups). Although many of the Amerindians are nominal Roman Catholics and practice "popular Catholicism," most are also practitioners of Native American Spirituality (animism).

Animists—Afro-Americans Present among, but not limited to, Afro-Venezuelans are a variety of animistic groups that combine African-derived belief systems with Roman Catholicism in the Latin American and Caribbean regions: Umbanda, Quimbanda, Santería, the Maria Lionza cult, and Myalism-Obeah. The Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza is a relatively new religion (since the 15th century) that draws on elements of Native Amerindian religion, African beliefs and practices, and Roman Catholicism.

Animists—Latin American Popular Religiosity (influenced by Roman Catholicism) All Latin American countries, including Venezuela, have a variety of Virgin Mary and Christ Child cults that emerged as Roman Catholicism blended with existing Amerindian and African-derived belief systems to form a syncretistic “popular religiosity.” Examples of these are the Cult of Our Lady of Coromoto, the Cult of the Virgin Mary of the Mystical Rose, and the Cult of the Nino Jesús in Capaya, Barlovento, Miranda state.

Western Esoteric-Occult Orders Present in Venezuela today are various groups that represent the traditional magic of ancient Western Europe that came to Latin America as part of the Spanish Conquest in the form of witchcraft (magicians, diviners, healers, witches, and shamans), as well as groups that represent the ritual or ceremonial magic tradition: the Traditional Martinista Order (France), the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (England and France), Freemasonry (Scottish and French rites: Grand Lodge of the Republic of Venezuela and R.L. La Esperanza No. 7, founded in the 1850s), the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC, United States), and the Ancient Rosicrucian Fraternity (Germany).

The neo-Pagan tradition is represented by Wicca, and the Satanist tradition by various secret societies that worship the biblical Lucifer. In 2007, the civil authorities reported that “practitioners of black magic cults” were stealing bones from the local cemeteries for use in Satanic and Santeria rituals, although the babalaos (Santeria priests) denied they use witchcraft (“black magic”) and human bones in their rituals; rather, their ceremonies utilize “white magic” to cure sickness and help believers resolve personal and family problems and attain success in school and on the job.

Other occult orders (founded in Latin America) present in Venezuela are the Grand Universal Fraternity (known as GFU, founded in Venezuela in 1948 by Serge Justinien Raynaud, known internationally as “Dr. Serge Raynaud de la Ferrière,” Ashram No. 1, El Limón, Maracay, State of Aragua) and Red-GFU (Venezuela, 1971, by José Manuel Estrada), the Christian Gnostic movement (various groups inspired by the writings and teaching of Víctor Manuel Gómez Rodríguez, known as “Grand Master Samael Aun Weor,” of Colombia), and the New Acropolis Cultural Association (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1957).

Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age Traditions The Psychic-Spiritualist Family is represented by the following: Spiritual Magnetic School of the Universal Commune (founded by Joaquín Trincado Mateo); the CIMA Movement of Spiritist Culture (Movimiento de Cultura Espírita [CIMA]) was founded in 1958 by David Grossvater (1911–1974) as Centro de Investigaciones Metapsíquicas y Afines (CIMA) in the city of Maracay, State of Aragua (affiliated with the Confederación Espírita Panamericana-CEPA, founded in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1946); and the Grand Cacique Murachi Portal Spiritual Center. Also present is The Theosophical Society (United States); the IAM—Ascended Master-related Sol Ray movement/St. Germain Grand Fraternity (founded in Venezuela by Connie Méndez in 1945); and the New Thought Development Foundation (Puerto Rico, 1987). The UFO Family is represented by the Raelian movement (founded in 1973 in France by Claude Vorilhon, known as Rael). The New Age Family includes the following groups: the Church of Scientology, or Dianetics (United States), Universal Life—The Inner Religion (Germany), the Unification Church of Rev. Moon (Korea), the International Society of Ascension (Canada), Ishaya Techniques (Colombia), and the Silvan Method or Silva Mind Control (Texas, founded by José Silva).

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia); Assemblies of God; Augustinians; Baha'i Faith; Benedictines; Capuchins; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Dominicans; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Episcopal Church; Evangelical Free Church of America; Family International, The; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; International Zen Association; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Melkite Catholic Church; Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness; Orthodox Church in America; Philadelphia Church of God; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; Salesians; Santeria; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Soka Gakkai International; Soto Zen Buddhism; Southern Baptist Convention; Spiritism; Unification Movement; United Pentecostal Church International; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Wiccan Religion; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Ayerra, Jacinto. Los Protestantes en Venezuela: quiénes son, qué hacen. Caracas: Ediciones Tripode, 1980.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Brierly, Peter. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Burgess, Stanley M., ed. "Venezuela." In the International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2001–2002.
- Catholic Hierarchy website at: <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/sc1.html>
- <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/diocese/dcsdv.html>
- Herring, Hubert, and Helen Baldwin Herring. A History of Latin America, from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Venezuela: 1819–1995." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ven/ven-chron.pdf>.
- Holland, Clifton L. Directory of Religious Groups in Venezuela, 2006. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ven/ven-dir2006.pdf>.
- Kraul, Chris. "Not even the dead are safe in Caracas: A ghoulish crime wave in Venezuela supplies a black magic cult stoked by faith and politics." Los Angeles Times (September 5, 2007). <http://articles.latimes.com/2007/sep/05/world/fg-blackmagic5>.
- Lewis, M. Paul, ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 16th ed. Dallas, TX: SIL International, 2009. <http://www.ethnologue.com/>.
- Navarro, Nicolás. "Venezuela." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 4. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1912. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/15327a.htm>.
- Orozco, José. "Latin America: Evangelical Christianity moves the masses—A report from Venezuela." ReligionScope (December 8, 2004). http://www.religion.info/english/articles/article_121.shtml
- PROLADES-RITA database. "Religion and Ethnic Diversity in Venezuela." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ven/ven-rd.htm>.
- Secretariado General de la CLAR. Estudio sociográfico de los religiosos y las religiosas en América Latina. Bogota, Colombia: Secretariado General de la CLAR (Confederación Latinoamericana de Religiosos), 1971.
- Steigenga, Timothy, and David Smilde. "Contradiction Without Paradox: Evangelical Political Culture in the 1998 Venezuela Elections." Latin American Politics & Society 46, no. 1 (2004): 75–102.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report, 2008: Venezuela. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108543.htm>.

Weber, Linda J., and Dotsy Welliver, eds. Mission Handbook of U.S. and Canadian Christian Ministries Overseas (2007–2009). Wheaton, IL: Evangelism and Missions Information Service, 2007.

Vernal Equinox

See Spring Equinox.

■ Vietnam

Vietnam, a Southeast Asian country, shares borders with China, Laos, and Cambodia, while its long coastline touches the Gulf of Thailand, the Gulf of Tonkin, and the South China Sea. It includes 127,244 square miles of territory in which its 86,968,000 citizens reside.

At first sight Vietnam seems to be a manifestation of the synthesis of the tam giao, or three great teachings—Buddhism, Confucianism, and Daoism—that one finds in China, but Vietnam has also been open to the religious concepts of its Southeast Asian neighbors; consequently the influence of Indian and, more recently, Islamic world conceptions has also had an effect. Most recent of all, decades of French colonialism, and the American presence in the south, have made Vietnam a crucible where East and West have been forced to meet. Nevertheless, the prevailing characteristics and attitudes of the Vietnamese people have remained the backbone onto which foreign religious ideas have been grafted. Certainly during the 20th century the nation continued to respond in its own unique way to the challenge of foreign influence. Thus the Worshippers in a temple of Cao Dai in south Vietnam. (Valery Shanin/Dreamstime.com)

VIETNAM

Vietnam

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Buddhists	26,404,000	44,383,000	48.9	1.45	49,827,000	54,099,000
Agnostics	4,200,000	11,500,000	12.7	1.19	14,400,000	17,000,000
New religionists	4,500,000	10,040,000	11.1	1.45	11,800,000	13,300,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,960,000	9,380,000	10.3	1.52	11,000,000	12,400,000
Christians	3,264,000	7,796,000	8.6	1.87	10,574,000	13,571,000
Roman Catholics	2,899,000	6,250,000	6.9	1.73	8,500,000	11,000,000
Protestants	161,000	1,150,000	1.3	2.12	1,550,000	1,950,000
Independents	37,700	615,000	0.7	3.04	770,000	900,000
Atheists	1,080,000	6,240,000	6.9	1.45	7,000,000	7,600,000
Chinese folk	900,000	890,000	1.0	1.46	1,000,000	1,100,000
Baha'is	200,000	400,000	0.4	1.45	500,000	600,000
Muslims	390,000	160,000	0.2	1.46	180,000	200,000
Hindus	0	55,600	0.1	1.46	75,000	100,000
Shintoists	0	200	0.0	1.47	400	700
Daoists	0	170	0.0	1.47	300	500
Total population	42,898,000	90,845,000	100.0	1.46	106,357,000	119,971,000

Vietnamese characteristics of accommodation and development are strongly reflected in the rise of a number of new religious movements that developed in this period.

The origin of the Vietnamese people is explained in a now famous myth attributed to the pre-occupation Hung kings (although the earliest source for this myth is dated to the 14th century CE). This “original” dynasty attributed their ancestry to a primordial sea-dragon, Lac Long Quan. He swam into the rivers of Vietnam, subduing demonic forces as he went. He brought wet-rice cultivation and married the earth-goddess Au Co. From this union 100 children were born from eggs, half of which returned to the sea, the other half remaining on the land to become Vietnam’s first rulers. This myth underlines a conceptualization of the natural world as a realm inhabited by spirits associated with prominent features of the landscape and other awe-inspiring phenomena. Much the same way that kami inhabit the Shinto conceptualization of the land in Japan (one example being the Great King of Mount Tan-vien. Tan-vien was also the first of the Hung kings).

Tracing the religious life of Vietnam before Chinese occupation is a dangerous job, as writing technology came late to the area. Certainly ancestor worship was an ever-present religious phenomenon. The Chinese, who occupied the nascent nation, invaded in 111 BCE and were not fully repelled until the late 10th century CE. It would seem that this 1,000-year occupation saw the adaptation of the Chinese social (and religious) model in Vietnam, but this is not necessarily the full story. It was during this period that the cult of national heroes began to develop. Foremost among these heroes, fighting for nghia, or national justice, against rapacious northern overlords, were the Trung sisters, who led a revolt against the Chinese in the first century CE.

Pre-Common Era Buddhist-designed pots (some possibly as early as the second century BCE) suggest that Vietnam was a vital route for the spread of Buddhism into China. Luy Lau, established around the second century CE, at the center of China’s Giao Chi Province, near present-day Hanoi, was a significant center for the early dissemination of Buddhism. At Luy Lau Buddhist texts and deities were translated into accessible local conceptualizations. It was here that the early Buddhist scholar Mau Tu wrote a Buddhist treatise known in Vietnam as “Ly Hoac Luan.”

According to one Vietnamese hagiographical source, the “Thien Uyen Tap Anh,” in 580 BCE an Indian monk named Vinitaruci arrived in Giao Chau to preach Mahayana Buddhism. What is true is that from a very early stage Buddhism became subject to a process of domestication in Vietnam that helped its inclusion into the prevailing Sino-Vietnamese social model. One example is the translation of Buddhist personalities into deities who were understood to possess power over the climate. Other Buddhas possessed the sort of magical powers that local deities were thought to have. Over these early centuries Buddhism began to coalesce into a sophisticated religio-philosophical system, with a number of schools being established by Vietnamese and Chinese monks.

When Chinese occupation was brought to an end in 949 CE, Buddhist advisors were intimately involved in the establishment of the Vietnamese court, which, like China's, had at its center a king (vu'o'ng) who held a similar place to the Son of Heaven. Prominent monks were given the honorific title of Quoc Su, or Tutor of the State, and worked closely with the court. In this way Buddhism of the Mahayana strain was forever linked with Vietnamese nationalism, and many kings of the following dynasties were intimately associated with the Buddhist cause.

During the Ly (1010–1225) and Tran (1225–1400) dynasties, Thien Buddhism, known as Chan in China and Zen in Japan, became a sort of official ideology in the country now referred to as Dai Viet, or Great Viet. King Tran Thai Tong (1218–1277) composed a Buddhist treatise, the “Khoa Hu Luc,” or “Discourse on Emptiness.” Notably, in 1299 King Tran Nhan Tong (1258–1308) retired and became a Buddhist monk. He launched a local school of Thien, known as Truc Lam, or Bamboo Forest. Today, Buddhism remains the major tradition of this nation of 80-odd million.

The rise of the Le dynasty (1428–1788) led to the increasing influence of Confucian scholars at court. It has been argued by Taylor that to maintain independence, Vietnam adapted the Chinese social model more completely after independence in order to demonstrate to China the civility of the Vietnamese people. The adaptation of Chinese concepts reached its apotheosis at the start of the Nguyen dynasty (1802–1945), when the court adopted Confucian-based Ming dynasty law codes.

In the meantime, Daoism largely remained a marginal part of Vietnam's tam giao tradition, disseminated in popular novels from the Ming dynasty on, and since Chinese occupation an ongoing but shadowy philosophical influence. It was never fully institutionalized in major monasteries and temples as it was in China.

From independence the nation, which had until then been based around the Red River delta, began its southward movement, or Nam Tien, along the eastern part of the Indochinese peninsula, conquering and displacing the more Indianized Cham peoples as they went. These peoples were strongly influenced by Theravadan strains of Buddhism and Hindu ideas, which maintained an on-going influence in the south despite the eventual subjugation of the Cham. As Europeans began to appear in the 16th century, Vietnam, already too big to administer from Hanoi, started to bifurcate. Jesuit Alexandre de Rhodes (1591–1660) Romanized the Vietnamese language, undercutting the grip on communication held by Confucian-trained scholars and further undermining the state. The nation was reunified only in 1802 under the last dynasty, the Nguyen. The new national government, based in Hue, quickly became unsettled by the continued growth of Catholicism. Introduced firstly by the Portuguese and then the French, the tensions created between missionaries and nationalists proved a very convenient cause that eventually allowed Napoleon III to add Vietnam to the Second Empire. Continued European religious influence has resulted in Vietnam possessing the largest Catholic community in Southeast Asia outside of the Philippines.

The French also brought a number of Esoteric traditions with them, including Freemasonry and Theosophy, and in particular a vogue for séance and Spiritism which, when linked with the traditional practices of Chinese-style divination, gave rise in 1926 to the syncretic faith of Caodaism. It was also during the Nguyen dynasty that Buddhism, increasingly controlled by the court throughout the later dynasties, continued its general decline. It was revived only in certain millenarian forms such as the Buu Son Ky Huong movement of the 1850s. This brand of Buddhism eventually gave rise to the often militant and puritanical Hoa Hao Buddhism from 1939.

In response to the mistreatment of non-Catholics by the Ngo Dinh Diem regime (1954–1963) mainstream Buddhism underwent a remarkable resurgence and the Unified Buddhist Church brought together many Buddhist groups of both Mahayana and Theravada strains. The monk Thich Nhat Hanh began his campaign to promote “Engaged Buddhism,” a form of the religion more closely connected to social justice issues. After 1975, when Communist forces overran the South, there was a systematic attempt to control religious activity by Communist authorities. This included the establishment of “management committees” designed to ally all religious activity to the direction of the state. A great number of religiously minded Vietnamese were interned in “education camps” for months, sometimes years. Both the actuality and the threat of persecution led many to flee the nation. Today these Vietnamese comprise a diaspora that has taken their various religious traditions around the world.

Although international reports on religious freedom in Vietnam continue to express concern since the government’s policy of “Doi Moi” began in 1986, there has been a significant increase in religious activity, from ancestor worship to informal séances with child and female mediums. There has also been a new awareness of the heritage of Cham peoples and other indigenous movements in their contribution to the spiritual life of the nation.

The main characteristics of the religious life of Vietnam have been of accommodation and adaptability. Many have referred to Vietnam as a crossroad of various socio-religious influences; however, we must be wary of ignoring the legacy that the Vietnamese themselves have made to internal religious developments which, after the events of 1975, are having an increasing influence on the world.

Christopher H. Hartney

See also: Ancestors; Caodaism; Hoa Hao Buddhism; Mahayana Buddhism; Shinto; Theravada Buddhism; Unified Buddhist Church.

References

- Cadière, Leopold. Croyances et pratiques religieuses des Vietnamiens. 3 vols. Hanoi: Publications de l’Ecole Française d’Extreme-Orient, 1955, 1957.
- Giap, Tran Van. Le Bouddhisme en Annam des origines au XIIIème siècle, 1932.
- Taylor, Keith Weller. The Birth of Vietnam. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

Taylor, Philip, ed. Modernity and Re-enchantment: Religion in Post-revolutionary Vietnam. Singapore: Institute of South Asian Studies, 2007.

Violence, Religious

The events of 9/11 shocked many because it was impossible to deny that religion seemed to be at the heart of this attack. Many have assumed that religion is about peace, but they were awakened on September 11, 2001, to the sight of people throwing themselves off burning towers that, only minutes later, toppled to the ground. For some, the hope that religion is only about peace was extinguished in those flames, but the question remains: does religion cause violence? In what ways is religion related to violence? Early French, English, and German thinkers of the Enlightenment portrayed religion as a form of superstition, and indeed the reason for the destruction of a third of the European population in the 16th century. David Hume (1711–1776) was convinced that religion did damage to the human character, and many European intellectuals in the 19th century called for its replacement. Marx called religion an opiate of the people, which kept them in chains. In the 20th century theorists of religion became more sanguine about religion—thinking of it as a form of the sacred (Mircea Eliade), or of meaning (Clifford Geertz), or a term of exchange with the gods (Rodney Stark), or a moral orientation to life (Christian Smith), or an ever-evolving organism with multiple socio-cultural dimensions (Ninian Smart). And while there is no generally accepted definition of religion, scholars have recently begun to conjecture about whether or not religion is the cause of violence.

Recent Explanations of Religious Violence Hector Avalos’s Fighting Words: The Origins of Religious Violence (2005) does a comprehensive job of outlining the traditional explanations of religious violence. We will not review all of these here because Avalos’s own hypothesis for religious violence is worth examining more specifically since it tends to give the best illustration of how some important contemporary thinkers explain religious violence: (1) Most violence is due to scarce resources, real or perceived. Whenever people perceive that there is not enough of something they value, conflict may ensue to maintain or acquire that resource. This can range from love in a family, to oil, on a global scale. (2) When religion causes violence, it often does so because it has created new scarce resources.

Fires still burn amid the rubble and debris of the World Trade Center in New York City in the area known as Ground Zero, two days after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. (U.S. Department of Defense)

Avalos follows recent economic and socio-biological explanations in proposing that social reality is, at its base, a conflict over scarce resources. When resources are plenty and fair distribution occurs, tensions decrease; when resources are scarce or distribution is unfair, conflicts arise and violence ensues. For the sociobiologist Richard Dawkins, religion is a cultural maladaptation; in other words, rather than benefiting the survival of genes, it leads to their extinction (Dawkins 1976). At one point in our history, religion may have increased our rates of survival, but in the modern world, religion seems to lead to our destruction. Avalos is sympathetic to this perspective but moves his explanation toward the economic model. Most fundamentally, humans are resource managers and the lack thereof produces conflict and, frequently, violence.

For Avalos, religion becomes particularly problematic because religion has “created” a scarce resource. In other words the “goods” of religion, its resources, are manufactured. Whether the good is a miracle, eternal life, mystical experience, healing, or communion with force, power, or god, all of these resources are ephemeral, non-empirical, and, thus, non-existent. What is clearly most troubling for Avalos is that religions not only create resources but make them scarce to control individuals and groups, which by definition creates conflict: “If any acts of violence caused by actual scarcities are judged as immoral, then acts of violence caused by resources that are not actually scarce should be judged as even more immoral . . . any act of violence predicated on the acquisition or loss of nonexistent entity is always immoral and needless because bodily well-being or life is being traded for a nonexistent gain” (Avalos 2005, 29).

For Avalos, religion is, by definition, trafficking in nonexistent resources. Religion is, thus, a morbid fantasy to say the least, or at most, a useless waste of time. He claims that religions are “prone” to violence; some have a greater capacity for it than other cultural forms. Religions use various forms of manipulation of nonexistent goods to maneuver believers, including access to the divine will, claims to sacred space, group privileging, and, finally, exclusivist soteriology (study in matters of salvation). In other words, religions use a kind of shell game that keeps people believing that god(s), spirit(s), and forces will show them how to live, give them a place of their own, set them apart as special, and promise them rewards that no one else can gain.

But is it a plausible explanation? Avalos makes a clear argument that scarcity in general tends to create tension and violence within and between humans. In agreement, it seems that religions create symbolic and social boundaries that engender individual and group identity and, in doing so, act both to include and to exclude. Religions’ “extra reasons,” according to Steve Bruce, are powerful markers of identity that shape behavior, promise rewards, and mobilize social action. These extra reasons correlate to Bruce Lincoln’s shorthand theory of religion—that religions make “exceptional claims” that mark common demands with a divine self-evidence.

So far, so good, but don’t many cultural processes create boundaries that both include and exclude? It would seem that, yes, other cultural variables, such as class, race, and nationalism, establish similar boundaries and create scarce resources, but in fact, we would not say that any one of these mechanisms is a unique cause of violence. Perhaps the most reasonable perspective is to argue that all cultural elements can be used for good and ill, some to create identity and a flourishing human community and some to tear down humanity, to dehumanize the other for the sake of one’s own sense of well-being. Religion is not unique in this pattern.

The Causes of Religious Violence Yet, it is still worth asking: what is it about religion that, in fact, causes some to do damage to others in its name? A part of the answer is that religion relates to a critical feature of human nature. Human beings tend to embody and express a deep social desire for freedom and self-expression related to what they consider as ultimate. In this sense, we can define religion as a socially constructed desire and passion for the ultimate. We mean by this, an affective longing for something that is not simply a rational choice conceived of as a correct decision, but a deeply felt sense and passion for something that is a sustained preference, often developed and nurtured over years. It is social because language itself is developed in a group setting that embodies a moral order, often involving a religion that shapes preference, values, and behavior (Smith 2003). This affective social desire is often conceived of as a core sense of freedom—a deep and sustained desire for self-determination and liberty from want and oppression. In thinking about religion, one can see how religion is both an instrument of this desire and, perhaps, a facilitator of this aspiration. Like any definition, there are problems; one could argue that it is too vague, that it could include too many kinds of human activities, whether having to do with sexuality, family, sports, or nationalism, and of course, this is true. But it also makes the point that religion is a subjective and slippery intention, which, nonetheless, perseveres through time and circumstance, even as it changes in form and expression. This helps to explain both the power of religion and why it has not disappeared from the modern world.

Many scholars assumed that the process of secularization would cause religion to either disappear altogether or, at least, to sink into the inner compartments of the human heart, but, in light of 9/11, in light of the insurgent power of Christianity in Latin America and Africa and China, of Islam in the Middle East, and of Buddhism in Southeast Asia, these predictions have been revised. Religion acts as a source of deep joy, purpose, and meaning and not just in the personal lives of individuals across the globe but as a part of their political expressions. When religion becomes political, as we know it has in many places—the United States, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Sri Lanka, Israel, and the list could expand—it touches on aspects of conflict and violence that are very much a part of the human condition.

Religion creates symbolic and social boundaries. Often it creates moral binaries that are less than conducive to modern pluralism and peace between diverse groups. To some extent, the unique claims that religions make are the source of their genius and their staying power. People share an identity in these claims that bring them social solidarity, again a powerful sense of human security. But these exclusive claims create moral and cultural binaries—not only in the religions of the West but also in the religions of Asia. These binaries then form the basis of social conflict and, occasionally, of violence that are a part of all religions. At times, religion appears to be the very source of violence. Jessica Stern, in her book Terror in the Name of God (2004), interviewed a number of religious militants, many of whom had planned and committed acts of violence. During these interviews, it became clear to her that religion supported and even facilitated some of their most violent fantasies and human actions. As Stern argues: “[Religion] is terribly seductive in its ability to soothe and explain, but it is also dangerous. Converts such as the one I visited as a child (a Christian saint) make good people better, but they don’t necessarily make bad people good. They might even make bad people worse” (2004, xxvii).

In the recent edited volume, titled Belief and Bloodshed: Religion and Violence across Time and Tradition (2007), we argued that there is nothing new in religious violence. Religious groups and leaders have turned to violence throughout history and in all the major religious traditions of the world. Religion creates moral exemplars that love and forgive as well as moral disasters that seek to annihilate any in their path. Religion seems to be a knife with which deep social desires are cut, some toward the good and some, frankly, toward evil.

Despite many of the predictions that religion would disappear in modern life, religion perseveres as a potent “technology” by which humans create their personal and social identities. Religion is one way humans express a deep social desire for the ultimate that has moved some to nonviolence, in figures like Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr., and others to violence, in events such as the crusades and in the events of 9/11. What we do know is that religion has great power to mobilize and move people in both directions.

James Wellman

See also: Secularization.

References

- Avalos, Hector. Fight Words: The Origins of Religious Violence. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2005.
- Dawkins, Richard. The Selfish Gene. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- Lincoln, Bruce. Holy Terrors: Thinking about Religion after September 11. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Smith, Christian. Moral, Believing Animals: Human Personhood and Culture. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Stern, Jessica. Terror in the Name of God: Why Religious Militants Kill. New York: Harper Perennial, 2004.
- Wellman, James K., Jr., ed. Belief and Bloodshed: Religion and Violence across Time and Tradition. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2007.

Vipassana International Academy

The globally spread meditational movement of vipassana has its roots in the revival of Theravada Buddhism in the late 19th century. Reformers reinterpreted Buddhist tradition afresh, stressing rational aspects of the dhamma (Pali: Buddhist teachings). They emphasized meditation, lay participation, and texts, and underscored the possibility of reaching final liberation, nibbana (Pali) or nirvana (Sanskrit), in this life. This contrasted with traditional Buddhism, with its centrality on dhamma teachings by monks and devotional practices such as chanting Pali verses and reciting formulaic lists, intended as means for accumulating merit (Pali: punna) toward a better next life. The instructing of people, both ordained and laity, in meditational practices by monks was new and decisive, inasmuch as the practice of meditation had not traditionally constituted an option for lay Buddhists; furthermore, the tradition of meditation had been lost for centuries among the sangha (Buddhist order), at least among the village- and town-dwelling monks. In addition, since the mid-20th century, laymen have taught meditation, an activity traditionally the prerogative of monks only.

The Vipassana International Academy (VIA) constitutes an independent organization developed from one of the two most important Burmese lineages of meditational practice inaugurated by eminent Theravada monks in the early 20th century. The relevant lineage for VIA originates with Ledi Sayadaw (1846–1923) and was made widely known by his grand-disciple U Ba Khin (1899–1971), a layman and former state official (he was head of three government departments). Satya Narayan Goenka, an Indian born in Burma in 1924, a highly successful businessman, and the founder of the VIA, started meditation practice with U Ba Khin in 1955. Having received authorization to teach in 1969, Goenka settled in western India that same year, one of his aims being to “bring back” the dhamma to its land of origin.

In 1976, Goenka established the Vipassana International Academy at Dhammagiri in Igatpuri, 84 miles northeast of Mumbai (Bombay). The present-day academy is situated on a 20-hectare plot with a golden pagoda, 4 meditation halls, and 300 small meditation cells. The organization runs some 20 10-day courses a year, some of which are at times visited by as many as 500 participants. Students must adhere to a code of discipline, including the observation of so-called noble silence for the whole period, and a strict timetable starting at 4:00 a.m., with some 10 hours of meditation practice, Pali recitations, and a discourse by the teacher or a video lecture. Goenka has developed a systematic schedule of courses with introductory, advanced, and specialized levels. All other meditational practices and neighboring vipassana approaches are banned, so as to teach the “pure” dhamma.

The term “vipassana” derives from the Pali root dis, meaning “to see.” Vipassana is understood to be a way of seeing or gaining an insight into reality, as understood in Theravada terms. Goenka and other modern vipassana teachers base their teachings primarily on the canonical Satipatthana sutta (Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness) and the classic meditation manual Visuddhimagga (Path of Purification) by Buddhaghosa. Closely related to vipassana, or insight meditation, is the concept of sati, mindfulness or awareness. Vipassana is developed through the practice of sati. To generate vipassana or insight, the meditator develops mindfulness of each of the four foundations of mindfulness (body, feelings or sensations, states of mind, and the mental objects). The Satipatthana sutta prescribes specific ways to meditate on each of these four foundations, beginning with the instruction on how to develop mindfulness of the body by focusing attention on the process of breathing. Vipassana is directed toward recognizing the “three marks of existence”: in the arising and disappearing of breath, feelings, thoughts, and other objects, the meditator experiences the “truths” of impermanence (anicca), no-self (anatta), and unsatisfactoriness or suffering (dukkha). In Goenka’s courses and in his own vocabulary, as well as that of U Ba Khin, this approach has come to be called “body sweeping”—that is, the focusing of mindfulness on each part of the body, “bit by bit, part by part,” as Goenka stresses.

Attached to the VIA is the Vipassana Research Institute. It pursues studies on early Buddhist texts and has compiled the texts of the Pali canon with its commentaries on a CD-ROM (Chattha Sangayana Tipitaka), launched for free in 1997. Also in 1997, the foundation stone for a huge hall, taking the form of a 300-foot-high stupa and providing room for 10,000 people, was laid in Bombay. In 2009, Vipassana courses were being taught at some 55 Vipassana centers and numerous other localities in India and Nepal. Courses are also held in Indian prisons, with much success. Since the late 1970s, because of a growing number of non-Indian students and visits abroad by Goenka, this sweeping approach has spread to numerous Asian and Western countries, with some 50 centers globally and many places where 10-day courses are held.

Vipassana International Academy
Dhamma Giri
Igatpuri 422 403
District Nasik
Maharashtra
India
<http://www.dhamma.org>

Vipassana Meditation Centre
Dhamma Dhara
386 Colrain-Shelburne Rd.
Shelburne Falls, MA 01370
<http://www.dhara.dhamma.org>

Martin Baumann

See also: Meditation; Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Goenka, S. N. The Art of Living: Vipassana Meditation. Shelburne Falls, MA: Vipassana Meditation Center, [1980].
- Goenka, S. N. For the Benefit of Many: Talks and Answers to Questions from Vipassana Students 1983-2000. Igatpuri: Vipassana Research Institute, 2005.
- Goenka, S. N. The Gracious Flow of Dharma. Igatpuri: Vipassana Research Institute, 1994.
- Guidelines for Practicing Vipassana Meditation as Taught by S. N. Goenka and His Assistant Teachers*. Shelburne Falls, MA: Vipassana Meditation Center, n.d.
- Hart, William. The Art of Living Vipassana Meditation as Taught by S. N. Goenka. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987, 1993.
- Neubert, Frank. "Ritualdiskurs, Ritualkritik und Meditationspraxis: Das Beispiel von Vipassana nach S.N. Goenka im 'Westen.'" Numen 55 (2008): 411–439.
- Sharf, Robert H. "Buddhist Modernism and the Rhetoric of Meditative Experience." Numen 42 (1995): 228–283.

Virasaivism

Virasaivism, also known as Lingayatism, is the religious system of the Virasaivas (heroic Saivites) or Lingayatas (those who have sought refuge in the linga); it is a variety of reformed Saivite Hinduism that rejects the traditional hierarchic structure of society by a radical emphasis on the worth of the individual as opposed to the traditional prominence of the social collectives known as castes. Besides having had a revolutionizing socio-political influence, Virasaivism has been the source of inspiration for a remarkable body of religious, mainly mystical, literature from the 12th century down to the present.

Virasaivism assumed an organized form in the late 12th century CE under the leadership of Basava (Basavanna, Basavesvara), in what is today the northern part of Karnataka state in India. The community is at present roughly estimated to have approximately 12 million members. Certain characteristics set Virasaivism apart from orthodox Brahminical Hinduism, of which the most striking are the rejection of the orthodox social order with its hierarchical system of varnas and jatis (castes); the notion of valid scripture; the concept of priesthood; the equal position accorded women; and the welcoming attitude toward religious conversion.

Basava (who lived around 1160 CE and should be considered the main organizer of the movement, rather than its founder) was born in an orthodox Brahmin Saivite family and thus by birth enjoyed a certain social prestige and privileges. He rose to a ministerial position at the court of the local king and became the royal treasurer, and thereby he gained a still higher social status. However, his attitude toward his ritual status in society was affected by his disgust at what he considered a formal, mechanically ritual religiosity of his religious community that had lost most of its meaning because genuine, individually felt devotion to god, which he thought to be the basis of the religion, had largely disappeared from public practice. His own profound devotion to and humility before Siva, who is the spiritual essence of the entire cosmos, made him reject the traditional high status that he had received by birth. He rejected the sacred thread that is the traditional insignia of his high caste and declared Allama Prabhu, a senior mystic of ritually low birth, to be his personal religious teacher. Around these two persons, the Virasaiva community took shape.

In this form of Hinduism the Vedas hold no place of special authority, and the main scriptures are the Saiva agamas and, particularly, a special genre of literature written in the Kannada language known as vacanas, or "sayings." These are relatively short prose-poems of often stunning literary beauty. Basava, Allama, Akka Mahadevi, and others have written many hundreds of them.

Virasaivism began as a religious community that was open to all individuals who accepted its tenets, and many vacanas express the gratitude of converts who thus found religious fulfillment and at the same time were freed from traditional social stigmas of birth, as is characteristic of orthodox Hinduism. The ritual hold of the Brahmin castes over the laity was broken by each devotee's possessing a personal linga, or symbolic image of Siva, and thereby becoming independent of ritual specialists. Although there is a quasi-Brahminical priestly section of such specialists in the community, these people have no special authority vis-à-vis the others. Still today Virasaivism openly welcomes religious conversion, regardless of ethnic, social, or national background.

The philosophical aspect of Virasaivism is known as saktivishtadvaita, or “modified monism of energy,” a form of monism in which ultimately everything is an emanation of Siva. The spiritual goal of the adherents is to merge with God via a six-staged path, the description of which is known as shatsthalasiddhanta, “the doctrine of six stages.”

The primary strength of Virasaivism is in Karnataka state in India. Being the largest single religious community in Karnataka, the Virasaivas hold a position of considerable social, cultural, and political importance. In certain parts of the state, their social prestige is higher than that of the Brahmins, who form the traditionally highest castes in orthodox Hinduism.

In 1995, His Holiness Shri Siddharama Mahaswamiji, the head of Naganur Shri Rudraximath, founded the Central Research Library of Lingayat Studies.

Central Research Library of Lingayat Studies,
Nagnoor Shri Rudraximath, Sivabasava Nagar,
Belgaum 590 010, Karnataka,
India

Robert J. Zydenbos

References

Chekki, Dan A. Religion and Social System of the Virasaiva Community. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Glasbrenner, E.-M. “Religiöse Erfahrung im Bild. Eine religionsästhetische Betrachtung zeitgenössischer Virasaivakunst.” In Religiöse Erfahrung II. Interkulturelle Perspektiven, edited by G. Haefner. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2007.

Ramanujan, A. K. Speaking of Siva. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973.

Zvelebil, K.V. The Lord of the Meeting Rivers. Devotional Poems of Basavanna. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1984.

Zydenbos, R. J. “Virasaivism, Caste, Revolution, et cetera.” Journal of the American Oriental Society 117, no. 3 (1997).

■ Virgin Islands of the United States

The U.S. Virgin Islands are located on the northeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea east of Puerto Rico. The islands are the western part of a larger archipelago, the other half of which are British territory. The U.S. Virgin Islands include 3 main islands—St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. John—and some 50 smaller islands, mostly uninhabited, with a total land area of 134 square miles. By 2008, the population approached 110,000.

Virgin Islands of the United States

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	62,900	105,000	94.7	0.10	99,200	73,600
Protestants	22,500	40,000	36.0	0.36	39,000	29,000
Roman Catholics	18,900	29,800	26.8	0.00	28,300	20,000
Anglicans	9,700	14,400	13.0	0.28	14,000	11,000
Agnostics	600	4,000	3.6	2.12	5,500	6,000
Baha'is	300	730	0.7	0.14	850	900
Hindus	0	480	0.4	0.17	600	650
Jews	200	360	0.3	0.17	360	360
Atheists	0	200	0.2	0.10	300	400
Muslims	0	120	0.1	0.17	150	180
Total population	64,000	111,000	100.0	0.16	107,000	82,100

Historic church in Charlotte Amalie, town on St. Thomas island, U.S. Virgin Islands, 2009. (Ramunas Bruzas/Dreamstime.com)

The islands were originally settled by Carib and Arawak people, all of whom were eventually killed by the Spanish. Christopher Columbus first landed in 1493. Denmark took control of the western Virgin Islands in the 18th century. They introduced sugarcane and cotton as well as slavery. In 1917 the United States paid $25 million for the islands. The Danes had previously established a local legislature, and U.S. officials built on it to create a system of local rule. Residents have U.S. citizenship and may vote in national elections. They have turned away from moves for independence or statehood. The great majority of residents are the descendants of Africans, though almost 40 percent have come to the islands from other Caribbean isles.

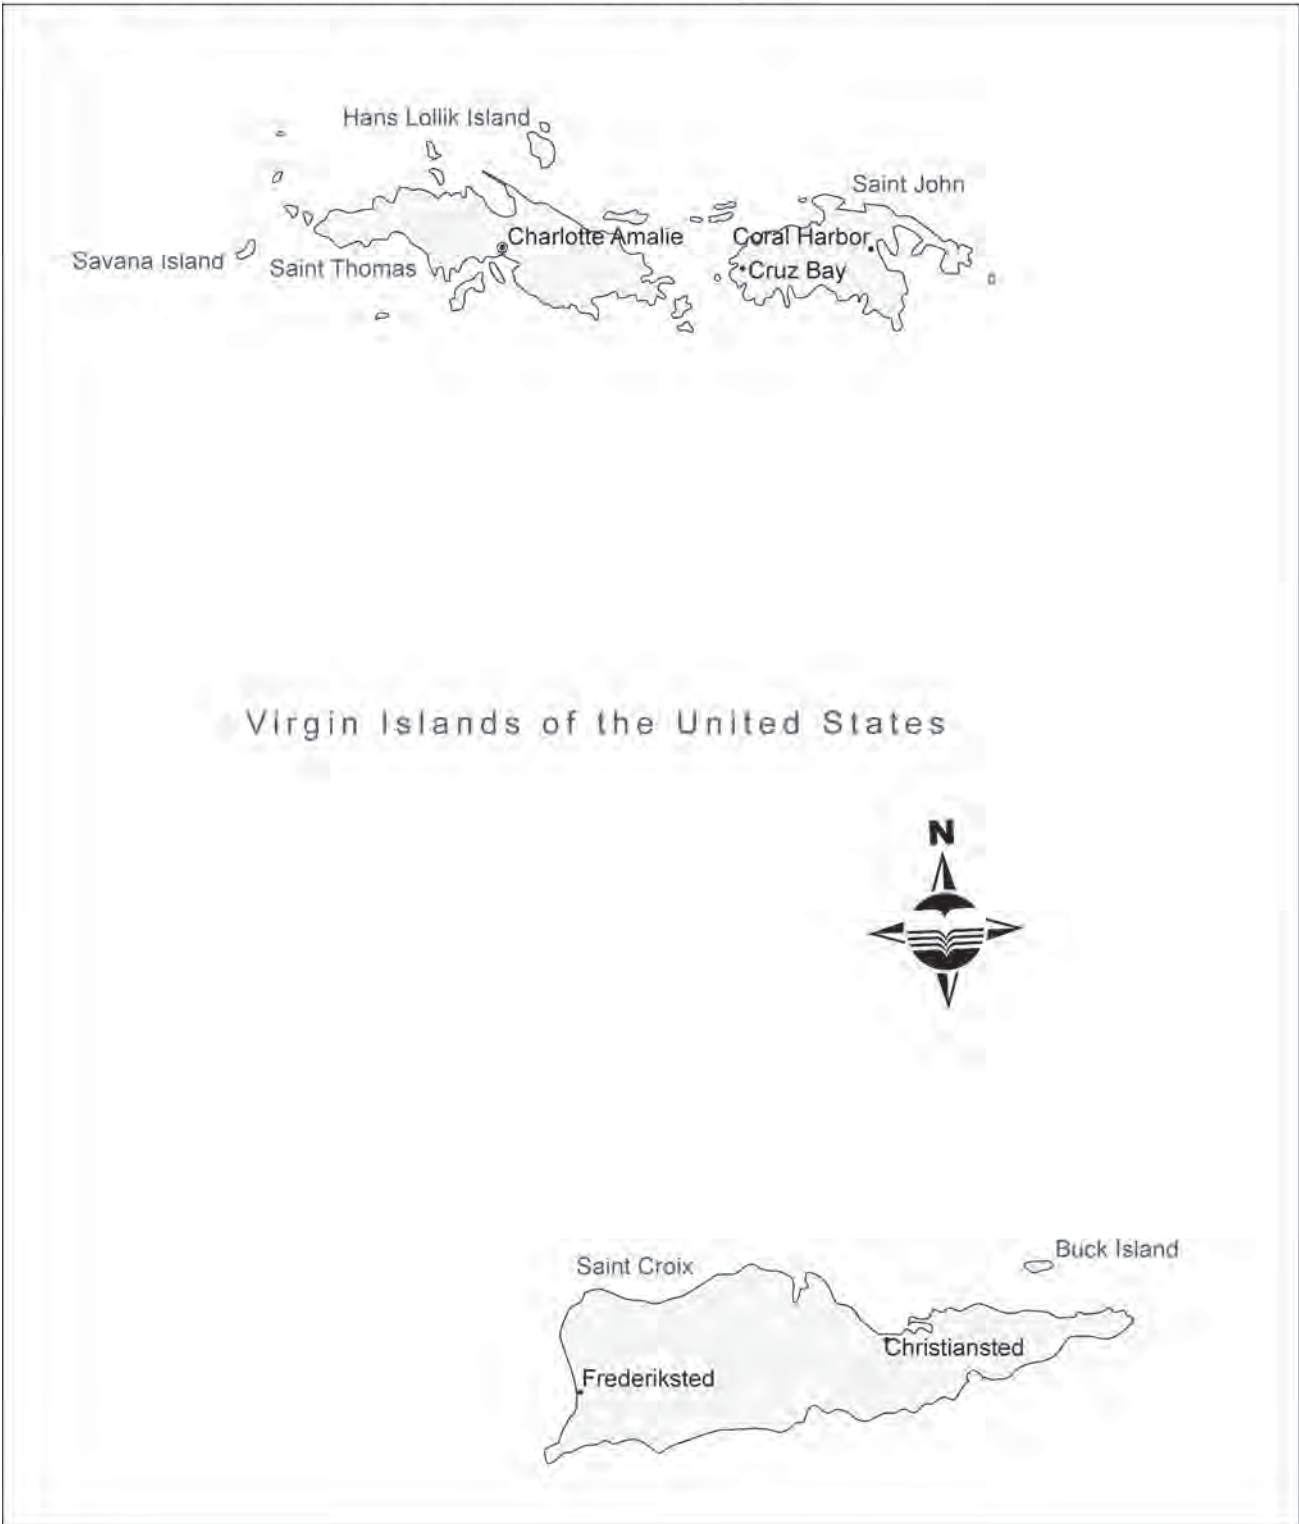

The Roman Catholic Church was originally established in the 17th century. Today it includes approximately one-third of the residents, and a diocese is headquartered on St. Thomas. It is a suffragan diocese to the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C.

During the years of Danish rule, a variety of churches entered, beginning with the Lutheran Church of Denmark. Lutherans are now a part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America. The Church of England spread through the islands in the 18th century, and by the middle of the 19th century approximately one-third of the residents were Anglicans. In 1916 this work was transferred to the Episcopal Church.

St. Thomas would play an important role in the modern Protestant missionary enterprise, which began with the Moravian mission to the slaves in 1732. From here, the Moravians would spread around the Caribbean and around the world. The Moravian work has been incorporated in the Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province. Methodists came to the Virgin Islands in 1891. That work has now been merged into the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, headquartered in Jamaica.

VIRGIN ISLANDS OF THE UNITED STATES

Throughout the 20th century a number of American churches opened congregations in the islands, but because of their relatively small size, most have only one or a few congregations. The Seventh-day Adventist Church has risen above the rest, and Pentecostals have split their support among the Assemblies of God, the Church of God of Prophecy, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), and the Damascus Christian Church, the latter a Spanish-speaking organization.

The Jewish community in the Virgin Islands dates to the 17th century. Today there are some 350 Jews, about half of whom are active in the synagogue, which is located on St. Thomas. In 1983 the members of the synagogue celebrated their 150th anniversary. There are also several spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith, and fewer than 100 Muslims.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Church of England; Church of God of Prophecy; Episcopal Church; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Baa, E. "Religious Development." In Fifty Years: Commemorating the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Transfer of the Virgin Islands from Denmark to the United States of America, March 31, 1967, edited by E. Downing. Charlotte Amaile, USVI: Friends of Denmark Society, 1967.
- Chapman, W., and W. Taylor. Historic Churches of the Virgin Islands. St. Croix: Saint Croix Landmarks Society, 1986.
- Cohen, Judah M. Through the Sands of Time: A History of the Jewish Community of St. Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands. Waltham, MA: Brandeis, 2003.
- Dookan, Isaac. History of the Virgin Islands. Kingston, Jamaica: University Press of the West Indies, 2000.
- Frederick Evangelical Lutheran Church, 325th Anniversary, 1666–1991: Celebrate Our Past,*

Challenge the Future. St. Thomas: Frederick Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1991.

Hall, Neville A. T., and B. W. Higman. Slave Society in the Danish West Indies: St Thomas, St John and St Croix. Kingston, Jamaica: University Press of the West Indies, 1994.

Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.

Vishwa Hindu Parishad

The Vishwa Hindu Parishad (Assembly of All Hindus) is an organization with a superdenominational structure. Its declared goal is to become the representative of a united Hinduism, an ambition with obvious political implications. The Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) stresses the meaning of hindutva—Hindu lifestyle—as a central characteristic of the intended new order of Indian society. The concept of the VHP is based on the conviction that Hinduism possesses all principles needed for the organization and governing of society, as well as the structuring of the economy. Therefore the aims and programmatical actions of the VHP are habitually characterized as "political Hinduism."

In the middle of the 1990s, the VHP had about 1.6 million members worldwide, the majority of whom lived in India. However, there exist branches of the VHP in the United States, in Canada, as well as in several European, African, and East Asian countries. The non-Indian branches operate relatively independently from the head office, but normally they are organized in a kind of net structure in the various countries. The U.S. branch, for example, was founded in 1973 and has since organized various national meetings with members from about 100 U.S. cities, the most recent as of this writing having been in Austin, Texas, in 1999.

The VHP was founded in Bombay on August 29, 1964, the mythological birthday of God Krishna (Janmashtami). Some 150 leaders of different Hindu sects participated. The founding of the VHP as a forum of a united Hinduism was initiated by Swami Chinmayananda (1916–1993), who became the first president of the organization, and Shivram Shankar Apte, a high-ranking official of the Rashtriya Svayamsevak Sangh

Members of Durga Vahini, the women's wing of Hindu nationalist group Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), participate in a self-defense training for women at Akhnoor, India, July 16, 2009. (AP/Wide World Photos)

(the national volunteers' organization), who functioned as secretary general.

The VHP is a lay organization with a relatively small number of full-time workers. A high degree of voluntary engagement by the members guarantees the efficiency of the activities, and the members' activities are declared a religious duty. The Organization Department, which is subdivided into the Central Board of Trustees, the Central Advisory Board, and the Central Executive Committee, constitutes the central administrative unit of the VHP.

The VHP's ambition as all-Hindu representative is expressed by the Religious Parliament (Dharma Sam-sad), a forum constituted by 1,008 sadhus, religious leaders, from different Hindu sects and denominations.

These sadhus function as transmitters and legitimists of the instructions and directives of the Organization Department. The practical work is done by 17 sub-departments that are responsible for different issues—for example, propaganda and publicity, finance, security, educational programs, mission, and so forth.

Dharmo rakshati rakshitah is the slogan of the VHP; it is translated as: "If you protect the Dharma, he will protect you." This motto expresses the conviction that Indian society suffers because the Dharma is not sufficiently observed nowadays. In the eyes of the VHP, a revitalization of the Dharma would regain the glorious strength of the Indian society. A basic prerequisite for this objective is the unification of the heterogeneous Hindu sects and denominations. With that goal in mind, the VHP has repeatedly formulated Hindu catechisms and catalogues of religious behavior, which are said to be authoritative for all Hindus.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the VHP concentrated on the development of its organizational structure. In addition, there were from the beginning two major fields of activity: several service projects, mainly among outcasts and tribals, and programs of reconversion. In both projects the VHP applied a strongly polemical tone against the Christian churches. Later, in the 1980s, there was an increase of activism, now directed against the alleged threat of a foreign Muslim influence in India. From the several actions against that threat, the most important—which received a negative press worldwide—was the Ramajanmabhoomi campaign for the liberation of Rama's birthplace. That crusade, initiated in 1984, pursued the aim of regaining the Babri-mosque in Ayodhya for the Hindus. This mosque was purportedly built in the 16th century on the ruins of a Rama temple. On December 6, 1992, the efforts culminated in an uncontrolled outburst of the fanaticized Hindu crowd that finally razed the mosque. As a result, several bloody altercations between Hindus and Muslims all over India arose, in which more than 300 people lost their lives. Following the Ayodhya incident the government banned the VHP, but in June 1995 it was legalized again.

Vishwa Hindu Parishad
Sankat Mochan Ashram
Sector 6

Ramakrishna Puram
New Delhi-110 022
India

VHP of America
PO Box 611
Iselin, NJ 08830
<http://www.vhp-america.org/>

Matthias Dech

See also: Hinduism; Janmashtami.

References

- Basu, Tapan, et al. Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags: A Critique of the Hindu Right. New Delhi: Orient Longman, 1993.
- Dech, Matthias. "Hindus und Hindutum in Deutschland." Ph.D. diss., University of Marburg, 1998.
- Hellman, Eva. "Political Hinduism. The Challenge of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad." Ph.D. diss., University of Uppsala, 1993.
- Van der Veer, Peter. "Hindu Nationalism and the Discourse of Modernity: The Vishwa Hindu Parishad." In Accounting for Fundamentalism, edited by M. E. Marty. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

Vlad Tepes

ca. 1431–ca. 1476

Vlad Tepes (or Vlad the Impaler), the obscure ruler of a small kingdom, Walachia, now a part of the modern state of Romania, has been rediscovered as a significant figure in 15th- and even 16th-century religious history. Though he ruled Wallachia a mere eight years (1456–1462), in that short time he was able to establish a reputation for cruelty in the process of suppressing the feudal lords and establishing a centralized nation. Today, Romanians see him as a founder of modern Romania. During most of his years on the throne, he also carried on an innovative, guerrilla-like war against the overwhelming forces of the Ottoman Empire, his actions contributing significantly to delaying the advance of the Muslim armies into Hungary. In the 20th century, as his political career was being rediscovered, his historical importance was overshadowed by the

Vlad Tepes (1431–1476), whose real name was Vlad III or Vlad Dracula, was a ruler of Wallachia known for his cruelty. (Getty Images) name he assumed as the son of Vlad II Dracul, which was adopted as the title of a horror novel by Irish writer Bram Stoker (1847–1912), Dracula, Son of the Dragon.

Vlad was the illegitimate son of Vlad II. In 1430, Vlad Dracula had been assigned the task of protecting the border at the Transylvanian town of Sighisoara. Here, Vlad was born as his father's second son toward the end of 1430 or beginning of 1431. Shortly after his son's birth, Vlad II traveled to Nuremberg, where he joined the Order of The Dragon (in Romanian Dracul), an alliance of Christian (both Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox) rulers. The Order was founded by Sigismund (1368–1437), the Holy Roman Emperor, as a means of defending Christianity whose major enemy at the time was seen as the Muslims who were invading.

In 1436, Vlad Dracul secured the Walachian throne and moved to Tirgoviste, the capital. The following year, Sigismund died, and Vlad Dracul signed a treaty with the Turks that allowed them to pass through Walachia and attack Hungary. Unfortunately for him, the Catholic Hungarians were able to drive the Turks back and in the process drove Vlad Dracul from his throne. He then turned to the Turks for help and they assisted him in the regaining of Walachia. As a guarantee of good faith toward his new allies, he allowed two of his sons, including Vlad, to be held at the sultan's court. In the meantime, Vlad Dracul's continuing efforts to play the Hungarians off against the Turks led to his defeat and death (along with his eldest son Mircea) in 1447.

Vlad, the son of Vlad Dracul, initially tried to take the throne in 1448, but could hold it only a matter of months. He then took refuge first in Moldavia, a neighboring Eastern Orthodox country. A powerful ruler was then on the Hungarian throne, John Hunyadi (1400–1456). Only after Hunyadi's death in 1456 was Vlad finally able to return to Walachia and begin his reign. In Tirgoviste, he had to contend with the power traditionally exercised by the feudal lords, the boyars. Frustrated with establishing his authority, he invited them to an Easter feast in 1459, at the close of which he arrested them, killed many of them, and forced the more able-bodied to march the 75 miles to Poenari, where over the next months they were forced to build a manor house on the top of a mountain overlooking the Arges River. The boyars' land was turned over to people who had supported and were now beholden to him.

Vlad next moved against the German cities that guarded the passes and hence controlled the trade between Walachia and Transylvania. Unable to obtain new trade agreements, he attacked the cities and impaled those individuals who had opposed him. He earned the hatred of the German communities of Transylvania and the nickname Tepes, or Impaler.

The major problem for Vlad now became the Muslim forces encamped along the Danube south and east of Bucharest. In 1461, he launched an effort to drive them out of what he considered to be his territory. In one bold move, he attempted to capture the sultan in his tent. The sultan gathered his forces and invaded Walachia with the goal of defeating Vlad. Vlad fought an effective hit-and-run retreat, killing many and taking prisoners. In the end, as the army approached Tirgoviste, Vlad created a forest of impaled Turkish soldiers and fled the city for his mountain retreat in Poenari. Deeply affected by what Vlad had done, the sultan quit the chase, but sent his Romanian allies to finish him off. They surrounded the manor at Poenari, but before taking it, Vlad escaped north into Transylvania.

Vlad was placed under house arrest by the Hungarian king, Matthias Corvinus (1443–1490), but eventually emerged as the best candidate to retake the Walachian throne. In the meantime, he converted from his Romanian Orthodox Church faith to Roman Catholicism and married one of Corvinus's daughters, and in 1475 again became the ruler of Walachia. He would now join the battles against the Turks in Serbia.

His last attempt to rule Walachia would be cut short just a year after he returned. He was killed by an assassin at some point late in 1476. His head was taken back to the sultan for display as a trophy and his body reputedly taken to the Orthodox monastery at Snagov for burial, though that fact is highly contested.

In the generation after Vlad, the Ottoman rulers turned their attention elsewhere in their quest to expand their empire and thus it would be 1521 before Belgrade, Serbia, fell and the Hungarians defeated at the Battle of Mohacs in 1526. The fall of Hungary opened the way to Vienna, the final obstacle blocking access to Western Europe. The Ottomans were finally stopped in 1529 at the gates of Vienna, when the Catholics diverted their attention from the growing Reformation movement in Germany and Switzerland to concentrate their forces to prevent any further European expansion by the Ottoman Empire.

In the 1970s, the life of Prince Vlad Dracula was conflated with the fictional account of Count Dracula, the anti-hero of Bram Stoker's novel. In novels and movies, Prince Vlad and Count Dracula were identified with each other, and the confusion was used to create tourism in Romania, in spite of efforts by Romanian historians to counter the popular myths.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church.

References

- Florescu, Radu, and Raymond T. McNally. Dracula: A Biography of Vlad the Impaler, 1431–1476. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1973.
- McNally, Raymond T., and Radu Florescu. In Search of Dracula. New York: Galahad Books, 1972.

- Miller, Elizabeth. Dracula: Sense & Nonsense. Westcliffe-on-Sea: Desert Island Books, 2000.
- Nandris, Grigore. "The Historical Dracula: The Theme of His Legend in the Western and in the Eastern Literature of Europe." Comparative Literature Studies 3, no. 4 (1966): 367–396.
- Treptow, Kurt W. Vlad III Dracula: The Life and Times of the Historical Dracula. Iasi, Romania: Center for Romanian Studies, 2000.

Vodou

Vodou is a religion that blends a variety of traditional African (mainly Fon, Yoruba, and Kongo) and Catholic elements. Although decidedly more akin in its forms of ritual and belief to African traditional religion than to Catholicism, Vodou is not an African religion but a product of the Haitian experience. This experience began in the injustices and brutality of plantation slavery in the French colony of Saint-Domingue (1697–1804), followed by two centuries of general political oppression, environmental decay, and stifling poverty. Vodou therefore is a religion born of displacement, suffering, and the negotiation thereof.

Since emerging in a French colony that prohibited its practice, Vodou has always represented a formidable force of political resistance; indeed, its contribution to the success of the Haitian Revolution has been stressed by numerous writers. With the most dynamic early Vodou communities springing up in settlements of escaped slaves from diverse African ethnic groups, since its very inception the religion has demonstrated significant variety. Certain traditions are primarily ancestor cults, while others focus on particular spirits brought from West Africa or others revealed in the New World. Because of the clandestine and variegated nature of colonial-era Vodou, moreover, the religion has no founder, no unifying doctrine, and no formal organizational network. None of these, nor a Vodou scripture, have ever developed.

Slaves brought to the colony were baptized Catholic upon arrival and given minimal religious instruction by Dominicans, Capuchins, and Jesuits. Syncretism thus immediately resulted, as slaves identified Catholic saints as new manifestations of African spirits, and adopted crosses, holy water, and incense as powerful religious trinkets to be used in conjunction with the amulets they reconstructed from African religious memory. The Catholic "pantheon"—with its single high creator, God, the Virgin Mary, and host of the dead (the saints) who intervene in the world of the living—lent itself quite fluently to assimilation with the traditional African community of spiritual beings. African religion, likewise, has a single distant creator God (called Bondyè in Vodou) and numerous spirits and ancestors, who, much like the Catholic saints, are perceived as accessible and with whom the greatest amount of human/divine commerce transpires.

Spirit possession and divination are the main forms of communication with the dead (lemò) and the spirits (lwa yo) in Vodou and together form its ritual focus. Put simply, when our relationship with lemò or lwa yo is in harmony, life is full and pleasurable; when this relationship is discordant, sickness, some other hardship, or even death may result. Upon the occurrence of such misfortune, ritual specialists (female: manbo; male: oungan) are consulted. Either through divination or the orchestration of ceremonies aiming to provoke spirit possession (which most often take place in temples [ounfò], family burial compounds, or public cemeteries), the manbo or oungan effects communication with the lemò or lwa yo in order to discover the cause of the illness or discord and to determine a means of re-establishing harmony or effecting healing. Both the maintenance and the reconstitution of this harmony rely primarily on sacrifice in various forms, while healing often involves herbalism and ritual baths.

Vodou remains popular among the vast majority of Haiti's peasantry (which composes 70 percent of the national population) and is today the religion of choice for a smaller majority of the nation's urban population. Most practitioners also consider themselves faithful Catholics and see no contradiction in this. The religion has spread internationally mainly through massive emigration, as roughly one million Haitians have settled in the neighboring Dominican Republic and more than a million more in urban centers of North America, mainly New York, Montreal, Miami, and Boston. With most of Haiti's estimated 8 million inhabitants, a smaller majority of the more than 2 million Haitians abroad, and an insignificant yet growing number of blan (non-Haitian) converts practicing the religion in some form, the worldwide number of Vodou practitioners may be roughly estimated at between 8 and 10 million.

Terry Rey

See also: Ancestors; Capuchins; Dominicans; Jesuits; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Desmangles, Leslie G. The Faces of the Gods: Vodou and Roman Catholicism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Laguette, Michael S. Voodoo and Politics in Haiti. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.
- Olmós, Marguerite Fernandez, and Lizabeth Paravisini Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santeria, Obeah, and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies

VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies, one of several groups to grow out of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), was founded by Srila Bhakti Aloka Paramadvaiti Maharaja (b. 1954). Swami Paramadvaiti originally joined ISKCON in 1971 in Düsseldorf, Germany, and he rose to a position of leadership as a temple president. He was sent to South America by Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), ISKCON's founder, where, in 1984, he created both the ISEV (Instituto Superior de Estudios Vedicos) and VRINDA (The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies). By this time he had come into a relationship with Srila Sridhar Maharaja (d. 2004), a Vaisnava guru (one of Prabhupada's god brothers) to whom some ISKCON leaders turned following Prabhupada's death. He took his sannyas vows (the renounced life) from Sridhar Maharaja.

VRINDA established centers (ashrams, farms, cultural centers, schools, and so forth) in Colombia, Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, Argentina, and Peru, and then spread to Central and North America and Europe (Germany, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Switzerland). In 1990, VRINDA was established in India, and a World Center opened in Vrinda Kunja. Also in Vrindavan, VRINDA opened the first Gaudiya Vaisnava Bookstore to distribute books from all of the groups in the Krishna Consciousness tradition, both classical texts as well as those produced by contemporary teachers. VRINDA has also committed itself to translating and publishing books in a variety of languages, especially German and Spanish.

VRINDA supports an expansive website, including the text of several books by Swami Paramadvaiti. It is a member of the World Vaisnava Association.

VRINDA
4138 NW 23 Rd. Ave.
Miami, FL 33142

Vrinda Kunja
Bhut Galli 169, Gopeshwara Road
Vrindavan, Mathura UP
281121

India
<http://www.vrindavan.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Society for Krishna Consciousness; World Vaisnava Association.

References

- Paramadvaiti, B. A., Swami. My Life. <http://www.vrindavan.org/bap/01/01.html>. Accessed April 24, 2009.
- Paramadvaiti, B. A., Swami. Our Family the Gaudiya Math. <http://www.vrindavan.org/English/Books/GMconded.html>. Accessed April 24, 2009.
- VRINDA. <http://www.vrindavan.org/>. Accessed April 24, 2009.

W

Wahhabi Islam

The Wahhabi movement was launched in the 1740s by its founder, Mohammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (ca. 1703–1791), as an attempt to purify and vivify Islam, especially in the Arabian Peninsula. Al-Wahhab was especially critical of the different Sufi brotherhoods, which he saw as having fallen into heresy. He took inspiration from the Hanbalite School of Sunni Islam and its more literalistic approach to the interpretation of the Koran, the Muslim holy book, and the hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. He tended to criticize the other Sunni schools as too accommodationist to the presence of the Sufis in their midst.

At the time that Wahhab began preaching, Arabia was part of the Ottoman Empire, which was dominated by the Hanafite School of Islam, of which Al-Wahhab was critical. He was able to gather an initial following by preaching to the pilgrims who annually flocked to Mecca. His efforts might have died out had they not become tied to the aspirations of the Saud family, which in the late 1800s began an effort to take central and eastern Arabia from the Ottomans. They were initially successful. They captured Mecca in 1806 and began to move into Iraq. The Ottoman caliph reacted, and in two campaigns, in 1812–1813 and 1816–1818, squelched the Saud family and the Wahhabi cause. The Saud family put together a coalition of Arab tribes and, in the 20th century, with the fall of the Ottoman Empire, was finally able to reconquer the peninsula. The kingdom of Saudi Arabia was proclaimed in 1932, with the Koran named its guiding authority and the head of the Saud family the country's king and absolute monarch.

The Wahhabi movement was institutionalized in the family of Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud, the first king, who placed his many sons and grandsons in positions of power. The Wahhabi movement also is manifest in the Committee for Encouraging Virtue and Preventing Vice, and with the mutawwah (religious authorities), who enforce public conformity to Islamic law, especially on issues of dress and attention to daily times of prayer. They receive support from the majority of Saudis who adhere to the Hanbalite School.

The Wahhabi perspective exists as the most conservative and traditionalist of the spectrum within Sunni Islam. Wahhabis are opposed to ostentatious worship, and Wahhabi mosques tend to be simply furnished and lack minarets (towers from which the people are called to prayer). They have opposed any efforts toward religious pluralism in the Islamic world, especially the efforts of Christian missionaries. They have also advocated traditional roles for women, which in the most austere form allows only very narrow roles for females in the home.

Through the activities of the wealthy Saud family, the Wahhabi movement has exerted influence globally and has been notably present in the Muslim World League, headquartered in Mecca. It is also seen as the direct inspiration for a variety of traditionalist Islamist movements, such as the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, the Jamaat-e-Islam Party in Pakistan, and the Taliban in Afghanistan. Its influence has reached beyond Sunni Islam to affect Shia Islam through such movements as the Palestinian Hezbollah and the forces undergirding the Iranian revolution in 1979. It gained strength by denying those forces internal to the international Muslim community that sought to respond to modern intellectual currents (including criticisms of traditional

The 16th century Amiriya Madrasa, a religious school that was built by the Sultan Amir bin Abdul Wahhab in 1504, is seen in Radaa city, near the Yemeni capital Sanaa. (Corbis)

Muslim practices such as polygamy), as well as the insults felt from European intervention in Muslim societies. In the 20th century it most strongly opposed the secularizing tendencies represented in liberal Islam, Marxism, and the permeation of the world by Western culture. Wahhabi and Wahhabi-related groups have consistently argued for the development of Islamic states in which the sharia (Islamic law) is the law of the land. The Wahhabi perspective is also dominant in the Arabian state of Qatar.

Since the days of Abd-al-Wahhab, the Wahhabis have encountered opposition in the larger Muslim world and from many in the other schools of Sunni Islam, many of whom have written of it as if it were a heretical Muslim sect. In the West, Wahhabis have been seen as part of the larger world of “Islamic fundamentalism,” a term rejected by most Muslim scholars, even those who might otherwise oppose the Wahhabi perspective, preferring in its stead terms such as “Islamic revivalism” and “Islamic activism.”

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa’ud; Hanafite School of Islam; Hanbalite School of Islam; Jamaat-e-Islam; Mecca; Muslim Brotherhood; Muslim World League; Shia Islam; Taliban.

References

- Abu-Hakima, Ahmad M. History of Eastern Arabia, 1750–1800: The Rise and Development of Bahrain, Kuwait, and Wahhabi Saudi Arabia. Troy, MI: International Book Centre, 1988.
- Al-Yassini, A. Religion and State in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1985.
- Sabini, John. Armies in the Sand: The Struggle for Mecca and Medina (the Egyptian Wahhabi War in the 19th Century). New York: Thames and Hudson, 1981.

Wenner, Manfred W. "The Arabian Peninsula and the Islamic 'Revival.'" In Islam in the Contemporary World, edited by Cyriac K. Pullapilly. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads, 1980.

Wake Island

Wake Island is one of three islands in an isolated Pacific atoll that includes the nearby islands of Wilkes and Peale. The United States occupied the atoll in 1898 during the war with Spain, and has since kept Wake as a military base. It currently has some 1,600 residents, almost totally armed forces personnel. It is used as a business center, stopover point for trans-Pacific flights, and a missile-testing base.

Religious services on Wake are conducted by Roman Catholic and Protestant/Free church chaplains as needed, and there are no permanent congregations. The Roman Catholic Church considers Wake a part of its Diocese of Agaña (Guam).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Free Churches; Roman Catholic Church.

Reference

Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Waldensian Church

The Waldensian Church is the oldest pre-Reformation Protestant body still in existence, and it prides itself on the title mater reformationis (mother of the Reformation). In terms of its origins, disentangling fact from fiction is not always easy. Its founder was Waldo or Valdesius (not originally "Peter Waldo," the name "Peter" being added several centuries after his death in order to claim that, like the early church, the Waldensian Church had also been first led by an apostolic figure known as Peter). Waldo was a wealthy merchant in Lyons, France, who around 1170 underwent a conversion experience centered on his desire to live a life of poverty and to preach the gospel. He died around 1206. Notwithstanding the hostility of the Catholic hierarchy, the separation from Rome of Waldo's Poor of Lyons movement (only later known as Waldensians) did not initially seem to be entirely inevitable. One of the Poor of Lyons groups, led by Durandus of Osca, reconciled itself with Pope Innocent III (1160–1216) in the year 1208. Other groups remained in the margins of the Roman Catholic Church, breaking with Rome only gradually. In the 13th and 14th centuries, Waldensian ideas spread from France and Italy into Austria, Germany, Bohemia, Poland, and Hungary, largely through independent local groups quite different from each other and with no common leadership. It is even questioned whether the firmly established "Waldensian" groups active in France and Italy in the 15th century could really claim an undisputed genealogy going back to Waldo himself.

In 1532, with the Synod of Chanforan, the Waldensians of southern France and the Italian valleys of Piedmont joined the (Calvinist) Reformed Church. According to some historians, this was a crucial breach in their continuity with Waldo, while others claim some degree of continuity. In the 17th century, Waldensians endured terrible persecution during Europe's religious wars, particularly in 1655 and 1686. An armed resistance failed, and the community, now reduced to some 3,000 members entrenched in the Piedmont valleys, escaped to Protestant Switzerland. In 1689, however, they returned to Piedmont with a spectacular and epic march. They managed to obtain some measure of tolerance, although within a ghetto. Waldensians received help from European, particularly British, Protestants, and in the 19th century the Piedmont valleys entered a period of religious revival. Finally, in 1848, the Waldensians were granted religious freedom, with full civil and political rights, by the king of Sardinia, Charles Albert (1798–1849).

During Italy's Risorgimento, the conflict between its newly created national state and the Roman Catholic Church gave the Waldensians the opportunity to embark on a nationwide missionary effort among those dissatisfied with the Church of Rome. Not much was achieved in term of converts, however, although a Waldensian presence was established in most Italian cities. Following another difficult period during the Fascist regime, the Waldensian Church was granted a new level of legal recognition after World War II, and in 1984 it entered into a Concordat with the Italian government, amended in 1993, allowing it inter alia to share in the national church tax. In 1975, Italian Waldensians and the Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy entered into an “integration agreement,” which was not technically a merger. The two churches, under the name Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches, are governed by the same executive body (the Waldensian Table), while also maintaining their own separate forms of organization.

Each local assembly in the Waldensian Church is led by elected elders and appoints delegates to the yearly church synod, which in turn elects the seven members of the Table, the governing body chaired by a Table chair (moderatore). The title of pastor is conferred upon men and women entrusted with the preaching ministry. There are at present 40,000 Waldensians, 25,000 in Italy and 15,000 in Uruguay and Argentina, where Waldensian immigrants settled in the 19th century.

After the Synod of Chanforan, the theology became Reformed-Presbyterian, and Waldensians share the general doctrines of the Reformed churches.

Waldensian Church

Via Firenze 38

00184 Rome

Italy

<http://www.chiesavaldese.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Hugon, Augusto-Armand. Storia dei Valdesi II: Dall'adesione alla Riforma all'Emancipazione (1532–1848). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1989.
- Molnar, Amedeo. Storia dei Valdesi I: Dalle origini all'adesione alla Riforma (1176–1532). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1989.
- Vinay, Valdo. Storia dei Valdesi III: Dal movimento evangelico italiano al movimento ecumenico (1848–1978). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1990.

■ Wallis et Futuna Islands

Wallis et Futuna is a French South Pacific Island territory consisting of the Wallis, Futuna, and Afori islands. They are north of Fiji and west of Samoa. A French possession through the 19th century, the Wallis et Futuna Islands were named a protectorate in 1887 and an overseas territory in 1961. The current population of 15,000 (2008) resides on the mere 106 square miles of land.

The Roman Catholic Church is the only organized religion on the islands. It was first established in 1836 by a Marist priest. The Diocese of Wallis et Futuna was established in 1966. In 1974 the bishop, a Frenchman, withdrew and turned the diocese over to his auxiliary, a priest who had been elevated from among the

The Wallis & Futuna Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	8,700	15,200	97.3	0.18	16,500	16,200
Roman Catholics	8,400	14,900	95.3	0.04	16,100	15,700
Protestants	0	120	0.8	6.58	180	250
Marginals	0	160	1.0	14.87	300	400
Ethnoreligionists	0	180	1.2	0.23	200	200
Baha'is	100	140	0.9	0.17	180	300
Agnostics	0	90	0.6	21.18	140	240
Atheists	0	10	0.1	0.00	10	20
Total population	8,800	15,600	100.0	0.24	17,000	17,000

Polynesian people who constitute the primary citizens of the islands. An indigenous episcopal leadership has been present ever since. The bishop serves as an auxiliary to the archbishop of Noumea (Kanaky) and participates in the larger Episcopal Conference of the Pacific, headquartered in Fiji.

Over the course of the 20th century, an aggressive policy of Christianizing the islands has largely displaced the pre-Christian indigenous religion.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Aldrich, Robert. France and the South Pacific Since 1940. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1994.
- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Fischer, Steven Robert. A History of the Pacific Islands. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Wang Chongyang

ca. 1123–1170

Wang Chongyang (or Yangqun, Wang Zhe) was the founder of Quanzhen Daoism, one of the two main surviving schools of Daoism. He is remembered for discovering a way to fruitfully integrate Daoism with Buddhist and neo-Confucianist perspectives, while the movement he founded incorporated many local Chinese deities into the hierarchy of Daoist gods.

Wang was originally a member of the literati during the Jin dynasty (1115–1234), which ruled northern China. This was a period of sudden political dislocation, with the passing of the Song dynasty (960–1279) in the north and the advent of a new dynasty ruled by foreigners. Wang had retired to a solitary life in the mountains when he had several meetings with such legendary immortals as Lu Dongbin, during which time he was pressed to start a new tradition of teaching. He finally evolved a highly syncretic mixture of teachings, practices, and morality seemingly well-suited to the times.

Wang's Quanzhen, or Complete Perfection, Daoist sect put greatest emphasis on self-cultivation and less emphasis on the intricate visualization exercises, elaborate rituals, and talismanic magic that had dominated earlier schools. For Wang, the primary goal was to refine the body's energies through the practices of inner alchemy (neidan). Wang called his meditative practice jing zuo, "quiet sitting," a term probably picked up from Chan Buddhism. From neo-Confucianism, he also borrowed an emphasis on the virtue of filial piety and some ascetic practices. The latter included the ab-staining from sex, alcohol, and strong vegetables. He and the small group of close followers lived a rather rustic lifestyle.

When Wang died, he had only about 15 followers. It would be due to his successors passing on Wang's approach that the Quanzhen sect of Daoism grew into such an important force in Chinese religion.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Alchemy; Daoist; Daoism; Meditation; Quanzhen Daoism; Zhengyi Daoism.

References

- Bartholomew P.M. Tsui. Taoist Tradition and Change: The Story of the Complete Perfection Sect in Hong Kong. Hong Kong: Christian Study Centre on Chinese Religion and Culture, 1991.
- Kohn, Levia, ed. Daoism Handbook. 2 vols. Leiden: Brill, 2000.

Warith Deen Mohammad, Ministry of

In 1975, following the death of his father Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975), Wallace Muhammad (1933–2008) was appointed leader of the Nation of Islam, or Black Muslim movement. Wallace, or Warith as he later became known, rapidly transformed the Nation's belief system: he eliminated the urgent apocalyptic message from his father's prophecies, and moved the organization closer to a more orthodox form of Islam. In 1992 Warith Deen Mohammad became the first Muslim cleric to lead prayers in the U.S. Senate.

The Nation of Islam originated in 1930 in Detroit, Michigan. Its founder, Wallace Fard, preached a combination of Islam and Black Nationalism. The doctrine was compelling, particularly in an urban environment in which large numbers of recently arrived southern blacks hoped to better their lives. The Great Depression magnified their economic marginalization and white prejudice, dashing the hopes of many. These individuals made a receptive audience for Fard's message. Within three years, the Nation developed a substantial following. Notably, it was supported by a well-organized administrative structure that included a security force and a school, as well as training classes for women on how to be good wives and mothers.

Imam Wahy Deen Sharif, standing center, spiritual leader of the Masjid Warith Deen mosque in Irvington, New Jersey, speaks in Washington Park in Newark during afternoon prayers, June 18, 2004. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Fard disappeared in the early 1930s, but his appointed successor, Elijah Muhammad, developed the movement's doctrine, and further strengthened its membership core. Muhammad taught that Fard was actually Allah incarnate, and that black Americans were his Chosen People. Muhammad identified white Americans as "white devils," and he prophesied that white America would fall in 1965–1966. In preparation for that time, he emphasized economic self-sufficiency, and the Nation undertook a variety of business enterprises.

Muhammad also required the Muslims to adhere to a strict moral code, and he emphasized physical and mental purity. He outlined strict dietary regulations, and members of the Nation were forbidden to smoke, take drugs, or gamble. In addition, he encouraged pride in the black race.

Inter-racial marriages were forbidden, and many new members took the surname "X," to symbolize that black Americans could never know their real origins, and to suggest their potential but as yet unrealized power. In the late 1940s, Malcolm Little (1925–1965) converted to the Nation of Islam. Malcolm X, as he became known, soon rose to become one of the Nation's most prominent ministers and recruiters. In the early 1960s, however, Malcolm became disenchanted with Elijah Muhammad's moral guidance (believing that he had fathered several children outside his marriage); he was in turn censured by Muhammad for commenting that President John F. Kennedy's assassination was simply "the chickens [coming] home to roost." As a result, Malcolm was expelled from the Nation. Soon afterward he undertook a pilgrimage to Mecca (the Hajj), and returned to the United States as a convert to traditional, orthodox Islam. He was assassinated on February 21, 1965.

Elijah Muhammad led the Nation until his death in 1975. He appointed his son Wallace as his successor, a move that surprised many. Wallace had a turbulent history within the Nation. He was strongly influenced by Malcolm X, criticized his father's interpretation of Islam as early as 1961, and was twice expelled from the Nation during the 1960s. Nevertheless, the majority of Muslims followed him when he completely reinterpreted the movement's doctrine. Within six months he had removed the urgent apocalyptic message from Elijah's prophecies, and within the next year he initiated even more radical changes. In March 1976 he declared that his father was no longer to be interpreted as the "last Messenger of Allah," and in October he announced that the Nation was to become the World Community of al-Islam in the West (WCIW), and that people of all races were welcome to join it.

One notable Muslim did not accept these changes: Louis Farrakhan. He left the group in 1978 and "resurrected" the Nation of Islam, with its original doctrine. For the most part, however, the Muslims accepted the new direction that Wallace chose for the movement. This relatively easy transformation was the result of two factors. First, evidence suggests that in his declining years, Elijah Muhammad exhibited moderation in his language and political views. Second, Elijah's strict doctrine and calls for education and economic self-sufficiency had the unintended consequence of raising the Nation's membership among the middle class. Radical views were no longer as appealing as they once had been.

Wallace's successful redirection of the movement continued during the 1970s and 1980s. In 1980 the WCIW became the American Muslim Mission, and its publication became the American Muslim Journal; in addition, Wallace announced that he would now be known as Warith Deen Mohammad. In 1985, Warith decentralized the movement completely, and the network of people and the centers associated with him have been described simply as the Ministry of Warith Deen Mohammad. Its publication became the Muslim Journal. This move toward the mainstream was perhaps most clearly evidenced in 1992, when Warith became the first Muslim cleric to lead prayers in the U.S. Senate.

Wallace's relationship with Minister Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam was a difficult one for most of the 1980s. During the 1990s, however, the two groups moved toward reconciliation. In February 2000, at Minister Farrakhan's request, Imam Muhammad spoke at the Nation of Islam's annual meeting. The two leaders embraced and called for the unity of all Muslims. Imam Warith Deen Mohammad died on September 8, 2008.

Like the Nation of Islam, Warith Deen Mohammad's movement has never published its membership numbers. The movement continues to publish the Muslim Journal, which can be found at <http://www.muslimjournal.net>. Warith Deen Muhammad's ministry is located at <http://www.wdmministry.com> and www.wdm-events.org.

Ministry of W. Deen Mohammed
PO Box 1061
Calumet City, IL 60409

Martha Lee

See also: Nation of Islam.

References

- Curtis, Edward E. Black Muslim Religion in the Nation of Islam, 1960–1975. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.
- Gardell, Mattias. In the Name of Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam. Durham: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Lee, Martha. The Nation of Islam: An American Millenarian Movement. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1996.
- Muhammad, Elijah. Message to the Blackman in America. Chicago: Muhammad Mosque of Islam No. 2, 1965.

Way International, The

The Way International, Inc., an international fundamentalist Christian fellowship, was founded in 1942 as a radio ministry under the name of Vesper Chimes by Victor Paul Wierwille (1916–1985), then a minister in the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ). It assumed its present name in 1974, after being known successively as the Chimes Hour (beginning in 1944), the Chimes Hour Youth Caravan (1947), and The Way, Inc. (1955).

Wierwille had decided to enter the ministry while a student at Mission House College. He later earned a B.D. at Mission House Seminary, in Minnesota, and did graduate work at the University of Chicago and Princeton Theological Seminary, earning an M.Th. in 1941. He was ordained in 1942 and became pastor of the Evangelical and Reformed Church at Paine, Ohio, from which he moved to Van Wert, Ohio, two years later, to become pastor of St. Peter's Evangelical and Reformed Church. During his stay in Van Wert he became an avid student of the Bible, concentrating upon the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In 1948 he was awarded a Ph.D. by the Pikes Peak Bible College and Seminary, an unaccredited school in Manitou Springs, Colorado.

In 1951, Wierwille received God's Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues for the first time, the basic Pentecostal experience. Out of his subsequent Bible study he developed a course in Christian living that he called the Power for Abundant Living (PFAL) class. He first offered the class in 1953. The following year he began to study Aramaic, under the influence of biblical scholar George M. Lamsa, and began to develop the unique perspective on biblical doctrine that has become identified with the movement that grew up around him. In 1957 he left the Evangelical and Reformed Church, and henceforth devoted himself full-time to his own ministry. That ministry had been chartered as The Way, Inc., in 1955 (later changed to The Way International in 1975). He led The Way until his retirement in 1983. He established the headquarters of The Way at the Wierwille family farm outside New Knoxville, Ohio.

The Way grew steadily through the 1950s, but growth slowed in the 1960s. Then it suddenly experienced spectacular growth in the 1970s, as the ministry identified with the national Jesus People Revival that moved among the Baby Boom generation, which was just coming of age. The Way expanded its facilities at New Knoxville, which hosted the first national Rock of Ages Festival, an annual gathering of Way members, in 1971.

Wierwille established The Way Corps, a four-year leadership training program, and in 1974 he purchased the former Emporia College in Emporia, Kansas, which he transformed into the corps headquarters as The Way College. The Word Over the World (WOW) Ambassador program, initiated by Wierwille in 1971, began to send young Way members across the country for a year of witnessing activity.

Wierwille was succeeded as president of The Way by L. Craig Martindale (b. 1948) in 1983, at the 40th anniversary of The Way's founding. Martindale had joined The Way while in college, and he became involved full-time after his graduation. He led The Way through the 1990s but was forced to resign in 2000, when he was accused of some extramarital sexual relationships.

The beliefs of The Way are summarized in an 11-point doctrinal statement. It rejects the Trinitarian orthodoxy of most Western Christianity and denies the divinity of Jesus; Wierwille's opinion on this controversial point is the subject of his book Jesus Christ Is Not God (1975). Although believing in the divine conception of Jesus by God, The Way teaches that Jesus is the Son of God but not God the Son. The Way also believes in receiving the fullness of God's Holy Spirit, believed to be the power of God, not the third person of a Trinity. This view has traditionally been termed Arianism, considered a heresy since the condemnation of its early exponent, Arius, by the Council of Nicaea in 325.

The Way also teaches a form of biblical interpretation known as dispensationalism, a view that divides Bible history into successive periods during which God developed a different relationship with humanity. Wierwille followed a version of dispensationalism known as ultradispensationalism. Most dispensationalists believe that a new dispensation began at Easter, when Christ was resurrected from the dead, and that we currently live in the dispensation of grace that was initiated at that time. Ultradispensationalists believe that between Easter and the emergence of the New Testament church at Pentecost there was a period of transition whose story is largely told in the book of Acts. This period is identified with the institution of John the Baptist's water baptism. In the succeeding dispensation of grace, the baptism of the Spirit replaces John's baptism.

Ultradispensationalists regard the Old Testament, the four Gospels, and the epistles of Hebrews and James as representative of pre-Pentecost dispensations. The book of Acts is a transitional document. Paul's epistles, especially his later letters, are seen by ultradispensationalism as the prime documents of the dispensation of grace. The Way believes in one baptism, that of the Holy Spirit, and rejects water baptism.

The Way, like most scholars, believes that Aramaic was the language spoken by Jesus, but in addition it believes Aramaic to be the language in which the New Testament was originally written, contrary to almost all scholars, who believe it was written in Greek. This view is based on the work of George M. Lamsa, especially his Holy Bible from Ancient Eastern Manuscripts (1959), and the books of independent Indian bishop K. C. Pillai, The Orientalisms of the Bible and Light through an Eastern Window.

The Way's basic teachings are presented in the 12-session course, the Power for Abundant Living (PFAL). New members take the course and upon graduation may continue to attend "twig" fellowships. Those who wish to become more involved in The Way's work may attend The Way College, join The Way Corps, or become a WOW Ambassador for one year.

The Way International's organization is based on the model of a tree. At the root are the five educational and administrative centers that serve the organization as international headquarters, located at New Knoxville, Ohio; The Way College of Emporia at Emporia, Kansas; The Way College of Biblical Research, Indiana Campus, at Rome, Indiana; Camp Gunnison (The Way Family Ranch at Gunnison, Colorado); and Lead Outdoor Academy at Tinnie, New Mexico. Various national organizations are identified as trunks, and state and provincial organizations as limbs. Organizations serving cities and towns are branches. The small fellowship gatherings in a person's home, most analogous to a congregation, are called twigs. Individual members are likened to leaves. The ministry as a whole is administered by a board of trustees that appoints the cabinet overseeing the headquarters complex, as well as the staff of the other root locations.

In 1983, at the time that leadership was shifted to Craig Martindale, The Way reported 2,657 twigs in the United States, with approximately 30,000 people involved. Each twig gathering averaged approximately 10 members. The Rock of Ages Festival, held that year, hosted more than 17,000 people. Also, PFAL classes were conducted abroad in a number of countries, primarily Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo), Chile, Argentina, Venezuela, and Colombia. Shortly after that transfer of leadership, The Way was hit with significant internal controversy that only grew following Wierwille's death in 1985. Membership also declined in reaction to continuing criticism of the organization as a cult.

Soon after the emergence of The Way International in the 1970s, various groups began to attack it and its founder. Christian counter-cult organizations opposed it because of its non-Trinitarian theology. Secular anti-cult organizations accused it of brainwashing its members and attempted to deprogram members. Then, after Wierwille's death, charges of improprieties by Wierwille and several of his close associates resulted in the defection by several prominent Way leaders, a few of whom established rival groups. As a result The Way lost considerable support, although it had seemed to recover somewhat by the 1990s, when attendance at the annual Rock of Ages Festival began to return to its former level. Much of that gain was lost in the light of revelations concerning Martindale at the end of the 1990s. There are a number of Internet sites devoted to criticism of The Way International, posted primarily by those who disagree with its theological stance.

The Way International
Box 328
New Knoxville, OH 45871

James R. Lewis

See also: Fundamentalism; Pentecostalism; United Church of Christ

References

- Martindale, L. Craig. The Rise and Expansion of the Christian Church in the First Century. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1993.
- Morton, Douglas V., and John P. Juedes. The Integrity and Accuracy of The Way's Word. St. Louis, MO: Personal Freedom Outreach, 1980.
- Wierwille, Dorothea Kipp. Victor Paul Wierwille: Born Again to Serve. New Knoxville, OH: American Christian, 1996.

Wierwille, Victor Paul. Jesus Christ Is Not God.
New Knoxville, OH: American Christian,
1975.

Wierwille, Victor Paul. Power for Abundant Living.
New Knoxville, OH: American Christian,
1972.

Wesak

Early Buddhist sources (apart from the sutras) suggest that Gautama Buddha's birthday, day of enlightenment, and paranirvana or death) all occurred on the same day of the year. That day, designated Wesak (Vesak), is the night of the full moon of the Hindu month of Vaisakha (usually in May on the Common Era calendar). Through the centuries, Wesak was primarily an event commemorated by Theravada Buddhists, for whom its celebration emerged as the most important festival of the year. Originally a time to remember the birth and death of Buddha, it evolved primarily into a celebration of his enlightenment. In the 20th century, Wesak has been adopted as a favorite celebration within the Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhist traditions, especially in the West.

The observance of Wesak usually includes both a formal and an informal aspect. The local temple or monastery will take the lead in the formal part of the celebration, which will include a procession by the monks, the presentation of an offering, and the chanting of sutras. In more recent times, the ceremony might also include a presentation on some aspect of the Buddha's teachings followed by the bathing of a statue of the Buddha. The Buddha's birth is usually acknowledged in the evening of the full moon with a vaisakha puja (sacramental offering).

Lay leaders take the lead in the more informal aspect of Wesak, which will occur over several days.

A devotee praying in front of a Buddha statue. (Kaikai/Dreamstime.com)

Gathering will include liberal amounts of food and drink, various artistic and cultural programming, and even academic discussions of Buddhist history and theology. This more informal program will usually begin immediately after the more formal rituals.

As Buddhism has become a recognized part of the global religious community and as the Buddhist diaspora have taken Buddhist to countries around the world, Wesak has acquired new functions. It is now a popular time for interaction between Buddhists of different sectarian and ethnic backgrounds, and a place to showcase the dialogue between Buddhists and their non-Buddhist neighbors. These functions have attained a high level of importance in the West, where Buddhists often exist as a religious minority.

Wesak is an official holiday in Hong Kong, Singapore, Thailand, Myanmar, Malaysia, Indonesia, India, and (since 1888) in Sri Lanka. In Tibet, February 8 is recognized as Parinirvana Day, a day to acknowledge the passing of Gautama Buddha. Wesak was accepted as the official Buddhist holiday by the United Nations in 1998. In Korea, Wesak is known as the Festival of the Lanterns. Along with the more familiar rituals conducted at Buddhist temples around the world, the Koreans decorate their temples and related structures with paper lanterns, covered with Buddhist symbols and inscribed with wishes for a long life. These lanterns will also be featured in parades through the street. The festival was designated as a Korean national holiday in 1975.

In the 20th century, several Western Esoteric groups have made an interesting appropriation of Wesak. In particular, theosophical teacher Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949) added three holidays that she saw as particularly relevant to the quest for spiritual enlightenment to the calendar of the Arcane School that she founded—Easter (full moon in April), the Day of Goodwill (full moon in June), and Wesak (full moon in May). In the 1970s, as Bailey's thought was integrated into the New Age movement, the celebration of Wesak as a ceremonial occasion spread far beyond the Arcane School and the several groups that had originated from it.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Bailey, Alice Ann; New Age Movement.

References

- Bailey, Alice A. "The Wesak Festival." <http://www.lucistrust.org/meetings/wesak2.shtml>. Accessed September 15, 2005.
- Ganeri, Aneri. Buddhist Festivals Through the Year. London: Watts Group, 2003.
- Ganeri, Aneri. Wesak. London: Heinemann Educational Books, 2002.
- Snelling, John. Buddhist Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Enterprises, 1987.
- Turpie, David. "Wesak and the Re-Creation of Buddhist Tradition." <http://www.mrsp.mcgill.ca/reports/html/Wesak/#111>. Accessed September 15, 2005.

Wesley, John

1703–1791

John Wesley, a priest in the Church of England, founded the Methodist movement in the 1740s. The Methodists would expand across the Atlantic during his long life and in the 19th century from their bases in England and the United States to become a global community.

John Wesley was born June 17, 1703, in the rectory at Epworth, England. He was the 15th of 19 children born to Samuel and Susannah Wesley. Samuel was an Anglican priest and an accomplished musician. Susannah was a Puritan, remembered for her dedication to the education of her children. Both John and his brother and hymn writer Charles Wesley (1707–1788), with whom much of his life would be intertwined, attended Oxford University.

The seriousness with which John pursued a religious quest was shown at Oxford, where he assumed leadership of an informal organization of students originally called together by his older brother and dubbed the Holy Club. After graduation and ordination, both he and Charles accepted an invitation of James Oglethorpe (1696–1785) to help build the religious life of his new colony of Georgia. On the voyage to America, John had his first encounter with members of the Moravian Church, whose Bishop August Spangenberg (1704–1792) pressed him on his personal religious life. That encounter bore fruit upon Wesley's return to England, where he encountered other Moravians, most notably Peter Böhler (1712–1775), and attended informal services at several lay-led religious societies in London. At one such society meeting on Aldersgate Street on May 24, 1738, he had a religious awakening, what he termed a “heart-warming experience,” which is generally seen as a founding event of the Methodist movement.

Portrait of Methodist leader John Wesley (1703–1791). (Hayward Cirkler and Blanche Cirkler, eds., Dictionary of American Portraits. New York: Dover Publications, Inc., 1967)

Wesley eventually broke with the Moravians over several issues the following year, and the first Wesley-led “Methodist” religious societies began to take shape. Members of the societies were invited into smaller intimate groups called classes.

Another Oxford classmate, George Whitefield, had a pilgrimage not unlike that of Wesley. He had taken a parish church, but had become a roving evangelist. While Wesley had been setting up work in London, Whitefield had been preaching in Bristol. Before leaving for a preaching tour of America, he turned his Bristol work over to Wesley. Bristol became the first site to which Methodism expanded outside of London. The movement, however, expanded throughout England and into Scotland and Ireland over the next decades, and as the movement spread, Wesley traveled throughout the British Isles periodically visiting the many Wesleyan societies.

Wesley regularly preached two or three times a day, and kept a daily journal of his activity. In addition, he wrote numerous books and created abridged editions of hundreds of others to educate the lay preachers that had emerged to assist him in leading the movement. Most prominent among his writings was a set of sermons that covered the basic teachings of Methodism and became an essential statement of its doctrinal position. In 1744, he began to hold conferences of the preachers at which he would answer their questions, the published minutes of their conferences becoming the major guide for the developing movement. Among the unique themes that Wesley developed was the need for Christians to lead a life of growing in grace and aiming at a separation from sin and toward becoming perfected in love.

Methodism evolved as a revitalization movement within the Church of England. In the 1760s the first classes and societies were organized in the American colonies. Wesley commissioned a number of preachers to travel through the colonies and build the movement; however, as the American Revolution began, all but one of those preachers, Francis Asbury (1745–1816), would return to their homeland. The success of the Revolution presented Wesley with a hard decision—what to do with the American Methodists. Unable to convince the Anglican authorities to assume responsibility for them, he assumed the office of a bishop and “set aside” two men, Thomas Coke (1747–1814) and Richard Whatcoat, as Methodist “superintendents” and assigned them the task of setting up American Methodism as an independent movement. At a conference held at Barrett’s Chapel in Delaware, they oversaw the consecration of Asbury as the first American Methodist bishop and the organization of the independent Methodist Episcopal Church (now the United Methodist Church).

In England, Wesley’s movement had followed a unique path. Following both his Anglican and Puritan roots, Wesley kept the movement officially within the established church, though it increasingly became a rival denomination. Wesley also adhered to the theology of Jacob Arminius (1560–1609), who had rejected the predestination so emphasized by John Calvin (1509–1564). Wesley preached a doctrine of the free grace of God immediately available to any who would turn and accept it. Only after his death would the Wesleyan movement finally reorganize as a separate church throughout the British Isles. Meanwhile, he and George Whitefield had parted company over the latter's Calvinism, and Whitefield went on to develop a form of Methodism that would later merge into the Presbyterian Church.

Wesley itinerated throughout the British Isles for some four decades, and during that time delivered more than 40,000 sermons (many of his sermons being repeated many times to different audiences). He remained active until close to the end of his life on March 2, 1791 in London. Among his last actions was the penning of a letter to William Wilberforce (1759–1833) supportive of his work to end slavery.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Arminius, Jacob; Calvin, John; Calvinism; Church of England; Epworth; United Methodist Church.

References

Since his death, there have been several attempts to collect and issue Wesley's writings as a set. The most recent began in 1976 by Abingdon Press. To date some 20 volumes have been issued.

Baker, Frank. John Wesley and the Church of England. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1970.

Collins, Kenneth J. A Real Christian: The Life of John Wesley. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2000.

Green, V. H. H. John Wesley. London and New York: University Press of America, 1987.

Heitzenrater, Richard P. The Elusive Mr. Wesley. 2nd ed. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2003.

Oden, Thomas C. John Wesley's Scriptural Christianity: A Plain Exposition of His Teaching on Christian Doctrine. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1994.

Wesley, John. The Heart of John Wesley's Journal.

Ed. by Percy Parker. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 2008.

Wesley, John. John Wesley's Sermons: An Anthology.

Ed. by Albert C. Outler et al. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1991.

Wesleyan Church

The Wesleyan Church, one of the leading products of the Holiness movement in the 19th century in the United States, was founded in 1968 by the merger of two older Holiness churches, the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Pilgrim Holiness Church. The Wesleyan Methodist Church originated in the abolitionist wing of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) in the 1840s. As the decade began, the church was divided into three factions; the largest groups were opposed to slavery but thought that it should be eradicated gradually over a period of time. On one side were many, primarily from the South, who tolerated or were even favorably disposed toward slavery. On the other side were the abolitionists, who demanded the immediate end to slavery.

As the debate became more intense, in 1843 a number of ministers and approximately 6,000 laymen withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church and formed the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Among their leaders were the Reverends Orange Scott (1800–1847), La Roy Sunderland (1805–1885), and L. C. Matlock. The new church not only took a strong position against slavery but also condemned the use of tobacco and alcohol, opposed membership in secret societies, and advocated modest dress. The church decided against reinstating the episcopacy, and instead chose to be led by a president elected by the members. Over the next decades the church was also drawn into the Holiness movement and its search for congregations of sanctified believers. The Wesleyan tradition had held out the possibility of every believer's becoming sanctified or perfect in love, as a work of grace on the soul by an act of the Holy Spirit. A renewed emphasis on sanctification spread throughout U.S. Methodist churches in the years after the Civil War.

The Pilgrim Holiness Church, merged into the Holiness movement, was losing favor in the Methodist Episcopal Church, which at the end of the 19th century attempted to distance itself from the understanding of sanctification that had become normative within the Holiness movement. In 1897 two former Methodist ministers who had resigned from the church, Martin Wells Knapp (1853–1901) and Seth Cook Rees (1854–1933), founded the International Holiness Union and Prayer League in Cincinnati, Ohio. Emphasis was on holiness, spiritual healing, evangelism, and the Second Coming of Christ. As it grew the union evolved, and in 1922 it took the name Pilgrim Holiness Church. Through the 1920s, several other groups with similar origins merged into the new church.

Following the merger of the two churches in 1968, a modified episcopal government was established. The general superintendents (bishops) constitute the Board of General Superintendents. There are two legislative bodies, the North American General Conference and the Philippine General Conference, and all of the units of the church, including the work in more than 40 countries of the world, are attached to one of these two governing bodies. The International Center of the church was moved from Marion, Indiana, to Indianapolis in 1987.

In 2005 the Wesleyan Church reported 116,151 members in the United States and 5,927 in Canada. Internationally, in 2008, it reported some 400,000 adherents in 4,000 churches and missions in 80 countries. The church supports several colleges, universities, and seminaries. The church is a member of the Christian Holiness Partnership, World Methodist Council, and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the World Evangelical Fellowship.

Wesleyan Church World Headquarters
13300 Olio Road
Fishers, IN 46037
<http://www.wesleyan.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Holiness Partnership; Holiness Movement; United Methodist Church; World Evangelical Fellowship; World Methodist Council.

References

- McLeister, Ira Ford, and Roy S. Nicolson. History of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Marion, IN: Wesley, 1959.
- Thomas, Paul Westphal, and Paul William Thomas. The Days of Our Pilgrimage: The History of the Pilgrim Holiness Church. Marion, IN: Wesley, 1976.

Western Buddhist Order, Friends of the

The Friends of the Western Buddhist Order (FWBO) organization was founded in London by an Englishman, Sangharakshita (Dennis Lingwood, b. 1925), in 1967. A year later the Western Buddhist Order came into being, composed of both women and men. The FWBO seeks to give Buddhism a modern, up-to-date shape, fitting Western sensibilities. The FWBO is not aligned to a specific Buddhist tradition in Asia, but rather strives to create a Western form of Buddhist interpretation, practice, and organizational form.

The FWBO uses the texts and teachings of various Buddhist developments and traditions. Basic to the FWBO is its reference to the spirit of the original teaching, as Sangharakshita calls it. This “original teaching” and the “spirit” are to be brought to light again, to be reawakened. To that end, Western art and literature—among others, William Blake, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, and Friedrich Nietzsche—are also introduced as so-called bridges to an understanding of the dharma (Buddhist teachings). This eclectic intra-Buddhist and interphilosophical approach also applies to the practices favored. Common are Buddhist meditation exercises from the Theravada tradition, especially those of the “mindfulness of breathing” (Pali: anapanasati) and the “cultivation of loving-kindness” (metta bhavana), but techniques from Zen and Tibetan traditions (such as visualization practices) are also used. Members regularly take part in pujas (worship) that include chanting, bowing, and prostration.

The authoritative and organizational focal point of the movement is the Western Buddhist Order. Order members are ordained in a ceremony, taking specific precepts, the title Dharmachari or Dharmacharini (male or female, Dharma-farer), and a religious name in Sanskrit or Pali. Order members might be single or married, live in celibacy and have full-time employment. Many, although not all, Order members live together in residential communities. Such communities, most often single-sex, are usually found near a center of the FWBO. The centers are visited by interested people and “friends”—that is, members of the FWBO. At the centers, Order members offer regular programs, including meditation classes, public talks, study on Buddhist themes and texts, and “bodywork” such as t’ai chi, yoga, and massage. In addition to the communities and the Buddhist centers, the FWBO has founded Right Livelihood cooperatives, such as vegetarian restaurants, whole food shops, or the successful wholesale and retail gift business Windhorse Trading in Cambridge, England. The movement’s three pillars—communities, centers, and cooperatives—aim to change the local as well as the overall Western society, and to bring about a “New Society.”

Founded in Britain in the late 1960s, a decade later, the FWBO began to gain a foothold in other European countries and overseas. An especially strong branch exists in western India, where Sangharakshita had supported Buddhist leader Babasaheb Ambedkar’s conversion movement during the mid-1950s. Apart from Europe and India, FWBO institutions exist in Australia, New Zealand, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, and Nepal, and throughout North and South America. In Britain the movement has founded some 30 centers and 35 local groups (as of 1997), having grown to become one of Britain’s principal Buddhist organizations. Globally, there are about 55 city centers, 15 retreat centers, and numerous local groups and cooperatives. In late 2000 the Order had approximately 900 members; the number of supporters and “friends” is estimated to be about 100,000, the vast majority of them being Buddhists in India. The FWBO publishes several journals, among them Dharma Life, and it has a prolific book-publishing house (Windhorse Publications).

During the 1990s, Sangharakshita started handing on responsibilities to senior Order members. Sangharakshita authorized these members to conduct ordinations and to take spiritual leadership. The selected members collectively compose the Preceptors College Council (19 persons), based in Birmingham, England.

A core group of this council, five men and three women, form the College of Public Preceptors. From this a chairman is elected to take the leadership of the order and thus of the entire movement. Although in the future the chairman is to be elected by the whole college and council for a term of five years (re-electable), the first chairman was chosen by Sangharakshita in the autumn of 2000. The movement’s founder appointed senior member Dharmachari Subhuti (Alex Kennedy), who authored a prominent book about the FWBO and Sangharakshita.

Friends of the Western Buddhist Order
Communications Office
12 Park Rd.
Moseley, Birmingham B13 8AB
UK
<http://www.fwbo.org/>

Martin Baumann

See also: Ambedkar Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West: The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley: Parallax, 1994.
- Baumann, Martin. “Work as Dharma Practice: Right Livelihood Cooperatives of the FWBO.” In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 372–393. Boston: Wisdom, 2000.
- Bluck, Robert. British Buddhism Teachings, Practice and Development. Abingdon: Routledge, 2006.
- Sangharakshita. The Rainbow Road. Birmingham: Windhorse, 1997.
- Sangharakshita: A New Voice in the Buddhist Tradition*. Birmingham: Windhorse, 1994.
- Subhuti, Dharmachari. Buddhism for Today: A Portrait of a New Buddhist Movement. Glasgow: Windhorse, 1988.

◆ Western Esoteric Tradition

“Esoteric” (Greek: esoterós) is a comparative term, meaning “more inward,” in contrast to “exoteric”

(Greek: exoterós), which means “more outward.” This usage, rooted in the terminology of Greek philosophy, presupposes a duality of insiders and outsiders. The defining characteristics of the esotericist are identification with the inside group, and consequent access to special or secret knowledge.

A prejudice in favor of classical Greece tends to date the Western Esoteric tradition from Pythagoras (sixth century BCE) and to root it in his travels in Egypt and Babylon. However, the legendary visit to Pythagoras of Abaris, a priest of Apollo from Hyperborea, points to an existing esoteric tradition in Northern Europe. The achievements in mathematics and astronomy of megalithic culture (fifth to second millennia BCE) bear witness to a technically educated elite, and almost certainly to a concomitant spiritual science. A residue of this prehistoric tradition survives in Celtic and Germanic myth and legend, and in what little is known of the Druids and other Pagan schools of the north.

The school of Pythagoras, which is much better documented, was divided into auditors (akousmatikoi) and students (mathematikoi). The auditors, seated outside the veil that hid the master as he spoke, received unexplained, dogmatic precepts, while the students were initiated into the reasons and realities behind these teachings. As the Greek name for the esoteric group suggests, one of their chief disciplines was mathematics. The same was true of Plato’s Academy (fourth century BCE), whose portal bore the inscription “Let none ignorant of geometry enter.”

Plato’s teachings, following Pythagorean tradition, had an exterior side devoted to ethical questions and the education of the rational mind. That is their better-known aspect, immortalized in the Socratic dialogues. The esoteric side, in which Plato’s debt to the earlier school is more evident, combined a science of number with a science of the soul. Platonic mathematics embodied insights, revolutionary for their time, into cosmology, harmony, and the invariable laws of the natural world. It is more difficult to reconstruct the Platonic science of the soul, because this was predicated on concepts and experiences that transcended verbal and logical expression.

However, there is little doubt that the inmost circles of Pythagoreans and Platonists alike were concerned with matters classified today as mystical and occult. Their ultimate purpose was to prepare the student for death and its aftermath. In this respect they resembled the initiations of the Eleusinian and other mysteries, but with the difference that the philosophers sought not just a life-changing experience but also understanding.

Portrait of Plato, one of the most influential philosophers of the Western world (fifth and fourth centuries BCE). (Library of Congress)

The first centuries BCE and CE saw an international revival of interest in Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy that left its mark in the writings of Cicero, Ovid, and Virgil. Some of the prime movers were Cicero’s friend Nigidius Figulus, a Roman neo-Pythagorean; Philo of Alexandria, who tried to reconcile the Greek philosophies with his native Judaism; the traveling magus Apollonius of Tyana; and the scholarly Plutarch, a priest of Apollo at Delphi.

Simultaneously there came the mystery religions from Egypt and the East, with their message of personal relationship with a savior god or goddess. The most widespread was Mithraism, which traveled with the Roman army to the outermost bounds of the empire. Mithraism as a whole was an esoteric cult that successfully guarded its secrets from outsiders. Within it, as in most esoteric groups, there was a further sifting of members as they progressed, through initiations, into ever more inward circles.

The philosophical revival, combined with the mysteries, was the soil out of which grew the great neo-Platonic movement of the third to sixth centuries CE, with its centers in Alexandria (Ammonius Saccas, Plotinus), Syria (Porphyry, Iamblichus), Rome (the later Plotinus, Porphyry), Carthage (Apuleius), and Athens (Proclus, Damascius). This was also the time during which Christianity rose to become the official religion of the Roman Empire.

The neo-Platonists at first ignored Christianity, as they had ignored Judaism, as being irrelevant to their interests. The exoteric society of which they constituted, by their own reckoning, the esoteric elite, was one of tolerant polytheism. Given their philosophic keys, they could easily discover the metaphysical and cosmological realities concealed in the Greco-Roman mythology and in everyday religious practice. The neo-Platonists were thoroughly in favor of the latter, being well aware of how much the established temple cults contributed to private piety and public order.

During the later period of the Roman Empire, they supported the convergence of cults toward a solar monotheism.

The new savior-religion of Christianity, originally an offshoot of Judaism, borrowed eclectically from the solar cult, from Gnosticism, and from the Egyptian and Mithraic mysteries. To an outsider, its most striking aspects were the solidarity of its followers and their contempt for all other religions. Spreading at first among the lowest classes, then among patrician women, it became a political force in proportion to the weakening of the empire. In the process it discarded most of its founder's teachings, as being too unworldly and disruptive of the social fabric, and built a powerful hierarchy of its own. After it achieved primacy as the empire's official religion (325), it set to work to liquidate its competitors.

After the failure of Emperor Julian to reinstitute the worship of the old gods (360–363), Greco-Roman Paganism was doomed, along with its esoteric academies and mystery schools. The closing of the Athenian Academy in 529 marked the end of a millennium-long tradition.

Esotericism lived on despite Christianity, not because of it. Primitive Christianity was essentially a way of love and renunciation, indifferent to profane learning and the natural sciences, and suspicious of any attempt to find salvation outside the church. The esoteric path, in contrast, is one of knowledge, or gnosis. Those for whom the science of the cosmos and the science of the soul were a consuming passion adapted the Christian framework for their own purposes. (The same happened with the Sufis in the Muslim world.) An example is the extraordinary figure known as Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (seventh century). His mapping of the angelic hierarchy and its earthly parallel in the hierarchy of the church is a typically esoteric exercise, drawing on the doctrine of correspondences, in which heaven and Earth reflect one another. His “negative theology,” similar to the higher metaphysical flights of Plotinus, bypasses all the dogmatic assertions that the “positive” theologians argued over.

There is little doubt that Dionysius was also an accomplished mystic, but esotericism is not the same as mysticism. The mystic, driven by love and emotion, yearns for union with God—an experience which, unexamined, can lead to delusion or fanaticism. The seeker after esoteric knowledge wants the transformative gnosis that reveals the true nature of himself, the world, and the divine. In a prescientific age, when illiteracy and superstition were the norm, this path of knowledge began with mathematics and natural science, logic, and the analysis of language. For this reason, Aristotle was nearly as important a contributor to it as Plato.

During the centuries after Dionysius, neo-Platonism continued to attract Christians unfulfilled by religious observance alone. The School of Chartres (11th to 13th centuries), inspired by Plato's Pythagorean dialogue Timaeus and by the encyclopedic work of Boethius, revived the sciences of number. Their lasting memorial is the Gothic cathedral, a triumph of geometry and the constructive imagination. The technical knowledge that went into this was the jealously guarded property of the master-masons, who came in time to constitute an esoteric brotherhood of their own.

The pointed arch that is the basis of Gothic architecture had appeared long before in the Arab world, where, too, the works of Aristotle, the Platonists, and the Greek scientists were studied in translation. Among other ancient sciences that passed through the Arabs to Christian Europe was alchemy, or the “Hermetic art.” For four centuries and more, alchemy served as the principal nexus of the Western Esoteric tradition. It provided a cover under which one could pursue an esoteric path, in a more or less conscious way. There was nothing in it to disturb Christian orthodoxy: even the ambition to make gold could be excused by a wish to help the poor. When practiced at the physical level, it gave a plenitude of insights into organic and inorganic nature. When the alchemist became more identified with the work, it began to operate its transmutations simultaneously on the human subject. In some cases, laboratory work was entirely omitted, and the alchemical processes were carried out through active imagination alone. Then mercury, sulphur, salt, and so forth were allegories of states of mind and soul that were explored and manipulated in the cause of transformative knowledge.

The traditional secrecy of esotericism also applied to alchemy, in which the essential points were conveyed by word of mouth from master to pupil. For instance, no one ever stated outright what their First Matter was, or their Secret Fire. Moreover, just as Pythagorean cosmology included information such as heliocentrism, which remained unknown to the world in general for 2,000 years, so alchemy probably included some secrets about the natural world that have yet to be rediscovered. In both cases, esotericists act as the scientific preceptors of humanity, but only when the time is ripe. Until then, their ideas would be met with mockery or suppression.

The science of the soul that is the other side of esoteric training was even more alien to the majority and to their exoteric guardians—in earlier times, the church; in later ones, scientific materialism. For instance, all the neo-Platonists followed Pythagoras in embracing the doctrine of reincarnation. Exactly what they understood by that—what it is that they supposed to reincarnate—is a complex question. But certainly they did not envisage the after-death state of the soul as the Christians did: as an eternity of heaven, or else of hell. Nor could any philosophic mind take seriously the cult of relics, the trade in indulgences, the prayers to saints, and all the other apparatus that hinged on this belief concerning the afterlife. As for the idea of the New Testament, and even more the Old, as infallible works of divine inspiration, the Catholic Church did well to leave their improprieties and self-contradictions in the decent obscurity of Latin.

The existence of esoteric groups during the Middle Ages is beyond doubt, but largely beyond our historical grasp. Symptoms of their existence appear, as mentioned, in the Masonic guilds; also in the Courts of Love in southern France; in the Sicilian court of Emperor Frederick II; in the Knights Templar; and in Dante. But it is in the nature of esotericism not to advertise itself, nor to admit potentially unworthy and indiscreet persons to its secrets. The science of “how man makes himself immortal” (Dante’s words) was transmitted along the thinnest of threads.

During the 15th century, the rediscovery and translation of Greek texts, especially the neo-Platonists and the Corpus Hermeticum, led to a renaissance of classical Pagan philosophy. The Byzantine philosopher George Gemistus Plethon planted the idea that divine wisdom was inherent in all religions, and that an “ancient theology” or a “perennial philosophy” had existed since the earliest ages, of which Christianity was the latest (if the most perfect) manifestation. The Roman Academy of Pomponio Leto went so far in its revival of antiquity that it was dissolved by papal order and its members imprisoned. Marsilio Ficino, head of the Florentine Academy, re-created the Orphic invocations and practiced astrological magic; his younger colleague Pico della Mirandola added Jewish Kabbalah to the mixture.

Early in the 16th century, Henry Cornelius Agrippa compiled an encyclopedia of natural, astrological, and Kabbalistic magic that has yet to be superseded. Neo-Platonic ideas permeated the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture with an alternative mythology to that of Christianity.

All of these developments hinted at the possibility of an initiatic path existing outside the church, but they were soon extinguished. The climate of controversy and religious wars following the Reformation made it dangerous enough to be the wrong sort of Christian, let alone Pagan. Alchemy alone survived as a visible and acceptable witness to an Esoteric tradition.

In the 17th and 18th centuries, the two components of traditional Esotericism parted company. The science of the cosmos and of number became secularized in the Scientific Revolution, while the science of the soul found a new home in Protestant mysticism, invigorated by the example of Jacob Boehme (1575–1624). This “Theosophy” took for granted the Christian revelation contained in the Bible, but, like alchemy, regarded the Book of Nature as a parallel revelation in which the divine mind could be penetrated. Leaning to piety and mysticism rather than to philosophy, the Boehmians (or Behmenists) were the chief if not the only Esoteric tradition through the Age of Reason. Another candidate for the title is Freemasonry, especially in its more Theosophical, magical, and alchemical offshoots.

Although the majority of lodges were fraternal and political in intent, they offered a haven for discreet meetings and transmissions, while their symbolism had evident links with the ancient mysteries. Some of them, such as those frequented by the young Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), gave access to Jewish esoteric teachings, notably those on sexual magic. With good reason, the church was suspicious of Freemasonry in all its varieties.

The Romantic era was a time of philosophical ferment comparable to the Roman Empire period and to the 15th century. Once again, European Esoteric traditions (Boehmian Theosophy, Freemasonry) met with extra-European influences, now coming from Persia, India, and China. Christianity, much weakened politically and discredited in the minds of many intellectuals, no longer served as the unquestioned substratum of belief. The first stages of Esotericism became freely accessible: the opportunity to study and cultivate, not merely to save, one’s own soul; the opening of the world of the imagination through poetry and music; communion with a living nature.

However, no philosophical academies existed to carry the aspirant further, and the end-point was often a pantheistic mysticism.

The Romantic attitude also made itself felt as an alternative current to the natural sciences, deprecated today because of its unacceptable metaphysics (that is, because it is not based on the materialistic assumption). Some examples are the medical practices of Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815); the theories of metamorphosis and of color espoused by Goethe (1749–1832); the homeopathy of Samuel Hahnemann (1755–1843); the universal science based on the doctrine of correspondences of Lorenz Oken (1779–1851); and the experiments of the later Mesmerists with animal magnetism and altered states of consciousness. The connection of these with Esoteric philosophy is obvious. Even more so is that of the Psychological Research Society, whose chief object was to settle the question of the soul’s survival. Until World War I, some major figures in the natural sciences (for example, William Barrett, William Crookes, Oliver Lodge, Charles Richet, and Johann Zöllner) were dedicated to such research.

Both of these tendencies—the concordance of Western with Eastern traditions, and the pursuit of a non-materialistic science—met in the Theosophical Society. Founded in 1875 by Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Henry S. Olcott (1832–1907), with a large contribution from the medium Emma Hardinge Britten (1823–1899), the Society was at first devoted to practical research into occultism. The 1880s saw the emergence of a rival group, the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor, largely based on the teachings of the American medium Pascal B. Randolph (1825–1875). Its influence was out of all proportion to its modest operation, which was not through personal contact or ritual but through a correspondence course in self-initiation. In the same decade the Theosophical Society founded an Esoteric Section, which still exists but whose activities have never been revealed. A little later, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn provided more glamorous opportunities for ceremonial magic and initiatic ritual. Its vocabulary was Hermetic, Kabbalistic, Rosicrucian, and Enochian (that is, based on the “angelic conversations” of John Dee). Later offshoots of the Golden Dawn, notably those led by Dion Fortune (1891–1946) and Gareth Knight, were more Christocentric, as was the Anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925).

The Western attraction to Eastern philosophies and to practices such as meditation and yoga was the most visible Esoteric phenomenon of the 20th century, comparable again to the influx of the Oriental mystery-religions (including Christianity) into the Roman Empire. Buddhism, first in its Japanese (Zen) then in its Tibetan form, provided a popular alternative religion to many former Christians and Jews. Toward the end of the century, the residue of all these tendencies—alternative science, occultism, Orientalism—congealed in the New Age movement.

At this point it is impossible to define a single Western Esoteric tradition. Some Christian Esotericists imagine an initiatic lineage going back to the secret teachings of Jesus himself, but the evidence, to an outsider, is nonexistent. Rather, the repeated impulses toward a “more inward” path seem to have led outside the Christianity of the churches, and the more so when the goal is knowledge of self and cosmos rather than mystical union. The fundamental teaching of Christianity is love, and its basis in the Gospels is anti-hierarchical and anti-individualistic. If in practice it has consistently violated those principles, they still remain as a powerful personal and social ideal, with their own virtues and rewards. To choose the Esoteric path is essentially to prefer self-perfection or self-realization to these ideals, which is why the Christian churches, unlike Hinduism, Buddhism, or Greco-Roman paganism, have never had a comfortable relationship with their Gnostic and Esoteric members.

Joscelyn Godwin

See also: Agrippa von Nettesheim, Heinrich Cornelius; Anthroposophical Society; Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn; New Age Movement; Steiner, Rudolf; Swedenborg, Emanuel; Theosophical Society (America).

References

- Faivre, Antoine. Access to Modern Esotericism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- Faivre, Antoine. Theosophy, Imagination, Tradition: Studies in Western Esotericism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Faivre, Antoine, and Jacob Needleman, eds. Modern Esoteric Spirituality. New York: Crossroad, 1992.
- Godwin, Joscelyn. Mystery Religions in the Ancient World. London: Thames and Hudson, 1981.
- Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Godwin, Joscelyn, Christian Chanel, and John Patrick Deveney, eds. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor: Historical and Initiatic Documents of an Order of Practical Occultism. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1995.

Hanegraaff, Wouter J. New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought. Leiden: Brill, 1996.

Introvigne, Massimo. Il cappello del mago: I nuovi movimenti magici, dallo spiritismo al satanismo. Milano: Sugar Co., 1990.

Melton, J. Gordon, ed. Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology. 2 vols. Detroit: Gale Group, 2001.

Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971.

Western Sahara

See Sahara.

White Brotherhood

The White Brotherhood, an occult order founded at the end of the 19th century, was formed in Bulgaria by Peter Konstantinov Deunov (1864–1944), better known by his spiritual name, Beinsa Douno. As a member of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, Douno had considered becoming a monk. Instead, he became a school-teacher. He later moved to the United States to attend seminary. He finally received one degree in religion and another in medicine. In the United States he had encountered the Rosicrucians and was also conscious of the Bogomils, an ancient Esoteric group from his own land. His first book, Science and Education, appeared in 1896. After returning to Bulgaria, he entered a period of seclusion and, in 1897, reported an initiatory experience during which he felt the Spirit of God descending upon him. When he finally reappeared to take students, he was recognized as having attained his masterhood. In what would be the first of regular annual meetings in August 1900, he created the White Brotherhood. His first three students were the only

Members of an international religious movement called the White Brotherhood perform their ritual dance, Panevritmia, as part of their New Year celebration on Rila Mountain, about 75 miles south of the Bulgarian capital Sofia, August 18, 2007. (AP/Wide World Photos) members. The teachings became the basis for a series of books by Douno.

Douno traveled widely, and the organization developed a following throughout Bulgaria through its first decade. In 1914 he declared the advent of the new age of Aquarius and relocated to Sofia, the capital. Because it was wartime, his activities came under official scrutiny, and signs of tension with authorities appeared. In August 1915, the annual meeting was disrupted and Douno was expelled from the town in which it was held. In 1917 the Holy Synod of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church pressured the authorities to have the Brotherhood expelled from Sofia. Finally in 1922, in response to Douno's opening a School of the Great White Brotherhood in Sofia, the church excommunicated Douno and many of his followers. Various further attempts to suppress the movement included the arrest of members and the disruption of meetings.

In spite of its critics, however, the movement persisted. In 1926 a new headquarters complex, including a publishing center, was erected at Izfrevna, near Sofia.

Douno's teachings included the practice of paneurhythmy, a set of exercises set to music. First introduced in 1934, the exercises were integral to the work when it opened its first group in Paris (1936), Latvia, and Estonia. Further spread of the movement was stopped, first by World War II, and then by the changes in the political situation following the war. Douno's death in 1944 occurred only a few weeks after the Soviet army took control of his homeland.

Not really understanding the drastic nature of post-war political changes, the Brotherhood reorganized in 1945 under a council and continued as it had prior to the war. Only three years later, their headquarters property was nationalized (and then leveled in 1970). Realizing now that they existed in a new, hostile environment, Brotherhood leaders took steps to preserve Douno's writings, an important move, as in 1957 the government confiscated all of Douno's books. Meanwhile, Douno's work had spread to Western Europe and the United States. His writings were translated and published. At the same time, Omraam Mikhael Aivanhov, whom in 1938 Douno had sent to take charge of the work in Paris, founded his own movement to perpetuate Douno's teachings as he understood and interpreted them. Aivanhov's work continues as the Universal Great Brotherhood.

Douno saw the White Brotherhood as embodying the true spirituality of Christianity and making a modern transmission of the eternal religion of Christ. The White Brotherhood thus continues the mystical Church of St. John, as opposed to the official church, the Church of St. Peter. Suppressed in the lands controlled by the Soviet Union, the White Brotherhood had only a few followers in the West. It was again allowed to hold meetings in the 1970s, and then in the 1990s it revived in Bulgaria as political changes brought a new level of religious freedom. It was officially recognized in November 1990, and a periodical was reinstated the following year. The rebuilding of the White Brotherhood community and educational center in Sofia began in 1995.

Today the Brotherhood exists as a vital international organization. Douno's Bulgarian followers have translated a number of his works into English and other Western languages, the first of which translations appeared in the 1960s.

Society White Brotherhood, Bulgaria
c/o Chairman: Andrey Griva
Vitoshki ezera Street 48
Sofia 1334
Bulgaria
http://www.beinsadouno.org/old/in_en.htm

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Universal Great Brotherhood.

References

Douno, Beinsa. The Master Speaks: The Word of the Great White Brotherhood. Los Angeles: Sunrise, 1970.

Douno, Beinsa. Paneurhythmy: Supreme Cosmic Rhythm. Sofia, Bulgaria: Bialo Bratstvo Publishers, 2004.

Douno, Beinsa. Reminiscences: Talks with the Master. Los Angeles: Sunrise, 1968.

Douno, Beinsa. The Teachings of Beinsa Douno: Pearls of Love. Glasgow: Beyond the Rising Sun, n.d.

White Fathers

The White Fathers (officially the Society of Missionaries of Africa), as the name implies, has been one of the more important organizations assisting the spread of the Roman Catholic Church in the modern world, especially on the continent of Africa. The order was founded in 1868 by Charles M. Lavigerie (1825–1892), then the archbishop of Algiers. Algeria was at the time a French colony. The occasion for the founding was a typhoid epidemic in Algiers, and the first assignment of the members was the care of children and youth orphaned by the illness. The order subsequently gained oversight of various missionary centers in the country. They adapted a habit designed from the clothing commonly worn in North Africa.

In 1878, Lavigerie submitted a plan to evangelize Central Africa to Rome. It was approved, and he was appointed the apostolic delegate for equatorial Africa. The first group headed for Tanganyika (now Tanzania) and established work in the western part of the country and in Uganda. They were joined by new personnel annually. Twenty-two missionaries who were killed in the late 19th century in Uganda were canonized in 1964. The work spread to the Congo and the Sudan (1894), and in the early 20th century to Guinea, Mali, Upper Volta (Burkina Faso), and Ghana. In the years since World War II, they have also accepted work assignments in Nigeria and Mozambique.

The final approval of the White Fathers' constitution occurred in 1908. Members take an oath of dedication to the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church on the African continent. Only with the approval of the pope may they work outside of Africa. In 1880 the pope requested that they assume responsibility for opening a seminary in Jerusalem for the training of the clergy of the Melkite Catholic Church. To date, that has been their only work outside of Africa, except for centers in the West, where members are recruited and trained. Such centers are found in the United States, for example, at Franklin, Pennsylvania (novitiate); Onchiota, New York (seminary); and Washington, D.C. (headquarters). The work of the White Fathers is divided into provinces, the first of which were designated in 1936.

Lavigerie also founded a second order, the missionary Society of Our Lady of Africa, a female society popularly known as the White Sisters. It took special responsibility for improving the spiritual and material life of African women. Like their male counterparts, the White Sisters have spread across Africa, where they currently manage more than 150 houses. They also maintain a presence in Europe and the United States where administration, recruitment, and training occur.

White Fathers

Via della Nocetta 111

Roma 00164

Italy

http://www.thewhitefathers.org.uk/home_pg.shtml

(White Fathers, United Kingdom)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Melkite Catholic Church; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- De Arteche, J. The Cardinal of Africa: Charles Lavigerie, Founder of the White Fathers. London: Catholic Book Club, 1964.
- Kittler, Glen D. The White Fathers: A Chronicle of Nearly a Hundred Years of Saintly Heroism in Africa. London: W. H. Allen, 1957.
- Matheson, Elizabeth Mary. African Apostles. Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1963.
- Shorter, Aylward. Cross And Flag in Africa: The "White Fathers During" during the Colonial Scramble (1892–1914). Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2006.

White Plum Asanga

The White Plum Asanga is an organization designed to promote unity and maintain harmonious relationships among the Dharma successors of Japanese Buddhist teacher Taizan Maezumi Daiocho (1931–1995), the founder of the Zen Center of Los Angeles. Maezumi Roshi originally received Dharma transmission from Hakujun Kuroda, Roshi in 1955, but additionally received inka (approval as a teacher) from Koryu Osaka, Roshi, and Hakuun Yasutani Roshi. The members of the Asanga also look to Baian Hakujun Daiocho as the “honorary” founder of the White Plum Asanga. He headed the Supreme Court of the main Soto Zen group in Japan and was one of the leading figures of Japanese Zen.

The Asanga promotes communication and provides a forum for conflict resolution among members, as well as other Buddhist schools and traditions. Many of those who hold their lineage from Maezumi Roshi are currently leaders of otherwise independent autonomous Zen centers and associations. The White Plum Asanga extends voting membership to all who received shiho (Dharma lineage) from Maezumi Roshi, who trained 12 Dharma successors: Bernard Tetsugen Glassman, Dennis Genpo Merzel, Charlotte Joko Beck, Jan Chozen Bays, John Daido Looi, Gerry Shishin Wick, John Teshin Sanderson, Alfred Jitsudo Ancheta, Charles Tenshin Fletcher, Susan Myoyu Andersen, Nicolee Jikyo Miller, and William Nyogen Yeo.

By the time Maezumi Roshi died in 1995, his students had in turn passed the Dharma lineage to nine second-generation teachers. Since then, many more have received the lineage and have spread it across North America to Europe and South America. By 2009, some 82 Zen teachers were part of the White Plume Sangha.

Bernard Glassman, one of the original founding members of the Zen center of Los Angeles, was a leading force in the formation of the White Plume Asanga, and then in 1996 led in the formation of the Soto Zen Buddhist Association, which has brought the teachers of the Maezumi Roshi lineage into fellowship with teachers of other Soto Zen lineages in the West. Shortly before his death, Maezumi Roshi gave inka to his senior disciple Tetsugen Glassman, Roshi. In this context, inka is considered an approval above and beyond Dharma transmission (shilo). It is granted only to someone considered to be an enlightened successor of the Buddha. Glassman later transmitted inka to Genpo Merzel, Roshi head of the Big Mind Western Zen Center (and associated zendos) in Salt Lake City. He has passed inka to John Daido Looi, Zen Mountain Monastery in Mount Tremper, New York. Genpo Merzel, Roshi is currently the president of the White Plum Sangha (2008).

White Plum Asanga
Zen Mountain Monastery
PO Box 197
South Plank Rd.
Mt. Tremper, NY 12457
<http://www.mro.org/zmm/white-plum.shtml>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Soto Zen Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Ford, James Ismael. Zen Master Who?: A Guide to the People and Stories of Zen. Ithaca, NY: Wisdom Publications, 2006.
- Maezumi, Hakuyu Taizan, and Bernard Glassman. On Zen Practice: Body, Breath, Mind. Ithaca, NY: Wisdom Publications, 2002.

White, Ellen G.

1827–1915

Ellen Gould Harmon White was a prophetess, a health reformer, and, with her husband, the co-founder of the Seventh-day Adventist Church (SDA). She emerged in the 1850s among the disappointed followers of William Miller who had accepted the idea of Jesus returning in 1843–1844.

Ellen was born on November 26, 1827, in Gorham, Maine. When she was nine years old, she was accidentally hit in the head with a rock that left her unconscious for three weeks. She was henceforth unable to attend school and attempting to read always made her dizzy.

She was raised in a Methodist family, and in 1842 in her mid-teens experienced a conversion and joined the church. Her spiritual awakening occurred just as the movement built around William Miller's predictions concerning Christ's imminent return was reaching a fever pitch across the United States. Ellen's parents identified with the movement, and in 1843 the Methodists disfellowshipped them. They then lived through the Great Disappointment, when Christ did not return in 1844.

As Ellen passed into adulthood, she became one of several people who tried to rally the Adventist community. While others were revising Miller's calculations and setting new dates, she reinterpreted the events of 1844, proclaiming to the audiences that she addressed that Christ really had returned in 1844, only not as expected. Rather than come to Earth visibly, he had moved into the heavenly sanctuary, which he was now cleansing (Daniel 8:14). As soon as that task was completed, he would appear visibly.

As she was rethinking Miller's prophecies, Ellen met James White (1821–1881), and in 1846 they were married. They encountered some Seventh-day Baptists, who convinced them of the correctness of Sabbath worship, and they in turn introduced Sabbatarianism to the larger Adventist community. Sabbatarianism proved a first step for some Adventists to develop a new appreciation for Jewish law and culture. Over the next decades some would begin to follow the Jewish feast cycle, adopt Jewish dietary rules, and even begin using Jewish names for the Creator and his Son. White would become interested in diet reform and would develop a famous sanatorium close to church headquarters set up in Battle Creek, Michigan, 1851.

Through the 1860s, Adventism would remain a fluid movement as individual Adventists would decide about key issues concerning such matters as the new dates for Christ's return proposed by different leaders. White injected herself into the process with her advocacy of Sabbath worship and then her emergence as a visionary and prophetess. James White was a publisher and created a periodical through which Ellen's views, visions, and prophecies could be quickly disseminated and/or turned into pamphlets and books.

By the end of the 1850s, the following that had coalesced around the Whites began to be referred to as the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which was formally organized in 1863. The long-lived Ellen would lead the church over the next half century. During this time, she wrote 25 books and some 200 shorter works.

White died on July 16, 1915, in St. Helena, California. She was revered as a biblical interpreter and a prophet/visionary. Her prophetic works are still considered authoritative within the church though a spectrum of opinion exists as to just how the visionary material is to be used. The church she created had a missionary zeal that grew out of its belief in the approaching end of the present era. That zeal had carried it into more than 200 countries as the 21st century began.

A controversy concerning White's prophecies surfaced in the late 1970s following the publication of a book by then church member Ronald L. Numbers that suggested a variety of purely mundane explanations for the supposed supernatural experiences underlying the prophecies. He subsequently left the church and has remained a sympathetic critic. Meanwhile, a number of volumes appeared defending White.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Great Disappointment; Methodism; Sabbatarianism; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Nichol, Francis D. Ellen G. White and Her Critics. Takoma Park, MD: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1951.
- Numbers, Ronald L., Prophetess of Health: A Study of Ellen G. White. New York: Harper & Row, 1976; Rev. ed.: Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.
- White, Ellen G., Early Writings of Ellen G. White. 1882. Washington, DC: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1945.
- White, Ellen G., The Great Controversy Between Christ and Satan. 1911. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press Publishing Association, 1950.
- White, Ellen G., Life Sketches of Ellen G. White. 1915. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press Publishing Association, 1943.

Wiccan Religion

The Wiccan religion is a worldwide nature religion with roots in the ancient past and contemporary times. Also known as Wicca, the Old Religion, the Craft, and Witchcraft, it incorporates revivals, adaptations, and continuations of ancient folkways, symbology, and spiritual practices from old Pagan Europe and the classical civilizations of Greece, Rome, Egypt, and Mesopotamia. These include the ritual kindling of bonfires; celebrations of transition points in the cycles of nature; ecstatic dance and trance; use of intuitive perception and imaginal intention (magic); and developing and sustaining spiritual relationships with animals, plants, places, ancestors, and other forms of the Divine. In the 20th century, several major influences converged to shape the Wiccan religion into its 21st-century form. These include the writings and teachings of Gerald B. Gardner (1884–1964) and Doreen Valiente (1922–1999), which emerged in 1950s England and were taken to the United States in 1962 by Raymond Buckland (b. 1934); the back-to-nature counterculture movement of the 1960s United States; and the rise of feminist spirituality worldwide in the 1970s, inspired by the works of Merlin Stone (b. 1931), Z. Budapest (b. 1940), Margot Adler (b. 1946), Marion Weinstein (b. 1939), Starhawk (b. 1951), and others. In the late 20th century, the Wiccan religion and related forms of contemporary Paganism grew exponentially both in number of practitioners and in diversity of forms, not only throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe but also in many other parts of the world, such as Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Brazil, and Japan. Contributing to this growth has been the emergence of multi-tradition and international gatherings, networking periodicals, and information exchange through the Internet.

Although the word “Wicca” is sometimes used as a synonym for Gardnerian Wicca and forms directly derived from it, increasingly it is more typically used to include the wider range of Wiccan paths that now exists. Some practitioners call themselves “witches,” but others have abandoned that appellation because of its history of diverse and contradictory connotations. The Wiccan religion does not involve devil worship or malevolent practices. Across the many forms of the Wiccan religion, some commonalities are widespread, such as the spiritual practice of celebrating the new and full moons and the cycle of sun and seasons. The spiritual calendar, called the Wheel of the Year, consists of eight sabbats, or sacred festival times—the solstices and equinoxes and the midpoints between. These seasonal midpoints or cross quarters are also known as the Celtic Fire Festivals; they are Samhain (in mid-fall), Imbolc (winter), Beltane (spring), and Lughnassad (summer).

Also widespread are Wiccan spiritual principles, which include the following: (1) honor the Divine, understanding It as immanent and transcendent, as well as both multifaceted and as a united, interconnected whole; (2) live life with consideration of others as well as oneself, endeavoring to be of service and to do no harm; and (3) celebrate and attune to nature and nature's rhythms, understanding this as central to Divine understanding and worship. Wiccans across traditions also cultivate virtues, including integrity, honesty, reliability, responsibility, balance, perseverance, empathy, kindness, compassion, knowledge, service, and freedom. In addition, Wiccans seek to live with balance and moderation, such as balancing intellect and intuition in cognitive processing; work and rest in daily life; time with others and time alone. Furthermore, Wiccans seek to cultivate good communication and healthy relationships with family, friends, community, and the greater Circle of Life of All Nature.

"The Divine" is a gender-neutral term that can be used to refer to what is known in other religions as "God" (Christianity, Judaism), "Allah" (Islam), "Dao" (Daoism), and "Great Spirit" (Native American religions). Since the Divine is viewed in many Wiccan traditions as both immanent (indwelling) and as transcendent (beyond the limits of humanness), Wiccan spiritual philosophy is pantheistic. In that the Divine is viewed as a Great Unity, spiritual philosophy has a monotheistic dimension. The Divine is also viewed as multifaceted. In many traditions, the Divine is honored as both Mother Goddess and Father God, as well as Their Unity, also known as the "Great Mystery." In addition, The Goddess and The God have many sacred forms or aspects, such as the Triple Goddess in the forms of Maiden, Mother, and Crone, and the Dual God, symbolically represented by the sacred Oak (waxing Sun) and sacred Holly (waning Sun). The Divine also is acknowledged as manifest through the five elements of nature (earth, air, fire, water, and spirit). As with most other nature religions, spiritual philosophy also is animistic, in that The Divine takes the form of a spiritual dimension not only within living humans (higher power or inner self) but also within ancestors, animals, plants, places, and all things. Attunement to and communion with nature are central to spiritual philosophy and practice. Humans are viewed as part of nature, not as dominators or as owners of nature.

The predominant ritual and social space arrangement for Wiccans is the circle. As in ancient times, the circle represents many concepts, including wholeness, balance, the cycles of nature, continuity, partnership, and interconnectedness. The circle is used by individuals in personal rituals as well as by groups for rituals and festivals. The circle facilitates shared experience and encourages participation.

Although classified by some as a new religious movement because it gained visibility and growth in the 20th century, Wicca and related forms of contemporary Paganism do not fit neatly into the profile of the majority of new religious movements. Wicca is very decentralized, and thus it differs from those many new religions that typically center around the authority and teachings of a particular charismatic religious leader. The Wiccan religion and contemporary Paganism are nature-centered and with an emphasis on direct personal experience rather than being of "the book" or adhering to a specific, detailed, structured worldview, as revealed to a prophet or teacher. Wicca and Paganism are best grouped with other nature religions, sometimes called primal or oral religions, which encompass animistic worldviews, shamanic spiritual practices, and celebrations of the cycles of nature. The Wiccan community overlaps with the related traditions of Goddess Spirituality and Druidism.

Selena Fox

See also: Druidism; Fall Equinox; Gardnerian Wicca; Goddess Spirituality; Pantheism; Spring Equinox; Summer Solstice; Winter Solstice; Witchcraft.

References

- Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston: Beacon, 1997.
- Berger, Helen, Evan A. Leach, and Leigh S. Shaffer. Voices from the Pagan Census: A National Survey of Witches and Neo-Pagans in the United States. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

- Buckland, Raymond. Buckland's Complete Book of Witchcraft. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1997.
- Clifton, Chas. Witchcraft Today. 3 vols. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1992–1994.
- Crowley, Vivienne. Wicca: A Comprehensive Guide to the Old Religion in the Modern World. Lanham, MD: Element Books, 2003.
- Cunningham, Scott. Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn, 1988.
- Currott, Phyllis. Witchcrafting: A Spiritual Guide to Making Magic. New York: Broadway, 2001.
- Fox, Selena, Dennis Carpenter, and Theresa Berrie. Circle Guide to Pagan Groups. Mt. Horeb, WI: Circle, 2001.
- Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft. New York: Checkmark/Facts on File, 1999.
- Melton, J. Gordon, and Isotta Poggi. Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Pike, Sarah. New Age and Neopagan Religions in America. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.
- Starhawk. The Spiral Dance. Rev. ed. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1999.
- Valiente, Doreen. The Rebirth of Witchcraft. London: Robert Hale, 1989.

Winter Solstice

The shortest day of the year, Winter Solstice was among the earliest astronomical phenomena observed by human cultures that observed the sky and related it to the weather and agricultural seasons. In the Northern Hemisphere, if one observes the rising Sun in the fall, it appears to rise a little bit farther south day by day until it reaches a point in the last half of December where the southern drift stops. After what appears to be a pause, it begins to rise bit by bit farther north each day. In the Southern Hemisphere, the drift is exactly opposite. The Winter Solstice is the point at which the drift stops and pauses before starting in the opposite direction.

The Julian calendar, adopted in 45 BCE, established December 25 as the Winter Solstice throughout the Roman Empire. That calendar was officially adopted by the Christian church in 324 as the calendar of Christianity. Christmas, the celebration of the birth of Jesus Christ, was set on the 25th of December. In the meantime, the Winter Solstice gradually drifted due to small inaccuracy in the Julian calendar.

In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII (r. 1572–1585) made the changes in the calendar to account for the problem in the Julian calendar. The Gregorian revisions mean the northern Winter Solstice occurs around December 21.

In ancient Rome, the Winter Solstice was associated with the deity Saturn, the god of agriculture and the harvest. He was also believed to have had oversight of a mythological Golden Age. Rome's Winter Solstice festival was the Saturnalia, held in his honor. Originally held on December 17, it was gradually expanded as Rome prospered to a week-long event during which time war would not be declared, slaves and masters swapped status, prisoners would not be executed, and people gave gifts. In general, people forgot their problems and enjoyed life. The Romans also tended to conflate Saturn with the deity Cronus, the god associated with calendars, seasons, and harvests.

Though no date for the birth of Jesus is given in the New Testament, biblical scholars have frequently noted that events described in the Gospels in association with Christ's birth, such as shepherds being in the outdoors in the evening, do not support a winter event. Many have suggested that the dating of Christ's birth was affected by the attempt to supplant the Saturnalia with Christmas. Christmas more directly supplanted the Sol Invictus festival, which was added to the calendar in Rome in the later centuries of the empire and was celebrated on December 25. Attributes of the sun-god were later applied directly to Jesus.

The Winter Solstice was celebrated in most ancient cultures, especially in temperate zones. For some it was the middle of winter and for some the beginning. It would be a time when one batch of wine would have finally fermented and when some animals would be slaughtered in order to save for human consumption the food the animals would consume. Most of these celebrations were supplanted by the holy days of the larger world religions either by absorption or force.

Nahuatl indigenous women in San Andres make offerings during a winter solstice celebration to mark the start of winter in the Northern Hemisphere. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the modern West, the emergence of neo-Paganism, a large movement inspired by ancient Pagan practice and belief, has signaled a return of the Winter Solstice. Neo-Pagans, including their largest segment, the Wiccans, annually celebrate Yule on the Winter Solstice, and make note of the many practices of ancient Pagans that have been adopted by Christians—Yule logs, Christmas trees, and carol singing.

At the same time, as religious pluralism has increased in predominantly Christian lands, Christmas has developed a prominent secular element and other religions have emphasized holidays that also occur in close proximity to it. That new emphasis, along with the commercial aspects of Christmas gift giving and the close proximity of New Year's Day the week after Christmas, has contributed to the defining of a winter holiday season in Western society. In this regard, communities of Unbelief, especially Humanists, have revived the Winter Solstice as an occasion for celebration, and American Humanists have proposed Human Light Day (December 23) as a day to celebrate humanity and the production of culture with events that include art, music, dancing, storytelling, and candle light events, and social outreach through developing social awareness, helping the needy, and community involvement. As least one new holiday, Kwanzaa, was created to allow people (in this case African Americans) who did not want to observe Christmas to have a holiday to celebrate during the winter holiday season.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Christmas; Common Era Calendar; Hanukkah; Humanism; Summer Solstice.

References

- DeChant, Dell. The Sacred Santa: Religious Dimensions of Consumer Culture. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 2002.
- Matthews, John. The Winter Solstice: The Sacred Traditions of Christmas. Wheaton, IL: Quest Books, 2003.
- Ratsch, Christian, and Claudia Müller-Ebeling. Pagan Christmas: The Plants, Spirits, and Rituals at the Origins of Yuletide. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions, 2006.

Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod

The Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, one of the more conservative Lutheran bodies, began with the arrival of German-speaking immigrants in the American Midwest in the 1840s. They appealed to their homeland for ministerial oversight, and several mission societies (Berlin, Basel) responded. An original Wisconsin Synod was organized in 1850 with John Muelhaeser (1803–1867), pastor of the Salem Evangelical Lutheran Church in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, as its first president. Increasingly over the years, the Synod moved toward an emphasis upon doctrinal conservatism and became aligned with the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod.

A similar beginning also occurred in Minnesota, under the leadership of Christian Frederick Heyer (1793–1873), formerly a missionary in India, and Eric Norelius (1833–1916), a Swedish Lutheran pastor. A third such effort arose in 1840 in Michigan, where a synod was organized by Stephan Koehler and Christoph Eberhardt. The Michigan Synod eventually affiliated with the General Synod, the large Lutheran body that became the core of the Lutheran unity movement in America that is now embodied in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America. In 1968 it withdrew, however, a move reflective of its growing conservatism.

In 1872 the Wisconsin and Missouri synods formed the Synodical Conference, an association of conservative Lutheran synods. Eventually the Michigan and Minnesota synods also joined. In 1892 the Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota synods federated to form the Evangelical Joint Synod of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan. A more formal merger occurred in 1917 with the formation of the Evangelical Lutheran Joint Synod of Wisconsin and Other States. That body changed its name to Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod in 1959.

The Wisconsin Synod represents the most conservative extreme of Lutheranism in North America. It withdrew from its association with the Missouri Synod through the Synodical Conference in 1963. It follows the unaltered Augsburg Confession and holds to the position that it cannot adopt formal relations with other churches unless full doctrinal agreement is reached. This position has kept the church out of ecumenical bodies, though it has relations with a similar conservative Confessional Lutheran Church in Finland, Sweden, and Norway.

Through the 20th century the church built a world mission program, beginning with evangelism among the Apache people in Arizona, and currently it has affiliated congregations in Puerto Rico, Mexico, Colombia, Zambia, Malawi, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Indonesia. It also supports missionaries in India, Nigeria, and Cameroon.

The Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church in 2006 reported 395,947 members in the United States (and an additional 30,000 members in other countries) in 1,285 churches. It sponsors two colleges and a seminary in the United States.

Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church
2929 N. Mayfair Rd.
Milwaukee, WI 53222
<http://www.wels.net/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod.

References

- Continuing in the Word*. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern, [1951].
- Fredrich, Edward C. The Wisconsin Synod Lutherans: A History of the Single Synod, Federation & Merger. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern Publishing House, 1992.
- Koehler, John Philip. The History of the Wisconsin Synod. La Crosse, WI: Faith-Life The Protestant Conference, 1981.

Witchcraft

Witchcraft is a term that has been used to describe a broad range of real and fictional practices. “Witchcraft” (with a capital “W”) is commonly used to describe the religion of Witchcraft as practiced mainly in Western countries in the last half century, and “witchcraft” (with a lower case “w”) to describe beliefs and practices of many indigenous cultures where witchcraft is a label for describing painful experiences and malicious individuals.

Witchcraft is a new religious movement that began in England in the 1940s and has spread worldwide in subsequent decades (Luhrmann 1987; Hutton 1999; Salomonsen 2002). It is particularly strong in the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States, but has practitioners in many countries, although it tends to be most common in industrialized countries. The early growth of Witchcraft was primarily through personal friendships and networks—similar to the growth of other new religious movements. However, in the mid-1990s there was an explosion of information about Witchcraft available on the Internet, through introductory books found in mainstream bookstores, and displayed in popular movies and television programs. This led to a rapid growth of interest in Witchcraft among young people (Berger and Ezzy 2007). The new generation of younger Witches have often learned about Witchcraft from books or the Internet and are much more likely to practice on their own than the older generation.

Contemporary Witchcraft is generally understood to be part of the more general Pagan revival. Other contemporary Pagan religions include Druidry, Heathenry, and various reconstructionist movements such as those reconstructing classical Greek religious practice. Witchcraft itself divides into a number of “denominations.” These include Gardnerian and Alexandrian Wicca, feminist Witchcraft (which is closely related to Goddess Spirituality), and solitary practitioners.

Beliefs about the history of European witchcraft played an important role in the development of the new religious movement of Witchcraft. Margaret Murray (1921) published The Witch Cult in Western Europe, in which she argued that “victims of the early modern witch trials have been practitioners of a surviving pagan religion” (Hutton 1999, 195). Further, she asserted that the worship of the horned god of the greenwood in modern England was a continuation of the worship of Pan that she traced back through Europe to the Near East. Pan “had been the focus of worship for the witches, and the origins of the figure of the Christian Devil” (Hutton 1999, 196). Hutton is scathing of Murray’s scholarship, arguing that she quoted very selectively and ignored evidence that contradicted her thesis.

Sonja Kulmitzer, a self-described witch who runs the School of Witchcraft, uses a pendulum over a map to find energy lines, October 22, 2002, in the garden of her witch school in Klagenfurt, Austria. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Murray’s thesis was apparently supported by various academic works, including Carlo Ginzburg’s (1991), which suggested that there was a “core of truth” to the Murray thesis. Ginzburg’s work, however, demonstrates that witchcraft beliefs can be traced to indigenous European practices of shamanism and spirit-travel. This is not quite the same as Murray's argument that medieval and early modern Europeans were practicing the rites of a secret religion of Witchcraft with links back to classical times. Witches do appear in classical Greek and Latin literature as powerful women, although their representations in this tradition are almost entirely as fictional figures (Ogden 2002).

The idea that millions of women died in the early modern witch trials was also important to the development of feminist Witchcraft (Starhawk 1979). Starhawk saw contemporary Witchcraft as a reclaiming of feminine power and spirituality that was brutally persecuted during the witchcraft trials. There has been considerable recent research on the early modern witch trials. This research has dismantled some of the earlier claims that millions of women died. "It has been established beyond any reasonable doubt that there was no long-lasting or wide-ranging persecution of witches in early modern Europe . . . only a tiny percentage of people suspected by their neighbours of witchcraft were executed as a result, and mass arrests only occurred in very exceptional circumstances" (Hutton 1999, 379).

Forster in a 1976 article describes the term "witch-doctor" as an "outmoded" synonym for a shaman or healer that was used in the early anthropological literature about Africa. This usage probably reflected the general disrespect that many early anthropologists held for indigenous religious and healing practice. "Witch," in this sense, held similar derogatory overtones to that used by the Catholic Inquisition to describe medieval witches. Similar uses of the term "witchcraft" are found among American indigenous peoples, where witchcraft refers to "the aggressive use of supernatural techniques" (Carrasco 1989, 3)

The term "witchcraft" continues to be used in many African, and other indigenous, cultures to describe malevolent practices, often understood to be associated with supernatural means of acquiring illicit wealth or power. Accusations of witchcraft are often linked to political struggles for power such as local elections and debates over changing gender relations (Englund 1996). For example, Gescheiere and Nymnjoh (1998) describe accusations of "zombie witchcraft" associated with recently acquired wealth and urban-rural tensions in Cameroon. New technology, Western culture, and Christianity have been integrated into witchcraft beliefs and practices and it continues to thrive as a term used to describe and denigrate parties with opposed political interests.

In South Africa many people with AIDS interpret their suffering as a product of witchcraft. Ashforth (2002, 123) emphasizes that within the South African cultural context this is not a form of irrationality or superstition, but "entirely plausible." The consequence of this "witchcraft paradigm" for the explanation of AIDS is important to understand in order to develop informed public policy responses that address the role of traditional healers, and the silence and public accusations that may be associated with it.

In classical Greek culture the term "witch" was used to describe those who practiced magical spells, such as that to return a wandering lover. In Latin literature, accusations of witchcraft followed similar lines to those of Africa and other indigenous cultures, where it was associated with struggles for power and images of malicious old wealthy women in Roman society (Stratton 2007). Murray (2007, 284) makes a similar argument that the charge of "witchcraft" was used by Jewish rabbis in the first and second centuries who were "attempting to establish their authority" and who found "aspects of women's religious culture" threatening.

This situation is very different in contemporary Western Witchcraft. Although it has its share of evil and malicious individuals, there is no evidence that Witches are any more or less likely to be involved in illegal activities. Their rituals are typically positive and for healing. Berger and Ezzy (2007) argue that among the young Witches they interviewed, Witchcraft probably has a similar positive effect on self-esteem and a similar reduction in delinquent activities to that observed among young people participating in other religious groups.

Contemporary Witchcraft is a religion of practice. Belief is a secondary concern (Harvey 1997). The focus of Witchcraft practices is the celebration of nature, particularly through celebrating the changing seasons. Practitioners of Witchcraft participate in regular shared rituals, such as the festivals of the wheel of the year and full moon rites. The members of one group, however, may vary in their beliefs from those who think deities are real beings, to those who see them as symbols of the self, to participants who see them as symbolic representations of nature and might call themselves “atheist” Pagans. The term “Wicca” is sometimes reserved for those who have been initiated into an established tradition, with “Witchcraft” used as a more general term. However, many people who have not been initiated into an established tradition also call themselves practitioners of “Wicca,” and the two terms are often used interchangeably.

The rituals of the wheel of the year follow the seasons of the sun and consist of eight major festivals approximately 6 weeks apart (Hutton 1999). Samhain or Halloween (generally celebrated around October 31 to November 2) is a festival celebrating the dark of the year when those who have died are remembered and honored. The Winter Solstice or Midwinter or Yule (December 19–23) celebrates the rebirth of the Sun. Imbolc or Candlemas (February 1–2) celebrates the growing of the year. The Vernal Equinox or Ostara (March 19–23) celebrates the beginning of spring. Beltane or May Day (May 1) is a major festival of spring, often celebrated with bonfires and maypole dancing. Midsummer or Litha (June 19–23) celebrates the Summer Solstice. Lammas or Lughnasadh (August 1–2) celebrates the first harvest. The Autumnal Equinox or Mabon (September 19–23) is a time of celebration of the year past and anticipation of the coming winter.

In the Southern Hemisphere the dates of the festivals are usually switched to match the seasons—for example, midwinter is in June and midsummer in December. However this is not always the case, particularly among Witches influenced by ceremonial magic, who may continue to follow the Northern Hemisphere wheel (Hume 1997). The situation is even more confusing for those in equatorial areas, who may adapt or develop a set of seasonal festivals based on local seasons.

Witchcraft rituals may be practiced by solitary practitioners, in small groups of approximately a dozen people (sometimes referred to as covens), and at larger festivals with participants numbering 100 or more (these tend to be annual events). Participants will typically stand in a circle and remain standing for the duration of the rite. A ritual usually begins with a circle casting, in which the four directions of East, North, West, and South are honored. The circle is cast following the apparent movement of the Sun (counterclockwise in the Southern Hemisphere, clockwise in the north). The presiding priestess will “seal” the circle by walking around it with a sacred knife (athame) chanting an invocation. The ritual itself will depend on the festival and the particular tradition of the group. It may include a ritual drama in which a Greek myth (such as Persephone’s descent into the underworld and return) is acted out. It may include ritual chanting and dancing. Women’s and men’s roles are not hierarchically differentiated in Witchcraft. While some traditions do privilege women (Dianic Wicca only has female members), most Witches celebrate the different roles of males and females, but do not consider one to be privileged over the other.

Greenwood (2000) and Berger and Ezzy (2007) have argued that the magic practiced by Witches is mostly about self-development. While Witches may engage in magical practices designed to physically change the world around them, the magic of Witches is much more likely to involve rituals to improve a person’s self-esteem, to deal with poor body image, or to encourage success in relationships. Healing spells for an ill friend and rituals to heal ecological harm are also common.

In summary, the term “witchcraft” has been, and continues to be, used in indigenous cultures and in classical Roman, Greek and rabbinical writing, to describe malicious individuals and practices, often associated with political power struggles. Contemporary Western Witchcraft, in contrast, is a new religious movement that focuses on developing a greater awareness of nature, has established rituals and practices, and is widely accepted as a legitimate religion in many Western countries.

Douglas Ezzy

See also: Fall Equinox; Gardnerian Wicca; Goddess Spirituality; Spring Equinox; Summer Solstice; Wiccan Religion; Winter Solstice.

References

- Berger, Helen A., and Douglas Ezzy. Teenage Witchcraft: Magical Youth and the Search for the Self. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2007.

- Carrasco, David. "Introduction." In Witchcraft and Sorcery of the American Native Peoples, edited by Deward E. Walker, 1–11. Moscow: University of Idaho Press, 1989.
- Englund, H. "Witchcraft, Modernity and the Person." Critique of Anthropology 16, no. 3 (1996): 257–279.
- Forster, G. "Disease Etiologies in Non-Western Medical Systems." American Anthropologist 78, no. 4 (1976): 773–782.
- Geschiere, P., and F. Nymnjoh. "Witchcraft as an Issue in the Politics of Belonging." African Studies Review 41, no. 3 (1998): 69–91.
- Ginzburg, Carlo. Ecstasies: Deciphering the Witches' Sabbath. Trans. by R. Rosenthal. London: Hutchinson, 1991.
- Greenwood, Susan. Magic, Witchcraft and the Otherworld. Oxford: Berg, 2000.
- Harvey, Graham. Listening People, Speaking Earth: Contemporary Paganism. London: C. Hurst and Co., 1997.
- Hume, Lynne. Witchcraft and Paganism in Australia. Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1997.
- Hutton, Ronald. The Triumph of the Moon: A History of Modern Pagan Witchcraft. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Luhrmann, T. M. Persuasions of the Witch's Craft. Oxford: Blackwell, 1987.
- Murray, Margaret. The Witch Cult in Western Europe. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1921.
- Murray, Michele. "The Magical Female in Graeco-Roman Rabbinic Literature." Religion and Theology 14, nos. 3–4 (2007): 284–309.
- Ogden, Daniel. Magic, Witchcraft and Ghost in the Greek and Roman Worlds. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Salomonsen, Jone. Enchanted Feminism. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Starhawk. The Spiral Dance. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1979.
- Stratton, Kimberly B. Naming the Witch: Magic, Ideology, and Stereotype in the Ancient World. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.

Women, Status and Role of

As humanity moved out of localized ethnic-based societies, developed written languages, and created the civilized societies with their specialized roles, hierarchical and patriarchal structures became pronounced. Women were restricted to roles defined initially by their gender uniqueness, the bearing of children, and their role as wife, mother, and homemaker. Religiously they had a variety of functions as priestess, healer, seeress, and magical practitioner. These roles have survived and still operate in many of the indigenous religions worldwide.

Both modernity and urbanization contributed to the roles of women in religion through the establishment of hierarchies that regulate women's sexuality and relationships to men and each other, roles within the family, participation in religious traditions and worship, and the opportunity for formally recognized religious leadership roles (that required some form of ordination). Contention often lies within varying interpretation of religious texts upon which doctrine is based. It is clear, however, that women's roles at one time were not restricted in religious traditions as they were prior to the changes brought by the contemporary feminist movements. The roles of women in religion have been impacted by locale and history.

Hinduism Women's roles in Hinduism began to shift approximately 800 BCE in the early Vedic period. Prior to this shift, women were religious leaders and participated actively in sacred rituals and rites. As social hierarchies emerged, women were restricted to domestic roles of service and obedience to their husbands and families. It is important to note that other aspects of Indian culture, such as social caste, stage of life, family association, and age contributed to the diversity of experiences of women. Women could also draw on the images and stories of the many goddesses in the Hindu sacred literature.

Near 400 CE women became increasingly involved in their participation in religious activities once again. Women saints played important roles as religious figures in women's lives and roles within devotional activities. With the onset of the modern period (1700 CE through the present) cultural traditions that dictated women's roles, such as sati, the ban on remarriage of widows, child marriage, and the dowry were made illegal. As social justice movements continue to progress, women's roles in Indian culture and Hinduism will continue to shift.

A demand for women's rights emerged in India along with the general demand for both secular and religious reforms in the late 19th century, with the strongest progress noticeable in Bengal and Maharashtra. Annie Besant (1847–1933), the leader of the Theosophical Society, contributed to this movement with a program to found schools for girls throughout the country. By the mid-20th century, a small number of women guru-saints (such as Sri Anandamayi Ma, 1896–1982) had emerged, and following independence in 1947, their number multiplied exponentially. As Hinduism moved to become a global religion several women have assumed roles as the leader of new international Hindu spiritual movements: Shree Maa (b. 1950), Amritanandamayi Ma (b. 1953), Sri Mataji Niemala Devi (b. 1923), Swami Chidvilasananda (b. 1955), Shivananda Radha (1911–1995), Sri Daya Mata (SRF) (b. 1914), Ma Jaya Sati Bhagavati (b. 1940), and Mother Meera (b. 1960).

Buddhism Buddhism was founded primarily as a monastic movement. Mahaprajapati, the stepmother of Siddhartha Gautama known as the Buddha (563–483 BCE), sought and acquired permission to become a nun although the Buddhist monks and Buddha himself resisted women's participation in the monastic movement in the early years of the Buddhist tradition. Upon granting Mahaprajapati permission, Buddha essentially asserted that women could achieve enlightenment. While Buddha added eight restrictive rules that women were required to follow to maintain their subordinate relationships to the monks, the monks also received restrictive orders that disabled their ability to abuse their authority. Subsequently, women's status was elevated and the recognition of their spiritual, if not their social, equality was acknowledged.

As in other modern religious traditions, women faced a variety of subordinating structures. In Theravada societies, the contemporary struggle for women's rights has found a focus in the revival of women's monastic orders. In Mahayana and Vajrayana tradition, women have been able to draw upon the stories of women saints in previous centuries and the female bodhisattvas, such as Guan Yin and Mahasthamaprapta. While full ordination for women is currently available in Chinese, Korean, and Vietnamese Buddhism, through a monastic lineage called Dharmaguptaka, not until 2007 did His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama announce full support for the establishment of full ordination for women in the Tibetan tradition.

In North America in the 1970s, women protested their subordination in the emerging movement (which had in some cases led to abuse). Their organization led to marked changes in the temples and supported the emergence of a spectrum of leaders who followed in the footsteps of the pioneer leaders in Zen Buddhism, Ruth Fuller Everett Sasaki (1893–1967) and Jiyu-Kennett Roshi (1924–1996).

Judaism While women's primary responsibilities traditionally lie within the household and family relationships, in Judaism, women also are viewed as separate but equal to men. Women have traditionally held the right to purchase, own, and sell property and establish contracts and participate in business ventures. Women also possess the right to choose their marriages and neither spousal beating nor mistreatment has ever been condoned in Judaism. Women's role within the synagogue is limited and this is due to the observance of the separation of women and men. Prayer and devotional activities are performed with women and men separated. Women are not required to attend religious services and are restricted from participating in many portions of the services they do attend. Although men are obligated to perform more commandments than women, there are three mitzvot, or commandments, reserved specifically for women: nerot, which is candle lighting; challah, which refers to separation of a portion of the dough; and niddah, which entails a ritual immersion upon the conclusion of a woman's menstrual period.

In the 20th century, Judaism struggled with the issue of ordination of women. Above and beyond the tradition limiting the rabbinate to males, questions arose concerning women's ability to lead a congregation and meet various elements of the law (mitzvah) which male youth agree to follow at their bar mitzvah ceremony. Both the Reform and Conservative Jewish movements have dealt with these questions and beginning in 1972 (Reform) and 1984 (Conservative) welcome women to the rabbinate. The orthodox still oppose such ordinations.

Buddhist nuns wearing pink robes worship in Myanmar, 2007. (iStockPhoto.com)

Christianity Historically, there were a number of women that held power in the Christian tradition. Many served as missionaries to carry Jesus Christ's message to outlying villages with the intent of converting individuals and communities to Christianity. Despite social justice movements and proponents asserting that Christ's vision encompassed equality for humankind, women have been viewed as submissive to men in the Christian tradition. Women's status has been related to the interpretation of Eve as the temptress who offered Adam the apple in the Garden of Eden. This act, subsequently, caused the fall of civilization into the hands of Lucifer.

Women were pushed aside as the hierarchy developed, especially as the church came out of its period as a clandestine religion in the fourth century. Shortly thereafter, a new role for women developed as Christian monasticism developed and women's orders, led by women, were authorized along with those led by men. As the orders developed, they offered an array of new possibilities (including occupations) for women, in spite of their being held in a somewhat secondary role relative to the expansive men's orders. Women's orders were largely abandoned by Protestants.

In the 19th century, Christian women began to challenge the traditional interpretations of the Bible, which had blocked their progress in the secular world and limited their leadership possibilities within the various churches. A new debate on women's leadership was opened in the 19th-century Holiness movement led by such people as Methodists Phoebe Palmer (1807–1874) and Frances Willard (1839–1898). Such movements as the Salvation Army pioneered the ordination of women. The openness to the ordination of women passed to the Pentecostal moment which saw itself as the fulfillment of the prophecies of Acts 2, which included the promise that “your sons and daughters shall prophesy” (Acts 2:17). Further openings were found as Lutherans, Anglicans, and Methodists created a new deaconess movement (a Protestant form of the ordered life).

Through the 20th century, a small number of women were ordained in various denominations, often to serve specific missions for which no one else was available, and a movement slowly emerged to admit women to holy order and then in the episcopally led churches, to the bishopric. Leadership in this endeavor came for such diverse bodies as the United Church of Canada, the Anglicans in Hong Kong, the American Methodists, and the Swedish Lutherans.

Today, most of the larger Protestant churches welcome women to all levels of leadership, with some prominent exceptions among the more conservative, including the Southern Baptist Convention and several of the Anglican churches. The Church of England has yet to elect a woman as bishop, though it has passed enabling legislation. Both the Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox churches have closed debate on the issue for the time being. However, the debates pertaining to the interpretations of religious texts relative to women is ongoing and many scholars have elected to highlight important women in the Bible, while also researching the root of the translations of the original texts to clarify meaning.

While many Christian churches and denominations assert full equality for women and men in the church, women continue to be restricted from opportunities for ordination and various lay leadership positions in the majority of churches. Social movements directed at effecting change in women’s ecclesiastical privileges, roles, and rights continue to shape and reform traditions over time.

Islam The status and role of women in Islam, the Muslim religion, instigates heated debate. The status and role of women is based on the historical understanding of women being equated with slaves and being viewed as property. It is at this point where contention in interpretation of religious texts becomes paramount. While the Koran, the primary Muslim text, confers the responsibility for women to men, what this responsibility is and what it entails is often challenged. While strides have been made in modernity to liberate women from the status of property, little movement has actually occurred regarding women’s rights in countries where Islam is dominant. A lively debate on the status and role of women is ongoing in the West.

Women wearing burqas, Afghanistan. (iStockPhoto.com)

Women’s traditional dress of complete veiling in Muslim culture has been a target for many Western feminists. It has also become the subject of widespread public debate in both Europe and North America, with several countries passing legislation against veiling in a variety of circumstances from attendance at public school or driving an automobile. At the same time, within the cultural context, many women in Muslim culture adhere to and uphold the veiling, viewing this as a form of protection and integrity as it is situated within their cultural context.

Within Islam, responsibility for the household falls in the women’s domain and is upheld by doctrine. Women’s sexuality is highly restricted while men are able to practice polygamy (though most men are monogamous). Women who engage in sexual activity outside of marriage risk being stoned to death as punishment, although there are many social movements aimed to discourage this. Women's roles and status within the Muslim culture continue to be restrictive of women's independence.

Western Esotericism The Esoteric tradition, drawing on Gnostic, Hermetic, and alchemical themes, emerged anew in the 17th century. It did not challenge the dominant concepts of the status and role of women at the time and its primary 18th-century manifestation, Freemasonry, became known as a "men's club." Its tendency to see men and women as polar opposites (right-left, light-dark) tended to leave women as the embodiment of the negative side of the pole. This was amply demonstrated in the emerging ceremonial magic tradition in the 19th century, which tended to reduce women to the role of simply another magical tool (vividly seen in the writings of Aleister Crowley).

At the same time, the more popularized forms of the Esoteric tradition in the 19th century became allies of the women's movement. Spiritualism was founded by women and most of its mediums were female. Theosophy, Christian Science, and the New Thought movement were also founded by women (Helena P. Blavatsky, Mary Baker Eddy, and Emma Curtis Hopkins) and all employed women in important leadership positions. Spiritualist Victoria Woodhull became the first woman to run for president on a third-party ticket. Through the 20th century, women were as likely as men to found Esoteric movements or head its various centers. The larger Esoteric world would provide a nurturing context for the contemporary revival of Pagan women's Spirituality.

Women's Spirituality While religion has often aligned with those social structures that have contributed to women's oppression, many women find religion to be empowering. They find a sense of community and spiritual solace within their traditions. As religions change in response to women's movements, many women also find opportunities for leadership and service and support for activities aimed at social justice. Reinterpretation of texts, reshaping of rituals, rights and religious myths, and a revaluing of ecology and the feminine in the sacred are just a few ways women have participated in religion. Women and men have also elected to form new religions that honor the sacred in ways that uphold equality for everyone. Wicca, neo-Paganism, and Goddess spiritualities are a few of the paths that women and men have elected as solutions to celebrate the sacred while honoring the equality and dignity of humankind. Many of these religions are pantheistic and panentheistic to encompass an immanent sense of unity with the cosmos while including or rejecting the notion of a transcendent source of the sacred, as well.

Wendy Mason

See also: Besant, Annie; Crowley, Aleister; Eddy, Mary Baker; Freemasonry; Holiness Movement; Methodism; Mother Meera, Disciples of; Pentecostalism; Sahaja Yoga; Salvation Army; Self-Realization Fellowship; Siddha Yoga; Western Esoteric Tradition; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Aune, Kristin, et al. Women and Religion in the West. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2008.
- Awde, Nicholas. Women In Islam: An Anthology From the Qur'an and Hadiths. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.
- Berzin, Alexander. "A Summary Report of the 2007 International Congress on the Women's Role in the Sangha: Bhikshuni Vinaya and Ordination Lineages." University of Hamburg, Hamburg, Germany, 18–20 July 2007.
- Biale, Rachel. Women and Jewish Law: The Essential Texts, Their History, and Their Relevance for Today. New York: Schocken Publishers, 1995.
- Goodwin, Allison. "Right Views, Red Rust, and White Bones. The Eight Garudhammas and Buddhist Teachings on Female Inferiority Reexamined in Light of Psychological and Social Research." Paper presented at the Conference on Gender and Religion in Taiwan, 2007.
- Greenberg, Blu. On Women & Judaism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1981.
- Gross, Rita. Feminism and Religion. Boston: Beacon Press, 1996.

- Heath, Jennifer, ed. The Veil: Writers on Its History, Lore, and Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- Jones, Connie, and James D. Ryan. Encyclopedia of Hinduism. New York: Checkmark Books, 2008.
- Malone, Mary T. Women and Christianity: The First Thousand Years. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2001.
- Malone, Mary T. Women & Christianity: From 1000 to the Reformation. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2002.
- Malone, Mary T. Women & Christianity: From the Reformation to the 21st Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2003.
- Nadall, Pamela, and Jonathan Sarna. Women and American Judaism: Historical Perspectives. Waltham, MA: Brandeis University Press, 2001.
- Pike, Sarah. New Age and Neopagan Religions in America. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.
- Sharma, Arvind, and Katherine K. Young, eds. Women and World Religions. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2002.

Won Buddhism

Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo) is one of the most successful of Korea's new religions. The essence of its message is that it "provides hope to the world by providing balance between spiritual and material life." The religion calls the human mind the "mind-field" and seeks to teach people to attain sagehood by cultivating their "original minds." The purpose of the mindfulness teaching provided by Won Buddhism is to provide "personality instruction" to adherents so that they might enrich their lives in the material world by appropriately cultivating their minds spiritually through study, training, and activities in the material world. The religion has established missionary and community outreach programs throughout Korea and in several countries in Europe, Asia, and the United States, and it has translated its primary scriptural text into 20 major world languages.

Won Buddhism was founded in 1916 by Pak Chungbin (1891–1943), who is better known by his literary name, Sot'aesan. Sot'aesan was aware of the three traditional religions of East Asia—Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism—yet he felt that his enlightenment experience was independent of any tradition. Nevertheless, upon further inquiry he realized that all of the ancient sages had known that to which he had awakened, and, after reading the Diamond Sutra, he declared that the vehicle of Buddhism was the best for elucidating his vision of ultimate truth, the true understanding of the Dharmakaya Buddha (the body or law of the teaching).

Studies on Won Buddhism are based on The Canon of Won Buddhism (Won Pulgyo kyojon), which contains two books: the Principle Book (Chongjon), composed by Sot'aesan, and the Records (Taejonggyong), a chronicle of his sayings and doings. The next important book of the tradition is the Religious Discourses of Master Chongsan (Chongsan Chongsa Pobo), the words of Sot'aesan's successor, Song Kyu (1900–1962), the first prime master of Won Buddhism. These books express the religious vision articulated by these two leaders. Sot'aesan represented his enlightened vision of ultimate reality in a perfect circle, known as the One-Circle-Figure (Irwonsang), which he equated to the concept of Dharmakaya of conventional Buddhism.

No images of Buddha are found in Won Buddhist temples; instead, "four graces" are viewed as the incarnations of the Dharmakaya Buddha: Heaven and Earth, Parents, Brethren (fellow creatures), and Law (religious, moral, and civil). Won Buddhism rejects the traditional concept of deliverance or liberation from the world as nihilistic; instead, it tries to realize a paradise on earth by helping people to develop their own abilities, wisdom, education, and altruism. The path to achieving the ideal of enlightenment as expressed in the One-Circle-Figure is the "Threefold Learning." In conventional Buddhism these three are known by the Sanskrit terms samadhi (meditation), prajna (wisdom), and sila (morality).

Sot'aesan recasts these in modern language as the "cultivation of spirit," "study of facts and principles," and "choice of conduct." Religious practice in Won Buddhism consists of worship of the One-Circle-Figure in the place of images of Buddha, recitation of the name of the Buddha Amitabha, seated meditation, repentance and prayer, and scripture study. Won Buddhism operates a number of branch temples and other organizational establishments primarily in Japan and the United States. One such institution is Wonkwang University, which has a College of Won Buddhist Studies in which Won Buddhist priests, educators, and other leaders are educated in both undergraduate and graduate programs. Religious tracts and philosophical treatises are published by the faculty and research institute of the university, usually in Korean, although Won Buddhist scholars also publish in Western languages in a journal called Won Buddhism. As of 2003, the religion operated 15 dioceses, 550 temples, and 180 organizations in Korea and 5 dioceses, 51 temples, and 9 organizations outside of Korea that served a membership that was reaching approximately 1.4 million members.

Won Pulgyo
Sinyong-dong 344-2
Iri-si, Cholla Pukto, 570-754
Republic of Korea
<http://www.wonbuddhism.info>

Richard D. McBride II

See also: Korean Buddhism; Meditation; Pure Land Buddhism.

References

- Chung Bong-Kil. The Sacred Books of Won Buddhism. Classics of East Asian Buddhism, vol. 6. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2002.
- Chung, Bongkil. "Won Buddhism: The Historical Context of Sot'aesan's Reformation of Buddhism for the Modern World." In Buddhism in the Modern World: Adaptations of an Ancient Tradition, edited by Steven Heine and Charles S. Prebish. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Park Kwangsoo. The Won Buddhism (Wonbulgyo) of Sot'aesan: A Twentieth Century Religious Movement in Korea. San Francisco: International Scholars, 1997.

Wonhyo

617–686

Wonhyo, a Buddhist lay practitioner, partnered with the monk Uisang to effectively establish Buddhism across Korea some two centuries after its original transmission in the fifth century. Wonhyo's work was partially aided by the unification process that saw the three kingdoms of Silla, Koguryo, and Paekche brought together into the United Kingdom of Silla, a disruptive process that took most of the 660s to complete.

Wonhyo was born in 617 into a noble family and grew up near Sorabal, the capital of the Silla Kingdom in the southern portion of the Korean peninsula. He turned to serious spirituality as a youth and made the decision to become a Buddhist monk at the age of 15. Following his ordination, he transformed his home into a Buddhist temple. He would remain a monk for the next three decades.

At one point, he decided it was necessary for him to go to China to study in some of the famous temples there. He was accompanied by his younger colleague Uisang (625–702). In 650, the pair left to travel from Koguryo (the northern Korean kingdom) to China to study, but were mistaken as spies and arrested at the border. They returned home and 11 years later tried again. This time they planned to sail from a port city in Paekche. As they made their way, they were caught in a rainstorm. They took refuge in an underground shelter for the night and discovered on awakening that they were in an old tomb. Before the rain ceased, Wonhyo had an intense spiritual experience that led to an enlightenment of sorts, in which he concluded the world was made of mind alone. When the mind is stilled, the differences in the world cease to matter. A tomb and a temple are all the same. With this realization, he felt that he had lost any reason to continue on to China.

Abandoning his career as a monk in 661, he would spend the next decade in contemplation of his insight and writing some 80 works expanding upon it. Then beginning in 676 he would devote a decade to popularizing Buddhism among the masses. His most famous book, the Commentary on the Awakening of Faith in Mahayana, explained his insight on the mind. In his Treatise on Ten Approaches to Reconciliation of the Doctrinal Controversy, he turned to the problem of the divisions among a still minority faith on the Korean peninsula. He affirmed that all religious positions have at least some validity but emphasized that the different perspectives will find their reconciliation in the experience of the One Mind beyond all distinctions.

While articulating a mystical philosophy that could lead to inactivity, Wonhyo also refused to move in that direction. Rather, he remained active himself and called upon his students and audiences to demonstrate their concern for all sentient beings. As human life was relatively short, he argued that the years should not be wasted. Our efforts should be made to assist others in their appropriation of Buddhist truth.

Wonhyo finally passed away at a cave temple near Kyongju, Korea, in 686. His emphasis on unifying Korean Buddhism meant that he did not organize a new school, and in the short term his contribution seemed unfulfilled. However, his student Uisang did accomplish much toward both introducing Hwaom Buddhism to Korea and successfully using it to unify most of the Buddhists, still a minority faith in the country. Through the next century Buddhism continued to grow and with further growth came new divisions. As Korean Buddhists struggled with their own divisions, along with the pressure of both hostile rulers and foreign invaders, Wonhyo was rediscovered and his value recognized. At the end of the 11th century he was named the “National Preceptor of Harmonizing Controversies.”

Edward A. Irons

See also: Korean Buddhism; Uisang.

References

Lancaster, Lewis R., and C. S. Yu, eds. Assimilation of Buddhism in Korea: Religious Minority and Innovation in the Silla Dynasty. Berkeley, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 1991.

McGreal, Ian P., ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Word of Life Church

The Word of Life Church (Kale Heywet) grew out of the efforts initiated by the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) in 1927. The Mission had begun in 1893 with a vision to evangelize the Sudan, but it was slowed by the African climate, which led to the deaths of two of the founders and the retreat from Africa by the third. Eventually work would be established in several African nations other than the Sudan (Nigeria and Niger) before the Sudan was reached.

In the 1920s the Presbyterians established a mission in Ethiopia. Among its leaders was Dr. Thomas A. Lambie, who founded the Presbyterian hospital in Addis Ababa in 1923. Several years later he began an independent Abyssinian Frontiers Mission, which in 1927 merged with the Sudan Interior Mission. The mission grew slowly and had fewer than 100 baptized converts over the next decade. After the Italians occupied the country, foreign missionaries were kicked out (which became the occasion of SIM missionaries finally establishing work in the Sudan). When they returned in 1941, they discovered that the church had expanded dramatically. There were 20,000 members in some 100 congregations.

The church continued to grow, reaching 100,000 members by 1960 and 500,000 by 1974, by which time it had taken the name Kale Heywet (Word of Life) Church. This progress is attributed to its being a truly indigenous church that has developed its own missionary society, which has targeted the different peoples of Ethiopia. The church has also developed a literacy program for the poverty-stricken country, and in the 1990s it cooperated with the Baptist General Conference in developing a program of famine relief.

The church follows a conservative evangelical Christianity. As the new century begins, it had more than 2 million members. It has developed an extensive educational system and a medical ministry.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelicalism.

References

Fuller, Harold. “Serving in Mission: Linking Hands around the Globe.” <http://images.sim.org/pdfs/history/whfuller-sim-history.pdf>. Accessed April 24, 2009.

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1971.

World Alliance of Reformed Churches

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches was formed in 1970 in Nairobi, Kenya, by the merger of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian Order and the International Congregational Council. The Alliance of Reformed Churches was founded in 1875 in London, England, as an association of Reformed and Presbyterian church leaders. It was designed to facilitate cooperation and common action, especially in the mission field. The fellowship gradually grew to include members from the European continent. In 1946 the Alliance, originally headquartered in Edinburgh, Scotland, moved to Geneva, Switzerland, in anticipation of the formation of the World Council of Churches (WCC). It self-consciously decided to make no moves that could be just as easily accomplished through the WCC.

The International Congregational Council was founded in 1892 for purposes similar to those of the Reformed Alliance. In the ecumenical atmosphere during the years following the formation of the WCC, the mutual affirmation of a Reformed theological perspective drew the two organizations together.

The Alliance carries out theological dialogues, promotes programs of mutual cooperation between member churches, and sponsors a program of publications led by its periodical, The Reformed World. It has a history of witnessing against racism and in the promotion of human rights. In the 1980s it experienced particular concern over the apartheid policies of South Africa and the role of some Reformed churches' support of it. In 1982 the Alliance suspended the membership of two South African Reformed bodies until they brought their policies in line with the alliance's antiapartheid stance. One church left the Alliance, the other remained in association and was received back into full membership in 1997.

In 2008, the Alliance reported a membership of 214 churches scattered in 107 countries with an inclusive membership of 75 million people. In 2008, it focused attention on the 500th anniversary of the birth of John Calvin (1509–1564), the founder of the Reformed Christian tradition.

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Reformed Ecumenical Council decided to form a new ecumenical organization to be known as the World Communion of Reformed Churches. The merger took place in June 2010. The Council has, in the past, provided a more conservative alternative to the Alliance.

World Alliance of Reformed Churches

150 route de Ferney

PO Box 2100

1211 Geneva 2

Switzerland

http://warc.jalb.de/warcajsp/side.jsp?news_id=2&part2_id=19&navi=8

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; Congregationalism; Reformed Ecumenical Council; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.

The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

The Legacy of John Calvin: Some Actions for the Church in the 21st Century. Geneva: WARC/John Knox International Reformed Center, 2008.

World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation

The World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation was founded in Istanbul, Turkey, in 1986 to teach the channeled work of the Celestial Totality (a ranked hierarchy similar to the Great White Brotherhood of the Theosophical tradition). Mevlana, the foundation's founder, who is called the pen of the Golden Age, is responsible for channeling the organization's sacred scriptures, particularly the Knowledge Book. Mevlana, through what her group calls "reverse transfer" (this organization's term for reincarnation), has returned to the Earth in order to serve the divine purpose of the World Brotherhood Union (WBU). The WBU purports the Knowledge Book to contain the spiritual manifesto essential for personal and planetary transformation in the new millennium. The years from 2000 to 2005 are noted as foundational years, heralding a future Golden Age in which everyone attains Universal Consciousness. The WBU teaches that two UFOs are stationed above the Earth to monitor and police the activities of the people of the planet. Should human behavior err beyond the parameters set by the WBU a galactic military force based on the UFOs will intercede to reshape the destructive behavior according to the Divine Plan. They believe their plan to be based on goodwill, self-sacrifice, capacity, and consciousness.

The WBU proselytizes in people's homes. A group leader who receives special spiritual messages calls six friends who meet at her home and write down, date, and sign her unique messages, which are given to another six, and so forth. The WBU claims to unite feminist and egalitarian principles and teaches that the Earth is the only planet in the solar system on which discrimination between the sexes exists. Paradoxically, the specific messages to Mevlana are sent by Mustafa Molla and a Captain Riviere. Mohammed Mustafa is the messenger of Allah, and Kurtairce is the Savior or Jesus figure; both dwell with Buddha in the Celestial Totality—while touting equality, the ruling aristocracy is male.

By acknowledging the Koran as one of a number of sacred texts and Mohammed as a messenger of this particular sacred text, the WBU courts an Islamic population. However, the WBU should not be considered an Islamic revitalization movement, as it has only a cursory link with Islam. It has received its major inspiration from Theosophy and the Western Esoteric tradition, which it has synthesized with a unique Turkish twist. Thus the WBU integrates Theosophy with beliefs about UFOs and flying saucers in a concerted attempt to wed science and religion in a sophisticated, technological way. Because of the secrecy of this group, no accurate data exist for the number of its adherents.

World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation
Catalcesme Baggat Caddesi Ahmet Cevdet Pasa
Sokak
No. 1/6
81110 Bostanci-Kadikoy
Istanbul

Turkey

<http://www.dkb-mevlana.org.tr>

Gail M. Harley and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reincarnation; Theosophical Society (Adyar); UFO Religions; Western Esoteric Tradition.

Reference

Harley, Gail M. "From Turbans to the Tarot: Radical Religious Trends in Modern Turkey." Unpublished paper, 1998. Copy in files of the American Religions Collection, Davidson Library, University of California–Santa Barbara.

World Buddhist Sangha Council

The World Buddhist Sangha Council (WBSC) was founded in 1966 as an expression of the international Buddhist Sangha (community). Delegates from Ceylon, Vietnam, Malaysia, Republic of China, Hong Kong, Nepal, Cambodia, Korea, Pakistan, India, Singapore, Thailand, England, and Laos, along with a special delegation representing the Dalai Lama, assembled at Colombo, Sri Lanka, May 8–11, 1966, to adopt the original constitution.

Within Buddhism, Sangha refers to two distinct phenomena, the Savaka-Sangha, or the community of (noble) disciples (the larger community of all believers), and, more narrowly, the Bhikkhu-Sangha, or the community of Bhikkhus (monks). This latter grouping, especially prominent in Theravada Buddhist groups, is also referred to as the Sammatti-Sangha, or the conventional Sangha. The World Buddhist Sangha Council is organized around the Sangha in the more narrow sense of that term, as an association of Buddhist monks and clergy. In Theravada thinking, monks serve as the core and leading part of the larger Buddhist lay community. They attempt to lead exemplary and noble lives and thus exercise influence on the people in treading the Noble Eightfold Path. The Bhikkhu-Sangha also serves as the center for training both those who join it and the lay community.

The WBSC gathers in a general conference or assembly at five-year intervals. The assembly selects an executive council that meets annually to carry on the assembly's business between the larger meetings. As the new century begins, the executive council includes some 149 members drawn from all the major schools of Buddhism. The Most Venerable Wu Ming of the Republic of China (Taiwan) and the Most Venerable Kok Kwong of Hong Kong have been named the “lifelong honorable president” and vice president, respectively.

The WBSB has its headquarters in Taiwan. WBSB members come not only from the traditionally Buddhist countries but also from Buddhist communities around the world, especially North America and Europe.

The Council has taken stands on a variety of social issues, beginning with the Vietnam War. In more recent years it has encouraged the development of Buddhist education, especially for leadership training. It has argued for a consensus Buddhism representative of mainline Theravada and Mahayana Buddhist traditions. This perspective was noted in a 1995 declaration that stated that “fanatic elements are to be found even in the modern world who proclaim that they are the living Buddhas. Therefore, we solemnly declare that these wrong views expressed by certain elements of the Buddhist community will not be approved by the WBSB. The Buddha once admonished the disciples that even though they have cultivated the stage of obtaining supernormal power, they should not perform miracles leading to the misunderstanding of the path shown by the Buddha. In this context, we, the WBSB, appeal to the world not to be misled by such modern elements in the name of Buddhism. We hereby declare that the whole members of the Sangha should abide by and uphold the authentic teachings of the Buddha for the betterment of mankind.”

This stance can be seen as posing opposition to adherents of Vajrayana Buddhism (especially Tibetan Buddhists), who recognize various leaders as a living Buddha, or Rinpoche, but would equally apply to the leader of the controversial groups such as Falun Gong, whose leader, Li Hongzhi, is seen as a Living Buddha.

The Council draws its strength from Sri Lanka, Vietnam, and Taiwan, and the Chinese diaspora across Southeast Asia and from Chinese, Vietnamese, and Asian Theravada groups in the West.

World Buddhist Sangha Council
6 Shaoshing Street N.

Taipei

Taiwan 100

<http://www.wbsc886.org/English/E-index2/E-index.html>

Edward A. Irons

See also: Falun Gong; Mahayana Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism.

Reference

Payutto, Ajahn Prayudh. “Sangha: The Ideal World Community.” <http://www.saigon.com/~anson/ebud/ebdha062.htm>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Communion of Reformed Churches

The World Communion of Reformed Churches is a new organization designed to represent Christian churches of the Protestant Reformed tradition, still in process of formation as of 2009. The Communion began with a proposal initiated in 2005 by the Reformed Ecumenical Council, which represented a number of the more conservative Reformed denominations, to merge its work into the much larger World Alliance of Reformed Churches. The Council dates to 1946 and its membership had been built around a common allegiance to the traditional Reformed confessional statements. The Alliance dates to 1975 and the formation of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches Throughout the World Holding to the Presbyterian System. In 1970, it merged with the International Congregational Council, Congregational churches, being Reformed in theology, merely disagreeing on the matter of polity. Over the years, churches have evolved in their discernment of those issues that are most important relative to cooperative action and fellowship, and those that are of lesser significance.

Following the initial overture of the Council, the Alliance made a counterproposal. Rather than simply absorbing the Council, it suggested that both bodies dissolve and their member groups then form a new ecumenical organization in which all would be new and equal participants. That idea was welcomed by all and acted upon. A draft constitution was sent out for consideration in October 2008 and a proposed inaugural gathering of the new communion was held in Grand Rapids, Michigan, in June 2010.

The new communion is the home of some 257 denominations worldwide. It has established an Internet presence at <http://reformedchurches.org/>.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Congregationalism; Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

World Conference on Religion and Peace

The World Conference on Religion and Peace (WCRP) is an international organization that attempts to bring religious resources and religious leadership to bear in interfaith attempts to create world peace. WCRP dates to the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962, during which time the United States and the Soviet Union stood on the brink of war. At that time, Dr. Dana McLean Greeley (1908–1986), a leader with the Unitarian-Universalist Association, called together Rabbi Maurice N. Eisen-drath (1902–1973), Methodist Bishop John Wesley Lord (1902–1989), and Roman Catholic Bishop John Wright (1909–1979). Their informal meeting led to an initial conference on religion and peace in 1964 in New York City and a national Inter-Religious Conference on World Peace in Washington, D.C. Following that conference two representatives of the national conference made a world tour to assess the global situation and build a network of interested leaders.

The first World Conference on Religion and Peace met at Kyoto, Japan, in 1970. The WCRP was formally established at that time. In 1973, WCRP was granted consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. In the subsequent quarter-century of its existence, WCRP has created a variety of programs and responses to the changing world situation and shifting global hotspots. In 1970 it created the WCRP International Coordinating Committee for Women. A decade-long concern for children caught in war led to its sponsorship of the 1995 religious participation in the UN's study entitled "The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children."

The program is carried out through regional councils in Europe, Asia, and Africa, as well as chapters in some 40 countries. World assemblies are held every five years. The most recent met in Kyoto, Japan, in 2006. Members committed themselves to confront violence around the world and in their own country and continue their efforts toward world peace.

World Conference on Religion and Peace
777 UN Plaza
9th Floor
New York, NY 10017
<http://www.wcrp.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Arinze, Cardinal Francis. Religions for Peace: A Call for Solidarity to the Religions of the World. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 2002.
- Braybrook, Marcus. Inter-Faith Organizations, 1893–1979: An Historical Directory. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1980.
- Jack, Homer. WCRP: A History of the World Conference on Religion and Peace. New York: World Conference on Religion and Peace, 1993.
- World Conference on Religion and Peace. Religions for Peace: Action for Common Living. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2000.

World Congress of Faiths

The World Congress of Faiths, one of the oldest interfaith organizations in existence as the 21st century began, traces its beginning to the 1893 World Parliament of Religions and the series of interfaith conferences and organizations inspired by it. Especially important was the Religions of the Empire Conference, held in London in 1924, which brought to the fore Francis Younghusband (1863–1942). As a young man he had developed a mystical view of religion and come to believe that the Divine Spirit is latent in all people—that they are children of the same Father, and that people should nurture and develop the Divine Flame. His conclusions were confirmed in a vivid religious experience he had in Tibet in 1903.

Indian-born British explorer Sir Francis Edward Younghusband (1863–1942) founded the World Congress of Faiths. (Getty Images)

Out of his experience, Younghusband began to work for a congress of faiths at which he could share his vision of the unity of religions. He helped to plan the Religions of the Empire Conference, chaired a committee of the Society for the Study of Religions that grew out of it, and later spoke at the World Fellowship of Faiths Conference in 1933 in Chicago. From the Chicago conference, he returned to London and in 1934 established the British National Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths. He also proposed a Congress of Faiths, which convened in London in 1936, notable for its allowing actual discussion between the participants, and not just the giving of lectures. In spite of Younghusband's own beliefs, the Congress reached the opinion that the desirable end of its activity was the spread of understanding and a sense of unity between different religious communions.

Following the Congress a continuing committee was set up as the World Congress of Faiths (Continuation Movement). Subsequent conferences were held in 1937, 1938, and 1939. Then its work was curtailed by World War II. Younghusband died in 1942. The Congress moved forward through the succeeding decades, largely on the shoulders of a few people dedicated to interfaith activity and often in the face of many Christians who felt that interfaith commitments called into question the truth claims of Christianity. In 1949 a journal, World Faiths (now World Faiths Encounter), was begun, currently the oldest interfaith periodical in circulation. During the last decades of the 20th century, the successes of the Congress were in large part the result of the long tenure of its general director, Marcus Braybrooke, an Anglican priest who also served as editor for World Faiths. In 2004, the archbishop of Canterbury awarded Braybrooke an honorary doctorate for his “contribution to the development of inter-religious co-operation and understanding throughout the world.”

In 1993, in cooperation with the International Association for Religious Freedom and Westminster College, Oxford, the World Congress was able to put together an endowment for the International Interfaith Centre, inaugurated in Oxford on December 6, 1993. In part inspired by the centennial of the World's Parliament of Religions, and a perception of an increasing amount and variety of interfaith activity around the world, leaders of the congress came to believe that a need existed for an international interfaith center that was informed about interfaith work globally and could offer encouragement to continuing interfaith understanding and cooperation.

World Congress of Faiths
c/o London Inter Faith Centre
125 Salusbury Rd.
London, NW6 6RG
UK
<http://www.worldfaiths.org/>

International Interfaith Centre
<http://www.interfaith-center.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions; International Association for Religious Freedom.

References

- Braybrooke, Marcus. Beacons of the Light: 100 Holy People Who Have Shaped the History of Humanity. Oxford: O Books, 2009.
- Braybrooke, Marcus. A Heart for the World: A Program to Transform the World Based on Non-violence and Compassion. Oxford: O Books, 2006.
- Braybrooke, Marcus. Inter-Faith Organizations, 1893–1979: An Historical Directory. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1980.
- Braybrooke, Marcus. Wider Vision: A History of the World Congress of Faiths. Oxford: Oneworld, 1996.

World Convention of Churches of Christ

The World Convention of Churches of Christ grew out of an attempt to revive the fellowship that had been broken between the various segments of the Restoration movement that had begun around the revivalistic efforts on the American frontier of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), Alexander Campbell (1788–1866), Walter Scott (1796–1861), and others during the first decades of the 19th century. Most of the leaders had formerly been ministers in Presbyterian and Baptist churches. As the movement grew over the century, it also developed some differences, primarily concerning the development of structures serving the larger community of congregations. One wing of the movement remains fiercely congregational, and rejects any structures tending toward denominational structures. These differences led to the formation of three separate fellowships: the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, and the Churches of Christ (Non-instrumental).

In spite of their differences, the three bodies share a number of agreed-upon principles, 10 of which stand out: (1) a concern for Christian unity, (2) a commitment to evangelism and mission, (3) an emphasis on the centrality of the New Testament, (4) a simple Confession of Faith, (5) believer's baptism, (6) weekly Communion, (7) a biblical name, (8) congregational autonomy, (9) lay leadership, and (10) diversity/freedom/liberty.

An initial attempt to bridge the divisive forces in the Restoration movement culminated in the first meeting of the World Convention of Churches of Christ in 1930. With an interruption due to World War II, the Convention has met regularly every five years, and more recently every four years. The Convention unites congregations in 168 countries that have their heritage in the 19th-century Restoration movement. The Convention is primarily for fellowship, the tradition being opposed to pan-congregational structures.

World Convention of Churches of Christ
 1279 Brentwood Highlands Drive
 Nashville, TN 37211
<http://users.aol.com/worldconv/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Churches of Christ (Non-instrumental).

References

- Foster, Douglas A., et al., eds. The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- World Convention of Churches of Christ. <http://users.aol.com/worldconv/>. Accessed April 24, 2009.

World Council of Biblical Churches

The World Council of Biblical Churches is an international association of separatist fundamentalist Christian denominations. It was organized in 1987, originally taking the name Council of Bible Believing Churches International, following the break between the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC) and the International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC). In the 1930s, the more conservative wing of U.S. Protestantism, known as Fundamentalists, split into two factions. One, the evangelicals, agreed to work with conservative colleagues who remained within the larger liberal Protestant church bodies. The other faction, the Fundamentalists, demanded that their colleagues completely renounce and separate from the larger Protestant groups, which they believed had become apostate. Under the leadership of Presbyterian minister Carl McIntire (1906–2002), the Fundamentalists founded the ACCC.

In 1948, occasioned by the founding of the World Council of Churches, McIntire called together conservative church leaders from around the world to form the ICCC. From 1948 to 1969 the two organizations worked together, but then in 1969, the ACCC removed McIntire from its board. In the ensuing controversy, the ICCC sided with McIntire, and the two organizations discontinued their relationship.

For the next few years, the ACCC operated without an international affiliate, but in 1987 it led in the founding of the Council of Bible Believing Churches International. The Council sees itself primarily as an issue-oriented body designed to address with a united voice the primary topics facing Fundamentalist Christians globally.

As a Fundamentalist organization, the Council affirms the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and the importance of complete separation from heresy and apostasy. The World Council of Churches and its member churches are viewed as heretical organizations. The Council also opposes all accommodation to “Romanism, Ecumenism, Materialism, Communism,” and any other movement or group that teaches anything contrary to sound doctrine.

Members of the Council cannot be associated in any manner with the World Council of Churches or any of its affiliates; the World Evangelical Alliance or any of its affiliates; or the ICCC or any of its affiliates. The Council also opposes the modern Pentecostal/Charismatic movement. Between gatherings, the World Council of Biblical Churches is headed by an executive committee consisting of representatives from each member body. It shares headquarters space with the American Council of Christian Churches.

World Council of Biblical Churches
625 E. 4th St.
PO Box 5455
Bethlehem, PA 18015

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Fundamentalism; International Council of Christian Churches; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

Reference

Falwell, Jerry. The Fundamentalist Phenomenon. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981.

World Council of Churches

The World Council of Churches (WCC) is the primary organizational expression of the 20th-century ecumenical movement within the Christian community. Beginning in the 19th century and continuing through the first half of the 20th, Protestant Christian leaders from around the world voiced their concern that the splintering of the Protestant movement into hundreds of denominations was a scandal to the church. They called for new organized expressions of Christian unity. Such expressions began with agreements to stop direct competition on the mission field, and it grew into major conferences that focused issues around broad areas of Faith and Order (theological and ecclesiastical issues) and of Life and Work (the mission and activity of the church in the world).

Three important organizations operated through the early 20th century: the Universal Christian Council of Life and Work, the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order, and the International Missionary Movement. In 1933 prominent U.S. theologian William Adams Brown suggested to Archbishop William Temple of the Church of England that these three organizations enter into conversations with the World Alliance for International Friendship and the Student Christian Movement about a common future. From conversations initiated by Temple, a proposal to form a World Council of Churches was promulgated in 1937. Work on the constitution began the next year.

Slowed by World War II, the Council was not inaugurated until 1948, when delegates from a variety of Nobel peace laureates Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, right, and Adolfo Perez Esquivel of Argentina light candles during a march by the 9th Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Porto Alegre, Brazil, on February 21, 2006. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Protestant and Orthodox bodies gathered in Amsterdam. Its formation was opposed by a small group of the more Fundamentalist churches, which that same year formed the International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC). The ICCC should not be confused with the World Council.

The World Council has served as a fellowship of most of the larger Protestant and Orthodox Christian churches in the world. During the decades of its existence, it has assisted the process by which its North American and European members have granted autonomy to former mission churches around the world, and the Council's membership has grown considerably as it has welcomed these churches into its midst. Through the 1990s, the Orthodox churches have made their presence known in their dissent from the thrust of various Council activities centered on theological and liturgical innovation and involvement in controversial social programs. In the late 1990s, several of the more conservative Orthodox churches resigned from the Council, and others have threatened to resign.

The work of the World Council is carried out through the meetings of its general assembly and a program centered on the international headquarters in Switzerland. There are four internal administrative groupings, with a focus upon Issues and Themes; Relationships; Communication; and Finance, Services, and Administration. None operate as self-contained entities, working instead in an interdependent relationship with all the others. The Council has specialized in dialogue, which it promotes at all levels. The work of the Council is extended by the efforts of a variety of regional, national, and local church councils, as well as the efforts of structures that promote dialogue and cooperation within a single Christian family, such as the World Methodist Council and the Anglican Communion. The World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the Ecumenical Patriarchate, and the Lutheran World Federation have their offices in the same building that houses the World Council.

As of 2009, the World Council of Churches included more than 349 member churches based in some 110 countries representing over 560 million Christians. Membership runs the spectrum of Christian belief and practice from quite liberal and socially engaged churches to more conservative and evangelistically oriented. It includes most of the large international Protestant and Orthodox churches. Originally founded as a largely European and North American organization, currently the majority of WCC membership is from churches based in Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, Latin America, the Middle East, and the Pacific. Internationally, the work of the Council is made effective by its various regional councils such as the All Africa Council of Churches, the Middle East Council of Churches, the Caribbean Council of Churches, the Latin American Council of Churches, and the Pacific Conference of Churches. National councils affiliated with the World Council also operate in most countries. In most of the regional and national councils, the Roman Catholic Church is also intimately involved.

The Council has a special status for affiliated regional and national councils of churches, and for the organizations representing the various world Christian communions. Its Internet sites contain the Internet addresses of its member churches and affiliated organizations.

The Council describes itself as “a fellowship of churches that confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.” This wording has been accepted as a bridge to the Council’s primary function of bringing Christians of different persuasions into dialogue. It provides a basis for agreement without making the arena so narrow as to exclude churches that do not affirm particular items of traditional orthodox Christianity. Because of its relative openness, it has been accused by more conservative believers of being open to liberal and heretical views, and, increasingly, conservative churches have refused to participate in its programs. The primary alternative to the World Council of Churches has been provided by the World Evangelical Alliance, which, through the 1980s and 1990s, has established a set of regional and national councils of conservative churches and missionary agencies that parallels that of the WCC.

Most of the churches of the Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed/Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Methodist, and Orthodox traditions are members, while a relatively small number of Baptist, Holiness, and Pentecostal bodies are related. Although the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) is not a member, there are close links with it. The WCC/RCC joint working group meets annually, and the WCC Faith and Order Commission includes Roman Catholics who are members with full voting rights. The Council has built cordial relationships with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, the primary structure growing out of the Second Vatican Council to conduct ecumenical dialogue by the Roman Catholic Church. The Council conducts dialogue with leaders of the other major religious traditions through its Office for Inter-religious Relations.

World Council of Churches
PO Box 2100

150 route de Ferney
CH-1211
Geneva 2
Switzerland
<http://www.wcc-coe.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: All Africa Conference of Churches; Caribbean Conference of Churches; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; International Council of Christian Churches; Latin American Council of Churches; Lutheran World Federation; Middle East Council of Churches; Pacific Conference of Churches; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; World Methodist Council.

References

- Kinnamon, Michael, and Brian Cope, eds. The Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Key Texts and Voices. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1997.
- Raiser, Conrad. To Be the Church: Challenges and Hopes for a New Millennium. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1997.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook of Member Churches: World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Yearbook*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, issued annually.

World Evangelical Alliance

What is now known as the World Evangelical Alliance developed among the new generation of Protestant and Free church evangelical Christians following World War II, but it traces its organizational identity to the Evangelical Alliance that formed in England in 1846. The Alliance was an early expression of the Christian ecumenical movement, an organizational expression of Christian unity. The original gathering, held in London, brought together representatives of some 52 denominations from Europe and North America. The delegates had responded to a number of calls for such an alliance that had been issued by Christian leaders for several decades.

The initial organization was seen as an association of individual Christians, rather than a confederation of churches. A doctrinal statement emphasizing both the authority of the scriptures and the need for individual interpretation was adopted, along with statements on the Trinity, human depravity, and salvation through Jesus Christ. The development of a strong international organization foundered on the question of slavery, still a fact of life in the United States. Thus power was passed to a series of national alliances, the first established in England, Canada, Germany, and Sweden. Indian and Turkish chapters were opened in 1849 and 1855, respectively. No U.S. branch was formed until 1867, after the Civil War had settled the slavery issue.

The European branches of the Alliance have continued active. However, the U.S. branch became inactive at the beginning of the 20th century, and its corporation was formally dissolved in 1944 and its assets turned over to the Federal Council of Churches (now the national Council of Churches in the U.S.A.). Work in America had fallen victim to the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy. Out of the controversy, in the early 1940s the more forward-looking among the conservative evangelicals organized the National Association of Evangelicals.

In the years following World War II, evangelical leaders began again to look for some kind of international cooperation. Initial contacts resulted in the calling of a meeting to be held at Woudschiten, near Zeist, in The Netherlands, August 5–11, 1951, at which time the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) was created. A brief doctrinal statement was adopted and three purposes accepted. The WEF would direct its activities to the furtherance of the gospel, the defense and confirmation of the gospel, and fellowship in the gospel. An initial outreach tour was conducted by several WEF leaders to determine needs within the global evangelical community. Within the first year, six national evangelical fellowships had affiliated with WEF—Ceylon (Sri Lanka), Cyprus, Great Britain, India, Japan, and the United States. Six more—Singapore, Hawaii, Switzerland, Germany, France, and Holland—joined at the first meeting in 1952.

The WEF subsequently grew into a worldwide network of more than 120 national/regional evangelical church alliances, 104 organizational ministries, and 6 specialized ministries. In 2001, the WEF voted to change its name to World Evangelical Alliance. It is headed by an international executive council, whose members are drawn from every region of the world. It operates through seven regional bodies that in turn coordinate the activity of national bodies in their region. The World Evangelical Alliance serves those more conservative evangelical Christians who do not identify with the World Council of Churches, whose stance they consider too liberal.

In 2009, the Alliance coordinated a network of churches in 128 nations, each nation having formed a national evangelical alliance, and of some 100 international organizations. Together the member churches and organization represent more than 420 million people.

World Evangelical Alliance
13351 Commerce Parkway, Ste. 1153
Richmond, BC
V6V 2X7
Canada
<http://www.worldevangelical.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelicalism; Fundamentalism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Fuller, W. Harold. People of the Mandate. Carlisle, UK: Paternoster; Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1996.
- Howard, David M. The Dream That Would Not Die: The Birth and Growth of the World Evangelical Fellowship, 1846–1986. Exeter, UK: Paternoster, 1986.
- Klauber, Martin, and Scott M. Manetsch, eds. The Great Commission: Evangelicals and the History of World Missions. Nashville: Broadman & Holman Books, 2008.

World Fellowship of Buddhists

The World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB) is an international organization, founded on May 25, 1950, and inaugurated at its first general conference in Colombo (Sri Lanka) that same year. This was probably the first time in the history of Buddhism that representatives from nearly every school of Buddhism in the Theravada, Mahayana, and Tibetan traditions gathered to share their mutual understanding and Buddhist activities. The WFB is the best known Buddhist organization recognized by the state and the sangha around the world.

The Dalai Lama, right, presents a Buddhist image to Kaiko Kanto, General Secretary of the All-Japan Buddhist Association, in October 1978, at the Zojoji Temple in Tokyo during the 12th conference of the World Fellowship of Buddhists. (AP/Wide World Photos)

According to the WFB constitution, the general conference is to be held once in every two years. The president holds office for a term of four years, and his or her country is the place of the organization's headquarters. Accordingly, the first WFB headquarters was in Colombo. The respected scholar Dr. G. P. Malalasekera (1899–1973) was the WFB's first president, from 1950 to 1958. In the time of the WFB's second president, Hon. U. Chan Htoon (from 1958 to 1961), the headquarters was in Burma. Afterward, all WFB presidents have been Thais, and thus the headquarters is permanently situated in Bangkok, as adopted at the WFB ninth general conference in 1969.

The WFB has the following aims and objectives: (1) to promote among the members strict observance and practice of the teachings of the Buddha; (2) to secure unity, solidarity, and brotherhood among Buddhists; (3) to propagate the teachings of the Buddha; (4) to organize and carry on activities in the field of social, educational, cultural, and humanitarian services; and (5) to work for securing peace and harmony among men and happiness for all beings, and to collaborate with other organizations working for the same ends.

Inasmuch as the WFB organization is composed of different Buddhist denominations, all members learn to accept each other's beliefs, worship, and practices. In the first WFB conference, some significant resolutions were adopted. The Dharmacakra (Wheel of the Law), with eight spokes representing the Noble Eightfold Path, was adopted as the international Buddhist symbol, and the six-color Buddhist flag, at that time in use in Sri Lanka, was adopted as the international Buddhist flag. The term “Hinayana” in all contexts was replaced by the term “Theravada.” In the historical context, there was a stage when the Mahayanists, as a derogatory remark, called some of the earlier Buddhists followers of the lesser vehicle (Hinayana) while they believed that they were following the greater vehicle (Mahayana).

The WFB is a traditional rather than a controversial organization. According to its constitution, it refrains from involving itself directly or indirectly in any political activity. Currently, its patrons include, among others, the supreme patriarch of Thailand, the head of the Sri Lankan Sangha, the king of Thailand, the king of Nepal, and the president of the republic of India.

The organization is led by an elected president and the Office Bearers (15 vice presidents, 9 chairpersons of standing committees, an honorary secretary-general, an honorary deputy secretary-general, an honorary assistant secretary-general, and an honorary treasurer). According to the WFB, the duties and responsibilities of standing committees are particularly important and beneficial to all people. For example, the Standing Committee of Publication, Publicity, Education, Culture, and Art can work for the knowledge and peace of Buddhists and non-Buddhists, as can the Humanitarian Services Committee.

Nowadays, missions and activities of the WFB are carried on through its 147 regional centers in 37 countries in Asia, Europe, Africa, and North America (including Hawaii). It maintains Formal Consultative Relations with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) as a Category B nongovernmental organization, to represent the Buddhist point of view on matters relating to education, culture, and communication in UNESCO conferences and meetings. It has also been recognized as a nongovernmental organization (Category I), cooperating with the United Nations in the domains of peace, human rights, and development. The WFB has proposed to UNESCO that the Vesakh Day be recognized as the International Day. The proposition was well approved.

At present, the Vesakh Day is considered by all WFB members as the World Meditation Day that contributes to World Peace.

The true number of members within the WFB is unknown. It covers all Buddhists who join activities of regional centers around the world. The number of delegates and observers who join each WFB general conference is approximately 500.

The World Fellowship of Buddhists
616 Benjasiri Park
Soi Medhinivet
Off Soi Sukhumvit 24
Sukhumvit Road
Bangkok 10110
Thailand
<http://www.wfb-hq.org>

Pataraporn Sirikanachana

See Also: Buddhism.

References

- Guruge, Ananda W. P. “The Buddha’s Contribution to Humanity and World Peace: Keynote Address.” Journal of the World Buddhist University, vol. 4, no. 1 (2007): 8–30.
- Miyabara, Sunao. A History of the World Fellowship of Buddhists 2493 B.E. (1950) to 2533 B.E. (1990). Bangkok: Darnsuttha Press Co., Ltd., 1994.
- Sirikanachana, Pataraporn. A Guide to Buddhist Monasteries and Meditation Centres in Thailand. Bangkok: The Printing House of Thammasat University, 2004.
- World Fellowship of Buddhists. Record of Proceedings: The 23rd General Conference of the World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB); The 14th General Conference of the World Fellowship of Buddhist Youth (WFB Y); The 6th Meeting of the World Buddhist University (WBU) Council. Bangkok: The Printing House of Thammasat University, 2008.

World Methodist Council

Formed in 1951, the World Methodist Council (WMC) continues the intra-Methodist cooperative activity that Participants of the World Methodist Council float balloons symbolizing peace on the Korean peninsula during a prayer meeting in Paju, near the inter-Korean border, July 23, 2006. (Getty Images) began in 1881 with the first Ecumenical Methodist Conference that assembled in London. Attendees at the first conference represented primarily the various North American and British organizations into which the Methodist movement had splintered through the 19th century. The ecumenical conferences continued to meet every decade until the 1941 meeting was stopped by World War II. The desire to reunite the several churches into which both the British and Americans had split and the wish of American and British Methodists to keep fraternal relations strong fueled the meetings through the middle of the 20th century.

Significant changes in world Methodism led to the Council's creation. The larger American churches participated in a series of mergers (1939, 1946, and 1968) that led to the creation of the United Methodist Church; similar mergers in England led to the present Methodist Church. The constituent bodies of both churches had created a far-flung international missionary endeavor, and following World War II they began the process by which most of the missions were transformed into autonomous church bodies. This process was recognized in 1951 with the change of name of the Ecumenical Conference to the World Methodist Conference, and the establishment of a permanent secretariat.

In 1953 the Council's permanent headquarters was established at the Methodist campground at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina. Elmer T. Clark (1886–1966), the Council's first secretary for the Western Hemisphere, took the lead in the construction of the headquarters building and organized the following WMC conferences at Lake Junaluska (1956) and Oslo, Norway (1961). The conferences have continued to meet at five-year intervals.

The program of the WMC includes efforts to support Methodist education, strengthen family life in the various cultures, sponsor worldwide evangelism programs, develop worship and liturgical life in the churches, sponsor youth work, promote Methodist publishing worldwide, and provide an annual program of world exchange of clergy and laity. Through the quinquennial Oxford Institute of Methodist Theological Studies (where the Wesley brothers, George Whitefield, and others met in the earliest Methodist gatherings), WMC facilitates scholarly studies and timely theological reflection.

Between meetings, the work of the Council is entrusted to an executive committee and an executive staff headed by the general secretary. At the 2001 meeting, the general secretary, Joe Hale, who had held the post for 25 years, retired and was succeeded by the Reverend George Freeman. The Geneva office is currently led by the Reverend Denis Dutton, past bishop of the Methodist Church of Malaysia. The current chairperson of the World Methodist Council is His Eminence Sunday Mbang of the Methodist Church Nigeria. He succeeded Frances Werner Alguire, the first female chairperson. Churches from 108 countries are members of the Council.

World Methodist Council
545 N. Lakeshore Dr.
Lake Junaluska, NC 28745

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Nigeria; Methodist Church of Malaysia; United Methodist Church; Wesley, John.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2006.

World Muslim Congress

The World Muslim Congress (Motamar Al-Alam Al-Islami), the oldest of the several organizations aimed at bringing unity to the Muslim global community, was founded in 1926 at a gathering of Muslim leaders hosted by King Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud of Saudi Arabia. At a second gathering, held in Jerusalem in 1931, a constitution with the necessary rule and regulations was adopted for an organization that could promote solidarity among Muslims and cooperation on a global scale. Alhaj Aminul Husseini, the grand mufti of Palestine, was elected as one of the presidents. In the 1930s the idea of the congress fell by the wayside, but it was revived in the wake of the founding of the nation of Pakistan in 1947. A revived World Muslim Congress met at Karachi, Pakistan, in 1949. Those who gathered sought to unite Muslims against the newly independent India, from which Pakistan had broken away, and the newly formed nation of Israel.

At a second meeting, in 1951, the revived organization began to take shape, and permanent headquarters were established in Karachi. Alhaj Aminul Husseini continued as the organization's president. Proposals were accepted for the development of a World Muslim News Agency and the founding of a bank for the development of the Muslim community internationally.

Of the several Islamic cooperative organizations, such as the Muslim World League, the World Muslim Congress has been the least defined by the political concerns of the Muslim community. This has not, however, kept it from speaking out on various issues of particular concern for Muslims, such as the persecution of Muslims in minority situations, the struggles of Muslims in the Middle East, and, most recently, expressions of solidarity with the Muslims of Bosnia. However, it has shown a particular interest in the religious expression of Islam, and its leaders have attempted to represent Islam in numerous interfaith conferences.

The Congress periodically sponsors international conferences, the most recent of which met in Pakistan in 2000. Dr. Abdullah Bin Omar Nasseef of Saudi Arabia currently serves as president. Mir Nawaz Khan Marwat, the assistant secretary general, is in charge of the office in Karachi. Its work is carried out through a number of regional offices that range from Beijing, China, to South Africa and London. North American offices are located in Miami, Florida.

In 1987, the Congress received the Niwano Peace Prize from Japan, and the following year, Dr. Inamullah Khan, then the secretary general of the Modern World Muslim Congress, was awarded the Templeton Prize for progress in religion.

The Congress enjoys consultative status with the United Nations through its Economic and Social Council and UNICEF, and observer status with the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

World Muslim Congress
9-A, Block-7, Gulshan-e-Iqbal
PO Box 5030
University Rd.
Karachi-74000
Pakistan
<http://www.motamaralalamalislami.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud; Islam; Muslim World League.

Reference

- Burdett, Anita L. P. Islamic Movements in the Arab World, 1913–1966. 4 vols. Slough, UK: Archive.

World Plan Executive Council

See Global Country of World Peace.

World Reformed Fellowship

The World Reformed Fellowship was formed in October 2000 by the merger of two ecumenical associations operating among conservative churches of the Reformed tradition: the World Fellowship of Reformed Churches (WFRC) and the International Reformed Fellowship (IRF). The World Fellowship of Reformed Churches, formed in 1992, brought together the National Presbyterian Church of Mexico, the Presbyterian Church of Brazil, and the Presbyterian Church of America. The World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) was a catalyst for the formation of the World Fellowship as it existed under the WEF umbrella, and it held its meetings in conjunction with WEF assemblies. The organization considered the situation of evangelical churches in the Reformed tradition in the Western Hemisphere. Among the affiliated Spanish-speaking churches, 14 formed the Confraternidad Latinoamericana de Iglesias Reformadas, which initiated several missionary consultations concerning Latin America.

The International Reformed Fellowship was formed in 1992 in Pasadena, California, and was in its early years notable for the strong participation of Korean Presbyterian churches. Like the WFRC, the IRF assumed a conservative theological stance and opposed the contemporary theological trends it saw embedded in the World Council of Churches and the associated World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The new fellowship found agreement in adherence to the Westminster Confession of Faith, the formative document of the Presbyterian tradition, and in contemporary standards accepted by many conservative evangelicals concerning the authority of scripture, affirming the Bible's infallibility and inerrancy. The 23 original member churches were drawn from 23 countries. In 2009, the fellowship reported 42 member churches from around the world; in addition there are a number of organizations and local churches that have affiliated.

World Reformed Fellowship
430 Montier Road
Glenside, PA 19038
<http://www.wrfnet.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Green, Bill. "Is There a Need for a Reformed Fellowship?" <http://www.reformedmissions.org/fellowship.htm>. Accessed July 30, 2001.

World Religion Day

World Religion Day, observed worldwide on the third Sunday of January each year, is a Baha'i-inspired idea that has taken on a life of its own. In 2009, for instance, the Halifax (Nova Scotia) Regional Municipality in Canada celebrated its sixth annual World Religion Day in the Cathedral of All Saints, in recognition of which the mayor and councilors of the Halifax Regional Municipality issued a proclamation. In 2007, at the World Religion Day event hosted by the Entebbe Municipal Council of Entebbe, Uganda (situated on the northern shores of Lake Victoria, Africa's largest lake), participating religious leaders signed a joint declaration to establish the Entebbe Inter-Faith Coalition. The signatories pledged to use "the unifying power of religion to instill in the hearts and minds of all people of faith the fundamental facts and spiritual standards that have been laid down by our Creator to bring them together as members of one family."

As these examples illustrate, World Religion Day is now observed internationally, its American Baha'i origins notwithstanding. The history of World Religion Day dates back to 1949, when the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States (the national Baha'i governing council) instituted an annual World Religion Day "to be observed publicly by the Baha'i Communities wherever possible throughout the United States." Then as now, the third Sunday of January each year was designated for this celebration. The first World Religion Day event took place on January 15, 1950, and was observed by Baha'i communities across the United States.

The Baha'i Faith, among the younger of the independent world religions, emphasizes unity in the human community, and the inauguration of World Religion

Day could be seen simply as a natural expression of the Baha'i focus on the unity of religions, races, and nations. However, interfaith association was not the exclusive, nor even the primary original purpose of World Religion Day. In 1968, the Universal House of Justice, the international Baha'i governing body established in 1963, wrote: "Your letter of September 30, with the suggestion that 'there should be one day in the year in which all of the religions should agree' is a happy thought, and one which persons of good will throughout the world might well hail. However, this is not the underlying concept of World Religion Day, which is a celebration of the need for and the coming of a world religion for mankind, the Baha'i Faith itself. Although there have been many ways of expressing the meaning of this celebration in Baha'i communities in the United States, the Day was not meant primarily to provide a platform for all religions and their emergent ecumenical ideas. In practice, there is no harm in the Baha'i communities' inviting the persons of other religions to share their platforms on this Day, providing the universality of the Baha'i Faith as the fulfillment of the hopes of mankind for a universal religion are clearly brought forth" (Lights of Guidance, no. 1710).

While proclaiming the Baha'i Faith as the advent of a "universal religion" for humankind remains a constant among Baha'i sponsors of World Religion Day, the emphasis has slowly shifted over time. In a sample press release for Baha'i communities to use as a model, the following statement is made: "Baha'is celebrate the day by hosting discussions, conferences, and other events which foster understanding and communication between the followers of all religions. The purpose of World Religion Day is to call attention to the harmony of spiritual principles and the oneness of the world's religions and to emphasize that world religion is the motivating force for world unity." The wording of this model press release was likely based on a 2002 story on World Religion Day, published by the Baha'i World News Service.

In April 2002, the Universal House of Justice issued a letter addressed "To the World's Religious Leaders," in which interfaith dialogue is highly regarded. However, the letter states that the initiatives of the interfaith movement of the 20th century—as the progeny of the historic World's Columbian Exposition's World's Parliament of Religions (Chicago, 1893) did, in fact, "lack both intellectual coherence and spiritual commitment." For its part, "the Baha'i community has been a vigorous promoter of interfaith activities from the time of their inception" and will continue to assist, valuing the "cherished associations" that these activities create. The letter stresses the paramount importance of the universally recognizing that "religion is one" as a unific truth that can effectively dispel religious prejudice: "We owe it to our partners in this common effort, however, to state clearly our conviction that interfaith discourse, if it is to contribute meaningfully to healing the ills that afflict a desperate humanity, must now address honestly . . . the implications of the overarching truth . . . that God is one and that, beyond all diversity of cultural expression and human interpretation, religion is likewise one."

While neither the Universal House of Justice nor the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States currently plays an active role in promoting World Religion Day events, the Baha'i International Community (an official organ of the Universal House of Justice) has consistently reported on such events, with obvious appreciation.

The process of World Religion Day taking on a life of its own has been punctuated by several notable events. On January 20, 2007, in Brazzaville, the Republic of the Congo became the second country to issue a postage stamp for World Religion Day. Featuring a globe surrounded by the symbols of 11 religions, the stamp bears a French superscription which, translated, reads: "God is the source of all religions." Following a World Religion Day program that drew more than 250 participants from 8 faith-communities, agents were present to sell both the stamps and first-day covers. In 1985, Sri Lanka had become the first country to issue a World Religion Day stamp.

The purpose of World Religion Day today is to highlight the essential harmony of the world's religions; to foster their trans-confessional affinity through interfaith ecumenism; and to promote the idea and ideal of world unity, in which the world's religions can play a potentially significant role. This generalization is based on observations of how World Religion Day is celebrated in events that are sponsored by organizations that are not Baha'i, whether in concert with local Baha'i sponsorship or entirely independent of it. (In most cases, the Baha'is continue to play a vital role in the orchestration and success of these events.) The day is celebrated with interfaith dialogue, conferences, and other events that advance not only mutual understanding (or what scholars call "spiritual literacy"), but recognition, respect, and reciprocity among the followers of all religions who join together in celebrating World Religion Day.

Where observed, World Religion Day events typically do not attract representatives and participants from all local faith communities, primarily for religious reasons. As such, World Religion Day provides an insightful social barometer of the extent to which various religious groups are willing to formally associate with each other. While World Religion Day events are still sponsored and co-sponsored by local members of the Baha'i Faith worldwide, an increasing number of World Religion Day events are independently organized by interfaith or multi-faith coalitions. For instance, in Tralee, Ireland, the local World Religion Day observance was organized by the Kerry Diocesan Justice, Peace and Creation Committee, a Member Organisation of Pax Christi International in Ireland. In 2009 the third annual observance of World Religion Day in Greensboro, North Carolina, was organized by FaithAction and the Piedmont Interfaith Council. Also in 2009, World Religion Day was celebrated by Vadamalayan Hospitals and Vadamalayan Institute of Paramedical Sciences, in which a quiz competition was held to mark the occasion.

In certain cases, civic governments, both national and local, have tended to recognize the positive social value of World Religion Day events, perhaps more than the non-participating religious communities themselves, taken together, have been willing to admit. In 2004, for instance, the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky proclaimed January 17–18, 2004, as "World Religion Weekend" and went on to "urge the Commonwealth's citizens to participate in the observance of World Religion Weekend." In 2007, the Republic of Ghana's Secretariat organized a symposium themed "The Unity of the Faiths" on World Religion Day on Sunday, February 18, 2007. In January 2008, the City Council of Duncan, British Columbia (Canada) proclaimed January 20, 2008, as World Religion Day. In a 2009 World Religion Day event in Australia, Parliamentary Secretary for Multicultural Affairs and Settlement Services Laurie Ferguson declared, on behalf of the government of Australia: "Interfaith dialogue plays an important role in increasing understanding of our nation's religious and cultural diversity and bringing Australians closer together. The Australian Government supports interfaith dialogue at the highest levels." Many World Religion Day Events are associated with mayoral or municipal proclamations.

World Religion Day is self-perpetuating, thanks to the initiatives of progressive individuals and institutions who share a vision of religious confraternity. It is an inspired idea, with widespread appeal and remarkable longevity.

Christopher Buck

See also: Baha'i Faith.

References

- Baha'i Computer and Communications Association (BCCA). "World Religion Day" ("Sample Press Release"). <http://www.bcca.org/orgs/usnsa/samples.html>. Accessed September 30, 2009.
- Baha'i International Community. "Congo Republic issues stamp for World Religion Day." One Country 18, no. 4 (January–March 2007).
- Lights of Guidance: A Baha'i Reference File*. Comp. by Helen Hornby. 6th ed. New Delhi, India: Baha'i Publishing Trust, 1999.
- National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United States. "World Religion Day." Baha'i News, no. 226 (December 1949): 5.
- Parliamentary Secretary for Multicultural Affairs and Settlement Services. "World Religion Day 2009." <http://www.minister.immi.gov.au/parlsec/media/media-releases/2009/lf09002.htm>.
- Universal House of Justice. "To the World's Religious Leaders," 2002.
- Universal House of Justice. Letter dated October 22, 1968, to a Local Spiritual Assembly. Lights of Guidance, no. 1710.
- World Religion Day Program (Lal Fernando, Director-General). <http://www.worldreligionday.org>.

World Sephardic Federation

The Sephardic Jewish community traces its origins to the Iberian Peninsula (Spain and Portugal), where a Jewish presence can be traced to the third century BCE during the days of imperial Rome. The community grew following the scattering of Jews from Palestine as a result of the destruction of the temple in 70 CE. Over the next centuries Christianity came to power in the region and Jews became subject to an increasing number of repressive and discriminatory measures. Then in 711, Arab Muslim forces invaded southern Spain and quickly overran the peninsula.

Islam would control the territory for the next centuries. In the eighth century, at the time that the Umayyad dynasty was replaced by the Abbasid dynasty in the Middle East, a member of the Umayyad family escaped to the western Mediterranean. His arrival in Spain became the occasion of the setting up of a new Umayyad dynasty in Spain and the independence of Spain from the formerly united Arab Muslim empire.

Under Muslim rule, the Jews of Spain enjoyed the protection of the Arab rulers as a people of the book, though the separation of Spain from the larger empire would mean that the Jews in Spain would be somewhat isolated from large segments of the developing Jewish community, especially as it grew in Germany and in the Christian-dominated lands farther to the east. Meanwhile in Spain, Jews participated in the high culture developed in Muslim Spain. Jewish philosophers and scientists would arise, and the community would enjoy the leadership of learned theologians and jurists. The height of Jewish life in Spain could be said to have occurred in the 12th century, during the time that Moses ben Mamon (more popularly known as Maimonides or Rambam) lived (1135–1205). Maimonides wrote three important Jewish texts, though he is best remembered for his third volume, The Guide of the Perplexed (1190), which synthesized Jewish thought with Aristotelian philosophy. He also developed a widely quoted summary of Orthodox Jewish belief. Maimonides' writings circulated widely and not only provoked a reaction from other segments of the Jewish community but also caused many Christians to respond to his thought. In Paris, the Dominicans burned his writings in a public ceremony.

Within Spain, one group of Jews, largely in reaction to Maimonides, created a circle of mystics who in turn began to produce texts partially inspired by neo-Platonism and the Jewish mystical text, the Zohar. This movement would have an effect upon the development of the Hassidic community in other parts of the Jewish world.

Shortly after Maimonides's death, Christian partisans in Iberia, never completely pacified, began a reconquest of the land. Over the next two centuries, various kingdoms were established, and the Jewish community entered a new era of discrimination and persecution. In the kingdom of Aragon intense efforts to convert the Jews to Christianity were pursued. The height of reaction to the Jewish presence came in Castile and Aragon in 1391, when violence broke out and over a period of several months many Jews were massacred. A significant number of conversions to Christianity were noted over the following decades. The conversions decimated the Jewish community in many urban areas and by the end of the 15th century, as modern Spain was being created, led to a call for the complete expulsion of the remaining followers of the Jewish faith. At the same time a reaction against the Jewish Christians set in, and beginning in 1449 they were denied government positions.

In 1480 the Inquisition was established in Spain, with the specific task of rooting out any heresies among Jewish and Muslim converts. For the Jews, it meant scrutiny for tendencies among Jewish Christians to continue practicing Judaism after their conversion, and the beginning of the legends of the Conversos (aka Marranos), the secret Jews who though outwardly operating as Christians, in their private and family lives continued to practice Judaism and pass it along to their children.

The emergence of the modern state of Spain—with the conquest of the remaining territory held by Muslims in the south and the union of the states of Castile and Navarre—culminated in the orders of 1491 (Portugal) and 1492 (Spain) for the complete expulsion of the Jews from the Iberian Peninsula. The great majority of the Jews who left at this time found their way to Muslim territory and established centers for the perpetuation of Sephardic traditions throughout the Ottoman Empire and across North Africa. Here they would enjoy a new era of prosperity, and a number of outstanding scholars and political leaders would emerge. Some of these communities would quietly flourish until the late 20th century, when they would be decimated by the immigration of their members to Israel and to a lesser extent Western Europe and North America.

Indian Sephardic Jews place their hands to their faces as they take part in prayers at a synagogue in Aizawl, India, 2004. (AFP/Getty Images)

A smaller number moved to Holland and the other European countries. In Holland they were allowed to live somewhat peacefully, and Amsterdam became the new center of the Sephardic community. A smaller number of the expelled Jews relocated to the Americas. There is reason to believe that among the sailors who served with Christopher Columbus in his first voyage to the New World in 1492 were several Jews; a number of Portuguese Jews/Marranos relocated to Brazil. Some fled to Holland, possibly the most tolerant country of the era, where a new Jewish intelligentsia would develop. Possibly the most famous Dutch Jew is philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677).

In the early 1600s, the Netherlands attacked Brazil and established themselves in Recife. Jewish settlers emerged out of the population to found the first openly Jewish community in the Americas, Kahal Kodesh, the Holy Congregation. Unfortunately for them, Recife returned to Portuguese control in 1654. As a result, the members of the community were redistributed to Curacao in the Dutch West Indies, Surinam, and two North American locations, the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam (now New York) and the recently established Rhode Island colony. In the mid-1750s, Sephardic Jews organized the first Jewish community in Canada, in Halifax. A more permanent congregation, Shearith Israel, was later organized in Quebec. From Surinam and Curacao, the Sephardic community has spread across Latin America and now constitutes 15 to 20 percent of the whole. The beginnings of Judaism in both North and South America resulted from the Sephardic diaspora.

In the early 19th century, as German Jews began to arrive in force, many with Reformist tendencies, the German (Ashkenazi) and Sephardic Jews tended to go their separate ways. A small Sephardic presence remained, as first the Germans and then the Eastern Europeans came to dominate the Jewish community. Beginning in 1885, Sephardic life was established anew by the migration of Jews reacting to the decline of the Ottoman Empire. The mostly poor immigrants had difficulty integrating with the more affluent American Sephardic community.

In the meantime, in 1655, Oliver Cromwell found cause to admit the first Jews to England after their expulsion in the 13th century. Abraham Israel Carvajal (ca. 1590–1659) and his two sons received residency rights. As others arrived, Cromwell authorized a cemetery (but no public worship), the event from which the modern London Jewish community dates its existence. Cromwell saw the Jews as a vital source of information on England's perennial rival—Spain.

By the end of the 17th century, the Sephardic community was widely distributed across North Africa and the Middle East (the lands of the Ottoman Empire) and in scattered centers in the Americas and Europe. They resided in relative peace through the mid-20th century but were radically affected by the establishment of the nation of Israel and the growing enmity between Muslims and Jews in general over the Palestinian question. Through the last half of the 20th century, many of the old Sephardic Jewish communities in predominantly Muslim lands relocated to Israel, where they now form the largest segment of the Jewish community as a whole. (The Sephardic communities in the Balkans were largely destroyed by the Holocaust.) In 1984 a Sephardic party was founded in Israel, which through the 1990s became one of the largest political parties in the country.

In 1925, U.S. Sephardic Jews took the lead in founding the World Sephardic Federation in an attempt to build a cooperative network that could participate in the development of global Jewry. It became a strong supporter of the Zionist cause. At one level, the Sephardic community is integrated into the larger world of Orthodox Judaism, and its synagogues are part of the several Orthodox Jewish congregation associations. At another level, Sephardic leaders have worked to keep Sephardic distinctives alive. In 1928, they founded a Union of Sephardic Congregations in New York.

The American Sephardic Federation, founded in 1951, is the World Sephardic Federation's strongest national affiliate. The European Sephardic community has a focus through the Institut Sépharade Européen. There are numerous Internet sites representative of the Sephardic community.

World Sephardic Federation
13 Rue Marignac
Geneva 1206
Switzerland
<http://www.jafi.org.il/wsf/>

American Sephardic Federation
15 W. 16th St.
6th Floor
New York, NY 10011
<http://www.americansephardifederation.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hasidism; Orthodox Judaism.

References

- Cohen, Martin A., and Abraham J. Peck, eds. Sephardim in the Americas: Studies in Culture and History. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1993.
- Stillman, Norman A. The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1991.
- Zohar, Zion. Sephardic and Mizrahi Jewry: From the Golden Age of Spain to Modern Times. New York: New York University Press, 2005.

World Vaisnava Association

The World Vaisnava Association (WVA) was founded in 1994 by a spectrum of leaders (arcaryas and sannyasis) representing organizations that had grown from the Gaudiya Math. The Gaudiya Math had emerged at the beginning of the 20th century as the leading voice in the revival of the monotheistic devotional form of Vaisnava associated with Shri Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (ca. 1486–1533). In the last generation, beginning with the work of Srila A. C. Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada (1896–1977), the founder of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), the devotional form of Vaisnavism spread from Bengal, India, around the world.

In the years following Prabhupada's death, ISKCON experienced a number of schisms over issues of guru leadership. Members asked whether the gurus who succeeded Prabhupada should be venerated in the same manner that he had been. Other gurus had problems with the governing body that assumed headship over the international movement. A few turned to teachers (gurus) associated with the Gaudiya Math for new leadership. ISKCON split into a number of competing organizations, several of which grew into large international groups.

Initially, several former ISKCON leaders met in Vrindavan with B. V. Tripurari Swami, B. G. Narasingha Swami, and B. A. Paramadvaiti to discuss the possibility of founding a new organization as an expression of the unity of the flourishing global movement that had emerged from the Gaudiya Math. The group met again in 1993 and made several decisions. First, they agreed to approach Srila B. P. Puri Maharaj, then 97 years old, the most senior Vaisnava then alive, who agreed to become the first president of the proposed organization. They also decided to invite the leadership from all the different related groups to participate as founders of what would become the World Vaisnava Association.

An initial edition of the World Vaisnava Association Newsletter was issued in February 1994 and distributed to all the ISKCON-related groups. It invited suggestions and participation in a founding meeting that was held in November 1994. Some 120 people were present, and 28 arcaryas and sannyasis became founding members. The Association was seen as a revival of the Visva Vaisnava Raj Sabha, originally founded by Srila Jiva Goswami in the 19th century.

In promoting the unity of the various member organizations, WVA seeks to help others understand what it thinks of as the real Hinduism Sanatan Dharma, its theism, and its answers to the problems of contemporary society. It seeks to motivate the leaders and adher-ents of the member organizations in their propagation of Vaisnavism and to promote the circulation of Vaisnava literature. It was agreed that the organization would seek to build respect and fraternal relations between the various member organizations and would not in any way compete with any of them. In that regard, WVA would not create any ashrams, nor facilitate the guru-disciple relationship.

Founding members of the association included: Chaitanya Math, the Gaudiya Vaisnava Society, Sri Chaitanya Math, ISEV (Il Instituto Superior de Estudios Vedicos), ISKCON, Gaudiya Sangha, Sri Caitanya Gaudiya Math, Vedanta Samiti, Sri Caitanya Bhakti Gemeinschaft, VRINDA, the Bhaktivedanta Ashram, the Hungarian Vaisnava Association, the Sri Sri Radha Govindaji Trust, the Gaudiya Mission, the Bhaktivedanta Institute, the Sri Krishna Chaitanya Mission, Gopinath Gaudiya Math, and Mantra Meditation Hawaii.

Any organization in the Chaitanya tradition may associate with the WVA. While primarily formed and energized by the Western Chaitanya disciples, those organizations that broke away from the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the Association has been able to integrate Indian leadership into its life. All three of the Association's presidents, Srila B.P. Puri Maharaj, Srila Nayanandana Das Babaji, and the current president, Srila Bhakti B. Tirtha Maharaj, are Indians. The organization publishes the WVA Journal.

World Vaisnava Association
No. 154 Gopeswar Road
Mohala, Vrindaban
U.P. Dist.
Mathura Pin 281 121
India
<http://www.wva-vvrs.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Gaudiya Math; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Vaishnavism.

References

Paramadvaiti, B. A., Swami. Our Family the Gaudiya Math. <http://www.vrindavan.org/English/Books/GMconded.html>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Vaisnava Association. <http://www.wva-vvrs.org/>. Accessed October 1, 2001.

World Zoroastrian Organization

In the 1970s, some British Zoroastrians began to argue publicly for the creation of a worldwide Zoroastrian association that could assist the survival of the Zoroastrian community, which in every country of its existence is a minority and hence vulnerable to changing political climates. Unable to enlist the backing of the leadership in India and Iran, and spurred by the problems encountered by members of the faith in East Africa and fears for the situation in Iran following the Islamic Revolution, British Zoroastrians assembled a set of concerned leaders from around the globe to form the World Zoroastrian Association (WZO). The WZO grew out of a network put together as the result of several world Zoroastrian congresses that had been held through the 1970s and 1980s.

Within the London community, questions had arisen over the allowance of non-Zoroastrians to attend worship (an increasing problem in pluralistic London), the plight of children of mixed marriages, and the double use of the term “Zoroastrian” to indicate an ethnic Parsee as well as a practitioner of Zoroastrianism. In 1983 the World Zarathushtrian Trust Fund was established to support the WZO.

The WZO has found its strongest support in North America, among the member associations of the Federation of Zoroastrian Associations of North America, founded in 1987. It has not received the support of many of the Zoroastrians in India, where the WZO is seen as challenging older communal structures. The WZO is also perceived as representing the less traditional segment of the international Zoroastrian community, symbolized in 1993 by its acceptance of the children of mixed marriages into the Zoroastrian fellowship. Traditional Zoroastrians reject mixed marriages and make no provision for the conversion of non-Zoroastrians. They also have strict rules about the admittance of non-Zoroastrians into the most sacred space where important rituals are performed. The more traditionalist community members in the United Kingdom have withdrawn their support from the world organization.

The WZO is headed by a 37-member board with international representation, and a British-based executive committee. The organization has made it its job to intervene with governments on behalf of Zoroastrians; provide support for adherents living in poverty; assist the strengthening of Zoroastrian youth in the faith; and sponsor conferences, seminars, and research on Zoroastrianism.

The World Zoroastrian Organisation Trust
WZO Senior Citizen Centre,
Pinjar Street,
Malesar,
Navsari 396 445
India

World Zoroastrian Association
135 Tension Rd., South Norwood
London SE25 5NF
United Kingdom
<http://www.w-z-o.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Zoroastrianism.

Reference

Hinnells, John R. Zoroastrians in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.

Worldwide Church of God

The Worldwide Church of God (WCOG) officially changed its name in 2009 to Grace Communion International, thus severing its last link with the past. Today it is a fairly mainstream conservative evangelical church, which bears almost no resemblance to the church founded in 1934 by Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986) and run by him for half a century until his death. Much of the description here concentrates on the “historical” Worldwide church, whose background and summary of beliefs are essential to understanding the majority of the church’s numerous splinter groups.

The Worldwide Church of God shared common roots with the Seventh-day Adventist movement. When with the encouragement of Ellen G. White (1827–1915) a large group of Sabbatarian Adventist assemblies agreed to take the name Seventh-day Adventist Church at a conference in Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1860, a much smaller dissenting group split away under the name Church of God Seventh Day. Armstrong, a failed advertising executive, joined a congregation of one branch of this church in 1929, was ordained a minister in 1931, and was associated with the church until it removed his preaching credentials in 1937. In 1934 he started a small radio ministry (later to be called The World Tomorrow) and published the first mimeographed copy of The Plain Truth magazine, the two main activities by which the church reached out to non-members. His church was called the Radio Church of God until changing to the Worldwide Church of God in 1968.

The church was Sabbatarian and millenarian. It laid a strong emphasis not just on the Seventh-day Sabbath but also on holding the seven Jewish Holy Days and obeying Jewish dietary laws. It taught the literal (and soon-to-come) millennium, in which Christ would rule in peace on Earth for 1,000 years, with true believers (that is, members of the church) being rulers under Christ. It had a strong emphasis on biblical prophecy, and held a particular version of British Israelism, in which mentions of the subtribes of Ephraim and Manasseh in the Bible refer specifically to the present-day nations of Britain and the United States, respectively. Armstrong and other preachers and writers in his church examined political, military, and moral world affairs to prove that these are the end times. The church also taught that God is a family, currently with two members, the Father and the Son, but that true believers will become part of the God-family.

Throughout its history the WCOG met with much hostility from mainstream Christians and from anti-cultists, not only for its radical theological teachings but also for its insistence on two full tithes of gross income, and in some years a third tithe, and for its strict top-down governance, which allegedly led to much abuse of authority.

Until Armstrong's death the most traumatic period for the Worldwide Church of God was the decade of the 1970s. Many members believed from Armstrong's teaching that the end times would begin around 1972, and that Christ would return by 1975 (there was even a booklet entitled 1975 in Prophecy); when that did not occur, some disillusioned members left. Doctrinal changes on the date of Pentecost and a reversal of the church's formerly strict ruling against remarriage after divorce caused a number of members to leave in 1974, some to found splinter churches. In 1977, Armstrong married a divorcée 46 years younger than himself, much to the disapproval of his son and heir-apparent, Garner Ted Armstrong (1930–2003). The younger Armstrong was involved in sexual scandals early in the decade and was suspended from preaching for some months; on his return he liberalized some of his father's teachings until, in 1978, his father banished him from the church. Garner Ted Armstrong founded his own Church of God, International. In 1979, in response to allegations by former members of financial impropriety by Herbert W. Armstrong and the church's lawyer, Stanley Rader, the state of California placed the church in receivership for a time. In 1980 a former senior member published a book that detailed the authoritarian nature of the church, and also alleged that Armstrong had had sexual relations with one of his own daughters many years earlier.

The church recovered from all of these trials. At its height it had a baptized membership of very nearly 100,000, and its flagship magazine, The Plain Truth, had a worldwide circulation of more than 6 million.

A week before his death Armstrong appointed the church's administrative officer, Joseph W. Tkach (1927–1995), as his successor. Initially Tkach followed Armstrong's teachings and practices, but soon (strongly encouraged by his son Joseph Tkach Jr. [b. 1951], who became pastor general on his father's death) he withdrew all of Armstrong's books and booklets and began changing doctrines. Ministers who disagreed with the changes either resigned or were fired for refusing to teach them. In 1989 Gerald Flurry left to found the Philadelphia Church of God; in 1982 longstanding senior evangelist Roderick C. Meredith left to found the Global Church of God (see Living Church of God); and in 1995 a large group of ministers left to found the United Church of God. This last was in reaction to Joseph W. Tkach's Christmas Eve 1994 sermon, in which he formally renounced most of Armstrong's teachings and declared that the Worldwide Church of God was now effectively a standard evangelical Protestant church that "by tradition" worshipped on Saturday. Many of the offshoot groups had splits of their own; there are currently more than 400 separate offshoot groups, though many are minuscule.

With a massive drop in members and with tithing now voluntary rather than mandatory, the church's income plummeted. It laid off many of its staff, sold buildings, and had to close Ambassador University (formerly Ambassador College), which Armstrong had established in 1947 to train the church's members as ministers. In 2004 it sold its prestigious headquarters complex in Pasadena, California.

The Worldwide Church of God is now mainstream Trinitarian, has little emphasis on end-time prophecy, and has completely abandoned any belief in British Israelism. It celebrates Christmas and Easter, formerly condemned as Pagan festivals. The church's leaders encouraged congregations to hold services on Sundays instead of Saturdays, though that move has met with resistance from some of the membership, with some individual churches still meeting on Saturday.

In the United States, the WCOG was accepted as a member of the National Association of Evangelicals in May 1997, and in the United Kingdom it was accepted in the equivalent Evangelical Alliance in July 2000. Through these it is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

By 2009 the church claimed a membership of 42,000, in 900 congregations worldwide. It no longer publishes its former flagship magazine The Plain Truth, which has been replaced by Christian Odyssey. The U.S. The Plain Truth is now a cover-price magazine published by Plain Truth Ministries, founded in 1996 by one of the architects of the doctrinal changes in WCOG, Greg Albrecht, but officially unconnected with WCOG. The U.K. The Plain Truth, a completely separate non-denominational magazine, is still free, as all of WCOG's publications had formerly been, and is supported by donations.

In April 2009 the Worldwide Church of God in the USA made the final break with the past by changing its name to Grace Communion International. However, it still owns the copyright in the old name, and both individual U.S. congregations and non-U.S. national churches are free to continue calling themselves Worldwide Church of God.

Worldwide Church of God/Grace Communion
International
PO Box 5005
Glendora, CA, 91740-0730
www.wcg.org

David V. Barrett

See also: British Israelism; Evangelicalism; Living Church of God; Philadelphia Church of God; Sabbatarianism; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church of God; White, Ellen G.; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Armstrong, Herbert W. Autobiography. 2 vols. Pasadena, CA: Worldwide Church of God, 1986, 1987.
- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Hopkins, Joseph. The Armstrong Empire: A Look at the Worldwide Church of God. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1974.
- Nichols, Larry, and George Mather. Discovering the Plain Truth: How the Worldwide Church of God Encountered the Gospel of Grace. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 1998.
- Robinson, David. Herbert Armstrong's Tangled Web. Tulsa, OK: John Hadden, 1980.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah, 1997.

Wu Tai Shan

Wu Tai Shan (or in Chinese, Wenshu Pusa) is one of four mountains especially sacred to Chinese Buddhists. The four are scattered around the country, and Wu Tai Shan, located in Shanxi Province between Taiyuan and Beijing, is the mountain to the north. The sacred area of Wu Tai Shan is focused on five peaks with relatively flat tops, hence its name, which means "Five Terrace Mountain."

Wu Tai was originally a Daoist mountain and participated in the conception of mountains as pillars that held heaven in place above the Earth. It was also home to various Daoist deities. The mountain, however, began to participate in the first transmission of Buddhism to China and as early as the reign of the Emperor Ming Di (58–75 CE) a first Buddhist temple was built there. It seems to have been the result of the settlement of an Indian Buddhist monk on the mountain. During the next centuries more than 100 temples and monasteries appeared, and by the middle of the sixth century there were more than 200. Buddhism flourished until the reign of Emperor Wuzong, who in 845 turned on the Buddhist community and closed down temples and monasteries throughout his empire and forced hundreds of thousands of the Buddhist monks and nuns back into a secular life. Most of the temples now found on Wu Tai date to the post-Wuzong period though there are a few notable exceptions including the Nan Chan Si temple, the oldest surviving wooden temple in China, built in 782.

Tourists climb to a temple on Wu Tai Shan, one of four sacred mountains in China. (Carmentianya/Dreamstime.com)

The mountain is sacred to the bodhisattva Manjushri, who is believed to reside there. Reportedly, the same Indian monk who settled there in the first century had a vision of Manjushri, the first of many that would be reported over the centuries. In the seventh century, the Korean monk Chajang visited Wu Tai. He reported meeting a local monk who gave him several relics of Manjushri and instructed him to return to his home. A short time later he had a vision in which he was told that the monk was in fact Manjushri and that upon his return to Korea home he must build a temple to the bodhisattva, which he did.

During the time of Kublai Khan (r. 1260–1294), and his descendants, Tibetan Buddhism was favored, and Vajrayana monasteries began to develop at Wu Tai Shan. Ten of these monasteries are still active.

Today, there are 48 Chinese Buddhist temples on Wu Tai, plus the 10 Tibetan lamaseries. Most were built relatively close to Taihuai, the town in the middle of the five peaks. Because of its relatively isolated location, the temples on Wu Tai suffered little damage during the Cultural Revolution and the area around Taihuai retains much of the religious aura of pre-revolutionary China.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chajang; Emei Shan; Jiu-Hua Shan; Monasticism; Putuo Shan; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Nanquin, Susan, and Chün-Fang Yü, eds. Pilgrims and Sacred Sites in China. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.
- Shunxun, Nan, and Beverly Foit-Albert. China's Sacred Sites. Honesdale, PA: Himalayan Institute Press, 2007.
- Steinhardt, Nancy Shatzman. Chinese Traditional Architecture. New York: China Institute in America, China House Gallery, 1984.

Y

■ Yemen

Yemen is the southernmost country on the Arabian Peninsula. Its western border faces the Red Sea and its southern the Gulf of Aden. On the north and east it shares borders with Saudi Arabia and Oman. Much of its 204,000 square miles of territory is desert, and most of its 23,000,000 people (2008) live near the coastline.

Yemen has been inhabited at least since the end of the second millennium BCE, and a sophisticated civilization, the kingdom of Saba, or Sheba, developed there. It was based upon trade in spices, and over the next 1,000 years its cities became popular stops for caravans from both east and west. As sea trade between the Mediterranean area and India emerged, Yemen prospered even more.

Early in the Christian era, Yemen developed a special relationship with Ethiopia, which it faced across the Red Sea. Ethiopia conquered Yemen in 525 and remained in control for half a century until driven out by the Persians in 570. Yemen became a prize for different would-be conquerors for the next 300 years. Then in the seventh century, the leadership of the country converted to Islam, and within a generation Islam became the religion of the people. As the capital of the Islamic world moved to Damascus and then to Baghdad, Yemen was left somewhat isolated from the centers of both political and religious life.

In 897 a stable dynasty, the Yadyi, was established in the northern part of the country. A series of dynasties arose and fell in the south. For a time in the 16th and 17th centuries, the Ottoman Empire attempted to establish hegemony in the region. The British first made

Yemen

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	6,380,000	24,248,000	99.1	3.02	36,148,000	57,223,000
Hindus	4,000	155,000	0.6	3.02	300,000	600,000
Christians	2,100	41,300	0.2	2.92	60,500	87,700
Orthodox	0	11,000	0.0	1.09	15,000	20,000
Independents	1,400	12,000	0.0	4.14	20,000	35,000
Protestants	290	7,500	0.0	3.62	10,000	12,000
Agnostics	1,800	22,000	0.1	3.32	45,000	80,000
Atheists	400	4,800	0.0	3.02	8,000	10,000
Jews	1,300	1,300	0.0	3.02	1,300	1,300
Baha'is	300	1,300	0.0	3.00	2,000	4,000
Zoroastrians	600	1,000	0.0	1.61	1,000	1,000
Jains	0	250	0.0	3.06	500	800
Buddhists	0	150	0.0	3.04	300	600
Sikhs	100	130	0.0	3.04	200	300
Total population	6,391,000	24,475,000	100.0	3.02	36,567,000	58,009,000

View of the colorful and intricate skyline of San'a, the capital of Yemen and one of the oldest continuously inhabited sites in the world. (Zanskar/Dreamstime.com) their presence felt in 1618, when they established the headquarters of the East Indies Company at the city of Mukha. Then in 1839, they took control from Mukha through the Strait of Bab al Mandeb along the coast to Aden (the best port in the region). In response, the Turkish army moved into North Yemen. The opening of the Suez Canal in 1870 gave Aden new importance, and Great Britain moved to establish its control of the coast all the way to Oman, a process not completed until 1934.

In 1911 the Imam Yahya Ad-din began to reassert the rights of the Yadyi dynasty, which had survived though subservient to the Turks. It soon displaced the Turks, challenged Saudi influences on its northern border, and put pressure on the British over Aden. During the rest of the century, the struggle to unite Yemen as an independent country led to various wars, border realignments, and even the involvement of the country in the short-lived United Arab Republic (1958–1961). In 1967 a Socialist republic was declared in South Yemen, and in 1969 the British were forced out. The merger of North and South Yemen was delayed by the continued meddling of Saudi Arabia and other Arab nations that had interests in the north, but it was finally accomplished in 1990. Through the 1990s, the population increased dramatically as a result of the expulsions of Yemenis from Saudi Arabia and the return of Yemenis from Africa.

The Islamization of Yemen has been one of the more determinative factors in its history. The first mosques to be built in Yemen, reportedly erected by some men sent by the Prophet Muhammad himself, were in San'a al-Janad and near Wadi Zabid. These mosques may still be visited today. The country was also affected by the division of the Muslim community into Sunni and Shia. The Shias, the backbone of the former Yadi dynasty, are the majority in the northern part of the country, while the south is dominated by followers of the Sunni Shafaiite School. There is also a measurable Ismaili community and an even smaller number of followers of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, a 19th-century revivalist movement.

Islam is considered the established religion of Yemen, and Islamic law is the basis of all legislation. Non-Muslim religions are not permitted to proselytize, and Yemeni Muslims are not permitted to convert to another faith. Although the government has taken steps to present an open face to the West, it has been opposed by some Muslim groups, such as the Aden-Abyan Islamic Army, a militant movement opposed to Western presence in the Middle East. In 1990 the leader of the army was sentenced to death for his kidnapping of 20 Western tourists in the country.

Judaism had been present in Yemen for many centuries; but then at the beginning of the fifth century CE, a group of Yemenis, the Himyarites, decided to convert to the Jewish faith. It took control of South Yemen and established Judaism as the official religion. The Himyarites also moved to suppress Christianity, which had come into the country from Ethiopia. The Ethiopians reacted, and Himyarite rule was short-lived. In 525 the Ethiopians overran the Himyarite kingdom.

Through the succeeding centuries the Jews in Yemen lived quietly, though they were frequently the target of oppression and conversionist activity, and they created a unique Jewish community. In the mid-20th century it numbered upward of 50,000 people. Through the early 20th century, new anti-Jewish forces began to operate. In 1922, Yemen revived an ancient Muslim law that demanded the forced conversion to Islam of all Jews under the age of 12. In 1947, Aden was the scene of anti-Jewish riots that cost 82 Jews their lives and the destruction of many homes in the Jewish community. Continued pressure on the community led to the 1950 immigration of almost the entire community to the new state of Israel. Today almost no Jews are left, and there is no organized Jewish religious life.

Christianity was established in Yemen by the Ethiopians but gradually disappeared during the first centuries of Muslim rule. The primary exception appears to have been on the island of Socotra in the Arabian Sea, where the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East (a Nestorian Christian body based in Iraq) had a bishopric that lasted well into the medieval era.

Christianity made a new beginning in Yemen in the 19th century, when a Roman Catholic priest of the Servite Order settled in Aden. Work throughout the Arabian Peninsula had grown to the point that in 1854 a prefecture was created. It became a vicariate in 1888 and remained in Aden until 1974, when it was transferred to Abu Dhabi, where it remains. Catholic work in the decades after World War II has been primarily among expatriates, the number of whom radically declined after the British were driven out of Aden. However, in 1973 the North Yemen government invited the Missionaries of Charity (headed by Mother Teresa) to come to Hodeida and take charge of a home for the aged. That became the first of a variety of charitable and medical projects supported and managed by various Roman Catholic orders and missionary agencies. At the same time South Yemen nationalized the schools, and all but two Roman Catholic missionaries (except for two priests) were expelled. The Roman Catholic Church retains a minuscule presence in Yemen, but no proselytizing is allowed.

Protestant presence in Yemen goes back to 1885, when Ion Keith-Falconer, a Scottish nobleman, settled in Aden with a vision of spreading Christianity across Arabia. He died two years later, unable to adapt to the climate. The Church of Scotland adopted his mission, but more important, two students at the seminary of the Reformed Church in America at New Brunswick, New Jersey, were inspired to take the deceased missionary's place. James Cantine and Samuel M. Zwemer organized the American Arabian Mission and then left to attend language school in Beirut. Their work was greatly assisted by the adoption of their mission by the Reformed Church, which supplied funds for several hospitals. The primary work in Yemen, however, remained the single original mission in Aden and the hospital subsequently opened by the Church of Scotland.

The Scottish work united with the Danish Mission in 1961, and the church in Aden became known as the Church of South Yemen, almost the only congregation of Yemeni nationals in the country.

Beginning in the 1960s, several other groups, especially the Red Sea Mission Team, attempted to open work; however, in 1965 all missionaries were withdrawn from South Yemen. They returned in 1968 but were then ordered out by the government in 1973. More substantive work began with a clinic opened in 1964 in Taiz, North Yemen, by the Southern Baptist Convention's missionary arm. The facility moved to Jubia in 1968, and a small church has been formed that in 1992 reported 92 members. By 1972, 15 medical missionaries were active in the country. Today there are more than 30 Southern Baptist personnel in Yemen.

Although Protestants were attempting to establish work, the Anglicans had begun worship services led by chaplains with the forces that captured Aden in 1839. An Anglican parish was established in Aden and has continued to the present under the jurisdiction of the far-flung Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East.

In addition, Yemen has a very small Baha'i Faith community and a few practicing Hindus (from India and Pakistan).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Baha'i Faith; Church of Scotland; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Ismaili Islam; Missionaries of Charity; Reformed Church in America; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Southern Baptist Convention; Zwemer, Samuel Marinus.

References

- Ahroni, Reuben. Jewish Emigration from the Yemen 1951–98: Carpet Without Magic. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2001.
- Burman, R., ed. The Jews of Aden. London: London Museum of Jewish Life, 1991.

- Dresch, Paul. A History of Modern Yemen. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.
- Meissner, J. R. "Tribes at the Core: Legitimacy, Structure, and Power in Zaydi Yemen." Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1987.
- Pridham, B. R., ed. Economy, Society and Culture in Contemporary Yemen. London: Croom Helm Centre for Arab Gulf Studies, University of Exeter, 1985.
- Al-Rasheed, Madawi, and Robert Vitalis, eds. Counter-Narratives: History, Contemporary Society, and Politics in Saudi Arabia and Yemen. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.

Yezidis

The Yezidis are a small religious group of approximately 600,000 Kurmanji-speaking people, who are geographically dispersed in several areas of Kurdistan and the Caucasus. They constitute a minority in a two-fold meaning: first, as Kurds they represent an often persecuted ethnic minority within their countries of origin; second, as followers of Yezidism they are a religious minority within the Muslim majority, having often (wrongly) been denounced as "devil-worshippers." The largest Yezidi communities live in Northern Iraq (about 500,000) and the main sanctuary of the Yezidis, the shrine of Sheykh 'Adi, is situated in the Valley of Lalish just north of Mosul.

Yezidis played an influential part in Kurdish tribal confederations under the Ottoman Empire. Successive religious persecutions, however, drove waves of emigrants into the Caucasus, particularly Armenia and Georgia (40,000), but also Azerbaijan and Russia. In Syria live about 5,000 Yezidi, while most of the approximately 10,000 Yezidis of Eastern Turkey have fled during the 1980s, mainly to Germany, where there is a community of at least 35,000 people at present. Maybe 50 families live in the United States and Canada, having come after the First Gulf War in 1992. As they had cooperated with the Americans, they had to fear reprisals after it was decided to keep Saddam Hussein (1937–2006) in office.

Yezidism developed out of the Muslim 'Adawiyya Order of the Sufi Sheykh 'Adi ibn Musafir (ca. 1073–1162), who was born in Lebanon and studied in Baghdad. When he settled at Lalish, in the Hakkari Mountains, he drew many followers from the local Kurdish population as well as from outside Kurdistan. Being childless, Sheykh 'Adi was succeeded after his death by a nephew, whose descendants continued to lead the movement for more than a century. Under Sheykh Hasan b. 'Adi (d. 1254), his great-grandnephew, the Order seems to have deviated from acceptable Islamic norms by regarding Sheykh 'Adi as the sole source of religious authority. As many similarities with the cults of the Ahl-e Haqq and Alevis suggest, Yezidi tradition also incorporated pre-Islamic, presumably Western Iranian or Kurdish beliefs and observances. Its followers subsequently were regarded as non-Muslims and "devil-worshippers." Ever since, persecutions and attacks by their Muslim neighbours have marked Yezidi history.

One of the essential characteristics of Yezidi tradition is its non-literate nature—its holy texts have been orally transmitted over the generations, especially so as literacy was formerly forbidden to Yezidis. The body of religious texts is mainly constituted by the so-called qewls, sacred hymns in Kurmanji, which are chanted by trained bards (qewwal) on religious occasions (for a selection of these in English, see Kreyenbroek 1995; Kreyenbroek/Rashow 2005) and the two sacred books of the Yezidis, the Kitaba Jilwe (Arabic: "Book of Revelation") and the Meshef Resh (Kurdish: "The Black Book") (both translated in Guest 1993). Although these books most probably were not written before the 19th century, they seem to represent a genuine tradition, containing the essential teachings of the founders of the faith as they were once laid down in written texts of the same name.

The oral tradition prevented the development of a doctrinal body, making Yezidi tradition a belief-system in a very loose sense, with many variations in practice between individuals and the scattered communities. To generalize, the Yezidis venerate a God called Khode (a deus otiosus) and seven Holy Beings or Angels (khas), to whom God has entrusted the worldly affairs.

The leader of the Angels is the Peacock Angel (Kurdish: Tawusi Melek, hereafter Melek Tawus), who is responsible for all that happens in the world, whether good or bad, which may have promoted his identification with the Satan of other religions (although Yezidis are forbidden to use this name). The Yezidis believe in reincarnation, whereby the quality of a person's future life depends on his or her behavior in the previous one.

Being a Yezidi is a matter of birth, not belief—one cannot become a Yezidi. Personal convictions may result from membership of the community, but cannot lead to it. Participation in festivals, observance of some prohibitions, and formal obedience to religious authorities are essential elements of religious life, more so than individual verbal prayer. If Yezidis pray, they usually do so facing the Sun in the morning and evening. Wednesday is the holy day of the Yezidis.

Besides the veneration of Melek Tawus, the most conspicuous markers of Yezidi identity are their caste system and their strict rule of endogamy, as well as a number of prohibitions. Yezidi society is separated into two basic endogamous classes or castes, the laymen or commoners, called mirid, and the priestly castes. The community is led by both the mir of sheykh, who is traditionally regarded as the vice-regent of Sheykh 'Adi (and also of Melek Tawus), and the Baba Sheykh ("Father Sheykh"), the leader of the sheykhs and thus the spiritual leader of the faith (although recent developments in Iraq as well as the process of migration have limited their influence to some extent). The clergy is divided further into several castes or titles, among which the sheykh and the pir are the most important. Each Yezidi—including the sheykhs and pirs themselves—must have a sheykh or pir, who acts as a spiritual guide for him or her. The sheykh participates on behalf of his mirid in the performance of religious rites, such as those of birth, circumcision, baptism, marriage, and death. For this, the commoners pay him a certain sum of money each year. Prohibitions regarding purity in both spiritual and physical matters include marriage with non-Yezidis (which results in exclusion from the community) and polluting the "elements" by spitting, cutting or shaving one's facial hair, wearing blue clothes, eating certain types of food (for example, lettuce, fish, pumpkin, broad beans, cabbage), as well as using words connected with the devil.

The last decades have seen the continuing migration of Yezidis to Europe, particularly Germany, where a "diasporization" of the Yezidi community can be observed (Ackermann 2004). Against the background of a widespread fear that the Yezidi identity might disappear in the course of migration, the religious authorities have called for the collection of all relevant oral traditions, to forge a written scripture, and to reform some of the taboos. Free from religious persecution and having become simultaneously more urban and literate, Yezidi intellectuals (among them many mirid) try to reconstruct and represent their religion through the publication of journals, the creation of websites, and the cooperation with academics, according to the conditions of a modern, culturally complex society. At the moment it seems that these attempts will eventually result in the transformation of Yezidi tradition from an orthopraxy to a more orthodox scriptural religion—a Yezidism—where differing local traditions become homogenized into a more binding diasporic identity.

The diaspora will become even more important as the situation of the Yezidis in their traditional heartland, Northern Iraq, seems to become increasingly problematic. Radical Muslims once more label the Yezidis "devil-worshippers" that should be persecuted and even killed. Following a short period of relief after the downfall of Saddam Hussein (r. 1979–2003), a rising number of attacks on the Yezidi community has been reported, culminating in the terrible terrorist bombing attacks of August 14, 2007, which completely destroyed two Yezidi villages in the Sinjar region, killing more than 300 people. Again, Yezidis have become a most vulnerable minority.

Andreas Ackerman and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reincarnation, Sufism.

References

- Ackermann, Andreas. "A Double Minority: Notes on the Emerging Yezidi Diaspora." In Diaspora, Identity and Religion: New Directions in Theory and Research, edited by Waltraud Kokot, Khachig Tölölyan and Carolin Alfonso, 156–160. London and New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Allison, Christine. The Yezidi Oral Tradition in Iraqi Kurdistan. Richmond: Curzon Press, 2001.

Guest, John S. Survival Among the Kurds. A History of the Yezidis. London and New York: Kegan Paul International, 1993.

Kreyenbroek, Philip G. Yezidism—Its Background, Observances and Textual Traditions. Texts and Studies in Religion, 62. Lewiston, Queenston, and Lampeter: Edwin Mellen Press, 1995.

Kreyenbroek, Philip G., and Khalil Jindy Rashow. God and Sheikh Adi Are Perfect. Sacred Poems and Religious Narratives from the Yezidi Tradition. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2005.

Yoga

Yoga, a term from the Sanskrit that means both “yoke” and “union,” refers to a tradition of belief and practice that originated on the Indian subcontinent that has as its core intention the uniting of the individual self with ultimate reality variously understood as the true self, an impersonal absolute, or a personal deity. In common parlance, the word is used to refer to three primary aspects of the larger yoga tradition. First, it designates the philosophical system derived from the teachings of Patanjali, considered the founder of yoga and the author of a book, the Yoga Sutras. The path of yoga is considered one of the six great philosophical traditions of India. Second, yoga refers to a set of disciplined practices followed by those who accept the yoga philosophical system as a means of attaining moksha (or salvation). Traditionally, the philosophical teachings and the practice are combined, each supporting the other. Third, in the modern West (though originating in India), yoga may be used to refer just to the physical exercises known as hatha yoga. In the contemporary West, largely as a result of yoga being introduced into the New Age movement, a number of Western teachers have integrated one or more aspects of yoga into what is otherwise a Western Esoteric system. An adept practitioner of yoga is called a yogi.

History of Yoga No consensus has developed over the origins of yoga. Archaeological evidence of its ancient practice has been traced to figurines showing people in a meditative posture. These figurines, found in the Indus River valley, have been dated to 3000 BCE.

In Hinduism, “sadhu” is a common term for a mystic, an ascetic, a yogi (practitioner of yoga), and/or wandering monks. The sadhu is dedicated to achieving the fourth and final Hindu goal of life, moksha (liberation), through meditation and contemplation of Brahman. (iStockPhoto.com)

Yoga also is present in the later hymns of the Hindu holy texts, the Upanishads (600–500 BCE), the last phase of the Vedic writings (1000–800 BCE), and the religious philosophy derived from them, Vedanta (100 BCE). Yoga is also mentioned in the classic Indian epic, the Mahabharata (ca. 400 BCE–400 CE), especially the most famous segment of the epic, the Bhagavad Gita. Thus, by the time of the writing of the Yoga Sutras, which systematized the teachings, yoga had been widely discussed in Indian culture.

Patanjali is rightly remembered for his work of assembling and ordering the dispersed information on yoga; however, little is known about him. Most scholars assume that the Yoga Sutras were compiled in three stages, suggesting multiple authorship. The original Patanjali may have been a grammarian who lived in the second century BCE. He seems to have authored the first part of the sutras, three books of the sutras as known today. The second part, the final book of sutras, was added at a later date, possibly by a second person who wished his work would stand beside and be identified with the original. The third part is an early commentary written by Vyasa. Most later commentaries rely on Vyasa's authoritative work.

Vyasa is a legendary Hindu figure who is also identified with the writing of a number of Hindu holy texts, including the Mahabharata and many of the Puranas. Authorship of the Mahabharata and the commentary on the Yoga Sutras was certainly by two different individuals. Information on the Vyasa who authored the original Yoga Sutras commentary is lacking.

Patanjali defined the purpose of yoga as knowledge of the true self and outlined the eight steps leading to a direct experience of the true self—yamas, niyamas, asanas, pranayana, pratyahara, dharana, dhyana, and samadhi. The yamas and niyamas are the major moral dos and don'ts. The asanas, originally understood to be meditative postures, have come to be seen as the many postures for conditioning the body practiced as hatha yoga. Once the asanas are mastered, the student moves on to the disciplines of breathing, concentration, and meditation that culminate in an experience of union with the ultimate (samadhi). Over the years, the number of basic yogic disciplines has multiplied, and the relative merits of each are still hotly debated by various yogis. Patanjali's approach has been integrated into a variety of different Hindu groups, as well as non-Hindu schools of thought.

The modern Western appropriation of yoga begins with the discovery of Hinduism by Western scholars in the 19th century. Even as the West was being informed of Hindu ideas, a few Westerners began to practice yoga, albeit in an abbreviated form. In the 19th century, Western translations of essential yoga texts, the Yoga Sutras and the Vashita Yoga, appeared. The appropriation of the Bhagavad Gita into the mysticism of the Transcendentalists of New England in the middle of the century and the subsequent arrival of the first Indian guru (spiritual teacher) in 1882 in the person of Protap Chunder Mozoomdar (1840–1905), serve as markers for the rise of Hinduism in North America.

The first book that circulated in the West that both explained and advocated the practice of a form of yoga was Nature's Finer Forces by Rama Prasad, a treatise on pranayama (yogic breathing) that was published by the Theosophical Society (Adyar) in 1890. It was compiled from articles previously published serially in The Theosophist. The Theosophical Society was becoming the major conduit of Eastern teachings, both Buddhist and Hindu, to the West. Included among its yoga texts, the Society published a commentary on the Yoga Sutras by co-founder William Q. Judge (1851–1896) and a set of lectures on yoga by its then president Annie Besant (1847–1933) in 1908.

The first concerted effort to introduce the West to the broad range of yoga thinking began with Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902), the founder of the Vedanta Society. Vivekananda initially came to America to attend the Parliament of the World's Religions held in Chicago in 1893. After the Parliament, he stayed in the country and toured North America. Yoga proved to be among the more popular subjects upon which he lectured, and he subsequently wrote a series of books on the various branches of yoga—karma, bhakti, jnana, and raja. Missing was a work on hatha yoga, which Vedantists tended to ignore. One of Vivekananda's associates, Swami Abhedananda (1866–1939), would later become head of the New York Vedanta Society and author four books on yoga.

The introduction of yoga in the late 19th century created an audience upon which a variety of Indian teachers would build through the first half of the new century. Among these, Baba Bharati Premanand, a bhakti yogi from Bengal, arrived on the West Coast to introduce devotional yoga directed toward the deity Krishna (later reintroduced by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, aka the Hare Krishna movement). He would establish temples in Los Angeles and New York and though he stayed in America for only a few years, his following remained visible into the 1990s.

Along with the various Indian teachers who came to America, a small number of Americans emerged as yoga teachers, possibly the most notable being William Walker Atkinson (1862–1932). He was an attorney who went through a personal crisis from which he emerged as teacher of New Thought metaphysics. He would author a number of popular books espousing New Thought, though he never identified with any of the various New Thought denominations. Then in 1902, he began to publish books on yoga under the pseudonym of Yogi Ramacharaka, with only a small number of people knowing his true identity. Many Indians accepted him as another Indian teacher. These books were kept in print into the 1970s by the Yogi Publication Company, and have more recently entered into the public domain and remain in print from a variety of reprint publishing houses. Though he authored very popular texts, Atkinson did not found a Hindu center or group.

About the same time that Atkinson settled in Chicago, Pierre Bernard emerged as a most controversial teacher in New York. He is credited with introducing America to Tantrism and the kundalini yoga that is integral to it. Tantra has a much more positive attitude toward the human body and sexuality than do the more traditional and somewhat ascetic teachings associated with yoga. Eventually, Bernard moved his center from New York City to Long Island and would become an important resident of Nyack, New York, where he was best known as the president of one of the local banks. Bernard's nephew, Theos Bernard (1908–1947), would attend Columbia University, where he wrote a master's thesis on hatha yoga, later published as Hatha Yoga: The Report of a Personal Experience (1945)

In England, the introduction of hatha yoga was partially facilitated by Aleister Crowley, who authored Book 4 (1913), a text on Patanjali's eight-step path. He would subsequently introduce hatha yoga to the members of the Ordo Templi Orientis, the ceremonial magic group he later came to head. One of Crowley's students, J. F. C. Fuller, would author Yoga (1925), a textbook on the subject.

During the 1920s, the U.S. government passed additional restrictions against immigration from Asia, including India, and following a 1926 court decision, it even revoked the citizenship of some Indian Americans. Just before the passing of the new immigration law in 1924, however, two important teachers entered the country. Besudeb Bhattacharya and Mukunda Lal Ghose. Both were better known by their respective religious names, Pundit Acharya and Swami Paramahansa Yogananda (1893–1952). Acharya began as a dramatist and published several plays under his given name before assuming the role of yoga teacher in the 1920s. He founded the Temple of Yoga, the Yoga Research Institute, and Prana Press (which published his many books) in New York City and later in Nyack, New York.

Yogananda, who far eclipsed Acharya and the other Hindu teachers in the West during the first half of the century, came to the United States in 1920 to attend a Unitarian-sponsored interfaith conference in Boston. He stayed to establish the Yogoda Sat-sang (later known as the Self-Realization Fellowship) and to teach kriya yoga (a system for awakening the kundalini, the latent power believed to reside at the base of the spine). Most important, Yogananda developed a correspondence course and a ministerial training course, both of which could be accessed through the mail, which served to spread the organization he led far beyond the center he established in Southern California in 1925. Toward the end of his life, Yogananda authored his Autobiography, now a classic statement of Westernized Hinduism. His successors continued to build his movement throughout the Western world.

The last of the significant Hindu teachers to come to America in the first wave of gurus to arrive before the 1924 immigration law was Shri Yogendra (1897–1989). Yogendra had founded the Yoga Institute, the first modern facility dedicated to the revival of yoga (especially hatha yoga) and the study of it scientifically, in Bombay in 1918. In 1919, Yogendra came to the United States, where he would work with physicians at the Life Extension Institute in New York City and the Bloomingdale Hospital at White Plains, New York. He also founded the Yogashrama, the Yoga Institute of America, to facilitate his teaching yoga to Americans. He also authored a booklet, Lost Science of Five Thousand Years, written for a Western scientifically oriented audience. Through the ashram, he came into contact with some of the leading spokespersons of the natural healing movement, including Benedict Lust (1872–1945), Bernarr MacFadden (1868–1955), and John Harvey Kellogg (1852–1943).

Yogendra attracted a popular response that included the rich and famous. He is said to have initiated more than 3,000 people in the practice of yoga and introduced its practice into naturopathy and other drugless forms of healing. He returned to India in 1922 with plans for later visits, but was blocked by America's Asian Exclusion policies.

In 1924, the small institute he had formed earlier was superseded by the Yoga Institute of India, which with the backing of J. G. Gune (1883–1966) would become the major point of dissemination for an understanding of yoga as a scientific discipline. A number of Westerners would find their way to the Institute. Gune would take the name Swami Kuvalayananda and later train Vijayendra Pratap, who later moved to Philadelphia and found the Swami Kuvalayananda Yoga (SKY) Foundation.

The growth of Eastern religion in general and the practice of yoga in particular were stymied by the Asian Exclusion Act, which became law in the United States in 1924. Those Indian teachers who were outside the country at the time of its passing could not return and American seekers had access to those few gurus who had earlier decided to settle in America (such as Yogananda and Acharya). Yoga would be spread during this period by the few Hindu organizations, the Theosophical Society (among whose members Ernest Wood [1863–1965] was a popularizer of yoga), and Americans who took it upon themselves to get trained as yoga teachers.

In spite of the ban on teachers from India, a number of books on yoga would appear between the two World Wars. Prominent among these books were L. Adam's Beck's A Beginner's Book of Yoga (1927), F. Yeats-Brown's The Eight Steps to Yoga (1933), Claude Bragdon's An Introduction to Yoga (1933), and Kovoov Behanan's Yoga: A Scientific Evaluation (1937). These volumes prepared the way for the watershed books of Theos Bernard (1908–1947).

Bernard was raised in a Hindu environment and as a youth traveled to India, where he studied at Yogendra's yoga institute. He then attended Columbia University, in New York, where he wrote his master's thesis on yoga. It proved a popular introductory text complete with pictures of the basic postures (asanas) for hatha yoga and instructions on a method to awaken the kundalini energy. He followed with two additional books, Hindu Philosophy (1947) and Land of a Thou- sand Buddhas (1950). The last book was published posthumously. Bernard was killed in Tibet during the Chinese invasion of Tibet.

Europe became open to yoga practice especially in the years after World War II. Beginning in the mid-1940s, Hindu and yoga centers would be opened in England, Sweden, Holland, and Switzerland. British teachers Wilfred A. Clark, publisher of the Wheel of British Yoga, and Sir Paul Dukes became nationally known as advocates of yoga. Indian gurus began to make their way to the West, their travel facilitated by laws governing movement through the British Commonwealth. Meanwhile, Chinese-born Westerner Michael Volin launched the practice of yoga in Australia. He studied yoga in the 1930s in the Chinese center opened by Indra Devi (1899–2002), who had studied in Bombay while acting in Indian films.

Devi moved to the United States at the beginning of the 1950s and opened a yoga center in Los Angeles. She also introduced yoga to the emerging health spa movement through the center founded by Edmond Bordeaux Skekely (1905–1979) in Tecate, Mexico. She authored two early yoga texts, Forever Young, Forever Healthy (1953) and Yoga for Americans (1950).

An almost faddish interest in yoga emerged in the 1950s. These books generally followed Yogendra's lead in arguing for the scientific (as opposed to religious) nature of yoga, emphasizing the health values in the practice of hatha yoga, and identifying the practice with famous people and their success. Following Indian independence, Indian teachers found additional opportunities to travel the world and disseminate their teachings throughout the West. Among the new Indian teachers who found himself able to immigrate to the United States and settle there was Yogi Gupta, a disciple of Swami Sivananda Saraswati (1887–1963), one of the most prominent of the 20th-century yoga teachers and founder of the Divine Life Society. From his center in New York, Yogi Gupta published two popular texts, Yoga and Long Life (1958) and Yoga and Yogic Powers (1960).

Among the early Indian teachers in Canada was Swami Vishnu Devananda (1927–1993), also like Yogi Gupta a disciple of Swami Sivananda. Previous to his move to Canada, he was a senior instructor at Sivananda's Yoga Vedanta Forest Academy in Rishikesh.

After settling in Canada in 1959, he published the Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga, which subsequently became one of the most popular yoga texts in the English-speaking world. From his headquarters in Quebec, he founded centers across North America.

Possibly the most popular teacher of hatha yoga in North America in the last half of the 20th century was Richard Hittleman (1927–1991), who had initially discovered yoga in the 1930s. He sought out several yoga instructors and gradually developed his own variation of hatha yoga that he termed the “Yoga for Health” system. In 1957 he opened a center in Florida but soon moved to California where he developed the Yoga for Health television show that first appeared in 1961. Over the next two decades he wrote more than 15 books and issued several long-playing records on yoga. He introduced hundreds of thousands of people to the practice of yoga.

Hittleman exemplified the late-20th-century Western separation of hatha yoga from the larger yoga system advocated by Patanjali. Hittleman offered hatha yoga as a discipline that someone of any religion (or no religion) could adopt. At the same time, hatha yoga served as an introduction to Hindu philosophy and the broader teachings of the yoga tradition. Most of Hittleman’s books concentrated upon hatha yoga as an exercise technique, but he also ventured into the religious aspects of yoga in books such as Yoga Philosophy and Meditation (1964), the Guide to Yoga Meditation (1969), and Yoga: The 8 Steps to Health and Peace (1975). It would appear that the spread of yoga in the 1950s and 1960s was one reason that Hinduism spread so quickly in the 1970s and 1980s.

The change of the immigration law in 1965, which placed immigration from the countries of southern and southeast Asia on the same quotas as Western Europe, would lead to tens of thousands of Indians migrating to the United States annually. The change was heralded by the arrival of a few new Indian teachers, some of whom, like Rammurti Mishra (1923–1993), came in because of their special skills, in this case as a professor at the New York University Post-Graduate Medical College. While teaching, he used his leisure time to speak on Hinduism and yoga and in 1958 he founded the Yoga Society of New York, which soon developed centers in Manhattan and Monroe, New York (near Syracuse). In 1959 he published his yoga text, Fundamentals of Yoga.

Once the immigration law changed, a growing number of Indian teachers came to the United States, among the first being Swami Satchidananda (1914–2002), another student of Sivananda. He taught Sivananda’s system under the label “integral yoga” but quickly specialized in hatha yoga. His text, Integral Hatha Yoga, rivaled that of Swami Vishnu Divananda.

Arriving for a visit the same year as Satchidananda, B. K. S. Iyengar (b. 1918) had studied yoga with Swami Krishnamacharya (1888–1989), the same guru who taught Indra Devi. He had developed his own system for teaching yoga and it proved equally popular to that offered by the students of Sivananda. His book Light on Yoga (1966) emerged as the single most popular textbook for the training of yoga teachers, even though Iyengar remained headquartered in India and only visited North America sporadically.

Yoga expanded rapidly through the 1970s. By the beginning of the decade major yoga centers had been created by Swami Yogananda, Ramurti Mishra, Iyengar, and the students of Sivananda. During the decade, the many emerging yoga teachers would organize the first professional associations, of which the California Yoga Teachers Association proved the most important. It published the Yoga Journal, the first newsstand magazine on yoga. Iyengar’s students organized the Institute for Yoga Teacher Education, while Vishnu Devananda and Satchidananda offered teacher certification through their centers in Montreal and Virginia, respectively. New teachers emerging through the decade included Swami Rama (1925–1996) of the International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy; Yogi Amrit Desai, founder of the Kripalu Yoga Ashram; and Swami Kriyananda, who had left the Self-Realization Fellowship to found the Ananda Church of Self Realization.

The Yogi Tradition In India, yoga is seen as one of the six classical schools of philosophy. It encompasses a worldview and in practice involves a system by which the soul, the true essence of the individual, can reach samadhi, which is variously described as pure concentration, a consciousness of pure detachment from the world in which the soul abides in its own essence alone.

Ultimately, samadhi is the supreme indescribable mystic experience. As various forms of yoga practice have been disseminated, yoga has been incorporated in a number of variant philosophical systems, and many have attempted to describe the experience or event of samadhi.

B. K. S. Iyengar describes yoga as the union of the soul with God and the experience of samadhi as a state in which the body and senses are at rest while the faculties of the mind and reason are alert, but beyond mere consciousness. S. K. Majumdar notes that in samadhi, the yogi discovers his or her true identity as transcendent spirit and perceives the basic unity of existence. Thus, yoga might be described as a process to reach samadhi and the ultimate truth it offers.

The yoga sutras of Patanjali describe an eight-step sadhana (or path) to reach samadhi. This path is often called ashanga yoga, or the yoga of eight arms. The first two steps, yama (ethical disciplines) and niyama (rule of conduct), set the lifestyle of the yogi. The five commandments of yama include allegiance to ahimsa (nonviolence), satya (truth), astaya (non-stealing), brahmacharya (continence), and aparigraha (non-coveting). From ahimsa comes a respect for life that finds expression in a respect for animals and vegetarianism. From the virtue of the brahmacharya comes the preference for, if not insistence on, in the celibate life. Niyama includes the virtues of saucha (purity), santosa (contentment), tapas (austerity), svadhyaya (study of the self), and Isvara pranidhana (dedication to the Lord).

The third step in yoga is asana, or posture. The asanas are the exercises which have, in the West, been isolated from the yoga sadhana and turned into a system of physical exercise as hatha yoga. The asanas were originally developed over the centuries and passed from teacher to student. In the 20th century the asanas became the subject of numerous books and scientific speculation, and several yoga teachers have developed their own variations based upon what they deem the essential aspect of the performance of the yoga postures. Thus, various schools of yoga, such as those headed by Iyengar, Mishna, Baba Hari Das, and Hittleman, have distinguished themselves from the others. Among the most unique new yoga systems is that of Bikram Choudhury which is generally practiced in a room heated to 105° F with a humidity of 40 percent.

Pranayana, the fourth step of yoga, has, like asanas, frequently been isolated from the sadhana and taught as a physical psychological discipline. It is often taught in connection with hatha yoga, though by no means always. Pranayana is breath control. The student is taught the basics of inhalation, exhalation, and the retention of breath. Prana (breath) is the individual's portion of Pramatma (universal; spirit), which is conceived of as a subtle vital energy. Proper breathing enlivens the body as it enhances the flow of prana (as subtle vibrant energies) through the body. Pranayana and its accompanying understanding of vital energies flowing through the body have become the basis for a number of forms of psychic healing that are based on the transference of prana from one person to another.

The practice of pranayana leads directly to pratyahara, or sense control, the fifth step on the path. In yoga, the mind is pictured as a chariot hitched to two powerful horses prana and vasana. Vasana is a collective term for the bodily desires from hunger to sex. If prana is in control, all is well. If vasana is in control, the yogi is scattered and blocked in the past, which requires him or her to follow a single-minded course. Hence, along with pranayana, the yogi needs to work on sense control. This work might include, on the positive side, a healthy dose of bhakti, devotional service in a temple, to remind the yogi of the attractiveness of the divine. It will also include a soul-searching examination of the dominant sensual desires and a philosophical assessment of their limited value and ultimate uselessness. The yogi will attempt to detach himself or herself from the sensual desires.

After conditioning the body, taking control of the breath, and suppressing the desires, the yogi is ready for the next steps: Dharana (concentration), and dhyana (meditation). In dharana the yogi learns to fix the mind on a single object and to concentrate on it to the exclusion of all other thoughts. The ability to concentrate leads directly to dhyana, in which the flow of concentration is uninterrupted. Dhyana then leads to samadhi.

In addition to the practice of the eight-limbed path, the yogi also has access to a variety of yoga disciplines, which may enhance or substitute for the eight traditional steps. Some yoga practices may be used with or in addition to the eight-limbed approach, such as japa yoga, the use of mantras (or words of power) or bhakti (devotional service to the divine). Other practices, such as surat shabd yoga, the yoga of the sound current, are generally practices apart from the traditional eight-limbed approach.

Of special interest is kundalini yoga. The literature on the eight-limbed yoga mentions kundalini, the latent power believed by students of Tantrism to lie as a latent force at the base of the spine. The practice of kundalini yoga is supposed to arouse the kundalini energy (often pictured as a coiled cobra) and free it to rise up the spinal column and bring enlightenment as it reaches the crown of the head. Kundalini yoga teaches methods that focus on the arousal of the kundalini, methods that usually include an intense form of pranayana. Some gurus offer what is termed shaktipat (shakti being another name for kundalini) by which they use their own power to awaken the kundalini in others.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Besant, Annie; Crowley, Aleister; Divine Life Society; Hinduism; Integral Yoga International; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Meditation; New Age Movement; Ordo Templi Orientis; Self-Realization Fellowship; Sivananda Saraswati, Swami; Tantrism; Theosophical Society (Adyar); Vegetarianism; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Alter, Joseph S. Yoga in Modern India: The Body between Science and Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Behanan, Koor T. Yoga: A Scientific Evaluation. 1937; rpt.: New York: Dover Publications, 1960.
- Bernard, Theos. Hatha Yoga: The Report of a Personal Experience. New York: Columbia University Press, 1945.
- Choudhury, Bikram. Bikram's Beginning Yoga Class. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 2000.
- Day, Harvey. Yoga Illustrated Dictionary. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1971.
- DeMichelis, Elizabeth. A History of Modern Yoga—Patanjali and Western Esotericism. New York: Continuum, 2005.
- Devy, Indra. Forever Young, Forever Healthy. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1953.
- Feuerstein, Georg. The Yoga Tradition: Its History, Literature, Philosophy and Practice. Prescott, AZ: Hohm Press, 1998.
- Hittleman, Richard. Guide to Yoga Meditation. New York: Bantam Books, 1969.
- Iyengar, B. K. S. Light on Yoga. New York: Schocken Books, 1966.
- Mishna, Rammurti. Fundamentals of Yoga. New York: Lancer Books, 1969.
- Samuel, Geoffrey. The Origins of Yoga and Tantra. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008.
- Satchidananda, Swami. Integral Yoga Hatha. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1970.
- Vishnu Devananda, Swami. The Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga. New York: Pocket Books, 1960.

Yogi Tradition

The Yogi tradition is among Hinduism's oldest living traditions. The tradition has no separate modern-day form, as it permeates all of Hinduism. Essentially, as individuals desire to know the Ultimate, or Brahman, they are inspired to seek out Brahman. Yoga is the name given to a spectrum of ways to search for and come to know God.

The "Father of Yoga" was Patanjali (ca. second century BCE), the author of multiple discourses—that is, the Yoga Sutras that contain the knowledge about knowing God through yoga. Patanjali is considered the first yogi, in the strictest sense, though yoga itself derives from the Harappan civilization (2300 BCE). Among the Harappan archaeological sites in Mohenjo Dharo, an ancient statue of a man in a yoga posture was uncovered.

A yogi (or yogini, for a female) lives a life of asceticism. Many Hindus turn to the life of a yogi in the end stages of life in order to gain release from the cycle of reincarnation after their death. A yogi may undergo rigorous training in some form of yoga in order to achieve the deep level of concentration necessary for true yoga. The number of bodily postures (asanas) for hatha yoga is in the thousands, with some masters claiming to know them all. Asanas go from simple leg raises to seemingly impossible contortions.

A yogi may have one or more pupils that he or she will instruct in the ways of yoga, or he or she may be completely alone. This habit of teaching is central to Hinduism. There is no modern organization for the yogi tradition because it is a tradition that is incorporated into all forms of Hinduism.

The yogi will meditate until the ultimate goal is achieved. When the yogi sees all beings—friends, enemies, animals, plants, and everything else—as one, the yogi has broken the chain of illusion (maya). No more are there illusory distinctions and classes. No longer does logic or common sense seem real to the yogi. When the yogi sees all things as one, the yogi is ready to die, and after death to actually become one with Brahman, the Ultimate Reality.

Hatha yoga, the proto-yoga exercises (postures) that serve as a precursor to the practice of the other forms of yoga (karma, raja, bhakti, and jnana), had largely disappeared from India by the beginning of the 19th century. It was revived in that century by Yogi Madhavdas (ca. 1798–1921), who operated out of an ashram in Gizrat in western India, and Shyam Sundar Goswami of Calcutta. Madhavdas's student, Shri Yogendra (1897–1989), who built a center in Myambai (Bombay), was a major force in spreading hatha yoga to the West in the early 20th century.

Kumar Jairamdas

See also: Asceticism; Patanjali; Yoga.

References

- Aranya, Hariharananda. Yoga Philosophy of Patanjali. Trans. by P. N. Mukerji. Calcutta: University of Calcutta, 1977.
- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Desikachar, T. K. V. Religiousness in Yoga. New York: University Press of America, 1980.
- Jarrell, Howard R. International Yoga Bibliography, 1950–1980. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1981.
- Stone, Michael, and Richard Freeman. The Inner Tradition of Yoga: A Guide to Yoga Philosophy for the Contemporary Practitioner. Boston: Shambhala, 2008.

Yoido Full Gospel Church

The Yoido Full Gospel Church (Assemblies of God) was founded by Paul David Yonggi Cho in 1958 in an old U.S. Army tent located in a slum area of Seoul, Korea. Forty years later it was acclaimed the largest Christian congregation in the world, with some 730,000 members. The story of Cho and the Yoido church is to a great degree the story of Christianity in Korea since World War II.

Cho was born in 1936 in the District of Uljin near the southern port city of Pusan. He was raised in a Buddhist home in a nation under Japanese occupation. By the time he was 16, Cho was dying of tuberculosis when a young Christian girl told him of Jesus Christ and his healing power. After a miraculous healing in 1955, Cho became a Christian and joined the newly formed Assemblies of God.

The Korean Pentecostal movement began in 1928, when the first Pentecostal missionary from the United States, Mary Rumsey, arrived in Korea. After ordaining her first pastor, Sung San Park, in 1938, she organized the Chosun Pentecostal Church and Mission Center. She later organized five more churches before being expelled from Korea by the Japanese. After the devastation caused by the Korean War, Rumsey turned her churches over to the American Assemblies of God in 1952. The mission soon organized a Bible school in Seoul, where one of the first students was Yonggi Cho.

With the help of U.S. Army chaplains, Cho learned English and became an interpreter for visiting American evangelists. One of his heroes was the healing evangelist Oral Roberts. Cho patterned much of his ministry on Roberts's teachings and evangelistic methods.

In 1962, Cho built a new sanctuary that seated 1,500 persons, but this soon overflowed with crowds seeking salvation and healing. By 1964 the church claimed 2,000 members. Exhausted by his labors, Cho began to organize his church into "cells" that met in homes. These cells provided pastoral care for the exploding congregation. By 1985 there were more than 50,000 such cells, mostly led by women.

Stories of miraculous healings spread over the city, attracting ever-larger crowds. By 1973, with 23,000 members, Cho began construction of a huge new church on Yoido Island, near the site of the new South Korean parliament building. In 1973 the 10,000-seat sanctuary was completed in time to host the Pentecostal World Conference. The growth of the church skyrocketed. By 1979 membership passed the 100,000 mark. In the following years there were periods in which 10,000 new members were added to the church each month. By 1994 the membership had reached the 700,000 mark and the church made plans to be the first congregation to reach the 1,000,000 mark. The membership peaked about 1995, however, with 730,000 members. Slower growth resulted from the organization of new daughter congregations from the Yoido membership.

By 1990, Cho had led in a rebuilding program that saw his sanctuary enlarged to seat 22,000 persons. By this time he led seven Sunday services with more than 30,000 in attendance in each service through the use of additional auditoriums and closed-circuit television. It was claimed that Cho spoke face to face each week to more people than any other person on Earth.

Beyond his local church, Cho became well known as the author of several books on cell groups and church growth. These included his autobiographical Fourth Dimension (1979) and Successful Home Cell Groups (1981). In 1989 he founded a daily newspaper called the Kook Min Daily News, which quickly reached a million subscribers. In this newspaper as well as in his books and sermons, Cho expounded his “Fivefold Message of the Gospel,” which included Salvation, the Holy Spirit, Divine Healing, Blessings, and the Second Coming of Jesus. By the end of the century, Cho was probably the best-known Korean Christian leader in the world. His congregation was widely recognized as the largest Christian local church in history.

Yoido Full Gospel Church
PO Box 7
Seoul 150-600
Korea
<http://www.yfgc.org/>

Vinson Synan

See also: Assemblies of God; Pentecostal World Fellowship.

References

- Cho, Paul (David) Yonggi. The Holy Spirit, My Senior Partner: Understanding the Holy Spirit and His Gifts. Mary's Lake, FL: Charisma House, 1996.
- Cho, Paul (David) Yonggi. Prayer: Key to Revival. Waco, TX: Word, 1984.
- Vinson, Synan. “The International Ministry of Dr. David Yonggi Cho.” In The Holy Spirit and the Church: A Collection of Scholarly Papers in Celebration of the 40th Anniversary of Dr. Yonggi Cho's Ministry. Seoul: Privately printed, 1998.
- Wilson, D. J. “Paul Yonggi Cho.” In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley Burgess, Garry McGee, and Patrick Alexander, 161–162. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1988.

Yom HaShoah

Yom HaShoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) is a Jewish commemoration day dedicated to the remembrance of the Holocaust, the destruction of some 6 million Jews that began with the rise to power of the National Socialist Party (the Nazis) in Germany in the 1930s and reached its zenith in the last years of World War II with the development of the gas chambers in the several death camps, most notably Auschwitz in Poland. Shoah is a Hebrew word meaning “catastrophe” or “utter destruction.”

Yom HaShoah is held on the 27th of Nissan (which occurs in late April or early May on the Common Era calendar) and is an official holiday in Israel. In 2005, the United Nations designated January 27 as the international Holocaust Memorial Day, and that date is acknowledged in most of the countries of the European Union. Neither day is recognized in the United States, but the Jewish community and many in the Christian community hold a commemoration on or near Nissan 27.

As a relatively new day of commemoration, not only has no date been agreed upon by all, but there is no set ritual. Many will light candles, often 6 candles symbolic of the 6 million who died, though much more emphasis is placed upon holding some form of commemoration rather than the form that the observance will take. In Israel, a siren will sound, at which point everyone stops any activity in which they are engaged. Integral to the day is the retelling the stories of what people experienced. The United Kingdom first celebrated a Holocaust Remembrance Day in 2001, the year following the opening of a permanent Holocaust Exhibition at the Imperial War Museum.

Holocaust survivors light candles during the Annual Gathering of Remembrance, April 23, 2006, in New York. The annual event is held on the Sunday closest to Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1994, following the release of Schindler's List (1993), director Steven Spielberg formed the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation (now the USC Shoah Foundation Institute for Visual History and Education) to record and preserve video testimonies of survivors of the Holocaust. The Foundation concentrated on documenting the stories of Jewish survivors, but also interviews other victims including homosexuals, Jehovah's Witnesses, Gypsies, and a variety of others who had knowledge of the events. By the end of the 1990s, the archive (since 2006 housed at the University of Southern California) included some 52,000 video testimonies offered by people from 56 different countries.

The Holocaust began with a campaign of anti-Semitism by the Nazis and accompanying acts of violence and destruction. Once Adolf Hitler came to power, plans were put in place to eradicate various segments of the population including homosexuals and Gypsies, but most notably the Jews. In the end, the Nazis adopted a policy, termed the "Final Solution," that looked toward the complete annihilation of the Jews from all of Europe. Systematically, Jews were confined to over-crowded ghettos, then sent to concentration camps, and as additional countries were overrun, sent to death camps. By the time the Nazi regime was brought down, two-thirds of Europe's Jews had been killed.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Common Era Calendar; Jehovah's Witnesses; Judaism.

References

- Berman, Judith E. Holocaust Remembrance in Australian Jewish Communities. Perth: University of Western Australia Press, 2002.
- Cargas, Harry James. A Holocaust Commemoration for Days of Remembrance: For Communities, Churches, Centers and for Home Use. Philadelphia: Holocaust Remembrance Foundation, 1982.
- Hornstein, Shelley, and Florence Jacobowitz. Image and Remembrance: Representation and the Holocaust. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.
- Miller, Marjorie. "Britain Devotes a Day to Holocaust Victims." Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2001.
- Smith, Lyn. Remembering: Voices of the Holocaust: A New History in the Words of the Men and Women Who Survived. New York: Basic Books, 2007.

Yom Kippur

Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), possibly the single most observed holy day in the Jewish year, is one of two Jewish holidays not related to a specific historical event in Jewish memory (as are, for example, Passover or Purim). Like Rosh Hashanah, it is related primarily to the commandment of God for an annual act of atonement. It occurs on the 10th day of the month of Tishri in the Jewish calendar and follows more than a month of preparation that began on the first day of Elul, the previous month. During the month of Elul, one begins to think about the issues of self-reflection, repentance, and atonement for one's failings, and begins to bring one's consciousness and behavior into a repentant mode. This preparation leads to Rosh Hashanah, the Day of the Shofar Blast or the Jewish

A Jewish man observing kaparot, an ancient and mystical custom connected to the Jewish Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur. (Yehuda Bernstein/Dreamstime.com)

New Year, which kicks off the High Holy Days. The High Holy Days are seen as a time of concentrated self-reflection and repentance, and for special acts of charity and forgiveness. Following Rosh Hashanah, the Days of Awe lead to the Day of Atonement in which God seals his judgment for the coming year.

The observance of Yom Kippur is mandated in Leviticus 23:26-32: "And the LORD spoke unto Moses, saying: Howbeit on the tenth day of this seventh month is the day of atonement; there shall be a holy convocation unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls; and ye shall bring an offering made by fire unto the LORD. And ye shall do no manner of work in that same day; for it is a day of atonement, to make atonement for you before the LORD your God. For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from his people. And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any manner of work in that same day, that soul will I destroy from among his people. Ye shall do no manner of work; it is a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings. It shall be unto you a sabbath of solemn rest, and ye shall afflict your souls; in the ninth day of the month at even, from even unto even, shall ye keep your sabbath.”

On Rosh Hashanah, believers think of God writing a judgment upon them relative to their behavior and motivations over the previous year. The succeeding Days of Awe are a time to reflect upon the past year, seek forgiveness, and make amends. The Day of Atonement represents one last chance to change the judgment of God in one’s favor before the day ends, and God seals his judgment for the coming year. That judgment heralds one’s prosperity, happiness, and even life or death for the coming year.

Yom Kippur is observed as a Sabbath. One refrains from all work. It is also a day of fasting with no food or drink beginning shortly before sunset and continuing for the next 25 hours. Additional restrictions punctuating the uniqueness of the day include refraining from washing and bathing, not using cosmetics products such as deodorants, wearing shoes made of something other than leather (like canvas sneakers), and of course, refraining from sexual relations. Many people will dress in white.

Most of Yom Kippur is spent in communal prayer in the synagogue, there being five services; the first one at sundown on the eve of Yom Kippur begins the start of the fast; the last ends at nightfall the next day, and concludes the fast with the shofar (ram’s horn) sounded in a final long blast. Part of the Yom Kippur liturgy is a lengthy and broadly worded confession of the sins of the community, with an emphasis on sins that were detrimental to one’s neighbor, including acts of both omission and commission.

Yom Kippur is a public holiday in Israel. Radio and television stations cease broadcasting; airports and other public transportation shut down; and all businesses, including restaurants, close. In Israel, even many who consider themselves irreligious Jews fast and avoid using prohibited transportation and communication systems. Soldiers seek leave to be with their families for the day.

In 1973, well aware of Israel’s vulnerability on this, the most sacred day in the Jewish calendar, Egypt and Syria attacked Israel. As radios, which had been silent, began calling up the reserves and soldiers left their prayers to return to their units, Israel retreated before the advancing Egyptian and Syrian armies. However, within a few days, Israel recovered and fought the war to a point that victory seemed imminent before a cease-fire went into effect.

By 2008, 63 percent of the Israeli public said they planned to fast on Yom Kippur, the great majority for religious reasons. Those who did not intend to fast (a third of the Israeli public) did not plan to observe openly the traditional observance of the holy day.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Days of Awe; Judaism; Rosh Hashannah.

References

- Cohen, Jeffrey M. 1,001 Questions and Answers on Rosh HaShanah and Yom Kippur. New York: Jason Aronson, 1997.
- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher; Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.
- “63% of Israeli Jews plan to fast on Yom Kippur.” Ynet News. <http://www.ynetnews.com/articles/0,7340,L-3606942,00.html>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Yoruban Religion/Spirituality

The Yoruban people of Nigeria emerged out of prehistory with the founding of Ife, a city in southwestern Nigeria, which has been their center for a millennium. Yoruban towns are traditionally headed by a chief (oba) who is invested with authority by the chief in Ife. Although they are an agricultural people, everyday life is

A family gives an offering to Yemanjá, the Yoruban sea goddess, during a religious celebration in Montevideo, February 2, 2007. West African slaves brought their Yoruban beliefs to the Americas, where they have spread throughout many countries. (AP/Wide World Photos) centered in the villages that are placed in the center of the local farmland.

The Yorubans divide the cosmos into Orun, the sky, and Aiye, the Earth. In the sky dwells Olorun, the High God, a number of associated deities (the Orissa), and the ancestors. Olorun is seen as somewhat remote and difficult to approach; hence he is not the object of shrines, rituals, or prayers. He is seen as the source of all and the creator of the first 16 human beings. However, it is Orisa-nla who is credited with creating the Earth and transferring the first humans to their new home. It is also believed that Orisa-nla began his acts of creation at Ife. Hence Ife is the center of all religious and spiritual power. Other locations have power as derived from Ife. (An alternate story suggests that Orisa-nla messed up his work and that Odunuwa had to redo it.)

Orisa-nla and Odunuwa are but two of the Orissa. Others include Ogun, the god of metals, and Esu, generally associated with divination. Also important to the Yoruban system are the ancestors. Outstanding ancestors are seen as residing in the abode of the Orissa and are venerated with their own shrines and rituals. Some ancestors are recognized for their role in Yoruban history and are recognized above their association with a single family. Some have attained status for the nation as divine beings, including Sango, Orisa-oko, and Ayelala, virtually identical to the Orissa. Both the Orissa and the ancestors are sources of power.

The role of the various religious functionaries in Yoruban society is to mediate between the people and the Orissa and ancestors. Each of the deities has priests. Some priests (aworo) are diviners (babalawo) who are consulted on the questions of life. Other priests attend the shrines of various deities. Yorubans believe that deities possess various people, called the elegun, who operate as a medium through whom the deities communicate. There are also healers, the oloogun, and the masked dancers (egungun), whose traditional masks are seen as possessors of power.

There are between 5 and 10 million Yorubans, most of whom reside in western Nigeria. There is a great variety in the practice associated with the widespread Yoruban system, not only in Nigeria and neighboring countries but also in its New World incarnations in Cuba and Brazil (where it developed an overlay of Christianity and is known variously as Santeria or Macumba). Both Christianity and Islam have come into Yoruban lands, resulting in a situation in which syncretistic religions have emerged. Among the primary groups to arise in reaction to Christianity are the various Aladura churches, which exist along a spectrum between orthodox Protestant Christianity and traditional Yoruban religion. The Church of the Lord, Aladura is a member of the World Council of Churches. Others, such as the Aladura and Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim, have incorporated elements of possession practices from the traditional practice.

Yoruban religious leaders in the West have made themselves available to interpret the faith of their coreligionists in Africa. Prominent organizations include the Ife Foundation of North (<http://www.ifafoundation.org/>), the Iglesia Lukumi Babalu Aye (<http://home.earthlink.net/~clba/index.htm>), and the African Theological Archministry centers on the Oyotunji African Yoruban Village at Shelton, South Carolina.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Aladura Churches; Ancestors; Church of the Lord; Santeria; World Council of Churches.

References

- Curry, Mary Cuthrell. Making the Gods in New York: The Yoruba Religion in the African American Community. New York: Garland, 1997.
- Edwards, Gary, and John Mason. Black God—Orisa Studies in the New World. Brooklyn, NY: Yoruba Theological Archministry, 1985.

Ìdòwú, E. Bólájí. Olódùmaré: God in Yorùbá Belief. New York: Wazobia, 1994.

Lawson, E. Thomas. Religions of Africa. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1985.

Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia

The Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia (YBAM) was established on July 29, 1970, in Kuala Lumpur. The YBAM is a nonprofit religious organization that espouses a nonsectarian approach toward all Buddhist traditions.

The objectives of the YBAM are the following: (1) to be the national organization of all Buddhist youths in Malaysia; (2) to encourage, foster, and develop the practice of the teachings of the Buddha among youths; (3) to coordinate the religious, social, and recreational activities of Buddhist youths through its member organizations; (4) to provide leadership training for Buddhist youths; and (5) to further all other interests of Buddhist youths as may be decided upon at a National Council meeting. The YBAM carries out its activities through the following committees: (1) Dharma Propagation, (2) Education, (3) Publication, (4) Welfare, (5) Culture, (6) Training, (7) Buddhist Graduates and Buddhist Undergraduates, (8) Government Affairs and External Relations, (9) International Affairs, and (10) Finance.

Its core activities are based on Dharma propagation, education, culture, and welfare. The YBAM organizes Dharma propagation activities by inviting Buddhist scholars, both locally and overseas, to give teachings on Buddhism through public lectures, seminars, study camps, and conferences. In 1996 the Dharma Propagators Training Program was launched to train Dharma speakers. It also publishes an English journal, Eastern Horizon, three times a year, and a quarterly Chinese journal, Buddhist Digest, in addition to other Buddhist literature. In the area of education, it has produced a Buddhist syllabus for the primary schools and is preparing the syllabus for the secondary schools.

Inasmuch as Malaysia is a plural society, YBAM ensures that cultural programs representing Buddhist values are incorporated into the local Buddhist community. In 1994 it launched the organ donation campaign to educate the public on the importance of donating organs after death. In 1980 the YBAM launched its first Six-Year Plan (1980–1986) to ensure that programs are well strategized and in line with its national objectives. A formal planning process also allows it to monitor the success of its implemented programs. During the latest Six-Year Plan (1998–2003), a Quality Management System was launched to ensure that programs achieve quality standards.

Membership in the YBAM comprises ordinary membership and associate membership. Ordinary members are Buddhist organizations with youth members, while associate members are individuals. As of January 1, 2001, there were a total of 250 ordinary members and more than 2,000 individual members. In 2009, it reported 270 member organisations engaged in propagating the Dharma and training youth.

YBAM is a member of the Malaysian Youth Council, and it is affiliated to the World Fellowship of Buddhist Youth (WFBY). It hosted the WFBY's 13th General Conference in 2002 in Kuala Lumpur. The YBAM operates a full-time secretariat based at its headquarters.

Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia
10 Jalan SS 2/75
47300 Petaling Jaya
Selangor
Malaysia
<http://www.ybam.org.my/>

Benny Liow Woon Khin

See also: World Fellowship of Buddhists.

References

- YBAM 10th Anniversary Souvenir Magazine*. Penang, 1980.
- YBAM 15th Anniversary Souvenir Magazine*. Penang, 1987.
- “YBAM 15th National Council Biennial Report.”
Petaling Jaya, 2000.
- YBAM National Council Handbook*. Petaling Jaya, 2000.

Young Israel

The movement Young Israel grew out of an effort to reach out to the Orthodox youth, who were alienated from the Yiddish-speaking Orthodox worship that dominated within the immigrant communities of the Lower East Side of Manhattan. The founders of Young Israel, among them Jewish Theological Seminary Professors Mordecai Kaplan (who later founded the Reconstructionist movement) and Israel Friedlander, sought to bridge the Old World and New by creating an Americanized Orthodox synagogue for the immigrants' English-speaking children.

The first Young Israel congregation was established in 1915. Its sermons were in English; there was no charge for synagogue honors; and it included components of a community center to reach out to its intended audience.

Over time new Young Israel congregations emerged—today the movement claims 25,000 families as members. As these synagogues developed, they discovered that their approach differed in degree from that of other Orthodox groups. For example Young Israel set minimum standards for the partition separating men and women in worship, while other Orthodox bodies did not. Hence it remained a separate organization. Over the next decades, as the youth with whom the movement began grew to adulthood, Young Israel emerged as a powerful representative of Orthodoxy.

The movement incorporated in 1926. During the 1930s it spread across the United States and into Canada. By the beginning of World War II, there were 35 affiliated synagogues. After the establishment of the State of Israel, the American Friends of Young Israel was founded to establish centers in the new country. Today (2009) there are some 150 affiliated synagogues in the United States and 50 in Israel.

Young Israel, at its beginning, represented the liberal end of the spectrum of Orthodox Judaism. Yet, it steadily became more traditionalist through the 20th century, advocating punctilious Sabbath observance.

National Council of Young Israel
111 John Street, Ste. 450
New York, NY 10038

Young Israel
 PO Box 7306
 Jerusalem 91371
 Israel
<http://www.youngisrael.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Conservative Judaism; Orthodox Judaism; Reform Judaism.

References

- Rosenthal, Gilbert S. Contemporary Judaism: Patterns of Survival. New York: Human Sciences, 1986.
- “Young Israel—Movement to Synagogue.” In The Jewish Directory and Almanac, edited by Ivan L. Tillem. New York: Pacific, 1984.

Young Men's Buddhist Association

The Colombo Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA), known in Sinhala as Taruna Bauddha Samitiya, was founded on January 8, 1898. Many other similar Buddhist societies emerged as a result of the religious revival that began among Buddhists in Sri Lanka in the late 19th century. The Colombo YMBA's motto teaches that a life in which morality is well combined with wisdom brings one victory (sila pan-nanato jayam). One of the aims of the YMBAs was “to advance the moral, cultural, physical and social welfare of Buddhists.” As a lay Buddhist movement, its strength and prestige increased with the spread of its branches in local areas in the first half of the 20th century. YMBAs were invented to increase the knowledge in dhamma, to hold discussions on Buddha's teachings, and to help people to organize life in accordance with Buddhist doctrines (according to the dominant Theravada Buddhism in Sri Lanka). When YMBA grew in strength, it was assigned to organize the Dhamma schools (daham pasal) that have become a characteristic feature of Buddhist education in modern Sri Lanka. Until the Sri Lankan government took over its functions in 1961, YMBA had established a national network of Buddhist Sunday schools for which they provided printed texts and other educational resources.

In organizing the Dhamma schools, YMBA has made a distinctive contribution. On December 20, 1919, Sir D. B. Jayathilaka (1868–1944) chaired a gathering of Buddhist organizations held at Ananda College (f. 1895). In that assembly, YMBA was asked to hold Dhamma examinations. In the first Dhamma school examination, held in 1920, 374 male and female students from 27 Dhamma schools participated. Although its success encouraged YMBA to hold exams every year, it also introduced Bauddhacarya examination for teachers of the Dhamma schools in 1926, in which 12 teachers took part. During the time of Buddha Jayanti (1956), the interest in Dhamma schools developed steadily. Students could attend the Dhamma schools until the age of 23, and in one class students studied for 2 years. Although four to five books were assigned for each class, students were also expected to finish the study of texts such as the Abhidharmarthasangraha.

Although the Dhamma examinations, held at five levels, were open to any person interested in the study of Theravada Buddhism, candidates who were over the age of 25 were permitted to take diploma examinations without taking the prior ones. The examinations were held on the fourth Sunday of June at centers in Sri Lanka and abroad, and candidates were able to apply through Dhamma schools. The examination contained two papers, testing students' knowledge of Dhamma and Abhidhamma. Further, in the 1980s, the Colombo YMBA was asked to produce the Dhamma schoolbooks that were published and distributed free of charge by the Ministry of Buddhist Affairs.

In addition, since 1902, the Colombo YMBA has continuously published an English periodical, The Buddhist, which was originally published by the Colombo Theosophical Society, beginning in 1888.

To meet the expectations of lay Buddhists, local YMBAs scattered around the country organize a variety of activities to enhance the learning experience of the laity. For instance, since its founding in 1944, the YMBA in Balapitiya has provided religious instruction on Buddhism by sponsoring preaching sessions by famous Buddhist preachers, such as the Venerable Hinatiyana Dhammaloka (1900–1981).

Most YMBAs across the island nation support observing the precepts on special days, the practice of meditation, holding Dhamma discussions, the distribution of printed sermons, the celebration of Vesak, providing facilities for the sick, sponsoring sports activities, creating library facilities, and promoting the education of local children through financial support and guidance.

Colombo Young Men's Buddhist Association
70 D.S. Senanayake Mawatha
Colombo 8
Sri Lanka
<http://www.ymba-colombo.org/index.htm>

Mahinda Deegalle

See also: Theravada Buddhism.

References

Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus: Staat und Gesellschaft in den Landern des Theravada Buddhis-

mus. 3 vols. Wiesbaden: O. Harrassowitz, 1966–1973.

Bond, George. The Buddhist Revival in Sri Lanka: Religious Tradition, Reinterpretation and Response. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Gombrich, Richard F. Theravada Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1988.

Gombrich, Richard F., and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Valitota: Balapitiya Taruna Baudha Samitiye Rajata Jayantiya. Ed. by D. D. M. Seneviratna et al. Colombo: Anula Mudranalaya, 1971.

Z

■ Zambia

Zambia, in the heart of Central Africa, is a landlocked country surrounded by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Angola, Namibia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Malawi, and Tanzania. Some 11,700,000 people (2008) reside on its 286,000 square miles of territory. More than 70 languages are spoken by the various Native people who make up 98 percent of Zambia's population.

Over the centuries, what is now Zambia was settled by various Bantu peoples who attempted to make a place for themselves in the several river valleys and along the lakes that constitute its border with neighboring countries. Modern history begins with the initial trek of Portuguese explorers attempting to find a land route tying together Mozambique and Angola. They were frustrated first by the Sotos, who moved into the Congo when driven out of their lands to the south, and then by the British, who moved into the area from South Africa. The British both coveted the mineral resources of the region and wanted to build their own land route across Africa (from South Africa to Egypt).

The British–South Africa Company kept control of what became known as Northern Rhodesia (named for Cecil Rhodes) through the 19th century, and the British government assumed direct hegemony only in 1924. The oppressive conditions in the mines became the catalyst to unite people in the effort to gain independence. In 1953 the British moved Zambia into a federation with Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) and Nyasaland (Malawi). Kenneth Naunda led the forces boycotting an election that would institutionalize European domination of the federated states. The struggle would be fought openly over the next decade, but

Zambia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,772,000	10,775,000	85.3	1.95	14,496,000	20,653,000
Protestants	296,000	4,180,000	33.1	2.78	5,500,000	7,700,000
Roman Catholics	923,000	3,890,000	30.8	3.24	5,300,000	7,400,000
Independents	391,000	1,800,000	14.3	1.57	2,600,000	3,750,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,451,000	1,411,000	11.2	1.52	1,366,000	1,200,000
Baha'is	10,300	250,000	2.0	1.89	400,000	600,000
Muslims	13,000	135,000	1.1	1.89	180,000	250,000
Agnostics	10,000	22,400	0.2	1.89	50,000	90,000
Hindus	7,700	17,200	0.1	1.89	25,000	40,000
Atheists	0	8,800	0.1	1.89	13,000	20,000
Buddhists	0	4,200	0.0	1.90	7,000	12,000
Jews	800	1,600	0.0	1.89	2,000	3,000
Total population	4,265,000	12,625,000	100.0	1.89	16,539,000	22,868,000

ZAMBIA

after Naunda's United National Independence Party won the 1964 elections, independence immediately followed.

Naunda survived Zambia's isolation from its neighbors with an economy built on copper mining, and saw the situation reverse when the other countries gained their independence. He led the country until 1991, when a multiparty system was adopted and Frederick Chiluba was elected to succeed him.

Traditional religions have had a rich history since the coming of the Europeans. The religions that were developed by the various Bantu groups held in common the belief in a supreme being, variously called Mulungu or Lesa, the veneration of one's ancestors, and the practice of magic. In reaction to the presence of whites, a variety of movements have developed, drawing adherents from multiple peoples; new movements have come in from neighboring countries, especially the Mahamba movement from Angola and the Mashave movement from lands to the south. Most of these movements have in common an emphasis on spiritual healing or spirit possession. Somewhat different has been the Mchape movement from Malawi, which aims to counter witchcraft—that is, malevolent magic.

The first Christians in Zambia were Portuguese Catholics who entered the region in the late 1700s. The first permanent missionary station, however, was opened in 1885 by the Paris Mission affiliated with the Reformed Church of France. The London Missionary Society, the Church of Scotland's (Presbyterian) missionaries, and the British Methodists arrived within a few years. Each of these missions grew into churches, which finally merged in 1965 to form the United Church of Zambia, the largest church in the country. Kenneth Naunda was himself a Presbyterian. Other early churches with a sizable following include the Reformed Church in Zambia (started from South Africa), the Christian Brethren, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Representatives of the Church of England arrived in Zambia in 1909 and built their church primarily among white settlers. Zambian Anglicans are now part of the Church of the Province of Central Africa.

The Roman Catholic Church finally established permanent work in 1891 through the efforts of the White Fathers. They were later provided assistance by the Franciscans, Capuchins, and Jesuits. The church grew steadily through the 20th century, and the first bishop was established in Lusaka in 1959. The first African bishop was consecrated in 1963.

The Jehovah's Witnesses entered Zambia in 1911 and soon spread among the Native population. At their height as many as a fourth of the population were affiliated, and 15 to 20 percent remain aligned. Their growth has come in the face of periodic attempts by the government to suppress them, the most recent being in the late 1960s, when the new independent government banished all foreign leadership and tried (unsuccessfully) to destroy the movement. Today the Witnesses claim some 375,000 adherents. Their influence is extended through several large independent Witness groups. Of these, the independent Watchtower group is most interesting, as it has built its work around four cooperative villages. The New Apostolic Church, a German-based 19th-century millennial group, came to Zambia in 1915 and, like the Witnesses, has had spectacular success.

Zambia has been a center of new African Indigenous Churches, especially in the years since the country's independence. Among the most important is the Lumpa, or Visible Salvation, Church founded by Alice Lenshina (1920–1978) in 1954. It still has an active following counted in the tens of thousands, though it was officially banned in 1965. Also functioning is the Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi (Sweet Heart of the Clouds), founded in 1951 by Emilio Mulolani Chishimba (b. ca. 1921). The majority of the more than 100 independent churches known to exist in the country have come into Zambia from neighboring countries, though most have only small followings.

At least three ecumenical councils now operate in Zambia. The more liberal churches, those associated with the World Council of Churches, have remained in the Christian Council of Zambia, originally founded in 1945. The more conservative evangelical groups compose the Evangelical Fellowship of Zambia, associated with the World Evangelical Alliance. Many of the independent churches have banded together in the Association of Independent Churches.

Zambia has attracted only a small representative sampling of the world's religions. There is a small Jewish community of less than 50 resident members in Lusaka who support the Lusaka Hebrew Congregation. A larger Muslim community is focused upon Asian expatriates residing in Lusaka and several other urban centers. Similar is Hinduism, also brought to Zambia from India, but having little appeal to the population at large. Following a distinct course is the Baha'i Faith, which has enjoyed some success since the 1960s among various Zambian peoples.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Baha'i Faith; Capuchins; Christian Brethren; Church of England; Church of Scotland; Church of the Province of Central Africa; Franciscans; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; London Missionary Society; Mutima Walowa Wa Mukumbi; New Apostolic Church; Paris Mission; Reformed Church in Zambia; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church of Zambia; White Fathers; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Banda, Alick. Church-State Relations in Zambia: A Policy Proposal. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 2004.
- Cross, S. "The Watchtower Movement in South Central Africa." Ph.D. diss., Oxford University, 1973.

- Hinfelaar, Hugo F. Bemba-Speaking Women of Zambia in a Century of Religious Change, 1892–1992. Leiden: Brill, 1997.
- Hinfelaar, Hugo F. History of the Catholic Church in Zambia 1895–1995. Sarasota, FL: Bookworld Services, 2004.
- Macmillan, Hugh. Zion in Africa: The Jews of Zambia. London: I. B. Tauris, 1999.
- Roberts, A. D. “The Lumpa Church of Alice Len-shina.” In Protest and Power in Black Africa, edited by R. Rotberg and A. Mazrui. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Rotberg, R. Christian Missionaries and the Creation of Northern Rhodesia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1965.

Zaydites

Most Shia Muslims trace the lineage of their leadership, the imams, through al-Husayn’s surviving son, Ali, better known as Zayn al-Abidin (d. 714), and his son, Muhammad al-Baqir (d. ca. 732). However, between their time in office, the Shia community had to face the challenge posed by the elder son of Zayn al-Abidin, Zayd b. Ali (d. 740), who had been named the new Shia imam ahead of al-Baqir.

Zayd came to his office as the understanding of the imam as guide of the community was being elevated. Zayd rejected this trend and the ascription of any divine or supernatural elements to the imam’s authority. As his opinions became known, the majority of the Shiite leadership rejected him, and moved to substitute al-Baqir in his place. The Shias came to consider Zayd as never having been the imam. His small following survived, however, and in the ninth century they were able to establish hegemony in two countries, Tabaristan (south of the Caspian Sea) and Yemen. The former Zaydi state came to an end in 928, was re-established in 964, but declined in the 12th century. Most of the Zaydis were absorbed into the larger Shiite community.

Yemen, as a Zaydi state, was founded in 890. Zaydi supremacy was challenged in the years after the fall of the Fatimid dynasty in Egypt as Ismaili Islam grew strong in the region, but in spite of the attacks from the Ismailis, the Yemeni state retained its independence. Then in 1539, it was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire (based in the Hanafite School of Sunni Islam). Their rule lasted only until 1595, when the Zaydis revolted; they drove the Ottomans out in 1635. Yemen retained its independence for more than two centuries, but in 1872 the Ottomans once again took over the region. As the Ottomans declined, Yemen received independence (albeit with strong British influence) as World War I progressed.

The Zaydites disagree with the Shiites on the issues of the imamate (the same issue that split Sunnis and Shias). They did retain the office of the imam, though he was chosen on merit, military skill often being more important than any spiritual or intellectual qualifications. There are reports of two rivals for the imam’s office fighting to the death to demonstrate their higher qualifications.

The Zaydite community has been dramatically affected by events since 1949. In 1949 there was an attempt to overthrow the government by coup. Although Imam Yahya was killed, the coup did not succeed. His successors remained in power until 1962, when a secular coup was successful in deposing the imam and establishing the Yemen Arab Republic (superseded in 1990 by the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen). Since that time, the office of the imam has remained vacant.

The Zaydites have no separate headquarters, though it is the official religion of Yemen. There is a Ministry of Awqaf (endowments) and Religious Guidance in the government at the national level. Most of the world’s 8 million Zaydites reside in Yemen, but they may now be found scattered around the globe.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hanafite School of Islam; Ismaili Islam.

Reference

- Yann, Richard. Shi’ite Islam. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.

Zen Buddhism

Zen Buddhism is a branch of Mahayana Buddhism. According to legend, the Buddha established the foundations of Zen Buddhism during a discourse on Vulture Peak in which he held up a flower. Only Mahakashyapa understood this message, becoming the first Indian patriarch in the Zen Buddhist lineage. Legend continues that an Indian monk named Bodhidharma transmitted this new form of Buddhism to China around 500 CE. Bodhidharma's teachings mixed with Daoism to form a new school of Mahayana Buddhism, called Chan. Chan is the Chinese pronunciation of the Sanskrit word dhyana, which means "meditation." In Japan, Chan became known as Zen, which is the Japanese pronunciation of Chan. The two main schools of Japanese Zen Buddhism, Rinzai and Soto, were introduced into Japan from China in the 12th and 13th centuries, respectively. Both schools adapted to Japanese culture, while still retaining elements of their Chinese roots.

Statue of Buddha, Thailand. (Margouillat/Dreamstime.com)

The aim of Zen Buddhism is to achieve enlightenment. The essential nature of Zen is often summarized as follows: a special transmission outside the scriptures; no dependence upon words and letters; direct pointing at the human heart; seeing into one's nature and the realization of Buddhahood.

Zen claims to differ from other Buddhist schools in its emphasis on seated meditation. In contrast with his contemporaries, Bodhidharma de-emphasized the existing focus on priestly ritual and the endless chanting of the sutras or Buddhist scriptures. Although other Buddhist schools often balance meditation with other religious practices such as intellectual analysis of doctrines or devotional practices, Zen considers those practices useless in attaining enlightenment. The core of Zen practice is seated meditation, called zazen. Meditation practices differ in different schools: generally, Soto Zen teaches shikantaza, and Rinzai Zen teaches koan practice. Shikantaza (nothing but sitting) involves sitting, in a state of alert attention that is free of thoughts. Koans are paradoxical questions, phrases, or stories that cannot be solved using intellectual reasoning, such as "What is the sound of one hand clapping?"

Like other Buddhist traditions, Zen Buddhism has begun to develop in Western countries in the last 100 years. In 1893, Shaku Soyen attended the Chicago World's Parliament of Religions, becoming the first Zen master to visit the United States. In the early 1900s a few Rinzai priests moved to the United States, and in 1930 one of these established the first Zen center in the United States in New York, the Buddhist Society of America. Works on Zen by authors such as D. T. Suzuki had an important role in contributing to an understanding of Zen at an intellectual and philosophical level in both the United States and Europe. Interest in the practice of Zen came later, beginning with the influence of the Beat generation in the 1950s and increasing in the 1960s with the arrival of Japanese teachers coming to teach and establish centers in Europe and the United States.

The vast majority of Zen practitioners outside of Japan are converts. There are now indigenous Zen teachers from a variety of lineages leading Zen groups in countries as diverse as the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Poland, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Brazil, India, and the Philippines. As Zen has developed it has been recontextualized to suit Western cultures. Major changes include an emphasis on lay practice, equality for women, the application of democratic principles, an emphasis on ethics, and secularization and the linkage to some sciences, particularly psychology and psychotherapy.

Zen Buddhism has an extensive presence on the Internet, a good starting point being the Zen Buddhism Virtual Library at <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVL-Zen.html>. It includes a directory of groups and centers internationally.

Michelle Barker

See also: Bodhidharma; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Rinzaï (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam); Soto Zen Buddhism.

References

- Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. Wisdom, 2005.
- Kapleau, Philip. The Three Pillars of Zen. Rev. ed. New York: Anchor, 1989.
- Rommeluère, Éric. Guide du Zen. Paris: Livre de poche, 1997.
- Shunryu Suzuki. Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind. Shambhala Library, 2006.

Zhang Daoling

Zhang Daoling (Zhang Ling; second century CE) established Daoism as a unique religious movement. Until that point Daoist philosophers had created a philosophical school of Daoism, but no institutional framework in which to develop a religion and, eventually, a functioning state.

According to tradition Zhang was a hermit living in the mountains of western Sichuan. In 142 he experienced a vision from Taishang Laojun (Laozi). Taishang Laojun announced he was withdrawing the Mandate of Heaven from the current ruling dynasty, the Han, and giving it to Zhang. Zhang was given the title of tianshi (heavenly master) and powers to combat demons. He had become Laozi's spokesperson.

Zhang quickly established the Wudoumi (five pecks of rice) sect, so named because each follower was levied a tax of five pecks of rice. The movement passed under the control of Zhang's son and grandchildren and created a new state in Sichuan. While the state did not last long as a political entity, the Heavenly Master lineage established by Zhang has continued into the modern period. Daoist priests who receive ordination through this lineage are still widely accepted as orthodox.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Daoism.

References

- Miller, James. Daoism: A Short Introduction. Oxford: Oneworld, 2003.
- Robinet, Isabelle. Taoism: Growth of a Religion. Trans. by Phyllis Brooks. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Thompson, Laurence G. Chinese Religion: An Introduction. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1996.

Zhengyi Daoism

The Zhengyi represent the second group of legitimate Daoists active today (the other being Quanzhen). They are sometimes called Tianshi Daoists because they claim to trace their lineage back to the Heavenly Masters of the Han dynasty (Daoism), though scholars doubt the continuity. The Zhang family of Jiangxi Province, unknown before the ninth century, took on the mantle of the Zhang family of Sichuan Province of the second century and received imperial recognition. Thus the Zhengyi (Orthodox Unity) Order of Longhushan (Dragon Tiger Mountain) was created. That is still their headquarters in mainland China.

In 1304 the Yuan emperor appointed the Celestial Master to supervise the registers of other sects, and many folded into the Zhengyi. The Zhengyi was the dominant school during the Ming, and many of the Zhang family married into the imperial family.

Early Western accounts of Zhengyi called the hereditary Celestial Master "the Daoist Pope." In 1949 the 63rd Celestial Master moved to Taiwan, where the 64th lives today. (That is the 64th counting from Zhang Daoling, though the lineage is verifiable only through the 23rd, dating to the middle of the Tang.) Today approximately 20 percent of Daoists on the mainland are Zhengyi, concentrated mainly in southeast China. Taiwan (where many southeast Chinese immigrated after the Communist takeover) is predominantly Zhengyi. In Beijing, Zhengyi was represented by Dongyue miao

Daoist priest Dong Zhiguang, right, performs a ceremony at Qingyanggong, or Green Ram Palace, in Chengdu, China, 2005. (AFP/Getty Images)

(Eastern Peak Temple), built during the Yuan dynasty, now a museum.

Zhengyi ordination is passed down from father to son within individual families, or through master-disciple as legitimated through adoption. Priests work out of their homes, where they maintain an altar. They provide ritual services on demand or according to the calendar to community members, who are not necessarily Daoist. Zhengyi is sometimes seen as “folk Daoism,” though that is a misnomer.

Major rituals include jiao (communal sacrifice), which harmonizes the entire community with the cosmos. Used to commemorate a special event, the jiao includes a celebratory offering of flowers, fruit, and incense. The zhai are rituals of repentance in which the priests inside the temple fast on behalf of the community. Paradoxically, in the modern Daoist temple, zhai refers to the special community banquet (vegetarian dishes prepared to look and taste like meat) that follows.

Both jiao and zhai are commonly performed in conjunction with each other as part of an entire series of rituals held during a multiday festival. Other Zhengyi rituals include the gongde (requiem service), healing, and exorcisms. These rites incorporate many layers of previous ritual going back 2,000 years in Daoist history.

The division of labor in a traditional Zhengyi ritual is complicated. Priests nicknamed “black hats” perform classical rites inside the temple, to which the public is not admitted. “Red hats” (called fangshi, a Han dynasty term meaning “ritual master”) orally describe what is going on to the masses thronged outside the temple. Also, significant local variation has developed over time, depending on family lineage.

Important fieldwork on Zhengyi Daoist ritual has been done in Taiwan, in particular by scholars who have been initiated as Zhengyi priests, notably Kristofer Schipper and Michael Saso. Besides these scholar-practitioners, there are few true Zhengyi Daoists in the Western world. One attempt to re-create a Zhengyi ritual community in the West is Orthodox Daoism in America (ODA). Founded by the Euro-American Liu Ming (born Charles Belyea), the ODA accepts serious students interested in investiture (text completion) or ordination. Liu Ming also lectures to the public. The ODA publishes a quarterly newsletter, Frost Bell, which explains Zhengyi Daoism to a Western audience.

Longhushan Tainshi Association
Longhushan
Jiangxi 335411
People's Republic of China

Elijah Siegler

See also: Daoism; Quanzhen Daoism;
Vegetarianism.

References

- Dean, Kenneth. Taoist Ritual and Popular Cults of Southeast China. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993.
- Kohn, Livia. Daoism Handbook. 2 vols. Leiden: Brill, 2000.
- Saso, Michael. Taoism and the Rite of Cosmic Renewal. Pullman: Washington State University Press, 1973.

Zhi Yi

538–597

Zhi Yi (Chih Yi) established the Tian Tai School of Chinese Buddhism, a movement whose effects are still seen throughout East Asian Buddhist practice. Born in the region of the modern city of Nanjing, in central China, Zhi Yi came from a wealthy family and received a classical education. As a monk he learned from Hui Si (515–576), who emphasized the centrality of the Lotus Sutra. Later Tian Tai teachings put the Lotus Sutra as the key text in Buddhism because it contains the Buddha's essential teachings. Other schools and texts are then criticized for being incomplete in perspective.

Zhi Yi's major ideas are found in the Mohe Zhi-guan, a dense text composed of notes from Zhi Yi's lectures and recorded by Guang Ding (561–632), his major disciple. Zhi Yi enumerated his teachings by using a categorization schema called the panjiao to rank and distinguish different teachings. Zhi Yi also gave meditation and practice great emphasis. His zhi-guan (cessation of consciousness) techniques are still widely practiced.

Today, Zhi Yi is best remembered as the first Chinese Buddhist to present a complete and systematic classification of the Buddhist sutra and their teachings, in large part to explain the seemingly contradictory ideas moving through the larger Mahayana Buddhist community. He is also seen as among the first group of Buddhists to break from their Indian tradition and propose a truly Chinese form of Buddhism that in many ways left the Theravada texts behind.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Hui Si; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Theravada Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism.

Reference

- “Chih-I.” In The A to Z of Buddhism, edited by Charles S. Prebisch. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2001.

Zhong Gong

Zhong Gong, founded in 1988, is one of the most popular of the qigong groups operating in the People's Republic of China. By the end of the 1990s it was estimated to have tens of millions of followers. However, in 1999, in the wake of the government's crackdown on the Falun Gong, it also was singled out for repressive measures.

Zhong Gong, the China Health Care and Wisdom Enhancement Gong, was founded by Zhang Hongbao (1955–2005) during the heyday of government support for qigong. He taught a traditional form of qigong, emphasizing the use of exercises and meditation as a means of stimulating qi energy. Such energy, once properly flowing through the body, would bring health and enhance mental functioning. Zhong Gong operated independently of the officially sanctioned National Qigong Association, and it speedily spread across the country. In spite of its independent stance, it was favorably mentioned in the official press. Its training school in Shaanxi Province had more than 2,000 students. Reportedly, no lesser a personage than the country's president, Jiang Zemin, had sought out a Zhong Gong master to treat his arthritis and back pain.

Through the 1990s, the group had some minor run-ins with the authorities. Its independent ways became known, but no ideological elements appeared to contradict government authority (as was the case with Falun Gong). However, in December 1999, police abruptly closed the Zhang Gong training facility in Shaanxi. Then in January 2000, a Zhong Gong leader in Zhejiang Province was sentenced to two years for the Chinese equivalent of practicing medicine without a license, a changed evaluation of the group that potentially placed all qigong groups at risk. The government has charged that following qigong has been accompanied with admonitions to stop seeing medical doctors.

China declared Zhong Gong an illegal organization, and subsequently moved to confiscate its assets as well as those of the Unicorn Group, a commercial enterprise in which many members had an interest. Leaders were arrested and an arrest warrant was issued for Zhang Hongbao. He fled to U.S. territory, entering Guam illegally. He applied for political asylum, which was refused, but he was granted protective resident status in 2001. Unfortunately, five years later, while still involved in a variety of legal actions, he was killed in an automobile accident.

Zhong Gong continued. Though at one point larger than Falun Gong, it never attracted much attention and its cause received little media attention. It has all but disappeared in mainland China and never developed a significant following in the Chinese diaspora.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Falun Gong; Qigong.

References

- Eckholm, Erik. "China Imprisons a Leader of Healing-by-Meditation Society." New York Times, January 20, 2000.
- Lee, Richard E. Scientific Investigations in Chinese Qigong. San Clemente, CA: China Healthways Institute, 1999.
- Peisheng, Wang, and Chen Guanhua. Relax and Calming Qigong. Hong Kong: Peace, 1986.
- "Zhang Hongbao in Blast Furnace: A Documentary on How the Outstanding Spiritual Leader Transformed to a Political Leader." <http://www.tianhuaculture.net/eng/b1.html>. Accessed July 1, 2009.

Zhou Dunyi

1017–1073

Zhou Dunyi (Shou Lianxi, Chou Lien-his) was a key figure in the establishment of neo-Confucianism, a broad-based intellectual movement that transformed Chinese thinking in the later part of the 10th century CE. While Zhu Xi is the most famous thinker in this movement, Zhou Dunyi helped create the field itself. Zhu Xi in fact considered Zhou to be a Confucian sage on the same level as Mencius and Confucius.

Zhou was a minor official during the Song dynasty (969–1279). He did not reach the highest degree possible (jinshi), and his greatest influence was as a teacher. Among his students were the two Cheng brothers, Cheng Hao and Cheng Yi, important neo-Confucian figures in their own right. In addition Zhou authored two main texts, Explanation of the Diagram of the Supreme Ultimate (Taiji tushuo) and Penetrating the Classic of Changes (Tongshu). With these he set the major themes of neo-Confucian metaphysics. He explained the universe through a complete scheme starting from ultimate nothingness (wuji) through to the Supreme Ultimate (taiji), along the way generating the five phases (wuxing) of water, fire, wood, metal, and earth and other mixtures of yin and yang energies. He also emphasized that sagehood and humanity, Confucian virtues, are expressions of qi. It is clear Zhou was intimate with Daoism and Buddhism, and probably did not see the need to separate these ideas from Confucian concepts. By bringing in the cosmological dimension, which Confucianism had previously lacked, he opened the door for a major revival of Confucian energy.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Confucius; Daoism; Mencius.

References

- Chang, Carson. The Development of New-Confucian Thought. New York: Bookman Associates, 1957.
- McGreal, Ian P. R. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Zhuangzi

475–221 BCE

Zhuangzi (born Zhuang Zhou, also sometimes written as Chuang Tzu; fourth century BCE) was a bureaucrat and Daoist philosopher in the Warring States period of early Chinese history. Born in the city of Meng in the state of Song, in contemporary Honan, he had been an official and had a family. He had been well tutored by a Prince Changsang (other details unknown) and he himself had a group of disciples. Little else is known of his history.

Zhuangzi is the second major figure in Daoism, after Laozi (b. ca. 571 BCE), and as such is comparable to Mencius (ca. 372–289 BCE) and his relationship with Confucius. However Zhuangzi did not know Laozi, nor does it appear he considered himself to be a disciple. Zhuangzi was an iconoclastic observer of nature and the social order. He criticized the governments and leaders, and was equally unhappy with philosophical and political ideas then current. This led him to denounce the penal system in China. In addition his writing style has been consistently admired throughout China's long history. Indeed, in his writings Zhuangzi coined more than 100 new terms.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Confucius; Daoism; Laozi; Mencius.

References

- Hamill, Sam, and J. P. Seaton, trans. The Essential Chuang Tzu. Boston: Shambhala, 1998.

McGreal, Ian, OP., ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Mair, Victor. "The Zhuangzi and Its Impact." In Daoism Handbook, edited by Livia Kohn, 30–52. Leiden and Koln: Brill, 2000.

Wu, Chung. The Wisdom of Zhuang Zi on Daoism. New York: Peter Lang, 2008.

■ Zimbabwe

The modern nation of Zimbabwe (formerly the British colony of South Rhodesia), proclaimed in 1980, is a landlocked southern African nation surrounded by Zambia, Botswana, South Africa, and Mozambique. Its 11,350,000 people reside on 149,300 square miles of territory.

Zimbabwe traces its history to the arrival of Bantu miners who came to work the extensive iron ore deposits around the fifth century CE. They also worked the copper and tin deposits they found. Today, the Shona Bantu make up more than 80 percent of the Zimbabwean population. The Zimbabwean Bantu society created one of the highest medieval cultures in Africa, symbolized by the 10th-century walled city of Zimbabwe, from which the contemporary nation takes its name.

The Shona Bantu were divided into a number of subgroups. The Karanga people who built Zimbabwe extended their rule into present-day Mozambique and Malawi, and they traded their metal with the Asian market. The Karanga were displaced in the 15th century by the Rotsi, who continued their Asian trade until the Portuguese disruption of East African coastal life in the 16th century.

In 1834 the Zulus came into the area and pushed the Rotsi northward and westward. Zulu hegemony prevailed in southeastern Zimbabwe. In 1889 a representative of the British South African Company (headed by Cecil Rhodes) negotiated rights to exploit the mineral resources of the Zulu-controlled part of the country. The British founded the town of Salisbury (now Harare), and over the course of the next years they created a situation to legitimize their takeover of the Shona Bantu land (1895).

Zimbabwe

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,716,000	9,512,000	69.1	1.00	12,265,000	15,571,000
Independents	672,000	5,930,000	43.1	1.74	7,250,000	9,000,000
Protestants	730,000	2,450,000	17.8	3.41	3,300,000	4,200,000
Roman Catholics	557,000	1,382,000	10.0	2.27	1,900,000	2,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,408,000	3,905,000	28.4	0.09	3,269,000	2,972,000
Agnostics	8,000	140,000	1.0	0.72	180,000	250,000
Muslims	50,000	100,000	0.7	0.72	120,000	145,000
Baha'is	9,700	44,000	0.3	0.72	60,000	80,000
Atheists	1,000	21,700	0.2	0.72	25,000	30,000
Hindus	3,600	20,500	0.1	0.72	30,000	40,000
Jews	5,200	13,000	0.1	0.72	15,000	16,000
New religionists	1,200	1,800	0.0	0.72	2,500	4,000
Buddhists	0	1,000	0.0	0.71	1,800	3,000
Spiritists	300	660	0.0	0.72	800	1,200
Total population	5,203,000	13,760,000	100.0	0.72	15,969,000	19,112,000

In the 1960s, the white-led government resisted attempts to transfer power to the African majority, and in 1965 independence was proclaimed. The Ian Smith government held on for more than a decade, but the process of transferring power began in 1979 with the election of Abel Muzorewa (b. 1925), a bishop in the United Methodist Church, as president. He changed the name of the country to Zimbabwe-Rhodesia, but his government fell the next year; in new elections, the Zimbabwe African National Union led by Robert Mugabe was swept into power. Mugabe was able to reconcile with his main political rival later in the decade, and the merged Patriotic Front of the Zimbabwean African National Union has subsequently remained the primary political organization in the country. Mugabe remains in power after having faced several elections through the 1990s to the present (2010). He has faced growing opposition to his long rule and was, in 2008, forced to share power with the major dissenting party.

Zimbabwe has one of the most diverse religious communities of any nation in Africa. Some 30 percent of the population continues to follow traditional African religions, with some of the smaller groups not a part of the Bantu being among the most resistant to the various new religious traditions that entered in the nineteenth century. The Shona people worship a supreme being known as Mwari. In Shona thought, unlike that of most traditionalists in nearby countries, the supreme being provides ongoing contact through a variety of intermediaries (similar to mediums in Western Esoteric traditions) between God and his human children. Religious functionaries become possessed by Mwari, various ancestor spirits, and the lion spirits, the spirits of chiefs who ruled in Zimbabwe in ancient times. Various mediumlike functionaries serve as leaders of different movements among the various subdivisions of the Shona.

Christianity was brought into the area in the 16th century, the Portuguese having made contact with the Shona in 1561. However, no permanent Christian community was established. Then in 1859, the London Missionary Society (Congregationalists from England) made contact with the Zulu chief and were granted permission to open a mission station. The LMS would dominate Protestant effort in Zimbabwe until the end of the 1880s.

The Roman Catholic Church returned in 1879 and established early centers in Salisbury and Bulawayo. It established itself within the white community in the country, but steadily in the last half of the 20th century it found support among native Zimbabweans. The first African bishop was consecrated in 1973, during the years of the Smith government. To the present the church has not produced a sufficient number of black priests, and the majority of the priests remain foreign born. The church is supported by four indigenous female religious orders, among which the largest part of the church's African leadership is found.

Rabbi Ambros Makuwaza conducts a Rosh Hashanah service on September 14, 1996, at Rusape's Jewish Tabernacle, 70 kilometers (105 miles) east of Harare, Zimbabwe. (AP/Wide World Photos)

A new day for Zimbabwean Christianity began in 1888, when the British government, having asserted some hegemony in the region, gave the Church of England–related Universities Mission to Central Africa a grant of land, and work was subsequently initiated among both the Shona and Zulu peoples. The Diocese of Rhodesia was erected in 1891. The work was incorporated into the Church of the Province of Central Africa, created in 1955.

British Methodists arrived in 1890, and their American cousins six years later. The former had substantial support among Zimbabweans of British background, while the latter was a totally African church (apart from the small number of missionaries) from the beginning. The British work grew into what is today the Methodist Church in Zimbabwe. The American work remains attached to the United Methodist Church as its Zimbabwe Conference. Abel Muzorewa (b. 1925), the first African bishop, was consecrated in 1968. In 1992 the United Methodists founded Africa University.

The Salvation Army came to Rhodesia in 1891, and now it has one of its largest followings among the Shona. Other Protestant churches with substantial followings include the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1894), Churches of Christ (1896), the African Methodist Episcopal Church (1900), the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe (1903), and the New Apostolic Church (1910). Baptist work began in 1917 but was largely related to the white community. The Southern Baptist Convention directed its concern to Zimbabwe after World War II, and in 1950 it picked up the support of an independent Baptist missionary couple who had been working in the country since 1930. With added support from the United States, the mission grew rapidly and matured in 1963 into the Baptist Convention of Zimbabwe.

ZIMBABWE

In the early 20th century, the first of the African Initiated Churches appeared, and several—such as the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, the Mai Chaza Church, and the Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa—are among the largest Christian bodies in the country. The Zionist and Apostolic churches from South Africa have also garnered a significant following, and the Zion Christian Church is now larger than the Roman Catholic Church. The Zionist and Apostolic churches have grown into a large body in the years since the country's independence.

The various Christian churches in Zimbabwe are associated in several ecumenical organizations. The Zimbabwe Council of Churches, with its roots in the Southern Rhodesia Missionary Council, founded in 1903, is affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

The Evangelical Fellowship of Zimbabwe is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. A spectrum of the African Initiated Churches came together in 1972 to found the African Indigenous Churches Conference.

Also representing the larger Christian world are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (which arrived in 1950) and the Jehovah's Witnesses (ca. 1910). In the 20th century, Zimbabwe became home to a spectrum of the world's major religious traditions. Daniel Montage Kisch, a Jew, arrived in Zimbabwe in 1869 and became an advisor to King Lobengula, the Zulu ruler. In the 1880s, Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe (primarily from Lithuania and Russia) began to arrive. They were joined by German Jewish immigrants in the 1930s, and British and South African Jews in the decades after World War II. The contemporary community of some 10,000 Jews has its center in the Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies and the two synagogues in Harare and Bulawayo.

Zimbabwe is also home to one of the African groups that claim a relationship to the larger community. The Lemba people identify themselves as Jews culturally, following a set of traditional cultural and ritual practices that signify to them their Hebrew ancestry. Although their status as Jews is a matter of debate, in 1996 a set of studies began to appear that provided scientific support to their claims of Hebrew ancestry.

The small Muslim community grew 10fold (from 8,000 to 80,000) during the last quarter of the 20th century, primarily because of the immigration of Muslims from neighboring Malawi and Mozambique. Most are Sunnis of the Shafaiite School. There is a Hindu community based in the Indian community, and the Baha'i Faith has experienced considerable growth, in large part at the expense of the Muslims and Hindus.

Zimbabwe has provided a welcoming environment for many of the new religious groups from around the world, and today one can find centers of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis, the Church of Scientology, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and the Unification Movement. Buddhism is represented by Soka Gakkai International, and there is a single Tibetan Buddhist center in Harare.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Baha'i Faith; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church of the Province of Central Africa; Churches of Christ; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe; Great Zimbabwe; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Lemba; London Missionary Society; Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah; Methodist Church in Zimbabwe; New Apostolic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Unification Movement; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa; Zion Christian Church; Zionist and Apostolic Churches; Zulu Religion.

References

- Antsen, Hilde. The Battle of the Mind: International New Media Elements of the New Religious Political Right in Zimbabwe. Oslo: University of Oslo, 1997.
- Daneel, M. L. Zionism and Faith Healing in Rhodesia: Aspects of African Independent Churches. The Hague: Mouton, 1970.
- Ellison, Kudzayi Madenyika. Zimbabwe: The Betrayal of a Noble Nation. AuthorHouse, 2006.
- Ezeani, George B. The Church and State in Zimbabwe. Kent, UK: Veritas Lumen, 1998.
- Hall, Martin, and Rebecca Steffoff. Great Zimbabwe. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Hallencreutz, C. F., and A. Mayo, eds. Church and State in Zimbabwe. Vol. 3, Christianity South of the Zambezi. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1988.
- Mandivebga, E. C. Islam in Zimbabwe. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1983.
- Owomoyela, Oyekan. Culture and Customs in Zimbabwe. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Ranger, Terence O. Voices from the Rocks: Nature, Culture & History in the Matopos Hills of Zimbabwe. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.

Shoko, Tabona. Karanga Indigenous Religion in Zimbabwe. Aldershot, Hampshire, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 2007.

Welch, P. Church and Settler in Colonial Zimbabwe: A Study in the History of the Anglican Diocese of Mashonaland/Southern Rhodesia, 1890–1925. Leiden: Brill, 2008.

Zvobgo, C. J. M. History of Christian Missions in Zimbabwe. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1996.

Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa

One of the largest denominations in Zimbabwe is the Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa (popularly called ZAOGA), a newer Pentecostal church with roots in South African Pentecostalism, the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa (AFM). ZAOGA commenced in urban areas of Zimbabwe and is led by Archbishop Ezekiel Handinawangu Guti. In 1959, Guti and a group of young African pastors were expelled from the AFM after a disagreement with white missionaries. The group joined the South African Assemblies of God of Nicholas Bhengu, but separated from there in 1967 to form the Assemblies of God, Africa (later the ZAOGA). Guti went to the independent Pentecostal Christ for the Nations Institute in Dallas, Texas, in 1971, and he too received financial and other resources from the United States. But Guti, like many leaders of the new Pentecostalism in Africa, resists any attempts to identify his church with the “religious right” of the United States or to be controlled by what are considered “neo-colonial” interests. In a very pertinent development in 1986, leaders of 12 of the largest Pentecostal churches in Zimbabwe, including Guti, wrote a fierce rebuttal to a right-wing attack on the Zimbabwean state by a North American Charismatic preacher.

Since 1986, ZAOGA has also had churches in Britain. Zimbabwean ZAOGA missionaries went to South Africa to plant churches there in 1989, and the church also has branches, called Forward in Faith Ministries International, in 17 other African countries. ZAOGA is now organized as a fully fledged denomination with headquarters complex and administrative structures in Harare, headed by Guti. By 1999, ZAOGA had an estimated 600,000 affiliated members, which made it the third largest denomination in Zimbabwe after the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange and the Roman Catholic Church, with more than 10 percent of the Christians in the country. ZAOGA itself claimed to be the largest, with one and a half million members in 1995. Although the figure is disputed, it remains one of the largest and most prominent churches in Zimbabwe. Guti’s leadership style and expensive overseas trips were contentious issues in the late 1990s, as were the lifestyles of some of his more powerful pastors. ZAOGA has already experienced various splits, resulting in several new and vigorous Pentecostal churches in Zimbabwe.

13 A Powell Rd.
Waterfalls, Harare
Zimbabwe

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.

Maxwell, David. African Gifts of the Spirit. Athens, OH: Ohio University Press, 2007.

Maxwell, David. “‘Delivered from the Spirit of Poverty’: Pentecostalism, Prosperity and Modernity in Zimbabwe.” Journal of Religion in Africa 28, no. 3 (1998): 350–373.

Zion Christian Church (South Africa, Zimbabwe)

The Zion Christian Church (ZCC), not a typical Zionist church but now the largest denomination in South Africa, was founded by Engenas (Ignatius) Lekganyane (ca. 1880–1948). ZCC tradition says that in about 1910, the official year of the commencement of the church, Lekganyane was praying when he received a revelation through a whirlwind that he would found a large church. In about 1916, Elias Mahlangu founded the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa (ZAC), and Lekganyane was ordained and emerged as leader of a ZAC congregation in his home village. Mahlangu began to promote customs among ZAC members that Lekganyane objected to, such as wearing white robes, growing a beard, and taking off shoes before services—practices found in many Zionist and Apostolic churches today but not allowed in the ZCC. Lekganyane's break with the ZAC came in 1920, when he went to Lesotho and joined Edward (Lion) Motaung's Zion Apostolic Faith Mission (ZAFM), where he was ordained bishop. Differences emerged, and at about the end of 1924, Lekganyane founded the Zion Christian Church.

Members of the Zion Christian Church, the largest church in South Africa, gather for afternoon prayers in Moria, northern Transvaal, April 2, 1994. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1930, Lekganyane bought a farm near Pietersburg that became the church headquarters, Moria, to which Zionists flock today. In keeping with Zion City near Chicago and other African Zions, Lekganyane established a mecca for pilgrimage, a center of ritual power. In 1935 the ZCC membership was about 2,000, but by 1942, when the church was at last officially registered, there were 55 congregations and 27,487 members, having spread to Zimbabwe, Botswana, and the Northern Cape Province. A year later, the ZCC membership was more than 40,000. Lekganyane died in 1948, and a leadership struggle ensued between his sons Edward and Joseph. It was not clear whom Engenas had appointed as successor, and the brothers formed two separate churches in 1949. The followers of Joseph, the minority faction, are now St. Engenas Zion Christian Church and use the emblem of a dove, and are now led by Joseph's son Engenas. The majority of ZCC people followed Edward in the Zion Christian Church. There is very little difference between the two in beliefs and practices.

Under Edward Legkanyane (1925–1967) the ZCC continued to grow, so that by 1954 the membership was some 80,000, probably the biggest AIC in southern Africa at that time. Edward was a very effective leader, and after his premature death in 1967, his son Barnabas, the present bishop (b. 1954), succeeded him, although a superintendent governed the church until 1975, Barnabas's 21st birthday. Since being registered with the government in 1942, the ZCC has enjoyed the favor of the ruling regime. Edward Lekganyane invited the government to the annual Easter conference in 1965, during apartheid's worst years. Barnabas also invited the regime, beginning in 1980. In the much-publicized event at the 75th anniversary celebration at Easter 1985, President P. W. Botha was given the Freedom of Moria. After this event, ZCC members in Soweto were subject to a spate of violent attacks, as the visit reinforced the suspicion that the ZCC was a supporter of the status quo. Nevertheless, the ZCC has emerged from the fear of an oppressive regime to play a role in the radical changes since 1990. There were an estimated 4 to 6 million members of the ZCC in 2009, one of the largest AICs in the continent.

The ZCC is also the most significant Zionist church in Zimbabwe, and it has existed separately from the South African ZCC. Samuel Mutendi (ca. 1898–1976) had a series of dreams in 1919 revealing that he would start an African church. He was baptized by Engenas Lekganyane in Pretoria in 1923 and commissioned as the ZAFM's missionary to Zimbabwe. In 1925, Lekganyane called Mutendi and other Zionist leaders to Pretoria, where the ZCC was organized. Mutendi was the only Zimbabwean leader to join the new church, and Lekganyane ordained him a minister. Mutendi modeled the new Zimbabwean church on the ZCC in South Africa, and he remained loyal to Lekganyane until his death in 1948. Thereafter, the two ZCC churches had less contact, and although Edward Lekganyane managed to visit Mutendi in 1953, the ZCC in Zimbabwe became fully autonomous. It had 13 minor schisms between 1929 and 1961, but the most serious schism occurred after Mutendi's death in 1976. A succession struggle between his sons Ruben and Nehemiah resulted in two separate ZCC churches: Ruben with the smaller faction of some 50,000 members by 2000, and Nehemiah, who had received the support of most of the senior ministers, with more than 200,000.

Zion Christian Church
Zion City Moria
PO Boyne
nr Pietersburg
South Africa

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Zionist and Apostolic Churches.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. "The Lekganyanes and Prophecy in the Zion Christian Church." Journal of Religion in Africa 29, no. 3 (August 1999): 285–312.
- Anderson, Allan H. Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa Press, 2000.
- Daneel, M. L. Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. 2 vols. The Hague: Mouton, 1971, 1974.
- Zion Christian Church. The ZCC Messenger* (Johannesburg). Various issues.

Zionism

Zionism is the doctrine that the Jews deserve to have their own national home, and the location is normally taken to be Palestine, their ancestral home. The doctrine can take a secular form, where it is linked up with any national group and their claim to a national home. It can take a religious shape, where God is said to have promised the land to the Jews, and so they are entitled to claim it, since God created the world and everything belongs to him. The link between the doctrine and the state of Israel has made it very controversial, given the hostility that many have to the state, while others see anti-Zionism as nothing more than a modern form of anti-Semitism.

Zionism has a variety of forms, but there are two main Jewish doctrines, one secular and one religious. The creator of the modern Zionist movement, Theodor Herzl (1860–1904), was a secular Viennese journalist who it is said was impressed by the Dreyfus Affair in thinking that the Jews had no long-term future in Europe. They required a national home, and in the 19th century many nationalities such as the Italians, the Greeks, the Germans, and so on campaigned for and won a national home of some kind. It was in line with this desire that Zionism was established, and for Herzl that home did not have to be in Palestine; he was prepared to countenance anywhere available, even seriously considering part of Uganda when this was proposed by the British. His book Altneuland argued that once the Jews had their own country they would be able to lead normal lives and would be regarded as a normal community by the Gentile world.

Religious Zionism is the doctrine that the land of Israel was promised to the Jews by God, as recounted in the Torah, and so they have a right to live there, and indeed a duty to settle the land. Israel should be a Jewish state not just in the sense of having a Jewish majority, but also in that its character is Jewish. This means that Jewish religious law should be the law of the state (for Jews at least) and the state should be infused with Jewish values based on Torah observance. Some religious Zionists see the settling of the land as an important stage in the messianic future of the world, a view that is shared by some Christian Zionists who see the return of the Jews to Israel as a preliminary to the Second Coming of Jesus, and this has led them to support Israel against its enemies. On the other hand, some religious Jews are totally opposed to Zionism, seeing it as pre-empting God's decision as to when to send the Messiah and lead the Jews back to Israel. Secular Jews also have opposed Zionism, seeing it sometimes as a narrow form of nationalism and viewing a national home for the Jews as a poor alternative to integration in the countries with Gentile majorities.

For most Israelis Zionism is an abstract notion that has little to do with their life in the land in which they have been born and live, and like most people they think they have a right to live where they do, although some Israelis reject the Zionist idea that there should be something exclusively Jewish about the country, arguing that a state in which both Jews and Gentiles could live as equals would be preferable to the existing situation. Most Israelis are secular, although the religious Jewish community is rapidly growing in numbers and so influence, and they accept the Herzl view of Zionism, where Israel is seen as the national home of the Jews as a people, but not necessarily with any requirement to institute a religious lifestyle for its Jewish citizens.

Zionism has been pilloried by its enemies as racist and as a particularly evil idea, and Israel as an especially problematic country. The fact that it is the only state with a non-Muslim majority in the Middle East has perhaps had something to do with this, since the Muslim states around it do like Israel recognize a major religion in the state, in their case Islam. They are not generally so well-disposed toward the religious minorities in their states, unlike Israel, and have ever since Zionism became effective in their region opposed it violently. They do not on the whole have as strong democratic values as Israel either, and it is difficult to see why Zionism has aroused such universal ire apart from the fact that it stands in the way of a total Islamicization of the Middle East. On the other hand, opponents of Zionism sometimes argue that it was the creation of Israel that has led to all the present-day problems in the Middle East, including the expulsion of the Jews from the Arab world and the growing hostility between Islam and the other two Abrahamic religions. Regarding Israel as a pariah state is an appropriate reaction to Zionism since the doctrine is close to apartheid in giving preferential treatment to one racial group over others, according to its detractors.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Judaism.

References

- Herf, Jeffrey, ed. Anti-Semitism and Anti-Zionism in Historical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2006.
- Laquer, Walter. The History of Zionism. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 2003.
- Whaley, J. Theodor Herzl and the Origins of Zionism. Ed. by Richie Robertson and Edward Timms. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1997.

Zionist and Apostolic Churches

The beginnings of African Zionist and Apostolic churches in southern Africa are found in Zion City, near Chicago, where a Christian theocracy created in 1896 by healer John A. Dowie of the Christian Catholic Church (since 1997 known as the Christ Community Church of Zion) emphasized divine healing and triune baptism by immersion. This church was established in Johannesburg in 1895. It was joined in 1903 by Pieter L. le Roux, a Dutch Reformed missionary, with three African evangelists (Daniel Nkonyane, Muneli Ngobesi, and Fred Lutuli) and 400 preachers and converts in the eastern Transvaal (now Mpumalanga). In 1904, Dowie sent Daniel Bryant to South Africa as overseer. He baptized 141 Zion believers in the river near le Roux's church. This group of "Zionists," the great majority being Zulus, grew within a year to 5,000. In 1908 a team of North American Pentecostal missionaries arrived in Johannesburg and used the Zion church building there for services. Le Roux joined their Apostolic Faith Mission, but his African fellow workers remained Zionists while embracing the new Pentecostal doctrine.

One of the Zion leaders, Daniel Nkonyane, seceded from the AFM in about 1910, forming the Christian Catholic Apostolic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, having already obtained and paid for a "three hundred acre" building site, which became a prototype for many African "Zion Cities" to come. In 1917, Elias Mahlangu founded the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa. From Mahlangu's church, Edward Motaung (Lion) seceded in 1920 to form the Zion Apostolic Faith Mission (ZAFM), and Engenas Lekganyane's Zion Christian Church seceded from the ZAFM in 1925. Paul Mabiletsa, another founding Zion leader, commenced the Apostolic Church in Zion in 1920, and J. C. Phillips, a Malawian, commenced the Holy Catholic Apostolic Church in Zion.

In theology, there are no significant differences between African Zion and Apostolic churches on the one hand and the Pentecostal churches on the other, but in practices the differences are considerable. A Zionist becomes a Christian through baptism by triune immersion in water, which usually must take place in running water—that is, in a river often called "Jordan." There is an emphasis on divine healing, although the methods of obtaining this healing differ. Whereas most Pentecostals practice laying on of hands or prayer for the sick, this will usually be accompanied in Zion and Apostolic churches by the use of symbolic objects such as blessed water, ropes, staffs, papers, ash, and so on. Prophecy and speaking in tongues are also practiced in most Zion and Apostolic churches. There are strong regulations for members, and many churches do not allow alcohol, tobacco, medicines, or eating pork. The attitude to traditional religious practices in Zion and Apostolic churches is generally ambivalent, particularly when it comes to ancestors, and some of these churches allow polygyny. For the outsider, the biggest distinguishing feature is the almost universal use of uniform clothing, usually white robes with colored belts and sashes and other markings, or, in the case of the ZCC, khaki uniforms and green and gold colors. These churches do not have many church buildings and often meet in the open air.

In Zimbabwe, Zionist and Apostolic churches arriving from about 1921 through migrant laborers returning from South Africa soon eclipsed other AICs in size and influence. The first Zionist church was the Christian Apostolic Church in Zion, planted in Matabeleland by migrants from Mabiletsa's church in South Africa. David Masuka joined the Zion Apostolic Church of South Africa (ZAC) of Elias Mahlangu in 1921, when he was working in Pietersburg, and he returned to be minister for the church in Zimbabwe in 1923. The ndaza (sacred cord) Zionists wear white or multicolored robes tied with cords, and the ZAC of Masuka was one of the first of these among the Mashona. Like many other Zionist churches, the ZAC experienced schism from 1930 onward, starting with the Sabbath Zion Church, the Zion Protestant Church, the Zion Apostolic City, and several other schisms retaining the name Zion Apostolic Church. In contrast, the ZAFM under the flexible and highly respected Andreas Shoko, one of the first Zionist leaders, managed to avoid any further serious schisms after Mutendi left the church with Lekganyane to form the ZCC.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Apostolic Faith Mission; Christ Community Church of Zion/Christian Catholic Church; Zion Christian Church.

References

Anderson, Allan H. Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/

Apostolic Churches in South Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa Press, 2000.

Daneel, M. L. Old and New in Southern Shona Independent Churches. 2 vols. The Hague: Mouton, 1971, 1974.

Sundkler, B. G. M. Zulu Zion and Some Swazi Zionists. London: Oxford University Press, 1976.

◆ Zoroastrianism

Zoroastrianism, the ancient religion of Persia (Iran), is most known in the West from the biblical story told of the Magi visiting the child Jesus (Matthew 2). The wise men known for their searching the heavens for signs were Zoroastrians who would take note of a new star. In ancient Persia, large pyramidal structures called ziggurats were erected from which the Zoroastrian priests could make their astronomical/astrological observations.

Zoroastrianism is named for Zarathustra (or Zoroaster). Little is known about Zarathustra, including the years in which he lived. The best estimate is that he came from that area of modern Kazakhstan east of the Volga River from which the Iranian people originated. It is believed that he influenced a tribal chief named Vishtaspa in his favor, and that his faith was then carried among the Iranians when they moved into northeastern Iran around the 12th century BCE. Zarathustra may have lived as early as the 17th century BCE. From that base, Zoroastrianism spread among the Medes and Persians in western Iran.

During the reign of Cyrus the Great (559–530 BCE), an empire was created that extended from Turkey to Afghanistan. Under Cyrus, Zoroastrianism moved from its pre-historical to its historical phase, when Cyrus made it the empire's state religion. By this time the ziggurats were in place, as were the Magi, originally the priestly class from the Medes. The life of Zoroastrianism was completely disrupted during the conquests of Alexander the Great. Among other actions in subduing the land, Alexander burned Persepolis, the capital, and in the process destroyed many Zoroastrian records and writings. In the process of spreading Hellenistic culture, his successors suppressed Zoroastrianism until a new Persian Empire was finally created toward the end of the second century BCE. The Parthian Empire (ca. 129–224) re-established the primacy of Zoroastrianism, which it enjoyed through successive regimes until the coming of the Arabs and Islam in the seventh century CE. For the next centuries Zoroastrianism would battle Islam for the hearts of the people, and by the 10th century it had become not only the state religion but also the dominant religion practiced across the Persian lands.

The dislodging of the Zoroastrian leaders from the Persian court became the motivation for some to begin the migration to what was perceived as a less hostile land, and early in the eighth century migrations to western India began. They became the nucleus of the Parsee (or Persian) Zoroastrian community, which from India has now spread to Africa and the West.

Zarathustra preached a dualistic understanding of the universe. In it, two forces fight for the hearts of humans. Ahura Mazda, the eternal God, is wise, good, and just, but unfortunately, not omnipotent. There also exists a second entity, Angra Mainyu, like Ahura Mazda uncreated, but the embodiment of evil. In order to defeat Angra Mainyu, Ahura Mazda created the world, which exists as a battleground between the good and the bad. To assist him in the creative act, he called upon his Holy Spirit and evoked the Holy Immortals, all emanations of the one God. His emanations are, however, properly seen as divine and, as such, objects of veneration and even worship. Each of these seven emanations represents a high value, such as truth, health, or power. Zoroastrians should invite these Holy Immortals into their lives and make these qualities/values their own.

In the cosmic battle, Angra Mainyu brought evil spirits to oppose the Holy Immortals, some pictured as gods of war. They brought death into the world. The good spirit countered evil by bringing more life into existence to replace those who had died. Individual are called through their life to align with good or evil and will be judged at the end by which choices they made.

Humans have an important role in the cosmic battle. Collectively, they have the power to align with good and become the decisive force in the ultimate triumph of goodness. Then, at the end of earthly life, each person will be judged; those who were more good than bad will go to a heavenly existence, and the others are destined for hell and punishment. Although the dominant form of Zoroastrianism looked for the gradual triumph of good over evil and the eventual destruction of the evil order, a second form of understanding the end times, an apocalyptic system, also developed. In that second presentation, evil would gradually win, with an accompanying increase in chaos, natural disasters, and social ills. The inevitable growth of evil would at the last moment be halted by the appearance of a Saoshyant, a Savior figure who will appear out of the family of Zarathustra to lead a final battle of good people triumphing over the evil one. The dead will then be resurrected and the final judgment will take place. At that time the evil will be destroyed and the good purged of the remaining evil they possess. The good will enjoy eternal life. The correlation of this form of Zoroastrianism with later Christian perspectives is obvious.

Carved representation of Ahura Mazda from the Royal Audience Hall of Darius I (548 BCE–486 BCE) at Persepolis, Achaemenid dynasty. (Jupiterimages)

The Zoroastrian cosmology is derived from its scripture, the Avesta, a volume of approximately 1,000 pages. The oldest part of it consists of the Gathas, the hymns of Zarathustra, which are written in an ancient dialect known as Old Avestan. The original collection of the Avesta, known to have existed in the ninth century (two centuries after the Muslim takeover of Persia), included some 21 books. Much of the text was lost in subsequent years, the present text being the result.

In addition to the Avesta, Zoroastrians recognize a second level of holy writings that were written and compiled in the centuries of the Sassanian Persian Empire (third to seventh centuries CE). They are distinguished by being written in a later Persian dialect called Pahlavi. These texts include commentaries on the Gathas and summaries of the lost Avesta texts. Although the Pahlavi texts have an important role, the Avesta remains the primary sacred text.

Leadership in the Zoroastrian community is supplied by the priests, identified by their all-white clothing, a symbol of the high value placed on purity and cleanliness in Zoroastrian culture. They oversee the temples, at the center of which are the ever-burning fires, symbols of righteousness. Fire is a key reality in Zoroastrian life and culture. It symbolizes light and ties the believer to the heavens through the fiery lightning bolt—and acknowledges the importance that fire has had in the daily life of individuals, at least in pre-technological cultures. The Gathas speak of fire as the creation of Ahura Mazda and set fire as the superior symbol of divinity, as opposed to the idols, which it replaced. The primary fire is the Atash Bahram, which is created with special rituals of consecration and remains burning brightly in the primary hall of a temple. Lesser fires, the Atash-I-Aduran and the Dadgah, are used for minor rituals and as the center of space used for daily prayers.

Youth are initiated into the faith by passing through a simple ceremony that begins with learning a set of prayers. On the day of the ceremony, they engage in some purification rituals and don a sacred shirt. Performing ablution rituals will be a standard beginning to all sacred acts in the future. The heart of the rather brief ceremony is the reception of the sacred cord, called a kusti, from a priest. The cord is wrapped three times around the waist over the shirt, and then tied with a simple knot. The ceremony is like a wedding, a moment for general celebration by friends and relatives. The full member of the faith is expected to engage in prayer five times daily (similar to Muslim practice) before a fire. During the prayers, the kusti is untied and retied.

Among the important rituals to which Zoroastrians must periodically give attention are funerals. Rituals are designed to deal with the uncleanness of the body of the deceased and to assist the soul on its way. Traditionally, the body is placed on a high tower and its flesh devoured by vultures and the bones bleached by the Sun. Today, cremation is more common, especially in the West. The funeral is then directed toward the soul, which is believed to linger close by for three days. The funeral is done the day after the death, but the priests continue the rituals for the deceased for the next several days. The family joins in important good-bye activities on the fourth day. Commemoration of the deceased will continue monthly for the next year and then annually for the next 30 years at the annual ceremony for the dead. The day may be celebrated in the temple or in people's homes.

The annual acknowledgment of the deceased is just one holy day ritualized by Zoroastrians. The most important are the seven obligatory holy days that acknowledge the one God Ahura Mazda and the six Holy Immortals, No Ruz, or "New Day" (which celebrates the beginning of the year according to the Zoroastrian calendar), and the six gahambars, or days of obligation. Celebration of the gahambars is largely limited to the Iranian Zoroastrians today, among whom they are occasions for five-day festivals. Like other major religious communities, the Zoroastrians have their own calendar that has to be reconciled with the common solar calendar now used by the international community.

The movement of Zoroastrians to India beginning in the ninth century created two somewhat separated communities. Given their poverty and existence in a more-or-less hostile climate, there was little contact between them over the next centuries, and each community developed its own distinctive customs while trying to preserve its community and faith. Some changes came to the communities as they began to interact with the British in the 18th and 19th centuries. The rise of British power in India preceded the emergence of the Parsees as a well-to-do trading community. In the 18th century they had developed trading centers in the Orient (the history of which continues in the small Parsee community still found in Hong Kong).

As the British entered East Africa, Zoroastrians relocated to Zanzibar, Mombasa, and Nairobi, from where they expanded inland. By the mid-20th century, though remaining a somewhat separatist community culturally and religiously, they became prosperous, with members assuming leading roles in the business community and the professions. As decolonization proceeded, the Parsees were among the Asians who were viewed as having secured their position because of colonial advantages, and pressure came to bear on many to leave—especially during the regime of Idi Amin in Uganda. Rather than return to India, many Parsees relocated to the West. The largest community has emerged in London and its immediate environs, but scattered communities have also appeared across the United States and Canada, and more recently in Australia.

Meanwhile in India, the Parsee community had tended to shift from Gujarat southward toward Mumbai and into what is now Pakistan. The largest communities currently are in Mumbai and Karachi. In both countries, Parsees have become prominent business leaders and on occasion have appeared in important political posts.

The Zoroastrian community in Iran almost disappeared at the end of the 19th century, but through the 20th century it experienced a revival, growing fivefold. Zoroastrians have enjoyed guarantees of religious freedom articulated in the 1906 Constitution of Iran, and toleration under the post-1979 changes wrought by the Islamic revolution. They are expected to observe Islamic codes of public conduct. They are represented at the Majlis (Parliament) and serve in the armed forces. Furthermore, many members of these religions fought side by side with Moslem Iranians in the Constitutional Uprising of the late 19th century that finally resulted in the Constitution of 1906.

A visit by a group of Parsee priests to Iran in the late 1990s found that in spite of the revival, much was still lacking in the Iranian Zoroastrian community. The religion is, to put it bluntly, in shambles. There was no place where the major ritual ceremonies could be performed. None of the priests were holding the barashoom, the purification ceremony necessary to perform the “inner” rituals, which can be done only by a priest in the sacred space in the temple. There are fire temples in several cities, but some did not have the fires burning. The priests are largely uneducated, and many do not wear their priestly garb. Many laypeople do not wear the sacred shirt and cord. Although discouraged somewhat by what they had observed, the delegation held out hope for the continued revival and rebuilding of the Iranian community with assistance from India and the West.

Currently, Zoroastrians may be seen as divided into two primary communities, one based in Iran and the other in India, with both communities represented by diaspora communities in Africa and the West. The communities are further divided by what might be seen as traditionalist and modernist wings. The latter group has adapted to life in urban centers and the modern West. Traditionalists adhere with more strictness to older rituals and prayer life, and pay attention to the laws of purity relative to women in their menstrual cycle and the bodies of the dead (traditionally there were people set apart as unclean whose job was to handle corpses). They eschew cremation and demand disposal of corpses by carrion birds and the sun. They do not sanction marriage outside the faith, and do not engage in attempts to convert others to Zoroastrianism.

In the West several organizations have arisen to serve the Zoroastrian community. In 1980 an international group of Zoroastrian leaders founded the World Zoroastrian Organization, based in London, out of an expressed desire especially among diaspora Zoroastrians for an international structure to protect, unite, and sustain what is a very small community, almost invisible in the pluralistic West. In North America, where many Parsees migrated after 1965, a number of local Zoroastrian associations were established. In 1987 a number of these associations came together to create the Federation of Zoroastrian Associations of North America. Many of these associations, representative of the more modernist trends in the Western Zoroastrian community, also support the World Zoroastrian Organization. There are several local associations of Iranian Zoroastrians in North America, primarily along the Canadian and U.S. west coasts.

As early as 1962, a World Zoroastrian Congress was held in Tehran, Iran. Successive congresses have been held irregularly, the ninth meeting having been in Dubai in 2009.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Zoroastrian Organization.

References

- Boyce, Mary. A History of Zoroastrianism. 3 vols. Leiden: Brill, 1975, 1982, 1991.
- Boyce, Mary. Zoroastrians: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Geldner, K. Avesta: The Sacred Books of the Parsis. 3 vols. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer, 1986.
- Hinnells, John R. Zoroastrians in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon, 1996.
- Kriwaczek, Paul. In Search of Zarathustra: Across Iran and Central Asia to Find the World's First Prophet. New York: Vintage, 2004.

Nigosian, S. A. The Zoroastrian Faith: Tradition and Modern Research. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1993.

Writer, R. Contemporary Zoroastrians: An Unstructured Nation. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1994.

Zulu Religion

The Zulu people are one of the Bantu groups that migrated into what is now South Africa at some unknown point in the last two millennia. They date their own origin myth from a chief named Malandela, who had a son named Zulu who became the head of his own clan. He brought his clan to the Mfolosi Valley, north of the Thuleka River in present-day Natal. The Zulu people then entered into history with the emergence generations later of Shaka (1785–1828). A remarkable leader, Shaka reorganized the Zulus and turned them into a notable military force. His kingdom eventually covered some 11,000 square miles of territory. The British attacked the Zulu kingdom in 1879, captured the chief, Cetshwayo, and sent him into exile. In 1897, Zulu land was annexed and passed to the newly created Union of South Africa. The Zulu were pushed into a small “reserve” while most of their land was settled by whites.

The Zulu trace their ancestry to Inkosi Yezulu, the Sky God, also known as Umvelinqangi. The male Sky God and his female counterpart, Earth, brought forth the people, Abantu, though the exact process of creation is not clear. Also important to the Zulu are the ancestral spirits, especially those of outstanding chiefs, local village headmen, and men, in that order. The departed souls of the ancestors are known collectively as the amalozi or amathinga, and are pictured as residing in the earth but still having an active role in the life of their present progeny.

Various ritual figures are designated to assist the process of relating positively to the spirit world. At each village, the headman (umnumzane) serves as both secular and religious leader. He serves as priest, focusing the devotion of his people to the ancestors, and he symbolizes the chief's ancestors to the people. He is present at almost all ritual occasions. Diviners, most often women, deal with human problems by using their divinatory skills to find the cause of the problem. They work hand-in-hand with an herbalist (usually a man) who prescribes the cure once the problem is found. Herbalists are usually specialists in either medicine (izinyanga zemithi) or healing (izinyanga zokwelapha). Zulu medicine today is a mixture of traditional healing practices and Western medicine. Finally, attention to the ritual chores is completed by the izinyanya zezula, a specialist in relating to the sky, a function that evolved in part because of the thunderstorms that are important in local weather.

Less formally active in Zulu religion are the sorcerers, often herbalists who also have a knowledge of magic, though anyone may be a sorcerer. The sorcerer uses magic to redress a grievance. Finally, there is the witch, a person, usually believed to be female, who is thought to be living a concealed existence in the village. The witch is one who uses magic for evil and inappropriate ends. The witch is judged to be present by the manifest evil consequences of her actions.

Ritual activity for the Zulu happens most frequently in the circular villages called kraals, typically built on the side of a hill with the entrance facing down the slope. In the center of the kraal are the very important cattle herds. On the west side, at the highest point in the kraal, is the home of the headman, and adjacent to his house is the umsamo, the most important ritual center for the community. The umsamo is the place for communing with the ancestors. The surrounding hills of Zulu land (those unoccupied by kraals) provide the sites for special rituals, including those that invoke the Sky God.

Most Zulu ritual is about power (amandla), its use (and misuse). Power is derived from the Sky God, the ancestors, and medicine. Ritual connects with the source of the power that sustains life and creates order. Witches, of course, pervert the power.

Today's 4 million (some estimate as many as 6 million) Zulu live across South Africa, but they are concentrated in Kwazulu, the name of the old reserve. The royal house originally established by Shaka still exists, and the Zulu nation's current king is Zwelithini Goodwill KaCyprian Bhekuzulu. At various points in the 20th century, the Zulu king was an important voice challenging South Africa's racial policies.

Christian missions were first established among the Zulu in the 19th century, and today many Zulu mix life as a member of a Christian church with traditional rituals and varying levels of belief. Out of the conflict between Christianity and traditional beliefs have come some new African Initiated Churches, the Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church being the most prominent.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancestors; Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church; Witchcraft.

References

- Berglund, Axel-Ivar. Zulu Thought-patterns and Symbolism. London: C. Hurst, 1976.
- Hexham, Irving. Texts on Zulu Religion: Traditional Zulu Ideas About God. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1988.
- Lawson, E. Thomas. Religions of Africa. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1985.
- Von Kapff, Uli. Zulu: People of Heaven. Cape Town: Holiday Africa, 1997.
- "Zulu Information and Links." <http://www.zulupage.co.za/index-ien.html>, Accessed November 1, 2001.

Zwemer, Samuel Marinus

1867–1952

Samuel Marinus Zwemer was a pioneer Protestant missionary in the Middle East, author, and missiologist scholar. He opened the first Protestant churches in several Middle Eastern countries and finished his career as a prominent theorist of the Christian missionary enterprise.

Zwemer was born April 12, 1867, in Vriesland, Michigan. He graduated from Hope College (A.B., 1887) and New Brunswick Theological Seminary (M.A., 1890). Following graduation he was ordained as a minister in the Reformed Church in America by the Pella (Iowa) Classis.

Before his graduation, Zwemer joined fellow student James Cantine in a decision to become missionaries. They had been inspired by bicycle racing champion Ion Keith-Falconer (1856–1887), who had left his affluent life to master Arabic and open a small mission in Aden, Yemen. He died of malaria soon after he settled into his work. The pair decided to concentrate their efforts on the Middle East and become missionaries to the Islamic world. They were initially unable to find any agency willing to sponsor them, and as a result founded a new independent organization, the American Arabian Mission. Only in the mid-1890s, after they had launched their work, did the Reformed Church agree to sponsor the Mission.

Zwemer began his career in 1890 in Beirut, where he began to master Arabic and then moved on to Aden, where he found that the Church of Scotland had assumed sponsorship of the Keith-Falconer mission. It accepted Zwemer's assumption of the late missionary's position. Among his first tasks was the formation of a hospital. Within a few years the Reformed Church added its resources, enabling Zwemer to open additional hospitals in Bahrain, Kuwait, Muscat (Oman), and Basrah (Iraq). Operating in an atmosphere where direct proselytization was prohibited, maintaining the hospitals and operating associated bookrooms from which Bibles and Christian literature could be distributed became the main job of the Mission.

In Iraq in 1896, Zwemer met Anglican missionary Amy Elizabeth Wilkes. They were wed shortly thereafter and made their home in Bahrain. Zwemer wrote his first book, Arabia: Cradle of Islam, in 1900. In 1911 he would become the founding editor of The Moslem World, a quarterly journal that filled a significant information gap for English-speaking scholars. He would continue his editing task for 37 years. In 1913, Zwemer moved his headquarters to Egypt, where he remained until 1929.

When he returned to the United States in 1929, Zwemer was acknowledged by all as the foremost authority on the Christian missionary enterprise in the Muslim world. He accepted a position as the professor of history of religions and Christian missions at Princeton Theological Seminary. He remained at Princeton for the next decade, during which time he wrote the bulk of his more than 50 books he produced during his career. He retired in 1939. He lived in New York City, where he remained active in writing, editing and teaching for another decade. He died in New York City on April 2, 1952, still dealing with the problem of how Christians could effectively evangelize within the Muslim context.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church in America.

References

Wilson, J. Christy. Apostle to Islam: A Biography of Samuel M. Zwemer. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1952.

Zwemer, Samuel M. Across the World of Islam. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company, 1939.

Zwemer, Samuel M. Arabia: The Cradle of Islam. New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1900.

Zwemer, Samuel M. The Cross Above the Crescent: The Validity, Necessity and Urgency of Missions to Moslems. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1941.

Zwemer, Samuel M. Evangelism Today: Message Not Method. New York: Fleming H. Revell, 1944.

Zwemer, Samuel M. The Influence of Animism on Islam: An Account of Popular Superstitions. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1920.

Index

- Abbasids, 463, 855, 1497, 1521, 2608, 2788, 2789, 2903
- Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud, 3–4, 3 (image)
- Abd-al-Wahhab, Mohammad ibn, 3083, 3084
- Abduh, Muhammad, 4–5, 19, 20
- Abeel, David, 5–6
- Abell, Theodore, 1365
- Aboriginal cult. See Lionza, Maria, Aboriginal cult of
- Aboriginal religions, 8–10, 9 (image) and Aboriginal artwork, 9–10 and the Dreaming cosmology, 8 and knowledge of the law, 8–9 response of Aboriginals to Christianity, 9
- Abraham/Abram, 10–13, 12 (image), 1594
Genesis account of, 10–11 status of in Islam, 11–12
- Abraham, K. E., 681
- Abu Bakr, 76, 348
- Abu Hanifa, 13
- Abyssinia. See Ethiopia
- AD2000 and Beyond Movement, 14–15
criticism of, 15
- Adamski, George, 2917
- Adejobi, Adeleke, 716
- Adidam (Adidam Ruchiradam), 15–16
alternate names of, 16
- Adler, Cyrus, 781–782
- Advent, 16–18, 17 (image)
- Adventism, 18–19, 18 (image)
- Afghani, Jamal al-Din al-, 4, 19–20, 1525–1526
- Afghanistan, 20–24, 21 (image), 22 (map), 23 (table), 1522
Buddhism in, 22–23
Christianity in, 22
- Indians (Sikhs and Hindus) living in, 21
- influence of the Taliban in, 21
- intervention of the United States in, 23
- Jews in, 22
- Northern Alliance of, 21
- presence of al-Qaeda in, 23
- relationship with the Soviet Union, 20–21
- Africa Inland Church, 24–25
- Africa Inland Mission (AIM), 24, 777, 1627, 2815
- African Apostolic Church, 34
- African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange (AACJM), 25–26, 25 (image)
- African Brotherhood Church (ABC), 26–27
- African Church, Nigeria, 28
- African Church of the Holy Spirit, 28–29
- African Greek Orthodox Church, 42
- African Independent Pentecostal Church (AIPC), 29–30
- African Initiated (Independent) Churches (AICs), 26, 27, 30–36, 31 (image), 33 (image), 35 (image), 48, 136, 338, 645, 812, 1210–1211, 1781, 2012
- African/Ethiopian churches, 33–34
in Botswana, 2702–2703
different types of, 30–33
in Ghana, 2699–2700
in Kenya, 2115–2116, 2700–2702
- Pentecostal/Charismatic churches, 35–36
in Rwanda, 2485
- spirit/prophet-healing churches, 34–35
- in Togo, 2877
- in Zambia, 3177
- in Zimbabwe, 3187
- African Israel Church, Nineveh (African Israel Nineveh Church [AINC]), 36–37
- African Methodist Episcopal Church (AMEC), 37–39, 38 (image), 40
- African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (AMEZ), 39–41
- African Orthodox Church (AOC), 29, 41–43
- African Protestant Church, 43
- African traditional religions, 43–50 creation myths of, 44, 45–46
and dynamism (power and power specialists), 46–48 spirituality of (ancestors and the spirit world), 48–50 and theism (concept of God and of lesser divinities), 44–46
- Aga Khan, 1334 (image), 1335, 1491, 1534
- Agassiz, Louis, 821–822
- Agca, Ali, 1104
- Agnosticism, 50–51, 50 (image), 2943
- Agonshu, 51–53, 52 (image), 1568–1569
- Agrippa. See Nettesheim, Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa von
- Ahidjo, Alhaji Ahmadou, 484
- Ahmad, Hazrat Mirza Tahir, 47
- Ahmad, Mirza Ghulam Hazrat, 54–56, 55 (image), 57, 2171
- Ahmadiyya Anjuman Islaat Islam Lahore, 56–57
- Ahmadiyya movement, 57–59, 58 (image), 2171–2172
- Aitken, Anne, 888

- Aitken, Robert, 887–888
- Aivanhov, Omraam Mikhael, 59–60
- Ajahn Chah, 403
- Akbar, 1327, 1403–1404
- Akinola, Peter Jasper, 691 (image)
- Akinsowon, Abiodun, 545
- Akinyele, Isaac Babalola, 602
- Aladura churches, 60–61, 61 (image), 601
- Alamino, Jaime Lucas Ortega y, 834
- Al-Azhar University, 948
- Albania, 61–65, 62 (image), 64 (map), 65 (table), 313 current government policy toward religion, 65
 Muslims in, 62–63
 rebirth of religions in after the fall of Marxism, 63–65
 Roman Catholicism in, 63
- Alchemy, Daoist, 67–69, 68 (image)
- Aleph. See Aum Shinrikyô/Aleph
- Alevism, 69–72, 70 (image) and heterodox dervishes, 70 oral tradition of, 71 and the synthesis of Turkish culture, 70 and the term Alevi, 69
- Alexander, Daniel William, 29, 42
- Alexander the Great, 945, 1247, 1408 (image), 1497, 2803
- Algeria, 72–76, 73 (image), 74 (map), 75 (table)
 Christianity in, 73–74
 Coptic churches in, 75
 Islam as the state religion in, 75
 Jews in, 73
 Muslim influence in, 72–73
 Roman Catholicism in, 74–75
- Ali, Maulawi Muhammad, 56
- Ali ibn Abi Talib, 76–77 courage of at the Battle of Badr, 76 murder of, 77
- ‘Alí-Muhammad of Shiraz, 260
See also Birth of the Báb
- All Africa Conference of Churches (AACC), 77–78
- All Ceylon Buddhist Congress, 78–79, 78 (image)
- Allen, Richard, 37–38, 38 (image), 39, 40
- Alliance World Fellowship, 80
- Allred, Rulon C., 714, 2270
- Altered states of consciousness (ASC), 80–85, 81 (image), 83 (image), 83 (table)
 Husserl’s view of, 81–82 mystical experience, 84–85 operational mode of consciousness, 82–84 problem of studying altered states, 80, 82 and reflection, 84
 “subjective ontology” of, 50–81
- Amarnath, 85–86, 86 (image)
- Ambedkar, B. R., 86–87, 423
- Ambedkar Buddhism, 86–88
- American Baptist Association, 89–90
- American Baptist churches, 90–93, 91 (image)
 General Baptists, 91
 Primitive Baptists, 91
 Separate Baptists, 91 and the slavery issue, 91–92
- American Baptist Home Mission Society (ABHMS), 287, 289
- American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM), 6, 93–94, 1908–1909
- American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC), 3129–3130
- American Samoa, 94–97, 94 (image), 95 (map), 96 (table)
- Amin, Idi, 2920
- Amish, 97–98, 97 (image)
- Amitabha Buddhist societies, 98–99
- Amitabha’s Birthday, 100–101
- Amman, Jacob, 97
- Amuri Free Church, 789, 791
- An Najaf, 101–102, 102 (image)
- Anabaptism, 103–104, 221–222
See also Hutterites
- Ananda Marga Yoga Society, 104–105, 104 (image)
- Anastasios (archbishop), 66
- Ancestors, 105–109, 106 (image) ancestral rituals, 106–107
 Christian responses to, 108 commemoration of, 107 ethical systems concerning, 107 and reincarnation, 105–106 social aspects of, 107–108 stories concerning, 107
- Ancient Church of the East, 110–111, 153
- Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), 109–110, 2605–2606
- Anderson, Rufus, 2855, 2856
- Andhra Evangelical Lutheran Church, 111–112
- Andorra, 112–114, 112 (image), 113 (map), 113 (table)
- Andrew, J. J., 604
- Andrews, J. N., 2588
- Angels, 114–118, 115 (image)
 in the Bible, 116
 earliest references to (Babylonian), 114
 Egyptian and Roman angels, 115 in Greek religion, 115
 in Indian religious traditions, 115–116
 Islamic teaching concerning, 116–117 relationship between Hebrew and Zoroastrian angelology, 114–115
- Anger, Kenneth, 700
- Angkor Empire, 481–482
- Angkor Wat, 118–120, 119 (image)
- Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia, 120–121
- Anglican Church of Australia, 122–123
- Anglican Church of Canada (ACC), 123–125
- Anglican Church of Hong Kong and Macao, 125–126, 126 (image)
- Anglican Church in Japan, 121–122
- Anglican Church of Kenya, 126–127
- Anglican Church of Korea, 127
- Anglican Church of North America, 127–129 and the issue of homosexuality, 128
- Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council, 129–131, 130 (image)
- Anglican Diocese in Angola, 131
- Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America, 132
- Angola, 132–136, 133 (image), 134 (table), 135 (map)
 Christianity in, 134–135
 indigenous religions of, 134
 Methodism in, 135–136
- Anguilla, 136–139, 137 (image), 138 (map), 139 (table)

- Anim, Peter, 698
 Animism, 43, 1368, 3060–3061
 Ansgar, 1049
 Antarctica, 140
 Anthroposophical Society, 140–142,
 141 (image)
 Antigua and Barbuda, 143–146,
 143 (image), 144 (table),
 145 (map)
 Anti-Semitism, 1600–1601
 Aoko, Gaudensia, 1706
 Apostles of Infinite Love, 146–147
 Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ (U.S.A.), 147–151, 2697 national leaders of, 150
 Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, 110–111, 151–153,
 152 (image), 1495, 1499
 Apostolic Church, 153–155
 Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus
 Christ of Mexico, 155–159, 2697
 Apostolic Faith, 159–160, 159 (image)
 Apostolic Faith Mission, 160–161
 Apostolic Faith Mission of South
 Africa, 161–162, 161 (image)
 Apostolic Sabbath Church of God,
162–163
 Apostolic World Christian Fellowship,
163
 Appenzeller, Ella J. D., 1649, 1655
 Appenzeller, Henry G., 1649, 1655
 Appiah, Joseph W. E. (Prophet Jemiseham Jehu-Appiah),
 1993
 Aquinas, Thomas, 638, 1232, 1934, 2852–2855
 appropriation of Aristotle’s metaphysics, 2554–2555
 contemporary view of, 2854–2855
 education of, 2853
 primary philosophical/theological work of, 2853–2854
 Aquino, Michael, 700
 Arab American Oil Company
 (ARAMCO), 4
 Ararat, Mount, 163–165, 164 (image)
 Arcane School, 165–167
 Arès Pilgrims, 167–168
 Argentina, 168–178, 168 (table),
 169 (image), 171 (map),
 173 (image)
 Buddhism, Hinduism, and Baha’i religions in, 177 charismatic groups in (Charismatic Revival Movement [CRM]),
 175–176
 diversity of population in,
 168–169
 Eastern Orthodox communities in,
 170
 Great Argentine Revival, 176
 Jewish community in, 176–177
 military dictatorship in, 172–173
 Protestantism in, 174–175
 Roman Catholicism in, 169–170,
 173–174
 Western Esoteric groups in,
 177–178
 Arias, Mortimer, 1069
 Aristotle, 1231 (image), 1232,
 2554–2555, 2843, 2854, 3100
 Arius, 178–180, 179 (image), 228,
 635, 2096
 Armenia, 180–186, 180 (image),
 181 (table), 182 (map)
 Armenian presence in Ukraine,
 2928
 Christianity in, 182–183
 devastation of by war and ethnic cleansing, 181
 diversity of religions in, 184 occupation of by different empires and countries, 181–182 religion in under Soviet occupation, 184–185
 under the Ottoman Empire,
 183–184
 Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin), 186–188,
 187 (image)
 Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia),
188–189
 Armenian Catholic Church, 189–191,
 190 (image)
 Arminius, Jacob, 191–192,
 192 (image), 479–480, 1864,
 2319, 2407, 3096
 Armstrong, Garner Ted, 681–682
 Armstrong, Herbert W., 19, 406,
 681–682, 1733, 2249–2250,
 2972, 3145, 3146
 Army of Mary, 193–194
 excommunication of by the Vatican, 194
 Arnold, Eberhard, 651
 Arnold, Gottfried, 194–196
 Arnold, Heini, 651
 Arnott, Carol, 2884, 2885
 Arnott, John, 2884, 2885
 Aro gTér, 196
 Arsha Vidya Gurukulam, 196–197
 Art of Living Foundation, 197–199,
 198 (image)
 concept of health developed by,
 198–199
 Arthur (King Arthur), 1218, 1219
 Arthur, Chester A., 469
 Artigas, José Gervasio, 3025–3026
 Aruba, 199–202, 200 (image),
 201 (map), 201 (table)
 Arunachala (Sanskrit [Tiruvanamalai in Tamil]), 202–203
 Arya Samaj, 203–205, 204 (image)
 Asbury, Francis, 40, 2989, 3095 Ascension Day (Feast of the Ascension), 205, 924
 Asceticism, 205–209
 advanced practices of, 207
 Indian asceticism, 206
 priestly and warrior asceticism, 207–208
 rewards gained through, 208
 varieties of religious asceticism, 206–207
 Ashmole, Elias, 1146
 Ashoka, 209–210, 422–423, 424,
 2082
 Ashura, 210–212, 211 (image)
 Assemblies of God (AG), 212–214,
 213 (image), 271, 455, 837,
 1274, 2992
 in Panama, 2182–2183, 2185
 in Togo, 2877
 in Tonga, 2882
 in Venezuela, 3058
 Assemblies of God in Brazil, 214
 Assemblies of God in El Salvador,
 961–962
 Assemblies of God Incorporated,
214–217
 Assemblies of Yahweh, 217–218
 Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand, 218–219
 Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE), 219–220,
 220 (image)
 Association of Baptist Churches in Rwanda, 220–221

- Association of Evangelical Reformed Churches in Burkino Faso, 221
- Association of German Mennonite Congregations, 221–223, 222 (image)
- Association of Protestant Churches and Institutions in Algeria, 75–76
- Association The Church of God, 223
- Astrology, 223–226, 224 (image), 2068 contemporary astrology, 224–225
 definition of, 223–224
 Hindu astrology, 226–227
 practitioners of, 224 reputation of in contemporary society, 225–226 techniques for predicting the future through, 225
- Ataturk, Mustafa Kemal, 71
- Athanasius, 228–229, 228 (image), 635
- Atheism, 229–231, 2938–2941 impact of in the 20th century, 230–231
 Marxism as a form of, 230
 in the United States, 88–89, 88 (image)
- Athens, 231–235, 232, 1247 in the Christian era, 232–233 in the era of Greek independence, 233–234 in the Muslim era, 233
 in the Pagan era, 231–232
- Athos, Mount, 235–236, 235 (image)
- Atisha, 236–237, 429, 576
- Atkinson, William Walker, 3158–3159
- Atlan Khan, 1935, 1937
- Aubrey, 2753
- Augsburg Confession, 1754
- Augustine of Hippo, 237–239, 237 (image), 318, 1232, 1932, 2137, 2554 conflicts with Pelagius and Julian, 238 initial attraction to Manicheanism, 237 internal transformation of, 237–238
 refutation of the Donatists, 238
- Augustinians, 239–240
- Aum Shinrikyō/Aleph, 240–242, 241 (image), 1570 use of biological weapons by, 241
- Aumist Religion, 242–243
- Australia, 243–248, 244 (image), 245 (table), 246 (map)
 Aboriginal people of, 243
 British colonies in, 244
 Buddhism in, 247
 first settlers of, 244–245
 Hinduism in, 247
 Jewish presence in, 245, 247
 Protestantism in, 245
 Sikhism and Jainism in, 247
- Austria, 248–252, 248 (image), 249 (table), 250 (map)
 Buddhism in, 251
 religious freedom and diversity in, 249–250
 Roman Catholicism in, 248–249, 250–251
 under Nazi occupation, 250–251
- Austrian Buddhist Association, 252–253
- Avalos, Hector, 3067–3069
- Avatar Adi Da Samraj (b. Franklin Jones), 15
- Avebury, 253–254, 254 (image)
- Averroes, 638, 1232
- Avicenna, 19, 638, 1232
- Awang Alak Betatar, 413
- Ayatollah Khomeini, 1498
- Azerbaijan, 255–257, 255 (table), 256 (map)
 Christianity in, 257
 during Soviet occupation, 257
 Muslims in, 255
 secularization of, 257
- Azusa Street Mission, 154
- Azusa Street Pentecostal Revival, 155
See also Seymour, William J.
- Azzam, Abdullah, 1529
- Baal Shem Tov, 259–260, 1600
- Baba, Neem Karoli, 59
- Baba Ram Dass (b. Richard Alpert), 59
- Babalola, Joseph Ayo, 601
- Bábí Faith, 260
- Baha'í Faith, 96, 260–267, 262 (image), 265 (image), 395, 485–486, 557, 843, 1592 beliefs and practices of, 263–267 community of, 266 emphasis on human unity, 265–266
 in Ethiopia, 1006
 historical background of, 260–264 and individual devotional life, 267
 in Iran, 1492–1493
 national assemblies of, 263
 in Peru, 2243
 in Turkey, 2906–2907
 in Venezuela, 3060
See also Ridván, Festival of; Temples, Baha'í faith
- Bahamas, 267–273, 268 (table), 269 (map), 271 (image)
 Assembly of God in, 271–272
 as a British colony, 268
 Methodism in, 270
 as part of the British Commonwealth of independent nations, 268–269
 Rastafarians in, 272 religious development in, 269–272
 Roman Catholicism in, 270–271
- Bahamas National Baptist Missionary and Education Convention, 273–274
- Bahá'u'lláh, 274–275
See also Birth of the Báb
- Bahrain, 275–277, 275 (image), 276 (table), 277 (map)
 Christianity in, 276–277
 Islam in, 276
- Bailey, Alice Ann, 165–166, 277–278, 2069
- Bailey, Foster, 166
- Baker, Shirley W., 2881–2882
- Balfour, Arthur James, 1601
- Balim Sultan, 311
- Balkans, the, 942, 2577
- Ballard, Edna, 728
- Ballard, Guy Warren, 728, 2606
- Ballestrero, Anastasio Alberto, 3020
- Balogh, Lajos, 294
- Bamba, Ahmadou, 1991–1992, 2572
- Banda, Hastings Kamazu, 1780
- Banderas, Pedro, 149
- Bangladesh, 278–282, 279 (table), 280 (image), 281 (map), 2171
 Anglicans in, 280
 Baptists in, 279–280
 Hindu and Buddhist presence in, 281–282
 Lutheranism in, 280
 Roman Catholicism in, 279
- Bangladesh Baptist Sangha, 282
- al-Banna, Hassan, 1994, 1995 (image)

- Baptism, 507, 603, 615, 675, 676, 795 adult baptism, 601, 1142
 of the Holy Spirit, 541, 550, 621, 678, 747, 808 by immersion, 603, 603, 611, 689, 712 infant baptism, 507, 601
- Baptist Association of El Salvador, 282–283, 283 (image)
- Baptist Bible Fellowship International, 283–285, 284 (image)
- Baptist Convention of Haiti, 285–286, 285 (image)
- Baptist Convention of Hong Kong, 286
- Baptist Convention of Kenya, 286–287
- Baptist Convention of Nicaragua, 287–288, 287 (image)
- Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, 288–289
- Baptist Convention of Western Cuba, 289–290
- Baptist Missionary Society (BMS), 292, 293, 508, 643, 692, 1017
- Baptist Union of Denmark, 290–291
- Baptist Union of Great Britain, 291–293, 292 (image)
- Baptist Union of Hungary, 293–294
- Baptist Union of New Zealand, 294–296
- Baptist Union of South Africa/Baptist Convention of South Africa, 296–297
- Baptist World Alliance, 297, 299
- Baptists, 27, 64, 135, 185, 214, 218, 297–299, 298 (image), 347, 352, 368, 378, 391, 409, 449, 458, 486, 531–532, 732, 1160
 in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Zaire), 776–777 Free Will Baptists, 192
 in Honduras, 1351, 1352
 in Jamaica, 1559
 in Kazakhstan, 1623
 in Kyrgyzstan, 1673–1674
 in Latvia, 1690–1691
 in Lebanon, 1703
 in Moldova, 1924–1925
 in Panama, 2183–2184
 in the Republic of Korea, 1649
 in Serbia, 2579
 in Sierra Leone, 2625–2626
 in Uzbekistan, 3038–3039
See also American Baptist churches
- Baradeus, Jacob, 2793
- Barbados, 300–305, 300 (table), 301 (image), 302 (map)
 Anglicanism in, 302–303
 Buddhism in, 304
 Free church denominations in, 303 highly religious society of, 301–302
 Jewish community in, 304
 post-Protestant Christian groups in, 303–304 religious affiliations in, 301
- Barbour, Ian, 2551
- Barnabas, 1231
- Barrett, Thomas B., 154
- Barth, Karl, 619
- Barton, Blanche, 700
- Bascio, Matteo de, 505–506
- Basel Mission, 305–306
- Basilica of Our Lady of Peace of Yamoussoukro, 306–307, 306 (image)
- Basilica of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Aparecida, 307–309, 308 (image)
- Batak Christian Community Church, 309
- Bateh Berbai, 413
- Bates, Joseph, 2490, 2588
- Bazzy, Connie Fillmore, 3012
- Bear Butte, 309–311, 310 (image)
- Becker, Carl, 1233–1234
- Becker, Peter, 711
- Becket, Thomas à, 501, 674
- Bedward, Alexander, 1561
- Bektashi Order (Bektashiye), 311–313 division of into two branches (Babayan and Celebiyan), 311–312 hierarchy of, 312
 history of, 312–313
- Belarus, 313–317, 314 (table), 315 (image), 316 (map)
 Baptists in, 315–316
 Christianization of, 313
 Islam in, 317
 Jews in, 317
 Lutheranism in, 315
 Roman Catholicism in, 314
 Russian Orthodox Church in, 314 in the Soviet era, 314
- Bektash, Haji, 311
- Belgian Protestant Missionary Society, 2484–2485
- Belgium, 317–321, 318 (image), 319 (table), 320 (map)
 independence of, 319–320
 Protestantism and Roman Catholicism in, 320
 secularization of, 321
 under Austrian and French rule, 319
 under Spanish rule, 317–318
- Belize, 321–332, 322 (table), 323 (map)
 Anabaptist and Mennonite groups in, 328–329
 Assemblies of God in, 329–330
 Church of the Nazarene in, 328 high literacy rates in, 322
 Islamic community in, 331
 Jewish community in, 331
 Mennonites in, 322
 non-Christian religious groups in, 330–331
 Pentecostal churches in, 329
 Protestant movements in, 326–330
 Roman Catholicism in, 322, 324–326
 slavery in, 324
- Belize Association of Evangelical Churches, 330
- Bena, David J., 128
- Benade, William H., 1186
- Benares, 332–333, 332 (image)
- Bene Israel, 333–334, 739, 1405–1406
- Benedict of Nursia, 334
- Benedict XI (pope), 2585
- Benedict XII (pope), 735
- Benedict XVI (pope), 133 (image), 1103, 1709 (image), 2166, 2442
- Benedictines, 334–336, 335 (image), 1134 destructive effect of the Protestant Reformation on, 335
- Bengal Orissa Bihar Baptist Convention, 336
- Benin, 337–339, 337 (image), 338 (table), 338 (map)
 and the African Initiated Churches (AICs), 338–339
 Islam in, 337–338
 Methodism in, 338
 traditional religion in, 337
- Benincasa, Ursula, 1822

- Bennett, Dennis, 541
 Bennett, Malchus B., 329
 Bennett, Mrs. Malchus B., 329
 Bentley, Todd, 2885
 Berg, David Brandt, 1099–1101
 Berger, Peter L., 1922
 Bermuda, 339–341, 340 (map),
 341 (table)
 Presbyterians in, 339–340
 religious variety in, 340–341
 Roman Catholicism in, 340
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 735
 Bernard, Pierre, 3159
 Bernard, Raymond, 110
 Bernhardt, Oskar Ernst (Abd-ru-shin), 1237
 Berry, L. L., 39
 Bershadskii, Rodion G., 1673
 Besant, Annie, 341–343, 342 (image),
 356–357, 2069, 2845, 2846, 2849
 Besant, Frank, 341
 Bessarabian Orthodox Church, 1924
 Beta Israel, 343–344, 1006
 Beza, Theodore, 480, 703
 Bhagavad Gita, 979, 1329, 1419–1420
 Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh. See Osho
 Bhaktivinoda, Kedarnath Datta, 1179
 Bhikhan, Muni, 2834
 Bhutan, 345–347, 345 (image),
 346 (table), 346 (map)
 Drukpa Kagyu branch of Tibetan
 Buddhism in, 345–346
 Bible, the, 1015, 1292, 1293
 Hebrew Bible, the, 1593–1594 importance of among Indian
 Christians, 1402–1403
 Bible Sabbath Association, 347–348
 Biddle, Harry N., 666
 Bilal ibn Rabah, 348–349
 Billah, Ubayd Allah al-Mahdi, 463
 Billing, Einar, 709
 Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA), 1037 bin Laden, Osama, 23, 1529,
 1995–1996
 Birth, 349–352, 350 (image) origins of the child, 349 pregnancy and birth rituals, 249–350
 purity and pollution of the mother,
 350–351
 “Silent Birth,” 350
 welcoming the baby, 351–352
 Birth of the Báb, 352–353
 Birth/Ascension of Bahá’u’lláh,
 353–355
 Bitzer, Robert H., 2404–2405
 Biya, Paul, 484
 Black, William, 1889
 Blake, Charles Edward, 680
 Blau, Amram, 2065
 Blavatsky, Helena P., 341, 342,
 355–357, 356 (image), 729,
 1238, 2068, 2777, 3102
 See also Theosophical Society
 (Adyar); Theosophical Society (America)
 Blavatsky, N. V., 355
 Blyth, R. H., 887
 Boardman, George, 2002
 Boardman, Sara Hall, 2002
 Bock, Emil, 619
 Boddy, Alexander A., 153
 Bodh-Gaya, 357–358, 357 (image), 424
 Bodhidharma, 359
 Bodhisattva, 359–361, 360 (image), 421
 Bogard, Ben M., 90
 Bogomils, 376, 378, 447
 Böhler, Peter, 3095
 Bohm, David, 80
 Bohras, 361–362
 Bolívar, Simon, 7
 Bolivia, 362–371, 363 (table),
 364 (map), 366 (image),
 370 (image)
 Amerindians of, 362–363, 370
 divisions within Catholicism in, 366–67
 missionary societies in, 368
 National Revolutionary Movement
 (MNR) revolution (1952) in,
 363–364
 non-Christian religions in, 369 political divisions within, 364–365 religious diversity in, 367–368
 Roman Catholicism in, 365–366
 Seventh-day Adventism in, 368
 shrines and holy places in, 370–371
 Bolivian Evangelical Lutheran Church, 371–372
 Bokassa I (emperor of the Central African Empire), 531
 Bon religion, 372–374, 373 (image)
 as a form of Buddhism, 373
 Bond, Frederick Bligh, 1219
 Booth, William, 2516
 Borobudur, 374–375, 375 (image)
 Bosco, John, 2513, 2513 (image)
 Bosnia and Herzegovina, 376–378,
 376 (image), 377 (table),
 377 (map)
 Baptists and Nazarenes in, 378
 German occupation of and incorporation into Yugoslavia, 376, 378 modern Bosnian religions, 378
 Muslims in, 378
 under the Ottoman Empire, 376
 See also Medjugorje
 Botswana, 378–381, 379 (map),
 380 (table)
 Dutch Reformed Church of Botswana, 380
 independence of, 380
 Lutheranism in, 380
 Methodism in, 380
 Roman Catholicism in, 380
 Seventh-day Adventists in, 380–381
 traditional religions in, 380
 Bourdin, Gilbert, 242
 Boyd, R. H., 2034–2035
 Bradlaugh, Charles, 341–342,
 381–383, 382 (image)
 Brahma Kumaris World Spirituality
 University (BKWSU), 383–384,
 383 (image)
 Brahma Samaj, 384–385
 Braide, Garrick, 30, 60
 Branch Davidians, 385–387,
 386 (image)
 Branham, William Marrion, 387–388
 Branham Tabernacle and related assemblies, 387–388
 Bray, Thomas, 676, 982, 2655
 Brazil, 388–398, 389 (image),
 390 (table), 393 (map),
 396 (image)
 Assemblies of God in, 392–393
 Baha’i Faith in, 395
 Baptists in, 391
 Base Communities (CEBs) of,
 390–391
 Buddhism in, 395–396
 Catholic population of, 389, 390
 evacuation of Jews from, 200–201
 Hinduism in, 397
 mediumistic religions in, 394
 Methodists in, 392

- Orthodox Christianity in, 394
 Pentecostalism in, 392, 393–394
 Perfect Liberty religion in, 396
 Presbyterians in, 391
 Protestantism in, 391–392
- Brazil, Japanese religions in, 398–401, 399 (image) and the Dekasegi phenomena, 401 postwar situation, 399–400
 prewar situation, 398–399
 transnationalization of Japanese religions, 400–401
- Breeze, William, 2150
- Breese, Phineas F., 717–718
- Brethren, 401–402
- Brethren in Christ, 402–403
- Brethren of the Common Life, 2057–2058
- Brezhnev, Leonid, 257
- Bright, Bill, 487–488
- Brigman, Elijah Coleman, 6
- British East India Company, 1962, 1963
- British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), 3058
- British Forest Sangha, 403–404
- British Indian Ocean Territory (BIOT), 404–406, 405 (map), 406 (table)
- British Israelism, 406–407
- British Virgin Islands, 407–409, 408 (map), 408 (table)
 Anglicanism in, 406
 diversity of religions in, 408
 Methodism in, 407
 Roman Catholicism in, 407–408
- Brotherhood of the Cross and Star (BCS), 409–410, 409 (image)
- Brothers, Richard, 406
- Brown, George, 1878
- Bruce, F. F., 607
- Brunei, 410–412, 411 (map), 411 (table)
 Christianity in, 410
 Islam as the official religion of, 410 religious holidays in, 412
 religious organizations in, 412
- Brunei, Islam in, 413–415, 413 (image)
- Bryan, William Jennings, 821 (image), 823
- Bryant, Daniel, 732
- Bryn Athyn Cathedral, 1187 (image), 1188
- Buber, Martin, 1466, 1466 (image)
- Bucer, Martin, 477
- Buchanan, Archie, 68–681
- Buchman, Frank, 521–522
- Buckland, Raymond, 1175
- Buckland, Rosemary, 1175
- Budd, Henry, 123
- Buddha, Gautama, 51, 415–418, 416 (image)
 history of, 415–417
 questions concerning his birth date, 416
- Buddhasananuggaha Association, 418–419
- Buddhism, 247, 304, 373, 419–436, 420 (image), 423 (image), 427 (image), 432 (image), 649, 755, 767, 899, 1013, 2867
 in Australia, 432–433
 in Austria, 251
 in Brazil, 395–396
 Buddhist relics, 2391–2394
 Buddhist scriptures, 422 in Burma/Myanmar, 424
 in Cambodia, 425
 and the Cessation of Suffering, 420–421
 Chan Buddhism, 359
 in China, 425–426, 442, 560–561, 590–592 development and spread of, 422–424 enlightenment in, 977–978
 the “first turning of the wheel,” 420
 the Four Noble Truths of, 420, 421, 1393
 the “fourth turning of the wheel,” 422
 in France, 1132
 in India, 423, 442, 1392–1395
 in Indonesia, 1447–1450, 1448 (image) in Japan, 427–429, 1565–1566, 1659–1660, 2656–2659, 2657 (image)
 in Kenya, 1629
 in Korea, 427, 1646
 in Laos, 425, 1682, 1683
 in Malaysia, 1785
 monasticism in, 1929–1930, 1930 (image)
 in Myanmar, 1998–2000
 the Noble Eightfold Path of, 421
 in North America, 431–432
- number of adherents of (world-wide), 419 organizations involved in, 433–434 primary Buddhist traditions, 421–422
 in Singapore, 2639, 2641
 in South Africa, 433
 in Suriname, 2761
 in Taiwan, 426, 438–439, 573
 in Thailand, 424–25, 436–438, 437 (image), 2837–2838
 the “third turning of the wheel,” 422
 Tian Tai (Tendei) Buddhism, 100
 in Venezuela, 3060
 in Vietnam, 426–427
 in the West, 430–431
 women’s role in, 3117
- See also* Ambedkar Buddhism;
 Amitabha Buddhist societies;
 Angkor Wat; Bodh-Gaya;
 Bodhidharma; Bodhisattva; Bon religion, as a form of Buddhism;
 Diamond Way Buddhism;
 Drukpa Kagyu branch of Tibetan Buddhism; Eisai (Myoan Eisai); Fuguangshan; Fuji, Mount; Gelugpa; Guan Yin’s Birthday;
 Hoa Hao Buddhism; Hossoshu;
 Korean Buddhism; Lao Buddhist Sangha; Mahayana Buddhism;
 Mudras; Nalanda Pure Land Buddhism; Nara, six Buddhist schools of; Newar Buddhism;
 Pomun Order of Korean Buddhism; Shingon Buddhism;
 Shravakayana Buddhism; Soko Gakkai International; Tantric Buddhism; Temples, Buddhist;
 Theravada Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism; Unified Buddhist Church; Vajrayana Buddhism;
 Wesak; Won Buddhism; Young Men’s Buddhist Association (YMBA); Zen Buddhism
- Buddhist Association of Thailand, 436–438, 437 (image)
- Buddhist Association of the Republic of China (BAROC), 438–439
- Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, The, 439–440, 439 (image)
- Buddhist Institute, 440–441, 482

- Buddhist Missionary Society (BMS), 441–442
- Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia (BMSM), 441
- Buddhist Society, The, 442–443, 442 (image)
- Builders of the Adytum (BOTA), 443–444
- Bukhara, 444–445, 444 (image)
- Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai (BDK [Society for the Promotion of Buddhism]), 445–446
- Bulgaria, 446–450, 446 (image), 447 (table), 448 (map), 3104 changing borders of, 447
 Christianity in, 447
 Islam in, 449
 Jewish community in, 449
 non-Chalcedonian Orthodoxy in, 448
 Roman Catholicism in, 448–449
 under the Ottoman Empire, 447
- Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church, 450–451
- Bulgarian Catholic Church, 451
- Bulgarian Orthodox Church, 451–453, 452 (image)
- Buluku, Jakobo, 28
- Burkina Faso, 453–455, 453 (image), 454 (map), 455 (table)
 Assemblies of God in, 455
 Christianity in, 454–455
 Islam in, 454
 resistance of to both Christianity and Islam, 453
- Burnouf, Eugène, 430
- Burundi, 456–459, 456 (table), 457 (map)
 Anglicanism in, 458
 independence of, 456
 indigenous religions of, 456–457
 Protestantism in, 458
 Roman Catholicism in, 457–458
- Bush, George H. W., 1498
- Bush, George W., 102, 1499
- Butsuryushu, Honmon, 398
- Bwiti, 459–460, 459 (image)
- Byakko Shinko Kai, 460
- Byzantine Empire, 62, 181, 232–33, 234, 446, 447, 451, 638, 927, 941, 942, 2575, 2724–2725, 2788, 2903
- Byzantine Orthodox Christians, 249
- Caddy, Peter, 2607
- Cairo, 463–466, 464 (image)
 Christian presence in, 465–466
- Calendars, religious, 466–476, 467 (image) alternate religious calendars, 470
 Baha'i, 475–476
 Chinese, 473–474
 Common Era, 753–754
 Egyptian, 466–467
 Gregorian, 469, 1249, 3110
 Hebrew, 470–471
 Indian, 474–475
 Islamic, 471–472
 Julian, 468, 1249, 3110
 lunar, 2585
 Mayan, 1837–1839, 1838 (image)
 Middle Eastern, 467–468
 Nanakshahi, 475
 Roman, 468
 use of the old and revised Julian calendar by Orthodox churches, 469–470
 Zoroastrian, 476
- Calvin, John, 192, 477–479, 477 (image), 641, 703, 1020, 1106, 1141, 1232, 1748, 1948, 2285, 2781, 2997, 3096 doctrine of, 478
 and the execution of Servetus, 478, 2583, 2584, 2938
- Calvinism, 291, 318, 479–481, 1160, 1382, 1383 challenge of Arminius to, 479–480 five major tenets of, 480
- Cambodia, 481–484, 481 (image), 482 (map), 483 (table)
 Roman Catholicism in, 483
 Theravada Buddhism in, 481–482
- Cameroon, 484–487, 484 (table), 485 (map)
 Christianity in, 486
 Islam in, 485–486
- Cameroon Baptist Convention, 487
- Campbell, Alexander, 218, 603, 611, 732, 2997, 3129
- Campbell, Thomas, 218, 603, 611, 732, 3129
- Campus Crusade for Christ International, 487
- Canada, 488–493, 489 (table), 490 (image), 491 (map), 642, 1748–1749
 Christianity in, 489–490, 492
 independence of, 488–489
 Muslims in, 492
 political parties in, 489 religious diversity of, 492–493
See also Doukhobors; Quebec
- Canadian Baptist Ministries (CBM), 496–497
- Canadian Baptists of Western Canada (BUWC), 497–498
- Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), 498–499
- Candoblé, 499–500, 500 (image)
- Canterbury, 500–502, 501 (image)
- Caodaism, 502–503
- Cape Verde Islands, 503–505, 504 (map), 505 (table)
- Capra, Fritjof, 1438
- Capuchins, 249, 504, 505–507, 506 (image), 1136, 1137
 in Chad, 533–534
- Carey, William, 279–280, 292, 507–509, 507 (image), 643, 692, 705, 1079
 influence of Captain Cook on, 507–508
- Caribbean Conference of Churches, 509–510
- Carmelites, the, 2797
- Carroll, John, 1578
- Carter, Howard, 216
- Carter, John, 216
- Carter, Robert E., 1881
- Casarin, Roberto, 3020
- Castro, Fidel, 829, 831, 833, 2307
- Cathedral of Christ the Saviour, 510–511, 518–519
- Cathedral of Monreale in Sicily, 518 (image)
- Cathedral of St. Sava, 511–512, 512 (image), 513, 518
- Cathedrals—Christian, 512–519, 514 (image), 516 (image), 518 (image)
 Gothic cathedrals, 551 as places of pilgrimage, 514–515
 Romanesque cathedrals, 515 structure of, 514

- Catherine the Great, 2131, 2451, 2459–2460, 2474
- Catholic Apostolic Church, 519–520, 2072
- Catholic Charismatic Revival/Renewal (CCR), 173–174, 803–804, 1272, 1353–1354, 2182
- Catholic Counter-Reformation, 318
- Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany, 520–521
- Catholic Renewal Movement (CRM), 3029–3030
- Caunter, George, 722
- CAUX-Initiatives for Change, 521–523
- Caves of the Thousand Buddhas, 523
- Cayce, Edgar, 219–220, 220 (image), 2070
- Cayman Islands, 523–526, 524 (map), 525 (table)
 - Holiness churches in, 525
 - Presbyterianism in, 523, 525
- CBAmerica, 526
- Celebration of the Guru Granth Sahib, 526–527, 527 (image)
- Celestial Church of Christ (CCC), 527–529, 528 (image)
- Central American Mission (CAM) International, 960–961, 1273–1274, 1351
- Central African Republic (CAR), 24, 34, 529–532, 530 (map), 531 (table)
 - Baptists in, 531–532
 - independent African churches in, 532
 - Islam in, 531
- Chad, 532–534, 533 (map), 534 (table)
 - Capuchin missionaries in, 533–534
 - Protestant missionaries in, 534
- Chah, Ajaan, 2837
- Chaitanya, Shri Krishna, 535, 1327
- Chajang, 535–536
- Chaldean Catholic Church, 152, 536–538, 537 (image)
- Chand, Faqir, 1797–1798
- Chang, Barnabas, 2894
- Channel Islands, 538–540, 538 (table), 539 (map)
- Chapman, Percy T., 283
- Char Dham, 540
- Charismatic movement, 540–543, 645
- Charismatic Renewal Movement (CRM), 807–808
- Charles V (Holy Roman Emperor), 640, 641
- Charles V (king of Spain), 317–318
- Chartres Cathedral, 516
- Cheberuk, B. S., 316
- Chen Tao, 543–545, 543 (image)
- Cheng Yen, 439, 440
- Cheng Yi, 767
- Chernoff, Martin, 1862–1863
- Cherry Hill Seminary, 545
- Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim (C&S), 545–546
- Chia, Mantuk, 1314
- Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia, 546–547
- Chigaku, Tanaka, 1639–1640
- Chile, 547–559, 548 (image), 552 (map), 554 (table)
 - Baha'i Faith in, 557
 - Buddhism in, 557
 - Congregationalists missionaries in, 553, 554
 - Hinduism in, 557
 - Jewish community in, 557
 - Lutheranism in, 553
 - Methodism in, 554–555
 - minor Christian denominations in, 556–557
 - Muslims in, 557
 - Pentecostalism in, 555–556
 - Presbyterianism in, 554
 - Protestant movements in, 551, 553–556
 - Roman Catholicism in, 547, 549–551
 - Spanish conquest of, 547–548
- Chin Kung (Jing Kong), 98–99
- China, 559–565, 559 (image), 560 (table), 562 (map), 1444, 1645–1646, 2403
 - Buddhism in, 560–561, 564, 590–592
 - Christian missionaries in, 561
 - Daoism in, 569
 - folk religion in, 559–560
 - Islam in, 561
 - relationship with the Vatican, 564–565
 - religious policy under the Chinese Communist Party's leadership, 563–564, 594
- Roman Catholicism in, 561, 563
- See also* Chinese religions; Falun Gong; Foguangshan; Hong Kong; Lantern Festival (Chinese Lantern Festival); People's Republic of China (PRC), annexation of Tibet; True Jesus Church; Ullam-bana
- China Islamic Association, 577–578, 578 (image)
- Chinese Buddhist Association (CBA), 579–580, 579 (image)
- Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association (CCPA), 580–582, 581 (image)
- Chinese Daoist Association (CDA), 582
- Chinese New Year's Day, 582–584, 583 (image)
- Chinese New Year's Day (preliminary festival), 584–585
- Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council, 585–587
- Chinese religions, 587–595, 588 (image), 591 (image)
 - Chinese cosmology, 590
 - divination, sacrifice, and ancestor worship in the early dynasties, 587–589
 - early Confucianism, 589–590
 - literati and non-Confucianism as religions in, 592–593
 - popular religions, 593
 - sectarianism, 593
 - and the Yijing, 588–589
- Chinul, 595–596, 598–599
- Chishimba, Emilio Mulolani, 1997
- Chissano, Alberto Joachím, 1985–1986
- Chistiniyya Sufi Order, 596–598
- Chiyoko, Fukata, 980
- Cho, Paul David Yonggi, 3164–3165
- Chogye Order, 598–600, 599 (image)
- Chondogyo, 600–601
- Christ Apostolic Church, 601–602
- Christ Community Church of Zion/Christian Catholic Church, 602–603
- Christadelphians, 603–604
- Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA), 80, 604–605, 2696
 - in Ecuador, 938
 - in Jordan, 1592
- Christian Biblical Church, 606

- Christian Brethren, 606–611, 863 contributions to ecclesiological issues, 606 contributions to eschatology, 608 emphasis on Christian unity, 606–607, 607–608 emphasis on diverse gifts for ministry, 607
 in Honduras, 1351–1352
 permanent division of into “Closed” and “Opens,” 609
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), 611–612, 611 (image)
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada, 612–613
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Central Sulawesi, 613–614
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in East Timor. See Protestant Church in Timor Lorosa’e
- Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) of Sumba, 615–616
- Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, 616–617, 616 (image)
- Christian Churches of Java, 617–618, 618 (image)
- Christian Churches Together (CCT) in the U.S.A., 618–619
- Christian Community (Movement for Religious Renewal), 619–621, 620 (image)
- Christian Conference of Asia, 621
- Christian Congregation of Brazil, 621–622, 622 (image)
- Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow, 622–623
- Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera, 623–624
- Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa, 624
- Christian Evangelical Church in Timor. See Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor
- Christian Evangelical Church of Sangihe Talaud, 624–625
- Christian Holiness Partnership, 625–626
- Christian Life Churches International, 626
- Christian Methodist Episcopal Church (CMEC), 626–629, 627 (image), 628 (image)
- Christian Outreach Center, 629–630
- Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia, 630, 631 (image)
- Christian Reformed Church in North America, 631–632
- Christian Reformed Church of Brazil, 632–633
- Christian Scientist Association, 943
- Christianity, 9, 10, 26, 30, 31–32, 34, 36, 44, 47, 48, 54, 57, 60, 89, 111, 115, 142, 151, 179, 186, 206, 305, 335, 342, 351, 430, 451, 459, 500, 561, 573, 633–647, 634 (image), 637 (image), 651, 899, 1013, 2249, 2489, 2520–2521, 3100, 3007 adoption of the filioque clause, 637 in Athens, 232–233
 challenges facing, 646
 communal tradition of, 755–756 doctrinal development of, 635–636 drive toward reform in, 639–640 during the age of exploration, 642 early Christianity, 634–635
 in Egypt, 947
 evangelical Christianity, 487–488 future of, 645–646
 in Hong Kong, 566
 importance of corporate worship in, 1401
 in India, 1401–1403
 introduction of in Europe, 1759–1760
 in Iran, 1494–1495
 in Jamaica, 1558–1559
 in Japan, 1566, 1569–1570
 in Kazakhstan, 1623
 in Kenya, 1626
 in Kyrgyzstan, 1673
 in Laos, 1683–1684
 in Latvia, 1689–1690
 in Madagascar, 1766–1768
 in Malawi, 1780–1781
 in Malaysia, 1785–1787
 Maori Christianity, 1802–1803
 martyrdom and, 1816–1817
 in Mauritius, 1836
 in the Middle Ages, 636–638
 in Moldova, 1924
 in Mongolia, 1937–1938
 in Morocco, 1959–1960
 in Mozambique, 1983
 New Testament Christianity, 103, 608
 in Niger, 2102–2103
 in Nigeria, 2107
 and Protestant expansion, 642–643
 in Romania, 2432–2433
 in Qatar, 2352–2353
 in Saudi Arabia, 2547–2548 second millennium of, 638–639
 in Senegal, 2573
 in Serbia, 2577
 in Singapore, 2641
 in Somalia, 2664–2665
 in Suriname, 2757, 2759–2760
 in Sweden, 2770–2771
 in Syria, 2790
 in Tajikistan, 2805
 in Tanzania, 2814
 in Thailand, 2838–2840
 in Tunisia, 2899
 in Turkey, 2906
 in Turkmenistan, 2909–2910
 in the 20th century, 643–645
 in Uganda, 2920–2922
 in Uzbekistan, 3038–3039
 women’s role in, 3118–3119
 in Yemen, 3154
 in Zambia, 3176–3177
 in Zimbabwe, 3185, 3186, 3187–3188
See also Protestant Reformation; Protestantism; Spirituality, Christian
- Christmas, 647–649, 648 (image)
- Christmas Island, 649–651, 650 (map), 650 (table)
 Buddhism in, 649
 Christianity in, 651
- Church Communities International (CCI), 650–651
- Church in the Province of Melanesia, 652–653, 652 (image)
- Church in the Province of South Africa, 652–654, 653 (image)
- Church in the Province of Sudan, 654–655
- Church in the Province of Tanzania, 655–656, 656 (image)
- Church in the Province of West Indies, 656–658, 657 (image)
- Church in Wales, 658–659, 658 (image)

- Church Missionary Society (CMS), 643, 659–660, 676, 705, 723, 725, 985, 2173, 2571, 2626
- Church Missionary Society of Australia, 723
- Church of Bangladesh, 660–661, 660 (image)
- Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod), 661
- Church of Christ in Thailand, 662–663, 662 (image)
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Anglican Community of the Congo, 663
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Congo, 663–664
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Western Congo, 664–665
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo, 665–666
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Disciples of Christ, 666–667
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Light, 667
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Presbyterians, 668–669
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Evangelical Community, 669
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Mennonite Community, 669–670
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa, 670–671
- Church of Christ in the Congo—Protestant Baptist Church in Africa/Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa, 671
- Church of Christ, Scientist, 671–673, 672 (image), 943
publications of, 673
See also Eddy, Mary Baker
- Church of England (Anglican Church), 215, 244, 291, 298, 380, 545, 673–677, 674 (image), 835, 2980, 2985
in Anguilla, 139
in the Bahamas, 269–270, 272
in Barbados, 302–303
in Belize, 326
in Bermuda, 339
in Burundi, 458
decline of, 675, 676
in Dominica, 902
in Honduras, 1350–1351
in Jamaica, 1559
in Jordan, 1592
in Liberia, 1716
in Mauritius, 1836
in Oman, 2146–2147
and the ordination of women, 676–677
in Pakistan, 2173
in Panama, 2183
re-establishment of, 675–676
in the Republic of Korea, 1649
in St. Lucia, 2504
in Tonga, 2882
in Turkey, 2906
in the Virgin Islands, 407
See also Canterbury; Episcopal Church
- Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), 677–678
- Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), 678–679, 962
- Church of God in Christ (COGIC), 679–681
expansion of outside the United States, 680–681
- Church of God, International, 681–682
- Church of God of Prophecy, 682–693, 962–963
- Church of Ireland, 683–685, 684 (image)
- Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar, 685–686
- Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), 64–65, 96, 144, 176, 184, 202, 251, 252, 272, 281, 290, 303, 317, 330, 348, 368, 381, 394, 449, 686–689, 687 (image), 826–827, 1385, 1390, 2880 (image) in the Dominican Republic, 908 founding of, 687
in French Polynesia, 1154
in Mexico, 1905
in Micronesia, 1910
mission work of, 688
and polygamy, 687–688 role of in conservative politics, 689
in Samoa, 2521–2522
in Slovenia, 2651–2652
in Sweden, 2772
in Tonga, 2882
See also Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (FLDS); Polygamy-practicing Mormons; Salt Lake City; Temples, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; United Order Effort (Fundamentalist LDS Church)
- Church of Moshoeshoe, 689–690
- Church of Nigeria, 690–691, 691 (image)
- Church of North India, 692–694, 693 (image)
- Church of Norway, 694–696, 695 (image)
- Church of Pakistan, 696–698, 697 (image)
- Church of Pentecost, 698
- Church of Quakers in Africa, 29
- Church of Satan, 698–701, 699 (image)
- Church of Scientology, 350, 701–703, 702 (image) basic tenets of, 702
in Denmark, 882
See also Hubbard, L. Ron
- Church of Scotland, 703–705, 704 (image) heritage of, 703–704
- Church of South India, 705–708, 706 (image)
- Church of Sri Lanka, 708–709, 708 (image)
- Church of Sweden, 709–710, 710 (image)
- Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine, 710–711
- Church of the Brethren, 712–713
- Church of the Brethren in Nigeria, 712–713
- Church of the Disciples of Christ, 713
- Church of the Foursquare Gospel.
See International Church of the Foursquare Gospel
- Church of the Kingdom of God, 713–714
- Church of the Lamb of God, 714–715

- Church of the Lord, 715–716
- Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith (CLJCAF), 716–717
- Church of the Nazarene, 96, 144, 303, 322, 328, 368, 378, 408, 504–505, 717–718
- Church of the Province of Burundi, 718–719
- Church of the Province of Central Africa, 719–720, 719 (image)
- Church of the Province of Melanesia, 720–721
- Church of the Province of Myanmar, 721–722, 721 (image)
- Church of the Province of Southeast Asia, 722–723, 723 (image)
- Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean, 723–724
- Church of the Province of Uganda, 724–725, 725 (image)
- Church of the Province of West Africa, 725–727, 726 (image)
- Church of the White Eagle Lodge, 727–728
- Church of Tuvalu, 728
- Church Universal and Triumphant, 728–731
- Churches of Christ (non-Instrumental), 731–733, 732 (image)
- Churches of Christ in Australia, 733–734, 734 (image)
- Cilicia, Kingdom of, 183, 186–187
- Cistercians, 734–736
- Clan of Ausrans, 735–736
- Clapham Sect, 737–738
- Clare, 1137
- Clark, Randy, 2884–2885
- Clarke, John, 90
- Clavier, Pedro, 738–739
- Cleghorn, Robert, 327–328
- Clement of Alexandria, 2843
- Clement III (pope), 501
- Clement V (pope), 639
- Clement VI (pope), 1121
- Clement XI (pope), 2139
- Clement XV (pope), 146
- Clifford, Walter, 329
- Clifford, Mrs. Walter, 329
- Clinton, J. J., 40
- Cobb, John B., Jr., 251
- Cochin Jews, 739–740
- Cock, Hendrik de, 631
- Cocos (Keeling) Islands, 740, 740 (table), 741 (map)
- Codde, Peter, 2139
- Coke, Thomas, 706–707, 1079, 1559, 1864, 1866, 1868, 1874, 1880, 2989, 3095
- Coker, Daniel, 38, 545
- Coker, Jacob Kehinde, 28
- Collette, 1137
- Colombia, 740–753, 743 (map), 744 (table), 746 (image)
- Amerindians in, 741, 743, 744
- Charismatic movement in, 749
- constitutional freedom of religion in, 742
- independence of, 744
- Jewish community in, 750–751
- non-traditional Christian religions in, 750
- Protestant movement in, 747–750
- reasons for social and political upheaval in, 745
- religious diversity in, 750–752
- Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) in, 742, 744
- Roman Catholicism in, 745–747, 746 (image)
- Spanish colonization of, 742
- unofficial state sanction of Roman Catholicism, 743
- Columbus, Christopher, 267–268, 798, 902, 1259, 1293, 1347, 2331, 3052
- Common Era Calendar, 753–754
- Communalism, 754–757, 755 (image)
- Community of Christ, 757–759, 758 (image)
- Community of Protestant Churches in Europe, 759–760
- Comoros, 760–762, 761 (image), 761 (map)
- Companions of the Prophet, 762–763
- Conference of European Churches (CEC), 763–764
- Confucianism, 764–769, 765 (image), 1648, 2616–2617
- Cheng-Zhu School of, 767–768
- importance of ritual in, 764–765
- in Indonesia, 1450–1452
- literate culture in, 766
- religious nature of, 768
- reverence and personal transformation in, 765–766
- spread of by Confucian masters/teachers, 766–767
- Confucius, 589–590, 764, 769–770, 769 (image)
- Analects* of, 674, 770
- See also* Confucius's Birthday
- Confucius's Birthday, 770–771
- Congo (Brazzaville), Republic of the, 771–774, 772 (map), 773 (table)
- Bantu-based religion in, 773
- Christianity in, 772–773
- Islam in, 773–774
- native religions in, 773
- Pentecostalism in, 773
- Congo (Zaire), Democratic Republic of the, 774–779, 775 (map), 776 (image), 777 (table)
- Islam in, 778
- Kiyoka (Burning) movement in, 775–776
- Pentecostalism in, 777
- Protestant and Free church groups in, 777–778
- Roman Catholicism in, 776
- under Belgium rule, 774–775
- Congregational Christian Church in Samoa, 779
- Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa, 780
- Congregationalism, 780–781, 835, 2966–2967, 2997
- Constantine the Great, 783–785, 784 (image), 941, 1195, 1254, 1315–1316, 1539
- Constantinople, 637, 638, 1247, 2903. See also Istanbul
- Constanzo, Adolfo, 2176–2177
- Continued Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, 785–786
- Convention Baptiste de' Haiti, 786
- Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches, 787–788
- Conventuals, 1136
- Cook, Glenn A., 2992
- Cook, James, 789, 1610, 2077, 2114
- Cook, W. T., 3010
- Cook Islands, 788–791, 789 (image), 790 (map), 790 (table)
- as a British protectorate, 789
- indigenous Amuri Free Church of, 789, 791
- Cook Islands Christian Church, 791–792

- Cooke, Grace, 727–728
 Cooke, Ivan, 727
 Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, 792–793, 793 (image)
 Cop, Nicolas, 477
 Copernicus, Nicolaus, 2553, 2555, 2555 (image)
 Coptic Catholic Church, 793–794
 Coptic Orthodox Church, 794–796
 adherence of to the Nicene Creed, 795
 Coptic Orthodox Church of Egypt, 1004
 Corbu, Noel, 2310
 Cordoba, 796–798, 797 (image)
 Corfe, Charles John, 127
 Corvinus, Matthias, 3079
 Costa Rica, 798–810, 799 (image), 800 (map), 803 (table)
 Amerindian groups in, 798–799
 Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement in, 803–804 Charismatic Renewal Movement (CRM) in, 807–808
 independence of, 801
 miscellaneous religious groups in, 808–809
 Protestantism in, 804–808
 racial diversity of, 799, 801
 Roman Catholicism in, 801–803
 under Spanish colonial rule, 799, 801
 Cote d’Ivoire, 810–813, 811 (table), 812 (map)
 Christianity in, 811
 native peoples of, 810–811
 Protestantism in, 811
 Roman Catholicism in, 811
 Council for a Parliament of the World’s Religions, 813–814
 Council for Secular Humanism, 814–815
 Council of Antioch, 2141
 Council of Baptist Churches in North East India, 815–816
 Council of Christian Churches of an African Approach in Europe (CCCAAE), 816–818
 Council of Ephesus, 634–635
 Council of Nicaea, 228, 468, 634, 925, 2141, 2903
 Council of Trent, 335, 641–642, 1728, 2423
 Coulomb, Emma Cutting, 356
 Course in Miracles, A, 818–819
 Covenant of the Goddess, 819–820
 Cox, Melville, 1715
 Cranmer, Thomas, 502
 Crawford, Florence L., 160, 2593
 Creationism, 820–824, 821 (image), 822 (image) development of creationist theology, 820–821
 “New Earth” and Flood theories, 822–823
 “Old Earth” and Gap theories, 821–822 in religions other than conservative Protestantism, 824 strategies and court cases concerning, 823–24
 Crème, Benjamin, 2070
 Crete, 1247
 Croatia, 824–827, 825 (map), 826 (table)
 Baptists in, 826
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) in, 826–827
 Jehovah’s Witnesses in, 826
 Jewish community in, 827
 Lutheranism in, 826
 Reformed Church in, 826
 Roman and Orthodox Catholicism in, 825–826
 Cromwell, Oliver, 675, 3143
 Crowe, Frederick, 327
 Crowley, Aleister, 699, 827–829, 828 (image), 1225, 1226, 1319, 2068, 2840–2841
 Crusades/Crusaders, 1524, 1533, 1933
 Cuba, 829–840, 830 (image), 832 (map), 835 (table) and the Bay of Pigs Invasion, 833
 Christian groups in, 838 communist government of, 829–830
 Jews in, 838
 miscellaneous religions in, 838–839
 New Age movements in, 839
 Protestantism in, 834–838
 Roman Catholicism in, 831, 833–834
 Santería in, 830 (image), 839
 Cuban Council of Churches (CCC), 831, 837–838
 Cubbedge, Carolyn Hale, 793 (image)
 Cumberland Presbyterian Church, 840–842, 841 (image), 2306
 Cummins, George David, 984
 Cunningham, Alfred B., 680
 Crystal Cathedral, 513
 Cyprus, 842–846, 843 (image), 844 (map), 844 (table)
 Eastern Orthodoxy in, 842, 843 (image)
 Muslim community in, 843
 North Cyprus, 845 (map), 845 (table)
 Protestantism in, 843
 Cyril of Alexandria, 795
 Czech Republic, 846–850, 846 (image), 847 (map), 847 (table)
 Communist regime in, 848
 Protestant Reformation in, 846, 848
 religious rights and diversity in, 848–849
 Czechoslovak Hussite Church, 849–850
 Dacko, David, 531
 Dadu, 1397
 DahnHak, 851–852
 Dalai Lama, 236, 358, 373, 429–430, 574, 574 (image), 575, 576, 2999, 3134 (image)
 Dalai Lama III, Sonam Gyatso, 852
 Dallaston, Charles, 295
 Damanhur, 852–854, 853 (image)
 Damascus, 854–856, 855 (image)
 Daneel, M. L. (Inus), 32
 Dang, Luong Minh, 2703–2704
 Daniel, C. D., 289
Dao De Jung (Lao Zi), 560
 Daoism, 569, 573, 767, 856–862, 857 (image), 2644
 basic tenets of, 856
 Communist repression of, 858
 Daoist alchemy, 861
 divination used in, 862
 history of, 858–860
 importance of ritual to, 861
 medieval Daoist traditions, 859
 “millenarian” nature of early Daoism, 859 practices of, 861–862 present-day Daoism, 860–861 sacred books of, 856–857, 858 sexual practices of, 861

- Daoism (continued)
 under the Song, Yuan, and Ming dynasties, 859–860
See also Hua Shan; Quanzhen Daoism; Song Shan; Zhengyi Daoism
- Darby, John Nelson, 295, 608–609, 862–864, 863 (image)
- Darling, Alberto, 175, 176
- Darrow, Clarence, 821 (image), 823
- Datta, Narendranath (Swami Vivekananda), 1430
- David, 1596
- Dawkins, Richard, 2985–2986, 3068
- Days of Awe, 864–865, 864 (image)
- De Gaulle, Charles, 72
- De Séde, Gérard, 2310
- Death, 865–874, 866 (image) ars moriendi in modernity, 872–873 communication with the dead, 867–869 in primitive cultures, 866–867 promise of resurrection in Islam and Christianity, 870–872 religious mitigation of the destructive power of death, 869–870 in sacrificial religions, 865–866 universality of, 866
- Dee, John, 875–876
- Deeper Life Bible Church, 876–877
- Dees, Charles W., 1889
- Deima Church, 877
- Deism, 2938
- Dekanawidah, 1508
- Delgado, José Eloy Alfaro, 934
- Dellinger, N. T., 328
- Democratic Republic of the Congo, 24, 26
- Dempster, John, 1068
- Denarlaud, Marie, 2309
- Denmark, 877–882, 878 (image), 879 (map), 880 (table)
 Christianity in, 881
 Church of Scientology in, 882
 eschatology of, 880–881
 Nordic mythology of, 878, 880 religion during the Neolithic and Bronze ages, 878 religious diversity in, 881–882 religious festivals and the solar calendar, 880
- Descartes, René, 1233, 2939
- Desguliers, John Theophilus, 1146
- Deshimaru, Taisen, 1484–1485
- Deunov, Peter Konstantinov (Beinsa Douno), 3103–3105
- Devotion/devotional traditions, 882–884, 883 (image) in Indian religious history, 884 in the Roman Catholic tradition, 884
- Devotees of Islam, 1527
- Dewey, John, 1365
- Dhammakaya Foundation, 885–886, 885 (image)
- Dharma Drum Mountain Association, The, 886–887
- Dharmapala, Anagarika, 424, 430, 442, 1394–1395
- Di Mambro, Jo, 2659
- Diamond Sangha, 887–889, 888 (image)
- Diamond Sutra, 523
- Diamond Way Buddhism, 889–891, 890 (image)
- Díaz, Albert J., 289
- Diem, Ngo Dinh, 3067
- Din, Dawood Burhan-al, 361, 362
- Din, Nasir-al, 19–20
- Din Muhammad, Warith, 348
- Dionysius, 3100
- Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council, 891–892
- Divine Life Society, 892–893, 893 (image)
- Divine Science Federation International/United Divine Science Ministries International, 893–895
- Diwali, 895–897, 896 (image)
- Djibouti, 897–899, 898 (map), 899 (table)
 Christianity in, 899
 Hinduism in, 899
 Islam in, 899
- Djwhal Khul, 166
- Dodd, C. O., 217
- Dogen, 899–900
- Dogon Religion, 900–901, 901 (image)
- Doinel, Jules-Benoît, 1225, 1226–1228
- Dolamore, Decimus, 294–295
- Dominica, 902–905, 902 (image), 903 (map), 904 (table)
 Anglicanism in, 902
 folk beliefs in, 904–905
- Methodism in, 902–903
- Obeah religion of, 904
- Roman Catholicism in, 903–904, 905
- Dominican Republic, 905–909, 906 (map), 907 (image), 908 (table), 1035
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) in, 908
 Protestantism in, 907–908
 Roman Catholicism in, 907
 Seventh-day Adventists in, 908
- Dominicans, 563, 909–911
 organizational structure of, 910
- Donatism, 238
- Double Ninth Festival, 911–912, 911 (image)
- Double Seventh Festival, 912–913, 912 (image)
- Douglass, Frederick, 41
- Doukhobors (“Spirit-wrestlers”), 913–914, 2474
- Doyle, Arthur Conan, 727–728
- Dragon Boat Festival, 914–915, 925 (image)
- Druidism, 915–917, 916 (image), 976
 central beliefs of, 916 revival of interest in, 915–916
 Summer Solstice celebration of, 916–917, 2753–2754
- Drukpa Kagyu branch of Tibetan Buddhism, 345–346
- Drummond, Henry, 2404
- Druze Muslims, 917–918
 persecution of, 1521–1522
- Duff, Alexander, 706, 706 (image)
- Duff, Frank, 1706
- Dukhobors (“Spirit-wrestlers”), 2474
- Durham, William H., 2593–2594
- Durkheim, Emile, 1921–1922, 1922 (image)
- Dutch East India Company, 508, 706, 1443–1444, 2996
- Dutch Reformed Church, 93, 632, 918–920, 1443, 2012, 3011
- Dynamism, 44
- Dyson, Martin, 1878
- East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends, 923
- East Java Christian Church, 924
- Easter, 924–926, 925 (image)
- Easter Island, 926–927

- Eastern Orthodoxy (Eastern Orthodox Church), 62, 63, 170, 469–470, 927–929, 928 (image), 1004–1005
 in Brazil, 394
 in Hong Kong, 567
 in India, 1401
 jurisdictions of, 928–929
 in Mexico, 1904
 in Panama, 2185–2186
 in Peru, 2242–2243
 in Turkey, 2905
 in Ukraine, 2924–2926, 2929–2932
 in the United States, 3007
 in Uruguay, 3032–3033
 in Venezuela, 3059
- Ebner, Margareta, 1120
- Eck, Johann, 1746
- ECKANKAR, 929–930, 2110
- Ecuador, 930–941, 931 (table), 933 (map), 936 (image) current religious situation in, 932 diverse population of, 931 evangelical Christianity in, 938
 independence of, 934
 Jewish community in, 931, 940
 Middle Eastern community of, 931 miscellaneous Christian groups in, 939–940 miscellaneous non-Christian groups in, 940 political, social, and religious overview of, 932–935
 Protestant movement in, 937–939
 Roman Catholicism in, 935–937
 Spanish conquest of, 934
- Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople, 941–942
- Eddy, Mary Baker, 671–673, 942–944, 943 (image), 2068, 2189, 2404, 2777
- Edict of Nantes, 1128, 1129
- Edward I (king of England), 1219
- Edward VI (king of England), 641, 675, 969
- Edwards, Jonathan, 1079, 2305
- Egan, Daemon, 701
- Églises Baptistes de la RCA, 944
- Egypt, 794, 944–949, 945 (image), 946 (map), 948 (table), 1498, 1526, 1533
 Christianity in, 947, 948
 Fatimid Empire of, 945, 947
 Islam in, 947–948, 1521
 Jewish community in, 949
 movement of Islam into, 795, 947
 Protestant movements in, 948–949
 under Alexander the Great, 945
 under the Ottoman Empire, 945–946
 under the Ptolemaic and Roman empires, 945
- Egypt in Western religious imagination, 949–951
 interpretation of hieroglyphs, 949–950 narratives concerning the pyramids, 950–951
- Eid al-Adha, 11, 951–952, 951 (image)
- Eid al-Fitr. See Ramadan
- Eisai (Myoan Eisai), 952–953, 2417
- Ekaku, Hakuin, 2417
- Ekalesia Niue (Congregational Christian Church of Niue), 953–954
- El Salvador, 954–966, 955 (table), 956 (map), 959 (image)
 Assemblies of God in, 961–962
 Central American Mission (CAM) International in, 960–961
 Church of God in, 962
 Church of God of Prophecy in, 962–963 factions of Roman Catholic laity in, 959 historic overview of, 955–956, 958
 miscellaneous religious groups in, 964–965
 Protestant movement in, 960–964
 religious affiliations in, 954–955
 religious freedom in, 954
 Roman Catholicism in, 958–960
- Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission, 966–967
- Elim Christian Mission, 1274
- Elim Pentecostal Church, 967–968
- Elizabeth I (queen of England), 675, 968–970, 969 (image), 983, 2997
- Elliot, Jim, 607
- Emei Shan (Mount Emei), 970–971
- Emerson, Ralph W., 431, 2404
- Emissaries, The, 971–972
- Emmerich, Anne Catherine, 1823
- Emmerich, Anne Catherine, 1823
- Energy, 972–976, 973 (image)
 African concepts of, 974–975
 Chinese concepts of, 974 concepts of vital or cosmic energy, 972–973 contemporary religious views of, 975–976
 Indian concepts of, 973–974
 Japanese concepts of, 974
 in Western culture, 975
- Engel, Jacob, 402
- Engels, Friedrich, 230
- Engvall, Carl Johann, 669
- Enlightenment, 977–980, 977 (image) in Buddhism, 977–878
 in Hinduism, 978–979
 in Tantric beliefs/rituals, 979–980
- Ennōkyō, 980–981
- Epiphany, 981–982
- Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil, 982
- Episcopal Church, 982–985, 983 (image)
- Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, 985–986
- Episcopal Church in the Philippines, 986–987
- Epstein, Jerome, 782 (image)
- Epworth, 987–988
- Equatorial Guinea, 988–991, 988 (image), 989 (table), 990 (map)
 indigenous religions of, 988–989
 Protestant movements in, 989–990
 Roman Catholicism in, 989
- Eritrea, 991–993, 991 (table), 992 (map), 993 (image), 1004, 1007
- Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church, 993–994
- Esotericism. See New Age Movement; Ordo Templi Orientis; Western Esoteric tradition
- Espiritismo, 994–996, 995 (image)
- Esquivel, Adolfo Perez, 3131 (image)
- Estonia, 996–999, 997 (table), 998 (map)
 Christianity in, 997
 House of Taara and Native Religions in, 999
 Lutheranism in, 996–997
 Orthodox Church in, 997–998
 Soviet occupation of, 996, 1001
- Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, 999–1000

- Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC), 1000–1001
- Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad (EELCA), 1001–1002, 1002 (image)
- Estonian Orthodox Church of Moscow Patriarchate, 1002–1003
- Estrada, Jose Manuel, 3018, 3019
- Ethiopia, 1003–1007, 1003 (image), 1004 (table), 1005 (map), 1561
- Christianity in, 1004
- Eastern Orthodoxy in, 1004–1005
- Islam in, 1005–1006
- native peoples of, 1003–1004
- Protestantism in, 1006
- religious freedom in, 1006–1007
- See also* Beta Israel
- Ethiopian Catholic Church, 1007–1008
- Ethiopian Church of South Africa, 39
- Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus, 1008–1009
- Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, 1009–1111, 1010, 1561
- Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, 1011–1012
- Ethnoreligions, 1012–1016, 1013 (image)
- contemporary ethnoreligions, 1015–1016
- re-evaluation of, 1012–1013
- spirit possession movements, 1015
- Eucharist, the, 27, 124, 125, 130, 153, 238, 478, 514, 620, 639–640, 795, 867, 870, 969, 1032, 1073, 1106, 1342, 1634, 1777, 1816, 1855, 1920, 1948, 1997, 2135, 2138, 2140, 2210, 2394, 2396, 2428–2429, 2584, 2751, 2853, 2854, 2938
- European Buddhist Union (EBU), 1016–1017
- The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), 202
- Evangelical Baptist Church in Angola, 1017–1018
- Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI), 1018–1019
- Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya, 1019
- Evangelical Church in Germany, 1019–1022, 1020 (image)
- doctrines and creeds of, 1020–1021
- as the forced merger of Lutheran and Reformed churches, 1020
- legislative body of, 1021
- Evangelical Church in Kalimantan, 1022–1023
- Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands, 1023
- Evangelical Church of Chad, 1024–1025
- Evangelical Church of French Polynesia. See Maohi Protestant Church
- Evangelical Church of Gabon, 1025–1026
- Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria, 1026–1027
- Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Poland, 1027–1028
- Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania, 1028–1029, 1028 (image)
- Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic, 1029–1030
- Evangelical Church of the Congo, 1030–1031, 1031 (image)
- Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, 1031–1032
- Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil, 1032–1033
- Evangelical Church of the River Plate, 174–175, 1034
- Evangelical Church of the West Indies, 1034–1035
- Evangelical Church of West Africa, 1035–1036
- Evangelical Churches of Vietnam, 1026–1037
- Evangelical Church-Synod of the Nile, 1037
- Evangelical Committee for Relief and National Emergency (CEDEN), 1354–1355
- Evangelical Confederation of Latin America, 1037–1041, 1038 (image)
- drive to increase its membership, 1039
- formation of, 1037–1038
- Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola, 1041
- Evangelical Covenant Church, 1041–1042
- Evangelical Free Church of America, 1042–1043
- Evangelical Friends International (EFI), 1043–1044
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, 1044–1046, 1045 (image)
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada (ELCIC), 1046–1047, 1047 (image)
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile, 1047–1048
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo, 1048–1049
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark, 1049–1050, 1049 (image)
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland, 1050–1053, 1051 (image), 1386
- and Icelandic culture and political structure, 1051–1052
- relationship of to the government of Iceland, 1052
- strategic planning of in the 21st century, 1050–1051
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya, 1053–1054
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands. See Protestant Church in the Netherlands
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia, 1054–1055, 1054 (image)
- Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Romania, 1055–1056
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa, 1056–1057
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania, 1057–1058
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia, 1058–1059
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe, 1059–1060
- Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, 1060–1061, 1061 (image), 1113–1114
- Evangelical Lutheran Church of France, 1061–1062

- Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ghana, 1062
- Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania/Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora, 1062–1065, 1963 (image)
- Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea, 1065–1066
- Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway, 1066
- Evangelical Mennonite Conference (EMC), 1066–1067
- Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands, 1067–1068
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina, 1068–1069, 1068 (image)
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia, 1069–1070
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Costa Rica, 1070
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy, 1071
- Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay, 1072–1073
- Evangelical Mission of South Haiti, 1073
- Evangelical Pentecostal Mission of Angola, 1074
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Iran, 1074
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal, 1075
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa, 1074–1075
- Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana, 1076–1077
- Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola, 1077–1078
- Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania. See Evangelical Lutheran Church in Romania
- Evangelicalism, 1078–1084, 1080 (image), 1081 (image) current situation of, 1983–1084 in the 18th century, 1079 and Fundamentalists, 1081–1082 growth of in Africa, 1083 neo-evangelicalism, 1081–1082 in the 19th century, 1079 postmodernism's impact on, 1084 primary publications of, 1082 primary tenets of, 1078 in the 20th century, 1079–1081
- Evola, Julius, 1084–1086
- Evolution, theory of, 2556–2557 “theistic evolution,” 2551
- Evolutionary Enlightenment, 1086
- Ewart, Frank J., 2992
- Ewing, Finis, 840
- Exorcism, 1086–1090, 1087 (image), 2539 appropriate locations for, 1088 in Christianity, 1088–1089 common elements of across all religions, 1087–1088 and physical torture, 1088 prevalence in all major religions, 1087
- Faeroe Islands, 1091–1092, 1091 (table), 1092 (map)
- Fairbanks, Edward, 329
- Faisal II (king of Iraq), 1498
- Faith Bible and Tract Society, 217–218
- Faitlovitch, Jacques, 344
- Falkland Islands/Malvinas Islands, 1093–1095, 1093 (table), 1094 (map)
- Fall Equinox, 1095–1096
- Falun Gong, 1096–1099, 1097 (image) banishment of in China, 1098 key texts of, 1096 organization of, 1097 rituals of, 1098
- Family International, The (Children of God), 1099–1102 end-time beliefs of, 1101–1102 recruitment of new disciples to, 1100, 1102 sexual ethics of, 1099–1100
- Fang people. See Bwiti
- Fard, Wallace, 3088, 3089
- Farel, William (Guillaume), 477, 2781
- Faris, Ellsworth, 666
- Farrakhan, Louis, 1210, 2026, 2027–2028, 2027 (image), 3090
- Fatima (city), 1102–1105, 1104 (image) as a place of pilgrimage, 1103–1104
- Fatima (daughter of Muhammad the Prophet), 463
- Fatimid dynasty, 1533
- Fedchenkov, Benjamin, 2152–2153
- Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches, 1105–1107, 1105 (image)
- Fellowship of Irian Java Baptist Churches, 1107
- Fellowship of Isis, 1107–1108
- Ferguson, Samuel, 1716
- Ferriere, Serge Raynaud de la, 3018, 3019
- Festivities of the Holy Ghost, 2275
- Fiji Islands, 1108–1111, 1109 (table), 1110 (map) Islam in, 1110–1111 Methodism in, 1109
- Fiji Islands, Hindu community of the, 1110, 1111–1113, 1112 (image)
- Fillmore, Charles, 3012, 3013
- Fillmore, Myrtle, 3012
- Finland, 1113–1117, 1114 (table), 1115 (map), 1116 (image) and the Ecumenical Council of Finland, 1116–1117 effects of the Protestant Reformation on, 1114, 1116 Islam in, 1117 Jewish community in, 1117 late arrival of Christianity to, 1114
- Finnish Orthodox Church, 1116, 1117–1119
- First Vatican Council, 520, 936, 1477–1478, 1744, 2133, 2423, 2585, 2783, 2855
- Fiske, Pliny, 2791–2792
- Flagellation, 1119–1122, 1120 (image) in antiquity, 1119 in Roman Catholic Christianity, 1119–1121 self-flagellation in Shia Islam, 1121–1122
- Fletcher, Melvina, 40
- Flew, Antony, 1233
- Flores, Francisco, 156
- Fludd, Robert, 1122–1123, 1146
- Flurry, Gerald, 2249–2250
- Foguangshan, 1123–1125
- Foote, Julia A., 41
- Forman, Charles W., 696
- Formula of Concord, 1020
- Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (FPMT), 1125–1126
- Fox, Daniel O., 696

- Fox, George, 1126–1127, 1126 (image), 1157, 2982
- Fox, Kate, 2705
- Fox, Leah, 2705
- Fox, Margaret, 2705
- France, 531, 532, 642, 1127–1132, 1128 (image), 1130 (table), 1131 (map), 2940
- anti-Semitism in, 1130
 - Buddhism in, 1132
 - Eastern religions in, 1131–1132
 - Islam in, 1130–1131
 - Jews in, 1130
 - power of the monarchy in, 1128–1129
 - Roman Catholicism and the religious history of France, 1128, 1129
- Francis of Assisi, 648, 1132–1135, 1133 (image), 1934
- association of with animals, 1134
 - continuing influence of, 1134
 - literary work of, 1134–1135
 - visionary life of, 1134
- Francis de Sales, 2513
- Francis Xavier, 642, 1135–1136, 1577
- Franciscans, 169, 169 (image), 314, 365, 430, 448, 505, 563, 1136–1138, 1137 (image)
- approval of their order by the Vatican, 1134
 - growth and spread of across Europe, 1136–1137
 - Korean Franciscan Brotherhood, 127
- Frank Fools Crow, 311
- Frankel, Zachariah, 782, 1138, 1600
- Frashëri, Sami, 65
- Fraternité Blanche Universelle, 1138–1139
- Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X, 1139–1142, 1140, 2562–2563
- Free African Society, 38
- Free churches, 1141–1143, 1142 (image)
- Free Methodist Church of North America, 1143–1144
- Free Pentecostal Missions Church of Chile, 1144
- Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga, 1144–1145
- Freeman, Thomas Birch, 338, 1210
- Freemasonry, 1145–1147, 1146 (image), 2453
- and the tenets of metaphysical speculation, 1146–1147
- Freethought, 1147–1149, 1148 (image)
- Frei Agostino de Jesus, 307
- French Guiana, 1149–1152, 1150 (map), 1151 (table)
- French Polynesia, 1151–1154, 1152 (table), 1152 (image), 1153 (map)
- native deities of, 1153
 - Roman Catholicism in, 1153
- Freytag, F. L. Alexander, 714
- Friends of the Western Buddhist Order (FWBO), 3097–3098
- Friends General Conference, 1154–1155
- Friends United Meeting, 1155–1156, 1155 (image)
- Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC), 1156–1157
- Friends/Quakers. See Quakers (Religious Society of Friends)
- Frizza, Menichetti, 1919
- Fruentius, 1009
- Fuji, Mount, 1159–1169, 1159 (image)
- Fuller, Andrew, 291, 292
- Fuller, Charles, 1081
- Fuller Theological Seminary, 542
- Fundamentalism, 1160–1165, 1163 (image)
- “Christian Fundamentalism,” 1160
 - developments in after World War I, 1163–1165
 - difficulty in determining precise belief structure of, 1161
 - and The Fundamentals, 1160, 1162–1163
 - and science, 1161
 - trends in since the 1970s, 1165
- Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (FLDS), 2270–2271
- G12 Vision, 1167–1168
- Gabon, 459, 1168–1170, 1168 (table), 1169 (map)
- Christianity in, 1168–1169
 - Islam in, 1169
 - Roman Catholicism in, 1169
- Gales, Agnes J., 2404
- Gambia, 1170–1173, 1170 (image), 1171 (map), 1172 (table)
- Gandhi, Indira, 105
- Gandhi, Mohandas K., 1431
- Ganesh Chaturthi, 1173–1174, 1173 (image)
- Gardner, Gerald Brosseau, 1174–1175, 1175 (image)
- Gardner, Martin, 51
- Gardnerian Wicca, 1174–1176, 1175 (image)
- origins of, 1175
 - rituals of initiation into, 1175–1176
- Garifuna people, religion of, 1176–1179, 1177 (image)
- Garr, Alfred Goodrich, Jr., 2894
- Garr, Lillian Anderson, 2894
- Garvey, Marcus, 1011, 1561
- Gatung’u Gathuna, Arthur, 30
- Gaudiya Math, 1179–1181, 3143–3144
- Gauquelin, Michel, 226
- Gautama Buddha. See Lumbini
- Gaya religion. See Bodh-Gaya
- Gaziola, Manuel J., 155, 156, 157–158
- Ge Hong, 67
- Gedatsu Kai, 1181–1182
- Gee, Donald, 216
- Geiger, Abraham, 1182–1183, 1600
- Gelugpa, 1183–1185, 1184 (image)
- central meditation practice of, 1183–1184
 - and the “six perfections,” 1184
- Genchi, 1584
- General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt, 1185–1186
- General Church of the New Jerusalem, The, 1186–1189, 1187 (image)
- General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination, 91
- Genghis Khan, 1925
- Georgia, 1189–1195, 1190 (map), 1191 (table)
- Baptists in, 1194
 - Christianity in, 1192
 - Concordat between the state of Georgia and the Georgian Orthodox Church, 1193, 1197–1198
 - independence of, 1191

- independence of Abkhazia and South Ossetia from, 1191–1192
 Jews in, 1193–1194
 as part of the Soviet Union, 1189, 1191 religious composition of, 1192
 Roman Catholicism in, 1194
 social role of the Georgian Orthodox Church in, 1192–1193 Georgian Orthodox Church (GOC), 1195–1198, 1196 (image)
 autocephaly of, 1197
 Concordat between the state of Georgia and the GOC, 1193, 1197–1198 revival of, 1197
 Gerizim, Mount, 1199–1200, 1199 (image)
 German Buddhist Union (GBU), 1200–1201
 German Evangelical Church Federation, 1021
 German Reformed Church, 93
 Germany, 1201–1205, 1201 (image), 1202 (table), 1203 (map) effects of bi-confessionalism in, 1202, 1204
 Hinduism in, 1205–1206
 Islam in, 1206–1208, 1207 (image)
 non-Christian faiths in, 1204
 Protestant Reformation in, 1202
 re-establishment of Judaism in, 1204
 Germer, Karl Johannes, 1225, 2150
 Ghana, 26, 726, 1208–1212, 1209 (table), 1210 (image), 1211 (map)
 Ashanti people of, 1208–1209
 Christianity in, 1210
 Islam in, 1209–1210
 Methodism in, 1210
 Roman Catholicism in, 1210
 Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-, 1212–1213
 Ghengis Khan, 444, 561, 1196
 Ghose, Sri Aurobindo, 1431–1432
 Ghost Dance, 1213–1215, 1214 (image)
 Gibraltar, 1215–1217, 1216 (map), 1217 (table)
 Church of England in, 1215–1216
 Jews in, 1216–1217
 Methodists in, 1216
 Presbyterians in, 1216
 Roman Catholicism in, 1215
- Giguère, Marie-Paule, 193
 Gilbert, Nathaniel P., 553
 Gilmore, Peter, 700
 Ginnings, Dorus, 38
 Glassman, Bernard, 3106–3107
 Glastonbury, 1217–1220, 1218 (image)
 Glenny, Edward H., 75
 Global Church of God, 19
 Global Consultation on World Evangelization (GCOWE), 14
 Global Country of World Peace, 1220–1222, 1220 (image)
 Globalization, 1222–1225
 and global flows of religion, 1223 narratives of, 1222–1223 religious globalization, 1223–1224
 Gnostic Catholic Church, 1225–1226
 Gnostic Churches, 1226–1228
 Gnostic movement, 1228–1229
 Gnosticism, 1229–1230, 1798–1799
 Goble, Eliza, 1571
 Goble, Jonathan, 1571
 God, existence of, 1231–1234
 Goddess spirituality, 1234–1235, 1320, 2168
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang, 140–141, 195
 Golden Temple, 1235–1237, 1236 (image)
 Goldie, John, 2973–2974
 Gomar, Jacobus, 2407
 González, Eusebio Joaquín (Aarón), 1725, 1726
 Good Friday, 1342–1343, 2679 (image)
 Goodall, William, 2906
 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 257, 1191
 Gordon, Andrew, 696
 Gospel Holy Church of East Africa, 29
 Gospel Missionary Union (GMU), 328, 1792
 in Ecuador, 937–938, 939
 Grace Bible Church of Mosa Sono, 35
 Graham, Billy, 1081 (image), 1694, 1694 (image)
 Graham, Sylvester, 2588
 Grail movement, The, 1237–1238
 Granada, 1238–1241, 1239 (image)
 Grand Mosque (Damascus), 1241
 Grant, F. W., 609, 610
 Granth Sahib, 1400
 Graves, James R., 89
- Gray, Robert, 653
 Great Britain, 642
 missionary zeal in, 643
 Great Disappointment, the, 1242
 Great Mosque, Djenné, Mali, 1242–1243
 Great White Brotherhood (GWB), 730, 1243–1245, 1243 (image), 2606
 Great Zimbabwe, 1245–1246, 1246 (image)
 Greece, 942, 1246–1250, 1247 (image), 1248 (map), 1249 (table) adoption of the Gregorian calendar by the Church of Greece, 1249
 Christianity in, 1247, 1249, 2157
 dominance of the Orthodox Church of Greece in, 1249
 Jehovah's Witnesses in, 1250
 Greek (Melkite) Catholic Church, 1250–1251, 1591–1592, 1701–1702
 Greek Evangelical Church, 1251
 Greek Orthodox Church, 778
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa, 1252–1253
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All East, 1253–1254
 Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, 1254–1255, 1255 (image)
 Green, Tom, 2269
 Greenland, 1256–1257, 1256 (map), 1257 (table)
 Gregory IX (pope), 1137
 Gregory VII (pope), 501, 1257–1259, 1258 (image)
 Gregory XI (pope), 639
 Gregory XIII (pope), 568, 754
 Gregory XVII (pope), 146, 147
 Gregory the Illuminator, 183, 186
 Gregory Palamas, 235
 Grenada, 1259–1261, 1259 (table), 1260 (map)
 native peoples of, 1259
 Roman Catholicism in, 1260–1261
 Griffin, David, 2551
 Grundner, Antoninus, 2585
 Guadeloupe, 1261–1263, 1262 (map), 1262 (table), 1263 (image)
 Protestant movements in, 1261
 Roman Catholicism in, 1261

- Guam, 1263–1266, 1264 (map), 1265 (table)
- Guan Yin's Birthday, 1266–1267, 1266 (image)
- Guatemala, 1267–1279, 1268 (table), 1269 (map), 1270 (image)
- Amerindian religious practices in, 1278
- Assemblies of God in, 1274
- Buddhist and Hindu organizations in, 1277
- Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) in, 1272
- diversity of ethnic groups in, 1267–1268
- ecumenical bridges between Catholics and Protestants in, 1274–1275
- miscellaneous religions in, 1277–1278
- Protestant movements in, 1273–1276
- revolutionary groups in, 1272
- Roman Catholicism in, 1268–1273
- Guenon, René, 2232
- Guevara, Ernesto Che, 831
- Guinea, 1279–1281, 1279 (table), 1280 (map), 1281 (image)
- Islam in, 1280
- Roman Catholicism in, 1280–1281
- Guinea-Bissau, 1281–1284, 1282 (table), 1283 (map)
- Islam in, 1283
- as a Portuguese colony, 1282
- Roman Catholicism in, 1282–1283
- Guinness, H. Grattan, 669
- Gurdjieff Foundations, 1284–1287
- activities with children and young people, 1286
- movements and dances of, 1285
- music of, 1285
- practical work of, 1285–1286
- small group meetings of, 1284–1285
- studies of, 1285
- Gurdjieff, George Ivanovitch, 1284, 1285, 1287–1289, 1287 (image)
- Gurney, Joseph John, 1156
- Guru Gobind Singh's Birthday, 1289–1290
- Guru Arjan Dev Ji, martyrdom of, 1819–1820
- Guru Purnima, 1290–1291, 1290 (image)
- Guru Tegh Bahadur, martyrdom of, 1820
- Gush Emunim, 1291–1292
- Gustavus Adolphus II (king of Sweden), 710, 1692
- Gutenberg, Johann, 1292–1293, 1293 (image)
- Guyana, 1293–1297, 1294 (image), 1295 (map), 1296 (table)
- Hinduism in, 1296–1297
- indigenous religions of, 1294
- Islam in, 1297
- Roman Catholicism in, 1294
- Gyatso, Geshe Kelsang, 236
- Haakon VII (king of Norway), 694
- Haein-sa Temple, 1299–1300, 1300 (image)
- Hagia Sophia, 513, 514 (image), 1300–1301
- Hahn, Carl Hugo, 1054
- Haiti, 681, 1301–1305, 1302 (image), 1303 (map), 1304 (table)
- religious freedom in, 1304
- Roman Catholicism in, 1302, 1304–1305
- slavery in, 1302
- work of the Jesuits in, 1302, 1304
- Haji, the, 11
- Hak Ja Han, 1945 (image), 1946
- al-Hakim, 917–918
- Haldane, James, 2998
- Haldane, Robert, 2998
- Hales, Bruce, 610
- Hales, John S., 610
- Hamid, Sultan Abd al-, 19
- Hanafite School of Islam, 21, 1305–1307, 1306 (image), 1405
- Hanbalite School of Islam, 1307–1308
- Hanukkah, 1308–1310, 1309 (image)
- Hanuman Jayanti, 1310–1311, 1311 (image)
- Happy, Healthy, Holy Organization (3HO), 2628
- Harding, Stephen, 735
- Harer, 1311
- Harper, Henry John Chitty, 2571
- Harrington, Francis M., 1069
- Harris, Elmore, 1162, 1163
- Harris, Howel, 2304
- Harris, James, 3044
- Harris, Thomas Lake, 2777
- Harris, William Wade, 30, 60, 1311, 1312, 2699
- Harrist Church, 1311–1312, 2699
- Hasidism, 1312–1314, 1313 (image), 1600
- Bratslav Hasidism, 1314
- Lubavitch Hasidism, 1741–1742
- Satmar Hasidism, 1314, 2543–2544
- Hastings, Selina, 2304
- Hauge, Hans Nielsen, 695
- Haught, John, 2551
- Healing Tao, 1314–1315
- Heard, R. Dennis, 2221
- Heaven's Gate, 2918
- Helena, Flavia Iulia, 1315–1317, 1315 (image)
- Helwys, Thomas, 298
- Henderson, Alexander, 327
- Heng Shan, 1317–1318, 1317 (image)
- Henry, Carl F. H., 1081, 1694
- Henry I (king of England), 674
- Henry II (king of England), 501
- Henry IV (Holy Roman Emperor), 1258
- Henry VIII (king of England), 502, 641, 675, 1218, 1219, 1934
- Hensley, George Went, 2582
- Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, 1318–1320, 1318 (image), 1319 (image)
- Hernández, Felipe Rivas, 155, 156, 157
- Herrnhut Brethren (Moravians), 997
- Herzl, Theodor, 1601, 3191–3192
- Hesychasm, 235–236
- Heyer, C. F., 111, 2978
- Heyerdahl, Thor, 927
- Hickey, James, 1899
- Hicks, Elias, 1154–1155, 1155 (image), 1156
- Hiei, Mount, 1320–1321
- Hildegard of Bingen, 1321–1322, 1321 (image)
- al-Hindi, Sulayman b. Hasan, 361
- Hinduism, 247, 352, 397, 423, 754, 899, 1013, 1322–1333, 1325 (image)
- enlightenment in, 978–979
- epoch of Brahmanism, 1323–1324
- epoch of classical Hinduism, 1424–1326

- epoch of neo-Hinduism (the Hindu Renaissance), 1327–1328
 in Germany, 1205–1206
 in Ghana, 1211–1212
 in Guyana, 1296–1297
 the Harappa culture of, 1323
 in Indonesia, 1452–1454, 1453 (image)
 in Malaysia, 1785
 in Mauritius, 1835–1836
 in Peru, 2243
 principal concepts and practices of, 1328–1331 problematic nature of the term “Hinduism,” 1322–1323 reinterpretation of along Western organizational models, 1228
 in Suriname, 2760
 in Thailand, 2840
 in Trinidad and Tobago, 2889–2891, 2890 (image) two great epics of (the Ramayana and the Mahabharata), 1329–1330
 in Venezuela, 3060
 women’s role in, 3116–3117
See also Angkor Wat; Divine Life Society; Diwali; Fiji Islands, Hindu community in; Ganesh Chaturthi; India, Hinduism in (classical period); India, Hinduism in (medieval period); India, Hinduism in (modern period); India, Hinduism in (Vedic expressions of); Kedarnath; Prambanan; Smarta tradition; Swaminarayan Hinduism; Temples, Hindu; Vishwa Hindu Parishad
 Hinkins, John-Rodger, 1979, 1980–1981
 Hirsch, Samson Raphael, 1333–1334, 1600, 2160
 His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, 1334–1335, 1334 (image)
 Hittleman, Richard, 3161
 Hoa Hao Buddhism, 1335–1337, 1336 (image)
 Hocking, William E., 2162
 Hodge, Alexander Archibald, 1161
 Hodge, Charles, 1161
 Hodgson, Richard, 356
 Hoist, Maria, 697
 Holi, 1337–1339, 1338 (image)
 Holiness movement, 1339–1340
 Holkar, Ahilya Bai, 333
 Holmes, Ernest Shurtleff, 2404
 Holmes, Fenwick, 2404
 Holocaust, the, 3166–3167
 Holy Ghost Fathers, 504, 534, 1280, 1340
 Holy Orthodox Church in Japan, 1340–1342, 1341 (image)
 Holy Spirit, the, 603, 637
 Holy Spirit Church of East Africa (HSCEA), 28–29
 Holy Thursday (Maundy Thursday), 1342
 Holy Week, 1342–1343
 Holyoke, Charles Jacob, 382
 Homosexuality, 1343–1345
 Buddhist view of, 1344
 Christian, Islamic, and Jewish views of, 1343–1344
 Hindu view of, 1344
 Honduras, 1345–1357, 1346 (map), 1349 (image), 1354 (table)
 Baptists in, 1351, 1352
 Christian Brethren in, 1351–1352
 Church of England in, 1350–1351
 Evangelical Committee for Relief and National Emergency (CEDEN) in, 1354–1355 freedom of religion in, 1345
 independence of, 1347
 Native American religious traditions in, 1355–1356
 Pentecostalism in, 1352–1353
 Protestant movements in, 1350–1355
 Quakers in, 1352
 Roman Catholicism in, 1347, 1348–1350
 under Spanish occupation, 1347
 Honen, 101, 1356–1357, 1581, 1583, 2615
 Hong, Paul K., 681
 Hong Kong, 565–568, 566 (image), 567 (image)
 Christianity in, 566
 Muslim organizations in, 567
 Orthodox churches in, 567
 religious diversity in, 567–568
 Roman Catholicism in, 566–567
 traditional Chinese religions in, 565–566
 Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China, 1357–1358
 Hong Xiuquan, 593
 Honmichi, 1358–1359
 Hon-Ming Chen, 543–544
 Hoomi, Koot, 165
 Hopkins, Emma Curtis, 2068, 2404, 3013
 Hossoshu, 1359–1360
 Houteff, Florence, 386
 Houteff, George, 386
 Houteff, Victor, 385–386
 Howell, Vernon. See Koresh, David
 Hoxha, Enver, 62, 63, 66
 Hua Shan, 1360–1361, 1361 (image)
 Hubbard, L. Ron, 701–702, 702 (image), 1361–1362
 Hui Neng, 1362–1363
 Hui Si, 1363
 Hui Yuan (Hui-yuan), 101, 1364
 Human Living Vampires (HLVs), 976
 Human-Etisk Forbund I Norge, 1364–1365
 Humanism, 1365–1366, 1366 (image)
 Hume, David, 1233
 Hundayi, John, 3079
 Hungarian Reformed Church in America, 1366–1367
 Hungary, 1367–1372, 1368 (map), 1371 (image), 1372 (table), 1749, 2433 animism in, 1368
 church-state relationships in, 1367–1368
 early missionaries to, 1369
 Jewish community in, 1371, 1371 (image)
 Protestant and Free churches in, 1370 rehabilitation of religion in after the fall of Communism, 1371–1372 shamanism in, 1368
 Soviet occupation of, 1370–1371
 Turkish occupation of, 1369
 Hurlburt, Charles, 24
 Hurle, Henry, 2753
 Hus, John (Jan), 848, 849, 1947
 Husayn ibn Ali ibn Abi Talib, al-, 1372–1373, 1373 (image), 1616, 1616 (image)
 Hussein, Saddam, 102, 1498, 1499, 1502
 Hutter, John, 1374

- Hutterites, 103, 1374–1375, 1374 (image)
- Huxley, Thomas Henry, 50, 50 (image)
- Huysmans, Joris Karl, 2539
- I AM Religious Activity, 728, 1379–1380
- Ibadhi Islam, 1380–1381, 1380 (image)
- Ibarra, José María Velasco, 934–935
- Ibero-American Missionary Cooperation (COMIBAM), 1040
- Ibn Abi Aamir, Al-Mansur, 796
- Ibn Hanbal, Ahmad, 1382
- Ibn Rushd, 797
- Ibn Sima. See Avicenna
- Ibn Ziri, 1239
- Iceland, 1382–1386, 1383 (map), 1384 (image), 1385 (table)
- Christianity in, 1383–1384
- Evangelical Lutheran Church in, 1386
- the home as a place of worship in, 1384–1385
- Mormonism in, 1385
- Protestant socio-cultural system of, 1382–1383
- Spiritualism in, 1385–1386
- Ife, 1386–1387
- Iglesia ni Cristo, 1387–1388, 1388 (image)
- Ignatius of Loyola, 1231, 188–1389, 1577, 1579 (image)
- Independence, Missouri, 1389–1391
- Mormon efforts to colonize, 1390
- Independent Church of Australia, 1391
- India, contemporary religion in (Asian religions), 1391–1400, 1392 (image), 1395 (image), 1397 (image), 1398 (map), 1399 (table)
- Buddhism, 1392–1395
- Hinduism, 1391
- Jainism, 1392, 1395–1397
- Sikhism, 1397–1400
- India, contemporary religion in (Middle Eastern religions), 1401–1407, 1402 (image), 1404 (image)
- Christianity, 1401–1403
- Islam, 1403–1405
- Judaism, 1405–1406
- miscellaneous religious communities, 1406–1407
- India, Hinduism in (classical period), 1416–1423, 1417 (image), 1420 (image)
- and the Bhagavad Gita, 1419–1420
- and the content of dharma, 1420
- dharma and the stages of life, 1421–1422
- expansion of the Vedic concept of dharma, 1417
- and the hierarchical structure of society, 1420–1421
- sex and gender in, 1422
- two great narratives of (the Ramayana and the Mahabharata), 1417–1419
- See also* Upanishads
- India, Hinduism in (medieval period), 1423–1429, 1423 (image)
- and the basic presuppositions underlying Hindu darshanas, 1425
- development of Hindu thought during, 1425
- influence of the bhakti poets during, 1424
- Mimamsa School of, 1427
- narrative literature (Puranas) of Hindu gods and goddesses, 1423–1425
- Nyaya School of, 1425–1426
- Samkhya School, 1426
- Vaisheshika School, 1426
- Vedanta School, 1427–1428
- and Yoga, 1426–1427
- India, Hinduism in (modern period), 1429–1435, 1432 (image)
- accessibility of divine immanence through the land itself, 1433–1434
- end-of-life rites, 1434–1435
- Hindu reform movements during, 1429–1430
- Hindu temples, 1433
- religious calendar of, 1434
- religious practices and rituals of, 1432–1435
- specific reformers and their beliefs, 1430–1432
- the upanayana rite and marriage, 1434
- India, Hinduism in (Vedic expressions of), 1407–1416, 1408 (image), 1410 (image)
- cosmic dimension of Vedic ritual, 1414
- goddesses of, 1413
- “Hinduism” defined, 1407–1408
- hymns to Vedic gods, 1412–1413
- ideology of the Vedas, 1413
- and immortality, 1414, 1415
- prehistoric period, 1409–1410
- rebirth ideology of, 1415
- ritual identity in, 1415–1416
- sacrifice as the central practice of Vedic religion, 1413–1414
- structure of the Vedas, 1411
- textual and archaeological evidence of, 1408–1409
- Vedic period, 1410–1416
- See also* Upanishads
- India, in Western religious imagination, 1436–1438, 1437 (image)
- Indian Pentecostal Church of God, 1438–1439
- Indonesia, 1439–1447, 1440 (map), 1441 (image), 1445 (table)
- Buddhism in, 1447–1450, 1448 (image)
- Confucianism in, 1450–1452
- diversity of ethnic groups in, 1441
- establishment of Islam in, 1442–1443
- geology and early human habitation of, 1439, 1441
- growth of Protestantism in, 1444–1445
- Hinduism in, 1452–1454, 1453 (image)
- medieval kingdoms of, 1441–1442
- modern Indonesia, 1445–1447
- Supreme Council for Confucian Religion in Indonesia, 1451
- under Dutch colonial rule, 1443–1445
- Indonesia Christian Church, 1454–1455
- Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church, 1455–1456
- Indra, 1412
- Ingalls, Charles, 676
- Ingersoll, Robert Green, 1148, 1148 (image)
- Innocente, Geraldine, 728

- Insight Meditation Society (IMS), 1456–1457
- Institutes of the Christian Religion* (Calvin), 641, 1106
- Integral Yoga International, 1457–1459
- International Association for Religious Freedom, 1459
- International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches, 1459–1460
- International Church of the Four-square Gospel, 1460–1461, 1460 (image)
- International Churches of Christ (ICC), 1461–1463
- International Coalition for Religious Freedom, 1463–1464
- International Conference of Reformed Churches (CRC), 1464–1465
- International Conference on World Evangelization (ICOWE), 1693, 1694–1695
- International Congregational Fellowship, 1465–1466
- International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC), 1459–1460, 1466, 3130
- International Council of Christians and Jews (ICCJ), 1466–1467, 1467 (image)
- International Council of Community Churches, 1467–1468
- International Council of Unitarians and Universalists (ICUU), 1468–1470
- International Evangelical Church (IEC), 1470–1471
- International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross, 1471–1472
- International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches, 1472
- International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews, 1472–1473
- International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment. See Evolutionary Enlightenment
- International Humanist and Ethical Union, 1473–1474
- International Lutheran Council (ILC), 1474–1475
- International Meditation Centres, 1475–1476
- International New Thought Alliance (INTA), 1476–1477
- International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference, 1477–1478
- International Pentecostal Church of Christ, 1478–1479
- International Pentecostal Holiness Church, 1479–1480
- International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), 1480–1482, 1481 (image), 3144
- International Sufi movement, 1482–1483
- International Yoga Fellowship movement, 1483–1484
- International Zen Association (IZA), 1484–1485
- Internet, the, and religion, 1485–1489, 1486 (image) convenience of electronic access as a boon to religious studies, 1487–1488 online effects on offline religious practices, 1486–1487 and smartphone technology, 1485–1486
- Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace (IRFWP), 1489–1490
- Ioann Swami, 1243
- Iran, 1490–1496, 1491 (image), 1494 (map), 1495 (table)
 Armenian Christians in, 1495, 1496
 Assyrian Christians in, 1495, 1496
 Baha'i Faith in, 1492–1493
 Christian communities in, 1494–1496
 Jewish community of, 1493–1494
 Shia Muslims in, 1491, 1491 (image), 1492
 Sufism in, 1491–1492
 Zoroastrianism in, 1490–1491
- Iraq, 1496–1502, 1497 (image), 1500 (map), 1501 (table)
 Arab evangelical churches in, 1501–1502
 Armenians in, 1499
 British occupation of, 1497, 1498
 Christian communities in, 1499 effect of the Suez Canal crisis on, 1498 independence and sovereignty of, 1498
 Islam in, 1499, 1502
 Kurds in, 1498, 1499
- Protestantism in, 1501
 Roman Catholicism in, 1500–1501
 Yazidi in, 1499
- Ireland, 1502–1507, 1504 (image), 1506 (map), 1507 (table), 2985 division of Protestant and Catholic Christianity in, 1503, 1505 effect of the Anglo-Norman invasion of, 1505 religious diversity in, 1505, 1507
 syncretism of Celtic and Christian faiths in, 1503–1505
- Iroquois Confederacy, 1507–1509
 creation myths of, 1509 importance of the “Longhouse” to, 1508, 1509
- Irving, Edward, 2072
- Isaac, 11
- Ise Shrine, The, 1510–1511, 1510 (image)
- Ishmael, 11
- Islam, 3, 4, 5, 15, 19, 44, 55–56, 58, 63, 69, 70, 72–73, 101, 117, 207, 210, 250, 257, 260, 279, 312, 316, 321, 348, 351, 459, 636, 638, 756, 899, 1013, 1233, 1311, 1322, 1326, 1327, 1343, 1381, 1382, 1401, 1405, 1451, 1511–1524, 1513 (image), 1670, 1846, 1923, 1967, 1968, 2725
 in Algeria, 75
 in Bahrain, 276
 in Belarus, 317
 in Benin, 337–338
 in Brunei, 410, 413–415
 in Bulgaria, 449
 in Burkina Faso, 454
 in the Congo (Brazzaville and Zaire), 773–774, 778 different branches of, 1519–1520
 in Egypt, 795
 in Ethiopia, 1005–1006
 in Finland, 1117
 the Five Pillars of, 1517–1518
 in Gabon, 1169
 in Gambia, 1170
 in Germany, 1206–1208, 1207 (image)
 in Ghana, 1210
 in Guinea, 1280
 in Guinea-Bissau, 1283
 Hanafite School of, 13, 73, 255, 449
 in India, 1403–1405

Islam (continued)

- in Indonesia, 1442–1443, 1521
- in Israel, 1537–1538
- and jihad/terrorism, 1518–1519
- in Kazakhstan, 1621
- in Kenya, 1626
- in Liberia, 1717–1718
- in Macao, 569
- in Madagascar, 1768
- in Malawi, 1782
- in Malaysia, 1785, 1787–1789
- in Mali, 1791–1792
- martyrdom in, 1817–1819
- in Mauritania, 1834
- in Moldova, 1925
- in Morocco, 1958–1959
- in Mozambique, 1983
- in Niger, 2102
- in Nigeria, 2105–2107
- in Oman, 2144–2146
- the progress of Islamic faith, 1520–1523
- in Qatar, 2352
- relics in, 2396
- revivalist impulses of, 1522, 1523
- rise of fundamentalist Islam, 73
- in Romania, 2434, 2435–2436, 2435 (image)
- in Rwanda, 2485–2486
- in Serbia, 2579–2580
- in Somalia, 2663–2664
- in South Africa, 2671
- in Spain, 2678
- in Sudan, 2535, 2737
- in Suriname, 2760
- in Sweden, 2774
- in Tanzania, 2813–2814
- in Togo, 2877
- in Tunisia, 2899
- in Turkey, 2904–2905
- in Turkmenistan, 2908–2909
- in Uganda, 2920
- in Ukraine, 2928
- U.S. exposure to radical Islamism, 1522–1523
- in Uzbekistan, 3037–3038
- in Venezuela, 3060
- view of the Virgin Mary in, 1823–1824
- women's role in, 3119–3120
- in Yemen, 3152–3153
- See also* Abraham/Abram, status of in Islam; Druze; Hanafite School of Islam; Hanbalite School of Islam; Ibadhi Islam; Islamism; Koran, the; Maliki School of Islam; Mecca; Medina; Mosques; Muhammad the Prophet; Muslims; Ramadan; Russia, Islam in; Shafaiite School of Islam; Spirituality, Islamic; Wahhabi Islam
- Islamic Nationalist Front, 1527
- Islamic Salvation Front (ISF), 73
- Islamism (Islamic revivalism; Islamic fundamentalism), 1524–1530, 1525 (image), 1528 (image)
- effects of Saudi wealth on Islamic missionary activities, 1525
- rapid spread of in the 1980s and 1990s, 1527, 1529
- Wahhabi movement of, 1525, 1673
- See also* Jamaat-e-Islam
- Isle of Man, 1539–1532, 1530 (image), 1531 (map), 1532 (table)
- Methodism in, 1532
- Roman Catholicism in, 1532
- Ismail. See Shah Ismail
- Ismaili Muslims, 945, 947, 1532–1534, 1698–1699
- and the Assassins, 1533
- Nizari Ismailis, 1533–1534
- Israel, 1498, 1522, 1534–1539, 1535 (image), 1537 (map), 1538 (table), 1576, 1994
- Christianity in, 1536–1537
- ethical and theological differences of Jews in, 1536
- Islam in, 1537–1538
- and the “Law of Return,” 1536
- Protestantism in, 1537
- religious freedom in, 1538–1539
- under British control, 1535
- under Roman control, 1535
- Israel, occupied territories of, 2127–2130, 2128 (image)
- Christians in, 2129
- Jews in, 2128–2129
- original Islamic rule of, 2127–2128
- religious freedom in, 2129–2130
- Israel Baal Shem Tov, 1312–1313
- Istanbul, 1539–1541, 1540 (image)
- churches and synagogues of, 1540
- mosques of, 1540–1541
- See also* Hagia Sophia
- Italian Assemblies of God, 1541–1542
- Italo-Albanian Catholic Church, 1542–1543
- Italy, 1543–1549, 1544 (image), 1546 (map), 1548 (table)
- breakdown of religious diversity in, 1547
- Concordat system of regarding religions other than Catholicism, 1545, 1547
- relations with the Vatican, 1543
- reorganization of Vatican/state Concordat under Bettino Craxi, 1544–1545
- Roman Catholic church attendance in compared to the rest of Europe, 1547–1548
- under Mussolini's Fascist government, 1543–1544
- Ivimey, Joseph, 292
- Ivory Coast. See Côte d'Ivoire
- Izo, Iburi, 2832, 2833
- Iztaccihuatl, Mount, 2272
- Izumo Ôyashirokyô, 1549
- Jackson, Joseph H., 2311
- Jackson, Natasha, 433
- Jainism, 247, 754–755, 1551–1555, 1553 (image)
- beliefs of, 1552
- contemporary Jain communities, 1554–1555
- divisions within the Jain community, 1552–1554
- in India, 1395–1397
- monastic traditions within, 1396
- See also* Paryushana; Sthanakavasi Jain tradition; Terapanth Svetambara Jain tradition
- Jamaat-e-Islam, 1555–1558, 1994, 2806
- four-point program of, 1556–1557
- international activities of, 1557
- organization of, 1556
- Jamaica, 1558–1562, 1558 (image), 1559 (table), 1560 (map)
- Anglicanism in, 1559
- Baptists and Methodists in, 1559
- Christianity in, 1558–1559
- Protestantism in, 1559, 1561
- Rastafarianism in, 1561
- Jamaica Baptist Union, 1562–1563
- James I (patriarch), 42
- James, William, 81, 81 (image)

- Janmashtami, 1563
- Jansen, Corneille (Cornelius), 318, 2139
- Jansenism, 2137
- Japan, 572, 1563–1571, 1564 (image), 1567 (map), 1568 (table), 1569 (image), 1645–1646
- Aum Shinrikyo in, 1570
- Buddhism in, 427–429, 1565–1566, 1570–1571, 1659–1660
- Christianity in, 1566, 1569–1570
- complex religious history of, 1565
- indigenous/prehistoric religion of, 1565
- “new” religions in, 1568–1571
- new post–World War II religions in, 1566, 1568
- Shinto religion in, 1568, 1569 (image)
- Japan Baptist Convention, 1571–1572
- Japan Buddhist Federation, 1572–1573
- Javanism, 1573–1574
- Jeffs, Rulon K., 2270
- Jeffs, Warren, 2270
- Jehovah’s Witnesses, 18, 96, 202, 251, 272, 339, 826, 1211, 1250, 1574–1575, 2211, 2266, 2772, 2774, 2805, 3177
- Jerusalem, 637, 1575–1577
- fall of to the Crusaders, 1254
- fall of to the Ottoman Turks, 1254
- Jesuits, 134, 169, 249, 318, 324–325, 335, 366, 457, 504, 505, 563, 1282, 1577–1579, 1578 (image), 1579 (image), 1729, 1934
- call of for the assassination of Elizabeth I, 969
- importance of, 642
- missions of in Paraguay, 2199–2200
- suppression of, 1577–1578
- in the United States, 1578–1579
- Jesus Christ, 18, 116, 129, 153, 179, 193, 205, 212, 235, 299, 343, 351, 388, 633–634, 1708, 2162, 2489, 2588, 2915, 2993, 3092
- birth of, 3110
- boyhood of, 2050–2051
- casting out of demons by, 1088
- circumcision of, 350 (image)
- crucifixion of, 1218
- divine nature of, 1004–1005, 1010
- respect for in the Koran, 1516
- See also* Christianity; Mary, Blessed Virgin
- JeungSanDo, 1579–1580
- Jews, 22, 73, 176–177, 234, 272, 304, 317, 331, 351, 492, 557, 608, 1239
- Baghdadi Jews, 1405, 1406
- Cochin Jews, 739–740, 1405, 1406
- in Colombia, 750–751
- in Croatia, 827
- in Cuba, 838
- in Ecuador, 931, 940
- in Egypt, 466, 949
- evacuation of from Brazil, 200–201
- in Finland, 1117
- in France, 1130
- in Georgia, 1193–1194
- in Gibraltar, 1216–1217
- in Hungary, 1371, 1371 (image)
- in Iran, 1493–1494
- in Lebanon, 1703
- in Malta, 1796–1797
- mission to the Jews in Norway, 694–695
- in Moldova, 1925–1926
- in Morocco, 1959
- in Romania, 2433–2434
- in Serbia, 2579
- in Sweden, 2774
- in Tajikistan, 2805–2806
- in Tunisia, 2900
- in Turkey, 2906
- in Ukraine, 2927–2928
- in the United Kingdom, 2985
- in the United States, 3004
- in Uruguay, 3033
- in Uzbekistan, 3039
- in Venezuela, 3060
- in Yemen, 3153–3154
- See also* Bene Israel; Beta Israel; Israel; Israel, occupied territories of; Jerusalem; Judaism; Kabbalah; Neturei Karta; Passover; Pesach; Purim; Shavuot; Sukkot; Synagogues; Temples, Jewish; World Sephardic Federation; Yom HaShoah; Yom Kippur
- Jews for Jesus, 1862, 2212
- Jiu-Hua Shan, 1580–1581
- Jinnah, Muhammad Ali, 2170–2171
- Jodo-shinshu, 1581–1583
- Jodo-shu, 1583–1585, 1584 (image)
- John the Baptist, 1241
- John Chrysostom, 1301
- John of God movement, The, 1585–1586
- John XXIII (pope), 1586–1588, 1587 (image)
- election as pope, 1587–1588
- military service of, 1586–1587
- papal career of, 1587
- See also* Vatican II
- John Paul II (pope), 193, 307, 308, 830, 834, 1140, 2197, 2266, 2442, 2510
- assassination attempt against, 1103, 1104
- John XXI (pope), 2585
- John Street Church, 40
- John of the Trinity (b. Gaston Tremblay), 146–147
- Johnson, Ellen, 89
- Johnson, Sherrod, 716
- Johnston, Thomas W., 128
- Johnston Island, 1588–1589
- Jones, Absalom, 38
- Jones, Charles Price, 679
- Jones, Charles Stansfeld, 2150
- Jones, Franklin, 15
- Jones, James (“Jim”), 2230–2231, 230 (image)
- Jordan, 1589–1593, 1589 (image), 1590 (map), 1591 (table)
- Anglicanism in, 1592
- Arab-Islamic era of, 1589–1590
- Christianity in, 1591–1592
- folk culture of, 1591
- Greek Catholic (Melkite) religion in, 1591–1592
- Islam in, 1591, 1592
- Palestinian population of, 1590
- under the Mamelukes, 1590
- Joshua, 1594–1595
- Joshua Project, 14–15
- Jouret, Luc, 2659
- Judaism, 755, 1013, 1015, 1233, 1366 (image), 1535, 1593–1603, 1593 (image), 1595 (image), 1598 (image), 1601 (image), 2489
- conservative Judaism, 781–783, 782 (image)
- and the creation of Israel as a state, 1600–1602

- Judaism (continued) and the development of the modern Jewish community, 1600 during the diaspora, 1598–1600 during the Greek and Roman eras, 1596–1598
 in India, 1405–1406
 martyrdom and, 1815–1816
 Messianic Judaism, 1862–1863
 origins of, 1593–1596
 re-establishment of in Germany, 1204 sacred texts of, 1597–1598
 in Suriname, 2760–2761
 women's role in, 3117–3118
See also Hanukkah; Hasidism; Orthodox Judaism; Passover; Reconstructionist Judaism; Reform Judaism; Synagogues; Temples, Jewish
- Judge, William Quan, 342, 356, 2846, 2848–2849
- Judson, Adoniram, 92, 2001–2002
- Julius Caesar, 2733, 2753
- Justin Martyr, 1231
- Kabbalah, 443
- Kabbalah Learning Center, 1605–1606
- Kabila, Laurent, 775
- Kabir, 1326, 1397
- Kadampa School of Tibetan Buddhism, 236
- Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism, 1606–1607
- Kahihia, Benjamin, 30
- Kailas, Mount/Lake Manasarovar, 1607–1608, 1607 (image), 1608 (image)
- Kak, Subash, 226
- Kali, 2601, 2601 (image), 2602
- Kamakura, 1609–1610
 Great Buddha of, 100 (image)
- Kamal-ud-Din, Khwaja, 56
- Kamm, William, 2565
- Kanada, Tokumitsu, 2232–2233
- Kanaky (New Caledonia), 1610–1612, 1611 (map), 1611 (table)
- Kannon Jikeikai (Association for the Worship of the Bodhisattva Kannon), 51
- Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem, 1612–1614, 1613 (image), 2369–2370, 2370 (image)
- Karaites, 1614–1615
- Karbala, 1615–1617, 1616 (image)
- Kardec, Allan, 2693
- Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism, 1617–1618
- Karo Batak Protestant Church, 1618–1619
- Kashmir Saivism (Tantric Saivism), 1619–1620
- Kassam, Abd al Karem, 1498
- Kazakhstan, 1620–1624, 1620 (image), 1621 (table), 1622 (map), 1623 (image)
 Baptists in, 1623
 Christianity in, 1623
 Islam in, 1621
 Russian expansion into, 1620–1621
- Kedarnath, 1624
- Kedrovsky, John, 2152
- Keech, William, 283
- Keller, Otto, 36
- Kellner, Carl, 2149
- Kellogg, John Harvey, 2588
- Kellogg, Will Keith, 2588
- Kelly, William, 609
- Kemal, Mustafa, 2903–2904
- Kenya, 33, 1624–1629, 1625 (image), 1626 (table), 1627 (map)
 Buddhism in, 1629
 Christianity in, 1626
 Eastern religions in, 1628–1629
 ecumenism in, 1628
 historical mixture of Bantu and Muslims in, 1624–1625
 Islam in, 1626
 Masai hegemony in, 1625
 Mau Mau terrorist organization in, 1625
 Roman Catholicism in, 1628
 traditional religions in, 1626
- Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1629–1630
- Kenyatta, Jomo, 29, 1625–1626
- Khama, Seretse, 380
- Khan, Hazrat Inayat, 2739, 2740
- Khan, Pir Vilayat, 2739–2740
- Khan, Pir Zia, 2740
- Khilafat movement, 1630–1631
- Khyentse Foundation, The, 1631–1633, 1632 (image)
- Kikuyu Independent Schools Association (KISA), 29–30
- Kikuyu Karing's Educational Association (KKEA), 29, 30
- Kilham, Alexander, 987
- Kim, Simon K., 127
- Kim Il Sung, 1642
- Kimball, Spencer, 688
- Kimbangu, Simon, 31, 778, 1633, 1634, 2083
- Kimbanguist Church, 31, 1633–1634
- King, Jonas, 1251
- King, Martin Luther, Jr., 2311
- King, Samuel, 840
- Kiribati, 1634–1637, 1635 (map), 1636 (table), 1636 (image)
- Kiribati Protestant Church, 1637
- Kirpalani, Lekhraj Khubchand, 383
- Kisaburo, Ueda. See Onissaburo, Deguchi
- Kitamura, Sayo, 2833
- Kivuli, Daudi Zakayo, 36
- Kivuli, John Mweresa, II, 37
- Knapp, Martin Wells, 3097
- Kneeland, Abner, 1148
- Knight, Charles F., 433
- Knight-Bruce, George W. H., 719–720
- Knox, John, 703, 2285
- Ko Bong Soen Sa Nim, 1670
- Ko Thy Byu, 2002
- Köbner, Julius, 290
- Kôdô Kyôdan, 1637–1638
- Kofuku no Kagaku, 1568–1569, 1638–1639
- Kokuchu-Kai, 1639–1640
- Kolingba, André, 531
- Kongtrul, Jamgon, 2124
- Konkokyo, 1640–1641
- Kony, Joseph, 2922
- Koran, the, 405
 Allah in, 1515–1516
 biblical material in, 1516 description of true believers in, 1517
 eschatology of, 1517
 Jesus in, 1516
 major themes of, 1515–1516
 Muhammad in, 1516
 origin of, 1515
- Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea), 1641–1645, 1642 (image), 1643 (map), 1644 (table) missions in, 1642

- religious organizations in, 1644–1645
- repression of religion in, 1642–1644, 1645
- Korea, Republic of (South Korea), 1646–1651, 1647 (map), 1648 (image), 1650 (table)
- Anglicanism in, 1649
- Baptists in, 1649
- Buddhism in, 1646
- Christianity in, 1648–1649
- Confucianism in, 1648
- Methodism in, 1649
- new religions in, 1650
- Pentecostalism in, 1649
- Roman Catholicism in, 1649
- See also* Korean Buddhism
- Korean American Presbyterian Church, 1651–1652
- Korean Buddhism, 1648, 1652–1655, 1653 (image)
- Koryo Buddhism, 1654
- in the modern era, 1654
- Three Kingdoms Buddhism, 1652
- under the Choson, 1654
- Unified Silla Buddhism, 1652–1654
- Korean Christian Church in Japan, 1655
- Korean Methodist Church, 1655–1656
- Koresh, David, 386–387
- Kornya, Mahaly, 294
- Kosovo, 1656–1660, 1657 (image), 1658 (map), 2576–2577
- Koya, Mount, 1659–1660
- Krebs, Fritz, 2072
- Krishna, 3042–3043
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu, 1661–1663, 1662 (image), 2069, 2846–2847
- Krishnamurti Foundations, 1661–1663, 1662 (image)
- Krivogonov, Yuri, 1243
- Ksitigarbha's/Jizo's Birthday, 1663–1664
- Kublai Khan, 1937
- Kugler, Anna S., 111
- Kuhn, Thomas, 1078
- Kukai (Kobo Daishi), 1664–1665
- Kulmitzer, Sonja, 3113 (image)
- Kumarajiva, 1665–1666, 1665 (image)
- Kumuyi, William Folorunso, 876
- Küng, Hans, 1078, 1514–1515
- Kurozumikyō, 1566, 1666–1667
- Kurtz, Paul, 814, 1365
- Kuwait, 1498, 1667–1670, 1668 (image), 1669 (map), 1669 (table)
- Islam in, 1670
- religions other than Islam in, 1670
- Kuyper, Abraham, 2321
- Kwan Um School of Zen, 1670–1671
- Kyrgyzstan, 1671–1674, 1672 (image), 1672 (table), 1673 (map)
- Baptists in, 1673–1674
- Christianity in, 1673
- Islam in, 1673
- La Vey, Anton Szandor, 699–701, 699 (image)
- publications of, 700
- La Vey, Karla, 701
- Laba Festival, 1675
- Lakota people, 1675–1678, 1676 (image)
- Lakwena, Alice, 2933
- Lalibela, 1678
- Lambeth Conference (1888), 130, 676
- Lambeth Palace, 1678–1679
- Lambeth Quadrilateral, 676
- Lambie, Thomas A., 1006, 1009
- Lang, John Dunsmore, 3009
- Lantern Festival (Chinese Lantern Festival), 1679–1680, 1680 (image)
- Lao Buddhist Sangha, 1680–1681
- Laos, 425, 1682–1685, 1682 (image), 1683 (map), 1684 (table)
- Buddhism in, 1682, 1683
- Christianity in, 1683–1684
- Laos Evangelical Church, 1685
- Laozi, 858, 1685–1686, 1686 (image)
- Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), 1038–1039, 1686–1687
- Latin American Evangelical Pentecostal Commission, 1688
- Latin American Mission (LAM), 806–807
- Latin American Theological Fraternity (FTL), 1038
- Latvia, 1688–1691, 1689 (map), 1690 (image), 1691 (table)
- Baptists in, 1690–1691
- Christianity in, 1689–1690
- Paganism in, 1692
- Roman Catholicism in, 1690
- Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1692–1693
- Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization, 1039–1040
- Lausanne Covenant, 1693
- Lausanne movement, 14, 1693–1696, 1694 (image)
- Lavigerie, Charles M., 1917
- Lawes, Frank E., 953, 2114
- Lawes, William George, 953, 2114, 2190
- Lazarus, 12
- Leadbeater, Charles W., 342–343, 2069, 2845
- Leade, Jane, 1697–1698
- Lebanon, 1698–1704, 1699 (image), 1700 (map), 1703 (table)
- Armenians in, 1703
- confessional system of government in, 1699–1700
- Greek (Melkite) Catholic Church in, 1701–1702
- Islam in, 1698–1699
- Jewish community in, 1703
- Maronite Catholic Church in, 1701
- Protestantism in, 1702–1703
- Syrian Catholic Church in, 1702
- under the Ottoman Turks, 1699
- LeBaron, Aaron, 714–715
- LeBaron, Ervil, 714, 2270
- LeBaron, Floren, 714
- LeBaron, Joel, 714, 2270
- LeBaron, Ross Wesley, 714
- Lectorium Rosicrucianum, 1704–1705
- Lee, Ann, 756, 3000–3001
- Lee, Edward, 2593
- Lee, Witness, 1736
- Leeser, Isaac, 2160
- Lefebvre, Marcel, 1139–1141, 1140 (image), 2562
- Legion of Mary, 1705–1706 in Kenya (Maria Legio), 1706–1707, 1707 (image)
- Leibniz, Gottfried, 2231
- Lekganyane, Engenas, 31
- Lemba people, 1707–1708
- Lent, 1708–1710, 1709 (image)
- Leo I (pope), 637
- Leo X (pope), 833
- Leo XIII (pope), 335, 833, 2797, 2855, 3023
- Leopold II (king of Belgium), 776
- Lesotho, 1710–1712, 1711 (map), 1711 (table)

- Lesotho Evangelical Church, 1712–1713
- Leuenberg Church Fellowship.
See Community of Protestant Churches in Europe
- Levi, Eliphaz, 2068
- Lewis, C. S., 1233
- Lewis, H. Spencer, 109
- Lewis, Murshid Samuel, 2739
- Lewis, Ralph Maxwell, 109–110
- Li Shaoju, 67
- Li Tim Oi, 124
- Liberal Catholic Church, 1713–1714
- Liberation Theology, 959, 2200–2201, 2239
- Liberia, 1714–1718, 1715 (image), 1716 (table), 1717 (map)
Islam in, 1717–1718
Lutheranism in, 1716
Methodism in, 1715–1716
Presbyterianism in, 1716
Roman Catholicism in, 1716–1717
- Liberia Baptist and Educational Convention, 1718–1719
- Libya, 1719–1722, 1720 (image), 1721 (map), 1722 (table)
- Liechtenstein, 1723–1724, 1723 (map), 1724 (table)
- Lierde, Jean-Pierre van, 193
- Liggins, John, 125
- Light of the World Church, 1724–1726
- Lindsey, Gordon, 388
- Lingayatism. See Virasaivism
- Lin-Shen Chang, 2894
- Lionza, Maria, Aboriginal cult of, 6–7, 7 (image)
- Lipscomb, David, 732–733, 732 (image)
- Lisle, George, 1559
- Lithuania, 314, 1726–1730, 1727 (image), 1729 (map), 1730 (table)
independence of, 1730
religious freedom in, 1729–1730
Roman Catholicism in, 1728–1729, 1731
Soviet repression of religion in, 1730
- Liturgical Year (Christian), 1731–1733
- Living Church of God, 1733–1734
- Livingston, John, 2375
- Livingstone, David, 774, 1738, 1780, 2919, 2998
- Livingstone Inland Mission, 669
- Llorente, Francisco F., 148, 149
- Local Church, The, 1734–1738, 1735 (image)
criticism of, 1736, 1737
and the formation of Living Stream Ministry, 1736, 1737 growth of, 1735–1736
organization of, 1736–1737
origins of, 1734–1735
other names of (Little Flock; Assembly Hall Churches), 1734
- Lomax, Thomas H., 40
- London Baptist Missionary Society, 96, 245, 327
- London Jews Society, 2791
- London Missionary Society (LMS), 380, 568–569, 643, 685, 705–706, 728, 779, 789, 1108–1109, 1296, 1738–1739, 1767, 1878, 1937, 2190, 2207, 2521, 2641, 2880, 2963, 2997, 3010 work of in Africa, 1738 work of in Niue, 2114 work of in Tahiti, 1153 work of in the Tokelau Islands, 2878
work of in Vanuatu, 3044
- Lonka Sah (Lunka; Lumpaka), 2728–2729
- López, Francisco Solano, 2196–2197
- López, Luis, 148
- Lourdes, 1739–1741, 1740 (image)
- Loyola, Ignatius, 642
- Louis-Marie, Ovono Dibenga, 460
- Lowrie, John C., 696
- Luis Palau Evangelistic Association (LPEA), 1037
- Lumbini, 1742–1743, 1743 (image)
- Lund, Clara, 2593
- Lusitanian Church/Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church, 1744–1745
- Luther, Martin, 640, 1020, 1046, 1052, 1141, 1202, 1232, 1745–1748, 1746 (image), 1753 academic career of, 1745–1746 attack on indulgences, 1746 on the sacraments, 1746–1747 split with Zwingli, 1747
See also Protestant Reformation
- Lutheran Church in Canada, 1748–1749
- Lutheran Church in Hungary, 1749–1750
- Lutheran Church in Liberia, 1750
- Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, 1750–1752, 1751 (image)
- Lutheran World Federation, 1752–1753
- Lutheranism, 711, 1383, 1753–1754, 1754 (image) characteristics of, 1754
in Croatia, 826
in El Salvador, 964
in Estonia, 996–997
in Iceland, 1386
in Liberia, 1716
in Norway, 2121
in Papua New Guinea, 2190–2191
in Somalia, 2665
- Luxembourg, 1755–1757, 1755 (image), 1756 (map), 1757 (table)
- Lyahuka Church of East Africa, 29
- Lynch, James, 706, 1874
- Macao, 568–569, 568 (image)
Islam in, 569
Roman Catholicism in, 568
- Macedonia, 1759–1762, 1759 (map), 1760 (image), 1761 (table)
Christianity in, 1759–1760
- Machen, J. Gresham, 1081
- Machu Picchu, 1762–1763, 1763 (image)
- Mackay, Alexander, 724
- Mackay, George Leslie, 1763–1765
- MacKenzie, John, 1738
- MacLaine, Shirley, 2070
- Maclay, Robert F., 1649, 1655
- Madagascar, 1765–1769, 1766 (image), 1767 (map), 1768 (table)
Christianity in, 1766–68
Islam in, 1768
- Madhva, 1330
- Magellan, Ferdinand, 1908
- Maghi, 1769
- Maguire, Frank, 541
- Maha Bodhi Society, 423, 430, 431, 1769–1771, 1770 (image)
- Maharaj Ji, 966

- Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, 1220, 1221, 1437, 1437 (image). 1985
- Mahasivaratri, 1771–1772
- Mahasthamaprapta's Birthday, 1772–1773
- Mahavira, 1773–1775, 1774 (image)
- Mahayana Buddhism, 421, 423, 429, 431, 433, 442, 445, 561, 592, 1393–1394, 1775–1776, 1775 (image). See also Hui Neng; Zen Buddhism
- Mahinda, 424
- Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah, 1776–1777
- Makiguchi, Tsunesaburo, 2099, 2657
- Malagasy Lutheran Church, 1777–1778
- Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, 1778–1779
 patriarchs of, 1779
- Malawi, 26, 1779–1783, 1780 (image), 1781 (map), 1782 (table)
 Christianity in, 1780–1781
 Islam in, 1782
- Malaysia, 1783–1787, 1783 (image), 1784 (map), 1786 (table)
 Buddhism in, 1785
 Christianity in, 1785–1787
 Hinduism in, 1785
 Islam in, 1785, 1787–1789
- Malcolm X, 2026, 2027, 3089, 3090
- Maldives, The, 1789–1790, 1789 (map), 1790 (table)
- Mali, 1790–1793, 1790 (image), 1791 (image), 1792 (map), 1793 (table)
 Christianity in, 1792
 Islam in, 1791–1792
 Protestantism in, 1792–1793
 traditional religions in, 1791
- Malikite School of Islam, 321, 338, 458, 485, 531, 1240, 1405, 1717–1718, 1791, 1793–1794, 2102, 2105
- Malta, 1794–1797, 1795 (image), 1796 (map), 1797 (table)
 Jewish presence in, 1796–1797
 Roman Catholicism in, 1796
- Maltwood, Katharine, 1219
- Al-Manar (The Beacon)*, 4
- Manavta Mandir, 1797–1798
- Mandaeans, 1798–1799, 1798 (image)
- Manicheanism, 237, 447
- Manjushri's Birthday, 1799–1800
- Mao Zedong, 574, 594
- Maohi Protestant Church, 1800–1801
- Maori religion, 1801–1803, 1802 (image) creation stories of, 1801
 cyclic view of life and death in, 1802
 Maori Christianity, 1802–1803
- Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, 1803–1804
- Mara Evangelical Church, 1804–1805
- Marange, Abero, 26
- Marange, Johane, 25–26
- Marian devotion, 1805–1807, 1805 (image)
See also Medjugorje
- Marijuana, 1011–1012
- Maronite Catholic Church, 1807–1808
- Marsden, Samuel, 120, 2079
- Marshall Islands, 1808–1810, 1809 (map), 1809 (table), 1908
- Marshman, Joshua, 508
- Martin, Dorothy, 2606
- Martínez, José L., 149
- Martinique, 1810–1813, 1811 (image), 1811 (table), 1812 (map)
- Martinism, 1813–1814
- Marty, Martin, 1160
- Martyrdom, 1814–1819, 1815 (image), 1817 (image), 1818 (image) in Christianity, 1816–1817 in Islam, 1817–1819
 in Judaism, 1815–1816
- Marx, Karl, 230, 2940–2941, 2941 (image)
- Marxism, 645
- Mary, Blessed Virgin, 1820–1824, 1821 (image), 2137, 2727–2428, 2441
 doctrinal development concerning (Mariology), 1823 in Islamic thought, 1823–24 and scapulars, 1822 traditions concerning her death, 1822
 visitations of, 1822
- Mary I (Mary Tudor [queen of England]), 502, 1824–1826, 1825 (image)
- Maryknoll, 1826–1827
- Masih, Mirza Masroor Ahmad Khalifatul, V, 57
- Masjid al-Haram al-, 1827–1829
- Mason, Charles, 679–680
- Masowe, John, 162
- Maspéro, Eveline Porée, 440
- Master Ching Hai Meditation Association, 1829
- Mastropietro, Pierre, 194
- Mata Amritanandamayi Math, 1829–1831, 1830 (image)
- Mathers, Samuel Liddell MacGregor, 1318, 1319, 1831–1833
- Matlock, L. C., 3096
- Matsuda, Daijiro, 399
- Matswa, André, 2083
- Matthew, Arnold Harris, 2140
- Matthews, I. G., 1162
- Matthys, Jan, 221
- Mauritania, 1833–1835, 1833 (image), 1834 (map), 1835 (table)
 Christianity in, 1834–1835
 Islam in, 1834
- Mauritius, 1835–1837, 1836 (map), 1837 (table)
 Hinduism in, 1835–1836
- Mavuru, Kefa Ayub, 29
- Mawdudi, Sayyid Abu al-Ala, 20, 1555–1556, 1994, 2806
- May, J. W., 2221
- Mayan calendar, 1837–1839, 1838 (image)
- Mayotte, 1840–1841, 1840 (map), 1840 (table)
- Mazdaznan, 1841
- Mazu Tianfei, cult of, 571
- McAdow, Samuel, 840
- McCall, Nathaniel, 289
- McCauley, Mattie, 680
- McFarlane, John, 2078
- McFarlane, Samuel, 2190
- McGavran, Donald, 1695
- McGrath, Alister, 2985–2986
- McGuire, George Alexander, 41–42
- McIntire, Carl, 1082, 2162
- McKean, Kip, 1462, 1463
- McKean, Olivia, 1463
- McKeown, James, 698–699
- McLean, Elena, 1463
- McMurtry, Grady Louis, 1226, 2150
- McNair, Raymond F., 1733–1734

- McPherson, Aimee Semple, 1080, 1080 (image), 1460–1461, 1460 (image)
- Mecca, 1841–1843, 1842 (image), 1989
- Medicine Buddha's Birthday, 1843
- Medicine Wheel (Wyoming), 1843–1844
- Medinah, 1844–1846, 1845 (image)
- Meditation, 1436, 1846–1849, 1846 (image) in contemporary life, 1848 in major religions, 1846–1847 types of, 1847–1848
- Medjugorje, 1849–1851, 1850 (image)
- Meenakshi Temple, 1851–1852, 1852 (image)
- Meiji Jingu, 1852–1853
- Melanchthon, Philip, 1747
- Melcher, Joseph, 2585
- Melkite Catholic Church, 1853–1854, 2790–2791, 3105
- Melville, Andrew, 704
- Mencius, 1854–1855, 1855 (image)
- Mendelssohn, Moses, 2371, 2371 (image)
- Meng Ke, 766
- Mennonite Church in the Netherlands, 1855–1856
- Mennonite Church, U.S.A., 1856–1859, 1857 (image)
- Mennonite World Conference, 1859–1860
- Mennonites, 97, 368, 711, 1860–1861, 1860 (image)
in Paraguay, 2205–2206
in Russia, 103
in Uruguay, 3031–3032
- Meredith, Roderick, 1733, 3146
- Merici, Angela, 3022–3023
- Meron, Mount, 1862
- Mersdorf, Alexander, 1035
- Mesmer, Franz Anton, 2067–2068, 2705
- Mesmerism, 2705
- Mesrop Mashtots, 186
- Methodist Church, Brazil, 1871–1872
- Methodist Church, Caribbean and the Americas, 1880–1881, 1881 (image)
- Methodist Church, Chile, 1872–1873
- Methodist Church, Cuba, 1883–1884
- Methodist Church, Fiji and Rotuma, 1873–1874
- Methodist Church, Ghana, 1865
- Methodist Church, Great Britain, 1865–1867
- Methodist Church, India, 1874–1875, 1875 (image)
- Methodist Church, Indonesia, 1876
- Methodist Church, Ireland, 1876–1877, 1877 (image)
- Methodist Church, Kenya, 1877–1878
- Methodist Church, Malaysia, 1884–1886, 1885 (image)
- Methodist Church, Mexico, 1886–1887
- Methodist Church, New Zealand, 1887–1888
- Methodist Church, Nigeria, 1867–1868, 1867 (image)
- Methodist Church, Peru, 1888–1889
- Methodist Church, Puerto Rico, 1889
- Methodist Church, Samoa, 1878–1879, 1879 (image)
- Methodist Church, Sierra Leone, 1889–1891, 1890 (image)
- Methodist Church, Singapore, 1879–1880
- Methodist Church, Southern Africa, 1891–1892, 1891 (image)
- Methodist Church, Sri Lanka, 1868–1870, 1869 (image)
- Methodist Church, Togo, 1892–1893
- Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar, 1870–1871
- Methodist Church, Zimbabwe, 1882–1883
- Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC), 37, 39, 777, 835, 2989, 2990, 3096
- Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS), 2990, 2995
- Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile, 1893
- Methodists, 159, 507, 508, 643, 659, 706–707, 712, 734, 756, 840, 902–903, 981, 982, 989, 1075, 1079, 1106, 1145, 1210, 1216, 1339, 1351, 1532, 1737, 1745, 1863–1865, 1864 (image), 1948, 1951, 1952, 2222, 2246, 2286, 2307, 2325, 2380, 3095–3096
in Algeria, 75
in American Samoa, 96
in Anguilla, 139
in Australia, 245, 1145, 1403
in the Bahamas, 269, 270
in Barbados, 301, 303
in Belarus, 316
in Belgium, 320
in Belize, 327, 330
in Benin, 338
in Bolivia, 368
in Chile, 558
in Cote d'Ivoire, 811, 812
in Cuba, 835
in Estonia, 996, 997
in the Fiji Islands, 1109, 1110, 1111 and Fundamentalism, 1160, 1161, 1162
in Germany, 1202
in Ghana, 1210
in Gibraltar, 1216
in Honduras, 1351
in Ireland, 1505
in Jamaica, 1559, 1562
in Kenya, 1627
in Lesotho, 1710
in Liberia, 1715–1716
in Lithuania, 1730
in Macedonia, 1761
in Mexico, 1900
in Montserrat, 1943–1944
in Mozambique, 1984
in the Netherlands Antilles, 2063
in New Zealand, 2079
in Nicaragua, 2090
in Nigeria, 2107
in North Korea, 1642, 1643
in Norway, 2121
in Pakistan, 696, 698, 2173
in Panama, 2183
in Peru, 2240
in the Republic of Korea, 1649
in Russia, 2475, 2478
in Sierra Leone, 2626
in Singapore, 2641–2642
in the Solomon Islands, 2661–2662
in Tonga, 2880–2881, 2882
- Mevlevi Sufi Order, 1894–1895, 1894 (image), 2743
- Mexico, 1895–1908, 1896 (image), 1898 (image), 1901 (image), 1902 (map), 1903 (table)
- Amerindian culture in, 1896, 1897
current religious situation in, 1900–1901, 1903–1904

- Eastern Orthodoxy in, 1904
 five major ancient civilizations of, 1895
 Mennonites in, 1901
 non-Protestant Christian groups in, 1904–1905
 Protestant movements in, 1899–1900, 1901–1902
 registered non-Christian religions in, 1905–1907
 Roman Catholicism in, 1896, 1897–1899
 Spanish colonial period of, 1896, 1897
- Meyer, Heinrich, 294
 Meyer, Jacob O., 218
 Michaelius, Jonas, 2374
 Micronesia, Federated States of, 1908–1911, 1909 (map), 1910 (table)
 Mid-Autumn Festival, 1911–1912, 1912 (image)
 Middle East Council of Churches, 1912–1913
 Middlemiss, George, 1891
 Mikhail, M. S. (Bishop Antonious Markos), 2151
 Miki, Nakayama, 1566, 2831, 2832, 2833
 Milarepa, 1914–1915, 1914 (image)
 Miller, William, 18, 18 (image), 217, 406, 1079, 1242, 2211, 2587, 3004
 Mirabai, 1397
 Mission Covenant Church, 1915–1916
 Missionaries of Charity, 1916–1917, 1916 (image)
 Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa (the White Sisters), 1917–1918
 Missione (La Missione). See Paparelli, Luigia
 Mita Congregation, 1919–1920
 Mitchell, Hulon, Jr. (Yahweh ben Yahweh), 2028
 Modernity, 1921–1923, 1922 (image) modern religious trends, 1922–1923
 Mohammad, Warith (Wallace) Deen, 3088–3090
 Mokichi, Okada, 2568–2569
 Mokone, Mangena Maake, 39
- Moldova, 1924–1926, 1925 (map), 1926 (table)
 Baptists in, 1924–1925
 Christianity in, 1924
 Islam in, 1925
 Jewish community in, 1925–1926
 Seventh-day Adventists in, 1925
 Moller, Robert, 1761
 Molokans (milk drinkers), 257, 1926–1927, 2474
 Monaco, 1927–1929, 1928 (map), 1928 (table)
 Monastery of the Transfiguration, 2637
 Monasticism, 635, 1929–1935, 1930 (image), 1932 (image) among women, 1933
 Benedictine, 756, 1933
 Buddhist, 1929–1930
 Christian, 1931–1935
 Dominican, 1933–1934
 Jainian, 1930–1931
 and The Rule of St. Benedict, 1932–1933
 Mongolia, 1935–1938, 1936 (map), 1938 (table)
 Christianity in, 1937–1938
 Tibetan Buddhism in, 1937
 unification of religion in under Atlan Khan, 1935, 1937
 Mongols, 464–465, 638, 1935, 2794
 Monod, Jean, 1226
 Monophysites, 1004, 2793–2794
 Montaigne, Michel de, 1233
 Montenegrin Orthodox Church, 1938–1939, 1942
 Montenegro, 1939–1943, 1940 (image), 1941 (map), 1942 (table)
 annexation of to Serbia, 1942
 Eastern Orthodoxy and the Serbian Orthodox Church in, 1941–1942
 Roman Catholicism in, 1942–1943
 Montserrat, 1943–1945, 1943 (table), 1944 (map)
 Moody, Dwight L., 608, 821
 Moon, Sun Myung, 1945–1946, 1945 (image)
See also Unification Movement (UM)
 Moore, Jennie Evans, 2593
 Moore, John J., 40
 Moore, Richard, 339
- Moravian Church, European Continental Province, 1947–1949
 Moravian Church in America, 1949–1951, 1950 (image)
 Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province, 1946–1947
 Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland, 1951–1952
 Moravian Church in Jamaica, 1952–1953
 Moravian Church in Nicaragua, 1953–1954, 1953 (image)
 Moravian Church in Southern Africa, 1954–1955
 Moravian Church in Suriname, 1955–1957, 2759
 Moravian Church in Tanzania, 1957–1958
 Moravians, 93, 287, 490, 507, 508, 606, 643, 693, 712, 908, 1022, 1049, 1076, 1079, 1261, 1881, 1934, 3094, 3095
 in Antigua/Barbuda, 144
 in Barbados, 303
 in Estonia, 997
 in Ghana, 1210
 in Jamaica, 1559
 in St. Lucia, 2504
 in South Africa, 2672
 in Tanzania, 2815
 in the Virgin Islands, 3074
 More, Hannah, 737
 Morgan, G. Campbell, 1162, 1163 (image)
 Mormonism. See Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS)
 Morocco, 1958–1962, 1959 (image), 1960 (image), 1961 (map), 1961 (table)
 Christianity in, 1959–1960
 Islam in, 1958–1959
 Jewish community in, 1959
 Orthodoxy in, 1960, 1962
 Protestants movement in, 1960
 Morrison, Robert, 568, 1962–1963
 Morton, John, 2291–2292
 Morton, Sarah, 2291–2292
 Moscow, 1963–1967, 1964 (image)
 Moses, 1594, 1967–1968, 2636–2637
 Mosques, 1968–1973, 1969 (image), 1971 (image) acceptance of women in, 1971 architecture of, 1970

- Mosques (continued) historical importance of, 1971–1972 importance of the orientation of, 1968–1969 large size of, 1972
 origins of, 1969–1970
 social functions of, 1970–1971
 Mother of God Centre, 1974–1975
 Mother Meera, disciples of, 1973
 Mother Teresa, 1916–1917, 1916 (image), 2510
 Mountains, 1975–1978, 1976 (image) as the dwelling places of the gods, 1975–1976
 as temples of worship, 1976–1977
 Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, The, 1978–1979
 Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA), 1979–1981
 Mozambique, 26, 1981–1986, 1982 (image), 1984 (map), 1985 (table)
 Christianity in, 1983
 independence movements and civil war in, 1982–1983
 Islam in, 1983
 Protestantism in, 1983–1985
 traditional religions in, 1983
 Transcendental Meditation (TM) in, 1985–1986
 Mpadi, Simon-Pierre, 2083
 Muawiya ibn Abi Sufyan, 77
 Mudras, 1986–1988, 1987 (image)
 Muhammad, Elijah, 1210, 2026, 2027, 3089, 3090
 Muhammad the Prophet, 13, 54, 55, 56, 69, 76, 101, 117, 165, 210, 348, 636, 1373, 1516, 1533, 1556, 1970, 1988–1990, 1988 (image)
 character of, 1989
 God's call to, 1512
 historical accuracy concerning, 1513–1515 marriage of, 1511–1512 military life of, 1512, 1989
 pilgrimage of to Mecca, 1989 protests over Danish cartoons of, 1514
 See also Companions of the Prophet; Mecca; Medina
 Muhammadiyah, 2189
 Muktananda, 2623–2624
 Mul Shankara, 203–204
 Mulandi, Simeon, 26
 Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships, 1990
 Munetada, Kurozumi, 1566
 Muñoz, Antonio, 156
 Müntzer, Thomas, 221
 Muridīyya, 1990–1993, 1991 (image) developmental phases of, 1991 relationship of with the French, 1991–1992
 Murray, Billy D., 683
 Murray, Margaret, 3113, 3114
 Murray, William, 89
 Musama Disco Christo Church (MDCC), 1993–1994
 Mushati, Simon, 26
 Muslim Brotherhood, 948, 1522, 1994–1996, 2792–2793
 Muslim World League, 1996–1997
 Muslims, 5, 11, 19, 20, 21 (image), 56, 58, 63, 76, 146, 165, 177, 183, 202, 209, 278, 279, 304, 321, 331, 343, 348, 351, 378, 410, 412, 444, 449, 557, 1297, 2637–2638
 in Australia, 247
 in Bosnia, 251
 in Brazil, 395
 in Canada, 492
 in Cuba, 838
 in Cyprus, 843
 in Hong Kong, 567
 in the Israeli-occupied territories, 2127–2128
 Turkish Muslims, 249
 See also Druze Muslims; Ismaili Muslims; Mecca; Medina; Muhammad the Prophet; Shia Muslims; Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra; Sunni Muslims
 Mutima Walowa Wa Makumbi, 1997–1998
 Myanmar, 1998–2001, 1998 (image), 1999 (map), 2000 (table)
 Buddhism in, 1998–2000
 Buddhist organizations in, 2001
 Myanmar Baptist Convention, 2001–2002
 Myōchikai Kyōdan, 2002–2003
 Myozen, 899
 Nachman of Bratslav, 1314
 Naganuma, Myoko, 2420
 Nagarjuna, 2007
 Nagorno Karabakh Republic, 2007–2008
 Naht Hanh, Thich, 2949
 Namgyal, Ngawang, 346
 Nalanda, 2009–2010, 2009 (image)
 Namibia, 2010–2013, 2010 (image), 2011 (map), 2012 (table) contemporary religion in, 2011–2012
 Protestant movements in, 2012–2013
 Roman Catholicism in, 2012
 struggle for independence of from Germany, 2010–2011
 Nanak (Guru Nanak), 1235, 1326, 1397, 139–1399, 2013–2015, 2014 (image), 2170, 2629, 2630 birthday of, 2015–2016
 Nao, Deguchi, 1566, 2147
 Naqshband, Baha al-Din, 445
 Naqshbandiya Sufi Order, 2016–2017
 Nara, 2017–2019, 2018 (image)
 Nara, six Buddhist schools of, 2019–2025, 2020
 Hosso School, 2022–2023
 Jujitsu School, 2021
 Kegon School, 2024
 Kusha School, 2020–2021
 Ritsu School, 2024–2025
 Sanron School, 2021–2022
 Naropa, 2025–2026
 Nasser, Gamel Abdel, 4, 465, 1526, 1995
 Nation of Islam, 2026–2028, 2027 (image)
 Nation of Yahweh, 2028–2030, 2029
 National Association of Congregational Christian Churches, 2030
 National Association of Evangelicals of Bolivia (ANDEB), 369
 National Association of Freewill Baptists, 2031–2032
 National Baptist Convention of America, 92, 2032
 National Baptist Convention of Mexico, 2032–2033
 National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., 2033–2035, 2034 (image)
 National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon, 2035–2036

- National Presbyterian Church in Mexico, 2036–2037
- National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC), 2037–2038
- Native American Church, 1015, 2038–2041, 2039 (image) importance of peyote to, 2038
 peyote ceremony/ritual of, 2039–2041
 Peyote Road ethic of, 2039
 protection of by federal regulations, 2040 spread of in the Native American populations, 2040
- Native American religion, and Roman Catholicism, 2041–2045, 2042 (image) and enculturation, 2041–2042 influence of Kateri Tekakwitha on, 2043–2044 theology and ritual of, 2043
- Native Americans, 1015
See also Bear Butte; Ghost Dance; Native American Church; Native American religion, and Roman Catholicism; Navajo
- Native Baptist Church, 2045
- Naunda, Kenneth, 3175–3176
- Nauru, 2045–2047, 2046 (map), 2046 (table)
- Nauru Congregational Church, 2047
- Navajo (the Dine [the People]), 2047–2049, 2048 (image) creation and preservation of hozho among, 2048–2049
- Navaratri/Dashain, 2049–2050
- Navarra, Fernand, 164
- Navarro, Juan, 148
- Naylor, R. H., 225
- Nazareth, 2050–2052, 2051 (image)
- Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church, 31, 2052–2053
- Nee, To-sheng. See Nee, Watchman
- Nee, Watchman, 1734–1736
- Nepal, 2053–2056, 2053 (image), 2054 (map), 2055 (table)
 Hinduism and Buddhism in, 2054–2055
 indigenous religions in, 2056–2057
- Nerses Bedros XIX (patriarch), 191
- Nerses IV Klayetsi (the Gracious), 186, 188
- Nestorian Church, 151
- Nestorius, 635–636
- Netherlands, The, 2057–2061, 2057 (image), 2059 (map), 2060 (table)
 and decolonization, 2060 effect of World War II on religious practices in, 2059–2060
 the Protestant Reformation in, 2058
 Roman Catholicism and The Brethren in the Middle Ages, 2057–2058
See also Remonstrant Brotherhood
- Netherlands Antilles, 2061–2064, 2062 (map), 2063 (table)
- Netherlands Reformed Churches, 631, 2064, 2996
- Nettesheim, Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa von, 53–54, 53 (image)
- Neturei Karta, 2064–2066, 2065 (image)
- Nevius, John L., 2855, 2856
- New Acropolis Cultural Association, 2066–2067
- New Age movement(s), 973, 2067–2072, 2068 (image)
 and channeling, 2070 concepts of energy in, 975–976 decline of in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, 2071
 and the Lord Maytreya, 2068–2069
 Mesmerist movement, 2068
 occultism, 2068
 and the transformation of society, 2069–2070 and the use of crystals, 2070
See also Astrology; Western Esoteric tradition
- New Apostolic Church, 2072
- New Apostolic Church International, 175, 3033
- New Caledonia. See Kanaky (New Caledonia)
- New Kadampa Tradition-International Kadampa Buddhist Union, 2073–2974
- New religious movements (NRMs), 2264–2266, 2266–2267
- New Thought movement, 2404
- New Year's Day, 2074–2077, 2075 (image)
 Baha'i New Year's Day, 2076
 Chinese New Year's Day, 2074–2075
 Indian New Year's Day, 2076
 Islamic New Year's Day, 2075–2076
 Sikh New Year's Day, 2076
- New Zealand, 2077–2081, 2078 (image), 2080 (map), 2081 (table)
 Christianity in, 2077–2078
 Maori response to Christianity, 2078–2079
 traditional Maori religion of, 2077
- Newar Buddhism, 2082
- Newman, John P., 1068–1069, 1068 (image)
- Newton, Isaac, 2555–2556
- Ngala, Nathan K., 26, 27
- Nguema, Marcus, 988, 990
- Ngunzist Churches (Congo), 2083–2084
- Ngunzi (“prophet”) churches, 31
- Nicaea, 2084–2085
- Nicaragua, 2085–2096, 2086 (image), 2088 (map), 2093 (table) chronic political turmoil in, 2085–2089 development of Roman Catholicism in the Spanish colonial period, 2089–2091 devastation of the Managua earthquake in, 2087, 2093
 minor Christian groups in, 2095
 Protestantism in, 2091–2095
 under the Somoza dictatorship, 2086–2087
 U.S. involvement in support of rebel groups in, 2087–2086 world religions in, 2095–2096
- Nicene Creed, 635, 795, 928, 1010, 2096
- Nichidatsu, Fujii, 2112–2113
- Nichiren, 1609–1610, 2097–2099, 2097 (image)
- Nichiren Shoshu, 2099–2100
- Nichirensu, 2100–2101
- Nicolas V (pope), 2441
- Niger, 2101–2103, 2101 (image), 2102 (map), 2103 (table)
 Christianity in, 2102–2103
 Islam in, 2103
 Roman Catholicism in, 2103
- Nigeria, 2103–2111, 2105 (image), 2108 (map), 2110 (table)
 Christianity in, 2107
 effects of Islam on, 2106–2107

- Nigeria (continued) indigenous African churches in, 2107–2108
 indigenous religions of, 2104–2105
 Islam in, 2105–2106
 Pentecostalism in, 2109
 prophetic and healing churches in, 2108–2109
 Spiritual Science movements in, 2109–2100
 Nigerian Baptist Convention, 2111–2112
 Nikko, 2098
 Nikon (Patriarch Nikon), 2130
 Nipponzan Myohoji, 2112–2114, 2113 (image)
 Nirvana, 100, 101, 359, 360, 374, 375, 421, 869, 872, 885, 897, 977, 978, 1392, 1393, 1457, 1552, 1776, 1929, 2019–2022, 2388, 2512, 2530, 2614, 3070
 Nityananda, 2623
 Niue, 2114–2115, 2114 (table), 2115 (map)
 Niwano, Nikkyo, 2420
 N’Krumah, Kwame, 1209
 Noli, Fan S., 63, 66
 Nomiya Luo Church, 2115–2116
 Norris, J. Frank, 284, 284 (image)
 Norris, William H., 1068
 North German Missionary Society, 2875–2876
 North Korea. See Korea, Democratic People’s Republic of (North Korea)
 Northern Baptist Convention, 92
 Northern Ireland, 2985
 Northern Marianas, 2116–2118, 2117 (map), 2118 (table)
 Norton, Judith, 320
 Norton, Ralph, 320
 Norway, 2118–2122, 2119 (image), 2120 (map), 2122 (table)
 the Church of Norway, 2119
 Free churches in, 2119, 2121
 Islam in, 2121
 Lutheranism in, 2121
 Methodism in, 2121
 Penetecostalism in, 2121
 Roman Catholicism in, 2121
 Norwegian Baptist Union, 2122–2123
 Notre Dame Cathedral, 1128 (image), 1129
 Nuhu, Lucas, 29
 Nydahl, Hannah, 890
 Nydahl, Ole, 890–891, 890 (image)
 Nyingman Tibetan Buddhism, 2123–2125, 2124 (image)
 Nzago, Theodor Obiang Nguema Mba, 988
 Obama, Barack, 1529
 Obote, Milton, 2920
 Observants, 1136
 Occupied Territories. See Israel, occupied territories of Ockenga, Harold, 1081
 Oecolampadius, John, 2781
 O’Hair, Jon, 89
 O’Hair, Madalyn Murray, 88–89
 O’Hair, Robin Murray, 89
 O’Higgins, Bernardo, 548–549
 Olcott, Henry S., 342, 432, 356, 2845, 2848, 3102
 Old Believers (Russia), 2130–2132, 2131 (image)
 Old Catholic Church in Switzerland, 2132–2133
 Old Catholic Church of Austria, 2133–2134
 Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/ Catholic Church of Mariavites, 2134–2136, 2135 (image)
 Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands, 2136–2139
 Old Catholicism, 2139–2141
 Old Order Mennonite Church, 98
 Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church, 2141–2142
 Oldham, William F., 1879
 Olier, Jean Jacques, 2750–2751
 Olumba Olumba Obu, 409
 Olympus, Mount, 2141–2144, 2143 (image)
 Oman, 2144–2147, 2144 (image), 2145 (map), 2146 (table)
 Anglicanism in, 2146–2147
 Christianity in, 2146
 Islam in, 2144–2146
 Roman Catholicism in, 2146
 Omoto, 1566, 2147–2148
 Oncken, J. W., 290
 Oncken, John G., 293–294
 Ondeto, Mtakatifu, 1706, 1707
 Onissaburo, Deguchi, 2147–2148
 Ontakekyo, 2148–2149
 Open Brethren, 863, 3058
 Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), 2149–2150
 Organization of African Instituted Churches (OAIC), 2150–2152
 Origen, 2843
 Orimolade, Moses, 545–546
 Ortega, Daniel, 2087–2088
 Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania, 65–67
 Orthodox Church in America, 2152–2154
 Orthodox Church in China, 2154–2155
 Orthodox Church of Cyprus, 2155–2157
 Orthodox Church of Greece, 2157–2158, 2157 (image)
 Orthodox Church of Poland (OCP), 2158–2159, 2930
 Orthodox Judaism, 2159–2161, 2160 (image)
 Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 2161–2163
 Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia, 2155
 Osho (Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh), 2163–2164
 Ositelu, Josiah, 715
 Osore, Mount, 2164–2165
 Ostrong Monastery, 1940 (image)
 Osuke, Shimoyama, 2148
 Ottoman Empire, 3, 70, 71, 183–184, 234, 312, 376, 447, 638–639, 743, 1247, 1496, 1498, 1525, 1533, 1630, 2157, 2430–2431, 2575–2576, 2577, 2792, 2903–2904, 3151 genocide carried out against the Armenians by, 189, 2904
 Our Lady of All Nations, 2165–2166
 Owalo, Johana, 2116
 Owens, Dale, 1148
 Ozman, Agnes, 2206, 2225
 Pacific Council of Churches, 2167
 Padmasambhava, 429, 576, 2167–2168
 Pagan Federation, 2168–2169
 Paganism, 785, 1487, 1699, 2211, 2577, 2753, 2981, 3100, 3108, 3109, 3111
 Arabic, 117
 Christian, 736

- European, 1015, 2168
 in Hungary, 1369
 in Latvia, 1692
 neo-Paganism, 945, 2421, 2753, 2928, 3120 in Portugal, 2275
 in Ukraine, 2924, 2925
- Pakistan, 2169–2174, 2170 (image), 2172 (map), 2173 (table)
 the Ahmadiyyas in, 2171–2172 ancient Pakistan, 2169–2170
 Christianity in, 2173
 Islam in, 2171, 2172–2173
 modern state of, 2170–2171
 Roman Catholicism in, 2174
 separation of Bangladesh from, 2171
- Palau, 2174–2176, 2175 (map), 2176 (table)
- Palm Sunday, 1432
- Palo Mayombe, 2176–2177
- Palau, Luis, 1037–1038, 1038 (image)
- Palestine, 1535, 1590, 1994
See also Israel, occupied territories of
- Pali Canon, 417, 440
- Panama, 2177–2188, 2178 (table), 2181 (map), 2184 (image)
 Anglicanism in, 2183
 Assemblies of God in, 2182–2183, 2185
 Baptists in, 2183–2184
 Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement in, 2182
 Eastern Orthodoxy in, 2185–2186
 economy of, 2177–2178
 history of U.S. intervention in, 2178–2180 minor sects in, 2186–2187
 Pentecostalism in, 2184
 Protestantism in, 2184–2185
 Roman Catholicism in, 2178, 2180–2182
- Panchen Lama, 579 (image)
- Pangestu, 2188–2189
- Pannenberg, Wolfart, 2551
- Pantheism, 2189–2190
- Paparelli, Luigia, 1918–1919
- Papua New Guinea, 2190–2194, 2191 (image), 2192 (map), 2193 (table)
 indigenous religions in, 2193
 Lutheranism in, 2190–2191
 wide spectrum of Christian denominations in, 2191, 2193
- Paraguay, 2194–2205, 2195 (image), 2199 (map), 2203 (table)
 the Colorado Party of, 2196, 2197
 dominance of Roman Catholicism in, 2194
 Jesuit missions in, 2199–2200
 Mennonites in, 2205–2206
 non-Christian religions in, 2203–2204
 Protestant movements in, 2202–2203
 Roman Catholicism in, 2198–2202
 social progress of due to immigration, 2195–2196
 under the dictatorship of Stroessner, 2197–2198
 under the dictatorship of Francisco López, 2196–2197
 under Spanish colonial rule, 2196
- Paramahansa, Ramakrishna, 1430, 3046, 3047–3048
- Parham, Charles Fox, 159–160, 159 (image), 212, 406, 2206–2207, 2221, 2225
- Paris Mission, 2207–2208, 2295
- Parker, Quanah, 2038
- Parks, John, 1899
- Parr, John Nelson, 215
- Parsons, Jack, 699, 2150
- Parsons, Levi, 2791–2792
- Paryushana, 2208–2209
- Pashupata Saivism, 2209
- Pasqually, Jacques Martinez de, 1813
- Passover, 2209–2212, 2210 (image) among Jewish Christians, 2211–2212
 Christian Passover, 2211
See also Pesach
- Pasundan Christian Church, 2212
- Patanjali, 2213, 3158, 3163
- Patotsav, 2213–2214
- Patterson, J. O., 680
- Patterson, John Coleridge, 652, 2751
- Paul VI (pope), 2563, 3023
- Paul, 633, 634, 1231, 2214–2216, 2214 (image) conversion of, 2215
 education of, 2214–2215 journeys in Greece, 1247, 2215
 martyrdom of, 2216
 missionary journeys of, 2215–2216
- Paul, Joseph, 270
- Paulceus, Joseph, 680
- Payne, John, 1716
- Peace of Augsburg, 1020
- Peace Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy (PTS), 1980–1981
- Peacocke, Arthur, 2551
- Pelagius, 238
- Penn, William, 711, 1155, 1157–1158
- Pennepack Baptist Church, 90
- Pendell, Larry, 2221 (image)
- Pentecost, 924, 2216–2217
- Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, 2217–2218
- Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, 2218–2219
- Pentecostal Church of Chile, 2219–2220
- Pentecostal Church of God, 2220–2222, 2221 (image)
- The Pentecostal Mission (TPM), 2222–2223
- Pentecostal Mission Church, 2222
- Pentecostal Missionary Union (PMU), 216
- Pentecostal World Fellowship, 2223–2225
- Pentecostalism, 153–154, 159–160, 215, 368–369, 392, 393–394, 773, 836–837, 1160, 2225–2227, 2226 (image), 2523
 in Honduras, 1352–1353
 in Nigeria, 2109
 in Norway, 2121
 in Panama, 2184
 in the Republic of Korea, 1649
 in Scandinavia, 2227–2228
 in Uruguay, 3031
See also Charismatic movement; People of God; Spirituality, Pentecostal; True Jesus Church
- People of God, 2228–2229
- People's Republic of China (PRC), annexation of Tibet, 573, 574, 1619
- Peoples Temple, 2229–2231, 2230 (image) suicide pact taken by members of, 2231
- Perennialism, 2231–2232
- Perfect Liberty Kyodan, 2232–2233
- Perl, Jacob, 1670

- Perón, Juan Domingo, 170, 172, 173
- Perry, Matthew, 1571
- Perry, Troy, 3016–3017
- Peru, 2233–2245, 2235 (image), 2238 (map), 2242 (map)
- Eastern Orthodoxy in, 2242–2243
 - Hinduism in, 2243
 - parallel cultural development in, 2234–2235
 - racial mixture of its population, 2233–2234
 - Protestant movements in, 2239–2242
 - Roman Catholicism in, 2236–2237, 2239
 - ruling Spanish elite of, 2235–2236
 - slavery in, 2235
 - traditional religions in, 2244
 - and the War of the Pacific, 2236
 - Western Esoteric tradition in, 2243–2244
- Peruvian Evangelical Church, 2245–2247
- Pesach, 2247–2249, 2248 (image) and Christianity, 2249
- Peter, 633, 2425
- Peter the Great, 2451, 2474
- Petty, Calvin C., 40
- Philadelphia Church of God, 2249–2250
- Philip II (king of Spain), 318
- Philip III (king of Spain), 1240
- Philippine Independent Church, 2250–2252
- Philippines, 2252–2256, 2252 (image), 2254 (map), 2255 (table)
- indigenous religion of the Bisayans in, 2253, 2255–2256
 - Protestant movements in, 2253
 - Roman Catholicism in, 2252–2253
- Philo of Alexandria, 1231, 2843
- Phuurithatto, Phra Ajaan Man, 2836
- Pilgrim Holiness Church, 3096, 2097
- Pilgrimage, 2256–2262, 2257 (image), 2274 (image), 2636 (image), 2638
- association of in modern times with tourism, 2260–2261
 - pilgrimage routes, 2259
 - pilgrimage sites, 2259
 - replication and localization of, 2259–2260
 - role of symbolism in, 2258–2259
 - ubiquity of, 2257–2258
- See also* Cathedrals, as places of pilgrimage; Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage; Shikoku Pilgrimage
- Pingree, David, 226
- Pinochet, José Ramón, 549
- Pío (Padre Pío), 3034
- Pitcairn, 2262–2263, 2262 (map), 2263 (table)
- Pius V (pope), 568
- Pius IX (pope), 2137, 2855
- Pius X, 1587. See also Fraternity/Society of St. Pius X
- Pius XI (pope), 3022
- Pius XII (pope), 146, 335
- Plantard, Pierre, 2308, 2310
- Plato, 2843, 2854, 3099, 3099 (image)
- Plymouth Brethren, 862–863
- Poland, 2263–2267, 2264 (image), 2265 (map), 2266 (table)
- new religious movements (NRMs) within the Catholic Church, 2264–2266
 - non-Roman Catholic new religious movements (NRMs), 2266–2267
 - Protestant movements in, 2266
 - Roman Catholicism in, 2263
- Polish National Catholic Church (PNCC)/Polish Catholic Church (PCC), 2267–2269
- Polygamy-practicing Mormons, 2269–2271, 2270 (image)
- Pomun Order of Korean Buddhism, 2271–2272
- Pontoppidan, Erik, 694
- Poor Clares, 1134, 1137
- Popkin, Richard H., 1233
- Popocatepetl, Mount, 2272–2273, 2273 (image)
- Popper, Karl, 2551
- Portugal, 642, 2273–2279, 2274 (image), 2276 (map), 2278 (table)
- history of religious diversity in, 2274–2278
 - Roman Catholicism in, 2273, 2278
 - Spiritism in, 2277–2278
 - Theosophy in, 2278
- Possession, 2279–2283, 2280 (image) of animals, 2280
- involuntary and voluntary possession, 2280–2281
- Post, Henry Barrington, 2295
- Potay, Michel, 167
- Potter, Charles Francis, 1365
- Prambanan, 2283–2285, 2284 (image)
- Pratt, Orson, 2514
- Presbyterian Church in Brazil, 2292–2293
- Presbyterian Church in Cameroon, 2285
- Presbyterian Church in Canada, 2285–2287, 2286 (image)
- Presbyterian Church in India, 2296–2297
- Presbyterian Church in Rwanda, 2302
- Presbyterian Church in Taiwan, 2287–2288, 2288 (image)
- Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea, 2288–2289
- Presbyterian Church in Trinidad, 2289–2291
- Presbyterian Church of Africa, 2291
- Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand, 2291–2292
- Presbyterian Church of Australia (Continuing), 2292
- Presbyterian Church of Cameroon, 2293–2294
- Presbyterian Church of Colombia, 2294–2295
- Presbyterian Church of East Africa, 2295
- Presbyterian Church of England, 2997
- Presbyterian Church of Ghana, 2297
- Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong), 2297–2298
- Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap), 2298–2299
- Presbyterian Church of Liberia, 2299–2300, 2300 (image)
- Presbyterian Church of Mozambique, 2300
- Presbyterian Church of Nigeria, 2300–2301
- Presbyterian Church of Pakistan, 2301–2302
- Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa. See Uniting Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa
- Presbyterian Church in the Sudan, 2302–2303
- Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), 2305–2307, 2306 (image)
- merger of with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, 2306

- Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu, 2303–2304
- Presbyterian Church of Wales, 2304–2305
- Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba, 2307–2308
- Presbyterians, 486, 523–524, 969, 981, 989, 1037, 1975, 1216, 1403, 1745, 1892, 2030, 2208, 3009–3010, 3045
- in Ethiopia, 1006
- and Fundamentalism, 1160, 1162, 1164
- in Ireland, 1505
- in Jamaica, 1559, 1562, 1952
- in Gabon, 1169
- in Guyana, 1296
- in Kiribati, 1634
- in Lebanon, 1702
- in Liberia, 1716
- in Mexico, 1899, 1900
- in New Zealand, 2078, 2079, 2081
- in North Korea, 1642, 1643
- in Pakistan, 2173
- in Peru, 2241
- in South Korea, 1649
- Presbytery of Liberia, 2308
- Prince of Peace Evangelical Church Association, 1274
- Priory of Sion, 2308–2311, 2309 (image)
- Priscillianism, 2275
- Progressive National Baptist Convention of America, 2311–2312
- Progressive Utilization Theory (PROUT), 105
- Prophet, Elizabeth, 729, 730–731
- Prophet, Mark L., 728–729
- Prophet, Sean, 730
- Protestant Christian Batak Church, 2312–2314, 2313 (image)
- Protestant Christian Church of Bali, 2314–2315
- Protestant Christian Church of Nias, 2315
- Protestant Christian Church-Angkola, 2314
- Protestant Church of Algeria, 2325–2326
- Protestant Church in Indonesia, 2315–2316
- Protestant Church in the Moluccas, 2318–2319
- Protestant Church in the Netherlands, 2319–2323, 2320 (image)
- moderate wing of, 2321
- orthodox (Nearer Reformation) wing of, 2319–2320
- progressive wing of, 2320–2321
- special place of the Walloon Churches in, 2321
- Protestant Church in Sabah (Malaysia), 2316–2317
- Protestant Church of Senegal, 2326
- Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi, 2317–2318
- Protestant Church in Timor Lorosa'e, 2323–2324, 2324 (image)
- Protestant Church in Western Indonesia, 2324–2325
- Protestant Evangelical Church in Guinea, 2327–2328
- Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor, 2326–2327
- Protestant Methodist Church of Benin, 2328
- Protestant Reformation, 640–642, 735, 1374
- Protestantism, 93, 129, 146, 147, 174, 245, 305, 318, 320, 321, 324, 380, 391, 392, 406, 458, 502, 506, 543, 563, 606, 610, 641, 644, 645, 673, 675–676, 689, 714, 811, 820, 969, 983, 1020, 1022, 1069, 1072, 1080, 1082, 1160, 1460, 1467, 1800–1801, 1864, 1929, 1948, 2072, 2207, 2208, 2224, 2395, 2413, 2442, 2453, 2489, 2535, 2585, 2715, 2855, 2938, 3130
- in Australia, 245
- Calvinist, 675, 2438
- in Chile, 555
- in Colombia, 747, 748
- in Costa Rica, 804–808
- in Cuba, 836
- in Cyprus, 843
- in El Salvador, 959
- in Eritrea, 992
- in Ethiopia, 1006
- in France, 1129
- in Germany, 1202
- in Guatemala, 1275
- in Haiti, 1305
- in Honduras, 1350–1355
- in Indonesia, 1444, 1446
- in Iraq, 1501
- in Israel, 1537
- in Lithuania, 1428, 1429
- in Macedonia, 1761
- in Malaysia, 1785–1786
- in Mali, 1792–1793
- in Mozambique, 1983–1985
- in the Netherlands Antilles, 2061
- in Nicaragua, 2091
- in Panama, 2184–2185
- in the Philippines, 2253
- in Puerto Rico, 2335–2339
- rejection of monasticism by, 1934
- in Senegal, 2573–2575
- in Serbia, 2577, 2579
- in Slovakia, 2648
- in South Africa, , 2672–2673
- in Spain, 2680, 2681
- in Switzerland, 2781
- in Turkey, 2906
- in Ukraine, 2926–2927
- in the United Arab Emirates (UAE), 2960–2961
- in the United States, 3005, 3008
- in Venezuela, 3058–3059
- See also* Russia, Protestantism in
- Province of the Episcopal Church in Rwanda, 2328–2330, 2329 (image)
- Provost, Samuel, 983
- Puerto Rico, 2330–2342, 2330 (image), 2334 (image), 2339 (table)
- effects of immigration on, 2331–2332
- non-Catholic and non-Protestant religions in, 2339–2342
- patron saints of, 2335
- Protestant movement in, 2335–2339
- Roman Catholicism in, 2332–2333, 2335
- Pure Brightness Festival, 2242–2343
- Pure Land Buddhism, 100–101, 1124, 1565–1566, 1609–1610, 2343–2346, 2344 (image)
- See also* Jodo-shinshu; Jodo-shu
- Purim, 2346–2347, 2346 (image)
- Puritans, 675
- Putuo Shan, 2347–2349, 2348 (image)
- Pythagoras, 3099
- Qaddafi, Muammar, 1720
- Qadiriyya Rifa'i Sufi Order, 2351

- Qaeda, al-, 23, 1529, 1995, 1996, 2807
- Qadiriyya Sufi Order, 2351–2352
- Qatar, 2352–2354, 2353 (image), 2353 (table), 2354 (map)
Christianity in, 2352–2353
Islam in, 2352
- Qigong, 2354–2355
- Quakers (Religious Society of Friends), 498–499, 820, 836, 1126–1127, 1157–1159, 1158 (image)
in Honduras, 1352
See also Evangelical Friends International (EFI); Friends General Conference; Friends United Meeting; Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC)
- Quanzhen Daoism, 2355–2357, 2356 (image)
- Quebec, 493–496, 494 (image)
- Quimby, Phineas Parkhurst, 672
- Al-Qurtubi, Abu ‘Abdullah, 797
- Qutb, Muhammad, 1529
- Qutb, Sayyid, 1526, 1529
- Raalte, Albertus C. van, 631
- Rabbani, Muhammad, 21
- Rada, 2359–2360
- Radhasoami, 2360–2361
- Rael. See Vorilhon, Claude
- Raelian Movement International, 2361–2364, 2362 (image)
- Raja Rammohun Roy, 384
- Ram Das, 1235–1236
- Ramadan, 2364–2365, 2364 (image)
- Ramanuja, 1330
- Ramtha’s School of Enlightenment, 2365–2367
- Rance, Alver, 329–330
- Rand, Ayn, 700
- Randall, John Herman, 1365
- Rankin, Melinda, 1899
- Rastafarians, 1561, 2079, 2367–2368, 2367 (image), 2505
- Raven, F. E., 609, 610
- Rawlings, Jerry John, 1209, 1210
- Rawze-e-Sharif, 2368–2369
- Reconstructionist Judaism, 2369–2370, 2370 (image)
- Rees, Seth Cook, 3097
- Reese, Curtis W., 1365
- Reform Baptists (Russia), 2370–2371
- Reform Judaism, 1182–1183, 1600, 2159–2160, 2371–2373, 2371 (image)
- Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia, 2373–2374
- Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia, 2374
- Reformed Church in America, 93, 2374–2375
- Reformed Church in Romania, 2375–2377, 2376 (image) in the Transylvania territory, 276–2377
- Reformed Church in Zambia, 2377–2378
- Reformed Church in Zimbabwe, 2378
- Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria, 2379
- Reformed Church of France, 2379–2380
- Reformed Church of Hungary, 2380–2381
- Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN). See Protestant Church in the Netherlands
- Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated), 2381–2382
- Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine, 2378–2379
- Reformed Denomination, 2382–2383
- Reformed Ecumenical Council (REC), 2383–2384
- Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea, 2384
- Reformed/Presbyterian tradition, 2385–2386
- Reiha-no-Hikari, 2386–2387
- Reincarnation, 105–106, 2387–2390
and intermediate existence, 2388
and karma, 2388–2389
Plato’s view of, 2387
transmigration/reincarnation distinction, 2387–2388
- Reiyukai (Society of the Friends of the Spirit), 2390, 2420
- Relics, 2390–2397, 2391 (image), 2441
Buddhist, 2391–2394
Christian, 2394–2396
Islamic, 2396
and unbelief, 2396–2397
- Religion, types of government relationships to, 2397–2401, 2398 (image) cooperationist model of, 2399
in Denmark, 2398
Erastian model of, 2398
in Greece, 2398
separationist model of, 2399
in Sweden, 2398
theocracy model of, 2398
in Wales, 2398
- Religious freedom, 2401–2404, 2401 (image)
in China, 2403
constitutional promises of, 2402 religious freedom and human development, 2402–2403 and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 2401–2402
- Religious Science, 2404–2407, 2405 (image)
- Remonstrant Brotherhood, 2407–2408
- Renan, Ernest, 19
- Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. See Community of Christ
- Restored Church of God. See Living Church of God
- Restored Reformed Church, 2408–2409
- Reuchlin, Johannes, 2409–2410, 2409 (image)
- Réunion, 2410–2413, 2411 (image), 2411 (map), 2412 (table)
- Reuss, Theodor, 828–829, 1225, 2149
- Rhee, Syngman, 1642
- Rhenish Mission, 2413–2414
- Ricci, Matteo, 642
- Rida, Muhammad Rashid, 4, 20
- Ridván, Festival of, 2414–2416
- Rigpa Fellowship, 2416–2417, 2416 (image)
- Rinpoche, Chogyam Trungpa, 2603
- Rinpoche, Dzongsar Khyentse, 1631–1632
- Rinpoche, Sogyal, 2416–2417, 2416 (image)
- Rinpoche, Zopa (Lama Zopa), 1125, 1126
- Rinzai, 2417–2418, 2418 (image)
- Rippon, John, 292
- Rishikesh, 2419–2420, 2419 (image)
- Rissho Kosei-kai, 2420–2421

- Rittelmeyer, Friedrich, 619
 Rivail, Denizard, 2693
 Rizzi, Ada Albrecht, 2066
 Rizzi, Jorge Angel Livraga, 2066
 Roberts, Brigham H., 687
 Roberts, Evans, 153
 Roberts, Robert, 604
 Robertson, Archibald T., 297
 Robertson, William E., 42
 Roden, Ben, 386
 Rodgers, Mary Josephine, 1826–1827
 Rodríguez, Guillermo, 935
 Rodzima Wiara (Poland), 2421
 Roggeveen, Jacob, 926
 Roman Catholicism, 24, 103, 129, 146, 147, 351, 380, 401, 426, 451, 486, 499, 531, 580–581, 675, 685 (image), 883 (image), 969, 1007, 1778–1779, 1947–1948, 2156, 2158, 2309–2310, 2421–2430, 2422 (image) in Albania, 63
 in Algeria, 74–75
 in Angola, 134
 in Argentina, 169–170, 173–174
 in Austria, 248–249, 250–251
 in Bahrain, 276
 in Bangladesh, 279
 in Belarus, 314
 in Bermuda, 340
 in Bhutan, 347
 in Bolivia, 365–366
 in Bulgaria, 448–449
 in Burundi, 457–458
 in Cambodia, 483
 in the Cape Verde Islands, 504
 in China, 561, 563
 the church, ministry, and magisterium of, 2424–2426
 in Croatia, 825–826
 in Cuba, 831, 833–834
 in the Democratic Republic of Congo (Zaire), 776 “devotion” in the Catholic tradition, 883–884
 in Dominica, 903–904, 905
 in the Dominican Republic, 907
 in Ecuador, 935–937
 in El Salvador, 958–960
 in Equatorial Guinea, 989
 eschatology of, 2429–2430
 in France, 1128–1129
 in French Polynesia, 1153
 in Gabon, 1169
 in Georgia, 1194
 in Ghana, 1210
 in Grenada, 1260–1261
 in Guadeloupe, 1261
 in Guatemala, 1268–1273
 in Guinea, 1280–1281
 in Guinea-Bissau, 1282–1283
 in Guyana, 1294
 in Haiti, 1302, 1304–1305
 in Honduras, 1347, 1348–1350
 in Hong Kong, 566–567
 in India, 1401
 in Iraq, 1500–1501
 in Ireland, 684
 in Kenya, 1628
 in Latvia, 1690
 in Liberia, 1716–1717
 in Lithuania, 1728–1729, 1731
 in Macao, 568
 in Malta, 1796
 in Mauritania, 1834–1835
 in Mexico, 1896, 1897–1899
 in Montenegro, 1942–1943 in Namibia, 2012
 in Niger, 2103
 in Norway, 2121
 in Oman, 2146
 in Pakistan, 2174
 in Panama, 2178, 2180–2182
 in Paraguay, 2194, 2198–2202
 in Peru, 2236–2237, 2239
 in the Philippines, 2252–2253
 in Poland, 2263
 in Puerto Rico, 2332–2333, 2335
 in the Republic of the Congo, 772–773
 in the Republic of Korea, 1649
 in Romania, 2376, 2433, 2434
 in Rwanda, 2484
 sacraments of, 2428–2429
 in St. Lucia, 2504
 saints of, 2427–2428
 in Samoa, 2521
 in Serbia, 2577
 in Slovakia, 2648–2649
 in Slovenia, 2650
 in the Solomon Islands, 2661
 in Sudan, 2737
 in Suriname, 2757, 2759
 in Switzerland, 2783–2784, 2783–2784
 in Syria, 2790–2791
 theological anthropology of, 2426–2427
 theological emphases of, 2423–2424
 in Tonga, 2882
 in Tunisia, 2899
 in Uganda, 2921
 in Uruguay, 3024, 3025, 3027, 3029–3030
 in Vanuatu, 3045
 in Venezuela, 3055–3058
 in the Wallis et Futuna Islands, 3086–3087
 in Zambia, 3177
 in Zimbabwe, 3185–3186
See also Armenian Catholic Church; Army of Mary; Bolivia, divisions within Catholicism in; Capuchins; Christianity; Coptic Catholic Church; Dominicans; Franciscans; Greek Catholic Church; Holy Ghost Fathers; Jesuits; Legion of Mary; Marian devotion; Maronite Catholic Church; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mary I (Mary Tudor [queen of England]); Maryknoll; Native American religion, and Roman Catholicism; Salesians; Second Vatican Council; Servites; Spirituality, Roman Catholic; Sulpicians; Ursulines; White Fathers
 Romania, 2430–2435, 2431 (image), 2432 (map), 2434 (table)
 Christianity in, 2432
 Islam in, 2434, 2435–2436, 2435 (image)
 Jewish community in, 2433–2434
 Orthodoxy in, 2432–2433
 under the Ceausescu dictatorship, 2432
 under Ottoman-Turkish rule, 2431
 Romanian Greek Catholic Church, 2436–2437
 Romanian Orthodox Church, 2437–2439, 2438 (image)
 Rome/Vatican City, 637, 1258, 1543, 2439–2443, 2440 (image)
 Romero, Oscar Arnulfo, 960
 Romney, Mitt, 688
 Romuva, 2443–2444
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 4

- Roosevelt, Theodore, 24
- Rosen, Martin, 1862
- Rosh Hashanah, 864–865, 864 (image), 2444–2446, 2445 (image)
- Roshi, Shunryu Suzuki, 1670
- Roy, Philippe, 193
- Roy, Ram Mohan, 1430
- Ru Jing, 899
- Rucyahana, John, 128
- Rudra, 1409, 1412–1413
- Ruhani Satsang, 2446–2447
- Rule of St. Benedict, The*, 1932–1933
- Rumi, Jalal ud-din, 2743
- Rupert of Worms, 248
- Russell, Charles Taze, 18, 714, 1574, 2447–2448
- Russia, 2448–2458, 2449 (image), 2452 (map), 2457 (table) division of religious minorities in, 2453
 Freemasonry in, 2453
 Orthodox Christianity in, 2449–2451
 religion in post-Soviet Russia, 2455–2457 religion in pre-Soviet Russia, 2449–2554 religion in the Soviet period, 2454–2455
 Roman Catholicism in, 2451
See also Russia, Islam in; Russia, Protestantism in
- Russia, Islam in, 2458–2465, 2458 (image) after the 9/11 attacks, 2463–2464 among ethnic Tatars, 2460–2461
 anti-Islam policies of Stalin, 2461–2462
 Catherine the Great's policy toward, 2459–2460
 in imperial Russia, 2460 largest Muslim groups in, 2458 in the middle Volga and Western Urals, 2458–2459 resurgence of after the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions, 2462–2463
 Sufism in, 2459
- Russia, Protestantism in, 2465–2471, 2465 (image) in post-Soviet Russia, 2469–2471
 Protestant missionaries prior to 1917, 2467–2468
 Russian sectarianism, 2465–2566
 under the Soviet regime, 2468–2469
 Western Protestantism, 2466–2467
- Russian Orthodox Church (ROC [Moscow Patriarchate]), 1673, 1924, 1926, 2449–2451, 2455, 2457, 2471–2477, 2471 (image), 2930–2931 ban of on clergy involvement in politics, 2474 composition and structure of, 2476–2477 decline in relationship with the Roman Catholic Church, 2475 division of into monastic movements and the “non-grabbers,” 2472 in the post-Soviet era, 2476 schism of in the 17th century, 2472 as the state church of the Russian Empire, 2472–2473 under communism, 2473–2474 under the jurisdiction of Constantinople, 2472
See also Old Believers (Russia)
- Russian Orthodox Church outside of Russia, 2477–2479
 renunciation of “Sergianism” by, 2478
- Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church, 2153
- Ruthenian Catholic Church, 2479–2480
- Rutherford, Joseph F., 714
- Rwanda, 456, 458, 2480–2486, 2481 (table), 2483 (map), 2484 (image)
 African Initiated Churches in, 2485 and the Hamitic hypothesis, 2481
 Hutu/Tutsi genocide in, 2481–2482
 Islam in, 2485–2486
 Roman Catholicism in, 2484
 traditional religions in, 2482–2483
 under the Belgian regime, 2481
 under the German Empire, 2480
 work of the Belgian Protestant Missionary Society in, 2484–2485 work of German Lutherans in, 2483
- Ryan, Bertha, 692
- Sabbatarian Church of God, 2211
- Sabbatarianism, 2489–2491
- Sacred texts, 2491–2493
- Sadat, Anwar, 1995
- Safavi, Navvab, 1527
- Safavid, Shah Abbas, 1495
- Sahaja Yoga, 2493–2494
- Sahara, the, 2494–2496, 2494 (image), 2495 (map), 2496 (table)
- Sahib, Haji Hakeem Maulvi Nurud-Din, 57
- Sahib, Sahibzada Bashirud-Din Mahmud Ahmad, 57
- Sahib, Sahibzada Mirza Nasir Ahmad, 57
- Saicho, 2496–2497
- Saifuddin, Haji Omar Ali, 414
- Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage, 2497–2498
- St. Helena, 2498–2500, 2499 (map), 2500 (table)
- St. Kitts-Nevis, 2500–2502, 2501 (map), 2502 (table)
- St. Lucia, 2502–2505, 2503 (map), 2504 (table), 2504 (image)
 Anglicanism in, 2504
 Roman Catholicism in, 2504
- St. Nicholas (Santa Claus), 649
- St. Pierre et Miquelon, 2505–2506, 2505 (table), 2506 (map)
- St. Vincent, 1177, 1178, 2506–2509, 2507 (table), 2508 (map)
- Saicho, 2859–2860
 disciples of, 2859
- Saint-Martin, Louis-Claude de, 1813
- Saints, 2509–2511, 2510 (image) canonization in the Roman Catholic tradition, 2510–2511
 history of, 2509
 role of miracles in determining sainthood, 2511
- Sakae, Sekiguchi, 2749
- Sakwa, Wellington B., 27
- Sakyapa, 2511–2512
- Saladin, Nasser, 464, 638, 1521
- Salesians, 2513, 2513 (image)
- Salisbury Cathedral, 516–517
- Salt Lake City, 2513–2515, 2514 (image)
- Salvadoran Lutheran Synod, 2515–2516
- Salvation Army, 2616–2618, 2517 administration of, 2517 lack of sacraments in its worship services, 2518
 leadership of, 2516–2517

- Salzmann, Jeanne de, 1284
- Samantabadhara's Birthday, 2518–2519, 2519 (image)
- Samaritans, 2247–2248
- Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches, 2519–2520
- Samoa, 2520–2523, 2521 (image), 2522 (map), 2522 (table)
- Christianity in, 2520–2521
- Mormonism in, 2521–2522
- Pentecostalism in, 2523
- Roman Catholicism in, 2521
- San Marino, 2523–2525, 2523 (table), 2524 (map), 2525 (image)
- Sanbo Kyodan, 2525–2526
- Sanchi, 2526–2527, 2527 (image)
- Sanskrit texts, 1323
- Sant Mat. See Radhasoami; Sikhism/ Sant Mat
- Sant Niramkari Mission, 2527–2528
- Santaraksita, 429
- Santeria, 830 (image), 2528–2530, 2529 (image)
- Santi Asoka, The, 2530–2531
- Santo Daime, 2531–2532
- Sanusiyya, 2743
- São Tomé and Príncipe, 2532–2535, 2533 (image), 2533 (table), 2534 (map)
- Sapta Darma, 2535
- Saraswati, Dayananda, 1430, 196–197
- Sarkar (Marga Guru Shrii Shrii Anandamurti), 104–105
- Sarnath, 2536–2537, 2536 (image)
- Sarvodaya, 2537–2538
- Satanism, 2538–2540
- Satchidanada, Sri Swami, 1457, 1458
- Sathya Sai Baba movement, 2540–2543, 2541 (image) controversies concerning, 2542
- Satmar Hasidism, 1314, 2543–2544
- Satsang network, 2544–2545
- Saudi Arabia, 3, 4, 2545–2549, 2545 (image), 2546 (map), 2548 (table)
- Christianity in, 2547–2548
- Islam in, 2545–2547
- rise of the Saud family to power in, 2547
- Saunière, Berenger, 2308–2310
- Sava, 511
- Savanarola, Girolamo, 639, 2549–2550
- Savoy declaration of Faith and Order, 2997
- sayyids*, 19
- Scanderberg (b. Gjergj Kastrioti), 61, 63
- Schechter, Solomon, 781
- Schindelar, Adalbert, 2134
- Schmidt, Georg, 1954
- Schneerson, Menachem Mendel, 1314
- Schwartz, Friedrich, 2977
- Science and religion, contemporary issues concerning, 2550–2553
- epistemological issues, 2550
- methodological issues, 2550, 2551
- publications concerning, 2550, 2251
- Science and religion, history of the relationship between, 2553–2557, 2554 (image), 2555 (image)
- in ancient times, 2553–2554
- Aquinas's appropriation of Aristotle's metaphysics, 2554–2555
- influence of Copernicus on, 2555
- influence of Newton on, 2555–2556
- in Islamic culture, 2554
- and the theory of evolution, 2556–2557
- Scientology. See Church of Scientology
- Scofield Bible, the (Scofield Reference Bible), 821, 1162
- Scopes, John T., 823
- Scott, Orange, 3096
- Scott, Peter Cameron, 24, 1627
- Scott, Walter, 3129
- Scottish Episcopal Church, 2557–2559, 2558 (image)
- Scranton, Mary F., 1649, 1655
- Scranton, William B., 1649, 1655
- Scudder, John, 93, 706
- Sea Organization, 701–702
- Seabury, Samuel, 983
- Seagrave, Gordon S., 2002
- Seaman's Friend Society, 6
- Searle, John, 80–81
- Sebastianism, 2277
- Second Vatican Council, 170, 173, 189, 251, 325, 366, 541, 550, 584, 645, 747, 802, 804, 936–937, 959, 1139, 1140, 1141, 1272, 1304, 1350, 1466, 1514, 1586, 1588, 1823, 1934, 2422–2423, 2565
- Secularization, 2559–2562, 2560 (image), 2939–2940
- definition of, 2559
- during the Enlightenment, 2560
- influence of the American, English, and French revolutions on, 2560–2561
- theories about and responses to, 2561–2562
- Sedevacantism, 2562–2566
- and antipopes, 2564–2565
- “conclavist” sedevacantists, 2564–2565
- divisions within the movement, 2563
- in Mexico, 2563–2564
- origins of, 2562–2563
- “pure” form of, 2564
- Seicho-No-Ie, 2566–2568
- Seihô, Okano, 1182
- Seiken, Okano, 1181
- Sekai Kyusei Kyo, 2568–2569
- Selassie, Haile, 1561, 2367–2368
- Self-Realization Fellowship (SRF), 2569–2570, 2750 (image)
- Selwyn, George Augustus, 652, 2078, 2570–2572, 3045
- Selwyn, John Richardson, 652
- Semenstov, Dmitri P., 315
- Senegal, 2572–2575, 2573 (image), 2574 (map), 2574 (table)
- Christianity in, 2573
- Protestantism in, 2573–2575
- Sufi brotherhoods in, 2572–2573
- traditional religions in, 2572
- Serbia, 2575–2580, 2576 (image), 2578 (map), 2579 (table)
- attempts of to end Kosovo's independent status, 2576–2577
- Christianity in, 2577
- independence of from the Byzantine and Ottoman empires, 2575–2576
- Islam in, 2579–2580
- Protestantism in, 2577, 2579
- Roman Catholicism in, 2577
- Serbian Orthodox Church in, 1940 (image), 1941–1942, 2580–2582, 2581 (image)
- Serpent handlers, 2582–2583
- Servetus, Michael, 478, 2583–2384, 2938
- Servites, 2584–2585

- Sese Seko, Mobutu, 666, 670, 775
 Setsubun, 2585–2586, 2586 (image)
 Seung Sahn, 1670, 1671
 Seuse, Heinrich, 1120
 Seventh Day Baptist General Conference, 2586–2587
 Seventh-day Adventist Church (SDA),
 7, 18, 96, 164, 202, 271, 328,
 347–348, 368, 380–381, 386,
 486, 908, 1178, 1242, 1261,
 1387, 1501, 1712, 2211, 2316,
 2490, 2587–2589, 3049,
 3145–3146
 in Albania, 65
 in Anguilla, 136, 139
 in Argentina, 174, 175
 in the Bahamas, 272
 in Belarus, 316
 in Belize, 328
 in Bolivia, 368
 in Botswana, 380–381
 in Brazil, 394
 in Chad, 534
 in China, 564
 in Colombia, 748
 in Cuba, 830, 836, 837
 in the Dominican Republic, 908
 in Ecuador, 938, 939
 in El Salvador, 961
 in French Polynesia, 1154
 in Gibraltar, 1216
 in Guatemala, 1274, 1276
 in Honduras, 1351
 in Hong Kong, 567
 in Latvia, 1689, 1691
 in Lithuania, 1730
 in Mali, 1793
 in Martinique, 1810, 1813
 in Micronesia, 1910
 in Moldova, 1925
 in Nicaragua, 2091, 2092, 2093,
 2094
 in Niue, 2114
 in Panama, 2183, 2185
 in Paraguay, 2202, 2203
 in Peru, 2241, 2242, 2243
 in Pitcairn Island, 2262–2263
 in Puerto Rico, 2336, 2338
 in Romania, 2433, 2434
 in Russia, 2453, 2475, 2477
 in Samoa, 2522–2523
 in Slovenia, 2651
 in the Solomon Islands, 2662
 in Suriname, 2759
 in Tajikistan, 2805
 in Tonga, 2882
 in the United States, 3004
 in Uruguay, 3031, 3032
 in Uzbekistan, 3039
 in Venezuela, 3058, 3059
 Seventh-day Adventist Reform movements, 2589–2590
 Seventh-day Church of God, 18
 Sextus Empiricus, 1232
 Seychelles, 2590–2592, 2591 (image),
 2591 (table), 2592 (map)
 Seymour, William J., 159, 160, 2225, 2207, 2593–2594
 Shadare, Joseph, 601
 Shadhiliyya Sufi Order, 2594–2595
 Shafaiite School of Islam, 1785,
2595–2596
 Shah Faisal Mosque, 2596
 Shah Ismail, 71, 1491
 Shaivism, 2597–2599, 2597 (image) development of, 2597–2598
 Kapalikas (non-Siddhanta) Shaivas, 2598
 Kaula tradition of, 2598
 Pashupata Shaivas, 2598
 Shaiva Siddhanta tradition of, 2598
See also Tamil Saivism
 Shakers, 756
 Shakespeare, J. H., 297
 Shakta movement, 2599–2600
 Shaktism, 2600–2603, 2601 (image) goddess traditions influenced by Tantric rituals, 2601–2602
 Kalikula School of, 2602
 Shrikula tradition of, 2602
 Shrividya theology, 2602
 Shaku, Soyen, 431
 Shambhala International, 2603–2604
 Shan Dao, 101, 2604
 Shankar, Ravi, 197–199 breathing and meditation techniques used by, 199
 Shankara, 1330
 Shankara, Mul, 203–204
 Shapur II, 151
 Sharad Purnima, 2604–2605
 Sharif, Wahy Deen, 3089 (image)
 Sharif Ali, 413
 Sharp, Granville, 737
 Shasta, Mount, 2605–2607,
 2606 (image)
 Shavuot, 2607–2608
 Shaw, William, 1891
 Shemini Atzeret. See Sukkot
 Shem-Tov, Baal, 2927
 Sheng-Yen Lu, 2892–2893
 Sherab, Lekpe, 236
 Sherlock, Thomas, 1079
 Shevardnadze, Eduard, 1197, 1198
 Shia Muslims, 13, 19, 21, 56, 57, 69,
 76, 77, 101, 102, 153, 177,
 210–211, 255, 276, 279, 312,
 313, 314, 352, 354, 361, 458,
 463–464, 1491, 1491 (image),
 1499, 2608–2610
 self-flagellation among, 1121–1122
See also al-Husayn ibn Ali ibn Abi
 Talib; Karbala
 Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi
 Bohra, 2610–2611
 Shields, T. T., 288, 492
 Shikoku Pilgrimage, 2611
 Shin Buddhism. See Pure Land
 Buddhism
 Shingon Buddhism, 2612–2613,
 2612 (image)
 Shinjo, Ito, 2613
 Shinnyoen, 2613–2615
 Shinran, 101, 1581–1582,
2615–2616
 Shinto, 1013, 2616–2620,
 2617 (image)
 and Buddhism, 2618
 and Confucianism, 2616–2617
 elements of Shinto ritual, 2617 purification rites of, 2617–2618
 sacred texts of, 2617
 State Shinto under the Meiji government, 2618–2619,
2717–2719
See also Meeji Jingu; Ontakekyo
 Shiva, 1325 (image), 1326, 1338,
 1409
 Shoghi Effendi, 261–262, 263
 Shôkô, Asahara, 240
 Shrivakayana Buddhism, 421, 422,
 423
 Shri Ram Chandra Mission,
2620–2621
 Shugendo, 2621–2622
 Shwedagon Pagoda, 2622–2623,
 2622 (image)
 Siddha Yoga, 2623–2624
 Siddhanta Saraawati, 1179

- Siddhartha, 415–417, 977–978, 977 (image), 2719
- Sierra Leone, 2624–2627, 2625 (map), 2627 (table)
- Baptists and Methodists in, 2625–2626
- Islam in, 2626–2627
- Protestant and Free churches in, 2626, 2627
- Sikh Dharma, 2628–2629
- Sikhism/Sant Mat, 247, 352, 1397–1400, 2629–2633, 2629 (image)
- central place of Guru Granth Sahib in, 1400
- core teaching of, 1397–1398
- creation of the Sikh Khalsa, 1399–1400
- different sects of, 2631–2632
- early agricultural community of, 1398–1399
- founding of, 2629
- idea of that God is light and sound, 2632
- influence of Guru Nanak on, 1399
- relationship between Sikhism and Sant Mat, 2629–2630
- succession of gurus in, 2630–2631
- in Venezuela, 3060
- See also* Celebration of the Guru Granth Sahib; Golden Temple
- Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, 2633–2634
- Simalungun Protestant Christian Church, 2634
- Simchat Torah. See Sukkot
- Simeon Stylites, 2634–2635, 2635 (image)
- Simons, Menno, 97, 103, 222, 222 (image)
- Simpson, Albert Benjamin, 605, 1461
- Sinai, Mount, 2635–2638, 2636 (image)
- pilgrims to, 2638
- Singapore, 2638–2643, 2639 (image), 2640 (map), 2642 (table)
- Buddhism in, 2639, 2641, 2643–2645, 2644 (image)
- Christianity in, 2641–2642
- Methodism in, 2641–2642
- as a model of religious freedom, 2639
- Muslim community in, 2639
- Singh, Gobind, 2628
- Sinnett, A. P., 2845
- Sister Dhammadina, 432
- Sivananda Saraawati, Sri Swami, 1457–1458, 2645–2646, 3160
- Sixtus IV (pope), 2442
- Slavery, 1015, 1296, 1302, 2235, 2625, 2990
- and the formation of the Southern Baptist Convention, 2675
- Slovakia, 2646–2649, 2647 (image), 2648 (map), 2649 (table)
- Roman Catholicism in, 2648–2649
- Slovenia, 2649–2652, 2650 (image), 2651 (map), 2652 (table)
- Mormonism in, 2651–2652
- Protestantism in, 2650–2651
- Roman Catholicism in, 2650
- Seventh-day Adventism in, 2651
- Small, John, 41
- Smarta tradition, 2652–2653
- Smith, Joseph, III, 757
- Smith, Joseph, Jr., 686, 757, 1388, 1389, 2269, 2514, 2653–2654, 2653 (image), 2777
- Smith, Joseph, Sr., 1389
- Smith, Wallace B., 758
- Smith, Wilfred Talbot, 699, 2150
- Smoot, Reed, 687
- Smyth, John, 291, 298
- Snow, Samuel, 1242
- Society of Friends. See Quakers (Religious Society of Friends)
- Society of Missionaries of Africa. See White Fathers
- Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, 6
- Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPGFP), 982, 1350, 2654–2655
- Society for Psychological Research (SPR), 356
- Society of Saint Pius X. See Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X
- Society of Separationists, 89
- Socinianism, 2655–2656
- Söderblom, Nathan, 709
- Sojun, Ikkyu, 2417
- Soko Gakkai International, 1566, 1568, 1570, 2656–2659, 2657 (image), 2098, 2099
- beliefs and practices of, 2658
- schism within, 2658–2659
- Solar Temple, Order of, 2659–2660
- Soldiers of the Cross. See International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross
- Solomon, 1596
- Solomon Islands, 2660–2663, 2661 (map), 2662 (table)
- Methodism in, 2661–2662
- Roman Catholicism in, 2661
- Seventh-day Adventism in, 2662
- traditional religion in, 2660–2661
- Somalia, 2663–2665, 2663 (table), 2664 (map)
- Christianity in, 2664–2665
- Song Shan, 2665–2666, 2666 (image)
- Songgwangsa, 2666–2667
- Soto Zen Buddhism, 2667–2668, 2668 (image)
- South Africa, 2668–2674, 2670 (image), 2672 (map), 2673 (table)
- Protestantism in, 2672–2673
- Reformed Christianity in, 2671
- religion among the Bantu population, 2670–2671
- religion among the Khoi and San populations, 2669–2670
- under British rule, 2669
- South Korea. See Korea, Republic of (South Korea)
- Southern Baptist Convention, 2674–2677
- formation of and the slavery issue in the United States, 2675
- and the “Landmark” position, 2675
- in the 20th century, 2675–2676
- Soviet Union, 20–21, 69, 164, 180, 182, 184, 187, 189, 191, 222, 230, 255, 257, 313, 314, 317, 445, 447, 1642, 1727, 1730, 1966
- Soyen, Shaku, 3179
- Spain, 642, 2677–2687, 2679 (image), 2682 (map), 2686 (table)
- legal framework of religion in, 2684–2686
- religion in contemporary society, 2683–2684
- religion in the history of (first–15th centuries), 2677–2679
- religion in the history of (15th–20th centuries), 2679–2681
- under the second republic and the Franco regime, 2681–2683

- Spangenberg, August, 1946, 1949, 3094
- Spangler, David, 2069–2070
- Spanish Evangelical Church, 2687–2688
- Spanish Reformed Evangelical Church, 2688
- Spartus, Ruben, 42
- Spener, Philip Jacob, 194
- Spinoza, Baruch, 1233
- Spirit possession, 2689–2693, 2690 (image) and Anyakayapravesha, 2692
channeling/mediumship, 2691
demonic possession, 2691–2692
healing practices connected with, 2691
oracular possession, 2689–2690 prophetic possession, 2689–2691
- Spiritism, 6–7, 499, 2277–2278, 2693–2694
- Spiritual Baptists, 2694–2695
- Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church, 2695–2699
beliefs of, 2697–2698
early converts to, 2697
origins of, 2695–2696
- Spiritual churches (Ghana), 2699–2700
- Spiritual churches (Kenya), 2700–2702, 2701 (image)
- Spiritual Healing Church (Botswana), 2702–2703
- Spiritual Human Yoga (SHY), 2703–2705
- Spiritualism, 1385–1386, 2705–2708, 2707 (image)
and channeling, 2707
in England, 2707 factions within, 2706–2707
and Mesmerism, 2705
and psychical mediumship, 2705
- Spirituality, 8, 10, 44, 60, 225, 384, 391, 495, 499, 816, 851, 892, 910, 1014, 1052, 1078, 1079, 1797, 1798, 1830, 1948, 1980, 1997, 2043, 2137, 2149, 2163, 2352, 2366, 2511, 2540, 2552, 2613, 2679, 2692, 2704, 2719, 2780, 2816, 2863, 2917, 2967, 2986, 3105, 3122
- Amerindian, 1278, 2341
- Asian, 1449
- Buddhist, 2867
- Celtic, 1269
- Chinese, 560
- Christian, 116, 1139
- Eastern, 2110
- Egyptian, 950
- ethical, 1327
- feminist, 3108, 3114
- Icelandic, 1385
- Islamic, 117, 1519, 2741
- Japanese, 1569
- Mayan, 1273
- monastic, 1931, 1935
- Native American, 1508
- Pentecostal, 212, 968
- personal, 710, 1022, 1202, 2071
- Roman Catholic, 2422, 2427, 2468
- Sufi, 1446–1447, 2739, 2740
- Western, 1847
- See also* African traditional religions, spirituality of (ancestors and the spirit world); Goddess spirituality
- Spriggs, Elbert Eugene, 2915
- Spring Dragon Festival, 2708–2709, 2708 (image)
- Spring Equinox, 2709–2710
- Spurgeon, Thomas, 295
- Sri Aurobindo Ashram (SAA), 2710–2711
- Sri Chinmoy, 2711–2712, 2712 (image)
- Sri Chinmoy Centre, 2711–2713, 2712 (image)
- Sri Lanka, 424, 2713–2716, 2713 (image), 2714 (map), 2715 (table)
Hinduism in, 2716–2717, 2717 (image)
- Sri Venkateshvara, 2873–2874
- Stalin, Joseph, 1965–1966, 2467
- Standard Oil of California, 4
- Stanley, Henry M., 774, 2919, 2920
- Statues, Buddhist, 2719–2724, 2722 (image), 2723 (image) and the Maitreya Project, 2724
Mathuran tradition of, 2720
mega statuary, 2721
reclining Buddhas, 2722–2724
seated Buddhas, 2721–2722
standing Buddhas, 2721
- Statues, Christian, 2724–2726
mega statuary, 2725–2726
- Steiner, Rudolf, 140–142, 619–620, 620 (image), 2726–2728, 2726 (image), 2777
- Stella Maris Gnostic Church, 2728
- Steuchius, Augustinus, 2231
- Stewart, Joseph, 2695–2697
- Sthanakavasi Jain tradition, 2728–2731 division of into different mendicant orders, 2729–2730
and the Lonkagaccha mendicant tradition, 2729 origins of with Lonka Sah, 2728–2729
- Stillwell, William, 40
- Stock, Simon, 1822
- Stone, Barton W., 218, 611, 732, 3129
- Stone, Jean, 541
- Stonehenge, 2731–2733, 2732 (image), 2753–2754, 2753 (image), 2980–2981
- Stover, Mary, 692
- Stover, Wilbur, 692
- Stoyanov, Petar, 450
- Strauss, Theodore, 431
- Stukeley, William, 253, 2753
- Sturluson, Snorri, 878, 880
- Subud, 2733–2734
- Sudan, 24, 1526, 2735–2738, 2736 (map), 2737 (table)
Christianity in, 2735
Islam in, 2535, 2737
Roman Catholicism in, 2737
traditional religions in, 2735, 2737–2738
- Sudan Interior Church, 2738–2739
- Sudan Interior Mission (SIM), 1006, 2738, 2739
- Suddhodana, 416–417
- Sufi Order in North America, The, 2739–2740
- Sufism, 63, 69, 73, 177, 242, 247, 255, 261, 279, 311, 312, 338, 414, 444, 445, 454, 485–486, 1785, 2741–2743, 2742 (image) belief system of, 2741
in Iran, 1491–1492
organized structure of, 2741–2742
in Russia, 2459
in Senegal, 2572–2573
spread of, 2742–2743
See also Chistiñiyya Sufi Order; Mevlevi Sufi Order; Naqsh-

- bandiya Sufi Order; Shadhiliyya Sufi Order; Spirituality, Sufi; Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order, 2743–2744
Sukkot, 2744–2747, 2745 (image) building the sukkah, 2745–2746
Christian appropriation of, 2747
joint celebration of with Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, 2746–2747 timing of the holiday, 2744
Sukyo Mahikari, 2747–2749
Suleiman I (Suleiman the Magnificent), 2749–2750, 2749 (image)
Sulpicians, 2750–2751
Sumarah, 2752
Summer Solstice, 2752–2754, 2753 (image) ancient celebration of, 2753 and the Druids, 916–917, 2753–2754
See also Stonehenge
Sunderland, La Roy, 3096
Sundkler, Bengt, 32
Sunni Muslims, 76, 177, 210, 211, 255, 276, 279, 312, 313, 314, 352, 361, 378, 454, 464, 760, 1130, 1785
See also Maliki School of Islam
Supreme Council for Confucian Religion in Indonesia, 1451
Suriname, 2754–2762, 2758 (map), 2761 (table)
Buddhism in, 2761
Christianity in, 2757, 2759–2760
as a colony of the Netherlands, 2755–2756 correlation between ethnicity and religious faith in, 2754–2755 economic development of, 2756–2757
Hinduism in, 2760
indigenous religions in, 2761
Islam in, 2760
Judaism in, 2760–2761
Roman Catholicism in, 2757, 2759
Suzuki, Daisetz T., 431, 1570, 2418, 2777, 3179
Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands, 2763–2765, 2763 (table), 2764 (map), 2765 (image)
Swain, Clara A., 1874–1875
Swaminarayan Hinduism, 2765–2767, 2766 (image)
Swaziland, 2768–2770, 2768 (map), 2769 (table) formation of the Swaziland Council of Churches in, 2769–2770
traditional religions in, 2768–2769
Sweden, 2770–2775, 2771 (image), 2773 (map), 2774 (table)
Christianity in, 2770–2771
Islam in, 2774
Jehovah's Witnesses in, 2772, 2774
Jewish community in, 2774
Mormonism in, 2772
ubiquity of the Church of Sweden in, 2771–2772
Swedenborg, Emmanuel, 1186, 2775–2777, 2775 (image), 2779–2780
Swedenborgian Church of North America, 2777–2779
Swedenborgian movement, 2779–2881
Swing, William E., 2999
Switzerland, 2781–2786, 2782 (image), 2784 (map), 2785 (table) declining membership in mainline churches in, 2784–2785 effect of the Protestant Reformation on, 2781–2782 organization of the Roman Catholic Church in, 2785–2786 religious pluralism in, 2782–2783 role of the federal Constitution in religious areas, 2782
Roman Catholicism in, 2783–2784
Symington, James, 610
Synagogues, 2786–2788, 2787 (image)
Syria, 2788–2893, 2789 (image), 2790 (table), 2791 (map)
Christianity in, 2790
flowering of Islamic culture in, 2788–2789
influence of the Muslim Brotherhood in, 2792–2793 missionary activity in, 2791–2792
as a Muslim state, 2789–2790
Roman Catholicism in, 2790–2791
under the Abbasids, 2789
under the Fatimid dynasty, 2789
Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, 2793–2794
Syrian Catholic Church, 1702, 2794–2795, 2795 (image)
Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, 2795–2797
Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, 2797–2798
Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, 2798–2799
Tabernacles, Feast of. See Sukkot
T'aego Pou, 2801
Tagore, Devendranath, 384–385
Tagore, Rabindranath, 385
Tai Hsu, 438
Tai Shan, 2802–2803
Taisen, Deshimaru, 1570
Taiwan, 569–573, 569 (image), 570 (map), 571 (image), 572 (map)
Buddhism and Daoism in, 426, 438–439, 573
Christianity in, 573
Dutch administration of, 571–572
as a Japanese possession, 572
proto-Malayan peoples of, 570–571 religious history of, 569–570
under the influence of mainland China, 572
Tajikistan, 2803–2806, 2803 (image), 2804 (map), 2805 (table)
Christianity in, 2805
Islam in, 2804–2805
Jewish community in, 2805–2806
under the Soviet Union, 2803
Taliban, the, 21, 2806–2808, 2807 (image) destruction of the Bamiyan Buddha by, 23
Talmud, 1614
Tamerlane, 151–152, 444–445
Tamil Saivism, 2808–2810
Taniguchi, Masaharu, 2566–2567
Tantric Buddhism, 978, 979–980, 1183, 1185, 1220
Tantrism, 2810–2811, 3159
Tanzania, 24, 2811–2815, 2812 (image), 2813 (map), 2814 (table)
Christianity in, 2814
colonial rulers of, 2812

- Tanzania (continued)
 Islam in, 2813–2814
 missionary work in, 2815
- Taoist Tai Chi Society (TTCS), 2816–2817
- Tatian the Assyrian, 635
- Taylor, Dan, 293
- Taylor, Douglas, 902
- Taylor, Gardner C., 2312
- Taylor, James, Jr., 610
- Taylor, James, Sr., 610
- Taylor, John, 2269
- Taylor, William, 696, 777, 1872, 1874,
 1881
- The Teachings of the Buddha*, 445–446
- Teiji, Kondo, 399
- Teitelbaum, Yoel, 1314
- Temples, Baha'i Faith, 2817–2821,
 2817 (image)
 construction of on every continent, 2818–2820
 design of, 2818
 social significance of, 2817–2818
- Temples, Buddhist, 2821–2825,
 2823 (image)
 contemporary temples, 2824
 early temples, 2822
 in East Asia, 2822
 Mahayana temples, 2823–2824
 Theravada temples, 2822–2823
 Vajrayana temples, 2824
See also T'ongdo-sa Temple
- Temples, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 2825–2827,
 2825 (image)
- Temples, Hindu, 2827–2829,
 2828 (image)
- Temples, Jewish, 2829–2830
- Tenri City, 2830–2831
- Tenrikyo, 1566, 2147, 2831–2833
- Tensho Kotai Jingukyo, 2147,
2833–2834
- Terapanth Svetambara Jain tradition,
2834–2836
- Tertullian, 1232, 2553
- Tetzl, Johann, 1746
- Texas Oil Company, 4
- Thai forest monks, 2836–2837
- Thailand, 2837–2840, 2838 (image),
 2839 (map), 2840 (table)
 Buddhism in, 2837–2838
 Christianity in, 2838–2840
 Hinduism in, 2840
- Theism, 43–46
- Thelema, 2840–2842
- Theofilos III (patriarch of Jerusalem),
 1255 (image)
- Theology, 2842–2845
 contemporary, 2844
 Greek, 2842–2843
 medieval, 2844
 in the patristic period, 2843–2844
- Theosophical Society (Adyar), 2727,
2845–2848
 contributions of to alternative
 Esoteric movements, 2847–2848
See also Blavatsky, Helena P.
- Theosophical Society (America),
 432, 729, 1661, 2068–2060,
 2982–2983, 3102
See also Blavatsky, Helena P.
- Theosophist Society, 431
- Theosophy, 2278
 and reincarnation, 2388–2389
- Thera, K. Sri Dhammananda Maha
 Nayaka, 441
- Theravada Buddhism, 422, 430, 431,
 481–482, 592, 1394, 2055,
2851–2852, 3070
- Thibadeau, Robert, 1486
- Thoburn, Isabella, 1874, 1875
- Thoburn, James M., 1874, 1879, 1881
- Thomas, John, 603, 1878
- Thompson, John, 692
- Thoreau, Henry David, 431
- Thornton, Henry, 737
- Thorp, Edgar Bentley, 1875 (image)
- Three self-principles, 2855–2856
- Thuc, Pierre-Martin Ngo-Dinh, 2563
- Thuston, Floyd, 680
- Tian Dao, 2857–2859
- Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism,
2859–2861, 2860 (image)
- Tiantan, 2861–2863, 2862 (image)
- Tibet, 429–430, 573–577, 574 (image) annexation of by the People's Republic of China (PRC), 573,
 574, 1619
 destruction of its monasteries by the Red Guard, 1183, 2865 religious devoutness of its population, 574–575
 in Western religious imagination,
2863–2864
See also Tibetan Buddhism
- Tibetan Buddhism, 196, 236, 421,
 429–430, 431, 575–577, 1395,
2864–2867, 2865 (image),
 2866 (image)
 in Mongolia, 1937
See also Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Milarepa; Nyingman
 Tibetan Buddhism
- Tibetan Nyingma Institute,
2867–2868
- al-Tijani, Ahmad, 2573
- Tijaniyya Sufi Order, 2868–2870
- Tillich, Paul, 619
- Timor Leste, 2870–2873,
 2870 (image), 2871 (map),
 2872 (table)
- Tingley, Katherine, 2849–2850
- Tiridates III (king of Armenia), 183, 186
- Tirumala/Tirupati, 2873–2874
- Tkach, Joseph W., 1733, 2972,
 3146
- Tocoist Church/Church of Our Lord
 Jesus Christ in the World, 2874
- Togo, 2875–2878, 2875 (image),
 2876 (map), 2877 (table)
 Assemblies of God in, 2877
 evangelicalism in, 2876–2877
 Islam in, 2877
 work of the North German Missionary Society in, 2875–2876
- Tokelau Islands, 2878–2879,
 2878 (table), 2879 (map)
- Tokuharu, Miki, 2233
- Tomlinson, A. J., 683, 2582
- Tomlinson, Milton A., 683
- Tomoji, Ito, 2613
- Tonga, 2880–2883, 2880 (image),
 2881 (map), 2882 (table)
 Anglicanism in, 2882
 Assemblies of God in, 2882
 Methodism in, 2880–2881, 2882
 Roman Catholicism in, 2882
- T'ongdo-sa Temple, 2883–2884
- Torah, the, 1614, 1615
- Toraja Church, 2884
- Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship,
2884–2886
- Toth, Mihaly, 294
- Townsend, Luther T., 821
- Traditional Anglican Communion,
2886

- Transcendental Meditation (TM), 1220–1222, 1437–1438 program of in Mozambique, 1985–1986
See also Global Country of World Peace
- Transubstantiation, 640
- Trees, worship of. See Bodh-Gaya
- Triennial Convention, 92
- Trinidad and Tobago, 2887–2889, 2887 (table), 2888 (map)
 Hinduism in, 2889–2891, 2890 (image)
- Trinity, the, 635, 637
- Troward, Thomas, 2404
- True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece, 2891–2892
- True Buddha School, 2892–2894
- True Jesus Church, 2894–2896, 2895 (image)
- Trujillo, Rafael Leonidas, 907
- Trumbull, David, 553
- Truth, Sojourner, 41
- Tsong Khapa, 2896–2897
- Tsugio, Ishido, 399
- Tsvigun, Maria (Maria Devi Christos), 1243, 1243 (image), 1244–1245
- Tubman, Harriet, 41
- Tulun, Ahmad ibn, 463
- Tunisia, 2897–2901, 2898 (image), 2899 (map), 2900 (table)
 Christianity in, 2899
 Islam as official religion of, 2898
 Jewish community in, 2900
 Roman Catholicism in, 2899
- Turkey, 63, 69, 71, 151, 152, 164, 180, 181, 182, 184, 190, 255, 261, 311, 313, 449, 1526, 2901–2907, 2902 (map), 2906 (table)
 Baha'i Faith in, 2906–2907
 Eastern Orthodoxy in, 2905
 Islam in, 2904–2905
 Jewish community in, 2906
 key role of in the development of Christianity, 2901, 2903
 Protestantism in, 2906
 relationship with Greece, 2903–2904
 secularism in, 2904
- Turkmenistan, 2907–2910, 2907 (table), 2908 (image), 2909 (map)
 Christianity in, 2909–2910
 government control of Islam in, 2908–2909
- Turks and Caicos Islands, 2910–2913, 2910 (table), 2911 (map), 2912 (image)
- Turner, Harold, 32
- Turner, Henry McNeal, 39
- Turner, Peter, 779
- Turton, William, 270
- Tutu, Desmond, 654, 2999, 3131 (image)
- Tuvalu, 2913–2915, 2913 (table), 2914 (map)
- Twelve Tribes, 2915–2916
- Udvarnoki, Andreas, 294
- UFO Religions, 2917–2919, 2918 (image)
- Uganda, 26, 458, 2919–2923, 2919 (image), 2920 (table), 2921 (map) development of Christianity in, 2920–2922
 Islam in, 2920
 Roman Catholicism in, 2921
 suppression of prophetic religions in, 2922
 traditional religions in, 2920
- Uisang (Master Uisang Sunim), 2923–2924
- Uklein, Simeon, 1926
- Ukraine, 2924–2929, 2924 (image), 2925 (table), 2927 (map)
 Armenians in, 2928
 Jewish community in, 2927–2928
 Protestantism in, 2926–2927
- Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in (Ukrainian Orthodoxy [UO]), 2924–2926, 2929–2932 differing orthodox bodies within, 2930–2931
 under the Russian Empire, 2929–2930
- Ukrainian Autocephalous Orthodox Church (UAOC), 2930, 2931
- Ukrainian Catholic Church, 2932–2934, 2933 (image)
- Ukrainian Greek-Catholic Church, 2926
- Ukrainian Orthodox Church (UOC), 2925–2926, 2930–2931
- Ukrainian Orthodox Church (Kyivan Patriarchate [UOC KP]), 2931, 2932
- Ukrainian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate [UOC MP]), 2931
- Ullam-bana, 2934–2935
- Umar, 76
- Umayyad Caliphate, 20, 77, 444, 636, 1239, 1497, 2788
- Umbanda, 499, 2935–2936, 2936 (image)
- Unarius, 2936–2937
- Unbelief, 2937–2944, 2939 (image), 2941 (image) agnosticism, 2943
 atheism, 2938–2941
 contemporary Western unbelief, 2941–2943
 pseudoscience, 2943
 rationalism, 2939
 secularism, 2939–2940
- Unification Church, 1945–1946, 1945 (image)
- Unification Movement (UM), 2944–2947, 2945 (image) anti-Communism of, 2945–2946 controversy concerning, 2946–2947
- Unified Buddhist Church, 2947–2950, 2948 (image)
- Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada, 2950–2951
- Union of Baptist Churches of Cameroon, 2951
- Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia, 2951–2953
- Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Ukraine, 2953–2954
- Union of Evangelical Free Church Congregations (Baptist), 2954–2955, 2954 (image)
- Union of Indonesian Baptist Churches, 2955–2956
- Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East, 2956–2957
- Union of Welsh Independents, 2957
- Unitarian Universalist Association (UUA), 2957–2959
- Unitarians. See International Council of Unitarians and Universalists (ICUU)
- United Arab Emirates (UAE), 2959–2961, 2959 (table), 2960 (map)
- United Baptist Church (Mozambique), 2962

- United Christian Church of Africa, 2769
- United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands, 2962–2963
- United Church in Papua New Guinea, 2963–2964
- United Church of Canada, 2964–2965
- United Church of Christ (UCC), 93, 2965–2968, 2966 (image)
- United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands, 2968–2969
- United Church of Christ in Japan, 2969–2971
- United Church of Christ in the Philippines, 2971–2972
- United Church of Christ in Zimbabwe, 2972
- United Church of God, 19, 2972–2973
- United Church of the Solomon Islands, 2973–2975, 2974 (image)
- United Church of Zambia, 2975–2976
- United Congregational Church of Southern Africa, 2976
- United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India, 2977–2978
- United Free Church of Scotland, 2978–2979, 2979
- United and Free Gospel Missionary Society (Turtle Creek, Pennsylvania), 1274
- United Kingdom, 215, 2979–2988, 2981 (table), 2982 (image), 2984 (map)
- the Church of Wales in, 2982
- constitutional monarchy of, 2980
- declining church attendance in, 2986–2987
- established churches of (Anglican Church of England and the Presbyterian Church of Scotland), 2980
- indigenous and imported new religions in, 2983
- Jewish community in, 2985
- religious freedom in, 2983, 2985
- the Scottish Reformation, 3982
- United Lodge of Theosophists, 2988
- United Methodist Church, 2988–2991, 2989 (image)
- division in over the slavery issue, 2990
- United Methodist Church in Ivory Coast, 2991–2992
- United Nations, 1641, 1646, 1658
- United Order Effort (Fundamentalist LDS Church), 2270
- United Pentecostal Church International (UPCI), 2992–2994, 2992 (image)
- key beliefs of, 2993
- United Presbyterian Church of Brazil, 2994–2995
- United Protestant Church of Belgium, 2995–2996
- United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles, 2996
- United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom, 2997–2999
- United Religious Initiative (URI), 2999–3000
- United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing (Shakers), 3000–3001
- decline of in the post–Civil War period, 3001
- United States of America, 2807–2808, 3001–3009, 3002 (table), 3005 (image), 3006 (map)
- African American religious institutions in, 3004–3005
- Asian religions in, 3007
- communities of world religions in, 3007
- contemporary homegrown religions in, 3007
- Eastern Orthodoxy in, 3008
- exposure to radical Islamism, 1522–1523
- influence of the Puritans on, 3002–3003
- Jewish community in, 3004
- native inhabitants of, 3001–3002, 3003
- the slavery issue in, 3003, 3004
- United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, 1645
- Uniting Church in Australia, 3009–3010, 3010 (image)
- Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa, 3010–3011
- Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa, 3011–3012
- Unity School of Christianity/ Association of Unity Churches, 3012–3014
- Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, 3014–3015, 3015 (image)
- Universal Faithists of Kosmon, 3015–3016
- Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, 3016–3018
- Universal Great Brotherhood (UGB), 3018–3019
- Universal Life, 3019–3020
- Universal Soul, 3020–3021
- Upanishads, 1324, 1392, 1414–1416
- Chandogyu Upanishad, 1329
- URANTIA Foundation, The, 3021–3022
- Urbai Revolt, 19
- Urban II (pope), 638, 735
- Urban IV (pope), 1137
- Ursulines, 3022–3024, 3023 (image)
- Uruguay, 3024–3026, 3025 (table), 3028 (map), 3031 (map)
- Afro-Brazilian religions in, 3033–3034
- Eastern Orthodoxy in, 3032–3033
- guerrilla warfare in, 3027
- Jewish community in, 3033
- Mennonites in, 3031–3032
- Pentecostalism in, 3031
- political and economic climate of, 3026–3027
- Protestant movement in, 3030–3032
- religious freedom in, 3024
- revolt of against Spanish rule, 3025–3026
- Roman Catholicism in, 3024, 3025, 3027, 3029–3030
- Waldensians in, 3030–3031
- U.S. Center for World Missions, 15
- Uthman (Caliph Uthman), 1380–1381
- Uthmān ibn 'Affān, 76
- Uzbekistan, 2803, 2804, 3036–3039, 3036 (table), 3037 (map), 3038 (image)
- Baptists in, 3038
- Christianity in, 3038–3039
- Islam in, 3037–3038
- Jewish community of, 3039
- religious freedom in, 3037

- Vaisnavism, 3041–3042, 3042 (image)
 Gaudiya Vaisnavism, 3042–3043
See also Gaudiya Myth
- Vajrayana Buddhism, 1395, 1441, 1449, 1581, 1665, 1775, 1800, 1915, 1980, 2082
See also Milarepa
- Vanuatu, 3043–3046, 3044 (table), 3045 (map)
 indigenous religions in, 3046
 Roman Catholicism in, 3045
- Varanasi. See Benares
- Varlet, Dominique Marie, 2139
- Varuna, 1412
- Vatican, the, 1304, 2797
See also First Vatican Council; Second Vatican Council
- Vedanta Societies, 3046–3048, 3047 (image), 3158
- Vedas, the, 1325, 1329, 1411, 1412, 1413, 1414, 1417, 1424, 1430, 1434, 2620, 2632, 2653, 2727, 2810, 3041, 3046, 3072
 organizational structure of, 1323–1324
See also Upanishads
- Vegetarianism, 3048–3051
- Venables, Gregory James, 132
- Venerable Taixu, 579
- Venezuela, 3051–3063, 3051 (table), 3053 (map), 3056 (image)
 Animists in, 3060–3061
 Buddhism in, 3060
 Eastern Orthodoxy in, 3059
 Hinduism in, 3060
 Jewish community in, 3060
 marginal Christian groups in, 3059
 New Age and Esoteric religions in, 3061 political history of, 3054–3055
 Protestant movement in, 3058–3059
 racial mixture of, 3053–3054
 Roman Catholicism in, 3055–3058
 under Spanish rule, 3052–3053
- Veniaminoiv, John, 2152
- Venn, Henry, 737, 2855–2856
- Venn, John, 737
- Vest, Dean, 714
- Vietnam, 483, 3063–3067, 3063 (image), 3064 (map), 3065 (table) early religions of, 3065–3066
 under the Ngo Dinh Diem regime, 3066–3067
See also Caodaism; Unified Buddhist Church
- Vineyard Fellowship, 542
- Violence, religious, 3067–3070, 3068 (image) causes of, 3069–3070
 contemporary explanations for, 3067–3069
- Vipassana International Academy, 3070–3072
- Virajananda, 204
- Virasaivism (Lingayatism), 3072–3073
- Virgin of Guadalupe, 188, 1898 (image)
- Virgin Islands of the United States, 3073–3076, 3073 (table), 3074 (image), 3075 (map)
- Vishnu, 1326, 1337, 1412, 2600, 2601, 2873, 3041, 3042, 3042 (image)
See also Gaudiya Myth
- Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), 3076–3078, 3077 (image)
- Vlad Tepes (Vlad the Impaler), 3078–3080, 3078 (image) conflicts of with Muslims, 3079
 as the founder of the modern Romania, 3078
- Voliva, Wilbur, 160
- Voltaire, 2939 (image), 2940
- Vodou, 955, 1304, 3080–3081
- von Oye, Elsbeth, 1120
- von Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig, 1947, 1948, 1951
- Vorilhon, Claude, 2361–2163, 2362 (image)
- Vosmeer, Sasbout, 2136
- VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies, 3081
- Vritra, 1412
- Wahhabi Islam, 2743, 3083–3085, 3084 (image)
- Wake Island, 3085
- Waldensian Church, 3030–3031, 3085–3086
- Waldo (Valdesius [Peter Waldo]), 3085
- Wallis et Futuna Islands, 3086–3088, 3086 (table), 3087 (map)
- Walsh, James A., 1826, 1827
- Walters, Alexander, 40
- Walters, J. Donald (Kriyananda), 2570
- Wang, Thomas, 14
- Wang Chongyang, 3088
- Wangpo, Jamyang Khyentse, 2124–2125
- Ward, William, 508
- Wardley, James, 3000
- Wardley, Jane, 3000
- Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge, 1161
- Waring, David, 327
- Warren, George, 1889
- Watkins, Owen, 1882
- Way International, The, 3090–3093
 beliefs/teaching of, 3091–3092
- Weber, Max, 1921, 1922, 1922 (image)
- Wei, Paul, 2894
- Weor, Samael Aun, 1228–1229
- Wesak, 3093–3094, 3093 (image)
- Wesley, Charles, 987, 3094
- Wesley, John, 987, 1079, 1143, 1156, 1340, 1532, 1863–1864, 1865, 1873, 2225, 2304, 2982, 3094–3096, 3095 (image)
 in Georgia, 2989
- Wesley, Samuel, 987
- Wesleyan Church, 3096–3097
- Wesleyan Free Church, 2881–2882
- Wesleyan Methodist Church, 1351, 3096
- Westcott, William Wynn, 1318, 1319
- Western Esoteric tradition, 2727, 3007, 3098–3103, 3099 (image) attraction of to Eastern philosophies, 3102–3103
 during the Romantic era, 3102 from the 16th to 18th centuries, 3101–3102
 in the Middle Ages, 3101
 mystery religions of Egypt, 3099–3100 neo-Platonism, 3100
 Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy, 3099 secrecy of Esotericism, 3101
 in Uruguay, 3034
 women's role in, 3120
See also New Age Movement; Theosophical Society (America)
- Westminster Confession of Faith, 704, 2294, 2296, 2997
- Whatcoat, Richard, 3095

- White, Elizabeth, 680
- White, Ellen G., 18, 347, 2211, 2490, 2587, 2588, 3107–3108, 3145–3146
- White, James, 18, 2587, 3107
- White, John, 1883
- White, William, 38, 983, 983 (image)
- White Brotherhood, 3103–3105, 3104 (image)
- White Fathers, 3105–3106
- White Lotus Society, 593
- White Plum Asanga, 3106–3107
- Whitefield, George, 1079, 1864 (image), 1949, 2304, 2305
- Wiccan religion, 3108–3110
See also Gardnerian Wicca
- Wierwille, Victor Paul, 3090–3091
- Wilberforce, Wilbur, 737
- Wilkes, Elizabeth, 276
- Wilkinson, Thomas, 1881
- Willermoz, Jean-Baptiste, 1813
- William of Aquitaine, 335
- William the Conqueror, 674
- Williams, Channing M., 125–126
- Williams, Daniel Powell, 154
- Williams, J. S., 28
- Williams, John, 2114, 3044
- Williams, Roger, 90, 299, 3003
- Williams, Rowan, 677
- Williams, William Jones, 154
- Willis, Mike, 328
- Wilson, John, 406, 2038
- Wimber, John, 542, 2884
- Wine, Sherwin T., 1472–1473
- Winn, Michael, 1314–1315
- Winter, Ralph D., 1695
- Winter Solstice, 3110–3112, 3111 (image)
- Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, 3112
- Witchcraft, 3113–3116, 3113 (image) contemporary, 3113, 3114–3115 and the rituals of the wheel, 3115 “zombie witchcraft,” 3114
- Witmer, Peter, 402
- Witteck, Gabriele, 3019
- Wodziwob, 1213
- Wolf, Notker, 335–336
- Women, status and role of in major religions, 3116–3121, 3118 (image), 3119 (image) in Buddhism, 3117 in Christianity, 3118–3119 in Hinduism, 3116–3117 in Islam, 3119–3120 in Judaism, 3117–3118 in Western Esotericism, 3120 women’s spirituality, 3120
- Won Buddhism, 3121–3122
- Wonhyo, 3122–3123
- Wood, F. W., 289
- Woodman, William Robert, 1318
- Woodroffe, John, 974, 1234
- Woolfruff, Wilford, 687, 2269
- Woolley, Loren C., 2269
- Word of Life Church, 3123
- World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 3124
- World Brotherhood Union Mevlana Supreme Foundation, 3124–3125
- World Buddhist Sangha Council (WBSC), 3125–3126
- World Communion of Reformed Churches, 3126–3127
- World Conference on Religion and Peace (WCRP), 3127
- World Congress of Faiths, 3127–3129, 3128 (image)
- World Convention of Churches of Christ, 3129
- World Council of Biblical Churches, 3129–3130
- World Council of Churches (WCC), 3130–3132, 3131 (image)
- World Evangelical Alliance, 3132–3133
- World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF), 3133
- World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB), 437, 3133–3135, 3134 (image)
- World Methodist Council (WMC), 3135–3137, 3136 (image)
- World Muslim Congress, 3137
- World Muslim League, 58
- World Plan Executive Council. See Global Country of World Peace
- World Reformed Fellowship, 3138
- World Religion Day, 3138–3140
- World Sephardic Federation, 3141–3143, 3142 (image)
- World Vaisnava Association (WNA), 3143–3145
- World Zoroastrian Organization (WZO), 3145
- Worldwide Church of God (WCOG), 18–19, 406, 1733, 2249–2250, 2972–2973, 3145–3147
- Wovoka, 1214
- Wu Tai Shan, 3147–3149, 3148 (image)
- Wu Yaozong, 585, 586
- Wulf, Elizabeth Clare, 729
- Wright, Lloyd, 329
- Wyatt, Ron, 164–165
- Wycliffe, John, 846, 2981
- Wyth, Peyton, 2997
- Xingyun, 1124
- Xun Qing (Xunzi), 766–767
- Yasawi, Ahmad, 311
- Yasawiyyawiyya, 2742–2743
- Yasodhara, 417
- Yeats, William Butler, 828
- Yemen, 1526, 3151–3155, 3151 (table), 3152 (image), 3153 (map) Christianity in, 3154 Islam in, 3152–3153 Jewish community in, 3153–3154
- Yeshe, Thubten (Lama Yeshe), 1125–1126
- Yezidis, 3155–3157
- Yoga, 1426–1427, 1438, 3157–3163, 3157 (image) in Canada, 3160–3161 effects of immigration laws on, 3159, 3160, 3161 history of, 3157–3161 Integral Yoga, 2710–2711 in the United States, 3158–3160 Western appropriation of, 3158 Yogi tradition, 3161–3163, 3163–3164
See also Integral Yoga International; International Yoga Fellowship movement; Patanjali; Sahaja Yoga
- Yogananda, Paramahansa, 2569–2570, 3159–3160
- Yogi Bhajan, 2628
- Yoido Full Gospel Church, 3164–3165
- Yom HaShoah, 3165–3167, 3166
- Yom Kippur, 3167–3168, 3167 (image)

- Yoruban religion/spirituality, 3168–3170, 3169 (image)
- Yoshikazu, Okada, 2747
- Yossef, Ovadia, 344
- Young, Brigham, 686–687, 687 (image), 688, 2514
- Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia (YBAM), 3170–3171
- Young Israel, 3171–3172
- Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA), 3172–3173
- Youngusband, Francis, 3127–3128, 3128 (image)
- Yu, Dora, 1734–1735
- Zaghloul, Saad, 4, 19
- Zaharakis, Michael, 2777
- Zaire, 666, 670, 774–779
- Zaldívar, Fulgencio Batista y, 331
- Zambia, 3175–3178, 3175 (table), 3176 (map)
- Christianity in, 3176–3177
- Jehovah's Witnesses in, 3177
- Roman Catholicism in, 3177
- traditional religions in, 3176
- Zangpo, Rinchen, 236
- Zarathustra, 3194, 3195
- Zaydites, 2609, 3178
- Zen Buddhism, 359, 400, 426, 431, 887–889, 900, 1321, 1485, 1570, 1609, 1775, 1776, 3178–3180, 3179 (image)
- essential nature of, 3179
- Rinzai Zen Buddhism, 952
- See also* International Zen Association; Kwan Um School of Zen; Sanbo Kyodan; Soto Zen Buddhism
- Zenor, Richard, 1979
- Zeus, 2142–2143
- Zhang Boduan, 68
- Zhang Daoling, 856, 858–859, 3180
- Zhao Puchu, 579, 579 (image), 580
- Zhengyi Daoism, 3180–3182, 3181 (image)
- Zhi Yi, 3182
- Zhong Gong, 3182–3183
- Zhou Dunyi, 3183–3184
- Zhu Xi, 767
- Zhuangzi, 3184
- Zianr, Yaglimorossen ibn, 72
- Zimbabwe, 25–26, 25 (image), 3184–3189, 3185 (table), 3186 (image), 3187 (map)
- Christianity in, 3185, 3186, 3187–3188
- diversity of religions in, 3185
- Roman Catholicism in, 3185–3186
- traditional religions in, 3185
- Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa (ZAOGA), 3189
- Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa of Ezekiel Guti, 35
- Zion Christian Church (ZCC), 34, 3189–3191, 3190 (image)
- Zionism, 1291, 1601, 2372, 3191–3192
- Zionist and Apostolic Churches, 3192–3194
- Zog (king of Albania), 66
- Zoroastrianism, 151, 183, 257, 561, 1194, 1288, 1392, 1401, 1841, 3194–3198, 3195 (image)
- cosmology of, 3195
- in India, 1406, 3196, 3197
- in Iran, 1490–1491, 3197
- leadership in the Zoroastrian community, 3195–3196
- rituals of, 3196
- See also* Mazdaznan
- Zulu religion, 3198–3199
- Zulus, 379
- Zwemer, Samuel, 276, 1670, 2375, 2548, 3199–3200
- Zwingli, Ulrich (Huldrych), 640–641, 1105, 1141, 1747, 2781