Like products in a supermarket or department store, religious beliefs are available and on display, and are no longer the domain of religious officials. A bookstore, conference, magazine article, or Internet site provides the locale for a veritable buffet of beliefs available for the consumer. Quebecers are surrounded by what Réginald Bibby calls “religion à la carte” (La Religion à la carte, 1988). The religious product is subject to little regimentation as the consumer controls what elements she or he picks and chooses.

Philosopher Charles Taylor has suggested in his 2002 work Varieties of Religion Today: William James Revisited that Quebecers desire religious experience. Despite the rapid secularization of Quebec since the 1960s, and despite the fact that Quebec is Canada’s most secular province, religion remains at the heart of life in Quebec, even in a pluralistic form. However, while Quebecers are attracted to a fusion of different spiritual concepts, there also seems to be a desire to conserve a link with traditional religion.

Religious life in Quebec emerges as a complex phenomenon. On the one hand, there is an overriding tendency to take one’s spirituality into one’s own hands and to be autonomous in one’s spiritual quest. On the other hand, when Quebecers choose to retain certain elements of their traditional faiths, they do so in order to maintain a sense of collective cultural identity. In this sense, religion remains an important identity category and will continue to be a crucial element of cultural identity in the 21st century.

The creativity and originality exhibited in the religious life of Quebecers in recent years does not necessarily signify an irreversible shift from an old to a new order. Rather, it inaugurates an era in which religious beliefs are grafted onto each other and form a complementary role in individual and social life.

Gilles Marcouiller
(as translated by Andrea Beverley)

See also: Christmas; Easter; Roman Catholic Church; Secularization.

References

- Baum, Gregory. Nationalism, Religion, and Ethics. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2001.
- Bouchard, G. R., C. Taylor, et al. Building the Future: A Time for Reconciliation: Report. Quebec: The Consultation Commission on Accommodation Practices Related to Cultural Differences, 2008.
- Gagnon, Alain-G. Quebec: State and Society. Peterborough, ON: Broadview Press, 2004.
- Rochon, M., P. Bosset, et al. Religious Pluralism in Quebec: A Social and Ethical Challenge: A Document Submitted for Public Consideration. Quebec: Commission des droits de la personne du Quebec, 1995.
- Taylor, Charles. Varieties of Religion Today: William James Revisited. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2002.

Canadian Baptist Ministries

Canadian Baptist Ministries (CBM) serves as the national umbrella of 4 regional conventions/unions and 3 women's ministries representing more than 1,000 churches and 150,000 people who worship in 32 different languages and call themselves Canadian Baptists (2008). CBM is an amalgamation of Canadian Baptist Federation (CBF) and Canadian Baptist International Ministries (CBIM) brought together in 1994.

The independent covenanted member bodies, under the Canadian Baptist Partners Agreement of October 28, 2008, are the Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches, the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, the Canadian Baptists of Western Canada and l'Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada, Baptist Women of Atlantic Canada, Baptist Women of Ontario and Quebec, and Women in Focus (western Canada).

One progenitor of CBM was the Canadian Baptist Foreign Mission Board. Founded in 1911, the Canadian regional missionary societies and boards combined their more than 100 missionaries overseas, about 25 percent of whom were single women supported by regional Woman's Baptist Missionary Unions. In the 1960s, Angola became a mission field in addition to India and Bolivia. In response to the rising tide of nationalism in the Third World, the name was changed to the Canadian Baptist Overseas Mission Board. It moved to "team ministries" working with indigenous groups in theological education, agricultural work, pioneer team missions, and Bible translation. Another name change to Canadian Baptist International Ministries allowed workers to go where missionaries were not traditionally welcomed. Short-term volunteer workers also reshaped the pattern of how Canadian Baptists think of missions.

The second part of CBM, the Baptist Federation of Canada, was founded in 1944. It was created to develop a new sense of Canadian Baptist identity and speak to the national, international, and ecumenical agendas with committees for social service, war services and rehabilitation, law, radio and publicity, evangelism, chaplaincy, finance, and world peace. It operated chiefly as a fellowship group because the regional conventions/unions and Mission Board were unwilling to give up power to a new central agency. It coordinated some national ministries and held triennial conferences across Canada and played a leading role in military, hospital, and prison chaplaincy ministries. The Federation created The Sharing Way through which Canadian Baptists contribute millions of dollars each year to caring and development ministries around the world. This latter ministry overlapped with CBIM and provided one key reason for a new integrated organization in 1994.

CBM (name change, 1995) provides an integrated vision of home and overseas ministry for the participating bodies and works with church partners in grassroots leadership development, sustainable community development, pioneer outreach, and global discipleship in Angola, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Central Europe, China, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Kenya, Lebanon, the Middle East, and Rwanda.

CBM is affiliated with the Baptist World Alliance.

Canadian Baptist Ministries
7185 Millcreek Drive
Mississauga, ON Canada
L5N 5R4
<http://www.cbmin.org/cbm/>

Robert S. Wilson

See also: Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec; Baptist World Alliance; Canadian Baptists of Western Canada; Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches; Union d'Églises Baptistes Françaises au Canada.

References

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation: 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College, 1998.
- Priestley, David. "Introduction." In Memory and Hope: Strands of Canadian Baptist History, by David Priestly. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1996.
- Renfree, Harry. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Wilson, Robert S. "History of Canadian Baptists." In Baptist History Celebration, 2007: A Symposium on Our History, Theology, and Hymnology. Springfield, MO: Particular Baptist Press, 2008.
- Wilson, Robert S. "Patterns in Canadian Baptist Life." Global Baptist History, Papers Presented at the Second International Conference on Baptist Studies, Wake Forest University, July 19–22, 2000, Baptist History and Heritage 36, nos. 1–2 (Winter–Spring 2001).
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Baptists in Canada: Search for Identity Amidst Diversity. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1980.
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1988.

Canadian Baptists of Western Canada

Canadian Baptists of Western Canada (formerly known as the Baptist Union of Western Canada [BUWC]) unites Baptists in east-central Canada in a voluntary association that facilitates mutually supported ministries and allows their speaking with one voice to the larger culture. The Union has two geographic and several theological streams. Baptist work in Western Canada began in 1873 in Winnipeg by the Reverend Alexander "Pioneer" McDonald (1837–1911), who was sent to the west by the Baptists of Ontario. In 1875, First Baptist Church was established. By 1880 there were four churches in the newly formed Red River Association. The Baptist Convention of Manitoba and the North West Territories was founded in 1884 and the work moved west toward the Rocky Mountains.

Baptist work in British Columbia began with several laymen and help from the American Baptists. In 1876, First Baptist Church, Victoria, was founded. By 1897, the British Columbia Baptists formed a convention that was unique in that it integrated the Woman's Board of Missions into the Convention.

In 1907, the BC Baptists joined the Baptist Convention of Manitoba and Northwest Territories to form the Baptist Convention of Western Canada with some 200 churches and a membership of 11,000. Two years later the name was changed to the Baptist Union of Western Canada. In 1944, the BUWC became a founding member of the Baptist Federation of Canada (Canadian Baptist Ministries since 1995).

In 1949, the BUWC founded Baptist Leadership Training School, which for 50 years trained lay leaders and provided the first step to theological education for many pastors. Future ministers are trained at Carey Theological College in Vancouver. The CBWC has 7 residential camps ministering to 4,500 youth each year.

In 2008 there were 178 congregations and ministries with about 20,000 members in all 4 western provinces, the Yukon, and the Northwest Territories serving about 100,000 worshippers.

CBWC is a covenanting partner in Canadian Baptist Ministries and a member of the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada.

Canadian Baptists of Western Canada Head Office
600, 1177-11 Ave. SW
Calgary, AB T2R 1K9
Canada
<http://www.buwc.ca/>

Robert S. Wilson

See also: Canadian Baptist Ministries.

References

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation: 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College, 1998.
- Priestley, David. “Introduction.” In Memory and Hope: Strands of Canadian Baptist History, by David Priestley. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1996.
- Renfree, Harry. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Wilson, Robert S. “History of Canadian Baptists.” In Baptist History Celebration, 2007: A Symposium on Our History, Theology, and Hymnology. Springfield, MO: Particular Baptist Press, 2008.
- Wilson, Robert S. “Patterns in Canadian Baptist Life.” Global Baptist History, Papers Presented at the Second International Conference on Baptist Studies, Wake Forest University, July 19–22, 2000, Baptist History and Heritage 36, nos. 1–2 (Winter–Spring 2001).
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Baptists in Canada: Search for Identity Amidst Diversity. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1980.
- Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1988.

Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends

The Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) arose in mid-17th-century England during the religious ferment of the Cromwellian Civil War. “Quaker” was a derisive name given to George Fox (1624–1691, the founder of the Society of Friends) by an examining judge whom Fox called upon “to tremble before the Lord.” The central message was that “Christ is come to teach His People himself” and that there is “that of God in every man and woman” that enables them to respond to God’s Inward Voice.

The Canadian Yearly Meeting (Assembly) is part of the worldwide Society of Friends through the Friends World Committee for Consultation and holds membership in both the Friends General Conference and the Friends United Meeting. Quakers have been in Canada for more than 200 years. They arrived during the American War of Independence as refugees from the rebellious colonies and later from the British Isles and Europe. The Canadian Yearly Meeting was founded in 1955 from the union of three 19th-century Yearly Meetings. The Yearly Meeting is held annually in different locations across Canada. There are 24 Meetings (congregations) and 33 Worship Groups across Canada from coast to coast. Membership has remained constant at about 1,200, and there are many attendees.

Worship is held on the basis of silent waiting upon the Lord, which enables ministry to be given in a spirit of devotion by any worshipper present.

Canadian Yearly Meeting (CYM) has a summer camp for Young Friends situated on Georgian Bay (Lake Huron). The Canadian Friends Historical Association, founded in 1972, maintains the Quaker Archives at Pickering College, Newmarket, Ontario. As a founding member, CYM holds membership in the World Council of Churches and in the Canadian Council of Churches.

The Canadian Friends Service Committee (CFSC), a committee of Canadian Yearly Meeting, witnesses in words and in action to the Testimonies of Friends: It witnesses to the Quaker Peace Testimony, through peace education and by international service and relief to victims of war and to the poor; it works for reconciliation and in justice and prison issues, in social and economic justice and Aboriginal concerns, and currently in ecological questions (for example, biodiversity and genetically manipulated seeds) at the CFSC Office in Ottawa. CFSC cooperates in the international affairs work of the Quaker International Programs at the United Nations in Geneva and New York.

Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends
91A Fourth Ave.
Ottawa
ON Canada
K1S 2L1
www.quaker.ca

Kathleen Hertzberg

See also: Friends General Conference; Friends United Meeting; Friends World Committee for Consultation.

References

- Dorland, Arthur G. The Society of Friends in Canada: A History. Toronto: The Macmillan Company of Canada Limited, 1927.
- Grant, John W. The Church in the Canadian Era. Vol. 3, A History of the Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1972.
- Walsh, H. H. The Christian Church in Canada. Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1956.

Candomblé

Candomblé is rooted in the spiritual heritage of the at least three million African slaves who came to Brazil between the first half of the 16th and the end of the 19th centuries. It is the result of a process of cultural assimilation that took place under the pressure of a white-dominated society. In the course of this process the collective memory of the black people was diluted, and their former tribal spirituality gave rise to a syncretism, which included elements of other religions, particularly Roman Catholicism and Spiritism.

Today, this form of worship appears in different geographical areas under varying designations. The term Candomblé refers originally to the Afro-Brazilian religiosity in the state of Bahia, but is also frequently used as a collective name for all Afro-Brazilian religiosity. In Pernambuco and Alagoas the word Xango is popular; people in Maranhão and the states of the Amazon area prefer Tambor de Mina, while in Rio Grande do Sul the word Butuque is applied. Macumba, a term coined in Rio de Janeiro outside of Afro-Brazilian circles, carries a pejorative undertone and is not appropriate to an unbiased academic approach.

It took some time until Afro-Brazilian religiosity gained an institutionalized form. Although the slaves on the isolated and enclosed fazendas suffered from considerable social control, urban slaves were normally more independent. As a consequence, in the second half of the 19th century, Afro-Brazilian places of worship (called terrenos) and their hierarchies were first established in the cities of the northeast. They became numerically even more significant after the abolition of slavery in 1888, when former slaves migrated to urban areas en masse.

Until the 1960s the affiliation with a terreno normally implied African ancestry. Thereafter, the social dynamics within the Brazilian society in general and its religious field in particular led to a change in the essential character of Afro-Brazilian religiosity. Freeing itself of the previous ethnic limitations of its doctrines and practices, Candomblé became an option for urban middle-class people searching for a religious alternative. This change also reflected the greater social mobility within Brazilian society. The shift in Candomblé's social base is reflected in the results of the 1994 Datafolha study, which showed that in 1994 51 percent of all Candomblé practitioners were white and 74 percent lived in large cities. Currently, there are efforts within Candomblé circles to re-Africanize their actual religious repertoire, but the effectiveness of these attempts cannot yet be evaluated.

Brazilian scholars treat Candomblé as one of the several "mediumistic religions"; Umbanda also falls into that category. The 1991 census, which treated Candomblé and Umbanda as a statistical unit, counted 648,463 members, or 0.44 percent of the total population. According to the 1994 Datafolha study, about one percent of Brazil's adult population was associated with Candomblé and one percent with Umbanda. According to the last national census, which treats

Candomblé practitioners in Brazil dance to the beat of drums during a ceremony honoring various orixas, or gods. Candomblé is an Afro-Brazilian religious tradition. (Stephanie Maze/Corbis) Candomblé separately, there were 130,662 (0.09 percent of the total population) Candomblé practitioners in 2000. In striking contrast, the Federação Nacional de Tradição e Cultura Afro-Brasileira estimates that 70 million Brazilians participate in either Candomblé or Umbanda.

Frank Usarski

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Spiritism; Umbanda.

References

- Bastide, Roger, and Helen Sebba. The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of the Interpenetration of Civilizations. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2007.
- Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.

Voeks, Robert A. Sacred Leaves of Candomblé: African Magic, Medicine, and Religion in Brazil. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1997.

Canterbury

The ancient town of Canterbury, in southeast England, today the seat of the archbishop of Canterbury, the head of the Church of England and the worldwide Anglican Communion, became one of the first British towns touched by Christianity and then emerged as the center from which Christianity was disseminated throughout the British Isles. Christianity appears to have been introduced into Britain in the fifth century during the last years of the Roman occupation. St. Thomas Church, the oldest parish church in England, situated just outside the wall to the east of the old town, has been in continuous use since the sixth century. The local ruler, King Ethelbert (ca. 560–616), had married a Christian, and allowed his new queen Bertha (539–ca. 612) to include her personal chaplain, Bishop Luidhard, in her entourage. The bishop operated from St. Thomas Church.

Bertha's presence paved the way for Augustine (d. ca. 604), a Catholic priest who settled in England in 596 with instructions from Pope Gregory I (ca. 540–604) to convert the Angles. Shortly after his arrival, having obtained control of a former Pagan temple, he refurbished it as a church that he named in honor of a Christian martyr, Saint Pancras (ca. fourth century). Only ruins of this church remain today.

In 597, Augustine traveled to France, from where Bertha had come, and was consecrated as a bishop. Shortly after returning to England, Ethelbert accepted Christian baptism and presented Augustine with a modest building adjacent to the royal palace as the new seat of episcopal office. After it was refurbished, Augustine reconsecrated it (ca. 603) as the Church of Christ of Canterbury. Later canonized, Saint Augustine is today remembered as the first archbishop of Canterbury.

In Augustine's later years, the king also gave him land adjacent to St. Pancras upon which a monastic center was erected. His successor, Archbishop Laurence, completed the project. Several centuries later, Saint Dunstan (d. 988) would name the abbey in honor of its founder. The monastery flourished as a major British educational center until the 16th century.

A new era for Canterbury began with William the Conqueror (1027–1087). Lanfranc, who came to England with William, became the first Norman archbishop of Canterbury (1070–1089). He launched a thorough reorganization of the British church that introduced Normans to many high clerical positions formerly held by Saxons, and firmly established Canterbury as the chief center of the British church (over against its primary rival, York). Three years before becoming archbishop, he pulled down the original church, and rebuilt the cathedral. He constructed the new cathedral on a model he brought from Italy. He then used the occasion of the church's dedication to indicate his allegiance to Pope Gregory VII (r. 1073–1085) over his rival Clement III, who had been appointed to the papal office by the French king.

In this 19th-century drawing, four knights slay the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket, on December 29, 1170. Becket had vigorously resisted Henry II in his claim of royal authority over Catholic Church officials in England. Though Henry did not necessarily order the death of Becket, his antipathy for him was well known, and his subjects acted on this ill will. (Ridpath, John Clark, Ridpath's History of the World, 1901)

Over the years, Canterbury would become the site for numerous historical events. In the cathedral, Thomas à Becket (d. 1170) would be murdered as his opposition to King Henry II's attempt to control the clergy reached an impasse. Becket's supporters quickly gathered his remains and treated them as they would a martyred saint. Those relics remain a treasured possession of the cathedral. The pope canonized Becket in 1173. Canterbury, already a site for pilgrimage, became more so after the archbishop's interment, thus setting the stage for the Canterbury Tales, stories about pilgrims on their way to Becket's tomb written by Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1343–1400).

In 1538, the monastery at Canterbury was not exempted from Henry VIII's orders to dissolve all the British monasteries. Its destruction (only ruins remain) did not extend to the cathedral; this severely weakened the archbishop's support community. As archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556) would lead the Protestant cause, until arrested in 1553 as Mary I (r. 1553–1558) attempted to restore England as a Catholic nation. After Mary had Cranmer executed, Reginald Pole (1500–1558), who led Mary's restoration effort, became archbishop, but died the following year. Succeeding archbishops like Matthew Parker (1504–1575) and John Whitgift (ca. 1530–1604) became known for leading Queen Elizabeth's effort to establish her via media between continental Protestantism and Roman Catholicism.

With the overthrow of the Anglicans and the rise of the Puritans (Presbyterians), bishops were dismissed from their office. From 1642, when Puritan forces despoiled the cathedral, it was largely abandoned. Following the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, however, it reemerged as the headquarters of the Church of England and the center for the spread of the worldwide Anglican Communion. In the 20th century, several of the archbishops of Canterbury have become world famous for their leadership in the international ecumenical movement and the redefining of relationships between the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, and Eastern Orthodoxy.

In 1988, Canterbury was added to the list of World Heritage Sites designated by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Eastern Orthodoxy; Elizabeth I; Mary I; Pilgrimage; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Brooks, Nicholas. The Early History of the Church of Canterbury. Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1984.
- Gameson, Richard, ed. St Augustine of Canterbury and the Conversion of England. Stroud: Sutton, 1999.
- Knowles, David. Thomas Becket. London: A. & C. Black, 1970.
- Withers, Hartley. The Cathedral Church of Canterbury. BiblioLife, 2008.

Woodman, Francis. The Architectural History of Canterbury Cathedral. London: Routledge, 1981.

Caodaism

Caodaism is a movement consisting of several groups dedicated to the worship of Cao Dai, a mystical pseudonym for the Supreme Being. These movements originated in Vietnam from the 1920s on. Presently Caodaism ranks as Vietnam's third largest religion behind Buddhism and Catholicism and it is the country's largest indigenous faith. It has an estimated following of more than 6 million in Vietnam and throughout the Vietnamese diaspora, principally in Australia, Cambodia, Canada, France, and the United States.

The origins of the faith can be traced to the esoteric experiences of a French colonial administrator Ngo Van Chieu (also known as Ngo Minh Chieu) from 1920. His work was primarily focused on Chinese folk religions, Masonry, and mediumistic visions. His meeting in late 1925 with other French-educated Vietnamese, in particular, a group of younger French-speaking Vietnamese clerks enthusiastic about European trends in Spiritism and séance, caused the religion to erupt in a mass movement. This latter group, which included Caodaism's greatest charismatic leader, Pham Cong Tac (1890–1959), developed Caodaism as strongly esoteric; this did not suit Chieu well, and he departed with his own small group.

Also called Dao Cao Dai, Caodaism is concentrated in the south of the nation. Doctrine describes the faith as a Dai Dao, or Great Way—a self-admittedly syncretistic system that unites all previous world faiths within a millennial framework understood by Caodaists as the Third Period of world religious development; hence the official name of the main branch of Caodaism, Dai Dao Tam Ky Pho Do (Great Way, Third Period, [for] Salvation). Caodaism makes exceptional use of traditional East Asian mediumistic techniques wedded to Western Spiritism introduced by the French. As the religion grew during the 1930s a number of competing mediums led different groups. The Thanh Ngon (Compilation of Divine Messages), Tan Luat (New Canonical Code), Giao Ly (Book of Principal), and Phap Chanh Truyen (Religious Constitution), together with the prayers and rituals, were all either suggested or confirmed by séance. Most of these texts are accepted by the various branches of the faith.

The administration of the main branch of the religion, which is centered in the great religious complex at Tay Ninh (approximately 56 miles northwest of Saigon), is divided into three bodies: A college of mediums, Hiep Thien Dai, also acts as the judicial branch of the religion; an administrative hierarchy, Cuu Trung Dai, headed by a Giao Tong, or pope; and a heavenly organization, Bat Quai Dai, headed by the spirit of Li Po (the famous Daoist Chinese poet of the eighth century). The administrative section is divided at every level into male and female streams, allowing Caodaists to claim that their religion is not sexist.

During the early years, the séance was used as a brilliant recruitment technique. This partly explains the initial rapid growth—up to 500,000 adherents in the first four years. Some Western commentators see this phenomenal rise as a reaction to French colonialism and world crises, while others speak of Caodaism as a disguised political movement. The rapid growth of the faith also led to much sectarianism. From the followers of Ngo Van Chieu, the Chieu Minh, to those groups that broke from Pham Cong Tac’s increasing control during the late 1930s (for example, Ben Tre), Caodaism’s schisms have become numerous.

Very early on, séance messages drew the religion out of Saigon to Tay Ninh, 56 miles to the northwest of the city where, over the next 60 years, a vast, autonomous community was established. The jewel of this area is the religion’s Holy See, Toa Thanh, the most splendid religious complex in the region (Ankor excepted). Caodaist architecture is highly individual, and temples resemble small cathedrals with pagoda-like decorations. Inside, ritual focuses upon offering of flowers (symbolizing the body), tea (the mind), and wine (the spirit) to the altar of Duc Cao Dai (literally, Venerable High Palace—a very mystical appellation). The Supreme Being is represented by a Great Eye (Thien Nhan). Adepts concentrate their vision on this eye to effect internal alchemical changes. Prayers are also said to a canon of deities that includes Kung Zi (Confucius), Lao Zi (Lao Tzu), the Buddha, Jesus Christ, and the novelist Victor Hugo.

Since 1975, Caodaism, like other religions in Vietnam, has been subject to sometimes quite brutal repression by the Communists. Most activity today is centered in the West, with the most active communities located in North America and Australia. The Vietnamese government has moved to suppress Cao Dai in its homeland, and in response many members have moved to other countries. A replica of the Vietnamese headquarters temple is in process of construction; the site is at 9980 Mission Boulevard in Riverside, California.

Thanh That Cao Dai California/Cao Dai Temple of California
8791 Orangewood Ave.
Garden Grove
CA 92841

The most extensive website with electronic texts and translations is: www.daocaodai.info.

Christopher H. Hartney

See also: Spiritism.

References

- Blagov, Sergei. The Cao Dai: A New Religious Movement. Moscow, 1999.
- Smith, R. B. “An Introduction to Caodaism.” Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London 33, nos. 2 and 3 (1970).

■ Cape Verde Islands

The Cape Verde Islands are a group of islands in the Atlantic Ocean located to the west of the nation of Senegal. With a total land area of 1,557 square miles, the islands are now home to some 427,000 people, the majority of mixed European and African heritage.

The Cape Verde Islands were discovered by the Portuguese explorer Diogo Gomes (ca. 1420–ca. 1485) in 1460. Prior to that time, they were sparsely inhabited by several peoples of related Bantu heritage. In the next century the islands, like Sao Tomé and Príncipe, became an important point for processing slaves captured along the west coast of Africa and redirecting them to various places in the Americas. Farmers from Portugal arrived to establish plantations, and their methods destroyed much of the islands’ fertility. As the plantation culture failed, many islanders migrated to Guinea-Bissau, other Portuguese colonies (Angola, Mozambique, Brazil), or the United States. In the 20th century, Cape Verdeans began to agitate for independence and developed close ties to their counterparts in Guinea-Bissau. They became independent in 1975. Major droughts through the 1980s and into the 1990s kept the islands poverty-stricken and dependent to some extent on foreign assistance. This poverty has also led to further migrations, and currently more Cape Verde citizens live outside the country than on the islands.

CAPE VERDE ISLANDS

In 1462, just two years after the Portuguese discovered the existence of the islands, clergy of the Roman Catholic Church who were affiliated with the Franciscan Order arrived to begin a mission to the islands' inhabitants. At the time, the islanders followed a form of West African religion that recognized a Supreme Being, but centered upon the veneration of ancestors and lesser deities. Magic was integral to the belief, and Europeans saw it as rank heathenism.

Conversion of the indigenous population proceeded over the next century, and a diocese that included Gambia and Cape Palmas was established in 1532. Jesuits arrived in 1604 and Capuchins in 1656. More recently they have been joined by Holy Ghost Fathers and nuns from several different orders. The present Diocese of Santiago de Cabo continues the original diocese, Gambia having been separated early in the 20th century. Through the 20th century, an increasing percentage of the clergy were Africans, though a number arrived from Goa (India).

The Church of the Nazarene, a Holiness denomination from the United States, was the first Protestant/Free church to establish work on the islands. They remain the largest dissenting group, and primary leadership has been assumed by local leaders. They were

Cape Verde Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	266,000	539,000	95.0	2.36	710,000	944,000
Roman Catholics	251,000	495,000	87.3	1.86	644,000	843,000
Independents	200	20,200	3.6	3.56	30,000	40,000
Protestants	8,500	17,400	3.1	2.02	25,000	40,000
Muslims	0	15,800	2.8	2.38	22,000	32,000
Ethnoreligionists	300	6,200	1.1	2.38	7,000	8,000
Agnostics	1,000	5,200	0.9	4.37	9,500	15,000
Baha'is	100	920	0.2	2.38	1,500	3,000
Jews	0	70	0.0	2.31	70	80
Total population	267,000	567,000	100.0	2.38	750,000	1,002,000

joined by the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1935) and the Jehovah's Witnesses (1955). The primary non-Christian group on the islands is the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of the Nazarene; Franciscans; Free Churches; Holy Ghost Fathers; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

Friberg, H. R. Like a River Flowing: The Church of the Nazarene in Africa and the Republic of Cape Verde. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1982.

Lobban, Richard A. Cape Verde: Crioulo Colony to Independent Nation. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1998.

Motley, S. L. "Because We Are the True Catholics: Os rebelandos of the Cape Verde Islands." M.A. thesis, University of California at Los Angeles, 1993.

The World Factbook. Washington, DC: Central Intelligence Agency, 2008. <http://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/cv.html>.

Capuchins

The Capuchins, officially the Order of Friars Minor Capuchin, is a Roman Catholic ordered community in the larger family of Franciscan orders. It was founded in 1520 by Matteo da Bascio (1495–1552), as part of an effort to reform not just the Franciscans, who Bascio felt had fallen away from the original intention of the order's founder, Saint Francis of Assisi (ca. 1181–1226), but the whole church. The Capuchins parallel in their development with the Protestant Reformation and the Jesuits (Society of Preachers). Their name derives from the hood, or capuccio, they adopted and that was at the time a distinguishing sign of a hermit.

The Capuchins had a controversial beginning. Bascio joined the Franciscans at the age of 17. After more than a decade of life as a monk, he aligned with a larger opinion that the order needed reform. In 1525 he decided to enter a more austere life and alter his habit in a manner that seemed to more closely resemble that of Saint Francis. The pope initially condoned his actions, and in 1528 issued a bull publicly accepting his reform movement. A small number of Franciscans had joined the Capuchins by the time it formally organized the following year. He was elected the vicar general of the new order. A parallel female Capuchin order formed in 1537.

Bascio did not find leadership suited to his own goals, and he resigned in order to return to his own spiritual practice. Then in 1537, following some papal letters criticizing the Capuchins, he left the order and returned to the Franciscans, among whom he lived the remainder of his life. Those who were left persevered, in spite of multiple leadership problems. Bascio's successor as vicar general became a problem so severe that he was removed from office and expelled from the order. The third vicar general, Bernardino Ochino (1487–1564), attuned to the currents of his day, converted to Protestantism and threw his considerable skills into the building of the Reformed Church.

Capuchin Catholic church in Michoacan, Mexico. The Capuchin monastic order was founded in the early 16th century. (Radius Images/StockphotoPro)

Those left tried to keep the reform movement alive. They abandoned the ideal of the hermit's life for a more communal approach (the membership was divided into local centers of from 8 to 12 members), but emphasized a life centered on austerity, simplicity, and poverty. To avoid subverting the intent of the rule, provisions were set in place. The house was told not to store up necessities such as food for more than a few days. The needed supplies were to be obtained by begging and the brothers were to refrain from touching money. To emphasize the austerity and simplicity of the ideal life, the friars were discalced, that is, went about their tasks without footwear. A schedule of daily prayer and regular fasts punctuated their calendar.

Their outward work was centered on preaching and assisting the poor.

Surviving their early critics, the Capuchins spread throughout Europe in the last half of the 16th century and joined the Jesuits as an essential part of the Catholic Counter-Reformation. They are remembered by Protestants for their role in instigating the violence of the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre. At the same time, they launched missions to Africa, Asia, and the Americas.

The order peaked at the end of the 18th century when an estimated 31,000 men were friars. It had attracted the support if not the membership of the powerful and wealthy, many of whom were buried in the large crypt located below Santa Maria della Concezione, a large 17th-century church in Rome. It suffered significant setbacks through the turbulence of the 19th century, and by the end of the century membership dropped below 10,000.

The order spread to the United States in the 19th century. The initial Province of St. Joseph, aka Province of Calvary, is headquartered in Detroit, Michigan. An early American recruit, Father Solanus Casey (1870–1957), became noted for his holy life, and after being beatified by Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) will possibly become the first American-born male Roman Catholic saint. There are now five other American provinces and one sub-province. Internationally, as of 2008, the Capuchins had 1,800 communities located in 101 countries around the world, with approximately 11,000 brothers in residence.

Possibly the most famous Capuchin was Padre Pio (1887–1968), an Italian priest best known for the stigmata he bore on his body for many years. Following the declaration by Pope John Paul II in 2002 of his sainthood, Padre Pio has become one of the most popular saints in the Catholic Church. More than 3,000 Padre Pio Prayer Groups with an estimated three million members have been founded worldwide, and new parishes in Vineland, New Jersey, and in Sydney, Australia, have been dedicated in his honor.

Curia Generalizia Frati Minori Cappuccini
Via Piemonte, 70
I - 00187 Roma
Italy

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jesuits; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Baer, Campion. A Romance of Lady Poverty Revisited: A History of the Providence of St. Joseph of the Capuchin Order. Sterling Heights, MI: Lesnau Printing, 2005.
- Conrad, Simon. Brothers of the Sun: Story of the Capuchins. East Brunswick, NJ: J. S. Paluch Co., 1956.
- Derum, James Patrick. The Porter of Saint Bonaventure's: The Life of Father Solanus Casey, Capuchin. Orlando, FL: Fidelity Press, 1972.
- Zawart, Anscar. The Capuchins (1528–1928): An Historical Survey. Washington, DC: Capuchin College, 1928.

Carey, William

1761–1834

William Carey, a pioneering voice of the Protestant missionary movement, became involved in the movement to send Christian missionaries to countries around the world that had emerged in England late in the 18th century. Unlike some other churches, including the Moravians and Methodists, which had already become involved in sending missionaries, the Baptist movement to which Carey adhered had no organization that could sponsor and support such missionaries. Thus Carey had to create the first society specifically designed to promote and manage a missionary endeavor.

Carey was born August 17, 1761, in Paulerspury, Northamptonshire, England. He was raised in the Church of England, but experienced a personal religious awakening during his 18th year that led him to join the Congregational church in Hackleton, where he then resided. In the meantime he had learned a trade as a shoemaker and, while following his secular occupation, began preaching whenever he had the chance. In 1781 he married Dorothy Plackett.

Carey became aware of a Baptist church located in Olney, not far from Hackleton. The congregation followed a Particular, or Calvinist, Baptist perspective, not unlike that espoused by the Congregationalists, but demanding of those who joined them to undergo baptism again, as they did not accept infant baptism (which both the Church of England and the Congregationalists practiced). After associating with the Baptists for a period, in 1783 Carey was rebaptized and joined with them. In 1785 he moved to Moulton, where he assumed a new job as schoolmaster; in 1786 he became the minister of the Baptist congregation there. He had had little formal education, but was the son of a schoolmaster and an avid reader. In his adult years he would master several different languages, both classical and modern.

Considered by some as the father of modern missionary efforts, William Carey left Great Britain at a young age for British India. (John Brown Myers, William Carey: The Shoemaker Who Became the Founder of Modern Missions, 1887)

He traced his interest in the world situation and missionary activity to his reading of the Last Voyage of Captain Cook, a account of Cook's third voyage during which he died in 1779. It directed Carey's reading to other volumes descriptive of foreign lands. He also became aware of the missionary activity initiated by the Moravians and Lutherans and the outreach efforts to Native Americans by the New England Congregationalists.

Through the 1780s, Carey contemplated the condition of the peoples of the world relative to religion and concluded that as it was the duty of all to believe the gospel, it was likewise the duty of all Christians to spread the Christian message to all nations. However, there being no societies dedicated to missionary activity in England at the time, he had first to overcome the resistance of his colleagues in the Baptist ministry who taught that it was not the duty of contemporary Christians to attempt to convert the unbelieving nations; that was God's responsibility. If one held to a Calvinist theological perspective, with an understanding that God calls the elect to salvation irrespective of human endeavor, missionary work could logically be seen as an unnecessary activity.

In the face of resistance, Carey persisted. Possibly aware that Thomas Coke had been promoting missions among the Methodists and earlier had penned a Plan of the Society [of Methodists] for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen, in 1792 Carey issued a booklet, An Enquiry into the Obligation of Christians, to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathen. This brief work became the key item considered by his Baptist colleagues who finally agreed upon the organization in October 1792 of the Particular Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel amongst the Heathen, the first such organization in the English-speaking world. A short time later, John Thomas, a Baptist who had previously spent time in Bengal, made an appearance in Northamptonshire. The new Society chose him along with Carey to initiate missionary activity in India. Carey sailed in June 1793.

The East India Company, which controlled Calcutta at the time, was anything but enthusiastic about the arrival of Carey and his family. They saw him as at best a distraction and at worst a disrupter of their primarily economic interests in the region. Carey moved farther inland from Calcutta to the Dutch settlement at Serampore. During his first six years he did little actual evangelism, spending most of his time mastering some local languages.

He was joined in 1799 by two colleagues, Joshua Marshman (1768–1837) and William Ward (1769–1823). Then two years later he received an unexpected boon when the British governor-general appointed him to a teaching position in Calcutta. That position evolved into a professorship at the Fort William College. This job kept him confined to the Calcutta–Serampore area, but through it he was also to secure government protection for the mission and aid for the publication of Bibles and other Christian literature.

Carey's wife passed away in 1807. For many years previously he had been severely distracted by her gradual mental deterioration. Six months after her passing, he married Charlotte Rumohr, a Danish convert with whom he lived until her death in 1821.

The Serampore Mission was not a great success relative to the number of converts it made. It was, however, in light of what followed, invaluable for the information it offered about the process of missionary work, particularly the importance of preparing translations of the New Testament into various indigenous languages. More immediately, its staff would assist numerous British missionaries across the Protestant spectrum who established work in India in the decades ahead, and it served as an inspiration for those back home in England who were creating an interest in and support for the emerging missionary endeavor. The Baptist Missionary Society became the model for a host of additional Protestant missionary societies that would be created across Europe and North America in the first half of the 19th century.

After many years of work, Carey and his colleagues would lead the Serampore Mission to break relations with the Baptist Missionary Society (1827), the ownership of the mission's property being one of the important issues. Following the break, the mission suffered significant financial instability. It could not survive the deaths of Carey (June 9, 1834), and then Marshman (1837), and by the end of the decade collapsed. Its work passed into other hands, and the college that Carey founded at Serampore closed its doors.

With the growth of the international Protestant missionary endeavor through the 19th century, Carey's work came to be seen by many, especially the Baptists, as the fountainhead of the movement. Missionary histories frequently began by recounting his story, and numerous projects and missionary-related institutions were named after him. Among the educational institutions that carry his name are William Carey University, in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, and William Carey International University in Pasadena, California. The Mississippi campus is home to the Center for Study of the Life and Work of William Carey.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptists; Church of England; Congregationalism; Methodism.

References

- Appleby, John. I Can Plod. . . : William Carey and the Early Years of the First Baptist Missionary Society. Darlington, UK: Evangelical Press, 2008.
- Carey, Eustace. Memoir of William Carey, D.D.: Late Missionary to Bengal; Professor of Oriental Languages in the College of Fort William, Calcutta. With an Introductory Essay by Francis Wayland, D.D, President of Brown University. Boston: Gould, Kendall and Lincoln, 1836.
- Carey, S. Pearce. William Carey. London: Wakeman Trust, 2008.
- Carey, William. Letters from the Rev. Dr. Carey. London, 1828.
- Drewery, Mary. William Carey: Shoemaker and Missionary. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1978.
- Marshman, John Clark. The Life and Times of Carey, Marshman, and Ward, Embracing the History of the Serampore Mission. 2 vols. London, 1859.
- Smith, A. Christopher. "William Carey, 1761–1834: Protestant Pioneer of the Modern Mission Era." In Mission Legacies: Biographical Studies of Leaders of the Modern Missionary Movement, edited by Gerald H. Anderson et al., 245–254. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1998.

Caribbean Conference of Churches

The Caribbean Conference of Churches (CCC) is the primary expression of the ecumenical movement among Christians of the Caribbean region. Though not including the churches of the several North American countries that border on the Caribbean, it does include churches from two South American countries (Guyana and Suriname). The CCC was formed in 1973, but grew out of the work of an earlier organization, Christian Action for Development in the Caribbean.

The challenge facing any kind of common religious action through the region are the obstacles created by the diversity of cultures found throughout the region, the relative isolation of its many island nations, and the widespread presence of poverty in the world of post-colonialism. Most of the nations represented in the CCC were previously colonies of England, France, Spain, the United States, or the Netherlands. Many now have as the dominant element of the population the descendants of slaves brought from Africa to work European-owned plantations.

Member churches of the CCC attempt to speak with a united voice concerning the major issues faced by the region. Current leading issues include endemic poverty, the HIV/AIDS epidemic, and the scourge of drug trafficking and addiction.

In 2009, the CCC reported 33 member churches. It has greatly expanded in recent years by the loosening of control over religion in Cuba, which now has eight denominations that have joined the Conference. The Conference operates through its head office in Trinidad and two program offices in Antigua and Jamaica. Some of the member churches in countries where Spanish is the dominant language also participate in the Latin American Council of Churches.

Caribbean Conference of Churches
PO Box 876
Port of Spain
Trinidad

Program Office:
PO Box 911
St. John's
Antigua

Program Office
PO Box 527
Kingston

Jamaica

<http://www.ccc-caribe.org/eng/index.htm>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Latin American Council of Churches;
World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Cathedral of Christ the Savior

The Cathedral of Christ the Savior is the largest Orthodox church in Russia, and possibly in the world. The account of the church begins on Christmas Day, 1812. With the last of Napoleon's soldiers driven out of Russia, Czar Alexander I (r. 1801–1825) ordered a general thanksgiving to God and an honor to the Russian army to be punctuated with the construction of a new cathedral in Moscow.

The project faced a variety of delays, not the least being the unsuitability of the original site chosen for its erection. Finally, in 1832, Czar Nicholas I (r. 1825–1855) picked a new site and got the project moving again, which included the removal of the church and convent already present at the site. Further delays resulted in the cornerstone not being laid until 1839.

The building of the original cathedral took 40 years to complete. Philaret (Drozdov), the metropolitan of Moscow and Kolomensk, and his vicar bishop Leonid (Krasnopevko) oversaw most of the planning and creation. The decorations for the cathedral had a united voice in affirming the mercy of the Lord vouchsafed to the Russian people through the intercession of saints during the nine centuries of the existence of the Russian Orthodox Church. The heroes of the Napoleonic War were especially highlighted.

Following a common model used previously in large church building in Russia, the cathedral used the Greek cross (with four arms of equal length). The cathedral was officially named in 1880 with the consecration held on May 26, 1883, which happened to be the day Czar Alexander III was crowned. From that time, all of the important church and civic events were marked with worship services in the cathedral.

In the wake of the Russian Revolution, in 1917, Patriarch Tikhon founded the Brotherhood of the Cathedral of Christ the Savior as an effort to keep the cathedral open in the new situation. His hopes ran into a plan by the new government that hoped to build a Palace of Soviets on the site of the cathedral. This proposed palace was projected to be the largest building in the world and a monument to Socialism. In 1931, the cathedral was destroyed, though no building was ever raised in its place.

Immediately after the fall of the Soviet Union, the leadership of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) began to petition for permission to rebuild the cathedral. Approval came in 1992 and the first construction began in 1994, with the aim of completing the work by the end of the millennium. Worship services began to be held in the partially completed building in the mid-1990s, with the final dedication being held in 2000.

The Cathedral of Christ the Savior is the largest church building in Russia and is very close in size to the Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade, Serbia, generally considered the largest Orthodox church building in the world. The cathedral is designed as an equal-sided cross measuring 279 feet across (St. Sava is 298 feet by 266 feet). The cathedral is much taller, having an overall height of approximately 338 feet (compared to 239 feet at St. Sava). Seating can accommodate some 10,000 people.

As it commemorates the divine intercession that the builders believed led to the Russian victory over Napoleon, the cathedral is seen as both a religious and a historical monument. Therefore, many of the interior frescoes cover both religious and historical themes, especially relative to the War of 1812.

The patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church is the rector of the cathedral.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Cathedral of St. Sava; Cathedrals—Christian; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Bohlen, Celestine. "A Cathedral Razed by Stalin Rises Again." New York Times, September 13, 1998, E11.
- Cathedral of Christ the Saviour. <http://www.xxc.ru/english/index.htm>. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Gentes, A. "The Life, Death, and Resurrection of the Cathedral of Christ the Savior, Moscow." History Workshop Journal 46 (1998): 63–96.

Cathedral of St. Sava

Saint Sava (1175–1235), the patron saint and national hero of the Serbian people, was born Rastko Nemanja in 1175, the son of Serbian King Stephen (r. 1166–1196). Serbia was still a relatively young nation, having freed itself from the Byzantine Empire in the previous century. In 1077 Duklja became the first Serb kingdom, its founding being intimately interconnected with the establishment of the Roman Catholic Bishopric of Bar. Toward the end of the 12th century, the new state Raska, centered in what is now southern Serbia, rose as a second Serbian nation. King Stephen ruled Raska. In 1196, he, like his son Rastko before him, moved to the Eastern Orthodox monastic center on Mount Athos in Greece, where he was known as the monk Simeon. Soon afterward, he joined with his son to rebuild the ruined Monastery of Hilandar, on Mount Athos, which had been given to the Serbian people by the Byzantine emperor. Simeon died there in 1199.

In 1208, Sava returned to Serbia from his many years on Mount Athos. He settled the feud between his two brothers, who had been fighting over the throne, thus allowing a new kingdom of Raska to be established. He then started to organize what became the Serbian Orthodox Church, which required the establishment of a number of parishes and monasteries. His primary task, however, was to free the country from the jurisdiction of the Archbishopric of Ohrid (Macedonia), which was accomplished in 1218. The following year, Sava was consecrated the first archbishop of the Serbian church by Patriarch Manuel I of Constantinople (r. 1216–1222), the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

In his years as archbishop he not only developed the church but had a significant role in the development of Serbian secular life, especially in the realms of law and education.

Sava died in 1236. He was later canonized and named the patron saint of Serbian schools and schoolchildren. In 1595, the Ottoman Empire's General Sinan Pasha (1506–1596), then in a war with the Hapsburg Empire, incinerated the body of Saint Sava on the Vračar plateau, just north of the center of Belgrade. It is a high point in the present city of Belgrade.

On the 300th anniversary of the burning of Saint Sava's body, a group of Serbian Orthodox believers founded the Society for the Construction of the Cathedral of Saint Sava on Vračar with the idea of building a cathedral on the site. Initially a small church was constructed and the search began to find an adequate design. That quest was disrupted by World War I and the Society was not re-established until 1919. Finally in 1926 an acceptable design submitted by architect Aleksandar Deroko was selected.

Construction of the church began in 1935, with the laying of a cornerstone by Bishop Gavriilo Dožić-Medenica (1881–1950, later known as Patriarch Gavriilo V). Work continued until interrupted by World War II. The Society ceased to exist, and an atheist government took control as Serbia was integrated into the new federal republic of Yugoslavia. In 1958, Patriarch German (189–1991) revived the idea of the church, but his requests were rebuffed until 1984. With an updated plan using newly available building materials, the construction was restarted in 1985. Work has continued to the present (2009), with the internal decoration the primary part to be completed.

The church is centrally planned, having the form of a Greek cross (with each of its four arms the same length). Its most impressive feature is the large central dome supported on four pendentives. The church is 299 feet long from east to west, and 266 feet from north to south. It is 230 feet tall (to the top of the dome), with the cross on the top of the dome reaching another 39.4 feet upward). The ground floor has a surface area of 37,700 square feet, with 4 additional galleries. The cathedral can accommodate 10,000 worshippers. The choir gallery seats 800 singers.

The Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade, Serbia, is an Orthodox church. (Diomedia/StockphotoPro)

The Cathedral of St. Sava (not in fact a cathedral as it is not the church of the archbishop of Belgrade) challenges the Cathedral of Christ the Saviour in Moscow as the largest Orthodox church in the world. The Moscow church is 335 feet tall, and measures 279 feet on both its north-south and east-west axes, and is about equal in the number of worshippers it can accommodate.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Cathedral of Christ the Saviour; Cathedrals—Christian; Serbian Orthodox Church.

References

Serbian Orthodox Church. <http://www.spc.rs/eng>.

Accessed May 15, 2009.

Velimirovitch, Nicholai. The Life of St. Sava. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1989.

Cathedrals—Christian

Within the Christian tradition, the term “cathedral” most often refers to the primary church building of a diocese (or archdiocese) that is also attached to or houses the diocesan headquarters. It is a designation used almost exclusively within the Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Anglican traditions (and a few Lutheran state churches in northern Europe), where leadership is placed in the hands of a bishop or archbishop. More literally, the cathedral is the seat placed in the chancel area of the church's sanctuary in which the bishop sits when attending worship at the cathedral church. The seat has thus become a symbol of the bishop's authority.

In non-episcopal churches, the term "cathedral" has been applied to large and otherwise special church buildings, suggesting a comparison of the church with some secondary characteristics associated with cathedrals architecturally or in terms of importance to the group. Thus, the Crystal Cathedral, in Garden Grove, California, a church related to the Reformed Church in America, is a large church building with a variety of architectural innovations. In the modern Pentecostal/Charismatic movement, the leader of the many relatively small denominations has been given the title bishop, and the movement has subsequently used the term "cathedral" as a designation of the lead church of the new denomination. Since cathedrals are generally the largest church buildings in a city or diocese, there is a tendency to see any large church building as a cathedral whether it is a diocesan headquarters church or not. Such is the case, for example, with the Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade, Serbia, possibly the largest Eastern Orthodox church in the world.

Through the Middle Ages, cathedrals evolved architecturally from the ancient Roman basilica, the imperial palace hall. They were designed to be impressive structures above and beyond the role assumed by parish churches as the central building in a town. To encase more space and make a more forceful statement of the church's hegemony in society and culture, the Romanesque and then Gothic format evolved to obtain the most spectacular result from the primary building material—stone. In the contemporary world, steel and concrete have allowed for even more impressive structures to emerge using a spectrum of new styles.

The cathedral would begin to make an impact on the church in the fourth century, after Constantine decriminalized the church and then began to privilege it throughout the Roman Empire. In its new position the church began to gain strength and status in the culture; it also accumulated wealth and had access to numerous wealthy potential patrons. It began to make an architectural statement with the erection of the St. John Lateran Basilica in Rome, the official cathedral of Rome. (Though St. Peter's is often called a cathedral, it is a basilica only, the seat of the archdiocese of Rome being at St. John Lateran.) Then in 360, Constantius II (r. 337–361) built the first Hagia Sophia in Constantinople. As impressive as the new church was, it would be replaced in the 530s by the Emperor Justinian with the new Hagia Sophia, still one of the most impressive monuments of Christianity, as the new cathedral church for the archdiocese of Constantinople and headquarters for the Ecumenical Patriarchate. For the next 1,000 years, it was the largest cathedral in the world.

In the West, the cathedral developed first as a community of the clergy attached to the bishop and the church over which he was formally the pastor. The cathedral community also often had a monastery attached to it. In the 11th century a trend started toward secularizing monastic communities attached to cathedrals. By the 16th century, most clergy serving at cathedrals were not under monastic vows, and the number dropped dramatically as a result of the Protestant Reformation. The non-monastic clergy attached to a cathedral often operated collegially and were governed by a code of statutes, or canons. Thus they came to be known as canons. A range of offices were created to organize the cathedral staff and facilitate their work.

Over the centuries, as the status of the bishop and the wealth of dioceses increased, local communities worked to create cathedrals that were symbolic of the faith they professed and a worthy representation of the God they worshipped. The cathedral was designed to be the most prominent building in the community, and the larger cities informally vied with each other to have the biggest, best, and most aesthetically pleasing structure. It was decorated in such a way as to assist in the education of a congregation, with a high percentage of people who could not read. Its design praised the Creator's work with representations of such things as the seven liberal arts, the seasons of the year, or the Zodiac, and its stone statues and stained glass related elements of the biblical story.

Hagia Sophia in present-day Istanbul, Turkey, was commissioned as a Byzantine church by Emperor Justinian I in 537 CE. For centuries the most important church in Eastern Orthodox Christianity, it was later adapted for use as an Islamic mosque and today houses a museum. (Corel)

Structurally, cathedrals were most often orientated along an east-west axis, with the floor plan in the shape of a Latin cross. The main entrance was in the west. Worshippers commonly entered into the nave, the main body of the building, where aisles facilitated their finding their place for the worship service. At the far end of the nave, farthest from the main entry, were the sanctuary and the altar, where the sacramental elements were consecrated for consumption in the Eucharist. An altar rail generally divided the area in which the congregation gathered and the sanctuary where the clergy would be found. During worship, the priests and other officiants gathered in the sanctuary. The lay worshippers faced the sanctuary, where Christ was present in the Eucharistic elements and beyond in the distance, the rising Sun, that is, the Risen Christ.

The smaller part of the cathedral, forming the arms of the cross, was oriented north and south. Those parts sticking out from the main body of the church were the two transepts. They often were home to altars for the veneration of saints, side chapels, or the resting place of the honored dead. The portals, windows, and statues of the north side of the building generally depicted scenes of the Old Testament, while the south side would be devoted to scenes from the New Testament. The west portal facing the Sun was generally concerned with the Last Judgment.

The more prominent cathedrals became places for pilgrimages. People were attracted not only by the spectacular architecture of the building but what it contained—relics of Jesus or Mary, or one of the other biblical characters, or an equally famous post-biblical saint. Many of the relics would gain a reputation for facilitating miracles and/or healings. Thus pilgrims were attracted to the Romanesque Cathedral of St. Madeleine of Veزالay (France) because of legends that suggested that the relics of Saint Mary of Magdala had been miraculously transported there. Aachen Cathedral, among its collection of relics, possessed the shroud of the Blessed Virgin, while Chartres Cathedral claimed her veil. Visitors to Cologne could gaze upon the Sarcophagus of the Magi, a large gilded sarcophagus claimed to hold the skulls of the three wisemen who visited the baby Jesus. The head of John the Baptist was on display at the Cathedral of Amiens. One of the most visited sites of medieval Europe, Santiago de Compostela in Spain, houses the legendary sarcophagus of one of Jesus' Apostles, Saint James. Cathedrals did not have all the relics, of course. Every parish church had at least one, but with the exception of a few, such as Jesus' shroud located in a specially built chapel in Turino, Italy, the cathedrals tended to possess most of the more famous relics.

The building of cathedral churches became the cutting edge of architectural development through the Middle Ages. In each new structure, the builders were attempting to span as much space as possible and to allow in as much light as they could. As the basilica grew during the early centuries of the second millennium CE, what was termed the Romanesque style emerged, known from its representative examples such as the Abbey at Cluny (France), the Imperial Cathedral at Speyer (Germany), and the Cathedral at Mainz (Germany). These massive buildings had thick walls, often giving them a fortress-like appearance, and space was enclosed under the circular Roman arch. While expanding the space available in the basilica, the Romanesque cathedrals did not admit much light.

The Gothic cathedral that superseded the Romanesque was inaugurated by Abbot Suger at the French Imperial Cathedral of St. Denis north of Paris. The new form, which quickly spread throughout Europe, offered two fundamental architectural innovations. The preceding Romanesque cathedrals were tall but their massive walls allowed for only small, narrow windows. The Gothic architects in effect divided the thick walls and distributed the weight to flying buttresses along the side of the nave. The buttresses not only allowed for further heightening of the structure but for a radical expansion of the space allocated to windows, resulting in the brilliant displays of stained glass for which Gothic cathedrals became known. At the same time, by replacing the Roman arch with the broken Gothic arch, more space could be enclosed in the structure.

Like the Romanesque cathedral, the Gothic cathedral was constructed on an east-west axis, with the entrance facing west and the apse above the sanctuary facing east. Generally there were three portals on the north, south, and west sides. The tympanum, the semi-circular space above the central entrance, often had Christ sitting in judgment over the world as its major theme. As originally planned, cathedrals might have projected as many as nine spires. In reality, spires proved expensive and difficult to complete, and rarely were more than two raised. On occasion funds ran out after just one, and in constructions that took multiple decades, the two spires could look very different.

The art of the cathedral followed some traditional patterns with depictions of the Old Testament to the north and of the New Testament to the south, though a particular theme of the art overall, such as to whom the church was dedicated, could affect the content. There was often an attempt to relate an event on the north wall from the Old Testament as the anticipation of a parallel New Testament event that appeared opposite on the south wall. This artistic format followed a typological interpretation of the Old Testament that saw particular events as types of later events in the New.

As the Romanesque cathedrals began to be built in the 11th century, the Hagia Sophia in Constantinople remained the largest church building in the world, and European stone masons began experimenting on ways to increase the space they could enclose. The first successes involved lengthening the nave, and three British cathedrals began within a year or two of each other demonstrate the accomplishment. Ely, St. Albans's, and Winchester all pushed their naves beyond 500 feet with Winchester finally coming out the longest with a 558-foot-long nave. The next century would be marked by the new church at Cluny, in Burgundy, France, which, though not a cathedral church, was upon completion the largest church in Europe, second only to Hagia Sophia. The lead church for a powerful religious order, the building, with its 600-foot nave, would influence what would follow in the next century. Completed almost simultaneously with the church at Cluny was the Cathedral Church of Christ, Blessed Mary the

The Cathedral of the Incarnation, Nashville, Tennessee, is the cathedral seat of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Nashville. (J. Gordon Melton)

Virgin and St. Cuthbert of Durham, the cathedral for Durham, England. The Durham Cathedral is now seen as the epitome of what was termed Norman architecture, the designation of the Romanesque in Great Britain, and is noted for its 500-foot nave, 200-foot observation tower, and flying buttresses that allow it to be seen as a transitional building anticipating the Gothic. Durham was completed in 1133, just three years after Cluny.

The 13th century saw the explosion of cathedral building that again pushed the limits of the possible. The town of Chartres, about 50 miles southwest of Paris, was already a pilgrimage site due to its ownership of a tunic said to have belonged to the Virgin Mary. Fairs were organized on the occasions of the main feast days devoted to her. The tunic gained even more fame when it survived the fire that destroyed the previous cathedral. The miracle of the tunic's survival increased the funds available for support, and over the next 25 years, the church was raised (1194–1220). Not the largest, but by many considered the best, Chartres Cathedral was dedicated to the Virgin. It brought together all the Gothic features seen earlier at Durham and St. Denis and remains an object of beauty to be admired. It has also become an object of massive Esoteric speculations because of the mathematical proportions it embodies and its artistic features, from the rose window to the famous labyrinth.

Salisbury Cathedral was begun as Chartres was being built and became the leading example of early British Gothic architecture. Today it is known for its beauty, its single tower, the tallest church spire in the United Kingdom (404 feet high), and the world's oldest working clock, which dates from 1386 CE. The 14th century would see the completion of a host of new large cathedrals, including Nidaros Cathedral in Trondheim, Norway (ca. 1300); Lincoln Cathedral in Lincoln, England; and Notre Dame in Paris (1345). The following century would be punctuated by the Basilica di Santa Maria del Fiore in Florence, Italy, notable for its dome, the largest brick dome ever constructed, and Winchester Cathedral with its 550-foot nave.

The 16th century was a turning point in European history and architecture and notable for the construction of two churches, the Cathedral at Seville, Spain, and St. Peter's Basilica in Rome. The former, begun for the basest of reasons, was intended to showcase the city's prosperity and to celebrate the recapture of the city by Christians who pushed the Moors out in the 14th century. Work on the church began around 1402 and continued for a century. Initially completed in 1506, the church experienced a major disaster in 1511 when the dome collapsed. The new dome was completed in 1520. At this point, Seville surpassed the Hagia Sophia in size, and emerged as the largest cathedral in the world. Of course, by this time Constantinople had been conquered by the Ottoman Empire, which transformed Hagia Sophia into a mosque. The Seville Cathedral was built over the site of a former mosque, and incorporated its minaret as a bell tower that now rises in excess of 300 feet. St. Peter's, when finished in the 17th century, would, of course eclipse all of the previous church buildings, and it would await the advent of modern building materials and practices.

The Reformation would bring with it sweeping changes not so much as to how cathedrals were built as to how they were viewed. Many of the older, more famous cathedrals fell into Protestant hands, especially ones in Germany, Scandinavia, and England. Relics were abandoned, the role of saints re-evaluated, pilgrimages de-emphasized, and monastic communities dispersed. Cathedrals were now seen much more simply as the diocesan headquarters church.

Meanwhile, two important cathedrals begun prior to the Reformation, one in Italy and one in a part of Germany that had remained largely Catholic, were slowly being completed. The cathedral at Milan, the Doumo, begun in 1385, took 500 years to complete. An evolving, sophisticated, and complicated architectural plan was pronounced completed in 1965. It is one of the five largest cathedrals in the world, depending upon what measurements are used to determine that status.

By the time the Doumo was completed, the cathedral at Cologne had also been finished. Begun in 1248, it took 600 years to complete (in 1880). The massive structure emerged as the largest Gothic church in Northern Europe. When completed it was also for a few years the tallest structure in the world, though by the end of the century it had been surpassed by the Washington Monument in the District of Columbia and the spire of Ulm Cathedral. It still boasts the largest façade of any church in the world.

The larger cathedrals such as the ones at Seville, Milan, and Cologne, compete for attention with those that have acquired historical significance such as Westminster Abbey in London, where the rulers of England are crowned, or St. Patrick's, the first major cathedral building in the United States. They also compete with the new modern structures, such as the Cathedral of Our Lady of the Angels in Los Angeles, built after the application of steel and concrete created possibilities of eclipsing the massive designs of stone structures. It is to be noted that several new mega-churches adopting modern materials, such as the Basilica of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Aparecida in Brazil or the Church of Our Lady of Peace in Cote d'Ivoire, are not diocesan churches as such. In the midst of the emergence of the new materials and techniques, in the 1880s the Episcopal Diocese of New York commenced the building of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. As it now stands (and it has not been deemed completed), the inside encompasses 121,000 square feet (more than half a city block). Its nave is more than 600 feet long. It claims the title of the largest cathedral, the largest Anglican church, and the fourth largest Christian church in the world. Its claims are disputed by Liverpool Cathedral in the United Kingdom. St. John encompasses a larger total area within its walls, but Liverpool has a longer nave (618 feet). Seville is slightly larger than St. John in the area encompassed under its roof.

Amid the drive to build the largest religious edifices, some attention should be given to the cathedral in Mexico City, which was built over the Aztec Templo Major. Begun in 1573, it was not completed until 1813. It is both the largest and oldest cathedral in Latin America, and most other Latin American cathedrals can be seen as variations of it. It in turn drew inspiration from Spain and reflects the Baroque mystical theology of Spain's Counter-Reformation led by Saints Teresa of Avila, John of the Cross, and Ignatius Loyola.

The Cathedral of Monreale, Sicily, was constructed between 1175 and 1189 and is a national monument of Italy. (J. Gordon Melton)

In naming but a few of the more outstanding Western cathedrals, it should not be forgotten that the Eastern Orthodox churches were also creating cathedrals. While some of these were built on the longitudinal form of the basilica, most tended to be modeled on the circular pattern with a central dome, typified by the Hagia Sophia. This basic model gave Orthodox cathedrals a different look and feel from that of their Western counterparts. Though they never reached the proportions of the Hagia Sophia, they became outstanding pieces of art and architecture due to their intricate designs and artwork. Notable examples, among many that could be named, are the Saint Sophia Cathedral in Kiev, Ukraine; Bagrati Cathedral, Kutaisi, Georgia; Cathedral of Christ the Savior or the Cathedral of the Dormition in Moscow; St. Mark's Coptic Orthodox Cathedral, Cairo, Egypt; and Etchmiadzin Cathedral, Etchmiadzin, Armenia.

The largest Eastern Orthodox church in the world is the Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade, Serbia; however, it is not a true cathedral, having no role as the seat of a bishop. That being the case, the Cathedral of Christ the Saviour in Moscow, originally commissioned by Peter the Great and modeled on the Hagia Sophia, with space for 10,000 worshippers, appears to be the largest Orthodox cathedral in the world. Uspenski Cathedral, a Russian Orthodox church in Helsinki, is the largest Orthodox church in Western Europe.

Cathedrals have attained an importance over the centuries as they have embodied advances in architecture, participated in history, and influenced the development of culture. As such, not a few have been chosen for inclusion on the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) World Heritage Site list. Among those cited are Etchmiadzin Cathedral, Armenia; Notre-Dame Cathedral, Tournai, Belgium; Cathedral of Saint James in Sibenik, Croatia; Roskilde Cathedral, Denmark; the Chartres, Amiens, and Bourges cathedrals, France; the Aachen, Speyer, and Cologne cathedrals, Germany; the Cathedral of Seville, Burgos Cathedral, Spain; and Durham Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and Canterbury Cathedral, United Kingdom. Additional cathedrals are included on the list as part of a larger designation of a whole city or section thereof, as a listed site.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basilica of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Aparecida; Cathedral of Christ the Savior; Cathedral of St. Sava; Constantine the Great; Eastern Orthodoxy; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Hagia Sophia; Roman Catholic Church; Rome/Vatican City; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Ball, Philip. Universe of Stone: A Biography of Chartres Cathedral. New York: Harper, 2008.
- Erlande-Brandenburg, Alain. Notre-Dame de Paris. New York: Abrams, 1997.
- Favier, Jean. The World of Chartres. New York: Abrams, 1998.
- Fitchen, John. The Construction of Gothic Cathedrals: A Study of Medieval Vault Erection. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Male, Emile. The Gothic Image: Religious Art in France of the Thirteenth Century. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Schutz, Bernhard. Great Cathedrals of the Middle Ages. New York: Abrams, 2002.
- Scott, Robert A. The Gothic Enterprise: A Guide to Understanding the Medieval Cathedral. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
- Wilson, Christopher. The Gothic Cathedral: The Architecture of the Great Church 1130–1530. London: Thames & Hudson, 2005.

Catholic Apostolic Church

The Catholic Apostolic Church was a major part of the prophetic Adventist Christian movement of the 19th century. Although it no longer exists it gave birth to the New Apostolic Church.

It was founded around 1832 in London, England, by the followers of a former Presbyterian minister, Edward Irving (1792–1834), after he was forced to leave his London church over doctrinal issues; in the fashion of small sects of the time, it was sometimes known as the Irvingites. Rather than setting out to be a new church, it was intended to be a wake-up call to the main Christian denominations in the Last Days. Leading members included Sir Henry Drummond (1786–1860), on the grounds of whose estate at Albury, Surrey, in southern England, the Church’s Apostles’ Chapel was built, and also the son of Spencer Perceval, Britain’s only prime minister to be assassinated.

Theologically the Catholic Apostolic Church was what today would be called Charismatic evangelical, with exercise of the gifts of the Spirit, including speaking in tongues and prophecy; but unlike most churches of this type it also developed a rich liturgy and ceremonial, borrowed and adapted from the Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches. Its main emphasis, however, was on the imminent return of Christ.

It appointed 12 apostles to take “the Great Testimony,” “couched in lofty language, for presentation to the Potentates of the world and the bishops of the Church universal,” in an effort “to seek to unite the entire Christian Church in preparation for the Lord’s arrival.” The testimony met with minimal response. (Irving himself was only appointed an “angel,” or bishop, rather than to the higher offices of apostle or prophet. Disappointed by this, and by the lack of evangelistic results, he died a broken man at age 42, in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1834.)

The apostles were mainly of high social standing and included three clergymen, three barristers, and two members of Parliament. They believed that Christ might return at the end of 1838, and returned to Albury from their separate (and uniformly unsuccessful) tours of European countries, before Christmas that year. A major dispute arose in the church as the prophets, who had appointed the apostles, criticized them for their failure; the apostles, who outranked the prophets, pointed out severely that the prophets had no authority over them. The church lost its unity and much of its impetus.

Worldwide membership at the beginning of the 20th century was estimated at 200,000 in nearly 1,000 congregations, around a third of these in Great Britain.

Over the following years some apostles retired, and all eventually died. As the work of the apostles was to spread the message of Christ's imminent return while there was still time, the church had made no provision for replacing apostles as they died—and without apostles, they could not appoint new bishops, elders, shepherds, evangelists, priests, and deacons. The last apostle died in 1901, age 95, and the last active priest in 1970. Before that, most of the few remaining members had been absorbed into the Church of England. It is thought very unlikely that any members still existed at the beginning of the 21st century.

Although the Catholic Apostolic Church dissolved away, its work has been continued quite successfully by the New Apostolic Church. In 1863 the Catholic Apostolic Church in Germany, believing that new apostles could and should be appointed, split from its U.K. parent in the “Hamburg Schism” and reorganized, initially as the Restored Catholic Church and a variety of other names. Today the New Apostolic Church has nearly 11 million members worldwide in some 170 countries; it claims to be one of the largest dissenting religious groups in Germany. The movement comprises a number of separate denominations as a result of numerous schisms.

David V. Barrett

See also: Church of England; New Apostolic Church.

References

Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.

Dallimore, Arnold. Forerunner of the Charismatic Movement: The Life of Edward Irving. Chicago: Moody Press, 1983.

Miller, Edward. “Irvingism: The Catholic Apostolic Church.” In Religious Systems of the World. London: Swann Sonnenschein, 1889; 9th ed., 1908.

Newman-Norton, Seraphim. The Time of Silence: A History of the Catholic Apostolic Church, 1901–1971. Studies in Charismatic Renewal, privately published, 1974.

Shaw, P. E. The Catholic Apostolic Church, Sometimes Called Irvingite: A Historical Survey. New York: King's Crown Press, 1946.

Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany

The center of the movement in reaction to the declaration of papal infallibility by the First Vatican Council (1870–1871) of the Roman Catholic Church was led by German Catholics, most notably church historian Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890). He was excommunicated on April 17, 1871. An initial Old Catholic Congress met at Munich, Germany, September 22–24, 1871. More than 300 delegates and observers attended, primarily from German-speaking countries—Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. The conference affirmed its allegiance to the ancient Catholic faith, along with rejection of the new dogmas promulgated by the Vatican Council. It went even further, however, in repudiating every dogma of faith not in harmony with the actual consciousness of the church, a proposition that was to allow them to make other changes in the years ahead. Most important, the conference decided to seek control of the property of the churches that served their members. Thus, they indicated their aim to ask for state support for their actions. Some in Germany hoped that the movement would claim the allegiance of the majority of Roman Catholics and thus allow for the nationalization of Catholic interests in the various German states.

At a second congress at Cologne, September 20–22, 1872, the 350 delegates made decisions on the election of a bishop and the organization of the clergy and parishes. Immediately after this congress, efforts were made to obtain recognition by the several governments, especially Prussia, Baden, and Hesse. The following year, Professor Josef Hubert Reinkens (1821–1896) of Bonn was elected bishop; he was consecrated at Rotterdam by the independent bishop of Deventer, Hermann Heydekamp, on August 11, 1873. He was soon officially recognized as a Catholic bishop by Prussia, and he selected Bonn as his residence. The bishop and his diocese were recognized by Prussia and granted an annual sum for support. The eventual support offered by other German states and Swiss cantons led to the transfer of local church property to the Old Catholics, in spite of strong Roman Catholic opposition.

Subsequent congresses were held at Freiberg (1874), Breslau (1876), Baden-Baden (1880), and Krefeld (1884). Clerical celibacy was abolished in 1874, and in 1877, Reinkens founded a seminary for theological students, and a theological faculty developed at the University of Berne. It was also the case that changes introduced among the Old Catholics, such as allowing priests to marry and the use of the vernacular, alienated Döllinger, who refused to participate in these additional church congresses or lend his name to their promulgations.

The Old Catholic Church of Switzerland organized in 1875, and Reinkens consecrated a bishop for it the following year. Initially all of the Old Catholic parishes (other than those in the Netherlands) were part of the German diocese, but during the 20th century they separated into their own independent national churches. After an initial surge in membership, the movement declined, as many members decided to return to the papal jurisdiction. In 1878 there were in Germany some 122 congregations (including 44 in Baden, 36 in Prussia, 34 in Bavaria) and about 52,000 members. By 1890 the number of members had shrunk to about 30,000. In 2005 the diocese reported 25,000 members in 45 congregations.

The diocese is a member of the Union of Utrecht, founded by the Old Catholic bishops in 1880, through which it has been since 1931 in communion with the Church of England. It now has full sacramental communion with all of the churches of the Anglican Communion. It was a founding member of the World

Council of Churches. As had other Old Catholic bodies, the German Old Catholics initially had problems with the ordination of females, and during the 1980s tensions developed with the Anglicans, as the Anglicans moved forward on this issue. In the 1990s, however, their problems with admitting females to the priesthood and bishopric were resolved, and in 1996 the first German Old Catholic female priest was ordained.

Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany
Gregor-Mendel-Straße 28
D-53115 Bonn
Germany
www.alt-katholisch.de/index.html

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Huelin, George. Old Catholics and Anglicans, 1931–1981. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1977.
- Pruter, Karl, and J. Gordon Melton. The Old Catholic Sourcebook. New York: Garland Publishing, 1983.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

CAUX-Initiatives for Change

CAUX-Initiatives for Change is the name adopted in 2001 for the spiritual movement begun in the 1920s as the First Century Christian Fellowship, which was known through the last half of the 20th century as Moral Re-Armament (MRA). The movement was founded by Lutheran minister Dr. Frank Buchman (1878–1961). Buchman had had an intense personal spiritual awakening in 1908. In the years after World War I he began to share his experience of release from resentment and other negative emotions with college students at Oxford and Cambridge in England, and as his following grew, it was informally named the Oxford movement.

Buchman suggested that God could become real to anyone who believed, the lack of experience of God being caused by moral laxness. A turnaround began with self-examination in the light of moral standards—purity, unselfishness, and love. He offered a means of realizing a change through the confession of one's failings to another and listening for God's guidance in the quiet moments of life, as one listens to one's thoughts. He organized a series of what were termed "house parties" to share—that is, to confess and listen.

Buchman was deeply concerned as Europe rearmament in preparation for World War II. He proposed that the next great world movement would be (should be) a program for moral and spiritual rearmament. The Oxford group launched a program for Moral Re-Armament in 1938. After the war, the group purchased a hotel at Caux, in Switzerland, to focus its program for postwar healing and reconciliation, and from which the movement would eventually revise its name. They brought together people from both sides in the war and placed them in intimate space for personal and social reflection. Leaders likened their work to an ideological Marshall Plan. They did breakthrough work by including both Germans and Japanese in their programs, and in 1986 MRA was given credit by Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone for contributing to the re-creation of Japan in the postwar years. The leadership of MRA developed their program around two major imperatives: they envisioned a world in which the national leaders were themselves governed by God, and they advocated the beginning of each day with quiet time to listen for God's guidance.

While MRA was developing their international program, another program that had originated from the Oxford Group developed as an independent sister organization. A man simply known as Bill to the large audience who had heard of him, who had experienced the changes Buchman advocated, developed his understanding of Buchman's approach into a 12-step program to assist alcoholics to stop drinking. Alcoholics Anonymous spread across the United States and then internationally. In the 1960s it began to spin off a set of 12-step programs to deal with a variety of addictions, from narcotic drugs to gambling.

In the years since Buchman's death, MRA has been led by an informal leadership at the global level.

It operates through a number of national affiliates, each incorporated in its own country. There are a large international conference center in Caux, Switzerland, which also serves as the international headquarters, and a similar center in Mumbai, India. Smaller centers are located in the United Kingdom, Australia, Brazil, and Zimbabwe.

The organization, now CAUX-Initiatives for Change, supports an expansive Internet site at the address given below. Both the British and American organizations also have an Internet presence. Initiative for Change oversees a variety of programs that embody its concerns as they affect different arenas of human activity. It is not a membership organization, but some tens of thousands of people in 80 countries are estimated to be part of its active network. There are national organizations in 37 countries.

In 2002, the various national affiliates of Initiatives for Change created Initiatives of Change International as an association to represent the universality and multi-faith character of the movement and especially to facilitate its relationships with the United Nations and other international institutions. Initiatives for Change International has nongovernment organization (NGO) status with the United Nations and is in special consultative status with its Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC).

Initiatives for Change
PO Box 3909
CH-6002 Luzern
Switzerland
Luzernerstrasse 94
CH-6010 Kriens
Switzerland

Initiatives for Change International
1, rue de Varembe
PO Box 3
CH-1211 Genève 20
Switzerland
<http://www.caux.ch>

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Belden, K. D. Reflections on Moral Re-Armament.
London: Grosvenor, 1983.

Buchman, Frank N. Remaking the World. London: Blandford Press, 1961.

Lean, Garth. On the Tail of a Comet: The Life of Frank Buchman. Colorado Springs, CO: Helmes and Howard, 1989.

Caves of the Thousand Buddhas

In Dunhuang (Yunhuang), a town in northwest China along the ancient and fabled Silk Road, one finds some 500 caves filled with representations of the Buddha. Once a thriving center of Buddhist culture, the caves were the site where a lone monk had a vision of what he recounted as 1,000 golden Buddhas. Other monks began to settle at Dunhuang and began to turn the cave complex into a massive Buddhist shrine. As the number of Buddhas, bodhisattvas, and various related divine figures carved on the caves' walls grew, the site began to be known as the Caves of the Thousand Buddhas.

In past centuries, the caves were more accessible, as they were located on what was then the main route from central Asia to China. Here, monks from India destined to join the work of transmitting Buddhism to China could stop at Dunhuang to master Chinese. Even more came to the caves on pilgrimage. Women would arrive from the surrounding territory to offer their respects to Guan Yin and seek an end to their barrenness before a famous statue of her located in the caves.

Over the centuries, as the monastic community expanded, the caves came to house a large library of Buddhist texts. Then, as the Silk Road lost much of its importance as a trade route, the community declined. By the 19th century the caves mostly were abandoned and the library largely forgotten. Then in 1907, explorer Aural Stein set out to verify the existence of Dunhuang's library based on the description of the place left from the eighth century by the traveler Xuan Zang. As he explored the caves, he rediscovered the large library of ancient texts sealed up in a room in Cave 17. He bribed the abbot of the surviving community of monks, and carted off the treasure trove of texts, which finally arrived in Europe. Among the items to emerge from the library was what was later verified as the world's oldest printed document, a ninth-century copy of the Diamond Sutra, an important Buddhist scripture.

Today, the caves have emerged as an important major tourist spot within the People's Republic of China. Though the site has been repeatedly pillaged through the centuries, a surprisingly large amount of the statues, carvings, and illustrations that decorated the caves has survived, and a small community of monks continues to maintain the site.

In 2001 the caves were added to the list of World Heritage Sites designated by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Pilgrimage; Sacred Texts; Statues—Buddhist.

References

- Brockman, Norbert C. Encyclopedia of Sacred Places. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 1997.
- Davidson, Linda Kay, and David M. Gitlitz. Pilgrimage from the Ganges to Graceland: An Encyclopedia. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Whitfield, Roderick, and Anne Farrar. Caves of the Thousand Buddhas. New York: Braziler, 1990.

■ Cayman Islands

The three islands that constitute the present-day Cayman Islands are located in the Caribbean Sea south of Cuba and north and west of Jamaica. The 48,000 residents share some 100 square miles of land.

The Caymans were uninhabited prior to the sighting of them by explorer Christopher Columbus in 1503. The first settlers were buccaneers, and through the 18th century the islands were a headquarters and haven for pirates. Though Spain formally ceded the islands to the British (along with Jamaica) in 1670 by the Treaty of Madrid, it was not until 1833 that a settlement on Grand Cayman was started by Jamaicans. The land remained a Jamaican dependency until 1959, when it became a British dependent territory. It retains its relationship to the United Kingdom in spite of some local efforts to attain full independence.

Presbyterians, representatives of the Scottish settlers in Jamaica, began work on Grand Cayman around

Cayman Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	9,200	39,800	81.0	2.45	43,800	45,700
Protestants	7,200	17,200	35.0	3.36	18,400	19,000
Independents	1,200	4,700	9.6	1.21	5,300	5,800
Roman Catholics	0	4,300	8.7	0.00	4,600	5,000
Spiritists	500	5,000	10.2	2.53	5,600	6,000
Agnostics	110	2,700	5.5	3.83	3,800	4,500
Jews	200	810	1.6	2.53	800	900
Baha'is	50	410	0.8	2.57	700	1,000
Atheists	0	190	0.4	2.57	300	500
Hindus	0	140	0.3	2.41	250	500
Muslims	0	100	0.2	2.44	150	300
Total population	10,100	49,200	100.0	2.53	55,400	59,400

1800 and have continued to dominate the religious life of the islands. In 1965, the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica and Grand Cayman and the Congregational Union of Jamaica merged to form the United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands. The Presbyterians were joined in 1870 by the Baptists, the second largest group on the islands. Only a small number of Anglicans have come to the Caymans over the years, and there is but a single Anglican congregation, attached to the Church of the Province of the West Indies (now headquartered in the Bahamas). Similarly, the Roman Catholic Church has had only a few members and has a single congregation attached to the Archdiocese of Kingston (Jamaica).

Through the 20th century, two American-based Holiness churches had a significant impact on the Caymans. The Church of God (Anderson, Indiana) and the Church of God Holiness arrived in the 1930s and now claim a combined membership almost equal to that of the United Church. They had joined the Wesleyan Church, a Holiness body that began work in 1911. As the population of the Caymans has grown since World War II (and its role as a vacation and banking center has become known), a variety of Protestant and Free church denominations from the United States have organized congregations, including several predominantly African American churches such as the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints came to the Caymans late (1981), and the single center is attached to their larger work in Jamaica. There is also a small work supported by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The Jehovah's Witnesses opened work in the 1930s. For many years there was a single practitioner of the Church of Christ, Scientist, but no Christian Science presence was reported as the new millennium began.

There are approximately 35 Jewish families on Grand Cayman, but no synagogue. They hold services in private homes. There is also a small Rastafarian community.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith; Jehovah's Witnesses; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands; Wesleyan Church.

References

Crayton, Michael, and the New History Committee. Founded Upon the Seas: A History of the Cayman Islands and Their People. Kingston, Jamaica: Ian Randle Publishers, 2003.

Hirst, G. S. S. Notes on the History of the Cayman Islands. Grand Cayman: Hobbies and Books, 1910. Reprint, Kingston, Jamaica: P. A. Benjamin, n.d.

Thompson, J. K. The Rise of the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the Bahamas and the Cayman Islands. Nassau, Bahamas: privately published, 1992.

CBAmerica

During the height of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy, conservative Baptists fought for a missionary society that would exclusively commission missionaries who held to an orthodox Christian theology. Given the unsatisfactory response of the primary organizations of North Baptists (now combined in the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.), many of the more conservative congregations began to turn to various independent missionary organizations to place their missionary giving. Finally, in 1943, Richard Beal, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Tucson, Arizona, and Albert Johnson, pastor of Hinson Memorial Baptist Church, took the lead in calling for the formation of the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS), now known as Conservative Baptist International. The following year, at the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention, the new Society was excluded from its consideration.

The action of the Northern Baptists against the CBFMS became the catalyst for the several hundred churches that had chosen to support it to move on toward the formation of a new congregational association that would in effect create a new denomination. The Conservative Baptist Association (CBA) was formed in 1947. The creating of the Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society in 1948 completed the development of an alternative to the Northern Baptist structures. Congregations began to withdraw from their former relationships and reorient their life to the new Association. As the Association grew, Bible schools and seminaries for the training of ministers were opened, and missionaries were sent into a steadily growing number of countries.

The CBA played an important role in the formation of the National Association of Evangelicals, which united the new evangelical consciousness in the years after World War II. In the 1960s, the headquarters of the three related organizations were moved to adjacent properties in Wheaton, Illinois, though further attempts to unite them into a single corporation failed. In the 1990s the Association assumed its present name and moved its headquarters to Colorado. In 2006, CBA reported some 200,000 members in its 1,200 affiliated congregations in the United States. The Association supported three seminaries and three colleges. Congregations are organized into 23 state associations.

Conservative Baptists support missionary personnel around the world. Some are working specifically in Conservative Baptist missions and others are working with various projects initiated by like-minded evangelicals.

The Conservative Baptists have resisted attempts by some members to move toward a more stringent fundamentalist position, and in 1964–1965 more than 100 churches left the Association to form the New Testament Association of Independent Baptists.

CBAmerica
1501 West Mineral Ave., Suite B
Littleton, CO 80120
www.cbamerica.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.

References

- Finzel, Hans W., ed. Partners Together: 50 Years of Global Impact, The CBFMS Story. Wheaton, IL: Conservative Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, 1993.
- Founded for the Word, Focused on the World*. Wheaton, IL: Conservative Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, 1978.
- Shelley, Bruce L. A History of Conservative Baptists. Wheaton, IL: CB Press, 1971.

Celebration of the Guru Granth Sahib

The Guru Granth Sahib (also known as the Adi Sri Granth Sahib Ji) is the scripture of the Sikh community, and is treated with the same, if not more, respect as that accorded the Bible by Christians and the Koran by Muslims. Sikhs consider it not only their holy book, but also their living guru.

Sikh devotees carry a canopy containing the Shri Guru Granth, the Sikhs' sacred book, during celebrations of the 400th anniversary of the book at the Golden Temple in Amritsar, India, September 1, 2004. The celebrations mark the day when Sikh Guru Arjan Dev walked from another shrine in Amritsar to the Golden Temple to install the book. (AP/Wide World Images)

The Guru Granth Sahib began with the founder of the movement, Guru Nanak (1469–1539), who composed a number of hymns and prayers that were collected, sung, and recited by his companions. His successors as head of the Sikh community also composed hymns, which would be collected in books called pothis. Paralleling the work of Nanak and his successors were others who also composed hymns, poems, and prayers following Guru Nanak's format. Over time, it became increasingly difficult to separate the highly valued writings of the Sikh gurus from those of their imitators. The fifth guru, Arjun Dev (1563–1606), assumed the task of assembling an authentic collection of the writings of his own and his predecessors that could be presented to the community as an authoritative text. He also added material from some 36 Hindus and Muslims to the collection.

Guru Arjun left some blank pages in what now emerged as the Granth. The 10th guru Gobind Singh (1666–1708) filled in these pages primarily with the hymns of his immediate predecessor, Guru Teg Bahadur (1621–1675). Before his passing, Guru Gobind Singh suggested to the community that they treat the Granth Sahib as their next guru.

The respect paid the Guru Granth Sahib is seen in its placement in the gurdwara, the Sikh worship hall. It is placed on a platform in the front of the gathered community. It is covered with a fine piece of cloth, and rests under a canopy, which is decorated in attractively colored materials.

The annual celebration of the Guru Granth Sahib commemorates its installation in the Golden Temple in Amritsar, India, the lead temple of the community. The Adi Granth as first assembled by Arjun Dev was completed in 1604 and installed in the Golden Temple at that time. That event is now celebrated on September 1 (the 17th day of the month of Bhadon). However, an even more important event that is celebrated annually is the second installation of the complete Guru Granth Sahib by Guru Gobind Singh, and the declaration of its status as the new guru, which occurred on October 20, 1708. On the new Nanakshahi calendar, that event is now celebrated annually on October 20 (the sixth day of the month of Katik).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Duggal, K. S. Sikh Gurus: Their Lives and Teachings. New Delhi: UBSPD, 2005.
- Kapoor, Sukhbor Sing. Sikh Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Publishing Group, 1989.

Celestial Church of Christ

The Celestial Church of Christ (CCC) represents one of the most popular African Instituted Churches with a geo-ethnic, demographic spread in Africa and the African diaspora. The CCC is part of an indigenous religious phenomenon referred to in Western Nigeria

Members of the Celestial Church of Christ ride on a canoe as it floats past houses built of wood and bamboo in the village of Makoko in Lagos, Nigeria, September 28, 2003. (AP/Wide World Images) as Aladura churches, a name expressing their proclivity for prayer, healing, prophecy, and other charismatic activities. CCC worldwide membership has been estimated at several million, with branches spread widely in Africa, Europe, and North America.

The CCC was inspired by the life, visionary experience, and charismatic personality of its pastor-founder Samuel Joseph Oschoffa (1909–1985). The founder (a Yoruba carpenter turned prophet) claimed to have received a vision while marooned in a mangrove forest in Dahomey in his quest for timber. Following this spiritual experience, he claimed to have received a divine commission to found a church. The church itself emerged in 1947 in Porto-Novo (now Republic of Benin) and later in 1950 in Makoko (Nigeria), where it gained popularity and worldwide fame. From its nucleus membership comprising Yoruba and Egun peoples, the church has transcended ethnic and national boundaries. The membership cuts across all social strata of the societies where it is found.

CCC organization is structured around the centralized authority of the pastor. As both the spiritual and administrative head of the church, the pastor has the unchallengeable authority on all matters and legitimates this authority through his personal charisma. His position remains the constant reference point of the church. The pastor-in-council, under the ultimate authority of the pastor, represents the highest organ of government. It comprises the diocesan heads and their deputies, the board of trustees, and members chosen by the pastor, who also serves as the chairman.

The internal organization of the church involves a complex hierarchical structure that could be classified into upper and lower cadres. CCC Worldwide is run through the international headquarters located at the Mission House at Ketu, in Lagos (Nigeria), though a new International Headquarters Secretariat complex is under construction at an acquired parcel of land on the Lagos–Ibadan Expressway. Other major sacred spaces of the church include the Celestial City in Imeko (New Jerusalem) and the Supreme Headquarters in Porto-Novo.

The most significant issue perhaps that the CCC has dealt with was the untimely death of its pastor-founder in 1985, an incident that marks a watershed event in CCC’s history. The mantle of leadership fell on Alexander Bada, though not without disagreements over succession and legal contestation. Bada’s death in 2000 plunged the church into protracted legal tussle, leaving the church to deal with the matter of succession in its leadership, continuity, and the routinization of charisma.

CCC beliefs are of immense significance to its members, as they lie behind the praxis, rituals, worship, membership, and ethos. The members see the Bible as the source of all their knowledge, the foundation of all their beliefs and of their mode of worship. The CCC constitution states explicitly the belief that the name and organization of the church, as well as its doctrines, beliefs, and rituals, are derived primarily from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. One peculiarity of the CCC is in their hymnody. All CCC hymns are believed to have been revealed, or channeled, through certain individuals such as the pastor-founder and various prophets and prophetesses from a divine source, that is, under the influence of the Holy Spirit. The CCC is a member of the Christian Association of Nigeria, the Organization of African Instituted Churches, and the All Africa Conference of Churches. In spite of its global demographic spread and its self-identity as a Christian church, the World Council of Churches has denied it membership on grounds of its non-condemnation of polygamy.

Celestial Church of Christ International Headquarters
Mission House, Ketu
PO Box 1237
Ikeja, Lagos State
Nigeria
www.celestialchurch.com

Afe Adogame

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; All Africa Conference of Churches; Organization of African Instituted Churches; Polygamy-Practicing Mormons; World Council of Churches.

References

- Adogame, A. Celestial Church of Christ: The Politics of Cultural Identity in a West African Prophetic-Charismatic Movement. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1999.
- Adogame, A. “Mission from Africa: The Case of the Celestial Church of Christ in Europe.” Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 84, no. 1 (2000): 29–44.
- Adogame, A. “Ranks and Robes: Art Symbolism and Identity in the Celestial Church of Christ in the European Diaspora.” Material Religion: The Journal of Objects, Art and Belief 5, no. 1 (March 2009): 10–32.
- Celestial Church of Christ Constitution*. The Board of Trustees for the Pastor-in-Council, 1980.
- Odeyemi S. O. The Spiritual Foundation of Celestial Church of Christ, Pastoral Publication, Femyet Outreach Publishing Co., 1996.

■ Central African Republic

As its name implies, the Central African Republic (CAR) is located in almost the geographical center of the continent. The landlocked country of some 240,000 square miles is surrounded by Chad, the Sudan, Cameroon, and the two Congo states. The country is inhabited by a variety of ethnic groups, the largest being the Baya, approximately a third of the 4.5 million citizens (2008), followed by the Banda (27 percent) and the Mandjia (13 percent). Conflict between the several ethnic groups remains a problem inhibiting national unity.

Various archaeological sites indicate that the country has been inhabited since prehistoric times, but the real history of the region begins around the end of the first millennium CE, as people from both Sudan and Cameroon began moving in. During the Middle Ages, slavers from both Europe and the Middle East were

Central African Republic

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,204,000	3,048,000	66.4	1.78	4,082,000	5,437,000
Roman Catholics	278,000	920,000	20.0	2.92	1,300,000	1,800,000
Independents	211,000	820,000	17.9	1.78	1,100,000	1,600,000
Protestants	225,000	690,000	15.0	1.66	950,000	1,350,000
Ethnoreligionists	575,000	825,000	18.0	1.18	800,000	850,000
Muslims	86,000	675,000	14.7	1.64	880,000	1,200,000
Agnostics	2,000	32,300	0.7	1.64	50,000	90,000
Baha'is	3,500	11,500	0.3	1.64	18,000	30,000
Atheists	200	650	0.0	1.66	1,000	2,000
Total population	1,871,000	4,592,000	100.0	1.64	5,831,000	7,609,000

capturing individuals among the CAR peoples and carrying them into obscurity in faraway lands.

In the 19th century, France was awarded hegemony over Central Africa and granted concessions to different companies to exploit the region economically. Caring little for the population, they killed, tortured, and enslaved many. French rule was more firmly established after World War I and was able to hold on through World War II, but then granted CAR partial autonomy and in 1960 complete independence. In 1965 a successful coup brought the infamous Jean Bekel Bokassa to power. In 1972 he declared himself president for life. Five years later he renamed the country the Central African Empire and had himself crowned as Emperor Bokassa I. His repressive and corrupt government was brought down with the assistance of the French government two years later. He later died in prison, convicted of murder, torture, and cannibalism. David Dacko, whom Bokassa had pushed out of office, returned, and the country resumed its previous name. Dacko was deposed a second time in a coup in 1981. His successor, André Kolingba, did little better in moving the country toward democracy and out of poverty. It remains in turmoil and poverty in the new millennium.

Much of the strife in the CAR has reflected the rivalries between the different peoples who live there. Each of these groups holds to a distinctive faith (though all are somewhat related) that includes a belief in a Supreme Creator and a pantheon of lesser deities. One relatively new movement related to the traditional beliefs is the Nzapa to Azande movement, which the government has recognized as an authentic African religion.

Islam was introduced in the Middle Ages by Arab traders and found some support in the towns and cities, though to this day the primary support for Islam comes from CAR citizens of Arab heritage. Primary Islamic support among the Central African peoples is found among the Hausa and Bororo peoples in the northern part of the country. Muslims are Sunnis of the Maliki School of Islam.

The Roman Catholic Church entered the country in 1894 as the French were asserting their hegemony over the region. An initial mission was opened at Bangui and through the 20th century grew into a vicariate (1937) and a multi-diocese organization under the archbishop of Bangui.

Protestants entered the country in 1920 through the efforts of Baptist Mid-Missions, a conservative missionary agency based in the United States, and the following year with the Brethren Church (now the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches). Baptist Mid-Missions continues to be the largest single supplier of Christian missionary personnel. The Brethren pioneered the effort to have the Bible translated into the various languages spoken in the CAR. They were later joined by representatives of various denominations and missionaries sent by several interdenominational sending agencies. The Swedish Baptist Mission opened their first station in 1923, and workers from the Africa Inland Mission arrived in 1924 and established work among the Zande people. Their efforts are now known respectively as the Union of Baptist Churches and the Église Évangélique Centrafricaine.

Independent African churches first appeared in 1956, when a group left the Baptist Mid-Mission fellowship to found the Comité Baptiste. Other African Initiated Churches include the Church of Christ on Earth thru the Prophet Simon Kimbangu (from the Congo [Zaire]), the Christianisme Prophétique en Afrique, and Kanda Dia Kinziga (People for Eternal Life).

The majority of CAR citizens are members of the various Protestant and independent churches. The Christian community is notable for the relatively small number of churches representative of the liberal Protestant community, the primary representative being the Église Luthérienne de la RCA. It began as an effort by the Sudan Mission and later received support from the American Lutheran Church (now a constituent part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) and the Church of Norway. No church based in the CAR is a member of the World Council of Churches. Groups such as the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches and Baptist Mid-Mission are strongly opposed to the WCC.

The continued political instability in the Central Africa Republic has contributed to its not being an attractive site for new religious movements from outside of the region to establish work there. Hence the older churches grew through the last decades of the 20th century with relatively little competition. Those that have initiated activity include the Jehovah's Witnesses (1945), the Baha'i Faith (1961), the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1962), and, most recently, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (1995). The Baha'i work, including some missionaries from Haiti, grew rapidly during its first decade, establishing more than 20 spiritual assemblies.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Norway; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Jehovah's Witnesses; Malikite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Album du Centenaire l'Église Catholique en Centrafrique, 1894–1994.* Bangui, Central African Republic: Commission du Centenaire de l'Église de Centrafrique, 1994.
- Hill, R. W. "The Christianization of the Central African Republic." M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1969.
- Woodfork, Jacqueline. Culture and Customs of the Central African Republic. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.

■ Chad

Chad, a landlocked northern African country, is located south of Libya, east of Sudan, and west of Niger. To its south are Nigeria, Cameroon, and the Central African Republic. The northern half of the country's 486,000 square miles stretches into the Sahara Desert, and most of the country's 10 million people (divided among some 200 different people groups) reside in the south. Especially during the last several thousand years, an actively expanding Sahara Desert has pushed the population farther and farther south.

The land has been inhabited for millennia. Archaeological evidence indicates that humans were in the area a million years ago. Muslims found their way to Chad in the 11th century, but Islam only became a national religion during the 16th and 17th centuries. The primary routes established to transport slaves from Africa to the Middle East ran through Chad, and the peoples of southern Chad became traditional victims of the slavers. In 1885, France was assigned hegemony over Chad by the Berlin Treaty, but did not become an active presence until after World War I, by which time Chad was designated a territory in the colony of French Equatorial Africa. In 1920, the French Foreign Legion invaded the region and defeated the powerful Muslim groups that controlled the north. The southern tribes aligned themselves with the French, whom they saw as liberators.

French rule continued until France granted Chad political independence in 1960. France has, however, continued to meddle in the country's affairs because of ongoing economic interests. The years of independence have been ones of war with Libya, civil war, and political instability. The country remains largely divided between the northern Muslims and southern groups.

CHAD

Muslims experienced considerable success in the early modern era, and about 45 percent of the population became adherents of Islam, a figure that has remained stable in recent centuries. The largest number are Sunnis of the Malikite and Shafiite schools. Islamic Affairs Committee of Chad (Comité Islamique du Tchad), based at N'Djamena, the capital, provides a point of unity for Muslim believers. As with much of Africa, Sufi brotherhoods are an important part of the Muslim population, the Hamilliyya, Tijanniyya, Qadiriyya, and Sanusiyya being the more important ones.

Capuchin priests of the Roman Catholic Church attempted to establish a mission in Chad in 1663,

Chad

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,842,000	6,770,000	57.8	3.69	10,250,000	17,611,000
Christians	854,000	2,986,000	25.5	4.69	4,944,000	9,112,000
Protestants	211,000	1,257,000	10.7	4.36	2,100,000	4,100,000
Roman Catholics	231,000	887,000	7.6	6.17	1,480,000	2,700,000
Independents	36,800	580,000	5.0	7.69	1,100,000	2,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	980,000	1,855,000	15.8	2.28	2,149,000	2,400,000
Baha'is	5,000	98,000	0.8	3.69	150,000	250,000
Agnostics	1,000	5,900	0.1	3.69	10,000	20,000
Atheists	0	600	0.0	3.70	1,000	2,000
Total population	3,682,000	11,715,000	100.0	3.69	17,504,000	29,395,000

but were unsuccessful. Only after the French established their governance of the region did the Holy Ghost Fathers, in 1929, establish permanent work, at Kopu.

Protestants came to Chad in 1925 through the efforts of missionaries sent out by Baptist Mid-Missions. Work was started at Fort Archambault. Although the people were receptive, no progress was made until the then chief of the Sara people died in 1937. Suddenly the work grew rapidly. The mission became autonomous in 1964 as the Association of Baptist Churches of Chad (Églises Baptistes du Tchad). The Sudan United Mission entered Chad in 1927. The mission later united its work to the missions of the French Mennonites and the Worldwide Evangelism Crusade to form the Evangelical Church of Chad (Églises Évangéliques du Tchad), the largest Protestant group in the country. The Christian Brethren, through their international missionary arm, Christian Missions in Many Lands, quietly moved into Chad in the 1920s from their mission in Nigeria. Work was established at Fort Lamy by 1925. Today, the Assemblées Chrétiennes du Chad is the second largest Protestant body in Chad. In addition, the U.S.-based Church of the Lutheran Brethren has built an expansive work as the Église Fraternelle Luthérienne du Tchad.

Evangelical Christianity dominates within the Protestant Free church community, and no Chad-based churches are members of the World Council of Churches. Several of the Protestant groups have formed a Fédération des Églises Évangéliques du Tchad, affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Jehovah's Witnesses have been active in Chad since the end of World War II. The Seventh-day Adventist Church established its Chad Mission in 1967. It is now part of the Central African Union Mission, which includes a number of predominantly French-speaking African countries.

During the post-World War II era, the Baha'i Faith also expanded rapidly. It reported more than 50 spiritual assemblies (local centers) by the mid-1970s.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Evangelical Church of Chad; Free Churches; Holy Ghost Fathers; Jehovah's Witnesses; Malikite School of Islam; Qadiriyya Rifa'i Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Quinn, Charlotte A., and Frederick Quinn. Pride, Faith, and Fear: Islam in Sub-Saharan Africa. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Chaitanya, Shri Krishna

1486–1533

Shri Chaitanya is one of the most influential teachers of Vaishnava Hinduism, and many of his devotees claim him to be an incarnation of Krishna, that most famous of Hindu deities. A contemporary of Martin Luther (1483–1546), he worked a reformation in Hinduism in eastern India in the 16th century.

Chaitanya was born as Visvambhara Misra in Mayapur (now in West Bengal) in 1486. Though the early biographies contain hagiographic elements, including miraculous events that took place when he was a child, the general shape of his life is clear. Chaitanya became a scholar of Sanskrit at a youthful age. He married, but his marriage ended abruptly soon afterward when his wife died of a snake bite. Plans to remarry were subsequently aborted when he experienced spiritual transformation through an encounter with the noted ascetic Ishvara Puri of Gaya. Chaitanya had traveled to Gaya and was in a trance at a Vishnu shrine when Ishvara kept him from falling. Ishvara subsequently taught him about Radha's love for Krishna and gave him the Krishna mantra. Vaishnava Hindus generally regard Krishna as an incarnation of Vishnu.

Chaitanya abandoned his role as teacher and became obsessed with a mystic passion for Krishna. Soon people began to acknowledge him as the incarnation of Krishna for this age and simultaneously as an embodiment of Radha, Krishna's lover. He became a sannyasin in about 1510, traveled throughout India for a short while, and then settled in Orissa until his death in 1533.

Chaitanya adopted a personalist view of God and rejected the advaitist position that all is the impersonal One. For Chaitanya, Krishna is the Supreme Personality of God. Chaitanya left no extant writings though eight verses directly from him are recorded by others. These verses are known as the Siksastaka and mainly comprise devotional language about Krishna. The last verse reads: "I know no one but Krishna as my Lord, and He shall remain so even if He handles me roughly in His embrace or makes me brokenhearted by not being present before me. He is completely free to do anything and everything, for He is always my worshipful Lord unconditionally."

The most important early biographies include Chaitanya Bhagavata (by Vrindavana Das Thakura, 1507–1589), the Chaitanya Mangala (Lochana Dasa), and the Chaitanya Charitamrita (Krishna Das Kaviraja, 1496–ca. 1587). Krishna Das Kaviraja was a disciple of Raghunatha dasa Goswami (1494–1586), who was a student of Chaitanya. Raghunatha is one of the six goswamis of Vrindaban, the main teachers of Chaitanya's message.

The Chaitanya Charitamrita is widely known through the publishing efforts of Sri Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), the founder of the modern International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). Prabhupada published the Charitamrita in a deluxe 17-volume English edition in the 1970s. ISKCON has done more than any Hindu group to foster knowledge of Chaitanya and adoration of him as an incarnation of Krishna globally.

Some followers of the Indian saint Ramakrishna (1836–1886) have suggested that he was an incarnation of Chaitanya.

James A. Beverley

See also: International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Luther, Martin; Vaishnavism.

References

- De, S. K. History of the Vaisnava Faith and Movement. Calcutta: Firma KLM, 1986.
- Dimock, Edward C., and Tony K. Stewart, trans. Caitanya Cantamrta. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Kennedy, Melville T. The Chaitanya Movement. New York: Garland, 1991.
- Sharma, Krsnisha. Bhakti and the Bhakti Movement. New Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal Publishers, 1987.

Chajang

Seventh century CE

Chajang, an outstanding Korean Buddhist monk of the seventh century CE, was born of a noble family and early in life showed himself to be an intelligent and capable person. Chinp'yong (r. 576–579), the ruler of what was then the kingdom of Silla (on the southwestern part of the Korean peninsula), tried to convince Chajang to abandon the religious life and join his government. Chajang refused, citing his commitment to the Buddha. Chinp'yong was succeeded by his daughter, Queen Sondok (r. 634–647), who instituted a policy of strengthening Silla's ties to China.

Sondok's policies benefited Chajang, who was chosen as one of the first Korean Buddhist monks to go to China for study. Shortly after Sondok took the throne, he traveled to Wutai Shan, one of the four Chinese mountains especially sacred to Buddhists and believed to be the home of the Bodhisattva Manjushri, the embodiment of perfect wisdom. Toward the end of his stay at Wutai, Chajang was chanting before a statue of Manjushri and was given a poem in a dream. Unable to interpret the poem, he consulted a local monk, who gave him several relics of the Buddha and told him to return to his home. After a further week of devotional practice, he had a vision in which he was told that the monk was in fact Manjushri and that upon his return home he must build a temple to the bodhisattva.

In 643, Chajang arrived at the mountain Odae-san in southern Korea, where after some waiting he had another encounter with Manjushri. He subsequently built Woljong-sa (Calm Moon Temple), later a major center for disseminating Buddhism throughout the peninsula. In 646 he received the patronage of Queen Sondok to build T'ongdo-sa Temple. He settled on Yongjuk-san Mountain in what is now the South Kyongsang Province and from there oversaw the building of the new temple complex. Here he enshrined the relics of Manjushri acquired in China. (Woljong-sa was destroyed during the Korean War but rebuilt in 1969. T'ongdo-sa was largely destroyed during the Japanese invasion in 1592 and reconstructed in 1601.) He spent the rest of his life at T'ongdo-sa.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Korean Buddhism; Relics; T'ongdo-sa Temple.

References

Grayson, James Huntley. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Kim, Duk-Whang. A History of Religions in Korea. Seoul: Daeji Monoonwha-sa, 1988.

Mohan, Pankaj N. "W'n'gwang and Chajang in the Formation of Early Silla Buddhism." In Religions of Korea in Practice, edited by Robert Buswell, Jr., 51–64. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.

Chaldean Catholic Church

The Chaldean Catholic Church is an Eastern-rite church in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church that emerged in Iraq in the 1550s. The Christian community in Iraq had separated from the main bodies of Eastern Orthodoxy in the fifth century, following its unwillingness to affirm the promulgations of the Council of Ephesus (431 CE), one of the international gatherings of bishops of the Christian church at which decisions on essential Christian doctrines were made. The Iraqi (or Assyrian) church rejected the Orthodox formula concerning the nature of Christ. That church, now known as the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church, included Christians in Iran and Lebanon, and has survived through the centuries in spite of the conquest of the region by Islamic forces.

In the 13th century, Roman Catholic missionaries began work within the Iraqi Christian community. In the 1550s they were present and able to take advantage of a peculiar situation. The Assyrian church had developed a mode of passing the office of patriarch (the highest office in the church) from uncle to nephew in a single family. On occasion this practice led to the selection of an untrained youth as the new patriarch. Such a youth was selected in 1552. As a result, a group of bishops declined to acknowledge the new patriarch and instead turned to Rome. They selected a new patriarch, and in 1553, the pope consecrated him as Patriarch Simon VIII of the Chaldean Church. The new church accepted Catholic doctrine, especially its understanding of the person and work of Christ, but retained its own rite, the ancient East Syrian liturgy of Addai and Mari (with a few minor changes).

The new patriarch survived only two years, before being arrested and executed by Iraqi authorities. How-

Iraqi Chaldean Catholic worshippers attend Sunday mass at a Chaldean church in Amman, Jordan, February 18, 2007. There are about 2,000 Iraqi Christians in Jordan and most of those are Chaldean Catholics, who once formed Iraq's largest Christian community. They are linked to Rome, acknowledging the Pope as the head of their church. (AP/Wide World Images) ever, the church survived and grew, primarily at the expense of the Assyrian church. It is currently headed by Patriarch Emmanuel III Delly (b. 1927), patriarch of Babylon of the Chaldeans, who was elected and installed in office in 2003.

Today, the Chaldean Catholic Church is headquartered in Baghdad, Iraq. It sponsors a seminary in Baghdad and oversees two religious orders. There are 10 dioceses in Iraq, 4 in Iran, and 7 additional dioceses in the Middle East. There are some 419,000 members (2008). Along with other non-Muslim bodies, it has suffered severely due to the Iraqi War launched in 2003. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches. Outside the Middle East there is one diocese, the Diocese of St. Thomas the Apostle, serving the church's members in the United States.

Chaldean Catholic Church
PO Box 6112
Baghdad Iraq
<http://www.st-adday.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Eastern Orthodoxy; Middle East Council of Churches; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome:

Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

■ Channel Islands

The Channel Islands is the name given an archipelago in the English Channel off the French coast, west of Normandy and north of Brittany. Two islands, Jersey and Guernsey, share the majority of acreage (120 square miles) and people (160,000). The islands have been inhabited since prehistoric times, and they are dotted with the same monoliths that may be found across England and western France.

Christianity was introduced by Saint Marculf in the sixth century. He founded an abbey and was instrumental in having Saint Helier (d. ca. 550) come to the islands. A cave-dwelling hermit, Helier was killed by the Pagan residents of Jersey, among whom he was engaging in evangelical activity. Later Saint Samson and Saint Magloire worked on Jersey, as did Pretexatus, archbishop of Rouen, who settled at the Monastery of St. Helier after a quarrel with the king of the Franks. The monastery appears to have been destroyed in the ninth century when the Normans invaded and took control of the islands, but it was rebuilt in the 12th century.

The islands became dependencies of England in 1066 and remain in a relationship with the United Kingdom. The residents of the islands have their own Constitution. Prior to the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church in the islands was a part of the Diocese of Coutances (France). French Calvinist Protestants came to the islands in the 16th century and in 1564 organized the Presbyterian Church. The Presbyterian Church remained the dominant force in the Channel Islands until displaced by the Anglicans. The Church of England had been organized in Jersey in 1623 and Guernsey in 1663, but during the 19th century grew considerably. Today half the islanders are affiliated with the Church of England, and its parishes have been incorporated into the Diocese of Winchester. Both Guernsey and Jersey have deaneries, and the bishop has delegated some episcopal authority to the deans in their administration of the church.

Methodism arrived in the island in the 18th century, and had a deep influence among the population in the next century. The Methodist Church of the United Kingdom is now the third largest church in the islands.

The remaining population of the islands is found along the spectrum of religions present in the United Kingdom, though given the limited size of the population, the number of individual groups is quite limited. There are congregations of the United Reformed Church, the Greek Orthodox Church, the Elim Pentecostal Church, and the Baptist Union of Great Britain. Among the smaller religious communities, one can find the Church of Christ, Scientist, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the Greater World Chris-

Channel Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	116,000	126,000	84.3	0.03	123,000	112,000
Anglicans	69,200	65,500	43.7	0.22	64,000	59,000
Roman Catholics	20,500	22,500	15.0	0.00	22,000	21,000
Protestants	13,600	9,300	6.2	−0.39	9,200	9,000
Agnostics	5,700	20,800	13.8	1.81	25,000	27,000
Atheists	110	1,700	1.1	0.25	2,100	2,300
Baha'is	200	650	0.4	0.28	1,000	1,600
Hindus	20	150	0.1	0.34	220	370
Muslims	20	150	0.1	0.17	250	400
Jews	50	130	0.1	0.20	200	320
Buddhists	0	10	0.0	0.00	20	40
Total population	122,000	150,000	100.0	0.26	152,000	144,000

tian Spiritualist Church, and the New Church (part of the larger Swedenborgian movement). There is one Jewish synagogue and one Buddhist center, connected with Soka Gakkai International on Guernsey.

Jews were noted on the islands as early as the 1760s, but it was not until the early 19th century that a community emerged. It took the lead in building a synagogue at St. Helier, Jersey, in 1842. The majority of Jews left the islands prior to June 1940, due to the Nazi threat. Among those left, deportations to the death camps began in April 1943. Several dozen were eventually killed, though some survived by being hidden and protected by their neighbors. Those religious Jews that now reside in the islands are members of the Jersey Jewish congregation.

There is a council of churches on both Guernsey and Jersey, and both are associated with the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist Union of Great Britain; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Elim Pentecostal Church; Methodism; Methodist Church; Roman Catholic Church; Soka Gakkai International; Swedenborgian Movement; United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Peddle, S. V. Pagan Channel Islands: Europe's Hidden Heritage. London: Robert Hale, 2007.

Char Dham

The term “Char Dham” (four abodes) refers to two pilgrimage circuits in India. Originally, the term was used to indicate the four temples singled out by the eighth-century reformer/philosopher Shankaracharya—Puri, Rameshwaram, Dwarka, and Badrinath. Puri is located in the state of Orissa on India’s eastern coast and the site of the temple of Lord Jagannath. Rameshwaram, in India’s far south, is home to the Ramanathaswamy Temple. Dwarka, in the western Indian state of Gujarat, is home to the Dwarkadish temple, the core of which is dated to around 500 BCE. Badrinath, the northernmost of the four pilgrimage points, located in the state of Uttarakhand in the Neelkanth Mountains, is the site of the temple of Shri Badrinathji, resting on the banks of the Alaknanda River. Three of the temples are the homes or abodes of Vishnu and Krishna, while one, Rameshwaram, is seen as the residing spot of Shiva.

Shankaracharya was a champion of the monistic form of Hindu thought known as Vedanta and of the monastic life. To perpetuate both, he founded four monasteries (maths) whose location was relatively close to the four pilgrimage sites. The four maths are at Sringeri in Karnataka in the south, Dwarka, Puri, and Jyotirmath in Uttarakhand in the north.

Both the pilgrimage circuit and the four maths were created by Shankaracharya following his own travels throughout the subcontinent preaching the Vedanta doctrine. He saw a need to unify the larger transnational Hindu community and establish a structure that would bring people from different parts of the country to the different pilgrimage points as a tool to that goal.

In Shankaracharya’s thinking, Badrinath served as the culminating point of the pilgrimage circuit and was the most sacred of the four sites. Over the centuries, Badrinath also became the lead point of a second pilgrimage circuit that came to be known as the Chota (or little) Char Dham: Badrinath, Kedarnath, Yamunotri, and Gangotri. The territory that contained the Chota Char Dham sites was until relatively recently quite inaccessible to the general public. Given the difficulty of traveling even to Badrinath, going on the Chota Char Dham was usually left to wandering ascetics, religious professionals, and a few laypeople with the time and resources to devote to the arduous journey.

The accessibility and status of the circuit changed significantly after the 1962 India–China war. During the war, India invested considerable capital in improving transportation into the Himalayas. Inadvertently, the roads also supplied ready access to the Chota Char Dham sites. As the number of pilgrims radically increased (and tourist guides stepped in to facilitate pilgrimages), the Chota Char Dham slowly transformed into the Himalayan Char Dham.

Badrinath and the other Himalayan Char Dham differ in that travel is usually limited from the late spring into the early fall (and highly concentrated in the period between May 15 and July 15, just before the rainy season commences; however, as many as 200,000 may arrive in that relatively brief period.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Kedarnath; Pilgrimage.

References

- Gupta, Subhadra Sen. Badrinath and Kedarnath: The Dhaams in the Himalayas. Calcutta: Rupa & Co., 2002.
- Harshananda, Swami. Hindu Pilgrim Centres. Bangalore: Ramakrishna Math, 2005.
- Malhotra, S. S. L. Pilgrimage: A Journey and a Trek to the Himalayan Shrines of Badrinath, Kedarnath and Hemkund Sahib. London: Trafford Publishing, 2006.
- Saili, Ganesh. Char-Dham: Home of the Gods. New Delhi: Indus, 1996.

Charismatic Movement

During the 1970s, a wave of Pentecostal enthusiasm swept through Christian groups that were not part of the classical Pentecostal tradition. This movement was characterized by the appearance of the gifts of the Spirit, as mentioned in the Bible in chapter 12 of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians (healing, prophecy, discernment, working of miracles, and the rest), including speaking in tongues. Accompanying the revival was a theological critique of various points of Pentecostal doctrine, especially the idea that speaking in tongues was always present when the baptism of the Spirit was received and that it was evidence of the Spirit's presence.

The movement is generally traced to the manifestation of the gifts in the life of a small group of Episcopalians in California in 1959. Included in the group were two pastors, Frank Maguire and Dennis Bennett (1917–1991). On April 3, 1960, Bennett shared what had happened to him with his congregation at the morning services at St. Mark's Episcopal Church in Van Nuys, California. At the close of the third service, he also announced his resignation. The story was later covered by several national newsmagazines, by which time Bennett had moved to a church in Washington State. Meanwhile, in Van Nuys, Jean Stone, a laywoman who had received the baptism of the Holy Spirit, organized the Holy Trinity Society and began sending the Society's periodical to ministers across the country.

Bennett and Stone found immediate support from the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International (FGBMFI), a Pentecostal association founded by California layperson Demos Shakarian (1913–1993) and known for holding prayer luncheons attended by a variety of Christians from different backgrounds. FGBMFI was conceived as an evangelistic organization designed to spread the Pentecostal message. As members and ministers of non-Pentecostal churches began to receive the baptism of the Holy Spirit, the FGBMFI periodical, Voice, became the major instrument for spreading the word.

The Charismatic revival grew slowly through the 1960s, and church leaders in all of the major Protestant denominations became aware that Charismatic fellowships were developing within their congregations. Through the decade a number of national denominationally oriented Charismatic fellowships came into existence. The American Lutheran Church (now an integral part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) became the first body to officially discourage its members and ministers from participating in Charismatic events or promoting Charismatic experiences in the church.

As the Charismatic movement emerged among Protestants, some Roman Catholics, caught up in the spirit of renewal fostered by the changes inaugurated by the Second Vatican Council, also began to experience the gifts of the Spirit. The early recipients of the Spirit had been associated together in the mid-1960s, and in 1967, several of these formed the Word of God Community in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and began holding Days of Renewal Conferences to spread their experience. In 1969 an initial Center for Service and Communion was opened to serve the expanding movement within the Roman Catholic Church. Through the 1970s, the movement spread around the world, assisted immeasurably by the support of Leon-Joseph Cardinal Suenens (1904–1996), archbishop of Malines-Brussels and primate of Belgium.

The mixed reactions in the larger denominations, from open hostility to benign neglect, provided some with hope that their denomination would either become a Charismatic church or at the least welcome Charismatics as a vital element in the membership. Others, however, reacted to real and perceived hostility by leaving their former churches and founding new congregations, most of which eventually became part of new Charismatic denominations. Among the first such proto-denominational fellowships was Christian Growth Ministries, based in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Most of the new denominations, with prominent exceptions, were organized congregationally and opposed any move toward hierarchical structures. As one by one the established denominations increasingly expressed their unhappiness with the movement, a growing number of people affected by the revival left to found new congregations and denominations.

The emergence of the Charismatic movement led necessarily to a theological critique of Pentecostalism, as people in the older churches experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit and attempted to reconcile it with their previous theological perspective. Many Charismatics jettisoned any necessary connection between the experience of the baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues. While allowing for the tongues experience, they suggested that the Spirit could empower people who might manifest various gifts of the Spirit other than tongues. Roman Catholic doctrine taught that all Christians had been baptized by the Spirit, and it thus had to produce new language to talk about the “release” of the Spirit among those who had experienced the empowerment of the Spirit through their involvement in the Catholic Pentecostal prayer groups. These developments took place amid ongoing research by psychologists into the nature of glossolalia (speaking in tongues) and the related phenomenon of xenoglossia (speaking in a language unknown to the speaker).

In the early 1980s, a new emphasis in the movement developed out of the ministry of John Wimber (1934–1997), a teacher at Fuller Theological Seminary in Pasadena, California, and founder of the Vineyard Fellowship. Wimber emerged as a leader as older evangelical denominations were resolving differences with Pentecostals, and attempted to reconcile evangelical theology with Pentecostal experience. In his classes at Fuller, a leading evangelical school, he highlighted the normalcy of miraculous activity (“signs and wonders”) in evangelism. His work influenced many ministers during the decade, and the Vineyard grew into an international denomination.

The Charismatic movement, in both its Protestant and Catholic phases, spread around the world in the 1970s and through the last two decades of the century brought literally millions of believers into Pentecostal and Charismatic churches. In the United States, more than 100 new Charismatic denominations emerged, and the older Pentecostal churches experienced a surge in membership, as several million people were affected by the movement. Two Christian cable television networks helped to encourage a generation of new believers.

The movement also spread across Europe, where it generally met strong opposition from Protestant state churches. In spite of such resistance, a Pentecostal and Charismatic church became the largest non-established religious group in countries such as Sweden, Norway, Finland, and Italy, while making a strong showing in other countries, such as France, the Netherlands, and Spain.

The movement has had its most dramatic effect in Latin America, where new churches developed quickly from initial Charismatic missionary endeavors, and older Pentecostal churches founded in the first half of the century developed heightened growth profiles. In Brazil, five different Charismatic denominations, each with a membership of more than two million members, came to the fore late in the 20th century, including the Assemblies of God of Brazil, the largest Protestant body in the country. A similar dramatic emergence occurred in Guatemala, where approximately 60 percent of the Protestant community is Charismatic/Pentecostal, and like observations could be made about, for example, Chile, Argentina, and Mexico (from where the five-million-member Light of the World Church is spreading in Spanish-speaking communities worldwide).

The Charismatic movement has also spread across sub-Saharan Africa, where a much more complicated picture has arisen. Africa has nurtured literally thousands of independent churches, the majority of which have incorporated elements of Pentecostalism and the Charismatic movement. At the same time, numerous Pentecostal missions have been started by American and European bodies. Although Pentecostalism is an important phenomenon across the land, it is a highly diverse community, and no individual churches have assumed dominant positions in the various countries, as has occurred in South America. Prominent churches would include the Zimbabwe Assemblies of God, the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, the African Israel Church, Nineveh, and the African Independent Pentecostal Church.

The Charismatic movement launched Pentecostalism on a new worldwide growth phase, which continues to the present.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange; African Independent Pentecostal Church; African Israel Church, Nineveh; Assemblies of God in Brazil; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Light of the World Church; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Zimbabwe Assemblies of God Africa.

References

- Bennett, Dennis. Nine O'Clock in the Morning. Plainfield, NJ: Bridge Publishing, 1970.
- Bradfield, Cecil David. Neo-Pentecostalism: A Sociological Assessment. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1979.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Eduard M. Van der Maas, eds. The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.
- Hocken, Peter. The Challenges of the Pentecostal, Charismatic and Messianic Jewish Movements: The Tensions of the Spirit. Farnham, Surrey, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 2009.
- Martin, David. Tongues of Fire: The Explosion of Protestantism in Latin America. Cambridge: Basil Blackwell, 1990.
- O'Connor, Edward. The Pentecostal Movement in the Catholic Church. Notre Dame, IN: Ave Maria Press, 1971.
- Synan, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

Chen Tao

Chen Tao (Chinese: True Way) is a small Taiwanese millennial group that practices a syncretistic belief in Buddhism, Christianity, reincarnation, strict vegetarianism, and divinely driven flying saucers. It has also been variously known as God Saves the Earth Flying Saucer Foundation, God's Salvation Church, and the Right Way. The most prominent leader, Hon-Ming Chen, garnered international media attention when he claimed that God would land a flying saucer on his lawn in Garland, Texas, on March 31, 1998. When his prophecies failed to come true, many people were worried that the Chen Tao adherents would commit mass suicide. Although in hindsight there was little cause for alarm, the local authorities closely monitored the group and strictly policed the neighborhood, putting the freedoms of religion, speech, and the press at odds with that of peaceable assembly.

The Chen Tao faith has its roots in a Taiwanese splinter of Pure Land Buddhism, a school of Ithin Ma-

A member of God's Salvation Church in Garland, Texas, kneels before a shrine in the backyard of the home belonging to Chen Tao church leader Hon-Ming Chen, after God failed to appear as predicted by Hon-Ming. The leader had predicted a television broadcast by God on midnight March 24, 1998. (AFP/Getty Images) hayana Buddhism. The organization began the 1950s under the direction of a woman named Yu-Hsia Chen, who formed the Association for Research on Soul Light. Originally, this Association emphasized better health, spiritual powers, and lessons on karma. In 1995 Hon-Ming Chen (b. 1956), a retired sociology professor, assumed leadership and infused these beliefs and practices with radical prophecies about flying saucers and the end of the world, which was to take place in 1999.

Master Chen's books and broadsides predominantly discuss karma, antediluvian civilizations, eschatology, and the belief that "heavenly devil kings" rule over humanity. He also is reputed to have divinely inspired visions of golden spheres of light. Politically, Chen is an anti-Communist who fears that a nuclear war between China and Taiwan will spark the apocalypse.

Setting Chen Tao far apart from traditional faiths is the belief that the worthiness of a person's soul can be detected using an electronic device that measures his or her spiritual light energy. All but one of the known members of Chen Tao have been citizens of Taiwan. Since no Americans have been invited to join, its evangelical practices may be considered either selective or, at this point, nonexistent.

In 1996 Chen encouraged his followers to sell their belongings and relocate to North America, the only continent that would be spared the doom of an impending nuclear war. Another reason for immigrating to America was to search for the reincarnation of Jesus Christ. Later, Chen also claimed that in a previous life he had fathered Jesus and that two children within the group were, in fact, the reincarnations of Christ and the Buddha. Eventually, the group moved to Garland, Texas, because to them it sounded like "God Land." Once settled there, they called a press conference to announce when the flying saucers would arrive, at which time Master Chen would perform three miracles. He promised he would become invisible, duplicate his body, and simultaneously shake hands with everyone present and be able to speak each person's native language. Furthermore, Chen predicted that God would announce his descent during a worldwide television broadcast on March 25, 1998. This prediction ensured that the media would provide sensational coverage, while allowing Chen sufficient time to revise the March 31 prophecy, which he found necessary to do when God failed to appear on TV. At the time, he said that his predictions should be considered "nonsense," even though God had indeed appeared in the spirit world.

This publicity-seeking backfired when anti-cultists, the media, and local police promoted fears that the cult would commit mass suicide, as the Heaven's Gate adherents had done the previous year in Rancho Santa Fe, California. Although members of both of these marginal faiths believed that flying saucers would transport their bodies to spiritual realms, Chen Taoists conspicuously and continuously wore white clothes, in contrast to the black uniforms of the suicidal Heaven's Gate Away Team. In an effort to blend in with their Texan neighbors, most Chen Taoists wore white cowboy hats. Two or three of the presumed leaders sported traditional Chinese straw hats, which they said resembled flying saucers. Additionally, adherents wore rhinestone rings in emulation of Chen, who claimed he spoke with God via the jewels in his ring.

On March 31, 1998, police officers outfitted themselves with riot gear and blocked off nearby streets. Protesting evangelical preachers, curiosity seekers, and lifelong Garland residents were brusquely informed that only news representatives and immediate neighbors would be allowed to attend the press conference. Chen said (via translator Richard Liu) that his miraculous portents had indeed come true because, unbeknownst to those in attendance, all people were gods who could shake their own hands and greet themselves in their native tongues. He did not address the issues of his becoming invisible or welcoming flying saucers. For the remainder of his nearly three-hour speech, Chen briefly stared directly at the Sun (which he said would not hurt his eyes), surmised that objects such as furniture and televisions would become animated in the near future, and warned that strict vegetarianism was the only way to purify one's soul before the commencement of the Great Tribulation. Finally, when Chen invited nonbelievers to crucify or stone him to death, the Garland police crowded around him protectively.

The next day, about 10 members flew to upstate New York to search for new headquarters. One year after moving to New York, the membership had dwindled to between 30 and 40 faithful adherents. In an online statement dated June 18, 2002, six members declare that Chen Tao is an unorganized religious community. Citing deception and false prophecy as reasons for expulsion, they no longer consider Hon-Ming Chen a member of the True Way. The few remaining faithful adherents appear to have abandoned their belief in flying saucers and returned to the original teachings about karma and spiritual light.

<http://www.geocities.com/grandtrueway/>

Forrest Jackson

See also: Pure Land Buddhism; Reincarnation; Vegetarianism.

References

Chen, Hon-Ming. God's Descending in Clouds (Flying Saucers) on Earth to Save People. Garland, TX: Kingdom of God, 1997.

Chen, Hon-Ming. The Practical Evidence and Study of the World of God and Buddha: God's Salvation and Education. N.p., n.d.

Cook, Ryan J. "News Media and the Religious Use of UFOs: The Case of Chen Tao—True Way." In Encyclopedic Sourcebook of UFO Religions, edited by James R. Lewis. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2003.

Perkins, Rodney, and Forrest Jackson. Cosmic Suicide: The Tragedy and Transcendence of Heaven's Gate. Dallas, TX: Pentaradial Press, 1997.

Cherry Hill Seminary

Founded in 1999, Cherry Hill Seminary provides graduate-level training for contemporary Pagans, including Wiccans, Druids, and others. Its existence has become a major sign of the maturing of the modern Wicca/Pagan community that emerged in the mid-20th century. Its courses, primarily taught online, focus on providing skills in pastoral counseling, public ministry and chaplaincy (for prisons, hospitals, etc.), interfaith relations, and religious leadership and administration—all from a Pagan perspective. Its motto is "Distance education for professional Pagan ministry."

The seminary is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organized in the states of Vermont and South Carolina, its name taken from a site near the Vermont home of its chief founder, Kirk White, who was joined by Cat Chapin-Bishop and Laura Wildman-Hanlon. The seminary is now administered by a board of directors with its business office in Columbia, South Carolina.

By virtue of its South Carolina location, the seminary as a religious institution is exempt from state oversight. Its staff, however, are seeking to meet the same standards for licensure that would be required of a non-religious school. Cherry Hill Seminar is currently in the process of accreditation by the Distance Education and Training Council (DETC), with plans to seek later accreditation from the Association of Theological Schools, a largely Christian-focused body.

The seminar currently offers a certificate in professional development and a certificate of continuing education. In addition, Cherry Hill will be offering a master's degree beginning in the 2009–2010 academic year.

Cherry Hill Seminary
PO Box 5405
Columbia, SC 29250
<http://www.cherryhillseminary.org>

Chas S. Clifton

See also: Goddess Spirituality; Wiccan Religion; Witchcraft.

References

Harrow, Judy. Spiritual Mentoring: A Pagan Guide. Toronto: ECW Press, 2002.

Starhawk, and Nightmare, M. Macha. The Pagan Book of Living and Dying: Practical Rituals, Prayers, Blessings, and Meditations on Crossing Over. New York: HarperOne, 1997.

Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim

In 1925 in Yorubaland the first Aladura church started with the Eternal Sacred Order of Cherubim and Seraphim (C&S) Society founded by an Anglican, Moses Orimolade Tunolashe (d. 1933), and the 15-year-old young woman Abiodun Akinsowon, later called Captain Abiodun, also an Anglican. Orimolade began preaching in about 1915 after partially recovering from a long illness. Crowds came to him for prayers for healing during the influenza epidemic of 1918. He was called upon to pray for Abiodun to awaken from a trance, after which she related her visions of heaven, out-of-body experiences, and instructions to use special prayers and holy water for healing.

The movement began as a prayer group within the Anglican Church, but withdrew from it because of heavy criticism by Anglican priests. Orimolade and Abiodun associated for a time with African American missionary Daniel Coker (ca. 1780–ca. 1846) and the United Native African Church in Lagos, where they were given the name "Seraph," to which "Cherub" was later added, after a revelation that these two words should go together. The members of this prayer movement claimed a special relationship with angels, whom they represented on Earth. Abiodun and Orimolade took the revival to other parts of Yorubaland on extended missionary journeys, and they challenged witchcraft openly. This brought them into considerable conflict with both traditional and colonial authorities. The two leaders parted company in 1929, and Abiodun founded the Cherubim and Seraphim Society, the first of several schisms in this movement. This was followed in rapid succession by the Redemption Band of C&S, the Praying Band of the C&S under Ezekiel Davies in 1930, and the Holy Flock of Christ Church in 1932 under Major A. B. Lawrence. Orimolade died in 1933, after which Abiodun made an unsuccessful attempt to reunify the C&S movement, but by 1935 there were six independent C&S churches. Orimolade's emphases caused him to be known as Baba Aladura (praying father)—a title used by subsequent leaders of his church.

At this time, the influential daughter of a chief, prophetess Christianah Olatunrinle, known as Mama Ondo, became Iya Alakoso (mother superintendent) of the Western Conference of the C&S, a separate conference set up to protest against the increasing secessions. She was responsible for guiding the movement in the direction of Pentecostalism until her death in 1941. Her presence in the C&S leadership was evidence of the powerful influence of women in the Aladura movement—although she was denied the title of chairperson.

In 1943, another schism took place in Ilaje, where C&S members began to condemn the traditional practice of twin killing, resulting in the Holy Apostles Community at Aiyetoro (Happy City). There, starting in 1947, an internationally renowned and thriving commercial commune was developed, particularly known for its fishing and transportation industries, with community of ownership under its first oba, Ethiopian Ojagbohun Peter. After the third oba introduced private property to the community in 1968, members began to leave, and the community gradually disintegrated.

The various C&S groups came together in 1965 to form what became the National Council of Cherubim and Seraphim. By 1996, all but 4 of 52 C&S groups had reunited in the Eternal Sacred Order of the C&S, under the Baba Aladura, Dr. G. I. M. Otubu. The C&S movement continues to be very influential in Nigerian society, with schools and other community projects under its care.

Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim
PO Box 577
Lagos
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Aladura Churches; Pentecostalism.

References

- Authority, S. O. A. “Aiyetoro”: The Happy City. Lagos, Nigeria: Eruobodo Memorial Press, 1966.
- Omoyajowo, Akin. The Cherubim and Seraphim Church in Relation to Church, Society and State. Ibadan, Nigeria: Claverianum Press, 1975.
- Peel, J. D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Chi

See Energy.

Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia

The Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia (Orthodox Church in Italy) was formed as an alternative to the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of Italy, the older Greek Orthodox body in communion with the Church of Greece and the Ecumenical Patriarchate. It began as an outpost of the True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece, also known as the Holy Synod in Resistance, then under the leadership of Archbishop Cyprian. Archbishop Cyprian's church had left the Church of Greece because of its adoption of the revised Julian calendar.

Leading the Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia was its founder, Antonio (de Rosso), a former Roman Catholic priest, who served as the bishop of Aprilia and Latium. Following his consecration, Bishop Antonio attempted to unite many of the independent Orthodox churches operating in Italy, but with little success. He also concluded that he agreed with the Church of Greece on the issue of calendar reform, and adopted the revised Julian calendar that brings Eastern Orthodoxy in line with the calendar of the Western church, without adopting the Gregorian calendar. He broke with the Old Calendrists and in 1993 aligned with the dissenting Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church.

In 1995, the Bulgarian bishops participated in Bishop Antonio's enthronement as bishop of Ravenna and Italy. He was later elevated as metropolitan of Ravenna and Italy, and became a formal member of the Holy Synod of the Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church.

The Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia is in full communion with the Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church, the Ukrainian Orthodox Church—Kiev Patriarchate, and the Montenegrin Orthodox Church. In 2009, Metropolitan Antonio died and was succeeded by his former vicar Metropolitan Basilio Grillo Miceli.

Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia
Via Maiella n°2—Vigna di Valle
00062 Bracciano
Italy
<http://www.chiesaortodossa.it/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church; Calendars, Religious; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Montenegrin Orthodox Church; Roman Catholic Church; True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece.

Reference

Introvigne, Massimo, and Pier Luigi Zoccatelli, eds.
Le Religio in Italia. Torino, Italy: Elledice, 2006.

Children of God

See The Family International.

■ Chile

Chile is a long, narrow country that extends along the southwestern edge of the South American continent.

Chile is approximately 2,500 miles long, while the width varies between 100 and 185 miles. Ascent from the Pacific shore to the eastern mountain crests is, therefore, very abrupt, with the highest mountain peaks rising to more than 22,000 feet in the Andes, which also span the length of the country from north to south. The surface of the country, including its main islands, is calculated at about 290,000 square miles. Although Santiago is the capital, legislative bodies meet in nearby Valparaíso, the country's largest seaport.

The country has a population of 16.6 million (2009 estimate, compared to 11.2 million reported in 2002). Chilean ethnic groups have been defined thusly: white (European) and mixed combined, 95.4 percent; indigenous Mapuche, 4 percent; other indigenous groups, 0.6 percent (total indigenous 4.6 percent, 2002 census). An estimated 52.7 percent are white European, with mestizos estimated at 44 percent.

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and other laws and policies contribute to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors.

According to the 2002 National Census of Population and Housing, 70 percent of the population (over 14 years of age) identified as Roman Catholic and 15.14 percent as evangelical. In the census, the term “evangelical” referred to all non-Catholic Christian churches with the exception of the Orthodox Church (Greek, Persian, Serbian, Ukrainian, and Armenian), the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons), the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and Jehovah's Witnesses.

Of those surveyed in the 2002 census, all those affiliated with “other religions” totaled 493,147 persons, or 4.4 percent of the total population; atheists, those “indifferent” regarding religion and those classified as “none/no response” constituted approximately 8.3 percent (931,990).

It was not until 1540 that a permanent Spanish conquest of Chile began, led by Pedro de Valdivia (ca. 1502–1553), who was more successful than his predecessors. He founded Santiago de Chile in 1541 with the name Santiago del Nuevo Extremo, as homage to the Apostle St. James and to the province of Extremadura, Valdivia's birth place in Spain. Valdivia founded at least seven Spanish settlements, including Serena, Concepción, Angol, and Imperial. However, a prolonged and fierce war followed between indigenous warriors and Spanish forces, which lasted, with short interruptions, for more than two centuries. It was finally brought to a close only after 1773 by a peace treaty in which the Araucanians negotiated with the Spanish as an independent and foreign power.

Roman Catholic church in San Pedro de Atacama, in northern Chile. Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion in Chile. (Jose Luis Stephens/StockphotoPro)

Spain was unable to take care of its Chilean colonies in the first decade of the 19th century during the struggle for independence by rebellious criollos (Chilean-born of Spanish heritage). An independent provisional government was installed in Chile in 1810 but was soon attacked by Spanish Loyalist forces from Peru. The Chileans had to resort to arms, but its army, led by General Bernardo O'Higgins (1778–1842) (a self-declared Freemason, as were many of the liberators), was defeated at Rancagua in 1814. Spanish authority was restored for a while, but in 1817, the Argentine and Chilean independence armies, led by O'Higgins and José de San Martín (1778–1850), decisively defeated the Spanish. The independence of Chile was formally declared in 1818, and formally recognized by Spain in 1846.

O'Higgins's popularity as supreme director declined quickly, as the Conservative and Catholic leadership of Chile opposed his many innovations. The Catholic clergy deplored his interference with ecclesiastical authority: his insistence upon the government's right of patronage over church appointments; his demand for tolerance of religious dissenters (non-Catholics); and his opening of a cemetery for foreigners and non-Catholics. The Conservatives feared his cultural innovations, which included the establishment of the National Institute, the enlargement of the National Library, the founding of public primary schools, the invitation to teachers of the Lancastrian system of education in England to establish schools in Chile without the interference of Catholic authorities, the importation of books without church censorship, and the right of freedom of speech and of the press. O'Higgins encouraged the establishment of uncensored newspapers.

The 19th century was marked by confrontations between two ideologies: the Conservatives, on the one hand, regarded themselves as the guardians of monarchical order and authority while the Liberals, on the other hand, were inspired by the Enlightenment, the American and French revolutions, and British parliamentary ideals. The Liberals favored limitations upon the church (while remaining good Catholics), and dreamed of land reform and social progress for the majority of citizens. The Conservatives and Liberals fought a series of civil wars in 1830, 1839, 1851, 1859, and 1891. The Chilean Civil War of 1891 was an armed conflict between forces supporting congressional authority and forces supporting the executive authority led by the sitting president, José Manuel Balmaceda (1842–1891). This conflict ended with the defeat of Balmaceda's Liberal forces, followed by his tragic suicide in the Presidential Palace. The defeat of the Liberal forces opened a so-called pseudo-parliamentary period in Chilean history, which lasted from 1891 to 1925.

The Chilean government was led by various political factions during the authoritarian era of the first Republic of Chile (1826–1932) and the second Republic of Chile (1932–present). In 1970, a coalition of Socialists, Communists, Radicals, and some dissident Christian Democrats had backed the presidential candidacy of Dr. Salvador Allende Gossens (1908–1973). After barely winning the election, Allende began to restructure Chilean society along Socialist lines while retaining the democratic form of government and respecting civil liberties and the due process of law. With active support from the U.S. government's Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), however, in 1973 a group of military officers staged a coup d'état under the leadership of right-wing General Augusto José Ramón Pinochet Ugarte (1915–2006). Allende died during the coup.

Pinochet imposed a repressive military dictatorship that lasted until March 1990. According to the 1993 Rettig Report, more than 3,200 people were killed during the 1970s and 1980s; in addition, according to the 2004 Valech Report, at least 80,000 were incarcerated without trials and 30,000 were subjected to torture. Another 200,000 people went into exile as political refugees. Pinochet was finally forced out of power in March 1990, and a new democratic government took charge. Pinochet continued to serve as commander-in-chief of the Chilean army until 1998, when he retired and became a senator-for-life. Later, as his crimes began to catch up to him, he fled into exile. He died in exile fighting extradition back to Chile.

Today, Chile is a rapidly developing country with a large, educated middle class and a robust free market economy. The decline of Chilean economy for three decades was reversed during the 1990s and early 2000s. According to recent data on income distribution, 6.2 percent of the Chilean population composes the upper economic stratum; 15 percent the upper-middle stratum; 21 percent the lower-middle; 38 percent the upper-lower stratum; and 20 percent the lower-lower stratum.

Roman Catholic Church Catholicism arrived in 1541 and thereafter with the Spanish conquerors, colonists, and missionary priests. The Diocese of Chile was established in 1561 in Santiago de Chile, and was administered under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Lima (Peru). The first Catholic seminary was opened in 1584. In 1768, the Jesuits, who had begun missionary work among the Araucanians during the latter part of the 16th century, were expelled by an edict signed by King Charles III of Spain in 1767; and they were not allowed to return until 1843. After their departure, many of the Jesuit-administered Indian mission villages were turned over to other religious orders or to civil authorities.

The Conservative oligarchy that governed Chile between 1830 and 1861 was Roman Catholic, and Catholicism was made the official state religion. However, the newly independent government decided to confiscate church property, including most monasteries of religious orders; abolish the payment of tithes to the church by the state; and fix a salary for the clergy.

Between 1861 and 1891, Chilean society suffered great confusion. In 1865, the Liberal government granted non-Catholics the freedom to worship as they pleased without public display (no church steeples or bells, for example) and the freedom to operate their own schools, and a few cemeteries were established for non-Catholics. In 1878, growing criticism of the government by Catholic authorities led to a generation of strained relationships between church and state. In 1883, ecclesiastical tribunals were placed under lay supervision, and in 1884 civil marriage was introduced, which is still the only form approved by law.

In 1910, the Archdiocese of Santiago administered the Chilean Catholic Church, which had jurisdiction over the dioceses of Concepción, San Carlos de Ancud (Chiloe), and Serena, and the vicariates apostolic of Tarapacá and Antofagasta. In southern Chile the Indian missions were supervised by the Franciscan Recollects, the Capuchins, and the Salesians. The church operated numerous private schools and colleges throughout the land, under the administration of religious congregations, but even in the public schools Catholic religious instruction was compulsory.

Following the military coup of 1925, former President Arturo Fortunato Alessandri Palma (1868–1950) was restored to the presidential office under the Liberal Alliance. The Liberal government decreed the separation of church and state, which had the effect of granting religious freedom to other religious communities—most notably the Protestant groups. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church has continued to receive considerable subsidies for its educational and other charitable work.

Between 1925 and 1960, the relationship between church and state was strong under Conservative administrations and tense under Liberal ones. During this period, the nation was plagued by authoritarian governments of the right and left that were often intolerant of opposing views and that resorted to strong-arm tactics to retain power. Diverse tensions arose within the Chilean Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s). Reformers generally supported the church's modern, post-Second Vatican Council stance. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Chilean society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the Pinochet dictatorship and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) in Chile began in Santiago in 1972, during a spiritual retreat that took place at the Casa de Ejercicios de las Rosas on February 1–5. The leadership team at the retreat was composed of three Dominican priests—Fathers Francis McNutt (b. 1925), James Burke, and Patrick Rearden—and a Dominican nun, Sister Ana Félix, accompanied by a Methodist pastor from the United States. The CCR currently exists in more than 700 communities, from Arica in the north to Punta Arenas in the south.

During the 1970s, the Catholic Church risked its position by attempting to negotiate an end to the despotic Pinochet dictatorship; and, although its efforts failed, it emerged as a vocal critic of the government's dismal human rights record. However, some priests sympathetic to Allende's Socialist agenda were more vocal and assumed an activist role in defying the civil authorities. Many of them suffered the cruel consequences of being detained, beaten, tortured and “disappeared” by the secret police.

In 2004, the Chilean Catholic Church reported 27 dioceses with 951 parishes, which were served by a total of 2,201 priests (1,113 diocesan and 1,088 religious priests), who were assisted by 568 permanent deacons, 1,735 male religious workers, and 5,735 female religious workers. The church was divided administratively into 4 archdioceses (Antofagasta, La Serena, Puerto Montt, and Santiago de Chile), 18 dioceses, 2 territorial prelatures (Calama and Illapel), one vicariate apostolic (Aysén), and one military ordinariate. The current archbishop, Cardinal Francisco Javier Errázuriz Ossa, was appointed in 1998 as archbishop and in 2001 as cardinal.

The great majority of Chileans still consider themselves Roman Catholics, but the number of Catholic adherents declined from 76.7 percent of the national population in 1992 to 70 percent in 2002, according to census data. However, research conducted by the daily La Tercera in 2003 revealed that in 48 Chilean cities with the largest proportion of people living in poverty, Catholic adherents declined from 74.8 percent in 1992 to 67.7 percent in 2002. This indicates that the lower classes have lost faith in traditional religion and have opted to look elsewhere for answers to their multifaceted needs; some have opted to attend and become members of evangelical churches, while others have been attracted to the Christian sects or to new religious movements, or to no religion at all, which helps explain the growth of these alternative religious movements and of the population segment that now declares itself to have no religion at all.

The Protestant Movement In June 1821, the Scotsman James Thompson (1778–1854), a representative of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) and of the Lancastrian School Society, came to Chile at the request of the Supreme Director Bernardo O’Higgins (r. 1818–1823), who asked Thompson to promote popular education in Chile independently of the Roman Catholic Church, based on the Lancastrian system of mutual instruction. Thompson urged the government to invite foreign traders and agriculturalists to come to Chile to promote the economic development of the new republic.

However, Catholic authorities and their Conservative allies in government strongly objected to Thompson’s activities. The clerical party was opposed to the establishment of schools by non-Roman Catholics, arguing that such innovations would “destroy the cultural unity of the nation.” Furthermore, the ecclesiastic commission that investigated Thompson’s activities stated: “It would not be prudent to receive these de- vouring vipers who are not Roman Catholics into the bosom of the State, which desires to conserve pure, clean and inviolable the religion which it confesses” (Paul 1973, 53).

Thompson had taken with him to Chile 60 copies of the New Testament in Spanish, which he began to freely distribute. However, the Catholic authorities immediately challenged his right to import and distribute “Protestant” Bibles in the country, which were subject to clerical control at that time. Discouraged, Thompson left Chile after less than a year and traveled north to Peru and Colombia, where he was warmly welcomed by Liberal government leaders and where he achieved greater success in establishing the Lancastrian system of education and distributing the scriptures.

The Anglicans first held chapel services in English among foreign immigrants in the hilly port city of Valparaíso in 1825, led by Anglican laymen and chaplains from visiting British vessels. That year, the English and German immigrants in Valparaíso received permission from the civil authorities to build the first Protestant cemetery in Chile. In 1837, Anglican chaplain John Rowlandson arrived in Valparaíso as a private tutor and began English-speaking worship services in his own house. These services were continued, but it was not until 1858 that the Anglicans received permission to build the small St. Peter’s Church in Valparaíso, financed by the British government, which is still in existence.

In 1860, Allen W. Gardiner Jr. arrived in Chile. He was the son of Captain Allen Gardiner (1794–1851) of the Royal British Navy, who died in Tierra del Fuego in 1851 while serving as a pioneer Anglican missionary in the evangelization of the Amerindians under the sponsorship of the Patagonian Mission Society. The younger Gardiner came with the intention of continuing his father’s work of evangelizing the Araucanian Indians in the southern region, but because hostilities between the Indians and the Chilean army prevented him access, he accepted a chaplaincy for a small English colony in the coal mining town of Lota in Concepción province. His example encouraged the South American Missionary Society (SAMS) of the Church of England to establish chaplaincies in other South American locations. Later, SAMS sponsored missionary work among the Araucanian (Mapuche) Indians near Temuco, under Canadian clergyman Charles A. Sadleir, beginning in 1895.

It was not until December 1845 that New England Congregationalist missionary David Trumbull (1819–1889), after his graduation from Princeton Seminary, took up permanent residence in Valparaíso, under the joint sponsorship of the American Bible Society (established in 1816), the Foreign Evangelical Society (founded in 1839, later the American and Foreign Christian Union), and the American Seaman’s Friend Society (founded in 1826). At first, David served as a Protestant chaplain, charged with the task of ministering to the spiritual and material needs of English-speaking seamen aboard ships docked in the harbor of Valparaíso, located about 75 miles from Santiago. Following independence from Spain in 1818, Valparaíso (founded in 1536) became the main harbor for the nascent Chilean navy and was opened to international trade, which had been limited to commerce with Spain and its other colonies. Many foreign shipping companies quickly established commercial houses in Valparaíso, which were staffed by agents from their respective countries.

In the beginning of his ministry in Valparaíso, Trumbull was restricted to holding religious services on board vessels in the harbor but later, after having won the confidence and support of the local community and obtaining permission from the civil authorities, he built the Sailor’s Home and Bethel Chapel on shore. Soon he became engaged in encouraging the sick and the lonely in the American and British hospitals, and in visiting the foreign delinquents in the city’s prison. However, Trumbull’s goal was the establishment of the Reformed Church (in the tradition of the New England Reformed-Presbyterian-Congregationalist tradition), first in Valparaíso, then in strategic locations throughout Chile. After celebrating English-speaking worship services in private homes in Valparaíso for several years, Trumbull, along with an Anglican chaplain, helped organize Union Church in 1847, which was not permitted to build its own chapel until 1855. Until his death in 1889, Trumbull remained as pastor of Union Church in Valparaíso.

In 1862 another Congregational missionary, Nathaniel P. Gilbert, arrived in Santiago and organized another Union Church for all English-speaking residents in the capital. Gilbert was sponsored by the Foreign Evangelical Society, as was Trumbull. Finally, Trumbull, Gilbert, and their Chilean colleagues received permission from the civil authorities in 1865 to build the first Protestant church building in Santiago. To this end, Trumbull appealed to the American and Foreign Christian Union (previously known as the Foreign Evangelical Society) for reinforcements in the development of the Spanish-speaking work. Alexander M. Merwin and Sylvanus Sayre arrived in 1866, which facilitated the completion and dedication of the first Protestant church building in Santiago on September 20, 1868.

In November 1871, José Manuel Ibañez was ordained as the first Chilean Protestant pastor; in fact, he was the only native Spanish-speaking Protestant minister in all of South America (Paul 1973, 63). During this period mission stations were established at San Felipe, a village located 90 miles north of Valparaíso, and in 1869 at Talca, located south of Santiago in the central valley, in the fertile vineyard district.

The first Lutherans to work in Chile arrived in 1846 and founded a German-speaking organization largely limited to the expatriate community. After the German Revolution of 1848, the Chilean government offered Liberal German immigrants the opportunity to settle in the southern region, where large-scale immigration began after 1850. Many of the German immigrants were educated and had financial resources, which facilitated their settlement in Valdivia, Puerto Montt, and Santiago, while German farmers settled in what is now the Province of Llanquihue. The second wave of German immigrants arrived after 1870 and occupied frontier areas in southern Chile in the proximity of the territories of the Araucanos and Temucos near the Río Bió-Bío. This is where the most important colonies of German Lutherans were established.

After the arrival of German Lutheran pastor Oscar Fiedler, a congregation was organized in Valparaíso in 1867 but later ceased to exist. In 1886, a German Lutheran congregation was organized in Santiago under the leadership of R. A. Philippi, who later helped to reestablish the Lutheran congregation in Valparaíso, in 1889. After several failed attempts, the German Lutherans were able to organize the Deutsche Evangelische Chile-Synode in 1906.

Chile

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	8,867,000	15,010,000	87.6	1.06	16,569,000	17,176,000
Roman Catholics	7,794,000	12,000,000	70.0	−0.25	13,000,000	13,500,000
Independents	1,407,000	4,000,000	23.3	2.10	5,000,000	5,500,000
Marginals	40,700	735,000	4.3	1.15	950,000	1,060,000
Agnostics	321,000	1,300,000	7.6	1.86	1,800,000	2,400,000
Atheists	240,000	415,000	2.4	1.12	500,000	650,000
Ethnoreligionists	100,000	270,000	1.6	1.12	230,000	220,000
Muslims	2,000	76,000	0.4	1.12	100,000	120,000
Baha'is	7,800	28,000	0.2	1.12	25,000	36,000
Jews	30,000	20,800	0.1	1.12	25,000	26,000
Buddhists	500	6,200	0.0	1.12	7,500	11,000
New religionists	1,200	7,300	0.0	1.12	9,000	15,000
Chinese folk	0	400	0.0	1.12	500	800
Total population	9,570,000	17,134,000	100.0	1.12	19,266,000	20,655,000

The earlier work by Congregational missionaries became the foundation upon which missionaries of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) built their ministries. After the U.S. Civil War (1861–1865), the American and Foreign Christian Union ran into financial difficulties because many of its supporters began channeling their contributions through denominational mission agencies. Trumbull and his colleagues heartedly agreed with the proposal that their work in Chile be handed over to the Presbyterian Board of Missions, which took place officially in early 1873 when Trumbull himself became affiliated with the Presbyterian Board. His identification with the Chileans reached its logical conclusion in 1886 when he became a naturalized Chilean citizen. When he died in 1889, the Chilean Congress suspended its session out of respect for this respected Christian worker.

In 1873, the Reverend and Mrs. Robert McLean arrived from the United States and were assigned to the Presbyterian mission station in San Felipe. At the request of Trumbull, the Presbyterian Board, in 1878, sent Eneas McLean, Robert's brother, to Chile as well, and he was assigned to work in Concepción, the third largest city in the nation at that time, where a Presbyterian church was organized in 1880. These established churches later formed the Iglesia Presbiteriana de Chile (IPC), which was under the jurisdiction of the Synod of New York of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. The IPC became an independent and completely self-supporting denomination in 1964. In 1944, a group of young Fundamentalist Chilean pastors deserted the IPC and established the Iglesia Presbiteriana Nacional (IPN), which later experienced its own division with the formation of the Iglesia Presbiteriana Nacional Fundamentalista (IPNF) in 1960. The IPNF aligned itself with Carl McIntire's fundamentalist International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC), while the IPN became affiliated with the Presbyterian Church in America (PCA). In the 1980s, the PCA decided to establish its own church body in Chile under the name Iglesia Presbiteriana en América en Chile (IPAC).

The beginning of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) can be traced to schools established by William Taylor (1821–1902) in Bolivia and Chile during 1877–1878 as part of a self-supporting missionary enterprise, which was not officially endorsed or supported by his denomination. Between 1883 and 1888, Taylor and his colleagues began to develop church work among the Spanish-speaking population, despite great resistance from clerical authorities. The establishment and development of Methodist churches in Chile experienced slow growth between 1886 and 1893, but good progress was made in recruiting and training national pastors and workers. Between 1893 and 1897, Methodist work in Chile more than doubled in size, and this trend continued during the period 1897–1903, as well as from 1903 to 1907. Methodist growth in Chile between 1883 and 1907 was much more rapid than the Presbyterian work, which can be explained in part by the fact that Methodist methods of self-support tended to minimize the danger of nationalism and encouraged the development of lay ministry.

However, in 1910, the Methodist Church of Chile experienced a schism that both stopped its growth and gave a unique cast to Chilean Protestantism. Chile became one of the first places in South America where news of the Pentecostal revival at the Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa Street in Los Angeles, California, in 1906 found a response. That response was among the Methodists, led by the Reverend Willis C. Hoover (1856–1936) in Valparaiso. By 1910, the majority of Methodists in Chile had opened themselves to the Pentecostal experience and that year left the Methodist Episcopal Church to establish the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile, which maintained many of the ecclesiastical forms of Methodism.

From this beginning, Pentecostalism gained a relatively early position of strength in the country due to its rapid membership growth and its geographical expansion, led by the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile that became the parent body of a dozen or more other Pentecostal denominations between 1913 and 1950, such as the Church of the Lord (1913), the Evangelical Church of the Brethren (1925), the Evangelical Pentecostal Church (1933), the Evangelical Corporation of Vitacura (1933), the Pentecostal Church of Southern Chile (1933), the Christian Evangelical Church (1936), the Evangelical Army of Chile (1937), the Apostolic Pentecostal Church (1938), and the Pentecostal Christian Church (1938). In turn, many of these daughter church bodies experienced their own divisions, which led to the formation of more Pentecostal denominations, especially between 1934 and 1956. For example, divisions within the Evangelical Pentecostal Church (founded in 1933) produced the following new denominations: the Christian Church of the Apostolic Faith (1934), the Christian Church Won with His Blood (1941), the Pentecostal Church of God (1951), the Pentecostal Mission Church (1952), and the Evangelical Pentecostal Corporation (1956).

The favorable climate for Pentecostalism in Chile, mainly among the oppressed lower classes as a “refuge for the masses” in an authoritarian society according to Swiss sociologist Christian Lalive d’Epinay (1969), also led various European and American Pentecostal groups to begin work in Chile. These include the Swedish Pentecostals (1938), International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (1940), Assemblies of God Foreign Missions (1941), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1954), United Pentecostal Church International (1964), and Church of God of Prophecy (1975). However, serious disagreements over doctrine and church polity prevented cooperation between the later groups and most of the national Pentecostal denominations. Consequently, the later Pentecostal denominations (foreign-based) have not experienced as much church growth as the national church bodies that are more in tune with Chilean cultural idiosyncrasies.

Before Pentecostalism began to dominate the Protestant and Free church community in Chile, the first Baptist missionaries had arrived and began working among German immigrants in Victoria, near Temuco. The first Baptist church was established in this community in 1892. Between 1894 and 1897, a religious revival occurred with the German settlement, where worship services were held in German and Spanish. The Chilean Baptist Convention was formed in 1908; this denomination aligned itself with the Southern Baptist Convention in 1917, but has not been as successful as have Baptist denominations elsewhere in South America.

Historically, prior to 1900, 14 Protestant denominations and service agencies began work in Chile. Between 1900 and 1940, another 18 denominations and service agencies entered the country, or arose independently under national leaders, some by division from other church bodies. During the 1950s, 9 new organizations were established; during the 1960s, only 4; during the 1970s, 4 more; during the 1980s, 8; and during the 1990s, 10. In summary, during the period 1950 to 2000, a total of 35 new denominations and service agencies were established.

In 2002, about 90 percent of Chilean Evangelicals identified themselves as Pentecostal in the national census, while the remaining 10 percent were affiliated with Wesleyan, Lutheran, Reformed-Presbyterian, Anglican, Methodist, and independent Free churches.

Previously, the Lausanne Chile Country Committee, in preparation for the II Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization, held in Manila in July 1989, reported on the relative size of the largest Protestant denominations and independent church associations, based on their estimated number of adherents in mid-1989: the Pentecostal Methodist Church (700,000), the Pentecostal Church of Chile (400,000), the Baptist Convention of Chile (100,000), the Pentecostal Church of God (100,000), the Pentecostal Evangelical Church (50,000), the Pentecostal Apostolic Church (30,000), the Methodist Church of Chile (25,000), the Christian and Missionary Alliance (20,000), Church of the Lord Corporation (18,000), the Assemblies of God in Chile (15,000), the Evangelical Army of Chile (15,000), the Trinity Pentecostal Church (15,000), the Presbyterian Church of Chile (15,000), the Corporation Vitacura (12,000), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (10,000), the Autonomous Assemblies of God (10,000), and the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (10,000). All other denominations had less than 10,000 adherents, according to this report. Thirteen of the 17 denominations listed above are Pentecostal.

During and after the Pinochet dictatorship, many evangelical leaders began to express their misgivings regarding “endorsing” any political leader, while at the same time realizing that the growing evangelical movement had more political clout in the ballot box than previously. Some Chilean evangelical leaders were inspired by the holistic message of the Lausanne Covenant while attending international conferences sponsored by the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization during the 1970s and 1980s. After the founding of the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA) in Panama in April 1982, this interdenominational fellowship of conservative leaders offered similar inspiration and motivation for the pursuit of common endeavors among evangelicals in Chile and throughout Latin America.

Although the Evangelical Council of Chile (CEC) was established in 1941, it was not until 1988 that the Corporation of Interdenominational Pastors (CIP) was formed, followed by the Council of Pastoral Entities of the Metropolitan Region (CUPREM); and the Committee of Evangelical Organizations (COE), which was led by Bishop Francisco Anabalón in 2003.

At the same time, there was a growing consciousness among leaders of mainline Protestant denominations and some Free church bodies regarding the need to take a stronger stand in behalf of human rights and social justice issues, which had been trampled on during the Pinochet dictatorship. Therefore, some Chilean denominational leaders and local pastors began to participate in activities sponsored by the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC).

Other Christians The Ecumenical Fellowship of Chile (CEC), founded in 1973, includes the following members: Evangelical Lutheran Church, Methodist Church of Chile, Pentecostal Mission Church, Anglican Church, Baptist Union, Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East (through which are also represented the Russian Orthodox Church [Moscow Patriarchate] and the Greek Orthodox affiliated with the Ecumenical Patriarchate), Reformed Church, Roman Catholic Church, Universal Apostolic Mission Church; and the Wesleyan Church. The CEC is also associated with the WCC.

In 2002, the national census recorded 6,959 “Orthodox Christians” (Greeks, Persians, Serbians, Ukrainians, and Armenians) in Chile. Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions include the Armenian Orthodox Church; the Greek Orthodox Church; the Orthodox Church, Patriarchate of Antioch, led by Archbishop Sergio Abad; the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); and the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad (ROCA), Diocese of South America and Buenos Aires, led by Archimandrite Benjamin Wasniuk in Chile. The First Hierarchy of the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia is Metropolitan Vladyka Laurus, who resides in New York City.

In addition, there are several Roman Catholic-derived churches in Chile that are independent of the Holy See in Rome and that have established some type of relationship with Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions that claim “Apostolic succession.” During the 1980s, Juan Ignacio Cariaga y Cariaga founded the Holy Apostolic Catholic Church of Chile. René Parra Somorrostro was ordained a priest by bishops who were consecrated by Monsignor Carlos Duarte Costa of Brazil, and he was later consecrated a bishop and named bishop of Concepción and Araucanía, Chile, by Bishop Cariaga y Cariaga. From 1984 to 1989, Somorrostro was bishop of the Apostolic Episcopal Church of Chile. Since early 1989 he has been a bishop of the Orthodox Catholic Church of Chile, which is affiliated with the Igreja Católica Apostólica Brasileira, founded by Bishop Duarte Costa in 1945. Celso Mario Rosales y Fernes was ordained a priest and later consecrated a bishop in 1984 by Bishop Cariaga y Cariaga, assisted by Bishop Somorrostro, and named bishop of Valparaíso.

There are several non-Protestant marginal Christian groups that have been established in Chile: the Jehovah's Witnesses (810 churches with 71,715 members in 2008; the 2002 census reported 119,455 adherents); the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (one temple, 74 stakes and 24 districts with 103,735 adherents in 2002); the Philadelphia Church of God; the Church of Christ, Scientist; Israelites of the New Universal Covenant (Andean region); the Light of the World Church (from Mexico); the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (Brazil); the God Is Love Pentecostal Church (Brazil); and Unity School of Christianity.

Additional Groups There are a wide variety of non-Christian religious groups in Chile. The small Jewish community in Chile is centered in Santiago and includes Hungarian, German, and Sephardic elements. Though suffering losses from immigration to Israel in recent years, it still includes an estimated 15,000 Jewish residents. The community has its focus in the Comité Representativo de las Entidades Judías de Chile, headquartered in Santiago. There is a program of Jewish Studies at the University of Chile in Santiago. Jewish communities are located in Santiago, Valparaíso, Viña del Mar, Valdivia, Temuco, Concepción, La Serena, and Iquique (although there is no synagogue in Iquique).

The 2002 census reported a total Muslim population of 2,894. Many of those are Chileans who, as a result of their conversion to Islam, have even changed their names. The first known Islamic institution was the Society of Muslim Union of Chile (Sociedad Unión Musulmana), founded in 1926, which was followed by the Society of Mutual Aids and Islamic Charity in 1927. Today, mosques are located in Santiago, Iquique, and Coquimbo. Also, the Subud Association is present.

The Baha'i Faith community was founded in 1940 after the arrival of Baha'i pioneers from the United States, who made converts among Chileans and established an independent national spiritual community in 1963. In 2002, this community was picked for the establishment of the first Baha'i Temple of South America, which the community is still seeking to establish. Although Baha'i adherents were not mentioned in the 2002 census, Baha'i officials estimated that their community numbered about 6,000.

Buddhism not only exists among Chinese immigrants, but also among Chileans who are affiliated with one of the following organizations: the International Zen Association, Soka Gakkai International, Drikung Kagyu Ling Meditation Center, and the Valparaíso Buddhist Meditation Center.

The following Hindu-derived organizations exist in Chile: the Swami Shivapremananda Foundation (Centros Sivananda Yoga Vedanta), the Supreme Master Ching Hai Meditation Association (Sant Mat tradition), the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), and the Vaisnava Mission.

The Western Esoteric tradition appeared early in the 20th century among adherents of Spiritualism, Freemasonry (including Bernardo O'Higgins and other Liberals of his day; the Grand Lodge of Chile was formally established in 1862; Chilean Masons follow the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite), and the Martinista Order of Master Cedaíor. Others that appeared later were the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), Applied Metaphysical Studies Group, and Wicca-Chile.

Also present in Chile are groups associated with the Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age movements: the Theosophical Society, the Unification Church (Rev. Moon), Universal Life—The Inner Religion, Ishaya Techniques, and the Silvan Method.

Popular Catholic religiosity (syncretistic) is practiced by a majority of the Hispanic white and mestizo population. Among practitioners of Amerindian religions (animist) and "popular Catholic religiosity"

there are “specialists” who practice witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo). The traditional Amerindian religions that have survived in Chile are the Mapuche religion, with Nenechen at the head of a pantheon of gods and goddesses. Among the prominent deities is Pilan, who has power over thunder and volcanoes.

In August 2009, Hugo Zepeda Coll, a Chilean lawyer and theologian, published an article in the Chilean daily La Cuarta in which he claimed to have identified at least 70 locations where satanic rituals had been or were being conducted by as many as 250 secret satanic societies. That number remains unverified.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha’i Faith; Capuchins; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints; Dominicans; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Franciscans; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; International Zen Association; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Jesuits; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Master Ching Hai Meditation Association; Methodist Church in Chile; Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile; Pentecostal Church of Chile; Pentecostalism; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Philadelphia Church of God; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Salesians; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Soka Gakkai International; Subud; Theosophical Society (America); Unification Movement; United Methodist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Universal Life; Wesleyan Church; Western Esoteric Tradition; Wiccan Religion; Witchcraft; World Council of Churches.

References

Bandelier, Adolph Francis. “Chile.” In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 5. New York: Robert Appleton

Company, 1909. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/03660a.htm>.

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Burgess, Stanley M., ed. “Chile.” In the International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2001–2002.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/sccl1.html>.
- Cleary, Edward L., and Juan Sepúlveda. “Chilean Pentecostalism: Coming of Age.” In Power, Politics and Pentecostals in Latin America, edited by Edward L. Cleary and Hannah W. Stewart-Gambino, 97–121. Denver, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Dieros, Pablo Alberto. Historia del Cristianismo en América Latina. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Fraternidad Teológica Latinoamericana, 1992.
- Fleet, M. Christian Communities in Chile and Peru. Notre Dame, IN: Helen Kellogg Institute for International Studies, Notre Dame University, 1992.
- Herring, Hubert, and Helen Baldwin Herring. A History of Latin America, from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Holland, Clifton L. “A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Chile: 1811–1996.” <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/chi/chi-rd.htm>.
- Johnson, N. E. The History, Dynamic, and Problems of the Pentecostal Movement in Chile. Richmond, VA: Union Theological Seminary in Virginia, 1970.
- Kessler, J. B. A., Jr. A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile. Goes, Netherlands: Oosterbaan le Cointre, 1967.
- Lalive d’Epinay, Christian. The Refuge of the Masses: A Study of the Pentecostal Movement in Chile. London: Lutterworth Press, 1969.
- Lausanne Chile Country Committee. “Chile, a People Prepared,” Country Profile Series, prepared for the Lausanne II Congress on World Evangelization in Manila, The Philippines, July 11–20, 1989. Santiago, Chile: Lausanne Chile Country Committee, 1989.

Paul, Irven. A Yankee Reformer in Chile: The Life and Works of David Trumbull. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1973.

PROLADES-RITE website. “Census & Public Opinion Polls on Religious Affiliation in Chile: 1920–2006.” <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/chi/chile-rd.htm>.

U.S. Department of State. International Freedom of Religion Report 2007: Ecuador. <http://www.state.gov/drl/rls/irf/2008/108518.htm>.

Willems, Emilio. Followers of the New Faith: Culture Change and the Rise of Protestantism in Brazil and Chile. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1967.

■ China

With 3,705,406 square miles of territory, China is the fourth largest country on Earth, but relative to population, its 1,330 million people make it the most populous of the world’s countries (slightly ahead of number two India and far ahead of number three, the United States). China is located on the western edge of the Pacific Rim, immediately west of the Yellow Sea, the East China Sea, and the South China Sea, between Vietnam to the south and Korea and Russia to the north. China spreads westward from the ocean to India and Kazakhstan.

China is a nation with diverse religious beliefs; some originated in China and others were introduced from elsewhere. Both indigenous and introduced religions continue to play a significant role as the new century begins, especially in the era initiated by the establishment of the People’s Republic of China in 1949.

Confucianism could be considered a philosophy rather than a religion, but in either case, it is central to any consideration of the Chinese cosmic view. Originally the teachings of Confucius (ca. 550–480 BCE) focused on humanistic ethics and moral conduct. He dismissed speculation about the supernatural and insisted on the need for personal responsibility in the context of formal relationships between men and women, parents and children, rulers and subjects. In later centuries, Confucianism was adopted as the state orthodoxy and came to dominate official thinking, culture, and education. Its political expression was the veneration of the emperor as the supreme ruler by virtue of a heavenly mandate and the creation of an elaborate ritual around him.

Grave site of Matteo Ricci, Beijing, China. Ricci was a founder of the Jesuits’ mission to China. (J. Gordon Melton)

Folk religion profoundly influenced society throughout China. Every district had its own particular traditions, practices, and beliefs related to gods, ghosts, and ancestors. All over China, local deities made up a varied pantheon, including spirits of local heroes, versions of Daoist and Buddhist deities, and local, or animistic, spirits. Celebrations of gods often took the forms of colorful processions. Ancestor worship was most common in southern China, where it played a central role in kinship, lineage, and clan systems. Most

China

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Agnostics	400,500,000	413,277,000	30.9	−0.88	350,531,000	232,388,000
Chinese folk	217,360,000	435,000,000	32.6	0.87	480,000,000	500,000,000
Buddhists	54,000,000	190,000,000	14.2	2.49	245,000,000	270,000,000
Atheists	95,000,000	98,000,000	7.3	0.02	90,000,000	85,000,000
Christians	1,102,000	115,009,000	8.6	4.59	175,095,000	225,075,000
Independents	207,000	85,000,000	6.4	5.98	120,000,000	150,000,000
Protestants	423,000	25,000,000	1.9	5.63	42,000,000	55,000,000
Roman Catholics	400,000	15,200,000	1.1	2.69	25,000,000	35,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	40,000,000	57,000,000	4.3	0.68	55,000,000	45,000,000
Muslims	12,000,000	21,300,000	1.6	0.87	24,000,000	25,000,000
Daoists	200,000	6,000,000	0.4	4.08	10,000,000	12,000,000
New religionists	88,000	228,000	0.0	1.96	300,000	600,000
Sikhs	8,000	19,500	0.0	0.67	25,000	35,000
Hindus	12,500	17,800	0.0	0.67	20,000	25,000
Baha'is	500	6,300	0.0	0.98	12,000	20,000
Jews	900	2,500	0.0	0.67	2,500	2,500
Zoroastrians	50	70	0.0	0.63	70	70
Total population	820,272,000	1,335,860,000	100.0	0.67	1,429,986,000	1,395,146,000

households had a small altar where respect would be paid to previous generations. Ancestors and deities were expected to answer petitions. If they failed to do so, the supplicant was perfectly entitled to switch allegiance to others. Temples were often dedicated to several gods, and there was no concept of exclusivity. The entire system was decentralized, unsupervised, and subject to local conditions. The complexities of rituals and divination gave rise to religious specialists such as shamans, diviners, mediums, ritual leaders, astrologers, and healers.

Daoism is a term applied to the philosophy attributed to figures of uncertain historicity, Lao Zi (known to most Westerners as Lao Tzu) and Zhuang Zi (known as Chuang Tzu), who asserted the existence of an unseen, inexpressible absolute, known as the Dao, pervading the universe. Their works, dating from about the third century BCE, discuss how a person could become a sage by following the Dao, abandoning worldly desires, and acting spontaneously. Daoism later evolved into an esoteric system of religious beliefs centered on the achievement of immortality by a variety of occult means, including alchemy, rituals, exercises akin to yoga, and chanting of scriptures. All these practices greatly influenced the various Daoist-like sects popularized as forms of folk religion. The poem Dao De Jung, attributed to Lao Zi, is one of the most celebrated works of Chinese spirituality. The typical Daoist figure is the hermit, and Daoism was regarded by many of the elite as an alternative to the conventional state philosophy of Confucianism. Scholars who became disillusioned with the life of the court had the option of wandering away from the mundane world. There are many accounts of such men, telling how they retired to remote rural areas where they devoted themselves to meditation, the study of the Dao, medicinal herbs, and music or poetry. These sages, it was thought, could attain the blessed state of immortality.

To turn now to the foreign religions, Buddhism was introduced to China in the early centuries of the Common Era. Having originated in India in the fifth century BCE, it was at first mostly confined to foreign residents, but in the fifth century CE began to spread among native Chinese. The following centuries saw a rapid expansion of Buddhism, which reached its peak in the Tang dynasty (seventh to ninth centuries). The most popular sects were the Pure Land and the Chan (later known in the West via its Japanese derivative, Zen Buddhism). It is difficult to summarize the range of doctrines preached by different schools, but most of them advocated compassion, piety, and devotion to Buddha.

When Mahayana Buddhism was introduced to Tibet in the seventh century, it became influenced by Tibet's traditional Bon religion, and developed into the unique branch of Buddhism that is predominant among the Buddhists in Tibet, Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim, and northern India. Tibetan Buddhism also spread into China, under the patronage of several emperors. Today, Tibetan-influenced forms of Buddhism play a significant role, together with Chan and Pure Land, even in mainstream Chinese monasteries. Buddhism never fully recovered from a severe persecution in the ninth century, but it still remained an integral part of the Chinese religious scene, with thousands of temples and monasteries all over the country.

The first documented Christian missionary to China was the Nestorian Alopen (or Alopen) of Persia, who came to China in 635 CE. Later, Nestorian Christianity flourished in China until the ninth century, when the emperor suppressed all non-Daoist religions, including Nestorianism. Many Nestorians, including Mongolians, were exiled to Central Asia and only returned to China with Genghis Khan in 1215, after which they built a sizable Nestorian Church in China. However, when the Mongolians left China as the ruling class in 1385, the Nestorian Church in China gradually ceased to exist with the last documented Nestorians in the late 19th century. What remains in China now is the Nestorian Tablet and the Nestorian Pagoda in Xi'an (built in 700 CE)—the only standing architectural monument of the ancient Nestorian Church in the world.

Zoroastrianism was introduced to China in 516 CE and enjoyed a steady development for several hundred years. Beginning in the 10th century, it gradually declined in China, and ceased to exist since the 13th century. Zoroastrians came back to China as merchants in the mid-19th century and formed small communities in Guangzhou and Shanghai until 1950. Manicheism came to China in the sixth century CE, flourished for a few hundred years, and disappeared in the 16th century, leaving behind a Manichean temple in Fujian Province, perhaps the only standing Manichean temple in the world. Starting in the seventh century CE, Judaism came to China along with Jewish merchants. The Jews had synagogues in China for more than a millennium. Apart from those Jews who came to China in the mid-19th century as merchants, there has been a Chinese Jewish community in Kaifeng, Henan Province, with its rabbi and synagogue, since at least the late 16th century, and it lived as a distinct community even as recently as the beginning of the 20th century.

Arab and Persian merchants brought Islam to China in the eighth century CE. By the 16th century, many Muslims were integrated into Chinese society; these Sinicized Muslims are known as the Hui people. The Hui are descendants of Muslims who settled in China, often gaining administrative posts under the Mongol regime. They intermarried with Han; quite often the only sign of their former belief in Islam is some lifestyle feature such as headdress or diet. More than a dozen ethnic minority groups, such as the Uygurs, Kazakhs, and Salas, who were Muslim far back in history, live in the northeastern part of China. In the 19th century, under the influence of the Naqshbandi Sufi Order, there was a fierce Muslim revolt by the Chinese Muslims (Hui). Some have since been exiled to present Kazakhstan and are now known as the Donggan people who speak an archaic form of Chinese dialect.

Among the prisoners of war from the czar's army in Siberia taken by the Chinese Qing army in 1685 was a Russian Orthodox priest, Maksim Leontbev, who brought with him into captivity an icon of Saint Nicholas and a few Bibles. These few captives formed the first Russian Orthodox community in Beijing, where the emperor granted them a special area to live, as well as a temple to be used as an Orthodox church. Orthodoxy in China grew steadily and attracted many Chinese followers until the Boxer Rebellion in 1900, when many of the Chinese Orthodox were killed; 120 of the Chinese Orthodox martyrs were later canonized as saints. The Orthodox Church of China remained under the authority of the Moscow patriarch until 1956, when the Eastern (Russian) Orthodox Church of China (KHP) became an independent ecclesiastical entity, headed by Archimandrite Vasyliy Shuan of Beijing.

The Roman Catholic Church sent a Franciscan, Bishop John of Monte Corvino (1247–1328), as the first missionary to China. He arrived in 1294. However, the first Roman Catholics in China were the Catholic merchants from Europe, such as Marco Polo, who was in China in the mid-13th century. Bishop John built a small Catholic community, but it died off when the Mongol Empire collapsed a few decades later. The Catholic mission to China was re-established by the Jesuits in the late 16th century and was based in Macao. Michael Ruggerius, later joined by Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), established himself in China in 1583.

Other Jesuits as well as missionaries from other religious orders such as the Dominicans and Franciscans followed them. Soon these missionaries had different views on the Chinese tradition of ancestral worship, disputing whether it was a form of Pagan worship and so condemned by Catholic teaching, or a nonreligious tradition that could be tolerated if not honored. This conflict gave rise to the famous Rites Controversy, which led to an official ban on Catholicism in China for almost a century, along with intense persecution. The Catholic mission continued only when China was opened up to foreign merchants and missionaries after losing the Opium War in 1842. The Catholic population grew rapidly, in spite of the Boxer Rebellion, which killed at least 25,000 Catholics. When the Holy Hierarchy of the Chinese Catholic Church in China was established in 1946, it numbered three million followers.

The first Protestant mission to China comprised the Dutch missionaries who came to Taiwan (called Formosa by the Portuguese, and later occupied by Dutch colonial forces) in 1626 and established churches and schools with more than 1,000 converts. They were driven away by Chinese military forces in 1662 and failed to re-establish their mission despite several later attempts. In 1807, Robert Morrison (1782–1834) of the London Missionary Society went to Guangzhou (Canton) via Macao as a staff member for the East India Company and claimed to be the first Protestant missionary who had set foot in Mainland China. In 1808 he returned to Macao. It was not until after 1842, when China signed the Nanjing (Nanking) Treaty after the defeat in the Opium War, that Protestant missionaries were allowed to work in China. After that, China became the largest Protestant mission field, with more than 10,000 missionaries, mostly from the United Kingdom and the United States, in the 1930s establishing the Protestant presence through building churches, schools, hospitals, and other social service agencies. By 1949, there were slightly less than one million believers under virtually all major denominational banners—from Anglican, Lutheran, Pentecostal, to Free churches and Salvation Army. There were also major indigenous groups such as the Little Flock (the Local Church), the True Jesus Church, the Jesus Family, and the Church of Christ in China.

Since the establishment of the People’s Republic of China in 1949, the Chinese Communist Party has governed China. Marxist-Leninism is the state orthodoxy, so atheism, rather than religious belief, is the official ideology. The party has formulated the “Policy of Freedom of Religious Belief,” and the government has established the Religious Affairs Bureau to implement that policy, which is as follows:

1. All citizens have the right to believe, and not to believe religion. The government officially recognizes only five religions in China—Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, Catholicism, and Protestantism. The government has the authority to define what is, and what is not, a religion. Those that are not defined as falling under the five accepted religions are regarded as evil cults or feudal superstitions and are suppressed by law. The exception is the Orthodox Church of China; Orthodox churches are without a national body and are registered with local government authorities. The new religious movements and folk religions exist in China without clear legal status and in general are tolerated by the civil authority.
2. Each of the five religions is organized into its own patriotic organization under the supervision of the government: the Buddhist Association of China, the China Daoist Association, the China Islamic Association, the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association, the Chinese Catholic Bishops’ Conference, and the Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee of the Protestant Churches of China/China Christian Council (TSPM/CCC). All religious groups are affiliated with one of these groups and are registered with the government in order to have a legal status for existence. All religious groups have to support the ruling party and cooperate with the government's interests.

3. Religious activities are allowed within designated religious venues under the auspices of these organizations.
4. Religions are not allowed to instruct people less than 18 years of age unless they are minors whose family has already ascribed to religion. Religions are not allowed to interfere with the government's social, education, and marriage policies.
5. Party members, government cadres, military personnel, and public security officers are not allowed to embrace religious belief.
6. National minority groups have special permission to embrace a religion that is not one of the five officially recognized ones, as long as that religion symbolizes the cultural heritage of the particular minority group.
7. Foreigners in China are under separate ruling. They are allowed to have their own sanctioned religious activities, even outside of the five officially accepted religions, but foreigners' religious activities cannot involve local nationals. Further, all missionary activity is forbidden in China, and contacts between foreign and national religious groups must receive prior approval from the civil authority.

Currently, the government reports that there are more than 100 million followers of various religious faiths, more than 85,000 sites for religious activities, some 300,000 clergy, and more than 3,000 regional religious organizations (regional branches of the above mentioned national religious organizations). In addition, there are 74 religious schools to train religious personnel. Buddhist groups are separated into 3 divisions: Tibetan Buddhism, Mahayana Buddhism, and Theravada (Pali) Buddhism. There are more than 13,000 temples and 200,000 monks and nuns, among them 120,000 lamas, 1,700 living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism, and 10,000 Bhiksu of Pali Buddhism. There are 25,000 Daoist priests and nuns with about 1,500 temples, and the priests are classified into 2 groups: Zhengyi and Quanzhen. The Muslims are mostly Sunnis with a few Shiites; the total population is more than 18 million. Most of the Muslims are Hui and Uygur; in addition there are another 10 national minority groups who are all Muslim. There are 30,000 mosques, with 40,000 imams and Akhunds. These statistics, supplied by the government, are only approximate; accurate numbers of religious believers and their institutions have not yet been ascertained by reliable surveys.

The Protestant Church, with at least 15 million members affiliated with the TSPM/CCC, is officially declared to be post-denominational, but various traditions do exist within this community. The Seventh-day Adventist Church is treated as a separate entity within the China Christian Council. Similarly, the followers of the True Jesus Church and the Local Church (also known as the Little Flock and the Assembly) have their separate churches and training institutes in many places. In 2007, the Amity Press in China had printed 40 million copies of the Chinese Bible. There are many Protestant groups, with a collective membership of at least 15 million, not affiliated with the TSPM/CCC; these groups operate clandestinely and illicitly.

The Catholic Church in China broke its formal relationship with the Holy See in 1957 when it consecrated its bishops without papal approval. From the mid-1950s until now, formal relations between Beijing and the Vatican have been suspended, as the Vatican has kept diplomatic relationship with the Republic of China (Taiwan) as the legitimate representation of China.

Currently there is an underground Chinese Catholic hierarchy in full communion with Rome claiming a membership of more than 6 million. There is also a separate government-approved Catholic Church in China with independently consecrated bishops (the majority of them, however, having received papal approval) with a total membership of 6 million and at least 4,000 clergy and about 5,000 churches.

Sino-Vatican rapprochement was on the horizon in 1999–2000, as both parties engaged in intensive negotiations, but both parties broke negotiations off over the controversy created by the pope's canonization of 120 martyred saints of China on October 1, 2000, the National Day of the People's Republic of China. Talks between Beijing and the Vatican for normalization of relation has since been resumed as both sides are sending positive signals, and in 2007 Pope Benedict XVI issued a long pastoral letter to the Catholics in China urging different factions to be united under the papal authority. Several new Episcopal consecrations have since taken place with tacit approvals from both sides.

Since the death of the last government-recognized Chinese Orthodox priest—Gregory Zhu—in October 2000, there has been, officially, no longer a functional Orthodox Church in China. There are, however, a dozen communities of Orthodox believers in Beijing, Shanghai, Heilongjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Xinjiang as well as a few validly ordained Chinese Orthodox priests that the government has not recognized. In December 2007 the Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) started a department to help the normalization of the Orthodox Church of China (KHP). Since 2004, the government allowed several young Chinese Orthodox men to study theology in Moscow and St. Petersburg preparing for priesthood.

Kim-Kwong Chan and Alan Hunter

See also: Chinese Buddhist Association; Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association; Chinese Daoist Association; Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement /China Christian Council; Confucianism; Confucius; Laozi; Local Church, The; London Missionary Society; Orthodox Church in China; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church; True Jesus Church; Zhuangzi; Zoroastrianism.

References

- Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- MacInnis, Donald E. Religion in China Today: Policy and Practice. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1989.
- Madsen, Richard. China's Catholics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- State Administration for Religious Affairs of the Peoples Republic of China. <http://www.sara.gov.cn>.

Yang, C. K. Religion in Chinese Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1961.

Zhufeng, Luo, ed. Religion under Socialism in China. Trans. by Donald E. MacInnis and Zheng Xi'an. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991.

■ China: Hong Kong

Hong Kong resulted from the British settlement of Hong Kong Island beginning in 1841. The following year China formally conceded it and the Kowloon peninsula to Britain. In 1898, British territory was extended by a lease of additional land, the New Territories, for 99 years. Over the years, the whole spectrum of religion that was present in China became visible in Hong Kong.

Unlike the rest of the People's Republic of China (PRC), where there are specific policies regarding religion, since 1997 the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region Government, under the political principle of One Country–Two Systems, follows the Basic Law in regarding to religion. Hong Kong's official policy is religious freedom, which is without any religious law or governmental division supervising religious groups.

Traditional Chinese religions play a major role in Hong Kong. There are several Buddhist organizations representing various branches of Buddhism, and they operate hospitals, schools, charitable organizations, temples, and monasteries. The Buddhist Po Lin Monastery is home to the world's largest outdoor bronze statue of the Buddha. The Daoists run several Daoist temples and schools. However, the majority of the 600 temples do not make clear distinctions between Buddhism and Daoism, as most of them venerate local deities. These temples are manifestations of Chinese folk religion—a syncretistic religion of Daoism, Buddhism, ancestor worship, and polytheism from folk legends. The most popular deities are Bodhisattva (the Buddha), Guang Yin (protector of seafarers), Guang Gong (god of war and source of righteousness), Beidi (Supreme Emperor of the Dark Heaven), Che Gong (a general in the 12th century CE), and Wang Daxian (a local deity). Confucianism is registered as an academy, and its followers promote the teaching of Confucius. There are also many branches of neo-Daoist groups such as Tin

Altar at Tin Hau Temple, Hong Kong. The temple is dedicated to the Taoist sea goddess Tin Hau. Taoism is a traditional Chinese religious philosophy and one of many religions practiced in Hong Kong today. (J. Gordon Melton)

Tak Sing Kau (also known as Tien Dao or Yiguandao in China), which teaches a form of syncretistic religion. The Falun Gong registered with the Hong Kong government in the late 1990s as a social organization with less than 100 followers. Since 1998, the birthday of the Buddha has been observed as a public holiday.

Christianity also plays a substantial role in the society. Protestantism entered with the British colonial government in 1841 and has a current membership of 350,000 believers. The Protestant community is composed of more than 50 denominations, 1,500 congregations, 36 theological seminaries/Bible schools, and at least 200 Christian organizations. Most of the main-line denominations have branches here, including the Baptists, Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, Salvation Army, Presbyterians, and Pentecostals. There are many indigenous denominations, such as the Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China (representing Presbyterian and Congregational tradition), the True Jesus Church, and the Local Church (commonly known as the Little Flock). The Protestant community operates more than 500 schools (kindergarten, primary, and secondary), 3 postsecondary institutions, 5 hospitals, more than 200 social service centers, and a whole range of charitable institutions. There are two major ecumenical bodies—the Hong Kong Christian Council and the Hong Kong Chinese Christian Church Union—and two Christian weekly papers, the Christian Times and Christian Weekly.

The Roman Catholic Church began as a mission vicariate in 1841 and was elevated to a diocese in 1946. Cardinal Joseph Zen, assisted by Bishop John Tong and close to 1,000 religious persons (about 300 are priests), shepherds about 250,000 Hong Kong Catholics in 59 parishes and 30 centers for Mass. There are also an additional 100,000 Filipino Catholics, who are mostly domestic workers serving in Hong Kong. The Catholic Diocese operates more than 320 schools (kindergarten, primary, and secondary), 6 hospitals, a seminary, and a whole range of social service operations. It publishes two weekly newspapers: Kung Kao Po and the Sunday Examiner. It is in full communion with the Holy See.

There are three Orthodox representations in Hong Kong. The Greek Orthodox Church has a small congregation established in 1997. It is headed by a metropolitan, who is also in charge of the Metropolitanate of Hong Kong and South East Asia under the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople. In 2004 the Russian Orthodox Church re-established its parish in Hong Kong, suspended since 1970, under the Moscow Patriarchate. The Coptic Orthodox Church established a parish in Hong Kong in 2006, under the Coptic bishop of Australia. The Seventh-day Adventist Church's congregations are part of the Hong Kong–Macao Conference and sponsor a hospital and college, independent from other Christian groups.

Other religions are also present. There are several major Muslim organizations in Hong Kong—the Islamic Union of Hong Kong, the Chinese Muslim Cultural and Fraternal Association, the Pakistan Association, the Indian Muslim Association, and the Shiah Fatimi Ishmaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra Association, plus a dozen smaller ones. Islam has about 80,000 followers, with 4 major masjids, several charitable organizations, and 6 schools.

There is one inter-faith institution in Hong Kong, the Colloquium of Six Religious Leaders of Hong Kong, which holds regular inter-faith seminars and events; it is involved in the political apparatus by selecting delegates to the Election Committee of Hong Kong representing religious sectors, and also operates the Inter-Faith Prayer Rooms in the Hong Kong International Airport. Buddha's Birthday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and Easter Monday are public holidays.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Jehovah's Witnesses have also made their presence known to the public for decades, and the LDS Church established its Asian headquarters in Hong Kong. The Hindu community numbers 12,000 and has its own temple. The Sikh temple has been serving the small Punjabi community for more than a century. The Jewish community, dating from the 1840s, operates three synagogues (one Orthodox and two Reform), a community center, and a religious school. The Baha'i Faith began in Hong Kong in 1923 and formally registered with the government in 1974; it has a few dozen followers with its own religious center. The Zoroastrians registered with the government in 1842 and currently have a center in charge of Hong Kong and Macao affairs; there is a priest with some followers. Shinto is practiced among the Japanese in their homes in Hong Kong, but there is no Shinto temple. Among the new religious movements, Soka Gakkai International operates two larger centers with an increasing number of followers. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness established itself in the mid-1970s and supports academic activities in universities.

Methodist Church, Hong Kong. Methodism is one of many faiths practiced in Hong Kong. (J. Gordon Melton)

The New Age movement is becoming popular among the youth and intellectuals and most of the popular sects can be found here.

Kim-Kwong Chan

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Local Church; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shiah Fatimi Ishmaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra; Shinto; Soka Gakkai International; Statues—Buddhist; Tian Dao; True Jesus Church.

Reference

Information Services Department. Hong Kong: Hong Kong Government, 2007.

■ China: Macao

Macao became a Portuguese colony in 1557, and in 1997 was returned back into the sovereignty of China. It lives under the political rule of the People's Republic of China, but follows the Macao Basic Law in religious affairs under the One Country–Two Systems guideline. The Basic Law states that the Macao government does not intervene in the internal affairs of religious groups unless activities conducted by these groups are in violation of other laws. A wide spectrum of religious groups now manifests in this Special Administrative Region.

The major Buddhist group in Macao is Chan (Zen) Buddhism led by the Puzhi Zen Monastery, which was built in 1622. The second major Buddhist branch—Pure Land Buddhism—started in Macao in 1928. Several smaller Buddhist branches subsequently were introduced in Macao. The Macao Buddhist Association was established in 1997. Daoism has been popular in Macao in various forms of folk religion, with worshippers venerating various deities in the different temples. The most popular temple is Ma-Kwok Temple, built in 1605, venerating Mazu—the goddess of seafarers. There are some deities from local legends, such as Zhu Daxian and Sanbu Shen, worshipped by

Mazu, the Empress of Heaven, is a popular deity figure in Taiwan, Macao, and Hong Kong. (J. Gordon Melton)

Macao inhabitants. There is no formal Daoist organization except a loosely formed Macao Federation that has long been dysfunctional.

The first missionary of the Roman Catholic Church in Macao was the Jesuit Gregorio Gonzales, who came to Macao in 1553. Pope Pius V (r. 1566–1572) appointed Melchior Carneiro (1516–1583) as the first bishop of Macao in 1566. Pope Gregory XIII (r. 1572–1585) formally established the Macao Diocese in 1567, with jurisdiction over the missionary territory of China, Japan, and Indochina. The diocese became the center to train and send missionaries to these mission regions for several hundred years until the gradual formation of regional Catholic hierarchies. The Diocese of Macao currently has one bishop, about 250 religious persons (80 priests), and a membership of 23,000. It operates a college, several schools, and several social service centers.

The first Protestant missionary to come to Macao was Robert Morrison (1782–1834) of the London Missionary Society. He arrived in September 1807 and was followed by other missionaries and mission agencies. Currently there are about 3,500 Protestants and 200 pastors and missionaries belonging to about 5 churches or preaching points, 3 Bible schools, and 50 church organizations. The main denominations are the Anglicans, Baptists, Church of Christ in China, Pentecostals, and Christian Mission Church (an indigenous denomination). In 1990, several churches and organizations formed the Union of Christian Evangelical Churches in Macao with current membership of 20 churches and 18 agencies; it issues a monthly news letter. The Protestant churches operate schools, social service centers, and drug rehabilitation centers.

The presence of Islam in Macao can be traced back to the late 16th century. Currently there are several hundred Muslims in Macao affiliated with the Macao Islam Association. Zoroastrianism began its presence in Macao in the 17th century, and Zoroastrian merchants once had significant impact in Macao, especially in the 19th century. Currently they have no religious activity in Macao other than the upkeep of the Zoroastrian cemetery through the Zoroastrian Center in Hong Kong. The first missionary of the Baha'i Faith, Frances Heller, arrived in Macao in 1953. The Baha'is established their first local chapter in 1958 with 24 believers. Currently there are more than 2,000 followers, with 4 local chapters under the Macao Regional Chapter. There is a branch of Soka Gakkai International in Macao under the auspices of Hong Kong Soka Gakkai Center. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints came to Macao in the mid-1980s and is still growing. There is a New Apostolic Church congregation, mainly attended by Filipino followers living in Macao. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness began work in Macao in the late 1980s and now reports a small number of followers.

Kim-Kwong Chan

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; London Missionary Society; Pure Land Buddhism; Soka Gakkai International; Zen Buddhism.

Reference

Cheng, Y. M., and K. S. Huang. Religioes de Macau. Macao: Macao Foundation, 1994.

■ China:Taiwan

Taiwan is an island 90 miles to the southeast of the Chinese mainland, across the Taiwan Strait from Fukien Province. Its capital is Taipei and its population is close to 23 million. The ethnic makeup of the island includes indigenous Taiwanese and Chinese. The movement of the national government from the mainland in 1949 markedly increased the Chinese population. As in traditional Chinese society the religions of Taiwan comprise a combination of Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism. Less than 5 percent of the country identifies as Christian, although much more than 50 percent of indigenous Taiwanese identify themselves as Christian.

The religious history of Taiwan is marked by an indigenous tradition overlaid by both Western colonial and Chinese influences. The Chinese influences have resulted from an ongoing need for various groups of mainlanders to seek refuge, both political and economic. This influx from the mainland has included the establishment of pirates' bases, rebel army refuges, and even, after World War II, the site for the National Government in Exile, which fled Communist military successes on the mainland. Taiwan's recent religious developments have been most strongly influenced by those fleeing the political situation on the mainland and by the island's continued economic growth.

Holy Family Church, a Roman Catholic parish in Taipei, Taiwan. Christianity is a growing minority religion in China. (J. Gordon Melton)

The indigenous group that until the ninth century CE inhabited the fertile southern plains of Taiwan has been identified as being of proto-Malayan ancestry. Familial life was matriarchal, and religious life was centered on the priestess of the village. In his Formosa: A Study in Chinese History, William B. Goddard describes her role: "Under the influence of the sacred samshu, a spirit distilled from the sweet potato, the priestess held communion with the ancestral spirits and interpreted their will to the chiefs."

Tribes not of proto-Malayan stock settled in the north. They have a myth of the "cutting of the sun," which refers to an extended night, and that has led some to infer that this group came from the far north. Other theories, held predominantly by Chinese scholars, suggest that these tribes originated on the mainland. Their evidence relies on the interpretation of annals that refer to the political life and population movements that occurred under the (mainly mythical) emperors of the Xia and Shang dynasties (from before the 18th to the 11th century BCE). These northern tribes, often headhunting groups, demonstrate cultural practices similar to those of the Yueh, a group that settled throughout southern China and northern Vietnam. From an account of 1904 we hear of one of these northern tribes worshipping a dog that was believed to embody the spirit of the founder of the tribe.

Longshan Temple, Taipei, dedicated to Guan Yin, is one of the oldest Buddhist temples in Taiwan. (J. Gordon Melton)

In 611 CE there are Chinese records of an expedition launched from the mainland, which returned after encountering strong opposition. From the chaos, famine, and migration that accompanied the end of the Tang dynasty (907), the Hakkas (strangers), a racial group that for centuries had been denied social rights on the mainland, moved to Taiwan and pushed the indigenous peoples out of the fertile plains in the west. These people resettled in the foothills of the central and eastern mountains. The approach of Mongols on the mainland during the 1200s hastened this process and saw the arrival of the Hoklos peoples from Amoy and other parts of Fukien. Now it was the turn of the Hakkas to be pushed into the foothills. With this last movement the cult of Mazu Tianfei was introduced. Often presented as a virtuous young girl who risked her life to save shipwrecked sailors, she became the patron deity of all who used the sea and was elevated to the position of “heavenly mother.”

In the early 16th century, Taiwan was “discovered” by the Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese, Ilha Formosa, as the island has been called, being the Portuguese for “beautiful island.” The Dutch established an administration on the south of the island in 1622, the Spanish

China: Taiwan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Chinese folk	7,411,000	10,082,000	42.8	0.30	10,029,000	9,159,000
Buddhists	3,661,000	6,250,000	26.5	0.94	6,600,000	6,250,000
Daoists	1,534,000	3,000,000	12.7	1.24	3,173,000	2,990,000
New religionists	926,000	1,600,000	6.8	0.66	1,700,000	1,600,000
Christians	933,000	1,420,000	6.0	0.94	1,642,000	1,617,000
Protestants	275,000	400,000	1.7	1.13	500,000	500,000
Roman Catholics	305,000	300,000	1.3	−0.28	300,000	270,000
Independents	222,000	330,000	1.4	1.34	420,000	420,000
Agnostics	20,000	1,000,000	4.2	0.66	1,250,000	1,320,000
Muslims	60,000	92,000	0.4	0.66	100,000	100,000
Ethnoreligionists	40,000	57,000	0.2	0.51	60,000	58,000
Atheists	10,000	45,000	0.2	0.66	60,000	80,000
Baha'is	3,000	16,600	0.1	0.66	22,000	30,000
Jews	100	200	0.0	0.66	250	400
Total population	14,598,000	23,562,000	100.0	0.66	24,636,000	23,204,000 in the north in 1626. The Christian presence on the island is thus more than 400 years old, and many of the indigenous peoples were converted to Christianity centuries ago.

The interest from mainland China increased during the disturbances that accompanied the establishment of the Qing dynasty (1644–1911). Many Chinese, particularly in the south of the country, considered this Manchu dynasty illegitimate. Koxinga, a merchant adventurer and supporter of the Ming dynasty, was forced to flee to Taiwan after being routed by the Manchus. He expelled the Dutch East India Company and made the island his kingdom, renaming it Taiwan (terraced bay). Many religio-political secret societies that were anti-Qing in intent and that held Lord Guan (Guan di Gong), the Chinese god of loyalty, as their special patron, found refuge on the island. Lord Guan is immortalized in the popular novel Romance of the Three Kingdoms as guarding the throne for the rightful heir. Thus he represented the return of legitimacy. Under Koxinga, a military and civil administration was established. Much like Lord Guan, Koxinga himself was deified, at first by the people of Taiwan; after the capture of the island by Manchu forces in the 1690s his cult was made official. In 1930, a Japanese survey discovered 57 temples dedicated to the worship of this nationalist figure.

After the descendants of Koxinga were defeated, secret societies with a strong millenarian component, such as the White Lotus Society and the Tian-di Society, increased their activity; despite this unrest, during the ensuing decades living standards improved, and the island returned to peace under the Qing. The coming of the official Chinese bureaucracy brought state-supported temples dedicated to Confucius and the further development of Buddhism, as well as of Daoism, in both its popular and philosophical forms.

Religious life under the Chinese in Taiwan involved many layers: At the most basic level, ancestor worship operated primarily as a family cult and secondarily as a clan cult. Above the familial level there were many layers of state worship, the most immediate being the worship of the village or town deity. For example, the patron deity of Taipei is famous for his reputation of preventing the spread of epidemics through the town.

By the terms of the treaty of Shimonoseki (1894), Taiwan became a Japanese possession, and during the World Wars the island was developed as a highly industrialized supply base for the Japanese war effort. Returned to the control of the Chinese Nationalist Government in 1945, Taiwan became the place that this government fled to in 1949. As a part of China that has remained free from Communist control, Taiwan has become the most significant center for Chinese religious development. This became especially true after the Cultural Revolution.

Today, about 70 percent of Taiwan's residents follow the popular combination of Daoism and Buddhism, sometimes referred to as Chinese folk religion, that was at one time so evident on the Chinese mainland, or one of the popular new movements such as Tian Dao (Yiguandao). Since 1949 the growing prosperity of the island has allowed Taiwanese religious organizations to encourage the study of Chinese religions and their dissemination to the world. Such organizations as the Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, Dharma Drum Mountain, Foguangshan (International Buddhist Progress Association), and the highly structured Buddha's Light International Association have now become large international organizations, which are constructing Buddhist temples throughout the island and around the world.

Christianity came to Taiwan in 1621, when some Dominicans began a small mission, but the Dominicans were driven out by Dutch Protestants during their period of hegemony (1624–1662). However, the Christian community was totally wiped out by pirates later in the century. The Roman Catholic Church returned in 1859 and Protestants (Presbyterians) in 1865. Christianity thrived even when the Japanese tried to suppress it, first in the 1890s and then during World War II. Christianity burgeoned after 1949, when many missionaries and lay Christians moved to Taiwan with the Nationalist government, and since then Taiwan has been home to numerous Western missionary efforts and a variety of indigenous Chinese churches such as the True Jesus Church and the Local Church. As the new century begins, however, only about 6 percent of the inhabitants of the island are professed Christians.

There is a small Muslim community, which began with refugees in 1949.

Christopher H. Hartney

See also: Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, The; Dharma Drum Mountain Association, The; Dominicans; Foguangshan; Local Church, The; Roman Catholic Church; Tian Dao; True Jesus Church.

References

- Chandler, Stuart. Establishing a Pure Land on Earth: The Foguang Buddhist Perspective on Modernization and Globalization. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2004.
- Goddard, William G. Formosa: A Study in Chinese History. London: Macmillan, 1966.
- Jordan, David K., and Daniel L. Overmyer. The Flying Phoenix: Aspects of Chinese Sectarianism in Taiwan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Lin, April C. J., and Jerome F. Keating. Island in the Stream: A Quick Case Study of Taiwan's Complex History. Taipei: SMC Publishing Company, 2000.
- Wolf, Margery. Women and the Family in Rural Taiwan. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1972.

■ China:Tibet

Prior to its forcible annexation into the People's Republic of China (PRC) in the 1950s, Tibet was an independent country situated on the Tibetan plateau, one of the highest inhabited areas on Earth. Bordered by some of the world's tallest mountains, much of Tibet is remote and inaccessible, but the country had ongoing contact and trade with its neighbors, including India, China, Nepal, and Russia. Tibetan Buddhism is the dominant religious tradition of the plateau, and it is also found in surrounding areas, including Nepal, Mongolia, parts of Russia, and several Central Asian republics. Largely as a result of the diaspora caused by the Chinese invasion, Tibetan Buddhism has spread around the world, and there are now thousands of centers in North America, Europe, and Asia that practice Tibetan forms of Buddhism.

The Tibetan plateau lies an average altitude of 12,000 feet above sea level; the air is thin and the soil mostly sparse and rocky. Many of Tibet's inhabitants survive on a combination of subsistence farming and animal husbandry. Only in the lower valleys—such as the area around the capital city, Lhasa—is large-scale agriculture possible. The main language of the plateau is Tibetan, which is divided into a number of regional dialects. The populace is overwhelmingly Buddhist, despite the concerted efforts of the Chinese to undermine Tibetan Buddhism's influence and a campaign of vilification of its most important leader, the Dalai Lama.

Prior to its forced amalgamation into China's modern empire, Tibet tried to remain aloof from the rest of the world for centuries. In the 19th century its borders were closed to foreigners and legal punishments were prescribed for anyone who helped outsiders travel through the country. Despite such measures, Tibet had ongoing commerce with countries at its borders, and people from various parts of the plateau traveled to holy places on pilgrimages. Tibet's self-imposed isolation came to an end in 1950, when Chinese troops entered from the east. They encountered poorly armed and untrained recruits led by militarily inept aristocrats, and Tibet's defenders were easily defeated.

China's advance troops marched to Lhasa and declared that Tibet had always been an "inalienable part of China" (despite the fact that it had its own sovereign government that issued currency, ran an independent legal system and military, and collected taxes entirely separately from China). When the foreign troops arrived, there were no roads connecting the two countries; and because all Chinese nationals had been expelled from Tibet in 1911, there had been only minimal contact between the two countries for decades.

Despite these factors, Chinese authorities proclaimed that China had a "historical right" to Tibet and that its recent estrangement was due to the sinister machinations of "foreign imperialists" who had lured Tibetans away from the "motherland." In 1950 there were a total of five foreign nationals residing in the Tibetan plateau, none of whom had any role in the government. Despite this, China has consistently referred to its invasion and annexation as a "peaceful liberation."

Inspired by Communist ideology, China's supreme leader, the "Great Helmsman" Mao Zedong, proposed to remake Tibet in the image of modern China. Traditional small farms were abolished and the populace forced to merge into collectives, and Mao declared that "religion is poison" and worked vigorously to eradicate it. When the Chinese arrived, Tibet had more than 7,000 religious buildings, including monasteries, Tenzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama, the leader of Tibetan Buddhists worldwide. The Dalai Lama has been in exile since 1959 when China seized control of Tibet. (Special Collections, Davidson Library, University of California—Santa Barbara) temples, and stupas, but by the end of the Cultural Revolution (1965–1975) only 7 remained intact. Many monasteries were converted to military uses, and their contents were looted and sold overseas. Vast numbers of sacred texts were burned or defaced, and statues were melted down for their precious metals and jewels. Monks and nuns were forced to return to lay life, and many were subjected to the public humiliation of "struggle sessions" in which they were accused of being "class enemies," forced to confess their "crimes," and often made to perform public sexual acts.

Tibetans are arguably among the most religiously devout peoples in the world. Prior to China's invasion, about 15 percent of the populace were monks. The people generously supported religious institutions, and their daily lives were pervaded by religious practices. Thus it is unsurprising that Chinese attacks on their religion and culture produced a negative reaction. Beginning with the first incursions of Chinese troops, Tibetans took to the streets and demanded that their self-proclaimed “liberators” leave them alone and return to their own country. Organized resistance movements began to operate in eastern areas of the Tibetan plateau, particularly Kham and Amdo, and in 1959 tens of thousands of Tibetans took to the streets of Lhasa protesting Chinese actions and policies and demanding that Tibet regain its independence. This protest was brutally suppressed, and the Dalai Lama fled into exile in India, where he was soon joined by more than 100,000 other Tibetans. This event is commonly referred to by exiled Tibetans as the “First Tibetan War of Independence” and is commemorated every year by Tibetan communities and foreign supporters around the world. There have been ongoing demonstrations in Tibet since the 1950s, but these are always countered by overwhelming military force. Perpetrators (and often people who were in the vicinity of a demonstration) are commonly subjected to lengthy prison terms, torture, and often execution.

The most recent demonstrations occurred in March and April 2008. They began when a small number of monks took to Lhasa’s streets demanding an end to China’s campaign of “patriotic re-education,” in which monks and nuns are forced to participate in daily classes of Chinese propaganda. Instructors require them to repeat the highly fictitious Chinese view of Tibetan history and the PRC’s version of Tibetan Buddhist belief and practice (which deviates significantly from that of most adherents), and all monks and nuns are required to sign a document denouncing the Dalai Lama. Only officially recognized monastics can reside in monasteries, and only those who have signed denunciations of the Dalai Lama are allowed to join. Because of these harsh measures, thousands escape into exile every year in order to find religious freedom.

The first group of demonstrators was met by Chinese security forces, who beat them and took them into detention. A larger group of monks then protested their arrest, and they too were beaten and taken to a military detention center. This prompted thousands of laypeople to join the protest, and they focused on the economic marginalization of Tibetans in their own country. Several Chinese-owned businesses were destroyed, and several Chinese settlers were killed, with scores more injured.

Significantly, most of the protestors were in their twenties and thirties, and so had grown up under Chinese rule, as had their parents. The PRC government, embarrassed by this public show of Tibetan disaffection, attempted to blame the protests on the exiled Dalai Lama, although for decades Chinese officials have declared that he has no influence in Tibet and that he has been completely marginalized.

For the first time in Tibetan history, the Lhasa protests sparked others all over the plateau. Major demonstrations erupted in Kham and Amdo, and even the normally apolitical northern areas saw a number of large gatherings. Most monks and nuns focused their anger on “patriotic re-education,” while lay Tibetans denounced Chinese economic policies, racism by Han Chinese toward them, and attempts to destroy their religion and culture. Chinese authorities responded by expelling all foreigners and domestic tourists. Deported reporters witnessed vast military convoys pouring into Tibetan regions, filled with heavily armed combat troops. The entire region was placed under strict military lockdown, and according to some reports thousands of Tibetans were rounded up and incarcerated. Reports of arbitrary detention and torture trickled out of Tibet despite Chinese efforts to censor communications.

As this article was being written, the situation remains tense, and a number of monks report that Chinese soldiers or intelligence agents reside in their monasteries and that there is an extensive network of spies. A climate of fear pervades the region, and religious figures are the primary focus of Chinese repression. Human rights organizations that have investigated the situation agree that freedom of religion is nonexistent in Tibet. Torture, arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and government surveillance are commonplace.

Tibetan Buddhism: History and Practice The introduction of Buddhism is traditionally thought to have begun in the seventh century CE, during the reign of King Songtsen Gambo (ca. 618–650), who is credited with initiating the “first dissemination” (ngadar) of the religion into Tibet. Royal patronage continued during the reign of King Trisong Detsen (ca. 740–798), who together with the Indian scholar-monk Santarakṣita and the Tantric master Padmasambhava founded the first Buddhist monastery at Samye in 775. The two Indian masters represent competing paradigms of Buddhism, both of which became influential in Tibet: a monastic and clerical stream that emphasized cenobitic monasticism; and lineages often centered on charismatic lay tantrics. The former was transmitted mainly from north Indian monastic universities such as Nalanda, while the latter was centered in Bihar and Bengal and generally existed well apart from the monastic establishments.

Following the demise of the first ruling dynasty of Tibet in the ninth century, Buddhism went into decline, but it was revived in the 11th century by the Indian scholar-monk Atisha, who traveled to Tibet in 1042 and played a major role in the “second dissemination” (chidar) of Buddhism along with the great translator Rinchen Sangpo, the kings of the eastern Tibetan kingdom of Guge, and monks in Kham who had maintained scholastic traditions imported from India. In addition, Indian Tantric teachers had a powerful influence on the development of the tradition.

Tantric Buddhism is the dominant form of practice in contemporary Tibetan Buddhism. It derives from Indian texts that mostly have the term “Tantra” in their titles. They focus on ritual and visualization as means to transform the mind and cultivate desired qualities such as wisdom, compassion, altruism, and patience. The Indian root texts have been supplemented by millennia of oral commentary by both Indian and Tibetan masters, and all orders of Tibetan Buddhism have a range of Tantric rituals and scholastic traditions. Most serious practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism have taken at least one Tantric initiation and maintain a daily practice of ritual and visualization.

The monastic tradition championed by Atisha and the Tantric lineages of such masters as Naropa are the two main paradigms in Tibet to the present day. Over the centuries, the Buddhist tradition divided into four major orders and a variety of subsects. The major orders are the Nyingmapa, the Gelugpa (the school to which the Dalai Lama belongs), the Sakyapa, and the Kagyupa.

In addition to these Buddhist orders, there is a tradition referred to as Bon, which claims to predate the introduction of Buddhism to the region. Its histories report a separate (and superior) transmission by way of Persia, and Bon has its own canon, which shares much in common with that of Tibetan Buddhism. In recent times Bon has shifted away from its traditional emphasis on shamanistic practices and now has developed scholastic traditions and monastic practices similar to those of Buddhist orders.

One of the most important aspects of Tibetan Buddhism is the institution of reincarnating lamas (tulku). The most prominent of these is the Dalai Lama, believed to be the 14th in a series of physical emanations of the buddha Chenrezi (Avalokiteshvara). Each reincarnate lama transmits his consciousness to a newly conceived fetus after his death, and religious leaders of their respective lineages generally organize their recognition. The institution is based on two factors: (1) the Buddhist doctrine of rebirth, according to which every being is born, dies, and is again reborn in an endless cycle that is only broken by those who successfully engage in Buddhist practice and thus remove themselves from rebirth; and (2) the ideal of the bodhisattva, a compassionate figure who works for the liberation of all sentient beings from cyclic existence. Reincarnate lamas are believed to be advanced bodhisattvas who consciously choose their rebirth situations in order to help others.

Today Buddhism remains the dominant tradition in Tibet, and the majority of the inhabitants of the plateau are devout Buddhists despite Chinese efforts to undermine the tradition. In addition, devotion to the Dalai Lama remains strong, as evidenced by the response to remarks he made at a religious ceremony in India in 2006 in which he denounced the Tibetan practice of wearing animal furs. When some Tibetans who attended the ceremony reported the Dalai Lama’s words following their return, a wave of fur burnings ensued all over the Tibetan plateau, and the fur trade plummeted. Chinese authorities, embarrassed by this obvious demonstration of his continued influence, banned fur burning and even began to force Tibetans to wear furs in public.

The severe restrictions on religious practice in Chinese-controlled regions have led to the virtual eradication of freedom of religion for Tibetan Buddhists in their homeland, but the tradition continues to flourish in exile communities in India and Nepal, and Tibetan Buddhism is becoming increasingly popular around the world due to the missionary efforts of prominent Tibetan religious luminaries like Sogyal Rinpoche (b. 1947), the 16th and 17th Karmapas, Lama Zopa Rinpoche (b. 1946), and the late Chogyam Trungpa (1939–1987).

John Powers

See also: Atisha; Bon Religion; Dalai Lama III, Sonam Gyatso; Gelugpa; Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Reincarnation; Sakyapa; Tantrism.

References

- Blondeau, Anne-Marie, and Katia Buffertrille, eds. Authenticating Tibet: Answers to China's 100 Questions. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- Dalai Lama XIV. The World of Tibetan Buddhism: An Overview of Its Philosophy and Practice. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1995.
- Davidson, Ronald. Tibetan Renaissance: Tantric Buddhism in the Rebirth of Tibetan Culture. New York: Columbia University Press, 2005.
- Kapstein, Matthew. The Tibetans. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2006.
- Powers, John. A Concise Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion Publications, 2008.

China Islamic Association

The China Islamic Association was founded in 1953, soon after the formation of the People's Republic of China in 1949. It coordinates the activity of the Muslim community in China with the central government.

Islam reached the Chinese Province of Xinjiang (Sinkiang) during the seventh century, by tradition in 650, with the arrival of Saad ibn Abi Waqqas, one of the Companions of Muhammad. The Chinese emperor subsequently approved the building of the country's first mosque at Ch'ang-an, which remains open today.

Subsequently Muslim merchants from as far away as Persia settled in China along the fabled Silk Route, created small autonomous communities, and began to convert the local population. Later Sufis from Baghdad arrived. The community expanded rapidly during the Sung dynasty (960–1279), and were especially valued in the government of Kublai Khan (ca. 1216–1294), who recruited thousands of learned Muslims to help build the government infrastructure. By the 15th century, Islam had spread among a substantial number of the residents of Xinjiang and gradually became the dominant faith in the region.

Islam established itself among the Han Chinese, who became known as the Hui people. During the Ming dynasty (1368–1644), the Hui took major steps to integrate culturally back into the dominant Han culture, a process that included their adoption of Chinese names, while keeping their religion. The Hui are now found scattered throughout China but are especially important in Ningxia Hui (an autonomous region and the only Muslim province in China), Yunnan, and Inner Mongolia. The Hui now constitute half of the Muslim community in China and outnumber the Turkish groups, primarily the Uighurs and Tadjiks, who remain a strong minority in Xinjiang. Eventually, some 10 different ethnic groups (including the Kirgiz, Uzbeks, Tatars, Tungsiang, Paoans, and Salars) also became predominantly Muslim.

In 1953, the China Islamic Association was assigned the task of seeing to the needs of the Muslim minority, including the care and upkeep of mosques, the printing of the Koran, and, most important, the supervision of the Muslim leadership. Among its accomplishments was the translation and publication of the Koran into the vernacular. It ceased to function from 1966 to 1979, and the government organized a short-lived Revolutionary Group for the Abolition of Islam. Following the closing of the country's mosques, many Muslims fled to the Soviet Union and Taiwan while the Cultural Revolution ran its course.

The lessening of hostility toward Islam began to manifest rather quickly, and as early as 1967 a mosque (for diplomats) was opened in Beijing and one in Shanghai the following year. At the beginning of the 1970s some mosques serving the Hui people were reopened. Broad reorganization of the community, however, only occurred at the end of the 1970, when a degree of religious freedom was again allowed.

Thousands of Muslim worshippers depart Id Kah Mosque after service at the end of Ramadan, Kashgar, Xinjiang province. (Pniesen/Dreamstime.com)

After the end of the Cultural Revolution, in the early 1980s, Chinese Muslims were once again allowed to make the trip to Saudi Arabia for the annual hajj (pilgrimage). In 1989, the association was able for the first time to organize flights for the annual trip. Around 140,000 Muslims had made the pilgrimage by 2009.

The China Islamic Association was reorganized in 1979 and held its first gathering since the 1960s the following year. Its headquarters is in Beijing. There are, it is estimated, between 25 and 35 million Muslims in China, most Sunnis of the Hanafite School. Most Tajik people are Shias, but several Sufi orders are also present.

In 1999 the China Islamic Association of China reported that China had 30,000 mosques (refurbished and reopened since the Cultural Revolution), 30,000 imams, and 30,000 mullahs. The Association oversees the Institute of Islamic Theology.

China Islamic Association
No. 103 Nan Hen Xi Street
Xuan Wu District
Beijing 100053
China

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Islam.

References

- Gladney, Dru C. Muslim Chinese: Ethnic Nationalism in the People's Republic. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Council on East Asian Studies, 1991, 1996.
- Rahnan, Yusuf Abdul. "Islam in China." Islam and Muslims in China. <http://www.islamawareness.net/Asia/China/>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Chinese Buddhist Association

The Chinese Buddhist Association (CBA) is not a religious denomination but a para-governmental association that includes clergy and laypersons. It claims to represent the interests of all Buddhist practitioners in the People's Republic of China (PRC). The Association is present at national and local levels, with headquarters usually located in one of the main temples in each provincial capital.

During the early decades of the 20th century, Chinese Buddhists made a few attempts at establishing a national association, mainly in response to the threats to monastic property. Among other organizations, a Chinese Buddhist Association saw the light in 1929, when delegates from 17 provinces convened in Shanghai. Although the Association was open to lay membership, the clergy were firmly in control. Altogether, there were eight national conferences, until the Association was brought under the control of the Nationalist Party and government. In 1937, after the Japanese attack on China, it became almost completely inactive.

In 1945, the Venerable Taixu (aka T'ai Hsu, 1890–1947), an important figure within modern institutional Buddhism in China, was appointed the head of the Committee for the Reorganization of Chinese Buddhism. During a general meeting of the Committee in 1947, a new Chinese Buddhist Association emerged. Soon after the Communist victory in 1949, there were various attempts at resurrecting the CBA. After a few years of political skirmishes, an inaugural meeting of the new Association was held in Beijing in 1953. Its primary goal was to serve as an intermediary between the Buddhists and the government. The famous lay Buddhist Zhao Puchu (1907–2000) was secretary-general during all the life of the organization. Its official organ was the magazine Modern Buddhism. An important feature of the CBA of this period was that it did not have ordinary membership. In 1966, as the Cultural Revolution began, the organization ceased all its activities again.

The Panchen Lama (right) presents a hada or white ceremonial silk scarf to Zhao Puchu, chairman of China's Buddhist Association, during their meeting in Beijing on November 22, 1996. (AP/Wide World Images)

Institutional Buddhist activities finally resumed after 1978. In 1980 a national CBA congress was held in Beijing. The Association was essentially a reincarnation of the one that had ceased to operate in 1966. The chairman Zhao Puchu and other senior figures had retained their former posts. The leaders of the CBA announced a program for the restoration of Buddhism in the PRC, which was endorsed by the party and reported in the media. The official organ changed its name to Dharma Voice. Since the end of the 1980s, the CBA seems to have engaged mainly in temple administration and cultural and educational activities, keeping a generally low profile with regard to politics. However, many officers are appointed by the government, with no regard for their understanding of Buddhist practice and doctrine. A report published in 1982 listed five major tasks of the national CBA: to help the government to implement the policy of freedom of religious belief; to train monks and nuns; to produce and circulate Buddhist scriptures and other publications; to foster Buddhist research; and to promote exchanges with Buddhists from various countries.

In the new century, under its president Most Venerable Shi Yie Chang, the Association has shown increased activity and government favor. With government support, it organized the World Buddhist Forum in 2006, the first major international Buddhist conference in China since the founding of the People's Republic of China, with a follow-up conference in 2009. Some observers have suggested that a subtle policy change is taking place within Chinese government circles toward the favoring of Buddhism above other religions.

Chinese Buddhist Association
No. 25 Fu Nei Street
Xi Shi Section
Beijing
100034
People's Republic of China

Francesca Tarocco

See also: Pure Land Buddhism.

References

- MacInnis, Donald E. Religion in China Today. New York: Orbis Books, 1989.
- Welch, Holmes. The Buddhist Revival in China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.
- Yang, Genggang. "Religious Trends in China and Their Social Implications." Freeman Report (Freeman Chair in China Studies/Center for Strategic and International Studies), March 2009: 1–3.

Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association

During the Yuan dynasty (1260–1368 CE), the Mongol Empire included not only all of China but extended eastward to include parts of Europe. Thus China was brought in contact with Western Christianity. Through Marco Polo, Kublai Khan (ca. 1216–1294) invited Western religious and scientific teachers into his land. In 1289, the pope sent the Franciscan John of Monte Corvino (1247–1328) to China, where he was welcomed by the court. He settled, translated the Bible, and built a church of some 6,000 members. He also ran into conflict with the leadership of the Nestorian Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, which had previously established a widespread presence in China. The work prospered until the fall of the Mongols, when all the Catholics were expelled.

Catholicism reentered in the 16th century, after the Portuguese established a trading relationship with the Chinese in 1517, but missionaries were limited to Macao. A breakthrough came only in 1574 with the arrival of the Jesuits, who first attempted to build a de-Westernized church. Under the Jesuits and other orders the church made modest gains. The Jesuits also initiated a policy of purchasing land and creating close-knit self-sustaining communities, in which their converts were encouraged to settle. What had originally been an innovative theological approach to Chinese culture became over the centuries a conservative form of Catholicism that was largely isolated from the intellectual currents of the 19th and 20th centuries, both

Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association cathedral, Beijing, China. The Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association is the only organizational body of Catholics officially recognized by the government of the People's Republic of China. (J. Gordon Melton)

Chinese and Western. By the mid-19th century the church had a quarter of a million members. The numbers had almost tripled by the end of the century.

During the Chinese revolution, the Catholic Church supported the nationalists led by Chiang Kai-Shek, rather than the Chinese Communist Party. No attempt was made to accommodate to the new government when the war ended in 1949. Because of their obstinacy, Roman Catholics became targets for persecution, and the church was severely repressed. The move to find a more supportive leadership led the government to establish the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association in 1957. This new organization acknowledged the spiritual authority of the pope but denied his power to directly interfere with the church in China. Most important, the new Association claimed the right to consecrate bishops without Vatican approval. Although many Chinese Catholics adhered to the Association, the pope condemned it as schismatic.

During the Cultural Revolution, the churches were closed, and many buildings were confiscated for other uses. Some priests were arrested, and others forced to marry. A number of loyal Roman Catholics were killed. Both the Roman Catholic Church (sub rosa) and the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association (CCPA) revived in 1979, when open religious activities were again allowed in China. However, the church faced a severe shortage of priests. The church was also still attached to pre-Second Vatican Council structures, especially the Latin Mass. The vernacular Mass was introduced in the 1990s.

In the wake of the revival of the CCPA, two additional organizations, the National Administrative Council of the Catholic Church in China and the Chinese Bishops College, were created. Together, these three organizations represent the concerns of Catholics to the government. In the meantime, bishops loyal to Rome created a structure that they hoped would allow the Roman Catholic Church to continue. Their actions have challenged the authority of the CCPA. The pope showed his support on October 1, 2000, by canonizing 120 Chinese martyrs on a national Chinese holiday. His actions were denounced by the Chinese government and the CCPA. Since that time, several of the loyal Chinese Roman Catholic bishops have been arrested.

In 1995, the Bishops' Conference of the CCPA issued its first pastoral letter, on the status and role of women. It was issued just before the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing; it called for the union of the Chinese people in the implementation of "China's Platform for the Development of Women" as formulated by the government.

The Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association has approximately five million adherents. It is currently led by Joseph Li Shan (b. 1965), who succeeded Bishop Fu Tieshan (1931–2007). An estimated five million Catholics remain loyal to the pope.

Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association
No. 14 Niou Yin Street
Xi Chen District
Beijing

100009
People's Republic of China

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Jesuits; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Zhufeng, Luo, ed. Religion under Socialism in China. Trans. by Donald E. MacInnis and Zheng Xi'an. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991.

Chinese Daoist Association

The Chinese Daoist Association (CDA) is the government organization that regulates Daoism in the People's Republic of China (PRC). Based in Beijing's Baiyunguan District, the CDA was founded in 1932, then refounded under the auspices of the PRC in 1957. After the antireligious fervor of the Cultural Revolution had subsided, the new directives on culture handed down from the paramount leader Deng Xiaoping resulted in the reestablishment of the CDA in 1979 as well as the establishment of regional counterparts in various states and provinces. The CDA publishes a journal and sponsors conferences to serve scholars as well as Daoists themselves.

The CDA is subject to directives from the government's Bureau of Religious Affairs, which in turn bows to the Department of Propaganda and the Cultural Planning Committee. Also, as many Daoist sites in China are tourist attractions, the Daoist leadership must deal with Tourism Bureaus. (Note that the Chinese state has always attempted to exercise control over Daoism. See the general article on Daoism for more details.)

As of early 2001, the director of the Chinese Daoist Association was Min Zhiting, a practicing Daoist, originally from Qingcheng Mountain in Sichuan. The director of the standing committee is Yuan Zhihong, a bureaucrat whose job it is to see that Daoism operates within the limits set by the Chinese government.

Chinese Daoist Association
White Cloud Temple
Xi Bian Men Wai
Xuanwu District, Beijing
100045
People's Republic of China

Elijah Siegler

See also: Daoism.

Reference

- Pas, Julian F. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1998.

Chinese New Year

See Chinese New Year's Day; New Year's Day.

Chinese New Year's Day

Chinese New Year's is annually the most celebrated festival of the Chinese people. It begins on the first day of the Chinese lunar calendar, following a week of preparation. Celebrated usually in early February, it is a time of hope, welcoming the beginning of good weather with the spring season and a better year than the one left behind. A rich heritage of stories, art, and rituals has assembled itself around this holiday.

The celebration of the turning of the year, with offerings of thanks for the past year and invoking favorable events in the new, can be traced to the early years of the Western Zhou dynasty (1046–771 BCE) in China. With the adoption of the taichu calendar during the Han dynasty (475–221 BCE), the first day of the year on the new calendar became a date unifying a variety of celebrations that had been held with similar purpose on a variety of dates within the territory united under Han rule. The conflating of a variety of activities done to celebrate, worship, and sacrifice, the holiday grew in significance decade by decade. By the Tang dynasty, the exploding of fireworks, drinking of wine, and staying up all night with lanterns became identified with the day. As the entertainment aspect developed, lion dancing, dragon dancing, storytelling drama, flowers, and music were all integrated into the festivities. The temple of the god of the city became one of the popular stops on a round of holiday activities.

Worshippers celebrate the Lunar New Year during a parade on February 21, 2010 in New York City.

With many local variations, rituals for the day include veneration with sacrifice to the deities, veneration of ancestors, visits with the extended family, and the writing of chun lian (poetic couplets with brief hopeful and uplifting messages). Activities may start a week before New Year's Day and continue for up to two weeks afterward, depending upon one's circumstances, including one's ability to take off work.

During the last weeks of the old year, homemakers begin spring cleaning and pay attention to the kitchen god, who will on the 23rd day of the 12th lunar month leave for his annual visit with and report to the jade emperor, the head of the Daoist pantheon. On that day, the Preliminary Festival for the New Year, the family will offer their veneration to the kitchen god with grass and water for the horse on which he will travel and a sticky sweet (honey, sticky rice, etc.) so he will be unable to speak badly about the family. After he departs, the family will get serious about decorations and food for New Year's. The doors will be stuffed with red papers picturing door gods to keep out spirits that would bring bad luck, and all will begin to settle any outstanding debts.

Shortly before New Year's Day, people who live away from their family home will return to it, most often leaving the city for the site of their rural upbringing. On New Year's Eve they may stay up all night celebrating, reminiscing about the past year as they prepare to leave it behind, and wishing each other a good life in the new year approaching. They will begin to make offerings to the deities at the home altar and to the family's honored ancestors and exchange gifts. As the dawn approaches, the paper seals on the doors are removed, and the house is now opened to receive all the auspicious forces that might enter to influence the new year. Firecrackers will be heard throughout the town, though the streets are deserted.

New Year's Day itself is for eating, visiting with friends and neighbors, and enjoying the wealth of entertainment available through the day. The day is often punctuated with the acknowledgment of traditional culture; the temple ceremonies of traditional religion acknowledge the gods of the Daoist pantheon in all their local uniqueness, usually by the burning of incense.

Flowers are an important part of the New Year's celebrations and the narcissus the most favored. One story tells of a widow who had only a small plot of land to farm. In spite of her poverty, she showed kindness to a beggar, and gave him the last of her food. He saw her crying and discovered that she had nothing to feed her family for supper. The beggar then ran out of the house and across her land to a nearby pond. He jumped in and disappeared. As she searched for his body, flowers began to grow on her land. As they blossomed, people began to arrive to purchase them, beautiful narcissi. From that time on, the widow was able to make a comfortable living, and the narcissus became the preferred flower for the New Year's celebrations.

New Year festivities will certainly spill over into the next day or two, as people slowly return to the city and their jobs. However, celebrations and visits with family and friends will continue as long as possible. The holiday spirit will continue until the Lantern Festival begins two weeks later.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Chinese New Year's Day (Preliminary Festival); Daoism; Lantern Festival; New Year's Day.

References

- Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Chinese New Year's Day (Preliminary Festival)

The Chinese New Year, whose festivities are held the first week of the Chinese lunar calendar, is possibly the most celebrated event in the year both in China and among people of Chinese heritage worldwide. Much less well known, especially outside the Chinese community, is the Preliminary Festival or Small New Year held a week before in preparation for New Year's. This Preliminary Festival occurs on the 23rd day of the 12th lunar month, usually around the end of January on the Common Era calendar.

The Preliminary Festival is centered on one of the more famous Daoist deities, the kitchen god. The Daoist pantheon is headed by the jade emperor, who annually dispatches the kitchen god from heaven to keep an eye on the family and report back on the family's activities. On the basis of the kitchen god's report, the jade emperor will dispense good or evil to the members of the family in the coming year. The kitchen god leaves the home to report to the jade emperor on the 23rd day of the 12th month. He is often pictured with a wife, and with as many as seven children.

At the end of the 1950s, the government of the People's Republic of China attempted to stop the worship of the kitchen god, and actively suppressed it, but following the Cultural Revolution, it has slowly made a comeback. The god remained popular in Taiwan and within the diaspora communities.

Traditionally, the family has a porcelain statue or at least a picture of the kitchen god in the room where food is prepared. On the appointed day, the kitchen is cleaned and the statue of the kitchen god washed. The god will then be presented with an offering of water, grass, and sweets. The water and grass is for the horse the god rides; the sweets (sugar syrup, sticky rice, honey, etc.) have a more sinister purpose—to make the god's teeth stick together so he is unable to utter anything negative about the family to the jade emperor. (Some suggest the sweets are to be thought of more as a bribe, or to make the god's mouth so sweet that he would not think of speaking negatively.) Then a picture of the kitchen god is burned, a symbol of his journey upward. A new picture will be put up on New Year's Day, a week later, symbolic of his return from heaven.

The kitchen god's name is Zao Jun (Stove Master). Numerous stories are told of him, most involving accounts of his mortal life and an event that led to his becoming the kitchen god. One such story tells of Zao Jun as a farmer. One year, when crops failed, he had to sell his wife to pay the bills. Even with that, he wound up as a servant in the home of his wife's new husband. The wife secretly baked some buns into which she had placed coins. Rather than eating the buns, he sold them. When he discovered what he had done, he killed himself. The gods took pity on him and gave him the job of kitchen god. After his wife's death, he was later reunited with her.

As the preliminary festival approaches, family members will be on their best behavior, and regular veneration of the kitchen god, usually in the form of burning incense, will occur. After his departure for heaven, the doorway may be adorned with door gods to keep away evil spirits and influences. People will also write well-wishes on strips of red paper and post these in the entrance way to their home or business. The red color is both lucky and potent in frightening off Nian, the New Year monster, who can make an appearance to destroy crops and disturb homes.

Among the most substantive activities for the week of preparation is the settling of debts before the New Year begins. With the kitchen god fully placated and sent off to heaven and all the preparations in place, however, the family is ready for the imminent big celebration, Chinese New Year's Day.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese New Year's Day; New Year's Day.

References

- Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.
- "New Year Kitchen God." <http://www.chinafestival.com/kitchen-god.html>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council

After the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) launched a political campaign to transform China into a Socialist society that took a pro-Soviet and anti-Western political stance. Other than a few indigenous Christian groups, most of the Protestant churches in China were mainly composed of denominations heavily linked with Western counterparts and foreign support. Therefore the Protestant community was under intense government pressure to convert into a politically acceptable organization. In September 1950, some Christian leaders, headed by YMCA lay staff Wu Yaozong (1893–1979), who was well known for his pro-Communist views, advocated a pro-Communist declaration entitled "The Direction Which the Protestant Church in China Should Strive At in New China." This declaration called for both the independence of the Chinese church from its Western parental denomination/mission groups and the education of Christians on the crimes committed by the imperialistic missionaries in China.

The term "Three-Self" (self-administered, self-supporting, and self-propagating) was introduced as a guiding principle for the independence of the Chinese church from the West. At the outbreak of the Korean War in April 1951, Christian leaders—guided by the government—formed a national organization called the Chinese Protestant Church Anti-America, Aid-Korea Three-Self Reform Movement Committee. This national committee, headed by Wu Yaozong, established branches all over China to prepare for the First Chinese Protestant Church National Conference, attended by 230 delegates and held from July to August 1954 in Beijing. This conference established the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee, with Wu Yaozong as chairman. The committee passed the resolution to (1) lead the Protestant church in China to operate under the Three-Self principle, (2) merge the different denominations into one church body, (3) support the government to build a Socialist China, and (4) promote patriotic education among Christians to root out the poisons of imperialism in the church.

Membership in the Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee (TSPM), as the new organization was called, was restricted to those who had secured party approval by enthusiastic support for the new regime. Many were "progressive" Christians who sympathized with the CCP's objectives of social reform and national independence; some were conservative church leaders who decided to cooperate with the new regime; others were underground party personnel who had infiltrated into Christian circles. The most active and politically reliable members were selected to form the Standing Committee of the TSPM, led by Wu Yaozong and based in Shanghai. Soon the TSPM established regional chapters and published the only national Protestant magazine, Tien Feng (Celestial Wind). Although TSPM was technically not an ecclesiastical, but rather a lay political organization, it functioned as the government-endorsed organ that effectively ruled over the Protestant population in China. All denominational structures and the old National Christian Council were abolished by the TSPM, and churches were merged. Those who refused to cooperate with the TSPM were punished as antirevolutionary by the secular judiciary apparatus.

The Second Chinese Protestant National Conference was held in Shanghai from November 1960 until January 1961 with 319 delegates. Wu Yaozong was again elected as the chairman, and Bishop Ding Guangxun (K. H. Ting) (b. 1915) was elected as one of the seven vice chairmen. This conference revised the constitution of the TSPM to define it as a patriotic anti-imperialist political organization under the leadership of the CCP and the government. Among its missions were (1) to oppose the American occupation of Taiwan and the conspiracy of the Two-China Policy, (2) to guide Christians to follow the CCP's leadership, (3) to strengthen the political education within the Christian circles, and (4) to give priority to the government's policy of putting production over the needs of religious activity. The TSPM ceased to function from 1966 until 1980 due to the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution.

The Third Chinese Protestant National Conference was held in 1980 in Nanjing with 176 delegates. It amended the TSPM constitution and established a new organization: the China Christian Council (CCC). The amendments affirmed the political mission of TSPM as the agent that implemented the political policy of the party among the Protestants, reflected new national political objectives such as the Modernization program, and confirmed the newly formed CCC as a parallel organization that would carry the pastoral duty of the church. The constitution of the CCC defined this new organization as the ecclesial body that has authority over the pastoral ministries of the church. In effect, the CCC later organized pastoral ministries such as printing of the Bible, establishing of seminaries and Bible schools, drafting church polity, and organizing ordinations and consecrations. CCC, like TSPM, established regional and local branches. Both TSPM and CCC are under the authority of the China Protestant Representative Conference. Bishop Ding Guangxun was both the chairman of TSPM and the president of CCC from 1980 until he retired in 1996. He has since retained honorary positions in both organizations.

The relationship between the national TSPM/CCC and regional TSPM/CCCs is one of providing political and ecclesiastical guidance. A regional TSPM/CCC may enjoy a certain degree of autonomy, depending on its relationship with its local government. The regional (provincial and municipal) and local (county and village) branches of the TSPM/CCC run the daily local ecclesiastical affairs. Technically speaking the TSPM is a lay political group, which deals with political matters between the government and the church, while the CCC concentrates on pastoral and religious issues within the church community. In reality, in most places there is little difference between their functions at the local level, for very often it is the same group of church leaders who hold office in both organizations.

In 1993, the World Council of Churches formally accepted the China Christian Council as a full member to represent the Protestant church in China. In 1994, the government passed a national ordinance stating that all religious groups have to register with the government through the recognized religious organization. Therefore, all Protestant communities in China have to join TSPM/CCC in order to legally exist. Many Protestant groups have refused to join and are operating illegally in China. Some of the leadership of the TSPM/CCC, in 2007, suggested that there are at least 18 million Christians, more than 20,000 clergy, at least 40,000 churches/meeting points, a printing press, and 20 seminaries and Bible schools under its jurisdiction. It also recognized that there are Protestants who have refused to join TSPM/CCC. Other sources have suggested that the non-TSPM/CCC faction might have a population as large as, if not larger than, the TSPM/

CCC group. Currently the Presbyterian Fu Xianwei is the chairperson of the National TSPM and Reverend Gao Feng is the president of CCC.

China Christian Council
Jiujiang Road
Shanghai
200002
People's Republic of China

Kim-Kwong Chan

See also: World Council of Churches.

Resources:

- Directorate of the Policy and Regulation of the State Administration of Religious Affairs. Source Materials on China's Religious Organizations.* Vol. 1. Beijing: China Social Press, 1993. (in Chinese)
- Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- MacInnis, Donald E., and Zheng Xi'an. Religion under Socialism in China. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1991. www.chinesechristianity.org.

◆ Chinese Religions

China is the oldest continuous civilization on Earth (imagine if Greece and Rome had never fallen), and religion is at its heart. The very first Chinese dynasties, long thought of as legendary, are now being confirmed as historical. (Archaeology in China is in its infancy compared to that in Egypt, for example, and new finds are periodically putting the earliest dates of Chinese civilization farther and farther into the past.)

The concept of "China" itself began with the first emperor, Qin Shi Huangdi, who in 221 BCE conquered several smaller kingdoms to form a unified state. The new empire was called Zhongguo, the Middle Kingdom, still the Chinese name for China, which conveys its geographic and cosmic centrality. It was also referred to as Tian Xia, Under Heaven, which shows, perhaps, that Chinese self-conception was fundamentally religious.

Visit any Chinese temple in Hong Kong, Taiwan, Southeast Asia, or any Chinese community anywhere in the world. Observe the religious activities, the attitudes and organizational structures. The temple may be called Daoist or Buddhist, or be named after any of a plenitude of divinities. What you are witnessing is Chinese religion in action. Chinese religion is the religion of the Chinese people. It is different from both Daoism and Confucianism, although it incorporates elements of both and has influenced both.

China has seen virtually every major religion practiced in its borders. Indeed, the capital of China during the Tang dynasty (618–907) was at the time the largest city in the world and quite possibly as religiously diverse as New York City is today. Zoroastrians, Nestorian Christians, Manicheans, different kinds of Muslims, and Buddhists all lived together in relative harmony under the authority of the emperor. Later, the Chinese were exposed to Jews, Catholics, and Protestants. But all these religions, with the exception of Buddhism, remained foreign, and did not become part of Chinese religion properly so called, the subject of this article.

Chinese religion is not a specific religion in the Western sense, with an articulate doctrine and confession of faith. Rather, it is a worldview that encompasses the rhythm of agricultural cycles, the primacy of the family, and the idea of China itself. In Chinese discourse, the idea of religion is often placed under the larger category of traditional culture.

The Earliest Dynasties: Divination, Sacrifice, and Ancestor Worship

China's first three dynasties, the Xia, the Shang, and the Zhou, in many ways laid the foundation for Chinese religion, practice, and worldview for the next two millennia. The Xia dynasty was the time of legendary culture heroes. Fu Xi first established the family unit and bred animals; Shen Nong invented agriculture; Huang Di, the Yellow Emperor, created medicine. There is not yet any archaeological evidence confirming the existence of the Xia.

There is evidence that the Shang dynasty was founded around 1600 BCE in the present-day Yellow River Valley provinces. The Shang dynasty was a theocracy based not on military might but on religion and ritual. The ruler was a priest-king who had power to communicate with the high god Di. Like many other civilizations around the world, the Shang dynasty engaged in human and animal sacrifice, which was a form of transaction. Deities were offered goods in hopes of obtaining immediate or long-range benefits. Official sacrifices included meat, grain, and wine. Important people were buried with texts, food, jewels, and human figures. Today, sacrifices are part of all temple services and usually consist of fruit, foodstuffs, and incense.

A traditional Chinese temple, Jakarta, Indonesia. Chinese religions and philosophies have become influential worldwide. (J. Gordon Melton)

Another hallmark of Chinese religion from pre-history until today is divination. Definite evidence from the Late Shang shows that rulers used scapulomancy, that is, reading cracks on bones or turtle shells to predict the future. When the Zhou overthrew the Shang, besides ending the practice of human sacrifice, the Zhou kings introduced a new form of divination. By randomly picking from a pile a number of stalks of the milfoil plant, the diviner would generate odd or even numbers, which when repeated several times, would turn into a series of broken or unbroken lines. A diagram of six lines made up a hexagram. The text that interpreted the meaning of the 64 possible hexagrams was called the Yijing (more commonly known in the West as the I Ching; the Book of Changes). This Zhou dynasty classic also marked a shift from seeing the forces believed to control divination anthropomorphically to seeing them as impersonal forces and from assuming a relationship of interdependence with deities to questioning the nature of that relationship.

The Yijing is a moral and metaphysical text that links human action to cosmic cycles. It sees the universe as continuously changing and perpetually active. It has probably been the most used book in China (perhaps even the world), consulted by emperors, fortune-tellers, and common folk alike. It was appropriated by Confucians, Daoists, and Buddhists but predates all these traditions. In more modern times, the Yijing has become popular in the West as part of the counter-culture. In China today, using the Yijing (but not studying it academically) is technically illegal, though prevalent. Mao Zedong himself is said to have used it to plot military strategy.

Related to divination and sacrifice is ancestor worship. Ancestors were asked about which sacrifice was appropriate, and they were also asked to predict the future. Gods were asked too, but through the ancestors as intermediaries. Ancestor worship is the true bedrock of belief in China. Evidence of such devotion can be found in the burial practice of Neolithic times. The more archaeological evidence has been uncovered, the more support has been found for the hypothesis that the ancestral cult is one of the few constants of Chinese civilization from earliest times to the present. Ancestor worship is a demonstration of the mutual dependency between the living and the dead. The dead have more power than when alive, but need supplies and sacrifice; the living need protection.

There is no concept of the immortal soul in Chinese religion. So what then is worshipped in ancestor worship? Traditional Chinese religion holds that humans have several kinds of souls (or energies) that constellate together to form a human. The po souls are physical energies that disperse back to the Earth. The hun souls are the mental energies, which can be stored in ancestral tablets and remain part of the family lineage.

Around 1050 BCE the Zhou tribe conquered the Shang kingdom from the west and set up the Zhou dynasty. Their sacrificial rites were conducted by a young descendant of the royal family, who acted as a kind of medium, or shaman (the Chinese word is wu). Men or women could be possessed by spirits or deities, or send their souls on journeys. In ritual settings, shamans could heal and could also consult with the ancestors. Emperors used them right up until their suppression in the 11th century. In fact, many Chinese religions have their origins in mediumistic revelations, from the Heavenly Master Daoists of the third century CE to the quasi-Christian Taiping Rebellion in the 19th century. Several spirit-writing cults active in Hong Kong today are equally based on revelations from shamanic figures.

The Early Confucian Tradition The Warring States period (403–221 BCE) of the eastern Zhou dynasty (770–221) was a time of social disorder and political disunity. The Zhou king had little real power; rival states jostled for power. The Warring States was also China's richest era in religious and philosophical doctrine. Counselors for hire went from court to court promoting their own political philosophy and denigrating their rivals. This era has traditionally been referred to as the Hundred Schools period (551–233). The schools included logicians, hedonists, advocates of universal love, and cynical statesmen. Sunzi, the military strategist who wrote The Art of War, dates from that period as well. The two religious-philosophical systems of this period that survive down to the modern day are those of the philosophical Daoists, as they are often referred to, and the Confucians. The philosophical Daoists are covered in the article on Daoism.

The Confucian tradition has shaped the ethical and ritual norms of China for more than two millennia. Its founder, Master K'ung (551–479) or Kongzi, better known by his Latinized name, Confucius, often serves as the emblem of Chinese religion and civilization. Confucius was a petty official in the state of Lu from an impoverished noble family. He became a teacher whose students wrote down his teachings. About 100 years after his death, Confucius's sayings were compiled into a book of 497 verses in 20 chapters known as the Lunyu, or in English, the Analects.

Confucius spoke of certain virtues that all humans can and should cultivate. These include shu (reciprocity), chung (loyalty), li (ritual propriety or decorum), ren (human-heartedness, humanity, or benevolence), and xiao (filial piety). To practice these virtues means to become a gentleman, the Confucian ideal. Being a gentleman is not a result of mere birth or social position; it is rather a matter of character. These virtues can be taught, thus the importance the Confucian tradition has always placed on pedagogy. The idea of virtue being a matter of character and education, not noble birth, was revolutionary at the time, and constitutes the biggest contribution Confucius made to world civilization.

Note too that all Confucian virtues are based on relationships and action. He advocated morality of and in human relationships. Wholly absent from Confucianism are such Western solitary virtues as innocence and purity. In Confucianism, and in the Chinese religious worldview in general, there is no distinction between secular and sacred. All life becomes a holy ritual, man a holy utensil. Unlike Christianity or Buddhism, the original teachings of Confucianism posit no inner life and no special relationship between man and God.

The two most important Confucian thinkers after Confucius himself were Mengzi and Xunzi. Mengzi (Latinized to Mencius) (372–289 BCE) believed in the natural human potential for goodness, most notably expressed in his story about how any human being would respond, seeing a baby fall into a well. The most natural, automatic response is to rescue the baby. Mencius taught the natural equality of all things and the immanence of a benevolent divine power referred to as heaven. He fleshed out and standardized many of the ideas of the Analects, and in many ways he is more important than Confucius is.

Xunzi (or Sun-tzu; 310–220 BCE) was generally more pessimistic. He saw human nature as fundamentally evil. Only with education can man learn to restrain his impulses. He was also known for his rational agnosticism, denying any kind of active heavenly principle. From the Sung dynasty on, Xunzi was not as popular as Mencius.

Chinese Cosmology—Yin and Yang and the Five Agents The Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) saw the rise of religious Daoism, as well as the arrival of Buddhism from India via Central Asia. The Han also saw the development of a synthetic cosmology, a grand philosophy for a grand empire, which influenced all aspects of Chinese life from then on, from philosophy to medicine to architecture.

The most important element incorporated into Han cosmology was the theory of yin and yang. Originally referring to the shady (yin) and sunny (yang) sides of a mountain, for the Zhou dynasty yin and yang were the metaphysical building blocks, symbolizing a fundamental polarity that manifests in many ways: dark and light, passive and active, female and male, Earth and heaven. Yin and yang are not moral qualities: they do not refer to good and evil. Nor should they be construed as opposites: yin and yang exist in dynamic tension with each other, each containing the essence of the other and each becoming the other.

The other consistently important metaphysical principle is the composition of the universe from the five agents (wu xing). These are water, fire, wood, metal, and earth. They are emphatically not the equivalent of the four elements of Greek cosmology: water, fire, earth, and air. The five agents are not essences, but phases that all things pass through. They were used to explain the succession of dynasties, the astronomical procession, and indeed all processes of growth and change.

Buddhism in China Buddhism was the first portable faith; it was not tied to any particular people or location. Thus it became the first world religion. It arrived in China from India through the trade routes of Central Asia. The meeting between China and Buddhism was one of the great cultural encounters in world history. Both were changed significantly.

Buddhism first entered China in the first century CE. At first, it was regarded as a sect of Daoism (one Daoist scripture told of the legendary founder of Daoism, Laozi [Lao Tzu], going to India and teaching the Buddha). Soon, however, a deeper understanding of Buddhism was developed, promoted by translations of the sutras, the holy texts of Buddhism, into Chinese.

The late Han dynasty, disintegrating and decadent, was ready for Buddhism. Still, there were huge differences to be overcome. The Chinese and Indian civilizations were opposite in many ways. Their languages, including grammar, alphabet, and use of metaphor, were completely different. Their worldviews were similarly opposed. Chinese philosophy posited the existence of the universe and left it at that. Religious debate in China centered on the definition of the good life and questions of family and society. Its cosmology was finite. Indian philosophy was more cosmic, inquiring into the origins of the world. It cared more about an afterlife and salvation.

Also Chinese religion was and is non-psychological, with little analysis of individual personality. Buddhism involves and has always involved a sophisticated psychological analysis. Monasticism, one of the foundations of Buddhism, included many extremely un-Chinese practices, such as cutting off hair and burning of corpses. Worst of all though, from the Chinese perspective, becoming a monk meant leaving one's family, renouncing one's name, and not bearing children. Buddhism justified monasticism by making the sangha (the community of monks) into a kind of family. Daoism adopted a quasi-Buddhist style of monasticism only in the 12th century (Quanzhen Daoism).

In Chinese temples, food is offered to the deities as incense smoke fills the air. (J. Gordon Melton)

These differences were the source of Buddhism's appeal as well. Buddhism addressed questions of suffering, death, salvation, and the afterlife that Chinese religion had heretofore ignored. The monkhood promoted social equality; sources show that the monasteries were filled by people from all segments of society:

from ethnic minorities, to officials, to farmers. For Chinese women, Buddhism provided (as it still does) a way out of patriarchal Chinese society.

Buddhist monasteries flourished or shut down depending on state policy and imperial whim. To cite one notable example: in 845 the emperor, looking for immortality from the Daoists, decided to persecute the Buddhists. Records show that a quarter of a million monks and nuns were returned to lay life (out of a population at the time of 60 million). Five thousand monasteries were demolished or converted to other purposes. Monastic Buddhism never recovered. More popular sects flourished, notably Chan, the meditation tradition, which in Japan is known as Zen Buddhism, and Pure Land Buddhism, the devotional school, which posits that anyone can be reborn in Paradise. These sects continue to exist in China.

Although the previous paragraphs have dealt with Mahayana Buddhism, China has known all three main branches of Buddhism. Theravada Buddhism has had a presence in China, though it now only exists in Southwest China's Yunnan Province, among ethnic minorities related to the Thai and Burmese. Vajrayana, or Tibetan Buddhism, is of course the religion of the Tibetan people, and has been the religion of choice of Mongols, Manchus, and even Han.

Literati and Neo-Confucianism as Religion The continuity of Chinese religion is unthinkable without the classics of the literati, a series of books that formed the basis of classical education from the Han dynasty until the early 20th century. This canon is somewhat analogous to the Bible, in that it was studied, memorized, and commented on by the elite of Chinese society.

The Five Classics (Wu Jing) consists of Zhou dynasty texts, all of which were said to be edited by Confucius. They include the Book of History, the Book of Changes, the Book of Songs, the Spring and Autumn Annals (another history), and the Book of Rites.

Neo-Confucianism was an attempt to revitalize Confucianism through increasing its focus on social reform, and personal improvement. It developed during the Sung dynasty, after the Confucian tradition had for several hundred years been eclipsed by Buddhism and Daoism.

Neo-Confucians promoted the Four Books (Se Shu) to canonical status. These are the Analects of Confucius, the Book of Mencius, and two short chapters extracted from the Book of Rites, dealing with self-cultivation: the Great Learning and the Doctrine of the Mean. These texts became the basis of the civil service exams for the next 700 years.

The Four Books were edited and commented on by the most important neo-Confucian, Zhu Xi (Chu Hsi; 1130–1200). His thought has been called the crowning achievement of the Sung, and his influence has been felt not only in China but also in Japan and Korea. Zhu Xi believed all phenomena were made up of principle or pattern (li) and material force (qi). He advocated self-cultivation through an external “investigation of things.” Wang Yangming (1472–1529) challenged Zhu Xi's metaphysics and program of self-cultivation. Both agreed on moral principles, and the ideal of sagehood, but Wang held that the mind was the source all things (like the idealist school of Western philosophy) and so objected to Zhu Xi's program of external study, which depended so much on books. Wang thought all universal principles were already present in everyone's mind (and so could not be known only by those who could afford to study). Therefore, even ordinary people could self-cultivate while working in the fields, for example.

Another prominent neo-Confucian philosopher came up with a systematic metaphysics (something the original Confucians were lacking) based on the Yijing. Everything was made up of yin and yang, but prior to that was the Supreme Ultimate, or Taiji, represented visually by the famous diagram of swirls of light and dark forming a circle, each swirl with a dot of the opposite color. This represents the undifferentiated cosmos out of which all things arise. Erroneously known in the West as the “Tai Chi Symbol,” it can be found on everything from surfboards to tattoos.

Take taiji—the word and the concept—and add chuan, meaning fist, to get the name of the slow-moving martial art now taught all over the world, which is said to accelerate the embodiment of the powers of the cosmos within the human frame.

State Confucianism was overthrown in 1905, and the civil examinations emphasizing the four Confucian classics were abolished. Twentieth-century Chinese literati are often called “New Confucians.” Most of them left Mainland China and went to Hong Kong and Taiwan and often from there to the United States. New Confucians work toward advancing Confucianism as a Third Way for the development of modern Asian society, as an alternative to both Western market capitalism and Communism. They also are bringing their ancient philosophy into the global sphere, and proving it can coexist with democracy, environmentalism, and feminism. New Confucians are mainly university professors, though they have been called upon to make policy in Asian countries, particularly Singapore. The most prominent is Tu Wei-Ming, a professor at Harvard University.

When comparative religion departments were created in the 1960s and 1970s, courses in Chinese religion were generally taught by Chinese professors from the philosophy departments, who were themselves products of either secular or Christian education and came from a Confucian literati tradition. Thus the study of Chinese religion in North America for many years ignored Chinese religion—sometimes even proposing that “the Chinese don’t have a religion.” The Confucian bias was evident in the way Buddhism was minimized and Daoism ignored or reviled. Philosophy was studied at the expense of ritual. The fact is that, although from the time of Xunzi Confucian literati sometimes criticized the “superstition and mysticism” of other Chinese religions, Confucians have traditionally been as religious as any other Chinese. They engaged in divination, sacrifice, and ancestor worship as much as anyone in China. Neo-Confucians even had prayers for rain. In fact, neo-Confucianism shares many characteristics with Daoism and Buddhism. Neo-Confucians stress the importance of lineage; they dedicate temples to perform rites; they emphasize meditation traditions (in neo-Confucianism meditation is called “quiet sitting”).

Popular Religion During the Sung dynasty, popular religion often referred to as Chinese folk religion evolved into a tradition in its own right, something recognizable today. A pantheon of personified deities and household gods was worshipped in a plethora of local shrines. Popular religion became, in effect, the religion of everyone except clergy and literati. But much mutual influence existed between these spheres. In the 16th century, an explicitly syncretistic religion evolved, combining Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism. The founder was known as the “Master-of-the-Three-in-One.” There are still temples in Southeast Asian Chinese communities dedicated to this three-in-one religion.

The most important aspect of popular religion is the festival year, based on the lunar calendar. The most important festival marks of course the New Year, preparation for and celebration of which take several weeks, incorporating many religious traditions and rituals. There are also three different festivals during the year involving visits to ancestral tombs. Today, of course, many holidays are thoroughly secularized, involving no more than the consuming of special foods. Chinese funerals are huge events, complete with special clothes, various protocols for mourners based on degree of relatedness, continuing sacrifices (at domestic altars, gravesites, and clan ancestral halls), and eventually reburial.

Religion and Rebellion (Sectarianism) Often overlooked in Western discourse about Chinese religion is the fact that it is quite often political and even revolutionary in nature. The Han dynasty saw the Daoist sects of the Heavenly Masters and the Yellow Turbans try to bring about an ideal theocracy on earth.

Millenarian movements increased during the 16th and 17th centuries. These movements, whether inspired by Daoism or Buddhism, often worshipped goddesses, notably the Queen Mother of the West (Xiwangmu). Perhaps the most famous of such movements was actually Protestant-inspired: the Taiping rebellion. Hong Xiuquan (1814–1864) had visions inspired by a Christian tract given to him by a missionary. He saw himself as God’s younger son. Inspired by mediumistic trances, he raised an army and took over a good portion of China, burning temples wherever he went. He eventually set up a capital in Nanjing. In 1864 the imperial army, aided by foreign troops, put him down.

One of the most important of these “heterodox” groups is the White Lotus Society, which began during the southern Sung dynasty (1127–1279) and has spawned numerous sects ever since. These sects expect the coming of Mi-lo-fo (in Pali, Maitreya), the Buddha of the future, and their leaders have often claimed to be Maitreya himself, or at the least a ruler who will found a virtuous dynasty and thereby usher in a new age. These sects, of course, have always been persecuted by the government, which has driven them farther underground and often made them more popular.

These groups were known for their clinics, schools, and other social services, as well as for their married leadership. The White Lotus groups helped overthrow the Mongols and institute the Ming dynasty in 1368. The first Ming emperor then instituted a strict law against heterodoxy. Still, White Lotus groups were active up to the 19th century in North China. Also, they were the inspiration for early-20th-century millenarian groups, which, though combining elements of many religious groups, are in essence Maitreyist (for example, Tian Dao).

Religion in the PRC Today Freedom of religion is officially guaranteed by the Constitution of China; however, the government has the power to define what religion is. The five officially recognized religions in China are “Protestantism,” “Catholicism,” Daoism, Buddhism, and Islam. (The first two are in quotations because the Protestant Church of China is not affiliated with any denomination, and the Catholic Church is not affiliated with the Vatican. Catholics who remain loyal to Rome are often persecuted.)

Religious groups in China, like all other organizations, from opera troupes to universities to oil refineries, are controlled by a centralized bureaucracy, overseen by the Communist Party. Every religious denomination has an organization at the local, provincial, and national levels made up of councils of believers who are both lay and clergy, overseen by nonbelievers (Party members) responsible for instituting government regulations. Overseeing it all, also at all three levels, is the Bureau of Religious Affairs, made up of bureaucrats, academics, and social scientists specializing in religious studies.

Daoism and Buddhism are the two largest religions in China, but because neither is a membership religion, accurate membership counts are difficult to make (in fact, by some counts Islam is the largest religion in China). Buddhism seems to have a higher profile, perhaps because of its internationalism and growing popularity in the West. Even during the height of antireligious fervor during the Cultural Revolution (1965–1975), a few monasteries were kept open for show. Daoism is more parochial, with fewer international exchanges and contacts. Throughout the 20th century, it was more likely to be suppressed as a heterodox cult or as superstition.

Daoist and Buddhist monks must be over 18, unmarried, have parental approval, and have lived in a monastery for a two-year trial period. Some outside observers have claimed that Daoist and Buddhist monks today serve more as museum guards and ticket takers than as religious contemplatives. Unquestionably, China has developed monasteries as income-generating tourist attractions and outfitted previously inaccessible sacred mountains with cable cars, hotels, and karaoke bars.

Confucianism is not recognized as a religion in China but as a philosophy and method of pedagogy, although there are some ancestral temples that claim to enshrine the Kong family. After the 1949 revolution, Confucian ideals were attacked as examples of backward feudalism. Lately Confucius has been on a rebound as a moral exemplar, advanced by the government as a model of rectitude and selflessness, as part of their “rebuild spiritual civilization” campaign, an antidote to the corruption and materialism rampant in Chinese society today. In Taiwan, Confucius is a national hero, and his birthday is celebrated as a holiday. Confucianism is much more of a religion among Chinese communities in Southeast Asia.

An important current development is modern China is the rise of quasi-religious institutions. These are neither officially sanctioned religions, nor proscribed “evil cults” (such as Falun Gong, the Home Church, and the like). They include private charities, temple and lineage associations, nongovernmental organizations, and foreign businesses that surreptitiously promote religion (for example, Taiwanese-owned factories that include temples on their grounds at which workers are coerced to worship). Most qigong groups also fall in this quasi-religious category (as did Falun Gong before it was proscribed in 1999). So too do village or lineage festivals, which are officially called cultural or community events in order to maintain a legal status, although they may have very religious elements.

The most important quasi-religious movement in the PRC during the last half of the 20th century could be said to be Maoism. Chairman Mao Zedong (1893–1976) founded the People’s Republic of China on October 1, 1949. Especially during the years of the Cultural Revolution, religious energies and activities were channeled into the Mao cult. Quotations from Chairman Mao, making up the famous “little red book,” were memorized and recited in groups. Families would bow daily to a poster of Mao. The chairman wanted to be cremated, but after he died his body was put on display in the middle of Tiananmen Square in Beijing. More recently, he has become a domestic folk god, like Saint Christopher, his image adorning medallions hanging from rearview mirrors.

The power of religion should never be underestimated in Zhongguo Tian Xia, the Middle Kingdom under Heaven.

Elijah Siegler

See also: Agnosticism; Ancestors; Chinese Buddhist Association; Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association; Chinese New Year's Day (Preliminary Festival); Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/Chinese Christian Council; Confucianism; Confucius; Daoism; Falun Gong; Laozi; Mencius; Monasticism; Pure Land Buddhism; Quanzhen Daoism; Theravada Buddhism; Tian Dao; Zen Buddhism; Zoroastrianism.

References

- Ching, Julia. Chinese Religions. New York: Macmillan, 1993.
- Ching, Julia. "East Asian Religions." In World Religions: Eastern Traditions, edited by Willard G. Oxtoby. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- De Bary, William, ed. Sources of Chinese Tradition. 2nd ed. 2 vols. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Fowler, Jeanneane, and Merv Fowler. Chinese Religions: Beliefs and Practices. Sussex Library of Religious Beliefs and Practices. Eastbourne, East Sussex: Sussex Academic Press, 2008.
- Granet, Marcel. The Religion of the Chinese People. New York: Harper and Row, 1975.
- Lagerwey, John, and Marc Kalinowski. HdO: Early Chinese Religion: Shang Through Han (1250 BC–220 AD). Handbook of Oriental Studies, Section Four, China. Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 2009.
- Lopez, Donald, ed. Religions of China in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Miller, James, ed. Chinese Religions in Contemporary Societies. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2006.
- Paper, Jordan. The Spirits Are Drunk: Comparative Approaches to Chinese Religion. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Pas, Julian F. Turning of the Tide: Religion in China Today. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Poceski, Mario. Introducing Chinese Religions. London: Routledge, 2009.
- Thompson, Laurence G. Chinese Religion: An Introduction. 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1996.
- Yang, C. K. Religion in Chinese Society. Berkeley: University of California, 1961.
- Yao Xinzong. An Introduction to Confucianism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Chinul

1158–1210

Chinul was a prominent practitioner of Korean Son Buddhism (the Korean equivalent of Chan or Zen Buddhism) and reformer of the Korean Buddhist tradition. He was born into a somewhat privileged family that resided near the Korean capital Kaegyong (Kaesong), but was a sickly child who suffered from a chronic condition. His life was changed when his father offered Chinul to a Buddhist monk if the boy was healed. The monk healed him and Chinul, though a mere seven years old, was subsequently ordained. His training followed an atypical course. He was not placed in the care of a particular recognized teacher, though he did grow up in the small monastery in his hometown. Raised in a rich Buddhist environment, he was able to study broadly in many Buddhist writings that were made available to him. He also developed a broad perspective on the variant schools of Son meditation then practiced throughout the land.

Chinul was 42 when the need to take his examination occasioned his first trip to the capital. He was appalled by what he saw there, especially the worldly life led by many who considered themselves Buddhists. The experience led him to form a retreat society where practitioners could focus upon concentration and the acquisition of wisdom. He also abandoned his sedentary life and for almost a decade traveled widely throughout Korea, where he was able to study different monastic centers and further expand his comprehension of the tradition. This period became the occasion of important experiences that led him to a realization of the truth concerning the reality and experience of One Mind. His ever growing perspective that now combined theory with the practice of meditation would place him squarely in the tradition that affirmed the realization of enlightenment as a sudden and immediate awareness of what already is rather than a process of acquiring or attaining something new.

In 1190, Chinul formed a new retreat society on Kong Mountain and at the same time authored his first book, Encouragement to Practice: The Compact of the Concentration and Wisdom Community. He attacked what he saw as a degenerate Buddhist community, with special animus directed toward Pure Land Buddhism. Following his earlier insights, he argued that each person is already an enlightened Buddha and what is needed is the recovery of one's pristine enlightened state. Within a few years, the combination of Chinul's magnetic personality and the popularity of his teaching led thousands to Kong Mountain.

Soon the center on Kong Mountain proved unable to contain the many who wished to study with Chinul and he began to lay plans for a new center. By the end of the century he had selected a site on Songgwang Mountain in southern Korea, which became the setting for a new temple complex. On his journey to take up residence in the new temple, Chinul and his companions made a retreat on Chiri Mountain to consider the direction to be taken with the new community. During this retreat, they experienced a variety of supernatural events that were subsequently interpreted as confirmation that Chinul had realized a final and higher state of enlightenment.

Once installed at Songgwang Mountain, Chinul became the dominant voice in the Korean Son community. His first book from the Songgwang period emphasized the moral basis of the monastic life. Admonitions to Beginning Students is still regularly given to all young Buddhist monks in Korea. A few years later, the equally popular Secrets on Cultivating the Mind (ca. 1205) outlined Son practice and made it available to the beginner. His more advanced books would appear before the decade was out. Abridgment of the Commentary of the Flower Garland Sutra (1207) and Excerpts from the Dharma Collection and Sepa- rate Circulation Record with Personal Notes (1209) are considered his most important writings. The latter, a comprehensive survey of Buddhist thought and practice, soon became a standard work for students of Son meditation throughout Korea. He approached the practice of Son with an initial phase leading to sudden enlightenment to one's Buddhahood that should be followed by a life of cultivation of Buddhism that produces a mature realization. Chinul's approach continues to dominate Son practice in Korean Buddhism.

With the end of his earthly life nearing, in April 1210 Chinul invited his close disciples to engage him in a set of question and answer sessions. He died on April 22 and was buried in a stupa at Songgwang. Shortly thereafter, the Korean king named him National Preceptor Pril Pojo (or Buddha Sun Shining Universally), and another of his more remembered works, The Complete and Sudden Attainment of Buddhahood, was published.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Enlightenment; Korean Buddhism; Meditation; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Buswell, Robert E., Jr., ed. The Korean Approach to Zen: The Collected Works of Chinul. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1983.
- Keel, Hee Sung. Chinul: The Founder of the Korean Son (Zen) Tradition. Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1977.
- McGreal, Ian P., ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Shin, Jae Ryong. The Philosophical Foundation of Korean Zen Buddhism: The Integration of Son and Kyo by Chinul. Ph.D. diss., University of Hawaii, 1979.

Chistiniyya Sufi Order

Although the Sufi brotherhood of the Chistiniyya originated in Khurasan and developed some short-lived branches in the Iranian world too, it is primarily an Indian order. It was founded in Khwaja Cisht, today's Cisht-i Sharif in western Afghanistan, by the Syrian Shaykh Abu Ishaq Shami (d. 940), who traced his spiritual lineage back to the early Sufi Hasan al-Basri (d. 728).

In the early 13th century, when South Asia became a center of armed conflicts between the dynasties of the Ghurid and the Khwarezmshahs, the eighth in the line of Chishti-Shaykhs, Mu'in ad-din Cishti (d. 1236), shifted the center of the order to the eastern periphery of the Ghurid Empire; the new center became Ajmer in today's Indian state of Rajasthan. At this time already one distinctive feature of the formative period of this fariqa became apparent. The centers of the Chistiniyya were, due to doctrinal reasons, mainly situated on the periphery of their respective empires. Here the example of leading a pious life became an important factor in the consolidation of Islamic values among an only superficially Islamized population. From Ajmer, Mu'in ad-din sent his spiritual successors (khalifa) to different parts of the emerging Delhi Sultanate, and soon the fariqa spread all over northwestern India. One of those khalifas, Qutb ad-din Bakhtiyar Kaki (d. 1235), had considerable influence on Sultan Iltutmish in Delhi and thus extended the impact of the Chishtiniyya on the society. Nevertheless, his major khalifa, Baba Farid ad-din 'Ganj-i Shakkar' (d. 1265), again turned to the less crowded rural areas of Punjab. He is considered a good example of Cishtiyya doctrine and practices.

The doctrines of the Cishti-fariqa in its classical period are best summed up in the "Khayr al-majalis" of Nasir ad-din Mahmud Ciragh-i Dihli' (d. 1356). Two things are to be rejected: Sufihood without having been properly initiated by a shaykh (taqlid) and an initiated Sufi who begs a worldly ruler for money and thus sells his belief (jirrat). Everything, the spiritual and the material, will be provided by God to him who focuses his mind entirely on God. This absolute concentration on God can best be achieved by the renunciation of all worldly affairs and by leading an ascetic and pious life that relies only on donations (futuh). The community of Sufis lives together in a closed-up hall, the jama'at-khana.

At the lower stage of the consciousness of God the primary aim consists in the cutting off of the animal soul (nafs) and the purification of the human soul (qalb) by means of prayer, loud dhikr (dhikr-i jahr), contemplation (muraqaba), and certain exercises to control the breath (pas-i anfas). At a higher stage sama', as a special type of dhikr that uses religious music (qawwal) and dance, some very difficult types of ascetic exercises are performed as well. The monistic philosophy of Muhyi d-din b. 'Arabi (d. 1240) became most popular, especially his famous philosophy of the oneness of the existence (wahdat al-wujud), which allows for equal knowledge of the creation with knowledge of the creator. The last two aspects, together with a great sense for equality between men in the face of their creator, draw the Cishtinya near to Hindu thoughts and practices and thus made this fariqa adaptable and popular in South Asia.

Baba Farid ad-din appointed a long list of khalifas, but two of them require special attention, as they laid the foundation for the two major silsilas of the Cishtinya-fariqa. The first one, Shaykh Nizam ad-din Awliya' (d. 1325) of Delhi, was at the same time his most important khalifa and thus marks the peak of the classical period in the history of the fariqa. In Nizam ad-din the silsila of the Nizamiya is rooted. His tomb is, together with the shrine of Mu'in ad-din in Ajmer and the burial ground of Khuldabad in the Deccan, the main pilgrim's site for the order. The second important khalifa was Shaykh 'Ala' ad-din 'Ali b. Ahmad Sabir (d. 1291), to which the Sabiriya-silsila is traced back, though it gained considerable importance only from the 15th century on, with the activities of Shaykh Ahmad 'Abd al-Haqq (d. 1434) of Rudawli in Awadh.

After the time of Nizam ad-din Awliya', due to political developments, new centers of the Cishtiyya emerged, although with the above-mentioned Nasir ad-din Mahmud 'Ciragh-i Dihli', the city of Delhi remained a main center. Khuldabad in the Deccan became one new important center from the 14th to at least the 17th centuries, connected with names such as Burhan ad-din Gharib (d. 1337), who standardized the typical genre of Sufi writing among the Cishtis, the oral discourse (malfuzat). Another important center in the South became Gulbarga, from which Muhammad Gesu Dazaz (d. 1422) propagated the idea of the "oneness of testimony" (wahdat ash-shuhud) that was developed by the Kubrawiya-Shaykh ‘Ala’ ad-din Simnani (d. 1336) against the widely acknowledged teaching of the wahdat al-wujud.

The era of the Mughals seems to be connected to the rise of the Sabiriya-silsila in North India, though the relation between the emperors and the Sabiri-Shaykhs was not always a warm one. Around this period a considerable number of treatises in passionate defense of the concept of wahdat al-wujud were written by Sabiris. Even if some of the most outstanding and reform-oriented Sufi personalities in post-Mughal times, such as the founders of the seminary at Deoband, stood also in the line of this silsila, it must be emphasized that they belonged to the Naqshbandiya-fariqa as well; this fact seems more likely to be responsible for their orientation toward religious reformism, which is a very common feature in South Asian Sufism. Nonetheless, the founder of today’s missionary movement Tablighi Jama’at, Mawlana Muhammad Ilyas Kandhlawi (d. 1944), belonged to the Cishtiya-Sabiriya.

In the 18th century the Nizamiya branch saw a revival, which was strongly connected to the activities of Shaykh Kalim-allah Jahanabadi (d. 1729). His “Kashkul-i Kalimi” soon became regarded as the new standard manual for Cishtiya doctrines and practices. The late-18th-century philosophical school of Khayrabad/Awadh, to name a prominent example, belonged to this line.

Jan Peter Hartung

See also: Islam; Sufism.

References

- Currie, P. M. The Shrine and Cult of Mu’in al-Din Chishti of Ajmer. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Ernst, Carl W. Eternal Garden: Mysticism, History, and Politics at a South Asian Sufi Center. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Lawrence, Bruce. Nizam ad-Din Awliya: Morals for the Heart. Translated and Annotated. New York: Paulist Press, 1992. (English translation of Nasir ad-din Ciragh-i Dihli’s “Khayr al-majalis.”)
- Nizami, Khaliq Ahmad. The Life and Times of Shaikh Farid-u’-d-Din Ganj-i-Shakar. Delhi: Idarah-i Adabiyat-i Delli, 1955. Reprint, 1973.

Chogye Order

The Chogye Order is the largest Buddhist organization in the Republic of Korea (South Korea) in terms of both membership and places of worship. Although the teachings of the order focus primarily on East Asian Zen Buddhism, the worship of other Buddhist holy beings—the bodhisattvas Avalokitesvara, Ksitigarbha, and Maitreya, and the buddha Amitabha—also figure prominently in lay worship. Thus, the Chogye Order preserves many of the traditional votive observances of pre-modern Korean Buddhism. In recent years, as a result of the general economic success of South Korea as well as outreach activities such as the temple-stay program, a program in which native Koreans and foreigners spend several days in participating monasteries learning meditation and other activities, Buddhism and Buddhist traditions in Korea are reaching out to a greater number of people, and the order has become a more visible and more viable religious choice for many Koreans.

The origins of Korea’s Chogye Order (Chogyejong) date back to the arrival of the Son Buddhist monk Chinul (1158–1210), later known as State Master Puril Pojo, at Kilsang Monastery on Mount Songgwang in 1200. This monastery was renamed Son Cultivation Community (Susonsa) by the king in 1205. It soon became known as Songgwang Monastery. The early Chogye School soon subsumed the remnants of the Nine Mountains of Son, practitioners associated with the lineages of the Five Houses of Chinese Chan Buddhism (which came to be known in Japan as Zen Buddhism). Since the Chogye School received royal patronage during the Koryo period (918–1392), it was able to build a foundation strong enough to endure the oppression of Buddhism that came with the adoption of neo-Confucianism as the state ideology during the Choson period (1392–1910). The Chogye Order preserves a strand of traditional mainstream East Asian Mahayana Buddhism that stretches back several hundred years.

Chinul’s systemization of Buddhist doctrine was based on the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, the Avatamsaka Sutra and its exposition by Li Tongxuan, and Dahui’s Discourse Records. His approach was the concurrent development of samadhi (Sanskrit: the highest state of meditation) and prajna, the faith and understanding of the complete and sudden teachings, and the shortcut hwadu method, which focuses on the critical phrase or headword of a public case (kongan). Although Linji-style Chan (Zen) has been promoted by various leaders, Chinul's approach of sudden enlightenment and gradual cultivation remains the doctrinal mainstay of the school. Monks, however, trace their dharma lineage to T'aego Pou (1301–1382), who returned from China in 1348 bearing the lineage in the Yangqi line of the Linji School and who became state preceptor in 1371. In 1372, the community was officially named the Chogye School. Over a period of 200 years the school came to control more monasteries and land than any other school in Korea. However, by royal order in 1426, the Chogye School was combined with two other schools, its land and economic holdings were reduced, and it was renamed the Son School.

South Korean Buddhists pray during a service to celebrate the 2,552nd birthday of Buddha at the Chogye Temple in Seoul, South Korea. About one-third of South Korea's 48 million people are Buddhist. (AP/Wide World Images)

In 1911, control of the monasteries in the school was turned over to the Japanese and the headquarters were moved to the capital. In 1941, the school was renamed the Chogye Order of Chosen Buddhism. After liberation in 1945, the school was again renamed the Chogye Order of Korean Buddhism. Following Japanese policies, married monks and nuns were introduced into the school during the colonial period. This led to a great schism beginning in 1954 between the celibate monks and the married monks. This issue was partially resolved in 1962, when the married monks were officially expelled from the order. As of 2008, the Chogye Order administered 25 main monastic complexes and more than 2,000 branch temples and shrines in the Republic of Korea for a total of 2,444 sites. The order also sponsors many hospitals, social welfare organizations, schools, and universities, including Dongguk University. These religious sites and other institutions serve and are served by 5,292 monks, 5,209 nuns, 1,843 male novices, and 1,212 female novices. According to the Chogye Order, its lay membership is 11,084,460 (3,368,870 men and 7,715,590 women). Additional branch shrines and monastic establishments overseas serve Korean populations and converts in Japan, North America, and Europe.

Chogye Order
 Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong
 Chongno-gu Kyonji-dong 45
 Seoul
 110-170
 Republic of Korea
 www.koreanbuddhism.net

Richard D. McBride II

See also: Bodhisattva; Chinul; Korean Buddhism; Meditation; Songgwangsa; T'aego Pou; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Buswell, Robert E., Jr. Tracing Back the Radiance: Chinul's Korean Way of Zen. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1991.
- Buswell, Robert E., Jr. The Zen Monastic Experience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992.
- Mok Jeong-bae. "Buddhism in Modern Korea." Korea Journal 33, no. 3 (Autumn 1993): 23–49.

Chondogyo

Chondogyo, the most successful of a number of new religions that arose in Korea in the 19th century, was founded by Ch'oe Suun (1824–1864). Reacting to what he saw as both the influx of Western ways (especially Christianity) and the moral decay of the nation, he wandered the country for 10 years and then spent 6 years in meditation. While meditating he had a mystical experience during which he was given a mystical book. In 1860 he had a visit from Hanulnim (the supreme deity), receiving a spiritual symbol and instructions to save humankind from sickness. He received the culminating great awakening on April 5, 1860. He began to spread his teachings the following year, but was immediately opposed by Confucian leaders and the government. He subsequently authored Nonhak-moon, a part of the Chondogyo scripture in which he declared his way as the Heavenly or Eastern Way (Tonghak) as opposed to the Western Way (Catholicism).

Tonghak was organized in jops, each composed of 30 to 50 believers. In June 1862, Ch'oe Suun appointed 15 jop leaders. By this time the new movement had aroused the concern of the authorities, who saw it as a challenge to the government's power. In 1864 the government moved to suppress it. Ch'oe Suun was arrested and executed. His family and most of the group leaders were also arrested and exiled. However, Ch'oe Si-Hyung (1827–1898), Ch'oe Suun's appointed successor, was able to carry on underground. The scriptures were published in 1880–1881, and slowly the movement was rebuilt. In 1893 it emerged as a movement to protect the nation from foreign influence. In 1894 a protest movement against government corruption erupted in Chulla Province that became identified with Tonghak. Tonghak continued its attempt to reform the nation through the end of the century.

In 1897 Ch'oe Si-Hyung ordained his successor, Son Byong-hi. The following year Ch'oe Si-Hyung was arrested and executed by the government. Finally in 1904, Son Byong-hi, was officially renamed Tonghak. The new name, Chondogyo, was a signal to the government that it had been reformed as a nonpolitical religious movement. Although this solved many of its problems with the Korean government, the movement still ran into problems with the Japanese authorities, who, beginning in 1910, occupied Korea. In 1919 Chondogyo leaders organized an independence movement, which was met with a harsh response by the Japanese. Son Byong-hi and many leaders were arrested. Prior to his arrest, he ordained Park In-ho as his successor. Chondogyo continued to work for Korean freedom underground.

Chondogyo is derived from its two scriptures, the Tonggyung Tae-on (Great Eastern Scripture) and Yongdam Yusa (Memorial Songs of Yongdam), both penned by Ch'oe Suun. Worship centers on Hanulnim, the Lord of Heaven. Hanulnim is the Great Totality innate in humans who were caused to be by God. Human beings are called upon to improve the quality of their lives here and now rather than focus upon an afterlife. They are seen as identical with God but not the same as God. Every person bears Hanulnim, and all are called upon to act toward others as they would act toward God. The people of Chondogyo are attempting to build the paradise of heaven on Earth.

Members of the faith practice a spiritual discipline aimed at spiritual cultivation. Basic is the repetition of the Chondogyo Incantation formula, which consists of 21 syllables calling the person reciting it to harmonize his or her mind with God. The date of the founding of the religion (April 5) and of the ordinations of the second, third, and fourth leaders are celebrated as holidays.

At the end of World War II, Chondogyo's strength was in North Korea, where it had more than a million adherents. A headquarters building had been opened in 1921 in Seoul. That building remains the headquarters of Chondogyo in the Republic of Korea (South Korea). The movement grew rapidly in the postwar years: It had more than 700,000 members in the 1970s and more than a million at the beginning of the 21st century. It is estimated that more than two million adherents remain in the People's Republic of Korea (North Korea). There is in Pyongyang a government-sponsored Chondogyo organization, but its relationship to believers across North Korea is uncertain.

Chondogyo
88 Kyongun-dong
Chung-Gu
Seoul
Republic of Korea
<http://www.chondogyo.or.kr/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Meditation.

References

- Chondogyo: The Religion of the Cosmos That Blossomed in Korea.* Seoul, Korea: Administration of the Central Headquarters of Chondogyo, n.d.
- Focus on Korea.* 3 vols. Seoul: Seoul International Publishing House, 1988.
- Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Palmer, Spencer J., ed. The New Religions of Korea. Transactions of the Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. 43. Seoul: Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1967.

Christ Apostolic Church

An Anglican lay leader at Ijebu-Ode, Joseph Shadare (d. 1962), formed a prayer group in 1918 together with a female schoolteacher, Sophia Odunlami, who had a vision in which she was commanded to preach healing through holy water only and to reject medicines. This group, known as the Precious Stone (Diamond) Society, was created to provide spiritual support and healing for victims of the influenza epidemic. In 1922 the society left the Anglican Church (present in the form of the Church Missionary Society) over the issues of infant baptism and the rejection of medicines, both Western and traditional. It began a branch in Lagos and affiliated with a North American non-Pentecostal fundamentalist group called Faith Tabernacle, whose literature had reached Nigeria and which emphasized divine healing and adult baptism by immersion. Contact with the church in the United States was severed in 1925 after doctrinal differences over the Pentecostal gifts of the Spirit (particularly speaking in tongues), the apparent failure of the Americans to support the church in Nigeria, and the American leader's alleged immorality.

The greatest expansion of the Aladura, or prayer people, movement took place after a revival beginning in 1930 in which Shadare and the Precious Stone Society had a central role. After a series of divine visions, former road construction driver Joseph Ayo Babalola (1906–1959) contacted Shadare, became a member of the Precious Stone Society, and began preaching at Ilesa. He later became general evangelist of the Christ Apostolic Church (CAC), constituted in 1941 and soon the largest Aladura church in Nigeria. Babalola heard a voice calling him to preach using prayer and the “water of life” (blessed water), which would heal all sicknesses. The ensuing revival resulted in thousands of people becoming Christians and burning traditional charms. The colonial authorities became disturbed, for the revival activities were alleged to include witch-hunting and opposition to hospitals and medicine, and therefore they endangered public health. Some of the leaders of the revival, including Babalola, were arrested and jailed. This movement invited British Pentecostals to Nigeria, and missionaries from the Apostolic Church of Great Britain arrived in 1932, supported by the Nigerian church. The association was broken in 1939 over the British missionaries' attempt to control the church and their opposition to the use of the water of life. The African leaders also found the missionaries' use of medicine and quinine objectionable, and this problem led to Peter Anim in Ghana founding the CAC there.

Sir Isaac Babalola Akinyele (1882–1964), the first president of the Christ Apostolic Church (since 1940), became ruler (Olubadan) of Ibadan; he was one of the first converts in Ibadan and a strong financial supporter of the church. Akinyele had become a member of Shadare's Faith Tabernacle in 1925. Babalola died in 1959 and Akinyele in 1964, but the CAC continued to grow. By 1990 it had more than a million affiliates, one of the largest churches in Nigeria, and it had spread to several other countries in Africa, Europe, and North America. There were also inevitable schisms, one of the most significant being the Christ Gospel Apostolic Church, founded by the prophet Peter Olatunji, a prominent CAC leader, in 1948, and more recently a major split in the church occurred in Nigeria.

The CAC tends to distance itself from other Aladura churches and has been regarded more favorably by government and mainline church leaders than other Aladura churches because of its more definite Christology and emphasis on the Bible, its educated leadership, and its considerable involvement in education. Unlike those who belong to most other Aladura churches, CAC members and ministers do not wear white garments and practice monogamy. However, the church shares the customs of other Aladura churches of prayer; fasting; water and oil for healing purposes; sacred hills and mountains; and the rejection of medicines, alcohol, and tobacco. A different church of the same name exists in Ghana and is known as Christ Apostolic Church International.

Christ Apostolic Church
PO Box 530
Ibadan
Nigeria

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Aladura Churches; Apostolic Church; Church Missionary Society.

References

- Ayegboyin, Deji, and S. Ademola Ishola. African Indigenous Churches: An Historical Perspective. Lagos, Nigeria: Greater Heights Publications, 1997.
- Oshun, Christopher O. "Christ Apostolic Church of Nigeria: A Pentecostal Consideration of Its Historical, Theological and Organisational Developments, 1918–1978." Ph.D. diss., University of Exeter, 1981.
- Peel, J. D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Christ Community Church of Zion/ Christian Catholic Church

Christ Community Church of Zion, known until 1997 as the Christian Catholic Church, was founded in 1896 in Chicago, Illinois. It is a small American denomination that has had a significant role in the development of religion in southern Africa. The church originated out of the career of its charismatic founder, John Alexander Dowie (1847–1907). As a child Dowie moved with his family from Scotland to Australia. He grew up to become a Congregationalist minister, but left the church after he discovered the healing power of God and founded the International Divine Healing Association. On his way to England to attend a conference on spiritual healing in 1888, he stopped in America and decided to make it his new home. He eventually began an urban ministry in Chicago.

The congregation he pastored in Chicago moved to a rural tract north of Chicago in 1901 and there created the city of Zion, an intentional community. The community was guided by a theocratic order. Following a stroke in 1906, Dowie relinquished control of the church to Wilbur John Voliva (1870–1942). Voliva took complete control and brought the church back from bankruptcy. Voliva headed the church until 1942, and in subsequent years there has been a succession of general overseers.

The church draws broadly from the different traditions of evangelical Christianity. The Bible is accepted as its rule of faith and life. There is an emphasis on the necessity of personal repentance from sin and trust in Christ for salvation. Even though, because of its emphasis on divine healing, the church did not affiliate with the new Pentecostal movement, it had a considerable amount of interaction with it.

An annual conference meets in September. There are three congregations in the United States with some 1,100 members (2009). It is a member of the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it relates to the World Evangelical Fellowship.

In 1904, Daniel Bryant, the first missionary sent out by the Christian Catholic Church, came to South Africa. He founded a church in Johannesburg that took the name Apostolic Faith Church in Zion. Bryant introduced Africa to the practice of threefold baptism. In 1908 the first group of Pentecostals, inspired by the original Pentecostal revival in Los Angeles, California, arrived and conducted their first meeting in connection with the Apostolic Faith Church. The Pentecostal effort resulted in the founding of the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa. From these two churches and their ambiguous attitudes toward their African converts arose a spectrum of churches that continued a number of the peculiarities of the Christian Catholic Church—an emphasis on healing and baptism by triune immersion. Many of these churches added the word Zion to their name. The Zionist and Apostolic Churches have been particularly active in South Africa and Zimbabwe, and one of these, the Zion Christian Church (ZCC), is now the largest denomination in South Africa. The Christ Community Church rejects many of the Zionist churches, concerned with their “untenable syncretistic way” that includes animal sacrifice, ancestor worship, witchcraft, and divination.

There is still a branch of the Christ Community Church in South Africa. The church also has branches in 10 other countries around the world, including the Philippines, where the affiliated Zion Christian Community Church has more than 70 congregations. There are 6,000 members worldwide.

Christ Community Church of Zion
2500 Dowie Memorial Dr.
Zion
IL 60099

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancestors; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Witchcraft; Zion Christian Church (South Africa, Zimbabwe); Zionist and Apostolic Churches.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa. Pretoria: University of South Africa Press, 2000.
- Christ Community Church, Zion, Illinois. <http://www.ccczion.org/>.
- Cook, Philip L. Zion City, Illinois: John Alexander Dowie's Theocracy. Zion, IL: Zion Historical Society, 1970.
- Hollenwager, Walter J. The Pentecostals. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1972.
- Lindsey, Gordon. John Alexander Dowie. Dallas, TX: Christ for the Nations, 1980.

Christadelphians

The Christadelphian movement was started by Dr. John Thomas (1805–1871), a physician from Richmond, Virginia, and a member of the Churches of Christ movement associated with Alexander Campbell (1788–1866). In the 1840s, Thomas began to disagree with Campbell on a number of points. Their polemics led to Thomas's separation in 1844 and the emergence of the Christadelphians. The movement did not have a name until the 1860s, when members needed to be identified in order to be considered for conscientious objector exemptions from service in the two armies engaged in the American Civil War. The name means “Brethren in Christ.”

Thomas had a primary disagreement on the doctrine of the Trinity from which he dissented. He came to feel that the Holy Spirit was not a third “person” of a Triune God, but simply a name for God's power, by which he creates and redeems. Thomas also articulated what at the time was distinctly a minority view among Christians, that believers remained unconscious from death until the general resurrection, at which time they would finally be judged. Believers will enter the kingdom, and unbelievers will be annihilated (rather than confined to eternal torment). These beliefs have separated the Christadelphians from the main body of Protestant and Free church Christians, and made them the target of a considerable body of polemic writings.

The movement spread internationally through the English-speaking world and gained considerable support in Canada, England, Australia, and New Zealand. Christadelphians founded autonomous congregations, tied together by their mutual rejection by other church groups and by the periodicals that served them. In England in the 1890s, a theological controversy broke out that divided the local congregations (called ecclesias).

In 1898, the ecclesia in Birmingham, England, one of the more prominent in the growing movement, moved to clarify the movement's stand on the resurrection of people for judgment at the end of human history. Those in the movement all agreed that both believers and unbelievers would be resurrected and that only those who had become "responsible" for responding to the gospel would be summoned for judgment. Most agreed that those who had died as children were not responsible. The Birmingham ecclesia, however, proposed that among unbelievers, only those who had heard the gospel and been called to repentance could be considered responsible. This amendment left a place in God's kingdom for unbelievers who had never heard of Christ.

Robert Roberts (1829–1898), the editor of the Christadelphian, the leading British periodical serving the movement, had been largely responsible for writing the amendment, and he was able to convince most British Christadelphians to accept it. However, another prominent leader, J. J. Andrew, rejected the amendment, and championed the more conservative older statement. During the early 20th century, the Christadelphian ecclesias were forced to choose between the two positions, and two groups developed, the Amended, who were persuaded by Roberts and accepted the Birmingham ecclesia's position, and the Unamended, who followed Andrew. Over the years several attempts have been made to work out a reconciliation between the two groups, but a solution to the theological differences, now bolstered by other ideas as well, proved inconclusive.

The Christadelphians are a decentralized group with an ultra-congregational polity. There is neither national nor international headquarters. The movement is represented by a set of periodicals; the publishing house of each serves one or the other of the two branches of the movement. The Amended Christadelphians in the United States are served by the Christadelphian Book Supply, 8132 Puritan, Detroit, MI 48238, and Christadelphian Tidings, PO Box 530696, Livonia, MI 48153-0696. The Gospel Publicity League (PO Box 4129, Edgeworth, NSW 2285, Australia) publishes material for Australian believers. The Unamended ecclesias are served by the Christadelphian Advocate, 9420 Stanmore Place, Richmond, VA 23236 (<http://www.christadelphian-advocate.org/>).

Extensive Christadelphian Internet sites, which avoid the discussion on responsibility, but are generally representative of the Amended ecclesias, are maintained by members of the movement in Australia (www.christadelphian.org.au/), England (<http://www.christadelphians.com/united-kingdom.htm>), and North America (www.christadelphian.org). There are an estimated 50,000 Christadelphians worldwide; Christadelphian Bible Mission activity out of the United States and Canada, the United Kingdom, and Australia has established work in more than 100 countries on every continent, though to date the number of new ecclesias remains small.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental).

References

- A Declaration of the Truth Revealed in the Bible*. Birmingham, UK: Christadelphian, 1967.
- Lippy, Charles H. Christadelphians in North America. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.
- One Hundred Years of the Christadelphian*. Birmingham, UK: Christadelphian, 1964.
- Roberts, Robert. A Guide to the Formation and Conduct of Christadelphian Ecclesias. Birmingham, UK: Christadelphian, 1922.
- Tennant, Harry. Christadelphians: What They Believe and Preach. Birmingham, UK: Christadelphian Magazine & Publishing Association, 1986.

Christian and Missionary Alliance

The Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) was founded in 1887 by people who had been attracted to the evangelical and healing ministry of Presbyterian minister Albert Benjamin Simpson (1843–1919). Simpson, a Canadian, began his ministry in Hamilton, Ontario, but moved to Louisville, Kentucky, in 1875. During his years in Louisville, he associated with the Holiness movement, and at one point, while attending a camp meeting at Old Orchard, Maine, experienced a physical healing. In 1882, he left the Presbyterian Church and founded an independent congregation that would embody his ideal of a Christian people centered on evangelical and missionary concerns.

In 1882, Simpson began to issue a magazine calling for interdenominational support for missions. He held the first of a series of missionary conventions in 1884 in New York, and similar conventions were held in other cities over the next few years. These led to the formation of the Christian Alliance, a fellowship of like-minded congregations, and the Missionary Alliance, an agency to send missionaries to different countries. These two organizations came together to create a new denomination, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, in 1887.

Simpson had been deeply affected by Holiness teachings that looked for a deeper Christian life in the experience of sanctification, an experience of the love of God that led to a life of holiness. He developed a theological perspective around the All-Sufficiency of Christ as Savior, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming King. That theology led to a life of evangelism and missionary support, the experience of the holy life, spiritual healing, and an expectancy of the soon return of Jesus Christ. Within a decade, the Alliance had sent more than 200 missionaries into the field.

During the 20th century, the Alliance sponsored missionaries in more than 50 countries. In the United States, it operated as a loose confederation of independent congregations, but beginning in the 1960s it began to react to a changing world situation. The first sign of change was the separation of mission churches into new autonomous church bodies. Then in 1974, the Alliance went through a reorganization in the United States. It dropped its self-image as the focus of an interdenominational movement and declared itself a denomination. In 1980 the Canadian Alliance became an autonomous organization. As more and more mission fields became independent, the missionary endeavor was reorganized as an association of cooperating national churches, though many of the churches in Third World countries remain heavily dependent on North American support. The former CMA missions are now associated in the Alliance World Fellowship.

In 2006, the CMA reported 190,000 members in some 2,010 churches. Around 15 percent of the churches were functioning among a variety of Asian Americans and other ethnic groups. There were an additional 428 churches in Canada. The members of the Alliance World Fellowship reported more than 1.9 million members in 53 countries. As of 1998, CMA personnel were located in 39 countries.

The CMA has its main headquarters in Colorado Springs, Colorado. The Canadian CMA is headquartered at #510–105 Gordon Baker Rd., North York, ON M2H 3P8 (English-speaking) and 5473 Royal Mount, Ville Mont Royal, PQ H8P 1J3 (French-speaking). It supports three colleges and a theological seminary in the United States and a college and seminary in Canada. The CMA and the member churches of the Alliance World Fellowship generally support the World Evangelical Fellowship.

Christian and Missionary Alliance
8595 Explorer Dr.
Colorado Springs, CO 80920
www.cmalliance.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Alliance World Fellowship; Holiness Movement.

References

- Cowles, H. Robert. Healing Voices: A Narrative of the Acts of God in the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, 2000.
- King, Paul L. Genuine Gold: The Cautiously Charismatic Story of the Early Christian and Missionary Alliance. Tulsa, OK: Word & Spirit Press, 2006.
- Manual*. New York: Christian and Missionary Alliance, 1965.
- Simpson, Albert Benjamin. The Four-Fold Gospel. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, n.d.
- Simpson, Albert Benjamin. A Larger Christian Life. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publications, n.d.

Christian Biblical Church

The Christian Biblical Church originated in the movement of Pentecostal missionaries of Italian descent from Chicago to Argentina in the middle of the second decade of the 20th century. From their work a Pentecostal movement spread among Italian Argentineans throughout the country. The Christian Biblical Church was formed by some Italian Pentecostals in 1970. It is a conservative Trinitarian Holiness Pentecostal body. It practices believer's baptism by immersion, and its congregations celebrate holy Communion twice monthly. Its conservative stance is also marked by an allegiance to family values and traditional views of sexuality and the role of women. It advocates for the family as the basic unit of society.

The church has a basic commitment to both evangelism and social ministries. The latter is reflected in its sponsoring anti-drug centers, soup kitchens, and a secondary school. It also sponsors a school at which pastors are trained.

In 2005, the church reported some 30,000 members in 66 congregations. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1997, and is a member of the Evangelical Pentecostal Commission of Latin America.

Bermudez 3071
1417 Buenos Aires
Argentina

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Pentecostalism; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Brethren

“Christian Brethren” is an increasingly used designation for a movement within evangelicalism and the Free churches often referred to (usually just by others) as “Plymouth Brethren” (after the English port where a prominent early congregation was located). One must be careful not to confuse them with other Brethren movements that began in different times and places, although there are some similarities. These Brethren began in the 1820s and 1830s in Ireland and Britain, but quickly spread so that by the early 20th century they were found globally and are now in at least 120 countries. Some of this was due to migration, but mostly because of evangelistic and missionary work. At times the Brethren may well have had the largest percentage of their adherents serving abroad since the early Moravians. Currently at least 2,000 missionaries from their ranks serve internationally and many others serve cross-culturally within their own countries. Besides throughout the British Commonwealth and the United States, Brethren are found in most of Europe (especially Germany and the Romance-language lands from Portugal to Romania), in almost all of Latin America and the Caribbean, in most of Africa (especially in Angola, Chad, Congo, Egypt, and Zambia), and in much of South and East Asia (especially the Commonwealth nations of India, Malaysia, and Singapore).

Their distinctive ecclesiological emphases, including a common tendency to avoid the term “brethren,” make them an especially difficult movement for scholars, governments, and fellow evangelicals to interact with. The Brethren have remained relatively small, totaling by 2008 in all branches perhaps 1.5 to 2 million or so adult adherents in at least 30,000 congregations, but they are widely recognized to have had a disproportionate influence on the broader evangelical movement. Many emphases originating with Brethren have been adopted elsewhere, often unaware of their origin.

In view of their many internal divisions, and of the minimal relations with other evangelicals that some Brethren have, it is ironic that the first of the two most significant emphases that launched the movement was an insistence upon the unity of all true Christians over against the denominational walls that many had erected within Protestantism. This unity was to be visibly and practically manifested not by formal organization (like Catholics and Orthodox), nor by fairly complete agreement on distinctive doctrines or practices (as most Protestant confessions traditionally insist).

Instead, unity was to stress what believers shared in common (rather than their differences) and was to appear in three major ways. (1) The Lord's Supper should be observed weekly as a significant meeting for worship (often called the "breaking of bread") as a regular reminder of the Lord's sacrifice to create his one body. (2) Distinctive names (like Baptist or Methodist) that could not be equally applied to all Christians should not be used as this encouraged sectarianism. Instead, believers should meet simply in Christ's name. Among biblical terms that could have sufficed for self-designation, "brethren" prevailed at a time when it clearly included sisters. (3) Formal comprehensive church organization (whether older as with Catholics or newer as with Lutherans or Friends) was likewise felt to be sectarian and to diminish the role of the Holy Spirit thought to be actively leading the one body of Christ. Of course, with the passage of time, as with all movements, these ways of exhibiting unity have been modified or changed.

The second distinctive emphasis that created and sustained the Brethren is the insistence on diverse gifts for ministry given by the Spirit to all Christians. Though such giftedness has now become widely accepted, only a few others apply it as thoroughly as do Brethren, at least as regards gifts of evangelism, teaching, serving, and leading. This is because Brethren find no basis in the New Testament, neither theologically nor practically, for a distinction between clergy and laity. (Traditionally they have seen biblical reasons for distinguishing the exercise of gifts by men and by women, although for them current discussion does not involve the term "ordination" as it does in other groups.) Despite their insistence on the active role of the Spirit, Brethren do not generally accept the Pentecostal understanding of such sign gifts as tongues. However, in several countries Brethren have added at least some "Charismatic" features, or have divided over whether to do so.

Instead of an "ordained" ministry, Brethren "commend" both men and women (including their numerous missionaries) to full-time ministry. Among the more conservative, such ministry is usually itinerant. Among those who are more progressive, full-time ministry primarily with one congregation (still usually with a plurality of "elders") has become increasingly possible in the last generation (and was found in some places from earliest days). This practice did not develop rapidly or widely enough to avoid "exporting" many gifted preachers to serve non-Brethren congregations.

Traditionally, instead of centralized structures, specialized service agencies (such as publishers, camps, missionary service agencies, and, by many, Bible and theological colleges) have been seen as the appropriate organizations for ministries beyond what congregations could do. In the English-speaking world this still largely prevails (hence making it difficult to find details of membership or even numbers of congregations). But through pressure from colonial and other governments, in non-English lands branches of the Brethren have formed central organizations, often with the translation of the term "Brethren" not being part of the name (thus compounding difficulties for statisticians). Similarly their congregations (which they often refer to as "assemblies") do not use "Brethren" on their buildings, which are usually a "Gospel Hall" or "Bible Chapel" or the like, only sometimes a "Church." (Interestingly, the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ arose in America about the same time as the Brethren did in Britain and with many of the same distinctive emphases—and consequences. However, that movement became much larger and more diverse, but not nearly so widespread globally or so influential in the broader evangelical movement.)

The historic Brethren emphasis on the unity of all true believers has led in two opposite directions. Some have little cooperation with others—even though they acknowledge them as Christians—because they feel their way to express unity is the only biblically valid one. Indeed, separation from what is deemed to be evil is taken to be the main way of expressing unity by some. By contrast, many other Brethren have always made a disproportionate contribution to evangelical nondenominational ministries, both evangelistic and instructional, whether aimed at youth or adults. Their emphasis on unity coupled with fewer Brethren organizational structures facilitates this. Those with this cooperative emphasis are more likely to use the label "Christian Brethren" when they must identify themselves. Often their Brethrenness is unheralded, such as with the biblical scholar F. F. Bruce (1910–1990) or Ecuador missionary martyr Jim Elliot (1927–1956). The rise of these specialized, nondenominational agencies (publishers, schools, camps, missions, etc.) over the last century and a half in turn allows evangelical congregations in many countries to function independently rather than to be in a denomination. However, such congregations do not necessarily eschew clergy or celebrate the Lord's Supper as Brethren traditionally have.

In many countries the Brethren are growing, but in others where they were once prominent their numbers and influence are decreasing as "lay" leaders and full-time workers see better opportunities to serve elsewhere. Their historic emphasis on the unity of all true believers makes a transition away from the movement of one's natural and/or spiritual birth easier.

Besides ecclesiology, the other area of theology to which the Brethren have made a significant distinctive contribution is eschatology. They are generally credited (or blamed) with developing what is known as Dispensationalism, although not all Brethren did or do espouse it. Dispensationalism strongly dissented from the prevailing Christian view, even from before Constantine, which saw the church as having replaced or superseded Israel. Besides facilitating anti-Semitism, this prevailing view permitted the continuation within the church of such clearly Old Testament practices as a distinct priesthood and as close a link with the state as possible. God had supposedly given up on national Israel because of the rejection by most Jews of their Messiah. While earlier movements had stressed the distinctive nature of New Testament Christianity, Brethren felt they did this more consistently. To this emphasis, Brethren and later Dispensationalists added that the proper reading of the New Testament would show that God had not finished with national Israel after all. During this age or dispensation, Jews who accept Christ will indeed be joined to the church, and along with Gentile believers will be suddenly removed at the first phase (the "rapture") of Christ's return. God will then resume dealings with those left behind, among whom will be numerous Jewish people who only then will believe in Jesus. This is seen as the basic message of the last book of the Bible (Revelation), though indications of it can be found elsewhere in the New Testament. Moreover, only through having such a separate future for national Israel can so many of the Old Testament prophecies be properly fulfilled. While the first phase of Christ's return will be only for those who have accepted him, the second phase, after a period of great tribulation, will be in glory and judgment and usher in a millennial kingdom. It is noteworthy that Dispensational teaching was promulgated before modern Zionism arose, but the increasing return of Jews to their ancient homeland, followed by the formation of the state of Israel, helps explain its attraction for so many.

Eschewing Brethren ecclesiological distinctives, leading clergy from many denominations, especially in America, accepted and popularized among evangelicals the eschatology garnered from Brethren writings and traveling preachers. They did not publicize its origins both because it was believed to be the biblically correct view and because, along with disapproving of clergy, Brethren had developed a reputation for divisiveness. Prominent among them were Anglicans such as W. H. Griffith Thomas (1861–1924), Baptists such as W. B. Riley (1861–1947), and Congregationalists and Presbyterians such as James Brookes (1837–1897), C. I. Scofield (1843–1921), and Lewis Sperry Chafer (1871–1952). The renowned evangelist Dwight Moody (1837–1899) had connections with many of these (and with Brethren) and mildly backed the new eschatology. And although few from the Wesleyan tradition embraced it, its newer Pentecostal offshoot overwhelmingly did so, in spite of the opposition of both Brethren and the Reformed movement to "sign gifts" of the Spirit.

There were widespread speaking and writing about these elaborations to the traditional Christian teaching about Christ's return, but the biggest single factor in Dispensationalism's dissemination was Scofield's preparation of an annotated Reference Bible published by the Oxford University Press (1909). Financial support for this crucial project came from a Brethren businessman but Scofield only obliquely refers in his preface to the role of Brethren in developing what was distinctive in his theological notes.

In areas other than ecclesiology and eschatology, Brethren generally reflect the commonalities and diversities of evangelicalism. For example, soteriologically some are Calvinistic, others are Arminian, but most are somewhere in between.

John Nelson Darby (1800–1882), an Anglo-Irishman who was educated as a lawyer but became for a while an Anglican priest, early came into association with what is often called the first Brethren meeting, which was in Dublin, Ireland. Darby soon began a lifetime of global traveling, spreading the movement through years of residence on the continent, making several trips to North America, and once going as far as New Zealand. Another early leader was a German emigrant, George Mueller (1805–1898) of orphanage house fame in Bristol, England. The first of a long line of Brethren missionaries was Anthony Norris Groves (1795–1853), who in 1829 went from England first to Iraq and then settled in India. His practice of trusting in God to provide the needed support rather than receiving a stipend from a sending society made him a pioneer of what became known as “faith missions” and is another example of Brethren influence on the wider evangelical movement.

In the 1840s, the young movement was permanently divided into “Exclusives” or “Closed” (who stressed the informal though strong connections among the assemblies that were meeting “on the ground of the one body”) and “Opens” (who stressed the independence of each assembly and the willingness to cooperate actively with non-Brethren). Exclusives felt such “independency” undercut the emphasis on unity as well as opened the door to false teaching. Darby was clearly the Exclusive leader, while Mueller and Groves represented the Open perspective. At first, the Exclusives were much larger and included most of the movement’s teachers (who were to influence the development of Dispensationalism) such as William Kelly (1821–1906), W. J. Lowe (1838–1927), C. H. Mackintosh (1820–1896), F. E. Raven (1837–1903), all from the United Kingdom, and F. W. Grant (1834–1902), who left England as a young adult to settle in North America. Because of a much greater missionary and evangelistic emphasis, as well as a tendency for some Exclusives to become Open, the latter eventually became by far the larger. Therefore, it is important to realize that by 2009, the Open branch comprises well more than 90 percent of the Brethren, although it is true that many of these are now more or less separatistic in practice. Apart from what has been said on Dispensationalism, most of the influence and contacts with the broader evangelical movement has been from the Open branch of the Brethren.

The Opens have had one small breakaway that claimed new “needed truth.” In the 1890s in Britain they set up a presbyterian-style central organization called the Churches of God but it soon divided and both branches are now greatly reduced. However, in most countries where Open Brethren are found there have developed usually informal, partial, and overlapping distinctions into conservative and centrist and progressive assemblies. The first can be practically “exclusive” even if not historically derived from them. The last can so deemphasize any Brethren features that they become practically like any other non-denominational evangelical congregation. The middle group often appears as simply one more evangelical denomination with an emphasis on certain distinctives and institutions. Of course this process is similar to what has happened to other such movements over the centuries.

The situation among Exclusives, with their stress on the informal but strong connections among the assemblies, has been quite different. Until almost the end of Darby’s long life, the Exclusives held together, but by 1890 they were divided into five distinct groups, two of which divided again by 1910 so there were seven Exclusive divisions, not all of which existed in every country. However, over the 20th century, as a result of a number of reunions, there came to be only three more or less global groups of Exclusives, along with many small, more localized groups.

What is now the largest, though not the best known, Exclusive group had, following Lowe, opposed the distinctive teachings of Raven, resulting in the major split of 1890. They are often known as Continentals because they prevailed on the European mainland. Not only migrants but also missionaries have spread this group globally. With difficulty and splintering they have gradually reunited most from six of the seven major divisions, the exception being the followers of Raven and his successors. A major reunion occurred in 1926 with the Kelly division. Often those who would be in this Reunited grouping can be involved with other evangelicals, especially by supplying literature. Over the years, sometimes through government pressure, some Exclusives have come into increasing association and eventual de facto merger with Opens. This occurred with maybe half the Grant division (which had been the largest in North America) by the 1930s. In the last generation, apparently beginning in the Netherlands, this process has resulted effectively in dividing the Reunited Exclusives between those who keep to the principle of “meeting on the ground of the one body” and those who practice the “independency” and other practices, such as recognized “elders,” long associated with Opens.

A second distinct group, probably now the largest in North America (and they have some missionary work, mostly in Latin America), comprises those Exclusives who opposed Grant, then Raven, but supported a 1909 decision of the assembly in Tunbridge Wells, England, which the majority of their group (the Lowe-Continental) rejected. This division was largely healed in the United Kingdom in 1940, but the North Americans then made it clear that they opposed the principle of collective reunion. Reportedly, this grouping has been the most fissiparous of all.

The third and by far the most publicized of the Exclusive groups is often mistakenly thought to represent all of them, especially in English-speaking lands where they, apart from North America, have prevailed. These Exclusives sided with Raven in the 1890 split with Lowe and the Continentals, and then subsequently expelled those who sided with an assembly in Glanton, England, in 1908. This group alone has had the concept of a succession of principal leaders, the role that Darby had once filled. After Raven’s death James Taylor Sr. (1870–1953) of New York came to fill that role. Taylor’s ministry was even more controversial as far as other Exclusives were concerned, such as his denial that the title “son” belonged to Christ eternally. Curiously, during this period the large Local Church movement of the Chinese teacher Watchman Nee was associated with them from 1932 to 1935. (Their nickname “Little Flock” comes from the name of the hymnal used by Exclusives.)

On the elder Taylor’s death there was a considerable struggle before his son James Taylor Jr. (1899–1970) emerged as the recognized leader, but only after many defections. The younger Taylor was even stricter in promoting separation from what was deemed evil, so much so that the breakup of families and other actions led to negative publicity and government concerns in more than one country. Near the end of his life, scandal was alleged surrounding a visit from his

New York base to Aberdeen, Scotland. The result has been a major reduction in the size of this group, with those departing going in various directions, some of which formed small subgroups. Those who remained loyal to Taylor (and denied there was any scandalous behavior) were led after his death by James Symington (1913–1987) of North Dakota and then John S. Hales (1921–2002) of Australia, who was followed by his son, Bruce Hales (b. 1953). There are perhaps 40,000 adults in the Raven–Taylor–Hales group of the Exclusives in 300 assemblies in a score of countries but mostly in Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom. They are now less than half of all Exclusives globally. Although they do not vote, this section of Exclusives has nevertheless in recent years become involved in supporting certain political parties, candidates, and initiatives whose positions may coincide with some of their views. They also maintain a network of private schools for their children, sometimes subsidized and even commended by the state.

The Christian Brethren movement was one of the first of many attempts to reverse the divisions within Protestantism by trying to give continuous practical expression to the universal Christian belief that there is in fact only one church. Although all such attempts have so far failed to achieve that goal, besides some negative lessons to be learned, there have been many positive results from the effort. Surely some credit for denominational and clerical-lay distinctions not being taken so seriously as they once were goes to the Brethren movement and its often anonymous influence.

Donald Tinder

See also: Brethren; Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Darby, John Nelson; Free Churches; Local Church, The.

References

- Baylis, Robert. My People: The History of Christians Sometimes Called Plymouth Brethren. Port Colborne, ON: Gospel Folio, 2006.
- Dickson, Neil, and Tim Grass, eds. The Growth of the Brethren Movement. Milton Keynes, UK: Paternoster, 2006.
- Grass, Tim. Gathering to His Name. Milton Keynes, UK: Paternoster, 2006.

Shuff, Roger. Searching for the True Church. Milton Keynes, UK: Paternoster, 2005.

Tatford, Frederick. That the World May Know. 10 vols. Bath, UK: Echoes of Service, 1982–1986.

Wilkinson, Paul. For Zion's Sake: Christian Zionism and the Role of John Nelson Darby. Milton Keynes, UK: Paternoster, 2007.

www.brethrenhistory.org and www.brethrenportal.com (both with numerous links).

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) is one branch of the Restoration movement that grew out of the revivalist activities of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) on the American frontier in the early 19th century. The leaders of the movement all had Reformed theological backgrounds, but rejected the presbyterian hierarchical polity in favor of a loose congregationalism. They understood the church as consisting of autonomous congregations of members who had made a profession of faith in Jesus Christ. This Free church perspective led them to accept the view previously adopted by the Baptists that baptism should be by immersion and limited to adults.

In the middle of the 19th century, the churches of the Restoration movement tended to divide over two issues: the use of instrumental music (which the more conservative churches rejected) and the development of any organizations that tended to resemble denominational structures. The more conservative churches tended to be in the southern United States and to consist of poorer elements of the population. The more affluent churches in the northern states were more accepting of instrumental music, especially the use of organs in church worship. During the latter part of the 19th century, the northern churches were more accepting of historical-critical approaches to understanding the Bible and to more liberal trends in theology.

Through the 1840s the movement experienced rapid growth. A variety of associated schools and publishing concerns were founded. In 1849 a general convention was called to discuss coordinated support of the various forms of missional work in the areas of evangelism, foreign missions, and church extension. That convention adopted the name American Christian Missionary Society. Through the next 60 years, additional boards and agencies were created to oversee other joint programs supported by the churches. In 1910, many demanded that one general convention be formed that would centralize and coordinate the work of the various boards and agencies. That demand led to the creation in 1917 of the International Convention of the Christian Churches.

A delegate addresses the General Assembly of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Charlotte, North Carolina, on October 21, 2003. (AP/Wide World Images)

By the time of the formation of the International Convention, the more conservative wing of the movement, which rejected participation in organizations like the American Christian Missionary Society, had broken away under the name Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental). Besides those who supported the International Convention, there was a third group that rejected the trend toward centralization of activities in a denominational organization. They began increasingly through the century to identify themselves separately as the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ.

The churches that supported the International Convention increasingly came to resemble a denominational organization with a congregational polity. This was finally recognized in 1968 when the International Assembly of the Convention voted itself out of existence and reorganized as the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). The Disciples formed a representative general assembly, which meets biennially. It elects a general board, which administers all of the programs of the church and represents it to other churches and the government.

The Disciples have been active ecumenically, and were founding members of both the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the World Council of Churches. The church supports 19 institutions of higher learning. In 2005 the church reported 698,686 members in the United States.

Beginning in the 19th century, the Disciples began to support missionary programs around the world. In the later 20th century, most of these missions became autonomous churches and in several cases became a part of united churches (in the Philippines and India, for example). The Disciples retain a partnership relationship with many of these former mission churches. In 1985, the General Synod of the United Church of Christ and the General Assembly of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) issued a declaration of ecumenical partnership and four years later affirmed their full communion. In 1995 their world mission agencies merged as a Common Global Ministries Board.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
c/o Disciples Center
130 E. Washington St.
PO Box 1986
Indianapolis, IN 46206-1986
www.disciples.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental); Free Churches; United Church of Christ; World Council of Churches.

References

- Cummins, D. Duane. The Disciples: A Struggle for Reformation. St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2009.
- Cummins, D. Duane. A Handbook for Today's Disciples in the Christian Church. St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2003.
- Foster, Douglas A., et al., eds. The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Heltzel, Peter Goodwin. Chalice Introduction to Disciples Theology. St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2008.
- Jha, Sandhya. Room at the Table: Struggle for Unity and Equality in Disciples History. St. Louis, MO: Chalice Press, 2009.
- McAllister, Lester G., and William E. Tucker. Journey in Faith. St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1975.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada is one region of the larger 823,000-member Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) that is spread throughout the United States. The international headquarters for the denomination is in Indianapolis, Indiana. The Christian Church in Canada has congregations in six provinces, with the greatest number located in Ontario.

The first Disciples congregations in Canada were in the Maritimes, and were primarily founded by Scottish Baptist immigrants. The first Canadian congregation was formed near Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, in 1811, under the leadership of a Scottish Baptist preacher, Alexander Crawford. These Scottish immigrants were very receptive to the early 19th-century Restoration movement in the United States, a movement led by Americans Barton Stone (1772–1844) and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866). Many Scottish Baptist churches had become a part of the Restoration movement by 1840. The growth of the denomination was slow, limited by its small size and the vast distances between churches. In 1922 the All-Canada movement was begun as a way to coordinate and unite the churches and their efforts. Plans were discussed in the early part of the century to unite with the United Church, the Baptists, and the Anglicans, but after 1925 these talks ended. At the end of the 20th century there were 26 congregations in Canada, with around 2,700 members. The Christian Church in Canada is a member of the Canadian Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches. Its publication is the Canadian Disciple.

Disciples desire the church to live as it is described in the New Testament. Convinced that creeds and theological formulas divide the Body of Christ, they consider the Bible the only authority for faith and practice. This reflects the early Disciple motto, “Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent.” Believer’s baptism is practiced, and is administered by immersion (although other forms are recognized for church membership). The Lord’s Supper is a weekly celebration. These two ordinances are considered to be in obedience to Christ’s commands. Lay elders and deacons, both male and female, provide leadership for the church, as well as presiding over the Lord’s Supper. Clergy are ordained and granted credentials by each region. Service and missions work in the community and world are also considered to be important.

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in Canada
PO Box 23030
417 Wellington St.
St. Thomas, ON N5R 6A3
Canada
www.web.net/~disciple/canada.html

Gordon L. Heath

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); World Council of Churches.

References

- Butchart, Reuben. The Disciples of Christ in Canada since 1830. Toronto: Canadian Headquarters’ Publications, 1949.
- McAllister, Lester G., and William E. Tucker. Journey in Faith: A History of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1975.

Christian Church in Central Sulawesi

The Christian Church in South Sulawesi began as a Reformed church mission at the end of the 19th century, the mountainous terrain making the country one of the last areas over which the Dutch attempted to establish their hegemony. It also became important for the pioneering work of Albertus C. Kruyt (1869–1949), a Dutch missionary who broke with his missionary colleagues and approached the people of Sulawesi and their culture in a more positive manner. He worked on the island for 40 years (1892–1932) and built a movement that was integrated into the local culture and society.

Kruyt gained converts for many years, but did not hold an initial baptismal service until 1909, when he had gathered a large group ready to make a public profession of their faith. That event marked the beginning of a new growth phase that continued until World War II, by which time there were 42,000 church members. They were able to survive the war in better shape than other parts of Indonesia through the help of a Japanese civil servant who went out of his way to protect them.

The synod of the Christian Church in Central Sulawesi was organized in 1947, but was immediately plunged into a period of instability, due to both the Islamic revolt centered in the southern part of the island and the secessionist movement against the Indonesian government. Not until the 1970s was Sulawesi to return to a time of relative calm. In 1974, the church finally adopted a formal presbyterian church order. To assist the general recovery of the region from the troubled period through which it had passed, the church founded an agricultural college, which supplemented its older educational program that had included a number of primary and secondary schools. It also sponsors a hospital.

Christian church in Manado, Sulawesi. Christians make up an important minority group in Sulawesi, where most people follow Islam. (Guillen Photography/StockphotoPro)

In 2005 the church reported 188,000 members in 376 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Christian Church in Central Sulawesi
Jin Setia Budi 93
Tentena 94663

Sulawesi Tengah
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Christian Church in East Timor

See Protestant Church in Timor Larosa'e.

Christian Church in South Sulawesi

The Christian Church in South Sulawesi (Gereja Kristen in Sulawesi Selatan [GKSS]) began in 1933, but built on a century of Protestant contact with the people of the southern part of Sulawesi. In 1848 a translator arrived at the Dutch settlement in Makassar and translated the Bible into the two local languages. At the time Islam was spreading through the region, and the Dutch authorities prevented the Protestants from opening a mission station, as they tried to do in 1858. Another attempt was made in 1895, but had little success and was abandoned in 1905.

Finally, in 1933 a mission was established on the nearby island of Salayar among a group of heterodox Muslims. That mission provided a point of contact with the main island. Simultaneously, a congregation of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands in Java started a mission in South Sulawesi. Several hundred people converted prior to the Japanese occupation. Following World War II, South Sulawesi became the site of an Islamic revolt that lasted through the 1950s. It was not until the mid-1960s that the Christian community recovered. In 1966 the two missions merged and formed the Christian Church in South Sulawesi. It has grown slowly, but has been unable to effectively penetrate the Muslim community.

The church has a presbyterian organization, with a synod as the highest legislative body. In the 1990s it reported 6,500 members in 41 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Communion of Churches in Indonesia. It was a member of the World Council of Churches through the 1990s but has in more recent years withdrawn.

Christian Church in South Sulawesi
PO Box 11186
Jalan Ketilang No. 4
Ujang Pandang 90011 Sulawesi Selatan
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Church of Sumba

Sumba is a relatively small Indonesian island located west of Timor and east of Bali. It was formally incorporated into the possessions of the Dutch East Indies in 1866. In the process of establishing control of the island, the government moved immigrants from the island of Sawa. Initially two congregations came into being among these new arrivals in the 1870s. A missionary first arrived in 1881 and the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (now an integral part of the Protestant Church in the Netherlands) assumed control of the work in 1892.

As it turned out, the Sumbanese and the more recent residents from Sawa did not get along very well. The souring of the relations between the two groups meant that few Sumbanese became Christians. Thus in 1907, the missionaries in effect made a new beginning and set up an initial missionary post among the Sumbanese that was disconnected from the older work. Teachers from other islands came to Sumba to expand the work, but the first baptism did not occur until 1915. As congregations were established, they were given autonomy, but the leadership was not ordained. Only in 1942 was a Sumbanese minister ordained, and he was executed during the war by the Japanese who occupied the island.

After the war, the process of organizing the more than 5,000 Sumbanese Christians and providing them with an ordained ministry was accelerated. The church became autonomous in 1947, and while a number of the missionaries remained, they assumed an advisory position.

In 1972, the church worked out a new agreement with the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands that reordered their cooperative relationship. In the 1990s issues of contextualization of the Christian message and an accompanying renewed appreciation of the island traditions came to the fore.

The church is organized with a presbyterian polity. It has the Nicene Creed and the Heidelberg Catechism as its standards of faith. It sponsors two hospitals, several schools, and a variety of social service programs. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1998 and is also a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Reformed Ecumenical Council.

Jln R. Suprpto 23
Waingapu
87113
Sumba
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Protestant Church in the Netherlands; Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Churches and Churches of Christ

The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ form one branch of the Restoration movement that grew out of the revivalist activities of Barton Stone (1772–1844), Thomas Campbell (1763–1854), and Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) on the American frontier in the early 19th century. The leaders of the movement all had Reformed theological backgrounds, but rejected the presbyterian hierarchical polity in favor of congregationalism. They also adopted a Free church perspective that saw the church as made up of autonomous congregations of members who had made an adult profession of faith in Jesus Christ.

First Christian Church is located in Columbus, Indiana. The First Christian Church, established in 1942, was designed by Eliel Saarinen and was originally known as the Tabernacle Church of Christ. (Corbis/G.E. Kidder Smith)

As the movement developed it associated with some similar antiauthoritarian movements that had developed in the eastern part of the United States under James O’Kelly (1757–1826) in Virginia and Abner Jones (ca. 1772–1841) and Elias Smith (1769–1846) in New England. These groups identified themselves as simply the Christian Church. Thus they had a natural affinity with the larger Restoration movement, which rejected all denominational labels. They also rejected church creeds, preferring to rely upon the Bible alone as their guiding authority. Alexander Campbell had stated their position: “Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent.”

As the movement developed, it divided over several important issues resulting from variant interpretations of the basic guiding principle. The most conservative wing rejected the use of instrumental music in worship and the organization of an association or fellowship of churches that offered the possibility of developing into a denominational structure. This conservative wing is now known as the Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental). The more liberal wing had no problem with instrumental music (especially organ music) and in the 1840s began to develop annual meetings of congregational representatives that led to the emergence of a new denomination, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ fit between these two groups. The congregations do not have an issue with instrumental music. They are opposed to the development of denominational machinery, but are not opposed to voluntary gatherings at which representatives of the churches facilitate cooperative activities in missions and ministries. Such an annual gathering is coordinated by the North American Christian Convention (4210 Bridgetown Rd., Cincinnati, OH 45811). There is also an annual National Missionary Convention that focuses upon programs outside the United States.

In the absence of denominational machinery, the congregations have created a variety of outreach programs beyond the local churches. Members have organized colleges and a variety of missionary societies. Each school and missionary agency is independent and seeks support by a direct appeal to local congregations. In this manner missionaries are now supported in more than 50 countries.

In 1931, many of the Christian churches merged with the Congregational Church to form the General Council of the Congregational-Christian Churches (now a constituent part of the United Church of Christ). Those that did not join the merger identified with the more moderate congregations, which called themselves Churches of Christ, and in the last half of the 20th century emerged as a third significant branch of the Restoration movement.

The Christian Churches and Churches of Christ do not have a central headquarters, though many congregations meet together at the annual North American Christian Convention, whose office keeps many of the group's records. Among 38 colleges identified with this movement are the Cincinnati Bible College and Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio, and Lincoln Christian College and Seminary in Lincoln, Nebraska. Among the prominent periodicals identified with it are the Chris- tian Standard and the Lookout, both published by the Christian Standard Publishing House (8121 Hamilton Ave., Cincinnati, OH 45231), which also publishes much Christian education material used by the congregations. In 1995, the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ reported 1,071,616 members in the United States and 5,500 members in Canada. More than 1,500 missionaries were supported by the churches in 53 additional countries. Mission Services Association (Box 2427, Knoxville, TN 37901-2427) promotes the missionary programs operating among the churches.

North American Christian Convention
4210 Bridgetown Rd.
Cincinnati, OH 45211

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental); Free Churches; United Church of Christ.

References

- Conkin, Paul B. American Originals: Homemade Varieties of Christianity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Foster, Douglas A., et al., eds. The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Leggett, Marshall. Introduction to the Restoration Ideal. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1986.
- Murch, James DeForest. Christians Only. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1962.
- NACC, History and Purpose. Cincinnati, OH: North American Christian Convention, 1973.
- North American Gold: The Story of 50 North American Christian Conventions*. Joplin, MO: College Press Publishing Company, 1989.

Christian Churches of Java

The Christian Churches of Java (Gereja-Gereja Kristen Java [GKJ]) as a movement has its roots in the various missionary efforts that were started by different missionary groups operating in Java in the first half of the 19th century. One product of those missions was a man named Sadrach, who broke with the Europeans and started his own Christian movement. At a time when most Europeans had a low opinion of Javanese culture, Sadrach was a product of it. His movement spread through central Java in the 1870s and 1880s.

Christian church in Bogor, West Java, Indonesia. Christianity is a minority religion in Indonesia, where most people are Muslims. (Yoppy Pieter/StockphotoPro)

In the 1880s a Dutch missionary agency, the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging, moved into Java in an attempt to organize the scattered Christians into a single organization. It immediately came in contact with Sadrach's movement, but around 1890 rejected him and his work. With those Christians who adhered to it, the agency decided to make a new beginning. In 1894 the agency was absorbed into the Zending der Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. In 1900 the missionaries decided to build their church on a Dutch model. It introduced Western education and opened a number of medical facilities. However, it attached many elements of traditional culture. It also adopted a stance against Indonesian nationalism.

In spite of its opposition to the culture, the new church now known as the Christian Churches of Java slowly grew. In 1931 the synod was organized with Javanese leadership. The presbyterian church order was adopted the following year. The missionaries remained in place until the arrival of the Japanese in 1942. When the missionaries returned following the war, they were placed in subordinate positions in the autonomous church, whose members were active participants in the establishment of an independent Indonesia.

In the 1990s the church reported 212,000 members. An ecumenically minded body, it joined the World Council of Churches in 1948 and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches in 1959, though in recent years it has withdrawn from the Council. It also participated in talks that aimed at uniting the several Javanese-speaking churches of Reformed background, but negotiations failed to produce positive results.

Christian Churches of Java
Jalan Dr. Samardi No. 10
Salatiga 50711 Java Tengah
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Churches Together in the U.S.A.

Christian Churches Together in the U.S.A. (CCT) is an effort founded at the beginning of the 21st century to broaden the visible expression of Christian unity that is provided by the larger ecumenical bodies operating in the United States, and to speak especially to the division between liberal and evangelical Protestants. To that end CCT began as a diverse group of Christian leaders representative of the evangelical and Pentecostal, Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and liberal Protestant churches. It also reached out to churches most identified by their racial and/or ethnic makeup.

An initial meeting of interested church leaders convened in September 2001, to be followed by two meetings in 2002 at which the present name was chosen, announcements of their gathering were publicized, and a call was made for more participants. At the gathering in Chicago in April 2002, a statement was issued that suggested that a common witness could be visible through the many churches celebrating a common confession of faith in the Triune God; seeking the guidance of the Holy Spirit through biblical, spiritual, and theological reflection; engaging in common prayer; speaking to society with a common voice; promoting the common good of society; fostering faithful evangelism; seeking reconciliation by affirming commonalities and understanding differences; and building a community of fellowship and mutual support.

The next years were devoted to organizational development, especially the establishment of a process by which denominational bodies could officially join the organization. In 2005, the Steering Committee finalized the proposed organizational structure and initiated plans for an official organizing meeting that was held in Atlanta on March 30, 2006, with 34 churches and organizations in attendance.

CCT has chosen to operate by consensus. Its first goals are focused on building trust and friendships among the participating bodies. By aiming for consensus in its actions, it ensures that no minority at any point is left out of deliberations and that the majority on any issue are forced to listen and work through minority opinions.

By 2008, 43 denominations and parachurch organizations had joined and an additional 13 were in process of joining. Members run the spectrum of the American Christian community.

Christian Churches Together in the U.S.A.
PO Box 24188

Indianapolis, IN 46224-0188
<http://www.christianchurchestogether.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

References

“At first meeting, Christian Churches Together tackles poverty.” Catholic News Service, February 15, 2007. <http://www.catholicnews.com/data/stories/cns/0700911.htm>.

Granberg-Michaelson, Wesley. “Christian Churches Together.” Sojourners (February 2006). <http://www.sojo.net/index.cfm?action=magazine.article&issue=Soj0602&article=060221b>.

Christian Community (Movement for Religious Renewal)

In 1922, a group of pastors and theology students approached Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925), the founder of Anthroposophy whom they knew to be very concerned with the Christian life, to find ways of renewing the church after the tragedy of World War I. While Steiner was not inclined to limit himself to the institutional structure of Christian denominations, and was quite uninterested in beginning a Christian sect centered on himself, he nevertheless had ideas as to how the Christian community might reinvigorate itself in the light of Anthroposophy. He worked with a Lutheran pastor, Friedrich Rittelmeyer (1872–1938), Emil Bock, and others to initiate what eventually came to be called the Movement for Religious Renewal and then the Christian Community.

Steiner’s own understanding of Christianity through his study of Esotericism and his own clairvoyant experiences became a source for reunderstanding and reinterpreting what the foundations of Christianity were about. In contrast to other Christian revival efforts, such as the evangelical Fundamentalists, the neo-orthodox such as Karl Barth, or the Existentialists such as Paul Tillich, which emphasize a particular understanding of Christian doctrine, the distinctive feature of this renewal movement is the centrality of the sacraments in the Christian experience. The unity and continuity of their church lie in the definitive form of the sacraments. Rather than laying emphasis upon “normative doctrine,” the Christian Community has what might be called “normative practice.” The traditional seven sacraments are given a broader meaning through Esoteric Christianity as understood by Steiner.

Religious philosopher and writer Rudolf Steiner helped found the denomination known as the Christian Community.

While Steiner understood the practice of Esoteric Christianity in Anthroposophy to involve a more solitary spiritual journey, the Christian Community offers spiritual experience in the context of a collective congregation of believers that may make Esotericism somewhat more accessible to people in their everyday circumstances. As with Steiner’s own thought, the education of children to grow into loving free individuals is an important part of the work of the Christian Community.

For the Christian Community, religious experience is central to what they are about. They invite people to come to their services on the basis of the experience of the sacraments that they will receive. Most strikingly, the Mass, centering on the Eucharist, becomes “the Rite of the Consecration of Man” and is the central sacrament of the Christian Community. They practice “open Communion” wherein all who feel they may benefit from participating in the sacrament are both free and encouraged to partake of it.

The Christian Community emphasizes freedom of thought and reflection within the framework of Christian symbolism. The work of Rudolf Steiner is a continuing source of inspiration and insight, and he is freely cited and acknowledged by the Community. They emphasize however that, as Rudolf Steiner himself insisted, his work is to be a launching point for further reflection, and was not simply to become a new orthodoxy.

So much is freedom of thought encouraged and respected that the priests of the Community, when speaking or writing, are said to be sharing their own understanding of what the Community is about and not speaking in some definitive way for the Community as a whole. Their religious leaders are called “priests” though they often use the German word Lenker (guide) to describe them. Since its founding, men and women have both been eligible for ordination. Issues and problems are dealt with by synods of priests and, as much as possible, decisions are made by consensus.

There are now about 350 independent Christian Community congregations worldwide, 12 in the United States. The first congregation was founded in New York in 1948. The Christian Community has spread to other countries, particularly Germany, though there is a growing presence in the Czech Republic, where it sees the possibility of becoming an influential Christian movement in that country. Each congregation is expected to be financially independent and, like other Christian churches, depends upon contributions.

The Christian Community in New York
309 W. 74th St.
New York, NY 10023-1604
212-877-3577
www.thechristiancommunity.org

James Burnell Robinson

See also: Anthroposophical Society; Steiner, Rudolf; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Bock, Emil. Caesars and Apostles. Edinburgh, Scotland: Floris Books, 1999.
- Hindes, James. Renewing Christianity. Edinburgh, Scotland: Floris Books, 1995.
- Frieling, Rudolf. New Testament Studies. Edinburgh, Scotland: Floris Books, 1994.
- Steiner, Rudolf. The Christian Mystery. Trans. by James Hindes. Herndon, VA: Anthroposophical Press, 1998.

Christian Conference of Asia

The Christian Conference of Asia emerged in the atmosphere of ecumenism that permeated the post–World War II decade and the spirit of decolonialism that swept through the Christian world outside Europe and North America. An initial meeting of some representative churches in 1957 in Indonesia led to the founding of the East Asia Christian Conference two years later in Kuala Lumpur. The present name, reflecting the enlargement of the area covered by member churches, was adopted in 1973. The council's territory reaches from India and Sri Lanka across Southeast Asia to Japan and Korea.

The council's assembly meets every five years. It elects the General Committee, which is composed of the elected officers and one representative from each country represented in the Christian Conference of Asia. The Committee administers the affairs of the Conference between assemblies.

In 2009, the Conference reported membership of more than 100 churches from 17 countries. Missing from its member churches has been the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council, the primary Protestant church in the People's Republic of China, though the Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China is among its most active member churches.

Christian Conference of Asia
c/o Payap University
Muang, Chiang Mai 50000
Thailand
<http://www.cca.org.hk/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council; Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Congregation of Brazil

The Christian Congregation of Brazil (Congregação Cristã do Brasil) began among Italians who had migrated to Brazil in the 19th century. Luigi Francescon (1866–1964) had migrated to the United States and while living in Chicago had converted to Protestantism; then in 1907 he had received the Pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit (with the accompanying evidence of speaking in tongues) while attending services at the church pastored by William H. Durham (1863–1912). In 1909 he migrated to Argentina and began the Pentecostal movement there before moving to São Paulo, Brazil, in 1910. A short time after making contact with the Italian community he founded initial congregations in Santo Antonia da Platina and São Paulo.

Growth was primarily in southern Brazil (as most Italians lived in the São Paulo area), but expansion took the movement to Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, and Bolivia. By the mid-1930s there were some 2,000 members and by the mid-1950s, 16,000. The church spread among the lower economic classes, and its services were designed to meet the needs of the illiterate. The church has also developed programs to create jobs for the unemployed.

The church was organized as a lay movement, with leadership being provided by deacons and elders, there being no officially ordained pastors or ministers. The church grew primarily by word of mouth and the public evangelistic meetings so characteristic of most Pentecostal churches. The church opposes legalistic practices, including the observance of Sunday as a special day and tithing. Services have an air of spontaneity.

The church follows Pentecostal doctrine and practice, but has developed some rules that reflect its unique circumstances. Critics have noted that Bible study is not emphasized, the work of the church being carried on as a nonliterary movement. Much that happens in worship, including who will preach on a given occasion, is not decided ahead of time; rather the congregation allows the Spirit to designate the preacher and the message.

A statue of Christ stands outside a Christian church in Porto Seguro, Brazil. (Sergio Tafner Jorge/StockphotoPro)

The Christian Congregation grew at a spectacular rate in the last half of the 20th century, with more than 1.5 million members by the end of the 1990s. It is the third largest Protestant Free church body in the country, having transcended its Italian roots.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Pentecostalism.

References

Anderson, Allen. An Introduction to Pentecostalism: Global Charismatic Christianity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997.

Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow

During the Dutch era in the East Indies, the kingdom of Bolaang Mongondow was neglected by Dutch authorities, and Islam was established as the dominant religion. Then in 1904, the Muslim king asked the Protestant mission to establish schools in his realm. Protestants responded by moving to the area from the Sangir Islands and the Minahasa peninsula. They founded schools and, at the same time, the Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang Mongondow (Gereja Masehi Injili di Bolaang Mongondow [GMIBM]), but they did almost no proselytizing among the general population. Worship continued in the Sangir and Minahasa languages. As late as 1970, the membership of the church consisted primarily of the descendants of the original Protestant settlers.

In 1950, when Indonesia became an independent country, the church became an independent body. It adopted (or rather continued) its Reformed doctrine and church order, with a synod as the highest legislative body. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (since 1974) and the Communion of Churches in Indonesia. It was a member of the World Council of Churches, but has in more recent years withdrawn.

In the mid-1990s the church reported 86,000 members in 176 congregations in an area that is still predominantly Muslim. It supports the Fakultas Teologia Universitas Kristen at Tomohon, Indonesia.

Christian Evangelical Church in Bolaang

Mongondow
PO Box 104
Jalan Ahmad Yani No. 720
Kotamobagu 9571 Sulawesi Utara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera

Halmahera, an island in the midst of Indonesia, was Muslim territory when the Dutch arrived in the area at the beginning of the 17th century. They made no attempt to establish a Christian presence on the island, and it was not until 1866 that some Dutch Protestants established a mission station. The missionaries had very little response through the rest of the century, a result that has been attributed in large part to their denigration of the dominant Islamic culture. After a generation of work, only 150 people had become Christians.

In 1896 a movement into the church began, and during the next generation some 17,000 people identified with the church. The group suffered during World War II, as the Japanese placed a key military base on Halmahera. Many citizens were forced to work for the Japanese, and their home became targets for Allied bombs. During this period, the church members formed an independent church. Following the war, local church leaders renegotiated their relationship with the missionaries, and in 1949, the present Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera (Gereja Masehi Injili Halmahera [GMIH]) emerged. It had some 30,000 members. Shortly thereafter all of the missionaries withdrew, Halmahera being a major point of conflict between the Netherlands and the Indonesians who were bent on independence.

In 1965 the Indonesian government pressured those on Halmahera who continued to follow one of their traditional religions to choose one of the modern religions recognized by the government. Many chose the Evangelical Church, which enjoyed a sudden and unexpected spurt in growth. By the 1990s the church reported some 150,000 members in 328 congregations. In 2005 it reported 300,000 members in 374 churches. It now manages a set of schools, including one university and two theological schools. It sponsors a hospital and a home for the elderly.

The church has a presbyterian polity, and a synod serves as the highest legislative body. It accepts the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standard. It is a member of the World Council of Churches (since 1979) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Christian Evangelical Church in Halmahera

Jalan Kemakmuran
Tobelo
Halmahera Maluku Utara 97762
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa

The present Evangelical Church in Minahasa (Gereja Masehi Injili di Minahasa [GMIM]) traces its history to the original introduction of Christianity in that area on the northern peninsula of Sulawesi in Indonesia. In 1563, the Portuguese had established a mission of the Roman Catholic Church in Minahasa and baptized some 1,500 people, but a war with the Muslims on another island in 1570 prevented the spread of the mission. Much of northern Sulawesi subsequently became Islamized. The Catholics also gave the church members very little care. Eventually, in 1666, the Dutch, who had taken control of Indonesia, led in the conversion of all the Christians in Minahasa to the Reformed Protestant faith. However, they too neglected the community of believers.

It was in 1817 that a Reformed minister, Joseph Kam (1769–1833), of the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zending visited the community and arranged for permanent missionary care. The work revived quickly, and through the remainder of the century some 80 percent of the people became Christians. In 1875 the work came directly under the care of the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands. Through the next decades, the church developed outstanding local leadership and itself sent missionaries to other parts of Indonesia. In 1927 it became an independent church, though a Dutch minister was chosen to head the synod until 1942, when the first Minahasan assumed that post. A. Z. R. Wenas went on to become the church's most visible leader for the next generation. It became his job to negotiate with the Japanese and then to see the church through the period in which forces seeking secession from the new state of Indonesia arose on Sulawesi. He also led the church in its opposition to Marxism.

The church is organized presbyterially, and has over the years wavered on the amount of congregational autonomy it allows. Typical of Indonesian churches, it has developed a primary and secondary school system and sponsors several hospitals and other medical facilities. In the 2005 it reported 730,000 members in 816 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Christian Evangelical Church in Minahasa
PO Box 5
Tomohon Minahasa
Sulawesi Utara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Christian Evangelical Church in Timor

See Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor.

Christian Evangelical Church of Sangihe Talaud

The Christian Evangelical Church of Sangihe Talaud (known in Indonesian as the Gereja Masehi Injili Sangihe Talaud [GMIST]) dates to the arrival in 1857 of a group of German carpenters in the Sanghe islands, located on the eastern edge of the Celebes Sea south of the Philippines. There was already a large number of Christians in the islands, the product of proselytizing during the years of Portuguese and Spanish rule. They had, however, been without leadership for a period and their practice was weak. A short time later a second team of carpenters settled on Talaud Island, where the earlier Christian community had all but disappeared.

Under the sponsorship of the Dutch Missionary Society, the carpenters worked at clearing land, building churches, and spreading the teachings of the Reformed Church. They worked in relative isolation for most of their lives and when they finally passed away, the Society assumed full responsibility for the mission they had brought into being. The work proved relatively successful and membership increased from around 20,000 when they began to 121,000 by 1936. By the end of the century, 90 percent of the residents were church members.

The maturing of the mission was punctuated by two important events. In 1921, the missionaries ordained 16 pastors from among the Native people, and began to turn over to them the responsibility for the continuation of the work. A presbyterian polity was slowly installed. In 1947, the mission became autonomous as the Christian Evangelical Church of Sangihe Talaud.

The church has adopted the Apostles' and Chacedonian creeds as its doctrinal standard. In 2006, it reported 198,200 members in 322 churches. Pastors, slightly over half of whom are women, are trained primarily at the Faculty of Theology at the Indonesian Christian University at Tomohon on North Sulawesi.

The church is a member of both the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Kantor Sinode GMIST
PO Box 1221
Tahuna, Sangihe Talaud
Sulawesi Utara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Holiness Partnership

The Christian Holiness Partnership, the cooperative fellowship of Holiness churches and organizations, is one of the oldest Holiness organizations, having been founded in 1867 as the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness. The Holiness movement had developed slowly in the decades just prior to the American Civil War (1861–1865), but then enjoyed a sudden spurt of growth in the late 1850s. Immediately after the war, it quickly revived and spread through camp meetings that operated independently of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (both now constituent parts of the United Methodist Church), the churches in which most Holiness people then held membership. Over the next decades, people from other denominational backgrounds (especially Baptists and Quakers) associated with the movement. In the 1870s work extended to India and Australia, and by the end of the 1880s, the first Holiness denominations were formed.

The changes in the Holiness movement were reflected in the changing names and orientation of the Christian Holiness Partnership. In 1894, the words “Camp Meeting” were dropped. It operated through the first half of the 20th century as the National Holiness Association, becoming the Christian Holiness Association in 1971, a name that accommodated Canadian members. The present name was adopted in 1997, and reflects the reorientation in the late 20th century of North American thinking about former mission churches in the rest of the world.

The partnership now exists as a cooperative fellowship of Holiness churches worldwide. Membership currently (2009) consists of 17 churches. The Christian Holiness Partnership allows independent congregations and local churches to affiliate, whether their parent denominational bodies are part of the Christian Holiness Partnership or not. Approximately 10 percent of the individual members are also members of the United Methodist Church.

Christian Holiness Partnership
263 Buffalo Rd.
Clinton TN 37716

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Holiness Movement; United Methodist Church.

References

- Christian Holiness Partnership. Catalogue of Holiness Books. Clinton, TN: Partnership Press, 1999.
- Jones, Charles Edwin. A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

Christian Life Churches International

Christian Life Churches International is one of the larger church bodies to emerge out of the Charismatic movement in Australia. The fellowship began in 1970, when New Zealander Trevor Chandler came to Brisbane in January 1970 as pastor of a Pentecostal church. He was assisted in his work by Clark Taylor, who later left to found the Christian Outreach Centre. The church in Brisbane adopted the name Christian Life Center in 1972. Additional associated centers were opened in other nearby communities, and by 1975 there were seven congregations (five in Queensland and two in New South Wales) associated with each other.

In 1986, the various churches that were fellowshiping with each other adopted the name Christian Life Churches International. They remain a loose association of autonomous congregations that share a common faith and life. Their doctrine is like that of mainstream Pentecostalism.

Christian Life Churches International has continued to grow both by initiating new congregations and by the affiliation of older congregations with the fellowship. As of 2009, there were some 25 churches and missions in Australia and affiliated work in Papua-New Guinea, Japan, China, Malaysia, Italy, and Africa.

Christian Life Churches International
142 Pine Mountain Road
Brassall QLD 4305
Australia
www.clci@clci.org.au

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Charismatic Movement; Christian Outreach Centre; Pentecostalism.

Reference

- Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Christian Methodist Episcopal Church

“Set up, but not set off” is the way the Christian Methodist Episcopal (CME) Church characterizes its emergence as an independent Methodist body. The phrase reflects the communion’s assertion that, unlike other black Methodist communions, it is a legitimate offspring of its parent body, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS) (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church).

The slavery establishment in the pre-Civil War United States resisted the evangelization of African bondspersons, largely out of fear that the Christian gospel of the unity of humanity under God would have an unsettling, insurrectionary effect on the enslaved. There was a particular antipathy to such a message being delivered by persons from the free North and from others sympathetic to abolition. On the other hand, the South, which argued on biblical and theological grounds the validity of slavery, did not want to appear to undermine the work of evangelism among enslaved Africans, in as much as the need to Christianize them was one of the chief justifying rationales long advanced in support of their forcible importation to the West. So, by 1830, while barring “outside” evangelists, the Southern churches were investing considerable energy in converting and taking into membership the enslaved population, albeit on terms that were consonant with their slave status. As in the society more broadly, Methodists scored notable numerical successes for their efforts among blacks.

Worshippers celebrate at the official re-opening and rededication service of the Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church in the Lower Ninth Ward on June 1, 2008, in New Orleans, Louisiana. (Getty Images)

But following the close of hostilities in the Civil War, African American members in the white churches of the South began flooding out of those bodies and affiliating with established black congregations and denominations, which used their access to the South to do active recruitment. In opting for black denominations, the formerly enslaved were affirming their newly acquired freedom to choose and their sense of identity with and pride in institutions founded by African Americans. The black members of the MECS seem to have been impelled by these same motives, and most left the communion. But others also valued their Methodist identity and their association with the institution by which had come their spiritual rebirth. Thus, in 1866, those 78,000 remaining requested that they be granted a separate ecclesiastical structure and the ordination of their own clergy and bishops. The MECS General Conference granted the request, and in December 1870, the new denomination was organized in Jackson, Tennessee. The parent body transferred to this new Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America all properties that had formerly been used by the black members. In subsequent decades the MECS and its successor bodies sustained close ties with the CMEC (the name changing in the mid-20th century from Colored to Christian to honor current racial nomenclature). Material assistance and consultation continued to be extended; warm association continued to be shared.

The initial focus of the CMEC was the American South, its birthplace. But as the primarily southern African American population migrated slowly to other regions in the postwar years, the CMEC sought to follow with its ministry. Congregations were established along both coasts, in the Southwest, and in the Midwest, though the numerical strength of the denomination in the United States has remained in the South.

Israel Metropolitan Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D.C. (J. Gordon Melton)

The CME General Conference established in 1873 a General Missionary Board to coordinate the church's expansion efforts. The 1886 General Conference authorized Women's Missionary Societies to be organized at all levels of the church's structure to assist in the support of missional efforts. To this point, the vision was for home missions, that is, evangelizing and addressing the pervasive needs of the U.S. black population. However, the 1898 General Conference considered that the time had come for the church to undertake mission work in Africa, the homeland. And in 1902, the Vanderhorst Foreign Missionary Society was organized to pursue that purpose. Nonetheless, the effort did not come to fruition at that time. The leadership of the church, in assessing the resources of the denomination and the still pressing, far-ranging needs of the African American population, decided that for the time being the priority should remain with home missions.

In 1910, the MECS initiated a plan of cooperation between itself and the CMEC for inaugurating mission work on the African continent. The CME General Conference of that year voted to participate. Some preparatory steps were taken, and there was even an exploratory journey to the Belgian Congo. But the work languished. A subsequent effort in 1926 to establish the CME Church in Trinidad had a promising beginning but also fell into quietude.

Then in 1947, a minister in the Gold Coast (later renamed Ghana) wrote to invite the CMEC to come to that place. In a series of positive responses, the CMEC supported the zeal for missions of the Reverend M. L. Breeding, who in 1954 began the active establishment of the church in Ghana. In his statement to the 1958 General Conference, Breeding declared: "The time is ripe for us to move into Ghana to help build this little country into a strong Christian nation so that it can link up with the total liberation of Africa." In that year, lasting CME mission work in Africa began.

In 1978, the CMEC accepted the request of some independent congregations in Haiti to be brought into the denomination. In 1980, the same response was given to congregations applying from Jamaica.

The concern for African American identity and well-being that led to the call for setting up an independent CME Church also continued to find expression in the founding of multiple primary and collegiate educational institutions, such as Paine College in Augusta, Georgia, and Lane College in Jackson, Tennessee. It also found expression in a record of CME clergy and lay involvement in public advocacy for civil rights and racial advancement.

Today, the CMEC has approximately 850,000 members spread among some 3,000 congregations in the United States, Jamaica, Haiti, Liberia, Ghana, and Nigeria.

Christian Methodist Episcopal Church
564 Frank Ave.
Memphis, TN 38101
www.cmesonline.org

Larry G. Murphy

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; United Methodist Church.

Resources:

- Lakey, Othal Hawthorne. The History of the CME Church. Rev. ed. Memphis, TN: The CME Publishing House, 1996.
- Melton, J. Gordon. A Will to Choose: The Origins of African American Methodism. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2007.
- Murphy, Larry, J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. The Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.

Phillips, C. H. The History of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America. Jackson, TN:

Publishing House of the CME Church, 1925.

Richardson, Harry V. Dark Salvation: The Story of Methodism as It Developed among Blacks in America. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1976.

Christian Outreach Centre

One of several products of the charismatic revival in Australia, the Christian Outreach Centre (COC) traces its beginning to a congregation organized by Reverend Clark Taylor (b. 1937) in Brisbane in 1974. Taylor had formerly been a Methodist minister and in the 1960s had been healed of cerebral malaria. In 1970, he joined with Reverend Trevor Chandler in the founding of Christian Life Churches International, which originated in Brisbane. Two years later he became independent and began a period as an itinerant evangelist. He proved to be an appealing speaker who placed an emphasis on the visible manifestations of the Holy Spirit, especially the phenomenon of "slaying in the Spirit," in which people appear to faint under the Spirit's power.

In 1974 he founded the original Christian Outreach Centre in Brisbane. Through the next 15 years, additional congregations joined together, and the association known as Christian Outreach Centre was formed, primarily in Queensland and New South Wales, including a large congregation of several thousand at Mansfield, possibly the largest congregation in the country. Then in 1990, Taylor was accused of sexual immorality and removed from all leadership positions. Neil Miers was selected to head the fellowship, and he has continued as the international president since that time.

The church affirms a mainline Pentecostal doctrinal position, with an emphasis on the gifts of the Spirit and the freedom and joy that the Holy Spirit brings to the life of the believer. Unlike many Charismatic groups, the Centre has a centralized government, with all the local church property held in the name of the whole body by a Property Commission. A committee of pastors oversees denominational matters, including the ordination, appointments, and discipline of the ministers.

In the 1980s, the Christian Outreach Centre began work in the Solomons and other islands of the South Pacific, and by the end of 1988, there were 136 churches reaching from Auckland, New Zealand, to Perth, western Australia. Rapid growth was continuing and the following year, churches were established in Papua-New Guinea, Fiji, Vanuatu, the United Kingdom, and Malaysia; the first Bible college complex was completed in Brisbane. Through the 1990s, churches were opened in South Africa, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Germany, South America, Tonga, western Samoa, Spain, the United States, Argentina, and Bolivia. COC launched Global Care in 1996 with a program to deliver relief aid, development programs, and deploy Christ-centered mission works. Expansion has continued through the opening years of the new century. As of 2009, work was sustained in some 30 countries worldwide.

322 Wecker Road
Mansfield QLD 4122
Victoria
Australia
www.coc.org.au

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Charismatic Movement; Christian Life Churches International.

References

- Christian Outreach Centre (UK). <http://www.coc.org.uk/>.
- Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.

Christian Protestant Angkola Church

See Protestant Christian Church—Angkola.

Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia

The Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (Gereja Kristen Protestan Indonesia [GKPI]) grew out of several attempts at revival and reform by members of the Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP), one of the larger churches in Indonesia, with the majority of its two million members residing in northern Sumatra. When the church did not respond positively to the concerns of the reformers in the early 1960s, several of the movements for reform made common cause in a Coordinating Body for Reformation within the HKBP. That organization proved the proto-organization of the Christian Protestant Church, which was formed in 1964. The new church existed in a state of tension with its parent body for a decade before a reconciliation (but not a reunion) occurred.

The church is headed by its general synod, which meets every five years, and its bishop. Its congregations are organized into circuits and the circuits into districts. The pastors choose the bishop, whose election is then ratified by the synod. The synod also elects an executive committee, which administers the church's affairs between synod meetings.

Doctrinally, the church follows the Lutheran perspective of its parent body. It has an expansive evangelical program that has carried it across Sumatra into Java. By the end of the 1980s more than 220,000 people had joined the new church. In 2005 it reported 348,575 members and 1,114 churches. It joined the Lutheran World Federation in 1975 and established a relationship with the United Evangelical Mission similar to what its parent body enjoyed. The church also joined the World Council of Churches in 1977.

Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia
JinKpt. M. H. Sitorus 13
PO Box 36
Pematangsiatar 21115
Sumatera Utera
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Protestant Christian Batak Church; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Indonesian worshippers attend Christmas Mass at a Protestant church in Jakarta on December 24, 2009. Christians in this Muslim-majority country along with other Christians worldwide observe religious rituals on Christmas Eve, the day before Christmas, which commemorates the birth of Jesus Christ. (AFP/Getty Images)

Christian Reformed Church in North America

The Christian Reformed Church in North America dates to the 1830s and the secession of members of the Netherlands Reformed Church who rejected the attempt of the Dutch monarchy to bring the church under state control. In 1834, Reverend Hendrik de Cock (1801–1842) was suspended from the ministry, and his congregation in Ulrum subsequently withdrew from the state church. Within two years a number of other pastors had also withdrawn, and more than 100 independent congregations had emerged. They became known informally as the Christelijke Afgescheiden Gemeenten. In 1869, many of these independent congregations organized as the Christian Reformed Church.

In 1846, encouraged by the failure of the potato crop, de Cock and associated pastors Henrik Scholte and Albertus C. van Raalte led a migration of church members who had supported the secession to the United States. They finally settled in the state of Michigan and in 1848 organized the Classis (synod) Holland. They found existing in the United States a church with common roots, the Reformed Church in America, and in 1850 affiliated with it. At the time of affiliation, it was agreed that should the interests of Classis Holland and the church ever come into significant conflict, the Classis could withdraw.

The Classis Holland found a happy home within the Reformed Church in America, but a minority of its members began to dissent in the mid-1850s. Specifically, Gysbert Haan charged the Reformed Church in America with practicing open Communion, using a collection of hymns that included some that were not altogether sound, and neglecting catechism preaching. He further accused the church of aligning itself with the state church in the Netherlands and claiming that the Secession was illegitimate. The Classis as a whole did not agree with Haan, but beginning in 1857, individual congregations began to disaffiliate with the Reformed Church in America.

The several congregations affiliated in 1859 as the Dutch Reformed Church, assuming its present name, the Christian Reformed Church in America, in 1904. The church grew primarily through the continued immigration from the Netherlands. It assumed a conservative Reformed doctrinal position based on the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, and the Canons of the Synod of Dort. Rejecting the hymnology of the Reformed Church in America, the new church relied on a selection of hymns derived from the biblical book of Psalms, though it has more recently expanded its hymnology considerably. It stresses the teachings of the catechism to its youthful members.

The Christian Reformed Church of North America is organized presbyterially. The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. The church supports an active mission program, which includes two seminaries, four colleges, and several hospitals and homes. In 2006 the church reported 196,900 members in the United States and 72,900 in Canada.

The church began an expansive mission program during the 20th century. As of 1998, it had more than 200 missionaries serving in 23 countries. Many of these missionaries were working to support national churches that had developed from older missionary activity by either the Christian Reformed Church or the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands and the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa, with which it is closely affiliated. The Christian Reformed Church took the lead in creating the Reformed Ecumenical Council, through which it unites many conservative Reformed churches throughout the world. As of 2009, the Reformed Ecumenical Council is in process of merging with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches to form the World Communion of Reformed Churches.

Christian Reformed Church in North America
2850 Kalamazoo Ave., SE

Grand Rapids, MI 49560
www.crcna.org/cr/crwb/index.htm

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dutch Reformed Church; Netherlands Reformed Churches; Reformed Church in America; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated); Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Communion of Reformed Churches.

References

- Harms, Richard H. Historical Directory of the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Historical Committee of the Christian Reformed Church in North America, 2004.
- One Hundred Years in the New World*. Grand Rapids, MI: Centennial Committee of the Christian Reformed Church, 1957.
- Schaap, James C. Our Family Album: The Unfinished Story of the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: CRC Publications, 1998.

Christian Reformed Church of Brazil

The Christian Reformed Church of Brazil was started in 1932 by Reverend Jamos Apostod as an outpost of the Reformed Church of Hungary, and its first members were recent Hungarian-speaking immigrants to Brazil. The first congregation, in São Paulo, consisted of recent immigrants from Transylvania. Never a large body, the church had three congregations when it became autonomous after World War II. By the 1990s, the church had been reduced to a single congregation and about 500 members. It has since had an era of significant expansion, now holding services in both Portuguese and Hungarian.

The church follows a presbyterian polity. Doctrinally, it holds to the Helvetic Confession and the Fluminese Confession of 1557, a confession written by a group of French Reformed refugees who attempted unsuccessfully to set up a haven for Huguenots in the 1550s. It is a member of both the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

In 2006, the church reported 19,000 members in 11 churches.

Christian Reformed Church of Brazil
 Caixa Postal 2808
 Rua Domingas Rodrigues, 306, Lapa
 São Paulo SP 05075-000
 Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church of Hungary; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Christian Service Society

See Bengal Orissa Bihar Baptist Convention.

◆ Christianity

Christianity, which claims the allegiance of some 30 percent of the world's population, traces its origins to the ministry of Jesus, a Jewish teacher who lived in Palestine at the beginning of the Common Era. He built a small following during his brief ministry, but in the context of the Roman occupation of Judea ran afoul of the authorities and was put to death around 30 CE. Shortly after his death and burial, a number of his followers had an intense experience of Jesus, who they claimed had been resurrected physically. Some also claimed to have been present when Jesus was seen ascending into the clouds and disappearing in the heavens. Those of his close associates in his earthly ministry and who professed to have seen him in his resurrected state, became known as Apostles.

The Apostles assumed leadership of the discouraged followers. Following a time of internal prayer and consultation, the Apostles, now headquartered in Jerusalem, made a profession of their faith in Jesus and in his resurrection. They identified him as the expected Anointed One, the Messiah in the Jewish tradition, termed in Greek the Christ. The launching of their public ministry during the Jewish festival of Pentecost was accompanied by the Apostles speaking in languages other than Aramaic (the Apostles' common tongue).

The church (Greek: ecclesia), as the collectivity of Jesus' followers was designated, grew quickly in Jerusalem and then in other near-by towns. In Antioch, in what is now Syria, they were first termed Christians, followers of the Christ.

The growth of the Christian church was marked by several turning points. The first occurred when the Apostle Peter convinced his fellow Apostles and the members of the church, all of whom were Jews, that following the Jewish law should not be a requirement of membership in the church and that the Christians should admit Gentiles to their fellowship. Following on that decision was the conversion of Saul, a Jewish leader who had actively joined the efforts to suppress the movement. Following a dramatic visionary experience around 41 CE, he took a new name, Paul, and became the most prominent advocate of the faith he had previously persecuted. His experience included a vision of Jesus, and became the basis of his Apostolic authority. Though he had never met Jesus prior to his death, on the basis of his encounter with the resurrected Christ, Paul now termed himself an Apostle "out of season."

Paul, who was born and raised in Tarsus (in present-day Turkey), traveled on three missionary journeys from Jerusalem and Syria across the Mediterranean to Greece (where he introduced Christianity to Europe) and on to Rome. Legends suggest he may have also traveled to Spain, though he is believed to have been executed in Rome around 65 CE. He nurtured the people and congregations he had called to faith with a set of letters, now a part of the Christian scriptures.

No writings are attributed to Jesus directly, but soon after the church began, collections of sayings attributed to him were collected, and commemorations of the events of the last week of Jesus' life constructed. Jesus was remembered for his compassion, his healing of those who came to him (including some of leprosy), and his proclamation of the imminent arrival of the kingdom of God. Many of his teachings were delivered in pithy statements, others as parables. The major events at the end of his earthly existence, which occurred during the annual Jewish Passover festival, were named and commemorated with ritual, beginning with Palm Sunday (when Jesus arrived in Jerusalem), Good Friday (when he was executed on a cross), and Easter (when he was believed to have risen from the dead). Jesus' sayings and stories about him would later be collected in chronicles of Jesus' life called Gospels.

The cross, the major symbol of Christianity, at Saint Patrick's Cathedral, Chicago, Illinois. (J. Gordon Melton)

Through the first century, Christianity gradually separated itself from its rootedness in the Jewish community. That separation was spurred by both the spread of the church across the Roman Empire and its penetration of "Pagan" society, and the destruction of the Jewish temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE. Roman persecutions of the Christian community served to further distinguish it from the Jews. Anti-Jewish statements made as the church became a distinctive community would in later centuries be used by Christian rulers to legitimize actions against Jews.

Through the first several centuries a large spectrum of Christian writings appeared, including a number of gospels and documents offering instructions on the managing of church life. Already in the second century, the question of which writings were authoritative came to the fore. The importance of choosing the correct writings to guide the church was accentuated by the rise of Christian Gnosticism, a teaching that challenged the worldview of the older Christian writings but appealed to many in the context of the time. Over the next centuries, those books determined to have been written by Paul, the original Apostles, and their honored colleagues (such as the physician Luke) were brought together to constitute the Christian New Testament, which placed together with the Jewish Bible (called the "Old Testament" by the Christians) constituted the Christian scriptures. In this process, Christian leaders rejected the authority of a variety of writings, including those written from the Gnostic perspective as well as some popular Christian writings deemed not-Apostolic. Some were seen as simply less authoritative than the Apostolic writings, others were pushed aside as heretical.

Christianity operated as one among many minority religions in the Roman Empire, and on several occasions experienced widespread persecution, especially under the emperors Nero (r. 54–68), Decius (r. 249–251), and Diocletian (r. 284–305). However, the situation changed radically under the emperor Constantine (r. 306–337), who in 313 issued the Edict of Milan that made Christianity a legitimate religion in the empire. He later gave strong support to the Christians and through the fourth century they were increasingly identified with the empire, now headquartered in Constantinople, as the state religion.

While Christianity spread around the Mediterranean Basin, it also moved eastward from Jerusalem and Antioch into Mesopotamia and Persia. Edessa (modern-day Urfa, Turkey), the first center of Christianity outside of the Roman Empire, became the point from which Christianity found its way into the Persian Empire and beyond. Very early in the Christian era, the town was associated with Thomas, one of the Apostles, and Thaddeus (or Addai) (one of the 70 disciples mentioned in Luke 10:1). According to legend, Addai came to Edessa and became the instrument of the healing of the ruler, King Abgar, leading to the conversion of the tiny kingdom of Osroene. Addai is revered as the founder of the Church of the East, and his disciples Aggai and Mari with the further expansion of the church among the Armenians and Persians as far east as India.

Vying with Edessa in the East was Arbela, capital of another small kingdom, Adiabene, whose ruler had in the first century converted to Judaism. In the second decade of the second century, the bishop of Arbela, Semsoun, is said to have become a martyr for the faith. It is also near Arbela that Tatian the Assyrian (ca. 110–180) opened a school. His most lasting contribution was a translation of the four Gospels that had emerged as authoritative in the West into a single harmonized gospel, the Diatessaron. The Diatessaron was used for several centuries as the Gospel section of the New Testament for the Eastern Church. Tatian also impressed upon the Eastern Church his own asceticism that became an early impetus to monasticism.

By the end of the second century, the Christian community had spread eastward as far as Bactria, in what is now Afghanistan. It had gained strength throughout the Persian Empire. One of the oldest traditions within this community also spoke of the Apostle Thomas continuing his mission to the East by traveling to the Malabar Coast of India and there establishing Christianity in what would undoubtedly be its easternmost outpost. Landing around 50 CE, he is said to have founded seven churches and was eventually martyred. The legendary origins of the Indian church underlay the more firmly historical accounts of the arrival of the theologian Pantenus from Alexandria on a missionary journey toward the end of the second century. By the end of the fourth century, regular communications between the Indian Christians and the Church of the East indicate a developing relationship that continues to the present through the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch.

Doctrinal Development The rise of Christianity as an international movement also coincided with the church's development of a maturing theological outlook and turning its attention to the issuance of a consensus statement of Christian belief. As the church spread around the Mediterranean Basin and moved eastward through Persia to India and Central Asia, various movements had challenged the central tradition, including the very popular Gnostic movement and the third-century Montanist movement championed by Tertullian, one of the early church's intellectual leaders. Then, at the beginning of the fourth century, a controversy arose concerning the nature of Christ whom the church termed the son of God and worshipped as divine. This controversy flowered in the aftermath of the legalization of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire.

Arius (ca. 260–336), an Egyptian Christian priest, challenged the generally held belief in the divinity of Christ. He argued that such a belief contradicted monotheism. He suggested instead that Christ was a superior creation of God, properly called the son of God but not God. To resolve the controversy caused by the popular spread of Arian ideas, Constantine called a church council to meet at Nicaea (in what is now Turkey). The Council of Nicaea (325 CE) condemned Arius and issued a creedal statement that would become the most widely accepted summary of the orthodox Christian belief in the Triune God. The Nicene Creed would find its way into the liturgies of the church both East and West. The orthodox position, generally associated with Bishop Athanasius (ca. 300–373), the bishop of Alexandria, defined the one God manifesting as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and Jesus Christ as both fully God and fully human.

The Nicene Creed set the direction for the church as a whole, but did not solve all of its problems. Arianism was a movement, especially among the people who lived on the northern edge of the Roman Empire. It would peak in 410 when Arian Christians (the Barbarians) would invade Italy from the north and sack Rome. The fall of Rome was the beginning of the end of the empire in the western Mediterranean. Meanwhile, in the surviving Eastern Byzantine Empire, church leaders were concerned with the theological debates that grew out of the decisions at Nicaea. Subsequent councils were called in 381 (Constantinople) and 431 (Ephesus). The Council of Ephesus condemned the opinions of Bishop Nestorius (ca. 381–451), who appeared to divide the human and divine natures of Christ, thus destroying the unity of his personhood. He had also attacked the use of the term theotokos (literally, “Mother of God”) to describe Mary, the mother of Jesus. He feared the increasing veneration of Mary as a semi-divine figure in Christian mythology. A fourth council gathered at Chalcedon in 451 where a further definition of the Trinity was accepted and a new heresy, Monophysitism, was condemned.

The decisions promulgated by the councils of Ephesus and especially Chalcedon were not accepted by the dioceses that lay beyond the Roman Empire to the east, whose bishops had been unable to attend, and the church in Egypt, the primary loser at Chalcedon. As a result, a number of churches separated from the main body of Christians within the Roman Empire, including the Armenian Apostolic Church, the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, and the Coptic Orthodox Church. Although traditionally condemned by the Roman Catholic Church and the Eastern Orthodox churches as heretical bodies (Nestorian and Monophysite), in recent years their leaders have argued that they were not opposed to Chalcedon and that the heresies the Council had condemned falsely characterized their actual position. In the 20th century, these non-Chalcedonian churches would be fully admitted into the larger ecumenical world.

The Church of the Middle Ages Although the councils at Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon were the most important in shaping the Christian theological perspective, they were by no means the only ones. Three additional councils (Constantinople, 553 and 680–81, and Nicaea, 787) would convene to further refine Trinitarian belief, and the promulgations of these Seven Ecumenical Councils would form the consensus between the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. Meanwhile, the synods of Hippo Regius (393) and Carthage (397) capped the process of assembling the Christian New Testament and canonizing the 27 writings as a body of Apostolic and authoritative literature.

With the setting of the canon of the Christian New Testament and the definition of Christian orthodoxy, the church would be set to continue its expansion for the next several centuries. In the West, that expansion would be resisted by the indigenous leadership of the traditional Pagan religions of Europe, but over the remaining centuries of the first millennium CE the church would become the dominant religious force throughout Europe, from Constantinople, to Spain, Ireland, and Scandinavia. Five leading centers of the faith would emerge at Rome, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, and Constantinople. To the east and south, however, that dominance would be checked by the sudden rise of Islam.

Islam was established in Arabia by the time of Muhammad’s death in 632. Under his successors, the four caliphs, expansion began. Syria, Egypt, and Iraq fell relatively quickly. During the Umayyad dynasty (661–750), the Arab Muslim kingdom was extended across North Africa and moved into Spain. Its expansion was finally turned back north of the Pyrenees. Eastward, it crossed Persia and moved into central Asia and what is today Pakistan. While not, at least initially, moving against the overrun Christian community, Islam effectively blocked further Christian expansion in Africa and the Middle East for the time being. Under Islam, the Christian community survived, and those churches that had dissented from the ruling of Chalcedon, though heavily taxed, fared much better than they had within the Byzantine Empire.

Three of the ancient Christian centers (Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria) fell into Muslim hands, leaving the Patriarchate at Constantinople the unquestioned leading voice of Christianity in the Byzantine Empire. The effective leadership of Constantinople extended into the Balkans and then to the northern Slavic lands, and then to Russia (by the end of the first millennium CE). As the territory brought under the bishop of Constantinople grew, it faced constant rivalry with the Western Latin church.

The rise of the Roman church occurred in many stages, but was punctuated by a variety of events. The fall of the Western Roman Empire, generally dated at 476, left the church as the most important international organization, its authority built on its assumptions of many civic functions formerly performed by officials of the empire, its acquisition of lands, and its claims to primacy through the Apostles Peter and Paul. That authority was more firmly established during the reign of Gregory I (ca. 540–604), who reformed the church both organizationally and financially during his pontificate (r. 590–604). Over the next 400 years, as the church extended its control over Europe, allegiance to Christ and his church went hand-in-hand with an acknowledgment of papal hegemony.

Engraving depicting the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth on orders from Roman prefect Pontius Pilate. The crucifixion of Jesus is a central event in Christian belief. (PhotoDisc/Fotosearch)

The rivalry between the Eastern and Western churches was marked by the cultural distinctions between the Latin-speaking West and the Greek-speaking East; however, it was fueled by mutually exclusive claims of primacy by Jerusalem (where the church began), Rome (where Peter and Paul ministered), and Constantinople (the seat of power in the continuing Roman Empire). Pope Leo I (r. 440–461) asserted Rome’s primacy. In the East, a collegiality of authority was claimed for the five Patriarchies (Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome). However, the relationship between the Patriarchies shifted significantly after Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were incorporated into the Arab Muslim Empire. Real power was left in the hands of Rome and Constantinople.

The very different situations of Rome and Constantinople also began to be reflected in their approach to church-state relations. The church remaining under the jurisdiction of the bishop in Constantinople operated essentially in one political realm in a land with a strong secular ruler, while other Eastern Orthodox communities survived as minorities in a hostile Muslim environment. Their situation tended to blunt their assertiveness relative to the state. On the other hand, the Roman Catholic Church emerged as a strong political force regularly asserting its prerogatives and autonomy in the many kingdoms, princedoms, principalities, and city-states of the West.

Over the centuries numerous distinctions, each in and of itself relatively minor, accumulated to give the Western and Eastern churches a somewhat different flavor. Differences were reflected in theological concerns, liturgical variations, and the relative emphasis on mysticism (in the East). One visible difference was the use of statues of the saints in Western churches and the use of icons (two-dimensional pictures) of the saints in Eastern churches. The accumulating differences culminated in a break between the two churches in 1054 over a seeming minor theological difference concerning the wording of the Nicene Creed. In the West, the phrase “and the Son” was inserted into the creed to indicate a belief that the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, proceeds from the Father “and the Son.” That phrase was deleted from the Eastern text of the creed.

The adoption of the phrase, termed the filioque clause, by the Western church included an assertion of the power to make the change while the Eastern church claimed that only an Ecumenical Council could make such a decision. The ensuing controversy resulted in a hostile break, with both sides issuing anathemas and excommunications against the other. This critical break in Christian unity created in fact what had largely already existed in substance. The Roman Catholic Church now emerged as the single religious institution of note in the West. In the East, four separate churches representative of Eastern Orthodoxy appeared—the Patriarchate of Constantinople (generally referred to as the Ecumenical Patriarchate), the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa, the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, and the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East.

As the Roman and Byzantine churches assumed control of Europe, the non-Chalcedonian churches existing in Muslim lands were largely stymied in any further attempts to expand. One notable exception occurred in the seventh century when Alopen, a Christian missionary from the Nestorian Church of the East, arrived in China around 635 and presented the Christian message to the Emperor T'ai-tsung (of the T'ang dynasty). Three years later, T'ai-tsung, in what was a reversal of the policy of the former emperor, issued an edict granting universal toleration for religions, specifically mentioning the Way (Christianity). He had previously ordered a Chinese translation of the Christian scriptures be prepared. The Christian mission seems to have flourished in the eighth century but at some point in the 10th century, for reasons not altogether understood, the first establishment of Christianity in China disappeared.

The Second Millennium of Christianity In the centuries immediately following the split between the Eastern and Western churches, much of the energy of both bodies was spent upon the creation of a Christian culture in the lands over which they had religious hegemony. In the West, a number of universities emerged and theology flourished. The work of building the church (including the stamping out of pockets of heresy) fell to the Dominicans and Franciscans, the first of what would become a host of religious orders that served to establish monasticism in the West. The monastic impulse had become evident in the East in the fourth century, and in subsequent centuries its role in the church served as another difference between the East and the West.

The stability of the Western church allowed it to turn some of its attention to Islam. In 1095, Pope Urban II (r. 1088–1099) proclaimed a crusade against Islam aimed specifically at reclaiming prominent Christian sites in Palestine from the then rulers. The goal was accomplished in 1099. Unfortunately, in the process, a Jewish community in Germany along the route chosen by some of the would-be Crusaders became victims of a massacre. Over the next centuries, as conflict continued and subsequent Crusades led additional armies into the region, the focus of the original Crusade was lost. In 1204, for example, the Crusaders were diverted to Constantinople, which they sacked. Previously, in 1187, Saladin (or Salah-ad-Din, 1138–1193) recaptured Jerusalem, an early signal of a new period of expansion for Islam.

The Crusades had one positive effect in the West. They served to introduce scholars to a number of lost texts, including Aristotle's philosophical writings and other Greek texts that had been lost. Also, the Crusaders returned with a number of writings by Arab scholars, most notably Avicenna (980–1073) and Averroes (1126–1198). These new materials stimulated further philosophical and theological work in the West, culminating in the monumental system created by Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1224–1274). Aquinas, a Dominican monk, used his new knowledge of Aristotle to create a synthesis of knowledge that came to dominance within the Roman Catholic Church and has retained some degree of popularity to the present day.

During this same period, the Eastern church was enjoying a great expansion. Around 988 CE, Prince Vladimir of Kiev (r. 980–1015) converted to Christianity, in its Eastern Orthodox form. This expansion of Christianity into Russian territory coincided with a favorable political alliance with Constantinople. That alliance unfortunately did not deter the Mongol invasion of the region in the 13th century. When the Russians were finally able to throw off the Mongol rule in 1449, Moscow replaced Kiev as the center of a modern Russian state just in time to develop their independence in the face of a greatly weakened Patriarchate in Constantinople.

Since pushing the Crusaders out of Jerusalem, the Islamic kingdom had put increased pressure on the Byzantine Empire centered in Constantinople. Finally, in 1453, the Muslims overran Constantinople and in effect ended the old Roman Empire. The fall of Constantinople began a period of transition in European society and Christianity, which would in the next century remake the structure of the whole Christian world. The immediate effect of the capture of Constantinople would be the movement of Islam north and west along the Danube River. Bulgaria, Romania, the Balkan lands, and Hungary would be incorporated into the Ottoman Empire. Early in the 16th century, Muslim armies were sitting at the gates of Vienna. The Russian church, far outside the Muslim borders, would proclaim Moscow the new Rome.

Meanwhile, across the continent, on the Iberian Peninsula, ruled by Muslims for many centuries, Christian forces converged to push the Muslims out of Spain and Portugal, the completion of the process signaled by the fall of Granada in 1492. That year proved a significant one also marked by the discovery of the Americas by Columbus (who had been backed by Spain) and the expulsion of the Jews from the country.

Events in Spain did not deter Muslim forces in their drive into Central Europe. In the 1520s they moved to the gates of Vienna, but failed to capture it in 1529. The attention given to the Islamic threat would distract Catholic attention to the new threat coming from Germany.

The Drive for Reform Almost as soon as the Roman Catholic Church constructed the organizational, liturgical, and theological system through which it would exercise its spiritual authority throughout Western Europe, problems began to manifest. Although the church dominated society in many ways, one could hardly speak of its having created a holy or spiritual community. The church, having grown wealthy, had also developed signs of corruption. One symbol of its corruption was its failure in the face of the rising power of France, which all but controlled the papacy in the 14th century. Clement V (r. 1305–1314) was the first of seven popes who resided at Avignon in France rather than Rome. Only in 1377 did Gregory XI (r. 1370–1378), himself a Frenchman, find the strength to return to Rome. However, two years later, two contenders for the papal office emerged. The lineages of these two competing popes continued for a generation as different countries lined up behind each. The problem was only solved in 1414 when a broadly based council gathered at Constance (in present-day Germany). By this time even a third “pope” had appeared. The council declared its right to act, saw to the disposal of the three contenders, and elected a new pope with the council’s approval.

However, while the council returned organizational unity to the church, it was unable to still the calls for reform. In fact, it called one of the leading voices of reform, John Hus (ca. 1373–1415), to present his case. After hearing him, the council condemned his views, revoked his safe passage, and saw to his execution at the stake. Hus, however, was just one of a series of voices of reform with whom the church would have to contend, ranging from Englishman John Wycliffe (ca. 1329–1384) to the Florentine Girolamo Savonarola (1452–1498).

To understand the cry for reform, it is somewhat helpful to understand the organization and belief system out of which the church operated. Europe was divided into a set of geographical parishes, each parish having a church whose priest(s) served the people residing in the parish. Parishes were grouped into dioceses, each diocese being headed by a bishop, the older and more prominent dioceses being designated archdioceses. Both priests and bishops were expected to lead celibate lives. Within his own diocese, the bishop was the ultimate authority, but himself owed authority to the pope, the bishop of Rome. The ultimate authority in the church was a church council, consisting of all the bishops meeting in assembly, but such assemblies were rarely held.

The church had evolved around a sacramental system in which worship centered on a series of ceremonies that were believed to make available the grace of God to those who participated in them. The sacraments were designed to meet the needs of each individual from birth to death. Soon after birth, infants were baptized and welcomed into the realm of God’s fellowship, the church. As they entered their teen years, individuals were confirmed in the faith. Along the way, they would be introduced to the practice of confession of sins and penance (making restitution for sin) and the reception of the Eucharist.

In the Eucharist, the Last Supper of Christ with his disciples, would be reenacted daily. In that supper, Jesus likened the bread and wine that he shared with those present to his body and blood. The reenactment of the meal would recall his death and resurrection. Through the centuries, the church had come to believe that Christ was somehow present in the elements of bread and wine. Drawing a philosophical distinction between the essence and the appearance of different substances, the Roman Catholic Church had articulated a belief in transubstantiation, that as the words of consecration were pronounced in the Eucharistic ceremony, the substance (though not the appearance) of the bread and wine was transformed into the body and blood of Christ.

Ideally, parishioners would regularly confess their sins to a priest, receive the forgiveness of their sins, and do the penance required, after which they would partake of the Eucharist. The regular reception of the Eucharist was seen as leading to the increasing holiness of the individual.

During one's life, one usually also went through one additional sacrament. Those who wanted to establish a family participated in the sacrament of marriage. Those who entered the priesthood would go through the rites of holy orders. Those women who entered a religious order went through a ceremony in which they were symbolically married to Christ.

At the end of one's life, final unction offered forgiveness of as yet unconfessed sins, thus preparing one for the next life. Following death, the church would oversee the funeral and burial of one's body in consecrated ground. At death, it was believed that one passed to one of three realms. Those who refused the graces mediated through the church went to eternal damnation in hell. Those who died in a state of holiness went to heaven. The great majority, however, were seen as moving to an intermediate state, purgatory, where the remaining penance for sins was completed prior to entering heaven.

Given the structure of the church, corruption had a tendency to assume some predictable forms. Charges of simony, buying and selling of church offices, were widespread. Many priests found ways to avoid their vows of celibacy and those in religious orders to subvert their vows of poverty. However, by the 1520s, the belief that the church possessed a storehouse of grace that it could at will dispense to believers and thus reduce their time (or that of a loved one) in purgatory became the focus of widespread criticism. Typically, a believer could receive an indulgence, a dispensation from the storehouse of grace, by the performance of some act of piety such as a pilgrimage or the repetition of a number of prayers. However, increasingly the church began to exchange indulgences for gifts of money, a practice that soon allowed the development of a fundraising project through the systematic selling of indulgences, which eventually led to the Protestant Reformation.

The Protestant Reformation In the second decade of the 16th century, the pope picked up the idea of building St. Peter's Cathedral in the Vatican. In 1517, a Dominican friar, Jon Tetzel (ca. 1465–1519), arrived in Saxony (Germany). Martin Luther, a professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg, objected to Tetzel's activity and in reaction posted a set of theses (debating points) on the door of the local castle's chapel. His action would set off a series of events. Many church leaders looked with favor on Luther's perspectives that were widely debated. Finally, in 1521, he was summoned to present his ideas before the Diet of Worms, an assembly of secular and church officials who advised Charles V (r. 1519–1559), the emperor of the loosely organized Holy Roman Empire.

By the early 1520s, Luther's perspective had matured into a broad attack on church authority. He challenged church traditions that had created the sacramental system in the name of the Bible, which he saw as the authority over that of the pope, church councils, and traditions. He attacked the sacrament of penance with an assertion of the priesthood of all believers. He undermined the role of the church in human salvation by his assertion of salvation by grace through faith alone.

The Diet rejected Luther's teachings. He was outlawed by the secular authorities and excommunicated by the church. However, he had found many allies, including the ruler of Saxony, who disapproved, among other things, of Saxon money flowing out of Germany to Rome. His initial protection of Luther allowed his ideas to spread in the face of religious and secular authorities distracted by the immediate threat of Muslim forces on the Danube. Over the next 20 years, Luther's initial challenge to Roman authority would divide the church into five competing communities.

Luther's own teachings would come to dominate in Germany and flow northward into Scandinavia. In German-speaking Switzerland, Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) would emerge as the leader of a Reformation effort that would offer further challenges to the sacramental system. Zwingli's effort would be cut short by his untimely death in 1531. However, his effort would then be taken up in Geneva (French-speaking Switzerland) by John Calvin (1509–1564), whose Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536) would be the first systematic presentation of the Protestant faith and the bedrock of the Reformed Church. The Reformed Church would become the dominant form of Protestantism in Switzerland and Holland and as Presbyterianism in Scotland. Although not becoming the majority faith, it would gain significant followings in a number of countries, including France and Hungary, and exert considerable influence in some of the German states.

The Reformation would reach England by a very different route. At the time that Luther emerged, England and its king, Henry VIII (r. 1509–1547), were firmly in the Catholic camp. However, Henry ran into several problems, including the need to fill government coffers emptied by war and the desire to perpetuate his line with a male heir. The latter would become the occasion of the break with Rome, when the pope refused to sanction Henry's attempt to set aside Catherine of Aragon as his wife (an insult to the Spanish Crown). Henry forced Parliament to pass an act declaring him the supreme head of the church in England in 1534, and then moved against the monasteries whose property he confiscated to bolster the treasury. As he began to take minute steps to alter church practices (such as changing the language of the church's liturgy from Latin to English), Protestant forces gained strength, though only after Henry's death did they gain ascendancy.

During the reign of Henry's son, the youthful and sickly Edward VI (r. 1547–53), Protestants emerged and attempted to bring the church into the Reformed camp. Edward's sister, Mary (r. 1553–1558), tried to return the church to Catholicism. Then, during the lengthy reign of Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603), a new form of the faith that attempted to mediate between Roman Catholic and Protestant demands was articulated. The new Church of England continued the establishment of British Christianity and was the source of what would become known as the Anglican tradition.

The Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican churches did not challenge the Roman Catholic tradition in one respect. Each continued to view itself as an established church with close ties to the secular government, and understood itself to ideally be the church of all the citizenry, with responsibility for the religious needs of the entire population. However, a much smaller group of people challenged the very idea of an established church. Generally referred to collectively as the Radical Reformation, a spectrum of individual leaders called for a church consisting only of those adults who professed the Christian faith and agreed to try to live the Christian life.

This more radical call for reforming the church lost much support due to several violent incidents when followers attempted to revolt against the state's authority. Quite apart from the violence, however, the Radical Reformers found themselves opposed by the Lutherans, the churches of the Reformed/Presbyterian tradition, and Catholics alike. They experienced severe repression and survived in small pockets in the lands of a few tolerant rulers. The primary group assembled in Holland, where their cause was championed by a former Catholic priest, Menno Simons (1496–1559), whose community became known as Mennonites.

The Roman Catholic Church initially opposed the spread of Protestantism with the power of the state. Charles V took the lead, and the war in Germany continued with neither side winning. Eventually, the Peace of Augsburg of 1555 established an important principle that would operate in Europe for the next several centuries, the right of the ruler of each of the German states to choose the faith, Lutheran or Catholic, which would be observed within his realm. Although the Peace of Augsburg established the right of Lutheranism to exist, wars between Protestants and Catholics would break out intermittently for the next century. The most devastating conflict was the Thirty Years' War (1616–1648) that left large sections of the continent in waste, though the Peace of Westphalia (1648) would finally establish the legal rights of the Reformed Church.

The Catholic Church would also respond to the theological challenge posed by Protestantism. In 1545 it called a general church council that would meet in several sessions at Trent (Italy). The Council of Trent laid out the church's teachings over against the Protestants, including its position on the value of tradition, the authority of the popes, the sacramental life, worship in Latin, and clerical celibacy. The action of the Council coincided with a revival of Catholic church life signaled by attempts to root out the corruption in the priesthood and hierarchy, the establishment of new religious orders, and the development of an expansive evangelistic effort.

The most important of the new orders was undeniably the Jesuits. Founded by Ignatius Loyola (1515–1582), the Jesuit brothers took a special oath of allegiance to the pope and dedicated themselves to reverse the gains of the Reformation with their evangelistic and educational efforts. They would also take the lead, along with the Franciscans, in what would become a new world missionary expansion of Catholicism.

The Age of Exploration At the time of the Reformation, Christianity was primarily a European enterprise. Although Christian communities were to be found in the Middle East and at several places in southern Asia, the growth of the Christian community had been largely blocked by the rise of Islam. However, with the discovery of the Americas and the possibilities it offered, a burst of exploratory activity began to occur, with Portugal and Spain taking the lead. Portuguese sailors headed southward along the African coast and the Spanish directed their efforts across the Atlantic. So significant was this effort and so loaded with the possibility of conflict, that the pope took upon himself the task of dividing the worlds yet to be discovered. In 1493 he drew a line in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean (moved westward in the next year) and declared that all lands discovered west of the line belonged to Spain and all the lands to the east belonged to Portugal.

The pope's line, confirmed in the 1494 Treaty of Tordesillas, would lead to the extensive exploration of the Americas by Spanish conquistadors with the resultant spread of the Roman Catholic Church as an adjunct to that exploration. The result was the establishment of Roman Catholicism in Spanish colonies in Central and South America and many of the Caribbean islands.

The line finally agreed to in 1494 left the shore of Brazil in the region assigned to Portugal. However, the majority of Portuguese efforts were made to the south. Eventually Portuguese sailors rounded the Cape of Good Hope (South Africa) and made their way into the Indian Ocean. Although the subsequent invasion of various African and Asian lands by the Portuguese remains one of the less meritorious episodes in European history, it opened the way for Catholicism to gain its initial footholds in east Africa and southern Asia from India to Indonesia. Francis Xavier (1552–1610) and Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), two Jesuits, are most remembered for their initial efforts to spread Christianity in Asia and adapt Christian thought to the Asian context. Although the Portuguese would lead the way, the Spanish would soon follow the Portuguese in the lucrative trade with the lands found along the coasts of the Indian and Pacific oceans.

Much of the work accomplished by Christian missions was negated by the establishment of the slavery system through which Spanish and Portuguese dealers transported hundreds of thousands of Africans to the Americas in the 17th and 18th centuries. Christianity has been severely criticized in recent centuries for its seeming cooperation with the slave trade and the slowness of its response to the abolitionist cause. The church placed its emphasis on ameliorating the condition of the slaves and converting them to Christianity rather than work toward the destruction of the institution itself.

France, somewhat late, joined in the exploration effort and initially established colonies in Canada, the Caribbean, and the South Pacific. Even later, Great Britain entered the European effort to establish global empires. The British would colonize the eastern coast of North America and eventually drive the French from Canada. Conflict with Spain would lead them to the Caribbean and then the search for trade would lead them to Africa, the Middle East, southern Asia, and the South Pacific. Globally, the British would build the most expansive network of colonies. To a lesser extent the Dutch and, in the 19th century, the Germans, would attempt to also build colonial empires.

Protestant Expansion The effect of Portuguese, Spanish, and French expansion, especially in the 17th and 18th centuries, transformed the Catholic Church into a global religious organization. Protestant expansion beyond Europe began almost simultaneously with that of Catholicism, but in the first centuries was somewhat limited to the movement of Dutch, Swedish, and British Protestants to colonies their governments established, primarily in the Americas. A change began, however, in the 18th century when members of the Moravian Church launched a mission among the African Americans who had been brought to the Caribbean to work plantations. However, at the beginning of the 19th century, the British took the lead in what would become a massive movement that would transform Protestantism into a global faith. Pietists, similar in faith and practice to the Moravians, began the original Protestant mission in Asia, their representatives reaching India in 1706.

In the decades after the establishment of the Anglican Church of the via media, a process that emphasized the politics of ecclesiology at the highest level, many felt that the process of reformation should continue while others felt that the spiritual life of the British people had been neglected. There arose in England, even before the end of Elizabeth's reign, a call for further purification of the church. Some Puritans asked for a renewed emphasis on the spiritual life of the laity, some wanted to rid the church of bishops, some wanted to create a church of purely dedicated professing Christians that would be separated from the government. Those who wanted to see a Protestant church modeled somewhat on the Reformed model (with direct reference to the Presbyterian Church that had emerged in Scotland) briefly gained power in the middle of the 17th century during the reign of Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658). Following the end of the Commonwealth, England returned to the monarchy in 1660, and Anglicanism has since been the established church in England.

Following the Restoration, those groups dissenting from Anglicanism did not go away but formed a spectrum of sectarian bodies, each with its distinctive emphasis. Included were the Presbyterians, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, and the Friends (Quakers). They were joined in the 18th century by Methodism, the spearhead of the Evangelical Awakening that touched every segment of British life.

The British missionary thrust would begin with the felt need to serve British citizens in the American colonies. That need would lead to the formation of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (1699) and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge that between them recruited Anglican ministers to serve American parishes and nurtured them with books and literature. As the colonial empire developed, Anglican chaplains were recruited to accompany the initial settlers and keep the Church of England alive in their hearts.

By the end of the 18th century, however, a consciousness of the world's community, limited as it was, was present in British society, and the leaders in the dissenting churches began to organize structures for world evangelism. This effort is usually traced to a sermon preached by William Carey (1761–1834) in 1792 to a group of Baptists in Nottingham. Following the sermon, 12 ministers who were present met and organized what became the Baptist Missionary Society. As their first endeavor, they commissioned Carey to begin work in India. Over the next few years Congregationalists formed the London Missionary Society (1795), and Anglicans founded a second missionary organization, the Church Missionary Society (1799). The Methodists organized in 1813, and the Presbyterians of the Church of Scotland in 1823. Through the century, the work initiated in England would also inspire the formation of like organizations on the European continent (possibly the first being the Netherlands Missionary Society, 1797) and in North America. As the colonial empires expanded, typically, missionaries from the country that established the colony arrived and initiated evangelistic activities among the indigenous population. If colonial territories changed hands, it was common for missionary agencies to shift their work to a doctrinally aligned society from the new ruling country.

Through the 19th century European missionary agencies succeeded in establishing Christian churches in almost every country of the world, the great majority of those countries either becoming dominantly Christian in religious affiliation or becoming home to a significant Christian minority. Through the 20th century, Catholic and Protestant missions combined to change the world's Christian population from approximately 20 percent to some 35 percent. Most of that growth was at the expense of the many indigenous, ethnically based, primal religions.

The 20th Century While Christianity was experiencing a remarkable world growth, back home in Europe and North America, the church was being rent by the developments in the modern world, forces that have collectively grouped under the labels Secularization and/or Modernity. Protestantism, especially the thought that grew from the direction laid out by John Calvin, developed a much more mundane and less mystical and supernatural view of the world than that perpetuated by medieval Catholicism. This trend was pushed forward by the French Enlightenment and the rise of science and technology, which saw the world much more in terms of natural law than of God working in nature. The subsequent rise of the social sciences served to push God farther aside as an active force in history and the individual.

One product of the new worldview was the rise of biblical criticism with its questioning of both miracles in general and the miracles recorded in the Bible in particular. Work in geology and archaeology called the creation stories of the biblical book of Genesis into question, at least as literal events. Scrutiny of the biblical texts led to a much more complicated view of the assembling of the various books of the Bible and their compilation into what became first the Jewish Bible and then the Christian Old and New Testaments.

Although many clung to traditional affirmations, by the end of the 19th century, voices on both sides of the Atlantic were calling for a transformation of Christian thought that acknowledged the new information that was coming out of the centers of learning across the Christian world. The two tendencies would split Christians into those who would variously be called Traditionalists or Fundamentalists and those who would be termed Modernists. While living together for some decades in an uneasy tension, through the 20th century, disagreements on how to approach the Bible, the faith, and the world would drive the Protestant world into two camps, today grouped around the World Council of Churches (whose member bodies have tended more toward the Modernist approach) and the World Evangelical Fellowship (whose members tend toward the conservative Bible-oriented camp). Meanwhile, deep fractures within the Roman Catholic Church between Modernists and Traditionalists have appeared, though the church has largely been held together by its very flexible organization that has shown a remarkable ability to be inclusive of a range of opinions.

By the beginning of the 20th century, as a result of the global missionary endeavor, a relatively small number of churches and missionary agencies had established missions in countries around the world. The larger Protestant bodies existed as international bodies whose membership overseas in many cases already outnumbered its membership in its home country. Through the 20th century, that situation would dramatically change. First, in most countries, these churches would be the object of independence movements as the people who had become Christians in missionary situations broke with the sending church and established new churches that they believed better served the members in their own country, be it China or India or Kenya. Second, as the missionary churches developed their own leadership, they were released from their organizational ties to the church from which they originated and became autonomous bodies. That latter trend became most noticeable in the last half of the 20th century, as European countries largely divested themselves of their colonies.

Early in the 20th century, the missionary movement had been the major impetus for another movement, Ecumenism. Lone voices had, through the 19th century, decried the fragmentation of Protestantism, a process that has continued to the present. However, missionaries became the most vocal about keeping the issues that had so divided the European and North American churches into numerous competing denominations away from the mission field, where they distracted from the primary work of evangelism. Through the 19th century, the various churches had tried to handle the situation by dividing the vast missionary territory between missionary agencies. However, as missions grew, they inevitably moved into each other's areas.

The growing demands for ending the competition and finding some way to get around the sectarian differences among the larger churches led to the call for the development of cooperative councils and even the merger of churches in Africa and Asia. Several notable mergers across denominational lines occurred in India (Church of North India, Church of South India) and Pakistan (Church of Pakistan), while governmental pressure forced mergers in Japan, China, and the Congo. In the older countries, notable mergers across denominational lines occurred in Canada (United Church of Canada) and Australia (Uniting Church in Australia). Numerous additional mergers also occurred; however, they tended to bring together churches of the same denominational tradition (with the least doctrinal differences to resolve), such as the five churches in the Wesleyan tradition that merged in several steps to form the United Methodist Church in 1968.

The Ecumenical movement peaked in the 1950s and was subsequently given new life in the era of good feeling between Protestants and Roman Catholics that began with the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s. Ultimately, it was unable to halt the process of setting up new Christian denominations, the number of new churches growing decade by decade. However, it has succeeded in bringing most of the larger denominations into a working relationship with each other through local and regional church councils and the international fellowships of the churches of the same denominational traditions (such as the World Alliance of Reformed Churches [soon to become the World Communion of Reformed Churches] and the Lutheran World Federation). Most important, it has succeeded somewhat in lessening the animosity that developed in the 16th through the 18th centuries when the establishment of new denominations was accompanied with intense polemics and in many cases the attempts of governments to suppress the newer bodies.

The Future of Christianity In spite of predictions to the contrary, Christianity continued to grow through the 20th century, but most of that growth followed population trends, and unlike the 19th century, there was little growth percentage-wise relative to the world's population. Real growth in places such as Africa has been compensated for by losses in Europe, which emerged as a uniquely secularized area, and those countries that fell under Marxist rule (though there is every reason to believe that significant growth in post-Marxist societies will occur in the 21st century). Many churches that have shown a notable growth have gained their members from other Christian bodies rather than converting non-Christians.

Demographer Todd Johnson and historian Philip Jenkins have emphasized the southward shift as Christianity grows in South America, southern Asia, and especially sub-Saharan Africa. The geographical center of Christianity has moved from Europe into northern Africa and is expected to continue to drift southward year by year for the next decade. This shift has been visible in the changing membership of the World Council of Churches and was signaled not only by the growing number of African churches that joined, but even more so by the initial acceptance of the new African Initiated Churches into membership.

In the meantime, the church in dominantly Christian lands continues to be affected by various renewal and revival movements that periodically inject new life into the larger community. Among the more noticeable such movements in the 20th century were the Marian movement in the Roman Catholic Church and emergence of Pentecostalism and the Charismatic movement within both Roman Catholicism and Protestantism worldwide. A World Network of Marian Devotion, punctuated by claims of apparitions of the Blessed Virgin by hundreds of individuals around the world, has become an integral part of the life of the Catholic Church involving every parish and affecting the church's hierarchy all the way to the papal office. Beginning in a small Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, the Pentecostal/Charismatic movement has brought the religious life to literally millions of people around the world. The spread of Pentecostalism through the 20th century produced a host of new global denominations, but has had even more impact as piety has permeated and brought new life to the older Protestant Churches, especially in Africa and Asia and the Roman Catholic Church everywhere. Outside North America, the majority of those affected by Pentecostal phenomena have remained in their otherwise non-Pentecostal denominations.

Meanwhile, as Christianity has grown elsewhere, the Christian bases in Europe and North America have had to contend with a growing pluralism that has seen large worshipping communities of Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims, and lesser communities of other faiths, developed both through the massive immigration from Asia and the Middle East, but also by the conversion of people of Christian heritage to the newly arrived faiths. It would appear that the new pluralistic context will challenge the secularism that has consumed such a large proportion of the European populace, even as it has checked the growth of unbelief in the Americas.

The unique role of unbelief in Europe will also be challenged by the reassessment of the role of Western Esotericism in the religious community. Western Esoteric religions have formed a large segment of the religious community in North America (2 to 4 percent) and claim an even larger percentage of public allegiance in Europe; however, in the latter it is often lumped in with unbelief. Seeing membership in Esoteric and other spiritual communities as following a religious path will lead to a different picture of Europe's secular state.

Primary challenges for Christianity in the next century include the retention of its intellectual leadership and the development of a rapport with the world's other religious communities without losing its evangelical mandate. Christianity has in every generation produced a cadre of outstanding philosophers and theologians who have been able to speak not just as church leaders but as spokespersons amid the world's intellectuals. To maintain its place in the future, such voices will continually have to arise. Their priority task will be to restate the Christian perspective in the globalized and pluralistic world. The imperative to relate to other believers became vividly manifest following the death of 6 million Jews in the Holocaust. That event not only focused the tragedy of centuries of bad relations between the two communities, for which many Christian leaders have subsequently acknowledged the church's guilt, but also forced remembrance of the suffering and deaths that had been caused over the centuries by the conflict between competing religions. Thus it was that Pope John Paul II opened the new century with a series of public statements calling the Christian community to admit sins relative to the church's work in the past, and asked forgiveness for that history as a foundation for its future efforts.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Arius; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Etchmiadzin); Athanasius; Athens; Baptists; Calvin, John; Carey, William; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of North India; Church of Pakistan; Church of Scotland; Church of South India; Congregationalism; Constantine the Great; Coptic Orthodox Church; Dominicans; Easter; Eastern Orthodoxy; Ecumenical Patriarchate/

Patriarchate of Constantinople; Elizabeth I; Franciscans; Friends/Quakers; Gnosticism; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem; Holy Week; Istanbul; Jerusalem; Jesuits; London Missionary Society; Luther, Martin; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Marian Devotion, World Network of; Martyrdom; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mary I; Mennonites; Methodism; Monasticism; Moravian Church; Paul; Pentecostalism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Roman Catholic Church; Rome; Savonarola, Girolamo; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Thomas Aquinas; Unbelief; United Church of Canada; United Methodist Church; Uniting Church in Australia; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Communion of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Atwood, Craig D. Always Reforming: A History of Christianity Since 1300. Athens, GA: Mercer University Press, 2001.
- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Barrett, David, George T. Kurian, and Todd M. Johnson, eds. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bass, Diana Butler. A People's History of Christianity: The Other Side of the Story. New York: HarperOne, 2009.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Bettenson, H. Documents of the Christian Church. 2nd ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Gary McGee, eds. Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements.

- Grand Rapids, MI: Regency Reference Library, 1988.
- Cross, L. Eastern Christianity: The Byzantine Tradition. Sydney: E. J. Dwyer, 1988.
- Dwyer, J. C. Church History, Twenty Centuries of Catholic Christianity. New York: Paulist Press, 1985.
- Ferguson, Everett, ed. Encyclopedia of Early Christianity. New York: Garland Publishing, 1990.
- Grimm, Harold J. The Reformation Era 1500–1560. 2nd ed. New York: Macmillan Publishing Co., 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Hart, D. G., and Mark A. Noll, eds. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Des Plaines, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Hastings, Adrian. A World History of Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2000.
- Hoke, Donald, ed. The Church in Asia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1975.
- Isichel, E. A History of Christianity in Africa: From Antiquity to the Present. Grand Rapids, MI: Africa Word Press, 1995.
- Jenkins, Philip. The Lost History of Christianity: The Thousand-Year Golden Age of the Church in the Middle East, Africa, and Asia—and How It Died. New York: HarperOne, 2008.
- Jenkins, Philip. The Next Christendom: The Coming of Global Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Johnson, Paul. A History of Christianity. New York: Touchstone Press, 1995.
- Johnson, Todd M., and Sandra S. Kim. “The Changing Demographics of World Christianity.” In Antioch Agenda, edited by Rodney Peterson. Delhi: ISPCK, 2007.
- Johnson, Todd M., and Sandra S. Kim. “Describing the Worldwide Christian Phenomenon.” International Bulletin of Missionary Research 29, no. 2 (April 2005): 80ff.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Koester, Helmut. History and Literature of Early Christianity. 2 vols. Berlin, Germany: Walter De Gruyter, 2000.
- Lynch, Joseph. The Medieval Church: A Brief History. Boston: Addison-Wesley, 1992.
- McBrien, Richard P., ed. Encyclopedia of Catholicism. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1995.
- Marty, M. E. A Short History of Christianity. New York: Meridian Books, 1980.
- Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia: Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: Harper-SanFrancisco, 1992.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine. 5 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971–1989.
- Sanneh, Lamin. Western African Christianity: The Religious Impact. London: C. Hurst & Co. Ltd., 1983.
- Stark, Rodney. The Rise of Christianity: How the Obscure, Marginal Jesus Movement Became the Dominant Religious Force in the Western World in a Few Centuries. New York: Harper Collins, 1997.
- Sunquist, Scott W., ed. A Dictionary of Asian Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2001.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists Around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.
- Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation. 3rd ed. Kirksville, MO: Thomas Jefferson University Press, 2000.

Christmas

The term “Christmas” is derived from the English “Christ’s Mass” and is associated with the Mass that celebrates the birth of Jesus, the incarnation of God. The name for this high feast in other languages usually refers to the nativity: Navidad (Spanish), Natale (Italian), Noël (French). The Germanic word Yule, the earliest word for the December 25 holiday, probably refers to the Winter Solstice. The current German word for the feast, Weihnachten, means “hallowed night.”

Evidence suggests that Christmas was celebrated early in the fourth century in North Africa and by the Christmas nativity scene depicting the adoration of the infant Jesus Christ. According to Christian belief, Jesus was born in a stable and placed in a manger. (Corel) middle of the fourth century in Rome. By the end of the fourth century, December 25 became the date for most Western churches to celebrate the birth of Jesus. In Eastern churches, the older feast of Epiphany remains the time for Nativity observances.

Christmas probably originated in the Roman culture, which celebrated the Winter Solstice on December 25, the shortest day of the year. It was a Pagan celebration of the birth of “The Invincible Sun” as it began its annual journey back north from its southernmost point. It is likely that Christians began celebrating the birth of Jesus at this time as an alternative to the Pagan observance of the Winter Solstice. Another less likely theory suggests that the date for the birth of Christ was based on the idea that his conception coincided with the date of his death, which some consider to be March 25.

Even more than Easter, Christmas became one of the most popular holidays in Western culture. Today it is celebrated even among those who do not observe other Christian holy days. In the early sixth century the Roman emperor Justinian (483–565) made Christmas a public holiday. The feast was extremely popular in all European countries during the Middle Ages, inspiring the composition of music and liturgical drama. Its observance received added impetus in the early 13th century when Saint Francis of Assisi (1182–1226) originated the devotion of the Christmas crib (or crèche).

After the 16th century most of the Reformation churches retained the Christmas feast. However, the English Puritans tried to do away with the celebration of Christmas altogether in the course of the 17th century. The feast was revived with the restoration of the English monarchy in 1660. Under the Puritan influence in early America, especially in New England, Christmas was a regular workday until the middle of the 19th century.

Santa Claus is one of the most celebrated features of the Christmas season in Western culture. Also known as Saint Nicholas, Father Christmas, or Kris Kringle (depending on the country), Santa Claus is the legendary and mythical figure who brings gifts to the homes of the good children during the late evening and overnight hours of Christmas Eve, December 24. The legend may have a basis in tales concerning the historical figure of gift giver Saint Nicholas. He was a fourth-century Greek Christian bishop of Myra in Lycia, now part of Turkey. Nicholas was famous for his generous gifts to the poor, in particular presenting the three impoverished daughters of a pious Christian with dowries in order to avoid a life of prostitution. Consequently, the giving of gifts has become a central focus of the Christmas season.

While the attention given Santa Claus and the attendant commercialization and gift giving have caused many Christians concern, it is not the only Christmas tradition to have had a wide influence in Western culture, Christian or otherwise. The custom of sending special greeting cards at Christmas originated in 19th-century England.

The Christmas tree has become a traditional decoration for the season. Normally an evergreen, it is adorned with Christmas lights and ornaments during the Advent season and gifts are placed around it. An angel or star is often placed at the top of the tree, representing the host of angels or the Star of Bethlehem from the Nativity story. The practice began in Germany in the seventh century.

Other customs of the Christmas season include the baking of special foods, the cooking of poultry dinners on Christmas Day, and the singing of carols. The celebration of Christmas includes both Christian observances and wider folk customs that have roots in general festivity at the time of the Winter Solstice. In church sanctuaries, the liturgical colors of Christmas are white and gold, but red and green have come to symbolize the season in popular culture.

Christmas is one of the most celebrated of holidays. In North America it has become a public holiday with significant secular components, and is celebrated by Christians and non-Christians. As Christianity has spread globally Christmas has emerged as a popular holiday even within other religious communities who will exchange Christmas greetings and gifts.

In North America, there are several groups, most in the Adventist tradition (Worldwide Church of God, Jehovah's Witnesses), that make an issue of not celebrating Christmas, which they find to be unsupported by the Bible and of Pagan origins.

Kevin Quast

See also: Francis of Assisi; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Winter Solstice; Worldwide Church of God.

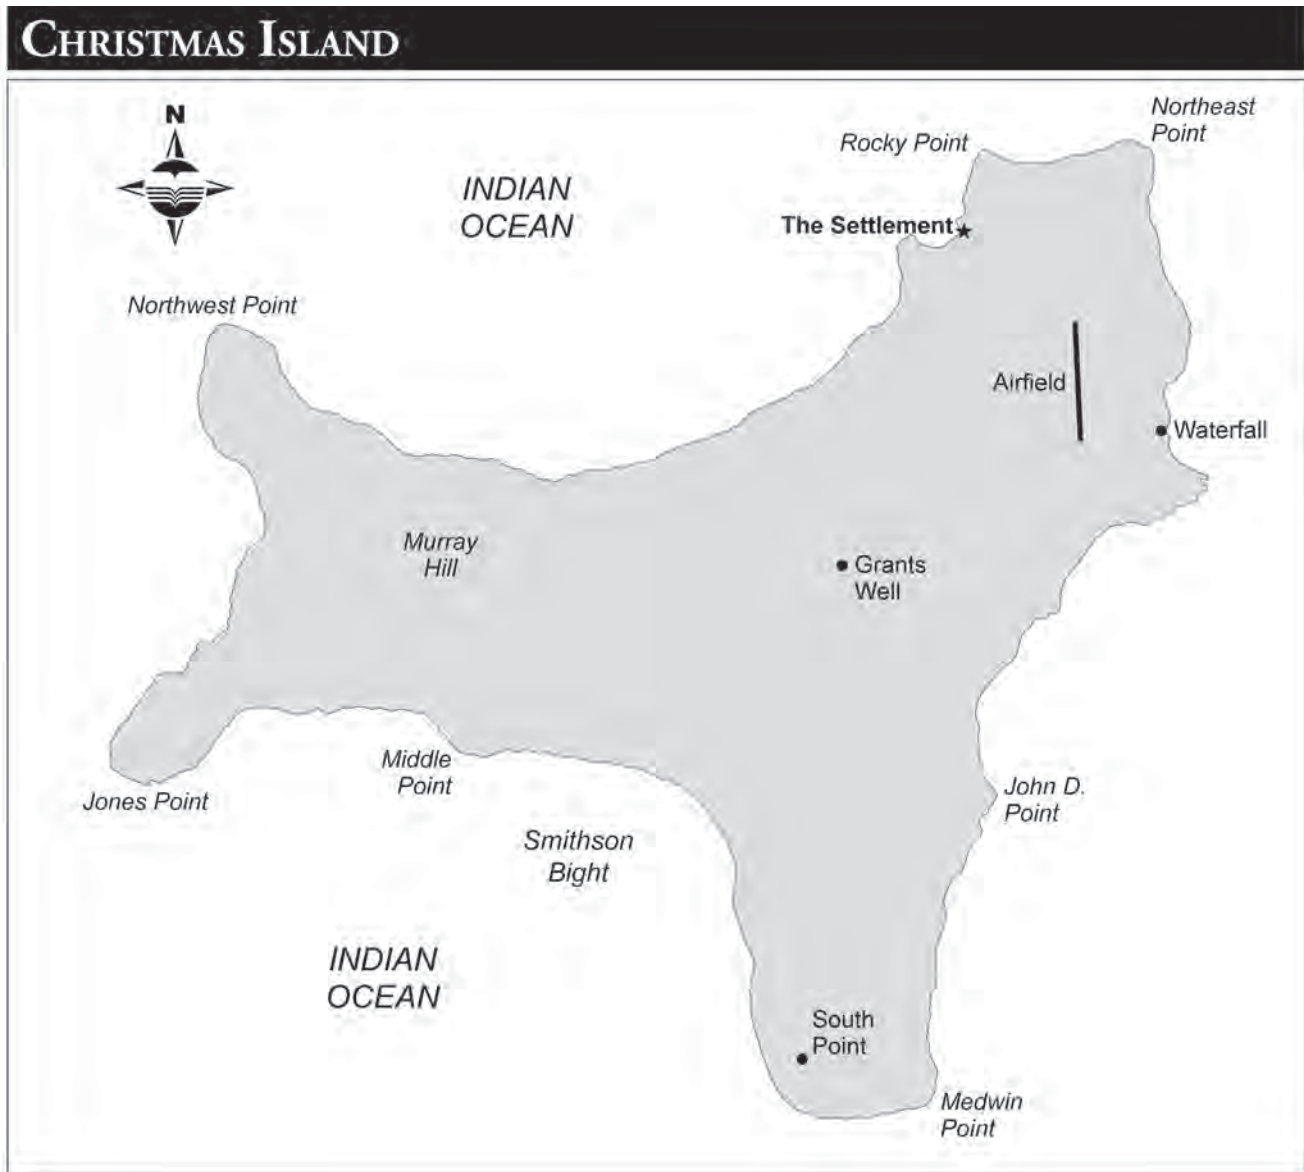

References

- Adam, Adolf. The Liturgical Year: Its History and Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy. Collegeville, MN: Pueblo Books, 1981.
- deChant, Dell. The Sacred Santa: Religious Dimensions of Consumer Culture. Cleveland: Pilgrim Press, 2002.
- James, E. O. Seasonal Feasts and Festivals. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1961.
- Restad, Penne L. Christmas in America: A History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Kelly, Joseph F. The Origins of Christmas, Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2004.
- Stookey, Laurence Hull. Calendar: Christ's Time for the Church. Nashville: Abingdon, 1996.
- Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.

■ Christmas Island

Christmas Island, since 1958 a dependency of Australia, is a small island of only 52 square miles located in the Indian Ocean south of Java. Like Malaysia and Indonesia, its population of some 1,400 people is very mixed, the largest number being Chinese and Euro-Australians. The island existed for many years as part of the British colony of Singapore, but in 1958, as Singapore moved toward independence, the island was transferred to Australia. The major industry on the island is phosphate mining.

Buddhism, in its Chinese incarnation, is the primary religion on Christmas Island and is largely confined to the Chinese community. The Malaysians,

Christmas Island

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	400	380	24.1	0.32	430	620
Roman Catholics	150	160	10.0	0.00	200	280
Anglicans	80	110	6.9	0.00	130	200
Protestants	100	60	3.8	1.68	80	120
Muslims	250	310	19.4	0.71	400	540
Agnostics	250	250	15.6	1.24	340	480
Buddhists	0	200	12.5	0.78	250	360
Hindus	0	20	1.6	1.15	50	50
Baha'is	0	10	0.6	0.00	30	50
Total population	1,400	1,600	100.0	0.68	2,000	2,800

approximately 20 percent of the population, are primarily Sunni Muslims of the Shafiite School of Islam.

Christianity is the faith of less than 20 percent of the population. The Church of England work, established in 1888, is now within the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Perth of the Anglican Church of Australia. The Roman Catholic Church also has work, including a substantial presence in the Chinese and Malaysian community. It is attached to the Archdiocese of Singapore. Less formally organized groups of Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians can also be found.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of Australia; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam.

References

- Adams, J. Christmas Island: The Early Years, 1888–1958. Chapman, Australia: B. Neale, 1993.
- Jameson, Julietta. Christmas Island, Indian Ocean: A Fascinating First-Hand Account of Life in Australia's Most Isolated Territory. Sydney, Australia: ABC Enterprises, 2003.
- MacKenzie, A. A. The MacKenzies' History of Christmas Island Parish. Sudbury, ON: MacKenzie Rothe, 1984.

Church Communities International

In 1920 Eberhard Arnold (1883–1935) and his wife Emmy Arnold opened a Christian commune in a rented German farmhouse. A few years later, members of the group began reading Anabaptist history and became fascinated with the communal Hutterites, whose vision seemed much like their own. Later they learned that the Hutterites still existed in North America, and in 1930 Arnold spent a year visiting Hutterite colonies.

The rise of the Nazis to power in 1933 led the Bruderhof members, as they now called themselves, to move to Liechtenstein, and then to England. With the outbreak of World War II, the community, now without Arnold, who had died following unsuccessful surgery, bought a 20,000-acre ranch in Paraguay on which they developed 3 separate hofs, or colonies, to house their growing population. In 1954 they immigrated yet again to Rifton, New York. Thereafter they expanded rapidly, soon operating nine hofs in five countries.

Many of the new members of the Bruderhof had been participants in existing American intentional communities. One of them was the Macedonia Cooperative Community in Georgia, and when about half of Macedonia's members joined the Bruderhof, they brought with them Community Playthings, a business that manufactured high-quality children's toys. Community Playthings has been the most important Bruderhof industry ever since.

Internal and external turmoil has marked a good deal of the Bruderhof's history. A conflict over the leadership claims of Eberhard Arnold's son Heini led to mass resignations and expulsions between 1959 and 1961. In the late 1980s a large group of critical ex-members began to publish a newsletter and hold periodic reunions. Relations with the Hutterites have been uneven, with positive ties for a decade or two after Arnold's initial contact with them, followed by antagonism, then renewed alliance, and then another break in the 1990s.

International expansion of the Bruderhof after it had become well established in the United States met with mixed results. In the 1980s the organization went back to its homeland, establishing Michaelshof, in Birnbach, Germany. It met with stiff resistance from its neighbors, and after several stormy years of conflicts over building plans and other matters the Bruderhof finally withdrew in the mid-1990s. Meanwhile, in 1991 the Bruderhof established a relationship with a Nigerian Christian community called Palmgrove and soon granted it membership in the Bruderhof movement. Cultural differences, however, proved problematic, and in 1994 the Bruderhof severed its relations with Palmgrove amid recriminations on both sides. Projects in other countries were better received.

Recently the movement changed its name to Church Communities International. Overall, the Bruderhof/CCI has remained prosperous and has grown over the years. In 2000 it had some 3,000 members in 9 hofs (6 in the United States, 2 in England, one in Australia). Contact with the CCI communities may be made through the movement's website, which in 2009 said that the movement had communities in the United States, England, Germany, and Australia. The Woodcrest Bruderhof in the United States has long served informally as the group's headquarters.

Woodcrest Bruderhof
 Rifton, NY 12471
 www.churchcommunities.org

Timothy Miller

See also: Communalism; Hutterites.

References

- Arnold, Eberhard. Why We Live in Community. Farmington, PA: Plough Publishing House, 1995.
- Arnold, Emmy. Torches Together: The Beginning and Early Years of the Bruderhof Communities. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1964.
- Baum, Markus. Against the Wind: Eberhard Arnold and the Bruderhof. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1998.

Church in the Province of Kenya

See Anglican Church of Kenya.

Church in the Province of Melanesia

Protestant work in the Solomon Islands dates to the establishment of New Zealand as a separate Anglican province in 1858. George A Selwyn (1809–1878), the first New Zealand bishop, established a Melanesian Mission and made several personal trips through the Solomons and other nearby islands. In 1861 John C. Patterson (1827–1871) was consecrated as a missionary bishop to oversee the development of the work throughout Melanesia. He carried out his duties until he was killed in 1871 by residents of the Santa Cruz islands. He was succeeded by Bishop Selwyn's son, John Richardson Selwyn (1844–1898), who continued Patterson's program for developing indigenous leadership.

The mission developed for more than a century as part of what is now the Anglican Church in Aotearoa,

Pastor Daniel Niirae preaches to his congregation at the South Seas Evangelical Church in the Solomon Islands in Melanesia, April 2007. (AFP/Getty Images)

New Zealand; Polynesia eventually grew to become the sixth diocese in that church. Although the diocese was centered on the Solomons, its boundaries changed over the years as work was shifted from one jurisdiction to another. The strongest work was developed on the eastern islands, Santa Isabel, Malaita, Guadalcanal, and San Cristóbal. Here the church developed an extensive primary and secondary school system (mostly now secularized) and a teacher training college.

Extensive discussions concerning the independence of the Solomons were held in the 1970s and culminated in independence being granted in 1978. It was in this atmosphere that the Diocese of Melanesia was set apart in 1975 as the independent Church in the Province of Melanesia. It continues as one in faith and practice with its parent body.

The church is led by its archbishop and now includes eight dioceses, one of which comprises the Anglican work in neighboring Vanuatu. In 2005 it reported 200,000 members in 197 parishes. Ministers are trained at the Bishop Patterson Theological Centre in Honiara.

The church is a member of the World Council of Churches (since 1977).

Church of the Province of Melanesia
PO Box 19
Honiara
Solomon Islands

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of Rwanda

See Province of the Episcopal Church in Rwanda.

Church in the Province of South Africa

Anglican presence in South Africa is traced to the establishment of British hegemony in Cape Town in 1806. During the ensuing years, the members of the Church of England in the Cape met for worship in the building that had been erected by the members of the Netherlands Reformed Church. The first missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts arrived in 1821 and of the Church Missionary Society shortly thereafter. The initial growth phase is dated from the consecration of Bishop Robert Gray (1809–1872) in 1847, one of the first Anglican bishops appointed for work outside of the British Isles. During his first two years he promoted the training of clergy, ordained and tripled the number of functioning priests, and saw to the erection of 20 churches.

A Dutch Reformed church in Worcester Church Square, South Africa. (T.W.P./StockphotoPro)

Through the 19th century, the South African church tended to have a preference for High-Church Anglicanism, and in 1870 a group of Low-Church Evangelicals separated and has continued to the present as the Church of England in South Africa. In spite of the schism, the church continued to grow, and by the beginning of World War I had churches across the Union of South Africa. Its jurisdiction has also extended into neighboring Botswana, Mozambique, Lesotho, and Namibia. Its present jurisdiction also includes the islands of St. Helena, Ascension, and Tristan de Cunha.

The church is headed by its primate. In 2007 Archbishop Winston Hugh Njongonkulu Ndungane was succeeded in that post by the Most Reverend Thabo Makgoba. In 2005, the church reported 2,300,000 members in its 24 dioceses that include in their territory Mozambique, Namibia, Angola, Lesotho, Swaziland, and the island of St. Helena. In 2002, the former United Evangelical Church Anglican Communion of Angola became the Angola Diocese of the Church of the Province of South Africa. The church is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

The Anglican Church made history in 1986 when it elected Reverend Desmond Tutu (b. 1931) as its new primate and archbishop of Cape Town. After completing his studies in London, Tutu returned to his native South Africa as a lecturer at the universities of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland. His subsequent rise was due both to his scholarly abilities and to the oratorical skills that manifested as the Anglican Church decided to confront the government on apartheid. In 1975 the church appointed him the Anglican dean of Johannesburg, the first Native African to hold that position. The following year he became bishop of Lesotho. He then became the general secretary of the South African Council of Churches (1978–1985). In 1984 he was named the Nobel Peace Prize laureate. He was appointed bishop of Johannesburg in 1985, then archbishop of Cape Town in 1986. In this latter post he became a global spokesperson, not only for the people of his own country, but for suffering people worldwide, and attained a status in South Africa similar to that held by Martin Luther King Jr. in the United States.

Church in the Province of South Africa
16-20 Bishopscourt Dr.
Claremont, Cape 7700
South Africa
www.cpsa.org.za/

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Netherlands Reformed Churches; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

Dow, Graham. "How a Reader Founded the Anglican Church in Angola." The Reader 100, no. 1

(Spring 2003): 9–11. http://www.readers.cofe.org/anglican.org/u_d_lib_pub/m1001.pdf.

Kruger, J. S. Along Edges. Religion in South Africa: Bushman, Christian, Buddhist. Pretoria: Unisa Press, 1995.

Lewis, Harold T. A Church for the Future: South Africa and the Future of Anglicanism. New York: Church Publishing, 2007.

Prozesky, Martin, and John De Gruchy. Living Faiths in South Africa. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Worden, Nigel. The Making of Modern South Africa: Conquest, Apartheid, Democracy. New York: Wiley-Blackwell, 2007.

Church in the Province of Sudan

The Church Missionary Society of the Church of England opened its first station in Sudan in 1899 at Omdurman, which became the launching point of an extensive mission work through the southern part of the country. A growth phase began in 1916 that led to the establishment of strong churches among six different Sudanese peoples.

In 1920, the work in the Sudan, which had grown up under the jurisdiction of the Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, was separated, along with that in Egypt, in a new Diocese of Egypt and Sudan. Through the next decades the work in the Sudan continued to grow, while that in Egypt was stifled. In 1945, Sudan was set apart as a separate diocese. It was again attached to Jerusalem in 1957, at which time the Jerusalem Diocese became an archdiocese. In 1964 the Muslim government expelled all foreign missionaries. At the time there were 2 Sudanese bishops and 44 priests.

In 1974, however, the Diocese of the Sudan, with more than 100,000 communicants, was separated from Jerusalem and placed under the direct authority of the archbishop of Canterbury. That change was in preparation for the establishment of the Church in the Province of the Sudan and the designation of four new dioceses. The new independent province was inaugurated in October 1976. (That same year the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East was given provincial status.)

The province (also known as the Episcopal Church of the Sudan) is headed by its archbishop, the Most Reverend Daniel Deng Bul Yak (b. 1950), who in 2008 succeeded the retiring Most Reverend Joseph B. Marona (b. 1941). Marona had identified the province with the more conservative element of the Anglican Communion, which opposed the election of a homosexual bishop by the Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. There are currently 23 dioceses. In 2005, the church reported 4,500,000 members. The church supports the Bishop Gwynne College in Juba. In 1998 it passed a resolution favoring the ordination of women. It is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

Church in the Province of the Sudan

Bishop's House

PO Box 110

Juba

Sudan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Episcopal Church; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- de Saram, Brian. Nile Harvest: The Anglican Church in Egypt and the Sudan. Wiltshire, UK: the Author, 1994.
- Kayanga, Samuel L., and Andrew Wheeler, eds. But God Is Not Defeated, Celebrating the Centenary of the Episcopal Church of the Sudan, 1899–1999. Nairobi, Kenya: Pauline Publications Africa, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobray, 1998.

Church in the Province of Tanzania

Anglicanism came to Tanzania when the Universities Mission to Central Africa (UMCA) initiated work in Zanzibar in 1864. The UMCA had been formed at Cambridge University in response to a sermon preached by David Livingstone (1813–1873) in 1858. It drew its support primarily from High-Church members of the Church of England. The Mission was supplemented by the arrival of representatives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (another High-Church sending agency) in 1875. Then in 1878, Low-Church evangelicals within the Church of England established work through the Church Missionary Society, drawing additional support from Australia and New Zealand. Finally, the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society (now known as Crosslinks), an evangelical sending agency founded in 1922, began work.

In 1960 all of these efforts were incorporated into the Church of the Province of East Africa, which also included the Anglican missions in neighboring Kenya. In 1969, the government nationalized the extensive educational system that had been developed by the church. The following year, the work in Kenya and Tanzania was divided and the present Province of Tanzania emerged.

The Church in Tanzania is headed by its archbishop, currently the Most Reverend Valentino Mokiwa. Congregations are divided into 16 dioceses. In 2005, the church reported 21,000,000 members. It is the third largest Christian body in the country. The church is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

Church in the Province of Tanzania

PO Box 899

Dodoma

Tanzania

<http://www.anglican.or.tz/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

An Anglican church in Tanzania. (Giuseppe Masci/StockphotoPro)

References

- Chapman, Mark A. Anglican Covenant: Unity and Diversity in the Anglican Communion. Woonsocket, RI: Andrew Mowbray, 2008.
- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church in the Province of West Africa

See Church of the Province of West Africa.

Church in the Province of the West Indies

The Church in the Province of the West Indies includes Anglicans from around the Caribbean basin. It includes a number of island nations, one Central American country, and three South American countries. Anglicans came into the Caribbean in the 16th century as Britain began to challenge Spanish hegemony in the region. Through the next century, they successively established themselves in Bermuda (1609), Barbados (1626), Antigua (1634), Jamaica (1655), and the Bahamas (1670s). From these islands, the church spread through the region. It reached such places as Trinidad and Tobago rather late (in 1797), and came to Belize in the 19th century along with Africans from Jamaica. Work on the coast of Guyana was begun by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1807 and moved on to Georgetown three years later. It is now the second largest church in the country.

St. Anna Church in the Dutch West Indies, on the island of Aruba. (Angelo Cavalli/StockphotoPro)

In the 19th century, as part of the Church of England, the Anglican West Indies was centered on Jamaica and Barbados, where the first bishops were appointed in 1824. The work grew through the next century under the protective umbrella provided by the colonial government. It was also one of the first parts of the Church of England that was set apart as an independent province, in 1883. It remained the established church until colonial rule was ended and the various nations became independent.

The province is headquartered at the residence of the provincial archbishop, who resides in Nassau, in the Bahamas. The headquarters has moved periodically, depending on the residence of the person who is elected archbishop (the previous archbishop residing on Antigua). The province includes eight dioceses (Belize, Guyana [which includes work in Surinam and French Guinea], Jamaica, Barbados, the Bahamas, the northeast Caribbean and Aruba, Trinidad and Tobago, and the Windward Islands). For a short period, Venezuela was a ninth diocese, but in 1982 it left the province to affiliate with the Episcopal Church, based in the United States. Not included in the province are the Episcopal Church of Cuba and the Anglican Church of Bermuda, both of which currently exist as extra-provincial dioceses directly related to the archbishop of Canterbury.

The province supports two seminaries, Codrington College in Barbados and United Theological Seminary of the West Indies in Jamaica. It is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

Church in the Province of the West Indies
Church House
East St. and Sands Rd.
PO Box N-1707

Nassau, N.P.
Bahamas

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Episcopal Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- Dayfoot, Arthur. The Shaping of the West Indian Church, 1492–1962. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1998.
- Newman, Las. “The Church as a Source of Identity: Reflections from the Caribbean.” In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.
- Pulis, J. W. Religion, Diaspora and Cultural Identity: A Reader in the Anglophone Caribbean. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Church in Wales

The Church in Wales dates to the arrival of Christianity in the second century CE. Real growth did not take place until the sixth century, the time of Saint David, the church’s patron saint. Little is known of David’s life, not even his birth and death dates, but he is known for having founded a monastery in Pembrokeshire and for having lived a godly life. His feast day, March 1, is a holiday in Wales.

The church was integrated into the Roman Catholic Church, and by the 12th century its four dioceses were part of the province of the archbishop of England. The Church in Wales felt the effect of the Protestant Reformation by way of England, and its dioceses were incorporated into the Church of England following the split with Rome. During Elizabeth I’s reign, The Book of Common Prayer (1567) and the Bible (1588) were published in Welsh. These two publications are credited with helping to save the Welsh language.

During the 19th century, dissenting churches (Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists) experienced significant growth in Wales, to the point that the Church of England, while still the largest church in Wales, no longer spoke for the majority of its citizens. The dissenting churches petitioned for the disestablishment of Anglicanism in Wales. The act to disestablish passed the British Parliament in 1914, but awaited the end of World War I for implementation. In 1920, the Church in Wales was separated from the Church of England. As a result, its bishops lost their seats in the House of Lords, and the church lost its tax revenues and favored legal status.

St. Tysilio Church in Anglesey, Church Island, Wales. (Pixtal/StockphotoPro)

The Church in Wales is headed by its primate archbishop, the Most Reverend Barry Morgan. Its previous archbishop, Rowan Williams, became the 104th archbishop of Canterbury and primate of the Church of England in 2003. In 2005, there were 6 dioceses and a reported membership of 78,000. The first women were ordained to the priesthood in 1997. It is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Province of the Church in Wales
39 Cathedral Rd.
Cardiff CF1 1 9XF
UK
www.churchinwales.org.uk/

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Harris, Christopher, and Richard Startup. The Church in Wales: The Sociology of a Traditional Institution. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1999.
- Robbins, Keith. England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales: The Christian Church 1900–2000. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church Missionary Society

The Church Missionary Society (CMS) is one of the two major Anglican missionary societies that were important in the spread of the Church of England globally during the 19th century. The Society grew out of the Evangelical Awakening, a national revival in Great Britain, of which the Methodist Church was the primary organizational product. However, many affected by the revival and its emphasis on a personal relationship with God chose to remain in the established church. Among the products of the revival was a new interest in Christian evangelization of the world.

The beginning of the CMS is usually traced to the posing of a question by John Venn, a Church of England minister at Chapham: “What methods can we use more effectively to promote the knowledge of the gospel among the heathen?” The result of the discussion of that question was the founding of the Society for Missions in Africa and the East in 1799. That organization became the Church Missionary Society in 1812. There was already an Anglican missionary society, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, but it was identified with High-Church Anglicanism. The support for the CMS was decidedly Low Church. However, in many fields, the two societies worked side by side, and the CMS served as a bridge between missionaries from various Protestant and Free churches and the larger Anglican community.

Early successful work was established in Canada and China, but soon spread worldwide, primarily in areas where the British were establishing their hegemony—most important, in Africa and India. By the end of the 19th century, efforts were well under way to train indigenous leadership. A symbol of desires in this direction was the commissioning of an African, Samuel Adjai Crowther (1808–1891), with the responsibility of opening the CMS mission in Niger. Crowther went on to become the first Anglican bishop of African background to be consecrated.

Early in the 20th century, the CMS began to place great emphasis upon education and medical care for women in the lands where their missions were located. In this endeavor it came into close association with the Zenana Missionary Society of the Church of England. The two organizations eventually merged in 1957. At this same time CMS had to adjust to the maturation of the missions and their transformation into dioceses and, especially after World War II, into independent Anglican churches (called provinces). In this new setting, the work of the society has been refocused upon numerous social service projects in cooperation with the new churches that have been established in the old missionary fields.

The CMS was a leading force in the development of cooperation and coordination among Protestant missionaries around the world. It supported the formation of the various united churches in which Anglicans merged with Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and other churches to form new bodies such as the Church of South India and the Church of Sri Lanka.

Church Mission Society Partnership House
157 Waterloo Rd.
London SE1 8UU

UK

www.cms-uk.org/J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Church of South India; Church of Sri Lanka; Free Churches; Methodist Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

References

- Hewitt, George. The Problems of Success: A History of the Church Missionary Society, 1910–1942. 2 vols. London: SCM Press, 1971.
- Overmakinde, Mike. An Introduction to Church Missionary Society Manuscripts. Lagos, Nigeria: College Press Publishers, 2000.
- Ward, Kevin, and Brian Stanley. The Church Missionary Society and World Christianity, 1799–1999. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 2000.

Church of Bangladesh

The Church of Bangladesh continues the history of the movement of Protestants into India early in the 19th century. The Protestant community in what is now Bangladesh has been dominated by the Baptists, but the Church of England and the Presbyterians were also active. In 1947 Bangladesh became the eastern province of the bifurcated nation of Pakistan, but in 1972 it officially separated as an independent nation.

In 1970, the Presbyterians and Anglicans in Bangladesh united (as part of the general union of Christians in Pakistan) to form the Diocese of Dhaka of the Church of Pakistan. The creation of Bangladesh involved a civil war and the development of harsh relations between the two countries. Although officially continuing as a diocese of the Church of Pakistan for some years, the church in Bangladesh began almost immediately to function as an autonomous organization, which gradually emerged as the independent Church of Bangladesh.

The church is led by Most Reverend Paul S. Sarkar, who in January 2003 became the third national bishop of the Church of Bangladesh. The 71 parishes are divided into 2 dioceses. The church has approximately 15,600 members (2005). It has been a member of the Bangladeshi priest delivers his sermon during Christmas Mass at a church in Dhaka, on December 25, 2007. Bangladeshi Christians, who make up only 0.08 percent of the population of the predominantly Muslim nation, joined Christians the world over to celebrate Christmas. (AFP/Getty Images)

World Council of Churches since 1975, and functions as part of the larger worldwide Anglican Communion.

Church of Bangladesh
St. Thomas Church
54 Johnson Rd.
Dhaka 1100
Bangladesh

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Church of Pakistan; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (General Synod)

In 1875 the Free church of Scotland established a mission in northern Malawi with its headquarters at Khondowe. The following year the Church of Scotland began work in the southern part of the country with headquarters at Blantyre. The Cape Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa opened a third mission in 1889 with headquarters in Mvera (later moved to Nkhoma). As these missions grew, they worked to combat the slavery business that had first attracted the world's attention to the region, and as one of their tactics they cooperated in the building of alternative forms of business that would undermine slavery's economic base. In the early 20th century, their critique was turned on the government and British businessmen, whom they had come to see as exploiting the native population. The missions also opened Western-style medical facilities and schools.

In 1924 the two Scottish missions, both of which had been organized with a synodal structure, merged to form the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian. The Dutch synod joined two years later. In 1956, three years after Malawi (then known as Nyasaland) had been merged with Rhodesia into the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the church organized the General Synod. Since then, the Presbyterian Synod of Harere (Zimbabwe) has joined the General Synod, as has the Synod of Zambia.

The General Synod is a loose organization that allows a great deal of autonomy to the five synods that constitute it. In Malawi, three different liturgies and catechisms and three church school curricula are being used. The General Synod does manage Zomba Theological College and Seminary. Ecumenically, the synod has observer status with the World Council of Churches. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the former Dutch synod is also a member of the Reformed Ecumenical Council.

During the years of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Presbyterian ministers were vocal critics of the political situation and a number were detained by the authorities. However, the federation came to an end in the early 1960s, when Nyasaland was separated from Rhodesia and became a self-governing country and then the independent republic of Malawi.

The General Synod worked with the Malawi Congress Party, the ruling party in the country during the first generation of Malawi's independence. Through the 1970s and 1980s, however, the government was frequently cited for human rights violations. At one point the president, a Presbyterian, outlawed the Jehovah's Witnesses organization. Finally in 1992, the General Synod, along with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, presented a letter to the president calling for the establishment of a commission that would make recommendations to reform the single-party system of governance. A referendum in 1993 and elections in 1994 spelled the end of the era of the Congress Party, and a democratic government came to the country.

In the 1990s the General Synod reported 770,000 members in 503 congregations. There were an additional 20,000 members in Zambia and 12,000 in Zimbabwe. The church is a member of the national councils of churches in Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe, but is not a member of the World Council of Churches.

General Synod
PO Box 30398
Capital City, Lilongwe 3
Malawi

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; Jehovah's Witnesses; Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Church of Christ in Thailand

The Church of Christ in Thailand began in the attempts of Protestants to establish missions in Siam (as Thailand was called at the time). The first mission, initiated by the London Missionary Society, was started in 1828. American Presbyterians arrived three years later. Over the next several decades, most of the groups that had originally come to Thailand abandoned the field, and the Presbyterians came to dominate the Protestant scene. They expanded throughout the country and followed a pattern of creating schools and hospitals with each of their churches. One of their missionaries, Daniel McGilvary (1828–1911), assumed the task of translating the Bible into Thai.

The Presbyterians were joined by other churches in the 20th century. The Churches of Christ, the British church inspired by the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), arrived in 1903. Baptists began to form congregations, which became the Thailand Baptist Fellowship. Representatives of the Marburger Mission came from Germany. In the early 1930s the Presbyterians invited the other Protestant groups into the country to create a national Protestant Church. The Baptist mission in Bangkok was the first to accept. Then other Baptist congregations and members from the work of the Marburger Mission agreed. In 1934 they constituted the Church of Christ in Thailand. In 1951, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) took over the work of the Churches of Christ. In 1962 they merged into the Church of Christ in Thailand.

In the 1950s, the local leadership that had been generated by the church expressed their desire to have an autonomous church under Thai management. That wish was granted. Then in 1957 the Presbyterians placed all their mission work under the authority of the Church of Christ in Thailand, and when the Disciples merged into the Church of Christ they followed suit.

The church is organized on a presbyterial system with a General Assembly as the highest legislative body. The church has expanded to include various language groups other than Thai, including the Karen and Lahu-speaking peoples. Continued growth through the last half of the 20th century was assisted by the support of missionaries from various churches around the world.

Catholic priests celebrate mass at a church in Bangkok, Thailand, in December 2005. (AFP/Getty Images)

In 2005 the church reported 130,000 members in 550 congregations. It supports the McGilvary Faculty of Theology at Payup University and the Chiang-Mai and Bangkok Institute of Theology. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and was a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Church of Christ in Thailand
109 CCT Building, 13th Fl.
Surawong Rd., Khet Bangrak
Bangkok 10500
Thailand
<http://netra.payap.ac.th/cct/cct.html>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Anglican Community of the Congo

Of all the Anglican provinces, the one serving the Congo had the most unique beginning. In 1895, the chief of Boga invited the two Ugandan Anglican evangelists to preach and to teach his people, who resided in the Semliki River valley. The chief did not like their message, and stopped their support. They returned to Uganda. At that point, Apolo Kivebulaya, a former soldier, offered himself as a catechist (lay instructor). He was subsequently sent to Boga, in 1896. Kivebulaya's opposition to some of the traditional religious practices hindered his progress for a period, and for a time he was jailed on charges that later proved to be unfounded. His example under pressure proved persuasive to many, including the chief who had originally opposed him.

Then in 1915, the border between Uganda and the Congo was altered, and Boga, formerly in western Uganda, became part of the eastern Congo. By this means, Anglicanism came to the Congo, though the work remained under the jurisdiction of the bishop in Uganda. Kivebulaya lived until 1933 and spent the better part of his life training a new generation of leaders.

In 1969, Theodore Lewis, an American Foreign Service officer, visited Boga, and found approximately a dozen ministers caring for some 25,000 members. He petitioned the Church of England to place a bishop in the Congo. In 1972, with the support of the Church Missionary Society, Philip Ridsdale, an English missionary, arrived as the first bishop. He was subsequently succeeded by a lineage of African bishops.

In 1970, the government of what was then Zaire demanded that all of the Protestant churches unite into the Church of Christ in Zaire (now the Church of Christ in the Congo). This body succeeded the former Congo Protestant Council (founded in 1924), and the Anglican Church became Church of Christ in Zaire—Anglican Church of Zaire. In 1992 the Anglican Church of Zaire became a province with its own archbishop, Patrice Njojo Byankya. With the overthrow of Zairian leader Mobutu Sese Seko in 1997 and the reorganization of Zaire as the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the present Church of Christ in the Congo—Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo emerged.

The Province of the Congo is headed by its archbishop, Most Reverend Njojo Byankya (B.P. 154, Bunia, Democratic Republic of the Congo). As the new century begins, it has grown substantially and now reports a membership of 300,000. There are five dioceses. The church is supported by the Congo Church Association, based in the United Kingdom, which serves as an advocate for the Congo within the Church of England and maintains an Internet site providing history and other information on the church at www.congochurchasn.org.uk/. The church is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

The church remembers Apolo Kivebulaya as its apostle on the anniversary of his death, May 30.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo

PO Box 25586
Kampala
Uganda

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Baptist Community of Congo

In the 1870s, just as the king of Belgium was asserting hegemony over the Congo, the Baptist Missionary Society in England started two efforts. One, launched by the independent Livingstone Inland Mission, founded by a member of the BMS committee, led to what is today known as the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Congo (aka Baptist Community of the Congo River). The other began with a gift of £1,000 to the BMS, which in turn used the money to send Thomas J. Comber (1852–1887) and George Grenfell (1849–1906) on an exploratory trip up the Congo River to Sao Salvador. In 1880, Grenfell opened a station at Musuki.

Since navigation on the river is blocked 100 miles inland by rapids, the BMS sent a steam-powered boat to Grenfell, which was carried in pieces to Stanley Pool and reassembled. With this boat, named The Peace, Grenfell explored more than 3,400 miles of the Upper Congo River system (for which he was honored by the Royal Geographical Society). In 1886, the BMS began founding mission stations on the upper river. The early work focused upon the establishment of elementary schools. Since government money for schools only went to Roman Catholics, the BMS had to raise the funds to support the Baptist schools. The first medical facility opened at Bolobo in 1921.

The first Bible translation in a local language, Kikongo, was published in 1893. Works in 11 other languages followed over the next 25 years. The mission presented a conservative Christian perspective and asked believers to follow a strict discipline, which included refraining from alcohol, polygamy, and sexual promiscuity.

The Congo became independent in 1960. The BMS transferred its mission to three new Baptist bodies, the Baptist Church of the Lower River, the Baptist Church of the Middle River, and the Baptist Church of the Upper River. However, soon afterward, the government decreed that all Protestant groups, in order to receive state recognition, had to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo. The three Baptist churches united as the Baptist Community of the Zaire River (Communauté Baptiste du Fleuve Zaire) and then affiliated with the Church of Christ, whose organizers had worked out a means by which the member organizations could retain their separate existence. Those missionaries that remained in the Congo (then known as Zaire) were now responsible to the community rather than the BMS.

The community has survived the regime of Mobutu Sese Seko (r. 1965–1997), the successful revolution in the 1990s, and the establishment of the present Republic of the Congo. In 2007, it reported 1,018,500 members. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance and the World Council of Churches.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Congo

BP 205

Kinshasa 1

Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Stanley, Brian. The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1992.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Baptist Community of the Western Congo

The king of Belgium asserting hegemony over the Congo alerted Baptists in England to the possibility of opening missionary work in this then relatively unknown area of the world. The Baptist Missionary Society started a work there that grew into what is known today as the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Congo River. Almost simultaneously, however, Alfred Tilly (1825–1899), a Baptist minister from Wales and a member of the committee guiding the BMS, founded the independent Livingstone Inland Mission. Believing that the BMS effort would be limited to the coastal region, Tilly directed the mission's efforts up river. Cooperating with the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, Tilly recruited 50 missionaries and sent them to establish stations along the hundreds of miles of the riverfront.

Beginning in 1878, seven stations had been established within the first five years. Then in 1884 the work was turned over to the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU; now an integral part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.). As it turned out, the BMS did focus its mission along the same riverfront; however, the territory was so large that a situation of potential competition became one of cooperation. The ABMU work received its first breakthrough in 1886 when a revival broke out at their station at Banza Manteke. More than 1,000 people converted.

Horrified at the practices of the traditional religions of the peoples among whom they worked, the ABMU missionaries, like the BMS missionaries, insisted that their converts make a strong break with their past. Members were taught to refrain from drunkenness, polygamy, what was considered Pagan dancing, witchcraft, and any other practices that the missionaries saw as remnants of their religious past. Like the BMS mission, the ABMU effort founded a number of elementary schools. They also discovered that people would often associate with the mission for many years before making the decision to formally convert to Christianity, a decision symbolized by their being baptized.

The ABMU mission took a major step in 1947 with the formation of the Convention of Baptist Churches. When the Belgian Congo gained its independence, the Convention became the Association des Églises Baptistes du Congo Ouest, and a formal separation from the mission occurred. In 1966, the ABMU formally gave the Association all of its assets in the Congo. When the government decreed that all Protestant groups, in order to receive state recognition, had to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo, the Association became a charter member of the new church. It was structured in such a way that its members were able to keep their denominational identity. The former Association became known as the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Western Zaire.

In 1909, the two missions cooperated in the formation of the Kimpese Evangelical Training Institution to provide training in evangelism and the Bible. The institution is known today as the Evangelical Center of Cooperation and operates a number of schools throughout the country. The mission also opened several hospitals and a leprosy camp. In the post-independence era, medical work developed a focus on preventive health care.

In the 1990s, a successful revolution ended the long regime of Mobutu Sese Seko, and with the new government the country's name was changed to the Republic of the Congo. Church names were adjusted accordingly.

In 2007 the Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Western Congo reported 385,000 members in 600 churches. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance. It was a member of the World Council of Churches for many years, but has recently withdrawn.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of the Western Congo Avenue de l'Avenir 537
BP 4728
Kinshasa 2
Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; Church of Christ in the Congo—Baptist Community of Congo; World Council of Churches.

References

- Stanley, Brian. The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1992.
- Torbet, Robert. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1955.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo

The Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS; now Conservative Baptist International), associated with the Conservative Baptist Association of America (CBAmerica), began work in the Congo in 1946 by assuming control of the mission previously established by Unevangelized Africa Mission. In 1928, Paul Hurlburt Sr. (b. 1927) had begun the work in Kivu

Province in the eastern part of the country. By the 1940s he had gathered some 2,600 missions and established several hundred schools and a clinic for people suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy). Once the CBFMS took over the work, they opened secondary schools, expanded the evangelism program, and distributed literature. In 1948 the missionaries founded Rwanguba Bible Institute, from which several regional Bible schools were opened. The mission was organized as the Association of Baptist Churches of Kivu for purposes of seeking government recognition.

The progress of the mission was interrupted several times in the 1960s due to the warlike conditions in that part of the Congo. On at least four occasions the missionaries withdrew and returned. In the midst of this unrest, the church suffered a schism over the continuing role of the missionaries. The greater number of church members no longer wished to cooperate with the missionaries and left to found the Baptist Community in Kivu. The group working with the Conservative Baptist missionaries continued as the Association of Baptist Churches.

In 1970 the government granted recognition to the Association. It also demanded that all Protestant and Free church groups come together in a new government-sponsored structure, the Church of Christ of Zaire (now the Community of Christ of the Congo). In 1973 the Association changed its name to the Community of Baptist Churches in Kivu and affiliated with the Church of Christ. The Baptist Community in Kivu also affiliated.

In 2007, the Community of Baptist Churches in Kivu, more recently known as the Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo, reported 73,346 members in 330 churches. The Baptist Community in Kivu is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Baptist Churches in the Eastern Congo

BP 485

Goma

Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; CBAmerica; Free Churches.

References

Founded on the Word: Focused on the World. Wheaton, IL: CBFMS, 1978.

Nelson, Jack E. Christian Missionizing and Social Transformation. New York: Praeger, 1992.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Community of Disciples of Christ

In 1884 the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, the missionary arm of what later came to be known as the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), considered the possibility of opening an African mission. After commissioning an exploratory visit, the Society sent Ellsworth Faris and Harry N. Biddle to establish the work. Unable to obtain the Belgian's government approval, they were blocked until the American Baptists abandoned some of their work in the central Congo and turned it over to Faris (Biddle having died, unable to cope with the climate). Initial work was established at Bolenge. The formal transfer of property was made in 1899, with the Disciples reimbursing the Baptists for part of the money that had been put into the facilities.

The original station expanded to 6 by 1925, at which time there were 664 self-supporting churches and almost 8,000 Native workers. Expansion was assisted by the construction of several large boats to navigate the Ruki River system. As the mission grew, its headquarters was moved to Coquilhatville, now known as Mbandaka.

The church in the United States very early adopted as its goal the building of an indigenous church, and soon saw that in terms of the mission becoming self-supporting and self-governing. Leadership began to be trained soon after a congregation was formed, and from early on the number of Native workers far outnumbered the missionaries, and many were ordained as ministers. The church was granted autonomy in 1964, though it has continued to receive support both from the Christian Church and from Germany through the United Evangelical Mission.

In 1971, following the rise to power of Mobutu Sese Seko and the change of the country's name to Zaire, the Disciples of Christ merged into the Church of Christ in Zaire as the Community of Disciples of Christ. The Disciples of Christ had grown into one of the largest of the Protestant churches in the Congo, with more than 650,000 members being reported in 2005.

The Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of the Disciples of Christ operates an extensive system of primary and secondary schools, and a theological school at Bolenge. It has placed great emphasis on assisting people in the development of modern agricultural techniques.

The church has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1965.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Disciples of Christ
Avenir du Congo No. 5
BP 178
Mbandaka
Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ);
World Council of Churches.

References

- Survey of Service.* St. Louis, MO: Christian Board of Publication, 1928.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Community of Light

The Community of Light was founded in 1931 in the Congo, but it traces its beginning to 1918, when the father of Kayuwa Tshibumbu Wa Kahinga, the present patriarch of the church, gave his life to the service of God. The elder Kayuwa began to preach in the town of Kafinga and to gather a congregation. He taught that Sunday was the holy day instituted by God in the fourth commandment (Exodus 20:8) and that it was the church's duty to preach the gospel for the liberation of the whole person.

The Church of Light, formally organized in 1931, adopted an orthodox Christian, Bible-based perspective. As it grew it developed a program that was integrated into the life of the society. Wednesday became a day for Bible studies and prayer meetings, and the first Friday of each month was a time for the whole congregation to gather for a special spiritual meeting.

As the church spread, the various congregations organized a general assembly, the highest legislative body. The assembly meets annually. The church is led by its patriarch and the bishops. The bishops gather twice annually. Each parish has a monthly gathering to conduct any immediate business. The church carries on a program of health care for the public and has sponsored programs in agricultural development and cattle breeding.

The church has a strong evangelistic program, which includes organized meetings for women and for youth, vacation Bible schools, and evangelistic campaigns. Churches offer literacy courses for adults.

In the 1980s the church had more than 220,000 members. In the 1970s, as mandated by the government, it joined with the other churches in the Church of Christ in the Congo. It has a close relationship with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). It has in the past been a member of the World Council of Churches, but has in recent years withdrawn.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Light
BP 10498
Kinshasa
Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ);
World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Community of Presbyterians

The Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Presbyterians grew out of the missionary thrust of American Presbyterians (now the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) who opened a station at Luebo in 1891. The church began to move quickly to develop indigenous leadership, and the appointment of teaching evangelists and the ordination of pastors occurred before the organization of local churches. The missionaries pursued a policy of recruiting capable leaders and placing them in charge of areas in which they served as evangelistic arms of the mission endeavor.

More formal congregations began to emerge in the years after World War I, and the more complete presbyterian church order, complete with local church elders and deacons, began to appear. These congregations could also take the more formal step of calling their pastors. Presbyteries were organized, and they in turn came together to constitute a synod. In 1959, the missionaries relinquished control, and the Presbyterian Community became an autonomous body. It received government recognition the following year.

Presbyterians in the Congo were among the leaders in the ecumenical movement and participated fully in the Protestant Council of the Congo formed in 1924. This Council was one of the first formal attempts outside the West of Protestant churches to coordinate their work in missions. It was also one of the first places in which the split between the more liberal socially active churches and the more conservative evangelistically oriented churches began to appear.

The Presbyterians were among the more liberal groups, their stance emphasizing the need for broad ecumenical relationships among the churches. They were among the churches giving their support to the idea of the creation of the Church of Christ in Zaire in 1970, soon after the coming to power of Mobutu Sese Seko (r. 1965–1997). Mobutu forced all of the churches into a single ecclesiastical organization much more closely tied together than a mere council of churches, though the former denominations were able to keep some denominational identity. As they later saw the attempts of the Mobutu regime to use the new united church for political purposes, church leaders became critics of the arrangement.

The Presbyterian Community has suffered two schisms. First, in 1967, a group in eastern Kasai withdrew to form the Presbyterian Community of eastern Kasai. Then in 1982 the leadership of the Church of Christ in Zaire attempted to impose an episcopal polity on the Presbyterian Community. Although most Presbyterians opposed this proposal, Pastor Jean Bakatshipa liked the idea and was consecrated as a bishop. He was then excommunicated from the Presbyterian Community and with his supporters established the Presbyterian Community in western Kasai.

Over the years various Presbyterian and Reformed churches established missions apart from the American Presbyterian effort, and several of these grew into independent churches. A number of these formed the Reformed Conference of Zaire (now the Alliance Réformée du Congo-Kinshasa) in 1988.

The Presbyterian Community is the largest Presbyterian body in the Congo and one of the largest non-Catholic churches in the country. In 2005, it reported 2,500,000 members organized into 12 synods and 43 presbyteries. Its General Assembly is its highest legislative body. It has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1972, and has also affiliated with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Presbyterians

c/o Procure CPZA

BP 1799

Kinshasa

Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.

The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Evangelical Community

The Evangelical Community in the Congo began in the 1880s with the arrival of missionaries in the then Belgian Congo from the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden, which emerged in the 19th century from the spread of the Pietist movement into Scandinavia. The first missionary, Carl Johann Engvall, worked in cooperation with the Livingstone Inland Mission, an interdenominational Protestant mission founded in 1878 by Irish evangelist H. Grattan Guinness (1835–1910). Their initial work in the Congo was eventually turned over to the American Baptists. As the Swedish work grew, some of the American Baptist work was turned over to the Swedish Mission.

The Swedish Mission became an independent evangelical church in 1961, after the Congo became an independent nation as Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo). Soon afterward, the government ordered the nation's Protestant groups to join in one organization, the Church of Christ in the Congo, as a prerequisite for receiving state recognition in the new independent state. Each of the member units of the Church of Christ became known as a community.

The church's centers are primarily located in the countryside, where it supports several hospitals and a large medical ministry. The Evangelical Community also maintains close connection with the Evangelical Church of the Congo in the neighboring Republic of the Congo (formerly Middle Congo). It is through that church that it may be reached. In 2005, it reported 83,746 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Evangelical Community
BP 3205
Brazzaville
Republic du Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptists; Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Mennonite Community

The Church of Christ in the Congo—Mennonite Community dates to the arrival of the first Mennonite missionaries in the 1890s. However, in 1912 the Defenseless Mennonite Church (now known as the Evangelical Mennonite Conference) and the Central Illinois Mennonite Conference (now an integral part of the General Conference Mennonite Church), both based in the United States, organized the Congo Inland Mission. The Mission assumed hegemony of the Mennonite work that was located southeast of Kinshasa and west of the Kasai River. In 1914, the missionaries supported by the Swedish Baptist Mission merged their work into the Congo Mission. The work grew slowly but steadily for the next half century. A number of Mennonite churches contributed both money and personnel to the Congo Mission.

In February 1960, in anticipation of the forthcoming independence, the Mission was turned over to local control, and it emerged as an independent Mennonite Church in the Congo, though the missionaries remained in the field to supply continuing support. The action proved fortuitous, as the missionaries were expelled before the end of the year. They returned briefly before being expelled again. In 1970, like other churches in the Congo, the Mennonite Church became a community in the Church of Christ in the Congo and assumed its present name.

The Mennonite Community headquarters are in the city of Tshikapa in West Kasai, but is best contacted through the Mennonite Central Committee in Kinshasa. In 2005, it reported 83,746 members. It has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1961.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Mennonite Community

c/o Mennonite Central Committee
BP 4081
Kinshasa II
Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mennonites; World Council of Churches.

References

- Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History: A Popular History of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
- Loewen, Melvin J. Three Score: The Story of an Emerging Mennonite Church in Central Africa. Elkhart: Congo Inland Mission, 1972.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Weaver, William B. Thirty-Five Years in the Congo: A History of the Demonstrations of Divine Power in the Congo. Chicago: Congo Inland Mission, 1945.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa

In 1955 the Presbyterian mission that had been established by the American Presbyterians (now the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) was shaken by a controversy in Leopoldville (now Kinshasa). Leadership in the area of the capital wanted to redirect its program to meet the needs of what it saw as an emerging urban area and of the growing educated middle class. This controversy led to a break with the mission, and the African leadership established an independent church. The lay membership of the church provided some of the dynamism for which the church became known, and that drive, coupled with the strength of the church because of its location in the major city of the country, gave it a level of influence beyond that which its actual size might suggest.

The church cultivated an emphasis on worship, but it was hurt in the 1960s when a wave of Pentecostalism swept through the membership; in 1962 some 1,500 members left to form a Charismatic church. On the other hand, the church rebounded under the able leadership of the Reverend Josue Tashimungu in the 1970s. Tashimungu emerged as one of the major architects of the Church of Christ in the Congo, the federation of Protestant churches that was forced upon the country in the 1970s following independence and the emergence of Mobutu Sese Seko as the country's strongman.

The Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa moved from being a leading voice in the formation of the federated church to being one of its strongest critics as the church's leadership began to impose an authoritarian rule on the church and the Mobutu government tried to use the church to manipulate the Protestant community. Among the significant issues it confronted was the 1980s attempt by the government to transform the Church of Christ into an episcopally led organization.

In the 1990s the Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa reported approximately 65,000 members. An ecumenically active body, it has joined the World Council of Churches and World Alliance of Reformed Churches and has been very active in the Alliance Réformée du Congo-Kinshasa, a cooperative body for churches of the Reformed tradition in the country.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Presbyterian Community of Kinshasa

Bzp 91

Boulevard Lamumba no. 2860

Limete, Kinshasa

Democratic Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:
William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company,
1999.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Protestant Baptist Church in Africa/ Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa

The Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa is a relatively new missionary endeavor, founded in 1956 by a Swiss Baptist minister, E. Clemann, assisted by Kabweka-Leza and other Congolese Christians. Though Baptist in belief and maintaining close relationships with Baptist churches in Europe, it has adopted an episcopal mode of organization. The church grew quickly, and as congregations were formed it developed an extensive educational program of primary and secondary schools, Bible schools, and maternity schools. It also manages a variety of medical and diaconal facilities. Work is conducted in French, Swahili, and Kiluba.

The church is led by its bishop, three auxiliary bishops, and the general auxiliary conference. The conference meets every five years. There is an episcopal cabinet that carries on the administration of the church on a day-to-day basis. There is also a council for each region of the church. The bishop nominates candidates for auxiliary bishop, and they are approved by the episcopal conference. Candidates for the ministry are approved by the episcopal cabinet. Both male and female candidates are accepted. Ministers must have a thorough education in the Bible and theology, given through the church's Higher Theological Institute. Some also study with the Theological Faculty at the University of Kinshasa or the Theological School in Kananga.

In 2005, the church reported 67,300 members. It retains close ties with the European Association of Baptist Churches and with various Baptist unions, especially those in French-speaking countries, from which it receives volunteer workers. It was a founding member of the Church of Christ in the Congo, the united church mandated by the government in 1970. However, the church has an ecumenical outlook and in 1973 joined the World Council of Churches.

Church of Christ in the Congo—Episcopal Baptist Community of Africa

c/o Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation
Kitwe
Zambia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.

Church of Christ in the Congo— Province of the Anglican Church of the Congo

See Church of Christ in the Congo—Anglican Community of the Congo.

Church of Christ, Scientist

Christian Science is a metaphysical religion with a spiritual healing component based on the revelations of Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), revelations received after a fall on the ice in 1866. Eddy, a semi-invalid, had in the past been assisted in her health problems by Phineas Parkhurst Quimby (1802–1866), a mesmerist and spiritual healer in Belfast, Maine. After he died in 1866, Eddy was confined to bed without his services after her fall. While she was reading the Bible, she received what she saw as a divine healing. After the healing, she got up and walked. Later, perceiving her mission to be divine, she began to explore scripture and wrote her first major treatise, Science and Health (later expanded as Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures) in 1875. Her work formed the theological cornerstone for the church and today is believed by Christian Scientists to be a companion volume to the Bible.

A stately Christian Science building in Boston, MA. (Corel)

Eddy believed that Christian Science had been revealed to her alone and started the Christian Science Association for her students near Boston in 1876. Her religion was a controversial one, frequently called the “Boston Craze” by newspaper writers. She suffered attacks from former Quimby student Julius Dresser (1838–1893), who accused her of pirating the healing work of Quimby without giving him credit. The polemics continued for a number of years, even after the death of Eddy, and the historical repercussions eclipsed the history of New Thought (that is, those metaphysical churches like the Unity School of Christianity and Religious Science whose history parallels Christian Science) and tainted Christian Science itself until late in the 20th century.

Eddy trained others how to heal in silence using her specific methodology when she formed her first class in 1870. In 1879 she organized the Church of Christ, Scientist, in Lynn, Massachusetts, later, in 1881, moving it to Boston, where she allowed her students to ordain her as the sole pastor. (Church services today are conducted by readers, who follow her precise lessons for each Sunday of the year.) In 1882 she founded the Massachusetts Metaphysical College, where she taught her students to be Christian Science practitioners. It flourished for several years, and then Eddy closed its doors in 1889.

Many of her brightest students, such as Emma Curtis Hopkins (1853–1925), Ursula Gestefeld (1845–1921), and Augusta Stetson (1842–1928), left Christian Science to found other churches or academies for spiritual training. Later these religious entrepreneurs and others like them became strong influences of the eclectic New Thought movement. Despite Eddy's attempt to wed Christian Science with Christianity and divorce it from New Thought, it differs from normative Protestantism because of the interpretation of God as monistic, not monotheistic, that is, God is seen as the one underlying reality of the whole universe, rather than as a Creator separate from his creation. In other words, God is a Principle, not a person, and that Principle is Life, Truth, Love, Substance, and Intelligence.

Eddy fully reorganized her church in 1892 and developed the Church Manual and bylaws, which gave it the organizational configuration that it has today. There is a five-member governing board, which runs the administration by the authority vested in it by the Mother Church. The board charters branch churches, which operate with democratic control within the framework of the Church Manual. Perhaps the most well-known component of the church is the Christian Science Publishing Society, which has its own board of directors. Publications include the award-winning newspaper the Christian Science Monitor, the Herald of Christian Science (published in 12 languages and Braille), the Christian Science Journal (whose first full-time editor was Emma Curtis Hopkins, who later went on to found organizational New Thought), the Christian Science Sentinel, and the Herald of Christian Science Quarterly, all published in Boston.

A major controversy hit the church's leadership in the early 1990s, and some administrators resigned in protest or were fired. Several of the issues concerned the expansive development of television as a promotional device, the spending of church monies in ventures that were considered speculative by some, and, most important, what appeared to be autocratic control by the board of directors.

There are approximately 3,000 churches worldwide. Membership is unknown. Headquarters of the Church are in a large complex in downtown Boston that has become a mecca for tourists as well as visiting Christian Scientists and features a number of educational and religious exhibits. Mary Baker Eddy as a religious entrepreneur earned the longest entry in Notable American Women.

Church of Christ, Scientist
Christian Science Church Center
175 Huntington Ave.
Boston, MA 02115
<http://www.tfccs.com/>

Gail M. Harley

See also: Eddy, Mary Baker; Religious Science; Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches.

References

- Christian Science: A Sourcebook of Contemporary Materials*. Boston: Christian Science Publishing Society, 1990.
- Gill, Gillian. Mary Baker Eddy. Reading, MA: Perseus Books, 1998.
- Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.
- Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy. 3 vols. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971.

Church of England

The Church of England, the primary religious organization in the United Kingdom, originated with the movement of Christianity to the British Isles during the years of the Roman occupation. Scattered communities of Christians were known by the second century, and the first martyr, Saint Alban, was killed during one of the periods of persecution in the third century. Bishops from London and York participated in the councils held at Arles (314) and Ariminum (359).

The miniscule British church experienced what is considered a new beginning at the end of the sixth century with the arrival of Augustine (d. 604; not to be confused with the North African bishop/theologian of the same name, 354–430), who came to Canterbury at the request of Pope Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604). He converted Ethelbert, the local ruler, was named

Parish church of the Church of England, Wembley, England. The Church of England is the established Christian church in England, with a network of parishes throughout the country. (J. Gordon Melton) archbishop, and established Canterbury as the center of the British church. Following Gregory's plan for organizing the work in Britain, a second major episcopal see for the north was established in York, the primary Roman city in the north. Augustine began the task of bringing the church as it then existed under the more direct authority of Rome and of evangelizing the mass of the island's inhabitants, who still followed their Pagan faith. Through the seventh century, much of the island was evangelized and the subordination to Rome completed. A rich monastic life developed.

The conquest of England by William the Conqueror in the 11th century brought French Norman influence to the fore in England. Normans succeeded to the major offices in the church. The church was, if anything, made even more Roman, due to the special ties that the Normans had to the pope. William appointed the Norman Lanfranc as the new archbishop of Canterbury in 1070, and Lanfranc set about the reorganization of the church, which included the imposition of clerical celibacy and the separation of the ecclesiastical courts from the secular. The church also took part in the reorganization of the land along feudal lines. Bishops and abbots assumed a new importance as large landowners. It also set up the significant struggles between church and state that led to the assassination of archbishop of Canterbury Thomas à Becket in 1170 and the withdrawal by King Henry I of the demands he had made for the submission of the church.

Although the church experienced many issues and changes in the next five centuries, none were so critical for its future as its response to the Protestant Reformation in the 16th century. Initially, Reformation ideas made little headway in England, as both king and bishops were loyal to Rome. However, for a variety of political and personal reasons, King Henry VIII (r. 1509–1547) began to separate the church from papal authority. The initial crisis came when he decided to divorce Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), the daughter of the king and queen of Spain. When the pope refused to alienate the Spanish Crown by granting a divorce, Henry forced the Parliament to enact a series of legislative acts (1534–1535) that changed the allegiance of the British church from the pope to the king. There was no change in doctrine, and no softening of the harsh attitude toward Lutherans in the country. He then moved against the monasteries to claim their land revenues for his own depleted treasury.

Even though Henry flirted with Protestantism, it was not until the reign of his son, Edward VI (r. 1547–1553), that Protestantism made any real progress. During his brief reign, the Protestants who had become his chief counselors and guardians promulgated Protestant belief and practice with a vengeance. However, after five years, the sickly Edward died, to be replaced by his sister Mary (r. 1553–1558), a loyal Roman Catholic. She and her supporters attempted to return the Church of England to its former position within the Roman Catholic Church and in the process executed a number of Protestant leaders. So extensive was the persecution that it earned her the lasting hatred of the Protestant community and her popular designation as Bloody Mary.

In 1558, Elizabeth I (1533–1603) inherited a land divided between Catholics and Protestants. Her great accomplishment was the articulation and enforcement of what became known as the via media, the middle way, a new path drawing upon both Protestantism and Roman Catholicism that led to the unique Anglican tradition of the modern world. She reinstated the Act of Supremacy that had established her father as head of the British church and assumed the title of supreme governor of the church. She also authorized a new Protestant edition of the Prayer Book, the primary liturgical document for the church. In 1559, the Roman Catholic bishops resigned, and new bishops loyal to Elizabeth were installed in their place. Pope Leo XIII declared the orders of the new bishops invalid. In 1570, Elizabeth was excommunicated from the Roman Catholic Church.

In the meantime, Calvinist Protestantism gained a foothold in Scotland, and in 1580 the Church of Scotland became officially Presbyterian in belief and worship. In England, some Protestants proposed various programs for further purifying the Church of England (whence their popular name of Puritans), most of which involved the replacement of bishops with an alternate form of church authority. The largest grouping among the Puritans were the Presbyterians. In the 1640s, they came to the fore in England and became the dominant force in Parliament, which entered into the open conflict with King Charles I (r. 1625–1649) known as the English Civil War, which ended in the overthrow and execution of the king. In 1645, Parliament forbade the Prayer Book and outlawed Anglicanism. In 1647–1649, an assembly of Presbyterian leaders issued the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Westminster Catechism, the primary statements of British Presbyterianism.

Anglicanism reached its lowest ebb during the years of the Commonwealth under Protestant Oliver Cromwell (r. 1649–1658). However, his successor proved inept, and a new king restored the monarchy. Charles II (r. 1660–1685) reestablished Anglicanism in 1662. The Church of England has remained the official church of the land since that time. The Puritans now faced official disapproval, and they went through a period of persecution and discrimination until the Act of Toleration of 1689 established a system by which dissent from the established church could be institutionalized in different churches as long as they basically accepted the Anglican statement of faith as embodied in the Thirty-nine Articles, drawn up under Elizabeth I. These articles present a set of orthodox Christian affirmations concerning God and Christ, affirm two sacraments (baptism and the Lord's Supper), make no mention of bishops, and specifically deny a variety of Roman Catholic beliefs, most notably transubstantiation and the veneration of the Virgin Mary.

The re-establishment of Anglicanism, the continued outlawing of Roman Catholicism, and the period of official disapproval of Protestantism led many to come into the re-established Anglican Church while retaining their Roman Catholic and Protestant tendencies.

This led to the development of three recognizable groupings within the church and its leadership. Those favoring Protestantism formed a Low-Church wing. They enjoyed a period of prominence in the 18th century during the Evangelical Awakening associated with the rise of Methodism. Those who favored an emphasis on ritual that brought them closer to Roman Catholic practice formed the High-Church, or Anglo-Catholic, wing. They experienced a period of marked revival in the 19th century. In the middle were the latitudinarians, who attempted to mediate between the two extremes. These three groupings continue in strength to the present in both the Church of England and the worldwide Anglican movement.

Soon after their re-establishment in power, Anglican leaders became aware of the significant number of British citizens who now resided outside of the country, especially in the newly discovered lands of the Americas. The large number of Anglicans who had settled in the American colonies were especially in need of leadership. Following a period of work in the American colonies in the 1690s, Dr. Thomas Bray (1656–1730) returned to England and led in the founding of two organizations to assist in the development of the church and clergy outside of England, the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG). The former set itself the task of producing inexpensive Christian literature for mass circulation. The latter began the recruitment of Anglican ministers for service abroad, especially in America.

The establishment of Anglican parishes abroad was initially seen as simply an extension of the church at home, and foreign churches were attached to British dioceses. No bishops were consecrated for service overseas until 1787, when Charles Inglalls became the bishop of Halifax, Nova Scotia. Prior to his taking office, however, the American Revolution had swept the Anglicans in the new United States into a very different situation. They reorganized as the Protestant Episcopal Church (now the Episcopal Church), the first Anglican Church independent of the administrative authority of the Church of England.

The American Revolution and the loss of its work in the American colonies, coupled with the development of the British Empire, led to the reorientation of the SPG and the founding of two additional organizations focused upon building the church worldwide, the Church Missionary Society (1799) and the British and Foreign Bible Society. The SPG having become identified with the High-Church wing of the church, the Church Missionary Society channeled the energies of the Low-Church wing and became the single most important agency of the church in establishing the Church of England throughout the colonies.

The 19th century became the era of the great spread of the Church of England internationally. With the appointment of a bishop for Australia (in 1835), New Zealand (1841), and South Africa (1847), the changing global nature of the church became evident to all. This change was further signaled by the meeting in 1867 of the first Lambeth Conference, calling together the whole Anglican episcopate. That Conference has continued to meet at 10-year intervals. In 1888 the bishops issued an important statement concerning the basis of the Anglican tradition in four principles: (1) the holy scriptures, (2) the Apostles' and Nicene creeds, (3) the two sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and (4) the historic episcopate.

The Lambeth Quadrilateral (as it came to be known), as articulated in 1888, became the basis from which the Church of England in the 20th century became a leader in the ecumenical movement. The church participated (on many occasions as host) in the conferences that led to the creation of the World Council of Churches in 1948. It has also moved to establish special relationships with the Moravian Church, the Old Catholic Church, and the several Orthodox churches. It has also carried on a long-standing dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, in the hopes of healing the rift brought on by the Reformation.

Although still the state church and the largest church in England, the Church of England has been stung by the widely reported findings of the steady erosion of public support for the church indicated by low attendance and the steady decline in the percentage of babies baptized and youth confirmed in the church. Nevertheless, the archbishop of Canterbury remains one of the more important world Christian leaders. In 1968, the Lambeth Conference recommended that the various Anglican bodies, including the Church of England, consider the ordination of females to the offices of deacon and priest. Subsequently, in 1994, the Church of England ordained the first female to the priesthood. To date it has not selected a female for the office of bishop.

The Church of England has 44 dioceses, which include some 13,000 congregations across England, the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, the Isles of Scilly, and a small part of Wales. An additional diocese in Europe includes more than 250 congregations across Europe, Morocco, Turkey, and the Asian countries of the former Soviet Union. Leadership is exercised by its 113 bishops, including 44 diocesan bishops and 69 suffragan and full-time assistant bishops. The dioceses are divided between the two provinces, Canterbury and York. An estimated 25 million people currently residing in the United Kingdom (approximately half the residents) have been baptized in the Church of England. Active membership, as measured by reception of holy Communion on Easter Day, is far lower. In 1997 only 1,172,000 people received Communion.

The current archbishop of Canterbury, who is also recognized as the leading cleric of the Anglican Communion, is the Most Reverend Rowan Williams (b. 1950), who was named in 2002 as the 104th bishop of the See of Canterbury. He is the first Welshman to hold the office and, as the former primate of the Church of Wales, the first bishop since the mid-13th century to be appointed to the office from beyond the Church of England.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the Church of England was a global body, with branches throughout the British colonial empire. Since World War II, that empire has been dismantled, and in keeping with the changes in missions throughout Christendom, the church granted autonomy to its affiliated branches in different countries and reorganized the whole of the world Anglican Communion as a fellowship of like-minded bishops and churches. As the mother church of the communion, the Church of England has hegemony over England while sharing responsibility for the Anglicans in the British Isles with the Church in Wales, the Scottish Episcopal Church, and the Church of Ireland. In a somewhat different status are the Anglican parishes throughout continental Europe. These parishes, usually one or two per country, serving primarily expatriates, have been organized into the Diocese of Europe, whose headquarters is in London.

General Synod of the Church of England
Church House
Great Smith Street
London, SW1P 3NZ
UK
www.england.anglican.org/

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church in Wales; Church Missionary Society; Church of Ireland; Church of Scotland; Episcopal Church; Elizabeth I; Lutheranism; Mary I; Methodism; Roman Catholic Church; Scottish Episcopal Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- Davie, Martin. Guide to the Church of England. Woonsocket, RI: Andrew Mowbray Incorporated, 2008.
- Moorman, John Richard Humpidge. A History of the Church in England. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 1986.
- Robbins, Keith. England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales: The Christian Church 1900–2000. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Wakeman, Henry Offley. An Introduction to the History of the Church of England. London: Rivingtons, 1947.

Church of God, an International Community

See United Church of God, an International Association; Church of God, International.

Church of God (Anderson, Indiana)

The Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), one of the leading representatives of the 19th-century Holiness movement, was founded in 1880 by Daniel Warner (1842–1925), formerly a minister of the Church of God, General Council. The Holiness movement had emerged among the several Methodist churches in the middle of the century and emphasized the belief that God could impart sanctification (holiness) to Christian believers as a special work of the Holy Spirit. Within Holiness churches, the experience of sanctification has been seen as the common experience of the Christian life.

Because of his belief in sanctification, Warner was expelled from the Church of God, General Council. He organized the new Church of God with a congregational polity. The highest legislative body for the church is the General Assembly, which meets annually. The assembly oversees the various agencies and schools established by the church. The church did not adopt a creed, but generally follows Holiness teachings and places a central emphasis upon evangelism and missionary endeavors. It celebrates three ordinances, all seen as symbolic acts of obedience: baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the washing of feet. Baptism is by immersion, the Lord's Supper is open to all Christians, and foot washing occurs annually on Maundy Thursday (during the week preceding Easter).

The church quickly developed an expansive missionary program and currently has work in 90 countries and territories encompassing some 7,500 churches and more than 1,100,000 believers, a large percentage in Central and South America and the Caribbean Islands. It is one of the few Protestant churches sponsoring work in Egypt.

The church has 2,215 congregations and 250,000 members in the United States (2006) and 48 congregations in Canada, with approximately 37,000 members. The church is affiliated with the Christian Holiness Partnership and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is additionally related to the World Evangelical Fellowship.

Church of God
PO Box 2420
Anderson, IN 46018
www.chog.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Holiness Partnership; Holiness Movement.

References

Callen, Barry L., ed. The First Century. 2 vols. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1979.

Miller, Milburn H. "Unto the Church of God." Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1968.

Smith, John W. V. The Quest for Holiness and Unity: A Centennial History of the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana). Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1980.

Sterner, R. Eugene. We Reach Our Hands in Fellowship. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1960.

Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)

The Church of God traces its origin to August 19, 1886, when Missionary Baptist ministers Richard Green Spurling (1857–1935) and his father, Richard Spurling (1810–1891), organized the Christian Union in Monroe County, Tennessee. Reacting to the exclusivity of the Landmark Baptist movement, the Spurlings called for Christian unity based on a testimony of Jesus Christ as Savior and a covenant to take the New Testament as the basis of doctrine and practice.

Over the next few years R. G. Spurling founded several congregations in eastern Tennessee. In 1902 Spurling and R. Frank Porter organized the Holiness Church at Camp Creek, North Carolina, in the home of William F. Bryant (1863–1949). This congregation conserved the results of an 1896 revival that had introduced the doctrine of sanctification as a second definite work of grace and located the group in the American Holiness movement with its growing use of Pentecostal language (that is, baptism of the Holy Spirit) to describe the sanctification experience. Following this revival, many people testified of speaking in tongues and of experiences of divine healing. When Indiana-born Ambrose J. Tomlinson (1865–1943) joined the group in 1903, he was immediately selected as pastor and served as leader of the movement until his ouster in 1923, amid controversy over polity and financial management. Activities moved to Cleveland, Tennessee, in 1904 when Tomlinson relocated there. Reflecting a belief that it was restoring the New Testament church of God as addressed by Paul in the scriptures, the second General Assembly chose the name Church of God in 1907. The denomination became firmly established in the Pentecostal movement following the Spirit-baptism experience of Tomlinson in 1908. Publication of the Church of God Evangel began in 1910. A list of Teachings was published in 1910, and a Declaration of Faith was approved in 1948, following debate over the nature of sanctification.

International efforts began in late 1909 and early 1910 when a missionary team composed of Edmond and Rebecca Barr and R. M. and Ida Evans, along with Carl M. Padgett, took the Pentecostal message to the Bahamas. Over the years the movement supported various missionaries and finally established a standing missions board in 1926. The last half of the 20th century saw the development of amalgamation agreements with several indigenous Pentecostal organizations, including the Full Gospel Church of God in Southern Africa (1951) and Gereja Bethel Indonesia (Indonesian Bethel Church of God) (1970). In March 2009 the Church of God reported 34,394 congregations in 172 countries and territories with 7,059,348 members worldwide.

Although continuing many practices of Appalachian Baptists, such as believer's baptism, shouting, and foot washing, Tomlinson led the development of a centralized form of church polity, which combines an Assembly composed of all members who are able to attend with an episcopal system of appointments. The general overseer and some other officials are elected biennially at the International General Assembly. Field directors, superintendents, and state, regional, and national overseers supervise in various geographical divisions.

Church of God
Keith at 25th Streets
PO Box 2430
Cleveland, TN 37320-2430
www.churchofgod.org

David G. Roebuck

See also: Paul; Pentecostalism.

References

- Conn, Charles W. Like A Mighty Army: A History of the Church of God, 1886–1996. Cleveland, TN: Pathway Press, 2008.
- Minutes of the 72nd International General Assembly of the Church of God*. Cleveland, Tenn.: Pathway Press, 2008.

Roebuck, David G. "Restorationism and a Vision for World Harvest: A Brief History of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee)." Cyberjournal for Pentecostal-Charismatic Research Volume 5: <http://www.pctii.org/cyberj/index.html>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Church of God in Christ

The Church of God in Christ ranks among a rare cadre of African American Christian denominations that have congregations on six continents. With more than six million members worldwide, the membership of the Church of God in Christ (COGIC) consists of myriad nationalities in some 60 countries. COGIC has become a global church through the ministry of its missionaries, nationals, and U.S. military families serving around the world.

The Church of God in Christ began as a Holiness fellowship among African American Baptists in Mississippi in 1895. In 1897 its first independent congregation was established as a Holiness church, and the Church of God in Christ has identified 1897 as its founding date. This was also the year that the name Church of God in Christ was revealed to Charles Harrison Mason (1861–1961), one of the leaders of the fellowship. The fellowship grew throughout the mid-South region of the United States, in addition to establishing a mission in Liberia. During this time, the fellowship became interdenominational, attracting Methodist as well as Baptist congregations into its organization. Theological controversies, however, over the compatibility of Baptist doctrine and Holiness teaching led the African American Baptist state conventions in Mississippi and Arkansas to disfellowship leading Holiness Baptist clergy such as Mason and Charles Price Jones (1865–1949).

In 1907 Mason and two other clergy from the fellowship attended the Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles. All three clergy received the Pentecostal experience. Mason returned to the South and introduced the Pentecostal message to his Holiness fellowship. Only a minority of the clergy embraced the message; the majority requested that the Pentecostal faction withdraw. Mason retained the name Church of God in Christ and began the process of transforming his faction of the fellowship into a Holiness-Pentecostal denomination. During the next decade (1907–1917), COGIC functioned as an interracial network of black and white fellowships. One of the white fellowships served as the core faction in organizing the Assemblies of God in 1914. Even though COGIC has remained a predominantly African American denomination, it has always had white and Latino members within its American congregations; during various periods of its history, especially the pre-civil rights era, COGIC included white and Latino congregations within its American membership.

Since its reorganization in 1907, COGIC has been led by 6 leaders, with 66 years being divided between two leaders: Mason for 44 years and J. O. Patterson (1912–1989) for 22 years. The current presiding bishop is Charles Edward Blake (b. 1940). Within COGIC ranks have been pioneers and leaders of the gospel music movement in the United States, Canada, Japan, and Great Britain. Within the United States, COGIC has expressed an ecumenical impulse in its involvement in the Fraternal Council of Negro Churches, the Congress of National Black Churches, and the Faith and Order Commission (National Council of Churches). Since 1970, the denomination has sponsored the Charles Harrison Mason Theological Seminary, located in Atlanta, Georgia, the first accredited Pentecostal seminary in the world. The seminary is a member of the Interdenominational Theological Center, an ecumenical consortium of seminaries affiliated with Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist denominations.

COGIC as a Holiness-Pentecostal denomination began to expand beyond the United States by 1919 with its emergence in Jamaica. By the mid-1920s, it had already been introduced into various Caribbean countries besides Jamaica: Mexico, Panama, the Turks Islands, and Trinidad. In 1924 Alfred B. Cunningham, a Jamaican, returned to Jamaica to advance the ministry in Jamaica. By 1925 a Rev. Hall, a Turks Islander, returned to the Turks Islands to introduce COGIC there as well as in some other islands in the area. Also in 1925 Mattie McCauley (McCauley), an African American, became the first non-national commissioned by COGIC; she served in Trinidad.

In 1928 COGIC commissioned Joseph Paulceus, a Haitian, as a missionary to Haiti; he established a congregation on the island in 1929. Paulceus had served as a COGIC elder in Connecticut. In 1929 COGIC entered Canada through the leadership of C. L. Morton Sr., a black Canadian, who established a congregation in Windsor, Ontario.

Within the Caribbean, Haiti came to take the lead, with currently more than 150 congregations, 42 primary and secondary schools, and an orphanage. Dorothy Webster Exume served as the first COGIC missionary to Haiti. In 1947 she opened the first COGIC school, the C. H. Mason School. COGIC personnel later established a presence in other Caribbean islands, including the Bahamas, Bermuda, the Virgin Islands, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Barbados, British Virgin Islands, and the Dominican Republic.

In the 1920s Ms. January, a COGIC member, went to Liberia; in 1930 she was joined by Elizabeth White. Liberia remained the focus of COGIC's African missions until the World War II era; by 1945, the denomination was introduced to South Africa. In the 1960s, COGIC would move into Ghana and Nigeria. By the 1990s, it was present in 18 sub-Saharan African countries in addition to Egypt. Currently, COGIC's ministry in Africa is led by African nationals and has its largest presence in Nigeria, with more than 2,000 congregations.

Among Central and South American countries, COGIC first established a presence in Panama. Alfred B. Cunningham of Jamaica opened work in Panama in 1924. During the late 1920s, Mattie McCauley shifted her focus to Costa Rica. By 1930, the ministry in Mexico was inaugurated, assisted by Latino COGIC congregations in Colorado. In 1956–1957 Reverend Richard Fidler introduced the church to Cuba. Through his contacts on the island, 40 congregations joined or were established. During the early 1970s, work expanded to Belize, Guatemala, Panama (reestablished), Colombia, Guyana, Brazil, Argentina, and Chile.

COGIC spread to Asia during the 1930s with missionaries in India and China. In 1945, Gracie Yancey would begin 25 years in ministry in Thailand under COGIC auspices. A mission would also be opened in Fiji by Floyd Thuston, a U.S. soldier. Archie Buchanan, a U.S. soldier stationed in Japan in the 1950s, would establish COGIC in Okinawa. During the 1960s, COGIC would be reintroduced to India after a lapse through an affiliated Pentecostal movement, the Indian Pentecostal Church of God, led by K. E. Abraham. With more than 500 congregations, India has the largest COGIC presence in Asia; these congregations joined COGIC after the affiliated relationship with the Indian Pentecostal Church changed. The COGIC presence in the Philippines, begun in the 1960s, was strengthened through the activities of COGIC military personnel at U.S. bases in the Philippines. Then Buchanan, along with Paul K. Hong, introduced the ministry to South Korea in 1970. Work later spread to Sri Lanka, New Guinea, Singapore, Malaysia, and Pakistan. The COGIC presence in Australia originated from South African congregations.

COGIC entered Europe in 1948 through a COGIC family, the McLachlans, from Jamaica, who immigrated to England. In subsequent years COGIC expanded within the Afro-Caribbean immigrant community and would be embraced by African émigrés during the early 21st century. It spread to Germany among military personnel, and then to Italy and Bulgaria. Haitian émigrés organized COGIC congregations in France during the 1990s and Nigerian émigrés established COGIC ministries in Denmark and the Netherlands during the early 2000s.

Currently, the nationality of COGIC membership varies significantly from country to country. In Africa, the Caribbean, Latin America, and most of Asia, its members are all nationals. In Japan and South Korea along with Germany and Italy, the members tend to be African American expatriates or military families. Asian Indians constitute the COGIC membership in Sri Lanka, Singapore, Malaysia, and Canada (British Columbia). Afro-Caribbeans along with their European-born descendants make up the majority in Great Britain and France. COGIC finds its largest concentration of congregations outside the United States in Nigeria, India, the Congo, Haiti, Liberia, South Africa, and Mexico.

Church of God in Christ
938 Mason Street
Memphis, TN 38126
www.cogic.org

David D. Daniels III

See also: Assemblies of God; Indian Pentecostal Church of God; Pentecostalism.

References

- Clemmons, Ithiel C. Bishop C. H. Mason and the Roots of the Church of God in Christ. Bakersfield, CA: Pneuma Life Publishers, 1996.
- Cornelius, Lucille J., comp. The History of Church of God in Christ. N.p., 1975.
- Pleas, Charles H. Fifty Years Achievement: Church of God in Christ. N.p., 1957.

Church of God, International

The Church of God, International (CGI) was founded in 1978 by Garner Ted Armstrong (1930–2003) after he was ousted from the Worldwide Church of God (WCOG) by his father Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986). The church is Sabbatarian and millenarian.

During most of the 1970s Garner Ted had effectively run the Worldwide Church of God, including making most of the World Tomorrow radio and TV broadcasts, while his aged father traveled the world on publicity trips meeting princes, prime ministers, and presidents in what Garner Ted was later to call “the world’s most expensive autograph hunt.” But this was also a decade of turmoil and scandal. After revelation of his extramarital affairs, Garner Ted was suspended from all his church duties in 1974; when church income plummeted, he was reinstated to his preaching on the broadcasts after making a confession of his misbehavior. To ministers who complained that his immoral behavior made him unsuitable to be a minister, it was said that as one doing God’s work, he was exempt from biblical strictures on morality.

However, father and son frequently clashed, and Herbert W. Armstrong would often overturn decisions made by his son. Although still very conservative in the world’s eyes, Garner Ted took a more liberal view than his father of some of the church’s doctrines, and was involved in an internal review of doctrines, the Systematic Theology Project, which his father later repudiated. But in a church characterized by an authoritarian and ambitious leadership, some of Herbert W. Armstrong’s closest advisors, according to Garner

Ted, were telling his elderly father lies about him. In 1978 Herbert W. Armstrong said that his son “has accused his father of senility” and that “his sole effort has been to destroy his father and God’s Church.” Garner Ted was banished, and went on to found the Church of God, International, headquartered in Tyler, Texas, which eventually grew to perhaps 3,000 members worldwide. This church and its offshoots are at the liberal end of the spectrum in comparison with most of the other Worldwide offshoots.

In 1995 Garner Ted Armstrong was again embroiled in sexual scandal. A masseuse released a videotape to the media, showing him in a compromising situation. She pressed charges of sexual assault. Many of the ministers of CGI asked Armstrong to step down as church president. When he refused, around two-thirds of them left early in 1996; in May 1997 they formed a loose confederation of independent churches known individually as Church of God (location); the umbrella group is called Churches of God Outreach Ministries (CGOM).

Armstrong continued with CGI until the end of 1997, when the Council of CGI unanimously voted him out of all positions in his church. He then withdrew from CGI, founded the Garner Ted Armstrong Evangelistic Association, and shortly after that set up the Intercontinental Church of God (ICG). A charismatic preacher, Garner Ted Armstrong continued to attract a strong personal following in spite of his checkered history. CGI, which he had founded, had a smaller membership without his leadership.

Garner Ted Armstrong died unexpectedly in 2003 of complications from pneumonia. His final church, ICG, is now run by his son Mark Armstrong, though he is not an ordained minister.

The Church of God, International, had around 1,500 members in 2009. It still maintains the television program Armor of God, established by Garner Ted Armstrong.

The independent churches in the umbrella group Church of God Outreach Ministries have around 750 members in total. They publish the magazines New Horizons and Fountain of Life.

The Intercontinental Church of God had around 2,000 members in 2009. They publish the Intercontinental News and Twenty-First Century Watch; an indication of the importance of Garner Ted Armstrong’s preaching is that the ICG still broadcast his sermons in their television programs.

The Church of God, International
PO Box 2525
Tyler, TX 75710
www.cgi.org

Church of God Outreach Ministries
PO Box 54621
Tulsa, OK 74155-0621
www.cgom.org

Intercontinental Church of God
PO Box 1117
Tyler, TX 75710
www.intercontinentalcog.org/www.garnertedarmstrong.org/

David V. Barrett

See also: Sabbatarianism; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Armstrong, Garner Ted. Autobiography. 2 vols. Pasadena, CA: Worldwide Church of God, 1986, 1987.
- Armstrong, Garner Ted. The Origin and History of the Church of God, International. Tyler, TX: Church of God, International, 1992.
- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Hopkins, Joseph. The Armstrong Empire: A Look at the Worldwide Church of God. Grand Rapids MI: William. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1974.

Church of God of Prophecy

The Church of God of Prophecy (the name since 1952) often claims to share the early years of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee). As a result of numerous sociological, theological, historical, and personal factors, the Church of God of Prophecy (CGP) came into existence in 1923–1924. It is an orthodox Christian body in the Holiness Pentecostal tradition.

A. J. Tomlinson (1865–1943) served as general overseer of the church until his death, at which time his youngest son, Milton A. Tomlinson (1906–1995), was chosen for the position. Tomlinson remained the head of the million-member (as of 2009) international church (with a presence in 125 countries) until retiring in 1990. Tomlinson oversaw international departments that directed prayer groups, organized missions, worked with young people, utilized modern media, sought out military personnel, and encouraged Bible study and evangelism. CGP still maintains the multi-million-dollar, 216-acre biblical theme park in western North Carolina known as the Fields of the Wood.

Under the Tomlinsons, the term Atheocracy was employed to describe an ecclesiastical government that proclaimed the annual general assembly to be the highest tribunal, while at the same time the entire ecclesiastical structure fell under the office of the general overseer. All of the general assembly resolutions, which were considered to be unanimous decisions of all males who attended the assembly, were predicated on Holiness Pentecostal thought, like the prohibition of multiple marriages of adulterous persons and affirming immanence-oriented eschatologies. The Holiness influence was keenly felt in matters of clothes and recreation, while the restorationist impulse was manifested in an exclusive body ecclesiology. The latter influenced the fact that the CGP has had a high percentage of female pastors and may be the most racially inclusive Pentecostal church at the leadership level in the United States.

Billy D. Murray was chosen to fill the position of general overseer when M. A. Tomlinson resigned in 1990. The church subsequently experienced rapid changes like the closing of Tomlinson College, financial restructuring with an emphasis on local churches, plurality of the office of general overseer, and relaxing of some previous taboos. CGP is active in the Pentecostal Charismatic Churches of North America (PCCNA), the Pentecostal World Conference, and the North American Renewal Service Committee (NARSC). Women ministers may now administer sacraments but are excluded from the elevated rank of presbyter.

Most recently, General Overseer Fred Fisher retired in 2006 and was succeeded by the present general overseer, Randy Howard.

Church of God of Prophecy International Offices
PO Box 2910
Cleveland, TN 37312
www.cogop.org

Harold D. Hunter

See also: Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Pentecostal World Fellowship; Pentecostalism; Women, Status and Role of.

Resources:

Cyclopedic Index of Assembly Minutes and Important Business Acts of the Church of God of Prophecy: 1906 to 1974. Cleveland: White Wing Publishing House and Press, 1975.

Davidson, C. T. Upon This Rock. 3 vols. Cleveland, TN: White Wing Publishing House and Press, 1974–1976.

Churches of God Outreach Ministries

See Church of God, International

Church of Ireland

The Church of Ireland, the representative of the Anglican Communion in both the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland, traces its history to the earliest entrance of Christianity into Ireland and especially to the work of Saint Patrick in the fourth century. In this regard, until the 16th century, it shares its history with that of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. In the 16th century, the Protestant Reformation spread to Ireland from England, and in 1537, the king of England (Henry VIII) was declared head of the Church of Ireland. Under Elizabeth I (r. 1558–1603), the Anglican way (discussed under Church of England) was imposed on the church, though it did not win the hearts of the people.

In the 18th century, immigration to Northern Ireland was encouraged by the British government. Through the 19th century the Anglican cause suffered, as Catholicism became identified with the fight for Irish independence. An important step came in 1829

Roman Catholic cathedral in Armagh, Northern Ireland. The city is the seat of both the Roman Catholic and Protestant archbishoprics, and as such has seen its share of the sectarian violence that has swept through Northern Ireland in waves for hundreds of years. (Northern Ireland Tourist Board) with the granting of legal status to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1867, the Church of Ireland was formally disestablished as the state church of Ireland and became administratively independent of the Church of England. The great majority of the former members of the Church of Ireland reverted to Roman Catholicism.

In 1921, what became the present Republic of Ireland emerged as the Irish Free State, but six counties in the northern part of the island remain part of the United Kingdom. The Church of Ireland retains most of its strength in Northern Ireland. The subsequent decades of war and terrorism have given the church, with members in both parts of Ireland, its primary agenda item through the later decades of the 20th century to the present. In 1995 it passed a statement concerning the ongoing peace process and the role that various church bodies have played in the past: “We are all called, without exception, to be peacemakers and agents of healing. The involvement of each and every Christian in peacemaking is essential to ensure that the cyclical nature of sectarian violence, which has been exploited for political purposes and has dominated this island’s history, is broken once and for all.”

The Church of Ireland is headed by its primate, presently the Most Reverend Alan Harper. There are two provinces in the church. The primate also serves as the archbishop of the Province of Armagh, which includes the seven dioceses in the northern half of the island. The Province of Dublin includes five dioceses in the southern half of Ireland. In 2005 the church reported 365,000 members. It was a charter member of the World Council of Churches.

Through the 1980s and 1990s, the church engaged in a lengthy process through which women were admitted to the ordained ministry. Legislation to admit women to the diaconate was initially passed by the General Synod in 1984. The first woman to be made a deacon, Katharine Poulton, was ordained in 1987. After further legislation was passed, the first women priests, Irene Templeton and Kathleen Young, were ordained in 1990. These actions made the Church of Ireland the first Anglican Church in Europe to ordain women as priests.

Church of Ireland
Church of Ireland House
Upper Ratbmines
IRDublin 6
Republic of Ireland
www.ireland.anglican.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Elizabeth I; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- McAdoo, Henry R. Anglicans and Tradition and the Ordination of Women. Norwich: Canterbury Press, 1997.
- Milne, Kenneth. A Short History of the Church of Ireland. Blackrock, Ireland: Columba Press, 2003.
- Tanner, Marcus. Ireland's Holy Wars: The Struggle for a Nation's Soul, 1500–2000. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar

The Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar began with the protection given by King Radama I (ca. 1793–1828) to missionaries from the London Missionary Society (LMS) who arrived in 1818. David Jones (1797–1841) and Thomas Bevan (ca. 1796–1819) established their initial missionary station at Toamasina on the island's eastern coast. Their school soon attracted many youth from the country's leading families. As additional missionary personnel arrived, the Malagasy language was reduced to writing, and a translation of the Bible was finally published in 1835. Unfortunately, however, Radama died in 1828 and was succeeded by his widow, Queen Rannavola I (ca. 1782–1861). She disliked the missionaries and turned on them. Finally, in 1835 she banished the missionaries and killed many of her people who had converted. This period forced the indigenous leadership to take over and created a memory of a generation of persecution, a generation that only ended with Rannavola's death in 1861.

Rannavola's son, Radama II (1829–1863), invited the missionaries to return, and in 1869 his widow and successor, Rannavola II (1829–1883), converted to Reformed Christianity. However, now a new force entered the picture, the government of France, which was asserting its hegemony in the region. As that government favored the Roman Catholic Church, the LMS moved to protect its mission by inviting the Paris Missionary Society (of the Reformed Church of France) to begin work in 1895. The following year, Madagascar's status as a French colony became official.

In spite of Roman Catholic dominance, both the LMS's work and the Paris Society's mission prospered. In the meantime, the Friends had formed a small mission. During the 1950s these three entities constituted themselves as independent churches, the Church of Christ of Madagascar, the Evangelical Church in Madagascar, and the Malagasy Friends Church. During the 1960s, these three groups saw themselves as essentially one in doctrine and entered into merger talks. In 1968, as part of a celebration of the 150th anniversary of the original LMS mission, the three churches formally created the new Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar.

The new church immediately ran into problems with the French authorities. The problem concerned a minor clause in the Constitution eliminating any manifestation of the state's authority in the church's buildings. The primary manifestation of the state under question was the flying of the state flag during visits by state officials to the church during various celebratory occasions. Only after the change in the government that brought a new Socialist regime was the church allowed registration. In 1972, the church turned over all its schools to the state. That same year it moved to become self-sufficient by no longer employing non-Malagasy personnel, though it still received considerable foreign financial support.

In 1980, following the establishment of the National Council of Christian Churches in Madagascar, the church participated in conversations to clear up a nagging problem, the need of a common spelling of Jesus Christ in the Malagasy language. In Malagasy, the Church of Jesus Christ's name became Fiangonan' I Jesoa Kristy Eto Madagasikara.

In 1991 the church participated in the overthrow of the government (not an altogether peaceful process) and in the writing of a more democratic Constitution for the new government.

In 2005 the church reported 3,500,000 members in 5795 congregations. It supports three theological schools and the graduate Faculty of Theology at Antananarivo. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar
PO Box 623
Lot II B 18
Tohatohabato Ranavalona I
Trano
Anakaly 101 Antananarivo
Madagascar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Friends/Quakers; London Missionary Society; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

Joseph Smith Jr. (1805–1844) founded the religion that became known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) on April 6, 1830, in the area of western New York known as the Burned-Over District, from the fires of revivalist enthusiasm that had swept through the region in the previous decades. Following a vision of God and Jesus Christ, Smith said an angel directed him to translate the Golden Plates, an ancient religious history explaining the Hebraic origins of the Native Americans and their important role in the Second Coming. Published as the Book of Mormon, the scripture gave Smith's religion its popular name of Mormonism and established him as a "prophet, seer and revelator" to his followers. To escape his reputation as a treasure hunter, Smith moved to Kirtland, Ohio, where missionaries achieved great success recruiting followers from what later became the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), founded by Alexander Campbell. Smith's "new and eternal covenant" made his followers the modern Israel, God's chosen people. He laid plans to build a communal society and temple to welcome Christ's return in Independence, Missouri, site of the Garden of Eden. Financial reverses encouraged Smith's departure from Ohio, and political conflict and persecutions in Missouri ultimately resulted in the expulsion of all Mormons from the state in 1839.

Smith rallied to a new "gathering place" at Nauvoo on the Mississippi River and implemented revolutionary extensions of his theology. He developed the doctrine of eternal progression based on a "multiplicity of gods" and an evolving deity. Revelations directed Smith to "do the works of Abraham," and polygamy became required of those who sought the highest levels of salvation. The Mormon prophet in 1844 was ordained king of the kingdom of God, the political organization he created to rule the earth following Christ's return. Smith was running for president of the United States when he was killed by a mob on June 27, 1844. His enemies accused him of being an imposter, but his followers claimed that Smith had "done more, save Jesus only, for the salvation of men in this world than any other man." Today Joseph Smith is widely viewed as a genius who some believe defined a religious tradition as different from Christianity as Christianity was different from Judaism.

Several candidates contested for Smith's legacy, but Brigham Young (1801–1877) consolidated his power as head of the Twelve Apostles and assumed control of the main LDS church shortly after Smith's murder. Although several dozen "Restoration" churches claim Smith as their founder, the branch led by Young became today's largest LDS church. Young directed the completion of the Nauvoo temple, where thousands of members received Masonic-style "endowments"—which had been revealed by Smith before his death—prior to the movement west. Young personally directed the initial migration and established a new gathering place at Great Salt Lake City (as Salt Lake City was first called) in the Great Basin. For two decades Young was one of the most powerful men in the western United States and insisted that polygamy—which Smith had initiated but had kept secret—be acknowledged.

In this illustration, Brigham Young and his followers reach the Great Salt Lake in July 1847. Young was an early Mormon leader and the founder of Salt Lake City in Utah. (North Wind Picture Archives)

Young served as governor of Utah Territory from 1850 to 1857, ruling a frontier theocracy that combined the powers of church and state. His defiance of federal authority and abuse of appointed officials ultimately persuaded President James Buchanan to send one-third of the U.S. Army to Utah to ensure Young's acceptance of his non-Mormon replacement. In spite of the government's blocking of his overall plan, by his death in 1877 Young had established Mormonism as the region's dominant cultural force. His successors battled the American authorities over polygamy until the manifesto issued by President Wilford Woodruff (1807–1898) declared in 1890 that the church would discontinue the practice. The hard work of bringing Mormonism into the mainstream of American society and making it a viable world religion fell to the church presidents of the 20th century.

The Mormons faced new political problems related to polygamy when church officials Brigham H. Roberts (1857–1933) and Reed Smoot (1862–1941) were elected to the U.S. Congress. In response, in 1904, the church issued a second manifesto to finally restrict practice of plural marriage throughout the world, although the actual revelation that Smith relied on to justify the practice remains part of Mormon scripture. Between 1900 and 1950, the church shed its controversial heritage as a radical sect to become a powerful religious community under astute conservative leaders such as Heber J. Grant (1856–1945) and David O. McKay (1873–1970). Grant, the last polygamist to lead the church, systematically unchurched those who practiced polygamy and elevated the proscription of alcohol, tobacco, and “hot drinks” in the “Word of Wisdom” from advice to commandment. In the second half of the 20th century the LDS church rapidly gained wealth and members, with notable success in Central and South America, enlisting by century’s end more than 10 million souls. More than 85 percent of the membership is concentrated on the American continents.

As the millennium ended, the LDS church built temples at an increasing rate, establishing 100 by the year 2000; 8 years later, the faith had 128 temples in operation and another dozen being built in locations ranging from the Ukraine to Brazil. The temple endowment’s purpose, creating eternal families, is unique to Mormonism. The ceremony is closed to outsiders, and even members lacking “temple recommends” cannot attend their children’s temple marriages. Beginning with Brigham Young, the church refused to ordain black males to the priesthood or allow black members to participate in the temple endowment. President Spencer Kimball terminated this policy in 1978.

The LDS Church has played a significant role in conservative American politics and was instrumental in defeating the Equal Rights Amendment. It actively opposes the gay and lesbian rights movement, gambling, liquor sales, abortion rights, and commercial activities on Sunday. It has also excommunicated intellectuals who have published works critical of church leaders or have presented views of history inconsistent with the church’s own interpretation.

The current leadership has struggled to win acceptance as a mainstream religion. It has de-emphasized the doctrine of eternal progression expressed in the epigram, “As man now is, God once was; as God now is, man may be,” and has called polygamy evil. As it works to overcome its controversial past, the church promotes traditional families and conservative moral values in sophisticated public relations campaigns.

Mitt Romney’s 2008 presidential campaign focused much media attention on his religion, reviving a sense of persecution among his fellow Mormons and evoking criticism and hostility from evangelical groups that consider the religion unchristian.

Yet the religion considers itself as different from Protestantism and Catholicism as Christianity was from Judaism. Some sociologists and historians and other unofficial spokespersons for the church have claimed that this uniquely American faith will be the world’s next great religion.

The church teaches that baptism by immersion for persons eight years and older is required for church membership. Belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ, the prophetic calling of Joseph Smith, and the Book of Mormon is central to conversion. The church’s canon of scripture includes not only the Bible and Book of Mormon but also additional revelations given to Joseph Smith and his successors contained in the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price. The church believes in an open canon and proclaims that the teachings of the church prophet are binding on the members. Blessings to heal the sick or infirm are often given by priesthood holders to the general church membership. The sacrament of the Lord’s Supper is administered each week in local wards (congregations). Bread and water are blessed and administered in remembrance of Christ. Members are encouraged to pay a full tithing, and no members are permitted to enter church temples unless they confirm that they have complied with this, and other church commandments, on a yearly basis. Members are endowed and married in the temple for time and eternity.

The church is governed by a First Presidency, which consists of the president-prophet and his two counselors; 12 apostles; various Quorums of Seventies (who direct the missions of the church); and a Presiding Bishopric (which governs the temporal affairs of the church). These leaders are collectively referred to as General Authorities. When the prophet dies the senior apostle is ordained as his successor.

Missionaries, who represent the church for two years during full-time missions, present a series of gospel lessons to investigators. Their primary objective is to baptize converts into the worldwide church, but some missionaries are also called to provide assistance on a more temporal level. In 2008, the church reported 13,508,509 members worldwide, of which approximately 5 million resided in the United States. The church is active in more than 200 countries and publishes literature in 166 languages.

Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints
Church Office Building
50 East North Temple Street
Salt Lake City, Utah 84150
www.lds.org

Michael W. Homer and Will Bagley

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Community of Christ; Independence, Missouri; Polygamy-Practicing Mormons; Salt Lake City; Smith, Joseph, Jr.; Temples—Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

References

- Allen, James B., and Glen M. Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. 2nd ed., rev. and enl. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1992.
- Bigler, David L. Forgotten Kingdom, The Mormon Theocracy in the American West, 1847–1896. Spokane, WA: Arthur H. Clark, 1998.
- Bushman, Richard Lyman. Joseph Smith, Rough Stone Rolling: A Cultural Biography of Mormonism's Founder. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2005.
- Gospel Principles*. Salt Lake City: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1995.
- Introvigne, Massimo. I Mormoni. Vatican City: Libreria Vaticana, 1992.
- Ostling, Richard N., and Joan K. Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. San Francisco: Harper, 1999.

Church of Moshoeshoe

The Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church, commonly shortened to Kerekeng ea Moshoeshoe, or the Church of Moshoeshoe (1786–1870), is named after King Moshoeshoe, the highly revered first chief of the Lesotho nation. King Moshoeshoe was to the peoples and history of the region what Moses was to the Israelites in pre-Davidic times. The Church of Moshoeshoe was founded by a man from the Berea District named Walter Matitta (1885–1935). It is not clear whether Matitta, born Matitta Phakoa, was raised as a Methodist or as a “heathen.” At approximately the age of 25, he began to experience powerful visions. One vision in particular, in which Matitta “died” and went to heaven where he witnessed God and Satan arguing over to whom Matitta belonged, seems to have been formative in his decision to become an evangelist under the Paris Mission (PEMS). In 1922 Matitta formed the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church in response to the more charismatic style of worship that his followers preferred and in response to the theological discrepancies he discovered between what he read in the Bible and what the missionaries had been teaching.

Although the Bible appears in a place of prominence in the church's title, and although it is read or recited with ritualistic prominence in worship services, members of the Church of Moshoeshoe do not appear to be more biblically literate than the average member of an African Initiated Church (AIC). Due to a lack of historical perspective, the Gospel story, that is, the particular story of Jesus Christ, is to a great extent lost within the larger biblical story. Heavy emphasis is placed on the role of law, especially on the laws from the Old Testament. The Ten Commandments, which are seen to be consistent with the traditional African worldview and its emphasis on social order, are read at each worship service. The Trinitarian formula may be readily affirmed by members of the Church of Moshoeshoe, but in reality the church functions with a binitarian understanding, relating primarily to God and the Holy Spirit. Members are generally unclear about the incarnation and are not concerned with having a personal relationship with Jesus Christ. However, unlike many AICs in Botswana, the Church of Moshoeshoe strongly discourages the practice of performing animal sacrifices, believing that Jesus' death negates the need to perform sacrifices today. Attraction to the Church of Moshoeshoe can be attributed largely to its healing ministry, thanks to which it draws members from mission churches and traditional religions alike. The church acknowledges the traditional African understanding of spiritual causation, recognizing fears of defilement associated with contacting certain objects and the fear of sorcery, and responding with methods of purification and protection.

In 1982 the membership of the Church of Moshoeshoe in Lesotho was estimated to be 2,200, with 5,500 affiliates, in 15 congregations. There have been at least five major schisms in the church. The Church of Moshoeshoe has spread to the Orange Free State of the Republic of South Africa, with 8 pastors in 10 congregations in 1982. Membership in the church is primarily made up of the Sotho people, with a few Zulu and Pedi congregations as well. An interdenominational and international body known as the Mokhatto oa Banazari was established to encourage Bible study, memorization of Bible passages, prayer, and healing in AICs in Lesotho, Orange Free State, and the Transvaal. This body, however, operates predominantly within the Church of Moshoeshoe. The Church of Moshoeshoe also has had connections with the Spiritual Healing Church of Botswana since the prophet Harry Morolong visited Matsiloje, Botswana, in 1923. Matitta is still considered a great prophet in the Spiritual Healing Church today.

Andy Brubacher Kaether

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Paris Mission; Spiritual Healing Church.

References

- Nussbaum, Stan. Toward Theological Dialogue with Independent Churches: A Study of Five Congregations in Lesotho. Ph.D. diss., University of South Africa, 1985.
- Haliburton, Gordon Mackay. "Walter Matitta and Josiel Lefela: A Prophet and a Politician in Lesotho." Journal of Religion in Africa 7 (1975): 111–131.

Church of Nigeria

Anglican work in Nigeria began with the migration of former slaves from Sierra Leone; shortly thereafter, in 1845, Henry Townsend (1815–1886) of the Church Missionary Society opened the first station among the Yoruba people. The work progressed quickly, and additional stations were soon opened in Abeokuta (1846), Lagos (1852), and Thadam (1853). The first African bishop for an Anglican church, Samuel Crowther (1808–1891), was consecrated in 1864 and gave yeoman service for almost three decades.

The Diocese of Lagos, which for many years operated directly under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, was among the five dioceses that after World War II petitioned the archbishop for status as an autonomous church. In 1951 the Church of the Province of West Africa was declared to be in existence, and the next decade was spent making it a reality; the synod had its first meeting in 1957, and the constitution was published in 1962. The constitution was accepted and went into effect in 1963.

In 1952, the Diocese of Lagos was divided into four dioceses. Through the 1960s and 1970s, further dioceses were carved out of the still growing church. This development of the episcopacy culminated in 1979, when the work in Nigeria was set apart as a new province, the Church in the Province of Nigeria. The province evolved into the present Church of Nigeria which includes 10 provinces, each headed by an archbishop, and made up of 91 dioceses.

The church is headed by its archbishop primate, currently the Most Reverend Peter Akinola. Akinola has become an international figure for his leadership in the conservative Anglican movement that has included the establishing of a missionary jurisdiction in North America, the Convocation of Anglicans in North America, for which Akinola consecrated a bishop, his support of the summer 2008 Global Anglican Future Conference in Jerusalem, and his assistance in the formation of the new Anglican Church of North America.

In 2005, the Church of Nigeria reported 17,500,000 members in 5,000 parishes, making it the second largest Anglican church in the world. It supports three theological schools, Immanuel College (Ibadan), Trinity College (Umuahia), and Vining College (Zana). The province is a member of the World Council of Churches (since 1980) and the worldwide Anglican Communion.

Church of Nigeria
Episcopal House

Archbishop of the Anglican Church of Nigeria Peter Jasper Akinola prepares to enter the sanctuary for the investiture of the Right Rev. Martyn Minns as the missionary bishop of the Convocation of Anglicans in North America at the Hylton Chapel on May 5, 2007, in Woodbridge, Virginia. Minns is now a bishop in the Anglican Church of Nigeria. (Getty Images)

23 Douala Street
 Wuse, Zone 5, Abuja
 PO Box 212
 Abuja
 Nigeria
www.nigeria.anglican.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of North America; Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of the Province of West Africa; World Council of Churches.

References

The Church of England Yearbook. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

- Hassett, Miranda K. Anglican Communion in Crisis: How Episcopal Dissidents and Their African Allies Are Reshaping Anglicanism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- Norman, Edward. Anglican Difficulties: A New Syllabus of Errors. New York: Morehouse Publishing, 2004.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobray, 1998.

Church of North India

The Church of North India, formed in 1970, was the product of more than four decades of merger negotiation among various churches that had grown out of 19th-century Protestant Christian missions. The Church of England entered India through the Church Missionary Society in 1813 and within a few decades had thriving work in such places as Benares, Lucknow, Meerut, and Allahabad. Its work was supplemented by the efforts of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. British Methodists entered in 1819, after beginning work in Sri Lanka prior to their being allowed into India proper. Although their work was concentrated in the south, it eventually moved into Bengal, Benares, and Lucknow.

The Baptists initiated their world missionary enterprise in India with the formation of the Baptist Missionary Society in London in 1792. William Carey (1761–1834) and John Thompson landed in Bengal the following year and established their headquarters at Serampore. The work expanded greatly in the 1820s, after a college to train Indian national leadership had been established in 1818. One of the larger bodies to grow out of the original mission was the Council of Baptist Churches in North India.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (supported by American Congregationalists) sent missionaries to Sri Lanka in 1818. The first to transfer to India was Dr. John Scudder (1793–1855), who arrived in Madura in 1835. From there, the work spread across India to include a variety of educational and social service institutions, the most notable in the north being a medical college at Ludhiana. Ludhiana had been the site of the original mission station established by the Presbyterians from the United States in 1834. Subsequent stations were opened in Allahabad (1836), Mussoorie (1847), Lucknow (1870), and Vengurla (1900). In 1924, the Presbyterian and Congregational missions merged their efforts and formed the United Church of North India.

The Moravians did not intend to initiate work in India, but the Moravian German office directed missionaries to western Tibet in the 1850s. However, because of the problems involved in entering Tibet, they made Kyelang, India, their original headquarters, and worked among the Tibetan-speaking residents on the Indian side of the border. Work continued among the Ladakh people in the area of the China–Tibet border, though few converts were made. World War I proved a crisis for the German missionaries, and after the war steps were made to develop indigenous leadership. In 1953, the congregation at Leh, the capital of Ladakh, affiliated with the United Church of North India.

Wilbur Stover (1866–1930), Mary Stover (1871–1960), and Bertha Ryan (1871–1953) launched the Church of the Brethren mission at Bulsar in 1895. Their work was quickly supplemented with additional personnel, who expanded the number of stations throughout the Gujarati-speaking region in northwest India. Early in the 20th century, a number of stations were created in the Marathi-speaking area along the coast north of Bombay. Eventually some 25 congregations and 20 evangelistic stations were organized.

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) began its work in India at Harda (northeast of Bombay) in 1882. From the initial station, missionaries established additional centers of activity across a vast area in the central part of the country.

As in South India, negotiations looking to a union of Protestant and Free church missions in North India began early in the 20th century. They were spurred by the formation of the Church of South India, but had additional theological and organizational problems to surmount. Finally, in 1970, the Plan of Union was completed and approved by six bodies—the Council of Baptist Churches in North India, the Church of the Brethren, the Disciples of Christ, the Methodist Church, the United Church of Northern India, and the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. The latter body, a very large multinational Anglican body, was while pursuing merger in India also dividing along national lines. The merger that produced the Church of Pakistan occurred almost simultaneously with the formation of the Church of North India. The Anglican Church of the Province of Myanmar and what is now the Church of Sri Lanka were also established in 1970.

The new church adopted an episcopal polity, and in 1988 it was accepted as a full member of the worldwide Anglican Communion. The church also retains membership in the World Methodist Council and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and cooperates with the Council on World Ministries, reflecting the continued recognition of its Methodist, Congregational, and Presbyterian heritage. The churches that merged to form the Church of North India were members of the World Council of Churches, and Council membership was continued by the new church. The church developed its own ecumenical statement of faith, which was included in the “Basis of Union” document promulgated in 1970. Its commitment to ecumenicity led it in 1978 into full communion with the Church of South India and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar. The three churches accept the validity of each other’s sacraments and ministerial credentials.

Indian Christians gather at The All Saints Cathedral during the installation ceremony of the Rt. Rev. Morris Edgar Dan as bishop in the diocese of Lucknow, the Church of North India, in Allahabad on September 6, 2009. Thousands of people gathered to witness the installation ceremony where they offered nightlong prayers. (Getty Images)

In 2005, the Church of North India reported 1.5 million members. Churches are organized into 26 dioceses. The General Synod, the highest legislative body, meets every three years.

Church of North India
PO Box 311
CNI Bhavan
16 Pandit Pant Marg
New Delhi 110 001
India
www.cnisynod.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Carey, William; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of Pakistan; Church of South India; Church of Sri Lanka; Church of the Brethren; Church of the Province of Myanmar; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Methodist Council; World Council of Churches.

References

- Frykenburg, Robert Eric. Christianity in India: From Beginnings to the Present. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Marshall, W. J. A United Church: Faith and Order in the North India/Pakistan Unity Plan: A Theological Assessment. New Delhi: ISPCK, 1987.
- Neill, Stephen C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984–1985.
- Sahu, Dharendra Kumar. United & Uniting: A Story of the Church of North India. Delhi: ISPCK, 2001.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Webster, J. C. B. The Christian Community and Change in Nineteenth Century North India. Delhi: Macmillan, 1976.

Church of Norway

The life of the Church of Norway, the state church of the country, was shaped by two important events, the coming of Christianity to the northernmost reaches of Scandinavia and the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century. Christianity came to Norway from England, where Viking raiders had established a foothold in the 10th century. Christian missionaries had slow success at first, but King Olaf Haraldsson (d. 1030) accepted the faith for his people early in the following century. He was later canonized as the country's first saint and spiritual patron. Olaf's successors served as heads of the Church of Norway and along with his nobles, who built and kept up most of the church buildings, largely controlled its development.

In 1104, Denmark incorporated the Church of Norway into the Province of Lund (Sweden). Finally in 1152, however, the Diocese of Nidaros (now Trondheim, Norway's major seaport), whose bishop was responsible directly to Rome, was erected. The diocese included Greenland, the Faeroes, and Iceland. Norway was still under Danish control when, early in the 16th century, the Reformation, in the form of Lutheranism, spread northward. In 1537 the Danish government passed the Danish Church Ordinance making the Church of Denmark Lutheran. The Norwegian diets meeting in Oslo and Bergen accepted the ordinance two years later. That action effectively ended the Roman Catholic Church's control of Scandinavia.

The Catholic bishops of the Church of Norway were replaced by superintendents. They later assumed the title of bishop, but they had lost any claim to Apostolic succession. Danish hymnals and Bibles were in common use, and Danish was the language of worship and instruction in the faith. The integration of the new faith into the hearts of the people, however, is credited to the Pietist movement of the 18th century, expressed in Norway in the popular explanation of Luther's Small Catechism written by Erik Pontoppidan, as well as in the ministry of popular evangelist Hans Nielsen Hauge (1771–1824).

The 19th century launched a period of struggle for Norway's independence, the major steps being the ceding of Norway to Sweden by Denmark in 1814 and the establishment of a constitutional monarchy under Haakon VII (1872–1957, r. 1905–1957). At that time, the Parliament and the king were assigned a number of powers in the administration of church affairs. Two years after the Swedes took control, the Norwegian Bible Society was created, and work began on a Norwegian Bible. The Old Testament appeared in 1891 and the New Testament in 1904.

The Church of Norway extended its influence internationally through a set of missionary organizations, many lay-inspired, which began to form in the 1840s. The Norwegian Missionary Society, formed in 1842, launched the church's cooperation with the worldwide spread of Protestantism. The first missionaries were sent to South Africa, and work later expanded to Madagascar, Cameroon, and Ethiopia. A secondary emphasis on the East led Norwegians to China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong. As late as the 1970s, new work was launched in Thailand and Brazil. Early interest in the Jews also led to the founding of the Norwegian Mission to Israel (1844), now known as the Norwegian Church Ministry to Israel. Christian Hebrew congregations gations were formed in Hungary and Romania, which later moved to Palestine/Israel. The Norwegian Seaman's Mission created chapels in ports around the world frequented by Norwegian sailors. The Norwegian Santal Mission launched work in India in 1867, which led to the formation of a Lutheran presence that still remains in Bengal and Bangladesh. The Norwegian Lutheran Mission (founded 1891) began work in China, Ethiopia, Tanzania, Japan, and Hong Kong. Work in China was extended through the Christian Mission to Buddhists, founded in 1922. Most recently, the Norwegian Christian Mission to Muslims, founded in 1940, began work in India, Pakistan, and Indonesia.

Olden Church in Norway. Most Norwegians belong to the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Norway. (Jaxpix/StockphotoPro)

Today, the Church of Norway is divided into 11 dioceses, each led by a bishop and a diocesan council. The bishops form the bishops' conference, led by the church's primate, the bishop of Oslo. There is also a national church council. In 1984, Parliament established a national church synod, and the church council now serves as the synod's executive body. Pastors are trained at the Free Theological Faculty and at the University of Norway. Most missionaries are trained at the School of Mission and Theology at Stavanger. Through its Council on Foreign Relations, the church is related to the World Council of Churches, the Lutheran World Federation, and other ecumenical structures.

In 2005, the church reported a membership of 3,800,000, representing the great majority of Norway's citizens. Although more than 90 percent of the population are baptized members, ongoing support, as indicated by church attendance, is much lower. The church remains in a cooperative relationship with the state and is supported with public funds. The church is an inclusive body, accommodating both liberal Protestant theologians and conservative Pietist lay organizations.

Church of Norway
PO Box 799 Sentrum

Radhusgata 1-3

N-010

Oslo

Norway

www.kirken.no/ (in Norwegian)

www.kirken.no/engelsk/engelsk.html (in English)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wilson, T. B. History of Church and State in Norway from the Tenth to the Sixteenth Century. Westminster (London): A. Constable, 1903.

Church of Pakistan

The Church of Pakistan was formed in 1970 by the merger of mission churches previously initiated by the Presbyterians, Anglicans, Lutherans, and Methodists.

Protestant Christian missionaries had pushed into what is now Pakistan in the 1830s from the Punjab. The first appears to have been John C. Lowrie (1808–1900), who moved to Lahore in 1834, though he soon had to retire. Then in 1849 Charles W. Forman opened the first permanent missionary station and went on to develop the impressive educational program that led to the founding of a string of elementary and secondary schools, several colleges, and a seminary. Forman led in the founding of the Lahore Church Council. In 1904 the Lahore Church Council joined the United Church of Northern India (a union of Congregational and Presbyterian missions that later became part of the Church of North India).

A second missionary thrust began in the Sialkot in 1855 under Andrew Gordon (1828–1887). This work grew to become the Presbytery of Sialkot, organized in 1859. In 1893 the presbytery was incorporated as one presbytery in the Synod of the Punjab, affiliated with the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). That synod became independent in 1961 as the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan.

A third Presbyterian effort began in 1856, when missionaries of the Church of Scotland settled in. In 1953, the Sialkot Presbytery was eventually incorporated into the United Presbyterian of North India and Pakistan.

The Church of England initiated work through the Church Missionary Society, which opened its initial station at Karachi in 1850. The initial Diocese of Lahore was erected in 1877. The Anglicans in New Zealand and Australia added their strength to the missionary effort. Those Anglicans leading the work in Pakistan became known as among the most conservative in the world Anglican community.

Methodism began in Karachi in 1874 among British troops stationed in the city who responded to the preaching of lay evangelist William Taylor (1821–1902). Daniel O. Fox (1835–1909) arrived as a missionary from the Methodist Episcopal Church and secured Taylor's initial works and before the year was out had built the first church. He also soon attracted a following among the Pakistanis. The work was attached to the center in Bombay. The work grew slowly until the first mass conversion of Hindus into the church. The work was organized into the Indus River Conference in 1988.

Methodist work was shattered by the partition of India that set up the nation of Pakistan. Most of the leadership of the Indus River Conference chose to remain in India, and the Pakistan work had to quickly rebuild. Work centered in Karachi and Lahore and along the railroad line that connected them. In 1956, a second conference, the Karachi Provisional Annual Conference, was established, and in 1960 the two conferences were tied together through the Central Provisional Conference of the Methodist Church in Pakistan. Meanwhile in the United States, in 1968, Methodists took a further step toward union with the creation of the United Methodist Church. That church's General Conference passed legislation allowing Pakistani Methodists to enter the Church of Pakistan merger.

St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church and convent, Karachi, Pakistan. (The British Library/StockphotoPro)

In 1903, Maria Hoist, a Lutheran physician serving with the Danish Pathan Mission, began working among the females of the Pathan people around Peshawar. From her initial work, an indigenous movement among the Pathan people (formerly Muslim) developed. The first Pathan minister was ordained as a Lutheran minister in 1937. The Norwegians added their assistance in 1940. The World Mission and Prayer League, an interdenominational society composed mostly of American Lutherans of Scandinavian descent, also started work. In 1955 the Lutherans formed the Pakistani Lutheran Church and elected pioneer missionary Jan Christensen as their first bishop.

In 1970, the Pakistani members of the Anglican, Methodist, and Lutheran churches and the United Presbyterian Church of North India and Pakistan joined in creating the Church of Pakistan. (The Presbyterians associated with the Lahore Church Council and the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan did not join in the merger. These two bodies later merged in 1993 to form the Presbyterian Church of Pakistan.) By this time the Anglican work had been organized in what was known as the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. That same year, the remaining work in India was incorporated into the Church of North India. Like the other united churches carved out on the Indian subcontinent, the Church of Pakistan accepted an episcopal polity as the Anglicans had demanded. It originally had four dioceses. There are now eight.

In 2005, the church reported 500,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Methodist World Council, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the Anglican Communion.

Church of Pakistan
17 Warris Rd.
PO Box 2319
Lahore 3
Pakistan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of North India; Church of Scotland; Methodism; Presbyterian Church of Pakistan; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); United Methodist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Walbridge, Linda. Christians of Pakistan: The Passion of Bishop John Joseph. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2003.
- Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobray, 1998.

Church of Pentecost

A Pentecostal church, initiated by James McKeown (1900–1989), a British Pentecostal missionary from the Apostolic Church who went to the Gold Coast (now Ghana) in 1937 after being invited by an African preacher, Peter Anim (1890–1978). Anim had been associated with the Faith Tabernacle, a non-Pentecostal healing church based in the United States. He left the Apostolic Church in 1939 because of McKeown's use of medicines (instead of relying on God for healing), and established the Christ Apostolic Church in Ghana, in association with the Nigerian church of the same name. McKeown continued as a missionary with the Apostolic Church until 1953, when he was dismissed for refusing to abide by the church's constitution. With the support of most of the African preachers, McKeown seceded and established the Gold Coast Apostolic Church that year, to be renamed the Ghana Apostolic Church after independence in 1957. A dispute with the Apostolic Church over the name led, with President Kwame Nkrumah's intervention, to the church being renamed the Church of Pentecost in 1962.

The church grew rapidly, through both the efficient administration of the church and the work of Ghanaian pastors and evangelists. Through the mediation of McKeown, it formed a cooperative agreement with the British Elim Pentecostal Church, an agreement that continues today. McKeown continued to lead the church until 1982, when, in his eighties, he retired in favor of F. S. Safo, a Ghanaian. McKeown was an unusual figure: a European missionary working for three decades for an African church.

Membership in 2009 was estimated at more than a million, which makes this possibly the largest church in Ghana. Because of its long association with British Pentecostals, the church may be considered a classical Pentecostal church in theological orientation, but it has nevertheless become an African church with its own distinctive features. Branches of the church are now found in many other parts of West Africa, as well as in Europe and North America, where the members are mainly Ghanaian migrants.

Church of Pentecost
PO Box 2194
Accra
Ghana

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Apostolic Church; Christ Apostolic Church; Elim Pentecostal Church; Pentecostalism.

References

- Leonard, Christine. A Giant in Ghana. London: Alpha Typesetting, 1989.
- Ter Haar, Gerrie. "Standing Up for Jesus: A Survey of New Developments in Christianity in Ghana." Exchange 23, no. 3 (1994): 221–240.
- Wyllie, Robert W. "Pioneers of Ghanaian Pentecostalism: Peter Anim and James McKeown." Journal of Religion in Africa 6, no. 2 (1974): 109–122.

Church of Satan

The Church of Satan, reduced today to a small organization, is the movement that was largely responsible for the development of modern Satanism in the 1960s. Its founder, Anton Szandor LaVey (1930–1997), gladly told the media flamboyant details about his life, all of which went unchallenged until the 1990s, when New Yorker investigative journalist Larry Wright proved that most of the claims were totally false. LaVey's real name was Howard Stanton Levey. There is no evidence, contrary to what he later claimed, that he was born with a tail, and had traveled extensively throughout Europe as a teenager. According to Wright, stories told by LaVey about having been a lion-tamer in a circus, a photographer for the San Francisco Police Department, and the lover (if only for a short time) of Marilyn Monroe (1926–1962), as well as the official organist for the City of San Francisco, are all apocryphal tales. It is true that in the 1950s he did play the organ for a living in San Francisco nightclubs and carnivals, as well as for occasional city events, and had made enough money by 1956 to be able to buy the later famous (or infamous) Black House at 6114 California Street in the same city. In 1960 he divorced his first wife, Carole Lansing, and took 17-year-old Diane Hegarty as his live-in girl friend (the union lasted until 1984).

Anton Szandor LaVey (1930–1997) was the founder of the Church of Satan. (AP/Wide World Images)

In 1951, LaVey became interested in the ideas of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), and joined a Berkeley group of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) connected to the Pasadena Agapé Lodge established by Wilfred Talbot Smith (1885–1957) and Jack Parsons (1914–1952). In subsequent years, LaVey became somewhat disillusioned with Crowley and the OTO, although it was this milieu that brought him in contact with Hollywood underground director Kenneth Anger (pseudonym of Kenneth William Anglemeyer, b. 1927). In 1961, LaVey and Anger founded an organization known as the Magic Circle, which gradually evolved into the Church of Satan, formally established on April 30, 1966.

In the tolerant 1960s, Satanism became somewhat fashionable in California (one of LaVey's early converts was actress Jayne Mansfield, 1933–1967), and he received surprisingly sympathetic treatment from the local media. LaVey was even hired as a consultant for Roman Polanski's 1968 movie Rosemary's Baby, based on Ira Levin's novel, which added to his fame. In fact, as clarified by the publication of LaVey's The Satanic Bible in 1969, the Church of Satan did not promote evil, nor did it literally believe in the existence of the devil. It was more an idiosyncratic and militantly anti-Christian human potential movement, devoted to the exaltation of human beings, who, having been freed from religious superstitions and the false Christian notion of sin, would eventually become empowered to be happy, enjoy life, and flourish. LaVey was deeply influenced by pro-capitalist writer Ayn Rand (pseudonym of Alice Rosenbaum, 1905–1982), and (largely based on her writings) concluded that selfishness, rather than altruism, is at the root of both personal and social happiness. LaVey's rituals honored Satan in a purely symbolic way, although The Satanic Rituals published in paperback form in 1972 underwent considerable editing, whereby certain references to practices of sexual magic in the Crowley tradition (included in the confidential private versions) were omitted.

In 1968, LaVey met Michael Aquino, an officer and intelligence specialist in the U.S. Army with an academic education. Aquino gradually became the main organizer of the Church of Satan, which he structured into local chapters known as grottos, thus recruiting some 200 or 300 active participants (with many more limiting their activity to the payment of a yearly membership fee and to receiving information by mail). During the early 1970s, however, a conflict developed between LaVey and Aquino. Ideologically, Aquino believed in the real, physical existence of a character known as Set, or Satan, an entity also believed to communicate in mystical ways with selected devotees, and he became increasingly disillusioned with LaVey's "rationalist" Satanism. Organizationally, Aquino was a firm believer in the system of the grottos, while LaVey was not particularly interested in running a church-like organization, even less so after some local grotto leaders found themselves in trouble with law enforcement agencies for a number of offenses. In 1975, Aquino and several important grotto leaders left LaVey, and went their separate ways into the newly established Temple of Set (PO Box 470307, San Francisco, CA 94147; website: www.xeper.org). With its "occult" Satanism, the temple may be the largest international Satanist organization still active today.

Despite Aquino's grim prophecies, however, the Church of Satan did not disintegrate. Although it is true that it remained a largely mail order organization for several years, the disappearance of local chapters actually helped LaVey to keep a low profile, as the media began to take a less tolerant attitude toward Satanism in the aftermath of the Charles Manson trial (1971) and the increased activities both of a Christian countercult movement, and of secular anti-cult organizations. In the 1980s, when anti-Satanism became somewhat disreputable because of its tall tales and gross exaggerations, LaVey was able to stage a comeback. Crucial in this revival was Blanche Barton, who had become LaVey's new companion after he left Diane in 1984. LaVey's daughters, Karla and Zeena, although very different in character, also cooperated in reestablishing the Church of Satan as a national presence in the 1980s. In 1990, however, Zeena publicly denounced both the Church of Satan and what she called her "un-father"; after several short-lived occult ventures with her husband, Nikolas Schreck, she eventually joined Aquino's Temple of Set and became one of its high priestesses.

In the same year, 1990, LaVey suffered a heart attack, which very much reduced his activities. Once again, it seemed that the Church of Satan was about to collapse. It was kept alive, albeit with difficulty, by Blanche Barton and by one of LaVey's closest disciples, Peter Gilmore. It is currently a largely mail order organization, but ritual activities are going on in a limited number of U.S. cities, where a grotto system has been put into operation once again. It maintains a website at the address given below. The website www.churchofsatan.org, on the other hand, does not belong to LaVey's original organization, but to a splinter group, known as The First Church of Satan, led by Daemon Egan (pseudonym of John Dewey Allee) and headquartered at PMB 172, 203 Washington Street, Salem, MA 01970. Critics have described the First Church of Satan as a commercial organization, mostly engaged in selling Satanic paraphernalia via the Internet, although Egan maintains that he is keeping LaVey's original spirit alive.

Karla LaVey originally cooperated with Blanche Barton, but eventually they parted company, based inter alia on a legal dispute about LaVey's inheritance, and in 1999 Karla established her own First Satanic Church (PO Box 475177, San Francisco, CA 94147; website: www.satanicchurch.com). The dispute over the inheritance also involved Zeena, and Barton represented (in addition to herself) her son, Xerxes LaVey, born in 1993, who, according to his father, would one day inherit his Satanic leadership mantle; it was later settled. In addition to the Church of Satan, the Temple of Set, the First Church of Satan, and the First Satanic Church, several dozen minor splinter or independent Satanist groups, all tracing their origins to the original 1966 foundation event, still operate throughout the world. Most of these organizations are quite small, however, and the current combined active membership of all branches probably reaches no more than 1,000, even though many more nonactive members have joined by mailing (or, most recently, by completing a form on the Internet), and thus remain on the mailing lists of the various groups.

Church of Satan
PO Box 499
Radio City Station
New York, NY 10101-0499
www.churchofsatan.com

Massimo Introvigne

See also: Ordo Templi Orientis; Satanism.

References

- Aquino, Michael A. The Church of Satan. Los Angeles: the author, 1989.
- Barton, Blanche. The Church of Satan. New York: Hell's Kitchen Production, 1990.
- Barton, Blanche. The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1990.

Introvigne, Massimo. Enquête sur le Satanisme. Satanistes et antisatanistes du 17e siècle à nos jours. Updated ed. Paris: Dervy, 1997.

LaVey, Anton Szandor. Satan Speaks! Venice, CA: Feral House, 1998.

LaVey, Anton Szandor. The Satanic Bible. New York: Avon Books, 1969.

LaVey, Anton Szandor. The Satanic Rituals. New York: Avon Books, 1972.

Church of Scientology

Scientology is a religious and therapeutic system of ideas and ritual practices developed, starting in the early 1950s, by American writer, adventurer, and philosopher L. Ron Hubbard (1911–1986). The first church was founded in Los Angeles, California, in 1954. At the beginning of the new century Scientology is represented on all continents, in 145 countries. The church estimates that 8 million people worldwide are, in some way, using Hubbard's life-improvement techniques, but not all of these people are devoted members. Most of them are buying books and taking courses in the church facilities on a regular basis without considering themselves devotees.

Scientology was reorganized in the beginning of the 1980s, and today the organizational structure is divided into two major units. The first is the Church of Scientology International, founded in 1991, with its headquarters in Los Angeles. This unit oversees public relations, legal affairs, organizational expansion, and other practical affairs. The second unit, Religious Technology Center, appeared in 1982. This unit owns all trademarks and service marks of the religion and controls the licensing of these items worldwide. Together these two units control all Scientological activities, from field activities to missions and churches and advanced churches, in order to secure what are considered the unique teachings of Hubbard.

In the 1960s a religious order of dedicated Scientologists, the Sea Organization, was founded, and in the 1980s its members assumed control of the church internationally. All executives and most of the staff of the Church of Scientology International, the Religious

L. Ron Hubbard (1911–1986) was the founder of Dianetics and Scientology. (Special Collections, Davidson Library, University of California—Santa Barbara)

Technology Center, and those facilities that deliver the more advanced training for Scientology leaders and facilitate access to what are considered the higher levels of Scientology teachings are Sea Organization members. Members of the Sea Organization take vows of commitment to the faith similar to those expected of members of ordered communities in other religions.

During the late 1930s and 1940s Hubbard developed his do-it-yourself-therapy, Dianetics, according to which every human being is suffering from severe mental and psychosomatic traumas because of the functions of what Hubbard calls the reactive mind. In the memory bank of this mind are stored the engrams, that is, all the pieces of a person's memory involving mental or physical pain. In the book Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health, published in May 1950 and still figuring on bestseller lists, Hubbard presented his ideas on how one can eliminate the engrams through dianetic therapy, called auditing.

From 1951 Hubbard carried his ideas further and began the transformation of the therapy to a fully developed religious soteriological system by including metaphysical ideas and axioms about the individual and the universe in his representations. In 1954 Hubbard announced the full transformation into a religion. The new religion got the name Scientology (from Latin scio, to know, and from Greek, logos, word or thought), knowing about knowing.

The basic idea in Scientology is the idea that the human being, a composite of body, mind, and spirit, is a spiritual, individual being (called a Thetan). Each individual, or Thetan, has existed through an endless number of incarnations on this and other planets through hundreds of millions of years. Scientology's mythological texts tell, for instance, how the Thetans in a remote past made the mistake of identifying themselves with a physical universe and physical bodies and how the different states of existence and mytho-evolutionary history have influences on the present condition of the individual. For each incarnation, the Thetan is suffering a series of karmic experiences hidden on what is called the timetrack. Through the ritual practices of Scientology one can get insight into these matters, confront one's mythological past on one's individual timetrack, and thereby improve one's happiness, relationships, and general well-being, as well as find one's individual path to ultimate truth.

Scientology, inspired by, to name a few, Buddhism, Hinduism, Western Esotericism, science fiction, and psychotherapy, offers an individual salvation to its practitioners through a number of ideas and related practices by means of which individuals can recognize and change various existential conditions of their lives. The salvational path to ultimate spiritual salvation, called the Bridge to Total Freedom, represents an extensive soteriological hierarchy of ritual steps to which each individual is gradually initiated in a codified prescribed sequence. Through these initiations one can move oneself into higher and higher states of awareness and order of existence, toward an ultimate recognition of oneself as a spiritual being and of the universe.

As the new century begins, Scientology is probably the new religion most exposed to the controversy among anti-cultists and most discussed in the media in the Western world. The organization has been accused of controlling its parishioners, financially and mentally, as well as of having an opaque organizational structure and using shady financial transactions between the different organizational units. These accusations prompted a prolonged and thorough examination of the church's financial and organizational practices in the United States by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). When that examination was completed, in the mid-1990s, the IRS concluded that Scientology is, as it claims, a religion that works for charitable purposes, that the income is used for these purposes, and that the organization does not operate in order to damage public policy or society. Although the conclusion reached by the IRS was clear, it does not seem to have influenced the church's reputation in many countries of Europe. In most European countries Scientology is not recognized as a religion, although the church continuously strives to win recognition, and has done so in such places as Italy, Sweden, and South Africa. In several countries, among them France, Germany, and Russia, not only the organization but individual Scientologists are exposed to different kinds of more or less sophisticated restrictions and discrimination.

The Church of Scientology International supports the official Internet site given below, and there are numerous additional sites concerning the church sponsored by the church, its members, and its critics. Congregations and missions of the church are now located in more than 120 countries.

Church of Scientology International 6331 Hollywood Blvd., Ste. 1200
Los Angeles, CA 90028-6329
www.scientology.org/home.html

Dorthe Refslund Christensen

See also: Hubbard, L. Ron; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Christensen, Dorthe Refslund. Rethinking Scientology. Cognition and Representation in Religion, Therapy and Soteriology. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002.
- Christensen, Dorthe Refslund. Scientology. Fra Terapi til Religion. Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1997.
- Church of Scientology International. The Scientology Handbook. Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1994.
- Church of Scientology International. What is Scientology? Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1992.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1950, 1989.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Science of Survival: Prediction of Human Behaviour. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1951, 1989.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Scientology. A History of Man. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1952, 1989.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Scientology. The Fundamentals of Thought. Copenhagen: New Era Publications International, 1956, 1989.
- Lewis, James R., ed. Scientology. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009.
- Melton, Gordon. The Church of Scientology. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 2000.
- Wallis, Roy. The Road to Total Freedom. London: Heinemann Educational Books, 1976.

Church of Scotland

The Church of Scotland is the largest Christian denomination in Scotland and is the national church there for purposes of church-state relations. For historical reasons it is often regarded as a mother-church of English-speaking Presbyterianism and so has been highly influential far beyond the borders of Scotland, especially in places where the founding initiative is traced to Scottish missions during the British colonial era.

The Church of Scotland traces its heritage back to the initial evangelization of Scotland by the Celtic church and through its pre-Reformation history, but dates its present form from the Scottish Reformation of 1560. John Knox (ca. 1514–1572), a disciple of John Calvin (1509–1564) and Theodore Beza (1519–1605),

A Scottish cathedral. The Church of Scotland is the largest denomination in that country. (Corel) led the initial Reformation in the face of opposition from the queen regent of Scotland, Mary of Guise, and subsequently from Mary Queen of Scots (1542–1587), who was a passionate defender of the Roman Catholic Church. Over the course of a further generation, the recognizably presbyterian form of church government was developed, particularly by the church leaders who gathered around Andrew Melville (1545–1622). The principal accommodation of church and state was made in 1592, which may conveniently be regarded as the point at which the Protestant system of the Church of Scotland was established.

The 17th century was characterized in Scottish history as the era of tension between the emergent Presbyterian church and the episcopal polity (like that of the Church of England) preferred by the Scottish king, James VI (later James I as king of both Scotland and England, r. 1603–1625) and by his immediate successors, the Stuart kings of Scotland and England. The Wars of the Covenant of the 1640s and 1650s can be regarded as both a struggle over church government and a conflict for sovereignty between church and crown. With the Restoration of 1660, the struggle resolved in favor of Presbyterianism in Scotland.

The 18th and 19th centuries witnessed a modified version of the conflict, in the disputes over the system of patronage that allowed secular authorities, especially major landowners, to appoint parish ministers. At the peaks of this argument three significant ruptures took place: The two lesser ones are called the First and Second Secessions of the Eighteenth Century, and the most celebrated is known as the Disruption of 1843, when about one-third of the church's congregations removed themselves from the Establishment. Most of the secessionists returned through a process of reunion that culminated in the Union of 1929, which created the modern Church of Scotland. Though no longer established in a legal sense, the church retains a carefully defined relationship with the state, being simultaneously national and free, with responsibilities to the whole nation but with an independent spiritual jurisdiction under church law.

Church government is by a conciliar hierarchy of three courts: the Kirk Session is the body of ruling elders in the local congregation; the Presbytery is the local grouping of congregations and consists of equal numbers of ministers and elders, plus members of the diaconal ministry; the General Assembly is the annual national meeting, again made up of equal numbers of ministers and elders, and including deacons. Each court fulfills primary functions, and the superior courts exercise both judicial and appellate functions. As oversight (a translation of the Greek episkopē) is exercised by courts, not individuals, there is no great emphasis on a leading figure; the strength of the system lies rather in ordered government, largely through the committees and agencies of the courts of the church.

The principal doctrinal standard of the Church of Scotland is the scriptures of the Old and New Testament, not including the Apocrypha, and the subordinate standard is the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), subject to a limited degree of liberty of interpretation. Worship follows the Reformed tradition, with a variety of styles, reflecting the theological opinions and preferences of the local minister.

The influence of the Church of Scotland is recognized in the many denominations that now constitute the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, because of the historical influence mentioned above. Therefore ties are particularly strong with churches in Commonwealth countries, though the Church of Scotland has a presence at the congregational level in about 15 countries, mainly in continental Europe and Israel. The church's commitment to ecumenical dialogue and cooperation is demonstrated in its membership in the World Council of Churches, the Conference of European Churches (CEC), Churches Together in Britain and Ireland (CTBI), and Action of Churches Together in Scotland (ACTS).

In 2007 the church reported approximately 500 000 adult communicant members. The inclusion of baptized persons not having proceeded to adult profession of faith would increase this number to around one million, making the denomination one of the largest numerically in Scotland (alongside the Roman Catholic Church).

General Assembly of the Church of Scotland
121, George Street
Edinburgh EH2 4YN
Scotland
<http://www.churchofscotland.org.uk/>

Marjory A. MacLean

See also: Calvin, John; Church of England; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Burleigh, J. H. S. A Church History of Scotland. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1960.
- The Church of Scotland Yearbook*. Edinburgh: St. Andrew Press, issued annually.
- Common Order*. Edinburgh: St. Andrew Press, 1994.
- McGillivray, G. An Introduction to Practice and Procedure in the Church of Scotland, <http://www.churchofscotland.org.uk/extranet/xchurchlaw/xchurchlawpracproc.htm>.
- Weatherhead, James. The Constitution and Laws of the Church of Scotland. Edinburgh: Board of Practice and Procedure 1997

Church of South India

The Church of South India, founded in 1947 by the merger of Anglican, Methodist, Congregationalist, and Presbyterian churches operating in the southern half of the Indian subcontinent, continues the traditions of Indian Protestant missions that began early in the 19th century.

As the global missionary impulse grew among Protestant groups at the end of the 18th century, India was among its early targets. As a matter of fact, India was the site of a singular effort by two Danish graduates of the University of Halle (the seat of continental Pietism) who came to India in 1706 and began a mission among the Tamil-speaking people on India's east coast. Their work was later supported by the early Anglican organizations, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. However, a new beginning came with the arrival of Baptist minister William Carey (1761–1834) in 1795. He settled at the Danish settlement at Serampore, some 15 miles inland from Calcutta.

The beginning of what became the Church of South India came only three years after Carey began his work, with the arrival of Nathaniel Forsyth, the first missionary sent to India by the newly formed and Congregational Church-based London Missionary Society. He settled in Calcutta and worked alone until the arrival of additional missionaries, who settled in Madras (1814) and Travancore (1818).

Anglicans came to India through the Church Missionary Society (CMS), which had earlier begun a mission in the Middle East. Abdul Masih, a convert from that mission, arrived in 1913 to begin his labors in the United Province (immediately south and west of Nepal). As with previous efforts, the CMS concentrated its initial activities in centers where Europeans had already settled—Calcutta, Travancore, Cochin, and so on. The church tried to work with the indigenous Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, but they soon parted ways.

India was at this time under the control of the East India Company, which was somewhat hostile to interference in its operation from clergymen; in 1813, however, Parliament had forced the company to open the land to missionaries. The coming of the CMS and the expansion of the LMS to Madras had been based upon that decision.

A missionary and educator, Alexander Duff (1806–1878) was a powerful figure in the Church of Scotland and played a pivotal role in Great Britain’s missionary work in India. (Library of Congress)

The Methodists also took advantage of the change of policy. Thomas Coke (1747–1814), who had taken the lead in building Methodist support for foreign missions, had given the last of his financial resources to support a mission to India. After Parliament’s action he won the support of his brethren, and in December he sailed for India with a group of missionaries. The group arrived in Sri Lanka a few months later, but unfortunately Coke died during the voyage. After Methodism was established among the Ceylonese, one of their number, James Lynch, moved on in 1817 to Madras, where he found a small group of Methodists who had been brought together by an expatriate merchant.

Missionaries from the Scottish Missionary Society (Presbyterians affiliated with the Church of Scotland) arrived in 1823. They settled in Bombay. Among the prominent leaders was Alexander Duff (1806–1878), who developed an outreach program to the upper classes of Indian society. Although he made few converts, through the schools he founded he was able to bring Western education to Maharashtra and influence a generation of Indian leadership.

In 1833, the East India Company opened its territory to non-British missionaries. American Presbyterians and Congregationalists were the first to take advantage of the new opportunity. Missionaries supported by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions had opened work in Sri Lanka in 1819. The leader of the work, John Scudder (1793–1855), moved on to Madura in 1835 and then on to Madras, where he opened a mission station in 1836. American Presbyterians came to India, their first foreign mission enterprise, in 1834. They settled at Ludhiana. A mission was opened in Allahabad two years later.

The British and American Congregationalist, the Scottish and American Presbyterian, and the Methodist and Anglican missions grew side by side through the 19th century. Each began work among expatriates, but soon turned their eyes toward the masses of the Indian people. Occasionally, their activity was rewarded by what became known as a “mass movement,” the sudden movement of a large number of Hindus into the Christian church. It has been estimated that as much as 80 percent of the members of all the Christian churches by the end of the 19th century were to be accounted for by such mass movements. Many of them were large-scale defections by the members of the lower castes and the untouchables from a religion that put them in so bad a situation that they had little to lose.

The churches were also affected by negative events. The Presbyterians were particularly hurt by the Sepoy Rebellion, and many of the missionaries lost their lives, caught in the middle of an attempt to overthrow foreign rule.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the missions moved to reduce the duplication of effort and competition among them. In 1901 the American and Scottish Presbyterian missions merged to form the South India United Church, and four years later, the British and American Congregationalists united to form the Congregational General Union of South India. These two churches united in 1924 as the United Church of South India. By this time negotiations were under way for a broader union that would include the Anglican and Methodist churches. Prominent issues to be resolved included the nature of the polity of the new church and the resolving of ministerial orders; the Anglican Church differed from the others because of its belief that its bishops held special authority because they could trace their lineage back to Christ's 12 Apostles, in what is known as the Apostolic succession.

In the end, the Anglicans emerged as the dominant body. The Church of South India that emerged in 1947 had an episcopal polity: that is, the church was led by bishops and organized into dioceses. A means of accepting those ministers not ordained by bishops in the Apostolic succession was finally agreed on, and the church emerged as a model for Christian cooperation throughout the Protestant world. The basis of the union was the Lambeth Quadrilateral, the historic statement of the bases of Anglican belief (discussed in the entry on the Church of England), which includes acknowledgment of the ancient Christian creeds.

In 2005, the Church of South India reported 3,500,000 members in 8,715 congregations. The congregations are divided among 22 dioceses (with one diocese reaching into Sri Lanka). The synod is the highest legislative body. It meets biennially, at which time a presiding bishop is designated. The church supports a number of educational and medical facilities, and in the 1960s initiated a vast program of rural development across India.

The church was a model for similar union attempts around the world, and it has remained a staunch supporter of the ecumenical movement. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Anglican Communion, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Methodist Council. Initially, many Anglicans outside of India had expressed concern over the provisions of the church's constitution, but in 1971, the Anglican Consultative Council called upon all Anglican churches worldwide to reexamine the Church of South India with a view to entering into full communion with it. In 1972 the Church of England's General Synod voted full communion. The problem for Anglicans had been the many ministers who had not been re-ordained by a bishop in the Apostolic succession. That problem had been taken care of over time by the ordination of all new ministers since 1947 by the church's bishops.

A number of the CSI members have moved to the United States. At first they worshipped in Indian Orthodox parishes, but then began to form informal Protestant groups, which gradually formed into local congregations. In 1981, the Diocese of Kerala recognized the existence of these parishes and began to include them in their pastoral concern. In 1988, the CSI Synod placed all of the parishes of the church outside of India directly under the presiding bishop.

Church of South India
CSI Centre
No. 5 Whites Rd.
PO Box 688
Royapettah, Madras 600 014
India
www.csichurch.com

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of Scotland; London Missionary Society; Methodism; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Methodist Council; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Frykenburg, Robert Eric. Christianity in India: From Beginnings to the Present. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- George, K. M. Church of South India Life in Union (1947–1997). Delhi: ISPCK, 1998.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobray, 1998.

Church of Sri Lanka

The Church of Sri Lanka (aka Church of Ceylon) continues the initial attempts of representatives of the Church of England to establish Anglicanism on the island of Ceylon. Several years after the Dutch ceded power over the island to the British, the Church Missionary Society began work in Candy (1818). Many formerly affiliated with the Dutch Reformed mission affiliated with the Anglicans. Stations were subsequently opened among the Sinhalese (who were Buddhists) at Baddegama (1819), Kotte (1822), and Kurunagala (1880), and among the Tamil (who were Hindus) at Jaffa (1818) and Colombo (1850). Education was an early and persistent concern, and the mission supported four men's colleges, two women's colleges, and two women's middle schools. A teacher training school was opened for both the Tamils and the Sinhalese.

In 1930 the work separated from the Church of England and was incorporated into the new independent Church of India, Burma and Ceylon. Then in 1947, the Anglican diocese in southern India became part of the new Church of South India. Two of the Ceylonese dioceses (Colombo and Kurunagala) did not join the new united church, preferring instead to concentrate on the effort to unite with the other churches in Sri Lanka that were members of the National Christian Council (Methodists, Baptists). In 1947, the Jaffa Diocese (serving Sri Lankan Tamils) did affiliate with the Church of South India.

Various conversations aimed at uniting the Church of Sri Lanka, the Methodist Church of Sri Lanka, the Baptists in Sri Lanka, and the Jaffa Diocese of the Church of South India have proceeded, but a plan for a united church acceptable to all parties has yet to mature. The continuing violence in the country has contributed to the failure of union attempts.

Christian church in the fishing town of Negombo, Sri Lanka. Christians make up a small minority in Sri Lanka. (Diomedia/StockphotoPro)

With slightly more than 50,000 members (2005), the church is the second in size only to the Roman Catholic Church in the Sri Lankan Christian community. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the worldwide Anglican Communion.

Church of Sri Lanka
Bishop's Office
358/2 Baudhdhaloka Mawatha
Colombo 7
Sri Lanka

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of South India; Methodist Church, Sri Lanka; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of Sweden

The coming of Christianity to Sweden is generally traced to the efforts of Saint Ansgar (801–865), the archbishop of Hamburg (Germany), who earned the title of “Apostle to Scandinavia” for his missionary efforts. However, the traditional religion of the northern people was firmly entrenched, and it was not until 200 years later that Christianity made real progress in gaining a foothold in the country. An early center was established at Uppsala, where the first diocese was erected and later (1477) a university opened. The church was thus still in the process of establishing itself within the Roman Catholic Church when the Reformation swept through Germany.

Two Swedes who had studied with Martin Luther at the University of Wittenberg, Olavus Petri (1493–1552) and Laurentius Petri (1499–1573), had the ear of King Gustavus Vasa (1496–1560), and the three took the lead in aligning Sweden behind the Reformation. Olavus Petri wrote pro-Reformation books and assumed the task of translating the Bible (1541) and Luther’s Small Catechism (1537) into Swedish. Laurentius Petri became the administrative leader as archbishop of Uppsala (1531). The reorientation of the church was secured over the remaining decades of the century. In 1593, a convocation of the church firmly established the church in the camp of Lutheranism. It adopted the Unaltered Augsburg Confession as its doctrinal standard and decreed that adherents to “foreign” religions were not to be tolerated in the land.

From the reign of Gustavus Adolphus (r. 1594–1632) forward, the fate of the Lutheran Church of Sweden was largely tied to that of the government, especially its spread with the establishment of the present boundaries of the country. Its exclusive rights to operate in Sweden were loosened only slightly by the introduction of an Act of Toleration in 1781 that granted other Christians the privilege of residing in Sweden. Toleration to Jews was granted the following year.

Secularization of the church began in the 19th century. In 1866, the Swedish Parliament created the church’s synod as a new legislative body and dropped the church’s direct representation in the government. At the same time, the church was hit with a variety of criticisms from Pietist and conservative theological perspectives. Many called for a revival of personal spirituality, and others condemned the church for a departure from the faith. A number of dissident groups formally separated from the church. In response, new church leadership arose, articulating the church’s position as an instrument offering Christianity to all the people of the country. Outstanding 20th-century leaders included Einar Billing (1871–1939) and Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931).

The Church of Sweden continues to hold the allegiance of the Swedish people, and some 90 percent are members. It keeps many of the statistical records on the Swedish population (for which taxes are collected and paid to the church), and most people turn to the church for baptism, marriages, and funerals. However, the church does not attract many (less than 10 percent) to regular attendance at worship. Widespread official church membership exists side-by-side with an extreme secularization of the country.

Bro Church in Gotland, Sweden. A majority of Swedes identify themselves as members of the Church of Sweden. (Corel)

The church has an episcopal polity, its bishops having received Apostolic succession in the 16th century from a lineage of bishops considered to be in direct line from Christ's Apostles. One bishop is chosen as the church's archbishop, the remaining bishops being assigned to one of the 13 dioceses. The king of Sweden is considered the first member of the church, and the government confirms the appointment of bishops.

In 1982, the church was given more independence to make decisions in areas of worship, doctrine, sacraments, evangelism, and world mission activities. The synod formed in the 19th century has evolved into the General Assembly, which meets annually. The assembly opened the ministry to ordained female clergy in 1960.

Entrance into the worldwide missionary movement was made formally in 1874 with the establishment of the Church of Sweden Mission, founded in 1874, which focused on efforts in Africa, India, and Malaysia. The work of that mission has led to the formation of a number of now independent churches. Its work is supplemented by that of the Swedish Evangelical Mission and the Swedish Jerusalem Society. It is challenged by the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends, a movement protesting the dominance of liberal theology in the Swedish church. The Church of Sweden also oversees a number of Swedish-speaking congregations that serve expatriates in various European countries.

In 2005, the church reported 7,200,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Lutheran World Federation.

Church of Sweden
 Sysslomansgatan 4
 S-751 70 Uppsala
 Sweden

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Murray, Robert, ed. The Church of Sweded: Past and Present. Malmo, Sweden: Allhem-Malma, 1960.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Waddams, Herbert M. The Swedish Church. London: SPCK, 1946.

Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine

During the 16th century the Protestant Reformation dominated by Lutheranism based in Germany spread into adjacent French territories, even though the Reformed Church based in French-speaking Geneva gathered the bulk of the response from Protestants in France. Lutheran congregations appeared especially in the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and the Montbéliard region farther south. Persecuted throughout the century, Lutheranism experienced some reprieve following the issuance of the 1598 Edict of Nantes, which gave Protestants some degree of toleration. Nevertheless, the church continued to suffer some persecution until the French Revolution and the subsequent establishment of a set of regulations under Napoleon that provided for the existence of Protestant churches. The regulations did not, however, allow the Protestants (either Reformed or Lutheran) to develop a national synod.

In 1871, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, Alsace and Lorraine became German territory. The Lutheran Church continued under the Napoleonic regulations and, apart from the ravages of war, survived with relative ease until the region was returned to France following World War II. There Lutherans, united by their allegiance to the 16th-century Augsburg Confession of Faith, were finally able to organize, but chose to remain separate from the other French Lutherans in the Reformed Church of France.

Through the last half of the 20th century, making use of its strength in the Strasbourg area, the church committed itself to working with Protestants in the Rhine Valley (including churches in Germany, the Netherlands, and Switzerland). It is an active member of the Conference of Churches along the Rhine and shares its headquarters building with the Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine, with whom it shares several centuries of history. The church was a charter member of the World Council of Churches. In 2005, the church reported 210,000 members worshipping in 206 congregations.

Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine

1 quai St. Thomas
F-67081 Strasbourg Cédex
France

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheranism; Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Brethren

The Brethren Church dates to the year 1708, when a group of German Lutherans decided to separate themselves from the church. In the process of establishing the new church, they showed some influence from the Anabaptist and Free church tradition in their practice of conducting an act of rebaptism. Their leaders had ties to the Mennonites and had read the Mennonite confessions of faith, and critics connected them immediately with their Anabaptist roots.

The Brethren found little support from either the more dominant church bodies (the Roman Catholic Church, Lutheranism, and the churches in the Reformed tradition). As hostility turned to active persecution, they sought shelter, as had the Mennonites before them, in Holland. By 1719, the Brethren began considering immigration to the British American colonies, and received with some joy the invitation of William Penn (1644–1718) to take advantage of his experiment in religious freedom in Pennsylvania. Before the year was out, the first group migrated to Pennsylvania and settled in Germantown (now a part of Philadelphia). Over the next 15 years, most of the Brethren migrated to Pennsylvania. Those few who chose to remain in Europe were absorbed into the Mennonite Church.

The first Brethren congregation in North America was established on Christmas Day, 1723, in Germantown. It became the mother congregation of the Church of the Brethren. Peter Becker (d. 1758) emerged as the pastor, and he baptized the first American converts and presided over the first love feast, a distinctive feature of Brethren worship. The love feast (variations of which were later adopted by Moravians and Methodists) is a service that includes foot washing, a group meal, and the Lord's Supper. Neighbors called the Brethren "Dunkers," in reference to another distinctive practice, triune baptism, wherein the believer, on his or her knees in the water, is immersed three times in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Like the Friends and the Mennonites, the Brethren shared a commitment to peace and simplicity; sought separation from secular influences (an attitude manifested in the plain clothing they wore); opposed slavery; and refrained from voting, taking oaths, or entering lawsuits. Brethren instituted a strict system of church discipline. Problems from their refusal to bear arms in war began at the time of the American Revolution and periodically reappeared through World War II. As the church spread, the Brethren began to hold an annual meeting for business and worship during the 1740s. Their ministers received no salary and were not expected to have a formal education.

Following the establishment of the church in the United States, the Brethren expanded westward, establishing centers in Kentucky and Ohio in the 1790s, and Indiana, Missouri, and Illinois in the 1810s. Brethren reached the West Coast by mid-century, though the main strength of the church is still found in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. The first schism among the Brethren occurred in the 1880s, and the church subsequently lost those members who either rejected any change or who felt that the church was changing too slowly. The Church of the Brethren remains the largest of the several Brethren denominations. In 2006 it reported 127,526 members in 1,064 congregations in the United States.

In the 1890s the Church of the Brethren began mission work in Denmark. They followed with efforts in China, Nigeria, India, and Ecuador. The China work was lost with the changes at mid-century. Nigeria emerged as the most successful mission and has resulted in the present independent Church of the Brethren of Nigeria. Work in India was merged into the Church of North India (1970), and the work in Ecuador into the United Evangelical Church of Ecuador.

The Brethren have become known for their work in relief, rehabilitation, and reconstruction after disaster. They earned special respect from their colleagues in other denominations for their efforts in Europe following World War II. They have an extensive publishing program through Brethren Press, established in the 1890s. The church is ecumenically active and was a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Church of the Brethren
1451 Dundee Ave.
Elgin, IL 60121-1694
www.brethren.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of North India; Church of the Brethren in Nigeria; Free Churches; Friends/Quakers; Lutheranism; Mennonite Church, U.S.A.; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Durnbaugh, Donald F., ed. The Brethren Encyclopedia. Philadelphia: Brethren Encyclopedia, 1983.
- Mallot, Floyd E. Studies in Brethren History. Elgin, IL: Brethren Publishing House, 1954.
- Sappington, Roger E., ed. The Brethren in the New Nation. Elgin, IL: Brethren Publishing House, 1976.

Church of the Brethren in Nigeria

The Church of the Brethren in Nigeria began in 1922 with the arrival of H. Stover Kulp (1894–1964) and Albert D. Helser (1897–1969) as the first missionaries of the American-based Church of the Brethren in Africa. The first congregations, which consisted of but four members, were founded at Garkida in 1927. In 1932, a school to train primary school teachers was founded. Through the next generation additional missionary personnel arrived, and in the decades following World War II, an expansion of institutional life aimed at building indigenous leadership. A pastor's school opened in 1950. The first of the Waka schools, to train teachers, church workers, and public officials, opened two years later. An expansive agricultural program was initiated in 1957. Kuip Bible School was opened in 1960 and the Theological School of Northern Nigeria in 1969.

In its second generation, the Church of the Brethren pursued the process of building indigenous leadership. In 1955 the first Nigerian was elected chairperson of the Nigerian synod, and the first Nigerian pastors were ordained. In 1972 the church in Nigeria was recognized as an autonomous sister church to the Church of the Brethren in America. In 1976 it adopted its present name, in the local language, Ekklesia Yanuwa a Nigeria. It continues the faith and practice of the Church of the Brethren.

The Church of the Brethren in Nigeria has reported 160,000 members and 403 congregations (2006). It joined the World Council of Churches in 1985.

Church of the Brethren in Nigeria
EYN Headquarters
PO Box 1
Mubi, Adamawa State
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Free Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Durnbaugh, Donald F. ed. The Brethren Encyclopedia. Philadelphia: Brethren Encyclopedia, 1983.
- Enns, Fernando, Scott Holland, and Ann K. Riggs, eds. Seeking Cultures of Peace: A Peace Church Conversation. Telford, PA: Cascadia Publishing House, 2004.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Disciples of Christ

A missionary affiliated with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Willie Burner, with his family, settled in Buenos Aires in 1906. The work was expanded by the arrival of additional personnel in 1910. Evangelism concentrated in Buenos Aires and its suburbs and was marked by cooperation with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church). In 1918, the two churches founded Colegio Americano and, along with the Waldensians, Union Seminary. Colegio Americano, a school for boys, was supplemented by El Instituto Modelo, a school for girls; the two later merged into the present Colegio Ward. In the 1930s, the church expanded into the province of Chaco, adjacent to the Paraguayan border.

The mission became an autonomous church in 1959, though the church maintains a strong relationship with its parent body. Its strength still lies in its social service work in the capital. It cooperates with other Protestant churches in supporting Aurora Publishing House.

This small church has been on the decline since the last decades of the 20th century and now has approximately 700 members in 7 congregations (2005). It has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1975.

Church of the Disciples of Christ
Terrada 2324
1416 Buenos Aires
Argentina

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Montgomery, J. Dexter. Disciples of Christ in Argentina, 1906–1956: A History of the First Fifty Years of Mission Work. St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1956.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Kingdom of God

The Church of the Kingdom of God is the largest among various European groups that separated from the Bible Students, the organization that eventually evolved into the contemporary Jehovah's Witnesses.

In 1916, Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916), the founder of the Bible Students, died quite unexpectedly, and a struggle for the succession followed. Although the great majority of the Bible Students eventually followed Judge Joseph F. Rutherford (1869–1942) as Russell’s successor (who later went on to establish the Jehovah’s Witnesses), a number of other Bible Students leaders created splinter organizations. One of them was the leader of the Bible Students in Switzerland, F. L. Alexander Freytag (1870–1947). Attempts to resolve his differences with Rutherford failed, and in 1920 Freytag published the Laodicean Messenger, a book marking the beginning of the separation. Rutherford answered with The Harp of God, his first mature doctrinal work.

In 1921, Freytag established the independent Church of the Kingdom of God (also known in certain countries as the Philanthropic Association of the Friends of Man). The organization was quite successful in Switzerland, with several thousand members, and expanded to a number of other countries, including the United States and Italy, where, thanks to the efforts of Sebastiano Chiardola (1914–1993), it also enjoyed a membership of several thousands. In subsequent years, Freytag not only denounced what he regarded as Rutherford’s innovations, but also reinterpreted most of Russell’s peculiar doctrines, so that his movement has been regarded by some scholars as Russellism evolving toward Fundamentalist evangelical Protestantism.

The Monitor of the Kingdom of Justice, the movement’s magazine, is published in several languages.

Church of the Kingdom of God

Le Château
1236 Cartigny (Geneva)
Switzerland

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Jehovah’s Witnesses; Russell, Charles Taze.

References

- Freytag, F. L. Alexander. The Divine Revelation. Geneva, Switzerland: Disciples of Christ, 1922.
- Freytag, F. L. Alexander. Eternal Life. Geneva, Switzerland: Messenger of the Lord, 1933.

Freytag, F. L. Alexander. The New Earth. Geneva, Switzerland: Bible and Tract House, 1922.

Church of the Lamb of God

The Church of the Lamb of God was a small polygamy-practicing Mormon church, which attained a level of fame because of the violence in which it became involved as a result of some of its members murdering members and leaders of other polygamy-practicing groups. The church was founded in 1970 by Ervil LeBaron (d. 1981), formerly the patriarch of the Church of The First Born of the Fullness of Times. The Church of the First Born grew out of the participation of the large LeBaron family in polygamy, which dated to the 1930s. In the 1950s they had resided at a colony in Mexico associated with the Apostolic United Brethren, the group led by Rulon C. Allred (d. 1977). In 1955, three LeBaron brothers, Joel (d. 1972), Ross Wesley, and Floren, left the colony and incorporated the Church of the First Born. Eventually Joel claimed to possess the Patriarchal Priesthood through a line of succession in the family that led back to Joseph Smith Jr., the founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

In 1970, Joel and Ervil parted after Joel accused his brother of taking undue liberties with the women in the church. After establishing the Church of the Lamb of God, Ervil issued a manifesto claiming leadership over all of the polygamy-practicing groups and the authority to execute any who did not acknowledge that authority. Soon afterward a series of attacks, some causing deaths, began to plague the other polygamy groups. In 1972 Joel LeBaron was murdered. A close associate of his, Dean Vest, was killed in 1975. Then in 1977 several individuals entered the office of Rulon Allred in suburban Salt Lake City, Utah, and killed him. A few days later an attempt to kill Merle Kilgore, another polygamy leader, was foiled. Eventually, all of these deaths were traced to orders given by Ervil LeBaron. In 1980 he was tried and convicted, but died the following year in prison.

The church did not die with Ervil. He was succeeded by his son Aaron LeBaron, and deaths associated with the group continued through the 1980s.

The most prominent deaths were of four members of the Chynoweth family in 1988. Aaron LeBaron was eventually convicted (1997) of conspiracy to kill the Chynoweths.

In recent years there have been conflicting reports of the church's disbanding. Its present status is unknown, and it may survive as a small informal organization of devoted followers.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Polygamy-Practicing Mormons.

References

- Bradlee, Ben, Jr., and Dale Van Atta. Prophet of Blood: The Untold Story of Ervil LeBaron. New York: Putnam's, 1981.
- Chynoweth, Rena. The Blood Covenant: The True Story of the Ervil LeBaron Family and Its Rampage of Terror and Murder. Austin, TX: Diamond Books, 1990.
- Fessier, Michael, Jr. "Ervil LeBaron, the Man Who Would Be God." New West (January 1981): 80–84, 112–117.
- LeBaron, Garn, Jr. "Mormon Fundamentalism and Violence: Historical Analysis." www.exmormon.org/violence.htm. Accessed November 1, 2001.

Church of the Lord

A prominent Aladura church, founded by Josiah Ositelu in 1930. Ositelu, an Anglican schoolteacher who had thousands of visions, became involved in the prophetic exposure of witchcraft. He was associated with Joseph Shadare (d. 1962), founder of Christ Apostolic Church (Ghana), and Joseph Ayo Babalola during the revival of 1930. Ositelu was known as a powerful healer, and he broke his short affiliation with Faith Tabernacle, an American non-Pentecostal church that emphasized faith healing in its teachings, in the same year, when the other leaders challenged his authority and practices. They objected to his concern with exposing witches, the use of holy names and seals to guarantee miracles, and his acceptance of polygyny. Ositelu then founded the Church of the Lord (Aladura) (CLA) and eventually took seven wives, for which he claimed divine permission.

Ositelu died in 1966, to be succeeded by Apostle Adeleke Adejobi (1921–1991), who had just completed a two-year theological training course at an evangelical Bible college in Glasgow, Scotland, and had established a church among West African immigrants in London in 1964. Adejobi was a man of considerable spiritual and administrative gifts and one of the most widely traveled Aladura leaders. He built the largest church building of the CLA in Lagos in 1942, planted the CLA in Freetown, Sierra Leone, in 1947 and in Accra, Ghana, in 1953. Adejobi's work in Ghana resulted in one of the most successful of the non-Nigerian CLA churches, and the daughter of the king of Ashanti, Princess Victoria Prempeh, became an avid supporter and eventually a minister.

The CLA was admitted to the World Council of Churches in 1975. Adejobi was also involved in the creation of two ecumenical associations for the African Initiated Churches, the Nigeria Association of Aladura Churches and the intercontinental Organization of African Instituted Churches (OAIC), created in Cairo in 1978, with offices in Nairobi. Primate Adejobi became the OAIC's first chairman (1978–1982). The CLA was also responsible for the creation of the Aladura Theological Seminary and the Prophets and Prophetesses Training Institute, originally established by Adejobi in 1965. On Adejobi's death in 1991, Ositelu's eldest son, Gabriel Segun Ositelu (1938–1998), an agriculturist and head of an Ibadan research institute, took his place as primate. On his death in 1998, his brother Rufus Ositelu became primate and was still in that position in 2009. The CLA seems to have evolved from a charismatic leadership pattern to a hereditary one.

Church of the Lord (Aladura)
PO Box 71
Sagamu Remo, Ogun State
Nigeria
www.aladura.de

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Aladura Churches; Christ Apostolic Church; Organization of African Instituted Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Peel, John D. Y. Aladura: A Religious Movement among the Yoruba. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Pobee, John S., and Gabriel Ositelu II. African Initiatives in Christianity: The Growth, Gifts and Diversities of Indigenous African Churches—A Challenge to the Ecumenical Movement. Geneva: WCC, 1998.
- Turner, Harold W. History of an African Independent Church. Vol. 1, The Church of the Lord (Aladura). Oxford: Clarendon, 1967.

Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith

The Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith (CLJCAF) is a predominantly Black Oneness (Apostolic) Pentecostal denomination founded by Sherrod C. Johnson (1897–1961) in 1933. Johnson called for a multiracial church and society during a period of deep racial tensions in America.

Johnson was born in North Carolina and began his ministry in 1917 in a predominantly white congregation in Philadelphia. In 1919 he founded another congregation in the city, mostly black, which he pastored until his death. Both Johnson and his church were originally affiliated with the Church of Our Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith (COOLJC) in New York City, itself a split from the original Oneness organization, the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World.

The growth and oversight of the CLJCAF were largely a consequence of Johnson's radio ministry, which began in 1935. By the time of his death he was heard weekly over 70 church-owned stations worldwide. Instead of appointing elders and bishops, his taped messages became the primary means for overseeing affiliated congregations. Johnson was a controversial leader and a product of the doctrinal and racial divisions within the early Oneness movement.

Johnson inherited many of his views from the COOLJC. Notable among them was his strict opposition to ordaining women and remarrying after divorce. He also taught that foot washing is a sacrament and insisted upon the use of wine in Communion. Other teachings were more radical. Women were required to dress conservatively in plain, full-length dresses, wear head coverings in church, and refrain from all jewelry and rings. Johnson condemned the festival observance of Christmas and Easter. He rejected all forms of military service and the practice of funeral services.

Theologically, Johnson held a variant position on the traditional Oneness doctrine of the sonship of Christ. He agreed that sonship is temporal, not eternal. But he taught that, because the kingdom of God is spiritual, sonship ceased the moment Jesus died on the cross and his flesh was glorified.

Upon his death, the church's secretary-general, S. McDowell Shelton (d. 1991), succeeded Johnson as apostle and general overseer. His appointment was not received well by the southern elders, and the CLJCAF has suffered six, mostly small, schisms since 1961. Under Shelton, succession was established according to family lineage. His eldest son by adoption, Shelton Nehemiah, succeeded him until his death in 1994. But Shelton's youngest son, Omega Y.L. Shelton, has also claimed legal right of succession since 1992, and continues as general overseer of CLJCAF and pastor of the mother church.

The festivals of Christmas and Easter are still not officially observed, but church policy is not binding on members. The CLJCAF now conducts funeral services and approves of military service. Standards of modesty have relaxed, but women are encouraged to wear a head covering when they pray.

Johnson's historic radio ministry was reduced to four U.S. cities—Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, D.C. Audio closed-circuit broadcast simultaneously beams the bishop's weekly message to all the affiliated congregations in the United States.

The CLJCAF officially claims a membership of 5,000 and approximately 70 congregations in the United States. Of this number, 2,500 belong to the mother church in Philadelphia. The CLJCAF neither counts members abroad nor holds church property. Its followers are most heavily concentrated in Belize, Bahamas, Jamaica, Nassau, Ghana, Liberia, Nigeria, South India, South Africa, and England. An internet website has replaced the church's former magazine, The Whole Truth.

Church of the Lord Jesus Christ of the Apostolic Faith
22nd and Bainbridge Streets
Philadelphia, PA 19146
www.tcljc.com

David A. Reed

See also: Pentecostal Assemblies of the World; Pentecostalism.

References

- French, Talmadge L. Our God Is One: The Story of the Oneness Pentecostals. Indianapolis, IN: Voice and Vision Publications, 1999.
- Johnson, S. C. Is Jesus Christ the Son of God Now? Philadelphia: the author, n.d.
- McCoy, L. A True History of the True Church. Rev. ed., 1977.
- Reed, David A. “In Jesus’ Name”—The History and Beliefs of Oneness Pentecostals. Blandford Forum, UK: Deo Publishing, 2008.
- Richardson, James C., Jr. With Water and Spirit. Martinsville, VA: the author, n.d.

Church of the Nazarene

The Church of the Nazarene is one of the leading representatives of the Holiness movement in American Christianity; during the 20th century, it became a global church with affiliated churches in more than 100 countries.

The church was founded in 1895 by Reverend Phineas F. Bresee (1838–1915), a former pastor in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). Bresee had been a leading minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the years following the American Civil War, when the Holiness movement had the support of Methodism’s leadership. By the 1890s, however, that support was waning. In 1894, Bresee asked the church to allow him to take charge of an independent mission in downtown Los Angeles, and when they refused his request, he withdrew from the Methodist Church. After a year at the mission, he founded the First Church of the Nazarene in Los Angeles. The aging Bresee, having previously served the Methodist Church for three decades, started a second career as the head of a new Holiness movement. The initial congregation grew rapidly, and a second congregation was started in 1897 in northern California at Berkeley. Several other congregations soon followed, and Bresee saw the possibility of developing a Holiness church along America’s West Coast.

The first delegated assembly of the associated churches gathered in 1898, at which time Bresee was named superintendent. In 1907, the West Coast group merged with a similar Holiness group on the East Coast, the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America. Their union produced a new national organization, the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. By this time, the Church of the Nazarene had already become involved with foreign missions. In 1897 it had sent a team of five workers to open a mission in India.

The 20th century was a time of steady growth in the United States. That growth was punctuated by a series of mergers, which have brought a number of smaller Holiness bodies into the church. These include the Holiness Church of Christ (1908), the Pentecostal Church of Scotland (1915), the Pentecostal Mission of Nashville (1915), Laymans Holiness Association (1922), the International Holiness Mission (1952), the Calvary Holiness Church (1955), and the Gospel Workers Church of Canada (1958). Most recently, the Church of the Nazarene (Nigeria), an indigenous church that had developed by using the 1944 edition of the church’s Manual, came into the larger church (1988). The Pentecostal Church of Scotland, the International Holiness Mission, and the Calvary Holiness Church were all products of the Holiness movement’s earlier spread in the United Kingdom.

In 2006, the church reported 633,000 members in the United States, 12,873 members in Canada, and 1.8 million members worldwide. The church is organized into districts, each headed by a district superintendent. The highest legislative authority is the General Assembly, which elects the general superintendents (who function somewhat like bishops) and the General Board, the primary executive body. Under the General Board are a spectrum of boards and agencies. The church sponsors a number of colleges and seminaries, the majority of which are located outside the United States. The church is affiliated with the Christian Holiness Partnership and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is additionally related to the World Evangelical Fellowship.

The Church of the Nazarene
6402 The Paseo
Kansas City, MO 64131
www.nazarene.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Holiness Partnership; Holiness Movement; United Methodist Church.

References

- Laird, Rebecca. Ordained Women in the Church of the Nazarene: The First Generation. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press of Kansas City, 1993.
- Purkiser, W. T. Called unto Holiness, II. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1983.
- Quanstrom, Mark R. A Century of Holiness Theology: The Doctrine of Entire Sanctification in the Church of the Nazarene: 1905 to 2004. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press of Kansas City, 2003.
- Smith, Timothy. Called unto Holiness. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1962.
- Van Note, Gene, and M. E. Redford. The Rise of the Church of the Nazarene. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1985.

Church of the Province of Burundi

Anglican work in Burundi began in 1934 with the arrival of missionaries of the Rwanda General and Medical Mission, the theologically conservative wing of the Church Missionary Society, which had initiated work in Rwanda in 1926. At this time a notable spiritual revival that had originated in Rwanda was sweeping through the country, and the mission experienced rapid growth among the Tutsi people (the smaller of the two ethnic groups in the country). The mission went on to found three hospitals. In 1961 the work was incorporated into the Church of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi.

Like other churches operating in Burundi, the Anglicans were directly affected by the sudden influx of more than 100,000 refugees during the period of disturbances that followed the gaining of independence by Rwanda in 1962. Burundi gained its independence the following year, followed by four more years of violence, which followed the pattern of older conflicts between the Tutsi and Hutu people. Many of the Anglicans were killed in this era.

In 1965, a coup led by strongman Michael Micombero ended the violence temporarily. That same year, the first African bishop was consecrated for Burundi, and the Diocese of Burundi became an independent diocese within the church the next year. In 1971–1972 a Hutu uprising was put down brutally, with more than 300,000 killed. Half of the Anglican clergy and more than 100 catechists were killed, and the church was forced to rebuild without trained leadership. There were more than 500 parishes to be served by less than 20 ordained priests.

In 1980, the Church of the Province of Uganda was separated, and the new Church of the Province of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire erected. This province was divided into three provinces along national boundaries in 1992. The Church of the Province of Burundi is led by its primate, currently the Most Reverend Bernard Ntahoturi. It has six dioceses, its primate residing at DS 12, Bujumbura, Burundi. The church joined the World Council of Churches in 1994 and participates fully in the worldwide Anglican Communion, of which it is among the most conservative members. The church, with approximately 600,000 members (2005), is the third largest religious body in Burundi, behind the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of Pentecost. It sponsors Warner Theological College.

Church of the Province of Burundi
BP 2098
Bujumbura
Burundi
<http://www.anglicanburundi.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; Church of Pentecost; Church Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.

Kastfelt, Neil. The Role of Religion in African Civil Wars. London: Hurst & Co Ltd., 2001.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Central Africa

The Church of the Province of Central Africa unites Anglican churches in four countries—Botswana, Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. The beginning of work in Central Africa dates to a sermon by David Livingstone (1813–1873) delivered in 1858 to students of Cambridge University. In response, the Universities' Mission to Central Africa was organized under Bishop Charles MacKenzie (1825–1862). MacKenzie accompanied Livingstone to Africa in 1861 and began work south of Lake Nyasa. However, MacKenzie died in 1863, and the mission withdrew to Zanzibar. A second attempt at the end of the 1870s by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts led to a permanent mission being established.

George W. H. Knight-Bruce (1852–1896), bishop of Bloemfontein (South Africa), journeyed to Zimbabwe in 1888, and three years later became the first bishop of a new Diocese of Rhodesia. His work was somewhat overshadowed by that of one of the African catechists he recruited to assist in building the church, Bernard Mizeki (1861–1896). Assigned to the village of Nhowe, Knight-Bruce built a mission-complex, learned the local language, and opened a school. Then in 1896, after refusing to flee, he was killed during a local uprising. His death was attributed partly to his having cut down some trees held sacred by followers of the traditional religion. He is remembered to the present on the calendars of the church in Zimbabwe as a martyr. The work in Zimbabwe was eventually put together with the work in Botswana and Mozambique in the Diocese of Southern Rhodesia, which was incorporated into the Church of the Province of Southern Africa.

Interior of a mission church in Malawi. (Travel Ink/StockphotoPro)

Work in Botswana had begun in 1899 as an extension of the work in South Africa. The Diocese of Botswana was formed in 1972. In 1910, John Edward Hine (1857–1934), the bishop of Nysaland and Zanzibar, initiated work in Zambia (then known as Northern Rhodesia), the occasion being the 50th anniversary of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa. He was assisted by Leonard Kamungu, one of the first Africans in the region to be ordained to the priesthood.

Work in Central Africa developed under the jurisdiction of the Church in South Africa and the archbishop of Canterbury. The Province of the Church in Central Africa was established in 1955, with Edward Paget named as the first archbishop.

The church is led by its archbishop. The Most Reverend Walter P. K. Makhulu retired in 2008 and his successor has yet to be named. In 2005 the church reported 15 dioceses, 900,000 members, and 250 congregations. The church supports the National Anglican Theological College of Zimbabwe, Zomba Theological College (Malawi), and St. John's Seminary (Zambia). In 1998 the church voted against the ordination of females. It is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and since 1956 of the World Council of Churches.

Church of the Province of Central Africa
PO Box 20 798
Kitwe
Malawi

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church in the Province of South Africa; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Melanesia

The Church of the Province of Melanesia is the Anglican body with jurisdiction over the Solomon Islands, Vanuatu, and New Caledonia. Work in Melanesia began in 1849 by Bishop George Augustus Selwyn (1809–1878), who defined his territory as bishop of New Zealand broadly. He began to make annual trips to the islands and brought young people back to New Zealand to be educated in a Western style. Beginning in 1855, Selwyn was joined in his annual trips by John Coleridge Patterson (1827–1871), who in 1861 was consecrated as the first bishop for the region. He promoted local leadership in the churches and the use of Mota as the common language of the mission. In 1871, as a result of forced movements of islanders by labor traffickers, Patterson was killed. He is still venerated in the islands as a martyr.

The church has experienced two periods of increased growth. First, at the end of the 19th century, an emphasis on the more populous Solomon Islands developed, away from Vanuatu and the Norfolk Islands upon which Patterson had concentrated. Then in 1978, following the Solomons becoming independent, a second growth phase resulted as the local leadership again expanded the territory covered by the church.

The church experienced a variety of problems during the unrest that swept the Solomon Islands during the period 1999–2003. A variety of social injustices had led to a state of lawlessness that resulted in Australia sending in, at the local government's request, a peacekeeping force. At the height of the unrest, seven brothers of the Melanesian Brotherhood were tortured and martyred.

The church of Melanesia is a part of the worldwide Anglican Communion. Worship is largely High Church in orientation, an approach bequeathed by its first bishop, but unique in its integration of Native music. The church is also distinguished by the presence of four Anglican religious orders, one of which, the Melanesian brotherhood, is the largest religious order in the Anglican Communion. The Mothers' Union in the Church of Melanesia mobilizes the younger women in the church and has become a base for the advocacy of women's issues.

The church is divided into eight dioceses. The general convention, which includes the bishops and representatives of the clergy and laity, is the highest legislative body. Each diocese is led by its bishop and diocesan synod.

In 2005, the church reported 200,000 members in its 197 parishes. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Church of Melanesia
PO Box 19
Honiara
Solomon Islands

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; World Council of Churches.

References

- Davidson, Alan K. The Church Of Melanesia 1849–1999. Auckland, NZ: College of St John the Evangelist, 2000.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wrightson, John. Mission to Melanesia: Out of Bondage. London: Janus Publishing Company, 2007.

Church of the Province of Myanmar

An Anglican presence in Myanmar (then known as Burma) was initiated in 1825 by chaplains serving British expatriates, but a meaningful mission was not established until 1859, when representatives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts arrived at Moulmein, five years after the British annexed the region. The first bishop was consecrated in 1859 and took his place in Rangoon (Yangon). Work began among the Burmese people, but was later extended to the Karin and Chin peoples. In 1924, the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society, a Low-Church evangelical sending agency supported by members of the Church of England, opened work in the northern part of the country and among the Khumi people in western Burma.

The Diocese of Burma grew under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury, but was eventually incorporated into the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. That church was broken apart by the establishment of the Church of North India and the Church of Pakistan. At the same time, the Church of the Union of Burma was established, which continues as the Church of the Province of Myanmar.

A Christian church in Myanmar. Christians face some religious persecution in Myanmar, where most of the population is Buddhist. (Keith Levit/StockphotoPro)

The church is led by its archbishop, currently the Most Reverend Stephen Than Myint Oo. Congregations are divided into six dioceses. In 2005, the church reported 62,000 members and 300 congregations. The church is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and since 1971 the World Council of Churches.

Church of the Province of Myanmar
140 Pyidaungsu Yeiktha Rd.
Dagon PO (11191), Yangon
Myanmar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the Province of Southeast Asia

Anglicanism arrived in what is now Malaysia following the establishment of the first British settlement in Malaya on Penang, an island off the western coast of the Malay Peninsula, by the British East India Company in 1786. The local magistrate, an active layman in the Church of England named George Caunter, took the leadership as lay clerk and acting chaplain. Supervision of the fledgling work was assumed by the Diocese of Calcutta. The Church of St. George the Martyr was constructed in 1819. The East India Company secured an Anglican chaplain for Singapore in 1826 and supported the building of its first church, St. Andrew's.

The church operated primarily among British expatriates until 1848, when more formal missionary work was commenced by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG) among the Chinese and Tamil-speaking Indians. Their efforts were boosted by missionaries from the Church Missionary Society and the Church Missionary Society of Australia. The SPG settled in Singapore in 1856.

In 1855 a Diocese of Singapore, Labuan, and Sarawak was created for better administration of the work. It operated as a missionary diocese of the Archdiocese of Canterbury. The East India Company closed in 1867, and Penang came under direct British rule. At that point, the SPG assumed the active role of procuring chaplains for the church in the region. The diocese was again reorganized into the Diocese of Singapore in 1909.

Malaysia became independent in 1957, and three years later the diocese was renamed the Diocese of Singapore and Malaya, the name selected to give due recognition to the political importance of Malaya. In 1970 the Diocese of West Malaysia was separated from Singapore (which by that time had become an independent country). Subsequently the dioceses of Sabah and Kuching (Sarawak) in eastern Malaysia were designated. In 1996, the dioceses of Singapore, West Malaysia, Sabah, and Kuching (previously existing as extra-provincial dioceses) were brought together as the Church of the Province of Southeast Asia. The Diocese of Singapore includes Anglican work in Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Indonesia.

The Province of Southeast Asia has emerged as one of the most conservative in the worldwide Anglican Communion. It has been particularly critical of the Episcopal Church (U.S.). The province does not ordain women, and made headlines in March 2000 when Moses Tay (b. 1938), the province's then archbishop, along with Emmanuel Kolini, archbishop of the Church of the Province of Rwanda, consecrated two U.S. priests, Charles H. "Chuck" Murphy III and John H. Rodgers, in Singapore for service in the United States. The two subsequently formed the Anglican Mission in America, which superseded two other conservative Episcopal organizations: First Promise Roundtable and the Anglican Association of Congregations on Mission (AACOM). Murphy (for the Province of Rwanda) and Rodgers (for the Province of Southeast Asia) were given the joint charge of planting churches and receiving congregations and clergy who felt unable to remain in the Episcopal Church. Archbishop Tay justified the action as an attempt to halt the exodus of unhappy members from the very liberal American church.

Christ Church in Melaka, Malaysia, is part of the Church of the Province of Southeast Asia. (Kevin Burke/StockphotoPro)

The Church of the Province of Southeast Asia is headed by the Most Reverend Dr John Chew, who also serves as bishop of Sabah. The province, with its estimated 98,000 members (2008), is not a member of the World Council of Churches, though three of the dioceses are members of the Council of Churches of Malaysia, and the Diocese of Singapore is a member of the National Council of Churches of Singapore. Both councils are affiliated with the World Council's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. The Anglican Mission in America may be reached at PO Box 3427, Pawleys Island, SC 29585. It has a website at <http://anglicanmissioninamerica.org>.

Church of the Province of Southeast Asia
PO Box 10811
88809 Kota Kinabalu, Sabah
East Malaysia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Episcopal Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Hurt, R., L. K. King, and J. Roxborough, eds. Christianity in Malaysia: A Denominational History. Selagor Darul Ebran, Malaysia: Palan-duk Publications, 1992.
- Loh Keng Aun. The Anglican Church in Singapore Island, 1909–1959. Singapore: University of Singapore, 1960.
- Ong, Eddie. "Anglicanism in West Malaysia." In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean

The Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean, formed in 1973, brings together the Anglican churches established in the islands of the westernmost part of the Indian Ocean, including Madagascar, Mauritius, the Seychelles, and La Reunion. These areas had previously been opened to Christianity by French-speaking missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church. The first Anglican work began on Mauritius in 1810, just a few years before England gained control following the defeat of Napoleon. It was 1843 before Church of England missionaries arrived in the Seychelles, in spite of England having gained control in the 1790s. For many years, the work in the Seychelles was included in the Diocese of Mauritius, but a separate diocese for the islands was created in 1973.

The Church of England arrived on Madagascar in 1864 through representatives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG) and the Church Missionary Society (CMS). The CMS withdrew in the 1870s and left the field to the SPG. The SPG concentrated its efforts along the east coast, the area around the capital of Antananarivo, and in the far north. In the 20th century it emerged as the Ekklesia Episkopaly Malagasy with three dioceses. By 1973 it had some 30,000 members. In 2005 it reported 505,000 members.

The church is at one in belief and practice with the churches of the wider Anglican Communion. It is led by its archbishop Most Reverend Gerald James (Ian) Ernest. There are seven dioceses, with the work on La Reunion a designated mission of the province as a whole. It sponsors three theological schools for the training of ministers. The church, especially in Madagascar, serves some of the poorest segments of the population and continues to receive support from other Anglican churches through the Province of the Indian Ocean Support Association. The church has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1975.

Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean
Ambohimano
101 Antananarivo
Madagascar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobray, 1998.

Church of the Province of Uganda

Anglicanism came to Uganda in 1876 in the person of Alexander Mackay (1849–1890), a representative of the Church Missionary Society, and a party of missionaries, all of whom except Mackay died during the first two years. He carried on until additional missionaries could be sent. The mission made substantial progress under the leadership of Bishop Alfred R. Tucker, who headed the work for more than 20 years (1890–1911), during which time the number of members of the Church of England grew from 200 to 65,000. The work was further supplemented in 1929 when representatives of the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society, representing the evangelical wing of the church, opened work among the Karamopong people. Over the years, the tragedy suffered by the original missionaries has been repeated. In 1886, for example, the first bishop, James Hannington (1847–1885), and his companions were murdered. More recently, in 1977, Archbishop Janani Luwum (1922–1977) was killed by Ugandan president Idi Amin (r. 1971–1979).

In 1961, the Church of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi was inaugurated, with Leslie Brown (1912–1999) being named the first metropolitan archbishop of the new province. In 1966 the first Ugandan archbishop, Erica Sabiti (r. 1966–1974), succeeded Brown. At the time, there were 10 dioceses in Uganda. In 1980 the church became the Province of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi. In 1994 that province was divided into three units, and the present Church of the Province of Uganda emerged.

The Church of Uganda is headed by its primate. In 2004, the current archbishop, the Most Reverend Henry Luke Orombi, succeeded the Right Reverend Livingstone Mpalanyi-Nkoyoyo (r. 1995–2004). The church is divided into 31 dioceses. In 2005, it reported a membership of 8,100,000. The church supports Bishop Theological College, founded in 1923, and Uganda Christian University, founded in 1997. It has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1961.

People attend a mass in an Evangelical and Pentecostal church on July 20, 2009, in Kampala, Uganda. (Getty Images)

Church of the Province of Uganda
Centenary Road, Namirembe Hill
PO Box 14123
Kampala
Uganda

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Hassett, Miranda. Anglican Communion in Crisis: How Episcopal Dissidents and Their African Allies Are Reshaping Anglicanism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mobery, 1998.

Church of the Province of West Africa

The Church of the Province of West Africa brings together the Anglicans of Ghana, Sierra Leone, Gambia, and Guinea. Anglican presence in the area began as early as 1752 but was confined to the Cape Coast, a Ghanaian coastal settlement. Work began in Sierra Leone in 1804, but was primarily focused upon Freetown and the community of freed slaves there. Work in Gambia began as a chaplaincy for British troops stationed there in 1816.

The church in Ghana grew during the 19th century, missionary personnel being primarily supplied by the Church Missionary Society (CMS) and later by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Work in Sierra Leone prospered through the 19th century, but growth stagnated during the 20th century. Progress in Gambia was stopped by the growth of Islam as the majority religion. It was not until the 20th century that CMS missionaries entered Guinea, a French colony. Work in the small mission was slowed for a time when in 1967 the government expelled all foreign missionaries.

Through the 20th century, the work in West Africa was organized into five dioceses. (The Diocese of Gambia and Rio Pongas included the work in Guinea, the minuscule Anglican community in Guinea-Bissau, and the single congregation in the Senegal that serves Anglican expatriates in the country.) These dioceses were under the direct supervision of the archbishop of Canterbury. In 1951, the archbishop began the process of creating a new province for West Africa, the synod of which met for the first time in 1957. The constitution was promulgated in 1962 and came into effect the following year.

As originally formed, the Diocese of Nigeria was part of the province, but in 1979 it was set apart in a separate Church of the Province of Nigeria. In 1982, the Diocese of Liberia was accepted into the Province of West Africa. It had a separate origin, being the product of the world of the Episcopal Church of the United States, which had started numerous schools among various Liberian peoples.

Over the years, the province has designated new dioceses, there being 11 at present. It is led by its archbishop, since 2003, the Most Reverend Justice Ofei Akrofi (b. 1942). The church supports Trinity College (Ghana), Cuttington University College (Liberia), and St. Nicolas Anglican Theological College (Ghana). In St. Mary's Anglican Cathedral in Banjul, Gambia, is part of the Church of the Province of West Africa. (Art Directors .co.uk/Ark Religion.com/StockphotoPro)

2005, the church reported 300,000 members. The province is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and the World Council of Churches.

Church in the Province of West Africa
Bishopscourt
PO Box 980
Koforidua
Ghana

www.netministries.org/see/churches/ch00609

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Episcopal Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Church of the White Eagle Lodge

The Church of the White Eagle Lodge grew out of the work of Ivan Cooke (d. 1981) and Grace Cooke (d. 1979), two Spiritualist mediums. From the beginning of her career as a medium, Grace Cooke, known to church members as Minestra, was associated with the Spiritualist Church of England and the Stead Borderland Library in London. In 1930, she was contacted by a French member of the Polaire Brotherhood who informed her that a recently deceased author, well known in Spiritualist circles, Arthur Conan Doyle (1859–1930) (known to the rest of the world as the author of the Sherlock Holmes stories), had chosen her as his instrument to speak to the living from his spirit existence. The result of this contact was later published as a book, The Return of Arthur Conan Doyle (1956).

As a medium, Cooke had been guided by a spirit being named White Eagle, a spirit identified as a Native American. White Eagle is believed to be the symbol of Saint John the Divine (one of the 12 Apostles who were the main disciples of Jesus Christ) and a sign of a coming age of brotherhood. Minestra channeled numerous messages from White Eagle, which became the basis of the work and teachings at the Church of the White Eagle, founded in 1934. At the time of her contact with the Polaire Brotherhood she was also given a six-pointed star, described as the Christ star of balance, which became the church's symbol. She was also asked to train men and women to work in the light of Christ and to aid the world in the "years of fire" that were approaching.

The church conveys the teachings of what is called the Great White Brotherhood, a group of evolved beings who reside on a higher plane and who guide the development of the human race. They offer the hope of a coming golden age, when intuition will arise as a greater force in human affairs. The church affirms belief in God as Father and Mother, the Cosmic Christ, and the five cosmic laws of reincarnation, cause and effect (karma), opportunity, correspondences, and compensation. The church also affirms that every person has a spark of divine light, the spirit of Divine Love, within. These teachings place the church firmly within the Western Esoteric tradition.

The Church of the White Eagle has its headquarters in the United Kingdom. Soon after World War II, the church spread to North America, and centers opened in the United States and Canada. Additional centers appeared across Europe and in the lands of the British Commonwealth (including Australia and South Africa). The international work is led by ministers ordained by the church in England. Worldwide membership is in excess of 15,000.

Church of the White Eagle
New Lands Lodge
Brewells Lane, LISS
Hampshire GU33 7HY
UK
www.whiteaglelodge.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Spiritualism; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Cooke, Grace. Minestra's Vision. Liss, Hampshire, UK: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1992.
- Lind, Ingrid. The White Eagle Inheritance. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Turnstone Press, 1984.
- The Story of the White Eagle Lodge*. Liss, Hampshire, UK: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1986.

Church of Tuvalu

Christianity in Tuvalu, a group of islands in the western Pacific formerly known as the Ellice Islands, began in 1861 with the landing of nine people who had been shipwrecked and drifting in the ocean for eight weeks. One, a deacon in the church on the Cook Islands named Elekama, received permission from the island chief to evangelize. After four months of work, he seized the opportunity to go to Samoa, where the London Missionary Society (LMS) had built a very successful missionary work, to receive more formal training. He returned with other Samoans to the Ellice Islands. They were joined by J. S. White, a missionary with the LMS, in 1870.

Previously, in the 1850s, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the American equivalent of the LMS, had developed a mission in the Gilbert Islands. In 1917, they turned that work over to the LMS, and afterward the mission in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands operated as a single unit. Among the primary contribution of the missionaries was the translation of the Bible into the Tuvaluan language (closely related to the languages of Samoa and Kiribati).

The mission became independent as the Church of Tuvalu in 1969. It has a congregational polity and has written its own Tuvalu Church Creed, which places it squarely in the Reformed theological tradition.

The church, also known as the Congregational Christian Church of Tuvalu, publishes a periodical, Te Lawa (in Tuvaluan). It is a member (since 1980) of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It claims some 95 percent of the islands' 10,850 residents as members of its 13 congregations (2005).

Church of Tuvalu
PO Box 2

Funafuti
Tuvalu

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Chambers, Keith, and Anne Chambers. Unity of Heart: Culture and Change in a Polynesian Atoll Society. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press, 2001.
- Kofe, L. The Tuvalu Church: A Socio-Historical Survey of Its Development towards an Indigenous Church. Suva, Fiji, 1976.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Church Universal and Triumphant

Founded in 1958 by Mark L. Prophet (1918–1973), the Church Universal and Triumphant began as Summit Lighthouse. The Summit Lighthouse traces its roots to the I AM Religious Activity of Guy (1878–1939) and Edna (1886–1971) Ballard. Guy claimed that he met the Ascended Master Saint Germain on Mount Shasta in northern California in 1929. The latter instructed him to give out various teachings that resemble those of Theosophy—for example, that a hierarchy of advanced entities called Ascended Masters guide the evolution of life on Earth—and New Thought—that affirming healing and other realities verbally makes them so, because the thoughts behind those verbal affirmations influence the material world. After Ballard's death in 1939, various splinter factions arose. One, the Bridge to Freedom, led by Geraldine Innocente (d. 1961), included a young World War II veteran from Wisconsin named Mark L. Prophet. His messages, or dictations, given to him by Ascended Masters, were published in the magazine of another I AM splinter group, Lighthouse of Freedom.

In 1958 Prophet began his own movement, the Summit Lighthouse, in Washington, D.C. In 1961 he married Elizabeth Clare Wulf (b. 1939), and in 1962 they moved to Fairfax, Virginia, and expanded their publishing activities, their most important publication being a periodical, The Pearls of Wisdom, in which were published the dictations Prophet received from Ascended Masters, especially El Morya, one of the Ascended Masters who guided Helena P. Blavatsky of the Theosophical Society. In 1962 they established the Keepers of the Flame, an inner circle of followers seen as serving as volunteers for the work of God on planet Earth millions of years ago in previous incarnations. In 1966 they moved their organization's headquarters to Colorado Springs. In 1970 they established a Montessori preschool in order to educate the children of Keepers of the Flame. They began Summit University in Santa Barbara, California, in 1971 as a series of training workshops for followers who completed basic lessons in the organization's beliefs.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the Prophets and some of their staff visited India, the Middle East, Africa, and Europe to expand their teachings and organization. They incorporated ideas from Asian religions and various New Age beliefs. Unlike the New Age movement, however, the Summit Lighthouse organization developed a structured and complex belief system that did not allow for the New Age's individualistic and eclectic doctrinal experimentation. Mark Prophet died suddenly after suffering a stroke in 1973, leaving the movement in Elizabeth Prophet's hands. In 1974, the Summit Lighthouse became the Church Universal and Triumphant, with Elizabeth Prophet as the messenger, in retrospect appointed jointly with Mark Prophet, and with Mark Prophet now elevated to Ascended Master status and given a new name, Lanello. In 1972, shortly before Mark Prophet's death, the Prophets coauthored Climb the Highest Mountain, the first exposition in book form of their cosmology. Subsequent books contained dictations and teachings from both Elizabeth Prophet and Mark Prophet/Lanello. Under Elizabeth Prophet's leadership the church grew significantly in numbers, reaching 25,000 by 1980. She moved the group's headquarters to Santa Barbara, later Pasadena, and then Malibu, where their headquarters complex, called Camelot, remained until 1986, when they made their final move to the headquarters' present location, the Royal Teton Ranch, near Corwin Springs, Montana.

During the years that followed the organization experienced a major controversy, sometimes called the "shelter cycle." The Prophets taught that evil, fallen entities work against the Ascended Masters from Maldek, a planet that rebelled against God and was destroyed, and whose pieces are now the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter. The corrupted entities, Luciferians, and their minions, the Nephilim, or "soulless ones," work to deprive humanity of its rightful evolution toward God. Elizabeth Prophet found evidence of the evil ones' work in the current state of affairs in the world, especially the advance of Communism. In some of the dictations given to her, she warned of the nuclear threat posed by the Soviet Union, leading some members to conclude that they should arm themselves for a post-nuclear holocaust world and dig shelters on the church's Montana property as protection against nuclear attack. This activity resulted in the events of 1989, when two high-ranking church officials were arrested for illegally purchasing arms. Elizabeth Prophet meanwhile predicted that a surprise nuclear attack could occur in 1990. Two thousand of the church's faithful sold their possessions and moved to Montana, renting space in the shelters for the possible day of disaster. But nothing occurred during the period that Elizabeth Prophet said was most likely for an attack. Some disillusioned church members left the organization. The controversy dragged the church's name through lurid media stories about harmful cults.

In the aftermath, several high-ranking officials resigned their offices in 1995, and Gilbert Cleirbaut, a Belgian managerial consultant, assumed the presidency. Elizabeth Prophet retired from active administrative leadership but retained her role as messenger of the Ascended Masters. Cleirbaut overhauled the organization's structure and finances, made it more accountable to the general public as well as to the membership at large, and led in the establishment of new subunits within the organizational chart dedicated to strengthening local centers and their ministries. Eventually Cleirbaut stepped down, and today the church is governed by a ministerial council and board of directors. Elizabeth Prophet was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease in 1998. In 2000 she made her last public appearance and formally resigned her positions and offices with the church, with the exception of vicar of Christ, and moved away from the ranch to be closer to her family.

The organization currently has more than 200 centers in 40 countries. They boast offices in Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, England, Finland, the Philippines, South Africa, Spain and other countries, but their world headquarters remains in Corwin Springs. Ex-members of the church include Elizabeth Prophet's son, Sean, who edits the online sites Black Sun Journal and Atheism.Online.

The Church Universal and Triumphant teaches that human beings are sparks of the light given off by the Great Central Sun, the hub of the universe, which is God, also called the Father/Mother God, because God combines both masculine and feminine energies perfectly and expects the individual to balance them in her or his life as well. These individualized sparks of divine light are the I AM Presences, which endure numerous incarnations. Each human being is also composed of four lower bodies: emotional, physical, mental, and etheric frequencies of spirit and matter surrounding a core, the soul. In each lifetime, the soul achieves progress by strengthening the Christ Self or Real Self, energy vibrations that are purified in the light of the I AM Presence. At death, the four bodies disperse and the individualized I AM Presence continues. The ultimate objective of human life is for the I AM Presence to reunite with God, fortified and matured through its journey in various incarnations.

Millions of years ago, a number of sparks from God were earmarked to exist in several lifewaves, or root races, on Earth. The first three existed in near perfection and harmony, but the fourth, on the ancient continent of Lemuria, rebelled against God and introduced evil and corruption into human history. This corruption serves as astral substance or negative karma weighing down the individual, who must overcome these negative effects through ethical living and spiritual disciplines. Ascended Masters, collectively called the Great White Brotherhood, are advanced entities from other planets who volunteered to guide humanity's lifewaves through their evolutions. They achieved coordination of karma and attuned their own I AM

Presences to the light of God to such a degree that they are no longer bound by the limits of time and space. After the rebellion of the fourth root race, or Lemurians, an Ascended Master from Venus named Sanat Kumara came to earth with many helpers to salvage Earth's sorry state. The Prophets are among those original volunteers, all of whom have subsequently been through many incarnations.

Saint Germain, the Ascended Master who communicated with Guy Ballard, is also important in the church's beliefs. He determined more than 100 years ago that humanity needed democracy, believing that of all the political philosophies, it would be most conducive to individualized I AM Presences achieving spiritual advance. Saint Germain supported the American Revolution and insists that the United States will continue to play a crucial role in humanity's spiritual evolution because it preserves the teachings of democracy in its governmental system. Therefore, like the I AM Movement, the Church Universal and Triumphant fosters patriotism.

Saint Germain and other Ascended Masters maintain centers, or retreats, in the etheric plane above Earth, from which they guide humanity and to which various advanced human beings can travel in dreams or meditation for further instruction. Those members of humanity who advance the most will someday become Ascended Masters in their own right, as exemplified by Mark Prophet. As followers increase in spiritual and moral purity, so they also increase the vibrational strength of light and sound from God and help the Earth to overcome the deleterious effects of earlier evil ones. They can achieve this growth by charging the seven chakra centers of energy, located along the spine from spinal base to the crown of the head, each corresponding to a particular ray emitted from the Great Central Sun. These energy foci in the human etheric body cycle divine energy in such a way as to render the devotee more attuned to cosmic reality. The seat of all spiritual activity in the human being is the heart, midway along the chakra stack, containing the threefold flame of power, wisdom, and love.

Elizabeth Prophet teaches that all human beings can potentially achieve Christlike status. Christ himself was but one of many Ascended Masters, but because of his particularly insightful teachings and crucial place in cosmic history, his words and example continue to be especially formative for church members. Church rituals included hearing Elizabeth Prophet deliver dictations from the Masters until her resignation. Members also “decree,” a form of prayer in which thoughts are expressed intentionally to alter existing states in order to effect healing and world peace, among other worthy goals. These rituals incorporate elements of Christian liturgy as well as meditative practices reminiscent of Buddhism and Hinduism. Liturgical objects include statuary of Jesus and figures from other world religions. The church structure is hierarchical, with some of the Keepers of the Flame having the rank of Communicants, the most committed members. From this group, the inner core of church leaders and members of the headquarters’ staff are chosen.

Church Universal and Triumphant
PO Box 5000
Corwin Springs, MT 59030
www.tsl.org

W. Michael Ashcraft and Leah Shaw Houghton

See also: I AM Religious Activity; New Age Movement; Theosophical Society (America).

References

- Melton, J. Gordon. “The Church Universal and Triumphant: Its Heritage and Thoughtworld.” In Church Universal and Triumphant in Scholarly Perspective, edited by James R. Lewis and J. Gordon Melton. Stanford, CA: Stanford Center for Academic Publications, 1994.
- Prophet, Erin. Prophet’s Daughter: My Life with Elizabeth Clare Prophet Inside the Church Universal and Triumphant. Guilford, CT: The Lyons Press, 2008.
- Prophet, Mark L. and Elizabeth Clare Prophet. Climb the Highest Mountain: The Path of the Higher Self. Livingston, MT: Summit University Press, 1972, 1986.
- Foundations of the Path*. Corwin Springs, MT: Summit University Press, 1999.
- Prophet, Sean. <http://www.blacksunjournal.com/>; <http://www.atheisonline.com>.
- Whitsel, Bradley. The Church Universal and Triumphant: Elizabeth Clare Prophet’s Apocalyptic

Movement. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2003.

Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental)

The Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental) is one of four large international church bodies to emerge from the revival work of three former Presbyterian ministers on the American frontier. Thomas Campbell (1763–1854) and his son Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) were Irishmen trained in Scotland and heavily influenced by the Free church tradition in Scottish Presbyterianism. Thomas Campbell came to America in 1807 and, after a very brief association with the Presbyterians, founded the Christian Association of Washington (Pennsylvania). He was soon joined by his son, and they led their followers into an association with the Red Stone Baptist Association. A lengthy affiliation with the Baptists assisted in grounding them in democratic Free church perspectives.

Barton Stone (1772–1844) was a Presbyterian minister who in the frontier atmosphere found the Presbyterian structure too confining. In 1809 he left the Presbyterians and began to found local churches that were simply called Christian churches. Authority was vested in the local church, and any association between congregations was for fellowship and edification only. The Campbells left the Baptists in 1830 and consummated a merger with Stone’s group in 1832. The churches associated with Stone and the Campbells adopted an anti-creedal Bible-based perspective. Thomas Campbell summed up their position: “Where the Scriptures speak, we will speak; where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent.” They were antiauthoritarian and distrusted any authority apart from the local church. They also protested the many divisions of Christianity, which they attributed to creeds and unbiblical forms of church organization (episcopal and presbyterial). They refused to adopt what they considered sectarian denominational names (Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian) and began to give themselves non-sectarian names, such as the Christian Church, Churches of Christ, or Disciples of Christ.

The movement spread during the 19th century. It saw itself as restoring primitive Christianity, and is often designated the Restoration movement. The movement was served by numerous schools, publishing concerns, and missionary agencies. As there was no denominational structure, each institution was formed and sponsored by a small group of the churches' leaders or by a single local congregation. The different periodicals that appeared represented the spectrum of opinion within the churches. Important differences of opinion developed over the use of instrumental music and the development of centralized boards and agencies carrying out the evangelistic, missionary, and charitable work of the churches.

David Lipscomb's log cabin home, now on the campus of David Lipscomb University, Nashville, Tennessee. Lipscomb was a member of the Churches of Christ. (J. Gordon Melton)

In the late 19th century, the movement began to divide into three groupings. The Churches of Christ (Non-Instrumental) represented the most conservative wing of the Restoration movement. Concentrated in the American South, the leaders of the Churches of Christ opposed the introduction of organs (as well as other musical instruments) into worship services. They were also the wing most opposed to any attempts to organize congregations into conferences and associations, even the rather limited associations that had appeared among the Baptists. Although the Churches of Christ had been differentiating themselves through the last decades of the 20th century, 1906 is usually taken as the date when the separation of the Churches of Christ from the rest of the Restoration movement, primarily the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), was formalized.

In the years after the Civil War, David Lipscomb (1831–1917), the editor of the Christian Advocate in Nashville, Tennessee, emerged as the leading spokesperson of the conservative branch of the Restoration movement in the last half of the 19th century. Lipscomb opposed many trends he saw developing, primarily among the brethren in the North, including the installation of organs in church sanctuaries, the larger role given to women in worship and church leadership, the use of historical-critical methods in Bible interpretation, and the acceptance of liberal theological beliefs. Lipscomb also emphasized the uniqueness of the Churches of Christ, which as the true church required converts who had previously been baptized in another church to be rebaptized. Through the 20th century, the Churches of Christ became the focus of a series of controversies, both with other branches of the Restoration movement and internally. The internal controversies over premillennial eschatology, Sunday schools, and the use of individual communion cups in the Lord's Supper led to divisions within the Churches of Christ in the United States.

The Churches of Christ particularly opposed the development of the American Christian Missionary Society, which coordinated the work of a number of missionary evangelism and charitable activities supported by those Restoration congregations that chose to gather at its annual convention. The Society became the focus of an expanding number of shared activities, which led in the 20th century to the emergence of its supporting congregations as the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Between the two stands the third large Restoration group, the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ.

The Churches of Christ are decentralized, and have no headquarters or denominational executives. There are a variety of representative institutions. The Gospel Advocate (Box 150, Nashville, TN 37202) and Firm Foundation (PO Box 690102, Houston, TX 77269) are leading periodicals. David Lipscomb University in Nashville, Tennessee, and Harding University in Searcy, Arkansas, are among 13 institutions of higher learning identified with the movement in the United States.

In the later 19th century, like other conservative Free church groups, the Churches of Christ became interested in world missions. Without a denominational structure, the founding of missions became the responsibility of individuals with a missionary calling who were willing to found individual missionary societies and gain the support of individual congregations

That effort has borne fruit, and Churches of Christ congregations are now found around the world.

In 2006, the Churches of Christ reported 1,250,000 members in the United States and an additional 2.5 million members in other countries. Globally, church members fellowship through the World Convention of Churches of Christ.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Free Churches; World Convention of Churches of Christ.

References

- Churches of Christ around the World.* Nashville: Gospel Advocate Company, 1990.
- Ferguson, Everett. The Church of Christ: A Biblical Ecclesiology for Today. Grand Rapids, MI: William. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1996.
- Foster, Douglas Allen, et al., eds. The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: William. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Hughes, Richard Thomas. Reviving the Ancient Faith: The Story of Churches of Christ in America. Grand Rapids, MI: William. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1996.
- Mac, Lynn, comp. Churches of Christ in the United States. Nashville: Gospel Advocate Company, 1990.
- Reed, Forest. Background of Division, Disciples of Christ and Churches of Christ. Nashville: Disciples of Christ Historical Society, 1968.

Churches of Christ in Australia

The Churches of Christ in Australia is the representative of the Restoration movement launched in the United States in the early 19th century by Barton Stone, Alexander Campbell, and their colleagues. The movement in Australia is traced to a congregation of Scotch Baptists in Adelaide whose members circulated the writings of Alexander Campbell in the mid-1840s.

Uniting Church in Victoria, Australia. (Radius Images/StockphotoPro)

This action resulted in a split in the congregation and the emergence of the core of members from which the movement developed. The movement also spread a short time later among Methodists in New South Wales. Growth followed the arrival of several talented preachers from America in the 1860s. The development of publishing concerns and regular conferences in the late 19th century gave the movement, which is congregationally organized, some added coherence. The first educational institution, the College of the Bible (now the Melbourne College of Divinity), was founded in Melbourne in 1907.

Through the 20th century, the movement in America divided, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) being the most organized and most liberal in its theology. Both the Churches of Christ and the Christian Church remained committed to the ultra-congregationalism of the original movement. The movement in Australia has not divided, but different congregations and leaders plainly align to the different segments of the American movement.

In the 20th century, the element favoring the Christian church (Disciples of Christ) came to the fore, and the Churches of Christ in Australia became ecumenically oriented. They have joined in the Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council and the World Council of Churches. In 2005, the Churches of Christ in Australia reported 33,000 members worshipping in 430 churches.

Churches of Christ in Australia
PO Box 55
Helensburgh, NSW 2508
Australia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council; World Council of Churches.

References

- Chapman, Graham. No Other Foundation: A Documentary History of Churches of Christ in Australia, 1846-1990. 3 vols. Mulgrave, Victoria: Privately published, 1993. <http://www.mun.ca/rels/restmov/texts/gchapman/nof/NOF2.HTM>.
- Chapman, Graham. One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism: A History of Churches of Christ in Australia. Melbourne: Vital Publications, 1979.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Cistercians

Two Cistercian orders are now found within the Roman Catholic Church, one founded in the 11th century and the other in the 19th. Both are cloistered, or enclosed, monastic orders that seek closely and literally to observe the sixth-century Rule of Saint Benedict. Both also wear a similar white habit over which is placed a black apron called a scapular.

The Cistercian reform was directed at the Benedictines, who had by the 11th century grown rich; many monks had moved from the life of manual labor to one of administration of that wealth. Thus in 1098, Robert of Molesme, left the Burgundian monastery over which he presided and with some 20 others moved to some marshland south of Dijon, France, called Cîteaux (Latin: Cistercium), where they founded a new monastery. A short time later, no less a personage than Pope Urban II (r. 1088–1099) ordered Robert to return to his former duties, and he was succeeded by Alberic of Aubrey (d. 1108), a former hermit and one of the group's original instigators, as their new abbot. Alberic led the group to exchange the black garments they had worn as Benedictines and to adopt the white garb that became their common clothing. He also established their life based on the ideal of work and prayer, with a projected ideal of both charity and self-sustenance. The church the monks built was dedicated in 1106.

Stephen Harding succeeded to the leadership of the growing group in 1108. Stephen put together the constitution that expressed the life as it had by this time been embodied in the monks. The new order also refused to admit minors, accepting only adults who chose to adopt their austere lifestyle.

As the order grew, it accepted gifts of unimproved land, which the brothers would develop by their own labors. Very early they developed a lay following, peasants who were illiterate, who were formed into a less stringent lay order.

As the order developed, each monastery was an autonomous center that elected its own abbot and handled its own finances. At the same time it was associated together with the other monasteries and was under the oversight of the general chapter that met annually at Cîteaux, and was presided over by the abbot of Cîteaux. Emphasis was placed on conformity in matters of observance of the common rule.

Early in their life, the Cistercians attracted a Burgundian nobleman named Bernard (1090–1153), who in 1115 was sent to lead the development of a new abbey at Clairvaux. Bernard of Clairvaux was to become one of the most famous of the second generation of Cistercians and one of the most honored churchmen of his age. He became the first member of the order to be canonized. His growing fame coincided with the remarkable international growth of the movement. The order proved the most popular of several introduced into England following the Norman conquest, and later spread to Scotland, Wales, and Ireland.

By 1152, there were 333 Cistercian abbeys throughout in Europe, and a decision was made to halt further expansion. It had spread from Norway to Italy and from England to Hungary and Romania. Growth did not stop, however, but merely slowed. One place of continued growth was on the Iberian Peninsula, where Christians struggled with Muslims for control. At the request of King Alfonso VII (r. 1135–1157) the Cistercians created a military branch known as the Order of Calatrava, the initial members being lay brothers who were reorganized as “soldiers of the Cross.” The new order would prove an important part of the re-conquest of Spain and remain in existence until it was dissolved in the 18th century. The continued growth of the order led to its inclusion of some 500 centers by the end of the 13th century, with the addition of 250 more over the next 2 centuries. It became one of the most influential orders across Europe.

The order's success also tended to undermine its rigorous lifestyle and promote its decline. Like the Benedictines before them, the Cistercian monks tended to become administrators of wealth rather than productive workers. Rules were relaxed. The election of a reformist Cistercian monk as Pope Benedict XII (r. 1334–1343) only slowed the decline temporarily, and the Cistercians' decline became just another part of the reform being called for throughout the whole of the Roman Catholic Church.

The Cistercians were major losers when the 16th-century Protestant Reformation, with its general devaluation of the monastic life, swept Europe, especially England where King Henry dissolved all the monasteries and confiscated their property. The order survived in France and other predominantly Roman Catholic lands, and experienced periods of reformation and new life. However, what the Reformation had done in northern and Western Europe, the French Revolution and the various democratic upheavals of the 18th and 19th centuries did elsewhere. By the middle of the 19th century, the Cistercians were almost totally destroyed. By the beginning of the 20th century, the main body had been reduced to about 30 monasteries, the large majority being in Austria-Hungary.

It is to be noted that there was also a large influx of females into the order, and an initial convent was founded in Langres in 1125. At one point there were some 900 convents. The life of the cloistered nuns centered on contemplation and field-work. One of the nunneries located at Port-Royal, southwest of Paris, was, in the 17th century, led by Marie Angélique Arnauld (1591–1661) and became a center for the dissemination of the controversial theological trend called Jansenism.

In the last half of the 17th century, some Cistercians in France developed a reformist movement that emerged as a new branch of the Cistercian movement, the Order of Cistercians of the Strict Observance. They are more popularly known as the Trappists, from La Trappe Abbey in Normandy (France), where the order began. The reform, launched in 1664, was led by Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé. Like the original Cistercians, the Trappists attempt a strict following of the Rule of St. Benedict.

Trappists are often known for the silence that is observed as an element of their life. Their rule does not impose a vow of silence, but following Benedict they discourage an unnecessary or frivolous discourse, and even developed a sign language that further delimited the need for verbal communication. They also are silent at meals, listening as one of their number reads from a book.

The Trappists have supplanted the older branch of the movement and are now its largest segment. In the 20th century it spread significantly outside Europe, By 1940 there were 82 Trappist monasteries worldwide. That number grew to 127 by 1970, and 169 by the end of the 1990s. The most recent expansion has included new monasteries in Central and South America, Africa, Asia, and the South Pacific. As with the older body of Cistercians, there is a female order among the Trappists.

The Trappists received their greatest attention from the outside world in the 1960s and 1970s due to the mystical writings of one of their monks, Thomas Merton (1915–1968).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Benedictines; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bianco, Frank. Voices of Silence: Lives of the Trappists Today. New York: Anchor, 1992.
- Bouchard, Constance Brittain. Holy Entrepreneurs: Cistercians, Knights, and Economic Exchange in Twelfth-Century Burgundy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2009.
- Cawley, Martinus. A Folk Geography of Cistercian U.S.A. Guadalupe Translations, 1988.
- De Wall, Esther. The Way of Simplicity: The Cistercian Tradition. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1998.
- Lillich, Meredith Parsons. Studies in Cistercian Art and Architecture: Cistercian Nuns and Their World. Collegeville, MN: Cistercian Publications, 2006.
- Louf, Andre. The Cistercian Way. Collegeville, MN: Cistercian Publications, 1984.
- Merton, Thomas. Thomas Merton: Essential Writings. Ed. by Christine M. Bouchen. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2000.
- Tobin, Stephen. The Cistercians: Monks and Monasteries in Europe. London: The Herbert Press, 1995.

Clan of Ausrans

The Clan of Ausrans constitutes a form of revived pre-Christian Paganism. The Clan was formed in 1954 in Lodz, Poland, among the founders being the present leader, Ryszard Ignacy Danka, a linguist. The name of the group comes from Ausra, or “dawn.” The Clan members see themselves as trying to restore the spiritual heritage of their Indo-European forefathers. They feel obliged to know both themselves and their ancestors, as “he who for genetic or cultural reasons sees himself as an Indo-European has the Being’s given right and obligation to take from and give thanks to the sources which used to feed his ancestors.” In accordance with its statute, since 1960, the Clan has used a reconstruction of the Indo-European language, which appears in its printed calendars and poetry, as well as in the religious songs (as many as 200 so-called mentlas) that they sing during ritual meetings. Worship is directed toward the Powers of the World conceived as gods. Among the worshipped deities are Dieus, Sawelijos, Worynos, and Pussan. The religious life is considered to be one of the ways of the soul toward higher perfection.

The worship (deiwokvolia) consists of recitation and singing of mentlas and other religious formulas, sacrifices, and sometimes teachings in parables about gods or classes on morality or philosophy. The priests obtain their own patron deities. Priests (deiwokvols) and believers (peristants) are allowed to take part in religious ceremonies of other religions. However, they should abstain from participation in actions spreading intolerance or destruction. Christianity is considered either a punishment for bloody pagan sacrifices or an attempt, as valid as the Pagan ones, at describing the Absolute.

Both priests and laymen can improve themselves through an ascetic life, which should be based on the Indo-European culture and nutrition. There are 200 to 500 members of the whole Clan. However, only a small minority of them (15–30) accept the religious character of the group.

Leslaw Borowski

See also: Pagan Federation; Wiccan Religion.

Reference

Beznic, Szymon. "Przegląd nowych ruchów religijnych w Polsce-wybor." In Nowe Ruchy Religijne, edited by Eileen Barker. Krakow: Zakład Wydawniczy "Nomos," 1997.

Clapham Sect

The Clapham Sect was a diverse but influential group of evangelical Christian social reformers that emerged in England at the end of the 18th century. The group became best known for its support of William Wilberforce's activity in Parliament to end British participation in the international slave trade.

Organization of the group is generally attributed to Henry Venn (1725–1797), best known for his leadership of the Church Missionary Society, one of the Church of England's prominent world missionary organizations. His son John Venn (1759–1813) was the rector of Holy Trinity Church in Clapham, at the time a small village just south of London, from which the group took its name. Early on, they were joined by Hannah More (1745–1833), a successful religious writer who used her earnings for philanthropic endeavors. Also residing in Clapham were the two most prominent Members of Parliament identified with the group, Henry Thornton (1760–1815), a banker and MP for Southwark, and Wilberforce. Help from London was provided by scholar Granville Sharp (1735–1813), possibly the most active worker on the antislavery cause, while important support was provided by Beilby Porteus, the bishop of London, who had authority over the Anglicans in most of England's overseas colonies (where slavery was being practiced).

Those who identified themselves with the Clapham Sect were mostly prominent and relatively wealthy Anglicans who were brought together by a common desire to end human slavery and reform the jails. They found their initial focus in the drive to end the slave trade, or at least England's participation in it.

After several decades of work, the group was initially rewarded with Parliament's passage of the Slave Trade Act in 1807, which banned the trade throughout the British Empire. Their efforts culminated in the passing of the Slavery Abolition Act in 1833, which eliminated slavery throughout the British Empire. They were less successful in their efforts to eliminate slavery worldwide.

Many contemporaries looked upon the Clapham Sect as a bunch of do-gooders whom they called pejoratively "the saints." In the light of history, however, the group has been looked upon as moral pioneers. Their work was portrayed in the 2006 film about William Wilberforce, Amazing Grace.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; Church of England.

References

Hennell, Michael Murray. John Venn and the Clapham Sect. Edinburgh: James Clarke, 2002.

Howse, Ernest Marshall. Saints in Politics: The 'Clapham Sect' and the Growth of Freedom. London: Allen and Unwin, 1971.

Telford, John. A Sect That Moved the World: Three Generations of Clapham Saints and Philanthropists. Kessinger Publishing, 2006.

Claver, Pedro

1581–1654

A Spanish Jesuit priest, Pedro (aka Peter) Claver emerged out of obscurity after being assigned to Colombia early in the 17th century. He went on to become the first person from the Americas to be canonized by the Roman Catholic Church.

Raised on his father's Catalonian farm, Claver was educated at the University of Barcelona, and at the age of 20 joined the Jesuit novitiate at Tarragona. During his religious training, he felt a divine call to evangelize the Spanish possessions in America. Pedro obeyed, and in 1610 landed at Cartagena, where for 44 years he was known as the "Apostle of the negro slaves."

Early in the 17th century, the colonial rulers of Central and South America needed laborers to cultivate the soil they had conquered and to exploit the gold and silver mines. However, the Amerindians were decimated by warfare, physical mistreatment by the colonists, and European diseases, and hence were as unable as they were unwilling to supply the needed labor required. Therefore, it was determined to replace them with Africans brought from the coasts of Guinea, the Congo, and Angola.

Because of its position as a key port on the Caribbean Sea, Cartagena became the chief slave market of the New World. Neither the repeated censures of the pope, nor those of Catholic moralists, could prevail against this enterprise. Because of the authoritarian and despotic rule of the Spanish colonial government, the Catholic missionaries found themselves essentially helpless in suppressing slavery; therefore they redirected their work toward alleviating the suffering of those enslaved. Pedro Claver, according to historical accounts, emerged as the first among equals among the priests.

To instruct so many slaves speaking different dialects, Claver assembled at Cartagena a group of interpreters of various nationalities, whom he made catechists. While the slaves (men, women, and children) were penned up at Cartagena waiting to be purchased and dispersed, Claver sought to instruct and baptize them in the Catholic faith. He firmly believed that baptism in water would save their souls from eternal damnation in the fires of hell; he advocated for humane treatment of the slaves on the nation's plantations and in the mines; and he organized charitable societies among the Spanish colonies, similar to those organized in Europe by Saint Vincent de Paul. For 44 years, Claver visited the slaves frequently and inquired about their needs and defended them against their oppressors.

However, the work done by Claver caused him severe trials, and the slave merchants were not his only enemies. The Apostle was accused of indiscreet zeal, and of having profaned the Holy Sacraments by giving them to creatures that scarcely possessed a soul. Fashionable women of Cartagena refused to enter the parish churches where Friar Claver occasionally assembled his Negro flock. Claver's superiors were often influenced by the many criticisms that reached them from concerned citizens who were more interested in financial gain than in spiritual endeavors. Nevertheless, Claver continued his heroic career, accepting all humiliations and adding rigorous penances to his many works of charity.

Claver became known as the prophet and miracle worker of New Granada, the oracle of Cartagena, and many people were convinced that often God would not have spared the city but for him. During his lifetime, he allegedly baptized and instructed more than 300,000 Africans in the Christian faith. After his death, his body was laid to rest in a glass coffin on the high altar of what is now known as the Church of San Pedro Claver in Cartagena.

Claver was beatified in 1850 by Pope Pius IX (r. 1846–1878), and canonized in 1888 by Pope Leo XIII (r. 1878–1903). The Feast of San Pedro Claver is celebrated on September 9. In 1896, he was proclaimed the special patron of all the Catholic missions among the Negros. The Knights of Peter Claver, founded in 1909 in Mobile, Alabama, is the largest African American Catholic lay organization in the United States.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Jesuits; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Lunn, Arnold H. M. A Saint in the Slave Trade: Peter Claver (1581–1654). New York: Sheed and Ward, 1935.
- Valtierra, Angel, S.J. Peter Claver: Saint of the Slaves. Westminster, MD: The Newman Press, 1960.

Cochin Jews

While the largest group of practicing Jews in India, the Bene Israel, resided in Mahashastra, a second group settled in southern India and continue in what is now the state of Kerala. They take their designation as Cochin Jews from the ancient state of Cochin. Cochin, located along Malabar coast in the extreme south of India, is recalled in the name of one of its prominent cities, Kochi, now an important Indian seaport.

The present Cochin Jewish community traces its beginning to the migration of Jews to the region at the time of the biblical King Solomon and the later division of his kingdom in the 10th century BCE. Those who claim such a lineage are popularly referred to as “black Jews,” not to be confused with contemporary Africans who claim a Jewish lineage. Variant accounts put the migrations in the eighth century or following the destruction of the temple in 70 CE. A second group, which came from Europe after the Roman conquest of the Holy Land, are called the Paradesi Jews (and popularly referred to as the “white Jews”). They integrated into the Cochin community. They dropped their Judeo-Spanish language and began to use the variant Keralan language, Judeo-Malayalam.

The community rose out of obscurity with the arrival of Joseph Rabban a Jewish merchant, who settled on the Malabar coast in the eighth century CE. Most likely from Yemen, Joseph seems to have been granted the rank of prince over the Jews of Cochin by the local ruler. According to the inscription on two bronze tablets still in existence, he became the ruler of a principality in Anjuvannam, whose main city was Cranganore some 150 miles north of Cochin. His charter dates to around 750 CE. Joseph’s descendants continued in power until the 1340s, when internal strife in the principality led to outside intervention and the end of Jewish autonomy.

In 1524, the Muslim forces attacked Cranganore, which led the majority of the Jews to migrate south and hence relocate to Cochin. Here, the Hindu ruler gave them sanction and set aside a plot of land upon which they could build their own community, later to become known as “Jew Town.” The sanctity of their new home was short-lived as Cochin was occupied by the Portuguese who periodically persecuted the Jews until they were displaced by the Dutch in 1666. The Jews were able to live peacefully with the Dutch and beginning in 1795 the British. Besides the main community at Cochin, they developed centers at Ernakulam, Aluva, and North Paravur.

The Jews of Cochin follow an Orthodox Jewish tradition, their main variation being the nurturing of public singing by women (a practice prohibited in the Talmud, a primary text on Jewish law) in their Judeo-Malayalam tongue.

Through the centuries many Jews converted to Christianity. Descendants of the converts form the largest segment of today’s St. Thomas Christians, now divided into several denominations—the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, and the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church. The small remaining Jewish community has largely migrated to Israel. Some 8,000 are divided between 2 locales, one in the far south in a community on the edge of the Negev desert and one in the north near Jerusalem. Less than 50 remain in India where one synagogue is still open (as of 2009).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bene Israel; Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; Syro-Malabar Catholic Church.

References

- Katz, Nathan. Who Are the Jews of India? Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
- Katz, Nathan, and Ellen S. Goldberg. The Last Jews of Cochin: Jewish Identity in Hindu India. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.
- Lord, James Henry. The Jews in India and the Far East. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1976.

■ Cocos Islands

The Cocos Islands, sometimes called the Keeling Islands, are 2 main and 25 small coral atolls in the Indian Ocean that are now an external territory of Australia. Approximately 600 people now inhabit the 5.4 square miles of land territory.

The Cocos were discovered in 1609 by William Keeling of the East India Company. They remained uninhabited until 1827, when settled by the Clunies-Ross family, headed by John Clunies-Ross (1786–1854), the founder of the Clunies-Ross Company. The riches afforded by the islands were their coconut groves. In 1857, the British assumed control over the islands, but then granted them in perpetuity to the family. Australia purchased the islands in 1978, but the company retained control of the production from the coconut trees. In 1984, residents voted in favor of annexation to Australia.

In the 19th century, the company brought in laborers from Malaysia to work the coconut trees. These were Muslims, primarily of the Shafiite School. They constitute more than half of the present residents, approximately 650 people. The remainder of the population are primarily Australians, and the largest group are adherents either of the Anglican Church of Australia or the Roman Catholic Church. For Roman Catholics, a priest from the Archdiocese of Perth occasionally visits the islands to say Mass.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of Australia; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Hughes, John Scott. Kings of the Cocos: the Story of the Settlement on the Atoll of Keeling-Cocos in the Indian Ocean. London: Methuen, 1950.

■ Colombia

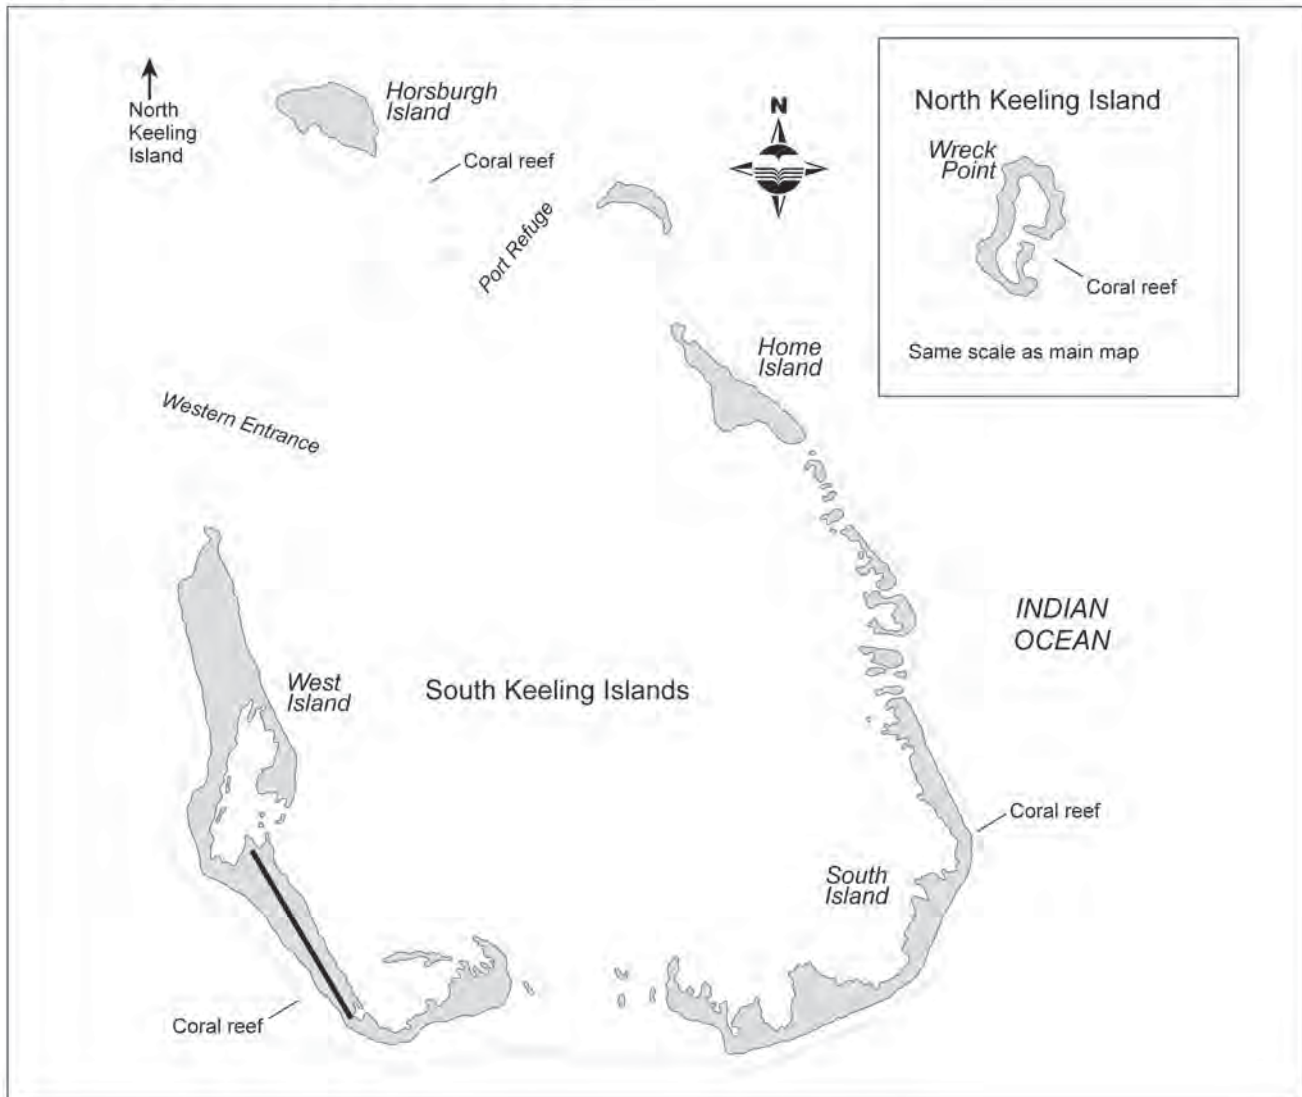

The Republic of Colombia is a large country in the northwestern corner of the South American continent, located between Ecuador and Peru to the south, Venezuela and Brazil to the east, and Panama to the west on the Darién Peninsula. Its northern coastline east of Panama touches the Caribbean Sea and to the west is the Pacific Ocean. Colombian territory also includes several small islands in the Caribbean Sea (San Andrés and Providencia) and in the Pacific Ocean (the largest of which is Malpelo).

In 2008, Colombia had an area of 439,735 square miles (land and water) and a population of 44.9 mil-

Cocos (Keeling) Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	150	180	27.3	0.70	210	230
Anglicans	70	100	14.6	1.09	120	120
Roman Catholics	40	40	6.7	0.00	40	60
Protestants	0	0	0.0	0.00	0	0
Agnostics	10	40	6.0	0.60	60	80
Chinese folk	20	10	1.0	0.00	10	20
Total population	620	670	100.0	0.64	740	810

COCOS (KEELING) ISLANDS

lion, making it the third most populous country in Latin America, after Brazil and Mexico. The majority of the population (58 percent) is mestizo (mixed European and Amerindian ancestry); 20 percent is of white European ancestry (predominantly Spanish, along with some Italian, Portuguese, and German ancestry); 14 percent is mulatto (mixed European and black African ancestry); 4 percent is Afro-Colombian (black African ancestry only); 3 percent is zambo (mixed Amerindian and black African ancestry); and one percent is Native Amerindian.

Today, there are an estimated 450,000 Amerindian people, representing more than 80 ethnolinguistic groups, in Colombia. Most inhabit the upper extremities of the Amazon River basin in the eastern regions that border Brazil. According to Wycliffe Bible Translators' Ethnologue (2009), the largest indigenous groups are the Paéz (an estimated 138,500 in the Central Andean Range near Popayán, Department del Cauca), Wayuu (135,000 in the Guajira Peninsula), Emberá (about 71,000 in the departments of Chocó, Risaralda, Caldas, Antioquía, and Valle), Guambiano (23,500 in the Central Andean Range near Popayán, Cauca), Guahibo (23,000 in the savanna regions of Casanare, eastern Meta, Vichada, Guaviare, and Guainia), Awa (20,000 in the Pacific slopes of the Andes, from the Ecuadoran border north), and Kogi (about 11,000 in the Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta). Most of the language groups of less than 10,000 people live in isolated areas of the eastern lowlands.

After the initial period of Spanish colonization, immigration has included a variety of other Europeans (Dutch, German, Italian, French, Swiss, Belgian, and Basque); also many North Americans arrived in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, along with Middle Easterners fleeing the cruelties of the Ottoman Empire (ended in 1914). In addition, there were an estimated 79,000 Romani (or Roma), popularly known as gitanos (Gypsies), in Colombia; the Romani are a European ethnic group that traces its origins to medieval India. During and after World War II, small numbers of Poles, Lithuanians, English, Irish, and Croats arrived. Many immigrant communities have been formed on Colombia's Caribbean coast. Barranquilla, the largest city on the Caribbean coastline, has the country's largest concentration of foreign residents, including people of Lebanese, Arab, Sephardic, Romani, Italian, German, and French descent. There are also small communities of Chinese and Japanese; the city of Cali has the largest Asian community because of its proximity to the Pacific Coast. Asians can also be found in other major cities, such as Barranquilla, Bogotá, Bucaramanga, and Medellín.

The 1991 Constitution provides for freedom of religion (Article 19), and other laws and policies contributed to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors. The Constitution states that there is no official church or religion but adds that the state "is not atheist or agnostic, nor indifferent to Colombians' religious sentiment." Some interpret this to mean that the state unofficially sanctions a privileged position for Catholicism, which was the official religion until the adoption of the 1991 Constitution.

A 1973 Concordat between the Vatican and the government remains in effect, although some of its articles are unenforceable because of constitutional provisions regarding freedom of religion. A 1994 Constitutional Court decision declared unconstitutional any official government reference to a religious characterization of the country.

The government extends two different kinds of recognition to religious organizations: recognition as a legal entity (personería jurídica) and special public recognition as a religious entity. Although the application process is often lengthy, the Ministry of the Interior and Justice (MOIJ) readily grants the former recognition; the only legal requirements are submission of a formal request and basic organizational information. In addition, any foreign religious group that wishes to establish a presence must document official recognition by authorities in its home country. The MOIJ may reject requests that do not comply fully with established requirements or that violate fundamental constitutional rights. However, many non-Catholic religious groups have opted not to apply for legal recognition and instead operate as nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) or as informal religious entities.

Between 1995 and 2004, the MOIJ approved 1,170 applications for special public recognition as a religious entity; an estimated 90 percent of the approvals were for Protestant entities (including denominations, local churches and service agencies). An article in the daily El Tiempo (April 2, 2007) quoted Bogotá's mayor as stating that "there are now 700 non-Catholic places of worship in the capital city, compared to 450 Catholic churches." According to the MOIJ, 1,775 applications failed to meet constitutionally established requirements and thus were not approved. Although the MOIJ has statutory authority over recognizing religious entities, there is no government agency to monitor or enforce laws governing religious freedom.

However, the daily newspaper El Tiempo (March 22, 2007), based on a national public opinion poll, reported that only 80 percent of the population claimed to be Roman Catholic (with a footnote that not all were active practitioners), 13.5 percent belonged to non-Catholic forms of Christianity (independent Western Roman, Eastern Orthodox, Protestant, or marginal groups), 2 percent were agnostic (no religious affiliation), and the remaining 4.5 percent were affiliated with other religious groups, such as Islam, Judaism, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Afro-Colombian and Indigenous animistic religions.

The presence of terrorist organizations in some areas of the country, such as the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), have inhibited

COLOMBIA

Colombia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	21,980,000	45,949,000	95.9	1.48	52,788,000	58,478,000
Roman Catholics	21,808,000	43,700,000	91.3	1.20	48,800,000	52,900,000
Protestants	325,000	1,350,000	2.8	3.38	2,025,000	3,200,000
Independents	110,000	1,100,000	2.3	3.57	1,700,000	2,040,000
Agnostics	99,000	920,000	1.9	3.63	1,600,000	2,000,000
Spiritists	10,000	490,000	1.0	1.52	600,000	720,000
Ethnoreligionists	280,000	305,000	0.6	1.49	260,000	260,000
Atheists	44,000	94,600	0.2	1.52	125,000	140,000
Baha'is	24,300	76,800	0.2	1.52	100,000	150,000
Muslims	50,000	25,000	0.1	1.52	60,000	70,000
Jews	10,000	10,300	0.0	1.52	8,000	7,000
Hindus	0	11,500	0.0	1.52	12,500	20,000
New religionists	1,000	3,300	0.0	1.52	3,500	6,000
Chinese folk	1,000	2,400	0.0	1.51	3,000	5,000
Buddhists	1,000	2,000	0.0	1.52	2,500	4,000
Total population	22,500,000	47,890,000	100.0	1.52	55,563,000	61,860,000

free religious expression by killing, kidnapping, and extorting money from religious leaders and practitioners. However, the terrorist organizations generally target religious leaders and practitioners for political rather than religious reasons.

More than a dozen Amerindian cultures inhabited Colombian territory before the Spanish Conquest and left vestiges of the surprising level of development they had attained. The Amerindians resisted Spanish attempts to enslave them and force them to work the land and the mines under the colonial feudal system, which included resettling them near the Catholic missions (reducciones) to make it easier to “convert” them to Christianity, instruct them in the Catholic faith, and organize them as a labor force to work in the fields and mines, and to build roads, towns, and churches. As disease reduced the Native Amerindian populations in Spanish-conquered territories, the Spanish colonial government and colonists began relying on imported slaves from Africa as a source of cheap labor. In 1518, the first shipment of black slaves went directly from West Africa to the Caribbean islands, where the slaves primarily worked on sugar plantations.

Extreme measures of taxation and exorbitant duties provoked a popular uprising in 1781 against the colonial government. The country remained in a state of turmoil, which was aggravated by the downfall of the Spanish monarchy before the invading French armies of Napoleon Bonaparte, which occupied Spain between 1808 and 1814 during the so-called Peninsula Campaign. With the resulting collapse of the Spanish colonial government in the Americas, including the Viceroyalty of New Granada, a period of chaos and uncertainty ensued in Colombia and neighboring countries. On July 20, 1810, a junta of criollo revolutionary leaders met at Bogotá to determine the territory’s future, and the following year the independent United Provinces of New Granada were established, which included Colombia, Venezuela, and Ecuador. Soon two warring parties emerged among the revolutionaries, so that by 1816 three civil wars had been fought.

Simón Bolívar’s victory in 1816 led to the establishment of the Republic of Greater Colombia (República de Gran Colombia) in 1819 under his leadership (r. 1819, 1827–1830) and that of Francisco de Paula Santander (r. 1819–1827). Venezuela and Ecuador left the republic to become independent countries in 1829–1830, and the territory of Colombia became the Republic of New Granada in 1831; its present name, the Republic of Colombia, was adopted in 1886.

No country of Spanish America, since its independence, was so often and so violently disturbed internally as Colombia during the 19th century. Almost every presidential term was marked by one or more bloody revolutions that produced disruption and anarchy. Despite these upheavals, Colombia settled down and became more orderly after 1909. This pattern of constitutional order was maintained until 1948.

Reasons for the frequent disruption of social and political order in Colombian society are not difficult to discover. One source of conflict has been the rivalry between partisans of strong central government and the defenders of the sovereign rights of individual departments (states). The Liberal and Conservative parties, founded in 1848 and 1849, respectively, are two of the oldest surviving political parties in South America. In summary, the Liberal Party is anti-clerical, broadly liberal economically, and federalist, while the Conservative Party supports Roman Catholicism, protectionism, and centralism.

Mariano Ospina Pérez (Conservative Party) was president between 1946 and 1950 when conflicts between the nation's two main political parties erupted into violence that lasted for a decade (1948–1958), called La Violencia. On April 9, 1948, Liberal politician Jorge Eliécer Gaitán was assassinated in confusing circumstances. Colombia was thrown into a constant state of insurrection and criminality from 1948 to 1958, a period during which more than 200,000 people lost their lives. In 1958, democracy finally returned to Colombia after the formation of a Liberal-Conservative coalition government (called the National Front), which formalized arrangements for an alternation of power between the two parties and excluded non-establishment alternatives.

However, the political monopoly of the National Front (1958–1974) fueled the nascent armed conflict that has continued into the 21st century. Since the 1960s, government forces, left-wing insurgents, and right-wing paramilitaries have been engaged in South America's longest-running armed conflict. Fueled by political rivalry and the lucrative cocaine trade, the nation's violence escalated dramatically during the 1980s and 1990s. Medellín became world-famous as home of the Medellín Drug Cartel, led by the infamous Pablo Escobar, who reportedly was one of the world's richest men at the time of his death in 1993 in a rooftop shootout with police. By the time the National Front was dissolved in 1974, traditional political alignments had begun to fragment, and this process has continued to the present.

The Roman Catholic Church Catholicism entered Colombia with the arrival of the Spanish, and the Diocese of Santa Marta was established on the Caribbean coast in 1534. The Diocese of Santafé en Nueva Granada was created in 1562 out of the Diocese of Santa Marta, and in 1564 it was elevated to the status of Archdiocese of Santafé (de Bogotá) en Nueva Granada. The Diocese of Santa Marta became a suffragan of the Archdiocese of Santafé en Nueva Granada in 1577.

What progress was attained in evangelizing the Amerindians during the colonial period was due to the efforts of the Dominicans, Franciscans, Jesuits, and other religious orders. However, missionary work was often opposed by the colonists and government officials who were more interested in achieving material prosperity. Due to the expulsion of the Jesuits by Charles III in 1767, the Catholic Church in New Granada lost its principal ally in the evangelization and civilization of the country.

Early in the 17th century, the colonial rulers of Central and South America needed laborers, and because of its position as a key port on the Caribbean Sea, Cartagena became the chief slave market of the New World. A thousand slaves landed there each month. Because of the policies of the Spanish colonial government, the Catholic missionaries could not suppress slavery, so they turned their attention toward alleviating the suffering of those enslaved.

The growth and expansion of the Colombian Catholic Church progressed steadily throughout the 18th century. The church authorities ran into trouble with the leaders of the Independence movement in the early 19th century. Catholic clergy accused the Republicans of being Liberals, Freemasons, agnostics, and atheists who wanted to destroy Catholic civilization, which was based on the authoritarian rule of state and church where dissent was not tolerated during the colonial period.

The Catholic Church and its rigid dogma permeated every corner of Colombian colonial society, and neither the Spanish state nor the Catholic Church allowed any outward expressions of non-Catholic religions among Europeans within the national territory during the colonial period. The Inquisition officially began in Cartagena de Indias in 1610. Construction was completed in 1770 on a two-story building for exclusive use by the Tribunal of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. About 700 people were tried (the majority for committing blasphemy or practicing superstition and magic) and some were tortured and “executed” in this building, which today is known as the Palace of the Inquisition.

Catholic church in Barichara, Colombia. (Urosr/Dreamstime.com)

Following Independence in 1819, the new Colombian government terminated the Catholic Church’s financial support from Spain, and the government had troubled relationships with the papacy. This period of the conflict between church and state provided an opening that allowed Protestantism to enter the country in the early 1800s. In 1853, church and state were separated during the Liberal administration of President José Hilario López (1849–1853), who also abolished slavery, created the agrarian law, and supported freedom of the press and the federalization of the state.

The Liberals governed between 1861 and 1884, but Conservative ascendancy in the 1880s led to their gaining control of the government and approving a pro-clerical Constitution in 1886. This Constitution explicitly provided (Article 38) that “the Catholic Apostolic Roman Religion is that of the Nation; the public authorities will protect it and cause it to be respected as an essential element of the social order.” Elsewhere the Constitution guaranteed all persons freedom from molestation on account of their religious opinions, and then forbade all groups that acted contrary to Christian morality or the country’s laws. The Colombian government signed a Concordat with the Vatican in 1887. The Archdiocese of Santafé en New Granada became the Archdiocese of Santafé de Bogotá in 1889.

The Catholic Church was able to weather the stormy period of Liberal anti-clericalism during the 19th century because of its stronghold on the hearts and minds on the majority of the people, who identified as Catholics first and then as Colombians. In the 20th century, the Catholic Church emerged as the guardian of Conservative values and the protector of the people against what were considered harmful ideas and practices, which included Liberalism, Freemasonry, Protestantism, Socialism, and Communism.

Continued Catholic opposition to Liberal reforms and modernization culminated in the terrible decade (1948–1958), known as La Violencia, in which Protestants were identified with the Liberals and suffered accordingly. The persecution of Liberals and Protestants was justified as a necessity in order to safeguard traditional values, which were based on Catholic dogma and social Christian principles.

Significant change came to the Colombian Catholic Church beginning in the 1960s as a result of measures passed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) and the Second General Conference of Latin American Bishops in Medellín in 1968, and the rise of Liberation Theology through Latin America and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal.

These new movements polarized Catholic bishops, parish priests, religious workers, and the laity into various factions: traditionalists who wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (late 1960s); reformers who supported the church's modern stance; progressives who sought to implement the new vision for "a preferential option for the poor" through social and political action aimed at transforming Colombian society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means; radicals who adopted Liberation Theology, based on Marxist ideology, and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the oligarchy and creating a Socialist state that would serve the marginalized masses; and charismatic agents (priests, nuns, and lay members) who sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the "baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues").

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) began in Colombia in October 1967 when Reformed minister Harald Bredesen (1918–2006), pastor of Mount Vernon Dutch Reformed Church in New York, and an ecumenical team of Charismatics from North America held a series of meetings in Bogotá. During their visit, Friar Rafael Garcia-Herreros (1909–1992), host of the radio/TV program, Minuto de Dios, was baptized in the Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues. Friar García communicated his newfound charismatic enthusiasm to a young priest, Diego Jaramillo. The pair (both members of the religious order Congregación de Jesús y María, called Eudistas) launched the Catholic Charismatic Renewal through their broadcasts.

In 1991, despite strong efforts by the Conservative Catholic hierarchy, Colombia's Constitutional Convention took away the official status of the Roman Catholic Church as the nation's official state religion and declared that "all religious confessions and churches are equally free before the law." This action was a serious blow to the Conservative Catholic leadership. It also demoralized the Catholic clergy and had a negative impact upon the recruitment of priests and religious workers. Between 1999 and 2006, the greatest decline in the Archdioceses of Bogotá was seen in the number of priests in religious orders (from 960 to 297), religious brothers (from 1,929 to 997), and religious sisters (from 4,975 to 2,604). The decline created serious leadership shortages in local parishes and Catholic institutions throughout the country.

In 2002, the Colombian Catholic Church was composed of 13 archdioceses and 75 dioceses with 3,831 parishes that were served by 5,661 diocesan and 2,259 religious priests (total of 7,920), who were assisted by 278 permanent deacons, 4,163 religious brothers and 15,178 religious sisters (nuns). The head of the Metropolitan See of Colombia is Cardinal Pedro Rubiano Sáenz, archbishop of Bogotá, who was appointed archbishop in 1994 and named cardinal in 2001. In 2007, an estimated 35.9 million people (80 percent of Colombia's total population) was reported to be at least nominally affiliated with the Catholic Church. Colombia's faithful Catholic population continued to honor and make annual pilgrimages to shrines dedicated to the nation's patron saints.

The Protestant Movement The history of the Protestant movement in Colombia can be roughly divided into six periods: (1) missionary pioneers (1629–1900); (2) early denominational development (1900–1948); (3) political violence and social turmoil (1948–1958); (4) organized evangelistic activities (1959–1969);

(5) Charismatic Renewal and evangelical organizational development (1970–1989); and (6) accelerated evangelical church growth (1990–2009).

Protestantism in what is now Colombia began on the Caribbean archipelago of San Andrés, Providencia, and Santa Catalina, two island groups and eight outlying banks and reefs located about 480 miles northwest of the Colombian mainland. Finding them unpopulated, Puritans from England settled there in 1629. The islands remained under British control until the Treaty of Versailles of 1783, which ceded the islands to Spain. They remained thinly populated by English-speaking white Protestants and their African slaves. In 1806, 800 of the 1,200 inhabitants were Africans.

After the British abolished slavery in their Caribbean colonies in 1833, the African population of the Colombian islands increased by migration. American missionaries founded the Emanuel Baptist Church in 1844 on San Andrés Island. They were assisted after 1860 by colleagues from the Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society. Many of the islands' oldest churches are Baptist.

In 1915 the Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived to begin mission work on the islands of San Andrés and Providencia. Later, other Protestant churches would be established on these islands, such as the Christian Mission of Barbados, the Assemblies of God, and the Church of Christ (as well as Jehovah's Witnesses, the Roman Catholic Church, and Islam).

Meanwhile, the Scotsman James Thompson (d. 1850), an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), introduced Protestantism to many South American countries, and was active on the Colombian mainland as early as 1824. The BFBS continued to make sporadic attempts to establish offices in the country over the next century, finally turning over its responsibilities to the American Bible Society in 1921.

It was not until 1856 that the first permanent U.S. missionary, the Reverend Henry Barrington Pratt, settled in Bogotá, as a representative of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). This was the only Protestant denomination in Colombia for many years, and it succeeded because of the establishment of a school system and medical facilities. Nevertheless, this denomination attracted relatively few church members during the 19th century.

Additional evangelical mission agencies arrived on the Colombian mainland between 1900 and 1930: the Gospel Missionary Union (1908) in Buenaventura and Cali; the Scandinavian Alliance Mission (1918) in Cucúta, later known as The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM); the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1921); the Christian and Missionary Alliance (1923), a holiness denomination, opened its first mission station in Ipiales and Cali and pioneered in the western departments; the Protestant Episcopal Church began work in 1923 among English-speakers in Cartagena and Santa Marta; and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church (1927) in Cali.

During the 1930s, at least 14 Protestant mission agencies, denominations, or independent groups arrived in Colombia beginning with some independent missionaries who arrived in 1930. Pentecostals associated with the Assemblies of God arrived two years later. They would be followed with a spectrum of missionaries sponsored by both interdenominational missionary agencies and denominations, mostly originating in the United States.

The Pentecostal Assemblies of Jesus Christ (later an integral part of the United Pentecostal Church International), a "Jesus Only" or Oneness Pentecostal denomination, entered Colombia in 1936 and soon became the largest non-Catholic religious organization in the country. In 1970, however, more than 90 percent of its members broke with the U.S. headquarters and formed the independent United Pentecostal Church of Colombia.

Although the general situation markedly improved for Protestants after the Liberal government came to power in 1930, it deteriorated significantly during the civil war that divided the country between 1948 and 1958, called La Violencia. A number of new missionary agencies arrived and established evangelistic efforts in the 1940s, including the Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board (1941); the Wesleyan Methodist Church World Missions (1941–1943); the South American Evangelical Union (1942); the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (1942); and the General Conference Mennonite Church (now the Mennonite Church U.S.A.). Then beginning in 1948, Protestants were identified with the Liberals (who had lost power in 1948), and they suffered the consequences of that association. They experienced a vast destruction of church and school property, the deaths of more than 120 Colombian Protestants, and the displacement of thousands who had to flee for their lives. The violence slowed the entrance of new missionary agencies, though a few did enter, including the Assemblies of God (1951), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee, 1954), the Christian Brethren, and the Society of Friends.

The general situation in Colombia greatly improved for Protestants after 1960. A study on church growth by Palmer (1974), analyzing information from the two CEDEC censuses, reveals that the Pentecostal membership increased by 560 percent between 1960 and 1969, compared to 110 percent for Adventist membership, 60 percent for the membership of older Protestant denominations, and 160 percent for the membership of independent interdenominational missions. During the 1960s, a variety of new mission agencies and denominations began work in Colombia, including the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana) (1961), the independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ (1962), Wycliffe Bible Translators (1962), Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada (1967), and the Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches of Canada.

The 1970s and 1980s were marked by Charismatic Renewal and evangelical organizational development. The first experiences of charismatic renewal in Colombia occurred in 1967 among Roman Catholics in Bogotá. Then, as the new decade began, the Charismatic Renewal movement (CRM) suddenly appeared almost simultaneously, among Catholics and Protestants, in dozens of countries and quickly spread throughout Latin America and the Caribbean regions. In 1972, two U.S. charismatic leaders, Father Francis MacNutt (b. 1925) and Ruth Carter Stapleton (1929–1983), visited Bogotá and held a series of meetings that impacted many university and high school campuses across the country, as well as local Catholic parishes and evangelical churches.

However, both Catholic and Protestant conservatives began to raise objections about the very nature of the CRM on the one hand and about the historic doctrinal differences on the other hand. Attempts of the Catholic hierarchy to regulate and control the CRM led many Catholics to leave the church and affiliate with evangelical Bible study and prayer groups and local congregations. As a result, evangelical congregations, in general, began to grow substantially throughout the nation, especially in the larger cities. Visible products of the move of former Catholics appeared in the formation of the Caravans of the People of God Biblical Christian Churches (formed by a group of Charismatic Catholics in 1974); the Bethesda Missionary Center (an independent Pentecostal church founded by Enrique Gómez Montealegre in 1975 in Bogotá); and the Christian Crusade Churches, a national Pentecostal denomination founded by Silvio H. Barahona in 1975. In addition several more U.S.-based Pentecostal churches began work in the country.

During the next decade, the Light of the World Trinitarian International Evangelical Work (an independent Pentecostal denomination founded by Jaime Banks Puertas in 1968) became established in Colombia. About the same time, in 1983, the International Charismatic Mission (MCI) was founded by César Castellanos Domínguez and his wife Claudia in Bogotá. Shortly thereafter, Castellanos visited the Reverend David Yongi Cho in South Korea, pastor of the largest Christian church in the world, the Yoido Full Gospel Church. In South Korea, Castellanos received a “revelation” that God would significantly increase the size of his work in Colombia and help him care for the growing numbers of people. Castellanos subsequently reorganized his church members into cell groups of 12 adults (called the G12 Vision), which caused his flock to grow in spectacular fashion. By 2009, the MCI had expanded its ministry throughout the country and established more than 200 local churches and hundreds more in North America, Central America, South America, and Europe.

Since 1990, Protestants, especially Pentecostals, have experienced an era of accelerated church growth (1990–2009). The period was marked by the arrival of several additional U.S.-based mission agencies and denominations, the expansion of older denominations, and the birth of new national church associations.

In 2007, the Protestant population of Colombia was estimated at 5 million, or 11.2 percent of the nation’s total population. At that time, the Protestant community included more than 2 million baptized church members, 150 denominations, and about 400 foreign missionaries (mostly from the United States). PROLADES estimated that, in 2000, there were 2 million baptized church members among 22,222 local congregations (average of 90 members per church), with a total Protestant population of about 5 million. The difference between the aggregate of “baptized church members” (over 14 years of age) and the total Protestant population nationally (adherents) accounts for those considered “nominal” in their religious commitment and attending church services infrequently or not at all.

However, overall, Protestant church growth in Colombia has been impacted by external historical circumstances that had a strong influence on the Catholic public’s perception of evangelicals as well as on their predisposition to visit and participate in evangelical activities, such as local worship services or public evangelistic crusades. After centuries of hostility toward Protestants by Catholic clerics who instigated their parishioners to oppose Protestant efforts at all levels of Colombian society, there was a radical shift in the official attitude of the Catholic hierarchy toward Protestants worldwide, beginning in the 1960s. This changed attitude began with the changes instituted by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965).

In terms of interdenominational and ecumenical relations among Protestant denominations and service agencies since 1980, there have been two main tendencies: (1) most conservative evangelical leaders are supportive of the vision and mission statements of the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA), affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance, whereas (2) the more liberal and ecumenical leaders and their respective denominations are affiliated with the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI) and, directly or indirectly, with the World Council of Churches (WCC).

Other Christians In 2007, 4.5 percent (830,200 people) of the total population was affiliated with religious groups other than those already listed. One of these groups is the New Apostolic Church with international headquarters in Zurich, Switzerland (worldwide, in 2007, there were 408,960 members, 7,569 ministers, and 1,419 congregations). This denomination is a pre-Pentecostal charismatic church that separated from the Catholic Apostolic Church in Europe in 1863. The focus of the New Apostolic doctrine is the expectation of the imminent return of the Son of God, Jesus Christ. The denomination is led by apostles who have been called to ministry by prophets; it emphasizes the activity of the Holy Spirit as the focal point of church life, and freely exercises the gifts of prophecy, healing, and speaking in tongues. This denomination has dozens of congregations throughout Colombia, with its headquarters in Bogotá.

During the 1930s, a wave of Middle Eastern immigrants (Maronite Christians) arrived in the Peninsula of La Guajira from Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, and Palestine, countries formerly under the Ottoman Empire, and established themselves mostly in the municipality of Maicao, on the border with Venezuela. Today, Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions in Colombia (with an estimated 8,000 adherents) are the following: the Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (Divine Providence Mission Congregation in Medellín); the Mercian Orthodox Catholic Church; the Orthodox Apostolic Catholic Church of Colombia; and the Greek Orthodox Church of Colombia.

Marginal non-Protestant Christian denominations include the Jehovah’s Witnesses (first arrived in 1895) who reported 2,016 congregations with 138,068 members and 457,022 adherents in 2008; the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (founded in 1966 and with 27 congregations established in 10 cities by 1971) reported one temple and 265 congregations with 163,764 members in 2007; the Philadelphia Church of God; Universal Life—the Inner Religion; the Christadelphians; the Light of the World Church (from Mexico); Unity School of Christianity; Mita Congregation and Voice of the Chief Cornerstone (both from Puerto Rico); Israelites of the New Universal Covenant (from Bolivia and Peru); Universal Church of the Kingdom of God and the God Is Love Pentecostal Church (from Brazil); and Growing in Grace Ministries International (Miami, Florida).

Additional Religious Groups The very diverse Jewish community, which numbered about 10,000 in the mid-1970s, had shrunk to around 5,600 by the mid-1990s due to the unstable economy and violence (kidnappings and murders) against Jews, which led to immigration to Israel, Central America, the United States, and elsewhere. Currently, the Jewish population is estimated at about 4,200. During the early part of the 20th century, a large number of Sephardic immigrants came from Greece, Turkey, Syria, and North Africa. Before, during, and after World War II, Jewish immigrants began arriving from Europe. The Jewish community in Colombia is composed of three main groups: the Ashkenazim, the Sephardim, and the Germans. Although most Jews in Colombia are not observant and generally not active in Jewish religious life, there are nine official synagogues in the country: Bogotá has four, Cali two (Unión Cultural Israelita and Centro Israelita de Beneficiencia), Barranquilla two (Sinagoga Shaare Sedek–Comunidad Hebrea Sefaradita and Casa Lubavitch), and Medellín one (Casa Lubavitch). The majority of the Jews reside in Bogotá, where the Centro Comunitario Israelita (founded in 1928) is located; other Jewish organizations in Bogotá include Congregation Adath Israel, Synagogue Israelita Montefiore, the Sephardic Hebrew Community (reorganized in 1943, mostly of Syrian, Turkish and Moroccan origin), the Colombo Hebrew School, and the Friends of Lubavitch.

Since World War II, a much more diverse religious situation has developed, with the arrival of as many as 50,000 Muslims from the Middle East. Islam is represented by the Islamic Center of Santafé de Bogotá, the Islamic Center of Maicao, the Islamic Center of Isla San Andrés, the Beshara School of Intensive Esoteric Education, and Subud. The Baha’i Faith spread rapidly during the 1970s, partially due to a mass movement into the Baha’is among the Guajiros.

Within the small Chinese community of Colombia there are those who practice traditional religions (including ancestor worship, Confucianism, and Taoism) and Buddhism, and there are many other Buddhist organizations in the country, such as the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition, the Yamanataka Center (FPMT), the Buddhist Center of Bogotá, and the Osho Rajneesh Movement. Japanese new religions that draw on Shinto as well as Buddhism include Sukyo Mahikari and Tenrikyo.

Hindu organizations include the Rosa Yoga Brahm Center; the World Spiritual University of Raja Yoga

Meditation; the Brahma Kumaris Association; the Krishnamurti Foundation; the Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Science of Spirituality; the Vaisnava Mission; the Sri Sathya Sai Baba International Organization; Satyananda Ashrams (International Yoga Fellowship Movement); the Osho Rajneesh Movement; the Vishwa Nirmala Dharma Religion; Transcendental Meditation (TM), now organized as the Global Country of World Peace; and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). ISKCON experienced a significant response in Colombia and became home to several spin-off organizations, such as the Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies (founded by Srila B.A. Paramadvaiti Maharaj), the Varsana Ecological Gardens in Granada-Cundinamarca (the principal temple of VRINDA, led by Swami B. V. Bharati), and the Temple of Prama Vardhana in Pereira (founded by Srila Guru Maharaj).

The Sikh/Sant Mat tradition is represented by the Sri Chaitanya Saraswat Mat; ECKANKAR; Supreme Master Ching Hai Meditation Association; and Elan Vital.

The Western Esoteric tradition is represented by the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), Builders of the Adytum, the Grand Universal Fraternity-Mission of Aquarius, the Universal Christian Gnostic Movement of Colombia, the Universal Christian Gnostic Church, the Wisdom Center of Gnostic Studies, the Samael Aun Weor Universal Christian Gnostic Church, the New Acropolis Cultural Center, and the Universal White Fraternity. Also, there are numerous Satanist groups in Colombia, such as Los Lobos en Contra de Cristo (The Wolves against Christ) and Los Cabras (The Goats), according to sociology professor Carlos Arboleda Mora in Medellín. In April 1998, the Administrative Department of Security (DAS, a police intelligence unit) reported the existence of Satanist sects in eight of Colombia’s departments and some of their alleged activities: sadomasochism, profanation of cemeteries and Catholic churches, animal sacrifices, suicide by poison, and the attempted assassination of several Catholic priests using poison.

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age movements are represented by the Astrologers Association; the Colombian Spiritist Confederation; the Theosophical Society; the Anthroposophical Society; the Ancient Church in Colombia; the Basilio Scientific School; the Center of Prayer, Growth and Spiritism; the Light of Your Destiny Esoteric Center; the CIMA Movement of Spiritist Culture (Movimiento de Cultura Espírita CIMA, founded in 1958 by David Grossvater [1911–1974] as Centro de Investigaciones Metapsíquicas y Afines [CIMA] in the city of Maracay, State of Aragua, Venezuela, and a member of the Confederación Espírita Panamericana—CEPA, founded in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1946); the Spiritual Magnetic School of the Universal Commune; the Ascended Masters; the Raelian Movement; the Rama Mission of Sixto Paz Wells; the Age of Aquarius Movement; the Church of Scientology—Dianetics; the Unification Church (Rev. Moon); and the Silvan Method.

Traditional Amerindian religions have survived in Colombia, especially in the more remote areas of the country. Many of the indigenous communities practice various forms of their traditional animistic systems, while others practice “popular Catholicism” (syncretistic) that blends Catholic and pre-Colombian beliefs, especially in the central highlands (for example, the Quechuas), whereas the tribal peoples in the remote tropical rainforests continue to practice traditional animistic belief systems. Also, the Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza (a nature goddess of Amerindian and Afro-Venezuelan origin), which is similar to Santería, is practiced by some Venezuelan immigrants and Colombians.

Popular Afro-Catholic religiosity permeates the Hispanic white and mestizo population. Among practitioners of Amerindian religions (animist) and “popular Catholic religiosity” there are “specialists” who practice witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo). Mestizo folk healers and others have discovered the ritual use of hallucinogenic substances that some practitioners of traditional animistic religions have utilized for centuries in the Amazonian lowlands.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Aboriginal Cult of Maria Lionza; Agnosticism; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Anthroposophical Society; Assemblies of God; Atheism; Baha’i Faith; Brahma Kumaris; Christadelphians; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren;

Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Dominicans; ECKANKAR; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Episcopal Church; Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; International Yoga Fellowship Movement; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Jesuits; Krishnamurti Foundations; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Lutheran Church in Canada; Maronite Catholic Church; Mennonite Church, U.S.A.; Mita Congregation; New Apostolic Church; Philadelphia Church of God; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Southern Baptist Convention; Subud; Sukyo Mahikari; Tenrikyo; Theosophical Society (American); Unification Movement; United Pentecostal Church International; Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Universal Life; VRINDA/The Vrindavan Institute for Vaisnava Culture and Studies; Wesleyan Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Yoido Full Gospel Church.

References

- Anderson, Justice C. An Evangelical Saga: Baptists and their Precursors in Latin America. Longwood, FL: Xulon Press, 2005.
- Arboleda Mora, Carlos. “Aspectos Históricos del Pluralismo Religioso en Colombia” (n.d.). http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/aspectos_historicos_del_pluralismo.pdf.
- Arboleda Mora, Carlos. “La Pluralidad Religiosa en Medellín (Colombia)” (n.d.). <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/medellin-directorio.pdf>.
- Bandelier, Adolph Francis. “Colombia” in The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 4. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1908. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/04121b.htm>.

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques. and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Brierly, Peter. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Burgess, Stanley M., ed. "Colombia." In the International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2001–2002.
- De Bucana, Juana B. La Iglesia Evangélica en Colombia: Una Historia. Santafé de Bogotá, Colombia: Asociación Pro-Cruzada Mundial / WEC International, 1995.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/sc1.html>.
- Dieros, Pablo Alberto. Historia del Cristianismo en América Latina. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Fraternidad Teológica Latinoamericana, 1992.
- Herring, Hubert, and Helen Baldwin Herring. A History of Latin America, from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Colombia: 1629–1996." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/chron-col.pdf>.
- Holland, Clifton L. "Directorio de Grupos Religiosos en Colombia, 2002." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/dir-colombia02.pdf>.
- Huertas, Pilar, Jesús de Miguel, and Antonio Sánchez. La Inquisición: Tribunal Contra los Delitos de Fe. Madrid, Spain: Editorial LIBSA, 2003.
- Lewis, M. Paul, ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 16th ed. Dallas, TX: SIL International, 2009. <http://www.ethnologue.com/>.
- Lores, Ruben. Estudio No. 3, "Sobre Toda Carne." In Acción en Cristo para un Continente en Crisis, 11–13. San José, Costa Rica: Editorial Caribe, 1970.
- Moreau, A. Scott, ed. Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 2000.
- Palmer, Donald C. Explosion of People Evangelism: An Analysis of Pentecostal Growth in Colombia. Chicago: Moody Press, 1974.
- PROLADES-RITA database. "Official Registry of Religious Associations in Colombia, November 2006," produced by the Ministry of Justice, Government of Colombia. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/col-registro-de-iglesias-nov-06.htm>.
- PROLADES-RITA database. "Religion and Ethnic Diversity in Colombia." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/col-rd.htm>.
- Safford, Frank, and Marco Palacios. Colombia: Fragmented Land, Divided Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Thompson, Leslie J. "Establishment and Growth of Protestantism in Colombia," Ph.D. diss., University of Wales at Bangor, 2005. http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/col/thompson_thesis.pdf.
- U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). World Factbook on Colombia, 2009. <http://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/co.html>.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report, 2008: Colombia. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108519.htm>.
- Weber, Linda J., and Dotsy Welliver, eds. Mission Handbook of U.S. and Canadian Christian Ministries Overseas (2007–2009). Wheaton, IL: Evangelism and Missions Information Service, 2007.

Common Era Calendar

The Common Era calendar is the name given to the calendar now used officially in most of the world's countries, and unofficially in the remaining countries, as well as a variety of international organizations such as the United Nations and the Universal Postal Union. This designation for what is a revised Gregorian calendar has come about in stages as the Gregorian calendar was accepted in countries where Christianity was not the majority religion and because of a growing sensitivity by scholars, government leadership, and the general public in the West to the presence of other religions in the world.

The Common Era calendar can be traced to the Julian calendar promulgated by Julius Caesar, a revised form of which was accepted as the calendar of the Christian church in 325 CE. That calendar, which had a small but increasingly important error in its measurement of the length of the year, remained in use until the 16th century, when Pope Gregory XIII (1502–1585) took the lead in revising it. The Gregorian calendar took root first in European Catholic countries and then in the Protestant countries. It was spread globally in the 19th century during which time much of the world became part of European empires.

As international trade and government relations increased, the need grew for a globalized way of measuring time, including the definition of the beginning of the day, the designation of a place for measuring the beginning of the new day, and a common means of naming the days, months, and years. The dominant role of the Western nations in world affairs in the late 19th century led to acceptance of the Gregorian calendar and the establishment of Greenwich meantime and the International Date Line. Through the 20th century, the measuring of time has become an increasingly more precise endeavor that has been turned over to an international group of scientists and technicians.

Part of the secularization of the Common Era calendar is the separation of its starting point, the year 1 CE, and the defining event it was supposed to commemorate, the birth of Jesus Christ. In the Bible, Jesus' birth was tied to the reign of Herod the Great. Herod is now believed to have died in 4 BCE; thus Jesus' birth would have to have occurred earlier.

The replacement of the Christian designations for the calendar (AD for anno Domini, or year of Our Lord) and BC (before Christ) with CE (Common Era) and BCE (before the Common Era) has proceeded rapidly in the West through the last decade of the 20th century into the new century. It is now standard practice in universities, reference books, and political discourse. While the current calendar with all the post-Gregorian alterations has moved forward virtually unchallenged, the adoption of Common Era terminology and abbreviations has met with some vocal resistance from some conservative Christian denominations, most notably the Southern Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant church in the United States.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Southern Baptist Convention.

References

- “Controversy over the use of ‘CE/BCE’ or ‘AD/BC’ dating notation.” Ontario Consultants on Religious Tolerance. <http://www.religioustolerance.org/bce.htm>. Accessed May 1, 2009.
- Duncan, David Ewing. Calendar: Humanity's Epic Struggle to Determine a True and Accurate Year. New York: Harper Perennial, 2001.
- Richards, E. G. Mapping Time: The Calendar and Its History. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Steel, Duncan. Marking Time: The Epic Quest to Invent the Perfect Calendar. New York: Wiley, 1999.

Communalism

Religious communalism, defined as the withdrawal of deeply committed believers from mainstream culture into small interdependent enclaves in which they pursue their distinctive spiritual work in the company of like-minded faithful, is found in nearly every major world religion. Its origins are probably nearly as old as religion itself.

Hinduism is the oldest of today's major world religions, and it has had a rich communal tradition. For thousands of years Hindu seekers have gathered in ashrams, which are small communities centered, usually, on individual spiritual teachers. Ashrams are traditionally located in remote locations of low population but of natural beauty helpful to spiritual growth. The residents of an ashram receive spiritual guidance from a guru (teacher) and engage in various spiritual exercises, including yoga. Because an ashram is usually attached to a particular sage, ashrams tend to come and go over time.

Jainism, which broke off from Hinduism in the sixth century BCE, has had a strong communal component from its earliest days. The followers of the founder, known as Mahavira, initially lived communally; later lay members were admitted to the movement as well. Monks continue to be important figures in contemporary Jainism, and are known for their extreme detachment from worldly comforts. In some Jain subdivisions the monks wear no clothes as a statement of separation from all material desires.

Elderly Jains talk to a Jain Sadhavi or Nun high priest as another walks in at their ashram in New Delhi, India. An ashram is an example of religious communalism. (AP/Wide World Images)

Buddhism also has an ancient tradition of communalism. It is said that the Buddha himself established orders of monks and nuns, and the sangha, as the Buddhist religious community is known, is often regarded as the oldest ongoing communal religious institution in the world. Thousands of local temples and monasteries in all of the branches of Buddhism house local sangha members. Generally a lifelong commitment is not required of Buddhist communitarians; often young men (and to a lesser degree young women) will spend a year or two in a monastery and then return to life in the larger society.

Judaism, with its strong commitment to marriage and family, has not embraced withdrawn religious communalism as strongly as have many other religions. However, Jewish religious communities have appeared frequently over at least the last 2,000 years. Around the beginning of the Common Era a community known as Qumran was active near the Dead Sea; its members, the Essenes, lived under a monastic discipline. More recently, many of the East European Jews who immigrated to the United States to escape persecution were settled in cooperative farm colonies, and still later, in the 1960s era, many young Jews seeking warm personal community founded communal settlements known as Havurot (a plural form; the singular is Havurah).

Christianity has had a strong tradition of religious communalism since its early years. Christian monasticism is usually traced to individual ascetics who withdrew to remote locations for intense spiritual practice and who often developed communities as other seekers sought them out and settled near their exemplars.

After several centuries of such informal communalism, Christian monasticism took a new direction under the influence of Benedict of Nursia (ca. 480–547), who encouraged the development of structured communities and laid down detailed rules for monastic life. Benedictine monasticism, with thousands of local communities of men and women, has continued to be an influential part of Christian religious life, particularly in Roman Catholicism. Monks and nuns traditionally take vows of poverty, celibacy/chastity, and obedience.

More than half a millennium after the founding of Benedictine monasticism a new form of Catholic communitarianism took shape with the development of Cistercian monasticism, which emphasized a less worldly, more contemplative, and more strictly disciplined form of religious life. Various orders of Cistercians, including the well-known Trappists, continue their work in the Western world today.

Communities also have ancient roots in Eastern Orthodox Christianity. Monasteries and convents can be found throughout the Orthodox world, typically taking shape as small, localized institutions. The preeminent Orthodox monastic center (for men only) is Mount Athos, in northern Greece, which has existed for perhaps 1,000 years and has dozens of monasteries.

Protestant Christianity has not typically emphasized communitarian life, but some religious orders have developed nonetheless. The Anglican Communion has orders of men and women that resemble the Catholic communities. Smaller communal establishments can also be found among such Protestants as the Lutherans and Methodists. More important, perhaps, many communal societies only loosely (or not at all) tied to specific Protestant denominations have emerged over the last several centuries. The Brethren, a Pietist movement founded in 1708 in Germany, saw many of its members immigrate to America, where they founded several communities, including Ephrata, in Pennsylvania, which endured for nearly a century after its founding in 1732. The Shakers (officially the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing), under their leader Ann Lee, left England for America in 1774, and soon established what became a network of about 20 communal villages in the eastern United States, one of which is still active. Several additional Pietist groups that had arisen in Germany in the 18th and 19th centuries also left their homeland for the United States, founding such communal movements and enclaves as the Harmony Society, the Amana Society, and the Zoar Society. Later groups followed those precedents; the Evangelical Sisterhood of Mary, for example, founded in 1947 in Germany, has established local communities in several countries, and the Bruderhof movement, founded in 1920 also in Germany, has had some thousands of members in communities on five continents. In the 1960s era tens or hundreds of thousands of countercultural Christian believers involved in the Jesus Movement founded thousands of communes in many countries.

Islam, like its predecessor faith Judaism, has emphasized family life and has not widely promoted separatist communities. However, especially as Islam has expanded in the West, mosques have often housed informal communities of the faithful. Islamic schools are also sometimes operated on a communal basis.

Daily life in religious communities varies according to the mission of the community, the direction of a parent organization (as in the case of the Roman Catholic Church), and the commitment of individual members. Typically religious communities are self-supporting, so work is a part of the lives of most members. Members can engage in agriculture, teaching, hospital work, social service, or any number of other productive activities. Some communities, in fact, define work as a form of worship. That fact notwithstanding, specific religious observances, such as daily prayer and Communion services, are usually a part of religious communal life. Income and assets are usually shared by the entire community, which in turn provides for basic needs of members. In some communities members maintain private finances but pay into a common pool for communal needs.

Many religious communities have required their members to be celibate; that pattern is basic to the majority of monastic paths described above. Some communities, however, particularly over the last several decades, have embraced family life. That tendency appears to be growing, at least in new Christian communities, and may represent an important part of the future of religious communalism.

Timothy Miller

See also: Athos, Mount; Benedictines; Cistercians; Mahavira; Monasticism; Roman Catholic Church; United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing; Yoga.

References

- Kanter, Rosabeth Moss. Commitment and Community: Communes and Utopias in Sociological Perspective. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1972.
- Pitzer, Donald E., ed. America's Communal Utopias. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Rexroth, Kenneth. Communalism: From Its Origins to the Twentieth Century. New York: Seabury, 1974.

Community of Christ

The Community of Christ is the second largest of several denominations that lay claim to the religious work of Joseph Smith Jr. (1805–1844). Smith formally organized his church at Fayette, New York, on April 6, 1830. Following Smith's assassination at Carthage, Illinois, in 1844, members and leaders alike became divided over the question of prophetic succession.

Congregations that would become the Community of Christ began to unite in the Midwestern United States in 1850. Initially adding the prefix "New Organization" to the name of the church as it had been in 1844—Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints—by 1872 the denomination formally adopted the prefix "Reorganized." The Community of Christ was known as the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints from that time until April 6, 2001, when the new name was inaugurated. Members and leaders alike felt the new name was more descriptive of the denomination and its message.

Following formal organization in 1830, Smith and a handful of followers from New York united with a Baptist preacher named Sidney Rigdon (1793–1876) early in 1831. They moved to Rigdon's settlement at Kirtland, Ohio, where the denomination began to grow rapidly. Smith sent a colony to Independence, Missouri, which Smith named Zion.

Smith promoted a new book of scripture, called the Book of Mormon, which he said he had translated from ancient metal plates inscribed in an unknown language. The Book of Mormon addressed most of the religious questions of the time in the United States, and it attracted notable attention, both positive and negative. After the church settlements at Independence, Missouri, and at Kirtland, Ohio were destroyed, members and leaders settled in Illinois, where they set up a thriving community at Nauvoo in 1839. Mounting distrust from longtime settlers, coupled with the church's growing political and economic influence, led to the death of Smith at the hands of an angry mob in 1844.

After Smith's death, many leaders claimed the prophetic mantle, which caused the church to split into more than a dozen factions. The best known of these factions, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, emerged under the leadership of Brigham Young (1801–1877), who had been an influential church leader under Smith during the Nauvoo period. Young led his followers to Utah.

Joseph Smith's son, Joseph Smith III (1832–1914), and most of his family united with the "New Organization," where church members recognized the young Smith as the legitimate successor to his father on April 6, 1860. The denomination had its headquarters first at Nauvoo, Illinois, then Plano, Illinois, followed by Lamoni, Iowa. International headquarters were finally set up at Independence, Missouri (from where it had been driven in 1833) in 1920.

The theology of the Community of Christ would be considered moderate to liberal, similar to main-line Protestantism in the United States. Although the church has no formal creed, its understanding of God, humanity, and salvation is Protestant in nature and practice. The Bible is seen as foundational, even though the denomination acknowledges the Book of Mormon. The denomination has never made any official statement about the historicity of the Book of Mormon. The church requires no formal confession about that book.

Another book of scripture, called the Doctrine and Covenants, contains what the church considers to be inspired guidance from the presidents of the church from Joseph Smith to the present. These writings consist mostly of counsel to the church on how its members should interact with the larger community, as well as major policy statements about the practices of the denomination. For example, in 1984 then-president Wallace B. Smith, great-grandson of the founder, introduced what is now known as Section 156 of the Doctrine and Covenants. This document called the church to build the long-awaited temple on part of the original 63 acres of land in Independence, Missouri, that had been bought in 1831. This document also called for a reformation of the church's priesthood, which for the first time included the ordination of women. The ordination of women erupted into a major controversy, which split the denomination and witnessed the emergence of a small, but vocal fundamentalist movement. Some of the fundamentalists have selected new leaders, and others are simply functioning independently of the denomination as congregationally governed churches.

Community of Christ Temple, Independence, Missouri. The temple is the international headquarters for the Community of Christ (formerly the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints). (J. Gordon Melton)

Congregations of the Community of Christ are generally run by lay leaders, many of whom are ordained as ministers but receive no financial support from the church. Only a few denominational leaders are supported full-time by the church, and these are mostly headquarters staff and administrative leaders who work at international or regional levels.

The denomination is headed by a president with two counselors who are collectively known as the First Presidency. The Council of Twelve Apostles is the chief missionary and administrative body of the denomination. Members of the Twelve serve as the administrative officers of regional areas of the world. The Presiding Bishopric, comprised of the presiding bishop and two counselors, oversees denominational finances and assets. Seven Quorums of Seventy, almost all of whom are bivocational ministers, serve in local areas as leaders of missionary and evangelistic work.

The denomination has a large membership in the United States and Canada, but just over 50 percent of total membership is located in other countries. As of December 2008, the denomination has congregations in more than 50 countries, with a total membership numbering about 250,000.

The international headquarters at Independence, Missouri (near Kansas City), is the focus of church administration, leadership education, and publishing. The church runs Herald Publishing House, which produces monthly magazines, church literature, and curriculum. The headquarters complex consists of the Auditorium, where regular legislative assemblies are held, and the Temple, which was dedicated in 1994. Both buildings house church offices and contain libraries, museums, theaters, sanctuaries for worship and meditation, and classrooms.

Community of Christ
1001 West Walnut
Independence, MO 64050–3562
<http://www.cofchrist.org>

Steven L. Shields

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Smith, Joseph, Jr.

References

- Bolton, Andrew, and Jane Gardner, eds. The Sacraments: Symbol, Meaning and Discipleship. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 2005.
- Scherer, Mark A. The Journey of a People. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 2009.
- Seekers and Disciples*. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 2001.
- Understanding the Way*. Independence, MO: Herald Publishing House, 2003.

Community of Protestant Churches in Europe

The Community of Protestant Churches in Europe, more informally known as the Leuenberg Church Fellowship, is an alliance of more than 100 Protestant Christian denominational bodies that have agreed that they have a shared understanding on a number of key points of Christian belief. Based upon that understanding, they can share “complete pulpit and table fellowship,” meaning that ministers of any group in the fellowship may be allowed to preach in the congregations of the other member churches and that all members recognize and may receive the sacraments of the other member churches. The agreement grew out of conversations initiated by the Lutheran and Reformed churches after World War II. It later came to include the Waldensian Church (Italy) and the Church of the Czech Brethren (Czechoslovakia).

The Leuenberg Church Fellowship was formed in 1973, when a lengthy text detailing the points upon which agreement had been reached was published. The agreement affirms the Christian faith centered in the affirmation of the Triune God and salvation in Jesus Christ. The heart of the agreement, however, concerned the sacraments, the differing understandings of which had been a major obstacle dividing Lutheran and Reformed churches. In two crucial paragraphs, the agreement affirmed the following:

Baptism: Baptism is administered in the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit with water. In Baptism Jesus Christ irrevocably receives man, fallen prey to sin and death, into his fellowship of salvation so that he may become a new creature. In the power of his Holy Spirit he calls him into his community and to a new life of faith, to daily repentance and discipleship.

The Lord’s Supper: In the Lord’s Supper the risen Jesus Christ imparts himself in his body and blood, given up for all, through his word of promise with bread and wine. He thereby grants us forgiveness of sins and sets us free for a new life of faith. He enables us to experience anew that we are members of his body. He strengthens us for service to all men. When we celebrate the Lord’s Supper we proclaim the death of Christ through which God has reconciled the world with himself. We proclaim the presence of the risen Lord in our midst. Rejoicing that the Lord has come to us we await his future coming in glory.

This agreement sidestepped 16th-century disagreements over the nature of the sacraments and in other places discounted a variety of pronouncements issued by the Reformation churches on other Protestant churches. Following the promulgation of the agreement, churches across Europe have signed it and joined the fellowship. The membership has extended beyond the Lutheran and Reformed traditions and earlier union churches formed by the merger of Lutheran and Reformed churches to include a number of Methodist churches in Europe. Several Lutheran churches in Argentina have also signed the agreement. Most of the member churches are also members of the World Council of Churches.

Although the Leuenberg Agreement has been implemented primarily in Europe, it has had an effect on church relations globally. For example, it was instrumental in bringing the Reformed and Presbyterian churches in Ethiopia into the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus, which had been formed by the previous merger of Lutheran missions in that country. Notable nonparticipants in the fellowship are the Baptist churches and the member churches of the worldwide Anglican Communion.

In 2009 the Community of Protestant Churches in Europe reported 105 member churches of which 95 have formally signed the Leuenberg Agreement. The seven Methodist churches in Europe joined it on the basis of a “Joint Declaration of Church Fellowship.” With the exception of five South American Protestant churches which were created by European immigrants and the United Methodist Church, all of the churches are headquartered in Europe.

Community of Protestant Churches in Europe
Leuenberg Church Fellowship
Severin-Schreiber-Gasse 3
1180 Vienna
Austria
<http://www.leuenberg.net/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus; Lutheranism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; United Methodist Church; Waldensian Church; World Council of Churches.

References:

Friedrich, Martin, Hans Jürgen Luibl, and Christine-Ruth Müller, eds. Theology for Europe: Perspectives

for Churches in Europe. Frankfurt a.M.: Lembeck Verlag, 2006.

Leuenberg Documents. Nos. 1-11. Frankfurt a.M.: Lembeck Verlag, 1998–.

■ Comoros

Officially known as the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros (République Fédérale et Islamique des Comoros), Comoros comprises an island group in the Indian Ocean north of Madagascar and off the coast of Mozambique. Some 732,000 people inhabit the 838 square miles of land.

The islands were originally settled in the fifth century CE by Indonesians. They lived a rather isolated existence until they were joined by Muslims in the 12th century. By the 14th century the Zandj culture of East Africa (and Islam) had been established. The Comoros remained a prosperous trading center, though briefly seized by the Portuguese in the 16th century. Through the centuries since the Portuguese first arrived, a number of Africans, mostly Bantu, came to the islands as workers.

The French occupied the island of Mayotte, a first step to taking control of the entire Comoros. They remained in control until 1975. Even before the results of the 1974 plebiscite, in which the overwhelming majority of the people voted for independence, the local government proclaimed its autonomy. The French decided to separate Mayotte, on which they had air and naval bases, from the rest of the Comoros, and the status of that island remains in dispute.

Sunni Islam of the Shafite School of Islam dominates the life of the Comoros. There is a mosque for every 500 inhabitants.

Christianity was introduced by the Portuguese in 1517 and reintroduced by the French. There are, however, only a few thousand members in a population of more than half a million. The Africa Inland Mission, an evangelical missionary organization, initiated work in 1975, but its missionaries were expelled by the government in 1978. In the same way, work begun by the Seventh-day Adventist Church was terminated.

J. Gordon Melton

Men pray at a mosque on March 5, 2008, in Moroni, the capital of the Union of Comoros. Islam is the majority religion in the Comoros. (AFP/Getty Images)

COMOROS

Comoros

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	228,000	760,000	98.3	2.72	1,014,000	1,351,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,000	7,500	1.0	2.72	9,000	9,500
Christians	1,500	3,800	0.5	2.72	5,500	7,400
Roman Catholics	1,100	1,700	0.2	1.30	2,200	2,600
Protestants	330	1,200	0.1	2.84	1,800	2,500
Independents	30	800	0.1	6.16	1,200	1,800
Agnostics	0	980	0.1	2.72	1,600	2,600
Baha'is	300	650	0.1	2.74	800	1,500
Atheists	0	80	0.0	2.53	140	200
Total population	232,000	773,000	100.0	2.72	1,031,000	1,372,000

See also: Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam.

References

- Adihami, S. H. M. L'Islam aux Comores. Port Louis, Ile Maurice, Océan Indien: New Print, 1980.
- Ferrand, G. Les Musulmans à Madagascar et aux Iles Comores. 3 vols. Paris: E. Leroux, 1981–1992.
- Knight, Cassie. Brazzaville Charms: Magic and Rebellion in the Republic of Congo. London: Frances Lincoln, 2007.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
- Ottenheimer, Martin. Historical Dictionary of the Comoro Islands. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1994.

Companions of the Prophet

The term “Companions of the Prophet” refers to those individuals who chose to join the prophet Muhammad (d. 632) following his abandonment of Mecca in 622 (the Hijra) and came together in Medina to create the first Muslim community, and later died still in the faith. The Hijra event is used as the starting point of the Muslim calendar, and it led directly to the formal founding of the community. The relatively small group who participated is highly esteemed by Sunni Muslims in general for the role it played in initially founding its faith, but is particularly esteemed for its effort to preserve the Koran and maintain the community in the years immediately after Muhammad’s death. The Companions’ activity came, in large part, to define the Sunna, the precedents used by Islamic jurists to create Islamic law. The Hadith, the Islamic book of tales about Muhammad, is based upon stories recounting incidents witnessed by the Companions and usually lists the name of one or more of the Companions among the people who transmitted the story that would eventually be written down.

The Companions are also considered exemplars of authentic Islamic practice, and most were remembered for their devotion, and several for their asceticism. A few were noted for their generosity, a few others for the life of sin they had left behind. Several knew Muhammad well enough to become legal experts. Among the Companions were the first four caliphs, often called the “rightly guided caliphs,” though the reigns of several were highly conflicted and resulted in their untimely death; some like the Ethiopian Bilal actually accompanied Muhammad on the Hijra. Some residents of Medina, the Ansars, joined the emigrants from Mecca and fought in the early battles through which the Muslim community established itself (Badr and Uhud). There was also the People of the Bench, a small group of poor but pious Muslims who were known to gather at the bench in the Medina mosque. This latter group is especially remembered in Sufi traditions.

There were women among the Companions, including most of Muhammad’s wives, such as Aisha, Umm Salamah, and Khadijah ul-Kubra, and his daughter Fatima. His wife Hafsa was for a time entrusted with the original handwritten copy of the Koran.

The Shia Muslim community has a somewhat different view of the Companions. It is their belief that Ali ibn Abi Talib, Muhammad's son-in-law, should have been named his successor. They see many of the Companions (including Muhammad's wife Aisha and the early caliphs Abu Bakr and Umar) as ones who united to block the rise of Ali. Thus they are seen as corrupting forces to be denigrated rather than revered. As the Shia community united around the descendants of Ali, opinion on his role among the Companions remains a vital difference between the Sunni and Shia communities.

See also: Ali ibn Abi Talib; Bilal; Mecca; Medina; Muhammad; Shia Islam.

References

- Arjomand, Said Amir, and Ella Landau-Tasseron. The History of Al-Tabari: Biographies of the Prophet's Companions and Their Successors. SUNY Series in Near Eastern Studies, vol. 39. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Hamid, Abdu Wahid. Companions of the Prophet. 2 vols. Austin, TX: Muslim Education and Literary Services, 1998.
- Jabali, Fuad. The Companions of the Prophet: A Study of Geographical Distribution and Political Alignments. Leiden: Brill, 2003.
- Madelung, Wilfred. The Succession to Muhammad. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Watt, William Montgomery. Muhammad at Medina. Oxford: Oxford University Press 1956.

Conference of European Churches

The Conference of European Churches (CEC) was among the spectrum of organizations that emerged from the ashes of World War II and the subsequent tensions of the Cold War. Through the 1950s a growing number of issues divided the countries of Western Europe and the United States from the Soviet Union and the countries of the Warsaw Pact. Following the formation of the World Council of Churches in 1948, European Christian leaders began to envision the possibility of regular contact between churches representing differing economic/political systems from across the political boundaries, especially the Iron Curtain.

Following informal preparatory meeting, an initial organizing conference was held at Nyborg, Denmark, in 1959. A subsequent conference at which the constitution was adopted was held aboard a ship in the Baltic Sea to avoid the many visa problems posed by such an international gathering at the time. Because of the unusual international situation in which it was born, the new organization set about the task of overcoming the divides that separated people from the political divides of the next generation to the more traditional divides between older and younger generation, men and women, and the poor and rich. It has seen the overcoming of divisions between Christians in various faith communions as a primary symbol of its effort.

In the decades prior to the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, the churches of Western Europe, which operated with a much higher degree of freedom than those in the east, formed the European Ecumenical Commission on Church and Society. In 1989, that commission was merged into the Conference of European Churches and continues as the CEC Church and Society Commission.

The CEC meets every six years in an assembly. The assembly elects a 40-member central committee that guides the work between assemblies. The various commissions and committees of the conference now work on a broad spectrum of social issues in the increasingly secularized Europe. In 2009, the Conference reported 126 Orthodox, Protestant, Anglican, and Old Catholic churches along with 43 associated organizations, with at least one member from each of the countries on the European continent. It maintains three offices, including one in the world council headquarters building in Geneva.

CEC Office in Geneva:
PO Box 2100
150, route de Ferney
CH-1211 Geneva 2
Switzerland

CEC Office in Brussels: Ecumenical Centre

rue Joseph II, 174
BE-1000 Brussels
Belgium

CEC Office in Strasbourg:
Church & Society Commission
8, rue du Fossé des Treize
FR-67000 Strasbourg
France

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Confucianism

“Confucianism” is the Western-language name for a religious/philosophical tradition that was never, in East Asia, named after a founder. The Western appellation is based on the name coined by 17th-century Jesuit missionaries in China for Kong Qiu (551–479 BCE), a Chinese teacher of literate young men who generally referred to him as Kongzi (Master Kong), and who in a very few later texts was also called Kongfuzi (a more honorific form of Master Kong). It was this last name that the Jesuits Latinized into “Confucius,” which in turn gave rise to “Confucianism” in the West.

In China, the tradition of thought and practice associated with Master Kong was known as the “teachings of the Ru” (Rujiao). “Ru” literally meant “refined” or “soft,” but came to refer to “scholars,” especially those versed in the ritual, music, poetry, and history associated with the royal aristocracy of the Zhou dynasty (1045–221 BCE). The Ru were experts in the textual traditions that were regarded as blueprints for a benevolent government and humane society, based on the models provided by the sagely founders of the Zhou dynasty. These texts came to be known as the Five Classics or Scriptures (jing)—originally six before the Scripture of Music was lost—the earliest religious canon in Chinese history. This canon gradually expanded until, by the Song dynasty (960–1279), it reached its final form of Thirteen Scriptures.

Confucius was an itinerant teacher who regarded himself as merely a transmitter of these more ancient teachings, not a creator of a new tradition. But in fact he was an innovator, being largely responsible for injecting ethics into the religion of the Zhou literate elite. Until his time, the religious practices of the aristocracy had centered on ritual sacrifice to ancestral and natural spirits and divination. Confucius redirected attention to the human, social realm of family life, community life, and government—the beginnings of “Confucian Humanism.” But this Humanism was a religious Humanism, because it was grounded in the belief in “heaven” (tian), a semi-personalistic but mostly naturalistic absolute reality that engendered “virtue” or “moral power” (de) in human beings.

The best source for what Confucius actually taught is a collection of his sayings, brief conversations, and statements about him called the Lunyu (discussions and sayings), conventionally translated into English as the Analects. It is the best source but not exactly a good source, for it was compiled by his students after his death, with additions continuing for perhaps as long as 200 years. Nevertheless, throughout most of Chinese history it has been regarded as an accurate representation of the Master’s thought and, to some extent, his practice. “Practice” here means, primarily, selected examples of his comportment in daily life: how he treated other people, how he listened to music, how he ate, how he dressed, and the like.

This type of daily activity was included by Confucius in his understanding of “ritual” (li), a term that originally had referred more specifically to sacrificial ritual. Confucius broadened its meaning to include every human activity, which should be conducted, he said, with the same sense of reverence that one should have when sacrificing to gods or ancestors. Ritual so understood was the uniquely human way of expressing the fact that human beings are fundamentally social beings. Our social relationships are constitutive of who and what we are: we are sons or daughters, brothers or sisters, fathers or mothers, and so on. These relationships are primary characteristics of human beings, not secondary. What distinguishes the “noble person” (junzi) from the “petty person” (xiaoren) is an understanding of these basic facts and a dedication to strive toward perfecting one's social nature. That perfection—probably not achievable but important as a goal nonetheless—was called by Confucius “humaneness” or “humanity” (ren)—a variant of the word for person or human (also pronounced ren). Thus for Confucius, to be authentically human is to be humane; this is the proper goal of human life and what makes it meaningful. (Being a junzi is not the goal; the junzi is one dedicated to achieving the goal.) Without ren, ritual (li)—no matter how perfectly performed—is meaningless (Analects 3:3). But ritual is necessary in order to achieve ren. So ren is the necessary inner dimension of li, and li is the necessary outward expression of ren.

A Confucian temple, Melacca, Malaysia. With the spread of Confucianism, Confucian temples have been built throughout East Asia. (J. Gordon Melton)

The reason that reverence is appropriate to the process of transforming oneself into a humane person is that “Heaven produced the virtue [de] in me” (Analects 7:21 or 7:22, depending on the edition), and heaven is the Confucian symbol of the ultimate. One's inherent virtue is one's connection with something that transcends the mundane world and is therefore sacred. Yet the fact that such virtue is inherent in human nature means that the sacred is, in a sense, immanent in the human world; the potential or power enabling human beings to transcend their given conditions is immanent. Another connection with the sacred in Confucian thought is “learning” (xue), which for Confucius primarily meant learning from the wisdom of the “sages” (shengren) who produced the Classics or Scriptures (jing). The Confucian Classics were thought to be the records of the divine sages who created some of the fundamental features of Chinese culture (in the case of the Yijing) and the sage-kings who founded the Zhou dynasty, whose first 300 or 400 years were thought to have been a glorious golden age of peace and benevolent government. Confucius regarded these sages as beyond the reach of ordinary humans, beyond even the achievement of perfect humaneness. They were divine or semi-divine, as is suggested by the word we translate as sage, shengren, which is also used for “saint.” Similarly, the so-called classics were jing, the same word used later to translate the word sutra when Buddhism entered China from India. And the two words together, sheng jing, are in fact the Chinese translation of “Holy Bible.” This is why “scripture” is a better translation of jing than “classic.” So the Confucian understanding of learning is also a connection with the sacred. In addition to these texts, learning encompassed the arts, such as poetry and music.

All of this together—wen or literate culture—was part of the Confucian Way (dao). The goal of making the Way prevail encompassed not only the self-perfection of the junzi aimed at humaneness but also the perfection of society through benevolent government. Service in government was the highest calling for the Confucian junzi. Confucius apparently served in several minor positions, but never achieved his personal goal of being an advisor to a king. The next best position for him was to be a professional teacher, and this is how he was honored throughout later Chinese history, as the “First Teacher,” the “patron saint” of the teaching profession. His birthday, conventionally taken to be September 28, has traditionally been celebrated as Teacher’s Day in both the People’s Republic of China and the Republic of China on Taiwan.

The teachings of Confucius were spread by his disciples, in several different lineages and variations. The next great Confucian thinker was Meng Ke, called Mengzi (Master Meng) in Chinese and Mencius (another Latinized construction) in English. His dates are less certain than those of Confucius, but he lived in the fourth century BCE and perhaps a little into the third. While we know Confucius (based on the Analects) as a teacher, Mencius comes down to us, through the book bearing his name, as a philosopher who presents and defends his ideas through rational argumentation. He is best known for his argument that human nature (renxing) is inherently good—a claim that can be found implicitly but not explicitly in the teachings of Confucius. What he means by this, Mencius says, is that humans are born with the potential to achieve the virtues of humaneness (ren), rightness (yi), ritual propriety (li), and wisdom (zhi). That potential is innate in the form of four specific, natural feelings, such as the feeling of commiseration, which can be consciously cultivated into the fully developed virtue of humaneness. It is these concrete, naturally occurring feelings that constitute the inherent goodness of human nature. This is a further development of Confucius’s claim that “Heaven produced the virtue in me.” It is restated by another text from the Mencian school, the Zhongyong (The Mean in Practice), which begins with the line, “What Heaven ordains/confers [tian ming] is called human nature.” Mencius differed from Confucius in regarding sagehood as being within the realm of human possibility—in effect redefining sagehood as the theoretically achievable goal of humaneness.

The last great Confucian thinker from the “classical” period was Xun Qing or Xunzi (Master Xun), who lived in the third century BCE. He is primarily known for his sharp criticism of Mencius’s theory of the goodness of human nature. He claimed, in fact, that human nature is fundamentally evil, since if left unchecked people are naturally selfish and aggressive. He did say, though, that people can become good, and in fact agreed with Mencius that any person is theoretically capable of becoming a sage. What is required for our natural, evil inclinations to be transformed into goodness is learning, especially the learning of ritual propriety. So on the question of human perfectibility Mencius and Xunzi agree. Their disagreement actually hinges on different concepts of what the “nature” (xing) of a thing is. For Mencius it is the unique characteristic that differentiates one class of things from another. Since only humans are capable of cultivating the four primary virtues, that is what distinguishes us from other animals, and so that is our nature. For Xunzi, the nature of a thing is what appears naturally or spontaneously, without external influence or training. Since education is necessary for human goodness to be expressed, that goodness cannot constitute our nature. Another way Xunzi differs from both Confucius and Mencius is in his understanding of heaven (tian). For Confucius and Mencius, heaven has a moral will, expressed as the mandate of heaven (tian ming). This was originally a doctrine of political legitimation attributed to one of the founders of the Zhou dynasty in the 11th century BCE, the duke of Zhou. The doctrine originally stated that heaven confers the authority to rule on a family (dynasty) based on its virtue, and removes that authority when their virtue declines. Thus the Zhou, who conquered the previous ruling dynasty, the Shang, through military means, “deserved” the right to rule because of their virtue and the later Shang rulers’ debauchery. Beginning with Confucius, tian ming was extended to mean “what heaven ordains,” which was assumed to be good. Xunzi, however, said that heaven is merely “the heavens” in a naturalistic sense, which do not respond in any way to human goodness or evil—a position of religious skepticism. This and his theory that human nature is evil (taken at face value) eventually resulted in Xunzi being excluded from the “orthodox” interpretation of the Confucian tradition. Mencius, with his idea of the naturalness of human virtue and its corollary, the idea that morality is inherent in the natural world, came to represent the main line of Confucian thought.

Until the second century BCE Confucianism was just one of several influential schools of thought, which also included classical Daoist thought, Legalism, and the School of Mozi (fifth century BCE). During the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE), Emperor Wudi (r. 140–87 BCE) reorganized his government according to the subjects of the Five Classics (documents, history, ritual, poetry, and divination) and established a school for training government officials in those subjects. This was the first institutionalization of Confucianism, making it the official ideology of the Han government. Since the Ru who were the acknowledged experts in these fields were also followers of Confucius, his ideas came as part of the package. The advisor who influenced Han Wudi to support Confucianism was Dong Zhongshu (179–104 BCE), an accomplished scholar who integrated the naturalistic theories of yin and yang and the Five Phases (wu xing) into Confucian thought. Although imperial support of Confucianism rose and fell over the centuries, the official status of Confucianism largely remained a constant until the last dynasty (the Qing) fell in 1911.

During the period of disunity that followed the fall of the Han in 220 CE, most of the work done by Confucian scholars was literary and commentarial, with little added to the pool of Confucian ideas. Buddhism, which had entered China in the first century CE, and the Daoist religion, which began in the second century CE, attracted the most original thinkers during this period. (Daoism as a full-fledged religion is only loosely connected with the classical texts, such as Laozi or Daodejing and Zhuangzi, which are commonly regarded as Daoist.) China was reunited by the Sui dynasty (589–618). During the succeeding Tang dynasty (618–906) the first stirrings of a Confucian revival began, most notably with Han Yu (768–824), who was strongly opposed to Daoism and argued that Buddhism was antithetical to the essence of Chinese culture.

The Confucian revival came into its own during the Song dynasty (960–1279), when there were several new schools of thought that collectively came to be known in the West as “neo-Confucianism” (there were also “conventional Confucians” during the Song who should not be included in this category). Of these, the one that emerged dominant from the 13th century on was the Cheng-Zhu School, named after Cheng Yi (1033–1107) and Zhu Xi (1130–1200). Cheng Yi and his brother, Cheng Hao (1032–1085), developed a metaphysical terminology in which the earlier Confucian-Mencian concerns with human virtue, human nature, learning, and government could be embedded in a larger philosophical framework. The two key terms were li (“principle” or “order”—a different word from the li that means “ritual”) and qi (the “psycho-physical stuff” of which all existing things—including mind and spirit—are composed). Zhu Xi, a few generations after the Cheng brothers, combined their ideas with those of several of their contemporaries, constructing a coherent system that dominated Chinese intellectual life for the next 700 years, and is still being actively studied and developed by scholars worldwide. Zhu Xi also developed an educational curriculum covering all levels of schooling and beyond. This included a book called Family Rituals (Jia li), which became very popular in China, was reprinted throughout the ensuing centuries in many editions, and was regarded as the standard to strive for in the practices of ancestor worship and life-cycle rituals. Another influential school of neo-Confucian thought was developed in the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) by Wang Shouren (1472–1529), commonly called Wang Yangming, and his followers. Drawing in part on the ideas of a contemporary of Zhu Xi's, Lu Jiuyuan (1139–1193), commonly called Lu Xiangshan, and therefore called the Lu-Wang School, this approach relied more on moral intuition than the Cheng-Zhu School, which emphasized the importance of intellectual inquiry in pursuit of the Way.

The teachings of the Cheng-Zhu School, beginning in 1313 under the Mongol Yuan dynasty (1279–1368), were the official basis of the civil service examination system through which government officials were selected until 1905. In the 19th century there was an intellectual movement known as kaozheng (examination and verification, or “evidential research”), which critically analyzed the texts on which the Cheng-Zhu School based its teachings and promoted a return to more original sources, or “Han learning.” At the very end of the 19th century there also began what some have called a “third wave” of Confucianism (after classical and neo-). These scholars incorporated Buddhist and Western learning into a new Confucian synthesis. As of the beginning of the 21st century the third generation of these “new Confucians” are the elder generation of Chinese and Chinese-American scholars, who have trained a large contingent of younger scholars, most of whom are Chinese, Korean, Japanese, Chinese American, and Euro-American. This last generation, for the most part, are less apt to be considered “Confucians” themselves; they are generally seen as scholars of Confucianism. However, since “Ru” really means “scholar,” the distinction is not a sharp one. Due largely to the influence of the third and fourth generations of Confucian scholars, the Confucian tradition is increasingly being taken seriously as a significant contributor to the cross-cultural dialogue of religions and to comparative philosophy.

There is not a consensus on the question of the religious nature of Confucianism, although scholars in the field of religious studies generally understand it as a religious tradition. The problem is partly a semantic one and partly due to the particular character of Confucian thought and practice. One semantic question concerns the reifying connotations of speaking of it as “a religion,” given that it is not, at least since the demise of the imperial Chinese examination system and court rituals, an institutionalized religion. But neither is Chinese “popular religion” institutionalized, yet no one denies that it is religious; it simply is not referred to as “a religion.” Confucianism can indeed be understood as an example of “diffused religion” (a term coined by the sociologist C. K. Yang in the early 1960s), which is religion that is practiced in largely secular social settings. The settings for Confucian practice are the family, the community (interpersonal relations), and, until the end of the last dynasty, the state (government).

Another semantic problem involves the Sino-Japanese words for “religion,” zongjiao in Chinese and shūkyō in Japanese, which are different pronunciations of the same Chinese characters (kanji in Japanese). This word was coined in the late 19th century by Japanese translators of treaties and Western-language texts and was later adopted by the Chinese. These translators felt that Christianity was a different sort of thing than the various Chinese and Japanese “teachings” (jiao / kyō), such as Buddhism and Daoism, and “ways” (dao / dō or tō), such as Shintō. Christianity demanded exclusive allegiance, while Buddhism, Daoism, and Shintō could be mixed and matched by individuals unproblematically. And Christianity strongly emphasized belief in particular doctrines, while the East Asian traditions emphasized action more than belief. Zongjiao / shūkyō fit the bill, because zong / shū means “sect” and implies exclusive membership, and jiao / kyō (“teaching”) implies doctrine. Zongjiao / shūkyō therefore has connotations of a foreign, exclusivistic, doctrinal religion. When Chinese or Japanese people, then, say that Confucianism is not a “religion,” they of course are saying that it is not a zongjiao / shūkyō—which is correct if we understand that word as unpacked above. But when asked whether it is a jiao, like Daojiao (Daoism) or Fojiao (Buddhism), they are likely to agree, because in Chinese it is in fact called Rujiao.

Joseph A. Adler

See also: Buddhism; Christianity; Confucius; Confucius's Birthday; Indonesia, Confucianism in; Mencius; Shinto.

References

- Chan, Wing-tsit, trans. and comp. A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1963.
- Dawson, Raymond, trans. Confucius: The Analects. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Gardner, Daniel K., trans. The Four Books: The Basic Teachings of the Later Confucian Tradition. Indianapolis, IN: Hackett Publishing Co., 2007.
- Jones, David, ed. Confucius Now: Contemporary Encounters with the Analects. Chicago: Open Court, 2008.
- Lau, D. C., trans. Mencius. Rev. ed. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 2003.
- Nylan, Michael. The Five “Confucian” Classics. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Rosemont, Henry, Jr., and Roger T. Ames, trans. The Chinese Classic of Family Reverence: A Philosophical Translation of the Xiaojing. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2009.
- Tu Weiming and Mary Evelyn Tucker, eds. Confucian Spirituality. 2 vols. New York: Crossroad Publishing, 2003–2004.
- Tucker, Mary Evelyn, and John Berthrong, eds. Confucianism and Ecology: The Interrelation of Heaven, Earth, and Humans. Cambridge: Harvard University Center for the Study of World Religions, 1998.
- Yao, Xinzhong. An Introduction to Confucianism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Confucius

551 BCE–479 BCE

The man we call Confucius was the founder of a religio-philosophical tradition that became almost synonymous with Chinese culture. From the second century BCE to the beginning of the 20th century “Confucianism” (Rujiao, literally “the teaching of the scholars”) was the official ideology of the Chinese imperial government and the reigning philosophy of education. As such, its values eventually permeated all levels of Chinese society. Confucius thereby became a cultural icon and a symbol for both the glories and the failures of traditional Chinese culture.

Statue of the Chinese philosopher Confucius. Confucianism has had a profound impact on Chinese thought and ethics. (Espion/Dreamstime.com)

The year of Confucius’s birth is uncertain but is traditionally given as 551 BCE. The Kong family into which he was born was, according to his first biographer, Sima Qian (ca. 145–86 BCE), formerly aristocratic but had been relatively impoverished for generations. He lived during a period of political disunion and constant warfare when the former dukedoms of the Zhou dynasty were vying for power, a situation that lasted until the reunification of China under the Qin state in 221 BCE. Confucius’s given name was Kong Qiu, his “courtesy name” was Kong Zhongni, and he is most commonly referred to in the Chinese literature as Kongzi (Master Kong). “Confucius,” coined by 17th-century Jesuit missionaries in China, is a Latinized form of Kongfuzi, a more honorific form of Master Kong. He had a son who died before he did, and a grandson, Kong Ji (483–402 BCE, also known as Zisi), who was an important figure in the later dissemination of Confucius's teachings.

Until his early fifties Confucius held a series of minor government positions in his home state of Lu, where he gained a reputation as an expert in court ritual and decorum (li) and had a small coterie of disciples or protégés. In 497 BCE, after one of the disciples, Zi Lu, opposed three powerful families for usurping the proper rulership of the duke of Lu, he and Confucius left Lu along with a few other disciples. Confucius became an itinerant teacher, traveling from state to state seeking a position as advisor to a ruler, a goal he never achieved. Around 484 he returned to Lu, having made something of a name for himself as a teacher of young men wishing to work in government. A few of his students did achieve responsible positions. Confucius lived the remaining five years of his life in Lu, where he died in 479 BCE.

After his death, Confucius's disciples began to record what they remembered of his sayings and conversations, as well as their recollections of his personal behavior. This record came to be known as the Lunyu (Discussions and Sayings), or Analects. Followers added to it for, according to some scholars, more than 200 years. The later chapters are therefore unreliable as sources of what Confucius actually taught, although the entire book, comprising 20 chapters, has traditionally been considered an authentic record of his teachings.

By the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) Confucius had become a sort of patron saint of the teaching profession. Sacrifices were made to him, beginning in his home town of Qufu, Shandong Province, and later in state-supported Confucian temples. Confucius's teachings were focused on restoring the ritual propriety that he believed had prevailed under the early rulers of the Zhou dynasty (ca. 1045–221 BCE). His moral theories, based on a relational understanding of human nature, became the basis for a comprehensive religious and philosophical worldview accepted by the majority of Chinese literati or intellectuals and many in Korea and Japan.

During the Chinese Cultural Revolution (1966–1976) Confucius was held responsible for all that had gone wrong in traditional Chinese culture, such as hierarchical age and sex discrimination. Since the 1980s his image has been gradually rehabilitated, to the point where the People's Republic of China in the 21st century is supporting Confucius Institutes around the world to spread the teaching of Chinese language and culture. Critics say, however, that the government's motivation is to use Confucius as he was used since the Han dynasty, to support social order and the status quo. Modern scholars have attempted to separate out this "politicized Confucianism" from the original teachings of Master Kong and his later followers.

Joseph A. Adler

See also: Confucianism; Indonesia, Confucianism in.

References

- Brooks, E. Bruce, and A. Taeko Brooks. The Original Analects: Sayings of Confucius and His Successors. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Chin, Annping. Confucius: A Life of Thought and Politics. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008.
- Sima Qian. Shiji [Historical Record], 10 vols. Beijing: Zhonghua Shuju, 1959. Chapter 47.
- Slingerland, Edward, trans. Confucius: Analects, with Selections from Traditional Commentaries. Indianapolis, IN: Hackett Publishing Co., 2003.

Confucius's Birthday

Confucius (aka Kǒng Fūzǒ or K'ung-fu-tzu), a sixth-century BCE thinker, was possibly the most influential philosopher/ethicist in China's history. His thought also deeply influenced the neighboring countries of Korea, Japan, and Vietnam and has been spread farther through the modern Chinese diaspora.

Much of his thought revolved around the idea of perfecting society by having its citizens engage in right behavior, which included the avoidance of extreme actions and emotions, being considerate to others, respecting family, and venerating one's ancestors. He found the key to building the happy society in correctly ordering five key relationships, those between ruler and subject, older brother and younger brother, father and son, husband and wife, and two friends.

Confucius's thought permeated all of Chinese society, at times becoming an independent system of thought that competed head on with rival religious thought worlds, especially Buddhism, and at times being integrated into other existing systems, especially the world of indigenous Chinese religions. He is honored in China in both Confucian temples and the circulation of his ideas throughout the schools and within the government.

Confucius was believed to have been born on the 27th day of the 8th month of the Chinese lunar calendar, placing his birth date somewhere between the last days of September and the first days of November on the Common Era calendar. That date is retained throughout much of the Chinese diaspora. In the Republic of China, Confucius's birthday is now celebrated on September 28, and heralded as National Teacher's Day, as Confucius is seen as the great teacher. Secularized Chinese emphasize the citizen's right to learning and knowledge.

The most elaborate celebration occurs at the Confucius Temple in Qufu, Shandong, where Confucius was born. Festivities include impressive ceremonies and rituals and much music and dance. In celebrations that begin at four o'clock in the morning practitioners will dress in traditional costumes and perform dances accompanied by ancient instruments. The event is also a time to recall the prominent ideas of Confucius, especially in celebrations organized among young students.

Incidentally, Teacher's Day had been created in China in the 1930s as an effort to build support for and raise the status of teachers. It was originally celebrated in June and then moved to coincide with Confucius's birthday in 1939. In 1951, the People's Republic moved Teacher's Day to May 1, where it was submerged in the annual Communist May Day celebrations. Confucianism was suppressed as anti-modern and only revived in the 1980s, after the Cultural Revolution. As Teacher's Day gained new prominence and Confucius was again recognized as a positive influence on the country, the two themes were again merged.

Outside of the People's Republic, events commemorating Confucius most often occur on the lunar calendar—hence are on different days every year of the Common Era calendar. In countries like Korea, where Confucian thought still has much support, the events emphasize ceremony and ritual. Through the Chinese diaspora, music and dance predominate.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Common Era Calendar; Confucianism; Confucius.

References

- Chin, Annping. The Authentic Confucius: A Life of Thought and Politics. New York: Scribner, 2007.
- Fingarette, Herbert. Confucius: The Secular as Sacred. Religious Traditions of the World Series. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press, 1998.
- Johnston, Reginald Fleming. Confucianism and Modern China. Vancouver, BC: Soul Care Publishing, 2008.

■ Congo (Brazzaville), Republic of the

The present Republic of the Congo is located north of the Congo River (as opposed to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, formerly Zaire, located south and east of the river). To the north and west it is bordered by the Central African Republic, Cameroon, and Gabon. It has 106 miles of coastline on the Atlantic Ocean. The capital, Brazzaville, is located just across the Congo River from Kinshasa, the capital of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Its 132,000 square miles of territory is inhabited by 3.9 million people (2008).

The Congo was originally settled by the San people (often referred to as Bushmen) and Pygmies, who were pushed aside by Bantu people, who easily came into control of the region in the first millennium CE. By the 14th century there were a variety of Bantu states in Central Africa, the Luango ruling over the Congo and much of neighboring Gabon. The Luango state was subservient to and paid tribute to the Manicongo state, centered farther south in what is now Angola and the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The Portuguese visited the Atlantic coast in the 1490s and early in the next century established a profitable slave trade. Meanwhile, in the 16th century, the Luango state rose in strength and became increasingly autonomous. Eventually it replaced the Manicongo as the dominant nation in the region. As the Portuguese worked to establish their power in Angola, the Luango resisted any attempt at colonization north of the Congo River, although they continued to cooperate with the slave traders.

REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

Late in the 19th century, rubber and palm oil became the main export items from the Congo, and the French, desiring control of the market, moved in and set up a colony. Over the next generation, two-thirds of the Native population were killed in the attempt to pacify the country. The brutality of the French regime led to a series of religious independence movements in the decades prior to World War II.

After World War II, Socialism came to the fore. Three years after independence (achieved in 1960), a Socialist government came into power and created a single-party system. A series of governments have followed. In 1992, a new Constitution was adopted that called for a president and a bicameral legislature. The new government was overthrown in 1997 by former Marxist ruler Denis Sassou Nguesso in a military coup. At the beginning of the new century, Nguesso remains president, and democratic rule has not returned.

Christianity was introduced into the Congo in 1491, when a Portuguese missionary expedition began an attempt to reach the people of the Congo River valley. Although highly successful to the south, the mission had little success in the area of the present-day Republic of the Congo. However, with the coming of the French, the Holy Ghost Fathers launched a new mission in 1883, which was designated a vicariate in 1886. Work was extended to the upper Congo in 1889, and a second vicariate erected the following year. The first Congolese priest was ordained in 1895. The church experienced a period of growth in the years after World War II, and in 1955 the Archdiocese of Brazzaville was created. The first Congolese bishop was consecrated in 1961. The Roman Catholic Church,

Congo-Brazzaville

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,212,000	3,607,000	89.9	2.43	4,752,000	6,653,000
Roman Catholics	399,000	2,488,000	62.0	5.21	3,500,000	5,000,000
Independents	121,000	522,000	13.0	2.13	750,000	1,100,000
Protestants	177,000	510,000	12.7	1.66	740,000	1,050,000
Ethnoreligionists	94,600	180,000	4.5	2.42	200,000	220,000
Agnostics	6,400	122,000	3.0	2.24	240,000	400,000
Muslims	5,600	56,400	1.4	2.42	90,000	140,000
Baha'is	3,100	26,300	0.7	2.67	45,000	80,000
New religionists	1,100	17,000	0.4	2.42	30,000	60,000
Atheists	500	2,200	0.1	2.42	4,000	7,000
Chinese folk	0	300	0.0	2.46	500	800
Buddhists	0	180	0.0	2.35	400	500
Total population	1,323,000	4,011,000	100.0	2.42	5,362,000	7,561,000

with almost a million and a half members, is now the largest church in the country.

In 1909, the Swedish Evangelical Mission (of the Swedish Mission Covenant Church) expanded their work from the Belgian Congo (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo) northward. The church grew in spurts over the next decades; its membership fluctuated, first with the growth of the independent church founded by Simon Kimbangu (1889–1951) and then influenced by a popular movement into the Salvation Army, which had arrived in 1935. The Kimbanguist Church, from neighboring Belgian territory, has been one of the most successful of the African Initiated Churches in the region and was the first to be admitted to the World Council of Churches (WCC). The Salvation Army in the Congo developed a strong emphasis on congregation building, which gave it an early leadership position in the Protestant community. The Evangelical Church of the Congo, created in 1961 when the Swedish mission became autonomous, is the only Congo-based church in the WCC.

Beginning in the late 20th century, Pentecostalism has attracted a large following. The Assemblies of God began work in the 1960s, but have been eclipsed by the independent Église Charismatique de Brazzaville and Assemblées du Dieu de Pentecost. There are several interesting new church groups, such as the Movement Crois-Koma (founded by former Roman Catholics) and the Église Matsouaniste, a messianic political movement founded in the 1930s. There is also a fairly large Eastern Orthodox community under the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa.

The traditional religions of the several Native peoples of the Congo have almost disappeared, with more than 90 percent of the population professing Christianity. The Bakwili and Ngwilli have been most loyal to their traditional religious life. More evident is the admixture of traditional elements of belief and practice in the life of professing Christians.

A Bantu-based religion has been alive among most of the Congo's peoples. It professes a belief in an all-powerful creator deity (Nzama or Nzambi) who is manifest in two aspects, the beneficent and the malevolent, God's nature explaining the alternating aspects of human experience. Integral to the worldview are the spirits of the ancestors, who are divided into those who reside in the abode of the dead and wandering spirits (bakuyu) who have not been admitted to their proper home in the spirit world, and who thus wander around the countryside causing all manner of mischief. The Christian traditionalist movement known as Nzambi ya Bougie (God of the Candle), begun by prophet Zepherin Lassy in 1953, once claimed 8.7 percent of the population of the Congo, though it has declined significantly in more recent years.

Islam has yet to make a significant impact in the Congo, though there is a small community, primarily of followers of the Sunni Malikite School who reside in the Congo as expatriates. They have been organized under the Muslim Committee of the Congo. The Congo has become one of the few places in Africa that host one of the Japanese new religions. In 1966, Tenrikyo, a Shinto-based new religion, founded a center in Brazzaville and today has several hundred followers. It supports a dispensary as part of its larger emphasis upon health.

In the fluctuating political climate of the Congo, the churches have been in a somewhat precarious position. In 1965, for example, the government nationalized all of the schools that had been founded by the Catholic Church, the Salvation Army, and the Evangelical Church (except for several professional training schools). More than half of the primary school pupils in the country attended these schools. In 1978 the government banned all but seven religious bodies (the Roman Catholic Church, the Evangelical Church, the Salvation Army, the Muslim Committee, the Kimbanguist Church, the Nzambi ya Bougie, and Tenrikyo). All religious youth organizations were banned, and all religious instruction to the young forbidden. Groups such as the Baha'i Faith, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Jehovah's Witnesses were particularly affected by this ruling. The religious situation has changed for the better since the adoption of a new Constitution in 1992 that guarantees religious freedom.

Ecumenically, the Ecumenical Council of Christian Churches of Congo (which includes the Salvation Army, the Evangelical Church, and the Kimbanguist Church) is affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Evangelical Church of the Congo; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Jehovah's Witnesses; Kimbanguist Church; Malikite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Tenrikyo; World Council of Churches.

References

Anderson, E. Churches at the Grass-Roots: A Study in Congo-Brazzaville. London: Lutterworth, 1968.

MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1983.

■ Congo (Zaire), Democratic Republic of the

The Republic of the Congo is a large country in West Central Africa whose 66.6 million people reside on the traditional lands of more than 200 ethnic and language groups who lived along the Congo River and its tributaries. Most of these peoples are of Bantu origin, though there are other important groups such as the Nilo-Hamites in the far eastern part. During the modern era, a variety of Bantu kingdoms had come and gone.

What emerged in the late 20th century as the Democratic Republic of the Congo includes 876,000 square miles of territory carved out as a colony by Belgium in 1908. It now lies between the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Angola. It also shares borders with Zambia, Rwanda, Tanzania, Burundi, Uganda, Sudan, and the Central African Republic.

The Congo has 23 miles of coastline along the Atlantic Ocean. It is situated between Angola on the south and Cabinda, a small enclave of land officially a part of Angola but also claimed as an independent country by many separatist rebels. Tens of thousands of the Cabindans now reside in the Congo, as their land has been engaged in a civil war for more than a decade.

The history of the Congo would take a distinctive turn in the 1840s when Scottish missionary and doctor David Livingstone (1813–1873) began to make Europeans aware of its existence. Then in 1876 King Leopold of Belgium financed the explorations of Henry M. Stanley (1841–1904). While in the area he signed hundreds of trade agreements with African leaders. Subsequently, Belgium established trading posts along the mouth of the river, and the king began to treat the Congo Basin as his personal property. In 1897 it became a Belgian colony, and troops of the Belgian army arrived to prevent any opposition, especially in the area of a prosperous copper mining operation in the province of Katanga.

Belgium liberalized its policies in 1957, and three years later the Belgian Congo became an independent nation. A period of civil war and political instability followed until 1965, when Sese Seko Mobutu (1930–1997) came to power in an army coup. He changed the name of the country to Zaire and his own name to Mobutu Sese Seko. Mobutu ruled as a dictator, and the government became increasingly corrupt and repressive. Through the 1980s, opposition grew, and Mobutu responded with more repressive measures. He was finally overthrown in 1997 by Laurent Kabila (b. ca. 1940), who changed the name of the country to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. However, hopes for a new democratic government have not been realized. A rebel army opposed to the Kabila regime still holds part of the country in the east, near the border of Uganda and Rwanda.

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

A variety of traditional religions remain strong in the Congo, especially in the more rural areas. As Christianity entered and European rule was imposed, traditionalists responded with a variety of new movements that promoted religion but decried the practice of malevolent magic (witchcraft). The first such movement, called Kiyoka (or Burning), swept through the southern part of the country along the Angola border in the late 19th century. Similar movements appeared sporadically throughout the 20th century. Also, new traditionalist movements emphasizing spirit possession have arisen.

Congolese worshippers attend a Sunday Catholic Mass at St. Joseph Church in Kinshasa's central district. Catholicism is a major religion in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. (AFP/Getty Images)

The Roman Catholic Church was the original Christian church introduced into the Congo. In 1482 a Portuguese explorer discovered the Congo River, and in 1491 a number of priests came, mostly Dominicans, Franciscans, and Canons of St. John. They made their way to the king of the nation of M'banza Congo, whose capital was in what is today northern Angola. He was eventually baptized, and a large stone church was constructed. Afonso I (r. 1506–1545) came to the throne in 1506. He sent his son to Europe for education, and the son was ordained and became the first modern African bishop. The capital, now renamed San Salvador, became the headquarters for the church in the region.

The Roman Catholics suffered as the slave trade grew, and only a remnant was left when a new wave of Catholic missionaries arrived in 1865. Their work was supported by the Belgian king, who assigned missionaries (both Catholic and Protestant) to specific areas, granted land, and gave concessions for education and medical work. Leopold II (1835–1909) negotiated an agreement with the Vatican that limited Roman missionaries to Belgian nationals and those orders headquartered in Belgium. In the 1950s, the church finally began official opposition to the injustices it saw perpetrated by the government, and in 1956 it published a long list of grievances. Siding with the laboring classes cost the church support among the elite, and during the period of civil war and instability in the 1960–1965 period, more than 200 Catholic priests and religious were killed. In spite of Mobutu's attempts to subvert the church, it retained popular support and today counts approximately half of the population as adherents.

British Baptists took the lead among Protestants for Zaire. Beginning in 1878 they built mission stations

Congo-Zaire

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	18,548,000	65,803,000	95.4	2.99	102,878,000	179,432,000
Roman Catholics	9,908,000	35,600,000	51.6	0.56	56,500,000	100,000,000
Independents	3,986,000	15,132,000	21.9	2.24	23,365,000	39,800,000
Protestants	4,645,000	14,500,000	21.0	3.45	23,000,000	40,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,635,000	1,740,000	2.5	2.97	2,100,000	2,500,000
Muslims	280,000	755,000	1.1	3.01	1,150,000	2,000,000
Baha'is	128,000	295,000	0.4	3.00	500,000	1,000,000
Agnostics	5,000	286,000	0.4	3.00	600,000	1,400,000
Hindus	1,000	105,000	0.2	2.99	200,000	400,000
Atheists	0	15,000	0.0	3.06	35,000	70,000
New religionists	500	6,400	0.0	3.33	10,000	20,000
Buddhists	0	4,000	0.0	3.33	7,000	15,000
Jews	500	400	0.0	-5.06	500	500
Total population	20,598,000	69,010,000	100.0	2.99	107,481,000	186,837,000

along the Congo River. They were soon joined by American Baptists, who worked along the Lower Congo River. Presbyterians from the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (the main Presbyterian body in the southern United States, now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), arrived in 1891 and centered their work along the Kasai River, with headquarters at Kananga. The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) came just before the turn of the century and took control of a former Baptist station at Bolenge. The Church of England did not have the presence in the Congo that it had in British-controlled areas, but the work initiated by the Anglican Church Missionary Society in 1895 has grown into the Church of the Province of the Congo.

Newly appointed missionary bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) surveyed the Congo River in 1885, which led to the Methodist Episcopal Church establishing several stations along the river between the ocean and Kinshasa. However, much of this work died out as missionaries succumbed to the land's climate and rigors. In 1911, a couple previously assigned to Rhodesia, Helen and John Rasmussen, pioneered a mission at Lukoshi in the Lunda country (north of the Zambian border). The Methodist mission did not really take off, however, until the Congo Mission was organized in 1915 and eventually grew to become the South Congo Annual Conference.

Meanwhile, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, established work in the Kasai and Kivi provinces, which included the land of the large Otatela people. In 1939, the two Methodist churches in the United States merged, and in 1964, the two Congo conferences received their first African bishop, Wesley Shingu. They continue as part of the United Methodist Church formed in 1968.

The independent African Inland Mission began their large and important work in 1912. Their first station was at Kasengu, from which they moved inland and built a considerable following throughout the northeast part of the country between the Congo River and Uganda. This church is a sister to the Africa Inland Church in Kenya.

Pentecostals penetrated the country in 1915, the first coming from Great Britain and supported by the Congo Evangelistic Mission. The Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland opened work three years later, and the Assemblies of God from the United States, which had only formed in 1914, sent people to the Congo in one of its first missionary enterprises.

The large country attracted a number of Protestant and Free church groups through the 20th century, among the larger churches being those developed by the Christian Brethren, the Mennonites (through the Congo Inland Mission), and the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Equally important, a number of indigenous churches developed, beginning with the Kimbanguist Church, by far the largest independent church in Zaire and the second largest Christian body in the country. The church began with the preaching activity of Simon Kimbangu in 1921. The success of his work led the Belgian authorities to arrest him. He spent the last part of his life in prison, but his church persisted, spread across the Congo and throughout central Africa, and became the first indigenous African church welcomed into the World Council of Churches.

In the half century after Kimbangu launched his work, more than 500 independent denominations appeared, and that number has continued to grow, both from schisms of the larger mission churches and from the influx of African Initiated Churches found in neighboring countries. Among the latter are the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, the Legion of Mary, and the Église Lumpa. Many of the newer indigenous churches have developed unique approaches to Christianity or have blended Christianity with elements of traditional religions in such a manner as to distance them from the older mission churches.

In 1970, five years after Mobutu took control, the government demanded that all of the Protestant churches unite into the Église du Christ au Zaire (now the Église du Christ au Congo, or Church of Christ in the Congo). This body succeeded the former Congo Protestant Council (founded in 1924), but came to be an association including churches of the most diverse theological perspectives. Eight churches that attempted to withdraw and found an alternate body in 1971 were refused recognition by the government and had to return to the state-mandated church. In addition to the Protestant church, the government recognized three other bodies: the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of Christ on Earth through the prophet Simon Kimbangu, and the Greek Orthodox Church (a branch of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa, which has been present in the country since 1958).

Churches that joined the Church of Christ in the Congo became known as communities. Those church bodies that affiliated with the new church added the name to their former name. Thus the former Church of Light became the Church of Christ of the Congo—Community of Light. In many ways they continued to operate as distinct denominations within the new structure. Several of the groups are members of the World Council of Churches and other ecumenical bodies. Churches that did not join the Church of Christ in the Congo were not granted government recognition and either went out of business or operated unofficially. Many groups, including the Jehovah's Witnesses, have operated apart from official recognition. Many have survived because of the government's lack of resources to enforce the law. The government stopped attempts to build an evangelical alliance that would have been affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance and an attempt to form an association of independent African Initiated Churches.

The Congo, because of the unrest there, has not been a magnet drawing new or Eastern religions. However, two European new religions have established work in Kinshasa, the Grail Movement and Universal Life. During the Belgian years, there was a Jewish community that grew to some 2,500 members, most residing at Lubumbashi. Since 1960, however, most have left the country. Of the 320 that remain, 300 live in Kinshasa and remain in contact with the chief rabbi in Brussels, Belgium.

Islam is present; missionaries arrived in the northern part of the country in the 19th century. Most are found in the northeast, where the Congo shares a border with the Sudan. Most Muslims are of the Sunni Shafiite School, but there is a small community of Indian and Pakistani expatriates who are Ismailis. Two Sufi Brotherhoods, the Tijaniyya and the Qadiriyya, are also present among the estimated 200,000 Muslims. Several movements that include roots in Islam are also present, including the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, Subud, and the Baha'i Faith. In 1963 there was a mass movement that brought 20,000 Congolese into the Baha'i movement.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Africa Inland Church; African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Apostolic Church of Johane Maranke; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church of England; Church of Christ in the Congo—Community of Light; Church Missionary Society; Dominicans; Franciscans; Free Churches; Grail Movement, The; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Jehovah's Witnesses; Kimbanguist Church; Legion of Mary; Mennonites; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Qadiriyya Rifa'i Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Subud; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; United Methodist Church; Universal Life; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Braekman, E. M. Histoire du Protestantisme au Congo. Brussels: Eclaireurs unionistes, 1961.
- Mukenge, Tshilemalema. Culture and Customs of the Congo. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Slade, R. M. English-Speaking Missions in the Congo Independent State. Brussels: Duculot, 1959.
- Niklaus, R. L. "Zaire's Super-Church." Christianity Today 16, no. 14 (1972): 4–10.
- Wild-Wood, Emma. Migration and Christian Identity in Congo. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002.

Congregational Christian Church in Samoa

The Congregational Christian Church in Samoa dates to the arrival of a team of Tahitian and Cook Islander Christian teachers and British missionary John Williams (1796–1839) in Samoa in 1830. Williams, a representative of the London Missionary Society (LMS), stationed the members of the team throughout the archipelago and then left the work in their care. Their work grew slowly for the first 5 years, and only some 2,000 were converted. However, by the end of the decade the overwhelming majority of the population had become Christians. In the meantime, the officials from the Methodist Church and the LMS met in Tonga and agreed to divide labors in the South Pacific in order to avoid competition. Work in Samoa was to be assumed by the LMS.

At the time of this decision, the Methodists had a thriving work led by a European, Peter Turner (d. 1873). He withdrew, but most members of the Methodist movement refused to join the LMS mission and continued to operate as a Methodist church apart from the work on the other islands. However, the Methodist work stopped growing, while the LMS work spread throughout the whole archipelago. It remained a single mission even after the eastern islands were set apart as American Samoa in 1899.

The Samoan mission remained under the guidance of the LMS until 1962, the same year that Samoa became an independent nation. That year the mission was reorganized on a congregational model as the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa. Shortly after it became autonomous, it was accepted as a member of the World Council of Churches. In 1980 the churches in American Samoa separated as the Church of Tutuila and Manua (now the Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa). Efforts to reunite the two bodies have been unsuccessful to date.

With some 70,000 members (2005), the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa is the largest religious body in Samoa, and the leading member of the Samoa Council of Churches.

Congregational Christian Church in Samoa
Box 486
Apai
Samoa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa; London Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Sopoaga, E. M. "The Church in the New Testament as the Basis of the Church Today: With Special Reference to the Congregational Christian Church in American Samoa." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1986.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa

The Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa shares a history with the Congregational Christian Church of Samoa until 1980. At that time American Samoa had existed as a distinct entity for more than eight decades, during which time Samoa had become an independent country (1962). In 1980 the congregational churches of American Samoa voted to become independent and reorganized as the Church of Tutuila and Manua. It soon assumed its present name. The new church remains similar to the parent body, as there were no theological or polity issues in the division. In the 1990s the two churches pursued attempts to reunite, but were unsuccessful.

The Congregational Christian Church is the largest religious body in American Samoa. In 2005 it reported some 39,000 members, of which approximately 10,000 were residing overseas. It has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1985.

Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa
PO Box 1537
Pago Pago
American Samoa 96799

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Congregational Christian Church in Samoa; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Sopoaga, E. M. "The Church in the New Testament as the Basis of the Church Today: With Special Reference to the Congregational Christian Church in American Samoa." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1986.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Congregationalism

The Congregationalists emerged in the 17th century as one branch of the Puritan movement, which wished to further purify the Church of England, then based in the Anglican tradition as it had emerged during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603). The Anglican tradition drew upon both the Roman Catholic tradition (especially in maintaining an episcopal hierarchy) and continental Protestant traditions (in the latter case, primarily on the Reformed tradition as developed in Switzerland by John Calvin).

It was the desire of many Puritans that the Church of England become a Protestant church in the Reformed tradition. In addition, the Congregationalists believed that the local congregations of the church should operate administratively as autonomous units, though they should keep their intimate connection with the state and maintain fellowship with each other through geographically based associations. They differed from the Presbyterians (who wanted to establish the leadership of lay and clergy elders, or presbyters, and not allow independence to local congregations) and the Baptists (who wished to end the church's connection to the government). Congregationalists spelled out their few distinctive beliefs in a variant text of the Presbyterians' Westminster Confession known as the Savoy Declaration (1658).

Congregationalism was first established in the American colonies, especially Massachusetts, and then later developed in the British Isles after the failure of the Presbyterians to retain their favored place following the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. American Congregationalists experienced several mergers in the 20th century, which led to the formation of the United Church of Christ. The main branch of British Congregationalists merged into the United Reformed Church, though several groups such as the Scottish Congregational Church and the Union of Welsh Independents still exist.

Congregationalists became an important part of the massive Protestant missionary movement through their two missionary organizations, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions and the London Missionary Society. The work of their missionaries led to the formation of Congregational churches around the world, many of which are now tied together through the Council on World Missions. Most Congregational churches have joined the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, reflecting the Reformed theological heritage they share with Presbyterians and other Reformed churches. Some of the more conservative Congregational churches have formed the International Congregational Fellowship.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; International Congregational Fellowship; London Missionary Society; Union of Welsh Independents; United Church of Christ; United Reformed Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Von Rohr, John. The Shaping of American Congregationalism, 1620–1957. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1994.
- Walker, Williston, ed. Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1991.

Conservative Judaism

Conservative Judaism's origins lie with the evolution of Positive-Historical Judaism in 19th-century Germany as a mediating position between traditional Orthodox Judaism and the more radical program of Reform Judaism. It resembled Reform in that it espoused a more positive attitude toward modern culture; however, it remained committed to the observance of Jewish law and ceremony.

Largely in reaction to the growth of Reform Judaism in America, Sabato Morais, Marcus Jastrow, and Henry Pereira Mendes took the lead in founding the Jewish Theological Seminary as a more traditional rabbinical school. The school floundered after the death of its first president Sabato Morais, and was reconstituted in 1902, when its leaders invited Solomon Schechter (1848–1915), then a lecturer at Cambridge University, to become the school's president. Schechter gathered a distinguished faculty and the seminary emerged as the center for the gradually developing Conservative movement, which found a new and expanding constituency in the children of the East European Jews then streaming to America.

As a staunch traditionalist, Schechter attacked the problem of change in response to modernity. Changes could not be introduced arbitrarily or deliberately. He suggested that change has been a constant in Jewish practice and articulated a principle by which further change could occur, namely, that decisions on Jewish law can be made by reference to the practices of the whole of the observant Jewish community. Schechter's approach to legal decisions necessitated the adaptation of the Halachic process (the system of legal reasoning and interpretation) as regards the Torah. Eventually, Conservative rabbis created a committee on Jewish law and standards to serve as the movement's central legal advisor. For nearly 100 years, the men—and later the women after Conservative Judaism began ordaining women rabbis—who have sat on this committee have wrestled with adapting Jewish law to the modern world. In the mid-20th century, they ruled it permissible for Jews to use automobiles to drive to the synagogue on the Sabbath, and in 2006 decided that the movement would ordain gay and lesbian rabbis. This Halachic process by committee constitutes one of the primary distinctions between Conservative and Orthodox Judaisms.

In 1913 Solomon Schechter took the lead in founding the United Synagogue of America (now the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism) as an association for Conservative synagogues. Cyrus Adler

Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice president of the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism, gestures while addressing the first joint meeting of five major organizations of Conservative Judaism, in Washington, D.C., on February 12, 2002. (AP/Wide World Images) (1863–1940), the second president of the United Synagogue after Schechter, also succeeded Schechter as head of the seminary in 1915.

Through the 20th century, Conservative Judaism spread across the United States and at the beginning of the new century reported some 800 synagogues and 1.5 million members. Rabbis associate professionally in the Rabbinical Assembly. It has found some response in Europe, the roots of the Conservative position having originally been developed in Germany in the middle of the 19th century by Rabbi Zacharias Frankel (1805–1875). There it is usually called Masorti, except in Hungary where the term Neolog is used. The Neolog movement also took its inspiration from Frankel. The European and North American phases of the movement have come together in the World Council of Conservative/Masorti Synagogues, recently renamed Masorti Olami.

Conservative congregations became an important part of the faith community in Israel in the 1970s, though the first Israeli Conservative synagogue, Congregation Emet Ve'emuna, dates to 1936. Conservative Judaism began in a community of German Jews who were students of Frankel's historicist position. As the number multiplied, a United Synagogue of Israel was organized to provide them with some associated structure, and rabbis affiliated in a Rabbinical Assembly. These two structures merged in 1979 to form the Masorti movement in Israel, which is also a part of Masorti Olami.

The headquarters of the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism are in New York. An integral part of the United Synagogue is MERCAZ U.S.A., the American Zionist Organization for the Conservative Movement. It nurtures Zionism within U.S. Conservative Jewry, and represents its interests in both the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel. The Association of European Masorti Communities includes congregations in France, Germany, Spain, and Sweden; in the United Kingdom, the Assembly of Masorti Synagogues is headquartered at 1097 Finchley Rd., London, NW11 0PU. The Masorti movement in Israel may be contacted at 8 Derech Hevron, PO Box 7559, Jerusalem 91074, Israel. In 2009 it reported some 30 affiliated congregations. There are several Conservative synagogues in various Latin American countries, including Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina.

The Rapaport House
International Headquarters of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism
820 Second Avenue
New York, NY 10017-4504
<http://www.uscj.org/index1.html>

Pamela S. Nadell and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Orthodox Judaism; Reform Judaism.

References

- Davis, Moshe. The Emergence of Conservative Judaism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1963.
- Gillman, Neil. Conservative Judaism: The New Century. New York: Behrman House, 1993.
- Karp, Abraham J. A History of the United Synagogue of America, 1913–1963. New York: United Synagogue of America, 1964.
- Nadell, Pamela S. Conservative Judaism in America: A Biographical Dictionary and Sourcebook. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1988.
- Schechter, Solomon. Studies in Judaism. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1938.

Sklare, Marshal. Conservative Judaism. Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1955.

Constantine the Great

285–337

Constantine the Great, who served as co-emperor (306–324) and then sole emperor (324–337) of the Roman Empire, is remembered primarily for his changing the status of Christianity from that of a marginalized and persecuted religion to the privileged faith of the empire. He is credited with moving the center of the empire from Rome to Constantinople (named after him), presiding over the first of the Ecumenical Councils held at Nicaea, and elevating the status of relics within the church, following the identification of many objects reputedly traced to the earthly ministry of Jesus and the Apostles by Constantine's mother Helena. He is revered by the Eastern Orthodox churches as a saint while both the Eastern churches and the Roman Catholic Church revere his mother as a saint.

Constantine was born around the year 285 CE in Naissus, in what is now Turkey. His father, Constantius I Chlorus, was the emperor and his mother Helena a barmaid. He rose to prominence as a military leader, a number of his battles being directed against rivals for the throne. Constantius, whose power base lay with the Western empire then centered in Trier, Germany, gave his son his blessings to succeed him as he lay dying in Britain in 306. Constantine subsequently married Fausta, the daughter of the emperor Maximian.

Constantine took sole control of the Western empire by defeating his wife's brother Maxentius in 312. The battle, one of the turning points in Christian history, occurred at Milvian Bridge, which crosses the Tiber River immediately north of the city of Rome. The church historian Eusebius of Caesarea (ca. 263–ca. 339) left a romantic account of the battle, the focus being on a dream during which Constantine reputedly saw the sign of the cross in the form of the Chi-Rho. Constantine then ordered the Chi-Rho placed on the standards carried by his army to replace the many Pagan protective talismans. Eusebius's account would further embellish the story of the dream with mention of a phrase spoken to the sleeping Constantine by

Head of Constantine I the Great, from a colossal statue, dating from about 325 to 337 CE. Constantine is renowned as the first Christian Roman emperor. (Allan T. Kohl/Art Images for College Teaching)

Christ, “In hoc signo vinces” (“With this sign you will conquer”).

Whatever actually occurred relative to the dream and the use of the sign, Constantine had already moved to grant religious toleration in areas he controlled. Then after his victory and ascendancy to the throne as the primary Roman emperor in the West, Constantine granted the Christian church official toleration throughout the empire and returned some of its previously confiscated property. This policy was articulated in the Edict of Milan issued together with Licinius (r. 308–324), the emperor in the East. This edict culminated a series of actions recognizing the growth of the church and the failure of the persecutions during the last years of the reign of Diocletian (r. 284–305). In 311, Galerius (r. 305–311), the former emperor in the East, had issued a toleration edict in the Balkans shortly before his death.

While tolerating Christians, Constantine would continue to follow Pagan practices for many years. That did not stop him from becoming involved in church controversy. In 314, he called the Council of Arles in response to a request for help from the Donatists, a party of strict Christians who were slow to forgive other Christians who had shown weakness in the face of persecution. The Council condemned their position, and Constantine moved to suppress them.

As early as 314, Constantine and Licinius began to fight. Civil war would continue off and on for a decade until Constantine finally defeated him in 324. Now the supreme power in the empire, Constantine moved to the East, rebuilt the city of Byzantium, and renamed it Constantinople (now known as Istanbul). With Licinius out of the way, Constantine again moved to assert his position with the Christian movement by calling the Council that met at Nicaea, not far from Constantinople. The problem this time was the dissent being offered by the Alexandrian priest Arius concerning the nature of Christ. Arius asserted that Jesus was not God, but the first creation of God. Earlier Constantine had sent Hosius of Cordova, his imperial theologian, to attempt a settlement of the Arian controversy. The failure of that effort occasioned his calling of and sitting as presiding officer at the Council of Nicaea in 325. The Council condemned Arius and issued the Nicene Creed, still a standard statement of orthodox Christian belief. Arius was exiled.

Constantine now moved on his own family. His mother accused Constantine’s wife of adultery. Constantine had Fausta and their son Crispus both murdered, and over the next years elevated the position of his mother. Toward the end of the decade, he underwrote his mother’s trip to Jerusalem, during which a number of sites were designated as those referred to in the Gospel accounts of Jesus. She was shown a number of objects and accepted local testimony of locals that they were indeed relics, the most notable item being the cross upon which Jesus was reputedly crucified (the True Cross), pieces of which were later scattered to churches throughout Europe. Constantine subsequently authorized the building of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, over the site where it is believed by many that Jesus was buried after his crucifixion.

As work on Constantinople continued, it emerged as one of the most holy cities in the East. The archbishop of Constantinople was named a patriarch with status equal to that of the patriarchs of the older metropolitan sees of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. Eventually, the patriarch of Constantinople would be named the first among the patriarchs and Constantinople would be recognized as the center of the Eastern Orthodox Church.

Constantine would also initiate a building policy throughout the empire. Among the many churches he built would be the basilica church St. John Lateran as the episcopal church of the bishop of Rome.

While Constantine had taken many actions that endeared him to church leaders, he did not become a Christian formally and accept baptism until the end of his life, on his death bed. Interestingly enough, he had in the mid-330s tried to rehabilitate Arius, who had at least outwardly tried to present a more orthodox front. Constantine was baptized by an Arian bishop Eusebius of Nicomedia. He died on May 22, 337. His less than orthodox baptism did not prevent his burial in the Church of the Twelve Apostles in Constantinople. In later decades he would be given an informal posthumous title as the “Thirteenth” Apostle.

Constantine’s reign became a turning point in Christian history. Within a few short years, the church moved from an outlawed and persecuted minority religion to a legal and tolerated faith, to a replacement of Paganism as the single religion of the Roman Empire. Part of the price for that transformation was the introduction of a church-state policy that came to be called Caesaropapism, which assigned the ruler direct roles in ecclesiastical affairs. This policy soon became the dominant structure of the religion-government relationship in Eastern Orthodox countries.

Among the issues significantly affected by Constantine’s reign was the relations of Jews and Christians. In a series of laws, he completed the designation of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath and devised a rule for determining Easter, so that Jews no longer needed to be consulted on its date. He also passed a law preventing Jewish leadership from attempting to impede any Jews from converting to Christianity.

Constantine was most honored in the East, where he was named a saint. His feast day is the same as that of his mother, May 21. While not venerated in the West, his stature was best illustrated by the document known as the Donation of Constantine. Forged in the ninth century, the document claimed that Constantine had given Pope Sylvester I (r. 314–335) title to the church buildings in Rome and authority over the patriarchs in the East. It would be cited by popes for several centuries relative to their claims to authority, until it was proved a forgery in the 15th century.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Helena, Flavia Iulia; Istanbul.

References

- Barnes, T. D. Constantine and Eusebius. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Burckhardt, Johannes. The Age of Constantine the Great. New York: Pantheon, 1949.
- Carroll, James. Constantine’s Sword: The Church and the Jews. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.
- Kousoulas, D. George. The Life and Times of Constantine the Great. Danbury, CT: Rutledge Books, 2003.
- Grant, Michael. Constantine the Great. New York: Scribner’s, 1994.

Constantinople

See Istanbul.

Continued Reformed Churches in the Netherlands

The Continued Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Voortgezette Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland [VGKN]) originated in March 2004. Some 20 local churches of the former Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (which in 2004 merged into the new Reformed Church in the Netherlands) decided to found a new community of churches. They disagreed with the foundation of the new Protestant Church in the Netherlands as they wanted to remain the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands. In the end, some eight local churches came together to form their own separate community.

The VGKN currently reports 7 local churches with 3,000 members and 4 ministers (2007).

Voortgezette Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland
De Sluiskampen 31
9422 AN Smilde
The Netherlands

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

Reference

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.

Convention Baptiste de' Haiti

Baptist work in Haiti can be traced to 1823, when the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society, one of the older Baptist state conventions in the United States, sent Thomas Paul to the island nation. He preached and distributed Bibles, but after six months returned to Massachusetts. It was not until 1833 that the Triennial Convention (now an integral part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) sent an African American preacher, William C. Monroe, to Port-au-Prince. He formed the first church, but also decided in 1837 to return to the United States.

More permanent work began with the American Baptist Free Mission Society, an abolitionist organization that had arisen in the context of the slavery debates among American Baptists, debates that eventually split them into two factions. The Society sent William M. Jones, who arrived in Port-au-Prince in January 1845. He was soon joined by William L. Judd and his wife, and in 1890 they were succeeded by one of their converts, Lucius Hippolite. During this period, British and Jamaican Baptists had also worked on creating a mission. The Jamaican work centered on the town of Jacmel, and then spread to St. Marc and Cap Haitien.

Following World War I, in 1923, the American Baptist Home Mission Society sent A. Garves Wood to Haiti. He was able to find more than 1,000 Baptists in the country. He gained the support of two pastors he located, Elie Marc and Nosirel L'Herrison. Traveling around the country, he trained Haitian pastors and created a national movement. Real growth came after World War II, signaled by the establishment of a seminary (1947), a hospital (1953), and an eye clinic (1989).

The Convention Baptiste de' Haiti was founded in 1964. It currently supports more than 85 schools. It has taken the lead in training people in modern agricultural techniques and in creating safe drinking water in rural communities.

In 2005 the convention reported 82,000 members in 110 churches. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance. It maintains a close working relationship with the Board of International Ministries of the American Baptist Churches, and in 2005 joined the World Council of Churches.

Even though the Convention Baptiste de' Haiti is the largest Baptist group in Haiti, it is by no means the only one. Several Baptist groups from the United States have begun missions, and a sending agency then known as Worldteam, now World Team, found their motivation to enter Haiti from converts in Cuba in the 1930s. The WorldTeam effort, now known as the Evangelical Baptist Mission of South Haiti, has some 60,000 adherents.

Convention Baptiste de' Haiti
Angle Rue 15 et Rue de Quai
Cap Haitien, PO Box 2101
Haiti

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

References

- Russell, Horace O. The Baptist Witness. El Paso, TX: Carib Baptist Publications, 1983.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville and Holman Publishers, 1995.

Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches

The Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches (also known as Canadian Baptists in Atlantic Canada), representing the Baptist churches in the most easterly part of Canada, is the product of a set of mergers that took place through the 19th and 20th centuries. It includes among its member churches the oldest Baptist congregations in Canada, and is itself the oldest Baptist group in Canada.

What would become the Convention had two churches between 1763 and 1765, but both lost visibility by 1771. Henry Alline (1748–1784), the Congregationalist New Light preacher, helped reconstitute the Horton Church (Wolfville) in 1778, making it the longest continuing Baptist congregation in Canada. In 1800, nine Regular Baptist congregations formed the Nova Scotia Baptist Association.

Among the Loyalists who came after 1783 was the former slave and Baptist preacher, David George (ca. 1742–1810), who helped found several white congregations and one black congregation in Nova Scotia. This was the beginning of the future African Baptist Association.

A Free Baptist/New Light congregation existed in Barrington, Nova Scotia, by 1795. Several similar groups emerged, some calling themselves “Christians.” In 1837, the Nova Scotians united to become the Free Baptist Conference and in New Brunswick they became the New Brunswick Free Christian Baptists.

The Regular Baptists founded Horton Academy (1827), Acadia College (1838), and the Fredericton Seminary (1827) that was the first coeducational college in the British Empire; the Baptist Missionary Magazine (1827); and the Baptist Convention of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island (1846). They sent out Protestant Canada’s first foreign missionaries, Richard (1810–1853) and Leleah Burpee (d. 1845).

In 1905–1906, the Free and Regular Baptists, including the African Association, came together to form the United Baptist Convention of the Maritime Provinces with a combined membership of about 60,000. In 1944, the UBCMP was a founding member of the Baptist Federation of Canada (Canadian Baptist Ministries since 1995) and the Canadian Council of Churches, only to withdraw from the Council in 1971.

In 1964, Newfoundland and Labrador joined and it became the United Baptist Convention of the Atlantic Provinces. In 2001 it became the Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches. The CABC has 21 associations, approximately 500 churches, and 61,000 members.

Its ministries include 14 facilities of the Atlantic Baptist Senior Citizens Homes; large youth programs built around association camps and special events; and Atlantic Baptist University (undergraduate) and Acadia Divinity College (graduate).

CABC is a covenanting partner in Canadian Baptist Ministries and is a member of the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada and North American Baptist Fellowship.

Robert S. Wilson

Convention of Atlantic Baptist Churches

1655 Manawagonish Rd., Saint John, NB E2M 3Y2
Canada

<http://www.baptist-atlantic.ca/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Canadian Baptist Ministries.

References

- Bentall, Shirley. From Sea to Sea: The Canadian Baptist Federation: 1944–1994. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1994.
- Grant, John Webster. The Church in the Canadian Experience. Vancouver, BC: Regent College, 1998.
- Priestley, David. “Introduction.” In Memory and Hope: Strands of Canadian Baptist History. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1996.
- Renfree, Harry. Heritage and Horizon: The Baptist Story in Canada. Mississauga, ON: Canadian Baptist Federation, 1988.
- Wilson, Robert S. “Patterns in Canadian Baptist Life.” Global Baptist History. Papers presented at the Second International Conference on Baptist Studies, Wake Forest University, July 19–22, 2000, Baptist History and Heritage 36, nos. 1–2 (Winter–Spring 2001).

Wilson, Robert S. "History of Canadian Baptists." In Baptist History Celebration, 2007: A Symposium on Our History, Theology, and Hymnology.

Springfield, MO: Particular Baptist Press, 2008.

Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Baptists in Canada, Search for Identity Amidst Diversity. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1980.

Zeman, Jarold K., ed. Costly Vision: The Baptist Pilgrimage in Canada. Burlington, ON: G. R. Welsh, 1988.

Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches

Baptists affiliated with the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU) (now a constituent part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) entered the Philippines immediately after the Spanish-American War opened the country to non-Catholic work. Eric Lund (1852–1933), a Swede who had worked with the ABMU in Spain, and Braulio Manikan, a Philippine national, opened a mission in Jaro on the island of Panay. It became the first Baptist church in the Philippines the following year. Lund, an accomplished linguist, soon translated the Bible into the local language, the Panayan dialect of Visayan. In 1905, the church organized a school, which later grew to become the Central Philippines University.

The educational work of the church grew during the first decade, and membership expanded through the central Philippines. In 1935, the Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches was founded. All the work came to a sudden halt when the Japanese invaded the islands during World War II. Much of the Convention's property was destroyed and many of the leaders interned. In December 1943, the Japanese executed 12 of the missionary personnel discovered hiding on Panay.

After the war, the work revived, and in the 1950s the Convention entered a growth phase. In 1969 the Convention launched its own foreign mission program and has subsequently sponsored missionaries in Indonesia, Japan, Laos, Thailand, Germany, and the United States. The expansion of the missionary effort led to the organization of a Commission on Overseas Mission and Evangelism. The missionary thrust is done in cooperation with the Board of International Ministries of the American Baptist Churches and the Australian Baptist Missionary Society, with which the Convention has a close working relationship.

The Convention was invited to join the merger that led to the formation of the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, but declined. It did, however, join the National Council of Churches in the Philippines, and remains the only one of the several Philippine Baptist groups affiliated with the Council. The Convention is also a member of the Baptist World Alliance and in 2001 joined the World Council of Churches.

In 2005, the Convention reported 100,000 members in 749 churches.

Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches

PO Box 263

Iloilo City, 5000

Philippines

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; United Church of Christ in the Philippines; World Council of Churches.

References

Bunda, Nestor Distor. A Mission History of the Philippine Baptist Churches 1898–1998: From a Philippine Perspective. Ammersbek bei Hamburg: Verlag an der Lottbek, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.

■ Cook Islands

The Cook Islands consist of a set of islands settled by Polynesians in the prehistoric past. The cluster of islands is located in the South Pacific about halfway between Hawaii and New Zealand. Together they have only 97 square miles of land, upon which some 12,000 people reside.

Today, most of the Cook Islands' population are Maori and share a natural kinship with the original inhabitants of New Zealand. European knowledge of the islands began in 1779, following the visit of British explorer Captain James Cook (1728–1779). Missionaries from the London Missionary Society (an interdenominational organization, but primarily based in Congregationalism) arrived in 1823. Over the next half century the mission campaigned against the indigenous faith and virtually eradicated it. Organized as the Cook Islands Christian Church, it was unopposed until the end of the century and beginning in the 1870s began to send missionaries to other islands, especially Papua.

A Christian church and cemetery are seen on Aitutaki, Cook Islands, June 2006. The dominant religion of Polynesia and the Cook Islands is Christianity. (AP/Wide World Images)

The islands became a British protectorate, and the country was incorporated as part of New Zealand in 1901. For a few years it was administered jointly with Niue, but that administration was divided in 1904. In the 1890s two new Christian groups arrived, the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1892) and the Roman Catholic Church (1894). The SDA Cook Islands Mission was formally organized in 1923 and exists today as part of the Central Union Pacific Mission. Roman Catholics established a prefecture in 1922. A bishop resides on Rarotonga, the largest of the islands, and serves as suffragan to the archbishop of Suva (Fiji Islands). Pentecostalism was introduced in 1963 by representatives of the Assemblies of God.

There is only one indigenous church in the islands, the Amuri Free Church, founded at the beginning of the 1940s by former members of the Cook Islands Christian Church. It remains small. There is also a small Anglican community, consisting primarily of expatriates and existing as part of the Church of the Province

Cook Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	21,300	12,000	96.3	-2.65	10,700	11,100
Protestants	16,300	8,600	69.0	-3.25	7,100	6,500
Roman Catholics	2,300	2,900	23.2	-0.90	2,800	3,000
Marginals	1,100	2,200	17.6	5.75	2,300	2,800
Agnostics	40	340	2.7	-2.24	500	700
Baha'is	100	110	0.9	-2.70	160	200
Atheists	0	10	0.1	-3.58	10	20
Total population	21,400	12,500	100.0	-2.64	11,400	12,000

of New Zealand. There is no formal ecumenical structure on the Cook Islands, but the Cook Islands Christian Church is a member of the National Council of Churches in New Zealand.

The overwhelming majority of the Cook Islanders are members of one of the more traditional Christian churches. In 1952, however, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints launched an aggressive mission and has now become the second largest church in the islands. There is also a small community of the Baha'i Faith.

In a plebiscite in 1965, the Cook Islands voted against independence, and the country continues as a New Zealand dependency.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Congregationalism; Cook Islands Christian Church; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- Makirere, T. "Worship in the Culture and Church of the Cook Islands, with Special Reference to the Needs of the Cook Islands Christian Church To-day." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1971.
- Maratu. Cannibals and Converts: Radical Change in the Cook Islands. Trans. and ed. by M. T. Cromcombe. Suva, Fiji: Institute of Pacific Studies, University of the South Pacific, 1983.

Cook Islands Christian Church

The Cook Islands Christian Church owes its beginning to the South Pacific work of the London Missionary Society (LMS) and the efforts of its famous pioneer missionary John Williams (1796–1839). Williams had advanced the use of Native workers and in 1821 facilitated the arrival in the Cook Islands of Papeiha, a Tahitian Christian. Papeiha began work on Aitutaki with successful results. Williams and his associated missionaries pursued Bible translation (completed in 1890). Meanwhile the LMS established the Tacamoa Theological College at Rarotonga (the capital of the Cook Islands). Graduates not only served in the Cook Islands but became missionaries in various island nations across the Pacific.

The LMS mission became an independent church in 1963. Through the 20th century, the mission (like the Cook Islands as a whole) had developed a strong relationship with the LMS-related churches in New Zealand, and there are two congregations of the church in New Zealand. The church was especially affected by the 1970 merger of some of the churches of the Congregational Union of New Zealand into the Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand. The Cook Island mission adopted a presbyterial form of church government.

Festivals form an important part of the celebrative life of the church. October 26 is Gospel Day, a public holiday in the islands commemorating the coming of Christianity to the islands.

In 2005 the church reported 18,000 members out of a population of approximately 21,000. It also has some 30 congregations in Australian and New Zealand. It sponsors both a radio and a television show. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1975.

Cook Islands Christian Church
Box 93
Rarotonga
Cook Islands

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Makirere, T. "Worship in the Culture and Church of the Cook Islands, with Special Reference to the Needs of the Cook Islands Christian Church To-day." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1971.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Cooperative Baptist Fellowship

The Cooperative Baptist Fellowship (CBF) is an association formed in 1991, in the aftermath of a major conflict within the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC). After a decade of struggle between a "moderate" leadership group and an insurgent fundamentalist movement, SBC moderates had, by 1990, lost every presidential election in the denomination since 1979; and by virtue of that, they had lost substantial ability to influence the Southern Baptist Convention's various theological schools and program agencies. In the summer of 1990, a call went out for "concerned Baptists" to gather in Atlanta. The 2,000 persons who responded created a rudimentary financial structure and an ad hoc "interim steering committee." In May 1991, the organization was officially chartered as the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship.

Almost all the founding delegates belonged to churches that were still part of the Southern Baptist Convention. However, over the following decade, an increasing number of them decreased or cut off their giving to the parent body, and many officially cut their ties. A few were ousted for their progressive practices, primarily related to women in ministry and the acceptance of homosexuality (both of which the SBC strongly condemned). Those who formed the Fellowship were disproportionately the best educated, urban, and progressive of the SBC's churches. While still conservative and evangelical relative to the mainstream of American Protestantism, the Southern Baptists who formed CBF were much less likely to hold strictly "inerrantist" views of the Bible, much more likely to support social service ministries, and virtually unanimous in their support for women's leadership, including a growing number of women pastors.

Early in its history, the CBF became a mission-sending organization, placing career missionaries and short-term volunteers around the world. The focus was on "unreached people groups" (such as the Romany or the Kurds), rather than on nations; and many of the missionaries were assigned to immigrant (and native-born) communities in the United States. By 2008, the full-time mission force had grown to 160, with hundreds of volunteers participating in a wide range of short-term activities.

Other organizational functions were largely accomplished through a network of related, but independent, agencies, increasingly reaching across ethnic and national lines. The network began in the early 1990s, as new organizations were founded to service the growing number of churches no longer seeking resources from the SBC. From a press agency to an ethics center to an educational publishing house to several institutions for theological education, CBF became a hub for a growing network of disaffected Southern Baptists. As the founding conflicts receded from memory, CBF partners were as likely to be independent evangelical agencies or other Baptist bodies as to have their roots in the SBC.

Both churches and individuals can join the Fellowship, and governance is by a Coordinating Council, elected by those who attend the annual CBF General Assembly. Elected presidents have been both clergy and laity and both men and women. A professional staff of 60, located in Atlanta, is led by a chief executive who is called the "coordinator." In addition, 19 state and regional organizations exist throughout the United States. Seventeen years into its history, a budget of $22 million was supported by approximately 1,900 contributing churches, placing it among the 25 largest religious bodies in the United States.

Its increasing distance from the SBC and its increasingly comprehensive range of activity mean that CBF is often treated as a new denomination. By the late 1990s, for instance, the U.S. military recognized the CBF as a separate official endorsing body for chaplains, and more than 500 chaplains (military, hospital, and other) have been endorsed. While some of its member churches remain tied to the SBC, its national and regional structures are, in fact, a separate and comprehensive religious network.

Rev. Carolyn Hale Cubbedge, Assistant Minister, First Baptist Church of Savannah greets parishioners. The church is part of the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship which emphasizes local church autonomy. (AP/Wide World Images)

Cooperative Baptist Fellowship
PO Box 450329
Atlanta, GA 31145-0329
<http://www.thefellowship.info/>

Nancy T. Ammerman

See also: Baptists; Southern Baptist Convention; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Ammerman, Nancy T. "SBC Moderates and the Making of a Post-Modern Denomination." Christian Century 110, no. 26 (1993): 896–899.
- Lolley, W. Randall, ed. FINDINGS: A Report of the Special Study Commission to study the question:

"Should the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship become a separate denomination?" Atlanta, Georgia: Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, 1996.

Coptic Catholic Church

The Coptic Catholic Church, a church in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church, dates to the conversion in 1741 of a bishop of the Coptic Orthodox Church to Roman Catholicism, but has its roots in Roman Catholic attempts to establish missions in Egypt during the medieval period. In the fifth century, the majority of the Christians in Egypt were separated from the larger body of the Christian community (represented by the Eastern Orthodox churches and the Roman Catholic Church) by their refusal to affirm the promulgations of the Council of Chalcedon (451) concerning the nature of Christ. The orthodox Christian formulation taught that the divine and human natures were present in the one person of Christ. Egyptian Christians tended to follow a position called Monophysitism, which affirmed that Christ had only the divine nature. In the eyes of the rest of Christianity, the members of the Coptic church were heretics.

Representatives of the Coptic Orthodox church attended the Council of Florence in 1442 and signed a document of reconciliation with Rome, but upon their return found that their action was not supported by the church's leadership. Then in the 1600s, Roman Catholic missionaries began to work in Egypt, but a breakthrough only came in 1741 with the conversion of a Coptic bishop, who was subsequently appointed vicar apostolic of a Coptic Catholic Church. The church adopted Catholic doctrine but continued to use the Coptic liturgy with some minor changes.

In 1824, Pope Leo XII (r. 1923–1929) established an Egyptian patriarchate, but it remained inoperative until 1899, when Cyril Makarios was named patriarch of Alexandria of the Copts. He retained the office until 1908, when he resigned. The office was again vacant until 1947, when a new patriarch was named. By the end of the 1990s, the church had approximately 180,000 members, and was far larger than the Latin-rite Catholic Church in Egypt. Parishes are also found in neighboring Libya.

Membership in the church is divided into nine dioceses. The church supports six religious orders, an extensive parochial school system, a set of medical facilities, and St. Leo's Theological Seminary in Maadi (a Cairo suburb). There is no official Internet site, but an unofficial site at www.opuslibani.org.lb/copticmenufr.html provides valuable information. The church is an active member of the Middle East Council of Churches.

Coptic Catholic Church

BP 69

Rue Ibn Sandar

Pont de Koubbeh, Cairo
Egypt

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Middle East Council of Churches; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Liesel, Nikolaus. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Coptic Orthodox Church

The Coptic Orthodox Church traces its history to two important foundational events. According to the Bible, Jesus' parents fled to Egypt to keep him safe from the slaughter of Hebrew babies ordered by King Herod (Matthew 2:14). Then, following Jesus' death and resurrection, tradition attributes the founding of the Christian church in Egypt to the preaching of Saint Mark, the author of the Gospel that bears his name. It is known that Christianity spread through Egypt during the first century CE. More recently, a fragment of the Gospel of Mark in the Coptic language dated to the second century has been discovered.

Through the fourth century, Egypt was among the more important parts of the larger Christian community, and the city of Alexandria an important center of Christian learning. Athanasius, the major defender of what became orthodox Christian theology, was the bishop of Alexandria for almost half a century. However, in the fifth century, the Egyptian church was accused of holding the Monophysite position concerning the nature of Christ (that is, of holding that Christ's nature is only divine, not both divine and human), after its refusal to affirm the documents promulgated by the Council of Ephesus in 431 and the later Council at Chalcedon. The Coptic church became somewhat isolated from the rest of Christendom from that time forward.

The Coptic church's isolation was increased by the move of Islam into Egypt in the seventh century. The Christian community has since existed as a minority community in a Muslim nation. The Egyptian church enjoyed a special status, due in part to the special place that Egypt had in the experience of Muhammad (who married a maiden sent to him by Coptic Christian ruler Muqawqis), but nevertheless frequently through the centuries became the object of persecution. The Copts were a semiautonomous community, but each member was required to pay a special tax. Those who did so were regarded as dhimmis, or protected ones. Individuals who were unable to pay were faced with the choice of converting to Islam or losing their status as dhimmis. Thus, although they have had periods of prosperity, they have continually lived under the threat of the government turning on them.

The position of the Copts improved during the 19th century under the stability and tolerance of Muhammad Ali's dynasty. The Coptic community ceased to be regarded by the state as an administrative unit, and by 1855 the Gezya tax, the main mark of Copts' inferiority, was lifted, and shortly thereafter Copts started to serve in the Egyptian army. The 1919 revolution in Egypt, the first grassroots display of Egyptian identity in centuries, stands as a witness to the homogeneity of Egypt's modern society as including both its Muslim and Coptic sects. Today, this homogeneity is what keeps Egyptian society united against the religious intolerance of extremist groups, who occasionally subject the Copts to persecution.

The Christian monastic movement started in Egypt toward the end of the third century and from there spread to Asia Minor through the efforts of Saint Basil and to Europe by way of Saint Jerome and later Saint Benedict. Like many Eastern Orthodox churches, the Coptic church draws its episcopal leadership from its monastic ranks.

Doctrinally, the church adheres to the Nicene Creed, and insists that it has never adhered to the Monophysite position. It attributes the break with the remainder of Christendom in the fifth century to both politics (a desire to eliminate the independent Egyptian patriarch) and a linguistic misunderstanding. Coptic theology affirms that Christ the Lord is perfect in his divinity, and he is perfect in his humanity, but his divinity and his humanity were united in one nature, called "the nature of the incarnate word," a belief that was reiterated by Saint Cyril of Alexandria (376–444). Copts, thus, believe in two natures, human and divine, that are united in one "without mingling, without confusion, and without alteration." Contemporary church leaders from both Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches have tended to accept the Coptic church's explanation. These more positive relations began in 1971 with the visit of Pope Shenouda to Rome.

Copts observe seven sacraments: baptism, chrismation (or confirmation), the Eucharist, confession, Holy Orders, matrimony, and unction for the ill. Baptism is commonly performed for infants a few weeks after birth, and chrismation immediately thereafter. Weddings may not take place during a fasting season. Polygamy is not allowed, though recognized by the civil law in Egypt. Divorce is eschewed, except in the case of adultery or other extreme circumstances.

The church's leader, currently Shenouda III, is designated the pope of Alexandria. The church has some 11 million members scattered across Egypt and an additional million members across Africa, Europe, North America, Brazil, and Australia (2005). Its 1,500 parishes are divided into 72 dioceses (with some bishops serving as abbots of monastic communities). Outside of Egypt, there are dioceses headquartered in Kenya, Israel, Sudan, France, Italy, the United Kingdom, Germany, Ireland, and the United States.

The church is active in both the Middle East Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Coptic Orthodox Church
St. Mark's Cathedral
222 Ramses St.
Abbassia, Cairo
Egypt
<http://pharos.bu.edu/cnl>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Middle East Council of Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Gabra, Gawdat. Historical Dictionary of the Coptic Church. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2008.

- Hasan, S. S. Christians versus Muslims in Modern Egypt: The Century-Long Struggle for Coptic Equality. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Kamil, Jill. Christianity in the Land of the Pharaohs: The Coptic Orthodox Church. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Mienardus, Otto F. A. Two Thousand Years of Coptic Christianity. Cairo, Egypt: American University in Cairo Press, 2007.
- St. Mark and the Coptic Orthodox Church*. Cairo, Egypt: Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate, 1968.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Cordoba

The Spanish city of Cordoba was, along with Granada, one of the great cities of Spanish Islamic culture in the Middle Ages—culturally, religiously, commercially, and politically. At its height, it was the largest city of Europe. A symbol of Islamic power, it would later become a symbol of the reconquest of Spain by Christian forces.

Cordoba is located in south-central Spain, north of Granada. The Guadalquivir River that flows past it continues its southwest course through the Sierra Nevada Mountains to the Atlantic Ocean. It became an early center of commerce for the region. In the second century BCE, the Romans seized control and turned it into a prosperous colony. They were finally displaced by Germanic invaders from Central Europe who inhabited it between the fifth and eighth centuries CE. Muslim armies entering Spain from North Africa drove the Germanic rulers out in 711.

The Umayyad caliphs ruled their Spanish territory from Damascus, Syria, but in 750, the Umayyad dynasty was overthrown and, as his family was being killed, Abd ar-Rahman (r. 756–788), then but 16, fled Damascus, with Bedr, a former slave. Narrowly escaping death, it took him several years to reach Morocco. Looking toward the descendants of the Syrians who had conquered Spain, he found a divided community ruled by a weak emir. He was able to locate some loyal subjects of the Umayyad dynasty and to them he proclaimed his place as the rightful Umayyad heir. He gathered those loyal to him, and established his throne in Cordoba, though not without a fight. Abd ar-Rahman assumed the title of emir.

In 784 the emir purchased the Church of St. Vincent, the primary Christian facility in Cordoba, had it demolished, and began the building of what would become the Great Mosque. It was located adjacent to his palace. He named it the Aljama Mosque after his wife. As the mosque, the greatest example of Muslim architecture in the city, reached its first phase of completion, it had one unique feature: the mihrab, the niche in a mosque's wall that indicates the qibla, the direction of the Kaaba in the mosque at Mecca, the direction that worshippers should be facing while at prayer. The qibla should have been in the east, but was located in the south, which would be the proper direction if one were in Damascus, from which Abd ar-Rahman had been driven.

The mosque would undergo a variety of improvements over the next two centuries. The city would achieve the height of its greatness during the reign of Abd ar-Rahman III (r. 912–961), the first of the Umayyad rulers to use the title caliph. He had a new minaret added to the mosque. His successor, Al-Hakam II (r. 961–976), had the mosque enlarged and further decorated the mihrab. The last of the significant improvements to the mosque occurred during the reign of Al-Mansur Ibn Abi Aamir (r. 981–1002).

During his reign, Ibn Abi Aamir controlled all of the Iberian peninsula except its northwest corner. Cordoba, his capital, had some 300,000 residents and stood as Europe's largest city. Ibn Abi Aamir also set the stage for the eventual fall of Islamic Spain. At one point he ransacked Santiago de Compostela, the major Christian pilgrimage site where one of the 12 Apostles of Jesus was buried. Then he was accused of pedophilia, forcing himself upon a boy whom he later executed. The boy was quickly hailed as a Christian martyr and canonized as Saint Pelagius of Cordova. The two events served as uniting and motivating forces in the reconquest of Muslim Iberia by Christian forces.

In the remaining two centuries of Muslim control of Cordoba, it flourished as an intellectual center.

Pillars and arches of the Mezquita in Cordoba, Spain. At one time the second largest mosque in the world, the Mezquita is now a Roman Catholic cathedral officially known as the Cathedral of St. Mary of the Assumption. (Vanbeets/Dreamstime.com)

Among the notable Muslim scholars who lived there were Ibn Hazm (994–1064), who mastered most of the subjects known in his day from philosophy and theology to law and literature; Imam Abu ‘Abdullah Al-Qurtubi (1214–1273), a classical Muslim scholar; and most famous of all Ibn Rushd (1126–1198), better known throughout the West as Averroes, one of the men most credited with reintroducing Christian Europe to the writings of Aristotle. Not as well-known as a center for Jewish studies as was Granada, Cordoba had a small Jewish community that became the home to one of the most famous rabbi/scholars of all time, Moses Maimonides (aka Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon, 1135–1204), the preeminent Jewish thinker of the era, also known for his appropriation of and passing on the teachings of Aristotle.

Cordoba was at this time home to a variety of luxurious palaces and palace cities built around the city’s outskirts. Among these was the Madinat al-Zahra, built by Abd al-Rahman III, and known for its fine gardens and Arabesque decorations. It was unfortunately destroyed in 1013. The city’s intellectual life was based on its many schools, both Muslim and Christian. It also was home to Alcazar library, which boasted some 400,000 books, making it by far the largest library in Europe in the 11th and 12th centuries.

Cordoba finally fell to Christian forces in 1236. They initially occupied the Alcazar, the main government palace. They also assumed control of the Great Mosque, within whose walls they constructed a Gothic cathedral and several chapels. This action was seen as an act of displacing Islam with Christianity.

As modern Spain came into existence, Cordoba would begin to decline in status, though it would remain an important political center for several centuries. As late as the 15th century, the Spanish rulers King Ferdinand (1452–1516) and Queen Isabella (1451–1504) were officially based in Cordoba and occasionally held court there as they directed the final push of Islamic rule from Granada. Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) lived there for a time, prior to his first voyage to the Americas.

After Philip II (1527–1598), who moved the Spanish court to Madrid in 1561, Cordoba was forced to accept its present role as a provincial city capital.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Damascus; Martyrdom; Mecca; Mosques.

References

- Hillenbrand, Robert. "Ornament of the World: Medieval Cordoba as a Cultural Centre." In The Legacy of Muslim Spain, edited by Sakna Jgadra Hattysum, 2 vols., 1:112–135. Leiden: Brill, 1994.
- Lowney, Chris. A Vanished World: Muslims, Christians, and Jews in Medieval Spain. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Menocal, Maria Rosa. The Ornament of the World: How Muslims, Jews, and Christians Created a Culture of Tolerance in Medieval Spain. New York: Little, Brown and Company, 2002.
- Nash, Elizabeth. Seville, Cordoba, and Granada: A Cultural History. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.

■ Costa Rica

Called the "Switzerland of the Americas," Costa Rica is located in Central America, between Nicaragua to the north and Panama to the south. The country is bordered by the Pacific Ocean on the west and by the Caribbean Sea on the east. This largely mountainous country, about the size of West Virginia, was home to nearly 4 million people as the 21st century began, two-thirds of whom live in the fertile Central Valley where the country's largest cities are found: San José (the capital since 1838), Cartago, Heredia, and Alajuela. The country has an area of 19,730 square miles.

The total population of Costa Rica (4,253,877) as of June 2009 was composed of the following ethnic groups: Spanish-speaking Costa Ricans, 77.7 percent; Spanish-speaking Nicaraguans, 13.8 percent; other Spanish-speakers (Central and South Americans, Cubans, and Puerto Ricans), 2.8 percent; Native Americans, 1.1 percent; Asians (Chinese and Koreans), 1.0 percent; Afro-Americans (English-speaking), 2.0 percent; and Caucasians (citizens of the United States, Canadians, Europeans, Middle Easterners), 2.0 percent. The literacy rate was 93 percent.

European discovery of Costa Rica was made by Christopher Columbus during his fourth voyage to the Americas in 1502, when he sailed from Honduras to Panama and anchored briefly off the Caribbean coast of a land that was later called the "Rich Coast" due to its lush tropical vegetation. However, it was on the Pacific coast that the Spanish conquistadors first explored the territory of Costa Rica: Gáspar de Espinosa, accompanied by Hernán Ponce de León and Juan de Castañeda, in 1519, and Gil González Dávila in 1522. Participating in the later expedition was the Spanish Roman Catholic priest, Diego de Agüero, who became the first foreign religious worker to visit present-day Costa Rica and Nicaragua. After exploring the Nicoya Peninsula (extending southeast from the northwestern territory of Costa Rica), the Spaniards established a temporary settlement among the Chorotega people, where the priest claimed to have converted and baptized about 6,000 individuals—although neither the Spaniards nor the Chorotegas understood each other's language. The first Roman Catholic chapel in Costa Rica was built in 1544 in the village of Nicoya during the administration of the first governor, Diego Gutiérrez. In 1560, Franciscan friar Juan Estrada Rávago arrived on the Caribbean coast from Granada, Nicaragua, and he is credited with advancing the evangelization of Amerindians in Costa Rica.

In addition to the Chorotegas, Costa Rica was inhabited by several other Amerindian groups: the Huetares in the Central Valley and Caribbean coast, and the Brunecas in the southern region along the Pacific coast. Although scholars disagree about the size of the indigenous population in Costa Rica at the beginning of the Spanish Conquest, some early records (1569) indicate that there were probably no more than 30,000 Chibchan-speaking peoples present in 1502. Many of the Amerindians later died of disease or at the hands of the Spaniards during battle, which led to a decline in the total population. By 1611, the entire population of Costa Rica was reported as 15,000, including Amerindians, Spaniards, and mestizos. Today, the descendants of the original indigenous peoples number about 40,000 and are known as Cabécares, Bribris, Guaymí, Borucas, Téribes, Guatusos, and Huértares.

Evangelical church in Costa Rica. Some Protestant churches in Costa Rica represent traditional denominations, but many, like the “World of Faith” pictured here, do not and may be found in working-class neighborhoods mixed in among commercial establishments. (Photo by Meg Mitchell)

During the Spanish colonial period, Costa Rica became a nation of small farmers because there were no significant mineral resources to exploit, such as gold and silver. Therefore, the colonists turned to producing sufficient food products for their own survival, as well as to producing goods for export to other Spanish colonies. The socioeconomic elite of the era were the principal families of the colonial capital of Cartago (founded in 1563) who traced their lineage to the Spanish conquistadors, and who controlled the cattle ranches of Guanacaste on the Pacific coast and the cacao-producing areas around Matina on the Caribbean coast. These families monopolized the wholesale and retail trade in Costa Rica, and they dominated civil, military, and ecclesiastical life.

The 18th century in Costa Rica produced an increasing racial mixture of whites, blacks, and Amerindians, which created today’s majority mestizo population. This new mestizo peasantry began to populate other parts of the Central Valley, in particular the fertile land around Heredia (founded in 1706), San José (founded in 1736), and Alajuela (founded in 1782), where local chapels were constructed and administered by the few Catholic priests then in Costa Rica.

COSTA RICA

Although during the colonial period (1519–1821) Spaniards and Roman Catholicism dominated the social and religious life of Costa Rica, beginning in the mid-1800s some ethnic, racial, and religious diversity appeared. The first Protestant worship services were conducted in San José during the 1840s among English-speaking foreigners, who were mainly American, British, and German citizens. This congregation eventually became the nondenominational Church of the Good Shepherd, now Episcopalian. During the mid-1800s, indentured servants were imported from mainland China to provide laborers for the growing coffee industry, and they brought their ancient religious beliefs and practices with them. During the late 1800s, additional Chinese laborers arrived in Costa Rica, along with Asian Indians and Afro-American immigrants from the British-controlled West Indies, particularly Jamaica, to help with railroad construction and banana industry development on the Caribbean coast. Most of the Asian Indians were Hindus, and the majority of the black West Indians were English-speaking Protestants upon their arrival; the latter established the first Baptist, Methodist, and Anglican churches on the Caribbean coast.

Following independence from Spain in 1821, liberal political parties vied with conservative ones for control of the government until the 1940s, when new political options and ideologies appeared on the national stage. During the 1800s, Costa Ricans became more conscious of the larger world and the need to strengthen their economy by exporting goods to North America and Europe, and by importing goods to make their life easier. During the late 1800s, coffee production and exportation became the country's leading industry, and its capital of San José became a showcase for the newly found prosperity: elaborate new public buildings, hotels, churches, homes, parks, and monuments were constructed, including the impressive National Theater (1897) that is a replica of the Paris Opera House.

Since the mid-1940s, two major political ideologies have dominated Costa Rican politics: the Calderonista movement (founded by Rafael Ángel Calderón Guardia, president from 1940 to 1944, based on Social Christian Catholic ideology) and the Social Democrat movement (founded in 1951 by José “Pepe” Figueres, who was president for three terms: 1948–1949, 1953–1958, and 1970–1974). Today, the Social Christian Unity Party (PUSC, conservative) represents the former, and the National Liberation Party (PLN, liberal) represents the latter. Between 1950 and 1990, the PLN won more presidential elections than the PUSC, but during the period 1998–2006 PUSC won two presidential elections, under Miguel Ángel Rodríguez (1998–2002) and Dr. Abel Pacheco (2002–2006). Democracy, peace, stability, and economic growth and development have characterized this nation since 1950.

Dr. Oscar Arias Sánchez (Ph.D. in political science) of the PLN served as president from 1986 to 1990 and won the Nobel Prize for Peace in 1987 for proposing the “Arias Peace Plan” (also known as “Esquipulas II”). The presidents of Central America signed this peace proposal in August 1987, thereby ending a series of armed conflicts in the region between Marxist-led insurgents and democratically elected governments during an ugly era of the Cold War in Central America.

After a Constitution reform was approved in 2005 that permitted the re-election of former presidents, Dr. Arias ran again on the PLN ticket and won the presidency in 2006, which was the first time in 36 years that such a thing had happened. Arias's opponent in the 2006 election was economist Ottón Solís Fallas of the Citizen's Action Party (PAC), a center-left party composed mainly of PLN dissidents who strongly opposed the PLN's neoliberal “free trade” policies with the U.S. government.

Until the mid-1800s, the Roman Catholic Church of Costa Rica was administered as part of the Episcopal Province of León, Nicaragua, founded in 1534. However, in 1850, Pope Pius IX created an independent bishopric (diocese) in Costa Rica and appointed Dr. Anselmo Llorente y Lafuente (a Costa Rican) as its first bishop. In 1852, the government signed a Concordat with the Vatican, by which the jurisdiction of church property and its temporal rights were transferred to the civil authorities. The first Catholic seminary was established for training local priests in 1878, and the Diocese of San José was elevated to an archdiocese in 1921.

Juan Primitivo Próspero Fernández Oreamuno, president from 1882 to 1885, implemented measures that sought to undermine the power of the Catholic Church; he withdrew the Concordat with the Vatican, expelled the Jesuits and the German Bishop Bernardo Augusto Thiel Hoffman (1880-1901) from the country, and in 1884 passed laws that placed cemeteries under state control, introduced civil marriage, and legalized divorce.

It was not until the administration of President Rafael Ángel del Socorro Calderón Guardia (1940–1944) that the anti-clerical laws of 1884 and 1894 were repealed, which prohibited religious instruction in schools and the presence of religious orders in Costa Rica.

For centuries Catholic religious life was centered in the old cathedral of the nation's colonial capital and in the shrine of Our Lady of the Angels, both located in Cartago, where the faithful believe that a small statue of the Virgin Mary and Child mysteriously appeared to a pardo woman (of mixed Indian and Negro blood), known today as Juana Pereira, in 1635. However, the veneration of the hand-carved stone statue of the Black Madonna, known as La Negrita, at Our Lady of the Angels chapel was not popular outside Cartago until the Catholic hierarchy began to promote this in the 1880s. After 1926, when Our Lady of the Angels became the nation's patron saint, the most important religious holiday in Costa Rica has been on August 2, the Virgin of the Angels Day. Beginning the previous day, tens of thousands of Catholics of all ages participate in an all-night pilgrimage by walking from their home towns to the Basilica de Nuestra Señora de Los Ángeles in Cartago. Annually, during the morning of August 2, the nation's Catholic clergy, led by the archbishop, conduct a special ceremony in honor of the Virgin Mary in the large plaza facing the Basilica, where great crowds of Catholics and some foreign tourists typically gather. The statue of the Black Madonna is believed to have great healing powers, which is demonstrated by the presence of thousands of small replicas of body parts (housed in glass-covered display cases) that people have given to the Basilica as a testimony of their alleged miraculous healing after making a pilgrimage and praying before the altar.

Historically, the Costa Rican Catholic Church has suffered from a lack of economic resources, as was true in other Central American countries, because it depended on the tithes of a relatively small and poor population. Even in the mid-1970s, the Catholic Church was still small and poor as an organization in Costa Rica, with only about 350 priests to attend to the spiritual needs of about 1.9 million parishioners, which is about one priest for every 5,429 Catholics. Although the Archdiocese of San José reported one priest for an average of 3,000 Catholics, many remote parishes were not as well off: Tilarán had one priest for every 7,600 people and San Isidro de El General had one priest for every 8,700 people. Although the majority of the diocesan priests were Costa Ricans, nearly all the religious priests (members of religious orders) were foreign-born, mainly from Spain, Germany, Italy, and the United States.

Although nationally the priest-to-population ratio was about 1:3,955 Catholics in 1999, this was a marked improvement over the mid-1970s. Part of this change was due to the improved operation of the Central Seminary in Paso Ancho for the preparation of diocesan priests, and of the Franciscan Seminary in Sabanilla for the training of religious priests. However, in 2004, the large Archdiocese of San José, with a reported population of 1,621,800 parishioners, only had a total of 395 priests (diocesan and religious), which is an average of one priest for 4,105 Catholics. This is about the same proportion of priests-to-population as existed in the archdiocese in 1949.

Several diverse tensions arose within the Costa Rican Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s). Reformers generally supported the church's modern, post-Second Vatican Council stance. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new

Costa Rica

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,788,000	4,517,000	96.8	1.94	5,303,000	6,058,000
Roman Catholics	1,688,000	4,150,000	89.0	1.55	4,700,000	5,200,000
Protestants	51,400	480,000	10.3	3.78	700,000	900,000
Independents	18,300	225,000	4.8	4.10	350,000	500,000
Agnostics	9,300	80,000	1.7	2.76	150,000	240,000
Chinese folk	5,000	25,000	0.5	1.95	32,000	40,000
Baha'is	5,600	14,000	0.3	1.95	22,000	32,500
Atheists	5,000	12,200	0.3	1.95	20,000	30,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,000	8,500	0.2	1.95	9,000	9,000
Spiritists	4,000	4,000	0.1	1.95	5,500	6,000
Jews	1,500	2,700	0.1	1.95	3,600	6,200
Buddhists	2,000	1,400	0.0	1.94	2,500	3,200
Hindus	0	600	0.0	1.96	1,000	1,500
Total population	1,821,000	4,665,000	100.0	1.95	5,549,000	6,426,000

vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Costa Rican society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people in neighboring Nicaragua as a means of overthrowing the Somoza dictatorship and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

The origin and development of the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement in Costa Rica during the early 1970s had a strong impact on many Catholics, although it also created a great deal of controversy. Opponents denounced it as the “Pentecostalization” of the church. The visits by several Catholic Charismatic leaders to Costa Rica, such as Dominican priest Francis MacNutt, Catholic laywoman Barbara Shlemon (RN), and other members of MacNutt’s team in 1970–1971, preceded by the visit of an evangelical Charismatic pastor from Argentina, Juan Carlos Ortiz of the Assemblies of God, in 1969, resulted in the birth of an ecumenical Charismatic movement that removed some of the previous barriers to fellowship that existed between Catholics and evangelicals. In July 1973, Father Francis Corbett visited Costa Rica and spoke to numerous groups, which further impacted the development of the CCR in this nation.

Following the visits by MacNutt and Corbett between 1970 and 1973, the leadership of the CCR in Costa Rica was assumed by Padre Reinaldo Pol Iparaguirre, who initially welcomed Catholics as well as evangelicals to CCR activities held in Catholic institutions and private homes. In addition, a group of university students, Catholics and evangelicals, who were influenced by MacNutt’s ministry, founded the Agape Coffee House ministry in May 1972 in San Pedro, Montes de Oca, near the University of Costa Rica campus. This ecumenical coffee house ministry had a strong impact on scores of university students who became active Charismatics until it was closed sometime in 1974.

Father Corbett also spoke at Holy Trinity Catholic Church in Barrio México to a group that had begun the “official” Catholic Charismatic Renewal in Costa Rica in 1972, led by a Catholic couple—José Miguel and Silvina Arias—and José Miguel’s sister, Sor Cecilia Arias of the Sisters of Charity. Father Corbett also attended other meetings with Catholics during those few days, and prayed over people to be baptized in the Holy Spirit. The Arias family provided key leadership to the CCR, and Padre Pol, who was a very close assistant to Archbishop Carlos Humberto Rodríguez Quirós (1960–1979), joined the group some time later.

By the mid-1970s, Catholic and evangelical Charismatics went their separate ways, due mainly to restrictions placed on ecumenical cooperation between the two groups by the Catholic hierarchy, which placed a strong emphasis on different practices of popular piety that had fallen into relative disuse after the Second Vatican Council, such as rosaries, pilgrimages, and novenas. All this Catholic reaction was favored by the style of the new pope, John Paul II (elected in 1978), who, contrary to Paul VI (r. 1963–1978), was very favorable to traditional piety and to promoting Marian devotion. After Bishop Román Arrieta, until then of the Diocese of Tilarán, became the archbishop of San José in 1979, he gave support to the Catholic Charismatic Renewal, but he also made sure that it was strictly Catholic. Although he supported ecumenism in theory, he often spoke against “fundamentalist sects” and discouraged specific expressions of ecumenism in his archdiocese. However, he did endorse the Comunidad Agape (later called Arbol de Vida) as an “official” ecumenical group within his archdiocese.

Charismatic Catholics have made a significant contribution to church renewal in Costa Rica by opening an opportunity for greater participation by the laity in church activities, including hundreds of home Bible study and prayer groups that were established throughout the country, especially in the San José metro area. This movement deepened the faith and commitment of tens of thousands of Catholics and led to liturgical changes in worship services and to greater spiritual vitality in the daily lives of believers, mainly among the middle and upper classes.

The CCR in Costa Rica was mainly an effort led by Catholic laypeople with the participation of a few Catholic priests and nuns, such as Padre Pol. In 1982, an estimated 25,000 people attended a CCR celebration at the National Stadium in San José, which was reported to be the largest Charismatic gathering in the history of Costa Rica.

In 2002, the Ecclesiastical Conference of Costa Rica (CECOR) consisted of 7 dioceses and 284 parishes, which were served by 561 diocesan priests and 192 religious priests, for a total of 753. In July 2002, Monseñor Hugo Barrantes Ureña was appointed as archbishop of San José. In May 2005 the Diocese of Cartago was created. The Catholic University of Costa Rica (Universidad Católica de Costa Rica Anselmo Llorente y Lafuente) was founded in 1993.

While the nation’s Constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the state religion and requires that the state contribute to its maintenance, it also prohibits the state from impeding the free exercise of other religions that do not violate universal morality or proper behavior.

The numerical growth and geographical expansion of independent Western Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions, Protestant denominations, marginal Christian groups, and non-Christian religions in Costa Rica is largely a phenomenon of the post–World War II era, which also witnessed a decline in Catholic Mass attendance and in the observance of older Catholic traditions.

Protestantism Although the Roman Catholic Church remains the dominant religion of Costa Rica, the growth of new religious movements during the 20th century—especially among Protestants since the 1960s—has led to the current situation of religious pluralism, which is demonstrated by the following polls. According to a national public opinion poll by CID-Gallup in September 2003, the Catholic population was 69 percent, Protestants 18 percent, other religions one percent, and those with no religion (or no answer) 12 percent. An August–September 2008 public opinion poll by Simer, S.A. on the Greater Metropolitan Region (GAM), which includes the cities of San José, Cartago, Heredia, and Alajuela in the Central Valley, reported that Catholics were 47.2 percent, Protestants 24.1 percent, other religions 1.7 percent, and those with no religious affiliation (or no response) 26.9 percent. A comparison of these two polls reveals that Protestant adherents and those with no religion have a stronger presence in GAM than in the rest of the country, whereas Catholic adherents are stronger in smaller population areas.

The earliest Protestant missionary efforts in Costa Rica took place in the 1880s among English-speaking West Indians (Afro-Caribbean peoples), who came from the British West Indies to work on the construction of a railroad (1870–1890) between the capital city of San José in the Central Valley and Port Limón on the Caribbean coast. Many of these laborers remained on the Caribbean coast to work in railroad maintenance, agriculture (cacao and banana plantations), fishing, and other endeavors, and they brought their own belief systems with them: Myalism (an African adaptation of Christianity), Obeah (witchcraft), and Protestant Christianity. The Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society sent its first worker to Costa Rica in 1887, the British Methodists in 1894, the Anglicans in 1896, the Seventh-day Adventists in 1903, and the Salvation Army in 1907.

The first Protestant worship services were conducted in San José, the nation's capital, in the 1840s among English-speaking foreigners, mainly American, British, and German citizens. The first Protestant chapel, Church of the Good Shepherd, was constructed in San José in 1865 to serve the expatriate community. Although this church was founded as a nondenominational worship center, in 1896 it became part of the Anglican Communion.

The activities of the British and Foreign Bible Society, beginning in 1845, and the American Bible Society (1890s) in San José and other major cities helped to promote Bible reading among Costa Ricans, and to strengthen the resolve of early Protestants to maintain their faith in an environment of religious intolerance created by Roman Catholics.

The first Protestant mission agency (nondenominational) to work in the Central Valley of Costa Rica was the Central American Mission (now CAM International), founded in Dallas, Texas, by Dr. C. I. Scofield and three friends "to pursue evangelism in Central America." The first CAM missionary couple was the Reverend and Mrs. William McConnell, who arrived in Port Limón in February 1891 and located in San José with "a vision to evangelize the nation's 280,000 souls." This work progressed very slowly and with great difficulty due to strong opposition from Catholic priests and the general public in the Central Valley.

By 1950, at least 15 Protestant mission agencies had begun work in Costa Rica, including those mentioned previously. Five missionary societies concentrated on West Indians along the Caribbean coast, and the other societies devoted their efforts to reaching the Spanish-speaking population, largely in the Central Valley. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now part of the United Methodist Church) arrived in 1917, followed by independent Pentecostal missionaries in 1918 (this work is now under the Pentecostal Holiness Church International), the Latin American Evangelization Campaign (founded by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Strachan) in 1921, the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana) in 1939, the Church of God International (Cleveland, Tennessee) also in 1939, the Southern Baptist Convention in 1943, the Assemblies of God in 1944, the Pentecostal Church of God (from Puerto Rico) in 1945, and the American Baptist Association in 1946.

The nondenominational Latin America Evangelization Campaign (LAEC), later known as the Latin America Mission (LAM), entered Costa Rica in 1921, under the leadership of Scottish Presbyterian missionaries, the Reverend and Mrs. Harry Strachan. The mission began as a promoter of evangelistic campaigns throughout Latin America, and soon came to have a major role in pulling the evangelical movement in Costa Rica out of its impasse and stagnation. This was accomplished by means of local evangelistic campaigns and the cooperative institutional efforts promoted by the Strachans.

In 1923, Harry and Susan Strachan established a Women's Bible Training School in their home, which was converted into a coeducational Bible Institute in 1924. In 1925, the Bible Institute was functioning with 19 students and a faculty composed of missionaries of the Central American Mission, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the LAEC. This interdenominational Bible Institute met a long-felt need and was well received in evangelical circles, resulting in many mission agencies deciding to send students to the school. In 1930, there were 40 students, representing 11 countries and 8 denominations or mission agencies. The name was changed to the Latin America Biblical Seminary in 1941, when its academic standards were raised to meet the growing needs of the evangelical movement.

Other ministries were created by the LAEC to further its ministry of service in Latin America. In 1926, a Spanish literature ministry was initiated that later became Editorial Caribe/LAMP (Latin America Mission Publications) in 1949, now one of the most important publishers and distributors of evangelical literature in Latin America. The Bible Clinic was constructed in 1929 to care for people, mainly evangelicals, who needed hospitalization, since prejudice by Catholics was so strong against them that they were sometimes refused entrance to the city hospital or, once interned, were neglected. Although Costa Rica was becoming more liberal, fanaticism still persisted in many of the state and Catholic institutions. A new hospital building was added to the older Bible Clinic facilities in 1975, which doubled the capacity to more than 60 beds. Since 1968, the hospital has been entirely under national management and constant improvements have been made among its staff and in its infrastructure. During the early 2000s, the older buildings were remodeled and new buildings were constructed or acquired, which has made Hospital Clínica Bíblica, now with international accreditation, the largest (more than 200 beds) and most prestigious private hospital in the nation. Today, this is an experienced world-class medical institution with state-of-the-art facilities and medical services, valued at more than $50 million.

Susan Strachan had a great concern for sick and homeless children, and in 1931, when a 200-acre dairy and coffee farm was purchased by the LAEC, her dreams were fulfilled by the establishment of an evangelical orphanage in 1932, called the Bible Home, located in San José de la Montaña. Hundreds of orphaned and abandoned Costa Rican children have been cared for by the Bible Home, and some of them have become outstanding evangelical leaders. In 1947, a Christian camping ministry was added, utilizing part of the Mission farm; Camp Roblealto thus became one of the earliest such camping ministries in all of Latin America. Both of these ministries are now under the ownership and administration of the Roblealto Child-care Association, founded in 1970.

The period 1941 to 1971 brought many changes to the LAEC. In 1941, its name was changed to the Latin America Mission (LAM) to reflect the expanding interests and ministries of the Mission. With the death of Harry Strachan in 1945, followed by his wife Susan in 1950, their university-educated son, Kenneth, became the general director of the LAM (1950–1965). Following the death of Kenneth Strachan, Horace L. Fenton Jr. served as general director from 1965 to 1971, at which time all of the LAM's ministries became autonomous entities.

The 1940s witnessed the emergence of the Costa Rican Bible Churches Association (AIBC), which grew out of the LAM's evangelistic ministry. Although it was not the Strachans' intention to plant local churches, the expansion occurred naturally, resulting from evangelistic work by students and faculty of the Bible Institute and from evangelistic campaigns sponsored by the LAEC. During the 1920s and 1930s, local congregations were formed in the Central Valley and in the northwestern coastal province of Guanacaste. The Bible Temple in San José, organized in 1929, remained the center of these efforts, with the distinction of being the largest evangelical church in the country at that time.

In 1945, the AIBC was formally organized with 14 churches and 406 baptized members; however, the number of active adherents was considerably larger. The LAM, during its early years of evangelistic enthusiasm, did not adequately follow up and consolidate the gains made in evangelism by organizing new believers into local congregations. This lack of proper ecclesiastical organization was a common defect of independent missions, such as the CAM and LAM, and stemmed from an inadequate concept of the importance of the local church. The first LAM missionary to see this weakness was Kenneth Strachan, who initiated the preliminary steps that led to the formation of the AIBC in 1945. However, many of the AIBC's founding congregations had only been organized locally the year before, when the first Latin American pastors of various nationalities were ordained. By 1959, much progress had been made toward self-support among congregations affiliated with the AIBC. In 1960, the AIBC reported 13 organized churches, 18 missions, and 37 preaching points, with a total membership of 1,055.

Between 1946 and 1982 numerous new LAM ministries were added: Radio Station TIFC, "The Light of the Caribbean," in 1946–1948; Colegio Monterrey (primary and secondary education) in 1956; Department of Evangelism (later called Evangelism-in-Depth) in 1959; Goodwill Caravans in 1960; Ministry to the Student World (MINAMUNDO) in 1967; Christian Ministries to the English-speaking (AMCA) in 1968; Roblealto Childcare Association in 1970; International Institute of In-Depth Evangelization (IINDEF) in 1971; the Latin American Center for Pastoral Studies (CELEP) in 1979; and the Missiological Institute of the Americas (IMDELA) in 1982.

It was under Kenneth Strachan's leadership that a major concern for mass evangelization was rekindled in the LAM, a vision that came to fruition beginning about 1948. The renewed evangelistic emphasis was seen in the expansion and growth of the AIBC, in the LAM's participation in the 1958 Billy Graham Caribbean Crusade, and in the decade of Evangelism-in-Depth campaigns held throughout the continent during the 1960s: Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, Venezuela, Bolivia, Dominican Republic, Peru, Colombia, Ecuador, and Paraguay.

Evangelical leaders in Costa Rica still remember the year of Evangelism-in-Depth (1960–1961) as a turning point in the history of the evangelical movement in the country, due to the strong impact that this cooperative effort had on the life and testimony of Costa Rican evangelicals. They were no longer a persecuted minority, but a growing army of committed disciples of Christ, who eagerly shared their faith with others and openly invited people to their local churches.

In 1971, the LAM was restructured under national leadership to provide a new organizational framework for the expanding ministries of its former departments. The Community of Latin American Evangelical Ministries (CLAME) was formed as an international federation of Christian organizations serving the evangelical community with ministries in Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, and Mexico. Although CLAME was dissolved in 1986, most of its component ministries continue to exist as autonomous entities.

Between 1950 and 1985, at least 28 additional Protestant mission agencies began work in Costa Rica, and numerous other church bodies came into existence as the result of the nationalization of missionary efforts, as a reaction to missionary domination, or as a result of independent efforts.

The latest national survey of Protestant churches in Costa Rica conducted by PROLADES (2000–2001) identified 210 church associations with 2,367 local congregations distributed as follows: non-Pentecostal groups (908, or 41.5 percent) and Pentecostal (1,459, or 58.5 percent). The total Protestant church membership (over 15 years of age) was estimated at 235,000, and the total Protestant population at about 800,000.

Today, there are four Protestant universities in Costa Rica that operate with official government authorization under the supervision of the country's Council of Higher Education (CONESUP): the Adventist University of Central America (UNADECA), founded in 1986; the Latin American Biblical University–UBLA (formerly the Latin American Biblical Seminary, 1924), founded in 1997; the Evangelical University of the Americas (UNELA), a merger of the Missiological Institute of the Americas (IMDELA, 1982) and the Nazarene University of the Americas (UNAZA, 1992), established as UNELA in 1998; and the Methodist University of Costa Rica (UNIMET), founded in 2001.

Most of the more conservative Protestant denominations and independent churches are associated with the Costa Rican Evangelical Alliance (Alianza Evangélica Costarricense), which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance (WEF). The Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI) is represented in Costa Rica by the Evangelical Methodist Church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Costa Rican Lutheran Church, the Federation of Baptist Associations, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church (a split from the AIBC), the Episcopal Church, the Moravian Church, and the Faith and Holiness Pentecostal Church; and CLAI is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC).

The Charismatic Renewal movement (CRM) began in Costa Rica during the period 1969–1973 inspired by the visit of several evangelical Charismatic leaders from the Argentine Charismatic Renewal movement in Buenos Aires: Juan Carlos Ortiz (Assemblies of God) and Alberto Mottesi (Baptist). After hearing about the Argentine Renewal movement that began among the Plymouth Brethren in Buenos Aires in 1968, a small group of evangelical leaders (led by Jonás González and Rubén Loes of the LAM) in Costa Rica agreed to invite Ortiz to visit San José and share what was happening in Argentina at a “Seminar on Evangelization.” This seminar, held in September 1969, was well attended by an ample cross-section of evangelical leaders who were electrified by his message.

Many of the early CRM activities were associated with the Bible Temple (Templo Bíblico) in downtown San José (affiliated with the AIBC), which was one of the largest congregations in the country in 1970. After Ortiz shared his testimony regarding the Argentine Renewal movement at the Bible Temple, this historic non-Pentecostal church (founded by the LAEC/LAM in 1927) became a catalyst for the CRM in Costa Rica. The CRM soon spread during the next few years to most of the AIBC churches in the Central Valley and Guanacaste province, and to some churches affiliated with the Baptist Convention, the Evangelical Methodist Church, the Association of Central American Churches, as well as many Pentecostal denominations.

An additional catalyst for the spread of the CRM in Costa Rica was evangelical radio station TIFC, known as “Faro del Caribe,” owned and operated by the LAM, which broadcast the recorded messages that Ortiz delivered at the “Seminar on Evangelization” in 1969. This was followed by recorded messages delivered in San José by other charismatic leaders: Gerardo de Ávila (a Cuban Pentecostal pastor from New York City) in 1970, Alberto Mottes (a Baptist pastor from Buenos Aires) in 1971, as well as a second visit by Ortiz that year and two more visits in 1972 and one by Father Francis MacNutt (a Dominican priest from the United States) in 1971 as well as Víctor Landero (an evangelical pastor from Colombia with the LAM-affiliated Association of Bible Churches of the Caribbean) in 1972.

After several members on the Board of Elders of the Bible Temple attended a private gathering of Catholics and Protestants in 1971 to hear the testimonies of Father MacNutt, Catholic laywoman Barbara Shlemon (RN), and Methodist pastors Tommy Tyson and Joe Petree concerning the nature, origin, and early development of the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement in the United States (which began in 1967 at Duquesne and Notre Dame universities), Father MacNutt was invited to speak at the Bible Temple on a Sunday morning. This was the first time in memory that a Catholic priest had spoken from the pulpit of an evangelical church in Costa Rica, and MacNutt gave a powerful message at the Bible Temple regarding the person, power, and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including “speaking in tongues,” prophecy, and healing) that had a great spiritual impact on the audience. This event further stimulated the growth and expansion of the CRM among AIBC churches through the country.

Other catalysts for the spread of the ecumenical CRM in Costa Rica were the establishment of chapters of the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship and Women’s Aglow Fellowship in the San José metro area during the late 1970s, which were well attended by evangelical and Catholic laymen and laywomen. In addition to regular weekly luncheon meetings, both of these organizations also sponsored small Bible study groups in private homes for men and women as well as for couples. These small group meetings, directed by lay leaders, became an important part of the development of the CRM movement in Costa Rica, not only in the Central Valley but also in other parts of the country.

Following a “Divine Healing Campaign” in San José led by Pentecostal evangelist T. L. Osborn in February 1973, there was a negative backlash among many non-Pentecostal evangelical pastors, denominational leaders, and missionaries, who were strongly opposed to Pentecostal and Charismatic (also called neo-Pentecostal) teachings concerning the baptism of the Holy Spirit, speaking in tongues, prophecy, faith healing, and casting out of evil spirits. The Fundamentalists, who are strong advocates of Dispensationalism, were particularly antagonistic toward Pentecostals and Charismatics (especially the Catholic variety), and toward non-Pentecostals who were sympathetic to the CRM. During the 1970s and 1980s, within some non-Pentecostal denominations, pastors and laypeople who became Charismatics were publicly rebuked and shunned, which resulted in an exodus of thousands of evangelicals from those denominations to Pentecostal and Charismatic groups.

Additional Religious Groups Although the Protestant population grew significantly between 1960 and 1990, this period also witnessed the arrival, numerical growth, and geographical expansion of other religious movements. Today, about 3 percent of the population belongs to “other religions,” which in the context of Costa Rica includes independent Western Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions, non-Protestant Christian-based groups (also called “marginal” Christian groups), and non-Christian religions.

The existence of independent Western Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions in Costa Rica is a recent phenomenon. Independent Western Catholic jurisdictions include the following:

Ecumenical Catholic Church of Christ, Diocese of Our Lady Mother of God, Apostolic Administration of Central America, Panama and Cuba. It traces its apostolic succession through the Syrian Jacobite Orthodox Church and the Old Catholic Church of Utrecht. This denomination is led by Monsignor Sebastián Herrera Plá in Costa Rica and Monsignor Karl Raimund Rodig, ecumenical archbishop of Miami, Florida.

Community of Communities of Our Lady of Guadalupe is led by Monsignor Higinio Alas Gómez in Urbanización La Aurora, Heredia; there is an affiliated church in Panama.

Reunited Apostolic Catholic Church, Diocese of Central America, Panama and the West Indies. The church in Costa Rica is led by Archbishop Monsignor Pablo José de Jesús María (secular name: Francisco Eduardo de la Espriella Torrens) and Assistant Bishop Monsignor Rodrigo Antonio López Chaves, with headquarters in the suburb of Desamparados, Province of San José.

Independent Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions include the following:

The Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia (ROCOR) began in 2004, when the Russian immigrant community (about 1,000) began to hold monthly services in private homes in the San José metro area, led by visiting priests from the United States: Daniel MacKenzie or Georgio Salatanov. In 2008, construction began on the country's first Russian Orthodox chapel in San Isidro de Coronado, Province of San José, under the auspices of the Russian Orthodox Association of Costa Rica.

The Autocephalous Orthodox Archdiocese of Costa Rica, Byzantine Rite, is led by Monsignor Nicolás I (secular name: Carlos Alberto Gómez Herrera) in San José, with chapels in Ulloa de Heredia and San Isidro, Vásquez de Coronado.

Orthodox Church of Costa Rica, Byzantine Rite (also known as Asociación Iglesia Misionera Apostólica Ortodoxa de Costa Rica) is led by Bishop Monsignor Pancracio de San Procopios (secular name: Carlos Retana) in the city of Guápiles, Limón province. This small denomination is a split from the group led by Monsignor Nicolás I (secular name: Carlos Alberto Gómez Herrera) in 2003.

The “marginal” Christian groups that emerged from the Protestant movement are: the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons, founded in 1946; one temple, 76 congregations and 35,647 members in 2007), the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society (also known as Jehovah's Witnesses: 272 congregations and 21,024 adherents in 2005), Christadelphians, Unity School of Christianity, Mita Congregation, People of Amos Church, Voice of the Chief Cornerstone, Light of the Word Church, God Is Love Church, Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, and other groups.

The non-Christian religions (about 80 distinct groups) include the following: Amerindian religions (7 ethnolinguistic groups), Baha'i Faith (3 groups), Buddhism (5 groups), Hinduism (at least 25 groups), Chinese religions (10 groups), Islam (2 groups), Judaism (5 groups), and Western Esoteric groups (more than 25). The small Jewish community (2,500) is centered in San José and includes Orthodox, Reform, and Messianic Judaism.

The older Western Esoteric groups are: Freemasonry, established in Costa Rica in 1865 by Dr. Francisco Calvo; the Theosophical Society (1890s, Tomás Povedano de Arcos); European Spiritualism (1908, Ofelia Corrales); Liberal Catholic Church (1920s, José Basileo Acuña Zeledón); and Grand Universal Fraternity-Mission of Aquarius (1950s).

In addition, Myalism and Obeah (introduced by Jamaican immigrants during the 1870s) are still practiced by some West Indians (Creoles, Afro-Americans) on the Caribbean coast, and more recently a small group of Boboshanti Rastafarians appeared in San José among non-black mestizos. Also, there are small groups of Wiccans and Satanists in the Central Valley. Among practitioners of Amerindian religions and Popular Catholicism there are “specialists” who practice witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo), while 43 percent of the population admitted to believing and participating in such practices, as reported by Demoscopía in a national poll conducted in November of 2001.

Another public opinion poll conducted in 2002 by IDESPO, a research institute of the National University in Heredia, showed that between 1995 and 2001 about 8 percent of the population of the San José Metropolitan Area (population 1.1 million) had “changed their religion,” with Catholic adherents declining and Protestants increasing as did those identified with “no religion” and “other religions.”

Clifton L. Holland

See also: American Baptist Association; Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Christadelphians; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Episcopal Church; Freemasonry; Jehovah's Witnesses; Latin American Council of Churches; Liberal Catholic Church; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mita Congregation; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Southern Baptist Convention; Spiritualism; Theosophical Society (America); Unity School of Christianity; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Wiccan Religion; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Biesanz, Mavis Hiltunen, et al. The Ticos: Culture and Social Change in Costa Rica. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1999.
- Holland, Clifton L. “Ethnic and Religious Diversity in Costa Rica.” Documents available on the PROLADES (Latin American Socio-Religious Studies Program). http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/cr/ri/diversity_cri.htm.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- Nelson, Wilton M. Historia del Protestantismo en Costa Rica. San José, Costa Rica: Publicaciones INDEF, 1983.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report 2007: Costa Rica. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90248.htm>

■ Cote d'Ivoire

The nation of Cote d'Ivoire (aka the Ivory Coast), a former French colony, is a West African country located on the Atlantic Ocean between Liberia and Ghana.

To the north it shares borders with Guinea, Mali, and Burkina Faso. Its 125,000 square miles of territory is populated by 20.2 million people.

The land that now constitutes Cote d'Ivoire was originally settled by a variety of African peoples, the major groups being the Akan, Kru, Volta, Mande, and Malinke. Those people closest to the Atlantic coast had by the 15th century made contact with Europeans, and two states that had formed in the southernmost part of the region, along the coast (Aigini), and somewhat inland (Atokpora), developed trading relationships with the Europeans. The European name of the area came from the trade in elephant tusks.

In the 18th century, the region was invaded by a group of Ashanti people from Ghana, the supporters of Queen Awa Poka (a loser in Ashanti political struggles), who established themselves in the central part of the region. Over the next century, the Ashanti grew powerful and expanded to the point that they began to put pressure on Aigini and Atokpora, who requested the French to come into the region as their protector. In return, the French assumed exclusive rights to the coastal trading centers in 1843.

Several decades later the French moved inland in an attempt to tie together their West African territories. Plans were thwarted for a generation by a strong nation that had been established in the region where Guinea and Cote d'Ivoire come together. Only after a war that lasted a quarter of a century was the region pacified and (in 1893) French West Africa established, made up of Senegal, Guinea, Mali, and Cote d'Ivoire. Other lands were added later.

French West Africa was dismantled in the late 1950s, and by the 1960s its various components had emerged as independent nations. Felix Houphouët-Boigny (1905–1993), a physician and head of one of the independence-oriented political parties, was named the new president of Cote d'Ivoire and was regularly re-elected until his death in 1993. He was succeeded by Henri Konan Bedie. A 1999 coup initiated a period of political turmoil and civil war on the country that was only resolved in 2007 when President Laurent Gbagbo signed an agreement with rebel leaders that included a sharing of power.

The various peoples of the country, who are further divided into more than 80 subgroups, each pos-

Cote d'Ivoire

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Ethnoreligionists	2,710,000	6,920,000	34.0	0.82	7,383,000	8,481,000
Christians	1,348,000	7,119,000	34.9	2.34	10,135,000	13,855,000
Roman Catholics	627,000	3,565,000	17.5	3.84	4,950,000	6,645,000
Protestants	152,000	1,835,000	9.0	3.50	2,600,000	3,500,000
Independents	308,000	1,400,000	6.9	1.53	2,200,000	3,200,000
Muslims	1,245,000	6,200,000	30.4	2.18	8,500,000	12,000,000
Agnostics	2,000	77,000	0.4	1.74	120,000	200,000
Baha'is	4,000	30,000	0.1	1.74	50,000	90,000
Buddhists	0	10,000	0.0	1.74	15,000	20,000
New religionists	1,000	5,000	0.0	1.74	8,000	12,000
Atheists	0	2,100	0.0	1.74	4,000	6,000
Hindus	500	11,500	0.1	1.74	18,000	40,000
Total population	5,310,000	20,375,000	100.0	1.74	26,233,000	34,704,000

sess a different traditional religion, which plays a role in defining them as a people and providing a degree of communal cohesion. Typical of the traditional religions is that of the Dan people, who call the Creator God Zra. Zra is the Creator, from whom all spiritual entities come. The other spirit beings are good, with one exception, Kogbin-dy. Kogbin-dy encourages the practice of malevolent magic, or witchcraft. Zra, assisted by Zole-dy, fights against witchcraft. Various other spirit entities also contribute to the elimination of malevolent magic from among the people.

Cote d'Ivoire is one of the African lands in which traditional religions have retained the strongest presence. Figures vary, but suggest that from one-half to two-thirds of the population continue to practice one of the African religions, especially in the lands in the north farthest from the coast. Traditional religions came under heavy onslaught through the 20th century from both Islam and Christianity.

Christianity was introduced by French missionaries in 1637, but conditions hostile to Europeans served as barriers to permanent work. Thus it was not until after France established its protectorate among the peoples of the south that a permanent mission of the Roman Catholic Church was created. In 1895 a prefecture was created, and the African Mission of Lyon accepted responsibility for a systematic program of evangelism. Work progressed quickly, and in 1911 a prefecture was created in Korhogo in the north. From this point, the work proceeded along a common pattern, with the first indigenous priest ordained in 1934 and the first archbishop from the country consecrated in 1960. The church's strength lies in the several urban areas; it is especially strong in the capital, Abidjan.

In 1990, Pope John Paul II visited Cote d'Ivoire during which time he consecrated the newly finished Basilica of Our Lady of Peace, located in Yamoussoukro, the country's administrative capital. The basilica, which resembles St. Peter's in Vatican City, immediately jumped into international prominence as the largest Christian church in the world. With an area of 322,900 square ft and a height of 518 feet (including the cross on top of the dome), it surpasses St. Peter's, but due to its floor plan can accommodate only 18,000 worshippers, while St. Peter's can hold 60,000 people.

Protestantism was introduced after World War I. British Methodists entered in 1924, and their work grew into the Protestant Methodist Church in Cote d'Ivoire. It was followed by the French Baptists (Bible Mission) and Americans with the Christian and Missionary Alliance. The World Evangelism Crusade (WEC) from Great Britain came in 1934. These groups worked out agreements that cut down on competition, and to this day each resulting church is strongest in one part of the country and has a membership mostly among certain peoples. The Église Protestante du Centre, the church that has emerged from the work of the WEC, for example, draws most of its membership from the Dan, Bete, Wobe, and Ngege peoples.

Beginning in the 1930s and continuing to the present, new groups have entered, including the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Free Will Baptists, CBAmerica, and the Assemblies of God. The Jehovah's Witnesses began work in 1924. Nigerian traders who were Christians established an outpost of the Nigerian Baptist Convention in Abidjan in 1930.

The more conservative of the Protestant and Free Church denominations have formed the Évangélique de la Côte d'Ivoire, which is associated with the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and the World Evangelical Fellowship. The Protestant Methodist Church is the only Côte d'Ivoire church that is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Côte d'Ivoire has been one area strongly influenced by the rise of African Initiated Churches. One church in particular, the Harrist Church, founded by William Wade Harris in the years immediately preceding World War I, grew dramatically in the 1920s and 1930s and became the largest church in the country apart from the Roman Catholic Church. A second church, Église Déimatiste (Ashes of Purification Church), was formed in 1922 by former Roman Catholics under the leadership of a woman named Lalou, who has assumed the title of pope. The Methodists experienced a schism in 1932 when the prophet Boto Adai (d. 1963) began to work among them. His preaching led to the creation of the Église Adaïste. Additional groups have come into the country from Ghana and Nigeria.

Beginning with the establishment of French West Africa, people from Mali and Burkina Faso began to move into Côte d'Ivoire and to bring Islam, primarily of the Malikite School of Islam. In the 20th century it established bases among the Malinke, Bambara, Senoufo, and Minianka peoples, and it has been aggressively evangelistic. It appears that by the late 20th century Islam had moved ahead of Christianity (both Catholic and Protestant), and Muslims now constitute approximately 25 percent of the population (approximately twice the percentage of Christians).

The city of Bondoukou, which has 32 mosques, is the informal center of Islam in the country. Organizational unity is provided by the Islamic High Council (Conseil Supérieur Islamique), which makes policy decisions for the Muslim community. There is also a small presence of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement and the Baha'i Faith. The Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis has established a small but dedicated following.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; CBAmerica; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Harrist Church; Malikite School of Islam; Nigerian Baptist Convention; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bissett, V. Les sects et l'esprit sectaire. Abidjan, Ivory Coast: Coopération et documentation missionnaires, 1992.
- Haliburton, G. M. The Prophet Harris: A Study of an African Prophet and His Mass-movement in the Ivory Coast and the Gold Coast, 1913–1915. London: Longmans, 1971.
- Schreiber, D. "The Urban Muslims of Ivory Coast." Urban Mission 3, no. 3 (January 1986): 39–43.
- Shank, David A. Prophet Harris, the 'Black Elijah' of West Africa. Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 1994.
- Soman, Kouassi P. Abongui My People, Cote D'Ivoire My Country, America My Home: The Ethno-History of a Small African Kingdom: An Autobiography. Lincoln, NB: iUniverse, 2003.
- La vie religieuse en Afrique: recherche en Côte d'Ivoire*. Abidjan, Ivory Coast: INADES, 1983.

Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions

The Council for the Parliament of the World Religions grew out of informal discussions in Chicago among scholars and religious leaders who began to talk about appropriate ways to acknowledge and celebrate the centennial of the Parliament of the World's Religions. That initial gathering in 1893 was a watershed in the spread of the major religious communities globally and initiated a century of efforts to create structures through which different religious communities could resolve their differences through dialogue rather than violence and move beyond tolerance to genuine respect and cooperative activity.

The initial conversation led to the founding of the Council in 1988 with the single goal of planning the 1993 celebration. Held in Chicago, August 28–September 5, 1993, the Centennial Parliament brought together 8,000 people from around the world and culminated in the mass signing of a document, "Toward a Global Ethic." Following the event, the Council responded to the expressed desire of many attending the 1993 event that the work of that gathering might continue. The Council agreed to continue and to convene a similar conference every five years. The second gathering occurred in Cape Town, South Africa, on December 1–8, 1999.

In preparation for the 1999 Parliament, the Council called for individuals, organizations, and different faith communities to create gifts of service to the world. These were formally recognized at the Parliament. A summary of the activities of the Parliament was published on the Council's website, given below.

Centered as it has been in the Chicago metropolitan area, the Council has developed a second program especially for people in the Chicago area. Its local and global commitment is to promote understanding and cooperation among different religious and spiritual communities; to celebrate the diversity of the various religious and spiritual traditions; and to renew the role of these traditions in relation to personal growth and the broad challenges facing humanity.

The Council's headquarters continue to be in Chicago. It is led by a board that includes local, national, and international trustees. It successfully organized Parliament gatherings in Cape Town, South Africa (1999), and Barcelona, Spain (2004), and planned its next gathering for Melbourne, Australia in 2009.

Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions
PO Box 1630
Chicago, IL 60690-1630
<http://www.parliamentofreligions.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Barney, Gerald O., et al. Threshold 2000: Critical Issues and Spiritual Values for a Global Age. Ada, MI: CoNexus Press, 2000.
- Teasdale, Wayne, and George Cairns. The Community of Religions. Ada, MI: CoNexus Press, 1996.

Council for Secular Humanism

The Council for Secular Humanism was formed at the end of the 1970s as the Council for a Democratic and Secular Humanism by Paul Kurtz (b. 1925) and others formerly associated with the American Humanist Association. Kurtz, a professor of philosophy, was also the head of Prometheus Books, a prominent Humanist/atheist publishing house. He had gained a high profile for his public attacks on psychic and occult phenomena and his leadership in the establishment of a watchdog group, the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal (now the Committee for Skeptical Inquiry). He had also been a prominent Humanist spokesperson. In 1973 he circulated "Humanist Manifesto H," a document seeking to update the original "Humanist Manifesto" of 1933. Then in 1980, on the heels of the Council's founding, he wrote a Secular Humanist Manifesto that sought to define his evolving position.

The term "Secular" was added as a descriptor to Humanism in the last half of the 20th century as a means of distinguishing it from forms of Humanism that are now seen as religions, albeit nontheistic religions. Secular Humanists are naturalists and as such do not accept the existence of any metanatural laws or principles, that is, laws or principles that transcend the natural realm, or of supernatural entities (gods, spirits, demons, and the like) beyond the material universe. As a corollary, they believe that most events described as miracles or as psychic in origin have a more mundane explanation. More important than any specific conclusions about the universe, however, secularists would hold that the method of arriving at conclusions is all-important. They demand the use of reason, the examination of evidence, and a scientific methodology, which are seen as opposed to faith or mysticism.

Secularists see their philosophical approach to life as the opposite of religion and not to be confused with it. That approach includes a concern for both individuals and humankind, and they search for ways to find fulfillment, growth, and a creative existence. They also search for an ethical existence and discuss among themselves options for leading the ethical life apart from revelation and God-given rules of conduct. They are committed to the democratic ideal and see in the give and take of a free society the best path to human progress. Secular Humanists are often united more by what they do not believe (theism) than by what they do believe, there being a wide range of outlooks among those who consider themselves Secularists.

The peculiar status of "religious freedom" as an individual right in law both in the United States and internationally, has created an ongoing problem for the Council relative to how Secular Humanism is seen in the larger world of religion. In 1961, for example, the U.S. Supreme Court had implied that Secular Humanism was a religion in its opinion in the case of Torcaso v. Watkins (367 U.S. 488). The Court held that a requirement for an oath declaring belief in God invades an individual's freedom of belief and religion. In the process it added, "Among religions in this country which do not teach what would generally be considered a belief in the existence of God are Buddhism, Taoism, Ethical Culture, Secular Humanism, and others." In the mid-1980s, in another case involving Secular Humanism, the Council moved against efforts to have Secular Humanism viewed as a "religion" by the federal courts. At the same time, the Council has continued to act like a religious organization and has participated in a series of inter-faith dialogues with Latter-day saints, Roman Catholics, and Baptists.

The Council has helped organize a variety of affiliated organizations. The Academy of Humanism recognizes prominent Humanist thinkers and leaders. The Committee for the Scientific Examination of Religion attempts to focus upon the claims of religions in the light of reason and science. The Biblical Criticism Research Project tries to disseminate the findings of critical Bible research, which it feels will further undermine the claims of both the Jewish and Christian faiths. The Secular Organization for Sobriety provides an atheist alternative to 12-step programs, which require the acknowledgment of a Higher Power as part of their instructions to those recovering from alcoholism. It sponsors the Center for Inquiry Institute in Amherst, New York.

The Council has promoted the formation of local affiliate groups that are associated together in the Alliance of Secular Humanist Societies. There is also a program to meet the special needs of African American members, African Americans for Humanism. The Council is in turn a member of the International Humanist and Ethical Union.

The Council publishes Free Inquiry, a monthly periodical, and the quarterly Secular Humanist Bulletin.

Council for Secular Humanism
PO Box 664
Amherst, NY 14226-0664
<http://www.secularhumanism.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Atheism; Humanism; International Humanist and Ethical Union; Unbelief.

References

- Herrick, Steve. Humanism: An Introduction. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2005.
- Kurtz, Paul. Transcendental Temptation: A Critique of Religion and the Paranormal. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1986.
- Kurtz, Paul. What Is Secular Humanism? Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2007.
- Kurtz, Paul, ed. The Humanist Alternative: Some Definitions of Humanism. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1973.

Council for World Missions

See London Missionary Society.

Council of Baptist Churches in North East India

There are more Baptists in India than any country except the United States, and the largest group of Baptists in India belong to the churches associated together in the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India. These churches originated somewhat accidentally, for the initial missionaries who had been sent by the American Baptists in 1836 were in fact headed for Burma. Unable to find their way into the land of the Shan people on the Burma–China border, they turned to the Indian state of Assam and began to evangelize the people. They baptized their first convert in 1841. The first church, with three branch congregations, was formed in 1845. Their first success was among the laborers of the tea gardens in Assam and among the Garos people in the state of Meghalaya.

Toward the end of the century, the work expanded to Nagaland and Manipur, and gradually included more and more of the different peoples, many of whom resided in rather remote hill country. Most of these people did not have a written language, and a considerable amount of time was spent reducing their languages to writing and producing the first pieces of literature, often portions of scripture, in the language. The mission also opened many elementary and secondary schools, and the graduates went on to become leaders among their people. The educational work took on additional importance in Nagaland, Manipur, and the Garos Hills area, where the mission was given the total educational responsibility by the British colonial authorities.

The area covered by the mission expanded greatly in the decades after World War I and continued to grow during the last half of the 20th century. An educational center developed at Jorhat, where the Bible school matured into a seminary for the training of pastors. Eventually Bible schools were created for each of the major language areas throughout the five-state region covered by the mission—Assam, Arunachal Pradesh, Manipur, Meghalaya, and Nagaland.

In 1950, prompted in part by the establishment of India as an independent nation, the mission was turned over to a locally controlled body, the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India. The Council consisted of five conventions, one in each of the five states. Each convention had a number of associations, many representing a single language group. More than 50 languages are spoken by Baptists in the Council, English being the language most shared in common.

The Council churches have continued their missionary emphases, and currently have workers in Myanmar and other parts of India. They participate in the United Mission to Nepal, a cooperative Christian agency drawing support from more than 30 denominations, which supplies educational and medical services to a land where evangelism is against the law.

In 1992 the Council downgraded its status and the five regional conventions assumed more responsibilities. Among the visible results of this change, the Council dropped its membership in the Baptist World Alliance. Three of the regional conventions have applied and been accepted as members. Neither the Council nor any of its member conventions are members of the World Council of Churches, though they cooperate with some World Council projects.

The Baptists had their greatest growth in Nagaland. Of the 550,000 members in the 5 conventions, 270,000 are in Nagaland, where the Baptists are now the largest religious body. Christians now hold positions of political and economic influence in the state.

Council of Baptist Churches in North East India
44 Acharya Jagadish Church
Bose Rd.
Calcutta 700 017
India

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

References

Downs, Frederick S. The Mighty Works of God: A Brief History of the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India: The Mission Period, 1936–

1950. Gauhati, India: Christian International Centre, 1971.

Puthenpurakal, Joseph. Baptist Missions in Nagaland. Calcutta: Firma KLM, 1984.

Sagma, Milton S. A History of American Baptist Mission in North-East India. Colombia, MO: South Asia Books, 1993.

Council of Christian Churches of an African Approach in Europe

The Council of Christian Churches of an African Approach in Europe (CCCAAE), formerly known as the Council of African Christian Communities in Europe (CACCE), is an ecumenical, pandominational organization comprising mainly African Christian religious communities and other African-focused parachurch organizations in Europe. It represents one of the initiatives of African/African-derived Christian communities in creating new intrareligious networks at the local, national, and continental levels in Europe. Other examples of existing networks include the African Christian Council, Hamburg; West Yorkshire African Caribbean Council of Churches; Council of African Churches in Germany; Council of African and Caribbean Churches—United Kingdom; and the Churches Together in Britain. CCCAAE's nucleus membership was drawn largely from the United Kingdom and continental Europe. Berlin serves as its current headquarters.

The 1997 Leeds conference on “The Significance of the African Religious Diaspora in Europe” was largely the spark that ignited the zeal toward religious networking among African Christian communities in Europe. The meeting, which brought together African and European Christians and scholars, was unique in that it provided a forum for constructing a Europe-wide African identity that was poised for dialogue with the European populations. It was set to facilitate dialogue between African (religious) communities and the (European) historic churches; to help networking between scholars and African religious communities from different countries; to help European institutions to perceive African peoples' religions and spirituality as central to their survival in dignity and affirmation of life; and to contribute to policymaking in terms of mutual support and empowerment across national borders.

From 1997, a number of other initiatives (African Christian Diaspora Consultations) took place in Västerås, Sweden (1998), Glay/Doubs, France (1998), Hamburg (1998), Cambridge (1999), and Belgium/Switzerland (1999), where further attempts were made to develop instruments and mechanisms for affirming the significance and implications of this religious development particularly for contemporary Europe. The 1999 Millennial Conference “Open Space: The African Christian Diaspora in Europe and the Quest for Human Community,” which was held September 16–20 at Westminster College, Cambridge, under the auspices of the Partnership of African Christian Communities in Europe, culminated in the establishment of this network, and was born out of the desire of members and participants to facilitate such meetings, to affirm a sense of belonging, and to encourage networking in order to enhance further cooperation and build supportive relationships across the continents.

The CACCE was formally inaugurated in December 1999. Delegates from five countries—Belgium, France, Germany, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom—met at Notre Dame de Justice, Rhode Saint Genese in Belgium following the Cambridge conference that had provided the groundwork three months earlier. Their legitimacy seemed to hinge on the claim that since “there are over three million Christians of African origin in Europe . . . it is our responsibility to network, share ideas, and join in common activities for the spiritual, social, cultural and political development of these communities” (CACCE Press Release, “Africans Unite,” July 2000). Their objectives were to “create strategic partnership for spiritual and social transformation in Europe; provide a platform for Africans to share common problems and find solutions in different African countries; work for peace, social, human and economic development in Africa.” At a continental level, the Council strives to represent the needs, wishes, and aspirations of its members who live and operate in various European states. It also claims to be inclusive of all those who would have sympathy with its aims and raison d’être.

In a bid to widen its membership and modus operandi, the Council underwent further transition in 2001 with a name change to CCCAAE at Arzier, Switzerland. An executive body was constituted the same year at a meeting in Berlin, Germany; and the CCCAAE objectives streamlined and enlarged to include the coordination and networking of African Christian congregations in Europe; the spiritual awakening and awareness of African Christianity in Europe; furthering the partnership between African and European churches. Others were furthering the advancement of African theology and evangelism in Europe; developing a forum for the problems facing Africans in Europe, in particular social exclusion and discrimination; promoting research on African Christianity in Europe; promoting Christian education of African youths in Europe; and supporting projects related to economic development in Africa.

In 2003 the CCCAAE co-sponsored an interdisciplinary conference in Hirschluch (near Berlin, Germany), on “The Berlin-Congo Conference 1884, the Partition of Africa, and Implications for Christian Mission Today,” which brought together African, European, and North American scholars from universities and research institutions in Africa, Europe, and the United States. The conference explored the historical and sociopolitical consequences of the partition of Africa for the continent and the African diaspora, highlighting issues such as migration, racism, and sexism; looking critically into the political role the Christian mission played in colonizing Africa as well as the paradigm shift in mission locally and globally; and inquiring into the significance of diverse indigenous movements (not least Pentecostal) emanating from the Two-Thirds World in their struggle for survival in dignity, as well as their interaction with religious and secular European institutions.

Afe Adogame

See also: Organization of African Instituted Churches; Pentecostalism.

References

- Adogame, A. “Betwixt Identity and Security: African New Religious Movements and the Politics of Religious Networking in Europe.” Nova Religio: The Journal of Emergent and Alternative Religions 7, no. 2 (2003): 24–41.

- Adogame, A. "Partnership of African Christian Communities in Europe." International Review of Mission 89, no. 354 (July 2000): 291–298.
- Adogame, A., R. Gerloff, and K. Hock, eds. Christianity in Africa and the African Diaspora. The Appropriation of a Scattered Heritage. London and New York: Continuum, 2009.
- Gerloff, R. "The Significance of the African Christian Diaspora in Europe: A Report on Four Events in 1997/98." International Review of Mission 89, no. 354 (July 2000): 281–290.
- Matthey, J., ed. "Open Space: The African Christian Diaspora in Europe and the Quest for Human Community." International Review of Mission, 89, no. 354 (July 2000).

Course in Miracles, A

A Course in Miracles is a religious movement that emerged in New York in 1975. The Course is also a series of books first published by the Foundation for Inner Peace, begun for the purpose of publishing and disseminating these texts. It is not a formal religious institution, but rather a movement of those who read and follow the teachings found in A Course in Miracles. There is not a particular founder of this movement. The author of the texts, Helen Schucman, reportedly transcribed the texts and retired from public life. The board of the Foundation for Inner Peace would be the closest thing to an organizational body.

A Course in Miracles is designed as a self-study course, intended to span one year, with a lesson for each day. The Course was "channeled" by Helen Schucman (1909–1981), a psychiatrist, from a source identified as Jesus over the course of seven years. The three books that make up the Course, the Textbook, the Workbook, and the Teacher's Manual, were first published in 1975. Although the Course is designed for self-study, there are study groups that meet once a week to discuss what they've read during the week and how the Course is impacting their lives.

As is the case with many metaphysical religions, adherents to A Course in Miracles do not consider the Course to offer a theology, nor in fact do they consider the Course to be a religion at all. Rather, the Course is considered to be one path to ultimate reality. Helen Schucman was reportedly an unwilling medium for the message claimed to come from Jesus Christ. This message was transcribed over time by Bill Thetford (1923–1988), and after seven years was published and distributed by a small group of people who believed the message was important. Much of the message of A Course in Miracles is meant to correct orthodox Christian teachings and to inspire a new worldview based in love.

Those who choose to take the Course can find information about it online; there is information about how to purchase the books, about the nearest place one can join a discussion group, and about chat groups. Many congregations affiliated with the Association of Unity Churches offer the Course as part of their study activities, although they are not officially affiliated with the group that publishes the Course, the Foundation of Inner Peace. The Foundation also hosts a teaching center in Temecula, California, which offers workshops for participants in the Course.

Although Schucman finished transcribing the Course in 1975, her involvement with the Course evidently stopped there. The Foundation for Inner Peace has been responsible for the publishing and distributing of A Course in Miracles, as well as other materials related to the Course, since the beginning. The foundation maintains an Internet presence at <http://www.acim.org/>. In 1999, the Foundation assigned the copyright and trademark to the Foundation for A Course in Miracles (41397 Buecking Drive, Temecula, CA 92590, <http://facim.org>).

Although it is difficult to estimate the number of people who have taken the Course, according to the Foundation, there are about one and a half million copies of A Course in Miracles in circulation worldwide. Translations have been made in Chinese, Dutch, German, Hebrew, Italian, Portuguese, Russian, and Spanish.

The main objective of the Course is to teach universal love and peace, which can be achieved primarily through forgiveness. The Course works at teaching how to overcome fear and guilt through the practice of miracles; a miracle is defined as a "shift in perception from fear to love." Although the Christian overtones are clear throughout the text, it is considered to be a universal teaching.

The Course makes the fundamental distinction between the real and the unreal: “Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.” According to the text, there are two worlds: the world of Truth, which applies to the collective of God’s creation, and the world of perception. Since Reality in the Course only refers to God and the Totality, all else is an illusion. The term “Creator God” is used throughout the text, not to describe the God who created the material universe, but to describe God as the Creator of the Totality. The Totality encompasses God and everything that is. This is Reality. The concept that there are two forces in the world, good and evil, is false. The illusion that we must be saved from evil, then, is false as well. The world around us does not exist. Rather than deny the body’s presence in the world, however, adherents of the Course subscribe to the statement in John 15:19: “Be in the world, but not of the world.”

Since the Course maintains that Jesus was the son of God as we all are sons and daughters of God, it is believed that we are each part of the divine Totality. All have been caught in the world of perception, and therefore have forgotten their divinity. Miracles, forgiveness, and prayer are corrective measures, meant to replace fear with love and to help human beings to remember that they are still a part of the Totality. It is believed that as soon as each person in the world realizes that all are living in a world of illusion, the illusion will disintegrate, and all will return to the Totality, which is Reality.

Foundation for Inner Peace
PO Box 598
Mill Valley, CA 94942-0598
<http://www.acim.org>

Dawn L. Hutchinson

See also: Theology; Unity School of Christianity/
Association of Unity Churches.

References

- A Course in Miracles*. Volume One: Text. Volume Two: Workbook for Students. Volume Three: Manual for Teachers. Tiburon, CA: Foundation for Inner Peace, 1975.
- Bahlmann, Shirley. The Pioneers: A Course in Miracles. Springville, UT: Bonneville Books, 2008.

Miller, Patrick A. The Complete Story of the Course: The History, the People, and the Controversies behind A Course in Miracles. Berkeley, CA: Fearless Books, 1997.

Wapnick, Kenneth. Absence of Felicity: The Story of Helen Schucman and Her Scribbling of A Course in Miracles. New York: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1991.

Williamson, Marianne. A Return to Love: Reflections on the Principles of A Course in Miracles. New York: HarperCollins, 1996.

Covenant of the Goddess

The Covenant of the Goddess (CoG) was founded in 1975 as an umbrella organization of contemporary Pagan Witches and was shortly thereafter incorporated as a California nonprofit religious organization. Its founders deliberately copied the Congregational Church model of autonomous congregations. (According to an internal legend, this choice was based on a remark attributed to the 17th-century theologian Cotton Mather, that “the witches were organized like congregational churches.”) The chief reason for CoG’s foundation was to give Witches of different Wiccan traditions some form of nationally recognized credentials as “clergy” so that they could perform marriages, serve as prison and hospital ministers, and carry out other clerical functions.

Since 2000, however, CoG has become somewhat less active as contemporary Pagans have developed a spectrum of additional organizations through which they can receive clergy credentials. Nevertheless, the organization continues to hold its annual festival, which first began in 1981. The Internet increasingly offers more ways for Pagan Witches to network beyond newsletters and festivals.

Both individuals and covens are accepted as members, with applicants admitted upon testimonial of current members that they are Witches and Goddess-worshippers. Criteria for coven membership require that the coven must “generally focus theology and ritual, etc., around the worship of the Goddess and the Old Gods (or the Goddess alone),” follow a code of ethics compatible with that of the larger organizations, and have been in existence at least six months. Since covens frequently dissolve and reform, CoG's membership rolls tend to be in a state of flux, but a handful of covens have been members for as much as two decades. Individuals may also join as associate members after paying annual dues.

Covens in some areas form local councils. As of 2009, local councils existed in the San Francisco Bay Area, Southern California (three councils), Minneapolis–St. Paul, and Seattle, as well as state-level councils in New Mexico, Texas, Florida, Massachusetts, and a Midwest Regional Council. Coven representatives meet each year in a Grand Council at MerryMeet, a large annual Pagan convention sponsored by CoG, where decisions are made through consensus methods based on those of the Society of Friends (Quakers). A first officer, elected annually, heads the organization.

The Covenant of the Goddess publishes a newsletter available from its headquarters address; membership is not required to receive the newsletter.

Covenant of the Goddess
PO Box 1226
Berkeley
CA 94701
www.cog.org

Chas S. Clifton

See also: Cherry Hill Seminary; Congregationalism; Friends/Quakers; Gardnerian Wicca; Witchcraft.

References

- Adler, Margo. Drawing Down the Moon: Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers, and Other Pagans in America. New York: Penguin, 2006.
- Ardinger, Barbara. Practicing the Presence of the Goddess: Everyday Rituals to Transform Your World. Navato, CA: New World Library, 2000.

Creationism

Creationism is a theological and moral movement that emerged in the United States after Charles Darwin's publication of On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured

Races in the Struggle for Life (1859) in order to combat the theories it proposed. Focusing on the Genesis narrative of creation, it adamantly affirms its inerrancy: God created the Earth, the animals, and humankind in six days and rested on the seventh. It is a major current within American Protestantism mostly led by the Fundamentalists who promote the return to the “fundamentals” of Christianity and the literal reading of the Bible, held to be the founding rock of the nation.

Originating as a battle against modernity, Creationism has grown into a full-fledged war: after abating around 1900, it reappeared in the 1920s, waned again after its defeat at the Scopes trial, and resurfaced in the 1960s. It has gathered more and more momentum ever since, thanks to the rise to national fame of Creationist preachers who forged alliances with conservative Republicans to form the New Religious Right. One of their major goals has been the introduction of Creationism in school programs. In spite of its deceptively simple tenets, it is a multifaceted movement that needs to be addressed beyond popular perceptions if one wants to understand its implications for contemporary society since it is a major component of the public debate at the turn of the 21st century in several countries.

The Development of Creationist Theology It is because Darwinism met with more success in the United States than anywhere else that it produced such a resistant anti-body. The theory of evolution shocked Christians because it negated the design of God in the universe: species appeared and disappeared thanks to the laws of nature, and the force behind them was not God but mere chance (even if Darwin admitted there must have been some supernatural creative act in the beginning). The Creationists are those Christians who, unlike those who admitted that such theory was not incompatible with the Bible, saw it as heresy. Since they were efficient activists well trained in the century-old tradition of evangelical revivalism, they turned their opposition into a crusade, a typically American mode of action. Though Creationism has thrived in the Bible Belt, it did not originate there but among the northern clergy and it spread throughout the country. Over the decades, inner feuds led to modifications in the interpretation of Genesis concerning the duration of the creative act and the impact of the Flood, resulting in the concepts of “old earth” and “young earth.”

View of William Jennings Bryan and Clarence Darrow in the courtroom during the Scopes trial in Dayton, Tennessee, in 1925. The trial was the opening skirmish between fundamentalist Christians and modernist Christians over the teaching of the theory of evolution in schools. (Library of Congress)

Though many Creationists can be seen as adhering to the anti-intellectual tradition, they have constantly sought to fight evolutionary scientists with equal tools, producing demonstrable evidence, notably fossil and geological records, and to validate their theories through scholarship, whether coming from their own ranks or from outside; the term “science” is found in most of their book or institute titles.

Old Earth and Gap Theories In the 19th century, conservative Christians accepted the idea that the Earth must be very old because of geological and paleontological evidence. They took the six days of Genesis to mean ages spanning millennia. Some imagined that the Earth had existed before the actual creation described in Genesis. There had been a lapse of time, a gap, between what the first two verses reported; this gap theory was accepted by the Scofield Bible (1909) favored by Fundamentalists and it remained their major interpretation of Earth history until World War II. They could also accept some form of evolution after creation. The most prominent creationist ministers were Dwight L. Moody (1837–1899), the Methodist minister Luther T. Townsend (1838–1922), and the Presbyterian evangelist Alexander Patterson.

The first Creationists relied on Louis Agassiz, a Harvard scientist whose Essay on Classification (1857)

View of a Bible open to the Book of Genesis, the part of Judeo-Christian scripture that describes the creation of the earth. (Stan Rohrer/iStockPhoto.com) held that species were created in large numbers, whereas Darwin negated the dogma of separate creations believed to have given birth to species once and for all. Arnold Guyot comforted them also for he saw multiple creations as divinely ordained. John W. Dawson's The Story of Earth and Man (1873) affirmed creation had been produced "by the Supreme Creative Will." These people read Genesis symbolically.

"New Earth" and Flood Theories Creationism radicalized throughout the 20th century. Only one-fifth of The Fundamentals (1910–1915) bore on evolution, all displaying various interpretations, none calling for an all-out war against Darwinism, though they saw it as the cause of the advent of higher criticism (that analyzed the Bible as a historical record). It was only gradually that the Fundamentalists saw it as the root of all evils: as engendering Communism, then the Germans' beastly behavior in World War I, and later feminism and Secular Humanism.

The further scientists progressed, the further Creationists reverted to a narrower view of origins. They now stick to the "new earth" theory that takes the six days as having 24 hours and figures that creation occurred less than 10,000 years ago. According to the Flood theory, fossils are not the vestiges of ancient times but of the catastrophic Noachian Deluge, a cataclysm that engulfed the planet and buried plants, animals, and humans on top of each other in the rapid but sequential upheaval it caused. This view was first expounded before Darwin by Eleazar Lord (1788–1871) who, in The Epoch of Creation (1851), asserted that fossils had been deposited during the Flood, the sediment column being due to the rising level of waters drowning living creatures in series. The same ideas would be developed in the 20th century by the figure-heads of creation science: George McCready Price who in New Geology (1923) expounded the “new catastrophism” and the formation of the geological column, and John C. Whitcomb Jr. and Henry M. Morris in Genesis Flood (1961).

The term “Creation Science” or “Scientific Creationism” was meant to prove that scientific evidence proved Genesis true. The 1981 Arkansas law requiring “balanced treatment of creation-science and evolution-science in public schools” defined it as including “the scientific evidences and related inferences that indicate: (1) sudden creation of the universe, energy, and life from nothing; (2) the insufficiency of mutation and natural selection in bringing about development of all living kinds from a single organism; (3) changes only within fixed limits of originally created kinds of plants and animals; (4) separate ancestry for humans and apes; (5) explanation of the earth’s geology by catastrophism, including the occurrence of a worldwide flood; and (6) a relatively recent inception of the Earth and living kinds.”

Creationists formed many research centers such as The Religion and Science Association (1930s) with Dudley Joseph Whitney; the Deluge Geology Society (1938); and the famous Creation Research Society (1963) with Walter E. Lammerts, and William J. Tinkle, which is still active today. Henry M. Morris, from the Institute of Creation Research (1970) in San Diego, has popularized Creationism, along with the Seventh-day Adventists’ Geoscience Research Institute (in Loma Linda since the late 1950s).

In the 1990s Creationists cloaked their beliefs under the label of “Intelligent Design,” an expression positing a specific force that launched life. Though the term smacks of classical titles for God such as the Great Architect, The Prime Mover of the Universe, and Providence, it is supposed to neutralize religious innuendos.

Strategies and Court Cases Paradoxically, while Creationists often belong to separatist denominations, they have woven networks within the nation to convert it back to old-time Christianity. Mastering technology and distribution circuits, they have produced quantities of educational books, films, and television or Internet programs that have met with major success. They have reached so far out of their original subcultures that the intelligentsia establishment has consistently tried to contain them.

Such tug of war has been most visible in their crusades to impose the teaching of Creationism either exclusively or on a par with evolution in public schools. In the 1920s they succeeded in California, Texas, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Florida in particular, which led to the much publicized Scopes or Monkey trial (1925).

John T. Scopes (1901–1970), a high-school teacher in Dayton, Tennessee, admitted he had not respected the law forbidding the teaching of evolution and he was brought to court. William Jennings Bryan, the notorious politician who was also a Presbyterian Creationist, came to assist the prosecution but he was ridiculed by Clarence Darrow, the agnostic defense attorney. Opponents thought such defeat would eradicate Creationism. Yet, Fundamentalists went underground and organized grassroots efforts, buying radio and later television stations, opening colleges, and publishing journals. Engel v. Vitale (1962) and Abington v. Schempp (1963) forced them out of seclusion. With leaders such as Southern Baptist Jerry Falwell (1933–2007) and Pat Robertson (b. 1930) they abandoned political separatism in the 1970s and campaigned to impose on the nation a literal reading of the Bible. This would be best achieved if Creationism could be taught to all children first.

One of the first legal cases was raised by Nell J. Segraves, a Baptist mother in Southern California who tried, in vain, to have Creationism included in the curriculum of her children. Epperson v. Arkansas (1968) struck down an Arkansas law barring the teaching of evolution. The debate resumed and bolstered Creationists, yet their local successes kept being reversed. McClellan v. Arkansas Board of Education (1982) struck down the 1981 Arkansas law and Edwards v. Aguillard (1987), a similar Louisiana law. Kitzmiller v. Dover Area School District (2005) held that Intelligent Design is not science, “cannot uncouple itself from its creationist, and thus religious, antecedents” and cannot be taught.

Despite such rebuffs, public support in the United States for Creationism is at an all-time high: a 2005 Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life study found that 60 percent of Americans agreed with its tenets, and 64 percent supported its teaching along with that of evolution.

Creationism in Other Religions Though never with the scope they reached in conservative Protestantism, Creationism debates have agitated other religions, notably the Catholic Church. Between 1888 and 1900 several International Catholic Scientific Conferences examined new theories critically. Notorious for this stance against modernity, Pius X (1903–1914) announced in his Pascendi encyclical the opening of the International Catholic Scientific Association. In 1908 lists of scientists were drafted but inner conflicts led to the abandonment of the project. Evolution was never an issue afterward.

Unlike the Bible, the Koran does not give a detailed account of Creation. Two suras (15 and 38) describe the progressive creation of humankind that some interpret as validating evolution. If most Muslims accept the concept of a unique creation, some have spoken of polygenetic creations. It seems that, more than a Muslim tenet, it was the American crusade that influenced Harun Yahya, the rich Turkish Creationist who in 2007 inundated European and American institutions of learning with his Atlas of Creation. It shows how the fossils of a given species look similar to the living individuals of the same species, thus disproving evolution. The onslaught led the European Parliament to draft a report (June 8, 2007) that scathingly denounces the attacks against the teaching of evolution: “Science provides irreplaceable training in intellectual rigor. It seeks not to explain ‘why things are’ but to understand how they work.” The authors warned that Creationist Fundamentalism threatened the core values of Europe.

Bernadette Rigal-Cellard

See also: Fundamentalism; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Artigas, Mariano, Thomas F. Glick, and Rafael A. Martinez. Negotiating Darwin: The Vatican Confronts Evolution, 1877–1902. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.
- Carpenter, Joel A. Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Marsden, George M. Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Marsden, George M. Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids and Cambridge: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1990.
- Numbers, Ronald L.. The Creationists: The Evolution of Scientific Creationism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992. Rev. ed., The Creationists: From Scientific Creationism to Intelligent Design. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2006.

■ Croatia

The present Republic of Croatia was established in 1991 when it declared independence from the People’s Federated Republic of Yugoslavia. The crescent-shaped country has a long coast bordering the Adriatic Sea, the inward half of the country being bounded by Slovenia, Hungary, Serbia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina. Its 21,800 square miles of territory is inhabited by 4.5 million people (2008). Croatians form one group within the larger southern Slavic population and are distinguished most from those most like them (the Serbians) by their distinctive language, which is written in Roman characters rather than Cyrillic.

The Croatian people had inhabited the territory of the present country since the sixth century of the Common Era. In the seventh century, as they were becoming the ruling force in the region, they were also converted to the Roman Catholic Church. Various Croatian tribal groups began to merge into larger units, and a Croatian kingdom appeared in the mid-ninth century. The new kingdom had to defend itself against the growth of the prosperous Venetians across the Adriatic, the Hungarians in the north, and the Byzantines, who were already in control to the south and west.

In the 15th century, the Croats joined the Hungarians in an attempt to stave off the Turkish advance, but at the beginning of the 16th century, Croatia came under Turkish control. Austria drove the Turks out in the 17th century, but Croatia was then incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire, where it remained (except for a brief period during the Napoleonic era) until after World War I. In 1918 Croatia became part of the Yugoslavian (southern Slavic) Kingdom, but remained an unwilling member, as Croats were looking for independence. They received instead four years of German occupation and membership in the Federated Republic of Yugoslavia under Marshal Tito's Communist government.

Finally in 1991, with the breakup of the former Yugoslavia, Croatia emerged as an independent nation. Unfortunately, during much of its first decade it was involved in a war with Serbia that slowed its attempt to take its place in the post-Communist world.

Croats were, like their neighbors to the north, the Slovenians and Hungarians, members of the Roman Catholic Church. However, unlike the Slovenians, they had been heavily influenced by Italian Catholicism with its differences from the German/Austrian variety. Also, at the time the first Croatian diocese was established at Nin in the seventh century, the Croats received the right to retain worship in their own language. Their Catholicism differentiated them from the Eastern Orthodox believers to the south. The church today is led by the archbishop of Zagreb and the Croatian Episcopal Conference. It retains the allegiance of the majority of the country's citizens.

Croatia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	3,960,000	4,176,000	92.1	0.34	3,983,000	3,431,000
Roman Catholics	3,533,000	3,640,000	80.3	0.01	3,503,000	3,050,000
Orthodox	370,000	270,000	6.0	0.79	250,000	200,000
Protestants	25,900	39,400	0.9	2.36	50,000	65,000
Agnostics	75,000	200,000	4.4	-2.12	150,000	130,000
Muslims	70,000	108,000	2.4	0.20	110,000	100,000
Atheists	64,000	47,300	1.0	0.20	30,000	30,000
Jews	0	850	0.0	0.20	1,000	1,000
Total population	4,169,000	4,532,000	100.0	0.20	4,274,000	3,692,000

Also, in the 16th century, an Eastern-rite Catholic Church emerged in the Archdiocese of Zagreb as a Roman counterpart of the Serbian Orthodox Church. In 1611 a bishop was appointed and attached to the bishop of Zagreb. From his headquarters at the Marcha monastery, he spearheaded efforts to convert members of the Serbian church to Roman Catholicism. The Eastern-rite church was given its own diocesan bishop, with his seat at Krizhevci, in 1777. When the 20th-century nation of Yugoslavia was created, the diocese was extended to include all of the country, and drew members from a variety of predominantly Orthodox ethnic groups (Ukrainians, Serbians, Macedonians, Romanians) found in Yugoslavia. It continues as the Byzantine Catholic Church of the Diocese of Krizhevci in the new nations of the former Yugoslavia.

Croatia was on the boundary between the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox world formally created by the split between the two churches in 1054. However, as Croatia was brought into a united Yugoslavia and stayed there through much of the 20th century, Croatian Catholics found Orthodox believers moving into their region. The Serbian Orthodox Church has established a significant presence, but there are also lesser communities of the Albanian Orthodox Autocephalous Church, the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the Macedonian Orthodox Church, and the Romanian Orthodox Church.

The Protestant movement, in the form of Lutheranism, came into Croatia in the 16th century. Lutheranism did not, however, have much impact until the 18th century, when thousands of Germans moved into the region to assist in the process of rebuilding after the Turkish forces were driven out. Included among the new German residents were some 100,000 Lutherans. They gave the church a decidedly German cast. After World War II, many German people returned to Germany. Through the years of Communist domination of the country, the once vital church went from 130,000 members to less than 5,000. Today, the Evangelical Church in Croatia has some 7,500 members.

The Reformed Church in Croatia grew among Hungarian-speaking residents of Croatia and was for many years an integral part of the Reformed Church in Hungary. In 1993 the church reorganized in light of the establishment of an independent Croatia. It has less than 5,000 members. It cooperates with the Lutheran Church in the Protestant Evangelical Council.

Baptists entered Croatia in 1883 when Filip Lotz, who had been converted and baptized in Vienna, returned to his home in Daruvar. A second center developed in 1890 in Zagreb under Ivan Zrinscalk, who like Lotz had been converted while out of the country. A Serbo-Croatian Baptist conference was founded in 1921. The conference cooperated with a Yugoslav Baptist movement founded in 1924. The Baptist movement was suppressed during the German occupation in World War II but revived after the war. Following independence in 1991, the Union of Baptist Churches was created by the several thousand Baptists in the new nation.

Jehovah's Witnesses have been active in Croatia since the 1920s. Suppressed by the Marxists in the last half of the 19th century, they revived and entered a growth phase in the 1990s. After a brief attempt to plant the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1889, the church had to wait for some 90 years for the opportunity to reenter the region. The Yugoslavian government recognized the church in 1975. By this time, there were LDS members residing in Croatia who had been converted while traveling abroad. The most prominent was Kresimir Cosic, a member of the Yugoslavian basketball team in the Olympics. He later became the deputy ambassador to the United States from Croatia.

Numerous Protestant and Free churches turned their attention to the country during the war in the 1990s. A variety of new churches emerged, including several Pentecostal bodies. Free churches had come into the country at the turn of the century, The Christian Brethren had arrived around 1901, and an initial Pentecostal congregation opened in 1910. Many of these were severely suppressed and ceased to exist in the 1940s and 1950s. However, by the end of the 1990s, numerous new independent missions and congregations had emerged. Many of these cooperate with the Protestant Evangelical Council of Croatia, associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

There had been a Jewish community in Croatia prior to the German occupation; it was almost wiped out during the Holocaust. Today approximately 2,500 Jews remain scattered in 9 centers around the country. The Jews of Zagreb have erected a Holocaust memorial in the cemetery of Mitrogoj.

Some Croatians converted to Islam during the years of Turkish rule, though they are a distinct minority, unlike the many in the neighboring countries of Bosnia and Albania. Islamic believers in Croatia follow the Sunni Hanafite School. There is also a small Baha'i Faith presence.

In spite of the conflict in the 1990s, a variety of Eastern groups found their way to Croatia, primarily Zagreb. Among the groups that have opened centers are the Kwan Um Zen School, the Croatian Shingon Buddhist Association, the Art of Living Foundation, the Gaudiya Vaisnava Association, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. There is also a center of the Unification Movement, and The Family has conducted an ongoing relief program through the 1990s from their centers in Budapest and Bucharest.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Albania, Orthodox Autocephalous Church of; Art of Living Foundation; Baha'i Faith; Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church; Christian Brethren; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Family International, The; Free Churches; Hanafite School of Islam; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Kwan Um School of Zen; Lutheranism; Reformed Church of Hungary; Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church; Serbian Orthodox Church; Unification Movement; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Eterovich, Francis, and Christopher Spalatin, eds. Croatia: Land, People, Culture. 2 vols. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1964, 1970.
- Shenk, N. G. The Social Role of Religion in Contemporary Yugoslavia. Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1987.
- Tanner, Marcus. Croatia: A Nation Forged in War. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.

Crowley, Aleister

1875–1947

Probably the most famous—and notorious—occultist of the 20th century, Edward Alexander Crowley was born in Leamington Spa, Warwickshire, England, on October 12, 1875, and raised in a fundamentalist Plymouth Brethren (now Christian Brethren) home. His father was a prosperous brewer who had retired to Leamington to study the Christian scriptures. Crowley came to despise the Plymouth Brethren primarily on the basis of his unfortunate experiences at the special sect school in Cambridge that he was obliged to attend, but after he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1895 he was able to spend much of his time reading poetry and classical literature as well as confirming his well-earned reputation as a champion chess player. It was while attending Cambridge University that he changed his name from Edward Alexander Crowley to Aleister Crowley, adopting a variant Gaelic spelling of his middle name.

Crowley's direct association with the Western magical tradition began in London in 1898 with his

English author, magician, and occultist Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) with a selection of occult instruments. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images) introduction to George Cecil Jones, a member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Crowley was initiated as a Neophyte in the Golden Dawn on November 18, 1898, and soon came to appreciate that those with the loftiest ritual grades were able to wield profound spiritual influence over their followers. Keen to ascend to as high a rank as possible, Crowley studied the symbolism of the Kabbalistic Tree of Life and all the techniques of ceremonial magic now available to him as a magical initiate. He passed quickly through the introductory grades of the Order and then sought initiation into the spiritual rebirth ritual that would admit him to the Inner, or Second Order of the Golden Dawn—otherwise known as the Red Rose and Cross of Gold. Crowley went across to Paris, where influential Golden Dawn co-founder S. L. MacGregor Mathers was then residing, and in January 1900 was initiated by Mathers into the Inner Order. Crowley then returned to England where he challenged the authority of William Butler Yeats, hoping to displace him as head of the Golden Dawn in England.

Crowley was unsuccessful in his bid to dislodge Yeats as head of the Golden Dawn and then suddenly switched course, embarking upon a series of travels through Mexico, the United States, Ceylon, and India before finally arriving in Cairo. It was here, in 1904, that he received a mediumistic revelation from a metaphysical entity called Aiwass (documented in a text later known as The Book of the Law) that would lead to the establishment of his magical cult of Thelema (see separate entry for details). Crowley's doctrine of Thelema (Greek: "will") was based on the practice of sacred sex magick (Crowley's unique spelling of the word) and claimed to herald the arrival of a new cosmic Aeon. Crowley (as the Great Beast 666) and his Scarlet Woman, or Whore of Babalon (again, his spelling), would be the principal players in an ongoing magical saga intended to replace the world's major religions. It was a far cry from the Kabbalistic theurgy of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in which Crowley had initially been trained.

In 1907 Crowley established his own magical order, the Argenteum Astrum, or Silver Star. Based initially on sources borrowed from the Golden Dawn, it soon developed into a vehicle for Crowley's increasingly explicit bisexuality, thereby complicating the apparently clear sex-role distinction between the Beast and the Scarlet Woman delineated in the Book of the Law. One of the early members of the Argenteum Astrum was Victor Neuburg (1883–1940), a young poet who, like Crowley, had studied at Trinity College, Cambridge. Crowley quickly recognized in Neuburg a kindred spirit, and they entered into a homosexual magic liaison tinged with sado-masochistic tendencies, which would last until 1914. Crowley's magical relationship with Neuburg included acts of ritual sex magic in the Algerian desert.

Events in Crowley's magical career took an unexpected turn in London in May 1912, when Crowley was contacted by Theodor Reuss, head of the German branch of the Ordo Templi Orientis—an esoteric organization similarly dedicated to the practice of ritual sex magic. As a result of their meeting Crowley became head of a new magical order known as the Mysteria Mystica Maxima, effectively an English sub-siary of the German Ordo Templi Orientis. In 1922—following Reuss’s retirement—Crowley replaced Reuss as the head of the Ordo Templi Orientis itself, a position he held until his death in 1947. The Ordo Templi Orientis now has its headquarters in the United States and continues to embody Crowley’s doctrine of Thelemic sex-magick.

Aleister Crowley spent his final years in a guest house in Hastings, Sussex, and it was here that he died on December 1, 1947. Crowley left behind an enormous outpouring of magical writing, much of it related to his central magical dictum: “Do what thou wilt, shall be the whole of the Law.” Although this expression appears at first glance to be indulgent and hedonistic, it focuses on Crowley’s belief that the magical practitioner should always endeavor to discover his or her true Will. Among the most enduring aspects of Crowley’s esoteric perspective are his systematic approach to magical consciousness and his emphasis on self-empowerment. Unfortunately Crowley was also authoritarian. He disdained human weakness and was frequently cruel—especially to those who depended on him. His magical records reveal that he was a complete chauvinist, regarding women essentially as sex-objects, rather than as people in their own right. He was, nevertheless, a strong believer in personal freedom and always emphasized that all persons have it within themselves to change their circumstances and their individual destinies. Crowley celebrated the cause of the individual throughout his life, despite the controversy he attracted through his own, unique approach to ritual magic.

Nevill Drury

See also: Christian Brethren; Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn; Mathers, Samuel Liddell MacGregor; Ordo Templi Orientis; Thelema.

References

- Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Ed. by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill and Wang, 1970.
- Crowley, Aleister. Magick in Theory and Practice. Paris: the Author, 1929. Reprinted in various editions.
- Crowley, Aleister. The Qabalah of Aleister Crowley. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

Sutin, L., Do What Thou Wilt: A Life of Aleister Crowley. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2000.

Symonds, John. The King of the Shadow Realm: Aleister Crowley, His Life and Magic. London: Duckworth, 1989.

■ Cuba

The Socialist Republic of Cuba, known as “The Pearl of the Antilles,” is an archipelago composed of 3,715 islands (with an area of 43,000 square miles) in the Caribbean Sea. The Island of Cuba (40,000 square miles), the largest and westernmost island of the West Indies, has a length of almost 750 miles with a width that varies from 100 miles to 30 miles.

The national language is Spanish, but Haitian Creole is spoken by more than 300,000 Haitian immigrants. Lukumi is a secret language used for rituals by priests (babalawos) in the Santeria religion.

According to Cuba’s National Office of Statistics (ONE), based on the results of the 2002 census, the Cuban population was 11,177,743. Officially, the racial makeup was 7,271,926 whites (65.1 percent); 1,126,894 blacks (10.1 percent); and 2,778,923 mulattoes and mestizos (24.9 percent). Between 1900 and 1930 more than a million Spaniards immigrated to Cuba.

During Fidel Castro’s first year as prime minister (1959–1960), reactions to government policies motivated many anti-Castro Cubans to leave. They formed a burgeoning expatriate anti-Castro community in Miami, which eventually grew to include some 900,000. Other Cubans have relocated to Venezuela (85,000), Spain (18,000), Jamaica (8,300), Puerto Rico (8,200), and other countries.

According to the 2008 International Religious Freedom Report, the Cuban Constitution recognizes the right of citizens to profess and practice any religious belief within the framework of respect for the law; however, in law and in practice the government continues to place restrictions on freedom of religion. Foreign missionary groups operate through registered churches. Visits by religious figures are handled by the Religious Affairs Office of the Central Committee of the Communist Party.

A man prays before a large homemade Santeria altar in Baracoa, Cuba. While most Cubans are Roman Catholics, many also practice Santeria. (Robert van der Hilst/Corbis)

The government continues to exert control over all aspects of social life, including religious expression. Certain groups, particularly Seventh-day Adventists and Jehovah's Witnesses, faced significant harassment and maltreatment. However, according to the majority of officially recognized religious organizations, there was a slight improvement in the status of respect for religious freedom during 2008. Various religious groups reported fewer restrictions on politically sensitive expression, fewer importation and travel restrictions, and permission to repair buildings, while reporting significant increases in membership.

Although guaranteeing religious freedom, the Castro regime passed a number of laws that had a direct effect upon religious groups. It nationalized all schools in 1961. It banned public religious festivals and demonstrations. It also passed regulations that took away church property from many religious groups. Even though there has been sporadic persecution of church leaders, the religious organizations that were in place in 1958 have been allowed to survive. Relations between the Cuban state and Christian churches began to improve following the January 1998 visit to Habana by Roman Catholic Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005).

The Cuban revolutionary government declared itself atheist during the early years of its administration, although in 1992 it redefined itself as secular and removed references to atheism in the Constitution, and religious believers were allowed to join the Communist Party.

There are no independent authoritative sources on the size or composition of religious institutions and their membership in Cuba. The Roman Catholic Church estimated that 54 percent of the population was Catholic in 2002. However, Catholic Church officials estimated that only about 10 percent of baptized Catholics attended Mass regularly. Membership in Protestant churches is currently estimated to be about 550,000 persons, or 4.8 percent of the total population. A small portion of the population is either non-practicing of any particular religion, or is atheist or agnostic, perhaps 10 percent. That leaves the category of “other religions” with about 30 percent of the national population. The latter category includes other organized religious groups (Christian and non-Christian) as well as non-formal religious groups, such as African-derived “popular religions” (animist).

Some reliable sources estimate that now as much as 80 percent of the population consults with practitioners of religions with West African roots, such as Santería or Yoruba. During 2008, a historically secretive male brotherhood associated with Afro-Cuban religious practices, the Abakuá Society, opened a public office.

The Cuban Council of Churches (CCC) is a private, officially sanctioned umbrella organization that works closely with the Cuban government and includes 25 religious organizations as full members; 9 are associate members, and 3 have observer status. Other officially recognized groups, including the Roman Catholic Church, the Jehovah’s Witnesses, and the small Jewish and Muslim communities, do not belong to the CCC. The government grants the CCC time for periodic radio broadcasts early on Sunday mornings.

Cuba was originally inhabited by the Taíno and Ciboney tribes of Amerindians. Their encounter with the Spanish after 1492 was disastrous, and during the 16th century they were largely eradicated by warfare and disease. Cuba subsequently became the staging area for the Spanish expeditions of discovery and conquest in the New World, specifically the conquest of Mexico and Central America, and the establishment of a Spanish presence in North America.

In 1511, Captain Diego Velásquez (1465–1524), who had accompanied Columbus on his second voyage, was sent to Cuba to subjugate and colonize the island. He founded a settlement on the present site of the city of La Havana, which later became the bishopric and capital (1552) and has remained so ever since.

The Aborigines that the Spaniards found in Cuba were reduced to slavery by the white settlers. However, among them was the energetic and persevering Friar Bartolomé de Las Casas (1484–1556), called “The Protector of the Indians,” who earned a high reputation in history for his heroic efforts.

In 1524, the first cargo of Negro slaves landed in Cuba. The slaves were subjected to great cruelties and hardships, their natural birth rate was checked, and their numbers had to be replenished by repeated importations. This traffic constantly increased until, at the beginning of the 19th century, slaves were being imported at the rate of more than 10,000 a year. Cuba was one of the last countries to abolish slavery.

During the 1890s, pro-independence agitation revived, fueled by resentment of the restrictions imposed on Cuban trade by Spain and hostility to Spain’s increasingly oppressive and incompetent administration of Cuba. The Cuban War of Independence (1895–1898), the last of three liberation wars that Cuba fought against Spain, was followed by the Spanish-American War, which lasted only a few months in 1898. In the resulting Treaty of Paris, Spain relinquished its hold on Cuba and Puerto Rico. The new Cuban government declared freedom of worship, but few left Catholicism.

U.S. government forces occupied the island for three years prior to a new independent government assuming control in 1902. Constitutional government survived until 1930, when President Gerardo Machado y Morales (1871–1939) suspended the Constitution. In 1933, Fulgencio Batista y Zaldívar (1901–1973) led a palace revolt and as head of the army became strongman behind a succession of “puppet presidents” until he was elected president himself in 1940. Batista eventually gave up the president’s office, but again in 1952 assumed control as a “provisional president” for the next two years.

Batista was opposed by a young Cuban attorney, Fidel Castro (b. 1926). In 1956, Castro returned to Cuba from exile and led an insurgency with the assistance of the youthful revolutionary Ernesto Che Guevara (1928–1967). With growing support, through 1958, the rebels launched a general insurrection, and Batista fled the country into exile. Castro's rebel forces entered the capital in January 1959, and Castro became prime minister of Cuba in February 1959.

In its first year in power, the new revolutionary government carried out measures such as the expropriation of private property with no or minimal compensation and the nationalization of public utilities, and began a campaign to institute tighter controls on the private sector, including the closing of the gambling industry. The U.S. government became increasingly hostile toward the Castro-led government of Cuba, leading to an unsuccessful attempt by U.S.-backed Cuban exiles to overthrow the revolutionary government of Fidel Castro (the so-called Bay of Pigs Invasion).

The Bay of Pigs Invasion led to a strengthening of the Cuban-Soviet strategic alliance and the decision to place Soviet medium-range ballistic missiles (MRBMs) and intermediate-range ballistic missiles (IRBMs) in Cuba. This precipitated the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962, during which the Kennedy administration threatened the Soviet Union with nuclear war unless the missiles were withdrawn. After a brief improvement in U.S.-Cuban relations, relations deteriorated again in 1963 as Castro moved Cuba toward a full-fledged Socialist system modeled on the Soviet Union. The U.S. government imposed a complete diplomatic and commercial embargo on Cuba.

Meanwhile, Cuba became openly anti-religious and promulgated repressive laws only loosened in the 1990s. In the early 1960s, the government nationalized all private schools—Catholic, Protestant, and secular—in an effort to move toward a “classless society.” Over the next decades, the Cuban exile community in the United States effectively opposed the liberalization of U.S. policy toward Cuba; however, the efforts to foment an anti-Castro movement inside Cuba, let alone a revolution there, met with limited success.

The fall of the Soviet Union in 1991 dealt Cuba a giant economic blow. The Soviet Union's collapse caused a crisis in confidence for those who believed that the Soviet Union was successfully “building Socialism,” but proved insufficient to persuade Cuba's Communists to surrender their grip on power. By the late 1990s, the situation in the country had stabilized. In 2006, Fidel Castro delegated his duties as president of the Council of State, president of the Council of Ministers, first secretary of the Cuban Communist Party and the post of commander-in-chief of the armed forces to his brother and first vice president, Raúl Castro.

Numerically, most Christian churches have fared poorly under the Castro regime, which remains in power (2009). The Roman Catholic Church declined from 85 percent of the population to about 49 percent in 1980. The various Protestant denominations and independent churches declined also during the 1960s, but began to grow again during the 1970s.

The Roman Catholic Church Roman Catholicism came to Cuba in 1512—some 20 years after Columbus first arrived in the Caribbean. The first Catholic priests were Dominicans, soon joined by the Franciscans. The priests primarily served the Spanish colonial settlements, because the Native Amerindian population was killed off rather than converted. Six years later, Pope Leo X (r. 1513–1521) established the Diocese of Baracoa, which included “all of Cuba” and the Spanish possessions of Louisiana and Florida. The name was changed to the Diocese of Santiago de Cuba in 1522. In 1910, Cuba was divided ecclesiastically into one archdiocese and three suffragan dioceses. The archbishop of Santiago de Cuba was the head of the Catholic Church in Cuba in 1910. Francisco Barnaba Aguilar (1835–1913), the first native Cuban to become an archbishop, was consecrated by Archbishop Chappelle in 1899. During the years of Spanish rule, all the bishops (and priests) on the island were appointed directly from Madrid. An apostolic delegate for Cuba and Puerto Rico resided at Havana, but he was not accredited to the Cuban government, and Cuba had no official representative at the Vatican. The first delegate was Archbishop Placide Louis Chappelle of New Orleans (r. 1897–1905), who was sent by Pope Leo XIII (r. 1878–1903) to look after the interests of the church in Cuba during the U.S. occupation in 1898.

During the early history of Cuba, the Catholic clergy seemed to have been the principal if not the only agents of education. In 1689, the College of San Ambrosio was founded in Havana for the purpose of preparing young men for the priesthood. As early as 1688, the city council of Havana petitioned the royal government to establish a university in that city, in order that young men desirous of pursuing higher studies might not be compelled to go to Europe to do so. After some years of preparation, the present University of Havana was founded in 1728. The rectors, vice rectors, counselors, and secretaries were all Dominicans. In 1899, at the time of the U.S. occupation, private schools abounded in Cuba, but were available only to the wealthy. Public education became a priority during the American occupation and by 1910 the public schools were equal, if not superior, to the private ones.

A conservative Spanish Catholicism spread across the island during the 19th century. At the beginning of the 20th century, the new Cuban government adopted a policy of separation of church and state, under which the Catholic Church actually experienced a renewal of strength and influence.

During the Batista years (1933–1959), there were “warm relations” between the Cuban government and the Catholic hierarchy. On December 31, 1958, Batista fled the country. At the time, it had been politically inactive for the previous decades even though more than 85 percent of the public were Catholic (some studies put the percentage of “devout” Catholics at below 50 percent) with strength based in the upper and middle classes. All agree that the Catholic Church hierarchy, allied to the wealthy elite, had a close and friendly relationship with the Batista dictatorship. Shortly after Batista fled Cuba, the majority of the mostly foreign Catholic priests also left the country, while other Catholic priests and religious workers were expelled.

Beginning in 1959, the Castro regime suppressed the Roman Catholic Church, its efforts only easing up after Pope John Paul II visited Cuba in 1998. During this time, the Catholic Church was accorded some approbation in recognition of a few progressive Catholic laity and priests who identified with and assisted the Cuban Revolution. Nevertheless, all religious schools have remained closed since the early 1960s. After the Cuban Catholic Church issued some pastoral letters in 1969 that offered a new direction to the Catholic faithful, especially a letter calling for Catholics to work for the development of Cuban society, relationships began to improve. The Catholic Church in Cuba was also helped by the rise of Liberation Theology, a theology developed by radical Catholic theologians based on a Marxist critique of society and propagated among radical priests in Central and South America.

During January 21–25, 1998, Pope John Paul II visited Havana in an effort to revive the Catholic faith in Cuba, and to improve relations between the Cuban Catholic Church and the Marxist government. At the time of the pope’s visit, the Vatican and the government of Cuba had maintained uninterrupted diplomatic relations since 1935.

The pontiff took aim at many aspects of Cuban society, and as he departed he made some critical references to the U.S. economic blockade of Cuba. In 2008, the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarciso Bertone, visited Cuba and reportedly met with President Raúl Castro. While there, Bertone unveiled a statue of Pope John Paul II in the city of Santa Clara to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the pope’s visit.

Today, the Roman Catholic Church is led by the Cuban Catholic Bishops’ Conference (COCC), under the leadership of Cardinal Jaime Lucas Ortega y Alamino, archbishop of La Havana. It has 11 dioceses, 56 female religious orders, and 24 male religious orders. In 2002, there were 264 parishes and about 200 prayer houses (casas de misión), served by 166 diocesan priests and 125 religious priests (total of 291); in addition there were 48 permanent deacons, 198 male religious workers, and 498 female religious workers. Informed observers reported that only about 10 percent of Catholic adherents—an estimated 6 million (54 percent) of the nation’s 11.2 million people—attended Mass weekly.

Although the Catholic Church is by far the largest religious community in Cuba, it has experienced a steady decline in adherents since 1960, directly related to the growth of the Protestant movement, other religions and the non-religious sector (atheism) during the last 50 years.

The Protestant Movement Historically, the Protestant community in Cuba has been small. In 1959, the number of all adherents of an estimated 50 denominations was estimated to be approximately 250,000 people. By 1970, the number of adherents had shrunk to about 50,000, according to some sources. Nevertheless, beginning in the 1970s, the Protestant movement

Cuba

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	4,013,000	6,562,000	58.3	1.91	6,647,000	5,986,000
Roman Catholics	3,819,000	5,760,000	51.2	1.99	5,820,000	5,175,000
Protestants	108,000	405,000	3.6	3.04	480,000	500,000
Independents	60,800	200,000	1.8	2.12	235,000	250,000
Agnostics	2,675,000	2,050,000	18.2	−4.15	2,000,000	1,682,000
Spiritists	1,516,000	1,930,000	17.1	0.21	1,930,000	1,700,000
Atheists	490,000	650,000	5.8	0.21	575,000	450,000
Hindus	3,000	23,500	0.2	0.21	25,000	30,000
Chinese folk	4,000	22,500	0.2	0.21	27,000	30,000
Muslims	1,000	10,000	0.1	0.21	14,000	17,500
Buddhists	5,000	6,200	0.1	0.21	8,000	10,000
Baha'is	500	1,400	0.0	0.21	2,000	3,200
Jews	1,800	850	0.0	0.22	800	800
New religionists	500	900	0.0	0.20	2,000	2,000
Total population	8,710,000	11,257,000	100.0	0.21	11,231,000	9,911,000

experienced revitalization, with a multiplication of its leaders and house churches (both legal and illegal ones) and a substantial growth in its membership and total religious community (adherents).

Today, an estimated 550,000 persons, or 4.8 percent of the total population, are affiliated with the Protestant movement in Cuba (mainline Protestant, evangelical Free church bodies, Adventists, and Pentecostals), which now has 54 officially recognized denominations. Pentecostalism has grown rapidly in recent years, and the Assemblies of God alone claims a membership of more than 100,000. The Baptists—represented by the Baptist Convention of Cuba and smaller denominations—are reportedly the largest Protestant family of churches in Cuba today, followed by the Pentecostal family of churches. According to many observers, the number of Pentecostals has been growing rapidly in comparison to non-Pentecostals.

The Church of England began holding services in Cuba in 1741, though they were limited to expatriate Anglicans. In 1871, the Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. sent a pastor to reside in Cuba and serve British and American residents. During the last decades of the 19th century, many Cuban Catholics fled to the United States, and many found the Episcopal Church to be an acceptable substitute for the Catholicism of their youth. Several chose to return to Cuba and preach to their fellow citizens. By 1906 the work had grown to the point that a resident bishop was named. The first Cuban bishop was appointed in 1967. Today, the Episcopal Church of Cuba has an unusual status; it is headed by its bishop, who resides in Havana, and a Metropolitan Council. That Council includes the primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, the archbishop of the Episcopal Church's Province of the Caribbean, and the archbishop of the Church in the Province of the West Indies.

In 1873, ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) began working with Cuban exiles in Florida. In 1883, two Cubans, Enrique B. Someillán and Aurelio Silvera, returned to Cuba and began to preach in La Havana, where the first Methodist church was organized in 1888. As the work grew, the Methodists began to build schools and medical dispensaries in rural areas. The rise of Castro became the occasion of rethinking the church's position, and it was granted independence as the Methodist Church in Cuba in 1964 by its parent body in the United States, now known as the United Methodist Church (since 1968).

As with the Anglicans and Methodists, the Baptists found their initial converts working among Cuban exiles in Florida. In 1882, Joaquín de Palma, who became a Baptist in Florida, returned to Cuba as a Bible distributor with the American Bible Society. He was joined in 1883 by colporteurs Alberto J. Díaz and Pedro Duarte, who were Episcopalian laymen. Later in 1883, Díaz established an independent Protestant church in La Havana, which became Iglesia Bautista Getsemaní in 1886 after Díaz became an ordained Baptist minister in 1885 under the Reverend William F. Wood of Key West, Florida, and became affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC).

Also, in 1886, the Jamaican Baptist Missionary Society began work in Cienfuegos in eastern Cuba among Jamaican immigrants; and, in 1890, Episcopal pastor Evaristo Collazo decided to become a Presbyterian in Cuba. Southern Presbyterian Church missionary A. T. Graybill arrived from Mexico to begin work in Cuba.

In 1898, representatives of the SBC and the Northern Baptist Convention (NBC) met in Washington, D.C., to discuss the future development of Baptist work in Cuba under the U.S. occupation. The two denominations agreed to distribute their mission work geographically to avoid the duplication of efforts, with the SBC working in the western region and the NBC in the eastern region.

In 1899, the Reverend José Regino del Rosario O'Hallaron Valdés, a Cuban exile in Florida who had been converted under the ministry of Rev. Díaz in La Havana, returned to Cuba affiliated with the SBC to begin mission work in western Cuba. At about the same time, missionaries with the American Baptist Home Mission Society (NBC) began work in eastern Cuba: the Reverend Hartwell Robert Moseley in Santiago de Cuba and the Reverend A. B. Carlisle in Guantánamo. In February 1905, the NBC missionaries organized the Association of Baptist Churches in eastern Cuba with 12 churches, 3 missions, and 17 preaching points. These two Baptist denominations later joined forces to organize the Baptist Convention of Cuba, now one of the largest Protestant denominations in the nation.

Under U.S. occupation after the Spanish-American War in 1898, various Protestant denominations began mission work in Cuba among people who were disillusioned with the colonial Catholic Church. Protestant mission schools—eventually supported by mission boards and North American corporations—became centers both for spreading the gospel and for “civilizing the natives,” and Protestantism became the spiritual justification not only for converting Cubans but also for the expansion of U.S. business interests.

The Congregational Church Home Missionary Society began work in La Havana in 1899, and the Central Congregational Church was organized there in 1900. The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) also initiated work in Cuba in 1899, but abandoned the field in 1918. Both denominations later passed their work to the Northern Presbyterians (Home Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church U.S.A.), which began work in Cuba in 1899 under missionary pastor Pedro Rioseco, who was joined by Dr. J. Milton Green in 1901. The established churches became independent in 1967 as the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Cuba.

Also, in 1899, the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church (founded in 1898 in Anderson, South Carolina) sent their first missionaries to Cuba: John Dull, Sarah M. Payne, Nora Arnold, and Cornelia Allen. In 1909, this church body became the first Pentecostal denomination in the United States. In 1911, it merged with the Pentecostal Holiness Church in Falcon, North Carolina.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church and the Friends United Meeting (Quakers) both arrived in 1900. In 1902, The Pentecostal Mission of Nashville, Tennessee, began work in Cuba, and this Holiness (non-Pentecostal) body merged with the Church of the Nazarene in 1915. In 1902, various independent Fundamentalist missionaries began work in Cuba. In 1903, the Board of Missions of the General Council of the Seventh-day Adventist Church sent their first missionaries to Cuba.

Prior to 1898 only 5 Protestant denominations had begun missionary work in Cuba, but by 1920 13 more mission agencies had arrived and new Cuban-based Protestant churches began to emerge. Between 1920 and 1960, 31 additional Protestant denominations and independent church associations began work in Cuba. By 1960, there were at least 50 Protestant church bodies on the island. All of the churches suffered in the 1960s, when more than half a million Cubans (including many church leaders) left the country for exile in the United States due to growing hardships encountered under the Castro regime.

Numerous Pentecostal denominations were founded in Cuba between 1920 and 1960: Gideon's Evangelical Band (1922), Church of God of Prophecy (1935), Open Bible Standard Churches (1937), Church of God World Missions (1942, based in Cleveland, Tennessee), Bethel Evangelical Church (1944, affiliated with Elim Missionary Assemblies), Pentecostal Church of God (1951), Pentecostal Holiness Church (1952), and the Congregational Pentecostal Church of Cuba (1956, founded by Luis M. Ortiz from Puerto Rico; this denomination was renamed the Worldwide Missionary Movement in 1963). Also founded in the 1950s were the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, Church of Christ of the Apostolic Faith, Apostolic Movement of God in Christ Jesus (founded by Emilio Alfonso Howard), United Pentecostal Church, Damascus Christian Church, Missionary Church of Christ, Worldwide Missions (founded by Marco Díaz Gonzáles), and Defenders of the Faith.

Also founded during this period (1920–1960) were numerous non-Pentecostal denominations, including Los Pinos Nuevos Evangelical Association (1928, affiliated with West Indies Mission, now WorldTeam), the Church of God (1930, based in Anderson, Indiana), African Methodist Episcopal Church (1939), independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ (1939), Christian Brethren (1939, affiliated with Christian Mission in Many Lands), Free Will Baptist Churches (1941, founded by missionary Thomas Wiley), Interior Gospel Mission (1944, founded by Vicente Izquierdo and his wife, Bessie Vander Valk, who became affiliated with the Christian Reformed Church in 1958), United World Mission (1944), Church of the Nazarene (reopened its work in 1945), Berean Mission (1945, founded by missionaries Ruby Miller and Lucille Kerrigan), Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (1946, Isle of Pines), Fellowship of Evangelical Bible Churches (1949), Franconia Mennonite Church (1954), Brethren in Christ Missions (1954), Baptist Bible Fellowship International (1955), and the Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society (1957, now CBAmerica).

According to PROLADES research on Cuba, using Dr. Peter Brierly's statistical data for 1995, the Liturgical Family of Churches had 65 churches with 10,300 members (2.3 percent of the total Protestant membership); the Evangelical Free Church Family of Churches had 546 churches with 36,318 members (38.6 percent); the Adventist Family of Churches had 110 churches with 11,200 members (11.8 percent); and the Pentecostal Family of Churches had 560 churches with 44,572 members (47.3 percent).

The Seventh-day Adventist Church reported 272 churches in 2007, up from 145 in 1997; and 27,556 members in 2007, up from 16,011 in 1997. This shows a large increase in the number of churches and members since 1980.

The Assemblies of God, officially registered as Iglesia Evangélica Pentecostal de Cuba, was founded by U.S. missionaries who laid the foundation for growth during the 1920s. When political unrest prompted missionaries to leave in 1963, the Assemblies of God had 42 organized churches, 248 preaching points, and 4,100 believers. During the difficult years that followed, the church suffered loss and experienced a time of stagnation. However, during the 1980s, there was a resurgence of church growth. By 1990, the Assemblies of God constituency numbered 12,000 in 90 churches. Today, the Assemblies of God is one of the largest Protestant denominations in Cuba.

After decades of tension following the January 1959 triumph of the Cuban revolution, relations between the Socialist government and Protestant churches took a radical turn for the better in the wake of an April 2, 1990 meeting between President Fidel Castro and 70 Protestant evangelical and ecumenical leaders. As a result of this meeting, the ruling Communist Party opened up its membership to people of faith, discrimination for religious reasons diminished, and new opportunities for religious organizations to work in the social arena were created. Today, an estimated 550,000 Cubans hear the gospel preached and taught each week in more than 8,300 registered Protestant churches, house churches (casa culto), or cell group meetings, some of which are considered illegal gatherings by the Cuban government. Between 1992 and 1998, more than 700 Protestant churches were established in Cuba, according to reliable sources.

The Cuban Council of Protestant Churches, founded in 1941, was renamed the Ecumenical Council of Cuba in 1977, when it was composed of 14 member organizations. Today, it is known as the Cuban Council of Churches (CCC) and is affiliated with the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI) and the World Council of Churches (WCC). Within the CCC, the only Cuban-based denominations that are members of the WCC are the Methodist Church of Cuba and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Cuba.

In 2008, the CCC registered 25 religious organizations as full members, 9 as associate members, and 3 with observer status. The CCC is structured into 5 “zones” across Cuba and represents approximately 100,000 Christians, according to the CCC’s leadership. Most CCC members are officially recognized by the state, although some, including the Evangelical Lutheran Church, lack legal status and are recognized through their membership in the CCC.

Other Christian Groups In the 1950s, local Catholic priests taught their parishioners that “Protestants were the devil and that the people should not send their children to Protestant schools,” whereas today there is more religious tolerance and respect for differing religious views, whether between Catholics and Protestants or among Protestants. However, there is less tolerance by Catholics and Protestants regarding religious sects and “new religious movements” in Cuban society. The exception is the Eastern Orthodox denominations that exist in Cuba today.

The Greek Orthodox Church (affiliated with the Ecumenical Patriarchate) was founded in Cuba in 1950 in La Havana among a small Greek immigrant population. In 1960, the Cuban government took over these facilities and used them to house a children’s theater company. Following the 1998 visit to Cuba of Pope John Paul II, the Castro government agreed to build a new Greek Orthodox church in La Havana, which was the first religious structure to be constructed in Cuba in 43 years. The new church was built near St. Francesco de Assisi Square, located on the port side of Old (Colonial) Havana, and dedicated to Saint Nikolaos (Nicholas).

In addition, the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) received permission and financing from the Cuban government in 2004 to begin construction of its own cathedral in La Havana. The Eastern Orthodox community in Cuba is composed of only a few thousand immigrants from Eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union, and the Middle East.

Non-Protestant marginal Christian groups include the Jehovah’s Witnesses, which reported more than 1,238 congregations (many of these are probably house churches) with 90,783 adherents in 2008; the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons) currently reports no churches or members in Cuba due to government restrictions; the Unitarian Universalist Church; and the Church of Christ, Scientist (one congregation).

Additional Religious Groups Several of the major world religious traditions are represented in Cuba. Sant Mat is represented by the disciples of Sant Thakar Singh (1929–2005) now organized under the leadership of Sant Baljit Singh (b. 1962). Buddhism is carried forward by Soka Gakkai International (SGI), Nichiren Daishonin, and various Western Zen groups. SGI-Cuba became the first Buddhist association to be officially recognized as a religious corporation by the Cuban government. On January 6, 2007, a ceremony celebrating the official registration of SGI-Cuba was held in Havana. The Cuban Baha’i community had its beginning in 1939; its headquarters are in Municipio Cerro of La Havana.

The Muslim population consists of about 6,000 temporary residents and 300 native-born persons, many of Middle Eastern ancestry. Currently, Cuban Muslims perform their prayers at home, because even in La Havana there is no mosque in which they can congregate for prayers. Among the international Islamic organizations that are carrying out charitable work among Cuba’s Muslims is the Qatari Charitable Society, and it is estimated that the population of indigenous Cuban Muslims is not less than 1,000. Also, the Subud Association (founded in Indonesia in 1925 by Muhammad Subuh) is active in Cuba with representatives in La Havana and Manzanillo de Granma.

Jews settled in Cuba in the 16th century, having been expelled from Spain in 1492. However, the growth of the community did not begin until the 19th century. The Jewish population in Cuba peaked in the 1950s at around 15,000 people, but most of them fled the island in the wake of the 1959 revolution that brought Fidel Castro to power. Today, the Jewish community has an estimated 1,500 members, with 1,200 residing in Havana.

In addition, a variety of Western Esoteric groups have survived from earlier in the 20th century, including Freemasonry, the Theosophical Society (America), and the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC).

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age movement is represented in Cuba by a variety of religious groups: Santería is just one of several branches of African-based Spiritualism in Cuba, albeit the most popular. Many local newspapers carry notices regarding local psychics, mediums, clairvoyants, fortune tellers, and the like, who are available to assist “seekers” (customers) regarding personal, matrimonial, social, and spiritual issues. European Spiritualism appeared in Cuba in the form of the International Spiritualist Federation (founded in 1923 in Paris), which established an affiliated association in La Havana in the 1920s. New Age groups include Reiki and Control Mental Silva.

While Christianity spread across Cuba, an undercurrent of religion grew among African slaves and their descendants derived from West African animistic religions. Cuban Catholicism is often practiced in tandem with Santería, a mixture of Catholicism and African belief systems that include a number of cult religions: Culto a Ifá, Regla Conga, Palo Monte, Palo Mayombe, Arará, Ganga, and Sociedad Secreta Abakuá (also known as Ñañguismo). These groups operate as semi-secret religious communities that meet in private homes, and their actual size is difficult to assess.

Santería (Way of the Saints), also known as Regla de Ocha or Lukumi, which many people believe rivals the Catholic Church in adherents, reached greater recognition in Cuban society after the 1959 revolution, and is now treated by the government on a par with all other religions. In 1999, there were an estimated 2,000 babalawos (Santería priests) in the whole country, or one for every 4,000 people. No reliable figures exist, but santeros (adherents of Santería) almost certainly outnumber the adherents of other organized religions in Cuba. Some sources estimate that now as much as 80 percent of the Cuban population consults with practitioners of religions with West African roots.

Cuba’s patron saint, La Virgen de la Caridad del Cobre (the Virgin of Cobre), is a syncretism with the Santería goddess Ochún. This important religious festival is celebrated by Cubans annually on September 8.

J. Gordon Melton and Clifton L. Holland

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Anglican Church of Canada; Assemblies of God; Baha’i Faith; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Baptist Convention of Western Cuba; CBAmerica; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of the Nazarene; Dominicans; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Episcopal Church; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Friends United Meeting; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Latin American Council of Churches; Methodist Church of Cuba; Palo Mayombe; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Santería; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Subud; Theosophical Society (America); United Methodist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; World Council of Churches; Yoruban Religion/Spirituality.

References

- Betto, Frei. Fidel and Religion: Conversations with Frei Betto on Marxism & Liberation Theology. 2nd ed. New York: Ocean Press, 1990, 2006.
- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Catholic Hierarchy. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/diocese/dsncu.html>.
- Chambers, Phil. “The Political Weakness of the Church in Cuba.” In The Theologian. <http://www.theologian.org.uk/churchhistory/cuba.html>.
- Fernández Olmos, Margarite, and Lizabeth Paravisi-Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Fuentes, Ventura. “Cuba.” In The Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 4. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1908. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/04558c.htm>.
- Holbrook, Joseph. “The Church in Cuba: 1952–1959. Ambivalence between regime and revolution.”

- <http://lanic.utexas.edu/project/etext/llilas/illasa/2008/holbrook.pdf>.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision International, 1981.
- Keegan, William F. Taino Indian Myth and Practice. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 2007.
- Morales Carrión, Arturo. Puerto Rico: A Political and Cultural History. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., 1983.
- Oficina Nacional de Estadísticas (ONE). <http://www.one.cu/>.
- PROLADES. A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Cuba 1837–1996. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/caribe/cub/cuba-chron.pdf>.
- PROLADES. “Religion in Cuba.” <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/caribe/cub/cub-rd.htm>.
- PROLADES. A Table of the Estimated Size of the Protestant Movement in Cuba, 1995. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/caribe/cub/cuba-tbl.pdf>.
- Ramos, Marcos Antonio. Panorama del Protestantismo en Cuba. Miami, FL: Editorial Caribe, 1986.
- Roman, Reinaldo L. Governing Spirits: Religion, Miracles, and Spectacles in Cuba and Puerto Rico, 1898–1956. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Stoll, David. Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report, 2008: Cuba. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108521.htm>.
- Wald, Karen Lee. “Cuba Meets the Pope, and Both Walk Away Winners.” In NY Transfer News, January 30, 1998. <http://www.blythe.org/nytransfer-sub/Caribbean/.kwald.html>.
- Yaremko, Jason M. U.S. Protestant Mission in Cuba: From Independence to Castro. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000.

Cumberland Presbyterian Church

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church grew out of an attempt of Presbyterian ministers on the American frontier early in the 19th century, who were reacting to the fact that only a small percentage of Americans (less than 20 percent) were affiliated with any church or religious organization. In the years after, the Methodists and Baptists experienced some growth through the use of evangelical preaching, as revivals of religion swept thousands into the churches. Most of the Methodists and Baptists also lacked formal theological education.

The revivals, though originating primarily in Baptist and Methodist meetings, quickly became ecumenical affairs involving Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and others. One Presbyterian minister, the Reverend James McGready (ca. 1758–1817), became deeply involved in the revivalist culture in Kentucky. He was originally licensed as a minister by the Redstone Presbytery. After 1802, he became associated with the Cumberland Presbytery. As the revivals swept through Kentucky, the Cumberland Presbytery licensed some untrained ministers. Other Presbyterians complained about what the Presbytery was doing and charged that these ministers had also departed from Presbyterian belief, as contained in the Westminster Confession. In 1805, the Kentucky Synod, of which the Cumberland Presbytery was a part, agreed that the Cumberland Presbytery was acting irregularly. It also demanded to examine the untrained ministers on the question of their orthodoxy. When the Cumberland Presbytery refused to submit to the Kentucky Synod’s ruling, the synod dissolved the Cumberland Presbytery. The Presbytery appealed to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. When that appeal went unheeded, some of the ministers from the Presbytery withdrew from the Presbyterian Church. In 1810, Finis Ewing (1773–1841), Samuel King (1775–1842), and Samuel McAdow (1760–1844) constituted a new independent Cumberland Presbytery. Over the next few years, those still at odds with the Kentucky Synod formed two additional synods, and in 1813 the members of the three presbyteries formed the Cumberland Synod.

Continuing to participate in the revivals on the frontier, the Cumberland Synod spread throughout Tennessee and Kentucky and to neighboring states. In 1929, the leaders of the synod gathered to constitute the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The church was strongly affected by the Meth-

Ed Schreiber, 96, prays during the traditional laying on of hands at his ordination in the Cumberland Presbyterian denomination on Wednesday, June 21, 2000, in Adairville, Ky. Schreiber, of Nashville, Tenn., decided to begin seminary studies at age 92, and in doing so inspired his classmates, professors, and others. The laying on of hands is done by Cumberland Presbyterian clergy and elders. (AP/Wide World Images) odists, who rejected traditional Calvinist Presbyterian ideas about predestination and emphasized human ability to respond to the free grace of God. Over the 19th century, most Presbyterians tended to make a place for human freedom.

In the last half of the 20th century, some Cumberland Presbyterian leaders began to pursue reconciliation with their parent body, the Presbyterian Church in the United States. In 1906, by a slim majority, the Cumberland Presbyterians voted to merge back into the larger Presbyterian body, and today their group constitutes an integral part of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). However, a significant minority refused to participate in the union and reorganized under their former name. It is this continuing faction that constitutes the present-day Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In 2006, the church reported 81,000 members in the United States. There were more than 6,000 members in related congregations in Hong Kong, Colombia, Japan, and Liberia. The church continued a fraternal relationship with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in America. This church was a result of a mission developed by Cumberland Presbyterian ministers to African Americans in the pre-Civil War South, many of whom were slaves. After the Civil War, these members were assisted in developing presbyteries and synods, and in 1874 these members (a remnant of some 30,000 who had been affiliated with the church prior to the war) organized what was originally called the Second Presbyterian Church. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church in America has its headquarters at 226 Church St., Huntsville, AL 35801.

Cumberland Presbyterian Church
1978 Union Ave.
Memphis, TN 38104
www.cumberland.org

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition.

References

- Barrus, Ben M., Milton L. Baughn, and Thomas H. Campbell, eds. A People Called Cumberland Presbyterians. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock Publishers, 1998.
- Campbell, Thomas. Good News on the Frontier. Memphis, TN: Frontier Press, 1965.
- Gore, Matthew H. History of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Kentucky to 1988. N.p.: Joint Heritage Committee of Covenant and Cumberland Presbyteries, 2000.

■ Cyprus

Cyprus, an island nation in the middle of the Mediterranean Sea, was home to one of the oldest civilizations in the Mediterranean Basin. Today, its 3,600 square miles of land are inhabited by 793,000 people, the great majority of Greek descent (77 percent). There is a significant Turkish minority (17 percent)

The island was populated as early as 3000 BCE. It was an early home to Christianity, Saint Paul having recorded a visit in his travels in the first century CE. In the fifth century, the church in Cyprus, formerly attached to the church in Antioch, received autonomous status and has been a small but honored part of Eastern Orthodoxy through subsequent centuries. Cyprus became a jumping-off point for Europeans engaged in the Crusades, one result of which was the coming of members of the Roman Catholic Church to the island in significant numbers. In the 12th century, some 80,000 Maronites (Eastern-rite Roman Catholics from Lebanon) arrived, and a Maronite archdiocese was erected in 1352. Control of the island by Roman Catholics also led to the establishment of a Latin-rite church that enjoyed political favor.

Venice was the last of a succession of European powers to rule Cyprus. The Venetians' rule of almost a century was brought to an end in 1572 by the invasion and conquest of the island by the Ottoman Turks. The Turks favored the Orthodox Church and actively repressed the Roman Catholic dioceses, both Latin and Maronite. Only small communities of each survived, many Maronites returning to the Orthodox Church in the process. The Turks gave the head of the Cypriot church considerable secular power, a fact increasingly resented by the growing number of Turkish Muslims residing on Cyprus. In 1821, the archbishop (generally called the ethnarch) was executed.

Cypriot history changed again in 1878 when Britain gained control. It formally annexed Cyprus in 1914. That status remained until the independence of the island in 1960. The new nation inherited a major problem, caused by the presence of a significant Muslim minority (some 17 percent of the population). Though the majority of the islanders were Greek and favored an alignment with Greece, the island is relatively close to the Turkish coast. The new Constitution provided a set of guarantees for the Turkish minority. It established two communities, and each citizen had to choose to which community he or she would belong.

In 1974, the Orthodox archbishop and president of Cyprus, Ethnarch Makarios, was deposed, the culmination of a longstanding feud with other church leaders. As a result, Turkish forces invaded the island and re-established Makarios in the presidency; the events of the year drove a deep wedge between the Greek/Christian and Turkish/Muslim citizenry, and the Muslims residing in the northern part of the island proclaimed the existence of an autonomous Turkish state. The new government was not recognized by anyone except Turkey, but at the same time, the Cypriot government was unable to organize the support to re-establish its authority over the Turkish community. To this day the unofficial government controls the northern third of the island.

The Orthodox Church of Cyprus remains the dominant religious force on Cyprus, with approximately 75 percent of the population identifying with it. The church is led by its patriarch His Beatitude Chrysostomos, archbishop of Nea Justiniana and All Cyprus, who is assisted by the five bishops who preside over the five dioceses. The church is at one with the other Orthodox churches in faith and practice (apart from language). The Roman Catholic Church has survived only as a remnant. Its Latin-rite churches are attached to the patriarch of Jerusalem. There are an Eastern-rite diocese and a resident bishop in Nicosia, the capital of Cyprus.

A man in Cyprus talks on the phone before a wall densely decorated with icons of saints. Such icons are typical of Eastern Orthodox Christianity, which is the dominant Cypriot religious denomination. (Lynn Galvin)

Protestantism was introduced to Cyprus after the British took control. The Anglicans now constitute a diocese in the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. The Reformed Presbyterian Church initiated work in 1887, but the Greek Evangelical Church has been the most successful Protestant group.

In the 20th century, the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Seventh-day Adventist Church began missions, part of a spectrum of American-based Free churches, such as the Church of God of Prophecy and the Christian Brethren (Open Brethren). Noteworthy among them were the Armenian refugees who came to Cyprus to escape the Turkish massacre of Armenians in 1914– 1915. They founded a branch of the Union of the Armenian Evangelical Church in the Near East.

The Muslim community of Cyprus is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the Hanafite School, the same school that dominates Turkey. Also as in Turkey, there are numerous Sufi brotherhoods, including the Mevlevi (whirling Dervishes), Fufai (howling Dervishes), Bektashis, and Ticani.

There are a small community of the Baha'i Faith on Cyprus and an equally small Jewish community. At one time a large Jewish community existed on Cyprus, but in 117 CE it revolted against Roman authority and was ruthlessly suppressed. There was a revival of the Jewish culture in the 12th century, which ended during the years of Venetian rule. As the Muslim rule began, only 25 families were left. During the 19th century,

Cyprus

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	460,000	630,000	91.8	1.41	737,000	856,000
Orthodox	441,000	583,000	84.9	1.45	681,000	790,000
Roman Catholics	6,400	12,500	1.8	0.36	15,000	20,000
Protestants	3,100	5,000	0.7	2.01	6,500	8,500
Agnostics	8,000	31,000	4.5	2.29	38,000	46,000
Sikhs	0	7,800	1.1	1.45	9,200	10,000
Atheists	2,000	6,400	0.9	1.45	7,800	9,500
Buddhists	0	5,200	0.8	1.45	6,700	7,200
Muslims	500	2,900	0.4	1.45	3,400	4,500
Hindus	0	1,700	0.2	1.45	2,500	2,400
Baha'is	200	1,000	0.1	1.47	1,500	3,000
Jews	30	180	0.0	1.44	250	300
Total population	471,000	686,000	100.0	1.45	806,000	939,000

NORTH CYPRUS

North Cyprus

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	133,000	192,000	98.0	0.55	207,000	238,000
Christians	10,200	3,100	1.6	0.55	3,400	4,000
Orthodox	10,000	1,300	0.7	-1.37	1,400	1,500
Independents	210	1,400	0.7	2.81	1,500	2,000
Agnostics	1,000	700	0.4	0.54	1,100	1,700
Atheists	0	70	0.0	0.30	100	200
Total population	144,000	196,000	100.0	0.55	212,000	244,000

Cyprus was targeted for the settlement of Jewish agricultural colonies, largely unsuccessful. Today there are some 50 Jewish families on Cyprus.

The newer religions have discovered Cyprus. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints organized work within the English-speaking community in Nicosia in 1962 and remains primarily a church of expatriates. The two congregations are attached to the Greece

Athens Mission. Among the other new religions are Subud. Among the more unique religious groups are the Linobambakoi, a group of Orthodox believers who concealed their true faith through the centuries of Muslim rule by taking Muslim names and visibly participating in keeping Islamic festivals (somewhat like the Marranos, the Christianized Jews of medieval Spain).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Bektashi Order (Bektashiye); Christian Brethren; Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Free Churches; Greek Evangelical Church; Hanafite School of Islam; Jehovah's Witnesses; Mevlevi Sufi Order; Orthodox Church of Cyprus; Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Subud; Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East.

References

- Bryant, Rebecca. Imagining the Modern: The Cultures of Nationalism in Cyprus. London: I. B. Taurus, 2004.
- Englezakis, B. Studies on the History of the Church of Cyprus, 4th–20th Centuries. Ed. by S. Ioannou and M. Ioannou. Aldershot, UK: Variorum, 1995.
- Hackett, J. A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus. New York: Burt Franklin, 1972.
- Mallison, William: Cyprus: A Modern History. London: I. B. Taurus, 2008.

■ Czech Republic

The dominant religion in the Czech Republic is Christianity, especially Catholicism. The beginnings of Christianization of Slavic tribes in the region can be traced back to the ninth century, when Moravian and Bohemian duces (Latin: leaders, or dukes) accepted baptism. Geopolitically, the region, which had formed into what is called the Great Moravian State, was located at the intersection of two powerful forces, the Frankish Empire and the Byzantine Empire. Although the first missions (the so-called Irish-Scottish and Bavarian missions) came from the Frankish Empire, in 863 the great Moravian duke Rostislav invited two Byzantine Christian missionaries, Cyril (d. 869) and Methodius (d. 885), in an effort to strengthen the influence of Byzantium. They stressed the right of Slavic people to their own liturgical language (Old Slavonic) and culture. In 869, an independent diocese was founded, for the region of Pannonia and Moravia, and Methodius was appointed as its bishop. After his death, however, his disciples and the Slavonic priests were exiled into Bulgaria with the consent of Pope Stephen VI. As a result, the promotion of Latin liturgy followed, and under the rule of Wenceslas I (ca. 907–929), the Czech kingdom was increasingly oriented toward the Roman Catholic Church. The Holy Roman emperor, Charles IV, who was pronounced the king of Bohemia in 1346, played a prominent role in further developments. He founded an archdiocese in Prague (1344) and the first university in Central Europe (1348).

Gothic facade of Tyn Church as viewed from the Old Town Square in the Stare Mesto neighborhood in Prague, Czech Republic. The Roman Catholic Church is a major Christian denomination in the Czech Republic. (Rfoxphoto/Dreamstime.com)

A short time afterward, Charles IV's (1316–1378) daughter, Anne (1366–1394), married the English king Richard II, which, among other things, brought the doctrines of John Wycliffe (ca. 1330–1384), forerunner of the Protestant Reformation, into Bohemia.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Czech Republic

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	7,929,000	5,824,000	57.2	-0.32	6,158,000	6,073,000
Roman Catholics	5,743,000	3,317,000	32.6	-1.77	3,397,000	3,272,000
Protestants	428,000	260,000	2.6	-0.72	400,000	500,000
Independents	560,000	250,000	2.5	-0.46	350,000	450,000
Agnostics	1,043,000	3,823,000	37.6	0.35	3,270,000	2,320,000
Atheists	820,000	510,000	5.0	-0.06	460,000	400,000
Jews	8,000	7,100	0.1	-0.06	7,000	7,000
Buddhists	0	6,000	0.1	-0.06	7,000	10,000
New religionists	0	2,600	0.0	-0.05	4,000	7,000
Muslims	200	1,400	0.0	-0.06	2,000	4,000
Baha'is	400	1,000	0.0	-0.04	2,000	4,200
Total population	9,801,000	10,175,000	100.0	-0.06	9,910,000	8,825,000

Influenced by his teachings, Jan (John) Hus (1372/1373–1415) started his critique of the Catholic Church. Although Hus was burned to death as a heretic after the Council of Constance, his teachings inspired a mass reform movement (the Hussite movement) in the 15th century. Formal attempts to suppress the movement began in 1420 on the heels of the promulgation of two anti-Hus declarations (bulls) in 1418.

In spite of the Catholic reaction, the Czech Reformation continued. In 1457, a small group of Christians founded a village on the principles of early Christianity, which started the tradition of Unitas Fratrum (from Latin for the unity of brethren; later also known as the Moravian Brethren). Among its most significant representatives was its bishop, Jan Amos Komenský (1592–1670) (usually referred to as Comenius, his Latin name), known also for his works on education. Along with many other Protestants, Comenius was forced into exile in 1628, in a period of increasing strength for the Counter-Reformation. During the following years of rule by the German Hapsburgs, who championed Catholicism, Protestants were persecuted severely. This situation ended only with the Edict of Toleration issued by Joseph II in 1781, which introduced civil and religious equality.

Meanwhile, the Lutheran Protestant tradition, in part inspired by the teachings of Jan Hus, had also come to the Czech countries. The Toleration Edict, however, legalized only two confessions of faith from all Protestant denominations: the Lutheran Augsburg Confession and the Calvinist Helvetic Confession. An actual equality of Protestants with Catholics was reached only after 1848.

These historical events had an influence on the present situation. The most significant religion tradition is Roman Catholicism, but an important role is also played by the Protestant tradition, which had been connected with nationalist efforts to counter the German Catholic influence. The break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918 was then favorable to the Protestants. After the foundation of an independent Czechoslovak Republic, two new churches were established: the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren in 1918, and the Czechoslovak Church (today, the Czechoslovak Hussite Church) in 1920, churches that evolved into the biggest Protestant churches.

The period of the Communist regime following World War II, in which religious life was deliberately and often violently suppressed, also had a strong impact on the present situation, which is marked by the prevalence of agnosticism. The census data from the years 1921, 1930, 1950, and 1991 serve to illustrate the decline of church membership. Although in 1921, 92.8 percent of the population declared themselves as belonging to a religious denomination, by the year 1991 this number dropped to a mere 43.9 percent and by the year 2001 to 32.2 percent. A similar decrease in membership can be documented within the individual churches: The Roman Catholic Church went from 82 percent (1921) to 78.9 percent (1930) to 76.4 percent (1950) to 39 percent (1991) to 26.8 percent (2001); the Czechoslovak Hussite Church, from 5.2 percent (1921) to 7.3 percent (1930) to 10.6 percent (1950) to 1.7 percent (1991) to 1 percent (2001); the Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, from 4 percent (1921) to 4.7 percent (1930), to 4.5 percent (1950) to 2 percent (1991) to 1.2 percent (2001).

After the fall of the Communist regime in 1989, the Czech Republic witnessed the alleviation of obstacles to free religious life. Under the new conditions, a large number of religions appeared. The state regulates their activities by means of several fundamental pieces of legislation: the Charter of Human Rights (Articles 15 and 16); Act No. 308/1991, concerning the freedom of religious belief and the status of churches and religious societies; and the Act of Czech National Council No. 161/1992, concerning the registration of churches and religious societies. According to this legislation, churches and religious societies registered by the state can, among other things, teach and educate the clergy and laypeople in their own schools and other institutions, as well as in tertiary theological schools and faculties. They also have the right to establish and run health and social-care facilities, or participate in providing services in such institutions established by the state. Entitled persons doing priestly work can further be admitted into public health and social-care facilities, children's homes, army barracks, places of imprisonment, detention, legally imposed therapy, and the like.

The above-mentioned rights are granted only to those societies that are acknowledged by the state as churches or religious communities. To achieve this status, a given religious society must prove that it has collected at least 10,000 signatures of allegiance by adult citizens permanently living in the Czech Republic. If a society is a member of the World Council of Churches, it is sufficient for it to submit 500 signatures of adult citizens with permanent residence in the Czech Republic. At the beginning of the 21st century, 21 churches and religious societies were registered. However, 19 of them were already declared to be registered in the appendix of the Act of 1991, on the basis that they had been operating earlier with state consent.

Among the churches and religious societies acknowledged by the state are the following: Roman Catholic Church, Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, Czechoslovak Hussite Church, Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, Orthodox Church in the Czech Lands, Religious Society of Jehovah's Witnesses, Seventh-day Adventist Church, Greek Catholic Church, Christian Corps, Methodist Evangelical Church, Brotherhood Union, Apostolic Church (UK), Federation of Jewish Communities in the Czech Republic, New-Apostolic Church, Religious Society of Czech Unitarians, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Lutheran Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Czech Republic, Old Catholic Church in the Czech Republic. The Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren, the Czechoslovak Hussite Church, the Orthodox Church in the Czech Lands, and the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Czech Republic are members of the World Council of Churches.

In 2002 a new act came into effect, under which the petition for registration can be filed by at least 3 persons, who at the same time attach signatures of 300 Czech citizens or foreigners with residence in the Czech Republic, who acknowledge affiliation to the new church. Such registration has been obtained by the Christian Fellowship Church, Christian Community in the Czech Republic, International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Czech Hindu Religious Society, Diamond Way Buddhism of the Karma Kagyu Tradition, Church of the Living God, Vishwa Nirmala Dharma, and the Center of Muslim Communities. In case the newly established church exists without any problems for 10 years and the number of its members reaches approximately 10,000 members, the church is granted the same rights as pertain to churches registered under the earlier act.

Dusan Lužný

See also: Agnosticism; Apostolic Church; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Czechoslovak Hussite Church; Diamond Way Buddhism; Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren; Greek Catholic Church; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; New Apostolic Church; Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession; World Council of Churches.

References

- Agnew, Hugh Lacaine. The Czechs and the Lands of the Bohemian Crown. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 2004.
- Burton, Richard D. E. Prague: A Cultural and Literary History. Northampton, MA: Interlink Books, 2003.
- Cornej, Peter, and Jiri Pokorny. Brief History of the Czech Lands to 2004. Prague: Prah, 2003.
- Di Domizion, Daniel G. Religion in Secularized Culture: The Czech Experience. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 2004.
- Kieval, Hillel J. Languages of Community: The Jewish Experience in the Czech Lands. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
- Michel, Patrick, and Alan Bradley. Politics and Religion in Eastern Europe: Catholicism in Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia. New York: Polity Press, 1992.

Czechoslovak Hussite Church

The Czechoslovak Hussite Church was formed in 1920 by some former Roman Catholic priests who drew upon the tradition of Czech church Reformer Jan (John) Hus (ca. 1373–1415). Their action in setting up an independent ecclesiastical body was made possible by the collapse of the Hapsburg Empire and the end of its rule over what are now the separate countries of the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The church saw itself as a progressive Catholic body, whose establishment followed the pope's rejection of a set of proposals for reform. Among the proposals was one for the Mass in the vernacular rather than Latin. The Hussite Mass was used, which included serving of both bread and wine to all communicants at the Lord's Supper.

The new reformed church continues to have an episcopal polity. One of the bishops is designated as the patriarch. A scholar, Karel Farsky, was elected as the church's first patriarch. Parishes are grouped into dioceses, each led by a bishop and diocesan council. The highest legislative body is the general synod, which meets every 10 years.

The church has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1963. In 2005 it reported 102,000 members and 3037 congregations. The church supports the Czechoslovak Theological Faculty in Prague. It introduced the ordination of women in 1947.

Czechoslovak Hussite Church, Central Council
Wuchterlova 5
PO Box 255
16 626 Praha 6—Dejvice
Czech Republic
www.ccsch.cz (in Czech)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Hnik, Frank M., Frank Kovar, and Alois Spisar. The Czechoslovak Church. Prague: The Central Council of the Czechoslovak Church, 1931.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

D

DahnHak

DahnHak, a movement that originated in Korea, is based upon the ancient Eastern practice of qigong. Although related to ancient traditions, the modern DahnHak movement was founded by Seung-Han Lee (b. 1950), who opened the first center in Seoul, Korea, in 1985. Following an enlightenment experience at Mo Ak mountain in Korea, he took the spiritual name Ilchi (literally, “a finger pointing to the truth”), by which he is now known. Lee had engaged in a process of spiritual seeking and development that led him to explore older approaches to spirituality. He modernized what he had discovered to create DahnHak. The movement has subsequently spread to both North and South America.

The practice of DahnHak centers upon the appropriation and use of ki (also known as chi), the life force, a common element in various Eastern meditation systems, exercise formats, and martial arts. DahnHak defines ki as the cosmic energy that circulates throughout the universe, the energy that is the true essence of every living entity. DahnHak practice follows a five-step program in which qigong exercises are introduced successively in order to introduce the individual to ki energy, to allow the accumulation of ki in the body’s lower energy center (the Dahn-Jon), and to permit the awakening and development of the Middle Dahn-Jon. The result of basic practice is supposed to be a state of habitual joy and peace. At a more advanced stage, the body energy meridians (the same energy paths identified in acupuncture systems) are opened, so that the body is fully aligned to the energy flow of the universe. The goal of DahnHak practice is human perfection, a state in which the illusion of the ego is released and one is identified with the True Self, at which point there is a mystic realization of one’s unity with all that exists.

Lee moved to the United States in 1994 and in 1997 established the Sedona Dahn Institute, still located in Sedona, Arizona, but since 2000 known as the Healing Society in Action, which has become the center of the movement in the West. There are currently (2009) more than 360 DahnHak centers worldwide, operating in Korea, Japan, the United States, Canada, Brazil, and the United Kingdom. The many centers are headed by DahnHak master teachers trained by Lee.

Also in 2000, Lee and Neale Donald Walsch, who channeled the popular New Age Conversations with God series, established the New Millennium Peace Foundation, dedicated to building a lasting world peace by raising human awareness. The following year, Lee hosted the First Humanity Conference in Seoul, Korea, dedicated to discussions of the concrete influence that spirituality might have in the contemporary world, given its political, economic, and cultural environment. Lee is also the president of World Earth Human Alliance for Peace and the Korea Institute of Brain Science. Early in the new century, he founded the International Graduate University for Peace, a Korean institute to study plans for peace and train leaders to implement those plans.

Healing Society in Action
2450 W. Broadway #108
Sedona, AZ 85202
<http://www.healingsociety.com>

Dahn Center Association
PO Box 41419
Mesa, AZ 85274-1419

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Qigong; Yoga.

References

- Lee, Seung-Heun. DahnHak: The Way to Perfect Health. Seoul, Korea: Dahn Publications, 1999.
- Lee, Seung-Heun. Healing Society: A Prescription for Global Enlightenment. Charlottesville, VA: Hampton Roads Publishing, 2000.
- Lee, Seung-Heun. Peaceology for Healing Society. Sedona, AZ: Healing Society, 2003.

Dalai Lama III, Sonam Gyatso

1543–1588

The title Dalai Lama (teacher of the ocean of wisdom) was initially given to Sonam Gyatso in the 16th century by the ruler of Mongolia. With it, Gelug Tibetan Buddhism emerged as the most influential community of Buddhism in the country, and Sonam Gyatso, formerly the head of the Gelug School and abbot of its leading monastery, took the first step to assuming political leadership over Tibet.

Sonam Gyatso was born in Khangsar, a community not far from Lhasa, Tibet's capital. A few years after his birth, the leadership at Drepung Monastery identified him as the reincarnation and successor of Gedun Gyatso (1475–1542), the former head of the Gelug School of Buddhism and abbot of Drepung Monastery. They took charge of the child and raised him at the Drepung and Chhokhorgyal monasteries. He proved an apt student and became famous throughout Tibet and in neighboring countries for his scholarship and leadership. As he reached adulthood, he took the opportunity to travel and expand his own reformed Buddhist community by founding the Champaling Monastery (in eastern Tibet), Kumbum Champaling (a monastery in northern Tibet), and Sandal Khang, the Sandalwood Temple, also in northern Tibet.

Then in 1578 Altyn Khan (1507–1582), in the last stages of uniting the Mongol tribes and rebuilding a Mongolian empire, invited Sonam Gyatso to visit eastern Mongolia. The new Mongolian ruler envisioned Vajrayana Buddhism as a further means of binding the Mongol tribes together. Sonam Gyatso proved a capable missionary and his success at introducing the Mongols to Buddhism met with Altyn Khan's approval. As he prepared to return to Drepung, he announced that Altyn Khan was the reincarnation of Kubla Khan and the embodiment of Maitreya, the bodhisattva of wisdom. This announcement was intended to further solidify and unite Khan's political and religious status.

Altyn Khan returned Sonam Gyatso's action in kind. He bestowed on him the title Dalai Lama. Gyatso and his successors would be seen as an incarnation of Avalokitesvara (aka Guan Yin), the bodhisattva of compassion. Upon his return to Tibet, Sonam Gyatso moved to honor the lineage of high lamas to which he belonged. He granted his title to his predecessor abbots Gendun Drub (1391–1474) and Gedun Gyatso (1475–1542). Thus, posthumously they came to be recognized as the first and second Dalai Lama, respectively.

As Buddhism spread in Mongolia, the people built their first Buddhist monastery in 1586. It occasioned a return visit by Sonam Gyatso. Unfortunately, it would be his last, as he died on his way back to Tibet. His colleagues cremated his body and brought his ashes to Drepung Monastery, which remained the center of the Gelug School until the 1950s.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Gelugpa.

References

- Brauen, Martin. Dalai Lamas: A Visual History. Chicago: Serindia Publications, 2005.
- Mullin, Glen H., trans. and ed. Selected Works of the Dalai Lama III: Essence of Refined Gold. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1985.
- Ya Hanzhang. The Biographies of the Dalai Lamas. Beijing: Foreign Language Press, 1991.

Damanhur

Damanhur is an esoteric New Age community founded in 1976 in the Valchiusella valley, some 30 miles north of Turin, Italy, by Oberto Airaudi (b. 1950). According to Airaudi, Damanhur is neither a religion nor a movement, but rather a social experiment and a community. In fact, Damanhur has its own constitution, its own government, and even a currency, known as "credit" (largely symbolic). There is little doubt, however, that

In this Damanhur meditation room, a secret trap door turns into a stairway leading to another chamber below. The woman ascending the stairs is a Damanhur teacher of sacred dance. The blue sphere links this meditation chamber to the Synchronic Lines. (Floris Leeuwenberg/The Cover Story/Corbis)

Damanhur's "citizens" live together on the basis of a peculiar religious philosophy and worldview. From the original 20 members, Damanhur has expanded to become the largest esoteric New Age communal group in the world, with some 600 members living in several communities all located in the same valley, and another 400 in communal houses nearby. Another satellite community has been founded in Berlin, Germany, and there are groups of sympathizers sharing the same worldview spread throughout Europe, the United States, Japan, and Australia. There are four levels of membership (indicated by the letters A, B, C, and D), the letters A and B indicating those living communally in Damanhur.

The central community in Piedmont is located in a series of highly symbolic buildings, including a large open-door temple. The existence of the most important facility, the construction of which was started in 1978, became known to the outside world only in 1992, following the revelations of a disgruntled ex-member. It is the Tempio dell'Uomo (Temple of Humankind), a huge subterranean temple comprising a fantastic collection of richly decorated rooms and galleries. Although Italian authorities originally regarded it as having been built in breach of zoning regulations, Damanhur managed to either win or settle all the ensuing court cases, and is now legally allowed to both operate and expand its underground temple. For Damanhur's citizens, the temple is much more than a means of expressing their artistic creativity; it is a "mystical pole," at which ritual work takes place for the benefit of the whole of humanity. A number of different rituals express a worldview based on the sanctity of nature, karma, reincarnation, and the tradition of Western Esotericism in general.

Damanhur runs its own kindergarten, primary, and intermediate schools, which have succeeded in developing friendly relations with local school authorities.

Relationships with neighbors in the Valchiusella valley have been more difficult. As has happened historically in the case of similar large communal settlements, some local residents initially welcomed Damanhur in the hope of reviving a struggling local economy. Damanhur has, in fact, become very much of a tourist attraction, receiving more than 50,000 visitors in the year 2008. Other local residents, however, fear that Damanhur's citizens will quickly become the majority of the valley's voters, thus eventually controlling the city councils in several local small towns. The town closest to Damanhur, Vidracco, for instance, elected in 1999 a citizen of Damanhur as its mayor. There is also some Roman Catholic opposition to a religious system perceived by Catholic counter-cultists as magical and neo-Pagan, as also to the fact that Damanhur celebrates "temporary weddings," which are supposed to last one or two years (although they can be renewed an unlimited number of times, and several Damanhurian couples have actually remained together for decades).

Damanhur

Via Pramanzo 3

180 Baldissero Canavese (Turin)

Italy

<http://www.damanhur.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Communalism; Reincarnation; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

Berzano, Pier Luigi. Damanhur. Popolo e comunità.

Leumann, Italy: ElleDiCi, 1998.

Cardano, Mario. Lo specchio, la rosa e il loto. Uno studio sulla sacralizzazione della natura. Rome: SEAM, 1997.

Introvigne, Massimo. "Children of the Underground Temple: Growing Up in Damanhur." In Children in New Religions, edited by Susan J. Palmer and Charlotte Hardman. New Brunswick, NJ, and London: Rutgers University Press, 1999.

Introvigne, Massimo. "Damanhur: A Magical Community in Italy." In New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response, edited by Bryan Wilson and Jamie Cresswell. London and New York: Routledge, 1999.

Merrifield, Jeff. Damanhur: The Real Dream. London: Thorsons, 1998.

La Via Horusiana. Principi, concetti e tradizioni della Scuola di Pensiero di Damanhur secondo gli insegnamenti di Oberto Airaudi. Baldissero Canavese, Italy: Damanhur, 1999.

Damascus

Damascus, the capital of the Arab Republic of Syria, is an oasis-like city situated in the midst of a largely barren land. It sits on a plateau at the foot of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains. Watered by the Abana and Pharpar rivers, it is a highly fertile area known for its orchards and plush gardens, standing in sharp contrast to the surrounding mountains and the vast desert to the east. Arab writers likened it to an earthly paradise.

It has been inhabited since prehistory and at times was incorporated into ancient Israel's land following its conquest by David (1 Chronicles 18:6); later Jeroboam II (2 Kings 14:28) was said to have recovered Damascus, "which belonged to Israel." Christians know of the city from the encounter between the Apostle Paul and the risen Jesus that occurred on the "road to Damascus" (Acts 9). Today it is a Muslim city, having become the seat of the Umayyad dynasty in the seventh century and later being abandoned, devastated by the Mongols, revived, and finally becoming a regional center within the Ottoman Empire.

Archaeological finds show signs of habitation of the land in and around Damascus for some 6,000 years, and the city shares claims with the city of Benares in India as the oldest city in the world. It arises out of prehistory when it was added to the conquests of the Egyptian pharaoh Thutmose III in the 15th century BCE. Five hundred years later, when its leaders came to support the king of Zobah, the Israelite King David (ca. 1037–970 BCE), defeated both and occupied the city. Jerusalem and Syria would be at odds through the next centuries. Damascus was later incorporated into Alexander the Great's kingdom and remained under his successors until 64 BCE, when the Romans took over. Christianity found early converts there. The Jewish leader Saul was on his way to the city ca. 35 CE to help suppress the movement when he had a visionary experience that led to his conversion to the new religion. Blinded in the encounter, he was taken to Damascus, where he encountered Ananias, who laid his hands on him and healed him. Paul later preached his first Christian sermon in the city. He also became the target of his former colleagues and had to escape over the famous walls of the city in a basket.

Women walk along the grounds of the Grand Mosque of Damascus, Syria. The historic mosque is one of the oldest and largest in the world. (Shutterstock)

From being a part of the Roman Empire, the city would evolve into a city of the Byzantine Empire. It remained Byzantine territory until the Muslim conquest in 635 CE. The Muslim Umayyad Caliphate (662–750) ruled from Damascus and turned it into an even more important cultural and economic center of the region. The Umayyads also built the mosque located in the center of the old city. It has become one of the largest mosques in the world, built on a site that had previously housed in succession different Pagan temples and a Christian church. When in 750 the Abbasids replaced Umayyad rule, they moved the Muslim capital to Baghdad and Damascus became a provincial town subject to the various successive Islamic dynasties. Then in the 12th century the Zenkid Turkish prince, Nur al-Din (1118–1174), and his successor Saladin (r. 1174–1193), revived Damascus as the center of political power. These two successful rulers also promoted their city as a center of literature and religious learning. The revived importance of Damascus came to a quick and somewhat unexpected end in 1260 when the city was devastated by the Mongol army that swept through the Middle East, destroying both social and physical structures.

The city would recover soon after the Mongols left, but it would not return to its old glories. In the 16th century, Damascus would be incorporated into the emerging Turkish Ottoman Empire. It would now have centuries of relative peace and could mature as a regional city of importance along key trade routes and especially as a staging point for the annual pilgrimage to Mecca.

Even before World War I was over, the fate of the Ottoman Empire appeared to be already sealed. In 1918 the British occupied Syria, relinquished to the French in 1920. The French mandate colony lasted through World War II and the establishment of an independent Syrian nation in 1946. Damascus was named the capital of the new nation.

Damascus has become a sprawling modern metropolis with more than a million and a half residents. The much smaller older city is defined by the walls that once protected it and the seven gates that restricted entrance and exit. The Grand Mosque built by the Umayyads sits within the old city. There are cathedral churches for both the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East and the Roman Catholics.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Grand Mosque, Damascus; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Paul; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Bahnassi, Afif. Damascus: The Capital of the Umayyad Dynasty. Damascus: Dar Tlass, 2002.

Burns, Ross. Damascus: A History. London: Routledge, 2007.

DeGeorge, Gerard. Damascus. Paris: Flammarion, 2005.

Keenan, Brigid, and Tom Beddow. Damascus: Hidden Treasures of the Old City. London: Thames & Hudson, 2001.

Simarski, Lynn Theo. "Visions of Damascus." Saudi Aramco World 42, no. 2 (March–April 1991): 20–29.

◆ Daoism

Daoism (or Taoism, as many in the West still call it) is the least understood of all the world's religions, and a considerable amount of misinformation about it exists in the mass culture. To most Westerners (and some Chinese), Daoism suggests an ancient philosophy of spontaneity and naturalness that emphasizes playfulness and going with the flow. That is not an accurate description of Daoism. At the same time, there is much disagreement about what an accurate description of the essence of Daoism would be. Although the basic historical contours, major figures, beliefs, rituals, and so on are not contested, fundamental issues remain a matter of scholarly debate. For example, is Daoism the deep undercurrent of Chinese culture, or is it a rare jewel? Did it come from the people or from an elite minority? Has it been a countercultural, revolutionary force, has it aided the political status quo, or is it inherently apolitical? Did Daoism influence popular religion, or did popular religion influence Daoism? These questions raise issues of interpretation and emphasis, of course, and cannot (and should not) be answered definitively. They indicate a continuing quest for deeper understanding in Daoist studies, and reflections upon them will be included in the presentation below.

Daoism (Chinese: dao-jiao) is the indigenous religion of China. A tradition with many subtraditions, Daoism comprises many sects and schools united by a similar cosmology and a shared goal of union with the Dao, which takes the form of a quest for either physical immortality or mystic transcendence, or both. The belief in immortality and transcendence predates Daoism and is found in every aspect of Chinese culture from medical theory to popular literature. But Daoist texts are most explicit not only in defining transcendence but in providing methods of attaining it. Daoism has embraced many diverse practices and ideas, including a wide variety of medical, gymnastic, and alchemical recipes.

Daoist doctrine owes much to Han cosmology and divination, which is based on the idea of the correspondence of all forces under heaven (in many ways similar to the Western metaphysical tradition of seeing a correspondence between the microcosm, the "small world" of the individual human being, and the macrocosm, the universe as a whole). The single most important term in the Daoist (and Chinese) worldview is qi (variously translated as energy, breath, pneuma), which has both physical and spiritual aspects. The first known usage of the word qi is in the Neiye, a manual of self-cultivation that predates Laozi (also known as Lao Tzu; usually dated to the sixth century BCE), the fabled founder of Daoism.

Zhang Daoling's vision of a deified Laozi in 142 CE in Sichuan Province is traditionally thought of as the founding event of religious Daoism. (Indeed, one Sinologist's famous definition of Daoism begins with a recognition of Zhang Daoling and excludes Laozi). Daoists began to identify themselves as Daoists and became self-conscious bearers of a tradition in the fifth century CE, and they continue to define themselves that way all over the Chinese world.

Hallmarks of Daoism, then and now, include divination through astro-geomantic principles, longevity techniques, rituals performed by clergy on behalf of the community, and a rich pantheon of divinities. The definition of the Daoist community remains one of the difficult questions. Daoism is not a membership religion. On one hand, clergy are easily identifiable; they wear long hair with a topknot and traditional robes. Their congregation, if one exists, might be a village or neighborhood. In the West, and more and more in China, people with an interest in Daoist philosophy or physical practices may call themselves Daoist.

The sacred books of Daoism are not the ones Westerners are most likely to know, the Daodejing (also known as the Tao Te Ching), supposedly written by the mythical Laozi, and the Zhuangzi (also known as the Chuang Tzu), supposedly written by Zhuangzi, the chief speaker in the book, a philosopher of the fourth century CE. Rather they are the appendixes to the Daozang (Daoist canon), which includes 1,120 titles in 5,305 volumes (making it one of the largest sacred canons in the world). Those texts include philosophy, scriptures, biographies (hagiographies), and ritual texts. Starting in the Tang dynasty (618–906 CE), emperors commissioned this evolving library of Daoist works. The latest extant edition was completed in 1445 and until recently had been preserved in only a few monasteries. It was little known to Western or Asian scholars until the 1930s. Complete editions now exist in libraries in China, Japan, and France.

Traditional Daoist temple in Malaysia. Daoism emerged at the same time as Confucianism during the Zhou dynasty. (Tdmartin/Dreamstime.com)

Most textbooks and reference works begin their entry on Daoism by noting the distinction between religious and philosophical Daoism. This is an artificial division used in China today, based on words that have existed in Chinese (daojiao and daoja) only since the late 19th century. Most scholars have discarded this distinction.

The idea of religious Daoism as superstition derives from the Confucian literati who served as Native informants for Protestant missionaries in China, missionaries who in turn became the first interpreters of Chinese religion to the West. They elaborated on the colorful rituals performed by Daoist priests and were surely reminded of Catholicism. Their informants believed that contemporary Daoism was backwards and a degeneration of pure philosophical Daoism, which was represented by two compilations of ancient provenance mentioned above, the Daodejing and the Zhuangzi. (In fact, these books, enormously influential though they are, are not strictly Daoist at all, but only considered such insofar as Daoism is a retrospective bibliographic category.) For most of the 20th century then, these two books became the only accepted sources of Daoism among scholars, and indeed in society at large.

In the early 20th century, Chinese intellectuals saw religious Daoism as superstitious and regressive.

Communists later adopted this idea, with devastating results for religious Daoism in Mainland China. This article (along with related ones in this encyclopedia) emphasizes Daoism as a living religion over Daoism as an abstract philosophy. Still, some basic philosophical terms will be explained.

Dao literally means “way” or “path.” It is a road to follow, or a method, or a principle. By the Zhou dynasty (ca. 1050–256 BCE), Dao had the connotation of “correct or natural way of doing something” (as in today’s popular Daoist texts). The Confucians and other philosophical schools used it to mean guide, teaching, doctrine, or moral truth. Only later did Dao come to mean the way the whole universe operates, or nature. In its cosmological definition, the Dao exists before the creation of the world, and is the origin of all transformation. The Dao, too, has come to be seen as an object to be worshipped: the ultimate reality behind or a part of everything. Thus deities and elements are but various manifestations of the Dao.

History of Daoism Although there are some earlier texts now coming to light, the Daodejing (literally translated as Tao Virtue Classic) remains the most written about of Chinese classics, with 750 commentaries and counting. It has been read as a self-cultivation manual, a metaphysical treatise, a handbook of political rulership, an agrarian polemic, a chapbook of aphorisms, and a journal of quietist philosophy. Due perhaps to its brevity and lack of proper names, it has become the second most translated text in the world, after the Bible, and is considered a classic of world literature.

Laozi (literally The Old Master, or The Old Guy) reputedly wrote the Daodejing in the sixth century BCE. For reasons mentioned above, for a long time the Daodejing was considered the sacred book of Daoism, and Laozi its founder. The legends of Laozi include elements found in founders’ hagiographies from around the world, including a virgin birth and astrological signs. With Laozi, however, unlike Jesus or Buddha, there is no evidence for his existence at all.

Many scholars think the Daodejing is a compilation of axioms in no particular order, a composite work by many authors over many years. But its consistent philosophical position and penetrating insight have made it the foremost Daoist scripture. Paradox is its hallmark: Humans are limited yet limitless; we can know through not knowing, act by not acting, achieve by letting go (indeed, one of the key terms is wuwei, which means nonaction).

Recent scholarship has shown that the Daodejing was used for the last two millennia as a sacred text, not just a philosophical one. It was considered revealed scripture, and chanted and memorized. Beginning in the Han dynasty, Laozi was deified, as Laojun (Lord Lao), a sovereign god who in one incarnation came down from heaven to instruct sovereigns and reveal sacred scriptures. Laojun was seen as an emanation of pure Dao, and worshipped along with three other manifestations, as the “Three Pure Ones.”

The second text of “Classical Daoism” is the Zhuangzi (the Chuang Tzu), as prolix as the Daodejing is terse, bursting with legends, jokes, and satire. As a literary text, its influence has been unequalled. Its vocabulary impacted Daoist imagery and alchemy, but in general, it has been much less important than Laozi to religious Daoism. Its hallmark is a skepticism directed toward religion, language, logic, reality itself. In the work, Zhuangzi mentions meditative and gymnastic techniques, which has inspired people to practice these techniques under his name. But the author of the Zhuangzi may have made the references ironically and as a way of making light of those who wished to prolong the physical body.

In the last two centuries BCE, Huanglao Daoism became a political movement, named for the culture hero Huangdi (the Yellow Emperor) and Laozi. It competed with the Confucians for imperial sponsorship during the Han dynasty.

Two important early popular movements show how Daoism has long been associated with political uprisings. The Yellow Turbans, also known as the Taiping (Great Peace), was a messianic movement that rose up in what is now Shandong Province. It was crushed by the government. The Celestial (or Heavenly) Masters (Tianshi) in what is now Sichuan, begun by Zhang Daoling, ran, for several decades, an independent theocratic state. Zhang divided his territory into 24 districts, in imitation of Han dynasty bureaucracy. All member families had to contribute five bushels of rice (hence its nickname Wudoumi, or “Five Pecks of Rice” Daoism) for which they were provided spiritual and military protection and healing. These were the first regular communities of Daoists. Tianshi Daoism included conventionally moral precepts, not too different from Confucianism, thereby reinterpreting the amorality of Laozi and Zhuangzi.

After being forced to settle in other parts of the country, the Celestial Masters gave rise to other medieval Daoist sects. The Celestial Masters are considered to have had great influence until the 10th century, and even today Orthodox Daoists claim direct descent.

Early Daoist groups were millenarian. They shared much in common with Western religions for which the word “millenarian” was coined, namely a revealed truth, an imminent eschatology, a cosmological dualism, and the prediction of cataclysm in which only members of the group will survive. Indeed, such tendencies are prominent throughout Chinese history and are observable today in such religious groups as Tian Dao and Falun Gong. This image of Chinese religion runs counter to the gentler picture usually painted in introductory textbooks and reference works.

Around the same time, Ge Hong (288–343 CE) wrote the first systematic treatise on alchemy as a means of seeking immortality. This book, called Baopuzi (The Master Who Embraces Simplicity), was for many years considered in Western scholarship to be the epitome of religious Daoism. In fact, the southerner Ge Hong was more of a freethinking Confucian interested in reenacting the cosmic processes in the laboratory. Although interested in many aspects of Daoism, he was not known to be affiliated with any organized movement.

Two famous medieval Daoist traditions are Shangqing and Lingbao, both dating from the second half of the fourth century CE. Shangqing began as a series of revelations to the medium Yang Xi (330–386). It is sometimes inaccurately called “Maoshan” Daoism, because Mount Mao (Shan means “mountain” in Chinese), southeast of present-day Nanjing, was one of its main centers.

As studied and translated by Isabelle Robinet and others, these revelations had a high literary quality, engaging in poetic flights of fancy. (The existence of such texts makes Shangqing Daoism different from that of the Celestial Masters, also from contemporary Chinese Buddhism.) Shangqing developed the idea of physical immortality into spiritual salvation. Its texts describing visualization practice of a colorful Daoist pantheon and ecstatic journeys throughout the universe remain an important part of the Daoist canon.

Lingbao (Numinous Treasure) is the other major school of early medieval Daoism. It borrowed heavily from Mahayana Buddhism, which by that time had made great inroads in China. Ideas included universal salvation and the liberation of one’s ancestors from the hardships of transmigration. Its precepts were clearly inspired by Buddhist precepts. Lingbao was absorbed into the Shangqing by the mid-sixth century; its liturgy is still an essential part of Daoist ritual, even today.

The Tang dynasty (618–906) was a great period for the Daoist religion, as it was for Chinese culture in general. Daoism became the official state religion. Emperors shared the same surname of Laozi (Li), and considered him as an ancestor. All emperors and their wives took formal Daoist initiation, and thus became great patrons of Daoism. There were no new Daoist revelations or founding of new movements in the Tang, but Daoism became more of a unified tradition. Daoists could be government officials, priests, or hermit poets. (The famous poet Li Po [Li Bai] was an ordained Daoist.)

In the mid-eighth century, the emperor decided that a temple to Laozi was to be erected in both capitals and every prefecture and also published a compendium of all scriptures, known as the Daozang (Daoist canon). The Tang dynasty also saw the rise of internal alchemy (see below).

The Song dynasty (960–1279) is generally seen as a period of decline. It was also a time when local gods became part of the bureaucracy of the Daoist heaven. Most famously, in the late 12th century, a local god from Sichuan became known as Wenchang, the god of literature, who is still a regular feature in Daoist temples. Over the next several hundred years, Daoism became more regional, integrated into local communities. At the same time, the Zhang family, who claimed direct descent from the first Celestial Master Zhang Daoling, became the authorizing center of many of the new cults, at first unofficially and then through official decrees. They were based not in Sichuan, but in Jiangxi Province, on Dragon Tiger Mountain (Longhushan). The emperor recognized them as the Zhenghi (Orthodox Unity) sect.

The Yuan dynasty (1260–1368) saw China, including its religions, come under the control of Mongols. The rulers, called khans, favored a reformed sect of Daoism called Quanzhen (Complete Reality).

It has been traditional to see Daoism during the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) as in decline, but in fact popular Daoist associations flourished. Official Daoism was severely restricted by the government, but folk festivals and annual pilgrimages, many of which are still celebrated today, sprang up. One example is the promotion of Mount Wudang as a major center of Daoism, associated with internal arts. One important figure associated with the mountain is Zhang Sanfeng, the legendary founder of internal martial arts, including taijiquan (tai chi chuan). Zhang's fame spread through the distribution of collections of esoteric works attributed to him. He is still enshrined in many Daoist temples today.

Also in the Ming, scholars compiled another version of the Daoist canon (Daozang), containing at least 1,500 separate works from all periods of Daoist history. This edition, which is the earliest one that survives, has been called the great encyclopedia of Chinese indigenous culture.

The Qing dynasty (1644–1911), when China was ruled by Manchus who practiced esoteric Buddhism, continued the trends set in the Ming. The government increased control and unified and standardized Daoist schools, even as more lay associations thrived. By the end of the Qing, only two Daoist sects were extant: the Orthodox Unity School (Zhengyi dao), which predominates in Taiwan and parts of eastern China, and the Complete Reality School (Quanzhen dao), which makes up 80 percent of Daoists in China today and predominates in Hong Kong.

Daoism Today The 20th century saw the somatization and secularization of Daoism through the new conceptual frameworks of qigong (energy work) and traditional Chinese medicine (TCM). The former is a series of longevity and meditative practices derived from Daoism, which spread throughout China beginning in the mid-1950s. The latter was a standardization of Daoist herbal lore and body energetics. Both approaches the Communists advanced as alternatives to Western (bourgeois) medicine.

The Constitution of the People's Republic of China officially guarantees freedom of religion, but it is the government that defines religion. Daoism in China is one of five officially sanctioned religions (Buddhism, Islam, Christianity [Protestantism], and Catholicism are the other four). Fortune telling, divination, and many other activities of Daoist priests were classified as superstition and therefore made illegal.

Since Deng Xiaoping and his liberalization policies came to power in the late 1970s, Daoism has made a comeback in Mainland China. Monasteries have been reopened, and new clergy have been ordained. Still, recent government statistics show that Daoism is relatively tiny compared to Buddhism. There are 600 Daoist temples in all of China, compared to 9,500 Buddhist ones, and 6,000 Daoist priests and nuns, compared to 170,000 Buddhist clergy. Cities that once had 100 Daoist temples now have one.

And yet Daoist traditions permeate everyday life in China. Calendars listing auspicious days are readily available once again. New sectarian qigong movements, such as Falun Gong, with followers that sometimes number in the millions, draw much of their teachings from Daoism, as well as Buddhism. Popular literature and film, particularly of the martial arts and ghost story genres, are indebted to Daoism.

Mainland China has also seen the growth of the academic study of Daoism since 1979, the beginning of liberalization. (This also coincides with the refounding of the Chinese Daoist Association.) In 1980, Daoist studies became a permanent part of the curriculum at Sichuan University in Chengdu and at the Beijing Academy of Social Sciences. Established in 2008, the Research Association on Laozi and Daoist Culture is a new Chinese national academic association, notable as it is licensed by the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs. It held its first International Summit on Laozi and Daoist Culture in Beijing in 2009.

Taiwan and Hong Kong never saw any legal restrictions on Daoist practice. In Taiwan, there is little monastic tradition: Daoist priests (primarily of the Zhengyi tradition) are householders who perform rituals for the community. Hong Kong has many active temples (most of the Quanzhen tradition), which, since the 1997 handover, have tried to extend their influence over Daoism on the Mainland.

The academic study of Daoism in the West, after years of considering religious Daoism of little interest, is now flourishing. As of 2001, several comprehensive reference works and accurate textbooks by top scholars (Livia Kohn, Kristopher Schipper, Fabrizio Pregadio) have recently appeared.

Daoist Practices Longevity techniques (yangsheng) have always been among the most important concerns within Daoism. Indeed, the earliest Daoist texts extant, those found in the Mawang Dui manuscripts, unearthed from a tomb filled in 168 BCE, include not only the Daodejing but the Daoyin Tu (a gymnastics chart). The techniques may include breathing exercises, sexual hygiene, gymnastics, massage, diet, and herbs, but their aim is always to guide the qi. The ideal of the body functioning in harmony was a moral as well as a physical ideal, and the first stage in the quest for immortality.

Sexual techniques (fangzhong: the arts of the bedroom) have also been known since earliest times. From the Celestial Masters on, formal sexual rites were used to codify marital relations. In the case of celibate practitioners, imaginary union with a divine partner was practiced. Group sex was also practiced. In a ritual called harmonizing the energies (heqi), community members joined in formal sexual intercourse.

The notion of Daoist alchemy has become somewhat popular in the West, but it is widely misunderstood. Jindan (literally, golden elixir or medicine, but translated as alchemy) refers to a range of esoteric doctrines. There are several streams that have contributed to its development.

Alchemy in China has a 2,000-year history. The earliest practices are called waidan (external alchemy), which was the compounding of elixirs through the refining of natural substances—notably, the refining of mercury from cinnabar (both of which were also cosmological symbols) in a search for the pill of immortality. The aim of waidan was not only to change the elixir but also the person who achieves it.

The Tang dynasty was the golden age of alchemy. Literati and certain emperors became interested (sometimes with fatal results). The Tang also saw the shift from waidan to neidan (internal or inner alchemy). (And yet as early as the second century CE, meditation was described in alchemical language—furnace, elixir and so forth.) The term refers both to the oral and written teachings, the practices derived from the teaching, and the inner state realized through these practices. Neidan held that the laboratory for making transformation was in the human body. Through meditation and concentration, the practitioner could crystallize the ingredients from his or her own energies (qi).

The most controversial and misunderstood aspect of inner alchemy is sexual practice. Some have said that the “arts of the bedroom” were key to the whole process. But references to these were expurgated from the texts and passed on orally. Certainly one of the key principles of internal alchemy is conserving jing, which translates as essence and also semen. Avoiding ejaculation during coitus is one way to do that. This technique is perpetuated by popular Daoist groups in the West such as the Healing Tao.

In general, though, the scholarly consensus seems to be that sexual practices are not central to mainstream alchemical traditions, even though those traditions retain the symbolism of sexual union. Indeed, some have said that redirecting semen into the bladder is a case of reading metaphor literally and that the practice is worthless at best and physically harmful at worst.

Inner alchemical texts listed separate practices for women (called nudan). This involved the control of menstrual blood, seen as the source of a woman’s energy, just as seminal fluid is a source in a man. Women were taught also to give birth to a being of light through the top of the head.

Ritual is a key aspect of Daoism. The Daoist canon contains a huge number of liturgical rituals for all aspects of life, including exorcisms, funerals, and thanksgivings. Early Daoist ritual rejected blood sacrifice and the acceptance of money for ritual services and instead emphasized the burning of writings and scriptures, still an important feature of Daoist ritual. Indeed, priests are seen as cosmic bureaucrats and must prepare all documents in triplicate. In fact, they visualize themselves in the courts of the Daoist gods. Ritual is also said to transform the body of the ritualist, and thus ritual is a form of alchemy (or vice versa).

Divination is not a form of Daoist practice, but rather supports and informs Daoism (like traditional Chinese medicine). Divination is an integral part of all Chinese culture, high or low, Buddhist or Daoist. All Daoist services, especially funerary ones, are performed on proper and auspicious dates. Divinatory methods include technical instruments, spirit possession, and more recently spirit writing. Topics in the Daoist canon that deal with divination include the Yijing (I Ching, also called the Book of Changes), calendrics, astrology, weather predictions, geomancy, and physiognomy.

One popular form of divination includes oracle slips; it involves pulling out a wooden stick with a number on it from a box, which refers one to a slip of paper with advice, sometimes in the form of a poem. This practice is officially outlawed in Mainland China. But it plays an important role among both popular and Daoist practitioners in Taiwan and Hong Kong, as well as in overseas Chinese communities. All temples offer these oracle slips (even now on the mainland).

Elijah Siegler

See also: Alchemy, Daoist; Astrology; Chinese Daoist Association; Confucianism; Falun Gong; Healing Tao; Laozi; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Mountains; Quanzhen Daoism; Tian Dao; Zhengyi Daoism.

References

- Bokenkamp, Stephen R. Early Daoist Scriptures. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.
- Kirkland, Russell. "The Historical Contours of Taoism in China: Thoughts on Issues of Classification and Terminology." Journal of Chinese Religions 25 (Fall 1997): 57–82.
- Kohn, Livia. Daoism and Chinese Culture. Boston: Three Pines Press, 2001.
- Kohn, Livia, ed. Daoism Handbook. Leiden: Brill, 2000.
- Kohn, Livia, ed. The Taoist Experience: An Anthology. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.
- Little, Stephen. Taoism and the Arts of China. Chicago: The Art Institute of Chicago, 2000.
- Pas, Julian F. Historical Dictionary of Taoism. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1998.
- Robinet, Isabelle. Taoism: Growth of a Religion. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Schipper, Kristofer. The Taoist Body. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Darby, John Nelson

1800–1882

One of the most ignored of religious founders, in seeking a church fellowship that more closely resembled the apostolic example than what he had experienced in the Anglican Church of Ireland, John Nelson Darby took the lead in founding a movement that had no name itself but eventually became designated as the Plymouth Brethren. In the process he developed a new approach to studying the Bible known as Dispensationalism, which spread far beyond the Brethren among North American Fundamentalist Christians in the early years of the 20th century.

Darby was born into an Irish family then residing in London, England, on November 18, 1800. In 1815, his family moved back to Ireland, and a few years later Darby entered Trinity College in Dublin. He initially studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1822. At the same time, however, religious issues had come to the forefront of his life and he decided against pursuing a law career. Instead he accepted deacon's orders in the Church of Ireland (Anglican) and was assigned to a position as curate at Calary, County Wicklow. As he took up his duties, he began to ruminate on the difference between the church he was serving and what he saw pictured in the Bible.

Within a few years, in 1927, he resigned his pastoral assignment, withdrew from the Church of Ireland, and began searching for a new home among the several dissenting sects (Presbyterian, Congregational, etc.). Finding each unacceptable, he eventually found his way to a small group in Dublin that had banded together in their opposition to denominationalism, formal church membership, and non-scriptural church names. The group gathered each Sunday and manifested their unity with a simple act of breaking bread (in commemoration of the Lord's Supper). A similar group would later emerge at Plymouth, England, which gave the movement its common name.

Portrait of Irish preacher John Nelson Darby. The Modern Fundamentalist movement can be traced to Darby's efforts. (Hy Pickering. Chief Men among the Brethren. London: Pickering & Inglis, n.d.)

Beginning in 1830, Darby traveled widely and wrote voluminously in support of the particular stance taken by the Brethren. Early stops included Paris and Britain's foremost university communities—Oxford and Cambridge. Early strength manifested in France and French-speaking Switzerland.

In the mid-1840s, a controversy at Plymouth split the movement. A disagreement developed between Darby and Benjamin W. Newton on several doctrinal issues and arguments grew more heated. As the disagreement continued, the congregation at Plymouth came into a relationship with a former Baptist congregation located at Bethesda. When some members of the Plymouth community visited the Bethesda congregation and were allowed to break bread (receive the Lord's Supper), the issue was joined around the quest, "Who was a proper subject with whom to share Communion?" Newton and the brethren at Plymouth suggested that they would break bread with any they perceived to be true Christians. Darby argued that he could break bread only with those who were affiliated with a fully separated assembly (congregation). Those assemblies that followed Newton would become known as the Open Brethren (now the Christian Brethren). Darby's supporters would become known as the Exclusive Brethren.

The controversy slowed Darby but little. He continued his travels with multiple trips to Germany, Canada and the United States, Italy, New Zealand, and the West Indies. The last months of Darby's life began in 1881 when he sustained a bad fall while in Scotland. His health began to decline and on April 29, 1882, he passed away at Bournemouth, where he had been staying.

Step-by-step, Darby originated the system of biblical theology called Dispensationalism. He saw the Bible as an account of God's interaction with humanity since creation. History can thus be divided into a series of historical periods in which God successively reveals himself ever more clearly and accordingly changes his expectations of the manner in which humans should respond. God's actions in history culminate in the incarnation of Jesus and the establishment of the present age of grace.

A major step in the spread of Dispensationalist thought was its acceptance by evangelist Dwight L. Moody (1837–1899), who promoted it through the 1880s and 1890s. Once beyond the Brethren community, however, Dispensationalism would continue to evolve as a system. One of Moody's associates, Cyrus I. Scofield (1843–1921) used the system as a basis of notes in the very popular Scofield Reference Bible, initially published in 1908, and the Bible led to Dispensationalism's widespread acceptance by most Fundamentalists in the 1920s and 1930s and its continuing popularity among evangelicals to the present. The Open Brethren (today generally known as the Christian Brethren) are an integral part of the larger evangelical scene. Meanwhile, in the 20th century, the Exclusive Brethren retained their separatist stance and a series of internal controversies led to their division into several factions.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Brethren; Church of Ireland.

References

- Coad, F. Roy, A History of the Brethren Movement: Its Origins, Its Worldwide Development, and Its Significance for the Present Day. Sydney, Australia: Paternoster Press, 1968.
- Darby, John Nelson. Collected Writings. 34 vols. Oak Park, IL: Bible Truth Publishers, 1971.
- Darby, John Nelson. Letters of J. N. Darby, 3 vols. Sunbury, PA: Believers Bookshelf, 1971.
- Turner, W. G., John Nelson Darby. London: C. A. Hammond, 1944.
- Werenchuk, Max S. John Nelson Darby: A Biography. Neptune, NJ: Loizeaux Brothers, 1992.

Days of Awe

The period known as the Days of Awe and the Ten Days of Repentance in the Jewish calendar ushers in a time of reflection and repentance as themes in the Jewish faith. They begin with Rosh Hashanah (the New Year) and end with Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement). Rosh Hashanah occurs on the first day of the month of Tishri and Yom Kippur falls on the 10th day of the same month (September–October on the Common Era calendar).

Jews believe that during these days God determines their fate for the coming year, even deciding who will live and who will die. On Rosh Hashanah God opens the book of judgment, and on Yom Kippur the book is closed and sealed. Jewish theology teaches that during the intervening days, when God's judgment remains open, prayer, repentance, and good deeds may avert a harsh decree. It is thus customary for Jews to

Prayer books are stacked at a Chabad Lubavitch Midtown Manhattan service for Rosh Hashanah in New York. Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, begins 10 days of repentance. The Days of Awe, as they are called, culminate with the holiest day of the year, Yom Kippur, or the Day of Atonement. (Corbis) convey to one another good wishes for the new year accompanied by the phrase “may you be inscribed in the Book of Life.”

In modern Jewish communities, the services held during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur become the best-attended events of the year for the average synagogue. Rabbis will often organize additional gatherings for people who are either not affiliated with a synagogue or are unable to attend their own synagogue. The Sabbath service that falls between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is known as Shabbat Shuvah, or the Sabbath of Return.

On the day before Yom Kippur, termed Erev Yom Kippur (Eve of Day of Atonement), believers will mark the time with a meal before the fast, acts of charity, and requesting (and granting) forgiveness of others. Yom Kippur is a most solemn and focused occasion that includes 5 services at the synagogue and 25 hours of fasting, emphasizing the means of finding atonement in a world in which no temple in Jerusalem stands.

Generally, to accommodate the many who wish to participate in the High Holy Days, synagogues require reservations and will admit people only with the presentation of a “ticket” verifying their reservation. Most synagogues expect a donation in return for the ticket. A similar requirement accompanies the various independent High Holy Day services established to meet the needs of the otherwise unaffiliated. Both Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are official holidays in Israel, but not the Days of Awe between them.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Judaism; Rosh Hashanah; Yom Kippur.

References

- Cohen, Jeffrey M. 1,001 Questions and Answers on Rosh HaShanah and Yom Kippur. New York: Jason Aronson, 1997.
- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher; Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.

Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

◆ Death

Death, as used here, refers to the termination of the various biological processes/functions that define a living organism, especially humans. The term may be used in reference to both the particular event that ends biological existence and the condition of the body following that event. The nature of death has through the centuries been a primary problem discussed in the discourse of all the world’s religious traditions, leading to a variety of convergences and divergences of thought.

Many have suggested that the spiritual life was a preparation for death. Once religious movements began to teach the notion of transcendence of the cosmic cycle and propose ways of salvation that would lead to permanent states of freedom and bliss beyond bodily death, the whole notion of the spiritual path began to acquire the features of a lifelong preparation for death. In order to gain access to the postmortem state of bliss, persons had to undergo initiation rituals, practice various forms of personal and collective prayer or meditation, observe a set of rules in accordance with the definitions of morality proposed by the religion, and make use of the assistance of the religious virtuosi during the dying process and beyond.

Pre-axial civilizations (existing prior to 800 BCE) valued life in this world and seem to have described only a shadowy existence after death. The structure of life in a particular religious community was elaborated on the basis of the cycle of the seasons, the appearance of the Sun and the Moon, the seasonal shifts in the constellations, and the rhythms of biological life. Wisdom entailed living an upright life with the intention of prolonging the lifespan of individuals and increasing the fertility of the community and its agricultural holdings (fields and flocks) as a whole. Death was thought of as either simply a natural transition in which a person rejoined the ancestors, or else a calamity requiring expiatory sacrifice.

In some cases, sacrificial religion involved the death not only of animals but also of human beings, in which case death was meant to represent the process of expiation and purification periodically required by the cycles that affirm and transmit life. A general dissatisfaction with the rather sketchy responses of these archaic religions to the deeper questions of the human spirit gave rise to feelings of insecurity and even fear. Most of the archaic religions not only practiced sacrifice, but also engaged in the practice of sorcery. Fear of death, of evil spirits, of diseases, of ill will, of envy and ill fortune, are all incited by sorcery and can become an oppressive burden on families and individuals, who live under perpetual fear of evil magic and its consequences. The notion of salvation beyond the sphere of this world in part arises as a repudiation of the power of sorcery to incite fear and subjection in persons; a supreme deity or a cosmic principle operates to overwhelm the often local potency of malefic forces.

Egyptian papyrus depicting the god Anubis, the jackal-headed deity who served as embalmer and guide for the dead, presiding over the mummification ritual of a dead man. (Corel)

The awareness of the universality of death and its deeply invasive quality in respect of human life have brought people, civilizations, and religions to reflect extensively on its origin and meaning, if and how it can be restrained in its destructive power, or indeed eventually overcome. In examining how different religions have faced up to death, it may be seen that the religious perception of existence is decisive. Understandably, many authors have held that the experience of death and humans' attempt to deal with it is what gives rise to religious practice in the first place (E. B. Tylor 1974).

E. Durkheim affirmed that "primitive peoples accepted the idea of death with a kind of indifference . . . They paid slight attention to human individuality, were used to putting their lives at risk, and were prepared to renounce it very easily" (Durkheim 1960, 383). This affirmation however stands in open contrast with the evidence provided by a great majority of ethnologists and anthropologists. Among Aboriginal peoples, says L. Lévy-Bruhl, "the fact of death seeks an explanation distinct from the workings of natural causes . . . If death comes in a certain moment, some kind of mystical power has come on the scene” (Lévy-Bruhl 1960, 20ff.). This is so much the case that in many cultures death is seen directly or indirectly as the result of a violent intervention of another person (Jameson 1898, 271). M. Mauss is convinced that for Aboriginal Australian peoples, the origin of death is magical, that is to say, religious (Mauss 1960, 318). And B. Malinowski, speaking of the peoples who inhabited the Trobriand Islands, in the southeast Pacific, says that mourning is the result of the suffering occasioned by the death of one’s own sub-clan, a suffering as severe as if one had lost a leg or a branch was torn off a tree (Malinowski 1932, 153). P. M. Kaberry spoke of death in terms of “the rending of emotional ties, the cessation of personal contact” (Kaberry 1939, 209). And religious systems consolidated, to an important degree, as humans attempted to respond to this the most powerful and incisive of all human experiences (Di Nola 1970; Thomas 1975; Taylor 2001).

Communication with the Dead: Visions, Dreams, Mediumship, Necromancy, Incubation Some of the earliest anthropological theories of the origin of religion made reference to dreams of the deceased as giving rise to the belief in disembodied souls. Mediumship and necromancy arose as attempts to communicate with the dead in order to obtain answers to questions of local and also of universal importance. Thus, the fate of the beloved dead might be sought; the reasons for an untimely or violent death; prognostications of the future; judgments on the conduct of persons left behind; guidance in making reparation for past offenses against the deceased; location of lost articles including inheritable treasures; finding ways to terrorize or defeat enemies, and so on. Incubation involved sleeping in or near a shrine in order to receive the blessing of a prognosticatory dream, particularly related to the healing of disease. Examples in the ancient papyri refer to dreams of Asclepius; medieval and even modern dreams of Saints Cosmas and Damian and other holy healers have been catalogued and widely reported.

Along with the rites for the dead, it is important to take note of the ritual objects and monuments for and to the dead in various human cultures. The pyramids of ancient Egypt, of stupendous size and almost unimaginable expenditure of human resources, were the archetypal funerary monuments of the earliest human civilization. Mounds and burial sites have been identified in Paleolithic times. Chinese civilization retained the custom of burying not only precious objects but also other persons (spouses, retainers, troops, slaves) with a royal deceased personage. The Hebrew scriptures describe concerns for proper burial; Abraham purchases a burial cave for his clan in Canaan; Joseph makes his heirs promise to carry his bones out of Egypt; burial sites for most of the Hebrew prophets are identified historically, Moses being the exception with accompanying legends of his possible ascension.

Christian burial in the early centuries focused on proximity to holy places, either the catacombs (vast underground cemeteries usually cut out of the tufa typical of the region around Rome and other Mediterranean cities) or burial ad sanctos (necropolis-style burial under or near a church, particularly the tomb-church of a martyr). The idea was to express solidarity with the patron saint while being gathered around the place where the Eucharist was celebrated (hence the martyrs’ tombs are set beneath the altar; later a relic is inserted into the altar), thus expressing solidarity with Christ, whose Body and Blood are offered on the altar; an eschatological dimension is present in the notion that those buried near a holy place will be among the first to rise on the last day to meet the Lord to experience the final and eternal fulfillment of religious hope.

Islamic civilizations tended to downplay the site of burial; burial was to be extremely simple and unpretentious, with an insistence on burial rather than cremation. However, both royal and sanctoral burial emerged in Islamic societies over time; thus the Taj Mahal is the burial monument for a Mughal queen in north India. The tomb of Rumi in Konya (Iconium), Turkey, is an elaborate example of Sufi funerary architecture in which the tombs not only of the great saint and poet may be found, but also those of his principal disciples, as in an eschatological gathering. Tombs of pirs can be found throughout Sufi-influenced Islamic societies, but the veneration of these sites is undergoing relentless criticism from reformist Sunni teachers. Buddhist burial monuments, stupas or chaityas, are known from the earliest centuries; they are reliquary mounds that became ever more elaborate in form and symbolism with time. Clockwise circumambulation of these monuments remains one of the principal forms of religious devotion for the Buddhist laity.

However, both pre-axial and post-axial (since 200 BCE) religions regard the time of death with particular attention. In some cases, divination or dream interpretation is used to predict the time of death. Over the centuries, religious virtuosi learned and handed on the indications of the onset of death, such as the appearance of the skin, the eyes, or the limbs, the pattern of breathing or of the pulse, the color of blood and urine, and so on. With time, the notion that a non-material element (the soul or spirit) exits the body at death became the common definition of death: the irreversible separation of body and soul. A Tibetan book, the Bardo Thodol, gives considerable detail on these biological phenomena, linking them with the stages of spiritual experience that the individual is undergoing, invisibly and simultaneously.

In ancient Egypt, the phenomenology of death became associated with the primary focus of religious worship. The preparation of the dead body of a pharaoh or leading figure acquired all the features of a very solemn ritual whose goal was to enable the deceased to attain immortality in part through the skillful embalming of the parts of the body. Chinese alchemy also sought to bring on bodily immortality in various ways, including breath and bodily practices, the use of herbal and metallic drugs, visualizations, and the like. Embalming seems to have been widely used, considering the large number of disparate cultures in which mummies have been found, including Peru, China, Japan, Egypt, and medieval Europe.

In real terms, many funeral rites attempt to deny the reality of death. Mourners make a special effort to ensure that the dead are well accompanied. Abundance of food and drink, magnificent clothes, rich, drawn-out ceremonies—all give the impression that the dead one still lives within the community. While it refuses to accept the extinction of the dead one, the community recuperates its unity and stability. In some Burkina Faso and Sudanese tribes, the dead person's brother or sister may be obliged to provide a child to the former's spouse so as to continue the progeny (the same practice is to be found in the Bible: Deuteronomy 25:5, Matthew 22:23–33). In many cases, close relatives are not allowed to mourn noisily or show excessive grief. To do otherwise might indicate the conviction that the dead person had disappeared altogether. Death should be mocked (Thomas 1982).

The literature associated with death and dying presents the possibility of encountering supernatural beings after death. The disciple is trained to deal with these encounters. Thus, the Gnostic Christian would learn the secret passwords enabling him or her to pass the postmortem toll stations governed by an infra-cosmic, and often malevolent, hierarchy of angels. In Christianity, after death one is to meet Christ as Judge, who will evaluate the person's conduct to see whether it corresponds to a faithful response to grace, thus concluding the process by which a person is saved. Religions that believe in reincarnation in various forms taught ways by which undesirable rebirths might be avoided and, if possible, complete liberation could be attained in the after-death state. The notion that one is judged on the basis of one's deeds also opens up the presentation of various demonic beings of the lower realms of the cosmos who are assigned the task of punishing miscreants, either for eternity or for the time necessary for purification.

The reality of death is also faced down in three additional ways. One is through possession rituals. Death is seen as the invasion of the evil spirit. To counteract it, mourners infused with divine power attempt to impart a vitality that overcomes the passivity of death. Another is reincarnation. This is admitted in many African and Eastern religions (Egyptian Orphites, Pythagoreans, Manicheans, some neo-Platonists, Brahmins). Reincarnation, whether symbolic (nominal) or real (ontological), attempts to assure continuity and renewal within society in spite of the apparent interruption death involves. Metempsychosis, or the transmigration of the soul into animals for the purposes of purification, common in Hinduism, moves in another direction, for it is not affirmative of the value of bodily life (Ortigue and Ortigue 1966). A third way in which death is resolved is the practice of ancestor cult. Many peoples hold that the dead lived in their ancestors and live on in their offspring, taking special care to look after the dead, ensuring they are provided with nutrition and protection. Practiced in China in 1000 BCE, it indicates a belief that the human spirit descends from the divine (Jensen 1951). This practice encouraged people to have many children so as to be properly honored when they die (Granet 1922). Likewise, Japanese Shinto religion teaches that the spirits of the dead (kami) pass on to one's descendants. In fact the most powerful among the kami are venerated as divinities. Of course ancestor cult is traditionally of special importance among sub-Saharan animist religions (Thomas 1982).

The Rise of Religious Beliefs That Mitigate the Destructive Power of Death

It is considered that one of the most effective ways of overcoming the annihilating power of death is simply to deny the fundamental role of the individual in society, that is, by insisting on the predominant value of human collectivity. Ancestor cult is a particular case of this. Death is seen as a passage, a transition, a rebirth, and thus, fundamentally, an occasion of renewal of society and humanity. Some religious positions tend, as a result, simply to deny death. For animistic religions, life, in the strong sense of the word, is not individual or derived, in such a way that death of the individual is but a secondary manifestation of life (Jaulin 1967).

The denial of the relevance of death was common among some Greek authors, for example, Epicurus. The latter said that humans should not be anguished before the prospect of death, for when they are alive they are not dead, when they die they no longer continue living. Hence, death does not exist and should not be feared (Lett. to Meneceus, 125). Such a radical denial of death and immortality is not common, however. De-dramatization of death is more common than outright denial. Socrates claimed that by living a just life humans had no need to fear death, for their eternal soul just passes on to another state, superior and divine (Apol. 35d). Likewise for Stoics such as Seneca, life on Earth is but a preparation for the next life. If at present we live like a fetus in our mother's womb, at death we are born to eternity (Lett. 102).

Brahmanic and Buddhist religion also consider death in a like way (Morin 1951, 215–237). The former explains the role of death in human life on the basis of the identity between the “deep self” (atman) and the fundamental principle of the universe (brah- man). Salvation (moksha) is obtained by means of the transmigration of souls (samsara) by which humans overcome all desire and are liberated from the results of their previous behavior (karman). In that sense, death is accidental in character.

For Buddhism, life is considered as a succession of illusory states of self that can only produce suffering and torment. Wisdom consists primordially therefore in “the annihilation of all desire, the annihilation of hatred, the annihilation of disorderly conduct,” which will bring about the so-called nirvana, or extinction of individual consciousness, the ultimate elimination of death understood as an affirmation of individuality and desire. Once the cycle of transmigrations is complete, “the torrent of being is halted, the root of pain is destroyed, there is no more birth” (Morin 1951, 228). Death is defeated in the same way as individuality is overcome; true being is nothingness.

Nonetheless, using a term made popular by J. G. Frazer, most peoples and religions envisage the dead as “ammortal,” as distinct from “immortal.” That is to say, they live on indefinitely after death, but not necessarily forever. The dead eat, drink, experience sentiments, and even reproduce. Death after all is a passage, a transition, “a kind of life that prolongs individual life. Life after death is not an idea, but an image . . . a metaphor for life, a myth if you wish” (Morin 1951, 14). African animistic religions commonly accept this position: a remainder or fragment of the human soul lives on after death. In fact, the notion of a fundamental spiritual core that endures beyond death can be found in many other religious forms: the ka of the Egyptians, the eidōs or psyche of the Greeks, the genius of the Romans, the rephaīm of the Jews, the fravaši of the Persians (O'Callaghan 2010). Buddhism teaches that “man is not like a banana, a fruit without a kernel, for his body contains an immortal soul.”

A body of literature generally referred to as the “art of dying” (ars moriendi) exists in most post-axial religions (developed after 200 BCE). These exhortations are derived from sermons and other kinds of discourse meant to bring to mind the inevitability of death and the need to prepare oneself morally and spiritually for one's final moments of life. In some cases, these texts emerged from popular preaching and so have a strong content calling people to conversion through a graphic presentation of the pains and confusion of the dying, the horrors of hell, and the need to reform one's life in order to be worthy of heaven and eternal life. In the case of the Tibetan delog accounts of the afterlife, the notion of an exhortation to moral reform is enhanced by the identity of the author, usually a woman, who has had a prolonged "death" experience in which the postmortem realms were observed in detail. Often these accounts prescribe prayers and other virtuous works in order to assist deceased persons seen in one of the hell realms by means of the transfer of merit. Similar objectives are expressed in the ancient Egyptian rites (Book of the Dead), in Masses and prayers for the dead (including the practice of transferring plenary indulgences to the deceased) among Catholic Christians, and in the postmortem rituals of Chinese and Tibetan Buddhism (for example, the recitation of the Tibetan Book of the Dead, the Bardo Thodol, for 49 days after death; the use of the pho wa practice of the transference of consciousness on behalf of the deceased; purification rites on behalf of the deceased; and the Chod ritual to remove bad karma and obstacles, including diabolical interference with the death process).

Death and the Divine Promise of Bodily Resurrection in Islam and Christianity An important distinction among post-axial religions may be made between those that propose a dematerialized final state of the person and those that propose some form of bodily resurrection. The most ancient form is generally held to have arisen among the Zoroastrians of ancient Persia; in order to enjoy the benefits of the final triumph of good over evil, the body is to be reconstituted in the heavenly realm. The basic principle remains the same for Judaism, Christianity, and Islam: since the body is inherently good, it necessarily participates in the pleasures of eternal life with God.

A strong notion of personal immortality is to be found in Islam and Christianity, centered in both cases on the doctrine of final resurrection that results from divine power. This decisively affects our perception of death.

Final resurrection of the dead is central in Islamic belief (Gardet 1960; Smith and Haddad 1982; Halevi 2007). The dead are snatched away by 'Isra'īl, the angel of death, and brought to the underworld, to be rewarded or punished as the case may be. At the end of time, the bodies of humans will rise up, accompanied by "subtle spirits," arrouāh. Resurrection (ma'ad) is closely associated with judgment, for all will have to give a reckoning (hisāb) of the weight (misān) of their actions: "Whosoever has done an atom's weight of good shall see it, and whosoever has done an atom's weight of evil shall see it" (Koran 99:7f.). As believers and non-believers pass over the bridge of Sirat, God will assist the just, whereas the evil will fall into hell. Final resurrection thus has strong ethical connotations, and produces great happiness and bodily pleasure in paradise (al-Jannah: Koran 76:12–22). However, resurrection is not considered as such as the result of redemption, nor is the vision of God (ru'yat Allāh) taken to be the essence of eternal beatitude.

Indeed, the peculiarity of Christianity (in close continuity with Judaism) lies in the doctrine of redemption (from sin, from slavery, from death) through the agency precisely of the death and subsequent resurrection of Jesus Christ (Hoffmann 1966; O'Callaghan 2010, chapter 9; Pieper 1969; Ratzinger 1988).

Three aspects of death typical to Christianity may be noted. In the first place, like all forms of religious practice, Christianity gives considerable importance to the presence of death in the midst of life. Media vita in morte sumus, sang the medieval hymn, "in the midst of life we are immersed in death." We are mortal beings, and we know it. Second, however, death is perceived as something improper and odious, as something that should simply not take place. Thomas Aquinas in a lucid and profoundly realistic way insists that death is the most terrible evil that exists in the created order (Summa Theologiae I, q. 72, a. 2); death is the "greatest of human misfortunes" (Comp. Theol. 277). The same may be said of other religions. Third and last, our understanding of death is perceived and situated in the context of immortality, of enduring life after death.

Traditional Catholic Christian practice provides rituals for the final moments of life beginning with the viaticum, reception of the final Eucharist, with accompanying prayers. Additional services provide for prayers at the home of the deceased or in a "funeral home" (rosary, along with a liturgy focused on biblical readings and prayers); a procession to the church with psalms and hymns; the funeral Mass with traditional chants such as the Requiem eternam, Lux eternam, In Paradisum (the sequence, Dies Irae, is no longer part of the rite, but remains a feature of the great choral settings of the funeral Mass by composers such as Mozart, Verdi, and Berlioz); the procession to the cemetery (again, psalmody and hymnody); the rite of blessing of the gravesite and prayers of commendation at the burial of the body; memorial Masses offered for the deceased after one month and one year; additional memorial Masses in accordance with the customs of the family and the locality; annual visits to the gravesite by members of the family, particularly on All Souls' Day (November 2). These rites may be found in other religions as well, in forms corresponding to the respective belief system; in recent times the Catholic rites have been diminished in practice, although all these liturgical options are available in the revised rites of the post-Second Vatican Council period (since 1965).

Immortality for a Christian believer is not something at one's personal disposal, to be constructed by humans. Immortality consists substantially in perpetual beatific communion with God (for the just) and universal bodily resurrection. Hence it is a divine gift: the gift of creation by which God gives humans an incorruptible spirit (the soul), and that of redemption by which he divinizes or elevates humans to partake in divine life. As with other religions, this experience of promised immortality critically determines the way the believer faces up to death.

Five observations may be made. First, regarding the origins of human mortality. Is it an aspect of the natural structure of things, like the mortality of animals and plants, that should be simply accepted and assimilated? Or does death find its roots in a primordial accident or fall that could eventually be repaired or reversed? Aquinas says that the need to die "is due partially to sin, partially to nature" (III Sent., D. 16, q. 1, arg. 1, c). Just as death involves separation from God, so also it means separation within the human community and within humans themselves. Death is a manifestation of sin: a breakup in solidarity. In fact, the Bible clearly teaches that death came into the world through sin (Genesis 3:17, 19; Wisdom 1:13f.; 2:23f.; Romans 5:12; James 1:15). Paul says that "the wages of sin is death" (Romans 6:23). Second, however, just as sin is overcome among humans through the redemption deriving from Christ's obedient acceptance of death (Philippians 2:8), so also death will be overcome when the dead will rise up at the end of time through the power of God: "Every tear will be wiped from their eyes, and death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain any more, for the former things have passed away" (Revelation 21:4). This will be Christ's definitive work: "I will raise you up on the last day" (John 6:40), he promised. Third, death does not occasion the end or extinction of life, but affords humans a privileged opportunity to appreciate life as God's gift, that can be lost or enhanced as the case may be. Hence, death can offer an occasion of opening oneself to the perpetual gift of divine vision and perfect bodily integrity in close communion with the rest of saved humanity. Fourth, death constitutes the cross-over point between this life and the next, between the transient and the permanent, between the corruptible and the eternal. Human life is unique, it can only be lived once; death means the end of the human pilgrimage. Hence, neither traditional Judaism nor Christianity envisages any kind of reincarnation after death. Fifth, the fact that Christianity and Judaism recommend burial of the cadaver and even its preservation does not amount to a denial of the power of God, who raises the dead and gives life; still, cremation is not prohibited as long as it does not indicate a despising of body (Code of Canon Law, 1176, # 3).

Christianity gave rise to a profound awareness of the value of the individual not present to the same degree in other religions (Morris 1972; Carroll, Furlong, and Mann 1990). Understandably, this constitutes a serious challenge to understanding death as the (apparent) extinction of the individual. Still, it should be remembered that for Christianity, the individual develops an awareness of her or his value and dignity not in conflict with the good of the collectivity as a whole, with the perfection of the human community, with the continuity of the race, but precisely by giving oneself to others. The believer is called to "lose" his or her life, in imitation of Jesus Christ, so that others may have it in greater abundance. But the loss will bring about the definitive gain. "Whoever would save his life will lose it," Jesus said, "and whoever loses his life for my sake, he will save it" (Luke 9:24). Through the willing acceptance of death (that is, loss of life, God's greatest gift), even to the point of renunciation in this life, Christian believers open themselves at the deepest possible level both to God's gifts and to one another.

At the same time, the life of the resurrected body is a fulfillment of the good or ill performed by the person in and with the instrument of the body during the course of one's life. In general (the exception being esoteric Judaism, which allows for reincarnation), the belief in bodily resurrection requires an identity of personhood and one unique incarnation; only one body is allotted per person, and only one body rises at the end of time to enjoy the life of the world to come (or to suffer the pains of hell). Christianity proclaims the resurrection of Jesus Christ as its central dogma, and the archetype of the life of the kingdom of God, to which all believers are called. The purpose of human life in Christ is to know, love, and serve God in one's earthly life in order to be eternally happy with God after death.

Christianity also proposes a dual judgment: one immediately after death, in which the person (separated temporarily from the body) is consigned to heaven, purgatory (to attain heaven after intense purification), or hell (from which there is no exit, although the possibility of a terminus to hell was discussed in esoteric and mystical circles, for which cf. Saint Isaac of Nineveh, in the trajectory of Origen and Evagrius of Pontus); a second and final judgment is pronounced on all humanity at the end of time, when purgatory is eliminated, and the heavenly realm is manifested as the conclusion of all sorrow, perfect communion with God, reconciliation of all injustices, and perfect justice for both the saved and the damned, evident to all. Likewise, Islam proposes an immediate judgment of the dead, and a final judgment in which Christ returns in judgment to reconcile all believers in the basic principles of monotheistic faith. Religions that propose liberation from all infra-cosmic processes prefer to speak of a purely spiritual vision of liberation or immortality of the soul without subsequent reunion with the bodily element; examples seem to include some forms of Sufism, Christian Gnosticism including Manicheanism, some expressions of Daoism, Hindu moksha, and some expressions of Buddhist nirvana.

As a way of expressing the sacramental dimension of life, founded upon the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, Christianity speaks of the "Paschal mystery" as an archetypal expression of the sacred dimension of a human life. Whatever suffering is undergone, it can be assimilated to the sufferings of Jesus; whatever consolations are received can be assimilated to the hope of glory manifested in the resurrection. The entire spiritual life, understood as a preparation for eternal life, undergoes purification and growth in the virtues in accordance with this basic pattern of "dying and rising."

Some exceptional manifestations of the death process have a place in the religions mentioned. These instances represent the process of moral perfection and salvation in a dramatic form that reinforces the convictions expressed in formal doctrine. Thus the Blessed Virgin Mary was "assumed" body and soul into heaven; even her death is not formally proclaimed in Catholic dogma, since she had not received the transmission of the effects of original sin at the moment of her own conception, and therefore her body was at all times free of the burden that brings bodily death into the human realm of being. In the Dzog chen School of Tibetan Tantrism, great masters attain one or another form of the "rainbow body" ('ja' lus) at the time of death; the material body may shrink or even disappear entirely in the week after death; perfumes, mysterious music, gentle rain, unnaturally formed rainbows and other lights in the sky; appearances to disciples; perpetual availability to disciples through prayers and invocations, are all reported. The rainbow body has some similarities to the ancient belief that kings and saints descend from a heavenly realm in times of crisis and re-ascend via a cosmic rope or pole instead of undergoing bodily death. The ascensions of Enoch, Elijah, and Jesus are comparable; legends claim similar phenomena for Moses and John the Baptist.

Reflection on the Ars Moriendi in Modernity Starting with the Protestant Reformation, with its intentional devalorization of Masses and prayers for the dead, there is a steady decline in Western religious focus on death and dying. The beloved dead are commended to the Lord; the notion of the eulogy grows in peripheral Christian communities in order to attempt to affirm a life well-lived; the notion of saints is eliminated and with it burial ad sanctos, with the exception of the Anglican and early American Protestant churchyard burial custom, only recently recovered as a symbol of eschatological hope. Pre-Revolutionary America tended to emphasize the themes of suffering and judgment, with death being a symbol for human moral depravity receiving its just punishment and angel wings as a reminder that the soul hopes to “fly, fly away” to its heavenly reward. Post-Revolutionary symbolism (vases, urns, willow trees) sought to comfort the bereaved family with the notion of heavenly rest (a “balm in Gilead”; “swing low, sweet chariot, comin’ for to carry me home”). Post-Civil War symbolism sought to give meaning to the loss of more than 600,000 lives by creating the first monumental cemeteries celebratory of the heroism of soldiers on both sides. Monuments to the fallen became a standard civic form of honoring those who gave their lives in warfare, both in North America and in Europe. Such monuments often dominate the center of town, whether a garden or green, or a piazza or square. Civic monuments to the fallen are the principal expressions of “civic religion” in the modern period; in some cases, monumental cemeteries have been created near the sites of the great battles of the two World Wars to remind the public of civic duty, and as an exhortation to personal sacrifice in the name of civic virtues. Recent times have seen the rise of cremation, the use of columbaria in churches and cemeteries, the practice of scattering ashes in a natural setting, keeping cremated remains in the home, and even the complete neglect of the remains of the deceased. At the same time, the funeral industry has tried to ally itself to traditional religion in order to preserve its cooperative role in a more rites-oriented manner of honoring the memory of the deceased.

It has been often observed that the Judeo-Christian understanding of life and death has given rise to an overly individualistic anthropology interested in personal, perpetual survival. This in turn affects our ethical perception, our notions of solidarity, community, ecology and death to a degree not present in many other religious forms. In post-Christian society, the result, however, is that death—referred of course to the individual—has come to be excluded from the warp and woof of everyday life, or at best made banal (Thomas 1975; Ariès 1977; Vovelle 1986; Ettinger 1964; Kübler-Ross 1970). Death and burial are sanitized and eliminated by specialized health services, cremation, burial in vast, remote state-run cemeteries, and the like. Marxist thought is a case in point: only collective humanity exists, whereas the affirmation of the individual, religiously founded, is at best a form of alienation. From the practical point of view, nothing can be achieved by humans attempting to obtain immortality. Speaking of death and immortality in Das Kapital, Marx teaches that humans should refrain from posing the problems they cannot solve.

The deaths of thousands in wars, plagues, natural calamities, and political persecutions have provoked both intensified public memorialization (Holocaust museums) and also reinforced the materialist view that only life has meaning and that death is the complete cessation of anything of human value. Modern literature celebrates the absurdity of belief in the afterlife, exposes the hypocrisy of military cemeteries as expressions of atavistic nationalism and militarism, and takes death as the most persuasive emblem of the essential aloneness of the human experience in a universe devoid of purpose or ultimate end.

Paul O’Callaghan and Francis V. Tiso

See also: Abraham/Abram; Alchemy, Daoist; Ancestors; Daoism; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Gnosticism; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Meditation; Moses; Reincarnation; Relics; Saints; Sufism; Tibetan Buddhism; Zoroastrianism.

References

- Ariès, Ph. L’homme devant la mort. Paris: Seuil, 1977.
- Bossuet, Jacques Benigne. Selections from the Funeral Orations of Bossuet. Charleston, SC: BiblioLife, 2008.
- Bowker, John W. The Meanings of Death. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Boyce, Mary. Zoroastrians: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Bynum, Caroline Walker. The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200-1336. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.

- Carroll, W. J., J. J. Furlong, and C. S. Mann, eds. The Quest for the Individual: Roots of Western Civilization. New York: P. Lang, 1990.
- Di Nola, A. M. Morte e morti. In Enciclopedia delle Religioni 4, col. 839–870. Firenze: Vallecchi, 1970.
- Durkheim, E. Les formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse. 4th ed. Paris: F. Alcan, 1960.
- Ettinger, R. C. W. The Prospect of Immortality. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964.
- Frazer, J. G. The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead. 3 vols. London: Macmillan, 1913–1924.
- Gardet, Louis. Connaître l'Islam. Paris: Fayard, 1960.
- Granet, M. La religion des chinois. Paris: Gauthier-Villars, 1922.
- Gregory of Nyssa. The Soul and the Resurrection. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1995.
- Halevi, L. Muhammad's Grave: Death Rites and the Making of Islamic Society. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.
- Hoffmann, Paul. Die Toten in Christus. Eine religionsgeschichtliche und exegetische Untersuchung zur paulinischen Eschatologie. Münster: Aschendorff, 1966.
- Huitzinga, John. The Waning of the Middle Ages. 1924; rpt. Mineola, NY: Dover Publications, 1998.
- International Commission on English in the Liturgy. The Rites of the Catholic Church as Revised by the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council. New York: Pueblo Publishing Co., 1976.
- Jameson, H. Letters from Victorian Pioneers. Melbourne: R. S. Brain, 1898.
- Jaulin, R. La mort Sara, l'ordre de la vie ou la pensée de la mort au Tchad. Paris: Plon, 1967.
- Jensen, A. E. Mythos und Kult bei Naturvölkern: Religionswissenschaftliche Betrachtungen, Studien zur Kulturkunde; Bd. 10. Wiesbaden: F. Steiner, 1951.
- Kaberry, P. M. Aboriginal Woman, Sacred and Profane. London: Routledge, 1939.
- Kübler-Ross, E. On Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1970.
- Lévy-Bruhl, L. La mentalité primitive. 15th ed. Paris, 1922, 1960.
- Liguori, Alfonsus. Preparation for Death: Considerations on Death, Judgment, Heaven and Hell. Rockford, IL: Tan Books and Publishers, 2009.
- Malinowski, B. The Sexual Life of Savages in North-Western Melanesia. 3rd ed. London: G. Routledge & Sons, 1932.
- Mauss, M. Sociologie et anthropologie. 2nd ed. Paris: PUF, 1960.
- Morin, E. L'homme et la mort dans l'histoire. Paris: Corrêa, 1951.
- Morris, C. The Discovery of the Individual 1050–1200. London: SPCK, 1972.
- O'Callaghan, P. Christ Our Hope. A Handbook of Eschatology. Washington, D.C., 2010.
- O'Callaghan, P. Soul. www.disf.org/en/Voci/30.asp.
- Ortigue, M.-C, and E. Ortigue. Ædipe africain. Paris: Plon, 1966.
- Pieper, J. Death and Immortality. London: Burns & Oates, 1969.
- Ratzinger, J. Eschatology. Death and Eternal Life. Washington: Catholic University of America Press 1988.
- Rosen, Steven, ed. Ultimate Journey. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2008.
- Smith, J. I., and Y. Haddad. The Islamic Understanding of Death and Resurrection. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1982.
- Taylor, J. H. Death and the Afterlife in Ancient Egypt. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Thomas, L.-V. Anthropologie de la mort. Paris: Payot 1975.
- Thomas, L.-V. La mort africaine. Paris: Payot, 1982.
- The Tibetan Book of the Dead*. Trans. by Francesca Fremantle and Chogyam Trungpa. Boston: Shambhala, 2003.
- Tugwell, Simon. Human Immortality and the Redemption of Death. Springfield, IL: Templegate Publishers, 1990.
- Tylor, E. B. Primitive Culture. 2 vols. New York: Gordon Press, 1974 (orig. 1871).
- Vovelle, M. La mort et l'Occident de 1300 à nos jours. Paris: Gallimard, 1986.

Dee, John

1527–1609

John Dee was an English Renaissance mathematician, magus, and religious enthusiast, associated with the court of Queen Elizabeth I. His research in natural history always intertwined with religious speculations rooted in various trends of Western Esotericism. During the last 30 years of his life he was engaged in an idiosyncratic religious practice, the so-called angelic conversations that synthesized his enthusiasm and apocalypticism on the one hand and his epistemological theories on the other. Having been a theorist and practitioner of ceremonial magic he represented the kind of late Renaissance interconfessionalist and heterodox humanism that was looking for a general reformation of the world by the help of Esoteric ideas and means. Its influence can still be detected in postmodern ideology, religious life, and popular culture.

Dee was born in London in 1527. From early on he decided to pursue an intellectual career. He acquired his bachelor's degree at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1546 and his master's degree two years later. From the time of his university studies, he showed a deep passion for collecting books that resulted a few decades later in the largest private library of the Elizabethan period.

After graduation he went to the continent for further studies. He spent some years in Louvain with mathematicians and cartographers, then he proceeded to Paris, where he met the most spectacular French humanists, including Guillaume Postel (ca. 1510–1581) the orientalist and linguist, himself a heterodox enthusiast of the kind Dee was to become. In 1550 he lectured on Euclid's geometry in the Royal College with great success.

Back in England he suffered a brief imprisonment because of his Protestant faith during the reign of Mary I (r. 1553–1558). His fortunes turned by 1558, when he was appointed to determine the astrologically suitable day for Elizabeth's coronation. The queen remained his supporter until her death. In the same year he published his first major work, the Prophaedumata aphoristica (An Aphoristical Introduction), in which he proposed a reform of astrological observations.

In the 1560s he traveled again to Germany, Austria, Hungary, Switzerland, and Italy. On his way back he wrote his main work, the Monas hieroglyphica (The Hieroglyphic Monad) in Antwerp, where it was promptly published (1564). During this time Dee became more and more interested in the hermetic philosophy and was absorbing various trends of Renaissance magic from Trithemius's Steganographia, through Ficino's sympathetic magic, Agrippa's humanist version of ceremonial magic to Paracelsus's new theosophical medicine and alchemy.

The rise of the Elizabethan British Empire turned Dee's interest toward politics: he became a supporter of the transatlantic discoveries and also worked out the queen's titles for the Overseas Territories. In the meantime he made his already impressive library available to courtiers and intellectuals; according to some interpretations his house became the seat of an informal think tank of the government. His intellectual development by this time shows a deepening interest in mysticism and the occult lore. All this led to his "angel conversations," which started in the early 1580s and soon became a daily practice assisted by the young "scryer," Edward Kelly. Scrying (crystal gazing) was in fact a crude medieval practice of magic; however, in Dee's interpretation it became an "archemastrie."

In May 1583, a visiting Polish aristocrat became interested in Dee's angel magic and invited the doctor with Kelly and their families to his estates in Central Europe. Until 1589 Dee lived on the continent, in various locations, offering his services and apocalyptic messages to Emperor Rudolf II in Prague and King Stephan Batory of Poland in Cracow.

After his return to England Dee could never regain his previous reputation and had to be content with a meager rectorship in Manchester. He died as a very old man in his Mortlake house in 1609. Practically until his last day he was pursuing the advice of angels and never gave up his hope of gaining superhuman knowledge and a direct contact with God by the help of the celestial beings.

Although during his long career Dee's intellectual development was shaped by various influences and widely differing concepts, there was a permanent attitude in his manifold activities and convictions: he had a burning desire for a superior knowledge that would enable him to get to know God and his creation perfectly. First he looked for this knowledge in mathematics and astrology, later in meditative mysticism that used geometry, alchemy, and cabala as auxiliary systems (the Hieroglyphic Monad); finally he came to the conclusion that the easiest way to know God is to learn the language of angels and speak to him directly. This curious project was the rationale for his angel magic.

Although representing an atypical epistemological program, Dee's thought has been exercising a considerable influence on Esoteric and mystical schools up to the present. Perhaps the most famous modern offspring of his legacy is Aleister Crowley's "Enochian magick."

György E. Szönyi

See also: Alchemy, Daoist; Astrology; Crowley, Aleister; Elizabeth I; Meditation.

References

- Clulee, Nicholas H. John Dee's Natural Philosophy. Between Science and Religion. London: RKP, 1988.
- John Dee on Astronomy. "Propaedeumata Aphoristica" (1558 and 1568). Latin and English*. Ed. and trans. by Wayne Shumaker, intr. essay by J. L. Heilbron. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.
- "A Translation of John D.'s Monas hieroglyphica, with an Introduction and Annotations." Trans. and ed. by C. H. Josten [with facsimile of the original]. Ambix 12 (1964): 112–221.
- A True and Faithful Relation of What Passed between Dr. John D. . . . and Some Spirits*. Ed. by Meric Casaubon. London: T. Garthwait, 1659; rpt.: Glasgow: The Golden Dragon Press / The Antonin Publishing Co., 1974.
- Szönyi, György E. John Dee's Occultism: Magical Exaltation through Powerful Signs. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2004.

Deeper Life Bible Church

The growth of new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches all over Africa since the 1970s has been most dramatic, but most so in West Africa, especially in Nigeria and Ghana. In these countries, many new churches originated within interdenominational university student groups, most notably the Scripture Union and the Christian Union. These groups later became fellowships, which then grew into full-blown denominations, often led by lecturers and teachers. One of the most remarkable and earliest of these movements in Nigeria is the Deeper Life Bible Church, with branches all over West Africa and inter-continently, and with more than half a million members in Nigeria only 10 years after its founding.

William Folorunso Kumuyi (b. 1941) was a former education lecturer at the University of Lagos and an Anglican who became a Pentecostal in the Apostolic Faith Mission. He began a weekly interdenominational Bible study group in 1973, which spread to other parts of Nigeria and was called Deeper Christian Life Ministry. The Apostolic Faith Church expelled him in 1975 for preaching without being an ordained minister. Kumuyi began holding retreats at Easter and Christmas, emphasizing healing and miracles and living a holy life. His followers distributed thousands of free tracts, evangelized, and established Bible study groups all over western Nigeria. The first Sunday service held in Lagos in 1982 is regarded as the foundation date of the new church. The following year, Kumuyi sent some of his leading pastors to Yonggi Cho's Full Gospel Central Church (now Yoido Full Gospel Church) in Seoul, Korea (the largest Christian congregation in the world), and after their visit a system of 5,000 "home caring fellowships" based on the Korean model was instituted.

Unlike more recent new Charismatic churches, which tend to be less prescriptive, Deeper Life emphasizes personal holiness, as evidenced by rejection of the world and the keeping of a strict ethical code—and in this respect it is more like classical Pentecostal churches and some older African Initiated Churches. Kumuyi's own congregation in Lagos was the largest single congregation in Africa. The church prides itself on being a wholly African church, totally independent of Western links, and here again it differs from other newer Pentecostal churches, many of which regularly promote Western Pentecostal media. It has tended to be exclusive in its approach to other churches, but its more recent involvement in ecumenical organizations has tempered this exclusivism somewhat. It considers itself part of the worldwide Pentecostal movement.

Deeper Life Bible Church
PMB 1004
Yaba, Lagos
Nigeria
<http://www.deeperlifedc.org/index.html> (D.C. congregation)

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Apostolic Faith Mission; Yoido Full Gospel Church.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Marshall, Ruth. "Pentecostalism in Southern Nigeria: An Overview." In New Dimensions in African Christianity, edited by Paul Gifford. Nairobi: All Africa Conference of Churches, 1992.
- Ojo, Matthews A. "Deeper Life Bible Church of Nigeria." In New Dimensions in African Christianity, edited by Paul Gifford. Nairobi: All Africa Conference of Churches, 1992.

Deima Church

The Harrist movement, sparked by the ministry of the Liberian prophet William Wade Harris (1860–1929), resulted in the Harrist Church and many other African churches in the Côte d'Ivoire, including the Church of Boto Adai, the Church of Papa Nouveau, and Crastchotche (originally Christ Church), founded by the Prophet Makoui in 1935. Most significant, as was characteristic of many other African Initiated Churches (AICs), two of these Ivorian movements were founded by women. Marie Lalou, who claimed to be the true successor to Harris, rejected the "foreign gods" of the missionaries (which had caused the return of evil spirits), and founded the Église Déimatiste (Deima Church) in 1942. This movement, which has instituted women as successive leaders since Lalou's death in 1951, has become the second largest AIC in the Ivory Coast.

Another movement separated from Deima after its female founder, Ble Nahi, had claimed to be Marie Lalou's true successor, changing her name to Jesus Onoi. When Ble Nahi died in 1958, however, two male prophets succeeded her. Both movements deriving from Lalou advocate the celibacy of their women leaders; healing and protection by holy water and ashes; and the rejection of fetishes, witchcraft, and the reading (or even the touching) of the Bible, a magical book. Both women founders received visions after a time of illness or extreme trouble, much in the same way that traditional healers are called to their profession. There were many other schisms in the Harrist movement during this time. Most of these churches have certain rituals in common, following the example of Harris. Harris's baptism, his clothes, his ritual accoutrements (the cross, bowl, and rattle), and the use of holy water for healing and protection are liturgical practices common to most of these groups. It appears, however, that traditional meanings have been given to these symbols, probably different from the meanings intended by Harris.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Harrist Church; Witchcraft.

References

- Walker, Sheila S. "The Message as the Medium: The Harrist Churches of the Ivory Coast and Ghana." In African Christianity: Patterns of Religious Continuity, edited by G. Bond, W. Johnson, and S. Walker. New York: Academic Press, 1979.
- Walker, Sheila S. The Religious Revolution in the Ivory Coast: The Prophet Harris and the Harrist Church. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1983.
- Walker, Sheila S. "Women in the Harrist Movement." In The New Religions of Africa, edited by B. Jules-Rosette. Norwood, NJ: Ablex, 1979.

■ Denmark

Denmark exists as a peninsula attached to Germany in the south but jutting northward into the space separating

Stone circles mark Viking graves in Lindholm Høje, Denmark. The Vikings believed in an afterlife and often buried their dead with clothes and valuables for use in the next world. (Corel)

the North Sea from the Baltic Sea. It also includes two main islands and a number of smaller ones to the east of the peninsula, the easternmost being Bornholm. To the northeast lies Sweden. Some 5.5 million people inhabit the 16,638 square miles of territory.

In a prehistoric context, Denmark must be regarded as a part of Northern Europe. We have only scant information about the religions of the first hunter-gatherers and the first agriculturists in the Paleo- and Neolithic, but the latter left behind a large number of megalithic chamber-graves. The Bronze Age (ca. 1800–500 BCE) was dominated by an aristocracy, who in the earlier part of the period were buried in large mounds. Some 20,000 such mounds still exist.

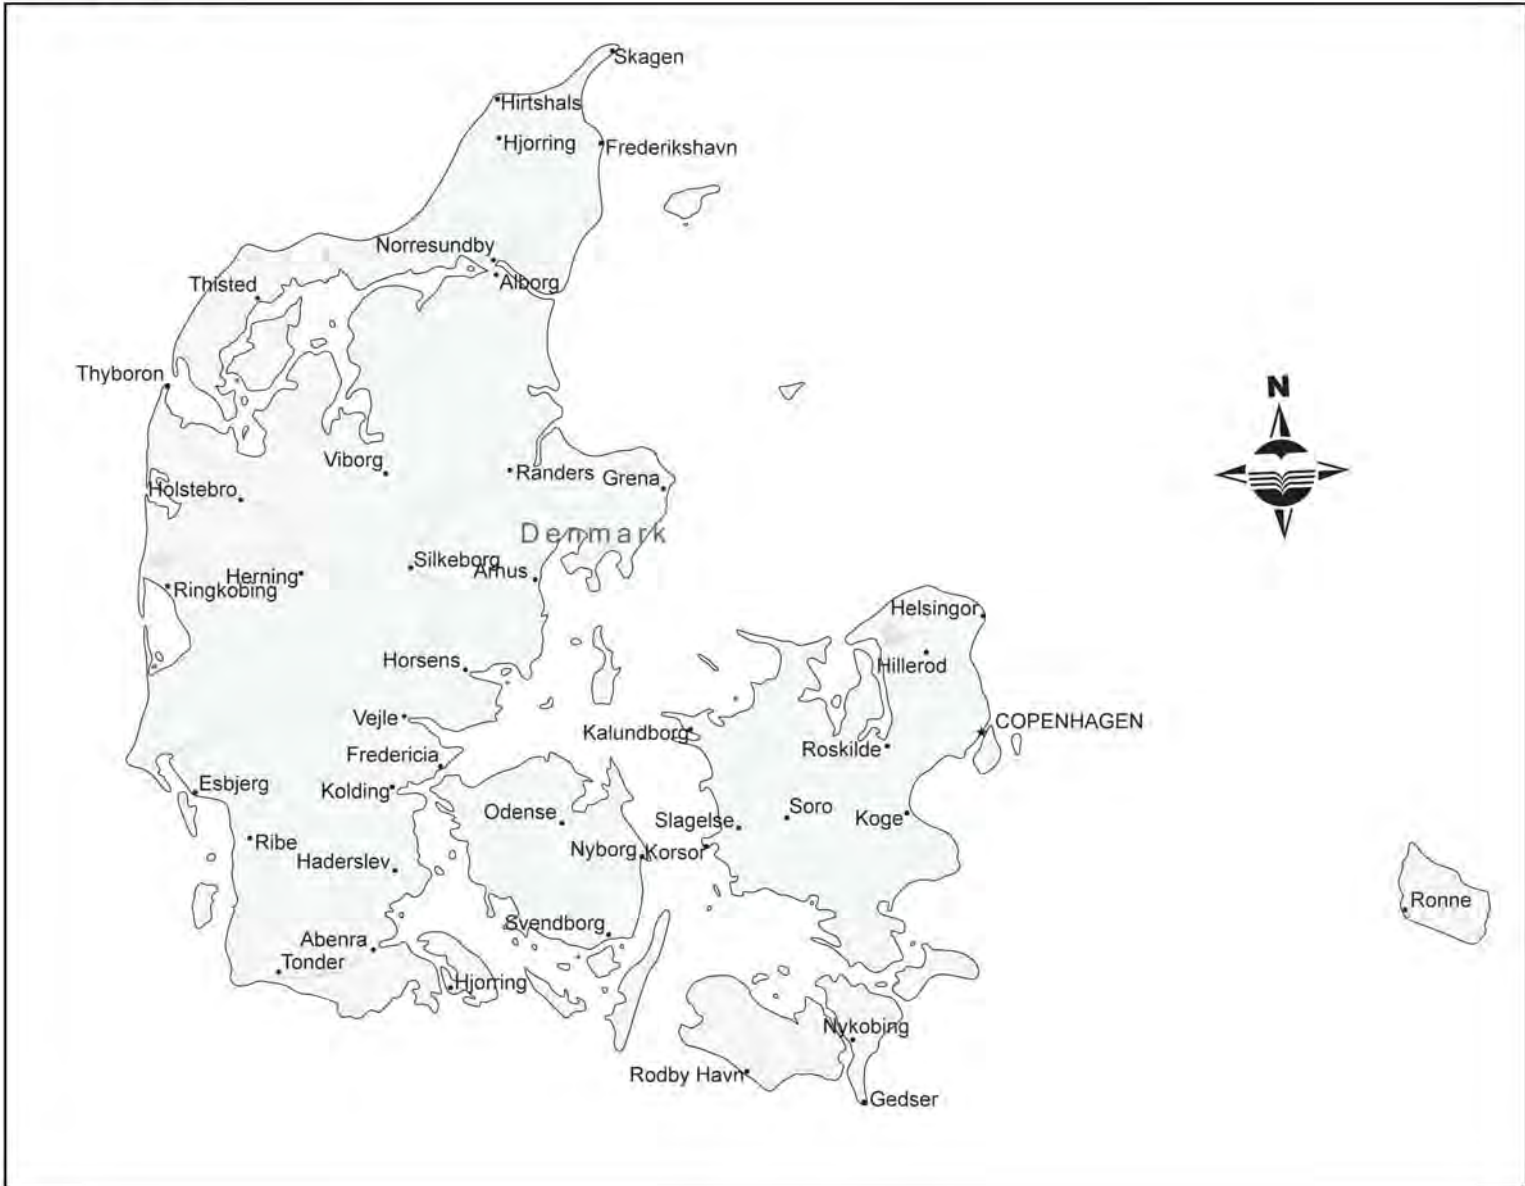

From about the time when iron came to be the main material for tools and weapons (ca. 500 BCE), Scandinavia probably came to be inhabited by Germanic peoples, whose religion was described by the Roman author Tacitus in 98 CE in his book Germania. Tacitus writes that the Germanic peoples believed their ancestor Tuisto was born of the Earth, that he had a son called Mannus (Man), and that Mannus again had three sons, whose names may be reconstructed as Ing, Hermin, and Ist. It is reassuring to find echoes of this mythical information in the mythology of the Vikings, which was preserved in Iceland, but in a language that was spoken all over the Scandinavian area.

The period between Tacitus and the Viking age is characterized by a dearth of sources, but from 793, when Vikings attacked Lindisfarne (off the eastern coast of England; called the Holy Island for its many monasteries) for the first time, more sources become available. Beginning in this period a series of poems, in modern times called the poetic Edda, began to be composed. They describe the mythical world of the Nordic gods, providing our best source for the pre-Christian religion. This is also the time when Christian missions to Denmark began. In 826 the German monk Ansgar preached in Denmark and later in Sweden. Wholesale conversion of the Danes was proclaimed by the Danish king Harald Bluetooth on a runic inscription around 965, but it took a long time before Denmark became a Christian nation with its own archbishop (in 1103). An Icelandic scholar and chieftain called Snorri Sturluson (1179–1241) collected and systematized the mythological poems in 1220. He called his book Edda, and this gave a name to the poems.

Snorri is our prime source for the Nordic mythology, but he may not have had better sources than we

DENMARK

Denmark

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	4,786,000	4,686,000	85.6	−0.03	4,560,000	4,332,000
Protestants	4,764,000	4,495,000	82.1	−0.03	4,375,000	4,135,000
Roman Catholics	27,300	38,500	0.7	1.84	45,000	50,000
Marginals	28,100	36,000	0.7	−0.98	44,000	55,000
Agnostics	96,500	460,000	8.4	2.63	571,000	641,000
Muslims	12,000	220,000	4.0	3.06	320,000	400,000
Atheists	47,000	80,100	1.5	0.26	95,000	113,000
Buddhists	1,000	4,300	0.1	4.41	5,500	8,200
Hindus	0	4,200	0.1	3.58	5,000	7,000
Jews	7,000	6,800	0.1	0.30	6,800	7,000
New religionists	1,000	5,900	0.1	1.88	7,300	9,400
Chinese folk	0	4,000	0.1	4.22	5,000	7,000
Baha'is	1,000	1,400	0.0	3.20	2,000	3,000
Total population	4,929,000	5,473,000	100.0	0.30	5,578,000	5,528,000

do today. The world of the Vikings can best be understood from the point of view of a farm in the woods. In the middle is Midgard, Middle Earth (literally, the fenced-in area in the middle); here live the humans. Around Midgard is Udgard (literally, outside the fence), and this is where giants live. Giants are a constant threat to order. They are associated with frost, wildfire, and wolves—anything that destroys crops or livestock. Around the world is the Ocean where another giant lives, the Midgard serpent, which encircles the world. Above Midgard, and connected to it by the rainbow Bifrost (literally, the shaky road), is Asgard, the realm of the gods called Aesir. There is another race of gods called Vanir. They battled the Aesir once, and in the ensuing exchange of hostages Njord and his offspring Frey (The Lord) and Freya (The Lady) came to live with the Aesir.

Other beings inhabit the universe, collectively called Vættir (Beings). Foremost are the dwarves, who live in big rocks and produce treasures, and the elves, who are something of a mystery. Names of these beings suggest that they are chthonic (associated with the underworld), related maybe to the cult of the ancestors. The gods are numerous. The most important are Thor, Odin, and Frey, who were worshipped in a temple in Uppsala, Sweden, probably as late as 1050. Thor is the god of cosmic order. He is the protagonist of many stories, where he demonstrates great strength and appetite and slays giants in duels. His symbol is his weapon, the hammer Mjollnir (Crusher). As Christianity encroached on the Nordic areas, Thor seems to have gained importance as the prime adversary of Christ, and the hammer symbol appears to have been consciously used as a symbol of opposition to the newfangled customs. Odin is the god of kingship, war, death, mead, poetry, magic, and ecstasy—all of which were perceived as interrelated by the Vikings. He is supposed to be the father of Thor, but they are portrayed as antagonists, just as the great farmers must have been against the warfaring aristocracy. Frey is a god of fertility. His image at Uppsala is said to have had an immense phallus. He was probably thought to unite with Freya, as the Male with the Female, although she is mythically described as his sister.

The religious festivals were tied to a solar calendar. The most important time of the year seems to have been the Vernal Equinox. Every ninth year a major festival was held, in which everybody had to participate or pay a heavy fine. Men, horses, and dogs were killed. The bodies were hung in trees, and the blood was used to stain the altars (and probably the participants). Highly regulated collective eating and drinking were an important part of the festivals, and we hear that a cup of drink was carried around “for Growth and Harmony,” as well as for the gods and the ancestors.

According to an enigmatic poem called “Völuspá” (normally translated as “The Sibyl’s Prophecy”), which describes the creation and decay of the world order, the world will eventually come to an end in a pitched battle between gods and giants. Odin will be swallowed by an enormous wolf, which will then be killed. Thor will kill the Midgard serpent, but die from its poison. Freya will be killed by the fire-giant, and the world will be consumed in flames. It will rise again, though, in a renewed state.

The Christian church's history in Denmark is long and complex. Christianity ruled unchallenged until relatively recently, when secularization, which is very outspoken in Danish society, led to a considerable weakening of the church. Until 1536, when the Lutheran Reformation was adopted as a new theological program in Denmark, church affairs were in the hands of the nobility, who also ruled over the church's property (40 percent of Denmark's land). When the ties to Rome and the pope were cut, the Danish king was installed as the head of the church, a principle that has survived to this day. When the country's first real Constitution was adopted in 1849, legislators decided to design a national church that would encompass almost every citizen, but at the same time ensure freedom of religion. The result was a rather special legal construction, the Peoples' Church (Folkekirken), which, in accordance with the Constitution, is supported by the state.

Today, Denmark remains one of the most ethnically and culturally homogeneous countries in the world. By 2009, some 83 percent of the population (some 5.5 million individuals) were members of the same church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark. During the later decades of the 20th century, the number of members declined, but in recent years the trend has turned, and the church seems to have stabilized its position. It has been observed on more than one occasion that the Scandinavian national churches, in certain ways, have become elements in civil religion structures, and a recent poll (1999) showed that 70 percent of the Danish population support the prevailing constitutional principle of a national church supported by the state. However, only a minority of people in Denmark are devoted Christians, and "belonging without believing" seems to be widespread.

On the other hand, "belief without belonging" is not uncommon in other walks of Danish religious life. Broadly speaking, New Age concepts have gained some influence, and many people hold beliefs in reincarnation, astrology, various kinds of healing, and so on; certainly many individuals without organizational affiliation believe in divine beings of various kinds, Christian and non-Christian. The rare category is the "believers who belong," a fact that points to secularization as a fundamental feature of contemporary Danish society. The pure breed of devoted "belonging believers" is primarily found in isolated parts of the National Church and in religious bodies on the fringes of or completely outside of conventional religion. About 3 percent of the population are engaged in other religious communities and approximately 11 percent reject religion and religious affiliation altogether.

All the world's major religions are represented in Denmark, but only Islam has a substantial following. In 2009, some 250,000 immigrants from Muslim countries (including their offspring) lived in Denmark (currently constituting some 3.4 percent of the entire population), but nobody knows to what degree these individuals consider themselves religious. Islam came to Denmark with imported labor in the 1970s, and now, when new generations are born into Danish society, it seems likely that a local variety of Islam, adapted to Danish ways, will evolve. The vast majority of Muslims follow Sunni Islam, but some groups are part of Shia Islam. Much smaller groups of Hindus and Buddhists have made their way to Denmark during the past two decades, primarily as refugees. These groups number up to 5,000 or 6,000 persons each, depending on how they are counted. In general members of non-Christian religions are able to lead religious lives according to their traditions, but Danish society has not as yet adapted to the reality of multiculturalism. At this point the country still awaits the erection of its first mosque and the inauguration of the first Muslim burial ground. A few Hindu temples exist, but they are remotely situated and by no means integrated into Danish urban life.

As regards new religions, the situation in Denmark seems to be the same as in other Western lands. Many different new groups are represented, but most of them only gain a very small following, and their presence leads to public concern and different kinds of negative reactions. At the same time, though, conflicts between the new religions and society at large seem to have been a less frequent feature in Denmark than in other Western European countries such as Germany and France. Also, as in other countries, the vast majority of people in Denmark express a nonsympathetic attitude toward the new religions if asked, but most are basically uninterested and generally uneducated in the subject. Religious belief and religious affiliation are usually looked upon as an entirely personal affair, which also means that most Danes find missionary work of every kind unacceptable.

Most new or relatively new religions in Denmark remain very small, with an average membership of some 15 to 25 individuals in the inner groups being quite normal. Inner members of all postwar new religions actively operating in Denmark hardly number more than 2,500 individuals, or approximately 0.04 percent of the population. If subpopulations with a more superficial or peripheral attachment to the groups are taken into consideration, the number will obviously increase, but not to a point where one would talk of real success.

The largest of the more recent new religions is the Church of Scientology, which presumably has an inner group membership of approximately 500 individuals, a relatively large figure that probably is due to the fact that the Church's Continental Liaison Office and its facilities for advanced training in the faith for Europe and Africa are situated in Copenhagen. It should be noted that almost every new religion in Denmark is involved in a global or at least Euro-American organizational network, and probably none of them would be able to exist without close global affiliations.

From a legal point of view religious freedom is guaranteed in the Constitution and urged by changing governments. Problems in this respect are due to political right-wing propaganda against Muslims, which has become increasingly more outspoken during recent years, and cult-awareness propaganda against new religions by the country's only organization of that kind, the Dialog Center. Although the former has an impact, it seems that the counterattack on the new religions has largely failed. Religious groups may apply for formal recognition, a status that grants them freedom from taxation and the right to perform legally binding marriages. By 2009 about 100 religious groups had been officially recognized through either the prevailing law (of 1970) or the one that went before.

Mikael Rothstein and Morten Warmind

See also: Church of Scientology; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark; Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Shia Islam.

References

- Davidson, Hilda. Myths and Symbols in Pagan Europe: Early Scandinavian and Celtic Religions. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1989.
- Lausten, Martin Schwarz. Danmarks Kirkehistorie. Kibenhavn: Gyldendal, 1996.
- Rothstein, Michel. "New Religions, State Policy and Anti-Cult Activities. Aspects of the Danish Discussion." In Gudars och gudinnors återkomst. Studier i nyreligiositet, edited by Carl-Gustav Carlsson and Liselotte Frisk. Umea, Sweden: Umea Universitet, 2000.

Department Française d'Action Apostolique

See Paris Mission.

Devotion/Devotional Traditions

The term "devotion" (from Latin devovere, "dedicate by a vow") is often used in the context of religious studies, but rarely defined. It can refer in a wide sense to nearly every form of religious action and/or attitude of individuals. The usage is often restricted to the colloquial meanings of the verb "devote" and its derivatives. In some cases, devotion (to gods and divine beings) is even used as a defining character of religion itself. In this sense, "devotion" encompasses attachment, faithfulness, affection, loyalty, fidelity, and love for beings (including humans) and objects considered as sacred. Thus, objects of devotion may include gods, ancestors, living religious specialists (gurus, spiritual teachers, specially qualified devotees), texts and scriptures, relics, books (such as the Guru Granth Sahib in Sikhism), shrines, pilgrimage sites, and natural objects such as mountains and rivers.

Basilique de Sacre Coeur, a Roman Catholic church dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Paris. (J. Gordon Melton)

In a somewhat narrower sense, “devotional” refers to more or less clearly definable traditions within the major religions that mostly teach an attitude of loving and/or serving attachment to gods, teachers, or sacred objects. Specifically devotional religious traditions include some mystical traditions (Sufism, Christian Mysticism, Hasidism, Kabbalism) and Christian Pietism as well as the Hindu bhakti tradition, which is usually held as a prototypical devotional tradition. In this sense, devotional traditions are differentiated from less devotional ones (non-devotional is nearly unimaginable because of the wider sense of the word) such as rationalist, ritualistic, or intellectualist traditions with reference to typical “devotional” emotional states of passion, affection, ecstasy, and submission.

In primary religious language, “devotion” as well as “piety” (and their respective equivalents or approximations in other languages such as Sanskrit bhakti, Arabic taqwā, ihlās or birr, Russian nabozhnost, German Hingabe, Ergebenheit, Andacht) are often used as highly normative concepts that tend to evaluate the truthfulness and sincerity of an individual’s religious attitude and practice. Thus, nearly every form of religious practice (prayers, pilgrimage, worship, meditation, ascetic practices, charitable acts) can be taken as means to live and/or display one’s devotion. Strongly devoted individuals, on the one hand, can themselves become objects of devotion as ideal devotees. On the other hand, an individual’s religious practices can be rejected as “fake” because of a lack of devotion, if they are deemed not to be performed with the right devotional attitude. Highly rationalized, often so-called orthodox traditions tend to reject devotionalism and its emotionalized religious practices generally as mere displays that distract the follower from the religious purposes, and therefore as heretical.

Empirically, devotional attitudes and practices can be found in different types of religious texts. Devotional literature includes prose texts, dialogues of teachers and their disciples, poetry, prayers, hymns and songs, but also directions for correct behavior and practice. The latter can take the form of ritual manuals, or of biographies of model devotees and saints, regulations for general devotional practice as well as descriptions of and prescriptions for dealing with specific objects of devotion. Awakening an individual’s devotion is the positive aim of a number of religious texts, ritual prescriptions, and teachings of spiritual masters. It is crucial to take the strong normative character of such texts (as of all religious texts) into account when dealing with descriptions of and prescriptions for devotional experiences. Most religious traditions also possess an (often implicit) canon of actions and attitudes that are considered to be particularly devotional.

In the history of Catholicism, the term “devotion” plays a role in the so-called devotio moderna, which in late medieval and early modern German and Dutch Catholicism refers to a reform movement of the 15th century that tended to further individual experience of God. The roots of this movement go back to medieval Christian mysticism. This movement can be regarded as influential on later currents that preferred individual experiences of and a personal relationship with God and Christ to mere worship and submission under the Church. This tendency was further enhanced by (German) Pietism with its worldwide impact through mission, although the movement was subject to severe criticism from orthodox Christians for subjectivism and enthusiasm. Furthermore, Christian (especially Catholic) devotionism is connected to the Christian mystical traditions and to the cult of saints. A recent kind of devotion developed in the evangelical and Pentecostal traditions with often highly emotionalized worship and a tendency to explicit declarations of devotion to Jesus Christ. The recent developments in Christian devotionism seem to reflect the growing importance of individual religiosity in the religious discourses of the 19th and 20th centuries.

In Indian religious history, the notion of devotion is inseparably connected to the Hindu bhakti (Sanskrit: “participation, loving devotion”) traditions that came to a first height in South India in the fourth to ninth centuries. Later on, it moved north to western and northern India, where it significantly helped to shape religious and secular literatures from the 13th and 14th centuries on. Most renowned are the Vaishnava traditions that worship the gods Rama and Krishna. Among them, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) has spread Indian devotionism globally. However, there are also elaborated Shaiva traditions of bhakti devoted to either Shiva himself or to Ganesha, as well as traditions worshipping a formless (nirguna) deity. In the various bhakti traditions, there exist diverse modes of devotional practice ranging from worshipping the names of god by chanting mantras to elaborate modes of service to both temple and private-altar deities. The widely fanned Bengali Vaishnava currents with their elaborate textual traditions of ritual texts distinguish inborn (rāgānugā) from trained, rule-bound (vaidhi) bhakti on the basis of differing emotional states (bhāva, rasa). The latter are further metaphorically categorized into different kinds of devotional relations to the respective god, such as a relation of younger and elder brother, of lover and beloved, of child and mother, or of servant and master.

Although the impact of bhakti movements on early modern Islam and Sufism in India is rather evident, it remains unclear to what extent Hindu devotionism influenced developments of mystical Islam beyond the South Asian subcontinent. However, devotionism in Islam is not restricted to Sufism with its mystical traditions of devotion to Allah, to the Prophet, or to Sufi saints. In fact, the name of the religion itself (islām) comes rather close to the meaning of devotion, specifically including submission or surrender to the will of God. Moreover, concepts like birr (piety, righteousness, goodness) or taqwā (piety, godliness) point to the normative notion of sincerity in one’s belief and religious practice.

Frank Neubert

See also: Evangelicalism; Hasidism; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Saints; Sufism; Yoga.

References

- Dan, Joseph, ed. The Heart and the Fountain. An Anthology of Jewish Mystical Experiences. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Geertz, Clifford. Islam Observed. Current Developments in Morocco and Indonesia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971.
- Kingsley, David, and Vasudha Narayanan. Encyclopedia of Religion. 2nd ed., 2005, vol. 4, pp. 2316–2322.
- Lopez, Donald S. ed. Religions of India in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- O’Toole, James M., ed. Habits of Devotion. Catholic Religious Practice in Twentieth-century America. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2004.
- Renard, John. Knowledge of God in Classical Sufism: Foundations of Islamic Mystical Theology. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 2004.
- Sells, Michael A. Early Islamic Mysticism: Sufi, Qur’an, Miraj, Poetic and Theological Writings. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1996.
- Umansky, Ellen M., and Diane Ashton. Four Centuries of Jewish Women’s Spirituality. A Sourcebook. Lebanon: University Press of New England, 2009.
- Werner, Karel, ed. Love Divine. Studies in Bhakti and Devotional Mysticism. Richmond: Curzon Press, 1993.

Dhammakaya Foundation

The Dhammakaya Foundation was established on February 20, 1970, in Wat Phra Dhammakaya, a famous Buddhist monastery near Bangkok, Thailand, by a group of leading disciples of the late Venerable Mongkol Thepmuni (Luang Phoh Sod, 1884–1959), the abbot of Wat Pak Nam in Bangkok. The Dhammakaya Foundation was originally known as the Dhammaprasithi Foundation, derived from the name of Grandma Upasika Jan Khon-nok-yoong (b. 1909), its leading founder and the earliest meditation teacher in the lineage of Luang Phoh Sod.

Dhammakaya means the dhammic element leading to enlightenment and the end of suffering. Luang Phoh Sod, the originator and the great master of the Dhammakaya tradition, teaches that Dhammakaya is the Buddha and the achievement of the Dhammakaya knowledge is to see the Buddha in oneself. The Dhammakaya practice requires a pure untainted mind, suitable for keeping all virtues. Its meditation technique requires a concentration on the phrase “Samma Arahham” (perfect attainer) until one has the vision of dhammakaya. According to the Dhammakaya teaching, seeing the dhammakaya within oneself is the attainment of nirvana (Sanskrit: extinction, freedom; in Pali, nibbana), and the Buddha, together with his holy disciples, still exists somewhere in the universe. The teaching is quite controversial among Buddhists in contemporary Thailand, and thus the Dhammakaya practice has fostered a new Buddhist movement critically confronting the Thai government, which directly supports the Thai Buddhist establishment. In 1999 the Dhammakaya Foundation was charged with distorting the Buddha’s teaching of nirvana and misusing donations.

The president of the Dhammakaya Foundation is the Venerable Dhammajayo Bhikkhu (b. 1944), who is now venerated with the monastic rank as Phra Rajabhavana-visudhi, the former abbot of Wat Phra Dhammakaya. The vice president is the Venerable Dattajeevo Bhikkhu (b. 1941), the acting abbot and former vice abbot. Both are Upasika Jan’s leading meditation students. The remaining 11 administrative members of the foundation are lay attendants who faithfully follow the Dhammakaya tradition.

The pioneering work of the Dhammakaya Foundation has addressed the spiritual needs of modern society by using novel combinations of old and new. Modern technology has been applied to present traditional teachings in a way that attempts to respond to the needs and expectations of those in contemporary society. Modern administrative practices that have a scope much broader than is usually possible for traditional temples have been applied to the traditional charitable framework of temples and monastic communities alike.

Novice Buddhist monks pray during ceremonies Feb. 6, 2010, at Wat Phra Dhammakaya on the outskirts of Bangkok, Thailand, in what organizers called the world’s largest mass ordination ceremony involving 100,000 males from all of Thailand. (AP/Wide World Images)

The objects and purposes of the Dhammakaya Foundation are to promote social harmony through the practice of meditation and to promote in world society a culture of virtue and morality for all, irrespective of gender, race, language, or religion and belief. The Foundation works (1) to provide the facilities for the teaching of meditation and the study of the culture that underlies world peace; (2) to create virtue in society by instilling morality, with special emphasis on the younger generation; (3) to promote the recognition and praise of those of exceptional virtue in society; (4) to produce materials in print and other media to promote peace, social harmony, virtue, and morality; and (5) to provide humanitarian services.

The Dhammakaya Foundation provides facilities to allow individual meditators to learn how to practice in some degree of convenience, even though the number of meditators and observers may reach 200,000 people at one time. The Foundation supports the establishment of the World Dhammakaya Centre (WDC), on its present 800-acre site, comprising the Great Sabha Dhammakaya Assembly Hall (which it claims is the largest spiritual assembly hall in the world), the Phra Mongkolthepmuni Vihara (Luang Phoh Sod Monument), and the Maha Dhammakaya Cetiya (which the Foundation describes as the peace-dome stupa for the third millennium).

Resident in the temple community in 2008 were approximately 800 monks, 300 novices, 150 laymen, and 500 laywomen; whenever the Dhammakaya Foundation holds a grand event, such as the Vesakh Celebration and the Annual Merit Making, the number of participants may reach approximately 300,000 people. Apart from meditation training and ordination of Buddhist novices, aimed especially at young Thais, the Dhammakaya Foundation also works internationally. For example, in 1994, it provided computerized scriptures and a Buddha image to the Burmese monastic community in Rangoon, Myanmar. Since August 1984, it has become the United Nations accredited non-governmental organization (NGO) associated with the Department of Public Information (DP) and has since sent delegates to the Annual DP/NGO Conference of the United Nations. It propagates its teachings and other information through the Internet and its 50 centers around the world. In 1986, the Dhammakaya Foundation was accepted as a member of the World Fellowship of Buddhists and World Fellowship of Buddhist Youth.

Dhammakaya Foundation
Wat Phra Dhammakaya
23/2, District 7, Klong Sam
Klong Luang, Pathum Dhani
Thailand
<http://dhammakaya.or.th>

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

See also: Meditation.

References

- Dhammakaya Foundation. World Peace through Inner Peace. Bangkok: Dokbia Publishing, 1999.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. "The Dhammakaya Foundation." WFB Journal (Thai Edition) 192 (November–December 1994): 28–32.
- Swearer, Donald K. The Buddhist World of Southeast Asia. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Dharma Drum Mountain Association, The

The Dharma Drum Mountain Association (Fakushan Association) is a religious, educational, and cultural organization based in Taiwan and New York, with 5 affiliates elsewhere in Australasia, 6 in Europe, 2 in Canada, and more than 30 in the United States. It was formed in 1996 as the result of a merger between two other organizations: the Chung-Hwa Institute of Buddhist Culture, a Chan Meditation Center set up in 1979 in New York to teach meditation to interested Americans, and the International Cultural and Educational Fakushan Foundation, established in 1989 in Taiwan. Both institutions result from the initiatives of Sheng Yen, a monk-scholar born in the Chinese Province of Jiangsu who divides his time between New York and the various branches of Fakushan in Taiwan. Although Sheng Yen does not elicit on the island mass appeal like his colleagues Hsing Yun, the creator of Foguangshan, or Cheng Yen, the founder of Tzu Chi, he is nonetheless a highly regarded spiritual leader in Buddhist circles. The Fakushan Association ranks as one of the 3 major Buddhist organizations in Taiwan, although, with a membership estimated at 400,000 members, it does not reach the scale of Foguangshan and Tzu Chi. While the latter two own branches throughout the island, the activities of Fagushan remain concentrated in the northern part.

The vitality of Fakushan, like other Buddhist organizations on the island, cannot rely solely on its small core community of about 100 monks and nuns residing in Taiwan and New York State, and must depend on the activities of lay members. In that particular respect, the practice and the teachings of Sheng Yen, like those of Hsing Yun, the founder of Fokuangshan, also relate to the pre-eminence of humanistic Buddhism (renjian fojiao) in Taiwan. Sheng Yen himself can claim a close bond to the founder of that trend, having studied at a seminary established by the famous reformist monk Tai Hsu in Shanghai. Although Fakushan organizes fundraising campaigns and participates in social and charitable activities in cooperation with the government and other associations in Taiwan, its involvement in that area does not compare to that of Tzu Chi. Fakushan, like Foguangshan, is primarily dedicated to the spread of the dharma through education. The distinctive contribution of Fakushan to Taiwanese Buddhism resides in the particular emphasis that Sheng Yen puts on consciousness-raising about the environment, and in the organization of Chan retreats in the United States.

To achieve its educational goals, Sheng Yen has taught over the years as many as 25,000 people about meditation and Buddhism. Sheng Yen himself is a Buddhist scholar who has written and published more than 50 books, in Chinese and other languages, to introduce the public to Chan Buddhism, and he has participated in international Buddhist symposiums. To sustain these activities, Sheng Yen founded the Chung-hwa Institute of Buddhist studies north of Taipei, a Chan meditation center, a retreat center, and a publishing house in New York. The organization had plans to build a Dharma Drum University that could offer to more than 3,500 students a curriculum on humanities and social sciences, but in the end, it had to rechannel its energies into the creation of the Dharma Drum Sangha University, a center for the training of monks and nuns.

The International Cultural and Educational Foundation of Dharma Drum Mountain
14-5, Ling Bon Ling
San Chieh Village
Taipei County
Taiwan, ROC

The Dharma Drum Mountain Buddhist Association
90-56 Corona Ave.
Elmhurst, NY 11373.

André Laliberté

See also: Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, The; Foguangshan; Meditation; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Crook, John H. "The Place of Ch'an in Post-Modern Europe." Chung-hua Buddhist Journal 13, no. 2 (May 2000): 549–584.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

Diamond Sangha

The Diamond Sangha is an international Zen Buddhist organization that has been significant in spreading Zen Buddhism outside Japan.

It was founded in 1959 by an American, Robert Aitken (b. 1917), one of the fathers of Western Zen. Aitken first became interested in Zen Buddhism when he was interned in a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp in Japan with R. H. Blyth, a scholar and well-known translator of Japanese poetry. Aitken began practicing Zen Buddhism in California in 1948 with a Japanese teacher, Sensaki Nyogen Sensei (1876–1958). Aitken continued his Zen training in Japan and Hawaii, studying with other Japanese Zen masters, including Nakagawa Soen Roshi (1907–1984). Soen gave Aitken permission to establish a Zen group in the United States where Soen could lead annual sesshins (meditation retreats) for American practitioners, so in 1959, Aitken and his wife, Anne Aitken (1911–1994), founded the Diamond Sangha in Hawaii.

Interior of dojo at Honolulu Diamond Sangha, a Zen Buddhist community in Hawaii. (Honolulu Diamond Sangha)

Aitken continued his Zen practice under the tutelage of Zen master Yasutani Hakuun Ryoko Roshi (1885–1973), the leader of a school of Japanese Zen Buddhism called the Sanbo Kyodan (Fellowship of the Three Treasures). In 1962 Yasutani began periodic visits to Hawaii to guide the Diamond Sangha members in Zen practice, and his successor, Yamada Koun Zenshin Roshi (1907–1989), visited the Diamond Sangha annually in the 1970s and early 1980s. In 1974 Yamada authorized Aitken as a Zen master in the Sanbo Kyodan lineage. In 1983 Yamada gave Aitken an additional qualification, that of shoshike (correctly qualified teacher), which gave Aitken the authority to teach independently of the Sanbo Kyodan lineage. The Diamond Sangha separated from the Sanbo Kyodan and became an independent lineage with headquarters in Hawaii and Aitken as its leader.

Diamond Sangha groups were then founded in other American states as well as in Argentina, Australia, New Zealand, Germany, and Switzerland. Aitken has maintained the Sanbo Kyodan system for appointment of teachers. The first appointment is as an assistant teacher, then as a Zen master, or roshi. Zen masters in the Diamond Sangha have full autonomy, as denpo (dharma succession) qualifications are included in the qualification as a Zen master. In 1999 John Tarrant Roshi, leader of the California Diamond Sangha, exercised his right to autonomy and founded an independent lineage called the Pacific Zen Institute.

The Diamond Sangha engages in practices similar to those of the Sanbo Kyodan; the vast majority of Diamond Sangha practitioners practice the Rinzai Zen meditation method of koan practice. Zen Buddhism claims to differ from other Buddhist traditions through its emphasis on zazen, or seated meditation. Because of this emphasis, the majority of Diamond Sangha activities are designed to provide opportunities for practice of zazen. Most groups provide group zazen periods of different lengths, such as two-hour zazen periods in the evening, half or full-day periods of Zen practice on weekends, and weeklong sesshins. A few groups also offer residential training programs of two to four weeks' duration. Dokusan is a private meeting of the student and the assistant teacher or Zen master that occurs in the teacher's room. This provides regular contact with a teacher and is particularly important for students undertaking koan practice.

The Diamond Sangha differs in several ways from many Japanese Zen Buddhist organizations and some Western Zen Buddhist groups. The Diamond Sangha is a lay practice with lay teachers (a tradition that originated in the Sanbo Kyodan). None of the teachers are Buddhist priests, monks, or nuns, although, paradoxically, some are in other religious traditions. A number of Diamond Sangha teachers are also qualified psychologists or psychotherapists, and psychological and psychotherapeutic techniques are being utilized in Zen practice.

The Diamond Sangha is well known for its emphasis on consensus and ethics. Aitken has written books on the relationship between Zen practice and ethics. Robert Aitken, Anne Aitken, and Nelson Foster Roshi (a Zen master in the Diamond Sangha) were among those who created the Buddhist Peace Fellowship as part of the Diamond Sangha in 1979. Teachers from other Buddhist traditions, including Gary Snyder, Joanna Macy, and Jack Kornfield, soon joined them.

Due to Aitken's emphasis on consensual decision-making processes, the Diamond Sangha ceased to be a hierarchical organization with headquarters and became an international network of affiliated Zen Buddhist centers. The Diamond Sangha has a charter of common ground to which all affiliated groups must agree, but each group is independent beyond the requirements imposed by this document. Formal discussion about organizational issues occurs between teachers at the annual Teachers' Circle. Most Diamond Sangha groups obtain the majority of their funds from membership fees. The percentage of male and female members is approximately equal, and members are mostly middle-class professionals or young people entering university, and Anglo-Saxon in background. Most would not classify themselves as Buddhists, and those that would are almost entirely converts to Buddhism.

There are now more than 40 assistant teachers and roshis in the Diamond Sangha network. At least 20 groups are formally affiliated with the Diamond Sangha, located in the United States, Australia, Germany, New Zealand, and Switzerland. Total membership is approximately 3,000.

Diamond Sangha
c/o Honolulu Diamond Sangha
2747 Waiomao Road
Honolulu, HI 96816

Michelle Barker

See also: Meditation; Rinzaï (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam); Sanbo Kyodan; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Aitken, Robert. Encouraging Words: Zen Buddhist Teachings for Western Students. New York: Pantheon, 1994.
- Aitken, Robert. The Practice of Perfection: The Paramitas from a Zen Buddhist Perspective. Berkeley, CA: Counterpoint Press, 1997.
- Aitken, Robert. Taking the Path of Zen. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1982.
- Ciolek, T. Mathew. "Harada-Yasutani School of Zen Buddhism." <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVL/Pages/ZenPages/HaradaYasutani.html>. Accessed March 15, 2009.

Diamond Way Buddhism

The Diamond Way organization is a Western lineage of the Karma-Kagyupa (Tibetan: Karma bKa' brgyud) Subschool of Tibetan Buddhism. Its rise and development offer an illustration of the way the Tibetan tradition of Mahayana Buddhism has settled in the West. Since the early 1970s, the Kagyu-oriented groups have settled and spread in Europe and the United States more quickly than any other school of Tibetan Buddhism. Unlike the Gelugpa, the Kagyupa had lost any significant role in Tibet's politics at the time of the Chinese invasion and annexation of the country (1950–1959). As a result, they favored a strategy of cultural and religious preservation by expanding in new areas. The 16th Gyalwang Karmapa (head of Karma-Kagyupa

Lama Ole Nydahl, founder of Diamond Way Buddhism. (Diamond Way Buddhism Network)

Buddhism) and Rangjung Rigpe Dorjé (rGyal ba Rang byung Rig pa'i rDo rje, 1924–1981), head of the Karma-Kagyü lineage, soon realized that the appeal of Buddhism in the late 1960s among Westerners presented an opportunity to spread the dharma (the Buddhist doctrine) outside Asia. Three decades later, along with the expansion of the other subschools of the Kagyü lineage, the Karma-Kagyü branch has emerged as one of the major worldwide Tibetan networks.

The Diamond Way organization exemplifies a process of Westernization of Buddhism. It was founded in 1972 in Copenhagen, Denmark, by Danish-born Ole Nydahl (b. 1941) and his wife Hannah (1946–2007). They were the first Western followers of Rangjung Rigpe Dorjé. The Nydahls' commitment to Buddhism began during their travels in Asia, where they met Tibetan lamas in Nepal in the early 1960s, just before this country became one of the favorite destinations of Western spiritual seekers. Like other Western Buddhist masters, Ole Nydahl sought to make Buddhist methods acceptable and available in the West. In so doing, he proved to be a talented translator of the teachings and a prolific author, as well as an unflagging traveling instructor. From the early 1970s on, he founded almost 600 centers around the world (270 in the early 2000s), paving the way for the quick and massive settlement of a “white” Buddhism in Eastern Europe and Russia (in the mid-1980s), and nowadays, a meta-cultural universal Buddhism worldwide.

Despite the lay and Western emphasis upon transmission and training promoted by Nydahl, the Diamond Way organization maintains intense genealogical, doctrinal, and organic bonds with the Karma-Kagyü monastic assembly. The Diamond Way is indeed a literal translation of the traditional label of the Tibetan tradition of Buddhism: vajrayāna, from the Sanskrit words vajra, “diamond” or “thunder” (Tibetan: rdo rje) and yāna, “path.” Although Ole Nydahl was not fully ordained as a monk, he is called “lama,” and as a lay teacher and leader, he remains faithful to the traditional teachings of the Kagyupa's doctrine and practices. Nydahl's attempts to demonstrate the superiority of Buddhism over other religions, as well as his polemics against other Buddhist traditions, have generated considerable criticism, and he lately switched toward a more moderate and tolerant attitude.

In the mid-1990s the recognition of two successors at the head of the Karma-Kagyü lineage brought to light an internal dispute concerning the traditional patterns of spiritual authority. Ugyen Trinley (or Orgyan Phrin las) (b. 1985) was first enthroned in Tibet (Tsurphu, 1992), and is now established in France. Ugyen's Asian headquarters is in Rumtek, near Gangtok, Sikkim, India. Nydahl actively supports Ugyen's challenger, Thaye Dorjé (or mThah yas rDo rje) (b. 1983), who fled from Tibet in 1994 and is now established in New Delhi. Thaye Dorjé may be contacted through the Karmapa International Buddhist Institute (KIBI) New Delhi, B 19–20 Institutional Area, Mehrauli, New Delhi, 110016 India. Thaye followers have a website at <http://www.karmapa.org>. He is considered by the Diamond Way organization as the authentic 17th Karmapa.

Nydahl's official website is at <http://www.lama-ole-nydahl.org> and is linked to the Diamond Way organization website (where a directory of centers is located).

Diamond Way Buddhism
Europe Center
Hochreute 1
D-87509 Immenstadt
Germany
<http://www.diamondway-buddhism.org/>

Lionel Obadia

See also: Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Mahayana Buddhism.

References

- Batchelor, Stephen. The Awakening of the West. The Encounter of Buddhism and Western Culture. Berkeley, CA: Parallax Press, 1994.
- Nydahl, Lama Ole. Entering the Diamond Way, Tibetan Buddhism Meets the West. Nevada City, CA: Blue Dolphin, 1985, 1999.
- Nydahl, Lama Ole. Riding the Tiger. Nevada City, CA: Blue Dolphin, 1992.

Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council

The Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council is an ecumenical body serving the sister churches of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Through the 20th century, as one element of the Restoration Movement traced to Barton Stone (1772–1844), Alexander Campbell (1788–1866), and their colleagues, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), based in the United States, sponsored missionaries and nurtured the development of the movement around the world. It was joined in its activities by sister churches in the United Kingdom, Australia, and other Western nations. After World War II, most of the former mission churches became independent denominations in their own country and some of the sister churches in the Western world joined in ecumenical efforts that resulted in united churches.

In the 1970s, Disciples expressed an interest in creating a deeper relationship among the members in the many churches spawned by the movement and those disciples who had joined in various united churches. An initial meeting, held at the same time as the World Council of Churches' meeting in Nairobi, Kenya, in 1975 resulted in the formation of the Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council. The Council sponsored a first international conference in 1979 in Kingston, Jamaica. Members from 12 countries attended.

The Council, given the strong commitment to a congregational polity among Disciples, is primarily for fellowship and is a visible sign of the movement's unity. It does not legislate for member churches. It has, however, found a vital role in keeping member churches informed of intellectual, moral, and spiritual currents of the larger ecumenical movement and has become a vehicle for expressing the concerns of Disciples within the ecumenical world. It has facilitated formal dialogues with Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Eastern Orthodox, and Reformed churches.

As of 2005, the council has 19 member churches participating from around the world.

Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council
130 E. Washington Street

PO Box 1986
Indianapolis, IN 46206-1986

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ).

References

- Foster, Douglas A., Paul M. Bowers, Anthony L. Dunnavant, and D. Newell Williams, eds. The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Divine Life Society

A trend in universalizing principles emerged in Hindu India early in the 20th century. The Divine Life Society is one of a number of organizations that promote a spiritual life, drawing upon insights from all the world religions' great teachers while framed in Hindu terms. The practice of meditation and yoga is central to Divine Life teachings. Belonging to the Divine Life Society does not preclude one from following the teachings and practices of other religious traditions.

The Divine Life Society is a religious organization whose philosophy and ritual practice are rooted in Hinduism's bhakti (devotional) and yogic traditions. Devotees refer to their faith as a practical form of spirituality promulgated through a nonsectarian, service-oriented, syncretistic set of beliefs in the teachings of prophets from divergent faiths (Zoroaster, Parsvanatha, Moses, the Buddha, Mahavira, Jesus, Muhammad, Guru Nanak), saints (Saint Francis of Assisi, Sri Aurobindo, the Baal Shem Tov, Mahatma Gandhi), and acharyas (Ramanujacharya, Chaitanya). Nevertheless, the primary source of their philosophical outlook is based on the work of the group's founder, Sivananda Saraswati Maharaj (1887–1963), and his disciples, who form a group of spiritual leaders that now run the organization. These teachings are focused on what Sivananda called the “science of seven cultures” (health, energy, ethical, heart, will, psychic, spiritual). In order to promote these cultures, the Divine Life Society sponsors conferences and seminars in yoga and meditation, and it is affiliated with temple communities in many countries around the world, particularly those with a significant population of people of Indian origin (South Africa, Trinidad and Tobago, Canada, Mauritius). Its headquarters is near Rishikesh, a sacred site high in the Himalayas where the Ganges River begins.

The founder, Sivananda, started life as Kuppuswami Iyer in the village of Pattamadai in Tamil Nadu. He was given a Western-style education and eventually became a medical doctor. While serving as a doctor for Indian plantation laborers in British Malaya from 1913 to 1923, Kuppuswami was exposed to the religious philosophies of many different faith traditions. He yearned for a more spiritual life for himself and thus returned to India to visit its holy places. While in Rishikesh he studied at the feet of Sri Swami Visvananda Saraswati, who renamed him after he had taken the vows of a sannyasin (follower of the renounced life). Sivananda now lived a monk's life of austerity and wandered from one end of India to the other. Eventually he returned to Rishikesh, where he established an ashram and dispensed medical services (practicing both Western medicine and Ayurveda, the traditional Hindu science of health) to those in need. It was here in a small kutir (hut) on the banks of the Ganga River that Sivananda established the Divine Life Society in 1936.

It is difficult to assess the number of people who subscribe to Divine Life precepts, although finding the locations of Divine Life Society chapters is relatively easy. Toward the end of his life, Swami Sivananda commissioned several of his students to go into the world and establish yoga centers in the Divine Life Society tradition. As a result Swami Vishnu Devananda (1927–1993) moved to Quebec and founded an international network of Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers across North America; Swami Satchidananda (b. 1914) moved to the United States and founded Integral Yoga International; and Swami Sahajananda began work in South Africa. Other international networks inspired by Sivananda include the International Yoga Fellowship Movement, and the Yasodhara Ashram Society. In the meantime, the Divine Life Society has itself opened work around the world and has centers in more than 15 countries.

Swami Chidanandaji of the Divine Life Society garlanding Lord Siva. (The Divine Life Society)

Swami Sivananda was succeeded by Swami Chidananda (b. 1916).

Divine Life Society
PO Shivanandanagar 249 192
District Tehri-Garhwal
Uttaranchal, Himalayas
India

<http://www.divinelifesociety.org>

<http://www.sivanandadlshq.org>

<http://www.swami-krishnananda.org>

Carolyn V. Prorok and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Integral Yoga International; International Yoga Fellowship Movement; Rishikesh; Yoga.

References

Ananthanarayanan, N. From Man to God-Man: The Inspiring Life-Story of Swami Sivananda. New Delhi: DLS, 1970.

Maharaj, S. S. V., ed. Sivananda: Biography of a Modern Sage. Freemantle, Western Australia: Divine Life Society, 1985.

Narayana, Guru. Life Divine and Spiritual Values. Bangalore: Swami Sivananda Spiritual Centre, 1977.

Sivananda, Swami. The Practice of Karma Yoga. India: Divine Life Society, 2004.

Divine Science Federation International/United Divine Science Ministries International

Divine Science began as an organized movement on May 4, 1888, when the original school was incorporated in San Francisco. Significant founders include Malinda E. Cramer (1844–1906) in San Francisco (1888); Nona Brooks (1861–1945) and her two sisters, Fannie B. James and Alethea Brooks Small, in Colorado (1889); and Herman H. Schroeder, who lived and worked in the German American community in St. Louis (1892). San Francisco became one of the leading centers of early New Thought under Cramer's leadership. In 1892, Cramer established the International Divine Science Association as a loose coalition of many early New Thought leaders and centers.

The Home College of Divine Science in San Francisco served as the early headquarters of Divine Science, although local groups have always been autonomous, as they remain to this day. Cramer edited and published Harmony, a monthly magazine that began in October 1888 and continued through April 1906. The San Francisco facility was destroyed in the earthquake of 1906, after which Denver became the focal point of the movement.

Various efforts were made to create a new central organization. In 1957, several churches held a conference in Denver and founded the Divine Science Federation International (DSFI), with Irwin Gregg as its first president. The Federation office was established in Denver in 1957 and remained there until 1997, when it was moved to St. Louis. It continues in the St. Louis area. William Freeman is the current president. A new, independent alliance of Divine Science ministries began in the late 1990s, in San Antonio, Texas. It is known as the United Divine Science Ministries International. Anne Kunath, its founder, retired in 2007. Its headquarters is now in Largo, Maryland, with Christopher Bazemore as its current leader.

Divine Science teaches the Omnipresence of God, and affirms that each individual has access to all the potential of God through his or her own consciousness. On this basis, Divine Science works to heal the sick in mind and body through affirmative prayer. It is a direct approach to God, which affirms the essential goodness of humanity as God's idea. Through a close attunement with the Divine Presence, individuals overcome the appearances of sin, disease, lack, and alienation from God, humanity, and the cosmos, and live an abundant life here and now. Divine Science maintains that this teaching reflects Jesus' true purpose, and thus lays its claim to be a Christian movement.

In recent years, there has been an increased emphasis on humanity's metaphysical connection not only with the Divine Presence, but also with all people everywhere, and with the natural world. Divine Science's commitment to individual illumination and healing is as strong as it has ever been. The results of expanded consciousness, however, are being more fully understood in terms of planetary healing.

Worship practices differ among churches and centers. There is no required format, but most services include a sermon (often called a lesson), prayer and meditation, and hymn singing. In Communion services, some churches use the traditional bread and wine, but others use candles, and still others use no tangible objects at all.

The individual, when in touch with the Divine Presence, is the supreme authority in Divine Science. The Bible is revered as a sacred text, but is not considered infallible. Doctrinal texts include Divine Science and Healing and Divine Science: Its Principle and Practice. There have been no doctrinal controversies within the movement, but there have been key controversies on organization and educational policy.

Divine Science began in the United States, but has students on six continents. The Center for Creative Thought in Durban, Republic of South Africa, is currently the largest Divine Science ministry outside the United States. Even though Divine Science seeks to spread its message, it does not send out missionaries. Nevertheless, it is rapidly becoming more widely known through a proliferation of websites.

The movement has never emphasized membership, and it is impossible to determine the number of adherents with any confidence. It is likely that there are fewer than 5,000 members worldwide. Yet it has had a wider influence than its numbers indicate, through popular Divine Science authors such as Emmet Fox, Joseph Murphy, and William Parker.

It is difficult to evaluate Divine Science's recent progress as an organized movement. Through the last half of the 20th century, the movement experienced a slow decline. There are, however, some new churches, including the Church of the Infinite Presence in Oklahoma City, and the Church of the Holy Spirit in Largo, Maryland.

There are currently two central headquarters, whose addresses are given below. A positive development is that leaders of the two headquarters, and of the three Divine Science schools, have enjoyed amicable contacts within the higher echelons of the movement since 2006. All three schools are now represented on the Board of Review, a quasi-judicial body within the Divine Science Federation; and this group held several conference calls during 2008. The Divine Science Ministers Association, which is open to members of both federations, is headed by its president, Will Mercer.

Students may enroll in ministerial programs in one of three schools: Brooks Center for Spirituality in Denver (which began as the Colorado College of Divine Science, with a charter dating to 1898); the Divine Science School in Washington, D.C.; and the United Divine Science Ministerial School in Largo, Maryland.

Two local churches, in their organizations dating back to the 19th century, are notable sites of the movement. Both have the corporate name of First Divine Science Church in their own cities, one being located in St. Louis (dating from 1892, the current building from 1916), and the other in Denver (dating from 1898, the current building from 1921). The church in St. Louis, however, now uses the name Center for Divine Love, holding itself out to the public as a New Thought ministry in the tradition of Divine Science.

United Divine Science Ministries International 8419 Callaghan
San Antonio, TX 78230
<http://www.uniteddivinescience.org>

Divine Science Federation International
110 Merchants Row, Suite 4
Rutland, VT 05701
<http://www.angelfire.com/il/divinescience/index.html>

Robert Winterhalter

See also: Religious Science; Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches.

References

- Brooks, Louise McNamara. Early History of Divine Science. Denver: First Church of Divine Science, 1963.
- Cline-McCrary, Joan, ed. Hidden Harmony. St. Louis: DSFI, 1990.

Diwali

Diwali (or Divali), the Festival of Lights, is the major Hindu festival of the year. It has become a national festival simultaneously celebrated by Jains, Sikhs, and even the Buddhists, each community pouring its own meaning into it. It lasts for five days, but centers on the the new moon day (the darkest day of each month) that ends the lunar month of Ashwin and begins the month of Kartika. It falls in the last half of October or the first half of November on the Common Era calendar. As a Festival of Lights, it properly occurs during the darkest period of the monthly lunar cycle and is a time to light the community with candles and lanterns.

Diwali seems to have evolved out of ancient but distinct harvest festivals, and many variations in celebration occur across India, reflective of the different local roots. There are also several stories that inform the celebration of Diwali. As with several other Hindu holidays, the story of the gods churning the ocean of milk is retold during Diwali. The story begins with the devtas, or demigods, complaining of weakness from a curse that had been placed on them. The deity Brahma told them that they needed to drink some amrit, the nectar of immortality, which could be obtained by the churning of the ocean. Vishnu suggested using Mount Meru as a stick to move the water and took the form of Kurma the giant Tortoise, whose back supported the churning stick. The devtas were assisted by the asuras (demons) in the churning activity, which was so successful that the turbulent ocean threatened to become a destructive force, and Vishnu was forced to take action to calm it.

Important for the celebration of Diwali, the churning of the ocean led to the emergence of Lakshmi, the goddess of prosperity and wealth. It is the goddess Lakshmi who is the major deity invoked throughout all the various ceremonies performed during Diwali. Also emerging from the ocean was Lord Dhanwantari, who brought with him the knowledge of Ayurvedic medicine, the traditional healing system of India.

Possibly even more popular than the story of the churning of the ocean is the account of Rama and Sita, incarnations of the deities Vishnu and his wife Lakshmi. Rama was the fabled king of Ayodhya. At one point, he was forced to leave home and he spent many years

Decoration for Diwali celebration in India. Hindus decorate their houses with rangolis and light oil lamps and candles to celebrate Diwali, the festival of light, and usher in the blessings of the occasion. (Thefinalmi/Dreamstime.com) in exile. Sita joined him in exile, during which she was abducted by Ravana, the king of Lanka. Upon learning of his wife's fate at the hands of his old enemy, Rama defeated Ravana in battle. In one form of the story, Sita had to be tested by fire, in order to prove her chastity while in captivity. One text of the Ramayana tells of Sita walking on the fire and the coals turning to lotuses. In southern India, this account is tied to the practice of walking on live coals. By all accounts of the pair, the royal capital suffered greatly in their absence. Upon their return to Ayodhya, the citizens lit lanterns to welcome their ruler and express their delight with his return. The city revived and again became prosperous.

Though not the New Year's Day in India, many see Diwali as the time to make new beginnings. Homes are prepared by internal cleaning and the painting of outside walls. White is the preferred color as it better reflects the light. In recognition of Lakshmi, stores will hold sales and shoppers will look for bargains. Preparation and preliminary celebrations may begin as early as Vijayadashami, the last days of the Navaratri festival, which occurs several weeks earlier in the lunar month of Ashwin. Vijayadashami commemorates for many the anniversary of Rama's defeat of Ravana. In northern India, it is also a prominent date for worshippers of Durga,

Each of the five days of Diwali has an additional story and deity to be emphasized, and there are many regional variations throughout India. Ritual days begin with the prior evening and the first day commences with an offering of prasad (sweets) to Lord Yama (the lord of death). Believers pray for protection from an untimely death. The offering and prayer are made ideally near a sacred tree or in the absence of an appropriate tree, in a clear space in one's front yard. After these rather solemn acts, lamps are lit and feasting begins. The next morning, attention turns to the goddess Lakshmi, and each family conducts prayers in which prosperity is a central theme. In Bengal, this day is given over to the dark goddess Kali, goddess of war, who is highly revered in eastern India. Celebration will last into the evening with lights turned on and fireworks discharged. (In Trinidad, firecrackers are made from freshly cut bamboo.)

This first day of Diwali has taken on added significance throughout India, as it has traditionally marked the beginning of a new financial year (though increasingly, the market is reordering itself around the Western New Year according to the Common Era calendar). A minor holiday, Dhan Terres (Wealth-Thirteenth) is recognized. It is celebrated as a particularly auspicious day to purchase precious metals. Meanwhile, many businesses celebrate Diwali, and many employees hope to receive Diwali bonuses and/or gifts. Throughout India, where Diwali is a national holiday, temples to Lakeshmi, Durga, and Kali will be filled, though attention to Lakshmi predominates. It is a time to consume many sweets.

Diwali is primarily a Hindu celebration, but Jains join the holiday festivities, which coincide with the date generally accepted as the anniversary of the attainment of nirvana (death) of Mahavira, the 24th and last of the Tirthankaras, the holy ones who founded Jainism.

For Sikhs, Diwali dates to the career of Guru Har Gobind Ji (1595–1644), the sixth Sikh Guru. At one point, he was imprisoned along with 56 other kings (all Hindus) at Fort Gwalior by the Islamic Emperor Jahangir (r. 1605–1627). After freeing himself and the other prisoners, Gobind Ji went to the Golden Temple in Amritsar. The Sikh community welcomed him by lighting candles and divas. Thus Sikhs will celebrate Diwali as “Bandi Chhorh Divas,” the day of the detainees’ release.

In Nepal, the only Hindu kingdom in the world, Diwali is also a major festival called Tihar, with its own national variations, though also centered on Lakshmi. Here, the primary minority, the Buddhists, also participate heartily in the celebration.

Constance A. Jones

See also: Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Mahavira; Navaratri/Dashain.

References

- Eck, Diana L. Banaras, City of Light. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Harshananda, Swami. Hindu Festivals and Sacred Days. Bangalore: Ramakrishna Math, 1994.
- Mukuncharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpith, 2005.
- Shekar, H. V. Festivals of India: Significance of the Celebrations. Louisville: Insight Books, 2000.
- Sharma, Nath. Festivals of India. New Delhi: Abhinav Publications, 1978.
- Welbon, Guy, and Glenn Yocum, eds. Religious Festivals in South India and Sri Lanka. Delhi: Manohar, 1982.

■ Djibouti

Modern Djibouti is a relatively new country, having been established in 1898 as a colony, French Somaliland. It is a small country (8,872 square miles) located around the Gulf of Tadjoura, an inlet on the Gulf of Aden. The land, mostly hot and uninhabited, was originally settled by the Afars (of Ethiopian heritage) and the Issa (of Somalia). Most of the country's 506,000 people (2008) are located along the lengthy coast. Islam came into the area in the 13th century from Yemen (across the Gulf of Aden to the north).

Present-day Djibouti became part of a new nation called Ifat centered upon the city of Zeila (in present-day Somalia). It later evolved into the Sultanate of Adal. Portugal aligned itself with Ethiopia and in 1541 attacked Zeila and other cities to the south. The Portuguese destroyed the cities' ability to compete in the rich trade that extended from India along the African coast to the south. Adal fell apart, and a variety of lesser sultanates divided the land.

One of these lesser sultanates was located at Tadjoura. In 1862, the sultan sold the city of Obock to the French. During the next generation the sultanate disappeared, and in 1898 the French announced the existence of their new colony, with the capital at the

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	149,000	851,000	97.0	1.97	1,079,000	1,431,000
Christians	12,000	14,100	1.6	0.81	14,600	15,800
Roman Catholics	11,000	7,500	0.9	1.39	7,500	8,000
Orthodox	800	5,400	0.6	-0.11	5,600	6,000
Protestants	200	630	0.1	1.04	800	1,000
Agnostics	200	10,400	1.2	2.98	17,500	30,000
Baha'is	100	770	0.1	1.98	1,000	1,300
Atheists	0	450	0.1	1.95	700	1,000
Hindus	300	340	0.0	1.98	440	560
Total population	162,000	877,000	100.0	1.96	1,113,000	1,480,000

city of Djibouti, a port they had built in the 1880s. Following the granting of independence to Somalia in 1969, the residents of Djibouti began to agitate for independence as well. A plebiscite in 1977 found 85 percent of the population favoring an end to colonial rule. Independence was granted. The area has remained somewhat unstable, however, due to the continued problems between Ethiopia and Eritrea and the unrest in Somalia.

Islam dominates Djibouti's religious life. The majority of the population are Sunnis of either the Hanafite or Shafaiite schools of Islam. There are some followers of Shia Islam, most from India. Active Sufi brotherhoods include the Qadiriyya, the Salihila, and the Rifaiya. There is also a small Ahmadiyya Muslim movement community.

Hinduism has been brought into the country by the relocation of several hundred Indians. There is also a small community of the Baha'i Faith.

Christianity appears to have been initially introduced into the country following the French purchase of Obock. The first priests of the Roman Catholic Church came from the Diocese of Arabia in 1883. The work grew slowly but steadily, and in 1955 the Diocese of Djibouti was established. Protestants from the Reformed Church of France arrived around 1940 and subsequently founded the Protestant Church of Djibouti. Workers from Ethiopia have more recently organized the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. The Ethiopian bishop of Djibouti, East and South Africa resides in Nairobi. There are also a small number of Greek Orthodox believers, mostly European expatriates.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Hanafite School of Islam; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Shafaiite School of Islam.

References

- Alwan, Daoud A. Historical Dictionary of Djibouti. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2000.
- Shehim, K. "The Influence of Islam on the Afar." Ph.D. diss., University of Washington, 1982.
- Trimingham, J. Spencer. The Christian Church and Missions in Ethiopia (including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Dogen

1200–1253

Dogen, the student of Eisai, the founder of the Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhist tradition in Japan, would as a mature practitioner establish Soto Zen (Chinese Caodong Chan Buddhism) in Japan. He would also work for the spread of Zen across the country.

Dogen was born January 12, 1200, into a well-to-do noble Japanese family, though he was left an orphan by the death of his parents during his childhood. He was raised by his uncle, who saw to his receiving a good education in Chinese literature. His home was near Mount Hiei, the headquarters of Tendai Buddhism, the dominant form of Buddhism in Japan as the 13th century began. Dogen, with a strong sense of the impermanence of human existence, began the serious practice of Tendai at the age of 13. He did not find a satisfactory practice nor an answer to his personal religious questions among the Tendai and after a decade of searching, in 1214 he eventually found his way to Kyoto, where Eisai (1141–1215), the founder of the Zen tradition in Japan, had opened Kennin-ji Monastery. Following Eisai's death, he studied with Myozen, Eisai's successor, who conferred dharma transmission on Dogen in 1221.

Two years later, Myozen accompanied Dogen on a trip to China, where they could explore the Chan centers directly. They had both been trained in the Rinzai tradition with its emphasis upon koans, verbal problems posed to students as a tool to assist students to enlightenment. In China, Dogen became increasingly distrustful of koan practice. He was led to Ru Jing (1163–1268), a master in the Caodong Chan tradition, which did not use koans, and focused upon sitting meditation (zazen). He eventually received dharma transmission and the "seal" (inkashomei) of dharma transmission from Ru Jing.

Myozen died while the pair were still in China. Thus Dogen returned to Japan in 1227 alone and settled back at Kennin-ji. Here he wrote an initial short book on sitting meditation, General Teaching for Zazen.

His stay in Kyoto was short-lived, however, as the Tendai leadership chose the opportunity to move against the new Zen teachings and attempt to mount a campaign to suppress the gains it had made during Eisai's last years.

Dogen moved out of Kyoto in 1230, settling first in Fukakusa south of the city, where he would build the first Soto Zen temple in Japan, Koshohorin-ji, and write his most famous text, the Treasury of Knowledge of the True Law, the basic text for Soto Zen practitioners. He emphasized following Buddha as a model and practicing zazen, sitting meditation.

The next years would be spent building Zen Buddhism, but were also ones of turmoil in the Buddhist world as several new forms of Buddhism were disturbing the Buddhist community. Finally, in 1247, Dogen withdrew from the turmoil that seemed to surround him and relocated to the rural Echizen Province. Here, in 1248, he founded Eihei-ji, the monastic complex that remains the major training center and point of dissemination for Soto Zen. Eihei-ji remained his headquarters for the rest of his life.

Dogen left Eihei-ji infrequently, but on occasion traveled to Kyoto and Kamakura on behalf of his growing movement. In 1253, the need of medical assistance forced him to Kyoto, and while there in September his condition worsened and he died. Ejo (1198–1280), his major disciple, became the new head of the movement.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Meditation; Soto Zen Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Abe, Masao. A Study of Dogen: His Philosophy and Religion. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Bielefeldt, Carl. Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- Cleary, Thomas, trans. Shobogenzo: Zen Essays by Dogen. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1986.
- Heine, Steven. Dogen and the Koan Tradition. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Tanahashi, Kazuaki, ed. Moon in a Dewdrop: Writings of Zen Master Dogen. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1985.

Tanahashi, Kazuaki, and John Daido Looi, trans. The True Dharma Eye: Zen Master Dogen's Three Hundred Koans. Boston: Shambhala, 2005.

Dogon Religion

The Dogon people inhabit land between the Niger River and Mali's border with Burkina Faso. The majority of the 700 Dogon villages are built along the 100 or so miles of the Cliffs of Bandigara, an escarpment that runs through the region. They appear to have settled in the area in the 15th century, in the process displacing other residents. They have been resistant to the encroachments of Islam, otherwise the dominant religion of the area, and Christianity, which was introduced during the years of French rule in the 20th century.

Dogon religion is built around three emphases. The Awa cult centers on Nommo, the first living being (and ancestor of the Dogon) who was created by Amma (the god who created the universe). Participants hope to reorder the spiritual forces disturbed by Nommo's death, a process to be accomplished by dancing with elaborate painted masks, especially for funerals and events marking the anniversaries of a death. More than 75 types of Dogon ritual masks have been identified. Awa dancing attempts to conduct the souls of the deceased to what is seen as their final resting place in the family altars. It also verifies their status among the ancestors.

The worship of Lebe, the earth god, centers on fertility, particularly as it is related to the agricultural cycle. Lebe is believed to visit his priests, called hogons, each evening. He takes the form of a serpent, which purifies and empowers the priest by licking him. The hogan takes the lead in various ceremonies that punctuate the agricultural cycle. He also oversees the shrine, one of which is found in each Dogon village, dedicated to Lebe. Each shrine incorporates some soil as a symbol of earth fecundity.

The Binu cult includes as important features ancestor worship, spirit communication, and agricultural sacrifices. After Amma created Nommo, he multiplied into eight Nommo (four pairs). One of the eight primordial humans rebelled and upset the order of the universe. Amma then sacrificed one of the remaining seven Nommo and scattered bits of his body through the world, including the sites of presently existing Binu shrines. These shrines provide a point of contact between the Dogon and their ancestors, especially a class of primordial ancestors who lived before death became a reality of human existence. In ancient times, one of these ancestors would appear in the form of an animal, which would assist a kinship group (clan) and thus become its totem animal. The Binu priests oversee the ongoing contact and intercession with the ancestor represented by the clan's totem. The rituals ensure the ancestor's benevolence and provide access to spiritual power.

Living in the central regions of Mali, the Dogon people are known for their expressive masks, dances, and architecture. Shown here is a Dogon dancer wearing a traditional mask. (Wlblack/Dreamstime.com)

The Dogon arose out of relative obscurity in the 1970s following the publication of The Sirius Mystery by Robert K. G. Temple. Temple drew attention to the Awa cult, especially its dancing and the masks used. Each Dogon male carves and paints a mask that is worn for funerals, but also, once every 60 years, for a dance ceremony called the sigi. The sigi marks the renewal of the generations, but also marks the rebirth of the white dwarf star, Sirius. The sigi was first photographed in 1970. As part of the ceremony, it was explained that a second (and sacred) star orbited Sirius. Astronomers later discovered that the Dogon were correct about Sirius being a double star.

The publication of Temple's book in the West had the effect of bolstering what was in the 1970s being touted as the "ancient astronaut" theory, a theory posed as an alternative account of human origins. The theory suggested that humans had originally come to Earth from outer space or had been created by extraterrestrials. As interest in the ancient astronauts died in the 1980s, the focus on Sirius began to inspire channelers (mediums), who began to channel messages from what were believed to be advanced beings who resided on planets in the Sirius star system. Laird Scranton follows upon and greatly expands upon Temple's approach.

There are some 300,000 Dogon people.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Traditional Religions.

References

- Griaule, Marcel. Conversations with Ogotemmel: An Introduction to Dogon Religious Ideas. London: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Imperato, Pascal J. Dogon Cliff Dwellers: The Art of Mali's Mountain People. New York: L. Kahan Gallery of African Arts, 1978.
- Scranton, Laird. The Science of the Dogon: Decoding the African Mystery Tradition. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions, 2006.
- Temple, Robert K. G. The Sirius Mystery. Folkestone, Kent, UK: Bailey Brothers and Swiften, 1972.
- Vanbeek, Walter E. A. Dogon: Africa's People of the Cliffs. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 2001.

■ Dominica

Dominica is a 300-square-mile island in the Lesser Antilles with a population of approximately 80,000 people. Most Dominicans are of mixed African descent. Dominica has been an independent nation since 1978. Previously, Dominica had been an associated state of Britain, a crown colony of Britain, a self-governing colony of Britain controlled by local mulatto elites, a colony exchanged a number of times between Britain and France, an independent Carib Indian island, and a Spanish possession. Geographically, Dominica is a mountainous volcanic island densely covered with vegetation. From the time it was named by Christopher Columbus (1451–1506), in 1493, to the late 18th century, the rough terrain made colonization difficult. Geography, economy, and politics have all been factors instrumental in shaping Dominica's religious history.

When Columbus set foot on Dominica in November 1493, he met the ancestors of the contemporary Carib Indians. Little is known about Carib religion, and few traces of it remain. What can be gleaned about Carib religion is often found in the suspect reports of early Roman Catholic missionaries.

Based on his analysis of Roman Catholic missionary documents, Douglas Taylor found Carib religion to be primarily a shamanic religion, which revolved around presenting offerings of food and drink to various spirits. There was belief in a variety of spirits, both beneficial and malicious. He also found evidence for some antagonism in Carib social structure, and one might surmise on the basis of various remaining cosmological myths, most of which deal with family relationships, that one function of Carib religion was mediating these antagonisms. In the mid-19th century, especially through the mission work of Father Delettre, most Caribs converted to Roman Catholicism.

In the colonial period, the religious landscape of Dominica was dominated by Anglicanism, Methodism, and, most especially, Roman Catholicism. Each of these religions was associated with a particular class, or status segment, and class and status associations are still important structures of Dominica's religious field.

Soufriere Catholic Church on the southern coast of Dominica. A majority of Dominica's population is Catholic. (Greg Johnston/StockphotoPro)

Anglicanism (represented by the Church of England) was the religion of British landowners, and in general Anglicans did not seek to convert the African Dominican populations. To this day, Anglicanism is a small religion, primarily associated with a few old landowning families. Anglican parishes are now included in the Church of the Province of the West Indies.

Methodism began to flourish in Dominica in the early 19th century. It is especially associated with the northeastern portion of the island (e.g., the villages of Wesley and Marigot), which have a different settlement history from the rest of the island, and were not colonized by the French. Methodism became especially associated with a rising mixed-race class in the 19th century, and from the 1830s forward it was particularly linked with the Mulatto Ascendancy, a colored elite that dominated Dominica’s legislature. Among other things, Methodism indicated status. It also distinguished the elite from the primarily Catholic black population, and it encouraged literacy, which facilitated elite education. By the late 19th century Methodism, now a part of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, ceased growing, and though it has been influential, it has remained a far smaller religion than Roman Catholicism. Dr. Philip A. Potter (b. 1921), former president of the World Council of Churches, is perhaps Dominica’s most well known Methodist.

Roman Catholicism first was introduced to Dominica by the French; under Colbert’s Code Noir of 1688, the French baptized slaves within six months of their arrival on Dominica. After the British took the island, the Roman Catholic Church was suspect, both for its ties to the pope and for its ties to France. It was only in 1828 that Roman Catholics were extended full rights. After that point, and continuing through emancipation in 1834, Catholicism was embraced by a large portion of the former slaves, who, it seems, often embraced it as an identity of resistance, in opposition to the Anglican landowners and the Methodist mulatto elite. At the

Dominica

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	63,600	63,000	94.2	–0.20	63,900	61,600
Roman Catholics	56,600	54,500	81.6	–0.45	52,000	48,000
Protestants	4,200	26,800	40.1	3.41	28,000	27,000
Independents	220	2,000	3.0	2.64	3,000	3,500
Spiritists	1,100	1,800	2.6	–0.19	1,800	1,800
Baha'is	50	1,200	1.8	–0.19	1,500	1,800
Agnostics	0	360	0.5	3.54	600	800
Ethnoreligionists	0	170	0.3	–0.23	200	200
Muslims	0	100	0.1	–0.21	300	500
Buddhists	0	90	0.1	–0.23	150	200
Hindus	0	70	0.1	0.00	140	200
Chinese folk	0	40	0.1	0.00	70	100
Atheists	0	30	0.0	0.00	40	50
New religionists	0	20	0.0	0.00	40	80
Total population	64,700	66,800	100.0	–0.18	68,800	67,300

same time, priests were important in representing peasant interests. Though there were severe conflicts between the Methodists and Catholics (including legislative disputes over religious involvement in education and at least two riots), these disturbances quieted toward the mid-19th century. After the Catholic bishop René-Marie-Charles Poirier (r. 1858–1878) gave up his French citizenship and became a British subject, the relationship of government and the Catholic Church was cemented. In the late 19th century, Dominica made the transition to crown colony status (a transition the Catholic Church had supported against the mulatto elite), and for the next half century a period of especially strong Catholic influence ensued.

During the late 19th century and the first half of the 20th century, the Roman Catholic Church exerted near hegemony over religious life on the island. In particular, the mountainous geography of the island left many villages disconnected from one another, and Catholic missionary priests (often French priests from the FMI—Sons of Mary Immaculate—Order) were the central organizing figures of village life throughout the countryside. In the city, the Catholic hierarchy (typically Belgian priests from the CSsR—Redemptorist—Order) was also instrumental in primary and secondary education, and later in providing social services (e.g., welfare services). During this time, Roman Catholic authorities actively discouraged the presence of new religious groups, and numerous witnesses attest to Catholic priests burning missionary tracts handed out by Protestant groups trying to establish themselves on the island. Despite Catholic opposition, small groups of the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and Pentecostalism (the Church of God of Prophecy and the Church of God [Cleveland, Tennessee]) were established near the larger towns in the first half of the 20th century. However, none of these flourished.

The main survival of African religion on Dominica is Obeah, a form of sorcery performed by and for individuals, and without group affiliation. There is little information on the prevalence of Obeah on Dominica, and though many people claim that it is widespread, few if any admit to using it themselves. Interviews with older Dominicans indicate that this was also the case in the past. It is possible that the availability of Catholicism as a religion of resistance made it less necessary to preserve subaltern African traditions. On the other hand, Obeah is still prevalent enough to be officially illegal and actively prosecuted, and even in recent years there have been arrests and deportations on grounds of practicing Obeah. According to the police in Dominica, Obeah is particularly associated with drug trafficking.

In terms of other folk beliefs, tales abound locally about soukouyan (witches), lougawou (werewolves), and other creatures, and though many people will carry a Bible verse or psalm to protect themselves from these creatures, it is difficult to determine the extent to which these types of belief structure Dominican worldviews.

After the middle of the 20th century, rapid social changes swept Dominica. These changes ranged from increased political independence and cultural revaluations of race to increased radio and television ownership. In turn these social changes led to changes in Dominica's religious field as well.

The Roman Catholic Church continues as the dominant tradition on the island, but its influence has diminished. In particular, the late 1960s saw a rapid expansion of the Protestant Pentecostal movement in Dominica, an expansion that relied heavily on radio. This was followed in the early 1980s by a second wave of expansion of the Pentecostal movement. Most villages on the island now have at least one Pentecostal or Charismatic church, both independent and denominational types. Partly in response to Protestant Pentecostalism, in the 1970s an active Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement also started. Hostilities between Catholics and Pentecostals became so severe that in 1986 the prime minister of Dominica, Dame Eugenia Charles, had to call a national meeting of religious leaders and appeal for toleration. Since that time, relations among religious groups have been more congenial.

Dissatisfaction with Roman Catholicism became particularly acute in the 1970s, when young men influenced by the black power movement increasingly associated Catholicism with colonialism (especially through its role in secondary education). Many of these men became associated in varying degrees with the Rastafarians, a religion originally from Jamaica, which emphasized Afrocentric notions of divinity, local traditions, and a return to the land. Partially as a cover for secular political and economic difficulties, and partly because of the challenge they posed to traditional norms, reaction against these Rastafarians was draconian; from 1974 through 1983 Rastafarians were virtually prohibited from Dominica through the infamous Dread Act. Among other things, the Dread Act made Rastafarian hairstyles (called dreads, or dreadlocks) illegal and provided blanket legal protection for those persecuting Rastafarians. The Dread Act further radicalized many Rastafarians, many of whom retreated to the rainforest to live in isolated communes. It is only in the last 20 years that Rastafarians have begun to be socially acceptable in Dominica.

Since 1970 other changes have also marked the religious field in Dominica. There is now a much wider range of religious groups on the island, including non-Christian groups such as the Baha'i Faith, Soka Gakkai International, and Islam (especially associated with foreign students at Ross University Medical School), and all groups practice freely. Since the 1990s and early 2000s, particularly with the entry of some Christian preachers into politics, religion has become increasingly important as an element of Dominican political discourse. This change has been an important topic of conversation among the on-line Dominican diaspora community, but there is no clear indication that religion will become a main reference point for Dominican politics.

Richard C. Salter

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of England; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Jehovah's Witnesses; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Pentecostalism; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Soka Gakkai International; World Council of Churches.

References

- Aspects of Dominican History.* Roseau, Dominica; Government Printing Division, 1972.
- Honychurch, Lennox. The Dominica Story. London: Macmillan Education, 1995.
- Salter, Richard C. "Religious Group Formation in the West Indies." Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 1998.
- Salter, Richard C. "Shooting Dreads on Sight." In Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence, edited by Catherine Wessinger. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

■ Dominican Republic

The Dominican Republic is an island nation occupying the easternmost 48,380 square miles of the island

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

A stone church in the Dominican Republic. The vast majority of Dominicans are Roman Catholic. (iStockPhoto.com)

of Hispaniola. Most of its border is coastal land with the Caribbean Sea to the south and the Pacific Ocean to the north. Its western border is shared with Haiti. Some 9.5 million people reside within the Dominican Republic.

The island of Quiaqueya was originally inhabited by several Caribbean peoples, the Lucayos, the Ciguayos, the Tainos, and the Caribs. Christopher Columbus renamed the island Hispaniola when he landed in 1492. The fort he built is marked as the beginning of the European colonization of the Americas. The Spanish subsequently enslaved the island's residents, almost annihilating them. Seeing the inability of the Native peoples to survive the imposed order, Bartolome de Las Casas (1474–1566), the Roman Catholic bishop, suggested the importing of Africans. Some of the first slaves in the New World were brought to Hispaniola, and some of the first independent African communities appeared here in the 1500s.

The island culture shifted to the production of sugarcane on large plantations. Valued as a strategic point between Europe and Central and South America, Hispaniola was coveted by both the British and French. The French took the western half of the island, which they later renamed Haiti, in 1686. The whole island became French for a period, but was lost to a short-lived African American republic. Spain recovered it in 1809. Finally, in 1865, after Spain had been in and out of the country, the Dominican Republic became independent. However, it fell under U.S. influence at the beginning of the 20th century, which led to the United States imposing a protectorate.

In 1930 a dictator, Rafael Leonidas Trujillo, came to power. His brutal regime ended only in 1961, when he was assassinated. At that time it was learned that he personally owned 70 percent of the country's workable land. In the intervening years, the instability of the sugar market has kept the country in crisis, and changes of government have been frequent. A democratic government with regular elections has been in place since 1966, but it is threatened constantly by corruption, massive poverty, and labor unrest.

European presence on Hispaniola destroyed the Native people and their religion, which was replaced with Christianity. The area that was to later become the Dominican Republic became the early center of the Roman Catholic Church, and the first bishopric in the Americas was established there in 1511. St. Thomas University was opened in 1538. Catholicism enjoyed a monopoly in the religious sphere until the 19th century and still retains the allegiance of the majority of the people.

The Roman Catholic Church enjoys a special status in the country, a status now confirmed by law, following the signing of a concordat between the Vatican and the government in 1954. Among other privileges, Roman Catholics have access to public funds to cover some church expenses, including the repair of church buildings. The government generally does not interfere with the practice of religion; members of the national police, however, are required to attend Catholic Mass.

Protestants took the opportunity provided by the Haitian occupation of the Dominican Republic to enter

Dominican Republic

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	4,474,000	9,672,000	94.9	1.58	11,458,000	13,074,000
Roman Catholics	3,731,000	8,579,000	84.2	1.36	9,940,000	11,100,000
Protestants	92,500	770,000	7.6	5.19	1,050,000	1,300,000
Independents	41,500	215,000	2.1	3.43	300,000	445,000
Spiritists	98,000	223,000	2.2	1.61	268,000	307,000
Agnostics	12,000	225,000	2.2	2.98	350,000	450,000
Atheists	5,600	47,500	0.5	1.61	65,000	92,500
Chinese folk	0	7,800	0.1	1.61	9,000	12,500
Baha'is	3,900	7,200	0.1	1.61	10,000	17,000
New religionists	1,000	3,400	0.0	1.61	5,200	8,700
Muslims	0	2,200	0.0	1.60	3,000	4,900
Buddhists	1,500	1,900	0.0	1.61	2,800	4,200
Jews	350	700	0.0	1.60	850	1,200
Total population	4,596,000	10,191,000	100.0	1.61	12,172,000	13,972,000

the country. Africans from North America were invited to populate the land, and once they arrived, they asked for religious leadership. In 1834 a Methodist minister from England arrived, and a few years later a minister from the African Methodist Episcopal Church established work. In the 1840s, a British Baptist missionary founded a church, which has not survived, at Puerto Plata among African Americans. American Episcopalians entered the country in 1898 and created a mission, which is now a diocese of the Episcopal Church. Apart from one independent missionary, later identified with the Free Methodist Church of North America, no other churches initiated work until the 20th century.

In 1911, American groups that had already established work in Puerto Rico moved personnel to the Dominican Republic. In 1919, the Presbyterians, the Methodists, and Church of the United Brethren cooperated in forming an Alliance for Christian Service in Santo Domingo. The Moravians eventually joined the Alliance, which was serving as an agency for coordination and cooperation. This Alliance matured into a united church, which became autonomous in 1953 as the Iglesia Evangélica Dominicana. The church carries on a wide variety of social service programs and has an active publication board that distributes a significant amount of literature. However, it has fallen behind some of the more evangelistic churches in gaining a following among the population. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church entered the country in 1908 and has built a strong movement, second only to the Assemblies of God, which entered in 1933. The Seventh-day Adventist work is a part of the Antillean Union Conference, which also includes Puerto Rico. The Jehovah's Witnesses, who started their evangelistic activity immediately after World War II, now have a substantial following. A wide spectrum of American Protestant and Free church groups have now opened work in the Dominican Republic. They range from Pentecostal groups such as the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) and the United Pentecostal Church International to various evangelical churches, including the Baptists, the Evangelical Church of the West Indies, and the Christian Brethren.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints arrived in 1978. There are also a number of local spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith. There is a small Buddhist community, consisting primarily of Chinese and Japanese expatriates, including a chapter of the True Buddha School. There had been a small Jewish community that was established in the 16th century; over the centuries, however, it disappeared. A new Jewish community was started in the 1930s and now numbers around 150 people. They have a synagogue in Santo Domingo.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Baptists; Christian Brethren; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Evangelical Church of the West Indies; Free Churches; Free Methodist Church of North America; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; True Buddha School; United Pentecostal Church International; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

References

- Davis, M. E. "Afro-Dominican Religious Brotherhoods: Structure, Ritual, and Music." Ph.D. diss., University of Illinois, 1976.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Lundhal, Mats. Peasants and Religion. Boston: Routledge, 1999.
- Wipfler, W. L. The Churches of the Dominican in the Light of History: A Study of the Root Causes of the Current Problems. Cuernavaca, Mexico: Centro Intercultural de Documentación, 1966.

Dominicans

The Dominicans, officially the Order of Preachers, constitute one of the oldest and largest of the religious orders of the Roman Catholic Church. Its founding was occasioned by the emergence of a heretical movement in southern France in the 13th century. The order's founder, Dominic (1170–1221), was placed in charge of the preaching mission directed to counter the Albigensians. To stave off any possible charges of personal gain, Dominic and his assistants practiced voluntary poverty. This group became the core of what became a permanent organization that in 1215 received the initial approval of the bishop of Toulouse, France. The next year the group adopted the Rule of Saint Augustine and in 1517 received approval of its name and mission from the pope.

The order was established to provide for the spiritual nourishment of its members and to send them upon missions in defense of the Catholic faith, the art of preaching being a primary tool. Shortly after its founding, Dominic sent lieutenants to various locations to open centers, beginning with Paris and Bologna. The first general chapter of representatives for the more than a dozen houses met in 1220. A vow of absolute poverty was adopted, and subsequently a form of governance was adopted and the work divided into provinces. The organization is democratic, but the leadership, especially the master general, is granted considerable administrative power. The general chapter may set broad policies and may on rare occasions modify the constitution.

Dominic's order was spreading rapidly when he died in 1221. It had penetrated most of Europe, and a number of national provinces were in process of formation. This growth continued under his successors. Dominic encouraged education, and the order obtained the first chair in theology at the Sorbonne. A number of scholars appeared among the Dominicans in their first century.

The order tended to establish its centers in urban areas. From this center, the community would become the target of systematic evangelism, and friars would be sent out to the surrounding countryside. Emerging out of the order were a number of "penitential preachers," who emphasized penance and reform of life as the major theme of their preaching work. The best known of these is Savonarola (1452–1498), who brought Florence to repent of its worldly ways during the Renaissance. The order quickly gained a reputation for its learning, and it was placed in charge of that major institution designed to stamp out heresy and promote allegiance to the church, the Inquisition.

Dominic's desire to help reform and revive the church also led him to missions. He sent Dominican brothers to the borders of Christendom. Early efforts were directed to the Jews and Muslims of southern Spain and northern Africa and to the Baltic peoples of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. The order also pushed eastward into Poland and the Ukraine. Efforts in the western Mediterranean Basin were directed toward the return of Orthodox Christians to the authority of Rome, as well as to the conversion of Muslims.

As the order expanded, its vow of poverty became a problem, and in 1475, Pope Martin V granted the Dominican priories (not individuals) the right to own property and thus provide for the basic needs of the members. The Protestant Reformation directly affected the order. It lost those provinces in northern Europe, and those in neighboring countries were considerably weakened. At the same time in the east the Dominicans were losing centers in lands overrun by the Turks.

The losses during the first half of the 16th century were partially offset by gains in the Western Hemisphere. The first Dominicans found their way to the West Indies in 1510 and had created a new province a mere 20 years later. That province was the base from which the order expanded through the Spanish colonies, as well as Brazil. Already in 1592 Dominicans had followed the Portuguese to Indonesia and the Philippines, from which they began efforts in China, Formosa, and Japan. From Italy they reestablished work in the Middle East and pushed eastward to Kurdistan.

Like the Jesuits, an order that was suppressed in 1773, the Dominicans suffered from the rise of secularized governments in several European countries. The wars for independence in South America then destroyed most of the work there. In 1804, the king of Spain separated the Spanish houses from the main part of the order, a separation that continued through most of the 19th century.

The initial problems created by hostile secular governments gave way to a new freedom to exist in a liberalized atmosphere that included commitments to religious liberty. Beginning in the late 19th century, the order reestablished itself in most European countries, and there was steady growth through the entire 20th century. Membership increased from 4,472 in 1910 to more than 10,000 in 1963. Much 20th-century growth occurred in the Third World.

The order is led by a general chapter and the master of the order (the successor to Saint Dominic). It consists of provinces, each of which is ruled by a provincial chapter and the prior provincial. Each province includes convents and houses, each of which is governed by a prior or superior. The international headquarters of the order is located in Rome. The master of the order has a website at <http://www.op.org/curia/>, but this is only one of many sites representing the many Dominican units worldwide.

The order is organized in three parts: the First Order, which includes priests and lay brothers; the Second Order, of contemplative nuns; and the Third Order, of people who live in the world but adopt the Dominican spirit or live communally but do not take the full vows of the First Order. The primary history has been carried by the First Order but the Second Order can also be traced to Saint Dominic, who authored its original constitution in 1206. The nuns took charge of their own temporal affairs in 1267.

The history of the Second Order has been marked by two periods in which mystical spirituality flowered. The first, in the 14th century, is associated with the preaching of several friars who were their spiritual directors, Meister Eckhardt (ca. 1260–1327), Henry Suso (ca. 1300–1366), and Johannes Tauler (ca. 1300–1361). A second period was noted in the 18th century. Like the First Order, the Second suffered ups and downs during the modern era, beginning with the Reformation, but enjoyed a period of expansion in the 20th century.

The Third Order appears to have emerged from the penitential fraternities that sprang up in response to the preaching of the Dominican friars in the 13th century. At the end of the century, a rule was created for those fraternities that came under the jurisdiction of the order. Some of these fraternities later developed a communal life and dedicated their time to social, educational, and other charitable works. Over the centuries the Third Order produced some notable saints of the church, including Saint Rose of Lima (1586–1617), the first person from the Western Hemisphere who was canonized; Saint Catherine of Siena (1347–1380); and Saint Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort (1673–1716), whose writings laid the foundation for the present emphasis on the veneration of the Virgin Mary in Roman Catholicism.

Convento Santa Sabina (Aventino)
Piazza Pietro d' Illiria 1
00153 Roma
Italy

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jesuits; Monasticism; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Ashley, Benedict M. The Dominicans. Collegeville, MN: St. Mary's, 1990.

- Bennett, R. F. Early Dominicans: Studies in the Thirteenth-Century History. New York: Russell and Russell, 1971.
- Devas, R. Dominican Revival in the Nineteenth Century. London: Longmans, 1913.
- Hinnebusch, William. The History of the Dominican Order: Intellectual and Cultural Life to 1500. Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1973.
- Reeves, J. B. The Dominicans. London: Bloomsbury, 1959.
- Zagano, Phyllis, and Thomas McGonicle. The Dominican Tradition. Spirituality in History. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2006.

Double Ninth Festival

The Double Ninth Festival continues a pattern in Chinese festivals that begin early in the lunar year that places a festival on the same day numerically as the month; thus there is a major festival on the first day of the first month (New Year's), the second day of the second month (Spring Dragon); the fifth day of the fifth month (Dragon Boat), and the seventh day of the seventh month (Double Seventh Festival). This pattern reveals both the potency of numbers considered good, with no festivals in the months numbered with negative numbers, and the additional symbolism accruing to different numbers. Nine is a male number associated with the male or yang side of the yin-yang polarity that controls so much of life.

The Double Ninth Festival appears to date back to the Han dynasty (221–206 BCE), at about the same time as the emergence of religious Daoism and its cosmology built around the concepts of yin-yang and the Five Agents: water, fire, metal, wood, and earth.

In the celebration of the festival, two plants come to the fore, the dogwood and chrysanthemum. The dogwood with its strong scent had been a plant desired for both its aesthetic qualities and its medicinal properties (Chinese doctors used it to treat kidney problems). The chrysanthemum is valued both for its beauty and as a substance producing longevity. Thus people came to wear the flowers of both plants and to drink wine (or tea) made from chrysanthemums.

Members of a chorus welcome the Double Ninth Festival in Shenyang of Liaoning Province, China. The festival is considered a traditional occasion to pay respect to the aged and falls on the ninth day of the ninth month of the Chinese lunar calendar. (Getty Images)

The actual festival traces back to a story from the Han dynasty about a mistress of the emperor who was driven from the palace by his wife. She revealed that every year on the ninth day of the ninth month everyone in the palace wore dogwood and drank wine to ward off disasters.

Today, as the holiday has become more secular, additional elements have been added to the celebration. The Double Ninth cake, some of which can become very fancy, is stuffed with various fruits or meats, and stacked in nine layers in the shape of a tower. Climbing mountains, also associated with long life, has become a popular activity on this day. The less adventurous can visit local parks to see the flower displays, or follow the example of the long-lived Empress Dowager Ci Xi (1835–1908) and add a little chrysanthemum jelly to their diet.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese New Year's Day; Double Seventh Festival; Spring Dragon Festival.

References

- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.
- Yeung, Him-Che. Handbook of Chinese Herbs and Formulas. Los Angeles: Institute of Chinese Medicine, 1985.

The Double Seventh Festival

The Chinese, like people in many cultures, have interesting beliefs about numbers. Some numbers are considered lucky and it is also traditional wisdom that good things come in pairs. These various beliefs come together in Chinese holidays, many of which occur on

A couple kiss during a disabled persons group wedding held to mark the Qixi Festival (also known as the Double Seventh Festival), the Chinese equivalent of Valentine's Day, on August 26, 2009, in Chengdu of Sichuan Province, China. The festival originates from a romantic legend of lovers, the cowherder Niu Ling and fairy Zhi Nu, who were separated by the Supreme God but reunited across the Milky Way once a year on the day. (Getty Images) the same numbered day as the month. Thus, the Spring Dragon Festival occurs on the second day of the second lunar month and the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month. The Double Seventh Festival is named for the fact that it occurs on the seventh day of the seventh month.

This day, the Chinese equivalent of Valentine's Day in the West, is built around the story of two lovers. The first was Niu Ling, an orphaned boy whose only possession was an old ox. Before he died, the aging animal told his owner that annually on the seventh day of the seventh month the seven daughters of the Jade Emperor, the ruler of heaven in traditional Chinese religion, would descend to Earth for a bath in the local river. He advised hiding the clothes of the youngest, Zhi Nu, known for her cleverness, and talking her into becoming his wife. Niu Ling acted on the ox's advice, with the promised results. They married, had children, and appeared to be leading a happy life.

Trouble came from the Jade Emperor, who resented the fact that his daughter's work of weaving beautiful clouds in the sky no longer occurred. When the daughter returned to heaven to visit, he caused a great river to flow across the sky that separated Zhi Nu from Niu Ling. That river is what we know as the Milky Way. The two lovers we know as the stars Vega and Altair. Meanwhile, on Earth, the magpies planned a solution to their problem. Every year on the anniversary of their meeting, they fly to the sky and form a bridge so they can again be united if but for a day. With the moon in its first quarter on the seventh day of the lunar month, the Milky Way appears dimmer, and no longer separates the two lovers.

The seventh day of the lunar month in August is China's day for lovers, but celebrated especially by unmarried women. Young girls in new clothes will visit local temples to pray to Zhi Nu for cleverness. While there they may also recite the traditional prayer for the ability to thread needles, symbolic of the acquisition of the traditional talents of a housewife.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Spring Dragon Festival.

References

Kaulbach, B, and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.

Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Doukhobors

The Doukhobors' origins are obscure, due to their reliance on orally transmitted traditions and teachings, but it is generally accepted that their sect began during the wave of reform that swept through Russia in the 17th century. The original Doukhobors were peasants from southern Russia who were influenced by that reform, and at times they experienced persecution under the Russian czars and the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). An Orthodox archbishop called them Doukhobors (spirit wrestlers) in 1785. The term was meant to be derisive (wrestlers against the spirit), but the sect put its own positive spin on the term (wrestlers for and with the spirit) and kept it as their own.

They faced persecution again in the late 19th century, and with the czar's approval and the support of Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) and British and American Friends (Quakers), 7,400 Doukhobors arrived in Canada as immigrants in 1899. They settled as a community in what was to become Saskatchewan. In 1902 the Russian authorities released their leader, Peter Vasilievich Verigin (d. 1924), from his exile in Siberia, and he soon joined his followers in Canada. After a change in the Canadian government's policy, the Doukhobors ran up against the authorities in 1905 for registering their lands communally (not individually as the Canadian government desired), as well as for their refusal to swear an oath of allegiance to the government. As a result, they lost the lands that they had tilled for the past few years. Beginning in 1908 Verigin led most of his followers to southern British Columbia, where he established an isolated community of close to 6,000.

Doukhobors are strict pacifists, and many refuse to swear an oath. The emphasis is on the inner light, which all Christians possess. Outward forms are rejected: the sacraments, clergy, images, signs of the cross, fasts, even the Bible. Many are vegetarians and avoid killing animals. What gives life is the Spirit of Christ that speaks through the lips of Jesus' followers.

The Bible is replaced with orally transmitted hymns and liturgy (their Living Book), which are sung and spoken during their meetings (called sobranyas). For most, communal living is the ideal way to live in mutual love. The leaders of the community are considered to have the Spirit of Christ more strongly than others.

Three major divisions occurred after the Doukhobors arrived in Canada. The Orthodox (or Community) Doukhobors continued in the communal way of living and remained loyal to the Verigin leaders. In 1938 these Orthodox Doukhobors were organized by Peter Verigin into the Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ. The Independents departed from the communal way of living. The Sons of Freedom (headquartered in Krestova, British Columbia) presented a more radical, and often violent, approach to dissent and nonconformity.

Presently there are around 30,000 Doukhobors in Canada. The Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ has its central office in Grand Forks, British Columbia. Its periodical is entitled ISKRA, which maintains a website at <http://www.iskramag.org>. A major challenge facing the Doukhobors in the 21st century is that of assimilation into mainstream Canadian culture.

Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ
Box 760
Grand Forks, BC V0H 1H0
Canada

Gordon L. Heath

See also: Communalism; Friends/Quakers; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Friesen, John W., and Michael M. Verigin. The Community of Doukhobors: A People in Transition. Ottawa, ON, Canada: Borealis Press, 1989.
- Mealing, F. M. Doukhor Life: A Survey of Doukhor Religion, History and Folklore. Castlegar, BC: Cotinneh Books, 1975.
- Woodcock, George, and Ivan Avakumovic. The Doukhobors. Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Dragon Boat Festival

The Dragon Boat Festival occurs on the fifth day of the fifth lunar month (early to mid-June on the Common Era calendar). Like the earlier Spring Dragon Festival, it acknowledges the dragon, a symbol of the emperor in pre-modern China, and the dragon's association with rain and water in traditional Chinese lore.

There are a variety of stories told about the festival. One of the oldest concerns Qu Yaun, an advisor to the ruler of Chu, one of seven states vying for power in the Warring States Period (476–221 BCE). Over time, his advice was rejected and he was pushed from the court. Eventually, Chu was conquered by a rival nation, and Qu Yaun committed suicide by throwing himself in the river, on the fifth day of the fifth month in 278 BCE. People attempted unsuccessfully to retrieve his body from the river. To prevent the fish from devouring the body, they threw rice into the river. At a later date, someone reported meeting Qu Yaun's spirit and was told that the dragon stole the rice thrown in the river.

Qu Yaun is now celebrated in the Festival by the holding of Dragon Boat races on the anniversary of his death. Over the years, these have become a matter of intense athletic competition. The races were ritualized by having a Daoist priest (or in a more secularized setting, a VIP) touching the eyes of the dragon on the front of the boats, called Awakening of the Dragon, symbolically calling the dragon from his slumber and animating his qi (energy).

People also eat sticky rice that has been wrapped in bamboo or reed leaves. It was believed that wrapping the rice thrown in the river with leaves would keep the dragons from eating it.

In 1980, China added Dragon Boat racing to its list of national sports. By this time the custom had spread across the land and to neighboring Vietnam, Japan, and Korea, and throughout the Chinese diaspora. The most heralded Dragon Boat Races are held annually in Hong Kong.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Daoism; Spring Dragon Festival.

A drummer keeps the beat as his team competes in the annual dragon boat races during the Dragon Boat Festival. (Corel)

References

- Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Druidism

Modern Druidism, or Druidry, has more groups than in Britain alone, and many more internationally. Most contemporary Druids in Britain are Pagan (and their groups and activities are part of the wider neo-Pagan and Wicca networks); some have close links with Wicca, some are Christians, some are members of non-religious friendly societies (for example, the Ancient Order of Druids), and others see Druidry as a philosophy or a way of life rather than as a religion. All Druids have at least one thread in common: the Celtic Druids are their source of inspiration. Little is known about how Pagan Celts practiced Druidry. Certainly, Druidism was the faith of the Celtic inhabitants of Gaul and the Celtic people of the British Isles until either Romanization or the introduction of Christianity led to its decline. Druids claim that the early Druids built megalithic monuments such as Stonehenge and the Rollright Stones.

The story of what constituted the beliefs and ritual practices of those inhabiting the prehistoric British Isles is little documented, and what is known is highly complex. However, by the 1720s an initial great revival of interest in the Druids was being disseminated

Present-day revellers in the south of England celebrate Bonfire Night, a ritual related to the Celtic festival of Samhain (otherwise known as Halloween). (Getty Images) by Romanticism and new archaeological findings. The history of the revival of British Druidism must be seen as a history of attitudes to Druidry and has been summed up as a story of creative reinvention, a process that continues in contemporary Druidry. Modern Druidry, as recognized by Druids themselves, can include just about anything you want it to include, and rituals may include non-Celtic elements of an American Indian or Hindu tradition along with elements from Welsh or Irish myth and poetry. Public rituals performed by white-robed Druids may use a version of the Universal Druid Prayer (Iola Morganwg's Gorsedd Prayer, first spoken in London in 1792) and may follow the Revival Druids in seeing the light of the sun as the symbol of God, or they may revere the sun as a symbol of spiritual light and associate it with one of the sun gods in Celtic mythology.

For many Druids there is a central belief in the unity of the spiritual, the creative imagination, and the natural environment. These three elements reflect the three realms of traditional Druidic learning, the Bards (poets, storytellers, and singers), Ovates (philosophers, diviners), and Druids (moral philosophers). Reconnecting to the past and to the natural world is assisted by working with the natural eightfold seasonal cycle of festivals: Halloween (Samhain), Candlemas (Imbolc), May Day (Beltaine), and Lammas (Lughnasad), together with the Winter and Summer Solstices and the Spring and Fall Equinoxes. Contemporary Druids also emphasize the primacy of the circle as a symbol of the wholeness of life, and the seasonal cycle as a spiritual sanctuary. Most of their rituals are celebrated in private. The most public and controversial festival has been the Summer Solstice celebration of the triumph of Light by Druids at Stonehenge. Druids revere the sun and often practice their rites in daylight. For 10 years or so, however, their key Summer Solstice public festivities at Stonehenge were curtailed.

Public outcry and the efforts of Druids themselves brought them back the right to worship there.

Membership numbers vary widely. The British Druid Order (BDO), whose current chief is Philip Shallcrass and which publishes the main Druid magazine, Druid's Voice, estimates its membership at more than 2,000. It may be contacted at PO Box 29, St Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex, TN37 7YP, UK, or through its website: <http://www.druidorder.demon.co.uk/>. The Ancient Order of Druids (founded by Henry Hurle in 1781) has more than 3,000 members, whereas many groups have fewer than 100. The Council of British Druid Orders acts as a forum for 8 of the 12 or so Druid groups in Britain. The Ancient Druid Order, or the Druid Order, founded in 1717, celebrates the Summer Solstice at Stonehenge, the Spring Equinox at Tower Hill, and the Autumn Equinox at Primrose Hill. From this developed OBOD, the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, constituted in 1964, and one of the largest Druid groups, with more than 3,000 members. It has a worldwide experience-based postal teaching program, a newsletter, and workshops. It aims to renew Druidry, promoting equality of the sexes, and is as concerned with environmental and artistic matters as spiritual ones. The first chief was Philip Ross Nichols, and the current one is Philip Carr-Gomm.

Other British groups include the Secular Order of Druids, whose current chief is Tim Sebastian; it developed out of attempts to counterbalance the increasing influence of the rock festival at Glastonbury, as well as from the feeling that the Druids needed to establish a stronger presence at Stonehenge in the mid-1970s. The Glastonbury Order of Druids, formed in 1988, remains a small group mainly concerned with Stonehenge and Glastonbury. The primary American Druidic groups are Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, founded in the mid-1980s by Isaac Bonewits (who became well known in 1968 when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in magic), and the original Druid group, the Reformed Druids of North America. The latter group originated in a student protest movement at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota, in 1963. An extensive directory of links to these and other Druidic groups may be found at <http://www.esotericart.com/fringe/druidLinks.htm>.

Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids
PO Box 1333
Lewes, East Sussex
UK BN7 37G
<http://www.druidry.org>

Charlotte Hardman

See also: Fall Equinox; Glastonbury; Spring Equinox; Stonehenge; Summer Solstice; Wiccan Religion; Winter Solstice.

References

- Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Druid Way. Shaftesbury, UK: Element Books, 1993.
- Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, UK: Element Books, 1991.
- Carr-Gomm, Philip, ed. The Druid Renaissance. London: Thorsons, 1996.
- Harvey, Graham, and Charlotte Hardman, eds. Pagan Pathways. London: Thorsons, 1995.
- Hutton, Ronald. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles. Oxford: Blackwell, 1991.
- Jones, Prudence, and Nigel Pennick. A History of Pagan Europe. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Matthews, John, ed. The Druid Source Book. London: Blandford, 1998.
- Restall Orr, Emma. Spirits of the Sacred Grove: The World of a Druid Priestess. London: Thorsons, 1998.
- Smiles, Sam. The Image of Antiquity: Ancient Britain and the Romantic Imagination. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.
- Woodward, Ann. English Heritage Book of Shrines and Sacrifice. London: Trafalgar Square, 1992.

Druze

The Druze emerged as a new religious community in Egypt among the Ismaili Muslims during the rule of al-Hakim, the Fatimid caliph (r. 996–1021). Some Ismaili clergy began to teach that their generation was the time of the end of the era of Islam and of Islamic law. As the movement developed, they also began to proclaim the divinity of al-Hakim, who served as both caliph of the empire and imam of the primary Ismaili community. The name of the new group was derived mistakenly from that of a leading exponent of that view, al-Darazi (d. 1019), though he was not associated with the group later called Druze. Another teacher, Hamzah ibu-'Ali, the real creative voice of the community, claimed to be both imam and lord of this age.

As the movement grew among the population, the authorities in Cairo moved to suppress it. In the midst of their efforts, al-Hakim suddenly disappeared under mysterious circumstances. The Druze interpreted this event as confirmation of their beliefs. To them, he had not been killed, but had voluntarily entered a period of Occultation, or Hiddenness, from which one day he would reappear to the faithful.

The disappearance of al-Hakim simply led to even harsher suppression of the Druze, who left Egypt and settled in Syria and Lebanon. There they survived as a semisecret community. They have been reluctant to share the materials containing their secret teachings with outsiders. Converts are not allowed; one can only be born into the Druze community.

The Druze now await the return of both al-Hakim and Hamsah, whose appearances will vindicate their faith. Meanwhile, they gather for worship on Thursday (rather than Friday), and they have a doctrine of the transmigration of souls. They have abandoned the following of the Muslim law (Shariah), feeling that many of its prescriptions are no longer relevant. Their moral code centers on truthfulness, mutual assistance, and submission to God's will as the highest values. They also are proud of having abandoned social discrimination a millennium ago, their understanding having led them to grant equal rights to women and to abandon slavery.

The Druze refer to themselves as al-Muwahhidun, which means those who believe in the Unity of God. While the Druze community remained strongest in Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine, it has become widely dispersed, beginning in the 19th century. The first American Druze community was organized in 1908. The American Druze Society was designed to protect the Druze identity, culture, and faith, as well as to serve the Druze community. Druze communities can also now be found across Latin America (Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Mexico, Chile, and Colombia). Others have settled in the West Indies, Australia, the Philippines, France, the United Kingdom, and Nigeria. The Druze in diaspora maintain a strong tie with the base community in the Middle East. There are an estimated 500,000 Druze worldwide, of which more than 400,000 live in Syria, Lebanon, and Israel.

Contact with the community for outsiders has been facilitated by the publication of Adam Magazine, a bilingual periodical (in Arabic and English). It and the Druze community may be contacted through the Druze website at <http://www.druzenet.org>. The American Druze Society and various local Druze communities also have Internet presence.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ismaili Islam; Shia Islam.

References

- Abu-Izzeddin, Neila M. The Druzes: A New Study of Their History, Faith, and Society. Leiden: Brill, 1993.
- Betts, Robert Brenton. The Druze. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Bryer, D. R. W. "The Origins of the Druze Religion." Der Islam 52 (1975): 47–84, 239–262.
- Firro, Kais M. A History of the Druzes. Leiden: Brill, 1992.
- Hitti, Philip K. Origins of the Druze People and Religion. London: Saqi Books, 2008.

Dussera

See Navaratri/Dashain.

Dutch Reformed Church

The Dutch Reformed Church is one of the two large churches in the Reformed tradition operating in South Africa that grew out of the settlement of the Cape of Good Hope by the Dutch in the 17th century. The church dates to 1672. After some years, church leaders began to institute missions among both the slave population that developed and the Native population, but they always maintained a very separate existence between the white European membership and the African membership. The church became independent of Holland after the British took control of the Cape Colony at the beginning of the 19th century. It held its first synod as an independent body in 1824.

The church spread through South Africa, but experienced two major splits in the middle of the 19th century. Issues causing tensions included geography, with a more conservative theology prevalent among settlers in the Transvaal. Arguments developed over whether hymns other than those derived from the biblical book of Psalms could be used. The Dutch Reformed Church based in the Cape area also adopted a more liberal interpretation of the basic Reformed documents (the Heidelberg Catechism, the Belgic Confession, and the Canons of Dort).

In 1862, the Supreme Court ruled that representatives of the Dutch Reformed congregations outside the Cape Colony could not sit in the synod of the Dutch Reformed Church. As a result, these congregations severed their formal ties to the church and established separate synods for the Transvaal, Orange Free State, and Natal. Later, a separate Dutch Reformed Church also arose for the same reasons in South-West Africa. These five churches remained in a friendly relationship, and in 1907 they formed a federation. They merged in 1962 to constitute the present Dutch Reformed Church (Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk).

The Dutch Reformed Church is headed by a general synod, and its congregations divided into presbyteries and synods. In the 1990s it reported 1.3 million members in 1,260 congregations. Missionaries from this church spread across the southern part of Africa in the late 19th century and were responsible for what have become independent national churches in Malawi, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Mozambique, Nigeria, Kenya, and Namibia. It has also built a number of social service institutions across South Africa.

As the issue of apartheid gained world attention, the Dutch Reformed Church, defensive of its segregated church life, withdrew from the World Council of Churches. Then in 1982, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches declared apartheid a sin and the theological justification for it that had been offered a heresy. It suspended the membership of the Dutch Reformed Church. By the end of the 1990s, with the changing events and stances being developed in the post-apartheid era, the Dutch Reformed Church began to rebuild its ecumenical relations. In 1997, the WARC readmitted it to membership, anticipating the church's formal rejection of apartheid. The church is also a member of the Reformed Ecumenical Council. It has yet to rejoin the World Council of Churches, but is a member of the South African Council of Churches, which is affiliated with the Council's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism.

In November 2006, leaders of the Dutch Reformed Church met with representatives of the Reformed Church in Africa, the Uniting Reformed Church in Southern Africa, and the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa to begin an exploration of the possibilities of reunion of the churches of the Reformed heritage in the country. While any possible merger is some years away, the meeting made manifest the strong intent of the assembled group to actively pursue reunion.

Dutch Reformed Church

General Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church
1200 Pretorius Street
PO Box 13528
Hatfield
0028 South Africa
<http://www.ngkerk.org.za/english/whoarewe.asp>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Ecumenical Council; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Uniting Reformed Church in Southern Africa; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Brown, E. A Historical Profile of the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa. Edinburgh: Department of Religious Studies in association with Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies, 1972.
- Elphick, Richard, and Rodney Davenport, eds. Christianity in South Africa. A Political, Social, and Cultural History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Kuperus, Tracy. State, Civil Society and Apartheid in South Africa: An Examination of Dutch Reformed Church-State Relations. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1999.

Tayob, Abdulkader. Maintaining Apartheid or Promoting Change? The Role of the Dutch Reformed Church in a Phase of Increasing Conflict in South Africa. Munich: Waxmann Verlag GmbH, 2004.

Religions of the World

Second Edition

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

E

East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends

American representatives of the Society of Friends (now the Friends United Meeting) began mission work in Kaunosi, Kenya, in 1902. Work concentrated on the Kakamega and Bungoma districts in the western part of the country and later extended into the Rift Valley, the Nyanza Province, and the two large cities (Nairobi and Mombasa). Over the next four decades, the work grew into the largest Yearly Meeting (association) of Friends in the world. The East Africa Yearly Meeting became self-governing in 1946 and became responsible for all of the properties formerly owned by the mission in 1964. More recently, it became the source of a set of closely related Yearly Meetings.

A group of Kenyan Friends under the leadership of Johnstone Namufweli moved into Uganda in 1948 and founded a Monthly Meeting (congregation) at Kampala. They were joined by others who migrated in the mid-1950s at the invitation of the colonial government. They were set apart as an independent Yearly Meeting in 1969. In 1952 the government of Tanganyika (now Tanzania) invited Kenyans to relocate there, and some Friends were among those who accepted the invitation. The first group settled in Ikoma in the Musoma District, where the first congregation was established. The Tanzania congregations remained a part of the Kenyan work until 1968, when the Tanzania Yearly Meeting was formed.

In 1973, the work in Kenya was reorganized into nine districts, and the first of what became five Yearly Meetings (Elgon Religious Society of Friends) established. In 1979 the East Africa Yearly Meeting (South) held its first meeting and is now the largest of the Friends Yearly Meetings, with some 47,000 members.

Yearly Meetings are congregational associations that are the basic organization unit among Friends. The East Africa Yearly Meeting (North) (with 13,000 members) and the Nairobi Yearly Meeting (with 4,000 members) were established in 1987. Among the five Kenyan associations, the East Africa Yearly Meeting sponsors the Friends Bible Institute (for the training of pastors) and Friends College, both in Aimosi. At the beginning of the new century, the East Africa Year Meeting was a member of the World Council of Churches, but has since withdrawn. It remains a member of the National Council of Churches of Kenya.

East Africa Yearly Meeting (South)
PO Box 35
Tiriki
Kenya

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Friends United Meeting; World Council of Churches.

References

- Kimball, Herbert, and Beatrice Kimball, eds. Go into All the World: A Centennial Celebration of Friends in East Africa. Richmond, IN: Friends United Press, 2002.
- Painter, Levinus King. The Hill of Vision: The Story of the Quaker Movement in East Africa; 1902–1965. Kenya: East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends, 1951.
- Quakers around the World*. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1994.
- Rasmussen, Ane Marie Bak. A History of the Quaker Movement in Africa. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.

East Java Christian Church

The East Java Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Jawi Wetan [GKJW]) dates to the activities of Christian laypeople operating in East Java early in the 19th century. In the 1930s two European laypeople, one a German watchmaker, the other an Indo-Russian farmer, introduced Christianity into the Muslim community around Surabaya. They baptized an initial convert in 1843. During this time, the watchmaker spent several periods in jail for violating the law against proselytizing Muslims. Eventually a small congregation emerged, which in 1850 came under the care of the mission of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands. Over the next generations the mission grew slowly but steadily. In 1931 a synod was organized. At this time there were some 23,000 baptized members, almost all residing in rural areas.

As with other missions in Indonesia, the missionaries remained in control until the Japanese arrived in 1942. The war and period of occupation totally disrupted the church, which took the rest of the decade to recover. Growth began again in the 1950s and resumed its pattern of steady development in what is a predominantly Muslim part of the country. Associated with the church are a set of schools, an orphanage, and a variety of medical facilities.

In 2005 the church reported 130,000 members in 148 congregations. It was a founding member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

East Java Christian Church
Jin Shodanchoo Supriadi 18
Malang 65147 Jawa Timur
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church in the Netherlands (Liberated); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:

William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Easter

The high feast of the Christian church, Easter celebrates the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Even those churches that typically do not follow the liturgical year calendar will observe Easter. The timing of all of the other moveable feasts in the Christian year revolves around Easter, showing this event's central position in Christian doctrine and worship. Easter Sunday is preceded by the 40 days of Lent and Holy Week. The feast begins a 50-day season of "Eastertide" that includes Ascension Day and leads to Pentecost.

There is biblical and early church evidence that Christians originally celebrated the resurrection of Christ every Sunday. At some point in the first two centuries of the church, however, it became customary to further celebrate the event annually during the Jewish Passover season, the time of year when Jesus was crucified, buried, and raised.

Prior to the fourth century, because of its Passover associations, the holy day was called Pascha. The word for Easter in most European languages still derives from this root. However, the English word "Easter," which parallels the German word Ostern, has less certain origins. Saint Bede the Venerable (672–735 CE) was the first to suggest that the term comes from Estre, the Anglo-Saxon goddess of spring and fertility. A related and more commonly accepted theory is that the word originated from early Christian designation of Easter week as in albis, the Latin plural for alba ("dawn"). This word evolved into eostarum in Old High German, the precursor of the modern German and English term for spring. This parallels the development of the word "Lent," which also has spring connotations.

Easter, like the Jewish Passover, is a moveable feast. Originally, churches in Asia celebrated Easter on the same day as Passover, regardless of the day of the week on which it fell. All other churches in other regions celebrated Easter on the first Sunday after Passover.

Catholics take part in an Easter procession celebrating Jesus Christ's resurrection in Niquinohomo, Nicaragua. (AP Photo/Esteban Felix)

Based on a formula decided by the Council of Nicaea in 325 CE, Easter is celebrated on the first Sunday following the first full moon after the Spring Equinox. As a result, Easter Sunday can fall between March 22 and April 25, depending on the lunar cycle. To complicate matters further, most Eastern churches use the Julian calendar (as revised early in the 20th century) and a 19-year lunar cycle while Western churches follow an 84-year cycle. Consequently, the Orthodox Easter sometimes falls on the same day as the Western Easter while at other times the two celebrations can occur as much as five weeks apart.

While there are many and varied liturgical customs associated with Easter, the Easter Vigil serves as the core of the event's worship activities. Before sunrise on Easter Sunday, worshippers gather in darkness for the lighting of the Christ, or Paschal, candle. From this new fire, worshippers light other candles to illuminate the entire sanctuary. Readings from the Gospels and songs of praise accompany the celebration of lights.

The sanctuary is newly adorned in the colors of Easter: white and gold. White symbolizes the hope of the resurrection, as well as the purity and newness that comes from victory over sin and death. The gold symbolizes the light of the world brought by the risen Christ who enlightens the world. The cross is no longer draped in black. Instead, it is covered in flowers and the top is draped in white.

The Easter Vigil has evolved into an outdoor sunrise service for many churches. The spreading dawn adds to the celebration of lights and candles. The practice may derive from the Gospel narrative of Jesus' resurrection, which states that Mary Magdalene went to the tomb "while it was still dark" (John 20:1) or as dawn was breaking (Matthew 28:1; Luke 24:1).

From the earliest days of the church, Easter has been the primary time for the baptism of new converts. It is a fitting time to celebrate not only Jesus' resurrection from death to life, but also the symbolism of death and resurrection of the Christian through the waters of baptism. At one time those baptized changed into new white clothes to symbolize their new life in Christ. This has led to the tradition of buying new clothes at Easter.

Easter has accumulated many traditions derived from folk customs, many of which were associated with springtime fertility celebrations. For example, the popular modern Easter symbols of eggs and rabbits are ancient Pagan symbols for fertility. The church prohibited the eating of eggs during the Lenten fast, so by the 13th century the custom arose of collecting and decorating eggs that were laid during Holy Week in anticipation of breaking the fast. The egg itself became a symbol of the resurrection. Just as Jesus rose from the tomb, the egg symbolizes new life emerging from the eggshell.

The custom of associating a rabbit with Easter arose in Protestant areas in Europe in the 17th century but did not become common until the 19th century. The Easter rabbit was said to lay the eggs as well as decorate and hide them.

Kevin Quast

See also: Holy Week; Lent; Liturgical Year; Passover.

References

- Aveni, Anthony. "The Easter/Passover Season: Connecting Time's Broken Circle." In The Book of the Year: A Brief History of Our Seasonal Holidays, 64–78. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Bradshaw, Paul F., and Lawrence A. Hoffman, eds. Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Cantalamessa, Raneiro. The Mystery of Easter. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1993.
- Chupungco, Anscar. Shaping the Easter Feast. Washington, DC: Pastoral Press, 1992.
- Holweck, Frederick. "Easter." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 5. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1909.
- Jones, Cheslyn, Geoffrey Wainwright, Edward Yarnold, and Paul Bradshaw, eds. The Study of Liturgy, Revised Edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Nocent, Adrian. The Liturgical Year. Vol. 3, The Paschal Triduum, The Easter Season. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1977.
- Ramshaw, Gail. The Three Day Feast: Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, Easter. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 2004.

Easter Island

Easter Island, a single isolated volcanic island, is located in the Pacific Ocean some 2,000 miles west of the coast of South America and an equal distance east of the clusters of inhabited islands of the South Pacific. Locally known as Rapa Nui, it received its Western name from Admiral Jacob Roggeveen (1659–1729), whose three ships visited the island on Easter Day in 1722. It would be Roggeveen who informed the world of the giant statues that seemed to peer out to sea from the island. Many interactions would occur between the Easter islanders and the outside world over the next two centuries, but not until the eye-catching work of anthropologist/adventurer Thor Heyerdahl (1914–2002) in the 1940s did the general public become engaged with the questions concerning the origins of the island's residents and its unique statuary.

Following Roggeveen's initial visit, additional ships occasionally stopped. Then early in the 19th century, a visit by a whaling vessel led to the spread of venereal disease. In the 1860s Peruvians raided the islands for slave labor, taking much of its political and religious leadership. The great majority of those taken died within a few years. Disease introduced by others killed most of those who escaped slavery. A mere 111 islanders were alive by the mid-1870s. The sudden loss of the island's religious leadership, who carried the group memories for what was a pre-literate people, led to the significant loss of knowledge concerning the island's history and culture. Through the last decades of the 20th century, anthropologists and other scientists spent many hours attempting to reconstruct the island's past.

The annexation of the island by Chile in 1888 did little to improve the residents' lot, as the island was turned over to commercial interests who ran it much like a slave labor camp. The harsh conditions did not improve when the island was turned over to Chile's navy in 1953.

Thor Heyerdahl came to Easter Island in 1955 bringing his celebrity over the popularization of his idea that the Polynesians originated in the Americas rather than Asia. He focused attention on the mystery surrounding the large stone heads. The team he assembled put together an initial story, which became the subject of several scholarly studies and a popular book. The islands had been inhabited since the fourth century BCE. He also found in the oldest statuary on the island a resemblance to contemporaneous statuary from South America.

Heyerdahl's work had a dramatic effect on the island. The Chilean government saw the possibility of attracting tourists. The islands saw their opportunity to reorder their relationship to their overlords. In 1966, they revolted and forced the writing of a Constitution that included a set of freedoms. Incorporating the island into modern transportation systems opened it to both tourists and scholars. Life steadily improved, and by the end of the century, the population had risen to approximately 2,000.

The archaeological community viewed Heyerdahl's study as merely a first step in understanding Easter Island. He focused his relatively brief study on the statues, locally called moais. These male figures stood some 13 feet high and weighed some 14 tons. They had been carved out of the volcanic rock. Their mystery was accentuated by the lack of written records concerning them and the loss of much of the oral tradition. It was also the case that by the 20th century, all of the statues, the existence of which had featured prominently in the early Western accounts of the island, had been toppled. Heyerdahl began the task of replacing the figures in their earlier resting places.

The mystery of the statues opened the door to the more complete study of the island's history and culture. In the late 20th century, UCLA archaeologist Jo Anne Van Tilburg emerged as the chief scholar of Easter Island lore. She deduced that the statues represented stylized images of various chiefs. She dated their initial erection to the years 1400 to 1600, during which time they played a key role in the religious life of the Rapa Nui. They appear to have served as contact points for communication with divine entities. The lack of definitive records, however, has left the door open to variant opinions on the statues and the island's history.

In 1995, Easter Island (Rapa Nui) was added to the list of World Heritage Sites designated by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Fischer, Steven Roger. Island at the End of the World: The Turbulent History of Easter Island. London: Reaktion Books, 2006.
- Heyerdahl, Thor. Aku-Aku: The Secret of Easter Island. London: Allen & Unwin, 1958.
- Heyerdahl, Thor. Easter Island: The Mystery Solved. New York: Random House, 1989.
- Orliac, Catherine, and Michel Orliac. Easter Island: Mystery of the Stone Giants. New York: Harry N. Abrams Inc., 1995.
- Van Tilburg, Jo Anne, and John Mack. Easter Island: Archaeology, Ecology, and Culture. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1995.

Eastern Orthodoxy

Together, the Eastern Orthodox churches constitute one of the three major traditions of Christianity (Roman Catholicism and Protestantism being the other two). Eastern Orthodoxy emerged as the dominant expression of Christianity in the eastern half of the Mediterranean world in the eastern half of the Roman Empire (which after the fall of Rome in 475 came to be known as the Byzantine Empire), and its organizational focus was on the archbishops at Constantinople (originally Byzantium, later Istanbul), Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. Greek was the dominant language, as opposed to Latin in the western Mediterranean, where after the fall of Rome the bishop of Rome became more and more important, leading the whole Western church as pope. Through the centuries, the organizational unity of Christendom was gradually weakened by theologically divergent churches in Armenia, Egypt, Persia, and lands to the east. Then in the 11th century, the most significant schism occurred, that between the Roman Catholic Church and the Greek Orthodox churches.

Mosaic in a Ukrainian Orthodox church, Edmonton, Alberta, Canada. (J. Gordon Melton)

Today, Eastern Orthodoxy consists of a number of churches, which are divided nationally and ethnically, but held together in communion through a shared faith, which finds expression in their version of the Nicene Creed. The Eastern Orthodox have a technical theological disagreement with the Roman Catholic Church concerning the place of the Holy Spirit in the Trinity. In the Nicene Creed as recited in Eastern Orthodox churches, belief is affirmed in “the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father.” In the Roman Catholic version of the creed, the phrase “and the Son” is added at this point, so that it reads, “the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Father and the Son.” The Eastern church rejected that phrase, believing that it suggested an undue subordination of the Holy Spirit.

The Eastern church also did not develop the ideal of celibacy of the clergy as in the Roman Catholic Church, though it insists that priests marry before receiving Holy Orders and that bishops be drawn from unmarried priests (primarily from its monks, who live in ordered communities).

The archbishop of Istanbul, the ecumenical patriarch, is the symbolic focus of the unity of Eastern Orthodoxy. His jurisdiction, the Ecumenical Patriarchate, includes Turkey (the former base of the Roman Empire in the East, usually referred to as the Byzantine Empire), parts of Greece, all of Europe not specifically assigned to other jurisdictions, and the Greek-speaking Orthodox in North and South America. The remainder of the Mediterranean is divided between the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, and the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa.

Through the centuries a variety of autonomous Orthodox jurisdictions have been recognized, most separating from the Ecumenical Patriarchate as they grew in size and their country asserted its independence. Important Orthodox churches include the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, the Orthodox Church of Greece, the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, and the Romanian Orthodox Church. There are in addition a number of smaller autonomous jurisdictions.

Also, during the centuries since the schism between the Eastern and Western churches, a variety of Orthodox communities have for various reasons moved back into communion with the Roman Catholic Church and now exist as Eastern-rite Catholic churches. Such Eastern-rite churches now parallel most Orthodox jurisdictions.

There are some Orthodox churches that are not in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. Some of these were formed during the 20th century, as Marxist governments rose in predominantly Orthodox countries. It was the feeling of some members of these churches that they could not remain in communion with bishops who had tacitly offered allegiance to such government authorities. The largest of these anti-Communist Orthodox churches is the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia, formed by Russian bishops who were outside the country at the time of the Russian Revolution and who attempted to reorganize the Russian parishes in the diaspora.

In the late 20th century, as the Orthodox Church began to participate in the ecumenical movement as expressed in the World Council of Churches, the more conservative church leaders saw such relationships as inherently subversive of Orthodox faith and practice. Their protest was focused in the change of most Orthodox churches from the traditional Julian calendar to the more commonly used Gregorian calendar. The conservative dissenting jurisdictions are generally known as "Old Calendar" churches.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem; Orthodox Church of Greece; Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bartholomew, Patriarch. Encountering the Mystery: Understanding Orthodox Christianity Today. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 2008.
- Clendenin, Daniel B. Eastern Orthodox Christianity: A Western Perspective. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2003.
- Fitzgerald, Thomas E. The Orthodox Church. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995.
- Orthodoxia*. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches. Rome, Italy: Pont. Institutum Studiorum Orientalium, 1988.
- Schmemmann, Alexander. The Historic Road of Eastern Orthodoxy. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1963.

ECKANKAR

ECKANKAR, also known as "The Religion of the Light and Sound of God," was founded by Paul Twitchell (ca. 1908–1971) in California in 1965. Although it claims to be the oldest religion in the world, its beliefs and practices bear striking resemblances to the Punjabi Radhasoami tradition, Western Esoteric traditions such as those found in the Theosophical Society and Rosicrucianism (the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis), and certain aspects of the Church of Scientology. The essence of ECKANKAR lies in its spiritual practices, which are said to lead the individual into greater union with God and toward becoming a co-worker with God. The practices taught by ECKANKAR include singing the mantra "Hu" (an especially holy name for God) and bilocation (soul travel). Eckists believe that they can be in more than one place simultaneously and that many dreams are actually such experiences. ECKANKAR teaches them how to interpret the spiritual meanings of dreams.

Paul Twitchell wrote several books about and for ECKANKAR, including the first volumes of an open-ended canon of ECKANKAR scriptures known as Shariyat-Ki-Sugmad. Twitchell died in 1971 and was succeeded by Darwin Gross, who was in turn succeeded as “Living ECK Master” (spiritual leader and oracle of God) by Harold Klemp in the early 1980s. Under Klemp and ECKANKAR’s president, Peter Skelskey, ECKANKAR relocated its world headquarters from California to Minneapolis, Minnesota, in the late 1980s. The world headquarters includes the Temple of ECK, ECKANKAR’s primary worship center, in Chanhasen, Minnesota. The organization does not publish membership statistics but claims to have tens of thousands of adherents worldwide. It is a nonexclusive religious organization, so many members are also members of other religious groups.

The highest authority in ECKANKAR is the Living ECK Master, and Harold Klemp is considered the 973rd such person in world history. ECKANKAR chelas (devotees) regard Klemp as their spiritual guide and believe that he appears to them and teaches them in their dreams. Klemp is believed to be in touch with a group of spiritual guides known as the Order of Vairagi Masters. The spiritual teachings and practices of ECKANKAR are determined by Klemp and communicated to the chelas via books, correspondence courses, and magazines published by Illuminated Way Publishing Company. ECKANKAR also produces videos, which often feature talks given by Klemp, and these are shown on cable television. ECKANKAR centers exist in numerous cities in North America, Europe, and Africa.

ECKANKAR has endured several controversies since its founding. Paul Twitchell’s autobiography and credibility as a genuine spiritual leader was questioned by at least one scholar. David Christopher Lane’s exposé of Twitchell and ECKANKAR, entitled The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and ECKANKAR, has plagued ECKANKAR since its first publication in the late 1970s. Controversy surrounded the departure of Darwin Gross and his succession by Harold Klemp. Many Minnesotans initially objected to the building of ECKANKAR’s temple in suburban Minneapolis, claiming that a cult was appearing in their midst. However, under Klemp’s capable leadership, ECKANKAR has managed to survive these controversies and has settled into a more stable life among the West’s relatively new alternative religions.

ECKANKAR
PO Box 27300
Minneapolis, MN 55427
<http://www.eckankar.org>

Roger E. Olson

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Church of Scientology; Theosophical Society (American).

References

- Klemp, Harold, The Spiritual Exercises of ECK. Minneapolis: ECKANKAR, 1993.
- Lane, David Christopher. The Making of a Spiritual Movement: The Untold Story of Paul Twitchell and ECKANKAR. Del Mar, CA: Del Mar Press, 1993.
- Olson, Roger E. “ECKANKAR: From Ancient Science of Soul Travel to New Age Religion.” In America’s Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Twitchell, Paul. ECKANKAR: The Key to Secret Worlds. Minneapolis: Illuminated Way Publishing, 1969, 1987.

■ Ecuador

Ecuador is located on the Pacific Coast of South America, between Peru to the south and Colombia to the north. This small Andean nation has an area of 109,483 square miles and a population of 14.6 million (July 2009), of which 66 percent is urban and 34 percent is rural. The country also includes the famous Galápagos Islands in the Pacific Ocean, about 600 miles west of the mainland. It is one of only two countries (with Chile) in South America that do not have a border with Brazil.

Ecuador

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,830,000	13,364,000	97.0	1.14	15,466,000	17,036,000
Roman Catholics	5,844,000	12,532,000	91.0	0.82	14,000,000	15,250,000
Protestants	82,900	532,000	3.9	5.17	850,000	1,000,000
Marginals	13,700	380,000	2.8	3.81	570,000	750,000
Agnostics	19,000	211,000	1.5	5.33	400,000	700,000
Ethnoreligionists	90,000	125,000	0.9	1.24	105,000	100,000
Atheists	6,000	21,000	0.2	1.20	29,000	50,000
Baha'is	16,400	17,200	0.1	1.20	25,000	35,000
Buddhists	2,000	14,600	0.1	1.20	17,500	24,000
Chinese folk	4,000	13,200	0.1	1.20	18,000	21,500
Jews	2,000	4,200	0.0	1.20	4,200	5,000
New religionists	1,000	3,000	0.0	1.20	5,000	7,500
Muslims	0	1,800	0.0	1.19	4,000	9,000
Total population	5,970,000	13,775,000	100.0	1.20	16,074,000	17,988,000

Ecuador’s population is very diverse, comprising many races and ethnic groups. In general, Ecuadorans trace their origins to four sources: Amerindians, Europeans, Africans, and Asians. Mestizos (mixed Amerindian and Spanish ancestry) are by far the largest of ethnic groups, constituting more than 65 percent of the current population. In second place are Amerindians, who are approximately 25 percent of the population. The whites are mainly criollos, who are descendants of Spanish colonists, and are about 7 percent of the population. In addition, there were waves of immigration from the Middle East, Italy, Germany, France, and other European countries. The Afro-Ecuadoran community, descendants of African slaves and freedmen, includes Negros, mulattos, and zambos, and it constitutes most of the remaining 3 percent of the population.

Since the early 1900s, Ecuador has experienced increased immigration from the Middle East, Asia (especially China and Japan), North America, and Europe. Today, Ecuador has about 95,000 U.S. expatriates and 30,000 European Union expatriates.

The community of Middle Easterners numbers in the tens of thousands, mostly of Lebanese, Syrian, or Palestinian origin. Many are prominent in commerce and industry, and are concentrated in the coastal cities of Guayaquil, Quevedo, and Machala; most are Eastern Orthodox Christians. The Arab-Ecuadoran community has created many cultural organizations to honor and celebrate their heritage, although most of those born in Ecuador do not speak Arabic. They are well assimilated into the local culture and are referred to commonly as turcos since the early Middle Eastern migrants arrived with passports issued by the Ottoman Empire at the beginning of the 20th century.

There are an estimated 225,000 English speakers and 112,000 German speakers in Ecuador of which the majority reside in Quito, mainly descendants of immigrants who arrived in the late 1800s. There are also small communities of Italians, Jews, Armenians, French, and Greeks. The Jewish community, which numbers less than 500, is mostly of German or Italian descent.

Also, there is a small East Asian–Ecuadoran community, estimated at 25,000; it mainly consists of those of Japanese and Chinese descent whose ancestors arrived as miners, farm laborers, or fishermen in the late 1800s.

Until the end of the 19th century, the Ecuadoran population was concentrated in the central highlands (the Andes Mountains run through the center of the country and surround the central highlands, known as the Sierra region), due to the prevalence of malaria and yellow fever in the coastal region, but today’s population is distributed about equally between the highlands and the coastal lowlands. Migration toward cities, particularly larger cities, in all regions has increased the urban population to about 55 percent of the national population. The majority of Ecuador's small but vibrant upper- to middle-class population segment is distributed between the capital, Quito, and Guayaquil, each home to 1.5 to 2.0 million inhabitants.

The Oriente region, composed of Amazonian lowlands to the east of the Andes and covering about half the country's total land area, includes some of the headwaters of the Amazon River and remains sparsely populated. It contains only about 3 percent of the population, many of whom are unassimilated Amerindians who maintain a wary distance from the more recent arrivals: mestizo and white settlers. This region is home to nine tribes of indigenous peoples who survive mainly as hunters and gatherers: the Quichua, Shuar, Achuar, Waorani, Siona, Secoya, Shiwiar, Záparo, and Cofan. These groups are all represented politically by the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of the Ecuadorian Amazon (CONFENIAE). By contrast, the Colorado Indians (about 2,300 in 2000) inhabit the northwestern jungle area west of Quito, around Santo Domingo de los Colorados, in the Pacific lowlands.

Occasional visits by outsiders to the Oriente region, seeking gold, land, trade, and converts occurred during and after the Spanish colonial period. These early contacts between Europeans and the indigenous people were disastrous because new diseases were introduced that decimated the tribal population. Later, the Amazon rubber boom in the 19th and early 20th centuries brought increased contact with Europeans, causing measles, malaria, and tuberculosis epidemics that further reduced the Native population.

Recent settlers in the Amazonian lowlands are the result of a small wave of immigration (mainly mestizo migrants from the central highlands) that began in the 1960s, when government-sponsored multinational corporations began to exploit petroleum reserves in the region. The boom in the petroleum industry led to mushrooming towns as well as to substantial deforestation, pollution of wetlands and lakes, and the further decline of the indigenous population.

Current Religious Situation The nation's Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and the government has generally respected this right in practice.

The government, at all levels, seeks to protect this right in full and does not tolerate its abuse, by either governmental or private actors. The only limits imposed by the government are "those proscribed by law to protect and respect the diversity, plurality, security and rights of others." The Constitution prohibits discrimination based on religion.

The Catholic Episcopal Conference estimates that 85 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, with 35 percent of Catholics actively practicing. Although no scientific survey has been undertaken, the Episcopal Conference estimates that attendance at Mass increased slightly during the 2000s. Some ethnolinguistic groups, particularly indigenous people who live in the mountains, follow a syncretistic form of Catholicism that combines animistic Amerindian beliefs and practices with orthodox Catholic doctrine. Catholic saints often are venerated in ways similar to those associated with indigenous deities.

Based on research conducted by PROLADES (Programa Latinoamericano de Estudios Sociorreligiosos), religious affiliation in Ecuador can be described as follows in 2000: Roman Catholic, 85 percent; Protestant, 12 percent; other religions, 1 percent; and none/no response, 2 percent. The latter category includes atheists and agnostics, but there are no reliable statistics for these specific groups.

While Protestant conversions traditionally have been more numerous among the lower classes, growing numbers of the middle class and professionals are converting to Protestantism or marginal Christian groups. There has been success finding new converts in different regions, particularly among indigenous people in the Andean provinces of Chimborazo, Bolívar, Cotopaxi, Imbabura, and Pichincha, especially among persons who practice syncretistic religions, as well as among the marginalized sectors of society, especially in urban areas.

Historical Overview of Social, Political and Religious Development Evidence of human cultures exists in Ecuador from ca. 3500 BCE. Many ancient civilizations were created and developed throughout Ecuador, such as the Valdivia culture and Machalilla culture on the coast, the Quitus (near present-day Quito), and the Cañari (near present-day Cuenca). Each civilization developed its own distinctive architecture, pottery, and religious characteristics. After years of fiery resistance by the Cayambes and other tribes, as demonstrated by the Battle of Yahuarcocha (“Blood Lake”), where thousands of warriors were killed and thrown into the lake, the region succumbed to the expansion of the Incas and was loosely assimilated into the Inca Empire in 1453. The most prominent of the conquered tribes were the Quichua (or Quechua), whose center was located at Quito.

ECUADOR

In 1531, the Spanish conquistadors arrived under the leadership of Francisco Pizarro to find an Inca Empire torn by strife and civil war. In subsequent years, the Spanish colonists became the new elite in the Andean region, with their centers of power in the viceroyalties of Lima and New Granada. Warfare and disease decimated the indigenous population during the first decades of Spanish rule, when the Native people were forced into the encomienda labor system of the Spanish landlords. In 1563, Quito became the seat of an audiencia royal (administrative district) of Spain and part of the Viceroyalty of Lima, and in 1717 it became part of the Viceroyalty of Nueva Granada, which included Colombia and Venezuela.

After nearly 300 years of Spanish colonization, Quito was still a small city of only 10,000 inhabitants. It was there, on August 10, 1809 (now, a national holiday), that the first call for independence from Spain was made in Latin America (Primer Grito de la Independencia), under the leadership of the city's criollos such as Carlos Montúfar, Eugenio Espejo, and Bishop Cuero y Caicedo. Quito's nickname, Luz de América ("Light of America"), comes from the idea that this first attempt produced the inspiration for the rest of Spanish America. Quito is also known as La Cara de Dios ("The Face of God") for its beauty.

On October 9, 1820, Guayaquil became the first city in Ecuador to gain its independence from Spain. On May 24, 1822, the rest of Ecuador gained its independence after Field Marshal Antonio José de Sucre defeated the Spaniard Royalist forces at the Battle of Pichincha, near Quito. Following the battle, Ecuador joined Liberator Simón Bolívar's Republic of Gran Colombia (modern-day Colombia and Venezuela), but withdrew from Gran Colombia and became an independent nation in 1830.

The 19th century was marked by instability in Ecuador, with a rapid succession of rulers. Between 1833 and 1908, the nation had 19 presidents. The opposing political parties were the Conservatives (or Clericals) and the Liberals. The first president was the Venezuelan-born Juan José Flores (r. 1830–1834, 1839–1843, 1843–1845), who was ultimately deposed, followed by many other authoritarian leaders. The Conservative Gabriel García Moreno (r. 1861–1865) unified the country in the 1860s with the support of the Roman Catholic Church. In the late 19th century, world demand for cocoa (chocolate) tied the economy to commodity exports and led to migrations of people from the highlands to the agricultural frontier on the Pacific coast.

The country continued under the leadership of an oligarchy of large landowners. Their stranglehold on the country prevented land reform, and their ineptitude led to the loss of areas of the country to their neighbors. Present-day Ecuador represents approximately 20 percent of the country's original territory at the time of independence from Spain.

The Liberal Revolution of 1895 led by José Eloy Alfaro Delgado (r. 1895–1901, 1906–1911) reduced the power of the Catholic clergy and the Conservative land owners of the highlands, and revoked the Concordat with the Vatican. He is credited with the separation of church and state in Ecuador and for implementing many political and civil rights, such as freedom of speech and the legalization of civil marriage and divorce.

The Ecuadoran Radical Liberal Party (Partido Liberal Radical Ecuatoriano [PLRE]) is the oldest existing political party in Ecuador. The PLRE emerged out of divisions between moderate and radical liberals within the Liberal Party of Ecuador. As in many Latin American countries, Ecuador experienced a great deal of conflict, often violent, between the Liberal and Conservative parties. Alfaro Delgado brought the Liberal Party to power during the revolution of 1895, which adopted a policy of secularization in church matters. The PLRE was officially founded in 1925, and during the next 50 years several of its members served as presidents of Ecuador. The PLRE was in power from 1895 to 1911, from 1921 to 1952, and from 1960 to 1970. Each time it was overthrown by military coups.

The Liberals retained power until the military "Julian Revolution" of 1925, which gave ultimate political freedom to all Ecuadorans, including the Catholic hierarchy. The 1930s and 1940s were marked by instability and the emergence of populist politicians, such as five-time president José María Velasco Ibarra (r. 1934–1935, 1944–1947, 1952–1956, 1960–1961, and 1968–1972 [as dictator]). However, he only served one of those terms (1952–1956) without being ousted by the army.

In 1972, a “revolutionary and nationalist” military junta overthrew the government of dictator Velasco Ibarra (r. 1968–1972). The coup d’état was led by General Guillermo Rodríguez. The new president exiled Velasco Ibarra to Argentina and served as head of the Supreme Government Council until 1976, when he was removed by another military coup. The new military junta was led by Admiral Alfredo Poveda, who was declared chairman of the Supreme Government Council. After the country stabilized socially and economically, this Supreme Government Council proceeded to hold democratic elections and stepped down to hand over the reins of government to the newly elected president. Elections were held in April 1979, under a new Constitution that instituted democratic rule. Jaime Roldós Aguilera (r. 1979–1981) took office as the first constitutionally elected president, but died two years later in a plane crash.

Beginning in the late 1990s, there was a high emigration of Ecuadorans due to the nation’s deteriorating economic and political conditions, which culminated in a severe economic and financial crisis in 1999. The emergence of the Amerindian population as an active political constituency has added to the democratic volatility of the country in recent years. The Quichua population, in particular, has been motivated by government failures to deliver on promises of land reform, lower unemployment, and provision of social services, and to stop the exploitation of indigenous territory by the land-holding elite.

At the start of the 2006 presidential campaign, Correa Delgado founded the Alianza PAIS (Patria Altiva y Soberana), a movement that espouses national sovereignty, regional integration, and economic relief for Ecuador’s poor and marginalized masses. After 8 ineffective presidents in 10 years, the frustrated population elected the left-leaning Correa Delgado in late 2006 (a friend of Venezuela’s current president, Hugo Chavez) who promised major governmental and economic reforms. President Correa Delgado, an economist and self-described “humanist,” took office in January 2007. Despite his earlier promises not to do so, in June 2009, Correa Delgado joined the Chavez-backed Bolivarian Alternative for the Americas (ALBA), founded in 2004 between the governments of Venezuela, Cuba, and Bolivia.

The Roman Catholic Church The Spanish introduced Roman Catholicism in the 1530s, and the Bishopric of Quito was established in 1545. Making use of the infrastructure of the Incas, both Spanish authority and the Catholic faith were established throughout the territory. Following the initial diocesan synod in 1595, a program of evangelizing the Amazon lowlands began under the Dominicans.

Missionary work among the different Amerindian tribes on the tributaries of the Amazon was difficult, and the Dominican missions were destroyed in 1599 by the savage Jivaros (Shuar and Achuar). Later, however, the Dominicans re-established themselves and were assisted by the Jesuits who had worked in Quito beginning in 1596. By the close of the 17th century, Ecuador was “well-evangelized,” according to Catholic historians.

However, after the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767, who on the Napo River alone had established 33 missions among an estimated 100,000 inhabitants, the Dominicans were unable to maintain the work and many of the converted Natives left the faith. During the colonial period, the Catholic Church founded institutions of learning such as the University of Quito, and established a printing press at the same place in 1760.

Steady progress in Christianizing the country was pursued through the 18th century; however, the country’s independence from Spain in 1822 brought many problems. The church’s dependence on Spain for priests, male and female religious workers, and financial support led to a sharp cutback in the services provided. The church’s limitations, especially in pastoral leadership and parish work, led to the further development of a popular folk Catholicism, which integrates many elements of traditional Amerindian culture, beliefs, and practices (syncretism).

In 1848, the Diocese of Quito was upgraded to an archdiocese under Archbishop Nicolás Joaquín de Arreta y Calisto, who died in September 1849 and was replaced by Archbishop Francisco Xavier de Garaycoa Llaguno in 1851.

The Catholic Church has always had an important role in Ecuadoran government and society. The Constitution of 1869, approved by the Conservative government of President Gabriel García Moreno (r. 1859–1865 and 1869–1875), declared the Roman Exterior of a Catholic church in Tena, Ecuador.

(iStockPhoto.com)

Catholic Church the nation's official religion and only Catholics could obtain citizenship. Under the new president, a Concordat was established with the Vatican (1863), new dioceses were established, and schools and missions were given back to the Jesuits, who had been permitted to return.

However, President García Moreno was murdered in August 1875, and his death not only put an end to the Concordat but also led to a wave of persecution against the church under the new political regime. In 1885, when Bishop Pietro Schumacher, C.M., became bishop of Portoviejo (established in 1870), nearly all the Native clergy were suspended and replaced by European priests and a new Conservative hierarchy was established under Archbishop José Ignacio Ordóñez (1882–1893), who participated in the First Vatican Council (December 1869–October 1870) hosted by Pope Pius IX (r. 1846–1878).

Part of the animosity García Moreno generated among Liberals was his friendship toward the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). During a period of exile, he helped a group of displaced Jesuits find refuge in Ecuador. He had also advocated legislation that would outlaw secret societies. This action and many similar ones encouraged the anti-Catholic parties of Ecuador, especially the Freemasons, to see in him an inveterate enemy. While the political situation at that time was “extremely convoluted and murky,” the fact that García Moreno was elected to a second term of office (r. 1869–1875) clearly indicates his popular appeal, both with the hierarchy of the Catholic Church and with the masses. His vigorous support of universal literacy and education based on the French model was considered both controversial and bold.

Liberal anticlerical forces in control of the government during the administration of President José Eloy Alfaro Delgado (r. 1895–1901) repudiated the Concordat with the Vatican in 1895. In 1899, the Liberal government approved a new Constitution that guaranteed freedom of religion and respected all religions. These actions were a severe blow to the Catholic Church. Religious orders, among them the Capuchins, Salesians, Missionaries of Steyl, and the various sisterhoods, were all banished and Bishop Schumacher was exiled.

In 1910, the state religion was Catholicism but other creeds were tolerated. The state provided for the maintenance of Catholic worship and supported religious educational institutions, such as the three seminaries at Quito and one in each of the six dioceses. At the same time, the state ruled that no new or foreign religious order would be permitted in the country. The Ecuadoran government was controlled by anti-clerical Liberals until 1925, when the so-called Julian Revolution led to the establishment of a new Conservative government that granted political and religious freedom to all Ecuadorans.

Diverse tensions arose within the Ecuadoran Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, the emergence of Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church's post-Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for "a preferential option for the poor" through social and political action aimed at transforming Ecuadoran society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing right-wing military dictatorships and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the "baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues"), rather than by political and social activism.

The Catholic Church has traditionally identified with the ruling Spanish elite and was thus unprepared to deal with the radical program introduced by Bishop Leonidas Eduardo Proaño Villalba (r. 1955–1987) of the Diocese of Riobamba in the Province of Chimborazo, who identified his diocese with the rights of the Quichuas and other Amerindian peoples and who introduced a broad range of programs, not only to draw them closer to the church but to bring reforms to secular society in rural areas. By the mid-1970s, Bishop Proaño Villalba was being excluded from meetings of the other bishops, but he was able to retain the support of the Vatican.

In 2004, the Ecuadoran Catholic Church was divided administratively into 4 archdioceses (Quito, Cuenca, Guayaquil, and Portoviejo) and 19 dioceses with 1,151 parishes that were served by 1,779 priests (1,019 diocesan and 760 religious priests), assisted by 69 permanent deacons, 1,360 male religious workers, and 4,759 female religious workers. Catholic male religious orders include the Franciscans, Mercedarians (Order of Our Lady of Mercy), Dominicans, Augustinians, Carmelites, Capuchins, Jesuits, Salesians, Saint Vincent de Paul (Lazaristas), Oblates, and Congregation of Saint Joseph. The current archbishop of Quito is Monsignor Raúl Eduardo Vela Chiriboga, who was appointed in March 2003.

In addition, there are two Eastern Orthodox denominations in Ecuador that are in communion with the Vatican. The Orthodox Church of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Maronite rite) was founded in 1978 in La Atarazana, Guayaquil, now led by the Reverend Flavio Alexis Alfaro, a former Roman Catholic priest. In 2002, the Holy Orthodox Catholic Church was founded in Quito (Archdiocese of Ecuador and South America) to serve Greek, Slav, and Arab Orthodox Christians; since 2004, this denomination has been led by His Eminence Vladika Chrysóstmos (an Ecuadoran), who supervises the Monastery of Anástasis and the Seminary of St. Basil in Quito.

The Protestant Movement In the face of almost total Catholic hegemony in Ecuador, James Thompson (1788–1854), a Scottish Presbyterian and agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), initiated a Protestant presence in the country in 1824. This initiative was followed up by BFBS agent Lucas Matthews in 1828. In 1835 the Reverend Isaac Watts Wheelwright, an agent of the American Bible Society (ABS), visited Guayaquil and Quito, where he assisted in the establishment of public education at the request of President Vicente Rocafuerte y Bejarano (r. 1834–1839). It was not until 1892 that another ABS agent visited Ecuador, the Reverend Francisco Penzotti, and distributed the scriptures in Guayaquil.

In 1896, the inter-denominational Gospel Missionary Union (GMU, now Avant Ministries) sent its first three missionaries, who were able to take advantage of the opening provided by the repudiation of the country's Concordat with the Vatican by the Liberal government of Eloy Alfaro (r. 1895–1901, 1906–1911). They initiated work along the Pacific coast and in the Amazonian lowlands among the Shuar and Achuar (Jivaroan) people, known as headhunters, who live in scattered communities along the tributaries of the Rio Napo and the Rio Paute, but their greatest success was among the Quichua in the Andean highlands. Later, their work was organized as the Gospel Missionary Union Churches (1949), which is now the largest non-Catholic denomination in Ecuador.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) opened work in 1897, and today its affiliated churches are called the Ecuadoran Evangelical Church. The Methodist Episcopal Church, now an integral part of the United Methodist Church in the United States, sent its first missionaries in 1900. The Seventh-day Adventist Church initiated work in 1905. Several independent Pentecostal missionaries arrived during the period 1910–1930.

After World War II, Ecuador became a major focus of evangelical Christian missions in South America, in part due to the attention brought by the work of the World Radio Missionary Fellowship. In 1931, Clarence Jones and Reuben E. Larson, both of CMA background, began Ecuador's first radio station with a 250-watt transmitter in Quito. HCJB, or the "Voice of the Andes" as it is best known, also was the first religious radio station established outside the United States.

After World War II, as other groups developed their own radio ministries, they gave support to HCJB and used it to build their various mission activities. The most famous incident associated with the station occurred in 1950s, beginning with the 1956 murder of five evangelical missionaries who, with the assistance of HCJB, had pioneered work among the Auca (Warani) Indians, a remote tribe of hunters and gatherers located in the Amazonian lowlands. The missionaries' deaths were widely reported and debated in evangelical circles, as well as the relocation of the wife and sister of two of those who were killed to Auca territory, where they bravely engaged in missionary work, which led to the eventual "conversion" of the people who had actually murdered the missionaries.

The only other Protestant groups to begin missionary work in Ecuador prior to 1945 were the Church of the Brethren in 1935 and Child Evangelism Fellowship in 1941. Among the groups that began ministries in Ecuador between 1945 and 1959 were the Missionary Church (Fort Wayne, Indiana, 1945), the Oriental Missionary Society (OMS International, 1946), the Evangelical Covenant Church (1947), Missionary Aviation Fellowship (1948), the Southern Baptist Convention (1950), the Lutheran-affiliated World Mission Prayer League (1951), Wycliffe Bible Translators (1953), the General Conference Mennonite Church, now the Mennonite Church U.S.A. (1953), Heifer Project International (1955), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (1956), the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ecuador (Missouri Synod, 1956), the United Pentecostal Church International (1957), the Church of England in Ecuador (1957, later known as the Anglican Catholic Church in 1982 and the Anglican Province of Ecuador in 1982, affiliated with the International Anglican Communion), the Berean Mission (1959), and the Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (Pentecostal, 1959).

Several older U.S. mainline denominations—the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now a constituent part of the United Church of Christ), the Presbyterian Church in the U.S., and the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (both now constituent parts of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), and the Evangelical United Brethren (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) combined their resources in 1945 to create the United Andean Mission in Ecuador. Although they intended to launch work in several countries, their efforts have been limited to Ecuador with only modest success, although its various medical, agricultural, and educational efforts have been well received.

Historically, the establishment of Protestant denominations and service agencies in Ecuador can be described as follows: prior to 1900 (4 groups), 1900–1944 (4), 1945–1959 (15), 1960s (18), 1970s (22), 1980s (18), and the 1990s (10). In summary, the period 1960–1989 witnessed the largest development of new church associations and service organizations in the country.

A number of national Amerindian churches have emerged since the mid-1960s, including the Church of the Holy Spirit (1967), the Universal Independent Church of Christ (1970), and the Voice of Jesus Christ Church, all of which are Pentecostal groups. The Association of Indigenous Evangelical Churches of Chimborazo (GMU-affiliated) was the largest Protestant or Free church association in the country in 1985: 235 congregations with an estimated 30,000 members, an average attendance of 80,000, and 130,000 adherents (Directorio de la Iglesia Evangélica del Ecuador). Other GMU-related church bodies at this time were the Association of Gospel Missionary Union Churches (founded in 1896: 8,500 adherents among mestizos), the Association of Indigenous Churches of Cotopaxi (founded in 1972: 2,000 adherents), the Association of Indigenous Churches of Tungurahua (founded in 1978: 2,000 adherents), the Association of (indigenous) Shuar Evangelical Churches (founded in 1980: 2,000 adherents), and the Association of Indigenous Churches of Pinchincha (also founded in 1980: 1,550 adherents).

The largest Protestant denominations in Ecuador in 1995, based on the World Churches Handbook, were the following: all GMU-related church associations (560 congregations with 71,800 members and an estimated 123,000 adherents), the United Pentecostal Church (65 congregations with 15,000 members and 30,000 adherents), the Christian and Missionary Alliance (190 congregations with 13,400 members and 32,500 adherents), the Baptist Convention (112 congregations with 12,300 members and 35,000 adherents), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (110 congregations with 8,100 members and 26,400 adherents), the Assemblies of God (150 congregations with 5,410 members), and the Evangelical Covenant Church (51 congregations with 3,880 members).

More recently, the Seventh-day Adventist Church reported the following statistics for the period 2001–2007: 84 churches with 42,377 members in 2001 and 150 churches with 74,096 members in 2007 (year-end statistics).

Protestant organizations were usually divided between predominantly indigenous organizations, such as the Council of Evangelical Indigenous People and Organizations (FEINE), and mestizo organizations. In large cities, Protestant mega-churches, some with more than 10,000 members, have continued to grow substantially. There is a high percentage of mestizo Protestants in the Guayaquil area.

Interdenominational work began with the establishment of the Inter-Mission Fellowship, founded in 1950, which included a spectrum of Protestant missionary organizations. It was superseded by the Ecuadoran Evangelical Confraternity (CEE) in 1964, a reflection of the emergence of autonomous Ecuadoran denominations. In 2007, the CEE membership included more than 150 denominations and independent church associations that represented conservative evangelicalism. The CEE is affiliated with the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA) and the World Evangelical Alliance.

Some of the ecumenical Protestant denominations are affiliated with the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), which established its continental headquarters in Quito in 1987. CLAI is associated with the World Council of Churches (WCC) and is active in broader ecumenical scene in the continent. CLAI members in Ecuador are: the Faith, Integrity and Hope Council of Evangelical Indigenous Organizations and Peoples of Ecuador (Consejo de Pueblos y Organizaciones Indígenas Evangélicas del Ecuador/Fe Integridad y Esperanza); the Episcopal Church of Ecuador; the Evangelical Lutheran Church; and the United Evangelical Church of Ecuador.

Other Christian Groups There are several Western Catholic denominations in Ecuador that are independent of the Vatican. The Priestly Fraternity of Ecuador (affiliated with the International Organization of Married Catholic Priests, based in the United States) is led by the Reverend Alonso Pérez of the parish of Iglesia La Dolorosa in Ambato. The Priestly Fraternity of Saint Pius X, founded in Switzerland by Mons. Marcel Lefèvre (1905–1991) in 1970, administers a parish in Quito and only celebrates the Mass in Latin; the Old Catholic Church has been led by Bishop José Javier Guanulema in Saquislí since 2005. The Reformed Catholic Church, founded in 2002 in San Camilo, Quevedo, is led by Bishop Vicente Ney Valero, a former Episcopal priest. The Latin Catholic Church, founded in 2003 in Barrio Guamaní in southern Quito, is headed by Luis Bolívar Lara, also a former Episcopal priest; this is a Spiritualist group that performs healing rituals with the “intervention” of a dead Venezuelan medical doctor, Gregorio Hernández, known as a folk healer. Finally, the Ecumenical Catholic Church was founded by Juventino Espinoza in Barrio La Cristianía in northern Quito; its current leader is Bishop José Vicente García, a lawyer.

Many non-Protestant “marginal” Christian groups are also present in Ecuador: the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS—Mormons, founded in 1965; one temple, 294 congregations and 185,663 members in 2007; on August 1, 1999, the Guayaquil Mormon Temple was dedicated by LDS President Gordon B. Hinckley); the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society (also known as Jehovah’s Witnesses: 764 congregations and 64,792 adherents in 2008); the Children of God, also known as The Family International (located in Valle de los Chillos); the Philadelphia Church of God; the Israelites of the New Universal Covenant (also in Peru and Bolivia); Christadelphian Bible Mission; the Unity School of Christianity; the Voice of the Chief Cornerstone (from Puerto Rico); Growing in Grace Ministries International (headquarters in Miami, Florida); Light of the World Church (from Mexico); and the God is Love Pentecostal Church and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God from Brazil.

Additional Religious Groups Non-Christian religions include Hinduism, Judaism, Buddhism, Baha’i Faith, Islam and Subud. Hindu-derived groups include: the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), Vaisnava Mission, the Brahma Kumaris Community, the Singh Rajinder Community, the Divine Light Mission (now Elan Vital), International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization, Osho-Bhadra Meditation Center, Srila Sridhar Swami Seva Ashram, Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission-Science of Spirituality, the Maharishi Community of Ecuador, and Transcendental Meditation (TM, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace).

There is a small Jewish community in Ecuador, whose approximately 1,000 members are found primarily in Quito and Guayaquil. There are more than 5,000 Chinese in Ecuador, many of whom continue in their Buddhist and Daoist faiths. Buddhist groups include the Buddhist Community of Ecuador (the Pagoda Yuan Heng is located in La Garzota, Guayaquil), the International Zen Association, the Dahrma Buhdi Susila Community, and the Tibetan Buddhist Community. The Baha’i Faith, introduced in the mid-1900s, has experienced growth, especially among some of the Amerindian peoples and those of African descent. Also, the Sunni Muslim (Islamic Center of Ecuador) and the Subud Association have a small following.

The Ancient Wisdom Tradition is represented by Freemasonry (Grand Equinocial Lodge of Ecuador); the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC); the Grand Universal Fraternity, Order of Aquarius (GFU, founded in Venezuela); the Gnostic Community of Ecuador; and the Universal Gnostic Christian movement.

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age traditions are represented by the Center of Esoteric Studies, Providence Spiritual Center, New Age Holistic Center, Ishaya Techniques, the Silvan Method, the Church of Scientology (also known as Dianetics), the Community of Oriental Spirituality, and the Unification Movement (founded in Korea by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon).

Popular Catholic religiosity (syncretistic) is practiced by a majority of the Hispanic white and mestizo population. Among practitioners of Amerindian religions and “popular Catholic religiosity,” there are “specialists” who practice witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo). The Quichua people make up about 40 percent of the present population of Ecuador. However, it is among the various smaller Amerindian groups in the remotest parts of the country, especially in the headwaters of the Amazon River, that traditional animistic religion has survived relatively untouched by the outside world. Among the Quichua there are still followers of Inti, the traditional Inca sun god.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Agnosticism; Assemblies of God; Atheism; Augustinians; Baha’i Faith; Brahma Kumaris; Capuchins; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church of the Brethren; Dominicans; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Family International, The; Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; International Zen Association; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Jesuits; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Maronite Catholic Church; Moon, Sun Myung; Philadelphia Church of God; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Roman Catholic Church; Salesians; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Southern Baptist Convention; Subud; Unification Movement; United Church of Christ; United Methodist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; Unity School of Christianity; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Bandelier, Adolph Francis. "Ecuador." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 5. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1909. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/05278a.htm>.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/scecl.html>.
- Crespo, Walter Roberto. Panorama Religioso en el Ecuador: 2007. http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ecu/crespo_estudio_ecuador.pdf.
- Goffin, A. M. The Rise of Protestant Evangelism in Ecuador, 1895–1990. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Hamilton, Keith E. Church Growth in the High Andes. Lucknow, U.P., India: The Lucknow Publishing House, 1962.
- Handelman, Michael. Culture and Customs of Ecuador. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2000.
- Hatch, Roberto, ed. Directorio de la Iglesia Evangélica del Ecuador. Quito, Ecuador: Comité Interdenominacional Pro-Directorio, 1985.
- Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Ecuador." San José, Costa Rica: PROLADES, 2003. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/ecu/ecu-chron.pdf>.
- Lewis, M. Paul, ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World, 16th edition. Dallas, TX: SIL International, 2009. <http://www.ethnologue.com/>.
- Padilla J., Washington. La iglesia y los dioses modernos: historia del protestantismo en el Ecuador. Quito, Ecuador: Corporación Editora Nacional, 1989.
- Reed, Gerardo. Los Evangélicos del Ecuador: Un Estudio Analítico. Quito, Ecuador: Iglesia del Pacto Evangélico, 1975.
- Stoll, David. Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- U.S. Department of State. International Freedom of Religion Report 2007: Ecuador. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90252.htm>.
- Weld, Wayne C. An Ecuadoran Impasse. Chicago: Department of World Missions, Evangelical Covenant Church of North America, 1968 (originally presented as a master's thesis to the School of World Mission at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, CA, in 1968).

Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople

The Patriarchate of Constantinople, also known as the Ecumenical Patriarchate, is one of the autocephalous churches of the Eastern Orthodox communion. It ranks highest in honor among those churches, and serves as a point of unity among them.

After the Emperor Constantine moved the Roman imperial capital to the town of Byzantium in 330 and renamed it New Rome, or Constantinople, the church of that city took on new importance. Thus the First Council of Constantinople in 381 elevated it to a patriarchal rank second only to Rome. The Council of Chalcedon in 451 expanded the boundaries of the Patriarchate and gave it jurisdiction over bishops of dioceses in "barbarian" lands. For the next 1,000 years, the church of Constantinople was the center of the church in the Eastern Roman Empire (usually referred to as the Byzantine Empire). It also presided over expansive missionary activity into the Balkans and the Slavic lands to the northeast. After the schism with the Roman Catholic Church of the West in the 11th century, Constantinople assumed the first rank among the Eastern Orthodox churches. The steady decline of the Byzantine Empire was hastened by the brief Latin conquest by Crusaders in the 13th century and the gradual encroachment of the Ottoman Turkish armies.

The fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453 ironically enhanced the authority of the Patriarchate dramatically. Although its territory had been reduced on the eve of the conquest to the small remnants of the Byzantine Empire, the Ottoman sultans established a new millet (administrative) system, which gave the Patriarchate civil as well as religious authority over all the Orthodox Christians within their vast empire. Then, when the Ottoman Empire went into decline and new Christian states emerged in the Balkans in the 19th century, the Patriarchate began to give up its ecclesiastical authority there and granted autocephalous status to the new churches in those countries. A small Greek kingdom gained independence in 1832, and in the wake of that independence, the expansion of the kingdom in the wake of the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913, and an extensive exchange of populations between Greece and Turkey in the 1920s, the great majority of the Greek-speaking faithful of the Patriarchate have been transferred to the autocephalous Orthodox Church of Greece. Anti-Greek rioting in Istanbul (the modern Turkish name of the city) in the 1950s precipitated another exchange of populations, such that now fewer than 5,000 Greeks remain in Turkey itself.

Nevertheless, the Patriarchate of Constantinople retains jurisdiction over the semi-autonomous Orthodox Church of Crete as well as the Orthodox dioceses in the Dodecanese Islands and the monastic republic of Mount Athos, all of which are in Greece. The Greek Orthodox in the so-called diaspora also come under the Patriarchate's jurisdiction, notably including the faithful in the Americas, Australia, and Western Europe. The total membership has been estimated at 3.5 million. It administers a number of theological institutions in Greece and elsewhere.

Today the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople continues to serve as a point of unity among the Orthodox churches, with the patriarch's role often defined as "primus inter pares," or first among equals. The Patriarchate does not have the authority to intervene in the internal affairs of the autocephalous churches, but it does coordinate pan-Orthodox activities, such as decisions to participate in ecumenical dialogues with other Christian bodies. Occasionally it calls the Orthodox churches together for common action when problems arise. The Patriarchate is governed by a permanent 12-member Holy Synod, which is presided over by the Ecumenical Patriarch. The Patriarchate's position in Istanbul remains precarious. The Turkish government closed down its only theological school on the island of Halki in 1971, and the tiny Greek community undergoes periodic harassment. But in 1989 the Patriarchate was able to dedicate a new administrative center to replace the one that had been destroyed by fire in 1941. This gave it the capacity to fulfill its role more effectively and to host important church events.

Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople
% His Holiness Bartholomew, Archbishop of Constantinople and Ecumenical Patriarch
Rum Patrikhanesi
34220 Fener-Istanbul
Turkey
<http://www.ec-patr.org/>

Ronald Roberson

See also: Constantine the Great; Istanbul; Orthodox Church of Greece; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Geanakoplos, Deno. A Short History of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople (330–1990): "First among Equals" in the Eastern Orthodox Church. Brookline, MA: Holy Cross Orthodox Press, 1990.
- Hussey, J. M. The Orthodox Church in the Byzantine Empire. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Maximos, Metropolitan of Sardes. The Oecumenical Patriarchate in the Orthodox Church: A Study in the History and Canons of the Church. Trans. by Gamon McLellan. Thessaloniki: Patriarchal Institute for Patristic Studies, 1976.
- Runciman, Steven. The Great Church in Captivity: A Study of the Patriarchate of Constantinople from the Eve of the Turkish Conquest to the Greek War of Independence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968.

Eddy, Mary Baker

1821–1908

Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science and author of Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, was one of the most influential and controversial religious leaders in 19th century America. Those who dissented from her primary organization, the Church

Mary Baker Eddy, founder of the religion of Christian Science. Eddy established the Church of Christ, Scientist, one of the United States' fastest-growing religious institutions of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. (Library of Congress) of Christ, Scientist, and its teachings went on to create the modern New Thought movement.

Eddy was born on July 16, 1821, in Bow, New Hampshire, and was raised in the Congregational Church, though she had early doubts about Calvinistic theology. She was married in 1843 to George Washington Glover but he died the following year. She wed Daniel Patterson, a dentist, in 1853 but that union resulted in financial and emotional torment and eventual divorce in 1873. She married again in 1877, this time to her former student Asa Gilbert Eddy.

In 1862 the future Mrs. Eddy traveled to Maine to seek healing at the hands of Phineas Parkhurst Quimby (1802–1866), a self-professed mental healer. Quimby emphasized the role of the mind in healing, and this suited her growing interest in the importance of the spiritual over the material. While she later downplayed his influence on her, Gillian Gill has shown that critics have often overstated the parallels between the two.

Christian Science is usually traced to Eddy's healing from a fall on the ice in Lynn, Massachusetts, on February 1, 1866. Her recovery from the accident followed a realization of the Allness of God. In her 1891 autobiography she called it a miracle wrought by "the divine Spirit." By 1870 she was teaching her views on healing and gathering devoted students to her side. Her most important works are Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, the textbook of the movement, first published in 1875, and the church manual, the movement's organizational guidebook.

The Christian Scientist Association was born in 1876 and the Church of Christ, Scientist was founded in April 1879. By then Eddy was a public figure, both loved by her followers and maligned by ex-students (Josephine Woodbury) and critics, including Mark Twain. Twain was withering in his critique of Eddy but did compliment her for industriousness. As an example of that, in her 87th year she founded The Christian Science Monitor. She died at home in New Hampshire on December 3, 1910.

Mary Baker Eddy was a convinced idealist and her statements about the sole reality of Spirit are uncompromising. One of the most famous lines in Science and Health reads: "There is no life, truth, intelligence, nor substance in matter. All is infinite Mind and its infinite manifestation, for God is All-in-all" (468). Later, she writes that "Man is not matter, he is not made up of brain, blood, bones, and other material elements." For her "Man is incapable of sin, sickness, and death" (475) and "evil is but an illusion" (480).

Following a fallout, Eddy's student Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925) would move to Chicago and began teaching students who would become the founders of the major New Thought associations, including Charles and Myrtle Fillmore (Unity School of Christianity), Malinda Cramer (Divine Science), and Ernest Holmes (Religious Science).

James A. Beverley

See also: Church of Christ, Scientist; Religious Science; Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches.

References

- Bates, Ernest S., and John V. Dittmore. Mary Baker Eddy: The Truth and the Tradition. New York: Knopf, 1932.
- Gardner, Gardner. The Healing Revelations of Mary Baker Eddy. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1993.
- Gill, Gillian. Mary Baker Eddy. New York: Perseus, 1998.
- Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1973.
- Harley, Gail. Emma Curtis Hopkins: Forgotten Founder of New Thought. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2002.
- Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy. 3 vols. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966, 1971, 1977.
- Twain, Mark. Christian Science. New York: Harper's, 1907.

Églises Baptistes de la RCA

Baptists entered French Equatorial Africa in the 1920s through the efforts of a fundamentalist Baptist missionary, William C. Haas (1873–1924). Haas had been a missionary in the Belgian Congo with the interdenominational Africa Inland Mission, but in 1920 founded an independent Baptist missionary society called Baptist Mid-Missions (now headquartered at 7749 Webster Rd., Cleveland, OH, 44130). Haas joined the first missionary team that established a mission in what is today the Central African Republic in 1921. They established initial stations at Sibut, Crampel, and Bangasou, where Haas was buried after his death in 1924.

The mission had steady growth over the next generation, and by the 1960s it had founded more than 100 churches. It also had established a hospital and six medical dispensaries. In pursuit of its educational ministry, it owns a printing press and has opened several bookstores. Its two Bible schools and seminary have assisted the development of indigenous leadership. It has contributed to the larger effort of translating the Bible into African languages by publishing the Bible for the Sango people. Its workers translated the New Testament and cooperated with the Grace Brethren Mission on the translation of the Old Testament.

In 1963, the mission was organized as the Association of Baptist Churches. The work was hampered by the discovery of some moral problems among the leadership, and the association was dissolved in the 1970s. In 1996, it reorganized under its present name. The work has continued to grow, and by the mid-1990s it reported 6,000 members in 375 churches. It is the largest non-Catholic religious group in the Central African Republic.

The Églises Baptistes has its headquarters at Bangui. As a fundamentalist group, it has no connection with either the Baptist World Alliance or the World Council of Churches. Baptist Mid-Missions remains an independent society, but has the recommendation of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches, from which it draws much of the resources that it uses to continue its support of the Églises Baptistes. In 1998, it reported 41 associated personnel in the Central African Republic. An account of the work is found at the Baptist Mid-Missions website at <http://www.bmm.org/Fields/car.html>.

Two schisms of the Églises Baptistes led to the formation of the Union Fraternelle des Églises Baptistes (1977) and the Association des Églises Baptistes Centrafricaines.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

References

- Baptist Mid-Missions. Field Surveys. Cleveland, OH: Baptist Mid-Missions, 1977.
- Strong, Polly. Burning Wicks. Cleveland, OH: Baptist Mid-Missions, 1984.

■ Egypt

Egypt, considered by many Westerners as the cradle of their civilization, was for millennia the home to a flourishing religious tradition (a tradition whose belief and practice lie beyond the reach of this encyclopedia). That religion, which in a revisionist form has reappeared outside of Egypt in neo-Paganism, was in stages replaced by Christianity and then Islam, whose entrance into the Nile Valley initiated the modern religious history of the region. Contemporary Egypt sits on the northern boundary of the African continent. The northern border of its 334,000 square miles lies on the Mediterranean Sea with the Red Sea and Gulf of Suez to the east. Sudan is to the south and Libya to the west. Much of Egypt's history has taken place on the Sinai Peninsula, a land mass of 23,000 square miles that lies to the east of the Suez Canal and the Gulf of Suez and forms a bridge between Africa and Asia. Egypt has one of the fastest rates of population growth in the region, which by 2008 reached more than 81 million.

Al-Azhar Mosque and Al-Azhar University in Cairo, founded in 972 CE by the Fatimid caliph. (Paul Cowan/Dreamstime .com)

Egypt was incorporated into the kingdom of Alexander the Great (356–323 BCE) and afterward came under the Ptolemaic dynasty, which continued to rule until Egypt became a Roman province (31 BCE). It remained within the Roman Empire through its transformation into the Byzantine Empire until the Arab conquest in 642 CE. The Arabs imposed their language and created the most definitive break with the country's ancient past.

In the 10th century, the Arabs were replaced by the Fatimids, Ismaili Muslims who had emerged at the end of the prior century in Tunisia and spread across North Africa. The Fatimids established their capital in Cairo and established the famed University of Al-Azhar. The Fatimid Empire extended from Palestine to Tunis but in the 12th century was weakened by war with the Christian Crusaders. In 1171, the Arabs were able to drive the Fatimids from power and reestablish themselves as the dominant force in the land. They held sway until 1517, when the rising Ottoman (Turkish) Empire assumed control.

Formally, Egypt remained a part of the Ottoman Empire into the 19th century. In 1805 an Albanian, Muhammad Ali, seized control and began the process of modernization. In the 1860s, Egypt gained a degree of autonomy, but it had already become the object of economic forces operating out of Western Europe. It had joined with the French to create the Suez Canal but in 1874 sold its interest in the canal to pay its debts to the British. In 1882 the British landed an occupation force, and in 1914 Egypt became a British protectorate. Though the protectorate was officially discontinued in 1922, the British presence continued in force through World War II, when Egypt was a staging area for Allied opposition to the Germans in North Africa.

In 1948, the weakened rulers of the country, who claimed royal prerogatives, were overthrown in a coup led by Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–1970). Nasser installed a secular government. He created an international crisis by successfully nationalizing the Suez Canal in 1956. Two years later he united Egypt with Syria in the short-lived United Arab Republic (1958–1961). Nasser's last years were overshadowed by the Israeli defeat of Egypt in the 1967 Six-Day War. His successor, Anwar Sadat, reoriented Egypt toward the West and worked out an agreement with Israel, both of which led to his assassination in 1981. He was succeeded by the present president, Hosni Mubarak.

Christianity looks to the account of Mary and Joseph fleeing to Egypt with the infant Jesus (Matthew 2:14–15) as the beginning of Christianity in the country. Then, according to tradition, after the church was established in Jerusalem, Saint Mark was sent to Egypt, where the first Christian church was called together in Alexandria. Over the next centuries, the church spread through the Nile Valley, and the successive bishops of Alexandria became major participants in the evolution of Christian theology through the fifth century. Egypt was also among the first places that Christian monasticism emerged as an important part of church life.

Egyptian Christians faced a major crisis in the middle of the fifth century; as part of the larger theological project of defining the nature of the Trinity, the Christian movement was concerned with defining the nature of Christ. Christ's two natures (human and divine) were defined by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The Egyptian leadership rejected the formula espoused by Chalcedon and were labeled Monophysites (from the Greek for "one nature") by those who accepted Chalcedon (who in Egypt were called Melkites). The theological battle continued over the next centuries, during which time the majority of the Christians in Egypt were united in their refusal to acknowledge the Chalcedonian position (while claiming that they fully accepted the Nicene Creed and were not Monophysites). Nevertheless, the Egyptian church broke relations with the rest of the Christian world, especially the patriarch in Constantinople (the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople being the nominal center of Eastern Orthodoxy).

Christian history was then interrupted by the Arab invasion in the seventh century and the entrance of Islam. Christianity was most negatively affected by the subsequent warfare between Egypt, the Muslims headquartered in Baghdad, the Byzantine Empire, and the Crusaders. Many Christians converted to Islam; however, the weakened Coptic Orthodox Church, as it was then called, survived, and eventually the Egyptian Christians becoming a recognizable subgroup in Egyptian society.

Islamic history also followed a somewhat disjunctive course, beginning with the Ismaili Fatimid rulers in 969. The Fatimid caliph established the new city of Cairo as his capital and in 972 founded Al-Azhar University. The Ismailis represented a form of Shia Islam that looked for leadership of the Muslim world in the descendants of Muhammad through his daughter Fatima and son-in-law Ali. They split with the main body of Shiites in the eighth century when the heir to the throne, Ismail, the son of Imam Ja'far al-Sadiq, died before he could assume authority. Most Shiites threw their support to Ismail's brother, but the Ismailis recognized the descendants of Ismail as the beginning of a new line of imams. The new lineage was named after Fatima.

The Ismailis also proposed the belief that prior to the end of time, a seventh prophet (Muhammad being the sixth) would arise. This prophet, the Mahdi, from the Arabic for "rightly guided," was expected to bring no new revelation, but to bring political unity.

In 1021, a Fatimid prince was declared Ismail resurrected and the one prophesied to overthrow the Arab ruler, a follower of Sunni Islam, then ruling from Baghdad. He failed to accomplish his assigned task, and the resulting splintering of the Ismailis contributed to the weaknesses that led to their overthrow in 1171. Among the groups emerging from the Ismailis was the mystical Tayyibiyya Sufi Brotherhood. Although the reestablishment of Arab leadership in Egypt did not mean the disappearance of the Ismailis, they did move into a minority status, while the Sunni Muslims took the lead. Sunnis are split among the major schools, with the Shafaiite and Malikite schools of Islam dominating in the north and the Hanafite School in the south.

Islam, in its several factions, remains the faith of more than 80 percent of Egypt's 81 million citizens. In the post-Nasser era, Islam in Egypt has developed a set of structures that now offer leadership to the religious community. The Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs has the assigned purpose of spreading Islam in

Egypt

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	28,711,000	68,804,000	86.5	1.92	86,626,000	107,668,000
Christians	6,347,000	10,293,000	12.9	1.29	11,277,000	12,676,000
Orthodox	6,002,000	9,300,000	11.7	1.26	10,000,000	11,000,000
Protestants	136,000	560,000	0.7	0.83	700,000	900,000
Roman Catholics	139,000	340,000	0.4	4.12	450,000	600,000
Agnostics	100,000	355,000	0.4	2.09	500,000	720,000
Atheists	30,000	76,000	0.1	1.83	100,000	140,000
Baha'is	1,100	6,500	0.0	1.83	8,000	12,000
Jews	700	1,500	0.0	-2.17	1,500	1,500
Hindus	0	800	0.0	1.83	1,000	1,600
Total population	35,190,000	79,537,000	100.0	1.83	98,513,000	121,219,000

Egypt and around the world. To that end it prints literature in a number of languages and makes grants for the construction of mosques and the education of youth. Al-Azhar University is one of the leading Muslim centers of higher learning in the world, and its scholars are called upon to make decisions concerning disputed questions in the Muslim community. Reorganized in 1961, it has developed a school for the training of females, a training institute for future Muslim leaders from around the world, and radio and printing facilities to assist in the spread and purifying of Islam. Finally, the Council for Islamic Studies has as its purpose the vivification of Islamic culture. Both the university and the council have been strongly opposed to the more politically radical elements (often lumped together under the term “Islamic Fundamentalism”) in Egypt.

Egypt was the originating point of the Muslim Brotherhood, a conservative group allied with the Wahhabi leadership in Saudi Arabia. The brotherhood gained political clout each time the Saudi government put money into the financially ailing Egyptian economy. It has advocated the institution of Islamic law as the law of the land, but has lost considerable support since individuals associated with it were deemed responsible for Anwar Sadat's death. Hosni Mubarak has banned all overt political activity by the brotherhood, while developing friendly relations with the United States. Under Mubarak the country has become more secular, at the same time resisting any attempt to return to the Socialist policies favored by Nasser.

Egyptian Christianity entered the modern world in two main forms, the Coptic Orthodox Church and the much smaller Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa (in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate). Then, in the 17th century, the Roman Catholic Church entered Egypt through missionary activity instituted by the Capuchins and Jesuits. While building up Latin-rite congregations, the spread of Catholicism also led to the formation of the Eastern-rite Coptic Catholic Church. As Egypt's population diversified, congregations of the Maronite Catholic Church and the Melkite Catholic Church also emerged (as have congregations of a variety of Orthodox churches, such as the Russian Orthodox Church [Moscow Patriarchate] and the Armenian Apostolic Church).

Protestants opened work in 1854 through the efforts of the U.S.-based Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). Their proselytizing activity, primarily among Coptic Christians, led to the formation of the Coptic Evangelical Church, now known as the Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile. Other independent evangelical churches and missionary agencies launched missions, among the most substantive being that of the Free Methodist Church in 1899. The work of evangelicals was disrupted by the wars in 1956 and 1967, when foreign missionaries had to leave the country. Several missionary agencies reassigned their missionaries to more friendly locations. Among the churches retaining at least a presence in the country are the Christian Brethren (since 1869) and the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee). Many of the evangelical groups have their base among expatriates (especially Greeks and Lebanese) living and working in Egypt.

Anglicans began work in 1847, and their parishes are now part of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East, based in Israel.

Egypt, of course, plays a major role in the beliefs of Judaism, and there has been a significant Jewish community in Egypt at least since the fifth century BCE. It was in Egypt that the Hebrew Torah was translated (around 250 BCE) into Greek, a work known as the Septuagint translation. That community survived through the years of Roman and then Muslim rule until 1948. After the establishment of the state of Israel, most of Egypt's Jews migrated, especially spurred by the hostility directed toward them following the wars in 1956 and 1967. At present only some 200 Jews remain in Egypt, supplemented by a small expatriate community that has recently emerged in Cairo. There are four Jewish synagogues in the Cairo metropolitan area.

Few of the newer 20th-century religions have tried to colonize Egypt. Although Buddhists speculate on the possibility that Buddhist missionaries reached Egypt in ancient times, there are no known Buddhist centers in the country at present. There is a small community of the Baha'i Faith, but no Hindus, Sikhs, or representatives of the new religious movements (though it is likely that some of these groups are represented by members in the expatriate community).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Etchmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Coptic Catholic Church; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile; Free Methodist Church of North America; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Hanafite School of Islam; Jesuits; Maliki School of Islam; Maronite Catholic Church; Melkite Catholic Church; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Shafaiite School of Islam; Shia Islam; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Abdo, Geneive. No God but God: Egypt and the Triumph of Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Hoffman, Valerie J. Sufism, Mystics, and Saints in Modern Egypt. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Kepel, Gilles. Muslim Extremism in Egypt. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.
- Kramer, Gudrun. The Jews in Modern Egypt. London: I. B. Tauris, 1989.
- Meinardus, Otto F. A. Two Thousand Years of Coptic Christianity. Cairo: American University in Cairo Press, 1999.
- Moaddel, Mansoor. Jordanian Exceptionalism: A Comparative Analysis of State-Religion Relationships in Egypt, Iran, Jordan, and Syria. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Murphy, Carlyle. Passion for Islam: Shaping the Modern Middle East: The Egyptian Experience. New York: Scribner, 2002.
- Tal, Nachman. Radical Islam: In Egypt and Jordan. Eastbourne, East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2005.
- Wakin, Edward. A Lonely Minority: The Modern Story of Egypt's Copts. Lincoln, NE: iUniverse.com, 2000.

Egypt in Western Religious Imagination

The idea that Egypt is the homeland of profound spiritual wisdom has deep roots in Western culture, and can be found already in Greek sources. Over the centuries, various authors have differed widely in describing the substance of Egyptian wisdom. Statements that were once commonplace, such as the late 18th-century claim that the tarot cards have an Egyptian origin, seem to have become increasingly infrequent. One major reason for such shifts over time is the dissemination among a wider readership of scholarship on the Egyptian system of writing and language. Claims regarding the mystical properties of the hieroglyphs, or of the spiritual import of particular texts translated by paranormal means, have become less common after the decipherment of Ancient Egyptian by Jean-François Champollion (1790–1832) and the popularization of his results and those of subsequent generations of Egyptologists. Another reason is that the nature of these claims adapt to the interests of society at large. In a technological age, claims regarding the profound spirituality of ancient Egyptians are conflated with claims that portray them as masters of an amazingly advanced technology partly built on paranormal foundations.

With the passage of time, the genre of literature and the social forums where the idea of an esoteric or spiritually advanced Egypt is disseminated have also shifted. With the advent of modern archaeological discoveries, conceptions of an esoteric, spiritual Egypt have largely been relegated from mainstream intellectual culture to various new religious movements and alternative (occultist and/or New Age) milieus. Several recent titles presenting alternative claims regarding the paranormal and esoteric insights of the Egyptians have been published by mass-market publishers and have sold millions of copies. Most academic Egyptologists consider such theories pseudoscientific, and the uncharitable label “pyramidiots” has been coined to designate those who accept such alternative claims.

There is no single, coherent image of spiritual Egypt in circulation in these alternative milieus, but rather a number of loosely related claims. Many of these concern the role, nature, and provenance of the pyramids. A first set of narratives suggests that a chamber within the Cheops pyramid functioned as a kind of meditation retreat, where highly initiated members of Egyptian secret societies could receive mystical knowledge. Related narratives suggest more broadly that the core of Egyptian spirituality was secret initiation, and portray a number of key figures in religious history, including Jesus, as the recipient of this hidden knowledge. Much of this alternative history can be traced back to theosophical literature (in particular, Helena P. Blavatsky’s Isis Unveiled, 1877), or to works historically related to the theosophical current (for example, Rudolf Steiner’s interpretations of Egyptian religious history or Edgar Cayce’s readings on this topic).

A second set of narratives focuses on the dating of the pyramids themselves. The conventional dating of these monuments to the third millennium BCE is challenged, and alternative accounts push this chro-nology back several thousand years. These alternative histories do not always agree with each other. Theosophical sources (for example, Helena P. Blavatsky in her work The Secret Doctrine [1888], vol. 2, 432) suggest an age of 78,000 years, whereas approximately 10,000 BCE is a common time frame in much of the more recent literature.

The method of construction of the pyramids is also the subject of frequent speculation, with a third group of alternative theories rejecting the standard Egyptological suggestion that the stones were transported on ramps to their final locations on the sides of the pyramid. Rather, paranormal means are invoked, for example, levitation by means of incantations and sound waves. Not infrequently, the ancient Egyptians themselves are given a subsidiary role in the construction of the pyramids, and the main role in the effort is attributed either to extraterrestrials (an idea mentioned by Louis Pauwels and Jacques Bergier in The Morning of the Magicians [French original published in 1960, English translation in 1963] and popularized by Erich von Däniken in books such as Chariots of the Gods [1968]) or to beings from Atlantis.

A fourth class of narratives insists that the pyramids encode secret or sacred information. In the past, the measurements of the Great Pyramid at Giza have been held to unlock the key to biblical chronologies and the timing of the apocalypse. These suggestions can be traced back to 19th-century speculations by writers such as Charles Taylor (1781–1864) and Piazzi Smyth (1819–1900). Taylor’s book The Great Pyramid: Why was it Built? And Who Built it? published in 1859 proved particularly significant. Other narratives of this type connect various measurements of the pyramids with astronomical data, for example, the exact duration of the Earth’s orbit around the Sun, or the precise distance between the two bodies. The placement of the pyramids at Gizah in relation to each other has also been interpreted as encoding astronomical information. Robert Bauval (b. 1948) has launched the theory that the pyramids correspond to the positions of the stars in the constellation of Orion as they appeared from an Earth-centered perspective approximately 10,000 BCE, that is, the time when the structures were purportedly built by a civilization predating that of the Egyptians.

A fifth, more recent suggestion is that the shape of the pyramids has paranormal properties. A highly publicized book by Sheila Ostrander and Lynn Schroeder, Discoveries behind the Iron Curtain (1971), popularized the notion, previously suggested in the 1930s by Antoine Bovis and in the 1950s by Karel Drbal, that objects placed inside pyramids are affected by a paranormal force, pyramid power. It is thus claimed that razor blades remained sharp if placed inside pyramid structures aligned along a north-south axis.

Beside various narratives regarding the pyramids, other archaeological findings are also reinterpreted as evidence of esoteric or paranormal claims. Thus, the Great Sphinx of Giza is frequently mentioned as an object with mysterious properties and a dating that differs radically from that accepted by the vast majority of academic Egyptologists.

Olav Hammer

See also: Blavatsky, Helena P.; Meditation; New Age Movement.

References

- Curl, James Stevens. Egyptomania: The Egyptian Revival. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 1994.
- Hornung, Erik. The Secret Lore of Egypt: Its Impact on the West. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2001.
- Iversen, Erik. The Myth of Egypt and Its Hieroglyphs in European Tradition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993.

Eid al-Adha

Eid al-Adha, or Days of Sacrifice, is a Muslim holiday celebrated for four days during the Islamic month of Dhu al-Hijjah. It celebrates the willingness of the Prophet Abraham (called Ibrahim by Muslims) to sacrifice his son in obedience to God. Like Jews and Christians, Muslims also honor Ibrahim, though their telling of the story varies somewhat from that found in the biblical book of Genesis, where Abraham as an old man finally becomes the father to a son by his wife Sarah. When Isaac has grown to be a young boy, God orders Abraham to build an altar and kill Isaac. Abraham is about to comply when his hand is stayed and a ram is supplied in Isaac's place.

Muslims slaughter sheep to celebrate Eid al-Adha in Jordan. On this holiday, the meat from slaughtered animals is given to the poor. (Adeeb Atwan/Dreamstime.com)

In the Koran, much more attention is paid to Ibrahim's relation to his first son by the servant Hagar, Ismail. He is believed to have accompanied Ibrahim on a visit to Mecca, where they fixed in place the Kaaba, the cubical structure inside the great mosque in Mecca toward which Muslims prayer daily (Koran 2:125). Muslims also believe that it was Ismail, not Isaac, that was the son who was almost sacrificed by Ibrahim.

Because Allah caused a ram to appear to be sacrificed in Ibrahim's son's place, when commemorating this event, Muslims sacrifice an animal to be eaten. They subsequently share a third of the meat with the poor and a third with friends and family, and keep a third for their own feast. The animals for the sacrifice are sheep, goats, cattle, or camels. The sacrifice must be made during the Days of Sacrifice, and verses in both the Koran and the Hadith indicate the obligatory natures of the sacrifice for all except the poor. The animal must be in good condition—not maimed. Also, the hide must be disposed of properly—one cannot sell it and pocket the money. In the end, the purpose of the holiday is to provide another vehicle for the wealth of the society to be shared with the less fortunate.

Ibrahim's act of obedience is also remembered during the Hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca required of Muslims at least once in their life. During the Hajj, pilgrims pass a site where Iblis (Satan) attempted to dissuade Ibrahim from making the sacrifice at least three times. Each attempt by Satan is designated with a symbolic pillar. As they pass these pillars, they throw stones at them.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Abraham/Abram; Islam.

Reference

Algül, Hüseyin. The Blessed Days and Nights of the Islamic Year. Somerset, NJ: The Light, 2005.

Eid al-Fitr

See Ramadan.

Eisai

1141–1215

Myōan Eisai, a Japanese Buddhist reformer, is credited with bringing Rinzaï Zen (known in China as Linji Chan) to his homeland from China. His work would establish Zen meditation as the primary practice in its own separate community and lead to Zen's emergence as a major Japanese Buddhist tradition. Eisai is also credited with bringing green tea to Japan.

Eisai was born in 1141 into the Kaya family in Bitchu Province (modern Okayama), west of Kyoto. His well-to-do family was associated with both the local Tendai temple and Kibitsu Shinto shrine. Eisai began his appropriation of Buddhism at the Annyōji Temple, where he studied for two years with the priest and tantric practitioner Joshin. He was but 13 when he went to Mount Hiei, the headquarters of the Tendai sect, to further his studies. He was ordained as a Tendai priest in 1154, though still in his early teens. Through his teen years he would travel between his home and Mount Hiei. He would in addition study Shingon (the Japanese form of Vajrayana Buddhism) and emerged as a competent Tantric practitioner. Finally, he also mastered a form of meditation taught within the diverse Tendai tradition.

Early on Eisai had become convinced that Buddhism in Japan had degenerated and was in need of reform. He concluded that he needed to go to China to tap into older purer sources. As he made plans for his journey, he encountered Li Te-chao, a Chinese interpreter in Japan, from whom he learned of Chan centers in southern China. In 1168, he was finally able to make his way to China and while there he visited Mount T'ien-t'ai. During his six-month stay, he delved into the origins of the Tendai tradition and made his first exploration of Chan. He returned to Japan with 60 volumes of Buddhist texts. He now immersed himself in Tendai meditation practices and made plans for a longer visit to China. It would be almost 20 years before he was able to realize his desire in that regard.

Eisai's return visit was delayed by events in Japan, including a civil war, which in the late 1170s forced him to relocate to Kyushu in southwest Japan. He again visited China in 1187. During this visit he concentrated on mastering Zen and received the "seal" (inkashomei) of Zen transmission from his instructor, Xuan Huaichang. He also gained a respect for the vinaya, the traditional discipline prescribed for Buddhist monks. Upon his return to Kyushu, he established the Hoon-ji, the first Rinzai temple in Japan. At this time he introduced tea drinking to his students, an aid to the strenuous discipline he imposed. He promoted tea based on its health values and in that regard authored a book, Kissa Yojoki (Drinking Tea for Health), which emphasized tea's general restorative properties. The later popularization of the tea ceremony can be traced to Hoon-ji.

In 1195, authorities at Mount Hiei, who enjoyed official favor with the secular authorities in Kyoto, became aware of what Eisai was attempting on Kyushu and summoned him to defend his practice. This inquiry occasioned the writing of a second book, Shukke Taiko (Essentials for Monks), in which he defended the vinaya. During his visit, he was able to successfully defend himself, though winning few friends on Mount Hiei in the process. In response to the confrontation, Eisai wrote Kozen Gokokuron (Propagation of Zen and Protection of the Nation), considered his most important book. He did, however, find important support from members of the powerful Minamoto clan, who sponsored his construction of the Shofukuji Temple on Kyushu. With their help he was able to begin building support at the imperial court in Kyoto, a necessary requirement for Zen to move from its rural beginnings.

In 1204, now in his sixties, he became the abbot of the Kennin-ji Monastery in Kyoto. Among his students was Dogen, who would later in the century also travel to China and transmit Soto Zen (Chodong Chan) to Japan. In 1206 Eisai was asked to rebuild Todaiji Temple in Nara. Work on the temple, damaged in a war, took several years, but was completed in 1213, much to the delight of the emperor. After accepting the honors the emperor bestowed upon him, Eisai retired to Kennin-ji. He died there two years later.

Eisai is considered the first monk to have established Zen teachings in Japan. He not only brought Rinzai practice from China, but through his life lifted it from obscurity and planted it in seats of power in the country. Through his student the second major school of Zen would be introduced and through the 13th century Zen would enjoy a massive expansion throughout the country.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Meditation; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Doumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. Vol. 2, Japan. New York: Macmillan Company, 1989.
- "Eisai." In Soka Gakkai Dictionary of Buddhism. Tokyo: Soka Gakkai, 2002.
- Kasahara, Kazuo, ed. A History of Japanese Religion. Trans. by Paul McCarthy and Gaynor Sekimori. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 2001.
- Suzuki, Daisetz T. Zen and Japanese Culture. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1959.

Ekalesia Niue

The Ekalesia (church) of the tiny island nation of Niue, also known as the Congregational Christian Church of Niue, was initiated by missionaries from Samoa sent by the London Missionary Society in the 1840s. They were joined by Europeans in the 1860s, first William George Lawes (1839–1907) in 1861 and then his successor Frank E. Lawes in 1868. The Lawes brothers organized the mission along Congregationalist lines and trained missionaries who later went to Papua and launched the church there. In successive decades the church developed a close relationship with the Congregational Union of New Zealand. At the same time, the country of Niue developed strong ties to New Zealand. Some 15,000 Niueans now reside in New Zealand, and Niueans have special citizenship rights there.

The mission in Niue became independent in 1966. It has congregations in New Zealand, and a continuing relationship to the Congregational Union of New Zealand and the Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand, which also has congregations in Fiji with Niuean members.

The Ekalesia of Niue includes as members 1,300 of the island's 1,896 residents (2005). It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and in 2001 joined the World Council of Churches.

Ekalesia of Niue
PO Box 25
Alofi
Niue (via New Zealand)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Smith, S. Percy. Niue: The Island and Its People. Suva, Fiji: Institute of Pacific Studies, 1983.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

■ El Salvador

El Salvador is the smallest of the Spanish-speaking countries in Central America, bordered by Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua in the north, east, and south, respectively. El Salvador, known as Cuscatlán (“Land of the Jewel”) by the indigenous peoples, is a spectacular land of volcanoes, rolling hills, and lakes, with a long, uninterrupted beach along the Pacific coast. The country has an area of 8,124 square miles and a population of 7.1 million (2007 census). El Salvador has the highest population density in Central America.

An estimated 90 percent of Salvadorans are mestizo (mixed Amerindian and Spanish origin) and culturally known as ladino; 9 percent are reported to be white: this population is mostly of Spanish descent but it includes others of European and North American descent (mainly French, German, Swiss, and Italian); only about 1 percent is Amerindian. Very few Native Americans have retained their ancient customs, traditions, or languages except for recent Kekchí migrants from Guatemala, an estimated 12,000. There is also a large community of Nicaraguans, 100,000 according to some estimates, many of whom are seasonal migrant workers. Spanish is the nation's official language and is spoken by virtually all inhabitants.

El Salvador has witnessed progress toward greater economic and political stability during the 1990s and into the 21st century, despite the fluctuations of the world economy that have affected traditional exports (mainly coffee and textiles), the revitalized manufacturing sector, the balance of payments (trade deficit and international loans), tourism, and other areas of the economy. One of the most important economic factors in the 1990s and early 2000s was growth in the amount of remittances from relatives living abroad, which helped Salvadoran families to survive the hardships and boosted the nation's staggering economy.

The country's religious landscape has also become divided since the early 1900s, with the arrival of scores of Protestant missionary agencies, mainly from the United States, and the emergence of a strong national evangelical movement, particularly since the 1960s, which have challenged the historically dominant position of the Roman Catholic Church in El Salvador. However, the Constitution explicitly recognizes the Roman Catholic Church and grants it special legal status.

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and other laws and policies contribute to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors. The Constitution states that all persons are equal before the law and prohibits discrimination based on nationality, race, sex, or religion.

A series of public opinion polls between 1988 and 2008 demonstrated that no significant changes had

El Salvador

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	3,579,000	6,953,000	97.4	1.46	8,238,000	9,561,000
Roman Catholics	3,313,000	5,800,000	81.2	1.48	6,600,000	7,335,000
Independents	67,900	850,000	11.9	3.74	1,100,000	1,400,000
Protestants	149,000	840,000	11.8	4.08	1,100,000	1,400,000
Agnostics	2,400	105,000	1.5	3.35	180,000	320,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,500	38,100	0.5	1.48	30,000	42,000
Baha'is	5,100	32,000	0.4	1.48	60,000	90,000
Atheists	600	7,000	0.1	3.60	8,500	15,000
New religionists	500	2,400	0.0	1.48	3,500	5,000
Muslims	0	2,000	0.0	1.48	2,500	4,000
Chinese folk	300	850	0.0	1.48	900	1,100
Buddhists	300	650	0.0	1.47	750	1,000
Jews	300	600	0.0	1.46	700	800
Total population	3,598,000	7,142,000	100.0	1.48	8,525,000	10,040,000

taken place in religious affiliation since the mid-1980s. However, between 1995 and 2004, new polls showed a marked increase in the size of the Protestant population, from 16.8 percent to 25.0 percent, with a corresponding decrease in those affiliated with the Catholic Church: from 67.9 percent in 1995 to 56.5 in 2004, a decline of 11.4 percent. All of these studies had a margin of error of plus or minus 2.5 to 3.0 percent. This trend continued between 2004 and 2008, with the Protestant population increasing to 34.4 percent while the Catholic population declined to 50.9 percent. Although an evangelical study published in 1993 claimed that the Protestant population was then more than 30 percent of the total population, in reality this did not happen until the end of 2007 (29.5 percent in November 2007, according to IUDOP-UCA).

It appears that one of the consequences of the end to the nation's civil war (1980–1992), which was followed by a period of relative peace and prosperity after decades of political violence and bloodshed, was a radical shift in religious affiliation from Catholic to Protestant (along with a slight decline in those who previously were religiously indifferent, agnostic, and/or atheist) and a trend toward greater civic and political participation by evangelicals (most were previously apolitical publicly) who have lost their fear of expressing their political views and become involved in social justice and human rights issues in the national context of free and democratic elections and a decline in political violence.

History of El Salvador By 1525, Pedro de Alvarado y Contreras (1495–1541), one of the cruelest Spanish conquistadores, had suppressed—with extreme brutality—most of the Amerindian population of Central America. In El Salvador the Pipil, Lenca, and Chortí resisted Spanish colonization but were subdued between 1524 and 1550. The territory of El Salvador became part of the Captaincy-General of Guatemala during the Spanish colonial period, and for some time after independence was part of a federated Republic of Central America (1821–1838) until achieving its full independence in 1838.

The young nation experienced a series of political struggles, assassinations, and revolutions until 1886, when Conservative rule brought about political stability for the next 45 years. During this period communal Amerindian lands were privatized, coffee became the main crop, and the coffee oligarchy consolidated its control of the country's political, economic, and social life.

In 1881–1882, government decrees abolished Pipil communal land holdings, which opened the way for coffee producers to increase their land holdings. The Pipil were, and still are, concentrated in the western departments of Sonsonate, La Libertad, Ahuachapán, and, to a lesser degree, Santa Ana. As coffee production expanded in the western departments, the Pipil population suffered increasing displacement, which forced them to join the growing labor pool of landless and land-poor peasants who were forced by economic necessity to work on the coffee plantations, especially during harvest season. It was in this context of social dislocation and labor unrest during the period 1900–1930 that the early Protestant churches took root and expanded in the western region.

From 1931—the year of the coup in which General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez (1882–1966) came to power until he was deposed in 1944—there was brutal suppression of any resistance to the military government. Until 1980, all but one Salvadoran temporary president was an army officer. Periodic presidential elections were seldom free or fair, which meant that a virtual military dictatorship controlled El Salvador from 1931 to the 1980s.

From the 1930s to the 1970s, authoritarian right-wing governments employed political repression and limited reform to maintain power, despite the trappings of democracy. The conservative-led National Conciliation Party was in power from the early 1960s until 1979.

During the 1970s, the political situation in El Salvador began to unravel. In the 1972 presidential election, the opponents of military rule united under José Napoleón Duarte, leader of the reformist Christian Democrat Party. Due to widespread electoral fraud, Duarte's broad-based reform movement was defeated. Subsequent protests and an attempted coup were crushed and Duarte was exiled.

These events eroded hope of reform through democratic means and persuaded those opposed to the government that armed insurrection was the only way to achieve needed change. Following decades of continuous social and political turmoil, the Salvadoran civil war generated the large-scale internal displacement (los desplazados) of an estimated 265,000 (registered) persons in El Salvador by October 1983, who were forced to leave their homes in embattled areas and wander the countryside in search of a secure town or settlement removed from the violence. The majority of the internally displaced persons—women and young children and the disabled and elderly—were too poor to leave the country; most of the men had been recruited by the Salvadoran Army or by the leftist guerrilla groups, or they had “disappeared” or had been killed. In addition, another 500,000 or more Salvadorans had fled to neighboring countries or to the United States as economic or political refugees by late 1983, according to international relief and development agencies.

During this tragic period of civil war, the international press reported a series of massacres that shocked the nation and the world and that began to sway U.S. public opinion against its government's support of the repressive Salvadoran government, which needed continued U.S. government assistance to win the war against the Marxist-led revolutionary movement. More than a dozen Roman Catholic priests were killed by right-wing death squads or public security forces during the period 1977–1991, including Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero of San Salvador. Also, in 1980, four U.S. Catholic nuns and lay workers were raped and killed by a military patrol near San Salvador, which led to a temporary suspension of U.S. military aid to the Salvadoran government.

In May 1980, Army Major Roberto D'Aubuisson Arrieta, after heading a failed coup against the ruling military government (1979–1982), organized the Secret Anti-Communist Army to coordinate rightwing death-squad activities. From 1978 to 1992, before and during the civil war, D'Aubuisson commanded secret military and paramilitary death squads. Among his victims was Archbishop Óscar Arnulfo Romero of San Salvador. On May 7, 1980, six weeks after Romero's assassination, D'Aubuisson and a group of civilians and soldiers were arrested on a farm, where investigators found weapons and documents identifying D'Aubuisson and the civilians as death squad organizers and financiers. However, D'Aubuisson and some of his collaborators managed to flee to exile in Guatemala.

In 1981, D'Aubuisson founded the Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA), which he led from 1980 to 1985, and his party campaigned in the 1982 election. In March 1982, despite alleged electoral fraud and political violence, the Salvadoran legislative election of a Constituent Assembly was a victory for

EL SALVADOR

ARENA, which gained 19 of 60 seats, and its allies gained 17 seats. Consequently, D'Aubuisson's supporters were the legislative majority. ARENA dominated Salvadoran presidential politics for the next 17 years under Alfredo Cristiani (r. 1989–1994), Armando Calderón Sol (r. 1994–1999), Francisco Flores Pérez (r. 1999–2004), and Elías Antonio Saca González (r. 2004–2009). The political tide finally turned in the 2009 national election, which was won by Carlos Mauricio Funes Cartagena, the candidate of the left-wing FMLN political party, who took office on June 1, 2009.

The Roman Catholic Church The evangelization of Central America by Catholic missionaries followed the Spanish conquest and occupation of the region in the 1520s. Although the Pipil in El Salvador had a sophisticated religion based on the worship of the forces of nature, there were a number of parallels between their religious practices and Catholicism, which made Spanish missionary efforts somewhat easier.

Following the defeat of the Indian armies by Pedro de Alvarado in 1525, the old gods seemed powerless before the Spanish conquerors and their new religion. The Franciscan friars, after driving out the Native priests and destroying the images of their gods, offered the Amerindians a new religious system that was generally accepted by them and superimposed on their old belief systems. Thousands of indigenous peoples were converted to Catholicism during the Spanish colonial period, when El Salvador was a province and parish of the Captaincy-General of Guatemala.

However, due to the chronic shortage of Catholic priests and other religious workers, the people of the smaller towns and villages learned to conduct their religious life with only occasional assistance from the Catholic clergy. To fill this need, the cofradía, a voluntary religious association, developed among the people for planning, organizing, and paying for local religious celebrations during the year.

The status of the Catholic Church in the post-colonial period changed depending on who was ruling the country, the Conservatives or the Liberals. The first anticlerical laws were established by a Liberal government in El Salvador in 1824. In 1871, the Liberal revolution proclaimed freedom of thought and religion, removed cemeteries from clerical control, legalized civil marriage, made education non-clerical, and abolished monastic orders. Priests were not allowed to teach in public schools, but private religious schools were permitted. These policies have remained in force until the present, except for the prohibition of religious orders.

The government does not contribute in any way to the support of religion, but since 1962 the Catholic Church has been allowed to acquire real estate for other than religious purposes. There is no Concordat between the Salvadoran government and the Vatican, but diplomatic representatives are exchanged. The Constitution of 1962 reiterated the separation of church and state and guarantees religious freedom for all faiths, but it precludes the clergy from belonging to political parties and holding public office.

There has always been a shortage of Catholic priests and other religious workers in El Salvador. In 1944, there were 106 parishes with 203 priests and 357 nuns, which increased to 175 parishes, 373 priests, and 803 nuns in 1968. In 1980, among 229 parishes, there were 373 priests (173 diocesan and 200 religious), 70 lay brothers, and 735 nuns. In 1970, about 62 percent of the priests and 19 percent of the nuns were native Salvadorans, which is a high percentage of national priests and a low proportion of native nuns compared to other countries of Latin America at that time. The proportion of priests per inhabitant in El Salvador decreased from 1:7,692 in 1970 to 1:9,090 in 1975 and to 1:12,860 in 1980.

In 1980, 200 Catholic priests in El Salvador belonged to religious orders. The most numerous were the Salesians and the Jesuits. About 50 percent of the religious clergy were dedicated to parishes, 20 percent to teaching, 10 percent to the training and preparation of priests, and the rest to work in the archdiocese. The religious priests assigned to parishes were mainly foreign missionaries, principally from Italy and Spain. The Catholic Church also sponsored 161 private schools with more than 35,000 students. Catholic personnel from the United States included 15 men (6 diocesan, 5 Franciscan, and 4 Maryknoll priests) and 13 women (11 nuns and 2 lay workers).

Since the 1920s, the Catholic Church has also been increasingly divided internally between those who have supported the status quo—the Conservative alliance of church and state—and those who have supported a Liberal and progressive agenda, based on defending the human rights of the marginalized sectors of society.

Catholics attend a procession with an image of Jesus Christ carried on a donkey on Palm Sunday in Panchimalco, El Salvador. (AP Photo/Edgar Romero)

Diverse tensions arose within the Salvadoran Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church’s post–Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Nicaraguan society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the Conservative dictatorship and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit” and “speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

Many Catholic families were sundered apart by armed conflict and forced geographical relocation due to the civil war and by internal conflicts between Conservatives, Liberals, and Progressives, in both the political and religious arenas. Monsignor Luis Chávez y González was archbishop of San Salvador from 1939 until 1977. During his tenure, the Salvadoran Catholic Church underwent significant changes. The marginal condition of the peasantry, which had been taken for granted by the church’s hierarchy, became a source of growing concern. The traditional approach of charity was seen as ineffective, and the growth of Protestantism loomed as a threat to the Catholic faith in the country. The archbishop addressed this situation by promoting the organization of cooperatives in the countryside, which were followed by the formation of Catholic base communities.

Many campesinos were encouraged to find new religious meaning in the message of a socially engaged Jesus and to seek liberation from economic and political oppression, which had significant repercussions. After the armed skirmishes between the army and the Marxist-inspired guerrillas turned into civil war in the 1980s, most Catholic base communities radicalized their activities and became members of peasant associations that provided support for the FMLN.

Relations between the Catholic Church and the state became strained after the rise of General Carlos Humberto Romero to power in January 1977 through a fraudulent election. At about the same time, another Romero, Oscar Arnulfo Romero, was appointed archbishop of San Salvador (1977–1980), apparently the more conservative of the two candidates for that position. However, in a country dominated by terror and injustice, Archbishop Romero soon became a voice for Christian compassion and reason, denouncing the military's systematic repression of the people and pleading for redistribution of land and unification of the country. Tragically, Archbishop Romero was shot through the heart by a sniper in 1980 while celebrating Mass two months after asking U.S. President Jimmy Carter to cease military aid to the Salvadoran government due to its dismal record on human rights.

Archbishop Romero's successor, Archbishop Arturo Rivera y Damas, S.D.B. (1983–1994), expressed his support for the ruling government junta, which he believed was holding its own ground in the political struggle between the forces of the extreme right and left. After Archbishop Rivera y Damas's death in 1994, Bishop Fernando Sáenz Lacalle was appointed as his replacement and served until his retirement in 2008. The current archbishop is Monseñor José Luis Escobar Alas.

In 2002, the Salvadoran Catholic Church reported 8 dioceses with 376 parishes that were served by 429 secular priests and 233 religious priests (a total of 662), in addition to 394 male religious workers (non-ordained brothers in religious orders) and 1,542 female religious workers (nuns). The first diocese was established in San Salvador in 1842, while the dioceses of Santa Ana and San Miguel were formed in 1913. San Vicente was added in 1943, Santiago de María in 1958, and Chalatenango and Zacatecoluca in 1987. The Diocese of San Salvador became an archdiocese in 1913 under Archbishop Antonio Adolfo Pérez y Aguilar, who served until his death in 1926.

The Protestant Movement The history of the Protestant movement in El Salvador is distinct from that of other Central American countries, in that pioneer foreign mission efforts were directed toward the Spanish-speaking population from the very beginning. In other republics, the presence of English-speaking immigrants, largely West Indians, often served as a cultural and linguistic bridge for new missionaries from the United States in their evangelistic and church planting activities prior to engaging in ministry to the Spanish-speaking ladino, or Amerindian, populations.

Since the Amerindian groups in El Salvador are predominantly Spanish-speaking, no Christian churches, either Catholic or Protestant, use an Indian dialect. Consequently, there is little obvious distinction between ladino and Amerindian ethnic groups in terms of general religious practices, and it is difficult to determine the extent of Protestant penetration among the remnants of the Pipil, Lenca, and Chortí. However, in the early 1900s, several Protestant missions began work among the Pipil in the southwestern region and the Chortí in the northwestern region of El Salvador using Spanish; and it is assumed that there are still congregations composed largely of Hispanized Amerindian believers.

The earliest Protestant groups to enter El Salvador were the newly formed Central American Mission (now known as CAM International, with headquarters in Dallas, Texas), whose first missionaries arrived in 1896; the California Friends Mission (Quakers) in 1902; an independent Canadian Pentecostal missionary, Frederick Ernest Mebius, who arrived in 1904; the American Baptists in 1911; the International Pentecostal Holiness Church (Mr. and Mrs. Amos Bradley, 1912–1918); and the Seventh-day Adventists in 1915.

By 1936, most of these Protestant church bodies were well established in El Salvador and had achieved some notable success among the general population of Spanish-speaking mestizos and the remnant of early Amerindians. The Quakers developed an extensive ministry among the Chortí (Mayan) in a region known as the Three-Nation Triangle (El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras), which includes northwestern El Salvador. However, the Quakers have not prospered as well as other Protestant groups in El Salvador.

Despite numerous stages of growth and decline, the CAM-supported church association has become one of the largest evangelical non-Pentecostal denominations in the country. From the establishment of its first church in 1898 in Ilapango, near San Salvador, this independent fundamentalist denomination had planted 21 churches and 83 mission stations in 8 of the country's 14 departments by 1936, largely due to the efforts of a team of U.S. missionaries and trained Salvadoran pastors. In 1935, the CAM-related churches were organized under a national council of leaders and became known as the Evangelical Church of El Salvador. In 1978, this association reported 83 churches, 32 missions, and more than 180 preaching points, with about 6,000 members. By 1992, there were about 140 churches with an estimated 13,000 members.

In 1911 the American Baptist Home Mission Society (affiliated with the Northern Baptist Convention, now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) entered El Salvador, where it soon developed strong educational and church work, especially in the departments of San Salvador and Santa Ana. By 1936, a chain of 19 churches and 50 mission stations had been established with about 1,380 members. Many of the churches were completely under national leadership, and work had begun among the Pipil in the western coastal region, near the city of Santa Ana. The Baptist Association of El Salvador was organized in 1934, but the development of trained national leaders was a slow process. In 1978, the association reported 41 churches with 3,665 members; in 1989 there were 57 churches with 5,700 members; however, by 1992 there were only 51 churches with 4,975 members.

In the 1970s, several other Baptist groups began work in El Salvador, but only two had more than 1,000 members in 1978: the Good Samaritan Baptist Churches with 15 congregations, the Miramonte Baptist Church with 16 congregations, the Baptist Bible Fellowship International, and the International Baptist Mission.

In 1915 the Seventh-day Adventist Church sent a missionary couple to El Salvador, and in 1916 their first church was established in San Salvador. However, the Adventists only reported 5 churches and 325 members in 1936, an effort that was curtailed due to competition with the growing Pentecostal movement. By 1978, there were 61 Adventist churches and 59 mission stations in the whole country, with a total membership of 12,067. Significant church growth occurred thereafter. In 2007, there were 593 congregations with 168,937 members. Three other Adventist-related bodies also exist in El Salvador: the Seventh-day Adventist Reform Movement, founded in 1956; the Church of God-Seventh Day; and the Israelite Church of God.

In 1904, Frederick Ernest Mebius began one of the first Pentecostal movements in Latin America, known as the Free Apostolic Churches of El Salvador. This occurred about two years prior to the world-renowned Azusa Street Revival that began in Los Angeles, California, in 1906, which is considered to be the modern-day origin of the Pentecostal movement. The Pentecostal doctrine preached by Mebius and his Salvadoran assistants became a source of great upheaval within the emerging Salvadoran evangelical churches, which brought Mebius into conflict with leaders of the CAM-related churches, the American Baptists, and the Adventists. Mebius and his assistants traveled throughout the countryside in an itinerant preaching ministry that eventually produced 25 loosely organized congregations with about 750 baptized members by 1930.

The congregations founded by Mebius became known as the Free Apostolic Churches, but several splinter groups were formed among his early converts, such as the Apostolic Church of the Apostles and Prophets (1935) and the Apostolic Church of the Upper Room (1930s). Two other denominations belong to this same tradition: the Apostolic Church of God in Christ (1950) and the Apostolic Church of the New Jerusalem (1977), as well as many independent congregations. In 1978, there were at least 50 independent churches with about 3,200 members within the Free Apostolic movement, as well as 114 churches and 5,500 members among the organized Apostolic Church associations.

After the arrival of the Assemblies of God in El Salvador in 1930, efforts were made to bring some order to this assortment of independent Free Apostolic Churches, but this attempt was only partially successful. In April 1930, 12 of these churches became founding members of the Assemblies of God, whose missionaries had entered the country at the request of Francisco Ramírez Arbizu, one of the leading Free Apostolic pastors. However, most of the Free Apostolic leaders did not want to submit themselves to the authority of the Assemblies of God in the United States or to its missionaries in El Salvador; consequently, they remained independent with only fraternal ties between them. Nevertheless, under the guidance of British missionary Ralph Williams, the initial groups of Assemblies of God were strengthened, advances were made toward self-support, and new congregations and preaching points were established. By 1936, the Assemblies of God reported 21 churches and 14 mission stations, with 655 members and 965 adherents.

Based on the foundations established by early missionary and national pioneers, the Assemblies of God experienced phenomenal church growth during the next 40 years, especially between 1970 and 1990. These advances made this country a showcase for this denomination's mission work in Latin America. This solid growth is attributed to the employment of "indigenous church principles" during the administration of missionaries Ralph Williams and Melvin Hodges. There was a large spurt of growth between 1935 and 1945, when the total membership increased from 684 to 2,560, and then rapid geographical expansion and membership growth followed.

There was continued growth in the Assemblies of God to the end of the century and into the next. In 2002, 1,395 churches with an estimated 132,525 members were reported. In retrospect, the Assemblies of God have not been immune to schismatic movements, with several splits occurring during the 1960s and early 1970s. At least five church associations were formed by leaders who left the Assemblies of God and began their own organizations: the Pentecostal Evangelical Union (1954), the Evangelical Mission of the Holy Spirit (1960), the Garden of Eden Evangelical Church (1962), the Evangelical Mission of the Voice of God (1969, the largest of these groups), and the Evangelical Pentecostal Church of El Salvador (1974). These 5 associations had a total of 62 churches and 2,830 members in 1978.

The arrival of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) in El Salvador in 1940 brought the Reverend H. S. Syverson, the general overseer of the Church of God in Central America, in contact with Mebius, who agreed to work together under the auspices of the former, although there were some obvious doctrinal differences between the two church traditions. Nevertheless, Mebius worked with the Church of God for several years, until his death in 1945 at age 76.

The Church of God in the U.S.A. sent a number of short-term missionaries to assist Syverson in El Salvador during the 1940s and early 1950s, but it was not until 1953 that additional full-time missionaries were assigned to the country. Growth over the next 20 years shows a consistent pattern of expansion and development in the Church of God in El Salvador. By 1970 there were 117 churches and 78 preaching points with about 4,300 members; by 1978 the work had grown to 165 churches and 50 preaching points with 6,117 total members. In 1980, there were 191 churches and 56 preaching points with 9,557 members; by 1987 there were an estimated 300 churches and 200 preaching points with 20,122 members; and by 1992 there were 392 churches and 287 preaching points with 19,281 members. Between 1987 and 1992 there was a plateau in church membership due to unexplained causes that need to be investigated.

Additional Pentecostal denominations also began work in El Salvador in the period 1950–1980. The Latin American Council of the Pentecostal Church of God of New York (with 58 churches and 5,665 members in 1992) and the Pentecostal Church of God of Puerto Rico, both with historical ties to the Assemblies of God, arrived in 1966. The Prince of Peace Evangelical Church from Guatemala began work in the early 1960s: PROLADES in 1987 reported 171 churches with 5,050 members; and in 1992 there were 430 churches with 19,111 members. The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel sent its first missionaries to El Salvador in 1973. The Elim Christian Mission from Guatemala established its first congregation in El Salvador in 1977. The Assemblies of God of Brazil arrived in 1978.

The Church of God of Prophecy arrived in 1950, but this denomination, called the Universal Church of God of Prophecy (UCOGP) in El Salvador, has had several divisions: Church of God Holy Zion (1952), Fountain of Life Church of Prophecy (1969, with 74 churches and 6,727 members in 1992), the Fundamental Church of God of Prophecy (1972), the Holy Zion Church of God of Prophecy (1974), and the City of Zion Church of God of Prophecy (also in 1974). The total membership of these splinter groups was 9,871 in 1978 with 175 organized churches, whereas the parent body reported only 38 churches and 4 missions with 1,726 members. In 1982, the UCOGP reported 54 churches and 2,445 members; in 1992 there were 92 churches with 5,151 members.

The Oneness (“Jesus Only”) Pentecostal movement is represented in El Salvador by two denominations: the Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (1948) and the United Pentecostal Church International (1965). The former had 33 churches, 25 missions, and 600 members in 1978, while the latter had 47 churches and missions, 372 preaching points, and 2,400 members.

Other non-Pentecostal denominations in El Salvador include the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (1953), independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ (1963), Church of the Nazarene (1964, with 32 churches and 2,469 members in 1992), Congregational Holiness Church (1966), Christian Brethren (1970, Cristianos congregados en el nombre del Señor, affiliated with Maurice Johnson’s group in California; 45 congregations in 2007), Evangelical Mennonite Church (1968, Beachy Amish), Church of God (1970, Anderson, Indiana), Apostolic Lutheran Church of America (1974), Evangelical Lutheran Synod (1975), Christian Reformed Church (1976), and several smaller groups.

In 1978, the estimated Protestant population of El Salvador was about 295,000, or 6.5 percent of all Salvadorans. The nation’s Protestant population had a large proportion of Pentecostals within the total membership (about 68 percent), compared to slightly more than 50 percent for the entire Central American region at that time. The largest Protestant denominations were the Assemblies of God (22,500 members); Seventh-day Adventists (12,000); Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (9,850); the Evangelical Church of El Salvador, related to the Central American Mission (6,000); and the Prince of Peace Evangelical Church (5,000).

Several new Protestant denominations in El Salvador have experienced significant growth during the past 20 or 30 years. Elim Christian Mission of El Salvador is a Pentecostal church founded by Sergio Daniel Solorzano Aldana in 1977, which now claims to have about 115,000 members, led by Pastor General Mario Vega since 1997. “Friends of Israel” Bible Baptist Tabernacle was founded by “Hermano Toby,” Edgar Lopez Bertrand, about 1978; it now claims to have about 10,000 members and is affiliated with Baptist International Missions. “Campground of God” Christian Church–Iglesia Cristiana Campamento de Dios was founded as an independent Charismatic church by Juan Manuel Martinez in 1990; Martinez was the president of the Evangelical Alliance of El Salvador in 2006. International Revival Tabernacle was founded by Carlos H. Rivas in 2001; it now claims to have about 15,000 members.

Ecumenical relations between the various Protestant denominations in El Salvador have been extremely difficult due to strong doctrinal differences and leadership conflicts, mainly between Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal groups. However, the Salvadoran Bible Society has been the major focus of interdenominational cooperation since the 1970s because of its neutral service function of promoting the distribution and reading of the Bible among the general public. More recently, the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA), affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance (WEF), has provided a platform for cooperation among conservative evangelicals since the early 1980s. In 1987, the Salvadoran Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONESAL) held its First Interdenominational Congress of Evangelicals in San Salvador. In 2001, CONESAL reported more than 50 member organizations.

The Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC), has the following institutional members in El Salvador: the Baptist Association of El Salvador (affiliated with American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.), the First Baptist Church of San Salvador, the Emmanuel Baptist Church in San Salvador, the Episcopal Church of El Salvador, the Calvinist Reformed Church of El Salvador (affiliated with the Christian Reformed Church in North America), and the Salvadoran Lutheran Synod (affiliated with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America).

During the Salvadoran civil war, few Protestants leaders raised their voices to publicly denounce the repression by government security forces and paramilitary death squads. Among the few prophetic voices demanding social justice for the oppressed were the Reverend Roger Velásquez, senior pastor of the First Baptist Church; the Reverend Edgar Palacios, senior pastor of Emmanuel Baptist Church; and Bishop Medardo E. Gómez of the Salvadoran Lutheran Church (Missouri Synod, established in 1954), all in San Salvador.

In 1985 the Salvadoran Lutheran Synod became an autonomous church. The relationship with the Missouri Synod was disrupted over a spectrum of issues—differing views on Liberation Theology and solidarity with the oppressed, ecumenical commitment, and ordination of women. During the civil war in El Salvador, the Salvadoran Lutheran Synod advocated for justice and assisted displaced persons and the poor. The Lutheran Church paid a high price for its social involvement: one of its pastors was murdered (David Fernández in 1984) and many church workers, including the bishop, received death threats and had to go into hiding or flee the country, as did Baptist pastors Velásquez and Palacios and their families.

Other Christian Groups In addition to the rapid growth of evangelical denominations during past decades, El Salvador has also witnessed the emergence of numerous non-Protestant marginal Christian groups, such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses (531 congregations with 30,687 members in 2005), the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons, established in San Salvador in 1951; in 1965, there were 4,200 members in El Salvador; in 1986, membership was 15,100; in 1990, membership was 38,000; and in 2007, membership was reported to be 102,043 in 161 congregations), and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (now called “Community of Christ”) from the United States; the Light of the World Church from Guadalajara, Mexico; Mita Congregation, People of Amos Church and Voice of the Cornerstone from Puerto Rico; the God is Love Church and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God from Brazil; the Growing in Grace International Ministries (founded by Jose Luis de Jesus Miranda in Miami, Florida), the Unity School of Christianity, and the Christadelphian Bible Mission from the United States, among others.

Additional Religious Groups Also, a few non-Christian religions have appeared, adding to the historical presence of the Jewish community that arrived from Spain (Sephardic) during the colonial period or from other European countries, mainly in the aftermath of World Wars I and II. The first synagogue was founded in 1950, and the first rabbi and spiritual leader of the community was Alex Freund.

Other non-Christian religions in El Salvador include the Baha’i Faith, Islam (mainly among Palestinian Arabs: Comunidad Islámica Shiíta de El Salvador, Centro Cultural Islámico Fátimah Az-Zahra), Buddhism (Buddhist Center of San Salvador [Lhundrup Changchub Ling—Jardín de la iluminación espontánea], Buddhist Group of San Salvador, Budismo Laica Reiyukai, Casa Tibet México—El Salvador, Kusum Ling Study Group, the International Meditation Association of the Supreme Master Ching Hai), and several Hindu-related groups: the Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission—Science of Spirituality (Sikhism/Sant Mat), Transcendental Meditation (TM, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace), and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON, Hari Krishnas).

The Ancient Wisdom tradition is represented by: the Ancient Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC) with local chapters in San Salvador, Santa Ana, San Miguel and Sonsonate; Freemasonry (Grand Lodge Cuscatlán of the Republic of El Salvador); the Instituto de Yoga y Escuela de Astrología Gran Fraternidad Universal (GFU, founded in Venezuela by Dr. Serge Raynaud de la Ferrière), and the Salvadoran Christian Gnostic Movement (founded by Samael Aun Weor in Mexico).

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age movement is represented by the Theosophical Society in America (with headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois, was established in San Salvador in 1929), the Church of Scientology, and the Unification Movement (founded in Korea by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon).

Some Native American religious traditions (animist) have survived from the pre-Columbian era in some areas of El Salvador. “Popular religiosity” (syncretistic) is practiced by a majority of the Hispanic Catholic population. Among practitioners of Amerindian religions and Hispanic Popular Catholicism, there are “specialists” who practice magic, witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo). In addition, there are numerous psychics, mediums, clairvoyants, and astrologers who announce their services in local newspapers.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Baptist Association of El Salvador; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Christian Brethren; Christian Churches and Churches of Christ; Christian Reformed Church in North America; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Community of Christ; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Master Ching Hai Meditation Association; Mita Congregation; Moon, Sun Myung; Roman Catholic Church; Salesians; Salvadoran Lutheran Synod; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Seventh-Day Adventist Reform Movement; Unification Movement; United Pentecostal Church International; Unity School of Christianity; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

Barrantes, Enrique. Cien Años de la Presencia Evangélica en El Salvador: El Movimiento Pentecostal. http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/els/IAP_historia_els.pdf.

Barrantes, Enrique. Así Llegó el Pentecostés: un capítulo en la historia de El Salvador. San Salvador, El Salvador: self-published by the author, ca. 2002 (revised 2008).

Barrantes, Enrique. Frederico Ernesto Mebius . . . Su Historia, 1869–1945. San Salvador, El Salvador: self-published by the author, ca. 2002 (revised 2008).

Barry, Tom. El Salvador: A Country Guide. Albuquerque, NM: The Inter-Hemispheric Education Resource Center, 1990.

Berryman, Phillip. The Religious Roots of Rebellion: Christians in Central American Revolutions. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1984.

Canizález, Carlos Napoleón. Ensayo de la historia de la Iglesia de Dios en El Salvador, 1941–1996. San Salvador, El Salvador: Iglesia de Dios, 1997.

Chapin, Mac. “La población indígena de El Salvador.” Mesoamérica, Año 12, Cuaderno 21, junio de 1991.

CID-Gallup. Encuestas de Opinión Pública. San José, Costa Rica: CID-Gallup, May 1995, September 2000, and June 2007.

CONESAL. Despertar '93: El Desarrollo de la Iglesia Evangélica 1982–1992 y los Desafíos para el Año 2000. San Salvador, El Salvador: CONESAL, 1993.

Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.

IUDOP-UCA. Encuestas de Opinión Pública. Informes Nos. 17, 111, 112, 114, and 116. San Salvador, El Salvador: Instituto Universitario de Opinión Pública, Universidad Centroamericana (IUDOP-UCA) José Simeón Cañas, 1988–2008.

Jeter de Walker, Luisa. Siembra y Cosecha. Tomo 1, Las Asambleas de Dios de México y Centroamérica. Deerfield, FL: Editorial Vida, 1990.

Monroy, Daniel, et al. Breve Historia de la Iglesia Bautista en El Salvador, 1909–1985. http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/els/ABEL_historia_els.pdf.

Mullancy, John. Aiding the Desplazados of El Salvador: The Complexity of Humanitarian Assistance. Washington, DC: The U.S. Committee for Refugees (USCR), Fall 1984.

PROCADES-IINDEF. Directorio de Iglesias, Organizaciones y Ministerios del Movimiento Protestante: El Salvador. San José, Costa Rica: Proyecto Centroamericano de Estudios Sociorreligiosos (PROCADES) del Instituto Internacional de Evangelismo A Fondo (IINDEF), agosto de 1982.

- PROLADES. Public Opinion Polls on Religious Affiliation in El Salvador, 1988–2008. http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/els/els_polls_1988-2008.pdf.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1969.
- Secretariado General de la Confederación Latinoamericana de Religiosos (CLAR). Estudio sociográfico de los religiosos y las religiosas en América Latina. Bogotá, Colombia: CLAR, 1971.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report 2008: El Salvador. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108525.htm>.
- Williams, Philip J. “The Sound of Tambourines: The Politics of Pentecostal Growth in El Salvador.” Chapter 10 in Power, Politics and Pentecostals in Latin America, edited by Edward L. Cleary and Hannah W. Stewart-Gambino. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Wilson, Everett A. “Sanguine Saints: Pentecostalism in El Salvador.” Church History 52 (June 1983): 186–198.

Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission

Shri Hans Maharaj Ji (1900–1966) founded the Divine Light Mission (DLM, which later became Elan Vital) in India during the 1930s. Hansji Maharaj was a disciple of Sarupanand, a guru in the lineage of Shri Paramhans Advait Mat centered in Guna, a district in the state of Madhya Pradesh. Shri Paramhans Advait Mat (which is based primarily on the teachings of the Sant tradition and shabd [sound current] yoga) is a guru-based organization with centers throughout India. The group’s teachings are remarkably similar to those of the Radhasoami tradition, which was founded in Agra, India, around the same time period (mid- to late 19th century). Apparently Hansji split with the main center of Shri Paramhans Advait Mat in a succession dispute after his guru’s death. This led him to create the Divine Light Mission. Hansji incorporated almost every tenet and practice he had learned in Shri Paramhans Advait Mat into his own teachings, including a nuanced understanding of sound and light meditation, lacto-vegetarianism, mahatmas, initiation, receiving “knowledge,” and enjoying divine nectar.

When Maharaj Ji died in 1966, Prem Pal Singh Rawat, the youngest of four sons and only eight years old at the time, declared himself to be his father’s spiritual successor and a satguru, or Perfect Master. A precocious child, he was said to have meditated from the age of two, and he spoke to crowds at age six. Although ascension to authority usually accrues to the oldest not the youngest son, neither his brothers nor his mother challenged his proclamation. He assumed his father’s name Maharaj Ji, but later became known as Maharaji.

In 1971, at the age of 13, Guru Maharaj Ji traveled to England and the United States and was almost immediately a media sensation. He established headquarters in Colorado, but the largest number of devotees (called Premies, meaning “lovers of God”) was in Britain. Barker estimates there were about 8,500 Premies in the early 1970s. But success was short-lived. In 1973 a mass gathering in Houston’s Astrodome, called to proclaim a millennium of peace, drew only a fraction of the crowd anticipated and turned out to be a financial disaster. A year later, at age 16, the young guru married his secretary, who was eight years his senior. This marriage fractured family ties and resulted in a reorganization of DLM. Some of his followers began to drift away.

For the next several years Maharaj Ji struggled with reorganization—how to present the message and how to meet mounting financial obligations. In 1979 headquarters were moved from Denver, Colorado, to Miami, Florida, where the responsibility for meeting payrolls and caring for Premies became an increasing burden. Maharaj Ji came to see the Indian spiritual motif as unnecessary, perhaps even a hindrance to reaching a larger audience. In the early 1980s he began closing down ashrams. He eventually disbanded the Divine Light Mission altogether and formed a new corporate structure through which he would present his teachings: Elan Vital. He also repackaged the message, changed his name to Maharaji and then began to use his given name Prem Rawat, and redefined himself as a teacher by dropping all outward appearances as an Indian guru.

In his new role, Prem Rawat has continued the primary teaching of the Divine Light Mission built around the “receipt of Knowledge.” The path to receiving Knowledge is the practice of four meditation techniques. The meditation techniques the Maharaji teaches today are the same he learned from his father, Hansji Maharaj, who, in turn, learned them from his spiritual teacher. “Knowledge,” claims Maharaji, “is a way to be able to take all your senses that have been going outside all your life, turn them around and put them inside to feel and to actually experience you . . . What you are looking for is inside you” (<http://www.elanvital.org/Knowledge.htm>).

The young guru, who willingly accepted the spiritual titles of “Lord of the Universe” and the “Perfect Master,” considered these meditation techniques to be fundamental in the quest for spiritual existence. Gradually he came to see the meditation techniques as mere technology, which can be applied to “secular enlightenment.” He now claims that “‘Knowledge’ is not spiritual, nor is it a religion.” And, of course, Elan Vital is not a religious organization.

Having set the Radhasoami perspective in a new context, as a secular personal-growth teaching, Maharaji has found a new following. He continues to travel the world lecturing and extending Knowledge to uncounted numbers, while the organization has assumed a low profile in many lands where it was formerly an object of intense controversy. In the process of change, he left behind a number of former members of the Divine Light Mission, who have formed a network to continue to communicate about their experiences. Elan Vital itself supports an Internet site, given below, where organizational contacts in countries around the world are listed.

Elan Vital
PO Box 6130
Malibu, CA 90264–6130
<http://www.elanvital.org>

Jeffrey K. Hadden and Eugene M. Elliott III

See also: Meditation; Radhasoami; Vegetarianism.

References

- Barker, Eileen. New Religious Movements: A Practical Introduction. London: Her Majesty’s Stationery Office, 1989.
- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.

Cagan, Andrea. Peace Is Possible: The Life and Message of Prem Rawat. Dresher, PA: Mighty River Press, 2007.

Downton, James V., Jr. Sacred Journeys: The Conversion of Young Americans to Divine Light Mission. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.

Maharaji. Listen to the Cry of Your Heart: Something Wonderful Is Being Said. Malibu, CA: Visions International, 1995.

Maharaj Ji. The Living Master. Denver, CO: Divine Light Mission, 1978.

Messner, Jeanne. “Guru Maharaj Ji and the Divine Light Mission.” In The New Religious Consciousness, edited by Charles Y. Glock and Robert N. Bellah. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

Elim Pentecostal Church

The Elim Pentecostal Movement is the second largest Pentecostal denomination in Great Britain. A 1996 survey reported an overall average Sunday attendance of 63,500 in the 432 churches in the United Kingdom, Channel Isles, and Ireland. The largest British Elim congregation is Kensington Temple, London, operating with 120 satellite churches and more than 7,000 members.

Elim was the large oasis that the children of Israel came upon during their wanderings in the wilderness (Exodus 15:27). In 1915, George Jeffreys (1889–1962), a Welsh evangelist, launched the Elim Evangelistic Band in Monaghan, Ireland. The Band’s first church was established in Belfast in 1916. Eventually a formalized constitution was agreed upon in 1922, coinciding with Jeffreys’ shift of attention from Ireland to England. In 1929, the group became known as the Elim Foursquare Gospel Alliance, reflecting the group’s Pentecostal emphases on Jesus as Savior, Baptizer in the Holy Spirit, Healer, and Coming King (a presentation of the Christian gospel developed by Albert Benjamin Simpson [1843–1919], founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance). In common with other Pentecostal groups, Elim has a high regard for the Bible, together with an expectation of a personal awareness of salvation and subsequent empowerment by the Holy Spirit. Distinctive to Elim among British Pentecostals, tongues are not insisted upon as the evidence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit.

In 1934, administrative power passed from Jeffreys to an elected Executive Council. From this time on, there was major conflict between Jeffreys and E. J. Phillips (1893–1973), Elim’s chief administrator, concerning both doctrinal and ecclesiological issues. This culminated in Jeffreys’ resignation in 1939 to form the Bible Pattern Church Fellowship.

After World War II, there was an emphasis upon organized evangelism, continuing Jeffreys’ methodology of gathering large crowds of people and preaching a message of salvation through Christ’s death and the possibility of divine healing. However, the results in the postwar period did not match the successes of Jeffreys during 1924–1934. It was the Charismatic movement in the 1960s that provided the spur for a revitalized Pentecostal spirituality and a renewed emphasis upon church growth. From the 1980s on, there has been an increased emphasis upon the social effects of the gospel, with many churches offering such programs as child care, employment schemes, and advice centers.

Elim has international links with churches and workers in 45 countries. These range from large national churches such as the Church of Pentecost, which has approximately one million adherents in Africa, to individual workers working with various local congregations.

The Elim Church is governed by the Conference, made up of ministers and laity, which meets annually. Up to 1998, membership of the Conference was only open to men. The national work is divided into regions, each having its own regional superintendent, who is elected to this position by the ministers and lay representatives from within the region. These officers form the basis of the Executive Council. Each church has a leadership session, consisting of the pastor(s), together with elders and deacons. The church session is responsible for the general oversight of the church, although the minister has the responsibility for the services. The membership of the church is open to any who are “born again.”

Elim Pentecostal Church
PO Box 38

Cheltenham, Glos. GL50 3HN
UK
<http://www.elim.org.uk>

D. N. Hudson

See also: Charismatic Movement; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Church of Pentecost; Pentecostalism.

References

- Cartwright, Desmon W. The Great Evangelists. Basingstoke, UK: Marshall Pickering, 1986.
- Hudson, D. N. “A Schism and Its Aftermath. An Historical Analysis of Denominational Deception in the Elim Pentecostal Church, 1939–1940.” Ph.D. diss., King’s College, 1999.
- Wilson, Brian. Sects and Society. London: Heinemann, 1961.

Elizabeth I

1533–1603

Elizabeth I, the daughter of King Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn, led England through a half century of political and religious turmoil. Politically, she had to stave off challenges to her rule from both claimants within her own family (most notably Mary Queen of Scots) and foreign powers (most notably Spain). Coming to the throne at a time when both Protestants and Catholics vied for control of the country, she found a way between the two options that led to the emergence of the modern Church of England, or Anglican Church.

Elizabeth was born September 7, 1533. Previously, Henry had withdrawn his allegiance to the pope and annulled his marriage to Catherine of Aragon, who had produced no male heir. He publicly married Boleyn in January 1533. She was subsequently crowned as his queen. Elizabeth was but three when her mother was beheaded (1536) for, like Catherine, not having borne a male child. Meanwhile, Parliament had passed the Act of Succession that declared Catherine’s daughter Mary illegitimate and named Elizabeth the heir to the throne. Elizabeth grew up as Henry, who remained a Catholic in belief and practice, strategized with Protestant leaders in his court for the religious direction of the country.

Portrait of Elizabeth I, queen of England (r. 1558–1603). During her reign, England consolidated its position as a European power and embarked upon becoming a colonial power. (Ann Ronan Pictures/StockphotoPro)

In 1547, Elizabeth's half brother Edward VI (r. 1547–1553) came to the throne. With Edward still a child, the Protestant-controlled Council of Regency took the country in a Protestant direction. Edward's brief reign was followed by that of an angry Mary I (r. 1553–1558), who reintroduced Catholicism with a vengeance. Elizabeth finally came to the throne in 1558 to lead a country that was financially broke, religiously divided, and threatened by both France and Spain. Elizabeth moved to quiet the religious controversy by mandating a position between the two competing religions, though she tended to favor Protestantism, aware that the major political/military challenges to England and her leadership, came from Catholic countries (Spain and France) and her Catholic cousin Mary.

Elizabeth's new format for the Church of England became known as the via media. The church would include important elements drawn from both Catholics and Protestants. She retained the church's episcopal leadership and left room in the liturgy so that the Eucharist could be seen as embodying the real presence of Christ. She had some of the most egregious elements of the Prayer Book introduced under Edward modified to appease the Catholics, though the Catholic bishops were still far from resigned. Aware of the Protestant majority in Parliament, she proposed a doctrinal infused with John Calvin's Reformed theology views and specifically denouncing Roman Catholic doctrine in several points. Finally, she reinstated several of the supremacy acts by which her father had taken control of the church. Parliament named her supreme governor of the Church of England.

Elizabeth was repeatedly distracted by attempts, led by Roman Catholics, to overthrow and even kill her. Her suppression of a Catholic uprising in 1569 led to her excommunication by Pope Pius V (r. 1566–1572). Through the early 1580s, Jesuits began to call for her assassination and told their audiences that assassination in the cause of the church was not only permitted but a genuine good. Elizabeth finally expelled them from her realm in 1585. Following the clear involvement of Mary Queen of Scots in an attempt to replace her cousin, Elizabeth had her executed in 1587.

The ongoing hostilities between Elizabeth and the Catholics culminated in 1588. Pope Sixtus V (r. 1585–1590) backed Spain's designs on England by helping finance the creation of a fleet of ships. The plan called for the Spanish Armada to attack via the Thames River, while an army originating in Holland (then under Spanish rule) was to create a second front. Unable to match the Spanish fleet, ship for ship, the British built several hundred small but swifter ships. Using privateers, some of whom had gained their experience in pirating adventures, the British defeated the Spanish Armada using hit-and-run tactics assisted by some bad weather. The defeat of the armada changed the basic power balance in Europe, with a Protestantized England emerging as the world's greatest naval power and Catholic Spain beginning its long descent from its former powerful position.

Elizabeth's Catholic problems did not especially improve the status of Protestants (mostly Presbyterians). Some refused to wear the prescribed priestly vestments, and Elizabeth fired them from their jobs as parish priests. Dissatisfaction with the continued Romanish elements in the Church of England led to repeated call for its further purification. Those calling for further change became known collectively as Puritans. Puritan opposition to a church led by bishops resulted both in the emergence of Anglican defenders of episcopal authority and Elizabeth's arrest of Puritan leaders. Some left for Holland, which, having overthrown Spain rule, had become the most religiously tolerant country in Europe.

In spite of opposition from both the most doctrinaire of her Catholic and Puritan subjects, Elizabeth created broad popular support for her political acumen and enjoyed obvious overall success in establishing England as a leading world power. As she outlived many of her critics, she gained more and more support for her mediating position from the next generation.

The problems of Elizabeth's last years were very real, though they pale relative to the momentous decisions and event of the first decades. She was also able to retain her health. She had smallpox in 1562, but survived. The disease had left her face scared and caused partial baldness, but otherwise had few long-term effects. Elizabeth began to develop health problems in 1602, but could still function until March 1603. She went relatively quickly, passing away on March 24, 1603, at Richmond Palace. Plans had already been put in place to proclaim James VI of Scotland as her successor.

Elizabeth had largely created the Church of England as it is known today. Especially in the decades after the defeat of the Spanish Armada, she supported explorers of the likes of Sir Francis Drake who set the stage for the development of England's colonial empire beginning in the next century. Through the 17th century, England would challenge the privileges assigned to Spain and Portugal in 1492 for the development of the world.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Mary I; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Erickson, Carolly. The First Elizabeth. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1997.

Greaves, Richard L. Society and Religion in Elizabethan England. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1981.

Marcus, Leah S., Janet Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose, eds. Elizabeth I: Collected Works. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Ronald, Susan. The Pirate Queen: Queen Elizabeth I, Her Pirate Adventurers, and the Dawn of Empire. New York: HarperCollins, 2006.

Somerset, Anne. Elizabeth I. New York: Anchor, 2003.

Watkins, Susan. In Public and Private: Elizabeth I and Her World. London: Thames and Hudson, 1998.

Emei Shan

Emei Shan (Mount Emei) is one of the four sacred Buddhist mountains in China. It is located in Sichuan Province south of Chung Du, and is the designated mountain of the west. When visiting Emei, one observes four peaks. The sacred aspect of the mountain is primarily attached to one of the four peaks known as Da'e Mountain. The main peak at Mount Emei rises more than 10,100 feet above sea level, making it higher than any of the five Daoist Holy Mountains.

Buddhism appears to have arrived and the first temple built at Mount Emei during the reign of Emperor Wudi (236–290 CE) of the western Jin dynasty. Additional temples were built during the Sui (581–618) and Tang (618–907) dynasties. Over the centuries the mountain was also identified with the bodhisattva Samantabhadra, the Universal Worthy Great Conduct Bodhisattva, one of the more important bodhisattvas in Pure Land Buddhism, often pictured atop a white elephant. He is a featured character in the Flower Garland Sutra, which happened to spread through China during the western Jin dynasty. Nichiren Buddhists see him as the protector of the Lotus Sutra.

As the association between the bodhisattva and the mountain developed, the understanding grew that Samantabhadra had transformed the mountain into his territory from which he worked to spread Buddhism. Symbolic of the bodhisattva's hegemony, during the Song dynasty (960–1279) a bronze statue of Samantabhadra was installed in Wannian Temple. The emphasis on Samantabhadra peaked at Mount Emei during the Ming and Qing dynasties, when several thousand monks resided at more than 70 temples (of which some 20 have survived).

Of the extant temples, the most notable are the Baoguo Temple, a wood structure with the immense Hall of Seven Buddhas and its many wood and stone carvings; the Wannian Temple, built in the Ming dynasty, known for its architecture and the 20-foot statue of Samantabhadra riding his white elephant; the Fuhu Temple with its Huayan Pagoda inscribed with the text of the Flower Garland Sutra; and Yogming Huazang Temple, atop one peak, whose exterior of copper mixed with gold has given its location the name Jinding (Golden Top) Mountain.

In 1996, Mount Emei was named a United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) World Heritage Site for both its natural beauty and historical sacred significance. Included in its designation as a site was the Giant Buddha of Leshan, a 234-foot-high statue of Maitreya Buddha, until quite recently the largest Buddha statue in the world. The Leshan statue is about 25 miles from Mount Emei.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Emei Shan; Jiu Hua Shan; Putuo Shan; Samantabhadra's Birthday; Statues—Buddhist; Wu Tai Shan.

References

- Hargett, James M. Stairway to Heaven: A Journey to the Summit of Mount Emei. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2006.
- Nanquin, Susan, and Chün-Fang Yü, eds. Pilgrims and Sacred Sites in China. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.
- Shunxun, Nan, and Beverly Foit-Albert. China's Sacred Sites. Honesdale, PA: Himalayan Institute Press, 2007.

The Emissaries

The Emissaries, a new religious group in the Western Esoteric tradition, was founded in Tennessee in 1932 by Lloyd Arthur Meeker (1907–1954), who had come to the realization that “he was completely responsible for the state of his world and the quality of his experience in it”; he published his ideas under the name of Uranda. In 1940 he met Martin Cecil (1909–1988), later the seventh marquess of Exeter, who took Meeker's teachings and developed them into a more systematic and comprehensive system. Their writings and talks are collected in a series of volumes entitled The Third Sacred School. Meeker died in a plane crash in 1954, and Cecil took over the leadership.

Most Emissaries live in 8 main communities of from 20 to 150 people, the largest being in the United States, at Sunrise Ranch in Colorado, established in 1945. In 2003 the British community sold the headquarters it had used since 1980 at Mickleton House in Gloucestershire, England, to focus on more localized work.

Until Cecil's death in 1988, leadership was centralized; for example, each community would read a transcript of a talk by Cecil at their Sunday services. After Martin Cecil's death his son Michael Cecil (b. 1935) decentralized the leadership, putting it into the hands of a governing board of trustees and locally selected representatives. After an awkward transition, eventually each community became used to being self-governing. Without the strong charismatic centralized leadership of Martin Cecil, however, membership fell by over two-thirds.

The primary purpose of the Emissaries is “to encourage the experience and expression of divine identity.” Individuals working together can “become the critical mass which empowers creative change on a wider scale.” They see themselves as part of the wider New Age movement of people “whose passion is to express the spirit of God on Earth.” Their main spiritual practice is attunement, “a form of vibrational alignment and healing . . . a process of clarifying and deepening our connection with Being and Source . . . a vital component of the spiritual renaissance emerging in the world today.” During attunement, one member will hold his or her hands over areas of another member's body, usually without touching, in order to activate “a free flow of life energy between physical and spiritual dimensions” and to “bring health and well-being on very deep and fundamental levels.”

Members, typically ages 40 to 60, tend to come from the professions, the arts, and the media. Emissary communities frequently host conferences, courses, and seminars by a wide range of other New Age groups and teachers. They also practice sustainable organic farming.

The Emissaries are also known as the Emissaries of Divine Light. Earlier names for the movement include the Foundation for Universal Unity, the Ontological Society, and the Integrity Society. The organization is led internationally by eight trustees and spiritual director David Karchere. There is an estimated world membership of 600.

Michael Cecil left the Emissaries in 1996, saying in an interview that he believed they had become too introverted. "I didn't want to be part of an enclave separate from the world," he said. "I felt I needed to move out into the larger sphere myself." In 2000 he co-founded a new group, the Ashland Institute, in Ashland, Oregon; it runs a variety of personal development courses with a focus on spiritual-based transformation. It practices attunement, which it describes as "an approach to healing based on the premise that the body is a dynamic, self-healing expression of a deeper spiritual self."

Emissaries
Sunrise Ranch
5569 North County Road 29
Loveland, CO 80538
<http://www.emissaries.org>

The Ashland Institute
PO Box 366
Ashland, OR 97520
www.ashlandinstitute.org

David V. Barrett

See also: New Age Movement; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Cecil, Martin. Being Where You Are. New Canaan, CT: Keats Publishing, 1974.
- Exeter, Martin. Beyond Belief: Insights to the Way It Is. Loveland, CO: Foundation House Publications, 1986.

Todd, Douglas. "Leader left Divine Light behind him." Vancouver Sun, September 29 2003.

Energy

Concepts of vital or cosmic energy can be found in many cultures and religious traditions, including pneuma or spirit in the Greco-Roman world, prana in India, and qi in China. These concepts are all etymologically derived from native terms for "breath," and imply a connection between the rhythms of breathing and the mystery of life. In the book of Genesis, God breathes the breath of life into clay to make Adam as a living soul; the Hebrew Bible also describes death as the breath's return to God. In the Stoic philosophy of ancient Greece, pneuma is the soul of God (Zeus) and the vehicle through which the divine logos organizes inert matter. Pneuma is thus the structuring force of the universe, which, in differentiated expressions, accounts for the variation among beings: the pneuma of state or tension, which gives cohesion to inanimate objects; the vegetative pneuma, which gives growth and life; the animal pneuma, which endows animals with powers of perception and reproduction; and the rational pneuma, which gives humans the power of judgment. In Vedantic philosophy, prana is the life-force and creative power of the universe. It exists primordially as an unmanifest, transcendental energy of pure consciousness, from which emanates a manifest force of creation through which the entire universe comes into being. In Chinese philosophy, qi is typically described as the pervasive life-force that circulates throughout the universe and all beings. Daoist and neo-Confucian thought postulate the emanation of formless qi from the Dao, which then differentiates between pure, ethereal yang qi, which rises to form heaven, and heavy, turbid yin qi, which descends to form the Earth. Qi continues to circulate between yin and yang, heaven and Earth, generating the five phases or elements (wood, fire, earth, metal, and water), and the myriad beings.

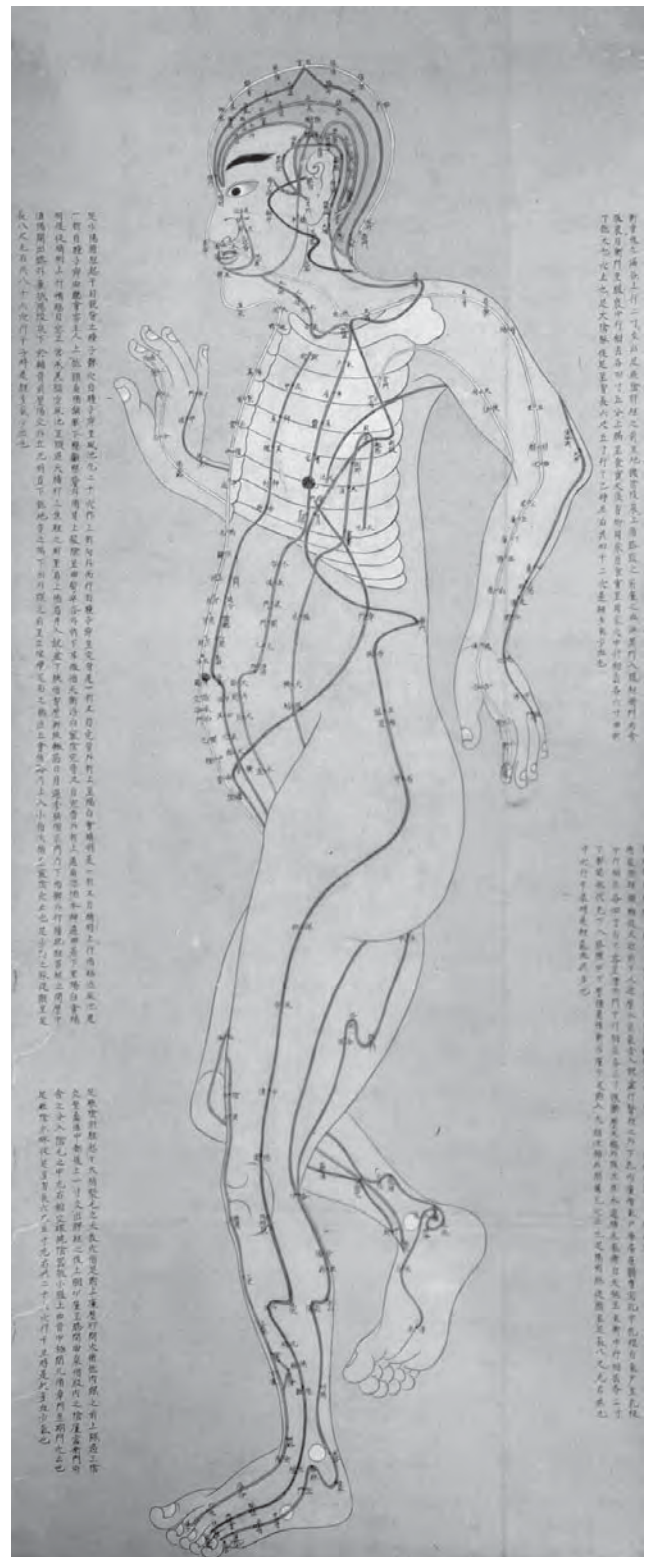

While beliefs about energy have become incorporated into a variety of religious and spiritual movements, the world religions typically have focused little attention on the subject. For example, although the Christian practice of laying on of hands may appear similar to energetic healing techniques, the fundamental belief is that prayer has the power to call God's miracles; positive effects are not based on the concept of energy itself. Likewise, Islam has no teachings specifically dealing with energy although some Muslims believe that by submitting completely to the will of Allah, blocked energetic resources can be released.

Prior to the global dominance of the biomedical model of human anatomy and physiology, many cultures' theoretical models of the human body emphasized a system based on energy. In contemporary society, energy theory is particularly evident within the milieu of complementary and alternative medicine. Many therapies purport to work directly on an energetic level, claiming to cure energetic imbalances that are believed to contribute to pain and illness.

Although therapies with a focus on health and well-being are perhaps not strictly speaking religious, many practitioners do incorporate these beliefs into a worldview that they rely upon to make major life choices. Such a worldview resonates with the beliefs and practices of the New Age movement and would include beliefs in the importance of thinking holistically (for both the individual and the plant), a mind-body connection, and the influence of energy. By learning to work energetically, many in this field describe an increased sense of empowerment and feeling of control over their health and lives. In the contemporary New Age milieu, this kind of energy or life-force is often explored simultaneously from many perspectives; it is often believed that the conceptual systems that developed in distinct historical and cultural contexts are simply different descriptions of what is essentially the same phenomenon.

Indian Concepts of Energy The Indian traditions have ancient and complex beliefs about what might be translated as “energy.” Shakti relates to the concept of energy involved with the force and power of creation. Shakti is often personified in the form of the goddess, or Devi, a dynamic feminine manifestation of the divine. Another Indian word for energy, with cognates in most Indo-European languages is ojas. In Ayurvedic (traditional Indian) medicine, ojas could be translated as “vital energy” and is conceived as the most essential element of a body. The strength of an individual's ojas is believed to impact on his or her "potency" or power and influence in the world (Gonda 1952). A related concept is prana, the Sanskrit word for "breath," which is defined as one of the five organs of perception in the Chandogya Upanishad, probably composed before 1000 BCE. From at least the time of the Chandogya Upanishad, it has been believed that prana is a form of energy that travels in the human body within channels called nadi. While the number of nadi vary within different descriptions, there are generally believed to be three main channels: the Pingala (associated with the right side of the body, maleness, and the Sun), Ida (associated with the left side of the body, femaleness, and the Moon), and the Sushumna, a central channel. According to some traditions, energy can be directed into the Sushumna, passing through a series of nodal points (chakras) to the crown of the head. When the prana in the central channel (now called kundalini) is unblocked, it is believed that an individual can experience the true nature of reality. In the Advaita Vedanta tradition this might be described as moksha, or liberation, an experience of the non-dual nature of reality; for a follower of Samkhya it would be described as kavailya, the experience of pure consciousness (puruṣa) unfettered by matter (prakṛiti). Esoteric practices aiming to achieve this energetic liberation, known as Tantra, became popular in the Indian subcontinent from around 500 to 700 CE and were incorporated into some Jain, Buddhist, Hindu, as well as later Sufi and Sikh traditions (see White 1996). In the early 20th century, a few Shakti Tantric texts were translated into English by Sir John Woodruff and Bengali collaborators (first published under the pseudonym Arthur Avalon) and these works were incorporated into Karl Jung's theories as well as Western esoteric and ritual magic (Shamdasani 1996; Urban 2006). During the 20th century there have been several published accounts of spiritual awakenings via the raising of kundalini energy and contemporary accounts continue to be published on the Internet.

Chinese depiction of energy flow, or qi, in the human body. (Bildarchiv Preussischer Kulturbesitz/Art Resource)

Energy in China The concept of qi likewise has ancient origins in Chinese culture. It could be argued that ideas of qi permeate all aspects of Chinese culture, but again, it is not specifically a religious concept. Conceptions of qi have changed over time and practitioners of traditional Chinese medicine, of both Western and Eastern origin, continue to refine the concept in the light of modern understandings (Zhang and Rose 2001). Like prana, qi is believed to be circulated through channels located within the human body. In traditional Chinese medicine these channels are believed to have a role in connecting the surface of the body with the internal organs. Regulating qi is believed to have an important role in maintaining health and increasing an individual's physical and psychological power. The strengthening and manipulation of qi is a key concept in acupuncture, many forms of martial arts, and in the practice of qigong. Consideration of qi in the arrangement of the physical world is known as Feng Shui. Tibetan culture has the concept of rLung, which can be defined as a subtle flow of energy in the body that is intimately related to the healthy functioning of not only the body, but also powers of speech and mind.

Energy in Japan In Japan, ki is often translated as "energy" and has historical and cultural overlaps with the Chinese concept of qi. However, in the Japanese language ki is a common word that has a variety of meanings usually relating to a person's mental state, feelings, or intentions. This link between the mind and body is often emphasized in contemporary presentations of ki as a concept. The Japanese also have a conception of energy traveling in meridians within the body. It is believed that skillful manipulation of this energy can contribute toward improving health, well-being, mental concentration, and spiritual development. Examples include traditional forms of Japanese massage, which form the basis of Shiatsu massage as well as the practice of Reiki, which claims to allow a healer to channel energy from the universe for the healing of a specific human body.

Energy in African Traditions Many African traditions have a belief in a concept related to energy. For example, the Yorùbá peoples have a belief in ashé. Ashé can be understood as mystical, generative force and life-giving energy present in all creation through divine grace. The various orishas, or divine beings, are understood as the first anthropomorphic manifestations of this energy. Ashé is considered an ever-present link between creation and the divine; a harmonious interaction with ashé leads to a fulfilling and successful human life. Concepts of ashé are important in Santería (also known as La Regla Lucumi or Regla de Ocha).

Energy is also an important part of the theology of Haitian Vodou practitioners where the human is seen as a non-discrete being in dialogue with numerous forces external to the human, including spirits and ancestors. The treatments prescribed by Vodou priests could be understood as a kind of healing system that aims to restore an individual's balance with all these energies (Bellegarde-Smith 2005).

Energy in Western Culture In the West, concepts of energy are associated with the vitalistic healing systems of Galenic, Ayurvedic, and Chinese medicine, in which therapies attempt to modify the circulation of vital energies in order to restore the body's energetic harmony. In the Chinese and Indian case, they are also associated with meditation systems (pranayoga and qigong) which aim, through the disciplining of the breath, to control the circulation of qi or prana with one's own consciousness, and to nurture its development and transformations.

Energy-based cosmologies and healing systems have played an important role in the development of alternative spiritualities in late modernity. Although, from the 19th century on, established scientific disciplines such as medicine and chemistry have purged all traces of "vitalism" from their theories and descriptions, energy-based therapies and spiritual techniques have become increasingly widespread in the popular realm. In an increasingly secularized culture in which many people reject the authoritarian monotheism of the established churches, energy therapies and cosmologies can easily be formulated using scientific terminologies such as "rays," "fields," "vibrations," or "biomagnetism," which can be manipulated by anyone through technical operations of the body. This opens a space for spiritualities that can be practiced outside the realm of "religion." The language of energies is shared by a broad array of contemporary therapies and spiritual practices, ranging from kundalini yoga and Anthroposophy to Feng Shui, Chinese martial arts, Reiki, rebirthing-bodywork, Integrative Body Psychotherapy, dowsing, shiatsu, homeopathy, Ayurveda, therapeutic touch, and the like.

Franz Mesmer (1734–1815) believed that health was dependent on the free flow of a kind of energy through channels in the body. He believed he could influence the flow of this energy with "passes" of his hands on and across the body. Although met with a mixed reception during his lifetime, Mesmer's ideas influenced the founding of hypnosis and enjoyed popular interest in Victorian Britain and America (Winter 2000).

In the late 19th and early 20th century, the Theosophical Society was responsible for promoting ideas to do with energy. In particular, the Society popularized the idea of auras or energetic fields visible as colors around individuals and the concept of "astral travel" or moving through space and time in a non-physical body (Campbell 1980).

In the 20th century, the psychiatrist Wilhelm Reich (1897–1957) generated new ideas about energy. He believed that he discovered ways to access the original primal energy which he termed "orgone." This energy was related to Sigmund Freud's concept of libido and also to sexual orgasm, but Reich emphasized that orgone energy permeated all of the Earth. He built "orgone accumulators," boxes in which healing orgone energy was maximized. He also posited a negative energy, termed "Deadly Orgone," or DOR, which he believed could be harnessed to control the weather. Although his concepts about orgone were not generally accepted, his ideas encouraged the development of somatic psychotherapy (Mann and Hoffmann 1980).

Some Contemporary Religious Views of Energy

There are many ways the various beliefs about energy found throughout the globe have become incorporated in more contemporary religious or spiritual movements. Some New Age worldviews describe the soul as a kind of energy, which actress Shirley MacLaine has described as allowing us to co-create our reality with God (Hanegraaff 1996, 175). This kind of assumption is implicit in many contemporary forms of New Thought, for example, the "power of positive thinking" and more recently "The Secret."

The practice of Esoteric or ritual magick is often associated with the manipulation of energy. The practice of magick could be described as ritual activities that have the aim of changing reality to conform to the practitioner's will. Sometimes the sexual act is used by magicians in an attempt to focus sexual energy into assisting with the magical goals. This practice is associated with Aleister Crowley and some contemporary Gnostic groups.

Contemporary Druids have an interest in energy as evidenced by the concept of "Awen." Awen is a Welsh word usually translated as "lowing spirit" and primarily associated with creative inspiration and intuitive understanding, but which has also been defined by Druids as "the energy of divine inspiration" and "divine energy exchanged." Understandings of Awen tend to be very personal, but accessing and respecting Awen is an important focus for contemporary Druidry.

An interesting approach to prayer energy is taken by the Aetherius Society, a religious movement founded by George King (1917–1997), who believed the "Cosmic Masters" of the Solar System had chosen him as "Primary Terrestrial Mental Channel" for their messages to Earth. King was given instructions by the Cosmic Masters about how to store the energy of prayer in a battery. By storing prayer energy, current members of the Aetherius Society believe they have a uniquely effective way of directing healing prayer energy throughout the world.

The term "energy vampire" or "psychic vampire" has become popular slang for someone who is experienced as a "drain" on energy levels by others. This has also become a self-description for some who consider themselves Human Living Vampires (HLVs). Although not considered a religion by those who self-identify as vampires, beliefs about vampires can become a working worldview with important metaphysical elements. While blood is considered a direct source of energy, most HLV claim to feed on the energy or prana of others, whether emotional, sexual, or ethereal.

Many contemporary practitioners of yoga, tai chi, and martial arts are concerned with energy levels. Most often the concern is not so much with esoteric anatomy, but with regulating levels of physical fitness, tiredness, and an ability to respond to the demands of work, home, and leisure without mental or physical fatigue. Those who practice such techniques often describe their practice as giving them more energy. Additionally, the 1998 Religious and Moral Pluralism Survey indicated that about 15 percent of Europeans understand God as an impersonal spirit or life force.

Suzanne Newcombe and David A. Palmer

See also: Anthroposophical Society; Crowley, Aleister; Daoism; Druidism; New Age Movement; Qigong; Santeria; Tantrism; Vodou; Western Esoteric Tradition; Yoga; Yoruba Religion/Spirituality.

References

- Avalon, Arthur (pseud. Sir John George Woodroffe), trans. The Serpent Power: being the Shat-chakranirupana and Paduka-panchaka, two works on Laya yoga / translated from the Sanskrit, with introduction and commentary, by Arthur Avalon. Madras: Ganesh & Co., 1924.
- Bellegarde-Smith, Patrick, ed. Fragments of Bone: Neo-African Religions in a New World. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2005.
- Campbell, Bruce. Ancient Wisdom Revived—A History of the Theosophical Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- Gonda, Jan. Ancient-Indian Ojas, Latin Augos and the Indo-European nouns in -es/-os. Utrecht: NVA Oosthoek's Uitgevers Mij, 1952.
- Hanegraaff, Wouter. New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought. Leiden: Brill, 1996.
- Mann, W. Edward, and Edward Hoffman. The Man Who Dreamed of Tomorrow: A Conceptual Biography of Wilhelm Reich. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1980.
- Shamdasani, Sonu, ed. The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga. London: Routledge, 1996.
- Urban, Hugh. Magia Sexualis: Sex, Magic, and Liberation in Modern Western Esotericism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
- White, David Gordon. The Alchemical Body: Siddha Traditions in Medieval India. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Winter, Alison. Mesmerized: Powers of Mind in Victorian Britain. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
- Zhang, Huan Yu, and Ken Rose. A Brief History of Qi. Brookline, MA: Paradigm, 2001.

Enlightenment

Enlightenment as a religious goal is mainly associated with Asian traditions, especially Buddhism, Hinduism, and Jainism, though its meaning differs between and within faiths just as the terms “Buddhism” and “Hinduism” are used to categorize a complex and diverse range of religious and philosophical practices. Enlightenment is a pan-Indian concept arising in the sixth century BCE in the early Upanisads, in the teachings of Buddha and Mahavira, the founder of Jainism. The enlightenment experiences of seekers are found in their biographies as well as in the religious and philosophical texts they composed. In brief, enlightenment is a profound existential experience that transforms an individual’s comprehension of reality. It is said that without the enlightenment experience we are locked into a compelling sense of the reality of the world, while the enlightened being sees the illusion of reality, sees through appearances to the ultimate truth.

Buddhism The biographies of the historical Buddha (ca. 566–486 BCE) reveal the process of achieving enlightenment and his later experience of that achievement. As a 30-year-old prince called Siddhartha, he abandoned royal status, family life, and all the comforts of civilization. For six years he wandered through the forests of what is today northern India, living as a celibate ascetic and seeking a solution to the problem of human suffering, which he framed within the endless round of being born, growing old, and dying, only to be reborn once again due to the force of karma, or our own deeds. This cycle is known as samsara (transmigration). Prince Siddhartha wanted to know if there was a way out (nirvana, meaning “extinction” but often glossed as enlightenment or liberation) of samsara. He sought a solution by studying with various ascetic teachers, none of whom could fully satisfy his questions, and by meditating and practicing severe asceticism, such as eating only one sesame seed, one grain of rice, and one juniper berry a day. His determination attracted five male disciples who looked after him.

Siddhartha Gautama leaves his sleeping wife and baby son, from a Burmese manuscript, 19th century. (The British Library/StockphotoPro)

The world of the forest recluse was predominantly male. A significant part of what Prince Siddhartha had rejected in leaving city life was contact with women. The meaning and role of gender are contested issues from the earliest days of Buddhism to the present, with many denying that women can achieve enlightenment, saying they must first reincarnate as men, despite the early record of nuns who achieved enlightenment. Padmanabh Jaini (1991) has a particularly brilliant exposition of the arguments in Jain history and Serinity Young (2004) discusses the Buddhist arguments, all of which raises the troubling question of why enlightenment was believed to be an experience limited to men. Returning to Prince Siddhartha, as he sat meditating and wasting away, his dead mother appeared and reminded him of the prediction at the time of his birth that he would achieve enlightenment, which was in jeopardy because of his continued austerities. He reassured her that he would attain his goal and she returned to heaven.

Realizing his body was too weak to achieve enlightenment, he decided to eat solid food. His five male disciples, believing he had abandoned asceticism, deserted him. But several women, human and divine, helped to restore his strength so that he could take his seat under the Bodhi Tree, where he proceeded through a series of ever deepening states of meditation throughout the course of one night. It has long been debated exactly what he experienced on that night, but its outcome, his achievement of enlightenment, is a defining principle of Buddhism that changed the religious face of much of Asia and more recently some of the West. After this experience he was given the title of Buddha, the awakened or enlightened one, from the Sanskrit root budh (to wake up) and from which is also derived the term bodhi, meaning “awakened or enlightened consciousness.” So, from the Buddhist tradition two separate terms, nirvana and bodhi, are translated as enlightenment.

With regard to this experience two points need to be made: first, when the Buddha achieved nirvana he became an enlightened being, and second, when he died he achieved parinirvana, meaning he would never be reborn. This understanding postulates that samsara/nirvana are two different kinds of existence, one ruled by desire and the other a realm where desire is extinguished through the enlightenment experience. This is the general view of Theravada Buddhism. A later tradition, Mahayana Buddhism, postulates instead that these are radically different states of mind, consequently putting the emphasis on achieving enlightened consciousness (bodhi).

Both traditions believe that the achievement of enlightenment is accompanied by omniscience and magical powers, and based on the Buddha’s experience, that it can be achieved through asceticism, generally understood to mean celibacy, moderation in all things, morality, meditation, and the cultivation of compassion for all living beings. These practices signal a withdrawal from the world, particularly from the entanglements of family life, having few possessions and devoting significant amounts of time to meditation. The idea is to downplay the world of the senses, which are connected to desire. Thus, for much of the Buddhist world, the social reality of seeking enlightenment was and remains structured by a celibate male hierarchy that seeks nirvana or bodhi while being supported by a lay community for whom they perform various religious and educational tasks. Exceptions to this are the later Tantric practices of Buddhists and Hindus that incorporate ritual sexuality into the search for enlightenment and the introduction of married Buddhist clergy in certain sects of Tibetan and East Asian Buddhism.

Hinduism Although nirvana has meaning in Hinduism as the final emancipation from matter and reunion with the Supreme Spirit (in the Upanisads this would be Brahman), the meaning of enlightenment is more often carried by the words moksa and mukti (both from the Sanskrit root muc, meaning “liberation, release”), which are used to contrast with samsara as well as to represent union with Brahman. In other words, the experience of moksa signals release from the endless round of transmigration generated by karma, which may culminate in union with the divine or with a particular deity perceived as the originator of the universe.

Moksa is listed as the highest of the four goals of human life, after duty, enjoyment, and wealth (Book of Manu, ca. the beginning of the Common Era), which suggests a different social model than Buddhism in that the Hindu ideal is for a man to wait until he has a grandson, at which time he should abandon his home and family to become a wandering ascetic dependent on the communities he passes through for his food. Of course, throughout history Hindus, like Buddhists, were moved to seek enlightenment at an earlier period in their life. Also like Buddhists, Hindus debated whether or not women were capable of achieving enlightenment or if they had first to reincarnate as men. The issue of gender seems to be tied to the belief that celibacy is a requisite to achieving enlightenment, which problematizes women, often casting them as sexual temptresses. These religions were formulated and developed within patriarchal cultures that put constraints on women that are reflected in their religious beliefs.

The Bhagavad Gita (ca. first century CE) introduced three paths to enlightenment: action (good deeds), knowledge (insight into reality), and devotion, in the specific case of the Gita devotion to Krishna, but the path of devotion spread to other Hindu traditions, such as those worshipping the god Shiva or the goddess in her many forms. All three paths involve spiritual discipline, such as self-control and meditation. The path of devotion is said to have many forms, such as chanting or singing the praises of god, making offerings as simple as a flower, and performing all acts with one's mind focused on god. Devotion is available to everyone, thus it became and remains very popular with ascetics and non-ascetics alike.

Tantra Tantra refers to a variety of religious paths that developed mainly in northern India perhaps as early as the third century CE among Buddhists, Hindus, and Jains, although it took several centuries to achieve widespread influence. Its practitioners seek enlightenment through ritual practices that are also believed to give them divine or magical powers; one of its essential features is an abundance of female symbolism. Tantra is considered to be a fast path to enlightenment, claiming that enlightenment can be achieved in one lifetime.

The Tantric ideal type is the siddha (from the word siddhi, “supernatural power”) or sadhu (holy man), a wandering yogi who is also a wonder worker, also referred to as a tantrika. The behavior of the tantrika is often designed to shock people, to break social taboos that keep people from seeing the enlightened state in which there is no right or wrong.

Tantric rituals often involve the “five m’s” (pañcamakara): wine, meat, fish, parched grain, and sexual union (respectively, in Sanskrit, madya, mamsa, matsya, mudra, and maithuna). The first four are described as aphrodisiacs and lead up to the fifth, actual or symbolic sexual union. Theoretically, there are two forms of practice: the right-handed path (daksinamarga), which uses substitutes for the first four and visualizes the fifth, sexual union, and the left-handed path (vamamarga), which imbibes these substances and involves ritual sexual intercourse. In point of fact though, left-handed practice also frequently uses substitutes and visualization. Generally, Indian left-handed practitioners were wandering yogis while right-handed practitioners were traditional Hindu priests (brahmins). A similar situation arose in Tibet, where free-wheeling Tantric practices were fairly widespread among non-monastics, both householders and wandering yogis, while a more rationalized Tantra flourished in the monasteries. There were, however, exchanges between the two groups.

The five m’s are forbidden to orthodox Hindus because they are polluting, but the Tantric practitioner, Buddhist or Hindu, ritually uses these forbidden substances to get beyond the concepts of good and evil, forbidden and allowed, and to achieve an experience of the ultimate union of all opposites, even of female and male. These practices are believed to lead tantrikas to moments of enlightenment that may become a permanent state of awareness. Through visualization practices during rituals or meditation, the adept seeks to merge with the deities, or the buddhas, in union with their consorts, thus sharing in their enlightened consciousness.

Sexual union, whether enacted or visualized involves the belief that women inherently possess something men do not, something that men need to achieve enlightenment. In the Buddhist tradition it is prajña (wisdom or insight), which advanced male practitioners can access and appropriate through sexual yoga. In the Hindu tradition it is sakti (power or energy). For Buddhist female practitioners, men are the source of upaya, skillful means, which women can access and appropriate through sexual yoga. During sexual union the adept, who will lose any spiritual benefit if he ejaculates, absorbs his consort's red drops (uterine fluids), mixing them with his white drops (semen), which he then absorbs through his penis up through his body to the top of his head. The female's red drops are not necessarily red, as they are also referred to as the vaginal secretion a woman is believed to ejaculate during intercourse. In other words, they are the female equivalent of semen. This practice imitates the sexual union of the god with the goddess and of the celestial buddhas with their female consorts, which are said to represent enlightened consciousness.

As Asian religious ideas began to penetrate Western thinking beginning in the 18th century and continuing to this day, the concept of enlightenment primarily from Buddhist and Hindu perspectives was incorporated into the service of the individual ideologies of Western translators, scholars, and philosophers, who spread their ideas to the larger culture. In this way, enlightenment has been as fluid a term in the West as it has in the East. Perennial philosophy extended this term to many different religions, a notion that exploded into the general culture of the West beginning in the 1960s and that has been explored recently by Andrew Rawlinson (1998) through the lives of Western teachers of Asian religions. In the end, though, enlightenment is an ineffable experience, one that is beyond the mundane concepts that limit our ability to communicate with one another, as indicated by the truism that those who know don't say while those who don't know do.

Serinity Young

See also: Asceticism; Buddha, Gautama; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Mahavira; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Monasticism; Perennialism; Reincarnation; Tantrism; Tibetan Buddhism; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Clarke, J. J. 1997. Oriental Enlightenment: The Encounter Between Asian and Western Thought. London: Routledge, 1997.
- Collins, Steven. Nirvana and Other Buddhist Felicities: Utopias of the Pali Imaginaire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Feuerstein, Georg. Tantra: The Path of Ecstasy. Boston: Shambhala, 1998.
- Jaini, Padmanabh S. Gender and Salvation: Jaina Debates on the Spiritual Liberation of Women. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.
- Linrothe, Rob, ed. The Holy Madness: Portraits of Tantric Siddhas. Chicago: Serinida Publications, 2006.
- O'Flaherty, Wendy Doniger, ed. Karma and Rebirth in Classical Indian Traditions. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- Rawlison, Andrew. Book of Enlightened Masters: Western Teachers in Eastern Traditions. Chicago: Open Court, 1997, 1998.
- Welbon, Guy R. The Buddhist Nirvana and Its Western Interpreters. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968.
- Young, Serinity. Courtesans and Tantric Consorts: Sexualities in Buddhist Narrative, Iconography, and Ritual. New York: Routledge. 2004.

Ennôkyô

Ennôkyô is a Japanese new religion founded by Fukata Chiyoko (1887–1925). In 1919 she received a special message from Kami (a Shinto deity) to become the messenger of Kami and a tool for the sake of world. After this revelation from Kami, she began to practice faith healing and to help people avoid misfortune by predicting troubles they would otherwise encounter. Gradually she attracted a number of followers, and in about 1931, six years or so after her death, they organized two groups, Ennô Shûhokai and Ennô Hôonkai, to carry on her essentially mystical and faith-healing teachings. Both groups dissolved in 1941, but were re-established as Ennôkyô after World War II and registered by the government in 1948. A feature unique to Ennôkyô is Shûhō. Its spiritual training sessions take the form of a dialogue between paired individuals to resolve problems in daily life. Its main scripture is Ennô kyôten, which includes the teachings of Sei (sincerity), Ai (love), and Zen (virtue).

Ennôkyô is currently led by Fukata Mitsuhiro. As the new century began it reported 459,935 members.

Ennôkyô

1-1 Muramori

San Nan-machi, Hikami-gun

Hyogo prefecture

669-3192

Japan

Keishin Inaba

See also: Shinto.

Reference

Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.

Epiphany

Falling on January 6, Epiphany is a Christian feast that celebrates the revelation of God in human form in the person of Jesus Christ. In Greek, the word “epiphany” means “manifestation” and in Eastern Christian tradition the event is called “Theophany,” which means “manifestation of God.” In the Eastern tradition, it falls on January 19. Roman Catholics will often celebrate it on the Sunday closest to January 6.

The Western observance commemorates the visitation of the biblical Magi to the child Jesus, stressing the appearance of Jesus to the Gentiles. In many Hispanic and European churches, it is also known as Three Kings Day. Eastern Christians include the baptism of Jesus in their celebration, highlighting Christ’s revelation to the world as the Son of God.

Marking the 12th day of Christmas, Epiphany brings to an end the Advent and Christmas seasons. The day begins an extended period of “Ordinary Time” in the Christian year that focuses on the mission of the church in the world to reveal Jesus as the Son of God. It is also a time of focusing on Christian unity and fellowship across ethnic and racial lines.

Originating in Eastern Christian churches, the earliest reference to the feast is found in 361 CE in the writings of Ammianus Marcellinus (ca. 330–395 CE). In a sermon delivered on December 25, 380, Gregory of Nazianzus (329–389 CE) referred to the day “the Theophany” and explained how in the coming weeks the church would be celebrating “the holy nativity of Christ.” On January 6 and 7, he preached two more sermons, declaring that the celebration of the birth of Christ and the visitation of the Magi had already taken place and now Christ’s baptism would be recognized.

Originally, the day was part of the Christmas celebrations of the nativity, but by 534 CE, the Western church had separated it as a commemoration of the coming of the Magi. The Eastern church continued to celebrate January 6 as a composite feast for some time, but eventually reserved January 6 as a commemoration of the baptism of Jesus.

The colors of Epiphany are usually the colors of Christmas, white and gold. Epiphany liturgies stress the universal mission of Jesus Christ and his church to all peoples throughout the whole world.

While Anglicans and Lutherans observe Epiphany, most Protestant churches ignore it and collapse into Christmas their discussion of the visit of the Magi and the related custom of giving gifts. In the last generation, with the spread of the acknowledgment of the liturgical year among some of the large Protestant groups (Methodists, Presbyterians), some notice of Epiphany has emerged.

Epiphany is the reference for the popular Christmas song, “The Twelve Days of Christmas.”

Kevin Quast

See also: Christmas; Eastern Orthodoxy; Liturgical Year; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Cullmann, Oscar. “The Origin of Christmas.” In The Early Church, edited by A. Higgins, 21–36. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1956.

Martindale, Cyril Charles. "Epiphany." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 5. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1909.

Merras, Merja. The Origins of the Celebration of the Christian Feast of Epiphany. Joensuu, Finland: Joensuu University Press, 1995.

Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1991.

Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil

The Church of England assumed that South America was not to be considered a missionary field because of the prior presence of the Roman Catholic Church; thus it was left to the Episcopal Church, based in the United States, to initiate the Anglican tradition in Brazil. In 1889, two young seminarians, James W. Morris and Lucien Kinsolving (1862–1929), representatives of the American Church Missionary Society, arrived in Porto Alegre. A decade later Kinsolving became the first Anglican bishop of South Brazil.

In 1905, the Mission Board of the Episcopal Church assumed responsibility for the mission. By 1913 there were 1,304 communicant members. As the mission grew, the Church of England opened chaplaincies in various parts of the country to serve expatriate communities.

By 1962, there were 185 parishes in the Brazilian Church, divided into 3 dioceses. Slowly the church leadership had become indigenous, but few parishes were self-supporting. Following the designation of a fourth diocese, in 1965, the church was set apart as an autonomous province, though it has still continued in a partnership relation with the Episcopal Church, which supplies various resources for it to draw upon.

The church (Igreja Episcopal do Brasil) is led by its primate, currently the Most Reverend Glauco Scares de Lima. There are eight dioceses. The synod of the church, its highest legislative body, meets triennially, and it appoints an executive committee to administer the church's affairs between synod meetings. As the new century began, the church reported a membership of 120,000 (2005) in 84 parishes and 60 missions. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the worldwide Anglican Communion.

Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil
Av. Ludolfo Boehl, 256 Teresopolis
CP 11510
Cep 90841-970 Porto Alegre, RS
Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Episcopal Church; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

Manross, William W. A History of the American Episcopal Church. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1950.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Episcopal Church

The Episcopal Church is the primary representative of the Anglican tradition in the United States and continues the work of the Church of England established in the British American colonies. The first Anglican worship service appears to have been held in 1587, at the colony originally established at Roanoke, Virginia. The first permanent congregation was assembled in Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607.

Through the 17th century, the church spread through the British colonies, and continued to exist there when Anglicanism was temporarily banned in England during the days of the Commonwealth (1649–1660). In 1692, British authorities finally forced the establishment of a congregation even in Puritan Boston. At the end of the century Dr. Thomas Bray led in the founding of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG). The American church received the benefits of the society in the form of hundreds of ministers who volunteered to organize and serve American congregations through the next 70 years. Though no bishop was ever appointed for the colonies, Bray returned in 1696 as the representative of the church, with some limited episcopal powers.

As their bishop, William White led the remnants of the Church of England in the United States to form the Protestant Episcopal Church. (Vincent L. Milner, Religious Denominations of the World, 1872)

The American Revolution was a devastating blow to the development of the church. Most members of the church, and especially the ministers, were identified with those settlers who opposed the Revolution. Following the ending of hostilities, all of the SPG missionaries moved to Canada or returned to England. They left only a small group of ministers committed to residing in the new nation and caring for the 400 Church of England congregations.

The immediate problem for the church was the securing of an American bishop. A bishop was needed to perform a variety of functions, not the least being the ordination of new ministers. In 1783 the clergy of Connecticut took the lead and selected Samuel Seabury to go to England for consecration. The British bishops were ready to consecrate him, but he withdrew when he found himself as an American citizen unable to swear allegiance to the British crown. Thwarted, he traveled to Scotland, where he found bishops with the Nonjuring Church of Scotland (now the Scottish Episcopal Church) who in 1784 consecrated him.

Back in the United States, Seabury found the Connecticut clergy ready to follow his leadership, but the churches and ministers in the colonies to the south balking. They still wanted orders directly from England: Some were resentful of the Connecticut brethren acting without consulting them; some did not like Seabury. In the meantime, while Seabury was in Europe, they had met in convocation and found a leader in William White. They developed a constitution for a new church and selected White and Samuel Provost as their prospective bishops. In 1787, the pair sailed for England, where they found that Parliament had passed legislation that allowed for the consecration of men who did not take the oath of loyalty if they were designated for service outside the country. They returned with valid episcopal orders.

In 1789, the Americans organized the Protestant Episcopal Church in the U.S.A. and adopted a constitution. A slightly edited edition of the Prayer Book used as a guide to worship by the Church of England was adopted. It included a basic liturgy reflective of the middle way between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism that had defined Anglicanism since the reign of Elizabeth I. The church also accepted the Church of England's Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

As the church developed, it served many of America's elite, and a majority of the country's presidents during the early half of the 19th century were drawn from its ranks. It also developed the several recognizable groups that had emerged in British Anglicanism after the Commonwealth. One group, the Anglo-Catholics, followed what was known as a High-Church path and favored rapprochement with the Roman Catholic Church. On the other extreme, those who advocated a Low-Church policy tended to identify with the Protestant community and were noted for their evangelical and missionary zeal. Between the two groups were the Latitudinarians, who followed a middle road between the two extremes.

The Low-Church wing tended to be the strongest in the church through the early half of the 19th century, though the Anglo-Catholic wing was always present. However, during the 19th century Anglo-Catholicism asserted itself in the Church of England, and its influence began to grow in the Episcopal Church. As its support grew, a crisis developed, leading in 1873 to the withdrawal of Kentucky bishop George David Cummins (1822–1876) and many of the Low-Church adherents to found the Reformed Episcopal Church. Although the church weathered the controversy, its worship life was changed. New churches tended to be built in the Gothic Revival style, and the Communion table tended to be replaced with an altar.

In the decades after World War II, the Episcopal Church became deeply involved in the ecumenical movement. A long-time member of the Federal Council of Churches, it was one of the original members of the National Council of Churches in the United States of America. It was also a charter member of the World Council of Churches. As a leader in the liberal Protestant community in America, it was also profoundly affected by the social changes during the last half of the 20th century. Many of the bishops and clergy assumed leadership roles in the civil rights movement, and the church was among the first Anglican bodies to consider the admission of women to the priesthood.

The church faced a new round of significant controversy in the 1970s, controversy created by dissent among members over the church's involvement in various social crusades, the laxity of morals perceived within the clergy, and a set of changes introduced into the Prayer Book. These issues culminated in 1976 when the General Convention of the church approved the ordination of women to the priesthood. As a result of that action, a number of ministers and members left and organized several new denominations that saw themselves as representatives of a Traditional Anglican movement.

The controversy surrounding the ordination of women paled in comparison to the furor unleashed by the election and subsequent consecration of a homosexual living in a long-term committed relationship to the bishopric in 2003. Conservatives who had remained in the church through the 1990s became more vocal and took their case to the other jurisdictions of the worldwide Anglican Communion. A small minority within the American church, the conservatives found majority support throughout the worldwide Anglican Communion. African and Asian jurisdictions quickly protested the action of the Episcopal Church and threatened the archbishop of Canterbury with withdrawal of their support from the Anglican Communion. Already in 1999, the leaders of the churches in Rwanda and Singapore had consecrated two American bishops to begin to receive dissenting individual Episcopalians and withdrawing congregations.

In 2004, conservative leaders organized the Network of Anglican Communion Dioceses and Parishes as a network of “confessing church clergy and lay member. By 2008, 10 dioceses had indicated their affiliation with the Network, 3 of which took the further step of voting to withdraw from national body. The action of these dioceses are expected to keep the church in litigation for some years into the future.

The Episcopal Church has its headquarters in New York. The church is divided into dioceses, each led by a bishop, and from the bishops, one is selected as the church's presiding bishop. The General Convention is the highest legislative body in the church. In 1967, the General Convention adopted the present name of the church, a shortened form of its original name.

In 2006, Katharine Jefferts Schori became the 26th presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church, the first female to hold the office. In 2006, the church reported 1,796,017 members in 7,095 churches.

The Episcopal Church has primarily seen itself as serving the American Anglican community and concentrated its missionary efforts on growing westward as the United States enlarged itself through the 19th century. It did found congregations and chaplaincies overseas to serve expatriate communities. Through the Convocation of Anglican Churches in Europe, it cooperates with the Diocese of the Church of England and the Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church (Portugal) to sponsor English-speaking Anglican churches throughout continental Europe.

In 1834 Low-Church forces in the church founded the American Church Missionary Society. The first missionary was an African American, James M. Thompson, appointed for work in Africa. That same year, 1835, Reverend Henry Lockwood was sent as the first missionary to China. Work has expanded to Japan and Haiti. It then became focused on Latin America. The church's Board of Missions took control of the foreign missions in the years after the American Civil War (1860–1865). The work of that board is currently in the hands of the Episcopal Partnership for Global Ministries, the name reflecting the changed relationship between the American church and the now mature Anglican churches worldwide. Some former mission churches have chosen to remain part of the Episcopal Church, and Province II includes the Diocese of Micronesia, Province VIII, the Diocese of Taiwan, and Province IX, the Diocese for Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, and Honduras.

In the years immediately after World War II, the Episcopal Church developed a special relationship with the Philippine Independent Church, a church formed by former Roman Catholics in the Philippine Islands. In 1948, Episcopal bishops passed Anglican orders to the Philippine Church, and the two churches have remained in communion since that time.

Episcopal Church
815 Second Ave.
New York, NY 10017
<http://ecusa.anglican.org>
<http://www.episcopalchurch.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church of England; Lusitanian Church/Lusitanian Catholic Evangelical Church; Philippine Independent Church; Roman Catholic Church; Scottish Episcopal Church; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Traditional Anglican Communion; World Council of Churches.

References

- Elgin, Kathleen. The Episcopalians: The Protestant Episcopal Church. New York: D. McKay Co., 1970.
- Hein, David, and Gardiner H. Shattuck, Jr., The Episcopalians. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004.
- Manross, William W. A History of the American Episcopal Church. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1950.
- Prichard, Robert. A History of the Episcopal Church. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 1991.

Webber, Christopher L. Welcome to the Episcopal Church. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse Publishing, 2000.

Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East

The Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East brings together the many efforts by members of the Church of England to establish missions from North Africa to the Arabian Peninsula. Though Anglican missionaries had visited the area in the 18th century, it was not until 1818 that permanent work began, in Egypt. Two years later, Joseph Wolff (1795–1862) of the London Church's Ministry among the Jews came to Jerusalem to begin evangelizing the Jewish residents. Wolff's work expanded to neighboring Lebanon and Syria in the next couple of years. The Ministry of the Jews reached Tunisia as early as 1829.

These initial efforts were strongly affected at the beginning of the 1840s by the decision of church leaders in England and Germany to establish a Christian presence in Jerusalem in the form of an Anglican bishop. They chose Michael Solomon Alexander (1799–1845), a German rabbi who had converted to Christianity and subsequently become an Anglican priest. He accepted the position as a means of converting Jews. In 1851, under the leadership of Alexander's successor, Samuel Gobat, the church turned its attention to the Arab population. He built schools and ordained the first Arab priests. Work expanded to Jordan in 1860.

The first Anglican in Iran, Henry Martyn (1781–1812), arrived as a chaplain for the East India Company. A gifted linguist, he translated the Bible into Persian. The fledgling work was given a new infusion of life in 1844 with the arrival of missionaries with the Ministry among the Jews to work with the Jewish community in Tehran. The Church Missionary Society (CMS) arrived in 1869 to begin more general work among the Persian Muslims. The mission grew into a church, and a bishop was named in 1912. The Diocese of Persia remains the most substantial work in the province.

Work on the Arabian Peninsula began in 1839, following the British capture of Aden. Anglican chaplains formed the first church. Over the years, other churches were opened and closed as British presence waxed and waned, but at the beginning of the 21st century those that remain now serve primarily expatriate personnel residing in the area as oil workers.

During the 20th century, Anglican work across North Africa and the Middle East underwent changes as new dioceses were created, and then in the post–World War II world, the move to grant autonomous status to missions took control. In 1920, Egypt and the Sudan were separated from Jerusalem as a new diocese. Sudan became a separate diocese in 1945. With the creation of an independent Israel, in 1948, the majority of the Anglicans left, and many Arab Christians moved to neighboring countries. CMS institutions in Jaffa and Lydda were closed, as was the Bishop Godat school in Jerusalem. Many other properties were abandoned and then destroyed or confiscated by the new government.

In 1957, the bishopric of Jerusalem was elevated into an archdiocese. That same year, the Diocese of Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria was set apart, and the following year, the Diocese of Egypt was suspended and the work attached to Jerusalem. That diocese was revived in 1974 and now included all the work in Egypt, Libya, Tunisia, Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, and Djibouti.

Finally, in 1976, the archbishopric was replaced by a new independent Anglican province, the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. Faik Ibrahim Haddad (r. 1976–1984) was the first bishop of Jerusalem in the new province. At the same time, the Diocese of Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria was absorbed into the Diocese of Jerusalem, and a new Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf was created by combining the Anglican parishes on Cyprus and the Arabian Peninsula. The Dioceses of Egypt and Iran became a part of the new province.

The province is currently led by the Most Reverend Dr. Mouneer Hanna Anis, the bishop of Egypt. He is president of the Central Synod that represents the four dioceses (Jerusalem, Egypt, Iran, and Cyprus and the Gulf). The president is elected for a five-year term and may be re-elected once. The bishop of Jerusalem, currently the Right Reverend Suheil Dawani, is in a unique position as his church recognizes the primacy of the patriarch of Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem as the successor of Saint James and hence the rightful bishop of Jerusalem. As a rule, Anglicans would not place a bishop in a city in which an Orthodox bishop had previously established his hegemony.

In 2005, the church reported 37,000 members in 31 parishes. The church oversees St. George’s College in Jerusalem. It is a member (since 1976) of the World Council of Churches and the Middle East Council of Churches.

St. George’s Close
PO Box 19122
91191 Jerusalem
Israel

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Middle East Council of Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- El-Assal, Raih Abu. “Anglicanism in Jerusalem.” In Anglicanism: A Global Communion, edited by Andrew Wingate et al. London: Mowbray, 1998.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Episcopal Church in the Philippines

The Episcopal Church in the Philippines originated in the religious ferment that followed the annexation of the Philippine Islands by the United States in 1898. The Episcopal Church in the United States sent missionaries, who arrived in 1902 with instructions to target those segments of the population not otherwise affiliated with any Christian church. Among groups so identified were the Chinese who lived in Manila, various ethnic groups in northern Luzon, and the Muslims of Mindanao and Sulu.

The work progressed steadily, and a set of primary and secondary schools was established. After World War II, during which the church suffered considerably from the Japanese occupation, a move to build indigenous leadership was vigorously pursued, and the number of Filipino priests increased sharply during the 1950s. The first Filipino bishop was consecrated in 1967.

The church has had a unique relationship with the Philippine Independent Church, which has Anglican orders, and in 1961 the two churches entered into full communion. Until 1990, the work in the Philippines was part of Province VIII of the Episcopal Church in the United States, but in that year it was set apart as an autonomous jurisdiction. The church is at one in faith and practice with the wider Anglican Communion and led by its prime bishop.

The church has six dioceses. In 2005 it reported 125,000 members in 513 parishes. Soon after its independence from the church in the United States, it joined the World Council of Churches (1991).

Episcopal Church in the Philippines
PO Box 10321
Broadway Centrum
1112 Quezon City
Philippines

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Episcopal Church; Philippine Independent Church.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Jones, Arun W. Christian Missions in the American Empire: Episcopalians in Northern Luzon, the Philippines, 1902–1946. New York: Peter Lang, 2003.
- Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Epworth

Epworth is a small town in North Lincolnshire, England. It arose from obscurity in the 18th century as the birthplace of John and Charles Wesley, the founders of Methodism. Their father, Samuel, was the Anglican parish priest in the town from 1695 to 1735. Epworth is located on the Isle of Axholme an island formed by several sounding rivers. The relative isolation of the area was ended when the area was drained, a significant engineering feat of the 1620s.

Samuel Wesley served as rector of the parish church, dedicated to Saint Andrew. It is located on a hill overlooking the town. Architects have dated the oldest part of the church structure to the late 12th century, with later additions primarily from the 14th and 15th centuries. The town itself is much older than the present church.

John and Charles grew up in a large family and Epworth provided a large rectory. However, in 1709, the rectory was burned and during the fire John was trapped and spotted at a second-story window. Because he was eventually rescued, his mother, Susannah, came to believe that he was saved for a purpose, a belief she imposed upon him. It is believed that the fire was set by parishioners angry at Samuel Wesley. Afterward, a new rectory was built. Refurbished and restored, it is maintained as a museum by the World Methodist Council. Samuel Wesley is buried in the church's cemetery.

In 1716 the new rectory became the site of some well-documented psychic disturbances that lasted for several months. They were attributed to a poltergeist whom the family called Old Jeffery. Susannah originally connected the Epworth phenomena to her brother who had disappeared in India, but they came to be connected mostly with John's sister Hetty.

John Wesley later relocated to London, but occasionally returned to Epworth. He is said to have preached in the Market Place from the steps of the Market Cross. British Methodists erected the Wesley Memorial Church on High Street in Epworth in 1889.

Epworth also happened to be the birthplace of Alexander Kilham (1762), one of the founders of the Methodist New Connexion. A forceful writer and speaker, he championed the cause of greater lay representation in the government of the church. The Methodists rejected his views, and in 1796, the Wesleyan Conference tried and expelled him. The next year he became the first secretary of Methodist New Connexion.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodism; Wesley, John; World Methodist Council.

References

- Clarke, Ada. Memoirs of the Wesley Family. 4th ed. London: W. Tegg, 1860.
- Edwards, Maldwyn. Family Circle: A Study of the Epworth Household in Relation to John and Charles Wesley. London: Epworth Press, 1961.
- Wakeley, J. B. Anecdotes of the Wesleys: Illustrative of Their Character and Personal History. New York: Nelson & Phillips, 1869.
- Wright, Dudley. The Epworth Phenomena. London: William Rider & Son, 1917.

■ Equatorial Guinea

Equatorial Guinea is a small country located on the western coast of Africa. It consists of a small area (28,000 square miles) on the mainland, sandwiched between Cameroon and Gabon, and several islands. The capital, Malabo, is located on one of the islands, Bioko, formerly known as Fernando Po. The territory on the mainland, known as Rio Muni, is largely a rain-forest, located less than two degrees from the equator. The major group among the country's 616,000 people (2008) in the country is Bantu, but there are many Ibo and Efik people on Bioko and Fang and Ndowe people on the mainland.

The Ndowe people worked with the European slave traders in the 18th century, while the Fang refused to participate in the slave trade and retreated from the coastal lands. In 1777–1778, Portugal ceded their claims on the area to Spain; before Spain could take control, however, the British moved in and occupied Bioko as a staging area for its conquest of Nigeria. Spain finally took control in the 1850s. Rio Muni had been French territory, but it came into Spanish hands in 1901. Equatorial Guinea remained attached to Spain until independence was proclaimed in 1969. Subsequently, Francisco Macias Nguema (d. 1979) moved quickly to consolidate his power as the new president. He viciously destroyed all visible opposition, and as repression grew, the country went through a decade of bloodshed. In 1978 all churches were ordered closed.

Children play in front of the cathedral in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea. The ornate cathedral, built in 1916 in the Spanish Gothic style, is located near the presidential palace and serves as a place of worship for the country's predominantly Roman Catholic population. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In 1979, Marcus Nguema was arrested and executed following a coup, but the succeeding regime gathered a reputation similar to Nguema's. The leader of the new regime, General Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mba Nzago (b. 1942), continues to lead the country. A slow transition to a more democratic government began in the 1990s.

Each of the peoples of the territory now constituting Equatorial Guinea had a traditional indigenous religion. These religions survive among a small minority

Equatorial Guinea

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	257,000	483,000	88.6	2.36	677,000	1,036,000
Roman Catholics	231,000	494,000	90.6	2.66	691,000	1,050,000
Protestants	14,900	26,700	4.9	2.82	43,000	75,000
Independents	5,900	25,500	4.7	2.86	45,000	80,000
Muslims	1,300	22,200	4.1	2.37	32,000	50,000
Agnostics	10,000	18,000	3.3	2.74	33,000	55,000
Atheists	2,800	9,900	1.8	2.37	16,000	25,000
Ethnoreligionists	19,300	9,200	1.7	2.37	10,000	9,000
Baha'is	700	2,800	0.5	2.37	4,200	7,000
Hindus	0	300	0.1	2.39	600	1,000
Total population	291,000	545,000	100.0	2.37	773,000	1,183,000

of the public, mostly among the Fang people, estimated at less than 5 percent of the total population. The Fang acknowledge a supreme deity named Nzame and venerate ancestral spirits called Bekon. The primary religious functionaries are the uganga (also called ngang), to whom is attributed the ability to contact the spirits and manipulate supernatural powers.

The Roman Catholic Church entered in the 15th century through the successive European powers that operated within the area. Spanish Catholicism provides the major background of the present church. The work was organized under a prefecture in 1855. The prefecture was elevated to a vicariate in 1904. There are presently two dioceses, one for Rio Muni and one for the islands. More than 80 percent of the population are baptized Catholics. The church faced many problems in the 1970s—the expulsion of priests, nuns, and bishops, the arrest of priests and lay leaders, and the closing of churches. However, it rebounded during the 1980s and 1990s.

The first Protestants in Equatorial Guinea were Baptists. They entered in 1841 but were expelled in 1858. Presbyterians began work on the island of Corisco in 1850 and moved into Rio Muni 15 years later. In 1933, the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (now WEC International), a Protestant sending agency founded by pioneer missionary C. T. Studd (1860–1931), began work in Rio Muni among the Okak (Fang) people. In 1970 the crusade merged its work with the Presbyterians to form the Evangelical Church, an independent Presbyterian body. In 1870, missionaries arrived from the Primitive Methodist Church in England. They established work on Fernando Po, which in 1893 expanded into Nigeria, where it has become a large organization and member of the World Council of Churches. In 1973, the Evangelical Church and the Methodists in Equatorial Guinea united to form the Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea.

Various indigenous movements have appeared in the country. The Bwiti movement, also known as the Church of the Initiates, is a revival of worship of ancestral spirits among the Fang people. Worship includes use of a psychedelic substance found in the eboga root. It emerged at the end of the 19th century in neighboring Gabon and has survived in spite of attempts to suppress it.

In 1937 the Presbyterians experienced a schism, when some members adopted a more congregational form of organization and formed as the Assembly of Brethren (Assemblies de los Hermanos). The Jehovah's Witnesses entered the country immediately after World War II.

Among the more interesting groups in the country is the Free Protestant Episcopal Church, a small autonomous Anglican jurisdiction that originated in England and established itself in Nigeria. The work on Bioko, mostly among English-speaking expatriate Africans, is part of the Diocese of West Africa (possibly the most successful arena of the Free church's life).

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has a small work with less than 100 members that is attached to the Ivory Coast Abidjan Mission. The

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Seventh-day Adventist Church established its Equatorial Guinea Mission in 1986 and now has several hundred members. The Baha'i Faith entered Equatorial Guinea in the 1960s. There is a minimal Muslim presence, primarily Sunnis of the Malikite School of Islam.

Marcus Nguema was an atheist, and as his regime proceeded, he first supported the spread of atheism and eventually moved against the churches because of their refusal to cooperate with his atheist programs. During this time, atheism became established among one segment of the public.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Atheism; Baha'i Faith; Bwiti; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Jehovah's Witnesses; Malikite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Fernández, C. Misiones y misioneros en la Guinea Española. Madrid: Editorial Co. SA, 1962.
- Liniger, Goumaz, Max. Historical Dictionary of Equatorial Guinea. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2000.

Pujadas, P. L. La Iglesia en la Guinea Ecuatorial. Madrid: Editorial Iris de Paz, 1968.

■ Eritrea

Eritrea is a relatively new country whose existence was challenged throughout the 20th century. It is a long, narrow country with a long shoreline (more than 650 miles) along the Red Sea between Djibouti and the Sudan. Its long southern border confronts Ethiopia. Its land area of 46,800 square miles is inhabited by some 5.5 million people, split between Islam and Christianity.

What is now Eritrea was originally inhabited by various African peoples believed to have come into the area from the Sudan in ancient times. At some point between 1000 and 400 BCE, the Sabians, a Semitic group, arrived in Eritrea and integrated with the local population. Because of its long shoreline, the area was a prize seized by different conquering forces over the centuries. Land-bound Ethiopia especially saw Eritrea as its entryway to the ocean. Eritrea was incorporated into the Axum Empire, which reached from its base in northern Ethiopia to include Yemen. Christianity was introduced in the fourth century, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, established in 332, became the religion of the nation’s ruling elite.

Muslims occupied the islands of the Daklak Archipelago at the beginning of the eighth century, and the religion began to penetrate the coastal area in subsequent centuries. Islam enjoyed its greatest success following Ahmad Granj of Harar’s establishment of it in the Amhara highlands in 1506. In 1541, a Portuguese fleet called into the area by the Ethiopians destroyed much of the Islamic culture along the coast to the north and east of Ethiopia.

A new era in Eritrean history began in 1885 when Italy occupied the region. Eritrea became the staging area for Italy’s subsequent invasion of Ethiopia. Defeated, the Italians received formal control of Eritrea in the subsequent negotiations. They named it a colony in 1900. In the 1930s, Benito Mussolini again tried to invade Ethiopia from Eritrea. Mussolini was defeated in 1941, and the British came into the region to replace the Italians. In 1950 the United Nations named Eritrea a federated state within the Ethiopian Empire. In 1962 it was incorporated fully into Ethiopia, a move rejected by many Eritreans, who had developed a new sense of national identity during the fight against Italy. Efforts to gain Eritrea’s independence began in the 1950s, and hostilities aimed at independence began in 1961. After 30 years of warfare, in 1991, while Ethiopia underwent a government change, a provisional government was established in Eritrea by the rebel forces. Following a highly monitored referendum, the new national state was declared in 1993 and most of the world’s countries immediately recognized its existence. The capital is in Asmara.

Islam and Orthodox Christianity vie for the hearts of the Eritrean people. The Sunni Muslim community, mostly of the Shafaiite School, is led by Sheikh

Eritrea

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	918,000	2,621,000	49.2	4.19	3,782,000	5,641,000
Christians	857,000	2,512,000	47.2	4.22	3,624,000	5,402,000
Orthodox	760,000	2,260,000	42.5	4.38	3,250,000	4,890,000
Roman Catholics	75,000	170,000	3.2	2.42	225,000	280,000
Protestants	10,000	65,000	1.2	3.46	120,000	190,000
Agnostics	0	155,000	2.9	4.20	250,000	400,000
Ethnoreligionists	71,000	32,000	0.6	4.20	23,000	15,000
Baha’is	500	1,500	0.0	4.21	3,000	4,000
Hindus	500	1,000	0.0	4.19	1,500	2,500
Atheists	0	300	0.0	4.23	500	1,000
Total population	1,847,000	5,323,000	100.0	4.20	7,684,000	11,465,000

ERITREA

Al-Amin Osman Al-Amin. The Orthodox Church of Eritrea has close relationship with the Coptic Orthodox Church of Egypt, and Pope Shenouda has consecrated most of its bishops. Prior to 1991, the church existed as a Diocese in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. The Roman Catholic Church has work in both the Latin rite and the Eastern (Ethiopian) rite, with two bishops in Asmara.

In May 2002, Eritrean authorities announced new policies by which it has officially recognized the Eritrean Orthodox Tewahdo Church, Sunni Islam, Catholicism, and the Evangelical Lutheran Church. These groups are exempted from the process of registration required of all other religious bodies. That process requires disclosure of data on their membership, and few groups have been willing to comply. Those few that have submitted information in hopes of registering have received no response.

Protestantism entered Eritrea in 1866 when three representative of the Swedish Evangelical Mission (representing Lutheranism) arrived in Massawa on their way to the interior of Ethiopia. Blocked from their goal, they stayed and initiated work among the Kunama people. After they had established a center in Massawa, the authorities began to entrust freed slaves to their care. They also began to recruit indigenous leadership. The church became self-governing in 1926, the first autonomous Lutheran body in Africa. In 1911, the church experienced a schism when some of the Swedish missionaries left their affiliation with the Swedish Evangelical Mission to affiliate with the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends, a conservative movement that had developed to protest liberal trends in the Church of Sweden. The new mission became autonomous in 1957 as the Lutheran Church in Eritrea.

Through the 20th century, various additional Protestant and Free church bodies entered Ethiopia through Eritrea, and the two countries share much religious history in common. Following World War II, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church and the Evangelistic Faith

The minaret of a mosque and the steeple of an Eritrean Orthodox church stand side by side in the religiously mixed market town of Keren. (AP Photo/Boris Grdanoski)

Missions (an American-based sending agency) initiated work in Eritrea. The latter established what has become the Evangelical Church of Eritrea. A year after the declaration of independence in 1993, the Southern Baptist Convention initiated work. These groups all now work outside the official regulations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Sweden; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Free Churches; Lutheranism; Orthodox Presbyterian Church; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Southern Baptist Convention;

References

Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Favali, Lyda, and Roy Pateman. Blood, Land, and Sex: Legal and Political Pluralism in Eritrea.

Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2003.

Pateman, Roy. Eritrea: Even the Stones Are Burning. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press, 1998.

Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (including Eritrea and the Somali-lands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church

The Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church is a Christian body in the tradition of the Coptic Orthodox Church of Egypt. It emerged in the wake of the country gaining independence in 1991.

The Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church traces its history to the founding of the Coptic Orthodox Church and its separation in the fifth century from the larger body of Eastern Orthodox Christianity. By this time Coptic Christianity had been established in Ethiopia, from which it spread to Eritrea. For centuries, the Eritrean orthodoxy was an integral part of the Ethiopian church. Like the Ethiopians, the Eritrean church recognizes Frumentius (fourth century) as its first bishop and it follows the beliefs and practices of Ethiopian Christianity.

The separation of Eritrea from Ethiopia, the result of a freedom movement that began in the 1960s, made the continuation of the Ethiopian church in the new country untenable and ongoing relationships have been strained. When the Eritrean church reorganized as a separate entity in 1994, it turned to the Egyptian church for the consecration and enthronement of its bishops. Four years later, Pope Shenouda III, the patriarch of the Coptic Orthodox Church, traveled to Asmara to elevate one of the bishops, Arbouna Philippos, as the first patriarch of the Eritean Orthodox Tewahedo Church. This ceremony was accompanied by the signing of a formal protocol of mutual recognition by the two churches.

The church is led by its synod, consisting of all the bishops and archbishops and chaired by the patriarch. In 2008, the church claimed 1,700,000 members in its 1,500 churches. The church includes about a third of the population, the remainder of which is primarily Muslim. The church is currently led by His Holiness Patriarch Antonios, who was enthroned in 2003 by Pope Shenouda.

The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the All Africa Conference of Churches.

Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church
PO Box 728
Asmara
Eritrea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: All Africa Conference of Churches; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Pateman, Roy. Eritrea: Even the Stones Are Burning. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press, 1998.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Espiritismo

Syncretized ritual systems form the basis of many religions indigenous to the colonial Caribbean. Espiritismo is a less common tradition that takes its place among other syncretized religions in the region such as Vodou, Santeria, and Orisha. Espiritismo is a form of ritual healing indigenous to Puerto Rico and commonly found wherever Puerto Ricans live in substantial numbers. While there is no central authority or institutionalization of Espiritismo practice, it is significant for its common expression throughout Puerto Rican society.

Espiritismo is one of a number of healing traditions that provide participants with an opportunity to relieve stress and to address specific emotional, social, and physical ailments, as well as creating an entertaining drama that satisfies spiritual needs and provides insight into psychic or behavioral crises. As a ritualized healing tradition, it is not practiced as an alternative to mainstream religions such as Catholicism. Ritual specialists (espiritistas/espiritistos) are essentially medioms who are able to access, or otherwise influence, spirits and Catholic saints for the benefit of their clients.

Syncretizing elements from a number of spiritual traditions, Espiritismo practitioners continue to adapt their rituals to their contemporary circumstances. Espiritismo has its origins in the writings of Allan Kardec, a Frenchman who attempted to rationalize popular European folk beliefs of the 19th century. In Puerto Rico, Kardec's "science of spiritism" blended with curanderismo, which was itself a blend of folk Catholicism, 16th-century European medicine, and earlier Caribbean and Mesoamerican Indian practices. More recently, elements of Santeria, an African-based syncretic faith that developed in Cuba, have also been incorporated into the practice of Espiritismo—especially in New York City, where it has gained wide popularity among Puerto Ricans and African Americans. The syncretism of Santeria and Espiritismo in New York City is still in its incipient form, and it is becoming distinguished as a separate religious/folk medical practice called Santerismo.

When a believing individual or family suffers from persistent pain that has not been relieved by medical doctors, when a husband is cheating on his wife, when someone is facing harassment and unfair treatment at work, or when a child always seems to be in trouble at school, then an espiritista or espiritista will be consulted. Likewise, newly purchased homes or cars will be "cleansed" and blessed. In the course of her work, an espiritista will have a private consultation with clients at the altar in her home where she will read cards, call upon her spirit guides, and interview the client to assess the nature of the problem. Guías, or spirit guides, are the disincarnated spirits with which a medium or medium in development is in direct communication. The guías help the medium and are not understood as "possessing" the espiritista. They talk to the medium, protect her from causas, and appear to mount the medium in trance to talk to and help others.

The spirits have personality characteristics that are valued for the strengths they represent or are desired by the medium. Such protecciones are often Catholic saints, the Yoruban powers of Santeria, folk heroes (such as Joan of Arc), idealized ethnic types (such as the Indio, the Hindu, the Negro Africano), a physical type (a strong black, an old man or woman), a professional type (priest, doctor, missionary), a deceased relative of the individual, or a relative from another existence. They are not understood to be perfect beings, but instead they are called upon as enlightened, elevated spirits. Espiritistas often have many guías.

Table set for Misa Espiritual (Spiritual Mass) in Houston, Texas. (Mary Ann Clark)

On the other hand, a causa is a negative and base disincarnated spirit. If such a spirit is identified as the client's problem, then the medium will recommend a despojo (a ritual bath) for spiritual cleansing, attending extra Catholic Masses, and participating in a feast night celebration (which she celebrates at the altar in her home or in a centro). If the base spirit is particularly resistant, the espiritista will "mount" and interrogate it, sometimes with the assistance of other mediums, in order to remove it from her client. Mounting is a vaguely defined experience of having a spirit ride one person in order to communicate with others. For instance, in Haitian Vodou, people who have the spirit

"on" them are called horses. When an espiritista mounts a spirit, she is metaphorically pinning it down with the weight of her own spiritual power. After the medium has cleansed the client by mounting the causa(s), she will use another ritual to cleanse herself (for example, going to the cemetery where she will ritually pass the causa to a guía, whereupon she returns home to ritually bathe and pray at her altar).

Espiritismo is a particularly Puerto Rican means for negotiating the difficulties of life. It is usually practiced in informal places, such as the home of the spirit medium or in centros, which are basement or storefront sites. Since it is an informal tradition without a central authority, it is extremely difficult to assess the number and distribution of both home and centro sites. Also, Espiritismo is fluid, dynamic, and loosely organized, with mediums having individualized styles and strengths that gain them a following. Still, most people who visit an espiritista consider themselves to be devout Catholics, and they do so only if there is a difficult problem to be solved by spiritual means. Most mediums are found by word of mouth or through their local botánicas (neighborhood shops selling spiritual products).

Carolyn V. Prorok

See also: Possession; Santeria; Spiritism; Vodou.

References

Brandon, George. Santeria from Africa to the New World: The Dead Sell Memories. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Garrison, Vivian. "The 'Puerto Rican Syndrome' in Psychiatry and Espiritismo." In Case Studies in Spirit Possession, edited by Vincent Crapanzano and Vivian Garrison. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1977.

Koss, Joan D. "Religion and Science Divinely Related: A Case History of Spiritism in Puerto Rico." Paper presented at the 73rd Annual Meeting of the American Anthropological Association, Symposium on Spiritism in Latin America, Mexico City, 1974.

Prorok, Carolyn V. "Boundaries are Made for Crossing: The Feminized Spatiality of Puerto Rican Espiritismo in New York City." Gender, Place and Culture: A Journal of Feminist Geography 7, no. 1 (2000): 57–80.

■ Estonia

Estonia is situated at the northeastern part of Europe, at the southern shore of the Finnish Gulf. The capital of Estonia is Tallinn. The population of Estonia is 1.34 million (including 68 percent ethnic Estonians, 25 percent Russians, 2 percent Ukrainians). The official language is Estonian. The majority of the population does not have a religious affiliation.

According to the census data from the year 2000 29 percent of the adult population considered themselves as adherents of some religion. The largest religious group are the Lutherans (13.6 percent of the population), followed by the Orthodox (12.8 percent), Baptists (0.5 percent), Roman Catholics (0.5 percent), Jehovah's Witnesses (0.34 percent), Pentecostals (0.2 percent), Old Believers (0.2 percent), Adventists (0.1 percent), and Methodists (0.1 percent). The largest non-Christian community are Muslims (0.1 percent). Also the indigenous religious traditions have considerable following (0.09 percent) though it is considerably less formally organized compared to other religious traditions. According to the census data, 6 percent of the population considered themselves atheists.

In 1991, after 50 years of Soviet occupation, Estonia reestablished its independence. The early 1990s were characterized by radical socio-political and economical reforms. The governmental regulations were minimized and radical socio-economic as well as political reforms were introduced. The free market ideology was adopted also in the field of religion. The Constitution from 1992 guarantees the freedom of religion and belief. The legislative framework for religious associations has been liberal and the principles of freedom of religion are followed both in legislation as well as in practice. The governmental policy toward religious associations has followed the model of cooperation and equal treatment. The main partner for the government on religion-related issues has been the ecumenical Estonian Council of Churches (1989). Through its member churches the Council represents almost 98 percent of adherents of different Christian churches (Lutherans, Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Baptists, Evangelicals, Methodists, Seventh-day Adventists, Pentecostals, Charismatic Episcopalians, and members of Armenian Apostolic Church).

According to the Constitution, there is no state church in Estonia. As of the end of 2008, Estonia was home to 9 churches (of recognized denominations), 9 congregational associations, and 71 individual congregations. There were also religious communities that have established themselves as nonprofit organizations, as well as some that have maintained themselves as informal associations.

The largest church is the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church. The second largest religious community is Orthodox, though divided into two churches: the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church and the Estonian Orthodox Church of Moscow Patriarchate. From 1993 to 2002 there was a serious confrontation between these two churches. The main reason for this

Estonia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	618,000	956,000	72.4	0.46	952,000	886,000
Orthodox	280,000	348,000	26.3	0.12	350,000	350,000
Protestants	328,000	238,000	18.0	0.40	242,000	230,000
Independents	350	40,000	3.0	4.76	56,000	60,000
Agnostics	410,000	307,000	23.3	-1.18	240,000	180,000
Atheists	318,000	50,000	3.8	-6.70	50,000	50,000
Muslims	10,000	4,000	0.3	-0.37	5,800	6,000
Jews	8,000	1,500	0.1	-0.37	1,500	1,500
Buddhists	300	800	0.1	4.16	1,000	1,500
Hindus	100	800	0.1	4.16	1,000	1,500
Baha'is	200	500	0.0	-0.40	700	1,000
Total population	1,365,000	1,321,000	100.0	-0.38	1,252,000	1,128,000

was the restitution of the church property nationalized during the Soviet period. The confrontation also had political overtones and had impact on the relations between Estonia and the Russian Federation as well as on the relations between the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople and the Moscow Patriarchate.

The pre-Christian religion of Estonia was most probably a local form of shamanism like that found among other Finno-Ugric peoples. Nature was considered animated by different spirits or powers, who were called “mothers” and “fathers.” The veneration of ancestors was also known. During the 1920s and 1930s, an attempt to restore the pre-Christian religion of Estonians was made under the name Taara-belief. In 1931 the Taara-believers founded their religious organization, Hiis (The Grove).

From the 11th century onward, Christianity was introduced to Estonians by trade and Christian monks. In the beginning of the 13th century the Roman Catholic Church and the Teutonic Order started to Christianize Estonia. By 1227 Estonia was declared Christianized. However, the pre-Christian worldview really started to change as late as the end of the 15th century, and was to a great extent maintained until the first half of the 18th century.

The Lutheran Reformation reached the towns in Estonia in 1524. Soon Lutheranism became the largest denomination. After the Great Northern War (1700–1721) Estonia became part of the Russian Empire. However, this political change did not affect the religious situation of the country. The Lutheran clergy has played an important role in the processes of forming Estonian cultural and national identity: the first prayer book and catechism in Estonian were Lutheran, printed in 1535, and the Bible was printed by Lutherans in 1739.

In 1727 the first Herrnhut Brethren (Moravians) came to Estonia. The native Estonians had an important role in the development of the Herrnhut movement, especially after 1743, when it was banned and the German Brethren expelled from the country. The movement eventually had a role in the national and cultural development of Estonia by encouraging literacy and various cultural pursuits that were popular in Europe at the time.

The Orthodox Church is one of the oldest churches in Estonia. However, Estonians did not join the Orthodox Church in great numbers until the middle of the 19th century. Then the prime reasons for conversion were economic and social, and the conversions were supported by the czarist Russification policy.

From the 1870s through the end of the first decade of the 20th century, there were several religious revivals in Estonia. During this period Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists, Methodists, Pentecostals, and others were introduced.

Shortly after the collapse of the Russian Empire in 1917, the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church was founded on the basis of Lutheran congregations in Estonia. In 1919 the Orthodox congregations in Estonia organized themselves as the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC). In 1920 the patriarch of Moscow gave independence to the EAOC, and since 1923 the EAOC has related to the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople as an autonomous church.

In 1940, when Estonia was incorporated into the Soviet Union, the religious situation changed dramatically. Already in 1940 some religious organizations were dissolved (for example, the Taara-believers, Salvation Army), religious literature was banned, the property of religious organizations was confiscated, and the Faculty of Theology at the Tartu University was closed. In 1945 the Russian Orthodox Church dissolved the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. The EAOC maintained its legal continuity in exile; the metropolitan of the EAOC had left the country along with approximately 70,000 Estonians who fled from the second invasion of the Soviet troops in 1944. In Estonia, the Russian Orthodox Church established its own diocese. In 1945 the Baptist, Evangelical Christian, Pentecostal, and Free churches were forced by Soviet officials to merge into the Union of Baptists and Evangelical Christians in Soviet Union. The activities of religious organizations were strictly regulated and controlled. The Soviet Marxist ideology of atheism was implemented particularly forcefully in the 1960s. During this period religion and religious institutions were marginalized in the society.

The change began with the national awakening during the end of the 1980s and gained strength with the re-establishment of the independence of Estonia in 1991. During this period religion became significant as the maintainer of ethical and moral norms, and also as a connection to Estonia's past. Because of its links to the past, the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church became important. Several religious movements that had previously been banned restarted their activities. In 1993 the EAOC reestablished itself in Estonia. During this period also, many new religious movements emerged. New Age sensibilities, which became noticeable in Estonia in the 1970s, started to gain much popularity among Estonians.

The national awakening also renewed interest in pre-Christian worldviews and religions. This trend is represented by the House of Taara and Native Religions, which together involve roughly 200 active members and approximately 1,000 people who identify themselves with that tradition. The Taara-believers continue the attempts made in the 1930s, whereas the followers of Native religions relate Native Estonian religion to other Finno-Ugric peoples' nature worship. This tradition is essentially person-centered, with the emphasis on a kind of power (vägi) that is understood both as a personal quality and as the essence of everything. In addition to Taara- and Earth-believers the local shamanistic tradition of healers (nõid) is still alive and popular though it has gained some New Age influences during the last decades.

Islam and Judaism have been traditionally connected to the national minorities in Estonia. In Estonia there are also followers of the Buddhist and Hindu traditions. However, the philosophical ideas of Buddhism and Hinduism are more popular than their religious practices. The most active Hindu group is the local community of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. The first influences of Buddhism arrived in Estonia during the early 20th century with the Estonian Buddhist monk Vahindra (Karl Tõnisson, also known as Karlis Tennissons). Today the Buddhist tradition is represented by four Tibetan Buddhist congregations, Friends of the Western Buddhist Order Estonia, and a small publishing house.

<http://www.eesti.ee/eng/>
<http://www.estonica.org>

Ringo Ringvee

See also: Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church; Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Salvation Army;

Union of Evangelical Christians—Baptists of Russia.

References

- Au, Ilmo, and Ringo Ringvee. Usulised ühendused Eestis. Tallinn, Estonia: Allika, 2007.
- Raun, Toivo U. Estonia and the Estonians. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 2001.
- Ringvee, Ringo. "State, Religion and the Legal Framework in Estonia." Religion, State and Society 36, no. 2 (2008): 181–196.
- Vakker, Triin, and Priit Rohtmets. "Estonia: Relations between Christian and Non-Christian Religious Organisations and the State of Religious Freedom." Religion, State and Society 36, no. 1 (2008): 45–53.
- Vogelaar, Huub. "Ecumenical Relationships in Estonia." Exchange: Journal of Missiological and Ecumenical Research 37, no. 2 (2008): 190–219.

Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church

The Orthodox community is the second largest religious group in Estonia. The Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC; Eesti Apostlik Õigeusu Kirik) is the third largest religious institution in Estonia. It has 3 dioceses with 58 congregations, and according to the EAOC it has approximately 25,000 members. The congregations are served by 27 priests and 10 deacons. The church has also two bishops, and it is led by Metropolitan Stefanus (1999). From 1923 the EAOC has belonged to the canonical jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

For centuries the Orthodox faith in Estonia was mostly the faith of foreign traders or rulers, or the faith of the cultural minority of Setus in southeastern Estonia. However, during the 19th century, there were two conversion movements pressuring the indigenous peasantry to give up Lutheranism and join the Russian Orthodox Church. The reasons for these conversion movements were both economic and social: the peasantry expected to receive land and hoped to be protected from the Baltic-German landowners if they accepted the official religion of the Russian Empire.

After the declaration of Estonian independence in 1918, the Orthodox congregations in Estonia organized themselves as a church. In 1920, Patriarch Tikhon of Moscow gave autonomous status to the Orthodox Church in Estonia. In 1923 the EAOOC came under the canonical jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople as an autonomous church.

In 1940, after the incorporation of Estonia into the Soviet Union, the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) forced the EAOOC to join the canonical jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate, considering the decision from 1923 as schismatic. The situation changed in 1942 when under the German occupation Metropolitan Alexander of the EAOOC re-established the church's independence from the Moscow Patriarchate. However, the Russian diocese of the EAOOC remained under the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarchate.

In 1944, Metropolitan Alexander and 22 priests went into exile just before the Soviet troops invaded Estonia for the second time. In 1945 the representatives of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) dissolved the synod of the EAOOC in Estonia and formed a new structure, the Diocese Council of the Russian Orthodox Church. The EAOOC was able to maintain its legal continuity in Sweden, serving the Estonian Orthodox community in exile. In 1978 Ecumenical Patriarch Demetrios I declared 1923 tomos to be inoperative in Estonia. In 1993 the EAOOC re-established its structures in Estonia. This was followed by a long dispute between the EAOOC and the Moscow Patriarchate over issues of church property, which was accompanied by the disputes between the Estonian government and the Moscow Patriarchate as the Estonian administration refused to register the former diocese of the Moscow Patriarchate in Estonia under the name and statute of the EAOOC.

In 1996 Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I restored 1923 tomos for the EAOOC in Estonia. As the reaction to this, the Moscow Patriarchate cut off communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate and with the autonomous Finnish Orthodox Church, which had supported the EAOOC during the 1990s.

The disagreements concerning property issues ended in 2002 when the disputes on the church property were solved by agreements between the EAOOC, EOCMP, and the Estonian government. However, the Moscow Patriarchate refuses to recognize the EAOOC as an autonomous church, claiming Estonia as its canonical territory. In 2007 the EAOOC became a member of the Conference of European Churches.

Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church

Wismari 32

10136 Tallinn

Estonia

<http://www.eoc.ee>

Ringo Ringvee

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

Papathomas, Grigorios D., and Matthias H. Palli. The Autonomous Orthodox Church of Estonia/L'Église autonome orthodoxe d'Éstonie. Athens: Épektasis, 2002.

Ringvee, Ringo. "Orthodox Churches in Estonia." Estonian Culture 1 (2003): 34–37. http://www.einst.ee/culture/I_MMIII/ringvee.html.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church

The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC; Eesti Evangeelne Luterlik Kirik) is the largest religious organization in Estonia, with 164 congregations in Estonia, 3 congregations in Russia, and 1 congregation in Latvia. In 2007 the EELC reported having approximately 180,000 members. The church's consistory is situated in Tallinn. Since 2004 it has been led by its archbishop, Andres Põder.

Estonia was Christianized during the 13th century by the Roman Catholic Church and the Teutonic Order. The Reformation, in the form of Lutheranism, reached Estonia in 1524. During the period of Swedish rule (1625–1710), the hierarchy of the Lutheran Church was organized along episcopal lines, as was the case with the Church of Sweden. The Lutheran Church with its clergy played an important role in the history of Estonian religion and culture. Then, shortly after the end of the Russian Empire, the Lutheran congregations in Estonia started to develop an indigenous organization. The first Church Congress was held in 1917, and the EELC was officially founded in 1919 at the second Church Congress. The EELC was defined as the “free people’s church,” as the majority of the population were Lutherans.

After the incorporation of Estonia into the Soviet Union in 1940, major changes concerning the situation of religious organizations took place. By 1939, 53 of the church’s 209 pastors had migrated to Germany, due to their German ancestry. In 1940 the Soviet authorities arrested several Lutheran pastors. The theological faculty of the University of Tartu was closed in 1940. Because of this closing, a new Theological Institute of the EELC was founded in 1943 during the years of German occupation. Today this institution still operates as an institution for the preparation of the clergy, as well as Sunday school teachers and the like. In 1944 approximately 70,000 Estonians, among them 72 Lutheran pastors, fled to the West because of the approaching Soviet army. After the war, they took the lead in forming the EELC Abroad.

The Soviet period had serious consequences for the EELC. During this period church life was controlled largely by the Soviet authorities, and the Soviet Marxist atheist campaigns marginalized the role of the EELC in the society. From the late 1980s on, during the period of national awakening that led to the re-establishment of the Estonian independence, the role of the EELC as the most traditional church in Estonia was stressed. In 1995 the Estonian government established a joint committee with the EELC for the discussions on matters concerning both parties. On the legislative level the EELC is treated on the same ground as other religious associations and the EELC does not have any specific privileges.

Internationally the EELC belongs to the World Council of Churches (1961) and to the Lutheran World Federation (1963). In 1996 the EELC signed the Porvoo Declaration, a statement of agreement with the Anglican and Scandinavian Lutheran churches. The ordination of women started in 1967. In 2008, 37 of the 142 EELC clergy were women.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church
Kiriku plats 3
10130 Tallinn

Estonia

<http://www.eelk.ee/>

Ringo Ringvee and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad; Lutheran World Federation; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Altnurme, Riho. “Foreign Relations of the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church as a Means of Maintaining Contact with the Western World.” Kirchliche Zeitgeschichte/Contemporary Church History 19, no. 1 (2006): 159–165.
- Veem, Konrad. Vaba Eesti Rahvakirik. Stockholm: EVR, 1988.
- We Bless You from the House of the Lord: The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Today*. Tallinn, Estonia: Consistory of the EELC, 1997.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad

The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad (EELCA; Eesti Evangeeliumi Luteri Usu Kirik) was formed in 1944 among Estonian refugees in Sweden. Currently the EELCA has 63 congregations all over the world—in Sweden, Germany, England, France, the United States, Canada, Australia, and Brazil. Its approximate membership is more than 15,000. The church is led by Archbishop Andres Taul (2007) and the consistory of the church, which is located in Toronto.

In 1944, due to the traumatic experiences of the first Soviet occupation (1940–1941), approximately 70,000 Estonians fled from Estonia to the West, mainly Sweden and Germany, before the Soviet troops occupied the country. The majority of the refugees were Lutherans. Among the expatriates were 72 Lutheran pastors, including the head of the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC), Bishop Johan Kõpp. The first new pastors were ordained in 1947 in German refugee camps.

All the statutes of the EELC were reestablished abroad in 1958. The consistory of the EELCA is situated in the country where the archbishop resides. The EELCA has been the maintainer of the Estonian national identity for the diaspora community, which traditionally maintains church services in the Estonian language. Through the last decades of the 20th century the membership declined, as second- and third-generation Estonians assimilated to the population of their country of residence. During the period of Soviet occupation of Estonia, the EELCA provided religious literature for the EELC at home.

Dome of the Toomkirik, an Estonian Evangelical Lutheran church in Tallinn, Estonia. (Focus Database/StockphotoPro)

On the international level, the EELCA was one of the founding members of the Lutheran World Federation (1947) and of the World Council of Churches (1948). It is also a member of the Conference of European Churches. Since 1978, the EELCA has also sponsored an educational institution for the clergy, the Theological Institute of the EELCA. The negotiations between the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church and the EELCA on the issue of unification of the two churches started in the 1990s.

Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad
383 Jarvis St.
Toronto, ON M5B 2C7
Canada
<http://eelk.org/index.php> http://www.eelk.ee/eng_EELCAbroad.html

Ringo Ringvee

See also: Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Veem, Konrad. Vaba Eesti Rahvakirik. Stockholm: EVR, 1988.
- We Bless You from the House of the Lord: The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church Today*. Tallinn, Estonia: Consistory of the EELC, 1997.

Estonian Orthodox Church of Moscow Patriarchate

The Estonian Orthodox Church of Moscow Patriarchate (EOCMP; Moskva Patriarhaadi Eesti Õigeusu Kirik) is the second largest religious institution in Estonia with approximately 170,000 members (2007). The EOCMP has 31 congregations, 44 priests, and 11 deacons. The church is led by Metropolitan Kornily (until 2000 as bishop).

Although the Orthodox Christianity has been in Estonia since 11th century, the official presence of the Moscow Patriarchate in Estonia is dated back to the 18th century, when the Orthodox congregations became part of the Pskov Diocese of the Russian Orthodox Church. In 1920 Patriarch Tikhon of Moscow gave autonomous status to the Orthodox Church in Estonia. In 1923 the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church came under the canonical jurisdiction of Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The presence of the Moscow Patriarchate in Estonia was re-established in 1940 after the Soviet occupation of Estonia. In 1945 the diocese of the Russian Orthodox Church was established after the dissolution of the autonomous Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. During the Soviet period from 1945 to 1991 many Orthodox churches were closed. Also the ethnic structure of the Orthodox population changed during the Soviet period due to the massive immigration from other parts of the Soviet Union to Estonia; the majority of the Orthodox were now ethnic Russians. The diocese was administrated from 1961 to 1990 by Metropolitan Alexy, who was in 1990 elected patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church as Alexy II. In 1993 the patriarch of Moscow gave tomos to the diocese, recognizing it as an autonomous church.

In 1993 the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church re-established itself in Estonia. Subsequently the Estonian authorities refused to recognize the diocese of the Moscow Patriarchate as legal successor of the pre-Soviet Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, which meant that the church property nationalized during the Soviet period was restituted to the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. This decision was followed by serious confrontation between the Moscow Patriarchate and the Estonian government. From 1995 on this conflict became an important factor in the relations between the Russian Federation and Estonia. In 2002 the Estonian authorities registered the former diocese as EOCMP although it was not recognized as the legal successor of the pre-Soviet Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church. The property issues were regulated by the trilateral agreements between the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, the Estonian government, and the EOCMP.

The Moscow Patriarchate has also two stavropeigial institutions in Estonia: Alexander Nevsky Congregation in Tallinn and Pukhtitsa nunnery in Kuremäe.

Estonian Orthodox Church of Moscow Patriarchate
Pikk 64-4
10133 Tallinn
Estonia
<http://www.orthodox.ee/>

Ringo Ringvee

See also: Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

Alexy, Patriarch. Pravoslaviye v Estonii. Moscow: Pravoslavnaia Entsiklopedija, 1999.

Ringvee, Ringo. "Orthodox Churches in Estonia." Estonian Culture 1 (2003): 34–37. http://www.einst.ee/culture/I_MMIII/ringvee.html.

■ Ethiopia

Ethiopia, a landlocked northeast African nation, is surrounded by Sudan, Kenya, Somalia, Djibouti, and Eritrea. For a variety of geographical reasons, its 432,000 square miles were able to remain largely free of European colonial ambitions, and its citizens are proud of their ancient civilization.

Ethiopia is home to a variety of Native peoples, the majority being Galla or Amhara. Around 2000 BCE

Bet Giyorgis (St. George's), one of a number of rock-hewn churches built by Lalibela, a Christian king of Ethiopia during the 12th and 13th centuries CE. (iStockPhoto.com)

Ethiopia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	15,921,000	52,477,000	58.6	2.71	75,052,000	112,046,000
Orthodox	11,072,000	35,570,000	39.7	2.70	49,540,000	72,700,000
Protestants	746,000	14,400,000	16.1	3.36	21,800,000	33,050,000
Independents	132,000	1,500,000	1.7	4.14	2,600,000	4,300,000
Muslims	9,000,000	30,457,000	34.0	2.69	42,550,000	62,500,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,875,000	6,400,000	7.1	1.69	7,000,000	8,000,000
Agnostics	0	170,000	0.2	2.62	300,000	700,000
Baha'is	7,000	30,300	0.0	2.62	50,000	75,000
Jews	28,000	13,100	0.0	2.63	14,000	18,000
Atheists	0	12,000	0.0	2.62	20,000	50,000
Hindus	0	6,500	0.0	2.63	10,000	15,000
Total population	29,831,000	89,566,000	100.0	2.62	124,996,000	183,404,000

the Habbashat, an Arab people from Yemen, moved into the region, and it is from them that Ethiopia also became known as Abyssinia. The early center of Ethiopia was Axum, a city along the trade route from the Red Sea to the southern Sudan.

An Ethiopian kingdom arose early in the Christian era and expanded across the Red Sea into present-day Yemen. In the fourth century, the royal family accepted Christianity, and gradually the Christian faith came to dominate the land. The kingdom suffered from the gradual movement of Islam, first through the Arab peninsula and Egypt and then along the East African coast. Feeling somewhat stifled by the Muslim world that now largely surrounded them, the rulers appealed to Christian Europe for assistance in the 15th century. Their appeal finally resulted in the arrival of the Portuguese in the next century and the destruction of Muslim power in Somalia.

The next centuries saw the rivalry between the Amhara (who had ruled Ethiopia) and the Gallas come to the fore. The Gallas gained the throne for a brief period in the middle of the 18th century, but eventually the Amharas re-established control.

At the end of the 19th century, the Italians invaded Ethiopia as part of their dream of an empire in Africa. They were soundly defeated in 1895, but were able to take control of Eritrea and the coast of the southern part of Somalia. The Italians again invaded in 1935, and they held Ethiopia until replaced by the British in 1941. Independence returned in 1948 under Haile Selassie.

Selassie ruled until he was overthrown in 1974. The underlying cause of unrest had been the stranglehold on the country held by Ethiopian royalty and the Ethiopian church, which together owned the great majority of the country. A military government, sympathetic to Marxist socialism, eventually took over in 1977, but faced a number of dissenting groups and constant violence and civil war through the 1980s. The military ruler, Mengistu Haile Mariam (b. 1937), was finally overthrown in 1991 but the new government faced a period of intense social conflict. It worked out a peace with the primary dissident group that controlled Eritrea, which became an independent country, and then turned to deal with the problem of the widespread famine, which had been exacerbated by the war.

Although some traditional African religions still exist in Ethiopia, the majority of the population are Christians and members of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. Traditional religion is strongest in the southwestern part of the county (in lands bordering Kenya and the Sudan).

Following the acceptance of Christianity by the ruling elite, the Ethiopian church has had a strong relationship with the Coptic Orthodox Church of Egypt and followed it in its break with the larger world of Eastern Orthodoxy during the Monophysite controversy in the fifth century. The Monophysites, whose name comes from the Greek for “one nature,” tended to emphasize the divine nature of Christ to the point of sacrificing his fully human nature. The Eastern Orthodox in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate held that Christ had two natures (human and divine), as defined in the Chalcedonian Creed, adopted at the council held in Chalcedon in 451. In modern perspective, the controversy appears to have been essentially a jockeying for control of the Egyptian church that was fought out in theological terms.

Through the centuries, the relation of the Ethiopian church as a daughter to the Egyptian church was symbolized by the regular appointment of an Egyptian as the abuna (archbishop) of the Ethiopian church by the head of the Coptic church. That relationship only ended in 1959, when the head of the church became an Ethiopian, bearing the title of patriarch-catholicos.

Abune Bacilios was named the first patriarch. The church is currently led by Abune Paulos, the fifth patriarch.

The Ethiopian church developed a unique relationship with Islam when some of the early followers of Muhammad visited the country in 662 CE. This visit is often quoted by Muslims as an important event establishing Islam's traditional tolerant stance toward the other religions of the Book (Christianity and Judaism). The Coptic church supported the country's resistance to the expansion of Islam as neighboring lands became predominantly Muslim.

Islam (of the Shafaiite School) gained a permanent stronghold in Ethiopia among several of the peoples in the southeastern part of the country near the border with Somalia. Danan is an important intellectual center, and Goba, a city farther inland and nearer the capital, Addis Ababa, annually hosts thousands of pilgrims on their way to the town of Ginir, where the body of Sheikh Hussein, considered a saint in Ethiopia, is entombed. Other Muslims are concentrated in the far east of the country near the Sudanese border. They currently make up some 30 percent of Ethiopia's residents.

The Roman Catholic Church came into the country in the 16th century, and some attempts were made to absorb the Ethiopian church into Roman Catholicism. Some progress to this end was made in the 17th century, when the head of the church briefly identified as a Catholic. However, some of the missionaries proved tactless and, among other things, attempted to impose the Latin liturgy on the land. In reaction, the missionaries were kicked out of the country and were not allowed to return until the 19th century. However, when they returned, they were identified with the Italians, and they were again ejected. The church survived, however, as Italian lay people were not forced to leave.

The church finally developed an Ethiopic liturgy that retained as much of the Coptic liturgy as was possible. Today a community of several hundred thousand Roman Catholics exists in Ethiopia, the great majority following the Ethiopic liturgy, though Latin- and Ethiopic-rite congregations operate within the same dioceses. The church is led by the archbishop of Addis Ababa.

Protestantism entered the country through the efforts of a spectrum of Lutheran missionaries, beginning in 1866 with some from the Swedish Lutheran Mission. Subsequently, in 1911, Swedish missionaries representing the independent True Friends of the Bible arrived. The two groups united their work in 1938. German missionaries from the Hermannsburg Mission arrived in 1927. Missionaries from Norway, Denmark, Iceland, and the United States arrived through the 1940s and 1950s. Much of the Lutheran work was brought together in the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus. American Presbyterians arrived in 1920 and began work among the Galla people. When the Italians arrived, the Presbyterian missionaries were expelled, and before leaving they organized their mission as the Bethel Evangelical Church. In the mid-1970s, it merged into the Mekane Jesus Church.

The Sudan Interior Mission (SIM) launched its expansive work in Ethiopia in 1927; Dr. Thomas A. Lambie (1885–1954), who had been working with the Presbyterians, began an independent work that he called the Abyssinian Frontier Mission. He merged his mission into SIM. Working primarily among the Galla people, the mission built a following of some 60 members, but after the expulsion of the missionaries in 1935, expanded rapidly. There were 18,000 by the time the British arrived. By the mid-1970s there were 182,000 members, and as the Word of Life Church/Kale Heywet, it has become the largest Protestant work in the country, with more than 2 million members as of the 1990s.

In the years since World War II, additional Protestant groups have begun work in Ethiopia, including the Baptist General Conference of America, which entered the country in 1950. Pentecostalism came into the country in the postwar years, and two large indigenous churches have resulted, the Full Gospel Believers Church and Gods All Times Association, which between them have half a million members. Both of these churches have been encouraged by assistance and personnel from Scandinavian Pentecostal bodies.

Among the most interesting of Ethiopian groups has been the Beta Israel, a Jewish group that existed in the Gondar region north of Lake Tana. They were the subject of much persecution at various periods of the 20th century, even as they fought for recognition by the larger Jewish community that had finally taken notice of their existence. In the 1990s, most of the group (which at its height numbered some 28,000) migrated to Israel (which finally recognized them under the Law of Return in 1994). Around 12,000 remain in Ethiopia.

The Baha'i Faith established its first spiritual assembly in 1964. Today there are almost 20,000 adherents. A variety of new religions have arrived, most African Initiated Churches from nearby countries. Though several Buddhist groups responded to Ethiopian needs during the recent famine conditions in the country, no Buddhist or Hindu groups appear to have been formed.

The Ethiopian Constitution guarantees religious freedom. Though the Orthodox church is in the majority, it is not considered the state church and is not officially privileged. Additional regulations forbid the forming of partisan political parties based on religious allegiance and incitement of religious quarrels. All religious groups are required to register themselves and renew such registration tri-annually.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Baha'i Faith; Beta Israel; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Shafaiite School of Islam; Word of Life Church.

References

- Eide, Oyvind M. Revolution & Religion in Ethiopia: Growth & Persecution Of Mekane Yesus Church. Athens: Ohio State University Press, 2000.
- Engelsviken, T. Molo Wingel: A Documentary Report on the Life and History of the Independent Pentecostal Movement in Ethiopia, 1960–1975. Oslo: Free Faculty of Theology, 1975.
- Erllich, Haggai. Saudi Arabia and Ethiopia: Islam, Christianity, and Politics Entwined. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.
- Horner, N. A. Rediscovering Christianity Where It Began: A Survey of Contemporary Churches in the Middle East and Ethiopia. Beirut: Near East Council of Churches, 1974.
- Levine, Donald N. Greater Ethiopia: The Evolution of a Multiethnic Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgy: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Marcus, Harold G. A History of Ethiopia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Molnar, Enrico S. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Pasadena, CA: Bloy House Theological School, 1969.
- Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (including Eritrea and the Somali-lands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.
- Trimingham, J. S. Islam in Ethiopia. London: Routledge, 2007.

Yesehaq, Archbishop. The Ethiopian Tewahedo Church: An Integrally African Church. Nashville: Winston-Derek Publishers, 1997.

Ethiopian Catholic Church

The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church was a branch of the Coptic Orthodox Church based in Egypt and like it failed to affirm the formulation of doctrine promulgated by the Council of Chalcedon in the fifth century. The Chalcedonian Creed affirmed that Christ existed as one person with both a human and a divine nature. The Monophysites (from the Greek for “one nature”), who predominated in the Egyptian church, held that Christ had only a divine nature. For many centuries after the establishment of Islam across North Africa, Ethiopia was cut off from the rest of the Christian world. It was rediscovered in the 15th century, and missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church launched efforts to bring the Ethiopian church into union with Rome.

In 1622, the king of Ethiopia declared himself Catholic and his nation a Catholic state. The following year, the pope appointed Affonso Mendez, a Portuguese Jesuit, the first patriarch of the new Ethiopian Catholic Church. He was installed in 1626. He lost popular support, however, when he tried to Latinize the liturgy. When the king died, his successor banished Mendez and ended the union of the Ethiopian church with Rome.

Catholic missionaries did not re-enter the country until the end of the 19th century, and the church did not expand significantly until the years of the Italian occupation (1935–1941), and not until 1961 was an episcopal see, headquartered at Addis Ababa, erected. Additional suffragan dioceses were established in Asmara and Adigrat.

In 1993, Eritrea became independent of Ethiopia. Approximately half of the Ethiopian Catholic membership resided in the new country; as a result two additional dioceses (Keren, Barentu), and eventually a third, were created. Most of the 223,000 members of the Ethiopian Catholic Church are in the two countries. The Ethiopian Catholic Church, distinguished by its use of the Ethiopic rite, now has six diocese (eparchies), three in Eritrea and three in Ethiopia. The church is currently headed by Archbishop Berhaneyesus Demerew Souraphiel (b. 1948), who took office in 1999. There is also a large presence of Latin-rite Catholics in Ethiopia whose congregations are organized into five vicariates and two apostolic prefectures. Vicariates and apostolic prefectures may be understood as provisional dioceses that have been established in an area where it is expected that a diocese will be created in the relatively near future.

Ethiopian Catholic Church
Catholic Archbishop's House
PO Box 21903
Addis Ababa
Ethiopia
<http://www.ecs.org.et/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Coptic Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus

The Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus was founded in 1959 by the churches that had grown out of the several missions created by different Lutheran missionary agencies that had been operating in Ethiopia through the 20th century. Lutheran work began with missionaries of the Swedish Evangelical Mission in Eritrea in 1866. Through the next decade, they worked with two converts. They eventually opened a mission in Jima, in the Province of Kefa. They purchased slaves who were then invited to become Christians and educated the neighborhood children in their school. Workers with the mission also helped translate the Bible into one of the Ethiopian languages, Oromo. Through the next decades, the Swedish Evangelical Mission grew primarily among the Oromo-speaking people, though the missionaries encouraged the developing evangelical movement within the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church that had resulted from the earlier translation of the Bible into Amharic (or Amarigna).

Through the next decades, other Lutheran groups established work in the country: the Swedish Mission of Bible True Friends (1921), the German Hermannsburg Mission (1927), the Norwegian Lutheran Mission (1948), the Icelandic Mission (1952), and the Danish Ethiopian Mission (1952). The earlier missions suffered during the occupation of the country by the Italians (1936–1941). Not only were the missionaries exiled, but a number of the leaders in the church were arrested and executed. However, the church not only survived, it prospered. In 1941 the congregation in Addis Ababa reorganized apart from the Swedish Evangelical Mission and through the decade emerged as the center of the indigenous Protestant movement in the country. In 1944 it called the first Conference of Ethiopian Evangelical Churches that would meet annually, apart from the missionaries' input and attendance, and work toward the creation of a single Ethiopian evangelical church.

A significant move to unite the Lutheran work in Ethiopia was initiated in 1947 by the Lutheran World Federation, which has called upon Lutherans around the world to seek unity in their own countries. A visit by a Lutheran World Federation representative led to the formation of the Lutheran Missions Committee, which in turn launched several cooperative efforts to assist all the missions, most notably the Ethiopian Evangelical College, opened at Debre Zeyt in 1956. By the mid-1950s, considerable effort was evident in planning for a united Lutheran church, culminating in the formation of the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus in 1959. The church was received into the Lutheran World Federation in 1963 and the World Council of Churches in 1972.

The church has grown by a series of mergers. In 1965, the Kambata Evangelical Church, formerly a synod of the Word of Life Church/Kale Heywet, merged into the Ethiopian Evangelical Church. Meanwhile in Europe, discussion between Lutheran and Reformed churches led to the Leuenberg Agreement, which offered a statement of understanding and alignment between the two communions. Based upon that agreement, the Evangelical Church Bethel merged into the Ethiopian Evangelical Church. The Bethel church originated in 1919 when a flu epidemic hit Ethiopia and the government requested Thomas Alexander Lambie (1885–1954), a medical missionary working in the Sudan, to come to Ethiopia.

He and other American Presbyterian missionaries who came afterward decided to work toward the renewal of the Orthodox church rather than set up separate Presbyterian church congregations. However, when the missionaries were kicked out in 1936, those who had been affected by their work moved to set up a church in the Reformed tradition in 1940. It was formally constituted as the Evangelical Church Bethel in 1947. In 1970 it was received into the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, though that association was dropped in 1974.

The church has more than four million members (2005). It went through a period of rapid growth between 1977 and 1983 during which the membership doubled. It also has affiliated congregations in Europe formed by members who have moved to Scandinavia. These congregations have organized the Northern Europe Mekane Yesus Fellowship.

The church is organized into synods and the quadrennial synodical convention is the highest legislative body. It is led by a president who is assisted by an executive committee and general secretary. The church supports the Mekane Yesus Seminary in Addis Ababa. In 1998, the church organized a peace, justice, and advocacy commission to work at various levels in the cause of peace-making.

Ethiopian Evangelical Church
Jomo Kenyatta Road
PO Box 2087
Addis Ababa
Ethiopia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Lutheran World Federation; Word of Life Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Aren, Gustav. Evangelical Pioneers in Ethiopia: Origins of the Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus. Addis Ababa, Ethiopia: Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus, 1978.
- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Edie, Oyvind M. Revolution and Religion in Ethiopia: The Growth and Persecution of the Mekane Yesus Church, 1974–85. Abingdon, Oxon, UK: James Currey, 2000.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church

Christianity's appearance in Ethiopia is generally attributed to Frumentius (ca. 300–ca. 380), a Greek Christian. According to the story, while on a voyage through the Red Sea, he was captured along with his brother, and both were taken to the ancient capital of Ethiopia at Axum as slaves. Placed in the service of the king, like the biblical Joseph, he won the king's favor and was given a position of trust. As a part of his privileges, he was allowed to preach his Christian faith. He eventually won over the king and court to the new faith, and the door was open to convert the country. Frumentius's brother was ordained as a priest, and in 339 Frumentius was consecrated by the Patriarchate of Alexandria (Egypt) as the first bishop of Ethiopia. He is credited with translating the Bible into the Ethiopian language.

The Ethiopian church developed as a daughter church of the Egyptian church. Several centuries after its founding it became involved in a controversy between the patriarch of Alexandria and the other bishops of the Christian church over the nature of Christ. As part of their attempt to refine Christian understanding of God, the church considered the mystery of Christ's dual nature as both God and human. The patriarch of Alexander argued that Christ's divine nature was primary, an opinion that deemphasized the human nature of Jesus. The rest of the church went on (in the fifth century) to reach a consensus that Christ was both fully human and fully divine. This "orthodox" position was included in the Chalcedonian Creed, adopted by the church's bishops in 451 at the Council of Chalcedon. The patriarch of Alexandria continued to adhere to the Nicene Creed (of 325), which is compatible with both the Monophysite (from the Greek for "one nature") position and that of the "orthodox" churches.

Timkat celebration, an important festival in the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, in which people renew their baptismal vows. (Carolyne Pehora/Dreamstime.com)

The argument split the church, and most of the Egyptians followed the patriarch into what is now known as the Coptic Orthodox Church.

Except for this question of Christ's nature, the Ethiopian church is at one with Eastern Orthodoxy and traditional Christian faith. The church follows the Coptic Church in its veneration of the Virgin Mary. However, it differs in its acceptance of the Apocrypha (books written between the period of the last books of the Hebrew Bible and the first century CE). It also recognizes some Old Testament figures as saints, holds Saturday as an additional holy day, and observes many Jewish dietary rules.

The Ethiopian church was cut off from the Christian world in the eighth century by the rise of Islam. Isolated, Ethiopia was able to remain autonomous in its mountainous homeland. In the 13th century, the Christian state reached the height of its power, and King Lalibela gave his name to a city of churches, 10 of which were carved from solid rock. It almost merged into the Roman Catholic Church in the 17th century, but pulled back in reaction to the tactless activities of Catholic missionaries. In the 20th century, responding to attempts to heal the rifts of the ancient church, the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo (“Unity”) Church has become a member of the World Council of Churches.

The church does not have an official website. There are several expansive unofficial pages at <http://members.nbc.com/redingtn/eth.html> and <http://www.prairienet.org/dximages/eotc.htm>. The church is headed by its patriarch, currently Abuna Paulos. In 2005, it reports some 38,956,000 members in Ethiopia. There are also dioceses in Sudan, Djibouti (covering East Africa), Jerusalem, London, Trinidad, and the United States. Its membership in neighboring Eritrea was set aside as an autonomous body in 1994.

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church
PO Box 728
Asmara
Ethiopia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Coptic Orthodox Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of Ethiopia: A Panorama of History and Spiritual Life.* Addis Ababa: The Ethiopian Orthodox Church, 1970.
- Molnar, Enrico S. The Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Pasadena, CA: Bloy House Theological School, 1969.
- Shenk, C. E. “The Development of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and Its Relationship with the Ethiopian Government from 1930 to 1970.” Ph.D. diss., New York University, 1972.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Yesehaq, Archbishop. The Ethiopian Tewahedo Church: An Integrally African Church. Nashville: Winston-Derek Publishers, 1997.

Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church

The Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church is a small body that traces its history to Marcus Garvey (1887–1940), the Jamaican reformer and advocate for African Americans, but gained a reputation of a different kind following the arrest of several of its leaders in 1978 for breaking the antidrug laws in the United States. Garvey founded the church in 1914 in Jamaica as a religious affiliate of his Universal Negro Improvement Association, and although it blossomed briefly in the 1920s, it died out in the United States. It survived in Jamaica as a very small body and became associated with the Rastafarians, known for their use of ganja (marijuana) as a mood-altering substance for religious purposes.

In 1970, several Americans in Jamaica encountered the church. They joined and established a church center on Star Island off Miami Beach, in Florida. Under the leadership of Thomas Reilly Jr., the American leader, a second center opened in New Jersey. Over the next several years the church had a variety of interactions with government authorities. In 1973, law enforcement authorities seized 105 tons of marijuana from the group. However, that did not prevent the church from finally receiving its tax-exempt status as a religious organization two years later. The church immediately filed a lawsuit against the government, demanding that its members be allowed to use marijuana.

The church had arisen on the heels of the widespread discovery of marijuana and other psychedelic substances by young people in the 1960s and the founding of a spectrum of groups that used various substances (LSD, peyote, and the like), all of which were considered controlled substances by the American government. The Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church believes that smoking marijuana is equivalent to making a burnt offering to God. The members believe that by smoking marijuana and thus consuming the psychoactive ingredient in the plant they will be able to change their body chemistry and thus survive into God's new world after the end of this world. The new world will be a time of peace and brotherhood and of such abundance that people will no longer have to work. They call upon the Bible to support their belief (Genesis 1:29; Exodus 3:2–4; Psalm 104:14; Hebrews 6:7).

In spite of their belief, in 1978 the court ruled against their members being allowed to use marijuana even in a religious context, and immediately afterward law enforcement agents raided the church center on Star Island. Finding illegal substances, the police arrested a number of church leaders, and after a long adjudication process they were convicted in 1981. In jail, they petitioned for the right to have marijuana, but were again denied. Through the 1970s, other drug-oriented churches in the United States (with one exception, the Native American Church) also were handed a series of negative court rulings.

The church survives in the United States, but headquarters remain where members operate a 4,000-acre farm. Unfavorable court rulings decimated the American membership though several thousand members reside in Jamaica. A website is maintained by church member Carl Olsen at <http://www.ethiopianzioncopticchurch.org/>. Olsen has continued the church's legal battle and found hope in the favorable ruling received by members of the Native American Church relative to the use of peyote and the more recent 2006 ruling in favor of the Brazilian-based União do Vegetal that uses ayahuasca. The rulings have been based on provisions of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The adjudication process for the Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church continues. On December 8, 2008, Olsen filed a Petition for Writ of Certiorari, a petition to ask the Supreme Court to review the lower court judgments against the church.

Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church

Carl E. Olsen, Director, Incorporator

PO Box 4091

Des Moines, IA 50333

<http://www.ethiopianzioncopticchurch.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Native American Church; Rastafarians.

Reference

Marijuana and the Bible. Hialeah, FL: Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, n.d.

Ethnoreligions

The term "ethnoreligion" designates a group of religions also termed primal religions, Native religions, indigenous religions, and most frequently in this volume traditional religions. The term refers to those thousands of religions practiced by the many, relatively small, surviving ethnic groups around the world. The religions themselves are relatively small in that, compared to Buddhism or Islam, for example, they are confined to a single particular ethnic (or sub-ethnic) group centered in a limited geographical locale. Adherents of the religion are usually tied together by a local language (some 5,000 such local languages still exist) and are related to each other as members of the same kinship group. In general, one is born into the group, and except under unusual circumstances, new members from outside the ethnic group are not admitted. Most of these groups are pre-literary, that is, they exist in cultures in which written languages may have only been introduced in the last two centuries, and what literature exists has not become a factor in the perpetuation of the religion.

In the 19th century, such ethnoreligions were viewed as lower in the evolutionary scale, less advanced forms of the religious life. Those scholars who developed the comparative study of religion often attempted to build a hierarchy of religions, in which invariably Christianity appeared at the apex and these religions formed the base. Over the 19th and 20th centuries, many ethnoreligions disappeared as their adherents were absorbed into one of the larger religious communities.

Various considerations led to a re-evaluation of ethnoreligions in the 20th century. A more sophisticated approach to history has challenged the ease with which presently existing tribal religions are equated with what might have existed in the ancient past. Scholars now understand that religions exist in time and change and develop over time. Scholars are now more hesitant to equate what they find in the present,

Macumba practitioners prepare food for the orixas (gods) before a ceremony begins honoring a novice being inducted into the temple, Rio de Janeiro. (Stephanie Maze/Corbis) even among the most isolated of groups, with what might have existed in the ancient past. They have also discovered that geographically limited communities were frequently tied to large trading networks that operated over large distances and were continuing spurs to transformation.

In the 20th century, scholars also developed a new appreciation of the levels of sophistication and appropriateness of the ideology underlying most ethnoreligions. Such sophistication was often obscured by the Western missionaries who for many years were the main conduits of information concerning the majority of ethnoreligionists. At the same time, rather than seeing a sharp break between “primitive” and “higher” religions, scholars now see a continuum of ethnogroups, which would include literary traditions such as Shinto and Judaism or a relatively new ethnoreligion like Sikhism. Hinduism can even be seen as a cluster of ethnoreligions.

Shinto, Judaism, and Sikhism aside, most ethnoreligions share characteristics that set them apart as a distinctive set of religions. The great majority of ethnoreligions operate as oral traditions. The chronicles of Christianity, in particular, have been filled in the past centuries with accounts of initial missionaries to a different people who spent their first years reducing a language to writing and producing a grammar, a Bible, and a hymnbook or liturgy. Such work has been integrated into the spread of Christianity since the 17th century among Native Americans and in primal cultures around the world. However, in the face of the global movement of Christianity, Buddhism, and Islam, many people have chosen to remain adherents to their traditional faiths.

While expressing a wide variety of theologies and mythologies, ethnoreligions tend to have a primary concern with power. They developed in situations in which the struggle for basic survival was a constant concern and lacked the contemporary tools that have been supplied by science and technology. They had to deal with disease, natural calamities, and limited resources while seeking means to predict, control, and overcome them. At the same time, they shared the common human experiences of spirit being; heightened states of consciousness; and moments of success, transcendence, and empowerment.

Both their physical environment and inner experience provided the elements from which a worldview would be constructed. That worldview would integrate the totality of existence from the mundane to the transcendent, and it would be developed in such a manner that modern distinctions such as sacred and secular or religious and nonreligious would not exist. Given the holistic nature of many ethnoreligions, some have argued that it is improper to think of the group as having a religion at all, suggesting instead that spirituality pervades their life. One can, however, provide some overview of ethnoreligions based upon a religious analysis.

Most ethnoreligions include reference to a pantheon of deities, usually headed by a being that is seen as a first deity who directly creates or is the source of lesser deities, the created world, and humanity. The account of the world of this deity is told in stories (which together constitute a myth), which account for the origins of the group and the land they inhabit. The primal deity is often remote and inaccessible, and hence any relationships are with the myriad gods and goddesses. The world is also usually seen as alive, as the abode of gods or spirits or itself possessed of spiritual power, or both. Usually introduced into the worldview is a place for ancestors. Many origin stories include accounts of the first humans and make a place for the memory of honored group heroes and the immediate ancestors of living individuals. One of the factors by which ethnoreligions may be distinguished is the relative emphasis placed on deities, various spirits, and the group's ancestors. Each is seen as a source of power, some of good power to be accessed and some of evil power to be avoided or countered.

Most ethnoreligions provide a variety of means to relate to the larger cosmos and the sources of power. The most common means is magic, the utilization of various techniques believed to be the means of manipulating spiritual power. A variety of forms of magic have been distinguished and a variety of names (witchcraft, sorcery, wizardry) applied to them. One generally thinks of magic being invoked when specific mundane goals are being sought, such as the manipulation of weather, the curing of a disease, or the fecundity of a harvest. The life of groups also embodies elements of worship, actions aimed at building positive relationships with the deities, the spirit world, and the ancestors. Some rituals will often combine elements of both magic and worship.

Different primal societies also have a spectrum of religious practitioners, most of whose jobs have elements of secular occupations. The most well known of such practitioners are the shamans, recognized for their abilities to be in direct contact with the spirit world, and the priests, who function as ceremonial leaders in the annual cycle of rituals and otherwise enforce communal rules. The priestly role often overlaps with political leadership. Some groups may have healers, who are repositories of the group's wisdom on alleviating sickness. Oracles and divines are people who have an ability to offer supernatural guidance about a situation or discern the future. Mediums are people especially able to contact spirits. The various functions of magic and worship are merged and divided in numerous ways in different societies, with practitioners combining their "spiritual" roles in very diverse ways with more mundane occupations.

Ethnoreligions rarely have an abstract ethics, there being little time or motivation for the speculative arts, though the groups will have some rules that dictate actions and others that delineate forbidden actions. Researchers in Polynesia encountered the idea of taboo: objects, actions, and even people who were considered dangerous (and hence to be avoided) due to some characteristic—ritual uncleanness, past negative occurrences associated with them, or possession of negative spiritual power. An analogous idea appears to be inherent in many primal cultures. Among the most common taboos are those relating to childbirth, menstruating women, or the bodies of the deceased.

The Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament) includes many stories of the conflict of Judaism with neighboring polytheistic ethnoreligions. The rise of Christianity to power in Europe came as it replaced the numerous ethnoreligions that had preceded it across the continent. The Arab-Islamic Empire that spread from the Indus Valley to Morocco, while relatively tolerant of Christian and Jews, saw “polytheists” as major subjects for conversion. Through the succeeding centuries, as Christianity and Islam became global religions, their progress was often at the expense of ethnoreligions, which have been increasingly on the defensive in the modern world.

In spite of the political and scientific power aligned with the major world religions, primal religions have survived, and in places ethnoreligionists have assumed the offensive in preserving their traditional life. In this task, they have been assisted by contemporary ideas of cultural relativity, and they have drawn on those ideas to charge Christian and Muslim missionaries with a form of cultural totalitarianism. Christians, in particular, have been associated with the evils of European colonialism, and ethnoreligionists have reasserted themselves in the now independent former colonies. Ethnoreligions remain a significant factor in the religious life of most African countries south of the Sahara and in Asia, in such countries as South Korea, Laos, Malaysia, and Mongolia, among others.

The interface of ethnoreligions with European colonial authorities and with Islamic and Christian missionaries has in many places led to the emergence of modern movements that draw on traditional religious themes and rituals, but attempt to respond to the pressures applied by the colonial and postcolonial situation. Among the more famous would be the Native American Church, a movement that spread among Native Americans early in the 20th century. It was but one example of a series of such movements that had emerged at various times through the 19th century as the United States expanded across North America. Most of these, such as the Ghost Dance movement, were suppressed by the authorities. Equally well known are the so-called cargo cults that emerged in the South Pacific following World War II.

In Africa, a number of new spirit possession movements, in which contact with the deities is made as participants go into a trancelike state and allow spirit to speak and act through them, appeared throughout the 20th century. Most began as local cults, but some subsequently spread to a variety of different groups across national boundaries. Another type of group was the Mchape (medicine) movement that arose in what is now Malawi in the 1930s, with a concentration on eradicating malevolent magic. It later spread to Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia, and Mozambique. The new traditionalist movements in Africa fit into a spectrum of new religions, which include groups that present a complex mixture of Christian and traditionalist themes such as the African Initiated Churches.

Thousands of ethnoreligions still exist, and only a representative sample could be included in this encyclopedia; these few, however, illustrate both the wide variety and common themes found in primal society worldwide.

As a result of slavery, many Africans were transported to the Americas. In Brazil and the Caribbean Islands especially, new forms of African ethnoreligions emerged in dialogue with Roman Catholicism. Often seen as syntheses of the two faiths, the Afro-Caribbean and Afro-Brazilian faiths have increasingly been seen as surviving African religions with a veneer of Catholicism.

During the 20th century, citizens of developed nations have turned their attention to ancient ethnoreligions and created new religions that attempt to recover religions lost for centuries. Most are known only through archaeological and anthropological reconstructions, or through the writings of representatives of faiths that replaced them. Most noticeable of the revivalist neo-religions are various forms of European Paganism. Attempts to refound Paganism began early in the 20th century, but did not take off until Gerald B. Gardner (1884–1964) founded the neo-religion of Witchcraft, or Wicca. As Gardnerian Wicca spread from England to North America, it inspired further neo-Pagan groups, including a revived Druidism, and provided a legitimation for a modern form of polytheism built around worship of a prime female deity, Goddess Spirituality. In the 1990s, the fall of the Soviet Union became the occasion of a new assertion of national tradition in Northern Europe by those who have revived Pagan traditions in the Baltic nations (Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia) and Poland. (Romuva, Clan of Ausrans, Rodzima Wiara).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Aboriginal Religions; African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Traditional Religions; Clan of Ausrans; Dogon Religion; Gardnerian Wicca; Goddess Spirituality; Judaism; Lakota, The; Maori Religion; Native American Church; Navaho, The; Nepal, Indigenous Religions in; Palo Mayombe; Possession; Rodzima Wiara (Poland); Romuva. Santeria; Shinto; Sikhism; Umbanda; Vodou; Wiccan Religion; Yoruban Religion/Spirituality; Zulu Religion.

References

- Adegbola, E. A. Ade, ed. Traditional Religion in West Africa. Nairobi: Uzima Press, 1983.
- Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press, 1986.
- Alpers, Anthony. Maori Myths and Tribal Legends. Auckland, NZ: Longman, 1966.
- Bastide, Roger. The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of Interpretation of Civilizations. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- Beier, Ulli. The Origin of Life and Death: African Creation Myth. London: Heinemann, 1966.
- Blakely, T. D., E. A. Walter, and L. T. Dennis, eds. Religion in Africa: Experience and Expression. London: Heinemann, 1994.
- Brandon, George. Santeria from Africa to the New World: The Dead Sell Memories. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.
- Collins, John James. Native American Religions: A Geographical Survey. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991.
- Eliade, Mircea. Shamanism: Archaic Technique of Ecstasy. New York: Pantheon, 1964.
- Haynes, Douglas. Micronesian Religion and Lore. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1995.
- Hultkrantz, Ake. Native Religions of North America. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987.
- Isizoh, Chidi Denis. "Bibliography on African Traditional Religion." www.afrikaworld.net/afrel/atr_bibliography.htm. Accessed January 15, 2002.
- Murphy, Joseph M. Working the Spirit: Ceremonies of the African Diaspora. Boston: Beacon Press, 1994.
- Olupona, Jacob, ed. African Spirituality: Forms, Meanings and Expressions. New York: Crossroad, 2000.
- Olupona, Jacob, ed. African Traditional Religion in Contemporary Society. New York: Continuum, 1990.
- Sullivan, Lawrence E., ed. Native American Religions: North America. New York: Macmillan, 1989.
- Sullivan, Lawrence E., ed., Native Religions and Cultures of North America: Anthropology of the Sacred. New York: Continuum, 2000.
- Smart, Ninian. The Religious Experience of Mankind. New York: Macmillan, 1984.
- Swain, Tony. Interpreting Aboriginal Religion: An Historical Account. Special Studies in Religion 5. South Australia: Flinders University, 1985.
- Swain, Tony, and Garry Trompf. The Religions of Oceania. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Turner, Harold W. Bibliography of New Religious Movements in Primal Societies. 2 vols. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977, 1979.
- Turner, Harold W. Religious Innovation in Africa. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980.
- Walker, Barbara. The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983.

European Buddhist Union

The European Buddhist Union (EBU) is an international umbrella organization of Buddhist communities, centers, and organizations as well as national unions. The EBU is not affiliated with a particular Buddhist tradition or school. According to its constitution, adopted in 1990 and renewed in 2004, the aims are to promote fellowship and cooperation among Buddhist organizations in Europe and to encourage meetings and friendly relations between their members. The EBU works to support and promote the growth and public recognition of Buddhism in Europe.

The EBU was founded in Paris in 1975. It is headed by a board consisting of a president, two vice presidents, and a treasurer. EBU's first president was French Paul Arnold (r. 1975–1983), followed by British Arthur Burton-Stibbon (r. 1983–1989), and also British Stephen Hodge (r. 1989–1991), Dutch Aad Verboom (r. 1991–1995), and French Lama Denys Teundroup (r. 1995–1998). The current president is Frans Goetghebeur, Belgium. The number of member organizations has grown steadily since the EBU's beginning, with about 30 members from 11 countries in 1991, and 46 members from 14 European countries in 2009.

Apart from national unions from Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and Switzerland, members are also Buddhist centers or organizations working on a Europe-wide basis, such as the Friends of the Western Buddhist Order, Dzogchen Community Europe, some Zen and Shin Buddhist groups, the Tibetan Center Hamburg, the Amida Trust (United Kingdom), and the Nalanda Association (Spain). Organizations of Buddhists who have immigrated from Asia (for example, Vietnamese, Cambodian, or Laotian Buddhists) or of Nichiren traditions are not members of the EBU. Thus, the EBU is almost exclusively a representational organization of convert Buddhists, although some migrant Buddhist organizations are affiliated with national unions. The EBU estimates the number of Buddhists in Europe to be between one to four million people. In view of scholarly studies, a much lower figure of around one million Buddhists is, however, more likely.

EBU delegates meet annually at varying Buddhist centers. The main public event of the EBU is the EBU international congress, held every five years (with modifications). Congresses have taken place in Paris (1979, 1988, 2000), Turin (1984), and Berlin (1992). The meetings are aimed at bringing about both a dialogue between Buddhists of the various traditions and a stocktaking of the state of affairs of Buddhism in Europe. During such conferences, visited by up to 1,000 people, notable speakers elaborate on the theme of the congress, be it the public recognition of Buddhism in Europe, educational issues, or the dynamic of the plurality and diversity of Buddhism in Europe. Also, annual meetings take place, synchronizing these every second year with a meeting of Buddhist teachers active in Europe.

The EBU has no permanent headquarters, due to its restricted financial resources and its less strong organizational efforts. Its offices are thus moved in accordance with the current president. For many years it has been acknowledged as a United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) nongovernmental organization (category C) and has been approached by the European Parliament and UNESCO on issues regarding the freedom of religious practice. In 2008, the EBU officially obtained participatory status with the Council of Europe.

Martin Baumann

See also: Tibetan Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Baumann, Martin. "Buddhism in Europe: Past, Present, Prospects." In Westwards Dharma: Buddhism beyond Asia, edited by Charles S. Prebish and Martin Baumann, 85–105. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Einheit in der Vielfalt-Buddhismus in Europa*. Munich: Deutsche Buddhistische Union, 1994.
- European Buddhist Union. <http://www.e-b-u.org>.

Evangelical Baptist Church in Angola

The Evangelical Baptist Church in Angola is the most prominent of several churches of the Baptist tradition working in Angola. The church traces its origins to the launching of work by British missionaries of the Baptist Mission Society. During the last years of colonial rule in Angola, many Baptists moved into exile in the neighboring Democratic Republic of the Congo (1961–1974). Returning after independence was declared, members of the mission organized in 1977 as an autonomous body.

The church continues the faith and practice of the parent Mission Society. All the local churches are represented in the general assembly, the highest legislative body for the church.

In 2006, the church reported 80,000 members, but its influence extends far beyond its formal membership. More than 200,000 children, for example, attend its Sunday school classes. The church oversees a variety of social and self-help programs. Ministers are trained at its seminary in Luanda. Women are accepted into the ordained ministry. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches (2005) and the Baptist World Alliance.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy

The Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy (UCEBI) is the largest Italian Baptist body.

The first Baptist mission in Italy was established in Bologna in 1863 and was known as the Gospel Mission to the Italians. Its lifespan was short. A more permanent institution, however, was the Spezia Mission for Italy and the Levant, which was founded in 1866 in La Spezia by English pastor Edward Clarke (1820–1912). Later, both an English and an American mission (the latter affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention) were established in Rome. In 1884, the two missions joined forces together with the Spezia Mission in a federation called Unione Cristiana Apostolica Battista (Christian Apostolic Baptist Union). In 1922, the British Mission left Italy and entrusted its members to the Southern Baptists, while the Spezia Mission maintained an autonomous presence under the leadership of Harry Herbert Pullen (1862–1951). A notable Baptist intellectual of the early 20th century was Giuseppe Gangale (1898–1978). In 1954, the Spezia Mission was reorganized and renamed Associazione Missionaria Evangelica Italiana (Italian Evangelical Mission Association). It merged in 1966 with the Unione Cristiana Evangelica Battista d'Italia (UCEBI; Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy), historically derived from the Southern Baptist Mission, but independent and in fact more liberal than its U.S. counterpart, thus inducing the more conservative Italian Baptists to establish a separate Assemblea Evangelica Battista Italiana (AEBI; Italian Evangelical Baptist Assembly). In the first decade of the 21st century a strong movement of independent Reformed Baptist churches has also developed independently of UCEBI. The Italian Reformed Baptists regard themselves as heirs of the Calvinistic theology of the particular Baptists in the tradition of John Bunyan (1626–1688), Roger Williams (1603–1683), William Carey (1761–1834), and Charles Spurgeon (1834–1892).

UCEBI now comprises more than 150 churches (not all of them Baptist), with some 50 male and female pastors, 5,000 adult members, and a “population” (including children and irregular attendees) of 25,000. On March 29, 1993, UCEBI entered into a concordat (“Intesa”) with the Italian government, which theoretically would have entitled it to share in the national church tax. However, the UCEBI has so far elected not to receive its rightful portion of the tax because of its theological principles about the separation of church and state. The concordat preserves the UCEBI’s congregationalist identity, whereby it regards itself as a loose federation of independent churches, despite the fact that in 1990 it adopted a Confession of Faith, which insists on adult baptism and separation of church and state. In 1977, UCEBI joined the World Council of Churches and, in 1990, it signed a protocol for the reciprocal recognition of ministers with the Waldensian and Methodist Union, notwithstanding their differences on infant baptism (clearly spelled out in the protocol).

UCEBI

Piazza San Lorenzo in Lucina 35
00186 Rome

Italy

<http://www.ucebi.it>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Carey, William; Southern Baptist Convention; World Council of Churches.

References

Maselli, Domenico. Storia dei battisti italiani (1873–1923). Turin: Claudiana, 2003.

Sanfilippo, Paolo. Commento alla confessione di fede dell'U.C.E.B.I. Rome:UCEBI, 1992.

Scaramuccia, F. Un'avventura di fede. L'Opera missionaria di Edward Clarke (1820–1912). Claudiana: Torino, 1999.

Scaramuccia, Franco, and Renato Maiocchi. L'Intesa battista: un'identità rispettata. Claudiana: Torino, 1994.

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists Around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.

Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya

The Evangelical Christian Church of Irian Jaya (GKI Irja: Gereja Kristen Injili di Irian Jaya) began with the arrival of two independent German carpenters who were supported as missionaries by an independent faith mission in Holland. They settled in northeastern Irian Jaya, a province of Indonesia, in what is known as the Bird's Head in 1855, accompanied by several native Christians from the Moluccan Islands. They had little success, a fact that has been attributed to their extremely low opinion of the culture.

The progress of the mission changed visibly in 1907, when suddenly Christianity spread and many joined the church. Over the next few years the church spread throughout the northern half of the island (the Dutch authorities had given the southern half to the Roman Catholic Church). A teacher training school was opened at Meiji, at which indigenous leadership was trained. However, the Japanese invasion caught the mission unprepared. No indigenous pastors had been ordained, and no pan-congregational structure had been created. The move to formally organize the church was picked up after the war. In 1950 the first Indonesian pastors were ordained, and in 1965 the first synod met. Irian Jaya was incorporated into Indonesia in 1963, at which time the missionaries turned the church over to the local leadership and left the country.

Since it became independent, the church has had to face a variety of problems. The population has changed radically, as different peoples have moved into the area following economic development. The church faces competition with the spread of Roman Catholicism and Islam in its established territory in the north. The church itself has begun to spread into the south of Irian Jaya.

The church is organized on a presbyterian model, with a synod as the highest legislative body. It accepts the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standard. The church has developed an extensive educational system that includes the Sekolah Tinggi Theologia I. S. Kijne (named for the leader of its original training school).

In the 1990s the church reported 650,000 members in 1,869 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and was until recently a member of the World Council of Churches. It is a partner church with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

Evangelical Christian Church in Irian Jaya
PO Box 1160
Jalan Argapura No. 21
Jayapura 99222 Irian Jaya
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Evangelical Church in Chile

See Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile.

Evangelical Church in Germany

The Evangelical Church in Germany inherits the history of the Christianity that was introduced into Germany possibly as early as the second century. Three bishoprics were erected in the third century, and over the next centuries Roman Catholicism became the dominant religion. The whole of present-day Germany was included in the Holy Roman Empire, whose emergence is generally dated to the coronation of Charlemagne in 800. By the 16th century, the empire consisted of a number of more or less autonomous countries, principalities, and city-states.

In the 1520s, Martin Luther, a monk and professor at the University of Wittenberg in Saxony, challenged the theological trends of his day and a variety of practices he felt had entered the Roman Catholic Church illegitimately. These trends and practices, he believed, contradicted the teachings of the Bible, which he insisted centered upon the message of the free salvation God offered to believers. The new movement he began championed the ideas of the final authority of the Bible (over and against the authority of tradition and the teaching office of the papacy) and of salvation by faith, apart from any good works performed by humans. These emphases and their implications were embodied in the Augsburg Confession (1530) and a catechism that Luther had authored the year before. These two documents more than any others define the Lutheran tradition.

The religious wars that broke out between Lutherans and Roman Catholics as Luther's ideas spread were brought to a halt in 1555 by the Peace of Augsburg. The treaty signed at that time articulated a principle that was to have far-reaching effects throughout Germany. Both Lutherans and Catholics would exist in the Holy Roman Empire, and the ruler of each principality would decide which church would dominate in his or her land (a principle often expressed, in Latin, as cuius region, eius religio, whose region, his religion). In Lutheran lands, the prince assumed the power formerly held by the bishop. The situation was complicated in the ensuing decades as the Reformed tradition (the form of Protestantism developed by John Calvin in Geneva, Switzerland) spread through Germany, and some princes accepted it. Lutherans issued the Formula of Concord (1577) to distinguish the Lutheran faith from the Reformed variation.

Among the more important of the Lutheran principalities was Prussia. In 1613, the ruler adopted the Reformed faith. Although the population remained Lutheran, a number of Reformed congregations came into being, with the approval of the country's leadership. This development attracted French Huguenots to Prussia to escape the hostile environment in their homeland. In 1817, King Frederick William I (r. 1797–1840) forced a merger of the Lutheran and Reformed churches into what became known as the Evangelical Church of Germany. Though there was one national church organization, local congregations and individual ministers were allowed to choose either the Lutheran or the Reformed faith. Both the Augsburg Confession and the Helvetic Confession (the latter a statement of the Reformed faith) were accepted as official statements of faith, and pastors could choose either Luther's Small Catechism or the Heidelberg Catechism as a tool to instruct the youth. In other lands, similar evangelical churches came into existence. In Baden and the Palatinate, a new catechism that combined Lutheran and Reformed emphases was introduced.

Stiftskirche, an Evangelical Collegiate church in Stuttgart, Germany. (iStockPhoto.com)

During the course of the 19th century, the many smaller German states were unified into modern Germany, though the border changed frequently as different wars were fought and won or lost. As the country was united, the larger of the former independent German countries became states in the new nation. Each state continued the church that had previously evolved within its boundaries. The various churches existed along a spectrum from those that were predominantly Lutheran to those that were evangelical or United (combining Lutheran and Reformed elements) to those that were predominantly Reformed. Predominantly Lutheran churches were found in Saxony and Bavaria, while the Reformed perspective dominated in Lippe. In Saxony, where the evangelical church had originated, one group of Lutheran separated from the state church as a confessional Lutheran body.

Attempts to bring some unity to this chaotic situation were focused in various gatherings of the territorial churches throughout the 19th century. Then in 1918, church and state was separated, and the Protestant princes handed the episcopal authority they had heretofore held to the church. The church's synods received that authority. They became self-governing churches just in time to experience the era of inflation, economic depression, the rise of National Socialism, and World War II. Each of the territorial churches, one in each of the German states, adopted a new constitution, and continued their relationship with the state to the extent that they still received state money for their maintenance.

In 1922 the German Evangelical Church Federation was formed. It built upon the theological work and relationships of the 19th century. It assumed a basically Lutheran perspective but allowed room for the Reformed minority. Also operating among the churches was the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference, formed in 1868. It worked on building relationships with Lutherans in other lands and led directly to the calling of the Lutheran World Convention in 1923.

The rise of Nazism split the church between those who supported the aims of the state and those opposed to what they saw as an evil government. Pro-government supporters forced the organization of the German Evangelical Church in 1933. The church became the battleground for the two factions, and the battle lasted until suppressed by the war. The war ended with Germany divided into two parts.

The surviving leadership of the anti-Nazi Confessing Church emerged in 1945 to lead in the formation of a new inclusive Protestant church, the Evangelical Church of Germany (Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland [EKD]). The same forces that led to the formation of the Lutheran World Convention led to participation in the formation of the Lutheran World Federation in 1948. The federation had as its immediate task the rebuilding of Europe. That same year, the predominantly Lutheran churches in Germany also founded the United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany (VELKD) as a fellowship within the EKD.

Both the EKD and the VELKD included the churches in the two sections into which Germany had been divided, which later became the Federal Republic of (West) Germany and the (East) German Democratic Republic. This attempt to preserve a church that reflected a united Germany proved untenable as the Cold War developed. In 1968 the EKD divided, and the VELKD followed suit the next year. That divided condition remained until the unification of Germany in 1990. The present Evangelical Church in Germany was brought together following the country's reunion.

The Evangelical Church in Germany now consists of 24 autonomous churches, one each in the different states of the German nation. Each church is allowed a considerable variation theologically and administratively and is responsible for the spiritual life of the people in its area. The Evangelical Church in Germany is a cooperative structure through which the churches carry out a variety of functions, including their relationship to various interdenominational ecumenical agencies like the World Council of Churches. Individual churches have also chosen to be members of the Lutheran World Federation or the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The highest legislative body in the EKD is its synod, which meets annually. The synod is headed by a seven-person governing board, the Presidium. The synod considers matters of common concern to the churches. It initiates programs through its nine permanent committees: Scripture and Proclamation of the Gospel; Social Services, Mission and Ecumenical Relations; Legal Affairs; Church, Society, and State; Education and Young People; Europe; the Environment; Budget; and Nominations.

The churches that now make up the EKD have experienced various movements concerned with theological revival and personal spirituality over the centuries. In the 19th century, the churches were profoundly affected by the world Protestant mission movement, which had actually begun in Germany among the Moravians. In response a number of missionary societies were formed, drawing their support from the members of one or more of the churches. Prominent among those based in the more Lutheran churches were the Leipzig, the Gossmer, and the North German Missionary societies. Societies drawing primarily from United churches included the Berlin, the Rhenish, and the Basel Missionary societies. The latter, as its name implied, also drew heavily from Swiss Reformed churches. These societies carried German Protestantism around the world and in some places perpetuated the internal differences that existed in the German church.

In 2005 the EKD reported 26 million members.

Evangelical Church in Germany
Herrenhauser Str. 12
Postfach 21 02 20
D-30402, Hanover
Germany
<http://www.ekd.de>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Rhenish Mission; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church in Kalimantan

The Evangelical Church in Kalimantan (Kalimantan Evangelical Church, Gereja Kalimantan Evangelis [GKE]) originated in 1935 with the arrival of missionaries from the Rhenish Mission (a German missionary society with roots in both Lutheranism and the Reformed tradition) to begin work among the Dayak people in Kalimantan, a province in the central region of the island of Borneo. In 1838 they formally opened stations among the Dayak, Ngaju, and Maanyan peoples. The people expressed little interest in Christianity, and the local religious leaders were openly hostile to the missionaries. They also resented the attempt of colonial Dutch authorities to establish hegemony in the area. In the 1859 revolt against the Dutch, the mission was seen as part of the Dutch rule and destroyed. The missionaries left the area and relocated on the island of Nias (thus initiating work there).

The mission was re-established once order was restored but continued to make only modest gains for the rest of the century. It was estimated that between 1866 and 1900, only 2,000 Dayak people joined the new religion. In 1920, the Rhenish Mission turned over its work to the Swiss-based Basel Mission. The work began to make progress over the next 15 years, and in 1935 the first Dayak ministers were ordained and the church formally established as an autonomous body. It was given a presbyterial order and adopted the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standards. Among the new ministers was the son of a Dayak chief, F. Dintang, who proved an effective evangelist.

The missionaries continued to serve the church, and until the arrival of the Japanese in 1942, one of the Germans headed the synod board. Church leadership became thoroughly indigenous during the war years. The church saw the peace that followed as a time for expansion and in 1950 adopted its present name a part of a self-conscious attempt to abandon its role as an exclusively Dayak church and become one serving people of all ethnic groups throughout Kalimantan, both the various traditional groups and the many immigrants who have arrived since World War II. It also joined the newly founded Indonesian Council of Churches.

In 1955 the church founded the Centre of Agricultural Training, located at Tumbang Lahang, and in 1967 the Technical High School at Mandomai. In 1987 it capped its vast educational program with the new Christian University, opened at Palangka Raya, the capital of central Kalimantan.

In 2005, the church reported 245,000 members in 1,057 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and was a founding member of the World Council of Churches

Evangelical Church in Kalimantan
PO Box 86
Jalan Jenderal Sudirman, No. 4, Rt 1
Benjarmasin-Jolly 70114 Kalimantan
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; Lutheranism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Rhenish Mission; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands

Christian missionaries began activity on New Caledonia (now the country of Kanaky in the South Pacific) in 1834. In 1841, two Samoan converts from the mission of the London Missionary Society (LMS) arrived in New Caledonia and others began work in the Loyalty Islands. They were joined by European missionaries in 1853, about the same time that the French took over control. The Roman Catholic Church missionaries had arrived two years earlier, and they received the support of the government. Nevertheless, the LMS mission grew steadily through the 19th century.

As French became the dominant language of Kanaky, the mission shifted its primary relationship from the LMS to the Paris Missionary Society (PMS) of the Reformed Church of France, beginning in 1897. Under the PMS, the mission enjoyed a particularly prosperous period, beginning in 1902 during the tenure of Maurice Leenhardt (1878–1954).

The church follows the Reformed tradition in theology and is congregational in polity. In the 20th century, it stressed its cultural identification with the Kanak people, the Melanesian group that originally inhabited the island.

The Evangelical Church became independent in 1962. During the century it developed largely indigenous leadership, and few Europeans remain on its staff. The church reports a membership of approximately 40,000 (2005) out of a population of 236,000.

Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands

8 rue F. Leriche
BP 277
Noumea
New Caledonia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of Cameroon

The Evangelical Church of Cameroon (Église évangélique du Cameroun) has its roots in the decision of the British Baptist Missionary Association to begin work in West Africa utilizing converts from among the recently freed Africans residing on Jamaica. In 1843, 42 Jamaicans joined 4 European couples in setting up a mission station on Fernando Po (now Bioko), the island that the Spanish had turned into a center of the African slave trade. Two years later, Joseph Merrick, one of the Jamaicans, moved to the coast of Cameroon and began learning the language of the Usubu people. One of the Europeans, Alfred Saker (1814–1880), moved to Cameroon Town (now Duala). He formed the first Baptist church in 1849.

The Baptist work grew until 1884, at which time Germany gained hegemony over Cameroon. The Baptists turned their work over to the Basel Mission, a Swiss missionary society that drew support from Germans and Austrians. The new workers agreed to respect the Baptist faith of the converts; nevertheless, many did not like the manner of the German missionaries or their introduction of practices such as infant baptism. A split occurred. Those who stuck with the Basel Mission experienced a new change as World War I began, when Britain and France replaced the German authorities. The Basel Mission turned its work in French territory (some 15 stations) to the Paris Missionary Society (of the Reformed Church of France). Even though the Basel Mission was allowed to return in 1925, it did not reclaim its stations from the Paris Mission. The resources of the French missionaries, however, had been significantly stretched by many new responsibilities, a fact that hastened indigenous leadership's taking over the church's management and the church gaining its autonomy even before the country became independent. The process toward independency began in 1947, and the church emerged as the fully independent Evangelical Church of Cameroon in 1957.

The Evangelical Church's life had been partly tied to that of the Union des Églises Baptistes du Cameroun, which had also come under the guidance of the Paris Mission and had also become independent, in 1947. The church and the union retain close fraternal ties and both are members of the Council of Baptist and Evangelical Churches.

In 2005 the Evangelical Church reported 2,000,000 members in its 700 churches. It is presbyterially organized and currently has 13 regional synods. A general synod is the highest legislative body. It has a theological college at Ndougué. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Church of Cameroon
BP 89
Duala
Cameroon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of Chad

The Evangelical Church of Chad grew out of the variety of Protestant and Free church missionary efforts launched in various parts of the country during the 20th century, at which time Chad was a part of French Equatorial Africa. The Canadian branch of the Sudan United Mission (SUM), an interdenominational evangelical sending agency, entered in 1925, and while developing its own work in the southwestern Province of Logone, was active in coordinating the efforts of other missionary groups. After World War II the evangelical enterprise entered a growth phase. SUM's effort was focused upon the establishment of a self-supporting church and the development of indigenous leadership among what was and remains a relatively poor land.

In 1958, the Mission franco-romande du Tchad started work in the Ouaddai region, a predominantly Muslim area in eastern Chad, with SUM support. It soon received substantial additional support from the World Evangelization Crusade (now WEC International), a British-based sending agency. In 1962, the leadership of the Sudan United Mission, the WEC, and the French Mennonites, who were also supporting work in the area, began a dialogue in light of the emergence of Chad as an independent country (1960) and the fragmented nature of the Protestant mission scene. Out of these conversations came the SUM Mission, which the government recognized in 1963. The SUM Mission evolved into the Evangelical Church of Chad.

It is a conservative Free church based upon the authority of the Bible and affirming the basic doctrines of evangelical Christianity. In the late 1990s, it reported some 200,000 members, the largest Protestant body in what is a predominantly Muslim country. It oversees several Bible schools and the École supérieure de théologie évangélique. It was an important force in establishing the Comité de Coordination des Activités Missionnaires, which continues to promote amity between the different missionary agencies operating in the country.

In the middle of the first decade of the new century, the Evangelical Church has been one among several religious groups that has suffered as the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan, with whom Chad shares a lengthy border, has spilled over. Church leaders have claimed that the Sudanese government has given support both to militia who have made raids into Chad and to Chadian rebel groups that have been allowed to establish bases in Sudan

Evangelical Church of Chad
BP 821
N'Djamena
Chad

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Free Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of

Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Evangelical Church of French Polynesia

See Maohi Protestant Church.

Evangelical Church of Gabon

The Evangelical Church of Gabon was initiated by missionaries from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the missionary agency founded by American Congregationalists early in the 19th century. Their representatives settled in what is now Gabon in 1842. A generation later, the work was passed to the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), which in turn passed its work on to the Paris Mission (the missionary arm of the Reformed Church of France) in 1892. In the late 19th century, France had asserted its hegemony over this part of Africa and in the 1890s demanded that instruction in all schools be in French.

By 1949, the Paris Mission had 8 stations and 20 missionary personnel working in Gabon. That same year the first group of African members returned from having completed their theological studies at the seminary in Cameroon. These five teachers became the first Native pastors. Their arrival also speeded the mission's transformation into an autonomous church, completed in 1961. The church was composed primarily of Fang people and was heavily female in membership.

Many churches have been disrupted because of interference or suppression by the government, but the Evangelical Church of Gabon has been troubled by internal disputes and power struggles. In 1971 the church was split into two factions, which had become visible during the close election of Nang Essono as head of the church. His unsuccessful challenger, Sima Ndong, headed the dissenting faction. The church removed the pastors supporting Ndong from their ministerial roles.

In spite of a number of attempts to settle the dispute, the schism continued for the next 20 years.

It was not until 1989 that what appeared to be a reconciliation was worked out and a single synodal council elected to office. However, in the early 1990s, troubles arose again. On several occasions the disputes led to shooting. By the middle of the 1990s, the church had split into three factions, known informally as the Baraka, the Foyer, and the Gros Bouquet. In 1997, the Baraka and Gros Bouquet factions met in a joint synod, formed a new national council, and elected a new president, Reverend Jean Noël Ogouliguendé. This church is now recognized as the Evangelical Church of Gabon.

In 2005, the church reported 205,000 members. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1961. It supports the Theological School of the African Protestant Church at Yaoundé, Cameroon.

Evangelical Church of Gabon
BP 617
Libreville
Gabon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Paris Mission; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Reformed Church of France; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria

Martin Luther's first followers in Austria can be traced as early as 1521, and until the beginning of the Thirty Years' War in 1618, Austrian Christians of the Protestant denominations in the upper classes had religious freedom. During the time of its widest spread the Evangelical Church could claim three-quarters of the Austrian population. But when the Austrian emperors Ferdinand II (1578–1637) and Ferdinand III (1608–1657) enforced some burdensome changes, following the victory of the Catholic league in the Battle of the White Mountain (1620), the fate of the Evangelical Church grew far worse. The Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation forced thousands of Protestants to either leave the country or to hide underground for more than 150 years.

Two important historical and legal changes happened in the following centuries. In 1784 Emperor Joseph II (1741–1790) issued the Patent of Tolerance, and Lutherans and Calvinists (and members of the Eastern Orthodox Church) were permitted private religious services, though they were still considered “second-class citizens.” Finally, in 1861, Protestants got the same civil rights as members of the Roman Catholic Church in the Austrian monarchy, and in 1867 religious freedom was legally acknowledged as a human right by the Fundamental Law of the State. But religious affairs, including those of the Evangelical Church, remained under the control of the government, which was traditionally dominated by Roman Catholic values. It was not until 1961 that an agreement was signed between the Republic of Austria and the Evangelical Church under which the latter gained full sovereignty and autonomy.

Presently there are about 328,000 members of the 2 bodies that together constitute the Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions, with sinking numbers during the last decades of the 20th century. The Church of the Augsburg Confession (Lutheran) now comprises 190 parishes and 7 superintendents; the Church of the Helvetic Confession (Reformed) has 9 parishes (with 10,500 persons). Worth mentioning is the existence within both churches of a small number of “mixed” parishes, following both the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions. The largest number of evangelical Christians in relation to the whole population lives in the Burgenland, an eastern part of Austria bordering Hungary, which was attached to Austria after World War I. Many adherents of the Helvetic Confession live in Vorarlberg, bordering Switzerland.

In both churches people are elected from the community for their offices; the governing body is the synod. Women have been admitted to the ministry; the first female superintendent, Gertraud Knoll, was elected in 1994 for the Burgenland. For theological studies there exists a faculty at the University of Vienna with a full curriculum leading up to the doctorate.

The Evangelical Church was a founding member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches of Austria in 1958; the Augsburg Confession also joined the Lutheran World Federation in 1947, and the Helvetic Confession is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Both Confessions are also members of the Conference of European Churches and the World Council of Churches. There are regular and active ecumenical contacts with most of the Protestant Free churches and with the Roman Catholic Church and Old Catholic Church of Austria; with the latter there has been intercommunion since 1986.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions
Severin-Schreiber-Gasse 3
A-1180 Wien
Austria
<http://www.evang.at>

Manfred Hutter

See also: Free Churches; Luther, Martin; Lutheran World Federation; Old Catholic Church of Austria; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Reingrabner, Gustav. Evangelische in Oesterreich. Vienna: Evangelischer Presseverband in Österreich, 1996.
- Reingrabner, Gustav. Protestanten in Oesterreich: Geschichte und Dokumentation. Vienna: Boehlau, 1981.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Poland

The ideas of Martin Luther (1483–1546) came to Poland as soon as Polish merchants and students brought them on their way back home from Wittenberg and Königsberg. The first evangelical (Lutheran) sermons were preached in 1518 in Gdansk and in Slask (Silesia). Already in 1523, the Wroclaw city council had nominated the first evangelical parson. The Lutheran views spread from Lower Silesia and Krakow to the area of Cieszyn and survived the Catholic Counter-Reformation during the reign of the Habsburgs to stay alive until today. In eastern Prussia, in turn, the last Great Master of the Teutonic Order, Prince Albert (1490–1568), under the personal influence of Luther, dissolved his order and then formally paid homage to the Polish king, Zygmunt the Old (aka Sigismund II, 1520–1572). Both the king and his son created favorable conditions for the Augsburg Confession in eastern Prussia. Although the Polish Parliament voted for equality of religions and religious peace in 1573, the act was condemned by the Roman Catholic Church, and the period of the Counter-Reformation started.

Later on, Austrian monarch Joseph I (1678–1711) allowed evangelicals to build six churches in Silesia, and the Edict of Toleration issued by Joseph II (1741–1790) in 1781 allowed evangelical religious life to flourish in the Cieszyn area. The immigration to Polish soil of evangelical craftsmen and farmers from the whole of Europe in the 19th century gave Lutheranism new strength. However, World War II prevented the stabilization of the church. Around 30 percent of the evangelical clergy died in concentration camps and prisons. The politics of the postwar authorities also caused a weakening of the church.

The primary structure of the church is its synod, the church's governing body, consisting of 15 clergy delegates and 390 lay representatives. The synod is elected every five years. The administrative and executive power rests with the eight-member consistory and the superintendent bishop. The consistory is based in Warsaw. Both the president of the synod and the president of the consistory are elected by a special collective electoral body. The inner affairs of the church are regulated by the Fundamental Inner Law, as accepted by the synod. The basic relationship of the church and the Republic of Poland is determined by the law enacted on May 13, 1994.

The church is currently divided into six dioceses in Poland. They are represented by their respective synods, which execute their power through the board and the bishop. There are 132 congregations that serve as worship centers for the 80,000 (as of 2006) members who reside mainly in the area of Cieszyn (Silesia), in Upper Silesia, Mazury (former East Prussia), and Warsaw. They are cared for by approximately 120 priests. The Kosciol Ewangelicko-Augsburski, to give it its Polish name, is a member of the Polish Ecumenical Council and was a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession
(Poland)
ul. Miodowa 21
00-246 Warszawa
Poland

Leslaw Borowsk

See also: Luther, Martin; Lutheranism; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Gastpar, Waldemar. Historia protestantyzmu w Polsce. Warszawa: ChAT, 1977.
- Marceli, Kosman. Protestanci w Polsce do polowy XX wieku. Wroclaw: Ossolineum, 1980.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relations. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania

The Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania derives from the spread of Lutheranism in the German-speaking areas of Transylvania in the 16th century. It shared some of its history with that of the Lutheran Church in Hungary, though existing as a separate German-speaking organization. The Lutheran movement arrived in Transylvania just as the Turkish army was establishing its control. German-speaking Transylvanians formed the Church of God of the Saxon Nation, which in 1572 officially accepted the Augsburg Confession as its confessional statement of belief. Hungarian-speaking Lutherans in Transylvania, originally a part of the Lutheran Church in Hungary, were cut off from their counterparts in Hungary with the separation of Transylvania and its incorporation into Romania after World War I. They organized the Synodal Evangelical Presbyterian Lutheran Church of the Augsburg Confession.

The “black church” of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Transylvania, Romania. (Christian Draghici/Dreamstime.com)

Transylvania was incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1691. Although Turkish rule was gone, the new government favored the Roman Catholic Church to the detriment of Protestant churches. In the mid-19th century the church adopted a new constitution (with the approval of ruling authorities in Vienna) that established a presbyterial-synodal governing system but allowed for significant congregational autonomy. The church has always been headed by a bishop. The church also oversaw a large primary and secondary school system.

The church suffered greatly during World War II and the subsequent rise of an aggressive atheist government. At the same time, many Transylvanians accepted the offer of the German government to resettle people of German heritage from Eastern Europe in Germany. With more than 100 pastors accepting this offer, the church has faced a significant leadership problem. The Romanian population also moved into the industrial centers and away from the towns where most Lutheran parishes were located. With the fall of the Ceausescu government in 1989, the church has received greater freedom to develop its life.

The church is headquartered in Sibiu. In 2005 it reported 14,543 members. In the Sibiu headquarters complex there is a school of theology for training pastors. With instruction in German, it serves as an extension school of the United Protestant Theological Institute located in Cluj, where instruction is in Hungarian. The Institute also serves Hungarian-speaking Lutheran, Reformed, and Unitarian educational needs.

The church is very ecumenically minded and is a member of the Lutheran World Federation, the World Council of Churches, and the Conference of European Churches.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania
Strada General Magheru 4
R-2400 Sibiu
Romania

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran Church in Hungary; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic

The territory constituting the present Slovak Republic, formerly a part of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, emerged as an independent country in 1993, in the wake of the destruction of the Marxist hegemony in Eastern Europe. It had existed under Hungarian rule for most of the second millennium CE. As such, it was eventually incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire. In 1921, in the wake of World War I and the collapse of the empire, the nation of Czechoslovakia was created by the merger of Slovakia with the neighboring provinces of Bohemia and Moravia, which through the centuries had been more identified with German rule.

In 1948, Czechoslovakia became a Socialist country. The government was reorganized as a federal republic in 1968, and Slovakia gained heightened autonomy as a regional government unit. With the fall of Communism, the desire for the formation of a Slovak-speaking state led to the formation of the present Slovak Republic.

Lutheranism had come into Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia during the early 16th century. The area had previously been affected by the reforming movement led by John Hus (1372–1415) and the Moravian Brethren. Although the Counter-Reformation led to a resurgent Catholicism in Bohemia and Moravia (and the almost complete suppression of Lutheranism), Lutheranism survived in strength in Slovakia. It was suppressed, but in the two decades after the Edict of Toleration of 1781, the church quickly rebounded. Parishes reappeared and more than 130 church buildings were erected. It received a new level of recognition in 1848, when it was accorded full ecclesial equality.

Until the formation of Czechoslovakia, Slovakian Lutheranism had been a part of the larger Lutheran Church in Hungary, which was controlled by a Hungarian-speaking leadership. The setting up of the new country was the occasion for establishing a separate Slovak-speaking Lutheran body. The present church continues that organization into the now independent nation of the Slovak Republic.

The church accepts the Augsburg Confession as its doctrinal standard. It has a rich liturgical life, which includes the use of the Kralice Bible (a Czech translation of 1577) and the hymnal of Wittenberg-trained pastor-poet Juraj Tranovsky (1592–1637). Ecumenically oriented, the church was a founding member of the World Council of Churches and the Ecumenical Council of Churches of the former Czechoslovakia. It is currently a member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in the Slovak Republic.

The church is organized into 14 districts and 2 dioceses, the latter each headed by a bishop. The general convention is the primary legislative body, and the administration of the national church is left in the hands of a presidium and the bishop-general. In 2005, the church reported 372,858 members. It oversees some Slovak parishes in the Czech Republic and has strong ties to Slovak-speaking Lutherans in the countries of the former Yugoslavia and Slovak-heritage congregations in the United States.

It sponsors the Slovak Theological Faculty, which trains pastors for Slovak-, Slovene-, and Polish-speaking congregations, both in the Slovak Republic and in neighboring countries. A separate Polish-speaking Lutheran church also exists in the Slovak Republic.

Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic

Palisady 46
81106 Bratislava
Slovak Republic
<http://www.ecav.sk>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheranism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the Congo

The Evangelical Church of the Congo began in 1910 when missionaries from the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden arrived in Madzia, then in French Equatorial Africa. They were soon joined by colleagues from Norway and Finland. A thriving mission resulted, and a seminary was created at Ngouedi. In 1947, a period of spiritual awakening broke out at the seminary and soon spread through the church and led to a burst of membership growth. In 1961, a year after the Congo gained its independence, the mission also became independent.

The new church followed the Pietist and evangelical teachings of its parent body. It has no creed and regards the Bible as the only source of its faith and practice. Only adult baptism is practiced. The church has a centralized government headed by a synod. The church is divided into districts, each headed by a superintendent. The church manages a number of health facilities and several schools for girls.

Service in an evangelical church, Brazzaville, Congo. (Pascal Deloche /Godong/Corbis)

The 1990s were a time of social unrest in the country and tensions within the church, many of which were based on ethnic differences. In 1997, during a civil war, much of the church's property was destroyed or looted. The church has worked for democratic government to become a reality in the Congo, one of the primary goals of the Institute for Training and Information, a joint project of the church and the Mission Covenant Church in Sweden.

In 2005 the church reported 150,000 members in 118 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Church of the Congo
BP 3205
1 rte de Djoué-Moukounizgouaka
Bacango-Brazzaville
People's Republic of the Congo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren

The Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren (Ceskokobratrská církev evangelická) emerged in 1918 through the coalescence of the former Calvinist Evangelical Church of the Helvetic Confession and the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, both of which dated to the movement of the Protestant Reformation into the Czech lands in the 16th century. Its emergence came as a result of long-term efforts of Czech Calvinists and Lutherans to unite. The unification had originally been planned for the year 1915 to honor the 500th anniversary of the martyr's death in flames of Czech religious reformer Jan Hus. However, the outbreak of World War I prevented it. After the war, the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the foundation of the new, independent, Czechoslovak Republic created space for the emergence of this new church. All the Czech congregations affiliated with the two churches joined this new church at its beginning.

The church is actively involved in the ecumenical movement: In 1927 it helped to establish the Union of Evangelical Churches in the Republic of Czechoslovakia; in 1955 it was one of the cofounders of the Ecumenical Council of Churches; and later it cooperated in the ecumenical translation of the Bible into Czech. It is also a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the World Council of Churches, and the Conference of European Churches.

One of the specific features of this church is its embracing of four confessions: the Brethren Confession (1535), the Bohemian Confession (the common confession of Evangelical Christians in the Czech countries, stemming from Hussite times and presented to the emperor Maximilian II in 1575), the Augsburg Confession (1539), and the Second Helvetic Confession (1566). However, the overall common denominator of its doctrine and practice is the Calvinism of the Helvetic Confession. Members acknowledge two sacraments: baptism and the Eucharist.

The organizational structure of this church is presbyterian. The church is divided into 13 seniorates, which are presided over by committees comprised of both ministers and laypeople. The highest body is the synod, which holds annual meetings and is comprised of elected deputies. The Synod Council, headed by a synod senior, controls the work of the church.

In 2005, the church reported 117,000 members meeting in 270 congregations.

Evangelical Church of the Czech Brethren
PO Box 466
Jungmanova 9
CZ-111 21 Praha 1
Czech Republic

Dušan Lužný

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Di Domenico, Daniel G. Religion in Secularized Culture: The Czech Experience. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 2004.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the Disciples of Christ in Argentina

The Evangelical Church of the Disciples of Christ in Argentina is the major body representing the Restoration tradition of Free church Christianity that originated with the work of Barton Stone, Alexander Campbell, and their colleagues on the American frontier in the early 19th century. Representatives of one of the three major bodies of the tradition, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), arrived in Argentina in 1906. The mission remained small, with a focus in two areas, metropolitan Buenos Aires and the Province of Chaco in the extreme northern part of the country near the border with Paraguay.

The mission became an autonomous body in 1959. In 2006 it reported 7 congregations and 700 members. Two of the Buenos Aires congregations are joint congregations with the Methodist Church. It is one of the smallest member churches of the World Council of Churches, and is also a member of the Disciples Evangelical Consultative Council. Its commitment to ecumenical activity has made it one of the most visible entities in the various Christian cooperative projects operating in Argentina.

Evangelical Church of the Disciples of Christ in Argentina
Terrada 2324
1416 Buenos Aires
Argentina

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil

The Lutheran presence in Brazil began with the movement of the Portuguese royal family to Brazil during the Napoleonic era. During his stay in Brazil, the king devised a plan to introduce European-style farming into the southern part of the country. He recruited farmers from the Catholic section of Switzerland, but unable to fill his needs, he turned to Germany. Most who accepted the offer of a new life in Brazil came from the poorer areas of the Rhine River Valley in the Palatinate. The first group arrived in 1823 and settled at Nova Friburgo, northeast of Rio de Janeiro. Subsequent settlers were located farther south in Rio Grande do Sul. In all some 5,000 people migrated, and included among them were a few German Lutheran pastors. The first church was organized in 1824.

The church overcame a number of obstacles during its first generation. It always had a shortage of pastors, a problem only remedied when several of the German mission societies became involved in the 1860s. Some settlements became victims of imposters. In mid-century, the Jesuits entered the area, and their vigorous pro-Catholic work soured what had been good relations between Lutherans and Roman Catholics. Nevertheless, immigration continued, and eventually four separate Lutheran synods emerged, serving communities in different parts of the country. The Synod of Rio Grande do Sul was formed in the south in 1886. Then came the Lutheran Synod (1901), the Synod of Santa Catarina and Parana (1911), and the Middle Brazilian Synod (1912).

The new century brought a new set of obstacles, not the least being the arrival of missionaries from the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod who, rejecting the theological latitude in the evangelical church, which included those of the Reformed tradition, took members away from the church to found a conservative, exclusively Lutheran, rival church. World War I brought pressures for the German-speaking communities to drop their German language, only to be followed in the 1930s by the attractiveness of National Socialism and Adolf Hitler. Then in 1938, the Brazilian government nationalized all the foreign-language school.

On a more positive note, in 1922, steps had been taken to start theological education in Brazil, a must if the churches were ever to free themselves from dependence on the home country. World War II led to the arrest of some pastors and speeded the transition to Portuguese. In 1946 the founding of the Faculdade de Teologia (now the Escola Superior de Teologia) became an important event uniting the four synods. They united in a federation just two years later and under that loose organization joined the World Council of Churches in 1950 and the Lutheran World Federation in 1952. The church is a charter member of the National Council of Churches in Brazil. It adopted its present name in 1954. At the time it was the largest non-Catholic body in Brazil, though that is no longer the case.

The new Evangelical Church moved to improve its ecumenical ties, especially with a long-term program of contacts with the Roman Catholic Church. It has also supported the continued improvement of its educational facilities and encouraged faculty members and pastors to pursue further education in Germany.

Although no longer the largest Protestant body in Brazil, it is by far the largest Lutheran Church body in South America. In the 2005, it reported 715,959 members. It experienced a membership boost as Lutherans from Europe moved to Brazil after World War II. The church is led by a general assembly that meets biennially, and the administration is in the hands of a church council. Its 1,812 congregations are divided among 18 synods.

Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession
Rua Señor dos Passos 202, 5 andar
Caixa postal 2876
90001-970 Porto Alegre, RS
Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jesuits; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Church of the River Plate

Lutheranism in Argentina began among German immigrants in Buenos Aires in the years after the country gained independence (in 1816). German Protestants initially gathered in the Anglican Church, but in 1842 petitioned the Evangelical Mission Society in Bremen, Germany, for a pastor. August Ludwig Siegel arrived the following year. It took the members a decade to raise the funds and construct their own building, which was dedicated in 1853. Meanwhile, immigration increased, especially after the unrest in 1848 encouraged many to leave Europe. Others were lured by a scheme to populate Argentina's interior. Some also settled in nearby Uruguay, and ties developed with similar congregations in Brazil, Paraguay, and Chile. In the 1890s a pastor was sent to travel a preaching circuit among the German Lutheran congregations across the southern half of South America, and in 1900 an association, the German Lutheran La Plata Synod, held its first meeting.

For the next three decades, the pastor of the Buenos Aires congregation also served as the president of the synod, but in 1932 a dean was appointed from Germany to take the burdens of the synod's office from the pastor. The church continued to grow, especially in the years after World War II, when many Germans moved to South America. It became independent of the Evangelical Church in Germany in 1956, and for the next generation church leaders pushed members to become more integrated into South American society. The success of their efforts was manifest in 1980, when the first Argentinean-born pastor, Rodolfo Reinach, was elected the synod's president.

Today the church continues to serve the descendants of German and Swiss immigrants, and as adaptation has occurred, Spanish services have superseded German-language worship. Gradually, the majority of pastors have also come from among men trained at the Instituto Superior Evangélico de Estudios Teológicos, a Protestant seminary supported by several denominations in Buenos Aires.

The church has been a leader in ecumenical efforts. It is a member of the Argentine Federation of Evangelical Churches and the Latin American Council of Churches. It helped to form the Lutheran Council of the River Plate, which includes the three larger Lutheran bodies in Argentina, as well as a number of independent churches and smaller associations. It is one of four Argentinian churches to sign the Leuenberg Agreement, which has led to pulpit and table fellowship with the other signing churches, namely, the Presbyterian Church of Argentina, Reformed Churches in Argentina, and the Evangelical Congregational Church. It is also a member of the World Council of Churches and the Lutheran World Federation.

The church is headquartered in Buenos Aires. It includes congregations in Paraguay and Uruguay in its membership, last reported in 2005 at 25,000.

Although largely Lutheran, the church has adopted a position as a "United Protestant" church, meaning that it follows a program initiated in Germany of uniting Lutheran and Reformed churches into a single organization and reconciling what are considered minor differences. It is estimated that approximately 10 percent of the members are from the Reformed tradition.

Evangelical Church of the River Plate
Sucre 2855, piso 3
C1428 DVY Buenos Aires
Argentina

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church in Germany; Latin American Council of Churches; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; World Council of Churches

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Church of the West Indies

The Evangelical Church of the West Indies grew out of the work of a team of independent evangelical Christian missionaries in Cuba in 1928. The work was initiated by Elmer Thompson (b. 1901) and his wife Evelyn McElheran (b. 1905), who were soon joined by Bartholomew Lavastida (1890–1994), a Cuban national, and Isabel Junco, a Spanish woman converted by Lavastida. They opened a Bible school in which the students were quickly engaged in evangelistic endeavor. Prior to Fidel Castro's coming to power, the work had formed more than 100 congregations, and the school had trained some 400 evangelists.

In 1936 the group decided to establish work in the Dominican Republic. Alexander Mersdorf, a missionary who had joined the original team, stopped at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on the way to his destination, and he was immediately asked by some Haitians to provide some training to a small group of Christians who had great zeal but had never been instructed in the Christian life. They lacked a Bible in their language and were desirous of a minister. He placed the need before the mission in Cuba, and they responded to it and postponed their thrust into the Dominican Republic. The opening of the mission in Haiti occasioned the team's adoption of a name, the West Indies Mission. The work in Haiti eventually became the Evangelical Mission of South Haiti.

The work subsequently spread to the Dominican Republic (1939), Jamaica (1945), and Guadeloupe (1947). Then in 1949, the Mission began a thrust into a number of the small English-speaking islands of the Eastern Caribbean—St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Grenada (the Windward Islands), and Trinidad and Tobago. Over the years, this effort matured and was eventually set apart as an autonomous church, the Evangelical Church of the West Indies (ECWI).

In St. Lucia there are 10 churches, all led by St. Lucian pastors, with a total membership of 1,000. The Mission first entered St. Vincent in 1952 when missionaries began witnessing in small coastal towns. Today there are 10 churches dotting the island with a membership of 650. In Grenada, the 5 churches have a total membership of approximately 250. The ministry on Trinidad was started in 1951 by Lloyd Cross and Dave Whitmore. They focused on the north coast, where they perceived a lack of Christian presence. There are now 18 ECWI churches scattered from Blanchisseuse in the north to Siparia in the south, including all the key towns of the island, with a combined membership of approximately 1,500.

Along the way the West Indies Mission became WorldTeam and continued to expand the number of countries in which it had work. It opened work in South America in 1955 and in Europe in 1970. Then, in 1995, WorldTeam merged with the British-based RBMU (Regions Beyond Missionary Union) International to form World Team (1431 Stuchert Rd., Warrington, PA 18976), and has continued to open new fields of operation.

The Evangelical Church of the West Indies has continued to work in close relationship with World Team. In 1990 it welcomed a new openness toward religion shown by the Castro regime in Cuba and has once again begun to grow, by forming of cell groups in different towns, many towns having been without a church since the rise of the Castro regime.

The church is headed by its president. Each island nation has its own structure, headed by a national moderator and national superintendent. A General Council meets biennially. In 1998 that council authorized the church's own missionary sending agency, which adopted a mission in French Guinea as its first responsibility.

Evangelical Church of the West Indies
Box 143
Old Montrose, Kingstown
St. Vincent

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Mission of South Haiti.

Reference

"About World Team: A History of World Team 1928–1995." <http://www.worldteam.org/about/wthist.htm>. Accessed November 1, 2000.

Evangelical Church of West Africa

The Evangelical Church of West Africa is the result of the missionary initiative of the Sudan Interior Mission, an independent evangelical missionary society founded in 1893 in the United States. In 1935 it sent missionaries into the Borno Province of Nigeria, who established a station at Kukar Gadu near the Bauchi Province border. This area is predominantly Muslim, but the missionaries targeted four communities of non-Muslims for attention, the Kare-Kare, Bade, Ngamo, and Ngizim peoples. They first had significant success from a station in Gashua among the Bade people opened in 1938.

They successively opened stations in Gadaka among the Ngamo (1951) and in Garin Maje as an outpost among the Ngizim (1952). In 1954 the several churches that had been created were united as the Association of Evangelical Churches in West Africa. The church had spectacular success, primarily in the northeast of the country. In the 1990s it reported 2,200,000 members, and it is the largest of the several churches of the Reformed tradition operating in Nigeria.

The Evangelical Church of West Africa has retained a conservative theological stance, which it teaches through its 15 Bible training school, 3 theological colleges, and 2 seminaries. It is organized congregationally. The congregations are grouped into 18 districts. There is a general council to oversee the church's denominational endeavors, which include extensive medical and educational facilities. The church is a member of the World Evangelical Alliance.

Evangelical Church of West Africa
PO Box 63
Jos, Plateau State
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelicalism; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; World Evangelical Alliance.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Evangelical Churches of Vietnam

The Evangelical Churches of Vietnam (Hoi Thánh Tin Lành), one of the few Christian religious communities operating in Vietnam, began in 1911 after missionaries of the Christian and Missionary Alliance (from the United States) obtained permission from the French colonial government to pursue evangelistic work in Da Nang. Very early, several influential members of the community identified with the church, and it grew rapidly. Local leadership developed, and it was granted autonomy as the Evangelical Churches of Vietnam in 1927. The government recognized it in 1929 and lifted restrictions on its work. It quickly expanded among various ethnic groups, especially the Radey and Kobo peoples. A Bible and Theological Training Institute was opened at Nhatrang and later others at Dalat and Ban Me Thot. The church developed with a congregational polity, and there is no national synod.

The end of French colonialism, the division of Vietnam into two countries, and the years of the Vietnam War created significant changes in the church. Following the withdrawal of the French, many church members moved into the southern half of the country. However, the work in the north, including the Bible school at Nhatrang, continued to operate throughout the years of the Vietnam War. In 1972, church leaders in the north made contact with the National Council of Churches in the United States, at which time they expressed criticism of the American role in the war. The following year they made contact with the World Council of Churches, which initiated aid to rebuild the church following the close of the war.

The final fall of South Vietnam and the withdrawal of American forces were accompanied by the immigration of many church leaders and pastors. In the 1980s, some American Vietnamese converts returned to Vietnam to start new congregations and revive the church. By the end of the 1990s, there were more than 1,000 congregations and some 400 Christian pastors working with the evangelical churches. Some 40 congregations were to be found in Ho Chi Minh City and its immediate environs.

During the first decade of the new century, the evangelical churches were granted official recognition and were allowed to register two congregational associations in the north and south regions of the country as the Southern Evangelical Church of Vietnam (SECV or ECVN-S) and Evangelical Church of Vietnam North (ECVN), two of the four Protestant churches that have been granted such recognition. Problems persist in the registration of local congregations. The official government count on membership of all Protestant churches is 610,000 (2007) though unofficially Protestant spokespersons claim as many as 1.6 million.

The evangelical churches may be contacted through the Evangelical Church in Vietnam-Hoahung, 625 Cach mang thang 8 P.15 Q.10, 155 Tran Hung Dao Q.1, Hochiminh City, SouthEast 84-8, Vietnam. This congregation has an Internet presence at <http://www.netministries.org/see/churches.exe/ch26215>.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian and Missionary Alliance; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile

The Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile derives from missionary work begun by American Presbyterians in Egypt in 1854. Unable by law to proselytize among Muslims, they found their converts from people raised as members of the Coptic Orthodox Tewahedo Church. The church built its program around evangelism, charitable activity (hospitals and schools), and Bible study groups using an Arabic Bible. By the turn of the century, four presbyteries had been founded, and work spread into the Sudan.

Through the 20th century, the Evangelical Church has spread to other North African and Middle Eastern countries, primarily from the immigration of its members responding to job offers. In 1967 it became an autonomous body and the following year fully independent, though it retains a working relationship with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). It presently has seven presbyteries united by the Synod of the Nile, the highest legislative body in the church.

In 2005 the church reported 250,000 members, though attendance at its 315 churches indicates a significantly larger constituency that for various reasons maintains official religious membership elsewhere. The church sponsors a theological seminary in Cairo. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and since 1963 of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile
PO Box 1248
Cairo
Egypt

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Coptic Orthodox Church; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Sharkey, Heather J. American Evangelicals in Egypt: Missionary Encounters in an Age of Empire. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2008.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Confederation of Latin America

The Evangelical Confederation of Latin America (Confraternidad Evangélica Latinoamericana [CONELA]) was officially organized in Panama City, Panama, in April 1982, led by a group of conservative evangelical leaders who were active in the Lausanne Movement for World Evangelization. The organization of CONELA was supported and financed mainly by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA), the Luis Palau Evangelistic Association (LPEA, founded in 1967), and other organizations. Palau is a well known and popular Argentine evangelist who previously worked with the BGEA in crusade evangelism in many Latin American and Caribbean countries during the 1960s and 1970s. CONELA is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance (WEA).

Evangelist Luis Palau preaches in Bolivia during a three-city campaign, 1995. (AP Photo/Gary S. Chapman)

Participating in the organizational meeting in Panama were delegates from 84 conservative evangelical denominations representing 4.2 million church members, according to official reports. Also participating were representatives of 64 para-church agencies, with media organizations comprising the largest number along with organizations specializing in mass evangelism.

However, absent from this event were representatives of the more fundamentalist denominations and service agencies that were not interested in joining anything interdenominational or ecumenical, which would be considered a betrayal of their basic principles.

In addition, according to David Stoll, the CONELA leadership wanted to keep out of the new organization those defined as “ecumenical Protestants” and those evangelicals who desired to remain in dialogue with the former, including members of the Latin American Theological Fraternity (FTL) who participated in the ecumenical Conference on Mission and Evangelism, held in Melbourne, Australia, in May 1980, sponsored by the World Council of Churches (WCC).

In part, according to Stoll, the creation of CONELA was a reaction against the formation of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI, Concilio Latinoamericano de Iglesias), which was initially established in 1978 in Oaxtepec, Mexico, by Latin American “ecumenical Protestants” whose denominations and service agencies were affiliated with the WCC. The defined purpose of CLAI was to promote evangelism as well as social change through its members, which initially included about 100 denominations and service agencies in Latin America. Since its inception CLAI has depended on WCC funding and technical assistance for its operation.

However, according to the Reverend Norberto Saracco, a Pentecostal leader from Buenos Aires and a member of the Lausanne Coordinating Committee, the birth of CONELA took place as a reaction against presentations by “ecumenical Protestants” at CLADE II (Congreso Latino-americano de Evangelización [Latin American Congress on Evangelization]) in Huampaní, Peru, regarding the politicization of the gospel in the Latin American context by supporters of Liberation Theology. CLADE I (Bogotá, Colombia, in 1969), CLADE II (Huampaní, Peru, in 1979), CLADE III (Quito, Ecuador, in 1992), and CLADE IV (at Seminario Sudamericano (SEMISUD), Quito, Ecuador in 2000) were sponsored by the FTL, which represents the progressive wing of evangelicals in Latin America (Saracco 2009).

In order to increase its membership and representation internationally, CONELA leaders targeted conservative denominational, national and female leaders; representatives of evangelical alliances, councils, pastors’ associations, and fellowships; directors of service agencies; representatives of international mission organizations; and pastors of local churches in each Latin American country. The principal motivational factor for organizing national chapters of CONELA in each country or for attracting existing evangelical alliances, councils, and fellowships to become affiliated with CONELA was to build bridges “in the spirit of the Lausanne Congress on World Evangelism,” inspired and united by the Lausanne Covenant as a modern, worldwide multinational, and multi-ethnic expression of evangelical faith. The initial Lausanne event in 1974 was convoked by a committee headed by well-known evangelist Billy Graham and drew more than 2,300 evangelical leaders from 150 countries. Lausanne I introduced the term “unreached people groups,” hailed as one of the milestone events in contemporary missiology. In contradistinction to those calling for a moratorium on foreign missions, such as many WCC leaders, the idea of unreached people groups pointed toward thousands of groups that remained without a single Christian witness.

In May 1980, approximately 650 worldwide “ecumenical Protestant” church leaders participated in the WCC-sponsored event in Melbourne, called the Tenth World Conference on Mission and Evangelism, which used the theme “Your Kingdom Come” to explore the place of the poor in the church’s worldwide mission. Liberation Theology had an especially strong influence on the conference discussions, with a focus on questions of power connecting the work of the church with the need to end political and economic oppression around the world. The conference also highlighted how the life and work of Jesus Christ exemplified Christian solidarity with the poor.

In June 1980, the Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization sponsored a Consultation on World Evangelization (COWE), held in Pattaya, Thailand, which gathered almost 900 evangelicals from around the world to consider strategic issues of reaching the unreached for Jesus Christ. Among the participants was a small group of Latin American evangelical leaders who held a private meeting to discuss the possibility of creating a CONELA-type organization to further the vision and goals of the Lausanne movement throughout Latin America among conservative evangelicals.

Lausanne II was held in Manila, Philippines, in July 1989 on the theme, “Proclaim Christ until He Comes: Calling the Whole Church to Take the Whole Gospel to the Whole World.” This event was significant in its representation: 4,300 in attendance from 173 countries, including the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and with a larger proportion of women, laypersons, and younger leaders than at previous Lausanne-sponsored conferences. A large group of Latin American church leaders participated in this event, which was an important networking opportunity between leaders of different countries. The Manila Congress played a significant role in a movement that stands for completing the task of world evangelization, for cooperation in that cause, and for networking between evangelical leaders in that task.

The congresses and consultations sponsored by the Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization were instrumental in strengthening support among participating Latin American evangelical church leaders for their involvement in CONELA as a vehicle for carrying out the Lausanne mandate. CONELA members helped to establish evangelical fellowships, alliances, and councils in their respective countries in the “spirit of Lausanne.”

In the mid-1980s, the leadership of CONELA summoned evangelical leaders to a meeting in Mexico City for the purpose of organizing the first Ibero-American Missionary Congress to discuss issues related to the Lausanne mandate of urgently taking the gospel of Christ to people in every tongue, tribe, people, and nation (that is, ethno-linguistic “people groups”) who have not yet heard the “good news” of salvation proclaimed by Jesus of Nazareth. In response, steps were taken to plan, organize, and promote the first Ibero-American Missionary Congress, which was held in November 1987 in Sao Paulo, Brazil. About 3,300 people from 35 countries registered as participants in the Congress. The emphasis at the event was raising awareness as well as training and mobilizing Latin Americans as missionaries to the yet unreached “people groups” around the world, beginning with crosscultural and transcultural evangelization and church planting in every country of Latin America and the Iberian Peninsula (Spain and Portugal) and from there to the rest of the world.

The major outcome of the Ibero-American Missionary Congress was the establishment of Ibero-American Missionary Cooperation (COMIBAM, Cooperación Misionera Iberoamericana). Since its establishment, COMIBAM has produced a substantial amount of literature about transcultural missions and has organized several missionary congresses and conferences at the national, regional, and continental levels, particularly in Latin America. COMIBAM-affiliated organizations have recruited, trained, and sent out hundreds of Latin Americans as missionaries among targeted “unreached people groups” in many nations, with an emphasis on the 10/40 Window, a concept defined by the Reverend Luis Bush of Argentina. The 10/40 Window is an area of the world that contains the largest population of non-Christians. The area extends from 10 degrees to 40 degrees north of the equator, and stretches from North Africa across to China. This 10/40 focus is on finishing the call of scripture to reach every tribe and nation and thus to plant the church of Jesus Christ among all people groups. Bush led COMIBAM during its initial phase (1985–1986) and later served as the international director of the AD2000 and Beyond Movement from 1989 to 2001.

The CONELA Constitutional Assembly was held in Panama City, Panama, in April 1982, followed by the I General Assembly in Maracaibo, Venezuela (April 1986); the II General Assembly in Acapulco, Mexico (April 1990); the III General Assembly in 1994; the IV General Assembly in Miami, Florida (June 2001); the V General Assembly in Panama City, Panama (May 2004); and the VI General Assembly in Bogotá, Colombia (April 2007).

The current president of CONELA is the Reverend Ricardo A. Luna Miño (an Ecuadoran), who took office in April 2007 at the VI General Assembly in Bogotá, Colombia, which also marked the 25th anniversary of CONELA. Previously he served as the Latin America director of the ministry Open Doors with Brother Andrew. Later, he founded Oasis Life International and is the current Latin America director for Book of Hope International (OneHope), with headquarters in Miami, Florida.

Mr. Ricardo A. Luna, President of CONELA
Latin America Director of OneHope
600 SW 3rd Street
Pompano, FL 33060
<http://www.onehope.net>

Clifton L. Holland

See also: AD2000 and Beyond Movement; Latin American Council of Churches; Lausanne Movement; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- “COMIBAM.” In Evangelical Dictionary of World Missions, edited by Moreau, A. Scott, Harold Netland, and Charles Van Engen, 211–212. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 2000.
- CONELA. www.conela.com.
- Holland, Clifton L. Personal conversations and correspondence with Virgilio Zapata, Galo Vásquez, Luis Bush, Luis Palau, David Howard and Ricardo Luna regarding CONELA and COMIBAM, 1980–2009.

Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.
<http://www.lausanne.org>.

Luna, Ricardo. "La Nueva CONELA." <http://transform-world.net/newsletters/2008/08/CONELA.pdf>.

Saracco, Norberto. "El origen y desarrollo de CONELA" (The origin and development of CONELA). Address in the chapel of the Evangelical University of the Americas (UNELA), San José, Costa Rica, August 10, 2009, sponsored by the Costa Rican Chapter of the Latin American Theological Fraternity.

Stoll, David. "The Evangelical Awakening in Latin America." Chapter 5 in Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola

The Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola (Igreja Evangelica Congregacional em Angola) dates to the arrival of representatives of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (now the Global Ministries Board of the United Church of Christ) in 1880. The mission, originally opened at Sailundo among the Ovimbundu people, grew very slowly. They were joined by Canadian Congregationalists (now a constituent part of the United Church of Canada) in 1886. As World War I began in 1914, they had gathered only 300 members; however, they experienced a growth phase in the 1920s and 1930s.

The mission has been greatly affected by the changes that came with the ending of colonial rule in Angola. In 1951 Portugal signaled its desire to retain control in Angola by making it an overseas province of Portugal. However, with independence coming to some of its African neighbors, Angola broke into civil war in 1960. In 1961, suspecting the missionaries of supporting the insurgents, the government began systematically denying visa renewals. The number of missionaries dropped significantly. In 1967, the United Church of Christ and the United Church of Canada withdrew the remaining non-Angolan personnel as a protest against the Portuguese policies in Angola.

In the meantime, in 1957, the two Congregationalist missions had united as the Evangelical Church of Central Angola. However, as the missionaries withdrew, the church itself divided, one part of it going into the underground with the rebels. After independence in 1975, the other faction established itself as the Evangelical Congregational Church in the People's Republic of Angola. The two groups remained in contact, and over the two decades after independence worked toward reunion. That was accomplished in 1996.

In 2005 the Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola reported 950,000 members. It was a founding member of the Council of Christian Churches in Angola and since 1985 of the World Council of Churches. The church had developed one of its earliest centers at Dondi, where they founded a seminary and a publication center. Today, ministers are trained at an ecumenical Protestant seminary at Huambo. The church is noted for its extensive medical facilities, the best in the country.

Evangelical Congregational Church in Angola
 Avenida Cmdte Gika 3-46
 PO 1552
 Luanda
 Angola

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; United Church of Canada; United Church of Christ; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Covenant Church

The Evangelical Covenant Church has its roots in the same revival of piety and spirituality in Sweden that led to the formation of the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden. Through the 1850s and 1860s, people who had been affected by the revival migrated to the United States. Most affiliated with Lutheran congregations and attempted to carry on their Pietist quest. However, as in Sweden, they found life in the Lutheran churches too confining, and in the 1870s they began to form their own churches. In 1873 the first synod, the Swedish Lutheran Mission Synod, was organized. A second synod, the Swedish Lutheran Ansgarius Synod, was created in 1884. The next year, the two synods merged to form the Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America. The church went through several name changes in the 20th century to emerge as the Evangelical Covenant Church.

Although operating out of the central Western Christian doctrinal tradition, the church is non-creedal and accepts the Bible as the only perfect rule of faith and practice. Its non-creedal position emphasizes the role of the Christian life over that of theological speculation. In 1981, the church backed the publication of an important theological volume, Covenant Affirmations, issued as a means of clarifying the church's perspective. It emphasized the centrality of the Bible, the necessity of the new birth, the church as the gathered community of believers, the conscious dependence of the believer on Christ, and the reality of the free life in Christ. Unlike the Baptists, the church practices infant baptism.

The church is organized congregationally, and there is an annual assembly of representatives of the congregations where business affecting the whole covenant is carried out. The church developed an extensive mission program early in the 20th century, and retains a partnership relationship with former mission churches in South America, Asia, continental Europe, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In 2006 it reported 114,283 members in the United States and 1,384 members in Canada. It has joined with other churches that came out of the same Free church impulse in Europe in the 19th century and the former mission churches to create the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches. It has been a member of the World Council of Churches but has in recent years withdrawn.

Evangelical Covenant Church
5101 N. Francisco Ave.
Chicago, IL 60625
<http://www.covchurch.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches; Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; World Council of Churches.

References

- Anderson, W. D. B. The Covenant Church in Canada, 1904–1994: A Time to Remember. Winnipeg: Evangelical Covenant Church of Canada, 1995.
- Matson, P., E. B. Larsson, and W. D. Thornbloom, eds. Covenant Frontiers. Chicago: Board of Mission, Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America, 1941.
- Olsson, Karl A. A Family of Faith. Chicago: Covenant Press, 1975.
- Olsson, Karl A. Into One Body . . . By the Cross. Chicago: Covenant Press, 1985.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Free Church of America

The Evangelical Free Church of America grew out of the 19th-century Free church revival that swept through Europe and had a special focus in Sweden, where it led to the formation of the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden. Many who had been inspired by the revival immigrated to the United States, where in the 1870s they began to form independent congregations. Some of these congregations joined together in 1873 to form the Swedish Lutheran Mission Synod. However, some congregations, prizing their freedom, rejected any involvement in a synod. They preferred a loose association of congregations. Such an association was formed at Boone, Iowa, in 1884 as the Swedish Evangelical Free Church.

At about the same time, immigrants from Norway and Denmark, where the Swedish revival had spread, also began to organize congregations in America. In 1889, a periodical, Evangelisten, appeared to promote their fellowship. An initial organization appeared two years later as the Western Evangelical Free Church Association, followed a few months later by an Eastern association. These two associations merged in 1909 to form the Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Free Church Association.

In 1950, the Swedish and Norwegian-Danish churches united as the Evangelical Free Church of America. By this time, the new church had become identified with the emerging evangelical movement, which had grown out of the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy of the 1920s. Their position was in contrast to the Evangelical Covenant Church, the other American body that had grown out of the same Swedish revival, which had identified itself with the more liberal Protestant churches and the contemporary ecumenical movement. One sign of the direction of the Evangelical Free Church was its adoption of a confession of faith that emphasized the essential affirmations of the Protestant Reformation, the Bible as the inspired word of God, and the premillennial imminent Second Coming of Christ.

In 2008, the church adopted a new statement of faith that retained its conservative theological perspective and reflected its adherence to the Princeton Theology that emphasized Biblical inerrancy: "As the verbally inspired Word of God, the Bible is without error in the original writings, the complete revelation of His will for salvation, and the ultimate authority by which every realm of human knowledge and endeavor should be judged. Therefore, it is to be believed in all that it teaches, obeyed in all that it requires, and trusted in all that it promises."

In 2006 the Evangelical Free Church reported 130,000 members in the United States and 8,400 in Canada. The church is organized congregationally, and a national annual meeting of congregational representatives oversees the cooperative endeavors of the fellowship. High among these endeavors is a mission program that supports personnel across continental Europe, in Latin America and Asia, and in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Many of the former missions of the church have in the last generation become auto-nous sister churches. The church also supports a college, a university, and a theological seminary in the United States and a spectrum of medical, educational, and social service institutions overseas. The church is a member of the National Association of Evangelicals through which it relates to the World Evangelical Alliance.

Evangelical Free Church of America
901 East 78th Street
Minneapolis, MN 55420
<http://www.efca.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Covenant Church; Evangelicalism; Fundamentalism; Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Forstrom, Jim. A Living Legacy: Evangelical Free Church of America—A Pictorial History. St. Louis, MO: G. Bradley Pub., 2002.
- Norton, W. Wilbert, et al. The Diamond Jubilee Story. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1959.
- Olson, Arnold Theodore. Believers Only. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1956.
- Olson, Arnold Theodore. This We Believe. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1961.

Evangelical Church of French Polynesia

See Maohi Protestant Church.

Evangelical Friends International

Evangelical Friends International (EFI) was founded in 1965 as a networking association for four autonomous Quaker groups that represented the most conservative wing of the Friends movement. Each had been deeply affected by the Wesleyan Holiness movement in the 19th century and had come to exist in the space between the two communities. The Evangelical Friends

Alliance, Eastern Division, was founded in 1813 as the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends and was one of the original Friends groups influenced by the preaching of Joseph John Gurney (1788–1847), a Quaker preacher deeply influenced by Methodist Holiness teachings.

The Kansas Yearly Meeting was formed in 1872 and in 1900 affiliated with the Five Years Meeting (now the Friends United Meeting). However, through the early 20th century its members were influenced by Holiness teachings, and in 1937 it withdrew from the Five Years Meeting. By this time it had established its first missionary program in the part of the Congo now known as Burundi. In the 1970s it changed its name to the Mid-America Yearly Meeting.

In the late 19th century, Friends began to move into the Willamette Valley in Oregon. In 1893 they dropped their affiliation with the Iowa Friends and formed the independent Oregon Yearly Meeting. In 1902, they too affiliated with the Five Years Meeting and like the Kansas Meeting withdrew after being influenced by Holiness ideas. The Oregon Meeting has been active in education and has established George Fox College in Newberg, Oregon. It later assumed the name Northwest Yearly Meeting.

In 1957 Friends in Colorado withdrew from the Nebraska Yearly Meeting (affiliated with the Five Years Meeting) and formed the Rocky Mountain Yearly Meeting. They did not keep their former affiliation with the Five Years Meeting. Rather, in 1965 they joined with the three other conservative Friends Meetings in the Evangelical Friends Alliance. Over the years that association took on the trappings of a denominational structure. The change of name to Evangelical Friends International in 1990 was a recognition of the change that had taken place.

In 2006, Evangelical Friends International North American Region reported an inclusive membership of 39,569 in 283 churches. It supports two colleges, one university, and a graduate school of theology. It carries out missionary work in Burundi, Mexico, Rwanda, Taiwan, Peru, Bolivia, and India. The Evangelical Friends Alliance, Eastern Division, is a member of the Christian Holiness Partnership, though Evangelical Friends International is not. Evangelical Friends International is a member of the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

Evangelical Friends International

No central headquarters. For information, contact:

Dr. John P. Williams

Regional Director for North America

5350 Broadmoor Circle, NW

Canton, OH 44709

<http://www.evangelical-friends.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Holiness Partnership; Friends United Meeting; Friends/Quakers; Holiness Movement; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

The Association of Evangelical Friends: A Story of Quaker Renewal in the Twentieth Century.

Newberg, OR: Barclay Press, 1975.

DeVol, Charles E. Focus on Friends. Canton, OH:

Missionary Board of the Evangelical Friends Church—Eastern Division, 1982.

The Story of Friends in the Northwest. Newberg, OR:

Barclay Press, n.d.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America is one of the two primary bodies continuing the Lutheran tradition in the United States. Formed in 1988, it stands in direct continuity with the earliest Lutheran organizations in America, formed in the 18th century, but is also the product of a series of mergers that occurred through the 20th century that saw more than 100 separate Lutheran churches merge into a single ecclesiastical unit.

Lutherans came to the United States from the different countries of northern Europe and through the 19th century spread out across the vast frontier then opening to settlement. As groups settled in different areas, churches were formed and synods established. Each synod typically served a single language group in a relatively limited area. A minority of synods represented variant trends in Lutheranism toward a more conservative doctrinal approach or an emphasis upon piety and the religious life. The earliest mergers tended to bring those of the smaller synods together that were of like language or national heritage.

First English Evangelical Lutheran Church in Baltimore, Maryland. (Gaja Snover/StockphotoPro)

As Americanization proceeded, mergers across the boundaries of national heritage became feasible. Numerous German Lutherans were among the 17th-century immigrants to the American colonies. These settlers formed the backbone of the earliest synods, the Philadelphia Ministerium (1748) and New York Ministerium (1786). The Philadelphia Ministerium, part of the New Ministerium, and the North Carolina Synod had merged in 1820 to form the General Synod of the Lutheran Church. Similar mergers in other parts of the country led to the formation of the General Synod of the South and the General Council. These three groups merged in 1918 to form the United Lutheran Church in America, the largest Lutheran body in America through the mid-20th century. This body included most of the German American Lutherans.

In 1962, the United Lutheran Church in America created a multiethnic church by its merger with the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church (Soumi Synod), the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church (of Swedish heritage), and the American Evangelical Lutheran Church (of Danish heritage). Their union created the Lutheran Church in America.

In 1930, a group of German American synods in the middle of the United States—the Ohio, Buffalo, Texas, and Iowa synods—united to form the American Lutheran Church. In 1960 the American Lutheran Church merged with the United Evangelical Lutheran Church, itself the product of a merger of Danish American churches and the Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Norwegian background. The new church retained the name American Lutheran Church.

Through the 1970s the American Lutheran Church and the Lutheran Church in America were the two largest Lutheran bodies in the United States. They also formed the more liberal and ecumenically oriented wing of American Lutheranism, in contrast to the more conservative, confessionally strict, churches such as the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod and the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod. The two churches entered into merger negotiation soon after they were organized. In the meantime, a controversy had developed within the Missouri Synod, in which a number of professors at the synod’s main seminary in suburban St. Louis, Missouri, were accused of straying from strict orthodox doctrinal standards. The controversy brought the more liberal pastors and members to the scholars’ defense. The controversy resulted in the more liberal group leaving the Missouri Synod and forming the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches.

The Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches was invited into the union meetings of the Lutheran Church in America and the American Lutheran Church. The effort of the three groups culminated in their merger as the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, a merger that became effective on January 1, 1988. The new church established its headquarters in Chicago. In 2006 it reported an inclusive membership of 4,774,203 members. The church is headed by its presiding bishop, currently the Reverend Mark S. Hanson (b. 1946). Hanson is also the president of the Lutheran World Federation. The church is divided into 65 synods, each of which is in turn headed by a bishop. The work of the church at the national level is channeled through a number of national boards and agencies. The church supports a number of colleges, universities, and seminaries, reflective of a rich intellectual heritage.

The church accepts the Bible and the Augsburg Confession as its standards of doctrine; it has, however, adopted a contemporary theological approach to doctrinal issues that draws from a variety of theological currents that emerged in the 19th and 20th centuries. The church is ecumenically oriented and a member of both the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches. In 1997, the church voted intercommunion with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), the United Church of Christ, and the Reformed Church in America. In 2001 intercommunion was established with the Episcopal Church. In 2005, the church approved an interim Eucharistic sharing agreement with the United Methodist Church that is expected to evolve into full intercommunion.

Some of the Lutheran churches that are now constituent parts of the Evangelical Lutheran Church were active in missions, often in cooperation with the missionary sending agencies of the various Lutheran churches in continental Europe. Already by the time of the 1988 merger, most of these missionary efforts had evolved into independent churches. The Evangelical Lutheran Church retains a partnership relationship with many of these churches and continues to supply significant financial support to some of them in the poorer countries. The church also supports congregations across Europe that serve English-speaking expatriates. In 1967 and 1986, respectively, the American Lutheran Church and the Lutheran Church in America released their affiliated Canadian parishes. These parishes eventually merged to form the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
8765 Higgins Rd.
Chicago, IL 60631
<http://www.elca.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Episcopal Church; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Reformed Church in America; United Church of Christ; United Methodist Church; Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod; World Council of Churches.

References

- Almen, Lowell G. One Great Cloud of Witnesses!: You and Your Congregation in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress Publishers, 2006.
- Chilstrom, Herbert W. Foundations for the Future. Minneapolis, MN: Publishing House of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, 1988.
- Nelson, E. Clifford. The Lutherans in North America. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1980.
- Nichol, Todd W. All Those Lutherans. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1986.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada

Lutherans are those who trace their roots to the 16th-century reforms initiated by the German Reformer Martin Luther (1483–1546). Behind many of these reforms was Luther's belief in the necessity of justification by grace through faith alone, as well as his conviction that only holy scripture has authority in matters of belief.

The first Lutheran congregation in Canada was established in Halifax in 1752. The location of churches originally depended on the pattern of German immigration. Support for the churches came primarily from their affiliations with American Lutheran groups. Early churches tended to be in rural Nova Scotia, Ontario, and the prairies. Since World War II, the largest concentrations of Lutherans are found in Kitchener–Waterloo, Winnipeg, and Edmonton.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada (ELCIC) is one of the two main Lutheran denominations in Canada (the other is the Lutheran Church–Canada). In 1986, the ELCIC was formed from the merger of two Lutheran denominations, the Lutheran

An Evangelical Lutheran church in Canada. (Frederic Sune/Dreamstime.com)

Church of America and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada. The ELCIC has its head office in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and is comprised of five synods, with each synod presided over by a bishop. Membership is numbered around 200,000. In July 2001 the ELCIC entered into full communion with the Anglican Church of Canada. This allows for the free exchange of members and clergy, although both denominations remain distinct church bodies. The ELCIC is a member of the Canadian Council of Churches, the Lutheran World Federation, and the World Council of Churches. Its denominational periodicals are entitled Canada Lutheran and Esprit.

The ELCIC uses the term “evangelical” in the way it was used in the 16th century, not necessarily in the way many use it today. Services are primary in English. The ELCIC is a “confessional” church, subscribing to the beliefs of the Reformers expressed in the confessions contained in the Book of Concord. Two sacraments are practiced in the church: baptism and holy Communion. Infant baptism is practiced, with the hope that confirmation will occur at a later date, after the child has been nurtured in the faith. Holy Communion is often celebrated every week, presided over by an ordained minister, and is usually open to all baptized Christians. The ELCIC ordains both men and women and seeks to be active in the promotion of ethical and social issues in Canada and abroad.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada
302-393 Portage Ave.
Winnipeg, Manitoba R3B 3H6
Canada
<http://www.elcic.ca>

Gordon L. Heath

See also: Anglican Church of Canada; Luther, Martin; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Cronmiller, Carl. R. A History of the Lutheran Church in Canada. Toronto: Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada, 1961.
- Pfrimmer, David. “A Lutheran Witness in Canadian Society.” In Church and Canadian Culture, edited by Robert E. VanderVennen. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.
- Ward, Kenn. This Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ours. Winfield, BC: Wood Lake Books, 1994.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile continues the spread of Lutheranism in Chile that began with the arrival of German-speaking people in the 19th century. An early center was in the southern part of the country near the towns of Valdivia and Osomo, and as early as 1852 two pastors arrived to form and lead congregations. About the same time, a professor of botany at the University of Chile began to organize Lutherans in the Santiago area and recruit pastors from Germany. They were allowed to meet only in private locations, religious freedom not yet being a part of Chilean life. He was assisted by the Gustav-Adolf-Werk, an organization established to assist Lutherans residing in predominantly Roman Catholic lands.

Pastors were obtained from several of the Lutheran bodies in Germany via Argentina, and they were considered part of a mission of the Evangelical Church in Germany. A synod was formed in 1904. It operated in an informal manner until 1937, when the German Evangelical Lutheran Church was formally organized. The church joined the Lutheran World Federation in 1955 and four years later adopted a new constitution and assumed their present name. The program of the church also shifted significantly away from preserving German heritage to Chileanization. The increasing use of Spanish in worship was accelerated by a cooperative program with American Lutherans that aimed at missionary work among the urban poor and the rural indigenous population.

The church ran into major internal problems following the fall of the Allende regime. Pastors tended to be more attuned to the needs of those least supportive of the new government, while many of the laypeople were staunchly conservative. The expulsion from the country of Helmut Frenz, who had headed an ecumenical commission caring for political refugees, became the occasion for a split in the church. Eight of 12 congregations left; some became independent, and some founded the Lutheran Church in Chile. In the 1980s, most Lutherans joined a Council of Lutheran Churches in Chile to work toward reunion, but such a union has not yet occurred.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile was left with only 2,000 members at the time of the disruption of 1975 and has added only a few hundred more in the ensuing decades. In 2005 it reported 3,000 members. Most of its 13 congregations and work are in the Santiago metropolitan area. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

The church is led by its president and the synod, the highest legislative body among the rather loosely associated congregations. It continues a program of cooperation with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and has attempted to extend it into communities south of Santiago.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Chile
Av.

Pedro de Valdivia 3420 H depot.33
Casill 167-11
ÑuÑoa-Santiago
Chile

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church in Germany; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo (Église évangélique luthérienne au Congo) originated among a group of Christian believers in the eastern part of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (then Zaire) who had been inspired by listening to the Radio Voice of the Gospel, a Lutheran radio station that operated out of Addis Ababa in the 1960s. They expressed a desire to affiliate with the Lutheran Church and were placed in contact with representatives of the Lutheran Church in Tanzania and the Lutheran World Federation. Leaders in the Congo group were invited to receive training in Tanzania. In 1975, the first graduate from the Makumira Theological School was ordained for an initial congregation, Kalémié. The following year, the association of Lutheran churches was received into the Church of Christ in Zaire (now the Church of Christ in the Congo), the state-recognized organization for all Protestant churches. The Lutheran Church received official government recognition in 1981.

Through the 1980s, the group grew as more pastors were graduated and ordained. A general assembly was organized. As the Evangelical Lutheran Community in Zaire East, the new church joined the Lutheran World Federation in 1986 and most recently, under its new name, a name that reflects the changes that brought the Democratic Republic of the Congo into existence, has been received into membership by the World Council of Churches.

The congregations of the Lutheran Church in Congo are in the easternmost section of the country, with its primary center in Lubumbashi, on Lake Tanganyika. The church is currently led by Bishop Ngoy Kasukuti. In 2005, it reported 52,000 members. Its 96 congregations have been organized into 6 dioceses. The church has survived through the violence and war that has continued to haunt the Congo in recent decades, a primary reason for its establishing its headquarters office and contact point in neighboring Zambia.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Congo
PO Box 23294
Kitwe
Zambia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark

Beginning with the Lutheran Reformation (1536), the Evangelical Lutheran Church was for centuries the only ecclesiastical body allowed in Denmark. It superseded the Roman Catholic Church, which had been introduced into Denmark around 825 CE by a Benedictine monk named Ansgar. Following the Reformation it adopted the Augsburg Confession and aligned itself in belief and practice with the Lutheran Church in Germany.

An Evangelical Lutheran church in Ebeltøft, Denmark. (Lorna/Dreamstime.com)

Through the centuries revivals were watched carefully and sects suppressed. During this period, by the grace of the king and in the economic self-interest of the state, Jews, Calvinists, Roman Catholics, and Moravians were allowed to settle in connection with embassies or in strictly limited areas. With the abolition of the absolute state, Denmark became a constitutional monarchy (1849) that allowed freedom of expression, association, assembly, printing, and religion. Since then citizens have been entitled to freedom of worship, and their religious organizations, financing, and rites may not be touched as long as they respect the public order and morality. No one is obliged to contribute to a religion that the person concerned does not affiliate with. No one can be deprived of civil and political rights because of his or her religious conscience.

Following the establishment of the constitutional monarchy, it was not expected that the majority church should be of the same standing as other religious communities. The national church, which was then called Folkekirken, or the People's Church, had to be Evangelical Lutheran, and for the last 150 years it has been protected and supported economically by the state.

Even in the early 21st century, the sovereign must be a member of a Lutheran community. In the mid-19th century 98 percent of the population belonged to the People's Church, which still today includes about 86 percent of the population. The situation is complex; church and state resemble a divorced couple continuing to live together, with one party having the upper hand. It is a strange fusion of a religious community and public administration, with Parliament as the ruling subject of the church, the institution that supports it, and the authority that gives and withdraws competence. The state can intervene in the external and internal matters of the church. However, it has seldom meddled with the internal affairs and the People's Church is not cowed by the state.

Since 1912 the influence of laypersons has been strong, thanks to local congregational councils, and for almost a century the church has given a lopsided amount of power to the local level. Today church-state relations represent a peculiar mixture of comparatively tight centralizing state administration and extensive self-government locally. This state of affairs has indisputably strengthened the People's Church locally, but it also explains the impotence of a church that is unable to manifest itself as an independent entity in relation to the state. The church has no synod and no one, neither bishop, priest, nor any layperson, can function as the "voice of the church" in, for example, ecumenical matters.

Denmark is an old maritime nation, and colonial power and church circles have always supported the religious and cultural life of Danes abroad, just as since the 18th century they have played a major role concerning Christian mission activities all over the world. At home Lutherans for the last 30 years have had to deal with the growing influence of other—and especially new—religious movements. In 1998, 4.1 percent of the population belonged to "recognized religious communities" outside the People's Church, and among them about 120,000 from Muslim countries. Only 10.1 percent did not in 1998 belong to any religious community at all.

In 2009, the church reported 4,494,589 members. Affiliated congregations, primarily for expatriates, are found in a number of countries across Europe. The church is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark
c/o Secretary International Church Relations
Nørregade 11
DK-1165 København K
Denmark
<http://www.folkekirken.dk/> (in Danish with a link to English page)

Frands Ole Overgaard

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches of the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Bruhn, Verner. A People and Its Church: The Lutheran Church in Denmark. København: Council on Inter-Church Relations, 1994.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland

The religious landscape of Iceland has been changing rapidly in the recent years mainly due to immigration of people of other faiths. When the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland was established in the first constitution of the country in 1874, it was the only religious organization in the country. Now it is one among many, counting 80 percent of the population as members, or 252,000. Endeavoring to be faithful to the gospel, and its unique history and culture, it is open to the challenges of a multi-cultural and multi-religious society.

In the early years of the 21st century extensive strategic planning was done throughout the church, involving some 1,000 people of different walks of life. Intensified work in Christian education for young and old was called for, renovation of worship life and music, development of youth work and leadership training, and more support for families and homes in Christian formation and prayer. There was also an emphasis on reaching out to cooperate with others in contributing to the strengthening of a hospitable society.

An Evangelical Lutheran church in Budir, Iceland. (Dalibor Kantor/Dreamstime.com)

Today Iceland is a highly urbanized society with an increasing pluralism of belief. In spite of the cultural and demographic changes, the Evangelical Lutheran Church still holds a key position. Almost all of the children are baptized within their first year, around 90 percent of all 14-year-olds are confirmed, 75 percent of all marriages occur in the church, and 99 percent are buried in the church. Most children are taught evening prayers in their homes. The primary schools teach Bible stories, and children's services are an important part of the worship life of most parishes. The State Broadcasting transmits worship services every Sunday morning, and daily devotions morning and night. Recent polls show 12 percent of adults in Iceland attend church services at least once a month. But different worship services throughout the week seem to be gaining ground in the parishes.

Iceland takes pride in its culture, language, and history. The church is an integral part of that. Iceland is unique among European nations in that from the very beginning of human habitation Christianity has been present. The first people in Iceland were Celtic hermits, seeking refuge to worship Christ. Later Norse settlers drove them out. When Iceland was constituted as a republic in the year 930 it was based on the Norse religion. At the end of the 10th century Christianity had gained ground. Soon the nation was divided into two hostile camps. Thus, in the year 1000, at the Alþing (legislative assembly) held at Thingvellir, the leaders of the two groups, realizing the danger that threatened them, chose a person that everybody respected, a Norse priest and chieftain, Thorgeir of Ljósavatn, to decide which way the people should go. After a day-long contemplation of the problem, Thorgeir announced his decision: “Let it be the foundation of our law that everyone in this land shall be Christian and believe in one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.” The people bowed to his decision. Soon afterward, missionary priests from Germany, England, and Eastern Europe organized the people within the Roman Catholic Church. The first Icelandic bishop, Isleifur, was consecrated in Bremen in 1056. He established his see at Skálholt, which remained the center of Christian learning and spirituality up through the 18th century. A second diocese centered on Hólar was created in 1106.

In 1262 Iceland came under the rulership of Norway and later Denmark. The Danish church joined the Lutheran camp in 1536, and thus four years later, the Reformation of Martin Luther was established in Iceland, enforced by the Danish Crown. The king ordered the dissolving of the monasteries and confiscated much of the church’s property, as he now assumed position as the supreme head of the church. Most of the former Roman priests though continued in their parishes under the new regime and the life of the parishes went on as before. The translation of the Bible and the publication of devotional books and poetry contributed to cementing the Reformation and preserving the Icelandic language and culture.

In 1801 the two old dioceses were merged into a new single diocese with one bishop headquartered in Reykjavík. The 19th century saw the beginning of a national revival in Iceland and a movement toward political independence. The Constitution of 1874 guaranteed religious freedom but also decreed that the “Evangelical Lutheran Church is a national church and as such it is protected and supported by the State.” This provision remained in the new Constitution of the Republic of Iceland adopted in 1944. This is the only article in the Constitution that can be changed by law, but which then has to be submitted to a national referendum. Church legislation was revised at the beginning of the 20th century, at which time parish councils were established and the congregations gained the right to elect their pastors.

In the early 1900s, liberal theology was introduced in Iceland, and textual criticism of the Bible became quite influential in the newly founded Department of Theology of the University of Iceland. At the same time Spiritualist and Theosophical ideas found support in intellectual circles. Conservative leaders opposed both trends, and the ongoing conflict marred church life well into the 1960s.

On January 1, 1998, a new law redefined the relationship of the Evangelical Lutheran Church to the government. The church remains established by law, but is otherwise autonomous. The state supports the church and collects membership dues for its parishes as for all registered denominations and religious communities. Church legislation, previously the domain of the Alþing, is now handled by the Kirkjuþing (church assembly), the highest legislative authority of the church. It has 29 elected representatives, 12 clergy, and 17 laypeople, and a layperson as a president. The highest executive authority is the Church Council (Kirkjuráð) elected by the Kirkjuþing and presided over by the bishop of Iceland. The bishop’s office in the Church House is at the same time the office of the Kirkjuráð. Besides dealing with financial matters and personnel, the council also has departments of church education, and diakonia (service), church music, liturgy, and ecumenical relations.

Annually the bishop summons all the pastors and theologians of the church to the pastors’ meeting, the synod, to discuss the affairs of the church and society. The synod has a say in all matters of theology and liturgy to be decided by the bishop and Kirkjuþing. At the old episcopal sees of Skálholt and Hólar there are assistant or suffragan bishops (vígslubiskup). They assist the bishop of Iceland in pastoral matters and with him form the Bishops’ Meeting. There are 280 Lutheran parishes nationwide, with approximately 160 priests and 10 ordained deacons. Ten priests and five deacons work in specialized ministries in hospitals and other institutions, and others serve Icelandic congregations abroad. The Theological Faculty of the University of Iceland, founded in 1911, educates the clergy and deacons of the Church. Many theologians go abroad for further studies in seminaries and universities on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland is a member of the Lutheran World Federation, the Conference of European Churches, the Nordic Ecumenical Council, and the World Council of Churches. It is also a member of the Porvoo agreement between the Anglican Churches of the British Isles and the Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches. The Union of Missionary Societies of Iceland, in cooperation with the Norwegian Missionary Federation, has operated missions in China, Ethiopia, and Kenya. The Icelandic Church Aid has worked in cooperation with foreign relief and developmental agencies in development work and emergency aid in various parts of the world.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland
Bishop's Office
Laugavegur 31
IS-150 Reykjavik
Iceland
<http://www.kirkjan.is/index.shtml?english>

Karl Sigurbjörnsson

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Fell, Michael. And Some Fell into Good Soil: A History of Christianity in Iceland, New York: Peter Lang, 1998
- Sigurbjörnsson, Karl. The Church of Iceland: Past and Present. Reykjavik: Church of Iceland, 2007.
- Hjálmarsson, Jón R. History of Iceland: From the Settlement to the Present Day. Reykjavik: Iceland Review, 1993.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya is one of two Lutheran denominations in Kenya. It has a unique history and is not to be confused with the Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church.

Lutheranism came to Kenya as a result of the Italian invasion of Ethiopia. In 1936, the Italians expelled all the Protestant missionaries. Among those who left the country were the representatives of the Swedish Mission of the True Bible Friends, an independent missionary organization founded in 1911 in protest of the liberalism its members felt had arisen in the Church of Sweden. The expelled missionaries began to look for an alternative field where they could both continue their evangelism and stay in some minimal contact with their colleagues in Ethiopia. At this juncture, they made contact with some Ethiopian refugees who had escaped the Italian occupation but were having a difficult time in Kenya.

The first representatives of the True Bible Friends arrived in 1939. In the process of helping the Ethiopians, they discovered a new field for evangelism. They settled in the area east of Lake Victoria and began to evangelize the Kisii and Luo peoples. The church had immediate success, and the missionaries moved quickly to train Native leadership. By 1958, the mission was ready to become independent, and a constitution for the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya was adopted. At the same time the first candidate for the ministry, who had been trained at the Lutheran seminary in Tanzania, was ordained. Following revision of the constitution in 1963, the church was registered as an independent church in 1965.

Even though the church was brought into existence by the True Bible Friends (who continue to support it), since its formation four other Lutheran bodies have added their support. These include the Swedish Lutheran Evangelical Association in Finland; the World Mission Prayer League, based in the United States; the Lutheran Evangelical Association of Finland; and the Norwegian Lutheran Mission.

Work has concentrated among the Kisii and Luo peoples, and editions of Luther's Catechism have been produced for both languages. There is both a hymnal and New Testament in Kisii. More recently, the church has reached out to other groups, including the Pokot, the Boran, and the Samburu. The Boran's land is along Kenya's border with Ethiopia.

In 2008 the church reported 85,000 members in 8 parishes. The general assembly is the highest legislative body and administration has been placed in the hands of an executive committee. In 1978 the church established the Matongo Lutheran Theological College and Bible School. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the National Christian Council of Kenya. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1985, but has recently withdrawn from membership.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya
Nile Rd.
PO Box 54128
Nairobi
Kenya

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Sweden; Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia is the largest of several churches that have grown out of the work of the Rhenish Mission in Namibia. The effort began at the urging of the London Missionary Society, which had initially surveyed the area in 1814. However, it was 1842 before representatives of the mission arrived. Latvian-born Carl Hugo Hahn (1818–1895) established work among the Hereros people. While waiting for his first convert, he reduced the language to writing.

After his initial converts in the 1860s, he founded a Christian colony at Otjimbingwe, where he trained some lay workers who led the mission into a growth phase. The work soon outstripped the resources available from the Rhenish Mission, and Hahn found additional support from the Finnish Missionary Society, the missionary arm of the Church of Finland. The expansion of Hahn's work into the land of the Ovambo people (and later the Kawango people) was the first foreign missionary endeavor undertaken by the church. This new support required some negotiation, as the Rhenish leadership was representative of the Evangelical Church in Germany, a church that had combined Lutheran and Reformed roots. However, Hahn's work was allowed to move toward a more exclusive Lutheran identity, as the Finns required. During World War I, the Finns assumed full responsibility for the growing work, and its success has been attributed to a peculiar affinity between the people and the Finnish missionaries, more than 200 of whom had been commissioned by 1970.

An Evangelical Lutheran church in Swakopmund, Namibia. Dating from 1912, it is the second-oldest church in Namibia. (Choups/StockphotoPro)

The Finnish work included the creation of a publishing center, a hospital (opened in 1911), and an educational system, which began with a teacher-training school in 1913. The move to indigenous leadership began soon afterward, and the first Ovambo pastor was ordained in 1925. The mission became independent as the Evangelical Lutheran Ovambokawango Church in 1954. It adopted its present name in 1984.

It became a prominent part of the anti-apartheid campaign in the last decades of the 20th century, a further reflection of its widespread social concerns ministries. The church also sponsors a public library, a rehabilitation center, two hospitals, and self-help programs. Its printing press is used for church projects and is made available to the public. Future ministers and church workers are trained at the Paulinum Theological Seminary, co-sponsored with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia.

In 2005, the church reported 609,093 members. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and since 2001 of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia
c/o Bishop Kleopas Dumeni
Private Bag 2018
Ondangwa
Namibia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church in Germany; Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia; London Missionary Society; Lutheran World Federation; Rhenish Mission; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia in the 21st Century*. Windhoek, Namibia: Gamsberg Macmillan, 2000.
- Hellberg, Carl J. Mission, Colonialism, and Liberation: The Lutheran Church in Namibia, 1840–1966. Windhoek, Namibia: New Namibia Books, 1997.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Romania

The Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Romania (formerly known as the Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania) dates to the movement of the Lutheran faith into Hungary and Transylvania in the 16th century. There it found a response among both German-speaking and Hungarian-speaking peoples. These churches existed in what was then a part of the Ottoman Empire. In 1691, Transylvania was incorporated into the expanding Hapsburg Empire and existed through a period during which the government supported efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to reclaim Protestant believers. Lutherans in Transylvania were initially incorporated into the Lutheran Church in Hungary, but were separated following the transfer of Transylvania to Romania following World War I.

The Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Romania continues the Hungarian-speaking Lutheran tradition that has been present in Transylvania since the Reformation. It had experienced a revival in the 1780s following the granting of religious tolerance by the government in 1781, during which time many of its prominent buildings were erected. Following the changes after World War II, the Hungarian (and Slovak) Lutherans decided to organize separately from the German-speaking Lutherans, now within the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania.

The Hungarian church is organized on a presbyterial system with congregations organized into presbyteries. A general synod is the highest legislative body. The church is led by a bishop who is assisted by a lay president. In 2005, the church reported a membership of some 33,000 in its 39 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Lutheran World Federation. With the Unitarians and Reformed churches, it supports the United Protestant Theological Institute in Cluj at which most of its ministers are trained.

Evangelical-Lutheran Church in Romania
 Str. General Magheru 4
 RO-55018 Sibiu-Hermannstadt
 Romania

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania; Lutheran Church in Hungary; Lutheran World Federation; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa was constituted in 1975 by the merger of four previously existing Lutheran churches, which have retained some organizational continuity as dioceses in the new ecclesiastical body. The first Lutheran missionaries, representatives of the Berlin Mission, entered the Cape of Good Hope in 1834, and their work eventually spread through the colony and into the Orange Free State. In 1911 the mission was organized as two synods, one in each territory. These two synods came together to form a regional church in 1963 and subsequently joined the Lutheran World Federation.

In 1854 missionaries unable to settle in Ethiopia, as planned, came to the Transvaal. They were joined four years later by missionaries from the Berlin Mission who established work among the Bakoba people. The mission spread among different peoples and into Botswana and Lesotho. In 1962 the work in the Transvaal was constituted as the Lutheran Church–Transvaal Region and affiliated with the Lutheran World Federation.

Lutheran work in Natal began in 1844 when five missionaries from the Norwegian Missionary Society arrived. They were joined by Norse-American missionaries in 1870. The Berlin Missionary Society spread their work to the area in 1847. They opened a school at their center in Emmaus. They later expanded their work into Swaziland and in 1911 constituted the Zulu-Xhosa-Swazi Synod. In 1857 the Hermannsburg Missionary Society added their strength to the growing work and opened a school to train parish workers. Finally, in 1876, missionaries from the Church of Sweden settled in the interior of Natal. In 1912, these several missions formed the Cooperating Lutheran Missions in Natal-Zululand. This structure matured into the Lutheran Church in South Africa–South-Eastern Region. As such it joined the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches.

In 1857, the Hermannsburg Missionary Society opened work among the Tswana people of the Transvaal. They found a ready acceptance of Christianity due to the prior activity of David Modipane. Some 20 years earlier, Modipane, then a war prisoner, had converted to Christianity. In the 1840s, he returned to his people and began to preach. He did not baptize or form a church, but told those who listened to him that soon others would come with proper authority. The missionaries purchased land from the Tswana and formed several Christian villages that became the church's centers. By 1959, when the independent Lutheran Botswana Church was constituted, there were some 100,000 members. That church became the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa in 1963 and soon affiliated with the Lutheran World Federation.

Shortly after the merger of these four regional churches to form the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa, two additional dioceses were created, one serving the Johannesburg area and one for the members in Botswana. The church has an episcopal polity and is led by its presiding bishop. The church assembly, the highest legislative body, meets biennially. The church council oversees the administration at the national level.

Given the racial divisions in modern South Africa, the reception in 1984 of five congregations whose members were predominantly of Indian heritage became a step forward of significance far beyond the bounds of the church. These congregations were the result of a mission opened in the 1970s by the Norwegian Missionary Society, the Hermannsburg Mission, and the Church of Sweden. The church struggled through the 1980s to deal with the many races, people, and languages in the church, all of which, given the apartheid system imposed by the government, continually threatened its unity. With the end of apartheid, the church has worked to overcome its divided past.

In 2005, the church reported 589,502 members. The church oversees two seminaries, the Lutheran Theological College Umpumulo at Mapumulo and the Marang Theological Seminary in Tihabane, Bophuthatswana. Several smaller churches, primarily of white South Africans, which share much of the history of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, have remained independent of the larger united body.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa
24 Geldenhuys Rd., Kempton Park
PO Box 7331
Bonaero Park, 1622
South Africa
<http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Meadows/7589/elcsa.html>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania (ELCT) was born in June 1963 with the formal amalgamation of seven churches that had previously worked together as a federation. These seven churches trace their beginnings to the 19th-century missionary activities in East Africa. Both African-initiated groups and German missionary societies became very active in creating congregations and parishes that later developed into self-governing churches. Before World War I there were three German mission societies operating in what was then Tanganyika: the Berlin Mission, which worked in the southern part of the colony and later on the eastern coast; the Leipzig Mission, which worked in the northern and central parts of the territory; and Bethel Mission, which worked in the northeast and later in the northwest. In the northwest, Protestant African groups, largely influenced by the Anglican Church in Uganda, invited Bethel Mission to work with them.

New mission societies arrived after World War I. The Augustana Mission, based in America, took over the work of the Leipzig Mission and Berlin Mission. The Norwegian Mission (Free Church) took charge of the Mbulu area in the northern part of the country. The Methodist Mission from South Africa became responsible for the northwest area, but did not remain there long after it got into conflict with the African Christian group.

During and after World War II, representatives from several Lutheran mission societies from Scandinavia arrived and worked together with the already established churches. It was during this time that these established churches of different background formed a Federation of Lutheran Churches in Tanganyika, which later, on June 19, 1963, merged to become the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania.

The former 7 churches have established 20 church units known as dioceses. Each diocese has its own constitution and diocesan leadership. These 20 different dioceses together constitute the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania, which in 2005 reported a membership of approximately 3 million members. It is the second largest Christian body in Tanzania and the largest Lutheran body in Africa. The head of the church is called mkuu wa kanisa (a Swahili title meaning “the one taking responsibilities of church leadership”) and is elected from among the 20 bishops. The first mkuu wa kanisa was the late Bishop Stefano Moshi (1906–1976) from the Northern Diocese, who was succeeded by the late Bishop Sebastian Kolowa (r. 1976–1992) from the North Eastern Diocese, who was in turn succeeded by Bishop Samson Mushemba (b. 1960) from the North Western Diocese. It is currently led by presiding Bishop Alex Gehaz Malasusa, who succeeded Bishop Mushemba in 2007. The church has a general secretary who works with the executive secretaries of different church departments. There is a General Assembly, which meets every four years, and an Executive Council, which meets four times annually.

The church has pursued its mission both within Tanzania and in neighboring countries. In the 1960s and 1970s it supported work in Kenya and the Congo (formerly Zaire). In the 1980s it worked in Malawi and Zambia, and more recently has opened work in Mozambique and Uganda. Within Tanzania it has established new mission areas where the work of diakonia (“service”) is very strongly emphasized. Education has become a strong priority, leading the church to establish secondary schools, colleges, and a university as expressions of its missionary task.

In order to continue the longstanding relationships between the church and the former mission societies, the Lutheran Christian Service body, since 1997 known as the Lutheran Mission Cooperation, was established in 1973. Its offices are within the church’s headquarters in Arusha. This body works together with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania to fulfill its mission objectives.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania is a member of the Christian Council of Tanzania, the All-Africa Conference of Churches, the Lutheran World Federation, and the World Council of Churches. Through these ecumenical bodies the church has shared its leadership talents with the larger Christian community. One of the former presidents of the Lutheran World Federation was the late Bishop Josiah M. Kibira (1977–1984), an ELCT bishop.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania
PO Box 3033
Boma Rd.
Arusha
Tanzania

Wilson B. Niwagila

See also: All Africa Conference of Churches; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands

See Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia dates to 1842 and the beginning of the Rhenish Missionary Society efforts in southern Africa in what in 1884 became German South West Africa and continued after Germany lost control of the region following World War I. Today the area is the independent country of Namibia. Originally developed in various parts of the territory, the work in the north was soon turned over to the Finnish Lutherans and evolved separately (and is now known as the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia). The Rhenish Mission work evolved into the Evangelical Lutheran Church in South-West Africa (Rhenish Mission) in 1957 and assumed its present name in 1990.

The church follows the belief and practice of the Evangelical Church in Germany, which includes an amalgam of Lutheran and Reformed trends. The church also has become socially active and sponsors leadership education programs for women, an anti-AIDS program, and programs to care for the elderly and ill. Among the educational institutions supported are the Martin Luther High School and the Palinum Theological Seminary, jointly sponsored with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia.

The church is ecumenically active and has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1992. It is also a member of the Lutheran World Federation. In 2005 it reported 350,000 members in 54 congregations.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Republic of Namibia

Private Bag 2018, Onipa
Ondangwa
Namibia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe

Lutheranism entered what is today known as Zimbabwe in 1903 when missionaries from the Church of Sweden, which had previously established a work in Natal, moved into southern Rhodesia. There the London Missionary Society, a British Protestant sending agency, and other churches had already initiated missionary work, and an agreement was reached by which the Church of Sweden would concentrate its activity in the southwestern part of the country. Here the missionaries encountered the Ndebele people (a Zulu-related people). The work spread across the southern part of the country, where its strength remains, though as members have migrated into the cities it now has congregations across the country.

In the 1930s the initial steps toward autonomy were taken that resulted in 1941 in a new Constitution, which outlined the several responsibilities of the Church of Sweden and the resident church members. Then in 1961, the church became autonomous. Three years later, southern Rhodesia became independent, though rule by the white minority continued until 1979.

The church is centered on the city of Bulawayo. Its parishes are organized into two districts. Legislation for the church is done at its biennial delegated assembly. The church is led by its presiding bishop, currently Naison Shava, who in 2006 succeeded Litsietsi Maqethula Dube (r. 2001–2006), who had in turn succeeded Dr. Ambrose Moyo (r. 1996–2001). Mayo moved on to become the executive director of the Lutheran Communion in Southern Africa. In 2005, the church reported 134,000 members in 396 congregations. Most of the church's pastors are trained at the United Theological College in Harare, a joint project of five Protestant denominations.

The church is characterized by a noticeable female majority among the active membership. They created a volunteer organization, Vashandiri, in the 1930s, which has been a significant part of the church's life and development. They manage a program of adult education, including both Bible and theological training as well as secular topics such as child care. Vashandiri is headquartered at a women's center in Gweru, which is also used for retreats, weddings, and various church meetings.

The church has an education program that includes several secondary schools and a youth center at Njube. An early emphasis on medical missions now manifests as joint support with other churches of four hospitals. The church cooperates with the world Lutheran community on various projects, especially Lutheran World Service, which has developed a spectrum of programs in response to the devastating drought in 1984–1986. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Lutheran World Federation, the Fellowship of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Southern Africa, and the Council of Churches in Zimbabwe.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in Zimbabwe
PO Box 2175
Bulawayo
Zimbabwe

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Sweden; London Missionary Society; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland came into being as a fruit of the 16th-century Reformation of the Roman Catholic Church. At that time, Finland was a part of Sweden. In the 19th century, the country was a part of Russia, and finally in 1917 it became independent.

Two main factors can be seen in the process of the Reformation in Finland. King Gustavus Vasa of Sweden (1496–1560) had political reasons to be in favor of the Reformation. Wealth and power were transferred from the church to the king when Sweden, and Finland as a part of it, became Protestant. At the same time, however, Swedish and Finnish priests studied in Germany and were significantly inspired by the new perspective of the Reformers. The church thus made the transition from Roman Catholicism to Lutheranism, the latter perspective lasting to the present.

In the 19th century, four revival movements started in the Finnish church, all of which continue to exist. Each has its own theological emphases, songbooks, and summer festivals. The largest of the four revival movements is the Laestadian movement, which especially reflects church life in northern Finland. A so-called fifth revival began after World War II and maintains links to the international evangelical movement. In addition to the several revival movements, there are many other organizations, including missionary societies and student organizations within the church; most recently the international charismatic movement has also gained a foothold in the church.

Oulu Cathedral, of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. (iStockPhoto.com)

According to the Constitution Act of the state from 1919, the state is neutral in respect of religion, and the citizens are guaranteed religious freedom. Still the Lutheran and the Orthodox churches have some privileges, among the more important being their taxing power. The Lutheran Church is a majority church, but no longer a state church. However, in the 1990s additional reforms occurred that further loosened the connection between church and state.

In 1999, 85.3 percent of the population, or 4.4 million people, belonged to the Evangelical Lutheran Church. The church plays, particularly through its ceremonies, a role in most people's lives: a vast majority are baptized, confirmed, married, and buried by Lutheran pastors.

There are approximately 600 parishes located in 8 dioceses. All the Swedish-language parishes in different parts of the country belong to one diocese (5.8 percent of Finns speak Swedish as their native language). The archbishop, who is often regarded as the head of the church is in Turku, the town where the first bishopric of Finland was established in the 13th century. The church's supreme decision-making body is the Synod (107 members). Other authoritative bodies are the Ecclesiastical Board, the Bishops' Conference, and the Church Council for International Relations. The central offices of the church are located in Helsinki. Altogether, the church employs almost 20,000 people full-time or part-time. Out of these, 1,800 are ordained ministers. One-fourth of the clergy are women. Women have been ordained since 1988, but even before that hundreds of female theologians worked in the parishes.

The financial basis of the church is its taxing power. Most funds are spent on parish work and maintenance of buildings. Parish work includes, for example, children's clubs, family counseling, hospital pastoral care, and work among the disabled, the unemployed, old people, and prisoners.

In 2008, the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland reported 4.5 million members in 548 parishes organized in 9 dioceses, plus some members who reside outside the country. The spiritual head of the church is Jukka Paarma, the archbishop of Turku. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Conference of European Churches, the Lutheran World Federation, and the Nordic Ecumenical Council.

Department for International Relations
PO Box 185
Satamakatu 11
161 Helsinki
Finland
<http://www.evl.fi/english>

Laura Maria Latikka

See also: Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. Church in Finland: The History, Present State and Outlook for the Future of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. Documents of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland 1. Helsinki: Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, 1989.

Heino, Harri, K. Salonen, and J. Rusama. Response to Recession: The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland in the Years 1992–1995. Tampere, Finland: Research Institute of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, no. 47, 1997.

Työrinoja, P., ed. The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Finnish Society. Documents of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland 6. Helsinki: Church Council for Foreign Affairs, Church Council, 1994.

Sentzke, G. Finland: Its Church and Its People. Helsinki: Publications of the Luther-Agricola Society. Series B 3, 1963.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of France

When the Protestant Reformation spread into France, the Reformed Church based in French-speaking Geneva found significantly more support than did Lutheranism. However, a Lutheran movement did emerge in the Montbéliard region (then a part of the German Duchy of Württemberg) and in Alsace-Lorraine (a French area bordering Germany). Beginning with the ministry of Guillaume Farel (1489–1565) and Martin Bucer (1491–1551), the church has been conscious of its role as a mediating force between German Lutheranism and French Reformed emphases. Over the centuries it has produced a number of significant figures in spiritual renewal, such as Pietist leader Phillip Jacob Spener (1635–1705) and Johann Friedrich Oberlin (1740–1825).

The first Lutheran congregation (expatriate Swiss) was founded in Paris in 1626. A Danish congregation soon followed. However, only with the coming of Napoleon and his establishment of a set of laws that both recognized the existence of Protestant churches and regulated their life, were Lutherans allowed to worship openly in France. The presence of Lutheranism in Paris grew in the 20th century with the development of work within the German expatriate community.

In 1871, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, many of the French Lutherans suddenly found themselves in Germany with the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine. Those Lutherans who remained in France were found primarily in Montbéliard and Paris. In 1906, following the separation of church and state in France, the Lutherans were finally free to form a national organization. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of France is one of the two bodies that continue the life of the Lutheran Reformation in France. When Alsace-Lorraine was returned to France after World War I, the Lutherans there organized the Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine, which has remained a separate body.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of France is a member of the Protestant Federation of France, the World Council of Churches, and the Lutheran World Federation. In 2005, the church reported 36,000 members in 54 congregations.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of France
24 Avenue Wilson
F-75200 Paris
France

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ghana

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ghana originated in 1958 with the efforts of missionaries of the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod. The work grew steadily and was formally registered as a new ecclesiastical institution in 1964. The church continues the conservative Lutheran theology and practice of its parent body. The church has also developed a widespread program of social endeavors throughout Ghana, including medical facilities aimed at assisting the blind and deaf, improving agriculture, and providing clean water. Evangelistic efforts are punctuated with a popular Bible correspondence course and a broadcast ministry built around the weekly This Is the Life television program.

The church has expanded its mission into neighboring Uganda, Nigeria, Benin, and Cote d'Ivoire. In 1998, it founded a ministerial training facility, the Lutheran Clergy Study Programe, based in Accra. In 2005 it reported 26,000 members in 150 congregations and 300 preaching stations. In spite of its ties to the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, the church joined the World Council of Churches in 2000. It is also a member of the All Africa Conference of Churches and the Lutheran World Federation.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Ghana
PO Box K 197
Kaneshie
Ghana

J. Gordon Melton

See also: All Africa Conference of Churches; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania/Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora

The Lutheran Church in Lithuania dates to the spread of the Protestant Reformation in the 1520s. Neighboring Prussia was the first country to declare Lutheranism its state religion (1525), and Lithuanians studied in Wittenberg, Leipzig, and other Protestant universities. The Reformation spread through all parts of society, and the initial Reformers faced harsh resistance by Catholic authorities. In 1539 Abraomas Kulvietis (Abraham Culva, ca. 1509–1545) established a college in Vilnius without permission of the local Catholic bishop, and the college was shut down three years later. The college founders sought asylum in Prussia, where Kulvietis, as well as another prominent figure of the Lithuanian Reformation, Stanislovas Rapolionis (often referred to by his Latin name, Stanislaus Rapagelanus; ca. 1485–1545), contributed to the founding of Königsberg University in 1544.

An Evangelical Lutheran church in Vilnius, Lithuania. (Alma Pater)

The Reformation eventually found support among the Lithuanian nobility (especially the influential Radvila family), and the country became predominantly Protestant. In response, the bishop of Vilnius invited the Jesuits, already working in Poland, to spearhead the Counter-Reformation. They founded Vilnius University in 1579, and by the end of the century, the Roman Catholic Church had basically regained its former primacy.

Though now in a minority position, Lutherans contributed significantly to Lithuanian culture. The first book ever printed in the Lithuanian language was Luther’s Small Catechism, published in 1547 by Martynas Mažvydas (in Latin, Martinus Mosvidius; 1520–1563) in Königsberg. In 1590 Jonas Bretkūnas (Iohannes Bretke; 1536–1602) completed the translation of the Bible into Lithuanian, although it was never published.

In 1648 the synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Lithuania adopted the model of the Saxonian Church of the Augsburg Confession. In 1780 the church’s synod established an independent consistory (which started functioning in 1782), and two years later the synod divided Lithuania into three church districts.

