In 1832 both the synod and the consistory were abolished by order of the Russian czar, an action made possible because a major part of Lithuania had fallen under Russian occupation in 1795. Lithuania's Lutheran parishes were joined to the Curonian Consistory, with its administrative center in St. Petersburg. Later, parishes in part of Vilnius County and on the right bank of the Nemunas River were joined to the Warsaw Consistory.

Meanwhile, beginning in 1613, Lithuania Minor had its own consistory, established in Königsberg. When in 1660 Prussia ultimately united with Brandenburg, the Königsberg Consistory was integrated into the Berlin General Consistory. In 1817, by decision of the king of Prussia, Frederick William III, Lutheran and Reformed churches were formally merged to become the Prussian Evangelical Church. Some Lutheran parishes never accepted the Prussian Union.

Lithuania regained its independence in 1918, and the northern part of Lithuania Minor, the Klaipėda District (Memel gebied), was joined to the Republic of Lithuania in 1923. Of the Klaipėda District's population, 97 percent (more than 150,000) was Lutheran, and there was a strong desire to unite all Lutheran parishes in Lithuania under one administration. Nevertheless, Lutherans in the Klaipėda District remained under the supervision of the Königsberg Synod. Only in 1955, after World War II, were the remaining parishes in the district formally joined to the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania.

In the rest of Lithuania, Lutherans numbered approximately 70,000, but they were divided by language. Thirty thousand were ethnic Lithuanians, 26,000 were German-speaking, and 14,000 were Latvian-speaking. As a result, between 1920 and 1941, each ethnic group formed its own synod, which in turn elected delegates for the consistory, the supreme body of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lithuania (ELCL). At the time, the president of the Republic of Lithuania appointed the president and the vice president for the consistory. As World War II loomed (1938), 9.56 percent of the 2.7 million Lithuanians were evangelical (Lutherans and Reformed being counted together).

Due to Soviet occupation and Lithuania's incorporation in the Soviet Union in 1940, a considerable part of the population fled to the West or was deported to the Soviet Union. The number of Lutherans decreased by almost 90 percent. After 1944 large numbers of Lithuanian Lutherans and nearly all pastors found asylum in the West. In 1946 in Germany the constituting synod formed the Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Exile, which (as a Lithuanian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Diaspora since 1993) continues to exist today. The church's bishop, Hans G. Dumpys, may be reached at its headquarters, 6641 S. Troy St., Chicago, IL 60629. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation. As the new century begins, it counts about 5,000 members.

A few pastors who remained in occupied Lithuania tried hard to keep the church alive under repression. A consistory was constituted in 1941 and 1950. Only in 1955 did the first synod meeting since World War II take place. By 1988 there were only 25 parishes in Lithuania.

National revival and the restoration of Lithuania's independence in 1991 provided the ELCL with an opportunity to re-establish parishes and various activities. In 2001 ELCL consisted of 55 parishes, served by some 25 clergy (including deacons). Since 1990, synods have taken place regularly every five years. Between the synods, the church is administered by the consistory.

Lutherans total about one percent of Lithuania's 3.6 million population. ELCL is a member of the Lutheran World Federation (since 1967) and the Leuenberg Church Fellowship. A relatively conservative body, it was a member of the World Council of Churches, but has recently withdrawn. Since 1993, a Department of Evangelical Theology has functioned at Klaipėda University. Bishop Jonas Kalvanas resides in the church headquarters in Tauragė.

Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea

Lutheran work in Papua New Guinea originated with two thrusts into the region following the establishment of a German colony on the northeast corner of the island of New Guinea in the 1880s. Johannes Flierl (1858–1947) moved to the German colony from Australia, where he had been working with the Aboriginal people. A missionary with the Neuendettelsau Mission, he established an initial station near Finschhafen. Missionaries from the Rhenish Mission joined him the following year. Work began on reducing the local languages to writing and then translating the Bible. As churches slowly emerged, each congregation was assigned an area for evangelization, and beginning in 1908 native teachers were sent out to evangelize their neighbors.

The missions made significant progress when they adopted a method developed by Christian Keyser (1877–1961) of gaining the consent of a whole people to convert before beginning baptisms. This method helped considerably in the preservation of much of the culture of the region. The mission was severely affected by World War I, when the missionaries had to withdraw, but as elsewhere the effect had a positive value in forcing the further creation of indigenous leadership. Until the Germans were allowed to return (1927), American and Australian Lutherans supplied some guidance to the emerging church.

The mission continued to grow through the 1930s, but was even more severely disrupted by the Japanese occupation of the island. A number of missionaries and church leaders were killed and many church buildings destroyed. The mission was quickly reconstructed after the war (with American and Australian assistance), and in 1956 the organization of the Evangelical Lutheran Church occurred. The present name of the church was adopted in 1976 with the establishment of the independent country of Papua New Guinea and the granting of full independence by the several missionary bodies that had until then overseen its operation. Partnership relationships were maintained with German, American, and Australian Lutherans. One of the major programs of the new church was the translation of the Bible into Pidgin, the language that had emerged as the most commonly spoken language in the country's multi-language environment.

In 1976 the Siassi Lutheran Church, a product of the Neuendettelsau Mission, which had been turned over to the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Australia in 1936, merged into the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea.

The church is led by its bishop, who resides in Lae, and the church convention that meets biennially. Congregations are divided into geographic districts. Zurewe K. Zurenuo, elected in 1973, was the first New Guinean selected for the episcopacy, though at the time he had yet to be ordained to the ministry.

In 2005 the church reported membership at 900,000 worshipping in 2,000 congregations. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches. It sponsors three seminaries for the training of ministers and church leaders. It also continues to oversee an extensive system of primary and secondary schools, as well as a teacher's college, also located at Lae.

Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway

Significant dissent from the established Church of Norway emerged toward the end of the 19th century when a group appeared asking for independence of the church from state control. The Reverend Paul Peter Wettergren (1835–1889), a former missionary of the church in South Africa, emerged as the spokesperson of the group, arguing that Jesus Christ, not the king of Norway, must be recognized as head of the church. In Norway, the Parliament acted as the Church of Norway's legislature, and the king retained the power of pastoral appointments and of promulgating church law.

The suggestion that the secular authority should not interfere in church affairs was bolstered by complaints that church discipline had become lax, doctrinal aberrations had appeared, and moral standards had been lowered. Wettergren and his associates suggested that congregations be given the privilege of choosing their own pastors and begin exercising the powers now in the hands of the king. The arguments were not accepted, and Wettergren and his followers withdrew from the state church.

The new church made a firm commitment to the standard Lutheran confession of faith and developed a presbyterial polity to organize its congregations. The synod, the highest legislative authority, meets semi-annually and elects the church's officers. Congregations call their pastors in cooperation with a district board. The church has established a Bible and Theological Seminary.

The church has a strong program of evangelism, especially among the more secularized adults in the suburbs of Norway's cities. It also has an extensive evangelism program, with missionaries in Japan, Ethiopia, Taiwan, and Cameroon.

In 2008 the church reported 21,775 members. Though challenging the Church of Norway, the Free church has built increasing good relations with it. It has remained aloof from other Free churches in Norway, but has friendly relationships with the Church of the Lutheran Brethren in the United States and sends observers to the Conference of Lutheran Free Churches in Europe. It remained aloof from the Lutheran World Federation for many years, but finally affiliated in 2005.

Evangelical Mennonite Conference

Mennonites trace their roots to the more radical element of the 16th-century Protestant Reformation. During a period of continuing persecution, many turned to the former Roman Catholic priest Menno Simons (1496–1559) for his mature leadership. His teachings shaped the movement, which spread from Europe to Russia in the 18th century.

The Evangelical Mennonite Conference's (EMC) origins can be traced back to a split in the Mennonite community in southern Russia in 1812. The leader of the reform movement, Klaas Reimer (1770–1837), concerned about lax discipline in the church, established a separate church entitled the Kleine Gemeinde (German: Little Community). The reason for the title is debated.

It most likely was due to its size in comparison with the Grosse Gemeinde (Large Community).

In 1874–1875 the group immigrated to North America to escape government pressure. About one-third of the group settled in Nebraska, and the other two-thirds settled in two colonies in Manitoba. The Canadian immigrants at that time numbered around 50 families. From the 1880s to the years immediately following World War II, the Kleine Gemeinde experienced a series of divisions within the community, political and cultural pressures to conform, and a loss of members as many immigrated to Mexico. The Kleine Gemeinde kept its name until 1952, when it was changed to the Evangelical Mennonite Church. In 1959 its name was changed to the present-day Evangelical Mennonite Conference.

The modern-day EMC has more than 7,000 members in 53 churches. Its churches are located in central and western Canada. Although its membership still reflects its Dutch-German background, it is increasingly becoming more ethnically diverse. The EMC is a supporting member of the Mennonite Central Committee and the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada.

The denomination holds that the “the Scripture has final authority in faith and practice, a belief in Christ’s finished work, and that assurance of salvation is possible.” It also adheres to historic Mennonite convictions regarding the necessity of discipleship, believer’s adult baptism, social concern, and pacifism. Women can serve on national boards, and in a wide variety of areas of ministry in the church, but they cannot be ordained as ministers. The EMC practices three ordinances: water baptism, the Lord’s Supper, and foot washing. Missions work and educational institutions are also an important part of the ministry of the EMC. Local church autonomy is stressed, with the churches of the conference organized under the conference council (which meets twice a year) and the moderator.

Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippine Islands

Following the change of administration in the Philippines as a result of the Spanish-American War, the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) launched missionary activity in the predominantly Roman Catholic country. The mission grew rapidly, but did not respond in a timely way to expressed desires for indigenous leadership. The desire for a greater leadership role was initially expressed in the formation of “The Truth,” an evangelistic effort created by Filipino evangelists. Church leaders discouraged the independent effort. Thus it was that Nicholas Zamora, the first Filipino ordained to the ministry, assumed leadership of some 3,000 members who broke with the MEC to form the Evangelical Methodist Church in 1909. The church was self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating. The church had grown to some 20,000 members by the mid-1920s.

Initially the church followed the parent body in organization and adopted a slightly edited version of the MEC Discipline as its organizational manual. In 1948, however, it placed the leadership of the church in the hands of a newly created consistory of elders, consisting of 11 ministers and 2 laypersons. The consistory was elected every four years by the church’s general conference. The consistory names one of its ministerial members as the church’s general superintendent. He, in turn, names the district superintendents who head the geographic districts into which the church is divided.

The church has developed a strong program of economic assistance and industrial development among the poorer people of the Philippines. It has taken a strong stand against racial discrimination, drug addiction, and divorce.

In 2005, the church reported 34,381 members. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina

As early as 1825, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) proposed the opening of a mission in Argentina, but the proposal was not acted upon immediately. Then in 1932, an unnamed Methodist wrote from Argentina saying that he had founded a Methodist class and requested that the church send a missionary to offer assistance. In 1835 the Reverend Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874) visited the country and returned to the United States to make his recommendation that missionaries be dispatched to the Plate River (Rio de la Plata) area.

John Dempster (1794–1863) arrived in Buenos Aires in December 1836. Over the next five years he built a school and congregation and then was succeeded by William H. Norris (1801–1878), who had been working in Uruguay. Under Norris's guidance, the work was extended into the interior of Argentina and into Paraguay, though the real expansion did not occur until the 1860s. All preaching was in English until that time. In 1874 the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society added their strength to the work and sent two missionaries to found a school for girls (now Colegio Americano).

In 1892, the General Conference authorized the founding of the South America Annual Conference (similar to a diocese in Methodism), and Bishop John

P. Newman (1826–1899) held the first session in 1893. Work now also included missions in Brazil, Peru, and Chile. There were 886 members in Argentina. The South America Conference gave way to the Latin American Central Conference in 1924, the central conference structure offering some degree of autonomy. In 1932, the conference elected the first Latin American Methodist bishop, Juan E. Gattinoni (1878–1970), pastor of Central Church in Buenos Aires.

Argentina was set apart as a separate conference in 1956, and in 1968, the uniting conference of the United Methodist Church voted positively on a proposal that the Argentina Annual Conference be allowed to become an autonomous church. That transformation occurred the next year when the Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina was organized. Carlos E. Gattinoni (b. 1907), the son of Juan Gattinoni, was elected as the first bishop of the new church. He, like his father, had been the pastor of Central Church when he was called to the episcopate.

The new church continued the structure and beliefs of the parent denomination, except that it established a committee to oversee pastoral appointments, rather than leaving that task in the hands of the bishop alone.

In 2005, the church reported 8,940 members. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and since 1991 of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia

Methodist work in Bolivia is dated from the arrival of bishop-to-be William Taylor (1821–1902) on an exploratory mission in 1877. In 1879, Jose Mongiardino began distributing Bibles in the country, but his work ended abruptly with his murder. Several other attempts to begin a mission met with mixed results, and it was not until 1906 that a stable work was begun, under Francis M. Harrington (1865–1908). He organized the first Methodist church in La Paz and the following year opened the American Institute, which subsequently grew to become the Colegio Evangelista Metodista. The single church carried Methodism for the next 34 years, even though the nation was designated a Mission Conference.

In 1952, Bolivia passed through a revolution, which brought among other changes a new openness to Protestantism. In 1956 the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) committed funds for a new “Land of Decision” program in Bolivia, which at the time had eight churches in what had been designated a provisional annual conference. Work was launched in Spanish-speaking areas, as well as among the indigenous Native population. Schools were founded, and medical work increased. The original clinic in La Paz is now the Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital. The United Church of Christ in Japan, into which Japanese Methodists had moved, sent missionaries to work among the increasing Japanese expatriate community.

In 1968, at the time of the merger that created the United Methodist Church, the conferences in Latin America requested autonomy, and the conference that had presided over the merger acted favorably on their request. The 1969 annual conference meeting in Bolivia completed the organization of the Evangelical Methodist Church in Bolivia. Reverend Mortimer Arias (b. 1924) was elected as the first bishop of the new church. The bishop is elected for a four-year term. The church continues to work closely with its parent body.

In 2005, the church reported 9,053 members in 188 churches. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council. Within the church, congregations are active among the Aymará, Quechua, and Castellanos peoples.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Costa Rica

Methodism entered Costa Rica in the 1880s in the person of Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), who had formerly worked as a pastor and missionary in South America. Born in Italy, he had moved to Uruguay, where as a young man he had had a dramatic conversion experience. He entered Costa Rica as an agent of the American Bible Society. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) was formally established in 1918 by George A. Miller (1868–1961), then superintendent of the church's Panama Mission. The first congregations were organized in towns along the Inter-American Highway between San José and the Panama border. A major project was the development of educational institutions, including a training school for church workers (later the Methodist Theological Seminary) and the Colegio Methodista, which became the first Protestant-sponsored school whose students were admitted to the national university.

The work was included in the Central American Mission Conference organized in 1940. The Costa Rica Provisional Annual Conference was organized in 1961. The work continued in affiliation with its American parent through the several mergers in 1939 and 1968 that produced the United Methodist Church. In 1973 it became autonomous as the Methodist Church of Costa Rica. The church is headed by its bishop, who is elected by the conference of ministers and lay delegates.

The church is a member of the World Methodist Council but has withdrawn from membership in the World Council of Churches. In 2002, it reported 9,500 members serving a wider church family of 12,500.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy

The Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy is the largest Italian Methodist body. Methodist missionaries have been active in Italy since the 19th century, with autonomous missions from both England (from what is now the Methodist Church) and the United States (from what is now the United Methodist Church). The first Wesleyan missionary, William Arthur (1819–1901), arrived in Italy in 1859. He was followed by Richard Green (1829–1907), who established an outpost in Florence and initiated cooperative contacts with independent Italian evangelical churches, including the anti-Catholic Free Christian Church, which had been established by a former Catholic priest, Alessandro Gavazzi (1809–1889). The debate on whether the Methodists should establish an Italian Methodist Church, or join in the efforts of those aiming to establish a national Protestant Church in Italy, continued for several decades. The British Wesleyan mission expanded under the leadership of Henry J. Piggott (1831–1917) and Thomas W. S. Jones (1831–1916), who in 1870 incorporated the Evangelical Methodist Church in Italy. The most distinguished Italian member was the philosopher Pietro Tagliatela (1829–1913), another former Catholic priest.

American missions took a separate path. Following a proposal by Charles Elliott (1782–1869), the Missouri–Arkansas Conference in 1871 decided to dispatch Leroy Monroe Vernon (1838–1896) to Italy. Attempts to join forces with the British Methodists were not successful, and in 1874 Vernon incorporated, in Bologna, the Episcopal Methodist Church of Italy, which in 1875 opened a temple in Rome. Vernon's successor, William Burt (1852–1936), developed a liaison with Italian Freemasonry, at that time a very anti-Catholic institution. A number of Italian Freemasons, however, were not Christians of any persuasion, but Secular Humanists. A former Wesleyan Methodist who had joined the Episcopal Methodists, Saverio Fera (1850–1915), promoted a schism in Italian Freemasonry, by gathering in a splinter organization around himself of anti-Catholic Freemasons who were nonetheless Christian and Protestant, and opposed Secular Humanism. Fera was a controversial figure, and his initiatives were ultimately detrimental to Italian Methodism, while a largely independent pastor, Riccardo Santi (1871–1961), acquired national and international respect with the foundation of Casa Materna, established in 1905 as an orphanage for the destitute street children of Naples.

After World War II (during which Methodists suffered discrimination as members of a “foreign” church), in 1946 the American and British branches merged to become the unified Methodist Church of Italy, which was eventually given official recognition by the Italian government on March 20, 1961. Still pursuing their original aim of unifying Italian mainline Protestantism within a single church, the Methodists signed a “pact of integration” with the Waldensian Church in 1975. This pact became officially effective in 1979. It was not, technically, a merger, because the Waldensians and the Methodists also maintained separate institutions, as well as separate international contacts. They decided, however, to be governed by one synod, responsible for the newly constituted Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches. The Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy remained also incorporated separately, according to legal proceedings completed in 1979, while the Union of Waldensian and Methodist Churches entered into a concordat with the Italian government in 1984.

Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay

The Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay (Iglesia Evangelica Metodista) dates to the 1835 tour of Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church). He not only assessed the possibility of initiating a Methodist ministry in Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay, but founded a Methodist class in Montevideo. During a six-month stay, he called for the church to send a full-time missionary to the area. As a result Reverend John Dempster (1794–1863) arrived in Buenos Aires in 1836. During his tenure he visited Montevideo and requested a full-time missionary worker for the country. That worker was William H. Norris (1801–1878), who arrived in 1839; however, even though he was able to get permission to build a church, the war between Uruguay and Argentina and internal unrest in the country prevented much success in his missionary activities. He withdrew in 1842.

In 1870, a new attempt to found Methodism in Uruguay was started by John F. Thompson (1843–1933), though he also had little success. Finally in 1876, Thomas B. Wood (1844–1922) arrived and was able to create a stable growing organization. He was aided by Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), converted under Thompson's ministry, and other Native Uruguayans. They had some difficulty from a hostile government and on occasions were arrested because of their evangelistic endeavors. They were able to get some relief after William Tallen became pastor of an American church in Montevideo and used the pulpit as a forum to defend Protestantism in general. He also occasionally spoke at the university and attracted several well-educated Uruguayans to the church. In 1884, the mission joined in the development of a theological school as a joint venture with the Waldensian Church (there being a large Italian expatriate community in Montevideo).

Uruguay operated as a branch of the Argentina work until 1893, when the Methodist Episcopal Church organized its South America Conference. Uruguay (including a small part of Argentina and Brazil) became a separate district. During this time, the Crandon Institute, the most important of the church's educational institutions, was founded. It eventually offered a complete education from elementary school through junior college. A ministerial training school founded in Montevideo was later transferred to Buenos Aires and became Union Theological Seminary. In the 1960s the church entered into merger negotiations with the Waldensians and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), but the merger was not consummated.

As the work in South America developed, the Argentina and Uruguay districts were separated into the River Plate Conference. That conference was dissolved in 1952, and Uruguay was set apart as the Uruguay Provisional Conference. Having recruited the necessary number of ministers (25), in 1964 it became the Uruguay Annual Conference. In 1968, at the time of the formation of the United Methodist Church, the general conference gave the Uruguay Conference permission to become an autonomous body. It completed that process in 1969, and Reverend Emilio Castro was elected as president of the new church. As secretary of the World Council of Churches, Castro went on to become one of the most outstanding voices in the world ecumenical community.

The Methodist Church is a relatively small church, with approximately 1,000 members in its 21 congregations (2005), but it has been a member of the World Council of Churches and of the World Methodist Council. It has sponsored a radio show since the 1940s, La Voz Evangelical (The Evangelical Voice).

Evangelical Mission of South Haiti

The Evangelical Mission of South Haiti grew somewhat accidentally out of the work of a team of independent evangelical Christian missionaries in Cuba. In 1928 Elmer Thompson (b. 1901), his wife, Evelyn McElheran (b. 1905), a Cuban national named Bartholomew Lavastida (1890–1994), and Isabel Junco opened a Bible school. As part of their study, they had the students engage in evangelistic efforts. The work of the students and graduates expanded to the point that in 1936 a decision was made to expand the effort to the Dominican Republic. Alexander Mersdorf, a missionary who had joined the original team, was sent to survey the situation, but stopped at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on the way to Santo Domingo. While there, he encountered some Haitians who had been converted to Christianity while working on a sugarcane plantation in Cuba. They knew little of the Christian life beyond the absolute basics and had no Bible in their Native Creole language. They were looking for a minister who could provide them with some training and guidance.

Upon his return to Cuba Mersdorf placed the needs of the Haitians before the group at the Bible school and they decided to postpone work in the Dominican Republic and concentrate instead on Haiti. The work in Haiti eventually became the Evangelical Baptist Mission in South Haiti. The Haitian mission began in 1937 by founding a Bible school in Les Cayes and growing the mission through its graduates. Over the next years it also founded a seminary, a hospital, and a radio network.

In 2008 the mission reported that its fellowship had grown to include some 487 churches, a significant expansion in the last decade. The West Indies Mission, the name assumed by the work that grew in the islands from Thompson's original effort later changed its name to WorldTeam. In 1995 it merged with RBMU International to become World Team (1431 Stuchert Rd., Warrington, PA 18976). The Evangelical Mission of South Haiti retains close relations with World Team. It also works with Reciprocal Ministries International (5475 Lee St., Suite 301, Lehigh Acres, FL 33971), an evangelical missionary agency, whose program "Hope for Kids" builds schools for children in Haiti.

Evangelical Pentecostal Mission of Angola

The Evangelical Pentecostal Mission of Angola dates to the arrival of American Pentecostal missionaries in the country in 1950. Their initial work was soon supplemented by additional personnel representing the Portuguese Assemblies of God. The work grew relatively rapidly and by 1974, when Angola became independent, the mission was ready to organize as a denomination and was recognized as such by the government under its present name. The church developed an expansive program with worship services daily. It also developed a broad program of social service that included programs in education, health care, and rural development, and soon found itself advocating on issues of peace and justice as well as human rights.

The Evangelical Pentecostal Mission has a distinctive perspective on the Christian sacraments. It celebrates the Eucharist and baptism (by immersion), but also designates its ceremonies of member consecration, marriage, and burial as sacraments.

The Mission is ecumenically oriented. In 1985, it joined the World Council of Churches, has affiliated with the World Pentecostal Fellowship, and maintains an active relationship with Portuguese-speaking Pentecostals, especially those in Brazil. In 2005 it reported a membership of 75,000.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Iran

The Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Iran, a church in the Reformed tradition, is the product of 19th-century Protestant missionary efforts in the Middle East. Work began in Iran in 1834. Given the hostility to conversionist initiatives by Muslims, missionaries concentrated on the older Orthodox Christian community, in this case the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East. One rationale for the mission was to revitalize the Church of the East as a missionary organization in its own culture. That approach did not work, and those few church members influenced by the missionaries ultimately withdrew and organized separately. The first congregations were formed in the mid-1850s in and around Rezaich. Work spread to other parts of the country. The first presbytery was organized in 1862.

In 1934, all of the Protestant churches, some of which included people of Zoroastrian and Jewish background, came together to form a united Protestant church that in 1963 reorganized as the Evangelical Presbyterian Church in Iran. The church is led by its synod, which is made up of representatives from the three presbyteries.

In 2005, the church reported 1,500 members in 7 congregations. The small body is a member of the World Council of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the Middle East Council of Churches.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa

The Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa began in 1875 when Reformed Church missionaries from Switzerland initiated work among the Tsonga people of the northern Transvaal of South Africa. They were later joined by workers from the Paris Mission (associated with the Reformed Church of France). The work spread throughout the Transvaal, especially after the mining industry developed. With the movement of people pursuing jobs, it spread to the Orange Free State and into Zululand. It has remained a largely ethnic church, with worship being conducted in the Tsonga language.

The mission matured as the Tsonga Presbyterian Church. In 1962 it became autonomous. Once organizationally independent, it began the long process of becoming financially self-sufficient. Its doctrine and practice follows that of its parent body. The synod is the highest legislative body. It appoints an executive committee that administers the church on a day-by-day basis.

In 2005 the Evangelical Presbyterian Church reported 48,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal

The first congregation in the Reformed tradition in Portugal was founded by a Scottish physician, Robert Reid Kelley, in 1845 on the island of Madeira. However, the church was suppressed and the members scattered. One of the members eventually found his way to Lisbon and was instrumental in founding the first Presbyterian church in that city. The movement spread with the assistance of Brazilian and American missionaries. Paralleling the Presbyterians, Manuel dos Santos Carvalho led in the founding of the first Congregational church in the 1880s. That church cooperated with the Evangelical Church of Rio de Janeiro, with whom it founded the Evangelical Union and Mission of Brazil and Portugal.

After World War II, Presbyterian and Congregational leaders began to look toward the formation of a national Portuguese church, and in 1947 a constitution was promulgated. The first synod of the new church, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Portugal (Igreja Evangélica Presbiteriana de Portugal), was held in 1952. In this effort, the United Presbyterian Church in the United States (now a part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) provided guidance and support. Those Congregationalist churches that chose not to join the united church formed the Union of Evangelical Congregationalist Churches.

The church has its headquarters in Lisbon, Portugal. It has benefited from the changes that brought religious freedom to Portugal and the new relations between Protestant and Roman Catholics following the Second Vatican Council, but remains a small church with 25 congregations and around 3,000 members (2005). It cooperates with the Spanish Methodists in supporting the Evangelical Seminary of Theology in Lisbon. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo

The Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Togo originated with the Norddeutsche Mission, founded in Hamburg, Germany, in 1836. It drew support from Pietist Lutherans, Moravians, and Reformed Protestants from across northern Germany, and in 1847 it sent the first missionaries into Togo to work among the Ewe people. Their work soon spread across the border into the Gold Coast.

In 1884, Germany assumed hegemony over what was then Togo, but during World War I the British and French took control, dividing the country into an eastern (British) and a western (French) part. In 1918, both governments expelled the German missionaries operating in their territories, and in 1922 the mission reorganized as the Evangelical Ewe Church, which included congregations in French Togo, British Togo, and the Gold Coast. The church tried to affirm its unity across national boundaries, but increasingly the British and French segments were divided by language and custom.

In the Gold Coast, the United Free Church of Scotland, a Presbyterian church, assumed control of the former work of the Basel Mission and then increasingly became influential over the congregations of the Evangelical Ewe Church. Meanwhile in French Togo, the Ewe church founded its own theological school and began to build a relationship with the Paris Mission (Reformed Church of France), which began to assume more and more control. It also began to spread among the Kabye people in the northern part of the country. In 1955 the United Church of Christ from the United States added its support to the work through its United Church Board of World Ministries.

The church became fully independent in 1959 as the Evangelical Church of Togo. The next year Togo became independent of France. In the next decades the church grew to a considerable extent and emerged as the largest non-Catholic body in the country. More recently it assumed its present name, an indication of its leaving its early congregational organization behind and adopting a presbyterial structure.

In 2005, the church reported a membership of 180,000 in 591 congregations. It is a member of the Christian Council of Togo and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana

In 1847, missionaries from the Bremen, the Norddeutsche, and the Basel Missions began work among the Ewe people in what was then called Togoland. These societies drew their support from the Lutheran and Reformed churches of Germany and German-speaking Switzerland. Germany assumed control of this area in 1884, and the mission experienced a period of growth beginning in the 1890s and extending to World War I.

Germany lost its African colonies as a result of World War I, and England and France divided Togoland. That part assigned to Britain was incorporated into the colony of the Gold Coast. The congregations that had been formed among the Ewe people were essentially left without missionary oversight, and in 1922 their leadership met for the first synod of the Ewe church. A congregational church order was developed, and the synod took oversight of the churches in both the French and English territory. Two synods were set up to function in the two new colonies, but a joint synod of the whole church was to meet every four years.

In 1923 missionaries from the Church of Scotland moved into the Gold Coast and began to work with the Ewe church members, while in 1929 missionaries from the Paris Mission (associated with the Reformed Church of France) assumed similar duties in French Togo. The two Ewe synods shared a constitution, but over the years developed in divergent directions. As the Gold Coast became Ghana and Togo became an independent country, the two synods became independent churches, though they continue to have close fraternal relations and to meet in their joint synod quadrennially.

The church in Ghana expanded far beyond its original base among the Ewe to include mission stations among the Twi, Guan, Konkomba, Kabre, and Akposso peoples. It has also had a turbulent history, as various groups have formed separate indigenous churches. As early as 1954, some 20 congregations among the Beum and Krachi peoples divided over issues of language and polygamy, the allowance of polygamy, common in some societies, being a persistent problem for African Christian churches. This split became the occasion for the Ewe Presbyterian Church to change its name to the Evangelical Presbyterian Church (The church in Togo made a similar name change.) Other churches that have their roots in the Evangelical Presbyterian Church include the Apostolic Revelation Society, the White Cross Society, the Evangelical Presbyterian Reformed Church, and the Lord's Pentecostal Church. Most recently, the Charismatic movement spread through the church and along with new life brought schism. Those most supportive of the movement have formed the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Ghana.

In 2005 the church reported 200,000 members in 787 congregations. It supports Trinity College at Legon jointly with the Anglican, Methodist, and other Presbyterian churches. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola

The Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola grew out of the work of Anglican missionary Archibald Patterson and Swiss minister Ernest Niklaus, who in 1922 started mission work in the Province of Uige. The work grew through the 1960s as the Igreja Evangélica do Norte de Angola. However, in 1961, when civil war broke out, the church faced severe government repression. Most church leaders were either forced underground or out of the country. Only in 1977, after independent Angola had been established, was the church able to reorganize. The members chose the name Evangelical Reformed Church of Angola.

The new church faced some immediate problems, not the least being the departure of 18 ministers who founded a separate church, which led to the formation of the United Evangelical Church–Anglican Communion of Angola. However, the main body of the church continued. Headquarters were moved to the capital in Luanda, and the church developed evangelical efforts designed to transform it into a national church, rather than simply a regional organization. It now has work in 11 of the 18 provinces of Angola.

In 2005 the church reported 200,000 members in 452 congregations. Its General Assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. Administration is in the hands of its executive committee. It is a member of both the Council of Christian Churches in Angola and the World Council of Churches.

Evangelicalism

Evangelicalism is a hybrid of theological and social components as complex as it is long-standing. While an unsophisticated and ahistorical answer to the question of its source might be “the New Testament,” a historically grounded response observes that evangelicalism’s roots run at least as deeply as the Reformation. Evangelicalism’s resemblance to 17th-century Puritanism is noteworthy, but the most straightforward connection is with the ideas and practices of 18th-century spiritual revitalization movements on both sides of the Atlantic. It has grown to become the largest single North American mode of collective religious practice and one of the world’s prominent religious movements.

The label “evangelical” derives from the Greek for “good news.” Elements commonly isolated to describe the core that distinguishes evangelicalism from other forms of Christianity include the preponderant stress on personal conversion (conversionism). The second salient signal, a corollary of the first, is activism, whether in generalized service or in evangelism. Third is the immense respect evangelicals hold for the Bible (biblicism). The final factor is the cross’s centrality in the redemption process (crucicentrism), although the rise of Charismatic influence has attenuated this somewhat, refocusing attention on the resurrection. The presence of these four features is sufficient to classify a movement as evangelical, neither wrongly including non-evangelical groups nor excluding those that are clearly evangelical yet eschew the title (a number of African-descended denominations, in both North America and Africa, thus qualify). These four features also hint at evangelicalism’s inherent fluidity. Never as monolithic as sometimes portrayed, the movement is in constant flux. Some organizations or denominations that once manifested these impulses no longer do so, while others that stood apart may choose to adopt them.

Evangelicalism is a specifically Christian manifestation of the massive Western paradigm shift known as the Enlightenment. The 17th to 19th centuries saw Christians struggling to clarify their relationship with Enlightenment rationalism. Hans Küng’s (b. 1928) adaptation of Thomas Kuhn’s (1922–1996) theory of paradigm shifts suggests that evangelicalism was a “meso-change,” a course correction involving several specific tenets, while not challenging basic orthodoxy. Evangelicals rarely abandon the first five Ecumenical Councils’ christological pronouncements. Thus evangelicalism enjoys extensive continuity with the historic faith, yet evinces its spirituality in ways consonant with the broader culture’s orientation, rendering it a profoundly conservative form of modernism.

The 18th Century By the third decade of the 18th century, religious revitalization was underway on both sides of the Atlantic. In England, the varying forms of Methodism preached by Anglicans George Whitefield (1714–1770) and John Wesley (1703–1791) provided spiritual outlets for tens of thousands of working people not vitally linked to the state church. Whitefield became a transatlantic phenomenon, preaching to thousands in the northern colonies. This broad upturn in spirituality, the Great Awakening, also included revivals in response to native-born New Englander Jonathan Edwards's (1703–1758) preaching. The New Lights valued the place of emotions in conversion and reevaluated humans' role in the process of evangelism and discipleship. By mid-century, the Church of England began internal renewal through clergy like John Newton (1725–1807) and Bishop Thomas Sherlock (1678–1761). Sherlock's apologetics addressed issues using Enlightenment categories. So successful was his adaptation to the new paradigm that his argumentation remained in use until the late 20th century, when post-modernism limited its effectiveness. William Wilberforce (1759–1833) and the Clapham Sect forced justice issues (particularly slavery) onto the public agenda. On the continent, evangelicalism flourished through the influence of Lutheran Pietism on the Moravians' guardian, Nicholas von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), and early foreign missions sponsored by the Danish Crown. After the American Revolution, the New Light Stir served as high-water mark of a process by which New England's Baptists separated from state-sanctioned Congregational churches to form voluntarist churches.

The 19th Century Activism was evangelicalism's dominant 19th-century feature. One form was renewed emphasis on conversionism. The 1801 Great Camp Meeting at Cane Ridge, Kentucky, marked the onset of the Second Great Awakening. The Awakening set in motion a demographic process that transformed American society. Church membership soared from roughly 10 percent in the post-Revolutionary period to approximately a quarter of the population by 1850. By century's end, as many as one in three Americans were church members, the largest segment found among the Methodists, Baptists, and other revivalist-oriented Christians.

Acceptant of society's fervor for progress, mingled with postmillennial eschatology, evangelicals' concern that faith have practical outcomes led to the promulgation of a plethora of service societies. English evangelicals launched what became worldwide movements: the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), the Young Men's Christian Association (1844), the Young Women's Christian Association (1854), the Evangelical Alliance (1846). Labor and health issues also garnered British evangelicals' attention. Inspired partly by the 18th-century advocacy of Thomas Coke (1747–1814) and William Carey (1761–1834), concern for foreign missions surged on both sides of the Atlantic. Significant resources were mobilized, often by women, to recruit and equip crosscultural missionaries. New American societies added antislavery agitation and strong temperance notions. Revivalism began transforming under the Holiness movement's influence. Indicative of revivalism's increasing success, there were fewer unconverted non-Christians and they became more resistant to evangelistic efforts. Focus shifted to promoting spiritual maturity of those claiming rebirth. If children were indeed moral blank slates, educating them with Christian values held profound potential for social amelioration. Higher education embraced the Baconian inductive method, imparting a new flavor to evangelical systematic reflection through the Princeton Theology.

Evangelicalism encountered several difficulties in the 1800s. While a number of communitarian and utopian collectives quietly promoted their eclectic eschatological views, William Miller (1782–1849) fomented broad anxiety with his dramatic interpretation of biblical prophecy, leaving premillennialism unpopular for decades. Revivalism was tamed after the Civil War, transforming raucous camp meetings into sedate and safe Christian resorts. Evangelicals experienced competition from an alternate conservatism, Anglo-Catholicism. It provided Anglicans with a less boisterous means to express profound and historically rooted piety. Darwinism quickly was perceived as a threat; the potential disruptiveness of rising commercialism and consumerism was not.

The Early 20th Century Much of evangelicalism's history in the early 20th century is bound up in the

Aimee Semple McPherson, early-20th-century itinerant evangelist. (Library of Congress)

Fundamentalist-Modernist Controversy. A reaction to the divisive influence of Higher Criticism, Darwinism, and other modern ideas, the controversy severely disrupted Protestantism, literally dividing some denominations.

A new alternate evangelicalism, a form of Restorationism known as Pentecostalism, appeared in 1901, soaring after the 1906 Azusa Street Revival. Disconcerted Methodist preachers were particularly attracted to Pentecostalism in the 1920s. Flamboyant Pentecostal ministries included that of Aimee (Kennedy) Semple McPherson (1890–1944). Born in rural Canada to Methodist and Salvation Army parents, she converted to Pentecostalism in 1907. She married Robert Semple, an evangelist; the couple became missionaries to China, where he died. Her second marriage ended in divorce, her frequent evangelistic trips being cited as abandonment by her spouse. Adventurous, she moved beyond her initial territory, the American Eastern Seaboard, planting her ministry base in Los Angeles. She broadened her constituency, eventuating in the formation of the International Church of the Four-square Gospel. To traditional evangelical accents it added healing. Her later ministry was plagued by scandals and her untimely death.

McPherson's use of radio, while sensationalized, was not unprecedented. The New England Fellowship (a precursor to the National Association of Evangelicals) and the Midwest's Moody Bible Institute also realized broadcasting's potential. The New England Fellowship became a major regional lobby, attracting hundreds of pastors by the early 1930s. Fundamentalist ideas also began penetrating denominations hitherto quite unrelated. For some ethnic denominations, Fundamentalist ideas offered a means to indigenize. For groups once considered on the fringe, such as the minority conservative wing of the American Christian Convention, Fundamentalism was an avenue to broader community acceptance. The relative absence of Afro-Americans in Fundamentalism's ranks is sadly noteworthy.

The Emergence of Neo-Evangelicalism By the late 1930s leaders such as Donald Barnhouse (1895–1960) broke ranks to criticize fellow Fundamentalists' shrill sectarianism. As the World Christian Fundamentals Association lost momentum, two rival entities supplanted it. The uncompromising Fundamentalists' American Council of Christian Churches (1941) was countered by a group committed to exploring a more cooperative approach. They opted for constructive cross-denominational cooperation, not merely opposition to the liberal-oriented Federal Council of Churches. The 1942 National Conference for United Action Among Evangelicals marked the genesis of the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE). Within 5 years, 30 denominations, representing 1.3 million members, were full-members with an influence base of a further 3 million. Non-Fundamentalists, including increasingly respectable Pentecostals, accepted membership. The NAE's analog, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada did not form until 1964.

Carl Henry's (1913–2003) Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (1947) served as a neo-evangelical manifesto. The goal was the movement's reinvigoration, ending its inward (some insiders called it "cultic") focus, shedding its cultural hostility to the purpose of renewed social impact, both through conversionism and broader activism. The term "new-evangelical" (later "neo-evangelical") was bruited in 1948 by Harold Ockenga (1905–1985), a student of J. Gresham Machen (1881–1937), who had in 1936 become the prominent pastor of Park Street Church (Boston) and the NAE's first president. The timing of Henry's and Ockenga's initiatives may reflect renewed optimism about mission in light of America's postwar secular leadership (as did a resurgence of foreign mission activity under evangelical auspices). Ockenga was also emerging as an educational leader; his guiding hand helped shape two quintessentially evangelical seminaries. In 1947, with funds provided by radio evangelist Charles Fuller, Ockenga was a key figure in the launch of Fuller Theological Seminary in California. Back in New England, in 1969, Ockenga facilitated the merger of two existing seminaries into Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary (the school's distance education center is named in Ockenga's honor). These new schools attest that neo-evangelicals felt less threatened by biblical scholarship and the gospel's social application than Fundamentalists.

The growing rift between on-going Fundamentalists and neo-evangelicals is well illustrated by the theory and practice of ecclesiastical separation. Drawing upon verses such as 2 Corinthians 6:17, separation placed a premium on putative purity over ostensible unity. As it evolved, the concept recognized three modes of denominational interaction between Fundamentalists and liberals. A denomination could be mixed, both parties coexisting in the same structure. The next step, in which a denomination maintained oversight such that only Fundamentalists were members but members were free to associate with Fundamentalists in mixed settings, was known as "first degree separation." The third option, known as “second degree separation,” applies to those whose denominations also consist solely of known Fundamentalists, but whose members associate only with Fundamentalists in other denominations practising first or second degree separation. Carl McIntire (1906–2002), instigator of the American Council of Christian Churches, insisted members adhere to second degree separation; failure to do so implied one’s tacit approbation of liberalism. Dispensationalism emphasized the need for separation, true believers associating only in pure churches until Christ’s return to relieve a beleaguered church. Fundamentalists who subscribed to a non-dispensational premillennialism possessed less motivation to adhere to the practice. Neo-evangelicals, notably evangelist Billy Graham (b. 1918), were willing to collaborate not only with denominations following first degree separation, but with persons in mixed denominations. The openness removed impediments to cooperation between predominantly Calvinist evangelicals, generally Arminian Holiness proponents and Pentecostals, whose numbers included both Calvinists and Arminians. Although some groups, such as the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International (1951), had been founded under Pentecostal influence and stressed the contemporary availability of healing, they nonetheless attracted support from some non-Pentecostal evangelicals.

Publications figured centrally in neo-evangelicalism’s expansion. Christianity Today, founded in 1956 with Carl Henry as editor and Ockenga chairing the board, sought to propagate conservative theology yet with a parallel commitment to engagement in social action. Within a quarter of a century, twice as many North American ministers read Christianity Today than its liberal foil, The Christian Century. The left-wing of evangelicalism was represented by Sojourners magazine. The translation and publication of the Bible became controversial in this era. While the 1901 publication of the entire American Standard Bible (ASB) had been generally uncontroversial, the release of the Revised Standard Version (RSV; New Testament 1948; Old Testament 1952) created a firestorm. Conservatives felt its rendering of certain Old Testament passages undermined prophecies of Jesus’ Virgin Birth. At least one denomination made reading of RSV in public worship an error sufficient to discipline pastors. A more conservatively undertaken New American Standard version emerged (NAS; New Testament 1963; Old Testament 1971); the New International Version (NIV; New Testament 1973; Old Testament 1978) was more broadly accepted, either because or in spite of its “dynamic equivalence” translation philosophy.

Para-church organizations increasingly marshalled evangelicals’ energy. The InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, imported from Great Britain to Canada in 1928, whose members exported it to the United States in 1938, provided an alternative to what had become the liberal-dominated Student Christian movement. Typical of the minimalism of transdenominational organizations’ statements of faith, InterVarsity’s 1933 symbol required assent only to scripture’s “inspiration, integrity and authority”; Jesus’ deity and saving death; the Holy Spirit’s role in regeneration; and Christ’s triumphal return. The Navigators (1933), Youth for Christ (1946), and Campus Crusade (1951) not only mobilized myriad volunteers, but reinforced evangelicalism’s transdenominational character. The 1966 World Congress on Evangelism, held in Berlin and chaired by Carl Henry, elicited insight from a broadly representative, worldwide group of evangelical leaders and thinkers. Eight years later, John Stott helped orchestrate the First International Congress on World Evangelism in Lausanne, Switzerland. At a time when older Protestant denominations advocated a moratorium on missions, evangelicals became more reflective and sophisticated in mission efforts.

The relaxed atmosphere for dealing with diversity simplified evangelicalism’s reaction to the emergence in the early 1960s in the Western world of the Charismatic movement. Arising in both Protestantism and Catholicism, this renewal movement’s relationship with older Pentecostalism was often strained, despite their similarities. Both emphasize experience more than theology, valuing spiritual intuition concerning the Holy Spirit’s presence, yet they were sometimes at odds with each other. The Charismatic movement’s acceptance, in turn, has helped lower barriers between evangelicals and Roman Catholics, allowing cooperative work on ethical issues (although to the consternation of separatist Fundamentalists).

Current Situation Evangelicalism's regaining of some broader cultural credibility was marked by Newsweek's declaration of 1976 as the "Year of the Evangelical." Some, concerned that the improved evangelical image might have been secured at the expense of a weakened stance on the inspiration of scripture, issued the 1978 Chicago Statement on Inerrancy, defending the Princetonian doctrine. Growth has continued for three decades. On any given Sunday in North America, a majority of those who attend church and report other forms of regular Christian practice during the week (such as routine Bible reading or praying) assent to the core evangelical tenets. Collectively, in the United States, the largely white, evangelical Protestant denominations enjoy rough parity with Roman Catholicism. Until the 1970s, evangelicals appeared less likely to be involved in politics than the general population, though during the Reagan administration political activism grew significantly, and evangelicals currently constitute a significant element of the Republican Party. Meanwhile, a number of evangelical authors have decried the relative absence of evangelical participation in academic roles or as public intellectuals.

Similar trends are evident in Canada, where participation in public religious activities during the second half of the 20th century was much lower than in the United States. This not only reflected broad abandonment of Catholicism among the large Francophone minority during the "Quiet Revolution," but a dramatic downturn in evangelicalism's popularity among the Anglophone majority. In the past 20 years, however, sociologists like Reginald Bibby discovered a strong resurgence, with self-identified evangelicals' numbers possibly doubling, from roughly one-tenth of the population to one-fifth. Charismatic renewal in Anglican and Roman Catholic churches accounts for some of this growth.

Transatlantic connections are stronger in evangelicalism than Fundamentalism; there are more commonalities on both sides of the Atlantic due to evangelicalism's broader base in both cultures. Fundamentalism has stronger appeal to North Americans, where there is no state church and voluntarist churches are the majority. British evangelicalism has its own emphases, however, such as generally being more open to the ecumenical movement and sharing in the general culture's sense of deference to upper social classes. Legal restrictions limit British evangelicals' use of television. British evangelical biblical scholarship, under the postwar influence of the Tyndale Fellowship, repudiated Fundamentalism; Dispensationalism is viewed as a Plymouth Brethren eccentricity. Pentecostalism has made far deeper inroads in the United States than in the United Kingdom, where the Keswick movement claimed many of its potential converts.

In continental Europe, evangelicalism has long been represented by small Pietist movements, whether existing within state-sanctioned Protestant churches or voluntarist in nature. In German, Evangelische means "Protestant" and should not be confused with the movement examined in this article. The fall of Communism has resulted in renewed legal evangelistic activity in Central and Eastern Europe. Efforts are impeded by growing alignment of general nationalist sympathy with long-standing national Orthodox churches.

Barriers to non-Roman Catholicism's presence in Latin America, including both social sanctions and execution, were gradually removed in the early 20th century, but profound penetration by evangelicals occurred only in the final third of the 1900s. In some countries, particularly in Central America, evangelicals grew to be a sizeable and vocal minority. As the century closed, Charismatic variants of evangelicalism predominated.

Sub-Saharan Africa is another area sustaining notable evangelical growth. Much of this growth is among Pentecostal or Charismatic groups; one-fifth of the population of Ghana is said to belong to one of two indigenous Pentecostal denominations. Some North American evangelicals find such expressions of faith in non-Western paradigms disturbing, perhaps without realizing that evangelicalism itself is highly culturally adapted. Recent years have witnessed increased violence in transitional areas, where predominantly Muslim cultures abut preponderantly Christian ones. Some evangelical Anglicans, especially from East Africa, have reversed a two-century-long trend, adopting North America as a mission field. Recently several Americans have been consecrated as missionary bishops.

Christianity of any description continues as a distinct minority in most of Asia, despite a long history of evangelical missions. The major exception is South Korea, where evangelicals constitute a sizeable minority who now undertake foreign missions, often to countries where Western missionaries are barred. China's sheer size translates the small percentage of its population that are evangelicals into millions of members. Violence against evangelicals has occurred in a number of Asian regions, from Muslim, Hindu, and Eastern Orthodox Christian sources.

Postmodernism's impact on evangelicalism is increasing. Disaffection with tradition undermines fixed denominational loyalty; lifelong adherence to a single group is increasingly rare. Individuals' successive membership in denominations once considered profoundly different is not uncommon. Some abandon organized faith communities altogether. The house church movement, dissatisfied with what it perceives as medieval and modern cultural accretions to ecclesiology, seeks non-hierarchical and non-clerical community. Affective bonding concerns adherents more than fine points of doctrine, although the movement still displays evangelicalism's core features. Largely successful in China, during radical Communist oppression, the movement is progressively popular in North America and Britain.

Evola, Julius

1898–1974

Julius Evola was a Traditionalist philosopher, critic of modernity, and synthesizer of Eastern and Western Esoteric currents. Giulio Cesare Evola was born in Rome on May 19, 1898, to a Catholic family of Sicilian origin. He was sometimes called "Baron," and preferred the Latin version of his first name. Little is known of his youth until World War I, when he served as an artillery officer.

After engineering studies, Evola joined the Dadaist movement and produced poetry and paintings, some of these now in museums. In 1922 he abandoned the arts and turned to philosophy. It was probably experiences with ether that first convinced him of the autonomy and absolute quality of the self, and of a “transcendent” state that would remain his guiding star throughout his life. The resulting two-volume study of “magical idealism” and the “absolute individual” won some recognition from the philosophical establishment. For recreation, he made several daring mountaineering ascents.

During the 1920s, Evola moved among Theosophists, Anthroposophists, Esoteric Freemasons, and proponents of neo-Pagan spirituality. He studied the literature of Esoteric traditions, both East and West, especially Daoism, Tantrism, and alchemy, and published the first Italian edition of the Tao Te Ching (1923). With Arturo Reghini he formed the Gruppo di UR for the practical application of these traditions, raising the concept of “magic” to a high intellectual level. After the UR group dissolved in 1929, Evola wrote a work on spiritual alchemy (The Hermetic Tradition, 1931) that impressed both Carl. G. Jung (1875–1961) and Mircea Eliade (1907–1986).

Evola’s longest work is Rivolta contra il mondo moderno (Revolt against the Modern World, 1934), which traces the decline of human culture and aspirations from prehistoric times to the present. It was influenced by the classical and Hindu system of four Ages or Yugas, by René Guénon’s notion of a “primordial tradition,” and by Herman Wirth’s vision of a prehistoric Arctic culture. Unlike Wirth, Evola regarded matriarchy and goddess religions as a symptom of decadence, preferring a hyper-masculine, warrior ethos. The same attitude marks his later work The Metaphysics of Sex (1958).

Although Evola never joined the Fascist Party, he hoped that it might restore a “Pagan imperialism” echoing that of ancient Rome, and wrote much journalism promoting his esoterically inspired politics. After Italy’s alliance with the Third Reich, he devised a “spiritual” theory of race in preference to the Nazis’ “biological” theory. Fluent in German, he lectured to SS and other groups, but documents have revealed that the Nazi leaders regarded him as a crank.

During World War II, Evola turned to Buddhism and wrote his most serene work, The Doctrine of Awakening (1943). In 1945 he was in Vienna, reputedly studying the confiscated archives of secret societies, when he was injured during a bombardment. This left his legs permanently paralyzed. In 1951 he was arrested under suspicion of inspiring neo-Fascist activity, but acquitted after six months in custody. In Men among the Ruins (1953) he was still hoping for an “order” that might restore a decadent world, but in Ride the Tiger (1961) he preached “apoliteia”—the renunciation of any political solution.

In his last years Evola seemed more sympathetic to Catholicism, but the religious attitude was always alien to him. In this he differs from other “Traditionalists” such as Guénon, Marco Pallis, or Frithjof Schuon. The essence of Evola’s work is its call to the “superior individual” to realize the identity of self with the Absolute, and the contention that this is the core of all authentic traditions.

Evola lived with his parents during their lifetimes and never married. He died in Rome on June 11, 1974. Since then, his 20 full-length books and innumerable shorter works have been widely republished and translated.

Evolutionary Enlightenment

Evolutionary Enlightenment was founded in the late 1980s as the Moksha Foundation by Advaita Vedanta teacher Andrew Cohen (b. 1955). Cohen had been raised in a Jewish home, but at the age of 16 he had a spontaneous spiritual awakening that eventually led him to India and Hinduism. His search for an explanation of what had occurred to him led him initially to Swami Hariharananda Giri (a master of kriya yoga) and then to the practice of martial arts and Zen meditation.

His search reached a first plateau in 1986 when he met Harivansh Lal Poonja, who followed the teachings of Sri Ramana Maharshi's Advaita Vedanta. The teachings emphasized that human beings as pure consciousness in the Absolute are already in a state of spiritual freedom. They do not need to seek or attain it, but rather simply realize what they already are. Cohen felt an immediate agreement with the message of Poonjaji (as he is respectfully called) and after studying with him for a brief period, began to teach himself, initially in Lucknow, India. He taught in England, Holland, and Israel prior to his return to the United States and the founding of the Moksha Foundation in Cambridge, Massachusetts. In 1989 he moved to Marin County, California (north of San Francisco), and published the first of many books, My Master Is My Self, which described his spiritual search.

In Marin County, a small community of close disciples began an experiment in living as if the teachings were true and trying to discover the implications of them for daily life. This group continues as the Sangha. The Sangha became an issue with Poonjaji, whose own perspective was that the realization of Oneness had nothing to do with the visible world. Cohen came to believe that there were stages of realization of one's own unity with the absolute and that there were implications for individuals living in the world. This issue led to his separation from Poonjaji.

The Moksha Foundation renamed itself in the late 1990s, calling itself the International Fellowship for Impersonal Enlightenment, and has more recently adopted its present name. It publishes a popular newsstand magazine, What Is Enlightenment? IEF centers are found in the United Kingdom, Holland, France, Germany, Denmark, Israel, and India.

Exorcism

In the most literal sense, "exorcism" refers to the ritual process of expelling a spirit that is controlling or possessing a person, animal, object, or a geographic domain. The Greek term (exorkízō), from which the English is derived, refers to ordering someone who is under an oath (for example, in Matthew 26:63, Jesus is adjured to tell the truth about his messianic status). This is the underlying process of exorcism across a variety of religious traditions, which typically involves one or more specialists binding the possessing being(s) in some way and then forcing it (or them) to leave the host. This can range from a crisis exorcism of one spirit from an individual (Shoko 2006, 354) to a public exorcism of an individual (Singleton 1975, 305–307) to an annual ritual exorcising the spirits from a village (Kalsang 1999, 194ff.).

Exorcism is found in every major religion on every continent (Betty 2005; DeWoskin 1981; Nasir 1987). In mainstream Christianity, Judaism, and Islam spirit beings that possess hosts are considered evil and the normal recourse is exorcism. In other religious traditions, some spirits are evil and need to be exorcised while others are good or helpful to the individual or community and therefore welcome to possess human hosts (Vodou and other Afro-Caribbean popular religions). In some religions exorcists are specially trained to bind and cast out spirits. In some cases the specialists may limit their duties exclusively to exorcism, though more frequently they perform exorcisms as one of the tasks within their full scope of responsibilities.

While the specifics of exorcism vary from tradition to tradition, it is possible to identify several common elements. First is the need to identify when exorcism is appropriate. In some cases this means that the person goes through several stages of illness and attempted remedies prior to the decision to attempt an exorcism (Nasir 1987, 160; Nguyễn 2008, 306). In others the symptoms are recognized immediately as possession and exorcism is the only recourse (Singleton 1975, 305). The symptoms may indicate the nature of the possession and, if so, the type of specialist needed for exorcism.

Once the need for an exorcism is confirmed, in most cases the exorcist, the possessed, and sometimes the community of the possessed will prepare for the ritual. Frequently the exorcist is a trained individual with perhaps an assistant or two (Nguyễn 2008). In some cases, however, it is part or all of the community of the possessed that participates in the exorcism (for example, a local parish community in Tanzania, Singleton 1975; an entire village in the Baithak ritual in Pakistan, Nasir 1987).

The exorcist may partake of special foods or substances, fast, meditate, or recite prescribed prayers to prepare. The victim may follow similar procedures, including being required to sacrifice something of value to demonstrate commitment to the process. The victim's community (nuclear or extended family, clan, or village) may also need to prepare in some way, perhaps through a community ritual to cleanse them as a whole from ritual defilement or atone for taboo violations.

An appropriate location (for example, the special compounds in Madagascar of the Lutheran Church called tob, Roschke 2006) and time (for example, the evening for the woto ceremony among the Tourag of Niger, Rasmussen 1994, 75) for the ritual may be indicated by the nature of the possession, or may need to be discerned by the exorcist or the victim's community. Prior to the ritual itself there may be additional preparations for the location where the exorcism will take place. Additionally, the exorcist may rehearse the ritual or engage in additional preparation, depending on the type of exorcism needed.

Once all participants are deemed ready, the ritual itself is performed. The exorcism itself requires a means to either entice or force the spirit to leave the host. Enticing may involve providing a suitable alternate host (whether human, animal, or object) and some enticement or persuasive element to convince the spirit to leave the current host for the new one.

When the spirit can only be removed by force, a variety of means may be used. They may be mediums whose controlling spirits are more powerful than those controlling the victim, and when possessed themselves they are able to force the lesser spirit(s) to leave (Nguyễn 2008; Singleton 1977). They may use magical rituals to force more powerful spirits to obey them, and then command them to banish the weaker spirits from the possessed (Heissig 1986). Alternately, they may also utilize consecrated paraphernalia such as oil or holy water, special incense, animal parts (feathers, horns, teeth), or religious symbols (crucifixes, statues, bells) that are believed to have power to force the possessing spirits to leave the victim. Or they may cast powerful magical spells through ritual actions, offerings, or sacrifices. These spells, when properly done, force the possessing spirit(s) to leave.

One of the most disturbing exorcism practices is physically torturing the victim to effect the exorcism. In some cases the participants believe that only the possessing spirit feels the effects of the torture (Betty 2005, 16). In other cases they believe that the spirit will react to the physical misery of the victim and depart to find a more acquiescent host. It is disturbing that the beatings, burning with boiling water or oil, and other gruesome acts can result in permanent injury or even death of the possessed when not properly handled.

After the exorcism, those close to the victim observe the efficacy of cure, since exorcisms are not always effective (Rasmussen 1994, 74). When the cure is incomplete, the initial exorcism might be repeated, or more powerful exorcisms are applied until the community is satisfied either that the possessed is delivered or that delivery is simply not possible. The latter may be due to a variety of reasons, such as the spirits claiming the host for some purpose (for example, to become a medium) or the host being a scapegoat for the entire community.

Christians have long noted that Jesus did not perform rituals to exorcise demons; he simply commanded them to leave and they did (Berends 1975, 361; Singleton 1975, 304–305). The apostles followed his lead, commanding spirits to leave in Jesus' name without engaging in the ritual activities of their forbearers (Acts 8:6–7; 16:16–18). The ability of Pentecostal Christians in Africa, Asia, and Latin America to expel demons has powerfully impacted the growth of the churches on those continents over the past century (Anderson 2006; Asamoah-Gyadu 2004; Bergunder et al. 2001; Hollenwager 1980, 71–72).

Until the 1600s, many branches of Christianity included exorcistic formulas in baptismal rituals. Ex-orcism continues today among Christians who believe in spirit beings and possession, though not without internal examination and debate (Theron 1996; Warrington 2004). In the United States there is contention among practicing Christian medical professionals on when or whether exorcism is appropriate for the treatment of dissociative disorders (Rosik 2003). In Africa there are questions on the extent to which Catholic Christians should accommodate themselves to traditional beliefs in exorcistic practice (Shorter 1980) and the extent to which they should performed exorcisms in traditional idiom but interpret them in anthropological or psychological terms (Singleton 1977).

Finally, despite the assumption that medical, psychological, and social advances of modernity would eventually displace religious practices such as exorcism, this has simply not been the case in many countries of the world (for example, England, Malia 2001; Ghana, Onyinah 2004; India, Bergunder et al. 2001; Japan, Young 1990; Panama, Moore 1983; the United States, Whitehead 1995; Vietnam, Nguyễn 2008; more generally see Goodman 1988 and Wilkinson 2007). Given this reality, perhaps a more appropriate question is the extent to which contemporary scientific perspectives can be integrated within the various beliefs and traditions related to exorcism.

■ Faeroe Islands

The Faeroe Islands is a group of 18 islands in the Atlantic Ocean north of Scotland with some 540 square miles of land and approximately 480,000 residents (2004). The islands were originally settled by Scandinavians, who over the centuries developed their own Faeroese language. For centuries they worshipped as Roman Catholics. Following the Reformation of the 16th century, the Roman Catholic Church was replaced with the Lutheran Church, which continues to dominate the religious community.

Today, the Faeroe Islands are a dependency of Denmark. The Lutheran community is a part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark and officially under the authority of the bishop of Copenhagen. An assistant bishop resides in Tórshavn, the capital. A small Roman Catholic Church community reappeared in the 1930s and today is attached to the bishop in Copenhagen.

Interestingly, the Christian Brethren, the open branch of the Plymouth Brethren, initiated work in the Faeroes in 1865 and have had success on several of the northernmost islands. They are by far the largest of several Free church groups, including the Salvation Army and the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which now have work. The first Jehovah's Witnesses came around 1950, and there is one kingdom hall. There is also a small group of the Baha'i Faith.

■ Falkland Islands/Malvinas Islands

The Falkland Islands, also known as the Malvinas Islands, are a disputed territory in the Atlantic Ocean off the coast of Argentina. Their 4,700 square miles of land are home to 3,140 residents (2008), overwhelmingly of a British background.

In 1982, after Argentina asserted its hegemony of the islands through an occupying force, it fought a war with the United Kingdom and was forced to withdraw. The Falklands include more than 100 islands first discovered in 1520 by Spanish explorers. They were initially inhabited by the British, who founded the community of Port Egmont in the 1690s. They later returned the islands to Spain, which renamed the community Port Soledad. Then in the 18th century French fishers and seal hunters settled on the islands and named them for Saint Malo.

Following Argentina’s independence, the islands were considered part of the new nation. In 1833, Great Britain, as part of a larger issue involving trade along the south Atlantic coast, occupied the islands. They also brought settlers with them. These settlers eventually became the overwhelming majority of the islands’ inhabitants.

British control of the islands was not disputed until the UN review after World War II. In the end, the UN recognized Argentinean sovereignty, a decision from which the United Kingdom dissented. Since the 1982 war, the United Kingdom has remained in control of the islands, and their status, like their name, is a continuing issue.

The settlers who arrived with the British in 1833 were primarily Anglican, but a chaplain from the Church of England did not arrive until 1845. Missionaries of the South American Missionary Society arrived a decade later. L. S. Brandon, who stayed in the islands for 30 years (1877–1907), is remembered as the person who largely built the Anglican establishment.

The Diocese of the Falkland Islands was created in 1869 and included British expatriates through most of South America. In 1910, work in Argentina and eastern South America was separated, but reunited in 1946. In 1974, jurisdiction over the work in the Falklands passed to the Consejo Anglicano Sud-Americano (CASA), a transition structure leading to the formation of the Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America. However, the English-speaking residents of the Falklands formally protested their inclusion in what had become a predominantly Spanish-speaking Anglican body, and in 1977 the archbishop of Canterbury assumed authority over the Falklands. The work there remains an integral part of the Archdiocese of Canterbury. The Anglican Church remains the largest religious group on the island though it is no longer supported by the majority of residents.

The Roman Catholic Church began work among the British expatriates in 1857, and their small work remains attached to the bishop of London. A Presbyterian minister arrived in 1872 as the beginning of what

Fall Equinox

The Fall Equinox was one of four points in the year (the others being the Winter and Summer Solstices and the Spring Equinox) discovered and marked by ancient peoples who observed the heavens. At the Summer Solstice, from an observer in the Northern Hemisphere, the Sun rises at a point farthest to the north and is in the sky the greatest amount of time. As the days pass, the Sun rises at a point slightly farther south each day and finally reaches a point, 3 months later, around September 21, when it is in the sky for 12 hours and below the horizon for 12 hours. That point is the Equinox. Viewed from above Earth, the Equinox is that point where the center of the Sun is passing through the plane created by the Earth's equator. Following the Winter Solstice, the Sun will appear to be moving north and again reach a point where the day and night are equal—the Spring Equinox. In the Southern Hemisphere, the Fall Equinox is around March 21.

The Fall Equinox was celebrated in temperate climates as the end of the harvest season. Greek mythology had a popular story for this time, related to Persephone (or Kore), the young maiden who was the symbol of fertility. At the Fall Equinox, she goes (or is abducted by Hades) into the underworld, where she reigns for six months, and her mother, Demeter, mourns for her. Without Persephone, the world grows infertile for half the year and awaits rebirth in the spring. Thus the fall festival would be a time of joyfulness, celebrating a full harvest, but with a note of sadness over the coming winter.

Around the world, most cultures celebrated a mid-autumn harvest festival, but it would become an Equinox festival for cultures that operated on a solar calendar. Thus much of Asia did not have their harvest festival on the Equinox, as they operated primarily on a lunar calendar.

The Fall Equinox was not recognized as a significant event in either the Christian or Jewish calendar, and Muslims operated on a strictly lunar calendar. As these three religions rose to prominence, any celebration of the Fall Equinox was almost totally abandoned.

The celebration of the Fall Equinox has been revived by the modern Wiccan/neo-Pagan movement and its eight equally placed annual holidays (usually called Sabbats). The Fall Equinox is acknowledged as the harvest festival, but as few modern Pagans are farmers, the Sabbat (sometimes called Mabon) has become a time for inner reflection. All of the myths related to journeys to the underworld have been collected and related to the inner exploration of the subconscious and unconscious, to contemplate death and understand the cycles of life, death, and new birth. In the Common Era calendar, September 21 is the beginning of fall, thus Mabon becomes the moment for a last summer outing to a Pagan gathering, functioning in the United States, for example, in a manner similar to the purely secular celebration of Labor Day (the first Monday in September).

Falun Gong

Starting in 1979, China's leadership introduced radical social and economic reforms. The four modernizations—economic, scientific, military, and agricultural—were presented in an optimistic mode and showed a real willingness on the government's part to experiment with social structure and management. In fact, no one was quite sure what the outcome would be of many of these experiments. One unexpected result has been the flourishing of spiritual and religious movements within the bounds of the new liberalism. Falun Gong is the most significant of the many groups to arise in the 1980s and 1990s.

Falun Gong is an indigenous Chinese spiritual movement that has grown swiftly using modern communication and organizational tools. It formed in 1992 in Chang Chun, an industrial city in northeastern China. At that time it was but one of many qigong practice groups. By the late 1990s it had spread into most Chinese cities and to overseas centers such as Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, and the United States. It rose to prominence on April 25, 1999, when more than 10,000 Falun Gong followers surrounded the leadership compound of Zhongnanhai in central Beijing to stage a peaceful but dramatic protest of perceived mistreatment by police. The mistreatment had followed a mass protest in Tianjin that resulted from sharp criticism of qigong and Falun Gong in particular by two writers. At that point Falun Gong ceased being simply an unknown meditation group and became, partly through ongoing intense international media focus, a political opponent of the Chinese government.

Falun is the Wheel of the Law or Dharma, in this case referring to the absolute truth taught by the Buddha, which inexorably rolls forward. Gong refers to a technique or practice, with a particular sense of a spiritual or meditation practice. Thus Falun Gong is the practice or implementation of the spiritual truth, and, by extension, the totality of practitioners who follow these teachings. (The group also refers to itself as Falun Dafa, the Great Law of the Wheel of Dharma.) In practice the label Falun Gong refers to followers of Li Hongzhi, who is said to be enlightened and the sole possessor of the Buddha's truth.

Li Hongzhi (b. 1952; some sources claim 1951) served in the army and worked for a government grain corporation before starting Falun Gong around 1992. Falun Gong literature states that he studied with Daoist and Buddhist masters.

It is not known how large the movement is overall at this stage. At one point Falun Gong literature estimated there were more than 40 million followers in China. Since the group was banned in China, most of these have ceased to participate in group activities; some who believe strongly have been driven underground. Although there are Falun Gong groups around the world that continue to protest and practice in public, the total number of active followers worldwide currently probably numbers in the thousands.

The key Falun Gong texts are Zhuan Falun (The Turning of the Wheel of Dharma) and Falun Fofa (Buddha Law of the Wheel of Dharma), which like most Falun texts are collections of Li Hongzhi's speeches. Li has also issued a collection of his poetry, Hong Yin (Torrential Sighs). One key aspect of Falun Gong's growth has been the adept use of the Internet. Key texts, speeches, and messages from Li Hongzhi are found on the group's websites, in several language options.

Falun Gong espouses a life oriented around both practice and cultivation, in order to cleanse oneself and cease being "ordinary." Practice means performing the set sequences of five physical and meditation exercises. These are often done in groups in the mornings, sometimes in neighborhood parks. Cultivation involves "removing your demon-nature and fulfilling yourself with Buddha-nature."

Zhuan Falun emphasizes that the basic nature of the universe is zhen-shan-ren, truthfulness, benevolence, and forbearance. This compact statement of the fundamental character of the universe is the Great Law (dafa). These original universal properties are shared by humans upon birth. We are, however, trapped in the state of ordinary consciousness and cannot see the truth of the universe. The way out of this situation of ignorance is cultivation.

Banner advertising Falun Gong, Taipei, Taiwan. (J. Gordon Melton)

The individual in Falun Gong is described as a container filled with some good elements and some bad elements, the Buddha-nature and the demon-nature. These dual natures are visible to those of higher perceptions as white or black substances. The white is de, translated as a physical field surrounding the body, which is accumulated through hardships, and the black is called karmic force (yeli), accumulated through bad actions over innumerable lifetimes. The goal of Falun cultivation is to transform de to gong, cultivation energy, through the assistance of the master. This de/gong energy level is apparent because it grows in a vertical spiral, the gongzhu, from the top of the head, which again is visible to some.

In addition to gong energy, an individual is characterized by his or her xinxing (mind nature) level. Xinxing is an aspect of the person that includes de, plus other characteristics such as tolerance, “enlightenment quality,” the abandonment of attachments, and the ability to suffer difficulties. Xinxing thus develops in tandem with de/gong.

A key aspect of cultivation is facing the travails encountered in life. Ordeals are necessary, for they function as tests of xinxing. Conflict in everyday life is similarly part of cultivation. Suffering overall is explained as the repayment of one’s karmic debts, and these debts must be repaid in some form.

Falun Gong teaches that the current cycle of the universe is bound to expire and end in catastrophe, “the Final Period of the Last Havoc.” The resulting new age will be a period of advancement and ease based on material progress.

Falun Gong’s organization is a dispersed yet informed linkage of leaders versed in training and functioning in a cell-like network with maximum flexibility and focus. In its early stages in China, Falun Gong established assistance centers (fudao zhongxin) with assistants and branch heads, in addition to general assistance centers (zong fudao zhongxin) at the provincial and municipal levels and a Research Society (yanji-uhui). The General Society (zonghui) arranged national or international meetings. Finally, there were Law Assemblies, fahui, at which cultivation experiences could be discussed. Many of these organizational structures fell apart with the crackdown in China. In contrast, Falun Gong in Hong Kong in 2000 was and is a loose collection of practitioner groups, each of which gets together daily to practice the exercises, with a minimum of leadership. However, there is some degree of coordination beyond this, as is evident in the dissemination of information, the training of new members, and the frequent public demonstrations on public holidays. A Hong Kong Association of Falun Gong officially promotes lectures.

Not all Falun Gong groups follow Li Hongzhi, however. Claims by Hong Kong followers of Belinda Peng Shanshan that she is the rightful master of Falun Gong may be a first case of intergroup fissuring.

Zhuan Falun repeatedly states that Falun Gong does not follow the rituals of the past. This does not, however, mean Falun Gong practitioners lack ritual. The carefully choreographed daily exercises so emblematic of Falun Gong practice are a form of group ritualization. In addition such actions as installation of the falun (wheel) in the practitioner's abdomen and the opening of the tianmu (celestial eye) are clearly initiatory rites.

The movement was officially banned in China on July 20, 1999, and since then has been actively suppressed by public security throughout China. Members caught engaging in the practice, demonstrating in public, or attending meetings have been arrested. Some have been sent to re-education camps or prison. Central government media coverage has also focused on painting the movement in a negative light. Newscasts have interviewed former members who have repudiated the group's principles. Graphic examples of suicide and murder have been attributed to the excesses of Falun Gong beliefs.

In January 2000 seven followers (some reports claim five) attempted suicide by self-immolation in Tiananmen Square, the heart of Beijing. Two subsequently died. Falun Gong spokespersons overseas doubted that the protesters were authentic Falun Gong members, since, they said, Falun Gong principles uphold the sanctity of life. These statements implied that the incident was staged, a contention denied by the Chinese government. Regardless, the constant media reporting of this incident has clearly served to discredit the group in the minds of many Chinese citizens.

Despite Falun Gong's strategic positioning of itself as in opposition to the surrounding society and its "ordinary" mentalities, the interaction has been mutual, with many of the forms found within Falun taken from the Socialist context in which the movement surfaced. These include organization into cells, concern with control over mass media releases, and the centrality of unified doctrinal and organizational practice, all characteristics of Chinese Marxism and the Chinese Communist Party, as well as many sectarian religious groups. The advent of Falun thus shows the resiliency of the tradition of popularly based religious movements within Chinese culture as a whole, as well as the undeniable influence of Chinese socialism.

Falun Gong in some ways fits well in this traditional model of an uneasy relationship between the central government and newly arisen religious groups. It is grassroots based; members are often farmers newly arrived in urban centers, or former state workers thrown out of work due to economic restructuring. And like similar rebellious groups, Falun Gong is consistently critical of the dominant ideologies, including both the established Communist ethos and the new it-is-glorious-to-be-rich game plan.

But in terms of modern (post-1911) Chinese history, there have been very few overtly political religious movements. The myriad groups, such as Tian Dao, which rose in the 1930s, generally had no avowed political agendas. And since the Communist victory in 1949, all but the largest religious organizations, such as Catholicism and Buddhism, have been repressed in mainland China. In this socio-political sense of being a political player, Falun Gong is unique among modern Chinese religious movements.

Falun Gong's success is most likely tied to a combination of the appeal of a clear, simple exercise and ritual practice with the vision expressed in Li Hongzhi's teachings. Clearly, it is not enough to say that Falun Gong grew simply because it filled a gap in a rapidly transforming Chinese socio-spiritual landscape, a gap associated with recent liberalization and modernization of China's economy; the many chapters overseas indicate it appeals to people untouched by China's rapid economic transformation as well.

The treatment of Falun Gong is often portrayed as an example of human rights violations in China, and consequently the group continues to surface as an international news subject. Falun Gong's prospects solely as a religious movement, however, are unclear. Falun Gong may continue to survive outside China simply as one of many spiritual-religious groups based on traditional Chinese cultural practices. Falun Gong has established numerous national organizations throughout the Chinese communities in the diaspora world. They are best contacted through the many Internet sites. In addition a Falun Gong-backed newspaper, Epoch Times, is widely distributed.

The issues between Falun Gong and the People's Republic remain unresolved. The movement has become invisible within China, though many people who were members have continued quietly to practice. Outside of China, Falun Gong continues daily protests at embassies and consulates where it passes out literature accusing Chinese authorities of torturing, killing, and experimenting medically on Falun Gong practitioners in confinement. At the same time, China has published numerous reports and pamphlets detailing the harmfulness of practicing Falun Gong and arguing for the legitimacy of its repression of the movement.

A major source of information on Falun Gong is the Internet. There one may easily find numerous sites in a variety of languages from a variety of perspectives. Especially good starting points are some of the official Falun Gong sites, such as <http://www.faluninfo.net> and <http://falundafa.org/eng/books.htm>. From the latter site, the complete text of Master Li's main book, Zhuan Falun, may be downloaded; additional books have been posted at other sites. For a learned appraisal and periodically updated bibliography, see the site maintained at the Sinological Institute at the University of Leiden, <http://www.let.leidenuniv.nl/bth/falun.htm>.

Family International, The

The Family International, originally known as the Children of God (COG), emerged out of the Jesus People movement of the late 1960s. David Brandt Berg (1919–1994), an itinerant evangelist loosely associated with the Christian and Missionary Alliance, established the movement in 1968 in Southern California. COG soon developed into a highly structured communal organization noted for an aggressive style of evangelism, high levels of tension with the outside world, strong internal discipline, and sustained anti-establishment rhetoric aimed at American society and the conventional churches of the day. The Family has spread around the world and is the most globally successful religious community to come out of the Jesus People movement. The Family has generated considerable controversy and occasional governmental repression, primarily due to the highly unconventional sexual ethos.

In 1969, Berg (known until his death as Father David or simply Dad) took his young disciples on the road, eventually establishing a permanent community on a ranch near Thurber, Texas. Here the organization grew to more than 200 young people, and the basic pattern of community life was established. In 1972, Berg ordered his disciples out of North America to begin the missionary task of reaching the entire world with the message of Jesus. Throughout the 1970s the movement grew and flourished. Berg withdrew from personal contact with members, but maintained control through the leadership structure and his written correspondence, known as MO Letters.

In 1978, due to serious internal conflicts and a leadership crisis, Berg fired almost all of the administrative personnel and essentially disbanded the organization. Continuing individual communities maintained ties through written correspondence. Other disciples formed smaller units and traveled nomadically. In 1980, Berg called the communities together again as the Family of Love, then simply the Family. By this time he had selected a young woman, Maria, from among the members as his spouse and successor.

In 1976, Berg introduced a revolutionary new sexual ethic. "Flirty Fishing," the use of sexual allure up to and including sexual intercourse, was advocated as a means of witnessing and establishing supportive friends. Family women began frequenting bars and nightclubs, and some joined escort services in order to meet potential converts and establish relationships with potential supporters. Flirty Fishing was never intended as a recruitment tool for new disciples, and few joined as a result of being “fished.” However, a substantial number of disciples left the movement in response to this sharp change in sexual ethic.

The new sexual ethos also included open sexual relationships between disciples, termed “sharing.” Disciples were allowed and encouraged to establish sexual fellowship with other members. Consent of all parties was required, but many homes experienced substantial social pressure to participate in this new aspect of Family life. Nudity and open sexuality became common features of most Family homes during the early 1980s.

A number of disciples interpreted some of Berg’s writings and his example as authorizing sexual contact between children and between minors and adults. Family children were considered adults when they turned 12 years of age, and sexual contact between adults and young teens was common during the early 1980s. In 1986, Maria became aware of a number of problems regarding teen/adult sex. Rigid age categories were defined, and sexual contact between adults and minors was prohibited. Flirty Fishing was discontinued the next year, and sexual contact with outsiders is now strictly forbidden. Sexual sharing among consenting adults continues, but sex between adults and minors is an excommunication offense. In the late 1990s, Maria introduced a new form of autoerotic religious sexual practice called “Loving Jesus.”

From the beginning, the Children of God focused primarily on a spiritual mission. In 1991, Berg issued a message entitled “Consider the Poor,” directing members to begin assisting the poor and helpless “just like Jesus did.” Disciples now conduct ministries to prisoners, street gangs, illegal aliens, refugees, unwed mothers, drug addicts, and abused children all over the world.

In October 1994, Berg died. Shortly after his death, Maria and Peter Amsterdam were married and now lead the Family together. In 1994, they issued the “Love Charter,” which spelled out the rights and responsibilities of Family members. Although final authority remained at the top, local leadership became far more democratic, and disciple life became less regimented.

The Family does not reveal the address of its leadership, and contact is best made through one of its homes or through the Internet. There is an official Family site at the address given below, and a number of sites sponsored by various continental and national units. By 1986, the greater percentage of disciples and the bulk of the missionary enterprise were located in Latin America and Asia. They had a particularly strong presence in India, Thailand, Japan, the Philippines, Argentina, and Brazil. With the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1989, a new missionary field opened, and in the early 1990s hundreds of disciples left for Eastern Europe. The vast majority were second-generation members under age 25. In the late 1990s, Family leadership identified Africa as the next area of focus, and over the past five years numerous Family homes have been established there.

In 1989, the Family drew a distinction between members who were willing and able to carry the full burden of disciple life, and those unwilling or unable to bear the yoke of full-time membership. Fully committed disciples are known as Charter Members, and the less committed are Fellow Members. In 2004 membership was subdivided into five categories: Family Disciples, Missionary Members, Fellow Members, Activated Members, and General Members. The last two constitute “Outside Members.” These are persons who have been led to faith in Jesus by Family disciples and look to the Family for religious guidance and instruction, but have never joined as full-time disciples. In the year 2000 the Family moved to place greater emphasis on the growth, care, and spiritual development of Outside Members. This is now the major thrust of Family ministry.

The Family is a highly diverse movement, counting disciples from a wide range of national, ethnic, racial, and socio-economic backgrounds. Family theology has generally reflected its evangelical Protestant roots. Members are bound together by a set of core theological beliefs. These core beliefs center on Jesus and salvation, Berg as God’s Prophet, the end times, and the spirit world.

From the very beginning, the disciples have understood themselves as Jesus people. They pray to Jesus, sing to Jesus, and spend their lives telling others about Jesus. And the disciples are convinced that they are the true and most dedicated followers of Jesus. Personal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ is the linchpin of Family theology. Witnessing for Jesus and persuading others to pray to receive Jesus as their savior is the defining task of disciple life.

David Berg is the defining personality of the Family. By the early 1970s, he had defined his role as God’s Prophet for the end times as an essential aspect of Family life. Berg claimed absolute spiritual and political authority over his young charges. The disciples have a high view of the Bible, and use Father David’s writings as authoritative interpretations of the scripture. Today, Maria is acknowledged as Berg’s successor and God’s Prophetess.

It is believed that Berg still leads the Family from the spirit world. He speaks regularly through dreams and prophetic experiences of Maria, Peter, and other Family members. Direct encounter with Jesus, Berg, departed saints, and other residents of the spirit world is a regular feature of Family life.

Family disciples hold end-time beliefs similar to those held widely in the Evangelical Protestant world. The Antichrist will arise and take over the world, persecuting Jesus’ followers. During this time of tribulation, the disciples will suffer greatly, but also lead the other Christians in resistance to the Antichrist. Jesus will return and defeat the Antichrist at the Battle of Armageddon, establishing a 1,000-year reign of peace on the Earth. At the end of the 1,000 years, Satan will be released for one final confrontation. After Jesus defeats Satan, God will judge the world and establish the kingdom of heaven, in which Family disciples will serve as rulers and priests. Family theology is distinguished by the special role assigned Family disciples and the intensity of their conviction that the end is near. There has been no formal change in end-time theology, but the intensity level seems to be waning, particularly among second- and now third-generation disciples.

Total commitment is another significant aspect of the Family belief system. Disciples must forsake all and commit their lives to witnessing and Family duties. At one time disciples generally relinquished most contacts with the outside world. With the Love Charter and the growing number of Fellow Members, Family literature now acknowledges “concentric circles” of commitment, though total commitment is still the ideal.

Recruitment of new disciples was a high priority until the late 1980s, when the Family began looking to the second generation as the key to growth and survival. The Family continues to recruit new disciples, but at a much more modest pace. As of the beginning of 2008 the Family reported 4,442 Family Discipleship Members, 2,904 Missionary Members, and 2,090 Fellow Members. They report 1,027 Active Members in 53 countries and 3,456 General Members in 62 countries. In addition, there are 38,773 persons studying in the Activated program and in the pipeline to become General then Activated Members. For 2007, the Family reported 995,818 “souls won” as a result of their missionary effort. In July 2008 The Family initiated “The Offensive,” the marshaling of the maximum amount of energy, time, and resources toward enlarging existing Activated congregations and developing new ones.

The normal Family term for the broader society is “the System.” Since the earliest days of the Children of God, the disciples have lived in high tension with the System. Disciples generally limited interaction with outsiders to witnessing and raising funds. However, as an increasing number of teens and young adults left the movement, parents have attempted to maintain contact with their children, thus softening the hard line between insider and outsider.

The Family’s peculiar lifestyle generated considerable hostility and even persecution from the social environment. Through the years, the Family response had been to go underground. However, beginning in 1989, Family adults were accused of physically and sexually abusing their children. Homes worldwide were subject to raids by law enforcement and social service agencies. To date (2001), all children taken into “protective custody” have been returned to their parents, and no disciple has been convicted of any offense.

However, the ongoing ordeal forced the Family into greater interaction with the legal system, social service agencies, and the academy.

Fatima

Fatima is a small town in central Portugal some 90 miles north of Lisbon that in 1917 was the site of what became the most famous modern apparitions of the Virgin Mary (Our Lady of Fatima). It was here that three children—Lucia Dos Santos (age nine), Francisco Marto (age eight), and Jacinta Marto (age six)—initially experienced visitations from an angelic being in the spring of 1916. The angelic visitation heralded the first vision of the “beautiful young Lady,” dressed all in white and bathed in light, who appeared to them on May 13, 1917. The three children were told to come to the place where this first visit had occurred on the 13th of every month for the next five months. She then challenged the children with a seemingly mature query for their youthful age, “Do you wish to offer yourselves to God in order to accept all the sufferings He wishes to send you, in reparation for sin and for the conversion of sinners?”

As announced, subsequent apparitions occurred on the 13th day of each month. Meanwhile, the children faced ridicule from many of the townspeople and the press and hostility from authorities. Then on October 13, the apparitions culminated with a miraculous promised occurrence. As some 70,000 people trekked to the site of the previous apparitions, where nothing had been seen by any but the 3 children, all were treated to a spectacular meteorological occurrence. The rain stopped, the clouds parted, and a bright round disk shone in the sky. The disk began to spin, throwing off sparks of light. The phenomenon of the dancing “sun” continued for almost half an hour. All, believer and nonbeliever alike, saw it. At the close of the event, the Sun seemed to plunge downward toward the crowd and all felt the heat as their rain-soaked clothing dried.

Over the months of the apparitions, the Blessed Virgin had little by little communicated a significant body of material to the children. Most of the content concerned the people’s need to pray for Russia, then in the throes of revolution. The Lady asked the pope to consecrate Russia to Mary’s Immaculate Heart. The most intriguing part of the message given to the children remained confidential for the time being. This secret message, in three parts, was partially revealed in 1927. The first part concerned a vision of hell and the second spoke of the consequences of sin and the need to spread the message of the Immaculate Heart. The third part was until the year 2000 known to only a small circle of church leaders in the Vatican. It was a prophecy of an assassination attempt against the “bishop in white.” Since 1981, this prophecy was seen by many who knew of it to speak of the assassination attempt on Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) that occurred on May 13, 1981 (coincidentally the anniversary of the first apparition at Fatima). As it happened, the would-be assassin pulled the trigger of his gun just as the pope reached down to bless someone carrying a picture of the Virgin. He later attributed his surviving the incident to Mary’s intervention. He subsequently visited Fatima and oversaw (and nurtured) the process of canonization of two of the children, Francisco (d. 1919) and Jacinta (d. 1920).

Lucia died in 2005, the same year as Pope John Paul, on the 13th of February, keeping alive the importance of the 13th of the month for events relative to the apparitions. Most recently, on the third anniversary of Lucia’s death, Pope Benedict XVI, who succeeded Pope John Paul II, announced that he had waived the normal five-year waiting period before formally opening the process leading toward canonization as a saint. This waiver had also been exercised in the case of Mother Teresa and Pope Benedict’s predecessor, thus putting all three on the fast track to future canonization.

Fatima has been officially recognized as a place of pilgrimage since 1930, still drawing about five million visitors a year. Especially after World War II, devotion to Our Lady of Fatima has spread worldwide, and is expressed, among other ways, through active support from the Vatican and in dozens of church-acknowledged branch shrines elsewhere in the world. Pope John Paul's actions elevated Fatima beside Lourdes as one of the two most important of the many sites that have experienced apparitions of the Virgin Mary. The recent attention given Fatima also culminated the efforts begun in 1947 by Father Harold Colgan who founded the Blue Army, an organization that has had the single purpose of spreading the Fatima message. It is one of the major Catholic devotions in the world.

In addition to being a "mainstream" Marian devotion, Fatima has a particular function as a standard-bearer for a conservative, even fundamentalist Marian movement, made up of a large number of conservative Catholic groups and institutions, some acknowledged by the church, some not and even actively contested, which take their inspiration from the messages (including the secret messages) that were given at Fatima. Generally these groups function autonomously, are often well organized, can command ample resources, and sometimes have large numbers of adherents (for example, Marian Movement of Priests, www.msm-mmp.org/, approximately 100,000; Blue Army of Our Lady of Fatima, c/o World Apostolate of Fatima, PO Box 976, Mountain View Road, Washington NJ 07882, www.wafusa.org/, more than 10 million).

According to the organizations and devotees involved, the messages of Fatima should form the basis for a worldwide re-evangelization and missionary program, in order to save the degenerate world and church from the ever-present Satan. Among the typical themes in the messages are penitence, prayer, conversion of all sinners, the rosary, war, and anti-Communism. Only after the world gives itself over to the Immaculate Heart of Mary (and acknowledges her salvific work) and the conversion of Russia takes place, a kingdom of peace will be realized on Earth, in which all those who believe in Jesus Christ, ask for remission of sins, and subject themselves to the pope will be protected against the devil. The formal dedication of Russia occurred in 1952. Also after this dedication, the Third Secret of Fatima, which the visionary Lucia shared only with the pope, continued to inspire end-time prophecies and speculations of an eschatological and apocalyptic nature about the further course of the world and the concrete beginning of the end times. During the Cold War, Our Lady of Fatima was the model for the church in the struggle against Communism, atheism, and apostasy. Communism did not remain quiet; an Italian parliamentary commission concluded that the assault by Ali Agca on John Paul II in 1981 was plotted by the Soviets. The pope ascribed, on his turn, his survival to Our Lady of Fatima.

Since the 1970s the interpretation of the messages has begun to take on a life of its own, and Fatima has increasingly begun to function as the paradigm for new fringe devotions, often in connection with new Marian apparitions.

The fall of the Communist regimes, growing interest in the end of the world caused by the millennium, his own personal devotion to Fatima, and her protection during the assault led Pope John Paul II to reveal the Third Secret during the Jubilee of 2000. The content appeared less dramatic and apocalyptic than many had expected. Fundamentalist circles continue to suggest that the message has not yet been fully revealed, and that the end of time was not to begin in 2000 but in the cataclysmic year 2012, with a comet impact, nuclear war, and total darkness. In this way Fatima remains an important source of nourishment for groups and individuals within the global network of divergent Marian devotion.

Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches

The Reformation in Switzerland began in 1521 in Zurich, where Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), one of the

Ulrich Zwingli, 16th-century Swiss religious leader. Zwingli was the founder of Zwinglianism, a Reformation movement that challenged the Catholic Church's literal interpretation of the Bible. (Library of Congress) more radical voices of the period, was pastoring. Reformed ideas spread through the German-speaking cantons during the remainder of the decade and were evident in the French-speaking territories by the beginning of the 1530s. Zwingli had read Martin Luther's writings as they appeared, and he came to believe that only that which the Bible taught should be binding upon Christians or allowable in the church. This principle took the Lutheran Reformation belief that those things that the Bible prohibited should be abandoned one step further. Thus Zwingli moved to get rid of church vestments, statues of saints, and the Mass (to be replaced with a simplified memorial meal, the Lord's Supper). In 1524, he married.

Zwingli was killed in a battle with the Catholic cantons. The battle proved decisive, in that the spread of the Reformation in Switzerland was essentially halted at that point. By the end of the decade, the Swiss phase of the Reformation had a new champion in the person of Jean Calvin (1509–1564). A Frenchman, Calvin moved to Geneva somewhat by accident in 1536, the year his magnum opus, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, was published. He initially attempted to build a model community, but ran into opposition that forced him from the city. However, he returned in 1541 and remained the head of the church until his death.

The Institutes of the Christian Religion essentially defined the Reformed faith. Calvin affirmed the basic Lutheran positions of biblical authority and salvation by faith as the free gift of God, as opposed to what the Reformers saw as the Roman Catholic position, advocating a system of salvation by human works. Calvin differed from Luther on the sacraments, teaching that Christ's presence in the Eucharist was spiritual rather than real. This position also differed from Zwingli's understanding of the Lord's Supper as in essence a memorial meal (a position later championed by the Baptists and most Free church groups).

Calvin's Geneva became the disseminating point of the Reformed Church, which spread eastward to Hungary and westward to Holland and the British Isles. Swiss Protestants were able to join in a united front when Calvin worked out an agreement with Heinrich Bullinger, Zwingli's successor in Zurich. The agreement was written up in the Consensus Tigurinus in 1549.

The Reformed position could also be seen as broadly opposed to the Free church position. Christianity was viewed as intimately integrated with the state, and Calvin spent his time keeping the state from interfering with the church, while asking the church to move against those who taught other than Reformed theology. Like Zwingli, he opposed the Anabaptists, who argued for a church separated from the state and open only to those who accepted Christ as adults and were subsequently baptized. Reformed churches aimed to be coterminous with the state and to baptize all its citizens as infants. The Reformed Protestant position was published in a series of confessional documents, the Second Helvetic Confession, authored by Bullinger in 1566, being especially important. Over the centuries these have tended to become less authoritative among Swiss Protestants.

For several centuries, the Protestant churches existed as separate state churches, one in each of the cantons. In 1884 the Swiss Confederation was instituted. A decade later a Swiss Church Conference began meeting annually. Then in 1920, the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches was founded, as a result of probes by the Federal Council of Churches in the United States, which was seeking a European partner to coordinate its efforts to rebuild Europe after the destruction of World War I. The Methodists aligned with the Federation in 1922.

The Federation now includes 22 cantonal churches, the Evangelical-Methodist Church of Switzerland, and the Free Church of Geneva. It exists as an association of the Reformed churches in Switzerland, but performs many denominational functions, such as holding the membership of those churches in the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. The member churches vary in membership from the large church in the Canton of Bern, with more than 700,000 members, to those in predominantly Roman Catholic cantons such as Ticino and Glarus, with only about 20,000 members in each. In 2005, the Federation reported 2,400,000 members in 982 congregations.

The several larger member churches support a set of theological schools in Switzerland. The churches have a structure that models that of the Swiss cantons; they are supported by state funds.

The Swiss Protestant community was significantly affected by the Pietist movement, a movement emphasizing personal religious faith. That movement led to the establishment of a variety of Free churches, opposed to state interference in church life, and to the establishment of a variety of organizations that helped revive the faith life of the churches. Among the more important was the Basel Mission, founded in 1815, which became one of the important structures carrying Protestantism around the world in the 19th century. The Basel Mission drew support from both Lutheran and Reformed churches in Switzerland, Germany, and Austria.

Fellowship of Irian Java Baptist Churches

The Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches (Persekutuan Gereja-Gereja Baptis Irian Jaya) began in the 1950s with the work of Mennonites from Holland who launched a mission in Irian Jaya, the eastern half of the island of New Guinea, now a part of Indonesia. They established churches in the Bird's Head region in northwest Irian Jaya near the border with Papua New Guinea. The Mennonite missionaries withdrew in 1963, when Irian Jaya was incorporated into Indonesia, but the work they had founded continued.

In 1955 missionaries connected with the Baptist Union of Australia expanded their work in Papua New Guinea to Irian Jaya. It was their desire to reach those peoples who were still following their traditional religion. Evangelism began among the Dani people in the Balien Valley the following year. The first converts were received in 1962; however, the sight of the burning of their traditional religious artifacts angered many, and four months after the baptismal ceremony, some of the traditionalists attacked and killed some of the converts.

This action was broadly condemned, and the dead, considered to be martyrs for the church, became a catalyst that led to heightened growth. The Fellowship of Irian Jaya Baptist Churches was founded in 1966 among the Dani believers.

In 1977, some of the leaders of the Fellowship were in Jayapura, the regional capital in northwest Irian Jaya, and there encountered some university students who had grown up in the churches founded by the Mennonites. This chance encounter led to communication between the two groups, and the Mennonite work was later merged into the Fellowship.

In the 1990s the Fellowship reported 49,000 members in 170 congregations. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Fellowship of Isis

The Fellowship of Isis was founded in 1976 at Clonegal Castle, Enniscorthy, Ireland, by Olivia Robertson with Lawrence and Pamela Durdin-Robertson, her brother and sister-in-law. Since Lawrence Durdin-Robertson's death, the Fellowship has been led by Olivia Robertson. Succession planning in January 1999 created a decentralized organization with an Archpriesthood Union of 32 archpriestesses and archpriests acting as custodians of the Fellowship of Isis.

The Fellowship of Isis is multi-religious, multi-racial, and multi-cultural. Members are free to maintain other religious allegiances. The Fellowship of Isis is active in interfaith dialogue and has taken part in the Parliament of the World's Religions. Olivia Robertson was one of 2 women and 16 men who gave a platform address at the opening plenary at the Parliament's Centennial Session in 1993.

Around 26,000 people from 93 countries have taken up membership, but not all are active. Outside Western countries, the Fellowship of Isis is particularly active in Nigeria. The Fellowship has three principles that all members acknowledge—Love, Beauty, and Truth, which are considered to be the divine attributes of the goddess. Membership is seen as a way to promote closer communion between members and the goddess. While it was founded to promote goddess worship, the Fellowship of Isis is not exclusively a goddess organization. Male deities are also venerated.

The Fellowship of Isis has around 700 Iseums, or centers of worship, mainly in members' own homes. These are considered "Hearths of the Goddess." They offer initiation, celebratory rites, and fellowship. Seasonal celebrations are also held at Clonegal Castle and at public venues. A standard liturgy of rites is available for group worship, but Iseums are free to adapt these to their own needs. Members can conduct their own rites, but if they wish, women and men may train for the priesthood. The priesthood is believed to be linked to ancient Egypt through Olivia and Lawrence Durdin-Robertson's descent from a hereditary priesthood. Training in the priesthood is provided through around 110 College of Isis Lyceums. Each Lyceum provides an original course of study culminating in a rite from the Lyceum Liturgy. There are around 950 priestesses and priests. For those not seeking a vocation to the priesthood, there is a system of personal initiation involving 32 initiation rites and a 33rd level of "spontaneous mystical awakening."

The Fellowship of Isis publishes a magazine, Isian News, available by subscription. Membership itself is free. The Fellowship of Isis also has its own Druid Order and a body called the Noble Order of Tara that focuses on nature conservation. The Fellowship of Isis has a strong environmental ethos and venerates all life—animal, plant, and mineral. Every human, animal, bird, and tree is considered to be "an eternal offspring of the Mother Goddess's Divine Family of Life."

■ Fiji Islands

The Fiji Islands are an archipelago in the South Pacific that appears to have been populated as early as 2000 BCE. Of the approximately 500 islands, Viti Levu and Vannua Levu are the largest and include most of the country's 7,000 square miles of land. The majority of the 932,000 residents also reside there. Also included in the islands' political hegemony, Rotuma, an island some 400 miles north, is a dependency of Fiji.

Melanesians settled there in the sixth century BCE. They were first contacted by Europeans in 1643, by Abel Tasman (1603–1659) (for whom Tasmania would later be named). Subsequently, James Cook (1728–1779) visited in 1774, and in 1789 William Bligh (1754–1817), the famous captain of the HMS Bounty, stopped there and wrote the first lengthy account of island life.

Toward the beginning of the 19th century, a Fijian leader, Na Ulivau, was able to unite the islands into one community. Then in 1830, the first Christian missionaries arrived, representatives of the London Missionary Society (LMS). However, by agreement among the Protestant missionaries working in the South Seas, the Methodists received hegemony over Fiji, and in 1835 the LMS missionaries withdrew and two British Methodists assumed their post. They made little progress until 1854, when Na Ulivau's son, Ratu Seru Cakobau, converted and was baptized. The new king went on to become a great admirer of the Western world, and in 1858 actually offered his kingdom for annexation to the United States. Caught up in the approaching Civil War, the government ignored his offer.

Eventually, England annexed Fiji in 1874 and began the development of large sugar plantations. The local inhabitants would not leave their land to work the plantations, and in 1879 the British began importing laborers from India. Eventually, the Indians brought their wives from their homeland and settled in Fiji. They soon constituted the majority of the population, a fact that has been a continual source of conflict.

The islands became independent in 1970, but political turmoil and ethnic tensions have led to government coups in 1978, 2000, and 2006. The most recent government change saw the ousting of Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase by military leader Commodore Voreqe Bainimarama, who was named interim prime minister.

The ancient religion of the Melanesians predominated on the Fiji Islands until the 19th century. It has virtually disappeared as a distinct religion, though remnants are kept alive in periodic revivals of traditional culture. In 1885, the prophet Ndungumoi arose as a spokesperson of traditional religion and led a movement opposed to the further spread of Christianity. His movement was notable for its espousal of ritual cannibalism.

The British Methodist Church had a 25-year head start on other Protestant churches in building its work and remains the largest religious group in the islands. After the Indians began arriving in numbers, in 1892 the church opened an Indian Mission. The church had over the years been closely identified with the Fijian government and was severely affected by the coup that occurred in 1987 and by the political unrest during the 1990s. The Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma is the only Fijian-based church in the World Council of Churches.

The Church of England established its initial work in the islands in 1860. The present-day Anglican parishes are part of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia. It was followed by missionaries from the Presbyterian Church (1876) and the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1989). Through the 20th century, a variety of Protestant groups, from the Assemblies of God to the Christian Brethren, also arrived.

Fiji Islands

The older missionary churches operating in Fiji formed the Fiji Council of Churches in 1924. It is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC). Also, the regional Pacific Conference of Churches, itself affiliated with the WCC, is headquartered in Suva, Fiji. One result of this cooperative activity was the creation of the Pacific Theological School in 1966 with the sponsorship of the Anglicans, Methodists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians.

Among the more interesting groups on the islands are several indigenous movements, such as the Church of Time (1945) and the Messiah Club (1965), both schisms of the Methodist Church. The Jehovah's Witnesses, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (who have a special role for South Sea islanders in their understanding of salvation), and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (now known as the Community of Christ) are active in Fiji. The Church of Christ, Scientist, visible in the 1970s, has disappeared.

The Indian laborers brought Hinduism, in several varieties, with them. Of the 60,000 who arrived prior to World War I, one-fourth were from South India and the rest from North India. The Arya Samaj, a 19th-century reform movement opposed to temple worship, was brought to Fiji by the North Indians. In opposition, representatives of the Sanatan Dharm, based in the more traditional temple worship, established what is now the largest group in the Hindu community of the Fiji Islands. Competing with it are the TISI Sangam and the Gujarati Samaj, both more traditional groups serving Telugu-speaking and Gujarati-speaking segments of the population. All three have emphasized the construction of temples and the preservation of traditional worship. It is the largest group in the Hindu community of the Fiji Islands. Fiji has also participated in the popular spread of Hinduism worldwide. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness, formed in New York in 1965, has established a Krishna temple in Lautoka, and Adidam, an Advaita Vedanta group, purchased one of the Fijian islands as a home for its guru.

Islam also came to Fiji through the immigration of Indians (and Pakistanis). Their community includes both Sunnis and Shias. Most Muslims are related to the Fiji Muslim League, which in 2000 reported some 56,000 Muslims in Fiji. It cooperates with the Islamic Council for the South Pacific, founded in 1984, which promotes cooperation among Muslims in Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, Fiji, Vanuatu, and Tonga, and the Regional Islamic Da'wa Council for South East Asia and the Pacific, based in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. There is also an active group of Ahmadiyyas, which may have the allegiance of as many as a third of the islands' Muslims.

Several thousand Sikhs from the Punjab joined in the migration of workers from India. More recently, spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith have appeared.

The division of the country into two groupings, one of native Fijians and one of Indian origin, has become an increasing problem in Fiji since World War II. In 1987, Fiji was the subject of a military coup led by people who believed that the native Fijians were being deprived of their rights. The coup led to a new Constitution being promulgated in 1990. Then in 2000, during the term in office of Mahendra Chaudhry, the country's first prime minister of Indian descent, a second coup attempt occurred, which led to the country being taken over by the military. The coup attempts placed the Methodists, the largest religious body in Fiji, whose membership is almost totally native Fijians, in the middle. Many identified the church with the failed Fijian coup attempts.

Fiji Islands, Hindu Community of the Hinduism came to Fiji with the indentured laborers who were brought from India to Fiji by the British colonialists to work on plantations. Indentured migration to Fiji took place between 1879 and 1916 and involved some 60,000 Indians (45,000 from North India, 15,000 from the south), 80 percent of whom were Hindus. The majority of them decided to stay in Fiji after the end of their indenture, and they were later joined by free migrants from Gujarat and Punjab. According to the 1996 national census, there were 261,097 Hindus in Fiji (259,775 were of Indian origin, the others being converts from other ethnic groups) and 3,076 Sikhs. The overall number of Indo-Fijians was 338,818, or 44 percent of Fiji's total population.

Whereas in India, Hinduism and the caste system are closely related, the latter determining social status, marriage, occupation, and commensality, the caste system did not even survive the journey of Hindus from India to Fiji, let alone plantation life in Fiji. Only the Brahmin status was re-created, while Hindus of all castes lived and ate together, did the same work, and even shared the scarce women. The fading away of the caste system meant that Hindu society in Fiji became more egalitarian and that religion lost its central position in life.

Since Hinduism is closely bound to the Indian soil with its holy rivers, shrines, and gods, a feeling of loss, rootlessness, and guilt is widespread among Hindus in the diaspora. This is one of a number of reasons why most Indo-Fijians cut all ties with India once they embarked on the ships. Free migrants on the other hand kept close ties to India and were therefore important in keeping Hindu traditions alive.

In the early decades, the absence of proper caste and family life meant that many traditional ceremonies were either not observed at all or persisted in a simplified form. A popularized ritualistic version of Hinduism with a focus on devotion and little intellectual content was practiced, rituals and ceremonies became the essence of the religion, and Brahmins derived their authority from a command of these rituals rather than from religious learning and an ideal lifestyle. From the plurality of Hindu practices in India, Indo-Fijians have chosen those that made most sense to them and their social and economic situation. The Ramayana became the most popular text, not only because it is simple and casteless, but more important because its central theme is exile, suffering, struggle, and eventual return. In the barracks of the indentured workers, the Ramayana was recited, and Ram Lila performances were staged.

Especially after the 1920s, a number of formal religious societies were established that were active in the religious, educational, and cultural fields. For North Indians the most important were the Arya Samaj and the Sanatan Dharm; for South Indians, the Then India Sanmarga Ikyā Sangam (PO Box 9, Nadi, Fiji) or TISI Sangam. The Arya Samaj, officially known as Arya Pratinidhi Sabha of Fiji (1 Ono Street, Samabula, Suva, Fiji), started in 1904 but did not register officially until 1917. The major aim in these early years was the provision of educational facilities for Indian children at a time when Christians ran most schools and there was fear of conversion. On the religious side, Arya Samaj stands for simplified ceremonies, a rejection of the caste system and of idol worship, social reform, and conversion of non-Hindus. All these appealed to many Hindus in Fiji who were dissatisfied with the lack of intellectual content in traditional Hinduism, the time-consuming rituals, and idol worship. Today, there are about 20,000 Arya Samajis in Fiji, and their ceremonies, most important the fire ceremony, hawan, are held in schools throughout the country as well as in three community centers. The headquarters is in the capital, Suva.

Sanatan Dharm missionaries were called from India in the 1920s to support Hinduism in Fiji and combat the Arya Samaj. The first convention was held in 1934, and an official organization, Shree Sanatan Dharm Pratinidhi Sabha (PO Box 1082, Lautoka, Fiji), formed in 1958. Over the years, the majority of Hindus in Fiji accepted it as their organization. It maintains a number of schools and the majority of temples in Fiji.

The TISI Sangam, a regional organization for South Indians, was formed in 1926. In addition to religious, social, and educational work, it is devoted to the preservation of the Tamil and Malayalam languages. It maintains about 30 temples in the country. In 1941, South Indians of Telugu-speaking origin broke away and formed the Dakshina India Andhra Sangam of Fiji, which runs a few schools and one temple. Apart from these major organizations, there are a number of religious movements and religious-cum-cultural societies. The Gujarati Samaj is the major organization for the 6,000 Gujaratis. The Satya Sai Baba Organization (PO Box 271, Lautoka, Fiji) has about 2,500 followers and 37 centers countrywide, with the headquarters in Fiji's second city, Lautoka. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness maintains a temple in Lautoka (Sri Krishna Kaliya Temple, 5 Tavewa Avenue, PO Box 125, Lautoka, Fiji) and three centers around the country. There are about 300 initiated followers in Fiji.

It is important to note that Hindus in Fiji have not come up with new religious movements or a distinct form of Hinduism that would reflect their unique experiences and needs in the diaspora, but have instead imported a variety of movements from India. There are no holy rivers or great places of pilgrimage in Fiji, though some places have acquired some importance, such as the Cobra Rock Temple outside Labasa, built around a snake-shaped rock that is believed to grow in size. In the course of the relatively short history of Hinduism in Fiji, there has already been a major shift in ritual practices: During the first decades, Holi was the major Hindu festival in the annual calendar. At present Diwali is the principal festival and even a national holiday. This can be interpreted as a shift from play- and transcendence-oriented devotionalism, with Lord Krishna in the center, to a duty- and perfection-oriented devotionalism, focused on Lord Ram. Since no distinct form of Hinduism exists in Fiji, the estimated 100,000 Indo-Fijians who live outside Fiji (most of whom left after the military coups in 1987 and the subsequent state-sanctioned discrimination against them) are sharing temples with Hindus of other origins. In Australia and New Zealand, which are the major countries of resettlement, Indo-Fijians split along lines based on India's, not Fiji's, geography (South versus North Indians) in their choice of temple. However, Indo-Fijians have established branches of their major organizations, especially the Arya Samaj, Sanatan Dharm, and TISI Sangam.

■ Finland

Finland, the easternmost of the Scandinavian countries, is sandwiched between Sweden and Russia. It has a long coastline on the Baltic Sea and Gulf of Bothnia as well as the Gulf of Finland. There are 5.2 million people who reside on its 131,000 square miles of territory.

The largest religious community in Finland is the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. In 1999, 85.3 percent of the population (approximately 5 million) were members of this church, and 1.1 percent belonged to the Finnish Orthodox Church. The third largest group was the Pentecostals, and the fourth was Jehovah's Witnesses. More than 10 percent did not belong to any religious communities, and those who dismiss religious beliefs as irrational have formed organizations in order to promote thinking and culture that is free from religious bonds, and have produced nonreligious ceremonies that can replace Christian baptism, wedding ceremonies, and so on. They think that freedom of thought, conscience, conviction, and religion are not yet achieved in society. The adherence to these organizations has so far been modest.

Finland was one of the last European countries to be reached by Christianity. The ancient religion of the Finns consisted of myths; worship of the dead; and worship of nature beings, sprites, and personal gods. There were also shamans and wise men. Worship of the dead was mainly based on the fear of ghosts. In the same way, worship of different beings like fairies, elves, and gnomes often aimed at propitiating these beings. Among the Sami people who populate northernmost Finland, the pre-Christian religion was preserved longer than among the Finns, although they, too, later became Lutheran or Orthodox Christians. Finnish mythology is found in the 19th-century poem collection, the Kalevala. It is a work of one man, Elias Lönnrot (1802–1884), who collected the stories in different provinces of Finland but probably also wrote some parts himself. In the 16th century, the church Reformer Mikael Agricola had published a list of ancient Finnish gods. Otherwise the sources of information about the old Finnish mythology are few. Today, there are some small groups of people, neo-Pagans, who wish to revive the religion that Finns had before Christianity.

The first Christian influences have been traced to the ninth century. Items with Christian symbols and Christian vocabulary came from both east and west. Finnish culture and language are not related to the cultures and languages in neighboring countries (except Estonia): Finns are neither a Slavic nor a Scandinavian people. Christianity was established during the first three centuries of the second millennium, and in 1216 the Finland of that time became a part of the diocese of Uppsala (Sweden). Some years later, the first bishop of Finland was appointed. By the end of the 13th century, the Roman Catholic Church had established its position in the country.

The Lutheran phase of the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century reached Finland rather early, the first influences felt already in the 1520s. The Christian New Testament was published in Finnish in 1548. It was translated by Mikael Agricola, later a Lutheran bishop. His literary work had an impact far beyond the church, as it became significant for the literacy of the Finns, for the written Finnish language, and for the national literature.

In theological respects, the Reformation was carried out moderately in Finland, and the historic episcopal succession, or apostolic succession of bishops, was not broken. The most visible changes were abandoning Latin as the church language and regarding only baptism and holy Communion as sacraments. Economically, the Reformation proved disastrous for the church in the Kingdom of Sweden, of which Finland was still a part. The church's wealth and much of its power were transferred to the king. This did not mean a disaster for Christianity, though, as the Reformation brought about a deepening of knowledge about the Christian faith to the people. Later, especially in the 19th century, several nationwide revivals were experienced among the people. Some of these took place in and still have influence in the Lutheran Church. Others resulted in the establishment and growth of other denominations.

Besides the Lutheran Church and the Pentecostal congregations, the strongest Protestant denomination is the Finnish Orthodox Church (14,000 members). It started at the end of the 19th century as a renewal movement inside the Lutheran Church, but separated as an independent church after the declaration of religious freedom in 1923. The Roman Catholic Church, which had to close down its activities in the 1520s, returned to Finland at the end of the 18th century. Now there are 7,000 Catholics in the 7 parishes of the Diocese of Helsinki. The number of Catholics, of whom many are foreigners, is increasing, and several Catholic religious orders have made their appearance.

The relations between churches became increasingly cordial through the 20th century. The Ecumenical Council of Finland, which is the oldest ecumenical body in the country and which also has the most member churches and organizations, was founded in 1917. The Council includes 12 member churches and communities and 18 observers. A change in the relationship between the majority church and the minority churches occurred recently when the annual official church services (for example, on Independence Day), which members of the government and the Parliament attend, became ecumenical.

The first Jews came to Finland from Sweden at the end of the 18th century, but the community has remained small. The majority of Jews have their roots in Russia. Today, there are 2 synagogues and 1,150 Jews in Finland. In Helsinki the Jewish community also maintains a kindergarten, a school, and a hospital.

The first Muslim community was founded in 1925 by Tatars who immigrated from Russia. This community retains much of its ethnic distinctiveness, as do most of the newer communities. There are not yet any Muslim schools, nor are there recognizable mosques. The registered Muslim communities are still small and few in number. Estimates on the actual size of Islam in Finland vary between 15,000 and 20,000; however, the number of Muslims in Finland is increasing, mainly due to immigration.

Several internationally known new religious movements are present in Finland, but they have remained small. Only Jehovah's Witnesses and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints have gained a notable numbers of members. There are no remarkable indigenous new religious movements.

Religious freedom is guaranteed for everyone, as far as the activities involved are not otherwise in opposition to the law. The legislation came into force in 1923. A new Religious Freedom Act, introduced in 2000, was passed in 2004 and has modernized the 1923 law in several areas. While religion continues to be regulated, the autonomy of the many groups other than the Church of Finland was increased. A minimum of 20 members is needed to formally organize a new religious group. Individuals may be a member of several religious communities at once. The registration procedure for new groups has been greatly simplified.

Finnish Orthodox Church

The roots of the Finnish Orthodox Church reach back to the missionary work done at the beginning of the second millennium in the easternmost area settled by Finnish tribes, that is, the Province of Karelia. This work primarily originated from the monasteries and was carried out by Orthodox monks. The monastery at Valamo, founded according to tradition by the Greek-born monk Sergius and his younger assistant Herman, was the most important base. As time went by, several other monasteries were founded to back up the church's work. None of the Orthodox parts of Karelia formed part of Sweden–Finland politically until the latter half of the 16th century, and more came to do so in the 17th century. In 1809–1917, when Finland was a Grand Duchy of the Russian Empire, a separate diocese was established for the Orthodox parishes (1892), centered on Vyborg (Karelia). When Finland became independent in 1917, the church's administrative links with the Russian church were broken. After various intermediate stages, the Orthodox Church's standing in Finland was formalized through government action: In 1923 it canonically became an autonomous Orthodox church under the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople, gaining extensive self-government in internal matters. As early as 1918 the Finnish government had endorsed, through a special decree, its status as the second national church, the other being the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland. The Current Act on the Orthodox Church of Finland dates from 1969, with a supplementary decree the following year.

Administratively, the Finnish Orthodox Church, which has some 61,000 members (2006), is divided into three dioceses: Karelia, Helsinki, and Oulu. The bishop of the diocese of Karelia is also archbishop (Archbishop John, archbishop of Karelia and All Finland), the other bishops being metropolitans (Metropolitan Leo of Helsinki and Metropolitan Ambrosius of Oulu). There is also an assistant bishop, called the bishop of Joensuu (Bishop Panteleimon), in the Diocese of Karelia. The church's supreme decision-making body is the General Assembly, made up of representatives of the clergy and laymen, to which the bishops belong by right. Decisions on doctrines and canons must be ratified by the Bishops' Synod. The ordinary decision-making body is the Board of Administration, which consist of bishops, a priest, and laymen. General Assembly decisions can only become acts and decrees following approval by the Finnish state. The church's publications committee takes growing responsibility for all Orthodox literature published. The Orthodox periodicals with the largest circulation are Aamun Koitto, Ortodoksiviesti, and Paimen-Sanomat. The committee also publishes a theological yearbook and a periodical on Orthodox culture. The dioceses are divided into 25 parishes, many of which cover an extensive geographical area. There are some 160 churches and chapels, and about 110 clergy, more than 20 of them currently in retirement. There is one monastery (called in Finnish Uusi-Valamo, or simply Valamo) and one convent (Lintula Convent). Most parishes use only Finnish for services, though Church Slavonic is also used regularly in Helsinki and occasionally in other places Swedish and Greek.

The Finnish Orthodox Church is primarily financed out of the church tax collected with the other national taxes and paid to the church by the state on a monthly basis. The salaries of the Orthodox clergy, for instance, come out of this money. The central and diocesan administrations are financed by the state. For 70 years (1918–1988), the Orthodox clergy were trained at a seminary maintained by the state. In 1988, however, the seminary was placed under the University of Joensuu, which has a Department of Orthodox and Western Theology for the purpose. There is also an Orthodox seminary subordinate to the church, which is responsible for service rituals and liturgical practices. The university trains teachers of religion and cantors as well as Orthodox priests. Religious instruction in public schools is confessional, and if there are enough of them, Orthodox pupils are entitled to separate instruction. The church usually arranges Orthodox teaching for groups too small to warrant this. The foreign and ecumenical contacts of the Orthodox Church of Finland have been growing steadily ever since the 1960s, and the church is now a member of the World Council of Churches. The church has associated parishes among Finnish Americans in the United States and in 1977 began cooperative work with the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa in Kenya and Uganda. Since World War II, there has also been a growing interest in reviving the tradition of icon painting and there are several active groups at the moment in various parts of the country. This art form has awakened interest outside the Orthodox Church, too, like many other manifestations of Orthodox tradition and culture.

Flagellation

Flagellation is the act of whipping the human body by using flexible instruments such as the whip, the scourge, or cat-o'-nine-tails. Flagellation can be located in the context of law, religion, medicine, or sexual excitation. In many cases the juridical and religious aspects are indivisible, whereas sexual arousal by (self-) flagellation is a distinguished phenomenon of Western modernity. In two monotheistic traditions—Roman Catholicism and Shia Islam—self-flagellation plays a role until today.

Flagellation in Antiquity The use of flogging instruments has been a long legal tradition of corporal punishment. The Latin word flagellum designates a multi-thong type scourge (whip, lash) with interlaced pieces of metal or bones that inflicts severe wounds on the body of the convict. The Roman law prescribed punishment by the flagellum either to extract a confession or as an overture to execution or as a distinct penalty. In the ancient Latin world flagellation was considered an extreme, gruesome penalty that caused not only tremendous pain but oftentimes grave mutilation and even death. Roman citizens were exempt from being sentenced to scourging whereas noncitizens were subject to it. Furthermore, the whipping of slaves was a common practice throughout the antique world.

The ritualistic usage of the whip was practiced in various Greco-Roman and Egyptian cults, namely, the cult of Isis, the Dionysian cult, the Thargelia festival, or the Roman festival of Lupercalia. Especially the old Spartan cult of Artemis Orthia was famous for its ritual flagellation (diamastigosis) of adolescent men (ephebos), as related by Plutarch, Xenophon, Pausanias, and Plato. Self-flagellation was practiced by the priests of Attis. Well documented is the ritual scourging in the course of diverse initiation ceremonies of mystery religions (especially Isis mysteries).

The motifs and motivations behind such ritualistic practices differed widely. Consequently there is no scholarly agreement on the general meaning of ancient cultic flagellation. Whipping is seen as a technique of inducing altered states of consciousness or as a ritual of manhood. Blood-letting caused by ritual scourging is interpreted as a substitute for human sacrifice or self-castration or as a means to increase fertility.

Flagellation and Self-Flagellation in Roman Catholic Christianity The first Christian emperors adopted the Roman legal system in varying degrees and by it flogging as a punishment procedure. The whip as an instrument of castigation made its way to early monastic rules. Vigorous corporal punishment was part and parcel of early Christian cloister life from Egypt to Ireland. The authoritative and most influential Rule of Benedict of Nursia (480–547), for example, prescribes flagellation of the stubborn and the hardheaded as well as the novices. Medieval Christian monasteries served as educational laboratories aimed at the fundamental transformation of the souls of monks and nuns. The Christian virtue of willing obedience was the object of the transformation. For the construction of humility and an obedient will, punishment was indispensable. In this context, the Latin word disciplina (discipline) was the common term for legally prescribed flogging. Monastic penance that was performed in front of the assembled monks served a dual purpose: it promoted subjection to the law and it paved the way to Christian virtue. Such rites of penance, however, were not directed toward the breaking of the will, but to the forming of religious desires and obedience by choice.

Self-flagellation as a monastic exercise emerged from the penitential disciplina and refers to the episode of the flagellation of Christ tied to the pillar, reported in the four canonical Gospels. The scourging of Christ by Roman soldiers preceded the death penalty by crucifixion. Aside from a few exceptions, the ideal of self-mortification and the practice of self-flagellation emerged relatively late in Christianity. Saint Pardulf (657–ca. 737), an abbot in Aquitaine, is reckoned as an early practitioner if not “inventor” of voluntary flogging. The incorporation of self-flagellation in the monastic routine was successfully implemented by Peter

Damian (1007–1072), a hermit, church reformer, and cardinal in Italy. In various writings, especially in his De laude Flagellorum (In Praise of the Whip), he propagates ritual self-flagellation as a useful form of purification and repentance. Submitting to the whip was not understood as a denial of the body but as a spiritual imitatio Christi, a way to engage the body and the imagination in the task of communicating with God.

By the 11th century, a Passion-centered piety mushroomed in Western Christianity. Self-inflicted suffering became increasingly appreciated by the religious virtuoso. The willing acceptance and evocation of suffering was not only a means of expressing devotion to Christ, but also of expiating guilt in this life and of pre-empting punishment in the afterlife. German Dominican mystics, such as Heinrich Seuse (1295/97–1366), Elsbeth von Oye (1290–1340), and Margareta Ebner (1291–1351), practiced drastic forms of self-mortification, among which self-flagellation constituted the rather harmless component.

Besides the individual self-mortification of mystics hidden behind cloister walls, flagellant processions appeared in public spaces in the mid-13th century. A famous flagellant processional happened in 1260, starting in Perugia (Italy) and spreading across the Alps to Germany, Bohemia, and Poland. Earthquakes and the Black Death stirred up another flagellant movement in 1349–1350, which appeared in different waves all over Europe. Huge crowds of clergy and laypeople traveled from town to town and performed new rituals combining collective self-scourging with sermons and hymn chanting. The flagellant movement of 1349–1350 was accompanied by millennial enthusiasm and massacres of Jews. Due to heretical tendencies Pope Clement VI (r. 1342–1352) forbade the processions in 1349. Notwithstanding, flagellant movements, smaller or bigger, are known until the late 15th century in Germany, northern Italy, France, and northern Spain.

During the Catholic reform in the 16th and 17th centuries the Jesuits enthusiastically promoted all kinds of sensual piety such as the veneration of saints and Jesus' mother Mary, paintings and architecture, musical drama and theater. Under their dramaturgical guidance processions, especially flagellant processions during Lent, were encouraged with great ambition as well as theatrical re-enactments of the Passion of Christ.

Since the late 17th century church criticism emerged denouncing the Jesuits as perverts. In the new literary genre of pornography lascivious clerics whipping or watching whippings became standard motifs. At the same time flagellation as a technique of sexual arousal was associated with medicine. Evoking sexual fantasies by flogging was explained with reference to Galen's humoral pathology.

The non-European history of self-flagellation started in the 16th and 17th centuries. The colonial ambitions and missionary fervor of the Spaniards brought Passion plays and the practice of self-flagellation to Mexico and the Philippines. In both countries Iberian "Calvary Catholicism" was introduced with great success. Flagellation in public became popular either as a theatrical element of Passion plays or as separate performance by confraternities or by individuals. The adoption of such rites of self-mortification was accompanied by local reinterpretation. In the Philippines, for instance, self-flagellation is associated with a private vow, the well-being of the family, corporeal purification, and healing, far less with guilt and atonement. Self-flagellation as Lenten ritual is part of popular piety all over the Catholic world, be it the U.S. Southwest, Mexico, the Philippines, or Mediterranean countries such as Italy, Spain, or Portugal. Penitential self-flagellation as an individual act is tolerated and encouraged at least to some degree in lay brotherhoods or congregations (such as Opus Dei) and in penitential orders by the Catholic Church until today.

Self-Flagellation in Shia Islam Self-flagellation in Shia Islam is part of ritualized commemoration of the martyrdom of Imam Husayn (626–680), son of Imam Ali (d. 661) and grandson of Muhammad, which happened in 680 CE. In the power struggle over the legitimate succession of the prophet, one faction encouraged Husayn to fight for leadership. His alleged supporters of Kufa (Iraq), however, betrayed him and his attempted coup failed. In company of only 72 devoted followers and relatives, Imam Husayn was surrounded and besieged by the troops of Omayya ruler Yazid in the Iraqi desert near Kerbela. On the 10th of Muharram, day of Ashura, Yazid's army stormed the camp and massacred Husayn and nearly all of his followers. The corpses were buried in situ and there the shrine of Karbala was erected afterward.

All over the Shiite world the tragedy of Karbala is remembered as a traumatic event and has become a key element of Shiite identity. The glorification of the martyrdom of Husayn and the sorrow over the betrayal is the core of mourning rituals, which are performed annually during the first 10 days of the month of Muharram. Ritual components are the wearing of black clothes, intense weeping, reciting the death narrative of Imam Husayn, somber musical performances, and fasting. The most spectacular and violent parts are processions of men who beat their bare chests with their fists, flagellate their backs with chains (zanjir), or cut their foreheads with swords, razorblades, or knives (tatbir). Theatrical re-enactments of the Battle of Karbala and Husayn's sacrifice are called ta'ziya (Persian: 'aza dari).

Originally, some individuals who called themselves tawabun (repenters) collected at the gravesite of Husayn praising his sacrifice, regretting not fighting and dying alongside him and cursing the killers. Further commemoration gatherings (majlis) were held in private rooms, while in Karbala the ritualized visitation of the grave of Husayn (ziyarah) flourished, in spite of all efforts of Abbasid caliphs to ban the pilgrimage and to prevent the construction of the shrines. In the year 963, the Buyids, a Shiite Persian dynasty, declared the 10th of Muharram as an official feast and public processions on the day of Ashura occurred with regularity shortly afterward.

In early historical sources the blood-shedding rituals are never mentioned. In the shrine cities of Najaf and Karbala self-flagellation with swords and chains became customary as recently as in the early 19th century. According to the documents, non-Arab participants, Persians and Qizilbash-Turks, introduced these practices.

In the 20th century, the theatrical performances of self-mortification caused legal controversies. The practice of flagellation as a means of identification with Imam Husayn was seriously questioned. Even Ayatollah Khamenei released a fatwa against self-mutilation in 1994 but the attempts to outlaw blood-shedding in Husayn's name have remained ineffective as a whole.

During the Islamic revolution in Iran (1978–1979) the Muharram processions and the mourning slogans were successfully utilized to mobilize emotions and the mass upheavals. “Every day is Ashura; every place is Karbala; every month is Muharram”—this slogan was chanted by the crowds, intoned on radio and television, and written on the walls. Since then this most important Shiite ritual has been constantly politicized by reinterpretation. In countries such as Lebanon, Iraq, and Iran the Ashura commemorations are occasionally transformed from a mourning ritual to emphasizing Islamic activism.

At present, the Muharram observances are carried out in all countries with a noteworthy Shiite population, including Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, Lebanon, India, Bahrain, and even in Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago. Laborers from India brought the commemoration rituals to the Caribbean. The main feature of the “Hosay” festival there are colorful parades of cenotaphs for Husayn attended by all ethnic and religious communities. Flagellation, ceremonial chest beating, and other forms of self-mutilation are absent.

Fludd, Robert

1574–1637

Robert Fludd was a Christian Hermeticist, defender of the Rosicrucians, and author of encyclopedic works on the macrocosm and the microcosm.

Fludd was born in 1574 at Milgate House, Kent, England, the son of Sir Thomas Fludd. In 1592 he entered St. John’s College, Oxford, where he moved in High-Church (anti-Puritan) circles, and became a close friend of the future royal physician, William Paddy. He graduated with a master’s degree in the arts in 1598.

Fludd then traveled for six years throughout the European continent. In France he acted as tutor to Catholic aristocratic families, notably that of the duc de Guise. In Rome he met “Grutherus” (possibly Matthäus Greuther), who taught him engineering and introduced him to “magnetic medicines,” including the weapon-salve. In Avignon he contested with the Jesuits over geomancy, a system of divination from randomly thrown pebbles. In Padua he met William Harvey, discoverer of the circulation of the blood. Fludd also visited Spain and Germany, where he became a convert to the Paracelsian system of medicine.

On his return to England in 1605, Fludd entered Christ Church, Oxford, and in the same year passed his doctorate in medicine. But his unorthodox views hindered his acceptance by the College of Physicians, and he was not admitted as a Fellow until 1609. He lived thereafter in London as a successful practitioner, treating many distinguished patients. He never married, and prided himself on his lifelong continence.

Fludd’s worldview was a synthesis of Hermeticism, Christian Kabbalah, neo-Platonism, alchemy, and “occult philosophy” in the tradition of Cornelius Agrippa (1486–1535). He also aspired to universal knowledge of the arts and sciences. During his European travels he had written treatises on arithmetic, geometry, perspective, military science, music, the art of memory, cosmography, geomancy, astrology, and engineering. He now incorporated these into a vast History of the Macrocosm and the Microcosm (Utriusque Cosmi Maioris scilicet et Minoris Metaphysica, Physica atque Technica Historia, 1617–1621). The first volume treated the external world (macrocosm) in two divisions: first the works of God, then those of man, including the arts and sciences. The second volume explained man himself (the microcosm), both in his God-given faculties (such as the physical body and paranormal powers) and in his own inventions that lead to self-knowledge (including palmistry and geomancy). The first part was printed in Germany and dedicated to King James I (1566–1625). Four other parts followed, but the ambitious scheme was never completed. The work is noted for its fine symbolic illustrations of the process of creation, the structure of the macrocosm, the harmony of the spheres, and the nature of the human being. Fludd’s second encyclopedic project was Catholic [in the sense of “universal”] Medicine (Medicina Catholica, 1629–1631). Also unfinished, it expounds a system of medicine that combines astrology, analysis of urine and the pulse, meteorology, and a firm belief in demonic influences.

Fludd’s proud and contentious nature involved him in several controversies. One concerned his use of the weapon-salve, an ointment applied not to a wound but to the weapon that caused it. Another was with the astronomer Johannes Kepler (1571–1630), who criticized Fludd’s unscientific interpretation of the harmony of the spheres. Further critics were Marin Mersenne (1588–1638) and Pierre Gassendi (1596–1655), who objected to Fludd’s Hermeticism and his leanings toward magic.

Fludd was among the earliest defenders of the Rosicrucians, a fictitious order of world reform proclaimed in 1614–1615. Certainly his philosophy accorded with that of the Rosicrucian manifestos, and believers in the Order, up to the present day, have counted him among its chief members.

Fludd died in London on September 8, 1637. His works were largely forgotten until the 20th century, when they became of interest to the modern Rosicrucian orders and to historians of ideas and of science.

Foguangshan

Founded in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, in 1967, Foguangshan (Buddha’s Light Mountain) had by the opening of the 21st century developed into one of the most influential Buddhist organizations in the Republic of China and had opened nearly 100 temples elsewhere around the world. Its founder, Master Xingyun, is regarded as a leading exponent of Humanistic Buddhism (Renjian Fojiao), by which is meant a refocusing of Chan (Zen) and Pure Land practice to more directly deal with the challenges of contemporary life.

Master Xingyun (b. 1927) took vows of renunciation at age 12 in 1939 at Qixia Temple in Nanjing, China. Ten years later, he followed the Nationalist army as it retreated to Taiwan. As his following among both mainland transplants and native Taiwanese grew, he established Foguangshan in the southern part of the island. The monastery's eight-story-high statue of Amitabha Buddha and its Pure Land Cave (which was modeled on Disney World's "It's a Small, Small World") have over the years attracted millions of pilgrims and tourists. Since the 1990s, Foguangshan has undertaken an ambitious campaign to spread the teachings of Humanistic Buddhism around the world.

Rather than exerting their efforts toward being reborn in a pure land elsewhere in the universe, as is usually advocated by the Pure Land School, Humanistic Buddhism exhorts practitioners to transform our own world into a pure land and thereby attain universal enlightenment. Master Xingyun believes that radical, confrontational reforms are not effective means for achieving that goal, since such tactics create too much suffering and remain within dualistic thinking. Instead, he espouses gradual amelioration through each person, whether monastic or lay, engaging in a daily regimen of recitation, meditation, and self-reflection, while simultaneously devoting the rest of his or her time to improving others' material and spiritual conditions. Hence, Foguangshan sponsors a variety of social, educational, and missionary enterprises, including two orphanages, a medical clinic, several preschools, a high school, and a liberal arts university.

Foguangshan projects are typically undertaken in cooperation with political and corporate leaders. Because of this, Master Xingyun's detractors have saddled him with the pejorative labels of "political monk" and "commercial monk." He counters that creating close working relationships with the powerful is an expedient means (in Chinese, fangbian; in Sanskrit, upaya) for achieving Buddhist goals.

Although improving people's material well-being is seen as essential to establishing a pure land on Earth, the key to realizing such a utopia nonetheless remains cultivating people's wisdom and compassion through exposure to Buddhism. Foguangshan is therefore especially well known in Taiwan for its publishing empire, which includes a punctuated edition of the Buddhist canon; a six-volume encyclopedia of Buddhism; and scores of books, cassettes, and videos by Master Xingyun on Humanistic Buddhism. The emphasis on promoting Buddhist teachings is also seen in Foguangshan's missionary efforts. Although the vast majority of devotees in Foguangshan branch temples outside of Taiwan are overseas Chinese Buddhists, the organization has also devoted considerable energy to bringing others into its fold. Hsi Lai Temple (Hacienda Heights, California), Nan Tien Temple (Wollengong, Australia), and Nan Hua Temple (Bronkhorstspuit, South Africa) have been at the forefront of Foguangshan missionary activity.

Approximately 1,300 monks and nuns were within the Foguang ranks in the year 2008, and the order's lay society, known as the Buddha's Light International Association, had a membership of at least 400,000 and perhaps more than one million.

Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition

The Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (FPMT) is the most widespread Tibetan Buddhist group of the Gelugpa School outside Tibet. The Gelugpa School is the reformed Tibetan school generally identified with the Dalai Lama and the FPMT may be seen as the Dalai Lama's main support group within the Buddhist world though he has no official position within the organization.

The founder of the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition, Lama Thubten Yeshe (1935–1984), was born in Tibet. He was identified as the reincarnation of the abess of Chi-me lung Gompa and joined Sera Je College near Lhasa, where he remained until he was 25. In 1959 he fled into northeast India along with many other Tibetans and there continued his studies. Here he met Lama Thubten Zopa Rinpoche (b. 1945), who became his first disciple. In 1965 the lamas first came into contact with a number of Westerners, many of whom were on the hippie trail to India, most important, Zina Rechevsky, an American heiress. Her request to be taught by the lamas resulted in her ordination as a nun by the Dalai Lama in 1967. The trio moved to Nepal in 1969, where they founded Kopan Monastery.

Over the following years Kopan attracted a large influx of Westerners, and the seeds of a new Buddhist movement were sown. Lama Yeshe developed a distinctive teaching style tailored to Western understanding and began to visit many groups, which had arisen throughout the West. By 1975 the extent of the movement was such that Lama Yeshe formed a group in order to oversee the diverse activities that were then taking place. This group was named the Council for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (CPMT) and comprised directors of Dharma centers, rural retreat centers, and training institutes, which were all part of the expanding organization that came to be known as the FPMT. It has now spread into over 26 countries across 4 continents. In 2008, the FPMT reported 147 centers, study groups, and projects in 31 countries worldwide under its spiritual direction.

Lama Yeshe died of a heart attack in a California hospital in 1984, and Lama Zopa succeeded him as spiritual director. In 1984 Osel Hita Torres was born to Spanish parents and was soon identified by His Holiness the Dalai Lama as the reincarnation of Lama Yeshe. He is now training at Sera Je monastery in southern India. In the future he will replace Lama Zopa as the spiritual director of the FPMT.

Conishead Priory in the United Kingdom was purchased in 1976 and was named the Manjushri Center. It became a thriving training and retreat center under the spiritual directorship of Geshe Kelsang Gyatso. However, tensions grew between the FPMT, then situated far away in Nepal, and the Manjushri Center. After much antagonism the Manjushri Center eventually split away from the FPMT and a new movement, the New Kadampa Tradition, was founded under the spiritual guidance of Geshe Kelsang (b. 1931). The two groups have no affiliation today.

At present Lama Zopa Rinpoche remains the spiritual director, and his authority is shared with the FPMT via the board of directors. The CPMT is responsible for representing all members of the various centers around the world. The FPMT Inc. Office (international office) is responsible for administration, legal and financial matters, education, and other coordinating functions, as well as the implementation of ideas stemming from the FPMT board of directors and from the CPMT. Many centers have Tibetan geshes as their resident teachers; the geshe is often assisted by a Western monk or nun.

Central to the FPMT teaching is the Lam Rim Chen Mo, which is a synopsis of the Perfection of Wisdom literature, though many other Buddhist texts are referred to as and when necessary. Although various meditation and Tantric practices are taught, the FPMT describe their main practice as “following the spiritual advice of Lama Zopa Rinpoche,” which is based on the Mahayana Gelug sect of Tibetan Buddhism and follows the lineage of Lama Tsong Khapa.

Lama Yeshe and Lama Zopa also began the Maitreya Project, an effort to build a 500-foot bronze statue of Maitreya Buddha (one of the main deities in the Mahayan Buddhist pantheon) at Kushinagar, Uttar Pradesh, in northern India. The statue will be seated on a throne, and the throne will be a building that will house several temples, a museum and library, and welcoming centers for tourists and pilgrims. When completed, the statue will become the largest religious statue in the world.

Fox, George

George Fox, a critic of the Church of England in 17th-century England, withdrew his membership and, after experiencing what he interpreted as communications from God, founded the Society of Friends, popularly known as the Quakers. The Quakers subsequently grew into an international movement best known for its work on peace concerns.

George Fox was the founder of the Society of Friends, better known as the Quakers. (Vincent L. Milner, Religious Denominations of the World, 1872)

Fox was born in July 1624 in Fenny Drayton, Leicestershire, England. While a teenager apprenticed to a shoemaker, he began to focus his thoughts on religious issues. He found himself dissatisfied with the religious trappings of the Church of England and he withdrew. Though still in his teens, as early as 1643, he began speaking against the church’s ornate buildings and the presence of ordained ministers as being unhelpful and even a hindrance to the basic element of the religious life, establishing a personal relationship with God. He moved from his critique of religion toward a more positive message following an intense experience of the divine in 1646. He now spoke of God dwelling within every individual and emphasized that communication with God was a possibility. God had given each person the Inner Light through which it was possible to speak to Christ.

The original core of people who gathered around Fox was termed the Friends of Truth. One by one, they also withdrew from the Church of England and, most important, refused to pay any church tithes. Fox exhorted the group to tremble before the word of God, an admonition they took somewhat literally. That characteristic led to their being derisively called Quakers, a term traced to Justice Bennet of Derby.

The movement, now termed the Society of Friends, emerged more or less informally during the period of the Commonwealth in England (1649–1660) and came to include some 20,000 adherents. With the restoration of the monarchy, however, Fox and the Friends suffer severe setbacks. During the reign of Charles II (r. 1660–1685), who leaned toward Catholicism, more than 13,000 Friends were imprisoned, some being sent into slavery. They developed a reputation for refusing to recognize differences of social rank, to take oaths (including the oath of loyalty to the Crown), and to pay church tithes. Margaret Fell (1614–1702), the wife of the vice chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and an early convert, provided a haven for some of her fellow believers at her estate, Swarthmore Hall. Following the death of her husband, in 1669 she married Fox.

As the movement grew throughout England, Fox extended his travels. He visited Germany and Holland in Europe and crossed the Atlantic to visit the British American colonies, Barbados, and Jamaica. He found a valued colleague in William Penn, who used his inheritance to found two havens for Quakers in the American colonies. When possible, Penn also traveled with Fox. Fox continued to travel until shortly before his death.

Fox organized the movement around a hierarchy of Monthly (congregational), Quarterly (district), and Annual (national) Meetings. Leadership was provided by elders appointed to care for ministry and overseers who took charge of the needs of the poor and the children. Members lived in simplicity. Meetings centered upon waiting for communications from the Inner Light. Women played a prominent role in the developing movement from the beginning.

Fox died January 13, 1691, in London. Active to the end, he had preached earlier that day at the meeting house on Gracechurch Street. Over the next several years, Penn led a group that assembled and published Fox's Journal, which appeared in 1694.

■ France

France is located in the very heart of Western Europe, and its capital is Paris. Around 64 million inhabitants dwell in the country, according to the latest census. French is the dominant language, and the country embraces a wide spectrum of linguistic and cultural variations. France ranges among the most developed countries (with a GNP up to $34,000 per person); it is primarily urban (76 percent of the total population), politically secure (as a republic system devoid of major trouble since World War II), and economically stable (despite the fact that 3 percent of the national wealth goes to the poorest 10 percent of the citizens, compared to 25 percent that goes to the richest 10 percent).

Since 1905 and the official separation between state and church, France is supposed to be a model secularized country. However, and despite the political system of laïcité (that prohibited, for instance, the teaching of religion in school and the survey of denominations), Roman Catholicism retains a major cultural influence, and new forms of religious activities (the “sects” and the religious heritage of migrants) have spread out in the public spheres, challenging the ideal of a lay national citizenship.

Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris exemplifies the Gothic architectural style. (J. Gordon Melton)

The religious history of France is thoroughly related to Roman Catholicism, which shaped the social and political basis for the foundation of the nation-state, as well as the framework of French culture. France has traditionally been considered “the eldest daughter of the (Roman) Church.”

Originally, the ancient territory now called Gaul (from the Latin Gallia), forerunner of France, was home to a pre-Celtic and Celtic pastoral and tribal civilization, whose religion was Druidism. After Greek (sixth century BCE) and Roman (second century BCE on) rule, Gaul was absorbed by the Roman Empire. The Gallic provinces began to be converted to Christianity in the first century of the new era.

The Franks, a Pagan Germanic tribe, invaded Gaul, along with other Germanic tribes, in the fifth century, but the baptism of the Frankish leader, Clovis (ca. 466–511), and his people inaugurated a lineage of Christian emperors and kings whose power was legitimated by the blessing of the church. This lineage stretched from the early Merovingian, Carolingian, and Capetian kings, to the late Napoleonic Empire (1804–1814) and the Second Empire (1852–1870).

Recurring barbarian invasions and endless territorial wars between feudal kingdoms in the Middle Ages and the early Renaissance did not allow the lasting foundation of a centralized and powerful state. Despite the success of Charlemagne (742–814) in having himself crowned emperor of the Romans by the pope (800), his unification of many territories into an empire (from the eighth to the 10th centuries) proved fragile, and the Holy Roman Empire that was based on his achievement turned out to be a rival of France rather than an extension of its power. For a time, nevertheless, France grew into the most powerful of feudal monarchies. Simultaneously, Roman Catholic institutions settled in France by way of the building of abbeys (Cluny, 927–942), monasteries, and cathedrals all over the country. The propagation and the reinforcement of the faith were achieved by means of evangelism and Crusades (1096–1291). The Catholic organization of the country was founded upon the model of Roman administrations and reflected the traditional structures of the pre-Christian civilization. This “parish civilization” (a territorial structuring in dioceses) persisted as the main religious and social form of organization in France until the 20th century.

After France recovered from the struggle with England later called the Hundred Years’ War, the French monarchy became stable and strong enough to survive the Wars of Religion of the 16th century, brought on by the Protestant Reformation, and to keep France Catholic. At the same time, the French monarchy avoided domination by the pope, and it was among the French clergy that Gallicanism originated as a movement that favored the restriction of papal control and the achievement by the clergy of each nation of administrative autonomy. Moreover, the Edict of Nantes (1598) granted the French Protestants (of the Reformed tradition; called Huguenots) a high degree of religious freedom and even power in some areas.

The absolutist French monarchy of the second half of the 17th century was shaped by a cardinal, the famous Richelieu (1585–1642), and came to its greatest power under Louis XIV (1638–1715), who saw himself as the greatest champion of the Roman Catholic Church and answerable only to God. He encouraged unity of religion, gradually undermining the freedoms and privileges of the Protestants and finally revoking the Edict of Nantes (1685), thus driving many Huguenots out of France and greatly weakening the French economy. The oppressiveness of the political system seemed inextricably linked with the power of the church, and the philosophes of the Age of Enlightenment, such as Voltaire (1694–1778), risked their lives when they questioned either.

It is thus not surprising that the French Revolution of 1798 brought about a quick laicization of institutions (public records, health, and social services) and originated a first major rupture with Rome. During the Reign of Terror there was even an effort to completely de-Christianize France—in 1793 the Cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris was proclaimed a Temple of Reason, and widespread persecutions occurred, especially in 1793–1794. On the other hand, ultimately the Revolution contributed to the recognition by state institutions of denominational pluralism (1795). Despite the dispossession of Roman Catholic Church properties during the First Empire, Napoleon I (1769–1821), knowing that most of his subjects were still Roman Catholics and wishing a return to stability, re-established relationships with Rome; the Concordat of 1801 made the Roman Catholic Church once again the established church of France, supported by the state, yet kept the church firmly Gallican, that is, under the control of the French government. After the first defeat of Napoleon I, the monarchy was restored, but it was a constitutional monarchy and remained one (after a brief hiatus in 1815, ended by Napoleon I's final defeat at Waterloo) until the Revolution of 1848. The Roman Catholic Church remained the established church, and Catholicism continued the revival it had experienced under Napoleon I, but the principle of religious toleration remained in force. It was only with the fall of the Second Empire (1870) and the establishment of the Third Republic (1871) that a republican political and social system came into being that completed the laicization of France.

French aesthetics, literature, and science have slowly separated from religious influences, starting in the 18th century. Further, the progress of industrialization and urbanization, together with the rise of new social strata (proletariat, bourgeoisie), contributed to the process of secularization in France. Emerging ideologies of the 18th and 19th centuries, such as Humanism, Positivism, and Rationalism, also played a key role in this process, in addition to politicized anti-clerical movements (even stronger since the mid-19th century) and to the rise of Freethought in the upper classes of society (which had begun in the 17th century). At the same time, Catholicism got more involved in social action (especially in the mid-19th century) and political life (especially between 1860 and 1875). Even so, the educational system was laicized in 1882, and the separation of state and church was decreed in 1905.

From that time, although Catholic Christianity in France has seen various religious renewals (through evangelism, especially in Christian youth movements [1935–1965]), it has on the whole weakened, and there has been a rapid growth of atheism. At the same time, since the mid-1970s the decay of the Catholic Church has favored the rise of new forms of Christian religiosity through traditional community forms (Mennonites, Baptists, or Friends [Quakers]) or evangelical movements (Adventists, Pentecostalism, Jehovah's Witnesses), introduced in France in the years 1900–1930.

Nevertheless, despite the weakening of Catholic institutions and organizations, statistical estimates place the native Catholic population of France at about 56 percent (according to social scientific sources) to 74 percent (according to religious sources). In comparison, Protestants (including Reformed, Lutherans, and Baptists) represent currently between 1 and 2 percent of the French population, while Eastern Orthodox adherents only account for 0.5 percent. Protestantism is represented in France most notably by such bodies as the Reformed Church of France, the Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine, the Evangelical Lutheran Church of France, and the Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine. The Protestant Federation of France includes these churches and additional groups such as the Salvation Army and the Federation of Evangelical Baptist Churches of France. The Paris Mission, supported by the Reformed Church, has been an important force in the worldwide spread of Protestantism since the 19th century.

Existing along with Christianity are “foreign” religions, imported through migration: Judaism, Islam, and various Asian religious groups. The presence of Jews dates to the late Middle Ages. They encountered a challenging integration in France, due to a long-lasting tradition of anti-Semitism. Jews acquired French citizenship in 1790–1791 and soon benefited from the official recognition of their religious life owing to integrative laws (1808) and later antidiscrimination laws (1846). Anti-Semitism then gained renewed life as a popular and influential movement in the late 19th century, culminating in the Dreyfus Affair, which began with the unjust sentencing of a Jewish officer, Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935), to life in prison for treason (1895). A national movement led by some of France’s greatest intellectuals fought to exonerate him, and anticlericalism was strengthened by the role the Catholic Church was perceived as having played in his ordeal. Nevertheless, the 1930s crisis reinforced anti-Semitism, and the collaborationist government of Vichy during World War II joined the Nazis in deporting many French Jews to concentration camps. In the second half of the 20th century, the massive settling of migrants from North Africa led to a revitalization of Jewish faith in France, especially propelled by the Jews of Algeria. Following independence in 1962, the Algerian government moved to suppress the Jewish community by, among other actions, depriving Jews of their economic rights. As a result, almost 130,000 Algerian Jews immigrated to France. At the end of the 20th century, Jews made up approximately one percent of the total population of France (some 600,000).

The 1989’s “veil” affair (two young Muslim schoolgirls refused to remove their traditional veil, or hijab, in school) propelled Islam (mainly Sunnis of the Maliki School) to the forefront of public debates. Islam came to France with the migration influxes of the 1960s from Morocco (one million), Tunisia, and Algeria (more than one million), as well as Turkey (200,000) and sub-Saharan African countries. The Muslim community now includes some 4 to 5 million adherents. It is the largest Muslim presence in Western Europe, and the most substantial since medieval Spain. There are only less than a dozen formal mosques, but between 1,600 and 2,000 less formal prayer and worship centers. The Grand Mosque in Paris serves as a symbolic center of the rather diverse community, but has faced internal tensions regarding the issue of the diversity of denominational and ethnic trends in French Islam. Since the mid-1970s, socially and sometimes politically active Muslim movements have emerged among the migrants and their naturalized offspring, who are torn between marginalization and integration, and who suffer an enduring xenophobic stigmatization because of their native religion. The multiplication of places of worship, the increasing number of French converts, and the argument against the principles of laïcité by some Muslim groups in France have motivated political considerations concerning religious pluralism. Since the early 2000s, the French model of assimilation, by which citizenship is predominantly based upon denomination and ethnicity, is slowly and difficultly shifting toward a model of multiculturalism, inspired by the Anglo-Saxon experiences.

Asian religions entered the French soil through migration influxes, mainly from the French ex-colonies of Laos, Vietnam, and Cambodia (Indochina), carrying Buddhism (from 350,000 to 500,000 adherents) and other forms of beliefs and practices (Daoism, Confucianism, and more recent indigenous groups such as Caodism). The United Buddhist Church transferred its headquarters from Vietnam to rural France. The International Zen Association is a large international Japanese Zen movement headquartered in Paris. Hindu immigrants from India and Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka number around 50,000 adherents.

Another and last face of the French religious landscape is the development of new religious movements beginning in the 1950s, including various Asian movements that have spread through the West in the last generation (the Unification Movement, Transcendental Meditation, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness) as well as Western Esoteric groups (Rosicrucians, Fraternité Blanche Universelle, the Acropole) and several uniquely French groups and organizations (Invitation à la Vie [IVI], the Aumist Religion [Mandrom], Ares). The increase in numbers of New Age, or “alternative,” movements (more than 300 groups with from several dozens to thousands of members) and the controversy that began in the mid-1990s (following the murder and suicide deaths of members of the Solar Temple) about “sects” has focused public debates on issues of religious freedom, denominational pluralism, and secularization in France. The result has been the passing of a series of laws aimed at suppressing the “sects” in France, with the Jehovah’s Witnesses, the Church of Scientology, the Aumists, and the Buddhist movement Soka Gakkai International being primary targets. The UNADFI (Union Nationale des Associations de Défense de la Famille et de l’Individu) is struggling against the sectarian groups supposed to disregard the laws and norms of French society. In 1998, the government launched a Mission Interministérielle de Lutte contre les Sectes (MILS), replaced in 2002 by a Mission Interministérielle de Vigilance et de Lutte contre les Dérives Sectaires (MIVILUDES), whose mission is to watch over the developments of these “alternative” spiritualities.

As a final point, mention must be made of the subtle but ongoing persistence of indigenous beliefs in overseas French territories (French Polynesia and Guyana, as well as islands such as Réunion, Martinique, and Guadeloupe), despite their formal conversion to Roman Catholicism.

Francis of Assisi

ca. 1182–1226

One of the most beloved figures in Western Christian history, Francis of Assisi is revered by Protestants as a gentle soul and venerated by Roman Catholics as a saint. Best known as the founder of the Franciscan Order, now existing in multiple branches, he is acknowledged for his championing of the virtue of poverty in the religious life and for his concern for animals and nature. His best recognized literary work is also the first known Italian poem/hymn, the “Canticle to the Sun.”

Francis was born in Assisi, in the Province of Perugia, in central Italy, around 1181 or 1182, the son of Pietro and Pica di Bernadone. His father was relatively wealthy with income derived from trade in cloth, banking, and land ownership. Francis traveled widely from his home in Assisi in his early years, enjoyed parties, and had a fighting streak. He wanted to become a knight. He also seems to have had a right inner life from an early age and people knew him as a person who experienced vivid dreams and even visions.

At one point, he became a soldier and was captured in battle. Following his repatriation, he began to spend times in prayer. He developed a piety built around fasting and alms giving. This new turn, however, did not stop his return to the battlefield. On his way, he stopped by a long-neglected church building, the chapel of San Damiano. While at prayer, he heard what he understood to be the voice of Christ speaking to him. He took the words he heard, “Rebuild my church,” quite literally. Reversing his course, he returned to Assisi, where he sold some expensive bolts of cloth and gave the proceeds to the priest in charge of the chapel.

His angry father took Francis to court. The trial was held before the local bishop. Francis reacted to the whole proceeding by stripping naked and renouncing his inheritance. He subsequently donned a simple robe with a hood (later to become the common habit of the Franciscan Order). Now on his own, he began to engage in the physical rebuilding of some chapels in Perugia. During a worship service at the chapel of Santa Maria degli Angeli, known as the Portiuncula (“Little Portion”), he again heard Jesus speak: “Preach as you go, saying, ‘The kingdom of heaven is at hand’” (Matthew 10:17). Though an untutored layman, he began to preach. He attracted a group of young men, most of noble birth, around him. As their numbers grew, they spread out in pairs and preached through central Italy and into France and Spain.

The emergence of this group around Francis occurred contemporaneously with the appearance of a variety of medieval movements that had received negative attention from the church due to their heretical notions and extraordinary piety. Aware of the church’s reaction to these other movements, Francis and some of his associates traveled to Rome in 1209 to ask papal approval for what would be a new religious order. In initial conversations with officials at the Vatican, he was told to adopt the rules of the more established orders. Francis rejected the suggestions, as he had a very different order in mind. He not only wanted members of the order to take personal vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; he wanted the order collectively to renounce ownership of property. Rather than reside in one place (as a monastic order), he wanted the brother to itinerate around the countryside, without a home. The ideal of poverty would be thorough. It would allow them to concentrate on their work, identify with common people, and preach the gospel simply.

Francis offered a simple rule designed to copy the life of the Apostles as portrayed in the New Testament and emphasizing love of God and one's neighbor. The brothers were supposed to preach to the poor and oppressed while attempting to alleviate the suffering of the sick and homeless. Finally, Pope Innocent III (r. 1198–1216) granted his tentative approval. The order now experienced a spurt of growth, attracting many young men and even a few women. Most notably, Clare di Favarone, a young noble woman of Assisi, adopted Francis's life and became the founder of the second Franciscan order called the Poor Clares. Laypeople attracted to Francis, but not ready to accept the full life of a wandering mendicant, formed a spiritual association called the Brothers and Sisters of Penance.

The Franciscan movement was taking shape. The Benedictines, who owned the Chapel of Santa Maria degli Angeli, would give it to the brothers as a mother church. The Poor Clares would adopt a life similar to cloistered Benedictines and would receive San Damiano as a home base. The Brothers and Sisters of Penance would evolve into the Franciscan Third Order and would early on become known for using their wealth to assist victims of war and purchasing medicine for the poor. In 1219, some 3,000 friars arrived in Assisi for the annual meeting of the order held each Pentecost.

In 1213 Francis made the first of several international journeys to preach to the Muslims in Spain. In 1219 he made his way to Egypt where Crusaders were fighting the forces of the sultan al-Malik al-Kamil (1180–1238). Francis found a way to slip through the battle lines and engage the sultan in conversations. The following year found him in Acre, Palestine, one of the cities most in contention during the Crusades.

While in Acre, Francis learned of a controversy that was splitting his order in Italy. Church leaders were never happy with the challenge Francis presented to their often opulent life in spite of their personal renouncing of ownership of property and wealth. Bowing to pressure, the brothers had, in Francis's absence, amended the rules to allow corporate ownership of property. Unable to reimpose the rule on absolute poverty, Francis resigned his leadership in favor of Peter of Catanio (d. 1221). Francis continued attempts to amend the rule, but failed to reinstitute the older strictures relative to poverty. The rule was finally approved by Pope Honorius III (r. 1216–1227) in 1223.

Francis's association with animals comes from the later phase of his life. At one point, while on retreat, he staged a re-enactment of the birth of Christ in a cave using live animals. That event was followed by his distributing food to the poor and to the local stable animals. This became an annual tradition. Today, because of Francis, many Catholic and other churches hold annual blessings for animals.

Francis's visionary life also persisted into his later years. Most notably, in 1224 while in retreat with Francis, Brother Leo observed the appearance of an angel who imposed upon Francis the stigmata (the five wounds Christ received on his body during the crucifixion). Francis became the first person in Christian history known to experience this phenomenon, though a number would experience it in successive centuries.

Francis died October 3, 1226, at Assisi. At the moment of death, he lay on the ground naked, as he had requested. The cause of his death was the multiple diseases he had acquired in his travels, including tuberculosis and probably leprosy.

Francis's influence remains strong. The three orders created in his lifetime grew into large international organizations and were particularly important in the spread of Catholicism around the world. A number of additional orders have emerged over the centuries following the Franciscan rule, both within the Roman Catholic Church and among Anglicans and Lutherans.

His love of animals and nature led to his "Canticle to the Sun," a hymn on God and his creation:

Be praised, my Lord, with all your creatures,
Especially my master Brother Sun,
Through whom he gives us the day and through whom light shines.
He is beautiful and radiant with great splendor;
Of you, most High, he is the symbol.

Interestingly enough, the literary piece most associated with Francis, a prayer to peace, is a much later anonymous literary production ascribed to Francis in the 20th century.

Lord, make me an instrument of Thy peace;
 where there is hatred, let me sow love;
 where there is injury, pardon;
 where there is doubt, faith;
 where there is despair, hope;
 where there is darkness, light;
 and where there is sadness, joy.

This prayer became well known during and immediately after World War II as a result of its wide distribution by Archbishop Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York.

Pope Gregory IX (r. 1227–1241) canonized Francis in 1229. Roman Catholics celebrate his feast day on October 4.

Francis Xavier

1506–1552

Francis Xavier, a first-generation Jesuit priest, was a pioneer Roman Catholic missionary to Asia. He established the church in India and Japan and prepared the way for the re-entrance of Christianity into China.

Francis was born April 7, 1506, in Navarre. During the war that added Navarre to the new united Spain, the castle of the Francis's family was destroyed (1512). Sent to Paris for his college education, he met Ignatius Loyola while at the Sorbonne. Xavier became one of Loyola's close associates and was one of the original members of the Jesuit Order (the Society of Jesus) who took their vows with him on August 15, 1534.

Meanwhile Xavier earned his doctorate and became a college professor. He settled at Venice and was ordained while there in 1537. In 1540, King John of Portugal called for priests to serve in India, where the Portuguese had been establishing colonies for several decades. Xavier volunteered to go and was named apostolic nuncio (papal ambassador with the authority of an archbishop) to Asia. He sailed for India in 1541 and reached Goa in 1542. He initially settled at Cape Comorin to work among the pearl-fishers. He assumed leadership of the Jesuit college, and in 1544 Loyola named him the first provincial of the Society of Jesus in Goa. In 1545, he further expanded his mission by moving to Malaysia (Malacca) and Indonesia (the Moluccas).

The most famous segment of his life began in 1547, when he encountered a Japanese man named Yajio. Yajio convinced Xavier to establish work in Japan and subsequently became his translator. He arrived in Japan in 1549 and was given some limited freedom to preach by the local ruler (daimyo) at Kagoshima. With Yajiro's help, he produced a catechism in Japanese.

While in Japan, Xavier developed a vision of evangelizing China. To that end, in 1552, he moved to Shangchuan, an island near Canton. He would die there December 3, 1552, while waiting to gain entrance into the Chinese kingdom. He was buried in the Good Jesus Church at Goa, India.

Xavier's work was all the more notable as it brought good news to Rome about the expansion of the church at the very time it was suffering setbacks due to the Muslim invasion of Europe along the Danube and the loss of much of Northern Europe to the Protestant Reformation. The church would expand rapidly throughout Asia through the century following Francis's death. Pope Paul V (r. 1605–1621) beatified Xavier in 1619, and just three years later, Pope Gregory XV (r. 1621–1623) canonized him (at the same time Francis's mentor Ignatius Loyola was canonized). Today Francis is hailed as the patron saint of missionaries. The Roman Catholic Church celebrates his feast day on December 3.

The work initiated by Xavier continues in India, Malaysia, Japan, and China. In the half century after Xavier's death, a Christian community of some 300,000 emerged in Japan. Then, in 1614, the shogun banned the faith. Christianity went underground and survived until the opening of Japan in the 19th century. A new generation of missionaries discovered communities of "hidden Christians" at various locations across the country.

Franciscans

The Order of Friars Minor is the primary group referred to by the designation Franciscan. There are also two other groups: the order of contemplative nuns popularly known as the Poor Clares (or Second Order) and a lay order, the Third Order of St. Francis. The Order of Friars Minor traces its beginning to Saint Francis of Assisi (ca. 1181–1226). As a young man from a well-to-do family, he felt a call to "rebuild Christ's church" and to live the renounced life: poverty, preaching the gospel, and penance. Others were attracted to him, and he authored a rule that was, according to the order's tradition, verbally approved by Pope Innocent III (r. 1198–1216) in 1209, the founding date of the order.

The rule underwent a number of revisions over the next century, some caused by the need to adapt the rule to the quickly growing membership, the need to interpret ambiguous parts of the text, and the question of how property was to be handled in light of Francis's rather austere understanding of poverty. The legal and practical problems of handling possessions caused tensions in the order for decades, though some moderation was found during the leadership of Saint Bonaventura (1217–1274), considered the order's second founder. The tendency to adopt a more absolutist position on poverty, however, continued to attract many Franciscans. The next generation of the more radical Franciscans was called the Spirituals, and they were vigorously suppressed by the church.

In the 14th century, laxity in the main body of the order led to the emergence of a new subgroup, the Observants, who tended to retire to remote locations where they could practice the rule of Saint Francis in all its austerity. By the end of the century the movement had spread from Italy to France and Spain. Gradually a split developed between the main body of the order, the Conventuals, and the Observants, officially recognized in 1517. The Observants, which constituted the majority of the Franciscans at the time of the split, became the base of other reforming efforts that further split the order. Most of these additional reformed groups were reunited into the Observant branch of the order in 1897. The union of 1897 left three major branches of Franciscans—the Conventuals, the Observants, and the Capuchins (officially recognized in 1619).

In the meantime, the Franciscan movement had spread throughout the known world. Franciscans spread across Europe, were given special responsibility for the Holy Land, and founded the first Catholic churches in China. In the 18th century, the Jesuits had taken the lead in the Catholic Church's missionary work outside Europe, especially in the Americas. Thousands of Franciscans moved to the Americas in the 17th century, and after the Jesuits were suppressed in 1773, Franciscans were in most cases called to take their place. The international role of the Franciscans continued through the 19th century (in spite of ups and downs in various particular locations), and by the middle of the 20th century their centers could be found in more than 135 countries. Since the 1960s, they have reasserted an emphasis on ministering to the poor.

The Order of Friars Minor (continuing the Observant tradition) has its international center at Mediatrice 25, I-00165 Rome, Italy. It has a website at <http://www.ofm.org/>.

The Order of Friars Minor Capuchins has its international center at Curia Generalis Ord. Min. Cap. Via Piemonte 70, I-00187 Rome, Italy. It has several websites sponsored by the different Provinces, including <http://capuchin.org> and <http://www.capuchinfriars.org.au>. The order is currently active in 76 countries. The most famous Capuchin in the 20th century was undoubtedly Padre Pio, an Italian monk noted for his having the stigmata, the five wounds of Christ, in his hands, feet, and side. Although a number of cases of the stigmata have been reported over the centuries, he was the first priest in the history of the church in which they were manifest. He was beatified (a step toward sainthood) by Pope John Paul II on May 2, 1999.

The Order of Friars Minor Conventuals has its international center at Piazza SS. Apostoli 51, I-000187, Rome, Italy.

Contemporaneous with the founding of the Franciscans, a counterpart for females, the Poor Clares, was founded by Saint Francis and Saint Clare (1194–1243) in 1214. Cardinal Ugolino (later Pope Gregory IX) gave the order its first rule in 1219. Over the centuries, like their male counterpart, the Clares split into several branches. The Urbanists follow the rule of Pope Urban IV (1263), which allows some exemption from corporate poverty as well as personal poverty; the Collettines are named after Saint Collette, who restored the principle of corporate poverty in her houses in the 15th century. A Capuchin branch originated in the 16th century, paralleling developments in the male branches of the order. Most of the convents of the Poor Clares are purely contemplative and are strictly enclosed.

Frankel, Zachariah

1801–1875

Zachariah Frankel was a German Jewish theologian who sought a means to introduce reforms in Jewish life and worship without giving in to the more radical program of Reform Judaism. He developed what was termed the Positive Historical School of Jewish thought that would lead to Conservative Judaism.

Frankel was born September 30, 1801, in Prague (now the Czech Republic) and inherited rabbinical lineages on both sides of his family. After studying at the local yeshiva, in 1825 he entered the university at Budapest. He was ordained a rabbi and in 1836 became the chief rabbi at Dresden. He was early on attracted to the Reform cause, but soon became unenamored with the extremes he saw it taking. In 1845 he walked out of a Reform conference that was discussing the elimination of Hebrew from the Sabbath service. He would later become the rabbi in Leipzig, Germany, and director of the rabbinical seminary in Breslau.

Frankel arrived at what would be his mature position by 1859 when he published Darkhei HaMishnah (The Ways of the Mishnah). Based upon his broad survey of traditional texts, he concluded that Jewish law developed as a response to changing historical conditions. By the term “Positive Historical Judaism,” he was asserting that Jews had developed an ability to be committed to Jewish law (halakhah) as well as a rational faith, and, most important, the idea that the authority of Jewish law rested on its use by Jews over the generations. To bolster his opinion, he demonstrated in great detail how Judaism had changed and evolved over the centuries. The clear implication was that while the Torah may be of divine origin and hence true, the Jewish community has taken charge of the emergent Jewish legal system.

Frankel’s basic position would become the philosophical foundation later taken to America upon which Conservative Judaism would emerge a generation later. The Conservative position views the community as the active agent in determining the shape of Jewish belief and practice generation by generation.

Frankel died in Breslau on February 13, 1875.

Fraternité Blanche Universelle

The Fraternité Blanche Universelle (Universal White Brotherhood) grew out of the White Brotherhood that had been founded in Bulgaria at the beginning of the 20th century by Peter Deunov (1864–1944). In 1937, as the movement peaked, the aging Deunov sent Omraam Michael Aivanhov (1900–1986), one of his accomplished students, to Paris to open a center. His settlement in Paris was quickly followed by World War II, Deunov’s death, and the rise of Soviet power in Bulgaria. With the suppression of the movement in its land of origin, Aivanhov emerged as the leader of the movement in the West and a spiritual teacher in his own right.

The ultimate authority for the White Brotherhood is believed to be a fraternity of highly evolved beings who reside on a higher plane of existence. The earthly organization is seen as a visible reflection of this invisible Brotherhood, and the leadership is believed to be in contact with its members. The purpose of the Brotherhood is to pass on the eternal religion of Christ; it continues the tradition of the Church of St. John, considered by many as the genuine embodiment of Christian spirituality. The Church of St. John is seen as following the spirit rather than the letter of Christ's teaching (which the visible Church of St. Peter is seen as following). This tradition embodies a Christian version of Western Esotericism.

Aivanhov teaches that the goal of one's life is to know oneself, to unite one's human self with the divine self. Having made that connection, one is attuned to the White Brotherhood and ready to participate in the great work. The masters of the Brotherhood are attempting to bring the kingdom of God into reality on Earth. Aivanhov expounded on this basic idea at length in his writings and public discourses. These are published in two collections, The Complete Works (35 volumes) and the Izvor Collection (36 volumes).

Aivanhov's works are published in several languages by Editions Prosveta. In the decades following the war, the Brotherhood expanded in France, where it now has some 5,000 members and began to establish centers in other French-speaking countries. In the early 1980s the first center was opened in the United States. In 2008, it reported work in 23 countries, including countries in Western Europe, North and South America, and Africa. The largest concentration of members remains in French-speaking countries such as France (5,000) and Quebec (4,000). Since Aivanhov's death, the Brotherhood has developed a decentralized leadership. Anyone may join the Brotherhood and participate in its activities of spreading the teachings and attend the congresses held several times annually.

Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X

The Fraternity, or Society, of Saint Pius X is a large body of traditionalist Roman Catholics, regarded by the Vatican as schismatic although an ongoing dialogue aimed at a reconciliation is in process. Monsignor Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991), a French Roman Catholic missionary priest working in Africa, became first a bishop there, then the apostolic delegate for the whole of French-speaking Africa, and finally archbishop of Dakar in 1955. In 1962, he returned to France to become bishop of Tulle, while at the same time remaining superior general of his missionary religious order, the Fathers of the Holy Spirit. He resigned in 1968, however, finding himself unwilling to cooperate with the aggiornamento program requested for religious orders by the Second Vatican Council. In 1970, he opened near Fribourg, Switzerland, a seminary for young Catholic men seeking a "traditional" preparation for the priesthood. After a few months, the seminary moved to Ecône, in the Swiss Diocese of Sion, where the bishop had already granted his approval and incorporation of Lefebvre's organization as the Fraternity of Saint Pius X. In 1974, however, the Vatican started to investigate complaints that the seminary was offering a formation program incompatible with the Second Vatican Council, and in 1975 an ad hoc commission of cardinals requested Lefebvre to refrain from performing further priestly ordinations. He rejected the injunction, however, and on June 29, 1976, defied the Vatican by ordaining 13 new priests.

On July 22, 1976, the Vatican suspended Lefebvre from his functions as bishop and as priest (a lesser sanction than excommunication; Lefebvre was not excommunicated and was still recognized as a Catholic in good standing, but no longer authorized to operate as a bishop, or even as a priest).

A dialogue, in fact, continued between Lefebvre and Rome, and on May 15, 1988, it seemed to have achieved its goal, when the French bishop signed the preliminary version of an agreement making the Fraternity of Saint Pius X an independent organization within the Roman Catholic Church, headed by a bishop selected by the Vatican from the Fraternity's own ranks (although other than Lefebvre) and authorized to celebrate the pre-Second Vatican Council Catholic Mass. Several of Lefebvre's key aides regarded the agreement as unacceptable, however, and on June 19, 1988, negotiations were interrupted. On June 20, Lefebvre initiated what Rome regarded as a schism, by consecrating, without Vatican authorization, four new bishops (Bernard Fellay [b. 1958], Bernard Tissier de Mallerais [b. 1945], Richard N. Williamson [b. 1940], and Alfonso de Galarreta [b. 1957]). This time, he was promptly excommunicated, together with the conservative Brazilian bishop Antonio de Castro Mayer (1904–1991), who had assisted Lefebvre in the consecration ceremony. On July 2, 1988, Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) published the apostolic letter Ecclesia Dei, in which he denounced the new schism, but left a door open to dialogue and allowed Lefebvre's ex-followers who wished to remain in communion with Rome to obtain a special status and be authorized to celebrate the old Catholic liturgy.

Although separated from Rome, the Fraternity (incorporated in the United States as the Society of Saint Pius X) grew, creating several new male and female religious orders along its path (again, not recognized by the Vatican). It currently has 6 seminaries (in Switzerland, Germany, France, the United States, Argentina, and Australia), 162 homes in 31 countries, 2 universities, 20 high schools, and 50 elementary schools, as well as 486 priests, 192 seminarians, and some 100 male and 240 female members of the religious orders it has created. The Catholic Jubilee year 2000 saw the opening of a new dialogue between the Fraternity and the Vatican, and in March 2001 the Holy See officially confirmed that negotiations were in progress. An obstacle to the dialogue in the 2000s was the affair of the Brotherhood of Saint Josaphat, a traditionalist Ukrainian group of Roman Catholics of the Greek rite, founded in 2000 by Father Vasyl Kovpak. Its 40 priests and seminarians, and 25,000 lay members, are critics of the Second Vatican Council and are now part of the Fraternity of Saint Pius X. Kovpak and his followers were excommunicated by the Vatican in 2007.

In fact, although the media often report that the main disagreement between the Fraternity and Rome is liturgy, and the Fraternity's wish to celebrate the old Mass, there are in fact several other problems that have not yet been resolved. During his last years (he died in 1991), Lefebvre insisted that he regarded Second Vatican Council teachings on religious liberty as the most critical issue. Religious liberty was a notion he rejected for both theological and political reasons. He was also a staunch opponent of ecumenism and interreligious dialogue, which he regarded as conducive to relativism. In the course of its ongoing dialogue with the Fraternity, the Vatican has been quite open on liturgical questions, while the other issues have understandably proved more problematical.

On July 7, 2007, Pope Benedict XVI (b. 1927) published a motu proprio (a personal communication issued by the pope) called Summorum Pontificum, which significantly liberalized the rules for Catholic priests to celebrate the old Tridentine Mass in Latin. This was seen as a first step toward a reconciliation with the Fraternity, which issued a statement of appreciation for the pope's move. Then in March 2009, Benedict rescinded the excommunication issued against the four bishops that Lefebvre had consecrated in 1988. This action unleashed a storm of controversy as he apparently was unaware that one of the bishops, Richard N. Williamson, had on several occasions publicly denied that six million Jews had been killed in the Nazi Holocaust. Williamson apologized for his remarks, but the issue remains unresolved (2009) as Benedict turned his attention to repairing his relationship with the Jewish community.

Free Churches

As developed in the 18th century, the term “Free church” referred to those Protestant Christian churches that operated free of entanglements with the state governments of Europe. Free churches had emerged at the time of the Protestant Reformation, when leaders of the Swiss Brethren called for a more radical reformation of the church than that being asked for by Martin Luther (1483–1546), Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), and later John Calvin (1509–1564). They wanted a pure church consisting of adults who had been converted to Christianity and who had made a conscious decision to affiliate with the church. By definition, such a church could not be coterminous with the state and include all of the citizens whether they had or wanted any relationship with God or not. In such a church, ecclesiastical discipline operated only among church members and was limited to expulsion of a misbehaving member from the church's fellowship.

A primary symbol of the Free church came to be adult baptism. State churches (including the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican) generally baptized the children of members soon after their birth. The Free churches generally baptized those who had reached an age at which they were deemed accountable for their Christian profession and had made such a profession. Members who had been previously baptized as infants were typically re-baptized.

The emphasis on baptism within the Free churches led to further concern about, for example, the proper mode of baptism, with many following the lead of the Baptists in opting for immersions. A few, including the Church of the Brethren, advocated triune immersion. Baptists divided over the necessity of the act of baptism for individual salvation.

The Free church impulse led first to the spread of the Mennonites and Baptists and then took form across Europe with the formation of such groups as the Friends (Quakers), the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden, the Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway, and the Free Church of Scotland. In North America there were also the churches of the Restoration movement, the Churches of Christ, the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ, and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). In the 20th century, most Pentecostal churches have adopted the Free church approach to Christian community.

In the 19th century, the term "Free" was added to the name of various churches claiming additional freedoms. The Free Methodist Church of North America was an advocate both of immediately freeing African Americans held in slavery and of free pews (as opposed to other Methodist churches, which accepted a fee from members who wished to have a family pew in the local church building). "Free church" also came to mean without a creed (other than the Bible) or free of various forms of ecclesiastical hierarchy. Most Free churches have adopted a congregational polity, though originally the Congregational Church movement was not a Free church and remained tied to the state of Massachusetts into the 19th century. Groups such as the Churches of Christ and the Primitive Baptists have adopted an ultra-congregational polity, which limits any governance functions by structures above the local congregations. Other Free churches, such as the Southern Baptist Convention and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), grant denominational structures considerable power to build and control programs operated for the denomination as a whole.

In the last half of the 20th century, a new wave of Free churches adopted an anti-denominational stance that equated denominationalism with traditional hierarchical church governance (episcopal and presbyterian) and the multiplication of denominational boards and agencies. Most such anti-denominational denominations have organized as congregational associations.

Free Methodist Church of North America

The Free Methodist Church, one of the leading churches of the 19th-century Holiness movement, emerged as a conservative movement within the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) in the 1850s. Leaders of the movement felt that the main body of the church had slipped from Wesleyan standards, especially as related to an emphasis on the call to lead the sanctified life. Methodist founder John Wesley (1703–1791) had taught that it was possible to be sanctified in this life and had proposed that Christians should strive to be sanctified, to become perfect in love, in this life. Two signs of the Methodists' falling from this standard were the membership of many in secret societies and their toleration of slavery. Most of those who eventually made up the Free Methodist Church were abolitionist. The Methodist Episcopal Church, although against slavery generally, held that abolitionism was an extremist position.

The issues raised by the conservatives culminated when Reverend Benjamin Titus Roberts (1823–1893) and others were expelled from the church. They appealed to the General Conference that met in 1860. When their appeal was denied, they formed the Free Methodist Church. Their name related to another complaint of theirs, the selling of pews to particular church members. The Free Methodists declared that all the pews in their churches were freely open to all.

Formally, the Free Methodists had no doctrinal quarrel with its parent body. Increasingly, however, the Methodist Episcopal Church distanced itself from the particular version of the Holiness perspective that had been popularized in the church in the 19th century; the Free Methodists later added a statement on sanctification to the Twenty-five Articles of Religion, to which most Methodists adhere. A new set of articles of religion was adopted in 1974 that spelled out the Holiness perspective and gave the biblical references that underpin them. The church teaches that all Christians may be inwardly cleansed from sinful rebellion against God. This sanctification of the affections occurs instantaneously when believers, already having experienced justification from sin, in a moment of faith are open to the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives.

Outwardly the life of holiness includes conformity to a set of guidelines that the church feels should be normative for the Christian life. Church members refrain from alcohol, tobacco, and recreational drugs. They tithe their income. They refrain from membership in secret societies. They are antiracist. They hold marriage and sexual purity in high regard.

The church is organized with a modified episcopacy. The highest legislative body is the General Conference, consisting of an equal number of ministers and laity. The Conference elects the bishops (or general superintendents). The congregations are divided among annual conferences, which appoint ministers to their pastoral charges. In 1996, the church reported 74,059 members in the United States and 7,603 in Canada (2006). During the 19th century, the church joined in the world missions movement, and today 90 percent of its members are found in its conferences overseas, which reported 731,791 members (including the United States) in 34 countries (2008). The church is a member of the Christian Holiness Partnership and the National Association of Evangelicals, through which it is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

Free Pentecostal Missions Church of Chile

Free Pentecostal Missions Church of Chile, one of three Pentecostal bodies in Chile that have joined the World Council of Churches, was founded in 1974 by Pentecostal Bishop Victor Labbe Dias, who felt led to begin independent evangelistic/missionary work. The constitution of the new fellowship was approved in 1977 and subsequently officially registered in the country. The beliefs and practices follow those of other Chilean Pentecostal churches, the differences being purely administrative. The church has identified with the poor in the country, and in the 30 years of its existence spread to all sections of the country, though membership is concentrated in the Biobio, Araucanía, and Los Rios districts (south-central Chile) among the Mapucho and Chilote peoples.

The church carries on an active program of evangelism and membership nurture with a social program primarily aimed at health issues. By 2005, the church reported 13,600 members in 45 congregations.

Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga

Methodism, now divided into four bodies, forms the largest religious community in the multi-island nation of Tonga, and the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga is the largest of the four Methodist denominations. Methodist work on Tonga began in 1822, but the original missionary, Walter Lawry (1793–1859), had to withdraw after 14 months. On June 28, 1826, John Thomas (1769–1881) and John Hutchinson landed on Ha'atafu and settled in Kolovai. They had been preceded by two converts from Tahiti named Hope and Tafeta, who had started work on Nuku'alofa. As other missionaries (from Australia) arrived, the work spread to Ha'apai and Vava'u.

Success was scant until 1934, when the efforts of an early Tongan convert led to a mass conversion on Vava'u, and the success was soon repeated on Ha'apai. As it turned out, the ruler of Ha'apai, Taufa'ahau Tupouin, in the 1850s became the person who unified Tonga into a nation and became its first ruler. An admirer of the British, he chose the name George I, by which he was commonly known. He also encouraged his new subjects to become Christian, and by the end of the 1850s almost all Tongans were at least nominally Christians. Most Tongans were Methodists, though the Roman Catholic Church had established a small mission.

In 1890, the aging king and his prime minister, Shirley Baker (1836–1903), a former Methodist missionary, expressed their concern about the continuing control of the church from Australia. Their desire to break the administrative relationship led to a schism, and the king and his supporters formed the Wesleyan Free Church. Further, he ordered his subjects (as far as he could, given the religious freedom that had been proclaimed in 1855) to join it, and the Methodist Mission and the new church were bitter rivals for the next four decades. Finally in 1924 the new ruler, Queen Salote, worked out a reconciliation, and the two bodies merged to become the Tonga Conference of the Methodist Church of Australia. Some 6,000 people stayed out of the merger and formed the Free Church of Tonga.

The Tonga Conference continued its relationship with the Australian Methodists until 1977. The merger of the Australian Methodists into the Uniting Church in Australia became the occasion of the Tongan Conference becoming autonomous as the Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga. It sponsors an extensive education program that includes some 60 percent of the secondary education in the country.

During the 19th century, the Tongan church became crucial to the spread of Methodism through the South Pacific, as Tongan converts accompanied many Methodist missionaries, assisting in the foundation of the church in many island systems. In the 20th century, many Tongans migrated to New Zealand, Australia, and the United States, and congregations that retain their relationship directly with the Free Wesleyan Church can now be found in each of these countries.

The Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga is a member of the World Council of Churches. It has a baptized membership of approximately 38,692, but claims a constituency that would double that number.

Freemasonry

Although there is much debate over the ties of modern Freemasonry to medieval guilds of stone masons, there is little doubt that what is today called Freemasonry emerged at the end of the 17th century with the formation of the lodges of speculative Freemasons in Great Britain culminating in the formation of the first Grand Lodge in 1717 by the merger of four previously existing lodges in England. These initial lodges had emerged as older Masonic organizations accepted non-Masons into their community. Devoid of any interest in erecting buildings, these non-Masons used their gatherings to speculate about metaphysical issues quite apart from the theological perspectives of either the Church of England or the other dissenting churches operating in the country at the time, choosing instead to follow the Western Esoteric teachings previously spread under the label of Rosicrucianism. Among the first prominent exponents of Western Esotericism in England were Robert Fludd (1574–1637) and Elias Ashmole (1617–1692). The Reverend John Theophilus Desaguliers, who became the grand master of the British lodge, was also chaplain to the prince of Wales, and his political connections facilitated the spread of the movement throughout the British Isles and into the European continent and beyond.

Freemasons membership certificate, 1861. (Library of Congress)

Grand Lodges were formed in Ireland in 1723 and in Scotland in 1736. The first speculative lodge was founded in Germany in 1733, and similar lodges were soon established in Italy and France. The first papal statements against Freemasonry were issued in 1738 and 1751. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts was founded in 1733, and others followed beginning with South Carolina in 1737. The Masonic lodges would become hotbeds not only of metaphysical speculation but of new democratic political ideals. These Masonic ideals would flow through the salons of Paris in the decades prior to the French Revolution and would become part of the consensus shared by many of the American revolutionaries. The Marquis de Lafayette was a Mason as was Benjamin Franklin (who largely financed the American Revolution) and future American presidents George Washington, James Madison, and James Monroe.

English Masons led in the founding of speculative lodges in France early in the 18th century. The first national French Masonic body, the English Grand Lodge of France, was formed in 1728. It operated under British leadership until 1738, when the duke of Antin became the first French grand master. During the 1730s, the French work became fully independent and took its present name, the Grand Lodge of France. The French work became important in the 19th century as Freethought became important to French intellectual and political culture. In 1849, the Grand Lodge declared that the existence of God and the immortality of the soul were foundational principles of Freemasonry. However, in 1877, the French declared that absolute liberty of conscience and the solidarity of humanity were the basic principles. At the same time, all references to God were removed from the rituals. These actions led to the British or American lodges severing relations with the French. The French action appeared to have been made in reaction to Catholic criticism that Freemasonry had become a rival religion.

Freemasonry operates through an initiatory system in which members are brought step by step into the basic ideas and practices, a basic worldview being presented in the initial three degrees. There are various elaborate degree systems, the most famous being the 33 degrees of the ancient and accepted rite, the system used in most British and American lodges. The cosmos is viewed as a series of levels that the soul travels through as it rises to the realm of the Divine.

The endpoint of metaphysical speculation is an omnipresent, eternal immutable principle beyond the conceptualization of language (which many call God). That principle finds expression in natural law. There also exists space and motion, concepts basic to all human perception. Underlying the cosmos is Spirit/consciousness, which manifests as both energy and matter. The cosmos is in eternal flux and creation proceeds as universal energy and proto-matter interact and produce the seven basic levels of existence. These seven levels—physical, life principle, astral, karma, manas, buddha, atmi—are also reflected in the individual. Masonic rituals provide the material to reflect upon the universe and humanity’s rightful place within it.

There are a variety of rites (ritual schemes) used in the different Masonic lodges. A Grand Lodge unites lodges that use the same rite. A Grand Orient unites lodges that may use a variety of rites. The eastern star was founded in 1876 as a Masonic auxiliary for women, Masonry being basically a male endeavor. Through the 20th century several forms of Masonry termed Co-Masonry, which accepted female members, have been founded.

Today, the Masonic movement is organized in a set of national Grand Lodges and Grand Orients, the most prominent of which is the United Grand Lodge of England, the governing body of Freemasonry in England, Wales, and the Channel islands. The Supreme Council 33 Degrees of Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America is the leading American organization. Speculative Freemasonry has been an important transmitter of the Western Esoteric tradition, having been constructed from Rosicrucian teachings and serving as a basis for a spectrum of 19th-century Esoteric groups from Theosophy to ceremonial magic groups such as the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO). To the present it raises questions about the religious nature of its teachings and the essential nature of the several grand lodges as religious bodies.

Freethought

Freethought, or Freethinking, as a term to describe unbelief or dissent from specific religious propositions, appears to have arisen at the end of the 17th century in England. The term emerged during the struggle of science to free itself from ongoing theological debates, as it followed a “free way” in inquiry. Eventually, the term became applied to the conscious reaction to conscious rejection of some parts of traditional religion. The use of the term implies that the freethinker has a special loyalty to the process of thinking and to the freedom that would allow such thinking to go wherever logic takes it. As it developed, Freethought came to apply to any revision or rejection of contemporary religious doctrines, or the application of critical and rational thinking to specifically religious subjects.

In the 1690s, there appeared a pamphlet that included reference to the “New Religious Fraternity of Freethinkers,” and in 1708 Jonathan Swift, in his Sentiments of a Church of England Man, used the term to refer collectively to those espousing unbelief. Then, in 1713, Anthony Collins accepted the term in his Discourse of Free-Thinking, and from that point, the identification of the term and religious unbelief began to appear in popular discourse, though those opposed to Freethinking often included references to any kind of religious heterodoxy, a more common phenomenon than unbelief.

In the 18th century, individuals began to identify themselves as freethinkers, and in the last half of the 19th century, one could identify a movement of Free-thought that encompassed not only individuals but groups that included a reference to Freethought in their names. The leading exponent of freethinking unbelief in America was Robert Green Ingersoll (1833–1899), a popular lecturer, who identified himself as a freethinker. He noted in his 1890 lecture, “Has Freethought a Constructive Side?”:

A denial of all orthodox falsehoods—an exposure of all superstitions. This is simply clearing the ground, to the end that seeds of value may be planted. It is necessary, first, to fell the trees, to destroy the poisonous vines, to drive out the wild beasts. Then comes another phase—another kind of work. The Freethinker knows that the universe is natural—that there is no room, even in infinite space, for the miraculous, for the impossible. The Freethinker knows, or feels that he knows, that there is no sovereign of the universe, who, like some petty king or tyrant, delights in showing his authority. He feels that all in the universe are conditioned beings, and that only those are happy who live in accordance with the conditions of happiness, and this fact or truth or philosophy embraces all men and all gods—if there be gods.

By this time, Freethought had become a synonym for atheism, with the added polemic point that religious thinkers were somehow bound by outdated religious doctrines and institutions that hindered their logic and prevented their following the logic of their affirmations.

Among the oldest of Freethought organizations was the Free Inquirers, founded by utopian thinker Robert Dale Owens (1801–1877) in 1828. Several other Free Inquiry associations appeared in the next few years, the most notable being Abner Kneeland’s (1774–1844) First Society of Free Enquirers in Boston, Massachusetts. Among the largest was Die Freien Gemeinden, founded by German-speaking Americans in 1859. It developed chapters in a number of urban centers and remained active through the 1920s.

By the end of the 19th century, there were a number of Freethought institutions across the North American continent and Europe and around the world, including the Hindu Freethought Union (founded in India in 1875), General Freethought Association (Canada, 1880s), the Brisbane Freethought Association (Australia, 1888), the Freethought Association (South Africa, 1888), the Deutscher Freidenker Bund (Germany, 1881), and the Union des Libres Penseurs (France, 1904). The International Federation of Freethinkers was founded in Brussels in 1880 and has been known since 1936 as the World Union of Freethinkers (c/o Jean Kaech, PO Box CH-3001, Berne, Switzerland). The Freethinker, a British journal founded by George W. Foote (1850–1915) and espousing unbelief, began publication in 1881 and continues to be issued as a “Voice of Atheism.”

In the 20th century, atheists, Humanists, Rationalists, and freethinkers came to see themselves as forming one international community of unbelief, and numerous Freethought organizations have arisen, which are hardly distinguishable from other groups espousing unbelief. Many are members of the International Humanist and Ethical Union. Among the oldest and most influential are the Freidenker-Vereinigung der Schweiz (Switzerland), Vapaa-ajattelijain liitto (Finish Freethought Union), Libre Pensée (France, founded in 1848), and De Vrije Gedachte (The Dutch Freethinking Association).

A Freethought Trail connecting sites associated with prominent American Freethinkers has been designated in upstate New York to honor Freethought pioneers and social activists.

■ French Guiana

French Guiana is an overseas department of France located on the Atlantic coast of South America immediately north of Brazil and east of Suriname. It is a tropical land, whose capital, Cayenne, is only five degrees from the equator. Its 34,400 square miles of land is home to 191,000 people (2008), most of African descent.

The primary people found by the Spanish when they first visited the area were the Caribs, who had displaced earlier residents, the Arawaks. Farther inland were other peoples, including the Oyampi, Cussaris, and Emerillon. They practiced a variety of related indigenous religions, some of which have survived.

The Spanish and then the French, who occupied the coast in 1604, brought Catholicism with them. The land was disputed territory through the rest of the century and at different times was controlled by the Dutch, the British, and the Portuguese. French control was finally re-established in 1676. Various efforts to build the colony with French citizens met with mixed results, due to the climate, and even now most of the population resides along the coast and on the nearby islands (one of which was the famous penal colony, Devil’s Island).

Catholicism was established in 1636 and became the leading religion soon afterward. Efforts were made to convert the indigenous population, and most immigrants were of a Catholic background. The Diocese of Cayenne was erected in 1956. The church was very slow in creating indigenous leadership, and no native Guianan was ordained as a priest until 1971.

Challenges to Catholic hegemony did not really begin until the 20th century. At the beginning of the century, a member of the Christian Brethren (the Open Plymouth Brethren) came to Guiana from Barbados to begin work. He was followed by representatives of the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1940), the Jehovah’s Witnesses (1945), the Southern Baptist Convention (1982), the Evangelical Church of the West Indies (ECWI) (1986), the Church of the Nazarene (1988), and the Church of God of Prophecy (1991). The ECWI is an association of churches initiated by an American-based evangelical sending agency, World Team, in the Caribbean.

Also, through the 20th century, numerous people moved into French Guiana from other lands, especially Brazil, Surinam, and Haiti. There is also a measurable community of Asians, mostly of Chinese and Indian

The massive movement of immigrants into French Guiana has led to the establishment of a variety of different religions, including Afro-Brazilian spirit-possession groups, Spiritism, Vodou, Hinduism, and Buddhism. There are a few Muslims, most of Javanese or Lebanese extraction. French immigrants have brought Rosicrucianism, most noticeably members of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (an American-based group that has been quite successful in France).

■ French Polynesia

The islands presently grouped together as French Polynesia include some 120 islands of the Society, Gambier, Austral, Marquesas, and Tuamotu archipelagoes. The 1,413 square miles of land include the most famous island, Tahiti. More than three-fourths of the islands' 283,000 residents are Polynesians, with the Chinese forming the primary minority group (12 percent).

The islands were inhabited in prehistoric times by the Polynesians. Spanish explorers visited the Marquesas in 1595, but little attention was paid to them until the discovery of Tahiti in 1767 by the English explorer Samuel Wallis. The islands were then visited by Captain James Cook, and in 1789, Tahiti, the largest island, was the destination from which the HMS Bounty had just sailed when the famous mutiny occurred in 1789.

In 1840, the French occupied the island. In 1843 they named it a protectorate and in 1880 designated it a colony, calling it the French Establishments of Oceania. Beginning in 1966, French Polynesia was for a period the site of some very controversial French nuclear tests. Finally in 1984, the islands were granted local autonomy, the provisions of which were strengthened in 1996 and 1998. France remains in control of the country's military affairs and the currency.

Prior to the coming of Christianity, the residents of the islands worshipped a pantheon of deities headed by a supreme god called Ta'aroa. The other deities were ascribed hegemony over vital areas of island life, such as the sea or the weather. The traditional religion has been all but obliterated by the modern import of Christianity.

An initial effort at evangelization by Roman Catholics in the islands began as early as 1659. A second attempt began in 1772 by some Franciscans from Peru. More permanent efforts were begun in the Gambier Islands in 1831 by French priests. They subsequently found their way to the Marquesas in 1838, Tahiti in 1842, and Tuamotu in 1849. In the decades following World War II, the church experienced significant growth, which some attributed to the spread of a devotional movement centered upon the recitation of the rosary. The Living Rosary movement had begun in France under the leadership of Pauline Jaricot (1799–1862). Today, the church is centered on the Archdiocese of Papeete (Tahiti). There is also a diocese headquartered in the Marquesas and serving the northern islands.

In 1797, missionaries of the London Missionary Society (LMS) arrived in Tahiti, one of their very first missionary targets. A party of 18 settled on the island (and another 11 went on to Tonga). The group encountered a variety of unexpected problems, and by the turn of the century, only seven (five men and two women) remained, the rest having left for Australia and two having been dismissed for marrying local women. Crucial to the success of the mission, in 1815 King Pomare converted and requested to be baptized. He then saw to the building of a large church. At the king's urging, most of the people abandoned their old religion in favor of Christianity. The establishment of French rule and the introduction of Roman Catholic missionaries made the British-based LMS missionary work increasingly difficult, and in 1886 the missionaries turned their work over to representatives of the French Reformed Church's Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, which had already begun separate work on Tahiti. In 1963, the mission became autonomous as the Église Évangélique de Polynésie Française. The church is a member of the Pacific Conference of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Both the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons) and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (now known as the Christian Community) established missions in the islands. The former arrived first in 1844, and the Mormons have built extensive work, given the special role they have given Polynesians in their scheme of salvation. The work begun by Elder Addison Pratt (1802–1872) is considered the first Mormon mission to a non-English-speaking area of the world. The French closed the mission in 1852. It was reopened in 1892 and churches built for the remnant of loyal members. A temple was opened in Papeete in 1983. Most recently, the church reported 14,000 members. The Reorganized Church began with a schism in the LDS in the Tuamotu Islands in 1884.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church began work in 1892, and the Jehovah's Witnesses in 1932. The Evangelical Church has also been the scene of a number of schisms, among the most interesting being the Mamaia group, founded in the mid-1920s by a man with messianic pretensions and a calling to evict all white people from the islands. There have been several schisms since World War II, most on administrative issues. In 1968, the Chinese members left to found the Polynesian Pentecostal Churches. In 1977, Baptists made their first appearance in the area, with the entrance of the very conservative Baptist Bible Fellowship International.

Chinese had first arrived in the islands in 1865 and now constitute approximately 12 percent of the population. Although many are Christian, they have also established Buddhist centers. As in other French territories, the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis is present, and the Baha'i Faith has been growing since it arrived in 1955.

Friends General Conference

The Friends General Conference is the more liberal wing of the Friends movement, the wing that grew out of the ministry of Elias Hicks (1748–1830), an eloquent speaker who moved among American Quakers in the 1820s. He emphasized the more subjective side of the Quaker tradition, the reliance on the Inner Light for guidance, and tended to denigrate any outward forms. Among the implications of his approach was the gathering of Quakers for meetings without any prior planning (or programming). Thus those meetings attracted to Hicks's messages came to be known as "un-programmed." Within the Hicksite faction, a new level of theological diversity became manifest.

Hicks's approach created open controversy in 1823 in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting (the center of the Quaker community at the time), and over the next four years the controversy became harsher. Then in 1827 the Hicksite faction withdrew from the Philadelphia Meeting, and subsequently similar separations occurred in Friends' communities across the East and Midwest. Within a few years seven Hicksite Yearly Meetings were formed.

Further organization began after the American Civil War with the formation of a Sunday School Conference in 1868. It facilitated communication among the far-flung unprogrammed congregations, led to several other organizations focused on additional concerns, and culminated in the formation of the Friends General Conference in 1900.

With some 32,000 members (2002), the Friends General Conference is the smallest of the three main Friends denominations, with members confined to North America.

Friends United Meeting

Formed in 1902, the Friends United Meeting brings together the primary elements of the Friends, or Quaker, movement in the United States, which dates to the colonial era. The Friends movement developed around relatively small autonomous associations of congregations in a particular area, and by this means the movements spread across the United States during the 19th century and funded missionaries in Africa and Latin America. The Friends United Meeting has brought together one set of these yearly meetings (as the congregational associations are called).

The United Meeting traces its origins to the earlier arrival of Quakers in the American colonies in the 1650s. As in England, most colonists did not welcome them. The Congregationalists in New England saw them as disturbers of the peace, whose presence distracted from the religious uniformity they hoped to build. Quakers found a haven in the religiously free Rhode Island, and there they organized the first congregation (Quarterly Meeting). The real strength of the movement, however, was in Pennsylvania, where William Penn (1644–1718), a wealthy Quaker, created a colony, in large part to provide a refuge for Quakers and others who were suffering from religious persecution both in England and on the European continent.

The first organization of Quakers above the congregational level, the General Meeting of Friends, gathered in 1681 in Burlington, New Jersey. It became the seed from which the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting eventually grew.

The Friends movement developed on the radical fringe of the Puritan movement. While accepting a basic Protestant belief structure, including belief in the fatherhood of God, the lordship of Jesus Christ, salvation by faith, and the priesthood of all believers, Friends have tended to withdraw from participation in the state and are confirmed pacifists. At various times, their refusal to participate in wars has earned them the contempt of neighbors, which they have countered with a strong emphasis on social service. The Friends have also dropped the practice of water baptism, interpreting the one baptism referred to in Ephesians 4:4–5 as a baptism of the Spirit.

Friends have been known for their unique worship services based upon their understanding of the guidance of the Inner Light. They were known to sit in silence, waiting for the Holy Spirit to move in the hearts of those who had gathered. This emphasis made them the subject of two very different trends in the early 19th century. In the 1820s, many Friends were attracted to the teachings of Elias Hicks (1748–1830), who placed total reliance on the Inner Light and advocated an approach to worship that included no preplanning. Those Meetings that accepted his idea became known as “unprogrammed” Meetings. The Hicksite Friends now form the Friends General Conference. Another group of Friends were attracted to the Holiness teachings of Methodist John Wesley (1703–1791), as delivered by Joseph John Gurney (1788–1847). Most of those Yearly Meetings affected by the Holiness teachings are now gathered in the Evangelical Friends International.

Those Meetings that rejected both the approach of Hicks and that of Gurney continued as the largest faction of the movement. In the 1880s, efforts to bring the Yearly Meetings into a closer relationship were initiated. Conferences were held every five years through the last decades of the century, and in 1902 a loose association, called appropriately the Five Years Meeting, came into existence. The Five Years Meeting evolved into the Friends United Meeting in 1965. At the end of the 1990s, it included 27 Yearly Meetings. The Yearly Meetings cover the United States, but three-fourths of the 170,000 members are now found outside the United States, in the Yearly Meetings in Kenya (with some 120,000 members), Cuba, Jamaica, Mexico, and Israel.

Administratively, the work of the Friends United Meeting is carried out through the General Board. The Department of World Ministries relates American Friends to the associated Meeting overseas. The Meeting is a member of both the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the World Council of Churches and cooperates fully with the Friends World Committee for Consultation.

Friends World Committee for Consultation

The Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC) was the major product of the Second World Conference of Friends (Quakers) that was held at Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, in 1937. It expressed the desire for greater unity among Quakers, who had been split by doctrinal difference in the 19th century but had found a new sense of unity in their peace witness as a result of World War I. Also, by the 1930s, after several centuries as primarily a movement in England and North America, the Friends had become a worldwide movement. The initial work of the Committee was somewhat inhibited by the outbreak of World War II soon after its founding.

FWCC rebounded after the war and in 1952 organized the next World Conference, which was held in Oxford, England, in 1952. Since that time it has worked on its multifaceted program of assisting Friends to transcend their doctrinal differences, coordinating various social programs, representing Friends in different ecumenical settings, and providing a united voice for Quaker witness on social issues, especially those related to peace and social justice. Most of the Yearly (district and national) Meetings around the world are affiliated to the Committee.

The Committee is divided into four sections—Africa, the Americas, Asia and the West Pacific, and Europe and the Middle East. The Committee holds a large international Meeting ever three years. An Interim Committee and a staff headed by the executive secretary carry on the work of the Committee between the triennial gatherings. The Committee sees as one of its essential functions the maintenance of communication between Friends worldwide, many of whom live as small minorities within their own countries, and providing a sense of the global nature of their work and witness.

There are some 70 related Yearly Meetings, and several hundred thousand Friends worldwide.

Friends/Quakers

The Friends movement, commonly known as the Quakers, emerged in 17th-century England as the most radical expression of the Puritan movement, which attempted to complete the work of the Reformation in the Church of England by purifying it of non-biblical elements that had accumulated over the centuries. George Fox (1624–1691), the movement’s founder, was a mystic and social activist who began to preach in 1647, during the English Civil War, following his experience of inner illumination. His comments on the social scene drew fire during the years of the Commonwealth (1649–1660), when he was first arrested for his pacifist views.

The beginnings of a movement became visible in 1667 when Fox’s followers organized a set of Monthly (congregations), Quarterly (district), and Yearly (national) Meetings. The Society of Friends was built around Fox’s idea that the Bible was not the end of revelation, but that each believer had access to the Inner Light that provided immediate contact with the living Spirit. Gatherings were centered upon quietly waiting for the Spirit to speak. Bodily movements that appeared in these meeting gave members the popular appellation, Quakers. The messages received and the guidance they offered would then be tested by the teachings and example of Jesus.

Fox taught that Friends should lead simple lives, avoiding the vanities of the world. Members did not wear colorful clothing, wigs, or jewelry. Their language was characterized by their refusal to use “you” when addressing social superiors, as was customary; they addressed everyone with the familiar “thee” and “thou,” which further set them apart. They became known for their participation in various social causes, including abolition, prison reform, and, most notably, pacifism. Heightened tension over their pacifism regularly arose in times of war.

Persecuted in England, Quakers found a haven in the American colonies when William Penn (1644–1718) founded Pennsylvania and invited his fellow believers to settle there. They first arrived in 1655. Pennsylvania subsequently became a major source of American ideals of freedom of religion.

The Friends remained a small minority group in both England and the United States, and their support for the antislavery cause further limited their growth in the American South. However, through the 19th and early 20th centuries, they spread across North America. As early as 1681 the first General Meeting of Friends was held in New Jersey. It evolved into the General Yearly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, East Jersey, and Adjacent Provinces, and as the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting continues as the oldest Quaker association in North America.

During the 19th century, several issues split the Friends, and various Yearly Meetings arose that advocated several distinct perspectives. As the number of Yearly Meetings proliferated across the United States, various associations of Yearly Meetings appeared, the most important being the Friends United Meeting, the Friends General Conference, and the Evangelical Friends International. Friends have also organized for joint efforts on various social issues through the Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC). The movement began to spread in the late 19th century as Friends participated in the global Protestant missionary movement, and Yearly Meetings are now found on every continent. Their greatest success was in Kenya, where the East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends became the largest Quaker association in the world.

The organizational center of the Society of Friends remains in England, where the FWCC and the London Yearly Meeting are headquartered.

Fuji, Mount

Mount Fuji is Japan's highest peak at 12,389 feet, and its conical shape is a major reminder of the island's ongoing tectonic dynamics. The mountain became a sacred site in the prehistoric era, and its wide appeal found a home in both Shinto and Buddhism. It has erupted periodically, averaging twice a century since records have been kept; the last major activity in 1707 covered Tokyo in ash.

The mountain appears to be named for the fire goddess Fuchi, a deity of the Ainu people, the early inhabitants of Hokkaido. It came to be seen as the home of Sengen, the wife of Ninigi, the grandson of Amaterasu, the Shinto Sun-goddess. Sengen gave birth to three sons—Po-deri-no-mikoto (“Fire-shine”), Posuseri-no-mikoto (“Fire-full”), and Po-wori-no-mikoto (“Fire-fade”). Po-wori-no-mikoto is seen as the grandfather of Japan's first emperor. Sengen is believed to reside within a luminous cloud in the mountain's crater. She is usually pictured dressed in white.

Among the earliest recorded reactions to the mountain were dances performed by young women dressed in white robes, identified with two mythic females known for their beauty and heroism. Their dance mimicked the puffs of smoke seen coming from the mountain's crater. Also, early on, the mountain became home to female shamans/mediums, who could be found inhabiting the caves near its base.

As Buddhism was introduced to Japan in the sixth century CE and became a major religious force in the next century, Shugendo, a mountain-based religion, reacted to what its practitioners saw as the attempt to impose Buddhism on the country. Mount Fuji became a natural site for the new religion's development. Shugendo drew teachings and practices from a wide variety of religions then becoming available in Japan (including the magical practices of Shingon Buddhism). Its practitioners, the Yamabushi (literally, “those who sleep in the mountains”), constituted a male fraternity, which withdrew from ordinary society, adopted a special diet, and underwent a variety of physical trials, all of which contributed to their developing psychic/spiritual powers. In the mountains the Yamabushi could be in direct contact with the divine entities they believed resided there. Shugendo remained an active religious tradition until the Meiji reforms in the late 19th century and still exists today.

Quite apart from Shugendo, many Japanese climbed Mount Fuji over the years, though the oldest path to the top had been created by and dominated by Shugendo practitioners. Later three additional paths were developed. Then in the 13th century, stories began to circulate about Hitoana, a large cave located near Fujinomiya, a town in the mountain's foothills. It was also seen as the home of Sengen, a female being who was discovered by Nitta Shiro Tadsune (d. 1203), a representative of the shogun and later a favorite subject of Japanese fiction writers.

Religious reverence focused on Mount Fuji was significantly elevated in the 17th century following the founding of a new religion, Fuji Ko, by Hasegawa Kakugyo (1541–1646). He settled in Hitoana, where he lived an ascetic life and claimed numerous revelations. These revelations, including a set of undecipherable symbols, provided the content for Fuji Ko, which exists to the present day. Kakugyo's successors merged the veneration of the bodhisattva Maitreya, the future Buddha, into Fuji Ko. Japanese authorities were upset over the spread of Fuji Ko across Japan, especially the offshoots it spawned such as the Millennial Fuji Ko. These marginalized groups have enjoyed a revival in the midst of the post–World War II secularization of Japanese culture and the international promotion of pictures and replicas of the mountain for tourists.

Fundamentalism

Fundamentalism has polyvalent meanings. Taken broadly, it serves academic purposes, as in Martin

Marty's 11-point delineation of "fundamentalisms" (Kaplan 1992). Also broadly, it is a media and pop culture debased shorthand for fanatical extremists. However, the term enters religious discourse in reference to a conservative Christian movement deriving its name from a series of pamphlets published between 1910 and 1915, The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth, upon which this entry will focus.

"Christian Fundamentalism" remains an elusive term. For followers, it is a modern restoration of "the faith once delivered to the saints." For opponents, it is a religion distinct from mainstream Christianity, even a North American analog to European Fascism. The academic consensus is that Christian Fundamentalism's struggle with theological Liberalism was rooted in 19th-century developments, which particularly polarized Protestantism in the 20th century's second and third decades. The suggestion that Fundamentalism was merely millenarianism renamed has fallen from favor, although the profound dissonance of religious optimism in the late 1800s and early 1900s against the troubled culture in which evangelicals found themselves was one factor leading many to divest themselves of the postmillennial eschatology (common to the Protestant Reformers of the 16th century) and embrace Dispensationalism. Yet not all Fundamentalists were Dispensationalists, nor were they all Calvinists. Fundamentalism's additional facets include Scottish Common Sense Realist philosophy and anti-evolutionism. A subset of evangelicalism, Fundamentalism coexisted uneasily with other evangelical traditions, including such diverse groups as the Wesleyan tradition, Pentecostalism, and the Missouri Synod Lutherans. Southern Baptists, annoyed by Northern Baptist Fundamentalists' insistence on premillennialism, stood aloof, even though both sets of Baptists defended conservative Calvinism against theological liberalism and secularization.

Nineteenth-century precursors of the Fundamentalist movement include the Christian Conference (from 1878) and the Niagara Prophecy Conferences (1878, 1883–1897). Appealing to broad constituencies, these meetings introduced Christian Brethren–derived dispensational eschatological theology to leading denominations, including Anglicans/Episcopalians, Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians. Growing disillusionment with Progressive ideals' failure to produce profound social improvement rendered pessimistic apocalyptic scenarios more credible than the hitherto prevailing postmillennial vision. American audiences were particularly prepared by the Civil War's horrors; European disenchantment grew only as World War I's atrocities unfolded. The Civil War also divided American denominations into northern and southern regional branches. Some conservatives considered Darwinian thought and biblical Higher Criticism as adopted by liberals end-time threats.

Fundamentalism's precise belief structure is not easily discerned. Despite some authors' assertion that the 1895 Niagara Prophecy Conference adopted five famous foundational points, their only credal statement was a 14-point document issued by the 1878 conference. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America adopted a statement in 1910 (reaffirmed in 1916 and 1923) including scriptural inerrancy in the original documents, the deity of Jesus (including the virgin birth), the substitutionary atonement, the physical resurrection, and Jesus' miracle-working power. The weakness of this description is that Roman Catholics, who generally found Fundamentalism puzzling, share these beliefs. Fundamentalists also affirm human depravity (distinguishing them from the Methodists and Holiness churches), justification by faith alone (distinguishing them from Roman Catholics), the personal, bodily return of Christ, and a literal heaven and a literal hell.

Central to understanding Fundamentalism is the question of the movement's grasp of new scientific understandings of the world that were propounded in the 19th century. Often Fundamentalists are characterized as militant anti-modernists, fixated on supernaturalist perceptions that are counter-rational. Indeed, Fundamentalists went to great lengths to defend the Bible's miracles, Jesus' deity and resurrection, as well as a non-evolutionary cosmogony. Yet the Fundamentalists' forerunners insisted that theirs was a truly scientific view, taking into account observable facts in nature as well as biblical information. By the early 1880s, Presbyterian conservatives and moderates tussled over intellectual high ground, the scientific credibility each side believed they possessed. Systematization was the order of the day. Each applied a version of Baconian inductive method to study of the Bible, with predictably varying results. There was an Enlightenment confidence in the potential for a thoroughly unbiased, neutral, objective and systematic grasp of the Bible's content. Future Fundamentalist leader Reuben Torrey (1856–1928) touted a rigidly inductive, modern scientific method in his 1898 What the Bible Teaches. On a more sophisticated level, the Princeton Theology framed by Presbyterian scholars such as Charles Hodge (1797–1878), his son, Alexander Archibald Hodge (1823–1886), and Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield (1851–1921) adumbrated an extremely high and intricate doctrine of biblical inspiration. The individual words in the original autographs (that is, the first handwritten copy of a text) were divinely inspired, specifically chosen by God. These scholars were quite rationalistic, building with elements of Scottish Common Sense Realist philosophy and attempting to adapt to the modern scientific project.

As the 19th century neared its close, secular scientists increasingly realized the logical fallacy their method entailed, but theologians lagged in adapting. Instead of creating leading edge thinking, evangelicals naively treated the Bible as if it were a child's building toy, the pieces of which needed to be assembled correctly in order to create something useful. Their ahistorical readings displayed an underlying tendency to essentialism, or the conviction that the essence of biblical truth on any given biblical issue existed in a timeless state, so that a single specific formula could express that truth in any and every cultural setting. This reflects the massive abandonment of precedent woven into the fabric of the North American worldview that systematically devalued previous generations' (or other nations') wisdom. Anti-traditionalism encouraged self-confidence that bordered on arrogance, yet which was also tinged with innocence. Whether Princeton-bred or autodidact, late-19th-century evangelicals simply failed to grasp the problem that their hermeneutic shrouded the reality that all interpretation is in fact interpretation, conditioned by the interpreter's setting. Their Bible reading tended to atomize the text, handling individual verses as if they were self-standing. They were insouciant that they did not take into account the situation in which the biblical writer committed those words to paper.

At the same time, a new pragmatic brand of ministry training emerged. From 1882, Bible or missionary colleges began providing task-oriented preparation for evangelists, lay workers, and missionaries. Avoiding more speculative theological disciplines sidestepped the growing influence in universities of German Higher Criticism. Suspicious of academic freedom, founders aimed to reinforce faith's fundamentals. Denominationally based colleges naturally viewed the upstarts as a threat to their stability.

As the 20th century dawned, evangelicalism began to fragment. The largest group probably consisted of those unwilling or unable to align themselves with the two emerging, theologically opposed poles. This is understandable, as both extremes agreed on practical points of ethical interest and action, such as urbanization, immigration, and secularism, differing on abstractions. One wing, valuing primarily the gospel's social implications, moved toward theological liberalism. Another, which valued particularly the gospel's provision for personal piety, emerged as Fundamentalism. Polarity would soon provide clarity.

The Fundamentals Writing articles for The Fundamentals was an international project, but one dominated by American contributors (33 authors prepared 51 articles). The next largest identifiable group is English; 9 authors contributed 10 articles. Six Canadians wrote 8 articles. Two Scots furnished a total of 7 articles; one Irish and one German contributor round out the list of those whose nationality may be readily established. The American-Canadian border was especially porous for Fundamentalists, people, and ideas following lines of theological, rather than nationalist, interests. Publication costs were met by oil entrepreneurs Milton and Lyman Stewart (1840–1923), whose beneficence extended also to the creation of BIOLA (the Bible Institute of Los Angeles).

Given Fundamentalism's predominantly Calvinistic nature, it is no surprise that Presbyterians wrote numerous articles. Warfield's essay "The Deity of Christ" graced the first volume. The most prolific pamphleteers, each penning four articles, were the Scottish historian and theologian James Orr (1844–1913; vols. 1, 4, 6, 9) and American missionary statesman and evangelist Arthur Pierson (1837–1911; vols. 1, 6, 9, 10).

Their work appears consistently throughout the series' progress, from the early stages, sometimes characterized as more reasoned and philosophical, to the later stages, when some detect a more distressed and strident tone that presaged a future sense of alienation.

Baptists also figured prominently, with Amzi Dixon (1854–1925) as series co-editor and author of volume 5's "The Scriptures." Also on the editorial committee sat Elmore Harris (1854–1911). Son of a wealthy industrialist, he used family wealth to initiate both Walmer Road Baptist Church and the Toronto Bible Training School (1894; precursor of Tyndale University College and Seminary). An adjunct faculty member at his alma mater, McMaster University, he involved himself in academic politics, objecting to the 1905 appointment of I. G. Matthews as professor of Hebrew and Old Testament. Unable to block Matthews, Harris charged him with heresy in 1909. Again, Harris failed. Using fellow contributor William J. Erdman (1833–1923; vol. 10) as his son's namesake indicates how deeply friendship developed among some contributors. In 1911, Harris died in India on a round-the-world trip. Matthews earned his doctorate the next year from the liberal-leaning University of Chicago. When he left McMaster in 1919, his replacement was a strong conservative, a temporary victory for Fundamentalists.

Despite turn-of-the-century Congregationalism's well-earned reputation for liberalism, some key Fundamentals' contributors were Congregationalist pastors. Reuben Torrey (vols. 1, 5, 12) was one of the chief organizers and editors, a fulcrum of the American Fundamentalist community. The Englishman G. Campbell Morgan (1863–1945; vol. 1) was well known on both sides of the Atlantic as a prodigious preacher and author. The most controversial Congregationalist was Cyrus Scofield (1843–1921; vol. 11). His Scofield Reference Bible powerfully inculcated Dispensational doctrine. Less sophisticated readers occasionally mistook Scofield's notes as part of the infallible text. Harris and Pierson were two of seven consulting editors for the 1909 edition; revisions emerged in 1919 and 1966.

Methodists were under-represented among Fundamentalists. Methodists' postmillennialism remained largely intact, buffering the denomination from Christian (Plymouth) Brethren influence and keeping many aloof from Fundamentalism. The Southern Methodist evangelist Leander Munhall (1843–1934; vol. 7) and Arno Gaebelein (1861–1945; vol. 11), who assisted Scofield's editing of his Bible notes, were notable exceptions. Gaebelein's later departure from Methodism underscores its tenuous relationship with Fundamentalism. Despite coolness toward Fundamentalism, Canadian Methodist conservatives successfully ejected radical professors. George Workman's (1848–1936) challenge of Old Testament prophecy not only led to his forced departure from Victoria College, but provided direct motivation for William Caven's (1830–1904) rejoinder, a tract reprinted posthumously in volume 4. Principal of Toronto's Presbyterian Knox College and president of the Toronto Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, Caven provided a spirited defense of biblical authority. Methodism would prove fertile ground for another alternative Protestantism, Pentecostalism, in which it was over-represented.

Anglicans' (Episcopalians') contribution to Fundamentalism is complex. The Evangelical Party never formed a majority, although some dioceses contained concentrations of conservatives. Long experience as England's mandated state church created a pattern different from most Protestant denominations for dealing with strife; withdrawal was unconscionable. Osborn Troop's (1854–1932; vol. 10) biographer, while immensely proud of her father's evangelical credentials, omitted mention of his article. Two Canadian Anglicans were unusually influential in Fundamentalism. Toronto-born Dyson Hague (1857–1935; vols. 1, 8, 11) was professor of pastoral theology and homiletics at Toronto's conservative Wycliffe College from 1897. One of only seven to contribute three or more articles to The Fundamentals, Hague became the hub of the Canadian Fundamentalist network after Harris's death, until Thomas Todhunter Shields's (1873–1955) rise. American academics generally ignored The Fundamentals, except to portray Fundamentalists as ignorant country bumpkins or to predict prematurely their demise. British Anglican theologians, however, offered thoughtful rebuttal in Foundations (1912). Edited by Burnett Hillman Streeter (1874–1937), originator of the Synoptic Gospel Two Source Hypothesis, the tome went through several editions and earned the editor's symbolic excommunication from the conservative bishop of Zanzibar. The legacy of English-born and -educated William Henry Griffith Thomas (1861–1924; vol. 8) was his co-founding (along with Lewis Sperry Chafer, 1871–1952) of a premier Fundamentalist institution, Dallas Theological Seminary. He died shortly before the seminary opened; his library was donated to the seminary. Winifred Griffith Thomas Gillespie, his daughter, edited and published some of his work. Gillespie also served on the oversight committee of the New King James Version, a Fundamentalist-inspired update of the 1611 original.

Developments after the Great War Apocalyptic hopes ran high among Dispensationalists as reports of Great War (World War I) conquests in Palestine reached the West. Prophetic disillusionment was only one of several disappointments. More than one conservative editor of a denominational journal was ousted. Social Gospel topics displaced evangelistic discussion in many university student fellowships. Theological liberals increasingly secured leading denominational positions. Although not a contributor to the pamphlets, the Baptist William Bell Riley (1861–1947) continued his earlier leadership by guiding the 1919 inauguration of the World's Christian Fundamentals Association (WCFA). Delegates approved a nine-point Confession of Faith drafted by Riley and edited by a Torrey-led committee that included affirmation of the Bible's verbal inerrancy, Christ's personal, premillennial, and imminent return, the Trinity, Jesus' deity, human sinfulness, the substitutionary atonement, the bodily resurrection, justification by faith, and the bodily resurrection of the just and the unjust. July 1920 saw the adoption of the now infamous moniker, Fundamentalism, attributed to the journalist Curtis Lee Laws.

Going on the offensive, Fundamentalists managed the 1924 election of Clarence Macartney (1879–1957) as moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. Working in tandem with J. Gresham Machen (1881–1937), the last of the Princeton theologians, Macartney sought to rally flagging Fundamentalist Presbyterians. Momentum was soon lost, conservatives opting to withdraw from Princeton in 1929 to form Westminster Seminary. Becoming a Westminster board director, Macartney later parted company with Machen over the 1933 creation of the Independent Board for Presbyterian Foreign Missions. Thirteen of 28 Westminster trustees resigned over the issue. Despite Machen's insistence on the centrality of the substitutionary atonement, his distaste for both Dispensationalism and the Fundamentalist label resulted in his exclusion from the 1930 WCFA meeting.

One of the most publicly recognized non-clerical Fundamentalists, William Jennings Bryan (1860–1925) thrice obtained the Democratic nomination for the presidency and served as Woodrow Wilson's secretary of state. A supporter of peace initiatives, a single standard of sexual morality for both sexes, and women's suffrage, he confounded Fundamentalist stereotypes. Nor was Bryan a Dispensationalist. Not given to invective against his enemies, Bryan nevertheless suffered a loss of reputation from his role as prosecutor in the so-called Scopes Monkey Trial of 1925. Technically, he won the case, but Fundamentalism lost in the court of cultural influence. This may explain the persistent citation of H. Richard Niebuhr's error; he posited Fundamentalism's strength lay in poor, underdeveloped, rural southern states. Older historiography also leaned heavily on deprivation theory, suggesting Fundamentalists' fervor was compensation for a dearth of tangible affluence. Subsequent research highlights the opposite: Fundamentalism's principal strongholds actually were predominantly urban, middle-class, and northern.

Fundamentalism's relationship to theological education was ambivalent. The existing network of Bible colleges and Bible institutes expanded as suspicion grew concerning the theological probity of older Christian universities' teaching. Sensitive to charges of obscurantist anti-intellectualism, in 1927 the Baptist Bible Union acquired the bankrupt Des Moines University, appointing T. T. Shields chairman of the board. Success eluded the Union, however, with students staging spectacular on-campus riots that led to the university's entering receivership and permanent damage to the Union. More successful was the 1927 foundation of Bob Jones College (from 1947, University), honoring Methodist evangelist Bob Jones Sr. (1883–1968). Still in operation, the school was accredited only in 2005. The 1929 creation of Westminster Seminary under Machen's leadership marked the final abandonment of Princeton Seminary, Fundamentalism's original intellectual core.

In the short term, liberalism appeared ascendant to the point of nearly wiping out its erstwhile opponents. The creation of the United Church of Canada (1925) may be seen as an institutional triumph for theological liberalism. Lingering embers of cultural optimism were snuffed out by the Depression and World War II. Yet Fundamentalism lived on, despite liberal academics' pre-emptively dismissive declaration of its death. Newly invented radio broadcasting provided wound-licking Fundamentalists a medium by which to appeal to new audiences. Vitriolic exchanges in the late 1920s between two Canadian Fundamentalist broadcasters led to revocation of all faith-based radio licenses in Canada. In the 1930s, Fundamentalism began to recover, as non-Fundamentalist Northern European Protestants (such as Swedish Baptists and the Christian Reformed Church) were increasingly attracted, Fundamentalism's opening a route to their acceptance into mainstream culture. Another trend maturing over ensuing decades was Fundamentalists' tendency to migrate from denominational churches to independent ones.

Many Fundamentalists perceived a new, possibly more insidious threat in the 1940s and 1950s. The WCFA was not flourishing by 1940. Presbyterian Carl Macintire (1906–2002), perceiving alterations of the Fundamentalist consensus by neo-evangelicals as insider defection, or even betrayal, inaugurated the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC) in 1941 (the related global organization, the International Council of Christian Churches in 1948). The next year, neo-evangelicals launched the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE). The key difference between the ACCC and the NAE, otherwise almost theologically identical groups, was the question of separatism.

Trends since 1970 Fundamentalism continues as a viable and significant branch of the broader evangelical movement. The Baptist Jerry Falwell (1933–2007) turned his back on earlier anti-intellectualism by establishing Liberty University in 1971. Currently attracting approximately 38,000 students, the university offers a broad range of majors, in addition to traditional biblical and theological courses. Socially conservative, as well as theologically, Falwell intoned controversially against homosexuality and pornography. The Moral Majority lobby group he launched in 1979 was one of the first and leading movements in the broader Religious Right campaign. The Religious Right's voter mobilization may have aided Ronald Reagan's (1911–2004) 1980 presidential victory. Harold Lindsell (1913–1998), a strongly Calvinistic apologist, fomented a "Battle for the Bible" with his 1976 eponymous volume that accused some evangelicals of abandoning a sufficiently rigorous doctrine of inspiration. Repercussions continue to be felt in the Evangelical Theological Society. The American Council of Christian Churches continues to function, but as a vestigial group of 7 denominations representing approximately 200 congregations. One of the more highly visible current Fundamentalists is Texas megachurch pastor John Hagee (b. 1940). In keeping with Dispensational tenets, he is a Christian Zionist and vocal supporter of modern Israel.

G

G12 Vision

This Charismatic movement was initiated in the nation of Colombia in 1972 by two North American leaders, Father Francis McNutt (b. 1925) and Ruth Carter Stapleton (1929–1983), who visited Bogotá and held a series of meetings there that included both Catholics and evangelicals. A decade later (1983), the movement they initiated would influence the founding of the International Charismatic Mission (MCI) by César Castellanos Domínguez and his wife, Claudia. By 2000, the MCI had developed a large central church in Bogotá (with a weekly attendance of more than 40,000) and had established large daughter churches in other Colombian cities, as well as in other countries—such as Costa Rica, where the MCI had one central church with more than 3,000 in attendance weekly in July 2000.

A few years after the founding of the Bogotá church, Castellanos visited the Reverend David Yonggi Cho in South Korea. Cho had implemented a cell structure at his Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, which was subsequently grown to become the largest Christian congregation in the world (with some 830,000 members in 2007). While in South Korea, Castellanos claimed to have received a revelation in which God promised to increase the size of Castellanos's church in great measure and assist him in caring for the growing numbers of people.

Castellanos subsequently reorganized his 600-member church into cell groups of 12 adults (called the G12 Vision), while his brother-in-law, César Fajardo, did the same with the youth. Between 1991 and 1994, Castellanos's church grew from 70 to 1,200 members; and between 1994 and 1999, the church reportedly established 20,000 cell groups with a regular weekly church attendance of 45,000 people. In 2009, the MCI claimed 25,000 weekly cell groups with more than 150,000 people in attendance in Bogotá alone. Between 1990 and 2009, the MCI expanded its ministry throughout the country and established more than 200 local churches and hundreds more in North American, Central and South America, and Europe.

In 2000, evangelical church leaders from around the world traveled to the MCI in Bogotá, Colombia, to learn about the G12 Vision. In 2001, Castellanos formed an international G12 board of directors, with leaders from various countries. However, by 2005 some of these leaders decided to cut their affiliation with Castellanos and his G12 Vision, which they denounced as being too authoritarian. Defectors include César Farjardo, Castellanos's former youth pastor, who established Sin Muros Internacional (Without Borders International), and Ricardo Rodríguez, who founded Centro Mundial de Avivamiento (World Revival Center), both centered in Bogotá. Rodríguez went on to establish his own TV station in Bogotá, called the Avivamiento Broadcasting Network (TV-ABN), which began broadcasting in June 2001. The station is owned by the Centro Mundial de Avivamiento, which is pastored by Ricardo Rodríguez and his wife, María Patricia. In December 2008, Rodríguez held a giant rally at Parque Simón Bolívar in Bogotá, with an estimated 300,000 people in attendance. During that same week, about 15,000 pastors from 50 countries attended his annual "Avivamiento Leadership Conference."

In spite of the defections, many of the original leaders have continued to form branches of the G12 movement, following in Castellanos's footsteps. Currently, the MCI in Bogotá claims to have established 55,000 cell groups with about 550,000 members worldwide.

■ Gabon

Gabon, a country on the Atlantic coast of Africa between the Republic of the Congo (Brazzaville) and Equatorial Guinea, is home to some 1,486,000 people (2008), most members of one of the country's large Bantu people groups. The equator passes through the center of its 99,500 square miles of territory.

Gabon has been an inhabited area for several thousand years, but in the 16th century it was invaded by the Myene and in the next century by the Fang peoples. Amid the various Bantu groups in the area, the Fang emerged as the dominating force. Europeans had begun to visit the area in 1472 (the Portuguese), and sailors from various nations continued to land on the coast to collect slaves and ivory. The Myene and Fang cooperated with the Europeans in these endeavors. In the middle of the 19th century, as the slave trade was winding down, Libreville, now the country's capital, was founded as a city for freed slaves.

The French, who controlled Gabon for many years, had little interest in exploiting its resources and used it primarily as a conduit to more interesting parts of Africa. Only in the late 20th century did Western interests begin to focus upon the valuable uranium and oil deposits. The country made a rather peaceful transition to independence in 1960.

The many different peoples had a variety of traditional religions, most of which have been replaced by Christianity. The veneration of ancestors was a common theme among them. There were also various secret societies, the most important being the Bwiti, a male group dedicated to the remembrance of the great ancestors. It developed quite strongly among the Fang and more recently began to admit females to initiation. Members consume the eboga root, which possesses psychedelic properties and is used in initiation ceremonies in place of water baptism. Bwiti emerged in the late 19th century. Suppressed during the colonial era, it developed a branch that incorporated Christian elements and was then legalized in 1970. The Bwiti is now the third largest religious group in Gabon.

Christianity was introduced to Gabon by Capuchin missionaries who arrived from Italy in the 1600s. However, they were expelled by the Portuguese in 1777. In the 19th century the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Mary and the Holy Ghost Fathers became the backbone of the Roman Catholic Church presence in the region. Libreville became the center of church activity in the 1850s, and the Vicariate Apostolic of Senegambia and the Two Guineas established, with the vicar residing in Gabon. In 1863 the area was divided into several vicariates and the Vicariate of Libreville created. In 1958, Libreville was elevated to archdiocesan status and a new Diocese of Mouila created. A third diocese was set apart in 1969.

The Evangelical Church of Gabon had its beginnings when missionaries from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions arrive in 1842. They turned their work over to American Presbyterians in 1870, who in turn gave way to the Paris Mission (Reformed Church of France) in 1892. The Gabon mission became independent in 1961. In 1934, the Paris Mission encouraged the Christian and Missionary Alliance to begin work in the southern half of the country, their mission maturing as the Evangelical Church of South Gabon.

The Roman Catholic Church remains the largest church in the country, claiming upwards of 60 percent of the population. Besides the two larger Protestant churches, there are a few smaller groups, including the Jehovah's Witnesses; the Kimbanguist Church (Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu), which arrived from the Congo in the 1950s; and the indigenous Evangelical Church of Pentecost.

There is a small Muslim community, most of whom follow the Sunni Malikite School. The community received a boost in 1973, when Albert Bongo, who had become president of Gabon in 1967, announced that he had converted to Islam. The Baha'i Faith entered the country in the years after World War II. As is common in most former French colonies, there are several lodges of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

■ Gambia

Gambia is a small African nation that exists along the Gambia River, which flows into the center of Senegal. Gambia is completely surrounded on three sides by Senegal, the Atlantic Ocean forming its western border. Its 2,861 square miles are home to 1,735,464 people, most of whom are members of various African peoples. Almost half of Gambia's citizens are from the Mandingo people (42 percent), who moved into the area in the 15th century. They shared power along the river with the kingdom of Mali. The Portuguese arrived in 1455, and their presence caused a significant amount of the economic life to shift toward the ocean.

In 1618 the British purchased Gambia from Portugal and thus established Great Britain's initial foothold in western Africa. The British worked the river and developed a system of gathering slaves for transport to its colonies in North America and the Caribbean. The British saw the area primarily as a source for slaves, and neither the government nor the British churches saw it as an area for missionary work. Meanwhile, beginning in the early 19th century, Islam became the dominant religion in the country.

After the end of the slave trade, Gambia lost its economic importance to Great Britain and was transformed primarily into an irritant for France, which controlled Senegal. In 1889, the French and British reached an agreement that set the present border between Gambia and Senegal. Gambia became autonomous in 1963 and in 1965 became an independent nation in the British Commonwealth.

Although some traditional religion remains in Gambia, the great majority of the people became Muslim (Sunni Malikite School of Islam) in the 19th century. Both the Tijaniyya and the Muridiyya Sufi Brotherhoods are also present, having come into the country from Senegal. In 1960, the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement also established a small presence. The Baha'i Faith began a growth phase in the 1960s.

It was not until 1816 that an Anglican chaplain made his way to Gambia. Later missionaries from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts established a small mission. The Church of England's work was incorporated into the Diocese of Gambia, which in 1951 became part of the Church of the Province of West Africa. Representatives of the Methodist Church came in 1821, and Gambia became a launching pad for Methodism's expansion throughout West Africa. The first permanent mission of the Roman Catholic Church was established in 1849. There is now a Catholic diocese, established in 1957, whose bishop resides at Banjul. Many of the priests are Holy Ghost Fathers from Ireland.

These three churches dominated the Christian community through the mid-1950s. Together they constituted the Christian Council of Gabon, which in turn is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. However, beginning with the World Evangelical Crusade (now WEC International), which entered the country in 1957, several evangelical organizations have begun a new missionary effort. The primary effort has come from the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism, an American-based evangelical missionary sending organization that began sending missionaries in 1979. The first missionary couple, Mel and Ruby Pittman, was the vanguard heralding the arrival of what had become by the end of the 20th century a team of 17. The Southern Baptist Convention opened a mission in 1982.

Ganesh Chaturthi

Ganesh Chaturthi is a Hindu holiday that celebrates the birthday, actually the creation, of the deity Ganesh. There are a variety of tales related to Ganesh's birth; possibly the best known begins at a time when the god Siva, who commonly dwelt on Mount Kailas, left his abode. While he was away, his wife Parvati desired an attendant who could protect her privacy while bathing and prevent incursions by unwanted personages who might appear at her front door. She decided to create a son who could perform such a task and named him Vinayak. When Siva returned, he did not recognize the new person in front of his home and Vinayak did not recognize Siva. Vinayak refused him entrance, and Siva beheaded Vinayak with his trident.

Later, when he discovered what he had done, he sent some of his attendants into the nearby forest with instructions to bring him the head of the first living creature they encountered. That creature turned out to be an elephant. When they returned, he placed the elephant's head on the headless body of Vinayak and breathed life into him. Vinayak sprang to life and emerged as Ganesh, now recognized as the son of Parvati and Siva.

Siva then said that when people begin their worship, they should first worship Ganesh and dedicate to him all their future efforts. Such worship would ensure success and prevent failure. Thus Ganesh emerged as the god of prosperity and good fortune, and the remover of obstacles.

Another tale of Ganesha's birth begins with Siva slaying Aditya, the son of a sage. Siva restored the boy's life, but failed to calm his enraged father, Kashyapa, who cursed Siva. He doomed Siva's son to the loss of his head. The curse happened as Kashyapa had spoken. Siva retrieved the head from an elephant owned by the god Indra to replace it.

A third tale has Parvati throwing her used bathwater into the Ganges River only to have it drunk by the elephant-headed goddess Malini. Malini subsequently became the mother of a baby that had four arms and five heads—all shaped like an elephant. The baby was claimed as her own by the river goddess Ganga, while Siva asserted the claim of Parvati. He also removed four of the heads and then placed him on a throne as the "Controller of Obstacles."

The multiplication of stories about Ganesh indicates the prominent place he began to assume in Hindu rituals, often being the first deity mentioned, and the place he came to have in most Hindu temples. An increasing number of temples were dedicated to him as the primary deity. Interestingly, in spite of the prominent place Ganesh had, public festivities were not a part of Hindu culture until the 19th century. There was an annual Ganesh festival, but it was usually held in homes or the several Ganesh temples.

Lokmanya Tilak (1856–1920), an ardent Indian nationalist and the first popular leader of the Indian Independence movement that sought to overthrow British colonial rule, struggled with various obstacles to his goal, one being the social chasm that existed between India's ruling Brahmin caste and the masses of people in the various lower castes. Through the 1890s he began to suggest that the Ganesha Chaturthi celebration should be transformed into a National Festival and become a tool facilitating a grassroots unity between Indian peoples. He saw Ganesh as a god for every man. He had observed the Ganesha Chaturthi celebrations in Maharashtra and its capital Bombay (now Mumbai), where it had emerged as an important local festival. It would become an important festival across India through the first half of the 20th century.

Tilak was the first to promote large public images of Ganesha in outdoor tents, and he added the practice of creating many images of Ganesh, all of which were immersed on the 10th day of the festival. He viewed the festival as facilitating community participation and involvement in the 10 to 12 days of spiritual talks, dance, dramas, music, debates, and general festivities. The activities occasioned the coming together of people of all castes, at a time when large social and political gatherings were forbidden by the British.

Ganesha Chaturthi is celebrated during the month of Bhaadrapada on the Hindu lunar calendar, starting on the fourth day of the waxing moon. The day usually falls in August or September on the Common Era calendar.

During the 10 days (12 days in Maharashtra) of activities, aarathi (worship centered on the offering of light from wicks soaked in ghee or camphor to a deity) is performed daily. Kumkum, turmeric, and saffron powder, used for social and religious markings, is thrown over the idol. Food is offered before the statues.

A main activity of the celebration is the creation of numerous statues of Ganesh, which become the focus of prayers for good fortunes and success in the coming year. The festival climaxes with the procession of the many images of Ganesh great and small to the local shoreline where all the statues will be immersed in the water, with prayers that he will return to the place the next year. It is considered unholy to keep the image of Ganesh after this day.

In recent years, as the festival has grown in popularity, and as commercial interests have entered the statue-making market, a problem of pollution has arisen. The clay Ganesh statues used for many years were replaced with a variety of statues from non-biodegradable materials and their sheer quantity was a problem. Various cities have taken steps to promote an eco-friendly celebration relative to the immersion rituals and the materials being used in them.

Gardnerian Wicca

In its narrower sense, “Gardnerian Wicca” refers to one initiatory lineage within contemporary Pagan Witchcraft whose members can trace a line of their initiators back to Gerald Brosseau Gardner (1884–1964). In a wider sense, the term is sometimes used to character-

Gerald Brousseau Gardner, founder of the Gardnerian Wicca tradition. (Raymond Buckland/Forstean Picture Library)

ize many forms of the new religion of Wicca (the only modern religion born in Britain) that share elements of the strictly defined “Gardnerian tradition.” (“Tradition” in Wicca can be loosely compared to “denomination” in Protestant Christianity.)

Gardner was born in a suburb of Liverpool, where his father was a partner in a prosperous firm of timber importers. He had little formal education; due to acute asthma, he was often sent on sea voyages to warmer Mediterranean climates with his nurse-governess. When he was 16, his governess married a tea plantation owner in Ceylon (Sri Lanka, at that time a British colony). He worked two years for the couple and then took a managerial job on another plantation. During his early adult years he became a Freemason. He later managed rubber plantations in Borneo and Malaysia and, after contracting malaria, took employment with the colonial government inspecting rubber plantations and overseeing the legal opium trade. He retired in 1936, and returned with his English wife, Donna, to live on the south coast of England at Highcliffe near Bournemouth. During his years of contact with South Asian cultures he had become intensely interested in such ideas as reincarnation, shamanism, and magic.

Gardner claimed to have met a handful of surviving British witches, to have been initiated, and to have been given permission to write about the Craft, first as fiction (High Magic's Aid) and then as nonfiction (Witchcraft Today). Some historians of the Pagan revival, such as Aidan Kelly and Ronald Hutton, question whether any such coven actually existed or whether Gardner and some friends themselves created it. Philip Heselton, on the other hand, argues that the coven did exist in his book Wiccan Roots and suggests who its members were. Thus far, no independent source as to a pre-World War II Pagan Witchcraft has been found, whereas its existence is well documented after 1950. Thanks partly to Gardner's openness to the British news media, Gardnerian Wicca enjoyed steady growth throughout the 1950s and 1960s, aided by books and interviews that caused interested people to seek out him and his later coveners.

Gardnerian Wicca spread to North America first through Gardner's books and later in the persons of Raymond and Rosemary Buckland, an English couple who came to Long Island in the early 1960s. By then the American science-fiction writer Margaret St. Clair had already absorbed Gardner's Witchcraft Today and included many of its elements in her 1963 novel Sign of the Labrys. Most American and Canadian Gardnerian witches (in the stricter sense) trace their lineage to the Bucklands, although Raymond Buckland, a frequent writer on Wicca, would in the 1970s downplay the importance of such lineage, going so far as to start his own from-scratch tradition, “Seax Wicca” (Saxon Witchcraft).

Gardnerian Wiccans regard Wicca as an initiatory mystery religion, not a mass movement. There are three degrees of initiation, with the first making one a priest or priestess and the second conferring the right to teach the Craft. The third qualifies one to form one's own coven, although sometimes second-degree witches may also do so. Ideally, a coven would have a high priestess (Witch Queen) and a high priest (Magus), both of the third degree, and no more than 13 members.

Gardnerian covens tend to be hierarchical, with leaders ritually addressed as “Lady” or “Lord.” Third-degree initiates gain greater prestige based on the number of covens which have “hived off” from theirs. Each coven is autonomous, although persons judged to have broken their initiatory oaths may be shunned.

The ritual year is based upon a series of eight Sabbats at the solstices, equinoxes, and in-between cross-quarter days, plus Esbats, or magic-working and coven-business sessions, which may be held at the full moon.

All Gardnerian Wiccans are expected to copy their teachers’ “Book of Shadows,” a collection of core ritual scripts, chants, and other material, to which the student may later add. The eight seasonal rituals are not changed, however, as part of a deliberate effort to continue a shared current of energy that each generation adds to, a form of “group soul.” Followers believe that they will reincarnate in circumstances permitting them to rejoin their coveners in their next lives.

Gardnerian covens emphasize the “drawing down” or “carrying” of their deities, a form of trance-possession similar to that found in Vodou and Candomblé. Among contemporary Wiccans, they have made this a hallmark of their practice.

Initiates themselves estimate that there are approximately 220 to 230 covens with a total of about 3,600 initiated Gardnerian-lineage witches in North America.

In another sense—that popularized by historian of religion Aidan Kelly—most Wicca is “Gardnerian,” if it includes these elements that do not seem to have been part of English witchcraft before Gerald Gardner’s writings were published: an asexual Godhead manifesting as a God and Goddess; ritual leadership primarily or ideally female; seasonal and lunar rituals performed within a magic circle, with elemental guardians invoked at each cardinal direction; a belief in reincarnation; the idea that Wicca is a revived ancient religion with its own theology, not merely a loose collection of magical practices.

None of these characteristics are unique to contemporary Wicca, but collectively they go a long way toward defining it. The widespread influence of Gardner’s and his followers’ writings (notably Doreen Valiente [1922–1999], who served as his high priestess in the 1950s and authored several books of her own) have exercised a magnetic influence on other forms of witchcraft and caused them to align with this broadly “Gardnerian” model.

Covens in the Gardnerian tradition operate as autonomous bodies tied together fraternally by their shared lineage and practice. Gardnerians may be contacted through the Gardnerian Tradition Web Ring on the Internet in which a number of Gardnerian covens participate.

Garifuna Religion

The ethnic group known as the Garifuna, or Black Carib, exists today in Central America, the Caribbean, and various cities in the United States, Canada, and England (a total population of about 100,000 to 150,000) and can be distinguished by their unique cultural patterns: language, religion, crafts, music, dance, and lifestyle. Garinagu is the plural form of the singular word Garifuna and is the collective name preferred by the representatives of this population in Belize today.

The history of the Garifuna (“cassava-eating people”) begins on the Island of St. Vincent in the eastern Caribbean, which was originally inhabited by a mixture of Caribe and Arawak tribes (linguistically Mairipuran and Arawakan, or Island Carib) from mainland South America prior to the period of Spanish colonization that began in 1492. Soon after their initial contact with Europeans, the Island Carib began to absorb individual Europeans (from Spain, France, and England) and West Africans (mainly from shipwrecked Spanish slave ships) by means of capture or rescue. By 1700, a new ethnic group emerged on St. Vincent that was racially and culturally distinct from that of the Island Caribs: the Garifuna.

In terms of their language and cultural patterns, the Garifuna are an Afro-Amerindian people (called zambos by the Spanish) who have blended various traits of their ancestors to create a unique social system with a strong emphasis on music, dance, and storytelling and with its unique brand of religion that consists of a mixture of Indian, African, and Roman Catholic beliefs. Another distinction is that the Garifuna are matri-focal, which means that the women are the center of the household and that descendants trace their bloodline (consanguineal) through their mother’s family.

In November 1997, the Garifuna celebrated the 200th anniversary of their arrival on the shores of Central America, after being forcibly removed by the British from the Island of St. Vincent in 1797. After conquering many of the Spanish-held islands in the Caribbean, the British decided to take control of the French-held island of St. Vincent during the 1770s. By 1783 the British had dominated the French inhabitants and their slaves, and had attempted to subjugate about 7,000 to 8,000 Garifuna. Many Garifuna were killed in battles with the British or died from European diseases during this period. During 1795–1797, the British hunted down, killed, or captured the remaining Garifuna population, destroyed their homes, and deported on 8 or 9 ships about 2,250 survivors to the Island of Roatan in the Bay Islands, off the coast of Honduras.

However, the Garifuna leaders considered Roatan to be unsuitable for such a large population and requested help from the Spanish authorities at Trujillo, on the mainland of Honduras. By the end of September 1797, about 1,700 Garifuna had been resettled near Trujillo by the Spanish, who hoped that the Garifuna would provide them with needed manpower for the development of farming communities on the north coast of Honduras.

By 1900, the Garifuna had established their own settlements along the Caribbean coast of Central America, predominantly in Honduras, Guatemala, and Belize (known at that time as British Honduras), but also at Sandy Bay in Nicaragua. The principal settlements were at Stann Creek and Punta Gorda in Belize; Livingston, near Puerto Barrios, in Guatemala; and at scores of locations along the northern coast of Honduras, near the major cities of Puerto Cortés, Tela, La Ceiba, and Trujillo. In 1974, it was estimated that the Garifuna population in Honduras was about 60,900, with about 10,600 in Belize, 5,500 in Guatemala, and 800 in Nicaragua. With few exceptions, most of these settlements were located within 200 yards of the sea, at river mouths, freshwater lagoons, and protected bays. Also, during the 1970s, thousands of Garifuna were reported to have migrated to U.S. cities (New York, Boston, New Orleans, and Los Angeles), where the men typically served in the U.S. merchant fleet. More recently, Garifuna families have been reported in port cities of Canada and Great Britain.

Soon after their arrival in Central America in 1797, the Garifuna were considered by the Spanish and British settlers to be “devil-worshippers, polygamists, and speakers of a secret language,” which strengthened the Garifuna’s resolve to live apart in their own settlements, maintain their independence, and conserve their culture. The Garifuna songs and dance styles display a wide range of subjects, such as work songs, social dances, and ancestral traditions; one of the most popular dances is called “La Punta,” which is performed at wakes, holidays, parties, and other social events. Some of these traditional dances and ceremonies have to do with the Garifuna’s respect for the dead: the Amuyadahani (“bathing the spirit of the dead”), the Chuga (“feeding the dead”), and the Dugu (“the feasting of the dead”).

The Garifuna perform these religious rites and ceremonies because, like many Amerindian and African societies, they believe that the spirits of their dead ancestors, which are both good and evil and have a direct impact on the lives of people in the living world, must be respected, worshipped, and appeased. This religious tradition is known as Animism, or Spiritism.

Although some Garifuna adopted Catholicism on the Island of St. Vincent during the French occupation or after arriving on the Spanish-controlled mainland of Central America, this was more a “political decision” rather than an authentic conversion to Christianity. After migrating to the south coast of Belize in 1833 and establishing permanent settlements, some Garifuna accepted the presence of Anglican, Methodist, and Baptist missionaries in their villages and eventually the establishment of English-speaking Protestant churches and schools. Later, the Seventh-day Adventists and the Church of the Nazarene developed churches and schools in Garifuna villages in Belize. In Honduras, there are a few Baptist churches among the Garifuna, near Tela.

The core of Garifuna culture is their traditional Afro-Amerindian rites and rituals that are practiced in every Garifuna settlement, and the buwiye, or shaman (male or female), is the direct psychological link between the ancestors and the souls of the living. An important part of their religious ceremonies involves the use of songs, drinking, and dance, accompanied by drums and other musical instruments, which sometimes induces a trance-like state of consciousness (called “spirit-possession”) during which time a person may enter the spirit-world and communicate with the ancestors, according to practitioners.

These ceremonies—which are similar in some respects to Vodou, Santeria, and Myalism-Obeah (Myalism is an African adaptation of Christianity, and Obeah is the related witchcraft element of that religious system) practices in Haiti, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica, respectively—are used to mourn the dead, heal the sick, protect family members from harm, do harm to one’s enemies, discern the future, assure good fishing and harvests, find a mate, help the dead achieve peace and happiness in the next world, and appease alienated spirits. Rum is often administered ritually to begin a ceremony or induce a trance; it is thrown out of the doors and windows to attract the spirits; it is sprinkled upon the dancers, drummers, and the possessed to cool and sooth; it is used to cure those seeking relief from physical and psychological ills; and it is used to anoint the sacred table at the end of the ceremony. Food, flowers, and candles are normally used in these ceremonies as well, but there is no mention of animal sacrifices being used as in Vodou, Santeria, and Myalism-Obeah rituals.

Although many Garifuna today speak Creole English and/or Spanish, most continue to use their traditional language that is a unique blend of Arawak, Caribe, French, Yuroba, Banti, and Swahili.

Gaudiya Math

The Gaudiya Math family of institutions represents the most visible form of Vaishnavism, the worship of Vishnu, in the world outside India and, increasingly, within India itself. It traces its origins to the life of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (1486–1533), the great saint and ecstatic of Bengal, whom Gaudiya Math followers hold to be an incarnation of Krishna (Vishnu’s avatar) himself.

Like many modern Indian religious movements, the Gaudiya Math had its birth in the reforming period of the 19th century, when its spiritual father, Kedarnath Datta Bhaktivinoda (1838–1914), commonly known as Bhaktivinoda Thakur, undertook to reveal the theological depth of the form of Vaishnavism taught by Chaitanya. Bhaktivinoda’s son, Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati (1869–1936), was the actual founder of the Gaudiya Math in 1918, creating a modern institution to promote Vaishnavism. In so doing, he made a number of radical changes in the external forms of the religion, which can be summarized as (1) a new attitude to social organization, known as daiva Varnashram, which rejects all hereditary spiritual rights; (2) a more intellectually based religious life, rejecting the quietist and mystical approaches that predominated in traditional Vaishnava circles; and (3) a strict moralism, fundamentally rejecting abuses that had grown out of antinomian elements in the tradition.

The evangelical fervor that Siddhanta Saraswati brought to his preaching resulted in the establishment of 64 branches of his math (monastery) before he died in 1936. His conviction of the depth of the Vaishnava tradition inspired him to send disciples to England and Germany to spread the teachings, though with limited results. He left behind him a large number of highly committed and learned disciples, many of them sannyasi (in the renounced order of life). His succession was troubled, however, and a first schism took place in 1943, when Bhakti Vilasa Tirtha rejected the leadership of Bhakti Prasad Puri and became acharya (teacher) of the Chaitanya Math. Puri Maharaj’s organization is now officially known as the Gaudiya Mission. Other disciples of Siddhanta Saraswati became disillusioned with the leadership of both these acharyas and left to form their own independent institutions in the 1940s and 1950s. Most prominent among these sannyasis were Bhakti Rakshak Sridhar, Bhakti Dayita Madhava, Bhakti Prajnan Keshava, Bhakti Hriday Bon, Bhakti Saranga Goswami, and Bhakti Kusum Madhusudan. Most of these acharyas established separate branches in Calcutta and Nabadwip-Mayapur (the birthplace of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu) and generally had a stronghold in some regions of West Bengal, Assam, or Orissa. Some of them also established branches in other parts of India, such as Delhi, Bombay, and Chandigarh, where they often served a predominantly Bengali clientele. A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami (1896–1977), who started the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), was a relative latecomer and founded his society in 1967 in the United States (after an earlier, failed attempt to form another institution, the League of Devotees, in Jhansi in 1953).

Although these various Gaudiya maths had differing degrees of success in India prior to the spreading of the Hare Krishna movement internationally, ISKCON's unprecedented accomplishments around the world had undeniable repercussions on its relatives. In the early stages, the relationship of ISKCON to the Gaudiya Maths was problematic, due to Bhaktivedanta Swami's having been something of an outsider in his spiritual master's original movement. However, Bhaktivedanta Swami had strong friendships with two prominent sannyasi godbrothers, Bhakti Rakshak Sridhar (1895–1983), founder of the Chaitanya Saraswata Math, and Bhakti Prajnan Keshava (1898–1968), founder of the Gaudiya Vedanta Samiti. These relations were renewed following his return to India with his disciples from the Americas and Europe, and after his death in 1977, many of those disciples went to seek instruction in the Gaudiya Vaishnava religious tradition from Sridhar and Bhaktivedanta Narayan, one of Keshava's most prominent disciples. Another senior disciple of Siddhanta Saraswati, Bhakti Promode Puri (1899–2000), became a source of attraction to Westerners interested in the more authentic Gaudiya Math culture. Puri Maharaj became the first president of the World Vaishnava Association in 1994.

Sridhar's successor, Bhakti Sundar Govinda (b. 1929) (a Bengali), continues to travel all over the world and make disciples. Some of Sridhar's Western disciples have also enjoyed considerable success, particularly Bhakti Aloka Paramadvaiti (b. 1953), a Swiss national and disciple of Bhaktivedanta Swami, who founded his own organization, VRINDA, which now has more than 100 centers, most prominently in South America. Paramadvaiti has also been the driving force in reviving the World Vaishnava Association (Visva Vaishnava Raja Sabha), an attempt to coordinate the activities of the disparate Gaudiya maths. This project has met with limited success, and there are few joint projects by the various institutions, though, with the significant exception of ISKCON, most are members.

Another prominent Western disciple of Bhaktivedanta Swami who accepted Sridhar as siksha guru (teacher) and formed an independent society is Swami Bhaktivedanta Tripurari. The Gaudiya Vaishnava Society's northern California monastery, Audarya, is its only math. Swami Tripurari has concentrated on making a literary contribution, rather than on establishing maths and making disciples. His writing focuses on presenting esoteric Gaudiya Vaishnava doctrines in contemporary language. He has also successfully established an Internet congregation that transcends sectarian boundaries and serves the entire international Gaudiya Vaishnava community.

The above-mentioned Bhaktivedanta Narayan (Gaudiya Vedanta Samiti), who performed the funeral rites (samadhi) for Bhaktivedanta Swami, is the most charismatic force in the Gaudiya Vaishnava world today and has attracted the largest number of disciples outside of India, with followers on every continent and a strong publishing program in several languages. Narayan has his principal center in Mathura, India.

Bhakti Ballabh Tirtha, the current acharya of the Chaitanya Gaudiya Math, has also been particularly active worldwide and has disciples in the United States, England, and Russia, but this math's principal strength is in Assam. Bhakti Promode Puri (Gopinath Gaudiya Math) also has a following in Russia.

Doctrinally, there is not much to distinguish the Gaudiya Math from ISKCON. The principal differences are in form—the Gaudiya Math has not been overly influenced by Western elements. ISKCON has generally been suspicious of the Gaudiya Math's learning and charisma.

The Gaudiya Math has generally taken a more traditional form in India, with a single acharya generally inheriting the institution from his predecessor. The ritual of the Gaudiya Math is fairly standard throughout all the institutions, with few of the individual leaders leaving much of an individual mark. They pride themselves on fidelity to the traditions established by Siddhanta Saraswati. Though different Gaudiya Math institutions have branches throughout India, the Bengali language predominates as the language of hymns (kirtan), which are, as in traditional Bengali Vaishnavism, an important means of communicating doctrine. This is in contrast with ISKCON, which concentrates on chanting the Hare Krishna mantra rather than using the Bengali-language hymnal of Bhaktivinoda Thakur. No hymn tradition has been established in any other languages than Bengali, Sanskrit, and to a much lesser extent, Hindi. Liturgically, the Gaudiya Math tends to admit of little influence from India's different vernacular Vaishnava traditions.

Also worth mentioning here is "Jagat Guru" Siddha Svarupananda, the somewhat idiosyncratic founder of the Chaitanya Mission based in Hawaii. A disciple of A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, he is perhaps the most Westernized of all representatives of this tradition, with a less intensely scholastic approach to spiritual life. He has opened centers in Poland and other Eastern European countries, as well as in the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand, and is a founding member of the World Vaishnava Association.

Gedatsu Kai

A Japanese new religion founded by Okano Seiken (1881–1949) in Tokyo in 1929. After founding Gedatsu Kai, Okano was ordained at Daigoji (Shingon Buddhism) in 1931. For a time Gedatsu Kai received legal recognition as a subsidiary organization of Shingon Buddhism, and it was then called Shugendô Gedatsu Kyôkai, but with the end of World War II, it withdrew from the Shingon organization.

According to Gedatsu Kai, humans desire wealth, fame, sex, food, and other necessities, but they run into trouble whenever the search for these five (necessary for survival) becomes redirected to mere satisfaction for the individual. They then fall into life's tragedies—ignorance of karmic law, hereditary problems, and selfish thoughts. The object of religion is to move from the problems and resultant suffering to a state of enlightenment that will include calm resignation and complete peace of mind. Gedatsu Kai offers a method of attaining enlightenment (gedatsu) through developing wisdom, purifying the emotions, and improving will power.

Gedatsu Kai, literally the association of deliverance, reveres the Kami Tenjinchigi (the source of all being) and the Buddha Gochi Nyorai (a name borrowed from esoteric Buddhism). Hannya Shingyô is the most recited sutra in Gedatsu Kai. Ongohô Shugyô, which has to do with possession and mediation, is one of its main exercises. When performing Ongohô Shugyô, members kneel before a kami, or Buddha altar, holding a special spiritual card between their hands, and meditate. Spirits light on the card and present requests for purifying ritual and give warnings. The messages are interpreted, not by the person engaged in Ongohô Shugyô, but by a mediator posted alongside.

Another ceremony of importance in Gedatsu Kai is the Amacha Kuyô ritual, in which members pour sweet tea on cards inscribed with the name of ancestral or other spirits, in the belief that the ceremony purifies suffering spirits. Amacha Kuyô is performed morning and evening before the home altar.

The current leader of Gedatsu Kai is Okano Seihô. In 2000, it reported 193,856 members. Most reside in Japan, but centers are now scattered around the Pacific Basin and in Europe, carried by members who have participated in the Japanese global diaspora. The headquarters is in Tokyo, but there is a “holy land” in the city of Kitamoto, Saitama Prefecture. In the United States, there are three centers, called churches, in Los Angeles, Sacramento, and Honolulu.

Geiger, Abraham

1810–1874

Rabbi and biblical scholar Abraham Geiger was one of the founders of Reform Judaism, a 19th-century attempt to create a form of Jewish belief and practice that responded to the new intellectual demands of the age. He was an early student of the historical critical study of the Bible, which within the Jewish community came to be known as Wissenschaft des Judentums (the science of Judaism).

Geiger was born May 24, 1810, in Frankfurt, Germany, the son of a rabbi. He showed marked intellectual abilities as a youth and became an accomplished student of the Torah and Talmud; he also learned the classical languages, Latin and Greek. By the age of 19, he was at the University of Heidelberg (and later at Bonn) studying Syriac and Arabic, the additional languages he needed to study traditional Jewish texts. In 1832 he became the rabbi at Wiesbaden. While there, he completed his Ph.D. at Marburg (1834).

During his teen years, Geiger developed a liberal bent, which was manifest even as early as his bar mitzvah, when he chose to teach from the Torah in both Hebrew and German. His study of the different languages and the secular environment of the universities pushed him even further in a liberalizing direction. By the time he was at Marburg, he was demanding new freedoms to approach the Jewish texts using the new historical critical tools. Relative to the biblical books of Genesis and Exodus especially, the new critical approach offered a radically different view of the compilation of the text and of the history of the Jewish people.

Once in his rabbinical position, Geiger began to introduce reforms that tended to give the Sabbath service the appearance of a Protestant church. He also ran into opposition from an emerging Orthodox movement led by his old classmate, Samson Raphael Hirsh (1808–1888). In 1838 he was forced out at Wiesbaden and moved to Breslau, where the congregation was more accepting of the reforms he introduced (including a new prayer book) and the local government supported him. Like the Orthodox, he was concerned by the number of Jews who were simply assimilating into German society, but responded by articulating the position that Jews could assert their German identity in addition to their Jewish identity. Judaism could be a modern 19th-century religion that appealed to the contemporary culture.

Geiger suggested that Judaism could do without those elements of the traditional faith that separated Jews from their non-Jewish neighbors. He saw no need, for example, for traditional ritual and the Hebrew language. The Sabbath service could be largely in German, especially the traditional prayers and the sermon. He introduced an organ into the synagogue. He also abandoned the following of traditional kosher dietary laws and the wearing of peculiar apparel such as the head covering (kippah) and prayer shawl (tallit). His congregation went along with his changes in the Sabbath service, including the removal of references to a return to Zion, the Messiah, and the restoration of temple sacrifices. They balked at the complete abandonment of Hebrew and dropping the practice of circumcision.

Geiger worked for the spread of the Reform movement, and to that end founded a school to train Reform rabbis. Geiger died on October 23, 1874, in Berlin.

Gelugpa

The Gelugpa (sometimes spelled Gelukpa) order of Tibetan Buddhism is the largest of its four major traditions. Prior to the Chinese invasion of Tibet in 1950, it maintained the three largest monasteries in the country—Ganden, Drebung, and Sera—all of which have been rebuilt in Tibetan communities in India. The tradition is particularly associated with scholasticism and oral philosophical debate and has produced many renowned meditation masters.

Gelugpa traces its origins back to Tsong Khapa Losang Drakpa (1357–1419), a noted scholar and meditator, as well as one of the greatest debaters of his time. He traveled all over Tibet and studied with masters from various traditions in an attempt to determine what teachings and practices should be considered normative. The Gelugpa order—whose name means “System of Virtue”—was founded as a reformist tradition, the explicit aim of which was to emphasize the centrality of scholarship and monasticism.

Tsong Khapa considered his tradition to be the successor to the Kadampa order founded by Atiśa (982–1054) and his disciple Dromdön (1004–1064). For the first few centuries after its establishment, the Gelugpa order mostly avoided political entanglements, but in the 17th century it rose to supremacy in Tibet, when the fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Losang Gyatso (1617–1682), became the temporal ruler of Tibet with the help of Mongol troops. From this time until 1959, successive Dalai Lamas ruled the country. Following the Chinese invasion and annexation of Tibet, the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (b. 1935), fled to India in 1959 and established a government in exile in Dharamsala.

During the Cultural Revolution (1965–1975), Chinese Red Guards destroyed most of Tibet’s monasteries, including the major Gelugpa institutions. Gelugpas who followed the Dalai Lama into exile re-established the three major Gelugpa monasteries in south India, along with a number of smaller institutions, including two devoted to the study and practice of Tantric Buddhism. Today they continue to teach the traditional monastic curriculum, which is based on memorization of textbooks (yikcha) and oral debate (tsöba). In Tibet, meanwhile, the Gelugpa monasteries have been severely reduced in numbers by Chinese authorities. Prior to the Chinese invasion, the three main monasteries housed tens of thousands of monks, but today they are only allowed several hundred each.

The central meditation practice of the Gelugpa order is the “stages of the path” (lamrim) system, which is outlined in Tsong Khapa’s magnum opus, The Great Exposition of the Stages of the Path (Lamrim Chenmo). The text begins with an analysis of the sufferings of ordinary beings and the ignorance that is their root cause, followed by descriptions of the proper mindset of a religious practitioner. After generating a sincere desire to escape from cyclic existence, a practitioner should develop the “mind of awakening,” pursue the path of a bodhisattva (a being who wishes to become a buddha for the benefit of other sentient beings), and cultivate the “six perfections” (generosity, ethics, patience, effort, concentration, and wisdom), which together constitute the core of a buddha’s awakened mind. The path is conceived hierarchically, and along with the traditional practices of Mahayana Buddhism, Tsong Khapa discusses how the techniques of Tantra should be integrated into the training program. The core Gelugpa text for the Tantric path is Tsong Khapa’s Great Exposition of Secret Mantra (Ngakrim Chenmo).

Today the Gelugpa order remains the largest in Tibetan Buddhism, and its main reincarnate lama (tulku), the Dalai Lama, is generally considered to be the pre-eminent religious leader by all orders. He is not, however, the head of the Gelugpa order; this position is held by the Throne Holder of Ganden Monastery (Gan-den Triba), who is appointed in recognition of his scholarship and moral authority. The headquarters of the order is at the Tibetan Colony in North Kanars, Karnataka. Since 1959, Gelugpa leaders have spread across Australia, Europe, and North America. Apart from the main body, several autonomous Gelugpa groups have emerged, including the New Kadampa Tradition, a Gelugpa group that has challenged the Dalai Lama’s authority.

The Gelugpa tradition is also represented by a variety of independent organizations such as the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition and the Buddhist International Alliance. Although the present Dalai Lama holds no official position in the Tibetan exile government (at his own insistence), he is the most prominent figure in Tibetan Buddhism and has been involved in negotiations with the Chinese government aimed at encouraging China to respect international human rights conventions and give Tibetans greater autonomy in internal affairs. The address of the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama is Thekchen Choeling, PO Mcleod Ganj, Dharamsala 176215, India. A directory of the related offices of the Central Tibetan Administration of the government-in-exile established by the Dalai Lama in 1959 may be found at <http://www.lungta.cz/biblio/tibadr2.htm>.

General Baptist Evangelical Convention of Egypt

One of several bodies constituting the small evangelical Christian community in predominantly Muslim Egypt, the General Baptist Evangelical Convention originated in 1931 around the preaching of Seddik W. Girgis (d. 1980). Girgis had been raised in the Coptic Orthodox Church. However, in the 1920s, while working with the YWCA in Jerusalem, he came into contact with Baptists and adopted an evangelical faith. His Baptist friends arranged for him to go to the United States, where he attended Texas Christian University. After completing his B.A., he attended the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary (affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention). He also joined a Baptist church and was ordained as a minister.

In 1931 he returned to his hometown, Fayyoun, some 65 miles south of Cairo, and started preaching to his neighbors and family. Over the next 30 years he established 6 churches and converted some 250 individuals. The General Baptist Evangelical Convention emerged in the late 1960s, and Girgis served as its president until his death in 1980. He began a magazine, The Baptist Evangel, in 1971. The church building in Fayyoun was closed for a time because the church members had been unable to obtain a building permit prior to erecting it.

Once his work was off the ground, Girgis began petitioning the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) for support, but it was not until 1956 that he got a positive response. They began to send financial support and occasional visitors to check on the work. Only in 1981 were they able to send a resident missionary to pick up the work left by the recently deceased founder. The SBC continues to support the work.

In Egypt, it is illegal to proselytize Muslims, and many of the converts to the church come from a nominal Christian background. There is also a constituency who maintain formal ties to Islam. In 2006, the church reported 1,300 members in 13 congregations. The church is a member of the World Baptist Alliance. It was a member of the World Council of Churches, but has withdrawn.

General Church of the New Jerusalem, The

The General Church of the New Jerusalem, one of several churches formed by followers of the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), the 18th-century Swedish visionary and theologian, was formally established in 1897 by 347 men and women. The individuals involved in the founding of the General Church for the most part had been associated with what was termed the Academy movement, which at first was a body within the General Convention of the New Jerusalem (now generally known as the Swedenborgian Church). The Academy was founded in response to differences of opinion with the General Convention regarding the authority of the religious writings of Swedenborg, organizational structure, and procedural matters. The Academy position was based on the following three principles: first, Swedenborg's writings were the Divine Word of God, equivalent in authority to the Old and New Testaments; second, the writings clearly ordained a hierarchical, or episcopal, form of church government; and third, regional associations of the General Convention had the right to develop their own governmental structure. The Academy movement immediately established its own theological school, and in quick succession it also founded a college and separate high schools for boys and girls. The Academy was formally founded in 1876, when it received its charter from the State of Pennsylvania.

In 1890, differences between the two groups within the General Convention came to a head, when Bishop William H. Benade (1816–1905) ordained another minister of the Pennsylvania Association into the third or episcopal degree of the priesthood. His action was censured by the General Convention. At that point, members associated with the Academy movement withdrew from the Convention and established their own church, called the General Church of the Advent of the Lord. For eight years this church of the Academy movement functioned as both a church and a school, with Bishop Benade presiding over both. Benade's autocratic style of leadership increasingly caused problems and, with a sense of necessity and much sadness, the membership of the Academy withdrew their support from Benade. In 1897, the General Church of the New Jerusalem was founded, as a religious body separate from but affiliated with the Academy of the New Church.

At the time of its founding, the membership of the General Church came largely from those who previously had chosen to disaffiliate themselves from the General Convention of the New Jerusalem. However, it also attracted members from many General Conference societies in Canada, England, and other parts of the British Empire. Thus from its beginning it was an international church. Baptism does not confer membership and confirmation must be freely chosen as an adult. Church growth is thus dependent on the successful recruitment of each new generation, as well as on individuals who discover the works of Emanuel Swedenborg and are motivated to seek out an organized church.

The executive bishop of the General Church is the chief governor and pastor of the church. He is selected by the Council of the Clergy, and his name is then referred to the Board of Directors of the church for counsel and response. The priesthood of the General Church is open only to men, while both men and women may serve on the Board of Directors. The Joint Council of the Clergy and the Board of Directors decide when and where the name of the proposed executive bishop will be placed before the General Assembly of the membership of the church for confirmation. The bishop serves in the office until he resigns, dies in office, or is separated from the office by the same procedure used in the selection process. The executive bishop governs the church with the assistance of counsel from both clergy and laity and the assembly of all church members.

The bishop receives counsel from the Council of the Clergy, which is convened on a yearly basis, either in a council of the whole body of the clergy or in regional councils around the world, all of which the bishop attends. In addition, he receives regular counsel from a consistory composed of priests that he selects. The composition of the consistory changes from time to time, and it dissolves when there is a change in the holder of the episcopal office. He also appoints lay members to serve on the Bishop's Council for a term of three years. Both men and women, particularly married couples, serve on that council.

A General Assembly of the members of the General Church is held at the call of the bishop every three or four years. The General Assembly, while it is composed only of those in attendance, represents the whole church. The Joint Council acts for and represents the Assembly in the interim between assemblies. The last General Assembly was in 2005, when the Reverend Thomas L. Kline was elected bishop of the General Church. In 2008 he issued a call to have "meaningful contact with at least one million people" during the next 30 years. This challenge will be met by planting new churches, developing the international church, sponsoring spiritual journey campaigns at existing churches, creating a robust Internet presence, and creating an online church.

The General Church data center reports that as of June 2009, there were 5,075 members, with a total international church population of 16,845. This latter figure represents a 15 percent increase from 2001. It includes children and youths up to the age of 19, who are baptized but not yet confirmed in the church, and adults who are affiliated with the church but not members. The General Church has members in more than 70 societies, circles, or groups in 50 countries around the world. The largest concentrations of members and affiliates are in the United States, Canada, South Africa, and Ghana.

Growth and development has been particularly strong in Africa. The General Church now has members in 11 African countries. In West Africa the size of the clergy has doubled since 2000, due in part to the establishment of two theological schools there: one in Ghana and the other in the Ivory Coast. Eleven men were ordained in 2008 and each of these schools currently has six men enrolled. Three elementary schools have been founded in Africa in the last 10 years. Two schools in Ghana now serve almost 600 students, and one in Kenya is educating approximately 150 students through the 10th grade.

Nine North American societies of the General Church have elementary schools with a total of 595 students. Another long-established school is located in Durban, South Africa, serving 59 students. Additionally, a number of the church societies sponsor nursery education programs. Education of the young is considered an important function of the General Church. Although members of the General Church do not always live in special New Church communities, and in fact most members probably live outside of them, they have built several residential communities, which are centered around a church and an adjacent General Church elementary school, in various parts of North America.

The emphasis on education in the General Church is not limited to elementary education. Soon after the founding of the Academy in 1876, for the purpose of training men in theology, a college and a high school were also established. In 2008 there were 230 students in the boarding high school that draws students from the Philadelphia area and more broadly from states and provinces in North America. During the 2008–2009 academic year Bryn Athyn College had an international student body of 150 from 14 different countries. A substantially larger number of students enrolled in the college in the fall of 2009 due to a decision to increase the size of the college and its role within the General Church. An extensive building initiative is underway and by the end of the year there will be a new science center and classroom building, and a new student life center to complement the four residential cottages completed by the fall of 2008. A recruitment drive promises to increase the student body by at least 30 students or 20 percent. Previously led by a priest president who oversaw the whole Academy, a layman was named president of the college in the spring of 2009 to oversee the result of these initiatives and to look to program development.

In recent years a controversy has developed within the General Church membership over the issue of the ordination of women. At the beginning of the 21st century, women cannot be trained for or ordained into the priesthood of the General Church. Currently there are 128 priests on the roll; 85 of them are actively serving the church in some capacity. The others are either unassigned or retired. Women are welcome to enroll in the master's program in Religious Studies that was inaugurated under the leadership of the Theological School in Bryn Athyn in 1996. Since then 11 men and 20 women have graduated from that program, with an average of 3 graduates per year. An associate dean of graduate studies was appointed in the spring of 2009 in order to further develop and promote the program.

Bryn Athyn, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, has been the headquarters and episcopal center of this church since its founding. The Swedenborgian community of Bryn Athyn was created when the Academy moved the location of its schools from the center of the city of Philadelphia to the country, in Lower Moreland Township. The relocation of the schools outside the city had been deemed by church members to be culturally desirable and also beneficial to the physical health of the members. In 1916 Bryn Athyn was incorporated into a borough with its own mayor and Borough Council.

Currently, the offices of the General Church of the New Jerusalem are located in a building called Cairncrest, which was built by Harold Pitcairn (1897–1960), a member of the General Church and an aviator who developed the Auto Giro used in helicopter guidance systems. There are three other notable buildings in Bryn Athyn. One is Glencairn, designed by Raymond Pitcairn (1885–1966) as the home for his family, which has its own unique arts and crafts style. Today it is a museum that houses his medieval art and a growing collection of New Church art. The second is the Bryn Athyn Cathedral, which was built using a modern version of the guild system. In the cathedral, every detail is uniquely crafted so that no two objects in the building are the same. It, too, has a unique arts and crafts style. The third is Cairnwood, built by Carrère and Hastings in 1895 to be the family home of the Pitcairn family patriarch, John, his wife, Gertrude, and their children. In April 2009, these buildings and grounds were designated a National Historic Landmark District, one of only 119 in Pennsylvania and 2,500 in the United States. According to the Annual Report of Borough Council for the year 2007, the community of Bryn Athyn has a resident population of 1,318 individuals.

■ Georgia

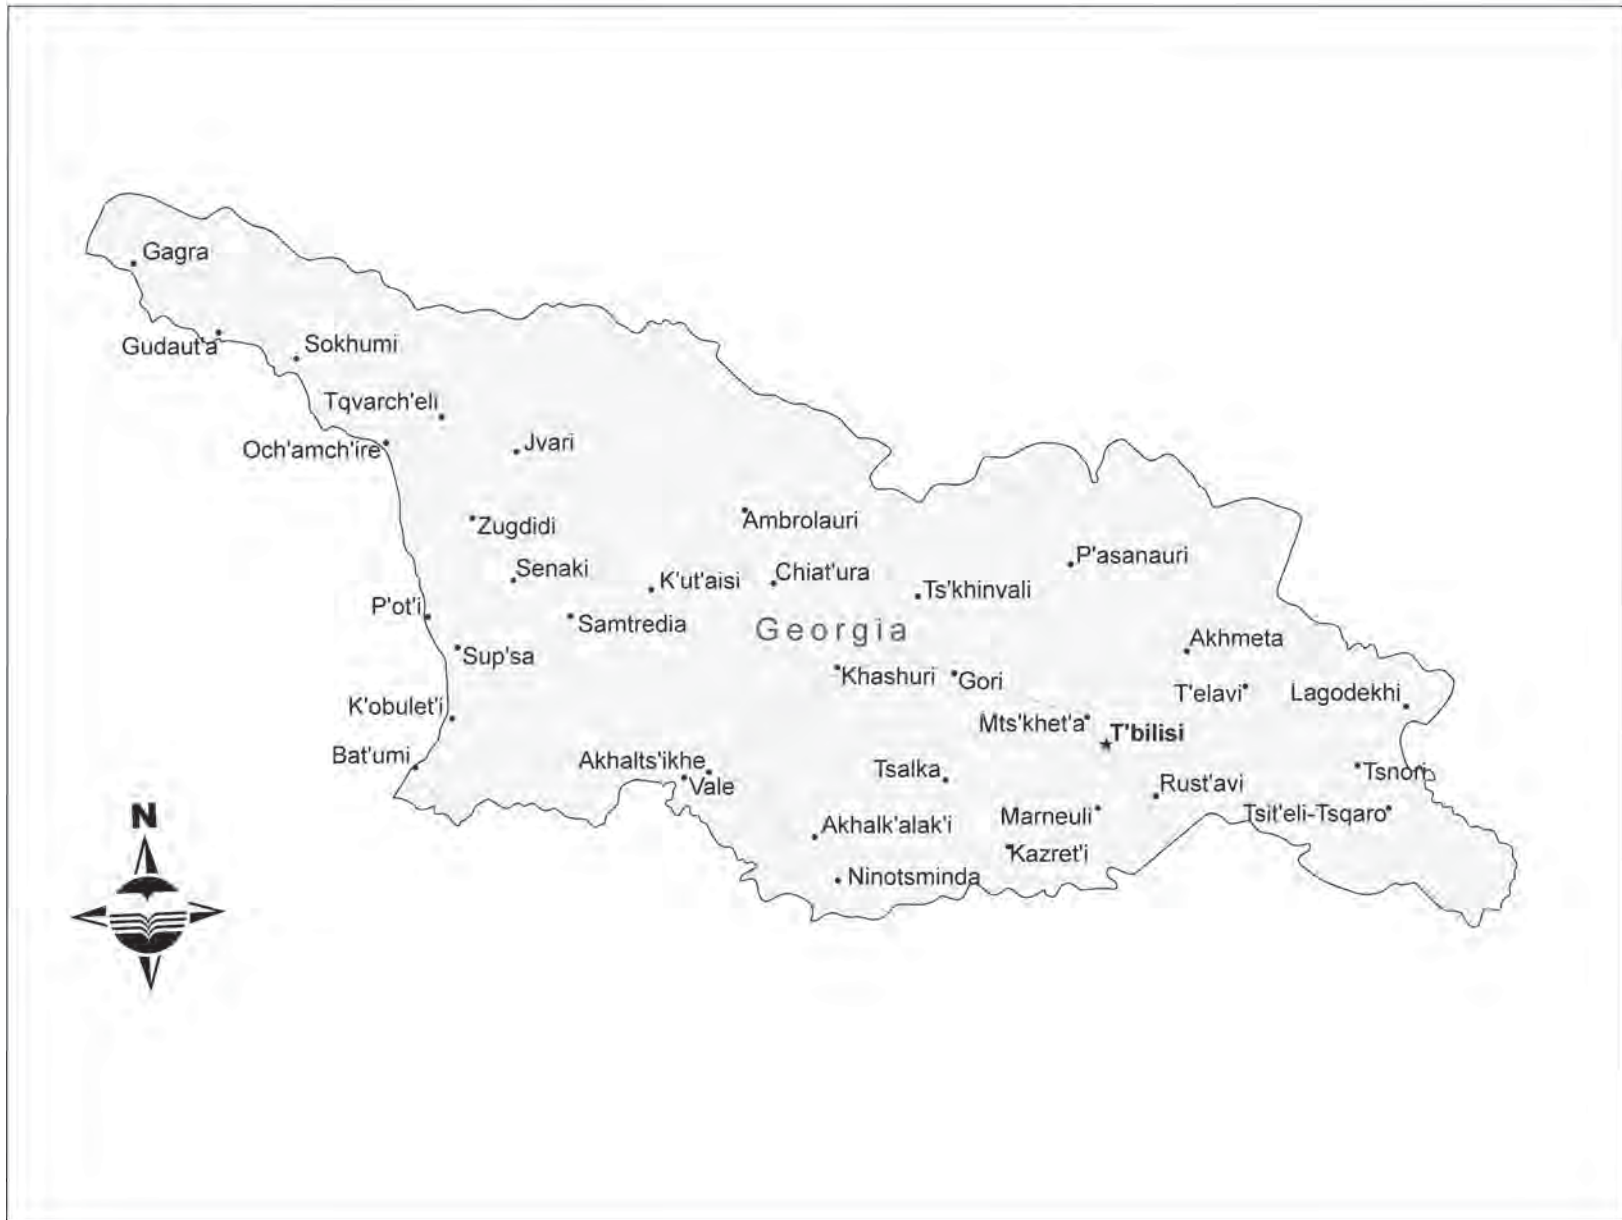

Georgia is a country in the mountainous region of the Caucasus in Eurasia. Until 1991, Georgia was one of 15 republics comprising the former Soviet Union. It is bordered on the west by the Black Sea, on the north by Russia, on the south by Turkey and Armenia, and on the east by Azerbaijan. The territory of Georgia is 26,900 square miles. The population of 4.4 million is overwhelmingly (84 percent) ethnic Georgians with lesser numbers of Azerbaijanians, Armenians, and Russians and with a small number of a few ethnic minorities (such as Ossetians, Greeks, Kurds, etc.). The city of Tbilisi is the capital of Georgia. Georgia is a unitary semi-presidential republic.

The territory of today's Georgia was inhabited in the third millennium BCE. As early as the sixth century BCE, the kingdom of Kolkhida in western Georgia had arisen. In the fourth century BCE, a second kingdom, Iberia (or Kartli), emerged in eastern Georgia. Both kingdoms were incorporated into the Roman Empire in the first century BCE.

The territory of Iberia and Kolkhida fell under a succession of foreign rulers, including the Eastern Roman (Byzantine) Empire and Muslim Arabs; several feudal states were created in the 8th to the 10th centuries. In 1008, Georgia was unified into one single independent kingdom. The period from the 11th to the 13th centuries is seen by many as a "golden époque" in the life of Georgia. It came to an end after devastating invasions of Gengis Khan in the 13th century and Tamerlane in the 15th century. The country was split again into many feudal princedoms. During 1500–1800, various parts of Georgia were fought over by neighboring Turks and Iranians. In 1783, eastern Georgia became a protectorate of the Russian Empire. It was finally annexed in 1801. By 1880, as a result of several wars with Turkey, Russia absorbed the rest of Georgia. In 1914, at the beginning of World War I, the territory of present-day Georgia was divided into four administrative units of the Russian Empire: the Tbilisi and Kutaisi gubernias and the Batumi and Sukhumi oblasts.

According to the 1897 census, of the total population in the territory of contemporary Georgia, 70 percent were Orthodox Christians, 15 percent Muslims, 11 percent followers of the Armenian Apostolic Church, 1 percent Jews, 0.8 percent Orthodox Old Believers, 0.7 percent Roman Catholics, and 0.5 percent various Protestants.

After the Russian Revolution of 1917, Georgia gained its independence in May 1918 and it was recognized by the Soviet government. However, Britain, Germany, and Turkey all sent troops to bring down what had become a Socialist government of the newly independent Georgia. In February 1921, the Soviets responded by sending troops into the country, and in 1922 Georgia became a part of the Soviet Union. Three autonomous territorial units were established within Soviet Georgia. Two of them—Abkhazia and South Ossetia—were based on ethnicity, while the third—

Adjara, which is populated by Georgian Muslims or Adjarians—was based on religion.

In 1988–1989, following the policy of democratization and liberalization introduced by the last Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931), a strong nationalist movement developed in Georgia. Its goal was both to destroy the Communist system and to break away from the Soviet Union. In May 1991, the first Georgian president, Zviad Gamsakhurdia (b. 1939)—a representative of the nationalistic bloc Round Table–Free Georgia—was elected, and in December 1991 the breakup of the Soviet Union finalized the re-establishment of Georgia’s independence. During 1991–1992, Georgia experienced civil war and unrest, combined with a growing separatist movement in its autonomous territorial units, South Ossetia, Adjara, and Abkhazia. In March 1992, the military had ousted Gamsakhurdia, but obviously failed to control the situation in the country. The leadership was offered to Eduard Shevardnadze (b. 1928), who was a decades-long Communist leader in Soviet Georgia and who resided in Moscow at that time. In 1995, he was elected president of Georgia under the new Constitution that had just been adopted.

Meanwhile, the strong local separatist movements being supported by Russia achieved the de facto independence of Abkhazia and South Ossetia from Georgia. In 2003, Shevardnadze was deposed by the so-called Rose Revolution, accused by Georgian opposition and international observers of the falsification of the November 2 parliamentary elections. One of the leaders of the Rose Revolution, the U.S.-educated Mikheil Saakashvili (b. 1967), was elected president of Georgia in 2004. The reforms initiated by President Saakashvili aimed at enhancing the economy and military strength of the country. Politically, a high priority has been given to building close relationships with the United States and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) (while distancing from Russia) and to gaining back control over secessionist regions of Adjara, Abkhazia, and South Ossetia. In August 2008, the increasing tensions between Georgian armed forces and South Ossetian separatists resulted in an open military conflict. On August 7, after bombing the South Ossetian capital, Tskhinvali, the Georgian army entered into South Ossetia. On August 8, under the pretext of the killing by Georgians of several Russian peacekeepers and hundreds of South Ossetian civilians, the Russian army intervened into the conflict, ousting Georgian troops out of South Ossetia and advancing quickly into Georgia proper. During intense fighting there were many contradictory reports on the number of casualties on both sides and among both civilians and military personnel. Both Georgia and Russia claimed unnecessary violence on the part of the other side. On August 11, Russian peace-keeping troops stationed in the breakaway region of Abkhazia entered western Georgia. The full-scale war between Georgia and Russia (with the clear superiority of the latter) ended only after negotiations mediated by the president of the European Union, Nicolas Sarkozy. The so-called six point plan was signed by the Georgian President Saakashvili, by the president of Russia, Dmitri Medvedev, and by the separatist leaders Eduard Kokoity of South Ossetia and Sergei Bagapsh of Abkhazia. On August 25, 2008, Russia unilaterally recognized Abkhazia and South Ossetia as independent states and announced that Russian troops would be stationed there according to the agreements between Russian and the local governments and, therefore, the status of these troops was not regulated by the six-point peace plan.

The 2002 census provided data on the religious composition of the population of Georgia. According to this census, 84 percent are Orthodox Christians (mainly members of the Georgian Orthodox Church), 10 percent are Muslims, 4 percent are Gregorian Armenians (members of the Armenian Apostolic Church), and 0.8 percent are Catholics (both Latin-rite Roman Catholics and Byzantine-rite Catholics); 1.2 percent of the population is scattered among a variety of other Christian and religious minorities. It should be pointed out that Georgia has a long history of the peaceful co-existence of the various religious groups. Religious discrimination has been virtually unknown in Georgia.

The initial Christianization of Georgia has been traced to the first century CE. According to legend, lots were cast among Jesus' apostles to determine to which country each of them was to go with a mission, and the Holy Mother, the Blessed Virgin Mary, was assigned Georgia. Therefore Georgians consider their home country as "allotted to the Mother of God." Since the Mother of God stayed in Jerusalem, the Apostle Andrew went to Georgia. Western Georgia also received the Apostle Simon Canaanite (aka Simeon the Zealot), whose reputed grave is near the city of Sukhumi in the village of Komani.

The arrival of Christian clergy from the Byzantine Empire, the construction of Twelve Apostles Cathedral in Mtskheta, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Kartli (Iberia), and the baptism of the nation are all dated to 326 CE, just a short time after the legalization of Christianity and the first Council at Nicaea. The church in Kartli was initially under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Antioch, but the Georgian Orthodox Church was granted independence from Jerusalem in 467. Consequently, the bishop of Mtskheta was elevated to the rank of catholicos. West Georgia, which was then a part of the Eastern Roman (Byzantine) Empire, gradually became Christian by the fifth century, and it came under the rule of the patriarch of Constantinople. Originally, the church in Georgia had joined with the Armenian Apostolic Church in the rejection of the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon in 451. However, it reversed its position in 697 and came again into full communion with other Eastern Orthodox churches.

As various conquerors (most of whom were Muslims) moved through Georgia, the struggle for independence became largely identified as a struggle for the defense of Orthodoxy, since many clerical and laypersons died as martyrs for their Orthodox faith.

In 1811, a decade after the Russian annexation of eastern Georgia, the head of the Georgian Church—the catholicos-patriarch—died. The independence of the Georgian Orthodox Church was abolished and it was incorporated into the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) as an Exarchate. The number of dioceses in the territory of Georgia was reduced from 13 to 4. The Georgian language in the church was largely replaced by the Church Slavonic liturgy, and forcible Russification of the church in Georgia began. After 1817, only Russian bishops were named as exarchs—the heads of the Exarchate of Georgia.

An independent Georgian Orthodox Church was re-established in 1917, but it was not until 1943 that it was formally recognized by the Patriarchate of Moscow.

After the break-up of the Soviet Union in 1991, the new important social role of the Georgian Orthodox Church in the independent post-Soviet Georgia was symbolized by the public baptism of Georgian President Eduard Shevardnadze in 1992. According to surveys, in 1993, 66 percent of the population in Georgia had declared that they considered themselves believers in a religion, and of those, 83 percent reported that they belonged to the Georgian Orthodox Church. At the same time, roughly the same proportion of respondents (80 to 82 percent) among those who called themselves nonbelievers and those who responded "don't know," also associated with the Georgian Orthodox Church. Thus, the overwhelming majority of the population sees the Georgian Orthodox Church as a national church and a symbol of Georgian statehood.

According to the Georgian Orthodox Church's decree (issued in 1991), priests and bishops are not allowed to be members of political parties or to participate in political activities, but indirectly various factions within the Georgian Orthodox Church have been involved in Georgia's politics. For instance, in the mid-1990s, the moderate head of the Georgian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Ilia II (born Irakli Ghudushauri-Shiolashvili, 1933), had forged an alliance with President Shevardnadze, while a conservative and anti-ecumenical group of Georgian Orthodox clergy has been linked to Georgian radical nationalists associated with ousted president Zviad Gamsakhurdia.

The ninth article of the Georgian Constitution declares full freedom of religion and the separation of the church and state, but it also acknowledges the "special role of the Georgian Orthodox Church in the history of Georgia." In the attempt to define this special role, some politicians have called for Orthodoxy to be declared the state religion. In several ways, the church operates already as an official body, and it has signed agreements about cooperation with the Georgian Ministry of Defense (1999) and the Ministry of Interior. In the 1990s, the Georgian state supported the Georgian Orthodox Church in opposing the spread of the so-called nontraditional and new religious movements into the country.

On March 31, 2001, the 188 members of the Parliament of Georgia passed a unanimous decision declaring the necessity of a Concordat (constitutional agreement) between the Georgian Orthodox Church and the state. The Concordat was signed on October 14, 2002. It stipulates, for example, that Orthodox clergy cannot be drafted into the army; the state recognizes marriages registered by the church; the property and lands owned by the church are tax-exempt; the state is obligated to implement joint educational programs and to support educational institutions of the Orthodox Church; and the 12 major Orthodox festivals are recognized as national public holidays.

Islam was first introduced to Georgia by the Arabs in the eighth century. However, it was not until the period when the Ottoman Empire and Persians (16th–19th centuries) had hegemony that a permanent Muslim community arose in the country. Although not a large number of Georgians were attracted to Islam, it has persisted through the centuries. A number of ethnically distinct Muslim communities exist today throughout Georgia. About 115,000 Muslims who live in Adjara (West Georgia) are ethnic Georgians who adopted Islam during the reign of the Turks. The Islamic population of Georgia includes also ethnic Azerbaijanis living in southeast Georgia (about 290,000) as well as Chechens and Ingushs (12,000) in the villages of northeast Georgia, in the district of Akhmeti. The Adjarian Muslims are Sunnis of the Hanafite rite, but there are both Shiites and Sunnis among Azerbaijanis. The religious practice of Chechens is largely of the various traditions of Sufism, of which there are more than 25, most important, the Qadiriyya and the Muridiyya brotherhoods. In terms of religiosity, the Adjarians are more superficial followers of Islam than Azerbaijanis and, especially, Chechens. Two major Islamic theological schools—madrasahs—function in the country and are situated in the capital, Tbilisi, and in the city of Marneuli.

Archaeological evidence confirms the presence of Jews in Mtskheta, the capital of the ancient eastern Georgian state of Kartli, in the first centuries CE. In western Georgia, Jews appear to have arrived in the sixth century, most likely from the Byzantine Empire. In the ninth century Georgia was the site of the birth of a new Jewish group that denied some Jewish laws concerning marriage and food. The group's founder, Abu-Imran Musa (Moshe) al-Za'farani, had moved to Tbilisi (then called Tiflis) from Babylonia. He was later known as Abu-Imran al-Tiflisi, and the group the Tiflis Sect. The group lasted some three or four centuries.

Today, Jewish religion in Georgia is represented by Orthodox Judaism. The Jewish community is subdivided in two groups: Georgian-speaking Sephardics and Russian-speaking Ashkenazi. While Sephardics can be considered as an indigenous population of Georgia, the origin of the community of Ashkenazi traces back only to the 19th century. At that time a number of retired soldiers of the Russian army who were Jews settled in Georgia. Consequently, until the 20th century, the Sephardics in Georgia lived almost exclusively in the countryside, while Ashkenazi were initially urban dwellers.

The number of Jews in Georgia peaked at around 61,000 in 1970, including 43,000 Sephardics and 18,000 Ashkenazi. It had decreased to fewer than 25,000 in 1989 (including 14,000 Georgian-speaking and 10,500 Russian-speaking) due to mass immigration to Israel and to the United States. The short period of Gamsakhurdia's radical nationalistic regime urged forward this process. The Jewish community continued to decrease in numbers through the 1990s. According to the 2002 census, only 3,541 Jews remain in Georgia. The vast majority of Georgian Jews live today in the capital Tbilisi (where they are served by two synagogues) and in the city of Kutaisi.

Most of the 33,000 Kurds who migrated to independent Georgia in 1918 did so because of the religious and political persecution conducted by the government of Turkey. They are Yezidis by religion. This Pagan religious teaching is based on Zoroastrianism, but it also has elements of Islam, Judaism, and Christianity. Kurds in Georgia are strict followers of religious traditions and prescriptions. According to the 2002 census, about 18,300 Yezidis are living today in Georgia.

The second-largest Christian group in Georgia are Gregorian Armenians (about 250,000 as of the census of 2002). Most of them (about 171,000) belong to the Monophysite Armenian Apostolic Church. Seven permanently functioning churches (two in Tbilisi and one each in Batumi, Nino Tsminda, Shaumjany, Akhalkalaki, and Akhalzikhi) along with many chapels in villages form the Georgian diocese of the Armenian Apostolic Church. Almost half of Georgia's Armenians live in southern Georgia, in the Province of Samtskhe-Javakheti. About one-third of the Armenian community resides in the capital Tbilisi.

The Roman Catholic Church was introduced to South Georgia at the time of the Ottoman Empire's rule. The Islamic conquerors were much more tolerant of Catholicism than of Orthodoxy, and many Orthodox Georgians preferred to convert to Catholicism rather than adopt Islam. Today Georgian Catholics (about 35,000 total) live mainly in the cities of Tbilisi and Kutaisi, and in South Georgia. The Catholic parishes in Georgia are part of the Apostolic Administration of Transcaucasia, which was established in 1994 and includes Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan.

Protestantism came to Georgia initially through the spread of the Molokan movement. In the 1840s, members of this group who ran into trouble with the authorities in the Russian Empire were banished to Transcaucasia and established several villages in Djavakhetia, the mountainous area in South Georgia. In 1862, a German Baptist, Martin Kalweit (1833–1918), settled in Tbilisi. He began to hold worship services, primarily within the German-speaking community in the city. In 1867, he baptized the first Russian, Nikita Voronin. From that time the Baptist congregation grew, with services in both Russian and German languages. The Baptist movement in Georgia spread primarily among the Russians living there. One of them was Vasilii G. Pavlov (1854–1924), who studied in Germany and returned to become the leading force in spreading the Baptist faith in Transcaucasia. In 1912 the first Georgian-speaking members were baptized. After 1919, Baptist services were celebrated in the Georgian language on a regular basis.

In 1919, a Trans-Caucasian Union of Baptists was formed. In 1921, Georgian Baptists merged with the Russian Baptist Federation. The Baptist churches were closed during the period of harshest Communist religious repression (1937–1944), but in 1944 the first Baptist church was reopened under an umbrella organization of various Protestant groups, the so-called All-Union Council of Evangelical Churches–Baptists. Following the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Union of Evangelical and Baptist Churches of Georgia was formed. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance. The Baptists in Georgia number about 18,000 faithful and have about 60 local churches (including 5,000 members and 8 churches in Tbilisi) and a theological seminary in Tbilisi. The Baptist congregations are divided along ethnic-linguistic lines: Georgian, Ossetian, Armenian, and Russian.

Aside from the Baptists, the Protestant denominations in Georgia are represented by Pentecostals (5,000 to 6,000 members in 70 local communities), Lutherans (about 1,000 persons living mainly in Tbilisi), Jehovah's Witnesses (the estimates vary greatly between 15,000 and 30,000), as well as by small groups of the New Apostolic Church and the Salvation Army.

A unique community of the Russian sect of Doukhobors in mountainous South Georgia numbered almost 7,000 in 1988, but it is almost extinct now, due to a mass migration to Russia. The remaining Doukhobors live today mainly in the village of Gorelovka in the Nino-Tsminda District.

Among religious groups that are relatively new to the country, the Baha'i community should be mentioned. The first Baha'i Local Spiritual Assembly in Georgia was formed in 1991. The first National Spiritual Assembly was elected by Georgian Baha'is in 1995.

Georgian Orthodox Church

The Georgian Orthodox Church (GOC) is the Eastern Orthodox Christian body that serves as the national church of the Caucasian country of Georgia. The great majority of Georgians are members of the church.

Archaeological findings testify to the existence of Christian communities in Georgia as early as the second and third centuries CE. At that time Georgia consisted of two states: the Kingdom of Kartli (or "Iberia" in Greek) in eastern Georgia and the Kingdom of Egrisi (or "Kolkhida" in Greek) in western Georgia. In Kartli, Christianity had become the state religion due to the missionary activity of "Equal to Apostles" Saint Nino, a woman from Cappadocia who came to Kartli from Jerusalem around 325. According to legend, Saint Nino was a close relative of Saint George, commonly recognized as a protector of Georgia. Under her ministry, Georgian Queen Nana (d. 363) and King Mirian III (r. 284–361) converted to Christianity, and then they requested the Byzantine emperor, Constantine (r. 306–337), to send clergy to Kartli in order to baptize the royal family. The construction of Twelve Apostles Cathedral in Mtskheta, an ancient capital of Kartli, and the baptism of the nation are dated to 326. Western Georgia, then a part of the Eastern Roman Empire, gradually became Christian by the fifth century, and it came under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople. The Church of Kartli was initially under the Patriarchate of Antioch, but in 467 it was granted full independence (the so-called autocephaly) at the request of King Vakhtang Gorgaslan. The bishop of Mtskheta was elevated to the rank of catholicos. Consequently, the relations with the Holy Land, in particular with Jerusalem, have always had a special meaning for Georgia and for the GOC. Like other early Christian churches, the Georgian Church was involved in the disputes surrounding decisions of the Council of Chalcedon (451) regarding Christological definition. It was not until the end of the sixth century that Georgians finally joined with the Church of Constantinople and supported the decrees of the Chalcedon while splitting with the Armenian Apostolic Church (who rejected the decrees of Chalcedon).

Monasticism has flourished in Georgia since the sixth century and it peaked during the 10th to 12th

Jvari church above the city of Mtskheta, Georgia. This Georgian Orthodox church was built between 586 and 605 on the site where, according to legend, Saint Nino converted the pagan population to Christianity. (Shutterstock) centuries. Georgian monasteries maintained regular contacts with monasteries in Jerusalem and Mount Sinai. Further, in the late 10th century, the Iviron Monastery was founded by Georgians on Mount Athos in Greece. The monks of the Iviron Monastery translated many religious books from Greek into Georgian. Georgians also built other churches and monasteries outside of Georgia in Palestine, Greece, Bulgaria, Syria, and Cyprus. Today, monasticism remains a significant feature of the contemporary GOC.

Initially in Kartli the Jerusalem liturgy of Saint James was celebrated, while the Byzantine liturgy was used in Kolchida, in western Georgia. After East and West Georgia were united into one kingdom in 1008, the Byzantine liturgy celebrated in the Georgian language was adopted in the whole country. Also since that time the head of the GOC has been known by the title of catholicos-patriarch.

The period from the 11th to the 13th centuries is seen by many as a “golden époque” in the life of Georgia and GOC. It came to an end after the devastating invasions of Genghis Khan in the 13th century and Tamerlane in the 15th century.

During the period from 1500 to 1800, Georgia began to develop new contacts with the West and Russia. Further, looking for protection from Islamic invaders, Georgia has repeatedly requested assistance from Orthodox Russia. In 1783, Georgia became a protectorate of the Russian Empire. In 1801, upon the request of the last Georgian kings, George XII (1746–1800) and Solomon II of Imereti (1772–1815) (the country having split again in two parts in the 14th century), Georgia was declared a part of Russia by Emperor Alexander I (r. 1801–1825). In 1811, when the catholicos-patriarch of the Georgian Church died, the Catholicosate of Georgia was forcibly abolished, and the Georgian Church became a part of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) with the status of exarchate. GOC lost its independence (“autocephaly”). The 13 dioceses of the church were reduced to 4, and the Georgian language was largely replaced by Russian and Slavonic in both the seminaries and the liturgy. Beginning in 1817, all exarchs of Georgia were ethnically Russians.

According to the 1897 census, of the total population in the territory of contemporary Georgia, 70 percent were Orthodox (members of the Russian Orthodox Church), 15 percent Muslims, 11 percent followers of the Armenian Apostolic Church, and 1 percent Jews. There were lesser numbers of Orthodox Old Believers, Roman Catholics, and Protestants.

In March 1917, after the abdication of the Russian Emperor Nicholas II, the autocephaly of the GOC was reestablished at a meeting of ethnically Georgian bishops, clergy, and laity. A new catholicos-patriarch of the GOC was elected in September 1917. After the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia (October 1917), Georgia existed as an independent country, but it was annexed by the Soviet Union in February 1921. The GOC, however, managed to retain its de facto independence from the Russian Orthodox Church, although this independent status was not recognized by the Moscow Patriarchate. The relations between the Russian and Georgian churches were broken, and the situation was aggravated by the fact that many Orthodox parishes in Georgia were predominantly Russian and had Russian priests. These parishes tended to remain loyal to the Moscow Patriarchate.

In 1943, the Moscow Patriarchate finally granted autocephaly to GOC, but this status continued to be questioned by the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Istanbul, which generally did not recognize Moscow’s authority to grant autocephaly. The autocephaly of the GOC and its patriarchal rank were finally confirmed by the Ecumenical Patriarchate in 1990.

The situation of the GOC under the Soviet regime was similar to that of the Russian Orthodox Church. At the beginning of the 20th century, the GOC had nearly 2,400 parishes and 26 monasteries and 5 convents. Some 590 public schools were also run by the church. The Orthodox clergy numbered almost 2,000. In 1985, only 54 Orthodox churches remained open in the Soviet Republic of Georgia, along with 4 monasteries and 1 theological seminary in the capital city of Tbilisi.

In the late 1980s, the democratic reforms and the policy of political liberalization introduced by Mikhail Gorbachev in the Soviet Union triggered quick revival of the GOC. By 1990, the church had 200 parishes (divided into 15 dioceses) and 15 Orthodox monasteries. In addition to the seminary, a theological academy was open in Tbilisi in 1988. By 1999, GOC had 400 parishes, 30 monasteries, and 30 convents. The number of dioceses has increased to 27, served by 600 priests. In 2009, the Georgian Orthodox Church had 35 dioceses served by more than 1,000 parish clergy. There are now 2 theological academies (in Tbilisi and Gelati) and 6 seminaries around the country. According to the 2002 census, of a total Georgia’s population of 4,380,000, 82 percent identified themselves as Georgian Orthodox. After the declaration of Georgia’s independence (1991), the revival of the GOC has been further intensified by the growth of the church’s political and social influence. The baptism of the Georgian president, Eduard Shevardnadze, in 1992 has been seen as a symbol of the important role that GOC plays in the newly independent Georgia. The 1994 agreement between the Georgian government and GOC introduced the teaching of religion in public schools under the program designed in cooperation with the GOC. Article 9 of Georgia’s Constitution (adopted in 1995) declares full freedom of religion and the separation of the church and state, but, at the same time, acknowledges the “special role of the Georgian Orthodox Church in the history of Georgia.” In the attempt to define that special role, some politicians have called for Orthodoxy to be declared the state religion.

On March 31, 2001, the 188 members of the Parliament of Georgia passed a unanimous decision declaring the necessity of a Concordat (constitutional agreement) between the GOC and the state. The Concordat was signed on October 14, 2002. It stipulates, for example, that Orthodox clergy cannot be drafted into the army; the state recognizes marriages registered by the church; the property and lands owned by the church are tax-exempt; the state is obligated to implement joint educational programs and to support educational institutions of the Orthodox Church; the 12 major Orthodox festivals are recognized as national public holidays.

The dynamic development of the GOC during 1990s was, however, accompanied by serious internal problems and tensions. Strong conservative and anti-ecumenical sentiments were growing within the GOC, specifically among the clergy in Georgian Orthodox monasteries. In an open letter published on May 17, 1997, the abbots of five monasteries threatened to break communion with the head of the GOC, Catholicos-Patriarch Ilia II, because of his ecumenical involvement (from 1979 to 1983, he served as president of the World Council of Churches). On May 20, 1997, in order to avoid a possible schism within the church, the Synod of Bishops voted to withdraw from both the World Council of Churches and the European Council of Churches. The leaders of the conservative opposition (who are in close contact with Old Calendarist groups from Greece), however, were not fully satisfied with this action and called to break communion with those national Orthodox churches that continue to participate in ecumenical organizations. These divisions within the GOC were to a significant extent associated with support for the various political factions. The moderate head of the GOC, Patriarch Ilia II (b. 1933), has forged an alliance with President Shevardnadze, while a conservative and anti-ecumenical group of Georgian Orthodox clergy has been linked to the Georgian nationalists related to the ousted president Zviad Gamsakhurdia.

In 2003, the so-called Rose Revolution deposed President Shevardnadze, who was accused by Georgian opposition and international observers of the falsification of the November 2 parliamentary elections. One of the leaders of the Rose Revolution, the U.S.-educated Mikheil Saakashvili, was elected president of Georgia in 2004. During the nonviolent Rose Revolution and transitional process of establishment of the new more pro-Western government, Patriarch Ilia II, made a strong appeal on behalf of the church against the use of arms and violence.

The administration of the Patriarchate of Georgia consists of 10 departments (External Affairs, Mission and Evangelization, Relations with Army and Law Enforcing Bodies, Relations with Prisoners, Search and Protection of Ecclesiastical Sanctities, Study of Non-Orthodox Denominations, Education, Publication, Folk Handicraft, Study of Ancient Georgian Sacred Songs). GOC supports a nationwide radio show, Iveria.

Since 1977, the GOC has been headed by His Holiness and Beatitude Ilia II, who has the title of “the Catholicos-Patriarch of All Georgia and Archbishop of Mtskheta and Tbilisi.”

Gerizim, Mount

Mount Gerizim is the holy mountain of the Samaritans. The Samaritans have a version of the Old Testament that includes references to the mountain that do not appear in the Jewish Bible. Mount Gerizim was the location of their competing temple and the central location of their religion; it continues to be the central focus of their religious activities today.

Mount Gerizim is in the southern side of the valley in which the city of Nablus, or Shechem, sits, the northern side being Mount Ebal. It is about 2,900 feet above sea level, slightly shorter than Mount Ebal. It is the center of worship for the Samaritan community, most of whom live in the vicinity. They regard Mount Gerizim as the site of Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac and of the Temple, both of which are positioned on Mount Moriah and in Jerusalem for Jews.

The mountain became a religious center designed to rival Jerusalem in the mid-fifth century BCE. The Samaritans established their own temple on Mount Gerizim and in the time of Alexander the Great, according to Josephus, it increased in size and magnificence. This seems to have aroused considerable antipathy with the Jews in Jerusalem, and both communities sought the support of the rulers of Palestine for the benefit of their own community. The Jews managed to destroy the temple on the mountain. Later on when Christianity became the state religion of the Roman Empire and a church was built on the mountain, this led to a violent Samaritan response, which briefly resulted in the sixth century CE in the recapture of the mountain and the destruction of churches in Samaria. This was put down quite quickly, though, and brought about the dispersal of the Samaritan population. Some must have remained, though, since a church was built on the summit of the mountain, which is rather flat, and was protected by a castle. The site remains today the place where Samaritans live, carry out their rituals, and await the coming of the Messiah.

Members of the ancient Samaritan community pray during the pilgrimage for the holy day of the Tabernacles, or Sukkot, at the religion's holiest site on the top of Mount Gerizim near Nablus, Palestine, October 25, 2007. (AP Photo/Kevin Frayer)

Mount Gerizim plays an enormous role in Samaritan life, and in their version of the Bible the place is mentioned in places where other mountains are mentioned in the Masoretic (Jewish) text. The many centuries of conflict and rivalry between the Jews and the Samaritans are symbolized by the differences in choice of holy mountains. In order for a Samaritan to be recognized as a Jew, he had to renounce any belief in the holiness of Mount Gerizim. There are various interesting remains on the mountain, including some stones that the Samaritans regard as sacred, together with parts of the church of the Virgin Mary and the wall built by Justinian. In the present day the Samaritan community lives on the slopes between the 10th of Nissan and the end of the Passover, using for their offerings not the summit of the mountain, even though this was the site of their original temple. They use a lower slope, perhaps because of the presence on the summit of a Muslim cemetery, which defiled the original site.

German Buddhist Union

The German Buddhist Union (GBU; Deutsche Buddhistische Union) is the umbrella organization of Buddhist groups, societies, and institutions in Germany. Since the organization is not aligned with any specific tradition, member societies are from the Theravada, Mahayana, Tibetan Buddhist, and Western Buddhist traditions. The Union is the only nationwide umbrella organization and widely recognized as the representative of Buddhism in Germany.

The GBU started as the German Buddhist Society in 1955, offering membership to both individuals and organizations. In 1958, the organizational structure was changed to an umbrella organization of Buddhist groups and societies only. The name adopted was German Buddhist Union, and it specified three aims: (1) to promote mutual understanding and cooperation between the different schools and traditions present in Germany, (2) to serve as a Buddhist representative for administrative bodies and other public institutions, and (3) to be a partner in interreligious dialogue.

During the first 25 years of its existence, the GBU remained small, with 7 to 8 member organizations only. As Buddhism generated increasing interest in Germany from the 1970s on, numerous new Buddhist groups and associations were founded. In the early 1980s, the GBU experienced a sharp increase, with new groups and organizations becoming members. This growth, accompanied by the wish to gain an officially established place in society and to firmly dissociate itself from new religious groups (such as the Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh movement), led to application for public recognition of Buddhism as an incorporated body in 1985. Although the GBU managed to meet legal prerequisites, especially those of a specific organizational structure and the provision of a commonly accepted doctrinal platform, the privileged status was not granted. The main reasons for the rejection were a lack of financial resources and the fact that too small a number of Buddhists were represented by the Union. Since 2008, the GBU has aimed to apply for recognition as an incorporated body.

The GBU is proud to present a Buddhist Confession (Buddhistisches Bekenntnis; a self-designation) that has been accepted by a wide range of traditions and schools. The friendly cooperation between the various Buddhist schools and groups in the GBU has been termed a "Buddhist ecumenism" (also a self-designation). The sharp increase in membership continued during the 1990s, doubling the members from 27 in 1994 to 59 in 2009. Many of the GBU members consist of numerous local meditation groups or centers; the organization thus comprises an estimated four-fifths of the more than 500 Buddhist groups, societies, centers, and organizations existent in Germany in the beginning of the 21st century. According to the GBU, the affiliated members attempt to realize an “authentic Buddhism” and all acknowledge the Buddhist Confession.

Legally, the GBU is a registered society with public benefit status. The Union is headed by a board of 11 persons, with a speaker coordinating the activities. Individual Buddhists can join the GBU via a membership in the Buddhist Community, which itself is a member of the GBU. Once a year, the GBU organizes a public conference, presenting varying topics. Since 1987, it has published the quarterly Lotusblätter, renamed and upgraded in 2004 as Buddhismus aktuell. The headquarters was established in Munich in 1986. The GBU is a member of the European Buddhist Union and the World Fellowship of Buddhists.

■ Germany

Germany as a united nation-state in the modern sense came into being after the Franco-German War of 1871. Before, there was a millennium-long story of rivalry between numerous small and big German states, between principalities, kingdoms (for example, Bavaria, Prussia), and the Holy Roman Empire, a shifting loose confederation of mostly German-speaking states, generally with a German emperor, of which it has been said that it was neither holy nor Roman nor an empire. The different peoples were loosely connected by the varying dialects of the German language (first referred to in Latin as theodisca lingua, from which the German expression diutisc was derived, first attested in the 10th century). From diutisc has come the modern Deutsch. People believed in the existence of local powers and deities (deities in trees, in rivers, on hills) that needed to be respected and approached in awe. In the course of the 5th to 10th centuries CE, Roman Catholic monks and nuns, supported by the ruling powers, led the peoples of the various central Western European territories to Christianity. During the Middle Ages (the 11th to the 15th centuries), the pope and the German emperor alternately struggled as rivals and cooperated.

Refurbished Berlin Synagogue and its glittering new dome shine in a sea of houses in former East Berlin. The Byzantine-style structure was severely damaged during World War II. (Merlindo/Dreamstime.com)

In the early 16th century, the initial historic split between the Roman Catholic Church and reformist Protestantism took place, Martin Luther (1483–1546) providing the theological inspiration. Following Luther's translation of the New Testament into German (from the Greek and Latin versions) in 1521 and his public criticism of the pope and the practice of selling indulgences, an increasing number of German principalities and kingdoms dissociated from Rome and introduced the Protestant Reformation. The peace treaties of 1555 and 1648 politically sanctioned the split of the church. By those treaties, the principle was established that the ruler of a region could determine its religion (in Latin, cuius regio, eius religio), and so parts of Germany became Protestant (following the Evangelical Church, as the church established by Luther was called), and other parts remained in the Roman Catholic Church. The subjects had to follow the principal's decision.

Within Protestantism, already in the 16th century the first splits occurred, and Pietistic denominations (emphasizing personal spirituality) came into being. Many principalities were in fact more or less mono-religious, but in the larger kingdoms people of both confessions (that is, of both the Evangelical and the Roman Catholic Church) resided, as well as marginalized Jews. Alongside this predominantly bidenominal set-up a small number of Free churches (for example, Baptists and Methodists), occult Esoteric groups, and metaphysical movements came into existence beginning in the 17th century.

Bi-confessionalism had also come about as a result of the legal secularization of 1803 and the territorial rearrangement of the German principalities following the Napoleonic wars (1806–1814). Along with the disappearance of states in which only one religion was recognized, a progressive dissolution of former state churches began, culminating in the legal separation of church and state (in a now united Germany) of the Weimar Republic Constitution in 1918. In 1949, after the Nazi regime and World War II, the law of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) incorporated the relevant articles of the Weimar Constitution. Article 137 states that there is no state church, that the various “religious societies” have the right to organize themselves in an autonomous way, and that each may collect church taxes if it is recognized as a public body. More basically, article 4 guarantees the freedom of faith and religious confession. As for East Germany, the German Democratic Republic (GDR), its Constitution of 1949 adopted the same articles of the Weimar Constitution. Nevertheless, this did not prevent the state and the Communist Party of the GDR from imposing Marxist-Leninist ideology, nor did it prevent strong criticism of the Christian churches (mainly Protestant), and indeed of every faith. As a result, after 40 years of the GDR, the percentage of people not affiliated to a church or faith was the highest in Europe (70 percent non-affiliated). With the GDR joining the FRG and thus the formal ending of the GDR in 1990, the percentage of religiously non-affiliated people in the now united Germany became 26 percent of the whole population.

Around the beginning of the 20th century, new, non-Christian faiths and traditions had already emerged in or trickled into Germany. A few individual Baha’i, Buddhists, Theosophists, freethinkers, Anthroposophists, and others met in private circles, founded societies, and propagated their conviction in journals and public meetings. A different way of contributing to the enlarging religious pluralism of Germany came about during the 1960s, with the arrival of so-called guest workers (Gastarbeiter) from Turkey. Most of these workers and their families were Muslims (in the Sunni Hanafite tradition). After years of work in Germany, many opted to stay in the country where their children had grown up by now. A multitude of small, hidden mosques were built, a process that during the 1990s changed to a more visible appearance of Islam in Germany. In 2000, Islam, with some 3 million people, had become the third largest religious faith in Germany. Furthermore, the migration of people and flight of refugees from Near Eastern, African, and Asian countries had brought additional faiths and traditions, including other Islamic traditions, African Initiated Churches, Yezidis, Hindu, Sikh, and Buddhist followers.

Additionally, during the 1970s and 1980s, new religious movements such as the Hare Krishnas (International Society for Krishna Consciousness), Transcendental Meditation, the Neo-Sannyas movement of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (Osho Commune International), and the Church of Scientology had succeeded in finding a footing in Germany. A fierce public debate has ensued about whether these organizations are dangerous. Christian pastors and so-called sect specialists have been at the forefront of this polemical discussion, using their traditional societal power to define what is right and wrong.

Despite the fundamental enlargement of religious options and traditions, Christian churches have retained their dominant position within the religious pluralism in Germany. In 2009, of Germany’s 83 million inhabitants, 24.8 million people were members of the Evangelical Church in Germany, and almost the same number of people were affiliated with Roman Catholicism (25.5 million). Free churches (1 million) and Orthodox churches (2.3 million) stay well behind the total of 4 million Muslims. Judaism has re-established itself in Germany after the persecution and Holocaust during Nazi rule, with 107,000 Jews affiliated with Jewish synagogues and 90,000 without such affiliation (often emigrants from Eastern European states). There are some 100,000 Hindus from India and Sri Lanka (Tamils), Tamil Hindus having been active in organizing and opening some 25 temples since the 1990s. The number of Buddhists can be estimated at some 150,000 people, two-thirds of whom are refugees and migrants from Asia. Other religious communities and new religious movements comprise a minority of some 120,000 to 140,000 followers altogether. In total, non-Christian faiths with about 10 million people constitute a growing minority of 12 percent. In contrast, the number of people not officially affiliated with a church or religious tradition is about 25 million, comprising more than a fourth of the population in Germany, with differences in East and West Germany.

Germany, Hinduism in

Interest in Hindu concepts and ideas in Germany can be traced to 18th- and 19th-century philosophers and writers. Despite this early encounter, a lasting presence of Hindu people began no earlier than the second half of the 20th century, with immigrants and refugees coming from South Asia. Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803) and Romantic thinkers and poets such as Joseph Görres (1776–1848) and Novalis (1772–1801) idealized India as being synonymous with original religiosity and unity, virtues supposed to have been lost in Europe with the 18th-century Age of Enlightenment. This kind of idealization has continued to this day among some artists; it has also shaped the image of India and Hinduism held by many Western converts. In 2009, the number of Hindus living in Germany was estimated at about 100,000 people. Far from forming a homogeneous faith minority, Hindus fall into subminorities from India, Afghanistan, and Sri Lanka, as well as belonging to organizations formed by Western converts.

Indian Hindus, many of them businessmen, doctors, and engineers from Kerala, Bengal, or Gujarat, have come since the 1950s. The number was estimated at some 35,000 people in 2001. These individual professionals have become well established as professors, senior physicians, and businessmen. A fair number have married German partners and taken German citizenship. Despite their number, no permanent places of worship have been founded. Occasionally Indian Hindus meet in rented halls to celebrate the main Indian annual festivals, such as Durga-puja or Divali. Wealthy families invite a swami (teacher) to provide lectures or to perform specific life rituals.

Afghan Hindus came to Germany fleeing the civil war during the 1980s. Of some 66,000 Afghans in Germany, a minority of approximately 5,000 are Hindus. In 2009, they maintained a variety of well-organized and richly decorated temples, such those in Hamburg, Cologne, and Frankfurt am Main. These sites are often visited by Sikhs and Indian Hindus too.

Western Hindus come together in organizations such as the Ananda Marga Yoga Society (with some 200 members), Sahaja Yoga (200), Brahma Kumaris (300), the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (whose members are called Hare Krishnas, 350), Divine Light Mission (now known as Elan Vital, 1,500), Krishna Community (400), Transcendental Meditation Organization, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace (1,000, plus 5,000–10,000 "practitioners"), and Osho and the International Osho Movement (5,000). All together they number less than 10,000 people. In numerous local groups, they pursue devotional acts, read basic Hindu texts, and practice yoga and meditation. They provoked public debates during the 1970s and 1980s, when they were stigmatized as belonging to “cults” and “sects,” but the controversy has calmed down since the mid-1990s. A less polemic and more factually oriented approach has emerged, which perceives these Hindu-faith-based groups as belonging to the category of new religions.

Tamil people from Sri Lanka have come to Germany as asylum seekers since the early 1980s. Among the 60,000 Tamil refugees and citizens in 2009, some 75 percent, or 45,000, were Hindus, the rest Catholic and Protestant. Despite the imposed geographic distribution of Tamils to all federal states of Germany, a clear concentration has evolved in North Rhine-Westphalia (NRW). In this region, 45 percent of all Tamil people live. They have established shops and social and political societies, and founded numerous temples. Of the 25 permanent temples (additionally there are temporary places of worship) in 2009, 15 were situated in NRW. The size of the temples varies, from little basement rooms to shrine rooms set up on the ground floor of a residential house to temples in spacious halls of converted industrial buildings. Hamm (in NRW), with its three separate temples for Vinayagar (Ganesha), Kamadchi (a goddess), and Murugan, has become the center of Hindu Tamil life in Germany. The Sri Kamadchi temple stages an annual procession attended by some 10,000 participants and visitors (Hindu Shankarar Sri Kamadchi Ampal Temple, Siegenbeckstr. 4, 59071 Hamm-Uentrop; <http://www.kamadchi-ampal.de>). Also, this temple is the only purposely built temple, constructed in South Indian style with a large gōpuram (tower) and seven separate shrines in the huge temple hall.

In general, until the mid-1990s migrant Hindus displayed a rather low public profile, despite their numbers. In contrast, media interests focused on convert Hindus and their religious practices. With the emergence of public processions and the founding of recognizable temples, there has been a shift to more public visibility of the immigrant Hindu minorities.

Germany, Islam in

In 2009, 3.8 to 4.3 million people of the Muslim faith resided in Germany (up to 5.2 percent of the population). Some 63 percent, or 2.5 to 2.7 million, of these were Turkish Muslims, most of them in the Sunni Hanafi tradition, and 14 percent, or half a million, Muslims from Southeast Europe. Along with the dominant Sunni community (74 percent), there are also Turkish Muslims of the Alewite tradition (13 percent), and smaller groups of Shia Muslims (of Turkish, Iranian, and other descent, 7 percent), Sufis, Ismailis, and members of the Ahmadiyya movement in Islam (6 percent). Finally, there are also some 10,000 German Muslim converts.

The current presence of Islam is based on the enlistment of Turkish men (very few women) for semi-skilled work in Germany during the 1960s. However, the history of Islam in Germany dates back to the mid-18th century, when in 1739 the Prussian king, Frederick William I, ordered the construction of a mosque in Potsdam (near Berlin) so that the Turkish soldiers serving in the Prussian army could faithfully practice their religious duties. In 1798, a first Muslim cemetery, owned by the Ottoman Empire, was authorized in Berlin. In the 1920s, due to Muslim diplomats, traders, and refugees living in Berlin (about 1,000 people), an initial Muslim community, consisting of Muslims from 41 nations, was established (1922).

A sharp increase of Muslim people resulted from a labor force shortage and the resultant signing of an employment agreement between West Germany and Turkey in 1961. Similar agreements were concluded with Morocco in 1969, and subsequently with Tunisia. The agreements foresaw a temporary influx of workers. A system of rotation was built into the program, and the so-called Gastarbeiter (guest workers) were intended to stay for one to three years only. Within 10 years, half a million Turkish workers came to Germany. In 1973, due to the oil recession, recruitment was stopped. The phase of family reunion commenced in the following year, and the guest workers moved from temporary housing to more permanent houses. A proliferation of Turkish social and cultural infrastructures, including small halls for prayer, developed during the 1970s and 1980s.

During the 1990s the children of the guest workers came of age, and they have occasioned a move of Islam into the public arena. Representative mosques, each with its minaret, quite different from the hitherto unnoticed, hidden prayer halls, have been built in various cities. Most often, the building of these publicly visible signs of Islamic presence were accompanied by emotionally laden controversies, as German-born residents complained about such overtly Islamic buildings. Still, the vast majority of places for prayer remain in converted halls or houses (some 2,300), as opposed to some 75 proper mosques. Mosques and prayer halls have assumed many functions, serving religious, cultural, and social needs. Some offer special programs for youth, women, or elderly people.

The primary Muslim organizations are the Turkish Islamic Union of the Authority of Religion (DITIB), a direct representative of the Turkish Ministry of Religion, and the Islamic Community Milli Görüs (IGMG; Islamische Gemeinschaft Milli Görüs). Influential are also the Sufi-oriented Association of Islamic Cultural Centers (VIKZ) and the Islamic Community Jama'at un-Nur (all four with headquarters in Cologne). In addition to these organizations, with which about half of the local mosques or prayer halls are associated, national umbrella organizations such as the Central Council of Muslims (ZMD; Zentralrat der Muslime in Deutschland) and the Islamic Council strive to function as general representatives of Muslims in Germany. However, so far factionalism and internal quarrels have prevented the formation of a unified body. The import of Turkish home policy, the alignment to specific Islamic schools and traditions, and the emphasis on the cultural-linguistic origin of immigrant Muslims strongly influence the heterogeneity of Islam in Germany. Despite this organizational disunity, the second generation's increasing share in the leadership has brought about a shift in orientation toward ambitions to establish Islam in Germany firmly and to foster processes of both public representation and acculturation. In political terms, in 2006 the Ministry of Inner Affairs established the "German Islam Conference," a meeting of Muslim representatives, politicians, and community workers. As the former migrants and guest workers have become German citizens and "German Muslims" (45 percent have acquired German nationality in 2009), the political meetings should foster an acknowledgment and understanding of the Muslim minority in Germany.

The various organizations, which, however, represent only some 40 to 50 percent of Muslims in Germany, can be contacted through the following: Zentralrat der Muslime in Deutschland (ZMD), Steinfelder Gasse 32, 50670 Köln, <http://zentralrat.de> and <http://www.islam.de/> (in German); Islamrat für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Osterather Str. 7, 50739 Köln, <http://www.islamrat.de/> (in German); DITIB, Türkisch-Islamische Union der Anstalt für Religion, Subbelrather Str. 17, 50823 Köln; IGMG, Islamische Gemeinschaft Milli Görüs, Boschstraße 61-65, 50171 Kerpen, <http://www.igmg.de/>; Islamische Gemeinschaft Jama'at un-Nur, Neustr. 11, 51063 Köln; and the Verband der Islamischen Kulturzentren (VIKZ), Vogelsanger Strasse 290, 50825 Köln, <http://www.vikz.de/>.

■ Ghana

Ghana, formerly the British colony known as the Gold Coast, is located on the Gulf of Guinea between Cote d'Ivoire and Togo. Much of its 89,000 square miles of territory is located along the Volta River. Today it is home to 23 million people, almost half of which are from the several groups of the Ashanti (or Akan) people.

The modern nation of Ghana began to take shape in the 14th century CE with the movement of the Ashanti people into the area, where they became rivals of the Denkyita state that controlled the coast. They emerged as a trading people who gathered the goods of the region and exchanged them for goods from the far north. This arrangement worked for several centuries, but in the 17th century, the Ashanti responded to the collapse of trade with North Africa by uniting and capturing several coastal cities. They then came into contact with Europeans and became partners in the slave trade.

The British attempts to stop the slave trade led to three different wars with the Ashanti (1806–1816, 1825–1828, and 1874). In 1875, the British established a protectorate over the coastal region, and 20 years later added the area in the north, where a new national political movement centered in Guinea threatened to spread. The Ashanti nation still controlled the central region. It was absorbed into the British colony, known as the Gold Coast, in 1902.

Pressure for independence grew after World War II, and in 1949 the Convention People's Party was founded by Kwame N'Krumah (1909–1972). He became the prime minister in 1952, and five years later the head of the first African colony to become independent. His attempts to reform the nation and his increasingly autocratic regime, however, met strong opposition, and in 1966 he was overthrown. A representative government was created in 1969. However, the next decades were marked by economic instability and frequent change of governments. Some stability has been offered by Jerry John Rawlings (b. 1947), who came to prominence in 1979 and became president in 1982. He has survived several changes in the government and remained the country's president as the new century began. He was succeeded by John Kufour, whose second term concluded at the end of 2008.

The Ashanti (who dominate the central part of the country) and the Fanti (along the southern coast) make up 45 percent of the citizenry. Other important groups include the Ewe, Ga-Adanbe, Mole-Dagbane, Guan, and Gurma peoples. Approximately 25 percent of the people retain their traditional beliefs and practices.

Islam entered Ghana as early as the 1390s, in part due to the trade fostered by the Ashanti. Conversions to Islam were few until the 20th century, but Muslims (of the Sunni Shafiite, and Malikite schools) are now found across the nation. Muslims are strongest in the north, where such groups as the Wala and Dagoma are more than 50 percent Muslim. In 1969, some 200,000 Muslim immigrants in Ghana were expelled from the country, and many Muslim schools were closed. However, by that time the native Muslim community had become well entrenched. At the beginning of the new century, some 20 percent of the population of 20 million are Muslims.

Prior to 1969, the Muslim community had been dominated by the Ghana Muslim Community, headed by non-Ghanaians. After 1969, the Ghana Muslim Mission (organized in 1957) and the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement (formed in Accra, the capital, in 1924) rose to prominence. Both formed modern Muslim schools and assumed a role in the post-independence culture. Most recently, missionaries sent by Al-Azhar University (Hanafite School) in Cairo, Egypt, have begun to proselytize in Ghana.

At the beginning of the 1990s, with the approval of the government, American Muslim leader Louis Farakhan, head of the Nation of Islam, launched a mission in Ghana. In October 1994, he brought some 2,000 members from America to hold a five-day celebration of the work of Elijah Muhammad (founder of the Nation of Islam), the International Savior's Day, at which the Ghanaian president, Jerry Rawlings, spoke.

Christianity entered Ghana with initial missionary efforts of the Moravians, but no permanent work was established until 1828, when representatives of the Basel Mission settled in Christiansborg. The shaky work, headed by Europeans unused to the climate, was rescued in 1843 by Jamaican Moravians, who finally built a stable congregation. The Basel missionaries built villages of Christian converts and created a school system. This work was transferred to the United Free Church of Scotland (now an integral part of the Church of Scotland) after World War I and eventually matured into the Presbyterian Church of Ghana.

British Methodists launched work in 1832 under the leadership of Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), whose African heritage (by way of Jamaica) allowed him some comfort in his homeland. In 1838 he began the work among the Ashanti and emphasized education and indigenous leadership. The Methodist Church, Ghana became the leading church in the land and developed an education system capped by Bible schools and colleges.

As the British gained hegemony over the region, Anglicans moved in, headed by workers associated with the Church Missionary Society and the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (though Anglican services had been held in several locations along the coast since 1752). That work has now been incorporated into the Church of the Province of West Africa. The Salvation Army came in 1922. Nigerian (Yoruban) Baptists established the first Baptist congregations in 1918. Americans with the Assemblies of God brought Pentecostalism in 1931. In subsequent decades a spectrum of American and British groups staked out mission territories. The Southern Baptist Convention began an extensive mission in 1947.

Like the Muslims, the Christian community suffered in 1969, when all aliens without valid passports and work permits were expelled. Most Western missionaries and numerous Christians from neighboring countries were among the millions of people forced to leave Ghana.

The Roman Catholic Church first reached Ghana when the Portuguese explored the coast in the 15th century, but did not build an effective presence until the 1880s, when systematic work began. Following World War I, the White Fathers took the lead in building the church. The first Ghanaian bishop was consecrated in 1957. The church has been helped in the last generation by the spread of the Catholic Pentecostal movement.

African Initiated Churches began to arise early in the 20th century, and several, such as the Musama

GHANA

Disco Christo Church (also known as the Army of the Cross of Christ Church), have gone on to become international bodies. The Divine Healers Church now rivals the Methodist Church in size. Other churches, such as the Cherubim and Seraphim and the Harrist Church, have come to Ghana from neighboring lands. The very first Ghanaian independent church, the Church of the Twelve Apostles, was founded by a former member of the Harrist Church in 1914. Literally hundreds of different independent churches now operate in Ghana.

Many of the older missionary churches organized the Christian Council of the Gold Coast in 1924. That council evolved into the Christian Council of Ghana, now affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More recently, conservative evangelical churches have organized the National Association of Evangelicals of Ghana, which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

The Jehovah's Witnesses began work in 1924, and though banned in 1989, the organization now has more than 100,000 members. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, also banned in 1989, now has 15,000 members and has erected a temple in Accra. The work in Ghana expanded for the first time in the years after the admission of people of African descent to the priesthood in 1978. The ban on the church was lifted in 1990.

Some Hindu traders from India had come to Ghana through the 20th century, but in 1977, a missionary (called the Black Monk of Africa) set up a Hindu monastery in Accra. It had a Ghanaian as its head and some two dozen African residents, who accepted the vows of renunciation as sannyasi. The monastery has developed a presence in various parts of the country through its establishment of clinics and social welfare structures. The Ananda Marga Yoga Society also has work in Ghana.

Additional small movements in Ghana include the Baha'i Faith, the Church Universal and Triumphant (from the United States), Soka Gakkai International (from Japan), and Chinese Buddhists.

Ghazali, Abu Hamid al-

1058–1111

Abu Hamid al-Ghazali is one of the most famous Muslim intellectuals, known especially for his promotion of Sufism as integral to true Islam. He was born in the early years of the Bagdad-based sultans of the Seljuk dynasty that ruled from Jerusalem to Bukhara.

Al-Ghazali was born in 1058 in Tus, in the eastern part of what is now Iran. In his late teen years he spent time under the guidance of Sufi shaykh Yusuf al-Nassaj. He then became a student of al-Juwayni (d. 1085), one of the famous imams of the time. Recognized for his brilliance, al-Ghazali was invited to teach in the court of Nizam al-Mulk, the vizier of the Seljuq leaders, and he became a professor at the Nizamiyah College in Baghdad in 1091.

In 1095 al-Ghazali left his teaching position and adopted the life of a Sufi mystic. After travels to Damascus, Jerusalem, and Mecca he moved to Tus, his birthplace. He had a band of disciples who joined his monastic path. In 1106, near the start of a new century, he began teaching again, this time at Nishapur. He died in his hometown in 1111.

Though more than 400 works bear his name, many are falsely attributed to him and others are questionable. He is most famous for Ihyā' ulūm ad-dīn (Revival of the Religious Sciences) and its promotion of a mystical understanding of Islam. Critics have accused him of killing Muslim philosophy, while defenders assert he released Islam from the grip of Aristotle. His epistemic struggles seem genuine in his autobiographical account Munqidh min al-Dalal (Deliverance from Error) though they were dismissed by some as a ruse to pass himself off as a genuine searcher. Historians of philosophy have noted the significant parallels between al-Ghazali and Descartes.

His appreciation of Sufism is sometimes overstated. He valued the Sufi path but not without caution. For example, he warned about false imitation of mystical encounters as a hypocritical substitute for genuine ecstasy. He damned those who pretend a state of intimacy with God as rationale for disobeying God's law. He also said that overzealous Sufi mystics could get lost in fancy if there is no grounding in reason. There is also some evidence that al-Ghazali had personal experience of the depression that can accompany the ecstatic path.

His appreciation of Sufism was held in balance with his commitment to reason and, more important, to the Koran and Sunna of the Prophet. Here are his words: "the one who calls for pure uncritical acceptance in complete isolation from reason is ignorant; just as the one who is satisfied with nothing but reason, independent of the lights of the Koran and the Sunna, is deceived." He also wrote of change that does "not come about through constructing a proof or putting together an argument, but by a light that God Most High cast into my breast. And that light is the key to the greater part of knowledge. And whoever thinks that the unveiling of things divine depends upon strict proofs has in his thought narrowed down the wideness of God's mercy."

Al-Ghazali wrote works of jurisprudence and tomes that sought to combat alleged heresies within Islam. He was one of the major critics of Ismaili doctrine and practice though his perspective was tainted by longstanding bigotry toward Ismaili Islam in the Seljuq and Sunni establishments of his day.

Ghost Dance

The term "Ghost Dance" refers to several Pan-Indian religious movements that spread among Native American people in the late 19th century in response to the European-American encroachment in the American West. The first of these movements began in the later 1860s when Wodziwob (ca.1844–ca.1873), of the Northern Paiute people, visited the spirit world while in a trance state, following which he conveyed prophecies of a restoration of conditions prior to contact with Europeans. During the years leading up to Wodziwob's pronouncements, the Paiute had experienced much suffering directly related to their being pushed off their traditional lands—disease, hunger, and a drought.

Wodziwob started the movement using the traditional Round Dance of the Paiutes, to which he added rites aimed at increase and healing. The movement brought no noticeable change to the Paiute and died out within a few years. By that time, however, it had spread to the West Coast. In California and Oregon, Noreliputus, a chief of the Yana-Wintu people, was inspired to found the Earth Lodge Religion, which added an element to the original movement, namely, the idea that believers would be protected from imminent apocalyptic changes by going underground into subterranean earth lodges, especially constructed for that purpose. As the movement spread northward toward Mount Shasta, dreams and dance were emphasized.

In north-central California, among the Hall Parwin people, a prophet named Lame Bill introduced what became the Bole-Maru Religion. This took the elements of the Paiute Ghost Dance in a somewhat different direction. While emphasizing dance and ceremony it replaced many of the predictions of apocalyptic events with an emphasis on belief in God, an afterlife, and moral reform, especially related to the abandonment of major personal vices. The movement produced a spectrum of innovative dances, including some for women. The movement has survived to the present.

The Bole-Maru Religion inspired the Big Head Religion, so named for the elaborate head piece worn

American artist Frederic Remington's interpretation of the Oglala Sioux Ghost Dance at Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, South Dakota, as it appeared in Harper's Weekly magazine in 1890. The Ghost Dance was a messianic movement that preached the promise of Indian freedom from the white man. (Library of Congress)

by the lead dancers. It also spread among northern California groups. Its dances were characterized by the presence of a foot drum and several kinds of rattles. The unique aspect of the movement was its traveling with the ritual instruments. A group would attain the ritual materials, perform the dances, and then pass the items to the next group, and the cycle would be repeated. The movement was present within any given group only when they owned the ritual instruments to carry out the dances.

In the late 1880s, a new Ghost Dance movement began among the Northern Paiute under the leadership of Wovoka (ca. 1856–1932). Wovoka emerged as a prophet in the mode of previous Paiute prophets. On January 1, 1889, during an eclipse of the Sun, he entered a trance state and visited the spirit world where he received teaching to be shared with his people. He offered a broad set of promises—the resurrection of those who had died, an end of the misery and death they had been experiencing, and the renewal of the land.

He preached a way of moral regeneration that included the abandonment of lying, stealing, and cheating; living in harmony with one's neighbor; and making peace with the white people. He proposed dancing, done in five-day increments, as the means of bring about the prophesied changes.

Wovoka was soon adorned with messianic expectations and news of his prophecies and pronouncements from the spirit world spread across the American West. His teachings and the dance he proposed spread to Native people from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. As it spread, numerous local variations developed in both belief and practice. Many hoped that white people would simply disappear and the buffalo would be restored. Many dancers reported a variety of visionary experiences and personal spirit contacts while dancing.

The rapid spread of the dancing movement alarmed the white people then in the midst of a major migration that saw hundreds of thousands moving from east of the Mississippi River to populate the emerging western states. Their fear that the dance heralded a massive Native American uprising led to a variety of repressive measures beginning with its being generally outlawed.

The most notable adaptation occurred among the Arapaho and Lakota peoples where a “shirt” said to be bulletproof was worn by the dancers. They saw the dances as bringing an imminent change, while many whites saw it as simply another war dance. That belief partially undergirded the military being called in to suppress the dance. The combination of the faith in the shirt and the fear of the dance among the white people culminated in the massacre of dancers and their families at Wounded Knee Creek in South Dakota.

On December 28, 1890, just two weeks after the unfortunate shooting death of Lakota Chief Sitting Bull and the officer attempting to arrest him, a group of 350 Lakota under Chief Big Foot encountered a force from the U.S. Army’s 7th Cavalry along Wounded Knee Creek. The next morning, the troop commander ordered the Lakota to surrender their weapons immediately. Yellow Bird, the group’s medicine man, started dancing and urged everyone to put on their sacred shirts in defiance of the troops. Amid the excited verbal exchanges that began, a shot was fired and the troops opened fire. When the firing finally stopped, some 150 Lakota had died. It appears that most of the troops that died or were wounded met their fate from unregulated friendly fire.

The Ghost Dance largely disappeared after Wounded Knee, and most certainly any belief in the powers of the sacred shirt. However, the movement survived in pockets for several decades. Among the Kiowa, for example, it had inspired a variant dance practice called the Feather Dance, so named for the eagle feather given to practitioners to be worn during the dance. The Kiowa had settled in eastern Oklahoma in the 1860s. They continued to practice the Feather Dance until threats of withholding government support money forced its discontinuance in 1916.

■ Gibraltar

Gibraltar, a peninsula located off the coast of southern Spain, is a United Nations territory administered by the United Kingdom. Though a mere 2.5 square miles of land mass, it is strategically placed immediately north of the Straits of Gibraltar and a mere 20 miles from Morocco. It is home to approximately 28,000 people, an eclectic mixture from a variety of European and North African backgrounds. Though the largest segment of the population is of Spanish heritage, the residents of Gibraltar have persistently rejected Spanish hegemony over their home.

The island was occupied by England in 1704. Spain formally ceded hegemony to England with the Treaty of Utrecht a decade later. Since the 1960s, Spain has actively worked to regain control, an effort blocked by a plebiscite in 1967. Following England and Spain working out an agreement for joint sovereignty, in 2002 the citizenry voted to reject the agreement. In 2007, a new Constitution, which assigned local autonomy and rejected any notion of the peninsula being a colony, granted the United Kingdom responsibility for defense, foreign relations, internal security, and financial stability.

The Roman Catholic Church had begun work on Gibraltar in 1492, but once the British assumed control, the church was suppressed. However, the church survived and remains by far the largest religious body on the island. In 1910 the work was organized into a diocese, whose bishop was immediately subject to Rome through the Office for the Propagation of the Faith.

The Anglican Church was introduced by the British in 1704 and has primarily served residents of British extraction. A Diocese of Gibraltar was organized in 1842, which included Anglican parishes across southern Europe around the Mediterranean rim all the way to Turkey. More recently, the Anglican work in Europe outside of the British Isles has been reorganized into the comprehensive Church of England's Diocese of Europe, which includes English-speaking parishes in some 45 countries. The work in Gibraltar has been reorganized into an archdeaconry.

Also following the British arrival, Methodists (associated with the Methodist Church [United Kingdom] and Presbyterians (related to the Church of Scotland) established work. The Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived early in the century. Gibraltar is part of the Spanish Union of Churches. The Jehovah's Witnesses established their presence around 1955.

In 1492, at a time that Spain was considering what to do with the Jews in its midst, the government heard proposals that Gibraltar would be a site to exile some of them, especially the Marranos, or hidden Jews. No one acted upon the suggestion. Thus it was not until the British occupation that Jews from North Africa began to arrive. By 1749, when they received legal status, there were some 600, and 2 synagogues had been erected. The Jewish community has risen and fallen over the years. It peaked at around 2,000 in the middle of the 19th century, but had dropped back to approximately 600 by the end of the 20th century.

Beginning in 1961, Moroccans began to arrive in Gibraltar. They brought their Sunni Islam (of the Malikite School) with them. Several thousand now reside on the island. There are also a minuscule number of Hindus and Baha'is.

Glastonbury

Glastonbury, a town in Somerset, southwest England, is identified in local pre-Christian lore as the mythical Isle of Avalon, a word derived from the Celtic deity Avalloc (or Avallach), who ruled the underworld. Glastonbury Tor, a teardrop-shaped hill, dominates the landscape around the town, and the surrounding plain, the Summerland Meadows. Now surrounded on three sides by the River Brue, in times past, at least part of the year, it was an island. A prominent landmark through much of Britain's prehistoric eras, it became a focus of popular religion and legend. Modern Esoteric practitioners have added significantly to its spiritual lore.

Inhabited as early as 300 BCE, residents found it to be an easily defended position with a natural moat. Called "Ynis Witrin" or Isle of Glass, the Tor was connected to the surrounding territory by a narrow strip of land, above water only at low tide. The Romans, for whom the nearby city of Bath was a favorite, used Glastonbury, where several trade routes converged, for the movement of goods. In the seventh century, a Celtic Christian monastic community settled on top of the Tor. The tower attached to their center is the only remaining structure on the Tor proper. Some sources say the monastery was founded by the Welsh Saint David late in the sixth century. It was afterward relocated to the foot of the hill and in the 10th century became the home of the future saint, Dunstan (d. 988). Dunstan was one of the leaders of the monastic revival in England of the late 10th century, and he launched the history of Glastonbury as a center of British monastic life.

Over the next 500 years, Glastonbury grew to become one of the largest and wealthiest abbeys in the land, and its abbot's influence reached across the country to the highest levels of the royal court in London. The object of King Henry VIII's (r. 1509–1547) attack in the 16th century, the monastery and church fell into ruins.

Prior to the rise of the church in the area, however, there are layers of myths and legends to be encountered. In the not too distant past, the high ground on which the church sits was surrounded by water. The high ground is believed by many to have been a center for the development of human settlement, culture, and worship in the region. In the Middle Ages, stories identifying Glastonbury with Avalon linked the region with King Arthur and his knights of the Roundtable. Avalon was reputedly the final resting place of the good king.

Placing King Arthur at Glastonbury/Avalon also leads to another popular legend, that during the early years of Jesus' life not covered in the Bible, he accompanied Joseph of Arimathea, supposedly his great uncle, to Glastonbury. Then, after Jesus' crucifixion, Joseph of Arimathea came into possession of the cup used at the Last Supper. He used the cup to catch some of the blood that flowed from Jesus' body as he was crucified. He returned to Glastonbury bringing the cup with him. He buried the cup (which came to be known as the Holy Grail) just below Glastonbury Tor. Shortly thereafter, a spring, now called Chalice Well, began to flow. Its water was a source of health and youthfulness. If one accepts the story of Joseph and the cup, the real purpose behind the Knights of the Roundtable becomes the discovery of the Holy Grail. On a more practical level, the story of Joseph served to bolster later British claims to have a Christian history that stood independently of Rome.

The legends that had grown up around Glastonbury were inexorably linked to the history of the old Celtic church/monastery in 1190, when the monks residing in Glastonbury Abbey claimed to have found the tomb of Arthur in the graveyard of the abbey south of the Lady Chapel. In the tomb was a lead cross about a foot long, with a Latin inscription: “Hic iacet sepultus inclitus rex arturius in insula avalonia” (“Here lies buried the renowned King Arthur in the Isle of Avalon”). The artifact is now generally believed to be a hoax perpetrated by the monks designed to link Avalon and Arthur to the town and abbey. It worked, and Glastonbury became a popular pilgrimage site.

The bones in the tomb (reputedly of Arthur and Genevieve) were placed in caskets. King Edward I (r. 1270–1307) visited the abbey in 1278, at which time the remains were put in a black marble tomb that was placed before the high altar in the abbey church. Unfortunately, Glastonbury did not stand in the face of King Henry VIII’s dissolution of the monasteries in 1536. Subsequently, the abbey was vandalized and Arthur’s remains disappeared.

After the destruction of the abbey, Glastonbury’s prominence faded considerably, but in the 20th century was revived as part of the growing popular and academic study of the Arthurian legends (that has included the identification of nearby Cadbury Hill with Camelot) and of the ancient monolithic structures in neighboring Wiltshire (especially Stonehenge). Then late in the century, Esoteric metaphysical believers and Christian mystics took up residence in and near Glastonbury to revel in older legends.

Glastonbury’s profile was initially heightened in the 1920s by Katharine Maltwood. An amateur student of the Arthurian legends, she began to study large-scale maps of the countryside surrounding Glastonbury Tor. She noticed in the patterns of the earthworks, field tracks, river banks, and other artifacts of the landscape, what appeared to be a gigantic star map. As shown in the illustrations of her 1929 book, A Guide to Glastonbury’s Temple of the Stars, the land features picture what could be seen as the 12 signs of the zodiac in a giant circle with Glastonbury Tor in the center.

The form of this terrestrial zodiac, as Maltwood (and countless later researchers) have designated it, is circular with a circumference of 30 miles. Some of the zodiacal figures are two to three miles in length. They could be seen only from some miles in the air. If one accepted the idea of the Glastonbury zodiac, then one would also have to suggest that many centuries before the megalith builders, there was a community at Glastonbury that was able to shape the terrain so to form the mystical and astrological patterns.

Contemporaneously with Maltwood, Frederick Bligh Bond (1864–1945), a local historian interested in Spiritualism, began to direct excavation of the abbey that proved remarkable for the number of discoveries he made over a relatively short period. In the wake of the discoveries, Bond disclosed that he had directed the work from the guidance he received from the spirit of a former monk who claimed to have lived at the abbey in its heyday.

In the decades since World War II, Glastonbury has come to life as one of Britain’s foremost Esoteric/New Age centers. All of the sites associated with the old legends have been well marked, and the town now rivals Stonehenge as a magnet for tourists to Western England. A variety of New Age and alternative groups have opened centers in Glastonbury, and a number of alternative religious events now occur there weekly. All of this activity has led to a veritable library of material about Glastonbury ranging from tracks by true believers to the very skeptical volume by Robert Dunning, Christianity in Somerset (1970). Dunning claims that all of the stories about the region originated in the 12th century as part of a deliberate attempt of the monks to raise money by promoting pilgrimage to the abbey.

Global Country of World Peace

The Global Country of World Peace is the major organization currently behind the worldwide spread of the practice of Transcendental Meditation (TM). Since 2000, it has superseded the World Plan Executive Council.

The practice of TM is generally ascribed to Guru Dev, the teacher of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (1917–2008). Guru Dev is a title of respect and endearment given to Swami Brahmananda Saraswati (1870–1953), Shankaracharya (spiritual and ecclesiastical leader) of Jyotir Math, one of the oldest and most prominent centers of Hinduism in India. Maharishi emerged in 1957 with the mission of telling the world about the benefits of engaging in meditation. Maharishi had spent 13 years with Guru Dev prior to his public career.

In 1958–1959, Maharishi made his first world tour, during which he introduced TM to the West. That year he founded the Spiritual Regeneration movement, which became the first organization for the spread of TM in the West. In 1965, it was joined by the Students International Meditation Society. He had spectacular success, in part due to the endorsement by several celebrities, most notably the Beatles.

In 1972, he announced the World Plan, the overall strategy for spreading TM and its theoretical base, the Science of Creative Intelligence. Maharishi argued that TM was not a religious practice and that the Science of Creative Intelligence is an ancient science, not a religious philosophy. Based upon that understanding, the practice of TM has been introduced into many countries with the backing and assistance of secular governments from Zimbabwe to Romania. However, in other places, most notably the United States, it has been seen as a religious activity and government support has been denied.

TM is based on the effortless repetition of bija mantras, individual syllables drawn from the Tantric traditions of India. Meditation consists of the repeated silent mental repetition of a sound. The sound, called a mantra, is given to the person at the time of initiation into the practice. The particular sound is determined by the age of the initiate.

According to the Science of Creative Intelligence, the universe is underlain by an absolute field of pure being—unmanifest and transcendental. The Science of Creative Intelligence teaches how to contact this underlying reality, pure being, via meditation. The ultimate goal is God-realization. This Science of Creative Intelligence is seen as the summation of the wisdom of India. A significant amount of research now supports the value of meditation and its healthful effects on the body.

The most controversial practice espoused by the TM movement is the TM-Sidhi Program, which claims to teach people to levitate, a practice called yogic flying. The skepticism about such claims, including the accusations of people who took the program and refuted its effectiveness, has undermined the movement's credibility in many quarters.

The World Executive Council was structured in a number of divisions. The International Meditation Society introduced the general public to meditation. The Students International Meditation Society focused on young adults, while the Spiritual Regeneration movement focused on older adults. The Foundation for Creative Intelligence worked with the business community. Maharishi International University in Fairfield, Iowa, offered a four-year college curriculum with instruction integrated with the practice of TM. The Natural Law Party functioned as a new political party that ran candidates for office in those countries where it was allowed to operate. The Maharishi Vedic Approach to Health has introduced a version of the Indian ayurvedic system of medical treatment to the West.

In 2000, Maharishi announced the formation of the Global Country of World Peace, a nation without borders, which would approach the concerns of world peace by focusing upon the divisive influence of nationalism and national borders on human society. The Global Country has largely superseded the World Plan Executive Council and is now the major structure organizing and directing the TM movement. Organized as a nation without borders, the Global Country has 40 ministries developed from the 40 branches of Vedic literature. It issues its own money, though the places that the currency can be used are quite limited. His Majesty Raja Nader Raam was named the first sovereign of the Global Country. According to the movement, "The sovereignty of the Global Country of World Peace is in the domain of consciousness and its authority is in the invincible power of Natural Law, which brings fulfillment to and upholds and nourishes every country's constitution."

The Global Country of World Peace launched a plan to establish at least two Peace Palaces, one for each gender, in the major urban centers of the world, including 240 of the largest cities in the United States. Each Peace Palace, drawing on the belief that the practice of TM by groups of people promotes world peace, is seen as a center that radiates peace to the surrounding community. Each Peace Palace is to be made ideally from marble and designed following Vedic architecture. While they are under construction, a number of Maharishi Enlightenment Centers still exist to provide instruction in TM.

In the new Global Country, Maharishi International University in Fairfield, Iowa, has become Maharishi University of Management (the name change actually occurred in 1995). The community that has grown up around the university has been named the Maharishi Vedic City. All the buildings have been either built or revised according to Vedic architecture, the most noticeable feature being that all entrances now face east. In addition, each building now has a designated silent space in its center called a Brahmasthan and a roof ornament painted gold called a kalash.

The TM movement has also envisioned the opening of a new Central University, being formed in Kansas—the geographic center of the United States. The university will be home to some 10,000 students, all practicing TM together at the same time. The university will be the Western parallel of the World Capital of Peace, in India, the seat of power of Raja Nader Raam and the home of the different rajas (administrators) and ministers of the Global Country, as well as 6,000 Vedic pandits (meditators, learned custodians of the ancient wisdom of TM).

In 2004, the national offices of the Natural Law Party in the United States was closed and the party's former presidential candidate John Hagelin organized the U.S. Peace Government, dedicated to creating permanent peace in the United States and the world. The U.S. Peace Government will be organized on a model of the government in the United States (a president, vice president, state governors, city mayors, etc.) and will ensure that "proven peace-creating programs," that is, the TM programs, are established across the country.

The TM movement claims that more than five million people practice TM and many more have been initiated. By 2003, there were more than 40,000 teachers of TM. At this point, all of the teachers were asked to become recertified. An unknown minority of them went through the process, though enough to maintain the teaching centers throughout the world. The Global Country of World Peace continually develops programs to facilitate the permeation of all realms of society with the practice of TM and has developed an extensive Internet presence (<http://www.globalgoodnews.com/>; <http://www.globalcountry.net/>; <http://globalcountryofworldpeace.net/>; <http://www.maharishipeacepalace.org/>; <http://www.tm.org/>; <http://www.alltm.org/>).

The TM movement builds much of its program around the 600 studies that have been conducted on TM and its practitioners. It is their belief that these studies have validated the benefits of TM on both the individuals who practice and every area of society where a critical mass of meditators exist. The movement urges every nation to establish Peace Palaces in order to safeguard its independence and sovereignty, and promises that Peace Palaces will make the nations invincible. It is also the claim that when individuals practice TM and the advanced TM-Sidhi program together in groups, there will be a measurable reduction in societal stress, crime, violence, and conflict and a parallel increase in coherence, positivity, and peace throughout the society.

The following addresses are all old. In the last years of Maharishi's life, the movement was centered in Vlodrop, Holland. Now the main centers of power appear to be in India, though this is in flux. One thing that is clear is that none of the Western heavy hitters (Hagelin, Bevan Morris, Tony Nader, etc.) are in Fairfield. They barely visit. Caution needs to be exercised in relation to addresses for the "center" of the Movement. Websites and the U.S. site are the safest at present.

Globalization, Religion and Religion has always been on the move. Some argue that religion was the first globalizing force in the world. Even before nation-states were formed, Christian, Muslim, and Buddhist missionaries, conquerors, traders, and travelers carried beliefs, rituals, and sacred objects and texts with them. However, in the past three decades, cheaper and better means of communication and transport has meant that this process of contact, exchange, and negotiation has taken an enormous leap. When scholars started writing about globalization in the early 1990s, they were mostly analyzing the economic aspects of this process. Globalization was then associated with a triumphant narrative of global capitalism due to the fall of Communism in the late 1980s and early 1990s. In this light, globalization would be a process by which the entire world would come to modernity, leading to cultural homogenization (or "MacDonaldization," since it was associated with U.S. imperialism).

In the past 15 years, much has changed in our understanding of globalization. The narrative of globalization as homogenization has been replaced by one in which homogenization and heterogenization are driving forces. Key concepts of hybridity (Garcia Canclini 1995; Werbner and Modood 1997) and Creolization (Hannerz 1997; Rocha 2006a) came into vogue to explain how the encounter between the global and the local takes place and the new forms it engenders. Robertson (1995) has coined the trope of “glocalization” to make it explicit that the global and the local are two facets of the same process. Furthermore, empirical studies have shown that global flows do not radiate only between central metropolitan powers and peripheries, in a North-South direction. Global flows radiate from a multiplicity of centers, and they have diverse itineraries and directions.

If globalization was first seen as an economic process, the increasingly prominent political and cultural roles religion plays in the world, and the intensification of flows of migration, commodities, ideas, and beliefs, have forced scholars to include religion as an important site of investigation. For instance, Turner (2001) argues that the globalization of the Western model of private religious faith and practice has elicited fundamentalism. Fundamentalism, he writes, “attempts to ensure the dominance of religion in the public spheres of law, economy and government” (2001, 133). Moreover, we have seen in the past decade that the tensions between (Christian and Muslim) fundamentalism on the one hand, and hybridity engendered by globalization on the other, take place in the everyday practices of actors involved. Many scholars have called for an anchored or grounded study of globalization (Levitt 2003, 2006, 2007; Vásquez and Marquardt 2003) to understand how religious practices, discourses, and norms are actually lived and transformed.

Indeed, global flows of religion are driven not only by religious institutions themselves, but also by migrants, refugees, tourists, pilgrims, and the Internet. By allowing transnational membership, religion presents itself as a map through which individuals, particularly transnational migrants, and organizations attempt to locate themselves amid fragmentation and dislocation generated by globalization (Vásquez and Marquardt 2003, 53). Indeed, religion is an important aspect in the insertion of migrants in the country of settlement as well in transnational processes (Levitt 2001, 2007; Tweed 2002). That is, migrants’ religious practices and beliefs have an influence on the host society by exposing it to religious diversity, and because migration continues to impact on the life of the homeland, these new forms are then carried back to the homeland and are re-created there, a phenomenon that Levitt (1999) calls “social remittance.”

Furthermore, religion plays an important role for migrant communities. It usually is the first port of call when migrants arrive in the new country. For instance, religious institutions work as a support network to help Brazilians cope with the pressures and anxieties of migration to Australia (Rocha 2006b). Because they are not part of the government apparatus of the host country, diasporic religious institutions support undocumented and documented migrants in finding employment and housing, understanding the rules and laws of the new country, and counselling them in spiritual and psychological matters.

In addition, religious institutions may also assist in reinforcing identity and sense of belonging by offering migrants a vicarious home away from home. Migrants can meet fellow migrants, worship in their own language, eat their own food, and celebrate holidays together. In this context, for many they play more a social than a religious function. Because of this heightened social function, many migrants who were not religious in the homeland may start frequenting religious institutions in the host country. By contrast, religious belonging may supersede national belonging even before some communities leave the homeland, as in the case of the Muslim and Hindu diasporas. As a result, conflicts from the homeland may be played out in the host countries (for instance, when transnational communities of local religious minorities seek political autonomy like the Sikh militancy in Britain). Diasporic communities may also influence politics in the homeland (for example, support to the Hindu nationalist BJ party by constituents of the Hindu diaspora).

Religious institutions are also part of this process of religious globalization. They may provide for a single ethnic community, with missionaries sent from the homeland with the mission of keeping migrants in the fold. They may also cater for a multicultural congregation, uniting locals and migrants or different migrant communities in the same place of worship.

Multicultural congregations, in particular, help migrants integrate since they meet locals who can assist them in practical terms while locals see migrants as brothers and sisters in their faith. Levitt (2001) has observed three types of transnational religious organization: extended, negotiated, and re-created. "Extended" refers to churches in the sending and receiving countries "which are connected and directed by a single authority, but enjoy autonomy at the local level" (2001, 12) like the Catholic Church. "Negotiated" refers to transnational religious organizations that are "much less hierarchical and centralized" and whose ties are "not subject to a set of pre-established rules that must constantly be worked out," such as Protestant churches (2001, 15). Finally, "re-created" transnational religious organizations are established when there is no religious infrastructure in the host country so migrants ask for "guidance and resources from the sending country" (2001, 18). To the latter, I would add that not only does the sending country contribute resources, but migrants receive guidance from their diasporic communities in other countries. A good example would be Brazilian Spiritists in Sydney contacting and receiving resources from the Brazilian Spiritist center in New York (Rocha 2006b). Furthermore, this third category can be used to analyze the role of non-migrants in importing religious practices and beliefs that carry kudos in their country. A case in point would be Buddhism in Western countries.

Moreover, tourists, as modern pilgrims, are also agents of change in the receiving community and in their homeland. In late modernity, sacred and secular pilgrimages intersect, and new sites are added to traditional pilgrimage sites such as Lourdes, Santiago de Compostela, Jerusalem, and Mecca. Globalization has made it cheaper and easier for pilgrims/tourists to reach and create new sacred pilgrimage sites such as Graceland, the local of the fatal car crash where Princess Diana died, Ground Zero, and most recently Michael Jackson's Neverland ranch in California. Many scholars have studied the impact of spiritual tourism/pilgrimage on individuals and communities (Badone and Roseman 2004; Coleman and Eade 2004).

Finally, the Internet has made religions more accessible and participatory. While religious institutions use the Internet to disseminate their beliefs, the increasing number of religious virtual communities and websites run by individuals exemplify how religion is meaningful in the contemporary world. Indeed, the Internet has expanded and strengthened the attributes of religious modernity (privatization of religion, religious pluralism, and the constitution of a market place) as well as the reinforcement of fundamentalist identities.

Gnostic Catholic Church

The Gnostic Catholic Church, a contemporary occult church, exists as an integral part of the thelemic (from the Greek, thelema, or will) magical order Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO). It is actually one faction of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle, which in 1890 was initiated as a new Gnostic tradition by Jules-Benoît Doinel du Val-Michel (1842–1903). In 1867, the year before his marriage, Doinel claimed that as part of an apparition of the Virgin Mary, Jesus had also appeared and consecrated him as a bishop. Through the next years, he focused his reading on occult literature, and then around 1890, during a Spiritualist séance, he accepted a second consecration that led directly to his founding of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle. Through the church, Doinel hoped to revive the mystical doctrines attributed to the second-century theologian Origen, most important, the idea of the pre-existence of soul and the related belief in metempsychosis, or reincarnation. Assuming the position as patriarch of the new church, Doinel proceeded to consecrate four bishops, each of whom went on to establish separate lineages from which several dozen distinctive Gnostic jurisdictions have emerged.

In 1892, Doinel consecrated Gerard Encausse (1865–1916), the author of several occult texts under the pen name Papus. Papus took Doinel's Gnosticism into the milieu of the German and British occult orders. Papus remained loyal to the Église Gnostique Universelle, a faction of the church that emerged in 1908. However, as a bishop he possessed authority to consecrate others without reference to his superior, and it is claimed by some that he in fact consecrated both Theodor Reuss (1855–1923) and Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), who as leaders in the Ordo Templi Orientis brought the Gnostic Catholic Church into the OTO orb. Evidence of these consecrations is somewhat weak.

Early in his work for the OTO, Crowley wrote a Gnostic Mass that integrated thelemic themes in a liturgy that followed the form of the Roman Catholic Mass, though no Christian teachings remained. In 1917 Reuss translated Crowley's Mass into German and began designating himself as the leader of the Gnostic neo-Christians and the Swiss legate of the Église Gnostique Universelle, then headed by Jean Baptiste Bricaud (1881–1934), reportedly consecrated by Papus in 1911. Reuss later accepted several additional consecrations, while Bricaud (albeit unsuccessfully) advocated the use of Crowley's Mass in Freemason circles.

During the years under Karl Johannes Germer (1885–1962), the Ordo Templi Orientis almost ceased to exist, and the performance of the Gnostic Mass was put aside. Then in 1957 in Switzerland, Hermann Joseph Metzaer (1919–1990), a leader in the OTO, accepted consecration as a bishop of the Gnostic Catholic Church from Herbert Fritsche (1911–1960), and then succeeded Fritsche as patriarch in 1960. Following Germer's death, in 1963, he called together German OTO leaders and was selected by them as the new international outer head of the Order of the OTO. He then revived the OTO, along with the Gnostic Catholic Church.

In America in the 1970s, Grady McMurtry (1918–1985) revived the OTO by assuming the role of caliph of the order and argued that he was therefore patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church. McMurtry claimed authority to lead the OTO from some emergency documents he had been given by Crowley in the mid-1940s. He argued that the same documents gave him an implied consecration as a bishop. McMurtry's role as head of the church was questioned, given the lack of documentation of Crowley's consecration by Papus and the lack of an act of consecration of McMurtry.

McMurtry's successor, William Breeze, put the controversy over the church to rest when he was consecrated anew by Jack Hogg, a bishop of the Gnostic Church of Thelema. Hogg's lineage could be traced directly to Doinel and has been supplemented by the lineage of Orthodox bishop Joseph René Vilatte (1855–1929), through the small theosophically oriented American Catholic Church. All ninth-degree members of the American OTO are now consecrated as Gnostic bishops. The outer head of the OTO is also considered the patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church.

The American branch of the Gnostic Catholic Church may be contacted at JAF 7666, New York, NY 10116. Gnostic church services are held across North America and in 18 countries where the OTO has affiliated lodges and groups.

Gnostic Churches

The Gnostic Churches comprise a number of new religious movements, most of which originated from the spiritual experience of Jules-Benoît Doinel (1842–1903). Doinel was born in Moulins (France), in 1842, into a pious Catholic family, sharing a special devotion to the 16th-century Jesuit saint Stanislas Kostka (1550–1568), who appeared to Doinel in mystical visions when he was a teenager. These visions eventually got young Doinel in trouble with his teachers at the Jesuit Seminary of Montciel, which he entered in 1859 and from which he was expelled in 1861. He decided then to become a lay archivist and historian rather than a Jesuit priest, and graduated from the famous École des Chartes in 1866. His first appointment as an archivist was in Aurillac. By that time, Doinel had abandoned Roman Catholicism altogether and was active as a spiritualist medium. In 1868, however, he married actress Stéphanie-Françoise Le Clerc (1835–1873), a pious Catholic who brought him back into the Roman fold. In 1869, he was appointed archivist of the city of Niort and, while still claiming to be a good Catholic, resumed his practice as a spiritualist medium. After Stéphanie's death in 1873, he remarried in 1874, this time to a lady with strong family ties to (rather anti-Catholic) French Freemasonry, which he ultimately joined in 1884.

By that time, he had held the post of archivist in Orléans (a very important position) since 1875 and had again abandoned the Roman Catholic Church. French Freemasonry was in need of a competent archivist, and Doinel was called to Paris to take on the directorship of the Masonic Museum. In 1882, he joined Monodism, a short-lived religious movement led by Guillaume Monod (1800–1896), the son of the famous Swiss Reformed scholar Jean Monod (1765–1836); Guillaume claimed to be the new Messiah and to represent the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. In 1890, Doinel met Papus (Gérard Encausse, 1865–1916), who was then the leader of the Martinist Order and other occult organizations, which the archivist quickly joined. Doinel was a true collector of occult society memberships, and he also joined the Theosophical Society. His studies led him toward a particular interest in ancient Gnosticism and Catharism. He shared these interests in Paris with Countess Maria Mariátegui (1830–1895), who later became the duchess of Pomar by marriage, and was a friend of Madame Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), as well as other Theosophical luminaries.

How Doinel came to found the Gnostic Church is a tale that he himself told in different ways during his later years. According to one version, in June 1890 during a Spiritualist séance at the home of the duchess of Pomar, the spirits of 41 Cathar bishops appeared and consecrated Doinel as patriarch of a newly established Gnostic Church. True or not, by late 1890 Doinel was actively consecrating Gnostic bishops, including Papus and another well-known French esoteric author, Paul Sédir (pseudonym of Yvon Le Loup, 1871–1926). By 1892, there were enough Gnostic bishops to convene a synod, which confirmed Doinel as patriarch with the name of Valentinus II. The same synod consecrated yet another French esoteric author, Léonce Fabre des Essarts (1848–1917), as bishop under the name of Synésius. Between 1890 and 1894 Doinel, using a mix of Gnosticism and Catharism, published both a catechism and a ritual for the Gnostic Church. In December 1894, however, Doinel repudiated both Freemasonry and the Gnostic Church, and in 1895 publicly announced his return to the Catholic fold. In May 1895, using the pseudonym of Jean Kostka (the latter being the surname of the Jesuit saint to whom he was so devoted in his youth), he published a book under the title of Lucifer démasqué (Lucifer Unmasked), in which he claimed that the devil himself was behind Freemasonry, the Theosophical Society, and the Gnostic Church.

Never one to remain in the same church for long, however, Doinel wrote to Fabre des Essarts (who, in the meantime, had been elected the new patriarch of the Gnostic Church) on December 31, 1899, claiming that he had never really abandoned Gnosticism and was returning to the Gnostic Church, not as patriarch, but as one of its bishops. In 1902, on the other hand, he published a rather pious book of Catholic poetry. Doinel died on March 16, 1902, with both Roman Catholics and Gnostics claiming that he had died while still embracing the tenets of their respective faiths.

Unlike Doinel, Fabre des Essarts remained a Gnostic bishop and patriarch throughout his whole life, and presided over the expansion of the Gnostic Church from France into Belgium, Germany, Russia, Italy, and the United States. During this period, René Guénon (1886–1951), the famous French esoteric author, was also consecrated as a Gnostic bishop (in 1909) under the name of Palingénius, but remained a member of the Gnostic Church for only a short time. Another well-known French esoteric author (and Martinist leader), Jean Bricaud (1881–1934), was consecrated a Gnostic bishop in 1901, but went on in 1907 to head a schism that established what was initially known as the Catholic Gnostic Church, but which from 1908 on became known as the Universal Gnostic Church. Bricaud's branch eventually attracted most members of the original Gnostic Church led by Fabre des Essarts (who died in 1917) and his successors, Léon Champrenaud (1870–1925) and Patrice Genty (1883–1964).

The two branches (the Gnostic Church and the Universal Gnostic Church) merged in 1960 under the leadership of Robert Ambelain (1907–1997), who, as leader of the Universal Gnostic Church, had succeeded Constant Chevillon (1880–1944), who had been assassinated by Nazi collaborators, and Henry-Charles Dupont (1877–1960). Ambelain, a successful writer of popular esoteric books, had established yet another independent branch in 1958: it was known as the Apostolic Gnostic Church, and it too was part of the 1960 merger. In 1967, Ambelain left his position as patriarch to pursue other interests, and in 1983 the Apostolic Gnostic Church (which was the name it maintained from the 1960 merger) ceased to exist as an international body. A dozen small Gnostic churches, however, continue to this day to survive on a national basis, particularly in France and Belgium (Rosicrucian Apostolic Church, Gnostic Apostolic Church), Italy (Italian Gnostic Church: Via San Zanobi 89, 50129 Florence, Italy, although the activity appears to be somewhat reduced after the death of its longtime leader Bishop Loris Carlesi, 1915–2006), the United States, and Barbados (Apostolic Gnostic Church), and they have kept alive Doinel's ideas and rituals right up to the present time.

The different branches of the Gnostic Church established by Doinel in 1890 should not be confused, however, with other new religious movements, also known as Gnostic churches; some are completely independent of the Doinel tradition described above (such as several independent Gnostic churches active in California or throughout the United States); others derive from branches of the Ordo Templi Orientis. The latter include the Gnostic Catholic churches, which operate within several branches of the OTO loyal to the tradition of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), although Crowley claimed episcopal orders from Doinel, and the Gnostic churches operating within the Gnostic Movement, founded by Samael Aun Weor (1917–1977).

Gnostic Movement

More than 100 independent organizations, known as Gnostic movements or Gnostic churches, claim as their founder Victor Manuel Gómez Rodríguez (1917–1977), an esoteric master born in Bogota (Colombia) and known under the pen name of Samael Aun Weor. Raised as a Roman Catholic, Weor later became a spiritualist, a Theosophist, and a member of the Fraternitas Rosicruciana Antiqua (Ancient Rosicrucian Brotherhood) founded by Arnoldo Krumm-Heller (1876–1949). Krumm-Heller was a friend of the British magus Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), and also operated a Catholic Gnostic Church, in which he probably consecrated Weor a bishop. Weor published his first popular esoteric book, The Perfect Matrimony, in 1950, and about the same time in Mexico City established a Universal Christian Gnostic Church. Weor's death in 1977 generated an endless sequel of schisms. They all differ on matters relating to leadership, doctrine, and ritual, but all venerate Weor as a superhuman master, and as the Messiah of the Aquarian Age. Some of the branches have several thousand members, particularly throughout Latin America, and also in Latin Europe and Quebec, with others in the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Asia, and Africa.

Weor's thought is syncretic and includes themes drawn from Theosophy, Krumm-Heller, Aleister Crowley, George Ivanovich Gurdjieff (ca. 1866–1949), and other masters. The three keys to Weor's system (or the "three factors of the consciousness revolution") are death, rebirth, and sacrifice. Death here means the destruction of all the negative psychological factors that prevent human awakening. Rebirth involves the birth of a higher alchemical body, achieved through sexual magic in the shape of the "AZF Arcane," a form of karezza, which is the technique aimed at halting a sexual experience just before orgasm. Sacrifice means spreading to humanity in its entirety the wisdom the initiate has acquired. In order to achieve the three stages of Weor's consciousness revolution, secret rituals (in seven degrees), study, astral projection, and astral travels have to be undertaken. The initiate's itinerary is divided into three stages, known as exoteric, mesoteric, and esoteric (a terminology also used by Gurdjieff). Weor's main sexual practice, the above-mentioned form of karezza, also known by the tantric name Sahaja Maithuna, is regarded as the only permissible sexual magic. All other forms (including those prevailing in the Ordo Templi Orientis groups inspired by the teaching of Aleister Crowley) are regarded as illicit, and ultimately controlled by a "Black Lodge" for its own satanic ends.

Drawing a map of the Weor groups is a difficult task, with new schisms occurring frequently. The largest group is the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology Samael and Litelantes (IGASL), which until her death in 1998 was led by Weor's widow, Arnolda Garro Gómez (known as Maestra Litelantes; 1920–1998). It has currently some 18,000 members and was established in 1989, when Arnolda left the original Gnostic Association of Anthropological and Cultural Studies over a dispute about the copyright on Weor's writings. The American branch of Arnolda's Institute is the American Institute of Gnostic Anthropology, which has several dozen centers throughout the United States listed in the website for the organization at <http://www.gnosisusa.org>.

The Gnostic Association of Anthropological and Cultural Studies (Internet site at <http://www.ageacac.org>) still exists under the joint leadership of Hypatia Gómez, Weor's daughter, and Victor Manuel Chavez, while Osiris Gómez, Weor's son, took over the leadership of the Gnostic Institute of Anthropology, together with Roberto Tejada, after his mother's death. Tejada, however, later left Osiris and established his own organization under the name Círculo de Investigación de la Antropología Gnóstica (CIAG).

Among other branches, a few are worthy of mention: (1) the Gnostic Association of Anthropological, Cultural and Scientific Studies, established in Spain in 1992 by Oscar Uzcátegui Quintero, one of Weor's closest associates (headquarters: Avenida de América 26/10F, 18006 Granada, Spain; website: <http://www.ageac.org>); several of Uzcátegui's disciples in turn have established their own independent branches; (2) the Center for Gnostic Studies (Centro de Estudios Gnósticos, CEG), perhaps the fastest-growing branch, a splinter from Arnolda's branch, guided by Ernesto Barón in 2001; Cloris Rojo Barón, Ernesto's wife, separated from her husband and created a separate branch that appears, however, to be moribund; (3) the Gnostic Christian Universal Church, founded by Colombian master Teofilo Bustos (1936–2005), known as the Venerable Master Lakshmi and currently headquartered in Uruguay (<http://www.gnostico.com> and <http://www.gnosis2000.com>); (4) the Gnostic Christian Universal Movement in the New Order, established in Colombia in 1960 by Joaquín Enrique Amortegui Valbuena (1926–2000), known as the Venerable Master Rabolú, a group that enjoyed a certain notoriety in the media thanks to its apocalyptic features and the idea that a planet named Hercólubus may soon collide with Planet Earth, thus destroying humanity forever. Many "Weorite" groups are quite secretive, and some have decided to close their websites, which were active in the 1990s.

Gnosticism

The term Gnostic was originally applied to a spectrum of groups that emerged to prominence in the second century CE as competitors to the Christian church. Questions about the origin of the groups remain a source of intense scholarly discussion, and estimates for the date of their origin range from the first century CE to the first century BCE. Until the 20th century, the Gnostics were known primarily from the writings of Christian heresiologists such as Saint Irenaeus (ca. 125–202), whose famous text Against Heresies included excerpts of the writings of various Gnostics such as Valentinus and Carpocrates, both of whom lived in the second century CE.

The study of Gnosticism was elevated from its status as a subtopic under Christian heresies in 1945, with the discovery of an ancient Gnostic library in the Egyptian desert at Nag Hammadi. The fourth-century site yielded complete copies of books such as the Gospel of Truth (initially recognized from the several quotes in Irenaeus's writings) and the Gospel of Thomas, a heretofore unknown collection of sayings attributed to Jesus. These books, along with the Pistis Sophia, a Gnostic collection published in 1900, have provided a whole new perspective on the Gnostic groups and have led some to question the conventional view of Gnosticism as a singular movement. The renewed interest in Gnosticism has also focused attention on the Mandaeans, possibly the only Gnostic group that has survived from the ancient Mediterranean. The Mandaean community is centered in southeastern Iraq.

Gnosticism was described by Irenaeus and other Christian writers as a heretical form of Christian teaching. However, in light of the new findings, the Gnostic tradition has come to be seen as a religious community in its own right that began to interact with the Christian movement already in the first century and incorporated Christian elements into its own teachings. Christian Gnostics believed that they possessed the clearest understanding of the message of Christ, the knowledge (Greek: gnosis) that allowed them to encounter spiritual reality and attain salvation.

To the Gnostics, God was a remote reality, utterly unknowable and transcendent. They described the world as the product of a series of emanations that originated in God—those closest to God being purely spiritual, and those closest to Earth being characterized by the gross materiality of earthly life. The material world was inherently bad, and only in escaping from it could one obtain salvation. Human beings were seen as sparks of divinity who had been trapped in this lower world. The gnosis allowed them to escape their fate and return to their spiritual home. In some groups, the God of the Hebrew Bible was pictured as a lesser deity, the demiurge, characterized by human passions. In contrast, Christ was seen as a totally spiritual being who appeared in human form (only seeming to have a material existence) to show the way back to the spiritual realm.

Gnosticism, apart from the Mandeans, appears to have died out by the fifth century, but the impulse it represented continued to reappear at various times and places throughout Europe, most prominently among the Bogomils toward the end of the first millennium CE in Bulgaria and the Cathars (or Albigensians) in southern France. Gnosticism had a great affinity to the kabbalistic teachings of mystical Judaism, which found expression in the Christian Kabbalah movement that emerged in the 16th century. A new burst of Gnosticism began with the Kabbalah movement and with the 17th-century movement called Rosicrucianism. This reborn Gnosticism is discussed elsewhere in this encyclopedia as the Western Esoteric tradition, which includes Rosicrucianism, Freemasonry (18th century), Theosophy (19th century), and a host of occult and metaphysical groups spawned in the 20th century, culminating in the New Age movement.

Whereas Christian leaders and scholars have tended to see Gnosticism as the oldest and most persistent Christian heresy, Western Esoteric leaders in the 20th century took the opportunity provided by the free religious environment to reclaim Gnosticism as a contemporary living tradition. Gnostic Christian groups have appeared on the fringe of the Christian community, incorporating the Gospel of Thomas into their canon of Scripture. Other Esoteric groups have claimed the Gnostic heritage by incorporating the term into their name, though without any significant reference to the ancient Gnostic texts; these include the Gnostic Catholic Church and the Gnostic movement.

A very few groups have attempted to base their religion directly on the ancient Gnostic writings. The most prominent representatives of this latter type include the Gnostic Society, based in southern California and headed by Gnostic Bishop Stephan A. Hoeller, and the Gnostic Society in the Kingdom of Norway, founded by Terje Dahl Bergersen.

God, Existence of Debate about the existence of God has preoccupied many of the leading thinkers of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, the Western religious traditions of humanity. For such thinkers, as for critics of each religion, it is not enough to simply accept the purported divine revelation behind one or more of these faiths. For these thinkers, both skeptic and believer, the existence of God is a proper subject of philosophical and theological debate. Even those who decry the need for religions to take philosophy seriously have to do so in order to state their case against its value or relevance.

There were two early signals that Judaism and Christianity would both be facing the topic of God in relation to the concerns of philosophy. The first had to do with the impact of Greek thought on Philo of Alexandria (ca. 20 BCE–40 CE), the father of Jewish philosophy. Though Philo's philosophy impacted the early Christian movement more than the Jewish world of his day, he was the earliest important Jewish thinker to wrestle with the relationship of Moses to Plato.

The second signal that Judeo-Christian thought about God would be seen through or in relation to the lens of philosophy was how quickly Christian leaders became preoccupied with Plato, Aristotle, and other

Greek philosopher Aristotle, whose philosophical writings had a significant impact on the development of Western intellectual history. (Jupiterimages) philosophers. Paul's trip to Athens is mentioned briefly in the Acts of the Apostles and he gives a warning about philosophy in his epistle to the Colossians. For the most part, however, first-century Christians were not overly concerned with philosophy. Their emphasis was on the proclamation of the revelation from God through Jesus.

While proclamation continued in the second century, an apologetic emphasis was beginning. Its first focus was on proving the superiority of the Christian revelation to that of Moses. This was a significant motif in Ignatius, Barnabas, and Justin Martyr (100–165 CE), the earliest of the church fathers. However, even in Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho we have clear proof of the significance of Greek philosophy for Christian thinkers. Justin claims that at a time in his life “contemplation of ideas furnished my mind with wings so that in a little while I supposed that I had become wise.” He goes on to contrast this “stupidity” with the prophetic message about Jesus that he learned from an old man. Justin’s critique of philosophy must not be overstated since he used Plato as an ally on various topics.

The apologetic against Greek thought continued in Tatian (110–180 CE), Theophilus of Antioch, Athenagoras (fl. 170), and Clement of Alexandria (155–215). With Tertullian (ca. 160–ca. 220), however, the apologetic took a decisively negative turn. Tertullian speaks of the Apostle Paul’s recognition that philosophy corrupts truth with its “mutually repugnant sects.” He then goes on with his famous rhetorical questions: “What indeed has Athens to do with Jerusalem? What concord is there between the Academy and the Church? What between heretics and Christians?” Thus, he commands: “Away with all attempts to produce a mottled Christianity of Stoic, Platonic, and dialectic composition! We want no curious disputation after possessing Christ Jesus, no inquisition after enjoying the gospel!” (Against Heretics, VII).

Tertullian’s radical demarcation between Christianity and philosophy was largely neglected until post-Reformation times. Origen (185–254) gave philosophical argument an important place, as did Gregory of Nyssa (fl. 370) and other theologians, including Augustine (354–430). Etienne Gilson even points out how Augustine foreshadowed Descartes in using similar tactics to set aside skepticism, as in this line from City of God: “Even in error, I should have to exist in order to be in error.” Augustine is confident in God’s existence as provable, though some make themselves blind to the obvious.

Augustine, like Tertullian, put reason at the bidding of theology, but Augustine showed far more comfort in combining faith and reason. This comfortable union of faith and reason continued, with little interruption, for 1,000 years, whether in Orthodox or Catholic circles. Belief in God was held with increasing certainty, even as Christian apologetic adapted, especially in Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), to the discovery of the thought of Aristotle. There were a few

Christian thinkers wary of philosophy, notably Bernard of Clairvaux. Donald Wiebe notes the importance of Bernard in his work The Irony of Theology and the Nature of Religious Thought.

Aristotle had an earlier impact on Islamic thought. His writings were most influential on Al-Kindi (805–873), the father of Islamic philosophy, Al-Farabi (ca. 872–950/951), Avicenna (ca. 980–1037), and Averroes (1126–1198), known to Muslims as Ibn Rushd.

These thinkers used Aristotle to strengthen the case for Islamic orthodoxy, though al-Ghazali (1058–1111), like Bernard, had suspicions of the rationalist mindset. Al-Ghazali never tires of asking in his Incoherence of the Philosophers “Do you know this through the necessity of reason or through speculating with it?”

By the time of Aquinas the arguments for God were similar in Christian, Islamic, and Jewish circles. Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) had formulated the ontological argument. The cosmological argument was used in a restrained way by Moses Maimonides (1135–1204), the greatest of medieval Jewish thinkers, in his Guide to the Perplexed. Aquinas focused his attention on various facets of the cosmological argument in his Summa contra Gentiles and Summa Theologica.

The teleological argument was used by Averroes (following Aristotle) and also by Aquinas. The latter states: “We see that things which lack knowledge, such as natural bodies, act for an end, and this is evident from their acting always, or nearly always, in the same way, so as to obtain the best result. Hence it is plain that they achieve their end, not fortuitously, but designedly.” This is the last of the five proofs to God from the Summa Theologica. Of course, Aquinas, the other Christian thinkers noted above, Muslim apologists, and Maimonides all noted the importance of moral argument in advancing the case for God. The first Christian apologists loved to point out the inferior morals of Pagans in contrast to the virtuous disciples of Christ.

The large unanimity and certainty about God in the Western religious tradition was diminished with the emergence of skepticism in the 16th century. At the same time that Martin Luther (1483–1546) and John Calvin (1509–1564) were questioning Catholic doctrine, the West was discovering the writings of Sextus Empiricus (d. 210), the Pyrrhonian writer. Thus, there was a double blow to the confident claims of Western religion.

This story has been documented most closely by Richard H. Popkin, the great historian of philosophy. His work The History of Skepticism shows how “the Reformation controversy had opened up Pandora’s box in seeking the foundations of certain knowledge” and that this theological crisis was compounded by a larger epistemological skepticism. The latter was advanced most powerfully by Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592) and his Apologie de Raymond Sebond. Popkin notes that “Montaigne’s genial Apology became the coup de grace to an entire intellectual world. It was also to be the womb of modern thought, in that it led to the attempt either to refute the new Pyrrhonism, or to find a way of living with it.”

Many Catholic and Protestant thinkers turned to fideism, the belief that faith is independent of and superior to reason as a means of reaching truth about God, as an alternative to the earlier Christian rationalism and the new skepticism. It was not always easy to tell if the fideists were true believers working in apologetics or real skeptics hoping for the demise of Christian faith. A creative non-fideism apologetic came from René Descartes (1596–1650), who used a skeptical motif to re-establish the certainty of one thing (“I think, therefore, I am”) from which he moved to solid proof for the existence of God. However, the foundations of knowledge had basically changed. Since Descartes all observations about the existence of God are made in the context of doubt and competing visions of reality, Christian and otherwise.

Christian and Jewish confidence about God was further impacted by the emergence of biblical criticism. The early proponents were Isaac La Peyrere (d. 1676), Baruch Spinoza (d. 1677), and Richard Simon (d. 1612), the French critic. Doubts increased dramatically with the confident Enlightenment theories of Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) and David Hume (1711–1776), especially in his famous essay against miracles. In a further blow, the next century provided Charles Darwin’s argument for evolution and a subsequent withering of trust in the teleological argument for God. All of this formed the background to the Catholic affirmation of papal infallibility (1870) and the emergence of an anti-intellectual Protestant Fundamentalism in the early decades of the 20th century.

Both Judaism and Islam have faced modern crises as well, though not so much related to the vagaries of argument. Muslim scholars had to cope with the collapse of the Ottoman Empire and the triumph of Western powers. Jews have had their own doubts come to the fore in reaction to Adolf Hitler’s Holocaust. This and other modern horrors have made it easy for critics to deny God on the basis of the problem of evil. This is one of the main arguments of the new militant atheists like Richard Dawkins and Christopher Hitchens. For them God is a delusion, and religious belief is a form of insanity.

In spite of five centuries of increasing agnosticism, belief in God continues. Western religious thinkers, residing in an increasingly globalized world, are more cognizant of other faiths. At the same time, the Western apologetic for God is now set increasingly in a postmodern context. Even Christian rationalists must acknowledge Jacques Derrida’s impact. Karl Barth would have seen postmodern malaise as perfect proof of the value of fideism. Gilson wrote once that “all the Barthian Calvinist asks of philosophy is that it recognize itself as damned and remain in that condition.”

Various Christian apologists have continued to opt for rational confidence about God. This includes the famed populist C. S. Lewis (1898–1963) and philosophers Alvin Plantinga (b. 1932) and Richard Swinburne (b. 1934). The case for God was strengthened with the 2004 announcement that Antony Flew (1923), the famous British philosopher, had abandoned atheism. He was impressed by a recent reformulation of Aristotle’s proof for God, the evidence for big-bang cosmology, and the teleological arguments of the Intelligent Design movement. Proponents of the latter, including William Dembski, Michael Behe, Phillip E. Johnson, and Stephen Meyer, are often the objects of ridicule by Dawkins and other mainstream scientists.

Carl Becker points out that “whether arguments command assent or not depends less on the logic that conveys them than upon the climate of opinion in which they are sustained.” This bears reflection given the changing opinions about the existence of God in Western thought. Becker describes the trajectory this way:

“It has taken eight centuries to replace the conception of existence as divinely composed and purposeful drama by the conception of existence as a blindly running flux of disintegrating energy.” He quotes with approval the words of Aristophanes: “Whirl is king, having deposed Zeus.” Of course, this verdict commands assent only in certain climates of opinion.

Goddess Spirituality

Goddess spirituality seeks to redress the imbalance it perceives in monotheistic traditions where the image of the Divine is overwhelmingly male and to envisage and celebrate the Divine as She as well as He. Goddess spirituality can be a radical challenge to the teaching of the world's monotheistic traditions, envisaging the Divine as immanent as well as transcendent and for many challenging also the accepted hierarchies and power relationships of Western society. There has been a strong identification, for example, with the environmental and climate change movements, which protest against capitalist and state exploitation of natural resources.

Some women have remained within Christian churches but have sought to adapt and enhance the liturgy and theology with enriched images and concepts of the Divine as Mother as well as Father. Some Jewish women have found in the Kabbalah and the matriarchs of the Bible images that can update Judaism to meet contemporary women's needs. Others have sought to find spiritual expression and fulfillment in other traditions, both West and East, and in indigenous spirituality.

The Goddess spirituality movement has been fostered by women's emancipation and growing social, political, and cultural participation from the 19th century on, but Goddess spirituality is not solely the preserve of women. Many men of deep spirituality have questioned the concept of a supreme male deity and contemporary Goddess spiritualities have been welcoming to men both heterosexual and gay. In the early 20th century, British colonial magistrate and Tantric scholar Sir John Woodroffe, writing as Arthur Avalon, advocated a return to a religion where Goddess and God were equal. All things were possible, wrote Sir John, when the supreme personifications of the Divine were God and Goddess who “give and receive mutually, the feminine side being of equal importance with the masculine.” In the mid-20th century, writer Dion

Fortune wove Goddess spirituality into literature for public consumption in novels that described a religion of Goddess and Horned God, drawing on European mythologies with Kabbalistic overtones. In the late 1940s a retired British colonial administrator, Gerald Brousseau Gardner, had his own personal vision of the Goddess and created what was in effect a new religious synthesis by grafting ideas of Goddess worship, heavily seeped in the classics of his boyhood education, onto the remnants of the British witchcraft tradition.

Gardner's Wicca, as the synthesis came to be known, incorporated gender essentialism and a focus on heterosexuality that was unattractive in the latter half of the 20th century to many women attracted to Goddess worship as a manifestation of their feminism.

Newer feminist interpretations of Goddess-based witchcraft arose, particularly in the United States through the work of Starhawk. Wicca already venerated the natural world as a theophony. Starhawk made more explicit the radical activism of many Goddess worshippers. From the 1980s on, Goddess spirituality, nature religion, and environmental activism have gone hand in hand. Goddess spirituality has had increasing inspiration from Buddhism, and many female bodhisattvas and Goddess figures are now revered in the West by women who think of themselves as Buddhists and by those who practice primarily a Goddess-based spirituality. Tara from Tibetan Buddhism and Chinese Buddhism's Guan-Yin (Kannon in Japan) are widely revered by Goddess-oriented women.

Goddess spirituality has been evolving rapidly as the first generations of Goddess-worshipping women have developed Goddess worship for family celebration and the religious education of children. This has led to the establishment of summer festivals and camps and family worship activities.

For Goddess-oriented women, there are numerous religious routes to ordination, including the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans (a branch of the Unitarian Church) and organizations such as the Fellowship of Isis and the Reformed Congregation of the Goddess.

Golden Temple

The Golden Temple, located in the city of Amritsar, Punjab, India, has emerged as both the symbolic and administrative center of the Sikh religion. The temple, or more properly gurdwara or place of worship, is surrounded by a manmade lake (that is, fed by a spring) and the lake is surrounded by a complex of buildings that includes an information office, a museum, and shrines to notable Sikh leaders.

Until the early 16th century, only a small lake and associated forest existed where now a city is located, but Guru Nanak (1469–1539), the founder of the Sikh faith, came to this lake for meditation and eventually retired here. After Nanak's death, his followers made pilgrimages to the lake, which acquired an aura of sanctity, much derived from the stories of people being healed, even of leprosy, by the lake's water. The lake became known as Amritsar, or "pool of the nectar of immortality."

After Nanak's death, a set of successive gurus (teachers) led the small Sikh community. The third guru, Amar Das (1479–1574), left the task of building an appropriate place for worship to his successor, Ram

Das (1534–1581), who oversaw the enlargement of the lake and began the construction of the temple. The fifth guru, Arjan Dev (1563–1606), completed the initial work. Three years after the temple's completion in 1601, the Adi Granth, the collection of the writings of the gurus that constitute the Sikh scriptures, were formally installed inside the Har Mandir (Temple of God). As the temple became identified with the still relatively small Sikh community, its enemies occasionally focused on it. They destroyed it several times in the 18th century, the last time in 1767. On each occasion the Sikhs rebuilt it. Since the upper exterior of the temple was covered with gold in 1830, it has been commonly referred to as the Golden Temple. Close by the complex of temple buildings are dormitories and dining halls where all persons, regardless of their religion, race, or gender, may find free room and board.

Pilgrims approach the Golden Temple along a causeway over the Pool of Nectar. At the beginning of the causeway is a small temple, the Akal Takht. As they pass over the causeway and circumambulate the temple, they find entrance doors on each of the four sides, a sign of the openness of the faith to all seekers coming from all directions. The Adi Granth's throne dominates the temple's main room of the temple. Within the temple, pilgrims find a tank filled with water from the spring that feeds the lake. Here they wash their soul and some pray for healing. As each day begins, a priest brings the Adi Granth from the Akal Takht to the Har Mandir, where it is placed on its symbolic throne. As the day progresses, he and others will read from it. At the end of the day, the Adi Granth is wrapped in ritual cloths and returned to the Akal Takht.

The world took notice of the Golden Temple in 1984 after a group seeking to create a separate Sikh nation (for which some Sikhs had argued through the 20th century) took residence within. Their cause was opposed by most Indians and then prime minister Indira Gandhi (1917–1984). In his search for independence, Sikh leader Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale (1947–1984) had made the Golden Temple his headquarters. In her efforts to suppress the independence movement, Gandhi vowed to capture Bhindranwale even at the cost of invading the temple's sacred space. When Bhindranwale refused to surrender, she ordered Indian army troops into the temple. In the process the Akal Takhl was largely destroyed, and many of the separatists, including Brandranwale, along with a number of unsuspecting pilgrims who had been trapped in the temple when the siege began, were killed.

For her invasion of the Golden Temple, Gandhi earned the enmity of the Sikh community, including the elite group of Sikhs who served as her personal bodyguards. Two of those bodyguards assassinated her in retaliation for the violation of the Golden Temple.

Guru Nanak had been opposed to the idea of making pilgrimages, thus Sikhs are reluctant to equate visits to Amritsar as making a pilgrimage. However, the temple and surrounding environment are the regular terminus of people visiting from far and near in search of spiritual and moral refreshment. Relatively close to Amritsar, visitors will also be able to find, including the gurdwara at Tarn Taran built in honor of Guru Arjun Dev, the gurudwara at Gobindwal built by Guru Amar Das and the memorial to Guru Angad Devji at Hazoor Sahib.

Grail Movement, The

The Grail movement is an old and historically important international Esoteric organization, now divided among two main rival branches. The movement was founded by Oskar Ernst Bernhardt (1875–1941), a German Esoteric author known under the pen name of Abd-ru-shin (Parsi: Son of Light). He was born in Bischofswerda (Germany) in 1875, and from 1900 on traveled extensively in the Middle and Far East, the United States, and Europe; he also published several novels, short stories, and theatrical pieces. The outbreak of World War I found him, a German citizen, in an enemy country, the United Kingdom, and he was interned on the Isle of Man. In 1923, he circulated the first parts of The Grail Message, the publication of which continued through to 1937.

The Grail Message, a complicated Esoteric work, found interested readers, particularly in Germany, France, the former Czechoslovakia, and Austria. Bernhardt decided to settle in Austria, at the Vomperberg (Tyrol), together with a handful of followers of what later became known as the Grail movement. In 1938, Austria was occupied by Nazi Germany: The Grail Message was banned, the Vomperberg Center closed, and Abd-ru-shin arrested. Released from jail in September 1938, he was banished first to Schlauroth (near Görlitz, Saxony), and then to Kipsdorf, where he died in 1941. His wife, Maria Freyer (1887–1957), continued his spiritual mission within the framework of the Grail movement, which was directed for several years after her death by the children she had from a previous marriage, Irmgard (1908–1990), Alexander (1911–1968), and Elizabeth (1912–2002), who all legally changed their last name to Bernhardt. Their leadership was not recognized by the large Brazilian branch, directed by Roselis von Sass (1906–1997), who established a splinter group known as Ordem do Graal na Terra. Other schisms occurred in the present-day Czech Republic. The most important problems, however, were born from the will of Irmgard Bernhardt, who was the legal owner of both the Vomperberg Center and the copyright on Abd-ru-shin's books. Irmgard left the Vomperberg to her granddaughter Claudia-Maria (in turn, the natural daughter of a disciple she had adopted; 1948–1999) and to Claudia-Maria's husband, Siegfried (who also legally changed his last name to Bernhardt), and the copyrights to her brother-in-law Herbert Vollmann (1903–1999), the husband of her sister Elizabeth Bernhardt. Although Irmgard expressed in her will the hope that all her relatives might peacefully cooperate, this was not the case, particularly after Vollmann's death in 1999. The two branches of the movement—called in the United States the International Grail movement (led by Vollman's heirs, the owners of the copyrights) and the Grail movement of America (led by Siegfried Bernhardt, who controls the Vomperberg)—are now in fact completely separate.

The Grail Message includes 168 talks, explaining the structure of the whole universe and of the laws that govern it. The border between the divine and human realms is the Grail Castle, where the holy cup of the Grail represents God's direct irradiation. Creation is the spread of God's rays, with their consequent and gradual cooling beyond this border. This is how different planes of the universe were generated, a scheme very reminiscent of that found in the thought of Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), one of the founders of the Theosophical Society. First came the original spiritual level, then the spiritual level and additional levels successively down to matter, all originating, it is believed, from the cooling and solidification of the divine rays. Crucial for this descent of the rays are two characters, known as Parsifal and the pristine Queen, or Mother. A force flows down from the Holy Grail and sustains the whole of creation. Planet Earth is part of the creation's denser and lower level. Human beings, however, keep within themselves a spiritual spark capable of reminding them of their divine origin. By cultivating this spark through successive reincarnations, humans can transcend the lower planes of matter, achieve a higher spiritual consciousness, and ultimately return to their heavenly home.

At the Vomperberg, and in other places, the Grail movement celebrates three spiritual feasts each year: the Feast of the Holy Ghost (Pentecost) on May 30, the Feast of the White Lily on September 7, and the Feast of the Radiant Star on December 29. The total membership of the main branch of the Grail movement (splinter groups not included) is currently 16,000. The international readership of The Grail Message is certainly much larger. The headquarters are located at the Vomperberg Center, although the international correspondence address is the movement's publishing house.

Granada, Spain

Located in southeastern Spain, the city of Granada (Arabic: Gharnata) was a medieval center of culture and learning located at the foot of the Sierra Nevada where the Darro and Genil rivers meet. Its strategic location had drawn settlers since prehistoric times. The city developed a large Jewish population after the Roman destruction of Jerusalem and its temple in 70 CE, but attained its heights under Muslim rule between the 8th and 15th centuries. It was incorporated into Christian Spain in 1492.

The Alhambra, located in Granada, Spain, stands as a reminder of Spain's Moorish heritage. (Ralph Paprzycki/Dreamstime.com)

The Jewish community sided with the Muslim invaders in 711 and assisted in their bringing the city into the swiftly expanding Muslim Empire. Then, following the destruction of the Umayyad dynasty in Damascus, one of the heirs, Abd ar-Rahman (r. 756–788), made his way to Spain and re-established Umayyad rule with a base in Cordoba. He soon incorporated Granada into his new kingdom. It grew through the next century to become the capital of a province under the Cordoba caliphate declared by Abd ar-Rahman III (r. 912–961) in 929.

Unfortunately, the caliphate ran into serious succession problems early in the 11th century that would lead to its downfall in 1031. However, even as the caliphate's troubles began to manifest, Granada was attacked and largely destroyed in 1011. Out of the ruins the independent Taifa of Granada emerged in 1013. At this time, the Jewish and non-Jewish sections of the city were united and the present name, Granada (Spanish for pomegranate), was adopted. The new kingdom lasted until 1091. The Taifa was established by a Berber (North African) general named Ibn Ziri (r. 1013–1020), who founded the Zirid kingdom and made Granada its urban center.

Ibn Ziri saw to the building of the Great Mosque of Granada, whose beauty by all accounts rivaled those in Seville and Cordoba. He was also responsible for the construction of the Casbah (old section of the city), whose wall enclosed the royal palace and the commercial and residential quarters. Greater Granada was itself surrounded by lush orchards, most being of pomegranates.

While continuing under Muslim rule, Granada would successively fall under the authority of the Almoravid dynasty based in northwest Africa in 1091 and then the Almohad dynasty in 1166. Spanish Muslims led by Ibn al-Hud overthrew the Almohad forces in the 1230s only to have power wrested from him by Muhammad Ibn al-Ahmar, who established the Nasrid dynasty and proclaimed himself sultan of Granada in 1238.

In the meantime, the reconquest of Spain by Christian forces was well underway and Cordoba had already fallen to the Christian kingdom of Castille. The sultanate of Granada survived more than two and a half centuries as the last Spanish Muslim state by becoming a vassal state to Castille, to whom it paid tribute, and operating out of a balance of power policy between Christian rivals (Castille and Aragon) and Muslim forces sitting just across the Straits of Gibraltar in North Africa. Interestingly, the Nasrid sultanate brought Islamic culture in Spain to its zenith. The major symbol of Muslim rule was the Alhambra (the Red), a fortress resting on top of Sabika Hill, which served as the royal capital. Muhammad Ibn al-Ahmar began the construction of the Alhambra complex and his successors added to it decade by decade until it was pronounced completed during the reign of Muhammad V (r. 1354–1359, 1362–1391).

The Nasrid dynasty is remembered for its allegiance to the Malikite School of Islam (the dominant legal school across North Africa) and the associated strong support of Sufism (also the case in much of North Africa, especially Algeria and Morocco). Muhammad Ibn al-Ahmar used Sufi symbols to legitimate his authority. The dynasty identified itself as “those who make [Islam] victorious through God.”

The educational life of Granada was focused in the Madrasah of Granada, started in 1349 by Sultan Yusuf I (r. 1318–1354). The school remained active until the suppression of the Muslim community in 1499. Subsequently, its building was confiscated and the library lost in a fire. It would be succeeded by what became the University of Granada, founded on a grant from King Charles V (r. 1516–1556) in 1526.

The fall of Muslim Granada was occasioned by the merging of Castille and Aragon through the marriage of King Ferdinand (1452–1516) of Castille and Queen Isabella (1451–1504) of Aragon. Granada was surrendered to Christian Spain in 1492, by which time Granada’s population had become overwhelmingly Muslim. Large numbers of Granada’s Christians and then the Jews had migrated to other parts of Christian Iberia through the 15th century. The initial capitulation agreement of 1492 provided Muslims the right to retain their customs and their religion.

The expected conversion of the majority of the population did not occur, and in 1499 Catholic leaders began a program of mass conversion and forced baptism—a clear violation of the surrender document. Some citizens revolted, which then became the occasion of the authorities to revoke the treaty altogether. The state now demanded the quick conversion or emigration of all of Spain’s Muslims. The great majority converted, but many remained secret believers in their old faith. Evidence of the continued Islamic practices of the new Christian converts led King Philip III (r. 1598–1621) to decree their expulsion from Spain early in the 17th century.

Even before the Muslims were integrated into the Christian community, the same year that Granada fell, a decree demanding that Jews convert or leave Spain also destroyed the Granada Jewish community and the old Jewish neighborhood was demolished.

A new Christianized Granada emerged through the 16th century, and Spanish Catholics subsequently migrated to the city from across the country. The city’s mosques were turned into churches or otherwise converted into Christian structures. Two of the structures begun early in the 16th century would join the list of architectural wonders in the city: the Granada Charterhouse, a Carthusian monastery, and the new Granada Cathedral. The cathedral was built over the site of the older Grand Mosque. It would take almost two centuries to construct (1523–1704). The monastery of the Carthusians, begun in 1615, would take three centuries to complete, but emerged as a magnificent example of Spanish baroque architecture. A number of other architecturally significant churches would also be built (or begun) during the 16th century.

Grand Mosque, Damascus

Damascus is one of, if not, the oldest city in the world, and its Grand Mosque, though built in the eighth century CE, rests on a site that had successively been the home to various Pagan worship centers and a Christian church.

On the site now home to the Grand Mosque, the Aramean people built a temple around 1000 BCE. Rome conquered the city in 64 BCE, and later saw to the erection of a temple to Jupiter on the site. The Roman temple was constructed on an elevated rectangular platform. It measured some 1,163 by 1,001 feet. There was a square tower at each corner.

In the post-Constantinian world of the late fourth century, the Jupiter temple was superseded by a Christian church dedicated to John the Baptist. In a century in which reputed Christina relics came into their own, the church claimed to have among the most valuable: the head of John the Baptist (the biblical record noting that he died by beheading). The church became a popular pilgrimage site.

The Muslims conquered Damascus in 636 and initially shared the building with Christian worshippers.

They built a prayer hall adjacent to the church. The Umayyad caliph al-Walid (r. 705–715) had the church demolished and a new large mosque, magnificent as befitting its role in the city that had become the center of Muslim power, put in its place. It included a large prayer hall (525 feet in length), an even larger courtyard, and many rooms for pilgrims. The Prophet's mosque in Medina was used as a basic model.

Al-Walid compensated his Christians subjects for the church and allowed them to rebuild elsewhere in the city. The relics of John the Baptist, who is also mentioned in the Koran, remained in the possession of the new mosque.

The builders took materials from a number of still-standing Pagan temples, and even columns from the Church of Mary in Antioch. The courtyard was faced with marble, glass, and gold. Included in the construction was what may be the largest golden mosaic in the world, covering some 43,000 square feet. This mosque is somewhat unique in having three minarets. The Minaret of the Bride dates to the 9th and 12th centuries; the Minaret of Jesus to the 13th century; and the Minaret of Qat Bey to the 15th century. Of the three, the Minaret of Jesus, is the tallest. Local tradition suggests that this will be the site of Christ's return to Earth on the Last Day.

The Umayyad mosque has suffered damage several times due to fires (1069, 1893), the Mongol conquest and destruction, and Tamerlane's overrunning the city in 1401.

In 1979, the mosque was included in the old city of Damascus, which was declared a World Heritage site by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). In 2001 Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) visited the mosque to view the relics of John the Baptist. It was the first time a pope had made a visit to a mosque.

Great Disappointment

The Great Disappointment is the name given to the severe letdown felt by the followers of William Miller's Adventist teachings when Christ did not return in 1844. Miller, a Baptist preacher from New York, had suggested in the 1830s, based upon his study of the Bible, that Christ was to return around 1843.

The keystone to Miller's understanding of the immediate future was Daniel 8:13–14, "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." This passage he coupled with Daniel 9:24, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people . . . to make an end to sins." He understood prophetic "days" as referring to mundane years, an idea based on biblical passages such as Ezekiel 4:6, "I have appointed thee each day for a year." Hence 70 weeks became 490 days/years.

Miller believed that the end of the 70 weeks was 33 CE, then the commonly accepted date of Christ's death and resurrection. If that was the case, the 70 weeks began in 457 BCE. Counting 2,300 years from that date brought him to 1843. With this essential chronology set, Miller was able to fill in the details of how Bible prophecy had predicted human history to that point. He began to share these findings with ministers in his community and as early as 1832 published a series of articles concerning his conclusions in a newspaper, the Vermont Telegraph, which led to a 64-page booklet the next year, Evidences from Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ about the Year 1843.

At the beginning of 1843, Miller stated that he believed that Christ would return between March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844. When Christ failed to return in March 1844, Miller confessed his error and left his own movement. A minority also defected from the movement, but some followed Samuel Snow (1806–1870), who suggested October 22, 1844, was the more correct date. It is the despair that followed the failure of this second date that became known as the Great Disappointment. It resulted in a period of chaos and the division of the movement into several factions from which would eventually come the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Worldwide Church of God.

Great Mosque, Djenné, Mali

The Great Mosque of Djenné, constructed in 1907, is representative of the emergence of Islam as the dominant religion in much of West Africa, with much of that spread coming through the evangelical efforts of merchants and traders. Djenné was formally founded around 800 CE as a trading center connecting Timbuktu and the desert region to the north and east with Guinea and the rain forest region to the south and east.

According to tradition, a local ruler, Koi Kinboro, converted to Islam and in his enthusiasm for his new faith had his palace converted. Records are scarce concerning the size and appearance of the first mosque, but it was large enough that Sheikh Amadou Lobbo, who conquered Djenné during the Tukolor War, ordered the original mosque demolished in 1834, as he considered it to be too lavish for a mosque. The only portion of the original building that survived was an enclosure containing the graves of local leaders. In 1861 the city was conquered by the Tukolor emperor al-Hajj 'Umar and was then occupied by the French in 1893. The French oversaw a re-creation of the original building, which was completed in 1896. However, that building was demolished after the decision was made to build what is now the present mosque, designed by the architect Ismaila Traoré, then the head of Djenné's guild of masons.

The new mosque was constructed of sun-baked mud bricks and laid with a mud-based mortar, the whole structure being covered with a mud plaster. The materials have been developed locally over the centuries and function to insulate the building during the day and keep it relatively warm through the night. The building was constructed on a raised platform (surface area 62,500 square feet), which keeps it above the water line when the nearby river floods. The annual flooding of the Bani River transforms Djenné into an island.

A roof covers half of the mosque while the other half is an open air prayer hall or courtyard. The prayer wall faces toward Mecca (east) and also overlooks the city marketplace. Rising above the prayer wall are three large minarets, each containing a spiral staircase leading to the roof.

The Great Mosque, the largest building in the world made of mud, was included in that part of Djenné designated a World Heritage Site by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in 1988. Once open to non-Muslims, it was closed following its use in a photo shoot that was deemed to be in violation of the building sanctity.

Great White Brotherhood

The Great White Brotherhood (GWB) is perhaps the most publicized and controversial millenarian new religious movement that appeared in the former Soviet Union in the early 1990s. The founder of the GWB, an electronics engineer named Yuri Krivonogov, became interested in ways of "releasing the energetic potential of humankind" and "directing" human behavior during the 1980s. In 1990, he set up the Atma Medical Centre

(or Institute of Soul) in Kiev, the Ukrainian capital, which was intended to study and propagate esoteric methods of healing. He soon met Maria Tsvigun (b. 1960), a young Ukrainian journalist who had had a "special experience" during an abortion operation, and recognized her as the "living God." Following their marriage and "persecution" by Ukrainian legal authorities (a criminal investigation of financial irregularities), the Atma Medical Centre rapidly evolved into a religious community, and its leaders became the "divine duo" of Maria Devi Christos and Ioann Swami.

They announced a 1,260-day period of spreading the message of the living God, which Maria Devi Christos had already begun and which would culminate in her "sacrificial death," followed within three days by her resurrection on November 14, 1993, in the ancient Cathedral of St. Sophia in Kiev. On that day, at least 700 members of GWB arrived in Kiev, but were prevented by the Ukrainian police from joining Maria Devi and her closest adherents, who had managed to enter the cathedral. The leadership of the group were later arrested and sentenced to imprisonment for “causing damage to citizens’ health under the guise of religious rituals and for seizure of state property.” In prison, Maria Devi denounced her former husband as a “fallen Cain” and divorced him. She was released in 1997 under an amnesty and married Vitaliy Kovalchuk (High Priest John-Peter II in the former movement’s hierarchy). The divorce caused a split among the remaining members, several dozens of whom continued to operate underground in both the Ukraine and Russia. After unsuccessfully attempting to register with authorities what they claimed to be a cleaned-up movement, the followers of Tsvigun and Krivonogov reverted to semi-underground operation.

The name of the movement alludes to an interest in, and the claim to have been initiated into, the ancient esoteric wisdom of “the White Brothers.” This “Great Brotherhood” is thought to be a fraternity of enlightened spiritual beings, or the “sixth race,” who after their ascendance from mortals to the higher realm remain responsible for the spiritual progress of human beings. This claim seems to indicate Krivonogov’s and Tsvigun’s familiarity with ideas of Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), co-founder of the Theosophical Society; with works of Helena Roerich (1879–1955) and Nicholas Roerich (1874–1947), founders of the Agni-Yoga Society, which was highly popular in the late Soviet Union (1970s–1980s); and with the legacy of Omram Mikhael Aivanhov (1900–1986), the Bulgarian mystic and founder of the Universal White Brotherhood, who became well known in Russia in the late 1980s. Krivonogov’s early teachings were also influenced by various other alternative techniques and teachings that were available in the emerging Soviet New Age movement, and the more broad cultic milieu of the 1980s, such as bio-energetics, various forms of yoga and meditation, Neuro-Linguistic Programming, and the like. Reference to Eastern religious teachings is evident in the names adopted by the leaders (Swami and Devi). At the same time, in the early days the GWB emphasized the ability of the leaders to provide therapeutic remedies and to enhance the human potential of its followers. As the religious community developed, however, millenarian features became increasingly prominent and were grafted onto the Christian apocalyptic motifs of Living God, God’s Sacrifice, Resurrection, and Redemption. These millenarian features were embodied in the teaching of Yusmalos.

Yusmalos (a contraction of the two first names of the leaders and logos) depicted the current state of the world in dualistic terms as governed by a Satanic conspiracy on the one hand, but, on the other hand, blessed with the presence of the Living God, which gave prospects for salvation to “144,000 saints” (an apparent reference to the biblical book of Revelation). The early teachings of the GWB had strong political overtones, with both anti-Western and anti-Communist elements. The Satanic conspiracy was occasionally referred to as “American-Israeli” or “Jewish-Masonic,” and only Slavs could be the elect few; God was said to be “Russian.” At the same time, the post-Communist reality was seen as a hangover of Communist injustices, which could only be overcome by the establishment of a strong theocracy based on the “true religion.” The “sacrifice” of Maria Devi Christos was seen as the beginning of the new era of “divine theocracy.” It remains unclear, however, whether her “death” was expected to be a physical or purely symbolic act.

During the early 1990s, dozens of small “Usmalian” communities organized around these beliefs emerged in Russia and Ukraine, which had the recognizable features of world-rejecting millenarian groups anticipating the imminent end of the world. Their young members (some under 18) were expected to sever all ties with their biological parents, adopt an extremely ascetic lifestyle, and devote all their time to spreading the message. Indeed, in 1992–1993, all major Russian and Ukrainian cities were covered with leaflets featuring Maria Devi Christos and her stark message of the impending catastrophe and repentance.

After the failure of the end of the world to materialize and the split in the leadership, the millenarianism of GWB diminished considerably. Maria Devi Christos renounced its most controversial features and attributed their origins to the “evil” influence of her former husband. Since 1994, followers have tended to claim that the movement stemmed from the “respectable” traditions of Theosophy and Agni Yoga. Maria Devi Christos has published several books of poetry with the message of love and happy family life as ways to achieve eternal salvation, that is, to become members of the “sixth race” that will survive the Final Judgment and inherit the Earth (a clear reference to Helena Roerich’s ideas from Agni-Yoga). Similar changes have occurred in the movement’s practices, which have evolved from strong asceticism and hostility to the outside world to more moderate attitudes and even attempts to cooperate with public institutions. At the same time, the movement still sees the West, in particular the United States, as evil, believes in the “Judeo-Masonic” conspiracy, and claims the salvationist mission of the Slavic people. The continuing semi-underground existence of the GWB makes it difficult to know the extent to which these changes have affected different subgroups within the movement. This is compounded by continuing persecution of members of the GWB by police and local authorities in Russia and Ukraine.

The early activities of the GWB served as one of the triggers of the Russian and Ukrainian anti-cult movements. The anti-cultists exaggerated the GWB’s controversial features and numerical significance to point to the general dangers from a spectrum of religious groups that emerged en masse in the former Soviet Union in the early 1990s. The very name of the group became synonymous with a dangerous destructive cult that capitalizes on vulnerabilities of hapless post-Soviet youth. The anti-cultists took the figure of 144,000 “destined to salvation” as representing its actual membership whereas in reality the movement is unlikely to have had more than 1,000 members at the peak of its activities.

Great Zimbabwe

In 1871, Europeans discovered Great Zimbabwe, the large medieval (abandoned) city located on the plains between the Limpopo and Zambezi rivers. It is the largest prehistoric stone structure in sub-Saharan Africa and it presented a problem as their understanding of the “primitive” state of the local inhabitants kept them from ascribing its construction to their ancestors. It was 60 years later before more thorough archaeological investigation proved that the Shona, the Bantu people whose presence in the area was dated back to fifth century CE, were responsible for the complex of buildings. The initial construction of the city, which encompassed some 1,800 acres, is now dated to around 1100 CE. Its growth and habitation continued through the mid-15th century.

Once its origin was understood, the story of Great Zimbabwe quickly unfolded. At its height, Great Zimbabwe would have been home to upwards of 20,000 people. Of these, the majority resided in those parts of the site now called the Hill Complex and the Valley Complex. Those of higher status, including the religious functionaries, lived on the higher land, while those of lower status (the workers and herdsman) inhabited the valley.

Placement of the city was dictated on the one hand by the nearby substantial gold deposits and on the other by the nearby location of pre-existing trade routes. The main problem was water, a scarce resource, though grasslands for cattle and wildlife were abundant. Overcoming the water shortages, the city flourished for more than three centuries. Its far-reaching trade has been documented from as far away as China and Persia. It continued to produce a variety of goods from the iron forge it operated close by.

Much of the interest in Great Zimbabwe is directed toward a third component of the complex called the Great Enclosure. The 32-foot-high wall of the enclosure was constructed without mortar. Inside its circumference (800+ feet), there are brick altar-like structures, interior walls, pillars, and stone monoliths.

The Great Enclosure at Great Zimbabwe, most likely built by the Bantu-speaking Shona. Great Zimbabwe, which comprises 100 acres of stone buildings, was the center of a thriving trade region up until the 15th century. (Corel)

Research into the uses of the Great Enclosure (both religious and secular) has been hampered by modern alterations of various features, including the removal and relocation of some of the pillars. Enough remains, however, that scholars have discerned that the builders had some knowledge of astronomy. A pattern on the southeast corner of the outer wall, for example, appears to mark the Summer Solstice, and a large interior passageway appears to be positioned to align with the Milky Way during the Summer Solstice. This latter observation resonates with the worldview of the local residents in which the Milky Way plays a prominent role. Other markers in the Great Enclosure appear to indicate the arrival of the Spring and Fall equinoxes.

The residents abandoned Great Zimbabwe in the middle of the 15th century. The most likely explanation is that they exhausted the local grassland and used up the forest, though the lack of written records may mean that the real reasons are forever lost.

In 1986, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) designated Great Zimbabwe a World Heritage Site.

■ Greece

The Greek peninsula and its associated islands, which constitute the modern nation of Greece, have been inhabited for some 5,000 years. The main body of the peninsula and its associated islands jut out into the Mediterranean Sea and its several adjacent local bodies of water—the Adriatic Sea, the Sea of Crete, and the Ionian Sea. Greece’s northern border is shared with Albania, Macedonia, Bulgaria, and Turkey. It is home to 10.2 million people.

In the second millennium BCE the Achaean people emerged as the ruling elite of the region. They founded the Mycenaean Empire, covering present-day Greece and Crete. The Dorians swept through the area and rose to dominance as the first millennium BCE began. Over the next centuries a set of city-states arose in the area. In the eighth century the increase in population and lack of resources forced the Greeks to turn outward to the Mediterranean Sea. They became great traders, established colonies throughout the region, and made Greek the language of international commerce.

During the sixth century, Athens began its rise to prominence among the city-states, and during several centuries of prosperity great strides were made in the setting down of laws, scientific observations, literature, and philosophical thought, developments that have had implications for all humankind. The growing influence of Greece culminated in the rise of Philip of Macedonia, who subdued the peninsula. Philip’s son, Alexander the Great (r. 336–323 BCE), built an empire that included North Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, Persia, and territory as far as India. The fracturing of Alexander’s empire after his early death set the stage for the rise of Rome. Rome conquered Greece in 146 BCE.

Greece remained a part of the Roman Empire for many centuries. When in the fourth century CE the empire was divided, Greece was tied to the eastern part of the empire, known as the Byzantine Empire because its capital was Byzantium (later called Constantinople, and later still, Istanbul); as Christianity was established as the religion of the empire, Greece was brought under the hegemony of the Eastern Orthodox Church. Greece was under the direct authority of the patriarch in Constantinople.

Constantinople fell to the Turkish Muslims in 1456, and within a few years Greece also fell. The Turks remained in Greece as an occupation force for the next four centuries and in 1718 formally incorporated Greece into the Ottoman Empire. By the beginning of the 19th century, the Ottoman Empire was showing its weakness, and in 1830 the Greeks were able to force the creation of an independent Greek state, minus the area in the northeast around Thessalonica. The country was ruled by a king through the rest of the century, but in 1911 a Parliament was created. The country was overrun by the Nazis during World War II. Political instability has marked the postwar decades, the country reaching its lowest point during the harsh repressive military dictatorship that began in 1967. The dictatorship ended in 1974. Since 1975 the country has operated under its new democratic Constitution.

The introduction of Christianity to Greece is described in the New Testament as resulting from a dream experienced by the Apostle Paul during which he heard a call to come to Macedonia. He subsequently traveled through the land, stopping at Thessalonica, Berea, Philippi, Corinth, and Athens. He later wrote letters to believers in Thessalonica, Philippi, and Corinth that became part of the Christian scriptures.

The rise of Christianity to a position of power in the Roman Empire led to its pushing aside the Pagan faith that had previously dominated in Greece and the other religions that had come to Greece along the trade routes established across the Mediterranean and through Alexander's kingdom. Christianity completely replaced what had come before though it was deeply influenced by the philosophy that had grown out of the encounter of Greek religion and the East, especially by the thought of Plato and the neo-Platonists, Judaism alone surviving. Over the next centuries the theology and liturgy of the Eastern Orthodox Church developed, and the Orthodox Church distinguished itself on various points from the Roman Catholic Church of the Latin-speaking part of the empire. Authority in the Eastern Greek-speaking church came to be shared by the patriarchs in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria.

The takeover of Greece by Turkey did not greatly change the church's position in Greek society, though the church became one symbol of the Greek people's survival during the long years of Turkish rule. However, after the coming of independence in 1830, a break with the Ecumenical Patriarchate followed. In 1833, the government issued the first formal statement declaring an independent national church free from the authority of the patriarch, who still resided in Turkish territory. It was not until 1850 that the independence of the church was recognized. Not included in the jurisdiction of the Orthodox Church of Greece are some of the Greek islands, still in the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, and most important, the independent Monastic Republic of Mount Athos.

In 1924, the Church of Greece made what many considered a crucial change in adopting the Gregorian calendar, which replaced the traditional Julian calendar. This move was seen by many as a step away from the received tradition of the church and led to major schism by bishops, priests, and parishes who continued to adhere to the Julian calendar. Over the years, the True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece has further divided over the issue of cooperation with the Church of Greece, which has participated in the larger ecumenical movement, even to the point of joining the World Council of Churches.

The Church of Greece remains the faith of the overwhelming majority of Greek citizens, but almost immediately after it came into being as an autonomous body, it had to make room for other Christian churches. Some posed little problem, such as churches like the Episcopal Church, the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin), or the Ancient Church of the East, which served small expatriate communities and offered no program for proselytization. However, in 1858, a Protestant movement, later known as the Greek Evangelical Church, was the first of a number of Protestant and Free church bodies that attempted to develop missions in Greece. At various times these churches have faced severe repression and in recent decades were the object of concern of the Greek police, who considered them subversive of national policy.

The most successful of non-Orthodox bodies have been the Jehovah's Witnesses, who began activity in Greece in 1900. They have also been the group that has received the most attention from both the Orthodox Church and the state in its attempt to protect the position of the church in Greek life. During the 1990s, the arrest of Jehovah's Witnesses led to the Greek government receiving two significant judgments from the World Court for violations of religious freedom documents to which it had agreed. These rulings have eased the situation in Greece somewhat.

During the 1960s, although not open to the new religions that were otherwise proselytizing throughout Europe, Greece became a setting for the development of the Western Esoteric tradition in the phase that came to be known as the New Age movement. Many New Age devotees described their work as nonreligious, though it was spiritual.

Greek Catholic Church

In 1829, the sultan of the Ottoman Empire rescinded the law requiring Roman Catholics following an other-than-Latin liturgical order to be subject to the Orthodox Church. That law had meant that the small number of Greek Catholics in Greece and Turkey worshipped in churches under the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, based in Istanbul. The small community of Greek Catholics, now allowed to have their own congregations, began to grow in the 1850s after missionary work was launched among the Greek Orthodox by a Roman Catholic priest. A modest number of parishes emerged through the remainder of the 19th century. In 1895, the Assumptionist Fathers settled in Constantinople, where they oversaw a Greek seminary and two parishes. In 1911, Pope Pius X organized the Greek Catholic parishes in Turkey into an exarchate and appointed Isaias Papadopoulos as the first bishop.

In the 1920s, almost all of the Greek Catholics moved to Athens, the result of an agreement between the two countries for a general relocation of expatriates to their homeland. The emergence of a body of believers in Greece affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church has caused considerable tension over the years in a land in which the Greek Orthodox Church is considered the national religious body. The Greek Orthodox Church has actively opposed both Protestant and Catholic presence in the country, but is especially opposed to the Greek Catholic Church, which it sees as easily confused with an Orthodox church. Catholics must conform to a set of special laws designed as obstacles to any movement of Orthodox believers into the Greek Catholic Church.

The several parishes of the Greek Catholic Church have a total membership of 2,325 (2009). There is still one parish in Istanbul. The church is led by Bishop Dimitrios Salachas (b. 1939), who took office in 2008.

Greek Evangelical Church

The roots of the Greek Evangelical Church can be traced to the work of Jonas King (1792–1869), a Congregationalist minister sent to Greece by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions following the Greek War for Independence that ended in 1828. He settled in Greece, met and married a Greek woman, started a school, engaged in welfare work, and preached as opportunity allowed. In 1848 the authorities arrested and deported King. Through the influence of the American government, he was eventually allowed to return.

It was not until 1866, just three years before King's death, that the first community of a future church was organized. King was by this time being aided by a young man, Michael Kalopothakis, who had been present at King's trial in 1848 and as a result had converted to Protestantism. He went to New York, studied at Union Theological Seminary, and then returned to his native land. He led in the erection of the first church building in 1871. By 1885 three congregations existed, and a synod was organized. In the meantime, evangelistic work had been conducted in the Greek community in Turkey by the British Mediterranean Mission. This effort was to have a significant effect upon the work in Greece. As a result of the Greek-Turkish War of 1922, many Greek people left Turkey and returned to Greece. As a result of the sudden jump in membership that followed, the synod was reorganized as the Greek Evangelical Church.

The church is conservative in its theology and places great emphasis on the authority of the Bible. It has developed a strong Sunday school and youth program. The church is headed by a general assembly that meets semi-annually.

In the years since World War II, the church appears to have attained a stable position in Greek society, though many still consider it a foreign element in Greek culture. It continues to evangelize and has developed a broad social service program. In the 1990s it opened a mission in Albania.

In 2005 the church reported approximately 5,000 members. Affiliated churches can now be found in Cyprus, Germany, and the United States, where many members have immigrated. It is a member of both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Reformed Ecumenical Council, as well as the World Council of Churches.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa

This is the second-ranking autocephalous church in the Eastern Orthodox communion and includes all the Orthodox Christians on the continent of Africa.

The city of Alexandria was founded by Alexander the Great in 332 BCE, and it quickly became one of the great cultural and political centers of the ancient world. According to tradition, Saint Mark the Evangelist brought Christianity to the city in the first century CE, and the new religion began to spread in the sizable Jewish community that had long flourished there. By the end of the second century Christianity had been embraced by the majority of the city's Greeks and was growing in the local Egyptian population, and a renowned catechetical school had been established. The community was persecuted by the Roman emperors in the third century, but came into its own after Constantine's Edict of Milan granted religious freedom to Christians in 313.

The Church of Alexandria was soon torn by theological controversies and efforts to suppress various heresies that sprang up. The Byzantine emperors enforced the Christological teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451), which had the support of local Greeks but was rejected by the great majority of the Egyptian Christian population. When the Arab armies took Alexandria in 642, the Egyptian Christians were free to organize themselves into what eventually became today's Coptic Orthodox Church. The Arabs singled out the Greek minority for special persecution because of their links to the former Byzantine rulers. The Turkish conquest of Egypt in 1517 brought an end to the persecutions but gave rise to a greater dependency on the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople. Some of the Greek patriarchs began to live in Constantinople, and at times the ecumenical patriarch appointed them to office. The Alexandrian Patriarchate sank deep into poverty and often had to turn to the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) for support. The church experienced a renaissance in the 19th century when the Egyptian rulers began to encourage Greeks to settle in Egypt. After 1846 the patriarchs resided permanently in Egypt once again, and the involvement of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in the administration of the Alexandrian Church ended in 1858.

Patriarch Meletios II (1926–1935) promulgated a new set of regulations for the Patriarchate and modified his title to include “of All Africa” in the place of the former “of All Egypt.” His successor Christophoros recognized a spontaneous movement of indigenous Africans toward Orthodoxy that began in Uganda and spread to Kenya and Tanzania. By 1998 there were more than 100 African Orthodox priests in East Africa, presided over by the world's first black African Orthodox bishop. The growing membership among Africans compensated for the shrinking of the Greek community in Egypt.

The Patriarchate is governed by regulations that provide for a synodal system of administration and a process of patriarchal election that involves both clergy and laity. The Holy Synod, made up of at least 7 metropolitans (currently 24), must meet at least once a year but ordinarily gathers semiannually. Through the efforts of Archbishop Makarios III of Cyprus, an Orthodox Patriarchal School was opened in Nairobi in 1981. The membership of the Patriarchate today includes approximately 100,000 black Africans and 150,000 others, mostly ethnic Greeks scattered across the continent. It is an active member of the Middle East Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East

This is the third-ranking autocephalous church in the Eastern Orthodox communion. It includes the Orthodox Christians in Syria, Lebanon, and other parts of the Middle East.

Founded in 300 BCE, the city of Antioch quickly became one of the most important urban centers of the eastern Mediterranean. The new religion arrived very early in the city; according to the New Testament book of Acts (11:26), it was there that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians. The single-bishop model of church government appears to have originated in Antioch, and most scholars agree that the Gospel of Matthew was composed there. The growing community was periodically persecuted in the third century CE, but flourished after Emperor Constantine's Edict of Milan (313) granted freedom of worship to Christians. The School of Antioch was renowned as a center of biblical studies advocating a literal interpretation of scripture and emphasis on both the humanity and divinity of Christ.

The Council of Chalcedon (451) established Antioch as a patriarchate but reduced its size by ceding much of its territory to Constantinople and the new Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Chalcedon also triggered a schism within the Church of Antioch, the larger portion rejecting the Christological teaching of the Council and eventually forming what is today the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East. After Antioch fell to the Arabs in 638, the Greeks who allied with Byzantium and who had accepted Chalcedon experienced many years of persecution. The Greek Patriarchate prospered again from 969, when the Byzantine Empire regained the city, until 1085, when it fell to the Seljuk Turks. During this period of Byzantine rule the older West Syrian liturgy of Antioch was replaced by the Byzantine liturgy. In 1098 the Latin Crusaders took Antioch and established a kingdom that lasted nearly two centuries. A line of Latin patriarchs was set up, while a Greek succession continued in exile.

The Greek Patriarchate returned to Antioch after the city was taken by the Egyptian Mamelukes in 1268. By now Antioch had been reduced to a small town, and the Patriarchate moved permanently to Damascus in the 14th century. The area fell to the Ottoman Turks in 1516 and remained under their control until World War I. The Christians of the area had been reduced to a minority, and the church was further weakened by the activity of Western missionaries. A domestic quarrel among the Orthodox resulted in the election of two patriarchs in 1724, one Catholic and one Orthodox, and the church split into separate Greek Orthodox and Melkite Greek Catholic communities. Even though in recent centuries the faithful have been composed almost entirely of Arabs, the line of ethnic Greek patriarchs continued until 1898, when the last Greek patriarch was deposed. An ethnic Arab patriarch was elected the next year, and all subsequent patriarchs have been Arabs.

Today the Patriarchate's Holy Synod is composed of the patriarch and all the active metropolitans. Meeting at least annually, it has the purpose of electing the patriarch and other bishops, preserving the faith, and taking measures against violations of ecclesiastical order. There is also a General Community Council made up of the Holy Synod and lay representatives. Meeting twice a year, this body is responsible for financial, educational, juridical, and administrative matters. When a new patriarch needs to be chosen, the council selects three candidates, one of which is then elected by the Holy Synod. Patriarch Ignatius IV (elected 1979) has been very active in the ecumenical movement and has encouraged dialogue with the Syrian Orthodox Church and the Melkite Catholic Church in an effort to reunite the three main segments of the ancient Antiochian patriarchate. In 1970, the Patriarchate established St. John of Damascus Academy of Theology, located near Tripoli, Lebanon, which in 1988 was incorporated into Balamand University.

There has been extensive immigration from the homeland of this church in Syria and Lebanon to various parts of the world in recent decades, especially to North and South America. The Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese of North America also includes a number of Western-rite parishes, for the most part composed of former Episcopalians. The archdiocese maintains a website at <http://www.antiochian.org>. The total membership of the patriarchate today is about 750,000.

Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem

This is the fourth-ranking autocephalous church in the Eastern Orthodox communion. It includes the Orthodox Christians living in Israel, Palestine, and Jordan.

The earliest Christian community in Jerusalem was decimated by the Roman destructions of the city in 70 and 135 CE. By the time the church in Palestine was organized in the late second century, the bishop of Jerusalem was subordinate to the metropolitan of Caesarea Maritima within the Patriarchate of Antioch. After peace was granted to Christians by Constantine in 313, Jerusalem became a great center of Christian life and pilgrimage, in part because of the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre and other churches built by Constantine and his mother, Helen. Given its newfound importance, the Council of Chalcedon in 451 made Jerusalem a patriarchate ranking immediately after Antioch in status.

Christian Jerusalem suffered a terrible disaster in 614 when it was sacked by invading Persians, who destroyed most of its churches and monasteries. In 637 the city surrendered to the Arab armies that had besieged it for four months, and subsequently under Arab rule much of the population gradually converted to Islam.

In 1099, Jerusalem fell to the Crusaders, who established a Latin kingdom that endured for almost a century. Rome created a Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem, but a line of Greek patriarchs continued in exile, usually residing in Constantinople. They began to live in or near Jerusalem again following the destruction of the Crusader kingdom by the Seljuk Turks in 1187. In 1247 the city was taken by the Egyptian Mamelukes, and in 1516 it fell to the Ottoman Turks, who ruled the city for 400 years.

Under Ottoman rule various Christian groups frequently struggled for control of the holy places in Jerusalem. In the mid-19th century the Turks confirmed Greek control over most of them. This arrangement remained in place under the British mandate beginning in 1917 and under subsequent Jordanian and Israeli administrations.

Even though most of the Patriarchate's faithful, including most of the married parish priests, have long been ethnic Arabs, since 1543 all the patriarchs of Jerusalem and most of the bishops have been ethnic Greeks drawn from the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulchre, a monastic community headquartered in the Monastery of St. Constantine and St. Helena in Jerusalem. This has been a source of tension, which broke into the open several times in the 19th century and which continues today. The Holy Synod has vigorously resisted efforts to promote ethnic Arabs to the Episcopate and eventually the Patriarchate, and has continued to affirm its Greek character.

Under its current charter, the Patriarchate has both a synod and a mixed council. The patriarch presides over the Holy Synod, which can have no more than 18 members and is composed of metropolitans and provincial bishops as well as titular bishops and archimandrites appointed by the patriarch. Questions are decided by majority vote; ties are broken by the patriarch. The mixed council, composed of laity and clergy and over which the patriarch also presides, provides for lay input into the decision-making process.

The Patriarchate is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Middle East Council of Churches. At present it has jurisdiction over Jordan, Israel, and the areas under the control of the Palestinian Authority. Total membership is estimated at 200,000, with no more than 3,500 remaining in Jerusalem itself.

GREENLAND

Greenland, the world’s largest island, is located in the North Atlantic between Iceland and the more northerly islands of Canada. Most of Greenland’s 836,330 square miles is covered in ice the year round and thus sparsely populated (57,600 in 2008). It was originally settled by Inuit people (Eskimos), and they remain the dominant element of the population. The majority of people live along the southwest coast, where the capital Nuuk (or Godthåb) is located.

Greenland played an important role in history as a staging area for the Viking exploration of America. Eric the Red established a colony in the 10th century that lasted until the 14th century. The land was rediscovered in the 16th century. In 1815 Denmark claimed it as a colony and established a new Danish settlement in 1894. It was made an integral part of Denmark in 1953, and Greenlanders elected two members to the Danish Parliament (the Folketing). Denmark granted local autonomy in 1979 but maintains hegemony over Greenland’s foreign affairs.

Danish Lutherans established work in Greenland in 1721, and Lutheranism retains the allegiance of the majority of the population. The dean of the church, who lives in the capital, works under the bishop of the Lutheran Church in Denmark who resides in Copenhagen. The majority of the Inuit have been baptized, but there is evidence of some continued allegiance to their pre-Christian faith in the far north. The traditional religion was built around the veneration of a female deity, called variously Nerrivik or Sedna, the Old Woman of the Sea.

During the 20th century, a spectrum of churches, from the Roman Catholic Church to the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Jehovah’s Witnesses, developed congregations, but all have had relatively little success. Pentecostals from several Scandinavian countries arrived in the years after World War II, and the Christian Brethren, who had had great success in the Faeroe Islands, initiated work in 1970.

papal power in his clash with Henry IV (r. 1084–1105), the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire.

The future pope was born in poverty and obscurity around 1021 at Soana in Tuscany, Italy. The young Hildebrand was given a way up and out of his parents' life through his education in a monastery in Rome and the subsequent opportunity to attend the Lateran school. As a teenager, he joined the Benedictine Order, where he was recognized for his intellect and skills. He was invited to the Vatican and served a variety of diplomatic roles to several popes. The arbitrary nature of kingly rule manifested during the reign of Gregory VI (1046–1047), when he was exiled from Rome; however, Leo IX (r. 1049–1054) brought him back to Rome and actually paved the way for Hildebrand's own path to the papacy. Leo campaigned against simony (the purchasing of ecclesiastical office) though he is remembered as the pope at the time of the official break between Rome and the Eastern Orthodox Church. Hildebrand would live to see him under house arrest for a year after his army was defeated by a rising Norman kingdom in southern Italy.

Hildebrand would work for the election of the man who became Pope Alexander II (r. 1061–1073) and assist him in developing a program to further needed reforms. He also used his diplomatic skills to bring about a reconciliation with the Normans. Thus it was almost expected when in 1073, following the death of Alexander II, Hildebrand was elected pope.

As Gregory VII, the new pope moved quickly to continue the reforms he had helped institute during the previous two decades. He began with a decree against simony. He then forbade the practice of lay investiture. It was common in Germany, France, and England, for example, for the ruler to formally hand over the lands attached to the diocese along with the symbols of the bishop's office to each new bishop. Rulers opposed Gregory's measures and in places ignored him as they continued installing bishops with the insignia of their office.

Henry IV reacted to Gregory in 1073 by declaring him deposed. Hildebrand responded by both deposing and excommunicating the emperor. In 1074, with his throne at stake, the emperor backed away and submitted to the papal decisions. Gregory absolved him for his actions, but the conflict did not end. In 1080, Hildebrand again excommunicated Henry IV, but public opinion now seemed to be on Henry's side. Henry IV took advantage of the situation and of Gregory's reduced support by marching on Rome. When he finally seized Rome in 1084, Gregory fled to his hometown, where he died on May 25, 1085.

Under Gregory, Rome experienced its greatest power relative to the secular states of Europe, but the Holy Roman Emperor also demonstrated the limits of that power. Gregory made a variety of claims that few others recognized, over additional territories, and moved more successfully to expand papal influence by establishing diplomatic relations with all the nations of Europe. Within the church, he moved on additional reforms, including the strengthening of the celibate clergy, and made an honest attempt to heal the rift with Constantinople.

Gregory was canonized in 1606 by Pope Paul V (r. 1605–1621), and his feast day was subsequently set for May 25.

■ Grenada

Grenada is an island off the Venezuelan coast, north of Trinidad and Tobago. To its west is the Caribbean Sea and to the east is the Atlantic Ocean. Its 133 square miles are home to 91,000 people (2009), over 90 percent of whom are of African descent. Two small islands to the north of Grenada, Carriacou and Petite Martinique, part of the Grenadine archipelago in the Windward Islands chain, are dependencies of Grenada. The remaining Grenadine islands are the nation of St. Vincent and the Grenadines.

When Christopher Columbus became the first European to discover Grenada in 1498, it was largely inhabited by the Carib people, who had previously displaced the Arawak people. The Spanish sailors who came to the island in the decades after Columbus overruled his name choice, and their name, Grenada, a reference to southern Spain, stuck. The Natives resisted any Spanish settlement and it was not until 1650 that the French fought a war with the inhabitants and conquered the island at the cost of all the Native population. The British almost immediately challenged the French, who began importing slaves from Africa to work the land. The British finally won control, under the Treaty of Versailles (1783), part of the complex settlement of the American Revolution. The British moved quickly to lay out sugar plantations and bring in large numbers of Africans to work them. Slavery was finally abolished in 1834.

Grenada remained under British control, first as a crown colony (1877), and then as an associate state within the British Commonwealth (1967), until becoming fully independent in 1974. In 1983, a Marxist military council took control of the island and attempted to establish a Socialist state. Six days later the island jumped on to the front page when it was invaded by forces from the United States and those of six other Caribbean nations. The Marxist leadership was ousted, and the following year, a general election re-established a democratic government, which has since remained in place.

The French brought the Roman Catholic Church to Grenada and a slight majority of the residents belong to it. In 1956, the Diocese of St. George was created. It was a suffragan diocese to the archdiocese of Port-of-Spain (Trinidad) until 1974, when it became a suffragan to the archdiocese of Castries (St. Lucia). The Diocese oversees parishes across Granada and on Carriacou and Petite Martinique.

As British power was established on the island, both the Anglican and Methodist churches arrived in 1784 and 1789, respectively. The congregations are now part of the Church in the Province of the West Indies and Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. The other church with multiple parishes is the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which arrived in 1903. Now the third largest group on the island, its work is part of its South Caribbean conference. There are also congregations of Pentecostals, the largest following going to the Pentecostal Assemblies of the West Indies and the New Testament Church of God (related to the Church of God [Cleveland, Tennessee]).

■ Guadeloupe

Guadeloupe, an overseas department of France, includes several islands in the northeast edge of the Caribbean Sea, the main three islands being Basse-Terre, Grande-Terre, and Marie-Galante. Nine of the islands, with a land area of 1,706 square miles, are inhabited by some 445,000 people (as of 2004).

The islands were originally inhabited by the Arawaks, who were in turn overrun by the Caribs. The Spanish attempted to invade the islands in 1493, but were driven off by the Caribs. Finally, the Caribs were defeated by the French in the 1630s, and the latter began to develop the sugar industry. They imported a number of Africans to work the plantations. By the early 18th century, the Africans had completely replaced the Caribs.

In 1815, France renounced the slave trade and restructured its Caribbean possessions as colonies. Slavery was abolished, and to build the labor force indentured servants from India were brought to the Island. Following World War II, Guadeloupe was designated an overseas department, a status granting it much local autonomy.

In 1523, the first missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church on the islands were killed by the Caribs, but later missionaries from the various orders (Capuchins, Dominicans, Jesuits) had more success following the establishment of French authority. In 1816, a prefecture for Guadeloupe and Martinique was established, and in 1850 Guadeloupe was named a suffragan diocese and attached to the Diocese of Bordeaux, in France. The first priest of African descent was ordained in 1925, and the first bishop in 1970. Today, Guadeloupen priests and nuns serve throughout the French-speaking world. The church counts more than 90 percent of the population as Catholic.

Protestant missionary efforts began with the Moravians, who started work in the West Indies in the 1750s. They had only modest success, however. Missionaries from the Reformed Church of France established substantial work, now existing as the Église Evangélique de la Guadeloupe. It has been eclipsed, however, by the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which entered the field in 1965 and is the largest Protestant body in the country. The Adventist churches are part of the French Antilles-Guiana Union Mission. Some success has also been registered by the Jehovah's Witnesses, who came to the islands in the mid-1930s.

A variety of Holiness and Pentecostal groups, most from the United States, have established small works in Guadeloupe since World War II, but most have only one or two congregations.

Indian immigrants from Tamil arrived as workers in the middle of the 19th century. They have developed and Micronesia in general. The lonely island, a mere 224 square miles, rests in the Pacific Ocean 1,000 miles east of the Philippine Islands. Some 176,000 people reside there.

The island was settled in prehistoric times by the Chamorro people, Micronesians. They first encountered Europeans when Ferdinand Magellan arrived in the area in 1521. The Spanish ruled the island and at various times in the last half of the 17th century attempted to exterminate the Native population. By the middle of the 18th century, fewer than 5,000 Chamorros were left alive. The present population is a product of intermarriage with the Spanish and with a number of Filipinos who migrated there along the Spanish trading route.

Guam came into U.S. hands in 1898 as a result of Spain's defeat in the Spanish-American War. After being reclaimed from Japanese control in 1944, it became a major U.S. military center. Guam was part of the trust assigned to the United States by the United Nations, which also began to urge the island's independence. Guam did not participate with the rest of the Marianas in the formation of the Federated States of Micronesia.

Guam remains an American territory. It has a semi-autonomous government that operates under the U.S. Department of the Interior. Residents are U.S. citizens, and the local political system is similar to the U.S. state governments. The island elects one representative (non-voting) to the U.S. House of Representatives. A third of the island is still controlled by the military.

During the Spanish era, the Roman Catholic Church became the dominant religion of the people, and with the intermarriage of the Chamorros with the Spanish and Filipinos, a unique form of Spanish Catholicism became institutionalized on the island. More than 90 percent of the population identify themselves as Roman Catholics.

The large number (more than 20,000) of U.S. military personnel on the island reflects the general spectrum of American religion. Military chaplains hold services for Catholic and Protestant and Free church believers. Jehovah's Witnesses are active on Guam, and there is one congregation of the Church of Christ, Scientist. Members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints were among the service men and women stationed there during World War II, and following the war the church organized congregations that reached out to local residents. The work on Guam is now designated the Micronesia Guam Mission.

Guan Yin's Birthday

Guan Yin (aka Kwan Yin; Kannon [Japan] and Chenrezig [Tibet]) is one of the most ubiquitous presences in the world of Chinese religion and among Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhists everywhere. Also known as Avalokitesvara (a male deity), Guan Yin is the goddess of compassion in Mahayana Buddhism. She also frequently graces the altar of Daoist temples throughout China, where she is frequently compared to the Virgin Mary in Roman Catholicism.

The veneration/worship of Avalokitesvara emerged in China in the third century CE, where it became especially identified with the Pure Land sect, which offered members the goal of rebirth in the heavenly Western Paradise. Three bodhisattvas—Amitabha Buddha, Mahasthamaprapta, and Avalokitesvara—are central to Pure Land practice. As the lord of compassion, Avalokitesvara is seen as an emanation of Amitabha or Amida Buddha (the leader of Pure Land) and as the guard of the world in the time between the departure of the historical Buddha and the future appearance of the coming Buddha, Maitreya.

Guan Yin was introduced in the Lotus Sutra, a Buddhist writing that appeared in 406 CE. Through the next centuries, Guan Yin would evolve as a female equated with Avalokitesvara. Vajrayana Buddhists (most identified with Tibet but also present in Mongolia and China) further popularized Guan Yin as a beautiful, white-robed goddess. She came to be known as the Perceiver of the World Sounds, that is, the cries of those who suffer. She works to relieve all suffering.

Several accounts are given of Guan Yin's origin, but the most popular relate to the story of Miao Shan, a seventh-century Chinese princess, who seems to be the source of the feminine representation of Guan Yin.

Miao Shan's parents did not appreciate their daughter, who at an early age expressed an overriding concern to help others. They berated her and forced her to do menial tasks. They finally allowed her to go to a convent, but asked the nuns to mistreat her. Given the barren land in which the monastery was located, they were amazed at her ability to gather wood and tend a flourishing garden.

When the king heard about these miracles, he decided that he was going to kill Miao Shan. After all, the nuns were supposed to have tormented her. But as his henchmen arrived at the monastery, a spirit came out of a fog of clouds and carried her away to safety on a remote island. She lived there on her own for many years, pursuing a life of religious dedication. She was later in a position to give of herself to save her father. Only after traveling to the island to meet the person who had saved his life, did he realize it was Miao Shan and repent of his bad treatment of her. At that moment, the 1,000 arms of 1,000 eyes of Avalokitesvara appeared and Miao Shan disappeared.

As early as the seventh century, Buddhist monks visited Putuo Shan, an island off the coast of Zhejiang, east of Ningpo and south of Shanghai. Later settling there, they built temples and identified this island as the place where Miao Shan had lived and devoted her life to healing and to saving sailors from shipwreck. They spearheaded both the identification of the island with Guan Yin and the veneration of her through northern China.

Guan Yin has numerous manifestations. She is depicted in various forms and her hand posed with appropriated mudras. She almost always is clothed in a long, flowing white robe or dress. She might be holding a rosary, a symbol of her devotion to Buddhism; the Lotus Sutra; a vase that pours compassion on to the world; or a willow branch. She is also seen as assisting barren women and is thus on occasion pictured, like the Virgin Mary, with a child in her arms.

Guan Yin's birthday is celebrated on the 19th day of the 2nd lunar month, usually in March on the Common Era calendar. It is a day for pilgrimages and events at the several temples and shrines in the island, but throughout the Mahayana and Vajrayana world it is acknowledged. In addition to her birthday, Guan Yin is saluted on two other days: her enlightenment day on the 19th day of the 6th lunar month (June) and her renunciation day—when she become a nun—on the 19th day of the 9th lunar month (September).

Guan Yin temples may now be found around the world. Prominent examples include the Kannon temples in northern Tokyo and in Kamakura, Japan; the temple on Waterloo Street in Singapore; Kek Lok Si Temple in Penang, Malaysia; and the Kuan Yin Temple in Honolulu, Hawaii, one of the oldest functioning Buddhist temples in the United States.

Through the centuries, Buddhist have also shown a particular penchant for erecting large statues of Buddha and the Buddhist bodhisattvas. Currently, the largest such statue is one of Guan Yin located at Sanya in Hainan Province of the People's Republic of China.

Completed in 2005, its stands 354 feet. (In contrast, the Statue of Liberty stands at a mere 151 feet.) The Guan Yin statue also eclipses the largest Buddha statue, located at Ushiku, Japan (328 feet), not to mention the well-known Buddha of Kamakura, a mere 36 feet.

■ Guatemala

The Republic of Guatemala is the most populous country in Central America, bordered by the Pacific Ocean to the west and the Caribbean Sea to the east, and adjacent to Mexico (west and north), Belize (north-east), Honduras (east), and El Salvador (southeast). The total population of Guatemala was 12,728,111, according to the July 2007 census. Most of Guatemala's population is rural, although urbanization is accelerating in the departmental capitals and in the national capital of Guatemala City (estimated population 2,156,348).

Guatemalan society is divided into two main ethnic categories: Amerindian and ladino. More than half of Guatemalans are descendants of indigenous Mayan peoples. Hispanicized Mayans and mestizos (mixed Spanish and Amerindian ancestry) are known as ladinos. However, the major factors for determining the size of the Amerindian population by the government have been language and dress, rather than race, which tends to underestimate the strength of the Amerindian population. According to Wycliffe Bible Translators' Ethnologue (2005), the population of Guatemala was 55 percent Amerindian, 44 percent mestizo, and about 1 percent other races. Fifty-four living languages are spoken in Guatemala (not including those spoken by immigrant groups) among 23 ethnolinguistic groups, with Spanish being the dominant language (about 44 percent, followed by the principal Mayan languages of Quiché, Mam, Cakchiquel, and Kekchí).

The current president of Guatemala (r. 2008–2012), Alvaro Colom Caballeros of the Unidad Nacional de la Esperanza (UNE), is a center-left politician, industrial engineer, and Mayan priest who studied traditional Mayan cosmology under the guidance of the priest Cirilo Pérez Oxjal, a respected Quiché leader and former president of the Consejo Continental de Ancianos de América. Colom was elected president in November 2007 due to the strong support he received from the politically mobilized Amerindian population that had grown tired of being marginalized by ladinos within Guatemalan society and was resentful of ladino dominance in national politics.

Christianity remains a strong and vital force in Guatemalan society, but its composition has changed during generations of political and social unrest. Historically, the dominant religion has been Roman Catholicism. In 1980, 84.2 percent of the population was reported to be Roman Catholic; 13.8 percent was Protestant (most of whom identified as evangelicals); and about 2 percent was identified with “other religious groups” (including traditional Mayan religions) or had “no religious affiliation.” However, by 1990, the Catholic population had declined to 60.4 percent (a decline of 24 percentage points), while the Protestant population increased to 26.4 percent (an increase of 12.6 percentage points); 2.1 percent were adherents to “other religions”; and 11.1 percent had “no religious affiliation” (CID-Gallup Poll, June 1990).

Surprisingly, during the decade of the 1990s, a series of public opinion polls revealed little change in religious affiliation between 1990 and 2001. However, between 2001 and 2006, the size of the Protestant population increased from about 25 percent to almost 31 percent in 2006, while the Catholic population remained relatively constant at 55 to 57 percent. Those affiliated with other religions also remained steady at 2 to 3 percent, while those with no religious affiliation declined to about 10 percent.

A characteristic of most cities, towns, and villages in Guatemala is the presence of a Catholic church situated on the central square or plaza. The Metropolitan Cathedral (original construction 1782–1815) in Guatemala City is a visible sign of the historical presence of the Catholic Church in the life of the nation.

The mestizo population of Guatemala has strong ties to traditional Roman Catholicism brought to the

GUATEMALA

Americas by Spanish missionaries, who themselves carried the cultural baggage of their Iberian homeland with its pre-Christian Celtic spirituality and medieval Roman Catholicism. Consequently, the general religiosity of the ladinos of Guatemala contains elements of European as well as Amerindian “popular Catholicism” (syncretism).

The Roman Catholic Church Conquistador Pedro de Alvarado y Contreras (1495–1541) and his army invaded Guatemala during 1523–1527 and subjugated many of the Amerindian peoples to even more than the customary atrocities. The Amerindians rapidly declined under the imposed system of slavery and heavy tribute. Alvarado was subsequently appointed governor of Guatemala by Charles I of Spain (r. 1516–1556) and remained its governor until his death.

Even before the conquest was complete, the Dominican friars had taken up residence among the Quiché and had begun the difficult task of converting the Mayans to the Catholic faith. In 1530, Father Francisco Marroquín (1535–1563) arrived from Spain to organize the Catholic Church in Guatemala, and in 1533 he was confirmed as the country’s first bishop. He gave special attention to the indigenous people and their languages, becoming particularly proficient in Quiché, into which language he translated the catechism.

Beginning in 1536–1537, Spanish friar Bartolomé de las Casas (1484–1566) established a Dominican convent at Santiago de Guatemala for the conversion of the natives, and applied methods of peaceful evangelization in the region of Vera Paz. Las Casas became well known for his advocacy of the rights of Amerindian peoples of the Americas, whose cultures he described with great care.

With the added assistance of the Franciscans, who entered the territory in 1541, the general “conversion of the Indians” was gradually accomplished, though the geography prevented extensive contact with remote Amerindian groups. In the early years of Spanish colonization, the Catholic clergy protected indigenous peoples who lived near the missions. Laws were passed in 1542 at the instigation of Catholic missionaries that attempted to eliminate some of the harsher practices of exploitation that had been imposed on Amerindians living in remote areas by Spanish authorities.

During the colonial period the Catholic Church was an agency of the Spanish Crown, although the friars’ evangelization methods sometimes occasioned conflict with the civil authorities. Catholicism in Guatemala developed around the veneration of the saints; local lay religious associations, called cofradías, were charged with caring for the saint's images in local communities. Cofradías in Guatemala are a mix of Spanish and Amerindian practices.

Santiago de Guatemala was made a diocese by Pope Paul III on December 18, 1534. The Diocese of Guatemala was raised to a metropolitan see by Pope Benedict XIV on December 16, 1743, with the dioceses of Nicaragua and Comayagua (Honduras) being subordinate to it. By 1750, more than 424 Catholic churches and 23 missions had been established in the territory of Guatemala.

The Diocese of San Salvador, erected by Pope Gregory XVI (r. 1831–1846) in 1842, and the Diocese of San José de Costa Rica, erected in 1850, also became part of the Metropolitan Church of Santiago de Guatemala. Together with the Archdiocese of Guatemala, these four subordinate dioceses (Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador, and Costa Rica) constituted the ecclesiastical Province of Central America.

Historically, the Roman Catholic Church has had a strong popular base among ladinos and Europeans but has met with more resistance in predominantly Amerindian areas of the country where indigenous religious beliefs and practices are maintained. Spanish missionaries played a critical role by establishing new religious, social, and economic structures in the colony; building monasteries, churches, and schools with forced Indian labor; and helping to organize the Mayan labor force for the new cacao and indigo plantations.

Independence from Spain in the 1820s and the emergence of a new economic class of coffee growers in the later 19th century, which included many German immigrants, weakened the hegemony of the Catholic Church. Politically, Guatemala achieved its independence from Spain in 1821–1823, after nearly 300 years of Spanish colonial rule, when the Captaincy-General of Guatemala became the United Provinces of Central America. In 1838, the independent Republic of Guatemala was created under rebel leader Rafael Carrera (1814–1865). In 1852, Carrera's government signed a Concordat with the Vatican, repealed the anticlerical legislation established under the rule of Francisco Morazán (r. 1829–1838), reinstated the Catholic religious orders, and allowed the Catholic clergy to operate the nation's few schools.

Following the death of Carrera in 1865, the Liberal Justo Rufino Barrios came to power (r. 1873–1885) and the Catholic Church was again subjected to harsh legislation. The Jesuits were again expelled, the archbishop and bishops were exiled, tithes were eliminated, convents and monasteries were closed, church property was confiscated, priests were prohibited from wearing clerical garb and were barred from teaching, religious processions were proscribed, and civil marriage was declared obligatory. These anticlerical laws so crippled the Catholic Church in Guatemala that it has never recovered its former influence. In addition, Barrios also declared "religious freedom" and invited Protestant denominations to establish churches and schools in his country.

It was not until the 1930s that the Roman Catholic Church began to recover some of its former power and prestige in Guatemalan society. Under the dictatorship of General Jorge Ubico (r. 1931–1944), the Catholic Church was able to exercise more political influence, but when Ubico was overthrown in 1944 by a coalition of progressive army officers and civilians who were intent on modernizing Guatemala, the Catholic Church felt that its own social and political power was being attacked.

During the 1940s and 1950s, the Catholic hierarchy and its lay organizations—the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and Catholic Action—joined forces with the Anti-Communist Party (PUA) and other right-wing organizations to counteract the liberalizing trends of the nation's democratically elected, reformist civilian governments during the period 1944–1954. Around 1949, a new Catholic reform movement began in Guatemala, called Acción Católica (Catholic Action), a militant lay Catholic organization engaged in the "re-conversion of Guatemalan Indians," among other things. Their tactics caused deep resentment in the traditional Mayan communities. This reform movement also produced renewed attacks by Catholics on the Protestants and on Bible reading.

In 1950, Colonel Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán (r. 1950–1954) won the presidency. He accepted support from the clandestine Guatemalan Communist Party before and after the election and later promoted the legalization of the Communist Party. Conservatives and officials of the Catholic Church used anti-Communist rhetoric to attack the Arbenz administration, which led to the triumph of the CIA-engineered, right-wing military coup d'état led by Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas.

Under President Castillo Armas's (r. 1955–1957) regime, thousands of people were killed in a purge of Communists and radical nationalists. At the same time, a new Guatemalan Christian Democratic Party was established in 1955 with strong support from the Catholic Church. The new government removed restrictions on the Catholic Church by allowing ownership of property, the entrance of foreign clergy and religious workers, Catholic religious instruction in the public schools, and wedding services officiated by priests. In turn, the Catholic hierarchy “blessed the military government” and supported its anti-Communist ideology and Cold War tactics.

One characteristic of this entire modern period, especially after the mid-1960s, was the frightful abuse of human rights by repressive, right-wing military dictatorships with the tacit support of the Conservative, anti-Communist elements within the Catholic hierarchy. Military and paramilitary counterinsurgency operations, mostly in the countryside against leftist guerrilla forces, led to the killing of tens of thousands of alleged “political dissidents and their supporters” between 1960 and 1996, many of whom were Mayans. Some exiled priests and nuns formed the “Guatemalan Church in Exile” and continued to try to draw international attention to the bloody civil conflict between repressive government armed forces and the “popular insurrection” led by leftist guerrilla rebels.

In response to the increasingly autocratic rule of General José Miguel Ramón Ydígoras Fuentes, who took power in 1958, a group of junior military officers from the military academy revolted (1960). When they failed, several went into hiding and became the nucleus of the 13th of November Revolutionary Movement (MR-13), which pursued armed insurrection against the government for the next 36 years (1960–1996). The civil war evolved into the brutal repression by military forces of all dissidents (including Catholic priests, nuns, and lay leaders), campesinos (rural peasants), and any indigenous communities suspected of collaborating with the insurgents.

The Guatemalan National Revolutionary Unity (URNG) was formed as a guerrilla umbrella organization in February 1982. Finally, in 1996, a peace accord signed by the Guatemalan government and the URNG ended the longest civil war in Latin American history. The URNG transformed into a legitimate political party.

During the 1950s, the Catholic Church was revitalized by the arrival of many new foreign priests, nuns, and other religious workers (mostly with a conservative political orientation), which provided needed resources for establishing new churches and schools and for expanding its social assistance efforts throughout the country. Some of the reforms introduced by the Second Vatican Council had a significant impact on the Mayans because the language of the liturgy was changed from Latin to vernacular languages; the change to Spanish was immediate, but increasingly the Mayan languages were used in indigenous areas.

In December 1973, the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) was established in Guatemala as a “laymen’s apostolic organization” authorized by the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church. The CCR gained popularity among middle- and upper-class Guatemalans until certain restrictions were implemented by Catholic authorities beginning in June 1974 under the supervision of a Pastoral Service Team, led by Monseñor Ramiro Pellecer. As a result, many “Spirit-filled” Catholics chose to leave the Catholic Church and join evangelical churches, especially in Guatemala City. By September 1979, the CCR had grown strong enough to fill the National Stadium during a rally led by Father Francis McNutt, then a Dominican priest.

The Catholic voice in Guatemala is often discordant as Catholics respond to a variety of social concerns. Individual Catholics frequently hold opinions that diverge from the hierarchy, and the hierarchy itself is not always unified. Within the Catholic Church in Guatemala social stances on issues such as abortion, ordination of women, and divorce tend to mirror those of the Vatican. Abortion is illegal in the Guatemalan Penal Code, but family planning is available in much of the country.

The modernization of the Catholic Church that came with the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) dovetailed with aspects of the older Catholic Action movement's agenda; there was a push for more direct pastoral involvement with social concerns. In Guatemala this resulted in a wave of cooperative and social organizing. Catholic Action's "Christian base communities" stressed education and consciousness-raising, and cooperated with one another throughout the highlands. They presented an alternative to both the guerrillas and the government, and, in many cases, peacefully supported the political goals of the guerrillas. This movement was attacked in the late 1960s and again in the late 1970s and early 1980s, when many priests and religious workers were killed or threatened.

During the 1970s, Catholic religious orders began an intensive missionary effort in isolated areas where indigenous groups practice Mayan spirituality. A school was established to train expatriate missionaries in the cultural practices of the indigenous groups, and in language acquisition, politics, and social concerns.

During the 20th century, the Catholic Church, as an institution, supported the status quo fostered by Conservative government policies that favored ladino society over Amerindian groups and that defended "national security" over human rights. However, a minority of Roman Catholic leaders (including bishops, priests, and nuns) dissented and opted to defend the interests of the poor and oppressed. Some of these priests and religious workers became martyrs for their faith during the Guatemalan civil war as well as in the aftermath.

The majority of the members of male Catholic religious orders in Guatemala have always been expatriates, primarily from Spain, Italy, and North America. Indigenous leaders were seldom trained. Native languages, values, and music were usually ignored and sometimes repudiated. In 1970, less than 15 percent of all Catholic clergy and religious workers were native Guatemalans.

In March 2009, the Guatemalan Catholic Church administered two archdioceses: the Archdiocese of Guatemala led by Archbishop Cardinal Rodolfo Quezada Toruño, appointed in June 2001, and the Archdiocese of Los Altos Quetzaltenango-Totonicapán (erected in 1996) led by Archbishop Oscar Julio Vian Morales, S.D.B., appointed in April 2007. In 2001, the 2 archdioceses reported a total of 14 dioceses and 428 parishes, which were served by 359 diocesan priests and 461 religious priests (for a total of 820), 6 permanent deacons, 769 male religious workers, and 2,059 female religious workers.

The Protestant Movement Pioneer efforts were made by English Baptist missionaries and laymen in the British colony of Belize to distribute the scriptures in the Spanish territory of Guatemala. The first known effort took place in 1824 when Joseph Bourne, an English Baptist missionary stationed in Belize Town, visited the ports of Ysabal in Guatemala and Omoa in Honduras.

Frederick Crowe (1819–1846), a young English seaman who had become a Baptist in Belize City in 1837, accepted an offer from the Eastern Coast of Central America Commercial and Agricultural Company in January 1841 to move to the new settlement of Abbottsville, where he worked as a school teacher and served as a voluntary chaplain. While residing in Abbottsville, Crowe made a difficult journey to Guatemala City as a missionary and Bible salesman (colporteur). Although Crowe was supported in his efforts by a few Liberal families, he was strongly opposed by the Catholic clergy and Conservative politicians, who forced his expulsion from Guatemala in April 1846.

Liberal President Justo Rufino Barrios (1873–1875) finally established freedom of speech and worship in Guatemala. Barrios also invited the Presbyterian Church of New York City (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) to send missionaries to Guatemala. Reverend John Clark Hill arrived in late 1882 to begin work in Guatemala City among 30 to 40 distinguished English-speaking foreigners who were already Protestants. The English worship services in Guatemala City, begun by Hill in 1882, were continued by James R. Hosmer and a succession of other pastors. Today, the nondenominational Union Church, located in Plazuela España, traces its founding to that date. This is the oldest Protestant church in Guatemala.

The third Protestant missionary organization to work in Guatemala was the Central American Mission (now known as CAM International, with headquarters in Dallas, Texas), which sent Mr. and Mrs. Edward Bishop to Guatemala City in 1899. The first CAM church established at a major intersection in the capital city became the "mother church" to hundreds of CAM congregations throughout the country. The Central American Evangelical Church Association (CAM-related) became one of the largest Protestant denominations in Guatemala and assumed an important role in training pastors and lay leaders for the whole non-Pentecostal evangelical movement, originally through its Central American Bible Institute (founded in 1926), superseded in 1965 by the Central American Theological Seminary (known as SETECA).

By 1935, other Protestant mission agencies were working in Guatemala. The Church of the Nazarene traces its origins to work begun in 1901 by missionaries affiliated with The Pentecostal Mission (TPM), which merged into the Church of the Nazarene in 1915. In 1902, the California Friends Mission (Quakers) began its ministry in the southeastern part of the country, near the border with Honduras and El Salvador, with headquarters in the Department of Chiquimula. The Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived in 1908 and began work in Guatemala City and Quetzaltenango, the nation's second largest city. The Christian Brethren began work in Guatemala in 1924 through the ministry of Carlos Kramer in Quetzaltenango, a German-heritage Guatemalan and former Presbyterian.

The Pentecostal movement had its origin in Guatemala in the ministry of the Reverend and Mrs. Amos Bradley, who served in Guatemala affiliated with the Pentecostal Holiness Church (PHC, organized in 1911 in North Carolina). The Bradleys were that denomination's first missionaries in Central America during 1913–1918, while serving in Guatemala and El Salvador. Previously, the Bradleys had been independent Holiness missionaries in Guatemala between 1909 and 1912.

In 1916, Thomas Pullin and Charles Furman of the United and Free Gospel Missionary Society (Turtle Creek, Pennsylvania) arrived in Guatemala with their wives to begin an itinerant evangelistic ministry in El Quiché, Totonicapán. In 1920, both couples returned to the United States to strengthen their base of support. When Furman and his family returned to Guatemala in 1922, they were affiliated with the PHC. In 1934, while on furlough in the United States, Furman joined the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) and returned to Guatemala to become that denomination's first missionary in the country. He proceeded to visit PHC churches and encourage the leaders to join him in the ranks of the Church of God, which resulted in 14 PHC churches switching their affiliation to the Church of God. By 1980, this Pentecostal denomination had grown to 664 churches and 234 missions with 34,451 members.

Pastors and missionaries of the Assemblies of God in El Salvador began work in the Department of Jutiapa, Guatemala, in 1927; however, it was not until 1937–1938 that Ralph Williams and John Franklin were successful in organizing the first six churches in Guatemala. By 1940, 20 churches had been organized and work had begun in 36 additional towns. Following a healing campaign by T. L. Osborn in Guatemala City in 1953, the Assemblies of God work began to grow more rapidly. In 1990, there were 1,385 churches, 2,329 preaching points, 1,630 ordained pastors, 2,379 lay pastors, 8 Bible institutes, and 224,751 adherents. Total baptized membership was estimated to be about 127,500 in 1990.

The Prince of Peace Evangelical Church Association was formed in 1956 by José María Muñoz in Guatemala City among a group of believers that had left the Central Assembly of God. Many of the early members of this new denomination had been members of other evangelical churches, but were drawn to Muñoz's ministry because of his popular radio ministry and powerful Pentecostal preaching. From a group of 100 in 1956, membership grew to 4,500 in 1967 and to 29,130 in 1980 with 567 congregations.

The Elim Christian Mission began as a house church in 1962 in Guatemala City, led by a well-known medical doctor and radio personality, Dr. Otoniel Ríos, who became an evangelical during the Evangelism-in-Depth campaigns in 1961. In 1973, Ríos terminated his medical practice to devote himself to a full-time pastoral ministry and building up a large central church, which grew to 3,000 members in 1979 after the congregation moved into a new auditorium. By 1980, the ministry of Elim included 147 congregations (churches and missions) with a total membership of 15,290, with a growing association of sister churches in El Salvador.

The Charismatic Renewal movement began in Guatemala during 1969–1970 with small group meetings among both Catholics and Protestants, some of which were led by Tim Rovenstine of World MAP.

Rovenstine was instrumental in bringing Catholics and Protestants together in the beginnings of the movement in the early 1970s, aided by visiting members of the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship, members of the Word of God Community in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and Father Francis MacNutt and his team of Charismatic leaders that included Methodist pastors Joe Petree and Tommy Tyson.

One of the main ecumenical bridges between Catholics and Protestants during the 1970s and 1980s was the John 17:21 Fellowship, which was associated with David du Plessis in the United States and Europe. However, a Latin American branch of the John 17:21 Fellowship was established by U.S. Charismatic pastors Robert Thomas, Paul Northrup, and Bill Finke (all former missionaries in Latin America), together with local leaders, in Guatemala City after the destructive 1976 earthquake, which resulted in massive relief and development operations by local and international service organizations. The Latin American branch of the John 17:21 Fellowship was coordinated by Robert Thomas (a pastor in Los Altos, California), who worked closely with Friar Alfonzo Navarro and the Catholic Missionaries of the Holy Spirit in Mexico City.

Protestantism in Guatemala has become a very diverse phenomenon after a century of growth and development since the first missionaries arrived. A 1978–1981 national survey of the Protestant movement in Guatemala conducted by a PROCADES-SEPAL (Proyecto Centroamericano de Estudios Socio-Religiosos/Servir a Pastores e Lideres) research team revealed the presence of more than 200 denominations and independent church associations with 334,453 baptized church members (15 years or older) in 1980. Between 1960 and 1980, the national Protestant average annual growth rate was 11.8 percent. The total Protestant population of Guatemala was estimated by PROCADES to be 13.8 percent in 1980, up significantly from a mere 2.8 percent in 1950.

Despite differences of tradition, doctrine, and practice, many of the leaders of the respective Protestant denominations in Guatemala met together periodically, although informally, to discuss common problems and resolve conflicts during the period 1909–1935. However, a formal structure was organized in 1935 to facilitate interdenominational cooperation, the Synod of the Evangelical Church in Guatemala. In 1951, the Evangelical Synod was restructured and its name changed to the Evangelical Alliance of Guatemala (AEG).

On February 4, 1976, Guatemala City and a large part of the country (16 of 22 departments) were severely shaken by a major earthquake that registered 7.5 on the Richter scale, which caused massive destruction and loss of life. Out of a total population of approximately 5,500,000, more than 22,000 were killed, more than 77,000 injured, and more than 1,000,000 made homeless. This was called the most severe natural catastrophe in Central America during the 20th century.

The response of Protestant denominations and service agencies, both national and international, to the survivors in the aftermath of this earthquake was swift and significant, in terms of both emergency assistance and more long-term community development activities. This produced a favorable reaction among those who received immediate as well as long-term assistance from evangelical organizations, with a resulting burst of growth in attendance and membership of evangelical churches.

With growing social strength in Guatemalan society, the Protestant community in general has taken more interest in the humanitarian problems and needs of the larger society and a more active role in community affairs, but not necessarily in politics. Their theology tends to be pre-millennial and their hope is that God will “rapture” them out of this present evil world to escape the Great Tribulation.

During the period 1960–1980, Guatemala became a showcase for the growth of the Protestant movement in Latin America, but the enthusiasm of evangelical leaders regarding continued high rates of church growth in Guatemala often exceeded the reality. A series of public opinion polls taken between 1990 and 2001 in Guatemala helped to correct some of the erroneous growth projections made by evangelical leaders: the CID-Gallup company reported that the Protestant population was 26.4 percent in May 1990 and 25 percent in April 1996. Early in 2001, SEPAL conducted a public opinion poll in Guatemala that showed Protestants to be 25.3 percent of the national population. Therefore, it seems clear that the size of the Protestant population had not changed in Guatemala in more than a decade, although the number of Protestant congregations had continued to increase: from about 6,450 in 1980, to 9,298 in 1987, to about 18,000 in 2001. It seems logical to assume that if the number of Protestant congregations grew by 258 percent between 1980 and 2001 that the total membership probably increased by a similar rate of growth. So why did the size of the Protestant population remain stable at about 25 percent between 1990 and 2001?

One possible explanation is that there may have been “a great falling away” (desertion or exodus) of Protestant adherents in Guatemala during the 1980s–1990s due to discouragement about the performance of evangelical politicians, such as General Efraín Ríos Montt (military dictator during 1982–1983) and Jorge Serrano (president during 1990–1993). During the 1980s, evangelical public opinion was divided for and against support for General Ríos Montt, who offended many people—Catholics and Protestants alike—by his public radio messages that blended anti-Marxist rhetoric with evangelical sermons. The leadership of the Evangelical Alliance of Guatemala, which represents most evangelical organizations in the country, decided to back off from publicly supporting Ríos Montt and to distance themselves from his government to avoid a possible negative backlash and persecution of evangelicals should General Ríos Montt be overthrown. When this happened in 1983, the expected backlash did not take place.

In 2001, Southern Baptist missionary Roger Grossman reported the following statistics on adherents, based on his extensive national research project: Assemblies of God (600,540), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (487,984), Independent (188,421), Prince of Peace Church (179,038), Seventh-day Adventist Church (175,849), Association of Central American Churches (162,175), Pentecostal Church of God (136,743), Church of the Nazarene (102,345), Elim Christian Mission (105,435), all Baptists (75,648), all Presbyterians (65,800), Bethany Church (60,000), MIEL (43,929), New Church of God (28,129), Galilee Church of God–Anderson, Indiana (25,705), Friends/Quakers (23,347), Church of God of Prophecy (22,984), Evangelical Mission of the Holy Spirit (18,790), Calvary Church (17,730), Verbo (14,649), Evangelical House of God (14,104), Living Water Church–Agua Viva (11,693), and Voice of God Church (11,047). All other Protestant groups had less than 10,000 adherents each.

In 2009, evangelical mega-churches (congregations with more than 2,000 members) in Guatemala City included the Christian Fraternity (Jorge H. López), the House of God Church (Carlos “Cash” Luna), El Shaddai Church (Harold Caballeros), Elim Central Church (founded by Dr. Othoniel Ríos Paredes, now called Iglesia de Jesucristo Palabra Mi–El Central), Showers of Grace Church (Dr. Ángel Edmundo Madrid Morales), and Ebenezer Ministries of Guatemala/Ebenezer Church of Christ (Sergio Enríquez).

Ecumenical relations in Guatemala are complex, with strong divisions between Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal leaders and their respective denominations. Nevertheless, many conservative evangelical leaders are represented by the Guatemalan Evangelical Alliance (Alianza Evangélica de Guatemala, AEG) at the national level, regardless of their denominational affiliation. However, a few of the most conservative denominations (called Fundamentalists) are not members of AEG and do not support its activities, such as the Trinitarian Bible Society (affiliated with the Independent Board of Presbyterian Foreign Missions), the Christian Brethren (Hermanos Libres), Baptist Bible Fellowship International, and the independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ. Internationally, AEG is affiliated with the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA), which is associated with the World Evangelical Alliance (WEF).

Also, the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC), has a few members in Guatemala. CLAI membership is divided into two categories: the only full-member is the Episcopal Church of Guatemala; fraternal members include the Evangelical Center of Pastoral Studies in Central America (Centro Evangélico de Estudios Pastorales en Centroamérica), located in Zona 2, Ciudad de Guatemala, and the Guatemalan chapter of the Mesoamerican Christian Community (Comunidad Cristiana Mesoamericana), also located in Zona 2, Ciudad de Guatemala.

Other Religions Between 2001 and 2006, those affiliated with other religions remained steady at 2 to 3 percent, while those with “no religious affiliation” (this includes agnostics, atheists, no preference, and no response) were about 12.5 percent, according to two polls: CID-Gallup in November 2001 and Latinobarómetro in 2006.

Included in the “other religions” category were non-Protestant marginal Christian groups: the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (see below), the Jehovah’s Witnesses (364 congregations with about 24,000 members and 68,650 adherents in 2005), Philadelphia Church of God, Yahweh’s House of God, Light of the World Church (Guadalajara, Mexico), Voice of the Cornerstone (Puerto Rico), Children of God (The Family International), United Church of Religious Science, Christadelphian Bible Mission, Growing in Grace Ministries International (Miami, Florida), and Mita Congregation and the People of Amos Church, both from Puerto Rico.

Mormon missionaries first arrived in Guatemala in 1947. The first official meeting was held in a rented building on August 22, 1948, with 66 people in attendance. Later that year, John F. O’Donnal baptized the first convert in Guatemala. By 1956, 3 small congregations with a membership of about 250 had been established. Membership grew to 10,000 by 1966, and 18 years later, when the Guatemala City Temple was dedicated in 1984, membership had risen to 40,000. By 1998, according to the church’s official statistics, membership had quadrupled again to 164,000. In 2007, the Mormon Church reported 1 temple and 418 congregations with 215,186 members. If these last statistics are valid, then the Mormon Church was larger than most Protestant denominations in Guatemala at that time. (Note: Roger Grossman’s 2001 study reported only 55,441 Mormon adherents nationally.)

There are three Eastern Orthodox denominations in Guatemala. (1) The Orthodox Catholic Church of North and South America (with headquarters in Akron, Ohio) ordained José Imre as bishop of Guatemala in 1990, with headquarters in Tiquisate, Department of Esquintla; this denomination operates a seminary in the municipality of Nueva Concepción, Esquintla. Prior to 1988, the Guatemala jurisdiction was known as the Catholic Orthodox Church of Guatemala and Latin America. (2) The Apostolic Orthodox Catholic Church of Guatemala was legally established in 1995 under the jurisdiction of Archbishop Antonio Chedraui, Metropolitan of Mexico, Central America, Venezuela, and the Caribbean, which is affiliated with the Holy Synod of the Patriarchy of Antioch (headquarters in Damascus, Syria). The Orthodox Parish of Guatemala is centered at the Orthodox Catholic Church of the Transfiguration (dedicated in 1997), which is located at the Rafael Ayau Orphanage in Zone 1 of Guatemala City and led by Hieromonje Padre Atanasio Alegría. Associated with this church body is the Orthodox Monastery of the Holy Trinity Lavra Mambré, which was founded in 1986 by Mother Inés Ayau García and Mother María A. Amistoso with the blessing of Metropolitan Damaskinos Papandreu. Although the monastery was originally located in Guatemala City, a new complex of buildings was constructed on the shores of Lake Amatitlán during the 1990s, under the leadership of Madre Inés. (3) The Orthodox Old Apostolic Catholic Church of Guatemala and Central America is led by Archbishop José Adán Morán Santos, with headquarters in Colonia Inde of Villa Nueva, a southern suburb of Guatemala City.

Guatemala is also now home to the spectrum of the world’s religions including the following: Animism, Baha’i Faith, Islam, Judaism, Chinese religions, Japanese religions (Mahikari Divine True Light), Buddhism, and Hinduism.

Buddhist organizations include Antigua Sangha (Vietnamese Zen); Buddhist Center of Guatemala City (Tibetan, Karma Kagyu, Diamond Way lineages); Friends of the Dharma; Kagyu Dak Shang Choling; Buddhist Center of Huehuetenango; Buddhist Group of Guatemala (Tibetan); Casa Tibet Guatemala (Lhundrup Tongpa Ling); and Losang Chogyel Study Group (Vajrayana, Tibetan, Gelugpa lineages).

Hindu organizations in Guatemala include International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organizations, Transcendental Meditation (TM, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace), and Vaisnava Mission.

Western Esoteric groups include Grand Universal Fraternity, the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae

Crucis (AMORC), Universal Gnostic Movement, New Acropolis Cultural Centers. Psychic-Spiritualist–New Age groups include the Spiritist Association, Guatemalan Heliosophical Network, Spiritual Magnetic School of the Universal Commune, Ishaya Techniques, Church of Scientology, the Unification Movement, Raelian Movement, and Silva Mind Control/Silvan Method.

Many of the Amerindian peoples practice religious syncretism, which combines their ancient animistic beliefs and practices with a Roman Catholicism imposed on them by civil and religious authorities during the Spanish colonial period (1521–1821). The result is a “popular Catholicism” that retains significant elements of Amerindian spirituality, which includes animistic beliefs and practices such as magic (white and black, good and evil), witchcraft (bujería), herbal healing (curanderismo), and shamanism (the shaman is an intermediary with the spirit world). Animistic beliefs are strongest among the Amerindians who are the least acculturated to ladino society, and who live in the central highlands or the rainforests of the lowlands in the Petén region of northern Guatemala. However, since the end of Guatemala’s civil war (1960–1996), there has been a resurgence of Mayan Spirituality in the predominantly Mayan areas of the Central Highlands, among both Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Also, Garifuna Religion (among the Black Carib) and Creole religion (among English-speaking West Indians: Myalism and Obeah) is practiced on the Caribbean coast in Livingston, Puerto Barrios, and surrounding areas. In addition, there are numerous psychics, mediums, clairvoyants, and astrologers who announce their services in local newspapers.

is the home to no less than 16 different African peoples, among whom the Fulahs, Mandingos, Malinkes, and Susses form the largest blocs in the population.

Guinea was a rich land, with notable gold deposits in its northern highlands. At various times through the centuries, parts of Guinea were incorporated into empires ruled from neighboring power centers. They were, for example, on the edge and frequently part of the various Fulani states centered in Senegal and Mali. Then in 1870, a man named Samori (1840–1900) rose from humble beginnings to become the Almany (a title indicating his combined political and religious role) of a state that approximated the present country of Guinea (plus parts of Mali and the Cote d’Ivoire).

Portuguese had traveled the coast of Guinea for several centuries and established trading posts prior to Samori’s emergence, but it was during his rule that the French began to move into the heart of the country from Senegal. He fought his first battle with French troops in 1886. He fought the French for the next 12 years but was finally defeated, taken prisoner, and exiled. The country remained a French colony until 1958, when, following a negative vote on President Charles de Gaulle’s plan to transform Guinea from a colony to a member of the French Community, the local leadership proclaimed the country’s independence.

The popular leader of the independence movement, Sékou Touré (1922–1984), died in 1984. Shortly thereafter a coup was led by Colonel Lansana Conté, who continues to head the government.

Traditional religions of the Guinea peoples have remained strong in this land, where Christianity and Islam have vied for the heart of the population. The Kissi, Loma, and Gbande peoples, who traditionally have occupied the forest lands in the southeast near the borders with Sierra Leone and Liberia, have been most resistant to conversion. Also many of the Malinke and Kpelle have retained their religion.

Islam (of the Sunni Malekite School) entered Guinea in the 18th century, the Fulani people being the primary instrument. The majority of Guineans are now Muslims. The strongest support has appeared among the Dialonke, Garakole, and Susu peoples. Many of the country's Muslims are members of the Tijaniyya Sufi Order, an order that was developing in North Africa at about the same time that Islam was moving into Guinea. In the 20th century, the community has further diversified with the introduction of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement from Pakistan. Also, since World War II the Baha'i Faith has begun to spread.

Portuguese arrived along the coast of Guinea in 1462. Catholicism was introduced at the trading centers, but there was no effort to evangelize the interior. It was not until 1877 that Roman Catholic missionaries, in the form of the Holy Ghost Fathers, arrived, by which time Islam already had established its claim on much of the region. The first mission station was opened at Boffa. The White Fathers arrived in 1896, by which time the French had almost completed their conquest of the land.

The Roman Catholic Church grew steadily through the 20th century, growth marked by the ordination of the first Guinean priest in 1940, the establishment of the first archdiocese (Conakry) in 1955, and consecration of the first African archbishop in 1962. The Holy Ghost Fathers were in charge of the archdiocese, and the White Fathers worked in the neighboring diocese of N'Zékékoré. Then in 1967, as the country was struggling to become independent, all foreign priests and nuns were expelled. Only eight priests remained to carry on the work. The church was forced to quickly recruit more priests and rebuild, which it has subsequently done.

Protestants did not enter the country until 1918, when the Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) began work in the Niger River Valley. It expanded primarily by working among groups that had to that point retained their traditional faith, rather than from the Muslim community. The CMA has taken the lead in producing Bibles and other literature in the various languages spoken in Guinea. Like the Catholics, CMA missionaries were expelled in 1967, but the CMA was able to negotiate an arrangement whereby 26 missionaries were allowed to remain, though their activity was for a period very restricted. Many of these were at the church's two schools at Telekoro and Mamou. Thus they were able to focus on leadership training and continue the process of translating the Bible. Their work eventually matured into the Evangelical Protestant Church.

By 1967, several other churches had also established missions, most prominently the Church of the Open Bible, an American Pentecostal group that entered in 1952. The Paris Mission and the Anglicans had both established work in the nation's capital city, Conakry. Each of these three efforts lost all their missionary leadership in 1967, and the churches have remained weak. Anglican churches are part of the Diocese of Guinea, which now includes both Guinea and Guinea-Bissau, part of the Church of the Province of West Africa.

The Christian community remains relatively small, 2 to 3 percent of the total population of approximately 10 million. Some 65 percent of the population profess Islam, and the remainder continue to follow their traditional religion. There are few signs of new religious impulses, though several evangelical groups (most notably the New Tribes Mission, SIM USA [formerly the Sudan Interior Mission] and the Southern Baptist Convention) opened work in the 1980. The Southern Baptists have a small work among the Susu people, and more recently the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., has launched missionary activity.

and the Bijagos Archipelago, which includes a number of islands in the Atlantic Ocean immediately off the coast. A population of 1.5 million people resides on its 10,800 square miles of territory.

Early in the second millennium BCE, the area was incorporated into different kingdoms centered in Senegal and Mali, but the people eventually attained their independence, only to see the Portuguese begin to create settlements along the coast at the end of the 15th century. At this time the area was home to no less than 40 different peoples, the most numerous being the Fulani, Mandingos, Mandes, and Balantes.

The Portuguese gradually established a colony, which became the source of slave labor. The country itself was turned over to a private company, which forced many into the cultivation of crops designed for export, while the majority of the population were living at subsistence levels. The country was impoverished and left in ignorance. However, in this situation in the 1950s a resistance movement began to develop, led by Amilcar Cabral (d. 1973). His goals were made plain in the name of the organization he founded, the African Party for the Liberation of Guinea and Cape Verde (the Portuguese island off the coast that had been a processing center for the slave trade). The movement turned into a war for liberation, which won the country's freedom in 1973. As he realized his life's work, Cabral was assassinated by Portuguese agents. The United Nations moved quickly to recognize the new nation, and its establishment played a major role in the coup that ended the harsh dictatorship in Portugal and led to the dismantling of the Portuguese colonial empire.

The new government was taken over in a coup in 1980, and a Marxist dictatorship took control. A multiparty democracy was put in place in 1991, but the poverty of the country has made it continually unstable. It was the scene of a civil war in 1998–1999 followed by an interim government, which fell following a coup in 2003. Former dictator Joao Bernardo “Nino” Viera was elected president in 2005.

The majority of the people of Guinea-Bissau retain allegiance to the traditional religions of the land, and are the overwhelming majority in the western half of the country farthest from the coast. The Banyum, Bayot, and Manjaco peoples have remained virtually untouched by either Islam or Christianity.

Christianity came to Guinea-Bissau with Franciscans who arrived in 1462 with the first wave of Portuguese traders. Their work came under the jurisdiction of the new Diocese of St. James of Cape Verde erected in 1532. They were later joined by Jesuit priests, but made only slow progress at wooing converts into the church. The low point of the church was in 1929, when only one priest remained in the entire country. In 1940 (as part of an agreement between Portugal and the Vatican), Guinea-Bissau became a mission independent of Cape Verde, and a new missionary effort began. The relative success in more recent decades was indicated by the mission's elevation to the status of a prefecture apostolic in 1955 and the establishment of the Diocese of Bissau in 1977.

GUINEA-BISSAU

The development of the Roman Catholic Church was overshadowed by the movement of Islam into the country, especially in the 18th century. Sunni Islam of the Malikite School came to dominate the Sominke, Fulakunda, and Susu peoples, mostly in the southern and eastern portions of the country, and the Diola in the west. However, even Islam has had only relative success, with only 40 percent of the population of 1.8 million people being attracted to it.

Protestantism did not manifest in Guinea-Bissau until the Worldwide Evangelization Crusade (WEC), headquartered in England, established work in Bissau. Its work spread along the coast and in the islands of the archipelago. Like the Roman Catholic Church, it has found progress difficult. In the 1990s the Evangelical Church of Guinea (Igreja Evangélica da Guiné), founded by the WEC, still had only a few thousand members. It is the largest Protestant work in the country. There is also a small Anglican presence attached to the Diocese of Guinea of the Church of the Province of West Africa and the small Guinea-Bissau Mission of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, part of the larger Sahel Union Mission, which includes a number of countries in West Africa.

Of some interest, there is a small Druze community in Guinea-Bissau consisting of approximately 100 expatriates from Lebanon. The continued civil unrest has tended to discourage the founding of new religions.

Gurdjieff Foundations

During his life, G. I. Gurdjieff (ca. 1866–1949) worked closely with a number of students in Europe and America in what remains essentially an oral teaching tradition that emphasizes the need to develop a new quality of participation in all aspects of life. Today, study of his ideas and practices exists in several locales. The primary locale represents direct descent from Gurdjieff and consists of a network of organizations operating largely under the titles Gurdjieff Foundation or Gurdjieff Society and other organizations founded by individuals who left Gurdjieff or his students to establish independent groups. As the most direct conduit from Gurdjieff himself, the Foundations are considered the organization that most completely represents his teaching.

Shortly before his death, Gurdjieff related to his chief student, Jeanne de Salzmänn (1889–1990), that a nucleus of people should be prepared in order to respond to the demand that would arise. In the early 1950s, Madame de Salzmänn began to coordinate groups dedicated to the Work (the body of ideas and practices that Gurdjieff introduced). Soon after, centers identified by the names Société d'Études et de Recherches pour la Connaissance de l'Homme (SERCH, later named Institut Gurdjieff) in Paris, Gurdjieff Foundation in New York and Caracas, and Gurdjieff Society in London were established, with one or more direct students in charge of each center. From these major centers, a growing number of organizations have begun in Europe, North America, South America, Australia, South Africa, the Middle East, and the Far East. Local organizations offer various forms of the Work, and, collectively, they remain the repository of Gurdjieff's musical and dance creations and direct the publication of Gurdjieff's writings and music.

Most of Gurdjieff's direct students, as well as their own students, have been associated with the Foundation/Society organization. The network remained under the leadership of Jeanne de Salzmänn from Gurdjieff's death in 1949 until her death in 1990. She traveled widely and saw to the publication of Gurdjieff's Life Is Real Only Then, When "I Am," and a volume of Gurdjieff's early talks, Views from the Real World. With director Peter Brook (b. 1925), she adapted Meetings with Remarkable Men into a film. She preserved and taught the "movements" or sacred dances taught by Gurdjieff and created several films that demonstrate some of the essential aspects of the Work through movements. Following her death, her son Michel de Salzmänn (1923–2001) maintained a link among the Foundations until his death in 2001.

At the local level, work groups are selected, organized, and led by senior members, usually acting as a council. Councils coordinate across localities to sponsor events and create projects. The relation of the Foundations to each other is cooperative rather than based on a central authority. The Foundations collaborate in order to develop a sense of responsibility to the influence that Gurdjieff brought. The link among local organizations is the teaching itself, not a formal or hierarchical structure.

In 2003, the International Association of Gurdjieff Foundations (IAGF) was chartered in Switzerland by four founding members: the societies in Paris, London, New York, and Caracas. Meetings of the IAGF occur twice a year on a rotating basis in Europe, Britain, the United States, and South America, primarily to share the efforts and experience derived in the different member institutes.

As a path devoted to development of consciousness, the Work does not involve belief or formal rites, but calls for direct experience and understanding. Essential to Gurdjieff's teaching is the principle that the Work, begun as quiet, inner observation of oneself, must eventually emerge into everyday life. He provided many inner exercises and practices to make use of the events of ordinary life for growth of awareness and attention. In the Foundations, practical work takes place through small group meetings, movements, exercises, study, and a wide range of activities including music, art, crafts, and manual work, all of which are intended to make possible the use of each aspect of everyday life for the growth of awareness.

Two central activities constitute the pillars or primary activities of Work in the Foundations: group meetings and movements. Other activities derive from and facilitate these primary activities.

Small Group Meetings Group meetings have been an integral part of the Work since its inception. Small groups experiment with exercises of attention and discuss questions that arise from study of the teaching undertaken in the conditions of everyday life. Participation in a group allows a student to deepen personal inquiry by learning from others' experiences.

In spite of the confidentiality practiced in Work groups, accounts of small group exchanges, with both Gurdjieff himself and later group leaders, are published. Of particular interest is a collection of exchanges with Lord Pentland (1907–1984), born Henry John Sinclair, a student of Gurdjieff who served as president of the Gurdjieff Foundation of New York from its inception in 1953 until his death. Accounts of group meetings with Lord Pentland show how students pose inquiries and an accomplished teacher of Gurdjieff's ideas responds.

As support for small group work, members sit quietly in order to develop awareness of bodily sensation and to observe internal processes and tensions in the body. Gurdjieff taught that sitting quietly without tension and without identification with thoughts brings energy and can help in formulating and realizing an aim. These "sittings," observed in small groups and individually, provide a means for self-knowledge and inner verification of Gurdjieff's teaching about the human condition.

Movements and Dances Gurdjieff included in his teaching rhythmic exercises, called movements, which he says parallel dances performed during temple rites in Asia and the Middle East. According to Gurdjieff, movements have two aims: self-knowledge and development of a new quality of attention that can include the whole person: body, mind, and feeling. Movements are said to express precise metaphysical laws and to allow a direct and personal experience of different qualities of energy. A student can experience intimations of another dimension of reality. In recognition of these transformative possibilities, Gurdjieff also referred to movements as "sacred dances" and "sacred gymnastics."

Each movement involves a sequence of positions and displacements of the body performed in changing patterns, usually accompanied by music. The challenge of movements is that they require instantaneous coordination of body and mind. Movements help a student develop awareness of the state of the body and its participation—as both ally and obstacle—in the search for consciousness. Because movements are taught in classes, each student can observe how a personal inner search is connected with that of others.

Other activities that derive from and support the two primary pillars of the Work, small group meetings and movements, include the following.

Music Gurdjieff maintains that he composed music in order to transmit understanding of universal laws through direct perception of the effect of vibrations on the organism. He explains that "objective music" can convey a precise understanding of the laws of vibrations and can produce in all listeners a predictable and identical result, unlike "subjective music," which is produced and received differently by different people. With music, Gurdjieff invokes the teaching of correspondences; study of the microcosm of music is an inquiry into universal laws and processes that also operate at the macrocosmic level.

The corpus of 200 or so musical compositions written by Gurdjieff and Thomas de Hartmann ranges widely as to form and effect. Some pieces echo folk melodies and rhythms; others include chants and dances; still others are hymns and prayers.

Study of Ideas According to Gurdjieff, ancient teachings brought an understanding of how a fine energy can enter human existence. Study of ideas can provide, he says, a way in which this energy from higher sources can enter the life of a person. In order to appreciate the universal source from which all great teachings derive, Work groups study ideas from ancient traditions, including Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, and nature religions, along with Gurdjieff's ideas. Study of ideas, alone and in groups, calls for an integration of the ideas of the teaching with personal experience. Gurdjieff stressed the need to study the ideas of his teaching at all levels, from personal to universal, and to spend time pondering the meaning of personal experience in relation to larger planetary forces.

Practical Work Working with craft materials or tools with a directed attention can provide impressions of how awareness, emotional attachment, and physical activity are interrelated. Groups regularly assemble for a period (day, weekend, or longer) to work at preparation of meals, housekeeping, gardening, writing, building construction, and crafts, such as weaving, sewing, and pottery. Work periods usually begin by setting a common intention to experiment with some aspect of self-observation during practical activities. At common meals, members exchange their individual observations in a group setting.

Activities with Children and Young People Since Gurdjieff's teaching is a way in everyday life, the Foundations value and devote attention to the education of children. Following Gurdjieff's teaching about the cultural and educational forces that deny development of essence in formative years, members work with children to encourage growth of essence and to ameliorate habitual imitation of others.

Although these activities are carried out for members only, essential aspects of the teaching are periodically presented to the public through conferences, lectures, concerts, and the publication of relevant writings. The Foundations do not proselytize widely for new members, which may in part account for the charges of secrecy that have arisen from time to time. Today, approximately 2,500 to 3,000 people worldwide are involved in the Foundation network.

No notable controversies have occurred within the Foundations since their beginning in the early 1950s. However, some older students separated from the mainstream of the work and formed groups of their own. Numerous other organizations are led by individuals who claim no historical lineage with Gurdjieff or his direct students, yet use a term from Gurdjieff's teaching, particularly the term "Fourth Way," in definition of their respective missions. An even more subtle diffusion of his ideas and practices into the larger culture includes spiritual teachers and professionals who cite Gurdjieff or his teaching in the development of their own systems. In many instances, the interpretations of his teaching given within these forms of dissemination have little or no relation to the way these ideas are approached and experienced within the Foundations.

Gurdjieff, George Ivanovitch

ca. 1866–1949

George Ivanovitch Gurdjieff was a spiritual teacher who brought a message of inner awakening and a method of self-development that is increasingly studied in the West today. The body of ideas and practices that he introduced, called the “Work,” reflects the Western Esoteric (alchemical) tradition that integrates humanistic and scientific concerns and requires effort on the part of the aspirant to awaken to the process of inner transformation.

A defining feature of this work on oneself is that it is meant to take place in the cauldron of everyday life. Specific to Gurdjieff’s method is his emphasis on the direct awareness of the triadic structure of humans, the three centers of body, mind, and feeling. The harmonious development of this triad, called by Gurdjieff the three “brains,” brings balance to the whole being and allows access to a new dimension of consciousness.

Born in Alexandropol, in the southern Caucasus, at the crossroads of diverse cultures, traditions, and languages, Gurdjieff dedicated his early life to the search for meaning. He was convinced that an ancient knowledge exists that could illuminate the true place of human existence within the cosmic scheme. He relates how, as a boy, he wished to understand the meaning of human life and humanity’s position in the universe. The force of these questions led him to investigate many sources, but in each he found contradictions, even among accomplished practitioners and scholars. In search of a non-contradictory understanding, he read widely in science and religion, and studied formally both medicine and Orthodox Christian theology. His writings portray early interest in a broad spectrum of philosophical and religious issues, as well as the history of science in the West and the technological advances of his day.

With the belief that understanding of his concerns could be found among ancient traditions in the Middle East and Asia, he decided to forgo further academic study and to search for surviving traces of these traditions. In his account, Meetings with Remarkable Men, he describes travels in the Middle East, Egypt, Ethiopia, Tibet, Central Asia, and the Hindu Kush. Sometimes on his own and sometimes with a group of associates who called themselves Seekers of Truth, he spent more than 20 years in what he describes as relentless inquiry—traveling, learning languages, surveying ancient documents and monuments, studying with spiritual teachers, and visiting religious centers and remote monasteries.

Meetings with Remarkable Men, an interweaving of travel, spiritual quest and allegorical teaching, relates that he studied many traditions, including Esoteric teachings in both East and West. Each adventure, he says, served his quest for an understanding of the sense and significance of life on earth, particularly human life. His later creations, including expositions of his ideas, music, dance, and psychological exercises, indicate a variety of influences, which he does not identify. Even with these influences unidentified, his writings refer often to world religions (including Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, and Zoroastrianism) as well as ancient teachings from Greece, Babylon, Egypt, and the fabled Atlantis.

After more than 20 years of searching in remote schools and monasteries of the Middle East and Central Asia, he appeared in Moscow in 1912 with an all-encompassing teaching that wove cosmology, metaphysics, social critique, and spiritual practice into a design for personal evolution. This was the beginning of Gurdjieff's career as a teacher. His first students were drawn mainly from the Russian intelligentsia. Among these was Peter Demianovich Ouspensky (1878–1947), philosopher, mathematician, and journalist, who by this time had received recognition in intellectual circles through publication of Tertium Organum, a treatise on the nature of the universe, first published in Russia in 1911. Ouspensky relates that he immediately recognized that what he had published was conjecture and that Gurdjieff offered more—an understanding, beyond conjecture, about the universe and humanity's place in it. Ouspensky was an avid student in the Moscow days and documented this time in a monograph, In Search of the Miraculous, which remains a major exposition of the teaching.

A core of students began to collect in Russia, including Sophie Grigorievna (1874–1963), referred to consistently as Mme Ouspensky; Thomas de Hartmann (1885–1956), an accomplished musician and composer who later collaborated with Gurdjieff in creating a corpus of music that expresses elements of the teaching; and de Hartmann's wife, Olga (1885–1979), who later served as Gurdjieff's secretary and was a significant contributor to the development of Gurdjieff's mission in France, the United States, and Canada.

Leading his students out of the chaos of the Russian Revolution, in 1921 Gurdjieff settled in France, where he based his activity until his death in 1949. At first he lived with some of his students at the Prieuré des Basses Loges at Fontainebleau-Avon and later moved to an apartment in Paris. During this period he also set out his ideas in his major work, Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson, as well as in Meetings with Remarkable Men, written in the form of a spiritual autobiography.

Between 1929 and 1948, Gurdjieff traveled to the United States nine times to meet with Work groups, oversee translation of his writing, and to attend to what he called the "material question," that is, finances. Over the years he supported a large extended family of émigrés, as well as the upkeep of the Prieuré. Throughout the 1930s, Gurdjieff diversified his activities. New groups were established in France, England, and the United States. During the German occupation of Paris, from 1940 to 1944, Gurdjieff conducted group meetings, under discreet and often stressful circumstances, in his apartment near the Place de l'Etoile. Groups continued to meet after the liberation. In 1947, after Ouspensky's death, Gurdjieff made his last trip to America and authorized Mme Ouspensky to publish her husband's account of his time with Gurdjieff. Gurdjieff died in Paris on October 29, 1949. He was memorialized with the rites of the Russian Orthodox faith at Alexandre Nevski Cathedral in Paris and buried at Avon near Paris.

Gurdjieff left a large corpus of sacred dances and exercises called "movements" and, in collaboration with Thomas de Hartmann, more than 200 musical compositions.

Guru Gobind Singh's Birthday

Guru Gobind Singh was the 10th guru (teacher) acknowledged as the leader of the Sikh community, and the one who held up the Guru Granth Sahib, the Sikh scripture, as his successor guru. Thus Gobind Singh was the last living guru acknowledged by the Sikh community. The birthday celebration allows for special acknowledgment of his role in shaping the Sikh community. The most important Sikh holidays are gurburbs, or festivals occasioned by birthday or martyrdom of one of the 10 gurus, and this is no exception.

Guru Gobind Singh was born the son of Guru Tegh Bahadur at Patna Sahib, in the state of Bihar, India, on December 22, 1666 (on the Gregorian calendar). He was raised at Annadpur, a Punjabi city founded by his father and now a Sikh holy site. He emerged to adulthood at a time of great stress within the Sikh community, which was suffering abuse by the Muslim ruler under which they lived. He articulated a principle later known as Kshatradharma, a form of spiritual practice that values the "protection of the seekers and destruction of the evildoers." This principle fit a militant response to discriminatory and persecutory actions. On several occasions Gobind Singh led forces and won battles in defense of the community.

The principle of Kshatradharma would lead him in 1699 to the organization of the Khalsa, the Order of the Pure, a military-religious fraternity originally consisting of those men who acknowledged their willingness to give their life for the guru. The khalsa later expanded to include all within the Sikh community, formally entered by baptism, the adoption of the name Singh (lion) (or in the case of women, the name Kuar [princess]). Sikhs give Guru Gobind Singh credit for turning the tide against Mughal oppression in India.

Along with his military and organizational accomplishments, Sikhs also point to his intellectual activity, which included authoring a number of treatises concerning what might be termed the Khalsa spirit. His writings would later be collected into a separate volume, the Dasam Granth, which is revered second only to the Guru Granth Sahib by Sikhs.

The guru's birthday is now celebrated on what is January 5 on the Common Era calendar, which is the 23rd day of the month of Poh on the new Sikh Nakan-shahi Calendar. Members of the community celebrate by gathering at the gurdwara (a Sikh house of worship) for special programs remembering Gobind Sing's life.

Guru Purnima

Guru Purnima is the annual day when Hindus show special veneration to their spiritual teacher, their guru. It is observed on the day of the full moon (purnima) in the Hindu lunar month of Ashadh (which occurs in June or July of the Common Era calendar). Primary honor on this date is given to an acknowledgment of the legendary Bhagwan Ved Vyasa, the first guru, who in Hindu lore is credited with compiling all the Vedic hymns available at the time, dividing them into four parts based on their ritual use. He is also credited with writing the 18 Puranas and the great epic of India, the Mahabharata. The Mahabharata dates to the third century BCE, with parts that may be as old as the ninth century. The Puranas date to the third to fifth centuries CE. Nevertheless, Vyasa supplies the original image of what a guru is and should be.

Besides the first gurus there have been many spiritual teachers throughout history and many exist today. Thus Guru Purnima becomes the occasion of especially honoring one personal guru in the present. Many Hindus believe that every spiritual aspirant needs a teacher who can dispel darkness and guide him or her to spiritual enlightenment. On this day, the aspirant should serve and worship the guru (vyasa puja), speaking of her or his life and teachings. One pattern for observing Guru Purnima is to meditate on the guru and chant his prayers; perform worship of the guru's feet; attend satsang (a gathering) in which discourses extol the glory of devotion to the guru; fasting; and prayer. The day ends as the devotee renews his or her resolve to make future spiritual progress.

It has become a common practice in some Hindu circles to have a special day of guru worship on the birthday (day of physical appearance) of the guru and to commemorate that day (Vaysa Puja) annually by issuing a book that will include pictures of the guru, excerpts of teachings, and accounts of his or her life.

Gush Emunim

Gush Emunim, the Bloc of the Faithful, is an Orthodox Jewish group founded in the wake of the Six-Day War of 1967, which pitted Israel against Syria, Jordan, and Egypt. As a result of the war Israel occupied new territory far beyond the borders fixed in 1949 by the armistice following its War of Independence, but part of historic Israel.

Immediately, a group led by Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook, the son of the revered Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook (1865–1935), former chief rabbi of Palestine, began planning to build Jewish settlements on this new land, even as the government of Israel considered returning it for peace with its Arab neighbors. The younger Kook believed Jews should possess all the territory included in the Israel of biblical times (including ancient Israel, Judea, and Samaria). He came to believe that possession of that land was a prerequisite for the coming of the promised Messiah.

Gush Emunim builds on the tradition of religious Zionism as expounded by such leaders as Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Kalischer (1795–1874), Rabbi Judah Alkalay (1798–1878), and Rabbi Samuel Mohilewer (1824–1898). As a minority movement among Zionists, the religious supporters organized the Mizrachi (Spiritual Center) movement in Vienna in 1901, at a conference called by Rabbi Isaac Jacob Reines (1839–1915), the organization's first president. Like all Orthodox Jews, they believed that a Messiah would come, and that he would reconstruct the temple and initiate a great Jewish empire that would be the instrument for establishing peace and prosperity for the world's people. They were also content, to some extent, to await the Messiah's coming. Rabbi's Kook's followers, the Gush Emunim, have given up waiting and operate on the idea that the Messiah wants or needs them to help prepare the way. According to the Gush Emunim, beyond the mere establishment of the state of Israel, the Temple Mount in Jerusalem needs to be cleared, the temple rebuilt, and all the biblical lands settled by Jews.

To carry out their program, once east Jerusalem was in Israeli hands, a member climbed to the top of the Wailing Wall and unfurled an Israeli flag. A short time later, Kook and some of his followers rented rooms at an Arab-run hotel in Hebron, the first step in a program to create a large number of settlements throughout the West Bank. Gush Emunim, though small, has additional support through their political party, the Tehiya Party, which, though also relatively small, has been able to block government attempts to return conquered land to Palestinian control. While unable to swing a large number of Israelis to its full program of religious messianism, in the 1970s they found the public supportive of the basic notion of Israel's territorial expansion.

The Gush Emunim have remained a small but important group in Israel. In 1980, some of the group were responsible for a failed attempt to blow up the Dome of the Rock, an important Muslim site in Jerusalem built in the seventh century. In the 1990s, rabbis sympathetic to the Gush Emunim position advocated disobedience to military orders to leave the occupied territories. At the same time, because of his activity in pursuing the peace process with the Palestinians, they called Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin a traitor. In November 1995, Rabin was assassinated.

Gush Emunim, though small in membership, has sympathetic supporters throughout Israel for some of its primary affirmations, especially its desire to expand Israel's borders and provide no concessions to an independent Palestine. It remains somewhat secretive, especially as it has been supportive and knowledgeable about continuing violent incidents in Israel.

Gutenberg, Johann

ca. 1398–1468

Though he lived and died a devout Roman Catholic, Johann Gutenberg is revered among Protestant Christians. His invention of moveable type is widely credited with both shaping Protestantism's orientation on the biblical Word and allowing the movement's relatively rapid spread through Europe in the mid-16th century.

Little is known of Gutenberg's early life. He was probably born in Mainz, Germany, around 1398, but only emerges out of obscurity around 1430, when his family moved to Strasbourg. By this time, he had gained some knowledge of metallurgy, which would serve him well in later life, and once in his new home he formed a partnership with Johann Fust, a well-to-do businessman.

Gutenberg actually had made several notable improvements of the printing press of his day, but they all take second place to his perfecting of a form of type based on individual letters that fit neatly on a single page and produced pages that were aesthetic to the reader. The use of individual letters allowed Gutenberg to quickly rearrange them to form new pages and thus greatly speed the process of producing books. The first book printed with the new press and technique was the Bible in Latin. This book, now known as the Gutenberg Bible, was published around 1455.

Shortly after demonstrating to the world the viability of their new techniques, Gutenberg and Fust had a falling out. Fust, having supplied the capital for the adventure, was impatient about recovering his investment. He sued Gutenberg and came into possession of the press, the type used for the Bible, as well as a whole new set of type that Gutenberg had prepared for a Psalter. Fust later published the Psalter.

Gutenberg had to locate a new patron, which he found in the person of Conrad Humery, the chancellor of the council in Mainz. With Humery's support, he produced the Catholikon, a grammar and alphabetic lexicon in 1460. The profit from the sales did not replace his losses to Fust and he lived the remaining years of his life in relative poverty. In 1565, Archbishop Adolf of Nassau began assisting Gutenberg, but his support was little above bare subsistence. Few took notice when he died in Mainz, probably in 1468. His burial place is unknown.

Gutenberg emerged briefly into the public light, but faded back into obscurity before the impact of his accomplishments could be appreciated. His impact on Western history and religion, however, was immense. The new printing press he had produced aligned perfectly with the theology of the Word developed by Martin Luther. It allowed Protestants to identify the Word of God with the Bible and to incarnate their theology by printing the Bible in mass quantities in local languages and making it readily available to all. Equally important, in the early stages of the Reformation, Protestants proved more capable of quickly printing and distributing propaganda material that consolidated popular support against their Catholic opposition. The emphasis on the written Word, the authority of the Bible, and the study of the Bible by individual believers would become a defining characteristic of Protestantism that continues to the present day.

■ Guyana

Guyana, on South America's northern coast, is located between Venezuela and Surinam. Its southern border is shared with Brazil. The former Dutch colony has 76,000 square miles of land, much of it hot and humid and along the three main rivers—the Essequibo, the Demerara, and the Berbice. Most of the population of 771,000 reside on the northern coastal plain.

Human beings may have reached what is today the country of Guyana as early as 35,000 years ago. In modern times it came to be the home of two people, the Arawak people, who inhabited the coast, and the Caribs in the interior. Eventually, the more warlike Caribs displaced the Arawaks, a process repeated several times as both groups moved into the islands of the Caribbean. They bequeathed to the region, its name, Guyana, or “land of waters.”

Christopher Columbus sailed along the coast of Guyana in 1498, but the first European settlers were from Holland. The Dutch constructed a fort in 1616, the first of several settlements to facilitate trade. The Dutch West India Company administered the colony into the 18th century. As agriculture increased in the mid-1600s, the Company began to import African slaves, and the shrinking Native population moved inland. In the 1770s, Guyana became contested territory, and after four decades during which it changed hands several times, it became a British possession in 1814, and was known as British Guyana. The British retained control until independence in 1966, when it assumed the name Guyana. Since 1968, the People's National Congress has been the leading political party.

The Guyanese Constitution guarantees religious freedom. During the early decades of independence, however, the Marxist-oriented governments promoted atheism, one symbol of which was the nationalization of all the schools operated by various religious groups. Religious groups and buildings are registered through the government's Ministry of Home Affairs. The presence of foreign religious personnel is strictly regulated.

Indigenous religions have survived in the interior of Guyana, especially among the Arekunge, Macushi, and Warrau peoples. But Christianity is now followed by a slight majority of the people, and Guyana has possibly the highest percentage of adherents to Hinduism of any country in the Americas (32 percent).

Roman Catholicism was introduced in 1657 by brothers of the Capuchin Order, but their work did not survive. Missionaries from the Netherlands Reformed Church and the Moravian Brethren arrived later in the century. The first Reformed church was erected in 1720, and Dutch Lutherans built a church in 1743, both primarily serving the Dutch community. The Reformed Church had a policy of not allowing either Africans or Guyanese people to become members.

A new era in Guyanese religion began with the establishment of British control. The London Missionary Society entered the country in 1807, and the Church of England was established as the favored religious community in 1810. State support was withdrawn from the Reformed Church, and it was gradually superseded by the Church of Scotland (Presbyterians), that church having been established in 1766 by several plantation owners. It began to receive state funds in 1837.

Methodism in the islands had a unique beginning. It was brought to Guyana by freed slaves from Nevis in 1802. The church was then supplemented by British immigrants. Rounding out the Guyanese scene were the Canadian Presbyterians (1885) and the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1887). During the 20th century, notable work was founded by the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, the Assemblies of God, and an independent evangelical sending agency, the Unevangelized Fields Mission, which now works in the country's interior. Among the more interesting indigenous churches are the Jordanites, an independent Pentecostal church, and the Hallelujah Church, which emerged in the interior in the 1870s under the leadership of a new prophet named Abel.

Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Guyana Council of Churches, an affiliate of the World Council of Churches. Conservative Protestants are associated in the Guyana Evangelical Fellowship, which is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

The Roman Catholic Church was re-established in 1826 with the arrival of an initial priest. The effort proved quite successful, and a vicariate was erected a mere 11 years later. The Diocese of Georgetown was designated in 1956. Catholicism now has the largest following in Guyana, followed by the Anglicans, whose work is now a diocese of the Church of the Province of the West Indies, and the Assemblies of God.

Following the abolition of slavery in 1833, the British turned to India as a source of labor. Indians (most of whom were Hindus) were recruited for work on plantations and brought to Guyana as indentured servants. They were largely from rural India, predominantly male, with 10 percent children and 30 percent female. Those between the ages of 10 and 20 were counted as adults. Some 200,000 were transported to Guyana, and their descendants now constitute 53 percent of the population. Many left Hinduism for Christianity, as the British made it an official policy for Hindus to become Christians before they could be eligible for the better civilian jobs.

Traditional Hinduism underwent some development as people from different parts of India were thrown together on plantations with Africans and members of the Native peoples. Various forms of traditional Hinduism, both Vaishnava and Saivite, remain popular, most of the temples being associated with the Hindu Orthodox Guyana Sanathan Dharma Maha Sabha, the largest single religious group in the country. Hindu priests have organized the Guyana Pandits Society. Two popular Hindu holy days, Diwali and Holi (Phagwa), are celebrated as national holidays.

There are small groups associated with the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization of Guyana, and the Arya Samaj. There is also a chapter of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad.

A percentage of the Indian immigrants to Guyana were Muslim, the great majority being Sunnis of the Hanafite and Shafiite schools. There are lesser numbers of Ismailis and Shias. The Shiites, who have no separate mosque, have felt some discrimination from the Sunni majority, especially with the growth of a vocal Wahhabi presence. Guyana's pluralistic culture has provided fertile ground for both branches of the Ahmadiyyas, the Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam and the Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore, and for the Baha'i Faith.

Although most Africans brought to Guyana (who currently constitute approximate one-third of the population) have become Christians, some have also become Hindus and Muslims, while a noticeable minority have continued to practice a form of their traditional African faiths. These now find expression in Guyanese Vodou (with a base in Ashanti religion from West Africa) and Spiritism, their life being somewhat affected by the improved communications between Caribbean lands and by the injection of the Rastafarian movement from Jamaica. One African-derived religion, the Comfa religion, focuses on the ancestral spirits of the various ethnic groups that constitute Guyanese society.

In November 1987, Guyana became the scene of one of the more dramatic religious events of the 20th century. More than 900 members of the Peoples Temple who had established an agricultural colony in a rural part of the country were involved in a massive act of murder and suicide. Although this event occurred in isolation from the ongoing life of Guyanese religions as a whole, it affected the larger religious community worldwide.

H

Haein-sa Temple

Located in a valley at the foot of Gaya Mountain in the Hapcheon-gun region in South Gyeongsang Province, the Haein-sa Temple is one of the Three Jewels Temples of the Republic of (South) Korea. Each temple was designed to represent one of the Three Jewels of Buddhism—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. Haein-sa Temple is focused upon the Dharma, Buddha's teachings. The name of the temple, Haein, is drawn from Korean phrases that refer to the enlightened world of Buddha and/or humankind's naturally unpolluted mind (Buddha nature).

The temple was initially built in 802, the story of its founding mixing history and legend. Its founding is tied to two Korean monks, Suneung and his disciple Ijeong, who had been away studying in China. On their return at the beginning of the ninth century, they discovered the wife of King Aejang (r. 800–809) ill with a tumor. The monks reputedly tied a piece of string to the tumor and ran it to a nearby tree. They subsequently began chanting and all were surprised to see the tumor shrink and the tree wither. King Aejang built Haein-sa out of gratitude for the healing of his wife. Another story has a more mundane account, namely, that the two monks secured the support of the dowager queen, who financed the monastic complex. As originally conceived, the temple was a base for Hwaom Buddhism and its propagation of the Avatamsaka or Flower Garland Sutra. Today it is a Son (Zen) Buddhist center.

Haein-sa is entered through three gates that lead to the courtyard. Straight ahead up a flight of stairs is the main hall. Constructed in 1818 on foundations laid in the ninth century, it is dominated by seven statues of Buddhas and bodhisattvas—the central statue being of a mega-statue of Vairocana. Of the rest, two—Avalokitesvara and Popgi, or Born of Truth Bodhisattva—are made of iron. The others—Manjushri, Ksitigarbha, Samantabhadra, and a second statue of Vairocana—are carved from wood. The wooden Vairocana, Manjushri, and Samantabhadra statues were all carved from a huge ginkgo tree during the rule of the Koryo dynasty (r. 918–1392). Additionally, the main hall is graced with a set of paintings of Buddha's life painted during the Choson (or Joseon) dynasty (1392–August 1910).

As worthy as is the main hall of attention, it pales beside what is to be found above and behind it—the Janggyeong Panjeon complex. The halls of the complex are the depositories for the 81,258 wooden printing blocks upon which are found the complete text of the Tripitaka Koreana. These blocks date to the time of King Gojong of Goryeo (r. 1213–1259), whose lengthy reign was marked by prolonged warfare with Manchuria. He turned to Buddhism to protect the nation, and in that effort he had the texts of Buddhist scriptures transferred to the printing blocks. The project took 16 years and was carried out on Kanghwado Island near Seoul. The project was completed in 1252. An earlier set, carved in the 11th century, was burned by Mongol invaders.

The Janggyeong Panjeon complex was built to hold the blocks. The four halls were expanded and renovated during the reign of King Sejo (r. 1455–1468) in 1457. These halls survived the various fires at the temple through the centuries and the devastation of the Korean War (1950–1953). A pilot sent to bomb the temple during the war found himself unable to release his bomb load. As a result he was initially court-martialed and imprisoned but later released and honored for what was seen as brave act.

Stupa in a courtyard at the ninth-century Haein-sa Temple complex, South Korea. (Carmen Redondo/Corbis)

At present, the temple is a permanent home to about 220 monks (including novices) while the 15 hermitages just outside the temple complex house some 200 women. Also, around the temple, 500 mountain men reside.

Hagia Sophia

The construction of Hagia Sophia, one of the great monuments of Byzantine Christianity, was completed in 538 CE in what was then Constantinople (now Istanbul, Turkey) after almost six years of building work under the mandate of the Emperor Justinian, following the destruction of the previous church on the site during a rebellion in 532. The elevated site had, it is believed, been a Pagan temple when Constantine I (272–337) came to power early in the fourth century and transformed Christianity from a persecuted religion into a state-supported church. The original church was erected between a smaller, hastily completed church, the original cathedral for the city, and the emperor’s palace complex. It was constructed during the emperorship of Constantine’s son, Constantius II (317–361), whose reign began in 337. It was dedicated near the end of his time in power in 360. The gold and silver items he donated to the church were lost when Arian Christians vandalized the church in 381, an act occasioned by the church council meeting there. The Council of Constantinople had reaffirmed the Nicene Creed and offered further condemnation of the theological position of Arius (260–336).

In 404, John Chrysostom, the archbishop of Constantinople, was exiled by the Emperor Arcadius (377–408) because he had made critical remarks about his wife. Riots erupted during which the church was destroyed. It fell to the Emperor Theodosius II (401–450) to build a new church, which was completed in 415. That church would stand until the riots of 532. The so-called Nike riots began over disagreements relative to sports competition (which carried underlying political dimensions). They led to the destruction of a large portion of the city, including the cathedral church.

Emperor Justinian I (483–565) took the occasion of the rebuilding of the city to inaugurate construction of a church that would be the most magnificent in existence. In this effort, he recruited the two most renowned architects of the day: Anthemius of Tralles (Aydin) and Isidorus of Miletus. He also stayed involved in the building's development and brought in resources from different parts of the empire (including materials taken from older Pagan temples), as needed or desired. It was completed on December 27, 537. The finished cathedral was the largest in the world for a millennium, until supplanted by the Cathedral at Seville in 1520.

The building was erected on a square base over which was placed a large dome, approaching the size of that of the Pantheon in Rome. The central dome has a maximum diameter of 102 feet, 6 inches. It reaches 182 feet, 5 inches above the floor. The dome was all the more unique because of 40 windows that were placed around its base. It was the first pendentive dome in history, a pendentive being an innovative device that permits the placing of a circular dome over a square room by carrying the weight of the dome to the four corners of the building base.

Above and beyond the ravages of time, the church was subject to the periodic earthquakes that affect the area and to the actions of those who attacked the city through riots and war. Just 20 years after the church's completion, the city was hit by earthquakes in 553, 557, and 558, requiring significant repairs. Additional damage was incurred in 869 and 986.

In 1204, frustrated Crusaders, unable to accomplish their goals in the Holy Land, turned on Constantinople and amid the sacking of the city did not leave Hagia Sophia untouched. This action still affects the relationship between Eastern Orthodoxy and the Roman Catholic Church. Then in 1453, the Ottoman Turks captured Constantinople and soon afterward converted the church into a mosque. They added minarets, but preserved the interior frescoes and mosaics (though they later covered them with plaster). The interior worship structures were altered to fit requirements for a mosque, including the establishment of worship toward Mecca.

Istanbul had been the headquarters of the Ottoman Empire until its fall in the years after World I. In 1935, Kemal Ataturk (1881–1938), then the head of the new secularized Turkish government, ordered Hagia Sophia converted into a museum on February 1, 1935. Ataturk visited the museum a few days later, on February 6, 1935. It remains a museum to the present.

■ Haiti

The Caribbean island nation of Haiti shares the island of Hispaniola with the Dominican Republic. Its 10,600 square miles of territory includes the western third of Hispaniola's land. Its 8.9 million citizens (2008) are almost totally of African descent.

A young girl is confirmed at a Catholic ceremony in Gonaives, Haiti. (David Snyder/Dreamstime.com)

Estimates of the number of inhabitants on the island of Hispaniola at the time of Columbus's arrival in 1492 vary from 500,000 to 2 million. Within 50 years, they had been reduced to a few hundred, such that the Spanish were forced to turn to African slaves as a replacement labor force. Although the island's native religious cultures, those of the Taino and Carib, all but perished with their bearers, certain indigenous Caribbean influences are still notable in Haitian Vodou. Zaka, the Vodou spirit of agriculture, for instance, is perhaps a derivative of an indigenous corn spirit.

As early as 1502 the Spanish were shipping enslaved Africans to the island, empowered by the 1454 papal bull Romanus pontifex. Slaves were forcibly baptized Catholic, yet their conversion was usually cosmetic. African religious traditions, despite their prohibition, thus thrived in the colony, especially in maroon communities, absorbing Catholic elements and eventually becoming the religion known as Vodou.

In response to an increasingly uncontrollable French presence on the island's northwestern coast, the Spanish ceded the western third of the island to the French at the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697. Statistics reveal the explosion of the French plantation system that followed: when the treaty was signed, there were roughly 2,000 slaves in the nascent French colony of Saint-Domingue, whereas by 1789, more than 600,000 slaves labored for the colony, at one point producing one-third of all sugar consumed in Europe.

French Catholicism in Saint-Domingue was hampered by a weak and factional priesthood, whose conversion of enslaved Africans was largely a perfunctory gesture required by article 2 of the Code Noir, the royal decree governing the treatment of slaves in French colonies. The arrival of the Society of Jesus in 1704 marked a significant change in this regard. French Jesuits learned African languages and established a more genuine mission for more than half the colony's slaves.

Colony administrators and plantation owners soon became suspicious of the Jesuits, however, accused them of insubordination to the Crown, and had them expelled in 1763.

By the end of the 18th century persistent slave resistance mushroomed into a national revolt following an August 1791 Vodou ceremony at Bois Caiman led by a slave named Boukman Dutty. Over the next 13 years of revolt, the popular Africa-based religion served to unite and inspire the rebel slaves to defeat Napoleon's forces and finally gain independence in 1804.

Independent Haiti's first leaders (who declared Catholicism the nation's official religion, which it remains today) struggled to gain the recognition and respect of the rest of the world. The Vatican, for example, refused to send priests until the signing of a concordat in 1860. The 54-year interim period was one of especial importance in Haitian religious history, as Vodou was further crystallized as the religion of the peasantry (despite new prohibitions against it). As for the Haitian Catholic Church, the few remaining priests in the new republic were joined by clerics who had been expelled from other colonies, and these men provided a dubious and inadequate sacerdotal leadership for Haitian Catholics. In such a disorderly ecclesial climate, popular Catholicism developed more unrestrainedly in Haiti than anywhere else in the Americas.

Shortly after the signing of the concordat in 1860, French Catholic missionaries came to Haiti and aggressively developed a national educational system. Not until the 1950s were Haitians ordained in significant numbers, and even then they only accounted for 20 percent of the country's priests. Over the course of these 100 years the Catholic Church was transformed into the largest and most functional institution in the country, rivaled in power only by the Haitian armed forces, and was kowtowed to by all Haitian heads of state, save the recalcitrant François Duvalier (r. 1957–1971).

Besides educating and ministering to the better part of the population, the Catholic Church hierarchy in Haiti has until very recently sought to eradicate Vodou from Haitian society. Three formal "antisuperstition" campaigns were waged to this end, in 1896, 1913, and 1941–1942. The last of these saw the Haitian government put the military at the church's disposal, and the resultant repression of Vodou practitioners and destruction of a treasury of national art represents one of the great tragedies in Haitian religious history.

Tempered by the spirit of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) and inspired by the force of Liberation Theology, the popular Haitian Catholic Church has changed radically in recent decades, both becoming acculturated and taking sides with the poor. Vodou rhythms and drums are now common features in Catholic Masses, and Catholic base communities have emerged as a potent political force, known collectively as tilegliz (Haitian Creole: little church). Empowered by Pope John Paul II's March 1983 visit and forceful declaration that "Something must change here," the tilegliz movement served to rally the masses against the oppressive Duvalier regime, eventually leading to the dramatic departure of Jean-Claude Duvalier in 1984 and the election of populist priest Jean-Bertrand Aristide as president in 1990.

As in other Latin American nations, the Charismatic Renewal is recently having a strong impact on Haitian Catholicism. The direct emotional religious experiences normally associated with Protestant Pentecostal revivals now feature in many Haitian Catholic Masses, and the annual national Charismatic convention in Port-au-Prince draws tens of thousands and is marked by dramatic healings, speaking in tongues, and witnessing.

A recent survey of more than 1,000 households in rural Haiti shows that as many as 30 percent of Haitians today are Protestant. Though surprising, this figure is in reality a reflection of Haiti's participation in the hemisphere-wide turn of Third World Catholics to Protestant Pentecostalism. Protestantism in Haiti, moreover, has a long history, beginning with the 1817 establishment of the Methodist Wesleyan Mission. Other Protestant sects emerged in Haiti in ensuing decades, including the Baptist, Episcopalian, and Seventh-day Adventist churches. Today, most major Protestant sects count significant numbers of followers in Haiti; the largest is the Convention Baptiste de' Haite, which was founded in 1924 and by 1986 counted 120,000 members.

Religious freedom is enjoyed today by all of Haiti's nine million citizens. Vodou has gained greater respect and is widely appreciated as a source of Haitian pride and identity and a driving force behind Haiti's rich artistic culture. Although small numbers of Buddhists, Muslims, and members of the Baha'i Faith can be found in Port-au-Prince, by far the most influential religious movements besides Christianity in Haiti are Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism, both of which date to the colonial era. Although the esoteric nature of these movements precludes any estimation of their numbers, many Haitian heads of state have been Masons, and historically the Catholic Church hierarchy has been troubled by the attraction of its flock—and especially of upper-class Haitian Catholics—to Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism.

Hanafite School of Islam

The Hanafite School of Islam is one of four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence recognized as orthodox within the Sunni Muslim world. Islam is centered upon submission to God (Allah) and obedience to the shariah, or law. As Islam developed, necessary decisions over acceptable and unacceptable behavior led to the elevation of jurisprudence within the Muslim community as a variety of interpretations of the Koran and the Sunnah, the collection of hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions). Through the first centuries of Islam, different collections of hadith appeared and only slowly did a consensus emerge concerning what constituted the authentic hadith.

Abu Hanifah (699–767) was a merchant in Kufa, in Mesopotamia (modern-day Iraq). He used the lessons of his mercantile experience when he turned to legal studies. After being a student for many years, he became a teacher and instructed many in his system.

He left no writings behind and it was left to two students, Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–198) and Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-Shaybani (749–ca. 804), and later scholars to develop the Hanafi perspective. A large body of legal commentaries produced by scholars over the centuries now forms the library of the Hanafi School. As Hanafi thought developed, it contended for acceptance with the Malikite and Shafiite schools. In the 9th and 10th centuries, the Abbasid Empire tended to favor the Shafiite School and the Hanafi approach went into eclipse. However, with the rise of the Ottoman Empire, the Hanafi School was revived and became the dominant school in those lands under its control. It has thus survived as the dominant school of Islam in Turkey and Egypt and the lands between (Syria, Lebanon, Jordan) and eastward into central Asia, Pakistan, India, and China (though challenged by Shia Islam in Iran and Iraq).

Muslim legal thought has four sources—the Koran, the Sunnah, the consensus of the ulama (community of those knowledgeable in Islamic law and theology), and reasoning by analogy, the latter principle allowing a general broadening of areas covered by the law. Like the other schools of jurisprudence, Hanafi legal scholars agree upon the importance of the Koran and the traditions passed through the Sunnah as important, and give due reverence to the consensus of the ulama. However, the Hanafi are distinguished by the relative importance they give to the use of analogy (qiyas) and tolerance of a resulting range of opinion (ra'y) on some issues. Hanafis use human reason to compare a current situation with one for which legislation already exists. Thus the Hanafi School has been seen as the most liberal of the four schools and the one that has been most open to issues of personal freedom.

The liberality of the Hanafis made them the object of attack by the Traditionalists, especially the Hanbalite School that rejected the use of analogy and placed its emphasis upon a conservative reading of the Koran and Sunnah. Those forces that opposed the Ottoman Empire, which had adopted the Hanafite system for its legal discourse, cited their opposition to the Hanafite School as part of their rationale for fighting the empire.

Hanbalite School of Islam

The Hanbalite School of Islam is one of the four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to Ahmad ibn Hanbal (780–855). Born in Baghdad, he would travel widely across the Arabian Peninsula and throughout the Muslim world. Though he never authored a single book on jurisprudence (fiqh), after his death, his students (including his son, Abd Allah (d. 903) gathered his writings, including a number of fatwas (legal pronouncements), which once assembled manifested the breadth of his work on the shariah (Islamic law).

Hanbal, though a student of Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas ibn Uthman ibn Shafi (767–820), the founder of the Shafiite School of Islam, developed a more strict approach to legal interpretation that centered upon the Koran and the Sunnah, the collection of hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions). He played down the role of the ulama (community of those knowledgeable in Islamic law and theology) and reasoning by analogy, which had become so established in the Hanafite School. The result was a more rigid approach to Islam that among other opinions developed a significant dislike of Sufism as a departure from orthodox Islam.

The Hanbalite School grew strong during the 9th and 10th centuries, but in 945 the new Buwayhid dynasty (which favored the Shia Islam) turned against the Hanbalites. The school enjoyed a revival under subsequent dynasties in the 11th and 12th centuries. Though not the most favored at court, the Hanbalites remained active through 15th century during which time one of its most celebrated teachers, Ahmad ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), appeared. The school further suffered in popularity with the rise of the Ottoman Empire, which favored the Hanafite School. The Hanbalite School survived mainly in pockets on the Arabian Peninsula.

The Hanbalite School experienced a revival in Arabia during the career of Muhammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (ca. 1703–1791). He founded a movement closely identified with the Hanbalite perspective (though many Hanbalite scholars have not supported it). The identification of the Saud family in Arabia with the Wahhabi movement provided an agenda for their moving against the Ottoman Empire and led in the 1930s to the establishment of the modern state of Saudi Arabia. Wahhabism is now the professed faith of the ruling elite in Saudi Arabia and Hanbalism the majority religious community in Saudi Arabia, which is home to a variety of Islamic schools, and the Hanbalite legal system forms the basis of state law. The Hanbalite School exists as a minority party in India, Egypt, and Syria.

Hanukkah

Hanukkah (or Chanukah), sometimes referred to as the Festival of Lights, is an eight-day holiday recalling the events of the Maccabean Revolt, the reclaiming of hegemony over the Temple at Jerusalem, and a reliving of the celebration that followed. These events occurred in the second century BCE, when Judea was part of the Seleucid Empire, one of several empires that arose following the death of Alexander the Great and the subsequent breakup of his great empire. During the second century, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (r. 175–164) emerged as the Seleucid ruler.

Much of the regime of Antiochus IV was taken up with efforts to assert control over Egypt, which were blocked by the Roman Empire in 168. Meanwhile, in Jerusalem the high priesthood had become embroiled in corruption, as Antiochus began appointing to the office those who bribed him. When a dispossessed Jewish high priest seized the moment, raised an army, and attacked the city of Jerusalem, Menelaus, the high priest Antiochus had chosen, fled the city. In return, Antiochus moved on Jerusalem and, in 167, restored Menelaus and then massacred many Jews. He then decided to go further and incorporate the Jews into the Hellenic world. He successively looted the Temple, outlawed the Jewish religion, and ordered the worship of Zeus as the supreme god. To enforce his orders, he had an altar to Zeus erected in the Temple upon which pigs were sacrificed. This desecration of the Temple was later termed the “abomination of desolation.”

Antiochus’s actions, especially relative to the Temple, galvanized many to fight against Seleucid rule and provoked a large-scale revolt originally led by Mattathias (d. ca. 166) and his five sons, the most famous among them being Judah the Hammer or Yehuda HaMakabi (Maccabee). In 164, the Maccabees succeeded in recapturing the Temple; they then purified it and rededicated it. The Maccabees called for an eight-day celebration to commemorate the re-consecration of the Temple. This story is retold in the apocryphal first book of Maccabees.

Missing from the oldest account of the story of the Temple restoration is any mention of a miraculous occurrence that reputedly accompanied this initial celebration. It seems that the olive oil needed to keep the lamp in the Temple lighted was lacking. Only enough for one day was available. In spite of the lack of oil, the lamp in the Temple was kept burning for eight days—equal to the time required for a fresh batch of olive oil to be prepared. At a later date, the leaders of the community instituted Hanukkah to commemorate the miracle that occurred during the original celebration of the rededication of the temple.

Several explanations of the events following the Maccabean Revolt have been offered. Some have suggested that the eight-day celebration was in fact the holding of the festivals of Sukkot (the Feast of Tabernacles) and Shemini Atzeret, for their proper celebrations had not been possible during the years of the revolt. These two holy days combined take eight days.

Modern scholarship on the Maccabean era has suggested that what propelled Antiochus to introduce the decrees outlawing Judaism was not Hellenistic zeal but rather a determination to quash an internal provincial civil war. These scholars focus on the fighting in Jerusalem among the followers of the various claimants to the high priesthood. Since the Temple and Judaism seemed to lie at the center of the civil war, Antiochus subsequently decided to extirpate Judaism and demand that the Jews adapt Greek culture and religion.

Modern Hanukkah is an eight-day celebration starting on the 25th day of the month of Kislev on the Hebrew calendar, which places it in late November or December on the Common Era calendar. There is a story told in the second book of Maccabees concerning the relighting of the altar fire by Nehemiah as the result of a miracle that had occurred on Kislev 25. This event from an earlier era appears to be the reason Judah Maccabees selected Kislev as the day for the rededication of the altar in 165 BCE.

Observance is carried out through a set of rituals performed each day of the eight days. Most are family-based and occur around the evening meal, the most important being the lighting of the candles soon after nightfall. On the first night a single light is lit, that number increasing by one each of the eight nights. The Hanukkah menorah has room for nine candles, the ninth, the shamash or guardian candle, should be higher than the others and is used to light the other candles. As the candles are lit, specific blessings over the lights and remembering God's miracles are said.

Other objects closely associated with Hanukkah are the dreidel, a four-sided spinning top that is used in a game that children play on the holiday. Also it is customary to eat foods fried in oil on the holiday. These include potato pancakes called latkes and jelly donuts.

In the modern West, Hanukkah has become a time of gift giving. The custom may be dated from 17th-century Poland when children were given money to pass on to their teachers. Eventually money was given to the children to keep for themselves. While most Hanukkah money was and remains in the form of small coins, Hanukkah in the modern world serves as the occasion for larger monetary gifts. Hanukkah also seems to have been the inspiration for chocolate companies to create coin-shaped chocolate covered in gold or silver foil.

In the late 20th century, Hanukkah was increasingly seen as one of a set of winter-season holidays that have absorbed elements of the secular side of Christmas, especially its gift giving. For some, it has become an occasion to give, especially to children, a gift on each night of the holiday. The eight days of Hanukkah are official holidays in Israel.

Hanuman Jayanti

Hanuman Jayanti is a Hindu holiday that celebrates the birth of Hanuman, the popular deity who appears as a monkey. Actually, he is of the vanara, the race of ape-like humanoids who play a prominent role in the India epic Ramayana. The vanara were created by the gods to assist the deity Rama in his battle against the demon Ravana. They possess strength and a spectrum of godly traits. Hanuman led the vanara in the fight against Ravana.

Hanuman is said to have been born to Anjana, a vanara who prior to her birth on Earth was a celestial being. There are several places that lay claims to be the spot of Hanuman's birth. The several stories about Anjana and Kesari, her husband, describe them as devotees of Siva and Hanuman as a product of that devotion.

The fifth book in the Ramayana is primarily concerned with the many adventures of Hanuman. They tell of his strong devotion, especially to Rama and Sita, his strength, his magical powers, and his ability to subdue evil spirits. He is often pictured having ripped open his chest to show a picture of Rama and Sita, the deities he carries in his heart.

Hanuman temples are found in most towns of any size throughout India. Hanuman Jayanti is celebrated during the Hindu lunar month of Chaitra (March–April), the exact day varying in different areas. The most distinct celebrations occur in Tamil Nadu and Kerala, in southernmost India, where the Hanuman Jayanti is celebrated in the lunar month of Margazhi (December–January). Wherever it is celebrated, however, on the selected day, spiritual talks will be given in Hindu temples (and not limited to those especially dedicated to the deity.) These talks will begin early in the morning. Hanuman was reputedly born at sunrise, and at this moment, the talks will be paused while sacred food (Prasad) will be distributed among those at the temple.

In one of the stories about Hanuman, he observed Sita applying sindhur (the unique mark found on the foreheads of most Indian women) to her head. Hanuman inquired into the rationale for it, and Sita indicated that it would ensure a long life for her husband (Rama). Hanuman then took the material and smeared it over his entire body, an act aimed at ensuring Rama's immortality. In remembrance of this account, devotees visit Hanuman temples and apply sindhur from the Hanuman statues to their foreheads. Devotees expect this act to bring them good fortune.

Harer

Harer is a small city in eastern-central Ethiopia, almost due east of Addis Ababa in the Ahmer Mountains. In recent centuries it has emerged as the primary Islamic pilgrimage site on the continent of Africa. Harer appears to date to the seventh century CE. Islam entered the city under the aegis of Shaykh Abadir, who in the 10th century established Islam with the assistance of 44 saints. Then in 1520, the empire builder from Somali, Ahmad Gran (1506–1543), captured the city and transformed it into the center of a large Muslim state. The Ethiopians who recaptured the city a half century later were from the Ethiopian Oromo people who also happened to be Muslims. The Muslim rulers relied on the large city walls, erected by the widow of Ahmad Gran, to assist them in maintaining a degree of independence, which lasted until Egyptian forces invaded the region in 1875 and occupied Harer. Two years later Menelik II (1844–1913) incorporated it into Ethiopia proper. He replaced the main mosque of the time with what is now the Medhane Alem Cathedral, a church of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church.

During the years of Muslim rule, Harer was essentially closed to non-Muslims. The first European to see Harer was Sir Richard Burton, who made his way there in 1854. Today, the city remains home to some 82 mosques and more than 100 Muslim shrines. Three of the mosques date to the 10th century, while the largest, al-Jami, was erected in the 11th century. Among the most visited sites is that of the tomb of the city's founder, Abadir, which several times weekly is the scene of Sufi ceremonies.

In 2006, Harer was added to the list of World Heritage Sites designated by the United Nations.

Harrist Church

William Wade Harris (1865–1929) received a call in 1910, while in a Liberian prison for treason, to be a prophet to take God's word to those who had never heard it. The Spirit came on him, and after his release, he began to preach from the Bible about the one true God, healing from disease, and the rejection of practices associated with traditional religions. In 1913 and 1914, he began preaching in Cote d'Ivoire and the Gold Coast (Ghana). Rejecting Western clothing and walking barefoot, Harris wore a long white calico robe, a turban, and black bands crossed around his chest. He carried a Bible, a gourd rattle, a bowl, and a staff in the shape of a cross.

The whole population of the regions through which he passed accepted him as the messenger of God. People traveled from distant places to hear Harris and be baptized, and as a result his message penetrated deep into the interior. He sent out disciples to carry his message and methods far and wide. On the Ghanaian coast, Harris confronted traditional priests, many of whom were converted. Opposition from Catholic missionaries caused him to return to Cote d'Ivoire, where he was accused of intimidation and fraud, arrested, and beaten; he was deported from Cote d'Ivoire toward the end of 1914. Over the next 10 years, Harrist believers were systematically suppressed and village prayer houses destroyed. Harris returned to Liberia and lived in relative obscurity until his death in 1929.

Harris never intended to form a separate church, and he directed people to existing (especially Catholic and Methodist) churches, but he also encouraged converts to build their own prayer houses where there were no churches; in those houses they were to worship, led by a minister and 12 apostles chosen by the village community. Tens of thousands of his followers formed these village churches in Cote d'Ivoire and the Gold Coast. Thousands of Harris's followers soon found themselves at odds with Methodist financial policy, their prohibition of polygyny, and the Methodist liturgy, so different from the African hymn-singing and dancing practiced by Harris. These followers organized themselves into the Harrist Church (Église Harriste), apparently after receiving the prophet's approval to do so just before Harris died in 1929. As symbols of his prophetic authority, Harris gave John Ahui a cane cross and a Bible, and Ahui was thereafter designated Harris's successor.

The Harrist movement was severely persecuted by the French administration, and for many years its adherents had to meet secretly. Many coastal Ivorians, however, increasingly identified it with the nationalist struggle, and it began to grow rapidly. Sometime after 1931, Ahui began preaching as Harris had done and organizing churches, but he was still severely restricted. After about 1945, people who had been baptized by Harris began leaving mission churches to join or to establish Harrist churches. The Harrist Church in Cote d'Ivoire was officially constituted in 1955, and Ahui became its preacher bishop, and later pope. In 1964, the church was officially recognized as one of four national religions, the others being Islam, Roman Catholicism, and Protestantism. Since 1972, the church has tried to modernize and has a renewed emphasis on healing and the eradication of witchcraft.

In 1990, the church had an estimated 176,000 members, one of the four largest churches in the Ivory Coast. Ahui died in 1992 and was succeeded by Supreme Preacher Cessi Koutouan Jacob as spiritual head of the church.

Hasidism

Hasidism is a form of Orthodox Judaism that emphasizes mystical experience, the direct encounter with the divine. Although it draws upon various Jewish mystical texts from centuries past, Hasidism began with the career of Israel Baal Shem Tov (born Israel ben Eliezer, referred to by the acronym the Besht; 1698–1760). A Baal Shem is one who possesses the secret mystical knowledge of the names of God and who works miracles out of that knowledge. It is reported that as a young man the Besht studied with a mystical teacher, or tzaddik, from a secret order called the Tzaddikim Nistarim, in which he became a leader. He also became familiar with the Kabbalah, one of the older Jewish mystical teachings, and in 1724 began a 10-year period of withdrawal to study the Bible and the Kabbalah. He also claimed to have been in regular contact with Ahiya of Shilo, a prophet who lived during the reign of the ancient King David. His retreat was climaxed in 1736, when he received a revelation concerning his future career.

Israel Baal Shem Tov settled in Mezshbozsh, Poland, and began to teach Hasidism. He taught that each individual could have a living experience of faith, and he encouraged people to cleave to God in their daily life. The sense of oneness with God would lead to joy, which would in turn be expressed in ecstatic dance and prayer. An approach to Judaism that emphasized devotion and piety over law and learning had an immediate appeal to many in the impoverished communities of Polish Jewry, and the movement spread to Jewish communities throughout the Slavic countries.

The Hasidic movement was organized around a set of teachers (called *rebbe*s or tzaddiks) who were known for their mystical, psychic, miracle-working powers as much as their learning. Tzaddiks became associated with a particular Jewish community, and their followers flocked to these centers to be with the tzaddik on special occasions and for extended periods of study and prayer. Tzaddiks emerged throughout Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine, Russia, Belarus, and other nearby countries.

Leadership within the movement was generally passed from father to son or nephew, and different Hasidic groups came to be known both by the town in which the tzaddik lived and by his family name. Two Hasidic groups stand out for their distinctiveness.

Bratslav Hasidism developed around Nachman of Bratslav (1772–1810). At the time of his untimely death, he was heard to have said, “My light will glow till the days of the Messiah.” His followers interpreted the remark to mean that he would have no successor, and the community he called together has continued without a rebbe to lead them. The Lubavitcher rebbe survived the Holocaust and moved to the United States, where he and his successors have spearheaded the growth of a global new Hasidism. Lubavitch Hasidim has also become known for the millennial expectations that have grown up around their recently deceased rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1902–1994).

Hasidism was almost destroyed by the Holocaust. Nazi forces overran much of the Hasidim’s homeland in Eastern Europe, and only a small percentage survived. The rebbes that escaped migrated primarily to the United States and Palestine. Among the survivors was Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979), the rebbe for Satmar Hasidism, a group well known for their opposition to Zionism and the establishment of the state of Israel. Today, most Hasidic groups have their headquarters in the United States (many in Brooklyn, New York) and Israel.

In the 1960s, a new generation of teachers from the Hasidic tradition appeared as leaders of a variety of neo-Hasidic groups. The movement was partially inspired by the writings of theologian Martin Buber (1878–1965). Rabbi and musician Shlomo Carlebach (1926–1994) was a popular figure of this new generation of mystically oriented Jews. The most successful of the new Hasidic groups, however, appears to be the Kabbalah Learning Centre, founded in 1922 by Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag (1886–1955), but now headed by Rabbi Philip S. Berg, the author of many books on the Kabbalah and Jewish mysticism.

Healing Tao

The Healing Tao is among the best known popular Daoist groups in the West. It teaches a regulated system of inner alchemy and is famous for popularizing ritual sexual practices. It was founded by Mantak Chia (b. 1944), a Thai-born Chinese, who was trained in Hong Kong and has a background in both Eastern and Western medicine, as well as traditional Daoist practices. He claims his teachings are a body of esoteric knowledge, previously hidden from the world but now being made available and accessible to the general public.

Chia is said to have begun self-cultivation at the very young age of six with Buddhist meditation training, martial arts, tai chi, and kundalini yoga. Of his many teachers, the most influential was from the Lungmen sect of Quanzhen Daoism. This teacher, called One Cloud, gave him transmission and a mandate to teach and heal.

Chia systematized his knowledge, and in 1974 he established the first of his schools in Thailand (called the Natural Healing Center). In 1979, he moved to New York and opened the Taoist Esoteric Yoga Center. This center, which became the Healing Tao Center, attracted Euro-American students who helped him organize a national seminar circuit. In 1994, Mantak and his wife, Manween (whom he subsequently divorced), moved back to Thailand to establish an international Healing Tao Center in Chiang Mai, which caters to wealthy Europeans and Americans.

Meanwhile, Chia’s principal student, Michael Winn, runs a Healing Tao University each summer in upstate New York that bills itself as the “largest summer ‘Chi’ retreat program in the world.” This program is no longer officially affiliated with Mantak Chia, and Winn has added several new techniques, but Chia is a guest teacher every year. There are currently some 1,000 certified Healing Tao instructors globally.

The Healing Tao program consists of 15 courses, the first 9 being introductory, the next 3 intermediate, and the final 3 advanced, which can only be reached after many years of practice. The first 9 include connecting the microcosmic orbit, developing the Inner Smile, and practicing the Six Healing Sounds. The personal goals of those who practice Chia's form of Daoism include the expansion of consciousness and improvement of their health, guided by the master through the workshops he has structured.

Healing Tao has its international headquarters at the Universal Tao Center in Thailand, where Mantak Chia now resides. Michael Winn now heads Healing Tao USA, which may be reached at PO Box 20028, New York, NY 10014. Healing Tao USA has a website at <http://www.healingtaousa.com>.

Helena, Flavia Iulia

ca. 248–328

Flavia Iulia Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, Roman empress, and alleged discover of the True Cross,

Saint Helena and the emperor Heraclius at the Gate of Jerusalem, altarpiece of Santa Cruz de Bleza, late 15th century. (The Art Archive/Corbis)

was probably born in Drepanum in Bithynia (later renamed Helenopolis in her honor) around 248 in humble circumstances. She was of low social origin and was working as a maid in an inn when she met Constantius (ca. 250–306), who would rise to be emperor of the Western Roman Empire. Out of their concubine the later emperor Constantine the Great (r. 306–337) was born in Naissus (modern Niš) ca. 272/273.

Constantius left her when he became a member of the tetrarchy in 293.

Constantine's rise to power in 306 brought Helena to the imperial court, where she gradually gained a prominent position. Coins and inscriptions mention her as Nobilissima Femina and from 324 until her death she held the title of Augusta, indicating that she was considered an important member of the imperial family. She may have lived at Constantine's court in Trier until 312. After Constantine had defeated Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge (October 28, 312), Helena probably came to live in Rome. The fundus Laurentus in the southeast corner of Rome, which included the Palatium Sessorianum, a circus, and public baths (later called Thermae Helenae), came into her possession. Several inscriptions (CIL, 6.1134, 1135, 1136) found in the area are evidence for a close connection between Helena and the fundus Laurentus. So is her interest in the newly found basilica Ss. Marcellino e Pietro, which was built in the area that belonged to the estate (Lib. Pont. I, 183); she was buried in a mausoleum attached to this basilica. Part of the Palatium Sessorianum was possibly shortly after her death transformed into a chapel, now known as the church of S. Croce in Gerusalemme.

Although it has been suggested that she was sympathetic toward the Christian faith from her childhood on, Helena most probably converted to Christianity following Constantine, who after 312 began to protect and favor the Christian church.

At the end of her life she journeyed through the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire. This journey, which took place ca. 326–327, is elaborately described by the church father Eusebius in his Life of Constantine (VC 3.41–47). Because of Eusebius's description—he is mainly concerned with her visit to Palestine, and he describes her religious enthusiasm, her desire to pray at places where Christ had been, and her care for the poor and needy—her journey is generally considered a pilgrimage. However, it is more likely that she traveled through the East for political purposes having to do with problems within the Constantinian family. Eusebius ascribes the foundation of the Constantinian churches in Bethlehem and on the Mount of Olives to her. He also connects her with the construction of the Church of Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

Helena acquired her greatest fame by her alleged discovery of the True Cross. Her presence in Jerusalem and the description Eusebius presented of her stay in Palestine led ultimately to connecting Helena with the discovery of the Cross. The connection between the Cross, relics of which were present and venerated in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre since at least the 340s, is only first attested in the sources at the end of the fourth century. The legend of Helena's discovery of the Cross most probably originated in Jerusalem in the last quarter of the fourth century and rapidly spread over the whole Roman Empire. The story is told by prominent late antique Christian authors such as Ambrose, Paulinus of Nola, and the church historians Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. The legend is known in various versions of which the best known is the Judas Kyriakos legend. According to this version Helena found the Cross with the help of the Jew Judas, who afterward converted to Christianity and became bishop of Jerusalem. This version, known in particular from Jacobus de Voragine's Legenda Aurea (13th century), was widespread in the Middle Ages; it was translated into vernacular languages and a favorite subject for iconographic representation, of which Piero della Francesca's frescoes in Arezzo are the most famous.

Shortly after her visit to the East Helena died at the age of about 80 in the presence of her son (Eus. VC 3.46) either late in 328 or the beginning of 329. Her porphyry sarcophagus is now in the Vatican Museums.

Apart from Rome, Trier and Hautvillers, which claim to possess her remains, have a lively Helena folklore. So does Britain: according to a medieval tradition Helena was a native of England; it gave rise to various British Helena legends. She is often venerated together with her son, Constantine, in particular in the Eastern Church. Her feast day in the Eastern Church is May 21 and in the Roman Catholic Church August 18.

Heng Shan

Heng Shan is the name of two of the five sacred mountains of China. The one designated the Daoist mountain of the north is located in Shanxi Province. The Daoist mountain of the south is located in Hunan Province. It is easy to confuse them as they bear the same name and are both within this very select group of sacred sites.

Heng Shan (Shanxi) rose to prominence during the Zhou dynasty (1045–256 BCE) and veneration of the mountain melded with the new concept of the worship of Tian (heaven). The Zhou sought to legitimize their authority by reference to the Mandate of Heaven, a Chinese idea similar to the Western notion of the divine right of kings. The ruler, as the “Son of Tian,” governed by divine right. It was noted that the ruler’s losing his throne meant that he had lost the mandate. It was also the case that repeated natural disasters and rebellions were evidence that the present ruling family had lost the mandate.

The mountain is the reputed home of the mountain god whose worship is focused at the Shrine of the Northern Peak, originally built during the Han dynasty (202 BCE–220 CE). This mountain, due to its location, frequently changed hands with the ups and downs of the Chinese empire, and this shrine was on several occasions destroyed and rebuilt. Today, no Daoists reside there.

Over the years, Heng Shan has become known for its hanging temples and monasteries that cling to the steep mountainsides in seeming defiance of gravity.

These are Buddhist centers, the most famous being the Buddhist Hanging Monastery, a wooden temple and monastic complex of some 40 halls that is supported by a relatively small number of wooden posts. It was originally built in 491 CE, and is one of the oldest Buddhist temples in the whole region. The current existing monastery was largely rebuilt in the Ming dynasty (1368–1644) and maintained through the Qing dynasty (1644–1911), with a major restoration effort in 1900.

Heng Shan (Shanxi) rises 7,087 feet and is one of the highest mountains in China. Heng Shan (Hunan), the 4,232-foot Daoist sacred mountain of the south, is noted for its beauty and the large forests on its slopes. It became the site of numerous Daoist and then Buddhist temples. With the decline of Daoism generally in China, many of the Daoist sites were abandoned, and their preservation has become a matter of grave concern.

Heng Shan is also the source of Mist Tea, one of the more cherished teas of a land that values its teas.

The origin of the tea is tied to Tanyue Buddhist Temple, the largest temple complex in southern China, located near the foot of the mountain. Destroyed and rebuilt on several occasions, the present temple was reconstructed during the Qing dynasty with plans inspired by the Imperial Palace in Beijing. The main halls of the complex rest on 72 stone pillars symbolizing the 72 peaks of the mountain. According to the stories, the tea was developed during the Tian Bao period (742–756 CE) when a monk attached to the Nanyue Temple observed a white snake burying tea seeds in the ground near the temple. From tea plants grown on that spot, Master Ching Yan, the monk, used water from a spring in a nearby cave in which to boil his tea. That spring later became famous as Hu Pao, or Running Tiger Spring.

Near Tanyue is Zhusheng Si, the Imperial Blessings Monastery, built shortly after Nanyue, but reconstructed and renamed in 1705 for an anticipated visit of Emperor Kangxi (r. 1661–1722), who never arrived. From Tanyue and Zgusheng Si, a path up the mountain passes many temples, both Buddhist and Daoist, and culminates at the top of the mountain, where the Daoist temple (Zhurong Gong [Wishing for Harmony Palace]) is located.

Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn

Established in England in 1888, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn has strongly influenced contemporary Western magical beliefs and practices ever since. The Golden Dawn drew on a range of ancient and medieval cosmologies and incorporated them into a body of ceremonial practices and ritual grades centered on the Kabbalistic Tree of Life, an important symbol within the Jewish mystical tradition representing the sacred emanations of the Godhead. In addition to the Kabbalah, the Golden Dawn also drew on the Hermetic tradition, which had its roots in neo-Platonism and underwent a revival during the Renaissance. Roscrucianism, Freemasonry, and the medieval Tarot were also significant elements.

The Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn was formally established in London on February 12, 1888, when its three founding figures, Samuel Liddell MacGregor Mathers (1854–1918), Dr. William Wynn Westcott (1848–1925), and Dr. William Robert Woodman (1828–1891), signed a document headed “Order of the G.D.” All three were members of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA) and it was through this esoteric Masonic organization that they had met each other. Westcott had acquired a manuscript in cipher form that had been discovered among the papers of a deceased member of the SRIA, and he claimed to have found among the leaves of the cipher manuscript the name and address of a certain Fraulein Anna Sprengel, said to be an eminent Rosicrucian adept. On her authority, and following a lengthy correspondence, Westcott announced in Masonic and Theosophical circles that he had been instructed to found an English branch of her German occult group, calling it the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

Westcott invited his colleague from the SRIA, Samuel Liddell Mathers, to expand the cipher material so that it could form the basis of a “complete scheme of initiation.” Mathers developed the five Masonic grades into a workable system suitable for the practice of ceremonial magic and as a result the Isis-Urania Temple of the Golden Dawn was established in London on March 1, 1888, with Mathers, Westcott, and Woodman confirmed as leaders of the Order. In a relatively short time it would be followed by other branches: the Osiris Temple in Weston-super-Mare, the Horus Temple in Bradford, the Amen-Ra Temple in Edinburgh, and the Aathoor Temple in Paris.

In due course the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn attracted a distinguished membership, including such figures as the distinguished homeopath Dr. Edward Berridge; the Scottish Astronomer Royal William Peck; Arthur Edward Waite, an authority on the Kabbalah, Rosicrucianism, and the Holy Grail legends; the distinguished poet William Butler Yeats, who would later win the Nobel Prize; well-known physician and pioneer of tropical medicine Dr. R. W. Felkin; lawyer John W. Brodie-Innes; the well-known fantasy novelists Arthur Machen and Algernon Blackwood; and the controversial ritual magician and adventurer Aleister Crowley. The Order also included within its membership several notable women, among them Annie Horniman, later a leading patron of Irish theater; artist Moina Bergson, sister of the influential French philosopher Henri Bergson and future wife of Samuel Mathers; Celtic revivalist Maude Gonne; actress Florence Farr; and in later years the Christian Kab-balist Violet Firth, better known as the magical novelist Dion Fortune.

As Freemasons, Westcott and Mathers were strongly attracted to the concept of ritual degrees, and the grades of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn were formulated in a manner that would align them symbolically with the sephiroth, or levels of mystical consciousness, upon the Kabbalistic Tree of Life. Four of the five ritual grades had Latin names: Zelator (corresponding to the sephirah Malkuth on the Tree), Theoricus (corresponding to Yesod), Practicus (corresponding to Hod), and Philosophus (corresponding to Netzach). There was also a Neophyte grade which, in a symbolic sense, was located below the Kabbalistic Tree of Life because at this stage the candidate who had just entered the Golden Dawn had not yet embarked on the magical exploration of the higher spheres on the Tree.

In addition, there were ritual grades associated with the Inner, or Second, Order of the Golden Dawn known as the Red Rose and the Cross of Gold: Rosae Rubae et Aurea Crucis. These grades were Adeptus Minor (corresponding to Tiphareth), Adeptus Major (corresponding to Geburah), and Adeptus Exemptus (corresponding to Chesed). By passing through the ritual grade of Adeptus Minor the ceremonial magician entered what MacGregor Mathers referred to as the Vault of the Adepts. The candidate was bound symbolically on the Cross of Suffering while also witnessing “the resurrection of the Chief Adept, who represented Christian Rosencreutz, from a tomb within an elaborately painted, seven-sided vault.” No ritual grades were assigned to the three remaining sephiroth on the Kabbalistic Tree of Life. Sometimes referred to as the Third Order, the spheres of Kether, Chokmah, and Binah were said to be the domain of Secret Chiefs—inspirational spiritual masters who were believed to guide the Order from the inner planes.

The Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn began to fragment into various splinter groups during the period between 1900 and the end of World War I, and the practice of ceremonial magic in the West then became increasingly dominated by Aleister Crowley’s doctrine of thelema (Greek: will). Wicca—contemporary Pagan witchcraft—would not emerge as a major Esoteric movement until the 1950s and 1960s, following the repeal in 1951 of the British Witchcraft Act forbidding the practice of witchcraft. Nevertheless, the historical influence of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn has been considerable. All modern occult perspectives—including Wicca, Goddess spirituality, and the Thelemic magick of Aleister Crowley—owe a debt to the Golden Dawn for integrating the principal sources of the Western Esoteric tradition in the late 19th century and initiating a transformative process that continues more than 100 years later.

Hiei, Mount

Mount Hiei, located a short distance northeast of Kyoto, Japan, has been a major disseminating point of Japanese Buddhism. Unlike other mountains, Mount Fuji, for example, Mount Hiei has not been thought of as a “sacred” mountain in and of itself. Rather, it has been the home to sacred centers and the site of a number of important historical events.

Mount Hiei’s association to Buddhism began following the return of the monk Saicho (767–822 CE) from China. He settled on Mount Hiei in 785 and three years later built a small temple, Hieisan-ji, which was renamed Enryaku-ji in 823 by the emperor after Saicho’s death. His choice of a location like Mount Hiei was most likely influenced by his time in China, where he was studying T’ian-tai Buddhism (known in Japan as Tendai Buddhism) and spent considerable time at Mount T’ian-Tai.

At the time the center at Mount Hiei was established, Theravada Buddhism dominated life at Nara, the major center of Buddhism in Japan; all ordinations of monks followed the Theravada format, and all occurred at Nara. Saicho used his considerable influence at court in Kyoto to gain permission to hold the first Mahayana ordinations in Japan at Mount Hiei. In succeeding centuries, a number of important leaders of Japanese Buddhism would study at Mount Hiei, including Honen (1133–1212), founder of the Pure Land Jodo-shu; Shinran (1173–1262), founder of Pure Land Jodo Shinshu Buddhism; Nichiren (1212–1282), founder of the Nichirenshu; Eisei (1141–1215), the founder of Japanese Rinzai Zen Buddhism; and Dogen (1200–1253), founder of Soto Zen Buddhism.

Hildegard of Bingen

1098–1179

Hildegard of Bingen was a unique and influential woman in the Roman Catholic Church of Germany. A mystic, she rose to be an advisor to some of the most powerful men of her day.

Born to a noble family, at a young age Hildegard began to experience visions. At the age of eight she was placed in the care of a woman named Jutta, a young woman from a wealthy and prominent family. Jutta had thought of entering a convent, but chose instead to become an anchoress. As such she would lead an ascetic life dictated by being enclosed inside a small room with only a small window through which food would be passed in and refuse passed out.

An anchoress would spend the day in sessions of prayer and contemplation broken by work such as sewing. Before entering the room, with the understanding that she was becoming dead to the world, the future anchoress would receive last rites accompanied with a funeral ceremony. Hildegard and Jutta began their life together as anchoresses in 1112 at Disibodenberg in the Palatinate Forest. As Jutta also had visions, many people came to visit the two women.

Jutta died in 1136, at which time the community of nuns at Disibodenberg bestowed the title of “magistra” (master) on Hildegard and the abbot asked her to become the prioress. Hildegard asked Archbishop Henry I of Mainz, who finally agreed. Hildegard and about 20 nuns moved to St. Rupertsberg in 1150. In 1165 she formed a second convent at Eibingen. Hildegard had been hesitant to share her visions until 1141, when at the age of 42, she received instruction in a vision to write down all she saw and heard.

In 1147, Saint Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1123) persuaded Pope Eugenius III (r. 1145–1153) to create a commission to investigate the nature of Hildegard's visionary life. The pope asked Hildegard to finish her writings, so with papal approval, Hildegard was able to complete her first major work, Scivias (Know the Ways of the Lord), which recounts 26 visions about the Christian doctrine of salvation. The commission later determined that she was a true mystic. As her fame spread through Germany and beyond she wrote additional works, including plays, a medical encyclopedia and handbook, and several well-known hymns. She also traveled around Germany to give public speeches at monasteries and cathedrals. In her mature years, she became one of the most influential women of her time. Through her many letters she advised popes, statesmen, emperors, and heads of different monasteries.

Hildegard died September 17, 1179. There have been four attempts to have Hildegard named as a saint, but all have fallen short with naming her beatified. In spite of the failure to complete the formal process of canonization, her name was added to the Roman Martyrology, a list of saints, and many have considered her as such. Her feast day is September 17. Hildegard also appears in the calendar of saints of both the Church of England and its American sister church, the Episcopal Church.

Hildegard left vivid descriptions of the physical sensations that accompanied her visions. These records have been examined by modern physicians and psychologists. They have suggested that she was describing what today is known as scintillating scotoma, a common visual effect that precedes migraine headaches.

◆ Hinduism

Hinduism became a global religion in the 20th century. For millennia restricted to the Indian subcontinent, Hindus currently reside in some 150 countries. The universal outreach has not been only geographical. Rather, the modern reinterpretation of Hindu ideas and practices has paved the way to attracting converts and sympathizers beyond the Indian people. As during the classical epoch of Hinduism, the modern epoch continues to be prosperous and dynamic in bringing forth new forms, ideas, and practices of Hindu ideas and devotion.

“Hinduism,” a Problematic Term The term “Hinduism” is a Western construction invented in the early 19th century by British colonial administrators and Orientalists. The construction and usage of the notion is built on a differentiation, current in the subcontinent, previously altering its meaning according to European understanding. Persian conquerors of the late sixth century BCE used the word Hindu, a Persian variant of Sanskrit sindhu, to denote both the region and the people living nearby and beyond the Indus River (the region of today's Pakistan). Muslim rulers, who invaded North India beginning in the eighth century, took over the term and used it to demarcate Muslims from their non-Muslim Indian subjects. The Muslims' exclusive term “Hindu” was then adopted by 18th-century European Orientalists and administrators in an altered mode. Since all people of the subcontinent were conceived of as followers of the one so-called heathen religion, the term “Hindoo” subsequently replaced the previous notion of “Gentoo” (heathens, from Latin gentiles, Portuguese gentio). Thus, all different Indian religious traditions—except Islam—prevalent in the 19th-century British Raj came under the heading of “Hindoo.” From this the abstraction “Hinduism” was derived, first used in English in 1829.

Since then, the notion of “Hinduism” suggests a coherent religion to be found all over India. The construction fails to convey, however, the apparent diversity and heterogeneity that it both subsumes and ignores. Related to the empirical situation in the subcontinent (and now also overseas), it would be more appropriate to speak of a number of distinct but related religious traditions or religions existing side by side within so-called Hinduism. The encompassing of diverse regional religious traditions under the one heading of Hinduism has stirred up both academic and practical problems of communal and national representation. The same terminological problematic applies to the designation “Hindu,” as a person is not a “Hindu in general” but rather a “Hindu in particular”—for example, a Gujarati Vaishnava or Tamil Shaivaite, placing emphasis on specific deities, sacred texts, ways of worship (puja), religious teachers, and so on.

Hindus seldom employ the notion “Hinduism” as a self-description, using as an alternative a term of their own—sanatana dharma (perennial or eternal faith). This term remains elitist, in particular as it is applied more to philosophical interpretations of the diverse Hindu traditions than to the multifarious local manifestations of practice and faith.

Main Historical Epochs This article subdivides the approximately 3,000-year-long history of Veda-based traditions, or Hinduism, into five broad epochs, highlighting the main developments and changes. (The references section directs the reader to topics and voices that deserve a fuller treatment than is possible here, in particular with regard to women, Dalits [so-called untouchables], the veneration of goddesses, worship, and the performing arts.)

The Harappa Culture Early 20th-century archaeological excavations made known the existence of large towns, such as Mohenjo Daro and Harappa, with some 40,000 inhabitants each, on the banks of the Indus River. It is assumed that these towns already existed in the first half of the third millennium BCE. This Indus Valley civilization, also designated as Harappa culture, knew the art of writing, evidenced in carved seals. The people built impressive houses of brick supplemented by a drainage system. The script has still not been deciphered, and thus the many archaeological findings are subject to contrasting interpretations and speculation. Speculations also abound in the religious sphere. Evidence suggests cults of fire and fertility, but it is not yet clear whether the many female figures excavated relate to the veneration of a mother goddess or are mainly paraphernalia for fertility rites. Seals seem to have been used like protective amulets.

Epoch of the Veda or Brahmanism According to established theory (though challenged recently), Indo-European people known as the Aryans (Sanskrit: arya, noble, honorable) invaded the northwestern plains of the Indian subcontinent during the first half of the second millennium BCE. It is not yet known for certain whether this incursion of the Aryans destroyed the Harrapa culture or whether the civilization had already come to an end because of ecological catastrophes (droughts). The Indo-European immigrants settled down near the River Sindhu (Indus) and subsequently went on to reach the Ganges River regions. Their language was an Indo-European tongue that developed into Vedic Sanskrit and later into classical Sanskrit. From those early days, Sanskrit has been the exclusive, sacred language of Vedic Brahmanism and Hinduism. Sanskrit texts, some of them more than 3,000 years old, provide ample evidence of the religious ideas, rituals, and culture of the Aryan people. The texts form a huge corpus of scripts that developed over a period of several centuries. These hymns and manuals on ritual and philosophy had previously been passed down from generation to generation by word of mouth and were written down between 1200 and 500 BCE. The collection of texts is called Veda from the Sanskrit root vid (knowledge). The Veda is spiritually audible, meaning that ancient seers (rishi) saw or “heard” the knowledge thanks to their superior intuition. Collectively, the four text groups of the Veda are called shruti (that which was heard). This knowledge is timeless, not subject to change. It is of nonhuman origin; it was not invented or composed by the seers.

The Veda consists of four collections, each divided into four sections. The collections are the Rig, Sama, Yajur, and Atharva; the sections in each of these collections are Samhita (hymnic compositions), Brahmana (ritual treatises), Aranyaka (forest books), and Upanishad (sitting near [the teacher], philosophical treatises). The stated sequence is roughly in chronological order, the Rig Veda Samhita being the earliest text (written down around 1200 BCE) and the Upanishads being the latest (composed from 800 to 500 BCE). The Veda is primarily a liturgical text, being used in the ritual honoring of the deities. The central religious practice was the sacrifice (Sanskrit: homa, yajna), in which the ritual specialist, the brahmana (also known as brahmin and brahman) propitiated the gods. Sacrificial ingredients were milk; ghee or purified butter; curds; various grains; and the soma plant. Also, domestic animals such as sheep, goats, cattle, or horses were offered by way of ritual slaughter. The substances offered would be given into the fire and through this transported to the deities (the deva invoked). Most important was the correct recitation of the hymns and mantras (sounds, verbal formulas); only the priest was eligible to perform these rituals. The Aryans primarily worshipped Agni, the fire god; Soma, a hallucinogenic plant; Varuna, the custodian of the “law” or cosmic order (rita); and Indra, the warrior god. According to the texts and the brahmins, these rituals were essential and indispensable to sustain the cosmic homology—that is, the correlation of the cosmos and man’s position in it.

In the course of time, the priestly brahmins came to dominate the religious practice and to establish their ritual monopoly. The kings also were especially in need of rites to legitimize and stabilize their power. The dominant position of the brahmins, undisputed until the middle of the first millennium BCE, provides valid ground to call this Vedic epoch the time of the brahmins, or Brahmanism. The early texts also outlined the fourfold classification of Vedic society along general social strata into which a person was born (Sanskrit: varna). According to Rig Veda 10.90, 12, the four varnas are the brahmana or priest; the kshatriya, or warrior and ruler; the vaishya, or farmer, trader, and commoner; and the shudra, or serf. The classification was straightforward and exclusive, based on ritual purity. A change of one’s varna and thus one’s social status was not possible. The first three classes were called the twice-born, due to a special ritual ceremony. The male members of those varnas underwent the initiation ceremony called upanayana, receiving the sacred thread. The girl’s equivalent to the upanayana ceremony was a rite during her first menstruation, performed especially for brahman daughters. During the epic epoch and subsequent centuries, this rough classification along varnas subdifferentiated along manyfold jatis—that is, specific occupational and residential so-called castes into which a person was born.

The youngest group of texts, the Upanishads, comprise the “end of the Veda” (vedanta). In these texts the change from a sacrificial worldview to a more person-centered search for liberation (moksha) became manifest. The knowledge of the correct performance of the ritual shifted to a knowledge based on insight and realization of inner wisdom. It was in the Upanishads that the central terms and concepts of classical “Hinduism” (that is, Veda-based traditions) were formulated and expounded. Both with regard to the Vedic and epic epoch, it is paramount to bear in mind that not a single, systematized Veda-based religion dominated the Indian subcontinent. Rather, a parallelism of various religious traditions and strands, at times markedly influenced by local cults, existed.

Epoch of the Epics or Classical Hinduism The time of so-called classical Hinduism can roughly be set from the late 6th century BCE to the 11th century CE. The shift from the Vedic to the epic epoch is based on both socioeconomic and religious changes. These took place in the seventh and sixth centuries BCE. During that time span, northern India witnessed an increase in urbanization and occupational differentiation. A self-content trading strata emerged, and the numerous smaller kingdoms were replaced by larger ones. In religious terms, during these centuries a variety of renouncer traditions emerged. Among the many shramana, or ascetic movements, prevalent in those days were the Buddhist and the Jain traditions. Like the many other renouncer traditions, they questioned the ritualistic predominance and the religious monopoly of the brahmins. The many shramana movements and orders of sadhus (good men, renunciators) and sadhvis (good women) accepted the authority of the Veda. In contrast, the Buddhists and Jains questioned the attributed sacred status of the texts. The two later came to be labeled as heterodox or heretic, and in the course of succeeding centuries various means were taken either to destroy their centers of learning or to conceptually absorb the teachings and religious practices. At times, powerful rulers such as the famous kings Ashoka (268–233 BCE) and Kanishka (first century CE) supported the Buddhist sangha (order); at other times dynasties such as the Guptas (320–600 CE) were less favorable and more in support of the brahmanical sacrificial traditions. In particular, from the Guptas on, the brahmanical traditions regained their central socio-political status in the Indian subcontinent, as these were concerned with the ritually legitimized status of the king, the maintenance of boundaries between the social strata, and the regulation of a person's behavior according to the general principle of dharma (order, obligation). Nevertheless, since the middle of the first millennium BCE and parallel to the established brahmanical traditions, groups of ascetics and renunciators came into existence. These advocated a homeless life, depended for food on alms, and minimized, in varying degrees, personal ownership of possessions. These ascetics, by virtue of their austere life and yogic exercises, became religious authorities in their own right. To them lay devotees came for spiritual advice and instruction as well as to have darshan (sight, seeing the divine) and to receive prasad (food from the gods). In this way, apart from the heterodox traditions, the strand of brahmanical sacrificial tradition(s) was faced with a strand of nonestablished, and often nonresident, authority of sacred knowledge and practice, based on the Veda.

During the epic epoch, both the central religious ideas of “mainstream” Hinduism crystallized and the leading gods and deities stepped forth. The separate section below will explain the main sociopolitical and doctrinal ideas, and thus we now turn to the emergence of the devotional veneration of one god (ishtadeva, deity of choice). The strengthening of the devotional, or bhakti, movement, in the southern subcontinent in particular, the expanding popularity of the epics and the Puranas among the general population, as well as the absorption of pre-Vedic and non-Aryan religious forms had their impact on this long-term development. In this way, during the second half of the first millennium CE, the main Hindu traditions, with their focus on Shiva, Vishnu, and Devi (goddess), took shape. Although the latter often is subsumed under the former—that is, the goddess being the wife or consort to Shiva and thus forming a part of the Shaivite tradition—it rightfully can be argued to speak of a line or strand of its own. The god Shiva in one of his many manifestations is known as a Himalayan ascetic, residing on the sacred mountain Kailas. Often he is venerated in the form of a linga, a smooth, cylindrical stone. He is also associated with a divine family, his wife Parvati personifying Shiva's female energy, shakti, together with the sons Ganesha and Skanda (or Murukan). Shiva is an ambivalent god, being both destructive and benevolent.

Like Shiva, Vishnu is described iconographically in many stories and myths in the Puranas. The followers of Vishnu, called Vaishnavas, venerate him in one of his 10 avatars (incarnations). Most important among these are the figures of Rama and Krishna; they form central figures in the great epic stories. The goddess tradition is associated with powerful female deities such as Kali, Durga, and many local goddesses. The character of the goddesses is often ambivalent; they can give life and fertility, but can also generate destruction and death. Their followers are called Shaktas; the devotional and ritual strand refers back to both tantric texts and non-Aryan practices. At various times—and a process going on these days also—formerly local goddesses may be identified with the pan-Indian Devi, providing additional legitimation for their veneration and their inclusion in brahmanical worship.

These deities were honored both at home and in temples. Brahmins performed a manifold complex of rituals, in particular in the temples. From the sixth century CE on, important temple cities evolved. These cities were not only centers of commerce and administration but also ritual centers, with the temple at the hub of the town and the streets radiating outward. The city formed the capital of the regional kingdom, and brahmanical ritual and the temple supported the power and sovereignty of the dynasty. Outstanding examples of such royal-religious cities were Madurai, Citamparam, and Kanchipuram in Tamil Nadu (South India), or Puri in Orissa (East India) with the Jagannatha temple.

Finally, notable during the first millennium CE, Hindu (and Buddhist) practices and concepts spread to Southeast Asia by way of Indians in search of economic wealth. Records provide evidence that brahmins, kshatriyas, vaishyas, as well as renunciators crossed the sea to find a living and wealth in foreign lands. This process, stretching from the 1st to the 13th centuries, has become known as the Indianization of mainland Southeast Asia and the archipelago. The local courts employed Indian warriors and priests to settle their power and to legitimize their reign ritually. Hindu and Buddhist elements were not so much superimposed on as creatively absorbed by the local nobility and elite. Localized versions of the Ramayana and other important doctrinal sources evolved, incorporating indigenous legends and myths. With the advance of Islam and the supremacy of Theravada Buddhism in Siam (Thailand) and Laos, the Sanskritic culture in Southeast Asia came to its end. In Bali, however, the particular version of Indo-Javanese culture and religion has survived to this day.

Epoch of Postclassical Hinduism and Islamic Rule
Spanning the time from about 1100 to 1800, this epoch witnessed less innovative religious impulses than the preceding epoch of classical Hinduism or the succeeding one of neo-Hinduism. Of paramount political importance was the gradual conquering of India by Muslim rulers, beginning with the raids of Mahmud of Ghazni in northwest India (977–1030). Later, the Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526) was followed by the Mughal Empire (1526–1757). Although neither the Mughals nor—gradually from 1757 on—the British actually imposed their religion on the Indians, both esteemed their religion as superior. They looked down upon Hindu beliefs and practices. In the 15th century, Muslim-Hindu syncretistic interpretations evolved. Most prominent among these new understandings were the concepts and practices proposed by bhakti poet Kabir (1440–1518) and Nanak (1469–1539). Nanak founded the Sikh tradition and was the first of a line of 10 gurus, based in the Punjab. Also notable was the religiously tolerant rule of the great Mughal emperor Akbar (r. 1555–1605). The Hindu traditions, differentiated along regional and devotional lines, also had some outstanding interpreters such as the dvaita renouncer Madhva (13th century). In line with his view, the Bengali saint Chaitanya (1486–1533) founded the Gaudiya Vaishnava sampradaya, or subtradition. His ecstatic dancing and singing enabled him to experience the love of Radha and Krishna. In the 20th century, the Bengali Vaishnava Prabhupada felt inspired by Chaitanya and Madhva, founding the International Society for Krishna Consciousness in New York in 1966. Other important theologians and poets of the 16th and 17th centuries, spreading their devotional form of religiosity in vernacular rather than Sanskrit verses, were Vallabha (1479–1531), Tulsidas (ca. 1532–1632), and Dadu (1544–1660), as well as Tukaram (1608–1649) and Ramdas (1608–1681). The latter two praised Hinduism and glorified past “golden ages.”

Epoch of Neo-Hinduism, British Rule, and Independence From the 16th century on, the Portuguese started to establish trading posts on the Indian coast. They were followed by Dutch, French, and British companies, all striving to gain a share in the lucrative trade in spices. The British strengthened their commercial and administrative position gradually. In 1757, the British East India Company secured Bengal by military force. Over the course of the next 100 years, the company was able to spread its commercial and military influence all over India. The Indian economy was changed to mainly the exporting of goods, which consequently ruined local trade and business. English became the official language of the administration and the law courts. In 1858 the British Crown officially adopted India as its colony, establishing a centralized administration for the whole country.

The industrialization of the Indian economy was accompanied by the establishment of the British educational system as well as the arrival of Christian missionaries. Earlier on, British administrators and scholars had started to study and collect the numerous sacred texts. Charles Wilkins translated the Bhagavad Gita into English in 1785, followed by William Jones’s translation of the Manusmriti in 1789. Christian missionaries aimed to convert members of the high castes, though with little success. They strongly criticized Indian customs such as child-marriage and the self-immolation of widows (sati). Such criticism was also voiced by Indian social reformers, most notably the Bengali Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833). Influenced by Muslim and Christian ideas, in particular by the Unitarians, Roy formed the Brahma Samaj in 1828. He intended to spread a rational, ethical monotheism, which according to him had its roots in the Upanishads and Brahma Sutra. The society was modeled on Christian reform movements and met regularly for religious services during which passages from the Upanishads were read, hymns sung, and sermons delivered. Some 50 years later, Dayananda Saraswati (1824–1883) founded the Arya Samaj in 1875. He emphasized a return to the Veda and denied the authenticity of Puranic Hinduism. The Arya Samaj criticized brahman-based ritual worship of images or “idols,” worked for the uplift of women, and glorified an assumed “golden Vedic age.”

The Brahma Samaj and Arya Samaj organizationally and conceptually pioneered what came to be known as neo-Hinduism or Hindu Renaissance. They were followed by other influential reformers and their organizations, most notably Vivekananda (1863–1902, disciple of Ramakrishna), Shri Aurobindo (1872–1950), and Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948). These and other spokesmen were strongly influenced by Western ideas and Christian values, making use of these in order to bring about a revival of Hinduism and an independent India. Religious reforms and a burgeoning Indian nationalism went hand in hand, reclaiming an “unpolluted,” sovereign Aryan past. These Western-educated reformers used the English language to spread their ideas, circulated texts and pamphlets, stressed social services, and criticized what they saw as degenerated Hindu customs and practices. They constructed a Hinduism based on reason and ethical spirituality, equal or superior to Christianity and Islam. Although this reformist Hinduism has acquired the image of representing “typical Hinduism” in the West, especially championed by Vivekananda and the Vedanta Society (founded 1894), in India itself the various reform movements have attracted only small followings. Their religious impact has remained confined to the educated, urban strata of Indian society, not reaching the mass of the Hindu people.

The movement for Indian self-rule (svaraj) grew stronger in the 1920s and 1930s, headed by Gandhi and his campaign based on the principle of satyagraha (holding fast to the truth). India gained independence in 1947, Nehru becoming its first prime minister. Based on democratic ideals and a secular Constitution, Hindu political nationalists questioned the latter in particular during the last two decades of the 20th century. The nationalists used the religious argument to a large extent for the achievement of political and ideological aims. A climax was reached with the destruction in 1992 of the Babri mosque (built in 1528) in Ayodhya. Communalism and the right-wing Hindutva policy (making India Hindu) have since undermined the country's self-claimed prestige as the most numerous secular democracy of the world.

The late-19th-century reinterpretation of Hinduism along Western organizational models and ideas was vital to paving the way for a trans-Indian outreach of Hinduism. Vivekananda's famous speech at the 1893 World Parliament of Religions in Chicago and his two-year stay in the United States made him the first effective proponent of Hinduism as a universal religion. An idealized image of India as the land of spiritually superior gurus (great persons) and of Hinduism as a religion of tolerance and deep devotion reinforced previously held Western glorifications (prevalent since the late 18th century). This positive perception was strengthened as Hindu teachers, swamis, and gurus started to visit the West from the 1950s onward. A variety of groups and organizations were founded, and they won followers among the hippies and the counterculture. Most prominent have become the Transcendental Meditation (now organized as the Global Country of World Peace) of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi; Swami Pabhapadas's International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Shree Hans Ji Maharaj's Divine Light Mission (superseded by Elan Vital); the Ananda Marga Yoga Society, founded by Shree Shree Amandamurti; the neo-Sannyas movement (Osho Commune International), centered on the teachings of Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (Osho); the Brahma Kumaris; and Sahaja Yoga.

Hindu practices, customs, and ideas had left India prior to this export of spiritual practices, however. Between 1838 and 1917, Britain's colonial authorities recruited workers from India for labor in the mines and sugar fields in South Africa, the Caribbean, and the Malayan-Pacific region. Also, laborers left India to build the railway in East Africa and to earn a living as traders there. The overall number of these indentured workers is estimated to have been in excess of 1.5 million. Communities of Hindu and, to a lesser degree, Muslim Indians were formed in the faraway colonies. The religious heritage was not abandoned, despite attempts to convert the Indians to Christianity. Rather, the religious belonging and rituals were maintained and handed down the generations. As a result, sizable Hindu communities have existed from the time of indentureship in such scattered locations as Trinidad, Guyana, Surinam, East and South Africa (Natal), Mauritius, Malaysia, and the Fiji Islands.

A very different trajectory has brought hundreds of thousands of Indians to the West since the 1960s. Because of changes in foreign policy (especially that of the United States), shifts in immigration policies, and the need for increased work forces abroad, Indians were allowed to immigrate to Canada, the United States, and Australia. Furthermore, Indians had begun a significant move to Great Britain following Indian independence, and beginning in the 1950s settled in other European countries as well. Finally, because of the oil boom, workers were needed to build new houses and cities in the Near East, and many Indians lived there temporarily. A widespread network of communications has been set up by Hindus in the different places, using the airplane, telephone, Internet, and e-mail to maintain contact with fellow Hindus abroad and in India. Also, as is the case with the converted "Western" Hindus, the Indian Hindu communities and their newly erected and consecrated temples are often visited by gurus and swamis from India. Confined for three millennia to the Indian subcontinent (with the exception of Indianized Southeast Asia), during the 20th century Hinduism became a globally distributed religion.

Principal Concepts and Practice At the close of the Vedic and the shift to the epic epochs, the texts of the Aranyakas and Upanishads expounded on the principal concepts of classical Hinduism. The notion of dharma started to become a leading religious concept: dharma, though untranslatable in any Western language, as it has no direct semantic equivalents, conveys the meaning of duty, norm, obligation, and cosmic law or order. A Hindu person is said to act according to the dharma of his or her varna and jati—that is, to stick to the obligations and restrictions imposed by one’s birth. Birth and rebirth in specific jatis is dependent on the person’s karma (action). All living beings are thought to be reborn repeatedly in the cycle of death and rebirth (samsara), this according to the cause and effect of the actions and deeds a person had performed in life. There are different “disciplines” (yoga, from the Sanskrit root yuj, to control) or “paths” (marga) to gain moksha, or liberation, from this beginningless cycle: the path of action (karma marga) entails the path of unselfish action—that is, of fulfilling one’s duty (dharma) without expecting praise or blame. The path of knowledge (jnana marga) is constituted by attaining scriptural knowledge and by this “true insight” into the real nature of the universe. The path of devotion (bhakti marga), most emphasized throughout the great epic Bhagavad Gita, outlines as means for final liberation the surrender to and wholehearted trust in the god venerated. Basic to these different paths is the fundamental correspondence of the all-pervading ultimate reality or truth (brahman) and the human soul (atman). To reach liberation is to understand this basic unity of brahman and atman. The Chandogya Upanishad explains this nonseparatedness in the famous conversation between Uddalaka Aruni and his son Shvetaku: the father asks the son to dissolve salt in water and says that brahman and atman are united in a similar manner. The father ends the teaching in explaining: “The finest essence here—that constitutes the self of this world; that is the truth; that is the self (atman); and that is how you are (tat tvam asi)” (6.13).

The two great epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata (including the Bhagavad Gita), in particular, expound on and make known the central Hindu concepts and the different paths to liberation. These epics, composed from 200 BCE to 300 CE and followed by other texts, such as the Manusmriti (codes of law), the Puranas (old stories), sutras, and shastras (normative and scientific texts), all belong to the category of smriti (remembered, handed down). Smriti texts are of human authorship; they explain, comment on, and prescribe ideas and life-styles touched on in the Vedas. Although theoretically this literature is of lesser authority than the Vedas, it has played a far more important role in the lives and religiosity of Hindus for the last 2,000 years. In particular, the sutras and shastras provide a normative structuring of a person’s obligation (dharma), both with regard to one’s position in society (that is, duties according to one’s varna) and with regard to one’s stage of life (ashrama). These two concerns together became known as varnashrama-dharma. Its fulfillment was a sign of brahmanical orthopraxy, and in many Hindu traditions this model codified the ideal of a “true Hindu life.” Smarta brahmins are especially proud and eager to follow the teachings and prescriptions of the smriti texts. The four different stages that a male “twice-born” (dvija) is expected to take are: brahmacarya, the stage of boy student, learning the Veda; grihastha, the stage of householder, raising a family; vanaprastha, the stage of hermit or forest-dweller, retiring from the householder’s duties; and sannyasa, the final stage of renouncer, concentrating on final liberation. The obligations of married women are generally referred to as stri-dharma, the duties of the wife. According to the Manusmriti, women are to be subject to male control and authority throughout their lives; they have to be docile and virtuous.

As mentioned, of paramount importance to teaching basic Hindu ideas, norms, and practices to the common Hindu were the two great epics, the Ramayana and Mahabharata. Some two and a half millennia later, these mythological dramas continue to attract an unsurpassed interest. The stories and their morale are told by parents to their children, set on stage by village theater groups, and broadcast in phenomenally successful television productions in the 1980s. The Ramayana, or story of King Rama, exists in a multitude of versions, the most widely known being the one attributed to Valmiki. The main plot of the story is the abduction of Princess Sita, wife of Rama, by the demon Ravana and the freeing of Sita and her return to Ayodhya with the help of the monkey general Hanuman. The story’s moral centers on the fulfillment of one’s dharma—that is, on loyal obedience to one’s social role and obligations. In the same way, the Mahabharata highlights the virtues of devoted service to and dutiful observance of one’s dharma. The main part of the story circles around struggles for throne succession among cousins, culminating in a battle between the Pandavas and the Kauravas. The eve of the battle sets the scene for the Bhagavad Gita (Song of the Lord), the well-known dialogue between Krishna and Arjuna. Doubtful Arjuna, who is hesitant to fight his relatives, is convinced by his charioteer Krishna that it is his social and religious obligation, or dharma, to go into the war. As a member of the warrior class, he has to fulfill his duty. Krishna, though disguised as charioteer, is really the supreme Lord, and he offers Arjuna guidance in the same way a teacher (guru) instructs his pupil. In the 18 chapters of the Gita, the 3 principal disciplines or paths to attain liberation from the cycle of death and rebirth are also explained prominently, among many further themes.

The shaping and codifying of basic Hindu concepts and norms from the middle of the first millennium BCE on was accompanied by the development of different philosophical systems and the growth of so-called sectarian or tradition-wise worship of particular deities from the middle of the first millennium CE. From around the third to the sixth centuries CE, theologians and philosophers worked out six so-called orthodox perspectives or systems (darshana) commonly identified in Hindu thought. Each system is based on a specific text and commentaries, containing logic, analysis, and scriptural exegesis. The samkhya darshana advocates a dualistic and atheistic differentiation of self or spirit (purusha) and matter (prakriti). The yoga darshana, based on the Yoga Sutra of Patanjali (fifth century), builds on the dualism of samkhya. It focuses, however, on the spiritual discipline required for the self to attain moksha, or liberation. The mimamsa darshana places its emphasis on right action (dharma), whereas the nyaya darshana elaborates on a system of logic, leading to liberation. The vaisheshika darshana constitutes a system of atomistic analysis of the categories of dharma and their constituent elements. Finally, the vedanta darshana, like the mimamsa darshana a system of Vedic exegesis, concentrates on the Upanishadic teaching on ultimate reality (brahman). In the following centuries, the vedanta system was differently interpreted by philosophers and renouncers. Most prominent among the many have become Shankara (ca. 788–820), Ramanuja (1017–1137), and Madhva (1238–1317). Shankara favored the nondualist, or advaita, vedanta and established that viewpoint as the touchstone of a revived smarta orthodoxy. He was founder of 10 orders of samnyasis (renouncers) and set up 4 (or 5) principal monasteries (mathas) or seats of learning (vidyapithas). The leading men of these seats are renowned spiritual and normative leaders known as Shankaracharyas (masters [in the tradition] of Shankara), playing an important role through the centuries and up to the present. Ramanuja taught a qualified nondualist, or vishishtadvaita, Vedanta different from Shankara's theology. He disagreed with Shankara on the nature of brahman, the individual selves, and the world. Ramanuja was the leader of a Shri Vaishnava Order (followers of Vishnu), arguing that Vishnu-Narayana is the ultimate brahman, his relation to the world and souls being "qualified" as substance to attribute. In contrast to Shankara's and Ramanuja's understandings, Madhva exposed a dualist, or dvaita, vedanta. He stressed the absolute sovereignty of God and differentiated the fivefold set of absolute distinctions between (1) God and souls, (2) God and the world, (3) souls and souls, (4) souls and the world, and (5) matter in its different aspects. These theological conceptualizations cannot be differentiated from philosophical systematizations; a sharp distinction is hardly possible.

Worship and the veneration of the chosen deity take many different forms in the Hindu traditions and sampradayas. To the vast majority of people, the above sketched philosophical investigations are rather less known. The bulk of devotees engage in the recitation of the name of the deity, in praying to the various gods and goddesses and receiving darshan, in joint singing at a meeting (samkirtana, bhajana singing), in night vigils of prayer and song, and in attending fire sacrifices in the temple or at home. Individual prayer is more prevalent than congregational forms of worship. A devotee may concentrate on a mental image of a god or pray in front of an image that expresses a divine spirit (murti). The honoring and worship can be daily, or it can be performed occasionally before the home shrine and without a foot ever set in a temple. Also, some may go on a pilgrimage (tirthayatra) to the holy spots in India, while many will attend the various specific festival days (utsava, yatra), celebrated throughout the year. One of the most popular forms of worship is the puja, the ritual offering of hospitality to a god or goddess as a most welcome and honored guest. The brahman offers flowers, camphor, water, light, fruits, and food, as well as mantras to venerate the deity. At specific days and occasions, a ritual bathing (abhishekam) will take place, the brahman offering a number of precious ingredients to the deity. As an expression of one's faith and devotion, a devotee may give gifts (dana) and undertake fasts and vows (vrata). In life-cycle ceremonies, memorial rites, and rites of expiation, the favor of the deity is sought through prayer and invocations. Of particular practical importance for many Hindus is the knowledge of auspicious times according to astrological constellations. In ancient times these were used to determine the appropriate times for Vedic sacrifices, and it has become a common belief that terrestrial events correspond to celestial phenomena. The constellations are held to have a direct effect on important life events. Hindus consult an astrologer or a brahman to have a horoscope cast, providing information about beneficial and unfavorable times. According to the days and hours specified, children's ritual names are selected, marriages arranged and performed, debts paid, businesses started, travels undertaken, and much more. In contrast to Western astrologies, the Hindu system considers the Moon rather than the Sun to be of fundamental importance.

Hirsch, Samson Raphael

1808–1888

Samson Raphael Hirsh, a rabbi for more than 35 years in Frankfurt, Germany, is today counted one of the major voices in the founding of the modern Orthodox movement in Judaism. During his Hamburg years, he wrote a number of books, edited a magazine, and headed a school that integrated Jewish and secular studies, and through which he propagated his basic idea of Torah im Derech Eretz (Torah with the way of the land).

Hirsh was born June 20, 1808, in Hamburg, Germany, where he also spent his early years. While he was attending public schools, his parents saw to his Jewish education in the home. His grandfather, Mendel Frankfurter, had founded the Talmud Torah, a Jewish religious school in Hamburg, and his father was an active observant Jew.

By the time Hirsch began his training for the rabinate, he had come to the idea of synthesizing traditional Jewish teachings with Western culture. After his ordination as a rabbi, he pursued further studies in classical languages, history, and philosophy at the University of Bonn, where he would meet Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), later a founding leader of Reform Judaism. Hirsch assume his first rabbinical position at Oldenburg, Saxony, and then in 1846 was named the district rabbi of Moravia (in what is now the Czech Republic).

While in Moravia in 1851, he developed a concern over the assimilation of the Jewish community into the larger culture, and immediately after he assumed his long-term post at Frankfurt, he launched an initiative to create Jewish schools, ritual baths (mikvas), and slaughter houses (kashrui) that would provide kosher food. On the Sabbath, he assumed some of the outward form of the popular Jewish Reformers. He wore a robe similar to the Protestant Christian clergy, delivered his sermons in the vernacular, and shaved off his beard. The synagogue had a male choir and emphasized the study of the Tanakh (Jewish Bible) over the study of the Talmud.

At the same time, Hirsh emerged as a defender of traditional Judaism. While at Oldenburg, he had published the Nineteen Letters of ben Uziel (1836), an articulate and even unique defense of “orthodoxy” that recognized the existence of and responded to the developing Reform movement in a way traditionalists had previously felt unnecessary. Two years later he released Choreb, a rationalist explanation and defense of the mitzvah, the traditional 613 commandments that Jews find in the Torah, which he followed with a commentary on the Torah (Jewish Bible).

Hirsch planted one foot in the modern world, while arguing that Jews could adhere to Jewish law and participate in modern society. This position became known as neo-Orthodoxy and the resultant neo-Orthodox movement emerged as the first effort among traditionalists to counter the rise of Reform. Hirsh rejected any attempt to abrogate Jewish ritual law (halakhah) and the subtle undermining of tradition he perceived in the historical approach to Judaism asserted by theologian Zechariah Frankel (1801–1875). He affirmed that God was the author of the Torah and that God had dictated Jewish law via oral tradition. Thus he concluded that Jews could embrace all of Western culture in so far as it did not conflict with or distract from the observance of Jewish law.

In Frankfurt, Hirsch emerged as a capable opponent of Reform Judaism and led in the formation of the modern Orthodox movement, whose members observed traditional Jewish practice while as far as possible fully interacting with Western society. After guiding the Frankfurt community for more than three decades, Hirsch passed away December 31, 1888, in Frankfurt, where he was also buried. Hirsch is credited with assisting traditional Judaism's successful countering of the new threat of cultural assimilation and in the process with creating the Orthodox movement

His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council

The His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council is the administrative authority, operating under the leadership of the Aga Khan, for the contemporary Nizari Ismaili Muslim community. The Nizari Ismailis, as a separate branch of Ismaili Islam, originated during the years of the Fatimid dynasty in Egypt. In 1094 CE, Abu Mansur Nizar (1045–1095) succeeded his father Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mustansir bi'llah (d. 1094) as caliph of Egypt and imam for the Ismaili

Aga Khan I, spiritual leader of the Nizari Ismailis, a Shiite Islamic sect that returned to prominence in British India during the early 20th century. (Dumasia, Naoroji M, The Aga Khan and His Ancestors: A Biographical and Historical Sketch, 1936) community. However, some part of the population favored his younger brother, Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad (1074–1101). A civil war resulted, and Nizar was defeated and subsequently executed. His death appeared to end his cause, but Ismailis in Persia and Iraq continued to recognize his lineage. After the fall of the Fatimid dynasty and the suppression of Ismaili belief in Egypt, the Persians became the center of the surviving community.

For several centuries, Ismaili life was centered upon the famous mountain fortress at Alamut in northern Persia (and similar mountain fortresses in Syria and Lebanon). During this era, the Ismailis became known as the Assassins, a name derived from their use of hashish, but later applied to their practice of sending out trained killers to assassinate their enemies. Their life at Alamut was brought to an end by the Mongols in 1256, and the last of the mountain outposts were finally overrun by the Ottomans in the 16th century. They were left as a minority Muslim community, but they still possessed a leadership in the lineage of Nizar, whom they believed to be in a direct familial lineage with Muhammad through his daughter and his son-in-law Ali. In the 1830s, the leader was given the honorific title, Aga Khan, by which he and his successors have since been known.

During the Alamut years the Ismaili community expanded to India when a number of missionaries began to build what became a growing following in Gujarat and the Sind (now part of Pakistan). By the beginning of the 19th century, the largest groups of Ismailis resided in India. Thus when the Aga Khan was forced out of Persia in 1840, it was only natural that he would assume a new residence among his followers in India. Locally, his followers became known as Khojas. Here they developed a distinctive literature focused in ginans, a variety of hymnlike poems utilizing local languages that embody Ismaili theological and speculative beliefs.

The contemporary Nazari Ismaili community is under the absolute spiritual guidance of the Aga Khan, a belief that was spelled out in the 1986 constitution granted to the community. The administration of the community is placed in the hands of the His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, which takes on life through a number of national and local councils that are found wherever the Nizari Ismailis have spread. During the 19th century, many Ismailis began to move to East Africa and in the 20th century to Europe and North America. It is estimated that there are some 30 million Nazari Ismailis worldwide.

During the first half of the 20th century, the Aga Khan authorized the formation of a spectrum of institutions for social and economic development on the Indian subcontinent and in East Africa. These have now been grouped in the Aga Khan Development Network, which includes the Aga Khan Foundation, the Aga Khan Educational Services, the Aga Khan Fund for Economic Development, Aga Khan Health Services, Aga Khan Planning and Business Services, the Aga Khan Trust for Culture, Aga Khan University (Pakistan), and the University of Central Asia (with projected campuses in Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Kazakhstan). The network may be contacted through its Internet site, <http://www.akdn.org>, or at its international offices at 1-3 Avenue de la Paix, PO Box 2369, CH-1211 Geneva 2, Switzerland. Several of the national councils have websites.

Hoa Hao Buddhism

Hoa Hao Buddhism (Phat Giao Hoa Hao, or PGHH) is a Vietnamese reformist Buddhist movement combining Buddhism and the cults of ancestors. Hoa Hao is considered by its followers to be a reform branch of Buddhism. It does not have an institutionalized priesthood and rejects many of the ritual aspects of orthodox Mahayana Buddhism. For instance, even the most dedicated followers of Hoa Hao, who would in more orthodox traditions be monks, are allowed to live with their families and are not required to shave their heads. Hoa Hao followers worship Buddha at least twice a day. Hoa Hao altars display no Buddha statues but a piece of brown cloth. Their flag is rectangular and brown, bearing no symbols.

Hoa Hao followers believe that their movement is an extension of the Buu Son Ky Huong (literally, "Strange Fragrance of Precious Mountains") sect, which was established in Vietnam in 1849. Hoa Hao Buddhism was launched in 1939 by charismatic 20-year-old visionary Huynh Phu So. His teaching highlighted basic Buddhist doctrines and the concept of “Four Debts,” namely, duties to ancestors and parents, to the Fatherland, to one’s compatriots, and to Buddhist values. The new Buddhist movement was named after Huynh Phu So’s birthplace—Hoa Hao village in Tan Chau District, Chau Doc Province, which is in the Mekong Delta near the Cambodian border.

Within a few months, Huynh Phu So gained the adherence of half a million followers. Also, in 1939 the young leader had composed four volumes of traditional Vietnamese verses, which aimed at propagating the basics of Hoa Hao doctrine. These works, composed in the language of ordinary speech, totaled about 150,000 words, and more than 800,000 copies were distributed.

During World War II, the Hoa Hao started a military build-up. When Vietnam declared its independence in 1945, Huynh Phu So allied with the Viet Minh to resist the French troops. On September 21, 1946, Huynh Phu So established the Social Democrat Party of Vietnam (Viet Nam Dan Chu Xa Hoi Dang, also known as Dan Xa). But the alliance between the Hoa Hao and the Viet Minh did not last. In 1947 Huynh Phu So was invited for talks by the Communists and executed. Beliefs that Huynh Phu So’s avatar will soon descend to Earth still persist among the Hoa Hao, constituting a potentially explosive amalgamation of millenarian themes and motives of personal allegiance.

In the wake of the 1954 Geneva Agreements, the Hoa Hao community suffered persecution under the regime of Ngo Dinh Diem. Only after the overthrow of Diem in November 1963 did the Hoa Hao Buddhists reorganize themselves and elect a new administrative body. Since the end of the Vietnam War in April 1975, Communist authorities have confiscated thousands of Hoa Hao properties, abolished its management structure, and banned its major celebrations. Also prohibited is the dissemination of Hoa Hao sacred scriptures.

The Vietnamese government officially recognized the Hoa Hao community only in May 1999, when a group of 160 Hoa Hao delegates convened a congress in An Giang Province with government approval. However, many domestic Hoa Hao followers, as well as expatriate Hoa Hao activists, do not recognize the validity of this congress, since they see it as subject to government control.

Hoa Hao followers are concentrated in the Mekong Delta, particularly in provinces such as An Giang and Chau Doc. According to the Vietnamese government officials, there are 1.3 million Hoa Hao believers. Church-affiliated expatriate groups suggest that there are more than 2 million.

The international authority of the movement has moved to the United States and may now be contacted at the first address given below, or at the mailing address that follows.

Holi

Holi is a Hindu festival that takes place on the day of the full moon in the Indian lunar month of Phalguna (generally in February or March of the Common Era calendar). While celebrated by Hindus around the world, observation is most intense in places identified with the deity Krishna, an incarnation of the deity Vishnu, such as the Braj region in the state of Uttar Pradesh, India. Within Braj, the land of Krishna, one finds Mathura, the traditional birth place of Krishna, and Vrindavan, the town now located where Lord Krishna spent his childhood days. Here the celebration may be stretched into two weeks or more.

In India three stories are told as to why this day is celebrated. Devotees of Vishnu, called vaishnavas, tell of Hiranyakashipu, the king of demons, who had been granted a boon by Brahma, making it almost impossible for him to be killed. As a result he grew arrogant and went on a destructive rampage. He also attempted to stop the worship of the gods, placing himself in their stead.

Hiranyakashipu's son, Prahlada, was a devotee of Lord Vishnu. He refused to stop his worship of Lord Vishnu, even at his father's command. In spite of several threats from Hiranyakashipu, Prahlada continued offering prayers to Lord Vishnu. Hiranyakashipu attempted to kill him. When his attempts failed, he commanded his son to place himself on the lap of his sister, Holika, on top of a fire. Holika was immune to fire as she wore a protective shawl. Prahlada followed his father's command while also praying to Vishnu to keep him safe. As the fire roared into flame, the shawl flew from Holika and encased Prahlada who survived unharmed. Holika was consumed. Holi remembers the burning of Holika. (Later Lord Vishnu killed Hiranyakashipu.)

A second tale concerns an ogress called Dhundhi, a female monster who specially troubled small children who became fed up with her. She had received a boon from the deity Siva that made her difficult to kill. Siva, however, left her vulnerable at one point: she could be endangered by boys going about acting crazily.

The king of the region affected by the ogress asked the local priest what to do. The answer was that on the 15th day of the month of Phalguna, he should have the village collect wood and grass and set them on fire with mantras. As the fire burned, they should clap their hands, circle the fire three times, and make noise with laughter and song. The noise and the fire would get rid of the monster. The legend states that on the day of

People smear colored powder on each other during Holi festivities in Mumbai, India. The Holi festival, also called the Festival of Color, celebrates the start of spring and is associated with the Hindu god Krishna. (AP Photo/Rafiq Maqbool)

Holi, the boys united and chased Dhundhi away by their shouts, abuses, and pranks. Today on Holi young boys are permitted to use rude language without their elders taking offense, while children enjoy burning Holika again.

A third story concerns the deity Siva's third eye, pictured in most representations resting in the middle of his forehead. The story is told that his wife Umā came up behind him and covered his eyes with her hands. As a result, the world sunk into darkness. Again to save the world, Siva developed a third eye on his forehead. When he opened that eye, the light returned to the world. Holi is a celebration of the day that Siva initially opened his third eye, one consequence being that Kamadeva, the god of love, was reduced to ashes.

Holi is an ancient festival, very likely one that began before the Common Era. In one early form married women celebrated the happiness and well-being of their families, but in a way that left in place a variety of sexual and erotic elements suggesting that the Holi may have derived from spring fertility rites. In some places in India, for example, sexually explicit songs may be sung and men might carry penis-shaped objects to brandish. One of the names for the festival is Kamamahotsava, or the celebration for the God of Love.

Today, Holi is the festival of color, and the most popular festival activity is the throwing or shooting of colored water on everyone. In recent years water balloons have become popular. People will commonly wear white clothes so that all the varied colors are visible on each participant. It was also not uncommon in years passed for men to drink generously of bhang, a potent marijuana concoction, during the celebrations.

Holi is a public holiday in most states in India.

Holiness Movement

The Holiness movement developed in the 19th century as a revival of interest in the teachings of John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of Methodism. Wesley had pictured the life of the Christian as one of growing in grace, culminating in the attainment of a level of perfection that he termed “sanctification.” Although Wesley saw the Christian life as one of striving, the attainment of this new grace of sanctification was, like the beginning of the Christian life, seen as a result of God’s gracious action, not human striving.

Among Methodists in America, the preaching of sanctification as a second act of grace immediately available to the serious Christian gave a slightly different slant on Wesleyan teachings. Within the camp meeting setting, the emphasis upon a life of growth in grace prior to sanctification was de-emphasized in favor of a focus upon the individual believer’s prayer for the immediate attainment of perfection by God’s action. The result was a fellowship in which the sanctified life became the norm of Christian church life.

This new emphasis on sanctification gained favor throughout the several Methodist denominations (including the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Free Methodist Church) in the decades immediately after the American Civil War, but began to lose favor with the bishops and church intellectuals in larger branches in the 1880s. The result was that during the next generation many Holiness advocates left the Methodists to form or join independent Holiness churches, while at the same time creating independent Bible colleges and seminaries for the training of ministers. In the early 20th century these churches began to coalesce into the major Holiness denominations, such as the Church of the Nazarene and the Pilgrim Holiness Church (now a constituent part of the Church of God [Anderson, Indiana]). In the meantime, several of the old Methodist denominational bodies, especially the Wesleyan Methodists (now a constituent part of the Wesleyan Church) and the Free Methodist Church of North America, continued their identification with the Holiness movement, while the several larger churches (later to become part of the United Methodist Church) steadily backed away from it.

Through the 20th century, the Holiness churches became worldwide bodies through an extensive missionary program. The larger Holiness churches now have affiliate congregations in most of the countries of the world, and several now report a majority of their membership residing outside North America. In North America, Holiness churches have fellowship through the Christian Holiness Partnership. Also, in the early 20th century, the Holiness movement became the birthplace of a new movement, Pentecostalism, which continued to share its emphasis on Holiness.

Holy Ghost Fathers

The Holy Ghost Fathers, officially the Congregation of the Holy Ghost under the Protection of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, is a religious order of the Roman Catholic Church composed of both priests and lay brothers. The Order, commonly referred to as the Spiritans, was founded in Paris, France, in 1703 by Claude Francis Poullart des Places (1679–1709). The original intent was the supplying of the French church with trained priests, and the first project was a seminary. The founder died in 1709 and the Order's first two members a year later; it survived, but did not receive official approval until 1734. The Order began to take an interest in missionary work during the 18th century. Their first missionary was sent to Canada in 1732. During the 19th century, several missionaries were sent to West Africa.

The Order was almost destroyed in the aftermath of the antireligious sentiments generated by the French Revolution. Disbanded, it was restored in 1804, but did not truly revive until the 1850s, under its new superior general, Francis Libermann (1804–1852), a converted Jew. In 1841, Libermann had founded the Congregation of the Holy Heart of Mary and sent priests to Guinea in West Africa. Out of contacts between Libermann's order and the Holy Ghost Fathers in Africa, the two orders decided to merge in 1848. Libermann became the head of the merged group.

Under Libermann's guidance the Order spread across Europe and North America, where a number of schools, including seminaries for the training of priests, were established. Here men were recruited for work in the rest of the world—South America, the West Indies, Africa, and the islands of the Indian Ocean. By the middle of the 20th century, the Holy Ghost Fathers had sent more missionary personnel (more than 1,700) to Africa than any other single religious order. Several, including Archbishops Prosper Augouard (1852–1890) (Congo) and Alexandre Le Roy (1854–1938) (Gabon), became honored church leaders of note.

The Spiritans entered the United States as early as 1794, and eventually centered their work in Pittsburgh, where Duquesne University was opened in 1878. In 1889, they founded an initial mission to African Americans in Pittsburgh. They subsequently joined forces with Saint Katherine Drexel and the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament to build a broad mission with African American communities throughout the United States.

The Congregation has its headquarters in Rome. There are numerous Internet sites for the Spiritans reflective of its various provinces.

Holy Orthodox Church in Japan

Eastern Orthodoxy spread to Japan in 1861 when Nikolai Kassathin (1836–1912), a priest, arrived as a representative of the Russian Orthodox Church. He began work on the island of Hokkaido, and within several decades had converted some 20,000 people and opened churches across the country. He had the vision of an indigenous church, and rather than ask for further priests from Russia, he began to recruit priests from among the converts. He was able to create a missionary society to expand the work and was rewarded for his efforts by being made bishop and then archbishop of the growing mission. Toward the end of the century, the spread of the church was hindered, first by the policies of the government, and then especially by the strong anti-Russian sentiment that developed as a result of the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905).

In 1919, following the Russian Revolution and the establishment of the Soviet Union, the church in Japan, under Metropolitan Sergei Tikhomiroff, established itself as an independent body. It took the name Nippon Harisutosu Kyokai (Japan Orthodox Church). Archbishop Nikolai's policy of quickly building an indigenous church allowed the church to survive the period of most intense nationalism during the last years of the Meiji regime and World War II. It remained a separate body and was not forced into the Protestant-based United Church of Christ in Japan. After the war, the church developed strong relationships with the independent Russian Orthodox community in the United States (now the Orthodox Church in America) and accepted episcopal oversight from them until 1965, when relations were normalized with the parent body in Moscow.

The Holy Orthodox Church became autonomous in 1970 under its own episcopal leadership. The first Japanese archbishop, Metropolitan Theodosius (1935–1999), assumed leadership of the new church. He was succeeded by the current primate, His Eminence Daniel (Nushiro, b. 1938), archbishop of Tokyo and metropolitan of all Japan. The archbishop resides in Tokyo, where the Cathedral of the Holy Resurrection has become a popular site for visitors. The church is organized around its three dioceses. It remains at one in doctrine and practice with Orthodoxy worldwide.

The Holy Orthodox Church has more than 25,000 members and sponsors a seminary in Tokyo. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1973.

Holy Week

Holy Week commemorates the last week of the earthly life of Jesus Christ. It covers the events of his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the Last Supper, the arrest, and his death by crucifixion. Beginning with the sixth Sunday of Lent, Holy Week includes Palm Sunday, Maundy Thursday, and Good Friday. Two lesser observed days of this week are Spy Wednesday and Holy Saturday.

The earliest reference to Holy Week observances appears in the writings of the Pilgrimage of Ætheria in fourth-century Jerusalem. From this time forward, we have records of Christians from all over the world taking pilgrimages to Jerusalem to participate in rites and re-enact the final events of Christ's life. Eventually, distinct practices for each special day of Holy Week spread throughout the wider Christian world.

Palm Sunday The first of Holy Week celebrations, Palm Sunday focuses on Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem when he was heralded as Messianic King. Worship services include the blessing of the palms outside the church and a procession into the church with participants waving palm branches and singing songs of celebration.

Holy Thursday (Maundy Thursday) Holy Thursday revolves around the last supper Jesus shared with his disciples and consequently commemorates the institution of the Eucharist (Communion). As well, according to John 13, Jesus washed the disciples' feet during the meal. He then commanded them to wash one another's feet. Consequently, Maundy Thursday incorporates the rite of foot washing in many denominations. The term "maundy" comes from the Latin mandatum (cf. the English "mandate") in John 13:34, referring to the new commandment Jesus gives his disciples to love one another as he has loved them.

After Maundy Thursday services, it is customary in some church traditions to remove all of the altar coverings and decorations. Crosses are also removed or veiled until Easter Sunday morning. As well, Maundy Thursday begins what is known as the Easter Triduum, a three-day period devoted to special prayer and observance that runs through Good Friday to Easter Sunday.

Good Friday On this day, the church commemorates Jesus' arrest, trial, crucifixion and suffering, death, and burial. It is traditionally a day of fasting and the Eucharist is not celebrated. Liturgies will often focus on the "Seven Last Words of Christ" and follow the "Stations of the Cross." Crosses remain veiled and the altar remains completely bare, without decorations, texts, candlesticks, or altar cloths.

Another common service for Good Friday is Tenebrae (Latin for "shadows" or "darkness"). Sometimes this term is applied generally to all evening church services on the last three days of Holy Week. More specifically, however, it is used for the “Service of Darkness” or “Service of Shadows” held in the evening of Good Friday.

Holy Week, and thus Lent, ends on the evening of Holy Saturday. Easter Sunday morning thus marks the beginning of a new period in the liturgical calendar.

In Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, Holy Week is marked with church services almost every day from Palm Sunday to Easter. Protestant Churches vary widely, with some, like the Anglicans, approaching the Catholic and Orthodox churches in their frequency and intensity, while others recognize only Good Friday and/or Maundy Thursday; still others, especially the Free churches, have abandoned special services during Holy Week.

Homosexuality

The world religions seem to agree widely that homosexuality is deviant and its rejection is deeply rooted in the context-sensitive concepts of sexuality and gender relations. It is important to keep in mind that homosexuality is a modern category of sexuality referring to a certain sexual orientation that is generally understood as the attraction to and preference of the same sex that goes beyond mere homosexual acts. Owing to its age the traditional literature of world religions doesn’t apply to this concept with its contemporary connotations but only corresponds to homosexual practices. Nevertheless, in the discussion about the acceptance of homosexuality, religious authorities refer to their normative scriptures to define their position. Thus it is important to outline the main arguments made in the traditional literature that are applied by the authorities and still bias the present attitudes toward homosexuality. Due to their common background the Abrahamic monotheistic religions of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam have very similar concepts of sexuality and gender roles. Their concepts of normative heterosexuality are derived from the belief that man and woman were created by God to complement each other. While the Islamic tradition teaches that they were created from the same sort of clay, the image of splitting the primordial Adam in two persons (Judaism) or creating Eve from Adam’s rib (Christianity) leads to the belief that Adam and Eve—originally one—have to regain this genuine unity, which in this world is attained by marriage. This is reinforced by the fact that only the sexual intercourse between a man and a woman results in procreation, which again is the foremost legitimacy for sexual intercourse (this has been very strict in Christian perception, while Judaism and Islam agree on the understanding of sexual intercourse as a sacred act that can be enjoyed within a marriage while it doesn’t have to lead to the requested procreation at any rate). This perception of legitimate sexuality implies the prohibition of same-sex relations, as they are neither fit to regain the unity of man and woman nor are they focused on procreation. For the Abrahamic religions, the center of reference to prohibit homosexual relations is the story about Lot and the people of Sodom, who tried to mass rape Lot’s angelic guests represented as males, even though he offered to them his daughters instead. As a divine punishment for this sin Sodom is destroyed and all its inhabitants killed (Old Testament: Genesis 19:1–11; Koran: Sura 7:80–84, 26:165–166). Generally applied passages of the New Testament don't refer to Sodom (Romans 1:26–27; 1 Timothy 1:10) and besides the story of Lot there are commandments in the Holiness Code of the Old Testament (Leviticus 18:22; 20:13) prohibiting same-sex relations; there are several hadith where Muhammad condemns homosexual acts (in his Farewell Sermon). Nowadays concerned Jews, Christians, or Muslims make an effort to change attitudes toward homosexuality, for example, by reinterpreting the sin of the Sodomites as a transgression of hospitality laws rather than a sexual sin. Homosexual Muslims who have a specifically bad standing in Islamic societies allude to the homoerotic poetry of Sufism and stories about catamites. Another argument for the acceptance of homosexuals is the importance of love in a relationship, which can't be denied to same-sex couples that should be accepted as equal to heterosexual couples and thus granted the right to legally marry.

As a conglomeration of several different traditions the attitude of Hinduism toward homosexuality can hardly be generalized. The Hindu literature widely ignores it, except for a few remarks in the epics and the Puranas that include same-sex relations while condemning promiscuity in general (the Mahabharata declares it as a reason for impotence; XIII.145.52). Furthermore some passages about homosexual practices are enclosed in the Kamasutra (KS II.9) as well as several sections in both the canonical and the secular law that provide specific but minor punishments (Manu XI.68, XI.175). In total there are few explicit prohibitions of homosexual relations in the traditional literature and the religious Hindu attitude may be relatively tolerant, but as a culture it isn't. Hinduism is very permissive about conjugal sex foremost with the intention of procreation, but sexual relations are not discussed in public and homosexual acts are seen as a transgression of the natural order. Neo-Hinduism is very hostile toward homosexuals; gays and lesbians have to suffer from serious discrimination and violent abuses. NGOs and LBTG-activists are fighting for equality—for example, the Naz Foundation India Trust accomplished the decriminalization of homosexual relationships between consenting adults in a legal battle in 2009.

Similar to Hinduism the diversity of Buddhist tradition has led to divergent perceptions that depend on the historical period and the geographical location. There is a general neutrality regarding homosexuality in so far as the Pali canon, the normative scripture for the Buddhist Sangha, prohibits any kind of sexual intercourse or stimulation; within this homosexuality is just one of many prohibited practices (Vinayapitaka, Parajika I). From a Buddhist point of view any form of desire is harmful on the way to salvation; sexual intercourse is especially negative in its effects because, resulting in procreation, it reconstitutes the humans' bondage to samsara. This rule for the Buddhist monks and nuns, however, does not apply to the laity. In the lay Buddhist context homosexuality is rarely mentioned as a transgression although extramarital relations are generally perceived as illicit. Homosexuality is often understood as a result of negative karmic consequences or as a flaw that will lead to a bad reincarnation. In some times and places, however, especially members of higher social strata had same-sex relations, like the emperors of China during Han times, who as a matter of course had male lovers, or even monks, for example, in 14th-century Japan, where older monks took young novices (chigos) as lovers. The legitimacy of the latter might be explained by the fact that homosexual relations can't result in procreation and therefore are less harmful on the spiritual way. Nowadays Buddhist attitudes toward homosexuality are as diverse as they have always been. Religious authorities that commented on the matter so far, for example, the Dalai Lama, were not entirely positive, but homosexual Buddhists are usually not restrained by religious beliefs but social condemnation. On a religious level there are means of identification with the stories about the close and devotional relationships between a bodhisattva or Gautama Buddha and a close male companion like Ananda in the Jatakas, which are perceived as homoerotic.

In the Abrahamic traditional literature female homosexuality, or lesbianism, is widely ignored; some religious authorities expand the prohibition of male homosexuality to lesbianism, but most of them don't regard same-sex relations between women as intercourse because there is no penile penetration; thus they classify it solely as immoral and prosecute it with lesser penalties. In contrast to that Hindu law books mention sexual relations between women and these are punished much more severely than those between men because female virtue and chastity were a greater concern than the right sexual role of the man. On the other hand homosexual practices between women are depicted in the Kamasutra (KS V.6) without apparent judging. The Buddhist Bhikkhunivibhanga of the Pali canon refers to sexual acts between nuns that are prohibited but solely entail repentance (Pacittiya III, IV).

Today attitudes may differ from the traditional perceptions of homosexuality but its acceptance still depends on the respective cultural and socio-political circumstances. While some religious authorities and especially individual believers open up to homosexuals or encourage their acceptance by introducing new interpretations of the traditional literature, others are insisting on prohibitions. In consequence of the process of globalization and secularization many cultures presently fear the decline of their traditional values and moral standards due to a compelling impact of the West. In this regard homosexuality as a sexual orientation is often depicted as an “invention” or a characteristic of the immoral Western societies. This perception of homosexuality as a characteristic trait of the enemy or the foreigner is characteristic throughout history—there are many examples of cultures that began prohibiting homosexual acts along with adultery to distinguish themselves from the other (Jews in Hellenistic times; the Christians in contrast to some pagan cults, etc.).

Today homosexuals in most cultural and regional contexts are actively trying to improve their standing in society and their situation within their religious system. However, if homosexuality is socially condemned or illegal, lesbians and gays don’t have much of a chance to fight for their rights, because of serious social consequences or legal penalties for solely coming out of the closet.

■ Honduras

The Republic of Honduras, formerly known as Spanish Honduras to differentiate it from British Honduras (now Belize), is about the size of Ohio—just over 43,278 square miles. The country is bordered on the west by Guatemala, on the southwest by El Salvador, on the southeast by Nicaragua, on the south by the Pacific Ocean at the Gulf of Fonseca, and on the north by the Gulf of Honduras, which is part of the Caribbean Sea. It has an estimated population of almost 7.5 million (2007).

Today, Honduras is the second poorest country in Central America and has an extraordinarily unequal distribution of income and a high unemployment rate. The economy relies heavily on a narrow range of exports, notably bananas and coffee, making it vulnerable to natural disasters and shifts in commodity prices.

In mid-2000, the national literacy rate was 80 percent and the total population was very homogeneous. Approximately 5,517,000, or 90 percent, of its population was mestizo (mixed Spanish and Indian blood), about 7 percent Amerindian (Lenca, Chorti, Chorotega, Pipil, Miskito, Pech, Sumo, and Tol), about 2 percent Afro-Caribbean (Garifunas and Creoles), and about 1 percent Caucasian. Honduras has the distinction of having the largest Garifuna (Afro-Amerindian origins, also known as Black Caribs) population in Central America.

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion and the government generally respects this right in practice. Although there is no state religion, the Honduran Armed Forces has an official Catholic patron saint. Government officials consult with Catholic Church officials and occasionally appoint Catholic clergy to quasi-official commissions on key subjects of mutual concern. Prominent Catholic and Protestant clergymen have been represented on more than a dozen governmental commissions, including the National Anticorruption Council.

HONDURAS

In May 2007, a national public opinion poll conducted by CID-Gallup that measured religious affiliation reported the following: Roman Catholics, 57 percent; Protestants, 36 percent; and “other religions” and those claiming “no religion” (or providing “no answer”), 17 percent. Previous polls reported that about 4 percent of the population was affiliated with “other religions” and about 12 percent claimed “no religion” (or “no answer”).

The Roman Catholic Church has been the most affected by competition with other religious movements and by the process of secularization within Honduran society since 1950. Despite the historical ties of Hondurans to the Catholic Church, national public opinion polls taken by CID-Gallup between 1997 and 2007 in Honduras revealed a steady decline in the number of Catholic adherents and a significant increase in Protestant adherents, while those affiliated with “other religions” and those claiming “no religion” remained proportionally about the same. On the one hand, Catholic adherents declined from about 95 percent in 1950 to 63 percent in 1997, and to 47 percent in 2007, or less than half of the total population. On the other hand, Protestant adherents increased from less than 5 percent in 1950 to 21 percent in July 1997, and to 36 percent in May 2007. According to many observers, this represents the most significant increase in Protestant adherents in Central America during the past several decades.

Prior to Spanish colonization, the Caribbean coast was populated by the Miskito, Sumo, and Rama peoples of Macro-Chibchan origin (the predominant group in Colombia) who lived in scattered fishing villages on the coast and along the inland waterways, whereas the Pacific coast was largely home to ethnolinguistic groups that migrated south along the Pacific coast from present-day Mexico as early as 1000 BCE, including the Lenca, Chorti (Mayan), Chorotega, Pipil, Pech, and Tol. The Mayan civilization in Central America stretched from southern Mexico into Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras. The ethnic Maya of western Honduras have managed to maintain substantial remnants of their ancient cultural heritage. The Chorti (also known as Ch’orti’) language is spoken today by approximately 15,000 people, but many are bilingual in Spanish also.

Spanish Admiral Christopher Columbus explored the northern coast of Honduras and landed on the mainland, near modern Trujillo (Colón Department), in 1502. The country was named Honduras (“depths”) for the deep waters off its coast, known today as the Bay of Honduras. In 1532, the Province of Honduras consisted of one Spanish settlement on the Caribbean coast at the port of Trujillo, which was founded in May 1525 by Juan de Medina.

After Pedro de Alvarado defeated the Amerindian resistance headed by chief Çiçumba in 1536, the Spaniards began to dominate the entire country. Alvarado imposed the repartimiento de labor, a colonial labor system whereby the natives were forced into low-paid or unpaid labor for a portion of each year. When the Spanish authorities began mining both gold and silver in the 16th century, they further enslaved the Native peoples (Amerindians) and imported Africans to work in the mines.

Beginning in the mid-1600s, the British claimed a Protectorate over the Mosquito Coast, which today forms part of the Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua. Trading settlements were subsequently established by the British, who armed the residents. The Miskito Kingdom successfully resisted Spanish conquests and allied itself with the British for self-protection and trade benefits.

Honduras gained its independence from Spain in 1821 but was briefly annexed to the independent Mexican Empire. In 1823, Honduras joined the newly formed United Provinces of Central America. Soon, social and economic differences between Honduras and its regional neighbors created harsh partisan strife among regional leaders, which brought about the federation’s collapse in 1838–1839. Restoring Central American unity was the officially stated chief aim of Honduran foreign policy until after World War I.

All democratic elections in Honduras have been dominated by two major political parties, the Honduran Liberal Party (PLH, center-left) and the Honduran National Party (PNH, center-right). The PNH dominated the country between 1933 and 1957. In 1963, a military junta overthrew the democratically elected government of President Ramón Villeda Morales (r. 1957–1963) and established an authoritarian regime that held power until 1982, when Roberto Suazo Córdova (PLH) became president.

The administration of General Policarpo Paz García (b. 1932; r. 1978–1982) was noted for its corruption and military repression, including the activities attributed to the infamous Battalion 3-16, a secret right-wing paramilitary death squad trained by the CIA that kidnapped, tortured, and assassinated many political dissidents of the military dictatorship. In 1980, the military junta headed by General Paz García decided to restore the nation to civil rule under a new Constitution, and subsequently Roberto Suazo Córdova (b. 1927; r. 1982–1986) was elected president.

Carlos Roberto Reina Idiáquez (1926–2003; r. 1994–1999) inherited a relatively difficult economic situation from the previous administration. He was able, however, to launch a “moral revolution” to defeat corruption and mismanagement, and most of his reforms were realized by the end of his first year in office. Then in 1998, Hurricane Mitch caused such massive and widespread loss that Reina’s successor, Carlos Roberto Flores Facussé (b. 1950; r. 1998–2002), observed that 50 years of progress in the country had been reversed. The powerful hurricane obliterated about 70 percent of the crops and an estimated 70 to 80 percent of the transportation infrastructure. Across the country, some 5,600 people were killed, and the economy lost some $3 billion. Estimated recovery would take nearly two decades.

The Roman Catholic Church Roman Catholicism arrived in Honduras with the early Spanish explorers and settlers, and it dominated the religious life of the country until the 1950s, when Protestant groups began to multiply rapidly throughout the country. The first Franciscans arrived in 1521, followed by Mercedarian missionaries in 1548, to begin the task of evangelizing and baptizing the Amerindians, and subsequently forcing them to build churches and convents in the settled communities across the land. The Franciscans were given the difficult and risky task of evangelizing Amerindians in unconquered lands, whereas the Mercedarians worked mainly among subjugated Amerindians in the reducciones (organized communities) near the mission stations, where they were given religious instruction and used as laborers by the missionaries; other captives were distributed among the Spanish colonists as slave labor. Convents were established by the Mercedarians in Comayagua, Tegucigalpa (Francisco Morazán Department), Gracias (Lempira Department), Tenocoa (Santa Barbara Department), and Choluteca.

The first Catholic bishop of Honduras was friar Cristóbal de Pedraza (1485–1553), who arrived in 1539 and settled in the town of Trujillo (founded in 1525), which is located on a bluff overlooking the Bay of Trujillo; this area has a very hot and humid climate, which created unhealthy living conditions. In addition, the British, Dutch, and French pirates took their toll of destruction on Trujillo during the 16th to 18th centuries. Bishop Pedraza was succeeded in 1555 by Gerónimo de Corella, who chose the town of Nueva Valladolid (now Comayagua) as his seat, due to its central geographical location in the interior, its relative safety from pirate attacks, and its more favorable climate. The Diocese of Comayagua was established in 1561 from the Diocese of Santiago de Guatemala, under Bishop Corella. In 1601, Catholic missions among the “savage Indians” on the north coast were attacked by English pirates, and the Spanish colonists and missionaries were scattered. Consequently, most Amerindians in that region “relapsed into their original savagery.”

The revolution of independence from Spain in 1821 did great damage to the Catholic Church. Before that time there were more than 300 Catholic churches and missions (called “ecclesiastical foundations”) and public worship was conducted nearly everywhere with some dignity. All foreign priests were expelled in 1821. The revolutionary government, by 1842, had confiscated most of the property owned by the church. Since then the parishes depended on precarious voluntary offerings to support public worship, and the number of clergy diminished in number by 1902. The episcopal city of Comayagua suffered greatly from the civil wars during the period of the Federation (1823–1839), and by 1902 had not regained its former size or prosperity.

Between 1878 and 1880, the new president of Honduras, imposed by the Liberal government of Guatemala, confiscated some of the church’s resources and abolished the payment of tithes by the state to the church. These oppressive acts greatly hampered the proper formation of the clergy, public worship, and the administration of the dioceses. By 1902, the Catholic seminary had been reopened, but it was subject to many governmental restrictions.

In 1908, Bishop Joseph María Martínez Cabanas (1841–1921, bishop of Comayagua, 1902–1921) was assisted by five parish priests in the Department of Comayagua. Nationally, there were 70 secular priests but no foreign religious priests, because the government had not allowed them to return since their expulsion in 1821.

At that time, the wealthier classes of the Diocese of Comayagua, with very few exceptions, were indifferent to religion. There were no parochial schools, because the people of the pueblos were unable to support them after paying taxes for the public schools. Moreover, the clergy were unable to conduct parochial schools because of their obligation at all times to move about from one small town to another among the widely scattered villages in mountainous terrain.

In 1902, the Diocese of Comayagua, which included the entire Republic of Honduras, had a population (exclusive of “uncivilized Indians”) of 684,400 inhabitants, mostly baptized Catholics, except on the northern coast and in the Bay Islands, among the Creoles, Garifunas, and Miskitos. In 1916, the Diocese of Comayagua was relocated and renamed the Diocese of Tegucigalpa, and it was elevated to an archdiocese under Archbishop Santiago María Martínez y Cabanas (1842–1921).

The current archbishop of Tegucigalpa (appointed in 1993) is Cardinal Oscar Andrés Rodríguez Maradiaga, S.D.B. (b. 1942, became a bishop in 1978 and a cardinal in 2001); he was ordained a priest of the Salesians of Saint John Bosco in 1970. Archbishop Rodríguez is cardinal titular of the Church of Santa Maria della Speranza in Tegucigalpa. Today, the Honduran Catholic Church is divided administratively into eight dioceses (the percentages are the proportion of Catholics in relationship to the total population in each diocese): Tegucigalpa (75 percent), Comayagua (92.2 percent), Choluteca (87.4 percent), Juticalpa (90.9 percent), San Pedro Sula (66.7 percent), Santa Rosa de Copán (90 percent), Trujillo (67.1 percent), and Yoro (82 percent). This reveals that the dioceses of San Pedro Sula, Trujillo, and Tegucigalpa have the lowest proportion of Catholic adherents in the country, in that order. It is assumed that the proportion of Protestant adherents is higher in those three dioceses than in the others.

During past centuries, the Roman Catholic Church in Honduras failed to develop into a strong national institution. In 1970, 86.3 percent of the religious priests in Honduras were expatriates (mainly from Spain), 9 percent were from other Latin American countries, and only 5 percent were Hondurans. As late as 1990, the Honduran Catholic Church was one of the most dependent national churches in Latin America, with a large number of expatriate priests, lay brothers, and nuns. In fact, Honduras still has a very high proportion of expatriate religious priests. In 2002, the Archdiocese of Tegucigalpa reported 168 diocesan priests and 214 religious priests (a total of 382), 255 non-ordained male religious, and 561 female religious (nuns), distributed among 168 parishes in 7 dioceses in the whole country.

Diverse tensions arose within the Honduran Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church's post–Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Honduran society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the military dictatorship and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit” and “speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

Since 1925, the patron saint of Honduras has been the Immaculate Virgin of Suyapa. Her statue (only 2.3 inches tall), which allegedly was discovered in 1747 and was credited with her first miracle in 1768, normally resides in the small Iglesia de Suyapa. However, during the week of her feast day on February 2, the statue is moved to the much larger Basilica de Suyapa to accommodate the crowds of pilgrims who travel from all over Central America to pray and ask her for a miracle. Each town and city has annual celebrations (fiestas patronales) for its patron saints, and special religious celebrations are held all over the country during Holy Week, which ends on Easter Sunday.

The Protestant Movement Between 1768 and 1950, Protestantism in Honduras experienced slow but steady growth. The first Anglican missionary, Christian Frederick Post (1768–1785) from Philadelphia, was sent out by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPGFP). Post arrived at the Black River settlement in 1768, and additional Anglican chaplains followed. In spite of their troubles with the climate, Anglican schools and chapels were established among the Amerindians and Africans, but few converts were made among the whites.

Anglican chaplains and missionaries continued to serve on the Miskito Coast until the mid-20th century. Anglican work in Honduras was transferred to U.S. jurisdiction in 1947, eventually becoming a missionary district of the Episcopal Church with headquarters in the Panama Canal Zone. In 2000, there were 41 Episcopal congregations (churches and missions) in Honduras, with about 2,900 members.

Protestant missionary activity increased during the 19th century with the arrival of British Wesleyan missionaries in the Bay Islands, where the first Methodist society was formed during 1844–1845. Between 1887 and 1892, missionaries of the Belize District of the Wesleyan Methodist Church formally entered the mainland of Honduras, where English-speaking congregations were established among Belizean and West Indian (Creole) migrants. During the 1930s, these congregations were taken over by a new mission agency from the United States, the African Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1949, the United Brethren in Christ Mission (UBCM) arrived on the Caribbean coast of Honduras, and soon absorbed the remaining English-speaking Methodist congregations. In 1952, the UBCM began work among the Spanish-speaking population in central Honduras, and by 1986 the work had grown to 34 churches, 8 missions, and 1,677 members. In 2005, this denomination had an estimated 67 churches and 2,880 members.

Another Methodist missionary society entered Honduras in 1957, the Wesleyan Methodist Church (now the Wesleyan Church), which also began work among the English-speaking population on the Caribbean coast. By 1978, 6 churches had been established, with about 260 members. In 1986, most of the English-speaking Methodists in the country were affiliated with the Conference of the Methodist Church on the Caribbean and the Americas. In 2005, there were an estimated 12 Methodist churches and 750 members in Honduras.

The Baptists in British Honduras (now called Belize) responded to invitations from West Indian Baptists in the Bay Islands to come and help them, and the first Baptist missionaries were sent from Belize to the Bay Islands in 1846. Although in 1978 there were only 7 churches and 110 members in the Baptist Association of the Bay Islands, by 2005 the work had grown to an estimated 82 churches and 4,550 members.

Baptist work on the mainland, begun by the Conservative Baptist Home Missionary Society in 1951, grew to 66 churches and 1,470 members along the Caribbean coast by 1978. In 1960, the Conservative Baptists established Radio Station HRVC in the capital, initially broadcasting on short-wave, but adding medium-wave in 1965. In 1978, this was the only evangelical radio station in Honduras and was listened to throughout the country. In 1986, there were 119 congregations with 2,269 baptized members affiliated with the Conservative Baptist Association (now CBAmerica) in Honduras, mainly resulting from the efforts of U.S. missionary George Patterson in the port city of La Ceiba. By 2005, there were an estimated 190 churches and 3,960 members in this Baptist Association.

Three other Protestant groups entered Honduras during the latter part of the 19th century, the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1887), the Central American Mission (1896), and the Christian Brethren (1898). Initially, the Adventists concentrated their efforts on the English-speaking population of the Bay Islands and on the coastal mainland. By 1978, Adventist work in Honduras was equally divided among Spanish-speakers in the interior and English-speakers on the north coast and the Bay Islands. At that time, the Adventist Mission included 55 churches, 97 mission stations, and about 18,400 baptized members. In 2000, Adventist work had grown to an estimated 100 churches and 22,200 members, which made this denomination one of the largest Protestant groups in the country. Also present in Honduras are the Church of God (Seventh-day) and the Seventh-day Adventist Church Reform movement.

Missionaries of the Central American Mission (now called CAM International) entered Honduras in 1896 with the express purpose of evangelizing the Spanish-speaking population, mainly in the nation's interior regions. Five CAM missionaries launched a pioneer effort in the mountain villages, while others concentrated their efforts on regional market centers. By 1985, CAM reported 154 churches and 21 mission stations with about 7,600 baptized members. In 2000, CAM work had grown to 270 churches and missions with 8,130 members, affiliated with the Association of Central American Churches of Honduras.

The Christian Brethren (the Open Brethren branch of the Plymouth Brethren movement from England) began work in the San Pedro Sula area in 1898 led by Christopher Knapp and, after 1911, by Alfred Hockins, an agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society. Hockins later became a missionary affiliated with Christian Missions in Many Lands (1919) and remained in active ministry with the Christian Brethren in Honduras until his death in 1978. By 1936, 12 small congregations, called Gospel Halls, had been established in the San Pedro Sula and Trujillo regions on the north coast. About 1950, missionary efforts were started in the interior of the country, and the Christian Brethren almost doubled their membership during the next decade. From 164 congregations and about 15,000 members in 1985, the Association of Gospel Halls grew to 250 congregations and an estimated 23,000 members in 2000.

During the 20th century, Protestant mission efforts in Honduras increased significantly with the arrival of dozens of new mission agencies and hundreds of new missionaries, mainly from the United States following World War II. The California Yearly Meeting of Friends (Religious Society of Friends, or Quakers) established mission work in Guatemala in 1902, and by 1912 their activity had spread across the border into northwestern Honduras, based in San Marcos de Ocotepeque. Soon Quaker missionaries and national workers were active throughout the departments of Copán, Gracias, and Ocotepeque. However, due to the war between Honduras and El Salvador in 1969, the work of the Friends Mission in northwestern Honduras was severely affected, because many of the church members were Salvadorans who were forced to return to their own country during the conflict, while other members fled to Guatemala and to the interior of Honduras. In 1985, the Friends Church Association reported 61 congregations with only 1,185 members, but by 2000 the total membership had increased to 2,240.

Although, in 1914, the Quakers also began work in Tegucigalpa, located in the south-central mountain region, this field of service was administered separately and included mission stations in La Esperanza, Marcal, La Paz, and Juticalpa. However, in 1944 the Tegucigalpa Friends Mission was transferred to the supervision of the National Holiness Missionary Society (now called the World Gospel Mission [WGM]), due to serious financial and personnel shortages during World War II. At the time of the transfer, there were 5 Quaker churches, but by 1985 the Honduras Holiness Church reported about 2,400 members in 98 congregations. In 2005, this denomination had grown to an estimated 3,490 members in 130 congregations.

Other non-Pentecostal churches established in Honduras included the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ) in 1935, with headquarters in San Pedro Sula. The Moravian Church began work in 1930 in the Mosquitia region among the Miskito Indians, as an extension of their older work in Nicaragua (begun in 1847). Missionaries of the Southern Baptist Convention first arrived in 1946 in Tegucigalpa, and in 1958 the National Convention of Baptist Churches of Honduras was organized with four churches and 22 missions. The Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities began work in 1950 on the Caribbean coast and later in Tegucigalpa.

Several other Baptist missions entered Honduras during the 1950s and 1960s: Baptist International Mission, Baptist Bible Fellowship International, Grace Baptist Churches, Baptist Mid-Missions, the Good Samaritan Baptist Mission, and a dozen independent Baptist groups. Also present in Honduras are the Church of the Nazarene, the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, the independent Churches of Christ, and several other small denominations.

The first known Pentecostal missionaries in Honduras visited the Bay Islands in the early 1900s, but it was not until 1931 that Frederick Mebius, an independent Pentecostal missionary working in El Salvador (he arrived there in 1904), crossed the border and helped establish the first Pentecostal churches in western Honduras. The leaders of these new Pentecostal churches in Honduras requested help from the Assemblies of God in El Salvador during the mid-1930s. Several national workers soon arrived from El Salvador, but the first Assemblies of God missionaries did not enter Honduras until late 1940. From the very beginning, the work in Honduras was indigenous and self-supporting, although the Assemblies of God Board of Missions has aided the work by sending missionaries and funds for special projects. By 1985, the Assemblies of God of Honduras had 392 churches with 10,156 members. In December 2000, when the Assemblies of God of Honduras celebrated their 60th anniversary in the country, the number of churches had grown to more than 700, in addition to more than 320 preaching points; there were a total of 1,050 national pastors and 90,285 adherents (about 30,000 baptized members). There is an Assemblies of God megachurch in Tegucigalpa with more than 10,000 members. Also, this denomination operates three Bible institutes in Honduras.

The Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) arrived in the Bay Islands in 1944, when Fred and Lucille Litton went to Roatán and Utila to hold revival meetings among the English-speaking West Indian (Creole) population. Spanish-speaking work was begun in the 1950s in the interior of the country through the efforts of Mexican evangelist Josué Rubio, who established the first church in Tegucigalpa in 1951 with 53 members. By 1985, there were 371 churches with about 14,000 members; and in 2005 there were an estimated 690 churches with 21,200 Full Gospel Church of God members in Honduras.

The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel began work in Honduras in 1952 with the arrival of missionaries Edwin and Vonitta Gurney. Evangelistic efforts were launched in the capital city and in the departments of Cortés, La Paz, Santa Barbara, and Valle, in addition to other parts of the Department of Francisco Morazán, where Tegucigalpa is located. This denomination had numerous divisions and little church growth until the mid-1980s. Since then, several Foursquare evangelists have held citywide crusades in stadiums around the country, with attendance numbering 10,000 to 50,000 for each event and with thousands of reported conversions. La Cosecha (Harvest) Foursquare Church in San Pedro Sula is acclaimed as the “largest evangelical church in Honduras,” with 20,000 attending weekly. In 2006, this denomination recorded 20,000 “decisions for Christ” and 13,000 water baptisms, and planted 17 new churches. There were a total of 250 Foursquare churches with 57,000 members in 2006.

The Prince of Peace Pentecostal Church, founded in Guatemala City by José María Muñoz in 1956, began its ministry in Honduras during the 1960s, mainly as a result of the influence of Muñoz’s extensive radio ministry and the reputation of the large mother church in Guatemala. In Honduras, Prince of Peace experienced rapid growth in the mid-1970s, increasing from about 50 churches in 1974 to 125 in 1979. In the early 1980s, it declined due to dissension from within and the formation of splinter groups. However, in 1985, this denomination reported 143 churches and about 2,000 members. In 2005, there were an estimated 210 churches and 15,200 members in the Prince of Peace Church Association.

Other Pentecostal denominations in Honduras include (2005 estimates by Brierly): the United Pentecostal Church International (220 churches and 13,400 members), Philadelphia Church from Sweden (130 churches and 7,090 members), the Church of God of Prophecy (230 churches and 6,410 members), Center for Christian Formation (18 churches and 6,470 members), the Great Commission Churches (110 churches and 5,500 members), Elim Christian Mission (59 churches and 4,460 members), the Pentecostal Church of God from Puerto Rico (170 churches and 4,200 members), the independent Living Love Church (29 churches and 4,350 members), the Congregational Holiness Church (200 churches and 3,680 members), Gospel Crusade of Honduras (about 200 churches), and several dozen smaller groups with fewer than 3,000 members each in 2005.

During the early 1970s, when the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement (its first retreat was held in 1973) began to grow among the upper classes in Tegucigalpa, several new ecumenical groups (fellowship groups of Catholics and Protestants combined) were formed, and some evangelical groups began to take on a Charismatic flavor. Some of these groups experienced significant growth, especially among young people and families involved in the business community. The Christian Love Brigade Association, led by Cuban pastor Mario Fumero, had 4 churches, 4 missions, and about 500 members in 1978. The Cenáculo Christian Center of Charismatic Renewal, pastored by Fernando Nieto, had 2 centers and 410 members in 1978; this group is affiliated with the Assemblies of God. Living Love Groups (Grupos de Amor Viviente), led by missionary Edward King, are affiliated with the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities; this organization reported 13 Bible study and fellowship groups that ministered to about 700 people in 1978. Some Mennonite groups in San Pedro Sula and La Ceiba also had a Charismatic emphasis. Abundant Life Christian Church (Iglesia Cristiana Vida Abundante) was founded in 1972 in Tegucigalpa by several families who had been active members of the Friends Church (Quakers). Sometime in 1979 during special meetings held with fasting and prayer (extended prayer meetings, called vigilias), some members of the group began “speaking in tongues.” These Charismatic experiences transformed their worship and prayer services into something quite different from the traditional Quaker meetings, which created problems for them with the Friends denomination in western Honduras. In 1980, the Friends group in Tegucigalpa decided to become independent of the Friends denomination, under the leadership of pastor Evelio Reyes. The new Charismatic church grew from about 30 people in 1977 to several hundred by 1980—in 1991, Mario René López reported an attendance of about 3,400 in the main worship services.

Overall, according to a socio-religious study of Honduras conducted by World Vision International in 1986, the Protestant movement in Honduras included an estimated 2,644 churches and 645 missions, for a total of 3,289 congregations. The total membership was reported to be 149,313, with a Protestant community estimated at 450,000, or about 11.7 percent, of the national population of 3,838,031 (1985 estimate). Although no national church growth studies have been conducted in Honduras since 1986, it is estimated that Protestant adherents increased from about 12 percent of the total population in 1985 to 21 percent in July 1997 (CID-Gallup poll), and to 36 percent in May 2007 (CID-Gallup poll).

The Evangelical Committee for Relief and National Emergency (CEDEN) was organized in 1974, following the disaster caused by Hurricane Fife, which hit the northern coast and caused widespread destruction and left 12,000 dead and an estimated 150,000 homeless. In 1985, CEDEN had the support of about 30 denominations and evangelical service agencies in Honduras. Temporary relief committees were formed by evangelicals to aid refugees during the war with El Salvador in 1969, to assist in earthquake relief in Managua in 1972, and to care for survivors of Hurricane Fife on the northern coast of Honduras in 1974. In response to these emergencies, as well as to growing social concerns among evangelicals, CEDEN was organized on a permanent basis. In 1985, its programs included agriculture and community development, well digging, public health, leadership training, communications, and audiovisual production. The organization of regional committees and offices gave CEDEN strong grassroots support among evangelicals in San Pedro Sula, La Ceiba, Choluteca, and San Marcos de Ocotepeque, in addition to the Tegucigalpa-Comayagüela area.

The Evangelical Alliance of Honduras has existed since 1958, but was strongest in the early 1960s during the years of Evangelism-in-Depth. The Alliance has always been a fairly weak organization, mainly dedicated to representing the evangelical community before the Honduran government in matters relating to religious education, taxes, customs duties, and the like. Prior to 1958, an inter-mission committee served a similar function.

In 2008, the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA)-related groups in Honduras were associated together in the Evangelical Confraternity of Honduras (CEH), which reported 212 member organizations, whereas the only Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI)-related groups in Honduras were the Evangelical and Reformed Church, the Episcopal Church, the Evangelical Mennonite Church, and the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

Other Religions In May 2007, a national public opinion poll conducted by CID-Gallup measured religious affiliation and found that those claiming adherence to “other religions” and those claiming “no religion” (or providing “no answer”) was 17 percent of the national population, but there was no breakdown of the percentages for these two categories. According to a previous CID-Gallup national public opinion poll conducted in July 1997, those claiming affiliation with “other religions” were 4 percent of the total population, and those claiming “no religious affiliation” (or “no answer”) were 12 percent.

Included in the “other religions” category are non-Protestant marginal Christian groups, which include the Jehovah’s Witnesses (231 congregations and 15,716 adherents in 2005); the Philadelphia Church of God; 2 Mormon denominations—the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Utah Mormons: 220 congregations and 125,606 adherents in 2007) and the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (now the Community of Christ); Light of the World Church (Guadalajara, Mexico); Philadelphia Church of God; God is Love Pentecostal Church and Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (both from Brazil); Mita Congregation, the People of Amos Church, and the Voice of the Cornerstone Church (all from Puerto Rico); and Growing in Grace International Ministries (from Miami, Florida).

Also present in Honduras is St. John the Baptist Antiochian Orthodox Church (an autocephalous Eastern Orthodox Church with headquarters in Damascus, Syria), founded in San Pedro Sula in 1963 and composed of Palestinian Arabs (mainly from Bethlehem) who first arrived in Honduras in 1890s; the community totaled 592 in 1934, 812 in 1937, and 1,149 in 1986. A minority of the Palestinian immigrants is Muslim, and there is a Mosque in San Pedro Sula. A small Jewish community was established after World War II; today, there are two synagogues, in San Pedro Sula and Tegucigalpa.

Other world religions in Honduras include Baha’i Faith, Buddhism (largely among an estimated 7,500 Chinese immigrants and their descendants), Hinduism (International Society for Krishna Consciousness, International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization, and the Transcendental Meditation movement, aka Global Country of World Peace). The Western Esoteric tradition is represented by the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), the Grand Universal Fraternity, and the Universal Gnostic Christian Church. Spiritualist-Psychic-New-Age groups include the Church of Scientology and the Unification Movement (Reverend Sun Myung Moon).

Native American religious traditions (animist) have survived from the pre-Columbian era and have been joined by the Garifuna religion among the Black Carib, who dwell in at least 50 communities on the Caribbean coast, and by Myalism (an African adaptation of Christianity) and Obeah (witchcraft) among the Creoles (West Indians), who are also concentrated on the northern coast. “Popular religiosity” (syncretistic) is practiced by a majority of the Hispanic Catholic population. Among practitioners of Amerindian, Black Carib, and West Indian religions and Hispanic Popular Catholicism, there are “specialists” who practice magic, witchcraft (brujería), shamanism (chamanismo), and folk healing (curanderismo). In addition, there are numerous psychics, mediums, clairvoyants, and astrologers who announce their services in local newspapers.

Satanic groups have been reported to exist in Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula.

Honen

1133–1212

Honen is a Japanese Tendai monk who broke with the Tendai tradition then prevalent and started his own school, Jodo (Pure Land) Buddhism. He is one of the greatest founders of religion in Japanese history.

Born into a prominent family in Mimasaka Province, he studied at the Tendai center on Mount Hiei, near Kyoto. During his time there he encountered the writings of Genshin (942–1017), a prominent Tendai scholar active at the beginning of the 11th century. Genshin advocated for devotion to Amitabha (known in Japan as Amida) Buddha. He believed that faith in Amida was the only possible route for Japan, which he believed had entered a degenerate age. Honen increasingly focused on the figure of Amitabha, the Buddha of the West, who had vowed to save all creatures and lead those with faith to the Pure Land, the western paradise. Whereas Genshin had focused upon visual meditation practices, Honen emphasized the verbal recitation of the nembutsu, a mantra that called upon Amida Buddha.

Starting in 1175 Honen began to preach this faith openly. He initially worked within the larger Tendai community, but the publication of his major work, Collection of Passages, in 1198, led to a break with Tendai. Then eight years later, the reigning emperor exiled Honen due to a scandal among his followers. He finally returned to Kyoto in 1211 but did not live beyond 1212. His six major followers then continued his work, with varying emphases and different outcomes. At least two major contemporary schools of Buddhist thought and practice (Jodo-shu and Honpa Hongwanji, plus the related Higashi Hongwanji) can be traced to Honen's influence.

Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China

The Church of Christ in China can be traced to 1918, when a group of Protestant Christian leaders in China thought it necessary for the several mission-based churches to become united and form an indigenous church organization. They also realized that if they wanted to preach the gospel more effectively, they should conform to the three principles of self-support, self-governance, and self-propagation (hence its popular designation as the Three-Self movement). Those denominations that supported such a movement included the Presbyterian Church, the London Missionary Society, the Congregational Church, the Church of the United Brethren, the Methodist Evangelical Missionary, and the Swedish Missionary Society. By 1948 there were 24 synods, 110 associations, 2,767 local churches, 496 ordained ministers, 1,448 male and female preachers, and some 172,000 communicants. The church organization consisted of a national assembly, synods, district associations, and local churches.

The Hong Kong Council was formerly incorporated within the jurisdiction of the Sixth District Association of the Guangdong Synod of the Church of Christ in China. It was renamed the Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China in 1953 and incorporated by legislation passed by the Legislative Council of Hong Kong in 1958 (Chapter 1095). Members of the Council basically included those churches, institutions, and schools that were originally members of the Sixth District Association, located in Hong Kong Island, Kowloon, the New Territories, Offshore Islands, and Macao. The Council became a self-supporting organization in 1974 and proclaimed as a Three-Self church in 1980. The Council emphasizes the universality and unity of the church, and focuses on sharing, witnessing, and service.

The Hong Kong Council of the Church of Christ in China is a uniting church organization and a member of the World Council of Churches. Its member churches come from different denominational backgrounds and church polities, but they share much: faith in Jesus Christ as Redeemer and Lord on whom the Christian church is founded; an earnest desire for the establishment of Christ's kingdom throughout the whole Earth; belief in holy scripture, made up of the Old and New Testaments, as the divinely inspired Word of God, and its supreme authority in matters of faith and life; and acknowledgment of the Apostles' Creed as the expression of the fundamental doctrines of a common evangelical faith.

Other than sharing these common beliefs, churches wishing to join the Council as members must also be willing to abide by several underlying principles. They must support the unity movement, emphasize democratic participation, and advocate the three-self principle. They must advocate equal rights for both sexes.

And they must practice a spirit of mutual respect, trust, and sharing.

By the end of 2008, the Council had 65 churches and preaching points in Hong Kong and Macao. These churches offer Sunday services in Cantonese, Mandarin, Fukienese, Hainan, and Swatow dialects. There are 68 ordained ministers and 124 preachers, and a congregation of 30,000 persons. Also, the Council sponsors 26 secondary schools, 2 evening secondary schools, 25 primary schools, 6 kindergartens, 1 special child care center, a family support center, and a campsite. Additionally, 24 primary schools and kindergartens are also operated by member churches. There are approximately 2,800 teachers and 58,000 students.

Honmichi

Honmichi (Original Way) honors both the founder of Tenrikyo, Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), and its own founder, Onishi Aijiro (1881–1958). The latter, a former member of Tenrikyo and one of its church leaders in Yamaguchi Prefecture, believed that the role of Nakayama Miki as mediator of divine truth to the Tenrikyo movement came to an end in August 1913 when the kami of truth, Kanrodai-Sama, decided to choose him as the tenkeisha (revealed one) and appointed him in Nakayama Miki's place as the mediator of divine revelation.

Tenrikyo finally expelled Onishi Aijiro in 1924, and in 1925 he established the Tenri Association for the Study of Heavenly Truth (Tenri Kenkyukai). In 1926 he and some 100 of his followers were imprisoned on the charge of lese majesty, a charge that was made against and led to the imprisonment of several other leaders, including Nakayama Miki, Deguchi Nao (of Omoto), and Deguchi Onisaburo (of Omoto). In the case of Onishi Aijiro, his crime consisted of expressing in a pamphlet, Kenkyu Shiryo (Research Materials), that the kami (gods) ruled Japan before Emperor Jimmu, the legendary first emperor of the nation, that the emperor himself was not of divine status, and that the then emperor was unfit to lead the nation. Released in 1935, he regrouped, but he was again imprisoned in 1938 for a breach of the Peace Preservation Law, and in 1939 his movement was disbanded.

On being released for a second time in March 1946, Onishi restarted his movement, giving it the new name of Tenri Honmichi (Original Way of Heavenly Truth). Later the Tenri part of the name was dropped, and the movement is now known simply as Honmichi.

Many of Honmichi's beliefs are derived from the Tenrikyo scriptures—the Ofudesaki (Tip of Divine Writing Brush) and the Migakura-uta—revealed by Tenri-O-no-Mikami (the creator god of both the universe and of humankind) to Nakayama Miki, the woman who founded Tenrikyo. At the center of Honmichi worship is the veneration of a group of 10 kami (the principal one of which is Tenri-O-no-Mikoto, God of Heavenly Reason), who are believed to be the core of the universe.

Hinokishin, or voluntary activity of a mental and physical kind, a pivotal idea in Tenrikyo, is also central to the teaching of Honmichi, where it often means the practice of the movement's teachings combined with selfless service to others.

Honmichi, and numerous other Japanese new and new, new religions (shin shukyo and shin shin shukyo, respectively), is persuaded that the solution to all ills lies in mind. Right mindfulness is the key to health, happiness, and peace, and thus great emphasis is placed on attaining, with the help of Kanrodai-Sama, the proper state of mind, and on using the mind in accordance with the will of God. Failure in these areas leads to misfortune, sickness, and unhappiness, all evil forces that obstruct God's efforts to assist humankind. The principal goal of human beings is to build paradise on Earth so that the human race can live united in peace and harmony.

Like so many other Japanese new and new, new religions, Honmichi is strongly millenarian. It is also apocalyptic, in that it preaches that world war and catastrophe will afflict the human race before the advent of paradise on Earth.

The current membership of Honmichi in Japan is estimated to stand at 316,000. There is only one overseas branch, and that is in the United States in Los Angeles.

Hossoshu

Hossoshu (Sect of Dharma Characteristics) draws doctrinal inspiration from the vijnanavada (consciousness-only) thought of Yogacara Buddhism, as propagated by Indian Buddhist philosopher-monk Asanga (fourth century CE) and Vasubandhu (fourth century CE). As a Buddhist school, Hossoshu has strong doctrinal links with Indian Buddhism. It intends to examine "the essential nature and phenomenal manifestations of all existents." It asserts consciousness as the basis for the appearance of the phenomenal world.

Hossoshu is the Japanese equivalent of the Chinese Fa-hsiang-tsung, one of the 13 traditional Chinese Buddhist sects. The doctrines of Hossoshu, together with an idealistic analysis of phenomena, were transmitted into Japan four times: first, the Japanese monk Dosho (629–700), who studied the doctrine of vijnap-timatrata under Hsuan-tsang (602–664), upon returning from China in 660 founded Hossoshu in Japan; second, in 658 Chitsu and Chitatsu brought the doctrines of the Kusha School; third, in 706 the Korean monk Chiho brought the teaching; and fourth, in 735 Genbo (d. 746) brought to Japan the first complete Chinese Buddhist canon.

Hossoshu played an important role in the early stages of Buddhism in Japan. In the early phase of Japanese Buddhism, influential and famous monks such as Gyogi (668–749), Gomyo (750–834), and Jokei (1155–1213) belonged to Hossoshu. Jokei, in particular, revived Hosso doctrines with an intense critique of Honen's exclusive nenbutsu movement. Hossoshu was one of the six Nara sects of scholastic Buddhism introduced to Japan during the Nara period (710–794), which became the foundation for doctrinal innovations in the Kamakura period (1185–1336). During the medieval period (13th–16th centuries), three important monastic establishments—Horyuji (fl. 607), Yakushiji (fl. 680), and Kofukuji (fl. 710)—propagated its ideas and practices; in 1892 these three headquarters came under the rule of one single abbot. Though Horyuji seceded from Hossoshu in 1950, both Yakushiji and Kofukuji in Nara each have about 20 affiliated temples.

In Japan, though the word shu (sect) is quite often used to identify Buddhist denominations, in the Nara period it did not denote the doctrinal differences associated with the English term "sect." In particular, in the Nara period it referred to "a group of scholars who gathered together to study one tradition," but their examination was not by any means restricted to one tradition alone. In fact, initially all six Nara schools gathered and pursued their studies at Todaiji Temple in Nara.

Although the major role of the Nara schools such as Hossoshu was the introduction of the academic study of Buddhism, as propagators of Buddhism among the masses they were not successful. Their vast depth of knowledge in Buddhist doctrinal and philosophical issues did not reach the general populace in Japan. Although two Nara schools—Kusha and Jojitsu—had no adherents, the other four Nara schools, including Hossoshu, attracted members of the aristocracy. However, even they made very little effort to spread their teachings among the masses, since they were still preoccupied with performing rites and rituals for the protection of the nation, the royal family, and the aristocracy and with the promotion of culture and education. Only a few individuals, such as Gyogi of the Hossoshu, believed that as Buddhists they were expected to teach Buddhism and help the masses create a better life for themselves. Nevertheless, the doctrinal contributions of Hossoshu and other schools still continue to shape the curriculum of higher learning in Japanese Buddhist institutions.

Hua Shan

Hua Shan, the Daoist sacred mountain of the West, is located in China's Shaanxi Province, some 75 miles east of the old capital at Xi'an. The tallest of the five major peaks rises some 6,550 feet. Legend places Daoist founder Laozi on Hua Shan, where he was said to have prepared the Elixir of Immortality. In later centuries, the mountain gained a reputation as a site where immortality drugs could be found.

The mountain became the home of the Quanzhen Daoists, whose community is presently centered on the imperial temple, Xi Yue Miao. Viewed from the temple, the five major peaks of the mountain resemble a lotus flower and as a result the mountain came to be known as the Lotus Mountain. Today the mountain is home to many Daoist poems and quotations that have been carved into its rock formation over the centuries.

Access to these carvings and other Daoist sites begins at Yu Quan Gong, the entrance temple, and follows a system of paths and steps cut from the rock and leading to each of the five peaks. These pathways are identified with the Dao, the Way, a basic concept in Daoist theology. The pathways were in place by the 16th century, by which time some 150 temples had been constructed at Hua Shan.

Among the important surviving temples at Hua Shan are the Shrine of the Western Peak (second century BCE), known as a site where mediums could contact the god of the underworld, and the Cloister of the Jade Spring, dedicated to one of the legendary founders of Daoism, Chen Tuan.

In 1998, the Quanzhen Daoists placed the mountain's temples under the hegemony of the China Daoist Association.

Hubbard, L. Ron

1911–1986

L. Ron Hubbard is the founder of the Church of Scientology, one of the most successful, if controversial, of the new religious movements founded in the 20th century. Hubbard, a former naval officer and a well-known writer of fiction and nonfiction, authorized the formation of the church in 1954, and over the years authored the material that embodied the church's developing beliefs and practices. These writings are now considered Scientology scriptures.

Lafayette Ronald Hubbard was born in Tilden, Nebraska, on March 19, 1911. His father was in the navy, and he traveled widely in his youth. He was an explorer, both during and after studying two years at George Washington University, though he made his living by writing. He served as an officer in the navy during World War II and returned to his writing career in the late 1940s.

Even before the war, Hubbard had developed a fascination with the human unconscious, and his hospital stay during the last years of the war further stimulated speculation about the nature of the mind and its role in illness and health. His initial writings on the question culminated in the publication of Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health in 1950. The book became a nonfiction best-seller.

Hubbard gained both fame and notoriety for his new theories on the mind espoused through his books and lectures. He had a growing following for Dianetics, even as he redirected his attention from the mind to the human spirit. This change of focus led him to accept the idea of past lives (commonly called reincarnation) and the crucial role of the soul, which he termed the Thetan. The new approach resulted in his moving beyond Dianetics to Scientology.

As Dianetics and Scientology grew in popularity, medical authorities viewed it in the context of pseudoscience and illicit medical practice. The medical community's opposition led to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration raiding the Washington, D.C., church in 1963. At the same time, the Internal Revenue Service began to question the church's tax status. Legal problems spread to other countries. The growing militancy against Hubbard and the church led him in 1966 to create a separate structure, the Guardian's Office (GO), to respond to attacks upon the church. About the same time, he resigned all his administrative offices in the church and retired from public life to engage in the advanced research that would complete his understanding of Scientology. He continued to direct the church from behind the scenes. Among his more important actions was the founding of the Sea Organization (Sea Org), a fraternity of highly committed members, to whom were assigned the duty of delivering the most advanced teachings of the church to its members.

Increasingly frustrated by its inability to track the source of its problem with different government agencies, in the mid-1970s, the GO infiltrated a spectrum of agencies looking for its files. The discovery of this activity prompted an FBI raid in 1977 and two years later a trial at which several church leaders, including Hubbard's wife, were convicted. Following the convictions, he authorized what became the complete reorganization of the church including the disbanding of the GO and the emergence of the Religious Technology Center and the Church of Scientology International, through which the movement is now governed.

Hubbard continued to live quietly out of sight through this period, only emerging periodically to prove that he was still alive. He died January 24, 1986, in San Luis Obispo, California. There is no authorized biography of Hubbard, though the church he founded has published a series of booklets, the Ron Series, which explore various aspects of his life.

Hubbard taught that humans are spiritual beings (Thetans), immortal creatures who live thousands of embodied lives. Similar to other Western Esoteric groups, he believed that the Thetan had, through time, lost its way and forgot who it was. He proposed a complex of methods to realize individual identity as a Thetan and help people achieve a state beyond matter, energy, space, and time. This path is known in Scientology as the "bridge to total freedom." Hubbard designed Scientology classes and a counseling process called auditing (therapy) to help humans reach the state of "clear" and move beyond clear to become an Operating Thetan, or OT. Hubbard also claimed that the human dimension involves dealing with eight powerful drives or dynamics, including self-survival, group identity, and the spiritual dynamic.

Hubbard's navy career impacted his vision and plans for Scientology as an organization. He employed ships as instructional centers in the 1960s and while residing on a ship, created the Sea Org. Its members dressed in uniforms and adopted a military style and drive for efficiency in the implementation of its goals and practices.

Hui Neng

638–713

Hui Neng is widely known in Mahayana Buddhism as the sixth patriarch of the southern line of the Chan

(Zen) School. He is a pivotal figure in Chinese Buddhist history, since he served to articulate rationalist concepts received from Indian Buddhism into irrational expression through Chinese Chan (later Korean Son and Japanese Zen).

Hui Neng's biography is found in the Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch, an important indigenous Chinese text still widely distributed today. He was born in the heyday of the Tang dynasty (618–907). He did not desire to become a monk until he heard a sutra preached when he was 24. He then went to study with Hong Ren (602–675), today known as the fifth Chan patriarch. During his tutelage under Hong Ren, Hui Neng bested the rival priest Shen Xiu (ca. 605–706) in a poetry contest that has become legendary. Shen Xiu wrote:

The body is like the Bodhi tree,
The mind is like a clear mirror.
At all times we must strive to polish it,
And do not let any dust land on it.

To which Hui Neng replied:

Originally there is no tree of Awakening
Nor is there a stand for the clear mirror.
From the very beginning, not one thing;
Where could the dust land?

Due to the deep perception obvious in this poem, Hong Ren is said to have named Hui Neng his successor on the spot. Hui Neng was also given the bowl and robe that had belonged to Bodhidharma, the founder of the Chan lineage.

Hui Neng spent the rest of his life in southern China, at what is today the Nan Hua Temple. He trained 10 major disciples, including Shen Hui. Shen Hui went on to promote Hui Neng as patriarch of southern Buddhism. Although much of the story of Hui Neng is legendary, a reflection of the Platform Sutra, the individual no doubt lived and was a patriarch in the Chan lineage. All current active lines of Chan/Zen trace their lineages back to Hui Neng.

Hui Si

515–577

A Chinese monk in the early period of Buddhism's development in China, Hui Si was well known in his day as a specialist in meditation. He was born in northern China, then under the rule of the northern Qi (550–577), a foreign dynasty. He later moved to Nanyue, in present-day Hunan, southern China. On nearby Heng Shan, one of China's sacred mountains, he built the Fu Yan Temple and the Can Jin Hill, both of which are still intact.

He was also the teacher of Zhi Yi, who later went on to found the Tiantai School of Chinese Buddhism. Hui Si emphasized the role of the intellect in Buddhism, which later manifested in Zhi Yi's teaching that both faith and intellectual activity were important in Buddhism. Zhi Yi compared them to a bird's two wings, noting that with one wing only, the bird cannot fly. Thus a Buddhist who abandons either faith or the intellect would be diverted from the path of liberation. Hui Si is also frequently mentioned as the transmitter of many of Zhi Yi's meditation techniques.

Hui Yuan

334–416

Hui Yuan was a student of Dao An (312–385), an early translator of Buddhist scriptures, based in the northern city of Chang An. In his early life he had been a student of the Chinese classical literature (Confucius, Laozi), but was converted to Buddhism after hearing Dao An's sermons.

In 402, Hui Yuan founded a religious community on Mount Lu called the White Lotus Society (bailian-she), not to be confused with the later revolutionary societies using that same name. The purpose of Hui Yuan's society was to focus on Amitabha, the Buddha of the West, through meditation and chanting, in order to gain entry into Amitabha's western paradise. Hui Yuan's group became the fountainhead of Pure Land Buddhism, a movement that spread throughout East Asia and that remains active today.

Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge

Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge (Norwegian Humanist Association) was formed in 1956 by a group of parents in Oslo who had begun by seeking an alternative to the coming-of-age ceremony through which most Norwegian youth go in their 15th year. The ceremony confirms them as adult members of the Church of Norway (Lutheran), the state church of the land. Not wishing their offspring to participate in a ceremony related to a faith they rejected, the parents proposed an alternative civil ceremony, similar to one that had been in use in Denmark. They organized the first ceremony in 1951, and 34 youths participated.

In 1956 members of the informal Association for Civil Confirmation, as the parents called themselves, broadened their program to unite a variety of individuals who were interested in nonreligious approaches to ethical questions. Those who attended an initial gathering founded the Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge. The first leader was Kristian Horn, a professor of botany, who was able to enlist a number of colleagues from the academic and political world as supporters. They represented a spectrum of nontheistic perspectives.

The association has served over the years as a forum for discussions and the development of a community of shared values and ideas. Though realizing its shortcomings, they supported the program of "life and education" that schools began to offer in the 1970s. The program presented different religious perspectives in a somewhat objective manner, as opposed to the Christian teachings that had previously dominated the curriculum. That program was ended in 1996 by a new law that re-established Christian dominance in the state schools. By this time, however, the association had grown into the second largest religious/philosophical organization in the country.

In 2000, some 8,000 youth, about 15 percent of all Norwegian youth of the appropriate age, participated in the civil confirmation ceremony. The association has also prepared secular alternatives to other rites of passage for births (naming ceremonies), weddings, and funerals.

Norwegian Humanists also voiced their concerns over a law passed in 1997 making Christian education part of the school curriculum in the country. In 2004, the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations ruled that the new law violated the human rights of Humanist Norwegians and by implication others who are not members of the Church of Norway.

As the new century began, the association reported 64,000 members. Religious freedom became a reality constitutionally in Norway in 1979. Citizens pay religious taxes, and the Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge receives the religious tax money collected from its members. The association is a member of the International Humanist and Ethical Union.

Humanism

Humanism is one form of nontheistic thinking that emerged in the 20th century in the context of liberalizing trends in American religion that sought to reconstruct religion around human aspirations, values, and moral needs rather than speculations about supernaturalism and divinity, especially those built upon reputed revelations of divine truth. Self-identified Humanists appeared at the beginning of the 20th century among members of the American Unitarian Association (now an integral part of the Unitarian Universalist Association), the Free Religious Association, and the American Ethical Union. Leading spokespersons included John H. Dietrich (1878–1957), Curtis W. Reese (1887–1961), Charles Francis Potter (1885–1962), and Theodore Abell (1891–1932). Potter was among the Humanists who in 1933 issued an early definitive statement of the Humanist perspective, the Humanist Manifesto. Other signers included philosopher John Dewey (1859–1952) and philosopher-historian John Herman Randall (1899–1980). The Manifesto suggested that the universe was self-existing and not (as Christianity proposed) created. It also rejected supernaturalism and theism. The goal of life is the realization of human personality, and social ethics is a major tool in reaching that goal. New Manifestos issued in 1973 and 2003 have attempted to expand upon and update the original with a strong affirmation that human beings have a responsibility toward the whole of the human race.

Among the first organizations to form specifically around the Humanist perspective was the American Humanist Association. Over the next generation, the movement spread globally and was embodied by such organizations as the Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge (1951), the Sydney (Australia) Humanist Association (1960), the Indian Humanist Union (1960), the Humanist Society of New Zealand (1963), the British Humanist Association (1963), the Humanist Association of Canada (1967), and the Humanist Association of South Africa (1979). Many of these groups have come together in the International Humanist and Ethical Union, founded in 1952.

Among the most successful Humanist groups is Human-Etisk Forbund i Norge (Norwegian Humanist Association), which has more than 60,000 members and has become the second largest philosophical/religious association in the country. It began as a group of parents who wished to organize an alternative to the confirmation ceremony through which most Norwegian youth pass during their 15th year. The first 34 youth used the new civil ceremony in 1951. In the year 2000, some 8,000 (about 15 percent of the youth that age) selected the civil ceremony rather than that of the Church of Norway.

At the end of the 1970s, philosopher Paul Kurtz (b. 1925), a prominent Humanist and head of Prometheus Books, left the American Humanist Association and began to argue for what he termed Secular Humanism. In 1980 he organized the Council for Secular Humanism, which stood for not only a nontheistic Humanism, but a nonreligious Humanism. He saw Secular Humanism as an alternative, not just to traditional religion but to all religion, and circulated "A Secular Humanist Declaration," which outlined that perspective. More recently, Kurtz issued his commentary on the 1973 Humanist Manifesto, Humanist Manifesto 2000: A Call for New Planetary Humanism.

The Council and its sister organizations have taken a more aggressive anti-religious stance; they propose scientific inquiry as the best method of reaching an adequate worldview and moral code. Like the religious Humanists, the Council is a member of the International Humanist and Ethical Union.

Hungarian Reformed Church in America

The Hungarian Reformed Church in America, a representative of the Reformed Presbyterian tradition of the 16th century, has its origins in the spread of the Protestant Reformation to Hungary and the subsequent migration of Hungarians to the United States where Hungarian Reformed congregations were established in the late 19th century. In 1904 an American Hungarian Reformed Church was formed under the care of the Reformed Church in Hungary. Following World War I, a series of negotiations with the Reformed Church in the United States led to the declaration in 1921 of the Tiffin Agreement, which mandated that the Hungarian Reformed Church in America would merge into the Reformed Church in the United States (now an integral part of the United Church of Christ).

Three congregations of the Hungarian Reformed Church did not accept the Tiffin Agreement. These congregations and four additional congregations formed after the issuing of the Tiffin Agreement subsequently came together as the Free Magyar Reformed Church in America, which in 1958 adopted its present name. That same year it joined the World Council of Churches.

The church adheres to Reformed theology as expressed in the Second Helvetic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. Its organization is a mixture of the presbyterian and episcopal systems, with a synod headed by a bishop and a lay curator. There are three classes: the New York, Eastern, and Western, each headed by a dean and lay curator. The synod, the highest legislative body, meets quadrennially.

In 2001, the church reported 6,000 members in the United States and Canada. It is ecumenically active, holding membership in the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

■ Hungary

The Carpathian Basin, where Hungary is located, is a relatively closed geographic unit in central-eastern Europe. The flat and open center of the surrounded area, called Plainland (Alföld), is broken only by a few rivers, of which the Danube (Duna) and Theiss (Tisza) are the most important. Once a Hungarian territory, the Highlands (Felvidék), located north of the Plainland, correspond to contemporary Slovakia and Carpatho-Ukraine. Also a Hungarian territory until 1920, Transylvania (Erdély), east of the Plainland in today's Romania, is a high plateau. The rolling hills of the Transdanubian region (Dunántúl) stretch from the Danube to the foothills of the Austrian Alps. Crossing the river Drava, we enter the historical region of Southland (Délvidék), today's Croatia and Slavonia. The dominant language in Hungary is the magyar (Hungarian). Of the different national and ethnic minorities living in Hungary, the 600,000 Romas represent the largest group, but the German and Slovakian minorities are also significant. Hungarian minorities experience ethnic discrimination in most of the surrounding countries, especially in Slovakia, Serbia, and Romania.

In the capital city, Budapest, lives about 20 percent of the country's 10,030,000 inhabitants. The latest census in 2001 concluded that apart from the Catholics (55 percent), adherents of the Reformed Church of Hungary (16 percent), and those of the Lutheran Church in Hungary (3 percent), the membership of all other religious entities amounted only to 1.2 percent. About 15 percent were not affiliated, and 10 percent refused to answer the question probing religious affiliation. The larger liberal Protestant churches have associated together in the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Hungary, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Some of the smaller, more conservative evangelical Christian congregations are now served by the Magyar Evangéliumi Aliansz, which is in turn associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

The most important developments in the country's recent history include the regained freedom after the fall of the Soviet Union in 1990 and Hungary's joining the European Union in 2004. While open religious oppression—as practiced by the Communists—disappeared, tensions in church-state relationships are not uncommon. While the so-called national-Christian political forces protect and support the large Christian churches, the Liberal-Socialist parties guard the freedom of the smaller religious entities, especially that of the new religious movements in order to weaken the Catholic, Reformed, and Lutheran churches. The roots of these tensions along with the Hungarians' generally tolerant attitude toward religion go back at least to the late medieval history of the country.

The Hungarians, or Magyars, entered the Carpathian Basin toward the end of the ninth century after a long journey. In 1235, a Hungarian Dominican friar, Julianus, set out to find Magna Hungaria, the great land of the ancestors, and actually found a people whose language he could clearly understand beyond the Volga, in the territory of today's Bashkiria, a republic within Russia. Like the belief system of the other peoples of the Steppes, the Hungarians' faith consisted of animism, the veneration of totem animals, and, most of all, shamanism. According to this belief, the spirits know everything because being bodiless they can go anywhere. However, only the táltos, the Hungarian shaman, has the unique capability of communicating with the spirits of living and deceased creatures and with objects. The information gained in a voluntary ecstasy—what the Hungarians call rejtőzés, meaning to conceal oneself—enabled the táltos to be the Hungarians' clairvoyant, healer of humans and animals, advisor, and regôs, who preserved the Hungarians' cultural heritage. Even today, a few táltos can be found among Hungarians.

By the end of the ninth century, Hungarians moved into, and practically conquered, the Carpathian Basin. From there they launched their stormy, marauding raids on wealthy European cities for roughly a century. Various European rulers and aspiring rulers also hired them as mercenaries against their rivals. That was the time when the prayer "From the arrows of the Hungarians, save us, Lord" was introduced to the litany of the Catholic Church. From the middle of the 10th century, however, the European rulers recognized that by constantly ravaging each other's domains through the use of Hungarian mercenaries, they were all harming themselves. From their several defeats, the Hungarian leaders also realized that continuing raids would lead to self-destruction. Hence, it was in the interest of both the European and the Hungarian leaders to tame the restless and nomadic Hungarians by having them settle down in a defined territory and by incorporating them in Christendom.

The missionaries—most important, Bishop Pilgrim of Passau, and after him, Saint Adalbert of Prague—were able to turn to local traditions for support, because in the fourth century Christianity had had episcopal seats in the Roman province of Pannonia, a territory that later became Western Hungary. In addition, after the fall of the Avar Empire (796), Charlemagne, the Holy Roman Emperor, promoted the Christianization of Eastern Europe. Instead of Constantinople, the Hungarian leaders turned to Rome, partly because of Hungary's relatively favorable bargaining position in relation to the papacy, which was feuding with the German emperors. For Stephen, Hungary's first king, a crown from the pope not only meant the acknowledgment of Stephen's rule but also signaled his independence from both Byzantium and the German emperor.

Religious intolerance was not characteristic of Hungarians. King Ladislaus (1077–1095), instead of persecuting Paganism, started what has been called a campaign of canonization in 1083. It raised, among others, Stephen, his son, Emeric, and Bishop Gerard, the martyr tutor of Emeric, into sainthood. The canonizations served a twofold purpose. Apart from issuing mild warning to the remnants of Paganism, they also certified the presence of the nation and its rulers, the dynasty of Árpád, in Christian Europe. A large Ishmaelite population in the 12th century provides further evidence of the Hungarians' religious tolerance. They were able to practice their faith and were obliged to serve the king only in case of war, and even then only against non-Muslims. Similarly, the Jews had privileges even under King Béla IV (1235–1270); and only the Anjou period (1301–1395) introduced to Hungary the medieval version of anti-Semitism and persecution. Finally, Coloman (1095–1116), nicknamed the Book Lover (Beauclerc), issued a decree in which he stated, contrary to the views of contemporary European rulers, that witches who could assume different shapes and forms did not exist. However, while different religions existed peacefully in the Carpathian Basin under the reign of the House of Árpád, the primacy and dominance of Roman Catholicism was unquestionable.

Hungarian kings were involved in the wars against the Turks from the time of Sigismund of Luxemburg (1387–1437). After the Hungarian defeat at Mohács (1526), the country was divided into three parts, with decisive consequences, especially with respect to religion. The western and northern regions became a part of the Hapsburg Empire, and thus remained Catholic. The middle part, a triangle-shaped territory, whose peak extended far beyond the capital city and included the Alföld (Great Plain), the eastern half of Transdanubia, and the lower tip of Transylvania, was absorbed by the Ottoman Empire. The remaining part of Transylvania emerged as an independent principality, protecting and nurturing future Hungarian national aspirations. Meanwhile, the 16th-century religious Reformation begun by Luther also affected the religious life of Hungarians. Due partly to the influence of Johann Honter (1498–1549), the founder of the Lutheran national church of the German Saxons, the Transylvanian territory soon developed an overwhelmingly Protestant character. By the middle of the 16th century, Protestantism had become well established in the whole country. Although Hungary was not saved from denominational enmities, in comparison to Europe, it preserved its religious tolerance. In 1557, the Edict of Torda, which takes its name from what is now the Romanian city of Turda, was the first European declaration of the equality of religions and of guaranteed free religious practice.

The victory of the Holy League at the Battle of Zenta in 1697 meant the end of the Turkish occupation of Hungary, but at the same time, Hungary became, for all practical purposes, a colony of the Hapsburg Empire. The Catholic Hapsburgs launched an anti-Protestant campaign. Their intention was probably the weakening of the Hungarian nobility, the mere existence of which represented a threat to their plan of colonizing Hungary. The fact that the Hungarian nobility survived was partly due to the Protestant Transylvanian princes who generously donated noble titles, although mostly without land. A consequence of the Hapsburg policy was that Hungarian national feelings became closely linked to Protestantism, because the adherents of this faith offered greater resistance to the Hapsburgs and consequently suffered more than the Catholics.

Despite the restrictive measures of the Hapsburgs against the Protestants, Hungarian Catholics fared little better in the latter half of the 18th century than the Protestants. The explanation for the relative weakness of the Catholic Church contains at least three components: what was called Febronianism, a new theory of church-state relations implicitly suggesting that the territorial churches were subject to their local governments; Maria Theresa's decrees regulating the life of Hungarian Catholicism; and finally the actions of her son, Joseph II. During his 10-year rule (1780–1790), Emperor Joseph issued 6,206 decrees concerning religious life in his empire. Some of his orders were ignored, especially in the remote areas of his empire, and others created such upheaval that he soon withdrew them. Nonetheless many traditional religious customs disappeared under his reign. His more important religio-political decisions included the dissolution of the contemplative religious orders and some of the teaching orders. Toward the end of his life he realized that, despite his good intentions, his painstakingly meticulous regulations had made the lives of his subjects miserable. On his deathbed, he withdrew all of his orders, with the exception of three laws, including his famous decree of religious tolerance issued in 1781. The edictum tolerantiale guaranteed the free practice of the Protestant faith in any settlement where at least 100 families were of that faith.

Various Protestant or Free churches entered Hungary during the 19th century. The Baptist movement was brought to Hungary by Hungarian workers who went to Hamburg, Germany, in the mid-1840s to help rebuild the city. There they encountered the great German Baptist leader Johann Gerhard Oncken (1800–1884), who in 1846 sent three Hungarians back to their homeland to plant a church. That initial effort led eventually to the founding of the Baptist Union of Hungary in 1920.

Methodism in Hungary began at the start of the 10th century through the spread of literature among German-speaking residents of the country. Ministers from Vienna began to visit Batchka, in what is now Serbia, from which work spread to other German-speaking communities. The first Hungarian services were held in 1904, and initial organization in Budapest occurred the next year. In 1907, the work was made part of the Northern Germany Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church). The work was organized separately following World War I, but all the Hungarian work was, with the exception of the Budapest centers, in the new Yugoslavian state, or Austria. The work in contemporary Hungary originated from the Budapest work. It developed into an independent church following World War II.

Hungary's revolution in 1848–1849 brought about serious consequences for church-state relations. The new government issued the so-called Religion Bill of 1848, in which they disestablished Roman Catholicism as the state religion by proclaiming the full equality of all the “lawfully received” denominations. This term originates in Transylvanian terminology, where during the 16th century the Catholics, Lutherans, Calvinists, and Unitarians were admitted and legally “received” by the prince and the estates. It reappears also in article 43 of 1895, which mentions a “form of legal classification of religions.” The first category consisted of the legally “received churches”: the Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed churches, the Jewish communities, the Eastern Orthodox Church, and the Unitarians. The second or so-called recognized churches contained most of the smaller denominations, including, starting in 1905, the Baptists and, starting in 1916, the Muslims. The religions in the tolerated category included the Adventists, the Methodists, the Millennialists, the Mormons, and the Nazarenes. Finally, a fourth group consisted of those religions that were banned, namely the Jehovah's Witnesses, the different Pentecostal movements, and, after 1939, the Church of the Nazarene. This categorization remained in force until the end of World War II.

Between the two World Wars, Hungary allied itself with Germany, expecting the abolition of the humiliating Trianon Treaty (1920), which reduced Hungary to a third of both its territory and its population. This alliance sealed not only the fate of 600,000 deported Hungarian Jews but also that of the whole country through the following Soviet occupation since it was used to justify the Soviet occupation of Hungary after World War II. The Communist era, for all practical purposes, meant the persecution of any organized religious life. The resistance of Cardinal Mindszenty (1892–1975) and other ecclesiastical leaders resulted in their imprisonment, the banning of religious orders, the dissolution of religious organizations, and harassment of both ecclesiastics and lay persons. A certain change of attitude toward religion was experienced starting in the mid-1960s, resulting in greater tolerance, but religious people were considered second-class citizens throughout the whole Communist period.

There has been a Jewish community in Hungary since Roman times. It reached a height of 450,000 (within the boundaries set in 1920) in the 1930s in spite of varying levels of anti-Semitism. Some 250,000 Jews could be found in Budapest. Many restrictions on Jews were removed by the Emancipation Act in 1867, and Jews played an important role in the country's economic, intellectual, and cultural life for the next 60 years. The community, however, bore much of the brunt of the Holocaust, more than three-fourths of it perishing.

Fewer than 100,000 Jews currently reside in Hungary, the great majority in Budapest. The Federation of the Jewish Communities in Hungary provides some overall focus. There is a large synagogue in Budapest that serves as a unifying point of the religious community, and nearby a rabbinical seminary. The chief rabbi heads the Central Rabbinate. Hungarian Jewry is largely Reform in orientation, but there is an Orthodox synagogue in Budapest. The strong Hasidic life that had been present in Hungary was wiped out during the Holocaust, though a remnant survived in Israel and the United States.

The fall of Communism brought along the rehabilitation of religion, in the form of an open expression of appreciation, financial support, and the return of some of the ecclesiastical buildings nationalized under Communism. While the population is dominantly Christian—at least nominally—fewer than 20 percent of Hungarians consider themselves religious according to the teaching of their denominations. One of the consequences is that, although a sizable number of Hungarians favor the presence of religion in public life, another significant—and more energetic—segment of the population considers the public role of churches particularly undesirable. Another source of tension is the increasing number of new religious movements, even though their membership is negligible. Due to the sensation-mongering media and the anti-cult campaign launched by a former Protestant minister in 1993, the Parliament suspended the financial support of four so-called destructive sects: the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Church of Scientology, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and the Unification movement. As a consequence of international pressure, the suspension was revoked the next year. Organizations concerned with religious freedom paid closer attention to Hungary again in 2001, when a bill was proposed, unsuccessfully, to make the requirements of establishing a new church more demanding. On the whole, however, Hungary has at the beginning of the third millennium a more tolerant attitude toward religion than most formerly Communist countries.

Husayn ibn Ali ibn Abi Talib Al-

626–680

Al-Husayn ibn Ali is the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad and a martyr hero to the Shia branch of Islam.

Ali ibn Abi Talib, fourth caliph of Islam, cousin and brother-in-law of Muhammad, holds the body of the killed Imam, Safavid fresco, 17th century. (SEF/Art Resource, NY)

According to Muslim tradition, he was born in 626 CE, the son of Ali ibn Abi Talib (the fourth caliph) and Fatima, Muhammad's daughter. His death on October 10, 680, in Karbala, Iraq, represents one of the major turning points in Islamic history and marks the decisive break between Sunni and Shia Muslims.

The death of Muhammad in 632 CE created a crisis over leadership and proper succession to the prophet. Muslims who believe that Ali, Husayn's father, is the proper successor to Muhammad are known as Shia (a shortened form of Arabic words for faction or house of Ali). Ali, a cousin of the prophet and husband to Fatima, was chosen leader in 656 CE after the killing of Uthman, the third caliph after Muhammad. The previous caliphs were Abu Bakr (632–634) and Umar (634–644).

After Ali was assassinated in 661, Husayn and his older brother Hasan grudgingly recognized the rule of Mu'awiya, the first of the Umayyad caliphates.

Mu'awiya died in 680 and the caliphate passed to his son Yazid I. Husayn resisted Yazid's rule, and Yazid sent an army to arrest Husayn, who was traveling to Kofa to meet supporters. Negotiations failed and Husayn was killed during the Battle of Karbala in October 680. His head was sent to Yazid in Damascus. Yazid tried to shift blame for Husayn's death on others but to no avail. The Umayyad caliphate was henceforth burdened with opposition from Ali's house.

Shia Muslims observe Husayn's death every year. The lamentation is known as the Day of Ashura and takes place during Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar. Rites of mourning involve fasting, recitation of stories of Husayn's death, and flagellation. Some Shia view Husayn's death as atonement for sin. Sunni Muslims hold a Day of Ashura as well but they usually observe it as a celebration to honor the rescue of Jews from Egyptian bondage.

Husayn is regarded by Shiites not only as one of the true caliphs but also as an imam. In Shia Islam the title imam is reserved for those leaders descended from Muhammad who provide infallible leadership to the Muslim community (umma). Shiites are divided over the correct number of imams. Most Shia Muslims claim 12 (hence known as Twelvers) while the Ismaili count 7. Besides being the third imam, Husayn is also credited as one of the Fourteen Infallibles of Shia Islam.

There are accounts in Shia hadith (traditions) about the Prophet Muhammad foreseeing the death of his grandson. There are also miracles related to Husayn's martyrdom. The main focus of the traditions, however, is to invoke Husayn's purity and sacrifice and his willingness to travel the martyr's path.

Hutterites

The Hutterites originated in the early days of the Anabaptist uprising within the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century and are thus spiritual cousins of the other Anabaptists, the Mennonites and the Amish. Among the distinctive Anabaptist teachings, still adhered to today, were adult baptism, separation of church and state, and pacifism.

Many Anabaptists, fleeing persecution in Switzerland and other nearby areas, settled in Moravia. There, in 1528, one group pooled their property, including money, in keeping with their interpretation of Acts 2:44–45 and other biblical passages. In 1533 Jacob Hutter joined the group and soon emerged as its leader. He shaped it into a disciplined communal organization, and the believers have been known by his name ever since. Persecution of the group continued, however, and Hutter was executed by the order of King Ferdinand I of Austria in 1536.

Although the Hutterites did have some good and prosperous times in Moravia after 1550, persecution continued to erupt periodically. In 1770, promised freedom from military service, among other things, they migrated to Russia. A century later, however, their exemption from military conscription was rescinded and they moved again. Beginning in 1874 they migrated to the United States, settling in South Dakota. There they founded three colonies, reflecting the organizational pattern that had prevailed lately in Russia. Each of those colonies became the founding locus of one of three Hutterite subgroups, or leuts, known after their founding elders as the Schmiedeleut, the Dariusleut, and the Lehrerleut. The leuts, harboring some distinctions in theology and lifestyle, have operated largely separately ever since. The Schmiedeleut, in a disagreement over leadership, divided into two subgroups in the 1990s.

The Hutterites grew in obscurity for many years, founding new colonies as their population expanded. In 1917, however, the U.S. government imposed military conscription without provision for conscientious objection. Young Hutterite men were incarcerated for refusing military duty and two died of maltreatment in a military prison. Meanwhile, harassment and even mob violence were directed against the colonies. Assured of exemption from military service in Canada, the Hutterites sold all but one of their American colonies and moved to Alberta and Manitoba. The majority have lived there ever since, although as social conditions changed new colonies were founded in the United States as well. Today the Hutterites have more than 40,000 members in more than 400 colonies in four Canadian provinces and six American states.

Unlike the Amish, the Hutterites accept modern agricultural technology. They maintain full community of property and live in colonies averaging about 100 in population. Each colony is led by a minister and a farm superintendent, both always male. Families live in apartments and eat at a common dining hall in the center of the colony. Each colony maintains two schools, a German-language school for instruction in religion and traditional values and an English school with a curriculum much like those of schools elsewhere. Children usually go to school until about age 15, when they begin working in the colony full-time.

Young adults are usually baptized when they are in their early 20s and only thereafter marry. The Hutterites have proven to be one of the most fertile populations in the world, with an average, at some points in their history, of more than 10 children per family. Thus a colony can double in size and give birth to an offspring colony in 10 to 20 years. That rapid growth has led to the chief recent controversy surrounding Hutterism, over repeated purchases of large tracts of land for new colonies, which, other farmers contend, drives up the price of land and takes it away from non-Hutterite farmers. In recent years, however, Hutterite family size has begun to decline.

Hutterite colonies are largely independent. An elder is designated for each of the leuts, and the nominal headquarters of each leut is located at that elder's colony. Contact is best made through the website maintained by Schmiedeleut Hutterites at <http://www.hutterites.org>. It gives the name of the designated elder for the three leuts, and for the committee of elders that head the Committee Schmiedeleut, one of the groups formed in 1990s when that leut divided.

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

I AM Religious Activity

The I AM Religious Activity is a spiritual and educational group founded in 1932 by Guy W. Ballard (d. 1939) and his wife Edna Ballard (d. 1971). The group falls within the Ancient Wisdom family of religious organizations that includes Theosophy, Bridge to Freedom, the Arcane School, the Holy Order of MANS, and Church Universal and Triumphant. As such it is a significant precursor group to the New Age movement of the late 20th century. The purpose of the Activity is to assist humankind at a critical juncture in its history by publishing heretofore hidden spiritual teachings from higher planes of existence. These teachings emanated from the Ascended Masters, also known as the Great White Brotherhood, and were communicated in more than 3,000 discourses given to the Ballards. Guy Ballard claimed that these masters were a mystical brotherhood of advanced initiates who have responsibility for the spiritual evolution of humanity.

The most important of the Ascended Masters for the I AM Activity is Saint Germain, who is believed to have appeared to Guy Ballard in 1930 while Ballard was hiking near Mount Shasta in Northern California. Saint Germain declared Ballard to be the Messenger of the Great White Brotherhood for the Seventh Golden Age, a coming millennial era of spiritual enlightenment. Ballard's description of his calling to messengership and of the teachings he received during his encounters with Saint Germain were published in 1934 under the titles Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence. Ballard used the pen name Godfre Ray King in these books. He published other discourses from the Ascended Masters in The I AM Discourses (1936).

These three titles continue to be the core of teaching materials for the Activity.

The parent organization for the I AM Activity is the Saint Germain Foundation, which was led by Guy Ballard until 1939 and by Edna Ballard until 1971. Since 1971 the Foundation, with its worldwide headquarters in Schaumburg, Illinois (a Chicago suburb), has been under the guidance of a board of directors. The board oversees both the Foundation and the Saint Germain Press. The press claims that it publishes the Ascended Masters' words in their original form, free from the revisions that have occurred in I AM Activity splinter organizations such as Bridge to Spiritual Freedom, Summit Lighthouse, and Church Universal and Triumphant. Among the press's offerings are complete editions of the Ballards' books, DVDs and videos, contemplation music, and paintings of the Ascended Masters. The Saint Germain Foundation is represented throughout the world by 300 local groups termed "I AM" Sanctuary, "I AM" Temple, "I AM" Study Groups, or "I AM" Reading Rooms. These groups are fully autonomous but are chartered by the Saint Germain Foundation's board.

The basic teachings of the Activity include knowledge of the "Mighty I AM Presence," the use of God's creative name, the "I AM," and the use of the Violet Flame. The "Mighty I AM Presence" is the individualized presence of God in each person. It can be contacted during meditation and can be used to create positive outer conditions through the practices of affirmation and decreeing. Affirmations are short sentences that affirm an ideal spiritual state and give thanks for blessings to come. In decreeing, a person calls forth the visible manifestation of a spiritual condition or seeks to dissolve a negative condition using the Name of God, “I AM.” Through progressive attunement with the God Presence Within, a person can balance out negative karma and gain Ascension back to a state of Divine Realization. The most powerful dictation calls on the Violet Consuming Flame, a highly charged spiritual force revealed by Saint Germain, to pass through the body and around it, thereby clearing a person’s spiritual and physical bodies from past imperfections.

The Saint Germain Foundation has always affirmed the special role of the United States in bringing the Seventh Golden Age to fruition. It is highly patriotic and proudly displays the American flag at its worship centers and during special events such as the “I AM COME!” pageant that is presented annually at the G. W. Ballard Amphitheater in Mount Shasta, California. The pageant was created, produced, and directed beginning in 1950 by Edna Ballard. It presents the life of Jesus and focuses on the Gospel miracles and the Ascension. The I AM Religious Activity is the oldest and most conservative of the groups that have their roots in the work of the Ballards.

Ibadhi Islam

The Ibadhites, who constitute the major Muslim group in the state of Oman, continue to espouse the emphases originally championed by the now defunct Kharijites, a group that emerged as the Muslim community was still maturing in the seventh century CE. The prophet Muhammad was succeeded by a succession of close followers who were appointed to the office of caliph and led in the growth of the Arab Muslim Empire. Some of the early followers of Islam felt that the growth had come at the price of bringing many into the faith who did not even accept the bare essentials of belief and practice, the so-called Five Pillars—acceptance of Allah and his prophet Muhammad, fasting, almsgiving, daily prayers, and the pilgrimage to Mecca. The Khariji (or successionists) argued that the new converts must live exemplary lives or forfeit their right to be called Muslims.

Caliph Uthman (644–656) opposed the Kharijite position and in its stead favored the position of another group, the Murji'ah, who argued that one must withhold judgment on any individual's moral laxity and leave that judgment to Allah in the next life. Those who broke the provisions of the Muslim law (the sharia) were to be punished appropriately, but their status as Muslims was not to be called into question. The issue reached a crisis point when Uthman was himself accused of stealing money. The Kharijites argued that he was henceforth not a Muslim and demanded his ouster from office. Uthman was subsequently killed during a Kharijite riot in Mecca.

Uthman was succeeded by Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. 661), the Prophet's son-in-law. The Kharijites were supportive of Ali, but withdrew their support when he attempted to reconcile his rulership with the challenge from the Umayyads, who eventually established themselves in the caliphate. The Kharijites accused Ali of compromising with evil and turned against him. Most were killed when Ali defeated them, but a small number survived to keep the Kharijite vision alive.

In the meantime, a half century earlier, Islam had spread to Oman. About 630, the Prophet sent a letter to the two brothers who ruled Oman jointly at that time. They embraced Islam and then became allies in the Arab conquest of Persia. The connection to the Kharijites came through Abdullah ibn Ibadh, a seventh-century Omani who shared many of the Kharijite beliefs. In the eighth century, an effort arose to transform Oman into an ideal Muslim country along the lines of Kharijite principles. Also, it was decided that an imam would be chosen to lead the community.

The first Ibadhi imam, Julanda bin Mas'ud, was elected in 751. He died in battle soon afterward and not until 801 was a successor, Warith bin Kaab, named. The final establishment of the imamate was followed by a period of peace, stability, and prosperity that lasted for some three centuries. Sohar emerged as one of the great seaports in the Muslim world, and the Omanis became responsible for the spread of Islam to the countries farther west (North Africa) and south (along the African coast).

The Ibadhis are distinguished by their creation of an allegorical interpretation of most of the anthropomorphic images in the Koran, especially statements about Allah, paradise, and the doctrines concerning the last days. Thus they believe that the coming day of resurrection, for example, should be understood as the gradual coming of Allah's order on Earth. They are most concerned with the commission of major sins (things forbidden in the Koran) and believe that such sins must be repented of in this life, or the person will not be able to enter paradise. There are a variety of differences between the Ibadhis and the Sunnis on particulars in regard to prayer and fasting.

The Ibadhis trace their history to the Kharijites, but consider some Kharijite opinions too extreme. Most important, Ibadhis do not believe that sinful Muslims are not Muslims. They use the term kufr ni'mah (ungrateful) to designate Muslims who commit major sins or fail to practice the faith they profess.

The great majority of Ibadhis reside in Oman. The sultan serves as head of the community, and its administration and coordination is carried out through the government's Ministry of Awqaf (endowments) and Religious Affairs. The endowment moneys are administered by the ministry for the upkeep of mosques and for the benefit of the community. The ministry also oversees Muslim schools, coordinates travel to Mecca for pilgrims, and makes provisions for the observation of the annual fast of Ramadan. The ministry headquarters are in Muscat. Smaller communities of Ibadhis reside in Zanzibar, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya. An unofficial but helpful Internet site on Ibadhis can be accessed at <http://www.angelfire.com/ok5/ibadhiyah/index.html>.

Ibn Hanbal, Ahmad

780–855

Ahmad ibn Hanbal is recognized as the founder of one of the four schools of Islamic law and an expert in the collection of hadith about the Prophet Muhammad. He is also famous for the persecution he endured from several Iraqi caliphs during a time of inquisition known as al-mihnah. Ibn Hanbal resisted their advocacy of the theory that the Koran was a created document. This view was connected to the Mutazilite movement and in particular the campaign of the Abbasid caliph al-Mamun.

Ibn Hanbal is said to have begun studies of the hadith at the age of 15. He traveled widely to learn from the hadith scholars in Mecca, Medina, Yemen, and Syria. His mistreatment over Mutazilite doctrine began in 833 and lasted until 848, when the traditionalist view that the Koran was eternal was readopted by the political powers in Baghdad. During the years of trial Ibn Hanbal was flogged and imprisoned but remained a champion of the orthodox position.

His most important written legacy was his collection (Musnad) of reliable hadith about the Prophet Muhammad. This is said to have been completed about 842. Two of his sons were said to have heard their father dictate his entire hadith corpus. During his lifetime he was known more for his piety than his jurisprudence. His status as the founder of a distinct school came with his written material on law, which is actually minimal by later standards. He argued that law has to be based on the Koran and the traditions and sayings of Muhammad and that jurists should thus resist any codifications that create distance from the holy book and holy traditions.

The Hanbalite School originated after the other three Sunni schools were established. There are reports of Ibn Hanbal having close ties with al-Shafii, the founder of the Shafiite School, but this is a questionable tradition. The rise of the Hanbalite School owes most to the work of Abu Bakr al-Khallal (d. 923 CE), who collected the teachings of Ibn Hanbal in 20 volumes. While the Hanbalite School remained the smallest of the four schools, it influenced the great Muslim jurist Ibn Taymiyah (1263–1328). He in turn impacted the Wahhabi movement of the 18th century, which shapes the Islam of contemporary Saudi Arabia.

■ Iceland

Iceland is an island nation located in the North Atlantic, north and west of Norway and Scotland and south-east of Greenland. It was home to just over 300,000 people as of 2009. The land area is approximately 39,770 square miles.

Although formally integrated into mainstream Western religious traditions, religious life in Iceland from the period of the settlement to the present has had unique characteristics that can be easily misunderstood by outsiders. The Icelandic case is particularly valuable for comparative studies because Iceland has undergone rapid, thorough modernization, but it does not have—and never has had—racial-ethnic diversity, regionalism, or rigid status hierarchies. In addition, the absence of a pre-European Native population means that there is not a double layer of cultural traditions that have intertwined and must now be carefully dissected. It has undergone, as has the rest of the modern world, a rural-urban transition. Unlike the rest of the West, however, this was not a transition from village to city, but from individual farmsteads to cities and towns. Iceland has also undergone the important transition from colony to nation. From the standpoint of the history of religions, too, Iceland has not only in the past been relatively isolated from events affecting the world-system, but also is one of the few thoroughly Protestant socio-cultural systems not to have been exposed at one point or another to Calvinism or post-

Puritan piety. If we are careful to note the distinction that sociologist Max Weber has made between the traditionalist Lutheran and the modernist Calvinist contributions to the Protestant ethic, much of the paradoxical character of the Icelandic religion-society-culture complex is rendered comprehensible.

Although there may well have been Christian monks from Ireland in Iceland in the eighth century, they had fled by 874 CE, when Ingólfur Arnarson cast overboard his high-seat pillars, consecrated to the Nordic gods, and vowed to settle where they came ashore. Yet it is also clear from the ancient documents of Iceland (Edda and Saga) that the early settlers included both atheists and persons who might at least have had rudimentary Christian persuasions.

The story of Iceland's conversion to Christianity in 1000 is unique in the annals of the faith. It is also a paradigm for the study of Icelandic religious consciousness. A conflict had been brewing between the independent Pagan Icelanders and Ólafur Tryggvason, the king of Norway, who had accepted the Christian faith and subsequently took upon himself the obligation to bring the Icelanders under the sway of the new teaching. The stage was set for a potential confrontation at Alþingi (the Icelandic Parliament), as Christian and Pagan parties each began to gather strength and as each declared that it would not live under the law of the other. The Christians then chose Hallur Þorsteinson (Síðu-Hallur) to proclaim their law. However, apparently unwilling to be responsible for dividing the people, he instead brought the question before the Lawspeaker, Þorgeir Ljósvetningagoði, himself a Pagan, whom the Pagan party had already authorized to speak on its behalf. Þorgeir took the case and then went "under the cloak": he lay down for a day and a night, pulled his cloak over him, and spoke to nobody, nor did anybody speak to him, probably in an attempt to attain hidden knowledge in some ancient Pagan tradition. When he finally mounted Law Rock to deliver his decision, it was for conversion, but with a series of limitations, one of which was that the worship of the old gods could continue in private.

Iceland accepted Christianity by a freely taken decision that weighed the options in light of international political and economic considerations but also in terms of domestic tranquility. Iceland became a vassal state to the king of Norway in the 13th century and was passed to Denmark in the 14th. Formally, then, it was part of the Western (Roman Catholic) Church until the time of the Reformation. But even the old church's strictures lay rather lightly in Iceland. For instance, when Iceland was required to submit to Danish Lutheranism, the principal holdout for Catholicism was Jón Arason, the bishop of Hólar. The effect was a rebellion and martyrdom for Jón, but the twist of Icelandic irony that slides in here was that the leaders of the rebellion were Jón's sons. In short, in spite of the officially "absolute" imposition of celibacy upon the higher clergy by the First Lateran Council in 1123, the defender of the Catholic position against Lutheranism 400 years later in Iceland was a bishop living openly in the married state, and his sons were national heroes. As was true with the Scandinavian Reformation generally, ecclesiastical changes were minimal: monasteries were abolished, but vestments and a formal sung liturgy were retained, with many of the clergy simply continuing in their parishes as before.

One crucial concession for Icelandic history was obtained at this point: namely, that conducting worship in the common tongue meant the use of Icelandic, not Danish. This decision made the church the central institution for a distinctively national life-world for Iceland during the colonial period.

Religion in Iceland has historically been a matter of the hearth. The home was the principal place of worship and teaching, with the church building serving primarily as the focal point for central life events. In this sense, every trip to church was a pilgrimage. Since Iceland was not a village but a farm society, the church was not the quasi-political center of village life but the pilgrimage center of family life. Particularly important for the development of a distinct Icelandic spirituality was the institution known as kvöldvaka, or the “evening wake,” born of a combination of Iceland’s literary cultural heritage, which made reading a valued pursuit, and cosmological circumstance: the winter noonday moon, the concomitant of the “midnight sun” touted by today’s summer tour brochures, provided many hours to while away. Kvöldvaka was at once church, school, and theater for each farmstead. It also provided the vital link between saga consciousness and modernity, mediated by Christian literature.

Iceland obtained internal freedom from Denmark in 1874, and changes came to its religious life. The birth of institutionalized “religious freedom” was occasioned by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the Westman Islands—a saga recounted in the form of a historical novel, Independent People, by Iceland’s Nobel laureate, Halldór Laxness. Beginning in 1905 there was also a series of dramatic spiritualistic phenomena associated with the “boy medium,” Indriði Indriðason, and uniquely among mainstream Western Christian traditions, spiritualistic theory and practice were integrated into sectors of the Lutheran state church, so much so that it has been estimated that half the Icelandic clergy by the mid-1930s were sympathetic to Spiritualism, and when they were first allowed to elect their own bishop in 1938, they chose a man sympathetic to the Spiritualist movement. Icelandic Spiritualism makes the case that Iceland’s tradition of spiritual phenomena stretching back to and through the conversion experience at Law Rock—a tradition described in the book as “saga consciousness”—provided a cultural substructure for distinctly modern innovations of “new men” at the helm of Icelandic society in the church, journalism, and politics. Later in the 20th century, Spiritualist influences in the national church seem to have waned into obscurity.

But Spiritualism and Mormonism are not the only “new religions” to have appeared in Iceland. Nýall, a unique Icelandic religion, founded by Dr. Helgi Pjeturss in about 1919, combined elements of Spiritualism, Theosophy, Icelandic nationalism, Eddic poetry and the sagas, and the latest scientific research of the period. It antedated both the Church of Scientology and the flying saucer religions but included elements that later appeared in each. The Theosophical Society also had a wide following; indeed, it had the highest per capita membership in the Icelandic population of any nation in the world in 1947. Beginning in 1972 an Icelandic neo-Pagan religion, Ásatrú, applied for legal status as a registered religious body, and in 1973 official recognition was granted. The chief godí was hence a legitimate “minister of religion” in the state’s eyes, and the Ásatrúarmenn receive tax support in proportion to their numbers, which is at this time is between 200 and 300, or about 0.1 percent of the population.

The great majority of the country’s population remains in the state church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Iceland. Weekly practice remains the province of a small minority, but baptisms, confirmations, weddings, and funerals retain historic significance, with participation at rates running from 75 to 99 percent of the population. There is also a Free Lutheran Church with a few congregations. The principal distinction between the two is the method by which pastors are selected. In the state church, the entire geographical parish (but not those who are members of other religious bodies) may vote on the selection of a new pastor (who is paid by the state), regardless of their participation in the affairs of the church, whereas the selection of pastors among Free Lutherans is limited to active church members (who also pay the pastor’s salary). Free Lutheran pastors, however, remain part of the pastors’ synod of the state church. The Roman Catholic Church has had a renewed presence since the turn of the 20th century, with a cathedral and resident bishop. There are also groups of the Pentecostals, Baha’i Faith, Seventh-day Adventist Church, Christian Brethren, and Jehovah’s Witnesses; recent immigration has also brought new immigrant Buddhists and Muslims.

Ife

Ife (aka Ile Ifa), an ancient city in southwest Nigeria, northeast of Lagos, is believed by the Yoruban Ibo people of Nigeria to be the place where creation occurred. Here the emissary of the Orisha Olodumare, the Supreme God (the one who has the fullness of everything), took the materials given by Olodumare that were spread out to create the Earth, separating the land from the water. Archaeologists have suggested that the city is at least 1,000 years old, while the surrounding region has been inhabited for another 1,000 years.

The Yorubans divided themselves into various groups, each with royal leadership. Each of the royal families believe that they have descended from the first king of Ife, Oduduwa. After Oduduwa’s death, his children left the city to found their own kingdoms. Oduduwa is believed to have had several sons (16 in number) who later became powerful traditional rulers of Yoruba land.

Through the centuries, Ife existed as a city-state whose paramount importance was its role as the original sacred city and the dispenser of basic religious teachings, including the divining technique known as Ifa, an indispensable tool in defining the course of one's life. At Ife one finds the acknowledgment of a basic pantheon of Yoruba gods, estimated variously to number 201, 401, 601, or more. Some divinities are said to have existed when Olodumare created the Earth, while others are outstanding individuals who have been deified. Among the more popular deities are Shango (god of thunder and lightning), Ifa (or Orunmila, god of divination), and Ogun (god of iron and of war). These deities have been brought to the Americas by the practitioners of what became Santeria.

The old Yoruban kingdoms have been superseded by the post-colonial Nigerian government, but the royal leadership persists at a less formal level. The kings (who united political and religious power) of the Oni people of Ife and the Alafin people of Oyo, farther to the north, are still the most highly respected Yoruba kings and religious leaders in Nigeria. Ife is home to the palace of the Oni.

Ife was largely destroyed in 1849 and rebuilt in 1882. Today, approximately 300,000 people live in Ife.

Iglesia ni Cristo

The Iglesia ni Cristo is very critical of the Roman Catholic Church (the majority church in the Philippines) and firmly believes itself to be the only one "true" church. It was founded by Felix Manalo Isugan (1886–1963), born to a Roman Catholic family in the Philippines, who subsequently joined successively the Methodist Church, the Christian Church/Churches of Christ, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church. In 1913, however, he felt called by God to establish his own church, which was officially incorporated on July 27, 1914 (its coinciding with the beginning of World War I would later be interpreted as a prophetic sign). The name Manalo gave to his church was simply Iglesia ni Cristo (Church of Christ), but its followers were known as Manalists in the Philippines.

Following a prophetic tradition in the Philippines, Manalo is venerated as the sugo, or the last prophet of God, as well as the angel from the East mentioned in Revelation 7. Manalists reject the traditional doctrine of the Trinity as potentially polytheistic, believing instead in a messianic role of Jesus Christ but not that he was God himself. They are also conditionalist and do not believe in the immortality of the soul, which in their view remains "sleeping" in the grave until the Last Judgment (a doctrine derived from Seventh-day Adventists). Manalists also give a literal interpretation to the biblical command not to eat blood, a serious matter in the Philippines where a popular dish known as dinuguan is prepared with cooked animal blood.

Although beginnings were difficult, a spectacular expansion followed in the wake of World War II. Membership in the Philippines currently exceeds 3 million. Smaller constituencies also exist in Europe (5,300 members, with regional headquarters in Italy) and the United States.

An international journal in English distributed by the church carries the title God's Message. The headquarters for international missions are situated at 1617 Southgate Avenue, Dale City, CA 94015. There is an international website for members only: www.inc-world.org.

Ignatius of Loyola

1490–1556

Ignatius of Loyola was the founder of the Society of Jesus, the Jesuits, an order within the Roman Catholic Church known for its dedication to learning and missionary work. The Jesuits also took a special oath to place themselves unhesitatingly at the behest of the pope.

Ignatius, of noble Basque lineage, was born in the family castle in the Guipuzcoa Province of Spain. As a youth he was sent to the court of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain, where he was trained for the army, which he joined in 1517. In 1521, he suffered an injury to his leg that left him partially crippled for the rest of his life and virtually ended his military career. While recuperating from his wound, he read two books, a volume on the lives of the saints and a biography of Christ, which helped him reorient his life.

Upon regaining his health, he took a vow of chastity, formally resigned from the military, and assumed the garb of a pilgrim, after which he moved into a cave and began a year-long retreat (1522–1523) to develop his understanding of living the Christian life. At the end of the year, he journeyed to Rome and then on to the Holy Land, where he tried his hand at converting Muslims. He also began work on the Spiritual Exercises, a manual for spiritual growth/development, which is still widely used both in and beyond the Order. To the present, Order members make an annual retreat, during which they practice these exercises.

In 1528 he began his formal study of theology, which over the next six years led him to visit successively Barcelona, Alcala, Salamanca, and Paris. By the time he completed his studies, in the summer of 1534, he had formulated plans for a new religious order that would become the Society of Jesus. He had also brought around him a small group of trusted companions. Even before the Order was formalized, James Lainez, Alonso Salmerón, Nicholas Bobadilla, Simón Rodriguez, Peter Faber, and Francis Xavier (1506–1552), among others, assumed vows of poverty and chastity and agreed to begin missionary work in the Holy Land. They began the preparation for their journey.

In 1537, Loyola was ordained as a priest, and the following year the group met with Pope Paul III (r. 1534–1549). By this time, travel to Jerusalem was blocked by a war, and they settled in Venice awaiting an end to hostilities and the issuance of the pope's bull that completed the formalities constituting the Society of Jesus.

The group elected Ignatius the military-like Order's first general. He subsequently traveled throughout Europe and to the Holy Land, before settling in Rome, where he worked until his death on July 31, 1556. The order he founded would become a global body, leading to the development of Catholicism in many parts of the world. In 1542, Ignatius dispatched Francis Xavier to India. He would become the pioneer of the Asian development and herald the Order's and the church's first incursions into Southeast Asia, Japan, and ultimately China.

Ignatius was beatified in 1609 by Pope Paul V (r. 1605–1621) and canonized in 1622 by Pope Gregory XV (r. 1621–1623).

Independence, Missouri

Located in Jackson County, Missouri, the city of Independence was founded in 1827. In 1831, Independence became home for immigrants coming from the northeastern United States who were followers of the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith Jr. Smith, claiming divine revelation, chose Independence as the center place of Zion. The church soon bought a tract of about 63 acres west of the courthouse for building a temple. The temple would be the central structure of this New Jerusalem and the place to which Jesus Christ would make his Second Coming. Smith also suggested that Jackson County was the location of the biblical Garden of Eden. Today several denominations based on the religious work of Joseph Smith Jr. have a presence or make their headquarters in Independence.

An important town on the American frontier, Independence soon became the trailhead for the Santa Fe, Oregon, and California trails. Riverboat navigation on the Missouri River in the early years stopped at Independence. Fur traders coming from the west sent their goods east and resupplied their needs here. Immigrants heading west bought their supplies and equipment in Independence. Into the 1860s, the traffic heading west continued to bring Independence great prominence on the American landscape as well as economic prosperity.

During the Civil War, two battles were fought in Independence (1862 and 1864), both of which resulted in victories for the Confederacy. The aftermath of the war and the rise of nearby Kansas City, Missouri, caused Independence to lose both its prosperity and prominence, but it continues to be the county seat. President Harry S. Truman grew up in Independence and was active in county politics for many years.

The history of the Mormon efforts to colonize Independence was short-lived in the 1830s, lasting about two years. By early 1833 some 1,200 of Smith's followers had settled in the city and bought about 2,000 acres. They believed they were literally building the "city of God." But relations between the original citizens and the Mormon immigrants were tense. These tensions erupted in mob violence in July 1833. An angry mob attacked the church's printing and publishing house and destroyed the press and scattered the type. Mobs also destroyed the Gilbert and Whitney store. The Mormon population was forcibly evicted from Jackson County by the end of 1833.

Upholding a fervent belief in the geographical location of the center place of Zion, three different denominations tied historically to Joseph Smith Jr. occupy sections of the original tract of land bought by Smith's organization in 1831. This property is intersected by Walnut Street and River Boulevard in Independence. Most of the denominations with foundations in Joseph Smith Jr.'s work view this acreage as sacred.

The first group of Joseph Smith Jr.'s followers to return to Independence arrived in 1867. Two years later they bought 2 lots located on the original 63-acre tract that Smith chose as the place for the temple of Zion. This group, now known as the Church of Christ, was organized formally in 1863 when they selected Granville Hedrick as president and prophet of the church. Sometimes called the Church of Christ (Temple Lot), Hedrick's followers believe themselves to be a "remnant" of the original church of Joseph Smith Jr. Their world headquarters building and local meetinghouse are located on a 2-acre tract of land in the northwestern section of the 63 acres, at the northwest corner of the intersection between Walnut and River.

Occupying land at the southeast corner of Walnut and River is the visitors' center, meetinghouse, and mission offices of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Headquartered at Salt Lake City, Utah, this church was formed by those who followed Brigham Young in the aftermath of Joseph Smith Jr.'s assassination in 1844. This denomination was formally organized in 1847, when they selected Brigham Young as president of the church, as they made their way west across the continent from Illinois to what is now Utah. They too understand Independence, Missouri, as the site of the New Jerusalem and a sacred place for the Second Coming of Christ.

On the northeast and southwest corners of the sacred intersection are the international headquarters buildings of the Community of Christ. This denomination was formed by members of Smith's original church organization who remained in the Midwest after Smith's death. They formally organized in 1860 when they accepted Smith's eldest son, Joseph Smith, III, as the president of the church. The first members of this denomination returned to Independence in the late 1860s. The first congregation of the denomination located at Independence was organized in 1873. The Community of Christ, then known as the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, made Independence its international headquarters in 1920. The denomination began building a multistoried, domed auditorium in 1926 to provide a place for church conferences and offices for church officials. Seating more than 5,000 people, the auditorium housed the headquarters offices of the church from the 1940s into the early 1990s, when it was joined across the intersection by the newly erected temple. The temple also houses offices for church officials, with space for worship and leadership education.

Several other denominations based on the teachings of Joseph Smith Jr. also make their headquarters in Independence and Jackson County. Many of these believe all or part of the 63-acre tract of land is sacred space. These groups do not accept the temple built by the Community of Christ as legitimate and look to the day when a "true" temple will be built on that land. Some of these denominations were formed by disaffected members of the Community of Christ, while others were formed by disaffected members of the Church of Christ (Temple Lot).

Independent Church of Australia

The Independent Church of Australia, a relatively new expression of Western Esotericism, was founded in Perth, Australia, in 1969. It has an eclectic perspective, with ritual and liturgy derived from both Roman and Protestant Christianity and teachings inspired by both New Thought and Theosophical traditions, especially the Unity School of Christianity and the Christian Community founded by Rudolf Steiner.

The Reverends Mario Schoemaker (1929–1997) and Colin Reed (1944–1999) opened the first church center and in 1971 created the church's educational arm, the Institute of Metaphysics. It is the church's belief that Jesus was a divine being who took on human form and who, having passed through death, now inhabits the spiritual atmosphere of the planet. The church teaches that each member has an essential divine nature. Their task is to nurture the "Christ within" and pursue a path of development toward a mystical unity with God. The Cosmic Mass (similar to that of the Christian Community) is celebrated weekly, as is a service focused upon spiritual healing.

The Institute's curriculum introduces students to occult metaphysics, the metaphysical interpretation of the Bible, psychism, mysticism, and the Christian mysteries. With his more advanced students, in 1988 Schoemaker founded the Order of the Mystic Christ. As students develop psychically they are directed to the gaining of a mystic vision of the Christ. The Order has its own distinctive set of chants and meditations. Many members of the Order reside in metropolitan Melbourne, where members can supplement their personal program of spiritual practice and study with bimonthly gatherings.

The Independent Church of Australia is headquartered in Victoria (a suburb of Melbourne). In 2009, it reported four centers in Australia, two in New Zealand, and one in the Netherlands. The church uses the several textbooks written by Schoemaker, including The New Clairvoyance and A Short Occult History of the World, and the many tapes of his talks and classes.

■ India, Contemporary Religion in: Asian Religions

The cultural, linguistic, and religious diversity of South Asia and of India in particular reflects a long history of encounter and dialogue among the various groups of people, communities, and traditions that share common religious concepts but whose religious identities cannot be reduced to those commonly shared elements. With 827,578,868 persons, approximately 80 percent of the Indian population identify themselves as Hindu. Thus, Hinduism is the largest religious tradition in India. However, as it is clear from the study of this complex religion, diversity in ritual, worship, and theological/philosophical outlooks makes it difficult to understand it as a monolithic tradition. The diversity of Hinduism can be traced to the Vedic period (ca. 1200–200 BCE), when already variously connected but individual ritual-schools (shakhas) present us with a variety of interpretations of the meaning Vedic sacrifice. It is also toward the end of the Vedic period, around the fifth century BCE, that Buddhism and Jainism emerge out the Vedic religious milieu expounding new religious ideas while continuing to reinterpret common South Asian religious concepts, such as karma, samsara, and spiritual salvation (moksha, nirvana) in new ways. Jainism continued through the centuries, while Buddhism was all but obliterated early in the second millennium BCE. They would be joined in the modern world by Sikhism. One of the youngest religions in India, Sikhism is rooted in Guru Nanak's experience of One Supreme Being (Ekankar) as the Eternal Reality and Creator through whose grace spiritual liberation (moksha) may be achieved in one's lifetime.

Tibetan pilgrims chant under the shade of the Bodhi tree in Bodhgaya, India. (Corel)

Religious pluralism in India has also been shaped by contact with non-indigenous peoples that have come into the subcontinent as a result of migrations or have been driven by economic, political, and religious ideologies. Included are Zoroastrianism, Christianity, Islam, and Judaism (covered in a separate entry below).

Buddhism Although India is the birthplace of Buddhism, by the 13th century the institutions that supported the doctrines taught by the Buddha had virtually disappeared. The 2001 census of India counted 7,955,207 individuals, less than one percent of the population, who identified as Buddhist.

Society and culture in India around the sixth century CE was undergoing a radical transformation. The late Vedic texts, the Upanishads, indicate the transition from small chiefdoms to a period of urbanization not seen in South Asia since the Indus Valley period (3500–1200 BCE), and the concurrent shift from an agricultural-based economy to one primarily based on commerce and trade allowed for a broader distribution of goods as well as wider dissemination and debate about religious ideas and institutions. It is during this period that the great religious tradition founded by Siddhartha Gautama (ca. 563–483 BCE), known as the Buddha (the Awakened One), appears on the cultural horizon of North India, according to the Tripitika in Pali (generally referred to as the Pali canon), the earliest Buddhist texts.

After having attained enlightenment (nirvana) under the Bodhi tree, located in modern-day Bodhi-gaya, the Buddha established the Buddhist monastic community of monks and nuns (Sangha), which has taught the heart of the dhmma (Sanskrit: dharma) for approximately the last 2,500 years. Although the Buddha's teaching of the Four Noble Truths contains the essential path for the spiritual transformation of the individual person, he did not lay down a system for his community to follow; rather, he presented a set of general principles of conduct for monks, nuns, and novices. These general principles are collected in the Vinaya pitika, whose guiding principles is to overcome excessive desire (tahna) by cultivating contentment in the company of others who are aiming for the same goal. Soon after the parinirvana, or final passing of the Buddha, the first Council of Arhats was held at Rajagaha, where the attending monks agreed upon the contents of the Sutta and Vinaya portions of the Tripitika. The Second Council was held approximately 70 years later at Vesali, where a number of issues regarding monastic practice became the focus of discussion, such as whether a monk should accept money.

Various perspectives on fundamental questions of Buddhist doctrine, such as the status of the self, the question of personal continuity, and the concept of causality developed within the various monastic fraternities. By the third century BCE, three schools of thought had crystallized within the Sangha: the Personalists (Puggalavadins), the Pan-realists (Sarvastivadins), and the Distinctionists (Vibhajjavadins). These three early schools of Buddhist thought developed within the elder (Sthaviras) monastic fraternities, which were distinguished by the time of the Second Buddhist Council from the Mahasanghika, or the greater assembly. The monastic fraternities connected with the Vibhajjavada perspective were primarily found in South India and eventually became established in Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), where they referred to themselves as Theravada, 'the tradition of the elders' (the Pali equivalent to Sanskrit Sthaviravada), one of the two major branches of Buddhism today.

At the Second Buddhist Council, the question of following one's teacher's practice against the practice established in the Vinaya was a controversial one. The elder (sthaviras) monks, primarily from western India, concluded that it was at times permissible to follow the practice of one's teacher, but there was no clarification of the details and application of the decision. According to non-Theravada sources, the majority of eastern monks disagreed on this issue and held their own council at Pataliputra, where the schism of the Sangha is said to have begun. At their council, the various Mahasangika monastic fraternities, centered in the capital city of Pataliputra and in the southern cities of Amaravati and Nagarjunakonda, generally argued against the Sthaviravada position that the Sutta and Vinaya of the Tripitika were the final authority regarding the Buddha's teachings. According to non-Theravada sources, there were five major points of contention regarding the status of the arhat, the ideal perfected individual who achieves freedom from the bonds of desire by following the teachings of the Buddha: (1) the arhat was capable of being seduced by another; (2) the arhat could be subject to ignorance; (3) the arhat may have doubts; (4) the arhat may be instructed by another person; (5) entry into the path of the Buddha may be accompanied by sorrow. The so-called five points of Mahadeva are an explicit critique of the arhat and the Theravada fraternities.

Many of the doctrines and practices of the Mahasangika monastic fraternities have much in common with those in the Mahayana traditions of Buddhism, which arose sometime between 150 BCE and 100 CE as contained in many of their sutras composed in Sanskrit, which claimed to be the word of the Buddha. In addition to questioning the status of the arhat and the limitation of the Buddha's teaching to the Tripitika, the Mahasangikas also stressed the transcendental nature of Buddhahood as not being limited to the historical Buddha. Recent scholarship has questioned the understanding of the later Mahayana tradition as developing from within Mahasangika groups and suggests that Mahasangika positions may have been influenced by already existing proto-Mahayana groups.

Theravada Buddhism survives today primarily in Sri Lanka and parts of Southeast Asia (Myanmar, Laos, and Thailand), while Mahayana Buddhism spread beyond the borders of India through trading routes to Central Asia as well as through seafaring trade into China, Japan, Cambodia, Korea, Japan, and Tibet.

The ascendancy of Buddhism in India and its spread to Central, East, and Southeast Asia cannot be understood apart from the intimate relationship between political power and religion. In the sixth century BCE, the political landscape of North India was made up of small kingdoms and tribal confederations. Following Alexander the Great's (ca. 356–323 BCE) invasion of North India and after the decline of Persian power in the region, Magadha emerged as the first major kingdom in the Gangetic plain to assert control over a large part of the subcontinent. By 303 BCE, Chandragupta Maurya (r. 324–301 BCE) had consolidated power over the territory extending from eastern Afghanistan to Bengal and south to the Narmada River, in modern-day Gujarat. The Mauryan Empire spread into the Deccan Plateau to modern-day Mysore and the Tamil region under Bindusara (r. 297–272 BCE). However, it was Ashoka (r. 269–232 BCE) who completed the first unification of India after his conquest of Kalinga (modern-day Orissa).

The close affinity and dependence between the Sangha and political authority for the Sangha's economic sustenance, as well as the king's need of the legitimating authority of the Sangha, have been an important aspect in the history and spread of Buddhism. After an initial period of bloody conquest during the early part of his reign, Ashoka converted to Buddhism. After his conversion, Ashoka made the Buddha's dhamma a guiding principle of this great empire by institutionalizing Buddhist doctrine, as is evident in the language of his edicts, which show a close affinity to Buddhist religious language and provided the ideological underpinning for his empire. Ashoka outlawed animal sacrifices in the royal court, as well as killing animals in royal kitchens. Although somewhat critical of Vedic ritual practices, Ashoka never outlawed any particular religious practice of any other religious communities. Indeed, many of his edicts show that there was royal support for all major religious traditions of this time—Buddhism, Vedism, Jainism, and Ajivikas. The tradition of royal support for religious institutions, regardless of the personal adherence of the ruler, may be traced to the early Mauryan rulers, including Ashoka.

The sectarian split along doctrinal lines between the Theravada and Mahayana traditions with the subsequent identification of monastic identity along doctrinal lines began at the Council at Vesali and was crystallized by 100 CE. For the next 800 years, Buddhism continued to survive in India alongside other religious communities in the various kingdoms that came into being with the end and the subsequent fragmentation of the Mauryan Empire. Royal patronage of Buddhist institutions declined after the death of Harsha (606–647 CE).

A crucial blow to Buddhist institutions in India came with the rise of Islamic political power in India that was inaugurated by raids into areas of Baluchistan, Sind, Punjab, and Gujarat by the armies of Mahmud of Ghazni in 997 CE. There were several factors, both internal and external, that contributed to the decline and eventual disappearance of a thriving Buddhist community in India, including the assimilation of Buddhist ideas and practices into Hinduism with its focus on religiosity connected to locality through the enormous web of sacred narratives of pilgrimage sites, the nearly exclusive dependence of Buddhist monastic institutions on royal patronage, and the isolation of monastic institutions from village communities. With the conquest of the Gangetic Plain by Muslim Turkish-Ghurids and the destruction of the two great Buddhist universities at Nalanda in 1197 and Vakramashila in 1203, the institutional foundation of Buddhism in India was shattered. Although Tibetan pilgrims in the early 1200s noted pockets of surviving monks and a few monasteries, by the 13th century Buddhism had institutionally been driven out of India.

The consolidation of British hegemonic authority in India and the subsequent policy of religious tolerance gave rise to movements to reintroduce Buddhist institutions. One such movement began at end of the 19th century, when Sri Lankan monk Anagarika Dharmapalan (1864–1933), inspired by the efforts of the Theosophical Society, established the Maha Bodhi Society in 1891. The aim of the Dharmapala's movement was to revive Buddhism in India by restoring the most important Buddhist pilgrimage sites, including the Mahabodi Temple at Bodhgaya. Dharmapala used the existing legal system and sued the Brahmans who had controlled the site for several centuries to regain control over other Buddhist pilgrimage sites including Kushinagar, the site of the Buddha's parinirvana.

The most significant effort to revive Buddhism in India was the re-conversion campaign led by Bhimrao Rami Ambedkar (1892–1956) to lead 600,000 untouchables (dalits) into the Buddhist tradition. Ambedkar saw Buddhism as an effective ideology to fight and abolish discrimination based on caste status. In 1955, he founded the Buddhist Society of India (Bharatiya Bauddha Mahasabha). He completed his final published work, The Buddha and His Dhamma, in 1956. He converted to Buddhism in a public ceremony along with some 300,000 others in 1956. Although the number of converts to Buddhism remains relatively low, members of Dalit Buddhist movements have continued to campaign in order to regain control of traditional Buddhist sites.

In the 21st century, the most visible strand of Buddhism in India is the Vajrayana, or Tibetan, branch of Buddhism. After troops from the army of the People's Republic of China amassed on the Tibetan border beginning in 1950 and Communist collectivization was instituted, the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso (b. 1937), the spiritual and political leader of the Tibetan community, escaped from Chinese troops into India in 1954. The Tibetan exile community has made its home in Dharmasala in the Kangra District of the state of Himachal Pradesh.

Jainism With 4,225,053 adherents, or 0.4 percent of the population, according to the 2001 census of India, Jainism is the fifth largest religion in India. In North India, Jains are found primarily in the state of Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh, and Rajasthan as well as farther south in Maharashtra and Karnataka. Jainism emerged out of the same historical context as Buddhism, namely, the late Vedic period. Jains understand their tradition to stretch back into prehistory, having been transmitted in a series of 24 ford makers (tirthankaras) who have periodically taught the Three Jewels, the uncreated teachings of right faith, right knowledge, and right practice. The historical tradition may be traced to the Mahavira (ca. 540–468 BCE), the 24th tirthankara, who is said to have taught Five Great Vows: restraint from violence, restraint from lying, restraint from taking what has not been given, restraint from possession, and restraint from sexual relations.

Jainism understands everything in the universe to be constituted of two eternal and ultimate real entities, life-monad or soul (jiva) and nonsentient matter (ajiva). Ajiva provides the conditions and mechanism through which jiva functions. In this view, jiva is understood to be restricted in its motion especially by karma, which is regarded as physical substances that sticks to the jiva in the same way as dust. Karma is the inescapable result of actions, which are conceived to harm living beings. The aim of the teachings of Mahavira is to stop the accumulation of new karma and to eliminate accumulated karma, so that the jiva may experience pure knowledge and bliss in its naturally unencumbered, liberated and disembodied state at the top of the universe.

Jain thought and practice is inseparable from the ascetic idea, which is the foundation of both the Jain lay community and the monastic community. For Jain monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen, the goal of liberation from the entanglements of karma can only be achieved through the gradual increase of restraint and purification. The religious life of laymen and laywomen is understood in the Jain sacred texts to be a less potent form of asceticism. Only by restraining body and mind is it possible to attain the correct view of reality that provides the initial push toward the strict path of spiritual purification of monks and nuns.

Two distinct monastic traditions—Digambara (sky-clad) and Svetambara (white-clad)—associated with the teachings of Mahavira are historically attested as early as the fourth century BCE. Although there were other sects among the Jains, such as the Yapaniya, the Digambara and Shvetambara have remained historically the monastic foci of the Jain community. The schism between these two groups is predicated on several issues, including the content of the Jain scriptural canon (Agama), styles of monastic practices, the question of female religiosity and liberation, and the question of whether the fully omniscient being (kevalin) needs food.

The most visible distinction between Digambara and Shvetambara monks is their understanding of the great vow of restraint from possession. Nudity as the ultimate detachment from possession is traceable to Mahavira himself, who is said to have refused to cover himself with garments. Digambara monks affirm nudity as a marker of their monastic identity. Shvetambara monks recognize nudity as the ultimate expression of non-possessing, but point to textual passages that advise a monk to limit the wearing of clothes by minimizing the number of garments.

Inseparable from the split over garments and nudity is the question of spiritual capacity of women, another point of contention between the two traditions. The fully developed Digambara doctrine holds that because female nudity is socially unacceptable, women therefore cannot fully participate in the naked ascetic path. Furthermore, they argue that women's physical and emotional character makes it impossible for them to genuinely engage in the intense path necessary for spiritual purification. Although by this argument, women can never do evil to the same extent as men, it also follows that they are inherently unable to carry out the good acts necessary for liberation. Only by being reborn as a man can a woman engage the ascetic path. Later Digambara secondary arguments appealed to human physiology in order to exclude women from the path: by their very biological basis, women constantly generate and destroy (and therefore harm) life-forms within their sexual organs. Shvetambara oppose this view by appealing to scriptures, which show that since the time of the first tirthankara, Rishabha, women monastics outnumbered monks. Shvetambara also maintain that the 19th tirthankara, Malli, was a woman. The Kalpasutra also points out that at the time of Mahavira's death, the community centered on his teachings included two and a half times more female ascetics than male ascetics.

Within the Digambara and Shvetambara branches there have been subsequent fragmentations based on doctrinal disputes, including the interpretation of image-worship as well as the practice of wearing a mouth piece (muhpatti) in order to minimize the destruction of air-bodies and tiny insects that may be accidentally harmed through the mere biological process of breathing. Sub-lineages within the two main branches were historically connected to influential teachers who claimed to be restoring the original teaching of Mahavira.

Lay Jains engage in a variety of popular religious practices, including image worship (puja), temple rituals, and pilgrimage, activities that from the point of view of an observer makes Jains and Hindu nearly indistinguishable on the surface. The focus of Jain devotional ritual is not directed toward a deity or meant to mediate a relationship between the sacred and profane. Rather, the focus of Jain devotion, whether through puja in the home or as part of larger temple rituals, is a celebration of the heroic lives of the tirthankaras and jina (literally "conquerors," who have conquered samsara), in order to direct the focus the mind on the qualities which the image of the jina embodies. Devotional rituals, including image-worship, songs, and prayers, are meant to remind the Jain householder of the ultimate centrality of the Five Great Vows as the only way to overcome samsara. Thus, the religious life of Jain householders, instead of leading the householder away from the monastic idea of complete restraint, only serves to magnify the centrality of progressive renunciatory progress toward liberation.

Sikhism Sikhs account for 19,215,730, or 1.9 percent, of the Indian population according to the 2001 census of India. Sikhism emerged as a distinct religious tradition within the broadly defined context of northern Indian Sant tradition, also known as the Nirguna Sampradaya. The devotional songs composed by famous Sants, including Kabir (1440–1518), Mirabai, and Dadu, incorporated the religious language of Vaishnava devotionalism (bhakti) and Sufism to emphasize the transformative personal experience of the transcendent deity who is beyond qualities and form. Like many devotional traditions in India around this period, Sant traditions focus on the signing of hymns, the recitation of mantras, and the singing of devotional songs (bhajans) as important practical elements for spiritual transformation.

The Sikh tradition is rooted in the uniquely transformative experience of its founder, Guru Nanak (1469–1539), who at the age of 30 received a revelation that designated him to honor and sing the praises of the One Supreme God. Nanak’s experience of the divine was influenced by the vocabulary of both Hindu devotional movements, theological/philosophical schools, and the Muslim understanding of Oneness (tawhid) of God. Informed by this religious milieu, Nanak understood his experience in terms of both traditions, but at the same time maintained its uniqueness. After visiting Hindu and Muslim pilgrimage sites (tirtha), Nanak established the village of Kartapur, in modern-day Pakistan, as the location of the newly emerging community of Sikhs (derived from the Sanskrit word shishya, disciple) who were attracted to his charismatic personality and teachings.

The core of Nanak’s teaching was the assertion of One Supreme Being (Ekankar), eternal and everlasting, who took on no physical manifestation. The Supreme

God may be known only through the grace of the guru (teacher), a concept that encompasses four essential doctrinal points: (1) guru as the Eternal Guru, the Supreme God; (2) guru as the personal guru; (3) guru as the Guru Granth Sahib, also known as the Adi Granth, the sacred texts of Sikhism; and (4) guru as the Guru Panth, the community of Sikhs as well as the doctrine of the community. Sikhism opposes any anthropomorphic representation of the Supreme God, insisting that it is beyond gender, transcendent (nirguna), but simultaneously immanent (saguna) as embodied in the Divine Name (nam), in the words (bani) of the sacred texts, and in the person of the guru and other saints.

The daily life of Nanak's early community of Sikhs centered on agricultural activity meant to sustain the town of Kartapur. The gurumuk (one oriented toward the guru) focused on the cultivation of a three-fold spiritual relationship with the nam, society, and self. For Nanak, disciplined worldly activity was a requirement for the ultimate union of the self with Aral Purakh (Timeless One). The early Sikh tradition incorporated the pan-South Asian religious concepts of karma and samsara into its worldview, but made both subservient to the monotheistic doctrine expressed in the Adi Grant. Karma is not an unalterable and unavoidable law of cause and effect, as in Hinduism or Jainism, but is subject to the divine order (hukam) instituted by the Supreme One. Divine grace can shatter cause and effect and free the individual from samsara.

The religious life of Sikhs has been shaped by the teachings of Guru Nanak, and also by the transmission and innovations instituted by the lineage of the Sikh gurus from Nanak up to the 10th and last guru, Gobind Singh (1666–1708), who closed the Sikh canon, terminated the line of personal gurus, and shifted ultimate authority to the sacred texts by establishing the Adi Granth as the eternal guru for all Sikhs.

From the middle to the end of the 16th century the Mughal Empire under Emperor Akbar (1542–1605) was relatively tolerant of various religions. The third guru, Amar Das (1479–1974), who had served in the court of Akbar, was granted land in the region between the Sutlej River and the Ravi River, where the city of Amritsar, the spiritual center of the Sikh tradition, was built. There he built the Harimandir (Golden Temple) one of the oldest and most important gurudwars. Following the death of Akbar, the Sikh community was caught up in the political machinations and the subsequent shifting currents of political and religious ideology within the Mughal Empire. The fourth guru, Arjan (1563–1606), was arrested by Akbar's son, Emperor Jahangir (1569–1627) for aiding his son Khusrau Mirza (1587–1622) in a plot to depose him. Arjan never admitted his guilt nor abandoned his faith in the face of Jahangir's policy of terror and conquest, and was eventually tortured to death.

Conflicts with the Mughal authorities intensified during the period of the guruship of Gobind Singh (1675–1708). After the public execution of the ninth guru, Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), fear of persecution spread among the community of Sikhs and led to a general movement to conceal Sikh identity. In reaction to both of these events, Gobind Singh reorganized the community around visible markers of Sikh identity and created the Sikh Khalsa, the community of pure ones. The five K's—uncut hair (kesh), a comb for the topknot (kangha), a saber (kirpan), a steel bracelet worn on the right wrist (kara), and knee-length soldiers' shorts (kachh)—are mandatory for members of the Khalsa. Gobind transformed the Sikh religious community into a religio-military order. In this transformation Sikhism abandoned certain religious emphases that had been important in its founding, including the strict interpretation of the concept of nonviolence (ahimsa).

The congregational life of Sikhs as well as their individual daily religious routines is centered on the Guru Granth Sahib. Congregational service takes place in the gurudwara and consists of singing passages from the Granth as well as hymns (kirtans). It also includes a sermon (katha) on the meaning of a particular section of the Granth delivered by the granthi (reader) or by a Sikh scholar (gyami). After a joint recitation of petition prayers and the reading of the divine command, sanctified food (karah prasad) is distributed among the devotees. Sikhs engage in the meditation on the Divine Name (nam) immediately after rising in the morning and taking an early morning ritual bath. After recitation of the five daily prayers, the individual or family read a randomly chosen passage from the Adi Granth, which is considered to be the divine commandment (vak laina).

The central place of the Guru Granth Sahib is also observed in Sikh lifecycle rituals. The naming ceremony for a newborn involves the selection of a name that begins with the same letter as the first composition on the left-hand page of a randomly opened section of the Granth. In addition, males receive the surname Singh, “Lion,” while females are given the surname Kaur, “princess.” These names became middle names especially among Sikh communities in North America, who use traditional caste names as last names. The initiation ceremony (amrit sanskar) for a Sikh boy may take place at any point in time when the initiate is willing and able to join the Khalsa community. During the ceremony, the initiate drinks five times from amrit, sweetened water stirred with a double-edged sword, which is also sprinkled in his eyes and poured on his head five times. The initiate takes on the five K’s along with a turban as visible markers of his identity as a Sikh. In diaspora contexts, especially in North America and Europe, some Sikhs choose to cut their hair but maintain their Sikh identity through the continued use of the name Singh or Kaur. Sahaj-dhari

Sikhs maintain traditional ritual practices such as the meditation upon the Divine Name, but disregard the five K’s. Sikhs have been one of the most economically successful communities of the various Indian religion and many Sikhs have immigrated to Western countries over the last century.

■ India, Contemporary Religion in: Middle Eastern Religions

Hinduism is, of course, the largest religious tradition in India. The diversity of Hinduism can be traced to the Vedic period (ca. 1200–200 BCE), and it is toward the end of the Vedic period, around the fifth century BCE, that Buddhism and Jainism emerge out of the Vedic religious milieu. Religious pluralism in India, however, was also shaped by contact with non-indigenous peoples that have come into the subcontinent as a result of migrations or have been driven by economic, political, and religious ideologies. Practitioners of Zoroastrianism, a tradition that shares much with the ancient religion of the Rig Veda, have made a home in India since their arrival in the Gujarat region in the early part of the 10th century CE. The origin of a relatively small community of followers of Judaism in India can be traced to Jewish merchants and traders from the Middle East as far back as the ninth century. Diversity also characterizes the history of Christianity in India, a community that accounts for approximately 3 percent of the population, according to the 2001 census of India. While the three major ecclesiastic traditions—Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant—are well established in India, the oldest communities of Indian Christians trace themselves to Saint Thomas, one of Jesus’ disciples, who visited India during the first century CE and established a church connected to the Syrian Orthodox Church. Islam, the second largest religion in the world, entered the subcontinent through two routes. Before the military raids of Mahmud of Ghazni into the areas of modern-day Baluchistan, Sind, and Gujarat in search of the long reputed wealth of al-Hind (India), Arab traders had established contact with the coast of southern India and, in the context of commerce and trade, were successful in gaining converts.

Christianity Christianity is the third largest religious community in India, with 24,080,016 adherents, or approximately 2.3 percent of the population according to the 2001 census of India. The members of three major branches of the Christian tradition—Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant—are found throughout India. The largest Christian churches are the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of South India, the Malankara Syrian Orthodox Church, the Church of North India, the Council of Baptist Churches in North-east India, the United Evangelical Lutheran Church in India, the Methodist Church in India, the New Apostolic Church, and the Samavesam of Telugu Baptist Churches. The majority of Christians in India are located primarily in the states of Kerala, Tamilnadu, and Andhra Pradesh.

The oldest ecclesiastical Christian tradition in the subcontinent is the Eastern Orthodox tradition, represented by the Indian Orthodox Church, the Orthodox Syrian Church of the East, the Armenian Apostolic Church, and the Chaldean Syrian Church. These traditions claim a historical connection to Saint Thomas, who established a church in India during the first century. However, the earliest attestation of Christians in southern India appears in the historical record only in the end of the second century CE. Roman Catholicism arrived in India with Vasco de Gama (1460–1524) in 1498. Catholic missionary activity by Franciscans and Dominicans was headquartered in Goa, a small town on the west coast of India, south of Mumbai. Protestant missionary activity in India began in 1706, with the arrival of German missionaries sent by the king of Denmark. They established the first Protestant congregation in Tharangampadi, in Tamil Nadu, south of Chennai. These early Protestant missionaries translated the Bible into Tamil. With the eventual arrival of more Western Protestant missionaries, the network of Protestant congregations expanded throughout India.

The importance of corporate worship in Christianity has remained a central element of the religious life of Indian Christians. However, Indian Christians have incorporated several linguistic and regional peculiarities that have given rise to authentic patterns of worship, liturgical practices, and church architecture that incorporate individual rituals, traditional rites of passage (samsakaras), and family ceremonies. Eastern Orthodox and Catholic traditions introduced the use of vernacular language for liturgy, the use of local musical traditions, and the adoption of Indian architectural styles in the construction of churches. While Protestant churches have been more cautious about incorporating local language and cultural practices into worship, they have also adapted the liturgy to traditional patterns of worship in India: entry (pravasha), awakening (prabodha), remembering and offering (smarana-samarpana), sharing the Body and Blood of Christ (darshana), and blessing (prashena/prasada).

The religious life of Indian Christians is also informed by home-based religious practices, many of which have adapted traditional Hindu samskaras (rites of passage). Indian Christian weddings follow the same pattern as Hindu weddings, which includes a set of rituals to be observed as part of the pre-wedding sequence, marriage day, and post-wedding days. As in Hindu weddings, the tilaka (marks of auspiciousness) ceremony is performed as part of the pre-wedding day rituals in which tilakas are applied on the head of the bride and the groom in their respective homes, using kumkum and turmeric paste. The bride and relatives from both families are made to wear green glass bangles.

In addition to home-based worship, the community celebrates Christmas and Easter, as well as church anniversary festivals, which commemorate the consecration of the local or regional churches. Roman Catholic churches have incorporated elements of Hindu temple rituals and puja, including the procession of the statue of the Virgin Mary. Like Hindus crowding to get darshan (religious sight) of the consecrated image (murti) of the deity being brought to see devotees, Indian Christians gather around to gain grace from seeing the procession of the Virgin Mary.

The Bible has occupied an important place in the religious life of Indian Christians, but early on both the Orthodox Christians and Catholics paid less attention to the translation of the text than to the collected body of liturgical practices, incorporating the focus on orthopraxy that has always permeated the Hindu tradition. The translation of the Bible into the vernacular languages of India was primarily a concern of Protestant missionaries, who named their translation the Veda or Vedagma. Some missionaries referred to the Bible as the “fifth Veda,” thus linking their sacred text to the antiquity and prestige of the Veda.

In the 20th century, there were several efforts to connect and unite the hundreds of different Christian communities throughout India. These efforts had some notable success, leading to the formation of the Church of South India (1947) and the Church of North India (1970), which brought together Anglicans, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Brethren, British and Australian Methodists, and the Disciples of Christ. A number of the Lutheran groups formed the United Evangelical Church in India.

Islam Today, Muslims form the second largest religious community in India, with some 138,188,240 adherents, or approximately 13.4 percent of the population, according to the 2001 census of India. Inspired by the universality of the message of the Koran, the early Muslim community based in Medina expanded and within 100 years Muslim armies had conquered substantial portions of the Iberian Peninsula, ancient Iraq, and Asia Minor. The first serious military incursion into South Asia took place in 711 CE, when the Umayyad governor of Iraq sent a military force into Sind as result of pirate attacks on Arab ships that passed near the mouth of the Indus River. With the decline and subsequent disintegration of the Abbasid Caliphate (ca. 750–1258), independent Muslim-dominated kingdoms were in competition with each other for territorial and economic gains. An independent Turkish Islamic kingdom was founded in 962 by a Samanid warrior slave, who seized the Afghan fortress of Ghazni. His grandson, Mahmud of Ghazni (971–1030), undertook a series of raids into Thanesar, Mathura, Kanauj, Nagarkot, and Somnath in modern-day Gujarat in search of wealth. By the time of his death, Mahmud had annexed the Punjab region into his empire. By 1175, Ghazni had fallen to Turk Ghurids under the leadership of Sultan Muhammad of Ghur (1162–1206). The Ghurids took Peshawar from the Ghaznavid forces in 1179, Lahore in 1189, and Delhi in 1193. The sultan left his lieutenant Qutb-ud-din Aybak (d. 1210) to consolidate control over North India with Delhi as the capital city and eventually founded the Sultanate of Delhi upon Muhammad of Ghur’s death in 1206. The Sultanate expanded its territory through campaigns of suppression against the Hindu Rajput confederacy as well as through tactics of persuasion and tolerance. Shams-ud-din Iletmish (1211–1236) consolidated his power by winning the support of Turkish military bureaucrats by continuing the system of grants of revenue from landed areas as well as by extending the status of “protected People of the Book” (dhimmi) to all Hindus, leaving local Hindu rulers in control of their domain as long as they paid land revenue to the sultan’s treasury.

In 1398, the Mongol conqueror Tamerlane (ca. 1336–1405) invaded northern India. Although he did not stay long, the plundering of the Punjab and the sacking of Delhi left the Sultanate in ruins and created a political vacuum that led to the fragmentation of a once powerful empire. In the aftermath of the Mongol invasion, two dynasties claimed control of the Delhi Sultanate, the Sayyids (1414–1451) and the Lodis (1451–1526). In 1526, Babur (1483–1530), Timur’s great-grandson, seized Delhi and established the Mughal dynasty after defeating a Rajput confederacy under the banner of Rana Sanga (r. 1509–1528) in 1527 and the remnant force of Mahmud Lodi in 1529.

Upon his ascension to the throne, Babur’s son Humayun (1508–1556) faced opposition from his father’s Afghan general, Sher Khan Sur. By 1540, Sher Khan had driven Humayun into Persia, and after declaring himself king proceeded to implement reforms of the revenue system and administrative appointments in order to consolidate imperial power, which would continue under the Mughal’s upon Humayun return to India in 1555.

Under Akbar (1542–1605), Muslim rule extended over most of the subcontinent. Akbar’s policies hinged on his understanding of the pluralistic character of Indian society and the necessity of cooperation with Hindu chiefs and kingdoms in order to maintain a functional empire. He established political alliances with Hindu chiefs through marriage and also abolished the tax levied on Hindu pilgrims and the jizya tax levied on non-Muslims. Akbar included Muslims as well as individuals from other major ethnic, regional, and religious groups, including Hindus, as part of the various ranks of the mansabdari system of administration. Indeed, the second most powerful person in Akbar's administration, the minister of revenue (diwan), was Raja Todar Mal, a Hindu. Although king Akbar enforced Islamic law (shariah) as interpreted by learned scholars (ulama) and enforced by judges (qazi), at the local levels Hindu law (dharma) was applied and decisions of village pañchayat councils were generally accepted as final.

Akbar's general understanding of the pluralism and the necessity of religious tolerance continued under his son Jahangir (1569–1627) and his grandson Shah Jahan (1628–1658). However, the last great Mughal emperor, Aurangzeb (1618–1707), systematically undermined the attitude of religious tolerance that Akbar had implemented in the administration of the empire in favor of stricter enforcement of Islamic religious law. Aurangzeb appointed “censors for public morals” (muhtasibs) to assure that Islamic law was obeyed and that prayers (salat/namaz) were being performed. He outlawed Hindu religious festivals, denied permits to build new Hindu temples, and reinstated jizya in 1679.

The transmission of Islam into South Asia has not been limited to contact of the Native population with Muslim military forces. Indeed, another major conduit for Islam to the broader populations has been Sufism. Although not rejecting the straight path to God laid down in the Koran and systematized in the later schools of Islamic law, Sufis emphasize the internal, ecstatic communion with God motivated by pure love. The Sufi path (tassawuf) encapsulated in the poems of the great Sufi saints brim with a language of devotion that not only describes the ineffability of the divine but also provides the paradigmatic model of the devotee. The language of Sufi poetry resonated with the bhakti-focused traditions and literary works that similarly focused on the ecstatic experience of the deity achieved through loving devotion with the ultimate aim of communion with the divine. In popular practice, the tombs (dargah) of Sufi saints function as sites of popular Muslim religiosity that are understood as charged with superhuman power and charisma (barakah). Muslims, as well as Hindus, Sikhs, and Christians, share the understanding that such superhuman or divine power can be accessed through devotion in order to cure the sick or help women become pregnant.

The religious life of Muslims in India as elsewhere in the world is structured around the practices that express the core beliefs found in the Koran and clarified by the various schools of Islamic law. The five universal obligations to Allah serve to structure the life of Muslims: declaration of faith (shahadah), daily worship (salat/namaz), fasting during the holy month of Ramadan (swam), obligation to share wealth (zakat), and pilgrimage to Mecca (hajj). The commemoration of the martyrdom of Husayn, the Prophet's grandson, as well as the celebration of the birth and death of Sufi saints, is also an important aspect of Muslim religiosity in India. Of the four schools of Shariah, the Maliki and Hanafi schools have had significant adherents in India.

The advent of British hegemony in South Asia saw the developments of Muslim reform movements that promoted different visions of Islam and Muslim life. Muhammad Iqbal (ca. 1877–1983) envisioned the reformation of Muslim society on the basis of ijtihad (independent reasoning) as both a way to revive past ideals and to modernize Islam by bringing modern democratic ideals into Muslim life and society. Ahl-e Sunnat wa'l-Jama'ah (People of the Way and the Community), founded by Ahmad Riza Khan (d. 1921), sought to reform Islam by focusing on the life of the Prophet as a model of individual responsibility. The Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College was founded by Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1898) as an alternative for Indian Muslim students to the British schools or the Islamic madrasahs of the times. Sayyid Ahmad rejected some of the traditional subjects taught in the madrasahs as no longer relevant to society, but the Islamic orientation of education that was compatible with the rationalism that underpinned Western education and thus remained an essential feature of the college. For Sayyid, the Koran and Western science were inherently compatible.

The Ahmadiyya Muslim movement and the Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam Lahore, heirs of the 19th-century Muslim revival movement begun by Mirza

Ghulam Hazrat Ahmad (1835–1908), were founded in India (in what is now Pakistan) and have gone on to become important international movements, though thought of as heretical by the majority of Muslims.

Judaism According to the 2001 census of India, 0.6 percent of the population is identified as belonging to “other religions and persuasion.” Indian Jews are included among this statistically small group. Although visibly small in numbers, Jewish communities have been found in India perhaps as early as Saint Thomas's arrival to the subcontinent in 52 CE. A popular legend among Christian communities in Kerala tells how upon his arrival in India, Thomas encountered a young woman, who was a flute-player, “by race a Hebrew,” among the participants in the wedding celebration of the local king. According to this popular story, the girl eventually converted to Christianity. Indian Jews belong to one of three communities located primarily in India, but also found in Burma: the Bene Israel, the Cochin Jews, and Baghdadi Jews. The number of these already small communities has shrunk over the centuries. In 1947, Indian Jews numbered approximately 23,000 but have steadily declined in numbers since.

The contact between local communities in India with Jews from the traditional territory of Israel is attested by linguistic evidence in the biblical book of Kings as well as tales told in the Talmud regarding trade with Hoddu (India). Documents from Egypt also indicate trade relations between the Near East and South Asia during the ninth century. Individual Indian Jewish communities maintain legendary accounts, tracing their origins back to biblical times.

The Bene Israel communities connect themselves through time to Israel as being members of the lost 10th tribe, who escaped persecution by their oppressors by sailing from Israel. The present community's ancestors were shipwrecked on the Konkan coast of Maharashtra and became part of the economic life of the community as oil pressers, known as Sahnwar telis (Saturday oil pressers), because they would not work on Saturday, the traditional Jewish Sabbath. Having lost their sacred books as well as the guidance of rabbis, they continued to recite the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4), observe Jewish holidays and related fasts, and carry out the ritual of circumcision of newborn males. Over centuries, they have adopted Marathi as their mother tongue and have also incorporated Urdu, Persian, and Arabic words, especially those related to kingship and religion. They reincorporated the sacred text, the Hebrew Bible, primarily through the translation activities of Christian missionaries. By the 1840s Jewish prayer books had been translated into Marathi.

The community of Cochin Jews on the Malabar Coast of India is attested in a land grant to Syrian Christians in the mid-ninth century. Cochin Jews claim that the seed of their community arrived along with Saint Thomas in 52 CE. The community moved from Cranganore, known to medieval travelers as Shingly, to Cochin in present-day Kerala in 1344. Jewish traders that followed Vasco De Gama's arrival in the subcontinent eventually settled in Cochin and had established a synagogue by 1568. Because of their contact with Portuguese and Dutch Jews, Cochin Jews have used the standard Sephardic prayer books.

The third major group of Indian Jews consists of immigrants from Baghdad and other major centers of Iraq who arrived in the subcontinent beginning in the early 1700s and originally settled in Surat and later moved to Mumbai and Calcutta. Baghdadi Jews spoke Arabic from the time of their arrival in India, but eventually adopted English as their primary language, with little attempt to adopt native Indian languages, except for a working knowledge of Hindustani.

Indian Jews observe major Jewish festivals and commandments (mitzvah), reflecting the centrality of monotheism of Judaism. Among the Bene Israel, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Simchat Torah, and Pesach are the most important festivals in which the entire community participates. Local Hindu traditions have influenced the religious life of all Indian Jews. In addition to celebrating major Jewish festivals and the traditional ritual of circumcision, Bene Israel Jews observe the hair-shaving ceremonies for newborns and also go on pilgrimages. They believe that the prophet Elijah (Eliyahu Hannabi) departed on his chariot from the village of Khandall in Kondan, which has become an important pilgrimage center for them. During Sukkot, Cochin Jews decorate their pandals (sukka) with painted coconut leaves. The Simchat Torah celebrations have incorporated singing, handclapping, and dancing in local Shingli style as well as the partaking of alcoholic drinks and refreshments. Baghdadi Jews have incorporated a number of local practices meant to protect the life of a mother and newborn child by wearing garlands and hanging amulets on a newborn's bed, including garlic, nutmeg, and pinning the name of God onto the baby.

With the formation of the state of Israel in 1948, many Indian Jews left India to settle in Israel. Nearly 50,000 Bene Israel, the majority of Cochin Jews, and a few Baghdadi Jews live in Israel today. Small Jewish communities remain in India, but they continue to diminish in size as religious intermarriage continues to rise. As numbers continue to dwindle, fewer individuals can lead prayer services and establish the required quorum of 10 men (minyan). It has become more difficult to maintain a cohesive community, which has resulted in the neglect and closing of many synagogues. In 1979, the Council of Indian Jewry was established in order to represent the interests of the various small Jewish communities in India.

Other Religious Communities Beyond the major world religions, there are a number of other religious traditions, ancient and modern, as well as religious movements that are found in contemporary India. Zoroastrians, or Parsis, as they are called in India, practice an ancient religion that served as the state religion under various Persian rulers, most notably Cyrus the Great (559–530 BCE). Zoroastrianism was dislodged from its prominent place in Persian culture and society as result of the conquests of Alexander the Great (356–323 BCE), whose successors suppressed the religion. It was re-established in the second century CE, but it was permanently displaced from traditional Persia as a result of the destruction of the Sassanid Empire by Muslims in the seventh century. Zoroastrianism survives in isolated regions of the world today, most prosperously in Mumbai, India, where there are approximately 200,000 adherents.

In the years since independence, numerous religious movements have emerged in India, including indigenous forms of older traditions. In addition to the numerous movements focused on a particular charismatic guru, there have been movements to unite the many independent Christian churches in India.

The Indian Constitution guarantees religious freedom for all religious groups, especially as they engage in purely religious affairs. The government operates on a principle of separation of religion and state affairs. It raises no money to support religion and does not allow religion to be included in the curriculum of state-supported schools. It is also a crime to promote enmity between groups based on religious prejudice. Although the Constitution provides a secular context for a religiously diverse society, old tensions have manifested in recent decades due to attempts to use the religious language and institutions for political purposes, especially in separatist movements.

■ India, Hinduism in: Ancient Vedic Expressions

The subcontinent/country of India is unique in a variety of ways. It is home to 1,166,100,000 people, making India the second largest country in the world, with slightly more than 17 percent of the world's population. Historically, a variety of kingdoms and dynasties have ruled different portions of the subcontinent—great and small. Definitively for the present, the British came to rule India in the 19th century and from their colonial state, the present countries of India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh were carved. The present state of India includes some 1,269,219 square miles of territory. Its lengthy southern shoreline bounds the Arabian Sea, the Indian Ocean, and the Bay of Bengal. Around its northern border is Pakistan, China, Nepal, and Myanmar. Bangladesh borders India on three sides.

India is also the home base to the religion we popularly call Hinduism. Though India has a substantial number of Muslims and Christians, and is home to the Sikh and Jain communities, 75 percent of the population are Hindus, almost 800,000,000 people. The Indian Hindu community is the source of the global Hindu community.

The formative stages of what we term Hinduism today occurred over several millennia and remain somewhat obscure due to a lack of written records. For the archaeological research and the few documents that have survived, the Hindu community can be seen as emerging through several distinctive periods discussed below as the Prehistoric, Vedic, and Classical. Later developments are discussed in a separate entry.

“Hinduism” is the relatively modern English term that designates the religious traditions and faith practiced by the largest majority of people in South Asia, especially India, as well as sizable diaspora communities in Africa, Europe, and the United States. However, when the question “What is Hinduism?” is asked, one is led immediately into the problem of defining a Hindu, Hinduism, and religion. Historically, it is nearly impossible to pinpoint a set of essential markers, such as a creedal statement, a founder figure, a universally accepted set of authoritative texts, or a unified belief system, worldview, or cosmology by which Hinduism may be understood as a monolithic tradition. The term “Hinduism” as representing a world religion is itself problematic, because it is not a word from any of the indigenous languages of South Asia, including Sanskrit, Middle Indic languages (Pali, Ardhamagadhi, etc.), or modern Indo-Aryan languages (Bengali, Gu-jarati, Hindi, etc.), that means “religion.” Hinduism is the name given to a collection of beliefs, practices, and traditions by outsiders. This modern term was formed by adding the suffix -ism to the base word hindu, which was adopted into European languages from the Persian translation for the name of the largest and most prominent river in Northwest India, the Indus (Sanskrit: Sindhu, Pali: Hindu). By 1050, Muslims referred to the land beyond the Indus as al-Hind and to the people who lived there, who were not “People of the Book,” as Hindus. For European traders and missionaries of the 17th century, “Hindu” came to signify both the people and the range of religious traditions, practices, and beliefs of persons who did not self-identify as Christians, Jains, Jews, Muslims, or Sikhs. As such, Hinduism does not designate a fixed creed, unified set of ritual traditions, institutional form, or group of exclusive practitioners or believers. Religious identity in South Asia has been traditionally affirmed with reference to multiple markers, such as doctrinal belief, sectarian affiliation (Vaishanava, Shaiva, Shakta), ritual practices, occupations, personal and religious lineage (parampara), ancestral village, and birth groups (varna, jati). Thus, from the beginning of its usage by Europeans, the term “Hinduism” has had a tangled history. One can think of “Hinduism” as an umbrella term that refers to particular configurations of linguistic, literary, anthropological, and archaeological evidence. The various traditions that are included under the term “Hinduism” share several characteristics, none of which can be considered as being essential, including the acceptance of the sacred status and authority of the Veda, its authoritative transmitters and interpreters, the Brahmins, and the body of ritual traditions contained therein.

One way to study Hinduism historically is by examining the textual and archaeological evidence, which spans a period of nearly 3,000 years. For the earliest period, the evidence consists of materials found in archaeological assemblages, including bricks, pottery, standardized weights, and inscriptional evidence. Beyond archaeological evidence, which is virtually lacking from ca. 1200 to 500 BCE, the bulk of the evidence for the history of Hinduism is textual. Although the texts cannot be accurately dated, their language, content, and other internal evidence have led to a relative linguistic chronology of Hindu texts that helps to ground the historical study of the tradition. The linguistic chronology overlaps with the Hindu understanding of the traditional chronology of the sacred texts. Most scholars divide the history of Hinduism into five periods: the prehistoric period (prehistory–1500 BCE), the Vedic period (ca. 1500–200 BCE), the classical period (ca. 400 BCE–600 CE), the medieval period (ca. 600–1600 CE), and the modern period (ca. 1600–present). The latter are treated in separate entries in this encyclopedia, “India, Hinduism in: Medieval Period,” and “India, Hinduism in: Modern Period.”

Prehistoric Period (prehistory–1500 BCE) The earliest advanced civilization known from archaeological evidence in South Asia is the Indus Valley civilization, or the Harappan civilization. This urban civilization flourished from ca. 2800 to 1300 BCE in the western part of South Asia and extended approximately 386,000 square miles throughout present-day Afghanistan, Iran, Pakistan, and India. The Indus civilization is characterized by sophisticated city planning, a system of water delivery and waste removal, granaries, a common weight system, and the use of writing. Although there is clear evidence of a system of writing, the language encoded in the Indus script remains unknown, and without access to the language, a reconstruction of the religion of the Indus must be deduced from material culture that has been excavated.

Excavations of Indus sites have yielded a large number of terra-cotta figurines that suggest parallels to mother goddess cults in Baluchistan, the Northwest Frontier Territory, and the Aegean area. Many of these figurines are female, as can be concluded from the exaggerated breasts and thighs, in addition to elaborate headdresses. These features suggest that one aspect of the religion of the Indus Valley was a concern for fertility. These figurines have been found throughout the various levels of excavation, which also suggests that goddess worship was a constant and popular feature in the Indus region. In addition to a mother goddess cult, there is evidence for a cult of a great male god. The evidence for this male deity comes primarily from a number of steatite seals, which also provide evidence of writing. The best known of these seals, identified by Ernest J. Mackay as seal #420, depicts a male figure seated in a pose that is similar to the lotus position that is used in the modern practice of yoga. This male figure wears a headdress with buffalo horns. In other similar seals, it also appears that the male figure has three faces or is wearing a three-faced mask. In some seals, the figure, possibly ithyphallic, is sometimes seated on a raised platform and often surrounded by animals, including an elephant, rhinoceros, water buffalo, and tiger.

These artistic motifs have led scholars to propose that this Indus figure might be an early representation of the Hindu god Shiva, who was known in the Rig Veda by the name Rudra. In this earliest Hindu text, one of Rudra’s epithets is “the lord of animals” (pa-shupati). In the later classical texts and images of Shiva, he is regularly depicted as seated in the lotus position, clearly engaged in meditative activity. He is regularly called “the great meditator” (mahayogi), which draws attention to Shiva’s intimate connection with asceticism, meditation, and the practice of yoga. The epithet sadashiva underscores the various dimensions of Shiva’s personality, which is artistically represented in sculpture and painting by Shiva’s multiple faces or heads. Finally, Shiva’s natural manifestation is the linga, a cylindrical shaft that often sits on a pedestal called the yoni (womb). Symbolically, the linga is said to represent two aspects of Shiva: eroticism and the potentiality for procreation on the one hand, and the ascetic, world-renouncing dimension, which is exemplified by sexual restraint.

Despite the numerous terra-cotta goddess figurines and seals depicting a great male god, there has been little else excavated that sheds light on the public dimension of Indus religion. There are no structures excavated that may be said to have a clear religious function, except perhaps the Great Bath of Mohenjo-daro. It is a large tank, with steps at the north end that descend into the tank. No other similar structures have been excavated at other Indus sites. The presence of steps going down into the tank suggests that it was probably used for ritual bathing by people who had access to the upper city. The ritual function of the structure may be also supported by the presence of bathing rooms on the eastern side of the building housing the tank.

It is possible to read many of these Indus artifacts as representing a point of origin for many important religious concepts, practices, and deities of Hinduism. However, many scholars have questioned such readings as perhaps expressing an unsupported assumption of cultural continuity. Regardless of the exact nature of Indus religion and religiosity, the archaeological record suggests that the Indus civilization came to an end sometime around 1500–1000 BCE. How a civilization as expansive and complex as the Indus suddenly comes to end has been a question that has preoccupied scholars since the discovery of the earliest Indus sites. Hypotheses about the demise of the Indus civilization have been shaped by later Hindu religious texts, as well as contemporaneous political ideologies. The earliest proposal for the demise of the Indus was the result of reading the archaeological evidence in light of the Rig Veda. Several hymns of the Rig Veda depict a struggle between a group of speakers of Sanskrit, who refer to themselves as noble ones (arya), and the dasul dasyus, who are often described in the texts as being dark-skinned, having large noses, and constantly being defeated in battle by the arya with the help of the great Vedic god Indra. The so-called Aryan Invasion Theory proposes that the Indus civilization and its people were wiped out by the invading arya, who were nomadic, cattle-raiding warriors. The horse-driven chariot, which was a significant component of their civilization, came to be understood as providing the technological superiority that made it possible for the Indus civilization to be wiped out. Beyond the textual evidence, there is no archaeological evidence of an invasion. Contemporary scholars of the Indus civilization have come to understand the late phase of the Indus civilization as a period of cultural transformation resulting from several forces, one of which was the influence of migrating populations, possibly of Indo-Aryan speakers, as may be indicated by Painted Gray Ware pottery found in the region.

Vedic Period (ca. 1500–200 BCE) Literary as well as some archaeological evidence from outside and inside of South Asia suggests the immigration of a new group of people into the northwest regions of South Asia. These newcomers have been identified as the composers and transmitters of the Vedas and the dominant culture in South Asia for the next two millennia. The “racial” character of the arya composers of the Veda is uncertain at best, but they spoke a language that was different from that of the Indus civilization. Vedic or Vedic Sanskrit belongs to the Indo-Iranian branch of the Indo-European language family, which includes the majority of the languages spoken in Europe, Central Asia, the Iranian Plateau, and northern parts of the Indian subcontinent. The genetic relationship of these languages has been established through the analysis of phonology, morphology, syntax, and lexical items that show a common linguistic structure that has only been reshaped by the study of sound changes/phonological developments. The question of the homeland of the arya remains a disputed one among archaeologists, linguists, and scholars of South Asian religions. However, it is clear from the large body of primarily religious literature found in South Asia from ca. 1200 BCE on that their social and religious ideologies became dominant, probably absorbing much of the previously existing culture, as can be seen from a large number of non-Sanskrit words in the Rig Veda.

The texts produced by these new immigrants into the subcontinent are called the Veda. The word veda, cognate with Greek (w)oida, English wit, and German Wissen, reflects the character of these texts as containing sacred knowledge. The Veda consists of poetry dedicated to the various deities, ritual injunctions, and prose explanations of various religious rituals. The post-Vedic, medieval Hindu tradition characterizes the Veda as shruti (“that which has been heard”), which is considered to be eternal, to have no human author, and to have been originally heard by the ancient seers (rishis), who preserved and transmitted them. Shruti is distinguished from smṛiti (“that which is remembered”), a genre of authoritative religious texts that have been composed by human authors.

The Veda consists of four separate collections—Rig, Sama-, Yajur-, and Atharva—characterized by the type of material and its usage in the classical Vedic rituals. Each Vedic collection is further subdivided into four sections—Samhita, Brahmana, Aranyaka, and Upanishad. The Samhita is the oldest section of each collection, consisting primarily of poems used in the performance of rituals. The Brahmanas present a type of exegetical commentary on the poetic formulas, or mantras, used in ritual activity. The Aranyakas, which stylistically are very much like the Brahmanas, focus on more secret and dangerous rituals that must be learned, recited, and performed in the wilderness (aranya) outside the village along with their more sophisticated, cosmic interpretations. The last section of each Veda, the Upanishads, continues to apply the same method of ritual exegesis as the Brahmanas and Aranyakas in order to set out the hidden connection between the cosmos, ritual, and the individual human being. The Upanishads are also called Vedanta (“the end of the Veda”) as they stand at a moment of transition between the archaic ritual-based religion of the Veda and the new religious ideas and institutions that characterize Hinduism. The Vedic texts were transmitted and preserved orally by ritual schools (shakhas) for a long period before they were written down.

The Rig Veda Samhita is the oldest and most authoritative text of the Hindu tradition. It is a collection of 1,028 hymns composed by various clans of poets, which have been arranged into 10 books. The hymns praising the various Vedic deities were used in religious rituals, which included the kindling and worship of the sacred fire (Agni), preparation of a special drink called soma, and specific rituals such as the horse sacrifice, and domestic rituals, including marriage and death rites. The Sama Veda contains a collection of chants (samans), primarily verses from the Rig Veda that have been set to melody, which are sung during the soma ritual. The Yajur Veda is the largest of the four Vedic collections and consists of mantras called yajus, which were recited during rituals. The Atharva Veda, the fourth Veda, is distinguished from the other three Vedas mainly in terms of content. It largely represents the popular side of Vedic culture and religion and contains spells for healing illness, the removal of demons, love-spells, speculative hymns about cosmic forces, as well as material relevant to domestic rituals, such as marriage, initiation, and death. Unlike the other three Vedas, its content is not directly relevant to shruta rituals.

Like all dates in ancient India, the date of the Rig Veda is by no means certain, but linguistic and internal evidence suggests that the text was composed ca. 1200–1000 BCE. The date of iron in South Asia (ca. 1000–900 BCE) helps to narrow down the date, since the Rig Veda mentions only metal or yellow metal (copper), as opposed to the Atharva Veda, which speaks about the black metal (iron). In addition, the Mitanni texts of Syria and Iraq (ca. 1450–1350 BCE) specifically mention the names of the most important Vedic deities (Indra, Mitra, Ashvins, and Varuna) as part of the treaty between a Hittite king and a Mitanni king. It also includes a manual on chariot horses by a Mitanni named Kikkuli, which contains many Indo-Aryan technical terms about horse training.

The hymns of the Rig Veda presume a complex mythological system that provides the context for the other Vedas, as well as later Hindu texts. It mentions several gods, many of whom belong to chronologically distinct groups or generations. The Sadhyas and Vishvadevas are distinguished from the Adityas, the younger generation of gods who are the focus of praise in the Rig Veda. The Adityas are counted as seven (sometimes eight) gods that in part represent important Vedic social and religious concepts, including tribal agreements (Mitra), arya-hood (Aryaman), luck (Bhaga), and lot (Amsha). The generational difference is also seen in the division of gods (devas) and asuras, the latter title often applied to gods that belong to the pre-Aditya generation, such as Varuna. In the Vedic text, the asuras slowly morph into a group of beings who stand in permanent opposition to the devas, and by Epics and Puranas are understood to be the demonic enemies of the gods. Among the 33 gods of the Rig Veda, the majority are male deities, with only few goddesses mentioned, including Ushas (dawn) and her sister, Ratri (night). The most important gods are Agni and Indra, to whom the majority of hymns are dedicated. Varuna, Mitra, Surya, Vishnu, Rudra, the Maruts, and the twin gods, the Ashvins, also play important roles in Vedic mythology.

Agni is the personification of the sacred ritual fire, which is the most important feature of the Vedic religion. As the ritual fire and the priest of the gods, Agni is the intermediary between the human world and the heavenly, divine sphere. He transports offerings to the gods, who consume the trans-substantiated offering in the form of smoke or aroma (medha). Indra, the king of the gods, plays a major role in the cosmogony of the Rig Veda and ranks second in importance only to Agni. It is Indra who separates heaven and earth, releases the dawns from the cave (vala), and frees the life-giving waters being held back by Vritra, the demonic power of chaos against the ordering power of the gods. Indra is able to carry out his demiurgic activity through the invigorating power of soma, which is both a deity and a plant/drink. Soma, extracted by means of pressing stones and mixed with milk, is said to have an intoxicating and exhilarating effect that stimulated the ancestors (pitris) to ritual activity and confers immortality on gods and men. Like Indra, Varuna is also regularly referred to as king of the gods. However, whereas Indra represents the martial or royal dimension of kingship, Varuna is primarily connected with the moral sphere as the god who looks down upon people to see if they are acting out truth (satya), and are not actively engaging in deceit (druh). He is intimately connected with rita, the active moral-cosmic force of truth according to which the cosmos properly operates.

Although Vishnu is one of the most important deities in the Hindu tradition, in the Vedas he plays a minor role, primarily as Indra's charioteer and helper in his battle with Vritra. His independent act in the mythology of the Vedas is as the god who takes three wide steps with which he measures out triple world (trivikrama). In the Rig Veda, the universe is conceived as consisting of three levels—Earth, the middle space/atmosphere, and the heavens. In taking these three wide strides, Vishnu traces and encompasses the totality of the universe. His first stride covers the Earth, the second stride traces the middle region between the heavens and Earth, and his final step encompasses the heavens and everything beyond.

Like Vishnu, Rudra, who is called Shiva in post-Vedic texts, is also one of the major gods of the Hindu tradition whose role in Vedic mythology starts out small and slowly expands. Rudra, whose name is probably connected with the howling storm, is often depicted as an ambivalent deity. He is praised as a healer and remover of infirmity while simultaneously being asked not to harm the poet, his family, and cattle. Hymns to the Vedic gods generally consist of explicit praise of their great deeds followed by a request for the standard Vedic wishes: wealth in the form of cattle, long life/immortality, progeny (especially sons), and fame. However, hymns dedicated to Rudra do not follow this paradigm, and instead ask Rudra not to be angry and to direct the effect of his anger toward others. Poetic material dedicated to Rudra in later Vedic texts attempt to change the character of this god by attributing a number of epithets that highlight the benevolent side of his personality, including Shiva (“friendly one”), Maheshvara (“great lord”), and Shankara (“the maker of happiness”).

Compared to their importance in the later Hinduism, the few goddesses mentioned in the Rig Veda seem relatively unimportant and anthropomorphically underdeveloped in the mythology and religion of the Veda. There are very few hymns dedicated to goddesses. Goddesses primarily represent natural or abstract concepts, such as Ushas (dawn), Ratri (night), Vac (sacred speech), and Shraddha (confident intention in the efficacy of ritual; faith). The goddess who receives most hymns in the Rig Veda is Ushas, the dawn, whose appearance announces the coming of the Sun, a new day, and the possibility of life.

Unlike the majority of hymns of the Rig Veda, which are primarily dedicated to the gods and focus on praise of their deeds, the hymns in the 10th book focus on speculation about the source and nature of the universe. Rig Veda 10.129, the famous Nasadiya Hymn, sets out a series of questions about the source of the universe. “Neither existence nor non-existence was there at that time” (10.129.1). The hymn goes on to deconstruct the possibility of anyone knowing “that” which was at the beginning before the duality of being and non-being. It culminates with the denial that even the overseer of the cosmos might know “that.”

The well-known Purusha Hymn (10.90) provides an insight into the ritual ideology of the Vedas as well as a glimpse in the sociological dimension of Vedic religion. The universe is said to have arisen from the ritual dismemberment of purusha, a man of infinite size, who encompasses the universe on all sides. In the beginning, there was only purusha, who was so immense that only one-quarter of him constitutes all being. We are told that the gods, the Sadhyas, and the rishis offered a sacrifice with purusha as the oblation, and from that sacrifice the entire ordered universe came into being; his eye became the sun, his mind the moon, his breath the wind, from his head came the heavens, and from his feet the Earth. The Veda itself was one of the first products of this sacrifice. The four classes (varnas) of human beings came from different parts of his body: the Brahmins, the priestly class from his mouth, warriors (Kshatriyas) from his arms, the agriculturalists and merchants (Vaishyas) from his thighs, and the Shudras, the class that supports the other three, came from his feet. The importance of this hymn for understanding Vedic religion as well as the later Hindu tradition is enshrined in the last verse: “The gods sacrificed with the sacrifice to the sacrifice. These were the first rites. These powers reached heaven, where the ancient Sadhyas and the gods are located” (10.90.16). Not only is ritual the source of the universe and human society, but it is the means by which the gods attained heaven and immortality. The implication is that without access to ritual, immortality is not possible. Thus, the gods were themselves mortal before reaching heaven by means of ritual.

The central practice of the Vedic religion was sacrifice. The Vedas show a complex system of ritual practices carried out by priests on behalf of the sponsor of the sacrificer (yajamana) and his wife. Each Veda contains liturgical material that is necessary for these sacrifices, each performed by a priest that specializes in one particular Veda. Thus, at minimum, any sacrifice required a priest from each of the Vedas. Sacrifices were divided into two broad categories, sacred (shrouta) rituals and domestic (grihya) rituals. Shrouta rituals required three sacred fires: the householder’s domestic fire (garhapatyagni), the southern fire (dakshinagni), and the offering fire (ahavaniyagni). These sacred fires were lit by a man who was qualified to take on the responsibility of become a yajamana. First, he must be a member of one of the three upper social classes (varnas), who has undergone the traditional education in the Veda. Second, upon completion of his Vedic education and only after having married, could he opt to establish his sacred fires, which he was then obligated to maintain through regularly offering sacrifices for the rest of his life.

There are two general types of shrouta rituals, haviryajñas, which involved offerings of milk products into the sacred fires, and somayajñas, which involved the main offering of soma. Animal sacrifice, which was a normal part of the Vedic ritual system, is considered a haviryajña. Vedic sacrifices vary in complexity and duration. Sacrifices were carried out by priests employed by the yajamana, who were paid a sacrificial fee. Although the yajamana did not play an active role in the ritual performance, the Vedas expressly state that the benefits produced by the sacrifice are accrued by the sacrificer and his wife. Domestic rituals only require one sacred fire, usually the yajamana's home fire, which was established at the time of the marriage ceremony. Domestic rituals are performed to mark points in the life of an individual that must be ritually established, such as Vedic initiation (upanayana), marriage, and funerary rites.

It is in the exegesis of the sacrifice that the texts give further details about the religious concepts and themes central to the religion of the Veda. The performance of sacrifice had several aims. Certainly, the performance of a complex and expensive ritual like the Agnicayana, which lasted 12 days and required 17 priests, would produce for the sponsor of the sacrifice a great deal of social and political currency in terms of prestige. The texts also speak about the cosmic and soteriological dimensions of sacrificial activity.

The cosmic dimension of Vedic ritual may be understood in terms of the relationship between humans and the gods mediated by ritual. In ritual, human beings make offerings of food to the gods, which are trans-substantiated by the sacrificial fire into two components, aroma (medha) and life force (asu). The gods consume the aroma. In return, they give back rain, which makes life and the ritual cycle possible. The texts often say that human beings offer sacrifices because the gods have no food in heaven. Sacrifice also involves offerings to the departed ancestors (pitris) of the yajamana, who like the gods have no food in heaven, and must be kept alive, lest they should fall back to Earth. In return, the ancestors give back progeny to the sacrificer. The ritual exegetes also understand a third cycle of exchange in which human poets offer praise to the prototypical ancient poets (rishis), who in return provide renewed inspiration for the composition of new poetry.

Vedic exegetes also understood the sacrifice to have a soteriological function. As the hymns of the Rig Veda make clear, the poet hopes to live a long life (ayus), to the ideal age of 100. Upon death, the wish expressed in all Vedic texts is that one will be immortal in the place one's wishes are fulfilled. That place is called by different names: home, the highest heaven, and the place of the ancestors and Yama, the first mortal who found the way to the heavenly abode. Immortality is conceived as a permanent stay in that world, where one does not die, which is achieved through the accumulation of merit that results from the correct performance of sacrifices. It is by means of accumulated ritual merit that the yajamana constituted his new heavenly body. Eternal life in heaven, unencumbered by death, was conceived in terms of a body that was sustained by the continuing ritual activity of subsequent generations of the yajamana's descendants.

The belief in immortality as a permanent condition is found throughout the Vedic texts alongside competing ideas about the nature of the afterlife. The Brahmanas speak about the second death (punarmrtyu) and the ritual means to avoid it. Although the texts are not explicit about what the second death entails, the contexts in which this concept is discussed suggest that the second death was understood to take place in the heavens. Since the texts state that the way to avoid it is by the correct knowledge of ritual, the implication must be that the result of the second death must also lead to the situation in which rituals can be performed, which must be as a human being rather than a departed ancestor in heaven. By the time of the Upanishads, punarmrtyu has disappeared from the discussions about the afterlife and the new concept of rebirth (often popularly called reincarnation) has entered the soteriological vocabulary of Vedic thinkers.

The Upanishads, the last section of each Veda collection, were composed ca. 800–300 BCE. Like the Brahmanas and Aranyakas, the Upanishads continue the tradition of exegesis whose aim was to understand the meaning of sacrifice. They focus on the correct understanding of the hidden correspondences or identities (bandhu, upanishad) whose knowledge was necessary for the ritual to be efficacious. This method of exegesis of the Brahmanas aimed to establish the hidden identity between the elements of sacrifice and their cosmic counterparts. The Upanishads take this analysis one step further to elucidate the secret correspondences between the sphere of ritual (adhyayajna) and the macrocosm (adhidevata), and expand it to include the connection to the individual person (adhyatma). It is the search for the three-way identity between macrocosm, mesocosm, and microcosm that drives the speculative exegesis of the Upanishads.

The Upanishads introduce new perspectives on all questions regarding Vedic rituals. Upanishadic discussions about ritual take place in various contexts, including debates among priests, which occasionally include women debaters (Gargi), debates between kings and priests, and discussions between Vedic teachers and their students. Specific teachings are often attributed to various well-known teachers, especially Yajñavalkya, or a famous king, such as King Janaka. It is in the context of ritual discussions that the Upanishads address broader questions about the nature and origin of the universe, the nature of human beings, the body, death, and the afterlife, and introduce new doctrines such as rebirth, transmigration, karma, and moksha.

Whereas the picture in the older Vedic texts is of a permanent blissful afterlife, the Upanishads introduce the belief that immortality in the heavenly world is temporary and eventually leads to rebirth. Rebirth is described primarily in biological and ecological terms, in which after an unspecified period of time, the person falls back down to Earth as rain and eventually re-enters the ecological food chain. He eventually becomes the food consumed by a man, which eventually becomes his semen, and is reborn in the womb of his wife. The idea that immortality was limited only by the amount of one's accumulated ritual merit is taken to its logical conclusion: immortality achieved by ritual was not real. Immortality is only truly achieved by the knowledge of brahman, which leads to the world of the gods, which is said to be beyond samsara, the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth.

The triumph of rebirth ideology over the older notion of a permanent, blissful heavenly existence occurs at the same time as the concept of sacrificial action (karma) is being reconceived. The older concept of ritual action and its effect (immortality) was already being questioned in the conceptualization of punararmtyu, "the repeated death," which had to be prevented in order to attain an immortal heavenly existence. The effects of actions beyond ritual were also being questioned in the Brahmanas. The violent killing of animals, which was required in sacrifice, came to be understood to lead to an afterlife in which human beings became the sacrificial victims of the sacrificial animals that they killed in sacrifice. Anxiety about the afterlife and the effects of killing led to the conception of an inverted afterlife in which the sacrificer became the sacrificed. It is in this context that Yajñavalkya introduces a new understanding of karma that becomes central to Hinduism. All actions (karma), not simply ritual actions, have automatic, inescapable results that affect not only one's present situation but also one's next rebirth. Although the Upanishads do not present a systematic exposition of karma and rebirth, they introduce the new concepts that are elaborated into a consistent theory of retribution and rebirth in later Hindu narratives, as well as by schools of Indian philosophy.

In dealing with the search of the threefold secret identity that links macrocosm, mesocosm (the sphere of ritual), and microcosm, the Upanishads focus on two concepts as the secret correspondence par excellence, namely brahman and atman. In the Rig Veda, brahman means both formulation of truth and the power that is activated by that formulation. By the time of the Upanishads, it comes to represent not only the essential identity among all things, but the ultimate source of all seeming diversity. All things are ultimately reducible to that which is real, brahman. Brahman is both the top of the hierarchical chain of being and foundation of the chain. Yajñavalkya calls it the imperishable, which is beyond conceptualization and which makes the ritual efficacious. Brahman emerges as the hidden ritual identity that must be known and without which all sacrifices are unproductive. Thus, the Upanishads raise knowledge of the ultimate ritual identity, brahman, beyond ritual itself: it is knowledge of brahman that ultimately leads to the highest goal, moksha, release from the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth and complete freedom from conditionality.

In addressing the question of the secret ritual identity from the point of view of the individual person, the Upanishads systematically deconstruct the human person into the various vital powers (prana) of the body (breathing, thinking, seeing, hearing, and speaking) only to conclude that upon which all vital powers depended and with which they are identical is the self (atman). The atman is identical with the vital functions of the body, but is none of the individual vital functions, and as such is the ultimate source of the human person. The highest teachings of the Upanishads establish knowledge of the identity of brahman and atman as the efficacious, liberating knowledge that leads to freedom from rebirth, conditionality, and suffering. They distinguish ritual knowledge from knowledge of brahman and atman and attribute the latter to those who dwell in the wilderness and have renounced Vedic sacrificial activity through the internalization of ritual.

■ India, Hinduism in: Classical Period

The classical period (ca. 500 BCE–600 CE) of Indian Hinduism was marked by transition from the religion of the Veda to a form of Hinduism based on the worship of various new deities that displaced the great Vedic deities, sectarian affiliations with new forms and expression of worship, and new philosophical/theological systems.

The Upanishads, the youngest layer of Vedic texts, the Vedanta, not only introduce new ideas but, when read in their historical and social context, show internal developments and changes with Vedic religion or Vedism. The term “Vedism” is used by scholars to show both the continuities and discontinuities between the ancient religion of the Vedas and the classical Hinduism of the Puranas. The transition from the ritual-based traditional religion of the Veda to the classical Hinduism of worship of various new deities based on new sacred stories that displace the great Vedic deities (Indra, Varuna, Mitra), sectarian affiliations with new forms and expressions of worship (pūja, temple building, chanting of bhajans, pilgrimage), and new philosophical/theological systems that reach back to the Veda for their intellectual foundation can be seen in the religious text composed in the classical period—the great Indian epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and in the vast body of literature that expound dharma. These texts document how the sacrificial system of the Vedas, rather than being eliminated, was re-imagined under the overarching principle of dharma. At the same time that ritualism was transformed into an ideology that encompassed both ritual and moral behavior, the epics show the integration of new ideologies with the religious ideas that had become firmly established, such as atman, brahman, karma, moksha, rebirth, and samsara.

By the third century BCE, the Vedic concept of dharma had been expanded from its limited connection in the Veda as specific ordinances and sacrifices that supported and continually maintained the cosmic order (rita), the regulative principle of the natural and cosmic order. Dharma was reformulated as the all-encompassing cosmic ordering principle, whose scope extended beyond sacrificial and ritual activity but embraced all socio-cultural practices as being inseparable from the cosmic order. Dharma emerged as the central topic of religious discourse in the two great Indian epics, the Mahabharata and Ramayana, and in the four principal genres of literature on dharma—Dharma Sutras (ca. third to first centuries BCE), Dharma Shastras (ca. first to ninth centuries), the body of commentarial literature (beginning ca. ninth century), and later

A scene from a printed version of the Mahabharata, an epic collection of mythological tales based on Hindu spiritual beliefs. (Apurva Patel and Marketa George)

Nibandhas (beginning ca. 12th century), digests that collected and topically organized extracts from various sources on dharma. This body of literature, which expounds the complexities of dharma and its application, although religiously authoritative, is not considered shruti. Smriti texts are understood to have been produced by human agency and as such represent a genre of knowledge that includes Vedic teachings and practices of dharma that have been lost or forgotten.

The two great Indian epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, although technically not revealed texts are believed to have been divinely inspired and as such are considered as authorities only to relative lesser degree than the Veda. In the daily lives of Hindus, these two narratives play a far more important role than the Veda, which most people have neither learned nor studied. The encyclopedic nature of the epics, especially the Mahabharata, has gained them the status of “fifth Veda.” It is primarily through the narratives about the heroes and heroines and the many interspersed stories linked to the main story line from which, as children, Hindus learn about the nature of dharma—social and religious duty, morals and ethics.

The Ramayana (ca. 750–500 BCE) is the shorter of these two great narratives, consisting of approximately 50,000 verses and attributed to the sage Valmiki. As its name reflects, the main story is about the life and adventures of Rama, the young prince who is heir to the throne of King Dasharatha of Ayodhya. The night before Rama’s consecration as king, Rama, joined by this wife Sita and his brother Lakshmana, voluntarily goes into exile as a result of a royal promise his father, King Dasharatha, had made to his youngest wife, Kaikeyi. As a result of the machination of Rama's old nurse maid, Manthara, Kaikeyi became afraid that under Rama's rule her son Bharata would be mistreated. She demands fulfillment of the royal promise, which, as king, Dasharatha is unable to refuse. She insists that Rama be exiled for 14 years and that her son Bharata be consecrated as king. Bharata has no desire to rule and tells Rama that he will rule only in his stead until he returns from exile. Bound by his word, Dasharatha accedes and eventually dies of a broken heart, after having banished his beloved son. Knowing the dharma of a king and the importance of the king's word, Rama accepts his banishment. While in exile, the demon king Ravana becomes enamored by Sita and abducts her. This key event sets up the rest of the story; in order to return to Ayodhya and reclaim his rightful place as king, Rama must regain Sita. On the way to Lanka, the island home of Ravana, Rama and Lakshmana gather not only allies, including King Sugriva and his commander, Hanuman, but also obtain divine knowledge and weapons. After battling Ravana's armies and laying siege to Lanka, Rama eventually defeats Ravana in combat, regains Sita, and returns to Ayodhya to reclaim his rightful place as king. Upon their return, the people express serious misgivings about Sita's chastity and purity during her forcible stay in Lanka. In order to placate his subjects and consolidate his kingship, Rama asks Sita to undergo a test of fire, which she successfully completes, thus publicly establishing her chastity and purity. However, rumors of her potential misconduct while in Lanka return again and, as king, Rama is obliged to banish Sita, who unbeknownst to him is pregnant with twin sons. While in exile, Sita meets the sage Valmiki, who takes her to his forest hermitage (ashram) where eventually she gives birth to Kush and Lavana. Shortly thereafter, after Sita returns to Ayodhya for the completion of Rama's Ashvamedha (horse sacrifice), she implores her mother, the Earth, to take her back into herself.

At its core, the Ramayana expounds the complexity of dharma, especially as it applies to the connection of the well-being of the world and the fulfillment of the king's dharmic duties. The main characters of the narrative—Rama, Sita, Lakshman, Hanuman, Kausalya, Dasharatha—embody social and moral ideals in the Hindu tradition. Rama, the star of the epic, is depicted as the ideal male human being, whose very actions are continually praised as proper dharma, even in cases in which his actions may appear to be dubious (shooting Valin from behind, banishment of Sita, etc.). His decisions and actions encapsulate the dharma of a son, husband, brother, friend, warrior, and especially ruler/king. Together with Sita, he is part of the paradigmatic married couple. Sita is portrayed as the ideal, devoted wife who obeys and follows her husband through all perils and refuses to break her oath of marriage, even at the expense of her own life. At the same time, Sita is also depicted as a strong-willed and wise woman who is skilled in the subtleties of dharma, especially when she presents a nearly unimpeachable argument to her husband as to why it is her duty to follow him into exile, although Rama does not wish her to go. Hanuman, Rama's faithful friend, represents the ideal devotee, who is said to have Rama and Sita enshrined in his heart.

The power and significance of the Rama story has given birth to numerous versions of the retellings, each reflecting literary attempts to address problematic aspects of the characters and story as understood in changing religious, political, and economic contexts. Next to Valmiki's Ramayana, the most well-known re-telling includes Tulsida's (ca. 1570) Ramacarita in Hindi, Kampan's (ca. 1100) Iramavataram in Tamil, and Adhyatma Ramayana in Sanskrit, which is part of the Brahmananda Purana (ca. fourth century BCE to fifth century CE).

The Mahabharata (ca. 400 BCE–400 CE) attributed to the legendary author Vyasa, whose name means “the editor,” is the longest extant poem in the world, consisting of 100,000 stanzas in its critical edition. Like the Ramayana, it is a compendium of dharma. The text refers to itself as “the fifth Veda” and expounds its encyclopedic application with the declaration that whatever is not found in the Mahabharata is not to be found elsewhere. The main story line concerns the struggle for succession to the throne of the Kuru dynasty between two sets of cousins, the Pandavas and the Kauravas. While on a hunting trip, King Pandu is cursed by a gandharva, after having killed him and his lover while they were making love in the form of gazelles. The childless Pandu is cursed to die if he should ever enjoy the pleasure of love-making with his wives, Kunti and Maitri. Kunti reveals that she knows a sacred mantra that allows her to call upon any god to father a child while maintaining her virginity. Pandu asks Kunti to call on the gods Dharma, Vayu, and Indra, to father respectively, Yudhishtira, Bhima, and Arjuna. Using Kunti's mantra, Maitri calls upon the twin gods, the Ashvins, and gives birth to the twins Nakula and Sahadeva. The five princes are collectively known as the Pandavas. Meanwhile, with the help of his uncle, the sage Vyasa, Pandu's elder brother Dhritarashtra, who was born blind and thus was unable to become king, and his wife Gandhari obtained 100 children known as the Kauravas, the eldest being Duryodhana.

After Pandu's death, Dhritarashtra becomes king, with the explicit understanding that Yudhishtira would inherit the throne. However, as the main plot unfolds, the audience witnesses the repeated attempts of the Kauravas, led by Duryodhana, to usurp and even kill the Pandavas. The enmity of the Kauravas toward the Pandavas reaches its height during Yudhishtira's royal coronation ceremony. Part of the coronation ritual for the king involves a dice game in which the soon-to-be king plays and defeats his adversary. Duryodhana asks his uncle Shakuni, who is well known for his skills at playing dice, to play against Yudhishtira in his stead. As the match progresses, Yudhishtira loses every throw of the dice until he has lost all his possessions. He then wagers his brothers Nakula, Sahadeva, Arjuna, and Bhima and also loses them to Shakuni. After having wagered and lost himself, he wagers Draupadi, the Pandavas' common wife, who had been wedded to Arjuna, but who became their common wife as result of Arjuna honoring Kunti's command to share all things he may have obtained with his brothers. Draupadi is forced to appear in front of the participants, even though she is in seclusion associated with her menstrual period. Like Sita, Draupadi questions the dharmic status of being wagered by Yudhishtira after he had already lost himself. After much debate, King Dhritarashtra resolves the conflict by restoring all property to Yudhishtira. After the Pandavas had left the ceremony, Duryodhana challenges Yudhishtira to one last throw of the dice. The loser and his family would go into exile for 12 years followed by an additional year, which had to be spent incognito, and if they were discovered the entire cycle of 13 years would be repeated. Upon completion of the exile period, their rightful portion of the kingdom would be restored. Yudhishtira loses the dice game and together with his brothers and wife is forced into exile.

Upon their return from exile, Dhritarashtra, manipulated by Duryodhana, refuses to restore the Pandavas' kingdom. The great war of 18 days follows, in which subsequently all Kauravas and nearly all descendants of the Pandavas are annihilated. After restoring the world as the rightful king, son of dharma, Yudhishtira hands the kingdom to Parikshit, grandson of Arjuna and only surviving descendant of the Pandavas, and together with his brothers and their wife Draupadi depart toward Indra's heaven.

Perhaps the best known episode of the Mahabharata is the Bhagavad Gita, a text that has acquired a life of its own independent of its epic context because it encapsulates many of the central religious concepts of the Hindu tradition. It consists of a dialogue between Arjuna and Krishna, his charioteer, best friend, and the incarnation (avatara) of god about dharma, the nature of action (karma), and the transformation and the liberation of the self (atman) from the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth (samsara). In its epic context, the Bhagavad Gita addresses Arjuna's paralyzing despair at the thought of engaging in a dharmically justified battle, in which he will have to kill his kinsmen and thus destroy the family, which according to dharma must be protected. From Arjuna's perspective, he is caught in a no win situation: if he does not engage in battle, he is neglecting dharma as a warrior, and if he engages in battle, he must kill his kinsmen, which goes against family dharma. The 18 chapters of the Bhagavad Gita are Krishna's attempts to persuade Arjuna to engage his sacred duty as a warrior by contextualizing the actions (karma) that Arjuna must undertake within the larger religious context. Krishna expounds the nature of karma (actions and their consequences) in terms of not only duty but also in terms of Vedic sacrifice and the cosmic necessity to act. He simultaneously situates karma within the Upanishadic context of discriminating knowledge of the nature of the body, the self (atman) and brahman, and renunciation.

Krishna tells Arjuna that the self is eternal and indestructible. He advises Arjuna that the way to overcome his paralyzing despair is by engaging in action through disciplined devotion (bhakti), by performing all necessary acts as a sacrifice to Krishna. Throughout the often repetitive dialogue, Krishna integrates the moksha-perspective of the Upanishads, with its focus on knowledge and liberation, to the world-affirming orientation of dharma-based duties with its focus on society, family, and responsibility of daily life, which is the inherited perspective of the Vedic ritualists. The Bhagavad Gita presents its teachings in terms of three seemingly distinct paths (marga) or disciplines (yoga): the path of action (karma yoga), the path of discriminating knowledge (jñāna yoga), and the path of devotion (bhakti yoga). In addition, these paths are integrated with the growing importance in Vedic thought of devotion (bhakti) to a transcendent, personal deity as a way to transcend the effects of action (karma) and attain salvation (moksha).

Dharma became a topic of specialization among scholar-Brahmans and led to the production of a body of literature elaborating the content of dharma—such as religious duties according to social class (varna) and caste (jati), stages of life (ashrama), dietary rules, expiations for transgressions, and the duties of the king—in a more systematic manner. In the discourse of dharma, duty according to social class (varnadharma) is understood as an expression of the cosmic order in the human, social sphere. Society, as depicted in the Dharma sutras and Dharma shastras, is one that is hierarchically stratified and understood to be linked to the creation of the cosmos. The nature of human society is found in Rig Veda 10.90, the famous Purusha

Sukta, where the four classes of human beings—but also the cosmic elements, gods, animals, and plants—are understood to emerge from the various parts of the body of purusha, the cosmic person. The origin of each social class from a distinct part of the body of purusha establishes the hierarchic distinction of the members of the four classes. Brahmans, who originate first from the mouth, the highest part of the body of Purusha, are invested with brahman (power of poetic formulation) and are the keepers of the Veda, who as scholar-teachers preserve and transmit the eternal truth of dharma. The warriors (Kshatriya) are the protectors of the people and overseers of government, who by the exercise of military and political power establish the conditions in which dharma operates by virtue of being identical with the power and might derived from the arms of Purusha. Originating from the thighs of Purusha, the merchants and agriculturalists (Vaishyas) represent the power of creativity, fertility, and productivity that they carry out as agriculturalists, merchants, and artisans. Being identical with the lowest part of the body of Purusha—the dharmic duty of the Shudras—the fourth and lowest class is to serve and support the upper three varnas.

In addition to the hierarchy of varna, which is understood in the Veda to be part of the very fabric of the cosmos, the Dharma sutras and Dharma shastras expound dharma in terms of another important system of social hierarchy known as jati, or caste. Jatis cannot be historically found in the Vedic texts, but Manava Dharma Shastra (ca. first century BCE to second century BCE), the oldest Dharma Shastra, popularly known as Manu, attributes the origin of various jatis to intermarriage between various varnas. The term “jati,” literally meaning “birth,” is usually translated as caste, which reflects Portuguese 14th-century travelers’ understanding of the social hierarchy in India as being similar to the Portuguese and Spanish castas, meaning chaste, which referred to the system of social stratification along racial groups in Spanish colonies. The use of the English term “caste” with a racial tone is present from 1555 on. Hindus are born into a caste and remain a member of the group until death. As such caste groups are ascriptive in nature and endogamy tends to be a feature of caste, although hypergamous marriage is also quite normal. In part, caste reflects a traditional division of labor, especially along religious lines, such as barbers and potters. However, in the context of the modern society, all occupations are theoretically caste-free. Caste grouping are found everywhere in India, although ranking will vary from region to region. In both varna and caste systems, Brahmans are at the top of the hierarchy, while dalits, or untouchables, who perform the most polluting tasks, are excluded from the varna system.

The opposition between purity and pollution is an operative principle in the hierarchy of castes. Pollution is understood to be a quality of the body that is transferable, especially through bodily substance, which must be controlled and kept at bay in order to maintain one’s relative purity in relation to another group. Purity and pollution can be most vividly observed in the commensal interaction among different caste groups in which the relatively superior rank of groups is expressed in terms of the distribution and acceptance of food. By accepting food and the inherent pollution that is absorbed by the food, a group concedes its relatively inferior status. Superior status is established in relation to the caste groups that will accept one’s food, which implies one’s relative high status in relation to them.

In addition to varna, dharma is elaborated in terms of system of stages (ashrama) of an individual’s life, traditionally counted as student (Brahmacarin), householder (Grihastha), forest-dweller (Vanapratha), and renunciant. The system of ashramas as alternative ways of life for a twice-born man, a male of the upper three varnas, has its foundation in the Veda, where originally each ashrama was an independent, alternative life way. After completing his period of Vedic study under the tutelage of a qualified teacher, a man could enter any of the three subsequent ashramas or could optionally choose to remain a lifelong celibate student. The earliest formulation of the ashrama system as a theological construct in which the four ashramas are conceived in a sequential manner to be undertaken in succession over the course of a lifetime is found in Manu. In this model, each quarter of a man’s life is identified with each of the successive ashramas. It is the duty of a father to make arrangement for his son to study the Veda and rite of initiation (upanayana), at which time he goes to live in the home of his teacher.

During his period of study, the student remained celibate and undertook the daily recitation of the Veda, daily ritual oblations to the gods, rishis, and ancestors, daily rounds of begging for alms, and various ritual vows. Upon the completion of his Vedic education, the young man enters the second stage, the householder, which is marked by marriage, the establishment of the ritual fire, and performance of the five great sacrifices (mahayajñas)—the recitation of the Veda to Brahman, offerings of food and water to the ancestors, offerings in the sacred fire to the gods, hospitality rituals for human guests, and bali offerings of food to bhutas (semi-divine beings). According to Manu, when his skin has become wrinkled and his hair has turned gray, and when he has fulfilled his obligations as a householder, he may retire with his wife to the wilderness outside the village to continue his ritual obligations to the sacred fires. The forest-dweller continues to maintain the ritual fires, performs the five daily sacrifices, and in addition undertakes increasingly severe ascetic practices that include wearing wet clothes during winter, sitting around five fires in the summer, and eating only flowers, roots, and vegetables. Through his performance of dharma and engagement in new ascetic practices, he prepares for the attainment of moksha, while still connected to the social world.

The final ashrama, the renunciant stage, is referred to by various terms in smṛiti literature, including parivrajika (wanderer) and sannyasa (renouncer). Only after having fulfilled his three primordial debts to the gods, rishis, and ancestors, may he divest himself of the vestiges that connected him to dharma—hut, wife, food, and ritual fires. Giving up these, the renunciant is now beyond all social responsibilities, beyond dharma, and his only obligation is the pursuit of moksha. As a renunciant or wandering ascetic, he never settles in one place and subsists by begging for alms. According to Manu, the renunciant channels all his energy on controlling his body and mind through the practice of breath control and the restraint and eventual withdrawal of the senses. By achieving complete awareness of body and mind, the renunciant aims to realize the identity of the individual self (atman) and brahman and achieve liberation from samsara.

Sex and gender is implicit in the discourse on dharma. Like Shudras, women are made into a social

“other” by their exclusion from upanayana and the study of the Veda; as such they are not really dvijas, since they are not reborn in the Veda. Although it is clear from the earliest Vedic texts on that a sacrificer must be married in order to carry out any ritual duties, women do not have the qualifications to independently sponsor any shrouta ritual. This ambivalence is reflected in Manu’s well-known dictum that women must never be independent and must always be guarded by a man: her father guards her in childhood, her husband guards her in youth, and her son guards her in old age. These texts, which regard women as the source of all auspiciousness, express the concern for guarding a woman’s inherent power from misuse or abuse. Her highest duty is to serve her husband as lord, which will lead her to heaven. However, smṛiti literature, although agreeing on the generally subservient status of women, also present different points of view regarding women’s independence as it relates to women’s property.

■ India, Hinduism in: Medieval Period

From the third through the sixth centuries CE, most of India was united in the Gupta Empire, a regime marked by the supportive environment given to art, culture, and intellectual endeavors. With the disintegration of the empire through the sixth century, India was divided into a variety of smaller kingdoms. The subcontinent then faced a significant discontinuity with the invasions of the Muslims, especially in the 11th through the 13th centuries. With the establishment of the first Delhi Sultanate by the Mamluk dynasty (1206–1290), Muslim regimes would come to rule the largely Hindu population, especially in northern India. In 1526, the Sultanate would be succeeded by the Mughal Empire, which remained in place until the arrival of the British. The Mughal came to rule most of the Indian subcontinent by the early 18th century, but would be brought to an end in the mid-19th century.

The emergence of the Muslims to power would have significant consequences religiously, including the disappearance of Buddhism, the founding of Sikhism (and the later Sant mat movement), and in the 20th century, the opting out of independent India by many Muslims who would found the modern states of Pakistan and Bangladesh. Beginning in the 18th century, Hinduism's forward trajectory was greatly affected by India's being targeted by Christian missionary activity, the Christian missionary movement receiving significant support by the British colonial establishment in the 19th century.

The massive political, economic, and social changes in Hinduism in India through the medieval period (ca. 600–1600) are reflected in the complex body of narrative literature produced during this period, which contain law codes, prescriptions for worship and pilgrimage, cosmogonic narratives, and stories and genealogies about gods and kings. This highly heterogeneous body of smṛiti are known as Puranas, literally “ancient stories.” The Puranas' self-understanding and authority in the tradition is derived from the Veda, with the latter understood as shabdhapradhan (that whose chief concern is sound), while the Puranas are arthashabda (that whose chief concern is meaning). The authorship of the Puranas is attributed to the sage Vyasa.

As a genre, purana encompasses everything from the Veda to the epics, including old stories that were told but not collected in the Veda. Indeed, some Puranas claim that they were created earlier than the Vedas, while the Bhagavata Purana (ninth to 13th centuries) clearly states that the Brahma, the creator, spoke the Veda first and the Puranas followed. The Puranas usually list 18 great puranas (mahapuranas) and another list of 18 minor puranas (upapuranas). The mahapuranas include Agni, Bhagavata, Bhavishya, Brahma, Brahmanda, Brahmavaivarta, Garuda, Kurma, Linga, Matsya, Markandeya, Narada, Padma, Vishnu, Varaha, Vamana, Vayu, Shiva and Skanda. The heterogeneity of the material contained in these texts, some of which was collected during the Gupta period (ca. 320–500 CE), but which includes much older material, makes the dating of these texts nearly impossible. Although in some sense the Puranas are a type of catch-all, the narratives present a set of themes and concepts that are central to the understanding of the Hindu tradition, in particular, the narratives about the nature of the cosmos and the various devas of the Hindu tradition.

The various narratives about the gods and goddesses and their deeds are presented in the Puranas within an established cosmogonic and cosmological framework. The universe is conceived as uncreated, beginningless, and eternal, but undergoes periodic cycles of dissolution and re-constitution or secondary creation. The cosmic cycle of dissolution and re-creation underpins the texts' understanding of time as simultaneously cyclical and linear. One system of time in the Puranas is the yuga system. The cyclical cosmic process is understood to consist of four ages or yugas, each cycle's duration being progressively shorter than the previous one. The yugas are named for the throws of dice: Krita (1,728,000 human years), Dvapara (1,296,000), Treta (864,000), and Kali (432,000). A mahayuga—a cycle of four yugas—ends in cosmic dissolution (pralaya), which is followed by another mahayuga cycle. The cosmic process and time are also intimately connected to dharma. The progressive decline of the virtue of human beings and the well being of the world is a feature of each subsequent yuga. Thus, each yuga is understood in moral terms, with Krta Yuga representing the height of ideal time when dharma is universally upheld. The Kali Yuga, the present age of the world, is conceived as the lowest point of dharma, in which society is turned upside down, where Brahmans act like Shudras and Shudras attain kingship.

The cosmic framework of the Puranas is also conceived in terms of the activity of the three great deities, the trimurti, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. Brahma, the grandfather, creates the universe at the beginning of each yuga, which is then maintained by Vishnu's activity, and is destroyed at the end of the yuga by Shiva. The classic images depicting the cosmic process show Vishnu lying on the giant serpent Shesha, literally “the remnant,” floating on the cosmic ocean. From Vishnu's navel grows a lotus flower upon which Brahma sits, distinguished by his four faces and often holding the Vedas, the first product of creation. In the famous relief at the Durga Temple at Deogarh (ca. 425 CE), Shiva, mounted on his animal vehicle (vahana), the bull Nandi, is depicted next to Brahma.

In addition to the influence of Sanskrit-based tradition, Hinduism in the medieval period was shaped through the religious sentiments expressed in vernacular religious literatures from other parts of the subcontinent, especially from South India. The songs and poems especially of Tamil poet-saints—the Vaishnava Alvars, the Shaivite Nayanars, and the yoga-centered Siddhas—have influenced the flavor of devotionism (bhakti) in Hinduism. These bhakti poets not only composed stressing the centrality of god's grace for salvation, but also criticized the privileged position of orthodox Brahmans. This criticism often extended to both Brahmanic ritual practices as well as attacks on traditional social ideology of varnashramadharm.

The Puranas also contain the narratives that form the core of the religions of Vishnu (Vaishnavism), Shiva (Shaivism), and the Goddess (Shaktiism), as well as other prominent deities of the pan-India Hindu pantheon including Ganesha, Skanda, and Hanuman. As such, the Puranas reflect the crystallization of a long period in the rise in popularity of these gods and their respective cults.

The systematic development of Hindu thought can be traced to the metaphysical speculation of the Rig Veda, which asks about the source of the cosmos, as well as the systematic inquiry into the meaning of sacrifice found in the Brahmanas and Upanishads. Over several hundred years, darshanas, or “ways of seeing,” emerged out of the speculative context of the Vedic tradition through exegesis of various foundational texts. Darshanas are systems of metaphysical speculation that address many of the same questions that Western philosophy undertake, but they are also concerned with systematic understanding of the nature of the divine. Thus, each darshana represents the history of speculation that encompasses epistemology, metaphysics, ethics, social customs, aesthetics, psychology, cosmology, grammar, logic, and speculation about language, which include both the orthodox (astika) Hindu darshanas as well as the heterodox (nastika) system of Jainism, Buddhism, and the Lokayata (materialists). All schools of philosophical/theological thought in South Asia are primarily exegetical traditions that systematically develop through commentaries and sub-commentaries that elucidate the school’s founding text and subsequent explanations. The founding text is generally a sutra text, which is the first systematic presentation of key concepts usually found in the Veda. Sutras are short, pithy, terse formulations that attempt to express the essence of the system and generally are difficult to decipher without the additional explanations provided by commentaries. Historically, the various systems of Hindu thought started around the same time and developed in constant engagement and criticism of one another. This can be seen in the common technique of argumentation that all schools use to elaborate their arguments. At the outset of the argument, the opponent’s view (purvapaksha) is stated, followed by critical assessment of the opponent’s view (khandana), and after providing a digest of the objections to the purvapaksha by rival darshanas, the demonstrated conclusion (siddhanta) against the purvapaksha is presented.

There are five basic religious presuppositions that underpin Hindu darshanas: the reality of the self (atman), dharma, karma, liberation (moksha), and the means to achieve it (sadhana). Beyond these presuppositions, there is a common epistemological framework shared by all schools: the knowing subject (pramata), the object which is to be known (prameya), and the process of knowing (pramiti). There are six means of valid knowledge (pramana): perception (pratyaksha); inference (anumana); authoritative testimony (shabda); analogy (upamana); presumption (arthapatiti); and proof of non-existence (abhava). The means of valid knowledge accepted by any of the six orthodox schools of Hindu thought will depend on the types of knowledge that they recognize.

The term nyaya is derived from the Sanskrit verb meaning “to go” and the verbal prefix ni-, “back, into,” meaning that by which one is led back (to a conclusion). Thus, the focus of the Nyaya School is primarily epistemological: how do we know something based on a valid means of knowledge—perception, inference, and authoritative testimony. Like the Vaiseshika School, Nyaya’s ontological standpoint is one of pluralistic realism, which is grounded in its procedures for establishing correct inference. In Indian philosophical debates, there are two types of inference: svarthanuma (inference aimed at convincing oneself) and pararthanumana (inference aimed at convincing another). It is the latter type that plays a crucial role in a debate that aims at discerning the real nature of what is being investigated and imparting that truth to another party. The aim of debate is to establish the correct application of inference that is required to help the listener in redirecting the thought process in the proper manner. The standard Nyaya five-pronged proof is the method that all Hindu and non-Hindu schools of thought employ. Inferential proof requires: (1) premise; (2) cause or reason (hetu); (3) example; (4) application of the example; and (5) conclusion. Within this framework, there is a constant burden of establishing another particular example and application. The emphasis on particularity leads to an argument that moves from one particular case to another particular case through a generalized, universal statement. Nyaya arguments were concerned with the soundness of the argument based on its relevance to the lived experience. The founding text of the Nyaya School is the Nyaya Sutra of Gautama (ca. 400–100 BCE), which seems to have undergone several redactions, since in its present form it incorporates material from earlier manuals and an awareness of Buddhist philosophy of Emptiness (shunyata), as well as Nagarjuna's (ca. 150–250 CE) critique of pramana-theory.

Vaisheshika gets its name from the term visheshha, “particularity,” a characteristic that distinguishes one thing from all other things. The main concern of this school of thought is to categorize nature in terms of fundamental categories. The ontological perspective of the Vaisheshika School is essentially pluralistic and atomistic; there is a plurality of real existents that are eternally related but not identical. There are nine fundamental substances: five material substances (earth, water, fire, air, and ether/space) and four non-material substances (time, space/direction, self, and mind). All material objects are made up of atoms (paramanu). There are many distinct selves (atman), which are distinguished only by their relative and specific visheshas, but each atman is eternal and unbound, even to space and time. The self is the substance of the quality of consciousness, which as witness and knower to experience must be different from matter, consciousness, sensations, and mind. Liberation is achieved when atman attains a state of complete qualitylessness. Vaisheshika accepts only two valid means of knowledge: perception and inference. The Veda is a valid source of knowledge, which is understood to be based on perception, and ritual injunctions contained therein are equally valid because they are based on inference. The founding text of the tradition is the Vaisheshika Sutra of Kanada (ca. 500–300 BCE) and its earliest commentary is the Padarthadharmasamgraha (“The compendium of the nature of fundamental categories”) by Prashastapada (ca. 400 CE).

Samkhya is the oldest systematic school of thought in the Hindu tradition, whose key ideas are found in the Rig Veda and the Upanishads. The term samkhya, “enumeration,” informs us about the central focus of this school: the enumeration and classification for the purpose of discriminating between spirit (purusha) and primal matter (prakriti) in order to attain liberation (kaivalya). Samkhya is a radically dualistic school that distinguishes between two distinct ontologically real entities, purusha and prakriti, which are understood to be distinct and eternally entangled. Purusha is pure consciousness, unmediated and unlimited, whose presence is the effective cause of the evolutionary process that gives rise to budhi or mahat (mind) and subsequently to ahankara, literally the “I-maker” or ego-consciousness. Prakriti is non-conscious and ever-changing. In the presence of purusha, it transforms and evolves into a manifested state through a series of 25 categories of reality, which comprise the world of experience. Prakriti is understood to consist of three qualities (gunas)—sattva (luminosity and intelligence), rajas (energy and activity), and tamas (darkness and inertia). It is through the discrimination of these individual psycho-philosophical categories and cosmological categories from the eternally free and unbound purusha that liberation is attained. The non-discriminating identification of purusha with prakriti, as ahankara, is bondage, which can only be shattered through discriminating knowledge. The foundational text of the Samkhya School is the Samkhyakarika of Ishvarakarna (350–500 CE).

Yoga refers both to the practical method for unifying consciousness and to a systematic exposition of the basic principles presented within a framework that adopts the dualistic metaphysical system of Samkhya and frames liberation in terms of the fluctuations, modification, and modulations of the mind (citta) that interrupt pure consciousness. In the Yoga Sutra of Patanjali (third century BCE), the basic principles of yoga were first systematically presented. Citta is identical with Samkhya's manas, the first manifestation of prakriti, which is the cause of differentiation. The cessation of all change means that citta is merged back into prakriti, which is termination of the false connection and identity of purusha as seer and prakriti as the seen. The five fluctuations of the mind—valid knowledge, misconception, conceptualization, sleep, and memory—may be inhibited through the cultivation of detachment. In Yoga, citta encompasses Samkhya's buddhi, manas, and ahankara and is both the cause and means of escape from bondage. Citta is understood to arise from asmita (i-am-ness), the self-consciousness that experiences and as such its eradication is necessary for liberation. Yoga stresses the radical disconnect between the self that experiences and the true self (purusha), which is in every sense other than asmita but is the point where purusha and prakriti become entangled.

The school of Mimamsa or Purva Mimamsa (earlier investigation) is primarily a tradition of exegesis concerned with the understanding of Vedic ritual injunctions. For Jaimini (ca. 200 BCE), author of the Purva Mimamsa Sutra, the founding text of the school, Vedic injunctions reveal dharma, the proper order of the cosmos. The correct performance of sacrifices produces a transcendent unseen result (apurva), which leads to the particular result of sacrifice. Apurva is the metaphysical link between the ritual act and its result and is inherently connected to the verbal force of the ritual command (vidhi), rather than to the actor, the action, or the result. The particular goal of performing sacrifices is heaven (svarga) rather than moksha. For Mimamsikas, dharma is unknowable outside of Vedic injunctions, which states what is to be done and what is not to be done. The efficacy of the injunction is not located in the intention of an actor but resides in the imperative verbal form of the injunction, which is manifested as an attitude (bhavana) of the actor. Jaimini accepts authoritative testimony (shabda) as the only means of knowledge that is infallible in relation to the unseen effect (apurva). There are two branches of Purva Mimamsa named after their respective founders, Kumarila Bhatta (seventh century) and his contemporary, Prabhakara.

Perhaps the best known school of Hindu thought by Westerners is Vedanta, which has had significant influence on the various ritual and theological tradition, sampradayas, and late 19th-century Hindu movements that re-imagined and aimed to re-model society based on a purified form of Hinduism. Vedanta literally means the “end of the Veda” and refers in particular to the Upanishads, which stand as the last section of each Vedic collection. The school of Vedanta understands the Upanishads to contain the essential truth of the Veda. The foundational text of the school is the Vedanta Sutra or Brahma Sutra of Badarayana (ca. 400 BCE). Like Jaimini, Badarayana understood the Veda as the primary means of knowledge. However, unlike Jaimini, whose sutra opens with an inquiry into dharma (atho dharmajijñasa), Badarayana’s main focus is the nature of brahman as the essential human pursuit (athato brahmajijñasa). The two schools together focus on the two major themes in the Veda: dharma, the realm of sacrificial performance that leads the qualified sacrifice to the ultimate goal (heaven) and brahman, the object of ultimate transformative knowledge that leads to liberation (moksha) from the cycle of birth and rebirth (samsara), which is the primary concern of the qualified renouncer. In both cases, qualifications are determined by the orthopraxic tradition of the Veda, which takes into account the centrality of the study of the Veda. There are several sub-schools of Vedanta that are unified by the acceptance of the primacy of the Veda (especially the Upanishads), Badarayana’s sutras and the Bhagavad Gita, although there are some disagreements as to the number of authoritative Upanishads. The three most important traditions are Advaita (non-dualism) founded by Shankara (ca. 788–820), Dvaita (dualism) by Madhva (1199–1531), and Vishishtadvaita (qualified non-dualism) by Ramanuja (ca. 1027–1147).

The foundational text of the Advaita sub-school of Vedanta is the earliest surviving commentary of the Vedanta Sutra, Shankara’s Brahma Sutra Bhashya. Shankara takes an epistemological stance by which he critiques human knowledge as inherently faulty. All knowledge is distorted by superimposition (adhyasa), thus making it impossible for human beings to see things-in-themselves as identical with self’s pure subjectivity, which is identical with brahman, the absolute. Superimposition of the self on what is not self and of what is not self on the self is the inherent way in which consciousness operates. It is only through the removal of ignorance (avidya), which Shankara understands to be identical with illusion (maya), that the self can be revealed as the witnessing subject (rather than the knowing self), which is identical with brahman. Thus, for Shankara, the world is epistemologically indeterminate (anirvacaniya); it neither exists nor does not exist. Avidya is inherent to human nature, but not to the self. It is this ignorance that entangles the person in samsara, but the realization of the identity of self and brahman shatters the veil of ignorance and maya and leads to moksha. Shankara’s primary effort is to clarify the epistemic problem of superimposition, which can only be overcome through correct understanding and interpretation of Veda and the refutation of false views. Knowledge of the self can only be achieved through the Veda, which also includes the ritual portion of the text and devotion to a personal deity. Thus, Shankara's system of thought is necessarily orthodox and orthopraxic, as both ritual (dharma) and devotion are understood to be necessary for the attainment of knowledge that leads to the effacement of superimposition and ignorance.

In contrast to Shankara's interpretation of the absolutely non-dualistic interpretation, Madhva holds that scriptures maintain a complete distinction (bheda) and dualism (dvaitia) between the self and brahman as a personal deity. Whereas for Shankara, brahman is ultimately without qualities or attributes (nirguna), for Madhva as well as Ramanuja, the highest manifestation of brahman has attributes (saguna). The individual self (jiva) consist of spiritual self-consciousness, whose nature is pure consciousness. The self is a mirror image of brahman as god and such is dependent on brahman. Madhva establishes five categories of differences: between the Lord and self (jivatman), between infinite number of selves, between the Lord and matter (prakriti), between the self and matter, and between phenomena and matter. All things, which are distinguished by particularity (visheshha), depend on the Lord. Liberation is identical with the self's innate state of pure consciousness and bliss, which necessarily participates in the bliss of the Lord. Madhva rejects karma as duty and rejects bhakti in the sense of meditation (dhyana) as leading to liberation. Only the continuous inquiry into the Lord (brahmajijñasa), which is free from all preconceptions and the realization that all things in the world are non-enduring and without essence can affect liberation through total devotion to Vishnu. Continuous inquiry into the Lord is understood to be possible only through grace (prasada) of the Lord. Unlike Shankara and Ramanuja, Madhva's exegetical method extends beyond the Veda, the Vedanta Sutras and the Bhagavad Gita and includes puranic sources such as the Vishnu Purana and Bhagavata Purana.

Ramanuja's qualified non-dualism (vishishtadvaita) may be understood to stand somewhere between the extreme non-dualism of Shankara and absolute dualism of Madhva. Like Madhva, Ramanuja writes from a theistic perspective and argues that Shankara's absolute non-dualistic reading of the texts is against reason, against the common understanding of language, and against the texts themselves. Ramanuja rejects Shankara's epistemic position that there are two levels of truth, a higher truth of the brahman and a lower truth that only represents brahman as a personal deity. Ramanuja understand the texts to make the single claim that brahman is the essence of the universe and the individual self and is also a personal being. Ramanuja expounds a view of non-qualified dualism in which Brahman, the individual soul, and the world are understood as identical in essence but distinct manifestations of the same essence. Both the self and the world are completely dependent on brahman but are yet distinct from Brahman. Ramanuja develops the image of the world of sentient and insentient matter as the body of Brahman, which is real rather than ontologically and epistemologically indeterminate. Liberation from samsara consists of the complete apprehension of the glory and nature of brahman; it is not an experience of identity with Brahman who is eternal distinct from the individual soul. Ramanuja develops the notion of qualified dualism in his Sri Bhashya, a commentary on the Vedanta Sutras, as well as his commentary on the Bhagavad Gita.

■ India, Hinduism in: Modern Period

Hindu thought and practice in the modern world (1700–present) has been shaped by several historical factors, none more significant than the European encounter with India that was inaugurated by Vasco de Gama in 1498. As the power and influence of the Muslim Mughal rulers faded after the death of Aurangzeb (r. 1658–1707), the influence of French and British colonial power grew especially through the economic influence of the British East India Company (1600–1858) and the eventual takeover of all its rights and interests by the British Crown (1858–1947). British colonial authorities attempted to govern Hindus according to their traditions, values, and laws, as long as they did not challenge Western standards. These efforts led to the production of knowledge about the East, Hindus, and their traditions for the practical purpose of empire-building and the civilizing Christian mission that spread alongside British political and economic domination. At the same time, European style mass-education conducted in English and reform-minded Western intellectual traditions were introduced to the colonial territory.

The colonial enterprise of empire-building and the Orientalist project, which aimed to construct Hinduism as “other,” produced several responses from Hindus that re-conceived their native tradition by adopting Western intellectual traditions. Many of the English-educated Hindu reformers came to look upon many aspects of their tradition as corrupt and degraded, such as the caste system, image worship, and social practices like child-marriage and sati (widow-burning). In many ways, these reformist movements were attempting to wrest the discourse on Hinduism away from European Orientalists by redefining and sanitizing

Hinduism in terms of the Western Romantic notions of Eastern religions and Hinduism in particular.

One of the earliest Hindu reform movements was led by Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833), often called the father of modern India and the founder of the Brahmo Samaj. Educated at the Muslim University in Patna and having studied Sanskrit in Varanasi, Roy developed much of his understanding of Hinduism while employed by the East India Company. His studies and experiences led Roy to understand true Hinduism to be found in the Upanishads. The true god was transcendent, unchanging but knowable through reason and from the laws of nature. He rejected polytheism, image worship, rituals and sacrifices, and concepts such as karma and rebirth. Roy maintained that all religions were one and that Hinduism was a universal religion of tolerance. Hinduism was in need of being purged of superstitions that had no foundation on texts or reason. Members of the Brahmo Samaj met regularly in Calcutta to read and discuss the sacred texts, the Upanishads, to sing hymns, and to listen to sermons on the single principle that underlies true religion. Roy's vision of Hinduism as implemented in the Brahmo Samaj found a receptive audience, especially among lower-class Brahmans and the growing urban middle classes of merchants and traders.

Dayananda Saraswati's (1824–1883) movement for reform crystallized into the Arya Samaj, which like Roy's movement aimed at a return to a purer form of Hinduism. However, unlike Roy, Dayananda saw the core of Hinduism to be found in the Veda and called for a revival of sanatana dharma (eternal law), which included the elimination of superstitions such as image worship and pilgrimage to sacred places, and social reforms including support for widow remarriage and eradication of child marriage; all which he claimed had no foundation in the Veda. He viewed the Veda as eternal, true, and binding; all other texts were later accretions that diluted the truth of the Veda. The Arya Samaj spread its message of a return to Vedic culture through its network of schools, which stressed the teaching of Sanskrit, the ancient language of the Vedas, as well as Hindi. The Arya Samaj was successful in reconverting low-caste converts to Islam and Christianity. Dayananda and the Arya Samaj teachings advocated an aggressive form of Hindu nationalism based on the return to the Veda that continues to shape strands of Hindu national politics and cultural life.

Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886) and his chief disciple, Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902), were seminal figures in 19th-century Hindu reform and in the promotion of Hinduism as a world religion. Unlike Roy and Dayananda, their concern was the articulation of Hinduism's universality and the pluralistic acceptance of all religions as aspects of one truth, rather than a concern with purifying Hinduism of idolatrous aspects that were objectionable to Westerners. Raised as a rural Brahman with no formal education, Ramakrishna served as the priest of a Kali temple at Dakshinesvar, just north of Calcutta. He is said to have frequently experienced religious ecstasy (samadhi) as a result of devotional practices focused on Hindu deities, including Kali, Sita, Rama, and Krishna, as well as religious figures from other religions, including Muhammad and Jesus. He came to believe that a single transcendent Reality was the common core of all of the world's great religions. Ramakrishna interpreted his various experiences through the Advaita Vedanta view of different levels of religious truth, broadening this viewpoint to include the theistic and monistic stands of other religions. Ramakrishna became an object of devotion and influenced both uneducated villagers and middle-class intellectuals from Calcutta. By the time of his death in 1886, he was already widely regarded as a great saint.

Narendranath Datta, later known as Swami Vivekananda, is the most well known and influential follower of Ramakrishna. After becoming a disciple of Ramakrishna and eventually becoming a renunciant, Vivekananda became one of the authoritative voices that shaped the West's view and understanding of Hinduism. At the Parliament of World Religions of 1893, he successfully gave voice to Ramakrishna's vision of the unity of all religions while stressing the value of diversity. During a four-year lecture tour in the United States, Vivekananda founded the Vedanta Society. Upon his return to India in 1895, he founded the Ramakrishna Mission, the aim of which was the promotion of educational and medical relief programs.

It is impossible to detangle the efforts of Hindu reform leaders of the late 19th and early 20th centuries from the social and political context of the times. The vision of Hinduism preached by Roy, Saraswati, and Ramakrishna were not limited to the personal experiential and theological dimensions but were implicitly political and aimed at revitalizing society. Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948) perhaps stands as the reformer who most successfully integrated the language of religion and Hinduism into Indian nationalistic aspirations for independence from British imperialism. As a young man, he studied law at University College, London, where he was profoundly influenced by the Western intellectual ideals of democracy, equality, and individual autonomy. He also was influenced by the writings of Russian writer Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) on voluntary simplicity and of American philosopher Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862) on passive resistance to governmental injustice. After completing his education, Gandhi took a position with a firm in South Africa to fight to remedy the grievances of Indians in South Africa. While in South Africa, Gandhi implemented and perfected many of his political tactics in the struggle against racial discrimination and hatred of indentured workers from South Asia. His personal and professional experience defending the rights of indentured workers through the work of the Natal Indian Congress radically changed Gandhi's perspective on the nature of freedom under the rule of empire. After returning to India in 1915, Gandhi espoused the lifestyle and life ways of the average Indian, discarding the business suit in favor of the traditional Indian dhoti and adopting many of the traditional dietary habits of poor Indians.

Gandhi transformed the political debate in India by his appeal to religious language, primarily Hindu, to mobilize the masses in nonviolent efforts to protest and eventually drive out British power from India. Like Roy and Dayananda, Gandhi accessed the language of the Upanishads, the language of truth (satya) as the central pursuit of humanity. Like Roy and Vivekananda, Gandhi espoused the belief in the essential unity of all as a central political and social ideology of harmony and non-violence (ahimsa). For Gandhi, oneness and nonviolence are manifestations of truth. Gandhi's notion of grasping the truth (satyagraha) was both religious and political, aiming to create welfare for all through the individual practice of self-control over anger and violence, sexuality, and dedication to justice and truth. In making chastity a key political value, Gandhi rearticulated the important Vedic ideal of the brahmacharin, the celibate student of the Veda, in the service of a political outlook that would lead to the welfare of all.

Gandhi's vision of truth as a moral and ethical code also included a call to end the plight of untouchables, or dalits. Gandhi referred to untouchables, persons who were considered to be outside the traditional system of varnashradharma, as children of god (harijans). Like Roy, he saw the caste system and untouchability to have no foundation in tradition and to be a corrupting force on society, the eradication of which would transform it. Gandhi's vision of Hinduism was influenced by many of the central Hindu concepts found throughout the Vedas, Upanishads, and Hindu epics, especially the Bhagavad Gita, such as nonviolence, celibacy, and the renouncer ideal, as well as by Christian notions of pacifism. His notion of an ethical Hinduism pays little attention to Hindu practice and rituals, gods and goddesses, or sacred stories beyond the ascetic lifestyle and their ethical bearing on the aesthetic or sensual dimension of the Hindu tradition.

Like Gandhi, Sri Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) was educated in England and attempted to apply a synthesis of Hindu religious and Western democratic ideals in the fight for Indian independence. After being arrested for anti-government activity, Aurobindo is said to have experienced the state of samadhi while in prison. After his release, he left for Pondicherry, where in 1910 he founded the Sri Aurobindo Ashram, which continues to flourish today. Aurobindo translated his intense spiritual experiences, including that of brahman as the one all-pervading reality and the world of appearances being totally illusory, into a system of "integral yoga," which aimed both at the union with the divine but also at the transformation of the outer and inner self. According to Aurobindo, both individual and social life are in the process of evolving from the illusion of distinct individualism through various stages of consciousness, until a state of super-consciousness is reached in which it is realized that brahman is the only reality that pervades all. He published several theological studies in English that provide a synthesis of Hindu and evolutionary ideas, including his Essays on the Gita and The Life Divine.

Aurobindo's vision of Hinduism affirms the Vedic vision of worldly activity as the arena for individual and social transformation. The resulting synthesis of Hinduism with Western values has been widely influential in both the West and the East and has substantially influenced the development of transpersonal and humanistic psychology, as well as the New Age and Human Potential movements both in the United States and in Europe.

Contemporary Hinduism is not limited to these pioneering religious figures and their movements but co-exist alongside what one might call "traditional forms of Hinduism" both within and outside of theistic traditions, in temple rituals and festivals, in the renunciant orders of sannyasi and itinerant sadhus, in pilgrimages to holy sites, in music and art, in the various forms of Tantra and Yoga, and the observances that structure family life. A host of other contemporary Indian religious figures, such as A. C. Bhaktivedanta (1896–1977), founder of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON); Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (1918–2008); Swami Sivananda (1887–1963), founder of the Divine Life Society; and Meher Baba (1894–1969) have continued to articulate forms of revitalized Hinduism in both India and the West. Hinduism has also been marked by the emergence of a number of notable female charismatic saints around whom movements have gathered. The most notable may be Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982) and her contemporaries, such as Mira Richard (1878–1973), the Mother, Sri Aurobindo's companion. They created space for living female gurus, such as Mata Amritanandamayi (b. 1953) of the Ma Amritanandamayi Centres; Mother Meera (b. 1960), founder of the Mother Meera Society; Shri Mataji Nirmala Devi (b. 1923), founder of the Sahaja Yoga movement; Ma Yoga Shakti Saraswati (b. 1927), founder of the Yoga Shakti International Missions; and the collective female leadership of the Brahma Kumaris.

Living Hinduism in Practice Hinduism cannot be reduced to textual and intellectual tradition or to a set of concepts, which although important do not capture the complexity of the traditions. The history of concepts and ritual practices as seen in the various Hindu texts from the Veda to the Puranas as well as smriti and philosophical/theological traditions have always existed alongside a myriad of religious practices that have been equally important in shaping the religious life of Hindus. Ritual and sacrifice have been at the heart of Hinduism since the Veda and have been continually re-imagined, re-interpreted, and transformed for the last two and a half millennia. Indeed, it may be said that orthopraxy has been the unchanging feature of Hinduism, even as various lines of contradictory orthodox viewpoints have developed in the Hindu tradition.

It may be said that the spiritual core of Hinduism revolves around the human encounter and experience of the divine as mediated through ritual practice. The earliest such mediation was the Vedic sacrifice, personified as Agni, who as the priest of the gods was the link between the divine sphere and the human sphere. The centrality of the sacred, consecrated image of the deity (murti) both in the home and in the temple as an intersection between the two worlds comes to the fore in the ubiquitous Hindu ritual of worship, the puja. A puja consists of a series of ritual actions whose aim is to express devotion to the deity through a paradigm of hospitality. Hospitality is expressed through a series of offerings of food, water, flowers, incense, and cloth. During puja, especially in the home, the deity is asked to enter the icon, which is constructed by artisans according to traditional features described in the sacred stories of the deity. Only after the deity has been bid to enter the image (avahana) may the puja commence, since the image is now infused with the sacred. At the end of the ritual, the deity is dismissed (visarjana). However, images in temples are understood to be permanently consecrate and puja must be regularly offered by the temple priest (pujari), whose primary responsibility is to regularly perform puja for the deity, regardless of whether devotees are present or not. During the ritual, the consecrated image of the deity is bathed in various sacred substances, dressed in new clothes, and adorned with jewels and perfumes, including traditional marks with kumkum paste on the forehead or bridge of the nose (tilaka). The dressing and the offering of food to the deity is made behind a curtain in the temple. Upon being regally dressed, the deity reappears to the worshippers, who receive the sacred sight (darshan) of the deity. The act of seeing the deity and being seen by the deity is considered by most Hindus to be the central element of puja, many of whom will state that their visit to a temple is for the explicit purpose of “getting darshan.” Another element of puja is the offering of light, called arati. During arati, the pujari moves a five-wicked oil lamp or camphor flame in a circular pattern in front of the deity, while ringing bells and reciting hymns of praise. After offering of light, the lamp is passed among devotees, who take in the light and warmth of the god’s light by cupping their hands over the flame and then touching their faces and eyes, symbolically transferring the light into themselves. Finally, devotees also receive prasad, the grace of the deity in the form of the remnants of the food that had been offered to the deity, which becomes sanctified through contact with the deity. Puja is practiced by the majority of Hindus in home shrines, which are often located in a separate room or area that is ritually cleansed where murti of the deity are kept. In the home, puja is generally performed daily or weekly primarily by women of the family.

As a locale of puja, the Hindu temple (mandir) is conceived as the encapsulation of the universe, which is mapped out in the Vastu Purusha Mandala, the geometric blueprint of the temple. Like the Vedic ritual, the temple mandala systematically identifies the parts of the body of the cosmic man (purusha), who is the source of the ordered universe with the various parts of the temple. As such, the Hindu temple is conceived as identical with the cosmos itself. The mandir is considered the abode of the gods and as such it is the permanent residence of the deity. The architectural plan of the Hindu temple reflects a transition from profane space to the sacred space, the core of which is the womb chamber (garbhagriha), where the deity of the temple resides. As the devotee progressively moves toward the inner sanctum, the experience of transition is highlighted by the myriad of images carved in the exterior and interior walls of the temple. The temple functions as a connecting point, a crossing place, a tirtha to the divine and from the divine where the proximal separation between the two spheres is closest.

The immanence of the divine is also understood by Hindus to be accessible through the very land of India. The land becomes a tirtha, a sacred ford where the divine has crossed down to Earth and therefore created a spiritual bridge to the other side. Many of these sacred sites are intimately connected with the events in the lives of great religious figures and gods related in the sacred stories of the tradition. Braj, the sacred land of Krishna, which is located within the triangle formed by Delhi, Jaipur, and Agra, is a living museum of the places where Krishna engaged in his divine play (lila). To enter the circle of Braj and engage in play which imitates Krishna’s lila is to participate in the presence of Krishna. Similarly, Varanasi (aka Benares), the eternal city of Shiva, perhaps the best-known tirtha outside India, is the place where many Hindus hope to die. It is simultaneously the city of death, liberation, and eternal life because it is Shiva’s most beloved place on Earth, which he vowed to hold above the cycle of creation and destruction for all time. Pilgrimage (tirthayatra) to sacred rivers such as the Ganga, Yamuna, or Narmada or to the sacred places of the goddess (pitha) is an important part of the religious life of Hindus through which they experience the India of the religious imagination. According to the texts that glorify (mahatmyas) individual tirthas, the simple act of going to such places destroys sins and evil and may even lead to liberation.

The yearly religious calendar is punctuated by a number of festivals (utsava), many which are Pan-Indian and others that are local or regional in character. Festivals are often connected to the agricultural cycle, the harvest and sowing season, or celebrate events in the life of the gods, events in the sacred narratives, or astrologically significant events such as solstice, equinoxes, or eclipses. During festivals connected with specific temples and their residing deities, devotees come to have darshan of the temple murti, which is brought out of the temple and taken in a procession around the village or town. Pan-Indian festivals including Krishna's birthday (Krishna Janmashthami), Ganesha Caturthi, Diwali (festival of lights), and Holi are some of the most important festivals in the Hindu religious calendar.

Religious rituals have both a communal and a personal dimension and the intersection of these two dimensions is important in the Hindu tradition. Rituals known as samskaras, lifecycle rites or rites of passage, have been a central feature of Hindu identity and religiosity since the Vedic period. These rites mark the crucial moments in the life of an individual member of society, beginning at conception through the funerary rituals (shraddha). They ritually fashion the social, religious, and spiritual identity of the individual and simultaneously legitimize the social institutions that uphold traditional Hindu society. The Veda and the later smriti texts present samskaras primarily as they apply to male Brahmans and by extension to males of the upper three varnas (Brahmans, Kshatriyas, and Vaishyas) within the fourfold ashrama system. According to the traditional domestic ritual texts of each Vedic school, the numbers of samskaras varies from 12 to 18, while later texts such as Manava Dharma Shastra mention 13. Although all samskaras are considered essential, upanayana (rite of initiation), vivaha (marriage) and anyeshti, shraddha (funerary rites) continue to be considered among contemporary Hindus to be essential to Hindu identity.

The upanayana is the rite of initiation of a young boy who belongs to the upper three varnas into study of the Veda under the guidance of a qualified teacher (guru). During the period of studentship, the young student remains celibate, studies the Veda, serves his guru, and offers oblations. The ceremony is marked by the bestowal of the sacred thread, which is worn by the young man and distinguishes him as a twice born man (dvija), and reciting the sacred gayatri mantra. After the period of Vedic education (brahmacarin), the young man moves to the householder ashrama, which requires that he find a suitable bride. In contemporary Hindu society, the upanayana ceremony is still considered essential and has been generally included in the long sequence of events of marriage ceremony, often performed the day preceding the marriage. According to Manava Dharma Shastra, for women, marriage is equal to upanayana and the duty of serving her husband is identified with the study of the Veda. Although Sanskrit texts have not preserved a set of rites of passage for women that parallel those for men of the upper three varnas, several ethnographic studies have shown that alternative ritual traditions for women have been part of the religious landscape of India at various local levels, which give expression to women's voices and religious hopes outside the brahmanic orthopraxic framework.

The rites that come at the end of life (anyeshti)—funerary rites generally known as shraddha—focus on reintegration of the family, whose social intercourse with the larger community has been interrupted by the pollution associated with death, and on transition of the departed family member from this world to heaven. Traditionally, there have been various methods of disposing of the bodies of the dead, including cremation, inhumation, and burial, depending on social status, caste, and gender. Normally, cremation takes place immediately after death, at which time the body is prepared by being shaved (if male), anointed with sandalwood paste, and wrapped in cloth. According to the Vedic and smriti texts, the cremation fire of the deceased should be lit from his domestic ritual fire. The shraddha rites, which last for 12 days following cremation, include the preparation and offering of rice balls (pindas) to the deceased, which ritually constructs his new heavenly body. The rites continue for 10 days and conclude with the sapindakarana ceremony, in which the recently deceased ritually transitions from the liminal ghostly world (preta loka) to the world of the departed ancestors (pitṛ loka). The belief in the heavenly afterlife, which is found as early as the Rig Veda, co-exists side by side with the belief in karma, rebirth, reincarnation, and moksha.

There has always been a wide range of beliefs, ritual practices, and theological perspectives woven into the tapestry that is called Hinduism that historically have been inherently understood by their practitioners as a unity in diversity. As one can see from the earliest Hindu texts, the Vedas, it is diversity of points of view, of textual transmission, of ritual thought and practice, of deities, and of understandings about the nature and purpose of human beings that produce the ever meaningful matrix which we call Hinduism.

India in Western Religious Imagination

Orientalism comes in two flavors: negative and positive. Representations of India in Western sources from antiquity to the contemporary period range from disparaging stereotypes that focus on the caste system and the purported evils of “idolatry,” to depictions of India as a source of the most profound spiritual wisdom. Whereas older sources, beginning with Herodotus, generally present India as the negative “other,” the Romantic period in particular saw the beginnings of a wave of fascination with all things Indian, spreading among the learned classes in Europe and North America. In their attempts to depict the spiritual wisdom of India, individual authors could focus on very diverse ideas and customs: yoga, mysticism, philosophy, Tantra, reincarnation, and much else beside. Western audiences were inspired to adopt some of these religious elements, or to see parts of their own heritage as being originally of Asian origin. India, in short, became both a source of various religious ideas and a screen for the projection of many others.

Gradually, and especially from the turn of the 20th century, the fascination with India, which originally was a literary and philosophical phenomenon, became the point of departure for a more diverse variety of social formations. For large audiences, elements of Hinduism and Buddhism continue to be treated as mysteries to be sampled on the printed page. Smaller numbers of people participate in practices inspired by India, either on a more sporadic basis (for example, as customers paying to participate in yoga classes) or with much greater levels of commitment (for example, as converts to Indian-inspired new religious movements). A brief survey such as this can only attempt to present thumbnail sketches of a few prominent themes in a topic of vast dimensions.

The belief in reincarnation has deep historical roots in Western religious history. Although rejected by the church, classical sources mentioning reincarnation were well known in the Middle Ages and beyond and made it possible for the intrepid few (Guillaume Postel [1510–1581], Giordano Bruno [1548–1600], Franciscus Mercurius van Helmont [1614–1699], and others) in the early modern age to profess sympathy for reincarnationist claims. As references to reincarnation became more widespread in 18th- and especially 19th-century writings, India increasingly became a source of legitimacy as well as a source of inspiration for authors promoting this concept. Theosophy, the movement and religious milieu that since the late 19th century has become particularly associated with belief in the rebirth of the human soul in a new body, presented its sympathizers with a view of reincarnation that differed quite radically from most of the versions of this belief that were widespread in India. Classical Hindu traditions usually suggest that the sum of good and evil deeds accumulated over this as well as past lives can lead to a rebirth in one of many different shapes, for instance, as an animal. Rebirth is thus a hierarchical process, by which auspicious incarnations (as a high-caste human) may well be followed by rebirth as an animal. Theosophical conceptions of reincarnation, on the contrary, see rebirth as a didactic process by which experience is accumulated and spiritual progress can be made in life after life. Theosophically inspired versions of reincarnation belief are widespread in the contemporary West, whereas versions more reminiscent of classical Hinduism are generally restricted to specific new religious movements.

Yoga and meditation in the West are also essentially phenomena with roots in the mid- to late 19th century. The transfer of these practices from India to contemporary Europe and North America has, again, entailed significant changes. Whereas these religious practices were in India often reserved for religious elites, yoga and meditation is in modern Western countries usually accessible to all. Yogic practice is in Hindu traditions typically embedded in specific soteriological contexts, for example, in a conception of human life as one stage in a vast cycle of incarnations, where the accumulation of religious merit according to specific methods can aid in improving one’s prospects for a positive rebirth, or eventually for liberation from the cycles of rebirth. Western understandings of yoga and meditation are quite diverse and are influenced by prevalent secularized discourses on the benefits of yoga as a form of exercise or a way to maintain good health, by conceptions of meditation as a means of reducing stress, and by individual reflection on the place of yoga in one’s life.

Besides such rather secularized practices, Western audiences have also become acquainted with considerably more mystical strains of yoga and meditation. The existence of Tantrism may have been known to select Western audiences in the 18th century and became more widely spread via late 19th-century texts such as those by Arthur Avalon, pseudonym of Sir John Woodroffe (1865–1936). To judge from the titles published and the number of Western interpretations available, the most widely incorporated element of Tantric yoga is the understanding that the human body comprises an occult physiology, with invisible channels serving as conduits of vital force, prana, and particular nodes where this energy manifests in especially potent form, the chakras.

A widespread idea among Westerners who sympathize with religious ideas and practices of Indian origin is that these are supported by scientific evidence. It is commonly suggested that the stress-reducing effects of meditation can be investigated and corroborated by the latest scientific means and that the chakras have an objective existence and could potentially be registered and measured as objectively as the elements of more conventional physiology. Two particularly influential attempts to draw parallels between Indian religious philosophies and contemporary Western science can be mentioned here. Transcendental Meditation, a movement founded by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (1918–2008), is indebted to Vedantist forms of Hinduism, but insists on its secular and scientific nature to the extent that its spokespersons will typically deny having anything to do with religion. What from one perspective could be seen as a classical religious claim, namely, that intense spiritual practice (that is, particular forms of meditation) can lead to seemingly miraculous examples of mind dominating matter (levitation), is within the context of Transcendental Meditation seen as objective fact resting on scientific foundations. The other example concerns the writings of Fritjof Capra (b. 1939), known for his suggestion (in his bestselling book The Tao of Physics, published in 1975) that there are highly significant parallels between the metaphysical statements of Indian mystics and the worldview of contemporary particle physics and quantum mechanics.

As these examples illustrate, the influence of India manifests itself in very diverse and partly incommensurable ways in various widely divergent new religious movements, and in what has been characterized as the cultic milieu where one can believe and practice without belonging to any organization, and where religious “practice” can typically consist in the reading of books.

Indian Pentecostal Church of God

The Indian Pentecostal Church of God, also known as India Pentecostal Church of God (IPC), is the largest Pentecostal denomination in India. It now has 2,000 local congregations spread all over India, Australia, North America, and the Gulf countries and claims a membership of 700,000. Sixty of the congregations are in the United States among the Malayalam-speaking Asian Indians. In India, the majority of its members are in the states of Kerala, Andhra Pradesh, and Tamil Nadu, with the headquarters in the state of Kerala.

The Indian Pentecostal Church is one of the indigenous movements that emerged out of the revivals that took place in South India in the early part of the 20th century. There were three significant revivals in the state of Kerala in the years 1873, 1895, and 1908, accompanied by manifestations of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Unlike the first two revivals, the third one was sustained by the arrival in 1909 of George Berg, fresh from the Pentecostal revival that was then occurring at Azusa Street in Los Angeles. Berg was not associated with any of the Pentecostal denominations then in their initial formative stages. Thus he led in the formation of various Pentecostal house churches long before the arrival of missionaries representing the various different Pentecostal groups. These house churches organized themselves to come together to worship once a month and later adopted the name South India Church of God in 1924.

In 1926 the South India Church of God and the South India Full Gospel Church, led by Pastor Robert F. Cook, an American Pentecostal missionary, merged to form the Malankara Pentecostal Church of God. However, in 1930 the South India Pentecostal Church of God, which was led by Native peoples, came out of this union in order to assert their independence and autonomy. As the remaining denomination began to spread to different parts of India from the state of Kerala, in 1934 it assumed its present name, Indian Pentecostal Church of God.

The revivals that took place in Kerala affected churches that belonged to the Syrian Orthodox tradition, and a significant section of the IPC's membership is of a Syrian Orthodox background. Because of its origin, IPC, along with other Pentecostal churches of Syrian Orthodox background, developed an apologetic against Syrian Orthodox Church beliefs and practices in addition to classical Pentecostal doctrines. A somewhat unique aspect of the IPC, this particular part of their theology was insignificant outside the state of Kerala, since the Syrian Orthodox in India is limited to this state.

Otherwise, the IPC shares broadly the doctrinal basis of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) and the Assemblies of God, and thus fits into the classical Pentecostal tradition.

The most remarkable distinctive feature of the denomination is its polity, which is characterized by independence and autonomy. A General Council elected by the members of the various regions is the highest legislative body. However, the General Council does not exercise any administrative powers. The State Councils or Regional Councils are comprised of various ecclesiastical districts. Each of these districts or centers, as they are variously called, is presided over by a center pastor who is appointed by the State Presbytery. The control of the State Presbytery over the local congregation is minimal, limited to the appointment and transfer of pastors. Otherwise, the local congregations are autonomous, though a sense of corporate identity is maintained.

The IPC from its very beginning refused to be affiliated with any foreign mission organization at the cost of the independence and autonomy of the local congregations. This lack of foreign control and the freedom that ensued is considered to be the reason IPC has a better growth rate than other classical Pentecostal denominations in India.

■ Indonesia

The modern island nation of Indonesia is the fourth most populous country in the world with 240,000,000 people (behind China, India, and the United States). They reside on some 17,500 islands, of which 1,000 are permanently inhabited. The 736,000 square miles of land territory is surrounded by 4 times that amount of navigable waters. The total area of the country is analogous to that of the United States. Immediately to the north are Malaysia, Singapore, and the Philippines, with Australia to the south. The Equator slices through the center of Indonesia.

The larger islands include Sumatra, whose western shore line faces the Indian Ocean; Java; Bali; Sulawesi, Timor; the Moluccas; and the eastern half of the island of New Guinea, known as Irian Jaya. Indonesia also includes the southeastern half of the island of Borneo, known as Kalimantan.

The islands are geologically unstable, and life is frequently affected by earthquakes, volcanic activity, and tsunamis. A line of volcanoes stretches along the southwestern coast of Sumatra, the southern coast of Java, through Bali to Timor. Included in that line are some of the Earth's most active volcanoes, including the legendary Krakatoa, located in the Sunda Strait between Java and Sumatra, whose famous eruption in 1883 created global effects. Indonesia has the largest number of historically active volcanoes (76), and has suffered the highest numbers of eruptions producing fatalities and the related destructive effects such as earthquakes, tsunamis, and pyroclastic flows. Banda Aceh, a city at the northern tip of Sumatra, was hit in 2004 by the devastating Sumatra-Andaman earthquake and tsunami, which took its place as one of the five largest earthquakes in recorded history. More than 100,000 Indonesians died.

Human habitation of Indonesia was quite early. Java was the site of one of the first finds of the bones of Homo erectus, a direct ancestor of modern man, the remains of which are popularly known as Java Man. It is assumed that during the last glacial cycle, land bridges connected what is now Indonesia with the rest of Asia and that humans moved into these warmer areas as the Earth's temperature cooled. When the glaciers melted, these land bridges were submerged and contact with the lands to the north was cut. Sumatra is currently separated from the Asian mainland (Malaysia) by a relatively narrow strait.

The Indonesian population is divided into hundreds of ethnic groups, the majority of whom speak one of the Malay or Austronesian languages. Most Indonesians trace their heritage to the southern part of China. The early inhabitants of the many islands followed a variety of indigenous ethnoreligions, though there were some commonalities such as a belief that all objects had their own life force, with some people such as the religious functionaries and the tribal leaders having relatively more of this life force. They also believed in life after death and most venerated their ancestors. The religious life was based in a variety of functionaries, including shamans and healers, with tribal leaders sharing religious and secular duties in complex ways.

By the beginning of the Common Era, Indonesians were trading with neighbors as far away as India and China. Growth of trade with India led to the influx of Hinduism and then of Buddhism. Hinduism came to dominate the coastal regions of Sumatra, Java, and Borneo. While knowledge remains sketchy, various kingdoms are known to have existed, as evidenced by the stone buildings they left and the accounts in Chinese records left by ambassadors who visited them. In the fourth century, the Taruma Kingdom emerged in western Java, and a century later, Srivijaya, a Malay kingdom, was established on Sumatra. The Chinese Buddhist monk Fa Xian visited Java at the end of 412 CE and noted that both Hinduism and indigenous religions were widespread. Christianity had a miniscule beginning on Sumatra in the seventh century.

In the seventh century, an Indian-based kingdom, Sailendra, began its emergence as the main power in central Java and for several centuries was a dominant force. The rulers were followers of Vajrayana Buddhism, which they promoted throughout their regime. About 770, the Sailendra King Vishnu (or Dharmatunga) began building Borobudur, the massive Buddhist stupa located not far from present-day Yogyakarta. The largest Buddhist monument in the world, it took a generation to complete, the task being finished by King Samaratunga around 825.

Samaratunga's reign also constituted the zenith of his dynasty's power. His successor Balaputra lost his throne to a rival, Patapan, of the Sanjaya dynasty. The Sanjaya dynasty had emerged on Java in the eighth century and had existed beside the Sailendra. In taking control of central Java it pushed the Sailendra regime eastward to Bali and replaced Buddhism as the dominant religion with Hinduism on Java. Thus Borobudur was largely abandoned. Around 910 CE, Sanjaya King Daksa succeeded to the throne and began the erection of the Hindu temple complex at Prambanan. When completed it included three major temples, one to Shiva, one to Vishnu and Brahma, and one to the mythical animals upon which they rode—Shiva's bull Nandi, Brahma's sacred swan Hamsa, and Vishnu's eagle Garuda. Over the centuries, the Garuda emerged as a symbol of Indonesia and now also appears on the planes of the airline Garuda Indonesia. By the end of the 10th century, the Sanjaya Empire covered Java, had conquered Bali and parts of Kalimantan, and threatened the Srivijaya kingdom of Sumatra.

At the end of the 10th century (911–1007 CE), a new, powerful kingdom of Singasari emerged in East Java. Its king, Dharmawangsa, a Hindu, saw to the translation of both the Mahabharata epic and the Bhagavad Gita into Javanese. After he was killed in an attack upon his capital, a new kingdom would arise led by Airlangga (d.1049), who subsequently made peace with the Srivijaya on Sumatra and then extended his rule over all Java and Bali. He is known for his tolerant policies toward both Hindus and Buddhists, and after many years of rule, retired to live his last years as an ascetic. One of Airlangga's descendants, King Jayabaya of Kediri (1135–1157), is remembered for his prophetic vision for the land. He saw the loss of self-rule in Indonesia and predicted that it would subsequently be ruled by a white race and then a yellow race. Today, many see the years of Dutch and Japanese rule to be a fulfillment of his prediction.

The year 1292 was an eventful one in Indonesian history as the Chinese emperor Kublai Khan (1215–1294) directed an attempted invasion of Java. About that same time, a rebellion in the court of the king of Sumatra led to the king's death and to his son-in-law

Wijaya founding a new court at Majapahit. When the Mongol forces arrived, he made an alliance with them and established his rule on the island. He then turned on the Mongols and drove them back home. The kingdom he founded would soon become the most powerful kingdom in the history of Indonesia. Under King Hayam Wuruk, not only were the islands of the present national state brought under its uniting rule, but territory was added from what today are Vietnam, Cambodia, and the Philippines. The kingdom was not as stable as it might appear, as much of its territory continued to be ruled by local princes who paid tribute. These local rulers would eventually become the source of the Majapahit kingdom's subversion.

The Coming of Islam Islam began to spread to Indonesia in the 13th century, brought by visiting merchants from Gujarat (India) and Persia (Iran), and even as the Majapahit kingdom was developing, in 1297, Sultan Malek Saleh (d. 1297) became the first ruler in Indonesia to convert. As Islam continued slowly to spread, especially in the coastal towns in Sumatra and Java, formerly Hindu rulers accepted the new faith. Crucial in the process was the conversion of Raden Patah, a prince of the royal family that ruled Majapahit, who in 1478 established an Islamic sultanate at Demak in central Java in 1478. Malek Saleh was reputedly taught by Sunan Ampel (1401–1481), one of the Islamic mystics/holy men known as the Wali Sanga. Sunan Ampel also seems to have inspired the original construction of the large mosque that still exists in the center of Demak.

The men who later came to be called the Wali Sanga had been coming to Java since the beginning of the 15th century. They are given the bulk of the credit for the spread of Islam and have thus come to have a hallowed place in the tradition, while their tombs have become places of pilgrimage. Traditionally, the number of Wali Sanga is set at nine, though putting together the diverse lists of the individuals indicates that there were more.

Where Islam was established, it was passed on from generation to generation by local teaching complexes called pesantrens. These pesantrens included the home of a resident Muslim scholar who knew theology, classical legal interpretations, and some devotional knowledge derived from Sufism; a mosque; and some residential facilities for the more dedicated students.

The Demak Sultanate spread both westward and eastward in Java and early in the 16th century had become the dominant power on the island. In 1527, Demak conquered what was left of the Hindu Majapahit kingdom. From that point, the sultans of Demak presented themselves as the successors to the former Majapahit state. Through the rest of the century, both Islam and the state of Demak spread through what is now Indonesia, though the spread of one was not necessarily contingent on the other.

As the Demak Sultanate emerged, the Portuguese widened their exploration of the coastal lands around the Indian Ocean to Malaysia and Indonesia. In 1511, they took Melaka on the northern coast of Malaysia and forced the sultan to flee. Within two years, the last remnant of the Majapahit state was destroyed, and the Portuguese founded the town of Sunda Kelapa, which would later become the modern city of Jakarta. (In 1527, Demak took control of Sunda Kelapa and renamed it Jayakarta.) As the Portuguese expanded their territory, many Muslims chose to move. The arrival of significant numbers of Muslims in northern Sumatra led to the development of Aceh as a Muslim state. By 1515, the Portuguese stretched their exploration eastward to the island of Timor.

Even as sultans of Demak and of Aceh and the Portuguese sought allies on the other Indonesian islands, in 1521 the Spanish made their first appearance in the area as the remnant of Ferdinand Magellan's (1480–1521) crew sailed south from the Philippines (where Magellan had been killed) through Indonesia to Timor on what became the first round-the-world voyage. Magellan, a Portuguese, sailed with a Spanish crew. The Spanish returned in force before the decade was out. Unable to take Melaka, they took control of the Philippines.

The spread of the Portuguese opened opportunity for the arrival of Christianity in Indonesia. Pioneering that work was the Jesuit priest Francis Xavier (1506–1552), who arrived in Melaka in 1545 and spent the first half of the next year opening work in the Moluccas—most notably Ambon, Ternate, and More. As the Roman Catholic mission spread, Dominicans arrived to support the evangelistic work. Now popularly referred to as the Spice Islands, the Moluccas became the most valued prize among the competing European powers for the various agricultural products, like nutmeg and cloves, which grew in great quantities.

In 1579 another new player in the game arrived, the British, in the person of Sir Francis Drake (1540–1596), who having harassed the Spanish in the Americas, sailed across the Pacific to land at Ternate, recently wrested from Portuguese control by the local residents. Sultan Babullah, who opposed both the Spanish and the Portuguese, welcomed Drake and offered his friendship to England. Drake's activity would have significant consequences for Indonesia. He exposed to the whole of Europe that the Spanish were active in the Far East in spite of the fact that the pope had assigned the Portuguese hegemony in the region (as he had assigned hegemony in the Americas to the Spanish). In a bind, the Spanish King Philip II solved his problem by invading Portugal, assuming the Portuguese crown for himself, and taking control of its colonies. The gain was short lived, however, as eight years later, in 1588, the Spanish were crushed when its fabled Armada was destroyed by the British.

The Dutch Era With the defeat of the Armada, Indonesia was opened to still another European power, the Dutch. At about the same time that Spain moved to take over Portugal, it lost the Netherlands when its citizenry revolted. England supported the Dutch, and all hope of regaining control of its lost territory was destroyed along with the Armada.

The Dutch almost immediately took advantage of their new status. They sent an initial expedition designed to test the feasibility of opening trade, which arrived in the Indonesian islands in 1596. The voyage had limited success but set the stage for a much larger effort several years later. The Dutch founded the Dutch East India Company with the goal of taking charge of the trade in spices from the islands. Almost simultaneously, the Dutch Reformed Church began recruiting missionaries to spread Protestant Christianity wherever the Company established its hegemony. Their gaining hegemony in the Indies would not go entirely uncontested, as the Portuguese fought to hold on to their territory and the British chartered their East India Company and opened their first trading center at Banda on the north tip of Sumatra.

Neither the Dutch nor British traders were enthusiastic about religion and did little to support the Protestant missionaries, with the exception of the Dutch suppressing the Roman Catholic Church in the areas under its control. The first Protestant (Dutch) church was formed at Ambon, in the Moluccas, in 1615. By the end of the 1620s, the Dutch were in firm control of the spice-rich Moluccas.

Both the British and the Dutch established forts adjacent to Jayakarta. In 1619, the city became a battleground, changing hands several times before being burned to the ground. The Dutch emerged in control and from their fort began building a new city, which they named Batavia. The head of the Dutch East India Company, Jan Pieterszoon Coen (1587–1629), attempted to turn the Company into a political entity and made the first steps toward turning the island into a Dutch colony.

The Dutch East Indies Company was primarily interested in trade and profit and controlled the region economically. Numerous small Indonesian kingdoms rose, existed for longer and shorter periods, and fell. Rather than attempt to replacing local rulers with Dutch administrators, the Company tended to be satisfied with keeping a stranglehold on trade and moving against any open revolts.

To assist their control of the islands, the Company invited many Chinese to take up residence in the islands. The Chinese had been there for centuries, operating way stations for trade between China and India and the Middle East. The Dutch encouraged further settlement of the Chinese and used them as go-betweens with the local populations that produced the products the Dutch so valued. The arriving Chinese brought Chinese indigenous religion to the island as well as introducing Chinese Buddhism. Two temples now located in Jakarta date to the 1660s. At the same time, many of the leading Chinese who had been able to ingratiate themselves with local rulers converted to Islam.

Through the 18th century, the growth of Protestantism was slow, but it slowly emerged in those areas controlled by the Dutch East India Company. A New Testament appeared in 1668 and the complete Bible in 1733, but many congregations were without regular pastoral care. Also, due to the difficulties of transportation and communication, no regional synods emerged. By default, the church council in Batavia provided overall leadership. Indonesians served as preachers and teachers but were not admitted to ordination and could not serve the sacraments. By the time that the Company went bankrupt in 1799, there were some 50,000 Christians throughout the islands.

The failure of the Company and the assumption of direct control of the islands had significant implications for the Christian community. A new colony, the Dutch East Indies, emerged as a political entity. The government professed to be religiously neutral and made no direct efforts to suppress Islam or the remnants of Hinduism (especially on Bali) and Buddhism. It did reverse the Company's policy relative to Roman Catholicism, and priest-missionaries began to arrive in force. It organized all the Protestant work into the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies and tied it to the state church in Holland. As a part of the officially neutral state church, it developed no further missions. That peculiar policy opened the door for a spectrum of new missionary agencies, both those based in Holland and others based in various European and North American countries. The first missionaries to arrive were sent to tend the small communities of Christians beyond the care of the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies. Then as the number of missionaries multiplied, numerous entirely new missions were opened, especially among the people groups that still followed one of the indigenous religions.

Various Reformed and Lutheran missionary agencies (such as the Basel and Rhenish Missions), especially some influenced by the European Pietist movement, took the lead in evangelizing the Indies through the 19th century, but by the end of the century they were joined by Baptists, the Salvation Army, and the Seventh-day Adventists. Additional churches arrived through the 20th century, including the Christian and Missionary Alliance and the Jehovah's Witnesses.

The newer missionaries tended to focus their effort locally, in the language of the people among whom they worked. While some Christian activity produced sizable churches, language, ethnic divisions, and the difficulty of traveling between the islands became barriers to the development of national organizations. Thus, a number of Protestant denominations developed, a few developing into memberships in the hundreds of thousands, including the Batak Christian Protestant Church, the Christian Churches of Java, the Evangelical Church of Indonesia, the Evangelical Christian Church of Irian Jaya, the Indonesia Protestant Christian Church, the Karo Batak Protestant Church, the Pentecostal Church of Indonesia, and the Toraja Christian Church.

As of 2009, 27 Protestant churches were members of the World Council of Churches. The World Evangelical Alliance is also active in Indonesia through The Fellowship of Indonesia Evangelical Churches and Institutions. As of 2008, Christianity made up approximately 13 percent of the population, of which 7 million are Roman Catholics, 14 million Protestants, and 7 million post-Protestant and evangelical Christians.

Modern Indonesia In the middle of the 20th century, the Dutch East Indies went through a significant trauma. Dutch control was ended by the invasion and occupation of the islands by the Japanese. After the war and the Japanese, before the Dutch could reassert control, suppressed independence efforts from before the war were invigorated. Immediately after the war, indigenous forces rose up and asserted the establishment of the new state of Indonesia, and appointed Sukarno (b. Kusno Sosrodihardjo, 1901–1970) as the first president. The Dutch instituted hostilities to try to regain their hegemony but admitted defeat in 1949.

The new Republic of Indonesia was founded on a rather unique set of principles termed the Panca Sila, through which the government recognizes the role of religion in the life of the nation and the daily life of the citizenry. Religion is also seen as a factor in maintaining the unity of the nation. The five principles in the Panca Sila include belief in God, humanity, national unity, consultative democracy, and social justice. Indonesia thinks of itself as a democracy in which a variety of religions and beliefs are recognized. It considers itself a religious state, meaning it is neither an Islamic nor a secular state, but a country with a religious foundation.

Since independence, Indonesia has experienced a variety of upheavals as attempts to unify the multi-ethnic, multi-linguistic, and multi-religious country have been met with various separatist movements. The 1945 Constitution rejected the extremes of Western individualism and Marxist Communism, choosing instead to emphasize the Panca Sila and institutionalize a strong presidency. In 1959, President Sukarno, who had acquired additional powers year by year, attempted to respond to the various tensions in the country by disbanding the Constituent Assembly, whose members had been unable to operate effectively due to allegiances to the various ethnic, linguistic, and regional constituencies they represented. He also invited the Communists into the political community and reverted to the unrevised Constitution of 1945. In 1963, Sukarno was named president for life.

In 1965, with Sukarno ill from kidney disease, a coup attempt led to the death of six senior army generals (the army having been strong supporters). A surviving General Suharto (1921–2008) became the new president. He continued to emphasize the importance of the Panca Sila ideal. At the same time he moved to create a more uniform Indonesia and build a strong autocratic centralized government, while using the army to assist his rule.

Among those who suffered the most from his policies were the Chinese. Wishing to integrate them more completely into mainstream Indonesian society, in 1967 he instituted a set of policies that led to the closing of the Chinese-language publishing centers and Chinese schools, and a ban on the public display of Chinese script. All non-Islamic Chinese religious expressions were confined to households. Individual Chinese citizens were “encouraged” to take an Indonesian name. These policies remained in effect until the end of Suharto’s presidency (1998).

His Timor policy proved one of the most visible failures of the Suharto years. The eastern half of the island came out of World War II as a surviving remnant of the former Portuguese presence in region. The western part of the island had been part of the Dutch East Indies and was incorporated into independent Indonesia in 1949. The two parts of the island were divided ethnically and religiously (with East Timor predominantly Roman Catholic). Following the withdrawal of the Portuguese in 1975, Indonesian forces invaded East Timor and attempted to integrate it into the country. Resistance was encountered on all levels. In 1996, two men, one being Roman Catholic Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for their efforts to end the conflict. In 1999 a public referendum rejected Indonesian rule and shortly thereafter the Indonesian occupying force withdrew. East Timor attained full independence in 2002 as the new nation of Timor Leste.

Meanwhile, Islam remains the dominant religion of Indonesia, and today it is the most populous Muslim country in the world. More than 80 percent of the citizenry consider themselves Muslims, most of the Shafiite School of Islam. At the same time, Indonesia recognizes five major world religions: Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, Catholicism, and Protestantism. As in China, Indonesia views Catholicism and Protestantism as separate religions, though their relationship as two branches of Christianity is also understood. Chinese indigenous religions are generally grouped together under Buddhism. A variety of local religious traditions have come to be officially classified as forms of Hinduism. Hinduism has special status on Bali, where the great majority of residents follow the faith.

One sign of its religious foundation is the large national mosque that was erected soon after independence. Today, the Istiqlal Mosque (Independence Mosque), located in the center of Jakarta, is the largest mosque in Southeast Asia whether measured in terms of the number of worshippers it can accommodate, the size of the building, or the land it covers.

The Indonesian Muslim community includes a number of Sufi groups, Sufism having a long and honored presence on the islands that goes back to the Wali Sango. Sufism permeated Indonesian Islam and accounts for much of the country’s relatively irenic religious atmosphere. Today there are numerous Sufi communities in Indonesia including local representatives of the Chistiniyya, Naqshbandriyya, Qadiriyya, Shadhiliyya, and the Tijaniyya Sufi orders. By the early 20th century, Sufism was largely viewed as being on the wane, its primary visible adherents being elderly men residing in the smaller villages. In the 19th century, it had been challenged by Wahhabism and the Islamic modernist movement. Though from the opposite ends of the Islamic spectrum, the two movements agreed on stripping Islam of a variety of older folk elements to which Sufis seemed the most attached. Through the 20th century, however, Sufi spirituality enjoyed a marked revival in urban areas and now has found the allegiance of the young and old of both sexes.

On one edge of Indonesian Sufism are a variety of Islamic-influenced spiritual movements such as Subud, Sapta Dharma, and Sumarah that also exist as part of the larger religious world of Indonesia. Generally known as Kebatinan or Kejawen, these groups represent a modern spirituality that draws on indigenous beliefs and practices, especially those of Java, as well as elements from Hinduism and Buddhism. Since independence, neo-Confucianism has also asserted itself as a religious community.

To deal with this multi-religious community, the Indonesian government established a Department of Religion in 1946. The Department of Religion subsequently grew into one of the largest government departments, among its other duties being the promotion of religious harmony and the management of conflicts that might arise among the varied religious communities, and cooperation with other countries in the field of higher education (including scholarly exchange programs). The department also regulates marriage and divorce among Muslims and facilitates Indonesian participation in the Islamic pilgrimages (the hajj).

Indonesia, Buddhism in

When Indonesia became independent in 1950, almost nothing from the Buddhist cultures that had thrived in

A Buddhist temple in Sumatra, Indonesia. (Corel)

Sumatra, Java, Bali, and East-Kalimantan between approximately the fourth and the 16th centuries CE had survived the Islamization of the archipelago. Today, only some stone inscriptions; Buddhist statues and seals; remnants of ancient temples, such as the eighth-century Central Javanese Borobudur; ancient Chinese reports; and a few survivals in some of the local traditions bear witness to the expansion of different Buddhist schools throughout the western part of maritime Southeast Asia.

The first more comprehensive historical account of Buddhist influence in the archipelago was written by I-Ching, a Chinese Buddhist pilgrim who, in 671, embarked on a journey from Canton to India. In order to await favorable monsoon winds, he stopped over in Palembang, the center of an emerging Buddhist empire in Sumatra called Srivijaya. I Ching recommended the local religious schools to Chinese students of Buddhism, after he himself had studied Sanskrit grammar in Srivijaya for six months. In 672, he departed to India, returning to Srivijaya on his way back to China. I-Ching observed that Mahayana had only recently been introduced to Sumatra, whereas the Mulasarvastivadanikaya—the Theravada canon in Sanskrit—had been followed for a long time. This tallies with the finds of Amaravati-style Buddha statues in Sumatra, West-Kalimantan, and Java, pointing to the dissemination of early Buddhist schools, often classified as Theravada, since the second century. In the late seventh century, however, Mahayana schools of Buddhism began to acquire ideological dominance over the regional courts. Renowned Mahayana teachers from India traveled to Srivijaya, among them Vajrabodhi, the first teacher of the Yogacara school and abbot of Nalanda, as well as Atisa, the reformer of Buddhism in Tibet. The former visited Sumatra in 741, and the latter studied for 12 years (1011–1023) under the local high priest, Dharmakirti.

Between 750 and 850, a Mahayana Buddhist dynasty also reigned in Central Java: the Sailendra, who erected the famous terraced temple-monument Borobudur. Their influence ended inexplicably in the mid-ninth century, while an older dynasty attached to the worship of Siva re-emerged to rule the island. Nevertheless, Buddhism continued to coexist with Hinduism, both gradually blending into a distinctly Old Javanese creed called Siva-Buddha religion. The last regime to follow it, the East Javanese Empire of Majapahit, was eventually conquered by Muslim forces around 1530. By then, North India, the Malay Peninsula, and Sumatra had already undergone a thorough Islamization process, which had severed large-scale communication between Java and the Buddhist countries of South and Southeast Asia. Majapahitan culture survived in Bali, though, transforming into a distinctly Balinese blend of Buddhism, Saivism, and ancestor worship.

Buddhism was reintroduced to Indonesia in a totally different form in the first decades of the 20th century. It was, in fact, the increasingly popular Theosophical Society that sparked growing interest in Buddhism among Dutch colonials, Chinese immigrants, and Native noblemen. Offering the Dutch a more rational version of Asian spirituality, Chinese immigrants a way of reinvigorating their Chineseness, and subjugated Javanese as well as Balinese noblemen a medium through which to reconnect to their glorious ancient past, Buddhism was disseminated in a Theravada and a Chinese Mahayana guise. In 1934, the Sri Lankan monk Narada Mahathera visited Java, planting a Bodhi tree at the recently restored Borobudur. It was actually a seedling from a Bodhi tree in Sri Lanka, which had itself been grown from a seed of the original Bodhi tree in Bodh Gaya. The latter had been brought to Sri Lanka in the late 19th century by the Theosophist Ir. Meertens. Narada Mahathera's gift thus reflected one of the trajectories of Buddhist revival in modern Indonesia. As Theravada followers forged closer contacts with Buddhist monasteries in Sri Lanka, Burma, and Thailand, Chinese Mahayana priests were invited to some of the Indonesian-Chinese Buddhist communities. Still, there were no clear-cut boundaries between the two groups.

In 1953, an Indonesian-born Chinese, Tee Boan-An, a former Theosophist and student of the Chinese Mahayana priest Chen Ping Lau He Sang, departed to Burma, where he was ordained as the first Theravada monk from Indonesia in 1954. Under his new name, Ashin Jinarakkhita, he returned to Indonesia the same year. In 1955, he formed the first Buddhist lay association, Persaudaraan Upasaka Upasika Indonesia (PUUI), in independent Indonesia, which he integrated two years later into the Indonesian Buddhist Association (Perhimpunan Buddhis Indonesia, Perbudi), comprising both the Theravada and Mahayana priesthood and their following. In order to acquire official recognition of Buddhism from the Indonesian Ministry of Religion, Jinarakkhita had from early on tried to adapt Indonesian Buddhism (Buddhayana) to universal monotheism (Ketuhanan Yang Maha Esa) as professed in the Indonesian Constitution. By equating the primordial Buddha (Adi-Buddha) with God, however, he eventually provoked the split-up of the national Buddhist community. There were those who could not endorse even the faintest allusion to theism, and there were others who increasingly rejected the spiritual guidance of Buddhists specially approved of by the Indonesian government. This has applied in particular to the strict followers of Theravada as well as to Nichiren Shosho International, which became popular in Indonesia in the 1970s. Members of the Chinese-Indonesian community, on the other hand, preferred a kind of folk Buddhism that also incorporated Daoist and Confucian tenets and customs (Tridharma).

In the last generation, the True Buddha School, a Chinese Vajrayana Buddhist group that originated in Taiwan, has built an impressive presence across Indonesia. In the process, the leaders discovered many Vajrayana Buddhists already present in central rural Java who trace their religion to the days of the building of Borobudur. Recognizing their beliefs as being reproduced by the true Buddha School, many have affiliated, and in return their leaders have been given special status in the school.

After the fall of the Sukarno government in May 1998, religious liberalization encouraged a part of the Chinese-Indonesian community to drop out of Tridharma Buddhism and to fight for the recognition of neo-Confucianism as a religion. This recognition was granted by former president Abdurrahman Wahid in 2000. Today, Indonesia's 2 to 3 percent Buddhists are a heterogeneous minority supporting monotheistic Buddhayaana, Theravada, various Mahayana traditions (Chinese, Tibetan, Japanese, reinvented Javanese), Tridharma, and Nichiren.

Indonesia, Confucianism in Chinese travelers were journeying in maritime Southeast Asia as early as the beginning of the Christian era. They acquired a dominant position as interlocal traders and merchants in the populous areas of the western part of what is now Indonesia, before the arrival of the Dutch at the end of the 16th century. The Dutch East India Company, formed in 1602, succeeded in ousting the Chinese from their dominant position in Southeast Asian commerce. By creating an apartheid society, consisting of "Europeans," "Natives," and "alien Orientals," the Dutch also obstructed the blending of Chinese immigrants with the indigenous peoples. Furthermore, from 1900 on, colonial policy began to expressly favor the interests of the Natives to the detriment of the Chinese, who were pictured as amoral and unscrupulous exploiters impeding the progress of the Native race.

The Chinese community reacted by revitalizing its Chinese identity. In 1900 the Chinese Association (Tiong Hoa Hwee Koan [THHK]) was established in Batavia, with branches founded in all major cities of the Dutch East Indies. The THHK set out to promote Confucianism as the spiritual power of all Chinese, taking up efforts similar to those of the leader of the Confucian reform movement in China, K'ang Yu-wei (1858–1927), who had been trying to establish neo-Confucianism as a national religion in the motherland. Countering the increasing inability of Chinese people in Indonesia to understand guo-yu (the national language, or Mandarin), the THHK established more than 250 Chinese schools where students received lessons in both Confucianism and Mandarin, alongside a modern education. Already in 1906, the first Confucian shrine, Boen Bio, was built in Surabaya, in north-east Java. In 1918 the Confucian Religion Council was founded in Surakarta, central Java, and in 1923 a congress was held at nearby Yogyakarta, during which the Center for the Confucian Religion Assembly (Khong Kaw Tjong Hwee) was established. The first book on Confucianism in the Malay language, Bahasa Melayu Betawi, had already been published in 1897. By 1936 a translation of four Confucian texts (the Ta Hsueh [Great Learning], Chung Yung [Doctrine of the Mean], Lun Yu [Analects], and Mencius) had followed. In addition, several weeklies in the Malay language were published to effectively promote Confucianism.

During the Indonesian struggle for independence, the Indonesian Chinese asserted their anti-colonial attitude. In 1946 Sukarno (1901–1970), the leader of the Indonesian independence movement, granted Confucianism the status of "religion" (Agama Khonghucu). Ruling as Indonesia's first president from 1945 on, Sukarno reconfirmed his decision in 1961. He thereby supported the claims of the Khong Kaw Tjong Hwee Indonesia—as it was now called—that the Confucian concept of heaven (thian) is equivalent to Christian and Muslim monotheism, that Confucius was a prophet, and that the Confucian ethic is "religious law" to be observed by all Confucianists. Consequently, the Su Si, a compilation of the above-mentioned four classical texts, was instituted as a "holy book," and Confucius's birthday (August 27) and the day of his death (February 18) were made official holidays for his followers.

Affirming the necessity to assimilate, the Khong Kaw Tjong Hwee Indonesia dropped its Chinese name in 1964 and took the Indonesian designation Gabungan Perhimpunan Agama Khonghucu Seluruh Indonesia (Federation of Associations of the Confucian Religion in the whole of Indonesia). At the same time, the Youth Association of the Confucian Religion (Gabungan Pemuda Agama Khonghucu) was established, paralleling the youth organizations of all the other recognized religious communities in Indonesia.

When General Suharto (b. 1921–2008) emerged as the most powerful man in Indonesia after quelling an abortive coup in 1965 and eventually deposing Sukarno as president, he was at first also prepared to accept Confucianism as an officially recognized religion. Pursuing a rigorous purge of atheism and Communism, his regime made religious affiliation obligatory for every citizen. Hence, Confucianism needed to adapt to the rigid standards of the Ministry of Religion to counter the increasingly voiced accusation that it was nothing but an alien philosophy of ethics and not a universal religion.

In 1967 the Supreme Council for Confucian Religion in Indonesia (Majelis Tinggi Agama Khonghucu Indonesia [MATAKIN]) was established. Regional branches were also formed, the so-called Councils for Confucian Religion in Indonesia (Majelis Khonghucu Indonesia [MAKIN]). More than one hundred places of worship (lithang) were built. Following the model of the Christian churches, a Confucian clergy was formed that includes haksu (high priests), bunsu (Confucian teachers), and kausing (missionaries). Alongside the youth organization, a Women's Association (Wanita Agama Khonghucu Indonesia) was founded. Confucian rites were celebrated with deep religiosity. Chinese New Year (Imlek) has become the best-known festivity of the Confucian yearly cycle. There are also monthly services, Sunday services, funerals, and weddings, at which altar boys and girls assist the officiating priest and a choir sings Confucian hymns.

Yet, all these measures could not abate the growing doubts about the religious status of Confucianism. In 1969, one year after his official appointment as president, Suharto interdicted all public manifestations of Chinese culture, demanding "full assimilation." Consequently, Confucian weddings were not acknowledged anymore. Children resulting from such unions were denied birth certificates and thus normal civic rights. Confucianism and Mandarin could no longer be taught at public schools. From 1977 on, Confucianists were forced to have their children educated in one of the recognized religions. Nevertheless, private practice of Confucianism was not forbidden, and the MATAKIN was still allowed to exist under the supervision of the Directorate General for the Guidance of the Hindu and Buddhist Communities (Direktorat Jenderal Bimbingan Masyarakat Agama Hindu dan Budha). Nonetheless, many ethnic Chinese chose to convert to Buddhism and even to Christianity and Islam, while secretly continuing to perform Confucian rites, including Imlek.

As a result, official Confucian membership numbers became obscure. In 1974 the MATAKIN counted 3 million followers, while the official census registered only 99,920 people (0.8 percent of the total Indonesian population). In order to counter anti-Chinese policies, the Indonesian Chinese Eternal Cultural Foundation (Yayasan Lestari Kebudayaan Tionghoa Indonesia) was formed. One of its major goals was to achieve the official recognition of Confucianism as a religion and of Imlek as a national holiday. Although this effort gained significant support from representatives of other denominations, anti-Chinese sentiments continued to smolder among the Muslim majority, impeding official recognition of Agama Khonghucu. In the wake of the Asian economic crisis and the ensuing demise of the Suharto regime, Indonesian Chinese were blamed for the destitute Indonesian economy and suffered severe pogroms. Their situation improved notably when Abdurrahman Wahid (b. 1940) was elected president in October 1999. Wahid instantly lifted the ban on the public celebration of Chinese festivities, making Imlek an optional state holiday and eventually recognizing Agama Khonghucu as one of the religions adhered to by the Indonesian people. This helped to restore a sense of pride and recognition among the Indonesian Chinese, who today are estimated at 16 to 17 million people (7 to 8 percent of the total Indonesian population). Confucianists are numbered at around one million people.

However, the performance of the classical Confucian rites has become a thing of the past, since most of them require the participation of large, extended families. Most of the Indonesian Chinese today have small, nuclear families consisting of four to five people. Moreover, modernization has led people to concentrate more on the future than on their filial duty toward their ancestors. Just like Christmas in the West, Imlek has become, above all, a good opportunity for social gatherings as well as commercial pursuit.

Indonesia, Hinduism in

During the period when Bali was coming under Dutch control between 1846 and 1908, the island was recognized as the last Hindu enclave by European Orientalists and soon became famous as such in the international jet set. The Balinese on their part, however, had not hitherto considered themselves as Hindus. Instead, the elite of traditional Balinese caste society, that is, the satria and wesia kings (raja) as well as the brahmana priests (pedanda), had seen themselves as descendants of the last Hindu-Javanese kingdom of Majapahit, which had fallen to Muslim forces around 1530. The Majapahitan culture and religion itself had been a blending of elements of different Buddhist schools, Vaishnavism, Saivism, and autochthonous traditions involving ancestor worship.

Ancient Indian culture had influenced the western part of the archipelago since approximately the second century CE. Among the earliest archaeological finds pointing to the dissemination of various strands of classical Hinduism in West Kalimantan as well as West and East Java from at least the fifth century on were the names of kings inscribed in stone, along with statues of Siva, Vishnu, and Brahma as well as those of their respective vehicles and family. The construction of the various Shaivite temples (candi) in Central Java from the late eighth century on culminated in the famous Candi Prambanan that was built in the mid-ninth century. Here, we also encounter the earliest proof of the dissemination of the Ramayana in the archipelago: a detailed relief recounting the story of Rama and Sita according to the Valmiki version. From the 10th century until the fall of Majapahit, a rich literature in the Old Javanese language developed in East Java, recreating both the Ramayana and Mahabharata in the local vernacular as well as addressing topics of other Indian works in an idiosyncratic manner. The Indian epics had a great impact on aesthetic development at the Hindu-Javanese courts, whereas the study of the Indian philosophical systems, Mimamsa, Samkhya, and Yoga, as well as the texts and practices of the Saiva Siddhanta, were the domain of the Shaivite priesthood. At the royal rituals, geared to reaffirm and reinforce the sacrality of local kings and their realms, the latter practiced side by side with Vaishnava and Buddhist clerics.

The practice of deifying dead local rulers continued to thrive in Bali, the heir of Hindu-Javanese culture after the downfall of Majapahit at the beginning of the 16th century. The three upper castes (triwangsa), tracing their descent back to noblemen and priests from Majapahit, actually sponsored a plethora of local rituals that revolved around commemorating their Javanese ancestors (bhatara). The Sudra majority were obliged to join in the veneration of the progenitors of their patrons and rulers. These rituals—in fact, all traditional rituals—were ultimately designed to re-establish or maintain the correspondence between the visible world (sakala) and the universal principles of the cosmic order that had emanated from Siva and were believed to be hidden in the invisible world (nis-kala). Successful performance of the rituals (yadnya) would activate the life-giving aspects (kerta) of the transcendent yet immanent cosmic principles, and important agents in this process were the ancestors of the noble families.

Although the various categories of Balinese priests practiced yoga and meditation (semadi), the majority of Balinese were thus immersed in a ritual system that largely consisted of details resembling other so-called animistic traditions in the archipelago. As soon as Bali was integrated into the Dutch East Indies, both Christian and Muslim missionaries were referring to this majority when claiming that the Balinese were not really Hindu but rather “animistic heathens” strongly in need of “religion.” At the same time, the socio-political innovations introduced by the Dutch colonial administration began to threaten traditional beliefs and lifestyles. In order to protect their religion against destructive outside influence, while also proposing to abolish customs that were not in accordance with the new times, several religious reform organizations were formed between 1917 and 1942 (the beginning of the Japanese occupation). Influenced by European Orientalists, who confirmed the link between Balinese culture and ancient Indian religion, as well as the Theosophical Society, who considered the Hindu-Javanese and Balinese nobility as descendants of the “Aryan race,” these reform organizations looked to India for orientation. The more progressive ones embraced key issues of Indian reformed Hinduism, as seen in such groups as the Brahma Samaj, professed by Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), who visited both Java and Bali in 1927. The more conservative ones, however, had stronger leanings toward (Balinese) orthodoxy and endorsed the (local) caste system.

After World War II and the ensuing independence of the unitary Indonesian nation-state, the Balinese experienced unexpected discrimination against their religion on the part of the Muslim-dominated Indonesian Ministry of Religion. In order to comply with the Indonesian Constitution, which made belief in universal monotheism mandatory for every citizen, and to avoid forced conversion to either Islam or Christianity, the Balinese again resorted to Indian reformed Hinduism to reformulate the tenets of their belief. In 1961, the monotheistic Hindu Dharma was officially recognized by the Indonesian government. When adherence to a recognized religion became a matter of survival during the purge of Communism in late 1965, members of other ethnic groups in Java, South Sulawesi, North Sumatra, and Central Kalimantan with no inclination to convert to Islam or Christianity began to embrace Hinduism as an umbrella under which to continue their various local traditions. Although it is true that Indonesian Hinduism has been lenient toward the practice of local customs, the increasing influence of more discriminate Indian sects and movements, especially since the beginning of the 1990s, has widened the rift between the various factions within the Indonesian Hindu community. Today, the approximately 6 million Indonesian Hindus (2.9 percent of the total population) are not only divided along ethnic lines, but also on the basis of different attitudes toward issues such as vegetarianism, hegemony of priests trained in Indian philosophy rather than local concepts and practices, ritualism rather than greater emphasis on spiritual practices like prayer and meditation, and caste privileges.

When Hindu rule on Java was replaced by Muslim rule, the royal temple complex Prambanan was abandoned and later lost to the jungle and then to the memory. It was rediscovered in the 18th century, though refurbishment waited until the 20th century. In the last generation it has become both a major tourist site in the country and a renewed focus for the Hindu community.

Indonesian Christian Church

The Indonesian Christian Church (Huria Kristen Indonesia [HKI]) originated as a split in the Rhenish Mission work (now the Protestant Christian Batak Church) on Sumatra. Some of the Indonesian leaders were seeking the ordination of Batak ministers and the elevation of more Batak people into other leadership positions. All of the ordained ministers were German, and they controlled the affairs of the church. Those who left were in northern Sumatra and spoke the Toba Batak language. The strength of the church remains in rural areas of Sumatra, but the church has spread as its members moved around the country in the latter part of the 20th century.

The new church adopted the organization of the parent body, with a synod headed by a president as the highest legislative body. Most pastors receive their training with the Theological Faculty at Nonmensen University. The church operates among some of the poorer people of Sumatra and has a rather limited institutional program. It has managed to develop a set of primary and secondary schools. It has also nurtured a project to bring clean drinking water to some of the more remote villages.

The ministerium of the church have worked on the problem, so crucial to Indonesian Christian life, of the relationship of Christian precept to adat, the rules and customs that have traditionally been passed down through the culture.

In the 1970s, with assistance from the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and in cooperation with the Simalungun Protestant Christian Church, the HKI developed an innovative program for educating the church's large group of teacher-preachers who did not have the opportunity for seminary training. The program dealt with many immediate situations these leaders encountered but also included instructions in traditional theological topics. Integral to the program was the willingness of some older pastors to become mentors to the younger workers.

In 2005, the church reported 220,000 members. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and since 1965 of the World Council of Churches.

Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church

The Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church (Gereja Kemah Injil Indonesia [GKII]) originated with a decision by the Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA) to launch missionary work in the Netherlands Indies (now Indonesia). The decision was implemented by Robert A. Jaffray (1873–1945), who had worked in China for the previous 30 years. In 1927 he and Leland Wang founded the Chinese Foreign Mission Union and began work among Chinese migrants in several Indonesian urban areas. They also responded to an opening among the Mahakam people on Kalimantan and soon had a church of more than 2,000 members. Jeffray settled in Makassar, which became the early center of the work. In 1930 he opened a publishing house and two years later a Bible school.

One by one, the CMA selected areas neglected by both the Dutch Reformed missionaries and the German missionaries (primarily from the Rhenish Mission) and opened work in East Kalimantan, Lombok (1929), Bali (1931), Southern Sumatra (1933), and West Kalimantan (1935). Additional missions appeared over the next seven years. The greatest response came in East Kalimantan and Irian (opened in 1939). A second Bible school was opened in East Kalimantan in 1938. The use of Bible school graduates allowed the mission to spread rapidly and prepared it for independence. The mission also pioneered the use of an airplane to overcome the problems of travel through jungle terrain.

As the mission spread, it encountered people who had moved around the islands. Upon their conversion many of them returned to their homes and began churches in regions where there was an already existing Reformed church. Reformed church leaders rose to oppose the CMA. It was condemned for its relative lack of theological education and its introduction of American methods of missionary work. Working with the government, the Reformed church had the CMA expelled from several locations, including Bali. However, the mission had already become a large organization and by 1941 had 139 mission stations and had placed more than 100 Indonesian workers into the field.

The loss of the relatively small number of missionaries (20) during the war did not affect the CMA work as badly as that of the Reformed churches; however, the pain was real. Four American missionaries and 10 Indonesian workers were killed. Jeffray was one of two missionaries who died while interned. The Japanese forced the CMA church to join the regional councils of churches that it imposed upon the Protestant community (following a pattern already in place in Japan).

After the war, an expansive program to take the church to all of Indonesia had spectacular results. In 1951, the work was organized into three regional churches. Five years later these churches were given independence, and the missionaries became subordinate to the new church authorities. A new relationship between the now independent churches and the parent body was negotiated. In 1965, the three churches entered into a fellowship, Kemah Injil Gereja Masehi Indonesia. This fellowship grew to include three additional independent churches that matured from the CMA missionary efforts. In 1983 the fellowship was transformed into the new united Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle Church.

One sign of the growth of the new church during the 1970s and 1980s was the founding of additional Bible schools and the maturing of the original Bible school into the Jaffray Bible College (1958) and the Sekolah Tinggi Theologia Jeffray (1966). In 1990 the church reported 323,000 members. The church is a member of the Evangelical Fellowship of Asia, through which it is related to the World Evangelical Alliance and to the Alliance World Fellowship.

In the last generation, one member of the Indonesian Gospel Tabernacle church, Benny Giay (b. 1955), a theologian at the Walter Post Theological College in Western Papua, has gained notoriety for his activism on behalf of the rights of Papua people who reside in the western, Indonesian half of the island of New Guinea. In his various writings he has argued for a high degree of Papuan autonomy within the Indonesian state and system.

Insight Meditation Society

The Insight Meditation Society (IMS) was founded in 1975 on the 80-acre site of a former Catholic seminary and boys' school just north of Barre, Massachusetts, as a nonprofit organization for the intensive practice of insight meditation (vipassana), a system largely developed by the Burmese monk Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982). Part of what some individuals refer to as a 20th-century modernization movement in Theravada, vipassana is an intensive form of meditation aimed primarily at a lay-oriented audience and designed to promote the attainment of the first of the four traditional levels of sainthood.

The site was purchased collectively by Joseph Goldstein, Jack Kornfield, Sharon Salzberg, and Jacqueline Schwartz, each of whom had studied with Asian vipassana teachers. Goldstein (b. 1944) studied with Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982) and his students Anagarika Munindra (1914–2003) and U Pandita (b. 1921); Salzberg (b. 1952) studied with S. N. Goenka, Mahasi Sayadaw, Munindra, and U Pandita; Kornfield (b. 1945) studied with Achaan Cha (also Ajahn Chah, 1918–1992) and Mahasi Sayadaw. Each returned to the United States to begin teaching various retreats, and although these initial retreats were what Gil Fronsdal calls “a hybrid of Asian forms,” their collective style was eventually geared for a Western audience of convert Buddhists, and thus virtually stripped of the religious trappings of Theravada, such as rituals, chanting, and the like. A forest refuge opened in 2003. Jack Kornfield moved to California in 1981, eventually founding Spirit Rock Meditation Center in western Marin County.

There are a number categories of teacher at IMS, as the center is called. These include senior Dharma teachers, comprised of a 16-person group of “core” faculty and a larger list of visiting teachers. In addition, there is always a “resident teacher” at the center. IMS sponsors various retreats for beginning and experienced meditators, consisting of daily meditation and nightly Dharma talks, interspersed with individual and group interviews with the teachers. The retreats are profoundly rigorous in nature, generally beginning as early as 5:00 a.m. and maintaining a routine of alternating periods of silent sitting and walking meditation, culminating around 10:00 p.m. Participants live in austere single quarters, segregated by gender, and all meals are vegetarian. In addition to the group retreats, experienced meditators may engage in self-retreats, work retreats, and long-term practice retreats. There is also a youth outreach program. In the quarter-century since its founding IMS has grown enormously and now accommodates more than 2,500 retreatants annually, ranging from 2-day weekend retreats to one 84-day retreat. Most retreats are 7 to 9 days in length.

Although Asian vipassana teachers focus on the attainment of freedom, negatively defined as the freedom from certain characteristics such as greed, hatred, and delusion (the traditional “three poisons” of Buddhism) and positively defined as the attainment of nibbana (nirvana), Western teachers like those at IMS stress the positive aspects of freedom, such as stress reduction, a happy life, and compassionate living. Although many traditional Theravada practices, such as merit-making, and taking monastic vows, are not emphasized, four concomitant practices of vipassana are stressed: mindfulness (Pali: sati), loving-kindness (metta), ethics (sila), and generosity (dana).

Like many American Buddhist communities, IMS has developed an academic component in order to help its practitioners to combine practice and study in a mutually reinforcing environment. To that end, the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies (BCBS) was founded in 1989 on 90 acres of wooded land, a half mile from IMS. The center’s executive director is Andrew Olendzki, and the resident scholar and programming director is Mu Soeng, a former Zen monk. In addition to Spirit Rock Meditation Center, the Cambridge Insight Meditation Center near Boston, the Vipassana Foundation of Maui, and Gaia House in the United Kingdom are associated with IMS. Although IMS generally maintains a low-profile, it has also been a leader in developing practices based on compassion and ethics for members and teachers alike. It has even developed an “Insight Meditation Teacher’s Code of Ethics,” which has enabled IMS to remain remarkably free of the scandals that have been documented in other American Buddhist communities. IMS also offers a rich series of online resources via their website at www.dharma.org. These include audios of guided meditations, a glossary of terms, URLs for related websites, and a strong list of suggested readings.

The Insight Meditation Society is headquartered in Barre. The associated periodical, Inquiring Mind, is the national journal of the vipassana meditation movement. It can be accessed online at www.dharma.org/ij/index.htm.

Integral Yoga International

“Integral yoga” refers both to the synchronization of the several forms of yoga teachings and to a specific group founded by Sri Swami Satchidananda (1914–2002), an Indian Hindu teacher who settled in the United States in the 1960s. Sri Swami Sivananda Saraswati Maharaj (1887–1963), a renowned Hindu teacher and revered holy man of the 20th century, is credited with first using the concept “integral yoga.” Integral yoga basically means a practice that synthesizes the major yoga traditions—hatha, raja, bhakti, jnana, and karma. Sivananda also added a sixth, japa yoga, a practice based on the repetition of a mantra.

Sri Swami Satchidananda was one of several Sivananda disciples who carried his teachings beyond the traditional boundaries of Hinduism in India. Other disciples of Sivananda used the concept “integral yoga,” but it is Satchidananda who is credited with both popularizing the concept and developing a synthesis of yoga teachings. (Sri Aurobindo, operating from a complexly different tradition, also used the term “integral yoga.”) Satchidananda’s organization has trademarked the term.

Satchidananda was born in 1914 in a small village of South India. After studying agriculture and science, he worked at several commercial and technical positions. Dissatisfied with these endeavors, he determined at age 28 to pursue a spiritual quest. He isolated himself and explored yoga through texts; later Satchidananda sat at the feet of several of India’s great religious teachers.

In 1947 Satchidananda’s spiritual quest led him to Swami Sivananda. He was initiated as a sannyasin (monk) in 1949 and, because of his mastery of the various forms of yoga, was given the title yogiraj, meaning “master of yoga.” Satchidananda’s affiliation with Sivananda and the latter’s Divine Life Society extended over almost two decades. In addition to extensive lectures throughout India, Satchidananda taught yoga and established centers in Sri Lanka (then Ceylon), Hong Kong, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, and the Philippines.

A two-day trip to New York in 1966 was extended to five months and eventually led to the establishment of the United States as Satchidananda’s base for worldwide operations.

In October 1966, the first Integral Yoga Institute was founded in New York City. In 1972 Yogaville-West, a community for those who practiced integral yoga, was created in Seigler Springs, California. A year later Yogaville-East was founded in northeast Connecticut and served as the American headquarters for integral yoga for almost 10 years.

Swamiji, as Satchidananda is known to his disciples, has also been instrumental in advocating and sponsoring ecumenical, or interfaith, programs. For more than 50 years he has initiated and participated in many interfaith gatherings around the world. The goal of integral yoga, writes Swami Satchidananda, “is to realize the spiritual unity behind all the diversities in the entire creation and to live harmoniously as members of one universal family.” Through the years he has helped popularize the teaching that “Truth is One, Paths are Many.”

Through a gift from folksinger Carole King, Integral Yoga International acquired 600 acres of woodlands in Buckingham County, Virginia, in late 1979, which became the movement’s world headquarters. Here, on the banks of the James River, Sri Satchidananda constructed the Light of Truth Universal Shrine (LOTUS), a shrine to all the world’s religions. Dedicated in July 1986, the LOTUS shrine is intended as a place where all faith traditions can come to worship and pray and find the One Spirit that unites all.

The Satchidananda Ashram-Yogaville is both a monastic order and a teaching center. Currently, approximately 80 persons live on the property, and an additional 200 affiliates reside near the ashram. More than 50 instructional programs and retreats are offered annually, most lasting for 1 to 2 weeks. Integral Yoga International has four institutes in the United States and one each in Canada and India. Integral Yoga International maintains 37 centers in 28 countries, almost half of which are in the United States. It also maintains a set of interrelated Internet sites, including web pages for the Satchidananda Ashram Yogaville (<http://yogaville.org/>), Integral Yoga Institute (www.integralyogaofnewyork.org), and the Integral Yoga Teachers Association (www.iyta.org). More than 400 persons in 23 countries are certified to offer instruction in integral yoga.

International Association for Religious Freedom

The oldest interfaith organization operating on the international scene, the International Association for Religious Freedom was founded in Boston, Massachusetts, by liberal religious leaders in 1900. That year people from various countries had gathered to attend the 75th anniversary gathering of the American Unitarian Association. In the United States that year was Protap Chundar Mozoomdar (1840–1905), a spiritual teacher from India and representative of the Brahma Samaj, with which the Unitarians had developed a close relationship. The president of the Unitarians, Samuel A. Elliott (1862–1950), also played a prominent role in the founding of the new Association.

Founded as the International Council of Unitarian and Other Religious Liberals, but soon changed to International Council of Religious Liberals, the Association met annually until World War I prevented its gatherings. After the war it continued to meet but seemed to have lost its purpose. However, in the post-World War II climate of urgency, it was reorganized as the International Association for Liberal Christianity and Religious Freedom. Its headquarters were established in the United States but soon moved to Germany. As religious liberty was the motivating force, it soon adopted the name by which it is currently known. It has subsequently attracted an interfaith coalition of leaders from around the world, though in the West it retains a primary contact with Unitarians. The North American chapter still gathers with the annual meeting of the Unitarian Universalist Association general assembly.

The International Association sponsors a congress of its members that meets every four years, with the venue moving among its four major regions (East Asia, South Asia, North America, and Europe/Middle East). It deals with particular pressing issues, among the many issues in religious freedom at any moment, as they are brought before it. In 2008, it reported 90 affiliated local groups in 25 countries.

International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches

The International Association of Reformed and Presbyterian Churches was founded in 1962 by delegates attending the meeting of the International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC) meeting in Amsterdam, the Netherlands. The ICCC represents the most conservative wing of Protestantism, usually referred to as Fundamentalist. It is militantly opposed to the most liberal wing of the Protestant community, as represented by the World Council of Churches (WCC) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC). The immediate inspiration for the formation of the International Association was the trip of the moderator of the Church of Scotland (a prominent member of both the WCC and WARC) to the Vatican.

The ICCC and the International Association both strongly affirm the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and demand the separation of Christians from all apostasy and heresy (which they believe have permeated the more liberal churches). Reverend Carl McIntire (1906–2002), a Presbyterian who spearheaded the formation of the ICCC and also took the lead in forming the International Association. Dr. A. B. Dodd of Taiwan and Dr. J. C. Maris of the Netherlands were the first moderator and secretary, respectively.

The churches of the ICCC from the Reformed Presbyterian tradition constituted the first members of the Association. The International Association has its headquarters at the same location in Collingswood, New Jersey, as the headquarters of the ICCC in America and the Bible Presbyterian Church founded by Carl McIntire.

International Church of the Foursquare Gospel

The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel was founded by Aimee Semple McPherson (1890–1944), Portrait of early-20th-century evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson, founder of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

one of a small group of prominent female Christian ministers in the United States in the first half of the 20th century. McPherson was born in Canada. Her mother had been a member of the Salvation Army, a Holiness church, but as a teenager Aimee experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit as evidenced by speaking in tongues. A short time later she married Robert Semple. In 1910 they moved to China as missionaries. He became a victim of the climate, and Aimee returned to the United States with her baby daughter, also named Aimee. Aimee subsequently married Harold S. McPherson and the pair toured the country as independent Pentecostal evangelists, though their marriage finally ended in divorce.

Following World War I, McPherson emerged as a popular evangelist in spite of derision because of her gender, winning an audience through her oratorical abilities. In 1918 she settled in Los Angeles and led in the construction of Angelus Temple. At the same time she opened an evangelistic and training institute to educate leadership for what was quickly to become the Pentecostal denomination. By 1921 there were already 32 congregations, and McPherson formed the Echo Park Evangelistic Association. The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel was formed four years later. Work was concentrated along the West Coast but soon spread to Canada.

McPherson developed a unique presentation of the Pentecostal message, which she called the foursquare gospel (a variation of the fourfold gospel of Benjamin Albert Simpson [1843–1919], founder of the Christian and Missionary Alliance). The name Church of the Foursquare Gospel derived from the church's emphasis on the fourfold role of Jesus Christ, as Savior, Baptizer with the Holy Spirit, Healer, and Coming King. Otherwise the church is theologically at one with other trinitarian Pentecostals.

The Church of the Foursquare Gospel moved easily into the global missionary thrust that had been inherent in the Pentecostal movement ever since the 1906 revival in Los Angeles that founded it. Through the last half of the 20th century, the great majority of the membership was found outside of the United States. As of 2008, the church reported 8,439,618 members in 59,620 churches and meeting places in 144 countries. Less than 5 percent of the membership (255,773) is now (2006) in the United States.

The headquarters of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel is in Los Angeles. It is a member of the Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America and participates in the Pentecostal World Fellowship. The church is led by its president. After her death in 1944, Aimee McPherson was succeeded as president by her son Rolf McPherson (b. 1913), who led the church until 1988. He was followed by John R. Holland, who held the office from 1988 to 1997 and was succeeded by Paul C. Risser. The current president is former mega-church pastor Jack W. Hayford. The highest legislative authority in the church is the delegated general convention.

International Churches of Christ

The International Churches of Christ (ICC) began as a renewal movement within the Churches of Christ (non-instrumental), a conservative American Free Church body. The Church of Christ shared a Protestant/Free Church theological tradition but adopted an ultra-congregational organization that placed all authority in the local congregation and rejected any effort to create denominational structures that served all of the congregations. Many leaders in the Churches of Christ identified it with the true church and suggested that only people who were baptized after understanding the nature of baptism for the remission of sins were truly baptized. They generally demanded rebaptism of any person joining with them who had been baptized in another denomination.

In the 1960s, what was called the discipling movement spread through American evangelical churches. The movement had as its goal the changing of nominal churchgoers into active Christian disciples. The movement took its name from the assignment of a new Christian to an older, more mature Christian who became the younger person's mentor in the faith. The mentoring relationship meant regular contact above and beyond contacts at congregational gatherings. There was an expectation that the disciple would accept the guidance of the mentor. During the height of the discipling movement, it was widely criticized for the often invasive and controlling guidance imposed upon young Christians.

The discipling movement entered the Churches of Christ through the Crossroads Church of Christ in Gainesville, Florida (adjacent to the University of Florida). Using the discipling program in its campus ministry at the University of Florida, it experienced spectacular success. It also became quite controversial. Eventually the Crossroads congregation withdrew their support for the program.

Among the people influenced by the Crossroads congregation during the heyday of the discipling movement was Kip McKean (b. 1954). He went on to become the pastor of a small congregation of the Churches of Christ in Lexington (suburban Boston), Massachusetts. In 1979 he challenged the members of the congregation to make a new commitment to restore the Christianity of the Bible. Starting with only 30 members, he asked them to commit their lives totally to Christ and, most important, to hold that as a standard for all of the people they converted to Christ. The Church of Christ, they believed, consisted totally of disciples.

Integral to the program was discipling. Every person in the church assumed a discipling relationship with an older member and disciplined one or more newer members. McKean also wrote a set of Bible lessons called the First Principles, which the church members were to master and use in teaching those whom they were discipling. It was assumed that disciples would spend part of their time each week engaged in evangelistic activity, and that they would spend time each week discussing their progress in the Christian life and any personal issues of importance with their mentor.

The church grew, moved into Boston proper, and took the name Boston Church of Christ. It grew spectacularly through the 1980s. In 1981, McKean announced a plan for the evangelization of the world in the next generation. He would send a small group of disciples to key urban centers. As they gathered disciples, they would in turn send teams out until all the world's capital cities had congregations. The movement would then go to the smaller cities until all the world was covered. The first congregations were seeded by the Boston Congregation in Chicago and London. New York, Toronto, Johannesburg, Paris, and Stockholm followed. Eventually the church reached out to Asia—Tokyo, Manila, Singapore, and Bangkok. It continued to expand through the 1990s.

The implementation of the plan involved a dramatic change from the more traditional organizational structure of the Churches of Christ. Instead of the congregational autonomy so prized within the Churches of Christ, the movement that was growing from the Boston Church had a strong centralized organizational structure put in place to carry out the discipling program and the plan for world evangelism. As the movement spread, World Sector leaders were appointed and given responsibility for evangelizing their part of the globe. In 1990, McKean moved to Los Angeles, and the movement has been centered there ever since. As criticism of the movement by the Churches of Christ mounted, the movement formally defined itself as no longer a part of the Churches of Christ and took the name International Churches of Christ.

In 1994, McKean, his wife, and all of the World Sector leaders and their wives signed an "Evangelism Proclamation" declaring their intent to plant a church in every nation with a city of at least 100,000 people by the year 2000. At that time they had started 146 churches in 53 nations. As of July 2000, the ICC reported 393 churches worldwide.

The International Churches of Christ distinguished itself from its parent body on several issues above and beyond the church organization. The ICC believes that it is the movement of God in this generation and thus has a unique role in evangelizing the world. It is this belief that underlies the strong commitment that is so characteristic of members. It has introduced instrumental music, in a limited manner, to the church and has given an unprecedented role to women in the leadership (though it has not admitted them to the ordained ministry).

The church has organized HOPE Worldwide, a volunteer program that conducts numerous social service projects around the world. It also now has special consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations

Although the church has pursued its program of growth and expansion, a number of former members who had bad experiences in the church and subsequently dropped away from the church and its discipling program have complained about the church. Some have suggested that the disciplined life demanded of members is inherently manipulative and destructive of personal freedom and choice. Some have denounced it as a cult. In the face of criticisms the ICC has modified but not discarded the discipling program and provided more formal guidance for those serving as mentors. Criticism of the church peaked in the early 1990s, when those who opposed the church for the changes it had introduced in the original ideas and organization of the Churches of Christ joined forces with those who saw it as engaged in brainwashing. With the demise of the brainwashing theory in the 1990s, criticism has significantly decreased.

External criticism of the ICC had significantly diminished by the beginning of the new century, but it would soon be replaced by significant internal turmoil beginning in 2001. Toward the end of that year, concerned with the perceived instability within the McKean family, the leadership announced that Kip and Elena McKean would begin a sabbatical leave from their leadership role. It was noted that their daughter Olivia McKean had recently left the movement. A year later, Kip McKean tendered his resignation as world evangelist, Elena surrendered her position as world women's leader, and the leadership in general abandoned the organization around World Sectors.

Several months after the McKean's resignations, in February 2003, Henry Kriete, a prominent British church leader, circulated a paper, "Honest to God," in which he offered a stinging critique of the state of the movement. Several months passed, and in the summer, the McKean's moved to Portland, Oregon, from where Kip McKean released a response to Kriete in the form of an open circular letter to the movement that he entitled "From Babylon to Zion." The letter included his assertion that he was ready to return to his earlier role leading the movement.

By the time McKean expressed his desire to re-assume leadership, a significant number of the other leaders had lost confidence in him. As discussions and negotiations on the direction of the movement proceeded, in 2005, 84 leaders formally withdrew fellow ship from him. At that point, McKean abandoned any attempt to return to leadership of the ICC and in 2006 formed a new movement that he called the Sold-Out Discipling Movement Churches. He and his wife subsequently founded the City of Angels International Christian Church in Los Angeles as the flagship congregation of the new movement.

The break with McKean (and the rancor that immediately preceded it) cost the ICC. There were major membership losses in 2003 and 2004. The ICC leadership estimated membership at the end of 2007 at 90,130, representing a 33 percent decline from the peak membership in 2002 of 135,046. At present (2007), there are still 562 congregations worldwide.

International Coalition for Religious Freedom

The International Coalition for Religious Freedom is one of several interfaith organizations inspired by and receiving the majority of its support from the Unification movement headed by Korean minister Sun

Myung Moon (b. 1920). In spite of its significant relationship to a single group, the Coalition strives to be completely nonsectarian in its program and work. It is based on a commitment to religious freedom for all and a belief that every religious entity has a right to freedom of religious belief and expression as conscience leads, a right that is balanced by the requirements of generally acceptable laws against criminal behavior.

The Coalition, founded in 1997, builds on and supersedes the work of the Coalition for Religious Freedom founded in 1983. Its first major activity was the holding of a set of conferences in 1998 under the general theme, “Religious Freedom and the New Millennium.” Sessions were held in Washington, D.C., Tokyo, Berlin, and São Paulo. Each session brought together religious leaders, scholars, and human rights activists to discuss the main points of religious suppression in the world and to highlight the issues faced in the creation of a more religiously free society.

The coalition in its short history has focused upon some peculiar problems faced by the Unification movement, including the deprogrammings against its adherents in Japan and the denial of entry to Rev. Moon in some European countries, but has been broadly attentive to problems of other minority religious bodies as well.

International Conference of Reformed Churches

The International Conference of Reformed Churches (ICRC) was founded in 1982 as an ecumenical fellowship of conservative Reformed churches. The original gathering included representatives of nine Reformed and Presbyterian denominations who assembled at Groningen, Netherlands, at the invitation of the Reformed Churches (Liberated). The Reformed Churches (Liberated) was formed during World War II in the midst of a controversy within the Netherlands Reformed Church. As theological debate took place on a variety of issues around the grace of God, the church's synod issued several doctrinal statements. The issuance of the new doctrinal statements aroused a secondary issue when a protest was generated over the new statements, which were binding on the teaching elders in the church.

Leading the protest was Professor K. Schilder (1890–1952), who argued that pressing new theological positions on the church was not the way to end the controversy. He was excluded from the church's ministry and with his supporters, including a number of congregations, he led in the formation of the Reformed Churches (Liberated). The church grew into a substantial denomination with more than 100,000 members. It was conservative in orientation and soon developed a close relationship with the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands.

Those who formed the ICRC felt that there was an attack within the large Reformed world on both the authority of the Bible and the Reformed creeds that had been promulgated in the 16th century. The ICRC adopted the Bible, the “Three Forms of Unity” (Belgic Confession, Heidelberg Catechism, Canons of Dort), and the Westminster documents (Westminster Confession, Westminster Larger and Shorter Catechisms) as the basis of their fellowship. Member churches are expected to be loyal to the confessional standards of the Reformed tradition.

The first assembly of the ICRC was held in Edinburgh in 1985 and hosted by the Free Church of Scotland. Subsequent meetings were held in Langley, British Columbia, Canada (1989); Zwolle, Netherlands; and Seoul, Korea. The 2009 conference was in Christchurch, New Zealand, with the Reformed Churches of New Zealand serving as the host. Prominent members of the Conference included the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, Canadian Reformed Churches, and the Presbyterian Church of Korea (KoShin). In 1995, the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, formerly associated with the International Council of Christian Churches and the Reformed Ecumenical Council, joined the ICRC.

The ICRC promotes cooperation in missions and the presentation of a united front on the Reformed faith and related issues by its member churches. Some 25 Reformed churches worldwide are now (2009) members of the Conference.

International Congregational Fellowship

The International Congregational Fellowship arose to meet the need for greater expression among those Christian churches that believed that the Congregational form of church life was the best form in the contemporary democratic world. Much of that thrust was lost in the merger of the General Council of Congregational Christian Churches into the United Church of Christ (1957), the merger of the International Congregational Council into the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (1966), and the merger of the Congregational Church in England and Wales into the United Reformed Church (1972). In the meantime, churches that stayed out of the mergers that created the United Church of Christ and the United Reformed Church formed the National Association of Congregational Christian Churches and the Congregational Federation of England.

The continuing Congregational churches made common cause in 1975, largely prompted by David Watson in England and John Alexander in the United States. People from six countries met to form the International Congregational Fellowship. They announced the first conference for 1977, at which time they signed a document called “The Chiselhurst Thanksgiving,” affirming their allegiance to the Congregational Way.

The Fellowship has organized as a gathering of individuals concerned with the promotion of the congregational form of church life rather than an association or council of denominations. Most Congregational churches are already members of either the World Council of Churches or the World Alliance of Reformed Churches or both. The Fellowship’s primary program is its quadrennial conference to advocate for Congregationalism.

The Fellowship holds international conferences quadrennially. Aside from the contacts given below, regional secretaries also now (2009) exist for Central Europe, Africa, Asia, Central and South America, North America, the Pacific and Australia, The United Kingdom, and Wales. The fellowship stays in touch with Congregationalists in more than 50 countries. The first issue of the biennial International Congregationalist Journal appeared in 2001.

International Council of Christian Churches

The International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC) was founded in 1948 at the instigation of the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC). The ACCC had in turn resulted from a split within the Protestant Fundamentalist movement in the 1940s. Fundamentalism had arisen in American Protestantism as a protest against what was seen as a departure from essential Christian beliefs by liberal Protestants in the early decades of the 20th century. The battle between Fundamentalists and Modernists (as the liberals were called) came to a head in the 1930s, when many Fundamentalists left the major Protestant denominations in the United States. Other Fundamentalists remained within the larger denominations as conservative voices.

In the late 1930s, some Fundamentalist leaders demanded that a complete separation from the liberal denominations should occur, and that ties should be broken with conservative leaders who remained in these older groups. Those conservative leaders who were willing to keep fellowship with conservatives within the older churches became known as evangelicals and later organized the National Association of Evangelicals.

Those demanding complete separation found a leader in Dr. Carl McIntire, a Presbyterian minister and founder of the Bible Presbyterian Church. He led in the formation of the American Council of Christian Churches in opposition to the Federal Council of Churches (now the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.). The ACCC also opposed the World Council of Churches (WCC), whose organization gained momentum in the years immediately after World War II. As the organizational conference of the WCC was announced for Amsterdam in 1984, McIntire called together his associates from around the world to gather in Amsterdam just a few days prior to the initial assembly of the WCC. In succeeding years, the much smaller ICCC often held its meeting to coincide with the WCC meeting.

The ICCC is a Fundamentalist Protestant body that affirms the infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible and the need for a complete separation from heresy and apostasy, especially as these are embodied in the WCC or the WEA or any of their affiliates. The ICCC faced a severe crisis in 1970 when the 30 years of leadership by McIntire was challenged. In 1969 the ACCC removed McIntire from his role as the leader of the organization. The ICCC chose to affirm McIntire, and the ICCC and the ACCC dropped their relationship. McIntire moved to create a new American affiliate of the ICCC, now known as the ICCC in America.

At its meeting in Amsterdam in 1998, the ICCC reported 700 denominations from more than 100 countries represented in its membership. The 17th World Congress of the ICCC met in Korea in 2005. The Congress meets every five years.

International Council of Christians and Jews

The International Council of Christians and Jews (ICCJ) is an association of national organizations from more than 30 countries dedicated to the dialogue between Christians and Jews at all levels and increasingly the wider encounter between Jews, Christians, and Muslims. The ICCJ was founded in 1946 as awareness of the extent of the Holocaust spread across Europe and North America. W. W. (Bill) Simpson, the leader of the British Council of Christians and Jews, was named the first executive secretary.

At the original gathering of the Council, at Seelisberg, Switzerland, in 1947, a 10-point statement was issued that called Christians, among other things, to avoid distorting Judaism with the object of extolling Christianity; identifying Jews as the enemies of Jesus; associating Jews with the killing of Jesus; and promoting the notion that the Jewish people are reprobate, accursed, or reserved for a destiny of suffering. The work of the ICCJ contributed to the changing views of the Roman Catholic Church toward the Jewish community that were proclaimed during the Second Vatican Council and a host of statements renouncing anti-Semitism and anti-Jewish theological perspectives and biblical interpretations by major Protestant bodies. As a result, most Protestant bodies, especially those associated with the World Council of Churches, withdrew support from efforts to convert Jews to Christianity.

Among the oldest affiliated member organizations was the National Council of Christians and Jews (now the National Conference for Community and Justice), which had been founded in the United States in 1927. A pioneer in Jewish-Christian dialogue, in the post-World War II context it expanded its role to include a broad program of activities aimed at ending religious, racial, and other forms of bigotry.

Knowledge of the Holocaust provided fuel for the Jewish-Christian dialogue through the 1970s, and the continued tension in the Middle East has spurred the broadening of dialogue to include Muslims. Beginning in Europe, the dialogue has spread worldwide into most countries with a significant Jewish presence, from Argentina to Australia and New Zealand. In 2009, it reported local chapters in 32 countries.

The ICCJ has its headquarters at the Martin Buber House, the home of the Jewish mystic and theologian prior to his having to leave Germany due to the rise of Nazism. The ICCJ has made a special effort to bring women and youth into the work of dialogue and sponsors the Abrahamic Faith Council to focus its efforts with Muslim dialogue. It maintains an extensive Internet site dealing with Jewish-Christian relations at <http://www.jcrelations.net>.

International Council of Community Churches

Community churches first appeared late in the 19th century in the United States as one response to the increasing religious pluralism, especially the many sects into which Protestantism had split. Nonsectarian community churches were an alternative to the establishment of multiple congregations of denominationally affiliated congregations. Such congregations were logical in smaller communities that could not support the array of denominational institutions. Then, in the early 20th century, in response to the ecumenical movement, a variety of united congregations (formed by the merger of congregations of different denominational affiliations) also appeared on the scene. In the 1920s, the initial attempts to network such nondenominational congregations began.

Reverend Orvis F. Jordan of the Park Ridge Community Church in Illinois became the center of one such network, the Community Church Workers, founded in 1923. The organization lasted into the 1930s. Community Church Workers operated primarily among churches serving the Anglo community, and a similar structure emerged that served African American churches, the National Council of the People's Church of Christ and Community Centers of the United States and Elsewhere.

Through the 1930s, various approaches to the Federal Council of Churches were made, but the Council failed to act on petitions to recognize the community church ideal. Then, after World War II, a new attempt at organization led in 1946 to the formation of the National Council of Community Churches. This group merged with the predominantly African American Council in 1950 to create the International Council of Community Churches. This Council underwent several name changes due to the loss of several foreign congregations, but in 1983, following the affiliation of congregations in Canada and Nigeria, the original name was again adopted.

By the very nature of its stance as nonsectarian, the Council has proposed no doctrinal statement, but member ministers and churches generally operate out of a liberal-Protestant, ecumenically minded stance. The Council describes itself as committed to Christian unity and working "toward a fellowship as comprehensive as the spirit and teachings of Christ and as inclusive as the love of God."

The Council is organized as a loose association of autonomous congregations, with the different Council offices primarily facilitating communication between congregations. The officers also represent the congregations in various official capacities with the government and the larger religious world. At the end of the 1990s the council joined the World Council of Churches and more recently joined in the new ecumenical Churches Uniting in Christ.

In 2006, the Council reported 157 member churches with a combined membership of 73,174. Approximately 1,000 additional congregations are affiliated with the Council and participate in various levels of its fellowship. Some 5 percent of the congregations have a dual membership in a denomination.

International Council of Unitarians and Universalists

The International Council of Unitarians and Universalists (ICUU) was founded in 1995 as an effort to further contact between Unitarians and Universalists across national boundaries. Its formation evolved from the new level of international contact that had followed the formation of the Unitarian Universalist Association by the merger of Unitarians and Universalists of North America in 1961. Previously, international contacts had been focused within the International Association for Religious Freedom. Then, in 1987, the General Assembly of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches of the United Kingdom passed a resolution favoring the organization of a new international cooperative structure. The ICUU is specifically mandated to nourish Unitarian and Universalist communities around the world. The founding meeting was held in Essex, Massachusetts, at which Reverend David Usher was elected president.

Although there is no creed, the ICUU adopted a brief affirmation: “We affirm our belief in religious community based upon liberty of conscience and of individual thought in matters of faith, the inherent worth and dignity of every person, justice and compassion in human relations, responsible stewardship of earth’s living system, and our commitment to democratic principles.” Unitarian Universalism is a religion of Oneness, and members heartily affirm the “interdependent web of all existence of which we are a part.” Often oppressed as heresy, for centuries Unitarians and Universalists were scattered. Today, its churches and temples include Christians, Buddhists, Pagans, and many others. They welcome “All Souls,” and are known for their witness for social justice and freedom of thought.

Members of the ICUU believe that Unitarian and Universalist teachings go back to the first Christians. Some early Christians spoke of Jesus as a “son of God by adoption” (the oldest Gospel, Mark, has no birth story). They saw only the Father as God, denying the Trinity. Others said that if God is Love, all will be saved. During the 16th-century Reformation both teachings resurfaced after years of marginalization. In 1531, a Spanish theologian and physician, usually known by his Latin name, Michael Servetus (1511–1553), wrote De Trinitatis Erroribus (On the Errors of the Trinity). Arrested during a visit to Geneva, he was burned at the stake on October 27, 1553, with the “blessings” of Reformed leader and theologian John Calvin. Subsequently, Unitarian churches developed in Poland under the leadership of an Italian theologian, usually known by his Latin name, Laelius Socinus (1525–1562), and in Transylvania under the leadership of a Hungarian cleric and theologian, usually known as Francis David (1510–1579). The Polish Church was suppressed for centuries, but there is now a Unitarian presence in Warsaw. Since 1568, Hungarian Unitarians have continued in hundreds of villages and cities in Romania and Hungary. Composer Bela Bartok (1881–1945) was a member of Second Unitarian Church, Budapest.

Unitarians and Universalists were common in many dissenting chapels in Britain. Many fled to North America, including Reverend Joseph Priestley (1733–1834; discoverer of oxygen), who established the first Unitarian Church in Philadelphia. Five U.S. presidents were Unitarian, including John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and William Howard Taft. Well-known Universalists include Clara Barton, who founded the American Red Cross, and P. T. Barnum, of circus fame. UUs, as they are often called, have made major contributions to science with Nobel Prize winners such as Linus Pauling and George Wald. Of special note are Unitarian contributions to literature. American writers Louisa May Alcott, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Herman Melville, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Kurt Vonnegut were Unitarians, as were British authors Elizabeth Gaskell and Charles Dickens. Dickens wrote A Christmas Carol, in 1843, the same year he joined a Unitarian Church in London. Late 20th-century Unitarians include Lord Alan Bullock, first Unitarian vice chancellor of Oxford; Sir Tim Berners Lee, creator of the World Wide Web; and Dr. Dana M. Greeley, co-founder of Religions for Peace.

Hundreds of UUs have suffered imprisonment and death for their faith. It was only in 1813 that English law accepted Unitarians. In the Czech Republic, before World War II, Dr. Norbert Capek was minister to the largest Unitarian Congregation in the world in Prague, with 3,500 members. Capek wrote beautiful hymns, some of which are translated in modern hymnbooks. But with the Nazi occupation, Capek died in a gas chamber. Dozens of other Unitarians were taken to concentration camps. After almost 50 years of oppression under the Communists, the Czech congregations are reviving. In cooperation with the ICUU, two Czech ministers have trained at seminaries in the United States.

The seven-member ICUU Executive Committee is elected by the ICUU Council. One hundred UUs from around the world come as delegates to ICUU council meetings in odd-numbered years. At the 2007 ICUU council meeting in Germany, there were delegates from more than 25 countries, including the Philippines, India, Indonesia, Nigeria, Kenya, Burundi, South Africa, New Zealand, Bolivia, Argentina, Britain, Denmark, Germany, Spain, France, The Czech Republic, the United States, Mexico, and Canada. There are 165,000 UUs in North America, 90,000 in Hungary and Romania, 10,000 in India, 6,000 in Great Britain,

2,000 in Germany, and about 15,000 scattered in small congregations from Nigeria to Japan.

ICUU Officers 2007–2009 are Reverend Brian Kiely, president, Canada; Reverend Gordon Oliver, South Africa, vice president; Jaume de Marcos, Spain, secretary; Reverend David Shaw, treasurer, United Kingdom. The executive secretary, Reverend John Clifford, Scotland, retired in 2009, and Steve Dick was appointed to replace him at the Council Meeting in Cluj-Napoca, Romania, September 1–5, 2009. The ICUU conducts programs for training in worship and ministry. Recent programs have held in Kenya and in the Khasi Hills of India. The ICUU has also hosted a Conference on Michael Servetus, and Symposiums at Oxford and Cluj-Napoca (Kolozsvár) Romania.

International Evangelical Church

The International Evangelical Church and Missionary Association (IEC) is a fellowship of Pentecostal churches that was formed in 1964 primarily to provide a legal cover for the Italian missionary activity of independent Pentecostal missionary John McTernan. The IEC expanded to the United States in the early 1980s to include the ministry of John Levin Meares (1920–), founder of Evangel Temple in Washington, D.C. The nephew of a former general overseer of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), Meares became a minister as a young man and served several Church of God congregations in Tennessee.

In 1955 Meares decided to resign his pastorate in Memphis in order to assist independent evangelist Jack Coe in a series of revival meetings in Washington, D.C. Meares decided to stay in Washington to build a Church of God congregation there, which he called the Washington Revival Center. He also started a radio show called Miracle Time. Although Meares was white, the major response to his ministry was from African Americans. The Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) was a white-controlled denomination with very intolerant attitudes about race at the time. In May 1956, Meares was disfellowshipped by the Church of God for starting an unlicensed ministry. He continued as an independent minister, and in 1957 his congregation settled in an abandoned theater, which was named the National Evangelistic Center.

John McTernan became associated with Meares soon after the latter arrived in Washington. The IEC, beginning with a few Italian churches, had reached out to include a group of Brazilian churches under Bishop Robert McAleister, as well as some churches in Nigeria led by Bishop Benson Idahosa (1938–1998). Meares became the new vice president of the IEC.

In the 1960s, Meares's ministry shifted from an emphasis on miracles to an emphasis on praise and the gift of prophecy. After the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968 and the riots that followed, almost all of the remaining white members left the National Evangelistic Center. Membership dropped to several hundred black members and then slowly began to increase again. In the early 1970s, the 300 remaining members of Meares's Washington congregation reorganized and decided to build a $3 million facility. The result was the Evangel Temple, which opened in 1975.

The IEC joined the World Council of Churches in 1972. In 1974, McTernan died and Meares found himself at the head of the IEC. In 1982 IEC founded a new Pentecostal ecumenical organization, the International Communion of Charismatic Churches, which includes the branches of the International Evangelical Church, the Gospel Harvesters Church founded by Earl P. Paulk Jr. (1927–2009), and others. The bishops of the International Communion of Charismatic Churches—McAleister, Paulk, and Idahosa—consecrated Meares as a bishop in 1982.

The International Evangelical Churches and Missionary Association emerged out of Meares’s capacity as mediator between black and white Pentecostal communities, which had diverged over a period of many years. In 1984 Meares began the annual Inner-City Pastor’s Conference, which draws together the pastors (primarily African American) of the many churches of the association from around the United States and Canada. More than 1,000 pastors attended the Inner-City Pastor’s Conference in 1987.

The IEC has its headquarters at Evangel Temple, which in 1991 relocated to suburban Maryland. At that time, led by Don Meares, John Meares’s son, Evangel Temple had more than 1,000 members. It remains a strong suburban Washington, D.C., congregation. The IEC had approximately 500 congregations worldwide, more than 400 of which were in Africa. There were approximately 40 member churches in South America, 20 in Italy, 20 in the United States, and 1 in Jamaica. Current statistics are not available. The IEC is no longer a member of the World Council of Churches.

International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross

The International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross, was founded in Havana, Cuba, as the Gideon Mission in the 1920s. The founder, Ernest William Sellers (d. 1953), affectionately known as “Daddy John,” was assisted in his work by three women—Sister Sarah, Mable G. Ferguson, and Muriel C. Atwood. Sellers became the bishop of the church, a post he held until 1947, when he was named the church’s Apostle, and three other bishops were designated.

The church began to expand beyond Cuba in 1950, when two missionaries were commissioned. Arnaldo Socarras pioneered the church in Mexico, and Arturo Rangel Sosa opened work in Panama. Daddy John’s successor, Angel Maria Hernandez y Esperon, placed special emphasis on the expansion of the church and started work in eight additional countries around the Caribbean.

Bishop Arturo Rangel succeeded Hernandez as the third Apostle. He continued the expansion of the church internationally, commissioning the first missionaries to the United States. However, that same year (1966), Rangel, one of the church’s bishops, and an evangelist disappeared. The three have not been heard of since. Eventually, the remaining bishops, Florentino Almeida and Samuel Mendiondo, took control of the church, and in 1969 they moved its headquarters to Miami, Florida.

The Soldiers of the Cross is a Sabbath-keeping Pentecostal church. The Law of God as presented in the Ten Commandments is revered, and the dietary restrictions mentioned in Genesis 7:2 and Leviticus 11 are seen as proper for today. Although their beliefs are largely in line with Pentecostalism, they practice baptism as a first step to salvation, the Lord’s Supper as a commemoration of Christ’s death (as opposed to his resurrection), and foot washing as a sign of humility. They have adopted an apolitical stance in regard to the social order.

The church is led by Archbishops Florentino Almeida and Samuel Mendiondo. The church adopted its present name in 1974 to avoid any confusion between it and Gideons International, the older Bible-distribution ministry. In the 1980s the church had some 1,500 members in the United States, with some 100,000 in 20 countries throughout Latin America, as well as Spain and Germany.

International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches

The International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches is an ecumenical association of churches that trace their beginnings to a Pietist Free church impulse in continental Europe in the 19th century. The earliest phase of this revival can be seen in Switzerland, where Free churches (that is, Protestant but separated from the state church) were formed in Berne, Basel, and Zurich. Progress was slow, as authorities discouraged the movement. However, as early as 1834, there was an attempt to associate with similar churches in France and Northern Italy. In 1910, the Swiss congregations came together as the Union of Free Evangelical Churches in Switzerland. A similar revivalist impulse in Sweden gave birth to the Mission Covenant Church, which, due to the steady immigration of members to the United States, developed a strong branch in North America. Branches also developed in Denmark and Norway.

Throughout Europe, churches that shared the same Pietist approach to the faith and accepted the Bible as their only creed also emerged. During the 20th century, the Mission Covenant Church developed a strong mission program, which included Africa and Latin America. Through the mid-20th century, these mission efforts matured into autonomous churches that retained a close association with their parent body.

Leaders from the various European Free churches began to meet in the 1920s and were in the 1930s joined by Covenant leaders from the United States. Interrupted by World War II, the meetings were picked up after the war, and in 1948, the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches emerged. The federation has held international gatherings as irregular intervals since that time. The Federation now (2009) includes some 33 member churches based in 23 countries around the world.

International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews

For more than a century, Jewish scholars and writers have attempted to articulate a secular ideology compatible with Jewish tradition, but only in the late 20th century did such a perspective give rise to organized structures like those of the various religious groups. In the 1960s, Rabbi Sherwin T. Wine (1928–2007) founded a synagogue in Birmingham (suburban Detroit), Michigan, which affirmed both the congregation's Jewish heritage and the Humanistic philosophy articulated by Wine. He was soon joined by Rabbi

Daniel Friedman of suburban Chicago. They led in the founding of the Society for Humanistic Judaism, which espoused a nontheistic form of Jewish theology.

Wine began a periodical and started to make his case in both Jewish circles and the larger world of Rationalists, atheists, and Humanists. Many ethnic Jews had shed their tradition and identified themselves as atheists and Humanists, and some welcomed the perspective and community offered by the idea of Humanistic Judaism. By 1986, enough international support had manifested that the International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews could be organized. The first president of the new association was Yehuda Bauer, a distinguished scholar at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, and Albert Memmi of the University of Paris (Sorbonne) was named the honorary president.

The Federation supports a perspective that sees Jewish tradition as a human-centered history, culture, civilization, ethical values, and the shared fate of the Jewish people. The secular approach indicates that the Jewish community has both the ability and the responsibility to assume control of Jewish destiny. Affiliated national organizations are found in Israel, the United States, Canada, France, Belgium, Australia, Mexico, Argentina, Uruguay, and the countries of the former Soviet Union.

International Humanist and Ethical Union

The International Humanist and Ethical Union (IHEU) is a global organization uniting Humanists, Rationalists, atheists, secularists, and various nontheistic religionists. It was founded in Amsterdam, Netherlands, in 1952 by representatives from seven organizations. It has grown to include a wide variety of liberal religionists (such as the Unitarian Universalists) as well as both secular and religious Humanists.

The Union was created to offer the public an alternative to religion and to totalitarian political systems. Humanism was seen as a philosophy that centered on respect for human beings as moral and spiritual beings. Its original 1952 statement defined Humanism as a way that was democratic, ethical, and aimed at the maximum possible fulfillment through creative and ethical living. A more considered statement in 1966 spoke of what was termed Ethical Humanism. It projected a primal need to take responsibility for human life in the world. It acknowledged human interdependency and the need for humans to respect one another. Human progress will come as freedom of choice is extended, and justice will come from the acknowledgment of human equality. Their position has been spelled out in the 1988 “Declaration of Interdependence: A Global Ethics.”

To accomplish their goals, Humanists have been involved in numerous activities and take advantage of a variety of means of disseminating their views. They have been particularly active in defending democracy, promoting civil rights, assisting victims of sexual violence, and advocating for those negatively affected by religious intolerance (including opposing female circumcision in some Muslim countries). In different countries, IHEU member organizations have fought for contraception and abortion rights; supported gay/lesbian concerns; provided nonreligious rites of passage for youth; and sponsored alternative counselors for hospitals, prisons, and the armed forces.

The IHEU represents its member organizations at the United Nations (including UNESCO and UNICEF) and the Council of Europe. It was a founding member of the UNESCO NGO Working Group on Science and Ethics. The Union is organized democratically and includes full member and associate member organizations. It also has a place for individuals as member supporters. Its international periodical, the International Humanist, is published in Canada. There are secretariats for Latin America and South Asia and several associated networks built around various issues and concerns. In 2009 the Union reported more than 100 organizations in more than 40 countries as members.

International Lutheran Council

The International Lutheran Council (ILC) is a global association of conservative (confession-oriented) Lutheran bodies that emerged in stages in the years after World War II. Among the factors undergirding the Council was the changed status of many missions founded by the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod that had matured into independent national churches. Moreover, in Europe especially, during the 20th century a variety of churches had come into being that assumed a theological stance similar to that of the Missouri Synod.

The ILC dates its beginning from a meeting of leaders from several confessional Lutheran churches in Uelzen, Germany, in July 1952. Seven years later, a second meeting was held in Oakland, California, specifically around the topic, “The Fellowship between Our Churches.” At the third meeting, in Cambridge, England, the name International Lutheran Theological Conference was adopted for what became a series of similar gatherings that were held through the next three decades. Eventually, attention turned toward working out a formal agreement for communion between the different churches, which was embodied in a constitution that was accepted in 1993. With the adoption of the constitution at a gathering in Antigua, Guatemala, the ILC came into existence. By this time, churches from around the world had joined in the negotiations. The doctrinal basis of their fellowship is the common acceptance of the holy scriptures as the inspired and infallible Word of God and of the Lutheran Confessions contained in the Book of Concord (originally published in 1580) as the true and faithful exposition of the Word of God.

The ILC now functions for communication, fellowship, mutual encouragement, and mutual assistance between the member churches. Although many of the ILC churches began with missionary efforts of the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, some, such as the Evangelical Lutheran Free Church in Denmark and the Confessional Lutheran Church of Finland, arrived at their position independently.

In 2001, the ILC included 30 member churches drawn from 5 continents.

International Meditation Centres

The history of International Meditation Centres begins with the life of the founder, Sayagyi U Ba Khin (1899–1971). He was born in Burma (later Myanmar) in 1899, and he served in the colonial administration of British Burma in the Accountant General’s Office. After independence in 1948 he was made the accountant general. Under Prime Minister U Nu, all government departments were encouraged to form Buddhist associations, and Sayagyi U Ba Khin decided to teach meditation to his office staff.

He had been authorized by two eminent meditation teachers of Myanmar to teach meditation: by his own meditation teacher, Saya Thet Gyi (1873–1945), a disciple of the Ledi Sayadaw (1846–1923) and the Webu Sayadaw (1896–1977), the reputed arhat of Myanmar. After talking to Sayagyi U Ba Khin at length, the Webu Sayadaw told him in 1941, “Great Disciple, you have to share your Dhamma. Give the Dhamma you have to everyone.”

Sayagyi U Ba Khin’s aim was to teach meditation to the staff of his office and to foreigners, as very few monks spoke English then. Being aware of the pressures of urban modern life, he knew that he would have to be able to give students a lasting taste of the dhamma (Buddhist teaching) in a relatively short time. In the Vipassana Research Association, together with his disciples, he developed a technique to teach insight (vipassana) very effectively in 10 days, 2 weekends and the week in between. He taught in the Dhamma Young Chi Pagoda, a pagoda specifically designed by him for meditation.

The first International Meditation Centre (IMC) was established in 1952 in Yangon (Rangoon). It is operated by the Vipassana Association of the Accountant

General’s Office. Sayagyi U Ba Khin held the office of president of the Association and taught meditation at the IMC until his death in 1971, always assisted by Sayamagyi Daw Mya Thwin (b. 1925). Being his senior disciple, she continued teaching at the IMC Yangon after U Ba Khin’s demise, until she and her husband, Sayagyi U Chit Tin, came out of Myanmar in 1978 to teach in other countries. Since then they have established five other International Meditation Centres: United Kingdom in 1979, Western Australia in 1981, the United States (Maryland) in 1988, New South Wales (near Sydney) in 1989, and Austria (in Carinthia) in 1990. All the centers outside Myanmar have regional teachers who conduct courses or assist the senior teachers when they are present. All five centers have Dhamma Young Chi Pagodas, which are replicas of the pagoda at the IMC Yangon. At the IMC Yangon, Sayagyi U Tint Yee (b. 1921), a disciple of U Ba Khin and the present president of the Vipassana Association of the Accountant General’s Office, leads the courses.

All the IMCs in the tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin hold regular 10-day retreats that are frequented by people of all religions. The courses are still taught according to the system established by Sayagyi U Ba Khin. The first five days are dedicated to anapana meditation to develop samadhi (one-pointedness of mind). The remaining time is dedicated to vipassana, or insight.

Sayamagyi Daw Mya Thwin and Sayagyi U Chit Tin regularly organize 10-day ordination courses for their disciples in order to give them the opportunity to ordain as Buddhist bhikkhus (monks) and meditate in robes. They have also led pilgrimages to the sacred Buddhist sites in India, Sri Lanka, and Myanmar.

International New Thought Alliance

The International New Thought Alliance (INTA) is a loosely structured association of New Thought churches, religious institutions, and individuals, which seeks to promote harmony and cooperation within the movement while also increasing awareness of New Thought throughout the world. It publishes a quarterly magazine, New Thought, operates the Addington/INTA Archives and Research Center, and hosts annual congresses in large urban centers in North America, chiefly in the United States. The Alliance's 10-point "Declaration of Principles" is a generic New Thought creed, which stresses traditional themes such as the goodness of God, the divinity of humanity, and the causative nature of consciousness. INTA is organized by districts, of which there are more than 100 worldwide, with slightly more than half being in the United States.

Fully vested membership is open to laypersons as well as clergy. INTA is led by a president and managed by a chief executive officer, in cooperation with an executive board. The president and members of the executive board are elected at annual congresses. Organizationally, INTA is the most open and democratically structured of all major New Thought groups, and its broad and inclusive membership requirements allow for significant diversity among individual participants, all of whom have voting privileges. Institutional membership has stricter guidelines than individual membership, but only slightly so.

INTA traces its origin to a 1914 New Thought conference in London, England. It held its first annual congress in 1915 in San Francisco and was incorporated in 1917 in Washington, D.C. The Alliance's organizational roots can be traced back to the National New Thought Alliance (1907), the New Thought Federation (1904), the first "New Thought Convention" (1899), and perhaps even the International Divine Science Association (1892). Although each of these predecessor organizations sought to unify the disparate groups in the mental healing movement, some with limited success, it was not until the formation of INTA that this goal was realized in such a way as to assure stability and longevity.

Unlike the various sects of New Thought, INTA has no easily identifiable founder. Its emergence as a coherent organization and successful overcoming of early institutional struggles were the result of the efforts of a number of talented leaders, all of whom committed themselves and in some cases the religious communities they had founded to the INTA mission. The list of early supporters reads like a New Thought who's who of the period: Annie Rix Militz (1856–1924), Myrtle (1845–1931) and Charles (1854–1948) Fillmore, Nona Brooks (1861–1945), Albert C. Grier (1864–1941), Thomas Troward (1847–1916), Horatio Dresser (1866–1854), Christian D. Larson (b. 1874), Orison Swett Marden (1850–1924), Elizabeth Towne (1865–1960), and Ella Wheeler Wilcox (1850–1919).

Although these high-profile celebrities were instrumental in giving the fledgling INTA valuable publicity and significant legitimacy as an umbrella organization for the entire New Thought movement, the real key to the Alliance's early success was a layperson and former employee of the U.S. Post Office, James A. Edgerton (1869–1938). Edgerton was the first president of the organization, a post he held from 1915 to 1923 and then again from 1934 to 1937. A skillful executive, diplomat, and bureaucrat, Edgerton left his stamp on the Alliance, which to this day follows the same basic organizational structures he put in place. No other person is as responsible for the establishment and development of INTA. Under his leadership, by 1920, the Alliance counted among its members Miltz's Homes of Truth, Brooks's Divine Science, the Fillmores' Unity, Grier's Church of Truth, and countless numbers of their followers.

Over the years INTA has been largely successful in its role as an umbrella organization for the New Thought movement. It has been particularly fortunate to have had a number of talented presidents, of whom the most important are Raymond Charles Barker (1911–1988), Ervin Seal, Robert H. Bitzer (1896–1994), and Blaine C. Mays. Bitzer and Mays are especially notable for their success in expanding the international outreach of INTA. Together with Edgerton, they are the longest serving presidents of the Alliance, with Mays having served the longest of all: 1974–1996, 1997–2007, and 2008–present.

As with any broad-based ecumenical organization, comprised of diverse and often competing groups, INTA has seen a fair number of controversies. Perhaps the most notable ones occurred in 1922 and 1996. Precipitating causes are difficult to specify in any detail, but both events appear to have been the result of disagreements pertaining to the Alliance's leadership and some of its programs. By comparison, the removal of references to Jesus, Christ, and Jesus Christ, from the group's "Declaration of Principles" in 1954 appears to have caused no adverse reaction. The 1922 event led to the withdrawal of Unity School from the Alliance and the end of Edgerton's long tenure as president the following year. Edgerton returned to the presidency in 1934. The 1996 controversy led to the withdrawal of the leaders of a number of large churches and Mays's defeat in an election by Marguerite Goodall. Mays returned to the presidency in 1997. It is noteworthy that the year following Unity School's withdrawal, it began holding its own annual conventions, and in 1996 a number of the leaders who had withdrawn joined with others to establish what could be seen as a rival organization, the Association for Global New Thought (AGNT).

In the late 1990s INTA membership declined slightly. This may have been the result of several factors: fallout from the 1996 controversy, the rise of AGNT, the growth of another independent organization (Affiliated New Thought Network, established in 1993), as well as further institutional development of the major New Thought churches. As of 2008 membership currently stands at about 1,200, of which 168 are institutional members, representing all branches of the New Thought movement. Notable institutional members include the Association of Unity Churches, Religious Science International, Divine Science Federation International, and United Divine Science Ministries International. INTA has districts in 51 countries and institutional members in 23. As is typical of New Thought groups (aside from Unity's Unity Village complex) there are no shrine centers in INTA, although trips to annual congresses may function as pilgrimages for highly committed members.

International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference

The Old Catholic movement developed in response to changes made in the belief structure of the Roman Catholic Church at the First Vatican Council (1870–1871), the most significant change being the declaration of papal infallibility and the elevation of papal authority it implied. In Munich in 1871, 44 dissenting

Roman Catholic professors, under the leadership of the German Catholic scholars Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890) and Johannes Friedrich, signed a protest against the First Vatican Council's action. Congregations that rejected the pronouncement of the Council began to form, and they, in 1873, organized the Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany with the consecration of Joseph Hubert Reinkens as bishop. He was consecrated at Rotterdam by the bishops of Deventer of the dissenting diocese in Holland, which re-formed as the Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands. Subsequent consecrations were held for the Old Catholic Church of Austria and the Old Catholic Church of Switzerland.

In 1889, the Old Catholic bishops created the Union of Utrecht, and in their initial declaration they complained of a variety of matters in which they felt that Rome had departed from the faith of the primitive church, including the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary and the universal authority of the bishop of Rome. At the same time that they organized the Union, the bishops decided to meet annually in conference to discuss any ongoing issues of importance. That annual conference evolved into the more formally organized International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference. The Conference has been extended to include bishops from the Old Catholic churches in other countries, including France, Yugoslavia, the Czech Republic, Sweden, Slovakia, the United States, and Poland.

The Conference is cooperative with the World Council of Churches, which most Old Catholic churches have joined, and its representatives meet annually with representatives of the other world Christian communions.

International Pentecostal Church of Christ

The International Pentecostal Church of Christ traces its beginning to an early Pentecostal periodical, The Bridegroom's Messenger, started by Gaston B. Cashwell (1860–1916) in 1907 in North Carolina. Cashwell became a singular force in spreading the Pentecostal message throughout the South. Among the people influenced by Cashwell were Hattie Barth and Paul Barth, who in 1907 founded a church in Atlanta. They later opened a Bible school, and their ministry led to the formation of a new association of churches and ministers, the International Pentecostal Assemblies.

At the same time, in 1908, John Stroup, a minister with the Methodist Protestant Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), received the baptism of the Holy Spirit and began to spread the Pentecostal message through Kentucky and Ohio. His work led to the founding of the Pentecostal Church of Christ in 1917, with Stroup as its first bishop. In 1976, the Pentecostal Church of Christ merged with the International Pentecostal Assemblies to create the International Pentecostal Church of Christ.

Although the church has only some 5,000 members in the United States (2009), beginning in the 1930s in Brazil it built an extensive missionary program and has more than 150,000 members in sister churches in Brazil, India, Mexico, French Guinea, Kenya, the Philippines, Vietnam, and Uruguay. These national churches are indigenous and self-governing churches but considered a part of the International Pentecostal Church of Christ. The church maintains Beulah Heights Bible College in Atlanta.

International Pentecostal Holiness Church

One must step back into the 19th century to start the pilgrimage of the denomination known as the International Pentecostal Holiness Church. The story of this church takes in both the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church (FBHC), with origins in Iowa in 1895, and the Pentecostal Holiness Church (PHC) of North Carolina, launched by Ambros Blackman Crumpler (1863–1952).

A call was issued by Benjamin Hardin Irwin (b. 1854) for a general council of his organization to meet July 28 to August 8, 1898, in Anderson, South Carolina. Irwin designated the Anderson meeting the First General Council of the Fire-Baptized Holiness Association. The government was a totally centralized autocracy, with the general overseer chosen for life.

In 1900 the news broke that Irwin had been leading a double life. J. H. King (1869–1946), then ruling elder of Ontario, came to Lincoln for the purpose of assuming the editorship of Live Coals of Fire, Irwin's periodical. King called for a meeting of the general council, which convened in Olmitz, Iowa, June 30 through July 2, 1900. King, at age 31, was chosen as general overseer.

Meanwhile, A. B. Crumpler's desire to preach his view of Holiness again outweighed his desire to stay with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church), so after a successful evangelistic campaign, he issued a call in the early part of 1900 for a meeting in Fayetteville, North Carolina, to organize a new denomination.

Crumpler had learned of the original Pentecostal movement at Azusa Street in Los Angeles from reports by Frank Bartleman in 1906 in James M. Pike's Way of Faith periodical. A North Carolina Holiness preacher in Crumpler's church, Gaston Barnabas Cashwell (1862–1916), traveled to Los Angeles and obtained the Pentecostal experience first hand. The North Carolina revival, which Cashwell initiated upon his return in the first days of 1907, quickly spread in the Southeast, while several holiness leaders and many of their members soon entered the Pentecostal fold.

A climactic battle for the Pentecostal Holiness Church occurred at the 1908 convention, which met in Dunn, North Carolina, on November 26. Crumpler, who had been unanimously re-elected there, finally brought the matter to a head by walking out of the convention. The convention ended with A. H. Butler as the president and the church totally in the hands of the Pentecostal preacher.

On January 30, 1911, in the octagon-shaped Pentecostal Holiness Church building at Falcon, North Carolina, duly elected delegates met for the purpose of effecting a consolidation between the Pentecostal Holiness Church and the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church. Such was accomplished by the close of the following day.

In 1999, the church reported 1,040,400 members and 8,383 churches worldwide of which 184,431 members and 1,771 churches were in the United States. By 2006, U.S. membership had grown to 248,398.

One of its most famous preachers was Oral Roberts (who left to join the United Methodist Church). Another, Bailey Smith, later became head of the Southern Baptist Convention, as did Charles Stanley, who also ranks among the most popular of electronic preachers.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness

The International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) is known popularly as the Hare Krishna movement in America and around the world. Essentially a Hindu missionary movement from India centered on the devotional worship of the dark-skinned god Krishna, ISKCON as a religious institution is entering its fifth decade in America. The Krishna devotional community in India is not only the largest sectarian religious community in India, but also one of its oldest.

The worship of the god Krishna, “the All Attractive Lord” (whose name literally means “black” in Sanskrit), dates back to at least the second century BCE in India, as recorded in the famous scripture the Bhagavad Gita (Song to the Lord). A 10th-century text, the Bhagavata Purana (The Tales of the Lord) established the playful, cowherd god Krishna as one of the most popular divinities in India. The Bengali sage Caitanya (1486–1534), a contemporary of Martin Luther, led a reformation of Krishna worship that included translating scriptures into vernacular languages, instituting public forms of dancing and singing (sankirtana), and inviting women and outcasts into the predominantly male worship circle. It was Caitanya’s evangelical Krishna tradition into which Abhay Charan De (1896–1977) was initiated as the spiritual master (acarya or acharya) called A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada in 1932 in Bengal. Prabhupada brought his deep devotion to Krishna to America on September 17, 1965, when he arrived in New York City penniless and with a suitcase full of his translations of Krishna scriptures.

Prabhupada began his preaching ministry on the Lower East Side of New York City and attracted youth who were drawn to his piety and deep faith and to the intricate philosophy and exuberant rituals of the Hare Krishna tradition. In 1966, he incorporated his new society in New York and named it the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON). As in Bengal, the worship Prabhupada taught to his American devotees was focused on devotion to Krishna through repetitive reciting of the names of Krishna (nama japa), worship in songs and prayers before the images of Krishna and his divine consort Radha (puja), and public dancing and singing to invite others to worship Krishna (sankirtana). Prabhupada’s translations of and commentary on the key Krishna scriptures were distributed as a means of preaching and soliciting for money.

The Hare Krishnas’ saffron robes and colorful saris, Indian chanting, and active proselytizing drew public attention to the group, made them quite visible, and invited criticism and even hostile opposition. Even during Prabhupada’s lifetime, overenthusiastic devotees sometimes engaged in questionable behavior in their fundraising, exuberant proselytizing, and personal lifestyles. Prabhupada died on November 14, 1977. In that same year two Southern California devotees were charged with drug trafficking and a former devotee, Robin George, sued ISKCON after charging it with kidnapping and brainwashing. The California Krishna temples that were involved and ISKCON as an organization were ultimately exonerated from both the drug dealing and kidnapping and brainwashing charges. Nonetheless, certain devotees, including several gurus among the 11 appointed successors to Prabhupada, did act unlawfully or immorally, which fueled public opposition to ISKCON. In the early years after Prabhupada’s death, guru scandals included the ouster of a controversial guru named Hansadutta from the Berkeley Krishna temple and the indictment of a Moundsville, West Virginia, guru named Kirtanananda for trademark infringements and conspiracy to commit murder. Though both of these gurus had been excommunicated from ISKCON before they ran into trouble with the law, the Hare Krishnas were embarrassed by these and other such public exposés of supposed spiritual leaders of the movement. Perhaps the most serious charges leveled at ISKCON had to do with child abuse. Even today, ISKCON is learning more from its adult “children” about why it was not wise for ascetic men and untrained teachers to run crowded Krishna boarding schools.

In spite of the imagined and real scandals that ISKCON endured, the positive dimension of the devotional movement centering on Krishna that Prabhupada preached has allowed ISKCON to persist and mature, not only in the United States but in nations throughout the world. During Prabhupada's lifetime, his movement spread to Canada, England, Europe, Africa, and parts of Asia. By the late 1970s, ISKCON had more than 10,000 devotees living in more than 50 communities in the United States and 60 communities in 45 countries around the world. In addition, there were literally tens of thousands of devotees living beyond the temples themselves as lay adherents. By the turn of the millennium, ISKCON was less temple- and less America-centered. By the year 2000, only 45 temple and farm communities were active in the United States, with approximately 900 devotees living in them, yet these same communities attracted many householder families (grihasthas) and large numbers of Indian immigrants who embraced the Hare Krishna faith that Prabhupada had brought to America 35 years earlier.

Also by the year 2000, ISKCON had 325 communities in 75 countries on every continent. In 2002, ISKCON opened its first accredited center of higher learning, Bhaktivedanta College, which, in partnership with the University of Wales Lampeter, now offers degrees in theology. ISKCON's international Food for Life project distributes millions of free vegetarian meals each year to those in need, especially at their Indian temples. Primary Hare Krishna devotional sites include Bhaktivedanta Manor outside London, the Palace at New Vrindavana in America, an international guesthouse and Vedic-style temple in Vrindavana, India, and a large devotional center in Mayapura, India. In 1998, while inaugurating a large new Krishna temple in New Delhi, India's prime minister, Atal Bihari Vajpayee, praised ISKCON for its success in the "globalization of the message of the Bhagavad Gita." Although some view ISKCON as simply an American religious cult, it can better be understood as a Hindu missionary movement promoting devotion to the Indian god Krishna, a movement that continues to gain popularity around the world even as its American membership base remains vital and stable.

Following Prabhupada's death, authority in ISKCON passed to the Governing Body Commission (GBC), composed of several initiating gurus and other senior devotees. Over the years the authority structure has become ever more decentralized, but the GBC still provides guidance internationally. The GBC may be contacted through the GBC Journal, PO Box 1119, Alachua, FL 32616, or through Secretary, Governing Body Commission, PO Box 16146, Circus Avenue office, Calcutta 700 017, India. Information is available from the ISKCON Communication Office, 10310 Oaklyn Dr., Potomac, MD 20854, and at ic@pamho.net, or through the society's publishing house, the Bhaktivedanta Book Trust at www.krishna.com.

International Sufi Movement, The

The International Sufi movement, a representative of Chisti Sufism, emerged following the death of India-born Hazrat Inayat Khan (1892–1927), who had founded the Sufi Order in the United States in 1910. Khan initiated a woman, Rabia Martin, and designated her as his successor. His choice was, however, rejected by Khan's family and his growing European following. Khan died at a relatively young age and had not written a will. Seizing upon this circumstance (and the fact that his son/successor was still a minor), the European members rejected Martin's leadership and organized the Sufi movement. They chose Maheboob Khan (1887–1948), Inayat's brother, as their new leader. He would be succeeded in 1948 by a cousin, Mohammad Ali Khan (1881–1958), Musharaff Khan (1895–1967), and Fazal Inayat Khan (1942–1990). Fazal resigned leadership in 1982.

After Fazal Khan's resignation, a collective leadership tried to assume control, but it soon met with dissent so deep as to split the movement. Hidayat Inayat Khan (b. 1917) soon emerged as the leader of the largest part of the Sufi movement. He shared leadership with Murshida Shahzadi. Hidayat, one of the sons of Hazrat Inayat, finally became the sole leader of the movement in 1993.

Hidayat Inayat Khan was only 10 years old when his father passed away in 1927. From his father he inherited a love of music. He studied at L'Ecole Normale de Musique and eventually became a professor in the Music School of Dieulefit, Drome, France, and conducted an orchestra in Haarlem, Holland. He wrote numerous compositions, including both secular music and a collection of Sufi hymns, and was a founding member of the European Composers' Union.

The Sufi movement resembles the Sufi Order International, headed for many years by Hazrat Inayat's elder son, Vilayat Inayat Khan (1916–2004), and is organized in five divisions to focus on universal worship, community, healing, symbology, and esoteric activity. The movement has spread across Europe to Canada and the United States. Members meet weekly for dhikr (worship) and classes.

International Yoga Fellowship Movement

The International Yoga Fellowship movement continues the work of Swami Satyananda Saraswati (b. 1923), one of the many disciples of Swami Sivananda Saraswati (1887–1863), the founder of the Divine Life Society. He lived with Sivananda at Rishikesh for 12 years beginning in 1943, but then, like other disciples, he left the Society to found his own independent work, the International Yoga Fellowship in 1956 and the Bihar School of Yoga, which opened in 1964.

Satyananda continued Sivananda's integral yoga format, based on the practice of hatha yoga exercises, but also integrating the additional approaches of karma, jnana, bhakti, and raja yoga. In 1968 he made a world tour, which first introduced his teachings to the world outside of India, and in the 1980s he wrote a number of popular books. Through these books, he became known as not only a teacher of integral yoga but an exponent of Tantric yoga. Tantra proposes the existence of a subtle human energy body that parallels the physical body. The subtle body explains the existence of psychic and spiritual experiences, and its cultivation and training is essential to the development of an enlightened state. Part of that process is the practice of kundalini yoga that activates the latent power believed by Tantric practitioners to reside at the base of the spine.

In the case of left-hand Tantra, as taught by Swami Satyananda, it also includes the use of sex to blend male and female energies and consciousness.

The International Yoga Fellowship movement spread in the 1960s by two routes. First, Indian disciples of Satyananda were among the many Indian nationals who migrated to Australia, North America, and Europe, and they have established centers primarily attended by Indian expatriates residing in the West. Many national organizations affiliated to the movement were formed by Swami Niranjannan Saraswati (b. 1960) including Satyananda Ashrams, U.S.A., in 1980.

Also, many Westerners have been attracted to the teachings of Satyananda, and they have been active in spreading his teachings among Western disciples. Australian yoga teacher John Mumford was initiated by Satyananda in 1973 and two years later authored Sexual Occultism, one of the first books offering details of the heretofore secret Tantric practices to the general public. Meanwhile, a Danish student who met Satyananda on his 1968 world tour moved to India with him and in 1970 returned to Denmark as Swami Janakananda Saraswati (b. 1939). He founded the Scandinavian Yoga and Meditation School in Copenhagen and in 1975 authored a second book detailing Satyananda's Tantric teachings.

The International Yoga Fellowship Movement has an Internet site at the address given below that includes links to its many centers around the world. In the 1990s, one of Satyananda's disciples, Paramahansa Niranjanananda, founded Bihar Yoga Bharati as an academic center to supply the higher educational needs of the movement. Movement centers are now found on every continent, and in Europe the centers have organized the European Yoga Fellowship.

International Zen Association

The International Zen Association (IZA, also known as the Association Zen Internationale [AZI]) was founded by the Japanese Zen Buddhist priest Taisen Deshimaru (1914–1982) in 1970 as an organization to support his mission in Europe. It is now an umbrella organization of nonprofit associations that links 8 temples (residences of a teacher sanctioned by the Japanese soto school) and 65 urban centers (called dojo in the group) devoted to the practice of seated meditation (zazen) that all belong to the Deshimaru's lineage in the Japanese soto tradition. When including smaller or more recent centers (designated as “groups”), the IZA claims a presence in 13 countries and more than 200 practice centers worldwide. Few of those are located outside Europe and the headquarters are in Paris, which makes it a strongly European organization, as was once indicated by its former name, the Association Zen d'Europe. The oldest and biggest centers are in France, Germany, Switzerland, United Kingdom, Belgium, and Spain. Although the active membership in the IZA is around 2,000 individuals, the audience and network of sympathizers of the movement is much larger. According to some members of the group, more than 15,000 persons have participated over time in its conferences, daily meditations, day-long intensive practice periods, or retreats.

Taisen Deshimaru arrived in France in 1967, shortly after receiving the priest ordination from one of the most respected Soto Zen priests in Japan, Kodo Sawaki (1880–1965). A former business executive, he came at the invitation of a visiting group of French members of the macrobiotic movement. As baby boomers started seeking Eastern masters in the late 1960s, Deshimaru Roshi's Parisian dojo became the basis of a rapidly expanding organization. The master's emphasis on practice rather than rituals or intellectual conceptions, his direct personality, and his provocative teachings (for example, urging his students to reconcile Eastern and Western philosophies through zazen) attracted many European disciples. The IZA claimed 25 centers in 1972, and by 1982, more than 53. A property was acquired in 1979, becoming the organization's temple of La Gendronnière (Loire-et-Cher, France). As confirmed by the 40th anniversary of his mission in the temple of La Gendronniere in 2007 and stated by the international website of the soto school, Sawaki's “last disciple”—as Deshimaru called himself in a book of tributes to his master—initiated the presence of that school in Europe, becoming in that process the patriarch of European soto Zen.

In his Autobiography of a Zen Monk, Deshimaru Roshi explained that his master's last instructions were to bring “the seed of Zen” to the West, since Zen was weakening in Japan and Asia in general. Deshimaru Roshi's agenda was to first transplant the Zen teachings in the West, then use those missions as a basis for reforming the institutions at home. Himself a lay practitioner for most of his training years, he gave priest ordinations (called “monks” and “nuns” in the group), interpreted as commitment to practice zazen in an otherwise lay life. In this regard, both his critical stance toward Buddhism in Japan and the lay practice pattern are very much in line with what can be observed among American Zen teachers. In the IZA groups, some rituals of Japanese Soto Zen were simplified by Taisen Deshimaru Roshi. In recent years, some of his former disciples have established non-urban dwellings with a small number of full time residents, a development that has been parallel to renewed ties with Japan, the re-establishment of the Soto Zen Buddhism Europe Office in June 2002 and the adoption by some members of the group of rituals closer to the Japanese forms.

Deshimaru introduced to his students the Soto Zen teaching of “just sitting” (shikantaza) and insisted that Zen is simply the practice of zazen, sitting cross-legged and observing one’s mind and breathing, without trying to gain anything. He emphasized the practice of zazen and retreat periods where one could live, work, and practice with others. He tirelessly taught this practice, stating that his disciples would contribute to resolving what he saw as civilization’s crisis, born of contradictions between intuition and rationality, science and religion.

The unexpected death of the charismatic founder sparked a crisis of succession. Some of his disciples left the organization, later receiving authorization to teach from other masters and founding their own organizations. Others stayed on, vowing to “carry on together the mission of their late teacher.” They have been establishing their own temples and centers in recent years and some of them received transmission certificates from Japanese masters after the death of their master. Thus, for example, one of the closest disciples of Deshimaru, Stéphane Kosen Thibault, has founded a network of groups that does not belong to the IZA, but clearly relates itself to Deshimaru’s teachings (<http://www.zen-deshimaru.com>).

As the teachers of IZA now come of age as leaders and define their own teaching styles, reaching out to a new generation, it seems likely that they will also have to define, both collectively and individually, the future of their “Japanese connection.” This is currently debated within the group. Some members hold cautious, if not somewhat negative views of maintaining close ties with Japan, while others believe that a dialogue with Japan is to be encouraged and will prove beneficial to the organization.

Internet and Religion

For most people in the developed (and increasingly in the developing) world, the Internet is virtually unavoidable. In less than two decades the World Wide Web has gone from a technological curiosity to an inescapable fact of life for hundreds of millions of people. As the technology of computer-mediated communication continues to miniaturize, loading more and more features into smaller and smaller packages, as its social penetration deepens and more people have more and easier Internet access, and as social institutions seek to go “paperless” and administer an increasing variety of tasks electronically, the Internet will only increase in importance even as it increases in social transparency. That is, as more and more our lives are connected to the Net, those connections will seem to us less and less remarkable. Like telephones and toasters, computers and the world of electronic communication have become part of the furniture that structures daily life. Smartphone technology such as the Apple Iphone or RIM’s Blackberry packs far more computing power in the palm of one’s hand than was offered by all but the most powerful consumer desktops

Robert Thibadeau shows an image of the “Houses of Worship” website on his laptop computer while standing in front of St. Paul’s Cathedral in Pittsburgh, October 10, 1997. Thibadeau hopes to connect as many of the world’s Christian churches as he can through this project. (AP/Wide world Photos)

just a few years ago. In many social and professional situations devices such as these are ubiquitous and not having an iPhone or a Blackberry is more noteworthy than having one. Indeed, talking on, texting, or emailing on handheld devices has become so common (and dangerous) in recent years that many jurisdictions have passed laws prohibiting their use in motor vehicles.

As it has with most (arguably all) advances in communications technology, from cave painting and campfire stories to television broadcasting and wireless communication, religion occupies a significant place in cyberspace. Just 20 years ago, when popularly available computer-mediated communication was in its technological infancy, computer literate religious believers discussed their faith, shared their concerns, and laid the foundation for an online community largely through dedicated bulletin board services. Primitive and painfully slow by comparison with even the most basic Internet service package today, these systems transmitted text only, perhaps with the occasional picture (which took a long time to download and even then required a special program to view). These are, however, the computer-mediated antecedents of dedicated discussion platforms such as Yahoo! and MSN Groups, social networking programs such as Facebook, MySpace, and Twitter, and visual media sharing sites such as YouTube, Flickr, and Photobucket. Now, in addition to a website, for many religious congregations around the world online information sharing—a Facebook group for the annual youth rally or dedicated to a special campaign, for example—is becoming more and more common. Religious leaders regularly post their messages online, in both text and video format, while congregants Twitter each other about the sermon—often while the pastor is actually speaking from the pulpit. In an effort to attract members of a younger, more technologically confident generation, religious organizations ranging from the United Church of Canada to the Church of Scientology have spent millions of dollars developing sophisticated websites that allow for services ranging from email hosting to chatrooms, and from online religious discussion and video teaching to computer-mediated prayer and meditation. From succinct “prayerful thoughts for the day” to rambling rants about current events and biblical prophecy, video clips recorded through onboard cameras are regularly uploaded to YouTube accounts by a wide range of Internet users. Often generating both text and video responses, these kinds of interaction are evolving into a new order of religious discourse unimaginable only a generation ago.

Contrary to much of the commercial and enthusiast hyperbole about the social prominence of the World Wide Web, however, it is unlikely that online versions of religious practice will significantly displace their offline counterparts, or that they will remain anything other than adjuncts of convenience for those with access to the technology. That is, they add to the experience of offline religious belief and practice, but do not (at least so far as we can determine at this point) replace it. That said, though, computer mediation is affecting religious belief and practice in some significant ways, if for no other reason than that how we do something inevitably impacts what we are doing. Many people, for example, use the Internet as a relatively risk-free means of exploring, or “trying on,” different religious identities, especially identities that are unavailable to them offline, either through geographical isolation or social opprobrium. Young people interested in aspects of modern Paganism, for example, often turn to the World Wide Web in search of initial contact and basic information. Although those who choose to explore a Pagan path more intentionally rarely limit their practice to the online environment, it is not insignificant that the Web provides them a starting point that was unavailable a relatively few years ago. On the other hand, the essential anonymity of Web-based interaction also allows for the online performance of virtuosity, with a wide variety of men and women claiming religious status in the so-called virtual world that, in many cases, would hardly be accorded them in real life.

When discussing religion and computer-mediated communication, two preliminary conceptual distinctions are necessary: the categories of online activity and the relationships that exist between human religious belief and practice, and the Internet as a social technology.

First, there is the basic spectrum of online activity. Originally proposed as a dyad between religion online and online religion, but quickly recognized as a continuum of computer-mediated activity, this is the preliminary distinction between use of the Internet to communicate information about one’s religion (that is, religion online) and as a vehicle to practice aspects of one’s religion (that is, online religion). Posting information about a prayer meeting on one’s church website or uploading the price list for various puja constitute the former, while convening a Facebook group or chatroom session to which members contribute prayers online or designing an interactive puja website are examples of the latter. Obviously, these are not discrete categories and there is often significant crossover between them. In many cases, believers regard religious education, for example, as part of their religious practice. Taking an online course in the letters of Paul can be seen as a kind of devotional activity, something that informs and influences who they are as religious believers. Posting inspirational messages to a variety of discussion forums can be understood as contributing to the spiritual activities of one’s co-religionists. This is not to say that all believers agree on the content or purpose of a particular online activity any more than they agree about all aspects of offline practice. They don’t. Although many Roman Catholics, for example, suggest that online adoration of the Blessed Host carries the same spiritual value as ritual adoration in person, others vehemently disagree, arguing that only in the actual presence of the Host is the grace of God mediated and anything else is tantamount to heresy. It is important to remember that in the vast majority of cases online religious activity is a reflection (or refraction) of offline behavior and practice; it is not sui generis. Although some groups claim to be purely online religion, none (to this point, at least) has lived up to this contention.

Second, there are the practical and analytic relationships inherent in the words “on” and “and.” That is, what is the difference between “religion on the Internet” and “religion and the Internet”? While this may seem a trivial distinction, it raises important issues for the scholarly study of religion in the context of computer-mediated communication. “Religion on the Internet” is that spectrum of online activity just discussed. That is, how are religious people using the World Wide Web to further their religious agendas, deepen their spiritual lives, and attract fellow travelers either on or to their particular path? Religion and the Internet, on the other hand, implicates both the ways in which the World Wide Web can be used to research religion and the manner in which computer-mediated communication is affecting religious belief and practice.

Few researchers would deny the convenience of electronic access to library catalogues, full-text runs of academic journals, popular magazines, newspapers, and religious publications, or the opportunity to view YouTube clips of research subjects. In this sense, the World Wide Web is an incredible boon to religious studies. There is also no doubt that the Internet dramatically increases the ability of scholars from around the world to collaborate on common research problems and electronic communication has in many ways streamlined the scholarly publication process. The vast amount of material vying for an Internet user's attention, however, along with the drastic difference in quality of information and the increasing popularity of online reference sources such as Wikipedia and its many versions and imitators, creates a data pool that is outside the normal scholarly review process and requires careful attention on the part of researchers. Put simply, there is a tremendous amount of erroneous information available online. Similarly, many scholars regard the advent of online peer-reviewed academic journals as a threat to the intellectual rigor of scholarly debate and discussion. With so many more venues for publication, they argue, how can the common denominator of peer-reviewed publication not decrease?

Religious studies research carried out online has its own benefits and problems. Although the ability to upload a survey and then access the data through a dedicated website undoubtedly makes the research process easier, it is limited to that portion of the population who use the Internet. Thus, given the various "digital divides"—regional, economic, racial, and age-based—unless they are specifically intended to research questions related to computer-mediated communication, online surveys provide a very narrow window into religious belief and practice. Industry and enthusiast hyperbole notwithstanding, and despite the increase of social penetration in developing areas of the world, far more people around the world go through their lives without regular Internet access than with it. Although computer-mediated communication can bring researchers in contact with a far broader range of believers than was possible through other means, the potential for conversion in online research raises the obvious ethical question of disclosure and the protection of research subjects. Since it is possible to hide one's identity as a researcher and join any number of online groups either by pretending to be something one is not (a member of that religion, for example) or simply by failing to disclose one's research agenda, the ability of research subjects to participate with full and informed consent is compromised.

One of the most interesting problems facing researchers of religion and cyberspace is the issue of social transparency. That is, as this technology becomes less socially remarkable, questions related to Internet effect on religious belief and practice become more difficult both to frame and to investigate. For many of those who first researched religion on the Internet, computer-mediated communication was a novelty. There was an obvious difference in the manner and content of communication. Written correspondence, for example, has a very different character and social life than email. The latter is often considerably shorter, occurs at a much higher turn-taking speed, employs an entirely different set of communicative conventions, and is ephemeral in the extreme—once read, the email is often deleted. Twenty years later, however, an entire generation of young people has had Internet access since grade school (if not kindergarten) and may never have handwritten a letter in their lives. Communicating by email, text or instant messaging, and social networking platforms such as Facebook and Twitter are as natural to them as using an ordinary telephone—in some cases moreso. For them, this is not a "different" technology. Investigating these advances in technology, usage, and social transparency will require a more longitudinal research approach, one that considers not just how a particular group is using computer-mediated communication, but how that usage has evolved over time and in response to technological change.

Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace

The Inter-Religious Federation for World Peace (IRFWP) is one of several international interfaith organizations that has been inspired by and is largely supported by the Unification movement, headed by Korean teacher Reverend Sun Myung Moon. The roots of the organization can be traced to a proposal put forth in the mid-1970s by Warren Lewis, a professor at the Unification Theological Seminary, that a centennial celebration of the 1893 World's Parliament of Religions be held in 1993. He received some initial backing and organized several exploratory conferences in the late 1970s that led to the founding of the Global Congress of the World's Religions in 1980.

The Global Congress held several meetings in the early 1980s that gave rise to two structures, the Council of the World's Religions, which sponsored interfaith meetings in locations around the world, and the Assembly of the World's Religions, a large interfaith gathering that convened every few years. Assembly meetings were held in New Jersey in 1985 and San Francisco in 1990. At the 1990 meeting, Rev. Moon announced the organization of the Inter-Religious Federation, which would supersede the Global Congress. This move was in line with other changes in the Unification movement, which was being reorganized into a set of peace federations.

The Inter-Religious Federation was formally created in 1991. While continuing the Global Congress, it also assumed the role of several other Unification structures, including the International Religious Foundation and the New Ecumenical Research Association. IRFWP seeks to bring the resources of the world's religions to bear on the primary goal of world peace. Peace is understood in all its facets as peace within the self and family units, peace within societies and between nations, peace within religions and between religious traditions, peace within and between cultures, and peace between the human and natural worlds.

The Federation is headed by a presiding council, which is assisted by a large board of advisors made up of a spectrum of religious leaders and scholars. There is an administrative staff who manages the IRFWP's programs on a day-to-day basis.

As of 2009, IRFWP reported active representatives in 192 countries. Among its major projects is Religious Youth Service, which brings youth of different faith backgrounds together to work on social service projects. The Federation also publishes a scholarly journal, Dialogue to Alliance.

■ Iran

Iran is the largest nation in central Eurasia and among the largest in southwestern Asia (aka Middle East) with a population just over 70 million and a physical size about the same as the state of Alaska. It is sandwiched between the Caspian Sea to the north and the Persian Gulf to the south with Iraq and Afghanistan dominating its western and eastern borders, respectively. The capital of Teheran is central to Iran's identity as a Persian state. Skirting the high and dry plateau of Iran are many of the other cities that gave birth to ancient Persian civilization, as well as becoming historic centers of religious thought and innovation. Moreover, numerous expansions and contractions of Persian political control in the region have resulted in a contemporary modern nation dominated by Islam (98 percent) but with an unexpected degree of ethno-religious diversity in the remaining, albeit tiny, section of the population. Religious minorities in Iran include Zoroastrians, Jews, Christians, and Baha'i adherents.

Zoroastrianism The first documented religious tradition in Iran rose in conjunction with its earliest civilization about 3,500 years ago, and it flourished as the state religion of three pre-Islamic empires. Zoroastrianism is named for its founding prophet, Zarathustra (often known as Zoroaster), who probably lived in what is now eastern or northeastern Iran between the 15th and 17th centuries BCE. Poised midway between the great Mesopotamian civilizations to the west and the magnificent Indus Valley civilization to the east, Persia's early civilization and the religion created by its prophet shared with them similar ceremonial practices and conceptions of the divine and the nature of the universe, while simultaneously producing a particularly Persian point of view.

Although ritual practice (with an official priesthood called magi) and philosophical interpretations changed over the course of three millennia, and pre-Zoroastrian elements were incorporated into its canon, Zoroastrianism continues to depend on the teachings of Zarathustra for inspiration—particularly through the Avesta, or holy book, of which only a quarter is extant. An emphasis on personal responsibility and growth as a spiritual being, and a reverence for the good will of the divine in our material existence characterize the Zoroastrian perspective.

The Zoroastrian worshipping community has faced dramatic changes in its political position over the centuries. Receiving the patronage of kings previous to the introduction of Islam in the seventh century, Zoroastrians periodically wielded much influence in a region extending from Greece to northern India (an influence seen, for example, in concepts of resurrection, the heaven/hell dichotomy, and savior imagery). Eventually, Zoroastrianism became a minority religion in the land of its birth, and those who persistently practiced it left the great cities for the southern provinces of Kerman and Yazd. By the 10th century some Zoroastrians found it too difficult to remain in Persia and migrated to the region of Gujarat in western India, where they became known as Parsis (meaning people from Pars, or Persia). Today, Parsis are a small but economically important religious minority found in India's western cities. Back in Persia, a dwindling Zoroastrian community courageously survived invasions by the Seljuk Turks and Mongols (who were eventually converted to Islam), punishing taxes (jizya), and humiliating rules of public social interaction with the dominant group (najes, or ritual uncleanness) by insulating themselves in rural and small-town settlements away from centers of political and economic power.

As the 20th century approached, the plight of Zoroastrians eased, as the jizya was revoked and educational opportunities improved. Eventually, during Pahlavi rule in the 20th century, Zoroastrians were recognized as descendants of an original, glorious Persian civilization, and iconic elements of their faith were made into nationalist symbols, including the new name of the modern nation, Iran, which was taken from a passage in the Avesta. Zoroastrians began to move back to the cities and are now protected under Iran's Constitution with guaranteed parliamentary representation. In the aftermath of Iran's revolution in 1979, many Zoroastrians feared a return to oppressive conditions, and some migrated to Western nations in the early 1980s. When religious oppression did not materialize as expected, emigration eased, and the community experienced numerical growth, despite a rapid decline in the overall numbers of minority religious adherents between 1976 and 1996. Today, although Zoroastrians do not enjoy the patronage of the Iranian government and are subject to laws that restrict control over education and other social institutions, they have not suffered political or economic oppression beyond that experienced by citizens in general. Approximately 150,000 Zoroastrian adherents exist worldwide, with the largest concentrations in India, Pakistan, and Iran. The 2006 census of Iran reported 35,000 self-identified Zoroastrians, though this number may be low, as intermarriage with Muslims is common.

Islam The seventh century CE proved to be a momentous time in Iranian history. The great Sassanid dynasty faced a major defeat in the Battle of Nihavend in 642 against Arab invaders, and their empire collapsed with the flight and murder of their last king, Yazdegird III, in 652. Incipient application of Islamic law and conversion to the faith was gradual in the first few centuries, but Islam eventually became the dominant and even imposed faith system for the majority of people by the time of invasions by Seljuk Turks and Mongols (who came to be known as the Mughals) in the 11th and 12th centuries. Through this period, and until the Safavid dynasty rose to power at the beginning of the 16th century, Sunni traditions prevailed in Persia.

Unorthodox movements arising out of Shia predispositions, held by groups such as the Ismailis and the Sufis, were flourishing in Iran as early as the 10th and 11th centuries. The Ismailis, some of whom continue to live in northeastern Iran, trace their origins to the lineage of Ismail (d. 760), the son of the sixth imam (revered as descended from Ali, son-in-law of the Prophet Muhammad). Ismail, who predeceased his father, is considered the seventh imam (hence the designation of Ismailis as Seveners) and the originator of a new lineage of imams (which later passed through another contested imam named Nizar). The Mongol invaders destroyed their religious center in the Alborz Mountains, causing Ismailis to flee the region. In 1840, the Nizari Ismaili leader, the Aga Khan, fled to British India, where he was successful in expanding the worshipping community. Today the majority of Nizari Ismailis, numbering several million, live outside of Iran.

Persia was the site where some of the first of the mystically oriented Sufi brotherhoods formed, several of which, such as the Qadiriyya, the Suhrawardi, and the Rifaiyya, not only spread through the region but over the centuries developed followings throughout the larger Muslim world. At the same time, the Sufi tradition contributed to the rise of a particularly Persian form of Shia Islam. The Sufis have historically been a brotherhood (and sisterhood) of mystical Shiite Muslims who eschew materialism and focus upon an ascetic and ecstatic form of spiritual expression and growth. Shah

Ismail, the founder of the Safavid dynasty, was a Sufi master who established a Sufi-inspired form of Shia as the state religion of Iran when he became king in 1501. More important, though, Shah Ismail conflated his political leadership with spiritual leadership. His followers, who were predominantly Turkic in origin, venerated him as both the murshid-kamil (the perfect guide) as well as an emanation of Allah himself. Eventually the majority of the Turkic and Persian populations were integrated through the persistent and forceful application of Safavid rule and religious leadership.

During the two and a half centuries of Safavid rule, Sufi groups were targeted as heretical, despite their role in the creation of the state religion. The Shiite leadership (called Ithna Ashariyya, or the Twelvers) have a special devotion to the 12 imams (Ali and his 11 successors) as intercessors between the believers and Allah. The 12 imams are Ali, al-Hasan, al-Husain, Ali Zayn, al-Abidin, Muhammad al-Baqir, Ja'far al-Sadiq, Musa al-Kazim, Ali al-Rida, Muhammad al-Taqi, Ali al-Naqi, al-Hasan al-Askari, and Ali ibn Muhammad Simmari. The imams are believed to have been chosen by Allah to direct destiny and guide believers in their earthly existence; thus, special prayers are offered to them and pilgrimage is made to their tombs.

The last, or 12th, imam is especially important (hence the designation as Twelvers) as he acquired the imamate at the age of five, and his caregivers kept him in perpetual hiding (well into adulthood) due to the fear of an assassination. This seclusion became institutionalized as the ghaiba, or lesser occultation. Twelvers believe he never died but simply disappeared from Earth around 939. Popularly known as al-Mahdi (the Guided One or the Hidden Imam), he will, it is believed, return to a debilitated Earth heralding justice and peace and preside over the Day of Judgment.

This state-sponsored form of Shia Islam continues to be the dominant sect of Islam in Iran today. An attempt was made to separate political and clerical leadership in the 20th century, but the effort came to an end in the 1979 Iranian Revolution. The Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), leader of that revolution, promoted the doctrine of velayat-e faqih, or political guardianship of the community of believers by religious and legal scholars. This created a theocracy in contemporary Iran not even achieved by the Safavids.

Besides the Ismailis and Sufis, other groups of questionable orthodoxy—from the contemporary perspective of Sunni and Shia leadership—include the Ahl-e Haqq, who are concentrated around Lorestan and whose practices also have origins in a medieval Sufi order. Innovation of interpretation and praxis continues to this day.

Iranian innovation in religious philosophy has also produced one of the world's newest global faiths. The Baha'i Faith is a religion that enjoins its followers to recognize a transcendent and unknowable God through that God's multiple manifestations over the millennia (Zarathustra, Abraham, Moses, Gautama Buddha, Jesus, Muhammad, the Bab, and Baha'u'llah). Baha'u'llah (1817–1892), the name taken by Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri, which means “the Glory of God,” came from a wealthy family in northern Iran and is the founder of this faith (1860s). He was originally a Babi, or one who followed the Bab, and he based his teachings on his own revelations as well as those of the Bab. The Bab (the Gate) was originally a merchant from southern Iran named Sayyid Ali Muhammad Shirazi (1819–1850), who claimed to have had visions in 1844 of the al-Mahdi (Hidden Imam). Later he claimed to be the 12th imam himself, with new revelations from Allah. His teachings were well received among the common folk across Iran, thus drawing the attention of orthodox religious leaders. Becoming more militant as a result of increasing persecution, Babis (his followers) took on the role of martyrs, as the Bab himself was imprisoned and fighting broke out in 1848. Eventually the Bab was executed by the government in 1850.

As a Babi, Baha'u'llah was imprisoned in Teheran in 1852, and in prison he claimed he had had his own revelatory visions. He was then exiled to Ottoman Iraq, where he lived the life of an ascetic in Kurdistan. By 1856 he returned to Iran, where he led a revival of Babism that morphed into the foundational philosophy of the Baha'i Faith. At first there was contention within the community concerning Baha'u'llah's claims and teachings, but by the 1870s most Babis became Baha'i.

The revival of what orthodox religious leaders saw as a heretical sect (whether in its original or new form) caused a renewal of persecutions, an increased militancy among Baha'is in their resistance and proselytizing activities, and their dispersal to other countries as early as the 1890s. Baha'u'llah himself lived in exile in Ottoman Turkey (Edirne, or Adrianople) and Syria (Akka, or Acre), where he wrote many of the treatises associated with Baha'i philosophical and ethical doctrine, while his son and grandson took over organizational duties.

Baha'i adherents in Iran have faced official persecution since the inception of their movement, with only a brief respite during the second Pahlavi regime (1941–1979). Currently about 6 million Baha'i followers can be found in more than 200 nations, while approximately 350,000 (this is a rough estimate) live in the land of its birth. Baha'i do not have constitutional protection, nor are they enumerated separately in the census. Some Baha'i in Iran are not likely to claim membership due to official discrimination in education and employment. The majority of Baha'i in Iran are ethnic Persians; thus, they are assimilated into all other social and cultural aspects of the dominant group.

According to the 2006 census of Iran, approximately 89 percent of Iran's people adhere to Shiite beliefs and practices in one form or another, while another 9 percent adhere to Sunni beliefs and practices. Sunni groups are primarily associated with a number of ethnic minorities that live in peripheral regions of Iran (for example, Azari Turks, Arabs, Kurds, Turkomen, Baluchis, Qashqais, Bakhtiari). In addition to ethnic Sunni communities, Iran is home to a number of other religious minorities, which include Jewish and Christian communities.

Judaism The Jewish community has been a part of Persian society for at least 2,500 years. When Babylonia fell to Cyrus the Great, he freed the Jews who had been in captivity there and allowed their return to Jerusalem. Some Jews remained in the Persian Empire, slowly moving eastward over the centuries, and gradually becoming culturally assimilated until they became ethnically indistinguishable from the Persian majority. Since the advent of Islam in Iran their circumstances have risen and fallen with the whims and attitudes of specific rulers. Despite their status as dhimmi, or people of the book (that is, people who follow what is regarded as holy scripture), Persian Jews in particular suffered harshly under the practice of najes (ritual uncleanliness) and were often relegated to occupations already considered lowly (for example, peddlers, dyers, weavers, entertainers) by the dominant political group. By the middle of the 19th century, Jews in Iran often lived in poverty in separate quarters (ghettoes) of the larger cities, they were subject to a poll tax, and they have most recently suffered a series of expulsions, forced conversions, and pogroms. When the Persian king, Naser al-Din Shah Qajar, visited Europe in 1848, European Jews brought to his attention the dire poverty and oppression Persian Jews suffered. The result of their entreaties was permission to provide financial help and lobbying for better treatment. This then led to the opening of the first modern Jewish schools.

Due in part to their new contact with Western Jews, Persian Jews began to migrate to Palestine by the late 19th century—a steady migration that has continued ever since. Under the second Pahlavi regime (1941–1979), they gained official political representation for the first time. The 1979 Revolution ended official Iran-Israeli cooperation, thus placing Persian Jews in a precarious political position. However, many Persian Jews had supported the Revolution, and the Islamic Republic Constitution recognized them as members of the Iranian nation with equal rights and responsibilities. Despite Jews being entitled to elect a deputy to represent them in Parliament, fears related to their perceived or real political relationship with Israel caused some Jews to suffer harassment, imprisonment, loss of property, and even death. Some individuals continue to be charged with being Zionist spies, although a recent (2000) court decision in Shiraz, in response to international pressure, reduced the sentences of 10 Jewish men convicted of spying for Israel.

The Israeli government was concerned and frustrated about the fate of Iran's Jews until Iraq invaded Iran in 1980. Iran felt vulnerable because of Western sanctions against it, which meant that it was forced to fight an international war without access to military hardware and badly needed parts. Under these circumstances an implicit agreement was made between Israel and the Islamic Republic: in exchange for spare parts, Persian Jews would be allowed to leave Iran. As many as 55,000 Jews have been allowed to leave since the Revolution.

As the new century begins, and although the Jewish population has declined significantly, Iran continues to be a home to more Jews than any other Muslim state. Many who left the country did so as much for economic reasons, such as high unemployment, high inflation, and social limitations, as they did for political reasons—all of which were causes of the emigration of Muslim Iranians as well. North America and Israel are major destinations for most of Iran's Jewish emigrants. According to human rights activists, Iranian Jews are no longer persecuted because of their religion, and attendance at synagogues and Jewish functions has been higher than at any time before the Revolution. The Jew ish community itself sees its problems as stemming more from their political and economic relationship to the state. They hope that the new elections in 2009 will improve the overall national social and economic situations and help them to resolve specific problems, such as having school on Saturdays, the Jewish Sabbath. Primarily living in large urban areas, Jews now number only half as many as before the Revolution.

Christianity Christian communities in Iran also have a long history and tend to be associated with specific ethnic groups. Armenians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans are officially recognized as religious minorities by the revolutionary Constitution, and they have had a Christian presence in Iran for nearly two millennia. On the other hand, Protestant communities (Congregationalists, Anglicans) emerged as missionary work began in the late 19th century. The original Protestant work, begun by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, led to the formation of the Evangelical Church of Iran, the largest of the Protestant groups. The Assemblies of God brought Pentecostalism to Iran at the beginning of the 20th century.

Armenians represent the largest group, whose numbers were estimated to be 500,000 in the 2006 census. Their origins in Iran are traced to the efforts of a Safavid king. Shah Abbas Safavid (1587–1629) led the Armenians from Julfa in the contemporary nation of Azerbaijan to a town designed for their settlement and with the same name near Esfahan in 1605, in order to take advantage of their artisan and business skills. Since then, most have been educated professionals, skilled artisans, or trusted businesspeople, who have preserved their traditions, religion, language, and cultural festivities amid the dominant Muslim population. Today Armenian communities in Esfahan, Tehran, and Tabriz, affiliated with the Armenian Apostolic Church, are the largest Christian congregations in Iran. In recent decades they have become the favorite place to live for those Armenians remaining in Iran, in large part because they have had better business opportunities there, and because they have been able to sustain their schools and social institutions in these cities.

The long-standing tolerant relationship between the Julfa Armenians and Shiite Iranians, as well as the contemporary diplomatic skills of Archbishop Korioun Papian (who presented Armenian cultural and festival traditions as religious in order to bring them under the protection of the Constitution), assisted the Armenian community during the most difficult period just after the revolutionary government came to power. Archbishop A. Manukian has suggested Islamic countries of the Middle East as the best place for Armenians to preserve their language and culture. Muslim majority nations rarely proselytize, and they promote traditional values. The return to traditionalism after the Revolution and the Iran-Iraq War were major factors influencing the migration of young Armenians, thus leaving a more elderly and urbanized population back in Iran. It appears that the revolutionary government's threat to a more secular lifestyle was a primary motivation for these individuals, while the threat of a more secular society was of concern to both Armenian bishops and Shiite clergy.

Assyrians and Chaldeans, religiously organized through the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church (also known as the Church of the East), are smaller numerically (10,000 in 2006) but have a much longer tradition of settlement in Iran than Armenians. Historically the Assyrians have been associated with the city of Urumiyeh (Rezayeh) in the northwest, and the Chaldeans with the Khuzistan region, especially Ahwaz. Their recent migration out of Iran (as well as to Tehran) was, to a large degree, caused by the Iran-Iraq War and their previous strong support for the Pahlavi regime. Before the development of university education among Muslims, the Assyrian and Chaldean communities were disproportionately represented in specialized technical and professional services, thus providing them the contradictory position of greater economic stability during hard economic times, but also creating the danger of becoming official or unofficial political targets because of some of the services they provided. Today more than 140,000 people of Assyrian and Chaldean heritage, hailing from the entire Middle Eastern region, live in the United States (mainly around Chicago and Detroit), where they have successfully established themselves.

Traditionally, Iranians have not perceived Armenians or Assyrians as proselytizers, even though they are Christian. On the other hand, Christian missionaries, particularly since the 19th century, have been seen as a threat to Muslim society, despite the fact that they have been involved in bringing education and health care services to all Iranians. American and European Christian missionaries opened schools in Tehran and other cities as early as 1881, almost two decades before the Jewish community. Establishing most of the earliest modern schools and colleges, such as Elburz College in Tehran, and hospitals with scientifically trained medical doctors, these philanthropic organizations served both Muslims and non-Muslims. Historically, European missionary activists in Iran had a higher rate of success in converting Armenians, Assyrians, and Jews than Muslims, sometimes causing deep resentments toward missionaries in these minority communities.

In Iran, both before the Revolution and since, apostasy (the conversion from Islam to any other faith) is a crime punishable by death. The degree to which people have actually been punished for apostasy varies from region to region and under specific rulers. On the other hand, historically, anyone who converts to Islam has the right to claim the property of his non-Muslim relatives. Thus, any religious group that actively seeks to convert others in Iran is regarded suspiciously, and this attitude has intensified since the Revolution. Both the Baha'i and Protestant Christian missionaries have been persecuted for their proselytizing activities, as well as their Muslim converts. Since 1979 several Muslim converts to Christianity, who were leaders of their churches, have been mysteriously killed. As Protestant Christian numbers have always been small, and they have not been enumerated separately, it is difficult to assess the effect of the Revolution on their migration and demographic experience, particularly in terms of different denominations.

■ Iraq

The land popularly known until World War II as Mesopotamia was carved out of the Ottoman Empire in several stages, beginning with the occupation of the British during World War I, its designation as a British Mandate in 1920, and its independence in 1932. Having been a part of the Ottoman Empire for many centuries, the national identity of the new country was not readily apparent to all and its subsequent life to the present has been challenged by the tensions between Shia and Sunni Muslim factions and the Arab/Kurdish ethnic division.

Geographically, Iraq lies in the Tigris-Euphrates River Valley and has two long borders with Iran to the northeast and Saudi Arabia to the southwest. The Persian Gulf lies to its southeast, but Iraq's access is highly limited by the placement of Kuwait. To the northwest lies Syria. And finally to the north, Iraq shares a border with Turkey, also home to a Kurdish minority. An estimated 28,200,000 people now reside in the 167,000 square miles of modern Iraq.

Through the millennia, Iraq has been the home of successive civilizations. Its most ancient history, however, is beyond the scope of this work, and this entry begins with the brief reign of Alexander the Great (334–327 BCE) and the Seleucid Empire, which followed. For several centuries, Mesopotamia functioned as a Seleucid desert outpost against the might of Roman conquest. However, between 133 and 117 BCE, the Roman Empire conquered much of Iraq. Frontier wars and political intrigues ensued that left Roman rule (now directed from Constantinople) in shambles and the region vulnerable to onslaught from other would-be conquerors.

During the seventh century CE, Islam, a new monotheistic religion founded on the teachings of the prophet Muhammad (569–632) rapidly spread from the Arabian Peninsula to the neighboring regions. Following Muhammad's death, internal disputes quickly occurred over who would serve as the caliph, the title assumed by the leader of the Muslim community. When Ali ibn Abi Talib (ca. 602–661), the son-law of Muhammad, was killed in battle in 661 the Umayyad dynasty ruled until 750. Most followers of Ali, who believed the rule of Islam should be established under those of the same bloodline as Muhammad, became known as the Shia, while others who believed that rule by consensus was called for became known as Sunni. The Sunnite Umayyads allowed a degree of religious tolerance that included both Shia as well as Christians.

The Abbasid dynasty supplanted the Umayyads in 750. After using the Shiites to help topple their predecessors, the Abbasids turned on them and destroyed their holy sites. In the meantime, Iraq had become the most prosperous part of the empire. The Shiite Buwaidids ruled briefly from the mid-10th century until the 11th, when the reins of power passed to Turkey and the Ottoman Empire, although the Abbasid caliph remained the titular head of state, reporting at times to the Ottoman emperor. In 1253, Hulagu or Hulegu, (ca. 1217–1265), a grandson of Genghis Khan (ca. 1167–1227), captured Baghdad, and by 1258 Abbasid rule faded away. Iraq was ruled by Mongols under the khan of Persia until 1335, when the Jalai'rids seized power and governed until the early 15th century. The Ottomans ruling from afar watched the rise and fall of these military and religious groups within their empire. They considered them to be a major threat to both the empire and to the Sunni tradition represented in the Hanafite School. Consequently, in 1534 Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566) conquered Baghdad, settling the question for the time being of who would rule.

Partially due to its location, Iraq only slowly absorbed Western influences. By 1800 there was a British resident at Basra, followed by a British consulate in 1802. France sent agents during the same period (and Catholicism was introduced by French and Italian religious orders). By 1914, the British were at war with the crumbling Ottoman Empire, leading to Britain being named the governing power. The British established a Christian regime that was politically foreign and religiously alien to the inhabitants. Immediate Arab nationalist sentiment, demonstrated in several insurrections, led the British to discontinue their new order, and an Arab Council of State was instituted, with Britain serving in an advisory capacity.

In 1921 Amir Faisal ibn Hussuan (1889–1933) assumed rulership of Iraq. After a decade of transition, Iraq was accepted into the League of Nations, in October 1932, as a sovereign state free from the British mandate. Unfortunately, freedom from foreign rule did not stabilize religious and national sentiments. Warfare soon broke out between Sunnis and the powerful Shia tribes of the Euphrates valley, while the Kurdish minority agitated for a separate state. Then in 1933, the Iraqi army massacred a number of the Assyrian minority, and the country experienced seven military coups between 1936 and 1941. After World War II, sentiment ran high against European intervention; Iraqis participated in the Arab-Israeli War of 1948 until a peace agreement was arranged. Most Jews, who traced their Iraqi heritage to ancient times, emigrated between 1948 and 1952. Today, there are fewer than 100 Jews left of that indigenous population, a record of which goes back to the dawn of history.

The Suez crisis between Egypt and Israel that began on October 29, 1956, and subsequent intervention of British and French forces affected Iraq deeply. Iraq severed diplomatic relations with France over French participation against Egypt. The students of Iraq rallied so stridently that colleges and schools were closed for a year and a half after disturbances in Mosul and Majaf caused deaths among the rioters. Martial law was imposed for one and a half years.

In 1958, King Faisal II (1935–1958), along with the Iraqi crown prince, was assassinated to make way for an independent republic. The power brokers of the coup were members of the socialist Ba'ath Party (founded in Syria in 1941). The leadership of General Abd al Kareem Kassem (1914–1963), who headed the new government, was disturbed by further efforts of the Kurds to establish their independence. Kassem was assassinated in 1963, and the Ba'ath Party, dedicated to Socialism, Arab unity, and freedom from foreign intervention, took full and exclusive control of the country. However, fighting involving the Kurds continued. Attempts to solve the Kurdish problem were undermined by Iran, who tended to support Kurdish aspirations out of their shared Shiite faith. Consequently, Iraq severed diplomatic relations with Iran. In August 1974, the hostile situation between the Kurds and the government led to 130,000 Kurds fleeing to Iran. A new peaceful solution fell apart when Iraq devastated parts of Kurdistan in 1975, leading to Kurds becoming displaced refugees, their homes and towns razed to the ground. (Of note, the initial reports of the use of chemical warfare by Iraq came from this military venture, which targeted both Iranians and Kurds.)

A new leader emerged in Iraq in 1979, when Saddam Hussein (1937–2006) became the president of the Revolutionary Party. He would emerge as both the prime minister and president of Iraq, posts he maintained until 2003. Under his leadership, a new Constitution, liberal by Iraqi standards, was approved in July 1990. Though offering the appearance of granting various liberties, the real power rested with Hussein. Hussein addressed the issue of an independent Kurdish territory but never acted, as numerous oilfields were located in the proposed territory. He also feared that the Shias would turn against his largely Sunni administration; the Kurds, however, manifested more aversion to the harsh government of Iran following the fall of the shah and the rise of the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989) than rule from Baghdad.

At the end of the 1980s, Hussein developed a heightened displeasure with neighboring Kuwait, which had increased its demands for the repayment of loans made to Iraq to buttress the financial infrastructure of a failing economy. In return, Hussein accused Kuwait of stealing large oil reserves from the borders of the two countries. Then in 1990 he moved troops into Kuwait. U.S. President George H. W. Bush reacted quickly and in January 1991 launched a war against the occupation. The war ended after only a few weeks with heavy losses by the Iraqis. The real damage to Kuwait came when Hussein ordered his retreating army to set oil rigs on fire, turning much of Kuwait into a roaring mass of fire and smoke.

After the war, Iraq was alienated and isolated from most global political and economic structures. Its postwar relations were hampered by United Nations Security Council Resolution 687, which imposed economic sanctions. Iraq could have the sanctions lifted only by accounting for all weapons of mass destruction, including biological warfare equipment. Hussein refused, arguing the need for such weapons—in case Israel attacked his country.

Surviving foiled assassination attempts and failed coups, Hussein remained in power through 2002. During this time, he was repeatedly associated with the conspiracy that led to the attacks on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001. The assertion of such associations were used by President George W. Bush as justification for invading Iraq in 2003. A short time after the initiation of military action, Saddam Hussein was removed from power and executed, and a new government was installed in Baghdad. As this volume goes to press, Iraq has yet to be fully pacified. Though an elected government was installed in 2006, the country remains unstable, and U.S. forces continue hostilities against significant pockets of opposition.

Since the eighth century, Islam has remained the majority religion in Iraq. Shias claim the allegiance of 62 percent of the population, including the Kurdish minority, although their reflection in government offices has been relatively small as the government under Hussein privileged Sunnis, who exercised most of the leadership in the country. Most Sunnis follow either the Hanafite or Shafaiite schools of Islam, the latter strong among Kurdish Sunnis.

Within Shia Islam there are two major schools, the Usuli and the Akhbari. The smaller group, the Akhbaris are found primarily in southern Iraq (and parts of neighboring Iran). The larger Usuli school has the more liberal legal perspective and uses a degree of interpretation in reaching legal decisions. Iraq has several sanctuaries for the Shiite population, including Samarra and Al Khadimain. There is an Institute of Islamic Studies at Baghdad.

Although a very small minority of the Kurds are Christian, there are also Yazidi among the Kurds. The Yazidi follow a religion that blends Manichean, Jewish, Zoroastrian, Nestorian, and Christian elements. They worship with two sacred books: the Black Book and the Book of Revelation. Yazidis live mostly west of Mosul, but some are scattered in other regions. The Mandeans who dwell in Iraq are known as Sabeans to the Arabs. Gnosticism synthesized with Christian, Jewish, and Iranian elements, along with a taste of fertility worship, forms the infrastructure of their faith. Their principal books are the Treasure, the Book of John, and a book of hymns. Most of them live in lower Iraq at Basra and Kut, as well as southwest Iran. The Baha'i Faith, which originated in neighboring Iran, has found Iraq an equally hostile environment. Despite maintaining a presence in Iraq for 120 years, it numbers fewer than 2,660.

Christian communities in Iraq trace their history to the first century and the mission of the Apostle Thomas in the Jewish colonies. Church hierarchies developed under the patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. In the next century, Nestorians sent missionaries to the region and declared a separation from Antioch. The Ancient Church of the East, or Assyrian Church, survived as the oldest Christian church in Iraq. It is aligned theologically with the Nestorians, who dissented from Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodoxy on the nature of Christ's divinity. Seleucia-Ctesiphon, near Baghdad, was at one juncture in time the most important Patriarchate beyond the Roman Empire. From there, from the fifth through the 10th centuries, Nestorian missionary efforts spread Christian doctrine throughout the Middle East.

Twentieth-century schisms splintered the church. Its ancient headquarters, located in Kurdish territory, fell victim to Turkish expansion in the 1890s. In 1940, the patriarch relocated to America, from which he now leads the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East. However, since the 1970s, a faction led by Mar Addai II (b. 1950), known as the Ancient Church of the East, has claimed to be the authentic Patriarchate. The Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church, which supports Mar Dinka IV (b. 1935) as patriarch of the East, is acknowledged by the Vatican to be legitimate. The Iraqi government under Hussein supported the claims of the Ancient Church of the East.

Armenians have lived in Iraq for many centuries. The Armenian Apostolic Church, Diocese of Baghdad, is related to the Catholicate of Echmiadzin in Armenia. Primary schools exist in cities where there are priests to teach them. The Greek Orthodox have one church in Baghdad, under the jurisdiction of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and all the East. Its bishop resides in Kuwait.

The Roman Catholic Church dates its existence in Iraq to 1553, when the Eastern-rite Chaldean Catholic Church was recognized. Most Catholics are Chaldeans and now number about 242,000 adherents in 10 dioceses. The church's patriarch resides in Baghdad.

Iraq's Pontifical Seminary at Mosul is a joint effort of the Syrian and Chaldean communities. The Syrian Catholic Church numbers about 50,000 people in 2 dioceses. The first congregations started in 1790. The Armenian Catholic Church congregations, with some 2,150 members, were organized into the Diocese of Baghdad in 1954, led by an archbishop and 4 priests. The Greek Catholic Church's 300 members are served by a priest residing in Baghdad. A Latin diocese for Catholics was formed in 1632; however, there was no resident bishop until 1920. Latin Catholics number about 3,200 today. There are 200 Dominican and Presentation sisters, most of them Iraqi, who teach and do medical work.

Christians who today use Syriac liturgy are divided into Chaldeans, Nestorians (Assyrian Churches of the East), Syrian Catholics, and Syrian Orthodox, who are sometimes referred to as Jacobites. This group entered Iraq in the sixth century, and they still feel that they are original Iraqis and the oldest Christian group in Iraq. Mar Matta near Mosul has the oldest Christian monastery, with six resident monks. During the demise of the Ottoman Empire in 1917, Armenian Orthodox (Gregorians) and Armenian Catholics fled Turkey and settled in Iraq. Greek Orthodox and Greek Catholics are immigrant communities in Iraq and are small in number.

Protestantism made a late appearance in the 19th century. The first British missionary attempt in Iraq was through the London Jews Society in 1820. Americans started activity in Mosul in 1850 through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The Church Missionary Society started its mission in 1882 and persevered until World War I. The Arabian Mission of the Reformed Church in America started its program in Basra in 1889. They were assisted by the Evangelical and Reformed Church (now a constituent part of the United Church of Christ) and the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). In 1957 another group, the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., joined the efforts. However, no presently existing Iraqi church can be traced to these roots, converts having primarily been made from Nestorian or Assyrian congregations.

Today, Arab evangelical churches number about 10 church groups in Baghdad, Kirkuk, and Basra. All of these congregations are served by Egyptian ministers. Two Assyrian evangelical churches in Baghdad and Mosul are not affiliated administratively. The Armenian Evangelical Church claims one small congregation in Baghdad. A single Anglican congregation, serving expatriate British and Arabs, belongs to the Diocese of Cyprus and the Gulf of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. The Lutheran Orient Mission has attempted to convert Kurds since 1911 with little success. Other small religious groups that have worked in Iraq, such as the Assemblies of God, Basra Assembly, Evangelical Alliance Mission, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church are no longer active. In 1969 all American missionaries were ordered out of the country, though some of the missions they created continue under national leadership. In the 1990s, Pentecostal and Charismatic movements were popular, and now number some 265,000 adherents. Christians now constitute about 3 percent of the population.

Islam has been the state religion of Iraq, but all citizens were deemed equal before the law. The cultural rights of the Syrian-speaking groups were decreed in article 25 of the Constitution dated April 22, 1972, which protected the Assyrian and Chaldean Christians. Technically, the Revolutionary Council recognized three religious holidays for Christians—Christmas and two days for Easter—along with five stated holidays for Jews. Religious judges (qadi) presided over Muslim jurisprudence. The General Bureau of Waqf (law) based in Baghdad was the official agency for Muslim law courts. There were no religious courts for non-Muslims, who settle their issues in civil courts.

The end of the Saddam Hussein regime placed the Christian and other minority religious groups in a precarious position. Constituting less than 3 percent of the population, they were somewhat lost amid the chaos of the efforts of the larger Muslim factions to gain and maintain their position in the new government. Amid the general chaos of the continuing Iraqi War, they have been subject to murders, the burning of worship centers, the abduction of leaders, and disenfranchisement from participation in the new government. Attacks on the Christian community reached a new level in February 2008 with the abduction and murder of Archbishop Paulos Faraj Rahho (1942–2008), the Chaldean Catholic archbishop of Mosul. Responding to the attacks, some Christians migrated internally while many thousands left the country. The status of all the minority groups have been called into question, and their future remains uncertain.

■ Ireland

Ireland is the third largest island in Europe and is located northwest of the continent. It is divided into two political units: the Republic of Ireland, with its capital of Dublin, covers just over 80 percent of the island while Northern Ireland, with its capital of Belfast, remains a part of the United Kingdom. The republic has nearly 6 million people and the north about 1.7 million people. The majority of people are ethnic Irish with a strong minority population of Ulster Scots who mainly speak English. Irish is still spoken in some regions of western Ireland. Catholicism remains the dominant faith of the republic while the north is nearly evenly divided between Catholics and Protestants.

The division of Ireland's population into Catholic and Protestant Christianity is a legacy of English colonization of the island over several centuries. This legacy is simultaneously linked to the transformation of Irish Celtic traditions into Christian ones during the medieval period as well as more recent politicization of religious identities on the island. A brief overview of Ireland's religious history reveals these relationships.

Ireland's historical geography is a complex one that thoroughly intertwines earthy Celtic sensibilities with historic Roman and Anglo penetrations. An early, pre-Celtic tradition is difficult to ascertain at this time. Celtic ritual traditions were practiced over a wide area of western and northern Europe and included Ireland—possibly as early as the first millennium BCE. The Irish Celtic tradition shared with its continental counterparts a belief in the immortality of the soul, and a reverence for the natural forces and life forms of Earth (for example, wind, water, trees, eels) and its planetary connections (for example, sun, sky, moon). Moreover, its priests (known as druids) played a powerful role in the social and political life of the people; for example, they ceremonially validated the power of local and regional kings (or chieftains), inasmuch as they were literally married to the land they ruled (known as a tuath).

The fecundity and the health of the tuath was essentially reflected through the virility and sound mind of the ruler. In this context, certain groves of trees and natural springs were singled out for ritual observances that guaranteed the health of the land, the king, and individual petitioners. Ancient Irish Celts believed that subterranean, parallel energy lines, now called ley lines, intersected with rising and falling subterranean streams. If such a stream erupted as a spring at Earth's surface, then it was deemed a power point to be ritually utilized. Not all springs were so blessed, and not all springs maintained their power. Yet, over the years the power of some springs has been amazingly long-lived, while new ones continue to be found. Eels could often be found in the pools that formed around springs. Those eels fortunate enough to live in powerful springs were believed to live far longer than a normal life span.

Early in the fourth century of the Common Era, an adolescent boy of British Roman origin was captured and taken to Ireland as a slave for a local king (probably in Antrim). He became fluent in Irish and familiar with Celtic beliefs over a period of about six years before he escaped. This young man eventually returned to Ireland to evangelize for the church in Rome, and he later became known as Saint Patrick (the patron saint of modern Ireland). Most of the details of Patrick's life are open to debate, as is the original spelling of his name. The current scholarly consensus is that he returned to Ireland around 461, and he himself says in his Confession that he was not sent by any human authority but impelled by divine inspiration. Other sources suggest he returned to carry out a mission assigned to him by Pope Celestinus I (r. 422–432) in the year 431. Early in the mission Patrick met resistance to his evangelizing, particularly from the druids, who had much to lose if their ceremonies were no longer needed. He is said to have found success by challenging Celtic beliefs at important ceremonies by subverting key elements of these events (for example, ignoring a royal edict against lighting fires in the days before an important spring ritual, Patrick lit a Paschal—Easter Eve—fire that the druids could not extinguish) or killing eels at powerful springs with no apparent negative effects to his own person. He also established Christian worship sites on or around those places deemed powerful by the Celts (for example, springs, tree groves, mounds). Eventually he baptized kings, thus laying the groundwork for a future Christian Ireland.

The Irish did not become Christians magically overnight or even in a century's time, despite Patrick's successful mission. Instead, Christianity overlaid an essentially Celtic faith tradition like a veneer on a table. As an Irish monasticism took root and spread, elements of the Celtic tradition were drawn up into Christian orthodoxy, while simultaneously Celtic practices absorbed Christian explanations. What emerged was a Celtic Christian church that had only nominal ties to the church in Rome. Christian priests eventually supplanted kings as the center of politically charged spiritual power, and powerful springs became holy wells. This synergistic syncretism of two great ritual traditions can still be seen at tree groves, in cemeteries, and at the holy wells of Ireland today. Although some wells are associated with local saints (for example, St. Peakaun's Well at the Glen of Aherlow in County

St. Patrick's Well in Clonmel, Ireland. (Martin Mullen/Dreamstime.com)

Tipperary) and often reflect a strong Celtic sensibility through their accoutrements and local character, other wells (for example, St. Brigid's Well at Liscannor in County Clare) have national significance and blend Celtic and Christian meaning and use. Finally, some wells have been thoroughly Christianized in meaning and usage (for example, St. Brigid's Well at Killare in County Westmeath and near to the hill of Uisneach). Such syncretism has occurred over one and a half millennia, with dynamic processes of remythologizing and historicizing sacred sites. The more historicized a site, the more Christian it becomes. Folk piety continues to have strong Celtic elements.

Local control of church ritual and practice was shattered in 1171 with the culmination of an Anglo-Norman invasion that installed English control over the Irish church through the Synod of Cashel. Culdees (Christian monks of the Celtic tradition) carried on the rituals of the Celtic Church for at least four more centuries before they finally died out. In the meantime, the Church of Ireland was formally separated from the Roman Catholic Church and its papal administration and politically incorporated into the Church of England. Through the trials and tribulations of English expansion, the Elizabethan Wars of the 16th century, enslavement to Caribbean plantations, Cromwell's reign of terror in the 17th century, and the great famine in the 19th century, Irish identity with the Roman Catholic Church deepened and helped to maintain the Irish people's identity as Irish, despite the direct control of the official Church of Ireland by the English Crown. Eventually, through sustained events of resistance (for example, the Catholic-Gaelic Rebellion of 1641, the 1798 Rebellion) and changes in Britain's own political goals (during Queen Victoria's reign and Gladstone's rule as prime minister), the Catholic Church in Ireland was finally legalized in 1829, and the Church of Ireland was disestablished as the state church in 1869, at which point most Irish churches reverted to their Roman origins. Today the Church of Ireland still exists, but in an attenuated form. It shares its early history with the Roman Catholic Church of Ireland through its Celtic Christian period. It is now part of the worldwide Anglican Communion found in 164 nations. In Ireland it has approximately 400,000 members, of which 300,000 live in Northern Ireland and 100,000 in the Republic of Ireland. It is governed as a single church with 2 provinces (Armagh and Dublin) and 12 dioceses.

Contemporary Ireland is overwhelmingly Catholic. This arises from its early connection to the Roman Church as well as its anti-Catholic trial by fire under English rule. Political, ethnic, and religious identities have become fully and completely conflated with each other, given this colonial history. As a consequence, political tensions and violence continue to be articulated through people's identity as Catholic or Protestant. Protestant/Free Church Irish are now associated with a number of denominations, due to the resettlement of various Protestant groups by the English during colonial times as well as the conversion of some Catholic Irish. It is Protestant identity in general, though, that carries political significance and not the particular sectarian group as such. Not surprisingly, most Protestants live in Northern Ireland, and the counting of people's religious affiliation during each census cycle is loaded with political implications. In 2004, Northern Ireland had 690,000 Catholics (40.4 percent), 359,000 Presbyterians, 300,000 Church of Ireland members, 65,000 Methodists, 21,000 Baptists, 12,000 Brethren, 12,000 Free Presbyterians, 8,000 Congregational members, 12,000 Protestant (no denomination noted), and 11,000 Christians (no denomination noted); 200,000 do not identify themselves with a specific religion, and approximately 9,500 people identified themselves as non-Irish minorities (for example, Sikh, Muslim, Buddhist) or atheist. These numbers, particularly of those who do not name their faith association and those who claim only a general category (Protestant, Christian), reflect a context of deep division and pervasive politicization of religious identity.

An American news broadcast (ABC, September 6, 2001) noted that unpublished results from the 2001 census of Northern Ireland indicate that Catholics now comprise 47 percent of the population. This increase is likely due to the combined effects of increased self-identification by Catholics, the emigration of Protestants from Northern Ireland, and higher birthrates within the Catholic community. This increase in the Catholic proportion of the population will likely have significant political consequences. The Republic of Ireland continues to reflect a strong Catholic identity, suffused with Celtic influences. In 2004, 87 percent of the population identified themselves as Catholic, 2 percent were members of the Church of Ireland, and 11 percent belong to an "other" category such as those who identified as atheists.

The "other" category is mainly reflected in Dublin's religious scene and includes members of evangelical and Pentecostal churches, Western Esotericists, imported religions (often imported by immigrants) such as Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism, and various new religions. Among the groups with centers in Ireland are the spectrum of Buddhists, the Universal White Brotherhood, the Baha'i Faith, the Church of Scientology, and the Unification Movement. It has also been a focus of the revivalist neo-Pagan movement based in the worldwide Fellowship of Isis headquartered at Huntington Castle in County Wexford.

The earliest reference to Irish Judaism was in the 11th century, and Jews are known to have come to Ireland following their expulsion from Portugal in 1496 and during the Napoleonic Wars early in the 19th century. As early as 1660, a prayer room was opened near Dublin Castle, and one Jewish seminary can be dated to the 1660s. The majority of the present-day Jewish community arrived between 1880 and 1910 from Eastern Europe. From a peak of 5,500, the community has dwindled to around 1,500, many having moved to Palestine after 1948. The several synagogues are Orthodox, except for one Reform synagogue.

Iroquois Confederacy

The Iroquois Confederacy (Haudenosaunee) consists of six Indian nations, comprising approximately 55,000 people, who live in the Finger Lakes region of New York, Wisconsin, and southern Ontario and Quebec. Originally the Haudenosaunee consisted of five Native American tribes—from west to east, the Seneca, Cayuga, Onondaga, Oneida, and Mohawk. The Tuscarora, fleeing from skirmishes with the British, joined the Confederacy in the early part of the 18th century.

The origin of the Confederacy of these eastern woodlands tribes may have occurred on August 31, 1142. This precise date is surmised because a total solar eclipse of the Sun was prominently featured in the oral stories; an alternative date could be 1451. The core story of the founding of the Haudenosaunee as a Confederacy is probably a factual account that has become embellished with mythic details. In this myth, a mysterious, semi-divine figure was born in Huron territory on the northern shore of Lake Ontario. Achieving adulthood, he announced that he had a mission to bring peace to the warring tribes in his area. He constructed a canoe of stone, which his grandmother was sure would never float, in order to help convince the people that his message was of divine origin. Dekanawidah, as he was called, began an epic adventure and overcame many hurdles as he gradually convinced recalcitrant chiefs to forsake warfare, embrace peace, and forge an alliance with a strong moral sense of justice, consensus building, and compassion at its core, rather than greed and selfishness.

The prophetic journey of Dekanawidah had many twists and turns. The first was the conversion of Hiawatha, who had retreated to the margins of society and had become a cannibal because of the tragic deaths of his wife and daughter. When Hiawatha looked into his cooking pot he saw Dekanawidah staring up at him, but he thought it was his own reflection. The vision, reflected back to Hiawatha, put him into a meditative mode and he realized that life could be beautiful if he abandoned his evil ways of killing and eating people. Dekanawidah then taught Hiawatha about peace and explained the basic features of a government based on trust, checks and balances, and compromise. In this Confederacy, men would be chiefs, but they would be chosen by women and could be deposed by the clan mothers if they became corrupt. Each nation would still govern itself, but they would all cooperate for the common defense and promote peace. Both Dekanawidah and Hiawatha then journeyed together to convert other tribal chiefs.

Despite some resistance, chiefs of four of the Indian nations eagerly joined what is sometimes referred to as the Great Law of Peace, or more commonly just the Longhouse. The last person to be convinced was a physically deformed and mentally twisted wizard and chief of the Onondagas, named Atotarho. Through persuasion, singing songs of peace, and combing snakes from Atotarho's hair, Dekanawidah and Hiawatha removed the wizard's physical deformities and cured his mind. Atotarho became the first spiritual leader of the Longhouse. Atotarho's descendant, the keeper of the sacred fire, continues to live in Onondaga and is chosen for his moral and spiritual insight. After designating Atotarho as spiritual leader, Dekanawidah called the first council meeting, the Great Council of Sachems (chiefs), where he briefly uprooted the great tree of peace to bury the weapons of war in a cavern below and then replanted it as the symbol for the people's strength that comes from a political unity based on moral principles of law, justice, and peace.

The Longhouse, a rectangular wooden building that serves as a "church" for the Haudenosaunee, seems to have originated with the founding of the Confederacy at the time of Dekanawidah and Hiawatha. The roots of the indigenous spirituality of these Iroquoian-speaking groups, however, go much farther back to the original peoples who settled in the eastern woodlands of North America.

Probably the most ancient ritual practices still current among the Haudenosaunee are those of the medicine societies, the most famous of which is known today as the False Face Society. Men become members of this society when they dream of a mythic ancestor who has piercing eyes, and frequently a bent nose and crooked mouth. Such visions often occur after a person has been cured in a ritual where masked individuals have crept into the bedroom, shaking their rattles to drive away the illness. The dreamer describes the vision to a known carver, who then carves a chunk of wood out of a soft-wooded tree and then carves the details and paints the mask, usually red and black.

Although women don't wear the masks, they often initiate and mediate between the false faces and the sick individual. These masked figures are not only important in curing illness, but also in annual rituals of renewal, particularly in the autumn, spring, and winter, when they enter every house in a village to drive out potential illness and protect the people from severe storms. These agricultural rituals are very important to the people who respect the three “sisters”—beans, corn, and squash—and who early developed a hunting society that also depended on agriculture.

Numerous versions of a creation account (Fenton 1987, 95–114) describe the origin of the false faces. In most, the Creator is out walking, inspecting his creation, when he comes across a surly, huge, hunchbacked man who claims to have created the world. To settle the dispute they decide to have a contest of power where both figures would try to move a mountain. Impressively, the hunchback moves the mountain a few feet. But then the Creator moves the mountain a great distance behind him. The hunchback turns around so quickly that he breaks his nose and dents his face. The Creator, however, allows the old man, called the Thunderer, to live if he moves to the edge of the Earth and allows people to access his power to remove illness and keep them safe from severe winds and thunderstorms. The false faces are his representatives to the people.

A famous Seneca version of the creation myth (A. Wallace 1969, 85–93) has a divine woman fall from the heavens upon a Turtle Island. She gives birth to twins, one who creates order and beauty, the other who creates chaos. Eventually the twins engage in a contest to move the mountain. In this version that came from Cornplanter, Handsome Lake’s brother, the Creator is called the “good twin,” and the other the “evil twin.” Even here, however, the pattern of transforming evil into good is more in line with the Dekanawidah myth than the probable Christian influence of using “good” and “evil” to describe the origin of the false face society.

A significant reform of the Haudenosaunee religion and culture occurred when the Seneca prophet, Handsome Lake (1735–1815), had a series of supernatural visions when he had nearly died of alcoholism. Engaging in conversations with Quaker (Society of Friends) reformers, who were attempting to help the Seneca escape from severe poverty, he first faced his own condition and gave up drinking. Through his visions he began to see the devastation of his people and created a moral code, centered on forswearing alcohol, wife beating, gambling, witchcraft, greed, quarreling, and the like. But, instead of converting to Christianity, he rooted this code in the traditional beliefs of his people, including the story of Dekanawidah. Although there was initially some tension between the old medicine societies and the religion of Handsome Lake, within a generation of his death, the Longhouse integrated both. Now at the Thanksgiving ceremonies in the fall, there is both a recitation of the Code of Handsome Lake and a purification ceremony by the false face society.

Two prominent religious traditions in the Haudenosaunee nations exist today—the Longhouse and Christianity. Conversion to Christianity originated in the 17th century; the most famous convert was Kateri Tekawitha (1656–1680), known as the Lilly of the Mohawks, who was recently beatified by the Catholic Church. Even though Christians today do not give the ancient rituals and myths much value or adopt the Code of Handsome Lake, they are comfortable at yearly agricultural festivals, where they see the dances as more a part of their culture than as religious truths. Others continue to follow the old ways of Handsome Lake and continue to tell the traditional creation accounts.

Ise Shrine, The

The Ise Shrine, located on Japan's eastern coast in Mie Prefecture, is an ancient site of traditional pre-Buddhist religion in Japan. Though at least a millennium old, none of the older structures remain at Ise due to the practice of the rite of shikinen sengu, by which the wooden buildings are burned and rebuilt every 20 years. This custom was first carried out in 690 CE. It is only during this ceremony that the general public is allowed to come close to the shrine.

There are two shrines in Ise. The Inner Shrine (Naiku) contains Amaterasuno Mikoto, the grandmother of Ninigi, who unified Japan, in Japanese traditional history; 3.7 miles distant from the Inner Shrine, the Outer Shrine (Geku) houses the Shinto deity, Toyouke, the goddess of agriculture.

Ise had a special status and from its beginning Buddhist rituals as well as terminology were prohibited. During the Kamakura period (1192–1333), when Japan was ruled by the shoguns based in Kamakura, Buddhism was privileged at the expense of traditional Shinto. One prominent family who favored more traditional beliefs, the Watarai family, who supplied the priests at the Outer Shrine at Ise, took the lead in developing a new revitalization of Shinto. Today, Ise remains the private shrine of the Japanese imperial household.

Essentially the Shinto religion as practiced at Ise stresses purity and honesty as ideals, with the goal of religious practice to perfect purity and honesty. The Ise Shinto priests have also attempted to reverse the previous Buddhist dominance in the land by speaking about the prominent Buddhas and bodhisattas as manifestations of Shinto kami, or deities.

The major text of Ise Shinto is the Shinto gobusho (Five Books), which dates from the Muromachi period (1334–1592).

◆ Islam

Islam is a monotheistic faith that claims Allah (the term for God in Arabic) has revealed himself supremely through the Prophet Muhammad (570–632 CE) and in the Koran, the holy book of Islam given to the Prophet by the angel Gabriel. Muslims believe that Islam dates back to the creation of humanity and that Allah has spoken through a lineage of prophets that includes Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Jesus. Islam has traditionally taught that Muhammad was kept from sin by Allah (as were the prophets that preceded him). His prophetic status secured the truth of the revelation he received and made him a model for future generations. Muslims look to the traditions about him (known as hadith) for guidance in belief and practice in all areas of life.

Islam is now the second largest religion in the world. As of 2005 there were 1.4 billion followers, almost one in 6 people on earth. The land in which Islam is now the majority faith stretches from the Middle East and across southern Asia to Indonesia, the latter with more than 170 million Muslims. India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh each have more than 35 million Muslims. Islam dominates northern Africa and its presence is growing in the sub-Saharan, where it is challenging both Christianity and nascent traditional religions for hegemony. Central Asia is also experiencing a resurgence of Islam while the immigration of millions of Muslims to Europe and North America is turning Islam into a truly global faith.

Some historians, like Michael H. Hart, believe that Muhammad may be the most significant person in history. Though Christianity claims more followers, Muhammad is viewed by some scholars as having had a greater impact on history, given the political depth of Islam, the range of Islamic law, and the breadth of Islamic political power, the depth and range of Islamic spirituality, and the all-encompassing ways in which Muhammad's teachings and example bear on every facet of life.

Muhammad the Prophet Understanding Islam demands singular focus on the traditional version of Muhammad's life as accepted by most Muslims. Scholarly debate about this version is an important but secondary matter. What follows is the narrative that has been standard in Islamic life since the early centuries of Islam. It is generally accepted that Muhammad was born about 570 CE. Muhammad knew pain early in his life, since his father died before he was born and his mother shortly after his birth. He was raised by his grandfather for two years. After his grandfather's death Muhammad was cared for by an uncle until his teen years.

Muhammad went twice to Syria with his uncle. These trips provided the opportunity for an apologetic motif with assertion of Muhammad's early business prowess and external testimony to his spiritual potential. Muslims claim that Muhammad's prophetic status was foreseen by Christian monks, on the first trip by Bahira and on the second journey by a monk named Nastur.

A woman merchant named Khadijah entered into Muhammad's life and they were wed in 595, when Muhammad was about 25. Though she was considerably older, she bore him at least six children (the two boys died early). They had a loving marriage, and while Muhammad later took multiple wives, he did not do so until after Khadijah's death in 619.

Islam traces God's call to Muhammad to the 17th night of the month of Ramadan in the year 610 CE, when the angel Gabriel visited him on Mount Hira, near Mecca. According to Muslim sources, the prophet was profoundly shaken by the angelic encounter and turned to Khadijah and her cousin Waraqah for confirmation of his prophetic mandate. Most Muslims believe that sura 96 in the Koran is the first revelation given to Muhammad.

After a pause (fatra) of three years Muhammad carried Allah's message to his fellow Meccans. At first he was largely ignored though he gained a few converts, including Abu Bakr, a later caliph (leader). Then, as Muhammad spoke more forcefully against polytheism and idolatry, he earned the wrath of various tribal leaders, including those of his own tribe, the Quraysh. One uncle, Abu Labah, also resisted Muhammad and this earned both the uncle and his wife a place in hell, according to the commentators on sura 111. Some of the Prophet's enemies denounced Muhammad as possessed by jinn (evil spirits).

Muslims believe that in 620, one year after Khadijah's death, Gabriel brought the Prophet to Jerusalem on the back of a heavenly horse named Buraq. Sura 17:1 states: "Glory to (Allah) Who did take His servant for a Journey by night from the Sacred Mosque to the farthest Mosque, whose precincts We did bless." Muhammad was offered a drink of wine or milk and was commended by Gabriel for choosing the latter. After conversing with Jesus and other prophets, he ascended via a ladder (miraj) to the seventh heaven. Muslims claim that the Dome of the Rock, a Muslim shrine on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, is built on the spot from where Muhammad ascended and descended. It is from this incident that Muslims believe that they have a stake in Jerusalem, and they consider the Temple Mount the third most holy spot in Islam.

Two years later in 622, in year one of the Muslim calendar, Muhammad and many of his followers fled to Medina, about 250 miles north of Mecca. This event, the Hijra, marks the starting date of the Muslim calendar. For eight bitter years, the Prophet engaged in various military battles with his Meccan enemies. The most significant victory was one at Badr on March 15, 624, but there were losses as well, including one at Uhud in 625.

Muhammad's military life has always been used against him by critics. Focus has been made repeatedly on the death penalty he ordered on the Kurayza, the last major Jewish clan under his control. He accused them of treachery during a battle known as the "War of the Trench." According to traditional sources the Prophet ordered the beheading of more than 600 Jewish males. Sura 33:6 is said to refer to this episode. "And those of the People of the Book who aided them—Allah did take them down from their strongholds and cast terror into their hearts. (So that) some ye slew, and some ye made prisoners."

Another expedition, this time against the Mustalik clan, gained notoriety because of charges against Aisha, one of Muhammad's wives. She had been accidentally left behind on the return trip to Medina. When a lone Muslim soldier brought her back to camp, rumors started. Muhammad received a revelation exonerating his favorite wife. Sura 24:12 is said to address the gossip: "Why did not the believers—men and women—when ye heard of the affair,—put the best construction on it in their own minds and say, 'This (charge) is an obvious lie'?"

In 628 Muhammad negotiated a treaty at al-Hudaybiya with his leading Meccan enemies and in the next year he reached reconciliation with his own clan. In January 630 his army took control of Mecca and demolished the idols in and around the Kaaba, the main worship site. This site, traced by Muslims back to Abraham, would become the most holy in Islam. The Kaaba is now surrounded by the Al-Masjid al-Ḥarām mosque, now the largest in the world.

Medina continued to be the base for the prophet, but he made a final pilgrimage to Mecca in early 632. He was sick at the time and returned home. He died on June 8 of that year, in the embrace of Aisha. His burial place, and the mosque that has grown around it, is the second most important site for Muslim pilgrims.

Alfred North Whitehead is noted to have remarked that "philosophy is one long footnote to Plato." Likewise, Islamic history is one long footnote to Muhammad. Thus, Muhammad's journey—in all of its detail, from his military style, to his reaction to Jews and Muslims bow their heads toward Mecca in prayer. Mecca, in present-day Saudi Arabia, is the birthplace of Muhammad, the prophet upon whose teachings Islam is based. (PhotoDisc/Getty Images)

Christians, to the way he brushed his teeth—becomes the paradigm for all Muslims. This includes Muhammad’s beliefs and policies in all realms of life, whether religious, social, or political. His words, whether in the Koran or the hadith (traditions about the prophet) become the final authority since he is the Prophet of God.

Historical Accuracy and Muhammad As one might expect, Western scholars have expressed skepticism about the traditional biography of Muhammad. The doubts have been framed along three different lines. First, following David Hume, there is agnosticism in principle toward Muhammad’s alleged miracles. They note the absence of such miracles in the Koran and argue that the miraculous accounts in the hadith are a later creation. Second, there is a more general suspicion of the hadith literature as a valid historical source. Ignaz Goldziher (1850–1921) provided a strong case that post-Muhammad Muslim communities read their views and hearsay back into the life of the Prophet. John Wansbrough and Patricia Crone are the more modern advocates of the limited historical value of the hadith collections, whether those of Bukhari (810–870), Muslim (817–875), or the Shiite world. Of course, traditional Muslim scholars continue to evaluate the standard hadith as trustworthy.

It should be noted that some Western scholars are not totally skeptical of the Koran and hadith as sources for history. F. E. Peters argues in his Muhammad and the Origins of Islam that it is rational to expect that the Koran and hadith contain much that can be used for biography. The same logic applies to the earliest biographies (sira) of Muhammad, the most famous being Ibn Ishaq’s Life of the Apostle of God.

A third line of Western skepticism has more to do with evaluation of the normative doctrinal and ethical claims in all traditional Muslim sources. To non-Muslim readers there is much that seems lacking. While scrutiny along critical lines runs counter to dominant irenic approaches to Islam (Edward Said), one can make proper use of Said without capitulating to the kind of naïveté that sometimes appears in pluralist visions of Islam.

Questions can also be raised about the value and limits of Islamic jurisprudence. The Sufi tradition is based, in part, on some dismay over the increasing hold that jurists had on Islamic thought and practice. Likewise, modern discourse about Islam should allow freedom to confront what seem to be superstitious, anti-feminist, and rather undiplomatic elements in the hadith. Do angels really have wings? Did the Prophet teach that females make up the majority in hell? What did Muhammad believe about the jinn? Did Muhammad teach that Allah turned Jews into pigs and apes? Likewise, in the Koran itself, what is the proper reaction to the command in sura 4:34 about the beating of wives?

Debate over Muhammad's views mirror the three distinct views of him that have dominated discourse since his emergence as a prophet. Of first significance is the Muslim understanding. In all forms of Islam Muhammad is the ideal. The hadith material speaks of him in highest terms. One hadith states: "Allah's Apostle was the most handsome, most generous, and the bravest of all the people" (Bukhari 4:277).

The great philosophers of Islam cut their beards in accordance with Muhammad's example. Some Muslims refuse to eat watermelon because there was no evidence that Muhammad ever ate one. Female circumcision, a topic not covered in the Koran, is supported or abandoned based on speculation about whether Muhammad opposed it or not. As another example, the Muslim hajj is based on duplicating the prophet's journey.

No vision of Islam can proceed without appeal to Muhammad. This applies whether it is about advocating traditional values, feminism, gay rights, democracy, honor killings, or even acts of terrorism. Professed allegiance to Muhammad was used to justify the destruction of the famous Buddhist statues in Bamyam in 2001. The sale of heroin in Afghanistan is defended as a necessary tactic in line with the prophet's military actions.

The high view of Muhammad is also shown in Muslim offense toward any who question the Prophet. Muslim attacks on Salman Rushdie and the fatwah against him by the Shiite cleric Ayatollah Khomeini in 1989 had to do with the novelist's perceived insults against Muhammad and his favorite wives. Ahmed Deedat, a popular Muslim apologist, attacked the novelist in a pamphlet called How Rushdie Fooled the West. His conclusion about Rushdie speaks for itself: "Mired in misery, may all his filthy lucre choke in his throat, and may he die a coward's death, a hundred times a day, and eventually when death catches up with him, may he simmer in hell for all eternity!"

Likewise, Muslims protested throughout 2006 over publication of cartoons of the prophet in the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten. The images were printed in September 2005 and reprinted worldwide. There was further anger in the fall of 2006 over a controversial reference about Muhammad made by Pope Benedict XVI in a speech at the University of Regensburg. The pope quoted the words of Manuel II Palaiologos, a 14th-century Byzantine emperor: "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached." The pope and the Vatican issued qualifying statements in the weeks following his lecture.

A second assessment of Muhammad has emerged in the last century or so. There are scholars who hold Muhammad in much esteem, without accepting that he is sinless or that he is the Prophet of God. Among Western Christian scholars, this new approach has been adopted by W. Montgomery Watt, Kenneth Cragg, Wilfred Cantwell Smith, and Hans Küng.

Küng, a Roman Catholic, first addressed the issue of Muhammad in Christianity and the World Religions. He presents seven parallels between Muhammad and the prophets of Israel, outlines the immense contribution of Muhammad, and concludes by citing a document from the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) that states that the Catholic Church "also looks upon the Muslims with great respect: They worship the one true God who has spoken to man." Küng states: "In my opinion, that Church—and all the Christian Churches—must also 'look with great respect' upon the man whose name is omitted from the declaration out of embarrassment, although he alone led the Muslims to the worship of the one God, who spoke through him: Muhammad the Prophet."

In his 2007 opus Islam: Past, Present and Future Küng restated his high view, while offering some significant criticisms of Muhammad. Other scholars, such as John Hick, Paul Knitter, and Wendy Doniger, have argued for the basic truth of all of the great world religions and the integrity of each founder. Karen Armstrong, a former Catholic nun, offered a lofty view of Islam in her Muhammad: A Biography of the Prophet, a bestseller that received some serious critique for her apologetic tone.

According to a third view, that forms a strong theme in Christian writing, Muhammad is the embodiment of evil. This tradition of contempt began in the early medieval period, as Christian and Muslim armies fought for land control from North Africa, across the Middle East, and into Europe. The wars were viewed by many Christians as the necessary struggle against the Antichrist himself—Muhammad. Dante's Inferno puts the Islamic leader in the lower realms of hell. Similar diatribes against Muhammad continued after Dante and through the Reformation to the present.

Secular writers have also offered some harsh critiques of Muhammad. He has been pictured as ignorant, barbaric, and immoral. He was on occasion characterized as either a hypocrite or delusional, perhaps the victim of epileptic seizures, whose success with converts had more to do with promises of sexual reward, material gain, and the proverbial Islamic sword than with any truth in his teaching.

In the aftermath of the bombing of the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11, 2001, some editorials in the secular press hinted at Muhammad's dark side, with subtle accusations that the terror that had been visited on New York and Washington had its roots in the life and teaching of the Muslim prophet. They cite Muhammad's all-or-nothing mentality, his expansionist vision, his dictatorship, and, of course, his love for jihad. Both religious and secular critics have traced the Koran to less than divine inspiration.

The Origin of the Koran Many Muslims believe that the Koran is eternal since its origin lies in Allah's eternal mind. Other believers argue that it is a created revelation. The vast majority of Muslims believe that the angel Gabriel dictated the revelations to Muhammad. He then recited the words to Khadijah, his first wife, and then to other followers. After Muhammad's death, a number of Muslim scholars formed the final edition of the Koran in the time of Uthman (d. 656), the third ruler (caliph) after the prophet.

Most Muslims are ignorant of skeptical attacks on the Koran. Most believe that the Prophet could not read or write, a point used to argue for the divine origin of the Koran. Western scholars have debated to what extent the Koran can be viewed as a trustworthy historical source. Recent skepticism takes its chief cue from the work of John Wansbrough, mentioned earlier, one of the major figures in modern study of the Koran.

The Koran contains 114 suras, or chapters, and more than 6,000 verses. The suras are arranged by size, with the shorter chapters near the end. Islamic tradition states that the shorter chapters came first in Muhammad's life while the longer chapters were revealed after the prophet conquered Mecca in 630 CE. In other words, the Koran should be read in reverse order if one wants a basic sense of unfolding revelation.

The titles of the various chapters relate to some word or idea in the chapter, though there is often no unifying theme in the various suras. Some Muslim writers attempt to argue for divine inspiration in the Koran by pointing to mathematic and scientific wonders in the text. Mention is made of the Koran's accuracy on medical matters as well.

Major Themes of the Koran Anyone who reads the Koran for the first time finds it confusing. It is not orderly or systematic, as most Muslims acknowledge, and the text is not always clear. There is no grand narrative in the Koran and the material is not ordered thematically. This means that the best way to understand it is to get a sense of its major themes and those topics that appear constantly throughout.

Allah The Koran is a text about Allah where the word itself appears more than 2,500 times. As in Judaism and Christianity, God is eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent, and is a spirit being. However, the Koran moves beyond these two other religions by placing greater stress on God's sovereignty and the notion of predestination.

Sura 59:23 is an example of a high view of God: “God is He, than Whom there is no other god; the Sovereign, the Holy One, the Source of Peace (and Perfection), the Guardian of Faith, the Preserver of Safety, the Exalted in Might, the Irresistible, the Supreme: Glory to God!”

The Koran puts more focus on the justice of God than his love but it is wrong to imply that the Koran has no sense of God’s love. Rather, his love is to be understood through the lens of his holiness. His mercy, a major theme, is related to the willingness of people to turn from evil, though even that repentance is ultimately an outgrowth of God’s ultimate will.

Muhammad The Prophet is the key human person in the holy text though he is only mentioned by name four times. However, he is the recipient of the revelation and the subject of many passages. When Muhammad is quoted, Muslims contend that these words represent the words of Allah.

As is commonly known, Muhammad is “the Seal of the Prophets,” (sura 33), a phrase interpreted to mean he is the last and greatest prophet. Muhammad is a judge to his followers (4:65), and is worthy of respect (2:104; 4:46). Muhammad’s role was foreseen by Moses (46:10) and by Jesus in sura 61:6. “O Children of Israel! I am the apostle of God (sent) to you, confirming the Law (which came) before me, and giving Glad Tidings of an Apostle to come after me, whose name shall be Ahmad.” Ahmad is a shortened form of Muhammad.

Muhammad’s message is universal (34:28) and he is the sign of Allah’s mercy to the world (9:61; 28:46–47; 76:24–26). The prophet is described as prayerful (74:3), gentle (3:159), concerned about his disciples (9:128), and anxious for unbelievers to repent (12:97; 25:30). He had an “exalted standard of character” (68:4). As noted earlier, he had his critics who accused him of craziness (7:184) and being under demonic influence (81:22).

His followers received instructions about proper social etiquette with the prophet. They could only visit his home with permission and they were to avoid arriving early or staying too long. The Koran says disciples are to avoid “familiar talk” with the Prophet. Such behavior “annoys the Prophet: he is ashamed to dismiss you, but God is not ashamed (to tell you) the truth” (33:53).

Biblical Material The Koran gives significant attention to figures and stories drawn from the Hebrew Bible and the Christian New Testament. Jews and Christians are referred to as “the people of the book” (3:64; 29:46). Muslims believe that Allah revealed himself to Jews and Christians, though both groups altered their scriptures. Muslims use this to explain why both Jewish and Christian accounts often differ from the way they are reported in the Koran. Critics of the Koran argue that its biblical material is often presented through the lens of Jewish and Christian views that were popular in Muhammad’s time.

In terms of biblical figures, Moses gets most mention in the Koran with more than 500 verses, or almost 10 percent of the text. Noah, Abraham, Joshua, David, Jesus, and Mary are also awarded major attention. Muslims often draw parallels between Muhammad and Moses, since both are lawgivers. As well, comparison is made between Muhammad and King David, since both led their citizens into warfare for God.

Jesus The Koran holds Jesus in the highest regard. He is called a Sign from God. His miracles are noted and the claim that he was born of the Virgin Mary is accepted. The followers of Jesus were called Muslims, according to the Koran. Jesus can be called apostle and messenger of God, though he is not the Son of God. He is a prophet, which is the highest title one can be given under Islam’s strict monotheism.

Muslims tell a somewhat different story of Jesus’ life than that in the canonical Gospels. For example, Muslims do not believe that Jesus died on the cross. In sura 4:157, one of the famous verses of the Koran, it speaks about enemies of Allah who insulted the Virgin Mary and who brag: “We killed Christ Jesus the son of Mary, the Apostle of God.” The text then reads: “but they killed him not, nor crucified him, but so it was made to appear to them, and those who differ therein are full of doubts, with no (certain) knowledge, but only conjecture to follow, for of a surety they killed him not.” Muslims believe that Jesus ascended to heaven and will return to earth to battle the Antichrist.

True Believers Much of the Koran is devoted to description of the life of those who submit to Allah. The word “Muslim” actually has the meaning of submission behind it. Though Islam is a religion of law, the Koran is more preoccupied with larger principles than legal niceties. The Muslim follows Allah and trusts his will as absolute. Hence, Muslims often repeat the word inshallah, which is Arabic for “if God wills.” The devout Muslim abandons all false gods since Allah alone is “lord of the east and the west” (73:9). Following Allah means, of course, following Prophet Muhammad, as noted earlier.

The Koran mandates prayer (2:238, 70:9, and 87:15, for example) and also fasting (2:185). The true believer should be forgiving, peaceful, and faithful. Charity is commanded and good works are a sign of true faith (3:114). Allah’s disciple obeys divine instructions on marriage (4:23; 5:5) and on inheritance laws (4:11, 126).

The true Muslim avoids evil in all its forms. This means no gambling, drinking, usury, and unlawful food (haram). Skeptics are to be avoided. Sura 44:9 warns against those “who play about in doubt.” Muslim males may have multiple wives, but cannot have more than four (3:3). Sexual lust is wrong. Given this, modesty is important, especially in females (24:31, for example), a principle much maligned in Western reaction to various forms of veiling among Islamic women.

Heaven, Hell, and Judgment Day The Koran gives enormous weight to issues about life after death. The rewards of heaven and the pains of hell are ever-present themes. In one popular English translation (Yusaf Ali) the word “hell” appears 94 times. There is a strong tradition in Islam, especially Shiite, that the battle against Satan at the end of time will be led by a messianic figure called the Mahdi who, in turn, will receive assistance from Jesus. Speculation about the soon appearance of the Mahdi has led to apocalyptic enthusiasm at different times and places in Islamic history.

Heaven is pictured as a garden paradise, with mansions, fountains, food and drink, and sexual pleasure (56:12–40, for example). The latter has become a matter of modern-day curiosity, given claims that Muslim martyrs will be rewarded with 72 virgins. This rather precise detail is from one of the lesser known hadith collections (al-Tirmidhi 824–892) and not explicitly from the Koran. The general idea of sexual reward in paradise is, however, well established in Islamic thought and applies to all Muslims, male and female, whether martyrs or not. The Koran also states that the greatest bliss is “God’s goodly acceptance,” which is “the triumph supreme” (9:72).

The Koran’s picture of hell is given with brevity and clarity. For example, the damned will wear garments of fire and drink boiling water (14:16; 47:15). There will be no escape from hell. Sura 13:18 notes: “But those who respond not to him—even if they had all that is in the heavens and on earth, and as much more, (in vain) would they offer it for ransom. For them will the reckoning be terrible: their abode will be Hell—what a bed of misery!” There is virtually nothing in the Koran that warrants any hope of deliverance from hell or any vision of universal redemption.

The Five Pillars of Islam The focus of Sunni Islam, submission to God, finds expression in five practices, popularly known as the five pillars. For Shia Muslims, a minority group, there is a different expression of basics. For Sunni believers, the first pillar is the well-known profession of faith known as the shahadah: “There is no God but Allah, and Muhammad is His messenger.” These words seek to establish the supremacy of Allah as the one true God and the finality of Muhammad as Allah’s ultimate prophet.

Second, faithful Muslims obey the call to prayer (salat), which is to happen five specific times every day. Muhammad first advised his followers to pray facing toward Jerusalem, but soon reoriented his followers toward Mecca. Kenneth Cragg, one of the great Christian scholars of Islam, writes: “Islam and prayer are in truth inseparable.” Islamic law provides detailed instructions on proper washings related to salat. These can be partial washings (wudu) or full (gushi). As well, scholars of Islam give detailed guidance on obstructions to prayer, including whether various bodily functions negate proper prayer. Men and women usually pray in separate areas of the mosque, though some Muslim feminists argue that women should be allowed in the front on occasion.

The Muslim place for worship, the mosque, is called a house of prayer, as that is the primary activity that occurs there. Though some mosques are quite elaborate, dramatic works of architecture, even opulent, the requirements of a mosque are relatively simple—an open space for the faithful to gather and a mihrab, a niche in the wall indicating the qibla, or direction, toward which prayer is offered. The direction is always toward the Kaaba in Mecca. Muslims generally gather at the mosque on Fridays for prayer. Men and women are segregated during the prayer time.

Third, Muslims are supposed to give a percentage of their worth to the poor and needy. The tithe, or zakat, is collected by a few Muslim states, but most Muslims give through leaving money in the metal zakat box in their local mosque. The zakat involves giving 2.5 percent of the Muslim's assets, but it is not charity since it is an obligatory act, one that is usually to be done in private.

Fourth, unless prevented by bad health, all Muslims are to fast, that is, to abstain from all food, water, and sexual activity from sunrise to sunset during the entire month of Ramadan. The fast offers a time for spiritual reflection, repentance, and giving to the poor. The whole Koran is often recited in evening worship over the 30-day period. Ramadan ends with a celebratory feast day known as Eid ul-Fitr.

The last pillar is known as the hajj and concerns the duty of all able-bodied Muslims to make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in their lifetime. Only Muslims are allowed inside Mecca. Many Muslims regard their experience of the hajj to be the greatest spiritual moment of their lives.

Males are instructed to wear simple white garments while women can wear their traditional dress. The pilgrims enter Mecca while reciting "Here I am at your service, O God, here I am!" They circle seven times around the Kaaba, the temple Muslims believe was built by Abraham and Ishmael. The pilgrims engage in a ritual of running between two mountains outside of Mecca, in memory of the plight of Hagar looking for food and water. Muslims also throw stones at a pillar that symbolizes Satan, and sacrifice animals in duplication of the narrative involving Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son. Muslims believe that Ismail rather than Isaac was the subject of this incident.

Jihad, Islam, and Terrorism The idea of jihad (literally, struggle) has emerged in the contemporary world as one of the most critical and controversial of Islamic beliefs. The modern Western controversies surrounding jihad have their epicenter in the events of September 11, 2001. Although many Muslims and some scholars contend that the word simply means spiritual struggle, jihad has often been interpreted in a more literal fashion as Holy War.

In February 1998, three and a half years before September 11, Osama bin Laden, the founder and leader of al-Qaeda, made his own views clear. Along with other groups representative of 20th-century Islamism from Egypt, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, he issued a fatwa, or legal ruling, that called on Muslims "to kill the Americans and their allies—civilian and military." He added that this struggle is an individual duty for every Muslim who can do it in any country in which it is possible to do it.

In contrast, the vast majority of Muslim countries have opposed Osama bin Laden since September 11. For example, the governments of Bahrain, Egypt, Iran, Lebanon, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen expressed their condemnation of the terrorist attacks almost immediately.

Terrorist attacks have brought to the surface intense disagreement within the Muslim community over the meaning of jihad and the nature of true Islam. The roots of these contemporary conflicts about Islam's real identity lie in ancient debates about the teaching of the Koran, the example of the Prophet, the legitimacy of non-Muslim governments, and the place of war in Islamic ideology.

Despite the debate, the following observations emerge from careful study:

The Koran uses the term "jihad" to describe both spiritual struggle and just war.

The Prophet engaged in warfare.

The Prophet taught that Islam must be spread to the whole world.

Islamic law justifies self-defense and certain acts of war.

Muslims often conquered non-Arab lands and peoples through war.

Most Muslims divide the world into two: Islam (the realm of peace) and non-Islam (the realm of no peace)

Many Muslims believe that all countries should follow Islamic law.

Some Muslim countries (like many non-Muslim countries) are nondemocratic and crush dissent.

Most Muslims find the focusing of Western-Middle Eastern discussions around “jihad” and “terrorism” by non-Muslims as a talisman to avoid critical scrutiny of Western weaknesses and American failures. This critique includes a negative assessment of Western culture (with its emphases on material possessions and sexuality) while emphasizing Muslim objections generally with Western imperialist activity in Muslim lands and particularly recent military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan. More specifically, the abuses at Abu Ghraib prison riled Muslims (and non-Muslims) as have recent American legal sanctions to what is usually regarded as torture. Most Muslims regard support for Israel with contempt and view with considerable consternation Western complicity with repressive dictatorships in the Middle East and Central Asia. The latter has been reported on at length by the famous British journalist Robert Fisk.

There are some 70 major terrorist groups operating in the world as the 21st century begins. Of these, more than 30 have an Islamic orientation. Of the rest, a few are well known—the Irish Republican Army or Aum Shinrikyo (the group that spread poison gas in the Tokyo subway system). Among the Islamic groups, the most well known are the Abu Nidal Organization (also known as Black September), the Islamic Group, or IG (Al-Gama’a al-Islamiyya), the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), Hamas, Hizballah (Party of God, also known as Islamic Jihad), and al-Qaeda. Though relatively small in membership, these groups have some popular support throughout the Muslim world, and their actions are widely debated. Various governments have moved against groups accused of engaging in terrorism such as the Muslim Brotherhood (Egypt). Other militant groups, such as the Jamaat-e-Islam in Pakistan, have emphasized education and political action in order to attain their ends.

The Branches of Islam Like all religions, Islam has not maintained its original unity. Within a generation of the Prophet’s death, Muslims were at war with each other over political leadership and the proper interpretation of Islamic spirituality. Generally, Muslims can be grouped under three major branches: Sunni Islam; Shia Islam, also known as Shiite; and Sufism.

Sunni Islam represents the largest grouping in Islam. Of the world’s 1.2 billion Muslims, more than one billion are generally counted as Sunni, which is about 90 percent of all Muslims. This figure is somewhat deceptive, however, since Sufism is probably under-reported in many parts of Africa, the Middle East, and Asia.

Sunni Muslims trace themselves back to the prophet but separate from Shia Muslims over the question of proper authority in Islam. Differences here relate to competing claims about connection to Muhammad, the text of the hadith, the shape of Islamic law, and the nature of salvation. Sunni Muslims have themselves disagreed over the methodology of interpreting Muslim law and have divided into four main schools of jurisprudence: Hanafite, Malikite, Shafiite, and Hanbalite.

There are about 170 million Shia (or Shiite) Muslims globally. In spite of minority status, the Shia version of Islam received enormous attention because of the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979. The shah of Iran was deposed, and the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), the well-known Shiite Muslim leader, returned from exile in France to run the country. The Iranian view of the West was and is shaped powerfully by anger over British and American plots to foment a coup in Iran in 1953–1954.

In Sunni Islam, the imam is the person who leads prayer in the mosque. In Shiite Islam the word “imam” is used most significantly of major leaders chosen by Allah to guide Shia Islam in its earliest and most important years. One Shia group believes there were 12 such leaders while the Ismaili Muslims argue that there were only 7. The Zaydiyya Shia, a minority group in Yemen, contends there were five imams. The Twelver group and the Ismaili Muslims place emphasis on the claim that the last imam is alive, but placed in a state of supernatural hiddenness by Allah. There are about 150 million Twelver Shi’ites in the world and about 15 million Ismailis. The most famous Ismaili is the Aga Khan, the hereditary leader of the Nazari branch.

Shia Muslims give enormous significance to the martyrdom of Husayn, whose father Ali (d. 661), was the son-in-law of the prophet. Husayn and fellow Muslims were killed by Sunni Muslims at Kerbala (in modern-day Iraq) on the 10th day of the Muslim month of Muharran in 680. Shia Muslims engage in elaborate rituals to honor his memory, and Shia pilgrims travel to his shrine in Karbala.

The Sufis are famous as the mystics of Islam. Some scholars estimate their numbers at 240 million throughout the world. Sufism emerged when Islam became legalistic and materialistic in the twilight years of the earliest Muslim dynasties. Al-Ghazali (1058–1111), the great Islamic devotional writer, turned to Sufism as an alternative to the speculative, uncertain paths of philosophy and reason. Sufism is most famously represented by the Whirling Dervishes (darvishes; literally, beggars), who practice a kind of mystical dance used to help the dancer resist outside stimuli and focus on the mind of Allah. Rumi (1207–1273), the great Persian poet and mystic, is probably the most famous Sufi.

Islam has often been shaped by local folk customs. Thus, scholars often speak of a folk Islam. Muslims in Pakistan or Nigeria use charms to ward off evil while in India strands of hair are hung at shrines to protect children. In many Muslim countries the Muslim shaman uses local tribal customs to keep Satan away. Muslims in many Islamic countries use magical objects to keep from being hurt by the evil eye. More orthodox Muslims dismiss these folk traditions as superstition.

The Progress of the Faith The dominant motifs of the Prophet Muhammad's life become the pattern, in one form or another, in Islamic history from the seventh century to the present. His own defense of Islamic truth is duplicated through the centuries by given leaders and movements. His willingness to bear arms under particular circumstances becomes the standard for declarations of jihad. His concern for a united community of the faithful is replicated worldwide from his death to the present, as Muslims of all types unite in the annual hajj to Mecca.

Muhammad's expansionist vision gripped Islam in the earliest years following the death of the Prophet. The rapid spread of Islam is probably the most striking thing about the first century of Islamic life. Muslims conquered Damascus by 636, ruled Jerusalem by 638, and controlled Syria by 640. Egypt came under Islamic control by 646, and the Sassanid dynasty in Persia fell by 651. Muslims moved into Spain in the early eighth century, and King Roderick of Spain was defeated in 711. Though Charles Martel stopped the Muslim advance in southern France in 732, the extent of the Islamic empire by then is startling.

The incredibly rapid spread of Islam is especially noteworthy, given the hostilities that dogged Islam from its inception. It is as if the strife in Muhammad's own life, and his battles with fellow Arabs, became a deep psychic reality in the Islamic mindset, setting brother against brother. Thus, Uthman, the third caliph in Sunni Islam, was assassinated in 656. The Kharijites formed in 657 out of direct opposition to Ali, the fourth caliph in the Sunni tradition, because of his perceived weaknesses in responding to the emerging Umayyad dynasty.

These tensions between those faithful to Ali (the Shiites) and the early Umayyad leaders culminated in the killing of Husayn, Ali's son, in 680 CE. As noted earlier, this killing radically impacted the Shias, who trace their roots to Ali as the proper successor to Muhammad. The war between Iran and Iraq in the 20th century played out against the backdrop of these earliest days of hostility.

Divisions within Islam are reflected to some degree in the changing Islamic dynasties. Albert Hourani documents more than 30 dynasties in A History of the Arab Peoples. Some of these emerge as a result of victory over Christian, Hindu, or Buddhist opposition, but many are simply a reflection of one Muslim dynasty expanding its control base by conquering other Islamic rulers and peoples. Often a dynasty crumbled from within as a once trusted servant from outside the tribe or nation started his own kingdom. As often as not, the dynasty crumbled when an heir did not have the capacity to rule as a monarch and lost the support of the people and the court, or was unable to lead the defense of the land from outsiders. This was certainly the case in medieval Spain.

Such realities explain why many dynasties, like the Aglabids in eastern Algeria (800–909) or the Buyids in Iran/Iraq (932–1062) or the Almohads in the Maghreb (1130–1269), did not survive. Survival between various Muslim groups is a tribute to the political acumen displayed in dynasties that spanned over half a millennium. The Abbasids ruled the Middle East and North Africa from 749 through 1258. The Ottomans dominated the Muslim world from 1281 through to 1922, a staying power rarely found in the history of civilizations.

The story of unrest in Islamic history is to a great degree the story of political and military rivalries, sometimes rooted in nationalist, ethnic, and tribal realities, as in the conflicts between Arab and non-Arab Muslims. However, divisions are also a reflection of competing visions of what constitutes true Islam. This is most evident, of course, in ongoing tensions between Sunni and Shiite, but was also reflected in the treatment of those deemed to be unfaithful to basic Islamic doctrine, practice, and the dictates of Muslim law.

For example, there were a few leaders who denied that Muhammad ever taught that he was the final prophet, and they duplicated his call to a new revelation from Allah. Thus, in the mid-eighth century Al-Muqanna (aka Hashim ibn Hakim) declared himself to be a prophet and a god. The view that the Koran is eternal was resisted strongly by the Mutazalite movement of the early decades of the ninth century. Sufi Muslims have been the frequent targets of the wrath of orthodoxy. Al-Hallaj, a Sufi master, was tortured and beheaded in 922.

Internal tensions between Muslims pale somewhat in light of the animosities fueled in the early years of Muslim-Christian conflict. Toledo was recaptured by Christians in 1085, good news for Catholic and Orthodox leaders, who were stunned by the Seljuk defeat of the Byzantines at Manikert in 1071. Pope Urban II (r. 1088–1099) called for a crusade against the Turks in 1095, and Jerusalem was in Christian hands by the end of the century.

Muslim misfortunes were reversed under Saladin (Salah-ad-Din Yusuf ibn-Ayyub, 1138–1193) who served as a minister to the Islamic Fatimid rulers in Egypt. Saladin took control of Egypt in 1171 and went on to retake Jerusalem from the Christians in 1187, just five years before his death. In the next century the anti-Islamic focus of the Christian Crusades gave way to hostilities between Catholic and Orthodox Christians. Their doctrinal split of 1054 was sealed in blood when Catholic armies sacked Constantinople in 1204, in a spree of murder, rape, and theft.

Historians trace the rise of the Ottoman Empire to 1281 when Osman I (1258–1321) took over as bey (ruler) after his father's death. Osman is known chiefly for his exploits against the Byzantine lands. The 14th century witnessed radical shifts in power between competing Islamic dynasties and armies (Ottoman, Mongol, Hafsids, Mamluk, Ilkhanid, Timurid). Despite the shifting political and military scene, Muslims were free to travel through the whole Islamic world. Ibn Battuta (1304–1368), one famous explorer, traveled for almost 30 years.

Ottoman ruler Mehmed II conquered Constantinople in 1453. In the next century the Mughal leader Babur (Zahir-ud-Din Muhammad, 1483–1530) was victorious at a battle in Panipat in 1526. Suleiman I (1494–1566), the great Ottoman leader, ruled as far north as Budapest, as far west as Morocco, east to Iraq, and south to Yemen. His naval commander Khair ad-Din (aka Barbarossa) ruled the eastern Mediterranean for decades. During the same time period, Akbar (1542–1605), the third Mughal emperor, controlled a large part of northern India from 1556 through 1605. Songhai, the large African empire, was under Saadi Muslim rule by 1591.

Indonesia, now the most populous Muslim country, was under Islamic influence by the 16th century. Shah Jahan (d. 1666) started construction of the Taj Mahal in Agra in 1632, and Morocco came under Alawi control in 1668. However, Islamic expansionism received a severe blow with the draining of Ottoman powers in wars with Poland from 1682 through 1699. Further, in a dramatic turn, the Ottomans again failed to take Vienna in 1683. The Muslim threat to Christian Europe declined in face of the waning of Ottoman power and the rising military superiority of a revived Europe.

However, it is inconceivable that Islam could have been destroyed either by bullets or by competing beliefs. By the time Napoleon conquered Egypt in 1798, Islam had survived for almost 1,200 years. The famous French leader captured Muslim lands but was unable to win their hearts or minds, regardless of Muslim respect for his military prowess.

Islamic orthodoxy has dealt harshly with innovative movements in the modern era. Druze Muslims, based largely in Lebanon, faced steady persecution through the 20th century. As well, the Ahmadiyya Muslims have endured widespread harassment for their “heretical” view that their founder, Mirza Ghulam Hazrat Ahmad Qadiyani (1835–1908), is a prophet and the promised messiah (madhi) of Islam. The Nation of Islam has faced a cold reception in America for its assertion of unorthodox belief. The Baha’i Faith, a new religion born in Iran, has seen many of its members martyred since its inception. (One of the Baha’is problems was the perception that the Baha’is had aligned with the shah and many of the shah’s secret police were Baha’is.)

On a global scale, modern Islam has been impacted most by the powerful ideologies that have swept the West since the Enlightenment. Skepticism and Rationalism has either eroded confidence in Islam or determined the nature of Islamic apologetic. As with Catholic monarchies, various notions of democracy have also threatened Muslim leaders and regimes. Muslim thinkers have been forced to articulate a reconstructed Islam to respond to emerging global ideologies.

The success of Islamist movements in the 20th century was based on the work of purists in the previous two centuries who were alarmed by the decline of Muslim power and stability, a reality that signaled to them that the ideals of the Prophet had been betrayed by his professed followers and leaders.

The revivalist impulse in Saudi Arabia goes back to the writings of Muhammad al-Wahhab (1703–1792). He was the ideological founder of the Wahhabi movement, which eventually gained control in the heartland of Islam. He also influenced Islamic reformers in the next century, most notably Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897) and his student Muhammad Abduh (1849–1905).

In the 20th century anti-colonial, pro-Arabic, and pro-Islamic movements dominated the Muslim story. There was not simply a resistance to the West of the kind expressed in Ali Shariati’s influential work Westoxication (1962), but also a strong revolt against Arab governments viewed as un-Islamic and corrupt. As noted earlier, Iran became the scene of Shiite radicalism that led to the toppling of the shah in 1979, leading to the present theocratic state.

The Muslim Brotherhood, founded by the youthful Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949), was formed in 1928. Iraq gained independence in 1932. Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi (1903–1979) championed Muslim ideals in both India and Pakistan through his Jamaat-e-Islam movement. Hasan al-Banna was assassinated in 1949 for his push for radical reform in Egypt. Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966), unimpressed by his student days in America, took up al-Banna’s cause and became the new voice against secular trends in Egypt and throughout the Muslim world. He was executed by the Egyptian government in 1966.

Afghanistan gained freedom from Soviet oppression in 1989. Islamic radicalism gained a foothold in Indonesia (the most populous Muslim country) late in the 20th century, and similar forces arose in Nigeria, Sudan, Algeria, and Pakistan. Less volatile expressions of Islamic ascendancy are seen with the formation of the League of Arab States in 1945 and the Muslim World League in 1962. Even the Million Man March on October 6, 1995 (promoted by Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan), was seen by many as an expression of Islam’s growing potency.

The Palestinian question also fueled the growth of Islamic militancy. Tensions in Palestine between Muslims (and Arab Christians) and Jews date back to the first wave of Jewish immigrants in the late 1800s. The British government’s 1917 Balfour Declaration heightened Arab unrest, as did Western support for a Jewish state 30 years later, both providing the context for the declaration of the state of Israel in May 1948.

Six wars between Arabs and Jews since Israel’s formation have further heightened Muslim-Jewish hostilities. These tensions were also shown in the rise of the first intifadah (uprising) in 1987. A second intifadah in 2000 followed the breakdown of talks at Camp David between Yasser Arafat (1929–2004) and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Islamic militant groups like Hamas and Hezbollah have called for an armed jihad against Israel. In 2009 U.S. President Barack Obama inherited the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as one of his most important foreign-policy issues.

American exposure to radical Islamism came with the arrest of Americans in Tehran in 1979, the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993, the explosions at American embassies in Africa, the attack on the USS Cole in Yemen, and then the attacks of September 11. These events are an indication of the depth of Islamic mistrust and hatred of the West, but they also have illustrated the deep ideological divisions among Muslims over what constitutes ideal Islam and its proper defense.

The revivalist trends of the last two centuries, expressed in moderate and extreme Islamist movements, have created a dilemma for the Islamic world. On the one hand, the success of Islamism has led to a new pride about the faith proclaimed by Muhammad. Nevertheless, the fundamentalist impulse has created renewed conflict among Muslims, expressed in divisions over Islamist groups, including the Taliban in Afghanistan. As well, there are bitter internal disputes about the role of women, human rights, and the proper scope of Islamic law in both the Islamic world and the West.

Islamism

Islamism (also known as Islamic revivalism or, popularly in the West, as Islamic fundamentalism) is the name given to a set of popular new religious movements that appeared in the Muslim world through the 20th century, though these newer movements have their roots in older groups that in the 18th and 19th centuries criticized the faltering Ottoman Empire and the intrusion of Western powers in the Middle East. The 1922 fall of the Ottoman caliphate, whose empire had once stretched from North Africa to Persia and from Yemen to the gates of Vienna, and the rise of national states in its place became the seminal event in the emergence of this movement, which has as a keynote the call to return to an Orthodox Islamic state in which Islamic law gives shape to the community's life. The Islamic tradition is strongly opposed to the modern Enlightenment ideal of separation of religion and government that now prevails in most of the non-Muslim world.

Mosque, London. (J. Gordon Melton)

In the last generation the Islamist tradition, a relatively small movement in the Islamic world, has been wedded to a program of terrorism, here defined as activity that does not so much have as its end the destruction of any given designated target but of using a target as a means of spreading anxiety, destabilizing the social order, and provoking a reaction from the targeted enemy. A relatively small number of people can use terrorist tactics to mobilize reactions far more extensive and costly than the energy and resources expended by the terrorist group.

Among the first movements that took advantage of the weakening of the Ottoman Empire was the Wahhabi movement, named for Mohammad ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (ca. 1703–1791), who emerged in Arabia as a critic of the Ottoman Empire, the lax practice of Islam among the Sunnis (the largest group), and the tolerance of what he considered the heretical practices of the various Sufi brotherhoods. He adopted a literalistic approach to the interpretation of the Koran, the Muslim holy book, and the hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. He gained an initial following around Mecca, but found long-lasting support from the Saud family. Around 1763, the Saudi sheikh began a conquest of Arabia. The Ottoman sultan tried to halt the erosion of his territory, but only in 1818 was he able to drive the Sauds into the desert. They were gradually pushed back until 1889, when they fled into exile in Kuwait. The almost dead Wahhabi movement was reborn when the head of the Saud family recaptured the family's traditional capital, Riyadh, in 1902 and over the next generation took control of what in 1932 became Saudi Arabia.

After World War II, the wealth of the Saudis allowed them to become missionaries for Islam and for the strict interpretations of Islamic law demanded by the Wahhabi perspective. Their striving in the cause of Islam (jihad) was manifest in the creation of the Committee for Encouraging Virtue and Preventing Vice to enforce public conformity to Islamic law in Saudi Arabia, the founding of the World Muslim League, support for the building of mosques in the West, and the sending out of a significant number of Wahhabi teachers to Muslim countries to win Muslims to their way.

Another significant movement that presaged 20th-century Islamism was the Pan-Islamic Unity movement launched by Persian teacher Sayyid Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897). While Wahhab concentrated his criticisms on the laxity of Sunni Muslims and the heretical practices of Sufi and Shia Muslims in Arabia, al-Afghani had traveled widely in the West and turned his critical pen against the Western nations, their immoral and degenerate culture, and their imperialist designs on the Middle East. He also picked up the Wahhabi critique of lax Muslims and called for the removal of some Muslim leaders of whom he disapproved.

Al-Afghani wrote at a time that Great Britain was making its presence felt in the Middle East, especially in Yemen, Egypt, and the Sudan. At the same time, the French were asserting themselves as the new colonial power over Islamic territories in northwest Africa, and they cooperated on the building of the Suez Canal in the 1860s. Throughout this period, the Ottomans were being slowly pushed out of the Balkans, a process that culminated in World War I and the choice of the sultan to side with the Austro-Hungarians. Following the war, a variety of national states arose in the former Ottoman lands, and in 1922 the sultan was deposed to make way for the modern state of Turkey. The final end of the Ottoman era, together with the disappearance of the caliphate, which had been in place in some form since the death of the Prophet Muhammad in 632 CE, set the stage for a new breed of revitalization movements.

Al-Imam Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949) grew up in an Egypt dominated by Great Britain. He became the disciple of al-Afghani through Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935), who continued al-Afghani's message in a periodical, al-Manar, that called Muslims to seek inspiration from the example of virtuous early Muslims. Rida was still active when, just six years after the fall of the caliphate, al-Banna founded Al-Ikhwan Al-Moslemoon, the Muslim Brotherhood, which began as a movement calling Egyptian youth to put away non-Muslim aspects of their life (including folk magic) and living their life according to the Koran and hadith. As the movement spread, its program expanded and came to include an array of social programs, including the Muslim Mothers' Institute for the education of women.

In the mid-1930s, however, al-Banna and the Brotherhood members were especially affected by the volatile developments in Palestine that followed the pullout of British forces. And when the state of Israel was proclaimed in 1948, members of the Brotherhood joined the forces fighting the new government. Within Egypt, they had also become more radicalized, and several assassinations of government officials were attributed to them. Publicly, al-Banna emphasized the need to Islamize the government. He was himself assassinated in March 1949.

The movement continued in Egypt until suppressed by then Prime Minister Gamel Abdel Nasser (1918–1970) in 1954, by which time Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966) had become its new theoretician. Nasser did not totally destroy the Brotherhood, which continues to the present, but he did succeed in marginalizing it for many years, during which time its impulse passed to other groups. Among those newer movements was the Jamaat-e-Islam. Founded by Indian Muslim Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979), the Jamaat emerged in the context of the Indian independence movement and the separation of Pakistan as an independent state. As a young intellectual, Mawdudi began to ruminate on the conflict between Islam and Western culture. He also criticized Indian nationalism, the effect of which he concluded would be the destruction of Muslim identity. As he watched Muslim leaders toy with various strands of political and cultural ideologies, he saw a need to reconstruct Islamic thought. That need led to the founding of Jamaat-e-Islam in 1941. He moved to what is now Pakistan, where he worked for the formation of an Islamic state, and was often the object of negative government action for his criticisms of their un-Islamic nature.

During his long career, he authored more than 100 books and pamphlets, the most important of which were translated into various Middle Eastern and European languages. Beginning in 1956 he traveled widely, which served to further his influence. Although many were quite critical of his ideas, he found pockets of support throughout the Muslim world. His influence was expanded through the effort of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood leader Sayyid Qutb. Qutb was changed through his reading of Mawdudi in 1951 on the heels of his sojourn in America. He had seen the problem of American culture and was inspired by Mawdudi's idea of Islam as a complete way of life. The ideas of al-Banna and Mawdudi came together for him in a revised program to turn Egypt into an Islamic state. He suggested that a revolutionary vanguard should take over the government and then slowly reimpose Islam on Egyptian society. His mature thought appeared in his 1965 book, Milestones (Ma'alim fi al-tariq), the ideas of which led directly to his execution the next year. His writings, however, survived, and they now stand beside Mawdudi's as the major literary expression of the first generation of Islamism. They have provided the platform on which the later, more violent groups have built, their ideas being cited to support programs that have included assassinations, guerrilla warfare, and widespread terrorist activity, and in the case of both the Islamic Nationalist Front (Sudan) and the Taliban, successful revolutions.

Crucial to the development of the Islamist position was the assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat (1918–1981), a reaction to the Camp David Accords, by which Egypt recognized the state of Israel. A booklet was left at the site of his death, roughly translated as The Neglected Duty. Building on Qutb's idea, this pamphlet blamed the West for Islam's problems. Its content suggested that all of the citizens of those Western countries that were attempting culturally to undermine Islamic society were guilty of attacking Islam, and hence were viable targets for death. This position spread among Islamist groups and has become basic to the terrorist program.

The opposition to the influx of Western political influence and culture, as well as to the leadership of secularized Muslims ruling countries apart from Islamic law, was strongest in Sunni countries, and prior to 1979 had its only major success in Saudi Arabia. However, Islamic revivalism also developed a presence in Shiite countries. In Persia, it appeared in the person of a young student, Navvab Safavi (1923–1956). He headed a secretive group known as the Devotees of Islam. The small group developed a program opposed to foreign influence in Persia (Iran) and is credited with the assassinations of government officials (including a prime minister and several intellectuals). In the mid-1950s the Devotees were suppressed and Safavi executed (1956). The thrust of the group, however, was not lost. It survived in the thoughts of the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), who as a relatively unknown cleric protested Safavi's being put to death. It then came to the forefront in the Iranian Revolution, as a result of which the secularized government of the shah was replaced by a new government that reunited clerical and political power in Iran and inspired a variety of Safavi groups in other countries with a significant Shiite presence.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the Islamist movement emerged in every Muslim country with more or less approval from the government's leaders. Among the more famous groups are Hizballah (the Party of God, also known as Islamic Jihad, Lebanon); Hamas (the Islamic Resistance Movement, Lebanon), an outgrowth of the Palestinian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood; the Islamic Salvation Front (Algeria); the National Islamic Front (Sudan); and al-Jama' al Islamiyya (Egypt). The Russian incursion into Afghanistan occasioned the rise of a new group inspired by the Wahhabis, the Taliban, which emerged as the power in the land after the Russians were driven out. In 1995, Egyptian Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman and nine other Islamists from various countries were convicted on charges related to the bombing of the World Trade Center in 1993. of Kuwait, and the success of the coup in Sudan in 1989, Saudi Arabian Osama bin Laden (b. 1957) developed one of the most radical of Islamist groups, al-Qaeda, accused by Western political leaders of masterminding the attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001. Bin Laden apparently was introduced to the spectrum of Islamist thought by Muhammad Qutb, the brother of Sayyid Qutb, and Abdullah Azzam (1941–1989), a Jordanian who worked with Hamas prior to taking a post at King Abdul Aziz University in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. While sharing a common heritage in the earlier movements, each organization has been particularly involved in local issues and at times (especially after the events of September 11, 2001) often eager to identify with or distance itself from particular actions believed to have been taken by another group.

During the last quarter of the 20th century, the question of Palestinian rights, the leadership of Afghanistan, the Gulf War, and the interaction of the Middle East and Western countries over oil were but a few of the issues focusing the attention of the different Islamist groups. In this context the distinctions between a new religious movement, a political activist group, and even a terrorist group become quite blurred. In the wake of some of the horrendous events that have been ascribed to various groups, it is often forgotten and/or seen as irrelevant that the actions can be traced to religious motivations. Given the nature of the more positive central teachings of the major religions, the violence that has punctuated religious history can easily be ignored. No religion of any size or length of time on Earth has been able to separate itself completely from identifications with governments and the wars they have waged.

Following the attacks on the Pentagon and World Trade Center, the United States initiated a military operation in Afghanistan under a policy enunciated by President George W. Bush that it would treat governments that gave haven to terrorist groups the same as the groups. The stated aims of the operation were to find Osama bin Laden and those other al-Qaeda officials deemed directly responsible for the attacks on America, to destroy al-Qaeda as a viable organization, and to replace the Taliban rule in Afghanistan. Of the three objectives, the first two were not accomplished and the third only partially accomplished. Both al-Qaeda and the Taliban leadership retreated into the mountains along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border and have survived, the latter still in control of part of the country.

In 2003, claiming that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and had supported al-Qaeda, the United States invaded the country with the goal of removing dictator Saddam Hussein (1937–2006). In this case, the regime was quickly toppled and Hussein eventually captured. A new government was installed and it executed Hussein in 2006. However, as in Afghanistan, the military operation proved unable to subdue the countryside and, as of 2009, operations continue.

In January 2009, Barack Obama assumed the presidency of the United States with a pledge of ending the war in Iraq as soon as possible and completing the war in Afghanistan. Meanwhile, since the beginning of the Afghanistan war, al-Qaeda has been active but has no spectacular success to report. Its leader has periodically issued statements, but they reflect on new theoretical developments. Groups allied to al-Qaeda also continue activities, and bombings and bombing attempts traced to Islamist groups have become an almost daily occurrence, most being suicide bombings. However, there has been the occasional spectacular event such as the 2004 bombing in Madrid and the 2009 hotel-takeover in Mumbai.

Since the end of the 1940s, the ideology of the Islamists has placed them in conflict with the authorities in a host of countries whose laws they have violated in pursuing their ends. While many Islamists have died in violent incidents, many have also landed in jail. In recent years, efforts to counter what are seen as extremist and anti-Muslim ideology, especially the justification of targeting innocent people even in the pursuit of a high ideal, have been stepped up, and Muslim clerics have made repeated efforts to convert Islamists to a more traditional Muslim position. The withdrawal of the belief that Allah condoned the killing of non-combatants who did not support the Islamist position would undermine the Islamist program.

■ Isle of Man

The Isle of Man, located in the Irish Sea northwest of the city of Liverpool, is a British Crown dependency, though officially not included in the United Kingdom. A mere 220 square miles, the island is home to 72,000 people, the majority of whom are Norse Gaelic. Many speak English, but a minority hang on to their dialect of Gaelic.

The island was inhabited during the first millennium BCE by Celts. Irish Catholic monks arrived on the island around year 400 of the Common Era and began the process of converting the population, a process that appears to have been completed over the next two centuries. The island was invaded by Vikings in the ninth century and annexed to Norway. The Vikings introduced a system of government, the Tynwald, which remains the governing system to the present. The island remained a Norwegian possession until sold to Scotland in 1266. It came into British hands a century later

The island existed as a semi-autonomous possession for the next 500 years, but in the 18th century it became a haven for smuggling to the point that the British acted and turned the Isle into a dependency. It still operates as a self-governing dependency of the United Kingdom, which is responsible for any foreign relations

The Isle of Man remained Roman Catholic until the Reformation of the 16th century, when its churches were incorporated into the Church of England. The Diocese of Sodor and Man retains the religious allegiance of the largest percentage of the island's residents. It also has a special relationship with the state and retains its own canon law, which differs somewhat from the rest of the Anglican Church.

The Roman Catholic Church has revived on the Isle of Man, as it has in the rest of the United Kingdom after several centuries of repression following the Reformation. It is currently the second largest church on the island, the congregations being included within the Diocese of Liverpool.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, first visited the Isle of Man in 1777, and the Methodist Church (UK) remains the third largest faith on the island. It now competes, however, with a spectrum of more than 20 Protestant and Free Church denominations. With the exception of the United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom and the Baptist Union of Great Britain, whose work began in the 19th century, the remaining churches have relatively small memberships.

Ismaili Islam

Following the death of Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765 CE), the imam around whom much of the Shiite Muslim community had gathered, a crisis of leadership emerged. The Shia community had invested authority in the physical family of the Prophet Muhammad (ca. 570–632) and in the descendants of his son-in-law, Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. 661). During the eighth century, that lineage had passed to the eldest sons in the family of Ali's son al-Husyan. However, the eldest son of al-Sadiq, designated the sixth imam, Ismail al-Mubarakhad (d. 760), died prior to his father. The main body of Shiites turned their attention to the younger brother, Musa al-Kazim (d. 796/797), and continued their leadership through his descendants.

One group of Shiites clung to Ismail as the seventh imam (ruling authority) of their community (hence their popular designation as Seveners), and chose his son Muhammad al-Matymum (d. 813) to lead them. Through Muhammad, a new line of caliphs developed. The movement spread through the next century and became particularly strong in North Africa. In 945, the Ismailis established control in Tunisia, from which they spread westward to the Atlantic. In 969 the Ismailis unseated the ruler of Egypt, and in 973 established their imam as the new caliph with his throne in the new city of Cairo. The Fatimid Empire (named after Fatimah, the daughter of Muhammad and wife of Ali) soon moved into the older territories controlled by the Sunni caliph now headquartered in Baghdad. Syria briefly fell under its control.

The Fatimid dynasty lasted for two centuries. Egypt prospered, and a relatively tolerant attitude toward other religions was evident. Among the Fatimids' cultural accomplishments was the founding of Al-Azhar University. The beginning of the end of the Fatimid dynasty came with the split of the Fatimid community into two factions in 1094. The ruler, Abu Tamim Ma'add al-Mustansir bi'llah (d. 1094), had intended that his son Abu Mansur Nizar (1045–1095) should become his successor. However, forces within the community that favored his younger brother Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad (1074–1101) declared him the new caliph. In the civil war that resulted, Nizar was defeated and subsequently executed; however, his line of succession was recognized by the important Ismaili community in Persia and Iraq. Ismailis in Syria, Yemen, and India recognized the lineage through Abu'l-Qasim Ahmad, known as al Mustali. They were later known as Mustali Ismailis.

The remaining Mustali Ismaili rulers of the Fatimid regime were beset with problems, including the Christian Crusades. Originally, the Fatimids had aligned with the Crusaders against their mutual enemy, the Abbasid caliph. However, in the 12th century, the Crusaders turned on the Fatimids and were able to inflict several defeats that left them in a greatly weakened condition. They were thus unable to withstand the onslaught of the Abbasid leader, Saladin the Magnificent (1138–1193), who took Cairo in 1171. They were also afflicted with internal dissension, which included several important splits over succession to the imamate.

One important faction of the Mustali Ismailis supported the cause of al-Tayyib, the infant son reportedly born to the assassinated Caliph al-Amir in 1130. An elder member of the family assumed the role of regent; the infant al-Tayyib was never seen, and his fate remains unknown. In the years after the fall of the Fatimid dynasty, most of the Ismaili factions were suppressed. However, the Ismaili leader in Yemen, Queen al-Sayyida, came to believe in the imamate of al-Tayyib. Because of her efforts, the followers of al-Tayyib alone survived among the several Mustali factions. Because her powers extended to Gujarat, this group also survived in India, where the Mustali Tayyib Ismailis became known as Bohras.

Meanwhile, the Ismailis who had favored Nizar came to believe that he was the reincarnation of Ismail returned to earth to rule. They also saw Nizar as the initiator of a new lineage of imams. Withdrawing from Egypt, his descendants moved to the new center of their support in Persia. A new headquarters arose at Alamut, a mountain outpost in northern Persia (Iran).

The Alamut era began one of the more infamous eras in Islamic history, as Nizari Ismaili leaders perpetuated their dream of continuing the Fatimid dynasty and ultimately replacing the Sunnite caliph in Baghdad. Alamut became a center of guerrilla warfare carried out through a network of Ismaili communities, now largely working underground, throughout the Abbasid-controlled lands. To undergird their new life, the Ismaili leadership proposed a doctrine of repudiation, the right to break the laws of Islam as a preparation for the arrival of al-Mahdi (the retuning seventh Imam), who would upon his appearance restore them. The Nizari offered followers wine and hashish and called for jihad (holy war) against the Sunni majority. From their use of hashish they became known as the Assassins—a word that later became attached to their practice of sending agents skilled in the arts of poisoning, killing, and disguise to murder targeted leaders. They were accredited with the murder of several caliphs.

The Assassins existed for the next two centuries as a cancer in the empire, operating from Alamut and other mountain fortresses in Syria and Palestine. The beginning of the end of the Assassins came with the fall of Alamut to the Mongols in 1256, though some of the Syrian fortresses held out until the 16th century, by which time the Ottoman Empire had arisen. Though no longer a military force, the Nizari Ismailis did not disappear. The lineage of imams continued, and in the 1830s the imam was given the title Aga Khan. The Alamut era also gave birth to several additional new variations on Shiite perspectives, most important, Alevism. The Alevis continue as a minority religious community in Turkey, Lebanon, and Syria. There are a number of separate Ismaili groups holding dissenting opinions on issues concerning the predicted al-Mahdi, though each is quite small, with membership numbering in the hundreds.

Very early in their history, the Ismailis began to engage in some mystical and even occult speculations. From their beginning with the seventh Shia imam, numerology began to play a role in their thought. Other events prompted the development of various secret rituals, some of which took on special importance when combined with speculation over the end of the age and the reappearance of al-Mahdi. These speculations, although done in the context of Orthodox Islam, on occasion challenged the tradition, especially when the Ismailis critiqued Muslim law.

Today, the great majority of Ismailis are Nizari associated with the Aga Khan, now operating through the His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, which in turn works through a variety of national and local branches around the world. The majority reside in India, though during the 20th century they became dispersed worldwide. During the late Alamut era, a number of missionaries were sent to India from Persia, and a thriving Ismaili community developed in Gujarat and the Sind (now part of Pakistan). When in 1840, the then Aga Khan was forced out of Persia, he settled among the larger concentration of his followers in India, where they are locally referred to as Khojas, a term of respect meaning “honorable person.”

Those Ismailis who trace their lineage back to al-Tayyib and al-Mustali also survived primarily in western India, in the area around Mumbai (Bombay). Here they have split into several groups and are now dispersed around the world. The largest group is organized as the Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyabi Dawoodi Bohra.

■ Israel

The modern state of Israel is located on land with a rich religious history, much of which is recorded in the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament). That history includes a variety of Pagan faiths (whose presence dates to at least 7000 BCE) and preeminently Judaism. Much of this ancient history lies beyond the reach of this encyclopedia, which picks up the story with the entrance of Alexander the Great (356–323 BCE).

Over the centuries, the borders of the political entities that were Israel/Palestine changed with relative frequency as different invading forces found more or less success. The malleability of the borders has remained the case over the decades since the founding of the modern state of Israel in 1949. In 1967, Israel occupied land that had been designated by the United Nations for a Palestinian state. Since that time, the Gaza Strip and West Bank have been under variant levels of Israeli oversight, though there is widespread agreement that they will eventually become the core of an independent state.

As of 2008, Israel proper consists of 8,020 square miles of territory on the Mediterranean Sea. It is bounded on the south by Egypt, the north by Lebanon, and the east by Jordan and Syria. The West Bank consists of 2,263 square miles of territory sandwiched between Israel and Jordan and north and west of the Dead Sea. The Gaza Strip includes some 139 square miles on the Mediterranean Sea immediately north of the Egyptian border. There are 11 million people (2008) in Israel and the Occupied Territories, of which 2.4 million reside in the West Bank and 1.5 in the Gaza Strip.

Israel was incorporated into Alexander's kingdom, and during the succeeding Ptolemaic Empire, Greek culture was imposed on the region. The predominantly Jewish residents revolted in 165 BCE under Judas Maccabaeus, and the land remained independent until overrun by Rome in 53 BCE. A revolt in 66 CE led to the destruction of Jerusalem (including the Jewish temple in 70 CE), and a later revolt in 131 led to Jews being forbidden to enter Jerusalem and the land being renamed Syria Palestina. The Roman occupation and suppression of independence movements led to widespread Jewish migration around the Mediterranean Basin and then throughout Europe.

Israel remained under Roman control, part of the Eastern Roman Empire, known after the fall of the empire in the West as the Byzantine Empire. The land was overrun by Muslim Arabs in the 630s and became a center of Islamic culture. It also became the focus of Christian Crusades during the Middle Ages, resulting in the periodic occupation of Jerusalem and portions of Palestine by European Christian forces. However, the rise of the Ottoman Empire re-established Islamic hegemony until the empire's collapse in 1918, at the end of World War I.

Great Britain took control of Palestine in 1918. A year earlier, in the famous Balfour Declaration, the British government had promised the world's Jewish community a homeland in Palestine; however, little progress was made on that promise through the next decades. In the meantime, Jews flocked to the cause of Zionism, the crusade to establish a modern counterpart of the ancient Jewish state, and Zionist organizations assisted Jewish migration to Palestine. Then, following the Jewish Holocaust of World War II, many survivors found their way to Palestine, and in 1948 they declared the formation of Israel. Those countries that had been victorious in the war gave more or less tacit approval to the new country. The creation of Israel caused the displacement of many Palestinians (mostly Muslims) and has led to more than a half century of conflict between Israel and its neighbors (all predominantly Muslim), a conflict that shows little sign of any final resolution.

Israel's original borders were enlarged in the war that followed immediately upon its formation and the Six-Day War (1967). Land taken from Egypt in 1967 was returned as part of the Camp David Accords (1977). The Accords vividly manifested the complicated support system that maintains Israel, which has continued to receive significant financial and military resources from the United States. That support is, in turn, maintained by a coalition of Jewish and conservative Protestant Christian organizations. In the meantime, the liberal Protestant community has tended to support the cause of the Palestinians and their demands for some justice in the light of their claims to Palestine as their homeland.

As the new century begins, Israel is the home to one of the most diverse religious communities in the world. The ancient site of the emergence of Judaism, Israel has had a continuous Jewish presence throughout history, though the size of that community has varied considerably from century to century. As Jews dispersed around the world, numerous variations of Jewish religious life developed, and many who were ethnically Jews secularized and developed a nonreligious ideology.

In 1950, the Israeli government passed what was referred to as the “Law of Return.” It gave every Jew in the world the right to migrate to Israel and settle there. As a result, as the new century begins, approximately 75 percent of the population are Jews. By 1995, 53 percent of the Jewish population had been born in Israel, 42 percent were first-generation immigrants from Europe or the Americas, and 5 percent came from Africa and Asia. The government includes a Ministry of Religion assigned to deal with the needs and problems of the Jewish community. It is active through a number of local councils and committees that operate in towns across the country. Religious matters are also referred to the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, consisting of two chief rabbis, one Ashkenazi (of European heritage) and one Sephardic (of Spanish/Portuguese heritage).

The Jewish community is divided both ethnically and theologically. The primary division is between those Jews who had a background on the Iberian Peninsula (where Jewish life flourished in the Middle Ages, prior to the expulsion of the Jews at the end of the 15th century), and those from Northern and Eastern Europe (including Germany, Poland, and Russia). However, Jews from India (Bene Israel), Ethiopia (Beta Israel), and Yemen have significantly extended the definition of who are Jews for purposes of the Law of Return. The refinement of that definition has been assisted by the denial to African American converts to Judaism and Jewish converts to Christianity from North America and Europe the rights and privileges under the Law of Return.

During the 19th and 20th centuries, Jews in Europe and North America divided first into Orthodox and Reform factions, each with their own rabbinical and congregational organizations, and then developed a spectrum of communities divided by differences over theology and adherence to traditional Jewish religious practices related to dress codes, the consumption of kosher food, the role of women, and activity on the Sabbath. Large communities that adhered to a Conservative Judaism (between the Orthodox and Reform perspective) and a Reconstructionist Judaism (that developed from the Conservative perspective) also emerged. On the far ends of the spectrum are ultra-Orthodox groups and several secularized groups represented by the International Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews.

The mystical and esoteric tendency within the Jewish community came together in the modern world in Hasidism, which spread especially through Eastern Europe in the 18th and 19th centuries. Though severely weakened by the Holocaust, Hasidism has survived in a spectrum of older groups (the largest being the Lubavitch movement) and several newer neo-Hasidic groups such as the Kabbalah Learning Centre, founded in Palestine in 1922.

Orthodox Judaism is the only form of Judaism recognized in Israel. In 1948, the government recognized the Chief Rabbinate as the ruling authority for Judaism. Among the powers assigned to the Chief Rabbinate are matters concerning Jewish marriage, divorce, and burial; decisions concerning the status of any immigrants whose Jewish identity is questioned; and designation of restaurants as kosher. Reform Judaism as the “Movement for Progressive Judaism” and Conservative (or Masorti) Judaism have secular corporate status but have not been recognized by the Chief Rabbinate. There are no provisions in Israeli law for secular marriage or divorce; both non-Orthodox religious Jews and secular Jews continually confront the authority of Orthodox Jewish leadership.

Christianity was born in Israel, developing from the ministry of a Jewish teacher, Jesus bar Joseph, a Nazirite executed by Roman authorities around 30 CE. The early Christian community was centered on Jerusalem, and it was at the famous Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15) that the decision to redirect Christianity toward the non-Jewish world was made. Following the acceptance of Christianity by the Roman Empire, and especially with the rise of Byzantium as the new capital of the empire, Constantinople, Palestine was dominated by Christianity. This hegemony ended with the rise of Islam as the great power in the eastern Mediterranean in the seventh century. Although Islam came to dominate the religious community, Christianity remained alive as, like Judaism, a tolerated religion of the book, and a Christian presence continued through the centuries. Christianity briefly returned to power during the Crusades but has remained a minority since the rise of the Ottoman Empire in the 16th century.

Today, the entire spectrum of Christianity has appeared in Israel, with many Christian groups supporting at least a token presence in what is considered the Christian Holy Land. Traditionally, the land has been the territory of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, which has an honored place as the oldest Christian community in the area. In 451, at the Council of Chalcedon, Jerusalem was formally recognized as one of the four major Orthodox patriarchates. The Roman Catholic Church entered Palestine at the time of the Crusades and is now represented by bishops over both Latin-rite and Eastern-rite dioceses. Roman Catholicism has replaced Eastern Orthodoxy as the largest Christian community in Israel. The Church of England launched a mission in the Eastern Mediterranean in the 19th century, which has resulted in the present Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East.

Protestantism began to develop a life in Palestine in 1839 with the entrance of representatives of the Church of Scotland. Lutherans and Anglicans began a cooperative work in the 1840s, and the Free Church of Scotland came in 1885. The older Scottish work continues today as the St. Andrew's Scots Memorial Church in Jerusalem. Through the 20th century, a number of American and British groups began work, especially after the foundation of the state of Israel. Many conservative evangelical and Pentecostal Christians have seen the emergence of Israel as a prophetic event indicating the beginning of the end-time events described in the book of Revelation in the Christian Bible. The spread of different prophecies regarding the nature of those events have led different groups to launch missionary activities directed toward the Jews both in Israel and elsewhere, and/or to develop a presence in Jerusalem to await the end time, which will include the Second Coming of Jesus.

Although the great majority of Christians in Israel are Palestinians or expatriates, among them is a late-20th-century movement, Messianic Judaism, built around Jewish converts to Christianity who wish to retain their Jewish culture and who emphasize the Jewish element in Christianity (which adopted the Jewish scriptures as part of its Bible). Messianic Jews meet in synagogues (rather than churches) and have been especially condemned by the rest of the Jewish community as dishonest and subversive. Messianic Jews have been denied citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

Islam emerged suddenly in the seventh century and spread quickly from its point of origin in Arabia. An Arab army conquered Palestine in the 630s, and Muslims were the dominant religious force in the area until 1948. Most Muslims are Sunnis of the Hanafite School, though some Shafaiites and Hanbalites are also present. Since the rise of the state of Israel, a variety of groups who follow a conservative form of Islam (Wahhabi) and/or identify with the political struggle of Palestinians have emerged.

The larger Muslim community in Israel is directed by a number of religious councils. Disputes are sent to one of four religious courts, which are assisted by a court of appeals in Jerusalem. Islam is recognized by the state, and most imams are paid out of the state treasury. This status continues a practice still in effect under Islamic rule, in which a spectrum of Jewish and Christian communities were recognized by the state, assigned responsibility for marriage and burial, and supported financially by the state. One implication of this system is that marriages by unrecognized groups are not recognized by the state.

Although Jews and Muslims lived together for many centuries in relative peace, since the formation of the state of Israel, tension has existed between the Jewish authorities and especially those Muslims in Israel (some 12 percent of the population) who have been displaced from their traditional home by the developing state.

Besides the main bodies of Judaism, Islam, and Christianity, there is a spectrum of distinctive groups that have a lengthy history in the region and a relation with one or more of the larger groups. Included are the Druze (which emerged out of Islam in the 11th century); the Baha'i Faith (which emerged out of Shia Islam in Iran but now has its international headquarters in Haifa, Israel); the Kairites (a Babylonian Jewish group); and the Samaritans (a Jewish group that resulted from the intermarriage of Jews and Assyrians in the eighth century BCE). The latter, now a small group of only a few hundred, have become internationally known because of the story of the Good Samaritan included in the Christian New Testament (Luke 10:30–37).

A variety of new religions have arisen in Israel. Among the first of the new youth-oriented religions to manifest were the International Society for Krishna Consciousness and the Transcendental Meditation movement. In the 1980s, an anti-cult movement developed and targeted any groups that it saw as tending to alienate young adults from Orthodox Judaism. It has been especially concerned with Messianic Judaism and other Christian groups that have a history of targeting Jews for conversion. Given the symbolic power of Jerusalem and other holy sites in Israel, a great deal of concern arose at the end of 1999 over possible violent reactions from both Jewish and Christian movements to the end of the century, though no such violence manifested.

Israel, while favoring Orthodox Judaism, and offering special recognition and support to a small number of the larger religious communities, also proclaims religious freedom. That policy has allowed the pluralism so evident in the urban centers. Most Christian groups, especially the Protestant groups, are not recognized, and the registration of marriages performed by Protestant ministers remains a problem. Many Protestant groups are members of the United Christian Council in Israel and are working for some level of recognition for their members. The Council is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Most of the older Catholic and Orthodox groups are members of the Middle East Council of Churches, which is also affiliated with the World Council.

Government policy has, in the main, been directed toward the larger communities, and to that end a Department of Muslim Affairs and a Department of Christian Affairs are included within the Ministry of Religions. Much of the energy of the ministry is spent, not so much in supporting Muslim and Christian religious activity, as in isolating non-Jewish religious groups from young Israelis who might be tempted to reject Judaism. A variety of organizations are dedicated to interfaith dialogue, both in an effort to improve relationships between the different religions and to apply religious insights to Israel's ongoing problems.

Istanbul

Istanbul is the Turkish name for Constantinople, the former capital of the Byzantine Empire that fell to the Muslims in 1453. It remains the center of Eastern Orthodoxy and there are many churches still in the city, but they are vastly outnumbered now by mosques, some of which are actually in or on former churches. The city became the capital of the Ottoman Empire, and from here a huge territory was ruled, and its ruler was the official caliph of the Sunni Islamic world. Some remarkable architects such as Sinan worked in the city and an extraordinary number and variety of beautiful mosques, some of a monumental scale, were constructed. A number of synagogues also exist for the small local Jewish population.

Istanbul was a significant Christian city, the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire under Constantine I and later emperors, and the place of three church council meetings to settle doctrine in 381, 553, and 680–681. Kadıköy (Chalcedon) was the host of a council in 451 and is in the wider Istanbul area today. About 500 churches existed in the city in the Middle Ages while it was the Byzantine capital, some transformed into mosques after the Muslim conquest. Many survive, however, and there are Byzantine, Greek Orthodox,

The Sultan Ahmet Mosque in Istanbul. (Corel)

Armenian, Syrian Orthodox, Catholic, and Protestant churches in the city today. Most important, the Ecumenical Patriarchate, the spiritual center of the Orthodox Church, is located in the city.

In the old city the most famous churches include Hagia Sophia (now a museum), Hagia Eirene and the Church of Saint Sergios and Bacchus (Küçük Aya Sofya), the Rose Mosque (Theodosia Church), and by the Golden Horn the Surp Hreşdagabet Church and the Zeyrek Mosque (Pantokrator Monastery Church). Across the Golden Horn is the Church of England Crimean Memorial Church (Christ Church) and the Virgin Mary Syrian Orthodox Kadim Church along İstiklal Caddesi. Farther north are the Asdvadzadzin Church in Beşiktaş, Fokas Church in Ortaköy and Surp Haç Armenian Church in Kuruçeşme. On the Asian side of the city are the Nigoğayos Church in Beykoz, and the Eufemia and Takavor churches in Kadıköy. Even the Princes' Islands contain churches. The building of churches in Istanbul did not cease with the Muslim conquest of Fatih Sultan Mehmet. Many of the churches of Beyoğlu, Şişli, and the Asian side of the city date from after the 16th century. Like all of Istanbul's buildings, its churches frequently suffered from earthquake and fire. The periodic hostilities between the Muslim majority and the Christian minorities in the 20th century often led to attacks on churches and the expulsion of Christians.

There are several synagogues in Istanbul, ranging from Neve Shalom, quite recently built and with a magnificent chandelier, and other synagogues built for distinct Jewish communities, some like Ahrida being quite old. Recent terrorist attacks on Istanbul synagogues have restricted access to them.

Accounts of Istanbul invariably refer to its multicultural status, but in fact today the city is overwhelmingly Muslim, and in the 20th century waves of persecution against its Christian, in particular Greek and Armenian, communities thoroughly reduced the size of non-Muslims in Istanbul. Many of the buildings remain, however, so there is certainly in architectural terms some religious variety. The capturing of the Byzantine Empire resulted in a huge amount of mosque and madrassa building in Istanbul, and the Ottoman Empire had the services of a brilliant architect, Sinan, who is responsible for some of the most remarkable structures, including the Şezade, Selimiye, Suleymaniye, Rüstem Paşa, and many more, which often include far more than just mosques, but associated buildings such as hospitals, tombs, schools, domestic sections, and so on, all employing Sinan's skill at combining simplicity of form and ornamentation in what often turn out to be huge structures. Since the 16th century mosque building has continued to flourish in Istanbul, and there has been some considerable variation in style. The rapid expansion of the city into the suburbs and countryside, and the growing religiosity of Turkey has led to a steady building program of Islamic structures all through the city.

One of the most impressive mosques is the Sultan Ahmet mosque in the heart of the city, with six unusually slim minarets rather than two or four; it is sometimes called the Blue mosque because of the blue tile work on its exterior. Slightly outside the city is the first mosque built after the taking of the city, the mosque of Eyüp, the standard bearer of the Prophet Muhammad, who is supposed to have died at that spot in an assault on the city.

The Fatih mosque commemorates Fatih Sultan Mehmet, the conqueror of Istanbul and is the site of his mausoleum, and also has a hospital, library, school, and baths, and covers a considerable amount of space. Like several mosques in Istanbul, it is built on the remains of a church. The Beyazit Mosque also comprises of a wide range of buildings along with the mosque itself, but possesses little of the coherence of the Fatih mosque complex.

The 17th-century Yeni Cami, or new mosque, is in Eminönü and has a very impressive tiled interior, while the 19th-century Ortakoy Mosque is in the baroque style, and has elaborate interiors.

Another baroque mosque is the Dolmabahçe, in the palace of the same name, and this contains a wide assortment of styles, and was designed like many of the big mosques—to impress. Here the royal family could pray and receive visitors, and its dramatic position on the Bosphorus makes it a very theatrical building. One of the most melancholy mosques is the Zeyrek Mosque. It was called the Pantocrator in the 12th century, a complex of three churches, in which the royal family was buried, and after the Ottoman conquest in 1453 the buildings became first a madrasa and then a mosque. It is in poor condition and brings to the fore the issue of how to renovate so many old and crumbling religious buildings.

Italian Assemblies of God

The Italian Assemblies of God (Assemblee di Dio in Italia [ADI]) is the largest Pentecostal body in Italy, and Italy's third largest organized religious group after the Roman Catholic Church and the Jehovah's Witnesses. The denomination adopted its name in 1947, when the majority of Italian Pentecostal Churches (most of them established after World War I by immigrants returning from the United States) entered into a treaty with the Assemblies of God (based in the United States). ADI, however, is an independent institution, with its own Italian peculiarities; it did not originate from missionaries sent by the Assemblies of God missions, but from separate Italian American Pentecostal congregations established in America at the beginning of the 20th century, which developed their own independent missions in Italy. Thus, the Italian Assemblies of God cannot be regarded as simply a branch of the U.S. Assemblies of God.

Italian Pentecostals suffered severe persecution under the Fascist regime in the late 1930s and early 1940s. In December 1945, Swiss pastor Hermann Parli (1916–1998) was dispatched to Italy by the Assemblies of God in Great Britain to check how much had survived of Italian Pentecostalism. Through him, contacts with the Assemblies of God in the United States were also established. ADI was formally established on May 22, 1948, with Umberto Goriotti (1904–1982) as the first president and Roberto Bracco (1915–1983) as first secretary. By 1955, member churches had already exceeded 300, with more than 20,000 members (although a part of Italian Pentecostalism resisted institutionalization and, to this date, remains independent of the ADI).

In 1951, the U.S. Assemblies of God sent pastor Antonio Piraino (1915–1992) to Italy in order to help the ADI to expand. ADI also maintained relationships with the Christian Church in North America, an independent Italian American Pentecostal body connected with the origins of Italian Pentecostalism, which in turn sent to Italy pastor Antonio di Biase (1897–1974). With the help of these American churches, ADI was able to establish its own academic institution in 1954, the Istituto Biblico Italiano, under the leadership of Vincenzo Burchieri (1893–1962), sustained by an Italian Christian Educational Foundation. In 1956, ADI launched a Christian radio channel and opened the Orfanotrofio Betania, an orphanage founded by Eliana Rustici (1912–1966); it was the first of several charitable institutions. On December 5, 1959, ADI was officially recognized by the Italian government, and in 1960 financial help from America was discontinued. In 1976, ADI entered into a “spiritual affiliation” agreement with both the Christian Church in North America and its European counterpart, the Italian Christian Churches in North Europe, in order to emphasize that its relationship with the Assemblies of God was not an exclusive one. In 1983, the Missione Evangelica Zigana (Gypsy Evangelical Mission), with some 700 Italian Gypsy members, merged within the ADI. In 2006 several churches of the Bari region separated themselves from the ADI over a dispute on the financial autonomy of local churches and established the independent Chiesa Cristiana Evangelica Assemblee di Dio with a Web site www.assembleedidio.it (while ADI's site is at www.assembleedidio.org). Both the name and the domain name of the newly established splinter group are the subject matter of a legal challenge by ADI, which remains unresolved at the time of this writing.

In 1986, ADI president Francesco Toppi entered into a Concordat with the Italian government, thus enabling inter alia ADI to receive its share of the national religious tax. Member churches currently number more than 1,000, with some 140,000 members. ADI publishes three official periodicals and supports several local radio stations. ADI emphasizes the need for a solid, conservative biblical formation for its pastors, and criticizes the Charismatic churches of second-generation Italian Pentecostalism for putting experience over theological formation and doctrine. In that same light, ADI pastors do not participate in the ecumenical enterprises some of those churches have promoted with non-Pentecostal Protestants and with the Roman Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement.

Italo-Albanian Catholic Church

The Italo-Albanian Catholic Church (aka the Italo Greek Catholic Church) is a small body in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church that exists among people of Greek heritage in southern Italy and Sicily. Christianity in this area developed using the Greek language and following the customs of the Eastern Church rather than the Latin Church, even though it was included in the area under the developing authority of the bishop of Rome. Through the centuries the process of Latinization began, but before it was completed, in the eighth century, the region was shifted from the jurisdiction of Rome to that of Greek Byzantium. Subsequently, a revival of Greek Christianity ensued. In the 11th century, the region was conquered by the Normans. Though returned to the Roman jurisdiction, the Byzantine church was strongly entrenched, and it was only slowly re-Latinized.

The progress that seemed to be leading to the eventual disappearance of the Byzantine rite in southern Italy was reversed in the 1400s when a number of Albanians moved into the area. Those from southern Albania followed the Byzantine rite. Their persistence was rewarded in 1595 when a bishop was appointed for them. Although it remained relatively small and even continued to decline, the Vatican looked with favor on the community and began a slow process of recognition of the group; eventually, in the 19th century, it was given full recognition within the church. In 1732 a seminary was founded in Calabria, and a second opened two years later in Palermo.

Today there are two dioceses serving the church, the Diocese of Lungro, erected in 1919, and the Diocese of Piana degli Albanesi, created in 1937. A third bishop resides at the monastery of Santa Maria de Grottaferrata and serves as its abbot. The monastery was founded in the 11th century and is the oldest structure representative of the continuing Greek tradition in Italy. There is one parish in the United States, the Italian Byzantine Rite Catholic Mission of Our Lady of Grace on Staten Island, New York.

The Italo-Albanian Catholic Church may be contacted through the bishop of Lungro, Vescovado, Corso Skanderberg 54, 87010 Lungro, Italy, or the bishop of Piana degli Albanesi, Piazza S. Nicola 1, 90037 Piana

■ Italy

Located in Southern Europe and one of the original founding members of the European Union, Italy, whose capital city is Rome, has a population of 59.6 million according to the last census (2008).

Italy, as a political entity, only came into existence in 1861, when the “artichoke policy” pursued by the Kingdom of Sardinia, which had successively conquered all the Italian staterelli (small states), led ultimately to the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy, with Turin as its first capital. The capital was moved to Florence in 1866, and in 1870 to Rome, after Italian troops had entered the holy city (which had previously been the capital of an independent state ruled by the pope). Within the territory of the Kingdom of Italy, Roman Catholics constituted a large majority (although hypotheses about the percentage of religious practice vary), with Jews forming the largest minority and Protestants confined to the Waldensian valleys in Piedmont.

The Roman Catholic Church had been largely hostile to the unification of Italy, achieved by the Kingdom of Sardinia ruled by an anticlerical elite, and became even more hostile after the seizure of Rome in 1870. Popes not only routinely excommunicated kings of Italy, but also prevented Italian Catholics, under threat of excommunication, from participating in political life either as candidates or voters, under the non expedit (Latin: it is not appropriate) policy. As a consequence, Italy became a strange democracy in which the papal veto, together with limitations connected with wealth and the exclusion of women, encouraged fewer than 3 percent of Italian adults to vote in most elections. Only in the period immediately preceding World War I were some limited exceptions to the non expedit policy allowed.

In the meantime, Protestants (both Italian Waldensians and all sorts of missionaries from the United States and United Kingdom) saw themselves as obvious supporters of the kingdom’s ruling elite and tried to capitalize on Catholic hostility to the unification in order to establish themselves as the natural allies of the newly established government. Quarrels between the various Protestant denominations prevented the establishment of a national Protestant church, however, and political sympathies did not easily translate into religious conversions, although various Protestant groups (Waldensian Church, Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy, Evangelical Methodist Church of Italy, Christian Brethren, and different independents, followed later by the Churches of Christ and the Salvation Army) were established in all Italian regions, including in the South, where the only Protestant presence had been virtually wiped out in the 16th and the 17th centuries.

In 1922 Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) seized power, having staged a successful coup (the so-called March to Rome), thereby leaving him free to establish his Fascist regime. Although Mussolini was originally an anticlerical freethinker, he later declared himself a Roman Catholic and tried to ingratiate himself with the Roman Catholic Church. Within the framework of this policy, he entered, on February 11, 1929, into a Concordat with the Holy See. The Italian state officially recognized the tiny independent “State of the Vatican” ruled by the pope and granted a number of privileges to the Catholic Church, including state salaries for parish priests and the teaching of the Catholic religion, controlled by local bishops, in public schools. After 1929, the initial Fascist tolerance of religious minorities turned into discrimination and persecution, particularly of those groups recently established by immigrants who had converted in the United States and returned to Italy (Pentecostals, Seventh-day Adventists, Jehovah’s Witnesses).

The Chapel of the Holy Shroud, Turin, Italy. (J. Gordon Melton)

After World War II, Italy became a democracy and a republic, with a new Constitution theoretically guaranteeing full religious liberty to all. Fascist laws that discriminated against most minorities, however, took time to dismantle. Restrictions governing Pentecostals, for instance, were abrogated only in 1955. The Constitutional Court played a pivotal role, however, and by the 1960s most restrictions had been abolished. This allowed several dozen denominations to establish themselves in Italy, some of them continuing a presence started in the early 20th century. Only two groups, however, were really successful: Jehovah’s Witnesses, which firmly established themselves as the second largest religion among Italian citizens, and the Pentecostal movement, a good half of which had been unified between 1947 and 1948 into the Italian Assemblies of God. Today among the current 409,000 Italian Protestants, only 60,000 belong to “historical” churches (such as Lutheran, Reformed, Waldensian, Methodist, Baptist), while the majority attends Pentecostal and other “non-historical” evangelical churches.

The 1980s saw dramatic changes in the Italian religious scene, with Prime Minister Bettino Craxi (1934–2000) in 1984 renegotiating the Concordat with the Roman Catholic Church. It was formally declared that Roman Catholicism was no longer Italy’s official religion (a largely symbolic move, since for all practical purposes this was already the case, thanks to a number of Constitutional Court decisions), and the church financing system was restructured. The salary paid by the state to parish priests was thus replaced by a national cultural and religious tax. Taxpayers were invited to specify, by indicating it on their tax return forms, their option for a participating church or state charity. (Later, national corruption scandals resulted in the state charity being selected by a very small number of taxpayers, thus in practice largely making the tax a purely religious one.)

The uniqueness of the Italian system (compared, for example, with Germany) is that there is no way for taxpayers to escape the payment of the religious tax (0.8 percent of their total taxes). Should a taxpayer fail to mark any of the options given, then 0.8 percent of his or her total taxes is divided among the participating churches in proportion to the national percentage attributed to each church, based on those who actually marked a particular option. Let's say, for instance, that the Lutheran Church has been selected in a given year by 2 percent of those who have marked one of the options; this means that the Lutheran Church will also receive a corresponding 2 percent percentage of the total amount of the religious tax paid by those taxpayers who have not marked any option.

The new system allowed the implementation of the Constitutional provision calling for Concordats (known as Intese, with the name Concordato being exclusively reserved for the treaty with the Holy See) to be signed between the government and religious bodies other than the Roman Catholic Church. As a result, new Concordats have been entered into with the Waldensian and Methodist churches (1984), the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1988), the Italian Assemblies of God (1988), the Union of Italian Jewish Communities (1989), the Italian Lutheran Church (1995), and the Italian Baptist Union (1995). Adventists and Assemblies of God Pentecostals, however, have elected to receive only the money of those taxpayers who, on their tax forms, opt explicitly for them, thus waiving their rightful participation in the division of the taxes paid by those who fail to mark a specific option. Baptists have so far elected not to receive any part of their share of the religious tax.

In 1999, the then prime minister Massimo D'Alema signed Concordats with the Italian Buddhist Union and the Jehovah's Witnesses. In 2007, D'Alema's successor Silvio Berlusconi signed new Concordats with the Greek Orthodox Church, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and the Italian Hindu Union (which includes a number of "traditionalist" Hindu temples and organizations. In order to become effective, however, such Concordats have to be ratified by Parliament, and this has not yet occurred at the date of this writing. In the meantime, in 1998, the government opened negotiations with the Greek Orthodox Church, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and the Alliance of Evangelical Christian Churches in Italy (which includes a number of Evangelical Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal churches), and in 2001 with Soka Gakkai International (the largest Italian Buddhist body that is not a member of the Italian Buddhist Union) and the Italian Hindu Union (which includes a number of "traditionalist" Hindu temples and organizations).

The Italian system has proved remarkably effective in assuring religious harmony and in preventing national religious controversies in Italy. Tax exemption and freedom to operate are largely granted to all sorts of religious bodies, unlike in France and Germany; for example, the founding fathers of the Italian Republic explicitly repudiated any attempt to limit religious liberty in the name of "public order" (as Fascism had) or allegiance to the Constitution, thereby granting full freedom of operation and proselytization to groups whose values are different from those shared by the Italian majority. More than 100 religious groups also enjoy official government recognition and are granted additional advantages (while tax exemption and freedom of proselytization do not require statutory recognition).

The eight churches that have, so far, entered into Concordats with the Italian government constitute an elite group of religious bodies whose national relevance is thus explicitly recognized. No church or religion is "entitled," by right, to a Concordat; entering into it is a purely political decision, fully discretionary, and requiring the approval of both government and parliament. Groups without a Concordat, however, are deprived neither of basic liberties and tax exemption, nor of "recognition"; they are simply not (or not yet) officially recognized as "partners" of the government, and are not financed by taxpayers' money. Under the post-1984 system, the Roman Catholic Church receives more money than ever before, and most participating minorities also receive enough funds to not only take care of their activities in Italy, but also finance some of their activities abroad.

The 1980s also saw a change in Italy's religious map following a massive influx of foreign immigrants, mostly from Africa and Asia, and later from Eastern Europe, both for economic reasons and because of new legal developments making it easier to leave post-Communist European countries and to enter Italy. As a result, what had been quite small minorities grew into substantial religious bodies. The Sunni Muslims (fewer than 1,000 in the 1960s), for instance, had reached 1,300,000 by the year 2008, while the number of Eastern Orthodox Christians rose from 15,000 to 1,140,000, as a result of the increased number of Eastern European immigrants (particularly Romanian) entering Italy after 1989. Buddhism also grew, although there are more Italian (107,000) than immigrant (55,000) Buddhists, due primarily to the quite remarkable development of Soka Gakkai (which numbers at present some 50,000 members). Some groups of Indian origin, particularly those connected with the Sathya Sai Baba Movement and the Osho Commune International founded by Osho Rajneesh (1931–1990), have also been quite successful in Italy. Although statistics about the Church of Scientology are notoriously intractable and controversial, it is quite likely that more people attend Scientology courses in Italy than anywhere else in Europe. There are also some 13,500 members of esoteric and occult groups, with Damanhur (in Piedmont) being probably the largest residential esoteric community in the world, comprising some 600 “citizens” living communally in its main center.

Among Italian citizens, active Roman Catholics represent roughly one-third of the population, with some 20,000 “fringe Catholics,” members of movements not recognized by the bishops as part of the Catholic fold (half of them members of Luigia Paparelli's Divine Mission). Non-Catholics represent 2.12 percent of Italian passport holders residing in Italy, as follows:

Fringe Catholics	20,000
Eastern Orthodox Christians	57,500
Protestants	409,000
Jews	29,000

Jehovah's Witnesses (and splinter groups)	400,000
Other Christian Groups	26,000
Muslims	40,000

Ancient Wisdom and Esoteric Groups	13,500
Human Potential Movements	20,000
New Age Movements	20,000
Others	5,000
Total	1,178,000

On the other hand, in addition to some 775,000 Catholic immigrants, there are also currently more than 2,321,900 non-Catholic immigrants on Italian soil, namely:

Muslims	1,153,400
Eastern Orthodox Christians	836,000
Protestants	180,000
Buddhists	37,000
Hindus	45,000
Sikhs, Radhasoamis	15,000
Other Far Eastern and African Religions and Groups	30,000
Jews	7,000
Jehovah's Witnesses	15,000
Others	3,500

As a consequence, non-Catholic minorities constitute roughly 5 percent of the entire population present on the Italian territory. Catholic church attendance in Italy is among the highest in Europe. After a decline in the 1960s and 1970s, the trend was reversed, and Sunday attendance started growing again from the late 1980s on, reaching 35 percent of Italians who report to attend at least monthly by the year 2000, although figures are controversial and recent years have witnessed a debate among sociologists about possible over-reporting. For those accepting the figures at face value, Italy seems to represent a solid confirmation of rational choice theories. Legal limitation of pluralism from the 1950s to the 1980s corresponded to a decline in general church attendance and to a greater increase in membership figures for groups in fringe niches (particularly Jehovah's Witnesses). The legal and practical establishment of an effective religious pluralism in the 1980s, on the other hand, led to a renewed interest in religion and church attendance in general, while groups such as the Jehovah's Witnesses experienced a slower growth rate.

As everywhere else in Europe, the tragic events of 2001 have worsened the already prevailing tensions between sections of the Italian population who are suspicious of Islam in general and the Muslim minority, as well as making the prospects of a Concordat with one or more of the largest Italian Islamic organizations even more difficult. On the other hand, both the Italian legal system (plus reminiscences of the Fascist persecution of minorities, which created in 1930 under the name of plagio a criminal offense very similar to what would later be called brainwashing; in 1981, the existence of such provision in Italian law was declared contrary to the democratic constitution by the Constitutional Court), and the visible presence in the media of a number of scholars of new religious movements who are critical of the anti-cult movement (most of them associated with CESNUR, the Center for Studies of New Religions, established in Turin in 1988), have so far prevented in Italy any significant anticult scare of the kind prevalent in other European countries, such as neighboring France. Although both secular and Catholic opposition to such groups as the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Church of Scientology does exist in Italy, its institutional influence has so far been comparatively limited.

Izumo Ôyashirokyô

Izumo Ôyashirokyô, formally known as Izumo Taishakyô, one of the oldest of Japanese new religions, was founded by Senge Takatomi (1845–1917). In 1873 Senge, a Shinto priest of Izumo Taisha (the Grand Shrine of Izumo), gathered like-minded shrine adherents into a voluntary religious association, meeting at the shrine but organizationally distinct from it. This association was finally authorized by the government in 1882. The main deity of this sect is Ôkuninushi no Kami, the mystical ruler of the nether world. Prayer to unite with kami though reciting Shingo (words of Kami) and Okunigaeri (a religious pilgrimage to Izumo Taisha) are of importance in its practices. Its main scriptures are Kyôshi Taiyô, Daidô Yôgi, Daidô Mondô, Izumo Mondô, and Sôsaisiki.

The current leader of Izumo Ôyashirokyô is Senge Michihiko. As the new century began it reported 1,236,771 members.

J

◆ Jainism

Jainism is generally seen as a reaction to the leadership of the Hindu community by the elite Brahman caste in the sixth century BCE. The name, Jain, derives from jina (victory), a reference to their founder, Mahavira, who was called the Victor. Jains are disciples of the Victor.

Many Jains reject the contemporary scholarship on their religion's origins and point instead to a lineage of 24 saints, the Tirthanikaras, among whom one female is included, Mallinatha. The 22nd in the lineage, Nemi, is reputed to have lived for 1,000 years, just one of the attributions ascribed to the saints that have caused many to see them as mythological rather than historical beings. History begins with Parsva (b. ca. 872 BCE), the son of the ruler of Benares, India. As a young man he became a notable soldier and the husband of a princess. However, during his 30th year he renounced his royal life and became an ascetic. He wandered India and as disciples came to him he laid out a life based on four vows—do not take life, do not lie, do not steal, and do not own property. He died in Bengal, and the place of his death, Mount Sammeda, remains a site of pilgrimage and reverence for the Jain community.

Parsva was succeeded by Vardhamana (b. ca. 599–ca. 527), later known as Mahavira, a member of the warrior caste. During most his life as a Jain, he lived without clothes, seen as a visible sign of his renunciation of worldly possessions. Spending some 12 years as an ascetic, he is said to have become the Victor over his worldly passions. The state of realization he attained is known as keval-jnana, considered to be perfect perception, knowledge, power, and bliss. He spent the next 30 years traveling on bare feet around India preaching to the people the eternal truth he had realized. He attracted people from all walks of life, both rich and poor, from royalty to untouchables. During his time, the largely monastic community assembled by Parsva was increased by the development of a lay community. Mahavira organized his followers into a fourfold order of monks (sadhu), nuns (sadhvi), laymen (shravak), and laywomen (shravika).

He also added a fifth vow—poverty—to the original four vows for the monks and nuns. These would form the basis of the main values of Jain life today: non-violence (ahimsa), or the refusal to cause harm to any living things; truthfulness (satya), or the speaking only of harmless truth; non-stealing (asteya), not to take anything not properly given; chastity (brahmacharya), or refusal to indulge in sensual pleasures; and non-possession (aparigraha), or detachment from people, places, and material things. Laypeople were to value the vows but lead a somewhat less austere existence.

Jain teachings remained as oral teachings for several centuries following Mahavira's death. They were finally given written form around 300 BCE and these texts exist today as the Jain sacred writings.

The Jain community experienced growth for its first decade. Around 300 BCE, it split into two basic communities—the Svetambaras (who wore white cloths) and the Digambaras (air-clothed or unclothed)—and over the centuries each divided into a number of sub-sects. The community reached its peak in the 12th century, when the ruler of Gujarat was converted to Jainism by Hemecandra (1088–1172) and turned Gujarat into a Jain state. In the next century, however, the Muslim conquest of India began and further growth was largely blunted. Periodically, both Hindus and Muslims turned on the Jains.

Jain Beliefs The Jain teachings picture a three-story universe, the middle level being the realm of human existence. The goal of human life is to allow the soul to reach nirvana, or the state of moska (liberation), pictured spatially as the top of the universe, where it can remain in a state of eternal bliss and peace. Commonly at the end of life one goes to the lower realm, a dark place where people are punished for various misdeeds. There is also a heavenly realm of the gods and saints, but it is not one's goal.

The earthly realm is the realm of human action. The human soul is seen as consisting of a set of jivas, or immaterial monads. These monads are intermixed with karma (consequences of one actions), which are pictured as particles. Karmic matter (ajiva) gives color to the monads. Colors (leysas) range from the worst (black) to blue, gray, red, yellow, rose, and white. Each color is associated with characteristics. A black color to one's jivas is indicative of cruelty, while a person of a dispassionate and impartial nature is seen as having yellow as the predominant color. All actions produce karma, even good ones, thus the ideal is non-action and detachment.

The Jain understanding of the goal of life has ensured that ethics is of primary importance in the individual's life. The person ready to become a full member of the community must first profess faith in the teachings of the Jain saints and then renounce all attachments to other religions. That having been done, they are ready to take the 12 vows. They vow: (1) not intentionally to take life, especially of a jiva (ahimsa); (2) not to lie or exaggerate (satya); (3) not to steal (achaurya); (4) to refrain from marital unfaithfulness and unchaste thoughts (bhramacharya); (5) to limit accumulation of possessions and give away extras (aparigraha); (6) to consciously limit oneself so as to decrease the possibility of committing transgressions (dik); (7) to limit the number of both consumable and non-consumable items in one's possession (bhoga-upbhoga); (8) to avoid unnecessary evil (anarthadanda); (9) to observe periods of meditation (samayik); (10) to observe periods of self-imposed limitations (desavakasika); (11) to live for a period as an ascetic or monk (pausadha); and (12) to support the monastic community (atithi samvibhaga).

The Jain vows carry some general implications for living one's life. Jains are vegetarians and do not even consume eggs. They refrain from any occupations that involve the destruction of living creatures; even farming, which may harm living creatures in the process of plowing and planting, is avoided. Business and scholarship are more acceptable. The monastic life is most preferred.

Monks, recognized by their shaved heads, are organized into communities each headed by an acarya, or superior, who possesses the authority for structuring the community and overseeing instruction. Monks and nuns tend to itinerate around the countryside. However, during the rainy season they will congregate for periods of concentrated study, practicing austerities, and meditation. Part of the rationale for staying inside at this time is protection of the many life forms brought out by the wet weather.

Following the Jain path ideally leads to heightened levels of self-realization. The five steps along the path to liberation are recognized as right perceptions (mati); clear scriptural knowledge (sruta); supernatural knowledge (avadhi); clear knowledge of the thought of others (manahparyaya); and omniscience (kevala). Those who attain kevala are also identified as perfected ones (siddhas). Jains accept the idea of reincarnation and believe that the upward path may take many lifetimes. In the end, the fully realized soul will fly to the top of the universe and there reside in a karma-free condition.

To assist the process of life, the Jain life, and attaining heightened levels of realization, the Jain community has built numerous temples, which are identified with the Jain symbol, a swastika above which are three dots and a half moon. The swastika is an ancient symbol in Asia and has no relation to its modern adoption in the 1930s by the German Nazis. Temples may be the abode of statues of the saints, and veneration of the saints easily transforms into worship. In Digambara temples, the figures are depicted as nudes, standing with their eyes cast downward. In the Svetambara temples, the figures tend to be seated with their legs crossed. Both types of temples follow a cycle of ceremonies and rites.

Divisions within the Jain Community The major division in the Jain community between the clothed and unclothed monks may go back even to the time of Mahavira and his living for so many years in a naked state. However, the formalization of the division became intertwined with a second problem—the writing down of the Jain scriptures. As generations came and went, Jain leaders pondered the problem created by having to memorize and pass on the scriptures and came to realize that material was continually being lost. Thus, around 300 BCE, they began the process of writing down and compiling what was remembered.

The decision to write down the scriptures was, in part, occasioned by events growing out of a great famine that spread through northern India. During this time, an important chief leader Bhadrabahu led a segment of the community to the south. While there, in the hills of Shravana Belgola, Bhadrabahu committed ritual suicide by starvation, a practice that was quite acceptable among the Jains for one already approaching the end of his life. After the famine ended, the group returned to the north only to discover that the monks had abandoned their life without clothes. They also realized that they had lost a segment of the Jain scripture, which Bhadrabahu had failed to teach to his successor.

Over the next centuries the division of the community around those monks who wore clothes and those who did not formally resulted in the separation of the Digambaras from the Svetambaras.

The Digambaras teach that nudity was integral to the teachings of Mahavira, and that it is completely in line with the observation argument that a monk should be devoid of any possessions (such as clothes) and devoid of the desire to protect his body from the elements. They depict Mahavira in complete nudity, without any ornamentation, with downcast eyes. They also teach that Mahavira never married and was celibate throughout his earthly existence.

Regarding the scriptures, the Digambaras teach that the words of Mahavira, reputedly contained in the eleven angas of the Jain canon, were lost forever during the famine as Bhadrabahu did not pass them on.

Hence they refuse to accept the 11 angas of the Jain canon as owned by the Svetambaras and now form part of the 41 Sutras.

Finally, the digambaras hold that women cannot join the order of those in the renounced life as they were not qualified for the austere life the order demanded from each of the adherents. Today the Digambaras are found mostly in the southern part of India, especially in Mysore state, where the group led by Bhadrabahu had journeyed some 2,000 years ago. The modern Indian state has moved to limit the public nudity of the Digambara monks.

In contrast, the Svetambaras teach that some of the Tirthankaras (those of the lineage of saints) did not live life in the nude. Most important, Parsva, the saint immediately prior to Mahavira, wore white robes. They note that prior to his becoming an ascetic, Mahavira had lived a householder's life, that he had married and fathered a daughter, and that he did not become an ascetic until his parents had died and he had fulfilled his necessary family duties. They also make note of an incident in his life. He began his renounced life as a clothed monk until one day the white robe he wore was caught in a thorny bush, and as he moved on the robe was pulled off. Never holding on to worldly things, Mahavira simply left it and continued on his way naked. Thus, they argue, Mahavira's nudity was not consciously adopted but was an accident of the moment.

Regarding the scriptures, the Svetambara believe that the words of Mahavira were not lost during the great famine and accept the authority of the 11 angas of the Jain canon. They also believe that women can attain sainthood, calling to their cause the case of the 19th Tirthankara Malli, who was a female. Today the Svetambaras are located primarily in Gujarat and Rajasthan.

In modern times, both the Digambaras and the Svetambaras have divided into a number of sub-sects that go under such names as Sthanakavasi, Terapanthi, Beespanthi, Japneeya, and Murtipujak. Typically, a distinguishable sub-group within the Jain community consists of a group of monks, the temples and monasteries they operate, and the laypeople who support them.

The Sthanakavasi Jain tradition, for example, can be traced to the Gujarati Jain reformer Lumpaka (ca. 1415–1489), who protested the lax practice of the Murtipujak Svetambara monks. Lumpaka worked as a scribe copying manuscripts for Jain monks. In his work he discovered that Jain scriptures do not mention any practice of giving money (for temple construction, for example) as a means to merit, the performance of worship before images, or rituals involving acts of violence such as the breaking of flowers. He rejected image-worship as well as the authority of several texts within the canonical texts that contain references to such worship. He began to live as an ascetic, following the oldest textual prescriptions. Lumpaka gained a following in Gujarat, which was continued by his first disciple, Bhana, who seems to have initiated some 45 followers during the 1470s.

Early in the 16th century, the Sthanakavasi split into several groups, which by mid-century had become some 13 independent branches, which further divided into additional distinct sub-groups, however, by the 20th century, only 4 branches remained in existence.

The Terapanth Svetambara Jain tradition was founded by Acarya Bhiksu (1726–1803), who had become attached to an acarya of the sub-sects of the Sthanakavasi tradition in the 1750s. Then, in 1760, complaining of the laxity of the Sthanakavasis, he founded his own order at Kelva near Rajsamand. In its early years, the new order attracted only 13 male members (including Bhiksu), and his critics labeled his group the path of the 13, or terah panth. Bhiksu turned the label to his favor by slightly changing it to tera panth, or your path.

Underlying the original break was a disagreement over the understanding of the Jain teaching on karma. Jains believe that the soul must renounce all violence (and ultimately all action) to achieve liberation from karma. The Sthanakavasis also emphasize the role of compassion as a religious virtue and suggest that, for example, charitable actions have a positive karmic result. In contrast, Bhiksu assumed a more narrow interpretation based upon the understanding that bad karma and good karma equally obstructed the process of liberation and hence both must be avoided. Thus, he reasoned, acts of compassion were sinful.

Contemporary Jain Communities Today, in India, the followers of Jainism engage primarily in business and trade. The committed are known for their fasting, nonviolence, vegetarianism, philanthropy, and simple lifestyle. They do not make the sharp break with the Hindu community (as for example the Buddhists and Sikhs do), and in turn the Hindu majority see them as a sister community.

Through the 20th century, Jain communities were established around the world. Among the earliest appearances of Jains outside of India, one occurred in 1893 when Virchand Gandhi made a presentation at the Parliament of the World Religions in Chicago. His travel to Chicago was opposed by many of his colleagues, who believed that travel by any means other than on foot was immoral. He would be followed by a few others, such as Champat Rai Jain, who traveled to England in the 1930s, but no communities emerged until after World War II. Migration to England began in the 1950s, and by the 1990s there were some 30,000 in the United Kingdom, most from Gujarat. They have been organized into the Federation of Jain Organisations (11 Lindsay Dr., Kenton, Middlesex HA3 0TA, UK).

Significant migration to North America began in the 1970s and centers have been opened in most states in the eastern half of the nation as well as Texas and California. These now cooperate (along with Canadian centers) in the Federation of Jain Associations in North America (1902 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, PA). Several Jain teachers have also come to the United States and founded organizations that reach out to the larger non-Indian population: the International Navahir Jain Mission and the Jain Meditation International Center.

Jain centers and temples may also now be found in Australia, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Japan.

Jamaat-e-Islam

The Jamaat-e-Islam, a major organizational component of the international movement variously called Islamism or, in the West, Islamic fundamentalism, was founded in 1941 by Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi (1903–1979). He was raised in a family that had for many years supplied leadership to the Chistiniyya Sufi Order in India. In his teen years he became a newspaper editor and began to participate in various Islamic movements that had emerged in the context of the British rule of India. Among these was the Khilafat movement (1918–1924), whose aim was to save the then dying Ottoman Empire after the disasters of World War I. At the same time, it also promoted Muslim political interests in India.

Toward the end of the 1920s Mawdudi wrote his first book, a study of war and peace in Islamic law. During the 1930s he began to concentrate on the issue of Islam's conflict with the West and the modern age. He offered a perspective based directly upon his study of the Koran, the Muslim holy book, and the hadith, the sayings of and traditions concerning the Prophet Muhammad. The more he looked at Western culture, the more he criticized fellow Muslims who were becoming Westernized. Then toward the end of the decade he moved to the Punjab to establish a research center, Darul-Islam, to train scholars and to launch a reconstruction of Islamic thought.

The plan to reconstruct the Muslim perspective led to Mawdudi's founding of the Jamaat-e-Islam, a religious organization that could also operate as a political organization in the context of the changes about to overtake India. He moved to Pakistan in 1947 to work for the development of an Islamic state (in which Islamic law would be the law of the land). When his goals were not realized, he became an ongoing critic of the government and was often arrested and imprisoned for expressing his antigovernment ideas. A prolific writer, he authored more than 100 books and pamphlets during the next quarter of a century. With the partition of India into India and Pakistan in 1947, the Jamaat split into Indian and Pakistani sections. Other related groups (but organizationally independent) were later founded in Kashmir, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, and Afghanistan.

Around 1940, Mawdudi completed a brief work, A Short History of the Revivalist Movement in Islam, which, in perspective, can be seen as an early manifesto of Islamism. He presents Islam, the teachings delivered by the prophets from Adam to Muhammad, as focused upon the establishment of the kingdom of God on Earth and the enforcement of the system of life Allah gave to humanity. The prophets sought to revolutionize the intellectual and mental outlook of the population, to regiment those peoples who had accepted Islam in the Islamic pattern, and to organize the various segments of social life on an Islamic basis.

The time of the establishment of the Muslim community by Muhammad (ca. 570–632) was followed by the period of the “rightly guided caliphs.” However, “ignorance” crept into the rule of successive caliphs (as early as the 650s under the third caliph, Uthman) and hence in every age there has been a need for successive mujaddids, revivers of Islam, people who accomplish an extraordinary work in rejuvenating true Islam. A mujaddid must accomplish several tasks: diagnose his contemporary situation; define the place to strike the blow to break the power of un-Islam and allow Islam to again take hold; encounter the political forces attempting to suppress Islam; and take authority from un-Islam and in a practical manner re-establish government on the pattern of those initial “rightly guided caliphs.” This program is not just for one country; it aims for the establishment of Islam as the predominant force for all humankind. Ultimately, the instrument for carrying out this program would be the person known in Islamic theology as al-Mahdi, the coming one, whom Mawdudi saw as a modern revolutionary who would draw people to him by the quality of his life and his leadership ability. He will overcome ignorance and establish the Islamic state, not by any supernatural acts, but by statesmanship, political sagacity, and strategic skill.

The Jamaat developed an organization and program to embody the vision outlined by Mawdudi. It has been headed by an amir, the first being Mawdudi (1941–1972), and the Majlis-e Shura, a consultation council, a representative body drawn from the various segments of the membership. The amir is the supreme authority. Mawdudi was succeeded by Main Tufail Muhammad (1972–1989) and the present amir, Qazi Husain Ahmad. The shura has control over all doctrinal issues and may by two-thirds vote veto the ruling of an amir. One of the senior members of the shura occupies the seat of the amir if it becomes vacant.

The Jamaat has a four-point program for the transformation of Islamic society. It begins in an appeal to reason, showing listeners how Islam can be effectively applied to the contemporary situation. The appeal to virtue reaches out to those people already predisposed to the erecting of a just and upright society. The educational efforts give birth to a program of social reform. To this end, the Jamaat has created a variety of agencies, including educational institutions, programs for moral uplift, and charities to help the weaker members of society.

The fourth aspect of the program looks for the actual change of leadership in society, beginning with intellectual, social, and cultural leaders and culminating in political leaders. Looking for long-term transformation, the Jamaat trains the more capable among its members in its conservative view of Islam so that they can then assume the leadership roles in society. In this manner, the Jamaat attempts to affect all dimensions of human life.

The work of the Jamaat-e-Islam has been significantly extended by the formation of a set of autonomous but ideologically aligned institutions. One group of organizations deals with publication of Islamic material. Among several such organizations is Islamic Publications Ltd. Lahore. The Jamaat also seeks to found organizations dedicated to bringing Islam into various specialized groups (including different occupations). Among the first Jamaat-affiliated groups was the Islami Jamiat-e Talaba, the student organization, founded in 1947.

The Jamaat has come to include a broad range of conservative Muslims in Pakistan. Following the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in suburban Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, members of the Jamaat have been generally supportive of the Taliban and al-Qaeda. Following the threat of the United States launching military operations in Afghanistan, the current leader of Jamaat-e-Islam, Qazi Hussain Ahmad, was quoted as saying, "Any attack on Afghanistan is an attack on Pakistan, and we will resist it."

Internationally, the Jamaat has been active in supporting like-minded groups around the world, from Kashmir and Afghanistan to Bosnia and the Philippines. These groups include those that bear its name in different countries and other groups of the Islamist movement, such as Hamas (Palestine), Ma'Shoomi (Indonesia), the Islamic Party of Malaysia, and al To'iah-al Islamia (Kuwait). Specific outreach efforts of the Jamaat include the UK Islamic Mission, the Islamic Foundation in Europe, and the Muslim Student's Association of the U.S. and Canada (MSA). In 1983 MSA created the Islamic Society of North America as an umbrella structure to coordinate the many Islamic organizations that had been founded by MSA in North America. The latter has become well known for its nurturing of a variety of associations of Islamic scholars and professionals. The Jamaat has associated groups in France, Spain, and Japan, and throughout Latin America.

The Jamaat-e-Islam is to be distinguished from another Pakistani group, the Jamiat-ul-Ulema-e-Pakistan, a more extreme group that is known for signing the fatwa (literally, declaration on a legal matter) against the United States issued by Osama bin Laden in 1998.

■ Jamaica

Jamaica is an island in the Caribbean Sea south of Cuba and west of Haiti. Its population of 2.8 million (2008), the great majority of whom are of African descent, is spread across the 4,244 square miles of the popular tourist destination. When Christopher Columbus first traveled along the Jamaican coast in the 1490s, he found the island inhabited by the Arawaks, who had taken it over from its earlier inhabitants, the Guanahatabeys. Diego Colon (Columbus's son) conquered Jamaica for Spain, an event that proved disastrous for the Arawaks, who over the next two centuries were largely eliminated. Spain began the development of a plantation culture, but by the 1590s it was under constant threat from the British. The British took control in 1655, and in subsequent years the island became the headquarters of British privateers (licensed pirates).

During the 18th century, the British fought the Maroons, those Africans who escaped slavery and formed free black communities in the central highlands. Some 200,000 Africans came to live on the island, most working in the sugar mills. Slavery was ended in 1838, but the end of slavery was followed by widespread poverty and sporadic periods of unrest. Jamaica was given internal autonomy in 1959 and full independence in 1962.

Christianity was brought to Jamaica by the Spanish at the beginning of the 16th century, and almost all of the residents were members of the Roman Catholic Church at the time of the British takeover. Prohibited for many years, the church was re-established in 1837, when a contingent of Jesuits arrived just prior to slavery being abolished. There is now an archbishop in Kingston and a bishop in Montego Bay.

The Church of England was brought to the island by the British forces in the 17th century, though a bishop was not appointed for the land until 1824. Today, Anglican work has been incorporated in the Church in the Province of the West Indies. Interestingly enough, the next group to begin work on Jamaica were the Friends (Quakers), though their work remained small until the Iowa Yearly Meeting (United States) began a mission in 1881. The Jamaica Yearly Meeting was organized in 1941.

Jamaica benefited from the beginning of the world Protestant missionary movement, whose initial phase (carried out by the Moravians and Methodists) was directed toward the Caribbean region. Moravians arrived in Jamaica in 1754 and the Methodists in 1789. Moravian work began at the request of two British members who owned land in Jamaica. The first missionary was to instruct the Africans residing on the two plantations. The work soon spread to neighboring plantations, and from there the Moravian Church in Jamaica emerged. Methodist bishop Thomas Coke (1747–1814) visited Kingston early in 1789, and before the year was out William Hammett arrived from the United States to launch the Methodist mission (which remained under the authority of the British Conference). That church is now a part of the larger Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. Both churches benefited from their opposition to slavery.

In the meantime, in 1782, George Lisle (ca. 1750–1828), a former slave in the American colonies, left the territory of the emerging United States with the British who had been driven out by the Revolution. He had been a Baptist preacher, and in Jamaica he founded the Baptist Church, which has become the source of two of the largest religious bodies in the country—the more staid Jamaica Baptist Union and the charismatic Revival Zion, which came to the fore in 1860 as the center of a nationwide revival movement.

Toward the end of the 19th century, the Seventh-day Adventist Church began work, which enjoyed great success in the 20th century. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) merged in 1956 to form the United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands.

Jamaica was close enough to the United States that a spectrum of Protestant churches began work and now contributes to the pluralistic atmosphere that pervades the land. There are a number of Pentecostal churches that compete for members, though no one has emerged as a significantly larger group. There are several churches that were founded in Jamaica, though fewer than in other countries, perhaps because indigenous leadership developed in the older churches through the 19th century.

Many of the older churches relate to each other through the Jamaica Council of Churches (which also includes the Roman Catholics). It is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Many of the newer, more conservative churches are affiliated to the Jamaica Association of Evangelicals, which is associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Jamaica is home to a variety of groups that are part of its unique history. Early in the 20th century, Marcus Garvey (1887–1940) organized a movement, the Universal Negro Improvement Association, to end discrimination against African people throughout the Western world. His effort led to a new emphasis on Jamaicans' African heritage, and an interest developed in Ethiopia (the term often referring to the nation of Abyssinia and at times to Africa in general). One result of the Garvey movement was the founding of several groups with claims to an Ethiopian heritage, including the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (with headquarters in Addis Ababa) and the Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, with more dubious connections to Africa.

The most famous Ethiopian movement was Rastafarianism. In 1927, Garvey predicted the crowning of a black king in Africa whose emergence would be a sign of the coming redemption of Africans in the Western world from their situation. Eight years later, the coronation of Haile Selassie appeared to many to be confirmation of the prophecy. In addition, several ministers in Jamaica saw the new emperor as the fulfillment of several biblical prophecies. The members of the movement soon ran into trouble with officials when Leonard Howell was arrested for circulating pictures of Haile Selassie and telling people that they were passports back to Africa.

Through the next decades, the Rastafarians became known for their dreadlocks (hair styled to resemble a lion's mane), their use of marijuana (or ganja, as they called it), and their liberation-oriented music (reggae), which has transcended their movement to become popular internationally. Some of the early Rastafarians had been members of the Bedwardian movement, started by the prophet Alexander Bedward in August Town. Bedward offered miraculous cures to people, whom he dipped in the nearby Hope River. In the early 1900s, he had a huge island-wide following and was later immortalized in the folksong "Slide Mongoose."

Jamaica has become home to a variety of West African religions that have survived with a Roman Catholic overlay and are today known as Santeria or the Obeah movement, distinguished by the experience of possession by the deities, shared by both leaders and lay members. Equally interesting are the Spiritual Baptists, a group that mixes African and Protestant Christian elements. Those religions that have incorporated African elements appear to have a bright future in Jamaica.

There is a small community of Jews (Sephardic), one mosque serving some East Indian and Syrian residents, and a growing number of spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith. Many of the East Indians are Hindus, who gather at the Prema Satsangh in Kingston. Other Hindu groups include the Ananda Marga Yoga Society, the Brahma Kumaris, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. Among the new religions, the Church of Scientology and the Unification movement have centers.

Jamaica Baptist Union

At the end of the American Revolution, in 1782, George Lisle (ca. 1750–1828), an ex-slave who had formed the first African American Baptist congregation in the American colonies, left Savannah, Georgia. Traveling with the retreating British troops he arrived in Kingston, Jamaica. His letter of recommendation secured him a job in Spanish Town, and in his spare time he began preaching. Within a year he had formed the first Baptist congregation in Jamaica. Over the next 20 years, in spite of the difficulties imposed by the slavery system, he had led in the founding of churches across the island. Early in the new century, several of the preachers he had recruited began to correspond with the Baptist Missionary Society (BMS) in England.

In 1814, John Rowe arrived from England to establish formal contact between the British and their Jamaican counterpart. The BMS began to send missionaries, whose work further spread the movement. A major obstacle developed in 1831 when a slave insurrection was identified with the Baptist church members, most of whom were slaves. The plantation owners reacted by burning many Baptist (and Methodist) chapels. The insurrection became a factor in ending slavery throughout the British Empire, and former missionaries from Jamaica became effective advocates of abolition in their homeland. The resulting abolition of slavery in 1833 and full emancipation for African residents in Jamaica allowed the Baptists a new beginning. Missionaries William Knibb (1803–1845), Thomas Burchell (1799–1846), and James Philippon (1798–1879) led in the founding of communities of freedmen, in which former slaves were given plots of land to farm. Also, by owning land they became able to vote.

In 1842, Jamaican Baptists, then organized into an Eastern and a Western Union, declared their independence from the BMS. They founded the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, and the following year, the Society sent its first missionaries to Africa. It later supplied missionaries for various locations around the Caribbean. In 1843, the Jamaican Baptists also established Calabar Theological College, the fountainhead of an education system that eventually crisscrossed the island. Finally, in 1849, the Eastern and Western Unions united to form the Jamaica Baptist Union.

Through the 19th century, missionaries from England continued to assist the Jamaican Baptists. In 1892, the salaries for these missionaries were finally withdrawn by the BMS. The loss of funds from England began an era of painful transition that resulted in a net membership loss over the first half of the 20th century, not an unimportant part due to the migration of large numbers of Jamaicans to Central America. Some turnaround occurred after World War II.

The Jamaica Baptist Union is an ecumenically oriented body. It joined the Baptist World Alliance at the time of its founding and is today a member of the World Council of Churches. In 1910, it formed an Evangelical Council with the Methodists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans. In 1966, Calabar College merged into the newly formed cooperative United Theological College of the West Indies, whose campus is adjacent to the University of the West Indies in Kingston.

The union is organized congregationally. Many churches, unable to support a full-time pastor, are organized into circuits that share ministerial leadership. A president and other executive officers are elected at the annual meetings of the Union. In 2005, the Union reported 43,000 members and 314 congregations.

Janmashtami

Janmashtami is a Hindu holiday that celebrates the birth of Lord Krishna, an incarnation of the deity Vishnu. It is celebrated on the eighth day of the dark half of the lunar month of Shraavana (mid August to mid-September on the Common Era calendar). While celebrations of Janmashtami can be found among Hindus around the world, the most intense celebrations occur in the Braj region, Uttar Pradesh, the land of Krishna. The largest city in the region is Mathura, the traditional birthplace of Krishna, and nearby is Vrindavan, where Krishna spent his happy childhood days.

The celebration of Janmashtami begins the day before with a fast that continues into a vigil through the evening, a remembrance that Krishna was born in the evening hours. At midnight, the statue of the infant Krishna is bathed and placed in a cradle. Prayers (aarti) are said and the fast is broken. According to Krishna's biography, soon after his birth, his father whisked him away to a foster home for his own safety. Women draw prints of baby feet walking toward the house symbolic of the infant entering its foster home. During the day, people will perform Rasa lila, dramatic enactments of the life or play of Krishna.

In Mahashastra, whose capital is Mumbai, Janmashtami is known as Dahi Handi (handi being a clay pot filled with buttermilk). Prior to the festival, the handis will be positioned at a significant height (as much as two to three stories). Young men will form human pyramids, while the person on top attempts to break the handi. If successful, the contents will spill over the entire group, which is now able to celebrate their accomplishment by a united effort. In contemporary Mumbai, different organizations offer substantial prizes to groups able to crack their handi, and groups called govindas (another name for Krishna) will travel around the city trying to crack as many handis as possible.

Janmashtami is a celebration of great joy and an affirmation of social oneness.

■ Japan

Japan consists of an extensive archipelago off the far eastern coast of the Asian continent. One of the world's most homogeneous nations (a factor in the shaping of its cultural and religious histories), its population is around 125 million, with barely one percent of that population consisting of non-Japanese inhabitants. Its capital since the mid-19th century, Tokyo, is one of the world's most populous cities, while Japan is now one of the world's most technologically advanced societies and one of its leading economic powers. Japan has developed from a feudal imperial society in the mid-19th century, in which state, political power, and religion were closely aligned, into a modern liberal democracy in the present day that constitutionally separates religion and the state, and places religion solely in the private sphere. Such modernization has been accomplished while retaining many aspects of the past, notably the continuation of the imperial lineage and of the emperor as titular head of state.

Japan has had a complex religious history in which religious forces from outside Japan (notably from continental Asia) have fused with indigenous forces to produce a variegated religious structure comprising a number of organized religions, including Shinto, a tradition that developed in Japan with a specific focus on the Japanese situation, and Buddhism, which came to Japan from continental Asia in the sixth century CE. It also has a continuing folk religious tradition centered on customs, beliefs, and practices that extend back thousands of years. The modern age has seen the emergence of a large number of new religious movements in response to the issues of modernization and cultural change, movements that speak to the needs of individuals in the modern day. Besides these religious influences, mention also should be made of Confucianism and Daoism, two Chinese traditions that entered Japan along with Buddhism and that, while not operating as separate traditions in Japan, have deeply influenced Japanese Buddhism and made their impression on the religious culture of Japan, and Christianity, which has been active in Japan since the mid-19th century.

Although this complex array of traditions has produced immense variety in Japanese religious life, it has also produced many areas of unity and areas of interaction between the various traditions in the ordinary lives of people. This is especially evident in the two main historical traditions of Shinto and Buddhism, which have complemented each other ritually in the individual lifecycle, Shinto being the most common operative religious system for commemorating births and for providing spiritual protection in the formative years of life, and Buddhism the commonly used religious framework for dealing with death, funerals, and the afterlife. Thus people may have affiliations to more than one tradition without feeling any sense of contradiction, while there is much shared ground within the traditions and the ways they function and serve people.

The indigenous prehistoric religion of Japan was based around the veneration of kami, a term that means god or deity, and may be either singular or plural. There were infinite numbers of kami, ranging from nature deities to the spirits of clan ancestors. The relationship between humans and kami was a reciprocal one, with humans venerating, praying to, and making offerings to the kami, whose role was to reciprocate by providing benefits, such as good harvests, and by overseeing the fortunes of the living. This indigenous tradition coalesced into a folk tradition centered around calendrical rituals, and eventually also into Shinto. The word “Shinto” means “the way of the gods” and indicates a tradition centered on myths that tell of the land and people of Japan being given life by the kami, who are considered as the protectors of Japan and as the ancestors of the Japanese imperial family. Such myths have, over the centuries, bound Shinto, the emperor, and the nation together and given Shinto a particularly nationalist orientation.

Buddhism entered Japan in the sixth century of the Common Era, along with various influences it had absorbed in China, including Daoist divination practices and Confucian ethical concepts affirming the importance of venerating one’s elders and parents and placing great emphasis on caring for the spirits of the dead, who were worshipped as ancestors. Buddhism also brought with it a variety of practices and rituals that have influenced Japanese religion ever since, ranging from the study of scriptures to meditation, pilgrimage, and mortuary rituals. Buddhism received support from the imperial court and became a central element within the Japanese political system through much of Japanese history until the 19th century.

Japanese Buddhism is striking for the variety of sectarian developments and innovative leaders it has produced. In the early ninth century the monks Saicho (767–822) and Kukai (774–835), respectively, established the Tendai and Shingon Buddhist sects, the former combining esoteric and exoteric elements and based on the teachings of the Lotus Sutra, and the latter centered on esotericism. Both introduced a reverence for mountains along with ascetic elements into their Buddhism. In the Kamakura period, between the late 12th and the 14th centuries, a number of new Buddhist leaders emerged to establish new forms of Buddhism, including the Rinzai and Soto Zen traditions based on meditation practices and founded in Japan by Eisai (1141–1215) and Dogen (1200–1253), respectively; the Pure Land sect founded by Honen (1133–1212) and the True Pure Land sect founded by Shinran (1173–1262), both sects based in faith in the Buddha Amida; and the Nichiren sect established by the charismatic prophet Nichiren (1222–1282), who espoused a nationalistic form of Buddhism based on the Lotus Sutra.

In the 16th century Japan also encountered Christianity through the activities of Catholic missionaries who were briefly successful in attracting converts there. However, in the early 17th century Japan's political rulers, fearing that Christianity would become a Trojan horse leading to the subversion of their power and the development of colonialism, banned the religion completely. Between the 17th and 19th centuries the country was virtually closed to the outside world, while all Japanese people were forced to take an oath of allegiance to Buddhism and to conduct the funerals and memorial services of their ancestors at their local Buddhist temples. These rules transformed Buddhism into a de facto pillar of the state, gave it a monopoly on the performance of death rituals, and helped build a close bond between the Buddhist temple and the household and family structures, through which the ancestors were memorialized, a bond that has largely endured, although becoming weaker in very recent times, especially among younger urban Japanese. In addition, both Buddhism and Shinto, which have traditionally drawn their strongest support in rural Japan, face severe problems because of declining populations outside the main city areas; many rural temples and shrines have closed because of a lack of local populations to support them. In the cities, growing interest in secular alternatives to the traditional Buddhist funeral and memorialization process has begun to erode support structures there.

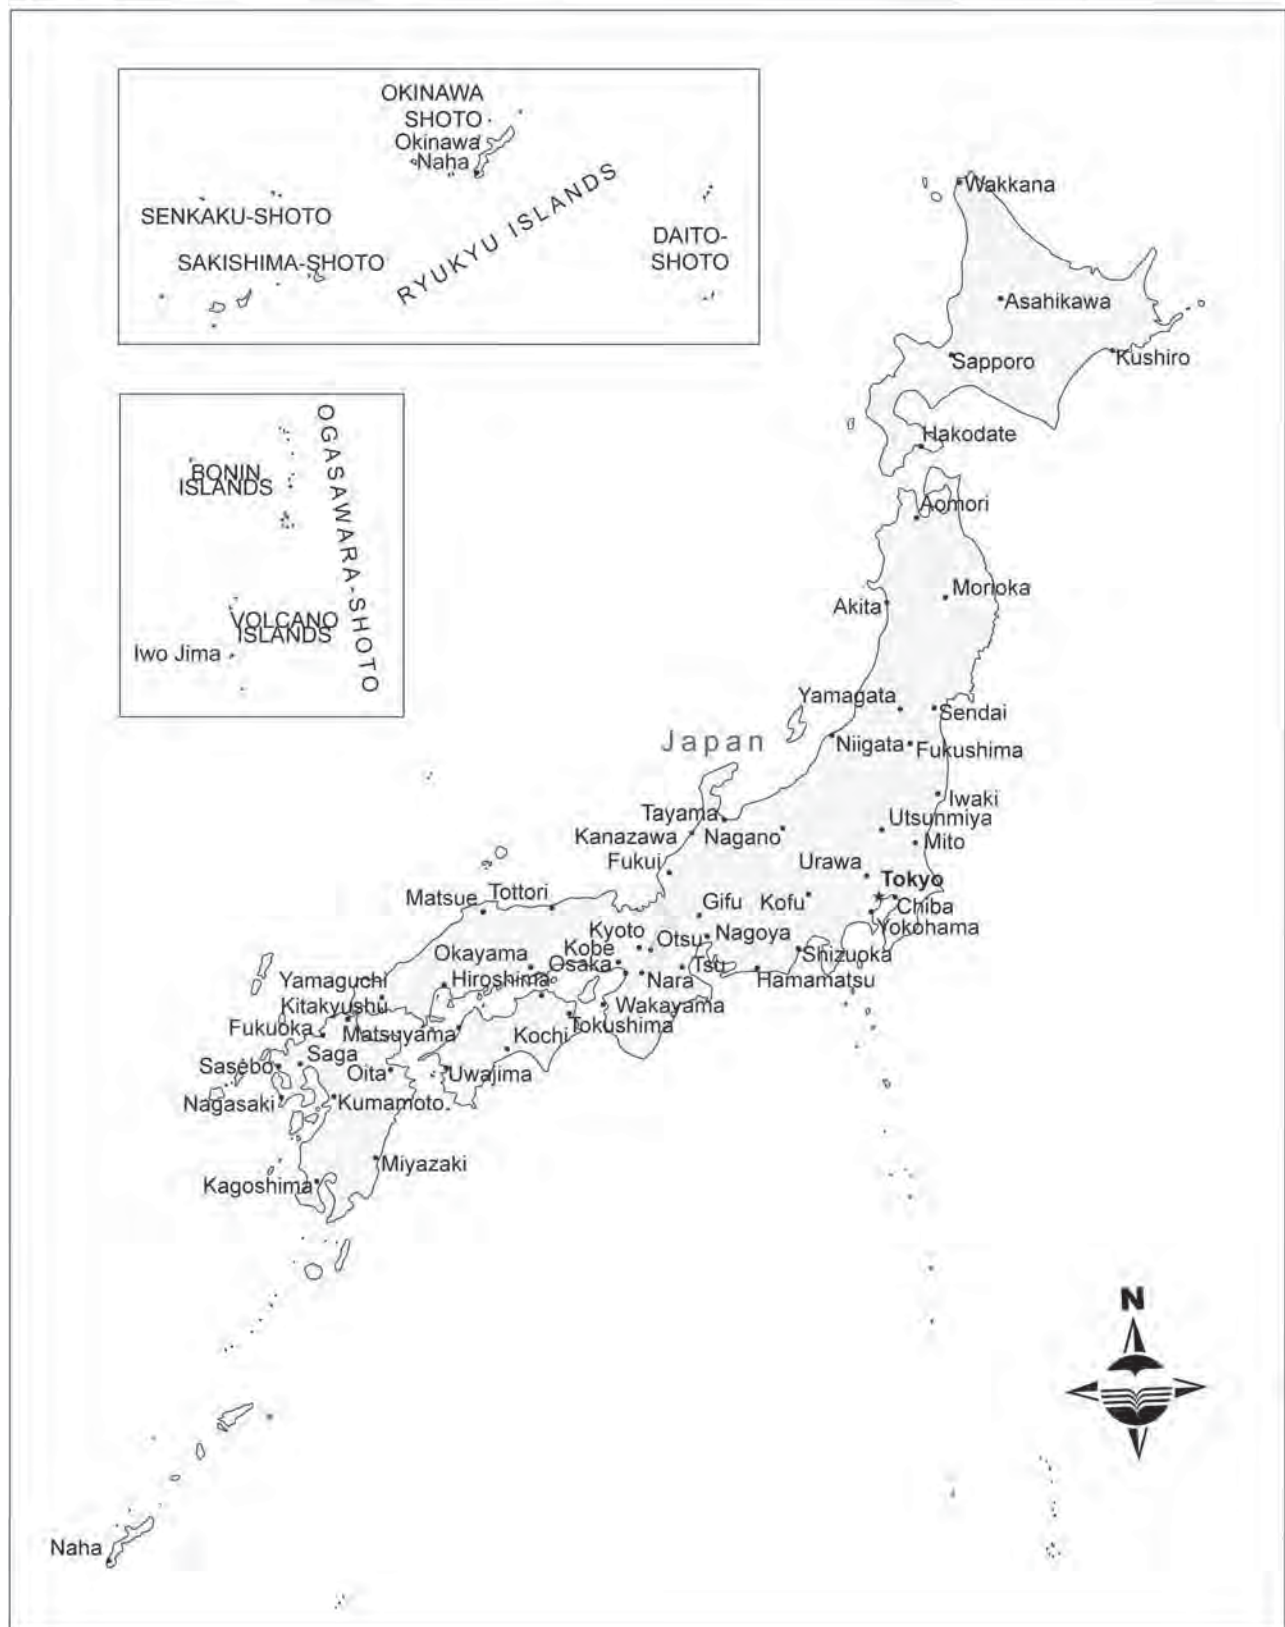

In the mid-19th century, Japan, forced to open up to the outside world, engaged in a process of modernization. The Meiji Restoration of 1868, which paved the way for the development of the modern Japanese state, led to sweeping changes in the socio-religious structure. Buddhism lost its privileged position, although its central role in dealing with death and the ancestors enabled it to retain substantial support from the populace, while Shinto was elevated to the status of a national religion, and the emperor was portrayed as a sacred figure. In the latter 19th and first half of the 20th centuries, Shinto became part of the Japanese nationalist project, which led to the repression of dissident groups inside Japan (including religious movements) and to Japan's aggressive expansion beyond its own territory, and eventually to its engagement in World War II. After Japan's defeat and occupation by Allied forces, the links between the state and religion were broken, the emperor was no longer considered a divine entity, and a new Constitution was enacted in 1946, which, for the first time in Japanese religious history, guaranteed religious freedom and allowed religions to operate free from state interference, but also without state support.

This change especially benefited the new religions, movements that began to emerge in Japan from the first half of the 19th century on, when rapid social and economic change and modernization led to much unease throughout society. A number of such movements arose, including Kurozumikyo, founded by the divinely inspired Shinto priest Kurozumi Munetada (1780–1850) in 1814; Tenrikyo, founded by the female Nakayama Miki (1798–1887) in 1837; and Omoto, founded by Deguchi Nao (1836–1918) in 1892. They were usually led by charismatic individuals claiming that they had received new truths for a new age from newly revealed deities, and often promising to bring about spiritual transformation in, and the eradication of injustice from, society. Often, too, these movements offered their followers readily accessible spiritual techniques of problem solving and healing, and thus managed to build large followings, especially in Japan's rapidly developing cities. The continuing emergence and development of new religions was a dominant feature of 20th-century Japanese religion, with a variety of Buddhist-oriented movements such as Soka Gakkai (known outside Japan as Soka Gakkai International), Reiyukai, and Rissho Kosei Kai developing in the 1920s and 1930s.

In postwar Japan, the continuing development of, and high levels of membership in new religions has been one of the most prominent features of religious life. Many of the movements established in the prewar period developed mass followings, most notably Soka Gakkai, which built a membership running into several millions while also establishing a national newspaper, a university, and a political party, the Komeito, which is now independent of its religious parent but retains close links with it. The latter part of the 20th century saw the rise of a new wave of new religions (sometimes referred to by scholars as “new” new religions), including Agonshu, a movement based on esoteric Buddhism and founded by Kiriya Seiyo (b. 1921), and Kofuku no Kagaku, founded in 1986 by Okawa Ryuho (b. 1956), who claims to be the incarnation of the Eternal Buddha who has come to transform the world spiritually. These movements have millennial orientations, attracting a following especially among young, well-educated urban Japanese who are deeply worried about the challenges to their cultural identity through the growth of Western influences in Japan and who are deeply concerned about threats posed to the planet by environmental problems and the threat of nuclear war.

In contemporary Japan the majority of Japanese describe themselves as being associated with both Shinto and Buddhism. Their primary association with Shinto is through festivals and community, lifecycle, and calendar rituals, including the New Year's festival, in which well over 80 million Japanese (the number has risen regularly over the past two decades) visit shrines (and some popular Buddhist temples) at the start of the year to pay their respects to the kami and to pray for good luck in the coming year. With Buddhism the primary link is through funerals, and household-based memorial rites for the ancestors. Yet at the same time, because these activities are predominantly social in orientation, many people who participate in them also describe themselves as not religious and have little other association with these traditions. Thus, although close to 90 percent of the population, according to surveys, have participated in various cyclical rites at Buddhist temples connected with the ancestors, the numbers who are devotional adherents of the Buddhist sects is considerably lower. At the same time, however, many Shinto shrines and Buddhist temples have extensive clienteles who visit them regularly to pray for good luck, while pilgrimages, especially to Buddhist temples such as the 88 pilgrimage temples on the island of Shikoku, are a popular form of devotionism that attracts large numbers of practitioners each year.

Although the traditional religions have struggled to retain a following in the modern era, the new religions continued to attract support at least until the mid-1990s; in the period from the early 1980s into the 1990s, for example, groups such as Agonshu and Kofuku no

Kagaku attracted hundreds of thousands of followers. In all it is estimated that perhaps 20 percent of the population (around 20 million people) may belong (or may have belonged to) to a new religion. However, since the mid-1990s, such growth has largely petered out, and many, especially older, new religions have entered periods of retrenchment. Partly this has been due to a new wave of religious options that have, especially among younger Japanese, provided new alternatives to organized religious groups in very recent times. The rise of what have been called new spirituality movements with New Age religious orientations, which offer the opportunity to engage in a variety of practices and religious techniques, without making demands in terms of formal religious belonging and commitment, has been an especially prominent modern development that is proving attractive to growing numbers of people. Bookshops in cities such as

Tokyo and Osaka often have “spiritual corners” full of self-help manuals and books about spirituality, meditation, channeling, and the like, and books of this sort sell in large quantities. There is also a growing interest in a variety of spiritual techniques and practices, ranging from divination and numerology to yoga and meditation. Although it is unclear how many people actively follow such practices, it is evident that this is a growing trend and that many people now eschew formal religious affiliations, constructing for themselves a self-help religious path through which to live their lives in the frenetic urban environment of modern Japan.

In addition, a small number (generally considered to be under two percent of the population) of Japanese have turned to Christianity in one form or another since it was allowed back when Japan opened to outside influences in the mid-19th century. Christians of all denominations have since been active in establishing churches and educational institutions throughout the country, and many Japanese have expressed some degree of affinity with Christian ideas. However, Christianity has never managed to translate this affinity into a sizable following, largely, it would appear, because its teachings fail to fit with the Japanese emphases on venerating the ancestors and on engaging in religious traditions that affirm a sense of identity, social integration, and belonging. Prominent in the Christian establishment are the Roman Catholic Church, the Holy Catholic Church in Japan (Anglican), the Holy Orthodox Church in Japan, the Japan Baptist Convention, and the United Church of Christ in Japan. The latter was formed as World War II began, when the government forced all of the Protestant missionary churches to unite into one body. Other religious groups from outside Japan that have established a small but notable presence in the country include the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Unification Church.

One of the “new” new religions, Aum Shinrikyo, has created a new challenge to religion in Japan. In 1995 devotees of Asahara Shoko (b. 1955), founder and leader of Aum Shinrikyo (which renamed itself as Aleph in 1999), carried out a nerve gas attack on the Tokyo subway. Although Aum acted alone, and was radically different in its world-negating pessimism and its communal structure from other religions in Japan, the Aum affair has had major repercussions for all religious movements in Japan. It has led to the laws governing the administration and regulation of religious organizations being strengthened, while there have been numerous calls from politicians of all persuasions for greater state control of religious movements. Beyond precipitating such legal changes, the Aum affair has given added influence to a variety of critics, ranging from those on the political left, who regard religion as an outmoded and corrupting influence on society, and who have used Aum as a way of attacking religious movements in general, to mainstream supporters of the traditional religions, who have used Aum as a way of claiming that all new religions are potentially dangerous. In particular, the affair has damaged the general image of religion, and has contributed to a widespread antipathy to, and reluctance to engage in, organized religion—a tendency that has,

if anything, added to the above-mentioned turn toward a more informal, self-directed approach to religious behavior and has weakened the support structures of organized religions.

Given that the religious traditions that have flourished in Japan have been especially concerned with the particular nature of the Japanese situation, it is unsurprising that they have had comparatively little impact beyond Japanese shores. When Japanese religions have spread abroad, it has mainly been along ethnic lines, among the Japanese immigrant communities that settled in Latin America, Hawaii, and North America from the late 19th century on. These communities carried their local religious customs with them, so that, for example, Buddhism continued to be the main vehicle for dealing with death. Thus, in Hawaii Buddhist temples and festivals such as o-Bon (the summer festival commemorating the spirits of the dead) continue to attract the support of many in the Japanese American community. Shinto has endured less well, probably because of its close associations with the land of Japan, and although its shrines may be found in areas where Japanese immigrants have settled (for example, Hawaii), they are less well supported than the Buddhist temples. Many Japanese new religions have gained a footing among overseas Japanese communities. Several of the older new religions, for example, have developed extensive support networks overseas, including Soka Gakkai (which is the largest Japanese religious movement both in and outside Japan) and Tenrikyo, which have put down roots in the Japanese communities of South America and elsewhere.

Outside the Japanese overseas communities, Japanese religions have met with limited success. Zen Buddhism has achieved some recognition in the West, initially through the writings of D. T. Suzuki (1870–1966) and later because of the activities of Zen priests such as Suzuki Shunryu (1904–1971) and Deshimaru Taisen (1914–1982), who established Zen meditation centers in Europe and North America. Nowadays Zen is one of the most highly visible forms of Buddhism operative in the West, attracting numerous practitioners and giving rise also to many centers now run or established by Westerners, some of whom have become Zen monks and nuns, and has more recently begun to develop a following among young urban elites in Latin America (notably Brazil) as well. Other Japanese Buddhist sects such as Shingon and Pure Land have been less well known or successful beyond Japan, although they, too, have established temples and developed small followings in Europe and the United States.

Some Japanese new religions have expanded beyond Japan and the Japanese immigrant community. The most successful has been Soka Gakkai, whose combination of Buddhist principles with affirmative teachings that emphasize personal success and development, has attracted many, especially upwardly mobile, followers in the United States and Europe. Another that has had some success has been Mahikari, whose emphasis on spiritual healing has helped it develop a small following in Europe, Australia, the Caribbean, and parts of Africa. Few other movements have developed more than a small number of non-Japanese followers. Overall, Japanese new religions have not traveled particularly well overseas, probably because their teachings and practices are so closely associated with the Japanese situation and Japanese religious worldview that their messages do not always appear capable of the universalism that is necessary for expansion beyond the confines of their own cultural milieu.

Japan Baptist Convention

The Japan Baptist Convention (Nippon Baputesuto) can be traced to the opening of Japan to the West by U.S. admiral Matthew C. Perry (1794–1858) in 1853. Among the men aboard Perry's flagship was a marine, Jonathan Goble (1827–1896), who also happened to be a Baptist. He was eager to gather information on the possibility of a Christian missionary enterprise in the land. To that end, he made the acquaintance of a Japanese castaway, who returned to the United States with Goble. After the U.S.-Japanese treaty of 1859, Goble obtained the support of the American Baptist Free Mission Society (a slavery abolitionist group), and in 1860 he and his wife, Eliza Goble, settled in Japan.

In 1872, with the American Civil War past and the country beginning to recover, the American Baptist Missionary Union (ABMU) assumed the responsibility for the American Baptist Free Mission Society. The Gobles were joined by Nathan Brown (1807–1886) and Charlotte "Lottie" Brown (d. 1923), his wife. The four organized the First Baptist Church of Yokohama in 1873. Brown soon took the lead in the mission and translated the Bible into Japanese. The mission was slow in forming schools and opening a theological seminary but in 1898 received a ship from a donor in Scotland and used it to travel around the Japanese islands. Then, in 1908, William Axling (1873–1963) and Lucinda Axling established an institutional (multi-service) church in Tokyo. Before Axling left for the United States almost 50 years later, the government of Japan made him an honorary citizen.

Missionaries from the Southern Baptist Convention, under a comity agreement with the ABMU, began work in southwestern Japan in 1889. The work was centered on Kyushu, the southernmost of Japan's major islands. Schools were opened (two of which developed into colleges), and in 1918 the West Japan Baptist Convention was organized. That same year the American Baptists organized the East Japan Baptist Convention. With World War II on the horizon, these two groups merged.

In 1941, the government forced the formation of the United Church of Christ in Japan and made all of the Protestant bodies join it. Following the outbreak of war with the United States following Pearl Harbor, all the remaining missionaries were interned and repatriated. After the war, William Axling was the leading voice in advocating that the Baptists remain with the United Church. Some did. However, some American Baptist congregations left in 1952 and in 1958 formed the Japan Baptist Union.

In 1947, 16 churches related to the Southern Baptist Convention withdrew from the United Church and founded the Japan Baptist Convention. It launched an aggressive evangelism program. In the next generation more than 225 new congregations were founded. It established Jordan Press and a hospital in Kyoto. In 2009, it reported 329 churches and 34,077 members, approximately two-thirds of all the Baptists in Japan.

The Japan Baptist Convention is a member of the National Christian Council of Japan and the Baptist World Alliance. The convention also has a working relationship with the Okinawa Baptist Convention, a cooperative venture of the American Baptists and Southern Baptists.

Japan Buddhist Federation

The Japan Buddhist Federation (JBF; Zen Nihon Bukkyokai) is an umbrella organization of more than 100 groups that encompasses all of the traditional Japanese Buddhist schools. Its member groups account for more than 90 percent of all temples and are located throughout Japan's provinces. It is the only such federation of Japanese Buddhist organizations.

The organization has its origins in the Bukkyo Konwakai (Buddhist Discussion Group) formed in 1900 to oppose state control of religion. It went through incarnations as the Dai Nippon Bukkyokai (Greater Japan Buddhist Association) and the Nihon Bukkyo Rengokai (Japanese Buddhist Union) before assuming its present name and becoming incorporated as a religious juridical body in 1957.

The JBF is engaged in a wide range of activities involving the entirety of the Japanese Buddhist world. Its primary activities strive to advance communication, the exchange of information, and the promotion of friendship among its member organizations. It also provides legal advice for its members. In addition, the JBF is a member of the Nihon Shukyo Renmei (Confederation of Japanese Religions), which includes representatives from Shinto, Christian, and new religious organizations. As a representative of the Buddhist world, it serves as a vehicle for communication with other religions, as well as for negotiation with political and bureaucratic authorities. It also functions as the Japanese branch of the World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB), serving to promote exchange between Buddhists throughout the world.

At present, the JBF is engaged in educational activities intended to increase awareness concerning the protection of human rights within Japan, especially in regard to the elimination of discrimination toward Japan's buraku class (underclass). It has also undertaken a research project to investigate the relationship between discrimination and the Buddhist scriptures.

The organization actively opposes recent amendments to the law governing religious bodies allowing for greater taxation and increased state monitoring of the finances of religious institutions. It also seeks to provide information about controversial issues, such as euthanasia in cases of brain death and the debate over organ transplants, both by organizing seminars and through its journal Zenbutsu, published in Japanese. The journal, with a circulation of 9,000, has been published since 1953, three times a year.

The offices of the Japan Buddhist Federation are located on the grounds of the Jodo (Pure Land) temple in Tokyo. The Federation is composed of a number of administrative organs, including a Board of Directors, a Board of Directors for Everyday Affairs, a Board of Trustees, an Office of General Affairs, and specialized committees for the examination of particular topics.

Javanism

“Javanism” (kejawen) is a term for diverse spiritual practices of Javanese speakers who place their syncretic ancestral culture above specific religious affiliations. It is almost synonymous with kebatinan, which refers to Javanese mystical movements. Most Javanists stress that their practices are rooted in perennial indigenous traditions of wisdom, arguing that these predate even Indian influences.

There are several dozen major movements with Java-wide and, in a few cases, genuinely Indonesian membership. These include organizations such as Pangestu, Sapta Darma, Subud, Sumarah, Ilmu Sejati, and Hardopusoro. It has been estimated that 3 to 5 percent of the Javanese population are actively engaged in kebatinan practices, but perhaps a quarter of Javanese speakers (of whom there are over 60 million) empathize with the spiritual style of these movements.

Kebatinan groups existed within the colonial framework but were usually secretive. Arguably they began to adopt modern form in reaction to the crystallization of modernist Islamic organizations. Among those the Mohammadiyah (founded in 1911) was especially anti-mystical in its early years. Most movements only came into public view during the revolution of the late 1940s, while Indonesia was attaining independence. Then, paralleling the organizing process in the 1950s through all sectors of Indonesian society, major movements became formally organized. During the early 1950s a number of movements argued that they deserved recognition as separate religions, suggesting that in the context of national independence it would be an anomaly if only imported religions received government approval. Some movements maintained that argument into the 1970s; most accepted they were unlikely to get formal recognition.

Within Indonesia these movements are now termed kepercayaan, simply meaning “beliefs.” Other designations have included kejiwaan or kerohanian, the first from a Sanskrit root, the second from Arabic, and both meaning “spiritual,” and kawruh kasunyataan, roughly, “knowledge of Truth.” Whatever the preference (which varies among movements), there is always a disavowal of the association with klenik, black magic and occultism, as that is the charge most often leveled against them by Muslim critics.

In opting for the designation kepercayaan, Javanist movements were self-consciously staking a claim to legitimacy within the provisions of the 1945 Constitution. That Constitution was readopted by Sukarno (1901–1970; r. 1949–1967) in 1959 and has remained sacred under Suharto (b. 1921) and even his recent successors. Inclusion of the term kepercayaan in the Constitution was credited to Wongsonegoro, who became the patron of umbrella movements on behalf of mysticism during the 1950s. The first of these, the BKKI (Badan Kongres Kebatinan Indonesia, or Congress of Indonesian Mystical Movements), was founded in 1955 by him. In Yogyakarta in December 1970 a successor organization was named the SKK (Sekretariat Kerjasama Kepercayaan) and subsequently renamed HPK (Himpunan Penghayat Kepercayaan).

Jehovah's Witnesses

The Jehovah's Witnesses are an organization within the group of Christian sects and denominations sometimes referred to as the "Adventist Family." While the organization began in the United States, it has spread throughout the world, although its growth is believed to have slowed somewhat in recent years. Witnesses believe the world is now in its last days. They hold that Christ began his invisible presence on Earth in 1914 and that Armageddon will occur in the very near future.

The American Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916) is generally regarded as the founder of the movement and is the originator of the group's basic system of beliefs. In 1879, Russell began publishing Zion's Watch Tower and Herald of Christ's Presence, in which he argued that the millennium was imminent and that Christ's invisible presence on Earth had begun in 1874. Russell began attracting followers, known as Bible Students, and in 1884 the Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society was incorporated. Russell's successor, Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1852–1942), can be credited with the development of the present-day hierarchical, or "theocratic," organizational structure as well as with the coining of the name "Jehovah's Witnesses." A period of concerted efforts at growth and global expansion began under third President Nathan Knorr (1915–1975) and has continued under the succeeding two presidents. In October 2000, the Witnesses announced a plan for reorganization in which theological and administrative responsibilities would be divided for the first time.

While the organization has been consistent in its belief in the imminent coming of the millennium, several different dates have been put forward for the end of the present era, the most recent being 1975. As a result of their interpretation of Revelation 7:4–9, Witnesses believe that 144,000 "chosen" people will rule the world from heaven with Jesus after Armageddon. Others, members of the "Great Crowd," will be resurrected during the millennium and given the opportunity to earn eternal life on Earth through obedience to God.

Jehovah's Witnesses believe that they embody the true church, the "faithful and discrete slave" responsible for acting according to the divine plan. Although they consider themselves Christian, they reject a number of ideas put forward by most Christian groups. Witnesses reject the doctrine of the Trinity and emphasize the oneness of God, to whom they refer as Jehovah. They regard Jesus as a perfect, but fully human, being who sacrificed his life as a ransom for sinful humanity. Witnesses reject the notion of hell as contrary to God's loving nature, and they reject the notion of the immortality of the soul.

Witnesses regard Christmas, Easter, birthdays, and other holidays as Pagan in origin and do not celebrate them. Their only sacred observance is the commemoration of Christ's death during Passover. Weekly observances emphasize public talks, training for witnessing work, and study of the Watch Tower and other Witness publications rather than the kinds of prayer or ritual usually associated with Christian worship. Because the last days are at hand, the most important work for Jehovah's Witnesses is door-to-door "preaching," or "publishing," in order to separate the saved from the damned.

The practice of "publishing" has brought Jehovah's Witnesses some notoriety in a variety of nations. Also controversial is their refusal to accept blood transfusions as a result of their interpretation of the biblical injunction against eating blood. But perhaps the source of the most tension between Witnesses and "the world" has been their refusal to serve in the military, to participate in patriotic exercises, and to join political parties. These positions have led political officials in many states to brand Witnesses as unpatriotic or enemies of the state and to subject them to persecution.

As of 2008, approximately 7.2 million Witnesses were active in 236 countries and territories. A total of 17,790,631 were in attendance at the memorial of Christ's death in 1999, and 289,678 were baptized. Growth in recent years has slowed, but the number of publishers worldwide continues to grow by a rate of about 2 percent. As a result of global expansion, less than 20 percent of all Witnesses live in the United States, the group's country of origin, while more than 25 percent live in Latin America.

Jerusalem

Jerusalem is a very old city that contains many sites of religious significance, and it continues today to be a source of considerable disagreement between the different Abrahamic religions and within each one also. For Jews it is the site of the temple, of which only a wall now remains (though probably not even a wall of the temple itself but probably just a wall close to it and once enclosing it). For Muslims it is the site of the Prophet's miraculous night journey from the Hejaz on Buraq, and his ascension through the heavens, and for Christians it is where Jesus was crucified and spent much of his life. The city is now the capital of the state of Israel, but its final status is still very much in question.

Jerusalem is replete with sites of sacred significance. King David, its founder, is said to be buried on Mount Zion, and this is also the site of the Last Supper, according to many Christians. It is also the place where Jesus reappeared after being dead for three days. This event is represented by the coenaculum, or the cenacle, a small, two-story structure within a larger complex of buildings on the summit of Mount Zion. The Franciscans built the upper storey in the 14th century to commemorate the Last Supper. It is also identified as the "upper room" in which the Holy Spirit descended upon the Apostles at Pentecost (Acts 2:2–3). The ground-floor room beneath the coenaculum contains a cenotaph that since the 12th century has been known as the "Tomb of King David"—even though the recorded burial place of the king was in the "City of David" on the Ofel Ridge (1 Kings 2:10). Beneath the level of the present floor are earlier Crusader, Byzantine, and Roman foundations. An apse behind the cenotaph is aligned with the Temple Mount, leading to speculation that this part of the building may have been a synagogue. Christian traditions also point to Mount Zion as the place where the Virgin Mary had fallen asleep for the last time. On that spot, a massive Benedictine basilica, named the Dormition Abbey, was erected. The Franciscans, on their return to Jerusalem, built the present Chapel of the Coenaculum in 1335. The mihrab, a Muslim prayer niche, was added in 1523, when the Franciscans were evicted from the building and the chapel was converted into a mosque.

The Via Dolorosa commemorates the Passion of Jesus and allows visitors to relive that experience, to a degree, while the site of the ascension on the Mount of Olives is also available. At the Garden of Gethsemane Jesus had prayed for the cup to be taken from him, and the Church of the Holy Sepulcher is yet another site of the resurrection, a very old church indeed that is possibly built on a Roman temple. It is sometimes identified with Golgotha, the place of the crucifixion, although this is probably some way outside the old walls of the city. The significance of this church means that it is shared by many denominations who do not always agree entirely on who controls what area and disputes that can become violent do arise.

The state of Israel came into the full possession of Jerusalem after the 1967 war and regards it as its indivisible capital, although no one else does. This means that Israel is in control of the religious sites of the three religions, and it has dealt with this by generally maintaining an Ottoman-like policy of leaving each community to regulate its own buildings, except where conflicts arise. So the two mosques on Temple Mount along with the other mosques in Jerusalem come under the authority of the Islamic waqf, or foundation, which looks after religious buildings, and Jews are not allowed onto the Temple Mount. There is great suspicion on both sides as to the intentions of the other, and some Muslims have denied that Jerusalem has any connection at all with Judaism and the temple, while some Jews and Christians see it as desirable for a third temple to be built on the Temple Mount, presumably after the removal of the mosques. The different Christian denominations are allowed to look after their own property in Jerusalem, but when a dispute arises, as it often does, the state steps in and tries to establish peace. Israel claims with some plausibility that there is now more freedom for the three religions than during the Jordanian occupation of Jerusalem from 1948 to 1967 since Jews can freely visit the city and its religious sites, which they could not do then. On the other hand, there are restrictions on Muslim worshippers, especially during times of tension, which did not exist when Jerusalem was controlled by a Muslim country.

The significance of Jerusalem for Jews cannot be overemphasized. It is mentioned more than 600 times in the Bible (but never in the Five Books of Moses) and three times a day in the prayers of traditional Jews, including a wish for the temple to be rebuilt. Synagogues are aligned so that the direction of prayer is toward Jerusalem and in particular the temple, and individuals praying anywhere are supposed to pray in that direction. For Muslims it is the third holiest city (hence its name, al-Quds) and the site of the first qiblah, direction of prayer, but is now largely significant because of the Prophet's night journey. He rode at night on the horse Buraq to Jerusalem, to the top of Mount Moriah and from there to the heavens to meet the prophets. In fact, the only reference in the Koran to Jerusalem is not that direct, but is only to the distant place of worship (al-aqsa) (17:1). For Christians, Jerusalem's significance rests on the life and death of Jesus there, and for some Christians the rebuilding of the temple plays an eschatological role without which Jesus will not return.

Mount Moriah is according to Jewish tradition the site of a number of key events in the Jewish Bible, including the temples, the sacrifice of Isaac, and Jacob's dream. It lies between Mount Zion to the west and the Mount of Olives to the east. It is regarded as the navel of the world, as the physical link between God and the Jews. Some early Christians believed that the navel stone of the universe lay in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, where the True Cross had reposed, and the idea of Jerusalem as a particularly close place to heaven persisted in several metaphysical systems, including that of the Freemasons and their interest in the temple of Solomon and architectural symbols is based on it.

The idea of Jerusalem as an especially religious city has become very much part of the ideology of modern Israel, where it is contrasted with the largely secular and modern city of Tel Aviv, which resembles modern Western cities anywhere. Jerusalem remains a city where religious people tend to wish to live, and seek to preserve the religious character of their own areas. So the ultra-orthodox Jews who live in particular parts of the city may try to impose dress and behavior codes even on those just passing through their neighborhood, and restrict what can take place on the Sabbath, encouraging secular Jews to live in different parts of Israel. In Jerusalem the disputed nature of the city between Jews and Arabs has made it a natural focus of violence, which hardly encourages people to want to live there, unless they have strong religious reasons to do so.

According to the 2000 Israel Statistical Yearbook, there were at that time 1,204 synagogues, 158 churches, and 73 mosques in the city. Many of the synagogues are very small and belong to ultra-orthodox (haredi) communities who live in the city and spend much of their time involved in religious activities based in particular neighborhoods and minimizing their links with the state. The churches are made up of a wide variety of different denominations with foreign congregations and some with a local clientele among the Palestinian Christian population.

Jesuits

The Jesuits, officially the Society of Jesus, is one of the largest and more important religious orders that contributed to the worldwide spread of the Roman Catholic Church in the modern world. The order was founded by Saint Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) on August 15, 1534. At the founding, Loyola and six others took a vow of poverty and chastity and dedication to apostolic labor as enjoined by the pope. The Order was approved by the pope in 1540. As the Order evolved, it was divided into geographical provinces. Leadership is placed in a general congregation, a body that includes the superior general, the vicar general, all assistants and provincials, and two electors from each congregation. The meetings of the congregations are infrequent, usually called following the death of the superior general in order to elect his successor. The superior general serves for life and is the real leader of the Society, apart from the adopting of broad policies and legislation by the congregation.

The Order expanded rapidly and had gained almost 1,000 members by the time Loyola died. Its first major task was stemming the tide of Protestant advance. It is credited with turning back Protestant successes in France, Belgium, and parts of Central and Eastern Europe. Jesuits operated under cover in some Protestant countries where their detection meant arrest, torture, and possible execution. Higher education became the Order's primary tool, and the Order opened a number of colleges—46 before Loyola died and almost 100 more in the next generation. It also developed the modern seminary for the training of clergy, the most outstanding of which was the Roman College, now known as the Gregorian University, in Rome. These seminaries became important centers of learning that assumed the burden of countering the Protestant and other heresies.

Second only to education has been the Society's work in missions. The first missionary, commissioned within months of the Society's founding, was Saint Francis Xavier, who traveled to the East as a representative of the Jesuits. The Society grew as the exploration and colonization of the Western Hemisphere was beginning. Though several other orders, especially the Franciscans and Dominicans, were already on the scene in the French, Spanish, and Portuguese colonies, in the 1700s the Jesuits surpassed them in number of personnel. They were especially effective in the settlement of South America. The Society also opened work in Portuguese colonies on the coast of Africa, but Jesuits were frustrated in their efforts to slow the work of the slave merchants. Efforts in Asia centered on India, China, Japan, and the Philippines.

In 1773 the Society fell victim to its own success. Its educational attainments had placed members at the center of a number of controversies and led to the creation of numerous enemies. Others resented the work of missions that blocked the exploitation of people and land in the colonies. By the mid-18th century, proposals to suppress the Society began to be debated in Rome. Beginning in 1759, the Jesuits were expelled from various South American countries, beginning with the confiscation of the Order's properties and possessions in Portugal. France acted against the Order in 1764, and Spain followed three years later. Under pressure, Pope Clement XIV dissolved the Society. Many became secular priests, and a few rose to power, among them John Carroll (1735–1815), the first archbishop in the United States.

Action on the suppression of the Order was not carried out in many places, and a remnant of the Order continued, possibly the most important group being the one in Russian-controlled Poland. Other pockets continued with tacit papal approval until 1814, when the suppression of the Order was repealed. The restored Order began with approximately 600 members. It grew steadily, and by the middle of the 20th century had 35,000 members. The Order returned to its emphasis on higher education and scholarship, and the Society founded a number of outstanding colleges and universities. It also produced many Catholic scholars of note. At the same time the missionary emphasis also re-emerged, and thousands of members were sent to work in Africa and Asia. The expansion of the restored Society has not gone unchallenged; it has continually faced opposition from secular governments (especially France and Spain) and was totally suppressed by Communist rulers.

The Jesuits found an especially welcoming environment in the United States, though the Order was on occasion targeted by popular waves of anti-Catholicism. It has built a system of top-rated colleges and universities, among the most famous being Boston College;

Portrait of Ignatius Loyola, who founded the Society of Jesus, also known as the Jesuits, in the 16th century. (Library of Congress)

Fordham, Georgetown, and Marquette universities; and the several Loyola Universities (Detroit, Chicago, New Orleans, Los Angeles).

In 2008, the Society of Jesus reported a total of 18,815 members of which 13,305 were priests, 2,295 were scholastic students, 1,758 were brothers, and 827 were novices. They were scattered around the world in 112 countries. Local residences/monasteries are organized into provinces, which in turn are divided among 10 regions called assistances. On January 19, 2008, Father Adolfo Nicolás was elected 30th superior general of the Society of Jesus. Headquarters of the Society is in Rome, as is its mother church, the Chiesa del Santissimo Nome di Gesù all'Argentina (the Church of the Most Holy Name of Jesus, or simply the Chiesa del Gesù).

Over the years, more than 25 Jesuits have been canonized.

The religious life, regulations, and directions for ministry are laid out in a set of writings known collectively as the Institutes. It includes a variety of papal documents; the Society's constitution; and the Spiritual Exercises, a book by Loyola outlining a special program of self-reflection and spiritual practice that each Jesuit utilizes as part of his own program of spiritual progress.

JeungSanDo

JeungSanDo (also spelled Jeung Sanh Doh) is a new Korean religious movement, a Dao or Way, which grew out of the life and work of Kang Il-sun Sah-ok (1871–1909), better known as SangJeNim. He is believed by his followers to be the incarnation of the Lord God who ruled with the Triune God. The Lord God came from heaven to fulfill a set of prophecies, including the Buddhist prophecy of the coming Maitreya and the Second Coming of Jesus expected by Christians. In JeungSanDo teachings, Shang-ti (Confucianism), the Jade Emperor (Daoism), Maitreya (Buddhism), and God (Western traditions) are the same. SangJeNim was the embodiment of this entity.

Kang grew up in poverty. In 1877 he reportedly experienced sudden enlightenment and in 1894 made the decision to save and enlighten the world. In 1901 he is believed to have defeated all evils and opened the Great Gate of Spirituality and to have begun the work of Reconstructing Heaven and Earth. He also began to gather disciples, the first of which was Kim Hyong-yol, designated the keeper of the Way of JeungSanDo. Kang predicted that within a relatively short time a good world would arise.

In 1907 he named Ko Pam-lye (1880–1935) as Sabu, the Head of all Women. He had already proclaimed that men and women were equal, and following his death in 1909, Lady Ko, better known as Tae-mo-nim (Holy Mother), became the leader of the movement. She assumed the task of propagating the new T'aedulju mantra, the chanting of which is believed to provide a lifeline to the enlightening and healing energy of T'aedul Heaven, the womb of the universe. Accompanying the mantra is a set of 16 tai chi movements corresponding to the sound symbols of the mantra, believed capable of activating the healing energy (chi) from the universe and pushing out the toxic energy from the body. Each movement is seen as related directly to the function of one or more internal organs. The movements are slow, controlled, and synchronized with the breath.

In the post-Korean War period, JeungSanDo experienced new life and began to spread throughout South Korea and then internationally. The publication of an English edition of the account of the founder's supernatural work, JeungSanDo DoJeon, in 1995 facilitated its movement into English-speaking lands.

As of 2009, JeungSanDo has centers in Japan, the Philippines, New Zealand, United Arab Emirates, Taiwan, Indonesia, Germany, the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom.

Jiu-Hua Shan

Jiu-Hua Shan is one of the four Buddhist sacred mountains of China. Located in Anhui Province, southwest of Nanjing, it is the mountain of the east. It is also considered especially sacred to Ksitigarbha (or Dizang) Bodhisattva.

The Buddhist history at Jiu Hua is usually dated from the arrival of Fu Hu, a monk who settled there in 503 CE and built a temple, called Fu-Hu-Cell. The middle of the eighth century became a time of significant Buddhist expansion. In 719, during the Tang dynasty (618–907), the Korean Prince Kim Gio Gak (aka Jin-Qiao-Jue, d. 793) came to live on Mount Jiuhua. He meditated for 75 years at Mount Jiu Hua and passed away at the age of 99. To the people, he closely resembled Bodhisattva Ksitigarbha and after his death, many came to believe that he was an emanation of the bodhisattva. He came to be called Gold Bodhisattva Dizang and a pagoda was built for his veneration. The building that came to house the seven-story pagoda was called the Hall of the Incarnation. From Kim Gio Gak's stay, the mountain began to be identified with Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva.

As occurred at Wu Tai Shan in the north, the suppression of Buddhism under the reign of Tang Emperor Wuzong in 845 CE led to the closing and/or destruction of the Buddhist temples at Jiu Hua Shan and forced most of the monks and nuns who had resided there to return to secular life.

Buddhism was revived at Jiu Hua during the Five Dynasties period (907–960) but did not really expand until the Ming dynasty (1368–1661). The first Ming emperor, Chu-Yuan-Chang, had been a monk in An-Hui before assuming the throne. He and his successors provided funds to restore Hua-Cheng Temple, the oldest temple on the Mountain. Each year, the emperor came to Jiu-Hua Mountain on the 30th day of the 7th lunar month to worship Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva, each year. The emperors of the Qing dynasty (1662–1911) favored Vajrayana Buddhism and continued the annual attention to the mountain, though most favoring Wu Tai Shan. During this time, as many as 5,000 monks and nuns resided in more than 300 monasteries on Jiu Hua Mountain.

The policies imposed on Buddhism by the secular government of the Republic of China worked against the survival of Buddhist temples and monasteries. Some were abandoned and closed, others appropriated for secular use. All the temples were closed during the Cultural Revolution in the 1960s. Beginning in the 1980s, the temples were allowed to reopen, and, since that time, the government has donated funds to restore many of them. New ones have also been opened. Today, approximately 100 temples and monasteries can be found on or at Jiu-Hua Mountain. Almost all are dedicated to the worship of Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva, who is represented in a variety of unique pictures and statuary.

Among the many temples on Jiu Hua is the Hua-Cheng Temple, the oldest temple on the mountain, which also houses the Historical Relics Museum of Jiu-Hua Mountain. On display there are the Buddhist sutras from the Tang and Ming dynasties and the handwritten documents of the Emperor K'ang-Hsi and Emperor Qian-Lung's of the Qing dynasty. In the Corporeal Body Hall of Bai-Sui Temple is the 350-year-old mummy of Monk Wu-Xia, still in good condition.

In 2001, plans were announced to create a mega-statue of Ksitigarbha at 155 meters (509 feet) to be completed around 2004. Several years later the date was changed to around 2008 and the size revised downward to 99 meters (325 feet), in honor of Kim Gio Gak, the emanation of Ksitigarbha, who reputedly ended his life when he was 99 years old.

The greatest time for pilgrims and tourists at Jiu Hua Mountain today is on Ksitigarbha's birthday, the 30th day of the 7th lunar month or the next day, the first day of the 8th lunar month.

Jodo-shinshu

Jodo-shinshu (True Pure Land School) belongs to the so-called Pure Land tradition, the largest current of traditional Japanese Buddhism of which Jodo-shinshu constitutes the largest denominational family. The 10 existing Jodo-shinshu denominations count approximately 15 million adherents, more than 20,000 temples, and 30,000 priests (more than 90 percent male) in Japan.

The denomination traces its origin to Shinran (1173–1262), a disciple of Honen (1133–1212), the founder of Jodo-shu. Shinran was an adherent of the powerful "movement of the exclusive and single-minded nembutsu," which was deemed heretical by the established Buddhist orders. When the movement was prohibited in 1207, Honen and some of his followers, including Shinran, were excommunicated and exiled. Shinran's exile to Echigo, where he started to propagate his own interpretation of Honen's Pure Land teachings, is traditionally regarded as the starting point of the Jodo-shinshu. Being expelled from the Buddhist order, Shinran regarded himself as neither priest nor lay, married, and had children, thus paving the way for the eventual abolishment of celibacy in Japanese Buddhism as well as for hereditary priesthood. After his death, his youngest daughter Kakushin functioned as the first caretaker of her father's mausoleum at Otani, east of Kyoto. She was supported by followers of Shinran, and out of this group of caretakers evolved what is now known as the Jodo-shinshu. In 1321 Shinran's grandson Kakunyo turned the mausoleum into a temple and called it Hongan-ji, which eventually became one of Japan's most powerful religious institutions.

The group of Shinran's descendants did not gain any notable influence, however, until Rennyō (1415–1499), the so-called Eighth Chief Priest of Hongan-ji. The expansion of the sect, being involved in a number of peasants' uprisings known as ikko-ikki—referring to the then customary designation “Ikkōshū” for the sect—engendered suspicion among the established orders. The army of Tendai monks attacked Hongan-ji several times, and the temple was moved to other places more than once. Still, the influence of the Jodo-shinshu in the provinces grew and its temples took the shape of fortresses, while its chief priests (monshu) became as powerful as secular lords. In the late 16th century the sect's headquarters, Ishiyama Hongan-ji—a temple-fortress located in present-day Osaka—was destroyed by the troops of Oda Nobunaga, who regarded the powerful Buddhist temples as major obstacles to the unification of Japan. In 1592 the Hongan-ji was rebuilt in Kyoto. Ten years later, due to disputes over the leadership of the Hongan-ji, a new temple was founded east of the original Hongan-ji. The sect's headquarters was thus divided into the Eastern Hongan-ji and the Western Hongan-ji. The former is the headquarters of the Otani branch, the latter that of the Hongan-ji branch of Jodo-shinshu. The Otani-ha counts approximately 5.5 million members and 8,698 temples. The Hongan-ji branch, which is known in the United States as the Buddhist Churches of America, has approximately 7 million members, more than 32,000 priests, and 10,281 temples. Both groups are members of the Japan Buddhist Federation through which they relate to the World Fellowship of Buddhists.

Besides these two, there exist today eight more branches of comparatively minor significance. The lay-oriented Jodo-shinshu has abolished all monastic elements, and training of priests has been reduced to the extreme. The major branches of Jodo-shinshu run universities and other educational institutions, and actively promote scholarly and social activities.

Doctrinally, the Jodo-shinshu differs considerably from the Jodo-shu, which derives its teachings from Shinran's master Honen. Among the so-called Three Pure Land Sutras the Muryōju-kyō (Sutra on the [Buddha of] Immeasurable Life) holds the central position. Shinran stressed faith in the “Other Power of Amida Buddha's Vow” rather than the practice of calling upon this Buddha's name (nembutsu). According to his interpretation, the nembutsu is merely a thankful reaction to the experience of absolute faith in the fact of being saved by Amida, which, again, is conferred to men by the Buddha. Shinran emphasized the sinful beings' utter dependence on Amida's grace, which is particularly directed toward those who are unable to do any religious or secular good.

Jodo-shinshu has been remarkably active and successful in overseas missions, also among non-Japanese, especially in Canada, the United States, Brazil, and Western Europe. In recent years, however, membership in the United States has been shrinking significantly.

Jodo-shu

Jodo-shu (Pure Land School) belongs to the so-called Pure Land tradition of Japanese Buddhism, to which almost 20 million Japanese adhere. The major branch of the denominational family called Jodo-shu counts approximately 6 million adherents, 6,932 temples, and 8,000 clerics (more than 90 percent male) in Japan and thus constitutes one of the major Japanese Buddhist denominations.

Tradition claims that Jodo-shu was founded in 1175 by the Tendai monk Honen (1133–1212) when he decided to leave the Enryaku-ji Monastery on Mount Hiei in order to propagate his Pure Land teaching among the populace. Honen maintained that the then already popular practice of invoking Amida Buddha's name (a practice called in Japanese nembutsu) with the intention of being born in his Pure Land of Bliss was the only appropriate practice in the “latter days of the dharma” (Buddhist law). Honen chose the so-called Three Pure Land Sutras as the scriptural basis of his Jodo-shu and claimed to follow the interpretation of these scriptures by the Chinese monk Shandao (613–681). According to Shandao, Amida Buddha himself, in his vow to save all sentient beings, had selected the act of calling upon his name as the practice that would inevitably lead to birth in his paradise, and thus liberate from the circle of birth and death. Honen also adopted Daochuo's (562–645) distinction between the Gateway of the Holy Path, under which he subsumed all the teachings and practices of Mahayana as well as so-called Hinayana Buddhism, and the Gateway of the Pure Land. Honen's major ideas are developed in his Collection of Passages on the Selection of the Nembutsu in [Amida's] Original Vow (Senchaku-hongan-nembutsu-shu), written, according to tradition, upon the request of regent Fujiwara Kanezane in 1198. Jodo-shu places itself in the tradition of the Chinese monks Tanluan, Daochuo, Shandao, Huaigan, and Shaokang, but lacks any incessant lineage of personal transmission up to Honen, a fact that weakened the movement's claims of orthodoxy.

Under the doctrinal guidance of Honen the movement of the “single-minded and exclusive nembutsu” grew rapidly. Many clerics and laymen appreciated Honen's simple but persuasive message. However, the established Buddhist orders and schools harshly criticized the movement for being intolerant, exclusionist, one-sided, and heretical. After a number of scandals had raised fears that Honen's followers might bring about social disturbance, the secular authorities yielded to the demands of the Buddhist establishment and prohibited the movement's activities in 1207. As a consequence, Honen and a couple of his close disciples were excommunicated and exiled. The popularity of his doctrine, however, remained unbroken. After Honen's death in 1212 the movement split into several branches, among which the so-called Chinzei branch eventually became dominant. Until the early 17th century, however, Jodo-shu failed to gain official recognition as an independent denomination. After World War II several factions seceded, but in 1962 they merged again, and the Chion-in in Kyoto, founded in 1234 by Honen's disciple Genchi at the site where his master had resided, was accepted as Jodo-shu's headquarters, or Grand Head Temple. A second, much smaller denominational family of Jodo-shu is called Seizan-ha. The three denominations belonging to the Seizan group count less than 500,000 adherents.

A monastic way of life is mainly upheld by nuns, whereas the temples are run by married male priests; a priest will, as a rule, bequeath his temple to his eldest son. Jodo-shu runs universities, colleges, schools, and kindergartens, and promotes various scholarly and social activities. It is a member of the Japan Buddhist Federation, through which it relates to the World Fellowship of Buddhists. Major strongholds of Jodo-shu outside Japan are regions with a large Japanese population such as Hawaii (14 institutions), the United States

(2 temples), and Brazil (2 temples). Hitherto, the denomination has developed no notable missionary activities among non-Japanese.

John of God Movement, The

While John of God has been working as a medium-healer in Brazil for four decades, only in the past decade has he become well known overseas. In 2006 alone he was invited to conduct healing events in Germany, the United States, and New Zealand. He returned to the United States and New Zealand in 2007, and in 2008 and 2009 he was once again in the United States. A large number of people attended each of these events, and many more have been to his healing center in the town of Abadiânia, central Brazil. Among the visitors are guides, healers, and the ill, who wish either to improve their healing powers or to obtain treatment. Several of them are building homes and establishing businesses (guest houses, restaurants, and Internet cafes) around the Casa de Dom Inácio, the healing center.

João Teixeira de Farias—aka João de Deus in Brazil and John of God overseas—was born in Cachoeira da Fumaça, a small town in the state of Goiás in 1942. He grew up in poverty and had very little schooling. João started prophesying at an early age and recalls having his first vision at 16. He tells of how while bathing in a river, Santa Rita de Cássia, an important saint in the Brazilian Catholic pantheon, appeared. Attesting to the highly syncretic nature of the Brazilian religious arena, it is alleged that the Catholic saint told him to go to a Kardecist Spiritist center in Campo Grande (the present capital of Mato Grosso do Sul state). There, for the first time, he maintains that he took on the entity of King Solomon and healed many people while oblivious to what he was doing. This was the first of the more than 30 entities he now channels.

After this incident, he traveled around central and northern Brazil healing people and doing odd jobs. Following the instruction of his spiritual guides, he finally settled in a small building near the highway in Abadiânia, a village 62 miles southwest of Brasília (Cumming and Leffler 2007, 1–5; Pellegrino-Estrich 2001, 42–43; Póvoa 1994, 45–47). John of God asserts that he is the medium of the spirits of deceased doctors, surgeons, healers, saints, and people who were remarkable in their lifetimes. He says he takes on these entities in a trance and does not remember his acts when he becomes conscious again. John of God is part of a small but significant group of medium healers who use kitchen knives, scissors, and scalpels to operate on people while in trance.

Although he declares himself Catholic, his is a highly syncretic Catholicism combining Kardecist Spiritism, Umbanda, and Freemasonry. Kardecist Spiritism is the religion that is flagged whenever people inquire about John of God's healing practices. Spiritist books are sold at the Casa shop; books and documentaries by foreign guides all call John of God's cosmology Spiritism.

Casa de Dom Inácio opens only three days a week. There are two healing sessions a day with approximately 500 people at each. Several healing methods are used by John of God in trance. He may prescribe herbs (sold at the Casa pharmacy), crystal beds (where the patient lies under a stand with seven fingers where crystals are placed, one for each chakra), sacred waterfall baths, meditation (or "current"), and invisible or visible (with cut) operations. Operations are conducted "to resolve a current physical ailment . . . to resolve a future health problem or . . . to clear some spiritual issue that is affecting your life and your mission" (Casa Guide for English Speaking Visitors 2006, 18). Patients undergoing invisible operations are told to close their eyes and place their hands on the sick part of the body while a volunteer prays aloud. Operations are concluded when John of God comes to the room and announces: “In the name of God you are all operated on.” People are then to go back to the pousadas (guest houses) and rest for 24 hours before they can return to the Casa. Those who have visible operations may have their skin cut with a scalpel, have their eyes scraped with a kitchen knife, or have surgical scissors inserted into their nostrils. An operation in one area of the body may be for another area. There is no asepsis or anesthetic, but people say they do not experience pain or develop infections.

If people cannot come to the Casa, they can send their picture through a friend or the guides. John of God in trance may draw a cross on the picture (meaning the person will need to come to the Casa eventually) and prescribe herbs. Another means of keeping the transnational connection and hence continuing the healing process is through crystal beds. While crystal beds were only found at the Casa, recently it has started selling them to foreigners. The sacred objects bought at the Casa shop, the DVDs, books on Spiritism and John of God, and crystal beds create a growing global network of healers, tour guides, and people who are ill or are seeking spiritual growth. They carry flows of ideas on French-Brazilian Spiritism, mediumship, and particular methods of healing to their home countries. In many parts of the world followers have started to meet to “sit in current” (meditate) as they would in the Casa. Accordingly, they believe the entities are present and may heal them. Some people are learning Portuguese to communicate with the healer.

This traffic of people, commodities, and ideas has created a snowball phenomenon: the more intense the traffic, the more people go to Brazil. The Internet has certainly had a role in this intensification: sites selling tours and books and films of visible surgeries on YouTube have facilitated the spread of information about the center.

John XXIII, Pope

1881–1963; r. 1958–1963

Pope John XXIII, an obscure elderly cardinal elected as pope in 1958 as a compromise candidate by a conflicted college of cardinals, became the most influential pope of the 20th century. He called the Second Vatican Council, which worked to reform the church and which altered longstanding relations with other Christian communities, Judaism, and the other major world religions.

John XXIII was born Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli to a peasant family in Sotto il Monte, Lombardy, in northern Italy, on November 25, 1881. He was directed toward the priesthood from early in his life and as a youth was sent to Rome to study. He was ordained as a priest in 1904 and the following year became the secretary to the bishop of Bergamo. During his decade in that position, he also taught church history in the diocesan seminary. His priestly career was interrupted in 1914 by World War I. He was drafted into the army and served in the medical corps as a stretcher bearer. The vicious nature of the war deeply affected him and led to a lifetime of peacemaking activity.

As a student, the young Roncalli developed a positive attitude toward the modern world and privately criticized Pope Pius X (r. 1903–1914) for a seeming fear of modernity. After the war, he was called to Rome, where he held a minor office in the congregation for the missions. He showed a degree of independence by opposing Vatican policy with his support of the Popular Party headed by Luigi Sturzo, a popular political leader who opposed the rise of Mussolini. At this time he developed a relationship with future cardinal and pope Giovanni Battista Montini (1897–1978).

Roncalli's career moved upward through the 1920s. In 1921, Pope Benedict XV (r. 1914–1922) named him the Italian president of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. In 1925, Pope Pius XI (r. 1922–1939) appointed Roncalli as apostolic nuncio to Bulgaria. The office carried the rank of archbishop. At the time of his consecration, he announced his motto obedientia et pax (obedience and peace), which some saw as a rebuke of the Fascist motto, credere, obedire, combattere (believe, obey, fight). His task also took him from Italy and the Vatican and placed him in direct contact with Eastern Orthodox Christians and Muslims, as well as making him an advocate for a Roman Catholic community (both Latin rite and Eastern Catholic) that existed as minorities.

In 1934 Roncalli received a further appointment as apostolic delegate to Greece and Turkey, which led to his move to Istanbul. Here he came in direct contact with Photius II (r. 1929–1935) and his successor Benjamin I (r. 1936–1946), who as ecumenical patriarchs were the spiritual leaders of the Eastern Orthodox community. Remaining in Istanbul through World War II, he used his diplomatic position to assist the network that facilitated the movement of many Jews from Eastern Europe to Palestine.

Roncalli's efforts were rewarded after the war with his assignment to France as the papal nuncio. However, he again found himself in a very different war, a war of words between the Vatican, which revived older anti-modernist themes, and a growing relationship with some of the leading French Catholic thinkers, all working on the intellectual horizons—Ives Congar (1904–1995), Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), Henri de Lubac (1896–1991), and Emmanule Cardinad Suhard (1874–1949). He proved a skillful diplomat.

Now in his senior years, in 1953 the Vatican named Roncalli the cardinal archbishop of Venice, a post seemingly designed to allow the aging cleric a comfortable retirement. Instead, he became a hardworking archdiocesan leader. He made it his task to visit every parish and join in the effort of finding jobs for the unemployed. He worked openly with Socialist and Communist leaders on common goals.

Then, in 1958, he attended the conclave of cardinals called to elect the new pope. Unable to reach a decision, the conclave turned to the aging cardinal Roncalli to hold the office for a few years. He took the name John XXIII, an interesting choice given his background in church history, as it asserted a lineage of Pope Gregory XII (r. 1406–1415) over against the claim of anti-pope John XXIII (r. 1410–1415), whose resignation of the papacy cleared the way for healing one of the major schisms in church leadership.

Quickly, Roncalli startled the people who had placed him in office. He held informal and lighthearted meetings with laypeople; he traveled outside the Vatican; and, a prelude of things to come, he removed a phrase referring to “perfidious Jews” from the prayers for Holy Week. Then, in an even more startling act, the new pope culminated his first year in office by announcing his call for a new all-church Council, choosing as his podium the church of St. Paul’s Outside the Walls, whose very name conveys its location outside the original precincts of Rome. He then used his diplomatic skills to prevent the attempts of curial conservatives to first delay the Council and then limit the subjects to be considered.

Pope John freed the Council to discuss a broad spectrum of issues, and the bishops passed a number of statements on the church. Major decisions included the promotion of worship in the language of the worshipping community instead of ecclesial Latin; a denunciation of anti-Semitism and a new openness toward the Jewish community; a call for more positive relations with Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches; further recognition of Eastern Catholics; and building a dialogical relationship with the major world religions.

Pope John XXIII died June 3, 1963, before the Council could complete its work. His old friend Giovanni Battista Montini was elected to succeed him. Much more conservative than his predecessor, Pope Paul VI (r. 1963–1978) acted quickly to first remove the issues of priestly celibacy and artificial birth control from the Council’s agenda and then to end the Council’s work in 1965. However, by this time, most of the Council’s business had been finished.

In the wake of Vatican II, the Roman Catholic Church entered a generation of adaptation to the changes wrought by the Council, which became most visible in the institution of the new Mass and the discipline (and schism) of the pockets of the most conservative elements of the church. A new era of dialogue with Protestants, Eastern Orthodox, and the various communities of the non-Christian religions was launched

(and still continues) at all levels of the church’s life, and significant steps were made to rid the church of all remnants of anti-Semitism.

Johnston Island

Johnston Island, a coral atoll in the central Pacific Ocean, is a small island dominated by an airfield. With it is another island, Sand Island, and two islands created by human effort. The two original islands have been greatly enlarged by a process known as coral dredging, the same process used to create the two additional islands. The total land mass of the four islands is about one square mile. The population is currently around 1,300 military and related civilian personnel.

Johnston Island was uninhabited when it was discovered in 1807 by the British sea captain for whom the island is named. The nearby Sand, East, and North islets are now combined in a U.S. dependency. Since 1934 the islands have been under the administration of the United States Navy, and unauthorized civilian visitors are not allowed.

There are no permanent religious buildings or congregations on the islands, and all services are organized by navy chaplains, primarily for those members of the Roman Catholic Church or of Protestant profession (interdenominational services without any attempt to deal with particular Protestant denominations).

■ Jordan

The modern country of Jordan is noted as a major site of civilization going back to the Paleolithic Age. As presently constituted, the country includes some 35,637 square miles of territory west of the state of Israel. It additionally shares borders with Syria, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia. The population is currently 6.2 million (2008).

Archaeological evidence indicates that the area has been occupied since ancient times. In the biblical era, it was occupied by the nations of Gilead, Moab, and Edom. In 331 BCE, Alexander the Great (356–323) conquered the area today known as the Near East, including this area, bringing Hellenic culture along with his conquering army.

Between 400 BCE and 106 BCE, the Nabataean civilization flourished in what is now southern Jordan. Its ancient capital, Petra, now a popular tourist attraction, was in its time one of the desert outposts of the Roman Empire. During the rule of the Roman Empire between 63 BCE and 324 CE, the Decapolis, a league of 10 cities (of which Jeresh, Philadelphia [now Amman], Umm, Qais, and Pella were in Jordan) was formed to facilitate commercial enterprise. Later during the Byzantine period (324–632), Jordan provided commercial wares and foodstuffs to travelers on caravan routes linking the Mediterranean to China.

Of interest to Jews and Christians are the numerous holy sites located in Jordan, recorded in both Hebrew scripture and New Testament writings. John the Baptist is supposed to have lived in the area around Bethany beyond the Jordan River, the river where John baptized Jesus. There are reports that Jesus also traveled to Bethany seeking a safe haven from hostile groups. It is thought that the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, whose destruction is described in Genesis, were near the Dead Sea. Another location near Mukawer is supposed to be the site where John the Baptist was imprisoned by Herod Antipas, who later beheaded John to please his wife, Salome. Mount Nebo, 3,281 feet above the Dead Sea, is noted as the area where Moses first saw the Holy Land and where he subsequently died and was buried.

The Arab-Islamic era began in 630 and during that era the region was ruled by the Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties, of Damascus and Baghdad, respectively. In the seventh century, this region was the site of the Battle of Yarmuk, in which the Arabs fought Heraclius (ca. 575–641), the Byzantine emperor, and won access to the Fertile Crescent, now in Iraq. During the Crusades, the western region of the territory served as the operational base for the military. In 1099, the Crusaders occupied Jerusalem. By 1187 Saladin (Salah ad Din; 1137–1193) had fought, conquered, and driven back the Crusaders at Kerek, resulting in their withdrawal from the Near East.

A 300-year rule by the Mamelukes, a military and political force made up of former slaves from Egypt, followed, and then Jordan fell to the Ottoman Empire, which made the territory a district administered from Damascus until World War I. The clandestine Sykes-Picot Treaty between France and England in 1916 gave the French control over Lebanon and Syria, while England gained a mandate over Iraq and Palestine (Palestine then included modern Jordan).

From 1920 until May 1946, the conflict and warfare over boundary lines and rulership continued. In 1920, Prince Abdullah (1882–1951) seized power and organized the nomadic Jordanian Bedouins, who were loyal to him. Fearing a hostile outbreak, the English offered Abdullah the Emirate of Transjordan (under their protection), while his opponent, Faisal, received control of Mesopotamia, now known as Iraq.

After taking part in the Arab-Israeli war of 1948–1949, Transjordan took the name of Jordan and annexed Arab Palestine, including the West Bank of the Jordan River, along with Palestinian refugees who had left Israel and Jerusalem. Palestinians make up two-thirds of the population of Jordan. King Hussein (1953–1999), who assumed the throne in 1953, supported the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). An incident known as Black September occurred in September 1970, when a number of Palestinians were killed by the army of Jordan for political reasons. Despite internal problems caused by a refugee situation, it is the money that Palestinian migrant workers send home to Jordan that underwrites the economy. In July 1989, Hussein relinquished his claim to the West Bank, which had been lost to Israel in the 1967 war. Problems with the cabinet led to some political reforms, and voting was allowed in 1989. In 1991, Hussein joined the leadership of the several political parties in signing a new Constitution, which included political rights for women and removed the restrictions that had disallowed a free press. In 1999, Hussein was succeeded by his son, King Abdullah, the present ruler of Jordan.

Folk culture has left an indelible imprint on Jordan from the pre-Islamic era. Of the folk beliefs, belief in the evil eye is the most common (as it is in a number of Mediterranean countries). Other practices, although done in the name of Islam, are antithetical to Islamic orthodoxy. For example, amulets made of paper containing verses from the Koran are worn, prepared by heterodox shaykhs for spiritual empowerment and protection, and people frequent “saints,” who are believed to have holiness (baraka). Visits to shrines are typical for people who wish to have children, a practice frowned upon by orthodox Islam. Jordanian Muslims generally have a strong work ethic, and pious expressions such as inshallah (God willing) and bismallah (in the name of God) accompany most important everyday activities.

In 1948, the population of the East Bank was about 340,000. The 1950 annexation of the West Bank swelled the population to about 900,000. After the 1957–1958 civil uprising an additional 250,000 to 300,000 West Bank Palestinians entered Jordan as refugees. Most refugees live in camps of hasty construction with poor sanitation facilities around Amman and the northern areas. Palestinians of the East Bank are caught in the throes of a national identity crisis.

During the 1950s pan-Arabism emerged, and Jordan’s leaders strongly recommended Jordanian sovereignty over the contested areas. The loss of the West Bank in 1967 and subsequent Israeli occupation furthered a nationalist climate that promoted the PLO, which offered an alternative identity for the displaced Palestinians. Today the Palestine Authority led by Mahmoud Abbas (b. 1935) attempts to provide a sort of government protection agency for the Palestinians who through warfare and border disputes are dispersed in several countries that are not their original homeland. King Hussein of Jordan (1935–1999) attempted to modernize Jordan. His oldest son Abdullah (b. 1962) has assumed the throne and seems to be following the policies his father had put in place. Noteworthy is that Abdullah’s wife is a Palestinian. The government has moved from an absolute monarchy in 1946 to a constitutional monarchy in 1991. There is a Senate with 40 members and a House of Representatives with 60 members.

More than 90 percent of the Jordanians are Muslims, with approximately 8 percent Arab Christians. The majority of Christians are Orthodox, the area being traditionally assigned to the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Those affiliated with that Patriarchate make it currently the largest Christian body in the country, with more than 80,000 members.

There is a small group of Greek Catholics (30,000), attached to the patriarch of Jerusalem of the Melkite Catholic Church, and a Latin Rite Roman Catholic Church community of about 12,000. There are a few congregations of Orthodox churches headquartered in neighboring countries, including the Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East, the Coptic Orthodox Church, and the Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia).

The Church of England has had mission stations in Jordan for more than a century. The Church Missionary Society, along with the Jerusalem and the East Mission, had to cut back services after the war of 1948, but work continues as part of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. The Old Hospital at Nablus is now maintained by the Arab Episcopal Community. There is a Bishop's School for Boys in Amman and St. George's School in Jerusalem.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance has been working in Jordan for more than 50 years and wishes to turn its property over to the Evangelical Church of the Christian Alliance, who have no missionaries but several pastored congregations. The Southern Baptist Convention began work in 1952, but political instability caused their work to languish. They have a bookstore and five churches affiliated with the Jordanian Baptist Convention, now possibly the largest Protestant Free church group, with more than 1,500 members. (The larger Evangelical Lutheran Church in Jordan had its work on the West Bank, and so is now in Israeli territory.) The very conservative Independent Board for Presbyterian Foreign Missions has worked in occupied Jordan south of Jerusalem. The Baraka Bible College opened in 1970, offering a bachelor in theology degree. World Presbyterian Missions has worked in Aqaba and Ma'an, in the extreme southern portion of Jordan. American Friends (Quakers) have had two excellent schools at Ramallah on the West Bank (now Israeli territory).

Church World Service and Lutheran Relief, as well as the Mennonite Central Committee, have been engaged in relief work in Jordan for a number of years. These groups provide resources to Palestinian refugees and have distributed food, clothes, and medicines in Jordan proper and in the West Bank. The Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Association arrived in Jordan in 1956 and, except for a brief period during the 1967 war, has had a small presence in Amman, with 3 churches totaling about 170 people. Also present in the country are the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the United Pentecostal Church, and the Church of the Nazarene.

Islam continues to be by far the largest religious group, with 93.5 percent of the population. Most are Sunnis who follow the Shafaiite School of jurisprudence. There is a small group of Chechens of Caucasian extraction who are Shias, and some 3,000 Alevis. Nomadic Bedouins follow their ancient customs first before the teachings from Islam.

There are some adherents of the Baha'i Faith near Adasiya in the Jordan Valley, and members of the Druze tradition are generally found near the Syrian border. Among the more interesting groups in the country is the Essene Church in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, a Gnostic group.

The government has accorded official government recognition to the Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic (Melkite), Armenian Orthodox, Maronite Catholic, Assyrian, Anglican, Lutheran, Seventh-day Adventist, United Pentecostal Church International, and Presbyterian churches. Several other churches are registered with the Ministry of Justice as societies rather than churches. The government does not recognize Jehovah's Witnesses, the United Pentecostal Church International, the Churches of Christ, or the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, though all are holding religious services without interference. Although they can practice their faith rather freely, Christians are discouraged from encouraging conversion to the Christian faith, since conversion attempts are considered legally incompatible with Islam and hence officially prohibited.

Members of the Baha'i Faith face official discrimination. Rather than viewing them as a separate religion, authorities define them as Muslims, thus their personal and family matters are referred to the Muslim law courts for adjudication. The government also refuses to register property belonging to the Baha'i community. In spite of these regulations, however, Jordan offers its minority religions more freedom than many of its neighboring countries.

Judaism

Judaism refers to the religious traditions of the Jewish people, a people dispersed since antiquity, whose major contemporary centers, in the United States and Israel, reveal a startling diversity of beliefs, praxis, and even ethnicities. Nevertheless, these varying interpretations of Judaism share the historic concepts of Torah, as both a record of the early history of the Jewish people and as a body of precepts and laws guiding its behavior; Israel, meaning the ancient homeland and the nation; and God and the unique covenant the Holy One made with the chosen people to give to them the land of Israel and the Torah in return for their obedience to sacred laws. The Jewish people today believe themselves to be the direct descendants of ancient Israel as described in the Torah. However, at various times and places other individuals and groups entered into this nation.

Because Jewish heritage reaches back almost to the beginnings of recorded history in the Middle East, the 4,000-year-old history of Judaism and the Jewish people rests on an ongoing process of interpretation of scripture and adaptation of traditions to new and changing historic and geographic contexts. Yet, across time and space, certain concepts have remained constant, even as they have undergone adaptation. Therefore, the Jews, as a nation, live bounded within a cycle of time that mandates the observance of Sabbaths and sacred occasions—the New Year (Rosh Hashanah) in the early fall, Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth), Passover (Pesach), and Pentecost (Shavuot). Another cycle of rituals and rites governs the great occasions of life from birth to death and even such quotidian experiences as diet and dress.

Ancient Origins The ancient origins of the Jewish people are recounted in the Hebrew Bible, the first great work of what would become an extensive body of sacred literature. The Hebrew Bible, which Christians hold sacred as the Old Testament, consists of three large sections: the Torah, also known as the Five Books of Moses (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy), which is read as the centerpiece of the Sabbath worship service; the Prophets, which follow the history of this people after the death of Moses and into the monarchy of the great kings David and Solomon and their heirs, and which also contain books of sacred prophecies; and the Writings, a collection of books diverse in style, including Psalms and Proverbs, and written at varying times.

According to the Torah, after the creation of the Earth and humanity, a clan emerged headed by the patriarch Abraham. Genesis relates the story of Abraham's covenant with God, or Yahweh (spelled in Hebrew as YHWH), and God's promise to make of Abraham's descendants through his wife Sarah a nation and to give them the land of Canaan. One sign of that covenant was the circumcision of all of the males among Abraham's people. God repeated the promises of the covenant to Abraham's son Isaac and to his grandson Jacob. Jacob had 12 sons. At a time of famine in Canaan, Jacob's descendants relocated to Egypt, where one of Jacob's sons, Joseph, who had been sold into slavery by his jealous brothers, had risen to a position of prominence. Thus, by the end of Genesis, the children of Abraham resided in Egypt.

The book of Exodus opens several generations later when a Pharaoh, who did not know Joseph, feared that the expanding population of the Hebrews—now called the Children of Israel or the Israelites, after Jacob who was also called Israel—would unite with his enemies. Pharaoh enslaved the Children of Israel, and then ordered the death of all male newborns. But the infant Moses survived and, as the text relates, was found by Pharaoh's daughter and raised as an Egyptian in the palace court.

As an adult, Moses fled to Midian after killing an Egyptian who was beating an Israelite slave. While tending his flock, he had an encounter with God who spoke from a burning bush that would not be consumed. God told him to return to Egypt and free his people. God identified himself as "I am that I am" and told Moses to tell the Israelites that "The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you" (Exodus 3:14–15). God also called Aaron, Moses' brother, to assist him.

After this encounter Moses returned to Egypt to negotiate the release of the Israelites, initially asking that they be permitted to go into the wilderness for three days to worship their God and then demanding their exodus from Egypt. According to the story recounted in Exodus, God sent 10 plagues to afflict the Egyptians, but Pharaoh only relented at the last of the plagues, the death of the first-born. Nevertheless, even as the people departed, Pharaoh's army pursued, and the miracle of the parting of the Reed Sea (as modern scholars have correctly translated this) allowed the Israelites to cross out of Egypt into the Sinai, but the waters returned to engulf Pharaoh and his chariots.

It is imperative to emphasize that, while the early books of the Hebrew Bible describe the origins of the ancient Israelites, no extra-biblical evidence confirms or denies this ancient story of Abraham's wanderings in Canaan or the exodus from Egypt. The first extra-biblical reference to the people Israel appears on the stele of Pharaoh Merneptah (1213–1203 BCE), which reports inaccurately that this Pharaoh had utterly destroyed the people Israel. Nevertheless, scholars and scientists continue to seek evidence for the possibility of the events described, which remain sacred to the Abrahamic religions, while skeptics assert that the stories of the Bible have no basis in history and their miracles are irrational myths.

Having successfully escaped, the Hebrews journeyed to Mount Sinai. There Moses received a new revelation, a new covenant between God and the people—they agreed to worship God, and God gave them the laws, including the Ten Commandments, by which they were to live. The people accepted the covenant, but soon afterward turned their backs on it by violating one of its essential laws prohibiting graven images. It would be a generation before the people moved from the Sinai wilderness into their promised land, Canaan.

Joshua succeeded Moses as head of the community and led the Israelite conquest of Canaan. At this point the ancient nation came into existence in the land of Israel. The story of the next centuries is told in terms of the struggle to remain loyal to the One God, in contrast to the surrounding polytheistic cultures, the struggle to fend off conquest by various neighbors, and the development of leadership. Israel was divided into the 12 tribes named for Jacob's sons. Joshua assigned land to each tribe, and a series of seers, judges, priests, and prophets emerged to guide the people according to God's will. These divinely inspired leaders dealt with a range of problems and provided some overall guidance to the confederation of tribes. (As with the books of the Torah, scholars debate the historicity of the biblical books of Joshua and Judges.)

During this time, worship was centered at Shiloh, where the symbol of the Israelites' covenant with God, the ark of the covenant, and worship of God, through the animal sacrificial cult, was maintained by the priests. The site was overrun ca. 1050 by the Philistines, who captured the ark. The Philistine victory led directly to the Israelite decision to create a stronger central government, the monarchy. Around 1000 the kingdom of Israel emerged, with Saul as its first king

(r. ca. 1020–1000). Saul’s troubled reign was followed by that of David (ca. 1000–962), Israel’s greatest king. He defeated the Philistines and, after capturing the hill city of Jerusalem from the Jebusites, made it the religious and political center of his empire. David’s son and successor, Solomon, went on to build the first temple there. From this time forward Jerusalem would remain the Jews’ holy city, a tenet eventually shared by Christianity and Islam, the other Abrahamic religions.

Solomon’s successor, Rehoboam (r. ca. 934–917), could not hold the kingdom together, and in 931 it split into two: the northern kingdom, which was called Israel, and the southern kingdom known as Judah, named for the largest of its two tribes. Both kingdoms prospered for the next two centuries. But in 721 the rising empire of Assyria conquered Israel, scattering its people—the legendary Ten Lost Tribes of Israel. A century later, when Assyria was eclipsed by the rise of Babylonia, the Babylonians overran Judah, and, in 586, conquered Jerusalem, destroyed the temple, and exiled its inhabitants to the city of Babylon.

How the stories of Israelite origins and history came to be recorded in the Hebrew Bible remains a matter of conjecture. Scholars hypothesize that, during the time of the two kingdoms, differing accounts were recorded that were later, during the Babylonian exile, redacted into what became the Torah. One hypothesis argues that the original sources used different names for God—one preferring the name Elohim in the account of events prior to the revelation to Moses at Sinai, the other calling the Israelite God YHWH, translated into English as Lord.

The time from the emergence of David and Solomon through the two kingdoms was also the era in which independent religious voices, those of the prophets, would arise to challenge the rulers and the priests wherever they saw corruption or false worship. Among the prophets, the voices of the two collected in the book of Isaiah (First Isaiah, eighth century, chapters 1–39; Second Isaiah, sixth century, chapters 40–66; scholars conjecture that these latter chapters may contain a third voice) stand out for their emphasis upon monotheism, worship of Yahweh as the God of history, and the vision that in the future all nations would come to worship the One God.

Prophets would continue to arise among the ancient Israelites even after Babylonia fell in 539 to Persia. The Persian king Cyrus (ca. 585–529) permitted the Jews—who so desired—to return to Jerusalem where they resumed worshipping God and, in 515 dedicated the second temple. Those who remained behind in the Persian Empire formed the origins of what the Jews, as this people would now be called, have named the diaspora, or dispersion. From then until today, the history of the Jewish people must trace the various civilizations of the Jews who have lived both within the land of Israel and in the diaspora communities that have flourished and disappeared over the ages.

The Greek and Roman Eras In 332, Alexander the Great (356–323) captured Jerusalem. Following Alexander’s death, his empire split among his generals. Judea first became part of the Ptolemaic kingdom based in Egypt, and then around the year 200 it came within the orbit of the Seleucid kingdom, centered in Syria. After several decades, the Seleucids clashed with traditionalists in Jerusalem and Judea. The issue came to a head during the reign of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV (r. 175–163). In his attempt to suppress Jewish dissent, Antiochus IV desecrated the temple and forbade the observance of the Sabbath (the weekly day of rest commanded in the Mosaic covenant), the study of the Torah, and the practice of circumcision. His actions sparked a revolt led by a family known as the Maccabees. Their capture of the temple and its rededication are commemorated annually in the Jewish winter festival of Hanukkah. Eventually, the Maccabees and their heirs threw off Seleucid rule and established an independent Jewish state in 142, known as the Hasmonean kingdom. The state would remain independent until the Roman conquest in 63 CE.

During the centuries of an independent Judea, a variety of groups emerged within the Jewish community. Prominent among them were the Sadducees and the Pharisees. The former argued against the authority of much of the oral tradition of interpreting the Torah, opting to keep control of interpretation in the hands of the priesthood. The Pharisees argued for a broader interpretation of the Torah, using the oral tradition and placing the authority in the hands of a learned elite.

The Pharisaic party would come to dominate, eventually giving rise to the era of classical Judaism, led by the rabbis or great sages of the Jewish people.

Judea's independence ended with the arrival of the Romans. It appears that the turmoil of Roman occupation and the establishment of a local puppet government created an environment in which a wide spectrum of Jewish groups emerged. Among these was the Qumran community (Dead Sea sect), which was forgotten until a library of their material was uncovered in the 1940s on the edge of the Dead Sea, where they had retreated to create their communal society. The Qumran community lived a separated life marked by discipline and hope for the arrival of a messianic figure. Scholars have argued for a half century over the possible influence of the Qumran community on the founding of another group, the Jesus movement that would eventually grow into Christianity.

Both the Qumran community and the Jesus movement were symbolic of unrest in the land, caused not only by Roman rule but by offensive Roman policies that were contrary to Jewish law and practice. A revolt against Rome broke out in 66, and an army was dispatched to quell it. Jerusalem fell in 70 and the second temple was razed. Resistance would continue for a few more years, most notably at the mountain fortress Masada, where, in 73, defenders committed suicide prior to its fall.

Even prior to the Roman era, diaspora Jewish communities thrived around the Mediterranean Basin. Possibly hundreds of thousands resided in Alexandria during the first century.

In direct response to the loss of the temple, Johanan ben Zakkai, a Pharisee, created a new school to continue the Pharisaic tradition of Torah interpretation. The learned Pharisees, or rabbis (teachers), as they were now called, fixed the canon of books, now assembled as the Hebrew Bible. With the sacrificial cult in the temple destroyed and with the concomitant loss of the centrality of the priesthood, the rabbis emphasized worship in the synagogue, a well-established institution and the local center for the gathering of the community for prayer and for the study and teaching of the Torah. As the settings for communal prayer three times a day, the synagogues now became the center of public Jewish religious life. The rabbis fixed the liturgies for the various synagogue services. They acknowledged God's covenant and hoped for the coming of Israel's messiah and the rebuilding of the destroyed temple.

Equally important, the rabbis carried on discussions concerning the oral law, commentary and interpretation of the Torah to apply its teachings to daily living. Rabbis began to write down these commentaries, and, at the beginning of the third century, an initial authoritative edition appeared as the Mishnah (literally, repetition). The Mishnah contains the opinions of more than 100 Jewish scholars. Its laws guide Jewish behavior, establishing such customs as the order of the blessings and the kinds of work prohibited on the Sabbath. Its regulations continue to guide Jewish religious praxis today.

In the next centuries the process of interpretation of the Torah continued with the Mishnah as its basis. In Palestinian academies in Tiberias and Caesarea, rabbis produced the commentary called the Gemara (completion). By the year 400 their commentaries with the relevant parts of the Mishnah were redacted into the text known as the Jerusalem Talmud. However, the writing down of the Mishnah also allowed the old Jewish community at Babylon, which had continued from the sixth century BCE, to establish rival academies. These emerged, in time—especially after Palestinian Jewry was affected by the division of the Roman Empire and then its decline—as authoritative centers for the Jewish world. Their commentaries, also called Gemara, were redacted, with the relevant sections of the Mishnah, into the Babylonian Talmud by 500. The two Talmuds, which do differ from one another, recorded comments from more than 2,000 teachers and covered numerous topics not mentioned in the Mishnah. (The attempt to establish the authority of the Talmud would lead to the emergence of one group that rejected the idea of the oral law and many of the rules and rituals derived from it. Through the centuries the Karaites have survived as a tiny minority tradition in the Jewish world.)

The legislation contained in the Torah, Mishnah, and Gemara, and all subsequent commentaries and texts of Jewish law constitute halacha, the law (literally,

“the way a faithful Jew walks”). To be a faithful Jew was to acknowledge God’s covenant with the community and to order one’s life in conformity to God’s law, which covered every imaginable aspect of life. In fulfilling the law, an individual sanctified life from moment to moment. Concern with proper behavior took center stage, although theological speculation still had its place.

While the rabbis were debating the laws of the Mishnah and Talmud, they also adapted the Jewish calendar and its holidays. The seder, a ritual and meal celebrating the Israelites’ deliverance from Egypt, was developed for the celebration of Passover. The rabbis fixed the future calculation of the Jewish calendar, which had once required witnesses to the new moon in Jerusalem. This guaranteed that Jews wherever they lived would celebrate holy days at the same time and in the proper season. It should also be noted that in antiquity Jews in the diaspora had added a second day to their celebration of festivals, a custom that developed out of concern that word of the new moon’s appearance might not reach diaspora Jewish communities in time for the celebration of Rosh Hashanah. This explains why some Jews today celebrate a single day of many festivals, as is done in the modern state of Israel and among some diaspora Jewish communities, and why others celebrate two.

With liturgies of Sabbaths, festivals, and weekdays, rituals for holidays and life’s passages, an ever-growing corpus of halacha, a fixed calendar, and a synagogue for every Jewish community, Judaism appeared ready to survive until God would send the messiah and return the nation to the land of Israel. Indeed, from a presentist perspective, the first generations of rabbis built the platform upon which Jewish history would henceforth develop.

Judaism in the Diaspora Through the dispersion of the Jewish community (even prior to the Roman era), Jewish ideas found their way to new Jewish communities that emerged in unexpected places. Jews traveled westward around the Mediterranean Basin, and a flourishing community emerged on the Iberian Peninsula. Very distinctive Jewish communities, including the Beta Israel and the Lemba, developed south of Judea in Yemen, Ethiopia, and even in far-off Zimbabwe. Jewish communities also sprang up in the East, in Mesopotamia, Afghanistan, and even India, where the Bene Israel and Jews of Cochin would become integrated into the society.

The dispersion of the Jews would at times be encouraged by economics, but all too frequently it was caused by persecution or the threat thereof. Jews encountered difficulties from the Romans, who did not understand their monotheism. Then, they found themselves under attack from the Christians, especially as Christianity developed as a separate religion followed primarily by Gentiles (that is, non-Jews) and one that saw itself as superseding Judaism. In the seventh and eighth centuries, Islam emerged as a new force sweeping out of the Arabian desert and across North Africa, into Spain, and throughout the Middle East to Mesopotamia, Persia, and Central Asia. By the eighth century, the majority of the world's Jews resided in the lands of the Muslim Caliphate, where they were mostly tolerated as a protected people. In many places in the Muslim world Jewish culture and intellectual life flourished.

Spain was an important center of Jewish life. Jews flourished under the Muslim caliphate in the eighth through the 11th centuries but were persecuted when, at the end of the 11th century, the Almoravid dynasty from Morocco extended its control into Spain, and these Islamic rulers took actions against the Jews, including the closing of the synagogues. During the next centuries the region would be dominated by the interests of competing Muslim factions and the reassertion of Christian hegemony. The re-establishment of Christian rule in Spain and Portugal eventually proved disastrous for the Jews, who were banished from their homes in 1492 and 1497, respectively.

Spain was also the birthplace of Moses ben Maimon (1135–1204), better known as Maimonides, who fled his homeland during the later Almohades persecution and eventually settled in Egypt. He became the author of a large code of Jewish law, the Mishnah Torah. He also articulated the 13 principles of Jewish belief. They require that Jews affirm the oneness of God, the revelation of Torah, and belief in the coming of the messiah. In the contemporary world traditional Jews continue to affirm these principles.

With his love of Greek philosophy, especially Aristotle, Maimonides, the author of the Guide for the Perplexed, stood in contrast to another Spanish teacher, Moses de Leon (1250–1305), who lived and worked in Granada. De Leon lifted Jewish mysticism to a new level with his compilation, the Zohar—a mystical commentary on the Torah. Judaism, of course, has a long mystical tradition. Kabbalah, the Jewish mystical tradition which emerged in medieval Spain, pictures the cosmos as the emanation of God through 10 realms called sephiroth. The last of these emanations, malkuth, is roughly equivalent to the mundane world. For the Kabbalist, the Torah, properly interpreted, is a doorway into the invisible mystical realm. De Leon's work would find a capable interpreter in the post-expulsion era in Isaac Luria (1534–1572). Later, in the 18th century, a separate branch of traditional Judaism—Hasidism—would also emphasize Judaism's mystical dimension.

In the Middle Ages Jews also spread north from Palestine into Europe, establishing communities in England, France, Italy, Germany, and Eastern Europe. Although these communities sometimes attained a stable life as minority groups in Christian lands, their history was punctuated by discrimination, persecution, massacres, and expulsions. Christian theology, which blamed the Jews for the death of Jesus, justified the denigration of this people. Over time, Christian anti-Jewish animus extended beyond restrictive legislation, such as the identifying Jewish badge, to imagine that Jews were inimical to Western Christendom, and that Jews even kidnapped Christian children for secret rituals. In this atmosphere of mistrust and misunderstanding, Jews faced the continual threat of sudden outbreaks of violence.

Jews were expelled from England in 1290 and from France early in the next century. The expulsion from Spain in 1492 led to further expulsions from Sicily (1492–1493), Lithuania (1495), Brandenburg, Germany (1510), Tunisia (1535), and Naples (1641). At around this same time urban governments established the first of the ghettos, closed communities that segregated the Jews from the larger society, the first one being created in Venice in 1516. As a result of expulsion and persecution, many Jews moved to Poland, which became a major center of European Jewish life. A vital community also developed in Holland in the 16th century, the most religiously tolerant land in Western Europe. Though segregated from the larger community, the Jewish communities developed a rich culture.

The expulsion of the Jews from Spain led many to find haven in the lands of the Ottoman Empire, which at the time stretched from the Balkans across the Middle East and into North Africa as far as Algeria. Many Jews also moved into the newly discovered Americas. They first became visible at Recife, Brazil, during the brief occupation by the Dutch (1630–1654). After the loss of Recife, the Jews dispersed throughout the Americas to such places as the Dutch settlement on the island of Curaçao and to the North American colonies of New Amsterdam (soon to become New York) and later to Newport, Rhode Island.

There were only six synagogues in the United States at the time of its founding, but through the 19th century the Jewish community was increased manyfold by immigration, first by tens of thousands of German and central European Jews and then by hundreds of thousands of eastern European Jews. These Jews from northern, central, and eastern Europe, known collectively as Ashkenazim, completely overwhelmed the original community of American Sephardic Jews, who traced their heritage through Spain and Portugal.

Development of the Modern Jewish Community

Through the 18th century, Jewish religion remained largely rooted in the teachings and traditions based on the texts that had developed in Palestine and Babylonia in the early centuries of the first millennium CE. However, during the late 18th and 19th centuries, Jewish life underwent a remarkable change, the result of the liberal policies toward Jews that grew out of the Age of Enlightenment and its demand for separation of church and state. The French Revolution had emancipated the Jews, granting Jewish men civil rights as individuals and annulling all anti-Jewish legislation, but demanding that Jews adapt to Western civilization in return. The Napoleonic wars carried these ideas to Jewish communities across Europe.

Now Jews, seeking to respond to modernity, consciously sought ways to integrate and assimilate into the larger Gentile society. One response was the creation of Reform Judaism, a new way of being Jewish that emphasized what were seen as the eternal truths of the faith, as opposed to irrelevant ancient practices. Arguing that God's revelation was progressive, German Rabbi Abraham Geiger (1810–1874) began to introduce changes into his synagogue in Breslau. Many traditional practices were discarded, including a variety of dietary restrictions, traditional beliefs were modified in favor of emphasis on an “ethical monotheism.” Reform Judaism caught on quickly in the United States, where Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise (1819–1900) championed the cause.

Geiger found strong opposition among the traditionalists in the Jewish world. Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) of Frankfurt am Main led the forces that would affirm traditional, or as it would come eventually to be called, Orthodox Judaism. In the United States Isaac Leeser (1806–1868) championed the traditionalist position in opposition to Rabbi Wise.

Between Orthodoxy and Reform, a third alternative was proposed by Zacharias Frankel (1801–1875). He recognized both the need to respond to the new consciousness of history and the Reform idea of Judaism as constantly changing with the times. However, he rejected the radical stripping of “outdated” ritual from the synagogue, especially Reform's willingness to jettison Hebrew as the language of prayer. He appreciated ritual as an expression of deeply felt realities. He therefore proposed a third way that has subsequently come to be known as Conservative Judaism, or in contemporary Israel, the Masorti movement.

In the meantime, Hasidism had been born in Poland, the product of both the Kabbalistic writing of de Leon and Luria and the experiences of men like Israel ben Eliezer (1700–1760), known as the Baal Shem Tov, the Master of the Good Name (of God). Reportedly an unlearned man, the Baal Shem Tov became known as a healer, and as a teacher he called into being a community whose centers were built around men known for one or more charismatic traits, often as wonder-workers. Although perfectly observant in belief and practice, the Hassidim and their courts were often seen as competitors to rabbinical Judaism and the synagogue. Many branches of Hasidism developed as different leaders established their work in the various cities and countries of Eastern Europe.

Zion, Holocaust, Israel In the second half of the 19th century, Jews continued to win emancipation in various countries in Europe. For example, several German states emancipated their Jews, and, in 1871, when Germany became unified, German Jews achieved full emancipation. But, even as Jewish integration into European civilization proceeded apace, reaction against new patterns of Jewish life and culture set in. Now what had once been a religiously based animus against the Jews evolved into racial anti-Semitism, hatred of the Jews rooted in the idea that they were a distinctive race that bore immutable, degenerate characteristics and whose members sought to undermine the foundations of Western civilization.

The culmination of 19th-century anti-Semitism was the infamous Dreyfus affair in France. Meanwhile in tsarist Russia, a new wave of violence had broken out against Jewish communities following the assassination of Tsar Alexander II in 1881. Waves of violence, known as pogroms, would continue there for the next decades.

Renewed violence and new forms of Jewish hatred in the 19th century provided the environment in which Zionism developed. In 1896, Hungarian-born Theodore Herzl (1860–1904) published his call for a Jewish nation, and the next year he founded the World Zionist Congress to plan for the future state. The rise of Zionism also called attention to the growing secularization of the Jewish community, for many of the early Zionists rejected religious praxis and belief, even as they saw Zion as the historic homeland of the Jewish people and planned to create a Jewish state there.

The idea of creating a Jewish state in Palestine, at the time still part of the Ottoman Empire, divided Jewish leaders. However, early supporters began to purchase land and to move there. Zionism as a national political movement gained greatly when, in 1917, Lord Arthur James Balfour (1848–1930), the British foreign secretary, wrote a letter to Lord Rothschild confirming the sympathy of His Majesty's Government for Zionist aspirations. Between 1900 and 1930, a quarter of a million Jews migrated to Palestine, which had fallen to the British when the Ottoman Empire was dismantled at the end of World War I. Migration increased during the next decade in response to persecution by the Nazis.

The history of the Middle East would likely have been very different had it not been for the Nazi Holocaust, the apogee of modern racial anti-Semitism. The Nazis murdered six million Jewish men, women, and children. Even before the full extent of the tragedy was known, much sympathy flowed to the survivors, and the Soviet Union favored the creation of a Jewish state over the continued presence of Great Britain in Palestine. Following a 1947 United Nations vote to partition Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state, events moved rapidly. In May 1948 the British ended their mandate over Palestine, and Jewish leaders proclaimed the new state of Israel. The concomitant Arab Palestinian state did not emerge.

Crucial to the development of Israel since its establishment has been the Law of Return. Originally passed in 1950, the law sought to solve the problem of Jewish persecution by granting every Jew residing anywhere in the world the right to migrate to Israel. As a result of this law, millions of Jews from communities around the world have moved to Israel during its brief history. They include Jews from historic communities in Arab countries, like Egypt and Yemen, who fled renewed anti-Jewish persecution following the establishment of the state of Israel, and approximately a million Jews from the countries of the former Soviet Union. Though a small minority of Orthodox Jews (Neturei Karta, Satmar Hasidism) continue to lobby against Israel, believing the state should not exist until the messiah comes, the world's Jews overwhelmingly support the existence of the Jewish state.

Modern Jewish religious life remains centered around the synagogue, each usually led by a rabbi. In turn, the synagogues are organized into national associations of synagogues and rabbis. Each of the major Jewish groups, Reform, Orthodox, Conservative, and the most recently formed Reconstructionist community, has national organizations in each country where they have multiple synagogues. Orthodoxy is divided by cultural traditions; German, eastern European, and Sephardic Jews retain a level of separation (World Sephardic Federation), and new forms of Orthodoxy have arisen around 20th-century issues (Young Israel and Gush Emumim). The national associations also participate in umbrella organizations serving the whole Jewish community, such as the World Jewish Congress, and some have formed international cooperative fellowships that serve their own constituency worldwide, such as the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

Today (2009), the world's two largest Jewish communities are in Israel and in the United States. Together they comprise more than 80 percent of world Jewry. Of the 5.2 million U.S. Jews, only around half are formally affiliated to a synagogue. Some 5.3 million Jews reside in Israel, where they make up more than three-fourths of the population. Large communities also continue in France (491,000), Argentina (185,000), Canada (374,000), and the United Kingdom (300,000).

Kabbalah Learning Centre

The Kabbalah Learning Centre is a relatively new effort to make the mystical wisdom of the Jewish Kabbalah—traditionally identified with the Hasidic movement and long the exclusive possession of an elite group of advanced students of a small number of rabbis—available to the Jewish community as a whole and even beyond, to seekers who are not Jewish. Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag (1886–1955) began this process by translating the Zohar, the basic text presenting the Kabbalistic wisdom, from Aramaic into modern Hebrew. He organized the text and wrote an introduction, later translated into English and published as the Ten Illuminations. In 1922 he founded the Kabbalah Learning Centre (also known as the Research Centre of Kabbalah) in Palestine. The Centre became the vehicle for Ashlag's continued work of translating and publishing the Zohar, which was completed in the 1950s.

Ashlag was succeeded by Rabbi Judah Brandwein (d. 1969), among whose major accomplishments was the republishing of the works of 16th-century Kabbalist, Rabbi Isaac ben Solomon Luria (1534–1572), thus making available these previously difficult-to-find works. Brandwein also added a set of notes and cross-references to the texts. He was in turn succeeded by Rabbi Philip S. Berg (formerly Philip S. Gruberger, b. 1929) the present leader of the Centre. Berg had grown up in the United States and met Brandwein in 1962. Berg has been a prolific author and has also worked on the production of an English translation of the complete Zohar.

Berg sees his task as presenting the Kabbalah to the whole world. He greatly expanded the operation of the Centre, opening teaching sites across Israel and in many European and North American cities. His basic text, Kabbalah for the Layman, was translated into Spanish, French, German, Persian, and Russian. He has also written books on reincarnation and astrology, which have appealed to people previously attracted to the New Age movement. One of the Centre's self-assigned tasks is to reach out to Jews in the New Age and bring them back to Judaism from popular Esoteric teachings.

As of 2009, The Kabbalah Centre reported 32 centers and study groups across the United States and 66 in other countries around the world. Its primary World Centres are found in Brazil, Argentina, Venezuela, Mexico, Israel, Cote d'Ivoire, Germany, United Kingdom, Poland, Russia, and Canada.

Israeli critics of Berg and the Centre have decried his attempts to teach the Kabbalah to a popular audience, pointing out that instruction was previously limited to males who were at least 40 years of age. More important, they have questioned his credentials; the yeshiva that Rabbi Brandwein headed denies any relationship with Berg. Berg has countered by publishing several volumes of his correspondence with Brandwein as evidence of their close relationship.

Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism

The Kagyu tradition (literally "transmitted command"), one of the four major schools of Tibetan Buddhism, is the result of a fusion of late Mahayana and Tantric teachings, both introduced by a lineage of Indian and Tibetan masters: Tilopa (988–1069), Naropa (1016–1100), Marpa (1012–1096), Milarepa (1040–1123), and Gampopa (1079–1153). The Kagyupa trace their origin to the Buddha Varjadhara. Traditionally, Marpa is considered to be the founder of the Kagyupa. Historically, however, the credit goes to the disciples of Gampopa. They established a number of sub-schools, including Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism, as well as the Padmodrupa (named for its founder, 1110–1170), which developed into a tree of lineages of which Drigung, Taklung, and Druk have persisted through the centuries along with the Karma. Although only minor differences in practice and ritual are discernible among these branches, each one underwent its own specific historical and geographical developments.

Originally, religious leadership was transmitted from uncle to nephew, but later branches adopted the reincarnation system of tulku (an incantation of a saintly person or deity). Neither strict celibacy nor exclusive membership to the institution was demanded by the early orders. Rather than a unified religious branch, the Kagyu order can be seen as a complex combination of organized monasticism and master-to-disciple tantric transmission.

Despite its emphasis upon oral transmission, the Kagyu tradition constitutes a matrix of teachings embodied in three basic texts. The first of these is the Mahamudra (Great Seal), a body of doctrine emphasizing meditation (Sanskrit: sadhana) and the consciousness of emptiness (Sanskrit: shunyata). Second, the Six Yogas of Naropa exposes the "extraordinary practices" (Tibetan: naro chodrug): "heat yoga" (Tibetan: tumo), "illusory body" (Tibetan: gyulu), "dream" yoga (Tibetan: milam), "clear light" perception (Tibetan: osel), "consciousness transmission" (Tibetan: phowa), and the yoga of the "intermediate states" between death and rebirth (Tibetan: bardo). Third, in his Precious Ornament of the Liberation, Gampopa offers a synthesis of the Kagyu and Kadam teachings in which he reaffirms the universal nature of Buddha. The realization of Buddhahood is possible by means of specific techniques: training of the mind (Tibetan: lodjong), "mindful awareness" (Tibetan: chine), and "penetrative seeing" (Tibetan: lakhtong), in addition to the "spirit of enlightenment" (Sanskrit: bodhicitta), the achievement of the "perfections" (Sanskrit: paramita), and merit-making performance (Sanskrit: puja), which are basic Mahayana practices. Of primary importance to the Kagyupa are faith and devotion to a qualified master (Sanskrit: guru; Tibetan: blama) considered as a "spiritual friend." Thus, Kagyu practice consists, on the one hand, of ascetic experiences of yoga and meditation as well as subtle Tantric techniques (that is, the visualization of deities), and, on the other hand, of ritual and collective performances (chants, pilgrimages) and expressions of devotion to the master and the lineage.

Many of the Kagyu dignitaries, especially those of the Karma school, played an important role in the political and religious history of Tibet. Exercising local power in their areas of settlement, the Kagyupa never fully achieved headship of the Tibetan nation. Their influence, however, extended to the borderlands of Tibet: the Drigung in Nepal and Ladakh (northern India), the Drukpa in Ladakh and in Buthan, and the Karma in Sikkim (India). Since the early 1970s, the Kagyupa have found new host countries in the West (Europe and North America).

Kailas, Mount/Lake Manasarovar

Mount Kailas, a spectacular peak in the Himalayan Mountains of western Tibet and the equally beautiful Lake Manasarovar, which lies at its base, are sacred to Tibetan Buddhists, followers of Tibet's Bon religion, and both the Jains and Hindus of India. The mountain is located north of the western border of Nepal and northeast of New Delhi. The mountain's peak reaches a height of 22,028 feet and sticks prominently above the surrounding landscape. The peak itself has a distinctive pyramidal shape with four steep triangular façades. On the southern façade, a vertical crease across the horizontal layers of rock presents a swastika design, which Hindus view as a symbol of the god Vishnu and Buddhists as an auspicious symbol, which will often be seen on the chest of statues of Gautama Buddha, the sides of Buddhist temples, and the covers of Buddhist books. The melting waters from the mountain's glaciers feed Lake Manasarovar (the highest freshwater lake of any size in the world) and ultimately four of the world's longest rivers: the Indus, the Brahmaputra, the Sutlej, and, most important, the Ganges.

Hindus identify the mountain with Shiva and consider it the axis of the world. It and the rivers it feeds form an immense sacred landscape that includes southwestern Tibet, northern India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. Saivite Hindus point to the mountain as the home of Shiva, where he sits aloof in the practice of the highest yoga and also engages in Tantric practices with his several consorts. It is the place that Shiva met one of his consorts, Meenakshi. The daughter of a king, Meenakshi was born with three breasts. According to the legend, she was told that she would lose one of them when she met her future husband, which occurred when she first encountered Shiva. Thus Hindu pilgrims come to identify the mountain as Shiva's linga and the lake as Meenakshi's yonis.

Their wedding was said to have occurred at Madurai, Tamil Nadu, where a temple was erected in 1560 in Meenakshi's honor. At the end of each day, the temple doors are shut, and, as music is played, temple priests take the statue of Shiva from its daytime resting spot into a room set aside as Meenakshi's bedroom. There Shiva remains until six o'clock the next morning, when he is brought out again for public viewing. Three annual festivals at the temple mark Shiva and Meenakshi's life together.

Tibetan Buddhists identify Mount Kailas with Mount Meru, the mythological center of the universe and symbolic of the single-pointedness of mind sought by practitioners. Pilgrims circumambulate Lake Manasarovar, occasionally stopping to bathe in its waters and quench their thirst. Bathing in the lake is said to assist one's entrance into paradise, and drinking the water can lead to healing. The mountain embodies the father principle and the lake embodies the mother principle. To complete the trek around the lake, which may consume three days or more, holds the promise of instant Buddhahood.

Local legends tell of an encounter between Tibetan Buddhist pioneer Milarepa (1040–1123) and a representative of Tibet's traditional Bon religion, the shaman Naro Bon-chung. They engaged in a contest of spiritual powers. As the contest proceeded, the Bon leader flew to the top of Mount Kailas on his drum. He arrived only to find Milarepa already waiting for him. Buddhists claim that the triumph of Buddhism and its displacement of Bon as the chief religion of Tibet can be dated to this encounter. In circumambulating the mountain, pilgrims will pass by a set of footprints that Buddhists believe to be Milarepa's. There is also a shrine that houses his silver-covered conch shell.

The predominance of Buddhism in Tibet has meant that Buddhists have tended to have the greatest access to the mountain over the centuries and they have used their proximity to erect some 13 monasteries adjacent to the mountain and the lake, and dotting the path the pilgrims follow to each. These monasteries were unfortunately targeted by the Red Guards during the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). The Chinese took the artwork, destroyed the buildings, and scattered the monks. It was not until 1981 that pilgrimages were again allowed to resume and the process of rebuilding the monasteries begun. To date only a small percentage of the monastic community has returned to assist pilgrims.

Not to be denied their role at the mountain, Jains believe that Rishaba, the first of their 24 tirthankaras (teachers), is said to have received his enlightenment at Mount Kailas.

Kamakura

Kamakura, today a small town south of modern Tokyo, was, following the shogun's wresting the power from the emperor at the end of the 12th century, briefly the capital of Japan. The time of the shogun's residency in Kamakura subsequently became a time of intense religious ferment and creativity, especially for Buddhism, which the shogun privileged. Kamakura is home to some 65 Buddhist temples, 19 Shinto shrines, and one of the most famous Buddha mega-statues in the world.

Kamakura's significance begins to emerge as one visits its many temples and shrines. It suddenly jumped out of historic obscurity at the end of the 12th century when the Minamoto family took control of Japan from the emperor and established their government in the city. Though the emperor continued formally on his throne in Kyoto, the power now resided in Kamakura even as the Minamoto shogun paid the emperor outward respect. The Kyoto drama ended in 1221, when the shogun's army defeated the belligerent imperial forces, but again, the emperor and his court remained in place. The Shogunate continued to rule until 1333, when the imperial rule was reestablished.

The 13th century saw the activity of many of the most famous Japanese Buddhist leaders, including Honen (1133–1212), Shinran (1173–1262), Eisai (1141–1215), Dogen (1200–1253), Ippen (1239–1289), and Nichiren (1222–1282). Honen founded, and Shinran and Ippen expounded upon, Japanese Pure Land Buddhism. In an age in which Buddhism was seemingly in decline, the trio approached the public with the offer to end their cycle of rebirth by entry into a new home in the Pure Land (heaven) through the regular recitation of the nimbutsu, the name of Amida Buddha. The simple piety built around the nimbutsu would project Pure Land Buddhism into its role as Japan's largest Buddhist community.

Zen arrived in Japan early in the seventh century, but not until the early Kamakura period (1185–1333) did it gain a real foothold throughout the country. Eisai became the instrument of introducing Zen Buddhism into Japan and is today thought of as its founder. Initially turned away by the Buddhist establishment in Kyoto, Eisai seized the opportunity provided by the emergence of the Kamakura shogunate. In 1200 he established Jufuju-ki, the first Zen center in Kamakura, and discovered strong support among the warriors (the samurai) that were the basis of the shogunate's power.

Eisai followed a form of Zen called Rinzaï, whose practitioners believed they would find enlightenment through spontaneous flashes. They became best known for their use of the koan, questions whose answers seem to defy logic. In the realization of the answer one is pushed toward enlightenment. In 1214, Eisai also wrote a treatise on tea and its healthful qualities that would become the source of later Japanese adoption of the beverage and its practice of the tea ceremony.

Dogen, Eisai's later contemporary, established the Soto School of Zen in Japan. Soto placed more faith in long periods of meditation and is best known for its practice of zazen, or sitting meditation. Dogen's stay at Kamakura was very brief. He moved there in 1247, but found Rinzaï practice so firmly established that he moved on to more fertile territory.

Today, Engaku-ji and the four other Rinzaï temples in Kamakura maintain the Zen base in the region. Engaku-ji later attained even greater significance for the role it was to play in the spread of Zen to the West. Soyen Shaku (1859–1919), the Zen teacher who attended the World Parliament of Religions in 1893, was from Engaku-ji, and this center would be among the first Zen centers to open its doors to Westerners.

Kamakura Pure Land Buddhism would become most visible in Kamakura by way of Daibutsu, the giant statue of the Buddha that has become one of the most recognizable images of Japan. Weighing approximately 121 tons, it is 43 feet in height and about 30 feet wide, from knee to knee. Originally constructed of wood, it was significantly damaged in a storm and in 1252 it was reconstructed in bronze. It was cast in several pieces and assembled in its present resting place. Several structures built over the statue at various times have been destroyed, and since 1495 it has remained in the open. Though a statue of an enlightened one, it is not of Gautama Buddha (the founder of Buddhism) but of the bodhisattva Amida Buddha, around which Pure Land Buddhism is focused. It was originally constructed after the shogun had seen the giant statue of Vairocana Buddha (called Birushana in Japan) at Nara.

A youthful Nichiren (he was ordained as a priest at age 15) began his quest for spiritual truth just as Pure Land Buddhism spread across Japan. He asked why people who put their faith in the nimbutsu still experienced the spectrum of painful conditions. This and other equally puzzling problems motivated his studies after he settled in Kamakura in 1238. Four years in Kamakura and 11 years roaming the countryside visiting the spectrum of Buddhist groups then operating in the country led him to one firm conclusion, that the writing known as the Lotus Sutra, somewhat promoted by the Tendai Buddhists, summarized the essential teachings of the Buddha.

When, in 1253, Nichiren announced his new Buddhist practice, he did so by attacking faith in the nimbutsu, which was to be replaced with the chanting of the “Great Title” of the Lotus Sutra, that is, “Namu Myoho Renge Kyo.” He offered this new practice as the practical way for everyone to realize the deepest truths of Buddhism. Pure Land leadership reacted immediately, intensely, and negatively. Feeling his life threatened, Nichiren sought refuge in Kamakura. From his small hut, he worked the streets preaching to whoever would listen. His anti-elitist message took hold among common people.

Nichiren’s efforts aroused active opposition from both Buddhist leaders and government authorities. His house was burned down in 1260, and the following year he was arrested and exiled. He returned to Kamakura in 1263. The government more or less tolerated him until 1271, when he was again formally exiled. In 1274, he returned to Kamakura, again approaching the government to gain its backing. Again he failed, and reconciling himself to the role of outcast, he settled permanently at Mount Minobu, the center from which Nichiren Buddhism would spread throughout Japan. Contemporary Nichiren Buddhists revere the several Nichiren-shu temples at Kamakura as they recall their founder’s adventures there.

Apart from the spread of the new forms of Buddhism during the Kamakura period, several of the temples have some individual characteristics that continue to attract special constituencies. Tokeiji, for example, is famous as a haven for females. Since the 13th century it has served as a refuge for battered wives who could get a divorce by serving as nuns at the temple for a few years. The Hase Kannon Temple boasts the tallest wooden statue in Japan, an 11-headed carving of the bodhisattva Kannon (aka Kwan Yin), the bodhisattva of mercy.

Buddhism dominated the Kamakura period, though Shinto was not neglected. Among the oldest temples in Kamakura is the Amanawa Jinja, dating to the eighth century. This shrine was protected by the shogun, though otherwise distinctly favoring Buddhism, as one of his relatives’ wives believed that she received help in bearing a son from her activity at the jinja.

When the shogunate fell in 1333, the power once again shifted to Kyoto, and Kamakura lost its place on history’s stage. The once bustling city again assumed the role of a small, quiet town. Rediscovered in the post–World War II world, today Kamakura draws visitors from around the world—pilgrims and tourists, believers, students of religion, and those who merely appreciate the artistry of the buildings and gardens.

■ Kanaky

Kanaky, or New Caledonia, officially the Territoire d’Outre-Mer de la Nouvelle-Calédonie, is a French overseas department consisting of the large island of New Caledonia and several sets of smaller islands in the South Pacific west of Australia. The islands include 7,171 square miles of land. The largest group, though not a majority, of the 225,000 residents (2008), is Melanesian. Approximately a third of the inhabitants are European.

European discovery and naming was made by Captain James Cook (1728–1779) in 1774. The islands had been home to Melanesians, primarily of the Kanaka group, for more than 3,000 years. The French occupied New Caledonia in 1853 and developed a harsh, repressive culture. French settlement was spurred by the discovery of nickel and chromium deposits. In 1998, the French signed the Noumea Accord designed to transfer governing autonomy to local leadership over several decades. The agreement also includes the holding of several plebiscites on complete independence.

The indigenous religions of the New Caledonians were largely destroyed and replaced by Roman Catholicism, but they have survived in some of the remote mountainous areas. Indigenous religious practice was given some new life by the introduction of the so-called cargo cults after World War II, primarily from the New Hebrides.

The first Christian missionary, a Methodist from Tonga, arrived in New Caledonia in 1834. He was joined in 1843 by two Samoans, who arrived as representatives of the London Missionary Society (LMS), a Congregationalist-based organization. European LMS missionaries came in the 1850s. Their combined efforts led to the formation of the Evangelical Church in New Caledonia and the Loyalty Islands, the largest Protestant body in Kanaky. It now commands the allegiance of around 15 percent of the population of 165,000 people. It experienced a schism in 1960, leading to the formation of the Free church.

The first priests of the Roman Catholic Church arrived in 1843, and following the French occupation the church enjoyed official support. In its second generation, it moved to develop indigenous leadership, and the first priests from New Caledonian members were ordained in 1884. The capital, Noumea, became the center of French Catholic life throughout the south Pacific, and in 1966 it became the home of the archbishop of Noumea, whose territory also includes the Wallis and Futuna Islands. Through the 20th century, the population of Kanaky became quite diverse, with measurable numbers of Anglos of British heritage, Eastern Europeans, Chinese, and representatives of many people from various other South Pacific islands. The present spectrum of religions now present in the islands can be traced to the mid-1880s, with the arrival of missionaries from the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (now the Community of Christ). Its sister, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, began work in the 1950s after some members from Tahiti moved to New Caledonia to work in the nickel mines. The work is part of the Fiji Suiva Mission.

Through the 1900s, other Christian groups established work on the islands, including the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1925), the Jehovah's Witnesses (1950), the Assemblies of God (1969), and Baptists

International Missions, an American-based fundamentalist Baptist organization (1995). The Baha'i Faith began work in 1952. Buddhism is practiced by a segment of the Vietnamese community, though the majority is Roman Catholic. There is a small community of Muslims, mostly Sunnis of the Shafaiite School of Islam from Indonesia. There is also a long-standing community of Rosicrucians affiliated with the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem

1881–1983

Mordecai Menahem Kaplan, a Conservative Jewish rabbi and seminary professor, was the founder of Reconstructionism, a new school of Jewish life and faith that has emerged as a major new community of American Judaism in the 20th century.

Kaplan was born June 11, 1881, in the town of Svencionys, Lithuania. Toward the end of the decade when he was only eight years old, his family immigrated to America. He attended public school but received a traditional Jewish supplementary education. After high school, he entered Columbia University, where he encountered the modern critical study of the Bible and religion in general. He subsequently attended the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), in New York City, and was ordained as an Orthodox rabbi there in 1902. Shortly thereafter, he began his professional career as a rabbi at Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun, an Orthodox synagogue in New York City.

In 1909, Kaplan returned to his seminary alma mater where he served as dean for the seminary's Teachers Institute. He was soon named professor of homiletics, Midrash, and philosophy. He would remain at JTS for the next half century, during which time he would become best known for his many extracurricular activities.

In 1912, he joined with colleague Rabbi Israel Freidlander in forming Young Israel, an Orthodox movement designed to reach out to the continuing waves of new Jewish immigrants coming into the United States from Eastern Europe and facilitate their assimilation into American life in such a way as not to destroy their Jewish life and culture. The first Young Israel congregation was founded in 1913.

In 1917, in addition to his teaching chores, Kaplan resumed his life as a synagogue leader. At the synagogue, he began the development of new approaches to Judaism that would lead him farther and farther from the Orthodoxy with which he began. He began to transform the synagogue by seeing it more as a community center than primarily a Sabbath worship center. His effort led to his being fired from his position. As a result, with his supporters, Kaplan founded a new synagogue center, the Society for the Advancement of Judaism, which went on to become one of the more important Jewish congregations in New York City. As it grew, it became a model for additional congregations around North America. It also moved Kaplan from a position within Orthodox Judaism to Conservative Judaism.

In 1934, Kaplan published his most well-known book, Judaism as a Civilization, in which he called for a "reconstruction" of Jewish life around the image of Judaism as a civilization rather than simply a religion. Subsequently, he began the journal, The Reconstructionist, to expand and elaborate upon the idea in the book. As a result, a movement—Reconstructionist Judaism—developed in the space between Conservative and Reform Judaism.

Reconstructionism was intended to facilitate the strengthening of Conservative Judaism's commitment to Jewish law, the study of Jewish literature, the ideal of Israel, while appropriating the critical study of ancient holy books and responding to the needs of life in the 20th century. Kaplan saw Judaism as an evolving (hence changing) religious civilization with its center in the community's life. His emphasis would lead to an empowering of the lay community in Reconstructionist synagogues. The formalization of the movement proceeded in stages, the first step being the organization of the Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation in 1940. The Foundation assumed responsibility for the journal, with Kaplan remaining as head of the editorial board through the 1950s.

As the Reconstructionist movement became more visible, it drew criticism, and even Kaplan's fellow faculty members began to reject the direction his thought was taking him. As early as 1941, the JTS faculty sent Kaplan a letter rejecting his views, though no steps were taken to fire him. The publication of the Sabbath Prayer Book in 1945 became crucial in his relationship with the larger orthodox community. Three leading JTS professors—Alexander Marx, Louis Ginzberg, and Saul Lieberman—wrote an open letter condemning Kaplan's new prayer book and the direction of his rabbinic career. Further, Kaplan's prayer book led the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada to excommunicate him and declare his work unacceptable. Eventually, Young Israel would condemn his approach as heretical and delete any reference to the role he played in its founding.

In spite of the criticism, Kaplan continued to write and gained a level of respect for his intellectual acumen. Among his many books are The Future of the American Jew (1948); Questions Jews Ask: Reconstructionist Answers (1956); Judaism without Supernaturalism: The Only Alternative to Orthodoxy and Secularism (1958); The Greater Judaism in the Making: A Study of the Modern Evolution of Judaism (1960); The Purpose and Meaning of Jewish Existence: A People in the Image of God (1964); and The Religion of Ethical Nationhood: Judaism's Contribution to World Peace (1970). He retired from JTS in 1963. Five years later, his son-in-law Ira Eisenstein led in the creation of the Reconstructionist College, a major step in Reconstructionism transformation from a movement within Conservative Judaism into a new Jewish denomination.

As the 21st century begins, Reconstructionism has been largely accepted in North America as a separate Jewish way beside that of Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Hasidic Judaism. Though almost all Orthodox and many Conservative Jews distanced themselves from Kaplan, many Reform and more liberal Conservative rabbis, without formally affiliating with Reconstructionism, have shown an affinity for Kaplan's worldview. The Reconstructionist movement remains small beside that of the other branches of Judaism and is largely confined to North America.

Karaites

Karaites are Jews who do not accept the authority of the Talmud—the commentary on Jewish law (the Torah)—as the authoritative interpretation of Jewish practice. The Karaites consider themselves the original Jews who follow only the Torah, from which later rabbinical Judaism has separated. A separate Karaite community could be distinguished as early as the eighth century CE in Babylonia (Iraq), where Anan ben David is said to have revitalized a lineage that had passed through a variety of earlier groups, including the community at Qumran known from the Dead Sea Scrolls. Many modern historians have questioned the association of Anan with Karaism and suggest that the first Karaites were a medieval group that appropriated the account of Anan to give themselves a longer history.

In any case, late in the ninth century the Karaite movement spread through the Jewish community then residing in the larger Islamic Empire and eventually became established in Palestine. After its Palestinian centers were destroyed by the First Christian Crusade in 1099, the leadership of the Karaite community relocated to Byzantium. After the fall of Constantinople to the Ottomans, Karaites migrated northward toward Poland and Lithuania and eastward to the Crimea. Much of the Eastern European Karaite community was destroyed during World War II.

The strongest Karaite community to survive into the mid-20th century was in Egypt, but in the late 1950s most relocated to Israel. As the 21st century begins, there are some 30,000 Karaites in Israel, with smaller communities in Egypt, France, and the San Francisco Bay Area of California. Major Israeli centers are found in Ramla and Ashdod. The American community is focused on the Karaite synagogue in Daly City, California.

Karaites reject the idea that rabbis are the main authority for interpreting the Torah. Instead, they believe that individuals are responsible for studying the Bible and for reaching the best interpretation for their situation, since in the end, it is the individual who will face judgment. This individual approach regularly introduces various interpretations into the community and ensures a level of diversity. Karaites do accept the authority of the Tenach (or Tanakh)—the Hebrew Bible (called the Old Testament by Christians)—but they reject other writings such as the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, the Christian New Testament, and the Muslim Koran. They believe in the future arrival of a Davidic Messiah (Isaiah 11:1), a human king filled with God's prophetic spirit. The Messiah will not be a divine or semidivine creature.

Over the centuries, Karaites have developed several practices that differ from those of the larger Jewish community, and their variant interpretations of Jewish law make intermarriage between Karaites and other Jews difficult. Karaites also calculate their calendar from actual observation of the new moon, and thus it varies slightly from that now common in Judaism. Karaites prohibit sexual relations on the Sabbath, whereas Orthodox Jews have seen the Sabbath as a particularly good time for sexual activity. Karaite synagogues do not have chairs, and the liturgy is very different from that in other Jewish traditions. They do not recognize the post-biblical holiday, Hanukkah.

The Karaite Jewish community is most easily contacted through their American adherents. Most recently, American Karaites have founded the Karaite Jewish University (PO Box 1971, Hedgesville, WV 25427).

Karbala

The town of Karbala in present-day Iraq, south of Baghdad, joins the nearby community of An Najaf as one of the most holy sites of Shia Muslims. The Shias form the second largest Muslim community, though the main Sunni community is almost 10 times larger in size. The Shia minority traces their origin to the squabbles over control of the emergent Islamic Empire in the decades after the Prophet Muhammad's death in 632 CE. After Muhammad, leadership of the Islamic community passed successively to the four caliphs. Following the assassination of the Caliph Uthman in 656, Ali ibn-Abi-Talib (ca. 600–661), Muhammad's son-in-law

Thousands of Iraqi Muslim Shiite pilgrims crowd around the shrine to Imam Hussein in Karbala on April 21, 2003, in a ritual known as the festival of Arbain, where the faithful came to the city to honor the first Shiite martyr, Imam Hussein (grandson of the prophet Muhammad). (AFP/Getty Images)

(the husband of Fatima) was chosen to succeed him by the powers that existed in Medina, Arabia. Ali was challenged by Mu'awiya (r. 661–680), and when Ali was assassinated in 661, most Muslims, including Ali's supporters, acknowledged him as the new caliph. Thus began the Umayyad dynasty that would rule Islam for the next century.

The year 680 became a watershed. Ali's two sons, Hasan (d. 669) and Husayn (626–680), had accepted Mu'awiya, but following Mu'awiya's death in 680, Husayn refused allegiance to his son Yazid (d. 683) as the new caliph and made plans to move to Mesopotamia (Iraq), where he believed he had strong support. However, as he journeyed to his goal, the caliph's forces blocked his progress at Karbala. When Husayn refused to surrender, he and all 86 of his companions were killed. He was seen as a martyr by his supporters, who turned the site of the deaths and the burial site of Husayn into a pilgrimage site. As the Shia Muslims emerged as a distinctive group, disagreeing with the Sunni on a variety of lesser points of belief and practice, they came to view Karbala as a most holy site. A key of divergence between the two groups is the acknowledgment that Islamic leadership properly passed to Ali and Husayn rather than the caliphs of the Umayyad dynasty.

The mosque-shrine, Masjid al-Husayn, built at his burial site, memorializes the martyrdom of Husayn, which is additionally commemorated in an annual pageant that symbolically re-enacts his death. Over the centuries, the shrine has been targeted by the Shias' enemies. It has been destroyed and rebuilt on a number of occasions. In 850, for example, Sunni ruler al-Mutawakil (r. 847–861), hoping to stop Shia pilgrimages, destroyed the shrine. Most recently, in 1801, the ultra-conservative Wahhabis, who would eventually come to dominate neighboring Saudi Arabia, targeted it. When rebuilt, the walls of the new courtyard were decorated with the entire text of the Koran. It was again damaged in the 1991 Gulf War only to be restored. During the second Gulf War, American forces made a self-conscious effort to spare it further damage.

Shia Muslims make pilgrimages to Karbala throughout the year, but two dates draw the greatest number. Ashura, the 10th day of the month of Muharram on the Muslim calendar, marks the day of Husayn's death. They also show up 40 days later, the 12th day of the month of Safar. At these times, pilgrims participate in various activities re-enacting the battle and deaths. Men will march through the street flagellating themselves and will allow cuts to be made on their heads. Press coverage often pictures young males with blood freely flowing from their various wounds. The majority, less demonstrative in their commemoration of the battle and deaths, purchase objects made from the clay of the battlefield.

Among the martyrs of 680 was Abbas, Husayn's half-brother. His tomb is located a mere 1,500 feet from Masjid al-Husayn and has become the second site most visited by pilgrims. Abbas is seen as a source of miraculous healings, and healing powers have also been ascribed to the small clay tablets that may be purchased and consumed by those seeking a restoration of health.

Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein (r. 1979–2003) operated from a power base in the Sunni-dominated areas of Iraq and, during most of his regime, forbade public celebrations at Karbala by the Shia majority in his country. Such celebrations were held for the first time in more than a quarter of a century in 2003 following his being driven from power.

Karma-Kagyupa, Tibetan Buddhism

The Karma-Kagyupa branch is one of the many sub-schools of Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism. It was founded by Düsum Khyenpa (1110–1193), a disciple of Gam-popa (1079–1153), who established several temples during his lifetime, as well as the headquarters of the Karma-Kagyupa in the monastery of Tsurphu (1185). Because of their Kagyu heritage, the Karma-Kagyupa emphasize yoga and Tantric practices. The Karma-Kagyupa path to enlightenment follows a succession of steps leading to mental quietness (Sanskrit: shamata). Preliminary practices of purification (Tibetan: ngondro) such as prostration, mandala offerings, recitation of the mantra of Vajrasattva, and guru yoga precede higher meditations and the visualization of deities (such as Tchenrezig, Tara, and Mahakala), considered to be mediums through which wisdom is expressed.

From the 12th century on, the Karma-Kagyupa order flourished in the central and eastern provinces of Tibet and later acquired political support within the imperial courts of Mongolia and China. By the 13th century the Karma-Kagyupa were competing with the Sakyapa for Mongol patronage, and during the 15th and 16th centuries they faced sporadic and localized conflicts against the Gelugpa. In the 17th century, the Dalai Lamas' dominance weakened the political power of the Karma-Kagyupa in Tibet.

The Karma-Kagyupa order claims to have pioneered the Tibetan system of voluntary reincarnation (tulku) of religious authority. Under this system, Karma-Kagyupa leadership was passed on for eight centuries in an unbroken succession of reincarnated masters, or karmapa (literally, "black hat"). A second tulku lineage was added to the first: Khaydrup Drakpa Senge (1283–1349) became the first sharmapa ("red hat"), the second highest Karma-Kagyupa spiritual leader. As a consequence, the doctrinal and hierarchical structure of the Karma-Kagyupa branch became inextricably linked to these two figures.

In 1950, Tibet was annexed by China. The 16th karmapa, Rangjung Rigpe Dorje (1924–1981), escaped from Tibet just before the open repression by China started in 1959. He established new headquarters in Rumtek, near Gangtok, Sikkim (now an Indian state), in 1966. In an effort to preserve the Karma-Kagyü tradition, he participated actively in the Western dissemination of Buddhism during the late 1960s and the 1970s.

The very first Tibetan temple in the West, Samyé Ling, was founded in Scotland in 1967 by two Karma-Kagyü lamas, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche (1939–1987) and Chuje Akong Rinpoche. In 1973, Trungpa established the Vajradhatu Organisation (now known as Shambhala International), thus initiating the creation of Western Kagyü orders. The Karma-Kagyü quickly developed into one of the largest Tibetan branches to spread and settle outside Asia. As of the late 1990s, hundreds of temples and thousands of followers were estimated to be scattered throughout the world, principally in the West. Following new routes, the old Tibetan tradition has now established new roots outside the Land of Snow.

The late karmapa died in 1981, and the recent and controversial recognition of two candidates for the succession—Trinley Thaye Dorje (b. 1983) and Urgyen Trinley Dorje (b. 1985)—is a major source of division among the Karma-Kagyüpa. Urgyen Trinley Dorje and his followers have their headquarters in Rumtek, Sikkim, India. They are represented in the Americas by the Karma Triyana Dharmachakra. Many Western Karma-oriented groups, especially the Diamond Way organization led by the Danish-born master Ole Nydahl, support Thaye Dorje. Nydahl has founded more than 590 affiliated groups in North and South America, Western Europe, and most significant, in many countries of the former Soviet Union. Thaye Dorje and his followers had their headquarters in New Delhi, but nowadays expand worldwide, and in the late 2000s, approximately 650 groups worldwide were under his guidance.

Karo Batak Protestant Church

The Karo people, one division of the larger Batak cultural group, reside in northern Sumatra. They were the last of the Batak people toward whom the Dutch Reformed missionaries directed their attention; however, in 1890 a missionary from the independent Nederlandsch Zendelinggenootschap started evangelizing in the area. He ran into immediate opposition, as the Karonese interpreted his presence as part of an effort by the Dutch to steal their lands. There were only 5,000 converts in the first half century.

During the 1930s, an effort was made to build indigenous leadership within the relatively small Karonese Christian group, and in 1941 the first Karonese pastors were ordained and the Karo Batak Protestant Church was created and granted autonomy. Almost immediately the church confronted challenges, with the beginning of the war with Japan and then the formation of Indonesia as a new nation. However, the many years of work began to reap rewards in the 1950s, when mass movements led many into the church, even as Islam also began to grow in the same region. During the last half of the 20th century more than 220,000 people joined the church. This growth is partly accounted for by a reformulation of church life, as the leadership has rid itself of attitudes hostile to Indonesian culture inherited from the Dutch missionaries.

In 2006, the Karo Batak Protestant Church reported 276,912 members. The church has a presbyterian polity, and its synod is the highest legislative body. At its inception the church adopted traditional Reformed statements of faith, but in 1979 it also adopted a new confession (revised in 1984), which its members had written. In 1987 it began to ordain women to the ministry, though female elders had been present from the beginning of the century.

During the early part of the century the church began to develop a school system and opened its first medical facilities. These have now been extended, and an orphanage, a home for seniors, and a credit bank have been added. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Kashmir Saivism

The Tantric Saivism or Shaivism of Kashmir is based on a canon of scriptures, called Agamas or Tantras, which are held to be revealed by the highest deity, Shiva (or Siva), and in which Shiva himself teaches the foundations of the Saiva religion. These scriptures were produced several centuries before the culmination of exegetical activity between the ninth and 11th centuries, when dualistic and monistic schools competed for their correct interpretation. Kashmir Saivism found its origin in one of these monistic schools.

The Kashmirian dualist school, called Saiva Siddhanta, considered Shiva, the soul, and the world as ontologically separate and ultimately real entities. According to the dualists, the soul is bound to transmigration by a beginningless defilement. The soul is therefore born into this world in order to experience its karma, remove the defilement, and thus gain liberation. In order to reach this freedom from transmigration the soul has to be initiated into the Saiva religion: the rite of initiation and the subsequent practice removes the defilement, so that the soul can be released at death.

Apart from the Siddhanta and its ritual, which centered on the worship of Sadasiva (a form of Shiva usually pictured with 5 heads and 10 arms), there existed more heterodox cults of female deities, as for instance the Trika (“trinity”), in which three goddesses (Para, Parapara, and Aparā) are worshipped, or the Krama (“sequence”), in which cycles of different manifestations of Kali are revered. Adherents of these cults upheld as valid the same canon of scriptures revealed by Shiva as did the Siddhanta, but based their views and practices on a different segment of the text. According to the cults’ philosophical system, which is named after its main text, Recognition (Pratyabhijna), there is only one reality, namely, consciousness of Shiva, from which souls and the world appear spontaneously. According to this monistic tradition, defilement is merely the soul’s ignorance of its true identity as Shiva. Once this identity is recognized, liberation occurs, even in this life.

Both the dualists and the monists had an impact in the rest of the Indian subcontinent. The southern Saiva-Siddhanta was heavily influenced and even dependent on the philosophical system their Kashmirian predecessors had developed, and the monist philosophy was integrated into other Tantric systems, most notably the Srividya. In Kashmir the monist system survived in a Gnostic form, which was termed Kashmir Saivism when its works were first published at the beginning of the 20th century.

Isolated in the Kashmir Valley, the followers of Kashmir Saivism have remained relatively few in number, a situation maintained by Muslim dominance in the region. In recent years, many Saivites have fled the war-torn valley of Kashmir and relocated to Jammu, New Delhi, and other sites throughout northern India. The Saivite philosophy attracted the attention of modern Indian charismatic gurus like Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, or Osho (1931–1990), who founded the Osho Commune International, and Swami Muktananda (SYDA). The last traditional Kashmirian guru who claimed to transmit the Kashmir Saivist system, Swami Lakshman Joo, has been the starting point of an American-based group, the Kashmir Saivism Fellowship, which may be contacted through its website.

■ Kazakhstan

The relatively new country of Kazakhstan, named as the homeland of the Kazakh people, is a large central Asian country that stretches between China’s western border and the Caspian Sea. It shares additional borders with Russia to the north and Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. It includes 1,030,815 square miles of territory. About half of its 15.3 million citizens (2008) are Kazakhs.

The area that now constitutes the modern nation of Kazakhstan was inhabited by various peoples as early as 2000 BCE. At a later date, it was overrun by Attila’s

Huns and then by the Turks. In the eighth century CE, a Turkish kingdom emerged that would create a high culture, especially in western sites along the shores of the Caspian Sea. At this time Islam was introduced. Over the following centuries, a sense of identity would slowly grow among the Kazakh peoples, tied together by their Turkish dialect and Hanafite Sunni Islam, though after the fall of the Turkish kingdom there was no uniting political entity.

Russians began to expand southward into Kazakhstan in the 18th century, and in the first half of the 19th century all of the country was annexed to Russia. The new authorities completely reorganized the ruling administration and moved to pacify still independent-minded local rulers. Russia exploited the region’s mineral wealth while using the area as a place to banish political dissidents.

Kazakhs rebelled in 1916 in reaction to an order from the tsar for universal military mobilization. The rebellion was crushed and the nation was incorporated into the Soviet Union. Kazakhstan was one of the first of the Soviet Republics to push for independence during the Gorbachev era at the end of the 1980s, and it became an independent country in 1991.

By the 1990s, there were about as many Russians as Kazakhs in the country, but the Russian population dropped significantly during the 1990s. Russians were approximately 35 percent of the population as the 21st century began. Russian Cossacks have emerged as a conservative minority, demanding that Russia take back the section of Kazakhstan that they largely control. Russia has demanded that the new Kazakh rulers treat the Russian minority fairly.

Islam came to the area in 649 with the Arab caliph Uthman ibn Affan (644–656). In the 13th century, the Mongols captured Kazakhstan, but they too converted to Islam, and in 1360 the Mongol Khan Tamburlaine (1336–1405) established the famed city of Samarkand as his capital. His army stretched the Mongol Empire to Poland and overran the Russian cities of Moscow and Kiev. Following the Russian invasion and takeover in the 19th century, Muslim Kazakhs were marginalized. In this context, the Sufi Brotherhoods emerged as the focus of a variety of independence movements. They were especially opposed to the secularization of the public schools by the Soviets. In the 1930s, Stalin instituted a harsh policy of repression that included the closing of the remaining Muslim schools, suppressing the Sufi organizations, and the further reduction of functioning mosques.

In 1943 the Russians created the Muslim Spiritual Board of Central Asia with headquarters at Tashkent, Uzbekistan. All imams had to register with the board, which controlled two seminaries for the training of religious leaders. Even as the board took more control, Kazakhstan took significant steps toward secularization, generally attributed to both the negative pressure of the long Soviet rule and the improved educational level of the general public. Today, most Muslims are content with the present government, although some younger, more conservative believers are pushing for the creation of an Islamic state.

Although most Kazakhs identify as Muslims, because of their isolation from the main centers of the Muslim world a form of popular folk Islam has established itself among the majority of religious practitioners. Their practice includes a number of activities generally denounced by more learned Muslims, including the visiting of the graves of Muslim “saints,” to curry favor, the use of verses from the Koran on amulets, and ancestor veneration.

KAZAKHSTAN

Christianity was established in Kazakhstan and a variety of sectarian religious expressions were introduced in the wake of Russian occupation and the encouragement of immigration to the region. The Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) is now second in size only to Sunni Islam as a religious community. There are three dioceses, whose bishops reside at Almaty, Shymkent, and Oral.

The first Baptist church in Kazakhstan was established in 1908 after Gavriel I. Mazaev, the brother of the president of the Russian Baptist Union, moved to Petropavl near the Russian border. Other churches were formed as settlers from different parts of the Soviet Union arrived over the next decades. Russian Baptist ranks were swelled by the arrival of displaced Germans during World War II. Unable to form separate congregations, the German-speaking believers attended the Russian Baptist churches that accommodated them with German services. They were able to grow slowly in the decades following the war and expanded greatly in the 1990s. By 1995 more than 170 congregations had come together in the Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists, the largest of the several Protestant/Free church organizations in the country.

A number of competing groups ultimately derive from the Baptist Union. One group of Baptists who are not part of the Union and who have refused to register with the government have been the subject of government actions aimed at forcing them either to register or to dissolve.

Among the several groups to find their way into Kazakhstan in the 20th century was the Seventh-day Adventist Church. The work grew slowly during the Soviet era, but the Kazakhstan Conference was organized in 1879 and by the mid-1990s there were 36 congregations. Pentecostalism also has a small presence in the country. A fair number of immigrants moved into Kazakhstan during the 20th century, including a number of Koreans. The Korean community supports both Baptist churches and Buddhist centers.

Through the 1990s to the present, minority (mostly Christian) religious groups have complained that intolerance of religious freedoms has been institutionalized in Kazakhstan through the religious registration regulations that on the one hand require registration for a group to exist but on the other make registration a difficult process. Jehovah’s Witnesses and Baptists have reported the most problems. Tensions with minority religions over issues of burial of church members, proselytization activities, and worship in unregistered facilities have kept Kazakhstan in the news.

Kedarnath

Kedarnath is a remote Hindu sacred pilgrimage site located in the Himalaya Mountains at a height of 11,760 feet. Kedarnath, the name of both a temple and the small town in which the temple is located, is one of the four Char Dham pilgrimage sites. The four sites are considered the abodes of God in the four directions of India. Kedarnath is the site in the north.

The temple is traced to prehistoric times, and even to the mythological past when the deity Shiva meditated here. In the Indian epic, the Mahabharati, the Pandav brothers, the sons of Pandu—Yudhishtir, Bhim, Arjun, Nakul, and Sahadev—were all married to the same woman, Draupadi. And as one, they fought and won a war against their cousins the Kauravas and an alienated half-brother. Despondent over the war, they visited the sage Ved Vyas (to whom authorship of the Mahabharati is generally ascribed), who advised them to meet with Shiva. Shiva could forgive them for the deaths of their kin. Shiva did not wish to forgive the brothers, and he hid from them at several places and finally at Kedarnath. The brothers eventually tracked him to his hiding place. As they approached, he turned himself into a bull and hid in plain sight among the cattle on the hillside. Still toying with the brothers, as the brothers were about to find him, he began to sink into the ground, head first. He was halfway in when one of the brothers grabbed his tail. At that moment, Shiva appeared and granted the brothers forgiveness. He also told them to worship the hind portion of the bull that remained above ground. The brothers were said to have subsequently built the first temple.

The story does not end there, and later on portions of the bull (that was Shiva in disguise) reappeared in other locations in the area—the Pashupatinath Temple at Kathmandu, Nepal, and four locations near Kedarnath. The bull's hair is at Kalpeshwar, the face at Rudranath, the chest and arms at Tungnath and the navel area at Madh Maheshwar. Kedarnath and the five other Shiva temples are the only locations where the different parts of his body rather than the lingum of Shiva is worshipped. The five locations in India are collectively referred to as the Panch Kedar (Five Kedar). A visit to all five sites is said to wash away a lifetime of sins of the pilgrim.

The temple at Kedarnath is open six months of the year, from the late spring through the fall. Snow makes the town inaccessible through the winter, and worship is transferred to a more accessible site at this time. The temple is under the care of priests of the Lingayata sect. This is a monotheistic Hindu sect that worships Shiva and identifies Shiva with the true self.

■ Kenya

Kenya is an East African country on the Indian Ocean between Tanzania and Somalia. It shares additional borders with Ethiopia, Sudan, and Uganda. Included within its 225,000 square miles are a variety of noteworthy geographical features from Lake Victoria in the southwest to the Rift Valley in northwestern Kenya where some of the oldest humanoid remains known were found. Kenya's 40 million citizens come from a variety of African people groups. In relatively modern times, it became the home of the Bantu people, divided culturally into a number of groups. Additional African peoples reside in the north and east near the country's borders with Sudan, Ethiopia, and Somalia.

Beginning in the seventh century, various groups from the Arabian Peninsula formed settlements along the eastern coast of Africa. In 975 CE, Ali bin Sultan al-Hassan, a prince from Shiraz (Iran), was driven from his country and relocated to the coast of Kenya, where he built several cities including Manisa (now Mombasa). The Arabs mixed with the Bantus and built a trading culture that eventually extended as far south as Mozambique. These cities flourished through the 16th century, when the Portuguese arrived. The Portuguese were determined to monopolize trade with India and set about occupying and destroying the cities. The Portuguese were forced out in 1698, and the coastal culture did not recover.

In the 19th century, the Masai, a group of Nilotic people, established their authority through much of the interior. Their hegemony was short lived, however, as their power was built upon their herding of domesticated cows, which were largely wiped out in a massive epidemic. At the end of the 19th century, a series of agreements among the European powers gave England hegemony in Kenya and neighboring Uganda. The British government moved to construct a railroad from Mombasa to Nairobi to Kampala, the capital of Uganda. As the railroad was constructed, Europeans moved in and settled on the land. These lands were primarily taken, without compensation, from the Kikuyu people.

In 1944 a movement was created to defend Kikuyu interests. Two important organizations were the Kenya Africa Union, headed by Jomo Kenyatta (ca. 1891–1978), and the secret group called Mau Mau, which operated as a terrorist organization attacking settlers' property and persons. Through the 1950s, a variety of repressive measures were instituted, but finally in 1960 Kenyatta's organization was recognized as the Kenya

African National Union. Kenya became an independent country in the British Commonwealth in 1963, and Kenyatta was elected president the following year. Following Kenyatta's death in 1978, Daniel arap Moi (b. 1924) succeeded him as president. Currently (2008), the country is led by President Mwai Kibaki (initially elected in 2002) and Prime Minister Raila Amolo Odinga (appointed in 2008) who represent the two largest political parties in the country.

Traditional religions remain strong in Kenya, although the number of practitioners dropped steadily through the last half of the 20th century. In the 1940s the percentage had dropped to around 60 percent, and by the 1970s an estimated 30 percent of the population was following traditional faiths. That percentage had further decreased to approximately 10 percent by the end of the century.

The first attack upon traditional religions came from Islam, which was brought by Arab settlers in the 10th century. Islam remained concentrated along the coast and the region adjacent to the border with Somalia. Sunni Islam of the Shafaiite School is strongest among the Somali people (who are almost all Muslim) and has a large following among the Digo, Boran, Pokomo, and Duruma peoples. In the years following independence, Islam suffered a loss in Kenya as Somali people moved to Somalia and as Muslims along the coast reverted to their traditional religion. However, Islam has since grown because of the migration of a number of Indians and Pakistanis. The largest group of immigrants follow the Shafaiite School, but significant numbers follow the Hanafite School and there are also many Shia Muslims. Minority groups include the Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyabi Dawoodi Bohras, Ismailis, and Ithna-Asharis. There is also a community of several thousand members of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement. In the years since World War II, the Baha'i Faith has had rapid growth both among the Bantu groups and among the Asian Indians.

Christianity was introduced into Kenya by the Portuguese, and evangelistic activity coincided with the destruction of the coastal culture. Although a mission was established and a number of converts were received into the Roman Catholic Church, the work was lost when the Portuguese were driven away. Christianity did not return until 1844, with the arrival of Johann Ludwig Krapf (1810–1881), a Church of England missionary representing the Church Missionary Society. Krapf's work was confined to the coast until the arrival of John Rehmman two years later. Backed by the British government for many years, the Anglican community would become the largest in Kenya and finally emerge as the Church of the Province of Kenya.

British Methodists, representatives of the United Methodist Free Churches (now a constituent part of the Methodist Church in the United Kingdom), came to Mombasa in 1862. They expanded their work along the Tana River and then into the area northeast of Mount Kenya. It is now known as the Methodist Church of Kenya. It would be the end of the century before other churches would discover Kenya; representatives of the Church of Scotland came in 1891, and of the Africa

Inland Mission four years later. The African Inland Mission had spectacular success. Its founder, Peter Cameron Scott, led the first missionary team, which proved a disaster, but a second effort soon after the turn of the century opened work successively among the Nzawi, Masai, and Tugen peoples. The mission became independent as the African Inland Church in 1943, by which time it had eclipsed all other churches with the exception of the Catholic and Anglican churches.

Numerous additional missions were started after the opening of western Kenya by the railroad in 1902.

The Roman Catholic Church began work in Kenya anew in 1889, with the arrival of the White Fathers. The church supported a broad program in Kenya, and the White Fathers were soon joined by priests from a variety of orders. As response was significant, more priests arrived and the Roman Catholic Church soon became the largest church in the land. By the early 1960s it claimed 20 percent of the population. The first Kenyan was ordained in 1927, and Kenya was established as a separate province in 1953. Nairobi was erected as an archepiscopal see and three additional dioceses were named. The first Kenyan bishop was consecrated in 1957. Since then, the church has continued to expand.

Two factors have dramatically changed the Christian community in Kenya. The move to create what are termed African Initiated Churches is generally seen as beginning in Kenya with the establishment of the Momiya Luo Mission by former Anglicans in 1914. It was followed by such groups as the African Church of the Holy Spirit (1927), the Kenya Foundation of the Prophets Church (1927), the National Independent Church of Africa (1929), and the Gospel Furthering Bible Church (1936). In 1962 the Roman Catholic Church experienced a significant schism when members left to found the Legion of Mary, the largest single Roman Catholic schism in Africa. More than 200 independent denominations had been formed by the 1970s, and the number has continued to grow to the present.

The second factor to shape Kenyan Christianity has been Pentecostalism, which was brought to Kenya in 1910 by representatives of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. Other North American and European Pentecostal churches began work over the course of the 20th century. The original work, now known as the Pentecostal Assemblies of God, and an African Initiated Church, the African Independent Pentecostal Church, are among the largest churches in the country. The African Independent Pentecostal Church was at one time the largest Protestant Free Church in the country, though it has now been eclipsed by the African Inland Church. Additional churches that grew out of the work of the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), the Salvation Army, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church are now home to large memberships, and the largest Friends church outside of North America is the East Africa Yearly Meeting of Friends (affiliated with the Friends United Meeting).

Kenya has been a center of ecumenism in Africa. The All Africa Conference of Churches is headquartered there. The National Council of Churches of Kenya, which unites those churches affiliated with the World Council of Churches, traces its beginning to the Alliance of Protestant Missions founded in 1918. More conservative evangelical churches are brought together in the Evangelical Fellowship of Kenya, which in turn is affiliated with the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and the World Evangelical Alliance. Several ecumenical structures serve the African Initiated Churches, including the East African Christian Alliance and the United Orthodox Independent Churches of East Africa.

With such a diverse Christian community, one would think that there would also be diversity among the other major religious communities, and such is indeed the case. For example, as early as 1886 the first Nams came to Kenya, along with Hindus and Sikhs who arrived to work on the railroad project. Although the great majority of Indians and Pakistanis returned to India after the completion of the railroad, enough stayed to create a significant community as the century progressed, and they numbered 100,000 by 1970. Members of both the Terapatha Svetambara and the Terapatha Digambara Jains are present, though the former are in the majority. A variety of Hindu groups are present, many having brought their religion from different parts of India. These older groups cooperate with the Hindu Council of Kenya. Among the newer movements, the Arya Samaj have a strong following, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness has gathered members among the indigenous population. The Sikhs have established their main center in Nairobi, but members now live in other parts of the country as well. All three groups have declined since World War II as members have either returned to India or converted to the Baha'i Faith.

Among newer Indian groups, Sahaja Yoga and the Osho International Commune have small followings.

The Theosophical Society brought the Western Esoteric tradition from its international headquarters in India, and there is also a very small group of Zoroastrians (Parsis).

Buddhism was unknown in Kenya until 1993, when a Tibetan lama came to Nairobi to form a Buddhist society. He left after giving a basic course on meditation, but the next year, Maung Soe Myint, a native Kenyan, traveled to Myanmar to study Vipassana meditation. He returned with books, tapes, and videos and shared them with the members of the Buddhist Society in Nairobi. As a result, Chanmye Sayadaw was invited to visit Kenya and other African countries, and he came in 1995. As a result of that visit, the first vihara (monastery) in Africa was constructed by the Myanmar community in South Africa. Also in the 1990s, a center of Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism has been opened, and a small Buddhist community has begun to take its place in Kenyan society.

In 1903 the British government offered the Zionist Organization land in what is now Kenya upon which to create a semiautonomous Jewish settlement. Although the organization officially turned down the offer, some individual Jews responded to it and settled in Kenya. Today the community consists of approximately 165 families who meet together for worship at the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation.

Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church

Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church is one of two Lutheran denominations in Kenya. It should not be confused with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya. The Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church has its origins in the several Lutheran missions in neighboring Tanzania begun in the 19th century by American and European missionaries. These missions led to the creation of seven separate Lutheran denominational bodies that affiliated with each other in 1938 as the Federation of Lutheran Churches. The churches of the Federation formally merged in 1963 to become the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania. Work spread to Nairobi and Mombasa, Kenya, in the mid-1960s and in 1968 a Kenya Synod was registered. Through the 1970s, Lutheranism expanded across the country and in the 1980s efforts to reorganize as an independent body resulted in the formal establishment of the Kenya Evangelical Lutheran Church. Its beginning was celebrated in 1992.

The relatively new church maintains broad ecumenical and fraternal relationships. It partners with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, with German Lutherans in Bavaria and North Elbia, and with its parent Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches. In 2005, it reported 30,000 members.

Khilafat Movement

The Khilafat movement (also known as the Caliphate movement) was a post–World War I movement that emerged among Muslims in India (1919–1924) that lobbied for the sultan of the Ottoman Empire being maintained in office as the caliph acknowledged by all Muslims, symbolically if not politically. The movement arose in the wake of the Ottoman Empire having experienced a century of decline as Europeans, primarily the Austro-Hungarian Empire, had pushed the Ottomans from the Balkans, and the independent states of Greece, Romania, Serbia, and Bulgaria had emerged. In North Africa, the empire saw the loss of Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt. The empire's fate was essentially sealed by its default on its international debt toward the end of the 19th century, but it survived for several decades as rival European powers vied for control in the Mediterranean. The Ottomans sided with the losers in World War I (1914–1918), which occasioned its final swift demise. The Ottoman Sultanate was abolished in November 1922, after which the last sultan left what became the new country of Turkey.

World War I ended with the sultan nominally still in power. In 1919, Muhammad Ali (d. 1931), his brother Shaukat Ali (d. 1938), Abul Kalam Azad (d. 1956), and Mukhtar Ahmad Ansari (d. 1936) launched an effort to mobilize the Muslim community across the Indian subcontinent, a community then divided by language, geography, and sectarianism. Though India had never been a part of the Caliphate through the centuries, the leaders advocated its preservation as the symbolic center of the Muslim world. They also wanted to keep Arab lands and especially its holy sites free of non-Muslim (especially British) control, however, when the Khilafatists sent delegations to Europe to press their demands, their representatives were, on occasion, charged with conspiracy and imprisoned by the British authorities.

The Caliphate had arisen in the wake of the Prophet Muhammad's death, the office initially held by four individuals who had been Companions of the Prophet. It was then held by a series of dynasties, but experienced a discontinuity when in 1258 the Mongol invaders captured Baghdad. The Ottoman Empire had emerged in stages at the end of the 13th century and soon incorporated all of the territory of the old Caliphate and beyond. It also claimed to be the continuing Caliphate.

This Indian pan-Islamic movement represented, in the first instance, an initial attempt to mobilize the elements of the Muslim community, using a singular moment in Muslim history, which had been brought together, despite older separating boundaries, under the single British Indian colonial administration. As World War II ended, the Muslim world faced the complete dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire, the part of it primarily falling under British colonial rule. The Indian Muslims had themselves seen the Mughal Empire, which had grown to rule much of India in the 16th century, displaced by British rule in India in the mid-19th century.

Soon after its founding, the Khilafat movement received a boost when Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948), the leader of the Indian National Congress, aligned with it as part of his strategy of noncooperation with British rule. Gandhi advocated boycotting British products, abandoning offices in the Anglo-Indian government, and passively-aggressively challenging British rule. As Hindus dominated the Congress, his alignment with the Khilafat movement had the effect of improving Muslim-Hindu cooperation across the country and spread the belief among Indian Muslims that independence was in their self-interest.

The Khilafat movement appeared to be growing for several years, but in early 1922 Gandhi suspended his noncooperation policy and the coalition between the Khilafat leaders and the Congress came to a swift end. Then, in the fall of 1923, Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881–1938) proclaimed the existence of the secular nation of Turkey and early the next year officially abolished the Caliphate.

The Indian Khilafat movement, during its brief existence, tried to stop the overwhelming move of historical forces that saw first European colonial forces and then nationalist forces within Muslim countries reorganize the old empire along historical, ethnic, and linguistic lines. It would be succeeded by a variety of groups primarily refocused upon the Indian move toward independence, the role of Islam in an independent India, and ultimately, the formation of Pakistan and Bangladesh.

Outside of India, the Caliphate revival idea was inherited by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and the many organizations it spawned.

Khyentse Foundation, The

The Khyentse Foundation was established in 2001 by Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche (b. 1961), grandson of the great Tibetan Nyingma lama Dudjom Rinpoche (1904–1987), and head of a number of monasteries both inside and outside China. The Foundation was initially intended to provide support for Dzongsar Khyentse’s monastic communities in India and Bhutan; however, its objectives soon expanded and now encompass the sponsorship of translation of Buddhist texts, the preservation of ancient manuscripts, the establishment of academic chairs in Western universities—the first being the Distinguished Professorship in Tibetan Buddhism at the University of California, Berkeley, in 2007—and the development and support of retreat environments.

Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche was trained in Buddhist studies from a very young age and is a prominent scholar of the Tibetan ris-med (non-sectarian) tradition, following the heritage of Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo (1820–1892) and other ris-med masters. He attended Sakya College in India and studied with some of the greatest contemporary masters, particularly H. H. Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and Khenpo Appey Rinpoche. He also studied at the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London in 1992, and is the author of View and Practice in Buddhism and the best-selling What Makes You Not a Buddhist (Shambhala, 2006). His Commentary on Chandrakirti’s Madhyamakavatara: Introduction to the Middle Way is studied and appreciated by Buddhist students the world over. In addition to writing, Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche is also active in film: he served as an advisor to Bernardo Bertolucci on Little Buddha and went on to write and direct two of his own films: The Cup (Palm Pictures, 1999) and Travellers & Magicians (Prayer Flag Pictures, 2003).

Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche began teaching in the West in the mid-1980s and established retreat centers in Australia (Vajradhara Gonpa at Kyogle) and

Kadam stupa in Bodhgaya, India, built by Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. (Yuliya Kryzhevskaya/Dreamstime.com)

Canada (Sea to Sky retreat center near Vancouver). He inherited the position of abbot of Dzongsar Khamje College in Sichuan, China, from his predecessor, Jamyang Chokyi Lodro (1893–1959). In the 1980s he established the Dzongsar Institute in Bir, North India, which was expanded and renamed as the Chokyi Lodro Institute at Chaundra in 2004.

The Khyentse Foundation was established in order to provide lasting structures to support the study and practice of Buddhism. It contributes to the text preservation and conservation initiatives of like-minded organizations such as the Tibetan Buddhist Resource Center (TBRC) and the Fragile Palm Leaves Foundation. Under the direction of Gene Smith, TBRC has acquired more than 15,000 volumes of Tibetan texts, the largest collection in the world. These precious texts are scanned, formatted, and archived for future distribution. Fragile Palm Leaves collects, preserves, and publishes Pali texts; translates previously untranslated Pali texts into English, Thai, and other languages; and coordinates information about the Buddhist literature of Southeast Asia, both regionally and internationally. These preservation initiatives benefit not only Buddhists, but also the world at large by making available highly developed traditions of scholarship and practice, including metaphysics, ethics, philosophy, psychology, medicine, poetry, and art.

In March 2009 the Khyentse Foundation sponsored the Translating the Words of the Buddha Conference in Bir. This attracted more than 50 translators of Tibetan texts, including 6 reincarnate lamas and famous Western scholars including Matthieu Ricard and Robert Thurman. The attendees agreed to long-term plans to translate the entire Buddhist literary heritage.

By taking a global outlook as a starting point, the Khyentse Foundation is modeling a unique approach to the promotion of Buddhism.

Kimbanguist Church

Claimed by some to be the largest church instituted in Africa with some 7 million members (actual figures are probably much lower), this church is most commonly known as the Kimbanguist Church. Simon Kimbangu (ca. 1887–1951) was born in the village of Nkamba in western Congo. On April 6, 1921, the founding date of the church, he was reported to have performed miraculous healings, the first of many reported miracles. His fame spread, and thousands flocked to Nkamba (later called Nkamba-Jerusalem) to be healed and to experience this revival for themselves. Kimbangu preached against fetishes and proclaimed trust in God, moral chastity and monogamy, love for one's enemies, and obedience to government authority.

In spite of his peaceful message, the local Belgian colonial administrator, Morel, was ordered to arrest Kimbangu and Nkamba was plundered by soldiers. Many of Kimbangu's supporters (including Baptist deacons) were imprisoned, but the prophet himself managed to escape. Less than two months after the beginning of the revival, Kimbangu was forced underground. The movement continued to grow, and in August 1921 a state of emergency in the region was declared and military occupation commenced.

Stories abounded about Kimbangu's miraculous escapes from arrest until he, following Christ's example, gave himself up voluntarily to the police in September. On October 3, 1921, after a trial before a three-man military tribunal without the opportunity to defend himself, Kimbangu was found guilty of sedition and hostility toward whites and was sentenced to 120 lashes and the death penalty. The sentence was commuted to life imprisonment after pleas for mercy were made to the Belgian king. Kimbangu was imprisoned in solitary confinement in Elisabethville (now Lubumbashi), 1,243 miles from his home. He was never released; his family was never allowed to visit him (nor was any Protestant minister). He died in prison 30 years later, on October 12, 1951.

Kimbangu's followers, forced underground, continued to increase. Kimbangu was now a national hero, and his wife, Muile Marie, became the leader of the underground Kimbanguist movement until her death in 1959. The colonial authorities, supported by European missions, persecuted Kimbanguists everywhere. They were imprisoned, exiled, and restricted; about 150,000 Kimbanguists were deported during the period 1921–1957. Deportations actually helped the movement spread across the entire Congo and become a multiethnic national movement.
