In 1955 the Kimbanguists held a demonstration in Leopoldville against their persecution, and the following year they appealed to the United Nations. They did not organize themselves into a denomination until 1956, and the Kimbanguist Church (Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu, or EJCSK) was only formally constituted in 1961. In December 1959, six months before the country's independence, the EJCSK was given official recognition. The youngest son of Kimbangu, Joseph Diangienda (1918–1993), became head of the church as legal representative, and his brother Salomon Dialungana Kiangani (1917–2001) became keeper of the holy city, Nkamba-Jerusalem. After independence in 1960, the church grew rapidly, but it failed in its attempt to unite all the disparate Kimbanguists into a single national church. In 1960 Simon Kimbangu's remains were reinterred at Nkamba-Jerusalem and a mausoleum was built in his honor, now a place of pilgrimage. The pool at Nkamba where Kimbangu used to send the sick to bathe, called Bethesda, is regarded as holy water and used in rituals all over central Africa; Kimbanguists sprinkle and drink it for healing, purification, and protection.

A multitude of 350,000 Kimbanguists held their first Communion service at Nkamba on April 6, 1971, 50 years after Kimbangu began his public ministry and, it was said, in obedience to his post-resurrection command. Two months before this occasion, Diangienda “sealed” thousands of members in the Lower Congo with a “special blessing,” the sign of the cross. The Eucharist is now celebrated three times a year by the EJCSK, at Christmas and on April 6 and October 12 (the significant dates of Kimbangu's life).

Several secessions from the EJCSK occurred during the 1960s, but President Mobutu Sese Seko's severe repression and tougher laws regarding the registration of churches discouraged these. By 1968 there were 93,600 children in EJCSK schools, and church-sponsored clinics, agricultural settlements, brickyards, and many other successful enterprises were established.

In 1969 the EJCSK was admitted to the World Council of Churches (where its membership is now in question over its unorthodox beliefs) and was declared by President Mobutu to be one of three recognized churches in the Congo, the largest after the Roman Catholic Church. Diangienda died in 1993 and his elder brother Salomon Dialungana Kiangani became head of the church until his death in 2001, when he was succeeded by his son Simon Kimbangu Kiangani.

Kimbanguist Church
PO Box 9801

Kinshasa 1
Democratic Republic of Congo

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1930. Oxford: Clarendon, 1994.
- MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983.
- Martin, Marie-Louise. Kimbangu: An African Prophet and His Church. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1975.

■ Kiribati

Kiribati is one of the more recently formed nations carved out of the scattered islands of the South Pacific. The widely scattered islands are found spread over 1,000 miles of ocean north of Tuvalu, Tokolau, the Cook Islands, and French Polynesia. The islands have a combined land area of 313 square miles and are home to an estimated 110,000 people (2008).

In the ancient past these islands were inhabited by Micronesian people, who had their initial contact with Europeans in 1764, when the British arrived. For the next two centuries the islands would be known as the Gilbert Islands. The islands were largely ignored for a century, but in 1856 they were settled by Hiram Bingham Jr. (1831–1908), from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which represented Congregationalists and Presbyterians. By the end of the decade a flourishing trade in copra and palm oil had developed. The work of the American Board expanded through the rest of the century. In 1892 the islands had been named as a British protectorate and in 1916 they became a crown colony. Following this last action, the American Board relinquished its backing of the missionary effort in favor of their British counterpart, the London Missionary Society. In 1916 the Gilbert Islands and the Ellice Islands to the south were grouped together as the Colony of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands. In 1975 the Ellice Islands were

KIRIBATI

Kiribati

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	42,700	96,500	97.0	1.81	118,000	144,000
Roman Catholics	23,900	54,900	55.2	1.78	66,000	80,000
Protestants	24,600	42,200	42.4	1.59	52,000	62,000
Marginals	90	13,300	13.4	3.19	18,000	25,000
Baha'is	1,100	2,500	2.5	1.83	4,000	5,000
Agnostics	100	550	0.6	6.24	1,000	1,500
Buddhists	0	20	0.0	1.76	30	50
Atheists	0	10	0.0	0.00	20	30
Total population	43,900	99,500	100.0	1.83	123,000	151,000

Father Cantorro, a Ponapean priest, standing in front of a destroyed church in Kiribati, 1949. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images) separated from the Gilbert Islands, and they are now known as the nation of Tuvalu.

In the meantime, Roman Catholicism was brought to the island by several Gilbertese who had converted while working in Tahiti. They began to share their faith with their neighbors on the island of Nonouti and had raised up a community of some 500 believers by 1888, when the first priests arrived. The work grew through the 20th century, and in 1966 a diocese was established at Bairiki on the main island of Tarawa. It now includes both Kiribati and Tuvalu. The Christians of Kiribati are almost evenly divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

The 19th-century Protestant work on the Gilbert and Ellice Islands led to the formation of a Protestant church serving the entire colony. Anticipating the separation of the two sets of islands, and reflecting the different ethnic backgrounds predominating in each, the church was divided into two independent churches (the Kiribati Protestant Church and the Church of Tuvalu). The Kiribati Protestant Church is the largest Protestant group in the country. It has, however, been joined by a number of other churches, including the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1947), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1955), the Elim Fellowship (1991), and the Anglican Church (part of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia). The Baha'i Faith has also enjoyed some success in Kiribati since it emerged in 1955; assemblies may be found throughout the islands.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Baha'i Faith; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of Tuvalu; Kiribati Protestant Church; London Missionary Society; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Healey, N. A Brief Introduction to the Kiribati Protestant Church. Bairiki Tarawa, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church, 1983.
- Macdonald, Barrie. Cinderellas of the Empire: Towards a History of Kiribati and Tuvalu. Canberra: Australian National University Press, 1982.
- Tlai, Sister Alaima. Kiribati: Aspects of History. Suva, Fiji: University of the South Pacific, 1979.
- Toakai, T. "A Study of the Two Denominations in Tabiteuea, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church and the Roman Catholic Church." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1980.

Kiribati Protestant Church

Protestant Christian faith was introduced to the Gilbert Islands in 1852, when Hiram Bingham Jr. (1831–1908), the son of one of the pioneer Congregationalist missionaries in Hawaii, settled on the island of Abaiang. Bingham had previously worked on Hawaii and was dispatched by the Hawaiian Missionary Society, an organization that had developed out of the Hawaiian Mission, originally established by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He was assisted by Hawaiians who had come to Christianity through the Congregational Church. Their work spread through the northern Gilbert Islands.

In 1870 the British-based London Missionary Society (LMS), which also had a Reformed/Congregationalist background, began work in the southern Gilbert Islands, assisted by workers from its Samoan mission. Following World War I, the Hawaiians withdrew and turned their work over to the LMS and its successor bodies. The church became independent in 1969 as the Kiribati Protestant Church and the British Congregationalists withdrew their support. In 1970 the Gilbert Islands became independent as the new nation of Kiribati.

The Kiribati Protestant Church has a Reformed theological perspective and a Congregational polity. It is the largest Protestant religious organization in the country, with approximately 28,000 members out of a total population of 81,000. It sponsors the Tangintebu Theological College, founded in 1900, located on Tarawa.

The church is a member of the Kiribati National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches, and it participates in the Pacific Conference of Churches. In the 1990s, after recognizing a need for assistance, the Christian Congregational Church in Canada launched efforts to support the church with literature and study materials and input on church renewal. In 2005, the church reported 130,000 members (slightly more than half the country's population) in 96 congregations.

Kiribati Protestant Church
PO Box 80
Antebuka, Tawara
Kiribati

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

References

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Healey, N. A Brief Introduction to the Kiribati Protestant Church. Bairiki Tarawa, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church, 1983.
- Toakai, T. "A Study of the Two Denominations in Tabiteuea, Kiribati: Kiribati Protestant Church and the Roman Catholic Church." B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1980.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Kôdô Kyôdan

Kôdô Kyôdan is a Japanese new religion founded by Okano Shodo (1900–1978), a Tendai Buddhist monk, along with his wife, Kimiko. They joined Reiyukai in 1934, and then in 1936 they established a branch organization in Yokohama named Kodokai, which became independent of Reiyukai in 1939 under its present name.

The main scripture of Kôdô Kyôdan is the Lotus Sutra, known as Jukueki Shobo among its members. Kôdô Kyôdan focuses on revealing the Lotus Sutra's original message in order to unite the study of the doctrine with its practice. Kodo means "the path of filial piety," which is very important in the teachings of Kôdô Kyôdan. Adherents conduct meetings for spiritual training, hold daily discussion meetings, and worship ancestors in the belief that honoring them brings protection and happiness to the family. Kôdô Kyôdan celebrates Hana Matsuri in April to commemorate the birth of Shakamuni Buddha and observes the Obon festival for the ancestors in the summer.

In 1975, three years before his death, Okano Shodo was succeeded by his son, Okano Shokan. As the 21st century began, Kôdô Kyôdan reported 327,701 members. It is a member of the Japan Buddhist Federation.

Kôdô Kyôdan
38 Torigoe, Knagawa-ku
Yokohama-shi, Kanagawa Prefecture 221-0044
Japan

Keishin Inaba

See also: Buddha, Gautama; Japan Buddhist Federation; Reiyukai.

References

- Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.
- Shodo, Okano. An Introduction to Kodo Kyodan Buddhism (in Japanese). Yokohama: Kodo Kyodan, 1967.

Kofuku no Kagaku

Kofuku no Kagaku (the Science of Human Happiness), a Japanese "new, new religion" (shin shin shukyo), was started in Tokyo in 1986 by Okawa Ryuho (b. 1956), a former employee of Tomen, a Japanese trading house. During his days as a law student at Tokyo Imperial University, Okawa began to become aware gradually, through the consciousness of Shakyamuni the Buddha, that he was the incarnation of the supreme grand spirit known as El Cantare. Although the movement's teachings have come to take on a more Buddhist tone, Okawa continues to be addressed by this title in ceremonies.

The movement experienced phenomenal growth during the first 10 years of its existence, owing in large measure to the careful organization and planning of its strategy of expansion. As students concerned with the science of human happiness, members spent the first three years studying the teachings of Master Okawa, as the founder is known, and only later was stress placed on expansion. In 1990, called Sunrise 90, the declared aim of the movement was to raise the Sun of Truth, that is, to spread the name of the movement throughout Japan. An estimated 77,000 new recruits joined the movement in that year alone. The year 1991 saw the introduction of the "miracle three-year project," the aim of which was to make Kofuku no Kagaku the largest and most influential religion in Japan and to bring about a revolution there. In 1994 a full-scale program of missionary work was launched with the aim of establishing the movement in countries outside Japan. That year the movement's first overseas offices were opened in London and New York.

Although this missionary program has had some success in Brazil, where there were some 3,000 practitioners in 2001, results elsewhere have been disappointing. As is the case in other new, new religions, Kofuku no Kagaku has made and makes use of all of the most advanced forms of mass communication to spread its teachings. It has produced several feature films, the first of which, The Terrifying Revelations of Nostradamus, was released in 1994, with Okawa himself as the executive director. The movement's publications, moreover, run into the hundreds. Hermes: The Winds of Love was released in 1997.

Controversy came with growth in Japan. Fortright and decisive, Okawa is said to have written hundreds of books, the best known of which is The Laws of the Sun (1990), which provides an elaborate account of the movement's cosmology and has assumed the status of a sacred text. The key idea of this book in relation to Okawa's own role is that he is the one who reveals to the contemporary world the “rising of the Sun of God’s Truth,” which provides human beings with essential light and energy and which is often prevented from reaching them by “dark clouds.” Other writings often used in seminars and cited by practitioners are The Laws of Gold (1991) and The Laws of Eternity (1991).

Until recently, Okawa spoke and wrote a great deal about the imminent advent of the Apocalypse and the subsequent coming of Utopia—that is, a world in which everyone can declare without any reservations that they are happy. Being happy means living with a mind and heart full of love and compassion. Thus, Utopia begins in the mind and heart of each individual, whose calling is then to transmit compassion to others.

The teachings of Kofuku no Kagaku speak of four Principles of Happiness: love, knowledge, development, and self-reflection. The practice of these principles is said to enable an individual to acquire the “right mind,” indispensable to happiness. The most important principle is love, and the essence of real love is giving, and the practice of this kind of love is the beginning of happiness.

Over time, the movement has taken on a more Buddhist character, and the leadership itself is often at pains to stress its Buddhist credentials. The focus has shifted from broad cosmological concerns to the central concerns of Buddhism, such as the three treasures, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.

The movement has built a number of meditation centers, including the Shoshin-Ken (House of the Right Mind) and the Mirai-kan (House of the Future), both at Utsunomiya, some 62 miles northeast of Tokyo in Tochigi Prefecture. Both of these centers are regarded as the Shoshin-Kan, or main temple.

Terms of membership have changed several times since the movement began in 1986, and each time they have become less demanding. Moreover, for some time now the term kaiin (member) has not been used to describe the ordinary practitioner, who is known instead as a shinja (believer). Although there are various types of believers, the term is generally applied to all those who attend seminars and read the founder’s writings, the most important of which is The Laws of the Sun (1990).

Kofuku no Kagaku
1-2-38 Higashi Gotanda
Shinagawa-ku, Tokyo 141-0022
Japan
<http://www.kofuku-no-kagaku.or.jp/en/>

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Buddha, Gautama; Meditation.

References

- Masaki Fukui. “Kofuku no Kagaku. The Institute for Research in Human Happiness (IRH).” In A Bibliography of Japanese New Religions, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 149–167. Eastbourne, England: Japan Library, 1999.
- Okawa, Ryuhu. The Laws of Eternity. Tokyo: IHR Press, 1991.
- Okawa, Ryuhu. The Laws of Gold. Tokyo: IHR Press, 1991.
- Okawa, Ryuhu. The Laws of the Sun. The Revelations of Buddha that Enlightens the New Age. Tokyo: IRH Press, 1990.
- Trevor, Astley. “The Transformation of a Recent Japanese New Religion. Okawa Ryuhu and Kofuku no Kagaku.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, nos. 3–4 (1995): 343–380.

Kokuchū-Kai

Kokuchū-kai, literally translated as “National Pillar Association,” was founded in Japan by Tanaka Chigaku (1861–1939) in 1914. Kokuchū-kai and the ideas of Tanaka Chigaku represent the nationalistic form of Nichiren Buddhism, and Tanaka and his followers tried to make the teachings of Nichiren, the founder of the Nichiren-shū of Buddhism in Japan, into the pillar of Japanese nationalism.

Tanaka Chigaku was born in 1861 at Nihonbashi in Tokyo. Tanaka was influenced by his father, who was a devoted follower of Nichiren Buddhism but critical of established Buddhist sects. After the death of his parents, Tanaka became a novice at a Nichiren Buddhist temple called Myokakuji in Tokyo. But he soon became disillusioned with the practices of traditional Buddhist temples and in 1879 renounced his priestly vows. In 1880 Tanaka started his own lay Buddhist movement, Renge-kai (Lotus Society), in Yokohama, for propogating “true” Nichiren Buddhism. In 1884 Tanaka shifted to Tokyo and renamed his organization Rissho Ankoku-kai. In 1914 he reorganized the movement, and at Miho village in Shizuoka Prefecture, where he had previously built the Saisho-kaku as an auxillary center, he established the Kokuchu-kai—its name derived from Nichiren’s words “I am the pillar of the state.” Kokuchu-kai was an amalgamation of all his followers as well as his activities, and it continues today as the principal organization devoted to Tanaka Chigaku and his work.

It was out of his conviction that the traditional Buddhist sects needed to be reformed that Tanaka launched his lay Buddhist movement with a call to “revive the way of the founder” (Nichiren). The importance that Tanaka attached to the lay practice of Buddhism is evident in his institution of a wedding ceremony according to Buddhist rites. However, Tanaka’s call for reformation was not restricted to Buddhism; through shakubuku (forced proselytization), it aimed at the reformation of the Japanese state as well as of the whole world. One of Tanaka’s major works, published in 1901, was Shumon no Ishin (Reformation of the Sect). In this monograph, he advocated the unification of Japanese Buddhism and its transformation into a great Nichiren organization that would serve as a kind of state religion.

The objective behind the founding of Kokuchu-kai as well as its predecessor organizations was to advocate Nichirenshugi, or Nichirenism. The term “Nichirenshugi,” coined by Tanaka himself in 1901, was meant to express the fusion of Nichiren’s teachings with the doctrine of Nihon Kokutai. Tanaka’s nationalistic philosophy was an interpretation of Nichiren Buddhism in the light of state-Shinto ideology and the emperor system. The publications of Kokuchu-kai, such as Myoshu, Nichirenshugi, Kokuchu Shimbun, and Tengyo Minpo, reveal Tanaka’s conception of Buddhism as being useful in the protection of the state.

In 1928 this organization built a stupa (dome-shaped shrine) memorial park in Tokyo called Myoshudaireibyō. Here the ashes of all the deceased are placed under one stupa, thus symbolically expressing the equality of humankind. After Tanaka’s death in November 1939, his eldest son Tanaka Houkoku took over the leadership of Kokuchu-kai, and, in 1949, his son Tanaka Koho became the kaicho (president/chairman) of the organization. In 1996, Tanaka Kikyū took over as the kaicho of Kokuchu-kai. In the years since the end of World War II, Kokuchu-kai has mainly been involved in publications, symposiums, and the like. In the year 2000, it had a membership of about 20,000 people in 84 branches, including an overseas branch in Brazil.

Even in the postwar period, Kokuchu-kai has maintained a nationalistic emphasis in its activities. Kokuchu-kai is at present campaigning to rename April 28, which is now observed as “Greenery Day” in Japan, as “Showa Day” because it is the birthday of Showa Emperor Hirohito. The significance of this movement lies not so much in its size or activities but in its influence on important personalities of modern Japan. Japanese poet Miyazawa Kenji and army officer Ishiwara Kanji, who planned to spread the Imperial Way throughout the world, were members of Kokuchu-kai. Ultrationalists such as Inoue Nissho, Meiji period intellectuals such as Takayama Chogyū, and a major scholar of Japanese religion, Anezaki Masaharu (1873–1949), were also greatly influenced by Tanaka’s teachings of Nichirenshugi.

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

See also: Nichiren; Nichirenshu.

References

- Kokuchukai Hyakunen-shi*. Editorial supervision by Tanaka Koho. Tokyo: Kokuchukai, 1984.
- Lee, Edwin B. “Nichiren and Nationalism: The Religious Patriotism of Tanaka Chigaku.” Monumenta Nipponica 30 (Spring 1975): 19–35.
- Otani Eiichi. Kindai Nihon no Nichirenshugi undo. Kyoto: Hozokan, 2001.
- Tanaka Koho. Tanaka Chigaku. Tokyo: Shinsekaisha, 1977.

Konkokyo

Konkokyo, Religion of Golden Light, was founded in 1859 by Kawate Bunjiro (1814–1883), a peasant farmer from Okayama prefecture who had received numerous divine messages from the malevolent golden kami Konjin, whom he had at one time offended. Kawate believed not only that from 1859 he had become possessed by Konjin, whom he referred to as the Golden Principle Parent, or Kami, of the Universe (Tenche Kane no Kami) and the Great Kami of Golden Light (Konko Daijin), but that he himself had actually become this same deity who had previously commanded him to leave farming and dedicate his life to the practice and teaching of toritsugi meditation.

Under the Meiji rulers who assumed power in 1868, Konkokyo aligned itself with state-sponsored Shinto, a decision it later reversed.

Konkokyo's principal sacred text is Tenchi Kakitsuke (Divine Reminder). Its primary focus of worship is Tenchi Kane No Kami, and its main teaching concerns the reciprocal relationship between this Principle Parent or God and humanity, which gives fulfillment to both. Suffering results from the fact that human beings ignore this fundamental principle. The Principal Parent is the original source of all living beings and things, and so every individual life is linked to this source. The purpose of toritsugi meditation is to connect individuals with the Principal Parent and with all the kami. Konkokyo mediators have the power to convey messages from the kami to individuals. The converse is also the case. This is not strictly a Shinto practice, nor is the belief in Tenchi Kane No Kami a Shinto belief.

The movement celebrates several major and minor festivals throughout the year including the New Year, Spring and Autumn Festivals, the Church Foundation Festival, and the Founder's Birthday Festival.

Konkokyo's headquarters remain in Okayama, where it was founded, although it also has an international center in Tokyo. As in other Japanese religions, among them Tenrikyo, the spiritual leader, or kyoshu, is chosen from the founder's descendants. Administratively, Konkokyo is divided into districts under kyo-kan, or district heads, who are chosen from the leaders of the churches in the districts. The membership in Japan is around 400,000. By comparison, the membership overseas is small, totaling only around 2,000 for Canada, South Korea, the United States, Brazil, and Paraguay together.

Konkokyo Main Headquarters
Otani 320, Konko-cho, Asakuchi-gun
Okayama-ken 719-0111
Japan

Konkokyo International Center (for non-Japanese-speaking inquirers)
2-17-11 Hongo, Bunkyo-ku
Tokyo 113-0033
Japan
<http://www.konkokyo.or.jp/eng/> (multilingual)

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Meditation; Shinto.

References

- Hardacre, Helen. "Creating State Shinto: The Great Promulgation Campaign and the New Religions." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 12, no. 4 (1986): 29–64.
- McFarland, H. Neil. The Rush Hour of the Gods: A Study of New Religious Movements in Japan. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Shimazono, Susumu. "The Living Kami Idea in the New Religions of Japan." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, no. 3 (1979): 389–412.
- Voice of the Universe: Selected Teachings of Konkokyo*. Okayama-ken: Konkokyo Honbu, 1996.

■ Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea)

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK; North Korea) occupies the northern half of the Korean Peninsula. It includes 46,540 square miles of territory with a population of 23.5 million citizens. The country shares a history with the Republic of Korea (South Korea) through World War II and the end of the Japanese invasion and occupation of the Korean Peninsula. At the war's end, Soviet troops moved into the northern half of the country and stopped at the 38th parallel, where they awaited the arrival of the U.S. forces moving in from the south. The United Nations called for an election and the establishment of an independent government, but the two superpowers could not agree on procedures. The south went ahead with elections, and Syngman Rhee (1875–1965) assumed the presidency. In the north, the Provisional People's Committee proclaimed the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and Kim Il Sung (1912–1994) emerged as prime minister. The Soviet Union withdrew its forces in December 1948.

The Pohjon Temple was founded in 1024 and is the most important Buddhist sanctuary in North Korea. (Thomas Gutschker/dpa/Corbis)

The two Koreas were unable to resolve their different visions for the future of the country, and war broke out in 1950. An armistice was arranged in 1953. No permanent peace treaty has been signed, and the border between the two countries is still regarded as something of a battle line.

Kim Il Sung and the Korean Workers' Party led the country in the decades after the war. In the 1990s, he began preparing the way for his son Kim Jong Il

(b. 1942) to succeed him. In 1992, Kim Il Sung was named the Grandfather of the Nation and his son the Father of the Nation. Kim Jong Il was also named the president of the People's Assembly (the legislature) and secretary general of the Korean Workers' Party. He succeeded his father in 1994.

From its inception, the government of North Korea has been officially Marxist and atheist. However, by the end of World War II a wide variety of Protestant groups had opened missions throughout the northern part of Korea, including the Presbyterians, the Anglicans, the Methodists, the Baptists, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Even the Swedenborgian movement had given birth to some 40 congregations. The Roman Catholic Church had a diocese at Pyongyang.

NORTH KOREA

In 1946 the government initiated the suppression of religious organizations and arrested many religious leaders. Then the government organized the Ki Dok Kyo Kyo Do Yen Mange, or Christian League, to facilitate church support for the new government. In 1950 the Methodists and Presbyterians were forced to combine their seminaries. Through the 1950s, as it became obvious that the Christian League was being eschewed by the great majority of believers, a full-scale repression of Christianity began. At the height of the Korean War, the United States occupied much of North Korea. When U.S. forces withdrew, some 2 million people fled south. Priests and other church workers either fled the country, moved to the south, or were arrested.

Korea (Democratic Peoples Republic of, North)

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Agnostics	6,466,000	13,377,000	55.7	0.59	13,736,000	11,969,000
Atheists	2,253,000	3,742,000	15.6	0.58	3,800,000	3,600,000
New religionists	1,800,000	3,094,000	12.9	0.58	3,250,000	3,176,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,298,000	2,935,000	12.2	0.58	2,600,000	2,400,000
Christians	142,000	484,000	2.0	0.28	1,415,000	3,027,000
Independents	8,000	425,000	1.8	0.30	900,000	2,000,000
Roman Catholics	15,000	40,000	0.2	0.00	300,000	600,000
Protestants	118,000	13,500	0.1	0.27	200,000	400,000
Buddhists	288,000	365,000	1.5	0.58	390,000	420,000
Chinese folk	0	15,400	0.1	0.58	32,000	64,000
Muslims	0	3,100	0.0	0.58	5,000	10,000
Total population	14,247,000	24,015,000	100.0	0.58	25,228,000	24,666,000

Harsh repression has continued and information about religious practice in North Korea remains difficult to obtain. The Constitution of North Korea provides for both freedom of religious belief and the right to use buildings for religious purposes. However, genuine religious freedom does not exist. In practice the government discourages all organized religious activity except that which serves the interests of the state. The Constitution also stipulates that “no one can use religion as a means to drag in foreign powers” or to disrupt the social order. Thus, religious belief is considered an affront to government authority, and religion is often seen as subversive in its attempts to build extra-government relations with foreign organizations. The government uses the cause of protecting the “social order” as a rationale for sporadic suppressive activity.

Nonetheless, there are continuing reports that Christian churches, Buddhist temples, and a few centers of Chondogyo have survived. Since 1988 the government has allowed and informally sponsored several religious organizations in Pyongyang. Leaders of these organizations, including two Protestant churches and a Catholic church, have some limited contact with non-Korean religious officials and organizations, especially those engaged in supplying relief aid within the country. Protestants are represented through the Korean Christian Federation, which in 1983 published an edition of the Bible and a new hymnbook. Representatives of the World Council of Churches made their first visit to North Korea in 1985, and representatives for the Korean Christian Federation visited Switzerland for a meeting in 1986. Since that time contact has continued to occur periodically. In 1997 four members of the Federation participated in a gathering of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. This was the first time Korean representatives had attended the meeting, even though the majority of Korean Christians are of Presbyterian heritage.

The Korean Christian Federation reports that there were some 10,000 Protestant Christians in North Korea as of the mid-1990s. (There were an estimated 120,000 in 1950.) There are only 25 active ministers. Reportedly, there is a Protestant seminary that is allowed to accept six to nine new students every three years. At the same time, continual reports of the arrest and execution of practicing Christians filter out of the country to the rest of the world.

Chondogyo (the Religion of the Heavenly Way) emerged in Korea in the 19th century as a popular new religion. At latest report, the government-sponsored Chondogyo Young Friends Party exists as a sanctioned vehicle for this religion, which is still popular among the people.

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom is but one watchdog agency that cites North Korea as a country which, though formally acknowledging the ideal of religious freedom, severely suppresses all religion. It currently (2008) summarizes its findings thusly: “Religious freedom is essentially absent in North Korea, where the government severely represses public and private religious activities and enforces a policy of actively discriminating against religious believers. The Commission has received reports that DPRK officials have arrested, imprisoned, tortured, and sometimes executed North Korean citizens who were found to have ties with overseas Christian evangelical groups operating across the border in China, as well as those who engaged in unauthorized religious activities such as public religious expression and persuasion.” The U.S. Department of State estimates North Korea to have 10,000 Protestants, 10,000 Buddhists, and 4,000 Catholics.

Korean Christian Federation
c/o Central Committee of the KCF
Konguk-Dong, Man Gyung Dae District
Pyongyang
Democratic People’s Republic of Korea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chondogyo; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Swedenborgian Movement; World Council of Churches.

References

- Belke, Thomas J. Juche: A Christian Study of North Korea’s State Religion. Batesville, OK: Living Sacrifice Book Co., 1999.
- Buswell, Robert E., Jr., ed. Religions of Korea in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- Clark, A. D. A History of the Church in Korea. Seoul: Christian Literature Society of Korea, 1971.
- Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Kim, Duk-Whang. A History of Religions in Korea. Seoul: Daeji Moonhwa-sa, 1988.
- “U.S. Department of State Annual Report on International Religious Freedom for 2008: Democratic People’s Republic of Korea.” Released by the Bureau for Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor. Washington, DC, 2008. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108410.htm>.

■ Korea, Republic of (South Korea)

The Republic of Korea (South Korea) occupies the southern half of the Korean peninsula, with some 46,540 square miles of land. It has a population of 48.4 million people (2008).

The Korean Peninsula has been inhabited since Paleolithic times. As China emerged, it viewed the Koreans as a constant nuisance and in the second century BCE attempted to establish hegemony over the peninsula. The Chinese threat appears to have been a catalyst for the formation of the three Korean kingdoms—Koguryo, Silla, and Paekche—that for many centuries controlled the Korean Peninsula. The warrior-like Koguryo people, with their capital at Pyongyang, reigned in the north from the first century BCE through the sixth century BCE. Then in the seventh century, Korea was united by the Silla Kingdom, which pushed a remnant of the Koguryo people farther north into Manchuria, where they established the Kingdom of Parhae. The period of the unified Silla Kingdom (668–935) was one of great prosperity that helped define Korea as a nation.

In the 10th century, Shilla authority disintegrated and eventually gave way to a rebellion from the north. In 935 the Shilla Kingdom was replaced by the Koryo Kingdom, which would last into the medieval era. It finally fell into a decadent state in the 14th century, thus preparing the way for the 1388 takeover by General Yi Song-gye (1335–1408). Yi invaded the capital and began a thorough reform of the nobility, the army, and the system of land distribution. In 1392 he declared himself king and began the new Choson Kingdom. Underlying Yi’s reforms was a shift of royal favor from Buddhism to Confucianism. Yi also built the new capital known today as Seoul.

In 1573 Japan was unified under a strong monarch, Toyotomi Hideyoshi (1537–1598). He invaded Korea in 1592 and quickly overran Seoul and headed north. Even as his army occupied the peninsula, China counterattacked and Korea’s outstanding navy cut the Japanese supply lines. The Japanese were finally forced to retreat in 1593, but the conflict left Korea a devastated land. Korea remained independent, but its glory had passed. In the 19th century, Korea also faced the invasion of the West. In the middle of the century isolationist policies came to dominance, only to be reversed as Japan again became a threat. Korea was constantly having to balance the alternating claims of Japan and China, and as the century ended, a new threat appeared in the form of Russia.

The Russian threat became the excuse for Japan to invade and form a protectorate over Korea. That protectorate, which would last through World War II, would be remembered for its brutality. The atrocities committed continue to sour Japanese-Korean relations. After World War II, Korea was affected by secret agreements between the superpowers, by which the United States and the Soviet Union occupied the former Japanese territory. Their inability to reach an agreement on what they termed “the Korean problem” led to the Korean War and the division of the land into the two nations, the Republic of Korea in the south and the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea in the north.

In 1947 the United Nations called for a nationwide election and the establishment of an independent government. The election was held in the south in 1948, and a new government was installed. The South Korean government had the support of the United States. The Soviet Union withdrew its troops from the north, but the United States remained in the south. The United States had the support of the United Nations, whereas the Soviet Union was temporarily boycotting the Security Council. Thus, when the North Koreans attacked in 1950, the United States came to the aid of South Korea. The bitter war was fought to a draw in 1953. A cease fire was arranged, but no permanent peace treaty was ever signed.

In the years since the war, South Korea has gone through a series of governments, including the dictatorship of Park Chung Hee (1917–1979), which began in 1961. Under Park, South Korea emerged as an Asian economic giant. He was assassinated in 1979. The country continues to struggle with creating a democratic government and solving the problem of unifying the Korean Peninsula.

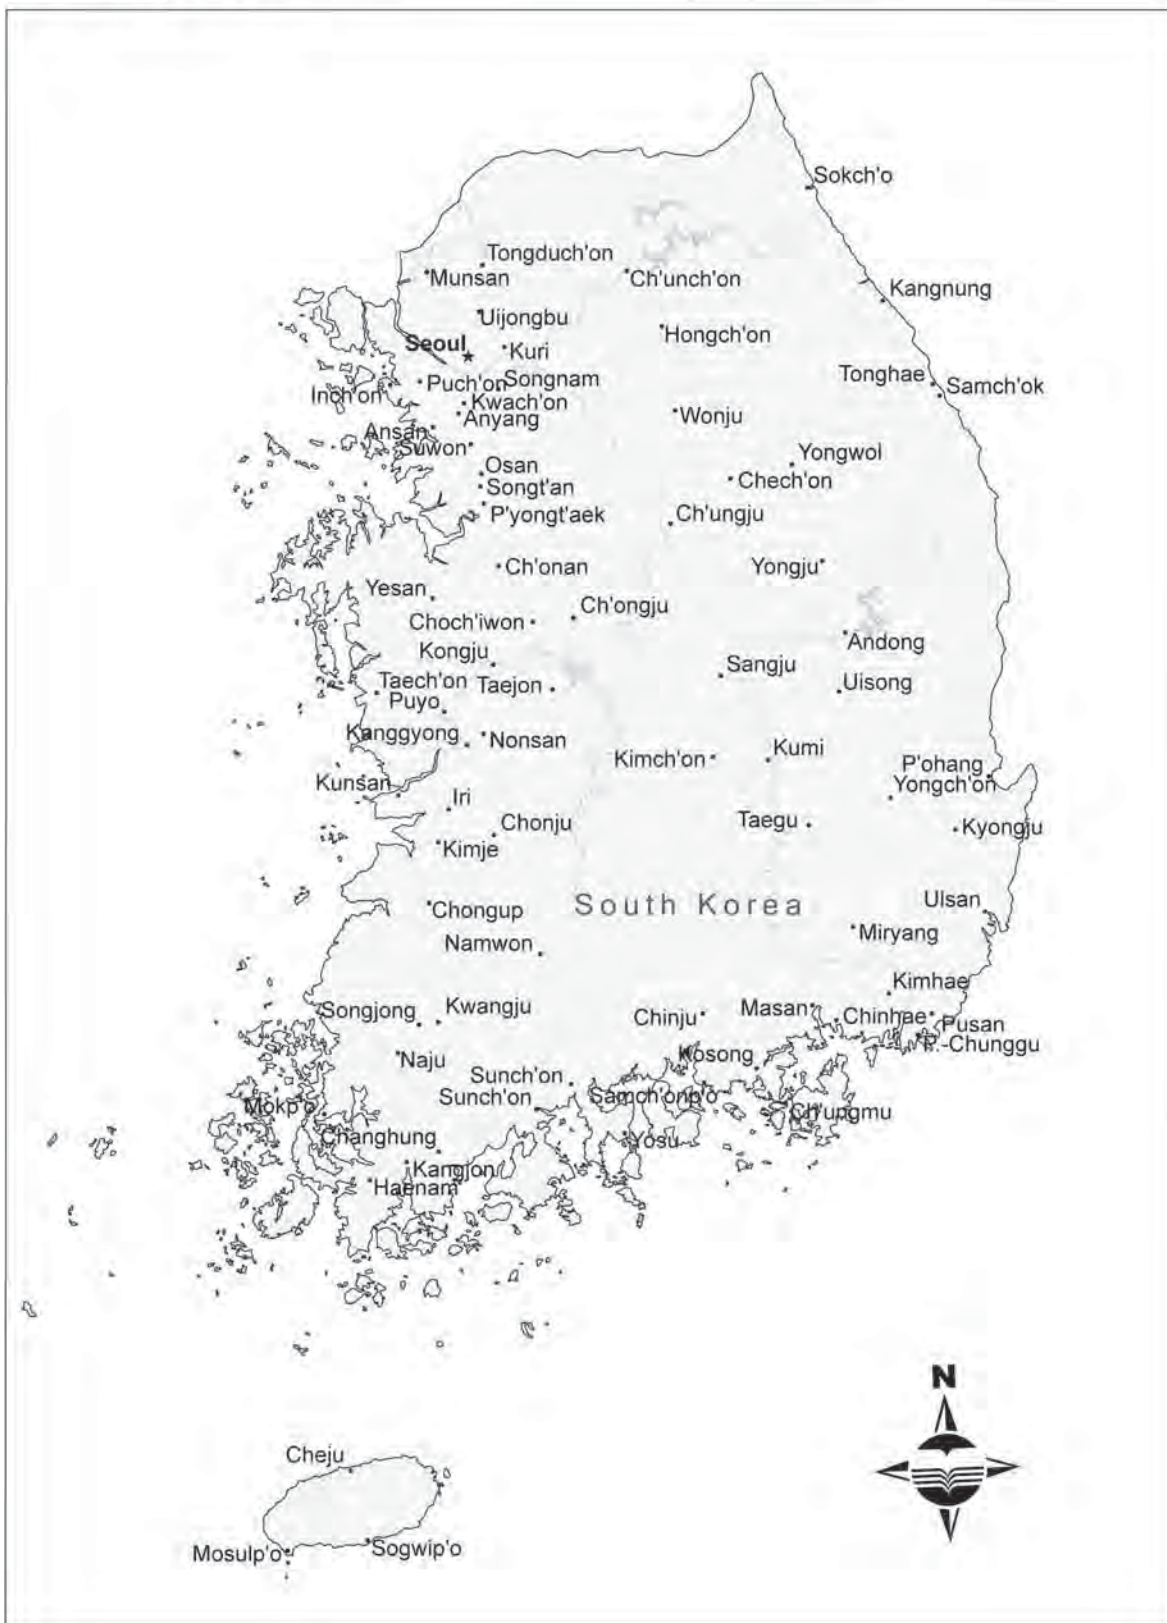

While South Korea has moved toward democracy, it has allowed a relatively high degree of religious freedom, and the variant religious strains that have been introduced over the years have been allowed to persist and grow. Ancient Korean religion was a mystical faith built around a belief that material objects and the forces of nature possess spiritual entities. Included in this vast spirit world are the souls of ancestors. Intercourse with the spirits is carried out by the mudang, or shaman. Shamans remain popular religious figures who specialize in communication with the spirit world through ceremonies known as kuts, a colorful ritual performance that may take several days to complete. During this ceremony the shaman will become possessed of a spirit. Many who seek the services of the shamans otherwise identify themselves as Buddhists or Christians.

Buddhism entered Korea in the fourth century BCE from China, initially taking hold in the Koguryo Kingdom during the reign of Sosurim (371–381). At about the same time, in the 380s, an Indian missionary priest named Marananda introduced Buddhism in the Paekche Kingdom. The new faith enjoyed royal patronage and quickly gained a foothold. However, it was not until the sixth century that it was able to gain a following in the Shilla Kingdom, after the royal family accepted it in 527. By the 10th century and the emergence of the Koryo Kingdom, thousands of Buddhist temples dotted the Korean landscape.

The decline of the Koryo Kingdom was intimately connected with corruption among the leadership of Korean Buddhism. When General Yi took over in 1388, he banished Buddhism from his capital and disestablished it across the land. Without the government’s support, the Buddhists suffered doubly from the Japanese invasion in 1592, as many temples were lost and never rebuilt. Buddhism experienced a revival in the 20th century and became somewhat identified with the struggle for independence from the Japanese, who were attempting to impose Shintoism. After the end of Japanese rule and the Korean War, a significant revival occurred with the Chogyo Order, whose headquarters were established in Seoul during the Japanese occupation. Embracing emphases of both Zen and Pure Land Buddhism, this inclusivist Order now includes the majority of Korean Buddhists. However, other schools such as the relatively new Won Buddhism also have a measurable following. This developing community emphasizes the rejection of marriage by monks, a practice introduced by the Japanese.

SOUTH KOREA

Traditional Confucian ceremony in South Korea. (Korea Tourism Organization)

When Buddhism was disestablished by General Yi, it was replaced with the teachings of Confucius (551–479 BCE). Confucius had developed a philosophical-moral system that focused upon building ideal relationships in the family, the community, and the nation. Not really a religion, Confucianism nonetheless took on a ritual and religious cast. Even as Buddhism rose to power, Confucian thought provided the philosophical context for Korean society. Confucianism permeated the government and educational system and inspired General Yi's reforms. It also emphasized respect for one's ancestors and demanded that individuals refrain from any activity that might reflect badly upon their ancestry.

Centers of Confucian learning, such as the Confucian University in Seoul, maintain the teachings of the honored teacher and perform ceremonies that honor Korea's Confucian scholars. Associated with the university are numerous sowon, or study halls, which perpetuate Confucian ideals.

Christianity entered the country in the person of Father Gregorio de Cespedes, a Jesuit priest who accompanied the Japanese invasion force in 1592. As the chaplain to a Japanese general who had become a Christian, Cespedes made no impact on the Korean people. Two hundred years later, another Jesuit, Peter Grammont, began secretly working in Korea and converting the first Christians. Though initially outlawed, the Christian community has had a continuous presence since that time.

It would not be until 1836 that a permanent resident missionary, Pierre Maubant, began to gather the scattered Christian flock. Though Christianity was still outlawed and was subject to waves of official persecution, it spread through the country. In 1866 nine priests were arrested and beheaded. That same year, a Welsh Protestant missionary was killed along with 24 others aboard an American ship that ran aground near Pyongyang.

The Roman Catholic Church grew very slowly through the 19th and early 20th centuries, when it was largely overwhelmed by the Protestant movement. The first Catholic diocese was established in Taegu in 1911. There are now two archdioceses, Taegu and Seoul, and a number of dioceses. The church entered a growth phase after the Korean War and baptized more than half a million adults through the 1960s.

It would not be until the Amity Treaty between the United States and Korea was signed in 1882 that Christianity's outlaw status was lifted and Protestant missionaries were freely admitted to the country. The first to arrive was Horace N. Allen (1858–1922) of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). A physician, Allen saved the life of the nephew of the Korean queen, an act that radically improved the image of Christianity throughout the upper echelons of Korean society. He was followed in 1884 by the first ordained minister to come to Korea, Horace G. Underwood (1859–1916). Canadian and Australian Presbyterians also established missions, and in 1893 they came together to form the Council for Mission of the Presbyterian Churches, which evolved into the Presbyterian Church of Korea in 1907. Presbyterians were to enjoy great success in Korea, and today the majority of Protestant Christians belong to one of the many Presbyterian denominations that have been formed, though the majority are in one of the two larger groups, the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap) or the Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong).

Robert F. Maclay (1824–1907), the Methodist superintendent in Japan, also visited Korea in 1884, during which time he received permission to open schools and hospitals. The first Methodist missionaries, representing the Methodist Episcopal Church, arrived in 1885. Dr. William B. Scranton (1856–1922) opened a medical center, and two other members of the party, Ella J. D. Appenzeller, the wife of Henry G. Appenzeller (1858–1902), and Mary F. Scranton, opened the first school for girls. Missionaries from the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, arrived in the 1890s. In 1930, anticipating the 1939 union of the two Methodist churches (both now constituent parts of the United Methodist Church), the Korean missions merged to form the Korean Methodist Church.

The Anglicans were first represented in Korea by Bishop C. John Corfe of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, who settled in Seoul in 1890. The Anglican work had a growth phase through the 1930s and claimed some 10,000 members when World War II began. It lost half its members in the division of the country, but it recovered and has continued to grow into the 21st century. The church became independent in 1993 as the Anglican Church of Korea.

Baptists entered the country after the prominent Clarendon Baptist Church in Boston, Massachusetts, formed the Ella Thing Memorial Mission, which sponsored work in Korea beginning in 1895. That work was turned over to a Canadian, Malcolm C. Fenwick (1863–1935), who in 1905 organized the Baptists into the Church of Christ in Korea. This work grew and expanded into China, Manchuria, and Siberia. After World War II, the group made contact with the Southern Baptist Convention. It subsequently emerged as the Korean Baptist Convention and has enjoyed spectacular growth.

Pentecostalism appears to have entered the country in 1944 in the form of the True Jesus Church, a Oneness Pentecostal group founded in China. A host of American Pentecostal groups arrived in the 1960s, including the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, and the United Pentecostal Church International. Pentecostalism took root quickly in Korea, and indigenous leadership appeared within a few years. The Yoido Full Gospel Church on Yoido Island in Seoul, founded in 1958 by Paul/David Yonghi Cho, has (b. 1936) become a denomination in itself. It is the largest Pentecostal congregation in the world, and its sanctuary was the site of the Pentecostal World Conference in 1973.

Since the end of the Korean War, numerous American denominations and evangelical missionary organizations have opened work in Korea, while tens of thousands of Koreans have come to the United States and created a host of new ethnic denominations. The more liberal Protestant churches are members of the National Council of Churches in Korea (founded in 1919 as the Federal Council of Churches and Missions),

Korea, Republic of (South)

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,750,000	20,150,000	41.4	0.65	20,652,000	18,397,000
Protestants	2,145,000	9,996,000	20.5	3.46	10,100,000	9,000,000
Independents	1,965,000	6,600,000	13.6	1.35	7,400,000	7,200,000
Roman Catholics	838,000	4,900,000	10.1	1.91	5,600,000	4,900,000
Ethnoreligionists	12,583,000	7,600,000	15.6	0.46	7,300,000	5,800,000
Buddhists	5,319,000	7,325,000	15.0	0.20	7,208,000	6,090,000
New religionists	3,380,000	7,390,000	15.2	0.46	7,420,000	6,400,000
Confucianists	4,758,000	5,250,000	10.8	0.11	5,250,000	4,400,000
Agnostics	100,000	730,000	1.5	0.46	900,000	900,000
Muslims	3,000	75,000	0.2	0.46	90,000	100,000
Atheists	5,000	50,000	0.1	0.46	70,000	90,000
Chinese folk	10,000	35,000	0.1	0.46	45,000	45,000
Baha'is	14,000	35,000	0.1	0.46	40,000	50,000
Shintoists	0	30,000	0.1	0.46	40,000	50,000
Hindus	0	2,200	0.0	0.46	2,500	3,000
Sikhs	0	1,200	0.0	0.46	1,800	2,000
Total population	31,922,000	48,673,000	100.0	0.46	49,019,000	42,327,000

affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Evangelical groups are united in the National Association of Evangelicals, affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. Several churches are aligned with the fundamentalist International Council of Christian Churches, including the Korean Presbyterian Church (HoHun).

Korea is also home to a wide variety of new religious movements. In the middle of the 19th century, amid a variety of new religious movements that began to emerge, one stood out. Tanghak, or so-called Eastern learning, arose in opposition to Christianity, or Western learning. Founder Ch'oe Che-u (1824–1864) saw his movement as a synthesis of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Daoism. However, his philosophy also became the basis of a political challenge to the central government. In 1864 the government forces defeated the main Tonghak army and executed Ch'oe Che-u, but his movement did not die. Instead, it reemerged as a purely religious movement called Chondogyo, which claimed several million followers at the time of the division of the country. It remains a potent force in Korean religion.

In more recent years, the U.S.-style religious freedom in South Korea has allowed the emergence of hundreds of new religions, which draw variously on the different older religious traditions that have been available in Korea through the centuries and also from neighboring China. Thus one finds new religions that draw concepts from shamanism, Christianity, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Prominent among the new religions is the Unification movement (Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity), which has been exported from Korea to over 150 other countries. In the West it became the focus of the anti-cult movement of the 1970s. Other notable groups that are now having an impact beyond the land of their birth include JeungSanDo and the DahnHak movement founded by Seung-Heun Lee. The latter group draws heavily on Chinese qigong exercises.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of Korea; Confucius; DahnHak; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Council of Christian Churches; JeungSanDo; Korean Methodist Church; Pentecostal World Fellowship; Presbyterian Church (USA); Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong); Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap); Pure Land Buddhism; Southern Baptist Convention; True Jesus Church; Unification Movement; United Methodist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Yoido Full Gospel Church; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Buswell, Robert E., Jr., Religions of Korea in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2006.
- Chongsuh, Kim, ed. Reader in Korean Religion. Songnam: The Academy of Korean Studies, 1993.
- Clark, A. D. A History of the Church in Korea. Seoul: Christian Literature Society of Korea, 1971.
- Clark, D. N. Christianity in Modern Korea. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986.
- Focus on Korea*. 3 vols. Seoul: Seoul International Publishing House, 1988.
- Grayson, James H. Korea: A Religious History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Hogarth, Hyun-key Kim. Syncretism of Buddhism and Shamanism in Korea. Seoul: Jimoondang International, 2002.
- Kim, Duk-Whang. A History of Religions in Korea. Seoul: Daeji Moonhwa-sa, 1988.
- Palmer, S. J., ed. The New Religions of Korea. Transactions of the Korea Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, vol. 43. Seoul: Royal Asiatic Society, 1967.
- Yum Chai-Shin. Korea and Christianity. Berkeley, CA: Asia Humanities Press, 2002.

Korean American Presbyterian Church

The Korean American Presbyterian Church is the largest of the several Presbyterian denominations to arise in the Korean American community. Since the end of the Korean War, thousands of Koreans have migrated to the United States, many of whom are members of the spectrum of Presbyterian bodies that exist in their homeland. They began to form congregations and presbyteries, often continuing ties to one of the denominations in Korea. In 1978 five presbyteries (California, the Midwest, New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada) of the more conservative churches united to form the Korean American Presbyterian Church. The meeting was held on the campus of Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the school sponsored by the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

The Korean American Presbyterian Church continues the tradition of the more conservative Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong), though the American church is administratively autonomous. After its establishment it moved immediately to found a seminary and to contact the many as yet unaffiliated Korean congregations known to exist in the United States and Latin America. The church adopted the Westminster Confession and catechism as its standards of faith.

By the mid-1990s the church reported 33,000 members in 19 presbyteries—including the Presbytery of Central South America, which united churches in Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, and Chile. Member churches were also found in Canada and in several European countries. The church is a member of the National Association of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, which includes the Presbyterian Church in America, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, and several other conservative churches of the Reformed tradition.

The Korean American Presbyterian Church should not be confused with the Korean Presbyterian Church in America, created by congregations and ministers formerly affiliated with the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap). Founded in 1976, the Korean Presbyterian Church in America is almost as big as its more conservative sister church, and it is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, cooperates with the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) on various programs, and is active in liberal Protestant ecumenism.

Korean American Presbyterian Church

125 S. Vermont Ave.
Los Angeles, CA 90004
<http://www.kapc.org/>

Korean Presbyterian Church in America

17200 Clark Ave.
Bellflower, CA 90706

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Orthodox Presbyterian Church; Presbyterian Church (USA); Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong); Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap).

Reference

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of

Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Korean Buddhism

Although Korea is often depicted as one of the most Confucian or Christian societies in modern East Asia, Buddhism has deep roots and a rich cultural heritage in this Northeast Asian country. Despite the unparalleled success of Christianity during the 20th century and the emergence of a Communist government in the north that persecutes religion, at the beginning of the 21st century, South Korea ranks as the 6th most Buddhist nation in the world by population figures and North Korea the 10th. Buddhists account for about half of the present population of South Korea, or 24,654,419 monks, nuns, and lay adherents, who belong to more than 50 different Buddhist sectarian organizations. Sixty percent of North Korea's population, or 13,747,306 people, are Buddhist.

Three Kingdoms Buddhism (ca. late fourth century–668 CE) According to Korean historical sources, Buddhism was transmitted from Chinese states to kingdoms on the Korean peninsula during the late fourth century. Although individual monks were active in these states perhaps as early as the early fourth century, the official introduction of Buddhism is presumed to have occurred in 372 CE when Fu Jian (r. 357–384), king of the Former Qin dynasty (351–394) in north China dispatched the monk-envoy Shundao (Korean: Sundo) to the northern state of Koguryo (37 BCE–668 CE) with scriptures and images. Because a few of the Chinese Northern dynasties, such as the Former Qin and Northern Wei (386–534), controlled vast empires stretching to Buddhist centers in eastern Turkestan, Chinese culture was brought into close contact with Indian, Persian, and Hellenistic civilizations. The Chinese interaction with Indian and Central Asian Mahayana Buddhism from the fourth through the eighth centuries engendered a new Sinitic form of Buddhism that spread to Korea. This Buddhism was characterized by a close relationship between the church and the state, worship of Maitreya, the future buddha, and the study of scriptures and treatises of the Mahayana tradition.

In 384 the Serindian monk Maranant'a (Malanda; Kumaranandin) is said to have come to the southwestern state of Paekche (18 BCE–660 CE) view from the southern Chinese state of Eastern Jin (317–420). He was received well by the Paekche court, a monastery was prepared for him, and Native men ordained as monks. As a result of maritime relations, Paekche eventually disseminated Buddhism to the Yamato court in early Japan in the mid-sixth century (either 552 or 538). The Paekche court dispatched doctrinal specialists, artisans, and architects to Japan and helped lay the foundation for the rich Buddhist culture of the Asuka and Nara periods.

The southeastern state of Silla (57 BCE–935 CE) was the last to embrace Buddhism and consolidate power following Chinese bureaucratic models. In 535, six years after the martyrdom of the Buddhist adherent Ich'adon, the first monastery was commissioned by Silla king Pophung (r. 514–540). The Silla royalty utilized Buddhist symbolism to legitimize their rule, attempt to create and project autocratic power, and protect the state. Social institutions such as the hwarang (flower boy) organization instituted by Silla king Chinhung (r. 540–575) drew upon Maitreya symbolism as well as native religious elements.

Unified Silla Buddhism (668–935) Buddhism flourished to an even greater extent after the Silla Kingdom conquered the kingdoms of Paekche and Koguryo in 668. During this period, the major intellectual and practice traditions of the religion that had developed in China were introduced to Korea. Scholars suggest that doctrinal teachings that had been imported during the Three Kingdoms period coalesced into five scholastic traditions: the Kyeyulchong, focused on the study and training in monastic discipline; the Yolbanjong, which promoted the teachings of the Mahaparinirvana Sutra; the Popsongjong, a uniquely Korean school that emphasized an ecumenical outlook toward Buddhist doctrine; the Popsangjong, focused on the “consciousness-only” teachings of Yogacara; and the Wonyungjong, the Korean branch of the Flower Garland (Chinese: Huayan; Korean: Hwaom) tradition. The writings of important scholiasts, such as Wonhyo (617–686) and Uisang

Buddhist monk at the Haeinsa Temple in South Korea, which holds the Tripitaka Koreana, a set of Buddhist Scriptures carved onto 81,258 wooden printing blocks. (Courtesy of the Korea Tourism Organization)

(625–702), played an important role in developing Huayan thought in East Asia; and others, such as Wonch'uk (613–686), who was a close disciple of the famous Chinese pilgrim Xuanzang (d. 664), developed Sinitic Yogacara, and his writings exerted a profound influence on early Tibetan Buddhism.

Despite the importance of intellectual traditions, the cults of Maitreya; Avalokitesvara, the bodhisattva of compassion; Amitabha, the buddha of the Pure Land in the West; and Bhaisajyaguru, the Medicine Buddha; not only constituted a significant aspect of monastic practice but were actively promoted by monks and nuns, including the most intellectual exegetes. Devotional piety and patronage dominated lay expressions of worship among the royalty and nobility and influenced the patterns of piety among the populace. The Flower Garland tradition was most successful in synthesizing devotional practice with doctrine and developed a comprehensive system that made Buddhist beliefs intelligible to an increasing number of Koreans.

The introduction of Chan (Zen) Buddhist teachings, Son in Korean, one of the most important developments in Korean religious history, happened during the Unified Silla period. The monk Pomnang (fl. 632–646), who is believed to have trained with the fourth patriarch of the Chan school, Daoxin (580–646), appears to have attempted to synthesize the teachings of two early Chinese Chan lineages with the seminal doctrine of tathagatagarbha (womb of buddhahood) as described in the Dasheng qixin lun (Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana). One of Pomnang's successors eventually founded the Huiyansan School, the oldest of Korea's Son traditions. During the eighth and ninth centuries many other Korean adepts in meditation founded other mountain traditions. These traditions are referred to as the Nine Mountain schools of Son (Kusan Sonmun). Most of these lineages claimed descent from the Hongzhou School of the middle Chan period that eventually developed into the Linji School of the mature Chan tradition. The most prominent Korean Son monk was Kim Heshang (ca. 694–762), who was held as a patriarch in the Baotang School that flourished in the Sichuan region and who was the first Chan master known to the Tibetans.

Koryo Buddhism (918–1392) The Buddhist church enjoyed royal patronage to an unprecedented extent during the Koryo period. The state developed bureaucratic organs to administer the religion and the court and nobility sponsored many kinds of rituals regularly throughout the entire dynastic period to draw upon the power of the buddhas for symbolic legitimacy, protection, and wealth. Doctrinal schools (Kyo), Son sects, and ritual traditions increased to 13 during the Koryo period.

Reconciliation between the doctrinal schools and Son is the principal contribution of Koryo period Buddhists in the evolution of the Korean Buddhist tradition. The royal monk Uich'on (1055–1101) made a first attempt by seeking to combine the Son schools with significant doctrinal orientation in a revived Ch'ont'ae (Chinese: Tiantai) School. Although his attempt failed, the efforts of the charismatic Son proponent Chinul (1158–1210) have proved to be enduring. Instead of emphasizing scholasticism, Chinul synthesized a variety of Son and Kyo approaches to soteriological practice. The most enduring of these practices was the meditative investigation of the “critical phrase” (hwadu; Chinese: huaou), or kongan (Japanese: koan) practice, as it had been developed in China by Dahui Zonggao (1089–1163). Chinul's synthesis of Son and the teachings came to be regarded as a distinctively Korean school of Son called the Chogyejong. He and his disciples enjoyed patronage by the Koryo court and came to dominate the Buddhist church in the late Koryo period. Later, during the period of Mongol domination on the peninsula, the Son master T'aego Pou (1301–1392) labored to effect the merger between the remaining schools of Korean Son and the Chogyejong by introducing official transmission in the Chinese Linji (Korean: Imje; Japanese Rinzai) lineage. His efforts ensured that the Chogyejong would remain the dominant school of Korean Buddhism until the present.

Buddhism under the Choson (1392–1910) and the Modern Era Because the Choson court ultimately adopted Confucianism as its preferred ideology in the early 15th century, the Buddhist church came under increased scrutiny and the centralized supervision of the government. Schools and sects were forcibly combined and ultimately reduced to two traditions, Son and Kyo. Sosan Hyujong's (1520–1604) influential Son'ga kwigam (Guide to the Son school) exemplifies the practice orientation of the Son tradition during this difficult period for the religion in Korea.

Japanese influence in Korea in the late 19th century provided new opportunities and new pressures on the Korean Buddhist tradition. Japanese Nichiren sect missionaries forced the weak Choson court to lift a centuries-old ban on the presence of monks in the capital of Seoul. At the same time, Kyongho (1857–1912) revitalized Son practice in Korea and successors to his lineage continue to teach today. Some Buddhists were in favor of adopting policies followed in Japan as a means of strengthening the social position of Buddhism. Han Yongun (1879–1944) who studied in Japan, advocated that monks be allowed to marry if Buddhism were to play a practical role in modern society. Although the Korean Buddhist leaders were against the adoption of such a policy, the Japanese colonial government ultimately adopted it in 1926 by legalizing matrimony for monks. Most monks were married within 10 years, but after independence in 1945, Korean Buddhism was split between the T'aegojong, a liberal sect of married monks that had flourished under colonial rule, and the Chogyejong, a smaller faction of monks who maintained the practice of monastic celibacy. In 1954, after years of legal conflict, the Chogyejong won government support for its position of maintaining Korean traditions and was awarded possession of the 25 major monastic complexes and their subtemples on the Korean peninsula. Now in the early 21st century, the Chogyejong is the most dominant sect of Korean Buddhism and is attracting a new generation of lay believers and monastic postulants.

Richard D. McBride II

See also: Chinul; Chogye Order; Nichirenshu; T'aego Pou; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Buswell, Robert E., Jr. "The Emergence of a 'Korean' Buddhism." In Korean Buddhism in East Asian Perspectives, compiled by the Geumgang Center for Buddhist Studies, Geumgang University, 23–44. Seoul: Jimoondang, 2007.
- McBride, Richard D., II. Domesticating the Dharma: Buddhist Cults and the Hwaom Synthesis in Silla Korea. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2008.
- Sørensen, Henrik H. "Buddhist Spirituality in Pre-modern and Modern Korea." In Buddhist Spirituality II: Later China, Korea, Japan and the Modern World, edited by Takeuchi Yoshinori, World Spirituality: An Encyclopedia History of the Religious Quest, no. 9, 109–133. New York: Crossroad Publishing Company, 1999.
- Vermeersch, Sem. The Power of the Buddhas: The Politics of Buddhism During the Koryŏ Dynasty (918–1392). Cambridge: Harvard University Asia Center, 2008.

Korean Christian Church in Japan

One source of Christianity in Japan has been Korea, where a vital Presbyterian mission operated through the last half of the 19th century. In 1909 the Presbyterian Church of Korea sent a minister, Han Sok-Po, to Tokyo to work primarily among Korean students at the university. This work continued during the years of Japanese occupation of Korea, beginning in 1910. The continued growth of the church in Korea allowed it to send additional evangelists. Over the next two decades congregations sprang up across the country, where many Korean expatriates resided.

The Japanese Presbyterian mission was forced into the United Church of Christ in Japan during World War II, but it separated from that organization soon after the war ended and continued as the Korean Christian Church in Japan. Organized according to a presbyterian church order, the church's congregations are divided into five regions, headed by a general assembly. The church accepts the Westminster Confession as its doctrinal standard.

In the later 1990s the Korean Christian Church in Japan reported 7,100 members in 100 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Korean Christian Church in Japan
Japan Christian Center, Room 52
2-2-18 Nishi Waseda
Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 191
Japan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Church of Christ in Japan; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Korean Methodist Church

In 1884, Robert F. Maclay (1824–1907), the superintendent of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) in Japan, traveled to Korea and while there received permission to open schools and hospitals in the country. The following year the first missionaries arrived in the persons of the Reverend Harry G. Appenzeller (1858–1902) and his wife, Ella J. D. Appenzeller, and Dr. William B. Scranton (1856–1922) and his wife Mary F. Scranton and his mother. Their efforts launched modern, Western-style education on the Korean Peninsula. They were joined a decade later by C. F. Reid and Josephine P. Campbell, both representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). During the first decade of the new century, their work bore massive fruit, with a membership jumping from around 2,000 to more than 13,000 people. The MEC mission organized an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism) in 1908, and the MECS mission did so in 1918.

Through the first decades of the 20th century, the MEC and MECS pursued talks aimed at a merger, but Korean Methodists grew impatient. In 1928 and 1930, respectively, the conferences petitioned their respective general conferences for independence so that they could form one independent church in Korea. That permission was granted, and by the end of 1930 a new constitution had been written and the new Korean Methodist Church was organized. The new church also wrote a new creed for use in its teaching work that was translated and widely circulated through the U.S. churches, which finally merged in 1939. Though the Korean church was independent, it maintained close fraternal ties with its sister church in the United States.

The church was totally disrupted by World War II. The Japanese occupying forces isolated missionaries and made contact with overseas offices impossible. The Russians sealed the border between the northern and southern parts of the country, and Methodism lost half of its churches and many of its members. It had just reorganized when the Korean War began in 1950. However, in the decades immediately after the war and with the establishment of the cease-fire that kept Korea divided for the rest of the 20th century, the Korean Methodist Church enjoyed a growth period. Its membership doubled during the 1950s and again in the 1960s. The growth continued through the rest of the century, and by 2005 the church reported more than 1.5 million members worshipping in 5,489 churches. The church has also become a missionary body, sending evangelists to more than 54 countries, many working in close cooperation with the United Methodist Church and other Methodist bodies. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and was a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

Korean Methodist Church
KPO Box 285
Methodist Building 16F
64-B Taepyungro1-ga
Jung-gu, Seoul 110-101
Republic of Korea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church, World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Kim, Jinhung. A Pictorial History of the Methodist Church in Korea. Seoul: Archives of the Korean Methodist Church, 1995.
- Park, I. G. The History of Protestant Missions in Korea, 1832–1910. Seoul: Yonsei University Press, 1970.
- Stokes, Charles D. “History of the Methodist Missions in Korea, 1885–1930.” Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1947.
- Yu, Chai-Shin. Korea and Christianity. Fremont, CA: Asian Humanities Press, 2004.

■ Kosovo

One of the newest countries on the world stage, Kosovo has existed since 1974 as an autonomous province of first Yugoslavia and more recently of Serbia. Beginning in the 1980s, Kosovoans, primarily of an Albanian ethnicity, began to call for complete independence. That call for independence increased through the 1990s and into the new century. It resulted in the declaration of autonomy in 2008.

Kosovo had been incorporated into Serbia in the 13th century. Toward the end of the next century, following the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, Serbia, including Kosovo, was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire. Over the next centuries, Turks and Albanians, both predominantly Muslims, moved into Kosovo and by the 19th century Serbians had become a minority segment of the population. The Ottoman Empire lost control of Serbia and Kosovo in 1912 and by the end of the decade no longer existed. Serbia existed in multiple national alignments through World War II when

The Old Stone Bridge, the 17th-century Sinan Pasha Mosque, and Saint Savior Orthodox Church in Prizren, Kosovo. (iStockPhoto)

KOSOVO

in 1946 it was incorporated into the Federal Peoples Republic of Yugoslavia, the Socialist state headed by the dictator Marshal Tito (1892–1980). Yugoslavia disintegrated in 1991. In its last stages, it revoked the autonomous status for Kosovo

In 1991, as Yugoslavia fell apart, Albanian leaders in Kosovo held a referendum that favored independence. Serbia, then under strongman Slobodan Milosevic (1941–2006), responded with repressive force. Armed intervention led to additional and more violent repressive measures that included displacement of ethnic Albanians and several massacres. Toward the end of the decade, NATO forces initiated a bombing campaign against the Serbian forces and forced their withdrawal. Deliberations as to Kosovo's future under United Nations hegemony began and continued for a number of

Kosovo

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,020,000	1,874,000	89.9	1.02	1,900,000	1,841,000
Christians	133,000	178,000	8.6	1.08	166,000	161,000
Orthodox	86,000	100,000	4.8	0.81	90,000	85,000
Roman Catholics	40,000	68,000	3.3	1.61	63,000	59,000
Protestants	1,000	2,800	0.1	0.00	4,000	5,000
Agnostics	50,000	25,000	1.2	0.79	20,000	18,000
Atheists	10,000	6,500	0.3	0.19	4,000	3,000
Total population	1,213,000	2,084,000	100.0	1.02	2,091,000	2,023,000

years without a resolution to the situation. Milosevic was forced from office and in 2001 arrested and placed on trial for war crimes relative to the massacres in Kosovo. He died before his trial was concluded.

After negotiations in 2007 on the status of Kosovo failed to resolve the issue, the Kosovo Assembly declared independence on February 17, 2008. Over the next year, approximately 50 countries recognized the new country. Among the countries that have refused to recognize it is Serbia, which is pursuing several options in international law to have the province's independent status rejected.

Sunni Islam of the Hanafi School became the dominant religion in Kosovo through the 18th and 19th centuries. There is a small Sufi community, primarily of the Bektashi Order. Muslims are primarily found among those of the Turkish and Albanian ethnicity. The second largest group is the Serbian Orthodox Church. Eastern Orthodoxy had established itself in the 13th century and spread to every part of the country. Though the majority party for many centuries, it gradually moved to second place as ethnic Serbs reverted to minority status. Its churches and monasteries are still to be found in all parts of the new nation.

There is also a Roman Catholic minority, primarily of ethnic Albanians, in Kosovo. The church has enjoyed a spurt of growth in the post-Serbian era and now constitutes about 4 percent of the population (about 60,000 members). Catholics have welcomed the end of Serbian rule as, like the Muslims, they were often the targets of Serbian repression. The leader of the church is Bishop Marko Sopi. In 2000, the Vatican designated Kosovo an apostolic administration and named Sopi as the apostolic administrator. Prior to that action, Kosovo's Roman Catholics had been part of the diocese of Skopje, based in neighboring Macedonia.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bektashi Order (Bektashiye); Hanafite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Serbian Orthodox Church.

References

- Duijzings, Ger. Religion and the Politics of Identity in Kosovo. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- Judah, Tim. Kosovo: What Everyone Needs to Know. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Weller, Marc. Contested Statehood: Kosovo's Struggle for Independence. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009.

Koya, Mount

Mount Koya, the center of Shingon Buddhism in Japan, is both the name of a set of mountains located in Wakayama Prefecture (near Osaka) and the specific area on those mountains where a temple complex has been located. Much of the wooded area surrounding the temples has been appropriated as a vast cemetery. The particular site selected by Kukai was a mountain valley located amid eight peaks of the mountains. The valley offered the appearance of being in the middle of a lotus blossom. Over the years a town has emerged in the valley that is now home to a Buddhist university and some 120 temples.

In 816, Kukai (aka Kobo Daishi, 774–835), the founder of Shingon, resided in Kyoto. Wishing to escape the general chaos of city life and separate from the control of the established centers of the older Buddhist schools in Kyoto and nearby Nara, he requested a grant of land where he could construct a rural center for Shingon monks to concentrate on meditation and practice esotericism. When the emperor Saga (809–823) granted the mountain to him, Kukai moved quickly to construct a temple and associated buildings of his new monastic community. Unfortunately, due to his duties in Kyoto, he was himself unable to move to the new center until 832, but once there he would remain on Mount Koya for the rest of his life. He was eventually buried there, his tomb, Okuno-in, being one of the mountain's most sacred spots.

In the years after Kukai's death, a rivalry developed between the Shingon center in Kyoto (To-ji) and Mount Koya. To-ji had been granted to Kukai in 823 and it was the primary place for training students. Mount Koya became the site of their final examination and, most important, their ordination. The number of ordained priests was rigidly regulated by the state, and the privilege of examining and ordaining the monks purveyed considerable power. The power struggle between the two centers caused the emperor to intervene on several occasions. In 853, he ruled that the candidates for ordination would be examined at To-ji, while they were to be ordained at Mount Koya. In 862, he gave Mount Koya full jurisdiction over all Shingon ordinations. Finally, in 902, the emperor increased the number of ordinations, allowed an ordination platform to be erected at To-ji, and assigned a portion of the Shingon ordination to the Kyoto center.

Mount Koya took on more significance through the 10th century as Kukai increasingly became an object of veneration. The emperor contributed to the growing cult of Kukai by giving him the posthumous honorary title of "Kobo Daishi" (Great Teacher). Many Shingon followers now affirmed their belief that Kukai was not dead but at the end of his life had entered a deep trance state from which he now awaited the appearance of the coming Maitreya, the future Buddha. Some went so far as to elevate Kobo Daishi into an emanation or incarnation of Maitreya, which made Mount Koya part of Maitreya's heavenly realm.

The faithful erected a large stupa over Kukai's tomb, which took on added significance in 1107 when the emperor Horikawa (r. 1086–1107) was buried in front of it. Mount Koya immediately became a pilgrimage site of increasing importance as well as a very popular place to be buried.

Kukai had taught that women could not attain Buddhahood (not an unpopular opinion within the Buddhist community in the ninth century), and he did not allow women to come to Mount Koya or participate in any of its activities. Several centuries later, however, Bifukumon'in, one of the emperor's consorts, asked to be buried on Mount Koya. In 1160, her request was granted. She was an exception, and the only exception until 1872, when the anti-female policy was abandoned.

Today, To-ji is considered the administrative center of the main Shingon Buddhist sect in Japan. Mount Koya is the center for monastic practice and the main focus of pilgrimages.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Meditation; Nara; Pilgrimage; Shingon Buddhism.

Reference

- Izutsu, Shinryu, and Shoryu Omori. Sacred Treasures of Mt. Koya: The Art of Japanese Shingon Buddhism. Honolulu: Koyasan Reihokan Museum, 2002.
- Kasahara, Kazou, ed. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 2001.
- Koyasan Reihokan Museum. Sacred Treasures of Mount Koya: The Art of Japanese Shingon Buddhism. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2002.
- Nicoloff, Philip L. Sacred Koyasan: A Pilgrimage to the Mountain Temple of Saint Kobo Daishi and the Great Sun Buddha. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2007.
- Saunders, E. Dale, Buddhism in Japan. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1964.

Krishnamurti Foundations

Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986) was a philosopher whose exploration of religion, psychology, and politics, as well as philosophy, addresses the great questions of human existence. His talks and publications, spanning six decades, influenced world leaders in politics, eminent scientists, and the general public, and continue to inspire many who seek a fresh understanding of the human condition. Born in 1895 in Madanapalle, near Madras in colonial India, Krishnamurti (literally, “the image of Krishna”) grew up in an orthodox Brahmin family steeped in tradition, ritual, and a sacred view of the world. After the death of his mother when he was only 10 years old, he moved with his father and siblings to the headquarters in Madras of the Theosophical Society, a rapidly growing spiritual movement.

The Theosophical Society, founded in 1875 in New York City, began as an organization dedicated to a synthesis of science, religion, and philosophy with the credo “There is no religion higher than truth.” Part of Theosophical teaching is the exploration of clairvoyant powers for discovering the hidden mysteries of nature and the esoteric powers of humanity. The Theosophists drew freely from their understanding of Western Esotericism and of Eastern thought, particularly Buddhist and Hindu cosmologies, to form a worldview that included a complex cosmology, an esoteric psychology, and an evolutionary scheme that encompassed eons. The synthesis of East and West, religion and science, and esoteric and exoteric understanding made Theosophy compelling to cosmopolitan, liberal people, regardless of nationality, who had been disappointed by the beliefs and practice of both religion and science and sought to unite the diverse peoples of the world in a peaceful brotherhood. It was to this milieu that the young Krishnamurti was exposed.

Drawing upon many religious traditions and prophecies, some leaders in the Theosophical Society at the time of Krishnamurti’s youth were actively looking for a messiah, a World Teacher, who would destroy evil and restore righteousness. In his early teen years, Krishnamurti was adopted by the Theosophists as the World Teacher and appointed head of the Order of the Star in the East, an organization devoted to realizing the World Teacher’s mission. For a number of years Krishnamurti traveled and addressed audiences in this role, maturing in his understanding of the Order, the Theosophical Society, and his role in each.

Over many months in 1922–1923, Krishnamurti experienced a profound transformation. Begun as meditation, Krishnamurti’s transformation, called “the process,” contained moments of great beauty and clarity offset by periods of physical pain, even agony. He often fell unconscious and appeared to converse with non-physical entities and to speak from several personas. Krishnamurti’s report of his transformation of consciousness is consistent with other reports of mystical non-dualism—his personality dissolved into communion with the whole of life. In his words, “I was in everything, or rather everything was in me, inanimate and animate, the mountain, the work and all breathing things.” Themes of his later teaching are found in his description of his transformation: “I have seen the Light. I have touched compassion which heals all sorrow and suffering; it is not for myself, but for the world.”

From this time on, he experienced a growing dissatisfaction with the authority structure of the Theosophical Society and its emphasis on occultism. At the death of his brother, which the occultism of the Theosophical Society did not foresee, his dissatisfaction became overwhelming and he defined his stance relative to Theosophy as one of revolt. In his talks, dialogues, and writings, he began to stress the benefit of doubt and questioning, a direction antithetical to the Theosophical structure of that day. Rejecting all forms of spiritual authority, he disbanded the Order of the Star in the East in 1929, declaring, “Truth is a pathless land.”

From then until his death in 1986, Krishnamurti ceaselessly taught his insights to a worldwide audience. He became a champion of freedom and inquiry and a relentless advocate of the discovery of truth without the aid of any organization, religion, or belief system. His teaching emphasized the necessity of developing awareness of one’s conditioning and bondage to thought, fear, and time. His goal was to make humans “unconditionally free” and, to this end, he invited

Jiddu Krishnamurti lectures to a crowd of people in Pennsylvania in 1932. Krishnamurti was an Indian philosopher who believed that God must be experienced directly in order to be known. (Corbis) those who listened to him to observe their inner selves, their motives and ways of thought, as well as events in the outside world. With each audience, Krishnamurti inquired into the basic nature of humanity and found that real self-transformation involves an instantaneous awareness of the psyche and its workings. Accompanied by simplicity and humility, this awareness could, he maintained, open a person to the “immensity” of life. Transformation is seen as “freedom from the known,” escape from the conditioning, beliefs, and emotions inculcated since infancy. The “known,” he says, includes time, sorrow, and bondage. To be free one must die to the “known” in order to meet truth, which is limitless, unconditioned, and unapproachable by any path whatsoever.

To Krishnamurti, living in thought ties one to the past. Freedom requires movement beyond the past, beyond myth, tradition, and the products of thought. Knowledge, time, and thought are not a means to change, but are the psychological sources of sorrow, pain, and anxiety, because they are the mechanisms for bringing the past into the present. The unknown, the truth, cannot be grasped by thought, but must be apprehended in the immediate present. This apprehension or seeing is the force of change. No one can see for another, so external authority is of no use. Knowledge and time must be left behind, as must psychological dependence upon anyone. Krishnamurti quoted Shakyamuni Buddha often when he instructed, “Be a light unto yourselves.”

Constantly warning of the dangers inherent in nationalism, political ideology, and religious belief, Krishnamurti maintained that the ending of human conflict can occur only with the cessation of misapplied thinking and its propensity for image-making of an inevitably harmful kind. Given the planetary interdependence of our times, each of us needs to see that, psychologically, “I am the world,” and that to understand one’s own consciousness is to understand human consciousness.

During his lifetime Krishnamurti created schools for children and young adults in India, the United States, England, and Switzerland. These alternative schools continue today in their mission to provide a new definition and practice of education, free from the conditioning and authority structures prevalent in modern educational institutions.

In his later years, Krishnamurti joined with the physicist David Bohm in exploring the human condition through a series of dialogues. Both men recognized the limitations of traditional didactic teaching and sought ways in which truth and insight can be discovered within individuals and small groups. All the Krishnamurti Foundations regularly hold dialogues that stress listening and exploring together in a relaxed, friendly environment, so that serious issues of common concern can emerge naturally—without didactic formalism or dogmatism. Krishnamurti and Bohm also predicted that the neuronal structure of the human brain could change fundamentally as the result of insight and inquiry.

Krishnamurti helped to establish Foundations in those countries where his teachings received the most response and which he visited regularly. The Foundations facilitated his travel, arranged for his public appearances, and published transcripts of his talks and dialogues. A large corpus of Krishnamurti’s original writings and talks as well as his dialogues with Bohm have been made available in book and video form by the Krishnamurti Foundations in England (founded 1968), the United States (1969), and India (1971). These Foundations and the Krishnamurti committees in other countries sponsor regular dialogue groups and hold gatherings for study of the teachings. Consistent with the tenets of his thought, the Foundations have remained relatively non-institutionalized. A current directory reports that Krishnamurti organizations and schools are now found in 40 countries around the world.

Krishnamurti Foundation America
PO Box 1560

Ojai, California 93024-1560
www.kfa.org,

Krishnamurti Foundation Trust
Brockwood Park
Bramdean, Hampshire
SO24 0LQ
United Kingdom
www.kfoundation.org

Constance A. Jones

See also: Krishnamurti Foundations.

References

- Holroyd, Stuart. The Quest of the Quiet Mind: The Philosophy of Krishnamurti. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Aquarian Press, 1980.
- Jayakar, Pupul. Krishnamurti: A Biography. New York: Penguin, 1986.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu. Commentaries on Living, from the Notebooks of J. Krishnamurti. Ed. by D. Rajagopal. 3 vols. Wheaton, IL: Theosophical Publishing House, 1960.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu. Freedom from the Known. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu. The Book of Life. Madras: Krishnamurti Foundation India, 1975.
- Krishnamurti, Jiddu, and David Bohm. The Ending of Time. San Francisco: Harper, 1985.
- Lutyens, Mary. Krishnamurti: The Years of Awakening. Krishnamurti: The Years of Fulfillment. Krishnamurti: The Open Door. 3 vols. New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1973–1985.

Ksitigarbha's/Jizo's Birthday

Ksitigarbha (also known as Bodhisattva Earth Repository or Earth Womb, or in Japanese as Jizo), was a bodhisattva who had a special mission directed at saving those suffering in the various hell realms of Buddhist cosmology. As Jizo, he is especially revered in Japan for saving the souls of deceased children, including those who were lost due to abortion. He is known as an especially compassionate being, at times rivaling Guan Yin in that capacity.

Ksitigarbha is commonly represented seated or standing, with a pilgrim's staff in his right hand and a pearl in his left. He wears a monk's robe with his head shaved. His famous vow was, "I therefore vow never to become a Buddha before all the prisoners are released from the hell."

Ksitigarbha is most associated with Mount Jiuhua, in Anhui Province, one of the four sacred mountains of Chinese Buddhism. His main temple there is Hua Cheng Temple, which was founded in 401 CE, though the story that most ties him to the mountain dates from the eighth century. In 719, during the Tang dynasty (618–907), the Korean Prince Kim Gio Gak (d. 793) of what was then the Kingdom of Silla, took up residence at a hermitage on Mount Jiuhua. A charismatic soul, he gained a following that grew over the three-quarters of a century he remained on the mountain. By this time, people had come to believe him to be an emanation of Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva. And in the centuries afterward, they generalized their belief to thinking of the mountain as his domain. Beginning in the Song dynasty (960–1279) the number of temples began to multiply. More than 75 of the older temples remain in place.

The Huacheng Temple, the oldest of the temples of Mount Jiuhua, is believed to have been built as a residence for Kim Gio Gak. In 781, it was rededicated as the "bodhimandala" of Ksitigarbha. Today, it also contains a display of more than 6,000 texts of Buddhist scriptures that the temple received as a gift from the Ming Emperor Wanli (1563–1620).

Ksitigarbha's birthday is celebrated throughout East Asia on the first day of the eighth lunar month (some celebrate on the last day of the seventh month), around July 13, and at this time thousands flock to the mountain. As monks gather in the Pagoda of the Holy Body to stand vigil for the Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva, the mountain is filled with a generally festive atmosphere.

In 2001, plans were announced to create a mega-statue of Ksitigarbha 155 meters (509 feet) to be completed around 2004. Several years later the date was changed to around 2008 and the size revised downward to 99 meters (325 feet), dictated by the facts that there are 99 mountain apexes in the Jiuhua mountain area and that Kim Gio Gak considered the emanation of Ksitigarbha reputedly ended his life when he was 99 years old.

Veneration of the Ksitigarbha/Jizo figure is even greater in Japan than in China. As in China, Jizo serves his traditional roles as patron saint of expectant mothers, children, firemen, travelers, pilgrims, and the protector of all beings caught in the six realms of the Buddhist cosmic world that are subject to reincarnation. Jizo is also venerated as the guardian of unborn, aborted, miscarried, and stillborn babies, roles not assigned to him in mainland Asia. Thus here, his recognition is heightened and the celebrations both widespread and frequent. The 24th of every lunar month is Jizo's day, and the 24th day of the 7th lunar month is the Grand Assembly in his honor. Today the largest celebration is held on the 23rd and 24th days of the 8th month in Kyoto and greater Kansai, where events focus on prayers for the welfare of children.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jiu Hua Shan.

References

- Bays, Jan Chozen. Jizo Bodhisattva: Guardian of Children, Travelers, and Other Voyagers. Boston: Shambhala, 2003.
- Bays, Jan Chozen. Jizo Bodhisattva: Modern Healing and Traditional Buddhist Practice. Rutland, VT: Tuttle Publishing, 2001.
- Boheng, Wu, and Cai Zhuozhi. 100 Buddhas in Chinese Buddhism. Trans. by Mu Xin and Yan Zhi. Singapore: Asiapac Books, 1997.
- Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva Sutra/ Ksitigarbha Bodhisattva Purva Prandhana Sutra. Also known as: Ksitigarbha's Fundamental Vows/Ksitigarbha's Fundamental Practices/Ksitigarbha's Fundamental Determination*. Surabaya, Indonesia: Cetya True Buddha Surabaya, n.d.
- Vessantara. Meeting the Buddhas: A Guide to Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric Deities. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse Publications, 1998.

Kukai (Kobo Daishi)

774–835

Kukai was a famous and influential Japanese monk who founded Shingon, the Japanese version of esoteric Buddhism. He was born into the gentry class and was well-versed in the Confucian classics. At the age of 14, he suddenly announced his desire to become a monk and after that day led a strictly ascetic lifestyle.

Kukai was one of the many monks to visit Tangera (618–907 CE) China. While there he studied under masters of both the Tian Tai and Vajrayana (Chinese esoteric) traditions. Upon his return to Japan he established his own monasteries and continued the Vajrayana (esoteric) initiations to new monks. He was appointed abbot of To-ji, a monastic center and temple near Kyoto, and this became the Shingon sect's center. He later moved to Mount Koya, where Shingon activities are centered to the present.

Kukai remains one of the best-known figures in Japanese Buddhism. His images can be seen in the grounds of many temples (not necessarily in the worship halls), and he is worshipped as an incarnation of the bodhisattva Maitreya. In the years after his death, as stories about him grew, he began to be called “Kobo Daishi” (or Kobo Great Teacher). Shingon altars will have a representation of him, an acknowledgment of his semi-deific status.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Confucianism; Koya, Mount; Shingon Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism.

References

- Abe, Ryuichi Abe. The Weaving of Mangra: Kukai and the Construction of Esoteric Buddhist Discourse. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Hakeda, Yoshito S., trans. Kukai: Major Works. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- McGreal, Ian, ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Payne, Richard K. “Ajikan: Ritual and Meditation in the Shingon Tradition.” In Re-Visioning “Kamakura” Buddhism, edited by Richard K. Payne. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1998.
- Tamura, Yoshiro. Japanese Buddhism: A Cultural History. Trans. by Jeffrey Hunter. Tokyo: Kosei, 2000.

Kumarajiva

344–413

Kumarajiva is considered one of the greatest translators of the Buddhist sutras. He played a vital role in the transference of Buddhism into China. Kumarajiva was perfectly suited to play this lynchpin role due to his unique background. He was born into royalty in Kucha, one of the oasis kingdoms along the north route of the Silk Road (in what is now the Xinjiang Province of China). Buddhism was strong in the land and his Buddhist mother encouraged Kumarajiva to study the sutras from the age of seven. He accompanied her on travels to visit learned monks in India and elsewhere. He was finally ordained as a Theravada monk in 364. His fame as an expert in Buddhism grew over time. It got to the point where the emperor of a Chinese dynasty, the Former Qin (351–394 CE), decided to attack

The Kumarajiva Sarira Pagoda, located in Caotang Temple in Huxian County, was built for keeping the remains of Kumarajiva. (Panorama Media [Beijing] Ltd./StockphotoPro)

Kucha in order to capture Kumarajiva and forcefully take him to his dynasty's capital. While this war raged the Former Qin itself was overthrown (383 CE). Kumarajiva then became a captive and a subject of negotiations. He was finally settled in Chang An, the capital of the new Chinese dynasty of the Later Qin (384–417), in 401.

Kumarajiva spent the remainder of his life translating Buddhist texts into Chinese. He was given all the resources needed by the current rulers, who seemed anxious to accrue merit by translation of the unexplored wisdom contained in Buddhist sutras. Kumarajiva recruited a large team of learned translators who spent years working on translations of 35 major texts. These translations were invariably done by teamwork and were not the work of any individual. Kumarajiva, knowing the essence of each text as well as the major languages, was able to review each prepared translation to ensure accuracy. The texts translated are often still used today. The Kumarajiva translation of the Flower Garland (Avatamsaka) Sutra, a massive work, which paved the way for the creation of the Hua Yan School of Chinese Buddhism.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Mizuno, Kogen. Buddhist Sutras: Origin, Development, Transmission. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 1980, 1982.
- Watson, Burton. The Flower of Chinese Buddhism. New York: Weatherhill, 1986.
- Wright, Arthur F. Buddhism in Chinese History. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1959.

Kurozumikyô

One of the oldest of the Japanese new religions, Kurozumikyô was founded in 1814 by a Shinto priest, Kurozumi Munetada (1780–1850). Both his parents died as the result of an epidemic in 1812, and then he became critically ill and spent three years in bed. While praying to Amaterasu Omikami (the sun goddess), he awoke to his own healing and to the realization that the divine and human are essentially one and that consequently there is neither birth nor death in this unity. This revelation, known as Tenmei Jikiju (direct reception of the will of heaven) occurred on November 11, 1814, and is commemorated as the beginning of Kurozumikyô.

After his revelation, Kurozumi began to preach this faith and is said to have healed people, attracting a considerable number of followers including a number of samurai and intellectuals. After his death in 1850, followers gathered together and formed religious associations in various provinces, and in 1876 they received official recognition as an independent Shinto sect from the government.

The followers of Kurozumikyô hold that the spirit that pervades the universe is that of Amaterasu Omikami and that people should seek, through communication with this spirit, to realize in experience the unity of the divine and human. Kurozumikyô reveres not only Amaterasu Omikami and the traditional kami pantheon but also the deified founder. Its primary unique practice is what is referred to as a “sun-swallowing rite,” in which believers worship the Sun while inhaling the fresh air, thus appearing to swallow the Sun (a representation of the Spirit of God) and experiencing a oneness with Amaterasu Omikami. Kurozumikyô uses the founder's writings, Kurozumikyô Kyosho, as its sacred scripture. Its leadership is held by direct descendants of Kurozumi family; the current head is the sixth-generation successor, Kurozumi Muneharu.

Kurozumikyô's headquarters complex includes a shrine to the founder and a large preaching hall. Leaders are trained at the Omoto Gakuin (Omoto Institute). Kurozumikyô also sponsors an orphanage at Akasaka, Okayama Prefecture. As the 21st century began, it reported 280,620 members.

Kurozumikyô

2770 Ogami

Okayama-shi, Okayama Prefecture 701-1292

Japan

Keishin Inaba

See also: Shinto.

References

- Hardacre, Helen. Kurozumikyô and the New Religions of Japan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press 1986

Thomsen, Harry. The New Religions of Japan. Rutland, VT, and Tokyo: Charles E. Tuttle Company, 1963.

Kusinagara

Kusinagara, a town in eastern Uttar Pradesh, India, is one of the four key locations associated with the life of Gautama Buddha (ca. 563–ca. 483 BCE), the others being Lumbini, Sarnath, and Bodhgaya. It was the place chosen by the Buddha to live out his last days on Earth. During this time, he delivered a spectrum of important discourses, among the most important being the Mahaparinibbana Sutra centered on the ideal of diligence. Also, he would receive the last people who were personally admitted to the community (sangha) by him.

As important as were his final years, the events immediately following his death also attained a high level of significance. First, his body was cremated and some of his remains enshrined at Kusinagara. The other part of his remains, most notably the various bone fragments, were divided among eight Buddhist kings who then ruled various parts of India. These remains were late to become venerated as the Buddha's relics.

Kusinagara's importance greatly increased several centuries later when the Buddhist ruler, King Asoka (third century BCE), expanded his kingdom. He saw to the construction of a variety of religious structures in the town and essentially turned it into a vital Buddhist center that would remain such until the Muslim invasion in the ninth century. At that time, the residents were scattered, and Kushinagar was consumed by the jungles. Only in the 1880 was the town discovered by British explorers. Recent excavations have uncovered ruins of a large monastic community that appears to have survived into the 11th century.

To date, the earliest buildings unearthed at Kusinagara have been dated to the time of Ashoka. That being said, archaeologists have uncovered two very important ancient remains that have subsequently attracted the attention of Buddhist believers. The Chankhandi Stupa marks the spot, many believe, where Buddha was cremated. A large pillar originally erected by King Ashoka is located in the midst of the stupa, though none of the Buddha's relics that had been placed in the stupa have survived. Nearby, Mahaparinirvana Temple houses a large statue of a reclining Buddha, a type of statue particularly associated with Burmese Buddhists, some of whom paid to have the temple rebuilt in 1927.

Through the last half of the 20th century, Indian, Japanese, and Sri Lankan Buddhists contributed to the revival of Kusinagara as a Buddhist pilgrimage site. Initially, they pooled their resources and erected a modern Buddhist pilgrims' center. Then in 1994, King Bhumibhol Adulyadej of Thailand contributed a substantial sum to the project to reestablish Buddhism in India as part of the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his assuming the Thai throne. In response, Thai Buddhists constructed Wat Thai Kusinara Chalermraj, a new contemporary Buddhist temple, one of several now serving pilgrims from all branches of Buddhism visiting Kusinagara.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Ashoka; Bodh-Gaya; Lumbini; Pilgrimage; Relics; Sarnath; Statues—Buddhist.

References

- Majupuria, Trilok Chandra. Holy Places of Buddhism in Nepal and India: A Guide to Sacred Places in Buddha's Lands. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1987.
- Panabokke, Gunaratne. History of the Buddhist Sangha in India and Sri Lanka. Dalugama, Kelaniya, Sri Lanka: Postgraduate Institute of Pali and Buddhist Studies, University of Kelaniya, 1993.
- Patil, D. R. Kusinagara. Delhi: Archaeological Survey of India, 1981.
- Tulku, Tarthang, ed. Holy Places of the Buddha. Vol. 9: Crystal Mirror. Berkeley, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1994.

■ Kuwait

Kuwait is a small country at the western end of the Persian Gulf. Much of the land away from the shoreline is desert, primarily prized for the oil found beneath. Due to the inhospitable climate inland, the overwhelming majority of the 2,600,000 residents reside in cities and towns along the coast.

The Fatima Mosque in Abdullah Al Salim, Kuwait. (Kuwaitna/Dreamstime.com)

The West attained a heightened level of public awareness about Kuwait at the beginning of the 1990s, when it became the focus of a war between the United States and Iraq. The land now designated as Kuwait has been populated since ancient times, though its history is often forgotten amid the famous ancient centers of the neighboring countries such as Baghdad (Iraq), Persepolis (Iran), and Mecca (Saudi Arabia). However, its strategic location made Kuwait an important early port for trade between India and the Middle East.

In the seventh century CE the area was changed by the emergence of the Arab Muslims, and Kuwait was incorporated into an empire that centered on Baghdad. The glory of the empire was finally destroyed in

Kuwait

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	701,000	2,613,000	85.7	3.88	3,354,000	4,367,000
Christians	38,600	301,000	9.9	4.25	431,000	600,000
Roman Catholics	17,700	230,000	7.5	4.95	320,000	440,000
Independents	2,400	30,000	1.0	1.56	50,000	75,000
Orthodox	13,300	28,800	0.9	2.03	44,000	63,000
Hindus	3,800	100,000	3.3	3.91	140,000	180,000
Agnostics	0	22,000	0.7	3.91	40,000	60,000
Baha'is	1,000	10,000	0.3	3.85	15,000	22,000
Sikhs	0	4,500	0.1	3.91	7,000	10,000
Atheists	0	500	0.0	3.91	800	1,200
Total population	744,000	3,051,000	100.0	3.91	3,988,000	5,240,000

the 13th century by the Mongol conquests. Kuwait would again find some stability in the 16th century as part of the Ottoman Empire, though the desert that surrounds the populated areas along the coast gave the area some degree of isolation.

In the 18th century, the people of the region chose to designate a representative to handle their relationship with the Ottoman Empire. In 1756, Abdul Rahim al-Sabah, the leader of the Anaiza people, was chosen. Al-Sabah is the fountainhead of the present ruling family of Kuwait. To keep from being absorbed into what was emerging as Saudi Arabia as the Ottoman Empire weakened, the Kuwaitis sought British help. Beginning in 1779, a set of treaties were signed, and as a result Kuwait obtained British protection and finally became a British protectorate following World War I.

The protectorate denied Iraq's claim to Kuwait, a claim going back to earlier centuries when the area was subject to Baghdad. The country was given independence in 1961, although Iraq refused to acknowledge Kuwait's new status. The head of the al-Sabah family declared himself emir, and his descendants continue to rule.

Islam is the official religion of Kuwait and virtually all residents are practicing Muslims. The only non-Muslims are expatriates who have moved into the country for economic reasons (oil or trade). Most Kuwaitis are Sunnis of the Malikite School and are thus differentiated from the Saudis, who are primarily Sunnis of the Wahhabi School, and the Iraqis, who are primarily Shias. There are both Wahhabis and Shias in Kuwait.

Christianity is present in Kuwait primarily to serve the expatriate community. The Roman Catholic Church has a relatively strong presence, operating several schools and a hospital. The individual parishes represent different Eastern rites and the Latin rite, all united into a single vicariate. Non-Chalcedonian Eastern Orthodox traditions are represented by parishes of the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin), the Coptic Orthodox Church, the Ancient Church of the East (Iraq), and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar. There is also a community of Greek Orthodox believers.

Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), who had introduced the Reformed Church in America into Bahrain, moved to Kuwait in 1903. The National Evangelical Church of Kuwait was organized that same year, though it did not have a building for worship until 1926. The Anglican Church in Kuwait was established during the height of the protectorate. The Christian Brethren and the assemblies associated with Bhakt Singh, an Indian leader with Plymouth Brethren roots, also have a small presence. Christians have a formal agreement not to attempt the conversion of Muslims. Also among the expatriates are some Hindus from southern India and some members of the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient Church of the East; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Coptic Orthodox Church; Malikite School of Islam; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Reformed Church in America; Roman Catholic Church; Wahhabi Islam; Zwemer, Samuel Marinus.

References

- Ali, M. H. "Kuwait, Religion, and Politics." Ph.D. diss., Michigan State University, 1986.
- Rizzo, Helen Mary. Islam, Democracy and the Status of Women: The Case of Kuwait. London: Routledge, 2004.
- Sanmiguel, V. Christians in Kuwait. Beirut: Beirut Printing Press, 1970.

Kwan Um School of Zen

The Kwan Um School of Zen, officially founded in 1983, is an international association of Zen centers established by Seung Sahn (called Dae Soen Sa Nim, or "Great Honored Zen Teacher," by his disciples), who is regarded as the 78th patriarch in his lineage in the Chogye order of Korean Buddhism, and the first to live and teach in the West.

Born in 1927 in Seun Choen, North Korea, Seung Sahn (1927–2004) became a Buddhist monk in 1948. He studied with Zen Master Ko Bong Soen Sa Nim (1890–1962), and on January 25, 1949, he received Dharma transmission from his teacher. Seung Sahn arrived in the United States in May 1972, eventually establishing a small Zen center in an apartment in Providence, Rhode Island. The Providence Zen Center remains the head temple of Seung Sahn's international organization. As his English improved, Seung Sahn's teaching expanded, and he began giving precepts to his students as well. His first American disciple, Jacob Perl, was a former student of Shunryu Suzuki Roshi (1905–1971) at the San Francisco Zen Center, and of Tarthang Tulku (b. 1935) at the Tibetan Nyingma Meditation Center in Berkeley, California. Now known as Zen Master Wu Bong, in 1978, Perl helped establish the first Zen center in Poland, and is the Head Teacher in Europe. Another of his early disciples was Barbara Rhodes, a registered nurse who received inka, or teaching authority, in 1977 and Dharma transmission in 1992. She currently serves as School Zen Master and Guiding Dharma Teacher, after having helped found the Providence Zen Center. Zen Master Dae Kwang now serves as abbot of the Kwan Um Zen Center.

Seung Sahn eventually gave Dharma transmission to nearly a dozen individuals, including the deceased monk Su Bong, who had been designated as Seung Sahn's successor. He also authorized nearly 20 individuals as senior students, or Dharma masters (Ji Do Poep Sa Nims). Seung Sahn died on November 30, 2004. Seung Sahn's style of teaching was an eclectic combination of sitting meditation, Dharma lectures, koan study, prostrations, and chanting. He was sometimes said to teach the "Don't Know" style of Zen, tracing back to a tale about the Zen patriarch Bodhidharma. He was a prolific author, having written Dropping Ashes on the Buddha, The Compass of Zen, Ten Gates, Only Don't Know, and The Whole World is a Single Flower—365 Kong-ans for Everyday Life.

The Kwan Um School of Zen is headquartered in Cumberland, Rhode Island. It has nearly 100 affiliated centers in the United States, Canada, South Africa, Hong Kong, Israel, Korea, Malaysia, Singapore, and Australia, and throughout Europe and the Middle East. These centers generally have regular schedules for sitting meditation and Dharma talks, as well as longer, intensive retreats called kyol che (coming together) that generally run for one or two months. The school also publishes a journal known as Primary Point, begun in 1984. In addition, their own Primary Point Press offers a series of videos and books by and about Seung Sahn, as well as his teaching. In 1988 the school weathered a scandal involving sexual relationships between Seung Sahn and female members of his community.

Like many of the Western Buddhist groups today, Kwan Um School of Zen has an extremely well-developed website, which includes an online catalogue from which a variety of Dharma-related objects can be purchased. The site also offers an extensive archive of Kwan Um materials, and it provides links to the Internet sites of more than 50 other Kwan Um School affiliates and to a variety of other useful Buddhist websites, both scholarly and popular in nature.

Kwan Um School of Zen
Providence Zen Center
99 Pound Road

Cumberland, RI 02864
<http://www.kwanumzen.com>

Charles S. Prebish

See also: Bodhidharma; Meditation; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Coleman, James. The New Buddhism: The Western Transformation of an Ancient Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Prebish, Charles S. Luminous Passage: The Practice and Study of Buddhism in America. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999.
- Seager, Richard. Buddhism in America. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Soeng, Mu. "Korean Buddhism in America: A New Style of Zen." In The Faces of Buddhism in America, edited by Charles S. Prebish and Kenneth K. Tanaka. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

■ Kyrgyzstan

Kyrgyzstan is a small Central Asian republic north of Tadjikistan. It is also intimately connected with Uzbekistan to its west, as Uzbek and Kyrgyz peoples share a similar religious and linguistic background. It additionally shares a lengthy border with China to the east and Kazakhstan to the north. Kyrgyzstan's 73,861 square miles are home to 5,360,000 people (2008).

The antecedents of the Kyrgyz people moved into the region from the area north of the Caspian Sea. There they mixed with the local Turkish and Mongol peoples, creating the present-day Kyrgyz people. In the 18th century, Kyrgyzstan was brought under Chinese hegemony as a protectorate. In the 19th century, Russia moved into the region as part of its general expansion southward, and through the 1860s a Russian administration was in place in northern Kyrgyzstan. Russian immigrants flowed into the area, and in the 1870s the southern part of the country was annexed by Russia.

Russian authority was replaced by Soviet rule in 1917. As the Soviet Union developed, the region was transformed into the Federated Republic of Kyrgyzstan

A Russian Orthodox priest consecrates a bell as it is lifted into a cathedral in Leninskoye, Kyrgyzstan. (Vyacheslav Oseledko/AFP/Getty Images)

Kyrgyzstan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,004,000	3,951,000	71.9	1.79	4,944,000	5,508,000
Agnostics	862,000	950,000	17.3	-0.47	800,000	600,000
Christians	338,000	322,000	5.9	-0.35	304,000	309,000
Orthodox	275,000	251,000	4.6	-1.04	210,000	190,000
Protestants	43,400	21,000	0.4	1.67	30,000	40,000
Independents	19,500	24,000	0.4	4.66	35,000	40,000
Atheists	700,000	220,000	4.0	-1.81	100,000	75,000
Buddhists	5,000	25,800	0.5	1.19	32,000	45,000
Ethnoreligionists	50,000	22,000	0.4	1.21	18,000	16,600
New religionists	1,500	2,600	0.0	1.02	4,900	6,500
Jews	4,000	1,800	0.0	1.01	2,000	2,000
Baha'is	0	1,600	0.0	7.26	2,300	3,000
Zoroastrians	0	800	0.0	1.03	800	800
Total population	2,964,000	5,497,000	100.0	1.02	6,208,000	6,566,000

in 1936. An independence movement developed in the 1980s that led to the establishment of an independent Kyrgyzstan in 1991.

The area carved out as the Kyrgyz homeland was among the last to be reached by Islam (ninth to 12th centuries), and only in the 19th century did Islam (of the Sunni Hanafite School) become the dominant religion of the country. Thus, the establishment of Islam was quite young when Russian forces invaded the country, bringing with them the Russian Orthodox Church. Christianity did not spread among the Muslim population. Like Christians, Muslims faced persecution under Soviet rule, but they clung tenaciously to their faith through the worst years of Soviet repression. In the years since independence was declared, a secular government has been established, and Islam has to some extent been revived. Subsequently, Islam has attained state recognition and its holy days are public holidays.

By the late 1990s it became clear that some Islamic conservatives, associated with Wahhabi Islam, were becoming active in the country, having found a base within the Uzbek minority. In 1998 a special department of the government was created to control Wahhabi activities.

Christianity entered the country with the Russians and through the 19th century was largely confined to the Russian communities. It has shrunk considerably since the 1990s, as Russians have returned to their homeland, many not wishing their children to attend schools dominated by the Kyrgyz language. Today, people of Russian heritage constitute approximately 12 percent of the population. Like Sunni Islam, however, the Russian Orthodox Church has gained state recognition, meaning that Orthodox Christian holy days are also state holidays. Today, the Russian Orthodox Church has one diocese that includes Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tadjikistan, and Kyrgyzstan.

As was the case in other Central Asian countries, the Baptists were the first Protestant/Free Church group to appear in Kyrgyzstan. In 1912, Rodion G. Bershadskii, his wife, and a family named Marafin moved from the Orenburg region of Russia to Bishkek. The congregation they formed became the first of several Baptist churches, and the movement primarily spread among German- and Russian-speaking residents. Since independence the church has been able to operate more openly, but it has also lost many members who have moved back to Russia or the West. During the last quarter of the 20th century, a German-based missionary agency, Licht im Osten, began working very quietly in Kyrgyzstan and neighboring countries. It has been able to operate more openly since independence, and in 1993 it opened a Bible school in Bishkek. In the 1990s, the Baptists, whose churches constitute the Union of Evangelical Christians-Baptists of Russia, began a significant post-Soviet outreach to Kyrgyz people.

Through the 20th century and into the 21st, the Seventh-day Adventist Church has had a small mission in the country, organizing the Kyrgyzstan Conference in 1978. By the mid-1990s, the Conference included 10 churches. There are also a few Pentecostal believers.

Following Kyrgyzstan's independence from the Soviet Union, it formed a State Agency on Religion and adopted a relatively liberal religious law that allowed the registration of a wide spectrum of religious groups. By 2008, over 2000 groups, most local congregations, had registered. Along the way, both the Unification movement and the Church of Scientology registered, but were subsequently denied status and banned in the country. Many among the governing authorities have felt the law was too liberal and have moved to pass new legislation that would greatly restrict registration for new, foreign-based, and small religious groups.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scientology; Hanafite School of Islam; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church; Unification Movement; Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Anderson, John. Kyrgyzstan: Central Asia's Island of Democracy? London: Routledge, 1999.
- Country Profile: Kyrgyzstan.* London: International Institute for the Study of Islam and Christianity, 1994.
- Khalid, Adeb. Islam after Communism: Religion and Politics in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- Rashid, Ahmad. The Resurgence of Central Asia: Islam or Nationalism? New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

Laba Festival

The Laba Festival is a Chinese celebration honoring ancestors that seems to have its roots in an ancient harvest festival, held to celebrate a bumper crop in hopes of having another the following year. Over time, however, it evolved into a celebration of one's ancestors. The contemporary festival remains as a building block in the Chinese veneration of ancestors. In the fifth century CE, the government decreed the 8th day of the 12th lunar month (January in the Western calendar) as the day for the Laba Festival.

As Buddhism was transmitted and grew in China, it identified the 8th day of the 12th lunar month as the day that Gautama Buddha gained enlightenment sitting under the Bodhi tree. The accompanying story told of how the Buddha had reached a point of discouragement and hunger in his practice. About to give up the pursuit, he encountered a shepherd girl who shared with him her porridge and rice. Revived and refreshed, he continued his meditation and eventually became enlightened.

Over succeeding centuries, the Buddhist and traditional Chinese celebration merged, and however an individual thought of it, all participated in the essential actions of preparing, sharing, and eating porridge. By the 11th century it became a national holiday. The Chinese ruler would give laba porridge to his underlings and send rice and fruits to the Buddhist monasteries. All families would make porridge, share it with their ancestors and neighbors, and then share it with their gathered family. It would be a good sign when all had eaten their fill and there were leftovers.

The Laba porridge is made with eight (for luck) main ingredients (including beans and grains) and eight supplementary ingredients (for sweetness and flavor). Preparation of the food begins the day before. The offering of the food to the ancestors and the distribution to neighbors (and of course the poor and needy) is done before noon on the eighth and then the family gathers to partake in what can be, depending on the importance placed on preparation, a most delicious meal.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancestors.

References

- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

The Lady of All Nations

See Our Lady of All Nations.

Lakota, The

The Lakota people fled their homeland in the eastern woodlands of the present-day United States in the winter of 1776 under attack by the Ojibwa, who called them "Sioux," a derogatory name that suggested they were less than human. Learning to integrate horses into their new nomadic lifestyle, the Lakota soon became masters of the Midwestern plains and followed the plentiful buffalo herds for sustenance.

In a treaty at Fort Laramie in 1851, the U.S. government granted the Lakota 60 million acres of land in the Dakotas, but the westward expansion of European Americans, with its concomitant provocation and warfare, the discovery of gold, and the land-grabbing of the settlers soon whittled away this territory. Even the most sacred Black Hills were soon confiscated. Despite one decisive victory against General George Armstrong Custer (1839–1876), the Lakota could not stand against the brutal force of the U.S. Cavalry, whose most notorious act was the massacre of more than 300 Lakota people at Wounded Knee Creek in 1890.

Taos Indian man seated, holding peace pipe. (Library of Congress)

Despite this tragic history and the loss of some knowledge of their sacred rites, the Lakota remarkably have continued most of their religious traditions. When they could no longer openly rebel against the prohibition of this practice, they hid boys who showed signs of being wicasa wakan, holy men or “medicine men,” in remote areas of the reservation.

The center of Lakota religion is the sacred pipe, which is an essential part of every ceremony. According to the most fundamental of the Lakota sacred stories, the pipe was given to them generations ago by White Buffalo Woman. A sacred being, White Buffalo approached two young hunters in the form of an extraordinarily beautiful woman. When the older hunter reached out to possess her, he immediately dissolved into a pile of bones. Selfishness, manifested here as lust and greed, killed him. The younger hunter listened carefully as the sacred woman told him to return to his encampment, where his people were starving, and to tell them to prepare to receive her. The next day she presented the gift of the sacred pipe and instructed the people in its use.

Their “peace” pipe centers the Lakota people in the sacred. Lame Deer, an important 20th-century wicasa wakan, summarized the unifying symbols in the sacred pipe: “This pipe is us. The stem is our backbone, the bowl our head. The stone is our blood, red as our skin. The opening in the bowl is our mouth and the smoke rising from it our breath, the visible breath of our people” (Lame Deer 1972, 264). Through its ritual use, the Lakota create unity among themselves and put themselves in harmony with all living beings.

Although the pipe is smoked in many ritual situations, it is the predominant feature of the Inipi, a sweat bath, and the sweat bath is the first stage of almost every ritual undertaking. The sweat house is a small circular enclosure that represents the entire universe—every living creature is said to be somehow represented within. As the Lakota strip off their clothing and enter the Inipi, they strip away all bad thoughts and animosities. Before sitting down in the Inipi around a fire that is heating large rocks, they make a complete circle in a clockwise direction inside the structure—aligning themselves with the movement of the sun. The circle, like the sacred pipe, is a primary symbol for the Lakota people, representing not only the ideal of communal harmony but also the cycles of life.

The wicasa wakan then offers the pipe in the six cardinal directions (east, north, west, south, and toward both the sky and earth), which symbolically centers the people present in the circle. The fire is put out, water is poured on the heated rocks, the flap of the sweat house is closed, and worldly thoughts are driven out of the minds of the participants, who now enter into a spiritual harmony.

The Lakota culture is extremely rich in ritual. There are solitary rituals of initiation, where young men seek their spiritual identities by digging a vision pit on top of a hill, frequently somewhere in their sacred Black Hills. Yuwipi ceremonies allow the Lakota to get in touch with both the spirits of the earth and ancestral spirits, often for purposes of healing.

Sun dances are communal celebrations, lasting several days, which emphasize personal sacrifice for the communal good. The central moment occurs when a few dedicated men are pierced and have rawhide pulled through muscles in their backs or chests; they then hang from a pole in the center of the ritual grounds until the rawhide tears their skin apart. More important than this description, however, is the visionary and ecstatic experiences that occur during this time. And most important is the communal solidarity that occurs during this rite.

Although the ritual positions of men have often been highlighted in Lakota religion, there are corresponding ritual places for women in most rituals. Grandmothers cut their skin in solidarity with their grandsons who are undergoing a vision quest, young girls are the first to touch the tree that will become the center of the sun dance, and mothers frequently purify their homes by burning sage.

The 1990 census numbers the Lakotas (with the various sub-groupings) at 107,321 people, approximately one-third of whom live on reservations and trust lands in South Dakota. Although some Lakota combine their native heritage with Christianity, mostly Roman Catholicism, almost all of those who live on the reservation or in trust lands also participate in Lakota ritual activity, at least occasionally. Although not unanimously supported by the Lakota, the American Indian movement, cofounded in the early 1970s by Russell Means (b. 1939), an Oglala Lakota, did much to renew interest in all Native American spiritual traditions and helped expand awareness of these traditions beyond the boundaries of the reservations.

Thomas V. Peterson

See also: Native American Religion: Roman Catholicism.

References

- Brown, Joseph Epes. The Sacred Pipe: Black Elk's Account of the Seven Rites of the Oglala Sioux. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1953.
- Lame Deer, John (Fire), and Richard Erdoes. Lame Deer: Seeker of Visions. New York: Washington Square Press, 1972, 1994.
- Powers, William K. Yuwipi: Vision and Experience in Oglala Ritual. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.

“Tribute to the Oglala Lakota Sioux: Their History, Culture, and Leaders.” <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Acropolis/3976/Hawk.html>.

Lalibela

Lalibela is a small town of rural Ethiopia located in the Lasta Mountains some 250 miles north of Addis Ababa, the capital. The town, once the capital of the Zagwe dynasty of Ethiopia, arises from obscurity as the home of one of the most spectacular holy sites in the world—a group of 11 churches, each carved out of the granite bed rock of the area in such a way that their roof is at ground level. The origin of these buildings date to the reign of King Lalibela (r. ca. 1185–1225). Popular legends ascribe the origin of the rulers of Zagwe dynasty to the descendants of the handmaid of the queen of Sheba, though no independent evidence of the claim has come forth.

Legends aside, King Lalibela made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, a trip that deeply affected his psyche. Immediately upon his return, he renamed the stream that flowed through his capital city, Roha (a name reflecting the red volcanic rock that underlies the town), after the Jordan River and a local hill after the Mount of Olives. He extended his efforts to create an Ethiopian Jerusalem by mandating the carving of the 11 churches. Sculptors carved seven of the churches straight into the cliffs of the mountainside. Their sanctuaries weave deep into the hillside. They then carved the four remaining churches from blocks of the volcanic rock isolated by excavating downward. They connected the churches to each with a number of small passages and tunnels. The entire project took 24 years.

While the trip to Jerusalem appears to have occasioned the church building, Lalibela’s hagiography also speaks of a vision that the king had early in his life. According to the story, his older brother, the previous king, tried to poison Lalibela. Instead of dying, while recovering Lalibela was carried by an angel to heaven, during which time he was shown the work he would later accomplish.

Following the completion of the churches, Lalibela abdicated his throne. He became a hermit and spent the remaining years of his life in the holy space he had created. The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church later canonized Lalibela and renamed the city in his honor. When the Zagwe dynasty came to an end in the 13th century, political power moved southward to Addis Ababa, but Lalibela remained the spiritual heart of Ethiopian Orthodoxy.

All the churches are still active centers of worship, and Lalibela receives pilgrims year round, with a significant concentration during the two weeks following Christmas. More than 10 percent of the town’s residents are priests whose job is to serve the pilgrims and maintain the churches. Most of the churches remain in good condition and much of the original decorations of the interiors survive. Among the many pilgrims, many young women struggling with becoming pregnant make their way to the pool outside the Church of St. Mary, where they spend the night immersed in the pool in hopes of ending their barrenness.

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has ranked the churches the eighth most unique historical site in the world, and the city was placed on the list of World Heritage Sites by the United Nations in 1978.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Pilgrimage.

References

- Bidder, Irmgard. Lalibela: The Monolithic Churches of Ethiopia. New York: Praeger, 1959.
- Gerster, Georg. Churches in Rock: Early Christian Art in Ethiopia. London: Phaidon, 1970.
- Hirsch, Bertrand. Lalibela. Madrid: UNESCO, 1997.
- Kidane, Girma, and Elisabeth Dorothea Hecht. Ethiopia’s Rock Hewn Churches of Lalibela. Stockholm: Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences/Pergamon Press, 1983.

Lambeth Palace

Lambeth Palace is the official London residence of the archbishop of Canterbury, the head cleric of the Church of England. It is located in Lambeth, on the south bank of the River Thames across the river from Westminster. Acquired by the archbishopric around 1200, the oldest remaining part of the palace is the Early English (13th century) chapel. Today the palace is the site of the decennial Lambeth Conferences held every 10 years, when all active Anglican bishops in the world gather for deliberations on the Anglican movement.

The palace played a significant role in a variety of historical events. In March 1378, proto-Reformer John Wycliffe appeared at the palace to defend himself from charges of heresy. During the hearing, a noisy mob gathered with the purpose of saving him; the bishops, divided over his teachings, dodged further confrontation by merely forbidding Wycliffe to speak further on the controversy. During the English peasants' revolt of 1381, rebels attacked the palace and captured Archbishop Simon of Sudbury, who was later executed by them.

In the 17th century, the so-called Lollard's Tower (built in the 15th century) was used as a prison. Reginald Cardinal Pole, who tried to return England to the Catholic fold during the reign of Mary I, lay in state in the palace following his death in 1558. Archbishop William Juxon rebuilt the palace's Great Hall in 1663 after it had been ransacked during the English Civil War.

The palace is also home to the Lambeth Palace Library, the official library of the archbishop of Canterbury and principal holder of records for the history of the Church of England. The library was founded by Archbishop Richard Bancroft in 1610, and now contains material dating as far back as the ninth century.

Around 1850 the adjacent parish church, medieval St. Mary-at-Lambeth, was rebuilt, only to be deconsecrated in 1972. It now serves as the Museum of Garden History.

See also: Church of England; Mary I.

References

- Allen, Thomas. The History and Antiquities of the Parish of Lambeth. London: J. Allen, 1826.
- Cryer, Mary. A Short History of Lambeth Palace. Worthing, UK: Churchman Publishing Limited, 1988.
- Dodwell, C. R. Lambeth Palace. London: Country Life, 1958.

Ducarel, Andrew Coltee. The History and Antiquities of the Archiepiscopal Palace of Lambeth, from its Foundation to the Present Time. London, J. Nichols, 1785.

Lantern Festival

The Chinese Lantern Festival had its roots in the ancient past, possibly as early as the Shang dynasty, which came to an end around 1046 BCE. The festival occurs on the 15th day of the 1st lunar month. As the lunar months are calculated from new moon to new moon, the 15th day is coincidental with the full moon. Thus, the Lantern Festival celebrates the light of the first full moon after the New Year celebration heralding the coming spring. At times, the New Year's spring festival would be stretched out for two weeks, with the Lantern Festival bring it to a close. In the days before electricity, the festival celebrated the declining darkness of winter and the ability of the community to move about at night with human-made light. Lanterns were the popular mode of illuminating the dark, and villagers used their artistic skills in the making of highly decorative lanterns. In recent times, temples and social groups would hold contests for the most beautiful and interesting lanterns.

The Lantern Festival took on religious connotations from the Daoist concept of three worlds (which was in turn rooted in Buddhist thought). The Lantern Festival celebrated the heavenly realm, while the later Double Seventh Festival celebrated the earthly realm and the Double Ninth Festival the human realm. Another account, from the Han dynasty (202 BCE–220 CE) tied the festival to the North Star. The Lantern Festival honored Ti Yin, the god of the North Star, who was seen as the balanced embodiment of the two opposing universal principles of yin and yang. He never changes his position in the sky.

Over time, as the meaning of the Lantern Festival changed, its essence remained as a way of asserting authority over darkness and a time for the general public to demonstrate its artistic creativity with unique, comical, and beautiful lanterns. The festival has lost much of its purpose with the coming of electricity and continues largely as a time for leisurely frivolity often expressed with fireworks and lion dancing.

A dragon boat floats down a river during the traditional lantern festival in China. (Everdancer/Dreamstime.com)

One custom has survived, the posing and answering of riddles. This began when scholars amused their students and friends by hanging lanterns outside their homes on which they had written riddles. This action was later generalized into a popular custom of posing riddles as part of the broader celebration.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Double Ninth Festival; Double Seventh Festival.

References

- Kaulbach, B, and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.

Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Lao Buddhist Sangha

The Lao Buddhist Sangha is the community of monks that teaches Buddhism throughout the Lao People's Democratic Republic and administers all Buddhist temples. It is independent of similar national organizations in the other four Theravada Buddhist countries (Burma, Cambodia, Sri Lanka, and Thailand), and has been for more than six centuries.

From the time of its establishment during the reign of King Fa Ngum (1316–1373), founder of the Lao Kingdom of Lan Xang in the mid-14th century, the Lao Buddhist Sangha has enjoyed both political patronage and social prestige. Its role in propagating social morality and respect for the throne gained it the support of Lao kings, who gave generously toward its upkeep.

The legitimation that the Sangha provided to the monarchy was strongest when the institution was unified. This was not always the case. Factions at court or opponents in succession struggles often had their monastic backers. Periodic “purification” of the Sangha was often thus an excuse to re-impose unity.

Little is known about sectarian division within the Sangha in the Kingdom of Lan Xang. We do know from the reports of the first Europeans to visit Vientiane (Vientiane) in the 17th century that much of the wealth of the kingdom was lavished on the monasteries of the capital. When Lan Xang split into rival kingdoms in 1707, the Sangha too was divided.

By the 19th century, when the Lao kingdoms had been reduced to tributary dependencies of Siam, the Lao Sangha reached its lowest point. Recovery was slow under French rule. The reform Thammanyut-nikay School founded by King Rama IV Mongkut of Siam (1804–1868) gained a foothold in Laos alongside the dominant Maha-nikay, especially in the south. The sectarian antagonism that resulted divided the Sangha.

The establishment of Buddhism as the state religion by the independent Kingdom of Laos in 1953 greatly enhanced the status of the Sangha. At the same time, however, political and ideological conflict associated with the First and Second Indochina Wars led to increasing politicization, as both the royal Lao government and Communist Pathet Lao attempted to use the Sangha for their own political purposes.

Fearing Communist infiltration of the Sangha, the government attempted to bring it under closer administrative control. Monastic organization was made to parallel that of the civil administration. Officials at each level of the Sangha were appointed by officials at the next highest level—from village, to district, to province. At the apex stood the Sangharaja, elected by senior abbots from a short list acceptable to the Ministry of Religious Affairs.

In response, the Pathet Lao championed religious freedom while encouraging young monks to demonstrate against the government. Overt political activism lost the Sangha some respect, however, and weakened its cohesion. When the Pathet Lao seized power in 1975, the Sangha lost what little remaining independence of action it had retained. Hundreds of monks joined the approximately 300,000 ethnic Lao and tribal minorities who fled abroad (10 percent of the total population). Some established monasteries in their new countries of residence, notably in the United States, France, Australia, and Canada.

The Pathet Lao abolished the sectarian divide and formed instead the Lao United Buddhists Association (LUBA), a member organization of the party-dominated Lao Front for National Construction. The position of Sangharaja was replaced by the president of the LUBA, who required the endorsement of the Lao People’s Revolutionary Party (LPRP).

The number of monks initially fell sharply after 1975, but numbers increased as Buddhism again became politically acceptable in the mid-1980s. In the form of the LUBA, the Sangha continues to perform its traditional role of providing education for disadvantaged youth and of providing advice on traditional medicine. As Communism lost its appeal in the 1990s, the LPRP increasingly turned to Lao nationalism for legitimation. Buddhism has been encouraged as central to Lao national culture, and even senior party officials now acknowledge the importance of the Sangha in the life of the nation.

Lao United Buddhists Association
Vat That Luang
Viang Chan (Vientiane)
Laos

Martin Stuart-Fox

See also: Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Evans, Grant. The Politics of Ritual and Remembrance: Laos since 1975. Chiang Mai, Thailand: Silkworm Press, 1998.
- Stuart-Fox, Martin. “Laos: From Buddhist Kingdom to Marxist State.” In Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia, edited by Ian Harris, 153–172. London: Pinter, 1999.

■ Laos

Despite being a nominally Communist state, Laos, or the Lao People's Democratic Republic as it is officially known, is one of only five countries where the dominant religion is Theravada Buddhism. The other four are Sri Lanka, Burma, Cambodia, and Thailand, the last three of which share a common border with land-locked Laos, its other two neighbors being China and Vietnam. Laos has a population of 6.2 million (2008 estimate), while the capital, Viang Chan (Vientiane), has a little more than half a million inhabitants.

Lowland Lao make up only 55 percent of the country's ethnically mixed population, according to the 2005 census, with another 10 percent comprising closely related Tai minorities. As many as 50 other ethnic groups make up the rest, the largest of which are the Khmu and Hmong. While Lao and Tai are overwhelmingly Buddhist, other ethnic groups are animists of one kind or another. Only a few have been converted to Christianity.

Tradition has it that the Theravada form of Buddhism was introduced into Laos from Cambodia when the Lao Kingdom of Lan Xang was founded in the mid-14th century. In fact, Buddha images and inscriptions excavated near the Lao capital of Viang Chan (Vientiane) indicate that Mon monks propagated the religion there four centuries earlier.

Prior to their conversion to Buddhism, the Lao, like some of the upland Tai tribes in Laos today, worshipped a hierarchy of spirits, ranging from heavenly thaen to earthly phi. Some phi were territorial, protecting villages, districts, or principalities (meuang); others were malignant, causing sickness when they gained entry to a human body.

The ethnic, or lowland, Lao began moving into the middle Mekong basin as early as the ninth century. The Austroasiatic-speaking peoples who were there before them, now known collectively as Lao Thoeng (Lao of the hill slopes, like the Khmu), worshipped their own array of spirits through a variety of rituals, including animal sacrifice. The most important collective ceremonies required ritual killing of a buffalo. Some Lao Thoeng tribes converted to Buddhism, but most have retained their traditional forms of animism.

Pha That Luang in Vientiane, the capital of Laos. "The Golden Stupa" is the national symbol of Laos. (iStockPhoto)

LAOS

Buddhism played a political role, as well as a social and spiritual role, in classical Lao society, for it legitimized the sociopolitical order. Conversely, the government favored Buddhism; the king ruled by right of superior merit (kamma), which he demonstrated by his beneficence toward the community of monks, the Lao Buddhist Sangha. By the early 17th century, when the first Europeans reached the Kingdom of Lan Xang, Viang Chan was a regional center for Buddhist scholarship. After 1707, when Lan Xang was divided, decline set in, and Lao Buddhism reached its nadir after the Thai sack of Viang Chan in 1828.

About that time, new tribal minorities began entering northern Laos from China. Known collectively as the Lao Sung (Lao of the mountain heights), these include the Hmong and the Mien. All of these peoples worship a variety of celestial and terrestrial spirits. The Hmong practice a form of shamanism, while Mien religion has been influenced by Daoism.

Christianity was first taught in Laos by a Jesuit priest who arrived in Viang Chan in 1642. It was not until Laos became a French colony in 1893, however, that Catholicism gained a foothold in the country. Buddhism was then in decline, but few Lao were converted. Buddhism showed signs of recovery after a Buddhist

Laos

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Buddhists	1,378,000	3,264,000	52.9	1.58	4,059,000	5,006,000
Ethnoreligionists	990,000	2,388,000	38.7	1.48	2,900,000	3,300,000
Agnostics	90,000	210,000	3.4	1.63	280,000	360,000
Christians	51,300	194,000	3.1	4.61	306,000	393,000
Protestants	9,200	125,000	2.0	4.55	200,000	250,000
Roman Catholics	41,500	52,000	0.8	3.83	75,000	90,000
Independents	300	16,500	0.3	7.80	30,000	50,000
Atheists	28,000	56,200	0.9	1.63	70,000	85,000
Chinese folk	9,000	22,100	0.4	1.63	35,000	50,000
Baha'is	100	14,500	0.2	3.60	25,000	40,000
New religionists	0	11,000	0.2	1.63	15,000	17,500
Muslims	5,000	7,500	0.1	1.62	12,000	20,000
Hindus	0	4,800	0.1	1.62	10,000	16,800
Daoists	0	300	0.0	1.65	1,000	1,500
Total population	2,551,000	6,173,000	100.0	1.63	7,713,000	9,290,000

Institute was established in the early 1930s. When Laos gained independence in 1953, Buddhism again assumed its role as the state religion.

Seizure of power by the Communist Pathet Lao in 1975 had an immediate impact on religion. For two decades during the Second Indochina War, both sides had attempted to enlist the Lao Sangha for their own political purposes. After seizing power, the Lao People's Revolutionary Party (LPRP) quickly reduced the Sangha to a pliant tool for the construction of Socialism. Attendance at Buddhist ceremonies continued, however, and more relaxed policies after the mid-1980s led to a moderate resurgence of Buddhism. Even Politburo members began attending important ceremonies.

According to the 2005 census, there were 84,750 Christians (about two-thirds are Catholic and one-third are Protestant), along with just over 1,800 Muslims and 1,000 Baha'i concentrated in urban centers. This compares with 3.75 million Buddhists and 1.74 million followers of various tribal religions. All religious affairs fall under the supervision of the Ministry of Culture, which serves as a regional center for the World Fellowship of Buddhists. The Sangha also has representation on the Lao Front for National Construction, along with other ethnic, social, and professional organizations.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed under the Lao Constitution, but there have been persistent claims of discrimination against Christians. The Lao government is suspicious of their loyalties abroad, Catholics to the Vatican, and evangelical Protestants to churches in the United States. By contrast, as Communism lost its ideological appeal in the 1990s, the LPRP began to turn to Lao nationalism as a source of legitimation, with Buddhism as its cultural core. Party leaders began attending Buddhist ceremonies, which encouraged greater popular attendance. And when Politburo members died, they were accorded elaborate Buddhist funerals. But though Buddhism has undergone something of a resurgence in Communist Laos, the Sangha still remains under the political control of the ruling party.

Martin Stuart-Fox

See also: Jesuits; Lao Buddhist Sangha; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bunnag, J. "The Way of the Monk and the Way of the World: Buddhism in Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia." In The World of Buddhism: Buddhist Monks and Nuns in Society and Culture, edited by H. Bechert and R. Gombrich. London: Thames & Hudson, 1984.
- Morev, Lev. "Religion in Laos Today." Religion, State and Society 30, no. 4 (2002): 395–407.
- Stuart-Fox, Martin. Historical Dictionary of Laos. 3rd ed. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2008.

Stuart-Fox, Martin. The Lao Kingdom of Lan Xang: Rise and Decline. Bangkok: White Lotus Press, 1998.

Stuart-Fox, Martin, and Rod Bucknell. "Politicization of the Buddhist Sangha in Laos." Journal of Southeast Asian Studies 13, no. 1 (1982): 60–80.

Laos Evangelical Church

In the 1870s, Daniel McGilvray (1828–1911), an American Presbyterian minister, settled in Chiang Mai, Thailand, from where he made regular trips into northern Laos during the years 1872–1898. As a result the first Protestant groups in Laos came into existence. A second effort to build a Christian presence was begun in the southern part of Laos in 1902 by Gabriel Contesse and Maurice Willy, two Swiss missionaries, who with their wives opened the first missionary station at Sing-Khone. As other missionaries moved into the territory, a few other Protestant churches were founded among a population that was dominantly Buddhist. By 1936 the Swiss missions had led to the formation of some 12 Christian communities. During this time, the first three Gospels were translated and published in Laotian (1908). A complete Bible appeared in 1932. In 1928 the Christian and Missionary Alliance added its strength to the small Christian work.

The two Christian communities, one in the north and one in the south, persisted in spite of the generally hostile environment, the ravages of World War II, and the rise of a secular Marxist government. In 1975 that government moved to curtail all religious activity, both Buddhist and Christian. This negative environment encouraged the two Christian groups to come together in 1982 and form the Laos Evangelical Church, which has subsequently received official recognition as a religious body. In 2008, the church reported some 100,000 members in 300 congregations. It is the second largest religious body in Laos. The church joined the World Council of Churches in 2008; it had previously been an active member of the Christian Conference of Asia.

The church is organized with a presbyterian church order, though it conceives of itself as interdenominational. It has accepted the Apostles' Creed as its doctrinal standard. Since 1965, a number of Laotians have moved to the United States. The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) has moved to provide an organization for Laotian Christians through its Lao Presbyterian Council.

Laos Evangelical Church
BP 4200
Vientiane
Laos P.D.R.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian and Missionary Alliance; Presbyterian Church (USA); World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Laozi

ca. 500 BCE

Laozi (literally, "Old Master") is a philosopher said to have lived as a contemporary of Confucius (the two met and debated), during the tumultuous Zhou dynasty (1122–256 BCE). The first account of his life was given in Sima Qian's Shiji (Records of the Historian). Sima states that Laozi was born in Chu, in today's central China, and worked in the Zhou ruler's court as an archivist. On a trip to the western regions (symbolic for being wild and untamed), Laozi met Yin Xi, the Guardian of the Pass. At Yin's request he wrote the Daodejing, the classic of the Way and its power, the first text of philosophical Daoism. The Daodejing's pithy style and use of aphorisms makes it one of the most-read books today.

The name Laozi is an honorific title, and the given name of the man to whom it was applied is unknown. Some scholars believe that Laozi is actually a composite figure referring to several individuals. There are a variety of legendary stories about him, but very little grounded information.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Confucius; Daoism.

A huge statue of the ancestor of Taoism, Laozi, in Fujian, China. (Bbbar/Dreamstime.com)

References

- Kaltenmark, Max. Lao Tzu and Taoism. Trans. by Roger Greaves. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969.
- Lao-Tse: Life and Work of the Forerunner in China*. Gambier, OH: Grail Foundation Press, 1996.
- McGreal, Ian, ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Latin American Council of Churches

The Latin American Council of Churches (Concilio Latinoamericano de Iglesias [CLAI]) is an ecumenical organization composed of Protestant-derived churches and movements that was established to promote unity among Christians of the continent. CLAI was officially founded in November 1982 in Huampani, Peru. Today, its headquarters are in Quito, Ecuador.

The ecumenical movement among Protestants in Latin America took shape in the 1960s with the formation of many action groups, networks, and study centers dealing with issues like social justice, popular education, and human rights. These action-oriented structures were generally set up by individuals, not by the churches. Some of these were organized at the regional level. Liberation Theology became an important source of inspiration for ecumenical action. Popular ecumenism was also expressed in “base communities” formed by Christians from different churches who sought a spiritual basis for their social commitment.

However, it took churches in Latin America to decide to create their own regional ecumenical organization. The idea of creating a regional ecumenical body was discussed at a large meeting of Protestant-derived churches four years earlier, in September 1978, at Oaxtepec, Mexico. The emphasis was on a council that would not run programs and projects on behalf of its members, but would accompany the churches and provide space for participation and solidarity. It was also decided that the new council would not deal with project funding. From the beginning, a decentralized model was adopted with secretariats in five sub-regions, in order to be closer to the churches in their daily life and context. The churches and movements that compose CLAI confess Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, according to the holy scriptures, and seek to fulfill their common calling and mission in unity, to the glory of God. Since 1978, CLAI has also become a focus point for the earlier ecumenical groups and networks.

Initially, CLAI attracted ecumenical Protestants from Spanish-speaking and Portuguese-speaking countries in Latin America whose denominations and service agencies were affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC). The specific purpose of CLAI was to promote evangelism as well as social change through its members, which initially included about 100 denominations and service agencies in Latin America. From its beginning, CLAI has depended financially on the WCC funding for its operations.

CLAI is a consultative and coordinating body that has no authority over its members in matters of doctrine, governance, practice, or worship. The main objectives of CLAI are to promote the unity of the people of God, to encourage and support its members in their task of announcing the gospel, and to promote theological and pastoral reflection and dialogue on the Christian mission and witness in the continent. Since 1978, the churches and groups that form CLAI have journeyed together with the intention to restore, in ways that are visible, and through concrete acts of witness and service, the unity they have found in Jesus Christ.

In the context of Latin America in the 1980s and 1990s, the churches affiliated with CLAI were inspired and motivated by the theme of hope and the building of a just and participatory society. CLAI has also focused on promoting peace in some of the conflict areas in the region, for example, in Colombia and Guatemala. The changes that came with the end of the Cold War prompted CLAI to reorganize and strengthen its institutional viability, to bring the organization closer to the member churches, and to widen its approach to churches that previously did not participate in the established ecumenical movement, in particular the Pentecostals.

In May 1980, approximately 650 worldwide “ecumenical Protestant” church leaders participated in a WCC-sponsored event in Melbourne, called the Tenth World Conference on Mission and Evangelism, which explored the place of the poor in the church’s worldwide mission. Liberation Theology influenced conference discussions by focusing on questions of power, thus connecting the work of the church with the need to end political and economic oppression. The conference also highlighted the life and work of Jesus Christ as exemplifying Christian solidarity with the poor.

The Conference on Mission and Evangelism and other WCC-sponsored activities are highly regarded by CLAI members, who seek to put the agenda defined in those gatherings into practice in the Latin American context.

In order to achieve its objectives, CLAI maintains specialized programs dealing with the issues of women and gender justice, youth, health, faith, economy and society, global environmental citizenship, liturgy, and communications. Its five sub-regional secretariats are Andean (Bolivia, Chile, Ecuador, Peru); Brazil; Caribbean and Greater Colombia (Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico, Venezuela); Central America (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua); and River Plate (Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay).

In recent years, CLAI has given much attention to the Pentecostal churches in Latin America (several of which are now among its member churches) and to the involvement of evangelicals and Pentecostals in society and in politics. Exchanges have been organized between Pentecostal churches and other churches from different countries, for example, between Brazil and Chile.

Another priority of CLAI has been dialogue with confessional families of churches present in the continent, and with its partner churches and organizations in North America and Europe.

As of January 2006, CLAI had a total of 170 full, fraternal, and associate member churches and parachurch organizations in 19 countries, representing about 4.4 million Christians.

Consejo Latinoamericano de Iglesias (CLAI)
Inglaterra N32-113 y Mariana de Jesús
Quito, Ecuador
<http://www.claiweb.org/>

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Latin American Evangelical Pentecostal Commission; Pentecostalism; Women, Status and Role of; World Council of Churches.

References

- Stoll, David. “The Evangelical Awakening in Latin America.” Chapter 5 in Is Latin America Turning Protestant? The Politics of Evangelical Growth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- WCC-CLAI website. <http://www.oikoumene.org/en/member-churches/regions/latin-america/latin-american-council-of-churches.html>.
- World Council of Churches (WCC) website. <http://www.oikoumene.org/en/member-churches/regions/latin-america.html>.

Latin American Evangelical Pentecostal Commission

The Latin American Evangelical Pentecostal Commission (Comisión Evangélica Pentecostal Lationamericana) is a product of the rapid expansion of Pentecostal churches in South and Central America and the Caribbean since World War II and especially since the emergence of the Charismatic movement in the 1960s. The Charismatic movement introduced the Pentecostal experience into the older mainline churches, especially the Roman Catholic Church. As of 2006, the numbers of Pentecostal believers (many of whom remain active in the older non-Pentecostal churches) have reached as high as 20 percent in some Latin American countries while developing a visible presence in countries such as Peru and Ecuador where Protestantism has traditionally been less successful.

As early as the 1970s, the issue of unity and cooperation among the numerous Pentecostal denominations was raised, and in 1971, an initial meeting between Latin American and North American Pentecostal leaders took place in Buenos Aires. Over the next decades a series of gatherings, more or less formal, occurred. The idea of forming a more permanent structure for such meetings was proposed in 1978 at a gathering of Protestant church leaders at Oaxtepec, Mexico. The World Council of Churches sponsored meetings of Latin American Pentecostal leaders in 1988, 1989, and 1990 at various South American locations. At the meeting in Santiago, Chile, in 1990, the decision was made to constitute the Latin American Evangelical Pentecostal Commission.

The Pentecostal movement, in part due to its rapid growth, was motivated to cooperate in the search for answers to some widespread questions, including the need for better educated clergy, the best use of modern media (radio and television especially), the status and role of women, and the importance of cooperative activity. The development of Pentecostal ecumenism immediately raised issues of the limits of ecumenical endeavors, including contacts with the Roman Catholic Church, non-Pentecostal evangelicals, and the member churches of the World Council of Churches.

The Commission has sponsored meetings at both the national and regional levels and has expanded beyond South America to include member churches in Central America and from various Caribbean Islands, most notably Cuba and Puerto Rico. South America has also become the one area from which Pentecostal churches have joined the World Council of Churches. In most parts of the world, Pentecostal bodies have considered the member churches of the World Council to be too liberal in belief and practice to allow for ecumenical contact.

As of 2006, the Commission included some 70 member denominations representing most South American and Central American countries, plus Mexico, Cuba and Puerto Rico. Five of these denominations are also members of the World Council of Churches. To some extent the Commission sees itself as a temporary body and has called for an even more inclusive and more permanent Council of Pentecostal Churches of Latin America and the Caribbean.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Pentecostalism; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

■ Latvia

Latvia is located in northeastern Europe on the east coast of the Baltic Sea. Its area is 24,937 square miles. Total national border length is 1,157 miles. Latvia is bordered by Estonia to the north, Russia to the east, Lithuania to the south, and the Baltic Sea to the west. Its strategic location has made it an international crossroad for trade, commerce, and cultural exchange since ancient times. Vikings followed the “Amber Road” through Latvian territory along the Daugava River to reach Byzantium and the Mediterranean Sea.

Religious life in contemporary Latvia is characterized by the coexistence of several equally strong Christian confessions. The Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Roman Catholic Church in Latvia, the Orthodox Church in Latvia, the Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations, the Union of Baptist Congregations, and the Latvian Conference of Seventh-day Adventists have all endured for several centuries.

LATVIA

Although the Latvian government has not officially enumerated which religions it recognizes as “traditional,” the Law on Religious Organizations prescribes that religion may be taught in public schools on a voluntary basis by representatives of the Evangelical Lutheran, Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Old Believer, Baptist, and Jewish religions only. Nontraditional denominations may provide religious education in private schools only.

The first information about Christianity in Latvia dates back to the 10th and 11th centuries, when Greek, Danish, and Slavonic missionaries tried to bring the Christian faith to the Baltic lands. In 1071 the first Christian church was built. German missionaries started their work in the 12th century, and around 1164 the monk Meinhard arrived in the land of the Livs. In 1186 Archbishop Hartwig of Bremen appointed Meinhard the first bishop of Livonia.

Nevertheless, progress in his mission was slow, and in 1198, two years after the death of Meinhard, Pope Celestine III (ca. 1106–1198) pronounced the First Crusade to Livonia. In 1199 Pope Innocent III (1161–1216) pronounced the Second Crusade to Livonia. Bishop Albert of Livonia and the Order of the Sword Brethren conquered the land and baptized the people by the middle of the 13th century. The Roman Catholic Church prevailed from the 13th until the 16th century, when Evangelical Lutheranism entered the region. The beginning of the Reformation in Livonia dates to 1517, when the first advocate of Reformation ideas in Livonia, Andrea Knöpken (1468–1539), arrived in Riga and started to preach in the Church of Saint Peter. In 1554 the Landtag of Valmiera (Wolmar) proclaimed the principle of freedom of faith in all Livonia, and in 1555 the representative of the Master of the Livonian Order signed the Treaty of Augsburg. Since then, the Lutheran Church has been the most influential Christian church in Latvia. Over the next several centuries, the Evangelical Lutheran Church melded with German rule of Latvia. A popular church, however, was born after the proclamation of the independent Republic of Latvia in 1918. In September 1919, the Provisional Regulations for the Evangelical Lutheran Consistories were issued. At the Church Council of 1922 in Riga, Karlis Irbe was elected the first bishop of the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church. According to the census of 1935, there were 1,075,641 Evangelical Lutherans in Latvia, out of a total population of 1,950,502. The Soviet occupation of 1940, the German occupation during World War II, and the ensuing years of the

St. Peter's Church in Riga, Latvia, is one of the best samples of Gothic architecture in the Baltics. (Andrey Grinyov/Dreamstime.com)

Soviet regime dramatically changed the religious situation in the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church. As a result of decades of religious suppression, in 2008 only 435,000 Latvian Evangelical Lutheran believers remained.

The Roman Catholic Church began its recovery from the Reformation in the city of Latgale and in several congregations in Kurzeme during the period of the Counter-Reformation, late in the 16th century. Poland established its authority in Latgale in 1580, and the Roman Catholic Church dominated there from that time on. In 1918, the Diocese of Riga was renewed. In August 1920 the first Latvian bishop, Antonijs Springovičs, was ordained, and two years later, a Concordat with the Holy See was signed. The separate province of the Roman Catholic Church consisted of two archdioceses, the Riga Archdiocese (from 1923) and the Liepāja Archdiocese (from 1937). According to the census of 1935, there were 476,963 Roman Catholics in Latvia. As of the beginning of 2008, the Roman Catholic Church in Latvia included the Riga Archdiocese and three dioceses—Liepāja, Rezekne-Aglona, and Jelgava. There were about 500,000 Roman Catholic believers. Since 1991 the highest office in the Roman Catholic Church of Latvia has been held by Cardinal Jānis Pujats. On February 21, 1998, he was made a cardinal in pectore by Pope John Paul II; his cardinalate was not publicly revealed until the consistory of February 21, 2001. He was one of the cardinal electors who participated in the 2005 papal conclave that selected Pope Benedict XVI.

The first information about the existence of Orthodox congregations in Latvia dates back to the 11th century. Until the Great Northern War (1700–1721), the Orthodox Church was repressed, but it grew measurably while the country was under the rule of the Russian Empire. In 1850 the Riga Diocese was established. In 1845, reacting to the difficult economic situation and responding to the appeal of Riga's Orthodox Bishop Filaret, the authorities began to force mass conversions of Latvian peasants from the Lutheran Church to the Orthodox Church. The effort culminated in 1846–1847, when the Lutheran Church lost around 113,000 participants. In 1935 there were 174,389 Orthodox believers. Today also in the Orthodox Church there are many converts from other religions and the number of Orthodox believers increased from 190,500 at the beginning of 2000 to 350,000 at the beginning of 2008.

The first groups of Old Believers appeared in Latvia in the second part of the 17th century. In 1659–1660, Old Believers emerged in Kurzeme (the Duchy of Kurland) and in Latgale near Daugavpils. The first Old Believers' church in Riga was built in 1760. Over the next decades, Daugavpils, Rezekne, Jekabpils, and Riga became the most significant centers for Old Believers, the majority of whom belong to the Pomorian, or the priestless, faction. There are around 2,287 Old Believers in Latvia today.

The Baptist movement appeared in Latvia at the end of the 19th century. In 1860–1861, the first congregations were established in Kurzeme, and in 1879

Latvia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,200,000	1,567,000	69.9	−0.09	1,614,000	1,468,000
Orthodox	564,000	839,000	37.4	−0.61	880,000	770,000
Roman Catholics	340,000	430,000	19.2	1.01	435,000	410,000
Protestants	373,000	295,000	13.2	0.04	330,000	310,000
Agnostics	736,000	549,000	24.5	−1.96	390,000	250,000
Atheists	394,000	110,000	4.9	−1.16	50,000	30,000
Jews	24,000	9,000	0.4	−1.11	8,000	8,000
Muslims	5,000	6,000	0.3	−0.66	8,000	9,000
Hindus	0	1,000	0.0	1.63	1,500	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	300	0.0	−0.64	500	600
Buddhists	0	120	0.0	−0.68	200	400
Total population	2,359,000	2,243,000	100.0	−0.66	2,072,000	1,768,000

Latvian Baptists formed the Union of Baptist Churches. As of the beginning of 2008, there were about 7,089 Baptists in Latvia. In 1896 the first congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church was created in Riga. There are around 4,000 Seventh-day Adventists in Latvia now. The Latvian Conference, first organized in 1920, is part of the Baltic Union Conference.

Like the above-mentioned Christian confessions, the Jewish community has also been accepted as a traditional denomination in Latvia. This once large community was virtually destroyed in the Holocaust during the 1941–1944 German occupation of Latvia and now totals only 6,000 persons from which only about 247 persons are active Judaists.

On June 8, 2008, the Agreements between the State and the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Orthodox Church in Latvia, the Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations, the Union of Baptist Congregations, the Latvian Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, the United Methodist Church in Latvia, and Riga Jewish Parish were signed. In 1990–2000, many new religions appeared in Latvia. There are now 2,434 active Jehovah’s Witnesses and about 800 active members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Charismatic Christian congregations such as Jauna Paaudze (the New Generation) and Prieka Vests (Message of Joy) claim more than 20,000 members, although precise figures are not available. Pentecostals and Methodists number about 6,000 each, and the New Apostolic Church of North Rhine-Westphalia has about 1,000 members. Muslims number about 334 active members, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness numbers about 500 active members, and Buddhists have about 100 active participants.

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Latvia, Paganism in; Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church; Lutheranism; New Apostolic Church; Old Believers (Russia); Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

Chernejs, Aleksandrs. Latvijas Pareizticiga Baznica. London: Community of St. John, 1996.

Krumina-Konkova, Solveiga, and Nikandrs Gills. “Die Lebendigkeit von Religion und Kirche im gegenwärtigen Lettland.” In Religiöser Wandel in den postkommunistischen Ländern Ost- und Mitteleuropas, edited by Detlef Pollack, Irena Borowik, and Wolfgang Jagodzinski, 429–477. Würzburg: Ergon Verlag, 1998.

Krumina-Konkova, Solveiga. “New Religious Minorities in the Baltic States.” In New Religious Movements in the 21st Century, edited by Phillip Charles Lucas and Thomas Robbins, 117–127. New York: Routledge, 2004.

Trups, Henrihs. Katolu Baznicas vesture. Riga: Avots, 1992.

Latvia, Paganism in Ancient Latvian religious beliefs and practice were a regional expression of the ancient Baltic religion practiced throughout the Baltic-speaking world by people speaking Old Prussian, Latvian, and Lithuanian. The highest figure in the ancient Latvian religious system was Dievs, the creator of order in the world and the judge and guardian of moral law who actively took part in the everyday life of farmers. Dievs also was the personification of the sky, similar to the Indian Dyaus and the Greek Zeus. Perkons, the Thunderer, Saule, the Sun, and Meness, the Moon, also occupied important places in the pantheon of Latvian gods. In Latvian religion the Earth was personified and called Zemes mate, the Earth Mother. Latvians also worshipped the forest divinity, Mezha mate, as well as the goddess of human destiny, Laima. Under the influence of Christian-Pagan syncretism, the Virgin Mary has assumed some of the functions of Zemes mate and is worshipped as the goddess Mara.

The most important source for the study of Latvian paganism is folklore, including dainas, or short quatrains, of which there are around 2 million, and numerous folktales. Latvian folk religion was largely pushed aside by Christianity, but in the 1920s Ernests Brastins initiated a Latvian national revival movement. He systematized the Latvian way of looking at the world, called Dievturība. Using the old Baltic form of the Latvian word tureti, Brastins coined the term “Dievturis” to name a person who keeps Dievs according to the ancient Latvian tradition. The Dievturi participate in three types of sacred events: rites of passage, seasonal feasts, and regular “praise meetings,” or glorification.

The Dievturi have been joined by another form of Paganism, the folklore movement, which started in the 1970s. The ancient worldview and the feelings maintained in Latvian folklore found new expressions here. Adherents of this movement devote most of their attention to singing. Because the several elderly members of the movement are the direct heirs of the oral folk traditions, a larger body of singers rightly call themselves the true exponents of ancient folk wisdom.

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

See also: Ethnoreligions; Wiccan Religion.

References

- Biezais, Haralds. Die Göttesgestalt der lettischen der Volksreligion. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1961.
- Biezais, Haralds. Die Hautgöttinnen der alten Letten. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1955.
- Biezais, Haralds. Die himmlische Götterfamilie der alten Letten. Uppsala, Sweden: Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 1972.
- Janis, Tupesu. “The Ancient Latvian Religion: Dievturība.” Lituanus 33, no. 3 (1987).

Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church

In the beginning of the 16th century the cities of Livonia—Riga, Dorpat, and Revel—were among the first cities in the world to adhere to the teachings of the Protestant Reformation. The first Riga leader of the Reformation, accepting it in 1521, was Andreas Knöppen (1468–1539) from Treptova; he was joined the next year by Sylvester Tegetmeyer from Vittenberg.

Participation in the Reformation by Latvians, as opposed to German-speaking residents of Latvia, occurred primarily in Riga, where almost one-third of the inhabitants were non-Germans. The Reformation became the catalyst for the development of a Latvian written language and book printing. The Bible was translated into Latvian by pastor Ernest Glück, and his edition was published between 1685 and 1694.

In 1628 King Gustavus II Adolfus (1594–1632) of Sweden captured Riga and moved on in 1629 to take control of the southern part of modern Estonia and the Latvian Vidzeme. In Vidzeme the rules of the Church of Sweden (Lutheran) came into force in 1686. The territory of Livonia Latgallia was under the administration of Poland/Lithuania from 1561 to 1772 and given the name Inflantia. During this period Roman Catholicism prevailed in Inflantia. Russia incorporated Vidzeme in 1721, Inflantia in 1772, and the Duchy of Courland and Zemgallia in 1795. In the middle of the 19th century, conversions from Lutheranism to Orthodoxy on a mass scale were forced upon the people of Vidzeme. There were 113,000 converts (12 percent of all Lutherans) in 1852 alone. A fresh wave of religious experience was brought to the country by the Herrutarian Brothers, who established the Latvian Church of Brothers, also known as the Moravian Church. The church organized and adopted its rule of order in 1727.

During the period before World War I, the Lutheran Church was divided into the provincial consistories of Vidzeme, Courland, and Riga (until 1890) with a general consistory in St. Petersburg (1832). The German Lutheran nobility of the Baltic provinces obtained special privileges from the Russian czars. In 1914 approximately two-thirds of the 120 Latvian congregations were under noble patronage. With the foundation of the Latvian state in 1918, the patronage was abolished in 1920 and the nobility's rights were transferred to the elected representatives of congregations. In February 1922 a newly formed synod elected Karlis Irbe as the first bishop of the independent Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church (LELC). He was succeeded by Teodors Grinbergs in 1932.

According to census data, the Lutheran Church embraced 55.15 percent of the Latvian population in 1935. However, at the end of World War II, 131 Lutheran pastors (55 percent) left Latvia to continue their religious mission elsewhere, even as the church in Latvia was being subjected to efforts by the Soviet regime to make it a loyal servant. In the late 1980s and early 1990s the church was one of the first institutions to enjoy spiritual and political freedom. Since 1993 the archbishop of Riga and Latvia has been Janis Vanags. Under his leadership, the LELC has again become an influential ecclesiastical body in the country. In June 2008, the new constitution (Satversme) of the LELC was passed and two new bishops, Einars Alpe and Pavils Brūvers, were elected to the dioceses of Daugavpils and Liepāja, respectively. The largest of the dioceses, Riga's Archdiocese, will be under the supervision of the LELC archbishop, Janis Vanags, who will also continue to be the church's overseeing bishop. In accordance with the new constitution of the LELC the Collegium of bishops was also established. In 1988 LELC had reported 206 congregations. By 1996 that number had increased to 294, with 324,280 members. In 1999 the church experienced a schism when some 400 members who adhered to a conservative interpretation of the Augsburg Confession established the Confessional Lutheran Church. There were about 435,000 Latvian Evangelical Lutheran believers at the beginning of 2008.

Solveiga Krumina-Konkova and Nikandrs Gills

See also: Lutheranism; Moravian Church, European Continental Province of the.

References

- Adamovics, Ludvigs. Dzimtenes baznīcas vesture. Riga, 1927.
- Gills, Nikandrs, and Solveiga Krumina-Konkova. The Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church at the Threshold of Year 2000. Religion, State & Society Series, vol. 27, no. 2. Oxford: Keston Institute, 1999.
- Kiploks, Edgars. Evangeliski-luteriskas baznīcas sakumi un nostiprināšanas Latvija. Ticības speka. Lincoln, NB: LELBA, 1983.
- Mesters Eriks. Latvijas evangeliski luteriskas Baznīcas vesture 1944–1990. Riga: Klints, 2005.
- Talonen, Jouko. Church under the Pressure of Stalinism. Rovaniemi, Finland: Historical Society of Northern Finland, 1997.

Lausanne Movement

The Lausanne movement (sometimes called simply Lausanne by participants) is a worldwide movement that mobilizes evangelical leaders to collaborate for world evangelization. It takes its name from Lausanne, Switzerland, the site of the first International Congress on World Evangelization in July 1974. Out of the Congress came both the Lausanne Covenant—a summary statement of evangelical beliefs, particularly those related to missions and evangelism—and the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization, which provides leadership for the movement. The Lausanne movement, however, is one of voluntary cooperation and intentionally has avoided developing a large organizational structure.

Although the International Congress on World Evangelization (ICOWE, later Lausanne I) generally is considered the birthplace of the Lausanne movement, many within the movement also see it as the successor to the world missionary conferences of the late 19th century, and particularly to the 1910 World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh, Scotland. There is, however, some irony in linking Lausanne and Edinburgh: the latter catalyzed not only a century of evangelistic and missionary activity, but also the modern ecumenical movement. Whether consciously or unconsciously, reaction against the ecumenical movement in general—and specifically against the World Council of Churches, successor to Edinburgh's Continuation Committee—played a role in the establishment of the Lausanne movement.

Billy Graham is regarded as America's foremost modern-day evangelist, having devoted most of his life to spreading the Christian message throughout the United States and the rest of the world. (Shutterstock)

More directly, the Lausanne movement grew out of the social and political turmoil of the 1960s. In response, the American evangelist Billy Graham (b. 1918) wanted to encourage evangelicals from around the world to unite in global evangelism. Funded largely by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, and with the co-sponsorship of the American magazine Christianity Today and its editor Carl F. H. Henry (1913–2003), the World Congress on Evangelism (WCE) convened in Berlin, West Germany, in October 1966. Though led and funded largely by Americans, the WCE gathered more than 1,200 participants from 100 countries and offered attendees stories of how the Christian faith was spreading in the non-Western world.

Following the WCE, Graham began to sense a need for a larger conference that would go beyond encouraging global evangelization to actively strategizing about it. Nearly 200 evangelical leaders worldwide agreed when asked by Graham whether they saw a need for such a conference and would be willing to work toward it. The result was the ICOWE, which drew 2,700 delegates from 150 countries, the majority of them from the Global South. When guests, observers, and media representatives were included, the total attendance was around 4,000. Time magazine called it “possibly the widest-ranging meeting of Christians ever held.”

The impacts of the ICOWE upon evangelical missions and evangelistic efforts, as well as upon evangelicalism in general, were many and far-reaching. Presentations by Ralph D. Winter (1924–2009) and Donald McGavran (1897–1990) of Fuller Theological Seminary’s School of World Mission introduced many attendees to the idea of “unreached people groups” for the first time. As a result, over the following decades the missionary-sending strategies of most evangelical missions agencies, and countless churches, shifted from an emphasis on countries to a focus on people groups. The ICOWE also marked a shift by Western evangelicals from viewing those in the Global South as targets of evangelism to seeing them as full partners in evangelism.

Most significant, the ICOWE produced the Lausanne Covenant, a 15-point statement on evangelization affirming that salvation is found through Jesus Christ alone and that the Bible is divinely inspired, truthful, and authoritative. The Lausanne Covenant also acknowledged, among other things, that every culture has value (while repenting of the conflation of gospel and Western culture that often had characterized evangelical missions); that evangelism should be holistic, encompassing the pursuit of both social justice and spiritual transformation without confusing the two; that cooperation among Christians of many traditions, as well as between North and South, is imperative for the task of global evangelization; and that the power of the Holy Spirit is crucial for the work of evangelism, which involves engaging in spiritual warfare. Many churches and organizations subsequently adopted the Lausanne Covenant as a statement of belief.

Yet for all the successes of the ICOWE, the gathering also served to highlight, and even magnify, the differences in culture, theology, and worldview among evangelicals. The Lausanne Covenant’s statement “Although reconciliation with man is not reconciliation with God, nor is social action evangelism, nor is political liberation salvation, nevertheless we affirm that evangelism and socio-political involvement are both part of our Christian duty” is particularly instructive here. One area of disagreement has been between those, frequently North Americans, who emphasize the “although” portion of the statement and those (often, but not exclusively, non-Western) who prioritize the “nevertheless” clause. Indeed, many attendees were so unhappy with the Lausanne Covenant that they did not sign it, and even some who did sign articulated criticisms of it, either immediately or over the following years.

For the most part, however, participants expressed a desire for ongoing communication even before the ICOWE had adjourned. The result was the Lausanne Continuation Committee, which met for the first time in January 1975 and renamed itself the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization (LCWE). Not surprisingly, given the differences of opinion among ICOWE attendees on what constituted “world evangelization,” one of the main issues facing the new LCWE was the extent of its mandate: was it limited to evangelism only, or did it extend to other areas addressed in the Lausanne Covenant? In response, the leaders ultimately chose both, stating that the LCWE’s purpose was “to further the total biblical mission of the church, recognizing that in this mission of sacrificial service, evangelism is primary.” Working groups—originally four, now expanded to eight—were formed the following year to address the various components of the LCWE’s mandate. In addition, the Lausanne movement currently includes numerous special interest committees to aid in coordinating the efforts of denominations, ministries, and networks in specialized areas of evangelization (such as among Jews or international students), as well as senior associates who work to address specific issues of importance (such as diaspora populations and evangelism training).

From this desire to see the work begun in Lausanne continue has come a series of consultations, the first of which was held in 1977. Sponsored by one or more of the working groups, consultations convene to address specific issues raised by a Lausanne Congress or the Lausanne Covenant, with the resultant findings usually issued as a Lausanne Occasional Paper. The large Consultation on World Evangelization (COWE) held in Pattaya, Thailand, in 1980 was organized as a collection of 17 mini-consultations, each designed to address how to evangelize a specific religious, socio-economic, or ideological group. The COWE produced both the Thailand Statement, issued by the consultation as a whole, and a series of occasional papers from each mini-consultation. Enthusiasm among participants in some mini-consultations was so high that they formed ongoing task forces, such as the Lausanne Consultation on Jewish Evangelism.

In the wake of the 1980 COWE, plans were begun for a second International Congress on World Evangelization (Lausanne II). Convened in Manila in July 1989, Lausanne II differed from the first ICOWE in several ways. It was sponsored not by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association but by the LCWE, and was funded by a wide variety of churches, organizations, and individuals. It was larger and featured participants from more than 170 countries, including many with Communist or Socialist governments. More women, laypeople, and younger leaders were present than at Lausanne I.

In many ways, however, Lausanne II also marked a crisis point for the movement. It was criticized as having an over-representation of leaders from the Global North on the program platform, while many of the Southern leaders at Lausanne I were absent. There was tension over the presence and role of Pentecostal and charismatic evangelicals, who enjoyed a prominence, in presentations as well as attendance, that some saw as overshadowing “traditional” evangelicals. Still others objected that Roman Catholics had been invited to participate. The Manila Manifesto, issued as an elaboration upon the Lausanne Covenant, seemed to lack the impact that its predecessor had wielded. The Lausanne movement also experienced financial difficulties in the aftermath of the Manila Congress, adding to the strain. Finally, the AD2000 and Beyond movement, which received a large boost in Manila, seemed in the 1990s to flourish at the expense of the Lausanne movement.

Thus, the 30th anniversary of Lausanne I in 2004 brought not a third ICOWE, as might have been expected, but the Forum for World Evangelization. Like the 1980 COWE, it was held in Pattaya and consisted of mini-consultations, this time centered on the challenges facing the church in the 21st century. A third ICOWE is planned, however, for Cape Town in October 2010, to address evangelization in light of such challenges as postmodernism and pluralism; an increase in religious fundamentalism of all types; attacks on Christians and Christianity by secular intellectuals and the media; the shift of Christianity’s center to the non-Western world; and globalization, particularly as it is manifested through increased urbanization and migration of populations.

The LCWE’s stated goal is that Cape Town’s expected 4,000 participants from 200 countries represent the church’s current cultural, theological, and demographic diversity. Most (nearly 70 percent) are to come from outside Europe and North America. Half will be under age 50, and at least one-third will be women. Ten percent are to be from non-church vocations, including business, government, education, medicine, and the media. In addition, the LCWE is encouraging people worldwide to participate via electronic media such as online discussion groups, chat rooms, and streaming audio and video.

The Lausanne movement can be contacted through its Internet site, <http://www.lausanne.org>.

Albert W. Hickman

See also: Charismatic Movement; Evangelicalism; Fundamentalism; Globalization, Religion and; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Chapman, Alistair. “Evangelical International Relations in the Post-Colonial World: The Lausanne Movement and the Challenge of Diversity, 1974–89.” Missiology 37, no. 3 (July 2009): 355–368.
- Douglas, J. D. ed. Let the Earth Hear His Voice. Minneapolis, MN: World Wide Publications, 1975.
- Douglas, J. D., ed. Proclaim Christ Until He Comes: Calling the Whole Church to Take the Whole Gospel to the Whole World. Minneapolis, MN: World Wide Publications, 1990.
- Stott, John. “Twenty Years after Lausanne: Some Personal Reflections.” International Bulletin of Missionary Research 19, no. 2 (April 1995): 51–56.
- Stott, John, ed. Making Christ Known: Historic Mission Documents from the Lausanne Movement, 1974–1989. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1997.

Leade, Jane

1624–1704

Jane Leade, a blind, elderly widow, became the leader of a Protestant non-Conformist group in London, known as the Philadelphian Society. Named after the sixth of the seven churches in Asia mentioned in Revelation (1:4; 3:7), they believed in the imminence of the millennium and the concept of universal salvation. Leade, a mystic and prophetess, drew on visions of Wisdom, or Sophia, and wrote at least 15 books and treatises, including a spiritual diary entitled A Fountain of Gardens that spans 16 years and is nearly 2,500 pages long. Remarkably, nearly all her works were translated into German and Dutch and published during her lifetime.

Jane Leade (nee Warde) was born in 1624 into a gentry family in Letheringsett, Norfolk, England. She wrote that during the family's Christmas celebrations in 1640, in her 16th year, and without any warning, she heard a voice saying, "CEASE FROM THIS, I HAVE ANOTHER DANCE TO LEAD THEE IN; FOR THIS IS VANITY." This sudden conversion experience plunged her into a spiritual turmoil and "nothing was able to give her any satisfaction or rest, or to ease her wounded spirit . . . which continued for the space of three years with very great anguish and trouble." It was then that she was determined to become a "Bride of Christ." She, however, married a cousin, William Leade, whom she described as "pious and godfearing," and they lived in London for 25 years and had 4 daughters (Lead, Wars of David, 16).

In April 1670, two months after the death of her husband, Leade started to receive a series of visions of Wisdom, or Sophia, whom she witnessed as "an overshadowing bright Cloud and in the midst of it a Woman." Three days later it gently commanded "Behold me as thy Mother," and six days after came the promise, "I shall now cease to appear in a Visible Figure unto thee, but I will not fail to transfigure my self in thy mind; and there open the Spring of Wisdom and Understanding" (Lead, Fountain, vol. 1, 18–21). The vision signaled the beginning of a spiritual relationship with Wisdom that lasted throughout Leade's life.

There was a significant turning point in 1674 when Leade met Dr. John Pordage (1607–1681), who introduced her to the writings of the German mystic Jacob Boehme (1575–1624). Influenced by Boehme's complex ideas, including alchemy, magic, Hermeticism, Gnosticism, and the Kabbalah, Leade believed in the Trinitarian model of the Godhead, though, unusually with Wisdom as an integral part—as a mirror of the Godhead. Leade moved into Pordage's household as his spiritual partner and "mate," where they shared Behmenist ideas and their mystical experiences. In the year of Pordage's death 1681, Leade published her first treatise entitled A Heavenly Cloud Now Breaking and she also took over Pordage's group of followers.

Leade's first publication aroused the curiosity of Dr. Francis Lee, a physician, who traveled from Leiden to meet her. He eventually married her widowed daughter, Barbara Walton. He regarded Leade as his "spiritual mother" and when Leade started to go blind, Lee acted as her amanuensis and editor. As she became known from her published writings, interest grew at home and additional Philadelphian groups were formed in Europe. Leade, however, eventually departed from the Behmenist tradition when she upheld the doctrine of apocatastasis, or universal salvation, and promoted the authority of her own revelations that she deemed were from God.

Leade was a millenarian who departed from a cataclysmic portrayal of the apocalypse, believing instead in spiritual regeneration, a quiet revolution that would occur inwardly. Through her emphasis on the spirit, Leade envisioned a future for all through God's love and through personal revelation. She influenced the 18th century cleric, William Law (1686–1761), who wrote A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729)—one of the central spiritual texts of the 18th century. Leade's millenarian expectations were unusual in that she envisioned the future in a highly gendered way. In common with many people in the 17th century, Leade believed that the Second Coming of Christ was imminent, though her millenarian hopes unusually centered as much on Wisdom's, or Sophia's, return as on Christ's.

In 1704 Leade died. Her epitaph in the non-Conformist cemetery at Bunhill Fields in London reads, "Exuvias Carnis hic deposuit Venerabilis Ancilla Domini JANE LEAD, anno Peregrinationis suae lxxxii" (Here the Venerable Handmaid of the Lord, Jane Lead, has shed the outer garments of her flesh, in the year of her departure [from life], 80).

Julie Hirst

See also: Western Esoteric Traditions.

References

- Gibbons, B. J. Gender in Mystical and Occult Thought: Behmenism and its Development in England. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Hirst, Julie. Jane Leade: A Biography of a Seventeenth-Century Mystic. Hants: Ashgate, 2005.
- Leade, Jane. A Fountain of Gardens. 3 vols. London: P. J. Louthembourg, 1696.
- Leade, Jane. A Heavenly Cloud Now Breaking. London: privately printed, 1681.
- Leade, Jane. Wars of David. London: P. J. Louthembourg, 1700.

■ Lebanon

Lebanon lies on the eastern edge of the Mediterranean Sea, between Israel and Syria, which bounds both its northern and eastern borders. Its 3.8 million people (2004) are overwhelmingly of Arab descent.

Lebanon's ancient and sometimes tumultuous history goes back to the beginnings of civilization. Phoenicians were among the earliest inhabitants of the land, migrating from the Arabian Peninsula about 3500 BCE. Major Phoenician hubs were Baalbek (named for the Canaanite storm god, Baal, who competed for devotees with the Israelite god, Yahweh), Beirut, Byblos, Tyre, and Sidon. The Phoenicians were noted for shipbuilding, and their alphabet also spread throughout the area.

Modern Lebanon was formerly a region that, like Israel, Jordan, and contemporary Syria, was once encompassed by greater Syria. Pompey the Great (106–48 BCE) assumed governorship of the region in 64 BCE and annexed it to the Syrian province, making it part of the Roman Empire. Aramaic replaced the Phoenician language, and Christianity became the primary religion by the fourth century CE.

Christianity spread in the region from Antioch, and the metropolitan of Antioch became one of the most revered leaders in the Eastern church, along with the metropolitans of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Constantinople. The Council of Chalcedon (451) established Antioch's patriarchal status while delineating the bounds of its territory, sandwiched in between Constantinople and Jerusalem. The Council also issued a statement about the nature of Christ as fully God and fully man, which was considered the orthodox position on the subject by most Christians. However, in the territory of the Antiochean church there were dissenters, called Monophysites, who rejected the Chalcedonian position and formed the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar. The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East remains the oldest of the Christian bodies in the region but has lost its position of hegemony in the Christian community, as it has been the major source from which each new movement in the region has gathered its members.

Islam took root in Lebanon in the seventh century. The two most important Islamic groups are the Sunnis and the Shiites. The Sunnis claim they are the only true followers of the faith, believing among other things that the leader of Islam should always be elected, rather than having the title conferred by heredity. Until 1959 they refused to accept the Shia as Muslims because they followed a hereditary caliphate. In the eighth century a minority group of Shiites, the Ismailis, created another division in the Islamic community. The split occurred over who should succeed Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 165 CE) as the next imam, the leader of the Shia community. The new imam had to be an heir of Muhammad through his son-in-law. However, the next imam Ismail al-Mubarakhad (d. 760) had already passed away. The Ismailis chose to continue the lineage of imams through Ismail and selected one of his sons to lead them. In contrast, the majority of Shiites selected Musa al-Kazem, the younger brother of Ismail, as the legitimate heir. The Shiites continued the lineage until the 12th imam, a child, Muhammad al-Mahdi, disappeared mysteriously in 874.

Many Ismailis (called Fatimids after Ali's wife, and Muhammad's daughter, Fatima) settled in southern Lebanon around the Arameans. Their views influenced the Persians and Arabs of the desert, and their presence laid the groundwork for the rise of popular Islam in Lebanon. Shia and Ismaili leaders, who taught that Ali and his descendants were incarnations of God, contrasted sharply with Sunni perspective and its practices of consensus, by which religious leaders are appointed, not necessarily through blood kinship with the Prophet Muhammad.

Young Druze man with pistol and sheathed sword from Mont Liban, Lebanon, ca. 1889. (Library of Congress)

Into this situation, another movement arose in the 11th century. A prophet named Muhammad ibn Isma'il ad-Darazi (d. ca. 1019) taught a new doctrine called Durzi, or Druze. He believed the Fatimid leader al-Hakim (996–1021), who suddenly disappeared in 1021, to be divine and awaited his return. Druzism emerged as an esoteric religion of secrecy. Those chosen to have access to the holy scripture abstain from wine, tobacco, and abusive language and observe monogamous marriages. The religion spread northward and converted several significant nomadic Arab tribes and some of the Sabeans who practiced a Gnostic form of Christianity. Today, the Druzes number about 500,000. Their religious practice is simple, based on five commandments: sincerity, devotion to one another, decrying Paganism, never interacting with the devil, and belief in the unity of al-Hakim.

The Alawis, also called the Nusayris, have a small presence in Lebanon. It is highly probable they took their name from Muhammad ibn Nusayr (d. 868), a noted figure in Basra who in 859 declared himself the 10th imam. A Pagan and Christian substratum underlies this eclectic form of Islam. The Alawis have some religious characteristics that are similar to those of the Ismailis. Their festivals include Christmas and Epiphany, as well as the Muslim feasts of Adha and Ashura and the Persian Nawruz.

In 1516 Ottoman Turks took military control of the entire Mediterranean coast, including the area now called Lebanon. For the next 300 years local leaders operated in relative autonomy and developed religious and economic ties with Europe. In 1831 Muhammad 'Ali Pasha of Egypt (1769–1849) extended his domain northward, encroaching on the debilitated Turkish Ottoman Empire. The Turks, ruling from afar, were prompted to first set up a Christian-based government and then allowed France to step in to protect the Maronite Christians.

When the Ottoman Empire crumbled after World War I, the French declared Lebanon and Syria protectorates, dividing them into two provinces for administrative reasons. Today, the two countries remain separate. However, it was not until 1991 that Syria signed a formal agreement recognizing Lebanon as an independent country, and to this day Syria keeps 20,000 military troops garrisoned there because of the threat of invasion by Israel.

Lebanon became independent in 1943, by which time the groundwork for an unusual system of government had been laid. Lebanon practices a confessional form of government in which representation is based on religious affiliation. According to the National Pact, an unwritten agreement that reflects the country's confessionalism, the president must be a Maronite Christian, the prime minister a Sunni Muslim, the speaker of the Parliament a Shiite Muslim, and the armed forces chief of staff a Druze. The census report from 1932 was used to establish the apportionment of government offices. At the time of Lebanon's independence, there were more Christians than Muslims. Today, 70 percent of Lebanese are Muslim and 30 percent are Christian. Under the 1991 Ta'if Accord, Muslims were given a more equitable representation in the legislature.

In Lebanon, all citizens carry a national identity card encoded with their religion. The government recognizes 5 Muslim sects (Shia, Sunni, Druze, Ismailite, and Alawite), 11 Christian traditions (4 Orthodox, 6 Catholic, and 1 Protestant), as well as Judaism. Religious affiliation defines how Lebanese citizens follow laws for marriage, divorce, adoption, and inheritance. While carrying certain benefits, this system has made it difficult to establish a nationalist or secular unification. Today, Lebanon is a republic with a president, a cabinet, and a unicameral National Assembly.

Lebanon struggled through civil wars during the late 1970s and 1980s. Although it was once considered (along with Iran) to be among the most modern and Western-oriented countries in the region, this turmoil eroded Lebanon's stability. Problems began when a new census was not conducted even though the Muslim segment of the population had grown considerably. Then in the 1970s, a charismatic leader from Iran, Imam Musa Sadr (1928–ca. 1978), revitalized and mobilized the Lebanese Shiite community. He founded the Movement of the Disinherited in 1974, leading to the formation of AMAL (Afwaj al-Muqawamah al-Lubnaniyyah), a socio-political network, and a militia force to protect Shiites.

Over the next decade, five events transformed Lebanon: the Lebanese Civil War of 1975, the disappearance of Musa Sadr in 1978 while visiting Muammar Qaddafi in Libya, the Iranian Revolution of 1978–1979, and the two Israeli invasions in 1978 and 1982. Some Shiites nurtured the idea that Musa Sadr was the “Imam of the Disinherited” and the occultation of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. The Israeli invasions impelled the Shiite community to protect itself.

In the 1980s Iran supported AMAL and two other groups, Hizbullah and the Islamic Jihad, all centered on Baalbek, a Shiite community in the Bezaa Valley. AMAL was rejected by some who saw it as too secular. Hizbullah, the Party of God, looked for an Islamic republic and felt empowered by the Koran (58:19–20) to fight against the party of Satan. Hizbullah argued that Western countries wished to banish the Koran, an idea that mobilized frightened Shiite clerics. Hizbullah emerged as an umbrella organization for a number of groups.

Although Lebanon remained neutral in the 1973 Arab-Israeli War, it did grant asylum to 300,000 Palestinians, mostly in the southern area. The refugee camps were makeshift and frequently the site of military action by both Israel and Lebanon. In June 1982, Israeli troops overran Lebanon and took over the Center for Palestinian Studies, administered by the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). The PLO then agreed to leave Beirut under international supervision. On August 23, 1982, a wobbly Lebanese Congress selected Bashir Gemayel (1947–1982) to succeed President Elias Sarkis (1924–1982); however, the Maronite leader was assassinated in a dynamite attack before taking office. In 1988 pro-Israeli Maronite General Michel Aoun assumed the presidency, with Selim al-Hoss, a Muslim, as prime minister. On November 5, 1989, Rene Moawad (1925–1989), a Maronite Christian sympathetic to Muslim issues, was elected president, but like Gemayel he was assassinated before taking office. Aoun, lacking international support, entered self-exile in France.

In December 1990, the National Pact was nullified, and various government and military positions were parceled out to the various groupings (Sunni, Shia, Druze, AMAL, and so on) in accordance with a 6:5

ratio of Christians to Muslims. In April 1992, a new 24-member cabinet was formed, half of whom were Christian and the other half Muslim. Today, the population is about 75 percent Muslim, with the Sunni closely challenged by the Shiites, who are growing in numbers.

The Christian community is historically centered in the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate under the leadership of the patriarch of Antioch and the East, who is selected from the graduates of Maronite College in Rome. The Patriarchate is based in Damascus, Syria, with Lebanese dioceses in Aleppo, al-Hadath, Beirut, Marj Uyun, Tripoli, Tyre, Sidon, and Zahle. As the new century began, there were 300,000 Greek Orthodox in Lebanon (approximately 10 percent of the population).

As Muslims conquered the region in the seventh century, the Maronites, an indigenous Christian sect of uncertain origin, sought refuge in the Lebanese mountains. The words maron or marun in Syriac mean “small lord.” Several theories trace them to John Maron, a fourth- or fifth-century monk, or to Maron of Antioch in the seventh century. In the seventh century, the Maronites separated themselves from the Patriarchate and elected their own bishop while remaining Orthodox in faith and practice. Although the Maronites had originally established ties with the Roman Catholic Church in 1182, they dissolved the relationship in the 16th century. When they re-established contact, it was with the understanding that they would retain the Aramaic, Arabic, and Karshuni (Old Syriac) script for their liturgy. During the Ottoman era (1516–1914), they remained isolated until 1857, when they revolted against the landed gentry, particularly the Druze, insisting on safe passage, political representation, and land ownership.

Today, the Maronite Catholic Church is the largest Christian group in Lebanon. Historically, Maronites have been country dwellers much like the Druze, but they are now scattered throughout the country, with the highest population in the Mount Lebanon area. The Maronites have traditionally dominated the upper socio-economic class. Prior to the civil war, they held 20 percent of the major political posts in Lebanon.

The Greek or Melkite Catholic Church forms the second largest Eastern rite community in Lebanon.

The Melkites split from the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate in the early 18th century and aligned with the Vatican, though continuing to use the Byzantine Greek rite and the Arabic language. The highest official of the church is the patriarch of Antioch, who lives near Beirut. He is elected by bishops in a synod and approved by the pope, who gives him a pallium. Greek Catholics permit icons in their churches but not statues. Most Greek Catholics in Lebanon live in Beirut and the central and eastern parts of the country. Their educational level is higher than that of most of the population, and they are proud of their Arab heritage. They make up approximately 3 percent of the population and as of 1986 numbered about 72,000 people.

The Syrian Catholic Church developed throughout the 17th century in response to successful missionary activity by the Roman Catholic Church among Syrian Orthodox faithful in Syria. Today it is based in Lebanon, and the patriarch resides in Beirut. There were times of conflict within the church over its closeness with the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch. The Syrian Orthodox did not accept the orthodox teachings concerning the nature of Christ. Instead, they were Monophysites (sometimes called Jacobites after their early leader, Jacobus Baradaeus [490–578]), who believed Jesus had only a divine nature. The Syrian Catholics, on the other hand, accepted the humanity of Jesus as described in the Catholic creeds.

The Syrian Catholic Church can be said to have begun in 1662, when those Syrians who accepted the Syrian-Antiochene Creed and were oriented to the papacy elected Andrew Akhidjan head of the Syrian Orthodox Church. After his death, the Orthodox and Catholic factions drew farther apart. During the 18th century, Syrian Catholics went underground because the Ottoman Empire favored the Orthodox. Then in 1782, the Syrian Orthodox patriarch declared his allegiance to Rome and fled to Lebanon. The Our Lady of Sharfeh Monastery was founded, and a new line of Syrian Catholic patriarchs was established. In 1885 the Ottoman Empire granted recognition to the Syrian Catholics, and in 1850 the church headquarters were moved to Mardin in southeast Turkey. The church expanded rapidly throughout the region, but due to the massacre of Syrians in World War I, many fled to Lebanon. The current patriarch, Ignasius Musa I Daud, is spiritual leader to 100,000 Syrian Catholics, mostly living in Lebanon, Syria, and Egypt. Worship is conducted in Syrian although most members speak Arabic. The Syrian Orthodox Church has dwindled today to less than 15,000 members.

The Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East oversees a small number of Protestants in Lebanon. Their origins can be traced to the late 18th century, when Anglican missionaries traveled the Middle East and North Africa. Permanent work began with Joseph Wolff of the London Churches Ministry. In 1820 he began evangelizing among the Jewish people in the region, and an Anglican bishop was placed in Jerusalem in 1840, from which an Anglican presence throughout the Middle East developed. In 1957 the Diocese of Jerusalem was elevated to an archdiocese, and a separate diocese was created for Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan. That diocese merged into the Diocese of Jerusalem when the present Episcopal Church was formed in 1976.

The National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon is a Protestant organization now based in Antelias, Lebanon, with about 4,000 members worldwide. Its history dates back to 1870, when the American Congregationalists turned over their missions to the American Presbyterians. Today it is autonomous. The Reformed Church in America has been working in former Ottoman territory since the 1840s; however, it does not have a large presence, choosing instead to work with other allied groups.

The first Protestant congregation to be recognized by the Ottoman authorities was founded by missionaries sent out by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which had been established in 1823 in Beirut. In 1886 Dr. Daniel Bliss, a Congregational missionary, founded the Syrian Protestant College, which in 1920 became the American University of Beirut. The university's charter reflects its ecumenical ideology, and its educational standards are benchmarks for other universities in the Middle East. (The United States, Great Britain, France, Denmark, and several other countries have dispatched missionaries to Lebanon. After World War I and the demise of the Ottoman Empire two churches were created. The National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon came together from several small congregations that unified.)

Lebanon

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	874,000	2,542,000	60.1	1.50	2,982,000	3,258,000
Christians	1,516,000	1,414,000	33.5	0.76	1,434,000	1,501,000
Roman Catholics	1,089,000	1,150,000	27.2	0.06	1,200,000	1,250,000
Orthodox	357,000	340,000	8.0	-1.28	320,000	300,000
Independents	10,500	23,500	0.6	1.68	35,000	50,000
Agnostics	37,000	144,000	3.4	0.79	200,000	250,000
Buddhists	0	88,000	2.1	2.14	100,000	120,000
Atheists	12,000	33,000	0.8	1.47	60,000	80,000
Baha'is	1,000	3,700	0.1	1.53	6,000	10,000
Jews	3,000	100	0.1	1.23	2,000	2,000
Total population	2,443,000	4,227,000	100.0	1.23	4,784,000	5,221,000

The Southern Baptist Convention began work in Lebanon in 1921 but did not send missionaries as permanent residents until 1948. The Lebanese Baptist Convention has approximately 450 members. The Near East School of Theology, an ecumenical institution near the American University in Beirut, is supported by the United Church of Christ and the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

The Near East Council is an ecumenical group of churches that dates from 1928. It has two regional councils, the Egypt Intermission Council and United Christian Council of Southeast Asia (Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria). Since 1948 this group has been engaged in helping the Palestinian refugees while serving parishioners throughout the Mediterranean area. Their finances generally come through the World Council of Churches and Church World Service.

Armenians have had a presence in Lebanon for centuries. The main group is a part of the Armenian Apostolic Church, attached to the Catholics of the House of Cilicia, established in 1441. Their number in Lebanon was significantly swelled by refugees from the massacres of Armenians that occurred in Turkey in 1915–1920 (after which many Armenians fled the region altogether), and now Lebanese Armenians number some 175,000. Beginning with the Crusades, Catholic missionaries began to proselytize Armenians, and a few congregations emerged from this work. In 1742 Abraham Ardzivian (1679–1749), an Armenian bishop, converted to Roman Catholicism and organized the Armenian Catholic Church. Pope Benedict XIV (1675– 1758) named Ardzivian as the Armenian patriarch. He renamed himself Abraham Pierre I, and Pierre has become a traditional name for the Armenian patriarchs to choose. Under Ottoman rule, Armenian Catholics were subject to persecution because the Ottoman Caliphate wished to relate only to the Armenian Apostolic Church, whose patriarch was headquartered under their control in Constantinople. In 1829 the Armenian Catholic Church was finally recognized officially, and their patriarch moved to Constantinople. In 1928, the patriarch relocated to Beirut, Lebanon, where the church is still based. Today, the Armenian Catholic Church remains in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church.

The Jewish community in Lebanon dates to ancient times, much of its history being recorded in the Jewish Bible, known to Christians as the Old Testament. In the mid-1950s, some 7,000 Jews resided in Beirut, but the majority left during the fighting of 1967. Then the 1975–1976 civil war was conducted around the remaining Jewish neighborhoods, and about 1,800 people left at that time. Today fewer than 100 Jews remain in Lebanon.

Among the Arab population in Lebanon, about 12 to 15 percent are Palestinians who abide in makeshift refugee camps. Their plight is uncertain because they are stateless.

Gail M. Harley and J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Armenian Apostolic Church (See of the Great House of Cilicia); Armenian Catholic Church; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Ismaili Islam; Maronite Catholic Church; Melkite Catholic Church; National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon; Presbyterian Church (USA); Reformed Church in America; Roman Catholic Church; Southern Baptist Convention; Syrian Catholic Church; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; United Church of Christ; World Council of Churches.

References

- Chamie, J. "Religious Groups in Lebanon: A Descriptive Investigation." International Journal of Middle East Studies 11 (1980): 175–187.
- Deeb, Laura. An Enchanted Modern: Gender and Public Piety in Shi'i Lebanon. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2006.
- Deeb, M. "Shi'a Movements in Lebanon: Their Formation, Ideology, Social Basis, and Links with Iran and Syria." Third World Quarterly 10, no. 2 (1988): 683–698.
- Esposito, John L. The Straight Path. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Grafton, David. The Christians of Lebanon: Political Rights in Islamic Law. London: Tauris Academic Studies, 2004.
- Khairallah, I. A. The Legal Status of Non-Moslem Communities in the Near East, and Especially Syria and Lebanon. Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1965.
- Mackey, Sandra. Lebanon: A House Divided. New York: W. W. Norton, 2006.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches—A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.
- Saad-Ghorayab, Aal. Hizbu'llah: Politics and Religion. London: Pluto Press, 2002.
- Salam, Nawaf A., Options for Lebanon. London: I. B. Tauris, 2005.
- Shaery-Eisenlohr, Roshanack. Shi'ite Lebanon: Transnational Religion and the Making of National Identities. New York: Columbia University Press, 2008.

Lectorium Rosicrucianum

Lectorium Rosicrucianum is one of the main international Rosicrucian bodies. In the 1920s Jan Leene (1896–1968) and his brother Zwier Wilhelm Leene (1892–1938) became the most important Dutch leaders of the California-based Rosicrucian Fellowship of Max Heindel (Carl Louis von Grasshoff, 1865–1919). On August 24, 1924, the Leenes had a spiritual experience that today is regarded as foundational for the Lectorium Rosicrucianum. The Leenes, however, who were joined in 1930 by Henny Stok-Huyser (1902–1990), only declared their independence from the Rosicrucian Fellowship in 1935, when they established the Rozekruisers Genootschap. After the premature death of Zwier Wilhelm in 1938, Jan Leene (using the pen name Jan van Rijckenborgh) and Mrs. Stok-Huyser (who signed herself as Catharose de Petri) began to put in writing their version of Christian Gnosticism, derived from Hermeticism, the 17th-century Rosicrucian movement, and the mystical Christianity of Jacob Boehme (Jakob Böhme) (1575–1624). Jan van Rijckenborgh translated Boehme's Aurora into Dutch, and in 1941 he was instrumental in founding a Jacob Boehme Society.

When the Nazis entered Holland, the movement was banned, its possessions confiscated, and its temples razed. Several members, including Jews, died in the concentration camps. In 1945, after the difficulties of the war period, the movement adopted the name Lectorium Rosicrucianum. Interested in Catharism, the two founders met Antonin Gadal (1871–1962) in France in 1948, Gadal being one of the key figures of the Cathar revival in the 20th century. At the same time, the Lectorium Rosicrucianum began to spread, first to Germany, where the Rosicrucian myth was as important as the Cathar tragedy was in southern France, and then to a number of other countries. The most notable success came, however, after the death of Van Rijckenborgh (1968) and Catharose de Petri (1990), who were replaced by an International Spiritual Directorate.

There are currently approximately 15,000 adherents of the Lectorium Rosicrucianum, who are divided into 14,000 "pupils" and about 1,000 "members," who await admission as pupils. After a waiting period of one or two years, the new pupils engage in a way of life in which a “balance of the consciousness” is regarded as essential. From this engagement stems a quest for mental, emotional, and physical purification, supported by vegetarianism and abstinence from alcohol, tobacco, and drugs. There is also a clear disapproval of other “unhealthy influences,” in particular those allegedly transmitted by television, as well as the more subtle influences coming from the world of the dead (the “reflective sphere”).

In order to understand the Lectorium, it is crucial to look at it in the light of Gnosticism and the Cathar tradition. The Lectorium proposes a classical Gnostic dualism between the divine, or static, world and the natural, or dialectic, world, which the true God did not create. As French historian Antoine Faivre has pointed out, it is difficult to reconcile this dualism with the Rosicrucian tradition, since the latter, at least in its 17th-century origins, is not dualistic.

The dialectic world includes both the living and those among the dead who, in a state of dissolution, await a new incarnation. Van Rijckenborgh’s idea of subsequent incarnations can only be understood within the framework of his notion that each person is a microcosm. Popular theories of reincarnation, whereby it is the personal ego that reincarnates, are refuted by this view. The only function of the ego is in fact to sacrifice itself in favor of the “resurrection of the original soul,” the divine spark at the heart of the human microcosm. The so-called living, having forgotten their divine origin, are imprisoned in this dualist and absurd world, although they also possess a “spirit spark atom,” which manifests itself in many as remembrance (or pre-remembrance) and nostalgia. The path to transfiguration, as envisaged by the Lectorium, is a seven-stage process that aims to awaken that divine spark, called “the rose of the heart,” and to lead humans back to their original condition, the divine world of the Light.

One finds here the classical picture common to all forms of Gnosticism. This version of Gnosticism, however, organizes itself according to a language and according to models often derived directly from the Cathar tradition. Over and above the debate on the role of Gadal and his neo-Catharism, the dualism of the Lectorium and that of the Cathars are remarkably similar. Both are not only evident in their cosmology but they also inspire human behavior. Human actions can further the progress toward transfiguration or, conversely, can further imprison humans in the dialectic field.

The Lectorium provides an esoteric interpretation of both soul and body, as well as presenting a vision of the future. Here, one finds texts on the coming of a false Christ and an Armageddon that could be regarded as either millennialist or apocalyptic. These labels are misleading, however, since apocalyptic language is used purely within a Gnostic context and is largely symbolic.

Lectorium Rosicrucianum

Bakenessergracht 11-15

2011JS Haarlem

The Netherlands

<http://www.lectoriumrosicrucianum.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Reincarnation; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Faivre, Antoine. “Les courants ésotériques et le rapport. Les exemples de la Nouvelle Acropole et de la Rose-Croix d’Or (Lectorium Rosicrucianum).” In Pour en finir avec les sectes. Le débat sur le rapport de la commission parlementaire, edited by Massimo Introvigne and J. Gordon Melton, 233–254. Paris: Dervy, 1996.
- Van Rijckenborgh, Jan. The Coming New Man. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1957.
- Van Rijckenborgh, Jan. Elementary Philosophy of the Modern Rosecross. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1961.
- The Way of the Rosecross in Our Times*. Haarlem, the Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1978.

Legion of Mary

The Legion of Mary is a Roman Catholic lay organization that found its inspiration from its veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary and its program in a wide variety of charitable activities and support of local parishes.

From its original organization in Ireland, it has spread to most parts of the Catholic world, and is now the largest lay Catholic organization in the church. As such it is a major building block of the world network of Marian devotion that is so much a part of the Roman Catholic infrastructure.

The Legion was founded in 1921 by Frank Duff (1889–1980), a layperson in Dublin, Ireland. Duff promulgated a two-pronged set of objectives, one being the spiritual formation of its members through devotion to the Virgin Mary and the other the building of the church through social service in the members' community.

The devotional life adopted by Legion members is derived from the writings of Saint Louis Marie Grignon de Montford (1673–1716). De Montfort was the author of the classical Marian text, True Devotion to Mary. Among de Montford's many accomplishments was the founding the Company of Mary, a religious order organized for evangelism under the protection of the Blessed Virgin.

Members of the Legion are directed into a wide variety of activities, from visitation of the sick and aged, assisting with religious education programs, and nurturing parish activities to evangelism and outreach beyond the parish. A local spiritual director named by the parish priest directs member activities.

Local chapters (praesidia) are associated with other praesidia in a hierarchical organization at the regional (curia), national (senatus), and international levels. The international headquarters remains in Dublin. The life of the organization is described in the organization's Official Handbook. The work spread to the United States in 1931 and the first praesidium was formed at Roton, New Mexico.

Legion of Mary
De Montfort House Morning Star Avenue
North Brunswick Street
Dublin 7
Ireland
<http://www.legion-of-mary.ie/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bradshaw, Robert. Frank Duff: Founder of the Legion of Mary. Bayshore, NY: Montfort Publications, 1985.
- Official Handbook of the Legion of Mary*. Dublin, Ireland: Concilium Legionis Mariae, 1953.

Legion of Mary/Maria Legio (Kenya)

The largest secession from the Roman Catholic Church anywhere in Africa is the Legion of Mary, or Maria Legio, with estimates of membership in the 1990s ranging between 250,000 and 2 million. This movement was founded by Catholic Luos in western Kenya in 1963, the year of Kenya's independence, and its name has been changed many times. The first leaders were laypeople, Simeon Mtakatifu Ondeto (1920–1991) and Gaudensia Aoko. A young woman whose two children had both died on the same day, Aoko began to denounce witchcraft and sorcery. Ondeto established a church headquarters on the holy mountain of Got Kwer, to be called the New Jerusalem and the Holy City, and Aoko began to perform mass baptisms. Within a year, the church had 100,000 members. It retained much Catholic liturgy, including the Latin language, a celibate leadership, an order of nuns, and titles like pope and cardinal.

The Legion of Mary also had many characteristics shared by other spiritual churches, including healing rituals; deliverance from witchcraft; prophecies and spirit possession; prohibitions on dancing and consuming pork, tobacco, and alcohol; and the practice of polygyny.

Aoko left the Legion of Mary in 1965 to found her own movement after Ondeto began restricting the role of women in general and her own role as charismatic founder of the movement in particular. Although she later returned, she was soon again head of her own Legion of Mary movement. Another woman, called Mama Maria, is believed to be the black incarnation of the Virgin Mary. Adherents to the Legion of Mary, called Legios, hold that Mama Maria had returned to heaven in 1966 and is the spiritual mother of Ondeto.

The church initially spread only among Luos but has become increasingly multiethnic, reaching many parts of Kenya, Tanzania, and other East African countries. In Tanzania, a schism from this church six months after its founding there resulted in the forming of the African Catholic Church. Ondeto, who died in 1991 and was buried at Got Kwer, became known as Baba Messiah and is regarded by some Legios as Christ reincarnated in Africa, the living God. Pope Timothy Blasio Ahitler (1941–1998) was the next leader until his death, when a new pope, Maria Lawrence Pius Jairo Chiaji, was appointed. Since 2004 the leader has been Pope Raphael Titus Otieno.

Members of the Legion of Mary Catholic movement study in a small classroom in Togo. (Pascal Deloche /Godong/Corbis)

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Reincarnation; Roman Catholic Church; Spirit Possession; Witchcraft.

References

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.

Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1930. Oxford: Clarendon, 1994.

Schwartz, Nancy. “Christianity and the Construction of Global History: The Example of Legio Maria.” In Christianity as a Global Culture, edited by Karla Poewe. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994.

Lemba

The Lemba are an African people residing primarily in South Africa and Zimbabwe who claim that they are descendants of Jews who have retained their faith even though cut off geographically for many centuries from the center of Judaism. According to traditions alive among the Lemba, they came from Sena, which many believe to have been a town north of Jericho in Israel. Others claim that the Lemba descend from attendants of the biblical King Solomon, who is said to have traveled to Zimbabwe (the Ophir of 1 Kings 9:28) in search of gold. The Lemba allege that when Solomon returned to Israel (the Hebrew Bible does not record any trip of Solomon to southern Africa), some of his men remained behind, that they intermarried with the Zimbabweans, taught the Africans to worship only one god, Mwali, and spread Jewish traditions through southern Africa.

The Lemba have been associated with the Venda culture that reached its peak in the 14th and 15th centuries, the time of Great Zimbabwe, the magnificent medieval stone city. The Lemba were of lighter skin than the Venda and served as physicians, artisans, and iron workers. They were also somewhat feared as sorcerers. They served with the Venda in wars against the British at the beginning of the 20th century.

A variety of traditional Lemban practices point to Jewish roots (though some claim that they were picked up from Muslim sources). The Lemba circumcise male children. They bury their dead in accordance with Jewish traditions. They hold the first day of the new moon sacred and shave their heads to commemorate it. They do not eat pork. They practice animal sacrifice, but only circumcised males may sacrifice animals for food. Women engage in purification ceremonies after menstruating or giving birth. Non-Lemba women are allowed to marry into the group, but Lemba men may be expelled if they marry outsiders.

It should be noted that the Lemba identify themselves as Jews culturally, but not necessarily religiously. They follow a set of traditional cultural practices that signify to them their Hebrew ancestry. While some have converted to the Jewish faith in recent years, many are Muslims or Christians. It is their unique ritual practices that separate them from their neighbors as a chosen people.

In a series of studies, the first published in 1996, the Lemba claims have been supported by research on their chromosomes, which were discovered to have a remarkable likeness to those of other Semitic people. More important, the researchers found that many Lemba men carry in their male chromosome a set of DNA sequences that is distinctive of the cohanim, the Jewish priests believed to be the descendants of Aaron.

There are some 50,000 to 70,000 members of the Lemba community. Their uniting symbol is a flag with a Star of David and the Elephant of Judah. They are not to be confused with Beta Israel, the Jews of Ethiopia.

The Lemba Community
c/o Lawrence R. Matandu
Makereni School
PO Box 249
Mberwengwa
Zimbabwe

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Beta Israel; Judaism.

References

- The Jews of Africa.” <http://www.mindspring.com/~jaypsand/lemba.htm>. Accessed June 15, 2009.
- Le Roux, M. The Lemba: A Lost Tribe of Israel in Southern Africa. Pretoria, South Africa: Unisa Press, 2003.
- Parfitt, Tudor. Journey to the Vanished City. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1993.
- Parfitt, Tudor. The Thirteenth Gate: Travels among the Lost Tribes of Israel. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1987.
- Thomas, M. G., T. Parfitt, D. A. Weiss, K. Skorecki, M. le Roux, N. Bradman, and D. B. Goldstein. “Y Chromosomes Traveling South: The Cohen Modal Haplotype and the Origins of The Lemba—The ‘Black Jews of Southern Africa.’” American Journal of Human Genetics 66 (2000): 674–686.

Lent

For six weeks preceding Easter, Christians have customarily undergone a time of penitential prayer, fasting, and almsgiving to prepare for the celebration of the resurrection of Jesus on Easter Sunday. This season of Lent originally was also a time of preparation for baptismal candidates and those separated from the church who were rejoining the community.

In Latin, this season of the Christian year was called Quadragesima, referring to 40 days. With the shift to the vernacular in the Middle Ages, the word “Lent” replaced the Latin term. Lent originates from the Teutonic root for “long” and refers to spring, the time of the year when days lengthen.

Pope Benedict XVI spreads ashes on the head of an unidentified prelate during the celebration of Ash Wednesday mass at the Basilica of Santa Sabina, in Rome, February 17, 2010. Ash Wednesday marks the beginning of Lent, a solemn period of 40 days of prayer and self-denial leading up to Easter. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Originating in the fourth century of the church, Lent spans 40 weekdays, reminiscent of the 40 days of temptation Jesus spent in the wilderness preparing for his ministry. In the Western church tradition, Lent begins on Ash Wednesday and ends on Holy Saturday, the last day of Holy Week before Easter Sunday. Since Sundays celebrate the resurrection of Jesus, the six Sundays that occur during Lent are not reckoned part of the 40 days of Lent, and are referred to as the Sundays “in” Lent. In the Eastern Orthodox tradition, the 40 days are calculated differently: the fast begins on Clean Monday, Sundays are included in the count, and it ends on the Friday before Palm Sunday.

Ash Wednesday, the seventh Wednesday before Easter Sunday, begins Lent. The name refers to the ancient practice of drawing a cross of ashes in oil on worshippers’ foreheads to demonstrate humility before God and mourning for death caused by sin.

There are other holy days within the season of Lent: Clean Monday, the first day of Lent in Eastern Orthodox Christianity; the fifth Sunday of Lent, which begins Passiontide; Palm Sunday, the beginning of Holy Week; Spy Wednesday, recognizing the day Judas betrayed Jesus; Maundy Thursday, in commemoration of the Last Supper; and Good Friday, commemorating Christ’s crucifixion and burial.

Throughout Lent, observers fast, though not necessarily every day. Historically, there has been great divergence regarding the nature of the fast. However, traditionally days of fasting include taking one meal a day, in the evening. Often fasters will abstain from meat and wine and the common law of the Roman Catholic Church is to avoid meat, milk, cheese, and eggs. During Holy Week, or at least on Good Friday, it is common to restrict the diet to dry food, bread, salt, and vegetables. Consequently, the custom arose of giving eggs for Easter to break the fast, thus leading to the concept of Easter eggs.

During Lent, the color purple or violet dominates the sanctuary to denote the pain and suffering of Jesus and the world under sin. As well, purple is also the color of royalty, befitting Jesus as the King. Some churches use gray for Ash Wednesday or for special days of fasting and prayer. Commonly, church traditions change the sanctuary colors to red for Maundy Thursday. Good Friday and Holy Saturday may utilize black to symbolize the powers of sin and death overcome by the death of Jesus.

Kevin Quast

See also: Easter; Eastern Orthodoxy; Holy Week; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Adam, Adolf. The Liturgical Year: Its History and Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy. New York: Pueblo, 1981.
- Regan, Patrick. “The Three Days and the Forty Days.” Worship 54 (1980): 2–18.

- Senn, Frank. Christian Liturgy: Catholic and Evangelical. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1997.
- Stevenson, Kenneth. Jerusalem Revisited: The Liturgical Meaning of Holy Week. Washington, DC: Pastoral Press, 1988.
- Stookey, Laurence Hull. Calendar: Christ's Time for the Church. Nashville: Abingdon, 1996.
- Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.
- Thurston, Herbert. "Lent." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 9. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1910.

■ Lesotho

The African nation of Lesotho, formerly known as Basutoland, is a small country completely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa. Its 11,720 square miles of land is home to 2,100,000 people, almost all of the Sotho linguistic/ethnic group. Sesotho, a bantu language spoken by the Sotho people, is the official language of Lesotho.

Lesotho had its origins in the expansionist policy of Shaka (ca. 1787–1828), a Zulu leader who in 1818 began the process of uniting the Zulu and other Bantu people of southern Africa. Although he conquered the land making up present-day Natal and Transvaal (South Africa), some groups united against him. The most effective counterforce was brought together by Moshoeshoe I (1786–1870), the head of the Bakwene group among the Sotho people. Moshoeshoe united several Sotho and Zulu groups against Shaka. They established themselves along the Drakensberg Mountains and were able to defend themselves in the intermittent wars through the 1820s. Then, in 1839, they had to stave off expansion by the Boer settlers in South Africa. This generation of warfare gave the very different groups a sense of nationhood.

Following the discovery of diamonds in South Africa, British missionaries convinced Moshoeshoe I that the safest course was to allow the British to establish a protectorate over the land to keep back further Boer encroachments. This land remained separate even after the British took control of South Africa. When South Africa attained independence, Britain promised the new country that the several protectorates, including Lesotho, would eventually be integrated into the new republic. However, Britain went back on its agreements after South Africans broke relations with the British government and instituted apartheid. A Constitution was published in 1965, and in 1966 the present state of Lesotho was born.

Christianity entered the country in 1833 when Reformed missionaries representing the Paris Mission of the Reformed Church of France accepted the invitation of Moshoeshoe I to work in the land. They began the process of converting believers from the indigenous religions, the most prominent being a polytheistic faith built around deities (medimo) and ancestral spirits (balimo). Today less than 10 percent of the population continue to follow the traditional religions.

The work of the Paris Mission led to what is today known as the Lesotho Evangelical Church (Kereke ea Evangeli Lesotho), the second largest religious group in the land. After becoming an autonomous body in 1964, the church has adopted a strong ecumenical outlook, playing a leading role in the formation of the Christian Council of Lesotho and joining the World Council of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the All Africa Conference of Churches.

The British presence in the region led to the introduction of the Church of England in 1875. Anglican work was organized as a diocese in 1950 and attached to the Church in the Province of South Africa. The Roman Catholic Church entered Lesotho in 1862, when Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate from France started a mission. Their work was turned over to Canadians in 1930. A major step in moving beyond the missionary era occurred in 1957 with the consecration of the first indigenous bishop. The Roman Catholic Church is now the largest religious body in the country. The Lesotho Episcopal Conference was founded in 1972.

In the decades leading to World War I, a number of other missionary-minded churches also established work in Lesotho. Many of these, such as the Dutch Reformed Church and the Methodists, came from bases previously established in South Africa. In 1892 the U.S.-based African Methodist Episcopal Church launched a missionary enterprise. During the 20th cen-

LESOTHO

Lesotho

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	842,000	1,889,000	92.4	1.14	2,094,000	2,234,000
Roman Catholics	411,000	990,000	48.4	1.27	1,100,000	1,220,000
Protestants	224,000	379,000	18.5	1.69	450,000	550,000
Independents	62,000	218,000	10.7	2.04	270,000	300,000
Ethnoreligionists	181,000	130,000	6.4	-0.88	80,000	60,000
Baha'is	8,700	18,500	0.9	0.99	26,000	45,000
Agnostics	500	4,000	0.2	0.99	6,000	10,000
Hindus	60	1,300	0.1	0.99	2,000	3,000
Muslims	530	1,000	0.0	0.99	1,600	2,500
Atheists	100	600	0.0	1.00	1,000	2,000
Total population	1,033,000	2,044,000	100.0	0.99	2,211,000	2,356,000

ture, the hegemony of the older missionary bodies was challenged by the movement of numerous representatives from the African Initiated Churches (AICs), most from South Africa and other nearby countries. Prominent among these are the Zion Christian Church and the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa. Lesotho has also contributed its own additions to the AIC movement with such churches as St. Paul's Church of Africa and the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers Church. Several hundred AIC groups are operating in Lesotho, a number of which have formed the African Federal Council of Churches.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints have all established churches in Lesotho. The Baha'i Faith began a period of rapid growth following the formation of its first spiritual assembly in 1964. Islam has made little progress among the general population, but some Asian businesspeople and their families established a mosque in Butha-Buthe in 1972.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; All Africa Conference of Churches; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Baha'i Faith; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Dutch Reformed Church; Jehovah's Witnesses; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; Zion Christian Church.

References

- The Catholic Church of Lesotho at the Hour of Independence.* Maseru, Lesotho: Lesotho Catholic Information Bureau, 1966.
- Fitzgerald, Emma (Rose Leone), and Julienne Lefebvre (Michel-Archange). Go Forth . . . : A History of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary Missionaries in Lesotho. Congregational Leadership Team of the Sisters, 2002.
- Frisbie-Fulton, Michelle. Historical Dictionary of Lesotho. Methuen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2003.
- Machobane, L. B. B. Basotho Religion and Western Thought. Edinburgh: Centre of African Studies/Edinburgh University, 1995.
- Mohapeloa, J. M. From Mission to Church: Fifty Years of the Work of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society and the Lesotho Evangelical Church, 1933–1983. Morija, Lesotho: Morija Sesuto Book Depot, 1985.

Lesotho Evangelical Church

The Lesotho Evangelical Church originated in one of the initial thrusts into the heart of Africa by the Paris

Mission (of the Reformed Church of France). In 1833 three missionaries—Thomas Arbousset, Eugène Casalis, and Constant Gosselin—received approval to work in the region from King Moshoeshoe I (1786–1870), who at the time was attempting to gather the people of the region into a kingdom. At first the missionaries' work proceeded smoothly. The initial station was erected at Morija and others were opened thereafter. However, South Africa had its eyes on the region, and to protect his land from the superior South African forces, Moshoeshoe aligned with Britain. The mission suffered in the warfare that followed and was eventually closed.

In 1868 Lesotho (then called Basutoland) became a British protectorate. The mission reopened and soon entered a growth phase. In 1887 a theological school was established. The first synod (seboka), including both the missionaries and the active graduates of the seminary, appeared in 1898. Natural development through the first half of the 20th century led to the establishment of the independent Lesotho Evangelical Church (Kereke ea Evangeli Lesotho) in 1964. Basutoland became the independent nation of Lesotho in 1966.

In 1970 the prime minister of Lesotho, Leabua Jonathan (1914–1987), suspended the country's Constitution. He attempted to rule as a dictator, pushing aside King Moshoeshoe II (138–1996). The church identified with the opposition. The church newspaper had published detailed stories of life under the new government; its editor was assassinated. The church's vice president was forced to leave the country. Jonathan was overthrown in 1986, but his successor did little better and an unstable period ensued until free elections were held 1993 and a new king was enthroned.

In 2005, the Lesotho Evangelical Church reported 340,500 members in 64 congregations. The highest legislative body is the general synod. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and since 1956 of the World Council of Churches.

Lesotho Evangelical Church
PO Box 260
Old Busstop, Casalis House
Maseru 100
Lesotho

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church of France; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Leuvenberg Church Fellowship

See Community of Protestant Churches in Europe.

Liberal Catholic Church

The Liberal Catholic Church was established in Great Britain in 1916 as a result of the reorganization of the British Old Catholic movement, introduced into the country by Bishop Arnold Harris Mathew (1852–1919). Bishop Mathew, consecrated to the episcopate of the Old Catholic Church of Utrecht in 1908, presided over an English mission that was independent of the See of Utrecht from 1910 to 1915. In these same years, many English members of the Theosophical Society joined the Old Catholic mission. Following a disagreement with Mathew on the doctrinal themes of the Theosophical movement, the great majority of the mission's members decided to rebuild it on more liberal lines. They sought greater attention to the forms of mysticism that in those decades were influencing Anglicanism and the modernist Christian circles.

The resulting church, formerly known as Old Catholic Church in Great Britain, took the name of Liberal Catholic Church in 1918. The church achieved worldwide growth through the missionary activity of its first presiding bishop, James Ingall Wedgwood (1883–1951), and in many countries it developed through a sort of symbiosis, sometimes highly conflictual, with the Theosophical Society.

A primary spokesman and doctrinal reference for the church is Charles Webster Leadbeater (1854–1934). Already a prolific writer of Theosophical books, Leadbeater was consecrated as a bishop in the Liberal Catholic Church by Wedgwood. He applied his method of extrasensorial perception to the study of Christian sacraments, and his findings were gathered in 1920 in a volume entitled The Science of the Sacraments. The liturgy of the Liberal Catholic Church was compiled by Bishops Wedgwood and Leadbeater and, with some minor changes, is still in use today. This liturgy follows in the tradition of Old Catholicism, which preceded the modern liturgical movement in creating a vernacular liturgy on Tridentine lines.

Today the Liberal Catholic Church is present in about 50 countries and organized into ecclesiastical provinces, each directed by a regional bishop and endowed with significant autonomy. The main administrative body is the General Episcopal Synod, headed by a presiding bishop. One of the American churches maintains a site for the international church with links to various dioceses around the world. The total membership in the world is estimated at around 30,000. The current presiding bishop is Most Reverend Graham Wale, elected in 2005.

The unique qualities of the Liberal Catholic Church make it difficult to place in the larger landscape of religious communions. Drawing as it does on both Anglican/Catholic Christianity and Theosophy, it has enjoyed a response from people worldwide while at the same time being somewhat marginalized from mainstream religious movements. Adapting the liturgical heritage of the Old Catholic world, the church offers a wide liberality of thought, in which Theosophical interpretations of Christian doctrines coexist with a search for common Christian roots, studies on psychological and inner effects of the sacraments, and so on. These very different heritages generate a certain level of inner tension within Liberal Catholicism that attracts many spiritual searchers who are confused by the constraints of ancient theologies and mystical doctrines. Some observers foresee that this church, unlike many other “small churches” from the independent Catholic and Orthodox traditions, will perpetuate its well-defined raison d'être and be able to keep a cadre of faithful who are limited in number but clearly defined among spiritual searchers.

Our Lady and All Angels Liberal Catholic Church Right Reverend William Downey, Regionary Bishop (USA)
1502 East Ojai Avenue
Ojai, CA 93024
<http://kingsgarden.org/English/Organizations/LCC.GB/LCC.html>

Andrea Cassinasco

See also: Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands; Roman Catholic Church; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Cooper, Irving S. Ceremonies of the Liberal Catholic Church. London: St. Alban Press, 1964.
- Norton, Rovnbert. The Willow in the Tempest: A Brief History of the Liberal Catholic Church in the United States of 1917–1942. Ojai, CA: St. Alban Press, 1990.
- Platt, Warren Christopher. "The Liberal Catholic Church: An Analysis of a Hybrid Sect." Ph.D. Diss., Columbia University, 1982.
- Tillett, Gregory J. The Elder Brother. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982.

■ Liberia

The African nation of Liberia is located on the continent's Atlantic coast between Sierra Leone and Cote d'Ivoire. The country also shares a northern border with Guinea. It is home to 3.3 million people, overwhelming members of the several groups that settled the land prior to the 19th century. About 2.5 percent are descendants of the African Americans who migrated there beginning in the 1820s.

The contemporary state of Liberia was originally settled by two major groups of African people, the Kru-speaking groups in the west and the Mende-speaking people (of which the Mandingo are the best known) in the east. There are more than 30 distinct ethnic groups in the country. The coastal region was visited by the Portuguese beginning in the 15th century and became one area from which slaves were collected.

At the end of the 18th century, Liberia was part of Sierra Leone, the area set aside by the British for the relocation of people liberated by their antislavery activity. However, in 1821 the American Colonization Society, an organization devoted to relocating African Americans to Africa, purchased what became Liberia and founded the port city of Monrovia. Some 20,000 African Americans, descendants from various peoples of western Africa, moved to Liberia. They had by this time been largely Americanized and were not well received by the Native inhabitants. Several American scholars coauthored a new Constitution for what in 1847 became the independent country of Liberia. The descendants of the repatriated African Americans formed a ruling elite in the country, a development that has affected its politics to the present.

Although the tropical climate kept many people away from Liberia, the land was rich in resources—from rubber trees to oil and diamonds. The United States intervened on several occasions to protect American economic investments in the country. In 1979 an economic crisis led to a political coup that saw the assassination of President William Tolbert Jr. (1913–1980) the following year. The new president, Samuel Doe (1950–1990), was able to hold office only by suppressing the opposition, a policy that culminated in civil war in 1990. U.S. troops moved into Liberia but were unable to prevent the assassination of Doe. Following his death, a new coalition government that included former rebel leaders was instituted, but fighting continued for another six years. A six-person ruling council assumed authority while elections were planned. Those elections, held in July 1997, led to the overwhelming victory of the National Patriotic Party and its leader, Charles Taylor (b. 1948).

A small contingent in northern Liberia did not accept the elections and continued armed resistance to Taylor's government. Additional opposition soon appeared in the south, and in 2003 the United Nations charged Taylor with war crimes and issued a warrant for his arrest. Taylor subsequently resigned and went into exile in Nigeria. In 2006, Nigeria rejected their asylum and Taylor was arrested. His trial is a continuing process as this encyclopedia goes to press. Meanwhile, elections in 2005 brought a new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, into office. The country remains unstable.

Group of students and staff at a Presbyterian mission school in Liberia, ca. 1895. (Library of Congress)

Liberia was included in the territory assigned to the Roman Catholic diocese of Cape Verde as early as 1533, but Catholic priests did not settle in the region. Thus, Christianity's real entrance began with the arrival of the African Americans, many of whom were Christians. Lott Carey and Colin Teague (ca. 1780–1839), remembered as the first African American Christian missionaries, were commissioned by the Richmond (Virginia) African Missionary Convention. Before sailing in 1821, Carey, Teague, and their families and accompanying travelers assembled and constituted themselves as a Baptist congregation. On their arrival on Providence Island, Liberia, they reconstituted themselves as the Providence Baptist Church, their meeting place being on high ground overlooking the Mesurado River. Three years later they dedicated a building as their the first sanctuary. The building was the first church building erected in Liberia. Their work was supplemented by that of white missionaries sent by the American Baptists, but eventually the work was assumed by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Missionary Convention and the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) sent their first missionary, Melville Cox (1799–1833), to Liberia in 1833. His death only three months after landing portended the problems that most future missionaries would have with the climate. The mission almost died

Liberia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Ethnoreligionists	690,000	1,775,000	41.2	1.96	2,500,000	4,113,000
Christians	432,000	1,764,000	40.9	2.71	3,015,000	5,965,000
Independents	136,000	650,000	15.1	2.94	1,100,000	2,300,000
Protestants	120,000	565,000	13.1	3.37	1,000,000	1,970,000
Roman Catholics	23,700	230,000	5.3	4.00	450,000	1,030,000
Muslims	262,000	691,000	16.0	2.31	1,085,000	2,020,000
Agnostics	0	67,500	1.6	1.39	140,000	300,000
Baha'is	3,000	13,000	0.3	2.30	30,000	60,000
Atheists	0	600	0.0	2.30	1,000	2,000
Total population	1,387,000	4,311,000	100.0	2.31	6,771,000	12,460,000

in the late 19th century but was revived with the support of several prominent bishops. Until the 1920s, attention was focused on the city of Monrovia and the former Americans there, but in 1925 a major work opened at Ganta in the north, and in 1948 another was initiated at Gbarnga. The Liberian work remains organized as a conference within the United Methodist Church (UMC). The UMC work has been supplemented by the work of the African Methodist Episcopal Church and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, which entered Liberia in 1873 and 1876, respectively.

The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) also began work in Liberia in 1833. Like the Baptists, the Presbyterians began their work among the African Americans, a number of whom were appointed as its missionaries. The last of the missionaries were commissioned in 1887, and the Presbytery of Liberia became an independent body in 1928. This was among the first Liberian churches to ordain women. It is now related to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

Two years after the Methodists and Presbyterians arrived, John Payne, an American missionary with the Episcopal Church, began to work in Liberia. In 1851 he was named the first missionary bishop of Liberia. Payne quickly escaped the confines of Monrovia and opened work among the Grebo people at Cape Palmas in 1836. Also notable in the Episcopal Church's history was the career of Samuel Ferguson (1847–1916), the first black person appointed to the episcopacy. During his long tenure as bishop (1884–1916), Ferguson developed an extensive educational system, capped with Cuttington College and Divinity School. The Episcopal Church in Liberia remains a diocese in the Episcopal Church (U.S.A.).

The United Lutheran Church, now an integral part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, began work in 1860 some miles inland from Monrovia along the Saint Paul River. It remained a small effort until the end of the century, when David A. Day (1851–1897) and his wife Emily arrived to assume control. They directed an expansive program that led to the establishment of stations across the country. The Lutheran Church in Liberia was organized in 1948, and in 1967 it was given full control over the extensive medical and education work. It has retained a close relationship with U.S. Lutherans.

Several other Christian groups entered Liberia in the 20th century and have since become as strong as the older churches. These include the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church of God (an African American Holiness church), the Assemblies of God, and the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World. The Church of the Lord (Aladura) is the largest of several African Initiated Churches.

The Roman Catholic Church attempted to establish work in Monrovia in the 19th century but was blocked by the predominantly Protestant religious establishment. However, in 1906, missionaries of the Society of Africa Missions—a French Catholic organization founded in 1856 in Lyons by Bishop Melchior de Marion Brésillac (1813–1858)—began work among the Kru-speaking peoples; later, they expanded to other areas. At the end of the 20th century the Catholic Church was the second largest church in the country, second only to the Liberian Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention.

LIBERIA

Ecumenical relationships have been strong in Liberia, with the larger Protestant churches sharing support of a variety of educational and charitable institutions. The Liberian Council of Churches is associated with the World Council of Churches (WCC) and includes WCC members such as the United Methodist Church, the Episcopal Church, the Lutheran Church in Liberia, and the Presbytery of Liberia. More conservative churches have formed the Association of Evangelicals of Liberia, which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

In spite of the strong Christian missionary activity, less than half of the Liberian people have become Christian. The largest segment, some 40 percent, retain their traditional religions, especially in those parts of the country farthest from the coast. Traditional religions have as major themes the veneration of ancestors, the working of magic, and the prominence of religious functionaries, popularly known as medicine men, who establish their authority by the demonstration of a spectrum of mystical competence—healing, divining, prognosticating, and so on. Several of the ethnic groups host a spectrum of secret societies to which outsiders are not privy.

Much animosity has been directed toward the traditional religions because of charges that some of their followers practice ritual killing. Ritual killings, in which various body parts are removed from victims and subsequently used in rituals, appear to occur sporadically, though the lack of reliable information is a problem in assessment (the same situation is encountered in other countries). Reports of ritual killing in Liberia may be related to incidents during the civil war of the 1990s, in which faction leaders sometimes ate the body parts of their rivals. One had himself filmed consuming such body parts. In recent years, common criminals have been charged with killing people and selling their body parts.

Islam, primarily of the Sunni Malikite School, has come into the country from the north. The Mandingo have been especially instrumental in the spread of Islam, and the Vai, among other groups, have largely converted to Islam. Muslims now constitute the third largest religious community in the country, making up approximately 16 percent of the population. The national center for Sunni Islam is the National Muslim Council, headquartered in Monrovia. There is also a measurable following of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, and both the Qadiriyya and Tijaniyya Sufi orders are strong.

The National Muslim Council participates along with the Liberian Council of Churches in the Interfaith Mediation Council, an effort to counter political forces that attempted to place the two communities in opposition. In 1997 the All Africa Conference of Churches awarded its first Desmond Tutu Peace Prize to the Interfaith Mediation Council for its efforts to bring peace and reconciliation to the country.

The civil war and continuing unrest in Liberia have not made it an attractive home to new religions, and few have attempted to colonize it.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; Assemblies of God; Church of the Lord (Aladura); Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Episcopal Church; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Liberia Baptist and Educational Convention; Lutheran Church in Liberia; Malikite School of Islam; National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.; Pentecostal Assemblies of the World; Presbyterian Church (USA); Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Cason, J. W. "The Growth of Christianity in the Liberian Environment." Ph.D. Diss., Columbia University, 1962.
- Ellis, Stephen. The Mask of Anarchy: The Destruction of Liberia and the Religious Dimension of an African Civil War. New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Gifford, P. Christianity and Politics in Doe's Liberia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Oldfield, J. R. Alexander Crummell, 1819–1898 and the Creation of an African/American Church in Liberia. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1990.

Olukoju, Ayodeji. Culture and Customs of Liberia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.

Wulah, Teah. The Forgotten Liberian: History of Indigenous Tribes. San Jose, CA: AuthorHouse, 2005.

Liberia Baptist and Educational Convention

Baptist work in Liberia has a distinctive history because of its unique place in the emergence of African American Christianity. In 1819, Lott Carey (ca. 1780–1828) of Richmond, Virginia, was able to purchase his freedom from slavery. By all accounts an unusual man, Carey had been converted to Christianity in 1813 and in 1815 had convinced the triennial Convention of American Baptists (now a constituent part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) to approve the formation of the African Baptist Missionary Society. The Convention's Foreign Mission Board appointed Carey and Collin Teague (ca. 1780–1839) to work in Liberia. They would be joined by their wives, Teague's son, and another couple, and these seven were to form a seed colony in Liberia. Before they left the States, they constituted themselves a church, later to become the Province Baptist Church in Monrovia, Liberia.

The seven sailed in 1821. During the remaining years of his life, Carey served as pastor of the church, as physician for Monrovia, and as a government official; in 1826 he was named lieutenant governor of Liberia. After his death, additional missionaries were sent by the American Baptists. Meanwhile, in 1845, Southern Baptists left the Triennial Convention and formed the Southern Baptist Convention. In 1846 the new Convention sent John Day (1797–1859), also an African American, to Liberia.

The American Baptists withdrew their support from the Liberian work in 1856, and Southern Baptist support was interrupted by the Civil War in the United States. The Southern Baptists redirected their small missionary budget for Africa to Nigeria in 1875. During this period, lacking support from the United States, the church in Liberia formed the Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention. The first president of the convention, Joseph James Cheeseman, later became the president of the country.

In 1882 the Baptist Foreign Mission Convention, one of the emerging structures among the African American Baptist community in the United States, provided support for one Liberian missionary. The next year it commissioned six missionaries, who founded a mission among the Vai people. This became the beginning of the Liberian mission of the National Baptist Convention in the U.S.A., formed by the merger of several African American Baptist organizations in 1895. Two years later, some African American Baptists, who withdrew their support from the Foreign Mission Board of the National Baptists, formed the Lott Carey Foreign Mission Convention. The Lott Carey Convention provided support for J. O. Hayes, formerly a National Baptist missionary, to continue his work in Liberia.

In Liberia, the work of the several U.S.-based Baptist organizations (including the Southern Baptists, who re-entered the country in 1960) was absorbed by the Liberia Baptist Missionary Educational Convention, which continues as the dominant Baptist body in the country. In 2009, it reported 72,000 members in 270 congregations. Among leaders of note in the late 20th century was William R. Tolbert, Jr. (1913–1980), who successively became the vice president of Liberia (1951), president of the Liberia Baptist Convention (1958), president of the Baptist World Alliance (1965), and president of Liberia (1971). Tolbert was assassinated in the military coup of 1980, which happened to occur just as the Baptists were preparing to celebrate the centennial of the Convention. Tolbert was still president of the Convention at the time of his death.

The Tolbert assassination began a period of extreme unrest and disruption in Liberia, first under Samuel Doe (r. 1980–1990) and then Charles Taylor (1997–2003). Baptists suffered possibly more than most because of their identification with the late president. Hundreds of thousands were tortured, killed, or exiled, and some stability returned only after Taylor was forced from office and the subsequent election of Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf as the new president in 2005. Baptists have assumed a role in the ongoing national reconciliation efforts.

The Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention
PO Box 10
0390 Monrovia
Liberia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptists; Baptist World Alliance; National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.; Southern Baptist Convention.

References

Tolbert, William R. "This Matter of Forgiveness."

The Oates Journal. <http://journal.oates.org/special/forgiveness/162-forgiveness-tolbert>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Tyler-McGraw, Marie. An African Republic: Black and White Virginians in the Making of Liberia. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.

Weeks, Nan F., and Blanche Sydnor. Liberia for Christ. Richmond, VA: Missionary Society of Virginia, 1959.

Williams, Walter F. Black Americans and the Evangelization of Africa. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982.

■ Libya

Libya is a large country (679,362 square miles) on the southern edge of the Mediterranean Sea. It sits between Egypt, to its east, and Tunisia and Algeria to its west. Most of the country lies in the Sahara desert, and in the midst of the desert to its south, it shares a border with Niger, Chad, and Sudan. The great majority of its 6.2 million people (2008) reside along its coastal plain.

A mosque in the ancient Berber oasis of Ghadames, Libya. (iStockPhoto)

Libya was settled by Berber Arabs in ancient times and participated in the history of its more famous neighbor, Egypt. It found itself a target of the rising power of the Carthaginian Empire (third century BCE) and later was incorporated into the Roman Empire. Many religious groups, including Christianity, found a home in Libyan cities during the first centuries of the Christian era. During the fourth century, Libyan Christians were divided by the Donatist heresy, and as a result Christianity failed to become the majority religion in the centuries prior to the arrival of the Muslims. Thus, Islam began its period of dominance in the seventh century CE. The Ottoman Empire annexed Libya in 1551.

The modern history of Libya begins with the weakening of the Ottoman Empire. As early as 1837, Muhammad as-Sanusi (ca. 1787–1859) founded a new clandestine Muslim group, the Sanussi, to oppose continued Ottoman rule. The Sanussi still exist as a dissenting Islamic body.

In 1911, Italy seized the Libyan coast concurrently with its declaration of war on Turkey. Following the distraction of World War I, the Italians would spend 15 years trying to consolidate their hegemony in the area. They were not able to annex the land until 1931. During World War II, Libya would be a major battlefield, where Generals Erwin Rommel and Bernard Montgomery would gain immortality. Several years of French and British occupation following the war led to the creation of the modern state of Libya in 1949.

In 1969 a group of army officers under the leadership of 27-year-old Muammar Qaddafi (b. 1942) staged a coup and took control of the government. Two years later, as head of the Revolutionary Command Council (RCC), Qaddafi was named head of state, commander in chief of the armed forces, and chairman of the RCC. On March 2, 1977, the government changed the name of the country from the Libyan Arab Republic to the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. (Jamahiriya has been defined as Islamic Socialism.) Qaddafi remains in control of the country.

Today, Libya is overwhelmingly Muslim, but several schools of Islam vie for control. The population is largely divided between adherents of the Hanafite and the Shafiite schools, though the Malikite School dominates in Cyrenaica. The Sanussi continue as an important minority voice, a role won not only by its opposition to the Ottomans but its more recent struggle against Italian colonialism. The most prominent centers of the Islamic community are the Department of Arabic Language and Islamic Studies at the University of Libya in Benghazi and the Jamiat al-Dawah al-Islamiah, an international Muslim missionary organization headquartered at Tripoli. There are a few members of the Kharijite School in Zuwara and the Jabal Nefusa sect in Tripoli.

The first phase of Christian presence in Libya ended gradually under centuries of Islamic dominance. The Roman Catholic Church was reintroduced in the 15th century, but its influence remained minuscule until the 20th century and the years of Italian rule. After World War II the number of Catholics in Libya dropped from more than 100,000 to approximately 40,000, but Catholicism remained a considerable force as the Italian presence remained strong in the country. At the

Libya

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,933,000	6,313,000	96.7	2.04	7,785,000	9,284,000
Christians	58,800	171,000	2.6	2.72	218,000	268,000
Roman Catholics	3,600	94,000	1.4	4.58	120,000	145,000
Orthodox	47,000	66,000	1.0	0.74	80,000	90,000
Protestants	3,800	5,500	0.1	0.31	8,000	15,000
Buddhists	400	22,000	0.3	2.06	32,000	50,000
Agnostics	2,000	11,000	0.2	2.05	30,000	45,000
Hindus	0	6,000	0.1	2.05	10,000	15,000
Sikhs	0	2,400	0.0	2.06	5,000	8,000
Chinese folk	0	1,800	0.0	2.06	3,000	6,000
Atheists	0	900	0.0	2.03	1,500	2,500
Baha'is	200	700	0.0	2.05	1,000	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	500	0.0	2.06	1,000	2,000
Jews	40	120	0.0	1.98	120	120
Total population	1,994,000	6,530,000	100.0	2.06	8,087,000	9,683,000

end of the 1960s the church consisted of three vicariates and a prefecture. After the coup of 1970s, however, the Italians were expelled from the country, and by 1972 only two Roman Catholic parishes remained and the majority of Libyan Christians were Eastern-rite Catholics.

Protestants began missionary activity in Libya in the 1880s, led by the North Africa Mission, soon followed by the Church Missions to Jews, an Anglican missionary organization. Then in 1936 all non-Catholic missionaries were expelled and were only allowed to return in 1946. All missionaries were again expelled in 1970. All British and American military personnel were expelled in 1974, further reducing the number of Protestants, almost all of whom were expatriates. The remaining Protestant groups are small and most serve small expatriate enclaves.

The Orthodox community began to grow after World War II with the movement of various Arab groups to Libya, especially Egyptians, among whom were many Coptic Christians. As many as 45,000 Coptics may have relocated to Libya before all Egyptians were expelled from the country in 1974. Only a minuscule community remains today.

Through much of the 20th century there was a large Jewish community in Libya, some 37,000 strong.

However, in 1951 almost all of them migrated to the new state of Israel. It is estimated that less than 50 remain in Libya today. There is likewise a tiny number of Chinese Buddhists and members of the Baha'i Faith in Libya.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Malikite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippendale. What Is Islam?: A Comprehensive Introduction. London: Virgin, 1997.
- Mason, J. P. Island of the Blest: Islam in a Libyan Oasis Community. Athens, OH: Center for International Studies, Ohio University, 1977.
- Mayer, Ann Elizabeth. "Islamic Law and Islamic Revival in Libya." In Islam in the Contemporary World, edited by Cyriac K. Pullapilly. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads Books, 1980.
- Ruedy, John. Islamism and Secularism in North Africa. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1996.
- Vanderwalle, Dirk. A History of Modern Libya. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

■ Liechtenstein

Liechtenstein is a small country of only 61 square miles located on the Rhine River between Switzerland and Austria. The home to 34,498 people, it shares much of the history of its two neighbors. Liechtenstein became independent in 1719 but was closely linked to the Austrian Empire for the next two centuries. Since the end of World War II, it has been more closely linked to Switzerland.

Christianity came into the area quite early, during the years of the Roman exploration and occupation of the Rhine Valley. As did Austria, Liechtenstein remained loyal to the Roman Church through the Reformation era. Today the Catholic Church remains the dominant religious force in the land, and the several congregations are organized into a deanery attached to the Diocese of Chur (Switzerland).

Protestants came into the area in the 1880s. Most were skilled workers who migrated from Germany and other countries with their families. In 1881 they organized the Evangelical Church. In 1954 the Evangelical Church entered into a Patronatsvertrag (patronage agreement) with the Protestant Church of the Canton of Saint Gall in Switzerland, which among other benefits provides access to a pool of pastors. That same year, the Lutheran members of the church left and founded a separate Lutheran organization. Soon afterward they affiliated with the Swiss Lutherans in what is now known as the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Switzerland and the Principality of Liechtenstein.

LIECHTENSTEIN

Liechtenstein

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	21,200	32,400	89.5	1.00	34,600	37,200
Roman Catholics	19,000	26,600	73.5	0.58	27,800	29,000
Protestants	1,400	3,300	9.1	1.38	4,200	5,500
Marginals	20	120	0.3	0.00	200	400
Muslims	0	2,300	6.4	1.36	3,400	4,500
Agnostics	170	1,400	3.9	1.33	2,200	3,200
Jews	30	50	0.1	0.91	50	50
Atheists	0	30	0.1	3.26	50	80
Baha'is	40	20	0.0	1.92	50	100
Total population	21,400	36,200	100.0	1.03	40,400	45,100

The Seventh-day Adventist Church has a small work in Liechtenstein that is an integral part of the Swiss Union Conference. There is also a small Baha'i spiritual assembly and a recently opened Zen Buddhist center, part of the International Zen Association, headquartered in Paris.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Zen Association; Lutheranism; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Beattie, David. Liechtenstein: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris, 2004.
- Eccardt, Thomas M. Secrets of the Seven Smallest States of Europe: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, and Vatican City. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.
- Leckey, Colin. Dots on the Map. London: Grosvenor House Publishing, 2006.
- Wille, H. Staat und Kirche im Fürstentum Liechtenstein. Freiburg, Switzerland: University of Freiburg, 1972.

Light of the World Church

This religious tradition, founded in Monterrey, Nuevo León, Mexico, in 1926 by Eusebio Joaquín González (later known as the Apostle Aarón), has blended Mexican mysticism with Pentecostal fervor to create a unique Christian movement that has spread throughout Mexico and to more than 20 countries in the Americas (including the United States and Canada), plus Spain, Portugal, Italy, Germany, and Australia. The Light of the World Church (since 1952 with headquarters in Colonia Hermosa Provincia, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico), grew from 80 members in 1929, to 75,000 in 1972, to 1.5 million in 1986, and to more than 4 million members in 22 countries in 1990, according to church sources.

The official name of this organization is the Church of God, Column and Pillar of Truth, Jesus the Light of the World (Iglesia de Dios, Columna y Apoyo de la Verdad, Jesus La Luz del Mundo), but its followers are popularly known in Mexico as Aaronistas (followers of Aarón). This religious organization has been classified as a Marginal Christian Group by PROLADES due to its unique characteristics, which include its claims to be “the restoration of Primitive Christianity” and that its apostles are “the voice of God on earth.”

The Light of the World Church has a strong Mexican nationalistic orientation and has an authoritarian form of church government; it strongly adheres to Old Testament teachings, is legalistic, and upholds high moral standards; and its members are known for their industriousness and honesty. Although there is a strong emphasis on Bible reading and memorization, the prophetic messages spoken by the Apostles Aarón and Samuel are considered as “the fountain of truth.” In addition to traditional Protestant hymns and gospel songs (many from the 18th and 19th centuries), some of the songs used refer to the “Anointed One,” the “Sent One,” or “The Prince,” which honor and praise Aarón as the church’s First Apostle. The traditional worship style is simple: people kneel to pray, women wear head coverings and long white dresses, no musical instruments are used, the choir sings a capella in four-part harmony, and males and females are separated by a center aisle.

Another unique feature of this movement is that all ordained pastors are required to travel to the Mother Church in Colonia Hermosa Provincia (symbolic of Holy Jerusalem) in Guadalajara on August 14 for an annual celebration of the Lord’s Supper, which is held on Aarón’s birthday. This event is also an occasion for faithful church members (called “the new spiritual People of Israel”) to make a pilgrimage to Guadalajara from within Mexico or from other countries, and to present the Apostle with special gifts. While rejecting Roman Catholicism as an apostate church, Guadalajara has become the new Rome for this movement, and excommunication from the Light of the World Church means that people are “irrevocably lost for all eternity.”

Doctrinally, the Light of the World Church has some similarities with the Oneness Pentecostal movement in Mexico but is distinguished by its allegiance to its Supreme Leader, the Apostle Aarón. Historically, Eusebio Joaquín González (an uneducated man of humble origins) was converted in 1926 by an Apostolic fruit vender and became a disciple of two itinerant lay preachers, known as “Saul” and “Silas,” who arose within the early Pentecostal movement in northern Mexico during the 1920s.

Eusebio was reportedly baptized by “Saul” on April 6, 1926, in San Pedro de las Colonias (near Monterrey); then he and his wife, Elisa, accompanied the two bearded and barefoot “prophets” for a few months on a preaching journey on foot. At some point, “Saul” is alleged to have spoken the following words of prophecy: “You will no longer be called Eusebio, rather your new name will be Aarón and you will become known in all the world.” Later, Aarón testified that this was the moment in which God called him to establish the Light of the World Church as the restoration of the Primitive Church of Jesus Christ, and in December 1926 the City of Guadalajara was selected as his spiritual headquarters (Gaxiola 1994, 167–169).

Between 1926 and 1952, this new religious movement grew from a small group of dedicated followers to an established movement of about 25,000 members. From 1926 to 1934, Aarón and his early disciples traveled on foot to many towns and villages, preaching to the marginalized peasants and forming “house churches” among his followers, who became known as Aaronistas. The first temple of the Light of the World Church was founded in 1934 in the lower-class neighborhood of San Juan de Dios in Guadalajara. By 1938, Aarón had established most of the rules and regulations that would govern the new movement, including the obligatory 5:00 a.m. daily prayer service, and he became known to his followers as “the new Messiah.”

In 1942, the Light of the World Church suffered its first major division, when a power struggle among the leaders (Aarón was accused of misusing church finances) resulted in the formation of a rival movement, known as the Good Shepherd Church (Iglesia El Buen Pastor), which is similar in doctrine and practice (Renée de la Torre, 1996, 155).

In 1952, Aarón purchased 14 hectares on the outskirts of Guadalajara, where he and his followers constructed the Colonia Hermosa Provincia as a segregated community to protect church members from worldly temptations and to strengthen the development of a community of faith. During the next few decades, a large central church was built that seated about 3,000 people, around which was developed a walled, self-contained community with its own commercial, medical, educational, and social services. All of these facilities were built by the voluntary labor and tithes of Aarón’s faithful followers.

After Aarón’s death in 1964, his youngest son, Samuel Joaquín Flores, became the new Supreme Leader and Apostle of the movement; and he began a new era of openness to the larger world by tearing down the stone wall around Colonia Hermosa Provincia, encouraging the growth and development of similar colonies of believers within Mexico and in other countries, and constructing a new, large central church at a cost of more than $5 million—not counting the cost of volunteer labor provided by church members. In 1992, an estimated 150,000 church members gathered for the annual celebration of the Lord’s Supper at La Glorieta Central de la Iglesia La Luz del Mundo.

When Aarón died in 1964, the Light of the World Church had 64 churches and 35 missions; under the leadership of Samuel, this movement grew to more than 11,300 churches and missions in 22 countries in 1989, according to Renée de la Torre (1998, 267). This demonstrates the growing social strength and missionary zeal of this autonomous Mexican religious movement.

Despite strong opposition from the Roman Catholic Church, many Protestant denominations, and other religious groups, this independent quasi-Pentecostal organization has achieved significant numerical, socio-economic, and political strength in Mexico (especially in the state of Jalisco), and through expansion to other countries has made its presence and unique message known throughout the Americas.

Apostol Samuel Juaquín Flores
Glorieta Central de la Iglesia La Luz del Mundo Colonia Hermosa Provincia, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico
www.laluzdelmundo.com

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ of Mexico; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church.

References

- Berg, Clayton, and Paul Pretiz. Spontaneous Combustion: Grass-Roots Christianity, Latin American Style. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1996.
- Gaxiola, Manuel J. La Serpiente y la Paloma: Historia, Teología y Análisis de la Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús (1914–1994). 2nd ed. Naucalpan, Estado de México: Libros Pyros, 1994.
- Revista Académica para el Estudio de las Religiones, La Luz del Mundo: un análisis multi-disciplinario de la controversia religiosa que ha impactado a nuestro país. Ciudad de México: Revista Académica para el Estudio de las Religiones, Tomo I, 1997.
- Torre, Renée de la. “Pinceladas de una ilustración etnográfica: La Luz del Mundo en Guadalajara.” In Identidades Religiosas y Sociales en México, edited by Gilberto Giménez. Mexico City: Instituto de Investigaciones Sociales de la Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), 1996.

Torre, Renée de la. “Una iglesia mexicana con proyección internacional: La Luz del Mundo.” In Sectas o Iglesias: Viejos o Nuevos Movimientos Religiosos, compiled by Elio Masferrer Kan. Ciudad de México: Plaza y Valdés Editores, 1998.

■ Lithuania

Lithuania is a country of Northeastern Europe, the largest from the three Baltic states with the capital at Vilnius and a population of around 3.336 million. The prevailing language is Lithuanian. Ethnically, Lithuania is composed of Lithuanians (84.3 percent), Russians (5 percent), Poles (6.2 percent), and Byelorussians (1.1 percent). There was a large community of Jews before World War II that was hard hit by the Holocaust, and it survives today with fewer than 5,000 members. The mainstream religion is Roman Catholicism. According to the 2001 census 79 percent of the population declared their belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, 4 percent to the Russian Orthodox Church. The membership of other religious communities did not exceed 1 percent of the population: Old Believers (0.78 percent), the Lutheran Church (0.56 percent), and the Reformed Church (0.2 percent). The New Apostolic Church, the Tatar Muslims, Full Gospel/Charismatic churches, Jehovah’s Witnesses, Pentecostals, Baptists, and Seventh-day Adventists each have memberships of 1,000 to 3,000 while there are smaller communities of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the United Methodist Church, and the Buddhists. There is also a small group of Karaites, who, along with the Sunni Muslim community, have had a presence in Lithuania since the 15th century, when they were brought to Lithuania by the Grand Duke Vytautas, while a variety of Muslims of Tatar, Uzbek, and Azerbaijani background migrated to Lithuania in the 20th century. The Tatar community currently numbers about 5,000.

Hill of Crosses near Siauliai, Lithuania, is a symbol of faith and national identity in the face of oppression. (Corel)

Lithuania has been a part of a Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth since 1569, and in 1795 was annexed by the Russian Empire. Lithuania was formally re-established as an independent state in 1918. The newly formed Lithuanian state enshrined freedom of religion in its new Constitution; however, there was no strict separation of church and state, and the Catholic Church retained a privileged position, strengthened by a Concordat of 1927 with the Holy See. After a short period of independence Lithuania was annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940, then by advancing Nazi Germany in 1941, and again by the Soviet Union in 1944.

After World War II, Lithuania was kept in the Soviet Union as one of its 15 republics. The independence movement gained momentum again during the perestroika period in the Soviet Union and culminated in the declaration of independence on March 11, 1990, and, after the crashing of a coup in August 1991 weakened the imperialist forces in the Soviet Union, recognition of the declared independence by both the Soviet Union and most states of the world in 1991. Lithuania joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the European Union in 2004. After regaining independence Lithuania has experienced vigorous economic growth, though in 2008 the GDP per capita was still only about 60 percent of the average in the European Union.

Modern-day Lithuanians are descendants of a few Baltic tribes, and the premodern indigenous religion of Lithuania was a multifaceted phenomenon belonging to the more generic Baltic family of religions. The sources of ancient Baltic culture are estimated to go back to around 2500 BCE, when autochthonous local cultures were merging with that of the newcomer Indo-Europeans. The pre-Christian religion in the current territory of Lithuania has undergone quite a few changes since those times, but it has kept the basic structure of Indo-European pre-Christian religions.

The cosmology and anthropology of the pre-modern Pagan religion of Lithuania describes the beginning of the world, in which two gods, Dievas and Velnias, create the world together. While creating the world they compete with each other, the world emerging in that constant competition. According to Lithuanian etiological tales, the first human being was created by accident, by a particle of spit from the mouth of Dievas, who only later saw the result of his spit and marveled at what had happened. This pessimistic anthropology permeates the worldview of ancient Lithuanian religion, where human beings are not seen as a result of purposeful divine activity. The vision of the afterlife is more optimistic, though the records about it are very diverse. People who have died would be met by gods and would get the treatment they have earned in this life, either going to dausos, the place of eternal bliss, or the place of darkness, governed by Velnias. The deities of the ancient Lithuanian (and Baltic) pantheon had correspondents in the pantheons of other regions. The highest god of the Baltic pantheon was Dievas, who in the later period of the Lithuanian religion became a distant, inactive deity, portrayed in tales as active only in the creation of the world and shortly thereafter. The most important member of the pantheon was Perkunas, god of storm and thunder, perhaps a son of Dievas. The Balts also had a chthonic god, opposite in nature to the heavenly gods, named Velnias, a god of dungeons, magic, and riches. The people also venerated a female deity called Zvoruna or Medeina. Besides the deities common to all the Balts there were different spirits or gods unique to the various tribes. Wizards or witches, warlocks, and medicine women had considerable influence on the common religious life of the people. The ancient shrines in Lithuania, called alkos, were constructed of stones on hills or by rivers. Groves were also designated as sacred places, being used to sacrifice to gods and to foretell the future. The remains of a few shrines, known from historic times, are being uncovered by archaeologists. It is in no way certain that the pre-Christian Lithuanian religion was centralized, but there was an important shrine to Perkunas in Vilnius.

Up until the 13th century, the spread of Christianity in Lithuania was prevented by its weak ties with Christian countries, the absence of a strong national state, and confrontation with the Crusaders. In about 1240, Mindaugas (d. 1263) became the ruler of Lithuania, thus uniting the unruly duchies, and in 1251 he was baptized for political reasons (thus gaining the king's title from the pope), though the people and most dukes kept the old faith. Lithuania starting from the 14th century has attracted a large diaspora of Jews, fleeing persecution in Spain and other Western European countries, while in Lithuania they were protected by law to live and practice their faith freely.

Over time, Catholic missionaries, primarily Dominicans and Franciscans, visited Lithuania, where some settled. Apart from a few violent incidents, the Christians and Pagans lived quite peacefully together. The official Christianization of Lithuania began under the Grand Duke of Lithuania Jogaila in 1387, who ruled as king Władysław II of Poland. This movement lasted for about a century. The destruction of the official cult of the Pagan religion also began at that time, though the manifestations of pre-Christian religion survived even into the 16th century, when missionary activity by the Jesuits began. Most of the nobility of Lithuania was baptized in 1387, with the baptism of the people following, while the more independent part of Lithuania, Samogitia, was formally Christianized only about 60 years later.

The Protestant Reformation was brought to Lithuania in the 1520s by the Lithuanian nobles who studied at the universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig, both strong Protestant centers of learning. The Reformation quickly spread through all the strata of society, facing strong resistance from only a small number of clergy who remained loyal to the Roman Catholic Church. The weakened state of the Catholic Church in Lithuania contributed to this rapid spread of the Reformation there, to the extent that by the mid-16th century, Lithuania was predominantly Protestant, with both Lutheran and Reformed influences present. The adherence of the influential Radvila family to Protestantism also contributed significantly to the spread of the Reformation generally.

However, in 1564 the ruler of Lithuania and Poland, Sigismund II Augustus (1520–1572), began implementing the decisions of the Council of Trent, which had been called by the Roman Catholic Church in 1545 to both reform the church and stop the further spread of Protestantism. Jesuit academic and missionary activities played a significant part in the Counter-Reformation that followed the Council. In 1570 the Jesuits established a college in Vilnius, which was later to become a university. With Catholicism regaining ground, the influence of the Protestants gradually faded, remaining strong only in the western and northern parts of Lithuania.

LITHUANIA

A separate issue was the presence of Eastern Orthodoxy in Lithuania and the Slavic lands within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, from the 13th to the 16th centuries. To keep political and social peace after the Christianization of Lithuania, Grand Duke of Lithuania Vytautas (1350–1430) strove unsuccessfully to establish a separate administrative unit of the Orthodox Church in Lithuania. Later there were also efforts to unite the Catholic and Orthodox churches within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland. These efforts were partially successful and culminated in 1596 with the creation of the union, which was not, however, joined by all Orthodox.

The Catholic-Orthodox problem was never resolved, and it re-emerged in a different form in the 18th century. Following the third division of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in 1795, by which the Russian Empire had annexed most of Lithuania, the Russians established a policy of assimilating Lithuania culturally, which also meant making it Orthodox. Both Catholic and Protestant churches suffered as a result, but in the end the effort proved unsuccessful. Lithuania retained its sense of nationhood, and both Catholic and Protestant churches played a significant role in preserving Lithuania's national character.

When an independent Lithuania re-emerged in 1918, the country recognized equal rights of all confessions, though the Concordat with the Catholic Church of 1926 established the privileged position of Catholicism, which remained the majority faith. About 5 percent of the population was Reformed or Lutheran, but they had little influence on Lithuanian politics as a whole. Additional Protestant and Free church traditions spread in Lithuania through the 20th century. The

Lithuania

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,216,000	2,979,000	89.3	−0.15	2,928,000	2,527,000
Roman Catholics	2,060,000	2,640,000	79.1	−0.09	2,566,000	2,181,000
Orthodox	116,000	152,000	4.6	−1.18	150,000	140,000
Protestants	37,200	40,700	1.2	0.61	70,000	90,000
Agnostics	605,000	320,000	9.6	−2.44	150,000	100,000
Atheists	304,000	23,300	0.7	−4.30	10,000	8,000
Muslims	6,000	7,000	0.2	−0.45	8,000	12,000
Jews	9,000	4,800	0.1	−0.45	4,500	4,500
Buddhists	0	700	0.0	−0.46	800	900
Hindus	0	600	0.0	−0.43	700	800
Baha'is	10	300	0.0	0.07	400	500
Ethnoreligionists	0	100	0.0	−0.47	100	100
Total population	3,140,000	3,336,000	100.0	−0.45	3,102,000	2,654,000

Baptists had been in Lithuania from the middle of the 19th century, and the Methodists, Seventh-day Adventists, Pentecostals, and the New Apostolic Church had established communities at the start of the 20th century. The American Bible Student movement (later known as Jehovah's Witnesses) appeared in the 1930s. Western Esotericism took deep roots in the country after one of Lithuania's famous writers, Vydūnas (Vilius Storosta), became an adept of Theosophy.

The Soviet occupation brought repression on all religions, while the persecution of religious minorities was most severe. Some communities were gradually eliminated, including those of the Seventh-day Adventists, Methodists, and Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Baptists were joined together with Pentecostals, in part as an attempt to eliminate their uniqueness and so undermine their existence. Independent, unregistered religious groups were under strict police control, receiving more tolerant treatment only toward the end of the 1970s.

The traditional religious communities faced both persecution and severe limitations on their previously flowering social activities. The Catholic and Reformed churches developed ties to the national resistance movement. Many of the social and religious leaders were exiled and forced to confess atheism. Communist Party membership was required for those taking higher positions in society. Atheist propaganda was widespread.

The restoration of Lithuanian independence in 1990 brought a revival of traditional religions as well as an influx of different religious movements from outside the country. The revival of religion peaked in 1992–1993, with a stabilization or even recession for most religious communities following at the beginning of the 21st century.

There is no state religion in Lithuania, and freedom of religion is established in the country's legal system. There are three levels of legal status for religious communities. Any religious community can be registered to become legal and freely practice their faith if they fulfill certain minimal legal requirements. However, there are nine traditional religions that are "state-recognized" as a part of Lithuanian cultural, social, spiritual heritage: Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, Evangelical Lutheran, Evangelical Reformed, Russian Orthodox, Old Believer, Jewish, Sunni Islam, and Karaite. This list of privileged religions is final. However, all religious communities are eligible for state recognition—an intermediate status—after they have existed in Lithuania for a few decades. So far, only the Association of the Baptist Churches in Lithuania and the Seventh-day Adventist Church have achieved such status. State recognition gives religious communities some tax privileges, permission to teach religion in public schools, and time on national television. They also enjoy greater social acceptance, as the nontraditional religions are often stigmatized as sects. The most influential religious body in Lithuanian society is the Roman Catholic Church, while other larger communities are based on either a particular ethnic minority group (for example, Russian Orthodoxy being concentrated among ethnic Russians) or a particular region (for example, Lutheranism being concentrated in the southwest part of the country).

Milda Ališauskiene and Donatas Glodenis

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Dominicans; Eastern Orthodoxy; Franciscans; Free Church; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Karaites; New Apostolic Church; Old Believers (Russia); Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Methodist Church.

References

- Beresnevičius, Gintaras. Religijų istorijos metmenys. Vilnius: Aidai, 1997.
- Beresnevičius, Gintaras. Lietuvių religija ir mitologija. Vilnius: Tyto Alba, 2004.
- “Communism’s Struggle with Religion in Lithuania.” Lituanus 9, no. 1 (March 1963).
- Glodenis, Donatas, and Lahayne, Holger, eds. Religijos Lietuvoje. Šiauliai: Nova Vita, 1999.
- Musteikis, A. The Reformation in Lithuania: Religious Fluctuation in the Sixteenth Century. Boulder, CO: East European Monographs, 1988.
- Peškaitis, Arūnas, and Donatas Glodenis. Šiuolaikinis religingumas. Vilnius: Vaga, 2000.
- Rimaitis, J. Religion in Lithuania. Vilnius: Gintaras, 1971.
- Suziedelis, S. The Sword and the Cross: A History of the Church in Lithuania. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1988.
- Vardys, V. S., ed. Krikščionybė Lietuvoje. Chicago: Ateitis, 1997.

Liturgical Year

From as early as the second century CE, the Christian church, following earlier Jewish tradition, has used the seasons of the year to mark sacred times. Around these times it has established festivals and holidays set aside to worship God and mark special moments in salvation history. While Jewish celebration revolves around the exodus from Egypt, the Christian church year focuses on the life and ministry of Jesus.

The Christian calendar is organized around two major feasts: Christmas and Easter. Advent ushers in Christmas and the season ends with the feast of Epiphany. Easter is preceded by Lent and leads to Pentecost. The periods of the year surrounding these two major seasons are known in the liturgical calendars as “Ordinary Time” and focus on various aspects of the Christian faith, particularly the mission of the church in the world.

The timing of all of the other moveable feasts in the Christian year revolves around Easter. The date of Easter itself is set according to a lunar cycle that changes. Consequently, seasons in the liturgical calendar vary in length and dates. As well, the Eastern Orthodox tradition, for example, uses the revised Julian calendar (proposed in 1923 and adopted by most Orthodox churches over the next several decades) rather than the Common Era calendar that has evolved over the last century from the Gregorian calendar. The major events of the liturgical year are as follows.

Advent: First Sunday of Advent through December 24 The beginning of the Christian liturgical year in Western churches, Advent marks the four Sundays before Christmas. The word “advent” comes from the Latin adventus, which means “coming.” This season just before Christmas is associated with the coming of Jesus as Messiah and marks a time of penitence, preparation, and anticipation.

Advent always contains four Sundays, beginning on the Sunday nearest to November 30 (the feast of Saint Andrew the Apostle). Consequently, Advent may begin as early as November 27 but always ends on December 24. If Christmas Eve is a Sunday, the last Sunday of Advent falls on that day, as Christmas Eve begins at sundown.

Christmas: December 25 through to Epiphany The Christmas season begins with the celebration of the birth of Jesus, Christmas day, or as a vigil on Christmas Eve. The Feast of Christmas lasts 12 days, until Epiphany. The Christmas season is a time of rejoicing in the incarnation. Christmas probably originated in the Roman culture, which celebrated the Winter Solstice on December 25, the shortest day of the year. It was a Pagan celebration of the birth of “The Invincible Sun” as it began its annual journey back north from its southernmost point. It is likely that Christians began celebrating the birth of Jesus at this time as an alternative to the Pagan observance of the Winter Solstice.

Epiphany Falling on January 6, Epiphany is a Christian feast that celebrates the revelation of God in human form in the person of Jesus Christ. In Greek, the word “epiphany” means “manifestation” and in the Eastern Christian tradition the event is called “Theophany,” which means “manifestation of God.” In the Eastern tradition, it falls on January 19. Roman Catholics will often celebrate it on the Sunday closest to January 6.

The Western observance commemorates the visitation of the biblical Magi to the child Jesus, stressing the appearance of Jesus to the Gentiles. In many Hispanic and European churches it is also known as “Three Kings Day.” Eastern Christians include the baptism of Jesus in their celebration, highlighting Christ’s revelation to the world as the Son of God.

Marking the 12th day of Christmas, Epiphany brings to an end the Advent and Christmas seasons.

Ordinary Time after the Baptism: Monday after the Epiphany through to Lent This season focuses on the early life and childhood of Christ, and then on his public ministry.

Lent: Ash Wednesday through Holy Saturday The season of Lent begins with Ash Wednesday and lasts until the final Saturday before Easter, Holy Saturday and includes Holy Week, the week before Easter. For six weeks preceding Easter, it is a time of penitential prayer, fasting, and almsgiving to prepare for the celebration of the resurrection of Jesus on Easter Sunday. This season of Lent originally was also a time of preparation for baptismal candidates and those separated from the church who were rejoining the community.

Holy Week, the last week of Lent, commemorates the last week of the earthly life of Jesus Christ. It covers the events of his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the Last Supper, the arrest, and his death by crucifixion. Beginning with the sixth Sunday of Lent, Holy Week includes Palm Sunday, Spy Wednesday, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday.

Easter: Easter Vigil through Pentecost The high feast of the Christian church, Easter celebrates the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Even churches that typically do not follow the liturgical calendar observe Easter. Easter Sunday begins a 50-day season of “Eastertide” that includes Ascension Day and leads to Pentecost.

The Easter Vigil is celebrated after night falls on the evening before Easter Sunday. It incorporates a “new light” ceremony in the form of candle-lighting and, often, an outdoor sunrise service. Typically, new converts to the church are baptized on Easter Sunday.

Six weeks into Easter, the church celebrates Ascension Day, a commemoration of the bodily ascension of Jesus into heaven. Until recently this holy day fell on the sixth Thursday after Easter Sunday, the traditional 40 days between the resurrection and ascension in the biblical narrative. However, some Roman Catholic provinces have moved the celebration to the following Sunday to facilitate the obligation of the faithful to receive Mass as part of the feast.

The last day of the Easter season is Pentecost, the festival that marks the birth of the Christian church by the power of the Holy Spirit as recorded in the biblical book of the Acts of the Apostles 2:1–41. The word “Pentecost” means “fiftieth day” and is so-named because it is celebrated 50 days after Easter Sunday.

Ordinary Time after Pentecost: The Day after Pentecost through the Final Day before Advent The second period of Ordinary Time is the longest liturgical season. Ordinary Time resumes after Pentecost and runs until the final Saturday before Advent. This period of Ordinary Time focuses on Christ’s reign as King of kings, and on the age of the church. It is meant to be a time of growth as the church meditates on the teachings of the Bible and their application to the Christian life. This is the present time between the age of the Apostles and the age of Christ’s Second Coming. The final Sunday in Ordinary Time is the Feast of Christ the King; the Saturday after this feast is the final day of Ordinary Time. The cycle repeats itself with the beginning of Advent.

Kevin Quast

See also: Advent; Ascension Sunday; Calendars, Religious; Christmas; Common Era Calendar; Easter; Holy Week; Lent; Pentecost.

References

- Adam, Adolf. The Liturgical Year: Its History and Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy. New York: Pueblo, 1981.
- Bonneau, Normand. Ritual Word, Paschal Shape. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998.
- Bradshaw, Paul F., and Lawrence A. Hoffman, eds. Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Fink, Peter E., ed. The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990.
- Lathrop, Gordon W. Holy People: A Liturgical Ecclesiology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1999.
- Martimort, Aime Georges, ed. The Church at Prayer: An Introduction to the Liturgy. Vol. 4: The Liturgy and Time. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1986.
- Nocent, Adrian. The Liturgical Year. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1977.
- Senn, Frank. Christian Liturgy: Catholic and Evangelical. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1997.
- Stookey, Laurence Hull. Calendar: Christ's Time for the Church. Nashville: Abingdon, 1996.
- Taft, Robert. "Towards a Theology of the Christian Feast." In Beyond East and West: Problems in Liturgical Understanding. Washington: Pastoral Press, 1984.
- Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.
- West, Fitz. Scripture and Memory: The Ecumenical Hermeneutic of the Three-Year Lectionaries. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1997.

Living Church of God

The Living Church of God is one of the three largest offshoots of the Worldwide Church of God (WCOG), with an active television, magazine, and booklet outreach.

In the years following the death of founder Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986) the WCOG dropped his distinctive teachings one by one under its new pastor general Joseph W. Tkach (1927–1995) and moved closer to standard conservative Protestant teachings. Many WCOG ministers found this difficult to accept. One of these was Roderick C. Meredith (b. 1930), who had been one of Armstrong's earliest students and affiliated with the WCOG since 1949. In 1992, after confrontations with the new leadership of the WCOG, Meredith left to found his own Sabbatarian millenarian church, the Global Church of God, holding firmly to the teachings of the WCOG during Armstrong's lifetime. Because of Meredith's previously high position in WCOG as senior evangelist, many other members left to follow him. The Global Church of God grew to a peak membership of around 7,000.

Armstrong had taught "top-down" church governance, with a single leader having sole authority over the church, and Meredith followed this model. In 1998 the board of the Global Church sought to temper Meredith's authority over his church. After a number of heated meetings and the quite public exchange of accusatory letters, Meredith left his own church and founded the Living Church of God, taking 70 to 80 percent of his ministers and members with him. The Living Church of God is more or less the old Global Church of God under a different name.

The remnant of the Global Church, reduced to fewer than 1,000 members, tried to continue, but they were faced with a dramatic drop in income from members' tithes. This difficulty was only compounded when founding members now with the Living Church demanded the repayment of loans they had made for the start-up funding of the Global Church, which voluntarily entered into a legal equivalent of bankruptcy. Its members re-formed as the Church of God, a Christian Fellowship (CGCF).

In a further twist to the tale, the president of CGCF, Raymond F. McNair (1930–2008), who had led the split from Meredith's original Global Church of God, left CGCF in 2000 and rejoined Meredith's new Living Church of God. He left Meredith's leadership for a second time in 2004 to found his own small church, the Church of God—21st Century (COG21).

In 2001 most CGCF congregations decided to merge with the largest offshoot from the WCOG, the United Church of God. A few remained separate, including the national organizations in Canada (under the name CGCF) and the United Kingdom (still called Global Church of God) and a small group in America that took the name the Church of the Eternal God. The three differently named churches, which are very small, have a joint leadership and literature and linked websites.

Shortly after Meredith left the Global Church of God another minister, David C. Pack, left to found the Restored Church of God, perhaps the most hard-line of all the offshoots from the "Worldwide family." Pack has published a book-length list of 280 teachings that he claims the "new" Worldwide Church has changed from Armstrong's original teachings and a further list of 174 teachings in which he believes all the other offshoots, between them, deviate from Armstrong's truth. A very literature-driven church, it avoided the copyright problems of the Philadelphia Church of God by completely rewriting many of Armstrong's books, along with new ones. The Restored Church of God claims more than 1,000 members.

The Living Church of God claims to hold to all the traditional teachings of Herbert W. Armstrong and the WCOG at the time of his death. Like most of the offshoots, it emphasizes in its literature and broadcasts the need to watch world news to "prove" that these are the end times. The second (or possibly third) largest offshoot from the WCOG, the Living Church of God has TV and radio programs called Tomorrow's World, the same name made famous by the WCOG, and publishes a magazine with the same name. It claims a membership of around 7,000 in more than 200 congregations.

The 78-year-old Meredith suffered a mild stroke in 2008 and appointed Richard Ames "to stand in for him as acting chief executive for the duration of his recovery"—one of the very few examples of a WCOG offshoot leader appointing a named deputy, and so a potential successor.

Living Church of God
PO Box 503077
San Diego, CA 92150-3077
www.lcg.org
www.tomorrowworld.org

Restored Church of God
PO Box 23295
Wadsworth, OH 44282
www.thercg.org

Global (UK), CGCF (Canada), Church of the Eternal God (U.S.A.) www.globalchurchofgod.co.uk www.churchofgodacf.ca
www.eternalgod.org

David V. Barrett

See also: Philadelphia Church of God; Sabbatarianism; United Church of God; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- The Journal: News of the Churches of God*. 2001–present. Big Sandy, TX: JMC Associates.
- Pack, David C. There Came a Falling Away. Wadsworth, OH: Restored Church of God, 2000.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah Books, 1997.

Local Church, The

The Local Church is the name assumed in the West by a movement variously known as the Little Flock or the Assembly Hall Churches. The Local Church grew out of the life and thought of Nee To-sheng, better known in the West as Watchman Nee (1903–1972). Nee was born in Shantou, China, and trained in classical Chinese studies. He was converted to Christianity in 1920 under the ministry of Dora Yu (1873–1931), a Methodist missionary who ran a Bible school in Shanghai.

A gathering of members of the Local Church in Taiwan. (J. Gordon Melton)

He was also deeply influenced by the writing of the British-based Keswick Revival and the exclusive Plymouth Brethren. He found himself drawn to the Plymouth Brethren and was associated with them into the 1930s.

Nee began his own ministry with a magazine, Revival, in 1923 and finished his first major book, The Spiritual Man, in 1928. By this time he had also come to the conclusion that the unity of the church would be best expressed by the establishment of only one church in each city; that is, that denominational competition was unbiblical and the only reason for different churches was geographical—hence the name Local Church. The first “local church” was founded in Shanghai in 1927. Nee also agreed with the ideal previously articulated by several 19th-century missionaries as “three-self.” In order to make the Protestant Christian movement in China independent of foreign churches, missions were urged to work toward three types of independence: self-governance, self-support, and self-propagation. Incarnating such an ideal was, of course, integral to the several indigenous Chinese Christian movements, including the Local Church. From the Brethren, Nee absorbed a dispensational approach to the Bible, seeing human history as unfolding in a series of God’s dispensations, during each of which God changed his way of relating to humanity.

The movement’s growth was somewhat disrupted by World War II and the Japanese invasion. In 1942 Nee took a job at the pharmaceutical company owned by his brother in order to raise money to support continued evangelical efforts, which had by this time become international. Some saw his taking a secular job as contradictory to his ministry, and the church's elders forbade him from preaching in Shanghai. The issue was not resolved until 1947, when Nee gave the church all of his business assets and withdrew from further secular work. He also encouraged other church members to "Hand Over" their business assets to the church, and the profits from these businesses began to be used to expand the evangelical work.

In the 1930s, Witness Lee (1905–1997) joined the Local Church movement and through the decade became a close associate of Nee. In 1948 Nee sent Lee to Taiwan, where the defeated Nationalist forces were to gather as the Communists took control of the mainland. The church came under attack from the Communist regime in the early 1950s. In 1952 Nee was arrested, and in 1956 he was tried and convicted of corrupt business practices and violations of public morals. He spent the rest of his life in jail. The government recognized only one Protestant church body, the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic movement, with which all Protestant Christians were required to affiliate. Thus the Local Church was banned in China, and Nee's movement became divided, with some congregations being absorbed into the Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic movement and others continuing as independent congregations outside legal structures.

However, the movement continued to grow outside of China. From Witness Lee's work in Taiwan, the Local Church began to spread throughout Southeast Asia, beginning with the ethnic Chinese communities in the larger cities. In 1962 Lee moved to the United States, learned English, and began to spread the movement among English-speaking residents of California, a first step in making the Local Church a truly international movement.

Lee gained an initial following among evangelical Christians attracted to his emphasis on the spiritual life and the immediate relationship between God and humanity. He continued the theology articulated earlier by Nee, which viewed humans as tripartite beings (body, soul, and spirit) and recognized an intimate relationship between God's Spirit and the human spirit. However, in the 1970s, as Lee expanded upon this mystical theology, trouble developed when some former followers began to suggest that Lee's approach, and some new language he introduced to focus the teachings, represented a loss of distinction between God and humanity and a distortion of traditional Christian teachings on the Trinity.

The seriousness of the theological charges were undergirded by the perception that Lee had gained most of his membership at the expense of other churches. In the early 1980s, the controversy erupted after spokespersons for several Christian counter-cult ministries, led by the Spiritual Counterfeits Project, accused the Local Church of being a cult. Included in their list of objections were several unique practices of the church, such as "Calling upon the name of the Lord," the invocation of God by the loud repetition of phrases such as "O Lord Jesus." (This is the practice that gave one group growing out of the Local Church the appellation "Shouters" in China.) In response, Lee had his theology and the church's practices examined by several trained theologians, who could find nothing heretical, and he attempted to reconcile his differences with his evangelical antagonists. However, the problems had grown with the expansion of Christian counter-cult ministries, and he was unable to resolve them. So in 1985 he sued the Spiritual Counterfeits Project in court and won a large multimillion-dollar judgment for libel and slander. For a period, the court case silenced the church's critics.

Following the court case, Lee began a new effort to encourage the further spread of the Local Church, which had stagnated in the 1980s. He moved to Taiwan for a period and led in the reorganization of the Local Church around a new emphasis on evangelism. He continued to lead the movement until his death in 1997. Since that time, the movement has been guided by a coalition of senior elders.

The Local Churches are organized as autonomous congregations, each led by elders selected from among its own membership. The congregations are tied together by their mutual acceptance of the fundamental doctrines and approach initially articulated by Nee and continued by Lee. Upon his arrival in California, Lee assumed the role of apostle and teacher. He organized Living Stream Ministry as an instrument to provide leadership for all of the local congregations. He published a magazine and a number of books and pamphlets. He also held regular training sessions to educate leaders on both the practical leadership of the churches and theological development of church life. Most church elders were part-time, unsalaried workers, but as the movement grew, some elders were designated as full-time co-workers. Although there are no ordained ministers, the co-workers have assumed many roles typically held by ordained clergy.

Living Stream Ministry continues to serve as the uniting force of the Local Church congregations. During the years of Lee's ministry, the Local Church became a worldwide movement, and it has associated congregations on every continent. Each congregation takes the name of the city in which its members reside. An unknown number of people, reportedly as high as 800,000, continue the ministry of Watchman Nee in mainland China, where a number of leaders have been arrested for preaching outside the established churches. In a 1983 court case, the movement was declared to be counter-revolutionary in but one of a variety of actions to suppress the group, and various international human rights groups have come to its defense. The Local Church in Hong Kong has a large following, necessitating multiple meeting halls, and some 60,000 members are found across Taiwan. Strong congregations are located throughout Southeast Asia, where the movement has moved beyond its base within the Chinese communities, and also across North America. Many Local Churches have their own websites. Worldwide membership is in excess of 1 million.

The belief statement of the Local Churches identifies it with conservative Protestant Free Church beliefs. It strongly affirms the Trinity and the divinity of Christ, substitutionary atonement, and the verbal inspiration of the Bible. Sectarian divisions and denominationalism is eschewed, and the oneness of Christian believers is affirmed. The Local Church places itself in a history of "recovery" of biblical Christianity, which it deems was lost through the centuries after the Apostolic era. The recovery began with Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation and continued through other movements, including the Methodists and the Plymouth Brethren (now generally called the Christian Brethren). A new phase began with Watchman Nee and his emphasis on the Local Church.

Lee kept up a prodigious schedule of teaching and speaking through the 35 years after his move to the United States. His lectures and sermons were transcribed and published and constitute a large collection of Christian literature. He wrote a multivolume commentary on the Bible and a translation of the Bible, published as the Recovery Version. Recordings of Lee's Bible studies are featured on the Local Church's radio program, Life Study of the Bible.

In the late 1990s, critics of the Local Church began to resurface; in response, leadership of the church in Anaheim, California, began anew to convince their critics, all from the evangelical counter-cult movement, of their orthodoxy. Running into opposition on one level, Local Church leaders instituted a suit against John Ankerberg and John Weldon, authors of the Encyclopedia of Cults and New Religions, who included the Local Church among the groups they covered. The suit was unsuccessful; however, the effort led to a major re-evaluation of the Local Churches by some of their more prominent critics and the issuance of a statement that they now accepted the Local Church into the circle of their fellowship. Their testimony largely cemented the effort of the Local Churches to re-integrate into the large world of evangelicalism.

The largest number of Christians who have grown from the work originated by Watchman Nee remain in China and Southeast Asia. The American-based Living Streams Ministry has a counterpart in Taiwan, which offers primary assistance to those members who speak Chinese throughout Southeast Asia. It is also attempting to stay in touch with an estimated 1 million "members" still in the People's Republic. Many of these "members" are part of the larger Church of Christ in China; others attend one of the unregistered churches that now dot the landscape. Living Stream Ministry pursues a variety of initiatives to communicate with government officials in China and to establish Watchman Nee's and Witness Lee's place in Chinese Christian history.

Living Stream Ministry
2431 W. La Palma Ave.
Anaheim, CA 92801
<http://www.lsm.org/> (in English, Chinese, Spanish, and Korean)
<http://www.livingstream.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement/China Christian Council; Christian Brethren; Evangelicalism; Luther, Martin.

References

The Beliefs and Practices of the Local Church.

Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1978.

Hanegraaff, Hank, Gretchen Passantino, and Fuller

Theological Seminary. The Local Churches:

“Genuine Believers and Fellow Members of the Body of Christ.” Fullerton, CA: DCP Press, 2008.

Kinnear, Angus I. Against the Tide. Fort Washington,

PA: Christian Literature Crusade, 1973.

Lee, Witness. God’s New Testament Economy.

Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1986.

Lee, Witness. The History of the Church and the Local Churches. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1991.

Lee, Witness. Life Study of the New Testament.

17 vols. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1984.

Lee, Witness. Life Study of the Old Testament.

15 vols. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1997.

Lee, Witness. Watchman Nee: A Seer of the Divine

Revelation in the Present Age. Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1997.

Nee, Watchman. The Collected Works. 62 vols.

Anaheim, CA: Living Stream Ministry, 1994.

Nee, Watchman. The Normal Christian Church Life.

Washington, DC: International Students Press, 1969.

Wu, Silas H. Dora Yu and Christian Revival in 20th

Century China. Boston: Pishon River Publications, 2002.

ish colonial interests worldwide. Particular inspiration came from the widely published letters sent back to England by William Carey (1761–1834), who had launched a mission in India in 1793.

Thus, in December 1794 a group of ministers and laypeople from the Church of England, the Presbyterian Church, and the Independents or the Congregational Church (the largest number) met to consider the idea of forming a pan-denominational missionary society. In the end, the Congregationalists became the primary supporters of the new LMS, constituted in 1795. Both the Church of England and the Presbyterian Church soon had their own competing missionary structures.

The primary field chosen for work was the South Pacific, then a territory devoid of Protestant church work. The LMS purchased a ship, the Duff, and in September 1796 it sent 13 men, 5 women, and 2 children. This first cadre was dispersed between Tahiti and Tonga, with one person staying in the Marquesas. Beginning with this initial band, the Society would dispatch additional missionaries to the Cook Islands and then to most of the larger South Pacific island groups. These first missionaries set a pattern for later missionaries—working with the indigenous population to train a set of local teachers and leaders and translating and publishing the Bible in the local language.

Early in the 19th century, the Society turned its attention to Africa. Two of the most famous people in Christian missionary history, John MacKenzie (1835–1899) and David Livingstone (1813–1873), were LMS missionaries who launched their work in 1840 in South Africa. MacKenzie became a politician and urged British expansion into the lands north of Boer-controlled territory, and Livingstone explored that territory. The Society also pioneered work in China and Mongolia. During its peak years, through the 19th century, the Society supported some 250 missionaries at any given moment.

As a variety of denominational and pan-denominational Protestant missionary societies began working alongside each other, the LMS entered negotiations to cut down on duplication of efforts and direct competition. In this manner, different societies accepted responsibility for different countries or sections of countries. Such agreements worked through much of

London Missionary Society

The London Missionary Society (LMS), now a constituent part of the Council for World Mission, is one of several organizations that facilitated the massive expansion of Christianity around the world in the 19th and 20th centuries. It emerged in 1795 in England out of the growing consciousness there of people in the world outside Europe, itself a sign of developing Brit-the 19th century, until the very success of many missionary efforts brought different groups into competition. The origin of the modern ecumenical movement lies, to a great extent, with these attempts to solve the problems of competition and to reduce the introduction of sectarian differences into the mission field from the Americas and Europe.

World War II proved pivotal to the LMS. Following the war, the former colonies of Great Britain became independent, and many territories—like China, the single largest LMS missionary field—were closed to foreign missionaries. Already a number of the missions had matured into independent churches, and beginning in 1947, with the Church of South India, the congregational work in a variety of countries merged with other Protestant missions/churches to form united Protestant churches. Thus in 1966 the LMS and a sister organization, the Commonwealth Missionary Society, merged to form the Congregational Council for World Mission. Then in 1977, a further reorganization and merger included the Presbyterian Board of Missions, founded in 1847, and led to the creation of the Council for World Mission (CWM). The CWM envisions itself as a cooperative, multicultural missionary effort combining the resources of 32 denominational bodies based on continents around the world that now share a partnership relationship. Missionaries are drawn from all of the cooperating churches and may be sent to any country as needed.

Council for World Mission
Ipalo House
32-34 Great Peter St.
London SW1P 2DB
UK
<http://www.cwmission.org.uk>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Carey, William; Church of South India.

References

- Handbook of the Council for World Mission.* London: Council on World Mission, 1984.
- Hiney, Thomas. On the Missionary Trail: A Journey through Polynesia, Asia, and Africa with the London Missionary Society. New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.

Kane, J. Herbert. A Global View of Christian Missions. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1971.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Lourdes

In 1858, Lourdes, a small town in southern France near the Spanish border, became the site of the most well-known modern apparition of the Blessed Virgin Mary. That year, a young girl named Bernadette Soubirous (1844–1879) had visions of the Virgin over a period of six months. The initial vision occurred on February 11, a few days after she had received her First Communion at the local church, her village being a Roman Catholic community. As she searched for wood near a grotto, her attention was drawn to a moving rosebush, and shortly thereafter what she would describe as a young and beautiful woman appeared above the bush. Bernadette immediately dropped to her knees and began to pray and was joined by the woman. The woman then disappeared without saying anything.

The Lady, eventually established to be the Virgin Mary, appeared on 18 subsequent occasions over the next 6 months. Bernadette first heard her speak during the third apparition. During her ninth appearance she instructed Bernadette to dig in the ground. Water would emerge and she was to drink from and bathe in that water. At the spot she dug, a spring began to flow. That spring would then be seen as flowing with healing water available for all. The Lady finally instructed Bernadette to see to the building of a chapel at the grotto.

The local priest, who saw Bernadette as naïve and somewhat ignorant, pressed her to inquire of the identity of the Lady she was seeing and with whom she was conversing, especially after the request to build the chapel was made. Finally, in her last appearance, the Lady identified herself as the Immaculate Conception. At the time, Catholic theologians of the day were pursuing a full inquiry into the viability of the concept of immaculate conception, the idea that the Virgin

Shrine to Our Lady of Lourdes, Palermo, Sicily. (J. Gordon Melton)

Mary had been born without original sin. (Among non-Catholics, the idea of the immaculate conception is often confused with Jesus' birth from a virgin, rather than Mary's birth without sin.) That Bernadette came forward with this somewhat sophisticated idea served to convince the parish priest that she was, in fact, in contact with the Virgin.

The increasingly secularized French public and government officials did not accept Bernadette's claims as readily as the priest. Even as Lourdes gained fame as a healing shrine, government officials occasionally moved against it and at one point closed it for several years.

Through her life, in the years following the visions, Bernadette suffered from a spectrum of illnesses. Her health, in fact, delayed her entrance into a religious order. She was finally accepted only after the local bishop put pressure on the Sisters of Nevers and they found a place for her at the Convent of Saint-Gildard.

During her rather brief career as a nun, she simply grew more ill, and finally passed away on April 16, 1879, at the convent's infirmary.

Many came to view her body, which was allowed to remain on view for three days. She was placed in a coffin on April 19, and it was sealed in the presence of a number of witnesses. Permissions were secured for its movement and on May 30, 1879, the coffin was transferred to the convent's chapel, dedicated to Saint Joseph. In 1909 the coffin was opened, and officials discovered that her body had remained uncorrupted. Once news seeped out, this phenomenon increased her reputation. To this day, her body remains on view at the Nevers chapel.

Meanwhile, though Bernadette remained isolated at the convent, the spring continued to flow and the grotto of the apparitions became the site of a growing number of reported cures. Though tens of thousands of cures were claimed, only a small percentage passed the very strict standards of the medical bureau that was established to examine different cases and assemble records of those that appeared to be medically unexplainable. Over the years the original small chapel was replaced with a large basilica.

Bernadette was canonized in 1933 by Pope Pius XI (r. 1922–1939). A nearby church, the Basilica of Saint Pius X, was dedicated by Angelo Cardinal Roncalli (1881–1963) then the papal nuncio to France and later known as Pope John XXIII. The building, largely underground, can accommodate a crowd of 30,000.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: John XXIII, Pope; Pilgrimage; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Carrel, Alexis. The Voyage to Lourdes. New York: Harper, 1950.
- Crawford, Kerry. Lourdes Today: A Pilgrimage to Mary's Grotto. Ann Arbor, MI: Servant Books, 2008.
- McEachern, Patricia. A Holy Life: The Writings of St. Bernadette of Lourdes. Ft. Collins, CO: Ignatius Press, 2005.
- Neame, Alan. The Happening at Lourdes: The Sociology of the Grotto. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1967.

Taylor, Therese. Bernadette of Lourdes: Her Life, Death and Visions. London: Burns & Oates, 2003.

Lubavitch Hasidism

In the late 20th century, the Lubavitch emerged as the largest of the Hasidic bodies that survived the Holocaust of World War II, during which many Hasidic bodies ceased to exist and others survived as mere remnants of their earlier life. The Lubavitch community began under Rabbi Schneur Zalman (1745–1813). He had studied with Rabbi Dov Baer, a prominent Hasidic scholar, and Dov Baer's death in 1772 became the catalyst for the founding of the Lubavitch dynasty. Zalman was sent to Lithuania to spread the Hassidic message, and the Lubavitcher community dates its origins from the start of Zalman's teaching in Lithuania.

The son of Rabbi Zalman, also known as Rabbi Dov Baer (1773–1827), or the Mittler Rebbe, succeeded his father and developed the Chabad, as the Lubavitch approach to Hasidism became known. In the late 1820s, he relocated to Lubavitch, Belarus, from which the community's designation is derived. From Dov Baer, the lineage passed to Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1789–1866), the son of Rabbi Zalman's daughter. The lineage eventually passed to Schneerson's grandson, Joseph Isaac Schneerson (1880–1950), who brought the movement to the United States. In the 1920s, Rabbi Schneerson founded the Agudas Chasidas Chabad of the United States of America and Canada, first visiting America in 1929. He had resided in Warsaw since the end of World War I, but he was persuaded to leave as the Nazi threat loomed. He took up residence in the United States in 1941.

The Lubavitch teach out of the Kabbalah, the ancient Jewish mystical system. The Kabbalah pictures the world as having emanated from God through several realms of spiritual activity. These spheres (sephirot) are pictured on a diagram called the Tree of Life. The name of the Lubavitch teachings, Chabad, is derived from three of the sephirot—Chochmah, Binah, and Daath—wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge. In the Chabad attempt to come into a relationship with the divine, an insistence on study and the intellectual appropriation of truth stands beside a need for faith and belief. As do other Hasidic groups, the Lubavitch use a rite derived from the writings of Rabbi Isaac Luria (1534–1572), a mystic and Kabbalist in Palestine. The prayers of the ritual contain special intentions relating to the mystical union of God and humanity. The Lubavitch also have a commitment to the larger Jewish community and have tried to dispel the low opinion that many Hasids have had of unbelieving and non-practicing Jews in general.

Lubavitchers are known for their music and dancing. Dancing is seen as a basic expression of the inward joy of the divine life. Men dance separately from women, mixed dancing being prohibited. Dancing forms an essential part of Hasidic gatherings, especially the festivals and anniversary occasions.

After World War II, the Rebbe Schneerson initiated a program of expanding the community's school and centers. When his successor, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1902–1994), took over the relatively small movement, he began to build the movement, based on its traditional openness to the whole of the Jewish community. Over the next decades it grew impressively as Jews across the spectrum, from Orthodox to Reform and even unbelief, discovered the movement and affiliated with it. Its work was furthered through the community's publishing arm, Merkos Publication Society; its educational arm, Merkos L'Inyone Chinuch; and its relief organization, Ezrat Pleitim. By the time of Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson's death, the movement had more than 200,000 followers, and centers had been opened in the midst of Orthodox Jewish communities worldwide. Its growth is partially attributed to its acceptance of modern technology, which other Hasidim have tended to reject, and especially to an international network of emissaries who establish missions of outreach.

Toward the end of his life, Rebbe Schneerson, who had led the movement for four decades, suggested that the time of the expected Messiah was at hand. He cited as evidence, among other incidents, the fall of Communism and the U.S. victory in the Gulf War. Some of his followers came to believe that he was the Messiah, and his death in 1994 placed the issue of the future clearly before the community. Following his passing, many refused to speak of him in the past tense, while some insisted that he would somehow cheat death. They refused to discuss a successor, and none had been named as of 2009. Banners and postcards were printed with an oft-repeated slogan, “Long live our master, teacher, and rebbe, King Messiah, forever and ever.”

In the meantime, all of the Rebbe’s spoken words, including his Sabbath sermons (sometimes four hours in length), were recorded and transcribed. These remain as a body of teachings from which the community can continue to draw inspiration. As a first step in sharing his wisdom, in 1995 a commercial publisher was allowed to publish Toward a Meaningful Life: The Wisdom of the Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson. The headquarters of the Lubavitcher movement is located in Brooklyn, New York, and there are many Chabad websites. As the 21st century begins, there are more than 2,000 Chabad centers serving more than 200,000 members.

Lubavitch Movement Headquarters
770 Eastern Parkway
Brooklyn, NY 11213
<http://www.chabadcenters.com/>
<http://www.chabad.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hasidism; Orthodox Judaism.

References

- Challenge*. London: Lubavitch Foundation of Great Britain, 1970.
- Dalpin, Chaim. The Seven Chabad-Lubavitch Rebbes. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Fishkoff, Sue. The Rebbe’s Army: Inside the World of Chabad-Lubavitch. New York: Schocken, 2005.
- Hilsenrad, Zalman Aryeh. The Baal Shem Tov. Brooklyn: Kehot Publication Society, 1967.
- Mintz, Jerome R. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Schneerson, Menachem Mendel. I Await His Coming Every Day: Based on Talks of the Lubavitch Rebbe. Brooklyn, NY: Kehot Publication Society, 1998.
- Schneerson, Menachem Mendel. Toward a Meaningful Life: The Wisdom of the Rebbe, Menachem

Mendel Schneerson. Adapted by Simon Jacobson. New York: William Morrow, 1995.

Warshaw, Mal. Tradition: Orthodox Jewish Life in America. New York: Schocken Books, 1976.

Lumbini

Tradition locates the birth place of Gautama Buddha as Lumbini, in what is now Nepal, and in the 20th century it joined the three other sites connected with Buddha’s life—Kusinagara, Sarnath, and Bodhgaya—as one of the four major holy places of international Buddhism. Many Buddhists also accept the stories from Buddhist literature that tell of events relative to the birth, which recount how Maya Devi, Buddha’s mother, gave birth while traveling to her parents’ home in Devadaha. She took a rest in Lumbini under a sal tree. The event is dated as early as 642 BCE, and as late as 566. The infant is also said to have spoken immediately after separating from his mother, “This is my final rebirth.” He then took seven steps to the four cardinal points of the compass, and a lotus flower sprang forth with each step.

Scholars of Buddhism have in the last generation called almost every occurrence in Buddha’s life into question, including the birth stories, but find themselves on firmer ground when it comes to the later history of Lumbini. Several centuries after the Buddha lived, King Ashoka visited the area (249 BCE) and erected a stele commemorating the event. He also ordered the building of a wall around the village as well as the placement of a stone pillar and four stupas (Buddhist shrines to the dead) to mark the spot. He capped his visit by reducing the taxes that the village would have to pay in the future.

Lumbini remained a Buddhist center under Buddhist hegemony until the ninth century CE. In subsequent centuries, Muslims invaded the area and then Hindus took control of the region. The Buddhist structures were destroyed, and eventually the memory of the location faded. Thus, the 1895 discovery of the Asoka stele by Alois A. Feuhrer, a famous German archaeologist, made news. His find led to further probes that uncovered a temple decorated with scenes of the

The Maya Devi Temple in Lumbini, near the birthplace of the Buddha. (Jun Mu/Dreamstime.com)

Buddha's life, a relatively later temple that had probably been constructed over one of the stupas originally erected by Asoka. Further excavations later in the century uncovered a number of the Buddhist sites. Toward the end of the century, Japanese Buddhists raised money to have the area renovated, and even though located in a remote corner of the world and difficult to reach, Lumbini has re-emerged as a place for Buddhist pilgrimages.

Contemporary pilgrims in Lumbini will find a Tibetan Buddhist monastery, a Nepalese temple (financed in part by U Thant, the Burmese who served as United Nations secretary from 1961 to 1971), and the Maya Devi Temple. The pillar with the Asoka stele remains the most important artifact in the town. The garden, where tradition places the birth of the child who became the Buddha (the Enlightened One) is said to have occurred is now cared for by the devoted faithful, and visitors are invited to take a symbolic wash at the nearby Puskarmi pond in which the infant Buddha got his first bath.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Ashoka; Bodh-Gaya; Buddha, Gautama; Pilgrimage.

References

- Majupuria, Trilok Chandra. Holy Places of Buddhism in Nepal and India: A Guide to Sacred Places in Buddha's Lands. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1987.
- Panabokke, Gunaratne. History of the Buddhist Sangha in India and Sri Lanka. Dalugama, Kelaniya, Sri Lanka: Postgraduate Institute of Pali and Buddhist Studies, University of Kelaniya, 1993.
- Tulku, Tarthang, ed. Holy Places of the Buddha. Vol. 9, Crystal Mirror. Berkeley, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1994.

Lusitanian Church/Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church

The Lusitanian Church is a small Portuguese church founded at the end of the 19th century under the auspices of members of the American Episcopal Church and the Church of England. The church, named after Lusitania, the ancient denomination for the territory that is now Portugal, is a formal member of the Anglican Communion since 1980. It is also affiliated with the World Council of Churches, the Conference of European Churches, and the Conference of Protestant Churches of the European Latin Countries.

After four centuries of almost complete absence, reformist movements saw the relative religious freedom that followed the establishment of a constitutional monarchy in 1834 as an opportunity to assert themselves on Portuguese soil. A few decades later, the introduction of the dogmas of papal infallibility and universal jurisdiction by the First Vatican Council (1870–1871) caused much uproar both among the reformist churches and urban Roman Catholics seduced by Liberalism. In this context, some Spanish priests established in Lisbon several places of worship where they celebrated religious services with Portuguese translations of the English Prayer Book and of the American Book of Common Prayer. Under this influence, some Roman Catholic Portuguese priests and laypeople began to form congregations in various places. In March 8, 1880, these priests and the lay representatives of their congregations met at a synod presided over by Bishop Riley, consecrated in the American Episcopal Church, and celebrated the formalization of the Lusitanian Church. Its members refer to this occasion not as the foundation but as the restoration of their church. They state that the Lusitanian Church is the resumption of the original Christian church that existed in the Iberian Peninsula and was allegedly initiated by early missionaries of the third century or, as some claim, by Saint Paul himself. At the time of the Visigothic invasion in the fifth century CE, the church was already well established, with its own councils and a distinct liturgy. According to this narrative, the Roman Catholic Church only managed to impose a strict papal jurisdiction with the Christian (re)conquest, which began in the ninth century.

From its “restoration” until 1964, the Council of Bishops was formed solely by Irish bishops. The first Portuguese bishop, António Fiandor, was consecrated only in 1958 by three foreign Anglican bishops. The reason for this is that, according to the Lusitanian Church, a legitimate consecration requires historical episcopal succession. Throughout the 1960s, Concordats of Full Communion were established with the American Episcopal Church, the Church of Ireland, the Church of England, and the Old Catholic bishops of the Union of Utrecht.

In 1980, two years after a formal application to the archbishop of Canterbury, the Lusitanian Church was welcomed into the Anglican Communion, of which it is still today an extra-provincial diocese. Following the approval of a new Law of Religious Freedom by the Portuguese Parliament, the Lusitanian Church applied for the status of Established Church, which was granted in 2008. Among other privileges, it can now celebrate religious marriages with civil effects, its donors benefit from a tax deduction, and the church can formalize agreements with the Portuguese state on matters of common interest.

The Lusitanian Church functions as a single diocese divided into two archdeaconries: the South (centering at Lisbon) and the North (centering at Oporto). Most of the 16 congregations cluster around these 2 major cities. The general governing bodies are the bishop, who devotes himself almost entirely to the spiritual leadership of the church; the Synod, consisting of every priest of the church and a lay representative from each parish; and a standing committee, which deals with administration affairs.

Currently, the Lusitanian Church has about 5,000 baptized members and 1,500 communicants, with 8 active priests and 6 active deacons in 16 places of worship. In 1997, 3 women were ordained as deacons. It was the first time in over eight centuries of Christianity in Portugal that women became part of the clergy of a church with the Apostolic ministry.

The doctrine of the Lusitanian Church follows the main parameters confessed by the Anglican Community and expressed in the Lambeth Quadrilateral. Furthermore, it declares itself to be in the historical and doctrinal continuity of the first centuries’ churches existing in Lusitania and declines to accept the later additions and changes introduced by the Roman Catholic Church. Its liturgy reflects this alleged heritage. The Portuguese Book of Common Prayer is said to be in accordance with the “Primitive Apostolic Church” and its compilation was largely based on the ancient Missal de Braga.

One of the most visible activities of the Lusitanian Church is its ecumenical effort of promoting inter-faith dialogue and the foundation of the Portuguese Council of Christian Churches, along with the Methodists and the Presbyterians. Since its “restoration,” the Lusitanian Church has been promoting a ministry of service to the underprivileged and nowadays it includes three institutions with social responsibility (including a day care center, a kindergarten, assistance to the elderly and promotion of social and cultural activities among the blind). Initially, this effort was more focused on the struggle against illiteracy, which by the end of the 19th century was as high as 80 percent in Portugal. Together with every place of worship that was opened, a primary school was also started. Presently, two of those schools are still functioning.

The Lusitanian Church

Rua de Afonso Albuquerque, nº 86

Apartado 392

4431-905 V. N. Gaia

Portugal

<http://www.igreja-lusitana.org/>

Tiago Santos, Pedro Soares, and Miguel H. Farias

See also: Church of England; Church of Ireland; Episcopal Church; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Lusitanian Church. Vila Nova de Gaia, 1985.

Moreira, Eduardo Henriques. Esboço da História da Igreja Lusitana. Vila Nova de Gaia: Sínodo da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica, 1949.

Relatório de 1914 da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica. Porto, Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica, 1915.

Soares, Fernando da Luz. Igreja Lusitana: Caminho para Cristo. Vila Nova de Gaia: Comissão permanente do Sínodo da Igreja Lusitana Católica Apostólica Evangélica, 1983.

Soares, Fernando da Luz. “The Lusitanian Catholic Apostolic Evangelical Church: A Century of Portuguese Anglican Witness.” The Convocation of American Churches in Europe website, 1998. www.tec-europe.org/partners/Lusitanian_partner.htm. Accessed October 6, 2008.

Luther, Martin

1483–1546

Martin Luther, an Augustinian monk, and professor of theology at the relatively new University of Wittenberg, Saxony, began a relatively mild critique of the Roman Catholic Church at the beginning of the 16th century that quickly turned into a complete call for the reformation of the church. The Reformation movement he initiated would find support especially in northern Europe and result in the formation of the Evangelical (Lutheran) Church based in Germany and Scandinavia that would in the subsequent century become a worldwide phenomenon.

Luther was born on November 10, 1483, in Eisenben, Germany. His father, though not of the nobility, was relatively well-to-do and his ambitions for his son included an education. As a youth, Martin was sent to schools in Mansfield, Magdeburg, and Eisenach, which prepared him for entrance to the University of Erfurt in 1501. He graduated four years later with an M.A. Degree. At this point, his college career was diverted by a period of personal soul-searching occasioned by the death of a friend. Feeling his own finitude, he entered the Augustinian Order, within which he combined rumination on his personal spiritual situation with theological studies. He was ordained a priest in 1507. His superiors recognized his intellectual talents and selected him for advanced studies. He earned his bachelor’s degree in theology at the University of Wittenberg in 1509.

After completing his doctorate (1512), he stayed at Wittenberg as a lecturer. He initially chose to focus his lectures on the biblical book of Psalms (1513–1515). His studies and lectures led to a belief that Christian salvation focused on a new relationship with God that was based in faith in Christ rather than deeds of merit done by the individual. He concluded that a Christian was also a sinner and hence undeserving of God's love. God nevertheless redeemed individuals and out of that new relationship started by God, the individual believer tried to conform his or her life to God's will. While sacraments and good deeds were still an important part of religious existence, they paled in comparison to the new relationship with God.

Statue of Martin Luther, Worms, Germany. (J. Gordon Melton)

With this new insight, Luther turned his attention to Paul's letter to the Romans, out of which came his own personal experience of salvation. He came to feel that God had forgiven his sin and that he had received that salvation by faith and faith alone. Luther moved from his intense personal experiences into the middle of a very public controversy. Johann Tetzel (1466–1519), a Dominican monk, traveled through Germany to sell indulgences. Any funds he raised were forwarded to Rome to cover the cost of building St. Peter's Cathedral.

Indulgences fit into a view of salvation that saw individuals pursuing a lifelong effort to become holy.

The average person fell far short, holiness being reached by only a few, the saints, most of whom had abandoned secular occupations for the religious life. The average person would have to continue the process of becoming holy in purgatory, a place of punishment and purification. Most thought of their family and friends who had previously passed away as now existing in purgatory. One could shorten her or his stay in purgatory through various acts of goodness and/or piety. The church, however, possessed the power to grant "indulgences," pardons that would reduce or even eliminate one's time in purgatory, or the time of a loved one. Tetzel, in particular, offered an indulgence to any who contributed to the construction of St. Peter's.

Luther saw indulgences, especially the commercialization of them by Tetzel, as a practice built on bad theology and a complete misunderstanding of grace, faith, and biblical salvation. He decided to challenge the practice and did so by proposing 95 points for debate. These points were written down and the list, reputedly, nailed to the door of the parish church at Wittenberg on October 31, 1517. The sale of indulgences dropped dramatically. Tetzel attempted to recover by proposing a set of counterpoints. Luther and Tetzel's interaction led to a debate, though Tetzel would be replaced by theologian Johann Eck. The debate was held in 1519 in Leipzig. Luther built his defense by direct reference to the Bible, its text being cited to refute the rulings of popes and church councils. He claimed that both popes and councils had made mistakes. Luther was declared a heretic and excommunicated.

In response to the debate and subsequent excommunication, Luther made his case to a larger audience in three lengthy essays. The Appeal to the German Nobility (1520) centered on the idea of the priesthood of all believers. The effect of asserting that every person was a priest had in effect removed some authority from parish priests and recast it in terms of the personal relationship between God and the believer. The whole concept would unfortunately soon be taken in some quite radical (and even violent) ways, much to Luther's consternation. He took up the subject of the church's elaborate sacramental system in Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520) and concluded that only two of the church's sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, met the criteria for continuation. On a lesser but not unimportant point, Luther argued that the cup of wine representing the blood of Christ should be given to the believers when the Lord's Supper was celebrated. Finally, Luther laid out a more systematic and complete understanding of faith in God, salvation, and the Christian life in The Freedom of the Christian Man (1520).

Access to one of the new printing presses invented in the previous century by Johann Gutenberg allowed the relatively quick circulation of Luther's writings, and their broad circulation led the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire to summon Luther to the meeting of its governing body, the Diet, which met at Worms. In defending his writings, Luther appealed to the Bible and to reason. The Diet condemned him, but the secular ruler of the region, Frederick, the elector of Saxony (1463–1525), was both very protective of his university and its faculty and strongly opposed the draining of finances from his territory to Rome. In addition, by the time the Diet met, significant support for Luther had developed across northern Germany. Though condemned, Frederick arranged for Luther's disappearance. Luther took the time to produce additional materials supportive of the developing perspective. The major new items produced by Luther at this time were his translation of the New Testament in the German language (1522) and a volume of hymns that included some written by Luther himself (1524).

The progress of Luther's Reformation was called into question by the peasants' revolt, a violent protest by the poorest segment of society using Luther's proclamation of the priesthood of all believers and the freedom of the Christian man. The revolt was put down at a high cost in lives. On May 15, 1525, the peasants were finally defeated at the battle at Frankenhausen, and, in what some saw as the darkest moment of the Reformation, some 50,000 peasants were killed.

The peasants' revolt momentarily slowed but did not stop the Reformation. It occurred in the context of other brutal battles, not the least being those related to the Muslim invasion of Europe. As Luther's movement in Germany developed in the 1520s, Turkish forces moved on Vienna and came close to capturing it.

While the churches in Germany were instituting the changes called for by Luther, a similar movement was developing in German-speaking portions of Switzerland under Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531). The two Reformation efforts developed along a parallel course, but a significant disagreement emerged between the two leaders over the issue of the sacraments. Zwingli came to believe that baptism and the Lord's Supper were primarily ordinances that continued because they were commanded by Christ. The Lord's Supper was primarily a memorial meal remembering Christ's sacrificial death. In sharp contrast, Luther believed that Christ became present for the believer in the sacramental act. Since they held the great majority of Reformation principles in common, Zwingli met Luther at Marburg in 1529 and the two tried to reconcile their few differences. The Marburg Colloquy, however, was unable to resolve the conflicting views on the sacraments, and the two men went their separate ways.

Unable to reconcile with Zwingli, Luther renewed his attempt to reach an agreement with the Roman Catholics. Through a document largely written by his faculty colleague Philip Melancthon (1497–1560), in 1530 Luther and his supporters presented a statement of their beliefs to the Lutheran princes of the Diet meeting at Augsburg in 1530. Though the Augsburg Confession was rejected, the Lutheran movement had reached a point of maturity and strength that largely assured its perpetuation.

During the remaining 16 years of his life, Luther spent much of his time to writing, while his colleagues took the lead in the various battles with the Catholic forces. From 1533 to his death in 1546 he served as the dean of the theology faculty at Wittenberg. Meanwhile, on June 13, 1525, Luther had given up his monk's vows of celibacy and married Catherine von Bora (1499–1552). She bore six children, four of whom reached adulthood.

In the later years of his life, Luther completed the German translation of the whole Bible (1534), compiled the Lutheran confessional statement known as the Smalcald Articles (1537), and wrote the Short Confession Concerning the Lord's Supper (1544) and a final attack on Roman Catholic authority, Against the Papacy at Rome Founded by the Devil (1545). Now considered one of his ill-considered works, he wrote a harsh polemic against the Jewish community, Jews and their Lies, published in 1543. Many consider this work a prime example of the anti-Semitism of the era.

Luther's death occurred in the midst of a trip to Eisleben. While there, his health failed him and he was too ill to return to Wittenberg. He died on February 18, 1546.

The Lutheran Reformation destroyed the religious unity of Europe. The movement not only came to dominate much of northern Europe, it created a situation in which further dissent led to the creating of modern Anglicanism in England and the adherents of John Calvin's variant Reformation perspective came to control much of Switzerland, Holland, and Scotland. The whole Reformation would raise considerations of religious toleration and the status of minority dissenting religious groups, most notably the Mennonites and the Unitarians.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; Dominicans; Lutheranism.

References

- Bainton, Roland H. Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther. Nashville, TN: Cokesbury Press, 1950.
- Brecht, Martin. Martin Luther. 3 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1985, 1990, 1993.
- Lohse, Bernhard. Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Work. Translated by Robert C. Luther. New York: Abingdon-Schultz; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.
- Luther, Martin. Luther's Works (LW). Edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann. 55 vols. St. Louis, MO: Concordia/Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1955–1986.
- Marty, Martin E. Martin Luther: A Life. New York: Penguin, 2004.

Lutheran Church in Canada

The Lutheran Church emerged from the reforms initiated by the 16th-century German Reformer Martin Luther (1483–1546). Luther's emphases of justification by grace through faith alone and the authority of the Bible over against tradition and any ecclesiastical authority were embodied in the several Lutheran Confessions (especially the Augsburg Confession) promulgated in the 16th century, which now form the standard of Lutheran belief.

Lutheranism was brought to Canada by German immigrants in the 18th century. The first Lutheran congregation in Canada was established in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1752. Most Lutheran churches in Canada, formed primarily in rural Nova Scotia, Ontario, and the Prairie Provinces (Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta), were organized and affiliated with U.S. Lutheran denominations. Through the 20th century, concentrations of Lutherans developed in Kitchener-Waterloo, Winnipeg, and Edmonton.

The Lutheran Church Canada (LCC) is one of the two main Lutheran bodies in Canada, the other being the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada. The LCC has its roots in the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (LCMS), which entered eastern Canada in 1854 and western Canada in 1879. By the middle of the 20th century, attempts were being made to create a self-governing church in Canada. The LCC was established in 1959 as a federation of districts within the LCMS, and in 1988 an autonomous church in Canada was founded, comprised of three districts. The denomination continues to keep close ties with the LCMS. Its head office is located in Winnipeg, its two seminaries are in St. Catharines, Ontario; and Edmonton, Alberta; and it supports a denominational periodical, the Canadian Lutheran. The LCC operates an extensive parochial school system across Canada and one university—Concord University College at Edmonton. There are approximately 325 LCC congregations across Canada, with close to 80,000 members.

The LCC has two sacraments, Holy Communion and (infant) baptism. It does not ordain women, and it practices closed Communion. It believes the Bible to be the “written Word of God and the only rule and norm of faith and of practice,” and it affirms without reservation the Book of Concord. LCC has observer status with the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada and participates with the International Lutheran Council. Through the Canadian Lutheran World Relief organization, the LCC seeks to be involved in social and justice issues around the world.

Lutheran Church in Canada
3074 Portage Ave.
Winnipeg, Manitoba R3K 0Y2
Canada

<http://www.lutheranchurch.ca> (in English and French)

Gordon L. Heath

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada; International Lutheran Council; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod.

References

- Cronmiller, Carl. R. A History of the Lutheran Church in Canada. Toronto: Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada, 1961.
- Pfrimmer, David. “A Lutheran Witness in Canadian Society.” In Church and Canadian Culture, edited by Robert E. VanderVennen. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991.
- Schwermann, Albert H. The Beginnings of the Lutheran Church–Canada. Privately published, 1969.

Lutheran Church in Hungary

The Protestant Reformation began to spread from Germany through the Christian community in Hungary as early as 1518. Well established in the 1520s, over the next generation almost 150 Hungarian students would take their theological studies at Wittenberg with Martin Luther (1483–1546). Magyar translations of the New Testament and Luther’s Small Catechism appeared in 1541 and 1550, respectively.

The spread of Lutheranism in Hungary occurred just as Turkish armies were launching an invasion. The decisive battle of Mohács in 1526 was followed by 125 years of Turkish occupation, from 1541 to 1686. After 1550, Lutherans also had to compete with the Reformed Church that also took root in Hungary.

In the 17th century, a Christian-led government returned as Austria slowly pushed the Turkish forces south and Hungary became part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Protestants, both Lutheran and Reformed, suffered during this time as Roman Catholics reclaimed numerous parishes and banished Protestant pastors. Pressure was not relieved until Emperor Joseph II (1741–1790) issued an Edict of Toleration in 1781. Lutherans remained a tolerated minority through World War I, but their status was strongly affected by the division of Hungary and the transfer of Transylvania to Romania. In the years after the war, Hungarian Lutherans strongly supported the formation of the World Lutheran Conference and the development of international ties, especially with the United Lutheran Church in the United States.

Following World War II, Hungarian Lutherans gained recognition under the new Marxist government but shared the suffering of all religious groups in the face of an aggressively atheist system. The school system was secularized in 1948, but religious freedom was granted with some imposed limits. A new translation of the Bible into modern Hungarian appeared in 1976. Celebration of significant events, such as the 500th anniversary of Luther’s birth in 1983, was permitted. A theology emerged that emphasized the witness to Christian faith through action in situations where religious discourse was not tolerated. Since the fall of Marxism, the church has been granted full freedom and has a new positive relationship to the government. Some of its schools have also been returned.

The Lutheran Church in Hungary adheres to the Augsburg Confession. Over the centuries it has developed a rich liturgical tradition. The church’s parishes are divided into two districts or dioceses, both headed by a bishop. The senior bishop is recognized as the presiding bishop. An assembly, presided over by a layperson (the general inspector) and the presiding bishop, is the highest legislative body for the church. Higher education is fostered through the Lutheran Theological Academy in Budapest. There are a number of church-related charitable institutions, including homes for the elderly and for children with disabilities.

In 2006, the church reported 305,000 members and 500 congregations. It publishes two periodicals, Diakonia and Evangélikus Elet. The ecumenically minded church is also a member of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Hungary, the Lutheran World Federation, and the World Council of Churches.

Lutheran Church in Hungary

üllői út 24

H-1085 Budapest

Hungary

<http://www.lutheran.hu/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Lutheran Church in Liberia

American Lutheran missionaries, including Morris Officer (1823–1874), began work in Liberia in 1860. However, they had difficulty with the hot and humid weather, and only with the arrival of David A. Day (1851–1897) in 1874 was some continuous leadership for the mission established. Day, a pastor and physician, was able to stay in Liberia for a quarter of a century. He established a station inland from Monrovia on the Saint Paul River and opened a school. As did many pioneer missionaries, he spent considerable time mastering the ways of the people among whom he worked. He offered health services and set up preaching points at settlements across the countryside. In the second generation of the mission, in 1908, a second mission station was opened, this time even farther upriver. As other personnel arrived, additional stations were added. Work concentrated among the Kpelle and Loma peoples, though work has begun among the Gbandi and Pallipo peoples.

During the 20th century, an indigenous leadership was developed, and the most promising ministerial candidates were sent to the United States for seminary training. The Lutheran Church in Liberia was organized in 1948, though it remained subordinate to its American sponsors. In the meantime, American Lutheranism, at one time split into more than 100 separate denominations, was in the midst of consolidating into several large bodies. The Liberian work eventually passed to the Lutheran Church in America (now a constituent part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America). In 1967, the Lutheran Church in America granted the Lutheran Church in Liberia full autonomy. It joined both the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches the next year.

The church adopted a polity combining congregational and presbyterial elements. Work is concentrated along the Saint Paul River from Monrovia to the Guinea border. The Bible has been translated and published in both the Kpelle and Loma languages. The church sponsors a number of elementary and secondary schools that use curriculum material developed in cooperation with the Methodists in Liberia and Sierra Leone. Ministers are trained at the Gbarnga School of Theology, an interdenominational effort sponsored by the Methodist, Anglican, and Lutheran churches. The church admitted women to the ordained ministry in 1982.

Hopes were high for the development of the church, but its work was thoroughly disrupted by civil wars (1989–1996, 2002–2003). In the fragile peace established in 2003, the church has placed priority on national healing and ministry to the traumatized.

In 2005 the church reported 71,196 members in 350 churches.

Lutheran Church in Liberia
PO Box 10-1046
1000 Monrovia 10
Liberia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod

The Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod is a strict confessional Lutheran church whose origins lie in the developing history of Protestantism in Saxony. Germany, the home of the Protestant Reformation, was and is predominantly Lutheran, but over the centuries the other major form of Reformation thought, Calvinism, also found adherents; many of Germany's Calvinists (members of the Reformed Church) resided in Saxony.

Portrait of Carl F. W. Walther, the leading force in the founding of the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod. (J. Gordon Melton)

It was the general agreement among the German states at the time that the ruler determined the faith that the people in his land would follow. In the early 19th century, the ruler of Saxony forced the merger of the Reformed Church in Saxony with the Lutheran Church. However, rather than force Calvinists to accept Lutheranism, he ordered the creation of a new Evangelical Church that would accommodate both Lutheran and Reformed theology and worship.

Although many found this a happy solution, some Lutherans did not, and they formed a movement adhering to a conservative Lutheranism that placed great emphasis upon the Augsburg Confession of Faith and the Small Catechism written by Luther for the instruction of new church members. In 1839 a group of Lutherans who rejected the Saxon Evangelical Church arrived in the United States under the direction of their bishop, Martin Stephan (1777–1846), and settled in Perry County, Missouri.

Soon after their arrival, it was discovered that Bishop Stephan had misappropriated some church funds for personal use, and he was banished. He was replaced by Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm Walther (1811–1887). Walther faulted erroneous theology for Stephan's downfall. He championed orthodox theology in the face of Stephan's errors, especially as they related to the authority of the ministry. Walther advocated congregational rights and responsibility in defending truth. He became the pastor in St. Louis and founded a small school that grew into Concordia Theological Seminary. In 1844 he founded a magazine, der Lutheraner, to spread his approach to faith. In 1847 he led in the founding of the Missouri Synod, composed of the 22 ministers and 16 congregations then operating among the settlers.

The synod found favor among German-speaking Lutherans across the Midwestern part of the United States. It found favor among those who preferred an emphasis upon the Lutheran confession rather than the Pietism that predominated in some of the larger Lutheran groups in the eastern United States. The leadership of the Missouri Synod saw an unacceptable doctrinal looseness in these other synods (which would eventually unite into the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America). Through the 20th century, the two approaches would diverge over various issues such as the ordination of women, which the Missouri Synod rejects.

In 2009 the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod reported 2,418,000 members in 6,155 congregations. It has a congregational polity. Its synod meets every 3 years and oversees an extensive educational program that includes primary and secondary schools, 10 colleges and universities, and 2 seminaries. Throughout the 20th century the church developed a vast missionary program. Many of its world missions have grown into mature autonomous churches with whom the Missouri Synod retains a partnership. The synod took the lead in forming the International Lutheran Council, which includes many of these partner churches along with other conservative Lutheran churches that agree with the Missouri confessional approach. The church believes that church unity must be based on doctrinal unity and has stayed out of most contemporary ecumenical groups, including the Lutheran World Federation.

Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod
1333 S. Kirkwood Rd.
St. Louis, MO 63122
<http://www.lcms.org/index.html>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; International Lutheran Council; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism.

References

- Graebner, A. Half a Century of True Lutheranism. Chattanooga, TN: J. A. Fredrich, n.d.
- The Lutheran Annual*. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing Company, issued annually.
- Meyer, Carl S. A Brief Historical Sketch of the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1938.
- Suelflow, August R., ed. Heritage in Motion: Readings in the History of the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod (1962–1997). Moorhead, MN: Concordia College, 1998.
- Todd, Mary. Authority Vested: A Story of Identity and Change in the Lutheran Church–Missouri. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Lutheran World Federation

Established in 1947 by representatives of Lutheran churches in 23 countries, the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) in 2009 numbered 140 member churches in 79 countries. It represents approximately 60 million of the estimated 64 million baptized Lutherans in the world; some congregations, though not all, that are associated with the U.S.-based Lutheran Church–

Missouri Synod and the International Lutheran Council remain outside the LWF.

Antecedent organizations include the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America (1867), the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference in Germany (1868), and the Lutheran World Convention (1923). The formation of the LWF after World War II served both to extend these efforts and to respond to postwar needs for reconciliation, relief, and service.

Initially regarding itself as a “free association of Lutheran churches,” the LWF was organized to foster united witness in the world, common theological research, the ecumenical involvement of Lutheran churches, and a common response to issues of human need and social justice. In 1990 it adopted a new Constitution based on a different self-understanding, one with strong ecclesial overtones: “The Lutheran World Federation is a communion of churches that confess the Triune God, agree in the proclamation of the word of God and are united in pulpit and altar fellowship.” This self-understanding is thus built around a theology of communion (Greek: koinonia), with increased concern for confessional unity, joint mission and service, theological reflection, and strong ecumenical involvement.

The ecumenical orientation of the LWF is manifest in its close cooperation with the World Council of Churches (WCC), with which most LWF member churches are affiliated. The LWF has also sponsored international, bilateral dialogues with official representatives of the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Reformed, Methodist, Baptist, and Adventist traditions. In Augsburg, Germany, on October 31, 1999—the anniversary of the day Martin Luther nailed his famous Ninety-five Theses to the chapel door at Wittenberg—representatives of the LWF and the Roman Catholic Church signed a “Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification,” an agreement that affirms that the mutual condemnations that Lutheran and Catholic leaders declared in the 16th century concerning the article of justification by grace through faith are no longer applicable or church-dividing. This declaration is widely regarded as an ecumenical breakthrough, and conversations with representatives of other Protestant traditions are being pursued by the LWF and the Vatican in the hope that its scope will be widened.

LWF assemblies have been held in Lund, Sweden (1947); Hanover, Germany (1952); Minneapolis, the United States (1957); Helsinki, Finland (1963); Evian-les-Bains, France (1970); Dar es Salaam, Tanzania (1977); Budapest, Hungary (1984); Curitiba, Brazil (1990); and Hong Kong, People's Republic of China (1997). In 2003, the 10th assembly met in Winnipeg, Canada.

The present organizational structure of the LWF was adopted in 1990. The assembly, which normally meets every six years, is the highest legislative authority; a council serves as the governing body and is comprised of 48 elected members, of whom 50 percent are from the so-called northern churches and 50 percent from churches in the so-called two-thirds world. Headquarters for the LWF secretariat are in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva, and its structure includes three departments in addition to a general secretariat: theology and studies, mission and development, and world service. Nearly 100 staff members serve at the LWF headquarters, and approximately 4,000 persons are employed in LWF world service projects throughout the world. Regional coordinators of LWF now work on four continents: Africa, Asia, Europe, and North America.

PO Box 2100
150, route de Ferney
CH-1211 Geneva 2
Switzerland
<http://www.lutheranworld.org>

Norman A. Hjelm

See also: International Lutheran Council; Luther, Martin; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Brand, E. L. Toward a Lutheran Communion: Pulpit and Altar Fellowship. LWF Report 26. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 1988.
- Nelson, E. C. The Rise of World Lutheranism: An American Perspective. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982.

Schjørring, J. H., N. A. Hjelm, and P. Kumari. From Federation to Communion: The History of the Lutheran World Federation. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997.

Vajta, V. From Generation to Generation: The Lutheran World Federation 1947–1982. LWF Report 16. Geneva: Lutheran World Federation, 1983.

[This entry was adapted from the Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, rev. ed., with the permission of WCC Publications, Geneva, and the William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, Grand Rapids, MI.]

Lutheranism

The various Lutheran churches of the world have grown out of the reformist activities launched by a German monk, Martin Luther (1483–1546) in the 16th century. In 1517 Luther challenged what he saw as a distortion of Christian practice, the selling of indulgences, which were believed by Roman Catholics at the time to lessen the time one would spend in purgatory dealing with the consequences of sin prior to going to heaven. A university professor, Luther posted a series of theses that outlined his position and called for a debate. During the ensuing debate, Luther took a further step and asserted that biblical authority transcends that of the church and pope. This assertion led to a papal bull denouncing Luther, which Luther answered in three essays.

As Luther's position developed, he attacked the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, limited the sacraments to two (baptism and the Lord's Supper) rather than seven, and elevated the role of the individual over that of the clergy with his understanding of the priesthood of all believers. He also elaborated on his basic principle of scriptural authority and salvation by grace through faith alone. He presented these views to the Diet, the governing body through which the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire exercised his authority, meeting at Worms in 1521 and was condemned. That condemnation set Luther and other Reformers against both secular and church authorities and led to a permanent break. Those who stood with Luther became known as the Lutheran or Evangelical Church. (In the French-speaking world, a parallel development led to the Reformed Church, which focused upon the thought of John Calvin of Geneva [1509–1564].)

Title page of Martin Luther's German translation of the Bible, finished in 1534. (Saxon State Library/Library of Congress)

The Lutheran Reformation became dominant in northern Germany and in areas north and east of Germany, including Scandinavia and Lithuania, though the southern German principalities tended to remain Catholic. During the 19th century, Lutheran missionaries who were connected with a spectrum of missionary societies carried Lutheran belief and practice worldwide, and through the 20th century numerous autonomous Lutheran churches resulted from that activity. Meanwhile, the home base of Lutheranism was devastated by World War II. Out of that war Lutherans worldwide came together in the Lutheran World Federation, initially intended to rebuild those countries ravaged by the war but later participating in a variety of cooperative activities around the globe.

Today Lutherans are characterized by their double emphasis upon Word and Sacrament, that is, biblical authority and preaching coupled with liturgy and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Their major doctrinal statement is the Augsburg Confession (1530), though Lutherans have been divided upon the strictness of its interpretation, especially as it stands in relation to Reformed Church confessions and participation in the contemporary ecumenical movement.

Most Lutheran churches around the world belong to the Lutheran World Federation, which has its headquarters in the same building that houses the World Council of Churches. Some more conservative Lutheran churches belong to the International Lutheran Council.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Luther, Martin; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachman, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachman. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Bodensieck, Julius, ed. The Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church. 3 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1965.
- Lagerquist, L. DeAne. The Lutherans. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1999.
- Lull, Timothy F. On Being Lutheran: Reflections on Church, Theology, and Faith. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress Publishers, 2005.
- Luther, Martin. Luther's Works. Edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and H. T. Lehman. 55 vols. St. Louis, MO: Concordia/Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1958–1967.
- Mildenberger, Friedrich. Theology of the Lutheran Confessions. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.

■ Luxembourg

Emerging as a separate entity in the 10th century, modern Luxembourg became fully independent in 1867. Its 998 square miles of land is nestled between France and Germany. It is home to some 486,000 people.

Luxembourg was originally settled at the end of the last Ice Age. Much later, Romans found the region settled by Celts and Germanic peoples. An early Roman center was created at Trier, just east of Luxembourg. In the third century CE, a new border that split the Low Countries (present-day Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg) divided the region between the German-speaking areas and the Romance language-speaking area controlled by Rome.

The leadership of Luxembourg opposed Spanish rule of the region and sided with rebels who defeated the Spanish in 1576. It later came under the authority of Philip II of France. In 1713, it was incorporated into the Austrian Hapsburg Empire, where it remained until overrun by Napoleon. In 1795 it was again annexed to France.

In 1815 the Congress of Vienna gave Luxembourg to William of Orange, king of the Netherlands, and it was designated a grand duchy. In 1831 Belgium separated from Holland and Luxembourg became separated geographically from the Netherlands. Its territory was divided, the greater portion being assigned to Belgium, the other part being administered independently by the Dutch royal house.

In 1866 the Treaty of London guaranteed Luxembourg's neutrality under the House of Nassau. The duke of Nassau remains the monarch of Luxembourg in what is now a constitutional monarchy. The House of Nassau has ruled the country continuously except for a short period of German occupation during World Wars I and II.

Christianity came to Luxembourg in 698 when Willibrord (ca. 658–739), a missionary from England, established a monastery at Echternach. Catholicism grew, becoming the dominant faith of the regions, and the Roman Catholic Church has remained largely unchallenged through the centuries. Catholicism is still the faith of some 90 percent of the population and stands behind the Christian Socialist Party, several labor unions, and the largest circulating newspaper, the Luxemburger Wort. A bishop of Luxembourg was named in 1870, and the office was elevated to archepiscopal status in 1988. The archbishop of Luxembourg resides in Esch-sur-Alzette.

Catholic pilgrims perform a traditional religious dancing procession in Echternach, Luxembourg, in commemoration of the Irish monk St. Willibrord, the founder of the Abbey of Echternach. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Religious affairs in Luxembourg are handled by the Ministry of Religions. A form of separation of church and state exists, but the Roman Catholic Church is supported by state funds and a course in Catholicism is integrated into the public school curriculum.

The small Protestant community, consisting primarily of expatriates drawn to Luxembourg in the 20th century, has come to play a role in the modern European

LUXEMBOURG

Luxembourg

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	323,000	437,000	90.6	0.84	497,000	613,000
Roman Catholics	296,000	427,000	88.4	0.96	480,000	590,000
Protestants	6,700	7,000	1.4	0.81	8,600	10,500
Marginals	1,000	3,400	0.7	−0.60	6,000	8,000
Agnostics	10,800	31,000	6.4	1.67	50,000	75,000
Atheists	3,000	7,200	1.5	0.89	11,000	18,000
Muslims	500	5,000	1.0	0.89	7,000	10,000
Baha'is	1,000	1,600	0.3	0.90	3,000	5,000
Jews	700	760	0.2	0.89	800	800
Total population	339,000	483,000	100.0	0.89	569,000	722,000

business community. The Protestant Church of the Grand Duchy dates to 1813 and the occupation of the area by German soldiers. A Mennonite Church was founded in 1830. There are also churches serving small Dutch-, Greek-, and Russian-speaking communities.

In the late 20th century, Luxembourg began to attract a spectrum of new religions, most notably Sukyo Mahikari, which has its European headquarters at the Grand Chateau at Ansembourg. The New Apostolic Church has come from neighboring Germany, and as in other European Countries, the Jehovah's Witnesses are active in Luxembourg.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jehovah's Witnesses; New Apostolic Church; Roman Catholic Church; Sukyo Mahikari.

References

Donckel, F. Die Kirche in Luxemborg vonden Anfängen biz sur Geganwart. Luxembourg: Sankt-Paulas Druckerei, 1950.

Eccardt, Thomas M. Secrets of the Seven Smallest States of Europe: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, and Vatican City. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.

Lallemand, A. Les Sectes en Belgique et au Luxembourg. Brussels: Editions EPO, 1994.

M

Mabon

See Fall Equinox.

■ Macedonia

The contemporary nation of Macedonia emerged out of the Federated Republics of Yugoslavia in 1991. It includes some 9,781 square miles of land surrounded by Greece, Albania, Serbia, Bulgaria, and the new nation of Kosovo. In 2008, it had just over two million citizens, the majority being Macedonians, a southern Slavic people, but with a significant minority of Albanians, a Paleo-Balkan people.

The history of Macedonia can be traced to the eighth century BCE, when a people calling themselves Macedonians emerged in the Aliákmon River valley and migrated east into present-day Macedonia. The Macedonians became prominent in the fourth century BCE under their king, Philip II (382–336) and his more famous son, Alexander the Great (356–323). During Alexander's reign the Macedonian Empire stretched eastward into India and south into Egypt and North Africa. The empire fell apart in the third century BCE and was finally incorporated into the Roman Empire at the beginning of the second century.

After the fall of the Roman Empire, Macedonia was successively overrun by its neighbors, being at different times a part of the Bulgarian and Byzantine empires, and it was eventually incorporated into Serbia. In the 15th century, it was incorporated into the Turkish Ottoman Empire. Toward the end of the 19th century, enthusiasm for independence rose even as the Ottoman Empire was weakening. Macedonia was coveted by Greeks, Bulgarians, and Serbians, but it remained under Ottoman control until that empire disintegrated in 1908. In 1913, after two wars, Macedonia was divided between Greece and Serbia. Then, following World War I, the northern part of Macedonia was incorporated into Yugoslavia, continuing as a part of the new Yugoslavia after World War II. That part of Macedonia constituted the present nation, which declared its independence in 1991.

Christianity was introduced into Europe in the southern Macedonian city of Thessalonica; indeed, the dream in which the Apostle Paul received the call to come to Macedonia has become a part of Christian lore (Acts 16:9). Christianity penetrated northward, and the great majority of Macedonians had become Christian by the fourth century. Through the next centuries, the Macedonian church tended to favor the leadership of Constantinople, and in 1054, when the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches divided, the region remained Eastern Orthodox in faith and practice.

The Eastern Orthodox church of St. Jovan Kaneo, perched on a cliff overlooking Ohrid Lake in southern Macedonia, is believed to have been built in the 13th century. (Vanja Genije)

An independent Macedonian state arose under the leadership of Czar Samuel (980–1014). During this time the independent Archdiocese of Ohrid emerged. When Samuel's kingdom fell, Ohrid was placed under the authority of Constantinople. In 1219 the Serbian Orthodox Church was formed, and it declared its independence from Constantinople in 1346. The church in Macedonia then came under the hegemony of the Serbian church. That policy continued through the years of Turkish rule, though for a period (1463–1557) the Turks favored the Ohrid Archepiscopacy and suppressed the Serbian Patriarchate.

The Serbian Patriarchate was re-established in 1557, but it was again suppressed in 1766 when the Ecumenical Patriarchate asserted its power in the region. The Serbian Orthodox Church was granted autonomy in 1832, and a united Serbian Orthodox Church was re-created in 1919; the Orthodox Christians in Macedonia were included in that church. The Patriarchate was re-established in 1920. In 1947, in the aftermath of World War II, a new Yugoslavian government arose, and it forced the creation of a separate Orthodox church to serve the Macedonian Republic within the new Federated Republics of Yugoslavia. In 1959 the government tried to force the Serbian Patriarchate to recognize the new Macedonian Orthodox Church and its leader,

Macedonia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,282,000	1,314,000	64.4	0.42	1,305,000	1,155,000
Orthodox	1,240,000	1,282,000	62.8	0.09	1,250,000	1,090,000
Roman Catholics	40,000	17,400	0.9	7.94	26,000	30,000
Protestants	1,600	10,800	0.5	3.67	22,000	28,000
Muslims	178,000	590,000	28.9	0.24	590,000	520,000
Agnostics	78,000	111,000	5.4	-1.64	90,000	60,000
Atheists	30,000	25,000	1.2	0.24	15,000	10,000
Jews	0	1,000	0.0	0.25	1,000	1,000
Total population	1,568,000	2,041,000	100.0	0.24	2,001,000	1,746,000

Bishop Dositej (r. 1958–1981), though for the time being the church was allowed to remain under the authority of the patriarch in Belgrade.

Then in 1967 Dositej declared his complete separation from the Serbian Patriarchate. The autonomous independent church was not recognized by either the Serbian Patriarchate or the Ecumenical Patriarchate until Macedonia became an independent country in the early 1990s. It has now received recognition as a sister body from the other Orthodox bodies as well. The church began to found congregations in North America and Australia in the 1960s, and today its only bishop serving outside of Macedonia resides in Australia. The church is currently led by His Beatitude, archbishop of Ohrid and Macedonia (<http://www.m-p-c.org>).

Protestantism entered Macedonia in the 19th century. In 1873 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions extended its work in Bulgaria into Macedonia. It founded some 10 congregations and a school, but following the establishment of Yugoslavia after World War I, the board had trouble responding to the new government. Meanwhile, in 1898 Robert Moller, a Methodist minister from Vienna, came to Yugoslavia. Starting in Croatia, this work slowly spread through the early 20th century. In 1922, the American Board’s work in Macedonia was turned over to the Methodists. About that time, a Yugoslavian Mission Conference was formed by the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). This church suffered greatly during the German occupation, and following the war many members in Croatia and Serbia left the region. The church has had an important role in the 1990s and the current president of Macedonia (2001) is a United Methodist layman.

The Baptists extended their work in Yugoslavia into Macedonia in 1928, when one of the Methodist congregations changed its affiliation. At the time the Baptists had legal status in the country, and the Methodists did not. A second Baptist church was opened in Skopje that same year. In 1991 the three active Baptist congregations in Macedonia formed the Baptist Union of Macedonia.

In the early 1990s, two evangelical sending agencies, Partners International and SEND International, launched work in Macedonia. Another agency, Pioneers, based in Florida, has begun work among Macedonian Muslims.

During the years of Turkish rule, many Muslims moved into central Macedonia. Some Christians, not wishing to bear the burdens placed upon them by the Turkish authorities, converted to Islam. The community of Valaades, or Greek-speaking Muslims, survived in some parts of the country until around 1912, when most resettled in Turkey. Today, the Muslim population in the country is composed primarily of the Gypsy, or Romany, people.

There is a small Jewish community at Skopje, and in the 1990s centers of the two Hindu groups, Sahaja Yoga and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, were opened. There is also a center of the Unification movement and a small group associated with the Ordo Templi Orientis.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Ordo Templi Orientis; Sahaja Yoga: Unification Movement; United Methodist Church.

References

- Ilievski, D. The Macedonian Orthodox Church: The Road to Independence. Trans by J. L. Leech. Skopje, Macedonia: Macedonian Review Editions, 1973.
- Norris, H. T. Islam in the Balkans: Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.
- Poulton, Hugh. Who Are the Macedonians? Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.
- Rossos, Andrew. Macedonia and the Macedonians: A History. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 2008.

Machu Picchu

Machu Picchu, a medieval Inca site, is located in the Andes mountains about 50 miles northwest of Cuzco, Peru. Probably used as a royal religious retreat center until shortly before the Spanish came into the area in the 16th century CE, Machu Picchu emerged in the late 20th century as an important site for modern Esoteric New Age practitioners to direct their speculation. The site is well away from the primary centers of Inca life, and thus appears to have no practical governmental, economic, or military function. When Spanish forces overran Peru in the 1530s, they missed it. This observation is the basis for the conclusion that it most likely was a religious center. There being no written records of its existence, awareness of the center was lost in Peruvian society and the various Peruvian governments through the 19th century were not aware of its existence. In fact, their hegemony did not extend into the more sparsely populated areas of their formal domain.

It was not until 1911 that Hiram Bingham (1875–1956), an archaeologist working in the country, discovered it after being invited to the site by some local residents. To his surprise, Bingham walked into a site that was largely intact from the time it had been abandoned. Its sudden emergence out of obscurity added to the site's mystique.

Machu Picchu is built around a large central plaza with an adjacent temple. They are surrounded by various buildings, the best guess being that they were living quarters for the rulers, the religious leaders, and other important persons. A large altar stone of unknown purpose dominates the interior of the temple. The site resides on the top of a ridge with a high peak on either side.

The lack of information about the site has transformed it into the focus of wide-ranging speculation. New Agers have suggested that is a place of powerful cosmic energies to which attunement yields a variety of spiritual benefits. Meanwhile, scholars, drawing somewhat on their knowledge of Inca religion, have suggested that the site was the home of a powerful mountain spirit who was worshipped in conjunction with Sun worship. There was also a special group of virginal females (the Chosen Women), who were religious functionaries in the Inca community, and who may have conducted many of their rituals here. Students of archaeoastronomy have weighed in relative to the possible use of Machu Picchu as a site for astronomical observations. They discovered that the Intihuatana stone (also referred to as the “Hitching Post of the Sun”), a protuberance from the temple altar, could be used to indicate several key stellar occurrences, most notably the Spring and Fall equinoxes. At midday on the equinoxes (March 21 and September 21), the Sun is directly above the pillar and the altar momentarily casts no shadow. At that moment, the Sun could be understood as sitting upon the pillar and being briefly “tied” to the altar.

Since the 1980s, specialists in sacred sites within the New Age movement have claimed Machu Picchu to be a particularly powerful site spiritually. They have organized pilgrimages to Peru and touted the remote mountain site as a place of transformation, a location facilitating the gaining of spiritual awareness, and a land of not only geological but spiritual highs. Harking to Chinese ideas of feng shui, tour leaders see the region as the focus of natural energies that flow around the high peaks, through underground openings, and suffusing the nearby valleys.

J. Gordon Melton

Cloud rolls over the Inca ruins of Machu Picchu in the Andes Mountains of Peru. (iStockPhoto.com)

See also: Pilgrimage.

References

- Bingham, Hiram. Lost City of the Incas. New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, 1948.
- Cumes, Carol, and Romulo Lizarraga Valencia. Journey to Machu Picchu: Spiritual Wisdom from the Andes. St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn Publications, 1998.
- Reinhard, Johan. Machu Picchu: The Sacred Center. Lima, Peru: Nuevas Imágenes, 1991.
- Waisbard, Simone. The Mysteries of Machu Picchu. New York: Avon Books, 1979.
- Wright, Ruth M., and Alfredo Valencia Zegarra. The Machu Picchu Guidebook: A Self-guided Tour. Boulder, CO: Johnson Books, 2001.

Mackay, George Leslie

1844–1901

George Leslie Mackay is the famous Canadian Presbyterian missionary who came to northern Formosa (Taiwan) in 1872 and preached specifically with Aborigines in mind until his untimely death.

Born on March 21, 1844, to pious Scottish Presbyterians from Upper Canada (Zorra Township, Oxford County, southern Ontario), Mackay embraced the faith at a tender age, and found foreign missionary work his calling. His postsecondary education was Presbyterian through and through; he studied at Knox College (Toronto), Princeton Seminary, and New College (Edinburgh), where his lifelong devotion to “natural theology” was born. Queen’s Theological College (Kingston, Ontario) honored him with a doctorate of divinity after almost a decade (1880). Mackay also went on to become the moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Canada in 1894 in absentia. It was his desire to live and die in Taiwan, where he lies to this day in the Mackay family plot adjacent Tamkang Middle School and Aletheia University. In 2004, a monument to his life and work was erected in Woodstock, Ontario. In 2006, Mackay was the subject of a Canadian television documentary, entitled The Black-Bearded Barbarian of Taiwan, followed by a Taiwanese opera production of his life at the National Opera in 2008.

Ironically, it was only after much pleading that the Canadian Presbyterian Church agreed to sponsor Mackay, asking only that he choose between Africa, India, and China. Mackay chose northern Formosa—China in effect—because it was “virgin” territory, making him the first Canadian Presbyterian missionary in the region. If his Diaries can be believed, he mastered the Native Amoy dialect in a matter of months after arriving in Formosa. He would go on to build 60 churches, including Native presbyters chosen and ordained by him to govern, creating what is now the Northern Synod of the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan (PCT). His ordination of Native preachers proved problematic for some Anglo-Canadians at the time, though he cared very little to ask permission of ecclesiastical precedent and orthodoxy on the matter—whether theological or cultural. Importantly, 70 percent of Taiwan’s indigenous population claim allegiance to the Northern Synod.

Education was crucial to Mackay’s somewhat unique brand of Native ministry and “Presbyterian Uplift,” resulting in two educational institutions of some prominence: Oxford College, now Aletheia University, and Tamkang Middle School, both in Dansui. The so-called Black-Bearded Barbarian Bible Man is equally famous for his work as an amateur dentist in service of Native health reforms, pulling teeth by the tens of thousands in the service of the Lord. Two memorial Presbyterian hospitals have been built in Taipei County since the construction of the first by Mackay in 1882. Moreover, his collection of Formosan native artifacts—considered among the best in the world—is housed at the Royal Ontario Museum (Canada). He died in Taiwan from throat cancer on June 2, 1901.

Mackay is considered by many to be Taiwan’s most famous Western missionary and premiere defender of Native culture and thus Taiwanese independence. A man of science and faith, defender and practitioner of miscegenation, proponent of a radical “native ministry” and “indigenized gospel,” his beliefs and practices both conformed to and challenged the racial thinking of 19th-century Canadian polite society. His marriage to a Taiwanese slave-girl, Tui Chhang-mia, as well as arranged interracial marriages he performed between select male Chinese and female Taiwanese graduates of Oxford College were consistent with his belief in “civilizing” through miscegenation—his most controversial and significant contribution in some respects. He had three children by Tui Chhang-mia. Bella and Mary, their two older daughters, married prominent Native preachers, whereas George, Jr., the youngest, studied at the University of Toronto and married an Anglo-Canadian woman.

A very private man, Mackay wrote comparatively little—his diaries notwithstanding. It is doubtful that he wrote his autobiography, From Far Formosa; his editor, Reverend J. A. MacDonald, claimed full credit after Mackay’s death and for good reason. As Mackay scholar James Rohrer writes: Mackay’s “correspondence and even his diaries reveal relatively little about his inner life, leaving us in many cases to read between the lines and to conjecture.” Mackay had the temperament of a soldier rather than a scholar and, according to his successor William Gauld, spent the bulk of his time “rushing around the country like a madman.”

Ironically, Mackay is rarely mentioned in North American histories of the Presbyterian Church and its somewhat unique place, along with his, in the Social Gospel movement. Brian J. Fraser’s The Social Uplifters: Presbyterian Progressives and the Social Gospel in Canada, 1875–1915 makes no mention of him whatsoever. Alwyn Austin’s seminal Saving China: Canadian Missionaries in the Middle Kingdom devotes a mere five pages to him, much of this less than flattering, and calling the Zorra Boy (Mackay) perhaps “the strangest character nineteenth-century Canada ever produced” (30). There were two Mackays: the indefatigable barbarian missionary abroad and the firebrand at home. Austin also casts doubt on Mackay’s medical qualifications.

Mackay scholars per se do not completely agree on the essence of the man and his mission. Dominic

McDevitt-Parks contends that Mackay was an “Orientalist” and thus allegedly a pawn of Western imperialism. His rabid anti-Catholicism may have driven him to build the many chapels he did merely to thwart Dominican priests from the Philippines who came to Formosa in 1886. Mark Eric Munsterhjelm charges him with “cultural genocide” for his role in the destruction of Chinese idols and ancestor tablets. Michael Stainton contends that Mackay’s belief in the “southern theory of Taiwanese origins” was essentially anti-Chinese. Finally, James Rohrer contends that Mackay should be seen a charismatic or cult leader and founder of a new Taiwanese “sect” that ran afoul of Christian orthodoxy.

Clyde R. Forsberg Jr.

See also: Dominicans; Presbyterian Church in Canada; Presbyterian Church in Taiwan.

References

- Austin, Alwyn J. Saving China: Canadian Missionaries in the Middle Kingdom. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1986.
- Mackay, George Leslie. From Far Formosa: The Island, its People and Missions. Ed. by Rev. J. A. MacDonald. Taipei, Taiwan: SMC Publishing, 1896, 1991.
- Mackay, George Leslie. Mackay’s Diaries: Original English Version, Ed. by Neng-Che Yeh et al. Tamsui, Taiwan: The Relic Committee of the Northern Synod of the Taiwan Presbyterian Church, 2007.
- McDevitt-Parks, Dominic. “19th-century Anglo-American Representations of Formosan Peoples.” Freeman Summer Grant, 2007.
- Munsterhjelm, Mark Eric. “Aborigines Saved Yet Again: Settler Nationalism and Narratives in a 2001 Exhibition of Taiwan Aboriginal Artefacts.” M.A. thesis, University of Victoria, 2004.
- Rohrer, James R. “Mackay and the Aborigines: Reflections upon the Ambiguities of Taiwanese Aboriginal Christian History.” In Christianity and Native Cultures: Perspectives from Different Regions of the World. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Cultural Publications, Inc.
- Rohrer, James R. “George Leslie Mackay in Formosa, 1871–1901: An Interpretation of His Career.” Journal of the Canadian Church Historical Society 47 (2005): 3–58.

- Rohrer, James R. “Charisma in a Mission Context: The Case of George Leslie Mackay in Taiwan, 1872–1901.” Missiology: An International Review 36, no. 2 (April 2008): 227–236.
- Stainton, Michael. “The Politics of Taiwan Aboriginal Origins.” In Taiwan: A New History, edited by Murray A. Rubinstein, 27–44. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1999.

■ Madagascar

Madagascar is a large island nation in the Indian Ocean east of the African nation of Mozambique. The fourth largest island on the globe, its land area is 225,000 square miles. There are also several much smaller close-by islands included in the nation of Madagascar, though islands to the north constitute a separate country, the Comoros. The largest group among the country’s 20 million people is the Merinas, a people of Austronesian and Malaysian origin who make up approximately one-fourth of the population.

Madagascar appears to have been originally populated by people from Malaysia and Polynesia around the beginning of the Common Era. Some 18 indigenous groups of Malay-Polynesian descent now inhabit the island. The descendants of Bantu Africans, first introduced as slaves, have intermarried and integrated into the general population. The primary groups include the Betsileo, the Sakalave, the Antankarana, the Betsimisaraka, and the Antasaka.

Modern Madagascan history begins in the 13th century, when traders from the Comoros Islands established ports on Madagascar’s northern shores. At the beginning of the 16th century, the Portuguese arrived. In their quest for valuables, they destroyed the trading settlements, but after finding no gold or other cash items, they departed.

The arrival of the Europeans became a catalyst for the formation of the first Madagascan kingdoms, one in the east and one in the west. The unification of the island occurred during the reign of King Radama I (1810–1828). Problems with succession following Radama’s death facilitated the return of the Europeans, who took over increasing portions of the land through the 19th century. Eventually Madagascar became a French colony.

Celebrants at a rural festival in Madagascar. (Corel)

In 1947 the struggle for Madagascan independence led to a revolt that was put down harshly, and autonomy was not accomplished until 1960. Fifteen years of political turmoil stood between independence and the establishment of a democratic republic in 1975. The presence of widespread poverty continues to threaten the political process, which in turn slows the processes of economic reform and revival.

Each of the various peoples of Madagascar had their own traditional religion, all of which were related by a common Malay-Polynesian origin. A creator deity (Zahahary) is acknowledged, but primary emphasis is placed upon ensuring survival after death and maintaining a relationship with those who have passed into the next life, that is, one's ancestors. A major ceremony is built around corpses that are moved about, ritually fed, and invited to dance. Traditional Madagascan belief also includes reliance on magic, with accompanying rejection of witchcraft (malevolent magic) and reliance on the protective effects of amulets. Approximately half of the population remains loyal to traditional religious beliefs.

Christianity was introduced to the island by the Portuguese, but systematic missionary efforts were not launched until the 17th century. Only with the unification of the land under Radama I and his introduction of European culture did the Roman Catholic Church establish permanent structures. The London Missionary Society (LMS) opened work in 1818, and its missionaries developed a written form of the Malagasy language and translated the Bible. In 1836 Radama's successor, Queen Ranaivalona I (r. 1828–1861), turned against Christianity, expelled all Europeans, and killed many Christians. However, when the missionaries returned in 1861, they found a growing Christian community. Queen Ranavalona II accompanied her coronation in 1869 with her conversion to Christianity, which thrived through the rest of the century. Jesuits worked beside Congregationalists, Friends, and, after 1897, Reformed Church missionaries from the Paris Mission. By 1900 there were more than one million Christians.

MADAGASCAR

The Protestant mission was concentrated in the northern part of the island and included numerous elementary schools. The primary churches represented were the Church of England (whose work was later incorporated into the Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean), the Malagasy Lutheran Church, and the Church of Christ in Madagascar (the LMS mission).

These were joined by the Friends Church and the Evangelical Church in Madagascar (the product of the Paris Mission). In 1968 the LMS mission, the Evangelical Church, and the Friends Church united to form the Church of Jesus Christ of Madagascar.

In 1913 the LMS and the Lutherans formed the Missionary Conference, which in 1958 was superseded by the Federation of Protestant Churches in Madagascar. The federation includes the Church of Jesus Christ of Madagascar and the Malagasy Lutheran Church and is related to the World Council of Churches.

Through the 20th century, additional groups representative of the Protestant and Free church perspective arrived to build up the Christian community, including

Madagascar

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	3,366,000	11,030,000	51.8	2.98	16,898,000	27,285,000
Protestants	1,351,000	6,651,000	31.2	2.60	9,358,000	14,000,000
Roman Catholics	1,595,000	5,240,000	24.6	4.29	7,500,000	11,500,000
Independents	146,000	940,000	4.4	3.31	1,550,000	2,700,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,437,000	9,722,000	45.6	2.74	12,186,000	15,729,000
Muslims	112,000	420,000	2.0	2.87	650,000	1,000,000
Agnostics	4,000	60,700	0.3	2.87	110,000	200,000
Baha'is	4,000	21,500	0.1	2.86	36,000	75,000
Atheists	0	15,400	0.1	2.86	28,000	40,000
Hindus	1,200	12,600	0.1	2.87	20,000	62,500
Chinese folk	4,000	10,800	0.1	2.87	17,000	40,000
Buddhists	2,000	5,500	0.0	2.87	9,000	20,900
Jews	100	300	0.0	2.88	400	600
Total population	6,930,000	21,299,000	100.0	2.87	29,954,000	44,453,000

the Swedish Assemblies of God, the New Apostolic Church, and the Evangelical Free Church. They were joined by a number of African Initiated Churches, several of which originated from schisms in the LMS mission. The missionaries of the Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived in 1926, and the Jehovah's Witnesses in 1933.

Islam has emerged in Madagascar as a significant minority community, most of whose adherents live on the northwest corner of the island. The Comoros islanders had become predominantly Muslim in the 14th century and became the source of Islam's entrance into Madagascar. The Sunni Shafaiite School is strongest among the Sakalave people. More recently, some Comoros citizens have moved to Madagascar. The Muslim community has been further enlarged by some 15,000 Indo-Pakistani Muslims, among whom are Ismailis and Bohoras, and several thousand Zaydis from Yemen.

The approximately 10,000 Indo-Pakistani people that came to Madagascar were primarily Hindu. There are also a small number of Chinese Buddhists and members of the Baha'i Faith. In 1975 Guru Maharaj Ji, head of the Divine Light Mission (now known as Elan Vital), a teacher in the Radha Soami/Sant Mat tradition, began to gather followers, but his movement was outlawed before the year was out. A minuscule Jewish community, with around 200 members, emerged in the 20th century.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar; Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Friends/Quakers; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; London Missionary Society; Malagasy Lutheran Church; New Apostolic Church; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafaiite School of Islam; World Council of Churches.

References

- Ferrand, G. Les Musulmans à Madagascar et aux lies Comores. 3 vols. Paris: E. Leroux, 1891–1892.
- Jacobsen, L. D. "Church Growth on the Island of Madagascar." Ph.D. diss., Fuller Theological Seminary, 1967.
- Keller, Eva. The Road to Clarity: Seventh-Day Adventism in Madagascar. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
- Madagascar et le christianisme. Historie oecuménique*. Paris: Agence de Cooperation Culturelle et Technique, 1993.

Ramambason, Laurent W. Missiology: Its Subject-Matter and Method: A Study of 'Mission-Doers' in Madagascar. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 1999.

Rund, J. Taboo: A Study of Malagasy Customs and Beliefs. Oslo, Norway: Oslo University Press, 1960.

Maghi

Maghi, a holiday for Sikhs, commemorates the martyrdom of the Chali Mukte, or Forty Immortals. The remembered incident occurred on December 29, 1705. Today, using the new Sikh Nanashahi calendar, the event is celebrated annually on January 13.

The founding of the Khalsa, the Sikh military order, by Guru Gobind Singh had alerted the Mughal (Muslim) rulers who controlled the Punjab at the time of the growing strength of the Sikhs and the correlative power of their leader. The Hindu leadership also felt threatened. The initial attempts to suppress the Khalsa were unsuccessful. Much of 1705 was spent fending off the much larger Muslim forces and found the Sikhs in what amounted to a strategic retreat. In December Gobind Singh was visited by a group of 40 Punjabi Sikhs. During their visit, he received word of the imminent approach of a Mughal army led by Wazir Khan. The 40 decided that they could not at that moment support him and they moved away, taking a position by the side of small body of water. As the army became visible, however, they reassessed their situation and turned to face the oncoming force. By sunset all 40 were dead or seriously injured and the Mughal forces retreated. Guru Gobind Singh blessed them as muktas, or emancipated ones, and changed the name of the place to Muktsar in their honor.

The largest celebration of Maghi is at Muktsar where an annual fair is held. Around the world, however, Sikhs visit their gurdwaras for kirtan (hymns), stories of the martyrs, and an end-to-end recital of the holy Guru Granth Sahib, the Sikh holy book.

Maghi is celebrated on the first day of the month of Magh in the Hindu lunar calendar. It follows on the heels of the Hindu mid-winter Lohri festival when bonfires are lit in Hindu fields and yards. The next morning Hindus see as an auspicious occasion to go for a brief swim in the local river or pond.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

Kapoor, Sukhbor Sing. Sikh Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Publishing Group, 1989.

Singh, Bhagat Lakeshman. Short Sketch of the Life and Work of Guru Govind Singh, The Tenth and Last Guru. Ottawa, ON: Laurier Books, 1995.

Maha Bodhi Society

Established in 1891 in Colombo, Sri Lanka (then Ceylon), the Maha Bodhi Society (MBS) constituted a striking part of the revival of Theravada Buddhism in South Asia around the turn of the century. The Society was founded by the Ceylonese activist Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) with the purpose of regaining control of the Maha Bodhi temple and resuscitating Buddhism in India. This ancient temple marks the site at Bodhgaya, in northeast India, where the Buddha is reputed to have gained enlightenment. It had been adopted centuries later by Hindus for their devotional practices.

The British poet and journalist Sir Edwin Arnold (1832–1904) had visited Bodhgaya in 1885 and lamented publicly that Buddhists had forgotten this “most interesting centre of [Buddhist] faith.” Arnold achieved an agreement with the temple’s Hindu manager to enable a Buddhist role in the temple’s administration. This arrangement was vigorously taken up by Dharmapala, who had visited Bodhgaya in 1891. In a move that was uncharacteristic to Buddhism but in agreement with Arnold, Dharmapala declared Bodhgaya and the temple as the central Buddhist pilgrimage site, encouraging Buddhists the world over to fight for its “rescue.” In 1892 the MBS headquarters was moved to Calcutta, and the Society’s journal, the Maha Bodhi, became established.

To further his cause, Dharmapala untiringly toured the United States, Europe, and East Asia in the next four decades, starting with a well-received speech at the World's Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893. Overseas branches of the MBS were formed in the United States (1897), Germany (1911), and Great Britain (1926). While in Europe, he initiated into Buddhism C. T. Strauss, the first Westerner to make a formal conversion to the faith. Undoubtedly, Dharmapala can be called one of the first Buddhist "global players," and the MBS the first international Buddhist organization.

Maha Bodhi temple in Bodhi Gaya, Bihar, India. (Luciano Mortula/Dreamstime.com)

Despite Dharmapala's activism, Bodhgaya and the temple remained under sole Hindu supervision during the first half of the 20th century. In 1949 the Bodh Gaya Temple Act reserved four of the nine votes in the temple's administrative board for Buddhists, thereby still securing the Hindu majority. The MBS continued to work for the cause by sending Theravada Buddhist missionary monks from Ceylon/Sri Lanka to Bodhgaya and other Indian places, by publishing the Maha Bodhi, and by maintaining hostels for Buddhist pilgrims.

In the late 1990s, the organization had eight centers in North India and five affiliated centers in South India, as well as centers in Sri Lanka, Japan, Korea, Hong Kong, the United States, and the United Kingdom. The Society's self-assured claim to represent all Buddhists in its demand for "rescuing" Bodhgaya certainly cannot be upheld in view of the multiplication of Buddhist schools and traditions at Bodhgaya. These various groups have established monasteries and temples there, particularly since the 1980s. Although the Buddhist presence at the site, with some 40 different organizations as of 2005, has relativized the one-time dominant role of the MBS considerably, Arnold and Dharmapala's Orientalist view of Bodhgaya as the central place of Buddhism has come true a century later.

Buddhagaya Centre
Mahabodhi Society of India
Buddhagaya 824231
Gaya, Bihar
India
<http://mahabodhisociety.com/>

Martin Baumann

See also: Bodh-Gaya; Buddha, Gautama.

References

- Ahir, Diwan Chand. Buddha Gaya through the Ages. Delhi: Sri Satguru Publications, 1994.
- Guruge, Ananda, ed. Return to Righteousness: A Collection of Speeches, Essays and Letters of the Anagarika Dharmapala. Colombo, Sri Lanka: Government Press, 1965.
- Sangharakshita, Maha Sthavira. Flame in the Darkness: The Life and Sayings of Anagarika Dharmapala. Terawada, Pune, Maharashtra, India: Tritarna Grantha Mala, 1980.

Mahasivaratri

On the 14th day of each month of the Hindu lunar calendar, the god Siva (or Shiva), one of the three major deities of the Hindu pantheon, is acknowledged, and the day is called Sivaratri. However, the 14th day of the Hindu month of Magha is designated as Mashivaraatri, and has become a national Hindu holiday celebrated throughout India and the Indian diaspora. It is a solemn occasion in which leaves of the Bael tree, believed to have medicinal value, are offered to Lord Siva and people fast and engage in an all-night vigil.

Mahasivaratri recalls an old story of the Asuras (power-hungry demons) and their half-brothers, the gods. The demons had much power, but because of their lack of piety—they neglected the making of sacrifices and did not visit holy places—they did not acquire great powers within themselves. Meanwhile, the gods made sacrifices, dealt truthfully with each other, visited holy places, and thus increased in power within themselves.

Both the gods and the Asuras knew that they could gain the Amrit, the Water of Life, if they churned up the Ocean of Milk that encircled their world. With the Mountain Mandara for a churning-pole and the giant serpent Vasuki for a churning-rope, the gods and the Asuras churned the Ocean of Milk. As they churned Vasuki spat venom from each of his many heads. The venom broke the rocks around the ocean, creating openings for the ocean to flow over creation, threatening destruction to the worlds of both gods and men.

At that point Siva stepped forward and gathered the venom in a cup and drank it. His wife Parvati, fearing for his life, grabbed his throat so the poison would not enter his stomach. The burn on his throat is still seen to this day as a dark blue marking. His action, however, saved creation and allowed the gods to gain more powers than the demons.

As the churning continued, wondrous things emerged from the primordial Ocean of Milk. Surabhi, the wish-fulfilling cow, came forth. Shri, the goddess of prosperity and fortune, and Dhanavantari, the physician of the gods, came forth. Then the Kaustubha gem that always adorns Vishnu's chest emerged. Finally, the nectar of immortality appeared, and knowing that the demons would want to seize the nectar of immortality, Vishnu took the form of the enchantress Mohini. While the demons were mesmerized with her beauty, she served the nectar to the gods alone. Thus only the gods gained immortality, and when the demons attacked they were routed and the world was once again in the hands of the gods.

Since that time Siva dwells in woodlands filled with flowers. He keeps near him a spear with which he will destroy the worlds at the end of an age, a bow, a battle-axe, and a trident. At one point, his wife Uma covered his eyes with her hands. As a result, the world sunk into darkness. To save the world, Siva developed a third eye on his forehead. When he opened that eye, the light returned to the world. But Siva's throat remains blue from the venom that he drank.

Mahashivaratri is unique as the major Hindu celebration not accompanied by revelry and gaiety. It is rather a solemn event that emphasizes restraint and vows of forgiveness, truth telling, and non-injury to others that must be kept for the full 24 hours. Fasting and staying awake to worship Siva during the entire night fill the hours of observance. One is to recite the mantra of Siva, om namah shivaya, and prayers for forgiveness during the evening vigil. If the rites are performed faithfully one is rewarded with worldly success and the heavenly realm of Siva.

Constance A. Jones

See also: Hinduism.

References

Harshananda, Swami. Hindu Festivals and Sacred Days. Bangalore: Ramakrishna Math, 1994.

Mukuncharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpith, 2005.

Sharma, Nath. Festivals of India. New Delhi: Abhinav Publications, 1978.

Welbon, Guy, and Glenn Yocum, eds., Religious Festivals in South India and Sri Lanka. Delhi: Manohar, 1982.

Mahasthamaprapta's Birthday

Mahasthamaprapta's (Bodhisattva Great Power, known in Japan as Seishi Bosatsu) is a Mahayana Buddhist bodhisattva best known within the Pure Land Buddhist tradition as a close associate of Amitabha and the Western Paradise. She is most often depicted sitting or standing beside Amitabha, along with Avalokitesvara (Guan Yin). This popular group is known as the Three Saints of the Western Paradise. Mahasthamaprapta's halo of wisdom permeates all creation. She is often seen in feminine form and recognized by the water pitcher on her crown and the lotus bud in her hand. The lotus bud is meant to be used to guide the elect to the Pure Land.

Mahasthamaprapta's birthday is celebrated on the 13th day of the 7th month in the Chinese lunar calendar, just two days before the Ullam-bana Festival. In Japan it is held on July 13. Japanese Pure Land practitioners make note of the fact that Shinran (1173–1263), the founder of the larger Pure Land group, had a vision of Mahasthamaprapta whom he identified with Honen (1133–1212), the founder of Pure Land Buddhism in Japan and Shinran's teacher.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Amitabha's Birthday; Pure Land Buddhism; Ullam-bana.

References

"The Bodhisattva that Shinran knew in Person." The Way of Shinshu Buddhism. <http://www.shinran.wasan.info/jw19.htm>. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Boheng, Wu, and Cai Zhuozhi. 100 Buddhas in Chinese Buddhism. Trans. by Mu Xin and Yan Zhi. Singapore: Asiapac Books, 1997.

“The Gentility of the Dharma.” The Way of Shinshu Buddhism. <http://www.shinranwasan.info/jw118.htm>. Accessed May 15, 2009.

The Seeker's Glossary of Buddhism. New York: Sutra Translation Committee of the United States and Canada, 1998.

Vessantara. Meeting the Buddhas: A Guide to Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric Deities. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse Publications, 1998.

Mahavira

ca. 599–527 BCE

Mahavira was the last in a lineage of 24 tirthankaras, enlightened beings, who are recognized as the founders of the Jain religion. A tirthankara is considered to be a person who has conquered his base sensibilities, especially anger, pride, deceit, and desire. Mahavira's life overlapped that of Gautama Buddha, who like him attempted to work a reform of the religion of India of his day, but there is no record of their ever meeting. Among the two major sects of Jains, the Digambara and the Shvetambaras, numerous differences in details concerning Mahavira's life emerge at every major turn.

Mahavira, literally the “Great Spiritual Hero,” was born in 599 in Kundgraam, a small kingdom located in what is now the state of Bihar in India. His father, Siddhartha, was the king of Kundgraam and his mother, Trishala, the sister of a local ruler. They named their son Vardhamana (“He who brings prosperity”).

Both the Digambara and the Shvetambaras remember that before Mahavira's birth his mother had witnessed 14 auspicious dreams in which she saw successively (1) a white elephant; (2) a white bull; (3) a lion; (4) the goddess Shri (aka Lakshmi); (5) garlands of mandara (hibiscus) flowers; (6) the full moon; (7) the rising sun; (8) a beautiful large flag; (9) a vase of fine metal; (10) a lake covered in lotuses; (11) an ocean of milk; (12) a celestial house in the sky; (13) a large pile of gems; and (14) a blazing fire. Digambara Jains, however, believe she also had two additional dreams in which she saw (15) a lofty throne and (16) a pair of fish playfully swimming in a lake. These dreams have now become a standard part of the recounting of Mahavi-ra's life, and contemporary Jains narrate these dreams and re-enact them in dramas as part of their celebration of the five auspicious moments of Mahavira's life.

The Shvetambaras also believe that Mahavira was originally conceived by a Brahmin couple, Rishabhadata and Devananda, after which the embryo was magically transferred into Trishala's womb. The Digambara reject the story of the transplanted embryo.

Mahavira's saintly career and inherent powers manifested even before his birth. When in his mother's womb, he remained very quiet, demonstrating the Jain virtue of ahinsa (non-injury). According to the story he moved only at those moments when he was aware that his mother worried that he might not be alive. His unique future was heralded at his birth. All beings celebrated the birth of a new tirthankara and many marvels and miracles occurred as he was being born. His parents were, of course, followers of the immediately previous Jain Tirthankara and teacher Parshvanatha.

Little is known about Mahavira's childhood. He was raised a prince in a wealthy environment. There are a few stories, such as one that recounts his subduing a ferocious snake, a demonstration of his courage and calmness. The accounts of his young adulthood vary. The Shvetambaras believe that he fulfilled his duties as a householder by marrying a princess named Yashoda and that the couple had a daughter called Priyadarshana. Only after the death of his parents did Mahavira leave the palace and adopt the life of a wandering mendicant. According to the Digambaras, Mahavira never married. He demonstrated an aversion to all worldly matters throughout his life.

When Mahavira was 30 years of age, Mahavira experienced the visit of some (Hindu) deities who urged his renunciation of the world. He chose a symbolic location for the renunciation, a large park under an ashoka tree, already a fabled tree associated with stories of the gods and known in India for its natural beauty (Buddha is said to have been born under an ashoka tree). The act of renunciation, according to the Digambaras, consisted of him removing all of his clothes and pulling out all his hair in five bunches (which remains a norm for contemporary Jain monks and nuns). Afterward he lived as a complete renunciate, which included the life of a naked ascetic. According to the Shvetambaras, Mahavira retained a covering over his private parts with a small loincloth he had received from Indra, the king of the gods. He reputedly wore this cloth for 13 months, but when it fell from him, he henceforth lived as a naked mendicant.

Jain devotees watch a dancer as they celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Lord Mahavira in Allahabad, India. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Mahavira wandered around India for the next 12 years, including periods during which he abstained from water, food, or both. He proved indifferent to bodily pains and pleasures, seemingly unconcerned if caught in burning sunshine or in pouring rain. The Digambaras assert that he also observed silence for these 12 years.

The Shvetambaras tell the story of Mahavira's encounter with an ascetic, Makkhali Gosala (described as attached to an ancient ascetic order, the anjikas), who attached himself to Mahavira, hoping to attain the yogic powers he manifested. He asked to become his disciple. Gosala traveled with Mahavira and observed with growing amazement. At some point he left and declared himself a jina (spiritual victor). Mahavira later reveals that Gosala not only was not a jina, but that his former disciple had unsuccessfully tried to kill him.

Meanwhile, after this time of ignoring anything done to his body, in a period of intense meditation, Mahavira attains kevalajnana, enlightenment, described as an infinite supreme knowledge/intuition. His attainment led to a new status as the 24th and final tirthankara of the era.

The gods constructed a large assembly hall for the new tirthankara. The Digambaras believe that because of his purity, he no longer needed to eat or drink and that he had no need of sleep nor did he age. He sat in meditation in the assembly hall, in the midst of which he uttered a divine sound that carried the essence of the Jain teaching—the beings of every rank from heaven to hell, from human to animal or deity—to all who gathered in the hall in a state of awe. The Shvetambaras teach, in contrast, that only the gods and a few highly select disciples were present for this teaching moment.

It is, however, from this time of his enlightenment that the Jain community began to form, quite apart from Mahavira making any effort to create it. Mahavira lived another 30 years and continued his itinerant life, wandering from place to place. During these years, the community of monks and nuns emerged (the nuns continuing to outnumber the monks to the present). Mahavira's death, at the age of 72, followed his undergoing a series of ever-more-rigorous fasts. Believers hold that his soul journeyed to the top of the universe, where it remains in unlimited consciousness and bliss.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Asceticism; Buddha, Gautama; Enlightenment; Jainism; Meditation; Monasticism; Yoga.

References

- Dundas, Paul. The Jains. London: Routledge, 1992.
- Jain, Mehesh K. Lord Mahavira: Life and Philosophy. New Delhi: Shree Publishers & Distributors, 2003.
- Jaini, P. S. The Jaina Path of Purification. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1990.
- Lalwani, L. C. Kalpa Sutra. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1979.
- Law, Bimala Churn. Mahavira: His Life and Teachings and Schools and Sects: In Jaina Literature. Kolkata, India: Maha Bodhi Book Agency, 2002.

Mahayana Buddhism

Buddhism goes back to the historical Buddha (ca. 563–ca. 483 BCE) called the Buddha Shakyamuni. Historically, the development of Buddhism is usually divided into four periods: (1) early Buddhism, from the lifetime of the Buddha until the reign of Asoka (d. 238 or 232 BCE) and the split of the Buddhist order into different branches (nikaya); (2) the schools of so-called Hinayana (nikaya); (3) Mahayana Buddhism and its systems; and (4) Vajrayana (or Buddhist Tantrism). Mahayana Buddhism (in Sanskrit, Mahayana means, literally, the “Great Vehicle”) is now the predominant form of Buddhism in Central and East Asia and has also been making its way under its different forms (Tibetan Buddhism, Zen Buddhism, Pure Land Buddhism) into Western countries and cultures.

A statue of Guan Yin, the Buddhist goddess of compassion. (Kikkeema/Dreamstime.com)

The early Mahayana sources mainly consist of religious, non-historical literature, and consequently our understanding of the formation of early Mahayana, especially the time and the movement's religious and social background in India, is not clear at all. The common assumption has been that the first step toward (proto-)Mahayana was the schismatic split of the early Buddhist community (sangha) into two branches, the Sthaviras (Sanskrit: the “Elder”) and the Mahasanghikas (Sanskrit: the “Ones Belonging to the Big[er] Community”). However, scholars now tend to fix the origin of Mahayana to a later period, probably around the beginning of the Common Era.

Early Mahayana was characterized by a set of concepts that were not necessarily absent in the teaching of Hinayana schools but that gained more prominence in Mahayana circles. Among these was the idea that the ideal soteriological “type” was no longer exclusively the ascetic, self-sufficient arhat, that is, the Hinayana saint who had finally reached enlightenment (Sanskrit: bodhi) and redemption (nirvana). In contrast, the Mahayana ideal was the socially behaving bodhisattva, a “being (bearing) enlightenment,” who was supposed to undertake any effort, physically and spiritually, to save all living beings before realizing his or her own redemption. Mahayana consequently and early on acknowledged the existence of a plurality of these saviors, including Buddhas, who acted also from beyond this world. This latter notion led to the idea of “paradises” (Pure Lands), where believers wanted to be reborn in order to gain enlightenment and final redemption from the circle of rebirth in the presence and by the teaching of a fully enlightened Buddha.

In religious practice, the concepts of Mahayana paved the way for more soteriological activities of the laypeople: through good deeds one could accumulate merit (Sanskrit: punya), which could even be transferred (punyaparinama) to other living beings. Even a normal human being bore the germ of enlightenment, and it was one of the goals of the Mahayana religious practice—in an ethical or ritual way or through meditative practice—to unfold this hidden, true nature.

The main philosophical schools of early Mahayana in India were the Madhyamaka (“[Teaching of the] Middle [Way]”) of Nagarjuna and the Yogacara (“Practice of the Yoga”) / Vijñānavāda (“Teaching of [Mere] Consciousness”). With the divergence of different schools in Mahayana, it became necessary, especially in East Asia, to systematize and hierarchize the teachings. Chinese schools like Tiantai, Huayan, and Mizong (esoteric Mahayana, in Japan mainly known as Shingon, “True Word”) tried to cope with this task. Besides these, there were schools that emphasized meditative (such as the Chinese Chan Buddhism and the Japanese Zen Buddhism) or devotional practice (like the Chinese Jingtū School and the Japanese Jōdo Shū, or Pure Land Buddhism) over systematics.

Max Deeg

See also: Ashoka; Buddha, Gautama; Buddhism; Enlightenment; Pure Land Buddhism;

Shingon Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Harvey, Peter. An Introduction to Buddhism: Teachings, History and Practices. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Sangharakshita. The Bodhisattva Ideal: Wisdom and Compassion in Buddhism. Glasgow: Windhorse, 2000.
- Suzuki, D. T. Outlines of Mahayana Buddhism. New York: Schocken, 1963.
- Williams, Paul. Mahayana Buddhism: The Doctrinal Foundations. New York: Routledge, 2008.

Mai Chaza Church/City of Jehovah

One of the more controversial of the African Initiated Churches in Zimbabwe is the City of Jehovah (Guta raJehova) movement, also called the Mai Chaza Church, founded in 1955 by Mai (Mother) Chaza (d. 1960). She was a Methodist who became ill and was divorced from her husband in 1953–1954. After this experience, she claimed to have been resurrected from the dead and stated that in revelations on a holy mountain (called Sinai) she had been called to live a celibate and ascetic life and to preach healing, especially to barren women. Her fame as a healer spread, with people coming to her for healing from all over Zimbabwe and other countries in southern Africa. She preferred to refer to herself as the Mutumwa (Messenger) of God, although followers gave her messianic titles like Muponisi (Savior) and Gwayana (Lamb), and saw her as an African reappearance of Christ.

Chaza faced opposition to her activities and eventually found refuge in the Seke township, near Harare. Here she established the first of seven healing centers created in various parts of Zimbabwe, called Cities of Jehovah, which members enter and may settle in after an elaborate confession procedure. Members of this church, both men and women, wear khaki tunics and shorts with red belts—a radical break with custom for African women, who may also wear white dresses—and they carry sheathed knives as the soldiers of Jehovah.

A book of revelation called the Guta raJehova Bible, in which Mai Chaza's words and deeds are recorded, has virtually replaced the New Testament in the City of Jehovah. Chaza is sometimes depicted as a member of the Trinity. The church opposes traditional healing practices and ancestor rites, monogamy is demanded, African music and dancing are used in liturgy, and infant baptism is practiced. The Eucharist is not celebrated.

When Mai Chaza died in 1960, a succession struggle took place. The minority faction settled in the Mutare area under a Nyamandura. The majority group believed that Chaza's spirit had entered a Malawian man named Mapaulos, who became known as Vamatenga ("someone from heaven"). Like Mai Chaza, Vamatenga was believed to be an incarnation of God, but he did not have the same influence as Mai Chaza. The movement was estimated to have some 60,000 members by 2000.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Asceticism.

References

- Martin, Marie-Louise. "The Mai Chaza Church in Rhodesia." In African Initiatives in Religion, edited by David B. Barrett, 109–121. Nairobi: East African Publishing House, 1971.
- Scarnecchia, Timothy. "Mai Chaza's Guta re Jehova (City of God): Gender, Healing and Urban Identity in an African Independent Church." Journal of Southern African Studies 23, no. 1 (1997): 87–105.

Malagasy Lutheran Church

The Malagasy Lutheran Church (Eglise luthérienne malgache) originated as part of the second phase of Protestant Christian development in Madagascar. Protestant Christianity on the island was pioneered by the London Missionary Society (a Congregationalist organization) and had enjoyed the favor of King Radama I (r. 1810–1828), but following his death in 1835, his successor, Queen Ranavalona I (r. 1828–1861) banished the missionaries and moved to re-establish traditional Malagasy religion. Only after her death in 1860 were the missionaries allowed to return. By this time, however, a translation of the Bible in Malagasy had been made and supporting literature had been printed.

In its conflict with Malagasy indigenous religion, Christian lay practitioners have continued to utilize a Christian rite of exorcism to drive what they believed were demons from new converts. This practice had been widespread in evangelical Christian circles in Asia and Africa.

In 1866 representatives of the Norwegian Missionary Society, the missionary arm of the Church of Norway, began work in the southern part of Madagascar. The work found immediate success and soon spread to a variety of locations, where schools were opened. A seminary for training workers was located in Fianrantsoa. The work was enlarged in 1888 and 1889 by Norwegian Americans sent by the several Norwegian Lutheran churches then operating in the United States (now an integral part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America). Through the first half of the 20th century, these three missions developed separately but cooperated in such activities as the seminary and coordinated their evangelistic efforts so as not to duplicate work.

After World War II, the movement for national independence gained significant strength, and the Lutherans responded to the coming changes in 1950 by formally merging their missions into the Malagasy Lutheran Church. Missionaries remained in charge until 1961, when, one year after national independence, the first Malagasy president of the church, Rakoto Andrianarijaona, assumed office.

The church retained an intimate relationship with the supporting missionary agencies and churches in Norway and the United States, which were represented at every level of church organization. A revision of the constitution in 1975 reoriented the relationship between the several churches: The formerly subordinate relationship of the Malagasy church was replaced with a partnership. The missionaries were now integrated into the church structure, and the sending churches reduced their representation in the church's ruling structure. In addition, the Malagasy church was now represented in the administration of the sending churches. The Malagasy church still receives financial support from the Church of Norway and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, and in 1978 the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark joined the partnership.

The Malagasy Lutheran Church is headed by a triennial national synod that elects a president and executive committee to oversee administration. It sponsors the Lutheran Printing Press, through which it publishes Bibles, hymnals, and other church literature. It supports a chain of elementary and secondary schools, including one especially equipped to serve the blind and one for those with speaking and hearing disabilities. Since World War II, an extensive medical program has been developed through several hospitals and a set of clinics. The medical units supplement a unique healing program that had been launched in 1894 around Rainisoalambo, a native catechist who was believed to have a gift of healing. Much of the church's growth came from the revival associated with this healing ministry and the diaconal caring program that grew out of it.

In 1975 the church moved its headquarters from southern Madagascar to the capital, a signal of the northward thrust of the church into those areas where Christianity is the weakest. In 2005 the church reported three million members. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches.

Malagasy Lutheran Church
54 avenue de l'Independance
BP 1741
Antananarivo 1101
Madagascar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Norway; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; London Missionary Society; Lutheran World Federation; Malagasy Lutheran Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Austnaberg, Hans. Shepherds and Demons: A Study of Exorcism as Practised and Understood by Shepherds in the Malagasy Lutheran Church. London: Peter Lang, 2007.
- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A

Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Syrdal, Rolf. Mission in Madagascar: Studies of our Mission in Madagascar and the Beginnings and Development of the Malagasy Lutheran Church. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1979.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church

The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church traces its history to the legendary travels of the Apostle Thomas to India in the years following the death and resurrection of Jesus. According to tradition, Thomas landed at Cranganore, Kerala, in 52 CE. He is believed to have evangelized the land over the next two decades but was finally martyred at what is known as Saint Thomas Mount.

Through the centuries, the church came into contact with the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, based in Iraq. Information on the existence of this church had been lost during the years after the rise of Islam and its control of the land between Kerala and the main concentration of Christians in Europe. Although the Malankara Church was in full communion with the Assyrian Church, communication was not regular. Then in the 15th century, when Portuguese Roman Catholics arrived, the church quickly established cordial relations with the visitors.

As the Portuguese established themselves in Kerala, representatives of the Roman Catholic Church began to criticize the theology of the Malankara Church. It had a theology that represented a position in the larger church that was condemned in the fifth century by the Council of Ephesus. The Assyrian Church, and hence the Malankara Church, was a Monophysite church that taught that Christ had only one nature, the divine nature. The Council of Ephesus promulgated teachings that Christ had both a human and a divine nature.

The Roman Catholic Church placed considerable pressure on the Malankara Church through the last half of the 16th century, and in 1599, at a synod held at Daimper, the church adopted a series of practices deemed necessary for its alignment with the Church in Rome. Changes included the adoption of Roman vestments, the abandonment of a married priesthood, and the acceptance of Portuguese bishops. Over the next 50 years, there was significant opposition to the changes, and in 1653, the great majority of the church withdrew from communion with Rome. At a synod also held at Daimper, church leaders both formally and symbolically renounced their ties to Rome and the changes that had been wrought in 1599. Those who remained loyal to Rome constituted the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church.

The Malankara Church revived the pre-Roman liturgy and practices and selected a new patriarch, Mar Thoma I (r. 1637–1670), who was consecrated in 1665 by Mar Gregorius (d. 1681) of the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch. The two churches enjoyed a cordial relationship for the next several centuries. However, late in the 19th century the relationship between the two churches began to sour. In 1886, Patriarch Ignatius Peter IV (r. 1872–1894) of the Syrian Church called a synod at Mulanthuruthy, India, and laid claim to all the property of the Malankara Church in India. The dispute lasted for more than half a century, during which time the Syrian Church established itself in India. Finally in 1958, the Supreme Court of India refused to sustain the claims of the Syrian Church and awarded all the disputed property to the Malankara Church.

During the lengthy battle with the Syrian Church, the Malankara Church faced other problems as well. First, the Church of England, which had also encountered the Malankara Church following the establishment of British authority in India, began to suggest changes to the church that would bring it more in line with Anglicanism and the orthodox theological tradition that dominated Europe. Through the 19th century, the drive to reform the church along Anglican lines gained considerable support. The Reformist wing of the church eventually left and reorganized as the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar. On the other hand, in the 1920s several bishops left to found the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, which has been in full communion with Rome ever since.

The modern Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church is led by the catholicate of the East, an office established by the church in 1912. In the midst of its dispute with the Syrian patriarch, Abdul Messiah, the Indian church leader, announced that the catholicate of Edessa (in Syria), a see that had not existed for centuries, was to be re-established in India. The new catholicate became the first of the new line of Malankara Church leaders.

In the years since World War II, the church has attempted to participate in the new global Christian community. The church is a charter member of the World Council of Churches. It has approximately 2 million members (2005), organized into some 23 dioceses. It sponsors a set of schools, including the Orthodox Theological Seminary, and several medical facilities.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Church of England; Syro-Malabar Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Chaillot, Christine. The Malankara Orthodox Church: Visit to the Oriental Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church of India. Paris, France: Inter-Orthodox Dialogue, 1996.
- Frykenberg, Robert Louis. Christianity in India: From Beginnings to the Present. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Moffatt, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1, Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.

■ Malawi

Malawi is a small nation in southern Africa east of Zambia and south of Tanzania. Its southern half is surrounded by Mozambique. Much of its border with Tanzania is constituted by Lake Malawi, the southernmost lake in the lengthy Rift Valley that can be traced northward to Kenya. Some 13,900,000 people (2008) live in Malawi's 36,324 square miles of territory.

The land making up the nation of Malawi rose from obscurity in the 10th century as part of the extended territory of the monomotapa (ruler) of Zimbabwe. Zimbabwe, desirous of extending its mining operations, had claimed the area to the west and south of Lake

An undated postcard of a Christian missionary near the Shire River in Malawi, Africa. (Rykoff Collection/Corbis)

Malawi. The land had been settled by a variety of Bantu people, especially the Chewas and the Yao. Then the expansion of the Zulus far to the south brought about the decline of the Zimbabwean kingdom and also pushed the Ngoli-Ndwande people into the region.

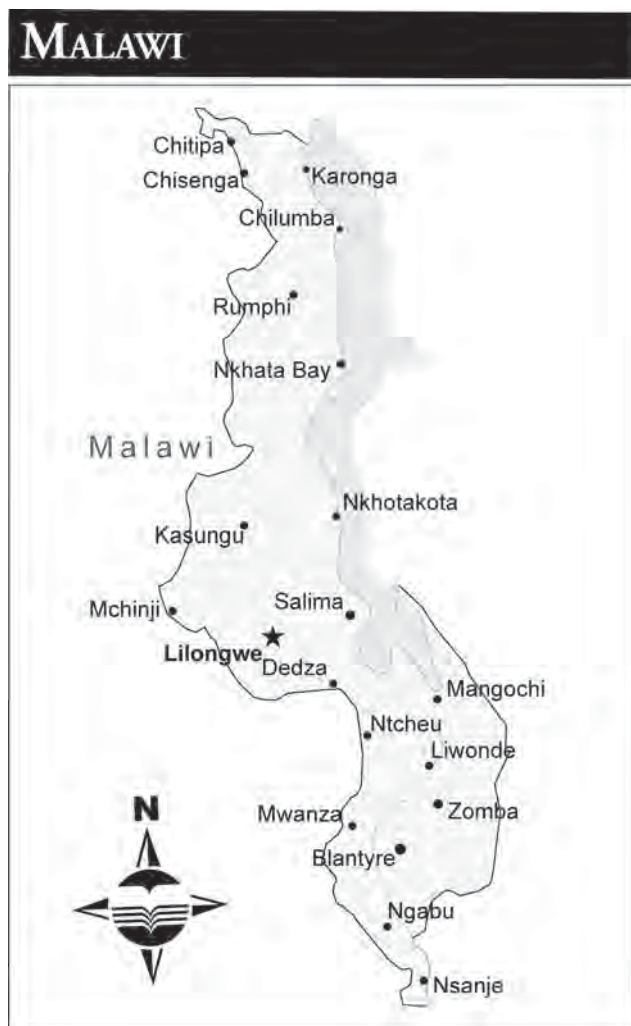

Western attention to the region began with the explorations of British missionary David Livingstone (1813–1873) and the subsequent assertion of British interest in building a land route linking South Africa to Egypt. In 1891 the British Protectorate of Nyassaland was created. That Protectorate gave way to the independent state of Malawi in 1964. Hastings Kamuzu Banda (1906–1997), elected president in the first free elections, soon seized power and continued to rule the country with increasingly dictatorial powers until he was defeated in 1994 in the country's first multiparty elections. The Banda years had been marked by suppression of dissident intellectual, political enemies, and minority religions.

The traditional religions of Malawi have been able to stave off significant missionary efforts from both Christians and Muslims. Approximately 25 percent of the population continues to follow their ancestral faith. Among the more important surviving faiths is that built around the deity Chisumphi, which survives among the Chewa people. The Chewas had held sway over much of Malawi during a period when the Zimbabwean kingdom had been in decline. Worship of Chisumphi was centered on a drum located at the main center of the faith at Kaphirntiwa. He was believed to possess women who functioned as mediums, known as Makewanan.

As Christianity moved into the area, it encountered another belief system among the southern Chewa, built around the deity M'Bona, a god who was once human. Under the impact of the cultural clash, Chewa leaders began to speak of M'Bona as a black Christ and adopted various practices from the Christian church.

David Livingstone issued the call for Christians to evangelize Malawi. The first work, established by the Universities' Mission to Central Africa, an Anglican society, established a station north of Lake Malawi (then known as Lake Nyassa), but it had to be discontinued after suffering a series of misfortunes. The Free Church of Scotland, a Presbyterian body, opened more enduring work in 1875, and the Church of Scotland, also Presbyterian, sent missionaries in 1876. In 1926, these two churches joined with the mission founded in 1888 by the Reformed Church of South Africa to form the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian, the largest Protestant church in the country. President Banda was a member of this church and moved against other groups, most especially the Jehovah's Witnesses, who were banned in 1969. The apolitical Witnesses had refused to abide by the law requiring all citizens to be members of the political party led by Banda, and in 1967, many had been savagely beaten for their seemingly unpatriotic stance.

Roman Catholics had first visited Malawi in 1561 but did not establish permanent missionary stations until the end of the 1880s. The White Fathers pioneered this effort. The first Malawian priest was ordained in 1937, and the first bishop was consecrated in 1956. The church experienced rapid growth after World War II and soon surpassed the Presbyterians in membership.

More than 100 different Christian denominations now operate in Malawi. Included are older missionary churches such as the Anglican Church (1879), the Seventh Day Baptist General Conference (1899), and the Churches of Christ (1906). The African Methodist Episcopal Church expanded its work to Malawi in 1924. The Anglican Church has two dioceses in Malawi, now incorporated into the Church of the Province of Central Africa, whose archbishop resides in Botswana.

These denominations have been joined by the newer Holiness and Pentecostal denominations, such as the International Pentecostal Holiness Church (1923), the Assemblies of God (1930), Church of the Nazarene (1957), and the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1970). The Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod is affiliated with the Lutheran Church of Central Africa, established in 1962. More recently the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Malawi (ELCM) was started by a Lutheran layman, Gilbert Msuku, upon his return to Malawi after 17 years of residence in Tanzania. He gathered an initial congregation in Lilongwe, the capital of Malawi, where its headquarters remains. The ELCM is affiliated with the Federation of Lutheran Churches in Southern Africa and the Lutheran World Federation.

Like its neighbors, Malawi is also home to a spectrum of African Initiated Churches, among the most expansive being the African Industrial Mission, founded in 1898, and the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange, an independent church that began in Zimbabwe. Besides the African Industrial Mission, unique Malawian churches include the Achewa Church (1920), which has Baptist roots, and the Last Church of God and His Christ (1924), founded by former members of the Presbyterian Church.

Malawi has offered strong support to both the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Jehovah's Witnesses, the latter having made a comeback after its period of suffering in the 1970s. The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa has a small

Malawi

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,665,000	12,001,000	79.8	2.77	17,410,000	26,553,000
Protestants	960,000	4,115,000	27.4	4.60	5,900,000	9,200,000
Roman Catholics	993,000	3,850,000	25.6	4.52	5,716,000	8,900,000
Independents	194,000	1,900,000	12.6	1.80	3,000,000	4,600,000
Muslims	725,000	1,985,000	13.2	2.62	2,800,000	4,150,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,113,000	940,000	6.3	0.75	950,000	900,000
Agnostics	500	42,000	0.3	2.62	75,000	125,000
Baha'is	8,400	36,000	0.2	2.62	70,000	130,000
Hindus	5,000	31,000	0.2	2.62	45,000	80,000
Sikhs	200	600	0.0	2.61	1,000	2,000
New religionists	200	600	0.0	2.64	1,000	1,600
Jews	80	250	0.0	2.63	300	400
Atheists	0	300	0.0	2.59	1,000	2,000
Total population	4,518,000	15,037,000	100.0	2.62	21,353,000	31,944,000

work associated with its diocese in Zimbabwe. A more substantive Orthodox presence is provided by the Coptic Orthodox Church, which named a bishop for the country in 1920.

The Christian Council of Malawi, an affiliate of the World Council of Churches, dates to 1939. It grew out of the older Consultative Board of Federative Malawi Missions of Nyassaland. There are also two organizations serving primarily African Initiated Churches: the Followers of Christ Association of Malawi and the Reformed Independent Churches Association of Malawi.

Islam has made its most significant impact in Malawi among the Yao people of eastern Malawi, the great majority of whom are now Muslims of the Sunni Shafaiite School. The Malawian Muslim community has expanded in recent decades, receiving financial support from several Arab countries. The first spiritual assembly of the Baha'i Faith in the country was founded in 1964. It experienced early growth in the expatriate Indian community, which includes Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs. Hindus have organized the Shree Hindu Seva Mandal (a temple) in Blantyre. The Sikh community is centered in Limbe.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange; African Methodist Episcopal Church;

Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of Scotland; Church of the Nazarene; Church of the Province of Central Africa; Churches of Christ; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; Jehovah's Witnesses; Lutheran World Federation; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Seventh Day Baptist General Conference; Shafaiite School of Islam; White Fathers; Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod; World Council of Churches.

References

- Amanze, Joseph. African Traditional Religion in Malawi: The Case of the Bimbi Cult. Zomba, Malawi: Kachere Series, 2002.
- Bone, David. S., ed. Malawi's Muslims: A Historical Perspective. Zomba, Malawi: Kachere Series, 2000.
- Bone, David. S., ed. Religion in Malawi: Current Research. Zomba, Malawi: Department of Religious Studies, Chancellor College, University of Malawi, 1983.
- Chakanza, J. C. An Annotated List of Independent Churches in Malawi, 1900–1981. Zomba, Malawi: Department of Religious Studies, Chancellor College, University of Malawi, 1983.

De Kok, Bergje. Christianity and African Traditional Religion: Two Realities of a Different Kind.

Zomba, Malawi: Kachere Series, 2004.

Sindima, H. J. A General Survey of the History of the Independent Church in Malawi, 1900–1976.

Nairobi: AACC, 1977.

Thompson, Jack. Ngoni, Xhosa and Scot: Religion and Cultural Interactions in Malawi. Zomba, Malawi: Kachere Series, 2007.

Wishlade, R. L. Sectarianism in Southern Nyasaland. London: Oxford University Press, 1964.

■ Malaysia

The modern nation of Malaysia was created in 1963 when the former British colonies of Malaya, Singapore, Sarawak, and Sabah merged to form the Federation of Malaysia (Singapore went its separate way two years later). It lies north of Indonesia, with whom it shares the island of Borneo. West Malaysia shares its northern border with Thailand. Some 25,274,000 people occupy the country's 127,000 square miles of territory. Ethnically, the population includes three significant groups: Malays (50 percent), Chinese (30 percent), and Indians (15 percent).

The Malays settled the land in prehistoric times, and the historical period began with the migration of the Chinese into the region in the second millennium BCE. Indians arrived in the first century CE, when an Indian state emerged on the Mekong River in what is now Vietnam. Chinese Buddhist states emerged along the eastern shore of the Malay Peninsula. In the 15th century, the port of Melaka (or Malacca) was founded on the western shore of the peninsula. This port became the doorway for Islam's entrance into the area, and a century of trade with Muslims coincided with the rise of Islam to dominance among the Malay segment of the population and the replacement of the Buddhist states with Islamic ones.

In 1511, the Portuguese seized Melaka. A century later, the Dutch moved in and replaced the Portuguese. The British then moved into the area by settling along the northern shore of the island of Borneo. The conflict between the Dutch and British, which reached a new peak following the founding of Singapore in 1819, led to an 1824 treaty that made Malaya a British colony. From their base at Melaka and Penang, the British encouraged the various sultans who continued to rule over most of the peninsula to form a federation, while the territories on Borneo (Brunei, Sabah, and Sarawak) were turned into protectorates. The British also encouraged the immigration into Malaya first of Chinese and then, in the early 20th century, of Tamils from India. By controlling the economy and employment, the British nurtured a segregated system—the Malays dominating agriculture; the Chinese, mining; and the Indians, rubber production.

Christ Church (Anglican), Melaka, Malaysia, is the oldest Protestant church in Southeast Asia. (J. Gordon Melton)

The area was occupied by the Japanese during World War II. When the British again assumed hegemony, they began to propose changes in governance, which raised tensions between the several ethnic groups, on several occasions leading to the outbreak of hostilities. Finally, in 1957, a platform for independence was worked out, building on the federation of sultans previously established. Malaysia was established as a federation of 11 states. Every five years, one of the sultans from the nine Islamic sultanates is designated as the monarch, sharing power in a constitutional system with a Parliament and popularly elected prime minister. The Chinese and Indians were granted citizenship, but the Malays, as indigenous people, were accorded several special privileges, and Malay was designated the official language.

MALAYSIA

Today, religion in Malaysia is largely divided along ethnic lines. Malaysia is dominated by Sunni Muslims of the Shafaiite School. Islam was introduced in the 13th century by traders from India (primarily from Bengal and Gujarat) and the Middle East. It replaced the indigenous religions of the Malay peoples as well as the Hinduism and Buddhism of the elites. Aristocrats in the coastal districts were the first to accept the new faith, and the population followed in gradual stages. Diplomatic marriages between the royal classes of different kingdoms further spread the faith. For example, marriages arranged by the sultan in Melaka led to the establishment of Islam on Borneo.

Islam remained dominant during the colonial era, and its continued leadership role is symbolized by the National Mosque in Kuala Lumpur, completed in 1965. Islam was named the state religion in Malaysia in 1957. Each of the nine sultans is head of the faith in his own sultanate. The sultan serving as king is also head of Islam in the two states without a sultan, Melaka and Penang. There is no designated head of the faith in Sarawak or Sabah. Among the king's stated duties is defending the faith, and he also has a set of administrative tasks such as setting the dates for Muslim festivals.

Founded in 1968, the Council for Islamic Affairs, which operates out of the prime minister's office, coordinates the activities of the state councils that advise the sultans and state governments on religious matters. The state and national legislatures have the power to make laws relative to Islam and other religions.

Although Islam of the Shafaiite School predominates, there are measurable communities of Shia Islam and Sufism. The Sufi brotherhoods were prominent among the Muslims who introduced Islam to the region, especially Borneo. There is a small community belonging to the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, and the Baha'i Faith is growing primarily from Muslim converts.

Buddhism emerged among the Malaysians of Chinese heritage and still retains the allegiance of the great majority of them. Most follow Chinese Mahayana (Pure Land) Buddhist traditions, often mixed with Daoism. Tian Dao (also known as Yiguandao) is a popular new Daoist movement that includes elements of Buddhism. There are also some Tibetan tantric influences and a few Theravada Buddhists; the urban Buddhist community in particular now manifests the same pluralism as found in other Southeast Asian cities. Thus one would find, for example, centers for groups such as the Falun Gong and the True Buddha School. At the other end of the spectrum, Buddhism fades into Chinese folk religion.

Leading Buddhist organizations include the Malaysian Buddhist Association (Mahayana), the Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia, Foguangshan Buddhism, the Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, the Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia, and the Sasana Abhiwurdhi Wardhana Society, a Theravada group formed in 1894 for Sri Lankans. The True Buddha School, a Chinese Esoteric Buddhist group from Taiwan, grew significantly in Malaysia through the 1990s, and now has more members in Malaysia than any country.

Hinduism, introduced around the beginning of the Common Era, controlled much of Malaysia through its Hindu rulers prior to the coming of Islam. Today it is the dominant religion of the Indian Malaysians, the majority adhering to Tamil Shaivism. Several of the new Hindu movements entered Malaysia in the 20th century, including the Divine Life Society and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. A number of Sikhs from India and Pakistan have also made Malaysia their home.

Coming relatively late to Malaysia is Christianity, introduced by the Portuguese when they captured Melaka. The Dutch pushed the Roman Catholic Church aside and introduced Protestantism (the Reformed Church) in the 17th century. However, it was not until the 19th century, during the British era, that the modern Protestant missionary movement targeted the region. Malaysia and Singapore shared a history until 1965, since which they have largely gone their separate ways.

Malaysia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	5,388,000	15,876,000	56.9	1.97	20,053,000	23,991,000
Chinese folk	2,687,000	5,050,000	18.1	1.94	5,300,000	5,755,000
Christians	582,000	2,530,000	9.1	2.25	3,308,000	4,064,000
Roman Catholics	301,000	1,250,000	4.5	1.64	1,550,000	1,850,000
Protestants	159,000	760,000	2.7	3.09	1,100,000	1,400,000
Anglicans	69,600	230,000	0.8	2.02	290,000	350,000
Hindus	804,000	1,750,000	6.3	1.97	2,100,000	2,450,000
Buddhists	690,000	1,430,000	5.1	1.74	1,650,000	1,900,000
Ethnoreligionists	553,000	950,000	3.4	1.73	850,000	800,000
Agnostics	16,000	105,000	0.4	1.97	200,000	300,000
Baha'is	42,700	78,000	0.3	1.97	100,000	120,000
New religionists	50,800	70,000	0.3	1.97	85,000	100,000
Sikhs	30,000	46,700	0.2	1.97	60,000	75,000
Atheists	8,000	32,000	0.1	1.97	60,000	72,000
Jains	1,200	2,100	0.0	1.96	3,000	4,000
Total population	10,853,000	27,920,000	100.0	1.97	33,769,000	39,631,000

The first Roman Catholic priest settled in Melaka in 1611. In the 1540s, the town was home to one of the more famous Jesuits, Francis Xavier (1506–1552), who introduced Roman Catholicism to much of Asia. The Diocese of Malaysia was established in 1557, abandoned in 1641, and re-established in 1888 (with the bishop residing in Singapore). The Archdiocese of Malaysia and Singapore was separated in 1972. Catholics have their major constituency among the Chinese, Indian, and small Eurasian community. The church has experienced major problems in Sabah as a result of the expulsion of many priests and religious in the early 1970s at the same time that a noticeable increase in Islamic proselytization within the Christian community was evident.

After the British expelled the Dutch from the Reformed Church, the next Protestant missionaries in Malaysia were from the London Missionary Society, a Congregationalist organization. The missionary William Milne (1785–1822) had stopped at Melaka on his way to China, and he stayed to train Chinese Malaysians as missionaries in both Malaya and China. When China was finally opened to Christian missionaries in 1842, the work transferred there.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, associated with the Church of England, began work in Malaysia six years after the London Missionary Society, in 1848. It was soon joined by the Church Missionary Society. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) began work in Malaysia from its base in Singapore. The effort, originally administered from India, was organized into the Malaysian Mission Conference in 1894 and the Annual Conference in 1902. Meanwhile, in the 1860s, the Christian Brethren launched their missionary efforts.

Through the 20th century, numerous other Christian groups have also initiated work in Malaysia—the Lutherans (Protestant Church of Sabah), the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Assemblies of God receiving the best response. Outstanding among missionary efforts, however, is the work of the Borneo Evangelical Mission, which was created in 1928 by a group of conservative Protestants in Melbourne, Australia. Their effort has produced what is now the third largest church in the country, the Evangelical Church of Borneo. It is just behind the Roman Catholic Church and the Methodist Church in Malaysia, and just ahead of the Anglicans, whose three dioceses are now part of the Church of the Province of Southeast Asia (created in 1996).

The Christian community has been increased by the addition of several non-Western groups, most important, the Local Church and the True Jesus Church, both developed early in the 20th century in China. The Tamil-speaking Ceylon Pentecostal Church came to Malaysia from Sri Lanka, and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar arrived with members migrating from India. However, even with the development of a variety of different Christian groups, the Christian community remains relatively small compared to the other major traditions. It has had the most success in Sabah and Sarawak as compared to western Malaysia.

Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Council of Churches of Malaysia (founded in 1948 as the Council of Churches of Malaysia and Singapore). It is an affiliate of the World Council of Churches. Conservative Protestants are associated in the National Evangelical Christian Fellowship Malaysia, which is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Buddhist Compassion Relief Tzu Chi Association, The; Buddhist Missionary Society Malaysia; Christian Brethren; Church Missionary Society; Church of the Province of Southeast Asia; Church of England; Divine Life Society; Falun Gong; Foguangshan; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jesuits; London Missionary Society; Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar; Methodist Church of Malaysia; Pure Land Buddhism; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafaiite School of Islam; Shia Islam; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Sufism; Tamil Shaivism; Tian Dao; True Buddha School; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Young Buddhist Association of Malaysia.

References

- Andaya, Barbara Watson, and Leonard Y. Andaya. A History of Malaysia. Houndsmills, Hampshire, UK: Palgrave, 2001.
- Basri, Ghazalki. Christian Mission and Islamic Dewah in Malaysia. Kuala Lumpur: Nurin Enterprise, 1990.
- Cheu, Hock Tong. Chinese Beliefs and Practices in Southeast Asia: Studies on the Chinese Religion

in Malaysia, Singapore and Indonesia. Selangor, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1999.

Hassan, M. Kamal, and Ghazali bin Basri, eds.

Encyclopedia of Malaysia. Vol. 10, Religions and Beliefs. Singapore: Archipelago Press, 2006.

Hurt, R., L. K. King, and J. Roxborough, eds. Christianity in Malaysia: A Denominational History. Selangor Darul Ehsan, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1992.

Kennedy, J. A History of Malaya. Kuala Lumpur: Synergy Books International, 1993.

Lee, Raymond L. M., and Susan Ellen Ackerman. Sacred Tensions: Modernity and Religious Transformation in Malaysia. Colombia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

McDougall, C. Buddhism in Malaya. Singapore: Donald Moore, 1956.

Putra, T. A. R., et al. Contemporary Issues on Malaysian Religions. Petaling Jaya, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1984.

Malaysia, Islam in

Islam is the dominant religion of Malaysia, though communities of Chinese Buddhists and Asian Indian Hindus and non-Malay Christians exist. Islam came to Malaysia from India and the Middle East through the arrival of Muslim traders.

During its initial growth in the seventh century, Islam identified itself with an emerging Arab culture and was carried from its base on the Arabian Peninsula eastward to the Indus River. In the following centuries, the Indian subcontinent would become a battleground in which Hindus and Muslims would be locked in fierce competition for the souls of the ruling elite and the people, with quite varying results in different areas. Beginning in the 12th century, Islam spread to Malaysia and the neighboring Indonesian archipelago. It was brought by merchants from India and the Muslim lands to the west, where it found a following from persuasion rather than the sword.

The port of Melaka (or Melacca), located on the Malaysian side of the narrow strait that separates Malaysia from Sumatra, was founded in the 15th century. Its rulers were the first in the region to convert to Islam and establish it among the people of their land. The prosperity of Melaka, developed from its trade with the Islamic world, tipped the scale among other leaders in the region, and within a short time Islam had become a majority faith and numerous, relatively small sultanates had come into existence. Islam continued to expand even after the Portuguese came to the region in the 16th century.

The Portuguese captured Melaka in 1511. In the mid-1600s, the Dutch entered the region and made an alliance with the sultan of Johor. The Dutch enjoyed a monopoly on trade in the region until the British moved into Malaysia in the late 18th century. After a half century of conflict, in 1824 the Dutch and the English reached an agreement, with the Dutch receiving control of the Indonesian islands and the British receiving control of Malaysia. Until the 1870s, the British did little to interfere with the running of the various states on the Malaysian Peninsula, but in 1874 they imposed the Pangkor Treaty, by which a British advisor was attached to each sultanate. This advisor was to counsel on all matters except Malay religion. The treaty had the unintended consequence of causing the sultans to bring the leadership of the Islamic community into their palaces, launching a tradition whereby the government supplied the top leadership of the religious organizations. As British missionaries moved into the region, Malaysian leaders manifested a noticeable hostility to all things Western, including Christianity.

Growing as it did in a non-Arab context, the form of Islam that became entrenched in Malaysia, Sunni Islam of the Shafiite School, wedded itself to a number of Malaysian cultural practices quite foreign to Middle Eastern Islam. At the beginning of the 20th century, many Malaysian students studied in the Middle East, which they saw as the center of their faith, and absorbed influences from different reformist tendencies. They returned to their homeland to found a movement calling for reform. Shaikh Tahir Jahal al-Din (1869–1957) emerged as the leader of the reformist movement in Malaysia and Indonesia. He called for the establishment of modern Islamic schools and the abandonment of various common practices, which he saw as unlawful innovations.

The reform movement, with a background in Hanafite and even Wahhabi perspectives, did not win the day. However, it did activate the older Shafiite leaders, and in its criticism of the British it is credited with originating the drive for independence that would emerge more visibly after World War II. In the 1950s the Pan-Malayan Islamic Party began to advocate for the establishment of an independent Islamic state.

Following independence in 1957, Islam was named the official religion of Malaysia, and the several sultans in the nine states were named the guardians of the faith in their territory. The country's sovereign is chosen from among the nine sultans. An office of Islamic Development was established in the prime minister's office, and in the 1970s the Islamic Center was opened to give increased attention to the development of the Muslim community. In 1970 the Faculty of Islamic Studies was created at the National University of Malaysia.

The final establishment of modern Malaysia in 1963, complete with the former states of Sabah and Sarawak on the island of Borneo, released the energy of the younger generation. Many affiliated with a new reformist dawah (propagation) movement, which saw Islam as a holistic life. Its members demanded a broader application of Islamic law in the land.

The dawah movement has had a visible effect on the government, which established a variety of institutions such as the International Institute of Islamic Thought and Civilization (1987) and changed a number of practices within the government itself so as to embody Islamic values and practices. There is a significant non-Islamic presence in Malaysia; however, it is almost totally limited to Chinese and other non-Malay peoples. Islam is the majority religion on the Malay Peninsula, but it is the minority in Sabah and Sarawak. Proselytization of Muslims is prohibited and conversion of Muslims to other religions is strongly discouraged and carries a variety of penalties.

Department of Islamic Development Malaysia
Menara Pusat Islam
50519 Jalan Perdana
Kuala Lumpur
Malaysia
<http://www.islam.gov.my/english/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hanafite School of Islam; Shafiite School of Islam; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Andaya, Barbara Watson, and Leonard Y. Andaya. A History of Malaysia. Basingstoke, Hamps., UK: Palgrave, 2001.
- Bakar, M. A. "Islamic Revivalism and the Political Process in Malaysia." Asian Survey 21, no. 10 (1981): 1040–1059.
- Hassan, M. Kamel, and Ghazali bin Basri, eds. Religions and Beliefs. Vol. 10, The Encyclopedia of Islam. Singapore: Archipelago Press, 2005.
- Nagata, J. "The New Fundamentalism: Islam in Contemporary Malaysia." Asian Thought and Society: An International Review 5, no. 14 (1980): 128–141.

■ Maldives, The

The Maldives is an archipelago in the Indian Ocean southwest of Sri Lanka consisting of some 2,000 small coral islands, fewer than 20 percent of which are inhabited. Their land area is a mere 116 square miles, but is home to 386,000 citizens (2008).

On July 3, 1153, the residents of the island, formerly Buddhists, made their conversion to Sunni Islam, and the ruler assumed the title of sultan. Abul Barakaath Yoosuf Al-Barbary, a Muslim from North Africa, led the conversion process, and Sri Tribuvana Aditiya, the king, assumed the name Sultan Mohamed bin Abdullah and instructed his subjects to adopt Islam. He encouraged the shift of allegiance by destroying the island's Buddhist temples and shrines. It is of interest that many of the mosques are oriented to the rising Sun rather than to Mecca, a seeming remnant of the pre-Buddhist culture of the islands. The Buddhists subsequently built their temples on the same sites, and mosques eventually replaced the Buddhist temples. Due to the scarcity of building materials, no attempt to reorient the buildings occurred.

The hub of the Muslim community is the Islamic Center and Grand Friday Mosque that dominates the skyline of Male, the capital city. Among the more than 20 other mosques in the city is Hukuru Miski, some 400 years old and famed for the stone carvings it houses. Adjacent to it is the tomb of Abul Barakaath, the island's Muslim pioneer.

In 1887 the sultan agreed that his land would become a British protectorate. Eventually a naval base was set up on one of the islands to protect the vital sea lanes in the region. The Maldives became independent in 1965. Three years later the sultan was forced out of office and a republic replaced his traditional rule. In 1982 the Maldives joined the British Commonwealth.

Sunni Islam is established as the state religion, and proselytizing by other religious groups (including other schools of Islam) is not allowed. There are a small number of members of the Roman Catholic

Maldives

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	121,000	318,000	98.4	1.59	404,000	501,000
Buddhists	0	2,200	0.7	1.59	2,800	3,500
Christians	220	1,400	0.4	-0.31	1,800	2,300
Roman Catholics	120	850	0.3	0.00	1,000	1,300
Protestants	90	420	0.1	-1.28	600	800
Independents	10	20	0.0	0.00	50	100
Hindus	0	1,100	0.3	1.59	1,500	2,000
Agnostics	0	300	0.1	0.60	500	800
Baha'is	20	130	0.0	1.66	300	450
Atheists	0	20	0.0	-0.97	40	60
Total population	121,000	323,000	100.0	1.58	411,000	510,000

Church and the Baha'i Faith, consisting primarily of expatriates.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Maloney, C. People of the Maldivian Islands. Bombay: Orient Longman, 1980.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
- Yijima, H., ed. The Islamic History of the Maldivian Islands. 2 vols. Tokyo: Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa, 1982, 1984.

■ Mali

Mali is a landlocked, primarily agricultural country in West Africa, south of the Sahara Desert, and home to the fabled city of Timbuktu. Its 471,000 square miles of territory, the northern third of which is desert, are surrounded by Mauritania, Algeria, Niger, Burkina Faso, Cote d'Ivoire, Guinea, and Senegal. Around half of its 12,300,000 people are from the several groups of the Mande people, the remainder from other African groups.

Settled in prehistoric times, the country is now home to a number of Native peoples, the largest group being one of the Mande groups, the Bambara. During the first millennium CE a trans-Saharan trade route that linked West Africa with the Nile River valley passed through Mali, and during the 14th century the Mali Empire reached its peak of prosperity. It reached west to the Atlantic (into present-day Senegal and Guinea), north into Algeria, and eastward into what is now Nigeria and Benin. Timbuktu dominated the western end of the trans-African trade. As Mali rose to power, it developed ties to the Muslim world in the Middle East, and Islam and Islamic learning became the dominant cultural forces in the land. The university at Timbuktu rivaled those of Western Europe in the Middle Ages and was an important force in spreading Islam throughout West Africa.

Detail of the Great Mosque in Djenné, Mali. During the reign of Malian king Sundiata Keita during the 13th century CE, stunning mosques made of earth were constructed throughout the West African empire of Mali. (Corel)

Dogon dancers wearing traditional masks. Living in the central regions of Mali, the Dogon people are known mostly for their culture, which is exemplified by their expressive masks, dances, and architecture. (Travel Pictures Gallery)

The decline of Mali began at the end of the 15th century. Important in this decline was the diversion of trade from the east to the Atlantic coast and the newly arrived Portuguese traders. As neighboring states grew strong, they took more and more land from Mali, a process that continued until the intervention of the French in the middle of the 19th century. In 1896, after rather brutal attempts to pacify the land, the French annexed Mali and in 1904 made it a part of French Sudan.

Independence came in steps, with Mali becoming autonomous in 1959, part of the Sudanese Republic (with Senegal) in 1959, and fully independent in 1960. The new government, which appeared to have made a good start, was swept away by a coup in 1968 and since has been plagued by political instability and poverty. The present parliamentary system is based upon that of France.

Although Islam has overwhelmed the religions of most of the Native peoples in Mali, traditional faiths have remained strong among the Kagoro, Bobo, and Minianka peoples, and the beliefs and practices of the Dogon people have become well known, as they have entered into the Western New Age beliefs. Dogon beliefs include an origin myth that ties them to the star system Sirius, a tradition that appears to contain information about the nature of the system that was unknown to secular astronomy until recent decades.

Islam entered Mali as early as the 10th century, and Malian Muslims are primarily of the Sunni Maliki School of Islam. Islam is said to have been established during a drought in the middle of the 11th century, when the ruler, Allakoi Keita, became a Muslim. Soon afterward the rain began to fall, and in gratitude to God, Keita decided to make a pilgrimage to Mecca. Upon his return to his realm, he was named sultan. The Tijaniyya Sufi Order moved into Mali, where they suffered a major schism, leading to the formation of the Hamaliyya Brotherhood, based in Nioro. By the end of the 20th century, between 70 and 80 percent of the people were Muslim.

Christianity first reached Mali in 1895 with the arrival of the White Fathers, a Roman Catholic missionary order, soon followed by sisters of the affiliate order.

They made slow progress, but in 1921 a vicariate was erected. The first African priest was ordained in 1936, followed by a slow process of building indigenous leadership. The first Malian bishop was consecrated in 1962, two years after Mali became an independent nation. The church has had its greatest success among the Bobo and Dogon peoples.

Protestantism entered the country in 1919 through representatives of the Gospel Missionary Union (GMU), an independent evangelical sending agency founded in the United States in 1892. The Christian and Mission-

Mali

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	3,680,000	11,755,000	87.0	3.08	18,461,000	31,666,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,100,000	1,350,000	10.0	2.72	1,500,000	1,500,000
Christians	85,200	384,000	2.8	2.32	593,000	995,000
Roman Catholics	60,700	270,000	2.0	1.97	415,000	700,000
Protestants	20,100	98,000	0.7	3.27	150,000	250,000
Independents	300	14,000	0.1	2.77	25,000	40,000
Agnostics	0	15,000	0.1	3.02	30,000	60,000
Baha'is	440	1,100	0.0	3.01	2,500	5,000
New religionists	100	700	0.0	3.05	1,500	3,000
Atheists	0	640	0.0	3.04	1,000	1,600
Total population	4,866,000	13,506,000	100.0	3.02	20,589,000	34,231,000

ary Alliance arrived in 1923. The Alliance has had the most success, and its efforts have led to the formation of the Eglise Chrétienne Evangélique du Mali (Evangelical Christian Church of Mali), now the largest of the Protestant bodies. The GMU mission has matured to become the Evangelical Protestant Church of Mali. A spectrum of churches, from the Assemblies of God to the Seventh-day Adventist Church, has appeared, and the Seventh Day Baptist General Conference has a small community.

Given the poverty of the land and the relative difficulty of travel, Mali has not attracted the spectrum of religions found in other countries. There is a small community of the Baha'i Faith and, as is typical of former French colonies, members of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Dogen; Malikite School of Islam; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Seventh Day Baptist General Conference; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; White Fathers.

References

Brenner, Louis. Controlling Knowledge: Religion, Power, and Schooling in a West African Muslim Community. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

Cardaire, M. L'Islam et le terrior africain. Bamako-Koulouba, Mali: IFAN, 1954.

De Villiers, Marq, and Sheila Hirtle. Timbuktu: The Sahara's Fabled City of Gold. Walker & Company, 2007.

Harmon, S. A. "The Expansion of Islam among the Bambara under French Rule, 1890–1940." Ph.D. diss., University of California at Los Angeles, 1988.

Macalou, Ousmane Abdoul. Religion, Magic, Political Power and the Bambara Gods of River Niger. Stanford, CA: Joint Center for African Studies, Stanford University, 1991.

Soares, Benjamin F. Islam and the Prayer Economy: History and Authority in a Malian Town. East Lansing: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

Status of Christianity Profile: Mali. Nairobi, Kenya: Daystar University College, 1988.

Malikite School of Islam

The Malikite School of Islam is one of the four madhhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to Medina (in present-day Saudi Arabia) and Malik ibn Anas al-Asbahi (713–795), a Yemenite who was born and raised in Medina. His major written work, Al-muwatta, was a collection of the hadith (the sayings and action of the prophet Muhammad and his companions), which he arranged according to the legal subject to which they spoke. He also made frequent use of the phrase “and this is the rule with us,” implying his continuing influence of the ulama (the totality of religious scholars) as it existed in Medina. Malik is remembered for opposing the Muslim rulers of his time (of the Umayyad Caliphate) who were asserting the right to make laws without reference to the Koran.

Among Malik’s students were Muhammad ibn al-Hasan al-Shaybani (749–ca. 804), later a distinguished scholar of the Hanafite School, and Muhammad ibn Idris al-Shafii (767–820), the founder of the Shafiite School. His thought was carried forward by Yahda al-Laythi (d. 848), who preserved Al-muwatta for later generations, and Asad ibn al-Furat (d. 828), who compiled what is today the major text identified with the school, Al-mudawwanah. The Malikite School held early sway in that part of Arabia near the Red Sea, including Mecca. It also was picked up by pilgrims from North Africa and Spain who came to Arabia on the hajj (pilgrimage) to Mecca. North Africa had become separated from the early Arab Muslim Empire and was never integrated into the later Ottoman Empire, except for Egypt. Thus the Malikite School came to dominate across the Mediterranean coast from Libya to Morocco and to be the primary form of Islam that moved across the Sahara and began to penetrate sub-Saharan Africa including Mali, Senegal, Niger, and Nigeria. (The Shafiite School predominates in the Muslim community along the eastern coast of Africa.)

As with the other Sunni legal schools, the Malikites emphasized the primary directives of submission to Allah (God) and the resulting obedience to the Shariah (Islamic law) to be the motivating foundation of their work. They also recognized the Koran and Sunna, the collection of hadith (the sayings and action of the Prophet Muhammad and his companions), as basic texts for the development of a legal system. Malik paid special attention to the consensus of his teachers in Medina and their traditions have had a special authority as the modern consensus of Malikite scholarship has developed. Malik gave some room for the fourth authority for legal rulings in Islam, analogical reasoning (qiyas), but gave a much more limited role compared to the Hanifites, primarily on issues not previously treated by the Medina scholars.

Much of the development of the Malikite school depended upon the ongoing process of assembling the hadith and decisions upon which were authentic and which were of dubious origin. Malik and especially his students were also influenced by the Traditionalist movement that developed in the eighth century, which insisted that the authority of tradition should rest upon authentic reports of sayings or actions of the Prophet Muhammad. The Traditionalist movement set issues around which the Malikite School developed while spurring scholarship on the hadith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hanafite School of Islam; Muhammad; Shafiite School of Islam.

References

- Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- Coulson, Noel J. A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin Publishing, 1998.
- Khan, Mohammad Hameedullah. The Schools of Islamic Jurisprudence. New Delhi: Kita Bhavan, 1997.
- Mansour, Mansour Hasan. The Maliki School of Law: Spread and Domination in North and West Africa, 8th–14th Centuries. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1994.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty That Was Islam. New York: Praeger Publishers, 1974.

■ Malta

The Republic of Malta consists of 5 islands with a total land area of 122 square miles lying south of Sicily in the Mediterranean Sea. Two are uninhabited; of the 3 inhabited islands, Kemmuna is but 0.6 mile in area, and Gozo is 67 square miles. The largest island, Malta, has been the constant target of various groups hoping to control the Mediterranean Basin politically, militarily, or economically. The present population of the Maltese people, now some 404,000 strong, reflects the coming of the Phoenicians, Italians, Arabs, and British at varied points throughout its history.

The Old Parish Church in St. Julian's Bay, Malta, is said to have been built in 1580. (Tyler Olson/Dreamstime.com)

Though skipped by the basically land-based Arabs as they initially moved across North Africa, Malta came under their control in the ninth century. They held it for two centuries, until it was overrun by the Normans in 1090. The Spanish Kingdom of Aragon reached out for control in the 14th century. In the 16th century, the island was turned over to the Knights of Saint John of the Hospital (now the Knights of Malta), who guarded the island for the next 300 years. In 1798 the French replaced the Knights of Malta but held it for only a short time, until the British were granted hegemony by the important decisions of the Congress of Vienna in 1815. For the next century, Malta was a key part of British dominance of the seaways.

In 1921 the British gave the Maltese a degree of autonomy. Revoked at the beginning of World War II, autonomy was restored in 1947. Independence was finally granted in 1964. Britain retained some responsibility for Malta for a decade, but in 1974, the Republic of Malta was proclaimed. The country has a parliamentary system of government. It joined the European Union in 2004.

With the coming of the Normans, the Roman Catholic Church became the dominant religion of Malta and has remained so to the present. Malta is justly proud of its Christian past, being mentioned in the New Testament as the place the Apostle Paul resided for three months following his shipwreck as he journeyed to Rome. That event is celebrated on the island each February 10. In 451, a bishop from Malta attended the ecumenical council that gathered at Chalcedon.

The Catholic Church is the state religion of Malta, and Catholicism has broad popular support. At the time of independence the church also owned the majority of the island's real estate, a fact that has since then brought it into conflict with the government. In 1983 the government expropriated all the church's properties and secularized all primary education. Two years later, the church signed an agreement with the government that led to the secularization of secondary education.

Although privileging the Roman Catholic Church, the country's Constitution also guarantees freedom to practice other religions. However, almost all other religions on the main island are operative primarily among expatriate communities. Within the English-speaking community, the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, the Salvation Army, and the Methodist Church have congregations. The Church of England has been present since 1798. There is a single congregation of the Greek Orthodox Church under the Ecumenical Patriarchate and also an evangelical congregation associated with the Christian Brethren.

The Jehovah's Witnesses entered the country just before World War II and have carried on a program of proselytization among the general public, though with no spectacular success. For many years there has also been a group associated with the Church of Christ, Scientist.

The Jewish presence on Malta dates to the Roman period, though it all but died out during the period of control by the Knights of Malta. The present community dates from the end of the 18th century, when Malta received Jews who moved from North Africa. The community opened a new synagogue in 1912, but it was demolished in 1979 as part of a development

Malta

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	301,000	403,000	98.0	0.68	418,000	409,000
Roman Catholics	297,000	382,000	93.0	0.55	395,000	385,000
Anglicans	3,000	1,000	0.2	-1.89	1,000	1,000
Marginals	230	1,200	0.3	0.70	1,500	2,200
Agnostics	1,000	6,000	1.5	2.11	9,000	13,000
Muslims	0	1,100	0.3	1.11	2,500	3,500
Atheists	500	810	0.2	0.68	1,000	1,200
Baha'is	100	300	0.1	0.70	600	1,000
Jews	50	60	0.0	0.69	60	60
Hindus	50	40	0.0	0.48	100	150
Total population	303,000	411,000	100.0	0.70	431,000	428,000

scheme. There are now approximately 50 Jews on the island. There is an equally small Hindu community on Malta, made up of expatriates from India.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Brethren; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of Scotland; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army.

References

Boissevain, Jeremy. Saints and Fireworks: Religion and Politics in Rural Malta. Oxford, UK: Berg Publishers, 1965.

Bonnici, M. A. History of the Church in Malta. 2 vols. Valletta, Malta: Empire Press-Catholic Institute, 1967, 1968. Vol. 3. Zabbar, Malta: Veritas Press, 1975.

Eccardt, Thomas M. Secrets of the Seven Smallest States of Europe: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, and Vatican City. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.

Gonzi, M. What Is Happening to Religion in Malta? Valletta, Malta: Pastoral Research Services, 1969.

Luttrell, Anthony. The Making of Christian Malta: From the Early Middle Ages to 1530. Aldershot, Hampshire, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 2002.

Mitchell, John. Ambivalent Europeans: Ritual, Memory and the Public Sphere in Malta. London: Routledge, 2001.

Manavta Mandir

Manavta Mandir (Be Man Temple) was founded by Faqir Chand (1886–1981), the chief spiritual successor of Shiv Brat Lal (1860–1939), in 1962 in Hoshiarpur, Punjab, India. Originally designed by Faqir to present the spiritual teachings of Radhasoami in a more ecumenical and nonsectarian fashion, Manavta Mandir represents a radical interpretation of guru-based spirituality. Faqir argued that all gurus of whatever stripe were ignorant about the real cause of the miracles and visions attributed to them. And because of this ignorance (and what Freud called “transference”), the guru gained power, attention, and devotion from disciples who incorrectly imputed omniscience and omnipresence upon such masters, even though they had neither.

In 1939 Faqir succeeded his guru, Shiv Brat Lal, an initiate of Rai Salig Ram (1829–1898), who was the chief disciple of Shiv Dayal Singh (1818–1878), the founder of Radhasoami in Agra, Uttar Pradesh, India. After establishing his main center in Hoshiarpur, Faqir went on yearly trips throughout India and abroad, preaching his unique brand of Radhasoami, which besides the usual moral vows (vegetarianism, sexual purity, no drugs or alcohol, and daily meditation), included a frank admission of ultimate unknowingness. Even after 70 years of meditation and countless admirers, Faqir admitted that he was still unsure what would happen to him after death and did not know whether God really exists.

During his fifth tour of the United States in 1981, Faqir died at the age of 95 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Shortly before his death, Faqir appointed Dr. Ishwar C. Sharma, a philosophy professor residing in the United States, as his chief spiritual successor at Manavta Mandir. Faqir also appointed several other men and women to serve as initiating gurus in his lineage. Dr. Sharma departed significantly from his guru's teachings and taught a more traditional interpretation of shabd yoga and spirituality.

After his wife's death and because of his increasing health problems, Dr. Sharma appointed Shoonyo Maharaj as his spiritual successor. Since Sharma's recent death, Shoonyo has been the chief resident guru at Manavta Mandir.

Today, the Manavta Mandir boasts more than 100,000 followers worldwide.

Manavta Mandir
c/o Be Man Temple
Sutehri Rd.
Hoshiarpur, 146001
Punjab, India
<http://www.manavtamandir.com>
<http://www.faqirchand.net>

David Christopher Lane

See also: Radhasoami; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David C. The Radhasoami Tradition. New York: Garland Publishers, 1992.
- The Unknowing Sage: The Life and Work of Baba Faqir Chand*. Walnut, CA: MSAC, 1993.

Mandaean

The Mandaean are possibly the only surviving group representing the ancient Mediterranean movement known as Gnosticism. Discovered by Western scholars in the 17th century, the community survives in Iraq, with major centers in Baghdad and Basra and members in the towns along the Tigris and Euphrates rivers between these two cities. Christian missionaries saw them as surviving remnants of the followers of John the Baptist, and the surrounding Muslim community has seen them as “baptizers.” This term, used in the Koran, has allowed the group to persist in the otherwise Islamic environment.

Mandaean Sabian followers prepare for baptism on the banks of the Tigris River in Baghdad in the early morning, May 23, 2003. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The origin of the Mandaean is somewhat obscure, but they appear to have originated in Palestine as a heretical Jewish sect in the first century BCE. They apparently absorbed material, including the practice of baptism, from the movement begun by John the Baptist and from the early Christians. They appear to have left Palestine toward the beginning of the first century or the beginning of the second century CE. Baghdad became an early center for Mandaeanism following the migration. However, many of their early temples were destroyed in the third century during the period of Zoroastrian ascendancy. Once the Muslims conquered Mesopotamia, the Mandaeans were recognized as a “people of the Book” and hence entitled to official toleration.

In a hierarchical structure, the Mandaean community has been led by the ethnarch, “the head of the people,” who oversees the bishops and priests. The office of ethnarch has, however, remained vacant since the beginning of the 20th century. According to the oral history, the destruction of the hierarchy began in 1830, when most of the clerical leaders were killed in an epidemic. At that time, educated laypeople assumed a significant leadership role.

In Mandaean teachings, the cosmos is divided into the world of light (the North) and the world of darkness (the South). Each of the two realms is led by a ruler who heads a hierarchy of powers. The world emerged in the battle between light and darkness (good and evil). Humans are a product of darkness, but they possess a soul, a core of light. At death, the soul is freed and begins a pilgrimage to the realm of light. Baptism is central to Mandaean worship. Unlike Christian baptism, it is not a once-in-a-lifetime event. Baptisms occur each Sunday, and every member participates several times a year.

A set of sacred books is used by the Mandaeans, but the Ginza (Treasure) is the central book. It is centered in the Mass for the dead (masiqta), a ceremony marking the release of the soul from the body and its “ascent” on its afterlife journey. The Mandaeans’ Jewish roots are also marked by dietary laws, including the ritual slaughter of animals and alms giving. Worship occurs in a sanctuary (mandi), a fenced-in area usually built adjacent to a river, the water of which is diverted to provide a baptismal pool with flowing water.

Today an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 Mandaeans exist in the Middle East. Until the beginning of the Iraqi War, almost all lived in southeastern Iraq, with one small community in Khuzistan, Iran. However, since the war began in 2003, the great majority of Mandaeans have fled Iraq for neighboring countries, most often Syria and Jordan. Earlier, several hundred Mandaeans had migrated to the United States in the 1980s, and others had settled in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and various locations in Europe, including the United Kingdom, Sweden, and the Netherlands.

<http://www.mandaean.com.au/home.htm>

<http://www.geocities.com/usamandaean/who.html>

(unofficial informational site)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Gnosticism; Zoroastrianism.

References

Foerster, Werner. Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts. Vol. 2. Coptic and Mandaean Sources. London: Clarendon Press, 1974.

“Mandaean Scriptures and Fragments.” The Gnostic Society Library Web site. <http://www.webcom.com/~gnosis/library/mand.htm>. Accessed March 25, 2009.

Rudolph, Kurt. Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1987.

Thaler, Kai. “Iraqi Minority Group Needs U.S. Attention.” Yale Daily News, March 9, 2007. <http://www.yaledailynews.com/articles/view/20341>. Accessed March 25, 2009.

Manjushri's Birthday

Manjushri (in Japan, Monju-bosatsu) is pictured in the Buddhist sutras (holy books) as the leader of the bodhisattvas. Regarded as a symbol of the perfection of wisdom, he is often pictured, along with Samantabhadra, in attendance upon Gautama Buddha—most notably in the Flower Garland (Adornment) Sutra. He is generally pictured riding a lion and holding a sword symbolic of the sharpness of his discrimination. Manjushri is one of the characters in the Medicine Buddha Sutra.

Manjushri is said to manifest himself on Mount Wutai, in China’s Shanxi Province. Stories tell of the visit of an Indian monk in the first century CE who reported a vision of the bodhisattva. Wutai Mountain and the Wisdom Buddha Manjushri are also the subject of various Buddhist scriptures, sutras, and tantras. Mahayana Buddhism began arriving on Wutai Mountain quite early in its transmission to China, and the first temple was constructed during the reign of Emperor Ming Di (r. 58–75 CE). Literally hundreds of monasteries were built over the next centuries. The associations of the mountain with Manjushri were significantly strengthened in the eighth century with the arrival of Padmasambhava, who was spreading Vajrayana Buddhism through nearby Tibet. Manjushri is especially dear to Vajrayana Buddhists. Then in the 12th century, the Mongolians of the Yuan dynasty, as part of their kingdom building, intruded into Tibet and left the Dalai Lama in charge of the country. As the development of Vajrayana Buddhism was encouraged, the Gelugpa School became established at Mount Wutai. The various Buddhist temples that remain on Mount Wutai hold two major celebrations. The first, the Assembly of the Sixth Month, is a time for pilgrims to visit. The second and more important occurs over four days in the fourth month. It focuses on rituals held in 10 of the mountain's largest temples. This ritual cycle marks Manjushri's birthday on the fourth day of the fourth lunar month.

In Japan, celebrations to honor Manjushri can be traced back to the ninth century CE. His veneration is still practiced in Japan. The veneration draws on stories of Manjusri appearing in the guise of beggars. Believers prepare food and drink on this day to feed all beggars. Meanwhile, in the temples, the names of Manjushri and the Medicine Buddha were recited 100 times each, each day. Today this ritual survives in only two temples.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Gelugpa; Mahayana Buddhism.

References

- Boheng, Wu, and Cai Zhuozhi. 100 Buddhas in Chinese Buddhism. Trans. by Mu Xin and Yan Zhi. Singapore: Asiapac Books, 1997.
- Einarsen, John, ed. The Sacred Mountains of Asia. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.
- "Sacred Mountains of China." Places of Peace and Power. http://www.sacredsites.com/asia/china/sacred_mountains.html. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- The Seeker's Glossary of Buddhism*. New York: Sutra Translation Committee of the United States and Canada, 1998.
- "Wutai Mountain Pilgrimage: Manjushri Empowerment, Teachings & Buddhist Qigong." Sacred

Journeys. http://www.sacredjourneys.org/schedule/a_wutai.html. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Vessantara. Meeting the Buddhas: A Guide to Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric Deities. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse Publications, 1998.

Maohi Protestant Church

The Maohi Protestant Church, previously known as the Evangelical Church of French Polynesia (Église évangélique de Polynésie française), dates to the arrival of the first missionaries dispensed to the South Pacific by the newly formed London Missionary Society (LMS) in 1787. The Society sent out 30 representatives, 4 of whom were ordained. The remaining party consisted of spouses and a spectrum of artisans. The original plan called for the team to establish two self-supporting communities on Tahiti and Tonga. Eighteen settled in Tahiti. However, within a year, 11 of these moved on to Australia. The remaining 5 kept the mission going. Their first task was the mastering of the local Tahitian language, "rep maohi." Their work finally bore fruit in 1815 (some sources say 1812) when King Pomare converted and asked to be baptized.

The king's conversion had far-reaching results. He had a large church constructed and urged his people to become Christians. Most followed his lead. The church became institutionalized across Tahiti with the training of lay leadership and the opening of a publishing concern. The missionaries saw to the translation of the Bible that was published in Tahitian in 1838.

The French moved into the area in 1840 and established a protectorate. The authorities soon demanded that French missionaries, primarily Roman Catholic priests, be allowed to work on Tahiti (they were already present on other near-by islands). A number of islanders deserted the Evangelical Church. In 1863, the French Reformed Church, through its Paris Mission, began work on Tahiti. It represented the same Reformed Protestantism as the LMS and in 1883, as the islands were becoming increasingly French in language and orientation, the LMS turned all of its work over to the Paris Mission.

Through the 20th century, the Paris Mission spread Protestantism through French Polynesia. In 1963, the Mission became autonomous as the Evangelical Church of French Polynesia. Through the 20th century, the church developed a mission among the Chinese laborers who arrived in two waves (1856–1866, 1907–1930). It voted to adopt its present name in 2004.

Today, the Maohi Protestant Church continues to dominate the Protestant community and includes a slight majority of French Polynesia's population (251,700) in its membership (130,000 in 2005). They have an additional large congregation among expatriate French Polynesians in Kanaky. There are a variety of small independent churches through the islands, most having been formed by former Evangelical Church leaders.

The Maohi Protestant Church has been a member of the World Council of Churches since 1963 and is an active participant in the Pacific Conference of Churches.

Maohi Protestant Church

BP 113
Blvd. Pomare 403
Paeete, Tahiti
French Polynesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; Paris Mission; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Maori Religion

Aotearoa (New Zealand) was settled late in the first millennium of the Common Era by one or more expeditions from Central Polynesia. These settlers over time developed their own distinctive culture utilizing their Polynesian inheritance. Traditional Maori religion, like Maori society, was tribal in character and varied in detail from region to region. Nonetheless, key concepts and practices were evident throughout the country.

Maori stories of creation often begin with the embrace of the Sky-father, Ranginui, and the Earth-mother, Papa-tuanuku. The offspring of their union and other early descendants include a number of figures common to many regions. Early sources usually refer to these as ancestors (tupuna) rather than gods (atua). They were, however, invoked in ritual chants (karakia), and the line between an ancestor and a god was rather thin. These early ancestors often personify natural elements and forces and human values. Tane (whose name means Man or Male) is the main creator in Maori religion and mythology, and he is usually credited with creating the first human being (often making her his wife) out of soil. Other important figures include Tu-mata-uenga, the archetypal human being and warrior; Rongo, the peacemaker from whom the kumara (a highly valued, cultivated sweet potato) originated; Tangaroa, the father of the fish and sea creatures; Tawhirimatea, the father of the winds; and Hine-nui-te-po (literally, Great Woman the Night), the guardian of the dead.

The more recent ancestral dead, especially dead chiefs, are frequently referred to as gods in early sources. These more recent ancestors were thought to continue their interest in tribal affairs even after death. They could be called upon to protect their relatives in times of need, such as war or illness. They also communicated advice and predictions using their living relatives as mediums.

Offerings, often of food, were made to atua. In the case of the more recently dead, the food was offered by suspending it near the sacred place where the body was kept. In the case of earlier ancestral figures, these offerings might be made to carved figures, stones, or other objects representing them. Every community had at least one shrine (tuahu) that was the main site where offerings were made to atua and where the priests (tohunga) performed rituals. The exact form and location of the shrine varied considerably from region to region, but a typical feature was a mound or hillock.

Maori warriors, bearing the coffin of Maori queen Te Arikini Dame Te Atairangikaahu, paddle down the Waikato River in Hamilton, New Zealand, August 21, 2006. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The Maori had a cyclic view of life and death. Spirits of the dead were said to go either to Te Po (the underworld) or to Hawaiki (a paradisiacal homeland). Hawaiki was not only the realm of the ancestors but also a source of life and fertility. Like Hawaiki, Te Po was thought to be a place from where infants originated.

A near male relative of the chief often took the role of chief priest. A special role was also accorded one or more high-ranking women. These women performed protective rites and often removed the tapu (sacred) at the close of sacred activities such as warfare, house-building, and childbirth. Other men and women also built reputations for their skill in healing, communicating with atua, and prophesying.

The distinction between tapu (sacred) and noa (ordinary) was particularly important in Maori religion and ritual. These concepts also reflected and shaped Maori social structure and the division of labor. The lives of rangatira (chiefs and their near relatives), who had the closest connection to the tribal gods, were the most ritualized. Tutua (ordinary people) pursued their own rituals and observed tapu restrictions to a lesser extent. Enslaved captives (taurekareka) seem to have been excluded from this ritual life. Gender also affected one's ritual status. Free men generally had a closer association with tapu and more elaborate ceremonial life than did free women of the same rank.

British missionaries first arrived in the north of New Zealand in 1815. Christianity began to spread rapidly in the 1830s, reaching even those areas of the country remote from Western contact by the mid-1840s. Considerable religious ferment followed, and many new indigenous religious movements developed in the latter half of the 19th century.

The Hauhau Church was the first instance of an organized, independent Maori Christianity. Founded in the early 1860s by Te Ua Haumene, a prophet and visionary, the church was Pentecostal and millennialist in orientation. The guiding principle of Te Ua's faith was goodness and peace (Pai Marire). He supported indigenous traditional practices where he thought them congruent with this principle. Because the Hauhau fought against the British settler government and its supporters, and because of settler outrage at the acts of some militant Hauhau, the popular image of the Hauhau became one of a violent apostate cult. In fact, Te Ua founded a tradition of spiritual vision and biblical prophecy that continued to influence subsequent Maori religious leaders after his death.

In 1996, 60 percent of Maori identified as Christian, constituting the vast majority of Maori who identified themselves as having a religion. More than half of Maori Christians belonged to mainline denominations: Anglican, Catholic, a number of Protestant churches, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Two independent Maori churches continue. A substantial minority belong to the Ratana Church, which was founded in the 1920s by Tahupotiki Wiremu Ratana, a visionary and faith healer. A smaller number adhere to the Ringatu Church, founded in the 1860s by the prophet and military leader Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Turuki. Membership is concentrated in North Island in the Bay of Plenty and East Coast regions, particularly among the Tuhoe, Ngati Awa, and Whakatohea peoples. Within this generally Christian context, Maori continue to draw on older indigenous traditions.

Ratana Church
Waipounamu St.
Ratana Pa, Whangaehu
New Zealand

Adele Fletcher

See also: Ancestors; Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

References

- Elsmore, Bronwyn. 1999. Manna from Heaven: A Century of Maori Prophets. 2nd ed. Auckland, New Zealand: Reed Books, 1989, 1999.
- Head, Lyndsay. "The Gospel of Te Ua Haumene." Journal of the Polynesian Society 101, no. 1 (1992): 7–44.

Johansen, J. Prytz. The Maori and His Religion in Its Non-ritualistic Aspects. Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 1954.

Orbell, Margaret. The Illustrated Encyclopedia of Maori Myth and Legend. Christchurch, New Zealand: University of Canterbury Press, 1995.

Reed, A. W. Maori Myths & Legendary Tales. Auckland, New Zealand: New Holland Publishers, 1999.

Shortland, Edward. Traditions and Superstitions of the New Zealanders: With Illustrations of Their Manners and Customs. 2nd ed. London: Longman, Brown, Green, Longmans & Roberts, 1856.

Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar

During the second decade of the 19th century, the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, a large Orthodox body centered upon the state of Kerala in southern India, came into contact with members of the Church Missionary Society (CMS) who arrived after Great Britain established its hegemony over the subcontinent. For a period, the CMS attempted to work through the Malankara Church but eventually withdrew and began to work independently. However, the CMS assisted in the formation of the Malankara seminary and in 1829 published the Bible in Malayalam.

One British missionary, Abraham Malpan (1796–1843), initiated a movement to reform the Malankara Church. Citing biblical authority, he suggested a number of changes, especially the abandonment of a variety of observances and ceremonial practices that had been added to the church over the centuries, which he considered corrupt. In response, a reformist wing appeared in the Malankara Church, and the conflict was not resolved. The separation of the two factions was formalized late in the 19th century.

By this time a new issue had emerged, namely, the authority of the patriarch of the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar, from which the Malankara Church had received its episcopal authority. In the 1880s, the Syrian church asserted a new level of hegemony over the affairs and, more important, the property of the Malankara Church. The reformist group, which took the name

Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, rejected the patriarch's authority.

Although continuing in the tradition of the Syrian Church, the Mar Thomas Church has revised its liturgy by removing "unscriptural" elements such as the invocation of the saints. It continues to worship in the Syriac language. Through the 20th century it moved closer toward the Church of England in India. In 1937 it established a formal relationship, including a partial intercommunion, with the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon—the Anglican body that eventually merged into the Church of South India, the Church of North India, and the Church of Pakistan. The Mar Thoma Church is now in full communion with each of these united churches, though it refused to enter the merger, as it wished to continue its unique liturgical heritage. Full communion with the Church of England was granted in 1974.

The Mar Thoma Church has approximately 1.1 million members (2005). It sponsors a broad program of general education, social service, and social reform. It was a charter member of the World Council of Churches.

Mar Thomas Syrian Church of Malabar

Poolatheen

Tiruvalla 689 101

Kerala

India

<http://www.marthomachurch.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of North India; Church of Pakistan; Church of South India; Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; World Council of Churches.

References

Fernando, Leonard, and G. Gispert-Sauch. Christianity in India: Two Thousand Years of Faith. New Delhi: Penguin India, 2004.

Moffett, Samuel Hugh. A History of Christianity in Asia. Vol. 1, Beginnings to 1500. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.

Neill, S. C. A History of Christianity in India. 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984, 1985.

Podipara, Placid C. The Canonical Sources of the Syro-Malabar Church. Kottayam, Kerala, India: Oriental Institute of Religious Studies, 1986.

Mara Evangelical Church (Myanmar)

The Mara Evangelical Church is a Protestant body that grew out of the independent efforts of British Congregationalist minister Reginald Arthur Lorrain (ca. 1885–1944) and his wife, who independently began work on the Burma-Indian border in 1907. The Mara people, among whom the Lorrains began their mission, reside in the Chin state of western Myanmar and the Mizoram District of India immediately to the west. They number about 55,000, of which slightly less than half live in Myanmar.

The Lorrains established a church among the Mara in 1907. Their leadership was followed by that of two indigenous leaders, Rev. Mathao (1918–1990) and Rev. K. Teitu (1926–2006). The work in India was set apart following Indian independence in 1947. The church in Myanmar, known simply as the Mara Church until 1960, added the word Evangelical to refer to its self-sustaining nature and enthusiastic engagement in mission. The church adopted a Presbyterian polity and a Calvinist theological outlook. The General Assembly is the highest legislative body of the church.

In 1972, the Mara Church split into two churches, headquartered at Sabawngpi village and Lailenpi village, respectively. The split was healed, but the church retains two headquarters to the present. It is now spreading beyond the boundaries of the Mara community to other ethnic groups. In 2006, the church reported 19,810 members in 97 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches (since 2001) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

GPO Box 366

Yangon

Myanmar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Congregationalism; World Council of Churches.

References

“Mara Evangelical Church (MEC).” http://www.marachristian.net/?page_id=14. Accessed January 16, 2009.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Marian Devotion, World Network of

From its earliest days, the Roman Catholic Church has given an important place to veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Mother of Jesus. Marian devotion has become the most significant and popular devotion directed toward the saints in the church. Many Catholics believe that at certain times Mary reveals herself to individual Catholics through visions and messages. The places where these apparitions occur generally develop into shrines acknowledged by the church, sometimes of international importance, such as the shrines of Guadeloupe, Fatima, and Lourdes.

Since World War II there has been an exponential increase in the number of apparitions of Mary, and also in the number of apparitions of other saints and Christ, although these are less frequent. In addition to this quantitative change, there has also been a sociographic shift with regard to those receiving the visions: instead of coming to children, the revelations increasingly come to adults. These visionaries not only make the messages public but also interpret them in relation to their own personal views on the church and the world. Adult visionaries are able, especially with the support of modern media, to distribute messages and interpretations much more widely and intensively and, moreover, they are capable of organizing the resources necessary to create and maintain supportive organizations and pressure groups.

La Conquistadora, Our Lady of the Rosary, Santa Fe, New Mexico. (J. Gordon Melton)

The Catholic Church has become increasingly wary of the boom in such private revelations and devotional activity. Presently, one can distinguish in Catholic culture two devotional circuits. First, activity focuses on sites of acknowledged apparitions—in Mexico around Guadalupe, in France around Lourdes, in Ireland around Knock, and so on. Second, activity focuses on devotions connected with apparitions and private revelations not acknowledged or banned by the church—as in Necedah, Wisconsin; Garabandal, Spain; Conyers, Georgia; and probably the most famous, Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The various cults in the latter circuit are each independent, but informally they do make up a network. Their collectivity lies in the type of visitors they attract, visitors who generally can be characterized as devotees and believers with conservative or traditionalistic views. These people often visit such sanctuaries in an eclectic manner, participating in the devotional life of each place. But, through their prayer groups, publications, and online medialization, the shrines collectively create a devotional network. On the global level the network is quite informal, there being no institutional umbrella organization apart from website owners and several publishers who tailor their book lists to these interests.

This network of modern divergent devotions is not static, however. There is continued interaction with the institutional church: on the one hand the Catholic Church ignores or impedes these devotions; on the other hand there are also forces within the church that wish to give elements of this vox populi dei a stronger role because of its indirect benefits for the church. During the pontificate of John Paul II (r. 1978–2005), this interaction led to the formalization of the devotions of some highly controversial persons (such as Faustina Kowalski and Padre Pio), while some previously “banned” sites of apparitions (such as that of the Lady of All Nations in Amsterdam and the Queen of Love at Schio, Italy) received positive toleration, or at least a level of acknowledgment.

Within the network, the messages given at Fatima (and before that yet, the Rue du Bac visions in Paris in 1830 and at La Salette, France, in 1846) are an important source of inspiration. Central themes such as penitence, prayer (particularly the rosary), war, and the activity of the devil point to approaching apocalyptic times, or the end of time, and a definitive separation of good and evil persons. Since the fall of Communism, new enemies have also been found, including apostasy, social degeneracy, abortion, homosexuality, euthanasia, and the corruption of the church and many of its priests (worldliness, apostasy, sexual abuse), this last concern producing a countermovement, the Marian Movement of Priests. In addition to Fatima, in the course of the 20th century the Italian Franciscan Padre Pio also became an important factor or spiritual guide for many “deviant” devotions.

Important devotions and shrines in the network include, among many others: Kérizine, France (established 1938); Amsterdam, the Netherlands (1945); Montichiari, Italy (1946); Marienfried, Germany (1946); Heroldsbach, Germany (1949); Necedah, Wisconsin (1949); Eisenberg, Austria (1955); Garabandal, Spain (1961); San Damiano, Italy (1961); Akita, Japan (1969); Bayside, New York (1970); Lac-Étchemin, Canada (1971); Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina (1981); Soufaniyé, Syria (1982); Maasmechelen, Belgium (1982); Melleray, Ireland (1985); Schio, Italy (1985); Manduria, Italy (1992); and Marpingen, Germany (1999).

Among the organizations supporting the world Marian network are the Society of Saint Pius X of Lefebvre (d. 1991); the Apostles of Infinite Love, based in Quebec; Our Lady of the Roses shrine in Bayside, New York; and the Order of Saint Charbel in Australia, which supports the papal claims and Marian contacts of William Kamm, known as the Little Pebble. The network has popular support among Roman Catholics in Africa who have an approved shrine at Kibeho, Rwanda. The Ugandan Marian movement took a tragic turn when the members of the Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments were killed in March 1999. Also, individual priests, fathers, and (titular) bishops like Paul Sigl, Peter Klos, P. van Lierde, Paolo Hnilica, and Emmanuel Milingo, proved to be important trait d’union between the cults.

By its very nature, this informal network has no address of its own, though each of the individual devotional sites do. Relevant international network publishers include the following:

Parvis-Verlag
Rue de l'Eglise 71
1648 Hauteville
Switzerland
<http://www.parvis.ch> (in French and German)

Miriam-Verlag GmbH
Brühlweg 1
Jestetten
Germany
<http://www.miriam-verlag.de> (in German) info@miriam-verlag.de

Segno Ed.
Via E. Fermi 80/1
33010 Tavagnacco (UD)
Italy
<http://www.edizionisegno.it> (in Italian)

TAN Books and Publishers
PO Box 410487
Charlotte, NC 28241
<http://www.tanbooks.com/> (in English)

Peter Jan Margry

See also: Apostles of Infinite Love; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Fatima; Homosexuality; Lourdes; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Medjugorje; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Christian, William, Jr. "Religious Apparitions and the Cold War in Southern Europe." In Religion, Power and Protest in Local Communities. The Northern Shore of the Mediterranean, edited by Eric R. Wolf, 239–266. Berlin: Mouton, 1984.
- Foundation Marypages. "The Apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary." <http://www.marypages.com/>. Accessed July 1, 2009.
- Kohle, Hubert. "Fundamentalistische Marienbewegungen." In Handbuch der Marienkunde, edited by Wolfgang Beinert and Heinrich Petri, vol. 2, 60–106. Regensburg, Germany: F. Pustet, 1997.

- Marian Library/International Marian Research Institute. "Marian Apparitions of the Twentieth Century." <http://www.udayton.edu/mary/resources/aprtable.html>. Accessed July 1, 2009.
- Margry, Peter Jan. "La terra di nessuno dei devoti. Devozioni informali tra localismo e transnazionalismo nell'Europa contemporanea." Sanctorum. Revista dell'associazione Italiana per lo studio della santità, dei culti e dell'agiografia 1 (2004): 153–178.
- Matter, Ellen A., "Apparitions of the Virgin Mary in the Late Twentieth Century. Apocalyptic, Representation, Politics." Religion 31 (2001): 125–153.
- Peliken, Jaroslav. Mary through the Centuries. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Zimdars-Swartz, Sandra L. Encountering Mary: Visions of Mary from La Salette to Medjugorje. New York: Avon Books, 1992.

Maronite Catholic Church

The Maronite Catholic Church, one of several Eastern-rite churches in communion with the Roman Catholic Church, originated in the charismatic ministry of a man later canonized as Saint Maron (d. fifth century). He gathered a religious community in what is today Syria, and his followers founded a monastery west of Antioch (in present-day Turkey). When Muslims came into the area, the community relocated to the mountainous region of Lebanon and survived as a somewhat isolated community. From among their bishops, they elected a leader who assumed the title of patriarch of Antioch and All the East.

Following the establishment of a Crusader kingdom headquartered at Antioch in the 12th century, Maronite church leaders came into contact with bishops of the Roman Catholic Church. Subsequently, in 1182, the Maronites affiliated with the Catholic Church. They retained their Syriac liturgy, with modifications to bring them into alignment with the Church of Rome, and they affirmed those beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church that distinguished it from the Eastern Orthodox churches. The isolated Maronites saw themselves as having never been out of communion with Rome, though no active relationship had existed since the Islamic move into the region.

In the 16th century, the Maronite homeland was incorporated into the Ottoman Empire and periodically suffered persecution from Turkish authorities. The most notable incidence of persecution, a massacre of thousands of Maronites in 1860, led to the intervention of French forces in the area and the formal establishment of French control over Lebanon following World War I. Following the massacre, Maronites also began to migrate away from their homeland, and by the end of the century, they had founded expatriate communities in North and South America and Australia. The establishment of an independent Lebanon in 1944 and the civil war that began in 1975 further encouraged migration.

As of 2008, the Maronite Church reported 3,106,000 members. The church has 10 dioceses in Lebanon and 6 additional dioceses in neighboring countries. Overseas dioceses now exist in Cyprus, Greece, Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, Canada, the United States, and Australia. There are scattered congregations across Europe.

The church is led by Patriarch Nasrallah Cardinal Sfeir (b. 1920). He was elected in 1986 and given his cardinal's hat in 1994. It sponsors two seminaries and a college in Rome. The University of the Holy Spirit at Kasnik offers advanced theological training. There are a number of Maronite religious orders and one missionary community, the Maronite-Lebanese Missionaries. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches. Unlike most Eastern-rite churches affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church, there is no Maronite church that exists as an Eastern Orthodox body.

c/o His Beatitude Mar Nasrallah Boutros Cardinal Sfeir Bkerkē
Lebanon
<http://www.bkerke.org.lb/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Middle East Council of Churches; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.

“The Maronite Catholic Church.” <http://www.cnewa.org/ecc-bodypg-us.aspx?eccpageID=56&IndexView=toc>. Accessed March 25, 2009.

Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

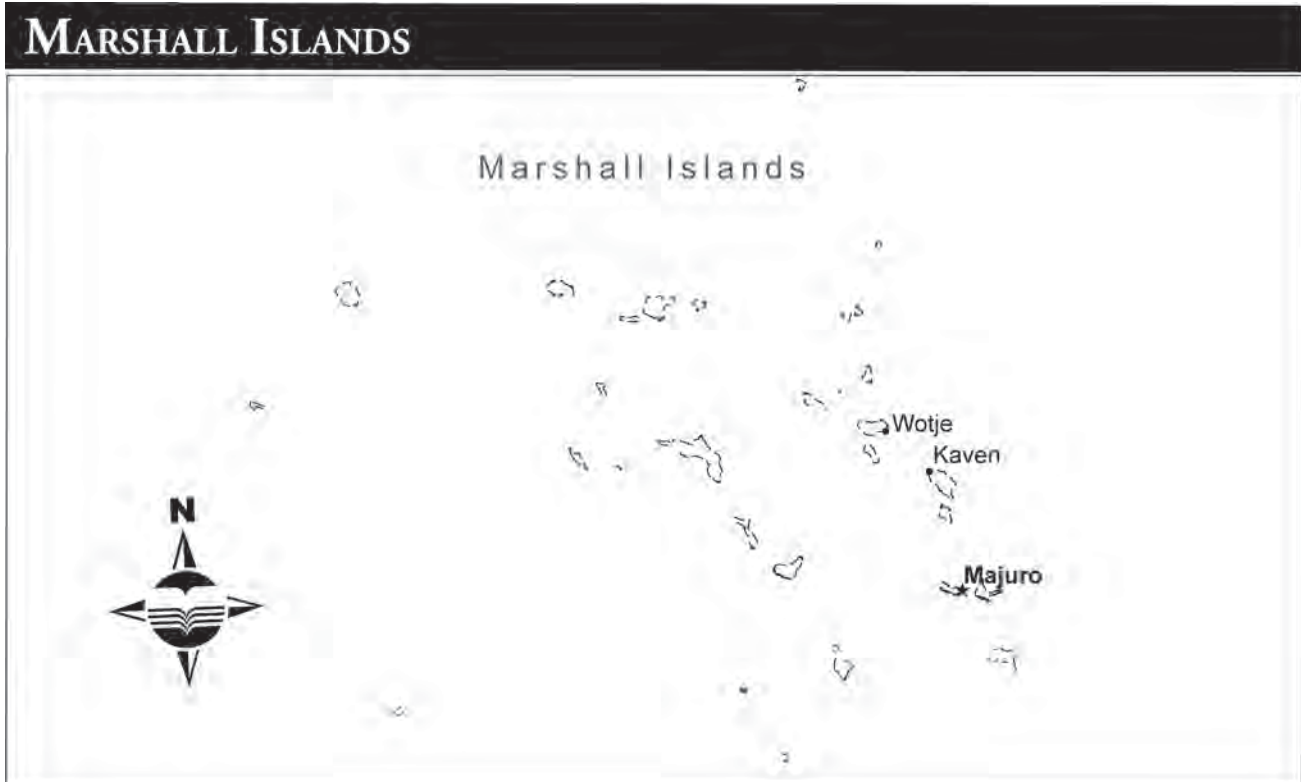

■ Marshall Islands

The Marshall Islands are a group of numerous islands, atolls, and islets in the North Pacific southeast of Hawaii and north of Nauru and Kiribati. The territory under the islands' hegemony, the easternmost part of Micronesia, includes 50 square miles of land and many times the area of ocean. Some 63,000 people (2008) reside on the islands.

Until 1978, the Marshall Islands shared a history with the rest of Micronesia (including the Caroline Islands, Guam, and the Marianas). Since the Spanish first came into Micronesia in the 16th century, these islands had been successively under Spanish, German, U.S., Japanese, and then again, U.S. control. Toward the end of World War II, the Marshalls were the site of some of the bloodiest battles leading up to the Japanese defeat. After the war they were also part of the Micronesian Trust Territory given to the United States. The Marshalls came to have a special role after the Bikini and Kwajalein atolls became the sites of extensive nuclear bomb tests beginning in 1946.

In 1979 a referendum led to the establishment of the Federated States of Micronesia, but the Marshall Islands did not become a part of the new nation. The Marshalls remained in a trust relationship with the United States. The islands were granted local autonomy, but the United States still controlled its security, and for a period it continued to use Kwajalein as a missile-testing site and a dump for toxic wastes. In 1986 the Marshalls became a Free Associated State of the United States. Although it still has a special relationship with the United States, the Marshalls now controls its own foreign policy. In 1990 the nation was admitted to the United Nations.

Roman Catholics arrived in the Marshalls in the 1500s and began the Christian church's warfare against

Marshall Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	19,200	60,300	95.1	1.68	75,000	87,100
Protestants	14,500	59,100	93.2	1.17	70,000	80,000
Roman Catholics	2,000	5,100	8.0	0.11	6,000	6,500
Marginals	340	5,600	8.8	2.72	8,000	10,000
Baha'is	300	1,700	2.7	1.70	2,200	2,500
Agnostics	100	880	1.4	3.07	1,300	2,100
Ethnoreligionists	800	500	0.8	1.72	500	500
Atheists	0	40	0.1	1.71	60	100
Total population	20,400	63,400	100.0	1.70	79,100	92,300

the indigenous religion, a form of polytheism that gave a central place to two deities: the Great Spirit and the Lord of the Nether Regions. That religion has all but disappeared. In 1905 the Catholic work in the Marshall and Caroline Islands was set apart as a separate diocese, with a bishop residing on Guam. More recently, reflecting the different courses taken by those two sets of islands, the work in the Marshalls has been separated from the diocese and placed under an apostolic prefecture.

Missionaries from Hawaii connected to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Congregationalist organization, arrived in the Marshalls from the Caroline Islands in 1857. That work has grown into the United Church of Christ–Congregational in the Marshall Islands, which became independent following the formation of the United Church of Christ in 1957. It is now a member of the World Council of Churches.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints opened a mission in the Marshalls in 1977 as part of its general expansion in Micronesia at the time. The work began on the island of Majuro, and it moved on to Kwajalein the following year. Finally it expanded to Arno and Mili, on the eastern edge of Micronesia.

Missionaries of the Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived in Micronesia, including the Marshalls, in 1930. Their work is now part of their Guam Micronesia Mission. The Assemblies of God opened work in 1964. There is one center of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement on the island of Majuro.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church of Christ; World Council of Churches.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Hazel, Francis X. The Catholic Church in Micronesia: Historical Essays on the Catholic Church in the Caroline-Marshall Islands. Honolulu: Micronesian Seminar, 1991. <http://www.micsem.org/pubs/books/catholic/index.htm>. Accessed March 1, 2009.
- Hazel, Francis X. Strangers in Their Own Land: A Century of Colonial Rule in the Caroline and Marshall Islands. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2003.
- Ibanez y Garcia, Luis de. The History of the Marianas, with Navigational Data, and of the Caroline and Palau Islands: From the Time of Their Discovery by Magellan in 1521 to the Present. Mangilao, Guam: Micronesian Area Research Center, University of Guam, 1992.
- Kelin, Daniel A., II. Marshall Island Legends and Stories. Honolulu: Bess Press, 2003.
- Sam, H. "A New Dawn: Christianity in the Marshall Islands, 1857–1885." M.A. thesis, Pacific Theological Seminary, 1988.

■ Martinique

Martinique, an island in the Lesser Antilles on the eastern edge of the Caribbean Sea north of Trinidad and Tobago, is an overseas department of France. Some 429,500 people (2004) live on the island's 409 square miles of land. Around 90 percent of the present population are descended from the Africans who came to the island beginning in the 17th century.

Martinique was originally inhabited by the Arawak people, but they were displaced by the Carib people around 1000 CE. They called the island Madinina. Columbus visited the island in 1502.

The French first settled on the island in 1635. After slavery was declared legal in 1664, enslaved Africans began to arrive, and the French began to develop the sugarcane business. Through the 1700s, Africans became the major element in the population and were responsible for a series of antislavery revolts. Slavery was abolished in 1794 but was reintroduced by Napoleon in 1802. It is believed that Napoleon's decision was strongly affected by his wife, the Empress Josephine, who was born on Martinique. Slavery was finally abolished in 1848. Chinese and Indian (primarily from Tamil Nadu) laborers were brought to Martinique to replace Africans who refused to work on the plantations.

The island became the site of one of the most famous of modern disasters when on May 8, 1902, Mount Pele erupted and within a matter of minutes killed all but one of the inhabitants of the town of Saint Pierre (approximately 30,000 people).

The Roman Catholic Church came to Martinique with the French and was established by members of the Dominican, Jesuit, and Capuchin orders. A diocese was established in 1850, but the church had a significant problem recruiting priests. In 1909 the island was placed under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith at the Vatican, which asked the Holy Ghost Fathers to assume responsibility for the island. Though the overwhelming majority of the population profess the Catholic faith, church attendance is relatively low. The single bishop for Martinique resides in Fort-de-France.

The Reformed Church of France entered the island informally, as French government and military personnel were stationed there, and continues primarily as an expatriate church. The Seventh-day Adventist

The Balata Church near Fort de France, Martinique. (iStockPhoto)

Martinique

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	320,000	388,000	96.5	0.49	385,000	324,000
Roman Catholics	306,000	360,000	89.6	0.40	350,000	292,000
Protestants	11,300	33,000	8.2	2.05	35,000	32,000
Marginals	2,000	9,800	2.4	0.88	13,000	14,000
Agnostics	2,700	7,000	1.7	1.67	9,000	12,000
Baha'is	1,000	2,200	0.5	0.88	3,200	4,500
Atheists	1,000	1,800	0.4	0.51	2,400	2,800
Hindus	0	1,000	0.2	0.50	1,400	2,000
Muslims	200	900	0.2	0.52	1,400	2,400
Spiritists	0	440	0.1	0.53	600	700
Chinese folk	0	240	0.1	0.51	400	500
New religionists	200	210	0.1	0.50	300	400
Buddhists	0	160	0.0	0.51	300	400
Total population	325,000	402,000	100.0	0.51	404,000	350,000

Church began missionary work on the island in 1924. The Martinique Conference was organized in 1974. The conference is now part of the French Antilles–Guiana Union Mission. Both the Baptists and the Jehovah’s Witnesses entered Martinique at the end of World War II and have since built a substantial presence. There are also congregations of the Assemblies of God and the Church of the Nazarene.

Possibly the most interesting movement on the island is the Maldevidan religion, a mixture of Hinduism and Catholicism found primarily in the northern part of Martinique. The principal deity is Maldevidan, who is pictured riding a horse and often identified as Jesus Christ. Mari-eman, the principal female deity, is also identified as the Virgin Mary and the mother of Maldevidan. As with Vodou, Maldevidan ceremonies involve drumming, ritual possession by spirit entities, and animal (sheep, roosters) sacrifice.

There is a small Jewish community on Martinique that finds its focus in a single Orthodox center in Fort-de-France. Islam is present in a small community of Syrian expatriates. The first spiritual assembly of the Baha'i Faith opened in the late 1960s. And as is true of most French-speaking lands, the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis has established several lodges.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church of the Nazarene; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Vodou.

References

- Horowitz, M., and M. Klaus. "The Martinique East Indian Cult of Maldevidan." Social and Economic Studies 10, no. 1 (March 1961): 93–100.
- La Croix, O. "The French Presence and the Church in Martinique and Guadeloupe." In New Mission for a New People: Voices from the Caribbean, edited by D. I. Mitchell. New York: Friendship Press, 1977.
- Wideman, John Edgar. The Island: Martinique. New York: National Geographic, 2003.

Martinism

Martinism is an Esoteric system derived from the teachings of three French masters active between the late 18th and early 19th centuries: Jacques Martinez de Pasqually (1727–1774), Jean-Baptiste Willermoz (1730–1824), and Louis-Claude de Saint-Martin (1743–1803). In 1754, Martinez de Pasqually established the Masonic Order of the Elected Knights Cohen, a new Masonic system with three degrees beyond the three traditional Masonic degrees. The second and third Cohen degrees taught an Esoteric doctrine called "reintegration," which included both Kabbalah and theurgy. A Cohen priesthood enabled initiates to control evil spirits and to communicate with angels. Silence, prayer, and fasting prepared the initiate for the mysterious apparition of la Chose ("the Thing").

Differences do exist between Martinez's system (Martinezism) and the more typically Masonic and Christian teachings of Willermoz, which eventually led to the establishment of the Reformed Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. Saint-Martin joined the Elected Knights Cohen in 1768 and eventually became Martinez's personal secretary. After Martinez's death, Saint-Martin became suspicious of all forms of occultism, and his ideas evolved into an idiosyncratic form of mystical Christianity. The Martinist tradition, in line with these developments, includes both a Martinezist wing, which maintains the Kabbalistic practices, and a Saint-Martinist wing, more interested in mysticism than in theurgy.

In 1891, only one century after Martinez's own initiatives, the Spanish-born French esoteric master Gérard Encausse, called "Papus" (1865–1916), together with Augustin Chaboseau (1869–1946), established an organization known as the Martinist Order. Both Papus and Chaboseau claimed to have been initiated into a chain going back to Martinez and Saint-Martin, although historians dispute their claims. After Papus's death in 1916, the Martinist order fragmented into an extremely complicated series of splinter groups. Most Martinists recognized Charles Détré, known as "Téder" (1855–1918), as Papus's successor, but he died only two years after taking office.

Téder and his successor, Jean Bricaud (1881–1934), changed the rituals in order to make them more Martinezist, closed the doors of their order to non-Freemasons and women, moved the headquarters from Paris to Lyons, and fought attempts by the American Rosicrucian order to create and lead an international federation of Esoteric orders. Favorable to the American order, on the other hand, was another Martinist branch known as the Martinist (and) Synarchist Order, led by Victor Blanchard (1878–1953), who in 1937 transferred his Martinist authority to Harvey Spencer Lewis (1883–1939), founder of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC). In 1939, however, the AMORC officially recognized as an allied Martinist order a group known as the Traditional Martinist Order (www.martiniste.org), founded by Chaboseau and Victor-Émile Michelet (1861–1938). This organization has continued its activities to the present day, in close cooperation with the AMORC.

As for Bricaud's order, his successor, Constant Chevillon (1880–1944), renamed it the Martinist Martinezist Order, underlining once again the coveted connection with Martinez. Assassinated by Nazi collaborators in 1944, Chevillon was succeeded by Henri-Charles Dupont (1877–1960). In 1952, Papus's son Philippe Encausse (1906–1984) re-established a Martinist order in a form similar to his father's, open to both non-Freemasons and women. In 1960 Dupont supervised the merger of his Martinist Martinezist Order with Encausse's Martinist Order, which remains to this day the largest Martinist organization worldwide. In 1942, Robert Ambelain (1907–1997) established a Martinist Order of the Elected Cohens, which after 1960 remained the sole Martinezist organization in the world. In 1962 the Ambelain and Encausse orders entered into a short-lived union, going their separate ways again in 1967. Thus the Martinist scenario appears to be divided today between two large organizations, Encausse's Martinist Order and AMORC's Traditional Martinist Order, as well as a number of smaller Martinezist groups.

Some scholars use the category of Kremmerzian Martinism to indicate the different competing occult orders following the tradition of the Italian esoteric master Giuliano Kremmerz (pseudonym of Ciro Formisano, 1861–1930). Kremmerz was influenced by a number of Esoteric authors connected with a branch of the Martinist tradition in Naples, Italy. Most of the Kremmerz-inspired orders go under the name Brotherhood of Myriam (one is called the Martinist Kremmerzian Order, however) and have a Martinist connection, and in turn Kremmerz influenced several branches of Italian Martinism. Some but by no means all of the Kremmerzian orders appear to be mostly interested in practices of "internal alchemy," including forms of sexual magic.

Among the several contemporary Martinist groups whose relationship to the older Martinist groups is a matter of claims and counterclaims are the Ancient Martinist Order (www.ancientmartinistorder.org), the Martinist Order of Unknown Philosophers (www.moup.org), and the Rose+Croix Martinist Order (www.rcmo.org). There are also several groups calling themselves the British Martinist Order. The Italian- and French-speaking Martinist orders are normally larger than their English-speaking counterparts but some of them are quite secretive and have elected not to maintain a website. One of the largest Italian groups, the Ordine Martinista Antico e Tradizionale, does maintain a website at www.martinismo.eu, while the website www.martinismo.it is operated by the smaller Ordine Mar-tinista Universale. The oldest Martinist order, Encausse's Martinist Order, may be reached at www.martinisme.org, while the independent French website www.martinisme.fr tries to keep a sympathetic track of the complicated evolution of the various European orders.

Martinist Order (Encausse branch)

5-7, rue de la Chapelle

75018 Paris France

<http://www.martinisme.org>

The Rose+Croix Martinist Order

3620 W. 10th St. B-150

Greeley, CO 80634-1821

<http://www.rcmo.org>

British Martinist Order (one of several)

BMO Administration

PO Box 1

Oldham, Lancashire OL4 4WW

United Kingdom

<http://www.bmosite.org/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Freemasonry.

References

- Amadou, Robert, and Alice Joly. De l'Agent Inconnu au Philosophe Inconnu. Paris: Denoël, 1962.
- Ambelain, Robert. Le Martinisme, Histoire et doctrine. Paris: Niclaus, 1946.
- Encausse, Philippe. Science occulte ou 25 années d'occultisme occidentale. Papus, sa vie, son œuvre. Paris: OCIA, 1949.
- Le Forestier, René. La Franc-Maçonnerie occultiste au XVIIIe siècle et l'Ordre des Elus Coëns. Paris: La Table d'Émeraude, 1987.
- Van Rijnberk, Gérard. Martinés de Pasqually: Un thaumaturge au XVIIIe siècle. 2 vols. Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms, 1982.

Martyrdom

The original signifier for "martyr," a Stoic term, used in classical antiquity, is Greek martyrs (witness), which has been taken over by Christians into Latin and from there into other languages. The English signifier “martyr” has today conquered the world in the process of globalization. “Truth” or “blood” was sometimes prefixed in the early church to distinguish its specific “witness” from a court witness.

Today there is a vague understanding of what the signifier “martyr” refers to. A person may say: “a martyr is a person who is killed/tortured in hate of his faith/conviction.” While this understanding goes back to a technical Christian definition of the cause of martyrdom, to the Latin and Christian formula in odium fidei (in hate of faith), its Christian origin has fallen into oblivion.

In the following, an overview of the religious concepts of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam is given with shorter remarks on secular martyrdom. This article replaces “faith” with “conviction” (of a moral or political stand) and suspends the concept of compensation in the next life. Examples are the Chinese Communist Party and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Ealam, which both cultivate an intensive, secular, martial cult of martyrs.

Judaism Martyrdom is so strong within Jewish religion that it has been called a religion of martyrdom. Modern Jewish theology uses both Hebrew and European languages, among them frequently English. Some important sources by Jewish authors about Jewish martyrs are also in Greek, Latin, and Yiddish. In Hebrew itself, there is no equivalent in one word to Greek martyrs. We find al qiddush ha-Shem, “[he died] for the sanctification of the [divine] Name,” or simply leqaddesh et ha-Shem, “[he died] to sanctify the [divine] Name.” This article refers to the Jewish martyr as sanctifier (of the Name).

A Jewish sanctifier is a violence-renouncing person who is killed in hate of his faith, which is evaluated as a sanctification of His Name by Jewish theologians. Modern Jewish use in English makes a clear difference between the sanctifier (violence-renouncing martyr) and the hero (martial martyr). This is reflected in a modern distinction in Hebrew, Yom HaShoah v’HaGevurah, which means “Shoa and Heroism Day,” but which is freely explained in English by the extended meaning of Remembrance Day or Martyrs and Heroes Day. It takes place annually on the Nissan 27, the day of the Warsaw uprising. In this understanding the martyr is a victim and the hero is a fighter in a resistance movement.

An illustration from the biblical book of Maccabees showing the seven sons of Hannah being martyred for refusing to worship an idol. (Corbis)

Some of the Jewish sanctifiers today have interpreted their situation according to a prefigured role from the past. This prefiguration of an ideal sanctifier, whose main ambition was to be faithful until death to Jewish culture, was transmitted in rabbinic literature in the first centuries CE. It was based on the writings by Rabbi Aqiva, Rabbi Chananya ben Teradion, Rabbi Jose ben Joezer, and Rabbi Jehuda ben Baba; on the tradition in 2 Maccabees 6:18–32 and the seven Maccabean martyrs with their mother in 2 Maccabees 7; and on the Midrash of the Ten Martyrs. Already in the Old Testament are statements about prophets who because of their message were despised, persecuted, and even killed. In the book of Daniel, we find the important reflection that death due to persecution results in a “purification” of the group. The dead will also rise from death. This is one example of representational dying that was profiled later through the Jew Jesus.

In the apocryphal book Wisdom of Solomon, from the first century CE, we find the fundamental idea of compensation for suffering and death in the next life. It is a central idea in all religious concepts of martyrdom but is, of course, suspended in secular concepts. Medieval Jewish thinking also knows rewards for the violence avoiding martyrs: the joy of martyrdom, remissions of sins, the passing to paradise without passing hell, the resting at the bosom of Abraham in heaven, the vision of God, the existence in the world of light, and the being in the company of the righteous. The concept of intercession is also available. All this is suspended by secular martyrdom.

The books of the Maccabees describe the heroic armed resistance of the Jews against the attempt to introduce Hellenistic culture in the period 162–163 in Israel. The family of Judas Maccabee opposed the Hellenizing of Jewish culture in connection with political domination and economic exploitation by Hellenized neighboring kings.

Thus, we find both the violence-renouncing martyr, which in Hebrew is given the meaning of and highlighted by the “sanctifier of the divine name,” and the martial martyr, who is referred to as “hero,” not as “martyr,” but when it comes to the use of English the distinction is often suspended. Both are called “martyrs.”

Christianity Within the Christian tradition, one has to distinguish between the proto-martyr and the martyr and then between the non-martial martyr and the martial martyr. A person, regularly depicted as an unarmed civilian, has directed his life to witness about his faith, but he has no agenda of seeking a representational and sacrificial death. His agenda is missiological only, not sacrificial. Therefore he is called a proto-martyr by modern theologians. He teaches and preaches, he “witnesses” about Christ. His being killed suddenly interrupts his agenda. From both Israel’s past and pre-Christian Greece came concepts of representational sacrificial dying for others that could be combined with the image of the suffering just in Isaiah 53 in connection with missiological activity. This combination became the very heart of all Christian martyrdom.

As a Jew, Jesus saw himself in the tradition of Isaiah 53, of a suffering just person. The ideal persona of a self-sacrificing martyr was foisted upon him by the early church. His life was interpreted by others not just as suffering, but as representational suffering ending in death. The proper way of piety was to imitate Christ, who gave his life to redeem humanity in the eyes of God. This excluded of course armed resistance and indicated a complete trust in God. Jesus became a model for many on how to die as a self-sacrificing non-martial martyr in accordance with John 15:30: “Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.” The Eucharist in Christianity preserves this idea and strengthens the church. Here, the famous saying by Augustine and several followers has to be noticed: “The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.” The idea of John 15:30 has also been made a leading idea in some altruistic secular concepts of martyrdom that replace “church” with “community.”

Atonement is one reward of martyrdom: ascending to heaven without waiting for the last day of judgment another. In secular martyrdom the only reward is the experience of satisfaction before dying of having achieved a further step toward the ultimate political aim.

The early church ordered the living to treat the bodies of martyrs with greatest attention. The date of their departure and their anniversaries should be made the object for liturgical celebration. This cult inspired by the cult of the dead in the Hellenistic world developed into elaborate rituals in the mediaeval period. Martyrs were buried in necropolises originally shared by Christians and Pagans. People were careful to unite the dead bodies with the bones of the martyrs. They were buried ad sanctos.

Already the early church used a martial language when describing faithful Christians. They were warriors fighting the enemy in a Roman arena or as fighting a regular army led by Satan. This language was available when the church came under the protection of the state through Constantine’s intervention. The Christians came into power and had to adopt themselves to the policy of the state in intra-Christian conflicts with Donatists and Arians, and in inter-religious conflicts later, especially with the Muslims. Christians got access to the state monopoly to exercise violence. It was success in battle under the sign of the cross that allegedly made Christianity plausible. The war against the non-believers or Christian heretics was also interpreted as a glorification of God who wishes the defeat of these enemies. A victorious war was verification of the truth of the faith. The medieval warriors, known as Crusaders, were witnesses of the true faith, and, if killed, they were martyrs as described in the life story of, for example, Roland in La Chanson de Roland/Die Roland-sage. Today we see a return to the ideal of martyrdom that glorifies the non-violent, victimized, and suffering martyr who dies a representational death in accordance with John 15:30 and exemplified by, for example, Maximilian Kolbe (1894–1941), who volunteered to die in place of another.

A stained glass window in Belgium shows Jesus Christ carrying the cross along the Via Dolorosa to his crucifixion. (Jorisvo/Dreamstime.com)

Most Christian uses of “martyr” are group specific or even sectarian; they reflect the interest of a certain group. Catholics do not recognize a Protestant martyr. In contrast to modern Jewish tradition the martial martyr is marginalized. The World Council of Churches (to which the Catholics do not belong) acknowledged in 1978 Christian martyrs of all confessions and even non-Christian martyrs.

Islam The Arabic word shahid, plural shuhada, used by Muslims, inspired by the Christian use of martyr as witness, shahid meaning also “witness,” refers like the Christian signifier to both a witness and to a person being killed in hate of his faith, to a martyr, within an Islamic context. In these meanings, it is also used by militant Sikhs fighting Muslims and Hindus in India fighting Khalistan. The signifier “witness” has also been translated by Christians into Sanskrit, Chinese, Japanese, and many other languages.

Indian Shiite Muslims carry a replica of a martyr's tomb during an Ashura procession in Ahmadabad, India, January 8, 2009. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In Islam a distinction is made between the martial martyrs who are defined as shuhada' al-dunya wa l-akhira, “martyrs in this world and the next,” and shuhada l-akhira, “martyrs in the next world only.” The latter do not die on the battlefield but are slain as civil victims. There are plenty of narrations about violence-renouncing martyrs who were killed while leading the community in prayer or who served God in other ways and who are said to deserve the title shahid. These martyrs “in the next world only” correspond well to the Christian proto-martyr type.

The martial martyr has a long tradition in Islam, known already from the military campaigns during the lifetime of the Prophet Muhammad, the first one taking place in Ramadan on March 2, 624. Then the Prophet said, according to later commentators, that whoever would be killed in the battle facing the enemy would enter paradise. This saying is said to be in accordance with the Koran (3:169–170): “Count not those who were slain in God’s way as dead, but rather as living with their word, by Him provided, rejoicing in the bounty that God has given them, and joyful in those who remain behind and have not joined them, because no fear shall be on them, neither shall they sorrow.”

Late commentators ascribed to Muhammad the view that he promoted three types of martyrs. (1) There is the warrior who goes forth to battle wishing neither to kill nor to be killed. His mere presence should frighten the infidels. (2) There is the warrior who goes forth wishing to kill the enemy, but not be killed himself. This is a situation that most dedicated soldiers all over the world face. (3) There is the warrior who wishes to kill the enemy and to be killed himself. The martyr actively seeks an opportunity to do so, a behavior that is known as talab al-shahada, “the quest for martyrdom,” which is heard of almost daily from suicide bombers in the contemporary Middle East.

Islam of the medieval period declared the following Muslims martyrs: those who died prematurely, as a result of accident, disease, or some other misfortunes like victimization of bubonic plague, of pleurisy or abdominal disease; those who drown, die in a fire or are struck by a falling house or wall; and women who die in childbirth. There is even a fatwa (Islamic legal opinion) written in Jumada in 749 that plague creates martyrs. Plague is caused by a jinn (or genie, a supernatural creature) who is an enemy of God. Therefore Muslims who die of plague are victims (not sinners like in a Christian tradition). The plague was regarded as a blessing in disguise. All who died of unnatural deaths, especially plague, are martyrs in a communitarian Muslim tradition.

In the history of Islam, martial martyrs were regularly males, but Islam allowed women supporting roles, such as tending the wounded. Exceptions are mentioned and we find them even today. The martial female martyr in Islam has become an attractive role for some Muslims.

The “canonical” prescriptive passage (Koran 3:169–170) is also a key to understanding what a Muslim shahid ultimately should want to achieve, namely, to “rejoice in the bounty of God.” According to medieval commentators, the body of a slain martyr should not be washed because on the day of resurrection every wound will exude the fragrance of musk. He should be buried in his bloodstained clothes, which constitute proof of his status on the day of judgment. Coming to the rewards, a martyr will receive, according to the commentators Al-Muttaqi and Sa’id b. Mansur, a wife and forgiveness of sins in paradise.

Peter Schalk

See also: Arius; Constantine the Great; Globalization, Religion and; Muhammad; Ramadan; Roman Catholic Church; Women, Status and Role of; World Council of Churches; Yom HaShoah.

References

- Cook, David. Martyrdom in Islam. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007.
- Delehay, Hippolte. Les origines du culte des martyrs. Bruxelles: Bureau de la Société des Bollandistes, 1912.
- Die Entstehung der jüdischen Martyrologie. Studia post-biblica*, 38. Ed. by J. W. van Henten, B. A. G. M. Dehandschutter, and H. J. W. van der Klaauw. Leiden and New York: Brill, 1989.
- Fenech, Louis E. Martyrdom in the Sikh Tradition: Playing the “Game of Love.” New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Kohlberg, E. “Medieval Muslim Views on Martyrdom.” In Koninklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen. Mededelingen van de Afdeling Letterkunde, Nieuwe Reeks, Deel 60, no 7. Amsterdam: Koninklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen, 1977.
- Martyrdom and Political Resistance. Essays from Asia and Europe*. Comparative Asian Studies 18. Ed. by Joyce Pettigrew. Amsterdam: VU University Press, 1997.
- “Martyrdom Today.” In Concilium 163 (March 1983), edited by J-B. Metz and E. Schillebeeckx. New York: The Seabury Press, 1983.
- Roos, Lena. ‘God Wants It’: The Ideology of Martyrdom of the Hebrew Crusade Chronicles and Its Jewish and Christian Background. Turnhout: Brepols Publishers, 2006.

Schalk, Peter. Die Lehre der Befreiungstiger Tamililams von der Selbstvernichtung durch göttliche Askese: Vorlage der Quelle, Überlegungen des Anführers. Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis. Historia Religionum 28. Uppsala: AUU, 2007.

Martyrdom of Guru Arjan

Toward the end of spring each year, Sikhs commemorate the martyrdom of their fifth leader, Guru Arjan Dev Ji (1563–1606), which occurred on the fourth day of the light half of the month of Jyaishta on the Hindu lunar calendar (May 30, 1606 CE). Today, using the new Sikh Nanashahi calendar, the event is celebrated annually on June 16.

Guru Arjan Dev Ji was born on April 15, 1563, as the youngest of the three sons of the Guru Ram Das Ji (1534–1581). He became the new guru following his father’s death in 1581, though still a teenager. Among the accomplishments for which he is remembered is initiating the compilation of the Sikh holy book, the Guru Granth Sahib. Though he was not an aggressive proselytizer, the Sikh community grew during his tenure in office. Many attended upon him at Govindwal, then the center of the Sikh movement.

All was well for the Sikh movement until 1605, when the Mughal emperor Akbar died. His son and successor Jahangir was a fervent Muslim with a vision of turning his land into an Islamic state, which would necessarily include converting the Sikhs. He opened himself to a variety of accusations against Guru Arjan Dev, most significantly to those of Diwan Chandu Shah (whose marriage proposal of the guru’s daughter had been refused by Guru Arun Dev). Arun Dev may have sealed his fate when he showed some kindness to Jahangir’s rival Khusrau, who ruled Punjab at the time. In any case, Jahangir ordered Guru Arjan Dev’s arrest and transport to Lahore. His possessions were also confiscated. Once in Lahore, he was subject to severe torture for six days but refused the emperor’s demands. On the last day, he died in the river where he had been taken for a bath.

The martyrdom of Guru Arun Dev is credited with changing the basic character of Sikhs from a passive peaceable people into militant group willing to fight for its own survival and to protect its members from persecution. Arun Dev was succeeded by Guru Har Gobind (r. 1606–1644). He rejected the pacifism and non-violent stance of previous gurus and organized a small army. He argued that it was necessary to take up the sword in order to protect the weak and the oppressed.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Pacifism; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Duggal, K. S. Sikh Gurus: Their Lives and Teachings. New Delhi: UBSPD, 2005.
- Kapoor, Sukhbor Sing. Sikh Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Publishing Group, 1989.

Martyrdom of Guru Tegh Bahadur

Guru Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675), the ninth guru of Sikhism, assumed his office on March 20, 1665. He succeeded to the task from his grand-nephew, Guru Har Krishan (1656–1664), who was only five years old when he became the guru and died before his eighth birthday.

Guru Har Krishan did not name a successor, only delivering an ambiguous message that he would be found in Bakala. Several proclaimed themselves the new guru, but eventually the unassuming Tegh Bahadur was singled out and received the support of the community.

He was named guru during the reign of the emperor Aurangzeb (1618–1707), who had the goal of turning India into a Muslim land. He initiated a program of forced conversion in Kashmir. A group of religious leaders agreed, on the advice of the guru, to tell the Mughal authorities that they would willingly embrace Islam if Guru Tegh Bahadur did the same. Aurangzeb ordered his arrest and before leaving for Delhi, Tegh Bahadur selected his son, Gobind (later Guru Gobind Singh), as his successor, should it be necessary. He was arrested, detained for three months, and then sent to Delhi in November 1675. He refused to recant his faith under torture and was eventually beheaded on November 11, 1675. The Gurdwara Sis Ganj Sahib in Delhi was later built over the spot where the execution took place.

The martyrdom of Guru Tegh Bahadur is now celebrated on Maghar 11 on the Nanakshahi calendar, which was accepted by the administrative authorities of the religion in Amritsar in the 1990. Maghar 11 is equivalent to November 24 on the Common Era calendar. Commemoration of Guru Tegh Bahadur's death is one of 12 Gurburbs, holidays that recall the birth or death of one of the 10 Sikh gurus. Sikhs celebrate the Gurburbs by performing an Akhand Path, a public reading of the Guru Granth Sahib, the Sikh holy scriptures, in gurdwaras around the world. It requires two days to read the entire volume from beginning to end. The reading will thus begin two days before the designated holy day and will end early in the morning of the day of commemoration. Each person chosen to participate will read aloud for two to three hours. The day itself will start early in the morning and include the recitation of prayers, the singing of kirtans (holy songs), and speeches on the theme of the day. It will include a communal meal. Though guru for less than two years, Tegh Bahadur made a significant impact on the movement because of his faithfulness under the most severe of circumstances.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Guru Gobind Singh's Birthday; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Duggal, K. S. Sikh Gurus: Their Lives and Teachings. New Delhi: UBSPD, 2005.
- Kapoor, Sukhbor Sing. Sikh Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Publishing Group, 1989.

Mary, Blessed Virgin

The Blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus of Nazareth, is one of a half dozen women named Mary who appear in the Christian New Testament. She first appears in the Gospel accounts six months after the conception of John the Baptist when she was visited by the angel Gabriel (whom Muhammad would later announce as having visited him with the content of the Koran). At the time Mary was as yet unmarried but was engaged to a carpenter named Joseph. Gabriel told Mary that she was highly honored and would become the mother of Jesus, the Son of the Most High. Given that Mary was a virgin, she would become pregnant by the power of the Holy Spirit. Gabriel also informed her that her cousin Elizabeth was already pregnant (with the future John the Baptist) and Mary proceeded to visit her and share the good news of her situation. Her pregnancy was initially a problem for her future husband, who thought of backing out of the engagement, until the special circumstances were revealed to him in a dream. Following the instructions he had received, Joseph married her.

Small child next to a statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Our Lady of Japan, Tokyo. (J. Gordon Melton)

Shortly before Jesus' birth, the couple traveled to Bethlehem to be counted in a census ordered by Rome. Joseph was descended from King David and thus Bethlehem was his family's home. Mary gave birth to Jesus under the most humble of circumstances but was soon afterward visited by people to whom his birth had been revealed. Among these were three Wise Men (Zoroastrian astrologers) who had come to Judea looking for someone whose birth had been heralded by a star that had suddenly appeared in the night sky. The Judean King Herod, learning of the child's birth from the Wise Men, decided to kill all the male infants in his realm as he saw the birth of Jesus threatening his throne. Being warned in a dream about this plan, Mary, Joseph, and Jesus left Judea and spent time in Egypt.

When conditions allowed, the family returned to Nazareth and Jesus grew up there. Little is heard of him for the next few decades. One incident stands out. When he was 12 years old, while the family was visiting Jerusalem for the Passover holy day, Jesus disappeared. Mary and Joseph eventually found him discussing serious issues with the elders in the temple.

Elsewhere in the Gospels, Jesus is mentioned as having brothers (James, Joses [or Joseph], Simon, and Judas) and sisters whose names are not mentioned (Matthew 13:55–56; Mark 6:3). Protestants generally assume that while Mary was a virgin when Jesus was conceived and given birth, she later lived a normal married life with Joseph and had additional children. This idea conflicts with the understanding of Mary's perpetual virginity, a doctrine held by the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches. They believe that Mary and Joseph never consummated their marriage and that those spoken of as Jesus' brothers and sisters were cousins or even more distant relatives.

Mary appears several times during Jesus' adult ministry. She is, for example, present when he turned water into wine at a wedding (John 2:1–10). She is also seemingly rebuffed when attempting to see Jesus; he refuses by stating that those who do the will of his heavenly Father are his real brothers, sisters, and mother.

Mary finally appears among those who keep watch at Golgotha after Jesus is crucified. While Jesus is hanging on the cross, he commends his mother to the care of his disciple John. She seems to have gone to his home to live from that time. She makes one last appearance, among the disciples in the days following Jesus' resurrection and ascension, but prior to the giving of the Spirit at Pentecost.

In the early years of Christianity, Mary plays into the debates over the way of salvation and the nature of Jesus. In the Apostles' Creed, the earliest statement of Christian belief in creedal form, Jesus is affirmed as having been "born of a virgin." This position is reaffirmed in the fourth-century Nicene Creed and Chacedonian Creed, which nailed down belief of Jesus' dual nature as God and man. Mary's status relative to the Virgin Birth of Jesus would be debated at the Council of Ephesus (451), which affirmed her as Theotokos, or Mother of God. Especially since the visit of Constantine's mother Helena to the Holy Land, relics of Mary have been valued. The beliefs of both Eastern and Western Christians prevent the existence of any bodily remains of Mary, but several items associated with her are held at the cathedral at Prado (a piece of ribbon identified as her belt), the cathedral at Chartres (her veil), and the cathedral at Aachen (her shroud).

During the 14th century, in Italy, a house at Loretto was put forth as the house of in which the angel Gabriel made the Annunciation (told Mary that she was to bear Jesus). According to the story, the house was miraculously transported to Tersato, Dalmatia, in 1291 and then to Loretto in 1294. It remains a popular pilgrimage site.

Several traditions have developed concerning Mary's death. Most Eastern Orthodox Christians believe that the Virgin Mary died a natural death, at which time her soul was received by Christ. Her body was buried and three days later was resurrected and taken into heaven as a symbol of the future general resurrection of all believers. They also recognize a site near the Mount of Olives just outside Jerusalem as her burial spot. A small church was built over this site in the fifth century. It was destroyed in the seventh century when Jerusalem was invaded by the Persians. Over the next centuries it was rebuilt and destroyed on multiple occasions, though the crypt remained intact. Though Muslims hold Mary in high respect as the mother of the Prophet Isa (Jesus), in 1187, Saladin destroyed the church that had been erected over the crypt by the Crusaders. Finally in the 14th century, some Franciscans (Roman Catholics) again erected a church over the site. That church is today owned by the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, though space in the church is shared with the Armenian Apostolic Church.

A second tradition traces Mary to Ephesus, near which she was taken by the Apostle John to a house on Mount Koressos, in what is today western Turkey, and maintains that she lived there the remaining years of her earthly life. Roman Catholics believe that she did not die but was taken up into heaven. Orthodox and Muslims believed that she died in this house. The site was lost, but was described in visions by 19th-century nun and seer Anne Catherine Emmerich (1774–1824). Using the Emmerich materials, a house was found in the 1890s by two members of the Vincentian Order, founded by Saint Vincent de Paul (1581–1660). They subsequently discovered that people from a nearby village who considered themselves descendants of the Ephesian Christians venerated the house as Mary's final resting place.

Over the centuries, thousands of people have claimed to have been visited by the Virgin Mary, the number rising significantly since early in the 19th century. Several hundred of these apparitions have risen above the mundane and become the basis of new forms of Catholic piety, the source of new revelations, or a new site for pilgrimages. The Roman Catholic rosary, for example, is traced to a 13th-century apparition of Mary to Saint Dominic. The Miraculous Medal was given to Saint Catherine Labouré in her vision of Mary in Paris in 1830.

The scapular is a narrow cloth with an opening for the head that hangs down a person's front and back. Evolving from the aprons worn by agricultural laborers over their clothes, in the medieval period they became the identifying mark of monastic garb. They were later worn by laypeople who wished to show their support for a particular order. In 1251, the Blessed Virgin appeared to Simon Stock, the superior general of the Carmelite Order. She gave him a brown scapular and promised that any who wore it would be saved from eternal damnation. In 1617, Ursula Benincasa (1547–1618), founder of the Congregation of the Oblates of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, had a vision of the Blessed Virgin who showed her a multitude of angels distributing blue scapulars. Her order subsequently made the distribution of the scapular one of its unique activities. Subsequent apparitions have been identified with scapulars of different colors.

Anne Catherine Emmerich is but one of many people who had apparitions of the Virgin and left behind a body of work that included messages to humanity from the Blessed Virgin. Many of the apparitions have relatively brief messages to communicate, most often centered on more fervent devotion or a particular action. But some seers have brought forth lengthy communications delivered over a period of time, some being published as multi-volume texts. Very few of these materials, received in a Roman Catholic context and resembling volumes received by New Age channelers, have received any recognition by church authorities.

The site of many of the 19th- and 20th-century apparitions, from Guadalupe, Mexico; to Lourdes, France; to Fatima, Portugal; to Knock, Ireland, have, especially when given the least bit of approval by church authorities, become popular pilgrimage sites. Even those marginalized by the church—Necedah, Wisconsin; Bayside, New York; and Conyers, Georgia—have been able to sustain a following to the present.

Doctrinal Development The spread of popular piety supported the development of Mariology, a theology of the Virgin Mary, as a subdiscipline of Christian theology. Mariology would explore and define a set of doctrinal affirmations that would become official dogma, that is, a doctrine to which all Roman Catholics are supposed to grant assent. The dogma of the Perpetual Virginity of the Virgin Mary, that Mary remained a virgin throughout her earthly life, was defined quite early and was clearly stated by Augustine and Thomas Aquinas and reaffirmed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). The dogma of the Immaculate Conception, that from her conception, Mary was preserved from original sin, was defined as dogma in 1854 by Pope Pius IX in his encyclical Ineffabilis Deus. The dogma of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, which states that Mary did not die a bodily death but was taken to heaven at the end of her earthly life and now spends her time working for the salvation of all, was put forth in 1950 by Pope Pius XII in his apostolic constitution, Munificentissimus Deus.

In addition to these dogmas, there are a number of titles that have been given to Mary—Queen of Heaven, Co-Redemptrix, Mystical Rose—which indicate additional popular beliefs that together have elevated the reverence of Mary into a major aspect of Roman Catholic devotion in the modern world. In addition, Mary has been named as the patroness—protector and intercessor—for a number of organizations, professions, and even countries. She has been named as the patroness of more than 60 countries, not all by any means having a Catholic majority.

Mary has been a primary subject of Christian artists. In the East, a number of sacred icons have Mary as their subject. Several of these have become famous as “weeping” icons. One icon traced back to Helena is called Our Lady of Czestochowa, an icon now located in Poland. In the 1380s, Prince Ladislaus, the regent for King Louis of Poland, prayed to the Virgin asking where her image should be placed, and in a dream she pointed to a hill at Czestochowa. Ladislaus endowed a monastery and left the image with the monks. In the 1430s, when the monastery was attacked, a soldier slashed the cheek of the image three times. He died as he made the third cut. Since that time, attempts to repair the image have been unsuccessful.

In the West, statues of the Virgin have been popular, many depicting the image of the virgin as she appeared in various apparitions. Most of these statues developed special names. Mary also became the subject of 20th-century attempts to build Christina mega-statues. The largest statue of Mary, at 151 feet, is the Virgen de la Paz, located at Trujillo, Venezuela. Other mega statues are the Holy Mother of God the Protectress of the town of Haskovo, Bulgaria, and Our Lady of the Rockies, which sits on the Continental Divide overlooking Butte, Montana.

Mary in Islam In Islamic thought, Jesus is one of the prophets preceding Muhammad, and his mother is given special attention in the Koran. It is noted by Muslim scholars that Mary is granted more attention than any woman mentioned in the Koran. She is in fact the only woman mentioned by name and one of eight persons to have a chapter (the 19th) devoted to her. She is called Mariam, Arabic for Mary. According to the Koran, Mary’s mother dedicated her to God while Mary was still in her womb. The angel Gabriel visited Mary to announce her pregnancy with Jesus, though she was a chaste virgin. She has Jesus, alone under a tree, neither Joseph, the visiting Wise Men, nor a manger being mentioned in the Koran. The birth of Jesus has been seen as more like Allah's creation of Adam de novo, rather than as miracle demonstrating Jesus' divinity. Mary is seen as the type of a pious believer who submits to Allah and is told, "O Mary! God hath chosen thee and purified thee—chosen thee above the women of all nations. O Mary! worship thy Lord devoutly: Prostrate thyself, and bow down with those who bow down."

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Augustine of Hippo; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Islam; Jerusalem; Muhammad; Passover; Statues—Christian; Thomas Aquinas.

References

- Ball, Ann. The Other Faces of Mary: Stories, Devotions, and Pictures of the Holy Virgin from Around the World. New York: Crossroad Publishing Company, 2004.
- Dodds, Monica, and Bill Dodds. Encyclopedia of Mary. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 2007.
- Durham, Michael S. Miracles of Mary: Apparitions, Legends, and Miraculous Works of the Blessed Virgin Mary. San Francisco: Harper, 1995.
- Galvan, John. "Jesus and The Virgin Mary in Islam." Islam for Today. <http://www.islamfortoday.com/galvan03.htm>. Accessed July 1, 2004.
- Heintz, Peter. A Guide to Apparitions of Our Blessed Virgin Mary. Sacramento: Gabriel Press, 1995.
- "The Mary Page (University of Dayton)." <http://www.udayton.edu/mary/marypage21.html>. Accessed July 1, 2009.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. Mary through the Centuries: Her Place in the History of Culture. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Rubin, Miri. Mother of God: A History of the Virgin Mary. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009.
- Zimdars-Swartz, Sandra. Encountering Mary: From La Salette to Medjugorje. New York: Harper Perennial, 1992.

Mary I

1516–1558

Mary I (Mary Tudor), queen of England (r. 1553–1558), was the daughter of Henry VIII (1491–1547). She came to power as the Protestant Reformation made a significant impact on the country and she used her power to attempt to bring England back into the Roman Catholic fold. In the process she had a number of Protestant leaders arrested and executed, and drove many more into exile. For centuries afterward, Mary was portrayed as a villain in Protestant literature.

Mary I was born February 18, 1516. She was the only surviving offspring of Henry's brief marriage to Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), a member of the Catholic Spanish ruling family. While Henry still hoped that he would have a son with Catherine, Mary was generally recognized as the current heir to the throne. However, once Henry moved to annul his marriage to Catherine, Mary fell from his favor. Henry subsequently, in 1533, had a second daughter, Elizabeth, whose mother was Anne Boleyn (ca. 1501–1536).

Catherine died in 1536, and Henry forced Mary to sign a statement renouncing her loyalty to Catholicism. Though having to still endure remarks about her legitimacy, she otherwise enjoyed a brief respite from Henry's anger. The pressure on her was further relieved the following year when Edward VI was born of Henry's next wife, Jane Seymour (1508–1537). In Henry's final will, Mary was named as second in succession to her half-brother Edward VI (1537–1553).

Following her father's death in 1547, she lived quietly away from London, though after the prohibition of the Mass by the Protestant-controlled Council that ran the government given Edward's youth, she defied the Council's leaders and continued Roman Catholic practice in her home. The issue did not prevent her from occasionally paying formal visits to Edward.

Following Edward's death on July 6, 1553, John Dudley, duke of Northumberland (ca. 1502–1553), who as the lord president of the Council had virtually run the country during the reign of the juvenile Edward, attempted to bypass both of Henry's daughters and have his daughter-in-law Lady Jane Grey (ca. 1537–1554) placed on the throne. Mary acted quickly after learning of the plot. She gathered her supporters and arrived in London, where she was acknowledged as the new queen on July 19. She turned on Northumberland and had him arrested and soon afterward executed.

As queen, Mary systematically began the reversal of all the laws and actions taken by her father and then her brother that had moved England away from Rome. She restored several Catholic bishops to their posts and removed the most outspoken Protestant ones. A few, including Nicolas Ridley (ca. 1500–1555), Miles Coverdale (ca. 1488–1569), Hugh Latimer (ca. 1485–1655), John Hooper (ca. 1500–1555), and Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556), were arrested.

British queen Mary I signs the death warrant of Lady Jane Grey in 1554. (Library of Congress)

Soon after her coronation, she named Reginald Pole (1500–1558) to the post of papal legate to negotiate the issue that had caused the country’s formal excommunication and found Philip of Spain an ideal husband. She had Parliament reinstitute the Mass throughout England and then repeal a number of what were perceived as “Protestant” laws.

Finally, Mary suppressed any who opposed her rise to the throne to the point of open rebellion, and from her perspective, now that she occupied the throne, the security of the state seemed to require stern measures. The leaders of the revolt were executed and with them the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey. Any role in the movement by her sister Elizabeth remained ill defined and Mary decided not to move against her.

A year of triumph culminated on November 30, 1554, as Mary participated in a ceremony along with her husband and all the members of Parliament in which Pole absolved England of its past anti-Roman actions. Within a few weeks, Parliament had repealed all the anti-Roman laws, and Roman Catholicism was once again established as the dominant practice throughout the country.

With Catholicism firmly in control religiously, beginning in 1555, Mary turned on the Protestant leadership, Before she left the throne, 277 persons would be burned at the stake for heresy. Cranmer, Latimer, Hooper, and Ridley were prominent among the victims (Coverdale having escaped to the continent). Mary ordered the executions as the only means of ridding England of any Protestant tendencies.

Mary's effort to return England to the Catholic fold permanently was blunted by her poor health. As her attacks on the Protestants continued, the dropsy (edema) from which she had suffered became more severe and she died on November 17, 1558, shortly after the fifth anniversary of her ascendancy to the throne. She would be succeeded by her half-sister Elizabeth, who would move as quickly away from Catholicism as Mary had moved toward it.

In her attempt to heal the divide between her Catholic and Protestant subjects (and in the process create modern Anglicanism) Elizabeth had to deal with the impact of the Marian Exiles, those Protestants who had escaped Mary's wrath by fleeing to the continent. They returned to England fired with Protestant zeal and an intense hatred for the woman whom they blamed for the deaths of so many of their brothers in the faith. They would vilify the one they called "Bloody Mary," the main subject of one of the most renowned of Protestant classics, John Foxe's Book of Martyrs (1563). The intense bitterness over Mary was only laid to rest in the radically altered relationship created between Protestants and Catholics in the wake of Second Vatican Council of the 1960s, some 500 years after Mary's reign.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Elizabeth I; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Knighton, C. S., ed. Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series Mary I, 1553–1558. London: Public Record Office, 1998.
- Loades, David. Mary Tudor: The Tragical History of the First Queen of England. London: National Archives Press, 2006.
- Maynard, Theodore. Bloody Mary. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Co., 1955.
- Porter, Linda. The Myth of "Bloody Mary": A Biography of Queen Mary I of England. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2009.

Prescott, H. F. Mary Tudor. New York: Macmillan Company, 1953.

Maryknoll

Maryknoll, officially the Catholic Foreign Missionary Society of America, an American-based foreign missionary society serving the Catholic Church, emerged as a seminary devoted to training missionaries. It subsequently grew, step by step, into a global missionary sending agency.

Maryknoll was founded by Fathers James A. Walsh (1867–1936) and Thomas F. Price (1860–1919). As a young priest, Walsh became interested in foreign missions and founded a periodical, The Field Afar, to promote interest in the work. Price, the North Carolinian ordained as a Catholic priest, began his career in home missions but soon expanded his concern to include foreign missionary activity. The two met in 1910 at the Eucharistic Congress held in Montreal and formulated plans for a seminary to train missionaries. They quickly received the approval of the American bishops and in June 1911 traveled to Rome, where Pope Pius X approved their project. The Catholic Foreign Missionary Society of America was a reality before the year ended. The Society was headquartered on a hill (knoll) near Ossining, New York, its name chosen because of Walsh and Price's devotion to the Virgin Mary.

At the time Maryknoll was founded, China was the single country that had received the most Christian missionaries and it was not surprising that China was chosen as the first object of the new Society's attention. Price accompanied the first group of three missionaries—Fathers James E. Walsh (not to be confused with the society's co-founder), Francis X. Ford, and Bernard F. Meyer—as the superior for the work. Price died in Hong Kong a year later of a burst appendix. Father James A. Walsh stayed at Maryknoll as the society's superior general, a post he retained until his death in 1936. In 1933, Walsh and Maryknoll were acknowledged by his being consecrated as the titular bishop of Siene.

Among the many people who worked in the background making Maryknoll a reality was Mary Josephine Rogers (1882–1955). She developed an interest in mission while a student at Smith College, where she organized a Mission Study club. Beginning in 1908, she assisted Walsh, and in 1912 was named the head of the females who were working for the Society. That group gradually began to think of themselves as pursuing a religious vocation, and reorganized in 1920 as the Foreign Mission Sisters of Saint Dominic. The Maryknoll Sisters, as they were popularly termed, became a Pontifical Institute in 1954, at which time its name was changed to Maryknoll Sisters of Saint Dominic. In 1925, Rogers, now known as Sister Mary Joseph, became the Sisters' first mother general, a post she retained until her retirement in 1946. Soon after their founding, the Sisters began working alongside the men in the East and Latin America.

A lay Maryknoll affiliate was added in 1975. Its member Maryknoll Lay Missioners have dedicated themselves to live in economically poorer communities, working to supply basic needs and generally assisting processes that are deemed to be producing a more just and compassionate world. Most lay missionaries are found in Africa, Asia, and the Americas.

The three entities at Maryknoll are distinct branches of the original structure—the Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers, the Maryknoll Sisters, and the Maryknoll Lay Missioners.

Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers spread out globally through the last half of the 20th century—Asia, Africa, and Latin America. They became prominent in South America in the 1960s where many of the brothers emerged as strong supporters of Liberation Theology. The Society has remained on the cutting edge of modern Christian missionary activity as it has made the transition to a decolonialized world and leadership in global Christianity has passed from the hands of Europeans and North Americans. Its publication affiliate, Orbis Books, is a major publisher of materials on contemporary Christian missions, missionary theory, and global Christianity.

As of 2009, there are more than 475 Maryknoll priests and Brothers serving in countries around the world, principally in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, while Maryknoll Sisters are to be found in 30 countries around the world.

Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers
PO Box 304

Maryknoll, NY 10545-0304
<http://society.maryknoll.org/>

Maryknoll Sisters
PO Box 311
Maryknoll, NY 10545-0311

Maryknoll Lay Missioners
PO Box 307
Maryknoll, NY 10545-0307

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Byrne, Patrick. Fr. Price of Maryknoll. Maryknoll, NY: The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, Inc., 1922.
- Sargen, Daniel. All the Day Long. New York: Longmans, Green & Co., 1941.
- Sheridan, Robert. The Founders of Maryknoll. Maryknoll, NY: The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, Inc., 1980.

Masjid al-Haram Al-

Al-Masjid al-Haram, located in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, is the largest mosque in the world, and in its midst is the Kaaba, a black cubical structure toward which Muslims orient themselves when offering prayers to Allah. Muslims consider it the holiest spot on Earth, the place where the earthly and heavenly realms intersect. It is a high point of the annual pilgrimage (al-hajj) in which Muslims come to Mecca, enter the mosque, and circumambulate the Kaaba.

The site of the mosque and Kaaba was in use as a religious site long before Islam arose in the seventh century CE, and various stories are told of its beginnings. Some consider it a product of the angels at the beginning of time. Tradition ascribes its building to the Prophet Ibrahim (Abraham) assisted by his son Ishmael. Some believe the Black Stone located at the eastern corner of the Kaaba to be part of the original structure erected by Ibrahim. After Ibrahim's death, the Kaaba was again filled with idols and remained in that condition until the time of Muhammad. At that time, the Kaaba was also the site for an annual gathering (the Hajj) of the tribes of the peninsula. It and the surrounding territory were considered an area of non-violence. The Kaaba was dedicated to Hubal, a deity of the Nabatean people who inhabited northern Arabia.

When Muhammad (570–632) assumed control of Mecca as the leader of the Muslims, he went to the Kaaba and oversaw the destruction of all the idols. At one stage of this process, his son-in-law (and later caliph) Ali Ibne Abi Talib climbed on Muhammad's shoulders to bring down the largest of the idols, that of Hubal. From this point, the Kaaba was integrated into the worship of the Muslims of Mecca.

Following the death of Muhammad, the caliph Omar Ibn al-Khattab (r. 634–644) enlarged the area around the Kaaba by demolishing a number of houses and erecting a wall that enclosed the outdoor prayer area surrounding the shrine. Caliph Uthman Ibn Affan (r. 644–656) enlarged the prayer area and covered it. Successive caliphs continued to enlarge the emerging mosque and added more permanent and aesthetically pleasing decorations. Then in 777, Caliph al-Mahdi (r. 775–785) demolished the existing mosque and saw to the construction of a larger one that incorporated marble columns decorated with gilt teak wooden inlay and three minarets. Caliph al-Madhi's work survived for centuries, but in 1399, the mosque was severely damaged by a fire and had to be rebuilt by Sultan Nasir Faraj bin Barquq (r. 1399–1405).

In 1571, Ottoman Sultan Selim II (r. 1566–1574) commissioned a major renovation of the mosque. At this time, the mosque took on the appearance it still maintains. He saw to the addition of domes over the prayer halls. In 1629, Sultan Murad IV (r. 1623–1640) added the seven minarets.

During the 20th century, the present nation of Saudi Arabia was created and in 1955, the first of what has become a series of expansions and renovations of the mosque, most designed to accommodate the growing number of visitors—especially for the annual Hajj—was begun. King Fahd (r. 1982–2005) added a new wing and an outdoor prayer area on the southeast side of the mosque. He followed between 1988 and 2005 with the addition of new minarets, the king's residence overlooking the mosque, and additional prayer area in and around the mosque. King Abdullah bin Abdul-

Aziz, who succeeded to the throne in 2005, has launched a massive effort to increase the capacity of the mosque by 35 percent. It currently can accommodate 800,000 inside the mosque proper and an additional 1,120,000 immediately outside the mosque.

The current Al-Masjid al-Haram centers on the Kaaba, the 60-foot cube that forms the main reason for Muslims' pilgrimage to Mecca. Surrounding the Kaaba on all sides is a large open area. That area is surrounded by the mosque building itself, a two-story structure that includes a variety of administrative offices and several enclosed prayer halls. Entrance into the area surrounding the Kaaba is through a number of large arched doorways. Outside the building are large areas also set aside for worshippers.

The current structure, including the outdoor and indoor praying spaces, covers an area of 99 acres. While its general capacity is usually two million, it can accommodate up to four million worshippers during the Hajj period.

One event in the modern era disturbed the sanctity of the mosque. In 1979, during the Hajj, a group of extremist Muslims led by Abdullah Hamid Mohammed Al-Qahtani seized control of the mosque. The insurgents declared their leader to be the Mahdi, the prophet who is to arise as the redeemer of Islam. They demanded all Muslims submit to his authority. In the process, a large number of pilgrims became hostages. The takeover lasted for two weeks but finally ended in a gun battle between the militants and the Saudi security forces. A number from both sides were killed in the clash, as were many hostages, before the Saudi forces reassumed control of the mosque.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Abraham/Abram; Islam; Mecca; Mosques; Pilgrimage.

References

- Adawi, Nabil. The Two Holy Mosques in Saudi Arabia: Historical Context, Modern Developments, and Cultural Significance. London: Gulf Centre for Strategic Studies, 1994.
- King, Geoffrey R. D. The Historical Mosques of Saudi Arabia. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1987.
- Trofimov, Yaroslav. The Siege of Mecca: The Forgotten Uprising in Islam's Holiest Shrine and the Birth of Al Qaeda, Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Company, 2007.

Wright, Lawrence. The Looming Tower: Al Qaeda and the Road to 9/11. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2006.

Master Ching Hai Meditation Association

The Master Ching Hai Meditation Association (also known as God's Direct Contact) emerged in the 1980s around the teachings and person of Master Ching Hai Wu Shang Shih, a Vietnamese teacher in the Sant Mat tradition. Today the organization has centers around the world and sponsors a series of fast food vegetarian-only restaurants (Loving Huts [<http://www.lovinghut.com>]). These cafés, which can be found throughout North America, Europe, and Asia, serve as mini-centers of Ching Hai's growing ministry. Raised a Roman Catholic in Vietnam, Ching Hai was introduced to Buddhism by her grandmother. As a young adult, Ching Hai moved to England to continue her education and then lived for a short time in France and Germany. While in Germany she married a Buddhist.

During the early years of her marriage, she pursued a spiritual quest at the feet of several different Eastern teachers, after which she left home to find enlightenment. Her quest had been determined by her reading of the Buddhist Surangama Sutra, which spoke of the Quan Yin Method as the surest means to enlightenment, but she could locate no Buddhist teacher who could inform her of the nature of the method. Finally she visited India, where she met Thakar Singh, a teacher in the Ruhani Satsang Sant Mat tradition, who instructed her in the shabd yoga of the sound current. The Sant Mat teaches that the world was brought into existence by the Creative Word or divine Sound Current. Through the use of simran (repetition of a mantra) and associated meditative techniques (dhyan and bhajan), individuals can reconnect to the spiritual realms.

Ching Hai concluded that shabd yoga was the Quan Yin Method she had been seeking. After her initiation by Thakar Singh, she moved to Taiwan and began to teach. Through the 1980s she met with an increasingly positive response, and her following expanded through Southeast Asia and by the early 1990s, around the world. While followers learn and practice shabd yoga, they are also asked to adhere to five precepts: to refrain from (1) taking the life of any sentient beings, (2) lying, (3) stealing, (4) illicit sex, and (5) intoxicants. Followers adopt a vegan or lactovegetarian diet.

Ching Hai is regularly pictured in the movement's literature as wearing designer clothing. In 1995 she created an organization to sell the clothing, which she had herself designed, with the understanding that the income would be used to support humanitarian activities, primarily Vietnamese refugee camps and support of flood victims in Southeast Asia. In December 1999 she attended and spoke at the meeting of the Parliament of the World's Religions in Cape Town, South Africa. The growth of the Master Ching Hai Meditation Association has not always been smooth, however; it has been accused of financial irregularities in Taiwan and has been banned since 1999 in the People's Republic of China, where it has been added to the list of cult-like organizations. Presently, Ching Hai has taken on the honorific "Supreme Master" and has become politically active in promoting environmental awareness in her "Be Veg, Go Green, Save the Planet" initiative.

Ching Hai Meditation Association (God's Direct Contact)
PO Box 9
Hsihu, Miaoli 36899
Formosa, R.O.C.
<http://www.godsdirectcontact.org/> (English and Chinese)

André Laliberté and David C. Lane

See also: Ruhani Satsang; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

Reference

The Supreme Master Ching Hai. The Key of Immediate Enlightenment. 2 vols. Miaoli Hsien, Taiwan/R.O.C.: Meditation Association in China, 1991.

Mata Amritanandamayi Math

The network of centers around the world devoted to extending the ministry of Indian spiritual teacher Mataji Amritanandamayi (b. 1951) (often called "Amma") emerged in India in the 1960s. Mataji grew up in Kerala in an atmosphere of family devotion to Krishna, but unlike the other children, at the age of seven she began to compose bhajans (holy songs) to him. She identified with him closely and seemed to be able to assume various moods attributed to him or to his consort Devi in a way that facilitated the devotion of others. In the early 1970s, when Mataji had just entered her young adulthood, her neighbors began to recognize her as an enlightened being. Among these was her father, who gave her land upon which to create an ashram (religious community).

People receiving the Darshan (The Embrace) from Mataji Amritanandamayi, or Amma, The Mother. (Frédéric Soltan/Corbis)

Mataji's local ministry began to spread, first throughout Kerala and then all of India. In 1988 she built the first of the unique temples associated with her. These Brahmastanams, or Abodes of the Absolute, are the residence of four deity forms, each installed as part of a single image representing the principle of the Unity of God. In the temples, devotees practice a form of bhakti yoga, a spirituality based in devotional service to God, by meditating and singing Mataji's bhajans. Devotion to a wide variety of deity figures, including Jesus, Buddha, the Virgin Mary, and so on, is allowed and even encouraged, as Mataji believes that all religions are spiritual paths that lead to the same One God.

International expansion began in 1987, when Mataji made her first tour in the West, centered on the United States, France, and Switzerland. This tour had been made possible by Western disciples who had encountered her in India. Through the 1990s more than 100 centers emerged across Europe and the Middle East and to Singapore and Australia. In 2008, there were approximately 100 centers in North America.

The Mata Amritanandamayi Math supports several social agencies in India—the Amrita Institute of Medical Sciences and Research Centre in Cochin, Kerala; Amrita Niketanam, an orphanage in Parippally; and Anbu Illam, a home for the aged in Sivakasi, Tamil Nadu. In 1996 Mataji inaugurated a project called Amrita Kuteeram, which within five years (2001) constructed some 20,000 houses in different parts of India. The Math has also instituted a program to provide pensions for widows and elderly women who are not receiving government support. These, and like programs, are seen as a manifestation of Mataji's compassion for all people.

Mata Amritanandamayi Math

Amritapuri, Kollam

Kerala

India

<http://www.amritapuri.org/>

<http://www.ammachi.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hinduism; Meditation.

References

Amritanandamayi, Mataji. Awaken Children! 2 vols.

Valickavu, Kerala: Mata Amritanandamayi Mission Trust, 1989–1990.

Balagopal. The Mother of Sweet Bliss. Valickavu, Kerala: Mata Amritanandamayi Mission Trust, 1985.

“Holy Woman Brings the Mother Spirit to the West.” Hinduism Today 9, no. 4 (July 1987): 1, 15.

Warrier, Maya. Hindu Selves in a Modern World: Guru Faith in the Mata Amritanandamayi Mission. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Routledge-Curzon, 2005.

Mathers, Samuel Liddell MacGregor

1854–1918

A key figure in late 19th-century Esotericism and co-founder of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, Samuel Mathers was born in London on January 8, 1854. The only child of William Mathers, a merchant's clerk, and his wife Mary Ann, Mathers grew up in Bournemouth in a family environment that was nominally Anglican. After his father died Mathers was sent to Bedford Grammar School. School records show that he was unexceptional as a student, showing none of his future brilliance as a translator of key medieval magical texts.

After leaving Bedford Grammar School, Mathers—like his father before him—began work as a clerk. However, he also developed a keen interest in military history and Freemasonry, and in October 1877, at the age of 23, was initiated as a Mason at Hengist Lodge in Bournemouth. Mathers subsequently gained the three regular degrees—Entered Apprentice, Fellow Draft, and Master Mason—but never became a Lodge Master. He later registered his name with his Lodge as Comte de Glenstrae, a sign that he aspired to more exotic social heights than his conventional and undistinguished background could otherwise provide. Mathers maintained that this title had been conferred on one of his ancestors by King James II. He would later also add MacGregor to his name, claiming that his father was of Scottish descent and that his surname was associated with Clan MacGregor.

According to his future wife Moina it was while working as a clerk that he first began leading “a student's life,” although it is likely that this was very much a part-time educational pursuit. Mathers also took up soldiering with the First Hampshire Infantry Volunteers, although according to occult historian Robert A. Gilbert he was never commissioned and it is unlikely that he achieved a higher rank than private. Nevertheless, he translated a military manual from French in order to adapt it to British army requirements and this was a sign of things to come, for Mathers would later revel in this particular skill, translating a number of medieval magical works into English, including Knorr von Rosenroth's Kabbalah Denudata (The Kabbalah Unveiled); Solomon Trismosin's alchemical treatise Splendor Solis; and several magical grimoires, including The Sacred Magic of Abra-melin the Mage, the Key of Solomon, and The Grimoire of Armadel.

In 1881, while still a member of Hengist Lodge, Mathers made a key contact in Dr William Wynn Westcott (1848–1925), who in addition to being a Freemason was also a member of Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (SRIA). When his mother died in 1885, Mathers left Bournemouth and moved to London's Kings Cross. In London he enjoyed the hospitality extended to him by Westcott, joined the SRIA, and moved in Hermetic and Theosophical circles. During this period Mathers also spent much of his time in the Reading Room of the British Museum, often arriving in the morning and staying until the early evening, studying and translating various ancient texts. It was here that he met another distinguished occult scholar, Arthur Edward Waite (1857–1942), with whom he soon discovered a mutual interest in all things Esoteric. According to Waite’s anonymous tribute to Mathers, published in The Occult Review in April 1919—a few months after Mathers’s death—Mathers initially spoke to Waite in the Reading Room “in a hushed voice and with [a] somewhat awful accent,” announcing that he was a Rosicrucian and a Freemason and that, accordingly, “I can speak of some things, but of others I cannot speak.” Mathers clearly loved secrets, and Waite’s first impression was that he was somewhat eccentric, but in due course the two men would both become leading members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

As events transpired, Mathers played a key role in the Order’s formation in 1888. Wynn Westcott had acquired a Masonic manuscript in cipher form that had been discovered among the papers of a deceased member of the SRIA and he invited Mathers to expand on the Rosicrucian cipher material so that it could form the basis of a “complete scheme of initiation.” Mathers subsequently developed the five Masonic grades into a workable system suitable for the practice of ceremonial magic. As a result the Isis-Urania Temple of the Golden Dawn was established in London on March 1, 1888. Mathers, Westcott, and another member of the SRIA—Dr. William Woodman (1826–1891)—were confirmed as leaders of the Order. However, in a comparatively short space of time, Mathers would assume total control. Dr. Woodman died in 1891 and Westcott began redirecting his attention toward the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, finally resigning from the Golden Dawn in 1897 because rumors about his involvement in a magical organization were affecting his professional career as a crown coroner. The death of Woodman and the resignation of Westcott left Mathers effectively in control of both the Inner and Outer Orders of the Golden Dawn, even though he and his wife, French artist Moina Bergson (1865–1928), were now based in Paris, having moved there in 1891.

At the time of his assumption of total control of the Golden Dawn, Mathers was engaged in literary research at the Bibliothèque de l’Arsenal, where much of his time was taken up translating the French manuscript of a lengthy and important 15th-century grimoire titled The Sacred Magic of Abramelin the Mage. Supported financially by wealthy Golden Dawn member Annie Horniman, a tea heiress and key senior member of the London Isis-Urania Temple, Mathers was presiding over the Ahatoor Temple in Paris while simultaneously attempting to maintain dominance over the various Golden Dawn branches across the Channel. However, when Annie Horniman (1860–1917) queried various aspects of the funding of Mathers’s stay in Paris, Mathers accused her of insubordination and expelled her from the Order.

Mathers’s increasingly autocratic style and the expulsion of Annie Horniman from the Golden Dawn caused considerable disquiet among Order members and he caused even more consternation soon afterward when he charged senior Order member Mrs. Florence Farr Emery with “attempting to make a schism” in the Golden Dawn and expelled her from the Order as well. The expulsion of Annie Horniman and Mrs. Emery from the Golden Dawn led in turn to years of internal bickering and dissension among Order members, culminating in the fragmentation of the Order itself. Serious rifts appeared around 1903 with the defection of key Order members like Robert William Felkin (ca. 1858–1922) and Arthur Edward Waite (1857–1942), although other members, like J. W. Brodie-Innes (1848–1923), remained loyal to him. Mathers died in Paris on November 20, 1918. The probable cause was Spanish influenza, but according to Mathers’s wife, his death resulted from a transcendental encounter with forces on the inner planes that no mortal could survive.

Nevill Drury

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Crowley, Aleister; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Colquhoun, I. Sword of Wisdom: MacGregor Mathers and the Golden Dawn. London: Spearman, 1975.
- Gilbert, Robert A. Revelations of the Golden Dawn: The Rise and Fall of a Magical Order. Slough, UK: Quantum/Foulsham, 1997.

Harper, G. M. Yeats's Golden Dawn. London: Macmillan, 1974.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England. London: Spearman, 1970.

■ Mauritania

The present state of Mauritania lies on the western edge of the Sahara Desert in North Africa, and most of its 398,000 square miles of territory, especially in the north and east, is very sparsely inhabited desert. The majority of its 3,400,000 people live along the Atlantic coast or on the Senegal River that forms much of its southern border with Senegal. Mauritania also shares borders with Mali, Algeria, and the highly disputed Western Sahara territory.

Mauritania gained independence in a process that began following World War II, when it was named a French overseas province. In 1960 autonomy was granted and over the next six years Mauritania struggled to free itself from French economic control. However, the history of the region begins in the fifth century CE, when the Berber people who inhabited the region organized the ancient kingdom of Uagadu, centered on the city of Koumbi-Selah in southern Mauritania, near the Mali border. At its height, Koumbi-Selah was one of the largest cities in the world. During the years of this kingdom, Islam swept across Africa.

In 1076 the armies of the Almoravid Empire, centered on Marrakesh (present-day Morocco), conquered Uagadu, and introduced Islam to Central Africa but left a decade later to concentrate on the conquest of Spain. However, in the next century the Almoravids were replaced by a new Muslim empire, the Almohad, which brought all of Mauritania under its hegemony. This second empire collapsed in the next century, leaving Islam as its enduring legacy.

Over the next centuries, the region experienced intermittent wars between the Berbers and the Arabs.

People coming to Friday prayer in Chinguetti Mosque, Mauritania. (Images&Stories/StockphotoPro)

Their conflict came to a head at the end of the 15th century, when the Arabs won the Cherr Baba War. Their victory led to the establishment of a stratified society, with the Arabs (the hassani) at the top, the Berbers in the middle, and the residents in the south, the Fulah and the Soninkes, at the bottom. In 1858 the French invaded Mauritania, but they were not able to pacify the land until the 1930s.

Islam has been the religion of the region for a millennium and remains the official religion of the independent nation of Mauritania. As the leader of an Islamic state, the president must be a Muslim. He is assisted by a High Islamic Council. Muslims are prohibited by their religion from converting to another religion. The government provides some support to the Central Mosque in the capital city, but other mosques are supported by their members. Most Muslims in Mauritania are followers of the Malikite School, although Sufi brotherhoods of the Qadiriyya, Tijaniyya, and Shadhiliyya orders are also prominent.

The Roman Catholic Church came into Mauritania with the French army but only established a settled organization at the beginning of the 20th century. The church has been able to continue a presence in the post-French years, primarily serving expatriates from France, Senegal, and the Canary Islands. Protestants attempted to evangelize the country on several occasions but have failed to establish any work apart from the expatriate community. Attempts at proselytization are controlled by a law that bans the publication of any material that is considered against Islam or that contradicts or otherwise threatens Islam. Christian

Mauritania

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,142,000	3,333,000	99.1	2.92	4,514,000	6,323,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,000	17,200	0.5	2.92	18,000	20,000
Christians	6,200	8,600	0.3	2.25	10,400	11,600
Roman Catholics	6,200	4,500	0.1	0.00	5,000	5,000
Independents	0	2,000	0.1	5.87	2,500	3,000
Anglicans	0	1,000	0.0	5.15	1,500	2,000
Agnostics	600	3,400	0.1	4.90	5,000	8,000
Baha'is	100	340	0.0	2.87	500	1,000
Atheists	0	280	0.0	2.90	500	700
Total population	1,150,000	3,363,000	100.0	2.92	4,548,000	6,364,000

churches (mostly Catholic) now exist in Nouakchott, Atar, Zouirat, Nouadhibou, and Rosso. The expatriate community of Christians and the few citizens who are considered Christians from birth practice their religion without government interference and may possess Bibles and other Christian religious materials in their homes.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; Shadhiliyya Sufi Order; Tijaniyya Sufi Order.

References

- Pazzanita, Anthony. Historical Dictionary of Mauritania. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2008.
- Sakho, M. A. La littérature religieuse mauritanienne. Nouakchott, Mauritania: Imprimerie Nouvelle, 1986.
- Status of Christianity Profile: Mauritania*. Nairobi, Kenya: Daystar University College, 1988.
- Stewart, C. C., with E. K. Stewart. Islam and Social Order in Mauritania: A Case Study from the Nineteenth Century. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983.

■ Mauritius

Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean east of Madagascar, was uninhabited until it was settled by the Portuguese in the 1500s. The independent nation of the same name now includes this island and several nearby islands, the largest of which is Rodriguez Island. Together the islands have 784 square miles of land, which are home to 1,280,000 people.

Abandoned by the Portuguese, Mauritius was resettled in 1598 by the Dutch, who gave it its name. The French recolonized it in 1715, and the British won control in 1814 as part of their prize after the defeat of Napoleon. By 1835, when slavery was abolished, Africans constituted 70 percent of the population. To deal with the labor shortage after the abolition of slavery, sugar plantation owners turned to India. Over the next century almost half a million Indians from Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh in southern India and from various spots in northern India entered the country as indentured servants. They eventually constituted the majority of the island's population, by latest count some 68 percent.

Hinduism is now the dominant religion of Mauritius. The Indian immigrants brought with them the spectrum of traditional Hindu beliefs and practices and have established both Vaishnavism and Shaivism throughout the country. There are also a large number of adherents of the Arya Samaj, a 19th-century reform movement that has found an affinity with American Unitarianism. Most Arya Samaj members have northern Indian heritage.

In the 20th century, a variety of new Hindu movements appeared in Mauritius. The country was an early home of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, an American movement with roots in

MAURITIUS

Bengali devotional (bhakti) yoga. There is also a group attached to the Vedanta Societies/Ramakrishna Math and Mission, also based in Bengal.

The Indians also brought Islam with them. Muslims constitute about 16 percent of the Mauritian population, the great majority being Sunni Muslims of the Hanafite School. There are also Sunnis of the Shafiite school, some Shias, and a few Ismailis, affiliated with the Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyabi Dawoodi Bohra. The largest dissenting group are the Ahmadiyahs, not recognized as orthodox Muslims by the rest of the community.

Christianity was established on Mauritius following the colonization by the French. The Lazarist Fathers, a Catholic order, arrived in 1722. They surrendered their work to the Benedictines in 1819, following the change of political control from France to Great Britain. At the same time, a vicariate was established that included Madagascar, South Africa, and Australia, with Port Louis, the Mauritian capital, as its center. Port Louis was named a diocese in 1852. The Roman Catholic Church is the largest Christian body on the island of Mauritius and claims the allegiance of most of the residents of Rodrigues Island as well.

The Church of England initiated work on Mauritius in 1810 and remains the largest Protestant church. In the 20th century the Church of England granted autonomy to its overseas affiliates and the Mauritian parishes are now part of the Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean. Mauritius has been set aside as a diocese. The archbishop resides in the Seychelles. Shortly after the Church of England was established in Mauritius, missionaries from the London Missionary Society arrived. Their work fed the development of the Church of Scotland, a Presbyterian body. In the mid-19th century, the Church of the New Jerusalem also began a mission, now related to the General Church of the New Jerusalem.

Through the 20th century, a number of Protestant and Free church groups began work, including the Assemblies of God, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Jehovah's Witnesses. The Adventists entered

Mauritius

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Hindus	379,000	551,000	42.7	0.91	573,000	539,000
Christians	297,000	435,000	33.7	0.93	476,000	504,000
Roman Catholics	280,000	334,000	25.9	1.79	329,000	336,000
Protestants	5,900	105,000	8.1	4.15	140,000	160,000
Independents	1,300	9,000	0.7	4.56	11,000	13,000
Muslims	132,000	217,000	16.8	0.92	238,000	245,000
Agnostics	1,600	33,500	2.6	0.92	50,000	70,000
Baha'is	6,500	24,800	1.9	0.92	35,000	50,000
Chinese folk	1,600	17,300	1.3	0.92	19,000	20,000
Buddhists	5,800	3,200	0.2	0.92	3,500	3,500
Sikhs	0	3,000	0.2	0.92	3,400	3,600
Ethnoreligionists	0	2,600	0.2	0.91	2,800	3,000
Atheists	400	1,600	0.1	0.92	2,500	4,000
New religionists	100	750	0.1	0.90	1,000	1,500
Total population	824,000	1,289,000	100.0	0.92	1,404,000	1,444,000

Mauritius in 1914, and their Mauritius Conference, now part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission, is now the third largest Christian body on the island.

Other religious groups that have formed congregations on the islands include the Baha'i Faith; the Church of Christ, Scientist; the Christadelphians; and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS). Since its entrance in 1995, the LDS has built a thriving branch now connected to the South Africa Durban Mission.

The ethnic and religious pluralism on Mauritius has dictated the necessity of interreligious contact, and an interreligious committee has functioned for many years. The country's Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, including the freedom to propagate one's religious views to others. Registered religious groups receive some support from state funds.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Arya Samaj; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Benedictines; Christadelphians; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scotland; Church of the Province of the Indian Ocean; General Church of the New Jerusalem, The; Hanafite School of Islam; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Ismaili Islam; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shaivism; Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyabi Dawoodi Bohra; Vaishnavism; Vedanta Societies.

References

- Eisenlohr, Patrick. Little India: Diaspora, Time, and Ethnolinguistic Belonging in Hindu Mauritius. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- Emrith, M. History of Muslims in Mauritius. Vacoas, Mauritius: Editions Le Printemps, 1994.
- Hazareesingh, K. The Religion and Culture of Indian Immigrants in Mauritius and the Effect of Social Change. Port Louis, Mauritius: Indian Cultural Association, 1966.
- Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.
- Naqapen, Amei dei n. The Indian Christian Community in Mauritius. Port-Louis, Mauritius: Roman Catholic Diocese of Port-Louis, 1984.
- Selvon, S., and L. Rivière. Historical Dictionary of Mauritius. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1991.

Mayan Calendar

In the 1990s, an obscure calendar from ancient Meso-America gained some importance among followers of

Calendar from the Mayan civilization, which thrived during the 3rd to 10th centuries, was highly accurate and based on complex mathematical and astronomical calculations. (Corel)

Western Esotericism. The importance of the Mayan calendar was initially proposed by art historian José Argüelles (b. 1939) in his 1987 book, The Mayan Factor: Path Beyond Technology. The unexpected success of The Mayan Factor among followers of the New Age led him to put out a new calendar for their use, a 13 Moon/28 Day Calendar focused on phases of the Moon, which many New Agers had begun to follow. This calendar runs from July 26 to July 24 of the following year, a total of 364 days. July 25 is left as a “Day out of Time.” Argüelles attempted to synchronize his calendar with the Mayan calendar, while drawing on other non-Mayan sources, and make it available to modern people who otherwise live by the Common Era calendar (the modern revised Gregorian calendar used by most countries as the 21st century begins). His work was highly criticized by his scholarly colleagues, though those criticisms were usually ignored by his New Age audience. Through the several organizations he founded, the Planet Art Network and the Foundation for the Law of Time, he has continued to speculate on the calendar and its modern spiritual and metaphysical implications.

Even before Argüelles, however, speculation concerning the Mayan calendar was made by Michael D. Coe, who in his 1966 book The Maya offered the suggestion, in passing, that civilization might end on December 24, 2011. In later editions he revised the date to the now familiar December 23, 2012. The idea was discussed by Frank Waters in his Mexico Mystique: The Coming Sixth Age of Consciousness (1975) and again mentioned briefly by Argüelles in both The Trans- formative Vision (1975) and The Mayan Factor (1987), but the idea was largely forgotten in the 1990s with the New Age movement in sharp decline.

Then after 20 years of neglect, Daniel Pinchbeck revived speculation about the Mayan calendar and the 2012 date while linking them to a wide variety of beliefs surrounding UFOs, though his best-selling 2006 book 2012: The Return of Quetzalcoatl was essentially based on his own experiments with mood-altering substances and channeling. He also tempered Michel Coe's original apocalyptic predictions and proposed a shift from materialistic to spiritual consciousness in its stead. By the time Pinchbeck's book appeared, the most popular prophetic Esoteric text of the 1990s, James Redfield's The Celestine Prophecy, appeared to have faded in popularity, and within a short time a host of new books appeared discussing and offering alternative speculation about what, if anything, would occur in December of 2012.

While the literature on 2012 generally refers to the Mayan calendar, the Mayans actually had three calendars. Two of these calendars were the Haab' and the Tzolk'in. The Haab' was the 365-day political calendar. It consists of 18 20-day divisions, plus a 5-day period added at the end of the year. These last five days, having been added to bring the year close to the solar year, were to some degree out of the system and viewed as unlucky and unfortunate. The Haab' started at the Winter Solstice and marked out the planning for an agricultural year.

The Haab' was combined with the Tzolk'in, the 260-day religious ceremonial calendar. At the beginning of the Mayan cycle, the Haab' and Tzolk'in would begin running side by side simultaneously. When the Tzolk'in ran out, it would simply begin again. It took 52 years for the Tzolk'in to once again end and begin at the Winter Solstice as did the Haab'. The 52-year cycle would operate for the culture's needs and most concerns, as very few lived to be more than 52 years old. The combined Haab'-Tzolk'in calendars named but did not number the years.

For the recording of events more than 52 years ago, a third calendar was employed, the so-called Long Count calendar. It is this calendar around which modern prophetic speculation has gathered. The Long Count begins counting years from what most believe to be the Mayans' date for creation, which would be August 11, 3114 BCE in the Common Era calendar used in most countries today. The Long Count calendar runs for 5,125 years and hence will run out in 2012 and start over again.

The 2012 date has been correlated with a variety of facts. Some have suggested, for example, that in 2012 the plane of the Solar System will line up exactly with the plane of the Milky Way, thus completing a wobble cycle that takes 5 times the 5,125 years of the Mayan calendar, or approximately 26,000 years.

Prophecies concerning 2012 vary from anticipations of catastrophe to hopes for positive social change and large-scale spiritual transformation for individuals. The expected changes vary from the visible and disruptive alternation of social and natural structures to the invisible and hence difficult to detect changes in human consciousness.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Western Esoteric Tradition; Winter Solstice.

References

- Argüelles, José. The Mayan Factor: Path Beyond Technology. Rutland, VT: Inner Traditions/Bear & Company, 1987.
- Braden, Greg. The Mystery of 2012: Predictions, Prophecies and Possibilities. Louisville, CO: Sounds True, Incorporated, 2009.
- Coe, Michael D. The Maya. London: Thames & Hudson, 1966, 1987.
- Miller, Mary, and Karl Taube. The Gods and Symbols of Ancient Mexico and the Maya: An Illustrated Dictionary of Mesoamerican Religion. London: Thames & Hudson, 1993.
- Schele, Linda, and David Freidel. A Forest of Kings: The Untold Story of the Ancient Maya. New York: William Morrow, 1990.
- Pinchbeck, Daniel. 2012: The Return of Quetzalcoatl. Tarcher, 2006.
- Pinchbeck, Daniel, and Ken Jordan, eds. Toward 2012: Perspectives on the Next Age. Tarcher, 2009.
- Sanderford, Susan K. What's Up With 2012? Scotts Valley, CA: CreateSpace, 2008.

■ Mayotte

Mayotte, an island in the Mozambique Channel between Madagascar and Mozambique, has traditionally been considered part of the Comoro Islands. It became the center of French culture during several centuries of French rule. In 1974, when the Comoros Islanders decided to become independent of French rule, the residents of Mayotte voted to remain connected to France. France had established both a naval and an air base on the island. Today, some 216,000 people live on the island’s 144 square miles of land.

Meanwhile, the status of the island remains a matter of intense dispute. France has refused to back away from its control of the island in spite of a United Nations resolution in 1991 recognizing the Comoros’s claim to the land. The Comoros Islands’ claim has been affected by its political instability.

Prior to 1975, Mayotte shares a common history with the Comoro Islands. Both are overwhelmingly Muslim, most residents being Shafaiite Sunnis. However, the Christian presence in Mayotte is stronger than it is in the Comoros, especially since the expulsion of Protestant missionaries there in 1978. The Roman Catholic Church is the largest Christian body, its work being attached to the Diocese of Ambanja (Madagascar). There are only a few thousand members.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Shafite School of Islam.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Beslar, J. “An Ethnography of the Mahorais (Mayotte, Camaro Islands).” Ph.D. diss., University of Pittsburgh, 1981.
- Headley, Stephen. Islamic Prayer Across the Indian Ocean: Inside and Outside the Mosque. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2000.
- Lambek, Michael. Knowledge and Practice in Mayotte: Local Discourses of Islam, Sorcery and

Mayotte

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	42,600	128,000	98.5	2.46	185,000	338,000
Christians	360	940	0.7	1.52	1,100	1,200
Roman Catholics	260	500	0.4	1.90	500	500
Protestants	100	200	0.2	0.00	250	300
Marginals	0	120	0.1	0.00	150	200
Ethnoreligionists	0	580	0.4	2.49	700	900
Agnostics	0	350	0.3	5.69	600	1,200
Atheists	0	50	0.0	2.44	100	200
Total population	43,000	130,000	100.0	2.46	187,000	342,000

Spirit Possession. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993.

Mazdaznan

Mazdaznan is a form of neo-Zoroastrianism which, although declining, is still present in several Western countries. Otto Hanisch (1844–1936), later known under the pen name of Otoman Zar-Adusht Ha'nish, was born in 1844, probably in Teheran, to a Russian father and a German mother. His place of birth was later disputed, and nothing certain is known about his life until he surfaced in 1900 in Chicago. There, he claimed to have been initiated while in Iran (or Tibet) into a mysterious Zoroastrian order. He quickly gathered a number of American followers and in 1917 established, in California, an organization known as Mazdaznan. Among the early followers were Maud Meacham (1879–1959) and Swiss-born David Ammann (1855–1923), the latter being instrumental in spreading Mazdaznan into Europe. Hanisch died in 1936, and his successors are known as Electors.

While Mazdaznan led a comparatively quiet existence in the United States, it became quite controversial in Europe. Critics claimed that Mazdaznan was not a genuinely Zoroastrian religion, putting great stress on Hanisch's idiosyncrasies. Because of his ideas about the Aryan race, Hanisch was accused in several European countries of being racist and anti-Semitic, although he was also critical of Nazism. In fact, the Mazdaznan organization was banned in Nazi Germany as early as 1935.

Crucial to Mazdaznan philosophy is the idea of reconverting Earth into a garden, where God will converse and cooperate with humans. Breathing exercises are also very important, and in fact this practice spread from Mazdaznan to a number of other groups, in German-speaking Europe particularly. Also popular were Mazdaznan songs and ideas about food and diet, which attracted a number of medical doctors to the movement.

The Mazdaznan movement declined steadily through the last half of the 20th century, and as of 2008 no longer has any public presence. Neither the website of the German section (<http://www.mazdaznan.de>) nor the former American headquarters (<http://www.mazdaznan.org>) is active. No activity appears to be carried out any longer from the Bonita address, where Mazdaznan remains legally incorporated.

Mazdaznan
4364 Bonita Rd., #617
Bonita, CA 91902-1421

Mazdaznan Canada
94 Autumn Place
St. Catharines, ON
Canada L2P 3W8
<http://www.mazdaznan.ca/cart/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Vegetarianism; Zoroastrianism.

References

- Ha'nish, Otoman Zar-Adusht. Avesta in Songs. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1946.
- Ha'nish, Otoman Zar-Adusht. God and Man United. A Study of the Evolution of Religion from 10,000 B.C. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1975.
- Ha'nish, Otoman Zar-Adusht. The Philosophy of Mazdaznan. Los Angeles: Mazdaznan Press, 1960.

Mecca

Mecca, a city of modern Saudi Arabia, is the geographical center of Islam. The significance of Mecca is based on its being the site of the first shrine built to worship God by Adam and Eve, and the acceptance by Ibrahim (Abraham) to sacrifice his son Ismail were this to be the will of God. It is also the ancestral home of the Prophet Muhammad and so a symbol of his faithfulness to God and to delivering the divine message. It is the site of the annual hajj, or pilgrimage ritual, in Islam, and is situated in the Hejaz region of what is today Saudi Arabia. It is the direction toward which Muslims pray and a city that has always been involved in pilgrimages of one sort or another. Vast numbers go on pilgrimage today, and the management of the pilgrimage is a major operation and the responsibility of the Saudi government.

This 19th-century engraving shows the Kaaba at Mecca, in present-day Saudi Arabia. The Kaaba is a shrine that houses the Black Stone of Mecca, the focal point for Muslim prayer and final destination for pilgrims to Mecca. (John Clark Ridpath, Ridpath's History of the World, 1901)

Mecca is the site of the Great Mosque in the midst of which is the Kaaba, a black stone said to have been an altar created by Ibrahim and Ismail to worship the one God. This pure monotheism was weakened subsequently by the importation of local deities into the site, which became the center of pilgrimage of Arab tribes. The Quraysh tribe was the dominant force in the city and controlled much of the pilgrimage business, although the extent to which the city was an important economic hub in the spice trade is now controversial. The clan from which Muhammad came, the Hashimites, remained the de facto rulers of the city for a long time, even under the Ottoman Empire, but they were overturned twice subsequently by the Wahhabis, who were supported by the al-Saud family, and eventually Mecca was incorporated into what is today Saudi Arabia. The Saudis are responsible for looking after the two religious sites of Mecca and Medina and organizing the tremendous inflow of pilgrims on the hajj and umra. Although Mecca has a tremendous religious significance in Islam, it has never been particularly important politically. Even at the time of the Prophet his main base was Medina not Mecca, and during the various Islamic empires the center of power was always in a capital city far from the Hejaz, in which Mecca is situated. It was largely a center of the pilgrimage and also of scholarship since many pious Muslims stayed there after their pilgrimage, although it has to be said that even in the pursuit of the Islamic sciences Mecca has remained a backwater until recently, the main intellectual centers generally being elsewhere.

The valley in which Mecca lies is called Becca, sometimes linked with the Arabic word tabakka, which refers to people crowding together and a lack of water. Baka means lamenting, and the local conditions are indeed harsh, with long dry periods being interrupted by sudden and very damaging floods. We are told in the Koran that the first house of God was built there (3:96). It became the qiblah, the direction in which Muslims should pray, but initially Jerusalem fulfilled this role, until a later revelation changed the direction.

The hajj is the pilgrimage to Mecca, compulsory for every adult Muslim who can undertake it once in a lifetime (3:91). It takes place in the month of Dhul Hijjah, 70 days after Ramadan. The pilgrimage celebrates three events: the forgiveness and reunion of Adam and Eve, Ibrahim's willingness to sacrifice his son Ismail, and the obedience of the Prophet Muhammad. Adam and Eve were reunited on the plain of Arafat and they are said to have built the Kaaba shrine to worship the one God. It is made of black granite and is now covered with a black cloth with Arabic calligraphy on it. The shrine was rebuilt by Ibrahim to commemorate both the dream he had when he was told to sacrifice his son Ismail to God and the overcoming of Satan. In the end Ibrahim instead sacrificed a ram to God, the origin of the Eid al-Adha festival at the end of the hajj during which sheep are slaughtered. It was here that Ismail and his mother were desperate for water and the Zam Zam spring appeared to save them from death. The water from this spring is still collected today and given to pilgrims, and sent to other parts of the world also. All these events occurred and are commemorated now in the vicinity or actually in Mecca.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Abraham/Abram; Eid al-Adha; Medina; Muhammad; Pilgrimage; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Crone, Patricia. Meccan Trade and the Rise of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.
- Hammoudi, Abdellah. A Season in Mecca: Narrative of a Pilgrimage. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2006.

Wheeler, Brannon. Mecca and Eden: Ritual, Relics, and Territory in Islam. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006.

Medicine Buddha's Birthday

The Medicine Buddha (Bhaisajya-guru or in Japan, Yakushi-nyorai) is the bodhisattva most known as a healing force in the Mahayana Buddhist tradition. According to Buddhist teachings, prior to attaining enlightenment, Medicine Master made 12 vows to cure all illnesses and lead all people to enlightenment. The circumstances of the making of the vows are revealed in the Medicine Master Sutra, which also speaks of the benefits to be offered to believers who invoke Medicine Buddha's name.

Medicine Buddha is charged with healing all diseases in the sick as well as any deficiencies of wisdom we might have. He is often depicted with the attending bodhisattvas Sunlight (on his left) and Moonlight (on his right) who lead the cadre of bodhisattvas that surround Medicine Buddha. His body is transparent, and he is pictured as wearing a monastic robe and as seated with his legs crossed. His left hand lies in his lap and usually holds the medicine bowl while his right hand forms the charity mudra and holds either a branch with fruit, or just the fruit of the myrobalan, a medicinal plant found in India and other tropical countries. His birthday is celebrated on the 22nd day of the 8th lunar month.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Calendar, Religious; Mudras.

References

- Boheng, Wu, and Cai Zhuozhi. 100 Buddhas in Chinese Buddhism. Trans. by Mu Xin and Yan Zhi. Singapore: Asiapac Books, 1997.
- Vessantara. Meeting the Buddhas: A Guide to Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric Deities. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse Publications, 1998.

Medicine Wheel (Wyoming)

Located high on a peak in the Bighorn Range in Wyoming, Medicine Wheel is an ancient Native American ritual site made of stones laid in a circular pattern, some 80 feet in diameter. At the center of the circle is a horseshoe-shaped cairn, about 12 feet in diameter and 2 feet in height. The central cairn is connected to the outside circle of stones by 28 lines of stones, giving the overall site a resemblance to a modern bicycle wheel. In addition, around the outer ring of stones are six additional unevenly spaced cairns.

The Medicine Wheel is located at a 9,642-foot elevation and is accessible only the 2 warmest summer months. It has been dated to as early as 10,000 BCE or as late as 1700 CE. Since its discovery by European Americans, it has been used and maintained by various groups to the present. The wheel is now seen as an integral part of other sites in the mountainous West, especially the more than 100 wheels that have been found in South Dakota, Wyoming, Montana, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. Near the wheel, at lower altitudes, are a number of sites used for different Native ceremonies, from vision quests to sweat lodges.

Archaeological explorations of the site suggest that the central cairn is the oldest element in the present site. It possibly has at times supported a central pole. In 1974, Jack Eddy opened archaeo-astronomical studies of the site. The placement of the cairns suggested an alignment toward the rising and setting sun at the Summer Solstice. He also checked the alignments with a variety of stars associated with the solstice. He found the cairns marked the rising points of the stars Aldebaran, Rigel, and Sirius, which are known to play important roles in both Cheyenne and Lakota mythology.

In addition, Jack Robinson, an astronomer who visited the site, found an alignment with the rising star Fomalhaut, some 28 days before the solstice, a possible rationale for the 28 “spokes” of the wheel. The rising of Fomalhaut would give people a month’s warning of the approaching Summer Solstice. Thus it has been hypothesized that, from about 1200 to 1700 CE, possibly best dates for the circle’s construction, that Fomalhaut, Aldebaran, Rigel, and Sirius could have identified the season on the mountain with Fomalhaut rising 28 days and Aldebaran 2 days prior to Summer Solstice, and Rigel rising 28 days after the solstice, and Sirius 28 additional days later, the true end of summer.

In the last generation, the site has enjoyed increasing use by Native Americans across a range of tribal affiliations. Since 1988, two Native organizations, the Medicine Wheel Alliance and the Medicine Wheel Coalition for Sacred Places, have worked with government agencies to preserve the site as sacred space and limit any development of the area. The Forest Service especially had projected improvements that allow greater access. An agreement signed in 1996 between Native Americans and a spectrum of government agencies recognizes Medicine Mountain, and the peak upon which the Wheel rests, as sacred space and radically limits tourist development and any foresting or mining. Twenty-four days each summer, the site will be exclusively for Native ritual use. Most recently, the site has been cordoned off to prevent its deterioration. Native groups have worked to have as large an area around the site as possible declared as protected territory.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Summer Solstice.

References

- Hirschfelder, Arlene, and Paulette Molin. Encyclopedia of Native American Religions. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Magli, Giulio. Mysteries and Discoveries of Archaeoastronomy: From Giza to Easter Island. New York: Springer, 2009.
- Stanford Solar Center. “Bighorn Medicine Wheel.” <http://solar-center.stanford.edu/AO/bighorn.html>. Accessed July 15, 2009.
- Wikliamson, Ray. Living the Sky: The Cosmos of the American Indian. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1987.

Medinah

Medinah was the city to which the Prophet Muhammad retreated when rejected initially by his hometown of Mecca. He built his power base there, and the first mosque, and from there launched his eventually successful campaign to overcome the opposition in Mecca. The Islamic calendar starts with his journey to Medinah and it is today a secondary site of pilgrimage after Mecca, containing important tombs such as those of the Prophet himself, his daughter Fatimah, and the first two caliphs. It is closed to non-Muslims.

Lithograph of people entering the mosque of Medinah, the site of the tomb of Muhammad and the second most holy city of Islam after the spiritual capital, Mecca. (Library of Congress)

About 200 miles north of Mecca is Medinah, originally called Yathrib, which was a significant city at the time of the Prophet Muhammad. In Arabic “madinah” just means “city” and perhaps it acquired this label because it was the first site of Islamic political power, and indeed Muhammad’s arrival in the city constitutes the start of the Islamic calendar. The city is sometimes called Medinat al-Nabi (the city of the Prophet) or Medinat al-munawwarah (the radiant city). Muhammad moved there when driven out of Mecca and found the city a more welcoming environment for the message he was transmitting, although not without difficulties in the form of its stubborn Jewish population who were resistant to Islam. We are told that the Constitution of Medinah was written to formulate an agreement between the Muslims and the existing communities in the area, in particular the Jews, and for some time an uneasy peace resulted. When hostilities eventually broke out with the Meccans the Jews were taken to have sided with the enemy of the Muslims and were entirely wiped out in the area, as far as we can tell, destroying any significant opposition to the new Islamic movement.

Medinah is important today for its sites, in particular the Mosque of the Prophet where he is buried and also the grave of the first two caliphs, Abu Bakr and Umar, and the Prophet’s daughter Fatimah, and is very much on the pilgrimage route of Muslims when they go on the hajj to Mecca. There are said to be other tombs there, of the Prophet’s grandson Hasan and the caliph Uthman. The rather elaborate tombs were destroyed by the Saudis; the Wahhabi theology on which the regime is based disapproves of praying at graves and the associated rituals. The first mosque ever built is also there, the Quba Mosque, although it has gone through many changes over time.

Medinah is in a much more favorable part of the Hejaz, with water and surrounded by a plain. It is surrounded by a substantial wall that originates in the 12th century CE and there is also a castle and four gates, of which the Bab al-salam is the most remarkable in design. The city has many houses and gardens, benefiting from the availability of water, and more industrial and technological activities than the other holy city, Mecca. Non-Muslims are not supposed to go to either city, but the exclusion zone in Medinah is far narrower than in Mecca.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Mecca; Mosques; Muhammad; Pilgrimage.

References

- Ali Kazuyoshi, Nomachi, and Seyyad Hossein Nasr. Mecca the Blessed, Medina the Radiant: The Holiest Cities of Islam. New York: Aperture, 1997.
- Dutton, Yasin, Malik ibn Anas, and Muhammad ibn Muhammad Ra’i. Original Islam: Malik and the Madhhab of Madina. New York: Routledge, 2007.

Esin, Emel, and Haluk Doganbey. Mecca the Blessed, Madinah the Radiant. New York: Crown Publishers, 1963.

Lekker, Michael. "Muhammad at Medina, a Geographical Approach." Jerusalem Studies in Arabic 6 (1985): 29–62.

Meditation

The word "meditation" has two distinct meanings. The first refers to philosophical thinking or deliberation that focuses on a particular topic or question, usually of deep existential or metaphysical import (as in the philosopher Descartes' Cartesian Meditations). In the second meaning, meditation does not engage the thinking process but, on the contrary, seeks to disengage it. To avoid confusion between the two, the second is sometimes called contemplation. Meditation understood as contemplation is relevant to religious and spiritual practices and will be elaborated upon here. Meditation in this meaning refers to dwelling in a state of consciousness with a single-pointed focus or dwelling in a state of alertness or wakefulness without a particular focus. It also refers to various practices developed for stilling the mind and bringing about these states of consciousness. Meditation practices as we know them today originated in religious contexts, as part of spiritual disciplines designed to help aspirants realize the spiritual goals envisioned by their religions. Today, increasing numbers of people practice some form of meditation, either for spiritual or religious reasons or for other reasons such as general health and well being.

Meditation in the Major Religious Traditions and in Contemporary Life All the major religious traditions of the world as well as many indigenous religions have developed some form of meditation practices. These vary greatly depending on the cultural context and the purposes assigned to them by the traditions. The common religious objective in all meditation practices is to alter the aspirant's everyday consciousness in which the mind is crowded by thoughts and images and driven by desires and anxieties to a mode in which it is more receptive to and capable of realizing the spiritual goals affirmed by his or her religion.

Meditating Indian guru. (Corel)

In monotheistic Western religions (Christianity, Islam, Judaism), God is usually conceived as being ultimately separate from humans, and consequently the highest spiritual goal for human beings is a union (not necessarily oneness) with God. Accordingly, meditation practices in these traditions developed out of the practice of prayer and are designed to deepen the aspirant's devotion and unwavering attention to God. They may consist of chants or repetitions of single words or visualizations that employ images or symbols of God. Contemplative prayers help the aspirant dwell in the qualities of God (such as all-knowing, loving, and merciful). Individuals who seek surrender to God as their life's foremost goal are called mystics in these traditions, and they typically utilize meditation practices along with other practices such as abstinences and privations to attain as direct a connection with God as is possible within the context of their religious beliefs.

Asian religions (Buddhism, Hinduism) tend to conceive of God as ultimately not separate from humans, though many of them acknowledge the presence and importance of God or gods. Meditation practices that are devotional in nature and similar to those in the monotheistic religions abound in these traditions. Additionally, these traditions have elaborate and systematically developed techniques for cultivating the aspirants' mental and spiritual capacities so they may realize God or ultimate reality within their own innermost being. These techniques have had a considerable influence on contemporary Western spirituality, perhaps because they can be relatively easily extracted from their cultural and religious contexts and adapted to contemporary Western cultural and spiritual life.

Meditation has established itself as one of the most important elements in new and contemporary forms of spirituality and also as part of the evolving practices aimed at promoting general health and well being. Beginning in the 1960s in Western popular culture, a variety of meditation practices have been loosely adapted from the Asian and Western Esoteric and to a lesser extent from the Christian and Jewish mystical traditions to fit contemporary lifestyles in which personal meaning and experience is greatly valued. Individuals who embrace traditional Western religions also use meditation to enhance their personal and experiential connection to the beliefs and values of their religion. In addition to these spiritual and religious contexts, contemporary medicine and health science has taken interest in the research and application of meditation.

Types of Meditation Practice Meditation is commonly practiced by sitting still on a cushion or a chair, but it can also be practiced by standing, walking, or lying down. Some practices employ visual imagery and suggestion, as in guided imagery. Most meditation practices that do not involve suggestion fall into one or the other of two basic types, concentrative or opening up, or some combination of the two.

Guided imagery practices may be done individually or in groups with the help of a meditation teacher, guide, or pre-recorded instructions that take the participants on a journey within their minds. The images and meanings suggested typically help calm and soothe the mind and also provide positive affirmations for health and well being. Guided imagery can be done sitting up or lying down, and the effort involved is in following the guidance provided. It is more structured than other types of meditation and for this reason accessible to a wider range of people, including those with health problems and disabilities.

Concentrative meditation, as well as the others described in the sequel, is usually done sitting on a chair or on a cushion with legs folded. Attention is focused on a single object, usually a sound (often referred to by the Sanskrit term mantra) or a visual object (yantra) such as a concentric image (mandala), an image of a deity, or the flame of a candle. The object may also be a natural process such as breathing. Whenever attention veers off of the meditation object, the practitioner brings it back to the object. The objectives of concentrative meditation include calming and stilling the mind and the development of one-pointed concentration and the capacity to abide in whatever the state that is being cultivated. Very deep concentration, which usually requires much practice, can lead to blissful states of stillness called samadhi. They may involve experiences of oneness with God or reality—the so-called supramundane states (dhyana) the Buddha is said to have experienced while practicing with the yogis with whom he lived in the forest before his enlightenment. In the Hindu tradition, Patanjali's Yoga-Sutras is a manual par excellence for concentrative meditation and for cultivating samadhi.

In opening-up meditation, the objective is to relax the narrow focus of intentional consciousness and allow it to open up into a spacious awareness that focuses on nothing in particular yet extends to everything within and around the practitioner without limit. In Zen, the practice of "just sitting," or shikantaza, is an example of this type of practice. In Tibetan Buddhism and in other traditions a practice that focuses on the open, limitless sky as the object of meditation is designed to develop this type of expanded, spacious awareness.

The best known meditation practices in the West derive from those developed in the Theravada Buddhist tradition and are known as vipassana, or insight meditation. Original descriptions of these can be found in two texts that are part of the Pali canon and are attributed to the historical Buddha. These are the Anapana-Sati and the Satipatthana Sutta. In the Buddha's time, apparently the aspirants began their training with concentrative practices called samatha, and only after developing their skill in abiding with concentrative meditation would they take up opening-up practices called vipassana, in which the aspirant practices mindful attention without selective focus.

Contemporary forms of vipassana taught both in Asia and in the West combine elements of samatha and vipassana, with the practitioner focusing on a process that naturally occurs within his or her body and/or mind as a meditation object. Such natural processes include the flow of air around the nostrils or the rising and falling of the abdomen as one breathes, sensations coursing through the body, and the arising and passing of thoughts or mental images within the mind. In concentrative meditation one attempts to still the mind by restricting the movement of thoughts and images, whereas in the combined form attention is returned to the chosen process again and again but is allowed to freely move within its confines. In pure opening-up type of meditation the freedom of the mind's movement is unlimited and attention can easily get lost in thought, whereas in the combined form the restriction of the movement to the process chosen as the object of meditation serves as an anchor for attention.

The objective of vipassana is to cultivate non-reactive openness, or “equanimity,” toward whatever happens during the meditation and clear attention that does not get lost in the content of thoughts and images. The cultivation of these qualities in turn enhances the practitioner's capacity for insight into the nature of phenomena, including his or her own thought patterns and emotional reactions. For this reason, vipassana is also referred to as “insight meditation.” The major Asian sources for vipassana practice in the West are the Theravada Buddhist traditions in Burma (Myanmar) and Thailand, and many first-generation Western meditation teachers trained with masters from these traditions during the 1960s and 1970s.

Meditation in Contemporary Life The apparent neutrality of vipassana and other Buddhist meditation practices with respect to religious or metaphysical beliefs has allowed their techniques to be adopted not only by Christian and other non-Buddhist religious practitioners but by those within the secular scientific community as well. The therapeutic benefits of vipassana have been recognized in contemporary medicine, and during the 1980s and 1990s the techniques of this meditation approach have been modified and developed into easily accessible forms that do not require knowledge or acceptance of the larger Buddhist worldview or beliefs. These include mindfulness-based stress reduction (MBSR), developed by Jon Kabat-Zinn for treatment of chronic pain and stress, and acceptance and commitment therapy (ACT) developed by Stephen Hayes and colleagues. Modified vipassana practices have also been successfully integrated into cognitive-behavioral therapy—the most commonly employed therapeutic approach today to mental and emotional disorders such as depression and anxiety. Known as mindfulness-based cognitive-behavioral therapy (MBCT), this therapy was developed by Mark Williams, Zindel Segal, and John Teasdale.

The effectiveness of MBSR, ACT, and MBCT in comparison with other treatment modalities has been extensively researched. Research has also pinpointed the basis of their effectiveness increasingly precisely, as having to do with the development of what psychologists call “meta-cognitive awareness” through mindfulness practice. Such awareness allows the practitioner to recognize thoughts in the moment that they arise in his or her mind as simply thoughts and thus remain unaffected by their content or meaning. Depression and anxiety are typically fueled by negative thought content in which patients suffering from these conditions get absorbed. Meta-cognitive awareness developed through mindfulness practice can help patients break free of such absorption and the associated tendency to relapse into depression or anxiety.

Kaisa Puhakka

See also: Asceticism; Buddha, Gautama; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Vipassana International Academy; Yoga; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Beck, Charlotte J. Everyday Zen: Love and Work. New York: HarperCollins, 2007.
- Das, Lama Surya. Awakening the Buddha Within: Tibetan Wisdom for the Western World. New York: Broadway Books, 1998.
- Davich, Victor. Eight Minute Meditation: Quiet Your Mind, Change Your Life. New York: The Berkeley Publishing Group 2006

- Feuerstein, Georg. The Yoga-sutra of Patanjali: A New Translation and Commentary. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions International, 1989.
- Goldstein, Joseph. Insight Meditation: The Practice of Freedom. Boston: Shambhala, 2003.
- Hart, William. Vipassana Meditation as Taught by S. N. Goenka. New York: Harper & Row, 1987.
- Hayes, Steven C., Victoria M. Follette, and Marsha M. Linehan, eds. Mindfulness and Acceptance: Expanding the Cognitive Behavioral Tradition. New York: Guilford Press, 2004.
- Kabat-Zinn, Jon. Wherever You Go, There You Are: Mindfulness Meditation in Everyday Life. New York: Hyperion, 1995.
- Khema, Ayya. Being Nobody, Going Nowhere. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1987.
- Kornfield, Jack, and Paul Breiter. A Still Forest Pool: The Insight Meditation of Achaan Chah. Wheaton, IL: Quest Books, 1993.
- Laird, Martin. Into the Silent Land: A Guide to the Christian Practice of Contemplation. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Mendenhall, Sarah. Guided Imagery Meditation: The Artistry of Words. Bloomington, IN: AuthorHouse, 2008.
- Mund, Todd. Christian Growth through Contemplation. Lincoln, NE: iUniverse, Inc., 2003.
- Nhat Hahn, Thich. Breathe, You Are Alive: The Sutra on the Full Awareness of Breathing. New York: Parallax Press, 1990.
- Nhat Hahn, Thich. The Miracle of Mindfulness. Boston: Beacon Press, 1987.
- Roehmer, Elizabeth, and Susan Orsillo. Mindfulness and Acceptance-based Behavioral Therapies in Practice. New York: Coleman Barks, 1995.
- Rossmann, Martin L. Guided Imagery for Self-healing. Publishers Group West, 2000.
- Sekida, Katsuki. Zen Training: Methods and Philosophy. Boston: Shambhala, 1985.
- Taimni, I. K. The Science of Yoga: Translation and Commentary on Patanjali's Yoga Sutra. Wheaton, IL: Quest Books, 1981.
- Underhill, Evelyn. Mysticism: A Study in the Development of Spiritual Consciousness. New York: Meridian, 1911/1974.
- Wallace, B. Alan. Buddhism with an Attitude: The Tibetan Seven-point Mind Training. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 2003.
- Williams, Mark, John Teasdale, Zindel Segal, and Jon Kabat-Zinn. The Mindful Way through Depression: Freeing Yourself from Chronic Unhappiness. New York: Guilford, 2007.
- Wynne, Alexander. The Origin of Buddhist Meditation. New York: Routledge, 2007.

Medjugorje

The authenticity of the apparitions that have taken place since 1981 in Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina (then a part of the Marxist Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia), is among the most contentious topics in the contemporary Roman Catholic Church. In 1981 2 boys and 4 girls, then between 10 and 17 years old, began receiving daily messages from Mary, who appeared under the title of Queen of Peace (feast day: June 25). These messages continue today. Like those of the apparitions at Fatima, Portugal, their themes include conversion, penance, prayer, the rosary, the family, and, particularly, peace. At first the Tito regime acted against the devotion and against Franciscan Jozo Zovko, the “counter-revolutionary” parish priest and spiritual advisor to the visionaries. After 1984 the government did not interfere with the cultus, possibly in part because of the hard currency that its pilgrims brought in, at that time primarily from Italy, Austria, and France.

A controversy about this Marian devotion also arose within the church. In this region of Europe, the Franciscan Order has a strong tradition of local pastoral care. The Fathers, popular for their spiritual care, refused to turn over parts of their pastoral responsibilities to the bishop of Mostar-Duvno. Against the background of this controversy, the bishop had growing doubts about the authenticity of the apparitions and messages, and suspicions of manipulation by the Franciscans who controlled the parish and the seers arose.

Over the years many influential persons in the Catholic Church, right up through Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005), have spoken out on the cultus, while others have expressly refused to take a position on it. The church is caught in a field of interests, which include those of the adherents who really “see” Mary, other Catholics who consider it all the work of Satan, yet others who hypothesize pious deception on the part of the visionaries and their advisors, and still others who assume machinations by the Franciscans are involved. Whichever view is correct, three diocesan investigative committees have declared the appearances and messages inauthentic, and in 1998 the Vatican itself also accepted that standpoint.

Statue of Our Lady of Medjudjorge, Bordeaux, France. (J. Gordon Melton)

However, over against the negative position of the church hierarchy stands a massive following of devotees and believers who find considerable strength in the shrine. In 1987 a total of about 5 million pilgrims had visited Medjugorje; in 1991 that number had reached 15 million, and in 2009, more than 60 million, including thousands of priests and hundreds of (arch-)bishops. The vast majority of the visitors are Catholics of conservative or traditional outlook. Because of the opposition of the hierarchy, organized devotional activity exists in a problematic spiritual vacuum, and links have arisen with other contested apparitions and devotions around the world, such as the Lady of All Nations in Amsterdam.

The spiritual and theological autonomy of the devotion is further stimulated by a powerful relation between the devotion to Our Lady of Peace and the Charismatic movement, a revivalist endeavor that tends to disassociate itself from institutional ecclesiastical structures. Charismatic prayer groups, initiated from Medjugorje, function as models for other groups elsewhere in the world and serve to further spread word of the Medjugorje apparitions. Intensive mission activities are supported by world tours by the visionaries and the Fathers themselves. Since 1997 a dedicated radio station, Radio MIR [peace] Medjugorje, helps spread the messages. Medjugorje prayer groups, foundations, committees, magazines, and websites have been established all over the world and branch shrines have been created, giving the millions of devotees who cannot come to Medjugorje opportunities for frequent and nearby devotion.

As a result of the massive growth of interest in Medjugorje, it is no longer possible for the movement to retreat from its position and continued rejection by the Vatican is less likely. The movement’s position is strengthened by the constant reference to the “fruits” its activity has borne for the Catholic Church, such as conversions, vocations for the priesthood, and miraculous healings. Since 2000, when the Belgian cardinal Godfried Danneels—influential in the church hierarchy—argued for reopening the discussion of Medjugorje, more clerics pleaded for officialization, but as of 2009 their efforts were in vain; the deadlock between the Vatican and the local Franciscans and their pressure groups still continues.

St. James Parish
 Zupni Ured
 88266 Medjugorje
 Bosnia-Herzegovina
<http://www.medjugorje.hr> (official website)
<http://www.medjugorje.org/>
<http://www.medjugorje.com/>

Information Center MIR Queen of Peace
 Gospin Trg 1

88266 Medjugorje
Bosnia-Herzegovina

Peter Jan Margry

See also: Charismatic Movement; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Fatima; Marian Devotion, World Network of; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Bax, Mart. Medjugorje: Religion, Politics, and Violence in Rural Bosnia. Amsterdam: VU Uitgeverij, 1995.
- Claverie, Élisabeth. Les guerres de la vierge. Une anthropologie des apparitions. Paris: Gallimard, 2003.
- Craig, M. Spark from Heaven: The Mystery of the Madonna of Medjugorje. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1988.
- Jones, E. Michael. The Medjugorje Deception: Queen of Peace, Ethnic Cleansing, Ruined Lives. South Bend, IN: Fidelity Press, 1998.
- Laurentin, René, and René Lejeune. Messages and Teachings of Mary at Medjugorje: Chronological Corpus of the Messages. Milford, OH: The Riehle Foundation, 1988.
- Margry, Peter Jan. "Marian Interventions in the Wars of Ideology: The Elastic Politics of the Roman Catholic Church on Modern Apparitions." History and Anthropology 20, no. 3 (2009).
- Sivric, Ivo. The Hidden Side of Medjugorje: A Theologian's Observations. Vol. 1. Saint Francis du Lac, Ca: Psilog, 1989.
- Skrbis, Zlatko. "The Apparitions of the Virgin Mary of Medjugorje: The Convergence of Croatian Nationalism and Her Apparitions." Journal of the Association for the Study of Ethnicity and Nationalism 11, no. 3 (2005): 443–462.
- Zimdars-Swartz, Sandra L. Encountering Mary: Visions of Mary from La Salette to Medjugorje. New York: Avon Books, 1992.

Meenakshi Temple (Madurai)

The Meenakshi Sundareshvarar temple complex, one of the largest in India, is located at Madurai, in the state of Tamil Nadu, at the southern tip of India. Madurai, one of India's older cities, traces its origin to the story of Indra, the king of the gods, who after fighting the demon Vrtrasura, was wandering the fields and forests of southern India. At one spot, he found a linga of Siva and began to worship it. A local resident who saw him then reported the occurrence to the local king, who immediately ordered a temple be built on the site. Around the temple a city grew. Madurai had its ups and downs over the years, but reached its zenith under the Nayak dynasty (1559–1736 CE).

The temple's original site seemed certainly to have been dedicated to the goddess Minakshi and worship of her in the region was from ancient times. The first Meenakshi Sundareshvarar temple was built by Maara-varamban Kulasekara Pandyan (r. 1258–1308), who ruled the ancient Pandyan kingdom that covered much of South India. It was later abandoned and fell into ruins. A new temple structure was begun by Viswanath Nayakar, the first king of the Nayak dynasty, in the 16th century and completed by one of his descendants, Tirumalai Nayakar, in the 17th century.

The temple complex is on a set-aside site measuring 700 feet by 850 feet. The outer wall is punctuated with 4 towers at the 4 entrance ways, each tapering upward to a height of some 120 feet. These are all elaborately decorated with multi-colored stucco carvings of a myriad of people and scenes from Hindu mythology.

Within the courtyard, the main temples take up a space of 225 feet by 150 feet. The modern temple also contains, in addition to the inner sanctum with the goddess's image, a linga for Siva worship, as well as a large statue of Siva as Nataraja, the Lord of the Dance. Visitors will also find the overarched area of the eight Shaktis (female deities); a golden lotus pond adjacent to the Meenakshi shrine in which devotees may bathe; the hall of parrots, where they are heard as singing praises of the two main divinities of the temple—Siva and Meenakshi, and the 1,000 pillar hall with the wall paintings that picture scenes from the Purana (Hindu holy texts) that relate the story of Siva's adventures.

Each spring, the temple is a focal point for the Chittirai Festival, at which the story of the wedding of Siva and Minakshi is re-enacted and celebrated. On the 10th day of the 12-day festival, large temple carts with the 2 lovers are carried around the temple. In Hindu lore, Meenakshi is the brother of the deity Vishnu and, of course, has a prominent place in their marriage. The temple also includes statues and pictures of Vishnu.

A lake in the courtyard of the Sri Meenakshi Hindu temple in Madurai, India. (Sergey Kushnir/Dreamstime.com)

Constance A. Jones

See also: Hinduism; Pilgrimage; Temples—Hindu.

References

- Fuller, Chris. A Priesthood Renewed: Modernity and Traditionalism in a South Indian Temple. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Fuller, C. J. Servants of the Goddess: The Priests of a South Indian Temple. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Harman William P. The Sacred Marriage of a Hindu Goddess. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Hudson, D. Dennis. "The Two Chitra Festivals of Madurai." In Religious Festivals of South India and Sri Lanka, edited by Gray R. Welbon and Glenn E. Yocum. Delhi: Manohar, 1982.

Meiji Jingu

The Meiji Jingu, a Shinto shrine located in Tokyo, is the leading center of national Shinto in Japan. It was built in 1920 to honor the life and accomplishments of the Emperor Meiji (1852–1912) and his wife, the Empress Shoken (1850–1914). Born on November 3, 1852, Emperor Meiji oversaw what was considered a prosperous era in Japan generally, and he was viewed as leading a transition period that took the country from the premodern to the modern world. Not the most popular ruler within the Buddhist community, during his half century (1867–1912) on the throne, he had led in re-establishing Shinto as the state religion and creating initiatives to integrating it into the identity of the Japanese people. He was initially buried in Kyoto, his birthplace. Empress Shoken was born on May 28, 1850, in Kyoto. During her reign as empress, she became best known for her promotion of the Japanese Red Cross. Like her husband, she too was buried in Kyoto.

Following the deaths of the emperor and his wife, by which time World War I was in full progress, the Japanese leadership began to consider how they could properly honor their deceased rulers. The decision to construct the site and the subsequent effort to build it could be seen as the culmination of a half century of regulations that had been put in place to guide the rise of Shinto to its place within Japanese society and the downgrading of Buddhism.

The Japanese military served as the official sponsors for the site, which was designed to visibly focus the faith in the divinity of the emperor. State Shinto was elevated to a role beyond mere religion. All gave it homage and were otherwise left free to choose a religious faith, albeit from among the relatively small number of religions that had been recognized by the government. Individual citizens were expected to show themselves as proper Japanese by publicly assenting to and showing appropriate behavior, at least minimally, relative to the state Shinto system. The designation of the emperor as divine created numerous problems for both Buddhists and Christians.

The shrine, located in the midst of a large park, was completed and ready to receive the souls of the royal couple in 1920, their souls being enshrined on November 1. One enters the park through Japan's largest tori (gate). There are three main buildings: the Outer Shrine, the Inner Shrine, and the Main Shrine. Believers will upon entering the site initially engage in a brief purification ceremony that includes rinsing their hands and gurgling water. Once inside, they may do one or more of a variety of devotional actions, such as making an offering, acknowledging the deity spirits (kami), and/or engaging in an act seeking one's fortune. The nearby Treasure Museum houses a selection of the couple's personal possessions along with a photo exhibition of their life.

The shrine was destroyed during World War II, and, following the war, the United States insisted that the emperor's role be transformed from absolute monarch to symbol of Japanese unity (similar to the role of the British monarch). Under pressure, in 1946, the emperor issued a formal renunciation of his role as divine spirit (kami). Shinto was also discontinued as the state-supported faith. After a decade of getting used to the new order of religious life, in 1958, the government undertook the project of rebuilding the shrine.

Today, while continuing as a center of Shinto practice—it is the site for 11 Shinto festivals annually—the Meiji Shrine has become a major recreational magnet for Tokyo residents and tourists. The large surrounding garden includes an art museum and a variety of sports facilities for baseball, tennis, golf, swimming, and others. For nature buffs, the park includes more than 300 species of trees native to Japan that were brought from across the country. The shrine attracts several million visitors annually.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Pilgrimage; Shinto.

References

- Kasahara, Kazuo. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 2001.
- Reader, Ian, Esben Andreasen, and Finn Stefansson, eds. Japanese Religions: Past and Present. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1933.

Melkite Catholic Church

The Melkite Catholic Church is a Byzantine Catholic church centered in Syria and Lebanon. It is termed “Byzantine” because its liturgy is derived from the Greek liturgy developed by the Ecumenical Patriarchate and widely utilized by the several Greek churches in the Middle East. It is Catholic in that it is in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church. The Melkite Church emerged in the 18th century in Syria following a schism within the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch. Antioch is an ancient center of Christianity and the seat of one of the four ancient patriarchates of Eastern Orthodoxy.

In 1724 a schism developed in the Syrian Church when two parties, one centered in Aleppo and one in Damascus, each elected a patriarch. The ecumenical patriarch stepped in and declared the candidate of the Aleppo party to be the new patriarch of Antioch. The other candidate, Cyril VI, was deposed and forced into exile in Lebanon. Then, four years later, in 1729, Pope Benedict XIII (1649–1730) recognized Cyril as the new patriarch of Antioch, and authorized his forming a new jurisdiction, the Melkite Catholic Church. (The word “Melkite” derives from the word for king in the Syriac and Lebanese languages.) The new church retained its Eastern liturgy and traditions (including the ordination of married priests) and adopted the several changes that would bring it into alignment with Roman Catholic doctrine, especially on those matters in which the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy have disagreed since the 11th century.

The Melkite Catholic Church has approximately one million members worldwide. The church is centered in Syria and Lebanon and has expanded into Palestine and Egypt. Its patriarch was given the additional titles of patriarch of Jerusalem and patriarch of Alexandria (two of the sites of the other ancient Christian patriarchates). In 1848 the church was granted recognition by the authorities of the Ottoman Empire and headquarters were moved to Damascus from its original site in Sidon, Lebanon. Beginning late in the 19th century, Melkite Christians joined in the dispersion of Syrians and Lebanese around the world. Communities were established in Brazil, Venezuela, Canada, and the United States, all of which evolved into new dioceses.

The church is currently headed by Patriarch Gregory III Laham (b. 1933). He took office in 2000. It supports eight religious orders, a seminary at Raboué, Lebanon, and a theological institute in Harissa, Lebanon. For many years it sent its candidates for priesthood to Saint Anne’s Seminary in Jerusalem, operated by the White Fathers, but that school closed in 1967. In 2008 it reported 1,347,000 members worldwide. The church is active in the Middle East Council of Churches.

Melkite Catholic Church

BP 22249

Damascus

Syria

<http://www.pgc-lb.org/english/index.shtml>

<http://www.melkite.org/> (U.S. Eparchy of Newton)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Middle East Council of Churches; Roman Catholic Church; White Fathers.

References

- Descy, Serge. The Melkite Church: An Historical and Ecclesiological Approach. Newton, MA: Sophia Press, 1993.
- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

Mencius

ca. 372–289 BCE

Mencius is the second most famous figure in Confucianism. A great teacher, Mencius lived during the Warring States period of Chinese history, characterized by a weak imperial dynasty and feudal wars. The constant bickering and alliance-building associated with this warfare was under the banner of an eventual unification under one state. The old gentry families had lost power, leaving the way for ambitious newcomers to rise through the social ranks. In this general atmosphere of confusion and collusion the intellectual challenge was to find a new set of world values beyond those dealing with individual goodness.

Very little is known of Mencius’s life. Scholars disagree over his dates. He seems to have been born in what is now Shandong Province, not far from Qufu, where Confucius was born. It was suggested that he was a pupil of Confucius’s grandson, Zisi.

Mencius and his followers often traveled to different states and so observed the social climate carefully. In contrast to his great adversaries, the Mohists, who preached a doctrine centered on efficient state functioning in order to maximize the general welfare, Mencius emphasized the Confucian virtues of humanity (ren) and righteousness (yi). For Mencius humanity was innate and central to each individual. Righteousness grew

The Chinese philosopher Mencius taught that humans are innately good but would act nobly only if and when they had peace of mind. Such statements are contained in The Book of Mencius, the standard commentary on the teachings of Confucius. (Ivy Close Images/StockphotoPro) from that sense of humanistic compassion. By focusing on righteousness, Mencius deepened Confucian doctrine, which had previously focused on the relationships between individuals and how to regulate those through virtues. For Mencius the focus became the relationship between the individual and the group or social environment. Righteousness became a social virtue as well as a personal virtue. Adhering to righteousness would ensure fairness and social wellbeing.

Mencius concluded early on that humans are basically good, something Confucius had only indirectly implied. His position allowed later thinkers such as Li Ao and Wang Yangming to develop intriguing theories of human nature. Confucianism continues to be associated with the tenet of innate goodness.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Confucius; Confucianism.

References

- Cho-yun Hsu. "The Unfolding of Early Confucianism: The Evolution from Confucius to Hsun-tzu," In Confucianism: The Dynamics of Tradition, edited by Irene Eber, 23–37. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- McGreal, Ian, ed. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Mennonite Church in the Netherlands

The Protestant Reformation called for a break between church and state and for a church consisting of those adults who had turned to God with faith. One radical movement within the Reformation, Anabaptism, began in Switzerland. Anabaptists took their name from the second baptism they offered to adherents who had previously been baptized as infants. Their new ideas led both the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant churches to attempt their suppression. The course of the movement was deeply affected by an incident at Münster, Germany, where the most radical branch of the movement attempted to set up the kingdom of God and awaited Christ's intervention as secular authorities tried to retake the city.

Anabaptism was brought to the Netherlands by Melchior Hoffman (ca. 1500–1545), a leader who differed from some of his Anabaptist colleagues by his emphasis on the imminent end of the world. It was in the Netherlands that the movement was to be revived and reformed by a Dutch convert, Menno Simons (1496–1559), who would lend his name to the movement. As a Roman Catholic priest, he had begun to study the Bible on the question of the sacraments and concluded that the Roman Catholic doctrines of infant baptism and the physical presence of Christ in the Eucharist were not supported by scripture. He came to the fore as a dissident leader in the mid-1530s, when he spoke out against the Münsterites. By 1536 he fully identified with the more moderate Anabaptists, and the next year he was ordained as their leader.

Simons assumed the task of articulating a theology to defend the idea of a separated church. This theology emphasized biblical authority and the justification of believers by faith in Christ. The immediate question, however, was survival, and Simons attempted to answer all the major attacks made on the group by leaders in the established churches.

Indeed, life for a Mennonite leader was still dangerous, and Simons had to be on the move constantly. The community suffered repression and produced a number of martyrs. Persecution in Holland finally ended in 1674 with the country's independence from Spain, and Holland emerged as the most tolerant nation in Europe. Galenius Abrahamsz de Haan (d. 1706) was the dominant leader of the Mennonite Church through the end of the 17th century. In 1699 he wrote an important defining statement of the Mennonite position. As the community prospered, it also was able to aid in other, less hospitable locations around the continent.

In the relatively tolerant climate of the 18th century, the church declined radically from 180,000 to fewer than 30,000 members. Many members converted to Dutch Reformed faith, and others left for America. To deal with the decline, in 1811 an all-Mennonite conference, the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, was founded. By midcentury the decline had been stopped, and some growth occurred through the 20th century. In 1847 a group had organized the Mennonite Missionary Association to focus interest on foreign missionary activity. The first missionary was sent to Java in 1851. In the 1950s it was superseded by the European Mennonite Evangelism Committee, a cooperative effort of the Dutch, French, German, and Swiss Mennonites.

At present, the Dutch Mennonites constitute the largest Mennonite body in Europe, with 10,200 members. The Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit is a member of the World Council of Churches and cooperates with the Mennonite World Conference.

Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit
Singel 454
NL-1017 AW
Amsterdam

The Netherlands

<http://www.ads.nl/> (in Dutch)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mennonite World Conference; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
- Hamilton, Alastair, Sjouke Voolstra, and Piet Visser, eds. From Martyr to Muppy: A Historical Introduction to Cultural Assimilation Processes of a Religious Minority in the Netherlands: The Mennonites. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken en stromingen. 3rd ed. Kampen, the Netherlands: Kok, 2000.
- Krahn, C. Dutch Anabaptism: Origin, Spread, Life and Thought (1450–1600). The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1968.
- Lapp, John A., and C. Arnold Snyder, eds. Testing Faith and Tradition: Global Mennonite History Series: Europe. Intercourse, PA: Good Books, 2006.
- Mellink, A. F. Documenta Anabaptistica Neerlandica. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975.

Mennonite Church, U.S.A.

The Mennonite Church, U.S.A., the largest of the Mennonite bodies in North America, was founded in 2002 by the merger of the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church.

The Mennonite Church was the oldest of the several Mennonite groups in the United States. Mennonites came to America as early as 1643, though it was not until 40 years later that the first Mennonite settlement appeared—in Germantown, Pennsylvania (now part of Philadelphia). This early community became known for its stance against the introduction of slavery into the American colonies and it influenced later opposition to slavery by the Friends (Quakers).

Mennonite boy, Lancaster, Pennsylvania, 1942, descendent of the original German settlers of Pennsylvania. (Library of Congress)

Mennonite ecclesiastic organization emerged as needed. In 1725 the congregations in Pennsylvania called a conference in which the major issue was the publication of an English translation of the Confession of Dortrecht, the primary statement of Mennonite beliefs. It was not until the 19th century, however, as the Mennonites moved to different sections of the country and issues of accommodating to American life began to emerge, that a regular conference structure developed. The conferences created a biennial General Assembly, the highest legislative body in the church.

Traditionally, the Mennonite Church was a rural church whose members worked primarily in agriculture. However, during the last half of the 20th century, it developed a significant urban membership. That change was accompanied by a more liberal approach to traditional behavioral norms, especially manifest in the abandonment of the “plain clothing” that has distinguished many Mennonite groups. Members also began to use modern conveniences, including automobiles and electricity (still eschewed by more conservative Mennonites).

In the mid-19th century, John H. Oberholtzer (1805–1895), a young Mennonite minister, began to anticipate the direction that the Mennonite church would take in the 20th century. Meanwhile, he found himself in conflict with his brethren in the Franconia District (located in Pennsylvania). He began to protest the plain, collarless coat worn by most ministers, which he saw as an arbitrary requirement having nothing to do with the Mennonite faith. He then argued for the adoption of a written constitution so that proceedings could be conducted more systematically. Finding but little support, Oberholtzer withdrew from the Franconia District in 1847. That same conference then proceeded to expel him. Sixteen ministers and several congregations left with him and formed a new conference.

The new denomination quickly moved to adopt a more liberal view of the ban (or shunning, the practice of avoiding contact with those who have withdrawn or been excluded from the fellowship), opened communication with other Mennonite groups, allowed intermarriage with persons of other denominations, and, eventually, provided salaries for their clergy. Oberholtzer also founded the first Mennonite newspaper in America, the Religioeser Botschafter (later Das Christliche Volksblatt).

From the beginning, Oberholtzer envisioned the union of all Mennonite congregations then—and still—divided into many factions. At the same time, thousands of Mennonite immigrants were moving to America and bringing into existence new churches. In 1855, Daniel Hoch (1805–1878), a minister to several Mennonite churches in Ontario, Canada, aligned with an Ohio congregation under the leadership of Reverend Ephraim Hunsberger (1814–1904) to form the Conference Council of the Mennonite Communities of Canada—West and Ohio. In Lee County, Iowa, two isolated congregations united and called for a systematic evangelistic effort among Mennonites who had now resided some distance from the main body of believers in the East. Representatives of some of the above groups met in 1860 in Iowa and invited Oberholtzer to attend. He was selected to chair the gathering that proceeded to form the General Conference Mennonite Church. They adopted Oberholtzer’s vision of uniting all the Mennonite congregations in the United States and Canada.

Both the Mennonite Church and the General Conference shared a common belief in accord with most Mennonite bodies. As the two groups began talk of uniting, a summary “Confession of Faith in a Mennonite Perspective” had been adopted by both groups in 1995. This 24-article confession affirms the church as a Trinitarian body in the mainstream of Christian belief relative to affirmations on biblical authority, creation, salvation in Jesus Christ, and the church of believers. It describes three ordinances: baptism, the Lord’s Supper, and foot washing. It also retains the traditional position of the Mennonites as a peace church and emphasizes the role of the family. The issues that had led the Oberholtzer group to leave in the 1880s had long since been decided.

The united church is organized around a congregational polity, and congregations are located in 21 regional conferences. The national church commissions in the two churches that oversaw publishing, support of work in other countries, education, home missions, social concerns, and congregational life in the two former churches have been merged. They carry on a large mission program with congregations on every continent. In the United States, home mission work is conducted among Native Americans, African Americans, Jews, the Spanish-speaking, Asian refugees, and the deaf. There are four church-wide ministry agencies: Mennonite Mission Network, Mennonite Education Agency, Mennonite Publishing Network, and Mennonite Mutual Aid. The new church sponsors four colleges, two universities, and two theological seminaries.

In 2006 the Mennonite Church, U.S.A. had approximately 109,174 members in 935 congregations. The church cooperates with the Mennonite World Conference.

Mennonite Church, U.S.A.
722 Main St.

PO Box 347
Newton, KS 67114-0347

500 S Main St.
PO Box 1245
Elkhart, IN 46515-1245
www.mennoniteusa.org/

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Amish; Friends/Quakers; Mennonite World Conference.

References

- Dyck, Cornelius. An Introduction to Mennonite History: A Popular History of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites. Lancaster, PA: Herald Press, 1993.
- Hostetler, Beulah Stauffer. American Mennonites and Protestant Movements: A Community Paradigm. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1987.
- Kaufman, Edmund G. General Conference Mennonite Pioneers. North Newton, KS: Bethel College, 1973.
- Kraybill, Donald B., and C. Nelson Hostetter. Anabaptist World USA. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2001.
- Krehbiel, H. P. The History of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America. 2 vols. Newton, KS: Author, 1889–1938.
- The Mennonite Encyclopedia*. 4 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1955–1959.
- Springer, Nelson P., and A. J. Klassen, eds. Mennonite Bibliography, 1631–1961. 2 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1977.
- Waltner, James H. This We Believe. Newton, KS: Faith and Life Press, 1968.
- Wenger, John Christian. The Doctrines of the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1950.
- Wenger, John Christian. The Mennonite Church in America. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1966.

Mennonite World Conference

The Mennonite World Conference is an ecumenical association uniting Mennonites globally. The Mennonites are the main group inheriting the tradition of the Swiss Brethren and other 16th-century groups that rejected the idea of a state-aligned church as well as infant baptism (thus they are called Anabaptists). From the earliest times, Mennonites have been pacifists and activists in peacemaking endeavors.

The Mennonite World Conference grew out of suggestions circulated in the years immediately prior to World I that communication and fellowship should be facilitated among the many churches of the Mennonite heritage (including some such as the Brethren in Christ that do not have the word “Mennonite” in their name). Tabled during the war, the proposals finally came to fruition in 1925, with the first international gathering of Mennonites, which was held in Switzerland on the anniversary of the first Anabaptist baptism in 1625. The initial conference was attended primarily by German, Dutch, French, and Swiss delegates. Only one North American was at the Conference.

The idea of cooperative activity among Mennonites grew considerably after World War II with the transformation of Mennonite missions into autonomous churches and the development of a consciousness of the Mennonite family as a global community. As the 21st century begins, some 84 Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches from 49 countries on 5 continents cooperate through the Mennonite World Conference.

The Conference promotes international meetings; cooperative action in social service, issues of world peace and community reconciliation; the creation of professional networks of pastors, educators, women, peace workers, and historians; and the communication of news, testimony, and teaching from churches around the world. The Conference has two headquarters, one in France and one in Canada. Its website includes an extensive directory of Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches worldwide, and well as other demographic data.

Mennonite World Conference
8, rue du Fossé des Treize
67000 Strasbourg
France

Mennonite World Conference
50 Kent Ave.
Kitchener, Ontario N2G 3R1

Canada

<http://www.mwc-cmm.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anabaptism; Brethren in Christ; Mennonites; Paraguay, Mennonites in.

References

- Beecher, Claude, et al. Testing Faith and Tradition. Intercourse, PA: Good Books, 2006.
- Bender, Ross T., and Alan P. F. Sell, eds. Baptism, Peace, and the State in the Reformed and Mennonite Traditions. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1991.
- Checole, Amelu, et al. Anabaptist Songs in African Hearts. Intercourse, PA: Good Books, 2006.
- Mennonite World Handbook: Mennonites in Global Mission*. Carol Stream, IL: Mennonite World Council, 1990.
- Snyder, C. Arnold. From Anabaptist Seed. Kitchener, ON: Pandora Press; Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1999.

Mennonites

The Mennonite movement emerged in the 1540s as the more moderate and theologically sophisticated branch of the Anabaptist movement that had begun in Switzerland two decades earlier. As the Protestant Reformation divided Christianity into three larger communities, the Roman Catholic Church, Lutheranism, and the Reformed movement, Anabaptism emerged as a fourth option. It accepted the Reformation emphases on the authority of the Bible and the centrality of justification of the believer by faith in Christ. However, it differed from all three by its critique of the sacraments, which it replaced with two ordinances. Baptism was not for everyone but was limited to those adults who made a profession of faith. The Lord's Supper was a memorial meal recalling the events of the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ.

In the intense atmosphere of the Reformation's first decade, the decentralized Anabaptist movement was carried away by theological radicalism. Most important, it very nearly became a millennial movement. One of the most important leaders, Melchior Hoffman

An Amish man, accompanied by a youth, guides a horse-drawn plow in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. (AP/Wide World Photos)

(ca. 1500–1545), developed an emphasis on the imminent Second Coming of Christ. Hoffman's imprisonment in 1533 occasioned the rise of Jan Matthys of Haarlem (Netherlands) (d. 1534), who found support for his millennial ideas in Münster, Germany. Matthys called upon the people to prepare Münster, by force if necessary, for the coming kingdom of God. The city armed for the battle to come, which came in the form of a siege. Matthys was killed early in the fighting and was replaced by an even more radical leader, Jan Beuckelson of Leiden (ca. 1509–1536). Beuckelson proclaimed himself King David returned, introduced polygamy, and ruled the city as an Oriental potentate. The city eventually fell, and with it, seemingly, the Anabaptist cause.

However, in Holland, a former Roman Catholic priest named Menno Simons (1492–1561) became convinced of the Anabaptist basics. Simons emerged as the anti-Münster spokesperson, and with his theological training he was able to work out a viable alternative. He developed the ideal of the believers' church, a Christianity consisting of those people who have experienced faith and choose in their adult life to live as Christ's disciples. The church should operate apart from the state and accept only the faithful who are willing to accept its discipline for baptism and membership. Simons articulated the importance of love and nonresistance as signs of the Christian life, the latter leading to pacifism and an unwillingness to bear arms. In place of the sword and other coercive powers of the state, he instituted the ban as a means of chastising errant members. Members had to radically limit their contact with anyone under the ban, a rule that most affected spouses, who could neither eat nor sleep with a spouse who had been banned until he or she had been reinstated.

The Mennonites suffered severely under intolerant governments, which were especially upset with their refusal to serve in the military, and they were forced to move from place to place as rulers came and went and occasional campaigns of repression and persecution arose. Military service was foremost among issues that led the first Mennonites to accept the invitation to settle in Russia and Pennsylvania at the end of the 17th century, and thus the center of Mennonite life shifted away from Western Europe. But by the 19th century conditions in Russia became increasingly hostile as the czarist government put aside the agreement that first led the Mennonites to migrate there. Thus many Russian Mennonites (and the related Hutterites) began to move to North America and develop a new set of communities in Canada and the United States.

The Mennonites in North America survived the crisis of World War I, when authorities had trouble understanding and appreciating their pacifist ways, and the continent became the new center of their community. However, in the relatively free conditions of both the United States and Canada, the small Mennonite community, which numbered only several hundred thousand, splintered into numerous denominations. Two of the larger Mennonite bodies, the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church, recently united to form the Mennonite Church, U.S.A. On the more conservative side are the Old Order Mennonites and the Amish who have attempted to perpetuate the agricultural and communal aspects of church life in 18th-century Europe. In the 19th and 20th centuries, Mennonites spread to Africa and South America, and they have had a significant impact in Paraguay. Attempts to assist the smaller Mennonite communities around the world and to provide some sense of fellowship and unity among the many Mennonite groups led to the formation of the Mennonite World Conference.

There are an estimated 850,000 Mennonites in the world as the 21st century begins. This number includes 266,100 U.S. Mennonites, 114,400 Canadians, 112,906 in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and 76,670 in India. More than 320,000 Mennonites reside in Africa and Asia. In the 1990s, more than 75,000 Mennonites moved from Russia to Germany. The Mennonite Central Committee was founded in the 1920s to serve Mennonites in the former Soviet Union and now operates as an inter-Mennonite relief agency in the global context.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Amish; Hutterites; Mennonite Church, USA; Mennonite World Conference; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- The Complete Writings of Menno Simons, 1491–1561.* Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1956.
- Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
- Kraybill, Donald A. Who Are the Anabaptists: Amish, Brethren, Hutterites, and Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2003.
- The Mennonite Encyclopedia.* 5 vols. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1955–1959.
- Mennonite World Handbook: Mennonites in Global Mission.* Carol Stream, IL: Mennonite World Council, 1990.
- Roth, John D. Beliefs: Mennonite Faith and Practice. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2005.
- Snyder, C. Arnold. Anabaptist History and Theology: An Introduction. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1995.

Mennonites in Paraguay

See Paraguay, Mennonites in.

Meron, Mount

Mount Meron is the highest mountain in pre-1967 Israel and is the site of the graves of important Kabbalists and also supposedly of earlier Jewish commentators. It is today the site of a ceremony that has become very popular among orthodox Jews where boys receive their first haircut.

Mount Meron is the site of the grave of Shimon bar Yochai, a second-century CE rabbi and official author of the Zohar, a major Kabbalistic text. The mountain is a place of pilgrimage for orthodox Jews who are particularly numerous at the festival of Lag B'Omer, where it is the tradition for their sons at the age of three to have their first haircut. The Aramaic word, hillula, meaning "festivity," was originally used to designate a marriage party. Among Jews originally from Muslim countries, the hillula generally commemorates the death of a sage, whose soul is regarded as having been reunited with its Creator. The classic instance of the hillula is that marking the traditional anniversary of the death of Rabbi Simon Bar Yohai, which is celebrated at his putative burial place and that of his son Eleazar in Meron, in northern Israel. Crowds as large as 100,000 people attend the festivities and large bonfires are lit and burn throughout the night. Mount Meron is the major mountain in Galilee, rising to about 4,000 feet, and is also the official burial site of a number of prominent rabbis, in particular the distinguished commentators Hillel and Shammai and many of their students. There is also a very old synagogue there, and the putative burial place of Shimon is covered now with a domed building. The celebration of Lag B'Omer, a festival in between Passover and Pentecost (Pesach and Shavuot), is a huge event for the Orthodox community in Israel. The festival represents the period of the ending of a great epidemic that killed many Torah students, and also the death of Shimon bar Yochai. He and his son are supposed to have spent 13 years hiding from the Romans in a cave where they were visited by Elijah and instructed in the mysteries that are hidden in the written Torah, which then became the Zohar, or "glittering." Although the Zohar was undoubtedly written by someone else, this story has served to make Mount Meron a popular site for those interested in the Kabbalah. It is also much valued by the Mizrahi community in Israel, Jews who originated in the Middle East.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Passover; Shavuot; Synagogues.

Reference

Heilman, Samuel. Defenders of the Faith: Inside Ultra-Orthodox Jewry. New York: Penguin, 1992.

Messianic Judaism

Messianic Judaism is a movement originating in 19th- and 20th-century Protestant missions to the Jews as well as the countercultural religious and ethnic ferment of the 1960s and 1970s. Jewish- and Gentile-born adherents accept Yeshua (Jesus) as Savior and Son of God as well as other tenets of evangelical theology, but utilize Jewish practices to express this faith. Today, hundreds of congregations throughout the world affirm this unique Jewish/Christian religious identity.

In the 19th and early 20th centuries, Protestant missionaries used Jewish symbols and language to communicate the message of salvation to Jewish audiences, and sponsored separate congregational worship for new Hebrew-Christian converts. By the 1950s, several Hebrew-Christian congregations existed under Protestant denominational control that kept potentially dangerous "Judaizing" to a minimum. Hebrew Christians were still eventually expected to integrate fully into existing church structures.

In the 1960s and 1970s, however, the growing interest among young adults in ethnic identity and religious meaning led to new developments. Martin "Moishe" Rosen, founder of Jews for Jesus, affirmed that Jewish identity need not be washed away by baptism. Although new converts were still expected to join Christian churches, the missionary organization utilized Jewish symbols effectively to reach Jewish youth. By 1975, the Hebrew Christian Alliance of America changed its name to the Messianic Jewish Alliance of America as a symbol of self-acceptance and as a successful evangelization tool. More important, key leaders such as Martin Chernoff began to form congregations to maintain Jewish identity; "assimilati-ing” into churches was now rejected. “Jesus” became “Yeshua,” churches “synagogues,” and Protestant hymns were replaced with Jewish-sounding music and Israeli dancing. A Jewish calendar was followed, with Christological messages inserted into each holiday using altered Jewish liturgy.

This lifestyle alteration led to deeper theological discussions concerning the place of Jewishness in the movement and divides congregations into several groups. The two largest are the Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations (UMJC) and the International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations, founded in the mid-1980s, which accept charismatic worship and a modicum of Jewish practices amended to fit evangelical faith. While some congregations are independent, others are formed, funded, and belong to Protestant denominations. All adherents agree, however, that Jesus was a Jew and Son of God, Jewish identity is God-given, and Jewish practices enrich their faith. Today these two movements, along with the International Federation of Messianic Jews (a Sephardic organization) include 172 congregations. With the approximate average congregational size of 60 members, and each congregation approximately 60 percent Gentile, this movement involves around 6,000 born Jews in the United States, with estimates of perhaps the same number in Israel and far less in small congregations worldwide.

Despite these small numbers, American Jews actively oppose the Messianic movement. While evangelical churches often support Messianic Judaism as an effective outreach method and a unique “ethnic” expression of Christianity, Messianic Jewish proselytizing angers American Jews. Jews for Judaism, based in Los Angeles, is the most prominent organization fighting what it sees as Messianic deception of ignorant and vulnerable Jews with the message that one can be both Jewish and Christian.

Recently, however, the UMJC seems to be focusing on drawing closer to the normative Jewish community. Dr. Mark Kinzer, a prominent Messianic rabbi in the organization, argued in Postmissionary Messianic Judaism (2005) that all Jews continue a covenantal relationship with God and do not need to be “saved” by Messianic Jews. A Jesus-believing Jewish movement without an evangelistic mission would certainly divide Messianic Jews from evangelical Christianity and from many fellow Messianic Jews and might even create new relationships with the American Jewish community. Any actuation of this idea could significantly reshape the direction and future of the Messianic movement.

The International Alliance of Messianic Jewish Congregations
PO Box 20006
Sarasota, FL 34276-3006

Union of Messianic Jewish Congregations
529 Jefferson St. NE
Albuquerque, NM 87108

International Federation of Messianic Jews
PO Box 271708
Tampa, FL 33688

Carol Harris-Shapiro

See also: Evangelicalism; Judaism.

References

- Cohn-Sherbok, Daniel. Messianic Judaism. New York: Continuum Publishing Group, 2000.
- Cohn-Sherbok, Daniel, ed. Voices of Messianic Judaism: Confronting Critical Issues Facing a Maturing Movement. Baltimore: Lederer Books, 2001.
- Harris-Shapiro, Carol. Messianic Judaism: A Rabbi's Journey through Religious Change in America. Boston, Beacon Press, 1999.
- Karabelnik, Gabriela. “Competing Trends in Messianic Judaism: The Debate over Evangelicalism.” Unpublished senior thesis, Yale University, 2002.
- Kinzer, Mark S. Postmissionary Messianic Judaism. Grand Rapids, MI: Brazos Press, 2005.

Methodism

The Methodist movement grew out of the life and work of John Wesley (1703–1791), an Anglican minister who in 1738 had an intense religious experience that culminated in a period of spiritual searching. Once he settled his own faith questions, Wesley began an itinerant ministry throughout England and Ireland that led to the establishment of a host of religious societies or revitalization groups within the Church of England. Wesley called people to a personal experience of the faith into which many had already been baptized and to a life of growth in grace toward holiness or perfection. As the movement grew, Wesley commissioned a number of lay preachers to assist him.

Portrait of George Whitefield, colonial Protestant preacher of the Great Awakening. (Library of Congress)

Methodism grew for several decades as a fellowship within the Church of England, and in the 1760s it spread to the American colonies, where Wesley sent preachers to nurture the gathered believers. The crisis of the American Revolution and the establishment of the United States led Wesley to assume the role of a bishop, as he ordained ministers to facilitate the formation of an independent American Methodist organization. In 1784 the American leaders organized the Methodist Episcopal Church, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church, and accepted orders from Wesley through his representative, Thomas Coke (1747–1814). The Methodists were the only group in the decades prior to the American Civil War to systematically welcome African Americans into membership, and three large predominantly African American churches grew from that effort: the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, and the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church.

British Methodists remained a fellowship within the Church of England until 1795, when the Wesleyan Conference was reorganized as a dissenting church. Through the 19th century, both the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Wesleyan Conference would experience a number of schisms, and a spectrum of Methodist bodies would arise in both the United States and the United Kingdom. The U.S. Methodists would also become the fertile ground upon which the Holiness Movement and then Pentecostalism would develop. During the 20th century, the larger Methodist bodies in both countries would go through a series of mergers, resulting in the United Methodist Church in the United States and the Methodist Church in the United Kingdom.

In the 19th century, the several Methodist churches became active participants in the worldwide spread of Protestantism, and the movement spread to Africa, the South Pacific, and Asia. To a lesser extent, it was established across Europe. Many of the churches that resulted from that movement are members of the World Methodist Council.

Methodists inherited a Calvinist theological tradition, but Wesley adopted the form developed by Dutch theologian Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) that rejected the emphasis upon predestination. The Wesleyan emphasis on the free grace of God led to a focus on evangelism and resulted in Methodism becoming the largest religious grouping in the United States in the early 19th century. Wesley also developed a doctrine of perfection as the goal of the Christian life, leading to an emphasis on both holy living and social action.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; Arminius, Jacob; Christian Methodist Episcopal Church; Church of England; Holiness Movement; Methodist Church, Great Britain; Pentecostalism; United Methodist Church; Wesley, John; World Methodist Council.

References

- Collins, Kenneth J. John Wesley: A Theological Journey. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2003.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Heitzenrater, Richard P. Wesley and the People Called Methodists. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1994.
- Richey, Russell E., Jean Miller Schmidt, and Kenneth E. Rowe. Marks of Methodism. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2005.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church, Ghana

Methodism was introduced to what is now the nation of Ghana in 1835, when the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in England responded to the request of a Ghanaian who had previously organized several groups for Bible study. Joseph R. Dunwell (1806–1835) arrived on January 1, 1835, but unfortunately he died six months later. His successors also succumbed to the climate and shared a similar fate. Then in 1838, John Birch Freeman (1809–1890), an African who had lived in England, arrived in Ghana with his wife. He worked among the Mfantse-speaking people along the coast and the Ashanti people farther inland, and from his base in Ghana he introduced Methodism to many places along the West African coast.

Once planted, the church grew steadily and by the end of the century had become one of the largest churches in the country. It developed an extensive educational system that included both primary and secondary schools. It supports the cooperative Trinity College with the Presbyterian and Anglican churches.

The church was granted autonomy in 1961. Since that time it has increased its membership from around 80,000 to around 800,000 (2005). Work is divided into 13 districts. The church is an active member of the Ghana Council of Churches, the World Methodist Council, and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church, Ghana
E252/2 Liberia Rd.
PO Box 4043
Accra
Ghana

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Bartels, F. L. The Roots of Ghana Methodism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Southon, A. E. Gold Coast Methodism. London: Hodder & Stoughton, n.d.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church, Great Britain

The Methodist Church of Great Britain is the primary body continuing the Methodist movement launched by the ministry of John Wesley (1703–1791). During his lifetime, Wesley had called together the preachers who worked with him into regular conferences, where they resolved both doctrinal issues and more practical matters about ordering the Methodist religious societies, the local organizations that would at a later date become congregations. Although Wesley took steps to establish the American work as a separate organization, he was always careful to view the British work as a movement within the Church of England. As early as 1752, he began to hold a separate conference for the Methodist preachers in Ireland.

In 1791 the conference assumed control of the movement. Four years later it authorized the serving of the sacraments in the society meetings, an act that is generally considered to mark the formal separation of Methodism from the Church of England and the point at which the Methodist Church became a separate denomination in Great Britain and Ireland. This act also brought the Methodists under a set of British laws regulating dissenting Christian churches, though by this time those laws were falling into obsolescence.

In 1797 the debate over the church's constitution led one group to break away and form the Methodist New Connexion, seeking a more democratic organization. In the Wesleyan Conference, which retained its hold on the movement, only the ministers were members of the conference. Jabez Bunting (1779–1858), who emerged as the leading minister of the conference, founded the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in 1814. He held the movement together but opposed any move to democracy. As a result, the Wesleyan Methodist Association (1837) and the United Methodist Free Church (1857) were set up by dissenting groups. Lay representation was finally granted in the 1870s.

Through the 19th century, the Methodists remained theologically conservative, and although organizationally separate from the Church of England, they were supportive of its role as the country's national church. They were known for their religious fervor and their commitment to social reform, rather than their theological prowess. In 1896 they joined with the other dissenting churches in an ecumenical endeavor, the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches.

Pan-Methodist union in Great Britain was raised as an issue as the ecumenical Methodist conferences began to meet in 1881. After the meeting in London in 1901, three of the smaller British Methodist bodies began a process that led in 1907 to the creation of the United Methodist Church. In 1918 the Wesleyan Methodist Conference invited the Primitive Methodists (a British group that had imported American-style revivalism and camp meetings to England) and the United Methodists to consider a larger merger. A plan of union was approved by the three churches in 1928 and 1929, but it took three more years to complete the process, which included the approval of Parliament. The united body was called the Methodist Church.

The Wesleyan Conference had been a pioneer in world missions even prior to the founding of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. As early as 1794, Thomas Coke (1747–1814) published A Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions Among the Heathen. Because the American work had developed in an independent direction after the American Revolution, Coke turned his attention to building Methodism throughout the Caribbean. The work began on Antigua, from where it spread to other islands. Early in the 19th century, he began to advocate the establishment of work in Africa, and in 1811 George Warren (d. 1812) was appointed to Sierra Leone. In 1813 Coke gave the last of his savings to that cause; he died the following year on his way to Ceylon (Sri Lanka).

Methodism spread as the British Empire expanded, and throughout the 19th century, Wesleyan missions turned Methodism into a global movement. Work was successively opened in Cape Colony, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand, and the South Pacific Islands. In the 1840s Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890) led in the spread of Methodism along the West African coast. In the 20th century many of these missions would grow into the autonomous church bodies that now carry the tradition in most countries of the world.

In 2005 the Methodist Church of Great Britain reported 293,661 members in its 5,900 congregations in England, Scotland, and Wales. It is the largest of the Free churches in the United Kingdom. It is a member of the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland, the World Methodist Council, and the World Council of Churches. The conference in Ireland evolved into the Methodist Church in Ireland in the early 19th century; it has always included the Methodists of Northern Ireland.

J. Gordon Melton

Methodist Church of Great Britain
25 Marlebone Rd.
London NW1 5JR
United Kingdom
<http://www.methodist.org.uk/>

See also: Church of England; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Davies, Rupert, and Gordon Rupp, eds. A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain. 4 vols. London: Epworth Press, 1965–1992.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Turner, John Munsey. Modern Methodism in England. London: Epworth Press, 1997.

Methodist Church, Nigeria

The beginnings of Methodism in Nigeria can be traced to several Africans who had spent time in the Americas as slaves before being freed and returned to Sierra Leone by the British. In 1838 they made their way back to their homeland at Abeokuta, in the southwestern part of present-day Nigeria. They subsequently asked that a missionary be sent to their people.

His Royal Highness Samuel Ademola II, seventh Alake of Abeokuta, with his daughter at the Methodist Missionary Society in London, 1937. (Hulton-Deutsch Collection/Corbis)

In 1942 Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), the British African missionary who introduced Methodism to much of West Africa, traveled to Abeokuta and established a mission station there and at Badagry. In its first generation, the work spread in the territory west of the Niger River, growing so successfully that a separate district was set apart in 1878. By 1913 the mission had more than 6,000 members. Meanwhile, in 1893 two British ministers from the Primitive Methodist Church arrived in Nigeria from their center on the island of Fernando Póo. They settled at Archibong and began to build a missionary movement east of the Niger.

These two missions were brought together in 1932 by the union in the United Kingdom of the Wesleyan Methodists and the Primitive Methodists to form the Methodist Church. The mission established an expansive system of primary and secondary schools and opened a number of medical facilities, including a colony at Uzuakoli for those suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy).

The mission became the independent Methodist Church, Nigeria in 1962. Joseph Soremekun was elected as the first president of the new church. In 1976 the church adopted an episcopal governance system. Churches are grouped into circuits, and circuits are grouped into dioceses, each headed by a bishop. The bishop presides at the annual synod meeting. Dioceses are grouped into six archdioceses, which meet annually under the archbishop. The conference of the whole church meets biennially and is presided over by the church's prelate. In 2005, the church reported two million members.

The Methodist Church, Nigeria oversees two colleges, Immanuel College at Ibadan, cosponsored with the Anglican Church of the Province of Nigeria, and Trinity Theological College at Umuahia, cosponsored with the Anglicans and the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria. The church is ecumenically minded, and it is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council.

Methodist Church, Nigeria
Wesley House
21/22 Marina
PO Box 2011

Lagos
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Ajanaju, Olufemi. Methodist Church Nigeria Today & by the Year 2000. Lagos: Free Enterprise Publishers, 1996.
- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church, Sri Lanka

The Methodist Church in Sri Lanka originated early in the 19th century, when Britain ruled the island nation, then called Ceylon. Thomas Coke (1747–1814) had motivated British Methodists (now the Methodist Church [UK]) to develop an Indian mission, giving the last of his savings to the Wesleyan Conference to help sway them to accept his vision. At the end of 1813 he sailed for Ceylon, but unfortunately he died on the voyage before reaching his destination. Six ministers accompanied Coke, and after their arrival they made two important decisions. They agreed to open schools (a suggestion of the British governor) and subsequently settled in locations on the island in both predominantly Buddhist and predominantly Hindu communities.

The group was soon joined by William Harman, who settled in Colombo and opened a printing establishment. The first church in Sri Lanka, and the first Methodist church in all of Asia, was opened in Colombo in 1816. An extensive school system using Ceylonese teachers was established, and from the school came many of the early converts and many ministers. The elementary schools led to the formation of secondary schools, colleges, and a theological school. The work grew slowly but steadily through the century. Of interest was a Christian-Buddhist debate in 1873 in which a Methodist, David de Silva, participated. The debate attracted the attention of Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907) of the Theosophical Society, leading to his conversion to Buddhism and to his support of Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933) in his development of the Maha Bodhi Society.

Wesleyan mission house in Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon). (The Print Collector/StockphotoPro)

Through World War II the work in Ceylon continued as a district attached to the work in India. Ceylon became independent in 1948, but not until 1964 was a separate Ceylon Conference constituted. At that time the conference became autonomous as the Ceylon Methodist Church. F. S. de Silva was its first president. He was followed by Daniel T. Niles (1908–1970), one of the most famous Asian Christians of the 20th century and a president of the World Council of Churches. The church was invited to join in the formation of a United Church of Ceylon (now the Church of Sri Lanka), but the necessary majority need to support the effort failed to appear.

In 1972 Ceylon withdrew from the British Commonwealth and renamed itself Sri Lanka. The Methodist Church changed its name soon thereafter. In 2005 the Methodist Church, Sri Lanka, reported 32,000 members in what is still a predominantly Buddhist country. The church is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church, Sri Lanka
252 Galle Rd.
Colombo 3
Sri Lanka

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Maha Bodhi Society; Methodist Church, Great Britain; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.
- Small, W. J. T. The History of the Methodist Church in Ceylon. London: Kelly, 1913.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar

In 1887 the Wesleyan Methodists in England (now known as the Methodist Church [UK]) responded to the opportunity to establish work in Upper (or northern)

Myanmar (then called Upper Burma) by sending two missionaries and two Sri Lankan ministers. They began to establish churches in the dry zone of Upper Burma, also building a number of accompanying schools and medical facilities. The work grew steadily and quietly through the mid-20th century. It became the autonomous Methodist Church in Upper Myanmar in 1964.

In 1948 Burma became an independent country. In 1962 the government was overthrown in a military coup and the new leader, General Ne Win (1911–2002), instituted a socialist regime that discarded the democratic guarantees of the country's Constitution. In 1966 he ordered all foreign missionaries to leave the country.

Fortunately, by 1966 the church had largely become an indigenous institution among the Burmese people. After the church became independent in 1964, the emergence of the indigenous leadership led to an increase in membership, which grew by one-third in 1967 alone. So, unlike its American Methodist counterpart in the southern part of the country (now called the Methodist Church of the Union of Myanmar), the church did not suffer the loss of a large number of English-speaking members and quickly recovered from the departure of the missionaries. It did lose its schools and the Methodist Leprosy Home and Hospital, all of which were nationalized.

The Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar, is led by a president rather than a bishop following the British Methodist practice. It is a member of the World Methodist Council, the Christian Conference of Asia, and the World Council of Churches. Now known as the Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar (Myanmar having become the name of the country in 1990), it is not to be confused with the Methodist Church, Lower Myanmar (also known as the Methodist Church of the Union of Myanmar), the other Methodist church operating in the country. The church reported 27,543 members in 2005.

Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar
PO Box 9
28th Street, between 68th and 69th Street
Mandalay
Myanmar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 1997.

Methodist Church in Brazil

In 1835 the Tennessee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC, now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) sent Fountain E. Pitts (1808–1874) to survey the situation in Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina. While in Brazil, Pitts organized a congregation of English-speaking residents of Rio de Janeiro. Following his return to the United States, the church then commissioned Justin Spaulding (1802–1965) to expand the small beginning. He was joined in 1839 by Reverend (and later Bishop) Daniel P. Kidder (1815–1891), his wife, Cyndy Kidder, and two teachers. However, when Cyndy Kidder died and left her husband with an infant, he returned to the States and the mission only lasted a few more years.

The reopening of the work came by an unusual means, following the American Civil War. Confederates who were unwilling to swear allegiance to the U.S. government left for Brazil, where they founded several expatriate communities. Joining the exodus was Reverend Junius E. Newman (1819–1895), of the Alabama Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). He settled in the Province of São Paulo, where most of the Americans had moved. He began preaching in several locations and in 1871 organized the first church. He also began to ask for additional personnel. The General Conference of the MECS sent the first set of missionaries in 1876. At about the same time, an independent layman, William Taylor (1821–1902), became interested in Brazil as part of an overall effort to build a mission in South America. The MEC would later make him a bishop and his work would later be absorbed into the expanding mission of the MECS.

In 1886 Bishop John C. Granbery (1829–1907) organized the Brazil Annual Conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism), known within Methodism as the smallest conference ever formed, there being only three ministerial members. Growth was steady from that year forward, in spite of opposition from the Roman Catholic Church and deaths from yellow fever. It was assisted by three Brazilian converts, Bernardo and Ludgero Miranda and Felipe de Carvaiho, who became preachers of note.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the conference asked for a resident bishop. The action was opposed by the MECS General Conference and did not occur until 1930, when the work was set apart as the autonomous Methodist Church in Brazil. In 1935 the first Brazilian bishop, Cesar Dacorso, was elected. A council was created to continue the fraternal relations between the Brazilian Church and the parent body. In succeeding years, the MECS assisted with funds to open a publishing house and to extend the educational program. A theological school opened in 1942 in São Paulo. In 1955 the annual conferences were designated as regions. Today there are six.

The church's General Conference is the highest legislative body. The College of Bishops administers the policies and decisions of the General Conference, which are collected in three documents, the Social Creed, the Plan for Life and Mission of the Church, and the Guidelines for Program. The Methodist Church in Brazil was the first organization in Latin America to join the World Council of Churches and is also a member of the World Methodist Council. In 2005, the church reported 163,424 members.

Methodist Church in Brazil
 Avenida Piassanguaba 3031
 Bairro
 Planalto Paulista
 04060 004 Sao Paulo, SP
 Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Methodist Church in Chile

The Methodist Church in Chile began with the 1887 plan of William Taylor (1821–1902), a layman in the Methodist Episcopal Church who wanted to organize missions along the west coast of South America. The first group of missionaries landed in Chile the following year, just as what was to become known as the Nitrate War was about to break out. The war led to the annexation of what is now the northern third of Chile from Bolivia and Peru, and as a result the initial work that had been established in Iquique had to be abandoned. More permanent work was established in Valparaíso and Santiago. The work spread as additional missionaries arrived.

The missionaries gathered in 1880 to create a conference structure and elect a president. This work was independent of the Methodist Episcopal Church. However, at the 1884 General Conference, Taylor was suddenly raised from layman to minister and was then elected bishop. He was sent to Africa as a missionary bishop. The Methodist Episcopal Church then moved to adopt his independent work in Chile, which in 1889 became the Chile district of the Cincinnati (Ohio) Conference. James P. Gilliland was named the first district superintendent.

The work in Chile was integrated with a Methodist mission in Argentina in 1892, and the South America Annual Conference was created in 1893. Later Chile was set apart as an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism). The church entered a growth phase, though it experienced a major schism in 1909, when churches and members influenced by Pentecostalism left to found the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile. This schism took with it the most conservative wing of the church.

In 1924 the work in South America was set apart as a central conference, which meant that rather than bishops from the United States coming to South America to head the conference sessions, resident South American bishops were to be elected. The first bishops for the central conference were elected in 1932. The work suffered greatly from a massive earthquake in 1939, in which two Methodist schools, Concepción College and Colegio Americano, and a number of church buildings were destroyed. An earthquake in 1960 likewise did severe damage to church property.

In 1968, the year of the merger that created the United Methodist Church, the Chilean Conference joined in the request of the other South American conferences for independence. The uniting conference granted that request, and the completion of the process occurred at the Annual Conference meeting in 1969. That meeting was held in connection with the last meeting of the Latin American Central Conference and the creation of a new Methodist ecumenical structure, the Council of Latin American Evangelical Methodist Churches.

In 2006, the Methodist Church of Chile reported approximately 10,000 members in 90 churches. The church is headed by a bishop. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council. In the meantime, the Pentecostal Methodist movement, divided into a number of denominations, has become the largest segment of Chilean Protestantism—the 800,000-member Pentecostal Methodist Church of Chile being the largest organization.

Methodist Church of Chile
Sargento Aldea 1041
Casilla 67
Santiago
Chile

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma

Methodism was brought to Fiji in 1835, after negotiations among various British Protestant groups working in the South Pacific had led to the assignment of the islands to the Methodists. Thus, in 1835 William Cross (d. 1842) and David Cargill (d. 1843), previously working on Tonga, replaced two missionaries of the London Missionary Society who had set up work in Fiji in 1830. Their work was initially assisted by several Fijians they had met while on Tonga. In 1841 the work on Rotuma, just north of Fiji, was assigned to the Fiji Mission.

The Methodists arrived during the reign of Na Ulivau, who had united the islands into one community. The missionaries made little progress until 1854, when they effected the conversion and baptism of Ratu Seru Cakobau, Na Ulivau's son and successor. Ratu Seru Cakobau developed a great love for Western culture, at one point offering his kingdom for annexation by the United States. Caught in the grip of an impending civil war, Washington ignored his overtures. Great Britain accepted his invitation in 1874. They began to bring Indian laborers to the island, which in 1892 prompted the Methodists to begin an Indian mission there.

In 1854 the Australian Methodists (now a constituent part of the Uniting Church in Australia) assumed responsibility for the work in Fiji, and work continued under their guidance until 1964. It then became one of the independent island conferences affiliated with what was known as the Methodist Church of Australasia. As each of the island groups gained political independence, the conferences became national churches and the Methodist Church of Australasia was discontinued.

The Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma follows the beliefs of other Methodists, as embedded in the writing of John Wesley (1703–1791) and the Methodist Articles of Religion. The church has strong fraternal relationships with the Uniting Church in Australia, the United Methodist Church (U.S.A.), and the Methodist Church in Great Britain.

As the church became established, it became a missionary sending organization. The first missionaries from Fiji arrived on New Guinea in 1875. Subsequently, Fijian missionaries served in Papua, the Solomons, and northern Australia. In 1924 it founded the Navuso Agricultural School.

Over the years, beginning with its close relationship with Ratu Seru Cakobau, the church was often identified with the Fijian government. The church had developed the country's educational system, which was taken over by the government in 1846. That close relationship became something of a problem as the Indian segment of the islands came to numerical majority. Methodists, the largest Christian group in the islands, became second to the Hinduism brought from India.

This identification with the government has been critical to the public understanding of the church, beginning with the government coup in 1987 and in subsequent years, as the conflict between the native Fijians and Indian-Fijians has flared. The church was accused of identifying with the coup leaders in 1987 and of attempting to replace the religious freedom enjoyed in the islands with a government preference for Christianity. The same accusation emerged in 2000, when a native Fijian, George Speight (b. 1957), attempted a second coup. The church had to publicly distance itself from the coup attempt and the taking of hostages, while at the same time minister pastorally to supporters of the coup, many of whom were Methodists. Speight was himself identified with the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

The church reported 213,000 members in 2006. This ecumenically minded Methodist body is a member of the Fiji Council of Churches, the Pacific Conference of Churches, the World Methodist Council, and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma
 GOP Box 356
 Suva
 Fiji

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; Methodist Church, Great Britain; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Methodist Church; Uniting Church in Australia; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, the United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in India

Methodist interest in India began with British minister Thomas Coke (1747–1814), who died at sea on his way to Ceylon and to establish work at Madras. James Lynch (1775–1858) and others who were traveling with Coke settled in Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and initiated the Methodist Church Sri Lanka. In 1817 Lynch moved on to Madras and initiated an extensive Methodist work associated with the British Methodists. More than 100 years later, as India was attaining its independence, that work would merge with missions from several other Protestant churches to become the Church of South India and the Church of North India. Methodists from the United States, associated with the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC) (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), arrived in 1856. Among the volunteers were Reverend William Butler (1818–1899) and his wife, Clementina Rowe. They had moved to the United States from Ireland, where Butler had been the assistant to James Lynch after Lynch's stay in India. The Butlers began their work in Lucknow and Bareilly, and were able to take advantage of the East India Company's new impetus to found schools in the country. The company gave both official sanction and resources for the development of the mission's extensive education program, which included primary and secondary schools and several colleges.

By 1864 an annual conference (the basic unit of organization in Methodism) was organized and four Indian ministers were received as members. In 1870 the famous lay-preacher and future Methodist bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) began his four-year stay in India, during which time the mission was energized and expanded. The conference began to experience spurts of growth, as whole groups of people would often make the decision to become Christians together. These group conversions, sometimes inappropriately termed "mass movements," led to the rapid growth of the church in northern India. In 1870 the movement was first joined by the female missionaries of the newly formed Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. The first of these missionaries were Isabella Thoburn (1840–1901), the sister of the missionary and future-bishop James Thoburn (1836–1922), and Clara A. Swain (1834–1910), one of the first American female physicians. Isabella Thoburn founded the first college for women in India, today known as Thoburn College. Swain formed the first hospital for women in the country, which also today bears the name of its founder.

Methodist bishop Edgar Bentley Thorp attending the inauguration of the Church of South India. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

In 1884 the MEC General Conference passed legislation that allowed the formation of a semiautonomous central conference in areas of the world where there were multiple annual conferences. The South Asia Central Conference was organized in 1885 in India and covered work eastward to Malaysia and eventually the Philippines. The central conference assumed the duty of electing bishops in the area, and in 1930 the first Indian national, Jasvant Rao Chitambar, was elected to the episcopacy.

The church in India remained affiliated with the United Methodist Church formed in the United States in 1968, but in 1980 it received permission to consider reorganization as an independent body. It voted in favor of independence, and in 1981 the Methodist Church in India came into existence. It continues its cordial and interactive relationship with the United Methodist Church and maintains the structure that was set in place during the days of the central conference.

In the late 1990s the Methodist Church in India reported 648,000 members. Its 2,460 congregations are organized among 12 district conferences. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church in India

Methodist Centre
21 YMCA Rd.
Mumbai Central
Bombay 400 008
India

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of North India; Church of South India; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Matthews, James K. South of the Himalayas: One Hundred Years of Methodism in India and Pakistan. New York: Board of Missions of the Methodist Church, 1955.
- Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Indonesia

The Methodist Church of Indonesia is a multicultural church with a multicultural origin. It began with the arrival of Hong Tean, a Chinese layman who settled in Medan, Sumatra, where he established a school. His work was soon supplemented by the arrival of C. F. Pyekett, a Methodist minister from the United States. Pyekett then facilitated the addition of S. S. Pakianathan, a Malaysian pastor, who spoke Tamil. In 1907, Pakianathan moved to Palembang to work with John R. Denyes, who had also come to Sumatra from Malaysia. Over the succeeding decades, additional missionaries arrived and the work spread. By 1940, there were 60 congregations with some 2,500 members, most Indonesians of Chinese and Indian heritage. An autonomous Sumatra annual conference, independent of the Methodist Church (in the United States), was created in 1964. Following the merger of the Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren in 1968, the Evangelical United Brethren work begun on Sulawesi in the 1950s was integrated into the Methodist church in Indonesia.

Outreach has continued to be focused in education and most congregations support an elementary school. In some districts the children in school outnumber the church membership. Work remains multi-linguistic. While Indonesian is a basic language, especially for the schools, worship is carried out in more than a dozen languages.

Since becoming an independent body, the church has spread to all parts of Indonesia, though its strength remains in Sumatra. It has strength on Bali, South Sulawesi, around Pontianak in Kalimantan, and the suburbs of Jakarta (Java). In 2005, it reported 119,000 members. Its 469 congregations were organized into 2 annual conferences and 12 districts. It is led by its bishop, R. P. M. Tambunan. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

I Jl. Kartini No. 31
Medan 20252
Sumatra Utara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Ireland

John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of the Methodist movement, made his first visits to Ireland in 1747, prompted by the fact that some Methodist preachers had already organized a Methodist religious society in Dublin. Both he and his brother Charles spent a great deal of time in Ireland through the rest of the decade, and Wesley returned there on 19 subsequent occasions. Wesley held the first Irish conference in 1752, and either he or Thomas Coke (1747–1814) presided each year through the rest of the century. In the years after Wesley's death, Coke worked with the conference that became the inheritor of Wesley's authority.

Following Coke's death, the relationship of Irish Methodists to the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church of Ireland, and the dissenting Free churches dominated its discussions. In 1816 the conference gave permission for the celebration of the Lord's Supper at the local Methodist societies. When that action had been taken in England some years earlier, it had signaled the movement's separation from the British Methodists. Those Methodists in Ireland who opposed this action formed the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Connexion and kept their identification with the Church of Ireland. By the 1870s that relationship was no longer operative, and in 1878 the two branches of Irish Methodism united to form the present Methodist Church in Ireland.

In the meantime, Irish Methodists kept a cordial relationship with British Methodists. Rather than creating a separate missionary society, they supported the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, through which they made their contribution to the worldwide spread of Wesley's movement. The Irish Methodists founded their first school in 1784, and elementary education remained an important concern through the 19th century. In 1868 the Methodist College at Belfast was opened. The Wesleyan Connexional School (secondary school) evolved into Wesley College, Dublin. During this time Irish Methodists had to continually overcome the effects of the immigration of its members, especially to the United States.

Methodist church in Howth, Dublin, Ireland. (iStockPhoto)

Methodist organization is based in the annual conference, now consisting of an equal number of ministers and laypeople. The Methodist Church in Ireland maintains a traditional and somewhat unique relationship with the Methodists in the United Kingdom. The president of the Methodist Church of Great Britain presides as president of the Irish conference, and eight Irish ministers sit in the British conference. The Irish elect the vice president of the conference, who acts as president of the church except when the conference meets.

In 2005, the Methodist Church in Ireland reported 60,000 members. From the 19th century to the present, in large part due to the immigration patterns, Methodism has shifted its center from Dublin and southern Ireland to the Belfast area. In 2002 the church entered into a covenant relationship with the Anglican Church of Ireland. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

The Methodist Church in Ireland

1 Fountainville Avenue Belfast BT9 6AN
United Kingdom

<http://www.irishmethodist.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Cole, R. Lee. Methodism in Ireland. Belfast: Irish Methodist Publishing, 1960.
- Cooney, Dudley Lewistone. The Methodists in Ireland: A Short History. Dublin: Columba Press, 2001.
- Jeffrey, F. Irish Methodism: An Account of Its Traditions, Theology, and Influence. Belfast: Epworth House, 1964.
- Vickers, John A. A Dictionary of Methodism in Britain and Ireland. London: Epworth Press, 2000.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Kenya

Methodist work in Kenya was initiated in 1857 by the United Methodist Free Churches, one of several splinter groups among the British Methodists that had come into existence as part of the struggle of laypeople to gain a greater voice in the running of the church. The United Methodist Free Churches commissioned missionaries to work in East Africa in 1862. The 19th-century mission was largely confined to the coastal region, but around 1912 work was established in the center of the country, north of Mount Kenya. As the mission developed, schools, medical facilities, and programs in agriculture were started.

Early in the 20th century, the United Churches would participate in a series of mergers, leading in 1932 to the formation of the present Methodist Church and bringing the African mission with it. The Kenyan church became autonomous in 1967, four years after Kenya became an independent country. The next year the government assumed hegemony over all schools in the country, including the Methodist schools, though a cooperative management arrangement was retained. The church now works with more than 200 schools and in addition sponsors agricultural training institutes, technical schools, and special schools for the physically disabled. It co-sponsors the ecumenical Theological College at Limuru. In the 1990s it opened a major new national venture, Kenya Methodist University.

Following the British model, the church was originally headed by a president, but it has since moved to an episcopal system. The church is currently led by a presiding bishop, and a bishop heads each of the 10 synods (districts). In 2005, the church reported 450,000 members. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church in Kenya
PO Box 47633
Nairobi
Kenya

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Nthamburi, Zablon John. A History of the Methodist Church in Kenya. Nairobi: Uzima Press, 1982.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Samoa

The Methodist Church in Samoa dates to the arrival of a Samoan chief on Tonga in 1826 and his conversion by the Methodist missionaries he found there. Upon his return to Samoa in 1828, he began to preach and raise churches. Peter Turner, the first European Methodist to arrive and settle in Samoa, found a thriving Methodist movement of more than 2,000 believers. About that same time representatives of the London Missionary Society (LMS), a Congregationalist organization that had established work in Samoa in 1830, and the Methodist leadership in Tonga agreed to divide the land upon which they would work. To avoid competition, the LMS would work on Samoa and the Methodists would work in Tonga. Turner was asked to withdraw from Samoa.

In part because communication at the time was slow and primitive and in part because they identified with Methodism, the Methodists of Samoa did not accept the decision to join with the LMS work. Thus they found themselves cut off from the mainstream of Methodist life. Then in 1855, the Methodist Church in Australia became independent of the mother church in Great Britain. John Thomas (1796–1881), the leader of the Methodist missionaries in Tonga, became the advocate of the Samoan Methodists, and the Australians voted to resume relations with the small group. Thomas argued that the new independent body was not bound by the agreement their British forebears had made with the LMS. Martin Dyson arrived in Samoa in 1857 and was succeeded by George Brown (1835–1917), who was most successful in building the church while keeping cordial ties to the LMS missionaries. The LMS remained by far the larger body.

The church continued to grow even after the division of Samoa in 1899, when the eastern islands were set apart as American Samoa. In 1964, two years after the western islands became the independent nation of Samoa, Samoan Methodists became the independent Methodist Church in Samoa.

Worshippers at the front of a congregation in a Methodist church in Western Samoa. (Nik Wheeler/Corbis)

At the end of the 20th century, the Methodist Church in Samoa reported approximately 36,000 members. The majority of members live in Samoa, but there are congregations across American Samoa and in the United States, where many Samoans have migrated. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council.

The Methodist Church in Samoa
PO Box 1867
Apia
Samoa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of

Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Singapore

The Methodist Church in Singapore began in 1885 with the arrival of William F. Oldham (1854–1937) and James M. Thoburn (1836–1922) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church). Oldham established a multiethnic congregation, and a building was erected before the year was out. A school for Chinese members was opened, and members of Tamil (Indian) background soon organized a Tamil-speaking congregation and school. These became the start of an extensive education system serving the Chinese and Indian communities within the small island state. The missionary thrust soon carried the Methodists across the Malaysian Peninsula.

The work in Singapore was originally included in the South India Annual Conference. In 1902 the Malaysia Annual Conference was organized. In 1950, the church in the region took a step toward independence with the establishment of the Southeast Asia Central Conference, which elected its own bishop. Autonomy finally arrived in 1968 when the Methodist churches and institutions in Malaysia and Singapore were set apart as the Methodist Church in Malaysia and Singapore. This was the same year that the United Methodist Church was formed in the United States. In 1976 the Malaysian and Singapore works were separated and the Methodist Church in Singapore was formed. Theodore R. Doraisamy was the new church's first bishop.

In 2005, the Methodist Church in Singapore reported 32,236 members. The church continues to support an extensive educational system. Ministers are trained at Trinity Theological College, a joint venture of Methodists, Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Lutherans. Members are organized in three conferences, one serving mostly Anglo members, one primarily serving the Chinese, and one serving Tamil members. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council.

The Methodist Church in Singapore
10 Mount Sophia
Singapore 228459
<http://www.methodist.org.sg/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of

Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Doraisamy, T. R. Forever Beginning 2. One Hundred Years of Methodism in Singapore. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 1986.

Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas

The Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas incorporates the work launched in the late 19th century by British Methodists in the Caribbean and Central America. In the years immediately after the American Revolution, after overseeing the process of setting up an independent American Methodist church, Thomas Coke (1747–1814) emerged with a world missionary vision. As early as 1784 he published the Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen. Following up on that plan, in 1786 he made his first trip to the West Indies, landing in Antigua on Christmas Day. There he visited an Antiguan slave owner named Nathaniel Gilbert (d. 1774), who for several decades had pursued a Methodist-inspired Christian work among the Africans on his land. In his second trip in 1789, Coke visited Jamaica, where William Hammett (d. 1803), the first Methodist missionary in the region, would be assigned. From Antigua and Jamaica, Methodism spread to other Caribbean islands, especially the Bahamas (1799) and Trinidad and Tobago (1812). Methodism became identified with the antislavery cause in the Caribbean, and many former slaves joined the church after their emancipation.

Methodism ventured to Guyana in the persons of two laymen, who moved there from Nevis in 1801. The first minister was assigned by the British Conference in 1815. Much of his effort was directed to the slave population, and he joined the Moravians in the attempt to overcome the plantation owners' opposition to missionary activity. Work then extended to British Honduras (now Belize) when a Methodist layperson asked the British Conference to appoint a minister to the region. Thomas Wilkinson arrived in 1825.

A 19th century Methodist church in Philipsburg on the island of St. Maarten in the Antilles. (Ramunas/Dreamstime.com)

The work in the various British colonies around the Caribbean developed somewhat independently. In 1885, an autonomous West Indian Conference was formed, but it was disbanded in 1904, and the work returned to the direct control of the British Conference. Then in 1967, a new effort at independence was inaugurated when Jamaica, Guyana, Honduras, and the South Caribbean and the sub-district that included Haiti, the Leeward Islands, Panama, and Costa Rica combined to form the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. The Bahamas were added in 1968. The church's work now extends throughout the Caribbean, including some 62,000 members (2005) in some 35 nations. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council.

Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas
Methodist Conference Center

Scott's Hill
PO Box 9
St. John's Antigua

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodism; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Forever Beginning: Two Hundred Years of Methodism in the Western Area.* Kingston, Jamaica: Literature Department of Methodist Church, 1960.
- Walker, F. Deaville. The Call of the West Indies. London: Cargate Press, 1910.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006.* Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar

Methodist work in Myanmar (then Burma) began in 1873, when James M. Thoburn (1836–1922), a missionary (and later bishop) in India, responded to requests for support from Indian Methodists who had relocated to the Burmese city of Rangoon (now Yangon). In 1879 William Taylor (1821–1902), an independent Methodist lay evangelist, sent a colleague, Robert E. Carter, to Rangoon, and Thoburn acted quickly to coordinate the two efforts. Soon a building was secured and services were begun in Tamil and Telegu, both Indian languages. The Burma work was seen as an outpost of the South India Conference, assigned to the new Bengal Conference in 1888.

Although based in the Indian expatriate community, the work soon extended to the Amoy-speaking people and the Chinese community. Because of this growth, it was designated as a mission conference in 1901 and an annual conference (the basic unit of organization in Methodism) in 1927. In 1951 the Indian government opened the Andaman Islands to civilian settlement, and a number of the Burmese Indian Methodists moved there to found the first Christian community.

In the early 1960s, as Burma moved to national independence, the Burma Annual Conference of what was then the Methodist Church (1939–1968) (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) requested autonomous status. That request was granted by the 1964 General Conference. The independent Burma Methodist Church was constituted in 1965. Lim Si Sin was elected as the first bishop. The church had approximately 2,800 members (adults and children) at the time, and it sponsored a string of elementary and secondary schools across the country. The church was organized into four districts according to language groups.

Burma had become an independent nation in 1948. However, in 1962 General Ne Win (b. 1911) overthrew the government and abrogated the democratic government and Constitution. Through the 1960s, a number of the English-speaking Methodists left the country, and in 1966 all missionaries were expelled by the new Socialist government. In the 1980s the country passed through difficult economic times and was cited for numerous human rights violations. In 1990 the name of the country was changed to the Union of Myanmar. During the 1990s the government massacred members of various ethnic groups residing in Burma. The Methodist Church, based as it has been in the ethnic communities, suffered accordingly.

In 1986, the church opened a theological institute for the training of ministers. Early in the new century it reported approximately 2,000 members (adults and children). It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the Christian Council of Asia, but it is not a member of the World Council of Churches. The church is also known as the Methodist Church of Lower Myanmar, not to be confused with the Methodist Church Upper Myanmar, the product of British Methodist missionary activity.

The Methodist Church in the Union of Myanmar
c/o Methodist English Church
47 Baho Road, Thazin Lane
Ah lone Township
Yangon
Myanmar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church in Zimbabwe

British Methodists Owen Watkins (1842–1915) and Isaac Shimmin introduced Methodism into present-day Zimbabwe (then Southern Rhodesia) in 1891. They had responded to an offer from Cecil Rhodes (1853–1902) of 100 pounds sterling per annum for the Wesleyan Methodists (now the Methodist Church in Great Britain) in support for such an endeavor. Rhodes's British South Africa Company had also made a grant of land for the development of missionary stations. The original stations were opened at Epworth near Salisbury and at Sinoia in the Lamagundi District. The following year, stations were opened at Nengubo (or Waddilove), Kwenda, and Bulawayo. The work was assigned to the Transvaal District of the South African Conference.

The most notable Methodist leader of the first generation was John White (1866–1933), who served for almost 40 years and became known for his defense of the resident Zimbabweans in the face of an often abusive colonial regime. He also developed the Waddilove Institute, where the first Zimbabwean ministers were trained. In 1904 the first African ministers were ordained by the church.

The church grew steadily through the 20th century in the area west and south of Salisbury. It developed a cooperative relationship with an American Methodist mission (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) that had begun in 1897 and concentrated its work north and east of Salisbury. In 1964 the church became a charter member of the Christian Council of Rhodesia, which earned the wrath of the government by declaring its disapproval of the country's unilateral declaration of independence in 1965. In 1968 it joined other members of the Council in forming a college.

The Methodist Church in Zimbabwe became independent of the British Conference in 1977. It organized in a manner similar to the parental body and was led by a president rather than a bishop. That changed in 1989, when Farai J. Chirisa was named the church's first bishop. At the beginning of the new century, the church reported 111,900 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church in Zimbabwe
Central Ave.
PO Box 712
Causeway, Harare
Zimbabwe

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Cuba

The Methodist Church of Cuba originated among Cubans living in Key West, Florida, in the 1870s. Around 1883 several of these Cubans, including the Reverends Enrique B. Someillan (1856–1928) and Aurelio Silvera, returned to their homeland and began to lead worship services. The first church was opened in Havana in 1888. There were 194 members. Other Cuban pastors arrived soon afterward to help expand the work.

Spain's defeat in the Spanish-American War in 1898 forced it to relinquish control of the island, which became an independent country. Immediately after the war, Bishops Warren A. Candler (1859–1941) and Walter R. Lambuth (1854–1921) of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) went to Cuba to inspect and reorganize the work there. Two missionaries arrived in 1899 to further expand the work geographically. The Cuba Mission of the MECS was organized in 1907. It became a mission conference in 1919. In 1939 the MECS united with the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Protestant Church to create the Methodist Church (1939–1968), then the largest Protestant church in the United States. The Cuban work became the Cuba Annual Conference of the merged body.

In 1959 Fidel Castro became the prime minister of Cuba, and relations between Cuba and the United States have since remained hostile. In 1962 most of the U.S. missionaries were withdrawn, leaving the church in a somewhat weakened condition. Women became an even more important part of church leadership and were welcomed as lay ministers. In 1964 the General Conference of the Methodist Church, partially in response to the needs of the Cuban Methodists now worshipping under a regime hostile to religion, passed a resolution allowing the Cuban work to become autonomous. In 1968 the newly independent church reorganized as the Methodist Church of Cuba. It recognized one of its recently deceased leaders, Angel Foster, as its first bishop, and then elected Armando Rodriguez as its new bishop.

Although somewhat hampered by the Castro regime, the church has revived, joining the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council, and participating in missionary activities in Colombia and other areas that lack a Methodist church. Early in the new century, the church had approximately 10,000 members.

Calle K. #502
Entre 25Y27 Venado
Ciudad de la Habana, 10400
Cuba

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Wingeier, Philip. Cuban Methodism: The Untold Story of Survival and Revival. Stone Mountain, GA: Dolphins & Orchids Publishing, 2007.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Malaysia

The Methodist Church of Malaysia traces its beginnings to the visit of William F. Oldham (1854–1937) and James M. Thoburn (1836–1922) (both later bishops) to Singapore in 1885. They founded a church under the auspices of the South Indian Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC), now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church. From its base in Singapore, then part of the Straits Settlement, work was launched northward into the Federation of Malaysia. The work grew quickly and in 1889 was named the Malaya Mission of the newly formed Bengal (India) Conference; in 1894 it was set apart as the Malaysia Mission Conference. It became an annual conference (the basic organizational unit in Methodism) in 1902.

Important to the work was William G. Shellabear (1852–1947), an Englishman who met Oldham in Singapore. A talented linguist, Shellabear was soon fluent in Malay and several dialects. Until he was overcome by the hot and humid weather, he gave valuable service translating Christian literature into Malaysian. Meanwhile, in 1890 Benjamin F. West and H. L. E. Leuring traveled through Dyak (Iban) country in Sarawak.

Then in 1901 a number of Chinese, including some Methodists from the China mission, were forced out of their homes by the Boxer Rebellion. Bishop Frank W. Warne (1854–1932) accompanied them and assisted in their resettlement in Sarawak. New congregations of Methodists arose almost immediately. As a result, James M. Hoover (1872–1935) was transferred from the Malaysia Conference to Sarawak, where he would remain for the next 35 years. As he spoke Malaysian, he was able to begin work among them and then extend his evangelistic efforts to the Dyak (Iban) people. Work was especially fruitful among the ethnic Chinese, who constitute a sizable minority in Malaysia. In 1936 the Chinese work was set apart as a second Malaysia Mission Conference. It became an annual conference in 1948.

In 1968, as U.S. Methodists moved to reunite into the United Methodist Church, the work in Malaysia was granted permission to become an autonomous church. That year, the Malaya Chinese Annual Conference, the Singapore-Malaya Annual Conference, the Tamil

Christians sing during a prayer service at Kuala Lumpur Wesley Methodist Church in Malaysia. (Viviane Moos/Corbis)

Provisional Annual Conference in West Malaysia and Singapore, the Sarawak Annual Conference, and the Sarawak Iban Provisional Annual Conference in East Malaysia united to form the new Methodist Church of Malaysia and Singapore. Dr. Yap Kim Hoa was elected as the first bishop. The conferences continued as units in the new church. The work in Singapore was set apart as the Methodist Church in Singapore in 1976. In 1996, the Methodist Church of Malaysia moved to establish mission conferences to organize the Chinese work in Sabah and the Sengoi work on the peninsula of Malaysia.

In 2005, the Methodist Church of Malaysia reported 97,197 members. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Malaysia
69 Jin 5/31
46000 Petaling Jaya

Senlangor, D.E.
Malaysia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Goh, Robbie B. H. Sparks of Grace: The Story of Methodism in Asia. Singapore: Methodist Church in Singapore, 2003.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Mexico

The Methodist Church of Mexico traces its beginning to the country's Constitution of 1857, which included provisions for the separation of church and state and for the freedom of religion. U.S. Methodists immediately expressed an interest in establishing missions in Mexico, but this work awaited the outcome of the American Civil War and the readjustments of the church in the war's aftermath. In 1871 Bishop Matthew Simpson (1811–1884) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) led the process of allocating church funds for a missionary to Mexico. As a result, Bishop Gilbert Haven (1821–1880) went to Mexico the next year. He was soon joined by William Butler (1818–1899), who was designated as the superintendent of the soon-to-be established mission. Butler opened the first church on Christmas Day, 1873.

At the 1873 Louisiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (MECS, now also a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), money was raised to send Bishop John C. Keener (1819–1906) to Mexico to launch another mission. Keener secured the first church of the MECS mission, a former monastery chapel. Alejo Hernandez (1842–1875), a Mexican who had been converted during a stay in Brownsville, Texas, returned to Mexico City to become the pastor of this Methodist congregation. He was the first native Mexican preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. J. L. Daves arrived in 1875 as the superintendent of the movement.

Although church and state were formally separated in Mexico, the Catholic Church remained a strong establishment and the building of Protestant churches was plagued by obstacles. However, by the end of the century, churches and associated schools and medical facilities had been established in most of the major cities. In 1930, anticipating the union in the United States of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (which occurred in 1939), the missions of the two churches in Mexico united and became the Methodist Church of Mexico. For a number of years the two missions had held an annual joint national convention.

Shortly after the union, the new church published a Discipline, the book of church law, and established two annual conferences, the basic organizational unit in Methodism. Bishops are elected for four-year terms. Currently the church is divided into six episcopal areas that include parishes in all but two of the states of Mexico.

Education has been an important emphasis since the beginning of the church, and in addition to its system of primary and secondary schools, the church founded several institutions of higher learning, including Colegio Palinore in Chihuahua and the Union Theological Seminary in Mexico City, the latter created in cooperation with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) and the Congregational Church (now a constituent part of the United Church of Christ). It currently oversees a university and two theological seminaries.

In 2005, the Methodist Church of Mexico reported 50,000 members in 400 churches. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Mexico
Cuernavaca 116
Col. San Benito
CP 83191 Hermosillo, Sonda
Mexico

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); United Church of Christ; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Baker, Betty M. Mexico Methodism: A Continuous Ministry Since 1832. Mexico United Methodist Church, 1976.

Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.

Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Lee, Elizabeth M. Methodism in Mexico. New York: Board of Missions of the Methodist Church, n.d.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of New Zealand

The Methodist Church of New Zealand (Te Haahi Weteriana o Aotearoa) traces its beginning to the arrival of Samuel Leigh (1785–1852), who had also introduced Methodism into Australia. Leigh settled at Kaeo in the 1820s, where he established an initial station, called Wesleydale. The station was destroyed by Maori warriors in 1827, and the missionaries moved their work to Mangungu, from which it spread throughout the island. Despite the animosity of their initial encounter with the missionaries, many Maoris became Methodists.

The Methodist missionaries played a significant role in facilitating the signing of the 1840 Treaty of Waitangi, which placed New Zealand under British protection and guaranteed the Maori a broad set of rights. However, the mission was hurt significantly in the fighting between the Maoris and the Pakela people, and the mission never really recovered. By the mid-1900s, there were approximately 15,000 Maori Methodists.

In the meantime, Methodism spread among the European settlers in New Zealand. In 1854 oversight was transferred from England to Australia, and in 1873 a New Zealand Conference was established. Also, several schismatic Methodist churches, the United Methodist Free Churches, the Bible Christian Church, and the Primitive Methodist Church, had spread to New Zealand from England. In 1896 the United Methodist Free churches and the Bible Christians merged into the Methodist Conference. On January 1, 1913, the New Zealand Methodists became autonomous from Australia as the Wesleyan Methodist Church of New Zealand.

A month later, that church merged with the Primitive Methodists to form the presently existing Methodist Church of New Zealand.

The church continues the beliefs and practices of the parent bodies in Australia (now part of the Uniting Church in Australia) and the United Kingdom (now the Methodist Church [UK]). A college for training ministers was founded in 1912. Prior to 1913, New Zealanders also supported the Australian missions on several South Pacific islands. In anticipation of autonomy, the New Zealand church was assigned hegemony over the mission in the Western Solomon Islands. After World War II, the New Zealanders cooperated with the Australians in work in New Guinea, the personnel of which included Solomon Islanders.

Today, the Methodist Church of New Zealand has associated work in Samoa, Tonga, and Fiji. In 2005 it reported 18,548 members in 158 parishes. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and a founding member of the World Council of Churches.

In 1972, a new recognition of the importance of the Maori membership was made with the designation of a Maori Synod (the Taha Maori). Then in 1983, the church officially committed itself to continue a bicultural program in which the Maori culture is equal to that of the more dominant Anglo culture.

Methodist Church of New Zealand
Morley House
21/22 Marina
PO Box 931
Christchurch 8015
New Zealand

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church; Uniting Church in Australia; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Lewis, Jack. The Search for Unity: Methodism and Ecumenism in New Zealand. Christchurch: Wesley Historical Society (New Zealand), 1983.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2003–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Peru

The Methodist Church of Peru (Iglesia Metodista del Peru) grew out of the visits of William Taylor (1821–1902), an American Methodist layman, to the west coast of South America in 1877. Taylor established work at Iquique, but soon afterward that part of Peru became the subject of a war between Chile and Peru and was annexed to Chile. In the 1880s, Francisco G. Penzotti (1851–1925), a Methodist and agent of the American Bible Society, began to travel through Peru, distributing Bibles. In 1890 he was arrested and became the focus of international concern about freedom of religion in the country. His work resulted in the first Methodist congregation in Peru being organized in 1889 in Callao.

The next year, Thomas B. Wood (1844–1922), a Methodist who had been working in Argentina and Uruguay, arrived in Peru. He had been designated the superintendent of the new Western District of the South American Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church). With his daughter, Elsie Wood, he founded several schools, the first Protestant institutions in the country. Although the educational work grew, evangelism was hampered through the first generations of this mission. By 1945 there were still only some 400 members. However, in the decades after World War II, missionaries moved into the countryside and the church began to grow among several of the native peoples, especially the Campa people. In the 1960s the work in Peru was named a provisional conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In 1961 the church added to its school system the Panamericana Normal School, which focused on the training of teachers for its elementary and high school system. Meanwhile, other work was growing into five institutions of higher education: Colegio America del Callao, Colegio Alverado, Colegio Andino, Colegio Americo de la Victoria, and Colegio Daniel Alcides Carrion. The Peruvian conference also supported a theological center, Comunidad Biblico Teológica Wenceslao Bahamonde.

At the same time, the conference developed a new emphasis on social service and social change. In 1965 it issued a document unique among South American Protestants called the “Manifesto to the Nation,” outlining the church’s role as an active force in affecting the social and economic order. This document, which argued that effective revolution should spring forth from the power of God, was issued in the midst of large-scale social protest over what many perceived as an unjust social system.

By 1968 the work in Peru had been organized as an annual conference in the Methodist Church (1939–1968). That same year the Methodist Church entered into the merger that produced the United Methodist Church, which gave its South American conferences the option of becoming autonomous. The Peruvian Conference opted for independent status. The new Methodist Church of Peru was organized in 1970. Dr. Wenceslao Bahamonde was elected as the church’s first bishop. The church’s theological training center is named in his memory.

In 2005, the church reported 8,000 members in 130 congregations. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and, since 1972, the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Peru
 Apartado 1386
 Lima 100
 Peru

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships.

Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Puerto Rico

The Methodist Church of Puerto Rico is a product of the Protestant missionary movement on the island following its transfer to American control in 1898. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) transferred Charles W. Drees (1851–1926), previously stationed in Uruguay, to Puerto Rico in 1900. The first church was organized in Guyana in 1902. That same year, the Puerto Rico Mission was formally organized. It evolved into a mission conference in 1913. In 1939, the year of a major merger of the branches of American Methodism, it reported 2,800 members. The next year the work was named a provisional annual conference. By the time of the formation of the United Methodist Church in 1968, the conference reported 11,800 members and was recognized as a full annual conference. In 1972, it began a process of becoming autonomous, a process completed in 1992, though it retains a strong fraternal relationship to its parent body.

In 2005, the church reported 12,000 members in 100 congregations. It maintains a variety of educational and social service ministries, and is ecumenically active. It is a member of both the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Puerto Rico
Box 23339, UPR Station
San Juan, PR 00931-3339

J. Gordon Melton

See also: United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

Methodist Church of Sierra Leone

Methodism in Sierra Leone began with the efforts of U.S. Methodists to extend their ministry into Canada. In 1781 William Black (1760–1834) was assigned to pioneer work in Nova Scotia, where he discovered at Sherburne and other communities a number of Africans who had been brought to Canada by the British army at the end of the American Revolution. They had supported the British in return for a promise of freedom.

With the help of British antislavery organizations, the Africans living in Nova Scotia were offered transportation to the new colony of Sierra Leone. In 1792 many accepted the opportunity and were taken to Freetown, including some 200 Methodists. Soon thereafter they began to correspond with the Wesleyan Methodists in England (now the Methodist Church [UK]), and, in 1811, George Warren (d. 1812) was finally assigned as a missionary. He arrived with three schoolmasters, who began the Methodist educational enterprise in Sierra Leone.

Warren died some eight months after his arrival in Sierra Leone, but the church survived and grew over the next decade. In addition to the former slaves from Nova Scotia, the missionaries served other groups in Sierra Leone. A number of Maroons, former slaves who had escaped plantation life in Jamaica only to be recaptured and transported to Sierra Leone in 1800, came under the influence of the Methodists, as did the “recaptives,” those slaves captured in the process of being transported to the Americas and returned to Africa. What looked like the blossoming of a prosperous mission, however, quickly disintegrated. In 1821 the older members of the Methodist church in Freetown argued with the missionaries, who then attempted to dissolve the congregations. They continued as an independent organization. Then the Maroons (1835) and “recaptures” (1844) left the Freetown society because they felt they were being treated as second-class citizens.

Parishioners worship at Zion Wilberforce Church in Freetown, Sierra Leone, 1975. (National Geographic/Getty Images)

The Methodists had thus split into four separate groups: the original Freetown society, the Wesleyan mission, the Maroon church, and the “recaptures” church (known as the West African Methodist Church). In addition, in 1841, following public excitement over the Amistad incident, American Methodists founded a fifth Methodist church among the Mende people at Sherbro, Sierra Leone. This work now exists as the Sierra Leone Conference of the United Methodist Church.

Eventually, the problems of the Freetown society and the Maroon church with the Wesleyan mission were resolved, and they reunited. The West African Methodist Church, however, affiliated with the United Methodist Free Churches in the United Kingdom. In 1932 the Wesleyans in England merged with the United Methodist Free Churches to create the Methodist Church of Great Britain. In Africa, their two affiliates also merged, but in 1934, the West African Methodist Church again went its separate way.

The Wesleyan mission experienced a period of growth in the 1930s, when it also began work in Mende country. Because of this opening, the missionaries launched work on a Mende edition of the Bible, published in 1959, and opened a hospital at Segbwema. In 1967 the former mission became an independent church, the Methodist Church of Sierra Leone. It has continued in a working relationship with British Methodists.

Like all religious bodies in the country, the Methodist Church of Sierra Leone has suffered from the civil war that has continued through the 1990s into the new century. Many church members have been killed, and many church facilities have been damaged or destroyed.

In 2005, the church reported 50,000 members, serving a constituency of 1.5 million. It is a member of the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Sierra Leone
4 George St.
PO Box 64
Freetown
Sierra Leonea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.

Marke, C. The Origins of Wesleyan Methodism in Sierra Leone. London: Charles H. Kelly, 1913.

“The Spirit of Amistad in the United Methodist Church.” Website of the General Board of Global Ministries, United Methodist Church. Online.

<http://new.gbgm-umc.org/about/history/mission/africa/index.cfm?i=8445>. Accessed December 15, 2008.

Walker, James. The Black Loyalists: The Search for a Promised Land in Nova Scotia and Sierra Leone 1783–1870. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1992.

World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information. 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of Southern Africa

The Methodist Church of Southern Africa traces its origins to a small religious society founded in 1806 in Cape Town by members of the Seventy-second Regiment of the British army under the leadership of George Middlemiss. A decade later Barnabas Shaw (1788–1857) arrived in Cape Town to serve as the minister for the Methodists. However, Shaw wanted to work among the Native Africans and soon left Cape Town to establish the Leliefontein mission station some 250 miles north among the Namaqua. As other missionaries arrived, work was concentrated in what is now known as Namibia and Bechuanaland. The Namibian work was eventually turned over to the Lutheran-based Rhenish Mission, and the work in South Africa was expanded among both white settlers and the Native population.

In 1820 William Shaw (1798–1872) arrived to become the chaplain to a group of settlers. His work became a second beginning for Methodism. He organized a series of preaching stations eastward all the way to Durban, many located in hostile territory. The work among the Native population was slow, but the church grew as more British settlers arrived. Shaw organized the Wesleyan Methodist Church, which experienced sporadic growth. A Methodist congregation was often the first English church to appear in the new settlements, attracting members of a variety of Protestant churches. As Presbyterian, Congregational, and Anglican congregations emerged, these members would leave the Methodist Church to rejoin their own denominations. In 1862, the church launched a mission among the new settlers from India.

A Methodist church in Stellenbosh, South Africa. (Inna Felker/Dreamstime.com)

The church grew up as a mission of the British Wesleyan Conference. As the districts multiplied, triennial meetings were held, beginning in 1873. In 1883 the districts were tied together by what was called the Affiliated Conference. Ties to Great Britain were loosened until complete autonomy was granted in 1927 with the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of South Africa. A merger in 1932 with the Primitive Methodist Mission and with the work in the Transvaal that had not joined in the 1927 reorganization led to the formation of the present Methodist Church of South Africa.

The South African church followed the belief, practice, and organization of the Methodist Church of Great Britain. Until 1988 it was headed by a president, who was elected at the annual conference, the basic organizational unit in Methodism. After 1988 the district heads were redesignated as bishops, and a presiding bishop, elected for a three-year term, replaced the national president.

In 2005 the Methodist Church of Southern Africa reported a membership of 1,700,000. It has jurisdiction over Methodist work in Mozambique and Namibia. Its extensive educational and medical programs were lost when the government nationalized the schools and hospitals. In 1978 the church was outlawed in Transkei, and Methodists there reorganized as the United Methodist Church of Southern Africa. Most of that church reunited with the main body when the ban was lifted in 1988. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Methodist Council. It currently supports the Federal Theological Seminary of Southern Africa, a cooperative venture with Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans.

Methodist Church of Southern Africa
PO Box 1771
Sasolburg 1947
South Africa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodism; Rhenish Mission; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- South African Methodism—Her Missionary Witness*. Cape Town: Methodist Publishing House, 1966.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Church of the Union of Upper Myanmar

See Methodist Church, Upper Myanmar.

Methodist Church of Togo

The Methodist Church of Togo began in the 1840s, when Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890) arrived as a representative of the Wesleyan Methodists in Great Britain. Freeman, the son of an African father and a British mother, developed a friendship with a chief of the Mina people at Anécho, who granted him permission to begin preaching to the people and to establish a school. Birch's original work was soon supplemented by other Methodists who were moving along the coastal communities from Nigeria to the Gold Coast. As the work developed, it was seen as part of the developing church in Dahomey (present-day Benin). That identification was increased by the French takeover from the Germans after World War I.

In 1957 the Dahomey and Togo work was set aside as a separate district of the Methodist Church of Great Britain. After Benin gained its independence in 1974, the Togo work became part of the Protestant Methodist Church of Benin. It separated from the church in Benin and again became a district of the Methodist Church in Great Britain. It voted to become fully autonomous in 1995, an action that was completed in 1999. It has remained focused on serving the Mina people, and thus has not grown, as have the Presbyterian Evangelical Church of Togo and the Assemblies of God mission.

In 2005, the Methodist Church of Togo reported 45,000 members. It is a member of both the World Methodist Council and the World Council of Churches.

Methodist Church of Togo
BP 49
Lomé
Togo

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Church, Great Britain; Protestant Methodist Church of Benin; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Methodist Council.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- World Methodist Council. Handbook of Information, 2002–2006. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile

The Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile (Iglesia Metodista Pentecostal de Chile) developed early in the 20th century, when the Pentecostal experience emerged within the Methodist Church of Chile (then still a district in the American-based Methodist Episcopal Church). In 1909 Willis C. Hoover (1856–1936), a missionary who pastored a Methodist church in Valparaiso, was influenced by the spread of Pentecostalism through Europe and India soon after its emergence in Los Angeles, California. He began to correspond with Pentecostal leaders in other countries and instituted prayer meetings and Bible study around the issue of the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the experience of speaking in tongues. Those in attendance soon professed to manifest the gifts of the Spirit.

The Pentecostal movement spread from Hoover's congregation to other Methodists in Chile, and in 1911, bowing to pressures from the United States, the leaders of the church in Chile expelled Hoover and his Pentecostal followers, who then reorganized as the Methodist Pentecostal Church. The church suffered through a period of discrimination until 1925, when a new Constitution established the separation of church and state in Chile. The church experienced a growth phase through the 1930s, expanding across Chile and into Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia, and Peru. In the years since World War II, the church's membership has doubled annually, and it has become one of the most successful indigenous churches in South America. The Jotabeche Pentecostal Evangelical Church in Santiago is one of the largest congregations of any kind in the world, rivaling in size the Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, Korea. The church has also experienced a number of schisms that have effectively spread Pentecostalism farther, as several of the daughter churches have also grown into large bodies.

Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile
Bernal del Mercado 139
Santiago Casilla 213-2
Santiago
Chile

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodism; Pentecostalism; Yoido Full Gospel Church.

References

- Barclay, Wade Crawford. History of Methodist Missions. 3 vols. New York: The Board of Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Church, 1949–1950.
- Copplestone, J. Tremayne. History of Methodist Missions. Vol. 4, Twentieth-Century Perspectives. New York: The Board of Global Ministries, The United Methodist Church, 1973.
- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Hoover, Willis C. History of the Pentecostal Revival in Chile. Trans. Mario G. Hoover. Santiago: Imprenta Eben-Ezer, 2000.

Metropolitan Community Churches

See Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community of Churches.

Mevlevi Sufi Order

The Mevlevi Sufi Order was founded by mystic and philosopher Jalal ad-din ar-Rumi (ca. 1207–1273) in Konya, Turkey. Rumi was born into a learned family in Balkh, Afghanistan. In the face of Mongol incursions into the region, his family moved on several occasions before finally settling in Konya. Rumi succeeded his father as a professor in religious sciences in 1231. Rumi is considered the most eminent poet produced by the Sufi movement, the height of his work being his momentous mystical work, Mathnawi.

The Mevlevi Sufis adopted their name from the term “Mevlana,” or “our Master.” Their main Sufi tenets consist of unconditional love and tolerance, positive reasoning, charity, and spiritual enlightenment through love of all of God’s creation. According to Rumi, human beings consist of the tripartite components of spirit, reason, and love. The spiritually advanced Mevlevi Sufis are supervised by the leading sheikh (celebi) as they whirl in circles during a devotional liturgy (sema); hence they have been called the Whirling Dervishes. Their dancing represents the mystical journey of turning oneself completely toward the One. Through eternal love, devotion, integrity, and generosity, the Mevlevi aspire to maintain their focus on the divine.

The international headquarters of the Mevlevi order is in Konya, Turkey. Members are found primarily in Turkey, Syria, and Central Asia, but in recent years they have also established centers in Europe and North America. Today, the order is headed by Faruk Hemden Celebi (b. 1950), a direct descendant of Rumi who succeeded to his post in 1996 following the death of his father, Celaleddin Bakir Celebi (1926–1996). Celaleddin Celebi (celebi, literally well-mannered gentleman, is the title given the order’s leader) was responsible for bringing the order to the West with the appointment of Edmund Kabir Helminski as the order’s representative in North America. Helminski founded the Threshold Society, which has become a major force for the publishing and circulation of Mevlevi literature in the English-speaking world. In 1994, in honor of the success of the Threshold Society, the Threshold Center in Brattleboro, Vermont, was designated Konya West by the Order.

The Whirling Dervish Festival held each December in Konya, Turkey, honors Jalal ad-din ar-Rumi, the 13th-century poet and Islamic philosopher who founded the Mevlevi Order of Whirling Dervishes. (Corel)

Threshold Society
270 Quarter Horse Lane
Watsonville, CA 95076
<http://www.sufism.org/>

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Sufism.

References

- Chittick, William. The Sufi Path of Love: The Spiritual Teachings of Rumi. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.
- Hakim, Khalifa Abdul. The Metaphysics of Rumi: A Critical and Historical Sketch. 2nd ed. Lahore, Pakistan: The Institute of Islamic Culture, 1959.

- Harvey, Andrew. Light upon Light: Inspirations from Rumi. Berkeley, CA: North Atlantic Books, 1996.
- Lewis, Franklin. Rumi: Past and Present, East and West. Oxford: Oneworld Publications, 2000.
- Mevlana Cealeddin Rumi. <http://www.mevlana.net>. Accessed February 1, 2002.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. The Triumphal Sun: A Study of the Works of Jalaloddin Rumi. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

■ Mexico

The United Mexican States (Estados Unidos Mexicanos) constitute one of the largest countries (an area of 761,606 square miles) in the Americas, located geographically in North America between the United States of America in the north and Guatemala and Belize in the southeast. It is bordered on the east by the Gulf of Mexico (part of the Caribbean Sea) and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. Mexico's population in mid-2000 was estimated at 97.5 million and in mid-2008 at 109 million, third in size in the Americas after the United States and Brazil.

The nation is composed of a diversity of ethnic groups: mestizos (mixed Spanish-Indian blood who are native Spanish-speakers), 88 percent; Amerindians (239 living languages among 13 linguistic families), 9 percent; and others (including North Americans, Europeans, Afro-Americans, Middle Easterners, and Asians), 3 percent. The predominant Amerindian languages are Náhuatl, Maya, Mixteco, Zapoteco, Otomí, Tzeltal, Tzotzil, Totonaco, Chol, Mazahua, and Huasteco.

Although Mexico continues to be dominated by the Roman Catholic Church (second-largest Catholic population in the world, after Brazil), those claiming affiliation with Roman Catholicism declined at the end of the 20th century—from 89.7 percent of the total population in the 1990 census to 88 percent in the 2000 census. Protestant adherents increased from 5 percent in 1990 to 5.7 percent in 2000; those affiliated with “other religions” increased from 1.4 percent in 1990 to 1.9 percent in 2000; and those with “no religious affiliation” (or providing “no answer”) increased from 3.9 percent in 1990 to 4.4 percent in 2000.

The present Constitution provides for freedom of religion relative to both belief and the practice of ceremonies and acts of worship. Congress may not enact laws that establish or prohibit any religion. The Constitution provides for the separation of church and state, and the 1992 Law of Religious Associations and Public Worship defines the administrative policies and remedies that protect the right to religious freedom. A provision was added to the Constitution in 2001 that established, for the first time, a constitutional prohibition against any form of discrimination, including discrimination against persons of the basis of religion.

As of March 2009, the Government's Office of Religious Affairs reported a total of 7,073 officially registered religious associations (ARs) in Mexico. A previous report, issued in June 2005, listed 6,373 ARs, which can be classified as follows: Christian/Roman Catholic (2,962, or 46.5 percent), Christian/Orthodox (21), Christian/Protestant (3,298, or 51.8 percent), Christian/Other (65), and non-Christian (27).

When the Spanish conquistadors arrived in Mexico in the early 1600s, they discovered some of the greatest cultures of human history, beginning with the Olmec civilization that began about 1200 BCE and continuing through the Aztec Empire that dominated the central region of the country with its elaborate ceremonial and political center (Tenochtitlan) built on a man-made island in Lake Texcoco in the Valley of Mexico. Around 9,000 years ago, ancient Amerindians domesticated corn and initiated an agricultural revolution, which led to the formation of many complex civilizations. Between 1800 and 300 BCE, many of these matured into advanced Mesoamerican civilizations that are credited with many innovations, including cosmology, astronomy, writing, mathematics, government, militaries, engineering, and medicine. These civilizations were organized around cities and pyramid-temples.

Mexico is said to have had five major civilizations: the Olmec, Teotihuacan, Toltec, Aztec, and Maya. At their peak, an estimated 350,000 Aztecs presided over a wealthy tribute-empire comprised of around 10 million people, almost half of Mexico's estimated population of 24 million in 1500. After 4,000 years, the existing civilizations were destroyed after the arrival of the Spaniards in 1519.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Church, Santa Fe, New Mexico, is the oldest shrine to Gaudalupe in the United States. (J. Gordon Melton)

Conquistador Hernán Cortéz (1485–1547) landed in Mexico at a site that later became the modern city of Veracruz and with his small army of 508 Spaniards supported by thousands of Tlaxcalteca allies conquered the Aztecs in 1521. He established Spanish rule on the ruins of the Aztec capital of Tenochtitlan, renamed Mexico City. In 1519, Tenochtitlan was the largest city in the world with a population of about 350,000; by comparison, the population of London in 1519 was only 80,000 people. When the Spanish arrived, there were an estimated 25 million Amerindians in the territory known today as Mexico.

During the Spanish colonial period (1521–1821), the majority of its Amerindian population was decimated by warfare, famine, and disease. Formal independence from Spain was recognized in 1821. The U.S.-Mexican War (1846–1848) ended with the ceding of almost half of Mexico’s national territory, including present-day Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California. French forces invaded Mexico in 1861 and ruled briefly until 1867. The Mexican Revolution of 1910–1917 resulted in the death of an estimated 10 percent of the nation’s population.

Between 1521 and 1821, the government aligned with the Roman Catholic Church. The Catholic Church also tried to build on ancient Native worship. The persistence of Amerindian cultures and belief systems is a vital force in modern Mexican society, as seen by the prevalence of practices such as shamanism (intermediaries between the human and spirit worlds), magic and witchcraft (bujería), herbal healing (curanderismo), and “folk saints and healers” throughout Mexico.

After independence from Spain in 1821, the Roman Catholic Church began to lose its place of privilege. Citizens were no longer obligated to pay tithes or to work for the church as serfs in a feudal society. The Catholic Church did, however, maintain its monopoly on religion in Mexico as affirmed by the Constitution of 1824, which declared that religion “will perpetually be Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman.” Full diplomatic relations were maintained with the Vatican until broken in 1867, following the period of French intervention.

From Independence to the Mexican Revolution (1821–1910), the Catholic Church sided with the more Conservative political parties, though certain liberal-minded elements within the church identified with the revolutionary struggle of the peasants. Through the 19th century, the Catholic Church was aligned with Conservative politics and opposed both the Liberal movement and Freemasonry, which had gained popularity among the wealthy elite. Church leadership opposed the reform movement led by Benito Juárez (1806–1872) and welcomed the French occupation of Mexico in 1862.

Although church-state tensions eased considerably during the Conservative administration of Porfirio Díaz (1876–1910), they flared up again after the Revolution of 1910–1917. The Constitution of 1917 established a separation between church and state, guaranteed a secular public education, and prohibited the clergy from participating in the nation’s political life and from owning property.

The Cristero War (1926–1929) was an attempt by conservative Catholic forces to invalidate anti-Catholic elements of the Constitution. Catholics resorted to armed violence against the government of President Elías Calles (1877–1946). The conflict ended in 1929, when President Emilio Portes Gil (1890–1978) promised a new respect for religion, which allowed the Catholic clergy to resume their religious work throughout the country.

In the decades after the Mexican Revolution, the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI, Partido Revolucionario Institucional) came to power. It controlled national politics from 1929 until 2001. In 2000, after 70 years, the PRI lost the presidential election to an opposition candidate, Vicente Fox Quesada, who won under the banner of the National Action Party (PAN, Partido de Acción Nacional), which has close ties to the Catholic Church. However, the continued non-PAN majority in Congress prevented him from implementing most of his proposed reforms during his term in office (2000–2006). In 2006, PAN candidate Felipe de Jesús Calderón Hinojosa, a self-described devout Roman Catholic, won the presidency for a six-year term (2006–2012).

The Roman Catholic Church The military conquest of Mexico by Spanish forces was generally perceived as the triumph of Catholicism over the Amerindian deities, and particularly as the disintegration of the Aztec worldview that required continuous human blood sacrifice to sustain the universe. The defeat of Amerindian religious leaders and the destruction of their sacred temples and images by Cortés’ army were seen as a spiritual conquest over a fundamentally-flawed brand of religion by agents of a superior religion. However, most of the Spanish friars were more ambivalent about associating their own missionary enterprise with Spanish military conquests.

The evangelization of the Amerindian tribes of Mexico by Roman Catholic missionaries began with the arrival of the Franciscans (1524), the Dominicans (1526), and the Augustinians (1533). Between 1594 and 1722, the Jesuits worked among the Amerindians in northern Mexico. During the 17th and 18th centuries, the Franciscans organized a vast mission empire that included 11 districts: from Sierra Gorda and Tampico in the northeast to Sonora, Arizona, New Mexico, and Alta California in the northwest. The Dominicans established two important mission centers in Sierra Gorda (1686) and Baja California (1772).

The first Catholic bishopric erected in Mexico was the See of Yucatán, under the patronage of the Virgin Mary as La Nuestra Señora de los Remedios. In 1526, Pope Clement VII (r. 1523–1534) named Father Julian de Garces as the first bishop of New Spain. In 1545, at the request of Spanish King Charles V (r. 1516–1556), Pope Paul III (r. 1534–1549) separated the dioceses of New Spain from the metropolitan See of Seville and established the Archdiocese of Mexico. During the Spanish colonial period (1520–1821), Catholic missionaries systematically established churches in nearly every village of Mexico.

Virgin of Guadalupe carved in a cottonwood tree. Also known as The Lady of Guadalupe, she is of significant importance to Mexican Catholics. (Corel)

Today, the Virgin of Guadalupe is a symbol of Mexican national identity, while the chapel to Our Lady of Guadalupe at Tepeyac hill (now a suburb of Mexico City) built in 1555–1556, has become the most sacred site for Catholics in Mexico. Future generations of clerics embellished the legend of Our Lady of Guadalupe, so that by 1648 Mexican peasants considered the shrine to have supernatural significance and to be a sign of divine approval for regarding themselves as the “new chosen people” (a cosmic race) that God had selected through the agency of the Virgin Mary, who, according to the legend, miraculously appeared to a shepherd at Tepeyac in 1531.

Special celebrations are held annually at these shrines, three of the most important being those dedicated to La Virgen de Juquila in the state of Oaxaca, to Nuestro Señor Jesucristo y San Miguel de las Cuevas de Chalma in the state of Mexico, and to La Virgen de Guadalupe in the Federal District.

There are a variety of “folk saints” in Mexico that have not been canonized by the Catholic Church but that are treated as sacred by many believers. One of the most popular folk saints is José Fidencio Síntora Constantino, known as El Niño Fidencio (b. 1898). He became known to the Mexican press during the Cristero War (1926–1929), when Catholics were persecuted during the administration of President Plutarco Elías Calles. El Niño Fidencio is popularly identified with the Christ Child, and is reported to have received his calling as a child, and as a young man received the gift of healing and achieved fame as a healer (curandero).

Another folk saint that has been popularized throughout Mexico is La Santa Muerte (Saint Death). Her larger-than-life statue, which devotees keep in glass boxes at road-side sanctuaries, is usually draped in lace-trimmed satin; her hooded, grinning skull is crowned with a rhinestone tiara, and the bony fingers that protrude from beneath her cloak are adorned with glittering rings. Stories of prayers answered and miracles performed have fueled the spread of this popular cult, whose worship is said to date to the mid-1960s among rural villagers. Prisoners, petty thieves, corrupt policemen, and powerful drug traffickers are believed to be devotees of La Santa Muerte, who appeals to the faith of simple working-class Mexicans who daily face hunger, injustice, corruption, and crime in some of Mexico’s toughest neighborhoods.

The independent Traditional Mex-USA Catholic Church is led by its self-appointed bishop David Romo Millán, a principal leader of the Iglesia de la Santa Muerte. Jesús Romero Padilla is the guardian of one of the movement’s main sanctuaries, located in Tepito in the Federal District; he is reported to lead processions honoring La Santa Muerte in Puebla, Toluca, Veracruz, and Oaxaca.

Yearly, there is a special celebration in honor of the dead, called Culto a los Muertos, which is celebrated from October 21 to November 2. In many villages, towns, and cities across the country, Mexican peasants bring a variety of offerings—flowers, food, drink, and candles—to a family altar in their homes or to the gravesides of their dead relatives, and there is a celebration with music, dances, masks, and other symbols of death and fireworks in their honor.

For many Mexicans, affiliation with the Catholic Church has become less of a social obligation than during previous decades, with fewer than 20 percent of Catholics regularly attending Mass. During the 1990s, numerous public opinion polls revealed increasing numbers unhappy with the Vatican's official policy regarding birth control, divorce, remarriage, abortion, the role of women in the church, obligatory celibacy for priests and nuns, the absolute authority of the pope, the authoritarianism of the bishops, and the lack of lay participation in church matters.

Today, the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico is divided administratively into 15 regions and 22 jurisdictions: 14 archdioceses, and 5 territorial prelatures. Eastern-rite Catholics are found in two eparchies and an apostolic exarchate: Nuestra Señora de los Mártires del Líbano en México (the Maronite Eparchy with about 148,250 adherents); Nuestra Señora del Paraíso en México (the Greek-Melkite Eparchy, with about 4,600 adherents); and América Latina e Messico, Faithful of the Oriental Rite (the Armenian Apostolic Exarchate with about 12,000 adherents).

The Mexican Episcopal Conference is composed of 157 members (the papal nuncio, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops) and presided over by Monsignor Carlos Aguilar Retes, the archbishop of Tlalnepantla. The archbishop of Mexico City (Federal District) is Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera, who was appointed archbishop in June 1995 and elevated to cardinal in 1998.

The Protestant Movement After the Constitution of 1857 formalized Liberal reforms, which limited the power of the Roman Catholic Church and broadened individual freedoms, a spectrum of Protestant groups began to penetrate Mexico. By 1900, at least 15 U.S. Protestant denominations from America entered Mexico, many having begun along the U.S.-Mexican border. Others arrived on the coastlands (Veracruz), and a few in Mexico City and other major cities.

One of the first independent missionaries to begin Protestant work along the border (1852, in Brownsville, Texas) was Melinda Rankin (1811–1888), a Presbyterian who later joined the American and Foreign Christian Union and established Protestant schools in Matamoros, Tamaulipas (1862–1863), and Monterrey, Nuevo León (1866). The first Protestant church organized in Mexico City (1861) was a German Lutheran congregation. In 1862, an independent Baptist missionary, James Hickey, arrived in Monterrey from Texas and began the task of evangelizing and establishing a church (1864) that was later pastored by Thomas Westrupp. By 1870, there were two Protestant churches in Monterrey, one affiliated with the American Baptist Home Mission Society (Westrupp) and the other related to the American Cumberland Presbyterian Church, pastored by John Parks. In 1868, the Protestant Episcopal Church established a relationship with an independent Catholic church (non-papal), known as the Mexican Church of Jesus, which had been organized in 1859 in Mexico City. By 1870, there were 23 Episcopal-Church of Jesus congregations in the Valley of Mexico.

During the period 1870 to 1900, at least 15 additional U.S. Protestant mission agencies inaugurated work in Mexico. The Society of Friends (Quakers) arrived in Matamoros, Tamaulipas, in 1871, near the Texas border. Three missionary couples affiliated with the Northern Presbyterian Church arrived in Mexico City in 1872, and eventually began work in Zacatecas, San Luis Potosí, and Guanajuato. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (Congregational Church) sent two missionary couples to Guadalajara in 1872, and five missionary couples were sent to Monterrey in 1873 to work with congregations formed by Melinda Rankin and Juan Sepulveda that grew out of the early Baptist and Presbyterian efforts. In 1872, both the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) and the Methodist Episcopal Church (South) began work in Mexico City, after purchasing from the government properties that formerly belonged to the Catholic Church. In 1874, the Southern Presbyterians began work in Matamoros, Tamaulipas. The Associated Reformed Presbyterian Church arrived in 1878, the Southern Baptist Convention in 1880, the Plymouth Brethren (also known as Christian Brethren) in 1890, the Seventh Day Baptist General Conference in 1893, and the Christian Women's Board of Missions (Disciples of Christ) in 1895.

Between 1900 and 1949, at least 45 Protestant church bodies or mission agencies were established in Mexico. The revolution of 1910 proved a significant watershed in Protestant church life. Most, if not all, of the Protestant missionaries in Mexico left the country soon after the beginning of hostilities and did not return until after the conflict ended in 1917. In that year, the mainline U.S. Protestant mission agencies (those affiliated with the Federal Council of Churches) that had previously initiated work in Mexico constructed a “comity” plan, whereby the various agencies were assigned to different geographical areas of the country in an effort to avoid competition and the duplication of efforts, though they left Mexico City open to all. However, the so-called Cincinnati Plan did not work out well in practice, as most Mexican denominational leaders, pastors, and their church members had already developed strong denominational loyalties and refused to adhere to the plan.

Many presently existing Pentecostal churches and denominations in Mexico trace their origins to the work begun by the Swedish Free Mission/Filadelfia Swedish Pentecostal Churches, founded in 1924 by Axel Anderson in Coyoacán, who was later assisted by other Swedish missionaries, such as Charles Armstrong and Gunhild Gustaffson. The Swedish Pentecostals looked for guidance from Reverend Lewi Petrus (1884–1974), the pastor of the Filadelfia Church in Stockholm, which in 1929 was reported to be the largest Pentecostal church in the world with 3,500 members. According to Manuel Gaxiola, Lindy Scott, and other sources, the Mexican denominations that grew out of this movement include the following: the Independent Evangelical Church in Mexico (IEIM), the Independent Evangelical Church in the Mexican Republic (IEIRM), the Independent Pentecostal Christian Church (ICIP), and the Independent Pentecostal Fraternity (FRAPI—composed of eight autonomous church associations).

Between 1950 and 1980, another 94 Protestant mission agencies began work in Mexico, and scores of new denominations came into existence under national leadership. During the 1940s and 1950s there were many reports of the severe persecution of evangelicals by fanatical Catholics, especially in rural areas and within Amerindian communities.

During the 1960s and 1970s, the Charismatic Renewal movement (CRM) began and flourished in Mexico. An ecumenical bridge between Catholics and Protestants in Latin America in the late 1970s and early 1980s was the John 17:21 Fellowship associated with David du Plessis. A Latin American branch of this Fellowship was established in Guatemala City after a major earthquake occurred there in 1976; the coordinator was the Reverend Robert Thomas of Los Altos, California. In Mexico, Thomas worked closely with Friar Alfonso Navarro Castellanos and the Catholic Missionaries of the Holy Spirit (MSPSC) to form UCELAM (Christian Union for Evangelizing Latin America) in 1978, which held annual ecumenical CRM conferences in Mexico City for a decade or more. Some of the UCELAM teams included evangelicals such as Bob Thomas, Paul Northrup (secretary of the Latin American John 17:21 Fellowship), Bill Finke, and Juan Carlos Ortiz (an early leader in the Argentine CRM between 1967 and 1978), who spoke to many ecumenical audiences in the United States and Latin America during the 1980s.

The Current Situation Statistics on the various Protestant denominations in Mexico at any point in time has been difficult for most researchers and church historians to find. One of the first sources of information about this was The Missionary Review of the World (May 1911, vol. 24), which reported 469 organized local churches with 16,250 members in 1888. In 1910, another source reported 23,940 baptized Protestant church members in Mexico: Methodists (12,500), Presbyterians (5,700), Baptists (2,630), Congregationalists (1,540), Christian Churches—Disciples of Christ (900), and Quakers (670).

However, in 1936, the total membership of these same denominations was reported to be 22,882, which reflects some of the difficulties encountered during the Mexican Revolution and the Depression years. Nevertheless, some of the newer denominations reported the following membership statistics in 1936: Assemblies of God (6,000), Adventists (4,000), Swedish Pentecostals (4,000), Nazarenes (2,000), Pentecostal Holiness (1,300), Pilgrim Holiness (1,200), and Mexican Indian churches (560), for a total of about 19,000 members. These are partial statistics because other denominations (with an estimated total of 6,000 members) were known to exist in 1936 that were not included in the study published by the International Missionary Council in 1938. The total Protestant membership in Mexico for 1936 was estimated to be 48,000 but did not include the Mennonite colonies.

A statue of Fray Junipero Sera (of California mission fame) and the Templo de la Santa Cruz in Queretaro, Mexico. (Arturo Osorno/Dreamstime.com)

Today, there are an estimated 80,000 Mennonites (adherents) in Mexico. They live in several areas, particularly in the states of Chihuahua and Durango. During the 1920s, the Mexican government wanted to settle the barren northern region with industrious farmers such as the Mennonites. In 1922, at the invitation of President Alvaro Obregón, 20,000 Mennonites left Canada and settled in the state of Chihuahua. The Mexican government agreed to sell them land at reasonable prices and level no taxes for 100 years if the Mennonites would produce the bulk of cheese needed for northern Mexico. President Obregón granted the Mennonites full control of their schools including retaining their language, independence of religion in both home and schools, and exemption from military service. In 2006, there were a total of about 26,000 Mennonite church members in Mexico.

By 1962, there were about 276,000 Protestant church members in Mexico, according to a study conducted by Dr. Donald McGavran; however, there was no mention of the Mennonite colonists. At that time, the largest denominational families were the following: Presbyterian (42,000), Methodist (33,000), Adventist (22,700), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (15,500), Swedish Pentecostals (15,000), Assemblies of God (15,000), Movement of Independent Evangelical Pentecostal Churches (Movimiento Iglesia Evangélica Pentecostés Independiente [MIEPI]) (10,000), and scores of other groups with less than 10,000 members each.

In 1960, the Mexican national census reported the Protestant population at 578,515. A study by William Read, Victor Monterroso, and Harmon Johnston on Protestant church growth in Latin America, published in 1969, reported that the total Protestant membership in Mexico was about 430,000 in 1967, of which 64 percent was Pentecostal and 36 percent non-Pentecostal. Obviously, the number of Pentecostal church members had increased faster than that of the non-Pentecostals in the 30-year period 1936–1966.

The size of the Protestant population in 2000 was 5.7 percent of the total population, compared to 4.9 percent in 1990, 3.3 percent in 1980, and 1.8 percent in 1970, based on statistics from the Mexican national censuses. By comparison, the percentage size of the Protestant population in Mexico is much lower than in the counties of Central America where Protestants are between 15 and 35 percent of the national population in each country; however, in terms of actual population, the number of Protestants in Mexico is very large, an estimated 6,322,000 in mid-2008, fourth in size in the Americas after the United States (150 million), Brazil (30 million), and Canada (9.5 million).

Based on information from a variety of sources, the largest Protestant denominations in Mexico today are believed to be the following in order of relative size

MEXICO

Mexico

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	51,018,000	105,583,000	95.7	0.87	117,604,000	122,760,000
Roman Catholics	47,029,000	98,500,000	89.3	0.87	107,000,000	108,263,000
Protestants	693,000	4,325,000	3.9	1.78	6,500,000	8,100,000
Independents	1,176,000	3,687,000	3.3	2.40	5,500,000	8,000,000
Agnostics	854,000	2,900,000	2.6	1.80	5,000,000	7,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	50,000	1,240,000	1.1	0.90	1,200,000	1,200,000
Muslims	15,000	220,000	0.2	0.89	400,000	650,000
Jews	35,000	125,000	0.1	0.89	125,000	125,000
Atheists	20,000	120,000	0.1	0.89	200,000	300,000
Baha'is	15,100	37,500	0.0	0.89	60,000	80,000
Buddhists	15,000	25,700	0.0	0.89	40,000	60,000
New religionists	2,000	14,600	0.0	0.89	25,000	40,000
Chinese folk	3,000	12,000	0.0	0.89	20,000	35,000
Hindus	0	9,800	0.0	0.89	15,000	20,000
Sikhs	1,000	5,500	0.0	0.89	6,500	8,000
Total population	52,028,000	110,293,000	100.0	0.89	124,695,000	132,278,000

by membership: National Council of the Assemblies of God (more than 5,000 congregations and 650,000 members in 2000); National Presbyterian Church (4,800 congregations and 624,000 members in 2008); Seventh-day Adventist Church (more than 2,852 congregations and 597,540 members in 2007); Independent Evangelical Church in Mexico (IEIM, founded by Swedish Pentecostal Axel Anderson); Interdenominational Christian Church in the Mexican Republic (ICIRM, Pentecostal); National Baptist Convention of Mexico (more than 1,700 congregations and 272,000 members in 2009); Church of God in the Mexican Republic (IDRM, a split from the Assemblies of God); Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (more than 1,400 congregations and 150,000 members in 2008—Oneness Pentecostal); Movement of Independent Evangelical Pentecostal Churches (MIEPI); Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church (362 churches and 578 preaching centers, with an estimated 62,500 members—Oneness Pentecostal); Methodist Church of Mexico (400 congregations and 52,000 members in 2006); Church of the Nazarene (616 churches and 40,000 members in 2008); Centers of Faith, Hope and Love of the Missionary Revival Crusade (245 centers, some of which have over 10,000 members each—Pentecostal); Independent Pentecostal Fraternity (FRAPI); Independent Evangelical Church in the Mexican Republic (IEIRM, a Swedish Pentecostal split from IEIM); National Evangelical Pentecostal Church (INEP); Universal Pentecostal Church of Jesus (in Morelos, Guerrero, and Veracruz); and independent Christian Churches/Churches of Christ (affiliated with Churches of Christ in Christian Union).

Several ecumenical organizations operate among Protestants in Mexico. The Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA) members in Mexico include the Secretariat of Social Communication of the Evangelical Christian Church of Mexico (Secretaría de Comunicación Social de Iglesias Cristianas Evangélicas de México [SECOSICE]); and the Mexican Evangelical Confederation (Confraternidad Evangélica Mexicana [CONEMEX]), founded in 1982. The only CLAI (Latin American Council of Churches) members in Mexico are the German Lutheran Church and the Methodist Church (affiliated with the United Methodist Church in the U.S.A.). The Methodist Church of Mexico is the only Mexican-based church that is a member of the World Council of Churches, though a variety of Protestant churches are related through their American affiliates. The World Evangelical Alliance work in Mexico through two national bodies: the Secretaría de Comunicación Social de Iglesias Cristianas Evangélicas de México (SECOSICE) and the Associate Alliance: Confraternidad Evangélica Mexicana (CONEMEX).

Eastern Orthodox and Independent Catholic Jurisdictions Eastern Orthodox jurisdictions in Mexico include both the large church representing the older Middle Eastern and Eastern European jurisdictions and some of the new western jurisdictions: The Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of Mexico and Central America affiliated with the Ecumenical Patriarchate based in Istanbul was founded in 1996 in Mexico. It is led by Arzobispo Atenagoras (Anesti). This jurisdiction is also known as Sacro Arzobispado Ortodoxo Griego de México (Greek Orthodox Holy Mission). The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East (commonly known as the Antiochian Orthodox Church) was founded in Mexico in 1943 under the leadership of Amín Aboumrad, who reported to Archbishop Samuel David in Toledo, Ohio; St. George's Orthodox Cathedral was built in Colonia Roma Sur, Delegación Alvaro Obregón, DF, between 1944 and 1947. In 1966 Antonio Chedraui became the first bishop of Mexico, and in 1996 he was appointed as the metropolitan archbishop of Mexico, Venezuela, Central America, and the Caribbean. Russian Orthodox are found in the Catholic Orthodox Church in Mexico (affiliated with the Orthodox Church in America) under the leadership of Presbyter Desiderio Barrero Sermeño; the Orthodox Apostolic Catholic Church (Russian Orthodox Patriarch of Moscow) based in the Parish of the Protection of the Holy Mother of God in Napanla, state of Mexico; and the Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia (ROCOR) (Patriarch of Moscow) under Archbishop Kyrill of the Western Diocese of North America. The related but smaller Ukrainian community is found in the Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Patriarch Moses of Kiev. Its congregations are associated together in the Archdiocese of Mexico and All Latin America under Archbishop Daniel de Jesús (Ruiz Flores).

Among several independent Western Orthodox churches operating in Mexico is the Eastern Orthodox Catholic Church (Iglesia Católica Ortodoxa Oriental), Archdiocese of the Americas & Diaspora, whose episcopal orders derive from Syrian and Russian Orthodox successions. It uses the Divine Liturgy of Saint John Chrysostom with the Syriac-Greek Typicon. This church is administered by a Synod of Bishops headquartered in Cleveland, Ohio; Cyril Cranshaw is the bishop of Central and South America (which includes Mexico).

The Coptic Orthodox Church of Alexandria, whose members derive primarily from Egypt, are under Patriarch Shenouda III. Its Mexican community founded the first church in the 1990s, as St. Mary and St. Mark's Coptic Orthodox Church in Tlaycapan, state of Morelos.

There are several small independent Western Roman Catholic-derived groups, among the most important being the Mexican National Catholic Church, which was founded in the 1920s to take the place of the temporarily disenfranchised Roman Catholic Church. It emerged in Massume under Bishops José Joaquín Pérez y Budar, Antonio Benicio López Sierra, and Macario López y Valdez.

More recently, the Mexican Apostolic Catholic Church, also known as the "Church of Mr. President," was founded in 1979 in Mexico City by excommunicated Catholic Bishop Eduardo Dávila de la Garza as an independent Mexican Apostolic Church. This church does not recognize the pope; rather, it claims that the president of the Republic of Mexico is its highest authority. The basic characteristic of this movement is a belief in the miracle of the hostia sangrante ("bleeding communion wafer") that is reported to have taken place in 1978 in the parish of Our Lady of Guadalupe, located in a poor neighborhood on the east side of Mexico City.

Other Christian Churches Although some of the non-Protestant Christian groups were probably included in the "Protestant-Evangelical" category in the 1990 and 2000 censuses, the two main denominational families are the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The official 2005 Report of Jehovah's Witnesses Worldwide listed 11,192 congregations with a peak attendance of 593,802 in Mexico. The 2000 Mexican census reported 1,057,736 Jehovah's Witnesses adherents, which means that the Jehovah's Witnesses in Mexico are the second largest worldwide to JWs in the United States.

The largest of the several Mormon groups in Mexico, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (popularly called Mormons), based in Salt Lake City, Utah, first arrived in the Casas Grandes Valley of Chihuahua in 1885 and eventually established nine agricultural colonies: six in the state of Chihuahua and three in Sonora. In February 2000, they dedicated a new temple in Juárez to serve its 25,000 members in that state.

The Community of Christ (until recently known as the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints), based in Independence, Missouri, has eight congregations scattered across the country that are associated with the congregations in Texas under the guidance of the Texas-Mexico mission Center in McAllen, Texas.

When the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints abandoned the practice of polygamy, a variety of dissenting groups established work in Mexico, which has been relatively tolerant of them. Included among these groups are the Church of the Firstborn in the Fullness of Times (known as the LeBaron Mormon Polygamist movement), which settled in Chihuahua in 1922); United Order Front (now known as the Fundamental Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints); and the Apostolic United Brethren (a split from the United Order Front). The Church of Christ (Temple Lot), now based in Independence, Illinois, has an origin independent of both the Community of Christ and the Utah church. The 2000 Mexican census reported a total of 205,229 adherents for all Latter-day Saint groups. In contrast, the official Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints website reported 1,158,236 members in 1,977 congregations for 2007.

Also present in Mexico are the Children of God (now called The Family International), the Christadelphian Bible Mission, Christian Science (Church of Christ, Scientist), Growing in Grace Ministries International (based in Miami, Florida), Mita Congregation (from Puerto Rico), the People of Amos Church (a split from Mita Congregation under Nicolas Tosado Aviles in Puerto Rico), Voice of the Cornerstone (a Branham-related group from Puerto Rico), the God is Love Pentecostal Church, and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (both from Brazil), among others.

Another significant religious tradition, founded in the city of Monterrey, Nuevo León, in 1926 by Eusebio Joaquín González (known as the Prophet Aarón, who died in 1964), has blended Mexican mysticism with Pentecostal fervor to create the Light of the World Church (its full name is the Church of the Living God, Column and Pillar of Truth, Jesus the Light of the World). Since 1952, its headquarters have been located in Colonia Hermosa Provincia, Guadalajara, state of Jalisco. In 1942, the Light of the World Church experienced a division that led to the founding of the Church of the Good Shepherd, led by José María González, with headquarters in Toluca de Lerdo, capital of the state of Mexico. Similar to the mother church, this denomination holds an annual celebration of the Lord's Supper (Communion) in April during Holy Week with the participation of pastors and lay representatives from all of its local congregations in Mexico, the United States, and Central America.

In 1965, Abel Joaquín Avelar, a son of Eusebio Joaquín (the Prophet Aarón), left the Light of the World Church in Guadalajara, moved to Mexico City, and founded his own organization, the Church of Jesus Christ (Iglesia de Jesucristo), which now has at least 22 organized churches. The leader of this denomination has taken the title apostle of the church and has an Apostolic Council composed of 12 members.

The Christian Apostolic Church of the Living God, Column and Pillar of Truth was founded in 1978 in Cuernavaca, Morelos, by Francisco Jesus Adame Giles, who claimed to have a dream or vision in 1978 in which he reported that "an angel appeared to me and called me to preach the Gospel and announce the Kingdom of God." In 1989 he formed a community of followers in Colonia Lomas de Chamilpa on about 16 square miles of land, north of Cuernavaca, with himself as the maximum authority. This community of an estimated 400 families is now called Provincia Jerusalén; its members are prohibited from smoking, drinking, and dancing, and women may not use makeup or wear jewelry or slacks. Adame has a dominant role in their lives—spiritually, socially, and economically; this group claims to be neither Protestant nor a sect, but rather "Israelites of the New Israel of God." The movement claims to have about 50,000 followers in the states of Morelos, Oaxaca, Veracruz, Guerrero, Mexico, Puebla, Guanajuato, and Baja California Norte.

Other Religions Religions not associated with the Christian tradition include some 60 registered religious associations that represent the spectrum of the world's religions: Judaism, Islam, Baha'i Faith, Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikh, Sant Mat, Chinese religions, and Shinto. Relatively small, these organizations have pioneered a presence for the various groups with roots in the Middle East (Islam, the Baha'i Faith) and Asia (Buddhism, Hinduism, Sant Mat). Buddhism is represented by the Centro Budista de la Ciudad de México, Casa Tibet México, Soka Gakkai de México; Jodo Shinshu Hongwanji-Ha Misión de México; Jodo Shinshu Hongwanji-Ha Ekoji de México; and Centro Zen de México. Hinduism movements include the Sociedad Internacional Para la Conciencia de Krishna en México, Iglesia del Señor Chaitanya/Sri Chaitanya Saraswat Ashram de Mexico, and the Movimiento Hare Krishna-Iskcon. The Sant Mat tradition includes the Organización Espiritual Mundial Thakar Singh; Eckankar de México; and the Movimiento del Sendero Interno del Alma (Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness [MSIA]).

The Western Esoteric Tradition is represented by Freemasonry, Servants of Light School of Occult Science, Rosicrucians (Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis, AMORC; Fraternitas Rosicruciana Antigua, FRA; Rosicrucian Fellowship), the Grand Universal Fraternity (headquarters in El Limon, Aragua, Venezuela), GFU Network (led by Jose Manuel Estrada Vasques, with headquarters in Morelos, Mexico), the Universal Gnostic Movement of Mexico (founded by Victor Manuel Gomez Rodríguez, known as Samael Aun Weor after 1956, with headquarters in Mexico City), the International Gnostic Movement (headquarters in Guadalajara, Mexico), the Universal Christian Gnostic Church, the Gnostic Movement Cultural Association, the Quetzalcoatl Cultural Institute of Psycho-Analytical Anthropology (Loreto, Zacatecas, Mexico), the New Acropolis Cultural Association, the Cafh Foundation, Wicca, and the International Pagan Federation of Mexico. Also, a variety of Satanist groups are known to exist in Mexico.

Additional Esoteric presence can be found in the more than 27 Spiritualism associations, several Theosophical groups, the Church of Scientology, and the Unification Church (Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity), among others. One Mexican national religious tradition blends Catholicism with Spiritualism (communication with the dead through the use of mediums and séances): the Marian Trinitarian Spiritualist Church, founded by Roque Jacinto Rojas Esparza (1812–1869) in Mexico City in 1866. Rojas allegedly received a message from the biblical prophet Elijah (Elías in Spanish), who named him “the prophet of the First Period.” After Rojas's death in 1869, the movement split into several factions; these groups are known today as the Prophet Elijah (Elias) movement, which included at least 47 registered religious associations in 2009.

“Popular religiosity” (syncretistic) is practiced by a majority of the Hispanic population, which is also present among numerous Amerindian religions (animist) that have blended elements of Catholicism to create several varieties of popular religiosity. The Amerindian groups are scattered throughout the national territory, with the largest concentration in the state of Oaxaca in southern Mexico. Religious shrines, images, and sacred places form part of the religious landscape in Mexico, some of which are dedicated to the Virgin Mary (la Virgen de Guadalupe), the Christ Child, the Black Christ, Saint Death (La Santa Muerte), and revered “folk saints and healers,” such as the Niño Fidencio cult (José Fidencio Sintora Constantino, 1898–1938) in Guanajuato, and the Juan Soldado cult (Juan Castillo Morales) in Baja California.

A revitalization movement among Amerindian tribes in the northern and central regions of Mexico (along the western Sierra Madre mountain range) is called the Peyote religion, due to its use of the peyote cactus, which is a psychotropic plant that produces “altered states of consciousness” during shamanic rituals. According to authoritative sources, this practice dates to about 7000 BCE in Mexico. The Native American Church of Itzachilatlan was founded by Aurelio Dias Tepankai in Yoricostio, Michoacán. Similar religious organizations exist in the United States, which have blended Christianity with the Peyote religion, such as the Native American Church in North America with headquarters in Box Elder, Montana.

Among the Afro-American population, elements of African-derived religions from the Caribbean may exist, such as Vodou (Haiti), Santería (Puerto Rico and Cuba), Myalism-Obeah, and Rastafarianism (British West Indies).

The Inter-Religious Council of Mexico was founded in Mexico City in 1992 with representatives from the following traditions: Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Mormon, Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh, Jewish, and Sufi-Muslim. In 1999, the coordinator of the council was Jonathan Rose, the Jewish representative.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ of Mexico; Armenian Catholic Church; Assemblies of God; Augustinians; Benedictines; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church of the Nazarene; Cistercians; Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Dominicans; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Evangelical Covenant Church; Family International, The; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Gnostic Movement; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Latin American Council of Churches; Light of the World Church; Maronite Catholic Church; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Melkite Catholic Church; Mennonites; Methodist Church of Mexico; Mita Congregation; Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness; New Acropolis Cultural Association; New Age Movement; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia; Salvation Army; Santería; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Seventh-Day Baptist General Conference; Southern Baptist Convention; Sufism; Unification Movement; United Methodist Church; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Vodou; Wesleyan Church; Western Esoteric Tradition; Wiccan Religion; Witchcraft; Women, Status and Role of; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Barry, Tom, ed. Mexico: A Country Guide. Albuquerque, NM: The Inter-Hemispheric Education Resource Center, 1992.
- Bastian, Jean-Pierre. Protestantismo y Sociedad en México. Mexico City: CUPSA, 1983.
- Blancarte, Roberto. Historia de la Iglesia Católica en México. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992.
- Dussel, Enrique, ed. Historia General de la Iglesia en América Latina. Tomo V, México. México, DF: Ediciones Paulinas, 1984.
- Fernández Olmos, Margarite, and Lizabeth Paravisini-Gebert. Creole Religions of the Caribbean: An Introduction from Vodou and Santería to Obeah and Espiritismo. New York: New York University, 2003.
- Gaxiola, Manuel J. "Las Cuatro Vertientes del Pentecostalismo Mexicano." <http://esnuestra historia.wordpress.com/historia/>.
- Giménez, Gilberto, ed. Identidades Religiosas y Sociales en México. Mexico City: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1996.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- McGavran, Donald, ed. Church Growth in Mexico. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1963.
- Pardo, Osvaldo F. The Origins of Mexican Catholicism. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2006.
- Poole, Stafford. Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Origins and Sources of a Mexican National Symbol, 1531–1797. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1995.
- PROLADES-RITA database: "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Mexico." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/nam/mexico/chron-mex.pdf>.
- PROLADES-RITA database: "Religion in Mexico." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/nam/mexico/mex-rd.htm>.
- Read, William R., et al. Latin American Church Growth. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1969.

Scott, Lindy. Salt of the Earth: A Socio-Political History of Mexico City Evangelical Protestants (1964–1991). Mexico City: Editorial Kyrios, 1991.

Scheffler, Lilian. Magia y Brujería en México. Mexico City: Panorama Editorial, 1994.

U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report 2008. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108532.htm>.

VELA. Panorama Evangélico Nacional 2008: Congregaciones Evangélicas de la República Mexicana. México, DF: Visión Evangelizadora Latinoamericana (VELA) y Sociedad Bíblica de México, 2008.

■ Micronesia, Federated States of

The Federated States of Micronesia emerged as a new country out of the several island groups of Micronesia, islands of the Pacific north of Papua New Guinea, and the Solomon Islands. Together, the islands have 271 square miles of land, upon which some 108,000 people (2008) reside. The great majority of the people are of one of several Micronesian ethnic groups.

The term “Micronesia” (meaning “small islands”) describes three archipelagos: the Marshall Islands, the Marianas Islands, and the Caroline Islands. They were inhabited in prehistoric times by Micronesians of various groupings. The first Europeans, Ferdinand Magellan (ca. 1480–1521) and his crew, visited the Marianas in 1521. They would be named for Queen Maria Ana of Austria (1667–1740) during her time as regent to the Spanish throne. The Spanish claimed hegemony over the islands and in 1885 were able to keep the Germans from trying to place a protectorate over them. The United States received Guam from Spain in 1898 as a result of the Spanish-American War. Spain then sold the rest of the Marianas to Germany.

Japan occupied Micronesia in 1914 and actually launched the attack on Pearl Harbor from a base there. Before the war was over, several of the islands, like Saipan, became famous battlegrounds. At the end of World War II, the United Nations Security Council gave the islands to the United States as a trust. The UN mandated that the U.S. government manage the trust so as to prepare the islands for independence. In 1975, as a result of a referendum, the Marianas were set aside as the Northern Marianas. In 1978, following another referendum, the Federated States of Micronesia, constituting the Caroline Islands, came into being. Palau and the Marshall Islands stayed out of the federation and now exist as independent countries. In 1982 the U.S. government signed an agreement with the Federated States that gave them local autonomy but assigned to the United States responsibility for defense and foreign relations. There are four states in the Federated States of Micronesia—Chuuk, Yap, Pohnpei, and Kosrae.

The traditional religions of Micronesia followed a polytheism that recognized a variety of deities under a supreme being known as Ialulep. The traditional religions have largely been replaced by Christianity, but they continue to exert influence through the survival of traditional healing practices.

Christianity came to Micronesia in 1668 with the opening of the first Roman Catholic Church mission. The missionaries had their greatest success among the Chamorros of the Marianas, who developed their own form of Spanish Catholicism. Work in the Marianas grew into a separate diocese headquartered at Agaña, the capital of Guam. The work on the Carolinas and Marshalls was combined in a vicariate. More recently, the Caroline Islands were set aside as a separate diocese and the Marshalls as an apostolic prefecture.

In 1852 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM), an association of American Congregationalists, sent a party of American and Hawaiian missionaries to the Caroline Islands, where they opened missions on Kusaie and Ponape. In 1857 they extended the work to the Marshall Islands. In 1865, administration of the Micronesian mission was assigned to the Hawaiian (Congregationalist’s) Church’s Board of Missions. German missionaries from the Liebenzell Mission entered and opened stations on the Truk Islands (or Chuuk), Palau, and the Yap Islands. They had come at the request of the ABCFM missionaries after Germany had asserted its claim to the area. The Germans worked cooperatively with the American missionaries until World War I, when all missionaries

FEDERATED STATES OF MICRONESIA

Micronesia, Federated States of

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	57,600	107,000	94.5	0.58	118,000	125,000
Roman Catholics	20,000	70,100	62.0	-0.48	75,000	76,000
Protestants	27,200	50,000	44.2	0.79	52,000	54,000
Marginals	320	4,500	4.0	1.76	6,500	8,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,000	3,500	3.1	-0.42	3,000	3,000
Agnostics	0	850	0.8	2.20	1,500	2,500
Baha'is	610	500	0.4	-1.72	500	500
Buddhists	0	500	0.4	0.57	1,000	1,500
New religionists	0	420	0.4	0.51	600	800
Chinese folk	200	340	0.3	0.55	500	700
Atheists	0	60	0.1	0.82	100	200
Total population	61,400	113,000	100.0	0.55	125,000	134,000

had to leave. They returned in 1925 and remained through World War II. Their work matured into the Protestant Church of East Truk.

The ABCFM was superseded by the United Church Board of World Missions in 1957, when the Congregational-Christian Churches in the United States united with the Evangelical and Reformed Church to form the United Church of Christ. The United Church of Christ continued to support the work in Micronesia. In 1986, at the time the new Federated States of Micronesia was being formed, the mission work was reorganized as the United Church of Micronesia, modeled in both doctrine and polity after the United Church of Christ. The United Church of Micronesia included four churches, the United Church of Christ in Kosrae, the United Church of Christ in Pohnpei, the United Church of Christ in Chuuk, and the United Church of Christ-Congregational in the Marshall Islands.

Through the 20th century, a number of U.S. churches across the Protestant-Free Church spectrum opened work in Micronesia. The Seventh-day Adventist Church, which arrived in 1930, now assigns the work to their Guam-Micronesia Mission. More recent arrivals include the General Baptists (1947), the Assemblies of God (1960), the United Pentecostal Church International (1965), the Baptist Bible Fellowship International (1972), and the Conservative Congregational Christian Church, an offshoot of the United Church of Christ (1984). The Baptist Bible Fellowship International mission began at the request of Ermut Ikea, the mayor of Puluwat (one of the Chuuk Islands).

In addition, a variety of independent evangelical and fundamentalist missionary agencies have started missions in Micronesia in recent decades. The Jehovah's Witnesses came in 1965, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) in 1976. Beginning its work on Pohnpei, the LDS extended its mission to include Chuuk and Yap in 1977 and Kosrae in 1985. By 1996 the church could report some 3,000 members.

Several indigenous religious movements surfaced in the 20th century. The first was Modekne, an attempt to synthesize Christian elements with the traditional religion on Palau. From its first appearance there, it spread through the islands, its appeal being attributed to its emphasis on healing, until it was suppressed by the government in 1945. It continues as an underground movement.

Following World War II, the Baha'i Faith came to Micronesia, and some Chinese Buddhist/Daoist worship is present among Chinese expatriates.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church of Christ; United Pentecostal Church International.

References

- Haynes, D. E., and W. L. Wuerch. Micronesian Religion and Lore: A Guide to Sources, 1526–1990. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995.
- Hezel, F. X. The Catholic Church in Micronesia: Historical Essays on the Catholic Church in the Caroline-Marshall Islands. Chicago: Micronesian Seminar/Loyola University Press, 1991.
- Hezel, F. X. Strangers in Their Own Land: A Century of Colonial Rule in the Caroline and Marshall Islands. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2003.
- Mueller, K. W. “The Protestant Mission Work on the Truk Islands in Micronesia: A Missiological Analysis and Evaluation.” M.A. thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1981.
- Trompf, Gary. The Religions of Oceania. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Wiltgen, Ralph M. The Founding of the Roman Catholic Church in Melanesia and Micronesia, 1850–1875. Eugene, OR: Pickwick Publications, 2008.

Mid-Autumn Festival

The Mid-Autumn Festival occurs in the middle of the second of the three lunar months that make up the autumn season in China—the seventh, eighth, and ninth months. As the months are measured from new moon to new moon, the middle of the month is always at a full moon. In a time before electricity, the moon was a more important illuminating force than in recent times, and the coming of a full moon at the time of the year when there were few clouds to obscure it and people were at the end of a long farming season were reasons enough for a pause to celebrate.

Buddhists contributed to this festival oriented on the moon by contributing several legends from India that introduced a connection between the moon and rabbits. According to one popular story, the Buddha summoned animals to him as he was preparing for the end of his earthly existence, but only 12 animals showed up to say goodbye. He acknowledged their presence by naming the years of the 12-year cycle in Chinese astrology after them. Of these, the fourth to arrive before the Buddha was the rabbit. Another story tells of Buddha’s prior incarnation as a rabbit. One day while traveling with an ape and a fox, he encountered a hungry beggar. The three left to find some food. The ape and fox returned with some, but the rabbit found nothing. In his determination to be of service, however, the rabbit made a fire and then jumped into it so that he would become food for the beggar. The beggar turned out to be the god Indra; he rewarded the rabbit by sending him to the moon.

Picked up by the Daoists, the rabbit on the moon was pictured as standing under a magical tree making the elixir of immortality. This image would be integrated with another story of Hou Yi and his wife Chang E who lived in ancient China during the reign of the long-lived Emperor Yao (2358–2258 BCE). Hou Yi was a member of the imperial guards known for his skill as an archer. At one point during Emperor Yao’s reign, suddenly 10 suns appeared in the sky. Their combined heat made life unbearable and the emperor asked Hou Yi to get rid of them. With his arrows, he was able to get rid of nine of them. As a reward, he was summoned to the throne room of the Queen Mother of the West who resided in the Kunlun Mountains, a very real set of mountains in Western China that in places form the northern border to Tibet. To the Daoists this mountain was a heavenly place. Though geographically placed on Earth, it was analogous to the Buddhists’ Pure Land. When Hou Yi visited there, he was given a pill of immortality, but told to prepare himself with prayer and fasting before taking it. His wife, however, discovered the pill and took it. She found she could fly, and to escape her husband’s anger flew to the moon.

On the moon, Chang E coughed and part of the pill flew out of her mouth. The pill became a jade rabbit and she a toad. Hou Yi in the meantime erected a new home on the sun. He is reunited with his wife monthly in the full moon.

These legends continue to inform what has become a family holiday in modern Chinese society, in both the People’s Republic and the diaspora. It is a time to reunite with friends and family and enjoy a characteristic Chinese delicacy, the moon cake. Moon cakes come in a variety of shapes and are filled with sweets, meats, or salty fillings.

Transparent dragon in a Mid-Autumn Festival street parade in Singapore's Chinatown on September 13, 2008. Farmers celebrate the end of the summer harvesting season on this date. (Espion/Dreamstime.com)

The primary ritual of the Mid-Autumn Festival is conducted by women on the 15th day of the lunar month as the full moon reigns above. It occurs around an open-air altar decorated with a picture of the moon goddess and some representation of the rabbit. Different food substances are brought to the altar, a wine glass filled, and incense lit. The culmination of the ritual involves the women of the house bowing, what in Chinese is a kowtow, before the goddess. The ceremony ends with the burning of the moon goddess's picture, the act of burning not being a destructive act but one of communion and communication.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Buddha, Gautama; Daoism.

References

Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.

Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.

Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Windling, Terri. "The Symbolism of Rabbits and Hares." Journal of Mythical Arts (Winter 2007). <http://www.endicott-studio.com/rdrm/rrRabbits.html>. Accessed May 16, 2009.

Middle East Council of Churches

The Middle East Council of Churches brings together the many divergent streams of Christianity that have operated through the centuries in the region of Christianity's birth. Protestants were among the last of the large international Christian communions to try to establish themselves in what is largely a Muslim-dominated region of the world (along with the Jewish-dominated country of Israel).

Early in the 20th century, Protestants raised the issue of Christian unity in a series of international conferences, most notably at Edinburgh in 1910. In the Middle East these conversations led to the meeting of the United Missionary Council in Jerusalem in 1924 and the Council of West Asia and North Africa (1927). These meetings led to the formation of the Near East Christian Council (1929). The Near East Council existed for 35 years as an exclusively Protestant organization, but in 1964 the Syrian Orthodox Church joined. That action prompted a name change to the Near East Council of Churches.

The action of the Syrian church came after more than three decades of conversations between Protestants and both the Eastern Orthodox and the non-Chalcedonian Orthodox (generally referred to as the Oriental Orthodox). That conversation followed the same dialogical effort that was leading to Orthodox participation in the formation of the World Council of Churches. Both Protestants and Eastern Orthodox accept the theological decisions of the Seven Ancient Ecumenical Councils of the church, while the Oriental Churches do not accept the promulgation of some of those councils (though in substance they have not specifically rejected the position articulated by those councils).

Though the World Council was formed in 1948, the conversation proceeded at a slower speed in the Middle East, where the claims and counterclaims of the various churches created the greatest number of immediate issues. Continued dialogue led in 1972 to the drafting of a constitution for an organization that included all three communions. That organization came into being in 1974 as the Middle East Council of Churches. Its first general assembly was held on the island of Cyprus. In 1990, the Roman Catholic Church, manifest in both its Latin-rite diocese and its Eastern-rite dioceses, joined the Council.

The Council operates with an understanding that it is the meeting ground of four Christian family communions, the four being the Protestants, the Eastern Orthodox, the Oriental Orthodox, and the Roman Catholic. Each communion is represented equally at the general assembly (which convenes every five years) and the Council's governing bodies, and each communion appoints its own representatives to the Council.

The Council has been quite active in the many conflictual issues that have made the Middle East an area of constant turmoil and unrest. Most notably, it has tended to support the cause of the Palestinians within Israel. It has also supported efforts to bring peace and reconciliation in Iraq. As the most representative Christian organization in the region, it has led efforts at dialogue to bring understanding among the various communions and to represent them within the larger Muslim world. Equally notable has been its attempt to dialogue with those evangelical and Free churches that have most recently entered the area and often become the focus of issues brought on by their zealous proselytizing.

The Protestant churches that had originally formed the Near East Christian Council also saw a continued need to maintain a special relationship among themselves following the organization of the Middle East Council of Churches. Without lessening their commitment to the new Council, they also formed the Fellowship of Middle East Evangelical Churches as an organization to affirm their common life and provide for action on their specific concerns.

In 2008, the Council reported 27 member denominations based in 12 countries and representing some 14 million members.

The Middle East Council of Churches
Makhoul Street, Deeb Building
PO Box 5376
Beirut
Lebanon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert, comp. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Midway Island

Midway became famous as the site of the decisive naval battle of the war in the Pacific during World War II. Midway is a single atoll of a mere 2.4 square miles with two islands, Sand Island and Eastern Island. Midway was annexed in 1867 by the United States and administered by the U.S. Navy. Until 1993 as many as 2,300 people, almost all military personnel, resided on the islands. In that year, however, the naval facility was closed and hegemony over the atoll was transferred to the Fish and Wildlife Service of the U.S. Department of the Interior. Midway is now a wildlife refuge and only some 40 people reside on the atoll as permanent residents.

There are no permanently organized churches or religious groups on Midway.

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Bissio, Roberto Remo, et al. Third World Guide 93/94. Montevideo, Uruguay: Instituto del Tercer Mundo, 1992.
- The World Factbook 2000: Midway Islands*. Washington: Central Intelligence agency, 2002. <http://www.facts.org/docs/factbook/print/mq.html>.

Milarepa

1052–1135

Milarepa, a native Tibetan, was one of the pioneers spreading Vajrayana Buddhism in Tibet and one of the founders of the Kagyu School of Tibetan Buddhism.

Milarepa was born into an upper-class family in Upper Tsang in northern Tibet. He was orphaned as a child. He began his religious life attempting to work black magic on his aunt and uncle, who adopted him and treated him most cruelly. He seems to have had some success in gaining a degree of retribution on the couple, but came to regret what he had done and turned away from his negative course.

As a young man, he found his way to a famous lama in central Tibet, Rongton Lhaga, who sent him to southern Tibet to study with Marpa Lho-brag-pa (1012–1097), a student of the Indian Vajrayana teacher Naropa. Marpa sensed that Milarepa was to be an outstanding student, and before seeing him, made him pass a set of difficult tests. Milarepa, desirous of becoming Marpa's student, performed all that was asked of him and was finally allowed to take his refuge vows from Marpa. Marpa noted that Naropa also made his young students go through a series of tests to show their perseverance and respect for their future teacher.

A close-up view of a Buddhist tanka representing Milarepa. Milarepa is generally considered one of Tibet's most famous yogis and poets. (iStockPhoto)

Milarepa joined with Marpa's three other leading students Ngok Choku Dorje, Tsurton Wanggi Dorje, and Meyton Chenpo in learning the basics of Vajrayana Buddhism, which includes mastering a number of techniques that open the invisible spiritual world and experiencing a series of initiations that bring the student into a relationship with various deities. Marpa gave Milarepa the Chakrasamvara initiation, during which Milarepa was able to see first the face of the deity and then the entire mandala in which Chakrasamvara appears surrounded by a retinue of other spiritual beings. After the initiation, Marpa offered a prophecy utilizing a four-handled pot, which Milarepa had presented to Marpa at an earlier date. In the prophecy he likened the four handles to his four main students while singling out Milarepa, for whom he saw a particularly fruitful future.

Milarepa remained with Marpa for another 12 years, during which time he learned the full spectrum of Tantric Buddhist practices that had been passed to Marpa. Marpa recognized him as having reached full enlightenment (termed vajradhara) and gave him the religious name by which he is still known.

Milarepa departed from his teacher and settled in Drakar Taso, which became the base from which he would travel across Tibet for the rest of his life. He composed a number of poems/songs that conveyed his teachings in a form his students could easily remember. Unlike Marpa and Naropa, who had spent much time with a few students, Milarepa drew a large number of disciples who would spread the Kagyu dharma across the country and eventually to neighboring Nepal and Bhutan. His most prominent student was Gampopa (1079–1153), who founded the Kagyu monastic lineage.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Tantrism; Vajrayana Buddhism.

References

- Garma C. C. Chang, trans. The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa. Boston: Shambhala, 1999
- Evans-Wentz, W. Y., ed. Tibet's Great Yogi Milarepa: A Biography from the Tibetan. London: Oxford University Press, 1951.
- Kunga Rinpoche, Lama, and Brian Cutill, trans. Drinking the Mountain Stream: Songs of Tibet's Beloved Saint, Milarepa. Somerville, MA: Wisdom Publications, 2003.
- Lobsang Lhalungpa, trans. The Life of Milarepa. Boston: Shambhala, 1985.

Mission 21

See Basel Mission.

Mission Covenant Church of Sweden

The Mission Covenant Church is a Scandinavian expression of the free religious impulse represented by the 18th-century evangelical revival in England and the Pietist movement in Germany. Essential to the Scandinavian revival was the work of Karl Olof Rosenius (1816–1868), editor of the periodical Pietisten. He organized conventicles—informal meetings outside the supervision of the state church—and led in the development of a new hymnology. A renewed emphasis on the spiritual life in Sweden in the mid-19th century led in 1855 to the formation of a new congregation separate from the state-supported Church of Sweden. Other congregations emphasizing the free association of committed believers were soon organized, and in 1878, when these groups established a formal relationship, they agreed upon a congregational polity. Growth was somewhat inhibited by the high level of immigration of members to the United States.

The Mission Covenant Church looked upon the Bible as its sole rule of faith and life, neither composing nor adopting a creedal statement. A Protestant theological perspective much influenced by both its Lutheran heritage and Methodism developed, but through the 20th century a Reformed perspective came to dominate. However, theology was always subordinated to the spiritual life. The church refrained from Baptist independency and continued to practice infant baptism.

At the end of the 1990s the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden reported approximately 70,000 members. The church developed an extensive mission program, often in cooperation with its sister church in America, and its missionary efforts resulted in the development of related autonomous churches around the world, from India and Japan to Ecuador and the Congo. These churches now fellowship through the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches. The Mission Covenant Church of Sweden continues to provide support for its sister churches in poorer countries.

The pressure to provide training for ministers early in the 20th century resulted in the organization of a seminary in 1908. Known since 1994 as the Stockholm School of Theology, the school is now a cooperative effort, jointly supported with the Baptist Union of Sweden. The church also supports Svenska Missionsförbundets Ungdom (Mission Covenant Youth), which has emerged as a broadly supported youth work with units throughout the country.

The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. Between meetings of the assembly, an executive board administers its policies. In 2005, the church reported 63,000 members. Its 790 congregations are organized into 7 districts, each of which is led by a superintendent. The church was a founding member of the World Council of Churches and also joined the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Mission Covenant Church of Sweden
PO Box 6302
Tegnérsgatan 8
S-11381 Stockholm
Sweden
<http://www.smf.se/> (in Swedish)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Sweden; International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Missionaries of Charity

The Missionaries of Charity are an ordered community of the Roman Catholic Church that has become world famous because of the attention directed to its founder, Mother Teresa (1910–1997). She was born Agnes (or Gonxha) Bojaxhiu into an Albanian family residing at Skopje, now the capital of Macedonia. When she was 18, she became a nun with the Sisters of Loreto. In 1929, after learning some English, she entered the novitiate at Darjeeling, India, and two years later she was assigned to work in Calcutta.

Portrait of Mother Teresa, 20th-century Catholic nun and founder of the Missionaries for Charity religious order. (Zatletic/Dreamstime.com)

In 1946 Mother Teresa experienced a new calling to serve the poor of Calcutta. Two years later, with the blessings of her order and church authorities, she left the Sisters of Loreto and settled in the slums of Calcutta. Several women who came to assist her became the nucleus of a new order that was formally approved as a diocesan congregation in 1950 and as a pontifical institute in 1965.

Over the next several decades the order grew rather quietly, with its first activities directed toward Calcutta's street children and then toward the dying, for whom Mother Teresa opened hospices. The order's concern grew for the homeless and those with the most despised diseases, such as Hansen's disease and AIDS. The order also expanded into other countries, and by the time of Mother Teresa's death it included more than 2,300 sisters serving in more than 80 countries. In 1984, Mother Teresa led in the founding of a male auxiliary to the order she led, the Missionaries of Charity Fathers. Members are priests who assume the traditional monastic vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, along with a fourth vow of "Wholehearted and Free Service to the Poorest of the Poor."

Mother Teresa was succeeded by Sister Nirmala Joshi, who served two terms as superior general of the order (1997–2009). She was succeeded by the current leader, Sister Mary Prema. There are novitiates in Rome, Italy; Manila, the Philippines; Warsaw, Poland; Tabora, Tanzania; and San Francisco, California.

Mother Teresa's work began to attract international attention, especially in Roman Catholic circles, in the 1970s, and she became the recipient of a series of awards, including the Pope John XXIII Peace Prize (1971), the Nehru Prize for her promotion of international peace and understanding (1972), and the Balzan Prize for promoting peace and brotherhood (1979). These were capped by the Nobel Peace Prize in 1979, which made her one of the most well-known women in the world. Even before her death, there were calls to canonize Mother Teresa, and they were acted upon soon after she passed away. In 2003, a mere six years after her passing, Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) beatified Mother Teresa, the final step before canonizing her as a saint.

Missionaries of Charity, Motherhouse
c/o Sr. Nirmala, MC
54A, Acharya Jagadish Chandra Bose Rd.
Calcutta 700 016
India
<http://www.mcpriests.com/> (Missionaries of Charity Fathers)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: John XXIII, Pope; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

Collopy, Michael. Works of Love Are Works of Peace: Mother Teresa of Calcutta and the Missionaries of Charity. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1996.

Kumar, Sinita. Mother Teresa of Calcutta. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1998.

Le Joly, E. Mother Teresa of Calcutta: A Biography. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983.

Serrou, R. Teresa of Calcutta: A Pictorial Biography. New York: McGraw Hill, 1980.

Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa

The Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, commonly called the White Sisters, is a Roman Catholic female order established in the 19th century to assist in the rapidly developing missionary efforts especially in North Africa. In 1868, the archbishop of Algiers, Charles M. Lavigerie (1825–1892), had founded the Society of Missionaries of Africa (the White Fathers) who launched work among the Muslim population of the French colony. It quickly became evident that women were needed to reach the women of the country who had limited contacts with males outside their family. Thus in 1869 Archbishop Lavigerie began to open houses in several European countries for women called to missionary work. Novices went through a lengthy probationary period that included both an examination of their calling and preparation for life in Africa. Within a few years they began to take their place beside the male missionaries. They spread to French-speaking Canada in 1903.

The order maintains a special relationship with Islam, in part derived from its origins in North Africa. Like their male counterparts, the members of the order adopted the white dress common among the Arabs as their habit, which resulted in their nickname, "the White Sisters." Lavigerie envisioned the work of the two orders as launching missions and quickly training African converts to assume responsibility for their own progress. To accomplish the task, missionaries had to be aware of the language and culture of the people among whom they would work. To meet this ideal, members of the White Sisters begin their religious life with a 9-month postulancy followed by an 11-month novitiate during which time they are schooled in African languages and culture.

Currently, the order has a number of houses across France, with additional centers in Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, England, the Netherlands, Poland, and Spain, and a general house in Rome. Branches are also found in North America: in Canada, the United States, and Mexico. Work is focused in 16 countries in Africa. The order peaked in 1966, at which time it had 2,163 members. It has declined to close to 1,000 by the beginning of the 21st century. In 2008, approximately 900 sisters are stationed at locations around the world, with about half at the various locations in Europe, and a fourth in Africa.

Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa
 Sœurs Missionnaires de Notre Dame d’Afrique
 24, quai Fernand Saguet
 94700 Maisons-Alfort
 France
<http://soeurs-blanches.cef.fr/index.php>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; White Fathers.

References

- Lacayo, Beverly. 100 Years in Zambia: What Is God Teaching Us When One Culture Meets Another? The Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, 2001.
- Renault, Francois, Cardinal Lavignerie: Churchman, Prophet, and Missionary. London: Athlone Press, 1994.

Missione–Luigia Paparelli, La

1908–1984

Luigia Paparelli was born in Scranton (Pennsylvania) on December 7, 1908. In the 1940s, she met Basilio Roncaccia (the founder of the Divine Mission, who claimed to have received the “divine mission” of sharing with his followers his newly found healing power) in Rome. Roncaccia and Paparelli shared a devotion to the Holy Trinity, and the idea of helping those who suffered, but their practices were different, and they separated quite soon. A charismatic figure, Paparelli gathered a significant number of followers around her. The first “sign” of her future mission dates back, in fact, to 1937 when, afflicted by a somewhat mysterious illness, the Lord, she claimed, had visited and miraculously healed her. Seven years of penance followed, and on October 13, 1944, Paparelli had a new mystical experience and interpreted it as the Sacred Heart of Jesus giving her the mission to “heal bodies in order to save souls.” The first cure ascribed to Paparelli’s miraculous powers took place in October 1944. In that year, she established a group called the Luigia Paparelli Mission (Missione Luigia Paparelli) and started calling her followers the “Brothers of the Mission.” Paparelli became, for her followers, “the Master,” divinely invested with powers to heal and exorcise. She “signed” the sick with a cross on the forehead, lips, heart, and the afflicted part of their bodies, in the name of the Holy Trinity. Paparelli also instructed those “signed” by her to visit a Catholic church in order to confess and receive holy Communion. In 1970 the Office of the Cardinal Vicar of Rome stated in a letter that Paparelli’s phenomena and “signs” were “superstitious” and could in fact “promote a form of superstition detrimental to religion.” In such phenomena, the declaration went on to say, there was “nothing supernatural.” The Mission continued to grow, however, and assumed the name La Missione–Luigia Paparelli (slightly different from the original) following Paparelli’s death. She died surrounded by the Brothers of the Mission, on August 28, 1984, in Valmontone (Rome).

Luigia Paparelli stated emphatically that she did not regard herself as the founder of a new religion; her faith, she said, was “the one and only religion of Jesus Christ, based on the Ten Commandments.” Rather, Paparelli’s teachings and her supernatural phenomena created a large community of believers who still regard themselves as Roman Catholics, but whose individual perception of their Catholicism differs from person to person and from place to place. Some Brothers of the Mission would simply claim that their feeling toward Paparelli is one of deep gratitude. For other Brothers, however, Paparelli is nothing less than divine and some of them also have an exclusive faith in her healing powers, to the exclusion of all mainstream medicine. These fringes of the larger movement live their lives quite separately from society as a whole, and often break ties with their own families in consequence. The relationship between the Mission and the Roman Catholic hierarchy is different in terms of the various attitudes held by Paparelli's followers and by local parish priests and bishops.

After Paparelli's death, problems of succession generated several divisions. According to some witnesses, the Master, before her death, "called" Rina Menichetti Frizza (1928–2002) from Orvieto (Central Italy) to whom Paparelli addressed her last words. Those Brothers of the Mission who were called Apostolini ("Little Apostles") recognized Menichetti as Paparelli's spiritual heir. There are, however, other Brothers of the Mission who assign no particular role to Menichetti.

Menichetti continued to welcome followers to her Orvieto house until her death. In her house she also enjoyed spiritual visions of the Master (Paparelli), whose messages she immediately wrote down for the Brothers. Menichetti told of her encounters with the Master who "[took] her on her coach" to "her Kingdom" together with God the Father and the Virgin Mary. In Menichetti's visions, Paparelli claims that she is the Son (not "the Daughter") of the Father, and that the Brothers should anticipate her return: "My return will be your liberation." At the end of each "conversation," Menichetti received a blessing from the "Holy Trinity": "In the name of the Father, Luigia the Son, the Holy Spirit, and the Virgin Mary."

After Menichetti's death most of the Brothers of the Mission that recognized Menichetti as Paparelli's spiritual heir think there is no successor with the same charisma; a minority of Brothers recognize another person as Menichetti's spiritual heir.

The stated aim of the Mission is the promotion of the "Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion." Its main centers are located in Gambassi (Tuscany) and San Venanzo, (Umbria), both in central Italy. "Temples" of the Mission, with statues of Jesus, the Virgin Mary, the Holy Trinity, and Luigia Paparelli herself, have been built, and are regarded as sacred places where both special yearly festivals and traditional Catholic feasts are celebrated. There are other centers in Italy, in Rome (Lazio), Marche, and Sicily, and in several other countries too (Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, France, the United States). Brothers of the Mission, and "Little Apostles" in particular, do not proselytize. The Mission's message is normally spread by somebody who has been healed, and who, in turn, propagates its powers of healing. The Brothers of the Mission in Italy and abroad total approximately 10,000. The movement does not maintain a website.

Via Montefalconi 21
50050 Gambassi terme (Firenze)
Italy

Raffaella Di Marzio

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Note: Rina Menichetti's visions from July 8, 1986, to April 8, 1988, are privately circulated.
- Di Marzio, Raffaella. "Gruppi ispirati a Basilio Roncaccia e a Luigia Paparelli." In Enciclopedia delle Religioni in Italia, edited by Massimo Introvigne, Pier Luigi Zoccatelli, Nelly Ippolito Macrina, and Verónica Roldán, 66–75. Leumann (Torino): Elle Di Ci, 2001.
- Massimo Introvigne, Pier Luigi Zoccatelli, Nelly Ippolito Macrina, and Verónica Roldán. "Movimenti cattolici di Frangia in Italia: dalla Missione Divina di Basilio Roncaccia a Luigia Paparelli." In Identità religiosa, pluralismo, fondamentalismo, edited by Mario Aletti and Germano Rossi, 161–167. Torino: Centro Scientifico Editore, 2004.
- Pia Società San Paolo. Chiese e sette protestanti in Italia. Roma: Edizioni Paoline, 1956.

Mita Congregation

The Mita Congregation, a Puerto Rican-based Christian Pentecostal church, was founded by Juanita García Peraza (1897–1970). When she was eight years old, García Peraza became ill with ulcers and was nursed back to health with prayer. Once well, she began to attend a Pentecostal church, the Pentecostal movement having just come to the island. She grew to womanhood, married, and bore four children. As a young woman, she had a vivid religious experience: she was visited by the Holy Spirit, who informed her that her body was needed to carry out God's work. After she accepted this calling, she was given a choice.

Her life trial would either be persecution or illness, and she chose the latter. One night a short time later, as she looked out the window, she saw a shooting star, which approached her and landed on her forehead. At that moment she became the incarnation of the Holy Spirit. She was also told the name of God for the new era: Mita. She subsequently began to perform a spectrum of miracles. She saw her experience as fulfillment of a prophecy in Revelation 2:17.

In the late 1930s García Peraza came into conflict with the Puerto Rican Pentecostal leaders, who were all male. One day while “in the Spirit,” she designated Teófilo Vargas Sein as the First Prophet of God for the new era, renaming him Aarón. As the conflict grew, she was tried for heresy. In the midst of the trial, she and 11 followers walked out of the Pentecostal church, and in 1940 she founded the Free Church. She later designated a site in San Juan where a temple would be built as the headquarters for the movement.

From the basic Pentecostal theology, Mita, as García Peraza became known, developed a new perspective. Drawing on an ideal initially articulated by Joachim of Fiore (ca. 1135–1202), she divided history into three eras, that of Jehovah, God the Father; that of Jesus, God the Son; and now that of Mita, God the Holy Spirit and Mother. Members draw a distinction between García Peraza, the human woman, and Mita, the God who worked through her. Aarón, who succeeded her, is seen as having become the channel through which the Holy Spirit (Mita) continues to speak.

The special work of Mita has been to gather the scattered children of God, which is done under the three banners of Love, Freedom, and Unity. The new era initiated by Mita serves to relativize and somewhat supersede the revelation that previously came through Christ. In the new era, baptism, the Eucharist, and many of the trappings of the Roman Catholic Church (the dominant religious body in Puerto Rico) have been left behind. Mita’s followers also see the arrival of Mita as equivalent to the Second Coming, fulfilling the prophecy of Jesus in John 14:16 concerning the coming Comforter. She is also identified with the woman in Revelation 12:1–2.

Mita’s movement originally developed among the working classes of San Juan. Developed along with the church is a corporation, Congregación Mita, Inc., through which numerous businesses have been organized, membership in the church coinciding with membership in an economic cooperative. As the movement grew, a variety of businesses were formed apparently with a long-term plan of community self-sufficiency. These have diversified to include farms and cattle ranches in rural areas and both retail and wholesale businesses in the cities. Over the years the businesses have prospered and have also given birth to various social services, including health and counseling services, a nursing home, and several schools. Rather than withdrawing from society as many communal groups do, the Mita Congregation is thoroughly integrated into the surrounding community.

Once established in Puerto Rico, the church expanded to Colombia and the Dominican Republic, where it has had equal success, and from there to Mexico, Venezuela, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Curaçao, and Panama. The church has also followed the migration of Latin Americans to North America, where congregations have been planted in Spanish-speaking communities across the continent. In 1990, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the movement, a new temple was dedicated in San Juan. It seats 6,000 people.

Mita Congregation has established its headquarters in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, inland and south of San Juan. It has approximately 50,000 members, the largest number of which is in Colombia. There are six congregations in the United States and one in Canada.

Mita Congregation
Calle Duerte 235
Hato Rey, 60919
Puerto Rico

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church.

Reference

Camayd-Freixas, Erik. “The Cult of the Goddess Mita on the Eve of a New Millennium: A Socio-Anthropological Look at a Caribbean Urban Religion.” Latin American Issues 13 (1997).

Modernity

The term “modernity” is generally held by the social sciences to describe the forces, structures, and historical patterns of the period from the late 16th century forward. This article begins with a discussion of the political, economic, and cultural building blocks of the modern period; it then provides a general outline of the ideas of modern sociological theorists insofar as they relate to religion; and finally, it touches on the particular patterns of religion in response to modernity. Modernity and its conceptual child, globalization, are the core constructs that every sociological theory must address in the contemporary world, but it is important to remember that modernity was neither inevitable nor simply a natural evolution in human history. Modernity was constructed, and it has become the most powerful force in human history.

The explosive growth of the world’s population from 400 million in 1500 to 1.6 billion in 1900, a number that has now quadrupled, reflects that radical transformation of the globe through the period that we call modernity, but what explains this transformation? The answer begins with the age of European discovery and the world-changing shifts that occurred politically, economically, and religiously. The Spanish colonization of the Americas facilitated the largest transfer of wealth from Central and South America in human history. The Spanish Empire, lasting more than 300 years, conquered the Aztec and Incan empires, extracting much of their gold and silver and enabling Spain and the rest of Europe to become the wealthiest nation-states in human history. This wealth, along with the new agriculture learned in the Americas, allowed for the capital investments that led to the Industrial Revolution and simultaneously produced gains in foodstuffs that enabled the quadrupling of the world’s population. Spanish expansion, as well as French, Dutch, and English colonization, solidified European power; monetized industries; enabled the expansion of the arts and sciences; facilitated modern Christian missions; and produced the economic, cultural, and social capital that constructed the modern world. During this period of colonization, religion and empire partnered to Christianize the world dominated by Europe. Roman Catholicism was spread in the Spanish and French colonial possessions, and the English were not far behind in seeding their colonies, particularly the United States, with the Anglican and Protestant religions.

This baseline of colonialism not only secured resources but also set the table for the development of new political ideas that marked and enabled modernity to thrive. Intellectual and political leadership produced the French Revolution (1789), putting forward a universalist vision of reason that sought to displace religion and its authority with the power of liberty and an egalitarian spirit. This ideology set in motion a series of attempts at representative government throughout Europe and eventually across the globe. A similar egalitarian and democratic mode of revolution mobilized the English and American revolutions of 1642 and 1776. These revolutions, different from the French, integrated religion and reason, leading to various forms of accommodation between church and state. Indeed, religious liberty became a critical feature of democracy, even as it had a mixed history in England and Europe. In the American context church and state were eventually separated, producing open cultural and religious markets that Protestant entrepreneurs would exploit as they churched America and sought to Christianize the world.

Max Weber and Emile Durkheim are the key theorists of religion and modernity. Weber, the German sociologist, interpreted the forces of modernity as rationalizing instruments of culture and religion. The compartmentalization of public and private life separated religious human ideals from the cultural, economic, and political spheres. Each sphere had its own rationality, and religion could and would no longer be an explanation that made rational sense outside the confines of the human heart. Modernity, for Weber, was a quintessential force of disenchantment, whereby the universe was no longer explained by God’s actions in it, nor did providential forces drive history.

Durkheim, the French sociologist, used the theory of differentiation to explain and describe the forces of modernity. For Durkheim modernity was marked by divisions of labor, the specialization of roles and responsibilities, and dominated by forms of instrumental rationality that sought profit over meaning and results over purpose. Unlike Weber, Durkheim argued that this loss of overall social solidarity created social anomie in which modern people experienced chaos and a lack of overall meaning. For society and culture to function properly, culture needed a sacred canopy—something like religion, though Durkheim never found or proposed a replacement for it.

Portrait of Emile Durkheim, late-19th- and early-20th-century French sociologist. Considered the founding father of modern sociology, Durkheim revolutionized the discipline by adopting the rigorous scientific methodology of the natural sciences. (Bettmann/Corbis)

In the 20th century, Peter L. Berger was the foremost theorist of religion and modernity. He took up where Durkheim left off, theorizing that, without a sacred canopy, religion would decline and lose its vitality and efficacy in modern life. However, Berger's prediction of secularization as the main result of mo-

Portrait of Max Weber, sociologist who conceptualized the theory of the Protestant work ethic and wrote about its influence on capitalism. (Library of Congress)

ernity ran into empirical disconfirmations at the end of the 20th century. Indeed, Berger confessed that he was wrong. Other sociologists of religion, such as Rodney Stark and Roger Finke, used economic theory and empirical analysis to propose a contrary theory. Modernity, precisely because it creates so many more options and open religious markets, gives access to religious entrepreneurs who, because they have no state-sponsored religious bureaucracies, have fewer barriers to overcome but must work harder to share their religious “goods.”

Modern Religious Trends Predictions that modernity would lead to the death of religion were premature. The modern era has ushered in a multitude of innovative new religious sects; some lead to new global religions such as the Church of the Latter-day Saints, Falun Gong, or any number of less well known new religious movements across the globe. Moreover, more traditional religions, like Islam and Christianity, have taken on new strength and vitality as they have flourished in various regions of the world. In Islam, new surveys show that Muslims, despite what many suspected were the corrosive effects of modern life, perceive their religion as very important. In fact, Muslim countries usually rate the importance of religion as higher than even the United States, a country that is supposed to be exceptionally religious. Again, religion and modernity are not mutually exclusive.

Christianity has adapted to modernity with success as well. At the end of the 19th century, it experienced an explosive new trend in the faith; Charismatic and Pentecostal forms of piety focused on more experiential and egalitarian modes of spiritual experience and authority. Its impact on Asia, Latin America, and Africa has been world changing. The Roman Catholic Church no longer dominates Latin America, and in some countries, such as Guatemala, more than half of their population is now Protestant. Indeed, Africa went from having nearly no Christians in 1900 to more than 360 million Christians in 2000. Some have suggested that the center of Christianity is no longer in the Anglo American or European context, but indeed in Asia, Latin America, and Africa—it has become, not unlike Islam, a global faith.

Modernity, far from being the death knell of religions, has rather become a context for enormous religious change and innovation. The tendency in the past was to write about the golden age of Christendom in the Middle Ages. We now know it was a myth—there appears to be little evidence for mass piety in that period of European history. Thus, the relative lack of modern Christian practice in Europe may simply be consistent with its history. England, however, seems to have experienced a real decline in the Christian faith and practice; empirical evidence supports this claim. In this way, England has become more like the rest of Europe than like its cousins, the Americas. There may be less religious and church affiliation, but one of the marks of modernity, at least in the United States, is the explosion of people who claim to be spiritual but not religious. Many now argue that they are neither members nor attendants of religious services, yet, they have high rates of belief in God as well as prayer. How to judge and define religion in the modern period is one of the real challenges of the era.

The modern market in religion appears to be more open to innovation and change than ever before. That this indicates a decline in religious affiliation per se is clear. But the claim that modernity means the death of religion is no longer plausible. Religion in modern life is as robust and powerful as it ever has been for good and for ill. We have not only had tremendous outbreaks of violence done in the name of God, across all the religions, but we have seen signs of the good that religions produce in caring for others on levels both small and large. In the modern world, where globalism creates new opportunities to communicate and share information, religion is more than ever an active partner in framing how we shape our cultures, societies, and politics.

James Wellman

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Falun Gong; Globalization, Religion and; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Secularization.

References

- Berger, Peter L. The Desecularization of the World: Resurgent Religion and World Politics. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Bruce, Steve. Politics and Religion. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2003.
- Cole, Juan. Engaging the Muslim World. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2009.
- Finke, Roger, and Rodney Stark. The Churching of America, 1776–2005: Winners and Losers in our Religious Economy. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2005.
- Freston, Paul. Evangelicals and Politics in Asia, Africa and Latin America. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Wright, Ronald. What Is America? A Short History of the New World Order. Cambridge: De Capo Press, 2008.
- Wellman, James K., Jr., ed. Belief and Bloodshed: Religion and Violence across Time and Tradition. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2007.

■ Moldova

Moldova, which emerged as an independent country with the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991, is sandwiched between Romania and Ukraine. It was once united with what is now the Romanian province of Bucovina in the Principality of Moldova. The modern nation includes some 13,066 square miles of territory upon which live some 4,300,000 people (2008). Since independence, Russian armed forces have had a continued presence in Transnistria, the sliver of Moldovan land east of the Dniester River. The majority of people who reside in the area are Ukrainians and Russians, and they have asserted their independence as a Transnistria republic.

The eastern European nation of Moldova has for centuries been home to the Vlach people, closely related to the Romanians. They emerged out of the silence of many centuries in the mid-1300s, when Vlach people northeast of Wallachia formed their own kingdom and separated themselves from Hungarian rule. Their territory was established between the Danube and Dniester rivers and northwest of the Black Sea. Running through the middle of the land was the Prut River. The Vlachs enjoyed great success through the 15th century under Stephen the Great (1435–1504), reaching eastward into modern Ukraine east of the Dniester River. But the Vlach Kingdom constantly had to defend its borders from its neighbors and from the expanding Ottoman Empire. Early in the 1500s, it was overrun by Turkish forces and turned into a vassal state.

In the 18th century, Moldova aligned itself with Russia in an attempt to overthrow Ottoman rule. By the early 19th century, Russia had gained hegemony over Moldova and expelled the Turkish residents. The land between the Dniester and Prut rivers became an autonomous region within Russia, Bessarabia, and then in 1873 it became a Russian province. During the 20th century the population soared, from 250,000 to 2.5 million. A process of Russification led in 1966 to the discontinuance of the Moldovan language in the schools.

In the years immediately following World War I, an independent Moldova was established with Romanian assistance, but Moldova became contested territory between Romania and the Soviet Union. The land west of the Dniester and Prut rivers became part of Romania, and that to the east of the Dniester was made a part of the Ukraine. In 1940 the Soviet Union annexed Bessarabia and created the Federated Republic of Moldova, with the approximate borders of the present state of Moldova.

Moldova proclaimed its independence from the Soviet Union in 1991. The land to the west (between the Prut River and the Carpathian Mountains) is a part of present-day Romania and the Moldovan land to the east of the Dniester River remains a part of the Ukraine.

Christianity spread along the western shore of the Black Sea in the third century CE, and from there it moved north and west along the rivers. By the time a Moldovan nation emerged in the 14th century, Orthodox Christianity oriented toward Byzantium had been established there. The church in Moldova was influenced first by the Romanian Orthodox Church, but beginning in the 18th century, the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) (ROC) had a greater impact. After Moldova was incorporated into Russia, the Moldovan church was incorporated into the Russian Orthodox Church. During the years of harshest repression of religion in the Soviet Union, the Moldovan church was least affected, and a larger percentage of its churches remained open than in other parts of the Soviet Union.

By the time of the country's independence in 1991, the church in Moldova had been thoroughly integrated into Russian Orthodoxy and remains so to the present. There are four dioceses of the ROC in Moldova, which function under the Moscow Patriarchate as the Orthodox Church of Moldova. It has close to 1,000 parishes. In 1992, some Moldovan priests left the church to form the independent Bessarabian Orthodox Church and sought to place themselves under the Romanian Patriarchate in Bucharest. The government has, however, refused to recognize this splinter.

More than 95 percent of the nation's 4.5 million citizens identify with the Orthodox Church. There are, however, many Romanian-speaking people in Moldova, and there is a diocese of the Romanian Orthodox Church with headquarters at Chisinau. There is also a diocese of the Russian Old Believers Church.

German Baptists came to Moldova in 1876 and baptized nine believers in Turtino (now in Ukraine). A church was formed three years later as part of the larger Baptist community in the Ukraine. In 1907 three German-speaking Baptist churches in Bessarabia formed the first Moldovan Baptist association. The German Baptists continued to grow until World War II, when most Germans left the region.

MOLDOVA

The first Russian Baptist congregation was formed in 1908 in Chisinau. A Russian Baptist association was formed in 1920. By 1942 there were 347 Baptist churches and 18,000 members. In 1944 the Moldovan Baptists were forced into the All Union Council of Evangelical Christians–Baptists, the umbrella group for evangelical churches in the Soviet Union. Following independence, Baptists in Moldova organized the independent Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church also began work in Moldova, which in 1989 was organized as the Moldova Union Conference. The Conference reported some 7,000 members as the 21st century began. Jehovah’s Witnesses had opened work early in the 20th century, but in 1951 they were deported from the region. Before the fall of the Soviet Union, they quietly began to return and evangelize and by the mid-1990s they had 80 kingdom halls.

Islam entered with the Turkish forces at the end of the 15th century, and a Muslim community grew up during the years of Turkish hegemony in the region, mostly among Turkish expatriates. Most of the Turks (and hence most of the Muslims) were expelled by the Russians, but a few thousand remain. Some 3.5 percent of the population speaks Gagauz, a Turkish dialect.

Jews began settling in Moldova in the 15th century. The community grew rapidly during the 19th century, from some 20,000 to more than 220,000. It continued to grow through the first half of the 20th century. Although Jews in the region had been perennially subjected to various forms of anti-Semitism, serious trouble began in 1940 with the exile of many Jewish leaders to Siberia. Nazi forces overran the area in 1941, and between 1941 and 1944, most of the remaining Jews were either killed or deported.

Moldova

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,665,000	3,568,000	96.3	–1.11	3,393,000	2,808,000
Orthodox	1,549,000	3,444,000	92.9	–1.20	3,203,000	2,636,000
Protestants	32,800	88,000	2.4	1.90	130,000	130,000
Marginals	200	42,000	1.1	1.92	50,000	50,000
Agnostics	1,068,000	80,000	2.2	–6.12	60,000	40,000
Jews	55,000	27,000	0.7	–5.71	20,000	15,000
Atheists	800,000	16,000	0.4	–6.37	10,000	8,000
Muslims	7,000	15,000	0.4	–3.88	12,000	10,000
Baha'is	0	600	0.0	–0.31	1,000	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	250	0.0	–1.29	300	300
Total population	3,595,000	3,707,000	100.0	–1.33	3,496,000	2,883,000

After the war, exiles returned and along with survivors re-established the Jewish community. In 1989 migrations to Israel began, and the majority of younger Jews have left the country. By the mid-1990s, some 65,000 Jews resided in Moldova, the largest community residing in Chisinau. Most Jews are Russian-speaking in a land where the majority of the population speaks Romanian.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jehovah's Witnesses; Old Believers (Russia); Romanian Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Seventh-day Adventist Church; Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Dima, Nicolas. From Moldova to Moldova: The Soviet-Romanian Territorial Dispute. New York: East European Monographs/Columbia University Press, 1991.
- The Republic of Moldova*. Chisinau: Moldpres, 1995.

Molokans

The Molokans (milk drinkers), also spelled Molokons, one of the most prominent of the 19th-century Russian Christian sectarian groups, were named for their practice of drinking milk during Lent, a practice forbidden to the members of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). The Molokans generally trace their beginning to the career of Simeon Uklein (b. 1733), the nephew of a noted Doukhor leader. He grew dissatisfied with Doukhor attitudes toward the Bible, and in the mid-18th century he began to preach in Tambov, southeast of Moscow. He proclaimed the Bible as his only authority, and by around 1780, the Molokans had arisen as an independent body.

Uklein was not a Trinitarian. Rather he taught that God the Father is the one God, that Christ is his Son and clothed with angelic flesh, and that the Holy Spirit is of the same substance as the Father but inferior to him. He also held that at the time of resurrection all believers will receive a new body, different from their present one. Uklein suggested that Christians should obey the secular law when it does not contradict divine law. He ran into trouble with the Russian authorities because he opposed war and advised believers to refrain from military service. He denied the need for sacraments and ritual. Water baptism was replaced with instruction in the Word. Molokans opposed the veneration given to icons.

Concerned about both the Molokans and the Doukhobors, the Russian government began to push them out of central Russia southward to the Ukraine and then farther south into the Caucasus (present-day Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan) and Central Asia. Repression of the group initially peaked in 1826, when the Molokans refused to be recruited in the army or to pay taxes.

Under repression they quickly reassessed the tax issue, but when pressed into the army would only take non-combat duties (hospitals, cooking, etc.). By the 1840s, the Russian government estimated that some 200,000 Molokans could be found in the Tambov region alone.

In the 1830s, a spiritual awakening spread through the Molokan communities. It was characterized by the practice of jumping about in spiritual ecstasy. It also coincided with the appearance of several charismatic prophets, some of whom had a millennial, apocalyptic message that tended to attract believers. The jumping phenomenon split the Molokans into two major groups: the Postoyannye (Steadfast), who rejected the jumping, and the Pryguny (Jumpers).

The Molokans may have had as many as half a million members by the middle of the 19th century. The problems with the government reached a new peak in 1878, when the government attempted to introduce universal military service, and this became a matter of most intense concern when the Molokans refused to bear arms during the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905). At this time, many Molokans began immigrating to the United States. Some 2,000 Pryguny migrated to Southern California between 1904 and the beginning of World War I. Several hundred Postoyannye moved to Hawaii in 1904, relocating to San Francisco, California, the next year. Today, some 2,000 Postoyannye reside in California and Oregon, and some 10,000 Pryguny reside in Southern California, Arizona, and Baja California, Mexico. There are also seven Molokan centers in Australia.

The Molokans have survived in Russia, over the years becoming the foundation upon which a number of other groups built their Russian ministries. Many Molokans joined the Mennonites, Baptists, and evangelical Christians. The Soviet government was no kinder to the Molokans than the Russian czarists had been. As the 21st century begins, however, more than 150 Molokan communities exist in Russia and the countries of the former Soviet Union, especially Azerbaijan. Most Molokans who were in the Caucasus have been driven out and have relocated in the southern part of Russia. In Russia, some coordination of the Molokan communities is being provided by the Community of Spiritual Christians–Molokans. In 1926, the Pryguny Molokans in southern California organized into the United Molokan Christian Association. There are an estimated 20,000 Molokans worldwide.

Community of Spiritual Christians–Molokans
c/o Head Minister Timofei Schetinkin Kochubeevka, Stavropol'skii krai
Russia

United Molokan Christian Association
16222 Soriano Dr.
Hacienda Heights, CA 91745-4840

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Doukhobors; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Dunn, Ethel, and Stephen P. Dunn. The Molokan Heritage Collection. Vol. 1. Reprints of Articles and Translations. Berkeley, CA: Highgate Road Social Science Research Station, 1983.
- Klibanov, A. I. History of Religious Sectarianism in Russia (1860s–1917). Trans. Ethel Dunn. Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1982.
- Mohoff, George W. The True Molokan. Montebello, CA: the author, 2003.
- “Molokan Home Page.” <http://gecko.gc.maricopa.edu/clubs/russian/molokan/>. Accessed December 19, 2001.

■ Monaco

Monaco, a small principality of only one square mile, is located on the French Mediterranean coast between Nice, France, and San Remo, Italy. Well known for its casinos, it attained a high profile after its prince married American movie star Grace Kelly (1929–1982). The majority of the 32,496 Monacans (2008) are of French heritage, but in the 20th century, Monaco became a metropolitan community, with residents from many national backgrounds having moved there from Italy and the several French-speaking countries.

Christianity spread along the French coast beginning in the first century. A Roman Catholic parish was established in 1247 as part of the Diocese of Nice. The Diocese of Monaco was established in 1887, though there are still a relatively small number of parishes.

Monaco

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	23,300	28,500	86.2	0.10	28,500	29,100
Roman Catholics	21,700	27,200	82.3	0.07	27,100	27,800
Protestants	1,000	700	2.1	2.53	800	800
Anglicans	450	300	0.9	-1.28	300	300
Agnostics	0	3,000	9.1	2.49	4,500	5,500
Atheists	0	760	2.3	0.32	1,200	1,500
Jews	400	560	1.7	0.29	600	630
Muslims	0	150	0.5	0.28	280	400
Baha'is	30	70	0.2	0.33	120	200
Total population	23,700	33,000	100.0	0.30	35,200	37,300

Protestantism was established in 1925 when the Church of England created Saint Paul's Anglican Church, which serves English-speaking residents and the many tourists who come to Monaco annually. Saint Paul's is attached to the Diocese of Europe. Greek residents organized a parish of the Greek Orthodox Church under the Ecumenical Patriarchate in 1957. French Protestants organized a congregation affiliated with the Reformed Church of France in 1959.

There is a small Jewish community in Monaco, but no synagogue has been erected. The Baha'i Faith organized in the mid-1950s. Many other different religious organizations are now represented among Monaco's diverse residents, but few have enough members to hold public worship or organize a center.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of England; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Eccardt, Thomas M. Secrets of the Seven Smallest States of Europe: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, and Vatican City. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.
- Pemberton, H. The History of Monaco, Past and Present. Boston: Adamant Media Corporation, 2002.

Monasticism

Monasticism is a form of religious life in which one renounces the world and chooses to live by specific means to reach salvific goals. It is marked by renunciation of and separation from routine social life. In most cases, potential members (novices) are tested for understanding and compliance to community expectations before being allowed to swear permanent vows. Physical separation in distinct, purpose-built structures is common, as is symbolic separation. The monk may wear distinctive clothing (a habit) or a tonsure (the specific emblematic pattern in which hair is removed) or take a religious name replacing that given at birth. These criteria preclude discussion of quasi-monastic forms found in various religions.

Monasticism's roots are lost in time's shrouds. The Greek "monos," meaning "alone," becomes "monk" (or "monarchist") in English. Early monks seceded from society for spiritual purposes. Over time, hermits gathered followings, which were organized into communities. "Cenobitic" (or "common") monasticism became Christianity's norm; it also figures in Buddhism and Jainism.

The oldest continually-practiced monastic forms arose in South Asia, in Buddhism and Jainism. Their precise developmental relationship eludes academic consensus. Both, along with ascetic Brahmanism, may be differing elaborations of a pre-existing regional thread of asceticism. Both seek release from karmic bondage. Discussion of intellectual dependency and direction of influence may reveal as much about the Western Enlightenment's fixation on "first" manifestations of ideas or practices as it does the primitive sources of Indian asceticism. Common in theme, however, is the hermits' practice of congregating in fixed locations during the three-month summer rainy season.

Buddhist Monasticism Buddhism granted monasticism a particular role in the process of attaining nirvana (freedom from suffering). Monachists devote themselves to seek total emptiness and loss of self. Chanting and breathing practices prescribed in their scriptures aided the monachists' search.

Buddhist monasticism is an extension of the original sangha (community) gathered around Gautama. Derivative sanghas, however, did not possess authoritative leadership. Initially only men were accepted; a tale exists of Buddha's reluctant acceptance of women.

The rulings of the First Three Buddhist Councils ground current practice for Theravadan Buddhists (the dominant form in Ceylon, Burma, and Thailand), although this idea remains controversial—Theravadans alone recognizing the third council. The first, around 486 BCE, recounts an attempt to preserve the recently deceased Buddha's teaching by reciting the sangha's key disciplinary rules (the Vinayapataka, or Book of Discipline). All Buddhist groups acknowledge this council's existence, but debate its content. Fortnightly communal reading from the Vinaya remains central to most Buddhist monachism. The second council, approximately 386 BCE, centered on 10 points allegedly deviating from the Vinaya, including the propriety of accepting monetary gifts. This partisan account of Buddhism's first schism foregrounds tensions between mobile ascetics and proponents of stable communities.

Buddhist monks, Kuming, China. (J. Gordon Melton)

The Theravadan sangha consisted of six categories: monks and nuns, novices of both sexes, laymen and laywomen; both Chinese and Tibetan Mahayana sanghas add male and female categories of probationers, a status lower than novice. Bhikkhu (monk) and bhikkhuni (nun) literally translate as “almsman” and “almswoman.” Sanghas are the embodiment of dhamma (teaching). Over time, initiation or ordination rites became more intricate. Likewise, monasteries evolved from park-like spaces reserved for monks during the rainy season hiatus to elaborate buildings with designated rooms for varying purposes.

Buddhism entered China roughly two millennia ago; it flourished in Japan from the 500s, where it introduced monasticism. The 1868 Meiji Restoration brought monastic suppression, with confiscation of property and encouragement of monachists' marriage.

Jaina Monasticism Mahavira, the great Jain teacher, was Buddha's contemporary. He recognized four branches of Jain practice: monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. Jainism elevates monastic mendicancy to a central role in achieving “emancipation” (moksha). In light of the genuine risk of starvation, mendicants' self-chosen begging is viewed as heroic, bringing contact with spiritual reality. Begging benefits not merely mendicants, but provides an avenue for donors' generosity, reducing both persons' negative karma. Ideally, death would occur during meditation after prolonged fasting.

Two major monastic divisions exist: Svetambara (white-clad) and Digambara (sky-clad). Both subscribe to the five basic Jaina tenets, differing profoundly over the interpretation of renunciation of personal property. The numerically inferior Digambaras include clothing among forbidden items. The division occurred somewhere after the fifth century BCE. Differing explanations are offered, but the core issue was Digambara accusations that clothed opponents' failure to take a vow of nudity indicated lax discipline. Renunciation of clothes is often gradual, as novices progress spiritually. Similarly citing renunciation of property, Digambaras decline alms-bowls, eating only food placed in their up-turned palms. Digambara nuns, who cannot achieve moksha without reincarnation as men, do not practice nudity.

The Svetambara canon includes the Ayara-, Kappa- and Vavahara-suttas, which define the scope of monks and nuns' disciplined life. More than 100 pages are devoted to the process of begging. Svetambaras reject nudity as an attempt to restore insignificant details of Mahavira's work. So strong is concern not to damage life that Sthanakvaki- and Terepantha-Svetambaras wear mouth-coverings to avoid damaging tiny beings with their breath. Renunciation of sexual activity is based not only on denying pleasure but upon belief that female genitalia teem with microscopic life that is pulverized during intercourse. Similarly, alcohol is rejected not only for its effects but because microbes are destroyed during fermentation. Both branches allow whisks for the sweeping of sleeping areas to remove insects that might become crushed. Forgoing travel in the rainy season lessens the likelihood of harming water-borne creatures.

The Terepantha-Svetambaras founded a research institute in the 1970s to promote much-needed academic reflection on Jaina monasticism.

Christian Monasticism Christian monasticism was polygenetic, arising simultaneously and independently in several locations. Whatever its New Testament-era role, the Qumran community's eradication by Romans broke any institutional link with Christian monasticism. Marking Christian monasticism is a persistent "resto-rationist" theme, attempting to re-create the perceived community from Acts 2.

Evidence suggests the existence, easterly outside the Roman Empire, of an ascetic tradition predating Egyptian developments. Tatian (ca. 120–180) and his eremitic encratic (literally "self-controlled") followers were considered heretical in the West, but their heightened strictness matched that of other regional religions. Ascetics undertook wandering mission journeys, separating themselves "to" mission, rather than "from" society. By the third century, celibate, single-minded community observance in Syria began with the "Sons and Daughters of the Covenant." Persian monastic community dates from the fourth century, with revitalization in the sixth, including the foundation of the Great Monastery on Mount Izla.

Egyptian hermits, perhaps reacting to relatively comfortable late third-century conditions, fled to the desert. Their story is shadowy until Athanasius (ca. 293–373) wrote his Life of Antony, a hagiography revealing typical early practices. Monastic vows were a second or true baptism. The Edict of Milan brought both rejoicing at the empire's apparent conversion and concern over lax discipline. Christian Platonists' elision of learning and asceticism grounded the movement; some see it as continuing early pacifism, monks' acting on the majority's behalf. Monastic community developed around 320, under Pachomius (ca. 292–348 CE). This cenobitic monasticism envisioned a third option between direct struggle with the world and withdrawal to undertake solely spiritual battles. His pragmatic Rule provided ad hoc advice for daily issues.

In Asia Minor, monasticism unfolded under the influence of Macrina (324–379) and Basil (330–379). Disdaining eremiticism as selfish, they promoted church reform through a service-based life with decentralized leadership. Basil's widely translated Asceticon was not a true "rule," but a guiding conglomeration of scriptures and ideas. Orthodox monastic spirituality extensively used icons from the sixth century. Imperial edicts in the eighth and ninth centuries, essentially equating icon veneration with idolatry, mandated iconoclasm (destruction of icons). Resistance by iconophiles, who defended their devotion on Christological grounds, led to their persecution.

Portrait of Saint Basil the Great, a fourth-century Christian leader and bishop of Caesarea. Basil was instrumental in the development of Eastern Christian monasticism. (André, Thevet, Les Vrais Pourtraits et Vies Hommes Illustres, 1584)

Several monastic figures attempted to bridge East and West. Indirect evidence of a native-Western ascetic and eremitic proto-monastic tradition comes from Jerome (ca. 347–420), who rendered Pachomius’s Rule into Latin. Ambrose (ca. 340–397), co-founder of Just War Theory, which banned monks from combat, was influenced by Athanasius and in turn influenced Augustine (354–430). Augustine, a key North African monastic promoter, prepared an unsystematic set of canons. The first known Latin rule, it influenced Benedict (480–547).

Monasticism, as governed by The Rule of St. Benedict (hereafter RB), and the papacy are medieval Christianity’s two defining institutions. RB is the high-water mark in a process, not a lone genius’s innovation. Benedict of Nursia originally sought a hermit’s life. Gradually gathering a following, he and his sister Scholastica (ca. 480–547) founded houses on Monte Casino’s Pagan hill-shrine site. RB’s life of reclusive prayer dovetailed with Pope Gregory the Great’s (r. 590–604) emphasis on purgatory and the idea of the Mass’s being a sacrifice. Monks’ financial needs were met by patrons’ endowing perpetual recitation of Masses to secure release from purgatory. With papal support, RB spread throughout Western Christendom, the Middle Ages’ second-most copied document. The Council of Tours (567) mandated cloistered life for monks.

RB’s twin pillars, permanence (or stability) and obedience, assume a leadership principle, possibly borrowed from secular models, parallel to theories of papal power. Abbots stand in Christ’s authority; inferiors’ obedience is expected to be absolute, abbots alone are responsible for errors. As imperial institutions crumbled and society atomized, Benedictine abbeys’ resiliency and economic self-containment created their massive social significance. Tiny libraries provided a slender thread preserving Western knowledge. Their near monopoly on literacy earned wide political influence. Drawing upon Psalm 119, RB punctuated daily life with eight services, between 2:00 a.m. and 6:30 p.m. To communal worship were added four hours of private prayer or study and six hours of manual labor. Bells called monks to prayer; a lectionary cycled through the Bible annually. Their spartan meatless diet provided one daily meal in winter, two in summer.

Celtic monastic communities, predating Patrick (ca. 387–493), resembled Greek semi-eremitism. Clusters of hermit’s cells formed monastic villages, but disciplined community was absent. Monasticism’s alleged centrality to Irish ecclesiology (abbots’ governing regions instead of bishops) has been challenged by recent historiography. Cuthbert of Lindisfarne (ca. 634–687) founded the Iona community and left an advice-oriented Rule. Pilgrimage, antithesis of stability, featured prominently. Monks wandered in groups, voluntary exile contributing to personal spiritual journeys. Controversy with Romans peaked at the Synod of Whitby (663), spawning the overwriting of Celtic rules by RB. The Iona network switched by 716; the palimpsest was completed in Ireland in the late 1100s, propelled by dual forces of Cistercian reform and Norman invasion.

By 800, RB was not universal. RB’s Roman nature suited Charlemagne’s (742–814) plans to unite his empire religiously. Benedict of Aniane's (750–821) reformed RB spread under Charlemagne's son, Louis (778–840). After Louis's death, observance declined. Occasional flourishing centers merely underscored overall decay. Making matters worse, Vikings stole most Northern European monasteries' endowments.

Reform at Cluny, around 909, evinced increasing task specialization, both spiritually and logistically. Priors aided abbots; sacrists cared for increasingly elaborate chapel contents and ornaments. Reading increasingly displaced manual labor; daily reading of RB's chapters occurred in an eponymous chapter house.

The Crusades constituted militant and mobile monastic forms. Bound by the code of chivalry and ideas of "holy war," Crusaders undertook armed pilgrimages. Motivated by indulgences, promises of remission of sins' penalties, and eschatological hopes, they mounted campaigns of conquest. Modified monastic rules resulted in vows of obedience, poverty, and celibacy, but not geographical stability or renouncing violence. These orders became major landowners, later seizing Rhodes and Malta after being ejected from Palestine.

Reorganization restricted women's roles. Whereas Hilda of Whitby (ca. 614–680) had governed a joint male-female monastery in the seventh century, 12th-century abbesses' power was limited and subject to male oversight. Men outnumbered women probably on the order of three or four to one. Hildegard von Bingen (1098–1179), mystic and writer, was a rare late medieval prominent female monachist.

When this monastic resurgence began, no carefully defined orders existed. Reform flowered into new Benedictine forms. The emergent orders' interpretation of RB differed from the mainstream. "White monks" (denoting undyed as opposed to black habit cloth) rode the crest of a late 10th-century wave of asceticism.

The 1084 founding of an abbey in Chartreuse (Latin: Carthusia) marked the Carthusians' return to minimalist pre-Benedictine practices. Semi-eremitic monks lived in clustered cells, eating and praying alone, shifting emphasis from liturgy to private devotions. The order's rigor ensured it remained small.

In 1098, the Benedictines at Citeaux (Latin: Cistercium) began following the unaltered RB. Never as ascetic as Carthusians, these Cistercians nevertheless eschewed architectural and liturgical decoration, reacting to perceived Cluniac excesses. Cistercian houses ranged from 12 to 140 monks and 40 to 500 lay brothers. Brothers covered most manual labor. Around 1200, half of monks were priests; proportions rose thereafter. Their intellectual center developed at Clairvaux, under Bernard (1090–1153), whose revisionism limited RB's authoritarian absolute abbacy. Cistercians often settled unoccupied areas, seeking seclusion and purity, but secular settlements built up around the innovative and successful monasteries. Cistercians' 1119 papal charter made them the first formal order. Cistercian houses multiplied rapidly across Europe: from 19 in 1122 to 529 by 1200.

Early medievals tended to believe only monks and nuns merited redemption. By roughly 1100, hope arose that the faithfully married might be saved. Despite this optimism, the number of monachists increased, outstripping general population growth by a factor of four. Europe's monasteries numbered in the thousands, having garnered broad community support. Previously, chief benefactors were kings and princes; now less wealthy folk pooled resources to found monasteries. There was also more wealth to mobilize, as better weather, land reclamation, and improved agricultural practices increased food supplies. Infant mortality dropped; surviving children often were entrusted to monasteries. Paralleling early church fears of laxity in the face of prosperity, lingering concern over biblical warnings of rich people's spiritual peril motivated gifts. By the 13th century, as much as one-third of some jurisdictions' land belonged to monasteries.

Monastic reform must be viewed in the context of papal reform, particularly the 12th and 13th centuries' Lateran Council series. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) recognized mendicant orders, Dominicans and Franciscans. Renouncing fixed incomes, wandering Europe preaching and begging food, mendicants held to obedience but not stability. They constitute a separate monastic category, precursor of modern active orders. Mendicant orders remained urban, as only cities provided sufficient concentrations of donors.

Founded by the Castilian noble Dominic de Guzman (1170–1221), Dominicans attracted intelligent young ascetics. Within Dominic's lifetime, women had a parallel order. Exempted from physical labor and soon expected to attend university, friars preached and taught theology. Commitment to orthodoxy made them invaluable Inquisitors. Their most famous member was Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274). They maintained a strong missionary emphasis, from Italy to Lithuania to China.

Francis of Assisi (ca. 1181–1226), a prosperous cloth merchant's son, played both wastrel and warrior before making a pilgrimage to Rome. Called by a voice while praying in a derelict church, he bought and repaired it, the first of many. His was not a spiritualized imitation of Christ, but concrete emulation. As such, Francis set down no elaborate fixed rule, like RB. A passionate denouncer of pride and greed, Francis downplayed learning or dogma. His Gray Friars (or Friars Minor) were anti-worldly, poor in spirit, possession, office, and learning. Papal pressure resulted in three successive Rules, each increasingly ordered and hierarchical. By the early 1300s, there were roughly 1,400 houses, possibly one-fifth for women.

The same era witnessed the eclipse of monasteries' educational role by emerging universities. Monastic schools' practical learning was supplanted by a scientific approach, aiming to meet the demands of business and secular government. Monarchs encouraged universities because they provided a steady stream of reliable, secular administrators. These bureaucracies simultaneously freed government for direct ecclesiastical involvement and nurtured nascent nationalism. Quasi-monastic expressions of the Modern Devotion, such as the Brethren of the Common Life, also set the stage for the Reformation.

Orthodox monasticism proved an important institution for preserving the Orthodox Church during the era of Turkish rule following the fall of Constantinople (Istanbul) in 1453. Latin churches in the region were suppressed; Orthodox properties were confiscated, then sold back to them. Thriving communities continue to this day.

Protestantism rejected monasticism, whether on principle (Lutherans and Reformed) or opportunistically (Anglicans). Henry VIII's seizures of monastic property in the 1530s forced English monasticism underground until the 1828 Catholic Emancipation. Numerous Protestant communitarian groups (Anabaptists, English Civil War radicals, Moravians, and American utopianists), although quasi-monastic are beyond this entry's scope.

The Catholic Reformation's medieval character is partly demonstrated by the founding of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits) by Ignatius Loyola (1491–1556), who sought papal recognition in 1540. A crippled former soldier, Loyola framed Spiritual Exercises by which spiritual mentors direct seekers into a life of unhesitating obedience. Obedience dominated Ignatius's personal piety, blending Renaissance individualism with ecclesiastical subservience. Jesuits differed from the other orders, having no distinctive habit or fixed hours of prayer and adding a vow of direct obedience to the pope. Jesuit seminaries prepared priests to reclaim territory lost to Protestants. Another keynote was missions beyond Europe, from Brazil to Japan. As other orders penetrated East Asia, conflict ensued over mission strategy. Jesuits advocated indigenization, but Franciscans and Dominicans insisted upon replicating European patterns, a debate known as the Chinese Rites Controversy.

In Europe's Enlightenment and Revolutionary eras, monasticism suffered. From France to Italy to the Habsburg Empire, waves of suppressions, secularization, and persecution winnowed monastic populations. Nineteenth-century stability witnessed the emergence of new monastic orders, a trend cresting in the mid-20th century. More than 30 congregations of active Benedictine sisters sprang up in a century and a half.

The Second Vatican Council impacted monasticism. Of the almost one and a half million Catholic monachists in 1967, fewer than 5 percent belonged to traditional contemplative orders. Popular culture advocates for activist orders over contemplative, although the recent trend is to stronger cenobitic recruitment despite its being at cross-purposes with Western hyper-individualism and anti-authoritarianism. Women outnumber men three to one, but all orders are declining. While the American monastic population remains above 1900 levels, the movement's mean age is high, with new vocations not replacing dying members. Lay oblate numbers, however, increase. Financial solvency is a growing parallel problem, prompting more double (male-female) monasteries. In Asia and Africa, contemplative orders are growing. Dialogue was initiated with non-Christian monachists.

Current Protestant monasticism remains limited. German Lutheran monasticism recommenced with the 1947 founding of the Evangelical Sisters of Mary. Anglo-Catholic contemplative communities are still the minority, but increasingly popular. From the 1970s, a few evangelicals dabbled with communitarianism. Increasing numbers of evangelical Protestants have been exploring monastic spirituality and choosing life as oblates.

C. Mark Steinacher

See also: Athanasius; Augustine of Hippo; Benedictines; Buddha, Gautama; Cistercians; Communalism; Dominicans; Franciscans; Hildegard of Bingen; Istanbul; Jainism; Jesuits; Mahavira; Sthanakvaki Jain Tradition; Terepanth Svetambara Jain Tradition; Theravada Buddhism; Thomas Aquinas.

References

- Benn, James Alexander, Lori R. Meeks, and James Robson, eds. Buddhist Monasticism in East Asia: Places of Practice. New York: Routledge, 2009.
- Dunn, Marilyn. Emergence of Monasticism: From the Desert Fathers to the Early Middle Ages. New York: Wiley-Blackwell, 2003.
- Harmless, William. Desert Christians: An Introduction to the Literature of Early Monasticism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Kim, Sunhae, and James W. Heisig, eds. Monasticism, Buddhist, and Christian: The Korean Experience. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2008.
- Lawrence, Christopher Nugent. The Age of the Cloister: The Story of Monastic Life in the Middle Ages. Mahwah, NJ: HiddenSpring, 2003.
- Rankin, Aidan. The Jain Path: Ancient Wisdom for the West. Berkeley, CA: O Books, 2006.

■ Mongolia

Mongolia is an Asian country sandwiched between Russia and the People's Republic of China. A relatively large country, its 600,000 square miles of territory are eclipsed by those of its neighbors. It also has a relatively sparse population of only 2,996,081 people.

The Mongols are a group of peoples tied together by a common ancestry, culture, language, and residence in the land between China and Siberia. As early as the fifth century BCE, the Huns established themselves in the valleys of the Selenga River. Over the succeeding centuries a Hun Empire emerged and became a major competitor against the Chinese Empire to the south. In the fifth century, the Huns under Attila (ca. 406–453) turned their attention eastward and conquered most of Europe. Attila's successors were displaced by the Turks.

The Mongolians reached a new zenith under Genghis Khan (ca. 1162–1227), whose kingdom stretched from Beijing to Tibet and Turkistan. As so often occurred, his successors were unable to keep his empire together. During the succeeding centuries, Mongolia and China were periodically at war. In the 17th century, some Mongolians sided with the Manchurians who took control of China in 1644, and over the next 100 years, Mongolia was almost totally absorbed into China.

At the end of the 19th century, Mongolia became an object of dispute between Russia, China, and Japan, and following the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905), Russia recognized Japanese hegemony over Inner (southern) Mongolia. In 1911, northern or Outer Mongolia revolted against China and proclaimed its independence. It again became a battleground between China and the troops of the czar at the time of the Russian Revolution. In the midst of continuing war, some Mongolians turned to Bolshevik Russia for help. In 1921 a combination of Russian and Mongolian troops seized Urga (now Ulaanbaatar), the capital of Outer Mongolia. Three years later, the People's Republic of Mongolia was proclaimed. It was able to resist the Japanese attempt to invade in 1939, and the assistance provided by the Soviet Union at that time cemented the cordial relationships that continued in subsequent decades. In 1992 a new Constitution moved Mongolia from the one-party system and domination by the People's Revolutionary Party and introduced a variety of democratic reforms. Meanwhile, Inner Mongolia has become an autonomous region of the People's Republic of China.

Religious life in Mongolia was radically changed during the reign of Atlan Khan (1543–1583), who believed that the Mongols needed a unifying religion.

MONGOLIA

After considering Chinese religion, he rejected it because of the possibility of Mongolia being absorbed by the Chinese. Instead he chose Tibetan Buddhism. He invited a Tibetan religious leader, Sonam Gyatso (1543–1588), to whom he granted the title of Dalai Lama (Ocean of Wisdom), to lead the religion. Sonam Gyatso is remembered today as the third Dalai Lama, as the title was posthumously bestowed on his two predecessors.

Thus Tibetan Buddhism was wedded to the Mongol state. In this process, one of the heirs of the Khalkas, the leading Mongol group in Outer Mongolia, was claimed to be the first reincarnation of the Living Buddha of Urga. His successors, seen as the third most important Tibetan Buddhist leader after the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama, remained in power until 1921, when the office was reduced to a puppet status. The political status of the Living Buddha was completely eliminated in 1924.

Tibetan Buddhism had been present among the Mongols from the time of Genghis Khan's grandson, Kublai Khan (1215–1294), who became emperor in 1259. He installed lamas as religious advisors to his court and supported the rise of Tibetan religious leaders into political control of their homeland. The integration of previously existing shamanistic and magical practices into the new Buddhism among the Mongol peoples also contributed to the creation of Tibetan Buddhism as a separate branch of the Buddhist family.

As in Tibet, leadership in the Mongolian Buddhist and political realm was focused upon a set of lamas, venerated as incarnations of different bodhisattvas (highly evolved souls). When such a lama passed away, his successor, believed to be his reincarnation, was sought among the recently born male children of the region. Once designated, the infant would be taken to the local monastery for training.

At the time of the emergence of a Communist government in the 1920s, there were more than 2,500 temples and monasteries in the land and more than 120,000 Buddhist priests (lamas). Beginning in 1929, however, the new secular government began the suppression of Buddhist worship. During the 1930s more than 20,000 monks were killed and more than 800 temples and monasteries destroyed or secularized. Lamas were integrated into the rest of the population. The heavy suppression of Buddhism was only relieved in the 1960s—one symbol of the new policy being the construction of the Gandan Monastery at Ulaanbaatar. It houses a community of some 100 monks and a new temple for the Living Buddha. The monastery serves as headquarters of the Asian Buddhist Conference for Peace, which holds conferences for foreign Buddhists, published a journal that circulated internationally, and hosted visits by the Dalai Lama in 1979 and 1982.

Buddhism has experienced a remarkable comeback in Outer Mongolia in the generation since World War II and now claims more than 20 percent of the population as adherents. During the 1990s, the new monastic communities formed a Buddhist Association to assist with the Buddhist revival. This revivalist movement owes much to a Ladaki monk, Bakula Rinpoche, who also is the Indian ambassador to Mongolia. He established a Buddhist school in Ulaanbaatar to train young monks and an associated temple. He is also credited with the idea of forming the Buddhist Association. In mid-1999, the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition also became involved in the effort to revive Mongolian Buddhism.

In the meantime, the pre-Buddhist shamanistic religion has never been displaced as a living tradition among the Mongol people, and today it continues to claim the allegiance of almost one-third of the people. It grew considerably when Buddhist structures were dismantled, though the largest segment of the population think of themselves as atheist or nonreligious.

Christianity was originally introduced among the Mongols in the seventh century but in its original form did not survive. The Roman Catholic Church was introduced in the 13th century, and the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) came during the years of Russian influence. In 1817 the London Missionary Society, a Congregationalist organization, sent two missionaries who succeeded in translating the Bible into Mongolian, though few converts were ever made. This second wave of Christianity was formally suppressed in 1924, and virtually no Christians could be found in the country until the faith was introduced again in the 1990s.

The largest Christian group, the Mongolian Partnership, was initiated from Hong Kong by several cooperating evangelical agencies. There is one parish of

Mongolia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Ethnoreligionists	438,000	913,000	33.7	1.39	1,307,000	1,488,000
Agnostics	494,000	735,000	27.2	0.05	600,000	400,000
Buddhists	27,000	675,000	24.9	1.57	900,000	1,170,000
Atheists	268,000	200,000	7.4	0.22	100,000	50,000
Muslims	22,000	120,000	4.4	−0.83	100,000	100,000
Christians	3,500	47,100	1.7	5.98	84,600	150,000
Protestants	0	20,000	0.7	6.72	40,000	80,000
Independents	100	14,000	0.5	5.64	23,000	38,000
Marginals	0	9,000	0.3	11.11	16,000	25,000
Chinese folk	3,000	17,000	0.6	0.88	20,000	30,000
Baha'is	0	60	0.0	1.20	200	400
Total population	1,256,000	2,707,000	100.0	0.88	3,112,000	3,388,000

the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia, and the Jehovah's Witnesses have initiated a work.

The other measurable religion in Mongolia is Islam, mostly of the Hanafite Sunni School, which is practiced by ethnic Uzbeks, Kazakhs, and Ulghurs who reside in the western part of Mongolia. The Baha'i Faith began work in the 1990s following the collapse of the Communist government.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition; Hanafite School of Islam; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia.

References

- Bodio, Stephen A. Eagle Dreams: Searching for Legends in Wild Mongolia. Guilford, CT: Lyons Press, 2002.
- Heissig, W. The Religions of Mongolia. Trans. G. Samuel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- Moses, L. W., and S. A. Halkovic Jr. Introduction to Mongolian History and Culture. Bloomington, IN: Research Institute for Inner Asian Studies, Indiana University, 1985.
- Sabloff, Paula L. W. Modern Mongolia: Reclaiming Genghis Khan. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Museum Publication, 2001.

Montenegrin Orthodox Church

The Montenegrin Orthodox Church is a relatively new Eastern Orthodox Church that emerged in the wake of the disintegration of the former Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia. Orthodoxy in Montenegro dates to the 13th century, when Saint Sava worked with the Serbian ruler to create a strong Orthodox presence throughout the realm then under Serbian control. Before Montenegro regained its independence, Orthodoxy had largely replaced Roman Catholicism in Montenegro. Once it gained independence, an autonomous Montenegrin Church was established in communion with the Ecumenical Patriarchate. For several centuries, until the mid 19th century, the nation had a theocratic government whose head of state was an Orthodox bishop.

Serbia re-established control over Montenegro at the end of World War I, and in 1920 the Montenegrin Autocephalous Orthodox Church, to which the great majority of the population belonged, was abolished, and the Serbian Orthodox Church assumed control over the church's administration and property. Montenegro remained in union with Serbia through the 1990s and into the middle of the first decade of the new century. However, through these turbulent times, many in Montenegro yearned for the same independence from Serbia that was being asserted by Macedonia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Kosovo. That independence was finally gained in 2006.

Meanwhile, in 1993, a small group of Orthodox believers, aligned with the Liberal Alliance of Montenegro, a political party that emerged as the first group advocating an independent Montenegro, declared the re-establishment of the Montenegrin Orthodox Church as the new legitimate representative of Orthodoxy in Montenegro. This action was staunchly opposed by the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The first leader of the church was Metropolitan Antonije (1919–1996, born Antonije Abramović). He was succeeded by Metropolitan Mihailo (b. 1938 as Miraš Dedeić), a former priest in the Greek Orthodox Church in Italy and now the archbishop of Cetinje (the site of the old capital of Montenegro and its ecclesiastical center). As voices grew for national independence, the new church attempted to assert its continuity with the previous Montenegrin Church and hence its right to the property it believed was illegitimately seized by the Serbian Orthodox Church in 1920.

The Montenegrin Church had some success beginning in 1997. Metropolitan Mihailo was consecrated by bishops from the Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church, which had challenged the legitimacy of the Bulgarian patriarch (who had held office during the Communist era). The Bulgarian Alternative had also found support in the post-Communist Bulgarian government. Also in 1997, the pro-Serbian government that had been in power in Montenegro was voted out of office and the new authorities quickly registered the Montenegrin Orthodox Church as a civil organization. Four years later the church was recognized as a nongovernmental organization by the Montenegrin Ministry of the Interior. Its gains were the result of rediscovering provisions of an obsolete (but still operative) law on the Legal Position of Religious Communities that had been retained from the former Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia.

Montenegro finally became independent in 2006, and the Montenegrin Church moved to register itself in Serbia, looking to gain support from ethnic Montenegrins residing there. Though initially rebuffed, in 2007 it won its case before the Serbian court.

The new Montenegrin Church continues to assert its legitimacy but as of 2009 had made no real headway in even partially replacing the Serbian Orthodox Church in the new nation. It is to be noted that almost half of the Montenegrin Orthodox believers are ethnic Serbians.

In the meantime, the Bulgarian government turned against the Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church, and in 2004, government authorities removed the priests of the group from all the church facilities they had held for the previous decade. Due to that action, the Montenegrin Church lost its major hope of a powerful international ally. Today the Montenegrin Orthodox Church is in communion with a spectrum of small Orthodox churches, including the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia, and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church-Kiev Patriarchy.

The Serbian Orthodox Church has challenged the status of the Montenegrin Orthodox Church. The Serbian Church sees the ecclesiastical unity of Serbian and Montenegrin Orthodoxy that begins with the conversion of Montenegro by Saint Sava. Now that the country is independent, it remains to be seen if there will be a move to separate the Orthodox faithful from the Serbian Church either through the government's privileging the Montenegrin Orthodox Church, which has failed to gain any widespread public support, or through separate action.

Montenegrin Orthodox Church
Gruda b.b.
81250 Cetinje, Crna Gora
Montenegro

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Chiesa Ortodossa in Italia; Montenegrin Orthodox Church; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

References

- Montenegrin Association of America. <http://www.montenegro.org/>. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Montenegrin Orthodox Church. <http://www.moc-cpc.org/>.
- Morrison, Kenneth. Montenegro: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris, 2009.

■ Montenegro

Montenegro is a small country in southeastern Europe on the Adriatic Sea. It is bounded by Albania, Kosovo,

The Monastery of Ostrog, a monastery of the Serbian Orthodox Church, is placed against an almost vertical background high up in the large rock of Ostroska Greda, in Montenegro. (Sasa Golub/Dreamstime.com)

Serbia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina. Its population of 620,000 (2009) resides on its 5,233 square miles of territory. Ethnically, the country primarily consists of Montenegrins (43 percent) and Serbians (32 percent). Serbian is spoken by twice the number who speak Montenegrin.

Slavic people began to settle what is now Montenegro as early as the sixth century CE. By the ninth century, a large percentage of the Slavs had become Christians (Roman Catholic), and the region existed as a vassal state called Duklja within the Byzantine Empire. In 1042, Duklja's King Vojislav won a decisive battle against Byzantium, and Duklja became an independent state. The fall of the Vojislavljevic dynasty in the 12th century led to a period in which what would become Montenegro struggled for independence, first from neighboring Serbia and then from the Ottoman Empire.

In the 14th century, the Crnojevic dynasty moved to maintain independence as the Ottoman armies established hegemony over their neighbors. Serbia fell following the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, Bosnia fell in 1463, and then Herzegovina in 1483. Ivan Crnojevic (1465–1490) allied himself with the city-state of Venice and was able to stop the Ottoman advance. In 1482, he established a new capital in a strategic location that evolved into the long-term capital, Cetinje. He also brought the first printing press into the southern Balkans, though it would be his successor and son, Djurdj Crnojevic (r. 1490–1496), who would become renowned for printing the first books originating in southeastern Europe.

Montenegro was able to maintain its independence through the next centuries and entered the 20th century as the Kingdom of Montenegro. It joined the allied cause in World War I, during which time Monte-

MONTENEGRO

Montenegro was occupied by Austria. King Nikola and his family fled to Italy. In 1918, Nikola's son-in-law and king of Serbia, Petar Karadjordjevic, had his army occupy Montenegro. Instead of reestablishing his father-in-law's throne, however, he annexed Montenegro and forbade Nikola's return. Though Montenegrins staged a national uprising against the Serbian annexation, they were eventually absorbed into the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, which evolved into the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1929. Following World War II, it was included in the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia fell apart in 1992. Montenegro initially joined Serbia in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which was increasingly unstable and evolved by 2003 into Serbia and Montenegro. In May 2006, Montenegro held a referendum on its relation with Serbia and more than 55 percent of the people voted for a break. Thus, on June 2, 2006, Montenegro formally declared itself an independent state.

As Montenegro emerged as a visible state in the 11th century, its population included Pagans who followed traditional Slavic religions; Bogomils, a Gnostic faith that had emerged in the southern Balkans; and Latin-rite Roman Catholic Christians. In the 12th century, with the fall of the Vojislavljevic dynasty, the influence of Constantinople became dominant, and there was considerable pressure placed on converting the region to Eastern Orthodoxy. With the further suppression of the Pagans and Bogomils, Eastern Orthodoxy had become the dominant religion by the time of the rise of the Ottoman Empire. During the Crnojevic dynasty, when books began to be printed, most were Christian books for use by the Orthodox faithful. The place of the Orthodox Church was even more firmly secured after the end of the Crnojevic dynasty. The country turned to the church, and for 180 years (1516–1697) Montenegro was ruled by their Vladikas (that is, the bishops), who were selected by popular assemblies. In 1697, the new Vladika Danilo Petrovic established the rulership of Montenegro in a single family, the Petrovics. The rulers, as orthodox bishops, were celibate, and thus the office of ruling Vladika passed

Montenegro

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	262,000	471,000	78.5	−0.89	496,000	494,000
Orthodox	226,000	425,000	70.9	−0.93	443,000	446,000
Roman Catholics	31,400	24,700	4.1	−2.96	24,200	22,300
Protestants	2,500	10,500	1.8	2.21	12,100	13,500
Muslims	62,900	99,000	16.5	−1.93	100,000	98,000
Agnostics	141,000	25,000	4.2	−10.66	15,000	10,000
Atheists	52,400	5,000	0.8	−8.25	2,000	1,500
Total population	519,000	600,000	100.0	−1.93	613,000	603,000

from uncle to nephew. That continued into the middle of the 19th century, when the new ruler Danilo Petrovic, instead of seeking ordination, secured the endorsement of the czar of Russia to rule as the prince of Montenegro. Thus the country smoothly transitioned to secular rule, which remained in place until World War I.

Following the annexation of Montenegro to Serbia, in 1920, the Montenegrin Autocephalous Orthodox Church, to which the great majority of the population belonged, was abolished and the Serbian Orthodox Church assumed hegemony over its property and assimilated its leadership into its own hierarchy.

As early as 1993, a group of Orthodox believers in Montenegro declared the re-establishment of the Montenegrin Orthodox Church, proclaimed to be the legitimate representative of Orthodoxy in Montenegro. Though this action was opposed by the Ecumenical Patriarchate, in 1997, Metropolitan Mihailo (b. 1938) was selected to lead the church with the title of archbishop of Cetinje. Over the next decade, the groups attempted unsuccessfully to assert its rights to the property still in the hands of the Serbian Orthodox Church. It was finally registered as a civil organization in 1997 and in 2001 as a nongovernmental organization recognized by the Montenegrin Ministry of the Interior under provisions of an obsolete law on the Legal Position of Religious Communities from the former Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia. Following Montenegro's declared independence, the Montenegrin Church attempted to register itself in Serbia, and in 2007 was supported in that effort by the Serbian courts. The new Montenegrin Church has attempted to assume the role of the autonomous church since prior to World War II, but has so far (2009) been rebuffed. It may have sealed its fate by aligning itself with the Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church, a dissenting group in Bulgaria that has been unsuccessful in challenging the Bulgarian Orthodox Church. Bishops of the Bulgarian group consecrated Metropolitan Mihailo to his office. The Montenegrin Church also remains alienated from the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

As the first decade of the 21st century draws to a close, the majority of Montenegrins (including the minority of ethnic Serbians residing in the country) adhere to the Orthodox Church, now a part of the jurisdiction of the Serbian Orthodox Church. In 2003, the most recent census reported 460,383 members (74.24 percent of the population). The church is currently headed by Metropolitan Amfilohije, the archbishop of Cetinje and metropolitan of Montenegro and the Littoral. The Serbian Orthodox trace their Montenegrin history to 1219 and the founding of the first diocese in the old capital by Saint Sava (ca. 1175–1235). Today, there is a second eparchy (diocese) based in Podgorica, the country's present capital.

The second largest Christian body in Montenegro is the Roman Catholic Church. The 2003 census reported 21,972 members (or 3.54 percent of the population). Catholics in Montenegro are almost entirely followers of the Byzantine or Eastern Greek rite and ethnically of Croatian or Albanian background. In 2003, Rome named an Apostolic Exarchate for the Greek Catholics of Serbia and Montenegro, headed by Bishop Djura Džudžar (b. 1954), though most of the faithful he oversaw were in the region of Vojvodina, Serbia.

Islam, the second largest religious community in Montenegro, consists largely of followers of the Hanafite School of Sunni Islam who reside in the extreme northern corner of the country, near the Bosnian border, and in various cities where Albanians and Bosnians have clustered. In 2003, the census reported 110,034 Muslims, making then about 18 percent of the population.

There are small groups of Protestants (less than one percent of the population), most notably members of the Reformed Christian Church in Serbia and Montenegro and the Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Serbia and Montenegro.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bulgarian Alternative Orthodox Church; Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Hanafite School of Islam; Montenegrin Orthodox Church; Roman Catholic Church; Serbian Orthodox Church.

References

Montenegrin Association of America. <http://www.montenegro.org/>. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Morrison, Kenneth. Montenegro: A Modern History. London: I. B. Tauris, 2009.

Roberts, Elizabeth. Realm of the Black Mountain: A History of Montenegro. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2007.

■ Montserrat

Montserrat is an island of the Lesser Antilles on the northeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea, southwest of Antigua. Its 39 square miles of land is dominated by the Soufriere Hills Volcano, an active volcano that drove the majority of the population to leave in 1995 and has had multiple eruptions in successive years. The present population is a mere 5,000 (2008).

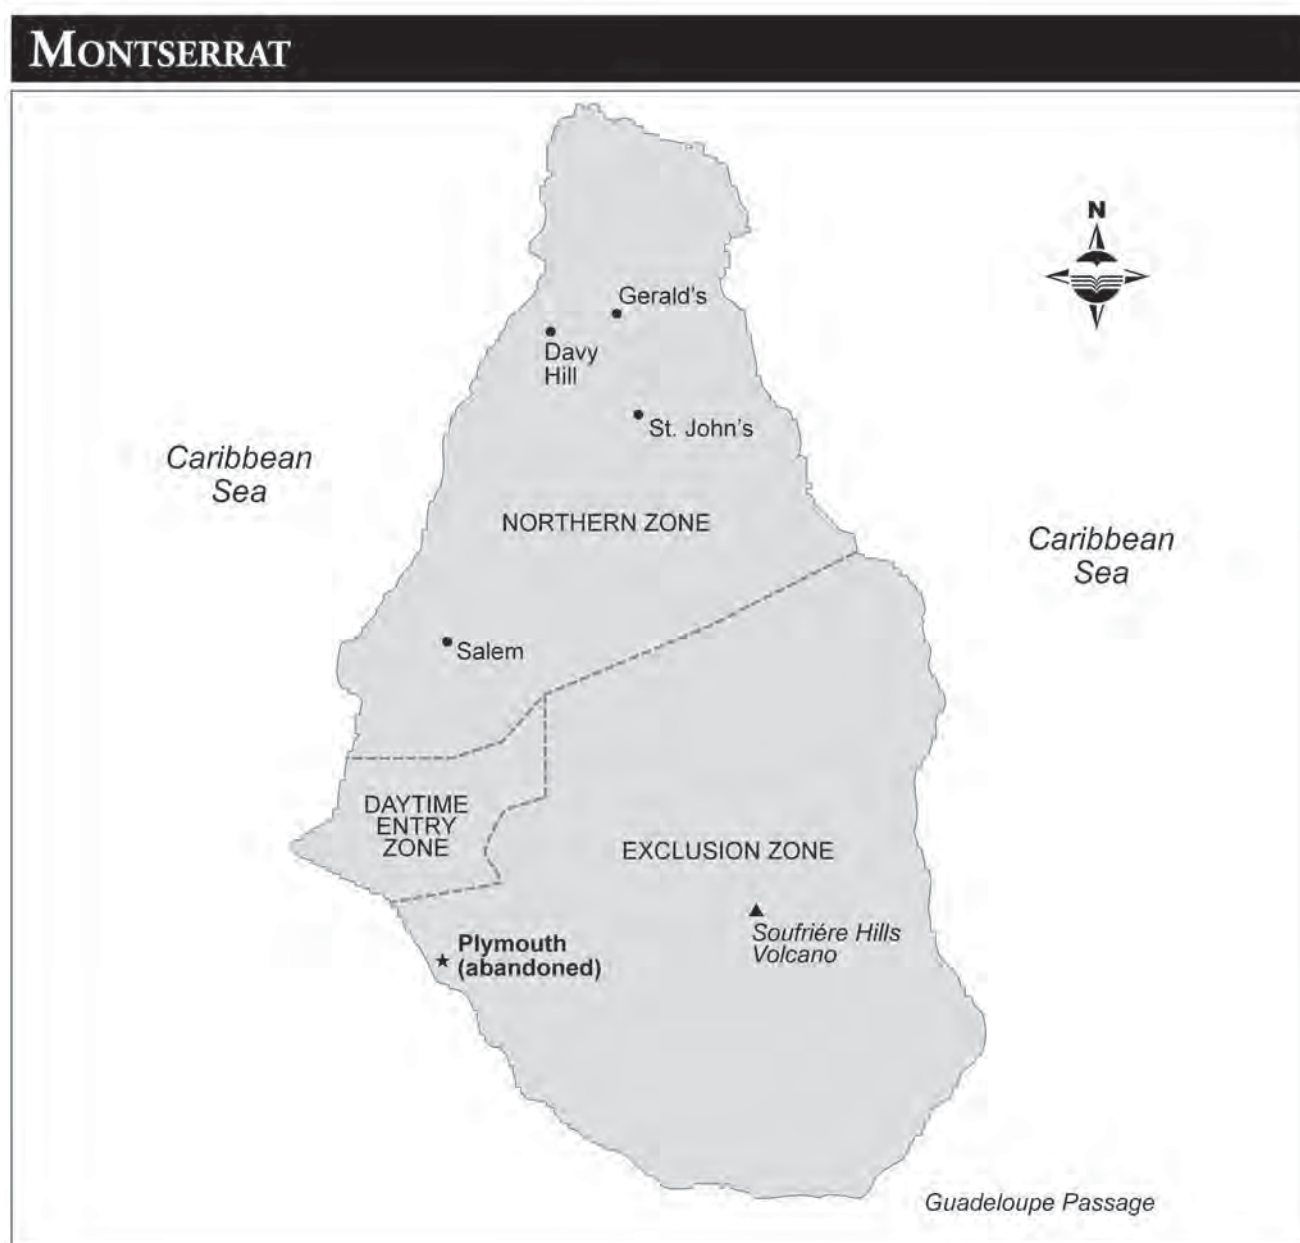

Montserrat was originally inhabited by the Carib people and was first sighted by Columbus in 1493. It was colonized in the 18th century by Irish people, driven from Saint Kitts, who began to plant sugarcane and cotton. They also imported slaves to work their plantations. The slaves were liberated in the middle of the 19th century, by which time they made up 90 percent of the population, the Caribs having all but disappeared.

Montserrat is still a colony of the United Kingdom, having previously been included with other colonies in the West Indian Federation. When the Federation was dissolved in 1962, Montserrat’s government was given semiautonomous status, though the governor is still appointed from London.

With the passing of the Caribs, Christianity became the dominant religion of Montserrat, and Anglicanism its first and foremost representative. Anglicanism claims approximately one-third of the 5,000 residents of the island. The Methodists entered in 1820 and have about 20 percent of the islanders as members. The Anglican diocese is attached to the Church in the Province of the West Indies, and the Methodists are part of

Montserrat

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	11,300	5,700	95.3	2.47	6,100	6,300
Protestants	4,400	3,400	56.7	1.27	3,800	3,900
Anglicans	4,000	1,500	25.0	0.00	1,600	1,600
Roman Catholics	1,300	400	6.7	0.00	400	400
Agnostics	130	180	3.0	6.32	300	400
Baha’is	150	90	1.5	2.64	150	250
Spiritists	0	10	0.2	2.71	20	30
Hindus	0	10	0.1	3.71	20	40
Total population	11,600	6,000	100.0	2.57	6,600	7,000

the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, both headquartered on Antigua. In like measure, the Roman Catholic Church on Montserrat is an extension of the Diocese of Saint John's, also on Antigua.

Canadian Pentecostals came to Montserrat in 1910 and have built a thriving work, still related to the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. Subsequently, missionaries from the Seventh-day Adventist Church, Pilgrim Holiness Church (since 1968 part of the Wesleyan Church), and the Church of God of Prophecy have also started churches. The Jehovah's Witnesses and the Baha'i Faith have a limited presence on the island.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of God of Prophecy; Jehovah's Witnesses; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Wesleyan Church.

References

- Boix, Maur M. What Is Montserrat: A Mountain, A Sanctuary, A Monastery, A Spiritual Community. L'Abadia de Montserrat, 1985.
- Demets, B. A. The Catholic Church in Montserrat, West Indies, 1756–1980. Plymouth, Montserrat: Montserrat Printery, 1980.
- Dobbin, J. D. "Religion and Cultural Identity: The Montserratian Case." Caribbean Issues 4, no. 1 (1980): 71–83.
- Fergus, Howard A. Montserrat: History of a Caribbean Colony. Oxford: Macmillan Caribbean, 1994.
- Lawrence, G. E. Montserrat and Its Methodism. Bristol, England: G. E. Lawrence, 1967.

Moon, Sun Myung

b. 1920

Sun Myung Moon, a native of Korea, is the founder of the Unification Church, the Family Federation for World Peace, and a host of other religious, political, and social organizations that together constitute the Unification movement. He was born on January 6, 1920, in what is now North Korea. His followers claim that Jesus appeared to him on April 17, 1935, and asked him to fulfill the mission begun by Jesus. As such, Rev. Moon claims to be the Lord of the Second Advent, which is Unification terminology for the one who is the promised Second Coming of Christ mentioned in the New Testament.

Reverend Sun Myung Moon and his wife, Hak Ja Han, are shown during the traditional invocation of a blessing at a mass wedding in Seoul's Chamsil gymnasium. At this ceremony, 6,000 couples from about 80 countries were married on October 14, 1982. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Moon studied engineering in Japan from 1941 to 1943 but returned to Korea to focus on his spiritual calling. He was married for the first time in 1943 and a son was born in April 1946. Two months later he left his wife and son behind to travel to North Korea. He was arrested twice and finally freed on October 14, 1950. He reunited with his family in 1952, but his marriage ended the next year. He started the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity in 1954 and sent the first missionary to America in 1959. He married Hak Ja Han in 1960 and she has given birth to 13 children. She and her husband are known as True Parents among followers.

Moon moved to the United States in 1971 and became a controversial figure after he supported embattled U.S. President Richard Nixon. He was a target of an emerging anti-cult movement and was imprisoned for income tax evasion in 1984. Even from jail he led the Unification movement and his far-flung enterprises worldwide. He viewed his imprisonment as a Calvary experience and his release in 1985 as parallel to resurrection. Based on his campaign against Communism, he took credit for the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and said that his political insight led to the Allied victory in the first Gulf War. He is the founder of The Washington Times and has established universities in both the United States and Korea. In 2008 he passed leadership to his youngest son and his oldest surviving son.

Moon's thought is expressed in his work Divine Principle and through the thousands of sermons that he has delivered over the last five decades. His religious views were shaped by his Presbyterian roots and elements of shamanism. He also was impacted by several new religious movements that focused on Korea as the locus for God's end-time work. His followers are taught that Jesus ultimately failed in achieving full redemption and that Moon has had to restore God's broken heart. Unificationists are also taught that being grafted into Moon's family takes away sin and creates a new family of God. Unificationists engage in special wedding and marriage rituals as part of the salvation process and in recent years have paid for the liberation of their ancestors.

James A. Beverley

See also: Ancestors; Unification Movement.

References

- Barker, Eileen. The Making of a Moonie. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1984.
- Beverley, James A. "Spirit Revelation and the Unification Church." In Controversial New Religions, edited by James R. Lewis and Jesper Aagaard Petersen. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Breen, Michael. Sun Myung Moon: The Early Years. West Sussex, UK: Refuge, 1997.
- Chryssides, George. The Advent of Sun Myung Moon. New York: St. Martin's, 1991.
- Hong, Nansook. In the Shadow of the Moons. Boston: Beacon Press, 1998.
- Inglis, Michael, ed. 40 Years in America. New York: HSA, 2000.
- Introigne, Massimo. The Unification Church. Salt Lake: Signature Books, 2000.
- Moon, Sun Myung. As a Peace-Loving Global Citizen. Washington: Washington Times Foundation, 2009.

Moral Re-Armament

See CAUX-Initiatives for Change.

Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province

Interest in the plight of Africans in the West Indies launched the entire Moravian missionary enterprise. In 1731 in Copenhagen, the Moravian leader, August Spangenberg (1704–1792), encountered an African man named Anthony, who told him of the deplorable conditions faced by Africans in the West Indies. Spangenberg's decision to respond to these conditions led Leonhard Dober (1706–1760) to offer his services as a missionary to the Dutch West Indies, thus becoming the first Protestant missionary of the modern era. Dober began his work on St. Thomas. It was soon extended to St. Croix (the site of a bloody slave revolt in 1833) and St. John, the Virgin Islands then being in Danish hands. In 1734 a team of 18 missionaries arrived on St. Thomas, and Dober turned the work over to them and returned to Germany with his first convert, an orphan boy named Carmel Oly, whose freedom Dober had purchased.

The work grew in spite of opposition from most of the plantation owners and the high toll of lives among the Moravians unable to cope with the climate. When Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), the Moravian bishop, visited the islands in 1739, he found the missionaries in prison as a result of a conflict with the local Dutch Reformed Church minister. On a more positive note, he also found some 800 African converts.

In 1772 the islands were hit by a major hurricane that destroyed much property; indeed, bad weather would periodically produce temporary setbacks throughout the history of the mission. However, as the work was established in the Danish East Indies, it built up enough momentum to carry the mission to the neighboring islands of Barbados (1765), Antigua (1771), St. Kitts (1777), and Tobago (1790). The effort on Tobago, then a French possession, was halted almost as soon as it began by the unrest at news of the French Revolution. The revolution also stimulated efforts that grew in England for the abolition of slavery. With the abolition of slavery on Haiti in 1793, hope for freedom spread throughout the Caribbean. Through the 19th century, one by one, the islands would become free states.

In 1830 the centennial of the mission was marked when the Danish king recognized the Moravians and granted them equal status with the state church (Lutheran). The next step in the mission's growth would be its maturation into an autonomous church, a process that began in 1879 when the West Indies work was organized as a province, accepted the challenge to become self-supporting, and established a semiautonomous governing board. The Europeans continued to provide some financial support, but they set a schedule to gradually decrease it. In 1886 the theological seminary was established at Nisky on St. Thomas.

In 1899 the Moravians moved to restructure their international fellowship as a federation. This restructuring brought a new level of independence to the island church. In 1922 the Moravian British Province assumed responsibility for the work in the West Indies. In 1931 the International Missions Board was abolished. Finally, in 1967, the work in the Eastern West Indies was set apart as a fully autonomous province.

The Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province, is at one with beliefs and practices of Moravians worldwide. It now includes work in the U.S. Virgin Islands, St. Kitts, Barbados, Antigua, and Trinidad and Tobago. In 2005 it reported 20,000 members in 53 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province
PO Box 504
Cashew Hill
Antigua
<http://www.candw.ag/~moravians/welcome.htm>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Gillespe, Michelle, and Robert Beachy, eds. Pious Pursuits: German Moravians in the Atlantic World. Oxford: Berghahn Books. 2007.
- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.

Moravian Church, European Continental Province of the

The Moravian Church continues the attempts at reformation of the Roman Catholic Church that were made by Jan Hus (ca. 1373–1415). Because of his oratorical skills as the preacher at the Bethlehem Chapel in Prague, Hus gained a popular following. His calls for reform came just as the papacy was divided between two claimants to Peter's chair and Prague was divided between its German-speaking and Bohemian-speaking populations.

After his excommunication in 1410, Hus became a popular hero among the populace. He attacked corruption in the church and its granting of indulgences as a means of raising money, and he upheld the authority of the Bible as a standard by which the church and its leadership could be judged. In 1414 Hus was invited to present his views at the Council of Constance, called by the Roman Catholic Church to deal with issues of reform. Though he was granted safe passage, when he arrived the protection was withdrawn, and he was condemned and executed.

Hus was condemned in part for his belief that the Eucharist, the sacrament recalling the sacrificial death of Jesus, should be served to the people in both kinds, that is, bread and wine, rather than just as bread, the common practice at the time. After Hus's death, the serving of the Eucharist in both kinds became characteristic of his followers, known as Hussites, and the Roman Catholics were unable to suppress the revolt immediately. A temporary compromise was worked out in 1436. Amid the spectrum of opinion in Bohemia and neighboring Moravia arose a new mediating group, the Unitas Fratrum.

During the 16th century, the Reformed Church (with teachings based on John Calvin's [1509–1564] theology) emerged in Bohemia and Moravia and held sway until the beginning of the 17th century. Then after the Thirty Years' War, Protestant leaders in Prague encountered Catholic leadership in the Holy Roman Empire bent on Counter-Reformation. In 1620 a Catholic army defeated the Bohemian forces and began to impose Catholicism anew throughout the land. In 1652 the expulsion of all Protestants from Catholic-controlled lands was implemented. Many members of the Unitas Fratrum went underground, and others fled their land. They settled first in Poland, and then, after 1722, they found refuge on the Prussian estate of Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), where they founded the village of Herrnhut. Here they developed an order to rule both their spiritual and secular lives. The acceptance of this new order in 1727 by the Czech brethren marks the beginning of the reorganized Moravian Church.

Within the church, new ministerial leadership soon developed. Zinzendorf wanted the church to remain as an ordered community within the Lutheran Church, while many of the community's leaders looked for the development of a revived separate Moravian church. In 1835 the ancient episcopal lineage was passed to the community by Daniel Ernst Jablonski (1660–1741), a German Calvinist who had been consecrated by the Polish Moravians. Zinzendorf was consecrated in 1837. In 1845 the Moravian Church was more formally organized as a new episcopal body. It was recognized by the Church of England and the British Parliament in 1749.

The Moravian Church would develop two important emphases. First, the church developed in Germany just as a scholastic approach to Protestantism was becoming dominant, and in reaction the Moravians absorbed the lively spirituality of the Pietist movement, which had spread through Germany in the 17th century from the University of Halle. Thus, Moravians would become known for their heart-felt religion, which would have a significant effect upon a youthful John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of Methodism.

Second, beginning with Zinzendorf's encounter with natives of the Danish West Indies and Greenland in 1731, the movement became enthusiastic proponents of a missionary enterprise. The Moravians sent the first missionaries to the West Indies in 1732 and to Greenland the next year. Through the rest of the century, the work would spread to England and the American colonies. Within the first generation, missions would follow to Labrador, South America, and Egypt. Stemming from this effort, the Methodists and then the Baptists would begin their own mission programs, and from this new venture would come the world-changing missionary enterprise of the 19th century, which would carry Protestantism around the globe.

During the mid-1700s, Zinzendorf assumed both temporal and spiritual powers as the leader of the Moravian Church. After his passing in 1760, the church organized its General Synod as the highest legislative body and appointed an executive board to administer the affairs of the synod. The executive board would in time evolve into the Unity Elders' Conference. Doctrinally, the church saw itself in general agreement with the Augsburg Confession (Lutheran), though there was no attempt to enforce assent to every sentence of this lengthy statement. A brief statement of essential beliefs was accepted in 1775. In practice, the church made or confirmed many of its practical decisions, especially concerning the deployment of personnel, by the casting of lots.

Through the early decades of the 19th century, the Moravian Church continued to expand globally. Partly because of the slowness of response from Europe, the church faced an increasing number of requests for grants of self-government from mission centers abroad. In 1857 the church established four provincial synods—one in continental Europe, one in England, and two in the United States, one in the North and one in the South. These provinces were given limited autonomy.

In 1879 the mission in Jamaica organized as a governing board with a proto-provincial organization, indicating that in the future, missions would grow to become discrete provinces. The 20th-century problems of continuing financial support for the ever-growing world membership, the transformation of Europe in the wake of two World Wars, and the changing perspective on missions within ecumenical Christianity led the Moravians in 1957 to extend the process of dividing the church's membership geographically into autonomous provinces. Meanwhile, in Europe, the work was divided into two independent provinces, setting off the work in what was then the German Democratic Republic of Germany, including the headquarters church at Halle. The European work was again combined after the reunification of Germany in 1990.

The Continental Province continues to have responsibility for Moravian life in Europe apart from the British Isles. The Moravian Church in the United States maintains an Internet site with links to Moravians around the world. The church has been active ecumenically and is a member of the European Council of Churches and Samen Kerk in Nederland (SKIN or the Church Together in the Netherlands). It was once a member of the World Council of Churches but, as of 2006, is no longer a member.

European Continental Province of the Moravian Church
Zusterplein 20
NL-3703 CB Zeist
The Netherlands
<http://www.moravian.org/> (Moravian Church in America website)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; Church of England; Roman Catholic Church; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton.
History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Moravian Church in America

The Moravian movement, first established in Europe as a descendant of the reformism of Jan Hus (ca. 1373–1415), was brought to North America in 1735, when a group under the leadership of Bishop August Gottlieb Spangenberg (1704–1792) moved to the new colony of Georgia. Because of the group's pacifism and refusal to serve in the militia, they left Georgia for Pennsylvania, where they initially settled on land owned by Methodist evangelist George Whitefield (1717–1770). They purchased 500 acres for the original settlement of what became Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, in 1741, and shortly thereafter obtained another 5,000 acres for the settlement they called Nazareth. Later, other settlements were created in neighboring New Jersey and Maryland, all positioned to carry out the primary goal of the movement from Germany, the evangelization of the Native Americans.

Spangenberg then led a group to North Carolina, where a large tract of land became the site of three settlements—Bethabara, Bethania, and, most important, Salem (now known as Winston-Salem). Over the next century, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and Winston-Salem, North Carolina, emerged as the center for the spread of the movement throughout North America and the headquarters of what would later become the two provinces (Northern and Southern) of the American church. The Moravian Church in America became autonomous following the international Unity Synod of Moravian leaders in 1848. The church found its best response in communities of German immigrants, especially in the Midwest. Then, at the end of the 19th century, it spread into Canada.

Moravian church building in Winston-Salem, North Carolina. (iStockPhoto)

During its earlier years, the church adopted a communal organization that had been proposed by Spangenberg. The pooling of economic resources, which lasted for about two decades, allowed the church and its members to prosper quickly and led to a close communal life that persisted for several generations after the communal living experiment ended.

The Moravians retain the essentials of Protestant Christianity, but they have adopted a motto to govern their approach to theology: “In essentials unity; in non-essentials liberty; in all things love.” They accept the Bible as the source of Christian doctrine. Central to the Moravian life is what is termed “heart religion,” a personal relationship with Jesus being more important than doctrinal purity. They continue to hold simple communal meals called love feasts and developed an early emphasis on music.

The Moravian Church in America has two headquarters: one for the Northern Province and one for the Southern Province. The Northern Province is divided into an Eastern District, Western District, and Canadian District. Of the church’s 22,000 members, approximately half live in the states of Pennsylvania and North Carolina. The church regularly participates in the meeting of the Unity (the international Moravian movement), which is held every seven years. The Moravian Church supports the Moravian College and Theological Seminary in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in America, Northern Province
1021 Center St.
Box 1245
Bethlehem, PA 18016-1245

Moravian Church in America, Southern Province
459 S. Church St.
Winston-Salem, NC 27108
<http://www.moravian.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Allen, Walter H. Who Are the Moravians? Bethlehem, PA: Walter H. Allen, 1966.
- Customs and Practices of the Moravian Church.* Bethlehem, PA: Moravian Church in America, 2003.
- Fogleman, Aaron Spencer. Jesus Is Female: Moravians and Radical Religion in Early America. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2008.
- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
- Weinlick, John R. The Moravian Church through the Ages. Bethlehem, PA: Moravian Church in America, 1988.

Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland

Moravian work in Great Britain formally began with the establishment of a religious society in London in 1742, from which it quickly expanded. Groups in Wiltshire, Yorkshire, and the Midlands had formed out of the preaching activity of several independent preachers affiliated with the Moravian movement: John Cennick (1718–1755), Benjamin Ingham (1712–1772), and Charles Delamorte. The first Moravian school was opened in 1742 in Essex. In 1746 Cennick visited Ireland and raised a congregation of some 500 members in Dublin. A number of congregations emerged among the Protestants in the north.

In 1749 Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760), the Moravian leader, arrived in England to negotiate a statement from the government recognizing the church and granting its ministers and members exemption from military service on the grounds of conscientious objection. He presented documents to a parliamentary commission to the effect that the Moravian Church continued the ancient church of Bohemia and Moravia and was aligned doctrinally with the German Lutherans. Based upon a favorable report by the commission, Parliament passed legislation, signed by the king, recognizing the Moravian Church as an “Ancient Episcopal Church.” The church was thus accorded the status of a sister church of the Church of England and Zinzendorf was acknowledged as a bishop.

The British Moravians, now under the superintendency of Peter Böhler (1712–1774), experienced a period of rapid growth that in some ways paralleled that of the Methodists. A British synod of what would become the Province of Great Britain convened for the first time in 1752. The church expanded into Scotland in 1765 after members from Ireland moved there.

The British Moravians became intricately involved in the support of the church’s worldwide mission program. When financial problems hit the church on the European continent in 1817, the British organized the London Association in Aid of the Missions of the United Brethren, which reached out to the missionary-minded friends of the Moravians. The association was to prove invaluable in the extension of Moravian missions in the 19th and 20th centuries.

In 1818 the Unity Elders’ Conference, then the central authority in the international church, moved to establish a provincial conference to administer the affairs of the British work. The first session, which met in 1824, was called upon to face both a decline in membership and a general pessimism that had swept through the congregations. Through the next decades, growth would be slight. In 1847, in light of its stagnation, the British provincial synod proposed that it be allowed to dissent from the Augsburg Confession and that its use of the drawing of lots, a time-honored practice among the Moravians, be discontinued for some decisions. A decade later the synod prepared to implement the change wrought by a new constitution. Over the next century, the church would drop many of its peculiar features, inherited from Germany, and adopt an organizational life more like that of other British churches.

In 2006, the church reported 1,700 members in 34 congregations. Though relatively small in numbers, through the 20th century the British Moravians built a strong ecumenical base. In 1919 they joined the Federation of Evangelical Free Churches of England, and in 1950, the British Council of Churches (now the Churches Together in Britain and Ireland). The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in Great Britain and Ireland
5 Muswell Hill
London N10 3TJ
UK
<http://www.moravian.org.uk/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
- Mason, J. C. S. The Moravian Church and the Missionary Awakening in England, 1760–1800. London: Royal Historical Society, 2002.
- Stead, Geoffrey, and Margaret Stead. The Exotic Plant: A History of the Moravian Church in Britain, 1742–2000. London: Epworth Press, 2004.

Moravian Church in Jamaica

The impetus for Moravian work in the West Indies came in the 18th century directly out of the church's international center in Germany. The West Indian effort had spread through the easternmost islands but had not opened a station on Jamaica. Then in 1754, two plantation owners, John Foster Barham and William Foster, who resided in England and also happened to be Moravians, asked for missionaries to minister to the Africans residing on their lands in Jamaica. Zacharias George Caries and two companions pioneered the work, and with the initial support of Foster and Barham, they soon gained the support of other plantation owners.

The work got off to a slow start; there were frequent changes of personnel, disease took its toll, and on occasion the converts returned to the religions they had brought from Africa. Then in 1834, slavery was ended in all British colonies. The church had taken special efforts to prepare its members for the new era. Some 26 schools had been opened. Membership shot upward in the years immediately after emancipation. In 1847 a conference structure replaced the rule of the mission's superintendent.

Representatives from Jamaica attended the 1863 conference on St. Thomas (Virgin Islands), where the process of transformation in the Caribbean toward more indigenous leadership and eventual self-support was discussed. The Jamaicans agreed to move toward self-support if the European church would continue to supply financial support for building and the travel of missionaries. As a first step, in 1876 a seminary was opened at Fairfield. In 1879 the work was reorganized as a separate province with semiautonomous status. The first bishop, Peter Larsen, was consecrated in 1901.

Most of the congregations were located in the western and especially the southwestern part of the island. The church developed under the most trying of conditions, including epidemics, hurricanes, and a devastating earthquake in Kingston in 1907. The bad times drew together the various denominations represented on the island, and in the 1920s union negotiations began between the Moravians and the Methodists, Presbyterians, Disciples of Christ, and Congregationalists. Though they did not bring union, these discussions did bring closer relations and a new commonly supported seminary.

Soon the work had grown enough to enable Jamaican Moravians to give more systematic attention to their responsibility for the church's world mission. In 1925 the Moravian Missionary Society held its initial gathering and focused concern for the missions in West Africa and Egypt.

The independent province of the Moravian Church in Jamaica was set apart in 1967. In 2005, it reported 30,000 members. It is at one with the beliefs and practices of Moravians worldwide. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in Jamaica
3 Hector St.
PO Box 8369
Kingston C. S. O.
Jamaica
<http://www.jol.com.jm/moravian/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Hastings, S. U. Seedtime and Harvest: A Brief History of the Moravian Church in Jamaica 1754–1979. Moravian Church, 1979.
- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Warner-Lewis, Maureen. Archibald Monteath: Igbo, Jamaican, Moravian. Kingston, Jamaica: University of West Indies Press, 2007.

Moravian Church in Nicaragua

In 1947 the Moravians sent missionaries to the Caribbean coast of what is today Nicaragua. They landed at Bluefields, then the capital of a kingdom of Native people, the Miskitos, which included other groups as well. The Anglicans had previously established a small work in the region, but the Moravian missionaries were appalled by the polytheism and polygamy they saw practiced there. They were welcomed by the Miskito king, who assigned them some land on which to begin their mission.

The work was substantially supplemented in 1856 with the arrival of African converts from Jamaica. Two years later they were given the first of several boats, which improved their movement up and down the coast. The mission progressed through the rest of the century in spite of several destructive hurricanes, diseases, political changes, and the opposition of many traders who made their living off of the Native population. In the 1880s the missionaries progressed in their mastery of the Miskito language, culminating in a translation of the four Christian Gospels and the book of Acts in 1889. A grammar and dictionary soon followed.

A Nicaraguan girl plays with a discarded tire in front of the Moravian Church of the community, February 13, 1998, in Pearl Lagoon on the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The mission had a major setback in 1900, when the Nicaraguan government mandated that all instruction in grammar schools would be in Spanish and given only by teachers who had passed the government exams. The missionaries, being unprepared to comply, closed the numerous schools they had founded, and the schools did not reopen until 1910. This difficulty was offset somewhat in 1902 by the consecration of the first bishop for the evolving church, August Hermann Berkenhagen.

The Moravian Church in America assumed responsibility for the church during World War I. Through the 20th century, the church moved to develop indigenous leadership. The first Nicaraguan bishop was consecrated in 1949, and the church became autonomous in 1974.

In 2006, the church reported 82,944 members. It supports a hospital at Bilwaskarma, an extensive school system (including a seminary and university in Puerto Cabezas), and through the Institute for Social Development of the Moravian Church in Nicaragua, it supports a range of economic and developmental projects in remote villages. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in Nicaragua

Apartado 3696

Managua

Nicaragua

<http://www.moravianmission.org/nicaragua.htm>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton.

History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed

Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Robertson, C. Alton. The Moravians, the Miskitu, and the Sandinistas on Nicaragua's Atlantic Coast: 1979–1990. Bethlehem, PA: Moravian Church in America, 1998.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Moravian Church in Southern Africa

As early as 1736, Moravian attention focused upon the Hottentot people of South Africa. These people, small of stature in comparison with both other African peoples and European settlers, were treated by many as less than human. Georg Schmidt (1709–1785), a former butcher turned evangelist, spent a year studying Dutch, and then traveled to Cape Town in 1737 to establish a rural mission at Genadendal. After a promising beginning, however, he was forced to return to Europe because of the Moravian clash with Reformed authorities in Holland.

Moravians did not return to South Africa until 1792, when they took up where Schmidt had left, even finding several people who had been converted by him. However, the quick improvement in the life of the Hottentots caused jealousy to arise among the European settlers. The hostile climate was not helped by the British occupation of Cape Town in 1795, but the British protected the colony that developed and gradually the settlers were won over as they benefited by the changes introduced into the Hottentot life. In 1800 a church that could accommodate 1,500 people was constructed. The missionaries worked constantly to counter the negative images of the Hottentots held by the Europeans.

By 1816 the work was well established and the Moravians made plans to start a fresh venture among the Bantu-speaking people along the White River some 400 miles from Cape Town. The mission, called Enon, survived even though it was largely destroyed by armed raiders soon after opening. Work also expanded to the Tambookie people in Kaffraria. Subsequent stations, called Elim and Shiloh, were also opened in the 1820s and provided attention to the Fetkannas.

Gradually the original station at Genadendal grew into a small town with a gristmill and shops that included a variety of artisans. In 1838 a normal school (for the training of teachers) was opened, and other Protestant groups began to send their people for training. A printing press began to publish a periodical and produced a Harmony of the Gospels in the Bantu language. The work grew steadily over the next decades, the government often inviting the Moravians to open stations in specific locations. The missionaries also sent people to the leper colony set up on Robben Island in 1845.

In 1865 the now extensive work in South Africa was divided into two provinces. The attempt to build indigenous leadership finally culminated in the first ordinations of native South Africans in 1883. After 1900, the pressure to develop local leadership would be significantly increased by the church's international leadership, but it was continually thwarted by wars and the developing racial policies of the colonial government. It would not be until 1951 that a stable institution for ministerial training would be opened.

In 1910 the four distinct colonies located on the southern tip of Africa were united into the Union of South Africa. Although this move softened ties between the Dutch settlers (the Boers) and the British authorities, it created some deep racial divisions between Native Africans and the European settlers. Despite this, the Moravians extended their work among the different African peoples and placed particular importance on the establishment of schools wherever possible. The school system would be nationalized in 1955.

In 1899 Ernst van Calker, the superintendent of the South Africa East Province, was consecrated as its first bishop, and in 1909 a new church constitution was adopted. It was not until 1921 that a constitution and church order was effected for the Western province. After World War II, efforts to draw the two provinces together were launched, and in 1951 both provinces participated in the formation of a seminary. In 1956 representatives of both provinces met at Port Elizabeth and merged the two provincial boards into one

South Africa Board, to be consulted on matters of mutual interest and concern. The united province became fully independent in 1967. In 2005, it reported 80,000 members.

The Moravian Church in Southern Africa has a long history of Christian ecumenical endeavor, its two provinces having participated in the first General Mission Conference in South Africa in 1904. It joined the National Council of Churches in South Africa and is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in Southern Africa
PO Box 24111
Lansdowne 7779
South Africa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton.

History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Kruger, Bernard. The Pear Tree Bears Fruit: The History of the Moravian Church in South Africa-West. Genadendal, South Africa: [Moravian Book Depot], 1984.

Moravian Church in Suriname

Moravians received an invitation to begin work in the Dutch territory of Suriname in 1836, and two years later missionaries arrived and settled on a plantation on the Berbice River. Their primary work was among the Africans on the plantation and nearby. Work expanded in 1848 with the arrival of Theophilus Salomon Schumann, a linguist who had mastered the language of the Native people, the Arawak. He soon translated the Bible into their language. The mission ran into trouble, however, when the local traders told the Arawak that the Moravians planned to sell them into slavery and told the authorities that the Moravians were inciting the Arawak to rebellion. Once the problem was solved, Schumann moved into the interior and began his life's work among the Arawak people. He died an untimely death in 1760, after which the mission to the Arawak died away and the church in the capital, Paramaribo, took center stage.

The work among the Africans was continually thwarted by whites who saw it as subversive of the slave system. By the beginning of the 1800s, the original mission still counted only a few hundred people as members. Work in the interior was slow because of the inability of the missionaries to adjust to the climate. By the 1820s, work was limited to the capital and a few nearby estates.

However, a growth period followed the smallpox epidemic of 1820 and the fire that destroyed Paramaribo in 1821. Afterward, the plantations opened their doors to the missionaries. The Dutch Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge among the Negroes of Surinam gave them boats to facilitate their travel to the growing number of plantations. The work was also assisted by the translation of a portion of the New Testament into the new language, Sranana Tongo, which the Africans had developed. By mid-century, the work claimed some 5,000 adherents. Overcoming significant opposition, they began schools for the Africans that were able to also train a set of teachers, who had greater access to their fellow slaves. In 1856 the mission took on a new responsibility at the request of the government—fulfilling the spiritual needs of those suffering from Hansen's disease (leprosy) at the hospital at Batavia.

In 1857 the mission gained a convert named John King, of the Matuari people, who had arrived at the mission door one day, prompted by a dream. King studied with the missionaries over the next four years and was ordained in 1861. He then spent the next 35 years taking Christianity to the residents of the interior. His efforts led to the conversion of the chief of his people and the development of a strong Moravian presence in the interior.

As in other lands, Moravian membership on Suriname rose in the years immediately after the emancipation of the slave population, about 60 percent of which identified with the church. Some 25,000 former slaves became Moravian in the decade during the transition to complete freedom (1863–1873). The mission also moved to evangelize the Chinese and Asian Indians who came into the country to replace the former slaves who left the plantations.

The changes adopted by the Moravian Church as a whole in 1899, to restructure their international fellowship as a federation, led the mission in Suriname to move toward autonomy. A new constitution was approved, and businesses that had been developed to support the work of the mission were formally separated from it. Shortly thereafter, the work was divided into the Old or Creole Mission and the New Mission. The former moved toward self-support, and in 1911 a church conference under the leadership of a resident bishop, Richard Voullaire, assumed authority. The development of indigenous leadership was assisted by the opening of a school to train teachers and ministers in 1902. Full autonomy came in steps through the next decades, held back by the general poverty of the land and political events, not the least of which was the German invasion of the Netherlands during World War II. The Old Mission became an autonomous Moravian province in 1963.

Although the Creole Mission also moved toward autonomy, it worked among the peoples residing in the interior, primarily Africans who had escaped plantation life during the days of slavery and re-established an African-like existence, complete with their traditional African faith. Some groups resisted any relationship to the church, but they finally developed more positive relationships as they saw the mission as a source for education and medical assistance. The mission also developed a following among immigrants from East India, China, and Java, the latter forming some 17 percent of the Surinamese population at the beginning of the 20th century.

In a joint venture with other Protestant groups, the Moravian Church in Suriname sponsors Bethesda, a hospital specializing in the treatment of Hansen's disease. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches. In 2006, it reported 40,000 members.

Moravian Church in Suriname
PO Box 219/1811
Paramaribo
Suriname

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton.

History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Moravian Church in Tanzania

In 1885 Germany was given hegemony over territory in east central Africa. The Moravian Church saw this action as an occasion for extending its missionary activity, and in 1891 it commissioned a team of missionaries to the new colony. They built their first station in Rungwe, in what was then called Tanganyika (now part of Tanzania), among the Konde people, a branch of the Bantu. Several additional stations were established in the southern highlands, but it was not until 1897 that the missionaries received their first convert. The missionaries developed the stations as self-supporting villages, utilizing the many skills that they brought with them from their homeland, such as farming and raising donkeys. In 1900 a clear separation was made between the mission and the economic enterprises that supported it. Simultaneously, the church inherited an older missionary station in western Tanganyika (south of Lake Victoria) from the (Anglican) Church Missionary Society. This work expanded rapidly, as the missionaries took advantage of government policy limiting each area to a single missionary group. The first converts were received into the church in 1903.

In 1912 the missionaries in the south expanded their services to include a medical facility, and they also supported the centers set up to assist those suffering from Hansen's disease. Some worked with workers from other missions on translating the Bible and other literature into more of the many languages spoken in the colony. By 1913 the Moravian missionaries could report that from their nine main missionary stations, they had developed more than 1,000 preaching points and had a membership of 1,955. Meanwhile some 800 children attended the schools they had established. Work in the west proceeded more slowly. Though the number of stations expanded, some schools were opened, and a headquarters was established at Tabora, the number of converts was small.

In 1916 the British invaded East Africa. They interned all of the missionaries in the southern highlands, and the work of the mission was turned over to the Free Church of Scotland (now a constituent part of the Church of Scotland). The church had few personnel and quickly expanded the role of the African teachers. Meanwhile, Belgium invaded the western territory being worked by the missionaries. Most were interned and sent back to Europe.

In 1923 the British allowed the first Moravians to return to Tanganyika, and in 1926 formal control of the mission was passed back into Moravian hands. Dutch Moravians assumed leadership in the west, and British Moravians in the south. As personnel and financial support arrived, stations were reopened and refurbished. The church focused attention on the school program, which was greatly expanded. In 1943 a teacher-training school was opened in cooperation with the Church Missionary Society.

During the 1930s, the mission emphasized the development of a self-supporting indigenous church. One step in that direction was the ordination of the first African ministers in 1935. This action proved fortuitous, as all the missionaries were again interned in 1939. A Danish couple sent from Great Britain was able to fill some of the need created by the internments, and they were joined by two more colleagues from South Africa the following year. They were able to work in conjunction with 13 African ministers. After the war further steps toward the maturity of the mission were taken, as it accepted responsibility for paying the salaries of all the ministerial staff.

Work expanded in the decades after World War II. As the African leadership evolved, three synods were organized, one in the west and two in the south. These were then linked by a Joint Board, designed to oversee and coordinate all the Moravian work in the newly independent nation of Tanzania. Each synod elected a provincial board, and the three boards came together to form the Joint Board.

The Joint Board of the Moravian Church in Tanzania now oversees the largest Moravian church in the world, with some 500,000 members (2005). It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Moravian Church in Tanzania
PO Box 747
Mbeya
Tanzania

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church Missionary Society; Church of Scotland; World Council of Churches.

References

Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton.

History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA, and Winston-Salem, NC: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

■ Morocco

The Kingdom of Morocco is located on the northeast corner of Africa, immediately south of Spain and the Island of Gibraltar. It shares borders with the disputed Western Sahara territory and Algeria. The west border of its 172,317 square miles of territory faces the Atlantic Ocean; the central part of the country is mountainous; while the far west reaches into the edge of the Sahara Desert. The bulk of Morocco's 34,343,000 citizens (2008) reside in the northeast corner of the country between the mountains and the sea.

Morocco was originally home to various Berber people. They were incorporated into the Roman Empire and later, after Rome fell, the land was overtaken by the Arab Muslims who swept into the area in the eighth century on their way to Spain. In the 11th century, an Islamic movement among Berbers who had established themselves in present-day Senegal established control of all of the land between Senegal and Gibraltar. Their Almoravid Empire lasted for a century (1062–1147), only to be replaced by the Almohad Empire (1147–1258). The Almoravids took control of southern Spain and helped create the rich culture generally associated with Granada and Cordoba. Modern Morocco was largely shaped by Spain's conquest of the Iberian Peninsula in the 15th century and the annexation of Algeria by the Ottoman Empire a century later.

Morocco remained an independent state into the 20th century, but in the decades prior to World War I it became a tantalizing target for colonization by various European nations. In 1912 Morocco became a French protectorate, while Spain retained Sahara, to the south of Morocco, and a small bit of land immediately south of Gibraltar. Tangiers was declared an international city. French rule was never accepted, however, and nationalist opposition grew over the next four decades until the French finally recognized Moroccan independence in 1956. In stages the country gained control of Tangiers and the remaining Spanish territory to the north.

Muhammad V (1909–1961) ascended the throne of independent Morocco in 1957. He was succeeded in 1961 by Hassan II, who ruled until his death in 1999. Hassan's rule was marked by his attempt to claim Sahara, the former Spanish territory to the south. He invaded Sahara and, along with Mauritania, occupied the region. In 1976 Spain renounced its claim in favor of Morocco and Mauritania, but the Saharans proclaimed their own independence. The border between the two countries remains a disputed boundary. After King Hassan's death on July 23, 1999, his son, Muhammad VI, ascended the throne.

Islam became the dominant religion in Morocco late in the first millennium CE, and today most Moroccans are Sunni Muslims of the Malikite School. Sufi Brotherhoods are also present in significant numbers, especially the Qadiriyya and the Kattaniyya.

The king, known as the "Commander of the Faithful," is seen as the center of the Muslim community. Among his assigned duties is ensuring that Islam is properly respected. The Muslim community is given focus in the Université Ben Youssef at Marrakech and the Université al-Qarawiyyin, with campuses at Rabat, Koutoubia Mosque in Marrakech, Morocco, 12th century. Construction on the Almohad structure began about 1150 and was completed during the reign of al-Manur (1184–1199). (Jupiterimages)

Fez, and Marrakech, both dedicated to Arabic and Islamic studies. The latter institution dates to the ninth century.

The Jewish community in Morocco predates the introduction of Islam, and over the centuries it has enjoyed a largely tolerant setting in which to develop, though there have been times of persecution. The community grew noticeably at the end of the 15th century, following the expulsion of Jews from Spain and Portugal. During the transition to independence, the great majority of Jews migrated to Israel, Canada, France, and Spain. The community shrank from 250,000 to 30,000 members. It continued to decline through the last quarter of the 20th century and at the beginning of the new millennium numbered only 13,000. The Jewish community is centered at Casablanca, though there are smaller groups in Tangiers, Fez, and other cities.

Christians came to Morocco during the days of the Roman Empire. Christian churches thrived in the northern part of the territory (Tangiers, Rabat, and Fez). Through the centuries these churches were rent by both the Donatist and the Arian controversies and were finally overwhelmed by Islam. An attempt to reintroduce Christianity was made by priests of the Franciscan Order in 1220, who actually built a following that justified the formation of a diocese at Marrakech in 1234. The diocese was suppressed in 1566, and the Roman Catholic Church barely survived. By the beginning of the 19th century there was only one priest in the whole country.

As the French began to operate in the country, a new attempt to grow the church was initiated, and in 1859 a prefecture was created. There was steady growth through the 20th century. The Vicariate of Rabat, created in 1923, became an archdiocese in 1955. As the transition to independence was made, the church suffered greatly from the migration of many of its expatriate members. Membership declined from 420,000 in 1955 to 100,000 in 1970. However, church leaders supported independence, and consequently the new government looked with favor upon Christianity.

A Berber sounds a traditional instrument in present-day Morocco. (Corel)

Protestants first entered Morocco in 1884, with missionaries from the North Africa Mission, an interdenominational missionary agency. They were joined by the Gospel Missionary Union in 1894 and the Emmanuel Mission Sahara in 1926. These two groups were expelled in 1969. After the declaration of the French protectorate, the Reformed Church of France entered the country and formed what became the Evangelical Church of Morocco (Eglise Evangélique au Maroc), now the largest of the several Protestant bodies. Several other groups such as the Assemblies of God, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Christian Brethren, and the Jehovah's Witnesses have attempted to build a following, but with limited response. Unable to do direct evangelism, several groups keep a Christian ministry alive through the operation of various humanitarian projects, the most famous being the Tullock Memorial Hospital and Nurses Training School in Tangiers, operated by the North Africa Mission.

Anglicans established work in 1929 through the efforts of the Bible Churchman's Missionary Society. Beginning as an extension of the Diocese of Sierra Leone, the Anglican parishes are now part of the Diocese of Egypt under the jurisdiction of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. Morocco is also home to a range of Orthodox churches, which emerged through the century as groups of expatriates

MOROCCO

Morocco

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	15,012,000	31,845,000	98.8	1.14	37,111,000	41,598,000
Agnostics	3,000	310,000	1.0	1.07	500,000	700,000
Christians	131,000	54,100	0.2	-0.10	63,600	69,800
Roman Catholics	100,000	20,000	0.1	-1.73	20,000	20,000
Independents	23,200	27,000	0.1	1.21	35,000	40,000
Protestants	5,000	3,800	0.0	1.60	5,000	6,000
Baha'is	2,200	32,400	0.1	1.14	45,000	60,000
Jews	31,100	4,200	0.0	1.13	4,000	4,000
Atheists	1,200	800	0.0	-2.90	1,000	1,000
Total population	15,181,000	32,247,000	100.0	1.13	37,725,000	42,433,000

settled in the country from Russia, Belarus, and other North African nations. These churches are members of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa.

The Moroccan Constitution guarantees freedom of religion to all, but such freedom does not include the freedom to proselytize among Muslims. Non-Muslim religious groups are allowed to operate freely as long as they limit activity to serving their own present constituencies. Conversion from Islam is against the law. The Council of Churches of Morocco includes the several older, larger Christian bodies and is affiliated with the World Council of Churches.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Christian Brethren; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Jehovah's Witnesses; Malikite School of Islam; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Geertz, C. Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1968.
- Holme, L. R. Extinction of the Christian Churches in North Africa. New York: Burt Franklin, 1969.
- Hoffman, Katherine E. We Share Walls: Language, Land, and Gender in Berber Morocco. New York: Wiley-Blackwell, 2008.
- Howe, Marvin. Morocco: The Islamist Awakening and Other Challenges. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Munson, H., Jr. Religion and Power in Morocco. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Pennel, C. R. Morocco since 1830: A History. New York: New York University Press, 2001.
- Shahin, E. E. A. "The Restitution of Islam: A Comparative Study of the Islamic Movements in Contemporary Tunisia and Morocco." Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 1990.
- Zeghal, Malika. Islamism in Morocco: Religion, Authoritarianism, and Electoral Politics. Princeton, NJ: Markus Weiner, 2008.

Morrison, Robert

1782–1834

Robert Morrison was a pioneer Protestant Christian missionary in Asia and the first Protestant missionary to work in China. His work prepared the way for both an indigenous Christian missionary movement in China and the development of the largest of the 19th-century missionary programs developed by the Protestant Church.

Morrison, of Scottish heritage, was born near Morpeth, Northumberland, England, on January 5, 1782. He grew up at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. After his primary education, his parents apprenticed him to a shoemaker, but from an early age he devoted his leisure hours to reading religious materials. After completing his apprenticeship and becoming an adult, he spent a year (1803–1804) at the Independent Academy at Hoxton. He subsequently applied for support to the London Missionary Society, an interdenominational missionary organization primarily supported by the Congregationalists. They suggested he study Chinese, and then appointed him to Canton (now Guangzhou).

The East India Company, the large British importing company operating in East Asia, was strongly opposed to Christian missionaries entering into the territories where it operated. They showed their displeasure at his appointment to Canton by refusing to take him to China on one of their ships. Morrison developed an alternate route that began in America. In 1807, James Madison, then the U.S. secretary of state, gave Morrison a letter of introduction to the American consul in Canton. The owner of Oliphant & Co. provided him with his needed transportation to China.

Once in Canton, Morrison's situation changed significantly, and soon he was on the payroll of the East India Company as a translator and was provided the time (and legal permission to remain in Chinese territory) to complete both a Chinese grammar text (originally published in 1814) and a translation of the New Testament (also published in 1814). He also met and in 1809 married Mary Morton, whose father was a physician for the Company.

Morrison went to work on producing an edition of the Bible in Chinese. He was joined in the effort to produce a Chinese edition of the Hebrew Bible by William Milne and his wife in 1815. The publication of the Bible, along with several translation books, was extremely helpful to future missionaries all across China.

Morrison's translation and publishing work proceeded in a somewhat clandestine manner as China had promulgated laws prohibiting the publishing of any religious books. Morrison lived quietly and adopted local dress. In the meantime, the Milnes had moved to Malacca, on the Malaysian coast, and in 1820 Morrison assisted them in opening an Anglo-Chinese college where Native evangelists could be trained. Their few Chinese converts could do the preaching work that the non-Chinese were prohibited from doing.

In 1821 the East India Company published the six-volume Chinese Dictionary Morrison had compiled. As his wife had died that year, he made a return visit to England, where in 1823 the Royal Society recognized his accomplishment by electing him a fellow. He remained in England for several years, during which time he met and married his second wife, Eliza Armstrong. In 1826 the couple returned to China, where Morrison picked up his work translating and publishing. He died in Canton on August 1, 1834, and was buried in the Protestant cemetery in Macau.

Like other pioneer Christian missionaries, Morrison made few converts. He baptized his first, Tsai-A-Ko, in 1814. However, he is remembered for producing the tools from which hundreds of missionaries who followed him would work. By the 20th century, China was the site of the largest Protestant missionary effort in the world. It survived the attempt to destroy it by the authorities of the People's Republic of China after the Chinese Revolution. As the 21st century begins there are more than 20 million Protestant Christians in China.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: London Missionary Society.

References

Broomhall, Maurice. Robert Morrison, a Master-builder. London: Livingstone Press, 1924.

Morrison, Robert. A Dictionary of the Chinese Language. 6 vols. London: Black, Parbury and Allen, 1815–1823.

Morrison, Robert. A parting memorial: consisting of miscellaneous discourses, written and preached in China; at Singapore; on board ship at sea, in the Indian Ocean; at the Cape of Good Hope; and in England; with remarks on missions, &c. &c. London: W. Simpkin and R. Marshall, 1826.

Rubenstein, Murray A. The Origins of the Anglo-American Missionary Enterprise in China, 1807–1840. ATLA monograph series no. 33. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1996.

Moscow

During the first half of the second millennium CE, Moscow rose out of obscurity to become the center of Russia and of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). So important had the ecclesiastical establishment in the city become that shortly after the fall of Constantinople to the Ottoman Turks in 1453, the idea emerged that it had now become the Third Rome, that is, the heir to the Byzantine (Roman) Empire. Currently Moscow is the capital of the Russian Federation and, with 10.5 million inhabitants (2009), one of the largest cities in the world.

The first reference to Moscow dates from 1147 when it was just an obscure settlement on the Moscow River in the principality of Rostov, northwest of what was to become Russia. By the 12th century, Christianity had already had two centuries to make itself the dominating religious influence. Originally centered in Kiev, in 988 Christianity became the official religion of the early Eastern Slavic state under Grand Prince Vladimir I (ca. 956–1015). Ecclesiastically, he aligned his regime with Byzantium and an archbishop metropolitan with authority from Constantinople residing in Kiev arose to head the church.

Moscow would take its first steps toward its future prominence in the last half of the 12th century. In 1156, Prince Yury Dolgoruky (ca. 1099–1157) built fortifications to protect the town. They proved ineffective against invasions in 1177 and in particular in 1237–1238, when the Mongol warriors passed through the region. Each invasion resulted in Moscow being burned and many of its inhabitants being killed, but the city was then repopulated and rebuilt. By the end of the 13th century, under Prince Danill Aleksandrovich (1261–1303), Moscow had become a prosperous center of a small independent principality, though still under the authority of the Mongol regime.

Novospassky Monastery (New Monastery of the Savior) is one of the fortified monasteries surrounding Moscow from the southeast. (Vladislav Rumyantsev/Dreamstime .com)

Moscow's relatively stable position after the withdrawal of the Mongol army attracted large numbers of refugees from other parts of what is now Russia. Under Ivan I (1288–1340), Danill's son, the Principality of Moscow surged in front of the rival principalities of the region. Under Ivan I (called "Kalita," or "Money Bag," in old Russian) Moscow got the exclusive right to collect taxes from other Russian lands for the Golden Horde, the Mongolian state. By acting as the Mongol's enforcement arm in the region and paying an additional amount of tribute, Ivan gained the khan's agreement that the Moscow Principality would not be divided among his sons, but would pass entirely into the hands of his eldest son, Simeon (1316–1353). Through the 14th century, the Grand Duchy of Moscow emerged as the most prominent Russian principality and in 1380 its Prince Dmitry Ivanovich (1363–1389) formed a united Russian army and secured an important victory over the Golden Horde in the Battle of Kulikovo. However, the fight for liberation from the Mongols took another 100 years. In 1382, Khan Tokhtamysh overran and sacked the city, though he was unable to breach the new fortifications of the Kremlin. It was only in 1480 that Ivan III (1462–1505) finally defeated the Mongol army, freed the country from their control, and made Moscow the center of power in Russia.

The city's new might and stability did not mean the end of its traumas. In 1571, the khan of the Crimea, one of the successors of the Golden Horde, attacked and sacked and burned the city, sparing only the Kremlin. In 1610 the Polish Lithuanian army began a two-year occupation of the city. In 1812, the city was burned as Napoleon's army approached, most likely as the result of an attempt to deny it to the invader, compounded by the chaos of its residents' evacuation. In 1941, Adolf Hitler tried and failed to take the city.

Moscow's ascendance to political power was accompanied by its rise as the ecclesiastical center of Russia, at the expense of Kiev. In 1299, the metropolitan of Kiev moved his residence to Vladimir, Moscow's rival, but shortly after to Moscow. From 1325, when Peter (d. 1326), still officially metropolitan of Kiev, established his seat in Moscow, the city became the center of the Russian Orthodox Church. In 1448, five years before the fall of Constantinople, Jonas (d. 1461) was declared the metropolitan of Moscow. In 1589, Job (d. 1607) was consecrated as the patriarch of Moscow and All Russia, and the Russian Church became jurisdictionally equal to its Constantinople progenitor.

As Moscow emerged in prominence, it also became the home to monasteries, prominent churches, and cathedrals. The oldest monastic community was at Novospassky Monastery founded in the 12th century during the reign of Prince Yury Dolgoruky, considered to be the founder of Moscow. Also laying claim to being the city's oldest monastery is the Danilov Monastery, founded in 1282 by Prince Danill. Monastic activities were later neglected and the buildings fell into disrepair. Thus in 1330, the monks were relocated and it would be two centuries before the site was revived as a monastic center. The most tragic episode in the monastery's history was when in 1930 it was turned into a children's prison by the Soviet government. It was returned to the Russian Orthodox Church in 1983 and became the residence of the Moscow Patriarchate, the governing body of the church.

The transfer of ecclesiastical power led to construction of churches and monasteries inside the Kremlin, which is the fortified center of Moscow. These included the Dormition Cathedral (1327), the monastery Church of the Saviour's Transfiguration (1330), and Archangel Cathedral (1333). A second building spree at the end of the century, under Ivan III, was intended to symbolize and celebrate Moscow's rise as the center of a powerful new state (the word "Russia" came to be used during Ivan III's reign). Apart from the new Kremlin walls and towers (still in place), this added new ecclesiastical buildings, such as Annunciation Cathedral, the Chudov Monastery, and Ascension Convent.

Earlier, Metropolitan Peter saw to the opening of the Vysokopetrovsky Monastery on a site outside the Kremlin walls. Metropolitan Alexei (1354–1378) built two monasteries during his long tenure as head of the Russian church. With high fortified walls, each new monastery added to a ring gradually being built around the Kremlin. Alongside their religious function, the monasteries would now also have a purely secular function as the first line of defense against future invaders. The Andronikov Monastery, located a short distance from the Novospassky Monastery, was built in 1360, following Alexei's return from Constantinople. It is said that, having encountered a violent storm while on the Black Sea during his return trip, Alexei had vowed to build a church if he survived. A short time later, he left Moscow to treat the ailing wife of the Mongol khan and the khan rewarded him with a grant of land in Moscow upon which he erected the Chudov Monastery. This monastery attained religious fame as the home of the 14th-century icon painter Andrei Rublev (ca. 1360–ca. 1430) and was saved from demolition during the Communist era by being transformed for a time into the Andrei Rublev Museum of Early Russian Art.

By the early 16th century, when the concept of the Third Rome was first elaborated by Filofey (Philotheos), a monk from the city of Pskov in the Russian northwest, Moscow was already a city of numerous Orthodox churches and monasteries. Its most internationally famous ecclesiastical building, however, would not be built until the reign of Ivan IV ("the Terrible") who, in the 1550s, commissioned a new cathedral to replace Trinity Cathedral located next to the moat that ran beside the Kremlin. The church was constructed to celebrate Ivan's conquest of the Kazan Khanate, the decisive victory of which fell on the feast day of the Intercession of the Virgin, and so named his new church the Cathedral of the Intercession of the Virgin on the Moat. However, at the time, the recently deceased holy man Basil the Blessed (1468–1552) was enjoying great popularity with the city's residents (including Ivan himself), and the church came to be called St. Basil's, the name by which it is known today. St. Basil's is a Moscow architectural landmark, famous for its nine colorful towers, each in a different pattern, and its intricate complex design.

The erection of St. Basil's came on the heels of the 1534 construction of the Novodevichy Convent and Monastery that celebrated another Russian military victory: the recapture of Smolensk from the Lithuanians in 1524. Toward the end of the century, Boris Godunov (ca. 1551–1605), who served as regent of Russia for a number of years and in 1598 became czar, commissioned the Donskoi Monastery to honor an icon of the Mother of God, which many believed was responsible for the deliverance of Moscow from a series of attacks by Mongols through the century. Continuing the construction of commemorative church buildings on the occasion of military victories would be the Kazan Cathedral, built to celebrate Russian victory over the Poles and Lithuanians in 1612. Though destroyed by the Soviet government, it has recently been rebuilt.

The erection of new monumental religious structures would be put to an end by the movement of the capital of Russia to St. Petersburg by Peter the Great (1682–1725) in 1712. It would remain the capital until 1918. During this period, only one new monumental project would be undertaken in Moscow, the Cathedral of Christ the Savior, the new cathedral church of the patriarch of Russia, originally opened in 1883 to commemorate Russia's victory over Napoleon. Joseph Stalin (1878–1953) ordered this symbol of Russian Orthodoxy and popular patriotism pulled down in the 1930s, and its reconstruction became one of the first projects of the Russian Orthodox Church and Moscow authorities in the 1990s, after the fall of the Soviet Union.

However, until 1917, construction of ecclesiastical buildings continued in the ever-expanding city, reflecting changes in architectural tastes, social structure, and economic prosperity. In the late 19th century the city was commonly referred to as a place of “forty forties” churches, as it was believed to have had at least 1,600 golden cupolas, their abundance reflected in many works of Russian arts and literature. According to the available statistics, at the beginning of the 20th century Moscow had around 450 churches. At the same time, while remaining a recognizably Russian Orthodox city, it was becoming increasingly multi-religious.

From the mid-16th century, Protestants (Lutherans, Calvinists, and Anglicans) were invited by czars as much-needed professionals and settled in Moscow, initially segregated in a special district called the German Quarter (Nemetskaya sloboda). At the beginning of the 20th century, there were around 25,000 Catholics and roughly the same number of Protestants in Moscow (out of around 1.3 million of its inhabitants). Over the centuries, there also emerged Muslim, Jewish, Armenian, and other communities. The first two Protestant churches (a Lutheran one and a Calvinist one) were built not far from the Kremlin in the mid-16th century under Ivan IV, but they were demolished shortly after the czar had grown fearful of their “heretical influence.” Despite numerous restrictions and obstacles, from the late 18th century, however, non-Orthodox faiths began to be architecturally represented in Moscow. In 1791, the first Catholic church, St. Ludwig, was erected in Moscow (to accommodate religious needs of refugees from post-1789 France), followed by an Anglican church, St. Andrew’s, in 1884. There is reliable evidence of a mosque being opened in 1823, but there may have been even an earlier mosque in the city. After many delays and much resistance, the first synagogue was opened in Moscow in 1906.

The Bolshevik assault on religion resulted in closures of religious communities, demolition of churches, and desecration of ecclesiastical buildings by turning them into secular offices, storage houses, and even prisons. By the mid-1980s, there remained no more than 20 functioning churches in Moscow. St. Andrew’s church was confiscated by the Bolsheviks in 1920, the mosque was closed down in 1939; the synagogue and St. Ludwig’s Church functioned throughout the Soviet period, though under severe restrictions and with much reduced space. At the same time, beginning in 1930, the Soviet government carried out a large-scale program of Communist “visual propaganda,” which, among other things, was designed to replace the Orthodox image of the city with Communist symbolism. The most ambitious project within this program involved construction of the Palace of Soviets on the spot of the demolished Cathedral of Christ the Savior. The palace was supposed to be 1,033 feet high and topped with a 328-foot statue of Lenin, founder of the Soviet state. For technical reasons, however, the project never went beyond excavation works for creating the foundation; in the late 1950s, a large outdoor swimming pool was built there instead.

After the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, Moscow became a hub of post-Soviet religious resurgence. It has around 900 registered religious organizations, and hundreds of groups operate without registration. Around 50 different religions are represented in the city. The Russian Orthodox Church dominates in the city, in terms of both the number of its congregations (320, or 30 percent) and, in particular, architecturally. Many churches and monasteries were restored and new churches built, including in residential areas constructed during the Soviet period. However, the city’s religious profile has changed considerably toward more diversity, with around 250 Protestant congregations (more than 30 prayer houses), 25 Muslim (6 mosques), 15 Jewish (5 synagogues), 16 Buddhist (3 temples), 12 Catholic (3 churches), and dozens of New Religious movements and New Age groups currently present in the city. However, this new diversity has also caused concerns and controversies over the Russian Orthodox profile of the Russian capital. This partly explains the disputes over construction of some non-Orthodox buildings, such as mosques and a Krishna temple. Some congregations have been legally challenged by Moscow city authorities, which resulted in a ban and later refusal to register the Salvation Army, which was later declared unlawful by the European Court of Human Rights. The Salvation Army's Moscow branch has now been reregistered. In 2004, the Moscow congregation of the Jehovah's Witnesses was legally "liquidated" as a religious organization.

J. Gordon Melton and Marat S. Shterin

See also: Calvinism; Cathedral of Christ the Savior; Cathedrals—Christian; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Lutheranism; Monasticism; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Salvation Army.

References

- Brooke, Caroline. Moscow: A Cultural History. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Krasovskii, Mikhail. Moscow Church Architecture. Moscow: G. Lissner, 1911.
- Murrell, Kathleen Berton. Moscow: An Illustrated History. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2003.
- Pospelovskiy, Dimitry. The Orthodox Church in the History of Russia. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1998.
- Vladimirskaya, Norma. Art and History of the Kremlin of Moscow. New York: Bonechi Books, 2000.
- Voyce, Arthur. The Moscow Kremlin: Its History, Architecture and Art Treasures. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1954.

Moses

Moses was the leader of the Israelites in their departure from Egypt and plays a central role in receiving the covenant from God. He is often identified as the main lawgiver in Judaism, and also represents the law in other religions such as Islam and Christianity. Moses is the main human figure in the Jewish Torah, the first five books of the Bible, often called the Five Books of Moses. He leads the Jews out of Egyptian slavery, directs them during their 40 years in the desert, brings the law down from Mount Sinai, and organizes the entry into the land of Canaan.

The name Moses, or Moshe in Hebrew, plays on a link with the word for drawing out of water (Exodus

2:10). He was born around the 13th century BCE to Amram and Jochabed with a sister Miriam and brother Aaron. During a time of persecution of Jewish males he was hidden in a basket and placed in the river, only to be rescued and subsequently brought up by Pharaoh's daughter. He fled to Midian after killing an Egyptian in defense of a fellow Israelite, marrying Zipporah, and having two sons. Here he again defended the weak, resisting aggression against the daughters of his father-in-law Jethro. On Mount Sinai he experienced the presence of God through a burning bush and received the orders to lead the Hebrews from Egypt. Moses protested his inadequacy and was told to take his brother Aaron with him to help in his task. Pharaoh resisted Moses' mission, although Moses carried on trying to change his mind, and the Egyptians were punished with the 10 plagues. With the last, the death of the Egyptian firstborn, Moses succeeded in leading the Israelites out of Egypt and evading the Egyptian attempt at recapturing them. He took them through the Red (Reed) Sea into the Sinai desert and returned to Mount Sinai, where a detailed covenant was established with God and the whole of the community. His people constantly let him down, yet he persisted in caring for them and guiding their route to the Promised Land. Moses then continued to lead the Israelites to the land of Canaan, but died at Mount Nebo without himself entering.

One of the rather charming aspects of Moses is his apparent modesty. He was frightened by the presence of God in the burning bush and refused to look at him, and admitted to not knowing the divine name or being able to carry out the task he was set. When his mission to Pharaoh was at first unsuccessful and the Israelites turned against him, he complained to God for sending him (Exodus 5:22) as the Hebrews complained to him about God's plans for them. Even when they escaped from Egypt and discovered the pursuing Egyptian army they blamed Moses. Moses followed God's instructions throughout the exodus and served as the conduit for divine assistance for the Hebrews throughout this long period when they were threatened by enemies, both human and natural. When Moses was delayed on Mount Sinai, where he received the details of the law, the people revolted against monotheism and constructed the Golden Calf, an event that caused Moses to smash the tablets he brought down with him. Eventually, after punishing the leaders of the revolt, he returned to Mount Sinai with blank tablets and God dictated the terms of the covenant.

Moses was also involved in constructing the tabernacle that contained the tablets of the law, and continued to intercede on behalf of the Hebrews on the occasions when they were attacked and the even more frequent occasions when they turned against God and refused to trust in the eventual success of their mission. Even Moses himself at Numbers 20:10 is shown to be very human in carrying out an order by God to tell a rock to produce water, when the Israelites were yet again complaining of lack of sustenance. He struck the rock twice and water did indeed gush out, but the implication was that he had carried out the miracle, not God, and for this he is told at Numbers 20:12 that he will not be allowed to enter the land of Israel, although other reasons are also given in the commentatorial tradition. Even when at 120 years old he saw the land from Mount Nebo and pleaded for admittance, God did not relent. Moses gathered the Israelites and reminded them of their trials in the desert and summarized some of the basic principles of the law they received on Mount Sinai. At the end of the Bible, Moses is referred to as a unique prophet, someone whom God knew face to face, and who was engaged in performing the most remarkable events. Yet unlike many of the other major figures in Judaism, his burial place is known to no one.

Moses as Musa figures as a major character in the Koran, the most frequently mentioned human being (137 references). The account of his life and achievements is broadly in line with the Jewish Bible. He is referred to as both a prophet and a messenger in accordance with the significance of his role for the Israelites. He is also the most mentioned Old Testament character in the New Testament, often referred to as representing the law and prefiguring Jesus. He has frequently become part of modern theological debates, such as whether or not he was in fact Jewish (Freud thought he was an Egyptian) and what meaning his prophecy has for the three religions that regard him as significant.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Judaism; Sinai, Mount.

References

- Buber, Martin. Moses: The Revelation and the Covenant. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1998.
- Freud, Sigmund. "Moses and Monotheism: Three Essays." In The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, vol. 23, 36–53. Trans. James Strachey. London: Hogarth Press, 1964.
- Walzer, Michael. Exodus and Revolution. New York: Basic Books, 1986.
- Wheeler, Brannon. Moses in the Qur'an and Islamic Exegesis. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Wildavsky, Aaron. Moses as a Political Leader. Jerusalem: Shalem, 2005.

Mosques

Mosques are the gathering places for worship within the Muslim community. The mosque is primarily a house for prayer, especially on Friday at noon, the main time for the community to gather. Masjid, another word for mosque, means literally a "place for prostration," referring to the posture assumed during prayer. The term "masjid" is often used to refer to smaller mosques. Traditionally, Muslims consider that prayer done in the mosque is more valuable than that done daily in the home or elsewhere.

The most important aspect of the area of a mosque, the musallah, or prayer room, is the qibla, the direction in which the believer orients himself or herself for salat, the prayer of Islam. The qibla is always aimed toward Mecca, or more precisely toward the Kaaba, the most holy place in Islam. The wall containing the qibla is perpendicular to the qibla. The Kaaba is the large cube-shaped building (approximately 50 feet high, 40 feet long, and 33 feet wide) cut from stone, located in the midst of the Grand Mosque in Mecca. Its four corners are oriented on the four cardinal directions, and the Black Stone, a sacred rock, is in its eastern corner.

Worshippers in the mosque face Mecca while praying. Mecca was not always the direction for worship.

The Sultan Salahuddin Abdul Aziz Shah Mosque, popularly termed the Blue Mosque, is the second largest mosque in Southeast Asia and the state mosque for the state of Selangor, Malaysia. (J. Gordon Melton)

For a few years (622–624 CE), the qibla was Jerusalem. Worship in Orthodox Judaism is also oriented toward Jerusalem. The change is noted in the Koran.

Each mosque must clearly show the qibla, the most common means being through a niche in one wall called a mibrab. The mibrab symbolizes the doorway into paradise. The area immediately in front of the mibrab is under a roof, and doors that worshippers use to enter the prayer hall are located on the wall not containing the mibrab. Near the mibrab is the minbar, an elevated chair used by the imam to deliver the sermon each Friday. The floor is usually covered with one or more rugs.

At the entrance into the mosque, shoes are removed and a place, the sardivan, is provided for ritual ablu-tions. Here the worshipper washes face, hands, and feet according to instructions found in the Koran (sura 5:6), “O you who believe! When you rise up to pray, wash your faces and your hands as far as the elbows, and wipe your heads and your feet to the ankles.” Those in a state of ceremonial impurity are instructed to bathe their whole body. If no water is available, for example, if one is in the desert, a symbolic substitute (sand, earth) may be used.

The evolution of the mosques begins in Medina, where the courtyard of the prophet Muhammad’s home became an initial gathering place for the first Muslim community in 622. Here the original qibla faced Jerusalem, though soon changed to face Mecca, and worship conducted under a covered space. The roof of Muhammad's house was the original place from which the daily calls to prayer were made by Bilal, an early convert, who acted as the first muazzin. It is considered the precursor of the minarets (towers) that are now attached to every mosque. Muhammad's wives resided in houses to the left of the courtyard. The Medina mosque quickly acquired a variety of functions central to the community.

In 630 Muhammad made his return to Mecca and he and his companions took control of the city, and most important, of the Kaaba. The items representative of various other religions that accumulated around the Kaaba were removed and the area transformed into the Grand Mosque and geographic center of Islam. By this time, additional mosques had begun to appear throughout the Arabian Peninsula. Very quickly, mosques would be created wherever the religion spread and it spread rapidly during its first century.

At some point during his years in Mecca, Muhammad was miraculously transported to Jerusalem, from where he visited heaven. After the Muslim Caliphate expanded to include Palestine, the Aqsa Mosque was constructed on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem over the spot it is believed where Muhammad led the former prophets and the angels in prayer immediately prior to his ascent into heaven. The original mosque was a rectangular prayer hall with its long axis oriented on another site on the Temple Mount, the Dome of the Rock. All three mosques, the one at Muhammad's home and burial place in Medina, the Grand Mosque in Mecca, and the Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, constitute the three most holy sites on earth for all Muslims. Other sites, especially the mosques in Karbala and Najaf, are particularly revered by Shia Muslims.

In the Middle East, most mosques are closed to non-Muslims, a regulation that evolved through the first century of Islam parallel to an increasing emphasis on the sanctity of the mosque. The sanctity of the mosque in Saudi Arabia has led to whole sections of Mecca and Medina being off limits to non-Muslims and the whole region being closed to tourists. In the West, where Muslims are a distinct minority, mosques are usually open to non-Muslim visitors, and have to be available to a variety of non-Muslims from fire marshals to building code inspectors. Ideally, all mosques are open to all Muslims, but as divisions have appeared in the Muslim world, in practice, there are boundaries that are largely respected. Thus Shia Muslims and Sunni Muslims do not share the same mosques. There are also mosques for Kharijis, and increasingly Islamists are somewhat segregated. Ahmadiyya Muslims are considered sectarians by the larger Islamic world and do not mix with other Muslim groups. These boundaries are most neglected in the larger more famous mosques.

The architecture of the mosque developed from a very simple area for worship with only a few essentials to much more elaborate and complex structures. Designs and decorations were kept simple, both to maintain theological purity and to avoid confusion between the mosques and the structures of other religions. Minarets proved a functional addition and were added fairly early, possibly as early as 665. The oldest minaret still in existence is at Kairouan, Tunisia. It was built between 724 and 727, about a century after the Medina mosque. Rooms were added as the mosque took on multiple functions and it became the residence of local holy men.

The early mosques were built by the government and owned by the ruler who authorized it and his successors. Later, besides the government, a wealthy donor would supply the funds. Its maintenance would be paid out of tax money and/or derived from various endowments. Administration would be in the hands of officials appointed by the ruler, the donor if she or he so chose, or a local nazir (administrator) who was usually the judge of sharia law. As the arbiter of legal matters, a nazir was a most powerful person in the Muslim community. In more secularized settings, or where the Muslims form a minority community, the mosque is usually paid for, constructed, and afterward maintained by those people who will be its support community once built.

The ruler was also (and in some Muslim countries remains) the official worship (prayer) leader, the imam, in the mosques of his domain. In practice, he rarely acted in that capacity, and in his stead, a khatib, literally the one who delivers the sermon, was appointed to act as imam. That person could also be a judge. In larger mosques, one would find several khatibs.

As they developed, mosques served many social functions, but began to evolve institutionally. Schools (madrasses) were added for training the young in Is-

The Islamic Society of North Texas has a large mosque in suburban Dallas. (J. Gordon Melton)

Islamic belief and practice and some of these evolved into universities, the al-Aksa University in Cairo being possibly the most prominent example. Mosques also housed law courts, lodging for travelers, and even hospitals. Some of these functions are being lost as society evolves and new secularized structures assume control of educational, legal, and medical facilities and different arrangements are made for travelers.

While women have an important role in Islam, their role differs markedly from that of men. This difference shows up at the mosque. The Friday prayers and sermon has been considered to be compulsory for all male Muslims. In some Muslim countries, women are not welcome at mosques, and mosques can be closed to women, though such prohibitions are absent from the Koran and the hadith. In mosques where women are welcome, in more secularized Muslim countries or in the West, women may be segregated and during Friday services seated in the rear of the mosque or in a separate room divided from the prayer hall by a screen that allows sound to pass freely through it.

In only a few mosques in the West do women join men in the main prayer hall and otherwise participate in the administration and management of the mosque. This issue has joined the veiling of women and their access to education and employment as major issues for those concerned with the status and role of women in Islam.

Besides the three major holy sites, a number of mosques have become famous for their historical importance, cultural identifications, and/or architectural significance. Notable among these are the many mosques of Cairo beginning with the Mosque of Amr, the oldest mosque in the city; the al-Azhar Mosque, the primary mosque of the Fatimid rulers in the 10th century, out of which al-Azhar University emerged; the 13th-century An-Nasir Mohammed Mosque, the oldest building inside the Citadel; the Mosque of Sultan Hassan, completed in 1363; and the 19th-century Mosque of Muhammad Ali.

The largest mosque in the world is al-Masjid al-Haram, the Grand Mosque of Mecca, which surrounds the Kaaba. It is an open-air mosque that has been repeatedly enlarged to accommodate the faithful as the movement has grown. One obligation of all able-bodied male Muslims is to make at least one pilgrimage to Mecca. The mosque can currently accommodate some 800,000 people both inside and immediately outside. During the hajj (pilgrimage) that capacity is increased to four million. In 2007, the current ruler of Saudi Arabia, King Abdullah bin Abdul-Aziz (b. 1924), initiated plans to increase the normal capacity to 1,120,000.

The Mosque of the Prophet in Medina is both the second holiest and the second largest mosque in the world. Like the mosque in Mecca, it has also been repeatedly renovated and enlarged. As a result, the current prayer hall can accommodate up to a half million worshippers. Muhammad's tomb is contained within the mosque and rests under a unique Green Dome in the center of the mosque.

Four other mosques are notable for their size, being able to accommodate as many as 100,000 worshippers in their main prayer hall: the Faisal Mosque in Islamabad, Pakistan, and the largest mosque in South Asia; the Imam Reza shrine, a sahia mosque in Mashhad, Iran; Istiqlal Mosque, (Independence Mosque) in Jakarta, Indonesia, the national mosque of Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation; and the largest mosque in Southeast Asia; the Hassan II Mosque located in Casablanca, Morocco, and the largest mosque in Africa. Each of these mosques are products of the late 20th century.

A number of Muslim countries have impressive national mosques, designated either officially or unofficially, like the Masjid Negara, the national mosque of Malaysia, located in Kuala Lumpur. The Great Mosque of Djenné, Mali, is most unusual, being constructed entirely of mud brick. It is the largest mud brick building in the world. The Id Kah Mosque located in Kashgar, Xinjiang, is the largest mosque in China.

From Afghanistan, Islam spread along the Silk Road through central Asia to China. Along that route, which became dominantly Muslim, are a number of cities, all of which have been notable centers of Islamic life. Prominent mosques include the Khast Imam Mosque at Tashkent; the Bibi Khanym Mosque at Samarkand, the Maghak-i 'Attari Mosque and Bukhara; the Azadi, Khezrety Omar, and Iranian mosques in Ashgabat; and the mosque/mausoleum complex of Sultan Sanjar in Merv, once the largest city in the world.

Minarets also grew taller as rulers discovered that they could also serve as observation posts from which possible invading hostile forces could be seen, though that motive seems superfluous relative to what is now the tallest minaret in the world found at the new Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca, Morocco. It reaches upward of 689 feet. The tallest brick minaret in the world (238 feet) is the Qutb Minar located in Delhi, India, and built between 1193 and 1385. It was constructed of red sandstone and covered with intricate carvings and verses from the Koran. For a time it served as the minaret for the Quwwat-ul-Islam mosque, the earliest extant mosque built by the Delhi sultans.

The Minaret of Jam, built in 1194 by Sultan Ghiyath al-din Mohammed Ibn Sam (1163–1202) in the province of Ghur, in what is now Afghanistan, is the second tallest minaret in the world. The tower is unique in that it sits in an isolated area of the country and was lost to history, the Ghurid dynasty and the society that supported it having been destroyed and dispersed by the Mongols. Even the site of the Ghurid capital remains unknown. The Minaret of Jam appears to have been the direct inspiration for the Qutb Minaret. It was rediscovered in 1957 by Ahmed Ali Kohzad, the president of the Afghan Historical Society, and French archaeologist André Maricq.

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has recognized the cultural significance of the mosque and added a number of them to its list of World Heritage Sites, including the minaret at Jam, Afghanistan; the Historic Mosque City of Bagerhat, Bangladesh; and the Great Mosque and hospital at Divrigi, Turkey. Many more are included in the designation of historical sections of cities from Cairo to Bukhara.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Cairo; Great Mosque, Djenné, Mali; Jerusalem; Mecca; Medina; Orthodox Judaism.

References

- Frishman, Martin, and Hasan Uddin Khan, eds. The Mosque: History, Architectural Development, and Regional Diversity. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1994.
- Grabar, Oleg. The Formation of Islamic Art. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Holod, Renata, and Hasan Uddin-Khan. The Mosque and the Modern World: Architects, Patrons, and Designs since the 1950s. London: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- McCauley, David. The Mosque. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2003.
- Welzbacher, Christian. Euro Islam Architecture: New Mosques in the Occident. Amsterdam: Sun Publishers, 2008.

Mother Meera, Disciples of Mother Meera, born Kamala Ready (1960) in Chandepalle, Andhra Pradesh, is an Indian female guru who since the 1980s has gained a large following in the West. When she was 12, her uncle Balgur Venkat Reddy declared her to be the incarnation of the original and supreme female power, Adiparashakti, and took her to live with him at the ashram of Sri Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950). There, she gathered some fame and came to be regarded as an avatar, or a divinity in human form who comes to save the world. Avatars (as opposed to gurus) are believed to be purely and originally divine and devoid of any sinful human nature. Kamala took the name Meera and was called Mother by her disciples. Among the early disciples of Meera was Adilakshmi, a woman about 20 years her senior, who is still Meera's closest associate, and Andrew Harvey, whose books gained Meera early popularity in the West, but who subsequently broke his association with her.

In the early 1980s, Meera, Balgur Venkat Reddy, and Adilakshmi visited disciples in Germany, where Meera married and settled. Reddy died in 1985, but Meera's fame has spread throughout Europe, the United States, and Australia. Every year, she receives tens of thousands of visitors who come for darshan (spiritual encounter or audience). Characteristic of Meera's darshan is the complete silence in which it occurs. Her darshan room has no icons or music, and she does not deliver any teachings or meditation instruction. Disciples approach one by one, kneel in front of Mother Meera, and place their head in her hands. After pressing the temples for a few moments, she looks the disciple straight in the eyes. This is believed to undo spiritual blockages and to release spiritual energy in the disciple.

Though there are very few teachings, the writings by and about Mother Meera reflect a mixture of the teachings of Aurobindo with popular Hindu devotion. Though Mother Meera is herself the central focus of this devotion, disciples are encouraged to realize their own divine nature through surrender to the Mother. It is the absence of any systematic teaching, organized ritual, or institution that appears to be part of the appeal of Mother Meera in the West.

Mother Meera
Oberdorf 4a
D-65559 Dornburg-Thalheim
Germany
<http://www.mothermeera.com>

Catherine Cornille

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Hinduism; Meditation.

References

- Adilakshmi. The Mother. Thalheim, Germany, 1987.
- Cornille, Catherine. "Mother Meera, Avatar." In The Graceful Guru. Hindu Female Gurus in India and the United States, edited by K. Pechilis, 129–148. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Goodman, Martin. In Search of the Divine Mother. San Francisco: Thorsons, 1998.
- Harvey, Andrew. Hidden Journey: A Spiritual Awakening. London: Rider, 1991.
- Linebaugh, Sonia. At the Feet of Mother Meera. Philadelphia: Xlibirs Corporation, 2005.
- Mother Meera. Answers. 2 vols. Ithaca, NY: Meeramma Publications, 1991, 1997.

Mother of God Centre

The Orthodox Church of Mother of God Derzhavnaya (“Majestic”), commonly known as the Mother of God Centre (MGC), is an indigenous Russian new religious movement that emerged as an underground group in the late 1980s in the Soviet Union and was officially registered in 1992 in the wake of the introduction of the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions. To some extent, it started as a breakaway movement from the Russian Free (“Catacomb”) Orthodox Church, which in turn had splintered from the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) and operated underground since the 1920s.

MGC was founded and is currently led by Archbishop Ioann Bereslavski (Veniamin Yakovlevich Bereslavski, b. 1946). In the mid-1980s, he was baptized and took monastic vows in the Free (Catacomb) Church, and soon after was ordained a priest and then a bishop. According to Archbishop Ioann, in 1984 the Mother of God appeared before him and revealed the true meaning of Christianity and the sufferings of the Russian people and their church. Since then he has been having continuous revelations, which constitute the basis of his ever-evolving theology and define the dynamics of the movement he leads.

While claiming allegiance to the Eastern Orthodox tradition (the Nicene Creed, the Apostolic succession, and the decisions of the seven ecumenical councils), MGC reinterprets it in a revivalist and millenarian fashion in light of the church’s “Marian faith.” This “renewed faith” is based on a series of miraculous 20th-century appearances and revelations of the Virgin Mary, in both Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic contexts, which taken together are believed to constitute “the White New Testament” or “the New Covenant.” According to Ioann Bereslavski, the New Covenant signifies that the world has entered the “era of the Holy Ghost,” in which God no longer dominates the world but reunites with it. “Charismatic gifts” of spiritual knowledge and divine life are no longer limited to the official church authorities but can be found in an infinite variety of sources and manifestations: from the centuries-old Russian tradition of monastic sainthood of Saint Nil Sorski and Saint Serafim Sarovski, through Russian classical literature and the philosophy of Leo Tolstoy and Nicolas Berdyaev, to the 20th-century martyrdom of Nicolas II monks of the Solovki Islands. From the late 1990s, following a series of visits and pilgrimages abroad, MGC widened its repertoire of charismatic gifts to include elements of Western sacred mythology, beliefs, and practices, such as the legend of the Holy Grail and mysticism of the Cathars.

The theology and mythology of MGC, however, remain Russocentric and particularly focused on the drama of Russian modern history. In his early prophecies, Bereslavski claimed that the Virgin Mary in her revelation in 1917 in Fatima, Portugal, predicted that Russia would become the battlefield of the final “cosmic” confrontation between the evil of Communism and God as embodied in the Orthodox Church. However, he asserted, the Moscow Patriarchate betrayed the Virgin’s salvationist mission through collaboration with the Communist regime, which was symbolized in the image of the three-headed Dragon, representing the Communist Party, the KGB, and the Moscow Patriarchate. The defeat of the 1991 Communist coup signified the end of the first two heads, and the severance of the last head will make possible the salvation of humanity through acceptance of the “True Marian Faith.”

In its early days, MGC bore an imprint of its origins in the monastic tradition of the Catacomb Orthodox Church on the one hand, and of youthful idealism of its first—predominantly male—members on the other. Salvation could only be achieved through “seeking sainthood,” that is, following strict asceticism and separation from “the world.” In social terms, this meant living in small semi-underground communities led by authoritarian sages (starets), separation from the biological parents, engaging in exhausting fasting and prayers, and avoiding—and at times harshly treating—women. However, from the mid-1990s this monastic revivalism gradually gave way to a more accommodating stance, with interest in engagement with the wider world, more open communities with flexible criteria for membership, and establishing contacts with other Christian churches and world religions.

The revivalist interpretation of the Orthodox tradition by MGC can be seen in its liturgical practice: the canonical Orthodox liturgy is complemented by the “plastic prayer,” which is silent prayer accompanied by highly expressive gesticulation, and by exuberant rhythmical music, dance, and colorful dress. In contrast to the Old Slavonic of the Russian Orthodox Church, MGC uses modern Russian as its liturgical language.

MGC has seven bishops, including head Archbishop Ioann (Bereslavski). The movement holds an annual Church Council, which is a major religious festival for all its participants and sympathizers. Its infrastructure includes several small monasteries, a school, a theological academy, and a publishing house, New Holy Russia Publishers, which annually produces dozens of books and two periodicals—The Virgin’s Mercy (formerly The Knight of Faith) and The Oasis of Peace.

There is no formal membership. It is estimated that the movement has never attracted more than a few hundred core followers and around 3,500 to 4,000 more loosely affiliated participants in various parts of Russia, around 400 of whom reside in Moscow. Since the early 1990s, the movement has been involved in the World Network of Marian Devotion. It now has followers in Croatia, Bulgaria, Italy, and some other European countries.

In the early 1990s, MGC was subject to controversy and became one of the main targets of anti-cult groups and the Moscow Patriarchate. The anti-cult groups mainly focused on allegations of hypnosis and assault on the family, which caused several investigations by the Office of the General Prosecutor. No evidence of criminal or antisocial activity was found. Several official documents of the Russian Orthodox Church mention MGC among the most dangerous “totalitarian sects” whose teachings and practices are unacceptable for both theological and moral reasons. In its early days, some anxieties were caused by MGC’s political activities encouraged by its messianic anti-communism, and its staunch opposition to the “Communist Church.” At that time, the movement’s monarchist political views encouraged several of its members to proselytize in some units of the Russian army in order to “re-educate” officers in the spirit of Marian faith and the Russian monarchist tradition. Although the subsequent moderation of the movement contributed to its removal from the list of primary anti-cult targets, it remains high on the church’s counter-cult agenda. Also the negative publicity created by the mass media is likely to have contributed to the recent instances of violence against MGC and unlawful detention of its members.

MGC is a prominent example of indigenous religious innovation in response to the opportunities and frustrations of the transitional period in Russia. In a way, MGC has created a religious mythology for post-Communist Russia, drawing on elements of the country’s traditional religious culture, as it survived the Soviet period and was transformed after the collapse of Communism.

Marat S. Shterin

See also: Asceticism; Marian Devotion, World Network of; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Saints.

References

- Baklanova, G. Pravoslavnaia Tserkov’ Bozhiei Materi “Derzhavnaja.” Moscow: Agent, 1999.
- Filatov, S. “Sects and New Religious Movements in Post-Soviet Russia.” In Proselytism and Orthodoxy in Russia: The New War of Souls, edited by J. Witte Jr. and M. Bourdeaux, 163–184. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1999.
- Shterin, Marat. “New Religious Movements in the New Russia.” Nova Religio 4, no. 2 (April 2001): 310–321.

Mountains

Humans have imputed sacredness to mountains for a number of reasons. Most obviously, mountains are high, reaching into the heavens—the realm of the gods. Mountains often are remote as well, and thus inaccessible to the majority of people, adding to their sense of mystery. The striking beauty of many mountains only adds to the awe people have felt, and still feel, when viewing them. In addition, mountains frequently provide the elements necessary for life: water (as the sources of rivers and springs), food (through the plants and animals found on their flanks), and minerals (both common and precious). As a result, most cultures

A Buddhist depiction of the universe with Mount Meru in the center. The world system consists of Mount Meru, sitting on top of four elemental disks, with the realms of all the gods above. At the very bottom is the black disk of wind, above it is the red disk of fire, next is the white disk of water, finally there is the yellow disk of earth. (iStockPhoto) have imputed to mountains—both mythical and real—sometimes towering and sometimes merely higher than their surroundings—a sense of the sacred.

Because their tops stretch high above the surrounding lands, mountains have been viewed as the center of the universe, linking Earth with both heaven and hell, by many of the world's cultures. The prototypical axis mundi (world center) is Mount Meru (or Sumeru) of Indian mythology, which influenced both Hindu and Buddhist beliefs. Harney Peak serves a similar function for the Sioux (Lakota) of North America, as does Gunung Agung for the Balinese, while the Kaaba is the highest point on Earth and center of heaven according to Islamic tradition. Indeed, the highest point on Earth, atop the cosmic mountain, functions in many cultures as the “cosmic navel” as well, the site at which the world was created.

Veiled by clouds, mountains also have been considered dwelling places of deities by large numbers of religions and cultures. Often the god said to live on a particular mountain has a direct association with the geography or geology of the peak (such as the storm gods of various ancient Near Eastern civilizations or the volcano goddess Pele of Hawaii). In other cases, mountains are home to a chief deity; Hindus, for example, believe Mount Kailas in Tibet to be the home of Siva, the god of destruction. Still other mountains are considered the homes of multiple deities, such as Mount Olympus, home of the ancient Greek pantheon, or the mythical Mount Kunlun in China.

Some mountains, such as Mount Kailash, are seen not merely as divine dwelling places but also as temples at which to worship their associated deities. The physical reality of the mountain and its spiritual significance become united in the mind of the devotee, who sees and experiences the peak in multiple ways simultaneously. In some cultures the linkage could be so complete that a mountain became an object of worship in its own right. The association made by ancient Chinese between Mount Yue and the life-giving water that came down from it was so strong that they offered sacrifices to the mountain to ensure abundant rain and crops. In Japan, Mount Miwa was venerated as the body of a deity, while in Africa the Kikuyu worship Mount Kenya as the brightness of the supreme deity.

Even mountains not revered as temples in their own right could, by virtue of their proximity to heaven, become homes to shrines dedicated to worship and sacrifice. On Crete, for example, are numerous peak sanctuaries at which ashes and other remains of offerings have been found. Palestine likewise was home to “high places” that God commanded the Israelites to destroy during the conquest of Canaan but that later became rivals to the Jewish temple in Jerusalem. Interestingly, in order to be accessible to a wide range of people (such as the elderly and the infirm), mountain shrines were sometimes sited neither on the tallest nor the most remote peaks.

Mountain shrines, of course, are hardly a thing of the past. Adam’s Peak in Sri Lanka, for example, is the site of an impression resembling a footprint that various traditions say was made by the Buddha (Buddhists), Siva (Hindus), Adam (Muslims), or Saint Thomas (Christians). Furthermore, the sacred spaces of mountains often served as models for temples located at some distance from them. Structures as varied, and as far-flung, as the step pyramids of the Americas, the ziggurats of Mesopotamia, the stupas and chedis of south and southeastern Asia, and the pagodas of east Asia all derive their appearances from, and act as replicas of, sacred mountains.

Their closeness to the heavens also makes mountains sites of divine revelation. This is particularly true for the world’s great monotheistic religions. On Mount Sinai, cloaked in fire and smoke, Moses received from God the Ten Commandments and the rest of the law for the Jewish nation. On the Mount of Transfiguration, Jesus’ appearance shone as God declared him his chosen son, overwhelming the three disciples who accompanied him. And on Mount Hira Muhammad heard the first words of the Koran.

Not all mountains derive their sacredness from direct associations with the divine, however. For example, a wide variety of cultures have stories of a flood that destroys all except a remnant of humanity (although the reasons for the flood differ). Some of them—from Hawaii, the Andes of South America, and the Great Plains of North America, for example—describe mountains that serve as refuges from the flood for the people fleeing the coming destruction. In order to spare the refugees, some of the mountains actually grow taller so that they rise above the floodwaters.

Other stories tell of heroes who escape the flood in boats that later come to rest on mountain peaks. In the Judeo-Christian tradition, Noah and his family took refuge in an ark that eventually came to rest on Mount Ararat. The hero Utnapishtim’s boat ran aground on Mount Nimush (or Nisir) in the Mesopotamian Gilgamesh epic. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha landed on Mount Parnassus according to Greco-Roman tradition, while Hindus tell how Manu, the first man, was saved by building a boat that Vishnu, incarnated as a fish, pulled to a mountain that subsequently was named Manu’s Descent.

Some cultures saw in the loftiness and remoteness of mountains a connection with the afterlife. To the ancient Japanese, mountains acted both as the realm of the dead and as the gateway to it from the land of the living, besides being places where the denizens of the two could meet. As a result, mountains also served as burial places in Japan. Likewise, ancient Chinese considered Mount Kunlun in the west the gateway to heaven. Others constructed artificial “mountains” in which to bury their dead, including the earthen burial mounds built by the original peoples of North America and the pyramids of the ancient Egyptians.

Albert W. Hickman

See also: Emei Shan; Fiji, Mount; Heng Shan; Jiu-Hua Shan; Kailas, Mount/Lake Manasarovar; Lakota; Muhammad; Olympus, Mount; Putuo Shan; Sinai, Mount; Song Shan; Tai Shan; Wu Tai Shan.

References

Bernbaum, Edwin. Sacred Mountains of the World. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Bonnefoy, Yves, comp. Mythologies. Ed. Wendy Doniger. 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Einarsen, John, ed. The Sacred Mountains of Asia. Boston: Shambhala Publications, Inc., 1995.

Eliade, Mircea. The Myth of the Eternal Return: Cosmos and History. Trans. Willard R. Trask. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2005.

Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments, The

The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments (MRTC) was a small movement in Uganda that suddenly made international news in March 2000 when hundreds of its members were murdered. MRTC traced its origin to visions of the Virgin Mary given to a young Ugandan woman, Credonia Mwerinde (1952–2000). As early as 1981, the Virgin told Mwerinde in a series of messages to renounce the sin in her life, change her ways, and prepare for a future mission. The messages also lamented the abandonment of the Ten Commandments by Christians, and they attacked the kind of malevolent magic that had spread from Rhodesia since the 1950s by the Mchape (witchcraft eradication) movement.

In the late 1980s, two other female visionaries, Angelina Migisha (1947–2000) and Mwerinde's niece Ursula Komuhangi (1968–2000), identified with Mwerinde. In 1989 the three recruited to their cause Joseph Kibwetere (1932–2000), who had independently received a vision of the Virgin. MRTC was essentially established by these four people. Kibwetere, a Roman Catholic layman, functioned as a bishop for the group. Eventually eight additional leaders, all designated apostles, were chosen.

The visions shared by these 12 apostles described apocalyptic events that would befall the people in the near future. Beginning in 1989, the group began to share their visions publicly, and in 1991 they published them in a book, A Timely Message from Heaven: The End to the Present Times, which announced the initiation of MRTC as a movement calling all believers back to observance of the Ten Commandments. The apostles were very loosely connected with the larger global network of groups that also received messages from the Virgin Mary.

MRTC's apocalyptic teaching became more defined through the 1990s. The group taught that the present generation would soon be brought to an end. They compared the Earth to a tree that had become barren. One vision predicted three days of darkness, during which all the faithful were to go into a sanctuary prepared for this purpose, shut the doors, and remain secluded. At the end of that time, three-quarters of the world's population would be dead. The remainder would inherit a new redeemed Earth.

Kibwetere was reported to have predicted significant changes at the end of 1999. These reports appear to be false, as the group was in fact focused on the end of 2000, the actual end of the millennium. Indeed, in January 2000 MRTC leadership sent a letter to the Ugandan government announcing that its mission was concluding and that there would be no year 2001.

The movement was headquartered at Kanungu, a village in the Rukungiri District of Uganda. Members constructed a complex of buildings, and eventually Kanungu became known as Ishayuriro rya Maria (Rescue Place for the Virgin Mary). They adopted a highly disciplined life that included celibacy and a simple uniform dress of green, black, and white. The movement also developed a form of sign language that replaced speech as much as possible (except during worship services), and contact with nonmembers was minimized.

Much about the movement remains unknown and is not likely to be discovered. However, MRTC leaders evidently made a decision early in 2000 to end the movement's existence by systematically orchestrating the deaths of its membership. It has been further hypothesized that their decision may have been occasioned by the demand of some members for the return of their donations to the movement. Whatever the motivation, the deaths occurred in two phases. Members were killed at various movement centers around the country. Deaths occurred by poison, strangulation, and stabbing. Some 400 members were killed and buried in mass graves at 6 different locations. The members residing in Kanungu were killed on March 17.

In the days prior to the climactic event, word circulated that the Virgin was about to appear and members were urged to prepare for their deliverance at her hands. They slaughtered cattle, purchased a large supply of Coca Cola, indulged themselves with food, and purchased a supply of gasoline. Some members sold property and destroyed personal items. On the evening of March 15, they gathered for a party at which the food and drink were consumed. Two days later they gathered at their sanctuary, where the windows were already boarded up as prescribed in an early revelation. Shortly thereafter, there was a violent explosion and consuming fire from which no one escaped.

Initially, the reports of the event talked of a “ritual mass suicide.” But during the investigation of the event, the bodies of those who had been killed at the other MRTC sites around the country were also discovered. Only when these hundreds of additional bodies were uncovered did the interpretations shift to homicide. The final count of victims was 780. MRTC leaders who planned the event seem to have perished in the fire with the believers, though their bodies have not been identified. Uganda issued warrants for their arrest, but no sign of any survivors have appeared. Given the group’s location and the limited resources available for its investigation, many questions about the group and its final days will probably never be answered. The movement was one of thousands of new African indigenous movements that began to appear at the end of the 19th century. There was little indication that the movement was headed toward a disastrous end.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Kabazzi-Kisirinya, S., R. Nkurunziza, K. Deusdedit, and B. Gerard, eds. The Kanugu Cult-Saga: Suicide, Murder, or Salvation? Kampala, Uganda: Department of Religious Studies, Makerere University, 2000.
- Mayer, Jean-François. “Field Notes: The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments of God.” Nova Religio 5, no. 1 (October 2001): 203–210.
- A Timely Message from Heaven: The End of the Present Times.* Rukungiri, Uganda: The Movement for the Restoration of the Ten Commandments of God, 1991.

Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness

The Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA) is a contemporary metaphysical Christian group founded by John-Roger Hinkins in 1971. MSIA is sometimes classified as “New Age,” and its Sound Current practices are closely related to practices found in the Radhasoami tradition.

Hinkins, informally referred to as “J-R,” was born Roger Hinkins in 1934 to a Mormon family in Rains, Utah. He received his bachelor of science degree in psychology at the University of Utah and in 1958 moved to Southern California, where he became an English teacher at Rosemead High School. In 1963, while undergoing surgery, he fell into a nine-day coma. Upon awakening, he announced that a new spiritual personality, named John, had merged with his old personality. The name John-Roger acknowledges this new transformed self.

Around this time John-Roger was a seeker exploring a variety of different spiritual teachings, including the Agasha Temple of Wisdom founded and led by Reverend Richard Zenor (1911–1978), correspondence courses of AMORC, the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis, and Eckankar, a Sant Mat-inspired group (Introvigne 1998). He began to teach and counsel informally and, by the late 1960s, held gatherings as an independent spiritual teacher. In 1971, he formally incorporated the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness. He also founded a number of additional organizations out of MSIA, including Prana (now Peace) Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy (1977), Baraka Holistic Center (1977), and Insight Seminars (1978). The John-Roger Foundation was created in 1982 in order to coordinate the several programs initiated by MSIA. The Foundation also initiated the Integrity Day celebrations, an effort to promote global transformation through the enrichment and upliftment of individuals. Beginning in 1983, the Foundation held an annual Integrity Award banquet, giving awards to individuals for their achievement, until 1988.

MSIA teachings reflect a blend of traditional Asian faiths—Hinduism, Buddhism, and especially Sikhism. However, the organization regards itself as a mystical Christian group, and its literature explicitly and repeatedly asserts that “Jesus Christ is the head of the Church of the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness” (Lewis 2009, 240).

MSIA advocates the idea that the individual soul incarnates on the physical, material world to learn its true nature. “MSIA teaches Soul Transcendence, which is becoming aware of yourself as a Soul and as one with God, not as a theory but as a living reality. MSIA offers an approach to living that focuses on how to incorporate spirituality into your everyday life (MSIA 1999).

In common with Sant Mat groups, MSIA pictures the cosmos as composed of many different levels or planes. Originally, these levels evolved from God along a vibratory “stream” until creation reached its terminus in the physical plane. The Sant Mat tradition teaches that individuals can be linked to God’s creative energy, and that this stream of energy will carry them back to God. The Mystical Traveler Consciousness—a key MSIA concept that originally manifested through John-Roger—accomplishes this link-up during initiation. Once this initial link is made, however, the individual gains its benefits through the practice of various spiritual exercises, particularly the repetition of the mantra “Hu” and the chanting of other sacred initiatory names of God.

Each individual is seen as being involved in a movement of spiritual inner awareness, of which MSIA is an outward reflection. Individuals who wish to develop a total awareness, including freedom from the cycle of reincarnation, seek the assistance of the Mystical Traveler, who is believed to exist simultaneously on all levels of consciousness in total awareness. The consciousness can teach them how to reach awareness and assists them in understanding and releasing themselves from their karmic responsibilities and is believed to have the psychic ability to read the karmic records of each individual.

Some of the several New Age healing techniques focusing on different aspects of the self have been adopted by MSIA. These include “aura balancing,” which is a technique for clearing the auric (magnetic) field that exists around each individual; “innerphasings,” a technique through which the individual can reach into the subconscious and bring to consciousness and remove the dysfunctional patterns learned early in life; and “polarity balancing,” which releases blocks in the physical body.

What might be termed membership in MSIA is accomplished when the individual is enrolled in a series of monthly lessons, referred to as Soul Awareness Discourses. After studying the Discourses for specified periods of time, an individual may apply successively for the four formal initiations that mark a person’s spiritual progress. Independently of the initiation structure, one may also become an MSIA minister. The basic MSIA gathering is the home seminar. MSIA ministers do not normally minister to congregations; rather, they are involved in some type of service work, which constitutes their ministry.

In 1978, John-Roger and Russell Bishop developed Insight Training Seminars (Insight Seminars), a program built around an intense transformational experience. “The Seminars literally guide participants into the awareness of how life can be better—for themselves and others—when they are living compassionately, making choices from the perspective of what we call their ‘heart.’ The process is so profound that it transforms the way they look at, and live, their lives. It creates a greater experience of loving, inner peace, health, wealth, success, happiness, and joy that becomes a template for how life can be—if they choose it” (Insight Seminars 2009). The Insight Seminars emphasize the individual’s ability to move beyond self-imposed limitations. Insight became a separate organization, independent of MSIA, in 1978. Insight claims that more than one million people around the world have participated in the Seminars since their inception.

John-Roger founded the University of Santa Monica (USM), which has also developed into a separate institution that offers a Soul-Centered Graduate Curriculum through the principles and practices of Spiritual Psychology (<http://www.universityofsantamonica.edu/>). A second educational institution, Peace Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy (PTS), on the other hand, has become an integral part of MSIA outreach. Today, PTS is the primary setting for MSIA seminars and workshops. PTS has expanded the program, adding master's and doctoral degrees. According to its course catalogue, the purpose of PTS is "to facilitate learning the lessons of the physical and spiritual worlds. We maintain that our primary relationship is with our own Soul and we provide educational opportunities that support students in becoming more aware of the Divine in themselves. The teachings in PTS courses are very ancient, but presented in a straight forward, modern day presentation."

In 1988, the mantle of the Mystical Traveler consciousness was passed to John Morton, one of John-Roger's students. Morton has increasingly taken the primary role in MSIA events and remains the Spiritual Director of MSIA today.

As the anti-cult movement developed in the late 1970s, it paid little attention to MSIA; then a small group compared it to the more visible religious groups that had called it into existence. In 1988, the Los Angeles Times and People magazine attacked MSIA. Criticism centered on charges by former staff members that John-Roger had sexually exploited them, a charge John-Roger denied. After the issues were aired, the controversy largely died. Then in 1994, MSIA was again the subject of media attention when multimillionaire Michael Huffington ran for the U.S. Senate and it was learned that Arianna Huffington, his wife, was an MSIA member. About the same time, Peter McWilliams, an MSIA minister who had coauthored a series of popular books with John-Roger, dropped out of the movement and authored a bitter anti-MSIA book, LIFE 102: What To Do When Your Guru Sues You, which attracted some media attention. Shortly before his death in 2000, McWilliams appeared to have reconciled his differences with the organization. (Refer to his online letter at: <http://www.life102.com/>.)

As of early 2009, more than 4,000 people were studying the Soul Awareness Discourses, of which some 2,600 were in the United States.

Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness
Peace Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy

3500 W. Adams Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90018
<http://www.msia.org>
<http://www.pts.org>

James R. Lewis

See also: Reincarnation; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- [Hinkins], John-Roger. Inner Worlds of Meditation. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1997.
- [Hinkins], John-Roger. Spiritual Warrior. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1998.
- [Hinkins], John-Roger, and Mark Lurie. Interviews with John Morton and John Roger: Religious Scholars Interview the Travelers. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1999.
- Insight Seminars. 2009. Insight Seminars website. <http://www.insightseminars.org/>.
- Introigne, Massimo. 1998. "The Origins of the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA)." <http://www.cesnur.org/testi/msia.htm>.
- Lewis, James R. 2009. "Did Jesus Die for our Karma? Christology and Atonement in a Contemporary Metaphysical Church." In Alternative Christs, edited by Olav Hammer. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lewis, James R. Seeking the Light. Los Angeles: Mandeville Press, 1997.
- MSIA. An Introduction to The Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness. Los Angeles: Peace Theological Seminary and College of Philosophy, 1999.

■ Mozambique

Mozambique is an East African country between South Africa and Tanzania. To the west it shares borders with Malawi, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. To the east its long shoreline faces the Mozambique Channel, which separates the country from Madagascar. Its 309,500 square miles of territory is home to 21,285,000 people (2008), almost all descended from various African Native peoples.

Great Mosque and beach, Mozambique. (JMN/Cover/Getty Images)

Bantu peoples began to move into what is today Mozambique in the early centuries of the Common Era. They spread through the region and developed both agriculture and mining. Then in the 10th century, a prince from Shiraz, Persia (present-day Iran), founded the city of Sofala near present-day Beira, which became a trading center through which goods moved from the interior (Zimbabwe) to the spreading Islamic culture along the African coast. The area flourished until the Portuguese arrived and destroyed it in their attempt to take over the trade. The first European to see Mozambique, Vasco da Gama (ca. 1460–1524), sailed along the coast in 1498. The Portuguese returned two years later and began the destruction of Mozambique and the Arab settlements northward up the coast.

Finally expelled from the lands to the north in the 18th century, the Portuguese in Mozambique turned to the slave trade. During the 19th century, the Portuguese ruled the coast but had little influence inland.

They tried to assert their hegemony in the interior, including several failed attempts to connect Mozambique with Angola (a plan that countered British plans to connect South Africa with Egypt). In their attempt to gain authority over the interior, they gave many land grants (Portuguese: prazos) to Portuguese colonists, and these ultimately became virtually independent lands. Finally, between 1890 and 1920 Portugal asserted its control over both the landholders (prazeiros) and the various Native peoples.

Independence movements developed after World War II. A 1960 demonstration that led to the deaths of 500 people convinced many that there would be no peaceful transition. In 1962, Eduardo Mondlane (1920–1969) was able to unite several groups into the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO), which in 1965 launched a civil war. The war continued until the revolution in Portugal in 1974. The independent republic of Mozambique was established the next year.

The new government began to reorganize the country along Socialist lines, and in 1977 it proclaimed Marxism-Leninism as the nation's ideology. The country was soon involved with neighboring countries, supporting Zimbabwe's fight for independence and opposing the apartheid regime in South Africa. In the 1980s South Africa aligned with dissident former-supporters of Portuguese rule, the Movement of National Resistance (RENAMO), and attacked Mozambique. The war continued through the 1980s and hundreds of thousands of people left the country.

Peace talks began under the auspices of Italy and the Roman Catholic Church. After a decade of conflict, FRELIMO and RENAMO agreed to a partial cease-fire in 1990, and finally, in October 1992, a general peace accord was signed. A UN peacekeeping force oversaw the cease-fire and the transition to multiparty elections, which took place in 1994. In the mid-1990s, more than 1.7 million refugees who had sought asylum in neighboring countries returned to Mozambique—the largest repatriation ever seen in sub-Saharan Africa.

Traditional religions still hold sway in much of rural Mozambique, especially in the northern two-thirds of the country. During the 20th century, a variety of revivalist movements appeared in response to the white culture. One prophetic group arose among the Hlengwe around 1913. It was built around belief in Mwirimi, the Supreme Being, who was believed to possess prophetic leadership. The movement included a campaign to rid the area of malevolent magic, tobacco smoke being the magical agent utilized. As the movement gained strength, the Portuguese moved to suppress it.

Islam came to Mozambique in the 10th century with the establishment of the city of Sofala. During the next centuries, the coastal region was controlled by representatives of the sultan in Zanzibar. To this day, many people who reside in the coastal area and along the Zambesi River are Muslim. In the 19th century, a new wave of Muslim belief entered the area. The Yao people, who operated as traders between Lake Malawi and the Muslim coastlands south of Zanzibar in Tanzania, converted to Islam. Today the Yao and related ethnic groups (including the Makua and the Makonde, the last hold-outs against the Portuguese pacification of the country) include some eight million people in Mozambique and neighboring Malawi and Tanzania.

Most Yao people are Sunni Muslims of the Shafaiite School, but there are also three other distinct factions of Muslims. The Sufis in Mozambique retain the Islam that was adopted at the time the Yao originally converted. They have kept many traditional rituals, over which Islamic practice has been added. They practice a form of Sufi worship called the dhikr (remembrance of God), which among the Yao includes a circle dance designed to produce an ecstatic state. A second group, the Sukutis (the quiet), rejected the dhikr. They are closer to the Sunnis but, like the Sufis, do not place a great emphasis on studying the Koran or on Islamic law. Finally, the Sunni community has in the last generation experienced a new wave of reform generated by teachers from Kuwait. They have emphasized orthodoxy and the study of Arabic, the Koran, and Islamic law. They reject all practices not sanctioned by the Koran.

Christianity was introduced to Mozambique by the Dominicans in 1506. They were later assisted by the Jesuits and Augustinians in building the Roman Catholic Church in Mozambique. They concentrated their efforts along the southern coast and in the Zambesi River valley. It was not until the end of the 19th century that stable work was established north of the Save River and began to penetrate inland, and in spite of the long history of Roman Catholicism, a bishopric was not established until the 20th century. The process of placing priests in all parts of the country was not completed until the 1930s. However, today, the Roman Catholic Church is the largest Christian group in Mozambique. It is organized into three archdioceses and nine dioceses.

Protestant Christianity was introduced by missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (Congregationalists) in 1881, but the Board eventually decided to relocate its missionaries elsewhere. In the meantime, as a result of the Berlin Treaty of 1885, authorities became more open to admitting non-Catholic missionary personnel. Bishop William Taylor (1821–1902) of the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) moved to secure the Congregationalist stations in 1889 and 1890, making them into the beachhead for a new missionary thrust. Originally attached to the Congo Mission, this work became a mission conference in 1920 and an annual conference in 1954. It remains a part of the United Methodist Church.

During the 1880s, the Episcopal Methodists were joined by missionaries from the Free Methodist Church of North America, the Methodist Church, Great Britain, and the Swiss Reformed Church. In the 1890s, Anglican missionaries of the Church of England visited the Yao people in northeast Mozambique and established work in 1893. Of the minority of Yao who have not accepted Islam today, many are Anglican.

The Anglican work is now a diocese of the Church in the Province of South Africa.

After World War I, a host of European and North American churches initiated work in Mozambique. The Free Baptist Union (based in Sweden) entered southern Mozambique in 1921. Its work grew and prospered, and in 1968 it was in place to absorb the work originally begun by the Church of Scotland in northern Mozambique. That work has passed through several hands and eventually came under the direction of the

Mozambique

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,610,000	11,925,000	52.7	2.92	16,819,000	23,349,000
Roman Catholics	1,553,000	5,100,000	22.5	3.71	7,550,000	11,000,000
Independents	54,300	3,050,000	13.5	1.41	4,000,000	5,000,000
Protestants	378,000	2,800,000	12.4	3.46	3,900,000	5,600,000
Ethnoreligionists	5,925,000	6,690,000	29.6	1.42	6,780,000	8,370,000
Muslims	900,000	3,870,000	17.1	3.01	5,100,000	7,000,000
Agnostics	5,000	90,000	0.4	2.07	150,000	250,000
Hindus	6,500	36,000	0.2	2.45	50,000	80,000
Atheists	0	20,000	0.1	2.19	50,000	60,000
Baha'is	1,000	3,700	0.0	2.45	5,000	7,500
Jews	200	200	0.0	2.41	200	200
Total population	9,448,000	22,635,000	100.0	2.45	28,954,000	39,117,000

South Africa General Mission (SAGM, now known as the Africa Evangelical Fellowship). The government moved to close the mission and refused entry to SAGM missionaries. Thus, the Swedish Baptists came to oversee the northern missions. The resultant United Baptist Church faced a rough period during the civil war, but in the 1990s it had an explosive growth. It is now the largest Protestant church in the country, with some 4 million adherents.

Among the larger Protestant groups as the 20th century came to a close were the Presbyterian Church of Mozambique, the Full Gospel Church of God (Igreja do Evangelho Completo de Deus), which resulted from several Pentecostal efforts, and the Jehovah's Witnesses. Protestant Christians associate with each other across denominational lines through the Christian Council of Mozambique, an affiliate of the World Council of Churches. Conservative Protestants are associated in the Associação Evangélica de Moçambique, which is related to the World Evangelical Alliance.

Neither the Portuguese colonial government nor the Marxist government of independent Mozambique was supportive of African Initiated Churches. Nonetheless, more than 100 indigenous, African-led churches and movements have appeared in Mozambique. Many, including the African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange and the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa, originated in neighboring countries. The African Portuguese Church was the first Mozambique-founded Christian church.

Jews began to enter Mozambique at the end of the 19th century. Though split between Sephardic and Ashkenazi, they were able to build a small synagogue in 1926. But they were never able to hire a rabbi. Following independence in 1975, most Jews left the country. The synagogue was confiscated and turned into a warehouse, and organized Jewish life in Mozambique was abandoned. Then, in 1989, a local non-Jewish businessman organized a campaign for the return of the synagogue to the city, with the idea that it would become a monument to the former Jewish community. Instead it became the start of a revival of services among the small group of Jews remaining in the country.

During the 1990s, Mozambique became the scene of a unique adventure by the World Plan Executive Council, the organization established by the Maharishi Melesh Yogi for the saturation of the world with Transcendental Meditation (TM). Following the general peace agreement of 1992, Dutch representatives of the council offered TM to the new Mozambique government as a means of bringing order and quelling future conflict. Initially, TM was taught to various military personnel as the start of an attempt to produce the "Maharishi Effect," which is believed to occur when a critical mass of meditators is reached, a number high enough to radiate peace and harmony throughout the nation. The country's president, Alberto Joaquim Chissano (b. 1939), discovered TM in 1992 and continues to meditate twice daily. As of 2002, he remains an avid supporter of the program, which he holds up as a “non-religious” activity and hence an appropriate program for government support. He authorized the creation of the Prevention [of War] Wing of the military, and beginning in 1994, all military and police recruits were ordered to meditate for 20 minutes, twice a day. In 2001, for reasons not altogether clear, government support for TM was withdrawn, and it is no longer compulsory within the army, though a number of people continue to meditate.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Apostolic Church of Johane Marange; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of England; Church of Scotland; Dominicans; Free Methodist Church of North America; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Methodist Church, Great Britain; Presbyterian Church of Mozambique; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam; United Baptist Church; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Azevedo, Mario. Historical Dictionary of Mozambique. Methuen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2004.
- Garcia, A. Historia de Moçambique cristão. Lourenço Marques: Diario Grafica, 1969.
- Harries, Patrick. “Christianity in Black and White: The Establishment of Protestant Churches in Southern Mozambique.” Lusotopie (1998): 317–333. <http://www.lusotopie.sciences-pobordeaux.fr/harries.pdf>. Accessed March 1, 2009.
- Ndege, George O. Culture and Customs of Mozambique. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.
- Thorold, Alan. “Metamorphoses of the Yao Muslims.” In Muslim Identity and Social Change in Sub-Saharan Africa, edited by Louis Benner. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.
- West, Harry M. Kupilikula: Governance and the Invisible Realm in Mozambique. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006.

Mudras

The term mudra derives from a set of words in ancient India that carried ideas of authority, the imprint left from a seal, and the way of holding the fingers. The meaning evolved to designate hand gestures or positions that enhance the spoken word and convey a mystical or occult meaning. In Hindu paintings and statues, the deities are pictured with what appears to the observer with unusual or strained hand gestures, some as if a movement has been caught in the middle, at other times with fingers entwined in a complicated pattern.

Mudras are used quite commonly in Hindu pujas. In creating mudras, each finger has been assigned a relationship to one of the five classical elements: thumb, agni/fire; forefinger, vayu/air; middle finger, akash/ether; ring finger, prithvi/earth; little finger, jal/water. Mudras are further classified as Aasanyukta (single-handed mudras) or Sawyakta (double-handed).

The oft-seen abhaya, or fearlessness gesture, is a good example of an Aasanyukta mudra. It is made simply by lifting the right hand to shoulder height with the palm open and face forward. It represents benevolence, the absence of fear, and the granting of protection. The pankaj, or potus, mudra is a simple Sawyakta mudra. The two hands are brought together in such a way that the fingers are separated and pointed upward, with the two thumbs and the two little fingers touching each other. The person making the symbol is, like the lotus that is detached from the mud below it, detached from the world while in meditation. The pankaj mudra also emphasizes the fire and water elements represented by the thumb and little finger.

Within Buddhism mudras have become marks of identity of the deity being personified. Thus in statuary and paintings, the different Buddhas and bodhisattvas can often be identified, amid dozens of very similar representations, by the mudra she or he assumes. Within Vajrayana, or Esoteric, Buddhism, these mudras are symbolic of various aspects of Esoteric reality. Mudras are designed to evoke both meaning and power among those who understand their significance.

Of the many mudras, five have become central to the presentation of images of the Buddha and bodhisattvas. The dharmachakra mudra, for example, recalls the Buddha's first sermon at Sanath. Both hands are pictured with the thumb and forefinger touching to form a circle (the Wheel of the Dharma), and the three remaining fingers extended, to which additional meaning is ascribed. The bhumisparsha mudra recalls the Buddha's enlightenment, with the right hand touching the Earth and the left hand placed flat in the lap. The varada mudra, emphasizing the Buddha's charity and compassion, shows the left hand, palm up and fingers extended. The dhyana mudra is made with the left hand placed in the lap, a symbol of wisdom (a feminine virtue). Various symbolic objects may then be placed in the open palm. The abhaya mudra, usually pictured with a standing figure, shows the right hand raised and the palm facing outward. The left hand is at the side of the body, often with the palm also facing outward.

Standing Buddha statue, Penang, Malaysia, with hands showing mudras. (J. Gordon Melton)

In Esoteric Buddhism, the five Dhyani Buddhas are central deity figures. They are not thought of as historical figures who have reached enlightenment, but are transcendent beings symbolizing universal principles. Each Dhyani Buddha is associated with a spectrum of attributes and symbols. Each one, for example, represents one of the five basic wisdoms, and thus each one can transform one of the five deadly poisons into one of the wisdoms. When pictured in Tibetan iconography, the five Buddhas are commonly shown sitting cross-legged in the meditative position and at first glance appear to be exactly the same, especially in statuary where the colors that often distinguish the five Buddhas have been lost. What really distinguishes the five Buddhas, however, are the mudras; each one is always shown with one of the basic mudras traditionally identified with the wisdom they embody. The Buddhas and the mudras they demonstrate are: Vairocana, dharmachakra or wheel-turning mudra; Akshobhya, bhumisparsha or witness mudra; Ratnasambhava, varada or charity mudra; Amitabha, dhyana mudra; and Amogasiddha, abhaya or fearlessness mudra. The most ubiquitous bodhisattva in Asia is Guan Yin (aka Avalokitesvara) who will be shown with a range of mudras or their variations. In one form of the 1,000-armed Guan Yin, each hand is arranged to show a different mudra.

Those who understand mudras will recognize that the Zen Buddhist practitioner while engaged in zazen, or sitting meditation, places her or his hands in what is known as the cosmic mudra. One hand rests on top of the other, with palms open and up. The joints of the two middle fingers rest on top of the other, and the tips of the thumbs are touching lightly.

In Esoteric Buddhist practice, unique hand positions indicate to the faithful the nature and the function of the deities, Buddhas, and bodhisattvas on which they gaze. Mudras thus symbolize divine manifestation. Teachers use them in rituals and spiritual exercises as aids to the invocation of the deity. When understood in its magical context, the use of mudras by the practitioner facilitates the flow of the invisible forces within the earthly sphere. Some hypothesize that the sequence of hand postures that manifest in ritual contexts may stand behind their entry and evolution in Indian Classical dance. Esoteric Buddhists see mudras as physical movements that alter perception and deepen awareness. Their use can assist the awakening of the chakras (energy centers believed to exist along the spine) and the flow of kundalini (the energy that travels along the spine and accompanying enlightenment).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Guan Yin's Birthday; Meditation; Sarnath; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Bunce, Frederick W. Mudras in Buddhist and Hindu Practices: An Iconographic Consideration. New Delhi: D. K. Printworld, Pvt. Ltd., 2005.
- Chandra, Lokesh. Mudras in Japan. Vedam eBooks, 2001.
- De Kleen, Tyra. Mudras: The Ritual Hand-poses of the Buddha Priests and the Shiva Priests of Bali. 1924; rpt.: New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1970.
- Hirschi, Gertrud. Mudras: Yoga in Your Hands. Weirs Bach, ME: Weiser Books, 2000.
- "Mudra." Mystical Myth. http://www.bellaterreno.com/art/a_religion/buddhism/buddhist_mudra.aspx. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Saunders, E. Dale. Mudra: A Study of Symbolic Gestures in Japanese Buddhist Sculpture. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1960.
- Thrunpa, Chogyam. Mudras. Berkeley: Shambhala, 1972.

Muhammad

ca. 570–632

The Prophet of Islam, Muhammad, is regarded by Muslims as the final prophet bringing God's most complete revelation to humanity. His life was apparently full of military as well as spiritual success, and he established Islam on solid foundations from which it was to rapidly become one of the world's major religions. His life and character are taken to be exemplary for Muslims, although he is not in any way regarded as anything more than a human being. It is a central claim of Islam that he did not write the Koran, but merely received it and passed on that revelation to the local community in Arabia, from which it spread throughout the world. He was also a remarkably astute political leader, creating a highly effective military force and a strong society in an environment in which initially he experienced much hostility.

The prophet Muhammad is depicted in this painting from the Tomb of Harun in Isfahan, Iran. (Art Directors.co.uk/ Ark Religion.com/StockphotoPro)

Muhammad is generally accepted to have been born around 570 CE, to a mother who died soon after his birth; his father had died earlier. He was raised by a grandfather and later his uncle Abu Talib. In the traditional Muslim accounts he is said to have visited Syria twice as a trader with Abu Talib and his commercial background was also emphasized by his marriage around 595 to Khadija, a female trader. The archangel Gabriel (Jibril) is said to have visited Muhammad on Mount Hira near Mecca on the 17th night of Ramadan in 610 and sura 96 is taken to have been the very first revelation from God. He is described in the Koran as illiterate and so should never be accused of having written the Book. He did not immediately begin to communicate God's message to the Meccans; there was a pause of three years, and the early reception was not favorable, although he did acquire some supporters.

The attack on idolatry struck at the heart of the main business of Mecca, which was to support the tribal and religious practices in the area that were thoroughly polytheistic at that time. Muhammad came in for much abuse. In 620 we are told that Muhammad was taken to Jerusalem by Jibril on the back of Buraq, a winged horse, and from there was taken up into the heavens where he met some earlier messengers. Two years later he left for Yathrib, later called Medina, which was less hostile than his hometown, and here he forged the first state based on Islam, increasingly distinguishing itself from Judaism and Christianity as the local Jews and Christians apparently resisted the message of Islam. For eight years Muhammad was involved in protracted military campaigns with the Meccans, and he seems to have been an impressive military commander, not unwilling on occasion such as the War of the Trench in 626–627 to take ruthless measures against his opponents. He also conducted raids to the north before returning in triumph to Mecca in 628 and capturing territory in the wider area also.

In 629 Muhammad made a pilgrimage to Mecca and appears to have won over his clan, taking control of the city the next year and destroying the idols in the Kaaba, the main shrine in Mecca. His final pilgrimage was in 632, after which he returned to Medina, where he died and was buried. The evidence for the historical account that has been given here is entirely based on Islamic sources, and the hadith, the reported statements of the Prophet and his Companions, widen this account to include various miracles and extraordinary events that are absent from the Koran, the revelation that Muhammad was to deliver to the Arabs and ultimately to the whole of humanity. In the Koran he is named at the seal of the prophets (33:40), as the last prophet, the heir of Jesus (61:6) and Moses (46:10), and the symbol of divine mercy (9:61 and in many other places).

His character is said to have been mild and patient, but he does not appear in the Koran to be perfect, as later on his followers took him to be. Some of the references to him in the Koran seem to describe arrangements designed for his convenience, as when he is allowed to marry women who would ordinarily not be available to him or when people are told not to visit him before mealtimes and are advised not to linger afterward. Muhammad has served as the great exemplar of how Muslims should live, down to how they should perform their ablutions, what they should eat, how their beards should be cut, and the statements he made that have been collected in the hadith have acquired a powerful status in many forms of Islam. In Shia Islam the idea that the family of the Prophet has a special status became canonical, leading to the divide between those who believed that the ruler could be anyone selected by appropriate processes, the Sunni, while the party of Ali, shi-at Ali, argued that only someone related to the Prophet and his descendants could legitimately rule, instancing first Ali, his cousin and son-in-law.

In just the same way that Muslims have a very high regard for the Prophet, the detractors of Islam are critical of him, citing his apparent enthusiasm for conflict and conquest, and pouring scorn on his claims to have received a revelation. In earlier centuries he was often depicted as especially evil, or mad, and in later centuries criticized for his heavy involvement in military campaigns and bloodshed, by contrast with Jesus. It is difficult to know precisely what form his life took since there is no evidence apart from what is found in the religious accounts provided in Islamic tradition. He certainly appears to have been a forceful political leader, while at the same time capable of energizing a society that was wedded to ideas of which he disapproved.

Oliver Leaman

See also: Ali ibn Abi Talib; Jerusalem; Masjid al-Ḥaram, Al-; Mecca; Medina; Moses; Shia Islam.

References

- Cook, Michael. Muhammad. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Motzki, Harald, ed. The Biography of Muhammad: The Issue of the Sources. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000.
- Peters, F. E. Muhammad and the Origins of Islam. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Ramadan, Tariq. In the Footsteps of the Prophet: Lessons from the Life of Muhammad. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Rubin, Uri., ed. The Life of Muhammad. Aldershot: Ashgate, 1998.

Watt, W. Montgomery. Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman. London: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships

The Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships (Mülheim Bewegung), the original Pentecostal association in Germany, traces its beginning to a series of meetings held in Kassel in 1907. The meetings were facilitated by two women who had come to Germany from a Pentecostal revival in Norway, led by Thomas B. Barratt (1862–1940). The revival centered on participants' reception of the Pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit and the manifestation of the gifts of the Spirit (as mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12), such as prophecy, healing, and speaking in tongues. The local evangelical (Lutheran) leader, Heinrich Dallmeyer, at first tried to work with the group but later rejected the manifestation of the gifts as diabolical. Observation of the Pentecostals over the next year led a number of other evangelical leaders to reject the new movement as well, some refusing to accept the highly charged emotional nature of the meetings, others focusing on theological differences.

One major concern was the "Methodist" theology assumed by the Pentecostals, who taught an approach to salvation that included three stages: justification (the making right of a believer before God), followed by sanctification (the believer becoming holy in the sight of God), and the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Lutheran theology assumes that justification and sanctification occur at the moment of faith, and Lutherans had no theology to account for a subsequent baptism of the Holy Spirit. In 1909 a group of evangelical leaders issued the Berlin Declaration, a strong denunciation of the new movement.

The declaration slowed but did not stop the spread of Pentecostalism, and Free church congregations arose over the next years. Among the ministers who emerged as leaders were Eugen Edel, Jonathan Paul, Emil Humburg, and A. Frieme. Though the churches originally attempted to remain a spiritual movement that influenced life in both the established church and the various Protestant Free churches, many of the churches came together in 1913 to form the Mülheim Association, which in stages emerged as a separate church body.

The Mülheim Association is not only the oldest but also the largest Pentecostal body in Germany. It also developed somewhat independently of the Pentecostal movement in the English-speaking world. For example, it rejected one of the major doctrinal foundations of Pentecostalism, which tied the baptism of the Holy Spirit to the visible evidence of speaking in tongues. The movement was also open to contemporary approaches to biblical scholarship and tried to reconcile with Reformation theology. As such, prior to the Charismatic revival in the 1970s, it often found itself at odds with the larger international movement.

The Mülheim Association survived the Nazi era and the division of Germany following the war. Today it is headquartered in Niedenstein, Germany. The Association has been in decline, and by the end of the 1990s it reported 3,180 members.

Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships
Hauptstrasse 36, D-34305
Niedenstein
Germany

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church in Germany; Pentecostalism.

References

- Burgess, Stanley M., and Eduard van der Maas, eds. The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.
- Eggenberger, Oswald. Die Kirchen Sondergruppen und religiösen Vereinigungen. Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1994.
- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostals: The Charismatic Movement in the Church. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1972.

Muridīyya

Muridīyya is the Arabic version of the name of a Muslim brotherhood or Sufi order (Arabic: tariqa) that was Muslim pilgrims gather at the Grand Mosque of Touba in Senegal for prayers. Thousands of disciples of the Muslim Muridiyya brotherhood visit Touba as part of the annual Magal pilgrimage in the holiest week of the Muridiyya calendar, commemorating the 110th anniversary of the departure into exile of their spiritual guide Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba. (© Pierre Holtz/epa/Corbis) founded toward the end of the 19th century by the charismatic Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba (ca. 1853–1927) in Senegal (West Africa). In French, the official language of Senegal, the order is known as Mouridisme, and in English the followers of this Sufi order are referred to as Mourides. The basic meaning of the Arabic word murid from which these terms are derived is aspirant, that is, one who seeks after progress on the mystical path of Islam.

Probably no Muslim community in sub-Saharan Africa has been the subject of more attention, both academic and non-academic, than the Muridiyya. This seems to be one of the reasons why their importance and influence tend to be exaggerated. Although reliable statistical data is not available, it is likely that about one-third of the Muslim population in Senegal can be counted as followers of Bamba. We can thus estimate the membership of the Muridiyya at about three million in 2001. Outside Senegal, the Muridiyya has recruited few followers. However, Senegalese Mourides can now be found in many francophone African countries and in countries of the Middle East. Since the 1970s, they have established important diaspora communities in Europe, particularly in Italy, France, and Spain, and in the United States, most notably in New York and Chicago. The influence of Ahmadou Bamba has been further extended by the efforts of additional teachers such as Sheikh Abdoulaye Dieye, who founded the independent Islamic Society of Mourids of Reunion, from whence he has built an international following.

The life of Ahmadou Bamba is surrounded by countless legends that remain tremendously popular among Senegalese Muslims. Some of these legends have found their way into modern Senegalese literature, popular music, and arts such as glass painting. Bamba can in fact be described as a national saint of Senegal, and his portrait can be seen on the walls of shops and private houses all over the country. It is possible to distinguish four phases in the development of the Muridiyya: the founding years (ca. 1880–1912), the transition from rejection to acceptance of colonial rule (1912–1927), the cooperation with two successive political regimes and the expansion of peanut cultivation (1927–1970), and finally, the shift from agriculture to modern business and the establishment of diaspora communities around the world (ca. 1970 to the present).

Bamba emerged as a religious leader after the death in 1882 of his father—a religious scholar, teacher, and advisor to a local ruler. In 1887, he founded the village of Touba in the region of Baol, which later became the capital of the Muridiyya. At that time, he had not yet established his own Sufi order, but practiced the recitation formulas (awrad, singular wird) of other orders, such as the Qadiriyya, the Shadhiliyya, and the Tijaniyya.

Around the same time, the French succeeded in destroying the local kingdoms of the Wolof, the primary ethnic group in Senegal. In this situation, Bamba's mysticism became the rallying point for a rapidly increasing number of followers, mostly of Wolof origin. As members of the former ruling elite and the warrior class were part of Bamba's entourage, Bamba himself came under suspicion of being the possible leader of an anti-colonial revolt. As a result, he was exiled in 1895. Bamba spent seven years in Gabon and, after a brief stay in Senegal, another four years in Mauritania. He returned to Senegal in 1907.

The exile of Bamba did not lead to a decrease in the number of his followers, as the French had hoped. Nevertheless, from about 1910 on, relations between the Muridīyya and the French gradually improved. Bamba repeatedly declared his loyalty to the French cause and urged his followers to obey the orders of the administration. During World War I, Bamba recruited 500 soldiers from among his disciples, and these were sent to Europe in order to fight for the French army. However, Bamba was never permitted to live in Touba again. When he died in 1927, the administration gave permission to bury him at Touba, where his tomb became the destination of an annual pilgrimage.

After the death of Ahmadou Bamba, his eldest son took over the leadership of the Muridīyya, at that time numbering about 100,000 people, most of them Wolof. Up to the present day, the brotherhood's supreme leader (called the Khalife général) is one of Bamba's two surviving sons. Under this new leadership the Muridīyya continued to expand rapidly into the so-called new territories, that is, into hitherto uncultivated areas of the Senegalese hinterland. New rural communities were established in these areas, and the members of these communities committed themselves to the cultivation of peanuts. The severe drought in the early 1970s and the later dramatic drop in the price of peanuts occasioned the move of many followers into the urban centers of Senegal, where they set up business enterprises in the modern sector, some migrating to Europe and the United States.

The doctrine of the Muridīyya does not essentially deviate from what might be called standard Islamic mysticism, although a difference has been noted between the "official" doctrine and its popular interpretation. The former stresses compliance with the Islamic norms related to prayer, fasting, and so on and emphasizes the necessity of a "spiritual education" that in turn is based on the disciple's total obedience and submission to his master. The Muridīyya also assign a central role to the Prophet Muhammad. On several occasions, Bamba claimed to have had an encounter with the Prophet, who Sufis usually believe can still appear and talk to whomever he wishes. According to Muridīyya hagiography, the first of these encounters took place in 1893. After that time, Bamba stopped practicing the liturgy (wird) of the other Sufi orders and began to present himself as the "servant of the Prophet." For the Muridīyya, this encounter meant that Bamba had acceded to the position of the supreme Muslim saint (qutb al-aqtâb).

In popular imagery, the position of Bamba as the supreme qutb gave rise to the belief that Bamba and his living representatives can guarantee success in this world and salvation in the hereafter. Moreover, the members of a group within the Muridīyya known as Baye Fall hold that they will go to paradise only on account of their total commitment to their spiritual master, without needing to comply with the ritual norms of Islam. This commitment usually takes the form of work for a Muridīyya leader, be it in the peanut fields or in a modern profession. The Baye Fall justify their conduct by pointing to the alleged sayings of Bamba, including "Work is prayer," and "Work for me, then I will pray for you." Indeed, the extraordinary spiritual value attached to physical work—not only by the Baye Fall, but also by many other followers—is perhaps the most peculiar feature of Muridīyya doctrine.

A spectacular event in Muridīyya community life is the annual pilgrimage (magal) to the Holy City of Touba, which is a kind of state within a state and during the 1990s developed into one of the biggest Senegalese cities. In recent years, the magal has brought together some two million people—including some of Senegal's most prominent politicians—who exalt the memory of Ahmadou Bamba. Another distinctive practice of the Muridīyya relates to ritual: the Mourides regularly meet in groups to recite Bamba's religious poetry, known as khassaites (from Arabic qasa'id, singular qasida, poem). Some of this poetry is in praise of the Prophet Muhammad, and other poems can be described as vulgarizations of mystical teachings.

Muridīyya Headquarters

c/o Son Excellence le Khalife Général de Mourides

Touba
Senegal
http://touba-internet.com/top_contacts.htm (in French) <http://www.toubaislam.org/> (in French and English)
Ruediger Seesemann

See also: Islam; Muhammad; Shadhiliyya Sufi Order; Sufism; Tijaniyya.

References

- Bamba, Ahmadou. Dîwân fi l-'ulûm ad-dîniyya. Recueil des poèmes en sciences religieuses. 2 vols. Casablanca: Dar el Kitab, 1989.
- Bamba, Ahmadou. Les itinéraires du Paradis. Trans. Serigne Sam Mbaye. Casablanca: Dar el Kitab, 1984.
- Cruise O'Brien, Donal B. The Mourides of Senegal. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.
- Dieye, Sheikh Abdoulaye. Ocean of Wisdom. St. Louis, Réunion: Islamic Society of Mourids of Reunion, n.d.
- Dumont, Fernand. La pensée religieuse d'Amadou Bamba. Dakar: Nouvelles Editions Africaines, 1975.
- Mbacké, Serigne Bachir. Les bienfaits de l'Eternel ou la biographie de Cheick Ahmadou Bamba Mbacké. Trans. Khadim Mbacké. Dakar: Imp. Saint-Paul, 1995.
- Schmidt di Friedberg, Ottavia. Islam, solidarietà e lavoro. I muridi senegalesi in Italia. Torino, Italy: Ed. della Fondazione Giovanni Agnelli, 1994.
- Seeseman, Rüdiger. Ahmadu Bamba und die Entstehung der Murîdiyya. Berlin: Schwarz, 1993.

Musama Disco Christo Church

The Musama Disco Christo Church (MDCC) is one of the spiritual churches in Ghana. In 1919 Prophet Jemisemiham Jehu-Appiah (1893–1948), born Joseph W. E. Appiah, a former Methodist preacher and schoolteacher, had a vision of three angels who sent him on a mission. He was filled with the Spirit and began to perform miracles, establishing the Faith Society with the assistance of a woman named Abena Bawa, whom he renamed Hannah Barnes. This prayer and Bible study group within Methodism became distinguished by its practice of prophecy, healing, and speaking in tongues. In 1922 the group's members were dismissed from the Methodist Church, Ghana, for alleged "occult practices."

Appiah and Barnes then founded the Musama Disco Christo Church (Army of the Cross of Christ), a name given by heavenly revelation. They established the holy city of Mozano (my [God's] town), which Appiah was given by the local chief to develop his own settlement. Appiah based his complex church organization on the traditional Fanti court and became the Akaboha I. Hannah Barnes, the Akatitibi (queen mother), was taken up into heaven and given instructions, including the revelation that she would marry Akaboha I, which she did after the prophet received a similar revelation. The movement spread and Akaboha I gave new heavenly names—each one unique and never repeated—to the thousands who joined, a practice that continues today. Members speak a special language in greeting and wear distinctive copper rings and crosses. Akaboha I died in 1948 and was succeeded by his son Matapoly Moses Jehu-Appiah (1924–1972), who was credited with a miraculous birth and became Akaboha II. In 1951 a new holy city, New Mozano, was established.

The MDCC is noted for its ban on ancestor rituals and its use of medicines. It has an elaborate system of angels, whose names are to be mentioned in prayer. The MDCC has complex rituals, involving several sacred objects, including an ark of the covenant in a holy shrine that only the Akaboha and senior ministers can enter to offer prayers and make petitions. The church has other sacred places and fast days, and its rituals involve sacrificial animals, candles, incense, rosaries, and elaborate ceremonial gowns. Healing rituals include the use of anointing oil and holy water. The office of the Akaboha, who is also called the General Head Prophet, is hereditary in the Jehu-Appiah family, and the Akaboha has both spiritual and political duties. On the death of Akaboha II in 1972, his eldest son Prophet Miritaiah Jonah Jehu-Appiah became Akaboha III. Another son of Akaboha II, Jerisdan Jehu-Appiah, has established the MDCC in Britain.

The MDCC, together with the Twelve Apostles and the African Faith Tabernacle, are the largest of the spiritual churches in Ghana, with about 125,000 affiliates each in 1990.

Musama Disco Christo Church
c/o Mozano
PO Box 11
Gomoa Eshiem
Ghana

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Methodist Church, Ghana.

References

- Ayegboyin, Deji, and S. Ademola Ishola. African Indigenous Churches: An Historical Perspective. Lagos, Nigeria: Greater Heights Publications, 1997.
- Bakta, G. C. Prophetism in Ghana: A Study of Some 'Spiritual' Churches. London: SCM, 1962.
- Jehu-Appiah, Jemisemiham. The History of the Musama Disco Christo Church. Koforidua, Ghana: Fanzar Press, 1939. Trans. Jerisdan H. Jehu-Appiah, 1998.

Muslim Brotherhood

The Muslim Brotherhood, al-Ikhwan al-Moslemoon, is one of the most important movements of contemporary Islamism, the revival of ultraconservative Islam with the aim of re-creating governments ruled by Islamic law throughout the Middle East. The Brotherhood was founded as a youth movement in 1928 in Egypt. Its founder, Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949), was a Muslim cleric concerned about the current drift of the Islamic public away from what he saw as Orthodox belief and practice, and he wanted to woo the next generation to the traditional Muslim way as defined in the Koran, the Muslim holy book, and the hadith, the accounts of the Prophet Muhammad and his companions. Both are considered the authorities for the formation of a Muslim lifestyle.

The call for a return to the Koran appealed to many Muslims, and the Brotherhood built a large base nationally. In the 1930s, however, it began to focus more clearly on political issues, in part occasioned by the pullout of British forces from Palestine and the resulting conflict between Jewish settlers, many advocating a Jewish homeland, and Muslim Palestinians. The Brotherhood openly favored the Palestinian cause. The situation in Palestine called attention to the weakness of the Egyptian government, which was heavily influenced by Great Britain.

By the end of the 1930s, al-Banna had outlined a program for the Brotherhood summarized in “The Twenty Principles for Understanding Islam,” which was included in his book The Message of the Teachings. According to al-Banna, Islam speaks to all of the spheres of life; from personal conduct to the running of government and the business world, the basics are plainly laid out in the Koran and hadith. Recognition of Allah’s existence is the primary attribute of the Muslim. Everything that has been introduced into the community that is without a base in the Koran or hadith should be abandoned, especially the popular practices of folk magic. Further, the divisions of the four Sunni legal schools are considered relatively unimportant, and wasting time on minor legal matters should be discontinued. And, most important, from belief comes action, for although good intentions are important, they must generate righteous deeds.

As part of its program, the Brotherhood became involved on a more clandestine level in the conflict between Palestinians and the new Jewish settlements in Palestine that escalated after the formation of the nation of Israel. In 1948 members of the Brotherhood joined the forces that attempted to block Israel’s stabilization. Meanwhile, in Egypt, it attempted to change the government by assassinating various officials, including one prime minister. The violence in Egypt came back on the Brotherhood in 1949 when al-Banna was himself assassinated.

The death of al-Banna set the context for the rise of Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966). Qutb was in the United States when al-Banna was killed, but upon his return to Egypt he devoted his life to the Brotherhood cause, having integrated the ideas of al-Banna with those of Indian Muslim leader Sayyid Abul A’la Mawdudi (1903–1979), founder of Jamaat-e-Islam. Mawdudi had projected the ideal image of a state administered by Muslims who adhere to the Koran and hadith and who would enforce Islamic law upon the land. Likewise, Muslim Brotherhood leaders mark the centenary of Imam Hassan al-Banna. Banna founded the Muslim Brotherhood movement in Egypt in 1928. (© Jamal Nasrallah/epa/Corbis)

Qutb looked for nothing less than a total reformation of Egyptian government and society.

Qutb became the chief editor of the Muslim Brotherhood's periodical and authored the first books that represented this new perspective, built around al-Banna's theme of Islam as a complete way of life. In 1954, Gamal Abd an-Nasser (1918–1970) led the coup that overthrew the Egyptian government, but rather than move toward an Islamic regime, he declared a Socialist and nationalist government. He also had been the victim of a failed assassination attempt by the Brotherhood, and soon after assuming the presidency he moved to crush them. He was additionally motivated by the fact that the Brotherhood was the one significant political force that could oppose his plans for a new Egypt. Included in the mass arrests that ensued was Qutb, who would spend the next decade in jail. While in jail, he penned his major work, published soon after he was released. In Ma'alim fi al-tariq (later translated into English as Milestones), he condemned the Nasser government as essentially un-Islamic and laid the foundation for the broad program of reform since advocated by the Brotherhood. Based upon his reading of the book, Nasser again moved against the surviving remnants of the Brotherhood. The top leaders, including Qutb, were arrested and executed.

In Milestones, Qutb explained the need for Muslim opposition to Western decadence, symbolized most clearly in the West's moral turpitude, its merchandising of women and sex, and its racism. One sign of Egypt's problem, he wrote, was the influx of Western degeneracy. More important, Qutb merged Mawdudi's call for an Islamic revolution with a Leninist approach, calling for an Islamic vanguard to organize and overthrow the un-Islamic political powers. Although stopping short of explicitly calling for the use of force and violence to implement his program, he provided a platform by which the use of violence could be justified.

In Egypt, the presidency of Anwar Sadat (1971–1981) created hope. He released all the remaining Brotherhood prisoners and promised to implement Islamic law in Egypt. The Brotherhood in turn pledged to renounce violence. Sadat's public movement away from many of Nasser's policies somewhat concealed his own attempt to create a middle ground between the visions for Egypt of Nasser, on the one hand, and of Qutb, on the other. The Brotherhood's support of Sadat ended with the Camp David Accords and peace with Israel in 1979. A variety of militant factions emerged, including one named Islamic Jihad, accused of Sadat's assassination two years later.

Eventually, after renouncing violence, the Brotherhood was allowed to become active again as a popular religious movement. It also integrated itself into the Egyptian government as a conservative Islamic political party. Although the writings of al-Banna and Qutb continue to inspire its members, the elements of its most radical past appear to have been largely inherited by other newer groups, not the least of which is al-Qaeda, the movement led by Saudi Arabian terrorist Osama bin Laden (b. 1957). Bin Laden's primary contact with the Brotherhood has come from his association with leaders of the Islamic Jihad, including Ayman Al-Zawahiri, who sits on al-Qaeda's Majlis-e Shura (consultative council), and other leaders like Abd al-Salam Faraj and Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, who contributed substantially to the Islamic perspective that bin Laden has come to hold, which legitimizes terrorist activity. Through the 1980s, Rahman carried the Brotherhood's banner, calling for an Egyptian state ruled by Islamic law. Under government pressure, he left Egypt and relocated to the United States. He is now in a U.S. prison after being convicted of charges related to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

In 1987 the Brotherhood supported the merger of several Egyptian political parties to form the Labour Islamic Alliance. Members of the Brotherhood won more than half of the Alliance's 60 seats in the national legislature, the People's Assembly, which has more than 400 members. However, in 1995, the Hosni Mubarak government again moved against the group on the grounds that it gave support to violence-prone militants. The government closed Brotherhood offices and confiscated its assets. In 1999, 20 of its most senior leaders were arrested, and as the 21st century begins its public presence in Egypt has come to an end.

At the same time, the Brotherhood claims to exist in more than 70 countries. People sympathetic to the Brotherhood in England maintain a website, <http://www.ikhwanweb.com/>. In other Middle Eastern countries, it has had very different histories. It has been most successful in Jordan, where since 1989 it has developed a political party, the Islamic Action Front, and has been very active in national politics under its spiritual leader Abdul Majeed Thneibat. The Syrian branch, on the other hand, was brutally suppressed by the Syrian army following its involvement in an insurrection in 1982. Some of its members were finally released from prison as part of the celebration of the Syrian president's 25th anniversary in power, but the group remains marginalized and suspect.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Islamism; Jamaat-e-Islam; Muhammad.

References

Esposito, John, ed. Voice of the Resurgent Islam. New York: Oxford University Press 1983

Lia, Brymjar. The Society of the Muslim Brothers in Egypt: The Rise of an Islamic Mass Movement, 1928–1942. Reading, UK: Ithaca Press, 1998.

Moussalli, Ahmad S. Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb. Syracuse, NY: University of Syracuse Press, 1994.

Qutb, Sayyid. Milestones. Beirut, Lebanon: The Holy Koran Publishing House, 1978.

Wiktorowicz, Quintan. The Management of Islamic Activism: Salafis, the Muslim Brotherhood, and State Power in Jordan. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.

Muslim World League

The Muslim World League was founded in 1962 as a relief organization working in several predominantly Muslim countries. However, over the years a secondary goal, that of advancing Muslim unity internationally, has come to dominate its program. The League has also devoted considerable time and energy to promoting Islam throughout the world and to defending Muslims, especially in those countries in which they are a minority.

The Muslim World League has its headquarters in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, in a building given by King Fahd bin Abdul Aziz (1923–2005), and the Saudi government continues to support the work of the League financially. That work is guided by a Constituent Council, composed of 62 members—all prominent scholars and thinkers from throughout the Muslim world. The executive branch of the Council, the Secretariat-General, is charged with implementing the Council's policies. The World Supreme Council of Mosques consists of 20 members representing various Muslim peoples and minority groups plus 30 additional members who seek the restoration of the mosque's role to what it was during the early days of Islam. The World Supreme Council also strives to gain freedom to propagate Islam in various countries of the world and to preserve Muslim religious endowments (charitable funds). The Islamic Jurisprudence Council is a group of scholars and jurists who study Islamic problems and attempt to suggest solutions based upon their study of the Koran, the Sunna, and the consensus of the Muslim scholarly community.

Among the more interesting structures associated with the League is the Commission on Scientific Signs in the Holy Qur'an and Sunna, which was suggested by the World Supreme Council of Mosques. This commission is a body of Islamic scholars who investigate and circulate information on the scientific and natural phenomena discussed in the Koran and Sunna in the light of modern science.

The League's headquarters and several of its national chapters sponsor websites. It has opened offices in more than 30 countries around the world, including both those in which Muslims predominate and those in which they are a minority. It publishes the weekly World Muslim League Journal.

Muslim World League
PO Box 537
Makkah al-Mukarramah (Mecca)
Saudi Arabia
<http://www.themwl.org/>

Gary Burlington

See also: Islam; World Muslim Congress.

Reference

Waines, David. An Introduction to Islam. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Mutima Walowa Wa Makumbi

Emilio Mulolani Chishimba (b. ca. 1921), a Zambian of Bemba ethnicity, founded the movement known as Mutima Walowa Wa Makumbi (Sweet Heart of the Clouds) in 1951. Sweet Heart represents the mystical experience of God available to believers through Chishimba. Clouds is a double reference to the barren spirituality of Europeans (that is, white, rainless clouds practicing a male-focused Christianity) in contrast to the fecund spirituality of Africans (that is, black, rain-bearing clouds practicing a balanced male/female Christianity).

In 1950, 14 years before Zambian independence, Chishimba, a Roman Catholic lay leader, received a revelation from the Virgin Mary. Her message, which revealed the selection of Chishimba as her representative on Earth, upheld God's androgynous nature and announced the Virgin's status as savior for Africa and her seniority over Jesus—revelator of God's male aspect and savior of Europeans—as well as the elevation of Africans over Europeans in world spiritual leadership. Chishimba rejected the bishops' authority, substituted a traditional Bemba meal for the Eucharist, and replaced gendered congregational seating with mixed-gender seating. He encouraged overnight worship gatherings, egalitarian relations between the sexes, and fasting leading to direct encounters with God. The Mutimas separated from the Roman Catholic Church in 1958.

Chishimba taught that a true relationship with God restores the innocence of Eden. He therefore promoted nude baptism. His church supported Simon Kapwepwe's (1922–1980) political message of African isolationism against the internationalism of Dr. Kenneth Kaunda's (b. 1924) postcolonial government. As a result of public outrage over nudity and government fears of internal stability, Chishimba's church was banned in the 1970s; believers were arrested and many followers defected. Chishimba dropped nude baptism but continues to teach its validity in principle. The church is still illegal in Zambia.

The story of Chishimba's birth is a paradigm through which he understands the Bible and the relationship between Africans and Europeans. Chishimba's mother, Chilufya, married a European named Stuart and gave birth to two children. Abandoned by her husband, Chilufya then married a Bemba, by whom Chishimba was born about 1921. Later Chilufya returned to Stuart. Chishimba was given to foster parents because Stuart threatened to drown him.

As Chishimba points out, the story of Rebekah's twins (Genesis 25 and 27) parallels his own. Chilufya, like Rebekah, gave birth to children representing two nations. The biblical prediction that the elder sibling would serve the younger supports the idea that Chishimba must usurp the spiritual position of the pope, while Africa must become the epicenter of Christianity. Jesus' words—"The first will be last" (Luke 13:30)—further confirm this view.

The lunar calendar regulates Mutima holy days. Believers consider the seventh day holy. Worship is influenced by the Catholic Mass but venerates the female aspect of God manifested in Mary. Vegetarianism, prayer, and fasting are encouraged. Accepting church teaching, adherence to the Mutima ethical code, and suffering to liberate androgynous souls from gendered bodies all produce salvation. Chishimba is revered as Guide and Parent in whom the female aspect of God resides. He is the final religious authority and the source of all church liturgy.

A laity and celibate clergy comprise the church. The highest clerical rank is that of Apostle, a position open to women. Other church ranks are Disciple, some of whom are celibate while others lead a lay life and may marry more than one wife; Servant, a lay rank with authority over mundane issues at the local level; and Freed One, members without rank. Clergy live in rural and urban communes known as Queen's Villages and are supported by their own labors, lay contributions, and church-managed businesses. The church is administered hierarchically at the national, provincial, and local levels.

The Mutima Church is confined to Zambia and its membership numbers are unknown. Hugo Hinfelaar (1994) estimates the number at 5,000, but church leaders claim the number to be 50,000 to 100,000.

Gary Burlington

See also: Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Chishimba, Emilio Mulolani. Kambelenge Nga Ni Mpelwa Ukucushako Amenso Ya Mubili Pa Kumfwa Icafikila Munyinefwe Umo Mu Calo Ca Zambia. N.p., n.d.
- Garvey, Brian. Bemba Land Church: Religious and Social Change in South Central Africa, 1891–1964. New York: E. J. Brill, 1994.
- Hinfelaar, Hugo F. Bemba-Speaking Women of Zambia in a Century of Religious Change (1892–1992). New York: E. J. Brill, 1994.

■ Myanmar

Myanmar (formerly Burma) is a multicultural country of 50 million people, with a new “siege-proof” capital deliberately located deep in the remote countryside at Nay Pyi Taw, 199 miles north of Rangoon (Yangon).

Ruined pagodas of the former city of Bagan (Pagan), Myanmar. The site was an important Buddhist ceremonial center. (© Rfoxphoto/Dreamstime.com)

Approximately 70 percent of the country is Ba-ma (Burmese), and the remaining 30 percent are members of various other ethnic communities. Official statistics claim 90 percent are Buddhist, 5 percent Christian, 3 percent Muslim, 0.5 percent Hindu, and 1 percent continue to follow premodern traditional faith. More likely estimates are 12 percent Muslim and 3.5 percent Hindu. In either case, demographic certainty about religion is difficult because many people do not want to tell the censor the truth lest it work against them. Myanmar is a troubled religious plurality, and combined with the latent, simmering power of a huge Buddhist sangha (monks' order), 300,000 strong, this makes religion a serious political issue.

Important religious minorities notwithstanding, Buddhism is clearly the largest and most influential faith in Myanmar. Most Burmese and many from the minority communities are Theravada Buddhist. The religion has had a presence in Myanmar for more than 1,000 years, and it coexists alongside a rich indigenous, apotropaic, magical animism (nat and spirit worship, the close involvement of Baydin Sayas or astrologers with official life). Early Pyu and Mon Buddhist kingdoms in lower Burma were replaced with the rise of Pagan, a golden age of Buddhism lasting from 800 to 1300 CE, followed by the Ava period (to 1550), the Toungoo (to 1750), and finally the Konbaung (dissolved by the British in 1885).

MYANMAR

The British ignored Buddhism, leaving the still-medieval theological and clerical structure ill-equipped to meet modernity and to work out its own destiny. Even so, Buddhism became a potent ingredient of

Myanmar

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Buddhists	20,410,000	36,851,000	73.6	0.89	40,879,000	43,552,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,000,000	5,200,000	10.4	0.25	5,000,000	4,500,000
Christians	1,350,000	4,002,000	8.0	1.83	4,828,000	5,498,000
Protestants	963,000	2,600,000	5.2	1.74	3,200,000	3,600,000
Roman Catholics	268,000	660,000	1.3	0.72	800,000	900,000
Independents	87,200	780,000	1.6	3.81	1,000,000	1,200,000
Muslims	1,000,000	1,900,000	3.8	0.89	2,150,000	2,300,000
Hindus	450,000	855,000	1.7	0.80	940,000	1,000,000
Confucianists	0	750,000	1.5	0.89	900,000	1,000,000
Agnostics	50,000	250,000	0.5	0.89	350,000	450,000
Chinese folk	80,000	132,000	0.3	0.89	145,000	160,000
Baha'is	11,200	85,000	0.2	0.89	140,000	200,000
Atheists	26,000	21,000	0.0	0.89	35,000	40,000
Jains	500	2,500	0.0	0.89	5,000	7,000
Sikhs	5,000	1,400	0.0	-6.97	1,000	1,000
Zoroastrians	200	700	0.0	0.92	700	700
Jews	200	20	0.0	0.85	30	30
Total population	26,383,000	50,051,000	100.0	0.89	55,374,000	58,709,000

nationalist ambitions, with key figures like the monks U Wissara (d. 1929) and U Ottama (d. 1939) taking leading roles in defying colonial rule in the 1920s and 1930s. The assassination of Bogyoke Aung San (ca. 1914–1947) was a crucial tragedy because he alone had worked out a vision for the newly independent nation that brought together the various religio-ethnic constituencies.

The first prime minister of the independent Myanmar was U Nu (1907–1995), a well-meaning ardently pro-Buddhist but somewhat unrealistic leader. Unfortunately, the army (Tatmadaw) used his zeal for religion as an excuse to seize power in 1962. The new government withdrew recognition of Buddhism as the state religion. It also ordered all religions to register with the government. In 1966 the government nationalized all religious schools (except seminaries) and medical facilities, and ordered all foreign missionary workers (mostly Christians) to leave the country.

Attempts by the several military regimes to “purify” Buddhism through reform councils (in 1965, 1980, and 1985) have brought the sangha under nominal government control. Yet in 1988 and 1990, the sangha showed vital support for the democracy movement, even “overturning the begging bowl” (patta ni kauz za na kan) to prevent the military from making merit the most crucial Buddhist ritual aim. Further, in September 2007, a mass protest suddenly erupted led entirely by Buddhist monks (and thereby named the Saffron Revolution). Tens of thousands of monks paraded in monsoon conditions citing the Metta Sutta and briefly offering the hope of regime change. The event, as close to an uprising as Myanmar has had since 1988, was put down by the state in the usual brutal manner, with many monasteries closed and monks sent home. But the Buddhist sangha again showed its key place in society in the aftermath of the May 2008 Cyclone Nargis, which devastated the Ayeyarwaddy delta, killing thousands and leaving 2.4 million homeless and in danger. The Myanmar military government refused most international aid and even discouraged internal private donors, leaving the sangha alone as the only initial conduit for help: providing food, shelter, medical care, and compassion. Despite the present state’s Peace and Development Council’s dislike of sangha autonomy, the junta knows that its authority must at least in part be established on its identification with Buddhism. An increasing engagement with the religion for political purposes is paradoxically evident, with emoluments showered on cooperating monks and public displays of the junta's religious piety.

Various Buddhist organizations in Myanmar reflect the several schools of thought within the country's Theravada Buddhism. The largest number identify with the Thudharma, and the Shwegyin and Dwara sects are also important minorities. In the late 20th century, several Burmese meditation masters, most notably Mahasi Sayadaw (1904–1982), U Ba Kin (1899–1971), and Satya Narayan Goenka (b. 1924), built large international followings. These have become embodied in such groups as the Insight Meditation Society, the International Meditation Centres, and the Vipassana Meditation Centres.

Of the minority faiths, Hinduism retains a close connection with Buddhism, despite serious pogroms against Indian expatriates in the past. Most of the remaining Hindus are descendants of immigrants from Tamil-, Bengali-, and Telegu-speaking parts of India.

Christianity is chiefly represented by the Roman Catholic Church and an assortment of Protestant denominations linked with the Myanmar Christian Council. Christianity continues to grow, in part through natural increase and because of missionary success among the hill tribes. The first Christian missionaries entered the country in the 16th century. Representatives of the Church of England came in 1825 and the result of their activity is now manifest in the Church of the Province of Myanmar, created in 1970. Of the various Protestant and Free Churches that opened work through the 19th and 20th centuries, that of the American Baptists attained legendary status as a landmark of the Protestant missionary movement. The Myanmar Baptist Convention now has almost 500,000 members, but a total Baptist affiliation is estimated at one million.

Islam in Myanmar is comprised of three distinct constituencies, all largely Sunni: the distressed and persecuted Rohingyas in the Arakan region on the Bangladeshi border, the Indian Muslims, and the mixed-marriage Burmese Muslims (called Zerbadees). There is a single Jewish synagogue in Yangon. Established in 1896, it now serves a small community of 25 to 50 persons. Taken together, religion is still a commanding force in this country, one of the poorest on Earth where millions live in extreme poverty and fear, and which has endured so much in recent decades.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Church of the Province of Myanmar; International Meditation Centres; Insight Meditation Society; Myanmar Baptist Convention Theravada Buddhist.

References

- Houtman, Gustaaf. Mental Culture in Burmese Crisis Politics: Aung San Suu Kyi and the National League for Democracy. Tokyo: Institute for the Study of Languages and Cultures of Asia and Africa, 1999.
- Mendelson, E. Michael. Sangha and State in Burma. Ed. by John P. Ferguson. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1973.
- Sarkisyanz, Emmanuel. Buddhist Backgrounds of the Burmese Revolution. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1965.
- Spiro, Melford E. Buddhism and Society: A Great Tradition and Its Burmese Vicissitudes. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982.
- Suu Kyi, Aung San. Freedom from Fear and Other Writings. London: Penguin, 1991.
- Yegar, Moshe. The Muslims of Burma: A Study of a Minority Group. Wiesbaden, Germany: Otto Harrassowitz, 1972.

Myanmar Baptist Convention

The Baptists were the first Protestants to enter Burma (since 1989 known as Myanmar). The mission work actually began when Adoniram Judson (1788–1850), who had arrived in India under the auspices of the Congregationalist organization the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, converted to the Baptist faith and upon his arrival in Calcutta was rebaptized by a British Baptist. Judson settled in India but was forced out by the authorities and in 1813 relocated to Rangoon (now Yangon). He eventually received the support of the American Baptists; in fact, his work became the occasion for the formation of the Triennial Convention (now a constituent part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.), through which American Baptists built their international missionary endeavor.

Judson set out to master the Burmese language and produced the first Burmese grammar text and later the standard Bible translation. The British Baptists in India gave Judson a printing press in 1816, which allowed him to found the Baptist Mission Press. Judson would go on to publish the Bible in four additional languages.

Growth really began in 1828 with George Boardman (1801–1831) and his wife, Sara Hall Boardman, who began work with Ko Tha Byu, a convert from among the Karen people. The three soon had a flourishing work among the Karen. Work was later developed among the Zomi and Kachin. Members were also received among the Burmese and the Shan. To assist the mission, the Burman Theological Seminary (1936) and the Karen Theological Seminary (1845) were opened. These various missions were combined in 1865 into the Burma Baptist Convention. Among the first activities of the Convention was the founding of Rangoon Baptist College, later Judson Baptist College. In 1880 representatives from the Karen people in Burma began work among their people residing in Thailand, resulting in the establishment of the Karen Baptist Convention in that country.

Early in the 20th century, Dr. Gordon S. Seagrave (1897–1965) began his career as a medical missionary in the northeast part of the country near the Chinese border. The story of his work under relatively primitive conditions was told in two books, Waste-Basket Surgery (1938) and Burma Surgeon (1943).

The mission suffered greatly through the mid-20th century. During World War II, the Japanese invasion led to the wide-scale destruction of property, which was slowly rebuilt after the war. In 1965 church property was again lost when all of the church's schools (including Judson College) and medical facilities were nationalized. In 1966 missionary personnel were deported, though the leadership and administration of the convention had already been turned over to the Burmese in the 1950s. The loss of the missionaries, however, seemed to spur growth. In 1963 there were around 216,000 members. In the next 30 years the membership more than doubled, and growth has continued to the present. In 2005 the Convention reported more than 650,000 baptized members and more than 600,000 additional unbaptized members.

The Convention is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Baptist World Alliance, and the Myanmar Council of Churches.

Myanmar Baptist Convention
143 Minye Kyawswa Rd., Lanmadaw
PO Box 506
Yangon
Myanmar

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

References

- Seagrave, Gordon S. Burma Surgeon. New York: W. W. Norton, 1943.
- Seagrave, Gordon S. Waste-Basket Surgery. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1931.
- Tegenfield, Herman G. A Century of Growth: The Kachin Baptist Church of Burma. South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1974.
- Torbet, Robert G. Venture of Faith. Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1955.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Myôchikai Kyôdan

Myôchikai Kyôdan, a Japanese new religion, was founded by Miyamoto Mitsu (1900–1984) in 1950. Along with her husband, Kohei, Miyamoto joined Reiyukai in 1934 and practiced rigorously. In 1945 Kohei died, and in 1950 Mitsu broke away and became independent of Reiyukai, taking 300 followers with her.

Myôchikai Kyôdan has a sanctuary in Chiba Prefecture, and a religious pilgrimage to this sanctuary is important in the movement's practices. The main ceremonies held there are the Kaishu (Miyamoto Mitsu) ceremony in the spring and the Daionshi (Miyamoto Kohei) ceremony in autumn. Myôchikai Kyôdan values the Lotus Sutra, ancestor worship, and repentance. Members are admonished to venerate their ancestors by offering them memorial rites utilizing the Lotus Sutra on a daily basis.

The current leader of Myôchikai Kyôdan is Miyamoto Takeyasu. Its headquarters are in Tokyo, Japan. In 2000 it reported 1,070,813 members.

Myôchikai Kyôdan
3-3-3 Yoyogi

Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 151-0053
Japan

Keishin Inaba

See also: Reiyukai.

References

Inoue, Nobutaka, et al., eds. Shinshûkyo Kyodan Jinbutsu Jiten. Tokyo: Kobundo, 1996.

Komoto, Mitsugi. "The Place of Ancestors in the New Religions: The Case of Reiyûkai-Derived Groups." <http://www2.kokugakuin.ac.jp/ijcc/wp/cpjr/newreligions/komoto.html>. Accessed March 25, 2009.

Religions of the World

Second Edition

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

N

Nagarjuna

3rd century CE

As a writer and the founder of one of the most important early schools of Buddhism, Nagarjuna is considered a seminal figure in the emergence of Buddhism on the world stage. At the same time, he is one of the more elusive figures in Buddhist history, with little actual known data about his life, including his birth and death dates. He became an honored figure in the Buddhist community, and when biographies were finally attempted after the passing of many centuries, they were filled with unreliable legendary and mythical material.

He is believed to have lived in southern India in the third century CE, though he is identified with Nalanda University, which was located in Bihar state. There is some reason to consider him to have been born in a Brahmin family. He is known primarily through his writings, which together form a body of commentary on the wisdom (prajnaparamita) texts, consisting of some 40 separate works such as the Heart Sutra and the Perfection of Wisdom Sutra. He developed a widely utilized methodology that reduced many arguments to absurdity and arrived at a middle position that eliminated dichotomies and extremes. His major work is the Mula Madhyamaka-karika (Memorial Verses on the Middle Teaching).

His teachings became the basis of the Madhyamika, or Middle Way, School. Central to his thought is an understanding of the non-essentiality of phenomenal reality and the related concept of shunyata, or emptiness. Nagarjuna concluded that the self is essentially “empty,” that is, lacking in ego. This emptiness is also equivalent to the absolute. Thus he reasoned that union with the absolute is a form of liberation or release. The idea of emptiness was so central to Nagarjuna’s thought that the Madhyamika School was popularly referred to as the Shunyata-vada, or emptiness, School.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Mahayana Buddhism; Nalanda.

References

- Burton, David. Emptiness Appraised: A Critical Study of Nagarjuna’s Philosophy. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Curzon 1999.
- Kalupahana, David J. Nagarjuna: The Philosophy of the Middle Way, the Mulamadhyamakakarika of Nagarjuna. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986.
- Nagarjuna. The Fundamental Wisdom of the Middle Way: Nagarjuna’s Mulamadhyamakakarika. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Nagarjuna. Madhyamaka’sastram of Nagarjuna. 2 vols. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1988.
- Walser, Joseph. Nagarjuna in Context: Mahayana Buddhism and Early Indian Culture. Irvington, NY: Columbia University Press, 2005.

Nagorno Karabakh Republic

The Nagorno Karabakh Republic, also known as Artsakh, is a territory on the eastern end of the Armenian Plateau, now completely surrounded by the nation of Azerbaijan. In the fourth century CE Armenia was on the battle line between the Persian and Byzantine empires, and was partitioned between the two powers in 387 CE. Artsakh became part of what was called Caucasian Albania (nothing to do with the present state of Albania in the southern Balkans). The region subsequently came under strong Armenian influence. The region became part of the larger world of Armenian culture and religion (including the Armenian Apostolic Orthodox Church), but existed through the centuries sometimes as an independent nation and sometimes as a part of neighboring states. Because of the mountainous nature of the region, rule from outside was always difficult.

In 1747, Muslim rule from Persia was established through the Karabakh Khanate, a semi-autonomous feudal state. In 1805 Russia won control of the region, but was not able to make its hegemony effective until 1813, when Persia formally ceded all claims to it. Russia abolished it and replaced it with a military occupation. The Russians encouraged Muslims to leave the land and welcomed Christians who formerly resided in Persia, a policy that made the land even more culturally homogeneous.

Russian rule continued through World War I and then the region passed to the Soviet Union. After the war, local forces and the great powers debated Karabakh's future. Locally, an Armenian Assembly of Nagorno-Karabakh declared independence and went about setting up a national government. Later, Ottoman troops entered Karabakh, meeting armed resistance by Armenians. New plans for self-governance in the region ended with the Soviet Union occupying Karabakh in 1920 and all of Armenia and Azerbaijan the following year. In 1923, the Soviet Union designated the Nagorno-Karabakh Autonomous Oblast as a territory within Azerbaijan SSR. As the Soviet Union began to disintegrate in the early 1990s, the majority Christian Armenian population of Karabakh repudiated its ties to the dominantly Muslim Azerbaijan and moved to unite with Armenia.

Karabakh declared independence in 1991. At the latest estimates, the territory claimed by the newly independent nation included 4,457 square miles of territory inhabited by 145,000 (2002) people. This number represents a drop from an estimated 190,000.

The attempt to set up a new country ignited a war between Azerbaijan and the former Autonomous Oblast, which ended with the Azerbaijanis having lost control of the territory that separated Karabakh from Armenia. Russia negotiated a ceasefire in 1994. The area has remained disputed territory, with the United Nations still attempting to broker a cease fire as late as 2008.

Religiously, the people of Nagorno Karabakh largely express their religion in alignment with their ethnicity. According to the government, the country is 95 percent Armenian, meaning that the people are overwhelmingly members of the Armenian Apostolic Church, whose ruling bishop is located in Echmiadzin, Armenia. This figure represents a sharp rise from a decade earlier when Armenians represented only about 75 percent of the people. The change is largely a result of the migration out of the region by the 40,000 Azerbaijanis.

The remaining 5 percent of the population include communities of Kurds, Russians, Greeks, and Assyrians. Of these groups, three follow a form of Orthodoxy. The Assyrians (Iraqis) follow the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East, the Greek the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Russians the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate). Most Kurds are Muslims. While known to follow different forms of Islam, most are Shia Muslims (as are most Azerbaijanis). There are also a very small number of Protestant and evangelical Christians in Karabakh.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Boyajian, Artashes. Failed Transition? The Nagorno-Karabakh Conflict and Armenia's Transition to Democracy. Saarbrücken, Germany: VDM Verlag Dr. Müller, 2009.
- Chorbajian, Levon. The Making of Nagorno-Karabakh: From Secession to Republic. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2001.
- Cornel, Svante E. "The Nagorno-Karabakh Conflict." Report no. 46, Department of East European Studies, Uppsala University, 1999. http://www.silkroadstudies.org/new/inside/publications/1999_NK_Book.pdf. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Nalanda

Known as “the Buddhist University,” Nalanda (“the place that confers the Lotus”) was a vast Buddhist monastic complex. Located in northeastern India near present-day Bihar, Nalanda was visited by such Chinese travelers to India as Xuan Zong and Yi Jing. They left colorful descriptions of the place. At its height Nalanda housed more than 10,000 monks studying the full range of Buddhist topics, including mathematics, medicine, and logic. However, as it grew in influence its curriculum was increasingly influenced by Hinduism.

Traditional accounts say that Nalanda was first founded by the Magadha dynasty in the fifth century CE. However no archaeological evidence has been uncovered to back this up. It was almost certainly founded by rulers of the Gupta dynasty (320–ca. 620). It was also strongly supported by the Pala rulers (eighth–12th centuries). The complex was ultimately destroyed in the Muslim invasions of the 12th and 13th centuries, beginning with the attack of Mohammad Bakhtyar in 1193. The site of Nalanda was first excavated in 1872 by Alexander Cunningham.

Nalanda was most significant as a site of contact with Tibet. A second Nalanda University was founded in Tibet, near Lhasa, by the monk/scholar Rongston Sengge (1347–1449). More recently, a Nalanda Monastery was founded in Toulouse, France, in 1981, by Lama Zopa Rinpoche and Lama Thubten Yeshe.

Today, tourists may visit the vast ruins of Nalanda. In recent years a Nalanda Institute of Pali Studies, established adjacent to the ruins, has attempted to capture the past glory of the site.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Buddhism; Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition; Tibetan Buddhism.

Ruins of Nalanda in present-day Bihar, India. Nalanda was a university and Buddhist center that dates back to at least the fifth century BCE. (AP Photo/Prashant Ravi)

References

- Chauley, G. C. Art and Architecture of Nalanda. New Delhi: Sundeep, 2002.
- Mani, C. The Heritage of Nalanda. New Delhi: Aryan Books International, 2008.
- Mishra, B. N. Nalanda. 3 vols. New Delhi: B. R. Publishing Corporation, 1998.
- Uphendra, Thakur. Buddhist Cities in Early India: Buddha-Gaya: Rajagaha: Nalanda. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1996.

■ Namibia

Namibia is a sparsely populated and largely desert land on the southwest coast of Africa, between Angola and South Africa. Its 318,700 square miles of territory is bounded on the east by Botswana. The Europeans who finally focused attention on Namibia in the 19th century found it inhabited by some 11 different African peoples. Today, among the 2,089,000 people of the country, the more populous groups are the Hereros, the Ovambos (making approximately half of Namibia's population), and the Demaras.

Germany, which came late to the European quest for colonial glory, annexed Namibia in 1884. In the meantime, explorers found it to be wealthy in a variety of minerals, from diamonds to uranium. Following World War I, Germany was stripped of Namibia, which became a trust territory assigned to South Africa by the League of Nations. Then, after World War II, South Africa announced its intentions to completely annex the land, thus beginning a struggle with the United Nations, which had supported Namibia's independence. In 1968 the UN declared South Africa's presence in Namibia to be illegal, but was unable to act as the major Western powers supported South Africa. In the mid-1960s, Namibians organized the South West African

Rhenish mission church in Namibia, built in 1895. (Bildagentur/Stockphoto)

NAMIBIA

People's Organization (SWAPO) to work for their liberation. A 25-year struggle ensued that often erupted into warfare.

Finally, as changes in the region were undoing the apartheid regime, South Africa finally released its hold on Namibia. In November 1989 the first free elections were held, and SWAPO delegates were swept into power. Independence was formally proclaimed in 1990. The new leadership moved to deal with the effects of apartheid with government actions, including the improvement of living conditions for the Native Africans and the strengthening of literacy programs.

Religion in Namibia today is in many ways shaped by the country's colonial past. Traditional religions do survive among several of the Namibian peoples, especially the Ambo, the Herero, the Heikum, and the Kung (or San) bushpeople. Although each group has its own particular religious community, they all share some common beliefs, such as that in a supreme God who is very distant. Because this deity is removed from everyday life, attention in the traditional religions in Namibia tends to be directed to more immediate realities, ancestor spirits, and magical operations. Traditional religion continues to decline in the face of Christian

Namibia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	715,000	1,967,000	91.2	1.37	2,356,000	2,798,000
Protestants	402,000	1,282,000	59.4	3.90	1,489,000	1,687,000
Roman Catholics	116,000	455,000	21.1	5.02	625,000	740,000
Independents	63,200	260,000	12.1	1.94	310,000	400,000
Ethnoreligionists	56,100	128,000	5.9	1.45	110,000	90,000
Agnostics	0	40,000	1.9	6.33	60,000	100,000
Baha'is	300	10,400	0.5	1.45	18,000	30,000
Muslims	0	8,500	0.4	1.45	12,000	16,000
Jews	600	2,600	0.1	1.45	3,000	4,800
Atheists	0	500	0.0	1.48	1,000	2,000
Total population	772,000	2,157,000	100.0	1.45	2,560,000	3,041,000

evangelism and is now followed by less than 5 percent of the population.

Christianity was introduced to Namibia by European missionaries. The London Missionary Society made an initial survey of Namibia early in the 19th century and was a catalyst in establishing the Rhenish Mission, which began missionary work among the Herero people in 1842. The Mission, supported by members of the Evangelical Church in Germany with a combined Lutheran and Reformed background, was soon joined by a second mission established by the Finnish Lutheran Mission. These two missions grew side by side, working with different African peoples. A third Lutheran group, serving only white members, arose in the 20th century.

At the end of the 19th century the Roman Catholic Church began to build a presence in Namibia, in the area immediately south of the Angolan border, among the Ovambo people. Originally assigned to the Diocese of Cimbebasia (Angola), the mission was designated a prefecture in 1892. The Vicariate of Windhoek was established in 1926, becoming a diocese in 1994. A second missionary thrust in the southern part of Namibia was organized as the Vicariate of Keetmanshoop in 1909. Keetmanshoop was also elevated to diocese status in 1994.

Following the takeover of Namibia by South Africa, South Africans moved into the land and brought with them a number of churches, the largest of which was the Dutch Reformed Church, whose membership was limited to whites though it had an all-black affiliate church. The Methodist Church of South Africa established a black mission, and approximately half its membership was black. The United Congregational Church of Southern Africa developed a membership that was 95 percent black. The Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa, a Pentecostal church, has had a small black membership in what has remained a predominantly white church.

The Anglicans, though the first Christian group in Namibia, did not develop a mission until the 1920s. That work among the Ambo people was originally assigned to the Diocese of Damaraland (South Africa), but more recently a Diocese of Namibia within the Church in the Province of South Africa has been erected, with its bishop stationed at Windhoek.

African Initiated Churches began to appear in Namibia with the successive waves of unrest among members of the Rhenish Mission, the majority of whom were Herero. In 1946 a group left the Rhenish Mission and affiliated with the African Methodist Episcopal Church, a church based in the United States with affiliated work in South Africa since 1892. Then in 1955 a large group of Herero left to found the Oruano (Community). Then in the 1960s that church split into three factions.

Since World War II, a spectrum of Protestant churches has appeared, many if not most having grown from South African churches establishing congregations in Namibia. There are also a few independent churches from Botswana, on Namibia's western border, such as the Spiritual Healing Church and the Apostolic Spiritual Healing Church, as well as the Moshoeshoe Berean Bible Readers' Church from Lesotho. Both the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Jehovah's Witnesses are also active in Namibia.

A Council of Churches in Namibia was organized in 1978. It is now an affiliate council to the World Council of Churches. The Jewish community in Namibia emerged in the early 1920s, and a synagogue was established in Windhoek in 1924. The several hundred members continue their relationship to the community in South Africa. Namibia has not been considered a major target of Hindu and Buddhist groups, which are very active in South Africa, and support for Islam is minuscule. There are several assemblies of the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Baha'i Faith; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Dutch Reformed Church; Evangelical Church in Germany; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Methodist Church of Southern Africa; Rhenish Mission; Roman Catholic Church; United Congregational Church of Southern Africa; World Council of Churches.

References

- Beris, A. P. J. From Mission to Local Church: One Hundred Years of Mission by the Catholic Church in Namibia, with Special Reference to the Development of the Archdiocese of Windhoek and the Apostolic Vicariate of Rundu. Windhoek: John Meinert, 1996.
- Buys, G. L., and S. V. V. Nambala. History of the Church in Namibia 1805–1990, an Introduction. Windhoek: Gamsberg Macmillan, 2003.
- Hellberg, Carl J. Mission, Colonialism, and Liberation: The Lutheran Church in Namibia, 1840–1966. Windhoek: New Namibia Books, 1997.
- Hunke, N. Church and State: 100 Years of Catholic Mission in Namibia. Windhoek: RCC/John Meinert Printers, 1996.

Katjavivi, P. H., P. Frostin, and K. Mbuende, eds. Church and Liberation in Namibia. London: Pluto Press, 1990.

Nammbala, S. V. V. Church and State in Namibia, 1806–1989. St. Paul, MN: Luther Northwestern Theological Seminary, 1990.

Nammbala, S. V. V. History of the Church in Namibia. Lutheran Quarterly, 1994.

Voipio, R. History of the Evangelical Lutheran Ovambo Kavango Church. Oniipa: ELOK, 1972.

Nanak, Guru

1469–1539

Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh religion, was a mystic and visionary caught within the conflicts between Hindus and Muslims for the support of the Indian people.

Nanak was born on April 15, 1469, in Talwandi-Rai-Bhoe in the District of Shekhupur (Pakistan), west of Lahore. He was the son of a land-surveyor and small farmer of the Khatri tribe, a warrior people, of the Bedi tribe.

The devotion to God that marked his mature life began to manifest even in his youth; he seemed often in a meditative state even as he watched over the family's cattle. Stories of his childhood tell of him beginning to utter mysterious sayings at the age of five. When he was seven, he was taken to a teacher from whom he was to learn to read, and he lapsed into silence. Stories also later arose of miracles that occurred during his childhood.

His tendency to withdraw led acquaintances of his parents to suggest that they should move for an early marriage. He eventually married Sulakhani, a Khatri from the Chona sub-caste, and they had two sons, Lakhmi Das and Siri Chand. As he grew to manhood, Nanak learned three languages. He took his basic education in the local Indian dialect, but also studied Sanskrit (the language of the Indian holy books) and Persian, whose poetry he mastered.

Of the many mystical experiences that dotted his life, an early one was particularly important. One day he went to the river to bathe. While there he was approached by "messengers of God" who whisked him away to a divine court where they fed him sweet nectar. No one saw him for three days, and then upon his return he declared his basic insight that there were neither Hindu nor Muslim. He had arrived at a state of internal harmony and equanimity. He now began to teach with the ideals of love, equality, justice, selfless service, and devotion to God as his central themes. He also denounced religious hypocrisy.

Portrait of Nanak, early-sixteenth-century Indian religious leader, founder of Sikhism, and the first guru of Sikhs. (Michael Freeman/Corbis)

Guru Nanak emerged as a leader of the devotional (bhakti) movement, while simultaneously calling for reform of unjust Indian social and religious customs. He dedicated himself to awakening the consciousness of the people even as he attacked the oppression of the caste system, discrimination, and injustice.

In founding the Sikh tradition, Nanak sought to integrate Buddhist, Hindu, and Islamic insights that contributed to the virtuous life and enlightenment. As he began to travel through India and beyond, he attacked the caste system and freely mingled with people of all castes. By precept and example, he called for an end to idol worship and what he considered pseudo-religious beliefs (those lacking a spiritual content). He used money he received to set up common kitchens, where all could relax and eat together with any who chose to hear his teachings apart from any consideration of their caste or status.

Three basic teachings formed the essence of his message. First, he called upon his followers to practice Naam Japna, the meditation on the One God through repeating and studying God's Name and virtues (also termed japna yoga). The inner life thus developed would support a life of righteousness. Second, his followers were to live as householders to earn their living through honest physical and/or mental labor. The life of righteousness is marked by truthfulness and the highest spiritual, moral, and social values. Third, Sikhs were to share their possession with others of the community. The community lives from the common good.

Nanak's teachings set the goal of human existence as achieving self-perfection while living and then assisting others to do the same (in logical not necessarily temporal order). He also emphasized the importance of the guru's grace and will in transforming one's life.

Throughout his life, Nanak's teachings were transcribed and the manuscripts passed to his successor Guru Angad Dev (1504–1553), the second guru of the Sikhs. These manuscripts were put together with the writings of his several successors by Guru Arjan Dev (1563–1606), to create the Adi Granth, the sacred book of the Sikhs.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Nanak's Birthday, Guru; Sikhism/Sant Mat; Yoga.

References

- Banerjee, Anil Chandra. Guru Nanak and His Times. Patalia, India: Punjabi University, 1971.
- Dhillon, Harish. The First Sikh Spiritual Master: Timeless Wisdom from the Life and Techniques of Guru Nanak. Woodstock, VT: Skylight Paths Publishing, 2006.
- Kapur, Prithipal Singh, ed. The Divine Master: Life and Teachings of Guru Nanak. Jalandhar, India: ABS Publications, 1988.
- McLeod, W. H. Guru Nanak and the Sikh Religion. London: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Talib, Gurbachan Singh. Guru Nanak: His Personality and Vision. Delhi: Gur Das Kapur & Sons, 1969.

Nanak's Birthday, Guru

1469–1539

Guru Nanak was the founder of Sikhism, which he created by merging what he felt was the best of Islam and Hinduism. The religion and its community steadily evolved over the next several hundred years under the leadership of nine gurus who in turn succeeded Nanak. The last of the gurus decreed that the Guru Granth Sahib, the book of writings of Nanak and the several gurus, would from that time forward be the community's new guru. Through the book, Guru Nanak's teachings have remained uppermost in the development of Sikhism.

Nanak was born in Talwandi, now known as Nankana Sahib, a village near Lahore, in what is now Pakistan. His birth occurred, according to the Hindu lunar calendar then in effect, on the third day of the light half of the month of Baisakh of the year 1469 CE. This date has now been calculated to be on or about Saturday, April 15, 1469, on the Common Era calendar.

The Sikh community is in a transition concerning its celebration of Nanak's birthday. Until the 1990s, it was celebrated in November. However, in the 1990s, a new Sikh calendar was adopted. The calendar is a solar calendar named the Nanakshahi calendar after Guru Nanak and based somewhat on the Common Era calendar. March 14 on the Common Era calendar is the first day of the New Year on the Nanakshahi calendar. The new calendar places Guru Nanak's birthday on Vaisakh 1 (or April 14). Most Sikhs now acknowledge that day.

Guru Nanak's birthday is one of 12 Gurburbs, holidays that commemorate the birth or death of one of the 10 Sikh gurus. Sikhs will celebrate the Gurburb for Guru Nanak by performing an Akhand Path, a public reading of the Sikh holy scriptures, at both the Golden Temple in Amritsar, the main Sikh temple, and in gurdwaras around the world. To read the entire Guru Granth Sahib from beginning to end requires two days. The reading will begin two days before the holiday to be commemorated and will end early in the morning of the holy day. Each person chosen to participate will read aloud for two to three hours.

Where possible, on the day prior to the actual birthday celebration, a procession may be held. It will include singers and musicians, and five men who dress to represent the Panj Piare (or Five Beloved Ones), the first five members to be formally initiated into the Sikh community.

On the day of the celebration, Sikhs will gather at the gurdwara, which will be decorated for a time of prayer, talks on various aspects of Sikhism, and the singing of kirtans, holy songs (in this case from the Guru Granth Sahib), followed by a communal meal. Activities for all ages may continue all day.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Nanak, Guru; Sikhism.

References

- Dhillon, Hareesh. The First Sikh Spiritual Master: Timeless Wisdom from the Life and Techniques of Guru Nanak. Woodstock, VT: Skylight Paths Publishing, 2006.
- Duggal, K. S. Sikh Gurus: Their Lives and Teachings. New Delhi: UBSPD, 2005.
- Kapoor, Sukhbor Sing. Sikh Festivals. Vero Beach, FL: Rourke Publishing Group, 1989.
- Khalsa, Parmatma S. Guru for the Aquarian Age: The Life and Teachings of Guru Nanak. Santa Cruz, NM: Yogiji Press, 1997.

Naqshbandiya Sufi Order

The development of the Sufi tariqa Naqshbandiya can be traced back to Khwaja Abu Ya'qub Yusuf-i Hamadani (d. 1140), who was the key figure for the genesis of Sufi associations in Transoxiana. After Hamadani's death, his tariqa split into two silsilas from which the two major tariqas in Transoxiana emerged: the Yassawiya, members of which were mainly Turkic-speaking nomads, and the Khwajagan, which found its followers predominantly among the Persian-speaking urban population. The seventh in the line of the Khwajagan Shaykhs was Shah Baha' ad-din-i Naqshband (d. 1389), the founder and name patron of the Naqshbandiya tariqa. His shrine is situated at Ćar Bakr near Bokhara in today's Republic of Uzbekistan.

Because of the urban social background of the Naqshbandiya, the interpretations of the normative Islamic texts made by the traditional Islamic scholars, the ulama, had a substantially greater influence on the population than, for instance, on the Yassawiya. This perhaps explains why the doctrines of the Naqshbandiya are often described as "pietistic," compared to those of other tariqas from a rural or even nomadic milieu. For example, an absolute prerequisite for the knowledge of the esoteric dimension of Islam is, as it is in the teachings of the most Sufi tariqas, the conscientious execution of the daily religious duties (including fasting in the month of Ramadan and performing the hajj). Above that, the silent dhikr (dhikr-i khufiya), the remembrance of God by contemplative seclusion (khalwa), plays the central role. The aim is not, as in many other tariqas, to cut off the driving soul (nafs) by ascetic practices, but to purify the heart (qalb) by the way of love ('ishq) in daily active life (hayat al-'amal).

By stressing a much wider interpretation of the Koranic term 'amal' than was usual, the Naqshbandiya emphasized a much stronger inner-worldliness than most Sufi tariqas in the Middle Ages. This provided it with an immense potential for the reformation of society (tajdid). Therefore it seems quite understandable that, from the late Timurid period (late 15th century) on, the Naqshbandiya became ever more concerned with social, economic, and political issues. In fact, it appears that the Naqshbandi saw himself as mediator between the ruler and the ruled, whose task it was to make sure their actions corresponded with the normative requirements of the Koran and the prophetic Sunna. This political intervention of the Naqshbandiya in Transoxiana is connected to individuals such as 'Abd ar-rah man-i Jami from Herat (d. 1492), his disciple 'Ali Shir Nawa'i (d. 1501), and, above all, Khwaja 'Ubayd-allah Ahrar of Samarkand (d. 1490).

The third of the major doctrines concerning Naqshbandi practice is the projection of love (rabitat al-'ishq) by the adept on his spiritual master in order to obtain the experience of spiritual unity as a substitute to the ultimate entering into God (fana'). In the context of the third doctrine one must refer to the role played by the monistic philosophy of Muhyi d-din b. 'Arabi (d. 1240). His famous philosopheme of the "Oneness of Existence" (wahdat al-wujud) allows equal knowledge of the creation with knowledge of the creator. The Naqshbandiya doctrine of the rabitat al-'ishq seems to be based on this theory of Ibn 'Arabi. Therefore his texts became quite popular among Naqshbandis by the 15th century, as we can see from statements made by such important figures as the above mentioned Jami, Nawa'i, and Khwaja Ahrar.

In the 15th century, with Khwaja Ahrar, the center of the Naqshbandiya shifted from Bokhara to Samarkand. He became a close confidant of the Timurid ruler and thus carried out mediation in armed conflicts. The Naqshbandis spread into the territory ruled by the last Çaghatayid princes and were finally among the followers of Babur (d. 1530) to India, where Babur established the dynasty of the Mughals. The “Baburnama” gives the names of some of those Naqshbandis, among them two spiritual successors (khalifa) of Khwaja Ahrar.

Not much is known about the Naqshbandiya in India from that time until the appearance of Muhammad Baqi’-billah “Bi-rang” Simaqi (d. 1603) in imperial Delhi, where he established a convent (khanaqah) and gathered a huge number of disciples around him. As an indirect khalifa, or successor, of Khwaja Ahrar, he openly advocated the idea of the wahdat al-wujud against the already known idea of the “Oneness of the Testimony” (wahdat ash-shuhud) in India, which was developed by the Kubrawiya Shaykh ‘Ala’ ad-din Simnani (d. 1336).

Baqi’-billah’s most famous and effective disciple was without doubt Shaykh Ahmad Faruqi Sirhindi (d. 1668), who was later given the epithet “Renewer of the Second Millennium” (mujaddid-i alf-thani). By rigorously advocating the idea of the wahdat ash-shuhud, found primarily in his epistles (“Maktubat-i imam-i rabbani”), Sirhindi introduced a new doctrine into the Naqshbandiya and was thus responsible for the divide of the tariqa. The debate over the wahdat al-wujud issue became essential in doctrinal terms, and its advocates constituted the Ahrariya silsila whereas the followers of Sirhindi formed the Mujaddidiya silsila.

With the decline of the Mughal Empire in the 18th century, representatives of both silsilas tried to focus on more pragmatic issues and thus to reunite the Naqshbandiya. A central figure in this context was Shah Wali-allah Dihlawi (d. 1762), whose influence on the various political and intellectual trends in India is still undiminished. Dihlawi tried to resolve the debate over wahdat al-wujud and wahdat ash-shuhud by describing them as referring to two different objects: wahdat ash-shuhud designates an epistemological viewpoint while wahdat al-wujud is an ontological category. More important for Shah Wali-allah Dihlawi was the unity of the Muslim umma to become able to act.

Nevertheless, the two silsilas are still separate today. Although the Mujaddidiya began in the 18th century to establish itself in Transoxiana, where it is connected with names such as Sufi Allahyar Bukhari (d. ca. 1723), and in the Middle East and in Anatolia by mediation of the Indian Murtasa az-Zabidi (d. 1791), the Ahrariya can be found in many south Asian socio-religious movements and institutions that developed in the 19th century: for example, the Dar al-’ulum at Deoband, the Nadwat al-’ulama’ in Lucknow, or the movement of the Ahl-i hadith.

Jan-Peter Hartung

See also: Islam; Sufism.

References

- Fusfeld, Warren E. “The Shaping of Sufi Leadership in Delhi: The Naqshbandiyya Mujaddidiyya 1750–1920.” PhD. diss., University of Pennsylvania, 1981.
- Garborieau, Marc, A. Popovic, and Th. Zarccone, eds. Naqshbandis. Cheminements et situation actuelle d’un ordre mystique musulman. Istanbul: Institut Français d’Études Anatoliennes, 1990.
- Hermansen, Marcia K. The Conclusive Argument from God: Shah Wali Allah of Delhi’s Hujjat Allah Baligha. Leiden: Brill, 1995.
- Paul, Jurgen. Doctrine and Organization. The Khwâjagân/Naqshbandîya in the First Generations after Bahâ’uddîn. Berlin: Das Arabische Buch, 1998.
- Rahman, Fazlur. Selected Letters of Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi. Karachi: Royal Books, 1968.

Nara

Nara, Japan’s capital city in the eighth century BCE, would be founded just as Buddhism was making its first significant push into the country and would continue to serve as the major center from which Buddhism permeated the country for several centuries. The relatively small city became the home of six Buddhist groups whose temple-schools specialized in the study and teachings of particular Buddhist texts, and from whom young monks received their training. The Ritsu School especially concerned itself with the Vinaya (Precepts), the document from the early Pali canon of Buddhist scripture outlining the rules by which monks lived. It is difficult to determine the exact order and dates when most of the schools arrived in Japan from Korea and China through the seventh century, though the Kegon (aka Huayen or Flower Garland) School was the last to organize (751).

The Buddhist Todai-ji Temple in the Japanese city of Nara is the largest wooden building in the world and houses some of the world's largest statues of the Buddha. (Holger Mette/Dreamstime.com)

Nara was located on Japan's main island, Honshu, a short distance south of present-day Kyoto. It was a planned city modeled on the Chinese capital, Chang'an (now Xian City in Shaanxi Province). The site remained Japan's capital from 710 to 784.

In the 730s a smallpox epidemic spread across Japan, and the Emperor Shomu (r. 724–749) called upon Buddhists to assist the government in meeting the crisis. He ordered each province of the country to build a Buddhist temple and make copies of Buddhist scriptures. Then in 743 as the disease receded, he oversaw the creation of a giant statue of the bodhisattva Vairocana Buddha, the primary character in the Flower Garland Sutra. It was formally dedicated in 752, its creation being directly connected to the arrival and establishment of the Kegon School. In the meantime, Todai-ji, which would become both the head temple of the Kegon School and the lead temple of all the Buddhist temples across the country, had been completed. The statue of Vairocana was erected in a building adjacent to Todai-ji. In 754, Ganjin, an Itsu priest from China, oversaw the creation of a formal place (a kaidan, or platform) for the ordination of Buddhist monks at Todai-ji. As the monks at the several Nara schools finished their course of study, they were all officially ordained at Todai-ji following the format common in China.

By building the Buddhist center in the nation's capital, the government showed both its support of the new faith and its intention to control it. It has also been suggested that with the growth of Buddhism, its role and influence on the court grew beyond what had been expected of it, and hence the emperor finally decided to move to Heian (Kyoto). After the government relocated in 794, all of the Buddhist groups opened branch temples in close proximity to the imperial court through which they continued to exert their power for the next centuries. Nara's power only began to wane with the establishment of the shogun's capital at Kamakura in 1185. The new capital became the new center of Buddhism and the home of a whole new set of groups that would replace the Nara sects as the dominant force in the Buddhist community.

The temple-schools at Nara would face a variety of challenges in the centuries after the capital moved to Kyoto. In 805, Saicho, the founder of the rival Tendai School of Buddhism on Mount Hiei, obtained permission to train monks apart from the Nara schools. At first, the monks had to go to Nara for ordination, but in 827 the Tendai center completed its ordination platform and began ordaining its own monks in the mode Saicho had seen at T'ian-tai Mountain in China. Meanwhile, Kukai (aka Kobo Daishi), the former head of Todai-ji, left Nara and moved to Mount Koya to begin the dissemination of Shingon Buddhism.

In a more mundane sphere, the temples at Nara were largely constructed of wood and at various times fell victim to both war and weather. Most at one point had been destroyed and had to be rebuilt. In the 11th century, Todai-ji was destroyed and the Vairocana Buddha statue damaged. The statue was restored and rededicated in 1195. The process of restoring the statue became the occasion for the building of the second giant Buddha statue, this time of Amida (Amitabha) Buddha, at the new capital of Kamakura. The main hall of Todai-ji that houses the statue was last destroyed in the late 16th century. It was rebuilt and, though slightly smaller than the building it replaced, survives today as the largest wooden building in the world.

Today, Nara is known primarily as a place to see the old temples originally erected in the eighth century and the still impressive statue of Vairocana. Three of the original groups have survived and maintain their national headquarters at Nara—the Kegon, Ritsu, and Hosso Buddhist schools. Beginning with the establishment of the Tendai School on Mount Hiei, however, the Nara schools, which had never developed a popular following, began to be left behind. With the establishment of Kamakura, the new schools—Zen, Pure Land, and Nichiren—became the dominant element in Buddhism, and the Nara schools never again assumed an important role in Japanese life.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Amitabha's Birthday; Hiei, Mount; Kamakura; Nara, Six Buddhist Schools of; Nichiren; Pure Land Buddhism; Saicho; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Hakudo, Inoue. Nar/ the Yamato Road: Villages of Spirit and Body. Kyoto, Japan: Kyoto Shoin, 1988.
- Kasahara, Kazou, ed. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 2001.
- Martin, John H., and Phyllis C. Martin. Nara: A Cultural Guide to Japan's Ancient Capital. Rutland, VT: Tuttle Publishing, 1994.
- Matsuoka, Asako. Sacred Treasures of Nara. Tokyo: The Hokuseido Press, 1935.
- Nara*. Tokyo: The Japan Times, 1972.
- Ooka, Minoru. Temples of Nara and Their Art. Trans. by Dennis Lishka. New York: Weatherhill, 1973.
- Yanagishima, Hikosaku. Kyoto and Nara: Where the Japanese Heart Goes Alive Everywhere. Kyoto, Japan: Ranshobo Co., 1960.

Nara, Six Buddhist Schools of

The Six Schools of Nara Buddhism were six temple-schools of Buddhism established in the seventh century at the new capital of Japan. Together, the schools constituted a massive academic center for the study of Buddhism, the training of monk-scholars, and offering leadership to the slowly developing national Buddhist movement. The imperial government assigned Buddhist leadership with conducting rites and ceremonies for the protection of the nation and the imperial family and the promotion of a comprehensive study of Buddhist culture, not just their narrow specialty. That being said, each temple-school represented a single scholastic tradition and approach to Buddhism, known in Japan as the Kusha, Jujitsu, Sanron, Hosso, Kegon, and Ritsu schools. All of these schools were introduced from China (or Korea). Given their primary task relative to the emperor and the nation, the Nara schools had limited direct impact on the religious life of the general population. However, they did lay the foundation upon which Buddhism would later expand. Their efforts provided the basis for the subsequent development of Japanese Buddhism. Buddhist monk-priests became increasingly influential in the Nara court, forcing Emperor Kammu (r. 781–806) to relocate his government to Heian (Kyoto), a move that encouraged Saicho (767–822), founder of the Tendai School, and Kukai (774–835), founder of the Shingon School, to experiment with more broadly based Buddhist movements.

Adherents of all six Nara schools shared Gautama Buddha's original concern for human suffering and his analysis of its cause, remedy, and extinction. Through the succeeding centuries, first in India and then in China, different teachers attempted to clarify the meaning of the Buddha's insight on such issues as interdependency of phenomena, ultimate enlightenment (nirvana), the non-self (anatman), and the Middle Way. Their divergent understandings created more than a dozen Buddhist intellectual traditions by the time that Buddhism began to move out of its homeland.

Buddha's insight on the interdependence of all phenomena (usually termed co-dependence arising) led directly to his attaining the enlightenment for which he is named. He opined on the fact that all sentient beings possess the essence of enlightenment, but because of the false notions and attachments of the mind, remain in an unenlightened state. The insight that all existences are mutually dependent in time and space reaffirmed the prevailing belief in transiency (anitya) and the moral efficacy of reincarnation and karma. Buddha also asserted his understanding of no-self (anatman). The self lacks any substantial reality, and the notion of eternal and self-sustaining entities (that is, the eternal soul or spirit) is fiction.

Kiyomizu-dera (pure water temple) was founded in 780 CE and is associated with the Hosso sect of Japanese Buddhism. (Mihai-bogdan Lazar/Dreamstime.com)

Buddha offered the Four Noble Truths as a new perspective on the basic human problem. The third of the Four Truths claims the ultimate enlightened state (nirvana) to be the antidote for entrapment in the transitory world of samsara. The fourth Noble Truth points to the Eightfold Path as the means by which a person can purge the mind of incorrect views. From this beginning, Buddhist thinkers concentrated their rumination on the nature of the mind. They asked questions such as: What does it know? How does it know? How can it be known? What does it do?

A selection of the many schools of Buddhism developed in India was transmitted to China, from China to Korea, and from both China and Korea to Japan. These traditions were living schools, so as they existed through time and moved into new countries and were expressed in new languages, they changed, even as their proponents continually returned to the texts from which each took their inspiration.

The Kusha School The Japanese scholar-monks Dasho (638–700), Joe (644–714), Chitatsu (dates unknown), and others who studied in China introduced the Kusha (or Dharma Analysis Treasury) School to Japan. It is based on the Abhidharmakosha (Japanese: Abidatsumakusha; Treatise on the Higher Dharma), written by the Indian Buddhist monk Vasubandhu (ca. 320–400). It was originally translated into Chinese by the Indian monk Paramatha (499–569) and later re-translated by Xuanzhang (600–664). Dasho, Joe, and Chitatsu studied with Xuanzhang’s direct disciples.

The Kusha School continued the Indian Sarvastivada School that sought to rationally demonstrate the truth of Buddha’s insight of no-self (anatman) and to establish a method to realize enlightenment (nirvana). To accomplish their goal, they attempted to clarify the relationship between transiency (anitya), no-self (anatman), and interdependence (pratityasamutpada) by analyzing the elemental building blocks of phenomenal reality (the *dharma*s). They suggested that phenomena were of two types—conditioned (samskṛta) and unconditioned (asamskṛta). Conditioned and unconditioned dharmas mix and match through a multiplicity of causes and conditions to momentarily establish and maintain the human personality and the material world. The conditioned elements of reality that constitute the ever-changing phenomenal experience of human existence consist of 72 dharmas that are grouped into four sub-categories: (1) the five sense organs and their objects, (2) mind, (3) psycho-physical (sense and thought) data, and (4) non-mental and physical elements. Dharmic events do not occur simply through a single cause, but are the result of a multiplicity of causes and conditions. The school identified six direct and four indirect causes and five varieties of results that explain the causal efficacy of conditioned dharmas and their effects. In the act of perceiving, conceiving, willing, thinking, and doing, an individual continually generates karmic energy that collectively constitutes an ever-evolving personal existence. In addition to such basic sentient psychophysical functions of sensation, volition, conceptualization, and remembering, the Kusha school identified attendant good (or efficacious) mental faculties, defiled (or inefficacious) mental faculties that relate to the realization of nirvana, and indeterminate mental faculties.

Enlightenment (nirvana), one of the three unconditioned dharmas, identifies a spiritual condition wherein a person has extinguished the karmic energy generated by thought, speech, and body through wisdom that recognizes the fiction of an enduring and substantial self. In order to transcend samsara, the world of suffering and change, a person must cultivate wisdom that extinguishes ignorance of the truth of interdependence (pratityasamutpada) and clinging to the belief in a substantial self (atman).

The other unconditioned dharmas are space and the quiescence that is the result of the absence of causes. The Kusha exploration concerning the mind and its functions anticipates the insights posed by the Hosso School.

The Jujitsu School The Jujitsu School takes its lead from the Satyasiddhi śāstra (Establishment of Truth), a text written by the Indian monk Harivarman (ca. 250–350). Kumarajiva (344–413) later produced a Chinese translation of the text that provoked considerable interest due to the presence within it of both Theravada and Mahayana ideas. It appears that the Korean monk Hyegwan (or Ekwan) transmitted Jujitsu teachings to Japan along with those of the Sanron School into Japan in the 620s as part of the original phase of Buddhism’s reception of the new religion a century before Nara existed.

Harivarman criticized the Kusha (in India the Sarvastivada) approach to Buddhism as overly intellectual in its attempt to prove the validity of anatman. Harivarman hoped to re-instill the spirit of the Four Noble Truths as the path to enlightenment by emphasizing nirvana and its attainment. He also introduced 27 stages for spiritual advancement from the 4 stages of the arhat, the ideal enlightened personality of early Buddhism.

Harivarman suggested that individual existence was composed of five psychophysical factors (form, feeling, conceptualization, volition, and consciousness) as well as 84 dharmas that affirm the rationality of anatman. Unlike the Kusha, Harivarman saw the dharmas as non-substantial. Rather than assert or deny the substantiality of dharmas and the self, he suggested that dharmas are provisionally true (samvṛti satya) in their transitory aspects, but are ultimately true (paramatha satya) in their essential non-substantial aspect. Interestingly, however, in the 27 stages of spiritual awareness he proposed, Harivarman speaks of the elimination of clinging to the self, but is silent on the issue of clinging to dharmas.

The Sanron School The Sanron (Three Treatise) School represents a number of strands of Indian Buddhist thought that emerged from the writings of Indian monk Nagarjuna (ca. 100–200), including the Dvadasadvaya śāstra (Treatise of Twelve Categories) and the Mulamadhyamaka karika (Middle Stanzas); Pigala’s commentary on the latter work; and the Sata śāstra (Treatise of One Hundred Verses) by Aryadeva (third century). These texts advocated the refutation of all views that impede the attainment of enlightenment and the establishment of correct views through the Middle Path of the two levels of truth.

To dissuade persons from holding on to false ideas concerning reality, Nagarjuna and his disciples developed a dialectic that reduced all assertions to absurdity. By claiming that all assertions concerning existence or non-existence are false, the Sanron Buddhist refutes (1) the Brahmanic idea of atman, (2) the Kusha belief in the eternal existence of dharmas, (3) the Jujitsu assertion of the emptiness of the self and dharmas, and (4) any Mahayanists who assert the truth of sunyata, or emptiness.

The Sanron perspective was introduced to Japan along with the Jujitsu School by Hyekwan, a Korean monk, in 625, during the reign of the Empress Suiko (d. 629), a century before Nara was constructed. Thus it had already been an integral part of the Japanese scene when the new capital was conceived. The Sanron tradition would never develop an independent following, but the study of its central texts continues to the present.

The Sanron position resonates with the Buddha’s reluctance to speculate on the nature of the transcendental—to do so contributes nothing to the relief of human suffering. The realization of nirvana, the unconditioned, stands in contradistinction to samsara, and thus transcends both existence and non-existence. Since nirvana/enlightenment is an intuitive experience that could not be expressed, the early Buddhists described it by explaining what it was not and in the process cast an unduly negative perception of the phenomenal world. The Sanron position rejected both the claim of the eternal reality of dharmas and the assertion of the nominal reality of dharmas and the self by affirming the Middle Way by utilizing the idea of sunyata (emptiness). In his effort to explain nirvana, Nagarjuna describes emptiness to be an experience devoid of all false thoughts. A person dwelling in sunyata is empty of thoughts and exists in selflessness.

In the Middle Stanzas Nagarjuna identifies the real and the ideal with the Middle Way. In the second verse he writes: “‘Pratityasamutpada’ (interdependence) is ‘sunyata’ (emptiness), it alone is the Middle Path.” In the fourth verse he identifies samsara (this world of transitions) with nirvana (enlightenment). “Samsara has nothing that distinguishes it from nirvana. The limit of nirvana is the limit of samsara.” Pratityasamutpada, sunyata, nirvana, and samsara refer to the same reality. Their distinction lay in how they are perceived. Paramatha satya (absolute truth) refers to an intuitive experience; with the cessation of conceptual thought, reality is perceived to be of a single uniform and undifferentiated experience. Sunyata, nirvana, and anatman point to this indescribable experience. In contrast, samvrti satya (conventional truth) refers to commonsense truth; it is the realm of samsara and pratityasamutpada. These two levels of truth are central to Sanron perceptions and to subsequent Mahayana thought. The Middle Path is simply to live in the world of samsara; to reside in nirvana is to be aware of the world’s pitfalls.

The Hosso School The Hosso (also known as the Vijñānavada, the Yogacara, or the Consciousness-only) School derives its name from its special interest in the characteristics of dharmas associated with the various phases of cognition; “hosso” (dharma laksana) means “characteristics of dharma.” The school is based on the writings of three Indian teachers, Maitreya (ca. 270–350, not to be confused with Maitreya, the future Buddha); Asanga (ca. 410–500); and Vasubandhu, the author of the Abhidharmakosha, who posited a Buddhist version of idealism, the notion of mind or consciousness-only, and that the phenomenal realities that we know are manifestations of mental functions. These thinkers do not deny the reality of the physical world; rather they maintain that we know the world through the sensory and cognitive data that are manipulated by the mind.

The most important text of this school is Dharma-pala’s (439–507) Vijnaptimatratasiddhi (Joyuishikiron; Perfection of Consciousness-only), with its 10 annotated commentaries on Vasubandhu’s Vijnaptimatrat

Trimśika (Yuishiki sanjuron; Consciousness-only in Thirty Verses). Vasubandhu reflects on the characteristics of dharmas and explores the process of transformation from ignorance to enlightenment that had been neglected by the other schools.

Unable to locate key documents in his homeland, the monk-traveler Xuanzhang fled China and made his way to Nalanda University in India to study with the Yogacara master Silabhadra (592–645). On his return in 645 he translated the Vijnaptimatratasiddhi and established the Faxiang (Hosso) School. The Japanese priest Dosho (628–700) who studied with Xuanzhang returned home with its teachings.

In contrast with the earlier Kusha's limited interest in the functions of mind, the Yogacara system distinguishes eight varieties of mind-consciousness. The first five associated with the sensory organs are the consciousnesses of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. The sixth is mind-consciousness that coordinates the sensory information that is received from five organs of sense and cognitive data from the seventh. The seventh is manas-consciousness, which receives data from the exterior world processed through mind-consciousness and compares them with information stored in the eighth or alaya-consciousness and reroutes the synthesized information to the sixth-consciousness, enabling it to respond. These multiple levels of mind account for the cognitive understanding of the physical world, imagination, dreams, and memory. The functioning of each of the eight consciousnesses is dependent on activities of other levels of mind.

The alaya-consciousness or storehouse-consciousness is the repository of discrete bits of bijas, or seeds, which evolved from the mind's apprehension of sensory and mental impressions. Dharmic data are not simply impressed on a passive mind, but are processed, distorted, and retained in the alaya-consciousness until retrieved. Bijas serve as a template with which the mind-consciousness compares with sensory dharmic data to make sense of the world. When eye-consciousness spots a long-lost face, the bija or bijas that are associated with that face are retrieved to confirm the fact. In addition to the task of recognition, cognitive experience is often tinted by emotional and other associative factors. If the long-lost face is that of friend, recognition also arouses joy. If the face is that of a tormentor, it may arouse anger. These earlier impressions were deposited in the alaya-consciousness and color the respective manner in which individuals may view subsequent events. The same event gives rise to differing emotions. While most Americans associate the events of 9/11 with horror and grief, those who perpetuated the attack on the World Trade Towers view the events with triumph and joy. Each person's comprehension of the "objective" world is created from past associations and present conditions; this does not mean that the object does not exist, only that the unenlightened do not perceive its true nature.

The soteriological task for the Hosso devotee is to transform the alaya-consciousness into adanajnana, or mirror-wisdom, which will no longer falsely apprehend and fabricate sensory data and mental images. The purification of the alaya-consciousness forms the basis for the transformation of the other seven consciousnesses.

By positing the alaya-consciousness the Yogacarins were able to deflect criticism on the tenability of anatman. Dharmapala, however, asserts that the alaya-consciousness is a separate reality, a position that is found nowhere else in Buddhism.

The Hosso School went on to explain that the mind, depending on the spiritual maturity, perceives "three natures" to any "reality" that appears before it. They are: parikalpita-laksana (illusionary and discriminative nature), paratantra laksana (dependent nature), and parisnispanna-laksana (perfected or true nature). The unenlightened person perceiving the parikalpita-laksana character of the phenomenal world believes phenomena to be independent and eternal, when in fact they are simply manifestations of mind. The person who sees the paratantra-laksana nature of phenomena understands that phenomenal reality is dependent and in constant flux. The enlightened person who grasps the parisnispanna-laksana aspect of phenomenal reality understands that reality is illusionary and temporary manifestations of mind. This understanding transcends both illusionary and temporary reality in the Middle Way. Ultimate reality exists, but not phenomenally; again ultimate reality does not exist, but it is not phenomenal non-existence. It is synonymous with sunyata and nirvana. Imbued with perfect understanding, the enlightened being resides and works in the world of suffering and illusion, an important feature of the Mahayana enlightenment.

The Kegon School The Kegon (or Hauyen) School is based on the Avatamsaka (or Flower Garland) Sutra that first appeared in northeast India between the first and second centuries CE. It emerged as an independent tradition in China through the efforts of Dushun (558–640); Jiyan (602–667); and especially Fazang (643–712), who developed a taxonomy of the several Buddhist schools (and their scriptures). Two of Fazang’s disciples, Daoxuan and Shenxiang, visited Japan where they were able to present Fazang’s approach to Buddhism to Emperor Shomu (724–748). The emperor responded quite positively to the teachings, and as a result ordered the building of Todai-ji and the casting of a large image of Vairocana Buddha, the major character in the Avatamsaka Sutra.

Kegon masters explored the vision that transformed Gautama into the Buddha, the Enlightened One, who on the morning of the enlightenment saw that all dharmas (phenomena) appearing before his mind’s eye were mutually related and interdependent. From this vision, they reasoned that the realm of dharmas, or the dharma-dhatu, is embraced within a single thought and proceeded to describe a psycho-cosmic “metaphysics” that they crystallized in the doctrine of hokkai engi. Hokkai engi includes four visions of reality that correspond to the four levels of spiritual maturity. First, jihokkai, or the world of phenomenal reality, is the common-sense understanding that all existents are independent and distinct. Second, rihokkai, or the realm of universal truth, is the realm that sustains the phenomenal world; it is the realm of sunyata that can be only intuitively apprehended. Third, rijimuge hokkai, the realm of the non-obstruction of phenomena and truth, is a vision that can be seen only by enlightened beings. Enlightened beings apprehend the truth present in every individual existence. Fourth, jijimuge hokkai, the realm of the interfusion of things, articulates the Kegon vision that all existents, while maintaining their individual identity, mutually interrelate and interfuse with each other to create a harmonious whole. The final chapter of the Avatamsaka Sutra also describes the various mental disciplines that need to be mastered to realize the dharmadhatu.

In its early years, the Kegon School enjoyed a certain privilege among the several Nara schools, given the emperor’s favor and its hegemony over the megastatue of vairocana and the ordination platform for monks that were erected in Todai-ji. However, through the succeeding centuries it failed to attract a large following. On two occasions, monk-teachers attempted to revive the tradition—Myoe (1185–1333) during the Kamakura period and Hotan (1657–1738) in the Tokugawa period—but both failed. Kegon exerted considerable influence on later Buddhist developments, particularly Zen, but survives as one of the smaller Japanese groups.

Ritsu School While five of the Nara schools focused on the philosophical issues raised in Buddhist thought, the Ritsu, or Precepts, School was most concerned with the practical matters of faith and the maintenance of the institution, especially the sangha. “Ritsu” focuses on the Buddhist Precepts or Vinaya, the original Buddhist codes of moral and monastic guidelines. The Vinaya was an essential text of the Pali canon of scripture so valued by the Theravada Buddhists.

The original purpose of the Vinaya was a confession of faith and affirmation of community. However during the Buddha’s life time the community instituted 250 articles for monks and 348 for nuns that set forth the rules that govern ordination, retreats, study, the celibate life, judicial codes, voting, and decision making. A second aspect of the code deals with safeguards against crimes and prohibitions against killing, stealing, lying, sexual misconduct, and imbibing intoxicants. Serious violations of the code meant expulsion from the community; lesser violations involved confession and ablution. The Ritsu School maintained that the commitment to and faithful observance of the Vinaya are essential steps to the purification of the mind and to enlightenment. The study of the Vinaya as canonical text has always been part of the Buddhist curricula for all traditions, though Mahayana interpretations vary somewhat from the Theravada.

In Japan, Emperor Shomu (r. 724–749), who took a considerable amount of his time to interact with the Nara schools, was highly concerned that an ordination procedure be put in place to ensure that future monks had a proper understanding of the responsibilities of their position. He commissioned two priests, Eiei and Fusho, to travel to China and determine how best to introduce the vinaya to Japan. As they began their studies, they quickly discovered that to be considered a monk, a candidate must pledge to observe the 250 Vinaya rules at the time of ordination. Both startled and concerned, they begged their Chinese colleague Dao Xuan (702–760) to leave for Japan immediately and begin informing the authorities in Nara of the demands of the Vinaya. He arrived in 736.

It would be almost 20 years later before Jianzhen (known in Japan as Ganjin, 687–763) arrived in Nara (754) with the invitation to formally establish the Ritsu School. Two months after his arrival, the ordination platform was constructed at Todai-ji, and 80 monks of the several schools received their priestly ordination, while other laypersons received the lay precepts. In China and subsequently in Japan a person was not considered to be a cleric until he or she had stepped on the kaidan, or ordination platform, and pledged to observe the Vinaya codes. The Chinese kaidan evolved from the early Buddhist sima, a sacred site in which the ordination took place. The candidate alighted the ordination platform by ascending three steps, representing the emptiness of self, dharmas, and both self and dharmas. The formal ceremony required the presence of at least 10 clerics who would determine the suitability of the candidate.

While Buddhism had been in Japan for more than a century, the transmission of the Vinaya from China to Japan formalized the actual establishment of a Buddhist community in the country. For the next generation, the Ritsu School acted as the exclusive interdenominational guardian of the ordination of the clergy. Its exclusive hold on the rites of ordination would be breached by Saicho (767–822), the founder of Japanese Tendai, who obtained the permission of the emperor to begin to train a few monks at Mount Hiei. The year after his death, permission was given to the Tendai Buddhists to establish an ordination platform on Mount Hiei. But for several centuries, Todai-ji remained the primary place for Buddhist monks to be ordained.

While Ganjin was able to establish the kaidan, it was also the case that Ganjin had to deal with several politically influential clerics who had persuaded the government to set guidelines for clerical conduct that fell short of those demanded in the Vinaya. Ganjin found himself lending legitimacy to this watered-down ordination process and in 758 Ganjin resigned his post at Todai-ji. The next year, he received permission to establish a center for Buddhist studies at Toshodaiji along with a rival kaidan. Because of the problems at Todai-ji and the rise of the Mahayana Vinaya on Mount Hiei, however, formal Vinaya discipline never took hold in Japan.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Buddhism; Hiei, Mount; Mahayana Buddhism; Saicho; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Buddhist Denominations and Schools in Japan*. Tokyo: Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai, 1984.
- Dutt, Sukumar. Buddhist Monks and Monasteries of India. London: George Allan and Unwin, 1962.
- Frauwallner, Erich. Studies in Abhidharma Literature and the Origins of Buddhist Philosophical Systems. Trans. by Sophie Francis Kidd. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1965.
- Kasahara, Kazou, ed. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing, 2001.
- Matsunaga, Daigan, and Alicia Matsunaga. Foundation of Japanese Buddhism. Vol. 1, The Aristocratic Age. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International, 1974.
- Murthy, K. Krishna. Buddhism in Japan. Delhi: Sundeep Prakashan, 1989.
- Ryukoku, Daigaku. Bukkyō yoron. Kyoto: Hakkaen, 1972.
- Saunders, E. Dale. Buddhism in Japan, with an Outline of Its Origins in India. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1964.
- Takakusu, Junjiro. The Essentials of Buddhist Philosophy. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1947.

Naropa

956–1040

Naropa, a key figure in the development of Indian Tantric Buddhism, is honored as one of the primary links in the lineage of the Kagyu School of Tibetan Buddhism, where the Six Yogas of Naropa form an essential element in the advanced teachings. He played an essential role in the transmission of Vajrayana Buddhism to both Tibet and Nepal.

Naropa was the subject of several reverential biographies (hagiographies); however, their contradictions call into question significant facts about his life. Some sources place his birth in Kashmir, while others suggest eastern India. A Tibetan source presents him as a prince who became a monk during his young adult years, while other sources claim that he had a more humble social origin as the son of a liquor dealer. Most sources agree that he was an excellent debater, and he most certainly spent years at Nalanda, the famed Buddhist university complex in Bihar. He seems to have served as the warden at Nalanda's northern gate, where he was assigned the task of discussing Buddhism with visiting scholars.

It is said that he eventually tired of life at Nalanda. Drawn toward the esoteric practices of Tantra, he sought out the Vajrayana teacher Tilopa. Among the more heralded events in his life, Naropa was required to pass through a set of 12 ordeals. Only after his successful completion of the ordeals did Tilopa accept him as a student. The highly motivated Naropa then became Tilopa's most accomplished student, his studies culminating in his full realization of Mahamudra, a direct understanding of the nature and essence of the mind. Soon afterward he settled at Pulahari, a retreat center not far from Nalanda. Through the years he attracted numerous students, the most notable being Marpa Lho-brag-pa (1012–1097), who played a key role in the passing of what became the Kagyu lineage of Tantric Buddhism to Tibet.

Several important works on Vajrayana Buddhism are attributed to Naropa, including commentaries on the Sekoddsha, the latter an important work associated with the secretive Kalachakra Tantra. He is also credited with originating a widely hailed advanced set of techniques known among Tibetans as the "Six Yogas of Naropa."

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Nalanda; Tantrism.

References

- Guenter, Herbert V., trans. The Life and Teaching of Naropa. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1963.
- Mullin, Glenn H., trans. Tsongkhapa's Six Yogas of Naropa. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 1996.
- Yeshe, Lama. Becoming Vajrasattva: The Tantric Path of Purification. Somerville, MA: Wisdom Publications, 2004.

Nation of Islam

The Nation of Islam, popularly known as the Black Muslim movement, emerged in 1930s Detroit. Its militant doctrine combined Islam and Black Nationalism; over the course of the 20th century, it became an influential religious community and an important African American political voice. Its leaders and spokesmen, including such individuals as Elijah Muhammad, Malcolm X, and Louis Farrakhan, influenced not only the Nation's membership, but also played a significant role in the development of African American political identity and served as a counterpoint to the Civil Rights movement.

In 1930 a charismatic salesman named Wallace Fard traveled the streets of Detroit, visiting homes and preaching a new religious doctrine that combined Islam and Black Nationalism. Within three years, he built a substantial following with a cohesive organizational structure that included a school and a security force. From this foundation, the Nation of Islam developed.

Fard disappeared in the early 1930s. His appointed successor, Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975), taught that Fard was Allah incarnate, and that he was his Messenger. White Americans were identified as white devils, and black Americans as Allah's chosen people. The Muslims anticipated an imminent "Fall of America," which would see white America destroyed and black Americans rising to their rightful place as world leaders.

In Message to the Blackman in America, Muhammad directed the Muslims to adhere to a strict moral code and attain a "knowledge of self." They were encouraged to follow strict dietary regulations, which included prohibitions on pork and a "slave diet" (foods such as corn bread and black-eyed peas), and they were forbidden to smoke, drink alcohol, take drugs, and gamble. Muhammad also encouraged racial pride. Many members took the surname “X” to symbolize both the mysterious origins and the power of the black American community.

Nation of Islam security guards flank the stage as their leader, Louis Farrakhan, speaks behind bullet-proof glass during the Million Man March in Washington, D.C., October 16, 1995. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the late 1940s, the Nation converted Malcolm Little. He adopted the name Malcolm X (1925–1965), and rapidly advanced through the movement’s ranks. He was a minister and recruiter; among those he converted were Cassius Clay and Louis Farrakhan. A rift developed between Elijah and Malcolm in the early 1960s, which eventually led to Malcolm’s expulsion from the Nation. He converted to orthodox Islam, and founded a new movement, but was assassinated on February 21, 1965.

Elijah Muhammad led the Nation until his death in 1975. His son Wallace succeeded him, and, following trends that emerged late in Elijah’s leadership, rapidly moved the Nation toward orthodox Islam. Although most Muslims accepted these changes, some did not. Among those who did not was Louis Farrakhan. He left in 1978, returned to Elijah Muhammad’s original doctrine, and re-established the Nation of Islam.

Farrakhan’s charisma, coupled with his attention to proselytism, saw the movement grow rapidly. Several events soon made him notorious with the American public. In 1984, when Jesse Jackson ran for the leadership of the American Democratic Party, Farrakhan declared that he would, for the first time, register to vote, and encouraged his followers to do the same. His vocal support for Jackson, however, brought media attention to anti-Zionist themes in his rhetoric. As well, during this period the Nation received several large financial gifts from Libya (including one loan for $5 million). By the close of the 1980s, however, Farrakhan had moved the Nation closer to a more traditional form of Islam, observing Friday prayers and Ramadan, and encouraging members to engage in Koranic study. During the 1990s, Farrakhan and the Nation worked toward reconciliation with Wallace Muhammad (Warith Deen Muhammad) and the more orthodox Muslim American Society, a notable milestone in Farrakhan's move toward orthodox Islam. Scholars suggest that this trend will eventually culminate with Farrakhan moving the Nation's followers to traditional Islam. In this decade, too, he continued to engage the larger American political community. In October 1995, he orchestrated the Million Man March on Washington, a controversial "day of atonement" for black American men. The March drew hundreds of thousands of participants, a success that emphasized the importance of Farrakhan's political voice.

The 2008 election of Barack Obama as president of the United States posed a significant challenge to the Nation of Islam; the organization's doctrine in part reflects the view that African Americans have no effective access to political power. In an interview following the election Farrakhan stated that he never thought he would live to see the day that a black man became president, and that America was "changing." Indeed, should America allow the black community to demonstrate its excellence, Farrakhan commented, it might well be that America has evolved into a "post-racial" nation. His comments on these developments further suggest that in the future, both Farrakhan and the Nation will move closer to the religious and political mainstream.

The headquarters of the Nation of Islam are in Chicago, and its mosques can be found across the United States, as well as in Canada, France, and the United Kingdom. It continues to publish The Final Call, a newspaper that publicizes its doctrine (available online at <http://www.finalcall.com>) and comments on current religious and political events.

Nation of Islam

7351 South Stony Island Ave.

Chicago, IL 60649

<http://www.noi.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Islam; Warith Deen Muhammad, Ministry of.

References

- Curtis, Edward E. Black Muslim Religion in the Nation of Islam, 1960–1975. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.
- Farrakhan, Louis. A Torchlight for America. Chicago: FCN Publishing, 1993.
- Gardell, Mattias. In the Name of Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Muhammad, Elijah. History of the Nation of Islam. Cleveland, OH: Sectarius Publications, 1994.

Nation of Yahweh

The Nation of Yahweh is a relatively small group that continues the tradition of black nationalism within the African American community. It was founded by Hulon Mitchell, Jr., better known by his religious name, Yahweh ben Yahweh (1935–2007). Raised as a Pentecostal, as a young man he joined the Nation of Islam and rose to become the leader of a mosque. However, he left the mosque and began to call African Americans together as Black Israelites, the followers of Yahweh.

Drawing themes from the teachings of Black Jews that had appeared throughout the 20th century in the United States, Yahweh ben Yahweh taught that there was only one God, that his name was Yahweh, that he had black woolly hair, and that he had sent his son, Yahweh ben Yahweh, to the African American people as their savior and deliverer. He identified African Americans as the true lost tribes of Israel, and upon accepting Yahweh, members take the last name "Israel" as a means of rejecting their slave past. Those who oppose God, of whatever color, are the devil. Though Yahweh had a special love for black people and a special animus for white people as the oppressor, ultimately individual white people could be saved by faith in Yahweh ben Yahweh.

Through the 1980s, the Yahwehites spread across the United States, their white clothing becoming a familiar sight in the African American community. By the end of the decade, centers had been established in

Nation of Yahweh service. The Nation of Yahweh moved to Miami in 1979 and set up the Nation of Yahweh under the leadership of Yahweh Ben Yahweh. (Ed Kashi/Corbis)

37 cities and members owned a number of businesses associated with the movement. Movement leaders saw themselves as establishing a united moral power within the African American community that would support voter registration, black-owned businesses, health education, scholarships for college, better housing, and strong family ties. They opposed the spread of drugs in the community.

However, during the late 1980s, stories began to circulate that leaders in the group had engaged in multiple acts of violence and murder, especially in the early 1980s. These rumors surfaced in 1986 after some people were shot during an eviction procedure in an apartment house owned by the Yahwehites. Then in 1988, a former member confessed to 4 murders and implicated Yahweh ben Yahweh and 12 other leaders.

Yahweh ben Yahweh and several other members were arrested and in the early 1990s convicted in federal court of conspiracy to murder. They received lengthy sentences, though Yahweh ben Yahweh was released in 2001, on the condition that he not associate with the group he had founded.

The group has survived, but it no longer is the growing enterprise that it had become at the time of the trial that brought down their founder. Headquarters were relocated from Miami to Quebec, Canada, where it reorganized legally as the Abraham Foundation. Its publishing branch, the P.E.E.S.S. (“Politically, Economically, Educationally, Socially, Spiritually”) Foundation, with offices in suburban Montreal and in Seguin, Texas, publishes and circulates the group’s materials.

Nation of Yahweh
P.E.E.S.S. Foundation
PO Box 520
Kirkland, PQ
Canada H9H
www.yahwehbenyahweh.com/.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Nation of Islam.

References

- Freedburg, Sydney P. Brother Love: Murder, Money, and a Messiah. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Hamill, Pete. "Mr. God Raises Hell." Esquire 115 (1991): 34.
- "Nation of Yahweh." New Religions Web Site. <http://religiousmovements.lib.virginia.edu/nrms/nyah.html>. Accessed September 15, 2001.

National Association of Congregational Christian Churches

During the Puritan era in the 17th century, believers who agreed upon particulars of Reformed theology disagreed upon church polity, some opting for congregationalism and others the presbyterian system. While Presbyterians dominated in England, Congregationalists settled in the American colonies and became the favored elite in New England through the 18th century and into the 19th.

In the 20th century, the Congregational churches took a leading role in the ecumenical movement and demonstrated their leadership with two important mergers. The first was in 1931 with congregations from the Christian Church, a church with a congregational polity from the Free church tradition. Then in the 1950s the Congregational Christian churches moved toward union with the Evangelical and Reformed Church, a church with which they shared many theological affinities but one that had a presbyterian organizational background. At stake was congregational ownership of parish property versus some centralized ownership based in presbyteries and synods.

In 1957 the union was consummated and the United Church of Christ came into being with mixed elements of congregational and presbyterian polity. Among the Congregationalists were individuals who feared and rejected any compromise on the congregational polity they had come to enjoy. Anticipating the 1957 union, they met in 1955 in Detroit and formed the National Association of Congregational Christian Churches. That meeting had been sponsored by two anti-union organizations, the League to Uphold Congregational Principles and the Committee for the Continuation of Congregational Christian Churches.

The National Association was formed as a fellowship of autonomous congregations that cannot and does not make pronouncements binding upon the local churches. However, it does undertake cooperative programs that extend the ministry of the local churches. Such programs have been initiated in ministerial career development, Christian education at all levels, church extension, and communications. One important area of cooperation has been in home and foreign missions. The association has supported the development of new congregational churches in the United States and missions in 12 countries in different parts of the world.

In 2001, the association reported 65,000 members in 432 congregations. It is a member of the International Congregational Fellowship.

National Association of Congregational Christian Churches
8473 S. Howell Ave.
PO Box 1620
Oak Creek, WI 53154-0620
<http://www.naccc.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Congregational Fellowship; United Church of Christ.

References

- Burton, Malcolm K. Destiny for Congregationalism. Oklahoma City, OK: Modern Publishers, 1953.
- Cowen, Gerald P. Who Rules the Church? Examining Congregational Leadership and Church Government. Nashville: B&H Publishing Group, 2003.
- Kohl, Manfred Waldemar. Congregationalism in America. Oak Creek, WI: Congregational Press, 1977.

National Association of Free Will Baptists

The National Association of Free Will Baptists continues the tradition of Arminian theology that has divided the Baptist community over the centuries. Baptists emerged as one element in the larger Puritan community, the English phase of the spread of Reformed theology. Reformed theology, as originally stated by John Calvin (1509–1564), had emphasized the sovereignty of God and hence the predestination of those who would be saved by Christ's saving act. As the Reformation became established in Holland, Dutch theologian Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) developed a Reformed theology that left a place for the human response in faith to God's grace. Arminian theology left the door open for the role of human free will in Protestant theology.

In the United States, the institutionalization of Free Will Baptist theology came in 1727 with the organization of a church at Perquimans, Chowan County, North Carolina, by Paul Palmer (d. ca. 1770). Other churches were subsequently formed, and in 1752 some 16 churches associated together in a yearly meeting. As this growth continued, they formed a general conference in 1827. A statement of belief was issued in 1834. A similar development of Free Will Baptists occurred in the northern states, and a 1896 Triennial Convention included congregations from across the South and as far north as Ohio. In 1911 the Free Will Baptists in New England merged into the North Baptist Convention (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.). Meanwhile, a number of disconnected Free Will congregations in the West (Texas, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Missouri) joined together as the General Co-operative Association of Free Will Baptists. They established headquarters in Tecumseh, Oklahoma, where they opened a school.

In 1935 the general conference in the South united with the General Co-operative Association to form the National Association of Free Will Baptists. Like most Baptists elsewhere, the new association championed the autonomy of the local congregations while providing an effective instrument for cooperative action, especially in church growth, education, and missions.

Free Will Baptists had existed in Canada since the early 19th century. They came together in 1832 as the Christian Conference Church, later renamed the Free Christian Baptists. In the 1870s, George W. Orser, one of the ministers, began to call for a new biblical church order. He opposed formal education of ministers and the paying of ministerial salaries. He eventually withdrew from the Free Christian Baptists and formed the Primitive Baptist Conference of New Brunswick, Maine, and Nova Scotia. The church eventually centered on Hartland, New Brunswick, where it had formed its own educational institution, the Saint John Valley Bible College. In 1981 the church joined with the National Association of Free Will Baptists as its Canadian conference.

The Association has its headquarters at Antioch, Tennessee. It supports four colleges. In 2005 it reported 187,193 members in some 2,399 congregations in the United States with an additional 10 congregations in the associated Atlantic Canada Conference. Although foreign missions had begun in the 19th century, the formation of the association allows a more effective mission program to develop. Currently, work is supported in Spain, Panama, Cuba, Brazil, Uruguay, France, the Ivory Coast, India, and Japan. The national associations from around the world are now united in the International Association of Free Will Baptist Churches (<http://www.ifofwbc.org/>).

Free Will Baptists are unique among Baptist bodies as one of the groups that supports three ordinances: baptism, the Lord's Supper, and foot washing (a practice derived from their reading of the Bible, John 13:4–17). The national Association remains theologically conservative. It joined the National Association of Evangelicals for a period but eventually withdrew. It has not associated with the Baptist World Alliance.

National Association of Free Will Baptists
PO Box 5002
Antioch, TN 37011-5002
<http://www.nafwb.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Arminius, Jacob; Baptist World Alliance; Calvin, John.

References

- Cox, Violet. Missions on the Move. Nashville: The Woman's National Auxiliary Convention, [1966].
- Davidson, William F. The Free Will Baptists in America. Nashville: Randall House Press, 1985.
- Picirilli, Robert E. History of the Free Will Baptist Associations. Nashville: Randall House Publications, 1976.

National Baptist Convention of America

The National Baptist Convention of America emerged out of a controversy regarding the newly formed National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. When the latter Convention formed in 1895, it followed the organizational pattern of the American Baptists, allowing a considerable amount of autonomy to its boards and agencies. Among these was the National Baptist Publishing Board, a structure incorporated prior to the formation of the convention. While serving as the convention's publishing arm, R. H. Boyd (1843–1922), the head of the board, increasingly operated independently and even contrary to the wishes of the Convention.

The issues between the board and the Convention culminated in 1915 with a court case that established the independence of the board. Following the ruling, Boyd and his supporters withdrew from the Convention and formed the National Baptist Convention of America. There were no doctrinal issues at stake, and the two conventions developed parallel programs. Through the rest of the century, the National Baptist Convention of America would grow, but it never rivaled its parent body.

The new Convention aligned itself with the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention, through which the Convention would focus its foreign missionary activity. That cooperation ended in the 1940s, and the Convention organized its own foreign missions board.

The strength of the Convention has been the publishing concern, both the literature it prints and the leadership it provides. However, the issue of its independence arose again in the 1980s and led to a split and the formation of the National Baptist Missionary Convention in 1989. Again, no doctrinal issues were at stake in the controversy.

The National Baptist Convention of America is organized congregationally, and the Convention facilitates fellowship and cooperation between affiliated congregations. The Convention supports missionary work in Jamaica, Panama, and several African nations. It co-sponsors two seminaries with the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. The Convention is a member of the Baptist World Alliance and the World Council of Churches. In 2000, the Convention reported 3,500,000 members.

National Baptist Convention of America
777 S R Thornton Frwy., Ste. 210
Dallas TX 75203
<http://www.nbca-inc.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.; World Council of Churches.

References

- Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1985.
- Pelt, Owen D., and Ralph Lee Smith. The Story of the National Baptists. New York: Vantage Press, 1960.

National Baptist Convention of Mexico

The National Baptist Convention of Mexico traces its roots to the organization of the first Baptist congregation in Mexico on January 30, 1864, in Monterrey. The congregation was formed by James Hickey, then in Mexico as an agent of the American Bible Society. This church would reproduce itself six times over the remainder of the decade. One member of the original church, Thomas Westrup, served as a missionary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society (now a constituent part of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.). John Westrup, Thomas's brother, organized three churches in northern Mexico during the late 1870s. In 1880 he was hired as a missionary by the Southern Baptist Convention's Foreign Mission Board, but he was assassinated before the year was out. However, through the rest of the century, both Baptist organizations sent more than 50 missionaries into Mexico. The first regional conventions were organized in 1884 and 1885.

In 1903 representatives from congregations of both American groups and some independent congregations affiliated with the National Sunday School Convention met in Mexico City and formed what became the National Baptist Convention of Mexico. Among its first tasks was the election of delegates to the 1905 gathering of the Baptist World Association.

The Baptist work in Mexico spread until 1910 but was decimated during the Revolution (1910–1917), when both property and lives were lost. Meetings of the Convention were suspended in 1912. The secular government established in 1917 nationalized church property, restricted church worship, and allowed only Native Mexicans to lead congregations. Only 54 churches were represented at the 1919 meeting of the Convention. Although the Convention revived its evangelism in Mexico City and along the Rio Grande Valley, the Southern Baptists extended its missionary activity independently, especially in the creation of several institutions. In 1977 two of these, a seminary in Mexico City and a hospital in Guadalajara, were turned over to the Convention. The Southern Baptists also agreed to work in a coordinated fashion with the Convention. By 1993 the Southern Baptist work was fully integrated into the Convention, which that same year was registered with the government as a separate religious organization.

In 2007 the Convention reported 150,000 members in 1,550 churches. It publishes a periodical, La Luz Bautista, and supports two seminaries. It has extended its work to include 10 of the different language groups of the Native inhabitants of Mexico, which is a predominantly Spanish-speaking country. It also began missionary work in Honduras. The two American bodies continue to support the work of the Convention, and other groups such as the North American Baptist Convention and the Baptist General Conference have added their support of personnel and money. At the same time, through the decades following World War II, a variety of other Baptist groups launched independent missionary efforts, that of the fundamentalist Baptist Bible Fellowship International being the most successful. The Convention is a member of the Baptist World Alliance.

National Baptist Convention of Mexico
Vizcainas Oriente No. 16 Ote.
060080 Mexico, D.F.
Mexico
<http://www.bautistas.org.mx/> (in Spanish)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Baptist World Alliance; Southern Baptist Convention.

References

- Carnett, Daniel B. Contending for the Faith: Southern Baptists in New Mexico, 1938–1995. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2002.
- Patterson, Frank W. A Century of Baptist History in Mexico. El Paso, TX: Baptist Spanish Publishing House, 1979.

National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., the largest African American religious body in the world, is rooted in the efforts of American Baptists to evangelize African Americans throughout the 19th century. The first African American Baptists had appeared during the colonial era, and in 1758 the first congregation was formed in Virginia. Many blacks in the northern states were attracted to the church, and independent congregations began to form in communities with a significant African American presence. However, it was not until the 1830s that large numbers of black people were attracted to the church. The first African American Baptist association was formed in Ohio in 1934.

Prior to the American Civil War, most African American Baptists were members of the several predominantly white Baptist bodies, and after the war the American Baptists (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) made special efforts to cultivate black Baptist membership. However, although many blacks were happy to remain a part of the larger American Baptist Fellowship, others rejected their exclusion from the highest levels of the denomination and began to create institutions controlled by African Americans.

Nannie Helen Burroughs holds the banner of the Women's Convention of the National Baptist Convention, 1900. (Library of Congress)

A variety of organizational attempts led in 1880 to the formation of the Baptist Foreign Mission Convention of the U.S.A. (generally accepted as the founding date of the National Baptists). A structure for congregational fellowship, the American National Baptist Convention, was formed in 1886. The Baptist National Educational Convention emerged in 1893. These three bodies merged in 1895 to form the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. (Many African Americans continued to affiliate with the American Baptists and today constitute approximately one-third of that body's membership.)

The new denomination followed the organizational pattern of the American Baptists, with the semi-autonomous boards that served the cause of Christian education and foreign missions relating directly to the affiliated congregations. Controversy arose immediately, and those who wished to continue a relationship with the American Baptists in the area of missions withdrew to form the independent Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention.

The next major controversy to hit the Convention occurred because of its failure to create a publishing house. Publishing for the Convention was primarily handled by the National Baptist Publishing Board, which had been incorporated separately under the leadership of R. H. Boyd (1843–1922). He began to operate independently of the directions offered by the Convention, and in 1915 the board's independence was upheld in court. The trial became the occasion for Boyd and his supporters to found the rival National Baptist Convention of America.

Under the leadership of Reverend Elias Camp Morris (1855–1922), however, the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., recovered from its losses and moved forward with a newly founded, Convention-controlled publishing house and went on to eclipse the older Methodist denominations in membership. The Morris era was followed by lengthy presidential terms for Lacey K. Williams (1871–1940), D. V. Jemison (1875–1954), and Joseph H. Jackson (1900–1990).

During Jackson's lengthy tenure (1953–1982), opposition to his philosophy of civil rights developed with the rise of Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), a young Baptist pastor in Alabama who had become the center of a movement centered on nonviolent confrontation with the authorities and the demand for the immediate end to racial segregation in the American South. King's approach ran counter to Jackson's belief in the gradual elimination of discriminating structures. Those most supportive of King and most opposed to Jackson's continued domination of the Convention left in 1961 to form the Progressive National Baptist Convention.

Jackson's lengthy tenure finally ended in 1982, and he was succeeded by Theodore J. Jemison. The election of Jemison, an activist in the Civil Rights movement in Louisiana, represented a change of direction for the formerly conservative Convention. Jemison also led the National Baptists into finally building a national headquarters building in Nashville, Tennessee, though the official headquarters of the Convention continues to be centered in the church pastored by the president.

In the 1990s, the Convention was traumatized when its president, Henry Lyons, was arrested and convicted of embezzling church funds. In 1999, the current president, Dr. William J. Shaw, pastor of White Rock Baptist Church in Philadelphia, assumed office and immediately moved to reorganize the Convention's financial affairs to pay off the debt incurred by Lyons and to create a system that would prevent such occurrences in the future.

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., is led by its president but is organized congregationally. There are various estimates of the membership of the convention's churches, but in 2004, it reported five million members. It supports one college, two universities, and four theological seminaries. The Convention is a member of the Baptist World Alliance and the World Council of Churches.

The National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.
1700 Baptist World Center Dr.
Nashville, TN 37207
<http://www.nationalbaptist.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; National Baptist Convention of America; Progressive National Baptist Convention; World Council of Churches.

References

- Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1985.
- Jackson, Joseph H. A Story of Christian Activism. Nashville: Townsend Press, 1980.
- Pelt, Owen D., and Ralph Lee Smith. The Story of the National Baptists. New York: Vantage Press, 1960.

National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon

Protestantism entered the territory of the former Ottoman Empire early in the 19th century, when Reformed missionaries from the United States and the British Isles established a mission. Missionaries working in what is today Lebanon and Syria were recognized by the Ottoman authorities in 1848. That year, an initial congregation was established in Beirut. Throughout the rest of the century additional missions were initiated by various Protestant bodies from France, Switzerland, Denmark, and Holland.

Following the fall of the Ottoman Empire, the present state of Lebanon was carved out of the empire's former territory. At that time, the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon was formed by the association of several small presbyteries that had been established in Lebanon. In 1959 the Synod assumed responsibility of a number of the missions that had been established in Lebanon and Syria. Worship in these churches is primarily in Arabic.

In 2005 the Synod reported approximately 20,000 members in 38 congregations. It has a presbyterian polity and directs a ministry through its many schools and medical facilities. The Synod is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the Middle East Council of Churches, and the World Council of Churches.

National Evangelical Synod of Syria
PO Box 70890
Rabieh, St. 34
Antelias
Lebanon

The Synod is closely related to the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon, which also carries the heritage of evangelical church life prior to the establishment of the state of Lebanon. The original congregation in Beirut became a center around which a small number of congregations gravitated, drawing on it for pastoral care and administrative guidance. These congregations made their relationship official in the early 1960s with the formation of the National Evangelical Union of Lebanon. In contrast to the Synod, the Union is organized with a congregational polity. In the 1990s it reported 9 congregations and 2,000 members. The Union is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Middle East Council of Churches.

National Evangelical Union of Lebanon
PO Box 11 5224
Al Kanissa Al Injiliah
Beirut
Lebanon

The Union and the Synod are related to each other through the Supreme Council of the Evangelical Community in Syria and Lebanon, which also includes the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East. The members of the Council support the Near East School of Theology in Beirut. All three churches suffered during the Civil War (1975–1991), which led to the destruction of much church property and the migration of many members to the United States and Australia.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Middle East Council of Churches; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Chopourian, G. H. The Armenian Evangelical Reformation: Causes and Effects. New York: Armenian Missionary Association of America, 1972.

National Presbyterian Church in Mexico

The National Presbyterian Church in Mexico dates to the beginning of Presbyterian work in Mexico by the United Presbyterian Church of North America (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) in Mexico City following the granting of religious freedom in the country in 1857. Other churches soon followed, including the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (now also a part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), the Congregationalists (now part of the United Church of Christ), and the Associate Presbyterian Church. The work of the United Presbyterians spread south and east from Mexico City toward Yucatan.

The first presbytery was established in Zacatecas in 1883, and others soon followed. The previous year a theological seminary was opened in Mexico City. What became the National Presbyterian Church began in 1901 when the United Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. decided to unite their work in Mexico. The process of developing indigenous leadership that had begun with the founding of the seminary was greatly accelerated by the adoption of the new Constitution by Mexico in 1917, which allowed only Native Mexicans to lead congregations. In 1920, with the assistance of the Reformed Church in America, the National Presbyterian Church expanded into Chiapas.

In the years immediately after World War II, the church experienced two schisms. A local controversy led to the formation of the Independent Presbyterian Church in 1947. Then in the 1950s, Reverend Carl McIntire (b. 1906–2002), a Fundamentalist Presbyter-rian from the United States, brought to Mexico his fight against the modernist tendencies he saw invading mainstream Presbyterianism and found some support among Mexican Presbyterians. In the early 1950s his supporters formed the National Conservative Presbyterian Church.

The National Presbyterian Church in Mexico became a part of the world ecumenical community, joining both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches though it has subsequently withdrawn from the latter. Closer to home, in 1995 it joined with the Presbyterian Reformed Church and the Associate Presbyterian Reformed Church to create the Alliance of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches in the Republic of Mexico.

The church has a presbyterial polity, and its general assembly is the highest legislative body. It recognizes the Heidelberg Catechism, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, the Westminster Confession, and the Belgic Confession in a statement it authored on its doctrinal perspective. In the 1990s it reported 1.2 million members in 4,800 congregations. The work is organized into 40 presbyteries and 7 synods. Six of the presbyteries are located in southern Mexico working among the indigenous peoples of the states of Chiapas, Oaxaca, and Huasteca Potosina. The seminary in Mexico City has now been joined by five additional ministerial training schools.

National Presbyterian Church in Mexico
Arenal 36
Col. Agri. Chimalistac
01050 Mexico, D.F
Mexico

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Reformed Church in America; United Church of Christ; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI:

William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

National Spiritualist Association of Churches

The National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC) is the oldest and largest organization of churches to emerge out of the 19th-century Spiritualist movement in the United States. As Spiritualism developed, it was given structure by a number of state Spiritualist associations. The movement was seen by many of its earliest exponents as having a “scientific” purpose—to demonstrate life after death—rather than as a new religion. However, in the decades after the Civil War, Spiritualist churches were founded and many began to advocate a Spiritualist approach to theology. Thus, in 1893, a number of leading Spiritualists, including Chicago medium Cora L. Richmond (1840–1923) and two former Unitarian clergymen, James M. Peebles (1822–1922) and Harrison D. Barrett (1863–1911), founded the National Spiritualist Association (later adding the words “of Churches” to the title). They initially drew support from some of the state associations and a few of the prominent camp meeting establishments. Among the reasons for forming such a national movement was the need to attack fraudulent mediumship, which many had seen as harming the movement.

In 1899, the Association adopted a six-article Declaration of Principles, later expanded to nine articles. These articles expressed the authors’ faith in life after death as being a proven fact, demonstrated by the phenomena of Spiritualism. The NSAC has tended to focus upon mental phenomena, that is, mediumship, rather than the physical phenomena that were so much at issue in charges of fraud directed at the larger Spiritualist movement. The Association also called for a moral life based upon the biblical Golden Rule, “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” Drawing upon contemporary science, the Declaration of Principles looked upon nature as an expression of God or infinite intelligence, and it noted that happiness is a result of following nature’s laws. It affirmed the existence of both physical and spiritual laws.

The NSAC has generally taken a negative stance toward two issues of importance to Spiritualists. First, it has not upheld the belief in reincarnation that was so staunchly advocated by the Theosophical Society and some Spiritualists early in the 20th century who accepted the idea from competing organizations. Second, Spiritualists have carried on a lengthy debate over the relation of Spiritualism to Christianity. Many individual Spiritualists see the experiences that are common in the movement as similar to experiences described in the Bible. However, the Association as a whole sees Spiritualism as distinct from Christianity, though they draw a distinction between primitive Christianity (with which they feel an affinity) and contemporary Christianity, which they see as a very different reality.

The Association has a fraternal connection to the National Spiritualist Church of Canada in Ontario and Quebec but has only cursory relationships with the Spiritualist movement in Great Britain and has been at odds with Spiritualists in France and Brazil where reincarnation is widely accepted. In 2009, the NSAC reported 89 member congregations. Seven state associations and 13 camps are affiliated with the NSAC.

National Spiritualist Association of Churches (U.S.)
Morris Pratt Institute
11811 Watertown Plank Road
Milwaukee, WI 53226
<http://www.nsac.org/>

Marika Speckmann

See also: Spiritualism; Theosophical Society (America).

References

- Holms, A. Campbell. The Fundamental Facts of Spiritualism. Indianapolis, IN: Stow Memorial Foundation, n.d.
- Judah, J. Stillson. The History and Philosophy of the Metaphysical Movements in America. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1967.
- Leonard, Todd Jay. Talking to the Other Side: A History of Modern Spiritualism and Mediumship: A Study of the Religion, Science, Philosophy and Mediums That Encompass This American-Made Religion. New York: iUniverse, Inc., 2005.
- One Hundredth Anniversary of Modern American Spiritualism*. Chicago: National Spiritualist Association of Churches, 1948.

Native American Church

In the early 1890s many of the traditional Indian ways of worship were being banished. However, at that time, the longstanding ritual use of the cactus plant peyote (Lophophora williamsii) was formalized into new ceremonies. Under the inspiration of the medicine men Quanah Parker (ca. 1845–1911; parents: Comanche, white) and John Wilson (ca. 1840–1901; parents: Delaware, Caddo-French), two different traditions of the new peyote religion, which today is called the Native American Church (NAC), diverged into distinct practices known as the Comanche Half Moon (also Little Moon and Way of the Sioux) and the Wilson Big Moon (also Cross Fire and Old Way). Both ritual forms fuse ancient Mexican, Plains Indian, and Christian themes. The Wilson Big Moon variant typically omits the water ceremonies that Quanah Parker had established, including the ritual water call and the blessing of people with water, celebrating an old Indian belief that water is a life-giving substance.

Peyote grows naturally only in north-central Mexico and in a limited area on the dry, rocky hills north of the Rio Grande River near Laredo, Texas. It contains at least 57 alkaloids, including the psychoactive alkaloid mescaline. Since the 1880s peyote from this region was cut and dried for shipment to communicants in the United States. Probably the Carrizo culture, which once occupied the area that extends from Laredo to the Gulf of Mexico, was instrumental in the early development of peyote meetings. Carrizo peyote rituals that were observed in 1649 included all-night dancing around a fire, but without the tepee or lodge used today. The western neighbors of the Carrizo, the Lipan Apache, seem to have transformed the Carrizo ceremony before teaching it to the Kiowa, Kiowa-Apache, and Comanche.

The Half Moon ritual appears to have been formalized by the Comanche in the 1880s. The Big Moon rite was also formalized about 1880. It spread between 1890 and 1908 among the Shawnee, Caddo, Seneca, Delaware, Quapaw, Potawatomi, and above all the Osage, and it was carried and transformed by different local “prophets,” such as Jonathan Koshiway (b. 1886; father: Sauk and Fox, mother: Otoe) and John Rave (ca. 1855–1917; Nebraska Winnebago). From the Kiowa, Navajo Indians at a peyote ceremony near Pinon, Arizona. The hallucinogen peyote is considered sacred by Native Americans and is used in religious practices to combat spiritual, physical, and other social ills. (Richard Erdoes/MPI/Getty Images) the Comanche, and the Caddo, the new religion spread to the eastern Great Basin, in Colorado, by 1896. It appeared throughout the Great Basin and into southern Canada beginning in the 1910s.

In 1918 the state of Oklahoma repealed an earlier territorial ban against the peyote sacrament and granted a charter authorizing the NAC. Peyotists in other states received similar authorization, and a national church was formed in 1934–1944. In 1945–1955 the NAC was organized into the NAC of Oklahoma and the NAC of North America. The main purpose of those incorporations was to legalize peyote as a sacrament.

The NAC ethical code constitutes a way of life, which is called Peyote Road. This ethic has four main parts: brotherly love, care of family, self-reliance, and avoidance of alcohol, in addition to truthfulness, economic self-sufficiency, praying for the sick, and praying for peace. There is no formal teaching or learning of the rituals through books, schools, or lectures. In the Christian element, which is mostly confined to Siouan-speaking groups, members are free to interpret Bible passages according to their own understanding.

From its earliest days the ceremony has consisted of an all-night prayer meeting in a tepee, lodge, or hogan around a crescent-shaped mound of earth, a sacred fire, and a special peyote button, today called Grandfather Peyote or Chief. Roadman, Cedar chief, and Drummer chief sit together opposite the door. The Fireman sits on the opposite side of the circle next to the door. Around the sacred elements in the center of the lodge, the water drum, gourd rattle, and staff are passed while peyote songs are sung, prayers are offered, sacred tobacco is smoked, cedar is burned, and peyote is ingested. At midnight the ritual is interrupted by special songs and a bucket of water is brought in to be blessed, mostly by the Fireman. At dawn there is another water ceremony, as the Water Woman carries holy water into the meeting along with her prayers. The morning water is followed by a ritual breakfast of corn, water, fruit, and meat, prepared by women. The singing, drumming, and praying last all night (10 to 14 hours). Finally the morning sun is greeted with hands raised to heaven and thanks given to the Creator.

In the first part of NAC history, women were usually not admitted to take part in ritual. Yet the importance of male and female complementarity is reflected in NAC myth and ritual. It is widely believed that being inside the tepee represents being inside the womb of the Mother, and the drum is the sound of the fetal heart-beat. According to many peyote origin myths, this religion was brought to the Indians by a woman, called Peyote Woman, and it is kept by men. In Navajo Peyotism the cactus itself is referred to as Female Medicine ('azee' ba'áád) or Mother (shimá 'azee').

For some, the NAC serves as a bridge between the ancient and modern systems of belief. Praying in peyote meetings appears to have much of the psychological flavor of the old vision quest. The NAC has often been bracketed with the Ghost Dance religion, which also taught the value of peaceful intertribal relations. (Although many other authors have repeated this idea, first set forth by Shonle [1925], historical documents establish that Peyotism had become an active ritual before Wovoka had directed the first Ghost Dance about 1889.) However, claims for the therapeutic effect of peyote are controversial, although several published reports have attempted to determine whether peyote used in the ritual of the NAC is effective in the treatment of alcoholism.

After 1965, the ceremonial use of peyote by Indians was protected by federal regulation. Although 28 states had by then enacted laws in conformance with the federal regulation, 22 states had not done so. In 1990 the Supreme Court prohibited the use and possession of peyote for all Americans. A 1995 law provided an exemption, declaring that although possession of peyote and its derivatives is illegal in the United States, Native Americans may use it for religious purposes.

The NAC has no professional paid clergy. Beyond the Roadmen, who lead the meetings, there are official leading positions for chairmen and the president of the NAC. The church is organized into regional, state, and national groups throughout North America. The members belong to some 70 Native American nations. In the continental United States, every state west of the Mississippi has at least one chapter; in all there are 80 chapters.

The NAC is the most widespread religion currently practiced by American Indians. By 1930, it was estimated that half the Indian population belonged to the church. The NAC membership in Navajoland ranged from 12 to 14 percent in 1951 to 40 to 50 percent in the 1980s. At the end of the 1960s there were an estimated 250,000 Peyotists, one-quarter of all Indians in the United States and Canada. In the 1980s the membership from more than 50 North American Indian tribes included some 100,000 adherents. In 1995 there was again a total membership of around 250,000, belonging to more than 70 Native American nations. A directory of Native American Churches has been developed by the Utah branch (<http://web.archive.org/web/20050308162749/www.utah-nac.org/nacindex.html>).

The spread of Peyotism beyond North America is not known. An example of non-Indian membership can be found in 1968, when a group with young whites took peyote in a ritual way, which was incorporated in New Mexico as the American Church of God and had a steady membership of some 200 people. Four-fifths of the group were whites. The rest were Indians, mostly 50 to 70 years old, from tribes all over the Southwest.

The peyote ritual in the United States was first reported by J. Lee Hall in 1886, an Indian agent for the U.S. government. Then in 1890 it was described by James Mooney, who researched peyote meetings among the Kiowa in Oklahoma. The earliest general historical and comparative study was written by Weston La Barre, who traveled to and studied peyote meetings among 15 tribes in the United States in 1935 and 1936. During the years after 1936 Omer Stewart visited peyote meetings; since 1960 he appeared in court to help defend the right of Peyotists (see, for example, Stewart 1987). Slotkin published a famous fieldwork report in 1956. Fieldwork accounts written by David Aberle (for example, 1966) specialized in Navajo Peyotism.

Among more recent work, a study about the NAC written by Silvester Brito (1989) is remarkable as he is the first Indian Peyotist to write an academic work about his religion. Peter Gerber (1975) explains the NAC as a crisis movement. In 1996 Huston Smith and the NAC Roadman Reuben Snake compiled testimonies of NAC members showing the church's struggle to survive in the face of constitutional debates. Marika Speckmann (1999) describes the NAC morning water ceremony, comparing it with other Indian rituals and myths.

Marika Speckmann

See also: Native American Religion.

References

- Aberle, David F. The Peyote Religion among the Navaho. Chicago: Aldine Publishing Company, 1966.
- Brito, Silvester. The Way of a Roadman. American University Studies, Series 21, Regional Studies Vol. 1. New York, Bern, Frankfurt am Main, and Paris: Peter Lang Publishing, Inc., 1989.
- Gerber, Peter. Die Peyote-Religion. Nordamerikanische Indianer auf der Suche nach einer Identität. Zurich: Lang Druck, 1980.
- La Barre, Weston. The Peyote Cult. Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1975.
- Shonle, Ruth. "Peyote—Giver of Visions." American Anthropologist 27 (1925): 53–75.
- Slotkin, J. S. The Peyote Religion: A Study in Indian-White Relations. Glencoe, IL: University of Chicago and The Free Press, 1956.
- Smith, Huston, and Reuben Snake, eds. One Nation under God: The Triumph of the Native American Church. Santa Fe, NM: Clear Light Publishers, 1996.
- Speckmann, Marika. Panindianische Mythologie am Beispiel der Peyote-Religion. Stuttgart: Marika Speckmann, 1999.
- Stewart, Omer C. Peyote Religion: A History. The Civilization of the American Indian Series, 181. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1987.

Native American Religion: Roman Catholicism

Roman Catholicism as practiced by indigenous people in the United States and Canada has undergone major changes over the 20th century, going from a mission-type institution to an almost full-fledged Native Church. It has spearheaded the enculturation of Christianity in those countries and granted Natives equal participation in the workings of the Universal Church. Though in the last decades it has been faced with declining membership like the other major Christian denominations in Native communities, on and off reservations, it now displays a rich variety of tribal expressions and keeps gathering momentum in the campaign to obtain the canonization of Kateri Tekakwitha. The social, spiritual, liturgical, and pastoral impact of enculturation will be addressed here along with the symbolic function of Kateri.

In Canada, it is estimated that 55 percent of the 1.3 million self-identified Native people are Catholics. In the United States, the figure is estimated at around 17 percent, or less than 500,000 people out of the 2.5 million who identify as Native. Regarding religious activity, one can divide Natives into three major groups: those who have retained some form of Christianity and may have also retained their traditional ways, but are not very active; those who have rejected Christianity altogether, and will tend to have reverted forcefully to traditional spiritualities; those who prove strongly committed Christians, and may also have kept some of their traditional practices. This last group divides along several lines: many have left the old churches to join newcomers, notably Pentecostalism and, in the western and central states and provinces, Mormonism (the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints); some shift affiliation within the major groups; some remain fervent adepts of their churches such as the Native Catholics who are taking their religious life into their hands as they are also gaining more social and political clout nationally. To accompany them, the Roman Catholic Church has devised a new mode of evangelization called enculturation.

Enculturation The idea of enculturation implies that the church should no longer impose a Western

Roman Catholic bishops and Native Americans pass a ceremonial pipe at the 60th Annual Tekakwitha Conference on the Gonzaga University campus in Spokane, Washington. (AP Photo/Jeff T. Green)

European model on its non-Western membership, and relative to Native Americans must bring to the fore those elements of Christianity that have always existed in Native cultures. Enculturation originated in discussions initiated before, but carried forward mostly after, the Second Vatican Council. The term was coined by a Belgian Jesuit, Pierre Charles, who gave it the same anthropological meaning as “enculturation,” the process whereby one acquires one’s own culture; the term was first publicly used during the 32nd General Congregation of the Society of Jesus (1974–1975), and was introduced to the Roman Synod on Catechesis (1977) by Pedro Arrupe (1907–1991), then general of the Society. Pope John Paul II (1920–2005) elaborated on the concept, yet he warned that the Christian message was transmitted through a specific apostolical dialogue that cannot be completely severed from its territorial origins. The message must be rooted in the culture of the evangelized communities even more than in the past. Cultural diversity is sought in a dialogue with the mother church that must respect ethnic expressions and seek to include them in its liturgy in order to ease the access of non-Western communities to the hidden mystery of the Christian message and to help them produce original celebrations of life and of the divine out of their own traditions (Catechesi tradendae 53).

Enculturation moves the institution to adjust its focus toward the vernacular, the local, and the laity, in order to meet the challenges brought about by modernity and decolonization; it has seen its major theological developments in Africa. In North America, the Jesuits, the Benedictines, and the Oblates of Mary Immaculate have been most innovative in the field. In Canada in 1984 John Paul II said that faith is expressed in many manners, and not only is Christianity pertinent for Native peoples but through the limbs of his Body, Christ himself is an Indian.

Theology and Ritual Enculturation has given rise to a new theology combining the Christian message and indigenous spirituality that has been formulated by a number of Native nuns and priests, including Sisters Priscilla and Eva Solomon, C.S.J. (Chippewa from northern Ontario), Sister Marie Therese Archambault, O.S.F. (Lakota Hunkpapa), Sister Kateri Mitchell, S.S.A. (Mohawk from Akwesasne), and Father John Hascall, O.F.M. Cap. (Sault Ste Marie Chippewa), to name but a few. All are very active in pastoral care and teaching and have articulated vibrant texts that illuminate the Christian message for Native communities. They emphasize its loving and healing power to mend the scars caused by colonization and its accomplice, imperial and authoritarian evangelization. By condemning Native cultures as Pagan and savage, previous missionaries robbed a whole people of its pride and self-esteem, wreaking havoc in its psychical, physical, and social makeup.

Emboldened by the new openness from Rome, these leaders have retrieved their Indian heritage from oblivion to re-empower Natives, claiming it is as important to Christianity as that of the Hebrews. They have developed the concept of the Two Old Testaments completing each other. The Native one contains the spiritual knowledge that tribes passed down often in clandestine ways to the younger generations, thus preparing them to receive the New Testament. As Sister Priscilla Solomon noted, “Our Aboriginal spirituality is our way back to God, to find eternal life. The teaching of my own tradition points to Jesus Christ, to the grace that he brings to us.” For them, the message of Christ is above culture, and above the wrongdoings a human institution such as the church may have inflicted on helpless converts.

Native theology is acted out in the introduction of tribal mores in ceremonies. To celebrate Mass, just as John Paul II wore fringed leather vestments in Aboriginal Canada (1987), priests wear theirs decorated with the symbolical patterns of the local tribe, found as well on altar covers. The drum and the flute will prevail over organ music. The offerings will be presented to the four directions. Prayers will be recited in tribal languages. Instead of incense, the thurifer will use local plants to perform smudging, using a feather fan to blow the smoke over the altar and the attendees. A baptism ceremony will blend the Catholic and the indigenous name-giving rituals, the participants moving in a pattern corresponding to the cosmic order of the tribe.

The retribalization of religious culture is also expressed in the architecture and the decoration of churches and spiritual centers. Whereas the typical religious buildings in Indian lands and in the rest of the two countries have remained European in style, many communities have chosen designs pertaining to their own vision of sacred geography in order to affirm their regained cultural pride. Where Indians lived in teepees, one finds round churches pointing to the sky; on the northwest coast they are made of large cedar beams and masts. Inside, the four directions are marked with the colors attributed by the respective tribes, and Native paintings, quilts, and sculptures adorn the aisles, often alongside classical representations of Saint Anne, Saint Joseph, or the Virgin of Guadalupe. One figure has gained more and more recognition in the past decades, Kateri Tekakwitha (1656–1680), from whom Native Catholicism today is inseparable.

Kateri Tekakwitha Tekakwitha was born in 1656 at Gandaougué, near present-day Auriesville in New York State. Her father was Mohawk, her mother a Catholic Algonquin; both were killed by smallpox, which marked Kateri’s face forever and damaged her eyesight. At four, she was adopted by her uncle. Jesuits visited the village and confirmed what she had learned from her mother. When she came of age to be married she refused all proposals, much to the surprise of her people for whom celibacy and virginity had no value. Later, Father Lamberville taught her more and baptized her on Easter day in 1676 as Catherine.

In spite of her uncle’s refusal, she settled in Sault Saint-Louis mission near Montreal. On the day of the Annunciation she pronounced her vows. Since she constantly mortified her body, she became sick and died at the age of 24. Her face underwent a transfiguration, the smallpox scars disappearing altogether.

Her cause was introduced in 1884 by the U.S. bishops in plenary council in Baltimore, and in 1885 by several Indian tribes from Canada and the United States. The Positio super virtutibus was published in 1938, and she was pronounced Venerable in 1943. With one miracle recognized, she was beatified in 1980. In 2009 the file on a new miracle (needed for canonization) was sent to Rome.

As the only blessed Native, she serves as a role model. The group most focused on promoting her cause is the Tekakwitha Conference. A 1939 meeting in Fargo, North Dakota, of Northern Plains Catholic missionaries to discuss the problems they faced with evangelization became yearly. The fathers then placed it under the patronage of Kateri. Nuns asked to take part since they were in the front line as teachers on the reservations. Lay Natives were not included until the 1970s. It is now a large network of Native Catholics whose headquarters is in Great Falls, Montana, with Sister Kateri Mitchell as the executive director (since 1998). It runs various seminars and activities, the most prestigious being the annual conference. It is organized in different cities by the local Catholic Natives, often united in Kateri Circles, and is attended by about 1,000 Native people, many nuns and clergy. The unfolding is meticulously planned to incorporate local tribal particularities into the canonical ritual that culminates in the daily high Mass celebrated by several bishops, showing the appreciation the church authorities pay to the Conference.

The workshops address the major social, family, and individual problems faced by Natives as well as spiritual healing (blending charismatic and traditional Native handling of sickness); testimonies and addresses by leaders strengthen the bonds between the members and their communities and impart them with the courage to face the future, in the footsteps of Kateri.

In Ontario, Eva Solomon organized the Kateri Conference in 1987 but it ceased to exist in 1995. Several pastoral and spiritual activities are still set up there around the figure of Kateri.

The success of “Katerian Catholicism” must not hide the fact that in both countries vocations to shepherd the flock are scarce, as in Europe. Whereas there are many Native nuns, there are very few priests, celibacy and the need to study far from home never appealing to Native men. As in the church at large, the diaconate is one of the solutions currently explored but it has not yet met with enough success to guarantee regular pastoral care in all Catholic parishes.

Still, the new forms of enculturated theology and rituals have proved to be a major ferment among Native communities. The new assessments of the universality of Christ’s message, best expressed in particular ethnic cultures, have allowed a reduction of tension for Native Catholics feeling torn between their two identities as Native people and Christian. They have found ways to affirm both their deep-rooted Indianness and an intense commitment to Christ. Enculturation has allowed a new ability to face criticisms leveled by traditionalists who lash out at them for what they consider their betrayal of authentic Native values. In the 21st century, Native Catholicism has emerged as a significant force within the Catholic Church in North America. Current signs of vitality appear to be the product of improved theological and pastoral leadership, both Native and non-Native.

Bernadette Rigal-Cellard

See also: Benedictines; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Easter; Iroquois Confederacy; Jesuits; Modernity; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Archamnault, Marie Therese, Christopher Vecsey, and Mark G. Thiel, eds. The Crossing of Two Roads: Being Catholic and Native in the United States. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2003.
- Holmes, Paula Elizabeth. “Symbol Tales: Paths Towards the Creation of a Saint.” Ph.D. diss., McMaster University, 2000.
- Peelman, Achiel, OMI. Christ Is a Native American. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1995.
- Rigal-Cellard, Bernadette. Missions extrêmes en Amérique du Nord: des Jésuites à Raël. Bordeaux : Pleine Page, 2005.
- Treat, James. Native and Christian: Indigenous Voices on Religious Identity in the United States and Canada. New York: Routledge, 1996.
- Vecsey, Christopher. The Paths of Kateri’s Kin. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1997.
- Vecsey, Christopher. Where The Two Roads Meet. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.

Native Baptist Church

The English Baptist Alfred Saker (1814–1880) began work in the Cameroon in 1845 and continued for the next three decades. Then in 1884, the Baptist churches that had been founded were handed over to the German-based Basel Mission when the Germans began their colonial rule, and these churches soon found their local autonomy threatened by the Basel Mission structures. In response, members formed their own independent church, the Native Baptist Church (NBC), in 1888, the same year that a similar church began in Lagos. The German colonial authority moved to restrict its activities.

The first leader of the NBC was Joshua Diboundou, who resigned his leadership in 1910 when he became a polygamist, to be followed by Albert Tobo Diedo. For a brief period (1917–1932), the NBC was in federation with Baptists of the Berlin Mission and the Basel church. Adolph Lotin Sami (1882–1946), a pastor in the Berlin Baptist Mission, was excluded from the pastorate by the missionaries in 1922 because of a “desire to earn money” and his practice of baptizing polygamists. Refusing to comply, Lotin began to reorganize the NBC, which was revived in 1932 with Lotin as its president. He composed many hymns sung to traditional Douala tunes. When he died in 1946, his place was taken by Moise Mathi Mathi, who changed the name of the NBC to Cameroon Baptist Church in 1949. The CBC was almost exclusively Douala and had more than 5,000 members by 1945, but it was in a state of decline in the 1990s.

Estimates of membership in 2009 are about 55,000. In 1995 the Native Baptist Church (Eglise baptiste camerounaise) was admitted to the World Council of Churches and began a process of internal reform, including renewing links with the Baptist Missionary Society in Britain.

Native Baptist Church
BP 4237
Douala Akwa
Cameroon

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Basel Mission; World Council of Churches.

References

- Brutsch, L. R. “Origine et Développement d’une Eglise Independante Africaine.” Le Monde Non-Chrétien 12 (October–December 1949): 408–424.
- Gifford, Paul. African Christianity: Its Public Role. London: Hurst, 1998.
- Joseph Church, Richard A. “State and Society in Colonial Cameroon.” International Journal of African Historical Studies 13 (1980): 5–32.

■ Nauru

Nauru is an island republic in the South Pacific, northwest of Australia and south of the Marshall Islands. With only 8 square miles of land, it joined the United Nations in 1999 as the world’s smallest independent republic. The island was originally settled by Polynesians and Micronesians. It was called to the attention of the West after its initial visit by American whalers, who called it Pleasant Island. In 1888 it was annexed by Germany. At the beginning of World War I, Australia took control of Nauru, a suddenly wealthy land due to the discovery of rich deposits of phosphate. It would remain under Australian control until 1968, except for a period under Japanese rule during World War II. Australia brought in a number of immigrant workers, including many Chinese, to work the mines. Today (2008), some 13,700 people reside on Nauru.

Nauru, which became independent in 1968, is a most unusual land. It has retained its rural character, and no cities have been built. The mining has made the nation wealthy, paying for all education, medical care, and housing. The influx of immigrants from many places to work in the mines has given the Nauru a very ethnically pluralistic culture. Only about 50 percent of the residents are Native Nauruans.

The indigenous religion of the Nauruans survived into the 20th century but appears to have disappeared in the decades since World War II. Although Germany controlled the island early on, the first missionaries were Congregationalists from the London Missionary Society. They assumed the work of translating the Bible into the Native language. Their work grew into the Nauru Congregational Church. As expatriates of other Protestant traditions moved to Nauru, they were

Nauru

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,400	7,700	74.9	–0.01	7,800	7,200
Protestants	2,700	5,400	52.4	0.21	5,300	5,000
Roman Catholics	1,200	3,400	33.0	2.23	3,800	3,900
Independents	0	700	6.8	1.30	900	1,200
Chinese folk	600	1,100	10.3	0.13	1,100	1,100
Baha'is	100	1,000	9.7	0.14	1,300	1,500
Agnostics	300	390	3.8	3.83	500	700
Buddhists	150	140	1.4	0.14	300	400
Total population	6,500	10,300	100.0	0.15	11,000	10,900

welcomed into the Congregational Church, which is still the only Protestant body on the island.

The Roman Catholic Church began work on Nauru in 1902. At present the parishes are part of the Diocese of Tarawa (Gilbert and Ellice Islands). Members of the Anglican Church moved to Nauru following the takeover of the island by Australia. Its work is now a part of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia.

Besides the three Christian church bodies, there is also a small group practicing the Baha'i Faith and some Chinese who follow the ubiquitous Chinese folk religion (a mixture of Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Nauru Congregational Church; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- McDaniel, Carl N., and John M. Gowdy. Paradise for Sale: A Parable of Nature. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
- Petit-Skinner, S. The Nauruans. San Francisco: MacDuff Press, 1981.

Nauru Congregational Church

The Nauru Congregational Church dates to around 1889 and the arrival on Nauru Island of Timoteo Tabwia, a Gilbert Islander who had been converted by missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM), an association of American Congregationalists. He was later joined by two Americans, Philip A. and Salome Delaporte, who arrived in 1899, mastered the Nauruan language, and translated the Bible. The ABCFM continued their work through the early decades of the 20th century, during which time the island was invaded by a variety of European companies that wanted to mine the calcium phosphates discovered in 1900.

In 1917, the ABCFM turned over its responsibilities in Nauru to the London Missionary Society, a British Congregationalist group. Through midcentury and following Japanese occupation of the island, Nauruan Congregationalists became closely affiliated with the Congregational Union of Australia.

Although the church had grown significant indigenous leadership during this time, the first Nauruan minister to receive seminary training, Itubwa Amram, was not ordained until 1956. Subsequently, the church became autonomous of the LMS but kept close ties with Australia. It is a member of the International Congregational Council, the Council for World Mission (the successor body to the LMS), and the Pacific Conference of Churches. It was a member of the World Council of Churches but has recently withdrawn.

Some 65 percent of the island's 10,000 residents are members of the church's 7 congregations. The church faces the challenge of diminishing mineral resources, the likely negative economic impact of the ending of mining operations, and the destruction of the majority of the island by the mining operations.

Nauru Congregational Church
PO Box 232
Nauru
Central Pacific

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; London Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Navajo, The

The Navajo refer to themselves as the Dine (the People). Originally a seminomadic tribal group of Athapascan stock from western Canada and Alaska, they began settling in the Four Corners region of the American Southwest in the 11th century CE.

The Navajo world was created when the Diyin-Dine (Holy People) emerged from four underworlds into this, the fifth world. The most important of these Holy People are First Man and First Woman, whose inner natures are, respectively, "Thought" and "Speech." Together they created a world where the most important value is hozho. Most commonly translated as "beauty," hozho encompasses much more—harmony, peace, health, happiness, balance, and the general good.

For the Navajo, life itself is movement, and it is through good intentions and prayer that men and women participate in keeping the world in harmony. Although the original harmonic patterns were created when the Holy People emerged into this world, the Navajo continue to participate in this ongoing creative act by ritually associating themselves with these supernatural beings through thought and speech. Beauty is not something to be discovered in nature but it is to be created, first in the mind as thought and then projected out into the world as speech. Speech is, in fact, the outer form of thought.

Navajo medicine man Deschinni Nez-Begav of Rough Rock, Arizona, draws a Red Ant Chant sandpainting using loose sand on the floor of the Museum of Navajo Ceremonial Art in Santa Fe, New Mexico, 1963. (AP Photo)

The Navajo walk in harmony and beauty through everyday activities that are rich with symbolism. Symbols seem to be the very grounding and basis for thought. Every morning, for example, men and women emerge from their hogons (circular homes), each of which is the symbolic center of the cosmos, to chant the world into existence by identifying themselves with First Man and First Woman. Through such ritual actions as scattering cornmeal in four directions and chanting beauty into the world at sunrise, the Navajo become active participants in creation itself.

All Navajos should work to create hozho, because then they will live long and prosperous lives, and their communities will continue in harmony. In this context, illness signifies a disruption in the harmonious fabric of living. A sick person, with the assistance of friends and family, will try to determine why his or her world is out of balance. Perhaps the ill person failed to fulfill some social or religious obligation. Or perhaps, even more seriously, a man returning from war has been polluted by violence and death. In the first instance only a portion of a Blessingway ritual might need to be performed some evening. In the second case a full-blown Enemyway ceremony of three or four days' duration will be needed to restore hozho.

There are at least 60 major ceremonies among the Navajo that preserve and restore hozho. It usually takes several years of apprenticeship for the ritual specialist, called a singer, to master one of these rites. Although both men and women may become singers, only men will prepare the sandpaintings that are usually integral to the ceremonies. Few singers learn more than one major rite, and only very rarely will any individual know more than a couple. Religious knowledge is therefore widely dispersed across the Navajo nation. A singer will diagnose the cause of illness and determine whether the patient should be referred to another singer or undergo this specialist's ceremony. This is critical, because the person will be healed if the diagnosis is correct, if the singer does the ritual properly, and if the wills of the singer and the people taking part in the healing are strong enough to forge a connection between the patient and the Holy People.

The singer creates the conditions for the complete merger of this world and the supernatural world by purifying the patient, most commonly through chanting prayers in a sweat lodge, and by overseeing the drawing of a sandpainting in the center of a hogan that creates the activities of the first Holy People in an action corresponding to the cause and cure of the patient's illness. The nearly naked patient then sits or lies on his or her corresponding deity in the sandpainting. Chanting, shaking rattles, touching, and other symbolic activities effect the cure by restoring hozho to the patient's life.

The Navajo do not fear dying when their cycle of life is completed. But a premature death signals the malevolent activity of sorcerers. The most common way for a sorcerer to harm an individual is to sing the parts of a religious ceremony in reverse order, thereby creating chaos in the place of harmony. Sorcerers must operate in secret because they cannot resist the direct onslaught of a singer's benevolent energy and will be destroyed by their own evil energy when it is returned to them.

Despite the many ways that hozho can be disrupted, the Navajo are remarkably optimistic. As long as they continue to participate with the Holy People in maintaining and creating hozho in the world, they can be assured that their world will be beautiful and harmonious and that they will live healthy and prosperous lives.

According to the 1990 census, there were more than 225,000 Navajo, of whom nearly 145,000 live on reservation and trust lands in Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah. Since religious and cultural practices are indistinguishable for the Navajo, most attend rituals at least occasionally, even though some also practice forms of Christianity. Not infrequently, Navajo sense the need to return to a ritual healing when they feel polluted by death. Numerous healing chants, for example, were held for veterans who returned from Vietnam, even those who lived in cities away from the reservation.

Thomas V. Peterson

See also: Native American Church.

References

- Gill, Sam. Sacred Words: A Study of Navajo Religion and Prayer. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Reichard, Gladys A. Navaho Religion: A Study of Symbolism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1974.
- Witherspoon, Gary. Language and Art in the Navajo Universe. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1977.

Navaratri/Dashain

The Navaratri (Navaratra), or "Nine Nights," Festival is celebrated in September–October (Hindu lunar month of Ashvin) for 9 nights (and 10 days). This is a pan-Indian festival, which, as Holi welcomes the spring, welcomes the autumn season. Also, like Holi, it takes very different forms in different regions. In neighboring Nepal, as the national holiday, Dashain, it is the largest festival of the year, involving both Hindu and non-Hindu Nepalis alike in celebration.

In most Hindi-speaking areas of North India Navaratri is centered on Rama, like Krishna an incarnation of the deity Vishnu. It is celebrated with a drama, the Rama Lila (the mysterious divine magic of Lord Rama), drawn from the Ramayana epic story. Here there are recitations every day from the medieval Hindi Tulsidas Ramayana, and in most places plays that depict scenes from the Ramayana story are presented in smaller or grander scale.

The largest of the Rama Lila play is staged across the river from Benares, where the king (maharajah) of Benares established an immense ground that represents the Ramayana story. Actors go from station to station on different days as the story develops. On Vijayadashami—variously described as the culminating day of Navaratri or the day after Navaratri—the effigies of Rama’s enemy, the demon king Ravana, along with his son Meghanada and his brother Kumbhakarna, are burned to celebrate the victory of Rama over the forces of the demons or Rakshasas.

In Bihar, Bengal, and Assam the Navaratri Festival, and in Nepal, Dashain is celebrated as a Durga festival. Durga pujas, or worship services, are done for her on the last three days of the festival. The festival begins by awakening Durga, who is asleep, and continues by manufacturing a temporary image of her which is enlivened for the purpose of the festival.

On Vijayadashmi, the image of Durga will be taken in a great procession to be immersed in the local body of water, be it a river or the ocean or a large tank. Lively festivities follow. In south India the goddess Sarasvati, the goddess of learning and the arts, is worshipped on the seventh day of the festival and Durga only on the eighth day. On the ninth day there is a worship of instruments and implements of livelihood, which are taken out to be honored with mantras and small offerings.

An additional tradition surrounding Durga and Navaratri concerns the Pandava brothers, important characters in the great Indian epic, the Mahabharata. Great warriors, all five brothers were married to one woman named Draupadi. At one point, they lived through a 14-year exile followed by a one-year period of incognito during which time they had to put away their distinctive weaponry. They hid it in a Shami tree near their residence. When their incognito year was finished, they went to the tree and retrieved their weaponry. For its safe preservation, they offered worship and thanksgiving both to the Shami tree and the goddess Durga, the deity of strength and victory. Meanwhile, their rivals, the Kauravas, had invaded the region looking for them. After completing their devotions, the Pandavas went directly to engage in the Battle of Kurukshetra, at which they won a decisive victory. That day subsequently became known as Vijayadashami (“Vijaya” is Sanskrit for “Victory”). Today, on Vijatadashami, people give Shami leaves with a wish that the recipient might have victory in his or her efforts.

Constance A. Jones

See also: Calendars, Religious; Holi.

References

- Eck, Diana L. Banaras, City of Light. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Harshananda, Swami. Hindu Festivals and Sacred Days. Bangalore: Ramakrishna Math, 1994.
- Mukuncharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpath, 2005.
- Sharma, Nath. Festivals of India. New Delhi: Abhinav Publications, 1978.
- Shekar, H. V. Festivals of India: Significance of the Celebrations. Louisville, KY: Insight Books, 2000.
- Welbon, Guy, and Glenn Yocum, eds. Religious Festivals in South India and Sri Lanka. Delhi: Manohar, 1982.

Nazareth

Nazareth, a small town situated inside a bowl atop the Nazareth ridge north of the Jezreel valley in Galilee in what today is Israel, was the hometown of Jesus, who was referred to as the Nazarene. Nazareth is west of the Sea of Galilee and some 65 miles north of Jerusalem. In Jesus’ day, Nazareth was a relatively isolated village of only some 200 residents. Its lack of status as a community was reflected in the statement ascribed to one of Jesus’ future apostles, “Can anything good come out of Nazareth?” (John 1:46).

Nazareth emerges out of obscurity in the New Testament account of Jesus’ mother Mary, who, after being engaged to marry Joseph, was visited by the angel Gabriel who announced to her the birth of Jesus (Luke 1:26–33). Though not the father of Jesus, Joseph married the pregnant Mary and the two then left Nazareth for Bethlehem to be counted in the census ordered by Caesar Augustus. Jesus subsequently spent his boyhood years in Nazareth, where he reputedly learned carpentry from Joseph. After beginning his ministry when he was about 30, he moved his home to Capernaum, but returned to teach in the synagogue of Nazareth twice more. He was rejected both times (Mark 6:1–6). On one occasion the townspeople were so outraged at Jesus that they tried to throw him off a cliff to his death (Luke 4:16–30).

Israeli city of Nazareth, the center of Jesus' ministry and one of Christianity's most sacred areas. Archaeological excavations reveal the ancient village of Nazareth was actually located on the hillside above the modern city. (Corel)

Very little is known about Nazareth from the ancient sources. It is not mentioned in pre-Christian records and then again falls into obscurity after the New Testament period. It is rediscovered only after the Roman Empire decriminalizes Christianity in the fourth century and the Holy Land emerges as a primary pilgrimage site. More recent archaeological excavations have confirmed that the city was only a small agricultural village during the Hellenistic and early Roman periods.

During the period of the Crusader kingdom, Nazareth became the center of a bishopric. A Byzantine-style church was built over a cave that had been designated as the spot where the angel Gabriel announced the birth of Jesus. In 1966 the Roman Catholic Church began constructing a new basilica over the remains of that church, and today this new Church of the Annunciation is the largest church building in the Middle East. Nearby is a Greek Orthodox church that was built over a well that also has been claimed as the site of the Annunciation, a claim that derives from one of the apocryphal gospels, the "Proto-evangelium of James," that pictured the scene of the Annunciation occurring as the Virgin Mary was drawing water.

In contemporary Israel, Nazareth's population has grown to more than 60,000, mostly Arab Christians.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jerusalem; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Pilgrimage.

References

- Braun, Herbert. Jesus of Nazareth. The Man and His Time. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1979.
- Brown, Raymond E. The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke. Rev. ed. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1994.
- Emmett, Chad. Beyond the Basilica: Christians and Muslims in Nazareth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Kenyon, K. Archaeology in the Holy Land. 4th ed. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1979.
- Pixner, Bargil. With Jesus through Galilee According to the Fifth Gospel. Rosh Pina: Corazin.

Nazareth (Nazarite) Baptist Church

The largest of the African Initiated Churches (AIC) among the Zulu, the Nazareth Baptist Church, better known as the amaNazaretha, or Isonto LamaNazaretha, or Shembe Church, was founded by Mdlwamafa Mloyisa (Isaiah) Shembe (ca. 1869–1935), who experienced several visions and audible inner voices from an early age. These revelations later told him to leave his four wives and children and to use no medicine, and they showed him people in white gowns who would follow him. He began his Christian life as a Methodist but was baptized in William Leshega's African Native Baptist Church (an early African secession from the white Baptists) in about 1900, by which time he was already a renowned healer. He was ordained an evangelist and began to baptize in the sea near Durban, a practice of many coastal African churches today.

In about 1911, Shembe seceded from the African Native Baptist Church, which did not insist as he did on taking off shoes in worship, leaving the hair uncut, not eating pork, night Communion services with foot washing, and the seventh day Sabbath. He founded the amaNazaretha and applied biblical references to Nazarites to his followers, who were to obey these laws. In 1916 he established a “high place,” called Ekuphakameni, outside Durban, and a holy mountain, Nhlankakazi—sites for annual festivals in July and January, respectively. Shembe wielded great influence in Zulu society. When he died in 1935, a sacred mausoleum was built over his grave at Ekuphakameni, now the headquarters of the church, and his son Johannes Galilee Shembe inherited the leadership.

On Galilee's death in 1976, a fierce and acrimonious schism resulted, with court cases, violent clashes, and even killings between the two factions. A small part of the church followed Galilee's son Londa Shembe, who was murdered in 1989 in the midst of the Kwa-Zulu Natal violence, leaving no clear successor. The majority of members followed Isaiah's other son, Amos Khula Shembe. As an indication of the prestige attained by the Shembe family, Nelson Mandela attended Amos's funeral in 1995. His son Mbusi Vimbeni Shembe, who seems to have retained the loyalty of the vast majority of the church, succeeded him.

The amaNazaretha's great veneration for their founder has been interpreted to mean that he is seen as an African Christ, a mediator between his people and God, standing at the gate of heaven to admit only his followers. amaNazaretha greet their leader with the shout “He is holy!” Shembe is believed to have “risen from the dead”; he appears to people in revelations and is believed to reveal God to the Zulus, and in his name prayer is directed. The criticisms of this movement have centered on the person of Isaiah Shembe and reflect prevalent assumptions made by earlier Western theologians about the AICs.

Evidence from the amaNazaretha themselves, however, is ambiguous. In the opinion of at least some of his followers, Shembe has very extraordinary, perhaps even divine powers, and divine and messianic titles are ascribed to him. But most frequently, amaNazaretha describe Shembe in lesser, more mortal terms. Instead of being a divine Messiah or Black Christ, Isaiah Shembe is a human “servant of the Lord,” “the man sent by God,” who is obedient to the bidding of God.

amaNazaretha wear white robes and remove their shoes in worship, men are circumcised (a custom not practiced elsewhere in Zulu society), polygyny is allowed, and members may not shake hands with outsiders, eat pork, drink alcohol, or take medicines. Isaiah Shembe composed more than 200 hymns that are sung by church members, some of which are accompanied by sacred dancing in African dress, and some of which are believed to have been written after his resurrection. Baptism by immersion, communion at night, and foot washing are practiced as sacraments, and the Sabbath is observed as well as the hlonipha (respectful avoidance) rules of the Zulu. The amaNazaretha have greatly influenced the rituals of other Zulu AICs (especially Zionists), and they represent a unique blend of Christianity with the best of Zulu culture. There are approximately a million amaNazaretha in South Africa today.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Native Baptist Church.

References

Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.

Hexham, Irving, and G. C. Oosthuizen, eds. The Story of Isaiah Shembe: History and Traditions Centered on Ekuphakameni and Mount Nhlangakazi. Lewiston: Edwin Mellon Press, 1996.

Sundkler, Bengt G. M. Bantu Prophets in South Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.

■ Nepal

The modern state of Nepal is strung out along the Himalayas northwest to southeast between Tibet to the north and India to the south. It is home to 28,560,000 people who represent a variety of ethnicities. It consists of 56,800 square miles of territory.

Nepal was created by King Prithvi Narayan Shah of Gurkha (1723–1775). He conquered the Kathmandu Valley in 1768–1769 and went on to conquer great swaths of the Himalayan foothills, west as far as Kangra and east to Sikkim. After a war with the British East India Company in 1814–1816, the boundaries of the state of Nepal were fixed largely as they are today, Nepal's autonomy was recognized, and the British right to recruit soldiers within Nepal was also granted.

In the period preceding 1769 and the unification of the country as seen by nationalist historians, there were numerous small kingdoms in the hills, ruled by families claiming prestigious Hindu descent from Indian Rajputs, who had supposedly fled to the Himalayas to escape Muslim depredations in Rajasthan. The high mountain region was inhabited by small pockets of Tibetan people, most of whom practiced a form of Myingma Tibetan Buddhism. The Sherpas, for instance, were migrants from Tibet who came over the high passes in the 16th and 17th centuries. In the middle hills to the south there were a number of tribal peoples: from west to east, the Magars, Gurungs, Tamangs, Rai, and Limbu, as well as other smaller groups. (These are the names that are used for these groups today; in some cases the names were not current before the 19th, or even early 20th, century and the groups did not see themselves as distinct groups until so classified by the Hinduizing state.) Of these tribal groups, the Magars were the most Hinduized, the Tamangs the most Tibetanized. All of them possessed lively shamanic traditions, which loomed largest among the Rai and Limbu, collectively known as Kirantis.

Bhairabnath Hindu temple and evening market, Bhaktapur, Nepal. (Szeferi/Dreamstime.com)

In this early period the largely forested plains (Tarai) region was inhabited mainly by tribal groups practicing shifting agriculture, most of whom now think of themselves as Tharus. There were, however, some areas of longer settlement, notably around Janakpur, where the populations were Hindu and culturally similar to those over the border in India. Finally, in the Kathmandu Valley, housing the three cities of Kathmandu, Lalitpur (Patan), and Bhaktapur, the Newar people practiced both Hinduism and Buddhism, both strongly influenced by Tantric ritualism.

Both of these forms of religion were highly conservative, harking back to forms of religious practice once much more widespread in the subcontinent. The Newar Buddhism is of particular significance, as the last direct descendant of Indian Mahayana Buddhism, which was exported and translated to the rest of Asia before dying out in the land of its birth. As the great French Sanskritist Sylvain Lévi (1863–1935) pointed out, studying Newar Buddhism is a window onto early Indian Mahayana Buddhism and the Hindu-Buddhist context in which it grew up and eventually went into decline. Also present in the Kathmandu Valley since at least the 17th century, and perhaps from the 16th, was a minority of Muslim traders.

From 1845 to 1951 Nepal was ruled by a hereditary system of Rana prime ministers. State-sponsored Hinduism played a key role in legitimating the rule of the Ranas and in welding their culturally and linguistically diverse kingdom into some form of unity. This sponsorship took the form of encouraging the country-wide observance of major festivals, in particular, that of Dasain focusing on the goddess Durga, which legitimated royal power as well as the position of leading men within patrilineages. It also took the form of introducing a national legal code that gave formal judicial backing to hierarchical Hindu notions of status.

The Rana regime fell in 1951, and after an abortive experiment with parliamentary democracy, King Mahendra (1920–1972) introduced Partyless Panchayat Democracy in 1960. The new constitution declared Nepal a Hindu state. The legal code was modernized and caste was no longer recognized. But there was no positive discrimination on behalf of Untouchables

Nepal

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Hindus	9,018,000	20,630,000	69.0	2.00	26,576,000	35,754,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,353,000	3,665,000	12.3	2.04	4,200,000	4,700,000
Buddhists	1,400,000	3,220,000	10.8	2.11	4,200,000	5,650,000
Muslims	332,000	1,305,000	4.4	2.10	1,695,000	2,260,000
Christians	7,400	935,000	3.1	5.11	1,908,000	3,062,000
Independents	5,500	720,000	2.4	4.72	1,500,000	2,250,000
Protestants	600	200,000	0.7	6.77	400,000	800,000
Roman Catholics	300	7,500	0.0	1.35	15,000	30,000
Agnostics	30,000	80,200	0.3	2.10	170,000	300,000
Chinese folk	0	20,900	0.1	2.10	40,000	70,000
Atheists	10,000	18,800	0.1	2.10	30,000	40,000
Sikhs	0	10,500	0.0	2.10	15,000	25,000
Jains	2,500	7,500	0.0	2.10	10,500	15,000
Baha'is	3,000	4,500	0.0	2.10	10,000	15,000
Total population	12,155,000	29,898,000	100.0	2.10	38,855,000	51,891,000

or other disadvantaged groups, as in India, and the entire population was governed by the same civil code. The Panchayat period was one of conscious nation-building. A Hindu cultural identity was a part of this; Buddhism, along with Jainism and Sikhism (barely present in Nepal), was declared to be a branch of Hinduism—a point that modernist Buddhist activists were not at all happy to concede.

In the 1930s Theravada Buddhism was first introduced, initially by Newars, but from the 1980s on there were increasing numbers of recruits from non-Newar backgrounds. A major expansion of Tibetan Mahayana Buddhism also occurred in Kathmandu and other major towns, sponsored both by Tibetan refugees and by urbanized and upwardly mobile Nepalis from Buddhist backgrounds (Gurungs, Tamangs, and others). Rais and Limbus began to organize in the 1990s around their shamanic indigenous religion, which they named Kirantism. After 1990 and the fall of the Panchayat regime, it became increasingly possible to assert a non-Hindu or even anti-Hindu identity, and many started to do so.

The 1991 census, out of a total population of 18.4 million, revealed 86.5 percent Hindus, 7.8 percent Buddhists, 3.5 percent Muslims, 1.7 percent Kirantis, and 0.2 percent Christians. (Buddhist activists have long claimed that the censuses, even that of 1991, underestimate the numbers of Buddhists.) Inducing people to convert remained illegal, but the penalties for conversion were no longer applied. Large numbers began to convert to Christianity, and a number of individuals from non-Muslim backgrounds also converted to Islam. The influx of the modern world and global culture meant that various new religions, such as Reiyukai and Tenrikyo from Japan, Sai Baba, Rajneesh (now Osho Commune International), S. N. Goenka's vipassana movement, and many others, established a presence in the capital and elsewhere. The new Constitution of 1990 continued to define Nepal as a Hindu state, but this was more controversial than ever before.

David N. Gellner

See also: Buddhism; Jainism; Mahayana Buddhism; Newar Buddhism; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Osho and the International Osho Movement; Reiyukai; Sikhism; Tenrikyo; Theravada Buddhism; Vipassana International Academy.

References

Bennett, L. Dangerous Wives and Sacred Sisters: Social and Symbolic Roles of High-Caste Women in Nepal. New York: Columbia University Press, 1983.

Gellner, D. N. Monk, Householder, and Tantric Priest: Newar Religion and Its Hierarchy of Ritual. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Gellner, D. N., J. Pfaff-Czarnecka, and J. Whelpton, eds. Nationalism and Ethnicity in a Hindu Kingdom: The Politics of Culture in Contemporary Nepal. Amsterdam: Harwood, 1997.

Hitchcock, J., and R. L. Jones, eds. Spirit Possession in the Nepal Himalayas. Warminster: Aris and Phillips, 1976.

Höfer, A. The Caste Hierarchy and the State in Nepal: A Study of the Muluki Ain of 1854. Innsbruck: Universitätsverlag Wagner, 1979.

Ortner, S. High Religion: A Cultural and Political History of Sherpa Buddhism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Nepal, Indigenous Religions in Nepal was until 2006 the only kingdom in the world to be officially Hindu. Following the movement for democracy, however, in which the king's power was severely curtailed, the Nepali Parliament altered the Constitution in January 2007 to make Nepal a "secular state." Indigenous religions in Nepal, in their richness and diversity, deny any such categorizations or attempts at secularization. The numerous tribal groups in the Nepalese hills present complex religious systems, which interrelate the various key influences of Hinduism, Tibetan Buddhism, spirit possession, shamanism, and "folk" traditions. Each religious system of hill Nepal, whether that of the Rai and Limbu (the Kirantis), or of the Tamang, Magar, Sherpa, Gurung, Newar, Sunuwar, or of the Indo-Nepalese Damai, Sarki, Bahun, or Chetri, combines these strands in their own unique way depending, for example, on their location, history, myths, and social structure. Studies of religion in hill Nepal have so far tended to focus on the separate strands of Hinduism, Tibetan Buddhism, and spirit possession. They have shown that for many groups there is a particular tribal identity and culture represented in their myths and rituals and through tribal ritual specialists. The Rai and Limbu (Kirantis), for example, developed in the 1990s their own pan-Kiranti identity around their indigenous religion, which they called Kirantism.

One of the key features of Nepal religions, as with South Asian religions in general, is the use of multiple specialists to communicate with the spiritual world, to carry their tribal knowledge, to propitiate divinities, and to act as psychopomp. These specialists are of central significance since for those living in Nepal the world is teeming with spirits of all kinds—including evil spirits, malevolent divinities, protective ancestors, moody ancestors, ghosts of the dead (some shared with other groups and some tribal-specific), as well as Buddhas and Hindu gods and goddesses. The tribal practitioners tend toward inclusivity in their rituals since omission of any god or spirit is likely to incite the wrath of the neglected. Common ailments such as diarrhea, backache, fever, or indigestion as well as severe illnesses are understood in terms of disturbance in the relationship between humans and one or more of these superhuman beings. To counter illness and misfortune people in the hills may seek support from Buddhist lamas and the authority of sacred texts, from Hindu practices, or from the power of shamans and ritual sacrifice. Shamans are the spiritual specialists, who are able to enter a trance state at will to communicate with spirits and gods on behalf of the community. They specialize in dreamlike revelatory states; from their journeys into the cosmos they can divine the future or sources of misfortune and illness, and return lost souls. Soul flight and spirit possession are prevalent and shamans from any ethnic group may be sought out. The Nepali term for the magico-religious specialist who is prevalent throughout the Nepalese hills is jhankri. These specialists are usually initially possessed involuntarily by spirits or gods and often undergo prolonged periods of illness before they learn to control the unintegrated dead or malevolent divinities.

Charlotte Hardman

See also: Ancestors; Possession; Sacred Texts; Secularization; Spirit Possession.

References

- Desjarlais, Robert. Body and Emotion: The Aesthetics of Illness and Healing in the Nepal Himalaya. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992.
- Hardman, Charlotte E. Other Worlds: Notions of Self and Emotion among the Lohorung Rai. Oxford: Berg, 2000.

Hitchcock, J. T., and Rex Jones. Spirit Possession in the Nepal Himalayas. New Delhi: Vikas Publishing House, 1976.

Holmberg, David H. Order in Paradox: Myth, Ritual and Exchange among Nepal's Tamang. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1989.

■ Netherlands, The

The Netherlands is a Western European nation with a long coastline on the North Sea. To its south lies Belgium, with Germany to its east. Its 16,000 square miles is mostly flat coastal land, with a significant proportion having been reclaimed from the sea, the highest point in the country rising little more than 100 feet above sea level.

The Netherlands is a typical trade country, and therefore it is an open society; since around 1970, it has been a multicultural society as well. The capital is Amsterdam; the place of government, The Hague. The population amounts to 17.5 million (2008). Dutch is the official language; in Friesland, also Frisian. The main religions are the Reformed branch of Christianity, divided into many churches (greater and smaller) and small communities, and, especially in the southern part of the country, the Roman Catholic Church. The important minority group (about one million) is the Muslim community from Turkey and North Africa, divided into national and religious-determined mosque-associations. The Netherlands is an open trade country and has therefore a wide spectrum of religious groups representative of the variety of the world's religions. Most Dutch citizens accepted the presence of the different religions, and a spirit of tolerance existed side by side with a special attachment to the Reformed branch of Christianity. In recent times the traditional spirit of tolerance has decreased.

The Netherlands has many political parties. The main political parties are the CDA (Christian Democratic Party, rather conservative), the PvdA (Partij van de Arbeid, a moderate Socialist party), the VVD (Volkspartij voor Vrijheid en Democratie, a Conservative party), the SP (Socialistische Partij, a radical Socialist party), and recently the PVV (Partij voor de Vrijheid, an anti-Muslim party). Smaller political parties are D'66 (a Liberal party), Groen Links (a Progressive party), the CU (Christian Union, the representative of some progressive Reformed Christians), and the SGP (Staatskundig Gereformeerde Partij, a party of very conservative Christians).

Basilica of St. Servas, a Catholic church in the southern city of Maastricht, the Netherlands. (iStockPhoto.com)

As early as the Middle Ages, the Low Countries (a former name for The Netherlands) took a special place on the field of religion. At that time the Roman Catholic Church was the only religion legally allowed. But many heretical movements of all kinds emerged, especially in the many towns. In the 14th century the Brethren of the Common Life, with Geert de Groot (1340–1384) as its “founding father,” gained many adherents, primarily in the towns and villages. That movement became very popular in many parts of Europe, from Sweden to Spain and Portugal. The Brethren promoted education in elementary schools, a modest way of life for the priests, and a personal belief. Of special importance to the Brethren was the now-classic devotional text The Imitation of Christ, written by Thomas à Kempis (1379/1380–1471), now available in numerous languages.

The Lutheran Reformation drew significant response for a short time, again especially in towns like Amsterdam. But the Reformers John Calvin (1509–1564), Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), Heinrich Bullinger (1504–1575), and others drew the attention away from the Lutherans. Their views on personal obedience to God and personal responsibility provided a rationale for denying allegiance to the lord of the Low Countries—that is, the king of Spain. The Eighty Years' War (1568–1648) found support from those who believed in a right of resistance when the king or other authorities did not obey the will of God. At the same time, the Bible-oriented Humanism of Desiderius Erasmus (1469–1536) and Dirck Coornhert (1522–1590) rose in importance, influencing especially the upper classes, who generally reigned in the cities.

During the post-Reformation era, The Netherlands was relatively tolerant of other beliefs: while churches other than the Reformed Church were officially forbidden, they were in practice tolerated. At that time the Low Countries knew Lutherans; revolutionary Anabaptists, ultimately reorganized as the Mennonite Church under the guidance of Menno Simons (1496–1559); Roman Catholics; and (Sephardic) Jews.

After the fall of Antwerp in 1585 (Spain occupied that important trade city and harbor), many strict Calvinists took refuge in the Low Countries and became important to the wealth of those regions. In 1685 many Huguenots (French Calvinists) came to this region because of the abolition of the Edict of Nantes. They organized themselves into the Eglises Wallones, now one of the classes of the former Netherlands Reformed Church, which recently merged into the new Protestant Church of the Netherlands. At that time another important part of what was to become part of the Dutch population fled from Spain: the Portuguese (Sephardic) Jews built their famous synagogue in Amsterdam. Amsterdam and other towns therefore in later centuries had two important Jewish groups: the Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews. The Low Countries became very important through their publishers (Elsevier and others); books forbidden in other countries could be published there. All the foreigners and refugees made the Golden Age of 1600 to 1650 possible.

Through the 17th century, the leaders of the country were moderate Calvinists and somewhat tolerant, although most of the common people and the ministers were strict Calvinists. The leaders had been strongly influenced by the mainly English writers of the Nearer, or “Nadere,” Reformation Puritans, who were important because of their personal belief and emphasis upon the necessity of experiencing conversion.

During the 17th century the northern Netherlands became for the Roman Catholic Church partes infidelium. Some Catholics disagreed and decided on a schism, the result being the founding of the Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands in 1723. Of particular influence in that action was the theological perspective of the Dutchman Cornelius Jansen or Jansonius (1585–1638), a Roman Catholic bishop in Ypres (Belgium) whose study of the works of Saint Augustine convinced him that the Roman Catholic Church had deviated from orthodox traditions.

The 19th century became for the Reformed Church an age of schisms, marked by the Separation movement of 1834 and the movement of Nonconformism in 1886. Both movements nurtured the beginnings of Reformed denominations with their distinct names. Since the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church had been only tolerated, but in 1853 it was allowed the legal right of its own organization. Since that time of emancipation, the church has constructed a number of new buildings (to replace the churches that had been confiscated in the 16th century), and Catholics founded many denominational schools (from primary schools to universities such as Tilburg and Nijmegen), newspapers, and a political party. For the next century, The Netherlands was divided into four socio-political and socio-religious groups: the Roman Catholics; the Reformed believers; the Socialists; and the so-called common group. Each group had its own broadcasting company, newspapers, and organizations in every possible field. The Roman Catholics and Reformed groups had their own schools.

At the end of the 19th century some new religions (primarily Christian sectarian expressions) from North America and other Anglo-Saxon countries attained some popularity, but only in small groups. These were the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, several Pentecostal movements (which have led to the formation of many independent communities), and, to some extent, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

THE NETHERLANDS

World War II caused dramatic changes in Dutch religious life, and in the subsequent half-century, several dominant trends were documented: (1) an increase of the process of secularization, so that about 50 percent of the Dutch consider themselves unbelievers, and Humanist organizations have begun to appear; (2) Indian religions have gained a noticeable popularity among young adults, and Hindu-based movements

(such as the Ananda Marga Yoga Society, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and the movement around Bhagwan Rajneesh) have emerged; (3) so-called youth religious groups, such as the Children of God (now the Family International) and the Church of Scientology, have grown in popularity; (4) Christian ministers and evangelists from the United States (Billy Graham and others) have achieved great popularity among many independent communities, utilizing a common broadcasting organization (Evan-gelische Omroep, the Evangelical Broadcasting Company); and (5) there are many new religions originating from the Far East (such as Zen Buddhism and the Unification movement), some arriving by way of the

The Netherlands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	11,651,000	10,653,000	64.6	−0.36	9,591,000	8,840,000
Roman Catholics	5,367,000	4,800,000	29.1	−1.81	4,600,000	4,200,000
Protestants	4,709,000	3,050,000	18.5	−1.32	2,850,000	2,620,000
Independents	166,000	400,000	2.4	1.25	550,000	800,000
Agnostics	1,166,000	4,071,000	24.7	2.13	5,017,000	5,410,000
Muslims	60,000	1,072,000	6.5	2.22	1,316,000	1,572,000
Atheists	100,000	300,000	1.8	5.56	480,000	650,000
Buddhists	4,000	200,000	1.2	2.84	300,000	450,000
Hindus	1,000	115,000	0.7	3.19	150,000	180,000
Jews	30,000	25,100	0.2	0.50	25,000	25,000
Spiritists	3,000	25,500	0.2	0.50	29,000	35,000
Sikhs	0	13,500	0.1	0.50	15,000	18,000
New religionists	7,000	12,000	0.1	0.41	14,000	18,000
Chinese folk	15,000	7,200	0.0	0.50	12,000	20,000
Baha'is	2,700	6,800	0.0	1.12	10,000	15,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	700	0.0	0.50	1,000	1,500
Zoroastrians	0	300	0.0	2.89	300	300
Total population	13,039,000	16,502,000	100.0	0.50	16,960,000	17,235,000

United States and already assimilated into the Western world.

In addition, around 1948 the process of decolonization began for The Netherlands. First from the East Indies, many so-called South Moluccans came to The Netherlands with their own Christian denominations and forms of worship. Only a very small group of the Moluccans was Muslim. In the 1960s began the decolonization of Surinam, with its many different religions, and many Surinamese moved to The Netherlands. At that time, many “guest workers” from countries around the Mediterranean migrated to The Netherlands. They became the major source of the current Dutch Islamic community. In the 1980s many refugees found The Netherlands a safe haven. They came (and continue to arrive) from several countries in Africa and Asia. Although some of these refugees are Christians, others are Hindu, Buddhist, and Muslim. Many Chinese refugees—very visible because of the Chinese restaurants now found throughout the country—are adepts of Confucianism and the unique Chinese mixture of Daoism and Buddhism. African and Asian Christians have formed tight communities that provide essential social contacts and a range of services. They have also developed an active program to re-Christianize the Dutch people, whom they see as having lost their original belief.

The Dutch government allows all religions and spiritual perspectives to build their own places of worship, and the Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims have their own (small) broadcasting organizations modeled on the larger ones sponsored by Catholic and Reformed believers. For many centuries the Dutch people have provided an ongoing example of toleration in the midst of the world’s growing religious pluralism.

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Ananda Marga Yoga Society; Calvin, John; Calvinism; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Confucianism; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Mennonite Church; Netherlands Reformed Church; Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Unification Movement; Zen Buddhism.

References

Blei, Karel. The Netherlands Reformed Church, 1571–2005. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2006.

- Blom, J. C. H., R. G. Fuks-Mansfeld, and I. Schoffer, eds. The History of the Jews in the Netherlands. Oxford: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2007.
- Brienen, T., et al. De Nadere Reformatie en het Gereformeerd Piëtisme. 's Gravenhage: Boekencentrum, 1989.
- Buijs, Frank J., Froukje Dernant, and Alef Hamdy. Strijders van eigen bodem. Radicale en democratische moslims in Nederland. Amsterdam: University Press, 2006.
- Eijnatten, Joris, and Fred van Lieburg. Nederlandse religiegeschiedenis. 2nd ed. Hilversum: Verloren, 2006.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland: Handboek religies, kerken en stromingen. 3rd ed. Kampen: Kok, 2000.
- Jongeneel, J. A. B., R. Budiman, and J. J. Visser, eds. Gemeenschapsvorming van Aziatische, Afrikaanse en Midden- en Zuidamerikaanse christenen in Nederland: Een geschiedenis in wording. Zoetermeer: Boekencentrum, 1996.
- Knippenberg, Hans. De religieuze kaart van Nederland: Omvang en geografische spreiding van de godsdienstige gezindten vanaf de Reformatie tot heden. Assen and Maastricht: Van Gorcum, 1992.
- Meijering, Eginhard. Het Nederlandse christendom in de twintigste eeuw. Amsterdam: Balans, 2007.
- Selderhuis, Herman, ed. Handboek Nederlandse kerkgeschiedenis. Kampen: Kok, 2006.
- Shadid, W. A. R., and P. S. Van Koningsveld. Moslims in Nederland. Minderheden en religie in een multiculturele samenleving. 2nd ed. Houten: Bohn Stafleu and Van Loghum, 1997.
- Stoutenbeek, Jan, and Paul Vigeveno. Joods Nederland: Een cultuurhistorische gids. Amsterdam: Em. Querido, 1989.

■ Netherlands Antilles

The Netherlands Antilles consists of two sets of islands on opposite sides of the Caribbean Sea tied together by their relationship to the Netherlands. One group, located off the coast of Venezuela, consists of Curaçao and Bonaire. The other group, located between Anguilla and Antigua, consists of Saba, St. Martin, and St. Eustatius islands. The total land area is 370 square miles with a population of some 225,000 residents (2008). The original inhabitants of Curaçao and Bonaire, the Caiqueti people, were enslaved by the early Spanish explorers and deported to Hispaniola. The original inhabitants of St. Martin and St. Eustatius met a similar fate.

The Dutch took Curaçao from the Spanish in 1634. After receiving Bonaire in the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, the Dutch began to repopulate the islands with enslaved Africans. Slavery was not abolished until 1863. Economically depressed over several generations, the islands came alive when refineries were built to handle the oil being produced in Venezuela.

In 1954, the islands were granted local autonomy. As a move was afoot to grant complete independence, in 1986 Aruba, which had been part of the Antilles, pulled out and became a separate country. That left Willemstad, on Curaçao, as the only city in the Antilles.

A variety of religions have been represented on the islands over the years. The Roman Catholic Church began a mission in the 16th century but was expelled when the Dutch took control of Curaçao in 1634. Several Jesuits re-established the Catholic presence in 1705. A vicariate was created on Curaçao in 1842, and the Diocese of Willemstad in 1958. Among Curaçaoans, 85 percent profess Catholicism, with lesser percentages on the other islands.

Protestantism came to Curaçao following the Dutch takeover, when the Dutch began settlement in 1650. Eventually, Reformed churches were established on Curaçao and Bonaire. Dutch Lutherans also migrated to the islands, and in 1825 Dutch authorities forced a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches that produced the Protestant Church. In 1931, members of the Protestant Church in Curaçao created the Reformed Church in Curaçao and assumed as a major

Netherlands Antilles

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	154,000	187,000	93.8	0.58	189,000	162,000
Roman Catholics	134,000	152,000	76.4	−0.70	151,000	125,000
Protestants	17,100	32,000	16.1	1.22	36,000	35,000
Marginals	1,000	4,000	2.0	2.74	7,000	9,000
Agnostics	2,900	6,400	3.2	2.14	10,000	14,000
Spiritists	0	2,200	1.1	0.62	2,800	3,000
Buddhists	400	1,000	0.5	0.62	1,400	1,600
Jews	600	620	0.3	−0.55	850	850
Baha'is	250	500	0.3	0.65	800	1,100
Hindus	100	410	0.2	0.63	600	800
Muslims	250	400	0.2	0.61	800	1,000
Atheists	0	310	0.2	0.63	500	700
Chinese folk	500	300	0.2	0.66	400	400
New religionists	50	150	0.1	0.58	300	400
Total population	159,000	199,000	100.0	0.63	207,000	186,000

task the ministry to members of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (one of the several Reformed denominations operating in Holland) who had migrated to the Antilles. This group merged with the Protestant Church to create the United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles in 1984. It is the largest Protestant church in the Antilles.

Methodists began work in the Antilles among Africans in St. Eustatius. In the mid-1780s, an African slave known only as Black Harry (and not to be confused with Black Harry Hosier, the contemporary Methodist preacher in the United States) had gathered a small group that the Methodists termed a “class.” When Methodist Superintendent Thomas Coke (1747–1814) arrived in 1787, he found 20 people in this group and during his visit organized additional similar classes. He returned a year later to find Harry had been banished by slave owners, fearful of religious organization among the slaves.

Although Methodism grew in the Antilles during this time, it was not until the early 1800s that non-hostile relations with the Dutch authorities developed. Methodism spread to St. Martin in the 1840s and to Curaçao in the 1930s. Methodist work there is now included in the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas.

Through the 20th century, a spectrum of churches began work in the Netherlands Antilles, the Salvation Army, the Assemblies of God, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church being among the more successful.

The Jewish community in the Antilles originated in the short-lived Dutch settlement of Brazil. Jews who had been living quietly under Portuguese rule in Recife openly organized after the Dutch arrived. When the Dutch were forced out of Brazil, many Jews left and came to Curaçao, where in 1651 João d’Ylan led in the construction of what is now the oldest synagogue in the Western Hemisphere.

Islam in the Antilles developed in the 20th century with the movement of laborers from Lebanon and Syria to Curaçao. They formed the Muslim Community of Curaçao, which sponsors a mosque in Willemstad.

There are a few adherents of the Baha’i Faith, and some members of the Liberal Catholic Church, the theosophical body that has one of its strongest followings in the Netherlands, and the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha’i Faith; Liberal Catholic Church; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Protestant Church of Netherlands Antilles.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Emmanuel, Isaac S., and Suzanne A. Emmanuel. History of the Jews of the Netherland Antilles. Cincinnati, OH: American Jewish Archives, 1970.
- Lutz, William. Netherlands Antilles. New York: Chelsea House Publications, 1987.

Netherlands Reformed Churches

The Netherlands Reformed Churches (Nederlands Gereformeerde Kerken) were founded in 1979 through a conflict in the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated). Some members wanted to enter into conversation with the General Synod of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands (GKN) (now an integral part of the Protestant Church in the Netherlands). They were suspended from membership and some 20 percent of the members and 30 percent of the ministers left the church. The Dutch Reformed Churches represent, on the whole, the perspective of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands around the 1970s. Like most Reformed groups in the Netherlands, it accepts the authority of the Catechism of Heidelberg, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Dutch Confession.

In 2007, the church included 32,250 members, 76 ministers, and 95 local parishes. Ministers are educated at the Theological University of the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands at Apeldoorn. The church now has (partly) its own academy. The parishes are different in their practice: some are very traditional Reformed, others rather progressive; some refuse to allow women to be elders, others have no problems with women holding office.

The church is not a member of any of the several international ecumenical organizations, but it maintains ecumenical contact with the Christian Reformed Church in North America, the Reformed Churches in Australia and New Zealand, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church in America, the Églises Reformées Évangéliques Indépendantes in France, and the Geredja Bebas in Eastern Soemba, Indonesia.

Netherlands Reformed Churches
Medeblikhof 39
6843 BC Arnhem
The Netherlands
<http://www.ngk.nl/ngken.html>

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Christian Reformed Church in North America; Orthodox Presbyterian Church; Protestant Church in the Netherlands; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated).

References

- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenvoegingen en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.
- Informatieboekje voor de Nederlands Gereformeerde Kerken*. Amsterdam: Buyten & Schipperheyn, 1974–.
- Moggré, A. J. Kinderen van één Vader. Kampen, 1994.

Neturei Karta

Neturei Karta (Aramaic: Guardians of the City) is the name adopted by a group of Orthodox Jews who have resided in Palestine for many generations but who refuse to recognize the existence or authority of the state of Israel. They have become well known for their history of demonstrating in support of their position, including staged burnings of the Israeli flag. Neturei Karta was founded in Jerusalem in 1938 by Rabbis Amram Blau and Aharon Katzenelbogen as a splinter group of Agudath Israel (or Agudas Yisroel), an Orthodox Jewish organization that was originally opposed to Zionism, the movement for the return of the Jewish people to Palestine and Jewish sovereignty over the territory of ancient Israel. In the early 20th century, Agudath Israel dropped its opposition to Zionism.

Ultra-Orthodox men from the Neturei Karta take part in a protest outside the United Nations headquarters in Jerusalem, July 22, 2007. The protesters called on the UN to recognize them as an oppressed people by Israeli authorities. (AP Photo/Kevin Frayer)

The Neturei Karta originally were known as Hevret ha-Hayyim, only assuming their present name over the years. Their leader Rabbi Amram Blau (1895–1976) spent much of his life planning and leading demonstrations against the Israeli authorities. Following the establishment of the modern state of Israel, Neturei Karta members found themselves in a high state of tension with authorities. They tended to describe the founders and leaders of the state as Zionists rather than as fellow believers.

Neturei Karta has opposed the state of Israel on the grounds that the idea of a sovereign Jewish state is contrary to Jewish law, and it stands against the practice of uprooting centuries-old Jewish communities around the world in order to build the Jewish population in Israel. Members continue the position assumed by many 19th-century Jewish rabbis who believed Zionism was contrary to the Talmud—the oral tradition believed by Orthodox Jews to have been given to Moses while he was on Mount Sinai receiving the Torah (the Law). They believe that the true state of Israel will only be established without the use of human force, and they claim that Jews should not revolt against established nations but rather seek to live as loyal citizens.

Over the years, many Neturei Karta members have left Israel for more hospitable environments. Neturei Karta centers have now been established in several countries, including the United Kingdom and the United States. There are three synagogues in Brooklyn, New York. Closely associated with Neturei Karta is the Friends of Jerusalem, an organization that has taken the lead in furthering the various causes of the Neturei Karta by organizing demonstrations against Israel and participating in a spectrum of activities (including meetings with heads of state) to advocate strong opposition to Zionist programs.

In recent years, Neturei Karta has divided into two factions. The more activist faction has come together under the names Neturei Karta International and Jews United Against Zionism. They are led in Israel by Rabbi Moshe Hirsch (the son-in-law of Aharon Katzenelbogen) and his son Rabbi Yisrael Meir Hirsch, and in New York by Rabbi Yisroel Dovid Weiss and Rabbi Moshe Ber Beck. This group has been most demonstrative and is regularly the focus of news reports. Rabbi Hirsch had served in the cabinet of the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat (1929–2004) as the minister for Jewish affairs. More recently leaders of the group in New York met with Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan while leaders of the Israeli branch traveled to Iran (2006) to meet with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. This faction's main synagogue, Ohel Sarah, is located in one of the oldest neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

The more moderate, less activist faction of the Neturei Karta is led by Rabbi Zelig Reuven Katzenelbogen (the grandson of the group's two founders). It claims the allegiance of the majority of Neturei Karta members. Its main synagogue, Toireh veYiroh, is also located in the old section of Jerusalem not far from Ohel Sarah.

The Neturei Karta claims several thousand committed members and a sympathetic constituency in the hundreds of thousands, which would include some of the anti-Zionist Hasidic movements such as Satmar. As Satmar Hasidism grew, the Neturei Karta placed itself under its care and guidance. The relationship had unforeseen consequences in 1965, when Rabbi Blau married a former Roman Catholic who had converted to Judaism. Satmar Rabbi Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979) forced the ouster of Blau from his leadership role. Most recently, following the visit of the several rabbis to Iran, some of whom described themselves as Satmar rabbis, the Satmar leadership denounced the rabbis and separated themselves from their actions and statements.

Neturei Karta International
PO Box 1316
Monsey, NY 10952
<http://www.nkusa.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hasidism; Nation of Islam; Orthodox Judaism; Satmar Hasidism; Zionism.

References

- Domb, I. The Transformation: The Case of the Neturei Karta. London, 1958.
- Lawrence, Bruce. Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Odenheimer, Micha. "We Do Not Believe, We Will Not Follow." Guilt and Pleasure 2 (Spring 2006). http://www.guiltandpleasure.com/index.php?site=rebootgp&page=gp_article&id=17. Accessed March 24, 2009.
- Zimmer, Uriel. "The Guardians of the City." <http://www.nkusa.org/Books/Publications/guardians.cfm>. Accessed March 24, 2009.

New Acropolis Cultural Association

Founded in 1957 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, by Jorge Angel Livraga Rizzi and his wife, Ada Albrecht, the New Acropolis Cultural Association claims to have more than 10,000 members in more than 40 countries. Professor Livraga Rizzi was born in Buenos Aires in 1930 of Italian ancestry, and he died in 1991 in Madrid, Spain. He allegedly studied medicine, philosophy, and the history of art at a university in Buenos Aires and was the author of numerous books and articles: the study of ancient cultures and civilizations, novels, philosophical essays, and reflections on the contemporary world, among others. His house in Buenos Aires is now a museum, maintained by the New Acropolis Cultural Association, where his achievements are honored and preserved. Some of Livraga's books and articles, as well as those of some of his disciples, are available in an electronic format on the Internet at: www.acropolis.org.

New Acropolis Cultural Association is a post-Theosophical movement that combines elements from many sources: Theosophy, Esoteric thought, alchemy, astrology, and Eastern and Greek philosophy. Although it claims to be a Humanist organization, independent of political and religious ties, some of its former members in France have accused the organization of being right-wing and promoting Fascist and neo-Nazi ideas. The alleged use of paramilitary language, symbols, and forms of organization, along with more recent charges of brainwashing, have led to many criticisms of the New Acropolis in Europe, especially in France, since the mid-1970s.

The New Acropolis movement promotes the idea of a universal “philosophy” or “tradition” upon which the world’s different religions and Esoteric traditions are based. However, it emphasizes Western rather than Eastern Esotericism and particularly focuses on Greek philosophy in the tradition of Pythagoras and Plato, according to Italian lawyer/sociologist Massimo Introvigne.

The stated aim of New Acropolis is to help each member reach his or her Higher Self and to reclaim a higher consciousness that, while normally dormant, is preserved in the esoteric schools and accessible through symbols, the active use of imagination, the study of one’s own dreams, and other techniques. The Higher Self, in turn, is a gateway to the Cosmic or Universal Self, described as a collective archetypal reality. When an adequate number of human beings achieve that Higher Self, the Universal Self may emerge as collective consciousness and may have important social and political implications. Although the society inspired by the collective consciousness of the archetypal Universal Self has been described in different ways throughout the history of the movement, it is certainly different from modern democracy. Indeed, the founder’s criticism of contemporary democracy (quoting Plato and other authors) is often offered by critics of New Acropolis as evidence of the movement’s “reactionary” or “fascist” attitude, although other texts by Livraga and his successors unequivocally condemn Nazism, Fascism, and more recently the National Front in France.

The New Acropolis website lists member organizations in the following countries: Argentina, Costa Rica, Japan, Paraguay, Slovenia, Sweden, Turkey, the United States, and Venezuela. Also, other organizations that use a similar name are known to exist in Mexico, Colombia, Belgium, and France.

New Acropolis Cultural Association
Amenabar 863
Buenos Aires 1426

Argentina
www.acropolis.org

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Alchemy, Daoist; Astrology; Theosophical Society (America); Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Introvigne, Massimo. “Defectors, Ordinary Leave-takers and Apostates: A Quantitative Study of Former Members of New Acropolis in France.” www.cesnur.org. Accessed June 15, 2009.
- New Acropolis Cultural Association. www.acropolis.org.

New Age Movement

The New Age movement, which rose to public prominence in the West in the 1970s and 1980s, was a millennial revivalist movement that swept through the groups of the Western Esoteric tradition, leading to the expansion of many older groups, the emergence of a new set of Esoteric organizations, and a general reappraisal of the tradition by the general public. The movement’s name derived from its orientation around a vision of a coming New Age of peace and wisdom, which was believed to be dawning upon humanity as the 21st century approached. The initial exponents of the movement were followers of offshoots of older Esoteric groups (the Theosophical Society, the Arcane School, and others) and the churches of the New Thought tradition. The movement waned in the 1990s as the idea of an imminent New Age lost support and the movement as a whole was attacked for some of its more questionable assertions.

The Western Esoteric tradition, at least in its popular phase as the purveyor of occult teachings over against the dominant Christian worldview, experienced a new rebirth in the 19th century following a century of decline under the combined challenge of Protestant Christianity and the Enlightenment. Its reemergence paralleled that of science, and the new occultists attempted to align magical teachings with the emerging scientific world. Leading the way was Austrian physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), who proposed the existence of a universal magnetic force that he believed underlay spiritual healing. Though denounced by the French Royal Academy of Science, “mesmerism” became a popular movement throughout the West in the early 19th century.

New Age painting depicts meditation in pursuit of the higher self. (Loveliestdreams/Dreamstime.com)

Building upon Mesmer’s thought, Eliphas Levi (1810–1875) identified the universal energy with the cosmic agent evoked while working magic. Levi’s several books launched a revival of magic in Europe. A century later, the elitist initiatory magic promoted by Levi and later exponents such as Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) would find its popular expression in neo-Pagan Wicca or Witchcraft. The renewed practice of magic supported the simultaneous rebirth of interest in various divinatory practices such as palmistry, astrology, and tarot reading. Astrology has been the most popular occult belief, and the very visible rise of the new 20th-century “science of astrology” provides a framework for understanding the appeal of occultism as a whole.

In North America, the very successful mesmerist movement was superseded in the middle of the 19th century by a movement centered upon contact and communication with the spirits of the recently deceased. Spiritualism began in Hydesville, New York, in 1848, and through the 1850s it spread across America and then to England and France, where it enjoyed an even greater response. Over the last decades of the 19th century, Spiritualist activity could be found in the major cities of Europe and such unlikely places as Cairo and Rio de Janeiro.

The alternative healing emphasis of the magnetist movement that popularized Mesmer’s ideas supported the development of a host of alternative healing practices in 19th-century America, setting the context for the discovery by Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910) of a new kind of healing. After decades of fighting illnesses, in 1866 she came to a realization of the Allness of God, from which she concluded that all illness was a monstrous illusion of limited minds, an erroneous perception of the nature of reality. To embody her new insight, Eddy founded the Church of Christ, Scientist. In the 1880s, one of her leading students, Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), began an independent ministry, now seen as the beginning of a new movement, New Thought, today embodied in several metaphysical church/movements: the Unity School of Christianity, Divine Science Federation International, Religious Science, and Seicho-No-Ie.

To Esotericists and occultists of the 19th and 20th centuries, history was of secondary interest at best, a practical means of relating to a mundane world from which they were trying to escape. Attention was focused on a set of occult (hidden) realities believed to lie behind the visible universe. However, toward the end of the 20th century, an attempt to ascribe some importance to the mundane world as a place of spiritual unfolding began with Madame Helena Petrova Blavatsky (1831–1891), a cofounder of the Theosophical Society. She suggested that the real goals of the Theosophical Society were to cooperate with the evolution of the race and to prepare for the coming of Lord Maitreya, one of the Masters of the Great White Brotherhood, the adepts who from a lofty estate actually guide humanity on its way. Maitreya’s coming would initiate a new cycle for humanity.

Blavatsky's initial idea about Maitreya was developed more fully by Annie Besant (1847–1933), who became the president of the Society early in the 20th century, and by a former Anglican priest, Charles Webster Leadbeater (1854–1934). Leadbeater identified the vehicle of the coming Maitreya as one Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986), a young boy whom Leadbeater spotted on a beach near the Theosophical Society's international headquarters at Adyar, India. Besant took control of the situation and provided for Krishnamurti's education. The society prepared him for his role as the Coming World Savior, and through the 1920s, Krishnamurti appeared at numerous Society-sponsored events.

Initially, Krishnamurti appeared to be following the Theosophical program, and the Society mobilized international support for the designated Savior figure. Then in 1929, he suddenly abandoned his predestined role and left the Society to deal with both the problems of his resignation and the Great Depression. The Society never recovered. Meanwhile, a new teacher, Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949), was just emerging as a prominent figure in the movement. Bailey had left the Theosophical Society to begin an independent effort built around her direct communications with one of the Masters, Djwhal Khul, whom she usually referred to as the Tibetan. Annie Besant disapproved both of the material received from the Tibetan and the process by which it was received—channeling, or mediumship. Bailey withdrew from the society in 1923 and with the assistance of her husband, Foster, founded the Arcane School.

Toward the end of her life, Bailey began to call her students' attention to the reappearance of the Christ, which she believed would occur during the last years of the 20th century. In the 1950s, many left the Arcane School, and students of her works founded a spectrum of independent Baileyite organizations—the "Light" groups—which engaged in channeling spiritual light (cosmic energy) into the world for its uplift and healing. The members of these groups also prepared for the expected World Savior.

As early as the 1960s, leaders of several British Baileyite groups would be the first to propose the New Age vision of a transformed world. They suggested that a transformation could result if an international network of Light groups would channel spiritual energy to the planet. A rudimentary vision began with the networking of several groups: the Wrekin Trust (England), the Universal Foundation (London), and the Findhorn Foundation (near Inverness, Scotland). By the end of the decade, Anthony Brooke (b. 1912), the former ruler of Sarawak and the head of the Universal Foundation, was touring and promoting the formation of additional Light groups. Groups emerged in several countries around the world.

In the mid-1970s, David Spangler (b. 1945), co-director of the Findhorn Foundation, authored several books that elucidated a broad vision of an emerging New Age. His 1976 volume, Revelation: The Birth of a New Age, and several subsequent titles offered a more fully developed statement of New Age possibilities, which became immediate fuel for an emerging revival. Spangler suggested that in the generation maturing in the last quarter of the 20th century, human beings could seize a unique opportunity to create a new social order that would replace the current world, characterized so much by war, poverty, starvation, and other social ills.

The New Age would begin with the transformation of individuals, who would be healed, changed, uplifted, and enlightened. Their transformation would be accomplished by the use of many old occult tools (astrology, palmistry, and meditation and concentration practices), new information received through channeling from evolved spiritual beings, and an array of alternative healing disciplines. Transformation could on occasion be quick and dramatic, but any change was but the beginning of a long-term process of development that would lead to new levels of spiritual experience and realization.

As ever-greater numbers of individuals were transformed, the larger goal, the transformation of society, would follow. The emergence of this new social and cultural situation was the real New Age. Spangler argued that if individuals would share the wisdom and energy they received as they were transformed, through the uniting of light and love the entire planet would be transformed into a New Age for humanity.

Spangler cited two sources for the New Age. First, the present moment (the late 20th century) was a propitious moment, when the heavens were being aligned for release of new levels of cosmic spiritual energy, which would power the New Age. Thus the idea of the New Age aligned with the notion of the Aquarian Age, which astrologers had predicted as occurring at some imprecise time in the 20th or 21st century. Significant points in the progression of the Earth through the zodiac and the initiation of a new astrological age are seen as occurring about every 2,000 years.

However, the cosmic energy of the stars could not do it alone. The second source for the New Age would be people—working, cooperating, and uniting. The New Age would require the effort of large numbers of transformed people channeling the cosmic energies. If people failed to act, the opportunity would be lost.

The New Age movement reached its zenith in the 1980s. During the decade people who had previously adhered to the Western Esoteric tradition caught the vision of the New Age, while hundreds of thousands of others around the world who had no background in the tradition also discovered the movement. New Age publishers and bookstores appeared in urban centers throughout the Western world, and New Age networks linked the largely decentralized movement. New Agers gathered annually in large New Age expositions that were organized so the various, often divergent elements of the movement could share experiences.

Under its new label, the Western Esoteric tradition continued to promote the older occult arts but remolded them for the New Age world. Ancient divinatory practices, including astrology and the tarot, were now offered to the public as scientific transformative tools. They were taken from their former deterministic worldview, in which they offered predictions of the future, and were now utilized primarily as instruments of personal insight and self-revelation.

Crystals emerged in the 1980s as a prominent New Age tool. Crystals had been mentioned in the channeled readings of seer Edgar Cayce (1877–1945), whose insights were published in a small booklet by the Association for Research and Enlightenment. Cayce's linkage of crystals and ancient Atlantis inspired Frank Alper, of the Arizona Metaphysical Center, who claimed that crystals had great potential for their ability to store and release transformative spiritual energies. Enthusiastic New Agers added crystals to their attire, meditated in their presence, and placed them in their ritual spaces in the belief that their energizing powers would thus effect spiritual evolution.

Mediumship, now termed “channeling,” emerged as the most definitive practice of the New Age movement. Channelers brought messages from a spectrum of authoritative spiritual entities (God, the Ascended Masters, spirits, extraterrestrial beings, the channeler's higher self) who provided guidance and direction for the movement. Some channels provided individuals with personal messages for their own particular and immediate concerns. The most well-known channels (JZ Knight, Jach Pursel, Kevin Ryerson, Ken Carey, Pat Rodegast, and others) brought more philosophical teachings that were applicable to the larger New Age public.

Among the more interesting New Age organizations was Share International, which structured the teaching activity of Benjamin Crème (b. 1922), a student of the Bailey writings, who in the 1970s began channeling messages from Maitreya and announcing his imminent appearance. When Crème's prediction of Maitreya's appearance in 1982 failed, he was largely dismissed by the rest of the movement.

The New Age culminated in 1989 with the airing of the television version of actress Shirley MacLaine's autobiographical book, Out on a Limb. MacLaine (b. 1934) had followed a New Age pilgrimage for a decade; however, her own transformation coincided with a very different change undergone by the movement itself. During the 1980s leaders were feeling the critiques of reporters and scholars, especially those directed at the underlying claims of paranormal realities related to crystals and channeling. Scientists denounced pseudoscientific claims about the power of crystals to store and release energy and raised doubts about the existence of the spiritual entities who spoke through channels. As the 1980s came to a close, several prominent New Age spokespersons (including writer David Spangler and publisher Jeremy Tarcher) revealed their conviction that they had erred in believing in the possibility of social transformation. That so many people had experienced a personal transformation justified the existence of the New Age movement, but it was time to give up any hope in a more pervasive social transformation.

In the 1990s the great majority of New Agers came to agree with Spangler and Tarcher, and they abandoned hope in a coming New Age. By this time millions of people across the Western world had been attracted to the Western Esoteric tradition, still called the New Age in the larger society. (Adherents remained a small minority in the West, still dominated by Christianity.)

The great majority of New Agers were content with the personal spirituality they had found. Many were associated with the organizations most identified with the movement—the Association for Research and Enlightenment, the Church Universal and Triumphant, and Ramtha's School of Enlightenment, to name just a few. Through the 1990s, new groups emerged that attempted to continue belief in the New Age, now defined as an ever-increasing global interest in spirituality that over the next centuries will lead to new levels of spiritual awareness and produce a flourishing new culture. This transformed New Age vision was given voice in a book by James Redfield in The Celestine Prophecy (1994), which became a bestseller and spawned a set of related texts and a new movement, the New Civilization Network. This new phase of the movement has been referred to as the Next Age, especially in Europe.

The New Age suffered greatly in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, bombings of the World Trade Center in New York and Pentagon in Washington, D.C. Over the next few years, the large convention/expositions were either cancelled or held in a reduced low-key manner. Many New Age businesses collapsed and only slowly has the movement recovered. The many New Age religious groups fared the best but suffered from a loss of a venue to contact prospective new members and distribute their literature.

As the movement recovered from the 9/11 disaster, it also became attuned to new millennial expectations built around the date, December 12, 2012. This date was originally posed as significant by students of the ancient Mayan calendar, who noted that it ran out in 2012. Others have added to the expectations around the year, though opinions as to what might occur in 2012 vary widely.

The New Age is best seen as a burst of growth in the Western Esoteric tradition. The movement greatly enlarged the number of people adhering to an esoteric worldview, created new currents of esoteric expression, and bequeathed to the tradition a fresh, more positive image in the Western world. As the New Age movement emerged, older adherents of the Western Esoteric tradition expressed a range of opinions about it. Some openly supported it, others watched and observed from a distance, and not a few voiced their strident hostility to the movement's shallowness. In any event, the movement created a new situation out of which future Western Esoteric activity will operate.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Arcane School; Association for Research and Enlightenment; Bailey, Alice Ann; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church Universal and Triumphant; Crowley, Aleister; Divine Science Federation International/United Divine Science Ministries International; Ramtha's School of Enlightenment; Religious Science; Seicho-No-Ie; Spiritualism; Theosophical Society (America); Unity School of Christianity; Western Esoteric Tradition; Wiccan Religion.

References

- Benedict, Gerald. The Mayan Prophecies for 2012. London: Watkins, 2008.
- Drury, Nevill. The New Age: The History of a Movement. London: Thames & Hudson, 2004.
- Introvigne, Massimo. New Age and Next Age. Casale Monferrato, Italy: Piemme, 2000.
- Hanegraaff, Wouter J. New Age Religion and Western Culture. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996.
- Heelas, Paul. The New Age Movement. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers, 1996.
- Klimo, Hjon. Channeling: Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources. Berkeley, CA: North Atlantic Press, 1998.
- Lewis, James, and J. Gordon Melton, eds. Perspectives on the New Age. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Finding Enlightenment: Ramtha's School of Ancient Wisdom. Hillsboro, OR: Beyond Words, 1998.
- Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly, eds. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research Company, 1990.
- Redfield, James. The Celestine Prophecy. New York: Warner Books, 1994.
- Spangler, David. Revelation: The Birth of a New Age. San Francisco: Rainbow Bridge, 1976.

Sutcliffe, Steven. Children of the New Age: A History of Spiritual Practices. London: Routledge, 2003.

New Apostolic Church

The New Apostolic Church, is one of the largest new religious movements founded in Europe, with an international following of some 11 million.

The Catholic Apostolic Church, established in England in the wake of the revival led by Edward Irving (1792–1834), though he was not its founder, was particularly successful in Germany. It taught, however, that no new Apostles should be appointed after the death of its 12 original founders. This created serious problems, since only the Apostles were empowered to consecrate Bishops, and only Bishops can ordain priests. This was not a major problem for the Catholic Apostolic Church, however, because the end of the world was expected to occur quite soon. This did not happen, of course, and one after the other the original Apostles died. Following short-lived attempts to solve the problem within the German branch, between 1897 and 1898 Fritz Krebs (1832–1905) proclaimed himself an Apostle, and proceeded to appoint other Apostles who, in turn, elected him as Stammapostel (“Root-Apostle” and chief of the church). In order to distinguish this splinter group from the Catholic Apostolic Church, it was legally established as the New Apostolic Church.

The New Apostolic Church’s success was outstanding, thanks to the efforts of Krebs and his successors Hermann Niehaus (1848–1932) and Johann Gottfried Bischoff (1871–1960). Although the Catholic Apostolic Church almost died out (and is currently reduced to a small remnant), the New Apostolic Church gathered millions of members throughout the world. Around the end of Bischoff’s life, a millenarian movement erupted within his church, in the expectation of an imminent end of the world. Schisms followed, although Bischoff’s successor, Walter Schmidt (1891–1978), was eventually able to explain why the prophecy had failed (God had changed his plans), and to keep most of the members within the fold. Today the New Apostolic Church, the current Stammapostel being German-born Wilhelm Leber, includes, according to most outside observers, some 11 million members, with 72,000 local communities throughout Europe, with the strongest concentrations in Germany and Switzerland, and the world (with the largest communities in Australia, the Philippines, the United States, and Canada).

The New Apostolic Church has come to the conclusion that Apostles in today’s world should number more than 12. There are at present 28 main “District Apostles” and some 300 other Apostles. Under the Apostles’ leadership are Bishops, elders, pastors, evangelists, priests, and deacons. Although the structure of the New Apostolic Church is reminiscent of the Catholic Apostolic Church (except, of course, that in the latter the number of Apostles never exceeded 12), the doctrine is more similar to evangelical Protestantism and includes a pre-millennial, pre-tribulationist belief in the rapture. The liturgy, on the other hand, maintains elements of the Catholic Apostolic Church (in turn derived from the Church of England), and includes the celebration of three sacraments: baptism, a kind of confirmation celebrated 18 months after baptism, and Communion. It is because of these liturgical elements, and its belief in the crucial role of the apostolic hierarchy, that evangelical Protestants do not normally regard themselves as being in communion with New Apostolics.

New Apostolic Church
Gutleutstraße 298
60327 Frankfurt am Main
Germany
<http://www.nak.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Catholic Apostolic Church; Church of England.

References

- Guide for the Administration: Brothers of the New Apostolic Church*. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Apostles College of the New Apostolic Church, 1967.
- Question and Answers Concerning the New Apostolic Church*. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: J. G. Bischoff, 1978.
- Rockefeller, Gottfried. Geschichte der Neuapostolischen Kirche. Frankfurt am Main: Neuapostolische Kirche, 1953.

New Caledonia

See Kanaky.

New Kadampa Tradition–International Kadampa Buddhist Union

The New Kadampa Tradition–International Kadampa Buddhist Union (NKT-IKBU) is a network of Buddhist centers and temples operating under the guidance of the Tibetan-born Gelugpa monk, Geshe Kelsang Gyatso (b. 1931). The organization aims to have a presence in all the major cities of the world. It is currently (2008) represented in 40 countries across 5 continents but with the majority of centers in Europe and America. The NKT headquarters are located in the United Kingdom, where there are around 50 centers each of which acts as a satellite for Buddhist teaching activities in other towns in the area. The NKT is one of the largest schools of Buddhism in the United Kingdom. There are now also nearly 40 centers in the United States.

The NKT-IKBU was founded by the Tibetan national, Gelugpa monk, and teacher Geshe Kelsang Gyatso. Geshe Kelsang was invited to the United Kingdom in 1977 by the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition (FPMT) to head one of their centers. He and his students declared independence from the FPMT in 1991. Since that time the organization has grown rapidly and spread across the globe.

The NKT-IKBU practices include meditation, the taking of refuge in Buddha, acknowledgment of the Dharma (or truth of impermanence), participation in the Sangha (or community of truth-seekers), and the recitation of ritual texts (sadhanas). Practitioners may receive empowerments for such rituals, which carry concomitant commitments to regular practice, from Geshe Kelsang or his senior followers. The texts, which are spoken in the vernacular, are represented as translations of traditional Gelugpa practices.

Central to the movement are three graded study programs: the open and introductory General Programme, the Foundation Programme for more committed practitioners, and the demanding Teacher Training Programme that is adapted from the Tibetan Geshe degree. Successful completion of the study programs is the primary goal for practitioners since only those who know the teachings can pass them on to others. The programs are based on commentaries by Geshe Kelsang on traditional Gelugpa texts such as the Lamrim. NKT teachers may be lay or monastic followers. Monks and nuns have equal status. They wear traditional Tibetan robes and take identical ordination precepts that have been developed by Geshe Kelsang for the Western context. The organization has developed internal rules partly as a result of scandals involving sexual misconduct among high profile monastics.

The NKT-IKBU promotes an exclusive path, stressing the need to study and practice only within Geshe Kelsang's teaching lineage and to avoid "mixing" NKT-IKBU practices with those of other schools. This contrasts with the approach of the Dalai Lama, who favors an inclusive, nonsectarian presentation of Tibetan Buddhism. This difference in emphasis, which is rooted within long-standing Tibetan debates, has become focused on the nature and status of the protector deity, Dorje Shugdan. Although some Gelugpa practitioners, including the Dalai Lama, regard Dorje Shugdan as a troublesome and sectarian worldly deity of dubious origin, for Geshe Kelsang and his teachers before him, Dorje Shugdan is a manifestation of the Buddha and also the most powerful and appropriate protector of Western practitioners. Practices focused on Dorje Shugdan remain central to NKT-IKBU ritual. The NKT-IKBU's uncompromising stance, which runs counter to some popular Western images of Buddhism and has been perceived to threaten the unity of the exiled Tibetan community, has attracted criticism from other Western Buddhist groups and from the Gelugpa school. The NKT-IKBU is nonetheless a member of the UK Network of Buddhist Organisations and it is by no means alone among Western Buddhist movements in attracting criticism from ex-members and from other Buddhist organizations.

Manjushri Centre
 Ulveston, Cumbria LA12 9QQ
 United Kingdom
<http://www.kadampa.net>

Helen Waterhouse

See also: Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition; Gelugpa; Meditation; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Cozort, D. "The Making of the Western Lama." In Buddhism in the Modern World. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Kay, David. "The New Kadampa Tradition and the Continuity of Tibetan Buddhism in Transition." Journal of Contemporary Religion 12, no. 3 (1997): 277–293.
- Kay, David. Tibetan and Zen Buddhism in Britain: Transplantation, Development and Adaptation. Abingdon: RoutledgeCurzon 2003.

New Year's Day

Most contemporary religions operate on a calendar based on the annual circulation of the Earth around the Sun (Islam being a prominent exception), have designated a beginning point from which to measure that circulation, and acknowledge a New Year's Day (Christianity being a prominent exception). For most religious communities, the new year begins on January 1 of the Common Era calendar or the Vernal or Spring Equinox. In the ancient world, the Winter and Summer solstices and the Spring and Fall equinoxes were among the most well known astronomical events.

Some ancient calendars, such as the Babylonian, used the Vernal Equinox as the new year. The Babylonians invented the Zodiac and calculated the movement of the Sun through its 12 signs. They passed this system to the Chaldeans and Assyrians and on to Egypt. The Hebrews were influenced by the Babylonian calendar during the years of captivity when they picked up the Babylonian days of the months and moved their New Year celebration (Rosh Hashanah) to the fall. Rosh Hashanah actually falls on Tishri 1, the first day of the seventh month in the Hebrew calendar. The first month (Nissan) comes in the spring. Rosh Hashanah is a prescribed day of rest, like the Sabbath. Its exact date relative to the Common Era calendar varies from year to year, and also must not fall on a Sunday, Wednesday, or Friday.

Julius Caesar revised the Roman calendar as a strictly solar calendar, established January 1 as the beginning of the New Year, and ensured the beginning of spring (the Spring Equinox) always occur in March. These strictures were carried forward in the Gregorian reforms and are maintained in our Common Era calendar today.

The Christian church adopted the Julian calendar as its official calendar at the Council of Nicaea in 325 CE. January 1 was not a particularly significant date on the annual liturgical calendar, though once the date of Jesus' birth was set as December 25, the New Year was acknowledged as the date of the Feast of the Circumcision. It was assumed that in Hebrew society circumcision of males would be held on the eighth day after birth. The feast of the circumcision is somewhat lost, falling as it does between Christmas and Epiphany (January 6). That fact, along with the downplaying of the liturgical calendar in general in Protestant circles, has contributed greatly to the almost complete secularization of New Year's Day in the Christian West.

Chinese New Year's Day While as in the West, the Chinese New Year's celebration has largely become a secular affair, it still retains elements of its religious past in Chinese traditional religion. It is celebrated on the first day of the first month of the Chinese lunar year and has always been a joyful event marking the end of winter and the beginning of spring. That date appears to have been largely set during the Han dynasty (221–206 BCE), which adopted the Taichu calendar that set the first day of the year across the land. Some elements of the festival—staying up all night on New Year's Eve, the lighting of lanterns, fireworks, the drinking of wine—also began to spread at this time. During the Tang dynasty (618–907), the focus of the festival gradually shifted from one of protecting one's self from ghosts and demons to enjoying life and expecting good in the year ahead. The celebration took on a lighter, more joyful tone. In later dynasties, more ritualized aspects of the celebration were added and the variety of entertainments—including lion dancing, dragon dancing, and boat races—was significantly increased. In many places, visits to the temple of the local deity became part of the day's activity.

Front door in Beijing, China, decorated with banners to ensure good luck for the New Year. (Lightbrush/Dreamstime.com)

The New Year's Day festivities have become the most important and celebrated holiday in both China and the Chinese diaspora. Preparation will begin as much as a week ahead of time. Those who have moved to the city in the last few decades will return to their rural home and extended family. The celebration, which begins on New Year's Eve, may last for a few days or stretch for as much as two weeks. In fact, preparation will have begun during the 12th month of the lunar year with the Laba (Lantern) and New Year Preliminary Festivals (Small New Year), built around the kitchen god. It was also a time for spring cleaning.

On New Year's Eve, the family will gather and seal the door of their home with red paper, to prevent their good fortune from escaping. They will offer food to the deities on their home altar and pay respects to their ancestors. They will rise early on New Year's Day and remove the paper around the door as it is time to welcome the good fortune of the new year into their homes. The welcoming is accompanied by firecrackers.

At this time, one would encounter a variety of decorations carrying various forms of well wishes for the coming year. Written on strips of papers they would be displayed in front of shops and on the doors of homes. The front gates of homes might also have pictures of two guardians and a tiger. This practice is derived from an old Daoist story in which two brothers fought demons and fed them to the tigers, believed to be the enemy of evil spirits and any who would harm the deceased.

New Year's Day is also a time to indulge in food. Enough for everyone for several days will have been prepared ahead of time. One popular practice is to place coins in dumplings (amid the meat dumplings) with being served such a dumpling being considered a sign of coming good luck. Presents may be exchanged.

In both China and Taiwan, the secularization of the holiday and the following of practices of the traditional culture without taking note of the spiritual reasons that lie behind them have become the norm. A most important sign of the transformation is the opening of retail businesses so that holiday goers may spend New Year's Day shopping.

Islamic New Year's Day Islam follows a lunar calendar of 354 days, which means that relative to the Common Era calendar, the new year will begin 11 days earlier each year. The Islamic New Year (Maal Hijra) is celebrated on the first day of Muharram (the first month of the Islamic calendar).

New Year is approached as a time for quiet and sober reflection. There are special prayers for the occasion that will be repeated by those who gather at a mosque. For Sunni Muslims, possibly the most important activity is to repeat the story of the Prophet Muhammad's hijra (the flight from Mecca to Medina in 622), and to reflect upon one's life and moral state.

For Shi'a Muslims, New Year's Day has a completely different meaning. It marks the beginning of the 10-day Remembrance of Muharram, when Shi'a Muslims recall the Battle of Karbala and mourn the death of Imam Husayn ibn Ali, Muhammad's grandson, at the hands of the army of the Sunni Muslim caliph Yazid I. The time of mourning culminates on the 10th day, the holy day called Ashura, the anniversary of the actual day of the battle. During this period, people will gather in mosques for the re-enactment of scenes of the Battle of Karbala. Women will wear black. Groups will begin to construct a replica of Husayn's tomb that will later be carried through the streets in a procession led by a horse, recalling Husayn's horse, Dul Dul.

Baha'i New Year's Day The Baha'i Faith has published its own calendar that operates within its community for scheduling religious events. It is built around 19 months of 19 days each, plus additional days to keep it aligned to the Common Era calendar. The first day of the year on the Baha'i calendar is always March 21, thus tying it to the Spring Equinox, even if in any given year the exact equinox occurs on March 20 or 22. Traditionally, the Persian calendar begins the year on March 21.

The Baha'i New Year's Day is termed Naw-Ruz (a name meaning "new day," taken from the same day in the Persian calendar). It marks the end of the annual 19-day month of Alá, which is a time for fasting, and is celebrated with a banquet feast. It is also one of the nine holy days of the year when work and school are suspended.

Indian New Year's Day In 1957, the Indian government introduced the new Saka calendar, a solar calendar that corresponds in many ways with the Common Era calendar, but begins on the day after the Vernal Equinox, on the first day of the month of Chaitra. That day is usually March 22, but will be March 21 during a leap year. Many Hindus focus upon Brahma, the Creator, as they believe that he began creating the world on this day.

India is a relatively new country, having been created by the British as it brought the many states of the Indian subcontinent into a single colonial regime. The various states retain ancient languages and customs, and in places their own calendars. In most states of modern India, there are local celebrations of New Year's Day and most of these local celebrations fall on the first day of the month of Chaitra. Among the different New Year's days is Puthandu, celebrated as New Year's Day in Tamil Nadu. Puthandu is observed on the first day of the month of Chithirai in the Tamil calendar (April 13 or 14). Celebrating New Year's on April 13 or 14 is also the traditional way in Nepal and the Indian states of Kerala, Orissa, and West Bengal.

Sikh New Year's Day Among the Sikhs, New Year's Day continues an old harvest festival in the Punjab called Baisakhi or Vasakhi, which happens to fall on April 13 or 14 in the Common Era calendar. This day attained a heightened meaning for Sikhs as one of their gurus, Gobind Singh, created the Khalsa, the collective body of all Sikhs, on this day by performing the Amrit (baptism) ceremony in the year 1699. Traditionally, for 48 hours prior to the beginning of the day, a continuous reading of the Guru Granth Sahib is held and the morning of Baisakhi begins with a completion ceremony. The gathered congregation then sings divine hymns and listens to discourses on the importance of Baisakhi. It is a day for those who wish to identify with the Sikh community to take Amrit. Following the activities at the gurdwara, all will engage in a wide variety of sewa (religious work).

Other Religions Most newer religions have adopted the dominant calendar in the place of their origin, and only a few have engaged in any attempt to create a new calendar for the special use of their group. For most new religions, January 1 on the Common Era calendar is their New Year's Day, though they might attempt to give the day new significance or involve members in special activities. Various religious groups will take advantage of the general holiday spirit during the period (including released time from work and suspension of school activities) from Christmas to New Year's Day in many Western countries to hold retreats, seminars, and other events for their members. Every year, a few days before New Year's Day, the Church of Scientology organizes a gathering of church members in a large auditorium in the Los Angeles Area at which the year, especially the accomplishments of the organization, is reviewed and celebrated and goals for the future are projected. This event is recorded and then sent to all the churches worldwide so that it might be shown at gatherings to be held on New Year's Eve.

Among the groups proposing a different New Year's Day are the Wiccans and neo-Pagans. They build their year around eight evenly placed high holidays, the Summer and Winter solstices, the Spring and Fall equinoxes, and four holidays halfway between the equinoxes and solstices. Samhaim (Summer's End) occurs on October 31, halfway between the Fall Equinox and Winter Solstice. It traditionally marks the end of the harvest season, though few modern Wiccans/Pagans engage in agriculture or even reside in rural areas, and hence they have come to emphasize the day as a festival for the deceased. In Samhaim gatherings, those who have died in the previous year are acknowledged and contact with the spirit world attempted. It is believed that the veil between this world and the next is thinnest on the evening of Samhaim.

Many scholars believe that Samhaim was the beginning of the Celtic year, and modern Wiccan/Pagans have picked up that idea, along with the convergence of Samhaim with the Christian celebration of All Saints' Day (November 1) and All Saints' Eve or Halloween (October 31).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Calendars, Religious; Church of Scientology; Fall Equinox; Rosh Hashanah; Sikhism; Spring Equinox; Summer Solstice; Winter Solstice.

References

- Algül, Hüseyin. The Blessed Days and Nights of the Islamic Year. Somerset, NJ: Light, 2005.
- Gregory, Ruth W. Anniversaries and Holidays. Chicago: American Library Association, 1983.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.
- Mukundcharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin, Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpith, 2005.
- Mukundcharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Rites & Rituals (Sentiments, Sacraments & Symbols). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpith, 2007.
- Parise, Frank, ed. The Book of Calendars. New York: Facts on File, 1982.
- Plunket, Emmeline. Calendars and Constellations of the Ancient World. New York: Cosimo Classics, 2005.
- Richards, E. G. Mapping Time: The Calendar and Its History. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.

■ New Zealand

Religion in New Zealand begins with the story of the history of Maori and Pakeha (non-Maori, especially White) immigrants. New Zealand was first settled by Polynesian people called Maori in the period between 500 and 1000 CE. Traditional Maori religion is based upon two realms: the world of physical existence and the world of supernatural beings. The latter is populated by beings including atua (gods), wairua (spirits), tipuna (ancestors), and kehu (ghosts). There are no clear-cut divisions between the two realms; gods or spirits frequently visit the physical world. The majority of Maori rituals aim to influence the gods and spirits so that their actions in the physical world are beneficial. All things are considered sacred, including nature and the land.

Dutch sea captain Abel Tasman (ca. 1603–1659) was the first European to discover New Zealand, in 1642, but it was not until the visit of Captain James Cook (1728–1779) in 1769 that moves were made toward settlement by the British. New Zealand's missionary period began in July 1814, when two tradesmen-missionaries, Thomas Kendall (1778–1832) and William Hall, distributed religious literature to Maori people and held shipboard services. It is claimed that the first Christian service was held in New Zealand on Christmas Day, 1814, by Samuel Marsden (1764–1838). Marsden was an Anglican chaplain from Australia and a representative of the Church Missionary Society. His sermon, delivered in English, was translated into Maori.

Representatives from other Christian churches began to arrive in the small European settlement that was mainly established in the north of the country. The year 1819 saw the arrival of the first ordained Anglican priest, John Butler, and the first Wesleyan missionary, Samuel Leighton. By 1838 2,000 settlers had come, including the first Catholic, Bishop Jean Baptiste Pompallier, in 1838. The first Presbyterian, John McFarlane, preached at Petone in 1840.

Interior of St. Mary of the Angels, a Roman Catholic church in Wellington, New Zealand. (Tupungato/Dreamstime.com)

In 1840 Governor William Hobson (1793–1842) signed the Treaty of Waitangi with Maori chiefs, annexing New Zealand as a British colony. The treaty ceded Maori sovereignty to the British queen in return for guaranteed possession of their property and the rights of British subjects. These events are still controversial, particularly the interpretations of the treaty and the circumstances under which it was signed.

With the advent of organized settlement, a new period of religious colonization began. By 1840 a number of Maori had already professed to be Christian, their conversion being assisted by exposure to Christianity through schools, hospitals, and chapels. The major

Christian denominations continued to grow. The first Anglican bishop, George Augustus Selwyn (1809–1878), was consecrated in 1841, and in 1848 the Presbyterians founded their own settlement at Otago. In 1850 Anglicans established themselves at Canterbury, and the first Baptist church formed in Nelson in 1851. At its first meeting, in 1854, the newly formed House of Representatives asserted the principle of religious equality for all denominations, endorsing the pluralism that was already a feature of the new colony.

Maori responded to the Christian influence by developing indigenous Christian sects that helped maintain their Maori identity. The basic theology of the Maori-Christian syncretism identifies the Hebrew Jehovah with Io, a figure in Polynesian myth. It is debatable whether Io's traditional role is that of a supreme being and thus comparable to the Christian God, but that is clearly the case in syncretistic Maori religious movements. This correlation then allows the genealogies of both traditions to be aligned, providing Maori with an ethnic identity that can be placed within Jewish, Christian, Mormon, and even Rastafarian belief systems. Although Maori have undoubtedly participated in this construction, the origin of these concepts can also be attributed to Samuel Marsden. An emphasis on charismatic prophets and imminent millenarianism is also a common feature of these movements.

From 1830 to 1850 10 religious movements arose based on this theology, and in the 1850s another 9 arose, mainly based on healing. Disputes between Maori and the new colonials regarding sovereignty, land ownership, and land confiscation led to the onset of the Land Wars from 1860 to 1865, a further catalyst for Maori to develop religious movements that suited their circumstances. At least 16 major prophetic movements arose, including the Pai-Marire, more commonly known as Hauhau. A prophetic movement, Hauhau transposed Old Testament prophecies about the Promised Land into the contemporary Maori situation. One of the most important movements arising in this period was Ringatu, a movement that has continued to thrive. Ringatu was founded in 1867 by Te Kooti, who identified himself with Moses and the Maori as Hurai (Jews), the lost tribes of Israel.

While indigenous Christian sects had been growing, so too had the major Christian denominations. By the 1860s Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, Catholic, and Baptist congregations were present in most major cities and towns. The 1877 Education Act established a free, secular, and compulsory national system of education, further evidence of the separation of church and state in New Zealand. By 1900 a number of religious groups, including Congregationalists, Churches of Christ, Quakers, Plymouth Brethren, Seventh Day Adventists, Latter-day Saints, and Lutherans, were also represented, in smaller numbers. A second major indigenous Christian sect was founded by Tahupotiki Wiremu Ratana in 1925. The Ratana Church understands itself as the mouthpiece of Jehovah and also stresses faith healing. Ratana is notable for its role as a major force in Maori politics and continuing growth. It holds a monopoly of the Maori parliamentary seats and is strongly linked with the New Zealand Labour Party.

In the 1960s there was a decline in the number of adherents to mainstream Christianity in New Zealand, with groups also splitting from the major denominations and forming evangelistic sects. The 1970s saw a growth in Pentecostalism and neo-Charismatic groups.

The 1996 census revealed that 60.5 percent (2,189,580) of the country identify as Christian. The three largest Christian denominations are Anglican (17.5 percent), Catholic (13.1 percent), and Presbyterian (12.7 percent). These figures have tended to decline over recent years, with the exception of Catholicism, which has remained fairly static. The next largest religious groups are Christian nondenominational (5.2 percent), Methodist (3.4 percent), Pentecostal and Assemblies of God (1.9 percent), Baptist (1.5 percent), Latter-day Saints (1.1 percent), Ratana (1 percent), Brethren (0.6 percent), and Jehovah's Witnesses (0.5 percent). An increase in the Christian nondenominational groups from 1.3 percent in 1986 to 5.2 percent in 1996 may account for some of the decreases among the major denominations. However, some denominations are growing; the number of Pentecostals has more than quadrupled since 1981, when they accounted for 0.2 percent of the population. The percentage of people not specifying their religion has increased sharply, from 1.8 percent in 1991 to 5.2 percent in 1996, and a similar rise in the number of people professing to no religion has also appeared, from 17 percent in 1986 to 24 percent in 1996.

Maori currently account for 9 percent of the New Zealand population, of which 60 percent are Christian, belonging to a variety of denominations: Anglicans (15.6 percent), Catholics (13.3 percent), Presbyterians (4.5 percent), Mormons (4.4 percent), Methodists (3.4 percent), Pentecostal and Assemblies of God (2.3 percent), and Christian nondenominational (5.3 percent). Of the indigenous churches, Ratana claims 6.7 percent and other indigenous Christian sects another 1.7 percent. Anglican and Catholic churches are becoming more Maori and Polynesian and less English or Irish. Buddhists have grown from 0.2 percent of the population in 1986 to 0.8 percent in 1996; Hindus, from 0.2 percent to 0.7 percent; and Islam, from 0.2 percent to 0.4 percent. The Jewish community, which dates to the arrival in 1831 of Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885), remains small, though a number of Jews have held high and responsible positions in the government and academia. The 3,300 Jews now account for 0.1 percent

NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,690,000	2,998,000	70.0	0.43	3,018,000	3,149,000
Protestants	852,000	792,000	18.5	0.18	739,000	750,000
Anglicans	877,000	640,000	14.9	−0.30	600,000	600,000
Roman Catholics	426,000	430,000	10.0	−1.00	420,000	450,000
Agnostics	84,400	924,000	21.6	3.14	1,230,000	1,428,000
Hindus	3,800	90,800	2.1	2.15	150,000	195,000
Buddhists	1,400	98,600	2.3	8.21	135,000	155,000
Atheists	15,000	54,000	1.3	6.00	75,000	90,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,000	40,000	0.9	2.90	32,000	30,000
Muslims	1,000	37,000	0.9	2.72	60,000	80,000
Chinese folk	7,000	15,000	0.4	2.64	22,000	26,000
Sikhs	300	10,000	0.2	1.23	15,700	20,500
Baha'is	2,600	7,600	0.2	1.95	10,000	15,000
Jews	3,800	4,800	0.1	1.23	7,000	7,500
New religionists	1,000	4,200	0.1	2.58	7,000	10,000
Spiritists	1,000	1,200	0.0	1.04	2,000	2,500
Total population	2,820,000	4,285,000	100.0	1.23	4,764,000	5,209,000

of the population. Adherents to Spiritualism and New Age religious movements add another 0.3 percent.

To a large degree the census figures reflect the effect of regional migrations. For example, the lack of immigrants from continental Europe has resulted in comparatively low numbers of Lutherans, while the recent increase in the number of Buddhists is largely due to Asian immigration, not conversion. Religious practice in New Zealand can be characterized as the adoption of nominal religious identity; census statistics are much higher than actual church membership and attendance, which can be attributed to only 12 to 15 percent of self-identified Catholics and Presbyterians, for example. It can almost be argued that civil religious practices such as ANZAC day or rugby are more important to contemporary New Zealanders than commitment to institutional religion.

Michelle Baker

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Assemblies of God; Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand; Baptist Union of New Zealand; Church Missionary Society; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Jehovah's Witnesses; Maori Religion; Methodist Church of New Zealand; New Age Movement; Pentecostalism; Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand; Selwyn, George Augustus; Spiritualism.

References

Colless, Brian, and Peter Donovan, eds. Religion in New Zealand Society. 2nd ed. Palmerston North, NZ: Dunmore, 1985.

Davidson, Allan K. Christianity in Aotearoa: A History of Church and Society in New Zealand. 2nd ed. Wellington, NZ: Education for Ministry, 1997.

Donovan, Peter, ed. Religions of New Zealanders. Palmerston North, NZ: Dunmore Press, 1990.

Ellwood, Robert S. Islands of the Dawn: The Story of Alternative Spirituality in New Zealand. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1993.

Hill, Michael, and Wiebe Zwaga. "Religion in New Zealand: Change and Comparison." In The Changing Face of Religion, edited by James A. Beckford and Thomas Luckmann, 64–87. London: Sage Publications, 1989.

Stenhouse, John, and Jane Thomson. Building God's Own Country: Historical Essays on Religion in New Zealand. Dunedin, NZ: University of Otago Press, 2005.

Newar Buddhism

The Newar society of the Kathmandu Valley in Nepal has a good claim to being the oldest continuous local tradition of Buddhism. Although the Buddhism of modern Newars is a diverse and evolving tradition, the term “Newar Buddhism” is used to refer to a distinct form of Vajrayana Buddhism. Its only professional religious are married priests of the Vajracarya/Sakya caste, who live in monastic courtyards carefully organized into public Mahayana and secret Vajrayana spaces. They draw their clients from mercantile, artisanal, and agricultural castes. They are unique among modern Buddhists in that their canonical language is Sanskrit, a trait that marks them as the last surviving descendants of the Indian Buddhist tradition. Together with Hindu Newars they draw on a common Indic inventory of gods and rituals. For example, all Newars worship Ganesha before any significant undertaking, worship the Eight Mother Goddesses, and take part in fasting vows (Sanskrit: vratas) according to the luni-solar calendar.

Scholars believe that Buddhism took root in Nepal at the time of Ashoka (d. 232 or 238 BCE). The great caitya (stupa or religious shrine) of Svayambhu, one of two foci of Newar Buddhist practice, may date from this time. The other great Newar site, the Lokeshvara at Bungamati, was well established as part of the pan-Asian Amoghapasa cult by the eighth century, and in this period Newar Vajrayana attained its early coherence. Nepalese Vajrayana retained its distinct local identity even as it helped to form high Pala Vajrayana of India, which returned to Nepal as refugees were driven from the great Indian Buddhist universities with their destruction around 1200.

From the 13th century on, Newar Vajrayana settled into its later form, emphasizing Chakrasamvara and the Mother Tantras but still preserving the Bodhisattva Amoghapasa Lokeshvara and the Buddha Vairocana as key figures. Nepal had long been a training ground for Tibetan Buddhists, but the Newar sangha (order) now turned inward, preserving Indic texts and forms while retaining strong commercial contacts with Tibet. By 1450 the extinction of Indian Buddhism led to a crisis in Newar Buddhism, which reinvented itself as an independent tradition and produced the last great Sanskrit Buddhist sutras (texts). These show a complex mix of Mahayana and Vajrayana ritual, thought, and iconography.

After 1768, with the advent of the modern Nepalese state, Newar Buddhism entered a long phase of decline. There was a period of intense creativity in the early 1800s, but the anti-Buddhist ideology of the Gorkha state pushed middle-class Buddhists to adopt Hindu names and affiliations.

In the 20th century, the opening of Nepal fostered a more complex and indeterminate practice among Newar Buddhists. As a result of the emergence of Newar Theravada in the 1930s, the influx of Tibetan refugees after 1950, and the development of Kathmandu as a site on the “Hippy Trail,” Newar Buddhists found their homeland converted into a center of modern eclectic Buddhism. Even though traditional high Newar Vajrayana is still taught and practiced by Vajracarya priests, its transmission is closed and secret. However, middle-class Newar Buddhists may go to Theravada monasteries for lifecycle rituals, some Vajracaryas and Sakyas have links with charismatic Tibetan lamas, and Japanese Buddhist pilgrims now visit the great Newar monasteries.

Will Tuladhar-Douglas

See also: Ashoka; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Gellner, David N. Monk, Householder, and Tantric Priest: Newar Buddhism and Its Hierarchy of Ritual. London: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Lewis, Todd T. Popular Buddhist Texts from Nepal: Narratives and Rituals of Newar Buddhism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Locke, John K., S.J. Karunamaya. Kathmandu: Tribhuvan University, 1980.
- von Rospatt, Alexander. “On the Conception of Stupa in Vajrayana Buddhism: The Example of the Svayambhucaitya of Kathmandu.” Journal of the Nepal Research Centre 11 (1999): 121–147.

Ngunzist Churches (Congo)

At the same time that the Kimbanguist Church was developing in the 1920s, an alternative Kimbanguist movement known as Ngunzism (from the Kikongo word ngunza, or prophet) began to appear. This movement, like some of the Harrist movements in West Africa, went much further than the prophet Simon Kimbangu (ca. 1887–1951) had intended: seeing Kimbangu as a political figure, a black messiah who would dramatically return from prison and destroy the colonialists with a holy war. Some said he would restore the ancient Kongo Empire. Many legends about miracles surrounding Kimbangu after his arrest were propagated. Borrowing elements from the Salvation Army, which had arrived in the Congo in 1934, several Ngunzist groups were formed, including the independent Congolese Salvation Army.

André Matswa founded the Amical Balali movement for the liberation of the French Congo (Brazzaville). His movement was at first a movement for political liberation. Matswa was imprisoned in 1930, where he remained until his death in 1942. He, like Kimbangu before him, was transformed by his followers into a religious figure—a savior and messiah who would come back to free his people from oppression and restore the old Kongo Empire.

In 1939 Simon-Pierre Mpadi, who trained as a Salvation Army officer, founded the Mission of the Blacks, the best-known of the Ngunzi movements. The colonial authorities saw all these groups as belonging to one Kimbanguist movement and they sought to destroy them, even though the Kimbanguists and Kimbangu himself had repudiated the views of Ngunzism. Mpadi's even more powerful movement was known as Mpadism, or the Khaki movement, after the khaki uniforms worn by his followers. Mpadi became the second and “greater” prophet of this Congolese church, and he built on the traditions surrounding Kimbangu and Matswa. He tried to unite various Ngunzist groups and succeeded in bringing Amicalism into his movement after Matswa's death. Mpadi himself was arrested in 1949 and imprisoned in the same prison as Kimbangu, and during that time his followers formed one of the most influential churches in the Congo.

A decree on Christmas Eve 1959 by the colonial administration gave recognition to the existence of religious “sects.” On his release from prison in 1960, when a general amnesty was given to African prophets in preparation for independence, Mpadi refused to join the Kimbanguists when invited to do so. He reorganized his Mission of the Blacks as the Church of the Blacks and Africa. He declared that Kimbangu had appointed him head of the Kimbanguist Church. In contrast to the Kimbanguists, Mpadi's church made polygyny compulsory and encouraged dancing, drumming, and displays of ecstasy. Mpadi was a messiah-like figure who wore a red gown with a crown and a scepter and claimed to have been resurrected 14 times.

Relationships between the prophetic churches and the government in the Congo (Kinshasa) were strained. In 1971 President Mobutu Sese Seko (1930–1997) forced the consolidation of most of the churches in the country by declaring an approved list of only six churches, one of which was the Kimbanguist Church. Even harsher laws were imposed in 1979, severely curtailing the activities of any unregistered religious groups. Several significant African Initiated Churches had to seek and obtain registration by affiliating with the Iglise du Christ au Congo (Church of Christ in the Congo), the recognized Protestant ecumenical council.

The Ngunzist movement differs from the Kimbanguist Church in several ways. Unlike the latter, Ngunzism is a heterogeneous movement located largely in the western Congo Basin, consisting mostly of small, unorganized groups loyal to a local prophet. Christian hymns, prayers, and the Bible are of secondary importance, and the main emphasis is on “organized quaking” and the beating of drums, accompanied by collective ecstasy, shrieking, and trance, which are believed to manifest possession by the Holy Spirit. Although many of these ecstatic manifestations were found in the ministry of Kimbangu, the Kimbanguists later discouraged any excessive emotionalism. Traditional African rituals and customs, including polygyny, are usually promoted in the Ngunzist movement.

Different religious groups in the region begin as movements of cultural and religious renaissance, others as political and anti-white protest movements, but most have made use of the mystique associated with the name of one of Africa's greatest prophets, Simon Kimbangu.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Church of Christ in the Congo; Kimbanguist Church; Native Baptist Church.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Andersson, Efraim. Messianic Popular Movements in the Lower Congo. Uppsala: Studia Ethnographica Upsaliensia, No. 16, 1958.
- MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983.
- Wamba-dia-Wamba, Ernest. "Bundu dia Kongo: A Congolese Fundamentalist Religious Movement." In East African Expressions of Christianity, edited by Thomas Spear and Isaria N. Kimambo, 213–228. Oxford: James Currey, 1999.

Nicaea

Nicaea, now known as Yznik, was an important Christian center from the fourth to the 11th centuries. It was located on the Sea of Marmara some 50 miles east of Constantinople. It became the site of two of the seven Ecumenical Councils at which the early church established orthodox doctrine. The most ubiquitous statement of Christian faith is named the Nicene Creed for the city and the council that promulgated it.

Originally founded in 310 BCE, Nicaea became an important Roman port city and an early Christian center in the region. With the emergence of the emperor Constantine (ca. 272–337) and his favoring of Christianity, the city's bishop and his headquarters at St. Sophia Cathedral quickly rose in status, all the more so after the church was chosen as the seat of the first Ecumenical Council in 325. This council, which gathered just two years after persecution against the church was formally ended, was called to consider the views of the priest Arius (d. 336). Attempting to understand in what sense Christ could be considered God and hence the object of worship, Arius proposed that since Christians believed that God the Father begat the Son, the Son of God must have had a beginning, that there was a time when he was not, but that his substance was like nothing in the rest of creation. The Council of Nicaea condemned the beliefs of Arius and wrote the first version of the now famous Nicene Creed proclaiming that the Son was of one substance with the Father.

A second all-church council was called in 736 and held its substantive sessions in 737. It dealt with the iconoclastic controversy, specifically with the issue of the use of iconic representations of Jesus and other holy personages. It ruled in favor of the icons, suggesting that representational art was quite in harmony with the history of the spread of the gospel. Such art provided confirmation that the God becoming man was real and not just imaginary.

Nicaea remained a Christian city until it fell to the Turkish Muslim Seljuk dynasty in 1078. The Ottomans took control in 1331. In subsequent years the Christian presence dwindled and today St. Sophia lies in ruins. As the Muslim city of Yznik, the city became noted for the quality ceramics it produced. Presently, Nicaea is a modest town of some 34,000 residents.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Arius; Athanasius; Constantine the Great; Istanbul.

References

- Bellitto, Christopher M. The General Councils: A History of the Twenty-one General Councils from Nicaea to Vatican II. New York: Paulist Press, 2002.
- Davis, Leo Donald. The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325–787): Their History and Theology. Wilmington, DE: M. Glazier, 1987.
- Faroqhi, Suraiya N. The Cambridge History of Turkey. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Hughes, Philip. The Church in Crisis: A History of the General Councils 325–1870. Garden City, NY: Hanover House, 1961.
- Rubenstein, Richard E. When Jesus Became God: The Struggle to Define Christianity during the Last Days of Rome. Orlando, FL: Harvest Books, 2000.

Taylor, Jane. Imperial Istanbul: A Traveller's Guide: Includes Iznik, Bursa and Edirne. London: Tauris Parke Paperbacks, 2007.

■ Nicaragua

The Republic of Nicaragua, the largest country in Central America, is located between Honduras and Costa Rica and bordered by the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean. The nation has an area of 49,998 square miles, slightly smaller than New York State, and had a population of 5.6 million in 2006. Its major languages (according to the 1995 census) are Spanish, 97.5 percent; Miskito, 1.7 percent; and other, 0.8 percent. English Creole (Afro-Caribbean) and Amerindian languages are mainly spoken on the Caribbean coast, also known as the Miskito Coast.

The Miskito Coast (La Mosquitia) of Nicaragua is a wide coastal lowland along the Caribbean Sea that stretches from Honduras to Costa Rica, which contains mangrove swamps, lagoons, rivers, savannas, and tropical rain forests. It has a population of about 118,000 inhabitants, consisting of 57 percent Miskito (Afro-Amerindian); 22 percent Creoles (Afro-Caribbean); 15 percent mestizo (European and Amerindian); 4 percent Sumo (Amerindian); 1 percent Garifuna (or Black Carib, Afro-Amerindian); 0.5 percent Chinese; and 0.5 percent Rama (Amerindian). The Miskito Coast's principal cities are Bluefields in the south and Puerto Cabezas in the north.

The Nicaraguan Constitution of 1987 provides for freedom of religion and the government generally respects this right in practice. Although there is no official state religion, because of its historical presence in the country since colonial times, the Roman Catholic Church has often enjoyed a close relationship with the government and has wielded significant political influence, especially under Conservative administrations.

The national census of 2005 reported religious affiliation in Nicaragua as follows: Roman Catholic, 58.6 percent (down from 72.9 percent in 1995); Protestant, 23.2 percent (up from 12.2 percent in 1995); other religions (including marginal Christian groups), 2.5 percent (up from 2.0 percent in 1995); and none/no response, 15.7 percent (up from 8.5 percent in 1995).

In 1950, Roman Catholic adherents were 95.8 percent and Protestant adherents were 4.1 percent of the national population, which shows a significant shift in religious affiliation that is characteristic of the Central American region: the Catholic population has declined at the expense of rapid and widespread Protestant church growth. Also, secularization has taken its toll on the Nicaraguan population, with about 16 percent now claiming no religious affiliation.

Nicaraguans have endured humid climate, perpetual poverty and underdevelopment, natural disasters (hurricanes, floods, earthquakes, and volcanic eruptions), civil wars and foreign military intervention, repressive dictatorships, and corrupt democratic governments. These conditions motivated many people to abandon their homeland during the 1970s and 1980s and seek refuge elsewhere. Although this mass exodus of Nicaraguan refugees caused families to be separated, it has also generated millions of dollars of support from those living abroad who send remittances to help their relatives in Nicaragua.

Turmoil continues to plague the nation today as political factions wage unending verbal warfare against their opponents, while seeking to gain advantage in the next elections. Historically, since 1821, the nation's various Conservative and Liberal political parties have vied for power and control of the executive, legislative, judicial, and military branches of government. However, today, the nation's two major political parties are (1) the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), led by President Daniel Ortega Saavedra (r. 1985–1990, 2000–present)—also a member of the ruling junta (1979–1984); and (2) the Constitutionalist Liberal Party (PLC), led by former President Arnoldo Alemán Lacayo (r. 1997–2002) who inherited the legacy of the Liberal Somoza dynasty.

During the period 1821 to 1909, Nicaragua experienced continued civil strife, which encouraged the development of a variety of private armies controlled by the political and commercial interests of Conservatives and Liberals. In 1893, Liberal President José Santos Zelaya (r. 1893–1909) came to power and enacted a series of progressive reforms, which included improving public education, building railroads, establishing steamship lines, and enacting constitutional reforms that provided for equal rights, property guarantees, habeas corpus, compulsory vote, compulsory education, the protection of arts and industry, minority representation, and the separation of state powers. However, in late 1909, due to ongoing conflicts with domestic and foreign powers (both political and commercial), President Zelaya resigned as president, turned over the government to José Madriz Rodríguez (who governed from December 1909 to August 1910), and fled into exile.

The Catholic Church of Guadalupe in Granada, Nicaragua, was built in 1626 by Fray Benito Baltodano. (Holger Mette/Dreamstime.com)

The chaotic political situation in Nicaragua prompted U.S. President William Howard Taft (r. 1909–1913), a Republican, to send the U.S. Marines to occupy the country (1912–1933) in order to provide political stability and safeguard U.S. economic and political interests. Between 1910 and 1926, the Conservative Party ruled the country under a series of 10 presidents, amid continued rivalry and civil conflict between Conservative and Liberal factions.

Liberal President Juan Bautista Sacasa (r. 1933–1936) took office in January 1933, and named General Anastasio Somoza García (1896–1956), nicknamed “Tacho,” as commander of the National Guard, at the insistence of the U.S. ambassador. In February 1934, Somoza assassinated Augusto César Sandino, who had led a guerrilla rebellion between 1926 and 1933, and several of his aides. Two years later, Somoza seized power in a coup d'état and established a family dynasty that ruled Nicaragua for more than 40 years (1936–1979).

General Somoza García was the de facto dictator of Nicaragua from 1936 until his assassination in 1956. His eldest son, Luis Somoza Debayle (1922–1967), succeeded his father as president (r. 1956–1967). In May 1967, Luis's brother Anastasio Somoza Debayle (1925–1980, nicknamed "Tachito") was elected president (r. 1967–1972, 1974–1979). While Luis Somoza had ruled more gently than his father, Tachito was intolerant of opposition of any sort; civil liberties were restricted and corruption was widespread. Because he was prohibited legally from immediate presidential re-election, Tachito worked out a deal that allowed him to run for re-election in 1974: he was replaced as president in 1972 by a three-man junta consisting of two Liberals and one Conservative, while he retained control of the National Guard and was the de facto ruler of the country.

On December 23, 1972, a magnitude 6.2 earthquake and several large aftershocks hit the nation's capital, virtually destroying the city: about 80 percent of Managua's commercial buildings were destroyed, an estimated 5,000 to 6,000 of the city's 400,000 residents were killed, and 20,000 were injured. Two-thirds of Managua's residents were displaced and faced starvation and disease due to infrastructural damages and crippled emergency services. General Somoza immediately declared martial law and appointed himself as head of the National Emergency Committee. Then he and his inner circle proceeded to embezzle foreign aid monies and resell supplies sent for earthquake relief and rebuilding efforts. Somoza's greed and corruption began to alienate a large portion of the country's influentials, including a significant sector of the Catholic clergy who began to speak out against the dictatorship. One of his fiercest critics was leftist Jesuit priest Ernesto Cardenal, who was an advocate of Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology.

As criticism mounted, support for the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) was growing inside and outside the country. During the early 1970s, a coalition of leftist guerrilla groups under the FSLN launched armed revolutionary activities in the northeastern mountain region of Nicaragua, with limited financial and logistical support from Cuba and the Soviet Union. The Sandinista insurgency attracted the support of groups throughout the country, including progressive religious leaders and their parishioners, among both Catholics and Protestants. In 1975, President Somoza sent National Guard units to conduct a fierce military campaign against the FSLN and its supporters throughout the country. Opposition to the despotic Somoza government now included prominent national leaders, such as newspaper publisher and editor Pedro Joaquín Chamorro Cardenal (1924–1978) of Nicaragua's leading daily, La Prensa, who was assassinated, allegedly under orders from Somoza, in 1978.

After the Somoza dictatorship was finally overthrown by the Sandinistas in 1979, FSLN commander Daniel Ortega became a member of the five-person Junta of National Reconciliation. The National Guard, without its top commanders, virtually disintegrated following the Sandinista victory, and a new professional army had to be built from scratch from the various guerrilla combat units. The new Sandinista government, led by Daniel Ortega, inherited an underdeveloped nation that was riddled with corruption and bureaucratic mismanagement and handicapped by poverty, infrastructural destruction, and economic ruin. The nation had more than $1.5 billion in debts and only about $3.5 million in international reserves. Human and material losses due to the civil war were staggering. An estimated 30,000 to 50,000 Nicaraguans had been killed; about 100,000 were injured; an estimated 150,000 were homeless; at least 150,000 had fled to neighboring Costa Rica or Honduras; and tens of thousands more had become internal refugees. Large-scale international efforts provided emergency relief, prevented starvation, and averted immediate economic collapse, but the task of national economic recovery and reconstruction was overwhelming. Also, the eyes of the world were on Nicaragua to see what would develop under revolutionary leadership, which included both Marxist and non-Marxist political components.

In 1981, U.S. President Ronald Reagan condemned the FSLN and authorized the CIA to begin financing, arming, and training rebels, some of whom were former National Guard officers, as anti-Sandinista guerrillas, who became known collectively as the Contras (a nickname for contra-revolutionaries, which President Reagan called “freedom fighters”). Between 1980 and 1989, more than 30,000 Nicaraguans died in the Contra conflict with the Sandinista government.

NICARAGUA

In November 1984, in the midst of the Contra war, Ortega allowed national elections; he won the presidency with 63 percent of the vote and took office in January 1985. According to the vast majority of independent observers, the 1984 elections were perhaps the freest and fairest in Nicaraguan history. The seven political parties that participated in the elections represented a broad spectrum of political ideologies.

However, in the 1990 presidential elections, Ortega lost to Violeta Barrios de Chamorro, his former colleague in the Junta of National Reconciliation, which finally brought an end to the illegal U.S.-backed Contra war. Chamorro was supported by a 14-party anti-Sandinista alliance known as the National Opposition Union (UNO), whose members ranged from Conservatives and Liberals to Marxists.

In Ortega's concession speech the day after the election, he vowed to keep "ruling from below," a reference to the power that the FSLN still wielded among various social sectors. Ortega ran for election again in October 1996 and November 2001 but lost on both occasions to Arnaldo Alemán Lacayo of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party (PLC) and to Alemán's former vice president Enrique Bolaños, respectively, both of whom had received substantial financial support from the U.S. government. In these elections, a key issue was the allegation of corruption by the ruling party.

In addition to its political divisions, Nicaragua has long been a nation divided by its geography and ethnicity. A central mountain range divides the country from north to south, and there are few roads on the broad Caribbean coastal plain—an area making up more than half of the national territory that is dissected by hundreds of rivers and streams. Historically, the Caribbean coast and the central mountain region have been thinly populated, whereas the Pacific coastal region has been more heavily populated, originally by Amerindian peoples and later by Spanish settlers and their descendants.

Prior to Spanish colonization, the Caribbean coast was populated by the Miskito, Sumo, and Rama peoples of Macro-Chibchan origin (the predominant group in Colombia) who lived in scattered fishing villages on the coast and along the inland waterways, whereas the Pacific coast was largely home to ethnolinguistic groups that migrated south along the Pacific coast from present-day Mexico as early as 1000 BCE: Chontales, Chorotegas (Dirianes and Nagrandanos), and Nicaraos (Nahua-Náhuatl-Pipil speakers of Uto-Aztecan origins).

Today, descendants of the latter ethnic groups live in the departments of Matagalpa (Misumalpan), León (Subtiaba), and Masaya (Monimbó), although they no longer speak their mother tongues. However, the Amerindian groups on the Caribbean coast still speak their original languages and many are bilingual in English and/or Spanish. Overall, about 194,000 Amerindian peoples were reported to exist in 1990, the majority of whom were Roman Catholics on the Pacific coast, whereas the majority of the Miskitos, Sumos, and Ramas on the Caribbean coast are Protestant (mainly adherents of the Moravian Church).

Spanish Colonial Period and Development of the Roman Catholic Church

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) discovered the territory of Nicaragua during his fourth voyage to the New World in 1502, when he sailed along the Caribbean coast and explored the area of Cabo Gracias a Dios at the mouth of the Coco River. It was not until 1522, however, that a formal military expedition, under Gil González Dávila, led to the first Spanish conquest of Nicaraguan territory.

In 1523, the governor of Panama, Pedro Arias Dávila (known as Pedrarias), appointed Francisco Hernández de Córdoba (d. 1517) to resume the conquest of Nicaragua, and he and his small army succeeded in establishing the first permanent Spanish settlements in Nicaragua in 1524: Santiago de los Caballeros de León and Granada, which later became the centers of colonial Nicaragua.

Although the Spanish conquerors were successful on the Pacific coast, their efforts were unfruitful on the Caribbean coast, which was dominated by the Miskito people and smaller Amerindian groups. Later, the British Empire established an alliance with the Miskitos that lasted for several hundred years. In 1894, Nicaraguan President José Santos Zelaya took control of the Miskito coast by military force, and the British, not wishing to go to war for a territory of little value to the British Empire, recognized Nicaraguan sovereignty over the region.

The first Roman Catholic Church was established in Granada in 1524 by Franciscans, but most missionary work during the colonial period was done by the Jesuits. The Diocese of León was erected in 1531, which included all the territory of Nicaragua and present-day Costa Rica, with diocesan priest Diego Alvarez de Osorio (1485–1536) as its first bishop. His successor as bishop was Padre Francisco de Mendavia (1537–1540), Order of Saint Jerome, who previously served as prior of a monastery in Victoria de Salamanca, Spain. Mendavia's successor was Dominican Friar Antonio de Valdivieso (1544–1549). During the 16th century, 10 bishops served the Diocese of León. In 1850, the Diocese of Costa Rica was separated from the Diocese of León. A Concordat between the Vatican and the Republic of Nicaragua was established in 1861.

In 1894 and following, the government of President José Santos Zelaya (r. 1893–1909) passed anti-Catholic legislation and other progressive reforms that provoked a protest from Bishop Francisco Ulloa y Larrios (1819–1902), which resulted in the bishop being banished to Panama. Upon his death in 1902, he was succeeded by Bishop Simeone Pereira (1863–1921). Although the Catholic Church had been the official state religion since the first Constitution of 1826, under Zelaya's administration church and state were separated and freedom of religion was constitutionally guaranteed to all forms of religious worship.

Traditionally, the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church in Nicaragua generally supported the Somoza family, which ruled from 1936 to 1979 under the umbrella of the Nationalist Liberal Party, and other members of the ruling oligarchy, although the bishops were partial to the various Conservative factions. However, beginning in the 1960s, many Catholic priests began to actively oppose the despotic Somoza regime, especially priests from the United States and Spain who became more dedicated to the Sandinista cause than were many Nicaraguan priests.

Diverse tensions arose within the Nicaraguan Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church's post-Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for "a preferential option for the poor" through social and political action aimed at transforming Nicaraguan society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the Somoza dictatorship and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the "baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues"), rather than by political and social activism.

Several radical Catholic priests (advocates of Liberation Theology) who supported the Sandinista uprising against the Somoza dictatorship were named to key posts in the new Sandinista government, following its July 1979 victory. Progressive and radical social and political advocacy among Catholics in Nicaragua was first apparent among priests, often Jesuits, who taught in private Catholic high schools and universities. By the mid-1970s, many of their former students, often children of wealthy families, had joined the Sandinista rebellion. And, as the fight against the Somoza regime intensified, several priests joined Sandinista guerrilla units in the field, while others helped organize people in poor neighborhoods via "church base communities" (called CEBs, comunidades eclesiales de base) in preparation for the "popular" insurrection. Many Catholic parishes played an indirect role in the Sandinista uprising by stockpiling food and medicine, giving first aid courses, or providing direct assistance to Sandinista guerrillas (including hiding combatants in their homes and churches).

The Sandinistas overthrew the Somoza regime with the help of a large segment of the Catholic Church, including the tacit approval of five out of seven bishops. However, following the Sandinista victory in July 1979, strains developed between the Catholic hierarchy and the Sandinista government. Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo of Managua, who opposed the Somoza regime but refrained from endorsing the Sandinista rebellion, became increasingly critical of the new leftist government while many Catholics in the “popular church” still supported it.

One of the particularly bothersome issues for the Catholic bishops of Nicaragua was the fact that five Catholic priests held high-level administrative positions in the Sandinista government. On May 13, 1980, the bishops asked for the resignation of the priests who worked in government positions. Pope John Paul II tried to persuade the rebellious priests to step down from their government posts as a condition of his visit to Nicaragua in March 1983. But he received only a compromise whereby the priests agreed to steer clear of the pontiff during his activities. Among the pope’s reported aims was to strengthen Catholic unity in the country in the wake of the Sandinista victory, due to concerns about the existing polarization between Somoza loyalists and Sandinista supporters.

In December 1984, the Sandinistas suffered some embarrassment due to pressure from the Vatican over the issue of priests serving in government posts. After five years of warnings, the Society of Jesus expelled priest Fernando Cardenal Martínez when he refused to resign as minister of education. Finally, in May 1985, the Vatican issued the suspension order to the three rebellious priests: Foreign Minister Miguel d’Escoto, Culture Minister Ernesto Cardenal, and Minister of Social Welfare/OAS Ambassador Edgard Parrales.

In 2000, the Nicaraguan Catholic Church administered 8 dioceses (including the Vicariate of Bluefields) with 243 parishes, served by 247 diocesan priests and 127 religious priests (total of 374), of which 75 percent were native-born and 25 percent were foreign-born. Also, there were 196 religious brothers and 977 religious sisters (nuns) in the country. The current archbishop of Managua, Monsignor Leopoldo José Brenes Solórzano, was appointed in 2005 as the successor to Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo (b. 1926, archbishop from 1970 to 2005) who retired in 2005. In many of the rural areas of the Nicaraguan interior, the presence of the Catholic Church has been weak or nonexistent due to a lack of clergy, especially in the North-Central Region and South Atlantic Autonomous Region.

The Catholic Cathedral of Managua, built in 1920, survived a 1931 earthquake but was severely damaged by the massive 1972 earthquake and was condemned. This eventually led to the construction of a new cathedral, called Catedral Metropolitana de la Purísima Concepción (Metropolitan Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception), inaugurated in 1993. Each town and city has annual celebrations (fiestas patronales) for its patron saints, and special religious celebrations are held all over the country during Holy Week that ends on Easter Sunday.

The Protestant Movement Protestant missionary activity in eastern Nicaragua can be traced to Anglican efforts in the 1760s, although an Anglican influence was present as early as the 1620s among the scattered British trading settlements and logging camps on the Caribbean coast, known as the Miskito Shore. The Wesleyan (British) Methodists made a weak and unsuccessful attempt to establish themselves in the port of Bluefields in the 1830s, mainly among the Creoles (English-speaking Afro-Americans from the British West Indies). However, serious efforts to evangelize the Creoles and Amerindians in eastern Nicaragua did not begin until the arrival of the German United Brethren (Moravian Church) in the port of Bluefields in 1847. From this base of operations, the Moravians began evangelizing the various ethnolinguistic groups on the Miskito Shore: Amerindians (Miskitos, Sumos and Ramas), Garifunas (or Black Caribs, an Afro-Caribbean people deported by the British from the Island of St. Vincent in the Caribbean to the Bay Islands of Honduras in 1789; the Garifuna community in Nicaragua is located at Sandy Bay, north of Bluefields), and Creoles (English-speaking West Indians) who were concentrated in the port settlements. The Jamaican Baptists were active in the Corn Islands of Nicaragua during the 1850s, and the Anglicans (now a diocese in the Episcopal Church) renewed their efforts on the Miskito Shore during the 1880s.

Prior to 1900, few Protestant attempts had been made among the Spanish-speaking population of western Nicaragua, either in the Pacific coastal region or in the central highlands. However, several successful missionary efforts had begun to produce fruit among the Hispanicized population (descendants of the original Amerindian peoples: Matagalpa, Subtiaba, and Monimbó tribes) by 1940. The independent Central American Mission began its labors in 1900, independent Pentecostals in 1911, the American Baptists (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) in 1917, and the Assemblies of God in 1936. The Seventh-day Adventist Church, which initiated mission work on the Caribbean coast among the Creoles in 1904, did not begin to expand their efforts to western Nicaragua until the 1940s.

Protestant church growth was slow in Nicaragua prior to the mid-1960s. In 1937, only 7 Protestant mission agencies had begun work on either coast; however, by 1965, 26 Protestant denominations were active in Nicaragua and, by 1978, 46 new denominations had arrived. In 1980, there were at least 72 Protestant denominations in Nicaragua with about 1,500 organized congregations that were served by more than 300 ordained national pastors, 760 lay workers, and 83 foreign missionaries (up from 41 missionaries in 1973).

In 1936, 75 percent of Protestant church members were Amerindians and Creoles on the Caribbean coast, and only 25 percent were Hispanics on the Pacific coast. In 1980, the situation was reversed: 70 percent of the Protestant membership lived on the Pacific coast (including the central mountain region) and only 30 percent lived on the Caribbean coast, which represented a drastic shift in the strength of Protestantism in Nicaragua during the previous 45 years.

Under the Somoza dynasty (1936–1979), Protestant denominations benefited from the principle of separation of church and state, with the Constitution guaranteeing religious freedom to all Nicaraguan citizens and to foreign residents. Consequently, most Protestant groups grew unhindered, engaging in evangelistic activities and planting churches at will, supported by constitutional law and the power of the civil authorities. Protestants, in general, felt that the civil authorities were “ordained of God” for the common good and could be counted on for protection in times of crises.

As a rule, Protestants abstained from assuming a critical stance toward the Somoza family dynasty, even though the National Guard increasingly used repression to stop political dissent, often with brutal and bloody consequences for political opponents or even those suspected of supporting the Sandinista insurgency during the 1960s and 1970s. For many Protestants, the revolutionary movement, led by the FSLN against the corrupt Somoza dictatorship, created a climate of fear, confusion, and uncertainty, for both the present and the future. Nevertheless, some Protestants, especially young people, openly embraced the Sandinista cause; others adopted a more cautious “wait-and-see” attitude in an attempt to remain politically neutral; and some even openly supported the Somoza government in submissive resignation to the belief that “the powers that be are ordained of God.”

Prior to the 1960s, most cooperative efforts among Protestants were fostered by foreign mission agencies, rather than by national church organizations, which were just beginning to develop as autonomous bodies. However, during the 1960s, national evangelical leaders and their respective ecclesiastical organizations played a more significant role in cooperative efforts than did the foreign missionaries.

In 1966, preoccupations over church-state issues and basic religious liberties compelled nine of the larger Protestant denominations to form the National Evangelical Council of Churches in an effort to counteract intensified Roman Catholic activities against evangelicals. In the early 1960s, the Catholic Church sponsored the “Santa Misión” program, which was probably a reaction to growing evangelical visibility and credibility among nominal Catholics during the 1950s and 1960s, especially in Managua. There, evangelicals had conducted several mass evangelistic crusades in public places, had marched down city streets by the thousands carrying banners with Bible verses and evangelical slogans, had begun dozens of radio programs and even founded an evangelical radio station, along with massive campaigns for Bible distribution, house-to-house visitation, prayer cells and Bible studies, and literacy efforts. The Catholic program to counteract activities by evangelicals was a logical reaction, especially when Nicaragua entered the modern period of mass communications. However, the National Evangelical Council was largely ineffective due to internal strife and the nonparticipation of influential evangelical leaders and their churches, such as those of the Baptist Convention.

Nevertheless, following the disastrous Managua earthquake in 1972, some 40 Protestant denominations and service agencies joined forces to organize the Evangelical Committee for Relief and Development (CEPAD). Later, the General Assembly of CEPAD formed a committee of pastors to promote interdenominational activities through a socio-pastoral action department. This committee, called RIPEN (Interdenominational Representatives of Evangelical Pastors in Nicaragua), organized regional pastoral committees in many parts of the country. CEPAD held training seminars, workshops and inspirational retreats and conferences, at both the national and regional levels, during the 1970s.

In the new environment following the overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship in 1979, there were lingering doubts among many evangelicals about the direction the Sandinista government was headed and about the enthusiastic support given by CEPAD and RIPEN to the Junta of National Reconciliation. Consequently, a group of about 50 evangelical pastors from a dozen or so small independent churches, but also from a few of the larger denominations, decided to form a new association of pastors in Managua during February 1980. This organization was called the National Council of Evangelical Pastors of Nicaragua (CNPEN), composed of individual pastors and not associations of churches (denominations) like CEPAD.

A national study of the Protestant movement in 1979, conducted by INDEF-CEPAD as part of the Central American Socio-Religious Studies Project (PROCADES), reported a total of 1,531 Protestant congregations (churches and missions) with 78,387 baptized members among 72 church associations (denominations and independent church bodies). It also revealed that the Pacific Region of the country, with 63.5 percent of the population, contained 52.3 percent of the Protestant congregations; the North-Central Region, with 29.4 percent of the population, contained 23.3 percent of the Protestant congregations; and the Atlantic Region, with 7.1 percent of the population, contained 24.5 percent of the Protestant congregations.

The main Protestant denominations in Nicaragua in 1979, according to the National Protestant Church Directory produced by INDEF-CEPAD in 1980, were the Moravian Church in Nicaragua (123 congregations with 12,950 members), Assemblies of God (186 congregations with 8,500 members), the Seventh-day Adventist Church (83 congregations with 6,073 members), Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (116 congregations with 5,250 members), Baptist Convention of Nicaragua (174 congregations with 4,659 members), Baptist International Mission (21 congregations with 3,040 members), Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (60 congregations with 3,600 members), the independent United Pentecostal Evangelical Mission—a split from the Assemblies of God in the mid-1950s (49 congregations with 3,004 members), and the Free Apostolic Church (43 congregations with about 3,000 members). Pentecostals represented 45 percent of all Protestants; the Adventists, 7.8 percent; liturgical groups (Lutheran, Episcopalian and Reformed-Presbyterian), 2.4 percent; other non-Pentecostal denominations (Moravian, Baptist, Brethren, Church of Christ, Nazarene, Central American Mission-related churches, Mennonite, etc.) 44.2 percent; and unclassified groups, 0.6 percent.

The National Protestant Church Directory, produced by INDEF-Nicaragua in 1998, reported 220 Protestant church associations and at least 113 independent churches in Nicaragua in 1997, for a total of 4,402 churches with a Protestant population of 534,284, or 12.2 percent of the national population (1995 census). Geographically, it also revealed that the Pacific Region of the country, with 56.6 percent of the population, contained 46.5 percent of the Protestant congregations; the North-Central Region, with 31.1 percent of the population, contained 31.8 percent of the Protestant congregations; and the Atlantic Region, with 13 percent of the population, contained 21.7 percent of the Protestant congregations.

The largest Protestant denominations in 1997 were the Assemblies of God (603 congregations with 65,315 members), the Moravian Church (144 congregations with 52,274 members), Full Gospel Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (363 congregations with 21,308 members), United Pentecostal Evangelical Mission

Nicaragua

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,380,000	5,597,000	96.0	1.32	6,711,000	7,624,000
Roman Catholics	2,168,000	5,000,000	85.7	1.00	5,800,000	6,350,000
Protestants	118,000	1,050,000	18.0	3.57	1,350,000	1,600,000
Independents	19,700	420,000	7.2	3.17	650,000	880,000
Spiritists	4,000	85,000	1.5	1.35	104,000	130,000
Agnostics	3,800	94,000	1.6	3.19	180,000	310,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,000	27,500	0.5	1.35	32,000	30,000
Baha'is	2,800	12,000	0.2	1.35	20,000	30,000
Buddhists	1,000	7,800	0.1	1.35	12,000	20,000
Atheists	500	3,000	0.1	1.35	6,000	10,000
Chinese folk	1,000	3,000	0.1	1.35	4,500	8,000
New religionists	200	1,100	0.0	1.34	2,000	3,000
Muslims	0	1,000	0.0	1.37	3,000	4,000
Jews	200	200	0.0	1.36	200	200
Total population	2,395,000	5,832,000	100.0	1.35	7,075,000	8,169,000

(273 congregations with 19,200 members), Pentecostal Church of God of Puerto Rico (211 congregations with 12,529 members), Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ (187 congregations with 12,122 members), Church of God of Prophecy (170 congregations with 11,870 members), Baptist Convention of Nicaragua (112 congregations with 10,158 members), Assembly of Christian Churches from New York City (98 congregations with 8,321 members), Pentecostal Mission of Christian Churches—a split from the United Pentecostal Evangelical Mission in 1975 (117 congregations with 6,024 members), Free Apostolic Churches (90 congregations with 5,727 members), and Church of the Nazarene (98 congregations with 5,066 members). All other Protestant denominations reported fewer than 5,000 members each in 1997.

Also, the 1998 National Protestant Church Directory listed 1,182 congregations in the city of Managua, which had a population of 1,093,760 in 1995. By comparison, in 1979, there were only 253 Protestant congregations in the city of Managua with a population of 511,767, according to the PROCADES study.

Moravian and Anglican-Episcopal communities are concentrated on the Atlantic coast, while other evangelical churches dominate the Pacific and North-Central regions. There is a strong correlation between ethnicity and religion within the various regions. Creoles (Afro-Caribbean) predominate in the coastal towns where English-speaking congregations were established by Baptist and Methodist immigrants from the British West Indies during the 19th and 20th centuries, whereas Seventh-day Adventist missionaries from the United States first arrived in 1904. Most of the other Protestant denominations that now exist in Zelaya Department (now divided into the North and South Atlantic Autonomous regions) did not begin work there until after 1950, and most of their congregations are Spanish-speaking. Amerindians (Miskito, Rama, and Sumo) who live along the Caribbean coast are more likely to belong to Moravian, Anglican-Episcopal, or Seventh-day Adventist churches.

Some evangelical denominations (mainly Pentecostal) have a strong presence in the remote towns of the North-Central Region and South Atlantic Autonomous Region, where Spanish-speaking migrants arrived to clear the forest and create new communities and farms since the 1940s. However, the North-Central Region of the country experienced the most significant Protestant church growth in Nicaragua between 1979 and 1997 (18 years). In 1979, the North-Central Region, with 29.4 percent of the population, had 23.3 percent of the Protestant congregations, whereas in 1997, the North-Central Region, with 31.1 percent of the population, had 31.8 percent of the Protestant congregations.

According to research conducted by the Latin American Socio-Religious Studies Program (PROLADES, the geographically expanded version of PROCADES), the highest rate of Protestant church growth in Nicaragua took place during the 1970s (12.2 percent annually), which corresponds to the period of greatest civil conflict between the Sandinistas and the Somoza dictatorship. The proportion of Pentecostal adherents in Nicaragua increased from 44.8 percent of all Protestants in 1979, to 51.5 percent in 1991, and to 55.7 percent in 1997; whereas the evangelical non-Pentecostal proportion decreased from 44.5 percent in 1979, to 34.7 percent in 1991, and to 32.4 percent in 1997. Therefore, the evidence shows that Pentecostal membership was growing more rapidly than non-Pentecostal membership between 1979 and 1997.

In 2007, the largest Protestant denomination in Nicaragua was the Assemblies of God with more than 860 congregations and an estimated 200,000 baptized members (mainly Spanish-speaking). Also, the Assemblies of God has a megachurch with more than 10,000 members in Managua. The second largest denomination was the Moravian Church with 188 congregations and 82,944 members (predominantly among Miskitos).

Today, there are four private Protestant universities that operate with official government authorization: the Nicaraguan Polytechnic University (founded by Baptists), Martin Luther King Evangelical University (nondenominational), the Adventist University (founded by Seventh-day Adventists), and Bluefields Indian and Caribbean University (founded by Moravians). Also present are dozens of evangelical Bible institutes and several theological seminaries that train pastors and lay workers.

Many of the more conservative Protestant denominations are associated with the Consejo Nacional Evangélico de Nicaragua (National Evangelical Council), which is affiliated with the Latin American Confederation of Evangelicals (CONELA) and the World Evangelical Alliance (WEA). The Baptist Convention and the Moravian Church are the only members of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI) in Nicaragua, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC).

Other Christian Groups Also present in Nicaragua are the following non-Protestant Christian groups: Jehovah's Witnesses (322 congregations and 19,003 adherents in 2005); the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (founded in 1953; reported 92 congregations and 59,886 adherents in 2007); the Light of the World Church (from Guadalajara, Mexico); Philadelphia Church of God; the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God and the God Is Love Pentecostal Church (from Brazil); and the Voice of the Cornerstone, Mita Congregation and the People of Amos (from Puerto Rico). The Growing in Grace International Ministry (with headquarters in Miami, Florida) claims to have at least 1,000 members in Nicaragua and has been active since 1997.

Immigrant groups include Palestinian Christians (Eastern Orthodox) whose ancestors came to Central America in the early 1900s, as well as Chinese and Korean Christians who arrived after the 1960s. Several other Christian groups (Eastern- and Western-rite) are reported to exist in Nicaragua as well: the Orthodox Apostolic Catholic Church—Virgin of Perpetual Help Mission (Padre Basilio Victorino Castro Mejías) and the Orthodox Church of the East/Church of Utrecht in America. The latter group was founded in the United States by Richard A. Marchenna (1932–1982), who was also associated with the Old Roman Catholic Church; he was succeeded by Derek Lang of the episcopal diocese of Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan Mission operates St. Martin's Seminary in La Esperanza, Zelaya. In addition, the Eastern Orthodox Catholic Church has one "religious community" of monks and nuns, the Monastic Community of Saint Basil, located at St. John's Monastery in Nicaragua. Its headquarters are at Our Lady of Sitka Monastery in Cleveland, Ohio.

Additional Religious Groups World religions in Nicaragua include the Baha'i Faith; Buddhism: Bodhichitta Buddhist Center, Compassion Buddhist Center, Paget Sayers Buddhist Center; Hinduism: Devanand Yoga Center, International Society for Krishna Consciousness, International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization, the transcendental Meditation Movement (now led by the Global Country for World Peace); Islam, and Judaism (see below); Western Esoteric Tradition: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), Grand Universal Fraternity–Order of Aquarius (from Venezuela), and the Universal Gnostic Movement (Samael Aun Weor); Spiritualist-Psychic-New Age movements: Ishaya Techniques, Kardec School of Spiritualism, and Unification movement (Reverend Sun Myung Moon). In addition, there are numerous psychics, mediums, clairvoyants, and astrologers who announce their services in local newspapers.

Although there are few adherents of pre-Columbian religions in the country, there has been a “freedom movement” within the Moravian Church to allow some Amerindian spiritual expression, often through music. Animistic groups include traditional Amerindian religions among the Miskito, Sumo, and Rama; Myalism-Obeah among Creoles; Garifuna religion (Afro-Amerindian) among the inhabitants of Sandy Bay, located north of Bluefields; and “popular Catholicism” among the Hispanic population (syncretistic), which includes the use of magic, witchcraft (brujería), folk healing (curanderismo), and spiritual guides (chamanismo).

The Jewish community has only about 50 adherents (including expatriates); they gather for religious holidays and Sabbath dinners but do not have an ordained rabbi or a synagogue. According to community members, the last synagogue in the country was fire-bombed by a Sandinista street mob in 1978.

There are approximately 1,200 to 1,500 Muslims in Nicaragua, mostly Sunnis who are resident aliens or naturalized citizens from Palestine, Libya and Iran.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ of Mexico; Assemblies of God; Baptist Convention of Nicaragua; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Nazarene; Episcopal Church; Franciscans; Garifuna Religion; Global Country of World Peace; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Jesuits; Mita Congregation; Moravian Church in Nicaragua; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritism; Spiritualism; Unification Movement; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Dussell, Enrique, et al. Historia General de la Iglesia en América Latina. Vol. 6, América Central. Salamanca, Spain: Ediciones Sígueme, 1985.
- Gooren, Henri. “Latter-day Saints under Siege: The Unique Experience of Nicaraguan Mormons.” Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 40, no. 3 (Fall 2007): 134–155.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- INDEF-CEPAD. Directorio de Iglesias, Organizaciones y Ministerios del Movimiento Protestante: Nicaragua. San José, Costa Rica: INDEF, 1980.
- INDEF. Directorio de las Iglesias Protestantes en Nicaragua, 1996–1997. Managua, Nicaragua: Departamento de Investigaciones Socio-Religiosas, Instituto Nicaragüense de Evangelismo a Fondo, 1998.
- Matamoros Ruiz, Bartolomé. Historia de las Asambleas de Dios en Nicaragua. Managua, Nicaragua: Distribudora Vida, 1984.
- Millett, Richard. Guardians of the Dynasty: A History of the U.S. Created Guardia Nacional de Nicaragua and the Somoza Family. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1977.
- PROLADES–Religion in the Americas Database. “Religion in Nicaragua,” <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/nic/ingles/nica-rd.htm>.
- Revista de Historia del Protestantismo Nicaragüense*. Managua, Nicaragua: CIEETS, September 1993.
- Rudolph, James D. Nicaragua: A Country Guide. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1982.
- U. S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report 2007: Nicaragua. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90261.htm>.

Nichiren

1222–1282

Nichiren was a 13th-century Buddhist reformer whose advocacy of the exclusive superiority of the Lotus Sutra, one of the more important Mahayan Buddhist scriptures, led to the formation of a new school of Japanese Buddhist life. Nichiren Buddhism is best known for its central practice, the calling upon the Buddha through the Lotus Sutra by reciting the mantra, “nam myoho rengo kyo.” Nichiren taught that as “myoho-rengo-kyo” was the title of the Lotus Sutra, it represented the essence of the sutra’s teaching.

Nichiren was born Zennichi-marō in Tojo Village, Awa Province, Japan. As a boy of but 11 years, he began his study of Buddhism at a nearby temple of Tendai Buddhism. He was ordained in 1237, and subsequently moved to Kamakura, which became his base for travels across Japan to study at different centers.

Tendai Buddhists had developed an approach to the many Buddhist scriptures that ranked them hierarchically, with the Lotus Sutra ranked at the top. Nichiren accepted the central Tendai observation that the Lotus Sutra contained the highest Buddhist teachings, and hence was superior to the other Buddhist sutras, but took the teaching one step further and concluded that the Lotus Sutra had supplanted the other sutras. It was all that a Buddhist needed. Simultaneously, he concluded that he had been entrusted with the mission of Bodhisattva Superior Practices, an important character in the Lotus Sutra to whom the task of propagating the Dharma in the Latter Days had been entrusted. Nichiren assumed that his work included emphasizing the superiority of the Lotus Sutra while at the same time pointing out the errors of the other Buddhists, including the very popular Pure Land Buddhist groups and his former Tendai colleagues.

Launching his mission in 1253 at Seicho-ji, a temple on Mount Kiyosumi near his birthplace, he assumed the new name by which he would henceforth be known—Nichiren (Sun Lotus). He also preached an initial sermon on the Lotus Sutra that included an attack on the Pure Land Buddhists and their central practice of reciting the Nembutsu (the mantra by which they called upon Amida Buddha in hopes that they would be delivered to the western paradise [or Pure Land] over which he was believed to have hegemony). The untactful attack led to an immediate reaction by the local Pure Land believers. Nichiren immediately retreated and went back to Kamakura. He spent the rest of his decades recruiting an initial following that included the first members of what would become the inner core of monk-disciples.

Nichiren Calming the Storm by Utagawa Kuniyoshi, ca. 1835, portrays the Japanese Mahayana master as one capable of influencing natural events. (Historical Picture Archive/Corbis)

In 1260, while residing in Kamakura, now the capital of Japan, Nichiren renewed his public debate with the Pure Land Buddhists. In 1260 he took the occasion of a crisis that Japan had experienced due to a series of natural disasters to present his treatise On Establishing the Correct Teaching for the Peace of the Land to government authorities. He suggested that Japan's problems derived from the widespread slander that he and his followers of the true Buddhism had experienced at the hands of the Pure Land Buddhists and others. He warned of further possible disasters. As people learned of the content of his writing, an angry mob sought Nichiren and he chose to leave the city. When feelings seemed to calm, he tried to return, but the shogunate sent him into exile on the Izu Peninsula, where he remained for the next three years. Finally the exile order was lifted and he was allowed to return to his hometown.

Back in Kamakura in 1268, Nichiren penned a letter reminding the shogun and the public that eight years earlier he had predicted the current threat, namely, an imminent invasion by Mongol forces. When a drought hit in 1271, he used the occasion to ridicule Ryokan, a leading Shingon Buddhist in Kamakura, questioning his ability to have any effect in ending the drought. Nichiren was arrested and threatened with execution, though in the end the shogun again exiled him for three years. Nichiren made use of the time to write some of his more important and substantive writings.

When he returned to Kamakura in 1274, the shogun offered him the opportunity to establish and have Nichiren Buddhism recognized on an equal footing with the other Buddhist schools. He rejected the offer and asserted that his teachings were superior and could not be reduced to just another Buddhist variant. He abandoned Kamakura for Mount Minobu, in Yamanashi Prefecture, where he founded the Kuon-ji Temple. He would remain there until just before his death.

Nichiren spent his last years writing and training the small group of disciples who would lead the movement after his death. It was also during this time (1279) that he inscribed the giant mandala-like Object of Worship, the Gohozon, which he dedicated to the attainment of Buddhahood by all humanity. Early in the new decade, his health began to fail. After making arrangements to transfer leadership to six senior disciples, in 1282, for the first time since his arrival, he left the mountain to visit a hot springs in hope of recovering his health. He died along the route.

After Nichiren's death, his disciples had a falling out over the care of his tomb on Mount Minobu. One of the six, Nikko (1246–1333), accused the others of neglecting the tomb and then went on to suggest that they were becoming tolerant of wrong practices. Nikko broke relations with his brethren and established himself separately at a temple near Mount Fuji. The effort of the five disciples would be continued by the Nichiren-shu, the largest group of Nichiren's followers. Nikko's following organized as what became known as the Nichiren Shoshu, or the Fuji School. In the 20th century, the Nichiren Shoshu would see the formation of a lay organization now known as the Soka Gakkai International. In the years after World War II, Soka Gakkai International became a large Japanese phenomenon and spread Nichiren's teachings worldwide. It became the largest Buddhist group in many Western countries. Then in the 1980s, the Soka Gakkai split with the Nichiren Shoshu and has now become a separate third large independent Nichiren group.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Mahayana Buddhism; Nichiren Shoshu; Nichirensu; Pure Land Buddhism; Soka Gakkai International; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism.

References

Masaharu, Anesaki. Nichiren, the Buddhist Prophet. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1916.

- Montgomery, Daniel B. Fire in the Lotus: The Dynamic Buddhism of Nichiren. London: HarperCollins, 1991.
- Nichiren. The Writing of Nichiren Daishonin. Tokyo: Soka Gakkai, 2003.
- Petzold, Bruno. Buddhist Prophet Nichiren: A Lotus in the Sun. Tokyo: Hokke Janaru, 1978.
- Rodd, Laurel Rasplika, ed. Nichiren: Selected Writings. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1980.
- SJI-USA Study Department. The Untold History of the Fuji School: The True Story of Nichiren Shoshu. Santa Monica: World Tribune Press, 2000.
- Yamblosky, Philip B. Selected Writings of Nichiren. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

Nichiren Shoshu

Nichiren Shoshu is a Japanese Buddhist religious sect founded by Nikko (1246–1333), one of the disciples of Nichiren (1222–1282). After the death of Nichiren, his disciples agreed that the guardianship of his tomb should rotate among his six senior disciples. Two years later when the rotation finished, Nikko broke away from the Nichirenshu and in 1290 founded Taiseikiji Temple, the present head temple of Nichiren Shoshu, at the foot of Mount Fuji. Over the centuries other Nichiren sects also developed. After the Meiji Restoration in 1868, followers in Nikko's lineage were forced into association with the other Nichiren sects. However, in 1900 it became independent and took the name Nichiren Shoshu in 1912.

In the 1920s, Tsunesaburo Makiguchi (1871–1944), the founder of Soka Gakkai, a Nichiren Shoshu lay association, was converted to Nichiren Shoshu. Although remaining small through the 1930s, after World War II Soka Gakkai International emerged as an aggressive proselytizing organization through which Nichiren Shoshu experienced dramatic growth and spread worldwide. Although Soka Gakkai had provided funds and buildings to Nichiren Shoshu, friction between the two organizations occurred almost from the beginning of the foundation of Soka Gakkai.

The conflict grew through the 1980s, and in 1991 Nichiren Shoshu pronounced excommunication on Soka Gakkai, on the grounds that Soka Gakkai had gone against Nichiren Shoshu teachings. The process of separating the two organizations took several years, and in 1997 the leadership of Nichiren Shoshu ordered all of its members to completely disaffiliate with Soka Gakkai by November 30, 1997, or lose their membership status. In the break, the majority of members (especially those residing outside Japan) adhered to Soka Gakkai, but a large minority of the non-Japanese believers remained loyal, and Nichiren Shoshu has retained its presence throughout the Japanese diaspora.

Members of Nichiren Shoshu believe that in mappo (the last period of history: a degenerate age in which the Buddhist law is no longer observed), only Nichiren and the Lotus Sutra can save this world, and that the government should endorse Nichiren Buddhism and establish it as the state religion—a principle known as obutsu myogo (a polity fundamentally united with Buddhism). This policy has led Nichiren Shoshu into the political arena, and in the last half of the 20th century it had close relations with a new political party. That party, the Komei Kai, adhered to Soka Gakkai after 1991. It has officially dropped any organizational ties to any religious organizations in the wake of the changes in Japan following the Aum Shinrikyo disaster in 1995.

Nichiren Shoshu reveres Nichiren as the religious founder (shuso) and Nikko as the sectarian founder (haso). As with other Nichirenist sects and movements, chanting “daimoku: namu myoho rengekyo” (adoration to the Lotus Sutra) is of central importance because it is believed that the invocation has a miraculous power to fulfill one's wish and lead to enlightenment.

Nichiren Shoshu is currently led by Abe Nikken. Its reported membership in 2000 was 338,000. It is a member of the Japan Buddhist Federation. In the United States, there are six temples, including one in Hawaii.

Nichiren Shoshu Headquarters
Taiseikiji, 2057 Kamijo
Fujinomiya-shi, Shizuoka Prefecture 418-0116
Japan

<http://www.cebunet.com/nst/> (in English)
<http://www.nichireنشوشو.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

See also: Aum Shinrikyô/Aleph; Japan Buddhist Federation; Nichiren; Nichirenshu; Soka Gakkai International.

References

- The Doctrines and Practice of Nichiren Shoshu.* Fujinomiya, Shizuoka. Japan: Nichiren Shoshu Overseas Bureau, 2002.
- Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1972.
- Wilson, Bryan, and Karel Dobbelaere. A Time to Chant: The Soka Gakkai Buddhists in Britain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Nichirenshu

The term “Nichirenshu” refers to a collection of Japanese Buddhist sects that have grown out of the life and work of Nichiren (1222–1282). Nichiren studied Tendai Buddhism at Mount Hiei and came to believe that the Lotus Sutra, the most famous Buddhist Sanskrit text, was also the most important Buddhist scripture and that it taught the ways of transformation, bliss, and law. Followers were taught to call upon the Lotus Sutra through the Daimoku, a chanting of “namu myoho renge kyo” (adoration to the Lotus Sutra). The repetition of this phrase is the most distinctive practice of the Nichirenshu and groups derived from it, and it is believed that its frequent use has a miraculous power to lead to enlightenment. Worship and repetition of the Daimoku is performed in front of the Gohonzon, a mandala upon which the chant is inscribed along with the names of various Buddhas, bodhisattvas, and other Buddhist deities.

In 1260, Nichiren presented the teaching of Risho ankoku ron (the establishment of righteousness and the security of the nation), stating that Japan would suffer from natural calamities and social ills if the government did not adopt the teaching. He also presented a view of world history divided into three millennia. The first, shobo, began with the Buddha’s death and constituted the period of true law. The second, zobo, or image law, followed. The third period, which began in 1052 CE, is called mappo, the end of the law. It will last, not just 1,000 years, but 10,000. During mappo, the Lotus Sutra is the way of salvation.

During his lifetime, Nichiren harshly attacked other religious groups, and in turn Nichiren’s sect itself later split into a number of subsects, including Kenpon Hokkeshu, Nipponzan Myohoji, Nichiren Shoshu, and Hokkeshu. There are also numerous Nichiren-related new religions such as Reiyukai, Rissho Kosei Kai, and Soka Gakkai International.

The head temple of Nichirenshu is Minobesan Kuonji, located in Yamanashi Prefecture. It is currently led by Fujii Nikko. With a membership in 2000 of 3,845,986, it is currently one of the largest Buddhist groups in Japan. It is also a member of the Japan Buddhist Federation. It sponsors Rissho University in Tokyo and Minobusan Junior College in Minobu, Yamanashi-ken.

Nichirenshu has a significant following overseas, especially in Korea, the United States, and Brazil. In 2008, there were 15 Nichirenshu temples in the United States and one in Canada.

Nichirenshu Headquarters

Ikegami Honganji
 1-32-15 Ikegami
 Ota-ku, Tokyo 146-8544
 Japan

<http://www.nichiren-shu.org/> (in English)
<http://www.nichiren.or.jp/> (headquarters in Tokyo, in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

See also: Japan Buddhist Federation; Nichiren; Nichiren Shoshu; Nipponzan Myohoji; Reiyukai; Rissho Kosei-kai; Soka Gakkai International.

References

- Agency for Cultural Affairs. Shukyo Nenkan. Tokyo: Gyosei, 2001.
- Anesaki, Masaharu. History of Japanese Religion. London: Kegan Paul Trench Trubner & Co., 1930.
- Anesaki, Masaharu. Nichiren, the Buddhist Prophet. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1949.
- Buddhist Denominations and Schools in Japan.* Tokyo: Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai, 1984.

Christensen, J. A. Nichiren: Leader of Buddhist Reformation in Japan. Fremont, CA: Jain Publishing Company, 2001.

Nichiren-Buddhist Service Companion. Chicago: Headquarters of the Nichiren Buddhist Temple of North America, 1968.

■ Niger

Niger is a large landlocked country in central West Africa. It is surrounded by Algeria, Libya, Chad, Nigeria, Benin, Burkina Faso, and Mali. Four-fifths of its 489,000 square miles of territory is in the Sahara Desert, and thus most of its 12,273,000 people reside in the southern part of the country immediately north of the border with Nigeria. This area has been inhabited for several thousand years. A kingdom, the Nok Empire, arose in southern Niger and had hegemony for many centuries prior to its decline in the sixth century. Its cities were important stops on the trade routes across the Sahara to the north and eastward to the Nile River valley. Successive regimes appeared through the centuries of the modern era.

The French entered the area in the 19th century, in 1922 annexing Niger as a French colony. They attempted to introduce cash crops for export, leading to periodic food shortages. At the time it became an independent nation in 1960, Niger was among the poorest of the African nations. On the heels of a major drought in the early 1970s, the army took control of the government and introduced a number of reforms. An economic boom followed, which ended in 1980 with a fall in prices of uranium, one of the country's few mineral assets. (Based on forged documents, in 2003 Niger was accused of attempting to sell uranium to Saddam Hussein, then the ruler of Iraq, for the purpose of creating nuclear weapons.)

Children sing at the small Evangelical church in the town of Maradi, Niger. (AP Photo/Schalk van Zuydam)

Islam entered Niger in the 11th century along the trade routes from the Mediterranean Coast. Most Muslims are of the Sunni Malikite School, but the Tijaniyya Sufi Order is especially strong among the Tuareg, Kanuri, Fulani, and Hausa peoples. A school for the training of religious leaders is found in Say, a Muslim holy city. Although Islam largely replaced the traditional beliefs of the various Native people of Niger, traditional beliefs remain strong among the Kurfeï and Mauri peoples. And resistance to Islam is notable among the Serma-Songhai and Beriberi.

It was not until the 20th century that Christianity arrived in Niger. The Sudan Interior Mission, an independent evangelical sending agency, sent its representatives into the area in 1923. They opened the initial mission station at Zinder the next year. Their work resulted in the present-day Evangelical Church of Niger, which supports a hospital at Galmi, one of the important medical facilities in the country, and a Bible school in Niamey. In 1991 the church faced a major schism that led to the founding of two additional denominations, the Union of Evangelical Protestant Churches of Niger and the Evangelical Church Salama of Niger.

Evangelical Baptist Missions, a sending agency dedicated to the spread of Christianity in French-speaking countries, began work in 1929 that led to the present-day Union des Églises Évangéliques Baptistes. A rather limited spectrum of Protestant churches entered through the remainder of the century: the Cherubim and Seraphim, one of several African Initiated Churches from Nigeria, and the New Apostolic Church from Germany showing some limited response. No

Niger

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	3,634,000	14,616,000	92.6	3.66	24,858,000	51,346,000
Ethnoreligionists	565,000	1,100,000	7.0	2.70	1,258,000	1,567,000
Christians	16,900	57,100	0.4	2.12	94,500	179,000
Roman Catholics	13,400	15,000	0.1	–3.79	17,000	25,000
Independents	1,000	27,000	0.2	5.40	45,000	90,000
Protestants	2,400	14,000	0.1	6.69	30,000	60,000
Agnostics	0	9,200	0.1	4.09	20,000	40,000
Baha'is	800	5,700	0.0	3.58	14,000	25,000
Sikhs	0	3,300	0.0	3.58	4,000	5,000
Atheists	0	200	0.0	3.60	700	1,000
Total population	4,217,000	15,791,000	100.0	3.58	26,250,000	53,163,000

churches or church associations based in Niger are members of the World Council of Churches or the World Evangelical Alliance.

The Roman Catholic Church came to Niger from an earlier base in Dahomey (now Benin) in 1931. It had very little success among the local population, and the great majority of its members are expatriates residing in Niger, many from neighboring African states. Nevertheless, a diocese was created in 1961. In 1972 the ordination of the first Niger priest became a cause for national celebration. Among those in attendance was the grand imam of Niamey, a leading figure in the Muslim community.

There is a small community of the Baha'i Faith in Niger, but other major religious traditions beyond those already mentioned are as yet unrepresented.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Baha'i Faith; Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim; Malikite School of Islam; New Apostolic Church; Roman Catholic Church; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

Aidou, Ousseina. Engaging Modernity: Muslim Women and the Politics of Agency in Postcolonial Niger. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of

Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Fugelstad, Finn. A History of Niger 1850–1960.

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Masquelier, Adeline. Prayer Has Spoiled Everything: Possession, Power, and Identity in an Islamic Town of Niger. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2001.

Norris, H. T. Sufi Mystics of the Niger Desert: Sidi Mahmud and the Hermits of Air. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.

Stoller, Paul. Fusion of the Worlds: An Ethnography of Possession among the Songhay of Niger. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

■ Nigeria

Nigeria, with a population of more than 150 million, is the most populous country in sub-Saharan Africa. The country is located in western Africa and has a total area of 356,669 square miles. It shares land borders with the Republic of Benin in the west, Chad and Cameroon in the east, and Niger in the north. Its coast lies on the Gulf of Guinea, a part of the Atlantic Ocean, in the south. Nigeria contains a vast diversity of ethnic and cultural backgrounds, comprising more than 400 languages. There are more than 250 ethnic groups, creating a country of rich ethnic diversity. The largest ethnic groups are the Fulani/Hausa, Yoruba, and Igbo, while the minority groups include Edo, Ijaw, Kanuri, Ibibio, Nupe, and Tiv, to mention a few.

The country gained political independence from the British imperial regime in October 1960. Nigeria is presently comprised of 36 states and the Federal Capital Territory in Abuja. It is a federal constitutional republic with a three-tier system of government comprising the executive, the judiciary, and the legislature. Nigeria reintroduced democracy in 1999, ending a protracted military rule that lasted from 1966 until 1999, and excluding the short-lived second republic between 1979 and 1983, aborted by military dictators who seized power in coups d'état and counter-coups during the Nigerian military juntas of 1966–1979 and 1983–1998.

The religious landscape of this geopolitical entity is highly complex and dynamic. Essentially, it is characterized by a multiplicity of religious traditions, including the traditional local religions and worldviews, the various strands of Christianity and Islam, as well as newer Spiritual Science movements. Many of the most recent manifestations of these various religions have come to be subsumed under the category of new religious movements. Another recent phenomenon that is easily noticeable within Nigeria's multifaith scenario is what has been described elsewhere as civil religion.

Accurate statistics for each tradition are difficult to come by and are largely a matter of conjecture. However, it is evident that the major religions in Nigeria are Christianity and Islam, both influenced in part by indigenous religious traditions. The politicization of religious statistics has become even more controversial with the enduring debate about whether Nigeria is a secular or a religious state. Whatever the case, religious ideas and worldviews continue to shape the ways that Nigerians explain, predict, and control the events and life circumstances that surround them. Religion has served and is still serving as a significant source through which many Nigerians seek understanding of their complex reality and existence, and it serves as a panacea for their various existential problems of day-to-day living.

The indigenous religions (also called ethnoreligions) of the various ethnic and cultural groups in Nigeria are apparently the oldest religious forms in the region. Examples of indigenous religion have come to be referred to, especially in academic circles, by the name of the respective language groups: Yoruban religion, Igbo religion, Edo religion, Kalabari religion, Hausa religion, Tiv religion, and so on. This categorization does not in any way presuppose a kind of uniformity of beliefs and rituals among these peoples. Indigenous religions are more or less localized; some beliefs may be more widespread while others may vary from one ethnic group or subgroup to another. What the categorization suggests instead is an aggregation of shared, similar, and related but sometimes quite different belief and ritual systems, often shaped by particular ethnic and social groups, power structures, and even the characteristics of natural phenomena in each respective locality. The indigenous religions do not lay claim to any specific historical origins but are believed to have been transmitted from one generation to another. One essential characteristic shared by the Nigerian indigenous religions is the belief in a Supreme Being, as well as various divinities, spirits, ancestors, and mysterious powers such as witchcraft, sorcery, and magic. However, it must be noted that the names, attributes, and significance of these supramundane entities may vary from one locality to another. The concept of God is called Olodumare or Olorun among the Yoruba, Osanobua among the Edo, and Chukwu or Chineke among the Igbo.

The description of these groups as "indigenous" or "traditional" does not in any way suggest that they are static and moribund. Their dynamism is partly exemplified by their tendency toward growth and innovation, a development that has given birth to what is now described as neo-traditional movements. A case in point is Ijo Orunmila, a movement founded in the 1930s by Yoruba Christians seeking to re-establish links with their traditional religious heritage. In 1963 the Arousa Cult (Edo National Church), which developed from Bini indigenous religion, fused with another neo-traditional movement, the National Church of Nigeria, to form what is now referred to as Godianism. The Bori Cult, a neo-traditional movement prominent among

A mosque in Abuja, Nigeria. Islam is one of Nigeria's major religions. (iStockPhoto.com)

Hausa women, draws partly on Islamic beliefs and practices. Also significant here are the various transformations of the Nigerian indigenous religions in diaspora, including Santeria, Candomblé, and the numerous Orisa cults. These are only a few examples of the creativity and innovation inherent in these indigenous religions.

The prevailing wave of modernization and social change has resulted in the decline of some features of the indigenous religions even as it has brought about a revitalization and modification of other aspects of the indigenous practices and modes of thought. The claim that Christianity and Islam totally outweighed the indigenous religions in their religious encounter is somewhat problematic. It becomes especially questionable when one considers how and to what extent these “external” religious traditions have engaged the indigenous religions in their attempt to contextualize and to make their messages more intelligible and acceptable to the Nigerian people. The indigenous religious worldview or aspects of it still largely pervade, consciously or unconsciously, the religious outlook and vision of many Nigerians, irrespective of their new religious convictions and background. The pertinence and reality of the indigenous religions for many individuals and communities in contemporary Nigeria are evident in the growing popularity of cults of divinities such as Ogun, Osun, and Oya. Religious festivals such as the Osun Oshogbo festival are gaining prominence among adherents and non-adherents alike, and the annual event is assuming international popularity. Kingship rituals such as the Igue Festival in Benin City, secret societies such as the Ogboni Society in western Nigeria, masquerades such as Egungun and Eyo among the Yoruba, divination, healing, and oracle systems such as Arockukwu among the Igbo and Ifa among the Yoruba are instances of the various ways and avenues through which the indigenous religions manifest their resilience in the face of a complex, multireligious, and rapidly changing society.

Islam touched on the Nigerian soil long before Christianity. It made its debut as early as the 11th century, entering from the interior of the continent across the West African savannahs and the Sahara Desert to the north. Through the activities of Arab and Berber merchants from the western Sudan and North Africa, Islam made inroads in many cities in the north, especially in the Kingdom of Kanem-Bornu. In the late 14th and early 15th centuries, Islam was also introduced through the influence of Wangarawa-Dyula traders in the city-kingdoms of Hausaland. Before the 16th century, Islam in northern Nigeria was very much mixed with Hausa traditional religion. The earliest attempts at propagating Islam produced what remained essentially a religion of the merchants, of the towns, the ulama (learned men), and the ruling class. It was only in the 17th century that it started to expand among other segments of the population. By 1700, Islam of the Sunni Malekite School began to generate immense support among all levels of Hausa society. The influence of the religion started to be felt in southwestern Nigeria only in the 18th century through the incursion of Hausa traders.

During the 19th century, a number of reform movements aimed at purifying Islam and more or less characterized by militancy were launched throughout West Africa. Another motivation of these reform movements was to create theocratic states based on shariah, the Islamic law. The successful jihad (holy war) under the leadership of Uthman Dan Fodio (d. 1817) in 1804 turned Islam into a religion of the masses and further resulted in a theocratic state, the Sokoto Caliphate. In this state there was extensive autonomy for emirates, who recognized the spiritual authority of the caliph (sultan). More than 30 emirates were created during the course of the 19th century. The successful execution of the jihad also enhanced the spread of Islam within and beyond the north. Through military conquest, the Caliphate expanded south into the Middle Belt region, thus leading to the forceful incorporation of other ethnic groups and non-Muslims into the emirates of the Islamic polity.

During the 17th century, the Oyo Kingdom had already been in contact with Hausa Muslims through trade. In 1817 the revolt by the pastoral Fulani, Hausa slaves, and Muslim Yoruba converts in Ilorin dealt a death blow to the Oyo Kingdom, followed by a series of internecine civil wars around Yorubaland. By the 20th century, Islam had spread to northern Yorubaland with an emirate in Ilorin, from where it moved on to other Yoruba towns such as Osogbo, Ibadan, Oyo, and Iwo. Islam experienced hostility in southeastern Nigeria because of the annexation of Ilorin and northern Yorubaland by the Sokoto Caliphate. However, Muslim traders gradually reestablished themselves in Yoruba commercial towns, thus leading to the integration of Yoruba Islam into traditional society. The evangelization of the southwest by Hausa traders and preachers was largely carried out through peaceful means and involved several Islamic organizations. Some of these towns had a predominantly Islamic population, even in the face of competition with Christianity, which was already well established in Yorubaland at the time Islam came. The integration of Islam into Yoruba indigenous culture gave it a distinct character that makes it different from Islam in northern Nigeria.

The diversity and complexity of Islamic movements in Nigeria is partly exemplified by the Sufi orders or brotherhoods. Two major movements that were involved in the Islamization process in Nigeria were the Qadiriyya and the Tijaniyya. The former is much older and has spread widely in northern Nigeria since the 19th century. The Qadiriyya emphasizes intellectual pursuits more than the Tijaniyya and was also introduced in the 19th century. The two brotherhoods have witnessed tension and rivalry for several decades of their existence. Other Islamic organizations oppose these two brotherhoods on the basis of doctrine. Yoruba Muslims have formed various societies whose task is to provide Muslims with a modern education that does not conflict with Islamic values. The Ahmadiyya Muslim movement has made significant impact in the southwest, where it is very popular. In 1923 a group broke away and formed the Ansar-ud-Deen Society. Both movements have enhanced the development of secular education, particularly in southwest Nigeria. The Ansar-ud-Deen was probably the most popular of these Muslim educational organizations. By 1960 it already ran numerous primary and secondary schools and training colleges.

The Izala (Jamaatu Izalat al-Bida) emerged in 1978, enjoining its members to reject innovation and instead work for the preservation of the Sunna. The leading representative of Izala until his death in 1992 was Abubakar Gumi, whose most important concern was to try to unite Muslims politically. However, between 1978 and 1985, many northern Nigerian towns and cities were shaken by the armed insurrections led by Mohammed Marwa Maitatsine (d. 1980) and his Yan Tatsine movement. Maitatsine had a long history of fomenting Islamic unrest in northern Nigeria. The source of his inspiration was the belief, especially in Sufi Islam, that a mujaddid (reformer) will arise each century to purify and revitalize Islam. Maitatsine's brand of Islam seemed to largely combine traditional Muslim conceptions with local indigenous elements.

One of the very visible effects of Islam in Nigeria has been the demand for and subsequent declaration of sharia in some states of the federation, a development that has produced protests and huge criticisms from the Christian population. The incessant religious riots in northern Nigeria have been given an added impetus with this recent development. Religion has become a matter of political significance and a source of tension in Nigeria. This religious tension has a clear connection with the growth of uncompromising Muslim and Christian activism. The relationship between Islam and Christianity has led to a growing culture of religious violence, particularly in northern Nigeria. Since the 1980s, there have been many violent clashes between Muslims and Christians, especially in the northern cities of Kano, Kaduna, Kafanchan, and Zaria. Nigeria provides a fertile ground for exploring the role of religious organizations in civil society and politics. Although there are three major religions, religious and political issues and conflicts have revolved largely around the activities of and the interrelationships between Islam and Christianity. Their involvement in regional and national politics is aptly illustrated by their activities in post-independence politics in Nigeria.

Christianity spread along the West African coast, via the Atlantic Ocean, to the south. The first attempt at planting Christianity in Nigeria was in the late 15th and 16th centuries, a period that witnessed the activities of Portuguese Catholics in the Warri and Benin kingdoms and the Niger Delta area. The Portuguese missionaries placed political and economic considerations over and above religious interests, leading to a dismal failure of this first attempt at evangelization. A more profound attempt at Christianization was made in the 19th century, especially following the abolition of the obnoxious trade in human slaves.

Many of the liberated slaves who had already converted to Christianity worked with foreign missions and later became the “native agents” in the eventual spread of Christianity among their own people. An example is the case of Samuel Adjai Crowther (ca. 1809–1891) and his missionary role within the Church Missionary Society (Anglican) in Yorubaland. Christianity was accompanied by Western education, a feature that was immensely attractive to potential converts. The success of this mission attempt was witnessed along the coastal towns of Lagos, Badagry, and Abeokuta, where a large number of people were attracted to Christianity and the accompanying Western education. This impact, which was first witnessed in Yorubaland, later spread to the Niger Delta and eastern Nigeria. The early missionaries who spearheaded this second evangelization process were Anglicans of the Church Missionary Society, Methodists, Baptists, and later Roman Catholics. These different bodies competed among themselves in a bid to carve out spheres of influence. With the intensification of mission work into the hinterland in the early 20th century, Christianity expanded rapidly throughout the southwest and the central areas of Nigeria.

The British administration, under the system of indirect rule, and the emirates deliberately prohibited Christian evangelization in Muslim areas. As a result, Western education developed very slowly in northern Nigeria as compared to the southwestern part of the country. It was only at the latter part of the 20th century that Christianity started to make inroads in the north, already the stronghold of Islam. The missionary enterprise to northern Nigeria was carried out partly by the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM). The SIM, an independent sending agency, devoted its energies to spreading the Christian gospel in northern Nigeria via church planting, literature development and dissemination, general education, and medical work. The SIM gave birth to a number of churches that together adopted the name Evangelical Church of West Africa (ECWA).

Just as the West African coast was the first home and indigenous breeding ground for the mission churches in the 19th century, so it fulfilled the same function for the indigenous African churches in the 20th century. African instituted churches can be understood basically by examining three phases of development. The first and earliest phase refers to the group of churches that broke away from the existing mission churches owing to a number of irreconcilable issues. These flourished mainly in South Africa (Ethiopian Churches) and West Africa (African Churches) in the 19th century. They all emerged out of similar circumstances, such as rigid white (European) missionary control and domination, discrimination against local African leadership, disputes over resources, a general feeling of marginalization among educated Africans, and apartheid (mainly in the South African context). Some of the churches that seceded from the historic churches in Nigeria are the United Native African Church (1891) and the African Church (Bethel) (1901) from the Anglican Church, and the United African Methodist Church (1917) from the Methodist Church. One notable feature of these churches was that in spite of the change in church leadership, they were still tied to the apron strings of the mission churches in their liturgical and hierarchical structures. Some of them still depended largely on the parent churches for financial resources.

The 1920s and 1930s witnessed the second wave of new beginnings within African Christianity, which include the Aladura churches in Nigeria. These are also variously referred to as “prophetic” and “healing” churches. The most dramatic aspect of 20th-century Christianity in Nigeria was the growth of the prophetic churches. These churches share certain basic characteristics in their worldview that helped to create a rather Nigerian brand of Christianity. These basic features include the centrality of the Bible, prayers, healing, prophecy, visions and dreams, elaborate rituals, flexible modes of worship, unsteretyped liturgy, and a charismatic leader (that is, a prophet or prophetess). The prophetic churches embrace a functional theology, and their pragmatic approach to life and existential problems endeared them to many Nigerians. Though they utterly condemn and reject the traditional religion as “fetish” and “demonic,” their belief systems and ritual structure appear to have affinities with traditional cosmologies. That is why they derive much of their membership not only from within the mainline churches, but also from other Christian and non-Christian groups (Islam and traditional religion).

In spite of the affinities that abound among the prophetic churches, it is important to note that each has its own religious dynamic. There are differences in specific doctrines and in the details of ritual acts and performance, just as in their histories of emergence. Their pattern of emergence is twofold. The first were those that emerged from or had their nucleus as “prayer bands” or “fellowship groups” within a mainline church, but that later broke away to form an independent group. In Nigeria, the Garrick Braide movement was the earliest movement in this category, breaking away from the Niger Delta Pastorate Church as early as 1916.

Other churches that fall under this category include the Cherubim and Seraphim (1925), the Church of the Lord, Aladura (1930), and the Christ Apostolic Church (1930). The second category refers to those groups that did not emerge out of conscious schism from an existing mainline church. They were founded through the visionary experience of a charismatic figure and independently of any existing mission church. A typical example is the Celestial Church of Christ, founded by Samuel Bilewu Oschoffa (1909–1985) in 1947. Most of the indigenous churches of both categories belong to a continental ecumenical movement, the Organization of African Instituted Churches (OAIC).

The most recent development within Nigerian Christianity is the emergence and increasing proliferation of Pentecostal and Charismatic churches, especially from the 1950s on. A huge proliferation of new Pentecostal churches was witnessed in the last two decades of the 20th century in Nigeria. In an attempt to forge ecumenical links and cooperation, both among themselves and between themselves and other churches, a majority of the churches have now come under an umbrella called the Pentecostal Fellowship Association of Nigeria (PFN).

There are two waves of Pentecostal movements. First there are the indigenous Pentecostal groups such as the Redeemed Christian Church of God, the Deeper Life Bible Church, and the Mountain of Fire and Miracles Church. Then there are Pentecostal groups and organizations that have established branches in Nigeria but have their headquarters situated in the West or elsewhere outside Nigeria. These include the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, the Full Gospel Businessmen Fellowship International, Youth with a Mission, and Christ for all Nations. The former are largely independent and hardly rely on any external assistance, some even embarking on mission activities by planting branches in the United States, Canada, Europe, and other parts of the world. Many groups in the latter category rely heavily on their mission headquarters for funds, literature, and sometimes personnel.

One underlying feature of the Pentecostal churches is the emphasis on a specific conversion experience, spiritual rebirth (“born againism”), and the manifestation of charismatic gifts such as speaking in tongues (glossolalia), healing, and prophecy. Some are more or less holiness movements, more interested in religious experience than in rituals. Some are noted for the prosperity gospel they preach, which has become very popular among Nigerians. The gospel of prosperity teaches that God is a rich God and intends his followers to prosper in all their endeavors in life. It promises a miraculous escape from poverty, unemployment, ill health, lack of promotion, poor examinations, and the like, offering a “short-cut” to riches by tithing and giving to the poor and less privileged. Some of these groups have assimilated some ideas and features originating in American Pentecostalism. On the other hand, their commitment to the gospel of prosperity fits in well with values of the Nigerian indigenous culture, where elaborate religious rituals are engaged to ensure prosperity, health, and protection from malevolent forces. That is why Christian groups such as the Pentecostal churches, the Aladura, and prophetic churches that seek to address day-to-day, existential problems have continued to expand in contemporary Nigeria.

One difference between the prophetic and Pentecostal groups is that many founders of the prophetic churches were semiliterate; their counterparts in the Pentecostal churches were in most cases university graduates and had worked in nonreligious professions. For instance, William Kumuyi, who founded the Deeper Life Bible Church in 1973, was a lecturer in mathematics at the University of Lagos. Chris Okotie, who founded the Household of God Fellowship in 1987, was a lawyer. Dr. David Oyedepo, the founder and bishop of the Winners Chapel (1983), was originally an architect by profession. The Christ Chapel Church (aka Voice of Faith Ministries) was founded in 1980 by a medical doctor, Tunde Joda. Following their callings, these founders have abandoned their erstwhile professions to undertake full-time church ministry. These churches are very appealing to youths, graduates, and professionals. The Pentecostal churches also emphasize in-depth study of the Bible through theological training, Bible courses, camp meetings, seminars, revivals, and retreats.

The Spiritual Science movements are an extremely heterogeneous collection of groups and organizations. One distinguishing feature of these movements is their quest for spiritual knowledge and power, higher states of consciousness and direct religious experience, as

Nigeria

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	22,694,000	72,302,000	45.7	2.58	99,194,000	139,000,000
Independents	3,076,000	26,500,000	16.7	2.87	37,000,000	52,000,000
Protestants	3,959,000	23,800,000	15.0	3.81	32,000,000	45,000,000
Anglicans	2,941,000	21,500,000	13.6	2.31	30,000,000	42,000,000
Muslims	23,057,000	72,306,000	45.7	2.58	99,200,000	139,000,000
Ethnoreligionists	7,870,000	13,160,000	8.3	1.99	10,800,000	9,143,000
Agnostics	100,000	420,000	0.3	2.43	700,000	1,100,000
Atheists	20,000	50,000	0.0	2.52	100,000	200,000
Baha'is	11,400	36,500	0.0	3.57	80,000	160,000
New religionists	11,100	24,000	0.0	2.53	32,000	48,000
Buddhists	500	8,500	0.0	2.53	15,000	30,000
Chinese folk	0	4,600	0.0	2.53	7,000	14,000
Jews	0	1,100	0.0	2.54	1,200	1,300
Total population	53,764,000	158,313,000	100.0	2.53	210,129,000	288,696,000

well as the use of procedures, techniques, and practices that draw upon hidden or concealed forces in order to manipulate the course of events. Some of them are very eclectic in nature, drawing upon Western Esotericism, Eastern spirituality, and indigenous traditions. Groups primarily drawing on Western esoteric traditions are the Ancient Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), the Aetherius Society, the General Church of the New Jerusalem, the Institute of Religious Science, and the Superet Light Mission. The largest Rosicrucian body internationally, AMORC has become quite popular in Nigeria, with headquarters in Lagos and branches in several parts of the country. AMORC does not claim to be a religion but describes itself as a “mystical philosophy,” a “worldwide cultural fraternity,” and an age-old brotherhood of learning. One of its main aims is to help people to discover their secret powers of inner vision and cosmic consciousness and to develop their psychic power of attraction.

The Eastern-related Spiritual Science movements include the ECKANKAR or Secret Science of Soul Travel, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the Unification movement, the Subud Brotherhood, the Grail movement, the Baha'i Faith, and Soka Gakkai International, a Japanese religion that has branches in Lagos and Zaria. The ECKANKAR Society of Nigeria, with headquarters in Lagos, began in 1973 in Benin City. In 1981 it began an extensive campaign to launch the movement in the country. It has more than 70 branches scattered all over Nigeria. The Unification Church was registered in Lagos in 1980, and although it has existed in Nigeria for some years, it has not had much success.

A typical example of an indigenous Spiritual Science movement in Nigeria is the Sat Guru Maharaj (the “Perfect Master”), which combines Sat Mat and Hinduism with elements of Christianity and Islam. The headquarters of the group is situated at the Ibadan end of the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway. Members of this group are easily identified by their red, flowing gowns and a distinct haircut. Although the presence and activities of the various Spiritual Science movements do not rival Christian and Islamic movements, the religious map of Nigeria would be incomplete without taking notice of their presence.

Afe Adogame

See also: African Instituted (Independent) Churches; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Aladura Churches; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Baha'i Faith; Candomblé; Celestial Church of Christ; Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim; Christ Apostolic Church; Church Missionary Society; Church of the Lord;

Deeper Life Bible Church; ECKANKAR; Ethno-religions; Evangelical Church of West Africa; General Church of the New Jerusalem; Grail Movement, The; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Malikite School of Islam; Organization of African Instituted Churches; Pentecostalism; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Religious Science; Roman Catholic Church; Santeria; Soka Gakkai International; Subud; Sufism; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; Unification Movement; Western Esoteric Tradition; Yoruban Religion.

References

- Falola, T. Culture and Customs of Nigeria. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Hackett, R. I. J., ed. New Religious Movements in Nigeria. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1987.
- Isichei, E. A History of Nigeria. London: Longman, 1983.
- Kalu, O. U. Christianity in West Africa: The Nigerian Story. Ibadan, Nigeria: Daystar, 1978.
- Olupona J. K., and T. Falola, eds. Religion and Society in Nigeria—Historical and Sociological Perspectives. Ibadan: Spectrum Books, 1991.

Nigerian Baptist Convention

Nigeria was one of the early mission fields selected by the newly formed (1845) Southern Baptist Convention. Thomas Jefferson Bowen arrived in 1850 as the Convention representative and settled at Badagry in the southwestern part of the country. The work progressed slowly, due in part to the American Civil War, during which funds were cut off. However, after 1874 the work began to make some progress. In 1888 the mission experienced a schism when some 200 members left to form the Native Baptist Church (not to be confused with the church of the same name in Cameroon), one of the first of what are now referred to as African Initiated Churches.

Because of the schism, the mission increased its efforts, and the Native Baptist Church also adopted a vigorous evangelistic stand. Both groups had grown by the time they reunited in 1914 as the Yoruba Baptist Association. Five years later the Yoruba Association became the Nigerian Baptist Convention. Over the next 20 years, the membership grew from approximately 3,000 to more than 21,000, more members coming from the Yoruba people. However, the work also began to expand into the rest of Nigeria, including the northern part of the country controlled by Muslims. In the 1930s a new rule against polygamy led to a schism among members in Oyo state, who established the United African Baptist Church.

During the last half of the 20th century, the Convention experienced significant growth and by the mid-1990s reported 600,000 members in 4,656 churches. During the last quarter of the century, the number of missionary personnel also dropped significantly, indicative of the Convention's continued progress at recruiting indigenous leadership.

The Convention has developed a major center of activity at Ogbomosho that includes a theological seminary, a medical center, a nursing school, a children's home, and a media center. Other similar institutions are found across the country. Literature is now published in English, Hausa, and Yoruban, with worship services being carried out in more than a dozen additional languages. The Convention, after the pattern of the Southern Baptists, has encouraged the development of a Women's Missionary Union, which has emerged in spite of the secondary role generally assigned women in traditional Nigerian society. The Union carries out a variety of evangelistic and social programs, from teaching literacy to assisting mothers in homemaking and child care.

The Convention has developed its own foreign mission program in Sierra Leone and Cote d'Ivoire. It is a member of the Christian Council of Nigeria, the Baptist World Alliance, and the World Council of Churches. In 2005, the convention reported 3 million members worshipping in its 8,500 congregations.

Nigerian Baptist Convention
The Baptist Building
P.M.B. 5113
Ibadan, Oyo State
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Baptist World Alliance; Southern Baptist Convention; World Council of Churches.

References

- Ademola, Ajayi S. “The American Civil War of 1861–1865: A Major Challenge to the Survival of Early Baptists’ Ventures in Nigeria.” Baptist History and Heritage (2008). <http://www.thefreelibrary.com/The+American+Civil+War+of+1861-1865:+a+major+challenge+to+the...-a0184132777>. Accessed December 15, 2008.
- Cillins, Travis. The Baptist Mission of Nigeria, 1850–1993. Ibadan, Nigeria: Associated Book-Makers Nigeria Limited, 1993.
- Duval, Louis M. Baptist Missions in Nigeria. Richmond: FMB, Southern Baptist Convention, 1928.
- High, T. O. Outline Notes on the Expansion of Baptist Work in Nigeria, 1850–1939. Ibadan: Caxton Press, Ltd., 1970.
- Okedara, J. T., and S. Ademola Ajayi. Thomas Jefferson Bowen: Pioneer Baptist Missionary to Nigeria, 1850–1856. Ibadan: John Archers, 2004.
- Whirley, Carlton F. The Baptists of Nigeria: A Story to Tell. Nashville: Convention Press, 1988.

Nipponzan Myohoji

Nipponzan Myohoji is a Japanese Buddhist organization in the tradition of Nichiren (1222–1282) that maintains a conspicuous presence in the contemporary peace movement despite its small membership of approximately 150 celibate monks and nuns (predominantly Japanese) and 1,500 lay followers. Its beliefs and practices have been determined by the life and career of its founder, Fujii Nichidatsu (1885–1985).

Fujii was ordained a Nichiren priest at the age of 19 and graduated from Nichiren University at 23. In 1916, while fasting, praying, and performing austerities in a waterfall, he had a vision that would prove decisive: Jyogyo Bodhisattva appeared to him carrying the child Buddha on his back and beating a hand drum. Thereupon Fujii vowed to unify all people according to the teachings of the Lotus Sutra by instituting the practice of gyakku-senryo, beating a fan-shaped hand drum while chanting “namu myo ho ren ge kyo,” the sutra’s title. This and periodic fasting continue to be prominent aspects of Nipponzan Myohoji practice.

Fujii went to Manchuria and established Nipponzan Myohoji temples in each of its districts, the first in 1918. These temples served as bases for proselytization and catered to the spiritual needs of the expatriate Japanese community. The first Nipponzan Myohoji temple in Japan was established in 1924 at the foot of Mount Fuji in Tagonoura. In 1930 Fujii vowed to realize Nichiren’s prophecy that Japanese Buddhism would return to India (saiten kaikyo). He arrived in India in 1931 and established temples in Bombay (1932) and Calcutta (1935). While in Ceylon he received Buddha relics that would be an integral part of his teaching thereafter. In 1933 he met Mahatma Gandhi and was impressed by his teachings of equality and nonviolence.

Despite Fujii’s claims that he was opposed to World War II, the evidence suggests that Nipponzan Myohoji activities were conducted in full accord with national policy. Fujii supported Japanese expansion as the bringing of (Buddhist) “civilization” to the Asian continent. The role of Nipponzan Myohoji clergy before and during the war was closely connected to the military—clergy members conducted prayer services for victory, remembered war victims, and spiritually purified military and political leaders.

With the Japanese defeat in 1945, Fujii began to advocate absolute pacifism, and Nipponzan Myohoji became the first Japanese Buddhist group to campaign actively for peace. Fujii’s teachings strongly denounced modern materialistic culture, and he identified the United States as the foremost embodiment and proponent of the values of materialism. The group first gained international notoriety when its yellow-robed, head-shaven monks and nuns protested nuclear and hydrogen bomb testing after Japanese fishermen were exposed to radiation off Bikini atoll in 1952, and it continues to campaign for a total ban on such weapons. Group members have also consistently opposed the presence of U.S. military bases in Japan, the most famous incident being in 1954 at the U.S. air base in Sunagawa, where protesting monks were attacked and seriously wounded by police. Nipponzan Myohoji was also prominent in demonstrations of opposition to the Vietnam War.

Nipponzan Myohoji peace pagoda in Milton Keynes, England. Built in 1980, it was the first peace pagoda established in the Western Hemisphere. (iStockPhoto.com)

Walking is considered a spiritual discipline by Nipponzan Myohoji, and its members engage regularly in peace walks, some for up to a year, throughout Japan and the world. Their other main form of practice is the building of “peace pagodas”—stupas containing Buddha relics—as symbols of peace. Fujii initiated the building of the first pagoda in Japan immediately after the war in 1945. There are now many more worldwide, some of which maintain small communities. They do not proselytize. In the United States, the group has forged special ties with Native American communities. They also have ties with the Sarvodaya Shramadana movement based in Sri Lanka.

Nipponzan Myohoji has no head temple and there is no spiritual successor to Fujii. Administrative leaders are chosen from among senior members and are appointed for three-year terms.

Nipponzan Myohoji, Tokyo Office
8-7 Shinsen-cho

Shibuya-ku, Tokyo-to 150-0045
Japan

Nipponzan Myohoji, Osaka Office
1-3-11 Minami-Senba
Chuo-ku

Osaka-shi, Osaka-fu 542-0081
Japan

<http://www.peacepagoda.org> (Nipponan Myohoji Sangha at Leverett, Massachusetts)

John S. LoBreglio

See also: Nichiren; Relics.

References

- Fujii. Buddhism for World Peace: Words of Nichidatsu Fujii. Trans. by Miyasuku Yumiko. Tokyo: Japan-Bharat Sarvodaya Mitrata Sangha, 1980.
- Fujii. My Non Violence: An Autobiography of a Buddhist. Trans. by Yamaori Tetsuo. Tokyo: Japan Buddha Sangha Press, 1975.

- Green, Paula. "Walking for Peace: Nipponzan Myohoji." In Engaged Buddhism in the West, edited by Christopher S. Queen, 128–156. Somerville, MA: Wisdom Publications, 2000.
- Kisala, Robert. Prophets of Peace: Pacifism and Cultural Identity in Japan's New Religions. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.

■ Niue

Niue is an autonomous island state in the South Pacific, between Tonga and the Cook Islands, which has strong ties to New Zealand. Its original inhabitants had a unique Polynesian dialect that led to its separation from its closest neighbors in the eyes of Europeans in the 19th century. Only 100 square miles in size, it has steadily lost population over the last generation (from 5,200 in the mid 1960s to some 1,500 in 2008). Many left for New Zealand.

Niue was originally settled in the prehistoric past by Samoans and Tongans. It was first visited by Europeans in 1774 when James Cook (1728–1779) arrived. The British established their hegemony in the 19th century and incorporated Niue into a protectorate jointly with the Cook Islands in 1900. Four years later Niue was separated from the Cook Island administration. It attained autonomy in 1974 as the Aotearoan Association Territory. It has an independent local government, with New Zealand continuing to handle its defense and foreign affairs.

The first effort to establish Christian missionary work on the island was in 1830. Unfortunately, the work of John Williams (1796–1839) of the London Missionary Society (LMS) was unsuccessful, as were periodic attempts over the next 15 years. Finally, in 1846 a Niuean who had attended a school sponsored by the LMS on Samoa returned home. Three years later, a Samoan classmate came to the island, and together they were able to launch a missionary effort. It would not be until 1861 that a European missionary, William George Lawes (1839–1907), settled on the island. Lawes stayed for seven years and was succeeded by his brother, Frank E. Lawes (d. 1910).

Under the Laweses and their successors, the mission developed strong ties to the Congregational Union of New Zealand, as some 15,000 Niueans reside in New Zealand. The church attained independence in 1966 as the Ekalesia Niue. It is by far the largest religious body on the island and a member of both the Council for World Mission and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The dominance of the Ekalesia Niue has been challenged by the Seventh-day Adventist Church, whose Tonga-Niue Mission was started in 1895; the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which began work in 1952; and the Jehovah's Witnesses, who arrived in 1960. There is also a small Anglican presence, part of the Diocese of Polynesia of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia, serving mostly British and New Zealand expatriates.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Ekalesia Niue; Jehovah's Wit-

Niue

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,000	1,500	97.0	–2.86	1,200	1,300
Protestants	3,700	900	60.0	–2.91	750	750
Marginals	500	380	25.3	0.57	400	500
Roman Catholics	220	150	10.0	0.00	150	150
Agnostics	0	30	2.0	4.36	40	60
Baha'is	10	10	0.7	–1.89	10	10
Chinese folk	0	10	0.3	–5.59	10	20
Total population	5,000	1,500	100.0	–2.76	1,300	1,400

nesses; London Missionary Society; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

References

Britsch, R. Lanier. Unto the Islands of the Sea: A History of the Latter-day Saints in the Pacific. Salt Lake City: Deseret Books, 1986.

Chapman, T. M., et al. Niue: A History of the Island. Suva, Fiji: Institute of Pacific Studies of the University of the South Pacific and the Government of Niue, 1982.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Loeb, E. M. History and Traditions of Niue. 1926; rpt.: New York: Kraus Reprint, 1978.

Nomiya Luo Church

The first African Initiated Churches (AICs) to emerge in Kenya were churches that began among Luo Anglicans around Lake Victoria in the Province of Nyanza, an area administered at the time by the Church Missionary Society in the Diocese of Uganda. One of the earliest AICs was the Nomiya Luo Mission, founded by a former Catholic, Johana Owalo (d. 1920), in 1914 and emerging as a deliberate and consciously syncretistic movement combining elements of Unitarian Christianity, Islam, Judaism, and Luo traditional religion in reaction against both Catholic and Protestant forms of Christianity.

The angel Gabriel appeared to Owalo in 1907 and told him to preach that people should worship God only, not Jesus or Mary. In a vision of heaven, he was told to circumcise his male followers (contrary to Luo custom), teach people to obey the laws of Moses and keep the seventh-day Sabbath, and baptize them in rivers. Owalo died suddenly in 1920, and the church was plagued with division over who should succeed him as leader. Eventually Petro Ouma became bishop, to be followed after his death by Benjamin Oundo. By 1944 the movement had spread to Luo living in Tanganyika and had more than 50,000 members in Kenya by 1966.

In 1960 the Holy Spirit descended on several Nomiya people who began speaking in tongues, prophesying, revealing sins, and jumping in ecstasy. A former Catholic, Jaote Pesa, began preaching and healing, claiming to be the successor to Owalo, and in 1967 the supporters of this Holy Spirit movement were expelled from the church. They formed a new church called the Nomiya Luo Roho (Spirit) Church under Bishop Zablon Ndiege, who has been archbishop since 1978. This church has suffered several schisms: Jaote Pesa started the Holy Ghost Coptic Church, and Cornell Bunde began the Nomiya Luo Roho Gospellers Church. The Nomiya Roho Sabbath Church started in 1974 out of a desire to return to the Sabbath observance that had been abandoned by the Nomiya Luo Roho Church.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Church Missionary Society; Islam; Judaism.

References

- Clark, Debbie. "History of Nomiya Luo Roho Church." Unpublished paper, 1984. Harold Turner Collection. University of Birmingham, UK.
- Hoehler-Fatton, Cynthia. Women of Fire and Spirit: History, Faith and Gender in Roho Religion in Western Kenya. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

■ Northern Marianas

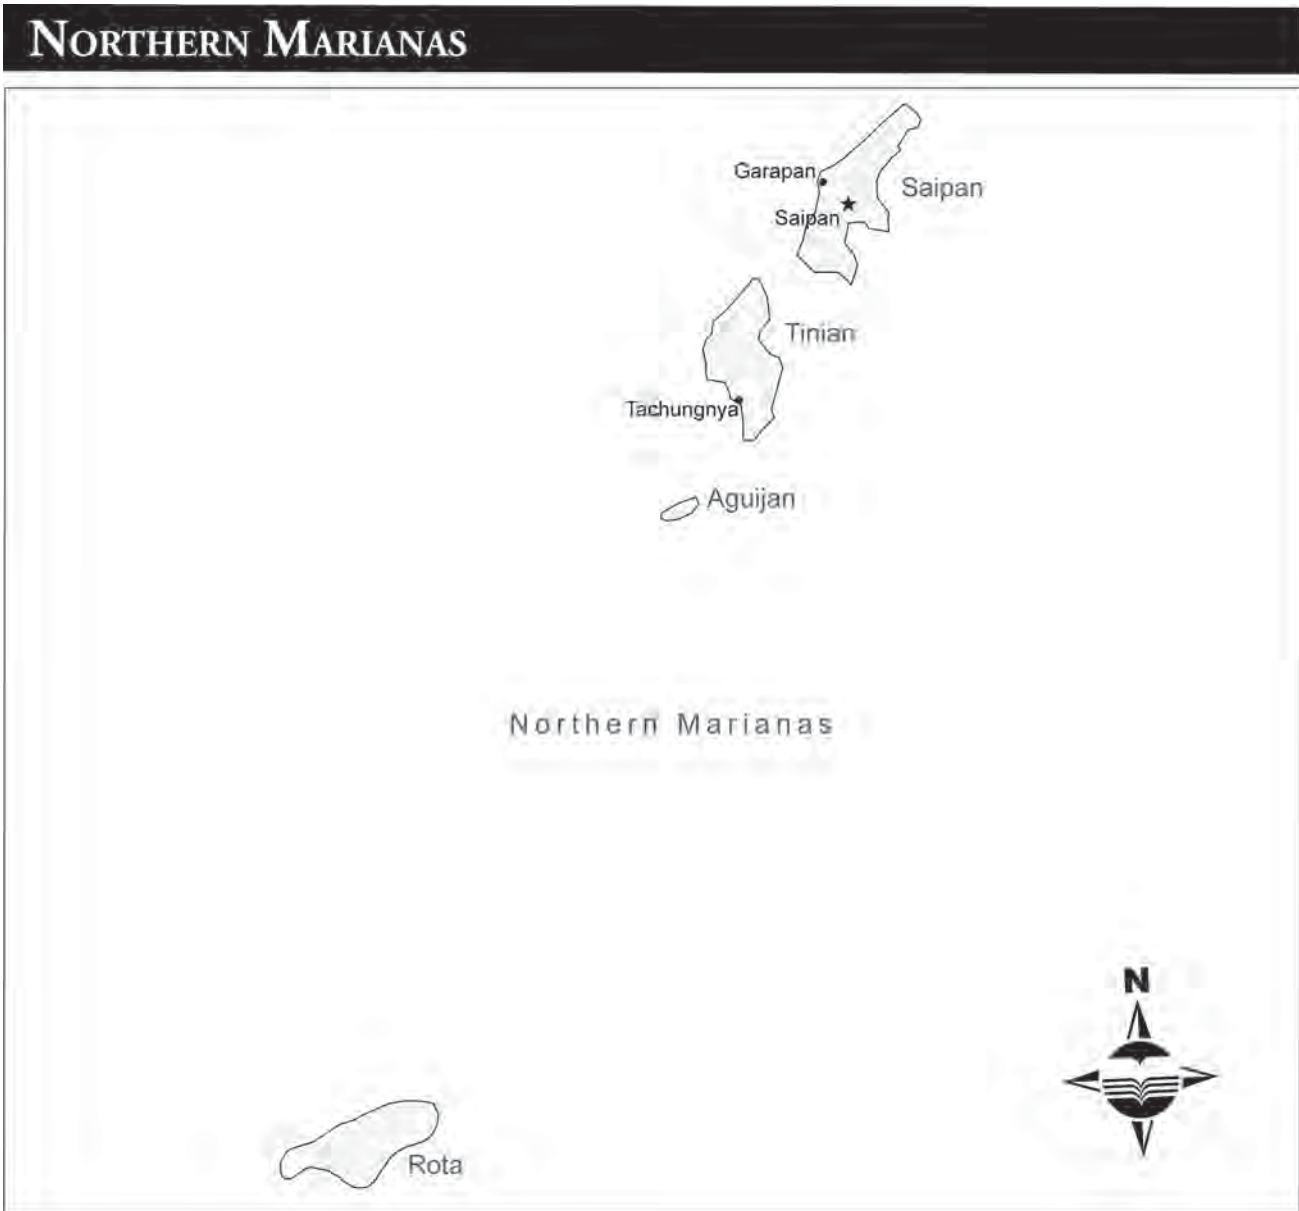

The Northern Marianas are a chain of islands in an area of the Pacific Ocean generally designated Micronesia. The several islands together have 177 square miles of land which is home to some 87,000 people (2008).

Prior to World War II, the islands shared much of their history with Guam and the Federated States of Micronesia. They were claimed for Spain in 1521 by Ferdinand Magellan (ca. 1480–1521). They were given their name in 1668 by Father Luis Diego Sanvitores (1627–1672) to honor the Austrian princess Maria Ana (1634–1696), then the regent of Spain.

The islands had originally been settled by the Chamorros people, possibly as early as 1500 BCE. They resisted the Spanish occupation that began in the mid-17th century and carried on a 20-year revolt that was finally quelled in the late 1680s. The indigenous population was greatly affected by the influx of Spanish culture, especially as it was reinforced by a growing number of Filipinos who came to the islands along the trade route that Spanish traders had established. The development of a new breed of Chamorros from the intermarriage of the Native people with the Spanish and Filipinos was accelerated by the relocation of many of the Marianas people to Guam in the 18th century. They were not allowed to return until after 1885.

Germany claimed the islands in 1885 but did not receive official control until Spain sold them in 1899, following the loss of its other Pacific territories to the United States in the Spanish-American War. Germany moved government administrators in early in the new century. The islands were lost to Japan as World War II began, and as the United States moved to end the war it fought fierce battles to take the islands, especially Saipan and Tinian. Tinian became the base from which the atomic bombs were dropped on Japan in 1945.

The Marianas were given to the United States as a trust following World War II. In a 1975 referendum they were separated from Guam (the southernmost island) and from the rest of Micronesia as a free associated state with a special continuing relationship to the United States. In 1986 the islands gained commonwealth status with the United States, and the citizens of the Marianas are now considered U.S. citizens (though without the right of voting in federal elections). The president of the United States is the official head of state, but there is a locally elected government that resembles a U.S. state government.

The Marianas have radically changed since 1970. The population has grown from approximately 10,000 to more than 85,000. Many of the newer residents are expatriates from Korea, China, and the Philippines.

The Roman Catholic Church initiated work in the Marianas in 1668, when six Jesuit priests, including Father Sanvitores, launched a mission. They had little success until after the local revolt was quelled in the 1680s. With the influx of Filipinos in the 18th century and intermarriage of the Spanish colonists with the local population, a very different indigenous culture developed and a unique form of Spanish Catholicism emerged, which is now practiced by the majority of the population. The church's parishes are included in the Diocese of Agaña (Guam).

Northern Marianas

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	12,700	71,900	81.2	3.04	88,700	120,000
Roman Catholics	11,400	71,300	80.6	2.31	84,500	108,000
Protestants	1,100	7,500	8.5	1.36	10,200	15,000
Independents	0	9,100	10.3	6.22	12,500	17,800
Buddhists	0	9,400	10.6	3.07	11,800	16,100
Chinese folk	20	4,300	4.9	3.07	5,400	7,400
Agnostics	0	900	1.0	5.65	2,000	3,500
Muslims	0	610	0.7	3.09	800	1,100
New religionists	0	600	0.7	3.07	900	1,400
Baha'is	40	430	0.5	3.06	800	1,200
Ethnoreligionists	200	310	0.4	3.04	400	450
Confucianists	0	110	0.1	3.06	200	300
Atheists	0	20	0.0	3.13	50	100
Total population	13,000	88,500	100.0	3.07	111,000	152,000

Protestants appear to have begun work in the Marianas only after World War II. In 1947 the General Baptist Foreign Missionary Agency sent a couple to Saipan to launch a mission that has grown into the Saipan Baptist Mission and now the Marianas Association of General Baptists. More recently the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the Assemblies of God have initiated work on the islands.

Work by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints began in the 1970s on Saipan but was then withdrawn. Restarted in 1975, it subsequently spread to Rota (1982) and Tinian (1986). It is attached to the Micronesia Guam Mission. There is also a small Baha'i Faith community in the Marianas.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Driver, Marjorie J. Fray Juan Pobre de Zamora and His Account of the Mariana Islands. Mangilao, Guam: Micronesian Area Research Center, University of Guam, 1984.
- Farrell, D. A. History of the Northern Mariana Islands. Saipan: Public School System/ Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, 1991.

Flood, Bo. Marianas Island Legends, Myth and Magic. Honolulu: Bess Press, 2001.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

■ Norway

Norway, the country along the westernmost edge of the Scandinavian Peninsula, shares a large peninsula with Sweden. It includes some 125,000 square miles of land area. Much of the country is surrounded by water and an estimated 50,000 islands huddle along the irregular edge of the mainland. The coastline, one of the longest in the world, reaches from the North Sea to the Norwegian Sea to the Arctic Ocean. Though a number of Norwegian towns are located within the Arctic Circle, the great majority of its 4,650,000 people reside in the most southern part of the country.

Norway appears to have been inhabited for some 10,000 years by the Germanic tribes that moved into the area following the retreat of the last Ice Age. Sense of nationality arose around 800 CE with the emergence of the Vikings, the seagoing people whose home base was Norway. Harald Harfagre (ca. 865–933) is considered the father of the nation. He consolidated power in the 890s following a battle at Hafsrjorf, near Stavanger, and brought much of modern Norway into a single political entity. As the Viking kingdom expanded, explorers crossed the Atlantic to Greenland and even North America.

At the height of the Norwegian expansion, during the reign of Haakon IV (1204–1263), the kingdom included Iceland, Greenland, the Scottish Islands, and the Faeroe Islands. The Black Death killed close to half of all Norwegians, hitting the upper classes especially hard. The Norwegian kingdom subsequently fell apart. In 1397 Norway was brought into a united Scandinavia and remained a province of Denmark for the next four centuries. At the close of the Napoleonic era in 1814, Denmark surrendered Norway to Sweden. Norway spent much of the 19th century in a struggle to free itself. In 1884 a constitutional monarchy was adopted, and in 1905 Norway gained its independence and crowned Prince Carl of Denmark as King Haakon VII (1872–1957). Norway has remained a sovereign power ever since. It was overrun by Germany during World War II, and Haakon ran a government in exile from England. Christianity was introduced into Norway in the 10th century by a Roman Catholic representative of the archbishop of Bremen/Hamburg in Germany. The spread of Christianity was greatly aided by several Christian kings, especially Haakon the Good (d. ca. 961), who had been educated in England. A certain resentment toward the church developed as the bishops assigned to administer the church, who were residing in Denmark, proved a significant force blocking Norway's attempt to free itself from Danish control. In 1523 the Norwegian administrative council acted to obtain independence. The Catholic bishops blocked the council's attempt to obtain Swedish support. Eventually, in 1536, the council was abolished. The Protestant Reformation gained control in Denmark the following year, and Norway quickly accepted the reorganization of the church along Lutheran lines and the dismissal of the Catholic bishops.

In 1937 the Church of Norway was established, with the king of Denmark and Norway at the head. The church, which was established on the basis of the Lutheran (Augsburg) Confession, was a rather staid institution, largely isolated from the various renewal and Pietist movements that so affected the life of Lutheranism in Germany. The first renewal of significance appeared in the early 19th century under the leadership of Hans Nielsen Hauge (1771–1824). He organized Pietist religious societies across the country that protested an emphasis upon liturgical worship and a rational orthodox theology. Other movements appeared periodically through the 19th century, some emphasizing enthusiasm for foreign missions.

St. Mary's Church (Mariakirken), a Lutheran church in Bergen, Norway. (iStockPhoto.com)

The Church of Norway remains the dominant force in Norwegian life. The relatively high church membership, however, is contrasted with a very low church attendance. The Lutheran Church was established as the state religion, and the king and the majority of his cabinet were required to be professed members. The strong ties between church and state continue, but reforms through the 20th century gave the church more autonomy.

In the mid-19th century, free churches began to challenge the exclusive hegemony of the Church of Norway over the religious life of the citizenry. Possibly the first to appear were the Baptists. Danish sailor

NORWAY

Frederick Ludvig Rymker began to preach in Norway in 1857 and founded several Baptist churches. By 1877, when the Norwegian Baptist Union was formed, churches had been founded in all parts of the country, though their actual membership was relatively small.

Methodism in Norway began in 1849 when Ole Peter Petersen (1822–1901), a sailor converted by Methodists in New York, returned to his hometown and began to share his new faith. A revival spread and Petersen began to preach. In 1850 he returned to the United States, pursued studies for the ministry, and was ordained. He returned to Norway in 1853. In 1856, Christian Willerup was sent from New York to superintend the work in Norway, and he eventually extended his work across Scandinavia. The first congregation was formally organized soon after Willerup arrived, and the annual conference met first in 1876. The church in Norway was founded as an extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church and has, through several mergers, become an integral part of the United Methodist Church.

Two revival movements in the Lutheran Church led to new Free church bodies that more closely adhered to the core of Lutheran doctrine, the Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway (1877) and the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden (1984). The latter church is related to the Covenant Church movement in Sweden that had roots in Methodist Pietism.

The Salvation Army entered Norway in 1888. Although most know it as a social service agency, the army is also a Holiness church, and in Norway it had spectacular success in attracting members. By the middle of the 20th century, it was by far the largest of the several bodies in the country, with almost 100,000 members.

Pentecostalism came to Norway in 1906, when Thomas Ball Barratt (1862–1940), a Methodist minister who had received the baptism of the Holy Spirit and converted to the Pentecostal position while visiting New York, returned home to Oslo and began to preach about his experience. As a result of his preaching, he was forced to withdraw from the Methodist Church. The growth of Pentecostalism in Norway led to the founding of the Norwegian Pentecostal Assemblies, which is now second only to the Salvation Army in size. Pentecostalism has also been strengthened by the addition of British missionaries with the Apostolic Church and American missionaries with the Apostolic Faith Mission.

There is an active Christian ecumenical movement in Norway. More liberal Protestant churches that are members of the World Council of Churches are associated together in the Christian Council of Norway. More conservative churches are members of the Evangelical Alliance in Norway and affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. A number of evangelical churches are indigenous to Norway, most founded by former members of the Church of Norway, including the Maranatha Revival Church, the Congregation of God at Vegardshei, and the Free Pentecostal Friends.

The Roman Catholic Church was allowed to reestablish itself in the early 19th century, and the first new parish was opened in 1842. The church experienced slow growth, there still being a great deal of anti-Catholic prejudice in the 19th century. A vicariate was erected in Oslo in 1931 and a diocese in 1953. The national episcopal conference includes the diocese and the two territorial prelatures of Trondheim and Tromsø.

As in most other Western European countries, 20th-century Norway saw the development of a pluralistic religious culture that now includes the broad spectrum of the world's religions—from the Church of Scientology to Tibetan Buddhism. The variety of organizations serving primarily expatriate communities include the Greek Orthodox Church and the Sikh community. The Jewish community, dating to the mid-19th century, consists of approximately 2,000 people, most residing in Oslo and Trondheim.

There is a relatively new Muslim community, originally centered on the Muslim Union of Oslo. It grew steadily through the last decade of the 20th century into the first decade of the new century, with a second site of concentration in Akershus. By 2005, the total community had grown to more than 100,000, most with origins in Pakistan. Most Muslims are of the Hanafite School of Sunni Islam, and many of their mosques have associated together in the Islamsk Råd Norge (Islamic Council Norway).

A variety of new Buddhist and Hindu groups, most seeking membership from young adults, including the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, have come to Norway since World War II, though most have only one or two centers. Esotericism is

Norway

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	3,829,000	4,370,000	91.4	0.22	4,583,000	4,911,000
Protestants	3,924,000	4,164,000	87.1	0.10	4,302,000	4,527,000
Roman Catholics	10,100	61,000	1.3	1.91	95,000	130,000
Independents	20,500	50,000	1.0	1.35	80,000	130,000
Agnostics	30,400	180,000	3.8	6.66	280,000	350,000
Muslims	4,000	150,000	3.1	9.40	250,000	300,000
Atheists	10,000	28,500	0.6	1.45	35,000	42,000
Buddhists	100	36,000	0.8	5.91	50,000	85,000
New religionists	500	7,000	0.1	−0.04	12,000	20,000
Baha'is	1,200	2,800	0.1	1.38	4,500	6,500
Sikhs	0	2,300	0.0	2.43	3,000	3,500
Ethnoreligionists	0	1,300	0.0	0.65	1,600	1,800
Chinese folk	0	1,800	0.0	6.89	2,500	4,000
Jews	900	900	0.0	0.67	900	900
Spiritists	0	540	0.0	0.66	700	900
Total population	3,876,000	4,781,000	100.0	0.66	5,223,000	5,726,000

represented in the Theosophical Society and the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) has been active in Norway since 1850, although many of its 19th-century converts migrated to the United States and the church is not as strong as it could have been. Norway was the home of one of the more interesting LDS splinter groups, the Independent Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which opened headquarters in Oslo and subsequently established congregations in Denmark and the United States.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Apostolic Church; Apostolic Faith Mission; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Evangelical Lutheran Free Church of Norway; Free Churches; Hanafite School of Islam; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; Norwegian Baptist Union; Salvation Army; Theosophical Society (America); United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

The Church of Norway. Hegdehaugen, Norway: Church of Norway Information Service, 1990.

Furseth, Inger. A Comparative Study of Social and Religious Movements in Norway, 1780s–1905. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002.

Hale, Frederick. Norwegian Religious Pluralism: A Trans-Atlantic Comparison. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1992.

Hunter, L. S. Scandinavian Churches: A Picture of the Development and Life of the Churches of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden. London: Faber & Faber, 1965.

Wilson, T. B. History of Church and State in Norway from the Tenth to the Sixteenth Century. Westminster (London): A. Constable & Co., 1903.

Norwegian Baptist Union

Unlike many Baptist fellowships in Europe, those in Norway had American rather than German roots. However, prior to the arrival of any Baptists, Lutheran pastor G. A. Lammers (1802–1878) had built a Baptist-like movement in Norway. Lammers became convinced of the truth of believer's baptism (as opposed to infant baptism, then the standard practice in the state-sponsored Church of Norway), and in 1856 he left the state church. Lammers and his fellow believers formed an Apostolic Free Church, congregations of which began to appear in various locations through the mid-19th century. As it grew, the movement split over the necessity of rebaptizing people who had been baptized as infants.

In 1857 Frederick Ludwig Rymler, a Norwegian who had been converted to the Baptist faith in the United States, returned to Norway and settled in Porsgrunn. Finding some initial support from those previously affiliated with Lammers's movement, Rymler organized the first Baptist church in Norway in 1860. The first association of churches was organized in 1872, and a Norwegian Baptist conference, including 14 congregations, was established in 1877. The Norwegian church was greatly assisted by Swedish Baptists.

The Norwegian Baptists had a steady membership gain through the early 20th century, in spite of losses to the Pentecostal movement. In 1910 they were able to open a theological school (superseded after World War II by a new seminary in Oslo). In 1963, in order finally to obtain government recognition, they adopted a confession of faith, thereby fulfilling one of the government's requirements. The church, a conservative body, has also issued a separate statement on the Bible as "God's inspired word." Membership peaked in the 1940 at around 7,500 and has since declined.

In the 19th century, the Norwegian Baptist Union supported missionaries through the American Missionary Baptist Union. It formed its own missionary organization in 1915 and commissioned its first missionary, Bernard Aalbu, in 1918. Aalbu began work in the Congo (Zaire) in 1920. More recently, the Union has tried to open work in Nepal. For many years it has worked with other Scandinavian Baptist churches in support of a Seaman's Mission in San Francisco, California.

In 2008 the Norwegian Baptist Union reported some 5,430 members in 78 churches. It is a member of the Baptist World Alliance. In the changed atmosphere of Norwegian religious life in the last generation, the church has moved from a position of hostility in relation to the Church of Norway to one of dialogue and cooperation.

Norwegian Baptist Union
Michelets vet 62

N-1320 Stabekk
Norway

<http://www.baptist.no/> (in Norwegian)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Baptists.

References

- McBeth, H. Leon. The Baptist Heritage: Four Centuries of the Baptist Witness. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1987.
- Rushbrooke, J. H. The Baptist Movement in the Continent of Europe. London: Kingsgate Press, 1923.
- Stiansen, P. History of the Baptists in Norway. Chicago: Blessing Press, 1933.
- Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1958.

Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism

Nyingma (Tibetan: rNying ma), which literally means "old," is the earliest tradition of Tibetan Buddhism. It is not a tightly structured institution, but a variety of traditions encompassing monastic practice, householder yogi lineages, and other diverse forms of Buddhist practice. Historically, the Nyingma tradition declined in significance in Tibet as its political importance was eclipsed by other schools, particularly the Gelugpa (Tibetan: dGe lugs pa). However, it has retained a number of significant monastic centers including Mindroling and Samye in central Tibet, others in eastern Tibet, and has a strong presence at village level. The advent of the Tibetan diaspora since the late 1950s has also witnessed the development of Nyingma monasteries in India and Nepal and Nyingma-affiliated Dharma centers in most countries in the West. Changes to Tibetan political and religious life that accompanied the development of the diaspora and the formation of the Tibetan government-in-exile made it desirable for the Nyingma to appoint a single "head," a nontraditional position that has now been filled by a number of notable lamas.

The teachings and practices of Nyingma are said to represent those brought from India during the period of the early spread of Buddhism in Tibet. Although this tradition may have commenced as early as the seventh century, it is thought to have gained real momentum during the reign of King Trisong Detsen (Tibetan: Khri srong lDe brtsan) (ca. 740–798 CE). Tradition has it that this king invited the noted monk and abbot of Nalanda monastery, Santaraksita, to travel to Tibet and found the country’s first Buddhist monastery, Samye (Tibetan: bSam yas). According to legend, the new religion was vigorously opposed by various autochthonous spirits and deities, who by night would pull down the walls of Samye that had been built during the day. In turn, Santaraksita called upon the renowned Indian tantric master Padmasambhava (Lotus Born) (eighth century) to subjugate the opposition.

Established in 1676, Mindroling Monastery in central Tibet is one of the centers of Nyingma Buddhism. (Ethel Davies/StockphotoPro)

Padmasambhava, also known as Guru Rinpoche, the “Precious Guru,” is venerated in Tibet as highly as the historical Buddha himself. Guru Rinpoche inspired the translation of many Buddhist texts into Tibetan and hid many texts and blessed objects (Tibetan: gter-ma, pronounced “terma,” meaning treasure), with the intention that they would be thus protected and then re-discovered at an appropriate time. Terma are of great importance within the Nyingma tradition. Although texts and sacred objects had been concealed in pre-Buddhist Tibet, this practice was strongly emphasized by Padmasambhava and his disciples. Those who discover these hidden terma are called “treasure finders” (Tibetan: gter ston, pronounced “terton”) and are held in high esteem and often identified as reincarnations of Padmasambhava’s disciples and other famous teachers.

The terma are a vital and dynamic part of the Nyingma textual collections. Although the term “Nyingma” indicates an emphasis on old traditions, the promotion of terma texts creates the opportunity for innovation. These texts of mysterious authorship enable new practices to be introduced that are responsive to changing needs. One of the most important terma texts of recent times was the Longchen Nyinthig (Tibetan: rDzogs-pa Chen-po Klong-chen Thig-le, or Klong-chen sNying-thig), the Innermost Spirituality of Longchenpa, which was promulgated by Jigme Lingpa (Tibetan: Jigs med gling pa) (1730–1798). This text, coupled with the teaching legacy of Jigme Lingpa, established the main Dzogchen (Tibetan: rDzogs chen, or Great Completion) teachings in the contemporary period and laid the foundation for the Ris Med, or non-sectarian, movement. Dzogchen teachings emphasize recognizing intrinsic awareness.

The Longchen Nyinthig gave the Ris Med movement an emphasis on yogic self-discipline rather than imposed monastic discipline and emphasized a conception of the enlightened state as pure and open, beyond all logic and conventional description. Jigme Lingpa’s teaching lineage flourished in eastern Tibet around Dege (Tibetan: sDe dge), and after his death three incarnations were recognized as being his emanations. The most famous of these was Jamyang Khyentse Wangpo (Tibetan: ‘Jam dbyangs mKhyen brtse’i dbang po) (1820–1892). Khyentse Wangpo joined with Jamgon Kongtrul (Tibetan: ‘Jam mgon Kong sprul) (1813–1899) in an extensive search across Tibet for rare treasure teachings. This search resulted in the creation of the most valued collection of these materials, the Rin chen gTer mdzod, the Precious Collection of Treasures. This collection is still growing, and was updated by important lamas in the 20th century.

The Nyingma tradition, like that of its pre-Buddhist predecessors, the Bonpos, includes both non-celibate householder (Tibetan: sngags-pa) lamas and monastic communities. The most eminent 20th-century Nyingma lamas, such as Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and other Khyentse incarnations, all carried this important heritage, which emphasizes treasure teachings, the Longchen Nyinthig, and Dzogchen. The most recent head of the Nyingmapa, appointed in 2001, was Minling Trichen Rinpoche (Tibetan: sMin gling Khri chen) (1930–2008). Like so many other greats in this tradition, Minling Trichen was a yogi-householder. His successor is yet to be announced.

The largest Nyingma monastery outside of Tibet is the Palyul Namdroling Monastery (PO Bylakuppe, Distt. Mysore, Karnataka, India 571-104), which was until recently under the direction of the previous head of the Nyingma, Penor Rinpoche (1932–2009). The emphasis in the Nyingma tradition on mystical experience and a deep appreciation of householder life has helped ensure its popularity in the West. Early residents in the West include Dudjom Rinpoche (1904–1987), a former head of the Nyingmapa, Tarthang Tulku (head of the Nyingma Institute, Berkeley, California), Sogyel Rinpoche (head of the Rigpa Fellowship), and Chagdud Tulku (head of the Chagdud Gonpa Foundation), all of whom have founded impressive institutions. There are also less well-known resident lamas and also regular visitors of no fixed address with retreat centers in Western countries, India, and Tibet.

There is also a new generation of Tibetan lamas who were born in the Tibetan diaspora since the 1960s. Among these are Dzongsar Khyentse Rinpoche (b. 1961) (head of the Khyentse Foundation) and Jigme Khyentse Rinpoche (b. 1960). One of the most recent important incarnations is Khyentse Yangsi Rinpoche (b. 1993), recognized as the reincarnation of Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who is being educated in Bhutan.

Some of the Westerners who came into contact with Nyingma lamas since the 1960s have also established a significant presence in the Nyingma tradition. Most notable is Matthieu Ricard (b. 1946), who studied with Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche from 1967 to 1991. He is notable for his photography, translation work, teaching, and the surprising achievement of being dubbed “the happiest man in the world” as a result of his participation in scientific analysis of brain function.

Despite setbacks in the 1960s and 1970s in Tibet, the movement of important lamas and institutions to regions outside of Tibet has created a new and vital diaspora. The Nyingma School has had considerable success both in asserting its presence within this diasporic community and in transmitting its teachings into the broader non-Tibetan environment, thus successfully managing its transition from being an almost exclusively Tibetan religion to one with adherents around the globe. In the process significant inroads have been made into the task of translating its massive scriptural canon.

Diana Cousens and Keith Richmond

See also: Gelugpa; Khyentse Foundation, The; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Padmasambhava; Rigpa Fellowship; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Rinpoche, Dudjom, and Jikdrel Yeshe Dorje. The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, Its Fundamentals and History. 2 vols. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1991. Vol. 1, The Translations. Trans. and ed. by Gyurme Dorje with the collaboration of Matthew Kapstein. Vol. 2. Reference Material. Gyurme Dorje and Matthew Kapstein.
- Snellgrove, David L. Indo-Tibetan Buddhism, Indian Buddhists and Their Tibetan Successors. Boston: Shambhala, 1987.
- Snellgrove, David L., and H. E. Richardson. A Cultural History of Tibet. London: George Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1968. Rev. ed., Boston: Shambhala, 1986.

Occupied Territories

The Israeli-occupied territories (official name: the Palestinian Authority, but also referred to as “Palestine”) constitute land captured from surrounding nations during the Six-Day War in 1967, including the West Bank, East Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip, and the Golan Heights. The Sinai Peninsula was also captured at this time, but was returned to Egypt as per the Camp David Accords of 1977. The combined population for the occupied territories exceeds 3.7 million.

These western Asian areas are rich with religious history and represent a modest number of world religions. However, because the occupied territories are not a unified body and lack reliable census data, it is difficult to give precise estimates of religious adherents in these areas. Although calculations of exact percentages vary, the three largest religious groups in the occupied territories are Muslims, followed by Jews, then Christians. There also exist many religiously unaffiliated individuals in the region (agnostics and atheists).

Muslims Palestine came under Islamic rule in the seventh century CE and remained so until the British Mandate of Palestine in 1920. The vast majority of the residents of the occupied territories are Sunni Muslim (more than 80 percent of the population). Palestinian Arabs are the largest Muslim people group in the territories, but there are also smaller populations of Egyptian, Bedouin, and Syrian Arabs. Muslims in these areas represent at least two of the four schools of fiqh (expansion of sharia law based on the Koran and Sunnah in the Sunni tradition), the Shafii School and Hanafi School. Shafii is the largest school practiced in the occupied territories and is considered one of the more theologically conservative. The Palestinian Basic Law serves as a temporary Constitution for the Palestinian Authority in lieu of independence from Israel. It claims Islam as the official religion of the territory with sharia law as its source of legislation and Arabic as its official language. In addition, the Basic Law states that respect be given to adherents of all other religions in the region.

The Gaza Strip is currently governed by Hamas, a term meaning “zeal” in Arabic, but that also serves as an abbreviation for Islamic Resistance Movement. Due to its militaristic efforts, including suicide bombing and use of short-range missiles, Hamas is considered a terrorist group by the European Union and the United States. Ninety-nine percent of residents in the Gaza Strip are Sunni Muslims, many of whom support Hamas because of their humanitarian work in the region (funding schools, orphanages, mosques, and other institutions that are not typically provided by the Palestinian Authority). The region is decisively marked by its more strict observance of Islam as compared to other Palestinian areas in the occupied territories, most conspicuously the appearance of women—nearly all appear in proper Islamic dress, including hijab (scarf) and jlibab (coat).

The Noble Sanctuary (also known as the Temple Mount) in East Jerusalem is considered one of the most holy sites of Islam. Islamic tradition states that the angel Gabriel visited the Prophet Muhammad while he was in the Kaaba in Mecca and brought him on a wild steed to Jerusalem (Isra) to visit the Masjid Al Aqsa (the Farthest Mosque). Muhammad then ascended to the circles of heaven (Mi’raj) and was given the command by Allah of five daily prayers (salat). The Noble Sanctuary also includes the Dome of the Rock, where, according to Islamic tradition, Muhammad ascended into heaven from the rock contained within. Jerusalem was the first qibla (direction of prayer) for Muslims before being replaced by Mecca, and the Masjid Al Aqsa is visited by thousands of Muslims for weekly Friday prayers. Historically, the area has been under many jurisdictions, though the Noble Sanctuary is currently under Muslim control. However, Jews still lay claim to the area, many of whom believe that a final temple will be built on the Temple Mount, destroying the Islamic presence there at the coming of the promised Messiah.

The Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, an important Muslim shrine that stands adjacent to the Western Wall, an important Jewish holy site. (iStockPhoto.com)

Jews According to the account found in the Tanakh (Hebrew Bible) and other rabbinical sources, Jews claim to be settlers of the land of Palestine since antiquity. The expulsion of the Jews by the Roman Empire in 70 CE, however, contributed to the Jewish diaspora that continues to this day. This expulsion was only the last in a series of invasions and deportations that contributed to the disinheritance of the Jews from the land. The conviction of the necessity for the Jews to return to their biblical homeland was heightened by the rise of modern political Zionism beginning in the late 19th century. Israeli settlements in the occupied territories—which many countries and human rights groups have claimed are in violation of international law—are highly controversial and the cause of much strife in the region for Muslims, Jews, and Christians. There are more than 444,000 Jews in the occupied territories—arriving both before and after the Six-Day War—with numbers nearly evenly split between the West Bank and East Jerusalem, with smaller populations in the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights.

Nearly 95 percent of Jews in the West Bank are ultra-Orthodox, significantly contributing to population growth in the region due to high birth rates. Many ultra-Orthodox Jews move to the region not for political reasons, but for economic (cheaper housing compared to Jerusalem) or personal (opportunity to live in a closed Orthodox community) ones. Notably, these ultra-Orthodox Jews typically do not adhere to the political Zionist ideology. There is also a considerable population of Russian Jews in the West Bank who arrived in the late 1980s and early 1990s from the former Soviet Union. Many of these individuals—like Jewish populations all over the world, including Israel and the occupied territories—are only moderately observant to Judaism, or are entirely secular (Jewish by ethnicity, not religious practice).

East Jerusalem contains some of the holiest sites of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. For Jews, Jerusalem's Old City, the Temple Mount, and the Western Wall are of the utmost importance for religious expression in the Holy Land. The Western Wall is visited by millions of individuals a year, both Jewish and non-Jewish alike. As of 2005, residents of East Jerusalem were 53 percent Muslim and 42 percent Jewish. Tensions between the two communities continue, and are often violent. Though attempts to achieve a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority persist, the city is still highly contested.

In addition to the larger Jewish population in the occupied territories, the West Bank is home to a small community of Samaritans, a Jewish sect dating back to the eighth century. The Samaritans reject both the Mishnah and the Talmud (classic Jewish rabbinical texts), have their own version of the Torah, and consider Mount Gerizim the place that God has chosen for worship, not Jerusalem. Though estimates vary, it is likely that there are fewer than 1,000 Samaritans worldwide, half of whom live in Nablus, a Palestinian city located between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim in the northern West Bank.

Christians Since the establishment of the modern state of Israel in 1948, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has caused hundreds of thousands of Palestinian Christians to leave their historic homelands (the territories were 17 percent Christian in 1900 but only 2 percent today), in which they have been present since the first century CE. Reasons for this exodus include better economic opportunities and political stability abroad, in conjunction with the desire for greater religious freedom. Many Palestinian and western Christian scholars claim that the Palestinian Christian population is on the verge of extinction if current statistical trends continue.

Despite dwindling numbers, the Christian community in the occupied territories is diverse in affiliation. Although most Christians in these areas are Greek Orthodox, there is also a significant Roman Catholic community. Other groups include Anglicans, Protestants (including evangelicals), and Independents (including Pentecostals). The largest Christian denomination is the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem, considered of great importance for Orthodox Christians because of its claimed historical ties to the Jerusalem church established on the Day of Pentecost (as recorded in Acts 2). In Palestine, 99 percent of the members of the Greek Orthodox Church are Arab and are Arabic- or Arabic/Greek-speaking Christians. With 10 congregations in 2005, this church makes up 41 percent of affiliated Christians and 0.88 percent of the population in the occupied territories. The second largest Christian denomination in the occupied territories is the Roman Catholic Church, with 43 congregations in 2005, but it has a slowly diminishing population growth rate. In 2000, the Holy See and the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) signed the Basic Agreement Treaty, which addresses, among other topics, freedom of religion and conscience, equality of citizenship despite religious affiliation, and respect for the legal code (the Status Quo) of the holy sites of Christianity. In May 2009 Pope Benedict XVI visited the Holy Land, making one stop in the occupied territories—Bethlehem—where he met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and visited various sites, including the Palestinian Aida refugee camp.

Religious Freedom Though religion is only moderately regulated by law through the government (both Israeli and Palestinian), the occurrences of social regulation of religion and religious persecution run high in the occupied territories. The 2008 Report on International Religious Freedom raised several issues in regard to the region, especially particular cases of religious persecution of Muslims, Jews, and Christians against each other during the reporting period. The Palestinian Authority Basic Law does provide for religious freedom; however, many religious minorities (such as select churches) are not recognized by the Authority.

There have been several accounts of discrimination and persecution from Orthodox Jews against non-Orthodox Jews, especially when an individual did not meet Orthodox requirements for being considered truly Jewish. There are also often violent clashes between Jewish and Muslim groups, especially in areas such as East Jerusalem, where tensions are high and adherents of each religion live in close proximity. In addition, proselytizing groups such as evangelical Christians often cite instances of discrimination and violence because of their forward attempts to spread their religious convictions. The issue of religious freedom in the occupied territories is a fragile blend of ethnic, religious, and political threads that often results in social strain and pressure on all religious groups in the region.

Gina Ann Bellofatto

See also: Agnosticism; Atheism; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem; Gush Emumin; Islam; Islamism; Jerusalem; Mecca; Mosques; Orthodox Judaism; Roman Catholic Church; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Choshen, Maya, ed. Statistical Yearbook of Jerusalem: No. 22—2006. Jerusalem: The Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, 2007.
- Goldscheider, Calvin. Cultures in Conflict: The Arab-Israeli Conflict. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Grim, Brian J., and Roger Finke. "International Religion Indexes: Government Regulation, Government Favoritism, and Social Regulation of Religion." Interdisciplinary Journal of Research on Religion 2 (2006), Article 1, referenced in The Association of Religious Data Archives: Israeli Occupied Territories (Palestine).
- Johnson, Todd M., ed. World Christian Database. Leiden: Brill, 2007.
- Lybarger, Loren D. Identity and Religion in Palestine. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.

U.S. Department of State. "International Religious Freedom Report 2008: Israel and the Occupied Territories." International Religious Freedom. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108484.htm>. Accessed July 7, 2009.

Old Believers (Russia)

The Old Believers (or Old Ritualists) originated out of an intense controversy within the Russian Orthodox Church in the middle of the 17th century. Over the centuries, various practices had been introduced into the Russian Church at variance from those of the Orthodox in the Mediterranean Basin, especially in those churches in the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople. Shortly after assuming office in 1652, the new Patriarch Nikon (1605–1681) moved to revise ritual books used in the church that had become corrupted over the years and bring them in line with the Greeks. For example, a seemingly minor practice, the Russians had been making the sign of the cross with two fingers rather than three as was common to most of Orthodoxy. Nikon introduced the first reforms almost immediately and continued them through the work of several synods in 1654 and 1655. In 1655 he began to publish the revised liturgy books. A synod in 1666 ordered the excommunication of any who continued to adhere to the old rites and use the old books. Each change led to the opposition party growing stronger, with most radical groups believing that Nikon's innovations signified the beginning of the reign of the Antichrist.

The execution of Archpriest Avvakum Petrov in 1682 became a rallying point for those who opposed Nikon and who gradually became known as Old Believers, that is, those who followed the rituals and practices as they were prior to his term of office. Those in sympathy with the Old Believers may have constituted as much as 10 percent of the population. As the Czar Alexey Michailovich (1645–1676) backed Nikon's reforms, they found themselves under the government's thumb. Many were imprisoned, some executed, and others exiled. Many more fled from the czar's land.

Over time, the Old Believers split into as many as a dozen recognizable groups, though the majority adhered to one of two main groupings: the Popovtsy (“with priests”) and the Bespopovtsy (“without priests”). While loyal to the tradition, the Old Believers were presented with a major problem as no Orthodox bishop had aligned with their cause. Without a bishop they lost their apostolic succession and the episcopal authority to ordain priests. The Popovtsy absorbed priests as they left the Russian Orthodox Church; the Bespopovtsy adapted to life without priests and sacraments. The Popovtsy found a friend in 1847 in the person of the former Orthodox Metropolitan Ambrosios of Sarajevo (Bosnia), who consecrated two bishops, thus providing for the establishment of an episcopal hierarchy.

Old Believers, Russian Christians, pray at the village of Gorelovka south of the Georgian capital of Tbilisi. (AP Photo/Shakh Aivazov)

In the 18th and 19th centuries, the civil rights of the Old Believers remained severely restricted, with occasional periods of liberalization, such as under Catherine the Great (1762–1796) when they were allowed to return from abroad and given incentives to set up businesses in developing industrial areas of Russia. This gave rise to the phenomenon of the Old Believers’ entrepreneurship that made enormous contributions to the transformation of the Russian economy in the 19th century, with their families such as the Morozovs, the Ryabushinskys, the Konovalovs constituting the country’s economic elite.

Finally, in 1905, Czar Nicholas II issued the Edict of Toleration that considerably expanded the Old Believers’ freedom to worship but retained the ban on their joining the civil service. During the Soviet years, those who remained in Soviet Russia were initially treated favorably by the Bolshevik government as those who had been oppressed by the czarist regime; however, from the late 1920s on they began to suffer the same persecution from the atheist government as all other believers. In 1971 the Russian Orthodox Church and some groups within the Old Believers lifted the mutual anathemas they had previously pronounced, which reflected both the sense of common fate under the Soviet regime and the government's intent to unify Russian Orthodox groups to make them more controllable.

As recently as 2000, Patriarch Alexy II, the then head of the Russian Orthodox Church, took visible steps to bring the Old Believers back into the church and had admitted the error of past persecution and restrictions. There are an estimated 2 to 2.5 million Old Believers in Russia. The headquarters of the largest priestly group of Old Believers, the Bielaia Krinitsia Church, is in the Ukraine, established at a time when the headquarters town was in Austrian territory. After the end of the Communist period, the Russian church was led by Metropolitan Alimpyj of Moscow and All Russia (1929–2003) who was elected in 1988. During his term a seminary was opened in Moscow (1996) and Metropolitan Ambrosios was canonized as a saint (1997). Since 2005 the head of the church has been Metropolitan Korniliy (Titov). The Bielaia Krinitsia Church is aligned with the Old Ritualist Orthodox of Romania who are led by Metropolitan Leonty of Braila, Romania. A second Russian group of Popovtsy is led Archbishop Aristarch of Novozybkov, Moscow, and All Russia. He resides in Novozybkov, and has associated bishops in several Russian communities as well as Georgia and Belarus.

A number of Bezpopovtsy moved to Lithuania in the late 17th century. An initial community was established in the Anyksciai region in 1709, and a monastery was opened in the Ignalina region in 1728. In the 1930s some 53 communities of the Old Believers with about 34,000 people could be found. Today, they make up approximately 1.43 percent of the population. Leadership is found in the Supreme Council of the Old Believers (Volunges N9–68, 2055 Vilnius, Lithuania). Similar groups in neighboring countries are organized into the Union of Latvian Old Believer Congregations (Maskavas 116, Riga LV-1003 Latvia) and the Union of Old Believer Parishes of Estonia. The revival of the Old Believers in post-Soviet Estonia is being assisted by the Society of Old Believer Culture and Development (Soola 5, Tartu 50013, Estonia).

Old Believers have also moved to the West. Bishop Sofrony (elected 1996) heads Old Believers in the United States, Canada and Australia from his residence in Gervais, Oregon. Some 10,000 members reside in Oregon and there is a small community in Alaska. There are approximately 500 in Canada and membership in the 3 countries exceeds 10,000 believers.

Old Believers Moscow
c/o Metropolitan Alimpyj of Moscow and All Russia
Rogozhovsky pos. 29
Moscow, Russia

Old Christ Rite Church (Romania)
c/o H. H. Leonti, Metropolitan
No. 5 Zidari St.
601 Braila
Romania

Old Believers Australia
c/o Old Orthodox Church of Holy Nativity 20 Norval St.
Auburn NSW 2144
Australia

Marat S. Sterin

See also: Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Bolshakoff, Serge. Russian Nonconformity. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1950.
- Conybeare, Frederick C. Russian Dissenters. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1921.
- Pokrovsky, N. N., and Richard A. Morris, eds. Traditional, Spiritual, and Material Culture of Russian Old Believer Settlements in Europe, Asia and America. Novosibirsk: Nauka Press, 1992.
- Robson, Roy R. Old Believers in Modern Russia. Rockford, IL: Northern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Wigowsky, Paul J., comp. Collection of Old Believer History and Tradition. <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Agora/2827/collection.html>. Accessed March 10, 2009.

Old Catholic Church in Switzerland

Confronted with the growing prerogatives entrusted to the papal institution and with the determined opposition of the leadership of the Roman Catholic Church to modern ideas in the 19th century, Catholic liberals—especially in Germany and Switzerland—had become increasingly suspicious of Rome. After the proclamation of the dogma of the infallibility of the pope at the First Vatican Council in 1870, some did not accept the new doctrine and broke with the Roman Catholic Church. They founded national Old Catholic Churches, which would join forces within the Union of Utrecht together with a group of Dutch Catholics who had separated from Rome in the 18th century and preserved the episcopate within their ranks.

In Switzerland, the leaders of the movement were primarily laymen, although a few priests joined the resistance too. The movement enjoyed a strong political support in those cantons where liberals were at the helm. It built upon a long desire of liberal political circles to create a national church, not submitted to any foreign leadership: several proposals to erect a national diocese had already been advanced over the previous decades. Large meetings of liberal Catholics took place during the spring of 1871. In a few cantons (Berne, Geneva), the governments decided that parishes had to elect their own ministers and, since the Roman Catholic Church forbade its faithful to take part in such elections, the parishes were then entrusted to priests ready to comply with the wishes of the local government. In such cases of government-enforced schism, only a minority of the faithful were ready to follow, and most of those parishes finally returned to the Catholic Church, once Rome allowed the faithful to vote in the elections for parish priests. In other cases, however, the movement had real popular support, and a few parishes freely decided to break with Rome.

Some participants in the movement wanted to go as far as to abolish the episcopate. But the episcopal function was finally preserved, although its power would be limited. The first National Synod took place in Olten in 1875 and marked the official beginning of the Old Catholic Church in Switzerland as a constituted body. Actually—this remains specific to the Swiss branch of Old Catholicism—it adopted the name of Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland (Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz). The priest Eduard Herzog (1841–1924) was elected as the first bishop of the Christian Catholic Church and consecrated the same year by the Old Catholic bishop of Germany.

The newly formed church very soon introduced reforms, which had already been introduced on their own by some priests in their parishes, including use of the vernacular in the Mass and abolition of clerical celibacy. As early as 1874, the government of the Canton of Berne had decided to sponsor the creation of a liberal Catholic theological faculty at the local university, which allowed the church to develop a well-trained clergy. In 1948, the Old Catholic Church of Switzerland became one of the founding members of the World Council of Churches. It made the headlines in the Swiss media when it ordained its first woman priest in 2000.

The Christian Catholic Church still enjoys today a public law status in nine Swiss cantons, which means among other things the right to raise church taxes. The church forms an acknowledged part of the Swiss religious landscape, but the number of its adherents has constantly decreased over the years: while there may have been some 70,000 members in the mid-1870s and there were still more than 35,000 in 1930, there are today less than 14,000 Old Catholics in Switzerland.

The Christian Catholic Church has its headquarters at Willadingweg 39, 3006 Bern, Switzerland. It has an Internet site at <http://www.christkath.ch/>.

Jean-François Mayer

References

- Flückiger, Wilhelm, and Carlo Jenzer. Christkatholisch: Die Christkatholische Kirche der Schweiz in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Zurich: Benziger Verlag, 1978.
- Gschwind, Paulin. Geschichte der Entstehung der Christkatholischen Kirche der Schweiz. Solothurn: Verlag Gassmann, 1910.
- Küry, Urs. Die Altkatholische Kirche: Ihre Geschichte, ihre Lehre, ihr Anliegen. 2nd ed. Stuttgart: Evangelisches Verlagswerk, 1978.
- Moss, Claude Beaufort. The Old Catholic Movement, Its Origins and History. London: SPCK, 1948.

Old Catholic Church of Austria

The beginning of the Old Catholic Church of Austria dates to October 1871, when the Catholic minister Alois Anton celebrated the first Old Catholic liturgy at Vienna. In that same year religious services started also in Warnsdorf (now in the Czech Republic) and in Ried (Upper Austria). As early as 1877, the government of the Austrian monarchy accepted the Old Catholic Church as one of the official religions in Austria. The first official synod, in May 1879, introduced the first changes from the contemporary practice of the Roman Catholic Church, namely, the right of laypeople to vote for and be elected to positions within the church, the use of the native tongue (in this case German) instead of Latin for the liturgy, and the abrogation of both priestly celibacy and confession. Though the church had gained followers, the Austrian government prohibited the election of a bishop for the diocese, refused to recognize the validity of marriages by Old Catholic priests, and did not allow members to direct tax money to the support of their priests.

During the next decades the church established several new parishes, but after World War I some of their territories were lost to Hungary and the Czech Republic. Thus in 1921 a new Austrian diocese had to be formed, and three years later Adalbert Schindelar was elected the first bishop of the Austrian Old Catholic Church. During World War II the church was incorporated within the Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany, but since the end of that war the independent Austrian diocese is functioning again.

At present there are 19,000 members of the church living in Austria, organized within 12 parishes. Each parish is headed by a minister, who is supported in his or her pastoral works by a committee. The whole church is headed by a bishop who is elected by the synod and a committee (Synodrat) consisting of three ordained individuals and six laypersons. The bishop, the ministers, and the deacons serve as liturgical authorities. In 1991 and 1995 the synod decided to allow women to be ordained to these church offices, and in 1998 Karin Leiter and Elfriede Kreuzeder were ordained as the first female ministers. In February 2008, Johannes (John) Ekemezie Okoro was ordained as bishop and head of the Church in Austria. For the theological training of future ministers there are no special university facilities as there are in the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confession and the Roman Catholic Church, which have their own faculties of confessional theology at the state universities. A university degree in Old Catholic theology can be acquired, however, at the University of Berne (Switzerland).

The Austrian Old Catholic Church has long been involved in cooperation with other churches. Soon after the founding of the Union of Utrecht in September 1889, the representatives of the Austrian Old Catholic Church joined the Union, rejoining it again after the reorganization of the diocese in 1921. (The Union of Utrecht was formed as a cooperative association of the Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany, and Switzerland.) Since its beginning in 1958, the Ecumenical Council of Churches of Austria has recognized the Old Catholic Church as one of its members, and there are active ecumenical meetings throughout Austria, mainly with the Evangelical Church and the Anglican Church but also with the Roman Catholic Church. In 1986 the Evangelical and the Old Catholic Church agreed to intercommunion; the Roman Catholic Church did not join this agreement. The church is also a member of the World Council of Churches.

Old Catholic Church of Austria

Schottenring 17

A-1010 Wien

Austria

<http://www.altkatholiken.at> (in German)

Manfred Hutter and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

Halama, Christian. Altkatholiken in Österreich.

Geschichte und Bestandsaufnahme. Vienna: Böhlau, 2004.

Zankl, Wilhelmine. "Die altkatholische Kirche." In Religionen. Ein Friedensbuch, edited by Brigitte Hantschk-Vavra and Christian Hantschk, 96–101. Vienna: Horn, 1986.

Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/ Catholic Church of Mariavites

Mariavitism started as a Catholic movement aiming at the moral reform of Polish Catholicism at the end of the 19th century. The movement assumed a more formal existence on December 15, 1903, when Felicja or

Church of the Old Catholic Church of Mariavites in Plock, Poland. (Fotosearch/StockphotoPro)

Feliksa (later Maria Franciszka) Kozłowska (1862–1921) established the Association of Mariavites of Continuous Adoration in Supplication. The new organization was denounced by the Vatican in 1904, and two years later Kozłowska was excommunicated. Following the excommunication, the movement became a legally independent “sect.”

The highly controversial marriage of the Mariavite archbishop Johann Kowalski (1871–1942) and his three bishops to nuns in 1922 was followed by trials of the archbishop (1928) and other priests. In 1931 the archbishop was sentenced to three years of imprisonment, later reduced to two years. The first consecrations of women priests, including a bishop, took place in 1929. The split of the movement in 1935 resulted in formation of the Old Catholic Church of Mariavites (OCCM), critical of the activities of M. Kowalski, and the Catholic Church of Mariavites (CCM), the smaller of the two bodies, which adhered to all of the innovations introduced in the 1920s. OCCM discontinued the priesthood for women in 1938.

OCCM is based on principles of the Old and New Testaments as well as the tradition of the undivided church determined by the first seven general, or ecumenical, councils. The message received by Kozłowska on God’s mercy is also fundamental; it says the sinful world can be saved through the veneration of the Holy Sacrament and by the help of the Virgin Mary. No new dogmas are accepted in the OCCM, as it is thought that the power to do so should rest only with a council that is ecumenical, that is, representative of the whole of Christianity. The church does not accept the primacy of any bishop in the truly Catholic Church or the infallibility of humanity in matters of faith and morality. Neither excommunication nor interdicts are administered in OCCM.

The aim of the church is to spread the worship of Jesus Christ hidden in the Holy Sacrament and to remind people of their need for constant help from the Most Holy Mother in the face of the worldly hostilities against God. The veneration of the Holy Sacrament consists of frequent holy Communion. Every member has to devote one hour per week to individual adoration of the Holy Sacrament and one hour per month to communal and ceremonial adoration. Participation in the Sunday Mass is obligatory as well. Priests and nuns have to practice the adoration daily. The entire liturgy is conducted in Polish.

In 1924 the church dropped strictures requiring the celibacy of the clergy, despite the views of Kozłowska on this issue. Instead, the stress has been put on leading the Franciscan life. The variety of services offered by the church (baptism, marriage, burial, and so on) are free, and acceptance of any payment for the conduct of the Holy Mass (as has been common in the Roman Catholic Church) is forbidden.

There are seven sacraments. Confession received by a priest is obligatory for children and youth and optional for people older than 18. However, adults are obliged to make the general confession to Christ himself, which is followed by absolution of sins by a priest. The holy Eucharist is distributed in two forms (bread and wine) to all believers. Though the church honors religious pictures and memorabilia of saints, it does not accept the claims made for so-called wondrous relics and paintings. In the beginning, most controversies around the Mariavites concerned its erosive influence on the Roman Catholic Church. During the partition of Poland, many believed any movement directed against the church was antinational.

OCCM is divided into 3 dioceses that cover 42 parishes and have 45 churches and chapels. There are 32 priests. OCCM counts approximately 26,000 members (1997) who live in Poland, mainly in the area of Plock and Siedlce as well as Lodz, Lublin, and Warsaw. The highest supervising body of the church is the synod. In periods between synod meetings, the General Chapter (the organization to which all priests belong) provides supervision. The main administrative body is the Council of the Church. The church is led by its head bishop. OCCM publishes the monthly periodical Mariawita and is a member of the World Council of Churches.

CCM is divided into 2 “custodies,” or dioceses, with 23 parishes. Among 18 priests, 12 are women. The head of the church is the Highest Council of Superiors. The 3,000 members of CCM reside in Poland.

Starokatolicki Kosciol Mariawitow
(Old Catholic Church of Mariavites)
ul. Kazimierza Wielkiego
09-400 Plock
Poland

Kosciol Katolicki Mariawitow w RP
(Catholic Church of the Mariavites)
Felicjanow k. Plocka
09-470 Bodzanow
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

See also: Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church; Women, Status and Role of; World Council of Churches.

References

- Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
- Ginter, Wladyslaw. Informator o Kosciole Starokatolickim Mariawitow. Plock, 1989.

Mazur, Krzysztof. Mariawityzm w Polsce. Krakow: Nomos, 1991.

Rybak, Stanislaw. Mariawityzm. Studium historyczne. Warsaw: Lege, 1992.

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands (usually called Oud-Katholieke Kerk and officially titled Roomsche Katholieke Kerk van de Oud-Bisschoppelijke Clergie) was founded on April, 23, 1723, but considers itself as the continuation of the Old Catholic Church that existed in the north Netherlands before the Reformation. The church traces its beginnings to 695, with the nomination of the Irish missionary Willibrord (ca. 658–739) to be the first archbishop of Utrecht. A problem arose in 1651, when the pope nominated Frederik Schenck van Toutenburg to the archbishop's chair, whereas since 1559, the year of the new grouping of the dioceses, the chapters of all the dioceses had been given the right to elect their own archbishops.

Another problem arose as result of the introduction of the Reformation into the Republic of the Seven United Netherlands. Rome failed to nominate new bishops as vacancies appeared, and it also refused to accept the nominations of the king of Spain, who at that time still formally held authority over the Netherlands. Eventually episcopal leadership fell to Sasbout Vosmeer (1548–1614), who in 1602 was appointed as the archbishop of Philippi in partibus infidelium (or in the regions of the infidels, a title usually given to bishops in non-Christian countries). Rome had intended to nominate him as archbishop of Utrecht, but the Peace of Münster in 1648 (ending the Thirty Years' War between Spain and the new Dutch Republic) blocked Vosmeer's elevation. Nevertheless, the Old Catholic Church claims that Vosmeer and his successors continued the Catholic worship and organization.

At the end of the 17th century the Roman Catholic Church tried to centralize its power over all Roman Catholics. Rome considered the Dutch Republic as a missionary country, to be governed by a nuncio directly out of Rome. The republic and the old Clergie (priesthood) refused to accept the nuncio and instead acknowledged each other.

In the 17th century the Old Catholic Church adopted the perspective of Bishop Jansenius (1585–1638), popularly known as Jansenism. He emphasized a return to the authentic sources of Christian beliefs: the Bible and the writings of the fathers of the church, especially Augustine. Very important were his ideas about original sin: the fall of humanity has so depraved human nature that human beings, even after christening, cannot voluntarily do anything else but sin. Only the mercy of Christ makes it possible for humans to voluntarily do things that please God. Jansenius also championed spirituality and placed great emphasis on the inner life and on the dignified preparation for the receipt of the Holy Sacraments. In the field of the canon law, he stressed the governing power of the bishops and the council of prelates over and against that of the pope. This latter point became especially important later, as part of the schism between the Roman Catholic Church and the Old Catholic Church.

The definitive break with Rome occurred in 1723, when the Chapter of Utrecht elected Cornelis Steenvoeten (d. 1742) to be archbishop. He was consecrated by Dominicus Maria Varlet, a French archbishop. Most Catholic believers in the Netherlands continued to follow Rome, even though there were no bishops until 1853, when the hierarchy of the Roman Church was re-established in the Netherlands.

The early history of the Old Catholic Church as a separate entity was dominated by a series of internal and external problems. In 1742 the bishop of the Diocese of Haarlem and in 1758 the bishop of Deventer (without a diocese) were consecrated to secure the episcopal succession. Then began a period of struggle for the defense of the old beliefs and practices. The church refused to accept the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary proclaimed by Pope Pius IX on December 8, 1854.

Other Old Catholic churches arose from religious and ethical concerns over the decrees on the dogma of the infallibility of the pope, proclaimed by Rome at the First Vatican Council of 1870. For example, under the leadership of theologian Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger (1799–1890), Catholics in Germany separated from the Roman Catholic Church in 1871. They sought connection with the Dutch Old Catholic Church, and subsequently J. H. Reinders was appointed as the first bishop in Germany, and in 1873 he was consecrated by Hermannus Heykamp, the bishop of Deventer (Netherlands). In Switzerland a fear of the loss of political freedom led to the formation in 1889 of the Union of Utrecht, a cooperative association of the Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany, and Switzerland.

The Council of the Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands is the supreme ecclesiastical organ and can decide on binding points of doctrine. All Old Catholic churches are therefore members of the Council. Old Catholics accept the Bible as the scriptural reproduction of the original revelation and therefore the primary source for the religious doctrine of the church and for personal life. The Bible is understood through the tradition of the church. The ideal ecclesiastical situation and the canon of faith for the Old Catholic Church is the old and undivided church of the first 10 centuries; the conclusions of the councils of this early period provide the basics for Old Church believers. In this there is no difference with the tradition of the Roman Catholic Church.

Old Catholics also emphasize the doctrine of the redemption of humanity: no one can find the solution to life's problems and fulfillment in life without God. Only God can restore the broken relationship between God and humanity, and only through such restoration is some cooperation between God and humans possible. Redemption through faith is only possible in the community of the church.

The Old Catholic Church accepts seven sacraments, the intermediaries of salvation. They facilitate the construction of the community of saints. The sacraments support believers in their faith and equip them for holy conduct in life. In the sacrament of holy Communion, Christ is seen as really present in the elements of bread and wine, though the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation is not accepted. The Apostolic succession is essential for preaching and doctrine as well as for the succession of the priestly offices. The Apostolic succession—very essential in the Old Catholic Church—is linked with the consecration of bishops.

Old Catholic buildings closely resemble Roman Catholic churches. The altar, as token of Mount Golgotha (where Jesus was crucified), has a central place. In the middle of the altar there is an open space where during the consecration of the altar some relics of martyrs are enclosed. The church is decorated with various liturgical colors reflective of the different periods of the ecclesiastical year. The celebration of the Eucharist is the essential act of Sunday worship services.

The Old Catholic Church has an episcopal structure. There are two dioceses: the Archdiocese of Utrecht and the Diocese of Haarlem. Until 1982 the church also had a titular bishop of Deventer. The archdiocese encloses the whole country except the province of North Holland and has 18 parishes, with 8 priests, 5 deacons, and 4 priests for special services. The Diocese of Haarlem has 12 parishes, 12 priests, and 1 deacon. In addition, the church also supports stations with believers in regions without a priest or parish.

The bishops are elected by the priests and by some believers entitled to vote. The Chapter of Utrecht is very important in the organization of the church. Decisions are made by the provincial synod of the clergy and by the general synod, but they need the approbation of the episcopate. Clergy education is provided for by the church's seminary at Amersfoort, connected with the State University of Utrecht or the Catholic University of Utrecht. There are some 10,000 Old Catholic Church members in the Netherlands.

Internationally, the several Old Catholic Churches around the world are associated in the Union of Utrecht promulgated on September 24, 1889. Now, as a new century begins, Union member churches include Old Catholics in the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, countries of the former Yugoslavia, Poland, France, Sweden, Italy, the United States, and Canada. The International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference handles all questions with regard to other churches and makes decisions on matters of belief and ethics. Worldwide, the Old Catholic Church counts some 600,000 believers (with 400,000 in Germany and 25,000 in the United States).

The Old Catholic Church has a special place in the ecumenical world as a result of its genesis. As early as 1873 and 1874 the so-called Bonner Unionskonferenzen (Conferences) between the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Church, and the Eastern Orthodox churches had occurred. A special place in this process was assumed by the Anglican Church, though it was not until 1931 that full communion was restored between the Church of England and the Old Catholics. The several Old Catholic churches have been active in the World Council of Churches. Meanwhile, the relationship with the Roman Catholic Church remains laborious. The Old Catholic Church has made several attempts at reconciliation, without results until 1966. Relations have been hampered by the special proclamation of Pope Pius XII (1950) of the dogma of the physical assumption to heaven of the Blessed Virgin Mary. However, in 1966 Pope Paul VI removed the restrictions on dialogue between the two churches, and in 1972 the International Conference of Bishops of the Old Catholic Church and the Roman Catholic Secretary for the Unity of All Christians decided to cooperate in matters in the pastoral and sacramental sphere.

Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands
Kon. Wilhelminalaan 3
3818 HN Amersfoort
The Netherlands
<http://www.okkn.nl/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Church of England; Eastern Orthodoxy; International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Hoekstra. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.
- Kleef, B. A. Geschiedenis van de Oud-Katholieke Kerk van Nederland. Rev. ed. Assen, the Netherlands: Van Gorcum, 1953.
- Küry, U. Die alt-katholische Kirche. Ihre Geschichte, ihre Lehre, ihr Anliegen. Frankfurt am Main: Ev., 1966.
- Maan, P. J., K. Ouwens, F. Smit, and J. Visser. De Oud-katholieke Kerk van Nederland. Leer en leven. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Gooi & Sticht, 1979.

Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1948.

Tans, J. A. G., and M. Kok. Rome-Utrecht. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Paul Brand, 1966.

Visser, J., F. Smit, and P. J. Maan. Onafhankelijk van Rome, toch katholiek. 250 jaar oud-katholieke geschiedenis. Hilversum, the Netherlands: Gooi & Sticht, 1973.

Old Catholicism

The Old Catholic movement traces its beginning to differences that developed in the Roman Catholic Church in France and the Low Countries around the teachings of Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), who in the 17th century found himself in opposition to the Jesuits. However, the more immediate catalyst for the movement was the declaration of papal infallibility at the First Vatican Council in 1870–1871.

Jansen, a Dutch theologian residing at Port Royal, France, was accused by the Jesuits of Protestant tendencies because of his denial of free will. From that point the controversy surrounding his work expanded. Moving from France to Holland, Jansen found support in the person of Peter Codde (1656–1710), the bishop of Utrecht. Pope Clement XI (r. 1700–1721), however, favored the Jesuit position; he deposed Codde and did not replace him. Some years later, Dominique Marie Varlet, who had recently been consecrated the bishop of Babylon and was on his way to his new post, stopped in Holland, where he confirmed a number of children. A bishop is needed for confirmation, and there had been no confirmation in Codde's diocese since his being deposed. Varlet was consequently deposed, and he settled in Amsterdam. In 1724 he agreed to consecrate a new archbishop for Utrecht, and he subsequently consecrated bishops for Deventer and Haarlem as well. Thus, an administrative schism existed in Holland while Dutch Catholics appealed their situation to a church council.

In 1870 the first church council since the Council of Trent in the 16th century was called, in part in reaction to the problems the church encountered with the rise of secular governments in Europe and the resultant loss of its power. In Italy, the church was dealing with the loss of the papal state, as modern Italy was being created. The actions of the First Vatican Council strengthened the authority of the papal office, especially in the affirmation of papal infallibility, long sought in some parts of the church. This widely misunderstood doctrine stated that the pope was infallible on those rare occasions when he spoke “ex cathedra,” or as the head of the church, in the act of defining doctrine. The doctrine elevated the pope's role as the prime teacher of the church and gave renewed importance to all of the documents, the encyclicals, issued by the pope, though these were not included among the documents declared infallible.

Portrait of seventeenth-century Flemish theologian Cornelius Jansen. He challenged the Catholic Church's doctrine of grace, giving rise to a movement known as Old Catholicism. (Library of Congress)

Some within the church opposed the new definition as a departure from tradition in ecclesiastical doctrine. In 1871, in anticipation of the Council's pronouncement, a conference was called by those who saw themselves as the defenders of the status quo. The conference was attended by delegates from both the Church of England and the schismatic diocese in Holland. The conference voted to organize the Old Catholic Church in hopes that large numbers of Catholics, including bishops and priests, would drop their alignment to Rome. That did not occur, but enough people did support the Old Catholics to allow national churches to be formed in Germany, Switzerland, Australia, and several other countries. Receiving no acknowledgment of their protest from the Roman Catholic Church, the three dioceses in Holland reorganized as the Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands and supplied episcopal orders to the other Old Catholic churches. (The Old Catholic Church's episcopal orders are considered valid by the Roman Catholic Church, but it considers the exercise of the powers of their office by the various bishops illegal.)

Over the next decades, the Old Catholics began to make a number of changes in religious practice, such as dropping compulsory fasting and private confession of sins to a priest. In 1874 they dropped requirements for priestly celibacy, and in 1880 moved toward a Mass in local languages in place of the Latin Mass.

In 1874–1875, the Old Catholics organized two Union Conferences in Bonn, Germany, to which Eastern Orthodox, Anglicans, and even Protestants were invited. These conferences located a wide range of theological agreement among the participants, though no administrative moves toward closer alignment were made. Then in 1889, the Old Catholic bishops created the Union of Utrecht. They established an annual bishops' conference and formulated principles to guide their common life. The Union was extended to include other Old Catholic bodies such as the Polish National Catholic Church and its European affiliate, the Polish Catholic Church. Then in 1931, representatives of the Church of England signed the Bonn Agreement, which created full sacramental intercommunion between the Church of England and the Old Catholic churches. That intercommunion had been made possible by the Old Catholic recognition of Anglican orders in 1925.

The intercommunion has since been extended to the various churches of the worldwide Anglican Communion. The relationship between the two communions has been disturbed over the years by the Anglican moves to ordain and even consecrate women, though those issues were largely resolved in the mid-1990s, when the Old Catholics began to admit women to the priesthood and the bishopric. The first Old Catholic woman was ordained by the Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany in 1996. However, to monitor the ongoing relationship, in the late 1990s Anglican and Old Catholic authorities established the Anglican/Old Catholic International Coordinating Council. The Old Catholics have yet to come into communion with Protestants; however, in 1985 the Old Church in Germany reached an agreement with the Evangelical Church in Germany that allows members of both churches to share in the Eucharist at congregations of either church.

In the last century, the Old Catholic movement has developed along two different paths. The churches of the Union of Utrecht exist as substantial church bodies, with thousands of members. The Dutch, Austrian, German, and Swiss churches are members of the World Council of Churches. Representatives of the International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference meet annually with the representatives of the other world Christian communions. A second group began in 1908, when the bishop in Holland consecrated Arnold Harris Mathew (1852–1919), a former Anglican priest, under the assumption that he was leading a substantial body of people who wished to be Old Catholics. No such following existed, and contrary to his agreement, without the sanction of Utrecht, he consecrated others to the episcopacy. These orders were then transferred to North America, where a series of new independent Old Catholic jurisdictions were established by bishops who founded dioceses in the hope that a church would emerge around them. Over the years more than 100 such bodies have been founded, and through the 20th century, the phenomenon of bishops without churches spread across Europe. The independent Old Catholic churches have been joined by independent Anglican and Orthodox churches that have followed a similar pattern.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Catholic Diocese of the Old Catholics in Germany; Church of England; Evangelical Church in Germany; International Old Catholic Bishops' Conference; Jesuits; Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands; Polish National Catholic Church and Polish Catholic Church; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Anson, Peter F. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
- Bess, Douglas. Divided We Stand: A History of the Continuing Anglican Movement. Nashville: Apocryphile Press, 2006.
- Huelin, George. Old Catholics and Anglicans, 1931–1981. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Moss, C. B. The Old Catholic Movement. Eureka Springs, AK: Episcopal Book Club, 1977.
- Plummer, John P. The Many Paths of the Independent Sacramental Movement. Nashville: Apocryphile Press, 2006.
- Pruter, Karl, and J. Gordon Melton. The Old Catholic Sourcebook. New York: Garland Publishing, 1983.
- Queen, Andre J. Old Catholic: History, Ministry, Faith & Mission. Lincoln, NB: iUniverse, 2003.
- Ward, Gary L. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit, MI: Apogee Books, 1990.

Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church

The Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church traces its beginnings to October 1924, when the Romanian Orthodox Church introduced the Gregorian calendar to its members. Prior to that time, the church had followed the Julian calendar (instituted by Julius Caesar in 46 BCE). The Gregorian calendar, followed by most of the world by that time, differed from the Julian calendar by some 13 days.

A number of the Orthodox faithful rejected the new calendar, and some monks left the monasteries that had instituted the new calendar and built new churches and monasteries. These Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Christians continued the Orthodox belief and practice, with the exception of the dates when the various church festivals and holy days were observed. Their leaders argued that the festivals of the church had been established by the councils of Nicaea (325) and Antioch

(345) and could not be changed. Consequently, any alteration of the calendar was regarded as a violation of the decisions made by the fathers of the church. In this matter, they made common cause with the Monastic Community on Mount Athos in Greece.

In 1930 the Romanian authorities began a period of harassment and persecution of the Old Rite believers. A number of their priests were arrested. However, the church persisted, and in 1936 the Romanian Council on Ministries decided that the Old Rite believers were to be integrated back into the Romanian Orthodox Church. More than 30 of the Old Rite church buildings were demolished. Following World War II, the priests were released from prison. They gathered the remaining body of believers (some 12,000) and demanded that their confiscated goods be returned. In 1945 the new Ministry of Cults granted the freedom to practice their faith to the Old Rite Church. A new center for the church was established at Suceava.

In 1948 a new General Status of Religious Denominations Law was passed, failing to recognize the Old Rite as a legal entity. A new wave of persecution hit the church in 1953. Again, most of the churches were closed and priests were arrested. Three church buildings were demolished, as were two monasteries. It was not until 1990 that Romanian authorities again officially recognized the church. The church quickly revived and by 1992 reported 18 churches, 8 monasteries, and 23,634 members, most of whom resided in the Suceava and Neamt districts.

At the same time as the Old Rite Church was forming in one part of Romania, others who similarly rejected the calendar change gathered in northern Moldavia, where they formed several large communities and monasteries. Although generally following Orthodox belief and practice, these believers have a special regard for the authority of the Synod of Constantinople and pay special attention to the Pilalion, a collection of religious canons approved by that synod, which they regard as the “guide of the church until the end of the world.” In 1945, during the reprieve in the persecution, they had been reduced to approximately 2,000 believers and 6 associated monasteries. In 1990 the Moldavian believers were recognized as the Traditional Christian Church with an administrative center in Mincești.

The Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church is currently led by Metropolitan Vlasiu, president of the Synod of the True Orthodox Church of Romania. He is assisted by seven additional bishops. The church is in communion with the True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece under the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Cyprian and the Old Calendar Church in Bulgaria. In 2008, it reported 130 parishes, 13 monasteries, and 21 sketes (communities of hermits).

Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church
c/o Monastery of the Transfiguration
Slatioara, Moldavia
Romania
<http://www.mitropoliaslatioara.ro/> (in Romanian)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Romanian Orthodox Church; True (Old Calendar) Orthodox Church of Greece.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Lonita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Bujor, Constantin. Resisting unto Blood: Sixty-five Years of Persecution of the True Old Calendar Orthodox Church of Romania, October 1924–December 1989. Etna, CA: Center for Traditionalist Orthodox Studies, 2002.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Olympus, Mount

Rising 9,577 feet, Mount Olympus, located about 70 miles from Thessaloniki, Macedonia, is the highest mountain in Greece, and one of the highest mountains in Europe. In ancient Greek Pagan religion, Olympus was believed to be the home of the gods and especially the Twelve Olympians, the 12 principal Greek deities, whose stories would be told in the writings of Homer and Hesiod.

The Olympians came to power when Zeus and his siblings overthrew their father Cronos and the other old deities (the Titans), who were hurled down to the abyss of Tartarus. Once in power, Zeus, fearing that he would in turn be the victim of one of his sons, consumed his first wife Metis. But she was already pregnant and the two within his stomach gave Zeus a hearty case of nausea. Eventually his daughter Athena would emerge fully grown and dressed as a warrior from Zeus's head. Others of the 12 were either Zeus's siblings—Hera (also Zeus's wife), Hades/Pluto, Poseidon, Aphrodite, Demeter, and Hestia—or his offspring—Ares, Apollo, Artemis, Hermes, and Hephaestus. The number and makeup remained somewhat fluid and different lists include additional deities in the Olympian household. The extended family would also be enlarged by the likes of the Muses, also known as the Olympiades, daughters of Zeus who were seen as residing in the deep ravines of the mountain.

In ancient Greek religion, each of the different deities had responsibility and primary concern for different regions of Earth and/or areas of human life. Olympus was their common space. They would also be joined in their work by additional deities with whom both the Olympian deities and humans interacted. The other deities would come to the mountain home when summoned by Zeus.

The Zeus family of deities were seen, not as residing on the mountain proper, but in a palace, higher up above the clouds. Here they lived a life of relative leisure, feasting on ambrosia and nectar and being entertained by Apollo playing his lyre and by the Graces and the Muses.

The Olympian deities would be worshipped in temples found throughout Greece. One appropriate form of worship was the offering of animals for sacrifice. It was believed, for example, that the Olympians loved the smell of beef and mutton being cooked, but did not care for their taste. Thus mortals would sacrifice sheep and cattle to them, and afterward the temple officials would either consume the meat themselves or sell it to support the temple. Festivals were a regular and frequent part of Greek life, with each deity enjoying special days and her or his own primary following.

Zeus wielded his authority from his seat on a large polished black marble throne, heavily trimmed with gold. Each of the seven steps of the pedestal upon which it rested was decorated in one of the seven colors of the rainbow. At his right arm was a ruby-eyed golden eagle. He sat on a purple ram's fleece, which could when needed be used for rainmaking. Zeus and Hera had lodgings at the south end of the palace. The view out their window overlooked the prominent Greek cities—Athens, Thebes, Sparta, Corinth, Argos, and Mycenae. The other deities lived around the open square in the center of the palace. Athena provided the gods' and goddesses' clothing, while things of a more solid nature were made of metal by Vulcan (or Hephaestus) who was architect, armourer, and chariot builder on Olympus.

View of Mount Olympus, Greece. In Greek mythology, Mount Olympus was home to the 12 Olympians, the highest gods in the Greek pantheon. (iStockPhoto.com)

In the time that the Olympian gods and goddesses dominated the religious life of Greece (until the fourth century CE, when Christianity emerged in power), the main sanctuary of the Macedonians, who had come to power through Alexander the Great and his successors, was located at Dion, a site located between Mount Olympus and the nearby Thermalhos Sea. Here the Macedonian kings would come to make sacrifices before engaging in war. The site had a number of temples to the Olympian deities (Zeus, Demeter, Artemis) to which were added temples to Egyptian deities such as Isis and Sarapis, the Egyptian religion spreading through the Macedonian Empire in the decades after Alexander's death. Near the base of Olympus, a number of towns and cities maintained temples where worship of the Olympian deities and the related pantheon was conducted. Included would be the cities of Petra, Pimbleia, Leivithra (believed to be the home of Orpheus), Pieris, Atira, and Pythio (where the god Apollo was especially worshipped).

In 2003, Greece asked the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) to consider Olympus for a place on the list of World Heritage Sites. It remains under consideration.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Athens; Wiccan Religion.

References

- Burkert, Walter. Structure and History in Greek Mythology and Ritual. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Graf, Fritz. Greek Mythology: An Introduction. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.
- Woodard, Roger D. The Cambridge Companion to Greek Mythology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

■ Oman

One of several countries on the Arabian Peninsula, Oman occupies 82,310 square miles of its easternmost corner. It is bounded on the south and east by the Arabian Sea and on the north by the Gulf of Oman. To the west are the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen. The oil-rich country is home to 3,300,000 people, most of whom live along its lengthy coastline.

Even though much of Oman is desert, the inhabitable portions were already a prosperous trading site as early as the third century BCE. Traders developed oceangoing routes across the Indian Ocean to Indonesia and Vietnam. Most residents of the area converted to Islam in the seventh century, and as a result, some dissidents left the country and founded the city of Zanzibar on the East African coast.

Since the eighth century, the secular and religious leadership in the country has been united in the person of the sultan. The area has been the scene of numerous wars, as different neighboring powers attempted to seize the country's wealth. Finally, in 1507 the Portuguese arrived and assumed control of the area for more than 150 years. A 20-year revolt finally succeeded in driving the Portuguese out in 1650, and Omanis eventually recaptured related territory along the African coast, including Zanzibar (1698).

Through the 18th century, Oman expanded its territory, eventually stretching from the Gulf of Oman to Madagascar. In 1832 the capital was moved to Zanzibar. This occurred just as the British presence was growing in the lands surrounding the Indian Ocean, and in 1856, the two heirs to the throne divided the African and Arabian portion of their land, forming two separate countries. In 1891 the British made present-day Oman a protectorate. An internal fight for power led to the division of Oman in 1920, but it was reunited in 1955, primarily in response to British pressure.

Sultan Qaboos Grand Mosque in Muscat, capital of Oman. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The present sultan, Qaboos ben Said, came to power in 1970 after overthrowing his father. He has brought his country into a strong alliance with the United States, which has been interested in its oil reserves and its strategic location relative to Iran, the Persian Gulf, and Middle Eastern oil fields.

Oman appears to have accepted Islam in a relatively peaceful fashion in the year 630, when the two rulers agreed to submit to the faith. Islamic states in the region were dividing into Sunni and Shia (Shiite) camps. The primary issue dividing the community concerned succession, the Sunnis placing leadership in the hands of the descendants of the tribe of the Prophet Muhammad, and the Shias placing it in the hands of members of the Prophet's family. Oman took a third option that has come to be known as the Ibadī School of Islam. The Ibadīs believe that leadership should go to the best candidate in the Muslim community. That belief allowed Omani leadership to rise, but it also meant that continual strife and even wars would be experienced during the process of choosing a new leader.

OMAN

Dissent on the issue of succession placed the Ibadī leaders at odds with both the Shia and the Sunni peoples who surrounded them, on the one hand, and on the other hand, it led them to develop a level of tolerance toward people of other religions that developed into a doctrine of quietism. Unlike those with extremely evangelical approaches to Islam, the Ibadīs have tended to allow non-Ibadī people in realms under their control to retain their faith. This approach also served the needs of Ibadī traders as they moved about non-Muslim areas of Africa. Today the majority of Omani Muslims are

Oman

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	739,000	2,429,000	87.8	0.86	3,110,000	3,919,000
Hindus	2,000	150,000	5.4	−0.19	220,000	300,000
Christians	3,800	131,000	4.7	2.22	190,000	273,000
Roman Catholics	470	75,000	2.7	2.23	110,000	150,000
Orthodox	1,200	20,400	0.7	2.07	30,000	42,000
Independents	620	24,000	0.9	2.47	35,000	58,000
Buddhists	0	21,500	0.8	0.86	35,000	50,000
Sikhs	0	18,500	0.7	0.86	28,000	40,000
Baha'is	300	10,000	0.4	0.86	20,000	35,000
Agnostics	1,600	6,500	0.2	0.86	10,000	20,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	550	0.0	0.86	300	500
New religionists	0	300	0.0	0.90	500	800
Atheists	0	200	0.0	0.82	500	1,000
Total population	747,000	2,767,000	100.0	0.86	3,614,000	4,639,000

Ibadi, but as many as one-third of the country's residents are followers of various Sunni (Wahhabi, Shafite, Hanbalite) and Shia beliefs.

Oman is officially a Muslim country, and Islamic law dominates the judicial system. Sultan Qaboos ben Said has voiced his opinion that various religious groups have a right to establish their faith communities in the country as long as they are law abiding. Religious life is guided from the government's Ministry of Awqaf and Religious Affairs (awqaf refers to religious endowments, such as mosques and schools and the state-administered revenues for their upkeep). Authorities monitor mosques for departures from orthodoxy. The sultan has granted land to a variety of different non-Muslim religious groups for the erection of religious facilities, but these must be placed behind high walls. Non-Muslims may not proselytize within the Muslim community—a regulation that also limits the circulation of any religious literature outside of the group's membership. Islam is a requirement for citizenship, but approximately 40 percent of the population are expatriates who have moved to Oman for various reasons, primarily to work in the oil fields.

There is no evidence that Christianity had penetrated to Oman by the time that the country adopted Islam in the seventh century. Thus, Christianity is believed to have first entered the land with the coming of the Portuguese in 1507–1508 and also to have departed with them. A new era began in 1889–1890 with the arrival of James Cantine and Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952) in Muscat, Oman's capital. Their visit was part of their work with the American Arab Mission. In 1894 the Reformed Church in America (RCA) assumed sponsorship of their work, which extended throughout the region. The RCA opened a hospital in Muscat, which became the center of the nation's Christian presence for many years. This work, now known as the Protestant Church of Oman, includes Protestants of many denominational backgrounds and continues to be served by RCA personnel. Its work is concentrated in Muscat and in the nearby communities of Ruwi and Ghala. The sultan also granted to the church parcels of land in Salalah and Sohar.

The Roman Catholic Church re-established itself in the area in 1841 with the assignment of personnel to Aden (Yemen). That work grew successively into a prefecture (1854) and a vicariate (1888), and in 1889 it gave birth to the Vicariate of Arabia, now administered from Abu Dhabi (United Arab Emirates) and responsible for Catholics in Oman. The first Catholic church in Oman was erected in 1977 in Muscat, and subsequently, as the community has grown, other churches have appeared.

In recent decades, a number of religious communities have emerged among the expatriate population. The Anglican Church has been one of the strongest.

Anglican congregations are under the jurisdiction of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East. In 1960, in response to the sultan's request for a physician, Dr. Bruwell Kennedy moved to the Buaimi Oasis in the northeast corner of Oman. Sponsored by The Evangelical Alliance Mission (TEAM), an American-based evangelical sending agency, Kennedy was given unusual liberty to carry out both medical and religious work among the Bedouins of the area. The TEAM staff soon numbered more than 20 members.

A large percentage of the expatriate community has come from India. Among the first group to request and accept the sultan's recognition were Christians from Kerala state in India, who organized the initial congregation of the Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar and of the Mar Thomas Syrian Church. There are also various Indian-based Pentecostal and evangelical groups. Many of the Indian residents in Oman are Hindus, and the sultan has been as generous to them as to the Christians. The Hindu community is centered on the Shiva and Bajrangbali Temple in Muscat and additional temples in other towns dedicated to Govindrayji, Shree Ganesh, and Devi Kalaka.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Hanbalite School of Islam; Ibadhi Islam; Islam; Mar Thoma Syrian Church; Muhammad; Reformed Church in America; Roman Catholic Church; Shia Islam; Syrian Orthodox Church of Malabar; Wahhabi Islam; Zwemer, Samuel Marinus.

References

- Alhinai, Abdulrahman Bin Ali. Ceremonies and Celebrations of Oman. Reading, Berkshire, UK: Garnet Publishing, 2000.
- Bierschenk, T. Religion and Political Structure: Remarks on Ibadism in Oman and the Mzab (Algeria). Bielefeld, Germany: University of Bielefeld, 1983.
- Ghubash, Hussein. Oman Islamic Democratic Tradition. London: Routledge, 2006.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.

Maamiry, A. H. Oman and Ibadhism. 2nd ed. New Delhi: Lancers Books, 1989.

Uwtran, Francis. A Modern History of Oman: Formation of the State since 1920. London: I. B. Tauris, 2004.

Omoto

Like Tenrikyo and Tensho Kotai Jingukyo, Omoto (Great Origin) was founded in Japan by a peasant woman, Deguchi Nao (1836–1918). Before she founded Omoto in 1892, Deguchi Nao had been involved in a new religion called Konkokyo. In 1897 she met the mystic and spiritualist Ueda Kisaburo (1871–1948), who became her son-in-law by marrying her daughter Sumi. He later changed his name to Deguchi Onisaburo and from 1904 became known as the kyosu, or doctrinal founder, of the movement while Deguchi Nao held the title of kaiso, or spiritual founder.

Although fiercely loyal to Japan and supportive of its expansionist policy in the Far East, both of these figures expressed literally and symbolically a deep hatred of the modernizing reforms introduced by the Meiji government (1868–1912) and its taxation policies in the rural areas. They challenged not only the government's modernization program but also the core myth on which the imperial system was based: that Amaterasu was the divine ancestor of the imperial line. Deguchi Onisaburo went so far as to claim that he himself was the authentic leader of Japan. This opposition led the movement to develop a powerful utopian vision of the ideal society and to construct a model of such a society in Kyoto Prefecture, at Ayabe City, at the center of which is the Miroku-den (Hall of the Future Buddha, Maitreya) and the Choseiden sanctuary.

Government persecution followed the establishment of this center; the movement's buildings were destroyed in 1921 and in 1935, and Deguchi Onisaburo was imprisoned on the charge of lèse-majesté. In 1935 the movement was dissolved. At this stage the estimated size of the membership was 2 million. Omoto would never again attract so many people.

In January 1946 Deguchi Onisaburo reorganized the movement and registered it as a religious juridical entity with the name Omoto Aizenen (Grand Source of the Community of Love and Virtue). In 1952 it adopted its present name of Omoto.

Omoto's teachings are contained in the Ofudesaki (The Tip of the Divine Writing Brush), written by Deguchi Nao, who is said to have been illiterate, under the inspiration of the deity Ushitora-no-Konjin (Great Father God). In this sacred text Deguchi Nao predicts the destruction of humanity and calls for a return to traditional ways of living and for the construction of the Kingdom of Miroku.

Among Deguchi Onisaburo's contributions to the movement's spiritual development and teaching is his insistence on art as meditation and prayer, as a spiritual discipline in its own right. Omoto also practices a form of meditation known as chinkon kishin, which leads to union with God. Once a month Omoto holds a communal service with roots in classical Shinto beliefs that see the divine everywhere in nature. A number of annual festivals convey the same sense of Omoto's Shinto roots, the most important being the Spring Festival, or Setsubun, which commemorates the day on which God revealed himself to Deguchi Nao; the Miroku Festival in April; and the Harvest Festival during which a pilgrimage is made to the Hill of Ten'nodaira (Imperial Flat Hill) where Nao, Onisaburo, and Sumi are buried.

Since Deguchi Nao's death, the movement has been headed by her female descendants. Its current head is Kiyoko, her great-great-granddaughter. Omoto's administrative headquarters are at Kameoka City, Kyoto Prefecture, where it has built the Ten-onkyo (Holy Grounds) and the Bansho-den (Hall of a Million Beatitudes). Although its membership in Japan has declined to around 150,000, Omoto has exercised great influence on the development of the teachings and practices of other Japanese new religions, particularly Seicho-No-Ie (House of Growth) and Sekai Kyusei Kyo (The Church of World Messianity).

Omoto has very few members outside Japan. It is nonetheless very active abroad in pursuit of its objectives. Among its main activities are programs for the protection of the environment, organic farming, the teaching of Esperanto, interreligious dialogue, and ecumenism. It participates in numerous joint projects with Christian, Muslim, and Buddhist movements, among others, and supports the construction of a world government. It sees the nation-state and the teaching of specific languages as dangerously divisive.

Omoto Tokyo Headquarters
2-1-44 Ikenohata
Taito-ku, Tokyo 110-0008
Japan
<http://www.oomoto.or.jp/>

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Konkokyo; Seicho-No-Ie; Sekai Kyusei Kyo; Tenrikyo; Tensho Kotai Jingukeyo.

References

- Berthon, Jean-Pierre. Omoto, esperance millenariste d'une nouvelle religion Japonaise. Paris (Atelier Alpha Bleue): Cahiers d'Etudes et de Documents sur les Religions du Japon, 1985.
- Hardacre, Helen. "Gender and the Millennium in Omotokyo." In Japanese Civilization in the Modern World, edited by T. Humasao, H. Hardacre, and H. Nakamaki, 47–62. Osaka: National Museum of Ethnography, 1990.
- Hino, I. P. The Ofudesaki: The Holy Scriptures of Omoto. Kameoka, Japan: Omoto Foundation, 1974.
- Ooms, Emily Grosz. Women and Millenarian Protest in Meiji Japan: Deguchi Nao and Omotokyo. New York: Cornell University East Asia Program, 1993.

Ontakekyo

Ontakekyo (Great Mountain Sect) is a Shinto-based Japanese religion. In the early 19th century, Shimoyama Osuke, a devotee of nature worship, founded Ontakekyo. Also known as Mitakekyo, Ontakekyo is one of the religious groups included among the "Sect Shinto" (kyoha shinto), those autonomous religious organizations that the Japanese government recognized between 1868 and 1945. The government recognized Ontakekyo as an independent sect within Shinto in 1882. By the late 20th century, an extensive study of Japanese religions carried out by Horii and other Japanese scholars (1981) had identified about 15 groups that were derived from Ontakekyo.

Ontakekyo is a mountain worship sect. Like many other religious movements in Japan, it was initially a voluntary association of people who were interested in climbing mountains as a religious discipline. As a devotional association, Ontakekyo encouraged the ritual climbing of Mount Ontake. The group's founder, Shimoyama, gathered like-minded devotees and established a permanent structure for the pilgrimage to Mount Ontake. Even today the popularity of Mount Ontake among the Japanese as a place of pilgrimage and religious practice is quite apparent in various areas, where small hills, such as the one in Nisshin-shi, Aichi Prefecture, are identified as Ontakesan. By climbing Ontakesan, pilgrims intend to produce newly empowered spiritual strength.

Mount Ontake, 10,049 feet high, is located on the border between Nagano and Gifu prefectures of central Japan. Among the Japanese, it is popularly called Ontakesan (Great Mountain) and has for centuries been regarded as a sacred mountain. From the latter part of the Sengoku (Civil War) period (1467–1568), the Shinto shrine on the summit of Ontakesan has functioned as an object of worship.

Characteristic features of the Ontakekyo include its stress on ascetic training and the worship of mountain deities. For the members of Ontakekyo, Ontake Okami (the Great Kami of Mount Ontake) is the primary object of worship. As a divine being, Ontake Okami combines three divine bodies: Kunitokotachi no Mikoto, Onamuchi no Mikoto, and Sukunahikona no Mikoto.

Japanese farmers believe mountains such as Ontakesan are holy places where divinities dwell. In early spring, they select a day to worship Ontakesan. This religious practice is connected with the folk belief that the god of the mountain (yama no kami) descends from the mountain to the rice fields in spring.

Even today, in summer, pious devotees dressed in white robes climb the mountain to reach Ontake Shrine as an act of religious piety. A bus takes the pilgrims partway up the mountain, but the remainder of the pilgrimage to the summit is an arduous one, particularly in the winter months. In winter, Mount Ontake is covered with snow and only very rarely do pilgrims climb the mountain, as it takes some 12 hours for the journey. Until the early 19th century, women were not allowed to climb Mount Ontake beyond the Mitake Shrine.

As a religious group, Ontakekyo aims to generate purity of heart, to realize divine virtues, and to contribute toward a stable nation, rich with spirituality. Members interpret the vicissitudes of life, such as fortune and misfortune, happiness and unhappiness, as indications of divine will. Although they engage in possession and healing, they also practice ascetic and purification rituals, such as chinka-shiki (rite of pacifying fire) and kugatachi-shiki (rite of sprinkling hot water), and a variety of divination and breathing exercises.

Ontakekyo
3775 Aza Obuchi
Futana-machi
Nara-shi, Nara-ken 631
Japan

Mahinda Deegalle

See also: Pilgrimage.

References

- Bocking, Brian. A Popular Dictionary of Shinto. Surrey, UK: Curzon Press, 1996.
- Hori, Ichiro, et al., eds. Japanese Religion: A Survey by the Agency for Cultural Affairs. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 1981.

Ordo Templi Orientis

The Ordo Templi Orientis is the largest branch of an Esoteric tradition dating back to the occult milieu as it existed in Europe during the first decades of the 20th century. During his long occult career, British magus Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) ultimately took control of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO). The organization had been established in Germany by Theodor Reuss (1855–1923), based on certain ideas developed by Austrian businessman Carl Kellner (1850–1905). Not all members of the OTO accepted Crowley's flamboyant authority, however, and several "pre-Crowleyan" OTOs are still in existence to this day. Crowley's death in 1947 was followed by a complicated struggle for succession. At present, there are more than 100 rival “Crowleyan” OTOs (in addition to several “pre-Crowleyan”) throughout the world. The largest organization is known as the “Caliphate” OTO, based both on the title of “Caliph” granted to its leaders, and on a joke by Crowley himself on the phonetic similarity between “Caliph” and “California.” The Caliphate has successfully claimed rights to the trademark OTO, at least in the United States, and to the copyright on Crowley’s writings in certain countries.

Forerunners of the Caliphate OTO include the organization created in the United States by Charles Stansfeld Jones (1886–1950), Crowley’s one-time “magickal son”, and the Agapé Lodge, founded in Pasadena by Wilfred Talbot Smith (1885–1957), and which claimed rocket scientist Jack Parsons (1914–1952) as its most famous (or notorious) member. The present-day Caliphate OTO traces its direct origins back to German-born Karl Germer (1885–1962), a prominent disciple of Crowley who moved to California and claimed to be his successor (although he was not particularly active in running the OTO as an organization). Germer’s own succession is also a somewhat disputed matter. Both in American courts of justice and among a significant section of Crowley’s followers in the United States (and several other countries), Grady Louis McMurtry (1918–1985) gained official recognition as Germer’s legitimate successor, taking the name Hymenaeus Alpha. In 1982, the Caliphate OTO (with McMurtry as its leader) was legally incorporated in the United States. McMurtry died in 1985, and French-born William Breeze, a member of its New York chapter, became his successor under the name of Hymenaeus Beta.

What is Crowleyan “orthodoxy” and who is, or is not, loyal to Crowley’s teaching is a matter of endless debate among the many contentious OTO branches throughout the world. But, be that as it may be, the Caliphate OTO is certainly one of the organizations most loyal to Crowley, whose main writings, published in The Holy Book of Thelema, are regarded by the membership as holy scripture, with particular emphasis on the Book of the Law, received by Crowley through magical revelation in Cairo in 1904. The Ca-liphate’s initiatory system, in 13 degrees, is also quite similar to Crowley’s, and includes the various teachings on sexual magic for which Crowley is both famous and infamous.

At present (2008), the Caliphate OTO counts 3,218 members throughout the world, in 151 official groups in 45 different countries.

Ordo Templi Orientist

Postfach 33 20 12

D-14180 Berlin

Germany

<http://oto-usa.org/>.

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Crowley, Aleister; Thelema.

References

Crowley, Aleister. Magick. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

Heidrick, Bill. Magick and Qabalah. Berkeley, CA: Ordo Templi Orientis, 1980.

The Holy Book of Thelema. York Beach, ME: Samuel Weiser, 1988.

Hymenaeus Beta, ed. The Equinox 3, no. 10. New York: Thelema Publications, 1986.

Reuss, Theodor, and Aleister Crowley. OTO Rituals and Sex Magick. Ed. by A. R. Naylor. Thames: I-H-O Books, 1999.

Symonds, John. The Beast 666: The Life of Aleister Crowley. London: The Pindar Press, 1997.

Organization of African Instituted Churches

The Organization of African Independent Churches (OAIC) was founded in 1978 in Cairo, Egypt. The link with Egypt was significant, for African Initiated Churches (AICs) saw Egypt and Ethiopia as the birthplaces of the oldest independent churches in Africa, the Coptic Orthodox Church and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tawahedo Church, both established alternatives to Western Christianity. Many previous attempts to bring together AICs in ecumenical associations had ended in failure. By 1985 the All Africa Conference of Churches (AACC) had accepted only 15 AICs into membership and the World Council of Churches (WCC) had admitted only 7, out of literally hundreds of applications to both organizations from across Africa.

Then AIC leaders Reuben Spartas of Uganda and Arthur Gathuna of Kenya pioneered the links with the Coptic Church, first visiting Cairo in 1943. AICs in several African countries began to form national councils, and by 1986 some 95 such councils had been formed, a remarkable achievement although 41 of these councils were in South Africa and Nigeria. The Kenya African United Churches was the first to be established in Kenya, in 1961, through the efforts of James Ochwatta of the African Orthodox Church. This success was short-lived, however, and in 1963 Ochwatta helped form the East African United Churches, which included all the large AICs in Kenya and was supported by politicians like Jomo Kenyatta (ca. 1891–1978), first president of Kenya, and Oginga Odinga (ca. 1911–1994). Zakayo Kivuli of the Africa Israel Church, Nineveh, was grand metropolitan of the organization, Lucas Nuhu of the Holy Spirit Church of East Africa was chairman, and Ochwatta was general secretary. This council unsuccessfully tried to register with the Kenyan government and to join the AACC and the WCC. In 1984 it was renamed the International Holy Spirit and United Indigenous Churches, with Nuhu as chair.

In 1976 Pope Shenouda III (b. 1923), Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, consecrated M. S. Mikhail as bishop of African affairs, and Mikhail took the name Bishop Antonious Markos. From his office in Nairobi, Bishop Markos began an extensive tour of AICs all over Africa, met political and mainline church leaders, and gained financial support for development projects for AICs. Two years later, Pope Shenouda invited 20 significant AIC leaders to the inauguration of the OAIC in Cairo, with the basic aim of facilitating teaching, training, and theological education. The executive elected at this time included (among others) Joseph Diangienda of the Kimbanguist Church in the Congo as a member, Nigeria's Primate E. O. A. Adajobi of the Church of the Lord (Aladura) as chairman, and Bishop Markos as organizing secretary. The second conference was held in 1982 in Nairobi, with representatives from 17 African nations and 31 AICs. A constitution was approved and Bishop Mathew Ajuoga of the Church of Christ in Africa (Kenya) was elected chairman, a post he held for 15 years.

In 1985 the name of the OAIC was changed to the Organization of African Instituted Churches at the request of the Kenyan government, and registration was effected. Bishop Markos resigned as OAIC executive secretary in 1990 after increasing tension with AIC leaders, and in 1995 the OAIC reorganized itself into eight regional groupings. The first issue of an official OAIC magazine, Baragumu: The African Independent Churches Voice, was launched in 1996. The third conference of the OAIC was held in 1997, when Nigerian Baba Aladura Dr. G. I. M. Otubu of the Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim was elected chairman. The new general secretary was Kenyan Archbishop Njeru Wambugu of the National Independent Church of Africa.

Then a significant shift in policy was made—member churches could become members of the OAIC only through their regional councils and could no longer join by applying directly to the international office. The OAIC office in Nairobi continues to be actively involved in projects for theological education by extension and development. One of the questions facing the OAIC and its member churches at the beginning of a new millennium was how to progress with assistance from the North without losing precious independence and identity to the new form of dependency euphemistically called “partnership.” The question becomes all the more relevant as many African countries spiral into greater economic crisis and debt.

Organization of African Instituted Churches
PO Box 21736
Nairobi
Kenya

Allan H. Anderson

See also: Africa Israel Church, Nineveh; African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Orthodox Church; All Africa Conference of Churches; Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim; Church of the Lord; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Kimbanguist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Barrett, David B., and T. John Padwick. Rise Up and Walk! Conciliarism and the African Indigenous Churches, 1815–1987. Nairobi: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Consultation with African Instituted Churches, Ogere, Nigeria, 9–14 January 1996*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1996.
- “Organization of African Instituted Churches.” Baragumu: The African Independent Churches Voice 1 (1996).

Orthodox Church in America

The Orthodox Church in America dates to the arrival of the first Orthodox priests in Alaska from Russia following the Russian discovery of Alaska in 1741. The first convert, an Aleut, was baptized in 1843. The mission expanded slowly through the rest of the century, and in 1794 seven monks came to Paul’s Harbor and formally consecrated the first church. In 1824 Father John Veniaminov (1797–1879), later consecrated as the first American bishop, arrived. He oversaw the construction of the cathedral in Sitka and of a seminary that was opened in 1841. He later returned to Russia to become head of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) and in 1977 was canonized as Saint Innocent.

A significant change came to the mission diocese in 1867, when Alaska was purchased by the United States from Russia. The church was cut off from its parent, and in 1872 the bishop moved to San Francisco, California; the church was reorganized as the Russian Orthodox Church, Diocese of the Aleutian Islands and North America. The establishment of the church in San Francisco gave Russian Orthodoxy hegemony over the Orthodox community in North America, though that hegemony would later be challenged by the Ecumenical Patriarchate, which has oversight over the Greek Orthodox outside of Greece proper.

Under Bishop Nicholas (r. 1891–1898), beginning in 1891, the church experienced a period of growth. As the mission work in Alaska expanded, thousands of Russians were pouring into the United States and Canada and new parishes were springing up rapidly in the eastern half of the nation. In addition, Orthodox Christians from other lands were also coming to the United States, and initially, most of these believers found their church home in the Russian churches. As the number of non-Russian Orthodox believers grew, ethnic parishes would be organized and eventually new ethnic dioceses formed as autonomous jurisdictions. During the first half of the 20th century the whole spectrum of Eastern Orthodox church life appeared in America. In the process, the head of the American Russian Orthodox was elevated to the office of archbishop and additional dioceses appeared—Alaska, Cleveland (Ohio), Brooklyn (New York), and Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania).

The steady progress of the church was disrupted during World War I by events in Russia. The Russian Revolution swept the czar, with whom the Russian church had always had a special relationship, from power and left the Moscow Patriarchate under the thumb of an aggressively atheist regime. The American church found its funds cut off even as it had to accommodate a new wave of refugees from the revolution. In the 1920s the patriarch of Moscow was arrested, and in 1923 the American leadership was faced with the arrival of representatives of the Russian church loyal to the new government and demanding control of the church and its property. In 1924, the American Archdiocese rejected the Russian representatives, declared its autonomy from Moscow, and reorganized as the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of America.

Those priests and members who remained loyal to the patriarch in spite of the changes in Russia also reorganized and took the new schismatic (as they saw it) church to court. They scored a major victory, winning the headquarters property, St. Nicolas Cathedral in New York City. This small faction continued under the leadership of Bishop John Kedrovsky (1879–1934). Their position was somewhat undermined by the arrival in 1933 of yet another bishop from Moscow—Benjamin Fedchenkov (1880–1961). He represented a position of accommodation to the presence of the Communist government in Russia, but he was seen as less accepting of its domination of the Patriarchate. He was thus able to build a following of Russians who wished to remain under the jurisdiction of Moscow. Eventually the Kedrovsky faction merged into what became known as the American Exarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Russian Orthodox church and cemetery in Ninilchik, Kenai Peninsula, Alaska. (Oksanaphoto/Dreamstime.com)

In 1970 the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church and the American Exarchate reached an agreement, the result of many years of negotiation and consideration of the position of the Russian Church as the initial Orthodox body in the United States. The Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church changed its name to the Orthodox Church in America and recognized the spiritual leadership of the Russian Patriarchate. The Patriarchate, in return, acknowledged the autonomy of the American church. The Exarchate dissolved and its members and parishes merged into the new Orthodox Church in America. A small number of parishes wished to remain under the direct authority of the patriarch of Moscow and reorganized as the Patriarchal Parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church in the U.S.A. This group remained in possession of St. Nicolas Cathedral in New York City.

In the meantime, as the main body of Russian Orthodox believers had found their way to accommodate the changes in Russia, one group refused to acknowledge the changes in Russia. Under the leadership of several bishops who had been placed in charge of the Russian church in diaspora prior to the revolution, they reorganized as a continuing Russian Orthodox church in vocal opposition to the Moscow Patriarchy and its accommodation with the Communist government. Over the years, this faction, now known as the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia, came to embody the most conservative element of Russian Orthodoxy and has rejected the post-Communist emergence of the Russian Orthodox Church for its movement into the ecumenical world and its attachment to the World Council of Churches.

The Orthodox Church in America is headed by its archbishop, and the U.S. parishes are grouped into 13 dioceses. There are also one Canadian diocese and an Exarchate in Mexico. The Diocese of South America includes one parish in Brazil and three in Venezuela. The church is a leading member of the Standing Conference of Canonical Orthodox Bishops, which includes most of the larger Orthodox bodies in the United States. Also operating under the canonical jurisdiction of the Orthodox Church in America are the Albanian Orthodox Archdiocese and the Romanian Orthodox Episcopate of America—the result of splits in the Romanian and Albanian churches after their home countries fell under Communist control.

The Orthodox Church in America reports some 1 million members while recognizing that its active membership, served by its 700 priests, is far less. It supports St. Tikkon's Orthodox Theological Seminary in South Canaan, Pennsylvania, and St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary in Tuckahoe, New York. It is a member of the World Council of Churches. The leader of the church, His Beatitude, Metropolitan Jonah (born James Paffhausen), is a former Episcopalian who converted to Orthodoxy. He was consecrated to the episcopacy and elected as the metropolitan in 2008.

Orthodox Church in America
PO Box 675
Syosset, NY 11791-0675
<http://www.oca.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; World Council of Churches.

References

- Koulomzim, Sophie. The Orthodox Christian Church through the Ages. New York: Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of America, 1956.
- Tarasar, Constance. Orthodox America, 1794–1976: Development of the Orthodox Church in America. Syosset, NY: Orthodox Church in America, Department of Archives and History, 1975.

Orthodox Church in China

Orthodox Christianity came to China in the 17th century, brought in 1686 by Cossacks serving in the Chinese imperial guard. A permanent mission in Beijing was established in 1715, which over the course of several centuries welcomed some 5,000 converts. The church swelled enormously in the 1920s, when some 300,000 believers fled into China from the effects of the Communist revolution in Russia. By the time of the Chinese revolution, there were some 106 Orthodox churches in China. Most participants were Russian expatriates, though some 10,000 members were also among the faithful.

Following the Chinese revolution, all foreign missionaries were required to leave, and many of the members also returned to Russia. In 1957 the church was granted autonomous status, and bishops established in Beijing and Shanghai. The Cultural Revolution (launched in 1966) almost destroyed the church—the churches were closed and all property was confiscated.

It was not until the 1980s that a revival of Orthodoxy in China was possible. Father Grigori Zhu Shi Fu (d. 2000) began regular services again in October 1981, at the Church of the Holy Protection in Harbin-Nangang. A second church was opened later some 16 miles from Harbin, where many Orthodox believers are buried in the cemetery. It is used on special occasions. The church in Beijing has been restored but turned into a museum.

In Xinjiang Province there are some 3,500 orthodox and reconstruction of a church at Urumqi was completed in 1990, though there is no priest to conduct services. Believers in Shanghai and Beijing have as yet not been allowed to organize for services.

On February 17, 1997, the 40th anniversary of the Orthodox Church in China was celebrated. The Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) accepted a new level of responsibility for the Orthodox believers in China, especially until a new leader of the church can be elected.

The Orthodox Church can be contacted at 270 Bolshoi Prospect, Harbin, China. It is not among the officially recognized religious bodies in the People's Republic of China. As of 2004, there were an estimated 13,000 Orthodox believers in China (not including Hong Kong) with parishes in Xinjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Harbin. There were as yet no priests serving the parishes.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

Meyer, Jean François. "Toward a Rebirth of the Orthodox Church in China. Interview with Mitrophan Chin." <http://www.orthodoxytoday.org/articles5/MayerChina.shtml>. Accessed December 15, 2008.
Orthodoxy in China. <http://orthodox.cn/>.

Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia

Eastern Orthodoxy was introduced into what is now the Czech Republic and Slovakia in the ninth century CE as part of the general spread of Christianity among the Slavic peoples. The area was overrun by the Hungarians in 906, and the Roman Catholic Church became the dominant religious community, though some churches retained the Eastern rite. Only in the 20th century, with the establishment of the independent state of Czechoslovakia in 1918, was Orthodoxy able to reassert its independent existence.

In 1925 the re-established Orthodox Church of Czechoslovakia came under the protection and guidance of the Serbian Orthodox Church and the patriarch residing in Belgrade. The small church experienced a sudden growth when, in 1930, some 25,000 Eastern-rite Catholics converted to Orthodoxy. The church's growth was halted during World War II when the Nazi government disbanded it and executed its leader, Bishop Gorazd (1879–1942), who had been the major force in founding the church.

The church was reorganized after World War II, and since the new government did not recognize Eastern-rite Catholicism, the remaining Eastern-rite Catholics were placed under the Orthodox bishop. Then in 1951, the Serbian Patriarchate recognized the autonomy of the Orthodox Church of Czechoslovakia. In 1968, as new freedoms were introduced into the country, many of the members returned to Roman Catholicism. The rebuilding of Eastern Catholicism created some harsh feelings, as buildings and property were turned over to the new Catholic body. Disputes over property between the two bodies continue to the present.

Following the separation of the former Czechoslovakia into the Czech Republic and Slovakia, the church adopted its present name. There is an archbishop in Prague and one in Presov, Slovakia. In 2005 the church reported some 75,000 members with 167 of its 242 parishes in Slovakia. It supports the Orthodox theological faculty at Presov University, and is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia
V. Jamé 6
PO Box 655
CZ-111 21, Prague 1
Czech Republic

Orthodox Church in Czech Lands and Slovakia
Budovatelska ul. 1
SK-080 01 Presov
Slovakia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Serbian Orthodox Church; World Council of Churches.

References

Giannaras, Chrestos. The Church in Post-Communist Europe. Crestwood, NY: Interorthodox Press, 2003.
Novak, G. "The Orthodox Church in Czechoslovakia." Orthodoxy (1964): 240–252.
Orthodoxia. Regensburg, Germany: Ostkirchliches Institut, issued annually.

Orthodox Church of Cyprus

Christianity on the island of Cyprus began with the arrival of the biblical Apostles Paul and Barnabas, who had been commissioned as missionaries at Antioch (Acts 13:2) and proceeded to Cyprus as one of the first stops on their initial tour. The church in Cyprus developed under the authority of Antioch until its autonomy was proclaimed by the church's Council of Ephesus in 431 CE. The ruling had the effect of granting the synod of Cypriot bishops the right to select their own archbishop. The church developed in the Eastern Orthodox orb and shares the same faith and practice with other Orthodox bodies.

With the spread of Islam in the seventh century, Cyprus became a target of Muslim raiders. At one point, many of the Christians, including the archbishop, relocated to Nea Justiniana, a city on the Dardanelles, where the Byzantine emperor could more easily provide protection. When the crisis passed and the archbishop returned to Cyprus, he added the title of archbishop of Nea Justiniana to his own; the Cypriot bishop is known by that designation to the present.

As part of a Crusade to recover Jerusalem, the British King Richard the Lionhearted (1157–1199) conquered Cyprus in 1191. The next year it was turned over to Guy de Lusignan (1129–1194), the former king of Jerusalem, whose Christian nation had been wiped out by the Muslim sultan Saladin (ca. 1137–1193) in 1187–1188. De Lusignan and his successors, who were Catholic, attempted to impose Latin Christianity on Cyprus, and for the next three centuries, the Orthodox Church found itself in retreat and fighting to survive.

The dominance of the Roman Catholic Church on Cyprus continued until 1571, when the emergent Turks, having captured Constantinople, overran the island. The new Muslim rulers removed the Roman bishops, recognized the Orthodox Church, and even granted it some degree of autonomy. As was common elsewhere in the expanding Turkish (Ottoman) Empire, Orthodox bishops were assigned a position in the civil government, with authority over the Greek-speaking Cypriots. This situation worked well until 1821, when the Greek citizens staged an unsuccessful revolt. In response, the Turks killed all the Orthodox bishops. New leadership that possessed the required apostolic authority (granted only by ordination and consecration by recognized bishops) had to be reintroduced from Antioch.

Real change came only in 1878, when the British leased the island from Turkey and subsequently annexed it (1914). The British granted independence to Cyprus in 1960. Archbishop Makarios III (1913–1977) became the first president of the new country, a move that continued the traditional political role played by Orthodox bishops but was nonetheless extremely controversial.

In 1973 the three other bishops of the Church of Cyprus created a national crisis by declaring that Makarios was no longer archbishop. The patriarchs of the other Orthodox churches in the region (Antioch, Jerusalem, Alexandria, and the Church of Greece) assumed authority to act and deposed the rebellious bishops. They also assisted in the appointment of three new bishops. However, this crisis was no sooner resolved than the continuing tension between the Greek and Turkish communities on the island became the excuse for Turkey to invade Cyprus and carve out a (still disputed) Turkish nation in the northern third of the island. The Orthodox Church lost many churches that were looted and/or destroyed in the takeover. For the next two decades no Orthodox priests were allowed into the area, though in 1994 two priests were allowed in to lead worship at St. Andrew Monastery, on the Karpas Peninsula.

The church is led by His Beatitude Chrysostomos, archbishop of Nea Justiniana and All Cyprus (b. 1927). Besides the Archdiocese of Nicosia, there are five additional dioceses on Cyprus. In 2005, the church reported 654,000 members. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Orthodox Church of Cyprus, Office of the Archbishop
PO Box 21 130
1502 Nicosia
Cyprus
<http://www.church.cy.net>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Englezakis, Benedict. Studies on the History of the Church of Cyprus, 4th–20th Centuries. London: Variorum, 1995.
- Hackett, John. A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus. New York: Burt Franklin, 1972.

Ioannou, M. Studies in the History of the Church of Cyprus, 4th–20th Centuries. Aldershot, England: Variorum, 1995.

Orthodox Church of Greece

The Orthodox Church of Greece is the 11th-ranking autocephalous church in the Eastern Orthodox communion. It includes the great majority of Orthodox Christians in Greece, where it is officially recognized as the predominant religion in the country. The entrance of Christianity to Greece is recorded in the Bible (Acts 16:9ff.), which tells us that the Apostle Paul responded to a dream calling him to Macedonia. The developing church eventually fell under the direct supervision of the Patriarchate at Constantinople, under whose authority it remained until the 19th century. In the meantime, Greece was conquered (1460) and incorporated into the Turkish Ottoman Empire.

The 1821 Greek revolution against Turkish rule culminated in the sultan's acceptance of Greek independence in the Treaty of Adrianople in 1829. The Orthodox Church had played a prominent role in the revolution and paid a heavy price for it: when the uprising began in 1821, the Ottoman government hanged Ecumenical Patriarch Gregorios V and a number of metropolitans at the gate of the patriarchal compound in Constantinople.

In 1833 the fledgling government of the new Greek kingdom declared the country's Orthodox Church autocephalous and established at its head a five-member permanent synod of bishops presided over by the king. This unilateral break with Constantinople and the establishment of a state-controlled church disrupted relations with the other Orthodox churches. After lengthy negotiations, the situation was regularized on June 29,

Interior of Saint Dimitrios of Thessaloniki, a Greek Orthodox church. (Panagiotis Karapanagiotis/Dreamstime.com)

1850, when Constantinople granted a Tomos, or official declaration, of autocephaly to the Orthodox Church of Greece. This declaration specified that the archbishop of Athens would preside over the Holy Synod and restored relations with the other Orthodox churches.

As Greece annexed more territory at the expense of the Ottomans, more Orthodox dioceses were received into the Orthodox Church of Greece. The large area of northern Greece acquired in 1912 remained under the Ecumenical Patriarchate until 1928, when those dioceses were provisionally placed under the administration of the Greek church. The dioceses in Crete and the Dodecanese Islands, as well as the monastic republic of Mount Athos, have remained under the Ecumenical Patriarchate to this day. Official statistics indicate that 96 percent of the Greek population today self-identifies as Orthodox, 2 percent as Muslim, and 1 percent as Catholic.

Over time, secular influence in church affairs has gradually decreased. However, the present Greek Constitution (1975) continues to recognize Orthodoxy as the “prevailing” religion in Greece and forbids proselytism. It also specifies that the Orthodox Church of Greece is “governed by the Holy Synod of all functioning bishops,” and by the permanent Holy Synod made up of members of the “first,” a structure that respects the provisions of the 1850 Tomos. The Greek Parliament enacted the current Charter of the Church of Greece in 1977. The Holy Synod is currently made up of 12 bishops and the archbishop of Athens, who presides over it.

The once-flourishing monastic tradition in Greece suffered greatly at the time of independence, when the new government closed most of the monasteries and convents. Subsequent wars and the Communist insurgency in the 1940s weakened it still further, and by the 1960s its future appeared bleak. But a modest revival has taken place since that time, with a significant influx of young men and women into the monasteries, especially on Mount Athos, where the number of monks has doubled since 1980.

There are theology faculties at the universities of Athens and Thessalonica, along with several seminaries for the training of parish priests. Most of the distinguished theologians of the Greek church are laymen. The church has been heavily involved in philanthropic activity, maintaining many orphanages, homes for the aged, and similar institutions. Total church membership is estimated at about 9 million. The Orthodox Church of Greece is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Orthodox Church of Greece
His Beatitude Archbishop Hieronymos II
14 Ioannou Glennadiou St.
GR-115 21 Athens
Greece

<http://www.ecclesia.gr/> (Greek and English versions)

Ronald Roberson

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; World Council of Churches.

References

- Frazer, C. The Orthodox Church and Independent Greece, 1821–1852. London: Cambridge University Press, 1969.
- Hammond, P. The Waters of Marah: The Present State of the Greek Church. London: Rockliff, 1956.
- Roudometof, V. “Orthodoxy as Public Religion in Post-1989 Greece.” In Eastern Orthodoxy in a Global Age: Tradition Faces the Twenty-First Century, edited by V. Roudometof et al. Walnut Creek, CA: Alta Mira, 2005.
- Stavrou, T. “The Orthodox Church of Greece.” In Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century, edited by Pedro Ramet, 183–207. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1988.

Orthodox Church of Poland

The Orthodox Church in Poland (Polski Autokefaliczny Kościół Prawosławny) started with the conquests in the East by King Kazimierz the Great (1310–1370) in the 14th century. His efforts for an independent Orthodox Church in Poland resulted in the appointment of a separate Polish metropolitan soon after his death. Some tension arose between the Orthodox Church and the Roman Catholic Church with the introduction of the Gregorian calendar by royal decree in 1582, though the major conflict emerged following the Union of Brzesc in 1596. A newly formed Uniate Church, combining its relationship with the pope with the Orthodox liturgy, started to attract Orthodox bishops. However, an independent Orthodox hierarchy was restored in 1620. In 1667 the metropolitan of Kiev accepted the authority of the patriarch of Moscow, which would later undergird interventions into Polish internal affairs by the Russian czar. The Orthodox Church was strongly supported by the czarist authorities during the partition of Poland. The Union of Brzesc was formally dissolved in the 19th century. Autocephalic status was given to the Polish Orthodox Church by the ecumenical patriarch in 1924, though the Synod of the Russian Church, the mother-church for Poland, accepted the fact only in 1948.

The head of the Polish Orthodox Church, for almost a quarter of a century, was His Eminence, Highly Blessed Bazyli (Włodzimierz Dorosz Kiewicz, 1914–1998), the late metropolitan of Warsaw and the Whole of Poland. He was succeeded by the present Metropolitan Sawa (Michał Hrycuniak, b. 1938). There are dioceses at Białystok, Gdansk, Lodz, Poznan, Wrocław, Szczecin, Przemyśl, and Nowy Sącz, as well as at Lublin and Chelm. The church's main administrative organization, the General Synod, consists of bishops and representatives of both clergy and laity. The Council of Bishops deals with matters exceeding the competence of particular bishops. The Council is the executive body of the Synod of Bishops chaired by the metropolitan of Warsaw.

The Orthodox Church of Poland took under its jurisdiction the Diocese of Aquilei (Italy) in 1988, the Metropolia of Lisbon along with four Portuguese dioceses in 1991 and a missionary diocese in Brazil. The church counts around 555,000 members residing in 250 parishes. They use 325 churches and chapels supervised by 273 priests (1997). The main press organ is the monthly Przegląd Prawosławny/Orthodoxia (5,000 copies). Additional periodicals include Biuletyn Informacyjny Kola Teologów Prawosławnych (1,000 copies) and Wiadomości Bractwa (1,500 copies).

In 1957, the Section of Orthodox Theology was formed in the Christian Academy of Theology (ChAT) in Warsaw, and there is also an Orthodox seminary in Warsaw. The biggest Polish Orthodox sanctuary and the best-known pilgrimage center is the Holy Mountain Grabarka (south of Białystok), with its monastery of Saints Martha and Mary. Up to 60,000 pilgrims gather here annually on August 19, the Day of the Lord's Transfiguration. Additional important pilgrimage centers include the Monastery of Saint Onufry in Jableczna, and Zabłudow, the birthplace of the martyr Gabriel Zabłudowski, the only Orthodox saint born within the boundaries of contemporary Poland. Other Orthodox sanctuaries are found at Rogacze, Suprasl, Odrynki, Krynoczka, Puchly, Nowa Wola, Stary, Kornin, Piatienka, Swieta Woda, Saki, and Tokary. The biggest center of Orthodox Christians in Poland is the Cathedral of Saint Nicolas at Białystok (ca. 100,000 people).

Polski Autokefaliczny Kościół Prawosławny
(Orthodox Church of Poland)
al. Solidarnosci 52
03-402 Warszawa
Poland

Lesław Borowski

See also: Calendars, Religious; Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate).

References

- Adamczuk, L., and A. Mirowicz. Kościół Prawosławny w Polsce. Dawniej i dziś. Warsaw: GUS and Warszawska Metropolia Prawosławna, 1993.
- The Orthodox Eastern Church in Poland. Past and Present*. London: Polish Research Centre, n.d.

Orthodox Judaism

Through the 19th century, the European and American Jewish communities experienced the challenges of post-emancipation modern life and an emerging, majority, secular culture that persistently sought to integrate and absorb the Jewish community into itself. In partial response to this new situation, a new form of Judaism that consciously tried to adapt to modern culture developed. Reform Judaism made a number of changes to traditional Jewish life, replacing traditional practices that were deemed nonessential to Jewish identity and inappropriate for the contemporary context. Included in the reforms were the cessation of kosher food standards, the introduction of the vernacular to

An Orthodox Jew prays at the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem. The Wailing Wall is the only wall that remained after the Roman destruction of the Second Temple and it is viewed as one of the holiest places on Earth by many Jews. (Corel) and abbreviation of the worship services, and the ending of separate seating between men and women at synagogue services.

As Reform Judaism emerged, especially in Germany and also among German Jewish immigrants and their children in the United States, traditional rabbis sought to reinvigorate commitment to traditional standards, even as some allowed for accommodations to the wider culture. Orthodox Judaism is the name now given to all elements of the religious Jewish community that demand strict observance of Jewish law and praxis.

Orthodox Judaism is distinguished by its attachment to the written Torah (the Jewish Bible or Tanakh) and the Oral Torah, a tradition explaining what the written Scriptures mean. Orthodox Jews believe that God gave the scriptures to Moses and then taught him the oral tradition, which has been passed down from generation to generation. Around the second century CE, the oral tradition was committed for the first time to writing in the Mishnah. In the centuries after the Mishnah was produced, additional commentaries elaborating on it, called the Gemara, were written down. The Mishnah and the Gemara together constitute the Talmud. Through succeeding centuries, rabbis continued to apply the Halakic process (a system of legal reasoning and interpretation) to the Torah and to these later sacred texts to determine how best to answer new questions as they arose. The Halakic process has given to the Orthodox community the means of dealing with changing situations, and serves as the basis for Orthodox observance.

Among the earliest champions of Orthodoxy in the face of reform were Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888) in Germany and Isaac Leeser (1806–1868) in the United States. For a quarter of a century, Leeser published The Occident and American Jewish Advocate. In the pages of this periodical, he opposed American Reform leader Isaac Mayer Wise (1819–1900) and the spread of Reform Judaism and advocated the unity of the American Jewish community around traditional Jewish practice. Hirsch is known for championing a fully Orthodox belief and practice while living in the modern world; the religious movement he spearheaded in Germany was called neo-Orthodoxy.

The Orthodox in German-speaking communities were the first to feel the full impact of modernity, and they developed an approach that has allowed Orthodox Jewry not only to survive, but, apart from the devastation of the Holocaust, to thrive. Through the 20th century, many flocked to an engaged Orthodoxy as they began to encounter the modern West. As modern Orthodoxy developed, it was distinguished on the one hand from the Reform and Conservative movements, and on the other hand from ultra-Orthodox organizations such as Neturei Karta and Gush Emunim.

Jewish Orthodoxy is split into a number of distinguishable communities. Some of the major divisions are ethnic. The Jews of Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and the Iberian peninsula (Sephardic Judaism) form the major divisions, all of which now appear in strength in North America. Over the centuries, these and other Jewish communities developed a variety of differences that do not affect their status as Orthodox but nevertheless are perpetuated.

Approximately half of the world's 13 million Jews reside in the United States. In the United States the majority of Orthodox Jews are represented by a congregational association and two rabbinical associations. The Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of the United States and Canada emerged in the 1880s, soon after the Reform congregations had organized. Rabbis are served by the Union of Orthodox Rabbis in the United States and Canada, uniting originally rabbis of primarily eastern European origin, whose influence has waned in recent decades, and the Rabbinical Council of America, which includes the rabbis who graduate from New York's Yeshiva University. Other Orthodox congregations are associated with the Young Israel movement. Jews of Iberian heritage are associated with the American Sephardi Federation (15 W. 16th St., New York, NY 10010). Hasidism represents a mystical form of Orthodox Jewry.

In most countries of the world, the Orthodox community is organized nationally. The Conference of European Rabbis represents Orthodox Jews in Europe. Some Jewish communities, though by no means all, have selected a chief rabbi. Such an organization is reflected in modern Israel, where there are two chief rabbis for the state, one for Ashkenazic Jews and one for Sephardic Jews. Agudath Israel is an Orthodox Jewish organization that operates a variety of social service programs in the Jewish community worldwide and represents the interests of Orthodox Jewry to local, regional, and federal governments. Founded in 1912, it seeks to place the Torah in a lead position in the Jewish community as it faces the modern world. The organization has spread globally through the Agudath Israel World Organization.

Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America
11 Broadway
New York, NY 10004
<http://www.ou.org/>

Rabbinical Council of America
305 7th Ave., 12th floor
New York, NY 10001
<http://www.rabbis.org/>

Conference of European Rabbis
87 Hodford Rd.
London NW11 8NH
United Kingdom
<http://www.cer-online.org/>

Israel Chief Rabbinate
Heikhal Shelomo
58 King George St.
Jerusalem
Israel

Agudath Israel World Organization
84 William St.
New York, NY 10038

Pamela S. Nadell and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Conservative Judaism; Gush Emunim; Hasidism; Neturei Karta; Reform Judaism; World Sephardic Federation; Young Israel.

References

- Davidman, Lynn. Tradition in a Rootless World: Women Turn to Orthodox Judaism. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1991.
- Donin, Hayim Halevy. To Be a Jew. New York: Basic Books, 1972, 2001.
- Gurock, Jeffrey. Orthodox Jews in America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2009.
- Heilman, Samuel. Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Orthodoxy. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
- Katz, Jacob. A House Divided: Orthodoxy and Schism in Nineteenth-Century Central European Jewry. Hanover, NH: Brandeis University Press and University Press of New England, 1998.
- Schlussberg, Eli W. The World of Orthodox Judaism. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1997.

Orthodox Presbyterian Church

The Orthodox Presbyterian Church is the major organizational product of the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy in the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) and currently a leading American representative of the evangelical movement. As the Fundamentalist controversy continued in the Presbyterian Church into the 1930s, it became evident that the Modernists, who had aligned themselves with the contemporary trends in science, theology, and the critical study of the Bible, had largely taken control of the church. In 1932 a new phase in the battle focused on the 1932 book Re-thinking Missions by William E. Hocking (1873–1966). Drawing on his experience of the changing needs of the world missionary enterprise, Hocking suggested that Protestant missionaries should not just work for the conversion of non-Christians but should develop Christian social services, especially medical missions. Challenging Hocking's conclusions was J. Gresham Machen (1881–1937), an eminent conservative professor at Princeton Theological Seminary. Machen had inherited the tradition of conservative theology that had been identified with the school, though more liberal theological spokespersons now dominated its faculty.

Machen charged that the church was sending missionaries to foreign fields who did not believe that Jesus Christ was the only way of salvation. He also began to support the Independent Board of Foreign Missions, an agency that attempted to garner support for the sending of conservative Fundamentalist missionaries apart from the official missionary board of the Presbyterian Church. Machen also expanded his critique to the other agencies of the church. As his criticisms grew, church officials charged him with disturbing the peace of the church. He resigned from Princeton in 1929, and from the Presbyterian Church in 1936, and with his supporters he left to found the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. The new church adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith and the two Westminster catechisms (the Longer and Shorter) as its standards of faith.

Shortly after organizing the church, Machen entered into a second controversy with one of his prominent colleagues, Carl McIntire (1906–2002), pastor of a large congregation in Collingswood, New Jersey. Like many of his Fundamentalist colleagues, McIntire had accepted the method of biblical interpretation that had been developed among the Plymouth Brethren, called dispensationalism. He also had become a premillennialist. Machen rejected both views.

McIntire also wanted to continue the work of the Independent Board of Foreign Missions. Machen felt that the work of the Board had been superseded by the new Missionary Board of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

Before their differences were resolved, Machen died in 1937. The following year, McIntire left the Orthodox Presbyterian Church and with his followers founded the Bible Presbyterian Church. McIntire would be the leading spokesperson of the continuing Fundamentalist wing of American Presbyterian through the next generation. In the 1940s, he would lead the relatively small community of fundamentalists in the formation of two interdenominational organizations, the American Council of Christian Churches and the International Council of Christian Churches. The Orthodox Presbyterians would, in the meantime, participate in the development of a new neo-evangelical perspective that would retain its emphasis upon biblical authority and traditional Christian affirmation while attempting to engage in dialogue with contemporary intellectual currents and modern culture. That perspective became embedded in the National Association of Evangelicals.

A relatively small body, in 2006 the Orthodox Presbyterian Church reported 28,486 members in 255 congregations; however, it supports missions in Korea, Japan, China, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, and Surinam. It is a member of the International Conference of Reformed Churches.

Orthodox Presbyterian Church
AT 607 N. Eastern Rd.
Bldg E, Box P
Willow Grove, PA 19090-0920
<http://www.opc.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Conference of Reformed Churches; International Council of Christian Churches; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)

References

Galbraith, John. Why the Orthodox Presbyterian Church? Philadelphia: Committee on Christian Education, Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1965.

Hart, D. G., and John Muether. Fighting the Good Fight: A Brief History of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. Willow Grove, PA: Committee for the Historian of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1995.

The Standards of Government, Discipline, and Worship of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church. Philadelphia: Committee on Christian Education, Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1965.

Osho and the International Osho Movement

Osho, formerly known as Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh (1931–1990), was a controversial spiritual teacher from India whose contemporary devotees include thousands of Americans, Europeans, and Asians.

Since 2000, the Osho spiritual movement has grown increasingly decentralized, and there are local centers in more than 60 countries. With few exceptions, these centers house no more than a few dozen residents, but they attract many more clients and visitors interested in Osho's teachings and meditations. Visiting group leaders, some of whom had direct contact with Osho when he was alive, swell attendance at center classes and events.

The diffuse spiritual movement's official headquarters, Osho Meditation Resort in Pune, Maharashtra, India, has belonged to the Osho (Rajneesh) movement since 1974. It houses a multiversity that offers workshops on personal and spiritual growth and on healing and creative arts. The movement's emphasis, however, is on meditation. There are individual and collective meditations throughout the day and evening.

The Pune meditation resort attracts spiritual tourists, seekers, and longtime Osho devotees alike. Swami Amrito, who was part of an inner circle that Osho appointed to continue his work in the late 1980s, oversees the movement's practical organization.

Around 2000, there was a schism within the Pune inner circle. Amrito successfully supported greater emphasis on Osho's visionary ideas and their diffusion, with less attention to his personal role as an enlightened master. A group led by another member of Osho's last inner circle, Ma Neelam, asserted that Osho's enduring personal legacy could not be separated from his doctrine. She established a competing center in Delhi and later moved to a large headquarters complex open to both devotees and visitors, Nisarga, near the Himalayas in Dharmasala, Himachal Pradesh, India. Despite the tension, many devotees and seekers visit both centers and sustain cordial relations with both, because each group defers to Osho's vision.

Indian spiritual leader and teacher Osho (Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh) at a news conference at the Rajneeshpuram, Oregon on July 20, 1985. (AP Photo/Bill Miller)

From 1958 to 1966, Osho, then known as Rajneesh, taught philosophy, primarily at the University of Jabalpur. He resigned his post in 1966 to travel throughout India as an independent religious teacher. In the early 1970s, he shifted headquarters from his Bombay apartment to the Shree Rajneesh Ashram in Pune.

His synthesis of spirituality with personal growth psychology attracted significant numbers of Westerners. Devotees known as sannyasins often received new names signifying their spiritual rebirth. Rajneesh developed unique meditations, a number involving intense, emotionally cleansing activity preceding stillness. Before his death, Osho shifted his emphasis to meditative therapies encouraging individuals' responsibility for their own personal and spiritual growth.

Osho's philosophical approach blends Western and Eastern traditions, with special emphasis on Zen Buddhism. Important themes include dropping the ego and its conditioned beliefs and integrating the material and the spiritual. The ideal human is "Zorba the Buddha," a consummate being, combining Buddha's spiritual focus with the life-embracing traits of novelist Nikos Kazantzakis's character Zorba. Recent interpretations from leadership at Pune underscore the importance of Zorba, on the grounds that it is easier for a life-embracing individual to develop a spiritual focus, than it is for an inner-directed meditator to embrace earthly pleasures.

At the height of his popularity, Osho was controversial throughout India because of his views on sexual freedom and the encounter groups that attracted so many foreigners to the country. The greatest controversy, however, developed in the United States when Osho settled at the Big Muddy Ranch in central Oregon. From the summer of 1981 until the winter of 1986, several thousand sannyasins labored to create the communal city of Rajneeshpuram and a model agricultural collective. Their dream disintegrated because of financial, legal, and political conflicts, and Rajneesh embarked on a world tour before returning to Pune in 1987. Two years later he took the name Osho, which means "dissolving into the totality of existence." He died on January 19, 1990.

In the wake of the exodus from Rajneeshpuram, a number of people left the movement. Several movement leaders were convicted of crimes against outsiders and also other devotees. A few former sannyasins, such as Anand Somendra, Paul Lowe, Margo Anand, and Swami Virato, have become independent spiritual teachers, drawing heavily upon what they learned while associated with the movement.

At Osho International Meditation Resort a core staff hosts thousands of visitors annually. Osho Nisarga, the competing group's much smaller enclave, also offers guest accommodations, workshops, and meditations at the foot of the Himalayas. In the United States, active centers are Osho Academy in Sedona, Arizona; Viha Meditation Center in Northern California; and Osho Padma Meditation Center in New York City.

Osho International
17 Koregaon Park

Pune MS 411001

India

<http://www.osho.org>

Osho Nisarga

Shilla: Post Office Pantehar

Dharmasala, HP 176057

India

<http://www.oshonisarga.com>

Marion S. Goldman

See also: Meditation; Zen Buddhism.

References

- D'Andrea, Anthony. Global Nomads: Techo and New Age as Transnational Countercultures in Ibiza and Goa. New York: Routledge, 2007.
- Franklin, Satya Bahrti. The Promise of Paradise: A Woman's Intimate Story of the Perils of Life with Rajneesh. Barrytown, NY: Station Hill Press, 1992.
- Goldman, Marion. Passionate Journeys: Why Successful Women Joined a Cult. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999.
- Osho. India My Love: A Spiritual Journey. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2002.

Osore, Mount

Mount Osore (aka Osorezan), one of Japan's most sacred sites, is a 2,884-foot-high volcanic mountain in the center of the Shimokita Peninsula on the northernmost reaches of the main island of Honshu. A volcanically active area, the terrain is somewhat desolate and barren, devoid of plant life. Sulfurous gases escaping from the underground color the water and permeate the air. Translated into English, Osorezan means Fear Mountain, and the entire site is often likened to Western (especially ancient Greek) ideas of the hell realm.

Buddhists have been present in the region for more than a millennium, and the Bodaji Temple gives focus to the veneration of Jizo (or Ksitigarbha), the primary bodhisattva worship at Osorezan. Bodaji is located next to Lake Usori. Near the main entrance is a red bridge over a river Sanzu no Kawa, likened to the River Styx in Greek mythology. Surrounding the lake are eight peaks, familiar from Buddhist descriptions of the afterlife. Just outside the temple are six statues of Jizo, one for each of the six realms of the Buddhist underworld through which Jizo can travel.

Osoresan is seen particularly as an abiding place of the souls of children and unborn babies who are pictured as trying to make their way across the river. To do so, they build piles of pebbles along the river. Jizo's task is to protect them from evil demons who are constantly trying to disperse the piles. The area is now dotted with many piles of small rocks created by parents of deceased children who have visited, and their many offerings in the form of items (often very colorful) associated with children, similar to ex voto offerings often left at Roman Catholic sites. The offerings are seen as items that will assist the children in attaining paradise.

Bodaji is home to a group of trance mediums, the itako, who specialize in communication with the souls of deceased children. The itako are especially trained for their work, and in the months prior to the annual Osoresan Festival each year (July 22–24), they perform a variety of austerities as part of a set of purification rituals.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Ksitigarbha's/Jizo's Birthday; Mountains.

References

- Blacker, Carmen. The Catalpa Bow: A Study of Shamanistic Practices in Japan. London: Allen & Unwin, 1975.
- Ivy, Marilyn. Discourses of the Vanishing: Modernity, Phantasm, Japan. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Miyazaki, Fumiko, and Duncan Williams. "The Intersection of the Local and the Translocal at a Sacred Site: The Case of Osoresan in Tokugawa Japan." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 28, nos. 3–4 (2001).
- Mount Osoresan. <http://www.osoresan.info/Entrance.html>. Accessed August 15, 2009.
- Schattschneider, Ellen. Immortal Wishes: Labor and Transcendence on a Japanese Sacred Mountain. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2003.

OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis)

See Ordo Templi Orientis.

Our Lady of All Nations

The devotional life that surrounds Our Lady of All Nations in Amsterdam arose from the apparitions and messages that a Dutch woman, Ida Peerdeman (1905–1996), received between 1945 and 1984. In these visions, Mary revealed herself as Our Lady of All Nations and introduced a peculiar prayer that, coupled with the expected spread of the rosary, was intended to realize the swift promulgation of a new, fifth dogma of Mary as "Corede[m]p[tr]ix, Mediatrix, and Advocate." With this dogma, Mary would achieve a place of her own in God's acts of salvation, an accomplishment that many felt the apparitions at Fatima, Portugal, had pointed toward in 1917. A painting of the apparition, showing The Lady standing on a globe, with her back against the Cross of Christ, functions as an icon for the devotion. The feast days are celebrated on March 25 and May 31.

In view of the parallel themes between Our Lady of All Nations and Our Lady of Fatima, devotees consider the Amsterdam apparitions to be a continuation of Fatima, for the messages of both are concerned with a spectrum of evils in the world: natural disasters, wars, hunger, chaos, apostasy, and Communism endanger the church and the world, and, above all, Satan threatens the world. However, after investigations in 1955 and 1973, the Diocese of Haarlem concluded that there was no ground for accepting a divine origin for the apparitions. Because of active support and promotion in several dioceses and noticeable activity in Third World mission fields, the veneration directed to Our Lady of All Nations became a concern for the Vatican as well, and in 1974 and 1987 it reiterated the conclusions of the Diocese of Haarlem. Nevertheless The Lady continued to enjoy the support and devotion of tens of thousands of Catholics, primarily conservatives. Millions of copies of the devotional card with the contested prayer on the renaming of Mary and the painting of The Lady in dozens of languages have been distributed around the world.

A turning point for the organization promoting Our Lady of All Nations came in 1996, with the death of the visionary, the arrival on the scene of a new administration for the group and of a group of missionary nuns (of the Austrian Family of Mary) who manage its daily activities. A breakthrough for the devotion came from the new bishop Jozef Maria Punt of the diocese. On May 31, 2002, he made public that notwithstanding the earlier investigations he received—“in a moment of mysticism”—the message or insight revealing that the Amsterdam apparitions were indeed of a supernatural character. This acknowledgment of the apparitions and messages led to skeptics within the Dutch church province but gave way to great enthusiasm among the devotees and an international stimulus of the cultus. Pope Benedict XVI, former apparition-skeptic Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, demanded that the contested words in the prayer—“The Lady who once was Mary”—would no longer be practiced.

The center of worship for Our Lady of all Nations, located in a mansion in Amsterdam, receives about 9,000 Dutch and foreign visitors each year. Beginning in 1997, international prayer days were organized in Amsterdam, with up to 10,000 visitors. In 2001 these days were split into national prayer days for The Netherlands, Germany, England, Austria, Ireland, the Cote d’Ivoire, Japan, the Philippines, Slovakia, and Switzerland, with about 20,000 participants in total. The largest number of adherents are to be found in these countries, but there are increasing numbers in Africa, Asia, and the United States. Following the “apocalyptic” events of September 11, 2001, more than a half million prayer cards of Our Lady of All Nations were distributed in the United States. A missionary “world action” has also been undertaken, in which dozens of copies of the painting of The Lady are traveling the world to expand the devotion.

Within the World Network of Marian Devotion, one encounters devotion to The Lady also among a spectrum of movements, among them the Medjugorje devotees. Devotees of Medjugorje visit the Amsterdam shrine regularly, as they see a link among the three “most important” apparitions of the new Marian era:

from its beginning in Fatima (in revelatory messages), through Medjugorje (recruiting “work apostles”), to the consummation in Amsterdam (the realization of the fifth dogma).

Sanctuary of the Lady of All Nations
Diepenbrockstraat 3
1077 VX Amsterdam
The Netherlands
<http://www.laudate.org/en/home>
<http://www.de-vrouwe.nl>
<http://www.ladyofallnations.org>
<http://www.fifthmariandogma.com/>

Lady of All Nations Action Center
PO Box 31481
St. Louis, MO 63131

Peter Jan Margry

See also: Charismatic Movement; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Fatima; Marian Devotion, World Network of; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Medjugorje; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Auclair, Raoul. The Lady of All Nations. Quebec, Canada: Ed. L’Armée de Marie, 1978.
- Klos, Peter. The Lady of All Nations, Who Once Was Mary. Santa Barbara, CA: Queenship Publishing Company, 1998.
- Künzli, Josef, ed. The Messages of the Lady of All Nations. Santa Barbara, CA: Queenship Publishing Company, 1996.
- Margry, Peter Jan. “Paradoxes of Marian Apparitional Contestation: Networks, Ideology, Gender, and The Lady of All Nations.” In Moved by Mary: The Power of Pilgrimage in the Modern World, edited by Anna-Karina Hermkens, Willy Jansen, and Catrien Notermans, 182–199. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2009.
- The Messages of the Lady of All Nations*. New edition. Amsterdam: The Lady of All Nations Foundation, 1999.

P

Pacific Council of Churches

The Pacific Council of Churches attempts to provide an avenue for fellowship, united ministry, and speaking with a common voice to the many Christian churches scattered throughout the islands of the South Pacific. The South Pacific was among the first targets of the developing world Christian missionary movement in the first half of the 19th century. These churches grew through the 20th century and in the decades since World War II passed through the process of decolonization and the transformation from missions into autonomous denominations.

Talks leading to the formation of the Council began at a church consultation in 1961 and the Council itself was organized in 1966. The Council works through five program areas, but has become known for its work on female equality, economic development at the village level, and opposition to further nuclear testing. Its work has been a challenge given the isolation of many of its members and the vast stretches of ocean between the centers of activity. At the same time, it has found itself dependent on outside sources of income to maintain its existence.

In 2006, it reported 26 member churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, representing 17 nations. It is the regional ecumenical body cooperating with the World Council of Churches.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relation- ships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Padmasambhava

Eighth century CE

Padmasambhava, popularly known as Guru Rinpoche (Precious Teacher), is credited with introducing Buddhism into Tibet from India in the eighth century CE during the reign of the Tibetan king, Trisong Detsen. Many elements of the story of his life have been questioned and the boundary between fact and legend is often vague. Even his name, which means “Lotus-born,” refers to a legend of the miraculous nature of his birth, which occurred at Oddiyana, an area around the border of Afghanistan and Pakistan. According to the story, Padmasambhava initially appeared in the form of an eight-year-old boy sitting in the center of a lotus flower in the middle of a sacred lake. He was then adopted by the local king and raised as a prince in his court. As he matured, he wanted to follow a spiritual life to which the king objected. To free himself from the king’s oversight, Padmasambhava arranged the death of a minister’s son. For this crime, the king banished him. Padmasambhava would reside for the next years of his life in cremation grounds, understood to be terrifying places of death where those pursuing a spiritual path would go to practice meditation while at the same time overcoming their fears. Reputedly, during this time, he developed the extraordinary spiritual powers for which he would later become renowned. Some derived from his visitation by wisdom dakinis (female guides to enlightenment), who initiated him into various esoteric Tantric practices.

Padmasambhava's fame increased year by year, and eventually reached King Trisong Detsen (ca. 740–798 CE) who invited the powerful yogi to Tibet where he hoped that the local demons and other obstructing forces could be defeated and that Buddhism could be established. Padmasambhava is usually associated with the founding of Samyé (775 CE), the first Buddhist monastery in Tibet; and the Nyingma, the oldest School of Buddhism in Tibet, revere him as a “second Buddha.” The Nyingma speak of the eight major forms of Padmasambhava, his eight manifestations that range in appearance from a peaceful gentle monk to the wrathful and terrifying Dorje Drolod. The Nyingma dedicate the 10th day of each lunar month in their religious calendar to commemorate a major event in Padmasambhava's life.

Padmasambhava had two primary consorts during his life—the Indian princess Mandarava and the Tibetan noblewoman Yeshe Tsogyal. Pictures of Padmasambhava often include the pair, who will be seen standing to either side of him. Yeshe Tsogyal, who became a Tibetan Tantra teacher in her own right, would pen Padmasambhava's biography and is credited with the process of concealing his more advanced secret teachings as terma (treasure). In Tibetan Buddhism, it is believed that many renowned gurus hid their important teachings, which they felt were somewhat ahead of their time. These teachings would then be discovered and released in the future by spiritually advanced ones (tertens, or treasure revealers). Padmasambhava is also remembered through the many places around Tibet that he is said to have visited. Across the country there are mountains, lakes, and caves considered to have been blessed as places of spiritual power by his presence.

Toward the end of his life, Padmasambhava left Tibet to continue his work of subduing demons and spreading the Buddha's teaching in wild and untamed lands. Since his passing from this life, he is considered to be a fully enlightened Buddha and as such remains an active presence in this world working from spiritual realms to benefit all sentient beings.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Meditation; Monasticism; Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Chonam, Lama, and Sangye Khandro, trans. The Lives and Liberation of Princess Mandarava: The Indian Consort of Padmasambhava. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1998.
- Evans-Wentz, W. Y., ed. The Tibetan Book of the Great Liberation: or, the Method of Realizing Nirvana Through Knowing the Mind. Preceded by an epitome of Padma-Sambhava's Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Kunsang, Erik Pema. Dakini Teachings: Padmasambhava's Oral Instructions to Lady Tsogyal. Boston: Shambhala, 1990.
- Padmasambhava. Natural Liberation: Padmasambhava's Teachings on the Six Bardos. Commentary by Gyatrul Rinpoche. Trans. by B. Alan Wallace. Somerville, MA: Wisdom Publications, 1997.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion Publications, 1995.
- Yeshe Tsogyal. The Lotus-Born. Trans. by Erik Hein Schmidt. Boston: Shambhala, 1993.

Pagan Federation

The Pagan Federation was founded in 1971 as the Pagan Front by John and Jean Score, Doreen Valiente, and others to provide information and to counter misconceptions about Wicca. In 1981, the name was changed to the Pagan Federation and around half the membership now practice some form of Wicca or Pagan religious Witchcraft, while the remainder practice various contemporary Pagan spiritualities including Druidry, Heathenry (Odinism, Asatru, Vanatru, and Northern Tradition), Shamanism, and Goddess spirituality.

The aims of the Pagan Federation are to provide contact between Pagan groups and genuine seekers of the Old Ways; to promote contact and dialogue between the various branches of European Paganism and other Pagan organizations worldwide; and to provide practical and effective information on Paganism to members of the public, the media, public bodies, and the administration.

At its core, the Pagan Federation upholds the following three principles:

1. Love and Kinship with Nature, which involves reverence for the life force and its ever-renewing cycles of life and death.
2. The Pagan Ethic: “If it harm none, do what thou wilt.” This is a positive morality, expressing the belief in individual responsibility for discovering one’s own true nature and developing it fully, in harmony with the outer world and community.
3. Honoring the Totality of Divine Reality, which transcends gender, without suppressing either the female or male aspect of Deity.

Membership is open to people over 16 years of age who consider themselves Pagan.

The Pagan Federation publishes a quarterly journal, Pagan Dawn (formerly The Wiccan, founded in 1968), and other publications. Conferences and other member events take place frequently throughout the year. In many parts of Europe, the Pagan Federation provides public celebrations of the eight major religious festivals of contemporary Paganism.

From the late 1980s, the activities of the Pagan Federation have been expanding. In 1989, the Pagan Federation took part in a major interfaith festival at Canterbury Cathedral, the seat of the archbishop of Canterbury who is the senior archbishop of the Church of England, and performed the first public Pagan religious ritual in Canterbury for many centuries. Since then, the Pagan Federation has been active in interfaith dialogue and has members in many interfaith organizations in the United Kingdom. It provides prison ministry for the Prison Service. In 2004 the Scottish Pagan Federation secured legal recognition for Pagan religious marriage services in Scotland.

The Pagan Federation is run by an elected committee that reports to a policy-making Council comprised of regional coordinators, honorary members, and other activists. The Pagan Federation has a membership of around 4,500, more than half of whom are women. Most members are United Kingdom-based, but Pagan Federation International has members in most Western European countries and a growing presence in Eastern Europe. There are also members in the United States and Canada.

Current campaigning issues for the Pagan Federation include prevention of discrimination against Pagans, the right to perform legally recognized marriages, recognition as a religious charity (not-for-profit organization), and ensuring that Pagans are accurately included in official statistics.

Pagan Federation
 BM Box 7097
 London WC1N 3XX, UK
<http://www.paganfed.org/>

Vivianne Crowley

See also: Church of England; Druidism; Goddess Spirituality; Wiccan Religion; Witchcraft.

References

- Hutton, Ronald B. The Triumph of the Moon. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Pagan Federation. The Pagan Federation Information Pack. London: Pagan Federation, 2008.
- Weller, P. Religions in the UK: A Multi-faith Directory. Derby: University of Derby, 2001.

■ Pakistan

The modern state of Pakistan, a long, narrow country following the Indus River Valley, is sandwiched between Iran and Afghanistan on the west and India on the east. It emerged in the 1930s with the suggestion that a Muslim state be set apart from India, then a British colony. That state was created in 1947, but its eastern half separated in 1971 and is now known as Bangladesh. Present-day Pakistan exists with unstable borders, its northwest border with Afghanistan following the Duran line representing the limit of British hegemony in the area in the 19th century and dividing the Pashtun ethnic community in half. Neither Pakistan nor Afghanistan has ratified the border. At the same time, there are continuing disputes over Pakistan’s border with India relative to the Indian state of Kashmir. The remaining state of Pakistan includes 310,000 square miles of territory. Though relatively small geographically, its 172,800,000 citizens (2008) make it the 6th most populous country in the world.

The Indus Valley had been inhabited as early as the third millennia BCE, but its modern history begins with the conquest of the area by Alexander the Great

Badshahi Mosque, Lahore, Pakistan. Built in the sixteenth century, it is one of the most famous landmarks and tourist destinations of Pakistan in addition to being one of the largest mosques in the world. (Naiyyer/Dreamstime.com)

(356–323 BCE). In the middle of the next century, it would be incorporated into the empire of Indian Buddhist ruler Asoka (d. 238 or 232). The history of the rise and fall of the Indian kingdoms was somewhat interrupted at the beginning of the eighth century with the entrance of the Arab Muslims under al-Hajjaj (661–714 CE), whose successors in the next generation came to dominate the whole of the Indus River Valley. From their foothold in Pakistan, Muslim rulers conquered most of India, residents of which were predominantly Hindu.

From the eighth century to the present, the struggle between Hindus and Muslims would be a major theme in the history of the Indian subcontinent. Through most of that history, the Muslim minority would form the ruling elite. Islam did not merge into Hinduism, as the religions of many earlier groups had, although it would give rise to Sikhism out of the effort of Guru Nanak (1469–ca. 1539) to find a synthesis between the two faiths. The decline of Muslim hegemony in India was evident in the 18th century, but its fate was sealed by the advent of the British and the conquest of India in the 19th century. Hindus were much quicker to identify with the British and to accept positions in the colonial administration.

In 1949 the modern state of Pakistan came into existence as an autonomous dominion within the British Commonwealth. The setting apart of Pakistan led to the deaths of hundreds of thousands in riots and the migrations of millions, as Hindus left the region and Muslims moved in. The future of the country was further hindered by the death in 1948 of Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), who had led the fight for an independent Muslim nation. The new country was afflicted with internal disagreement, leading to the October 1958 assumption of power by General Muhammad Ayub Khan (1907–1974) and the imposition of martial law. Ayub Khan ruled the country for a decade but was pushed out of office in 1969. The new government was immediately faced with grievances in eastern Pakistan that would lead in 1971 to its separation and the formation of independent Bangladesh.

The separation of Bangladesh set the stage for the rise of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto (1928–1979), head of the Pakistan People’s Party. His rule was interrupted by a 1977 coup led by General Zia-ul Haq (1924–1988). When the general was killed in an airplane accident in 1988, former president Bhutto’s daughter, Benazir Bhutto (1953–2007), became the first female head of state in a predominantly Muslim country. Though her rule lasted only two years, she re-established constitutional order in the country. Her successors in office attempted to try her for political corruption, but she survived and would briefly return to power in the mid-1990s. In 1999, after a decade of failure by the democratically elected government to deal with the country’s economic problems, there was another military coup.

The American invasion of Afghanistan has led to instability in Pakistan, whose leadership has attempted to be friendly with the United States while retaining its status in the larger Muslim world. Its disputed border has become a matter of concern as the Pushtan community has shown widespread support for both al-Qaeda, the group responsible for bombings in the United States, and the Taliban, the former rulers of Afghanistan deposed by the Americans.

For more than 1,000 years, the Indus River Valley has been dominated by Islam. With the immigration of most of its Hindu residents to India after partition in 1947 and the settlement of Indian Muslims in Pakistan at the same time, the country became overwhelmingly Muslim. In 1956 the country declared itself an “Islamic republic,” a unique designation in the Muslim world. The 1973 Constitution emphasized Islam as the state religion, and periodically an emphasis on Islamization has been proclaimed by government leaders (and seen by many Shia Muslims as a move to impose Sunni values on the country). Only a Muslim can be president, and the state is mandated to provide Islamic education for all citizens. The government supports the Muslim establishment, oversees mosques and funds collected for charitable purposes, and takes responsibility for the schools at which clergy (imams) are trained. At the same time, the Constitution guarantees the rights of religious minorities and of all citizens to profess, practice, and propagate their religion.

The Pakistani Muslim community is predominantly of the Sunni Hanafite School, though it has manifested an extremely diverse nature. Some 18 percent of Pakistani Muslims are Shias and 6 percent are Sufis, with the Naqshbandiya and Qadiriyya being the largest brotherhoods. The primary struggle in Pakistan has been between traditionalists and modernists, the traditional religious authorities being concerned that movement into the modern world will challenge allegiance to the Koran, the Islamic holy book and authority.

Pakistan is well known as the place of origin of the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, founded in 1889 by Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908). In his early years, Ahmad had concluded that Islam was in a state of decline, and it certainly had been pushed aside in British India. He took upon himself a mission to demonstrate the truth of Islam and was termed mujaddid, the renewer of the faith in the present age. He launched a proselytization movement to bring his fellow citizens back into the Muslim fold and took his crusade to the West.

Ahmad attempted to challenge Christianity directly. He developed a number of arguments for the superiority of Islam and called a variety of Christian beliefs into question. He asserted, among other things, that Jesus had not died on the cross but had merely swooned and recovered after being placed in the tomb. Eventually, he traveled to Kashmir and died a natural death there.

The Ahmadiyyas existed for many years as an organization within the larger Pakistani Muslim community, but following the death of Ahmad in 1908, the group split into two factions over the status of Ahmad. One group, the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, wished to consider Ahmad as a prophet, a status equal to that of Muhammad. The other smaller group, while holding Ahmad in esteem, refused to consider him of such a lofty estate. The attempt to proclaim Ahmad a prophet met with considerable criticism from the larger Muslim community, and in 1974 the Pakistani government formally declared the idea to be heretical and those who believed it as existing outside of the Muslim community. In the wake of that declaration, the small group, the Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ishaat Islam, Lahore (headquartered in Lahore, Pakistan), has had to fight to avoid being included in the general condemnation heaped on the larger faction.

PAKISTAN

Pakistan is home to several important international Islamic organizations, including the World Muslim Congress, Tanzeem-e-Islami, the World Federation of

Pakistan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	57,429,000	166,576,000	96.1	1.83	216,065,000	280,542,000
Christians	1,173,000	3,923,000	2.3	1.83	5,083,000	6,604,000
Protestants	592,000	2,150,000	1.2	0.87	2,600,000	3,150,000
Roman Catholics	341,000	1,250,000	0.7	−0.92	1,500,000	1,900,000
Independents	235,000	1,000,000	0.6	1.77	1,500,000	2,250,000
Hindus	890,000	2,260,000	1.3	1.83	2,900,000	3,700,000
Ethnoreligionists	35,000	185,000	0.1	1.83	200,000	200,000
Agnostics	10,000	140,000	0.1	1.83	300,000	500,000
Buddhists	2,000	112,000	0.1	1.83	170,000	240,000
Baha'is	15,100	90,000	0.1	1.83	150,000	300,000
Sikhs	2,000	45,400	0.0	1.83	60,000	80,000
Zoroastrians	5,200	8,000	0.0	1.83	8,000	8,000
Atheists	2,000	8,000	0.0	1.83	14,000	20,000
Chinese folk	1,000	2,600	0.0	1.83	5,000	10,000
Jews	250	900	0.0	1.84	1,000	1,000
Total population	59,565,000	173,351,000	100.0	1.83	224,956,000	292,205,000

Islamic Organizations, and the United Islamic Organization. Nationally, a variety of organizations represent the spectrum of Muslim opinion on political and economic issues, and a number of them are dedicated to establishing Muslim law as the law of the land.

Christianity was introduced into the area now constituting Pakistan at several points, beginning in the eighth century, but no permanent work was begun until the conquest of India by the British in the 19th century was well under way. In 1834 the first permanent work was launched by Presbyterian John C. Lowrie (1808–1900). Over the next few years he was joined by John Newton (1810–1891), Charles Forman (1821–1894), and Andrew Gordon (1828–1887). Their efforts would eventually lead to the formation of the Presbyterian Church of Pakistan (formally established by a merger of two older Presbyterian bodies in 1993). It is now the second largest Protestant church in the country.

The Church Missionary Society brought Anglicanism into Karachi in 1850, and the missionaries, as representatives of the Church of England, enjoyed the approbation of the British colonial authorities. The work spread through the region, and the Diocese of Lahore was formed in 1877. Representatives of the American-based Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) arrived in 1873. They were particularly blessed by rapid growth early in the 20th century. Lutheranism was introduced to Pakistan in 1903 by the Danish Pathan Mission (associated with the Church of Denmark). The work grew slowly but was supplemented by Norwegian and American Lutheran missions, and in 1955 the Pakistani Lutheran Church came into being by a merger of their work. In 1970 the Anglicans, Methodists, Lutherans, and the Presbyterians whose work was initiated in 1856 by the Church of Scotland merged to form the Church of Pakistan, currently the largest Christian body in the country.

The larger Presbyterian body (then the United Presbyterian Church) was heading toward participation in the merger that produced the Church of Pakistan, when in 1968 it was hit with a major controversy over its participation in the ecumenical movement. A group headed by the church's moderator, Kundan Lall Nasir, attacked the liberal views present in the World Council of Churches, and as a result of the disagreements, almost a third of the church members withdrew and established the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. The new church then aligned itself with the International Council of Christian Churches, a fundamentalist rival of the WCC.

A variety of different churches began work in Pakistan throughout the 20th century, many before the partition of 1947. Among those receiving the most response were the New Apostolic Church and the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church. Pentecostalism has had less success in Pakistan in recent decades than in other countries, and there are relatively few new indigenous churches. Among the several uniquely Pakistani churches is the National Virgin Church of Pakistan (1969), formed by former Presbyterians.

The Roman Catholic Church in Pakistan started anew in 1842. Administered under the Vicariate of Hindustan for many years, Lahore became a vicariate in 1886. By the time the new nation was created, the mission work had become centered on Karachi, the capital, and the first archdiocese was established there in 1950. The church rivals that of the slightly larger Church of Pakistan.

Christian ecumenism is manifested in the National Council of Churches in Pakistan, which includes the several larger churches and is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More conservative groups are members of the Evangelical Fellowship of Pakistan, affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. Several of the most conservative churches are members of the International Council of Christian Churches.

Despite the large-scale movement of Hindus out of Pakistan over the years, a large Hindu minority remains in Pakistan. Pakistani Hindus have continued to try to live in peace with their Muslim neighbors. Although only 1 percent of the population, the community numbers more than 1.7 million strong. There are significantly fewer members of the Baha'i Faith and practitioners of Buddhism, Jainism, and Sikhism. At the time of partition, most Sikhs left Pakistan, and most of those who remained were killed in the rioting. The Baha'is, who have been in the area for more than 100 years, are mostly people of Persian (Iranian) heritage.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ahmadiyya Anjuman Islaat Islam, Lahore; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Asoka; Baha'i Faith; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Church of Pakistan; Hanafite School of Islam; International Council of Christian Churches; Naqsh-bandiya; Presbyterian Church of Pakistan; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; World Muslim Congress.

References

- Banuazizi, Ali, and Myron Weiner. The State, Religion, and Ethnic Politics: Afghanistan, Iran, and Pakistan. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 2001.
- Gabriel, Theodore. Christian Citizens in an Islamic State: The Pakistan Experience. Aldershot, Hampshire, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 2007.
- Iqbal, A. Islamization of Pakistan. Lahore, Pakistan: Vanguard Books, 1986.
- Mangus, Marsden. Living Islam: Muslim Religious Experience in Pakistan's North-West Frontier. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Pinault, David. Notes from the Fortune-Telling Parrot: Islam and the Struggle for Religious Pluralism in Pakistan. London: Equinox Publishing, 2008.
- Rooney, J. On the Heels of Battles: A History of the Catholic Church in Pakistan, 1780–1986. Rawalpindi, Pakistan: Christian Study Centre, 1986.
- Schimmel, A. Islam in India and Pakistan. Leiden: Brill, 1982.
- Titus, Murray T. Islam in India and Pakistan: A Religious History of Islam in India and Pakistan. New Delhi: Musnhiram Manoharlal, 2005.
- Walbridge, Linda. Christians of Pakistan: The Passion of Bishop John Joseph. New York: RoutledgeCurzon, 2003.

■ Palau

The nation of Palau includes a chain of 200 islands southeast of the Philippines and north of Papua New Guinea. They include 177 square miles of land inhabited by some 21,000 people. The Palauans are a Micronesian group.

Palau was settled as early as 1000 BCE by Polynesians. The residents' first contact with Europeans occurred in 1543, when Ruy Lopez de Villalobos (d. 1546) of Spain landed. Spain claimed the islands but did not occupy them. In 1783 an Englishman, Henry Wilson, was shipwrecked off Ulong Island. The island's chief helped repair Wilson's ship and sent his son to be educated in Europe. The British put Palau in their trading network until the Spanish claimed their property in 1885. Spain turned Palau over to Germany in 1899 following its defeat in the Spanish-American War.

PALAU

The Germans were overwhelmed by the Japanese as World War II began. The Palauans suffered most in the war, with more than 80 percent of their number being killed in the fighting. After the war the islands became part of the U.S. Trust Territory of Micronesia, but in 1978 it opted to become independent, despite U.S. protest. The people have continually fought the proliferation of any nuclear presence in their country.

The Roman Catholic Church in the Caroline Islands (now part of the Federated States of Micronesia) extended its mission to Palau, but not until 1891. The original Spanish priests were replaced by German Capuchins following the transfer of the islands to German control in 1899. The work, which involved a majority of the island's residents, is a part of the Diocese of the Caroline Islands.

Protestants arrived in 1929, also from the Caroline Islands, through a couple representing the Liebenzell Mission. They were accompanied by a convert from Chuuk Island. Later, the Seventh-day Adventist Church

Palau

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	11,100	19,400	94.8	0.74	21,700	23,800
Roman Catholics	4,000	8,500	41.5	−0.23	9,500	10,300
Protestants	2,600	6,300	30.8	2.01	7,200	8,100
Independents	4,400	3,400	16.6	0.03	3,800	4,300
Agnostics	50	560	2.7	6.36	900	1,400
Buddhists	0	180	0.9	0.84	250	300
Baha'is	30	160	0.8	0.84	200	300
Ethnoreligionists	130	120	0.6	0.88	100	100
Chinese folk	20	60	0.3	0.82	70	80
Atheists	0	10	0.0	0.00	10	20
Total population	11,300	20,500	100.0	0.87	23,200	26,000 and the Assemblies of God would begin work in Palau. Missionaries from Baptist Mid-Missions worked there briefly in the 1980s but have subsequently withdrawn.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Ibanez y Garcia, Luis de. The History of the Marianas, with Navigational Data, and of the Caroline and Palau Islands: From the Time of Their Discovery by Magellan in 1521 to the Present. Mangilao, Guam: Micronesian Area Research Center, University of Guam, 1992.
- Kubary, John S. The Religion of the Palauans. Woodstock, NY: Micronesian Seminar, Woodstock College, 1969.
- Shuster, Donald R. "Islands of Change in Palau Church, School, and Elected Government, 1891–1981." Ed.D. thesis, University of Hawaii, 1982.

Palo Mayombe

Palo Mayombe, now found in Brazil, across the northern shore of South America, in Mexico, and in Cuba, perpetuates religion of the Kongo people of southwest Africa. Its main practitioners are people of West African descent, but it has also found a following among Hispanic people, who call it Palo Monte.

The traditional beliefs of the Kongo people are similar to those of the Yoruban religion in that they recognize a High God, a set of lesser deities (among the Kongo seen as the higher deities personifying the forces of nature), the spirits of nature (that inhabit various natural objects), and the spirits of the dead. It is possible to communicate with these various spirits through particularly gifted people and by possession, when the deity is believed to possess and speak through an individual.

Worship in Palo Mayombe occurs around the nganga or prenda, a consecrated cauldron that contains various objects including sacred earth, sticks (palos), and bones. The cauldron is believed to be inhabited by a spirit, who is thought to be active in any act of worship or magic that the worshippers might perform. Initiates go through a ceremony that links them to this spirit. After initiation, the new member is believed to be protected by the spirit.

Palo Mayombe received some negative publicity following the discovery in 1989 of the bodies of more than a dozen murdered men in Matamoros, Mexico (across the border from Brownsville, Texas). The murders were eventually traced to a gang deeply involved in the border drug trade. In a building on the site where the bodies were found, authorities discovered a nganga, and there was much speculation that the leader, Adolfo Constanzo (1962–1989), had molded the gang into a

Palo Mayombe group and was using human sacrifice to both eliminate rival gang members and build confidence among the gang members that they were magically protected. It was also revealed that members of the group had to watch a movie, The Believers, which portrays a group practicing a Hollywood version of Afro-Cuban faith.

As the investigation into the life of Constanzo continued, it was discovered that during the 1980s he had operated in Mexico City as a psychic, and that his services had included foretelling the future and clearing people of what they believed to be curses that had been placed upon them. His work often included animal sacrifices. Eventually his services expanded to include assistance to drug dealers and their staff. For a fee, he offered to make them invisible to police or bulletproof against their enemies. It appears that he made Palo Mayombe part of his practice in 1985, at which time he is believed to have raided a graveyard for human remains to include in his first nganga.

In July 1987, Constanzo became acquainted with the Hernandez brothers, who ran drugs along the Mexico-Texas border. While continuing his activities in Mexico City, he instituted his form of Palo Mayombe at a center near the village of Rancho Santa Elena, 20 miles from Matamoros. Human sacrifices became a regular part of the activities of the group, each sacrifice tied to some benefit the group was to receive. Several months after the police uncovered the activities at Matamoros, Constanzo was killed during a shoot-out with police in Mexico City. Other members of the group received long prison sentences.

Although the events at Matamoros were horrendous, there is no record of parallel violence that would indicate that Palo Mayombe practice is similarly violent and dismissive of human life.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Possession; Spirit Possession.

References

- Canizares, Baba Raul. The Book on Palo. Farmingdale, NY: Original Publications, 2002.
- Gallerne, Gilbert. Sacrifices humains à Matamoros. Paris: Editions Fleuve Noir, 1993.
- Humes, Edward. Buried Secrets. New York: Dutton, 1991.

Montenegro, Carlos. Palo Mayombe: Spirits, Rituals, Spells. Farmingdale, NY: Original Publications, 1998.

Schutze, James. Cauldron of Blood: The Matamoros Cult Killings. New York: Morrow/Avon, 1989.

■ Panama

Although the Republic of Panama, which is about the size of South Carolina, is now considered part of the Central American region, until 1903 the territory was a province of Colombia. The Republic of Panama forms the narrowest part of the isthmus and is located between Costa Rica to the west and Colombia to the east. The Caribbean Sea borders the northern coast of Panama, and the Pacific Ocean borders the southern coast. Panama City is the nation's capital, which contains about 40 percent of the nation's population.

The country has an area of 30,193 square miles and a population of 3.3 million (2008). Racially, the majority of the population is considered mestizo (70 percent, mixed Amerindian and Hispanic), while the rest are West Indian (14 percent, Afro-Caribbean), Amerindian (8 percent), Caucasian (6 percent), and Asian/other (2 percent). The Amerindian population (285,230 in 2000) includes 6 ethnolinguistic groups: the Guaymí (Ngöbe-Buglé), Kuna, Choco (Emberá-Wounaan), Teribe (Naso), Bokota, and Bribri.

In 2000, about 80 percent of the population were Spanish-speaking, about 9 percent were speakers of Asian or Middle Eastern languages (Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Hindustani, Hebrew, and Arabic), 8.3 percent were Amerindian (speakers of eight languages), and 3.7 percent were English-speaking (mainly West Indian and North American). However, many Panamanians are bilingual, especially in Spanish and English (Standard English and Western Caribbean Creole English). There is also a small population of Negros Congos, who speak an Afro-Hispanic Creole, especially on the Caribbean coast of Colón Province. The national literacy rate was 90.8 percent.

Panama's dollarized economy mainly depends on a well-developed services sector that accounts for 80 percent of GDP. These services include operating the Panama Canal, banking, the Colón Free Trade Zone,

Panama

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,395,000	3,058,000	87.1	1.81	3,678,000	4,312,000
Roman Catholics	1,316,000	2,360,000	67.3	0.22	2,700,000	3,050,000
Protestants	84,000	500,000	14.2	3.44	660,000	880,000
Independents	13,800	120,000	3.4	3.36	190,000	280,000
Muslims	65,000	155,000	4.4	1.84	190,000	225,000
Agnostics	8,500	108,000	3.1	2.61	160,000	250,000
Baha'is	14,400	46,000	1.3	1.84	60,000	80,000
Ethnoreligionists	8,000	38,000	1.1	1.84	37,500	35,000
Buddhists	2,000	27,300	0.8	1.84	36,000	45,000
New religionists	1,500	21,500	0.6	1.84	28,000	36,000
Atheists	2,000	18,000	0.5	1.84	30,000	50,000
Spiritists	0	17,000	0.5	1.84	21,000	25,000
Hindus	5,000	11,100	0.3	1.84	14,000	20,000
Chinese folk	3,000	5,200	0.1	1.84	7,000	9,000
Jews	2,000	4,400	0.1	1.84	5,000	5,500
Total population	1,506,000	3,509,000	100.0	1.84	4,267,000	5,093,000

insurance, container ports, flagship registry, and tourism. The nation's principal agricultural products are bananas, rice, corn, coffee, sugarcane, vegetables, livestock, and shrimp.

Although Panama's Constitution does not designate the Roman Catholic Church as the country's official religion, it recognizes Roman Catholicism as "the religion of the majority of Panamanians." The archbishop of Panama enjoys privileges usually reserved for government officials, and Catholicism is taught in public schools, although classes in religion are not mandatory. The Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, as long as "Christian morality and order" are respected; allows religious organizations to own property; bars clergy from public office, except in the areas of social welfare, public instruction, and scientific research; and prohibits discrimination in employment based on religion.

According to a January 1996 national public opinion poll conducted by CID-Gallup, the religious affiliation of the Panamanian population was as follows: Roman Catholic, 86.4 percent; Protestant, 7.3 percent; other religions, 2.1 percent; and none/no response, 4.2 percent. In June 2004, the company Latin Dichter & Neira conducted another national poll with the following results: Roman Catholic, 79.1 percent; Protestant, 10.8 percent; other religions, 7.7 percent; and none/no response, 2.4 percent. A comparison of these two polls reveals that Protestant adherents and those affiliated with "other religions" are growing in Panamanian society, while Catholic adherents are declining.

Historically, Panama has played an important role in world commerce, starting in the Spanish colonial period when mineral treasures from the Andean region were brought by ship to Panama and carried overland from the Pacific to the Caribbean coast for transshipment to Spain. During the California Gold Rush (1848–1855) would-be miners arrived by ship in the Caribbean port of Aspinwall, now called Colón, and walked or rode in wagons across the narrow isthmus to Panama City, located on the Pacific Ocean, where they boarded other ships to travel to the gold fields in northern California. In 1850 U.S. businessmen financed the construction of the Panama Railroad between these two major port cities in order to provide transportation for the growing numbers of people who were headed to California. Then, in 1878, a French company acquired the exclusive right to build an inter-oceanic canal on the Isthmus of Panama, which was partially constructed between 1882 and 1889.

With the political and military backing of the U.S. government, the Province of Panama seceded from Colombia in 1903 and established the independent Republic of Panama. Immediately thereafter, the U.S. and Panamanian governments signed the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty, which gave the former the right to build the Panama Canal across the Isthmus and to control a 10-mile strip of land from coast to coast for its operation, maintenance, and protection, which became the U.S.-administered Panama Canal Zone (PCZ). The U.S. Corps of Engineers proceeded to complete the difficult and costly construction of the Panama Canal that was finally opened to shipping in 1914. The U.S.-controlled Panama Canal Company operated the inter-oceanic waterway until December 1999, when, under the provisions of the Torrijos-Carter Treaty of 1977, the Panama Canal and PCZ were turned over to the government of Panama.

From 1903 until 1968, Panama was a constitutional democracy dominated by a commercially oriented oligarchy. During the 1950s, the Panamanian military began to challenge the oligarchy's political hegemony. Its civilian government was overthrown in 1968 by a military coup, and for 20 years Panama was run by a left-wing military junta led by Generals Omar Torrijos (r. 1968–1981) and Manuel Noriega (r. 1983–1989).

In October 1968, Dr. Arnulfo Arias Madrid (1901–1988), twice elected president (r. 1940–1941, 1949–1951) and twice ousted by the Panamanian military, was ousted for a third time as president by the National Guard after only 10 days in office. A military government was established, and the commander of the National Guard, Brigadier General Omar Torrijos, soon emerged as the principal power in Panamanian political life. Torrijos's regime was harsh and corrupt, but his charisma, populist domestic programs, and nationalist (anti-U.S.) foreign policy appealed to the rural and urban constituencies largely ignored by the oligarchy. In 1979, Torrijos founded the Revolutionary Democratic Party (PRD), with a Social Democratic ideology, described as center-left.

Torrijos's sudden death in 1981 in a mysterious plane crash—rumored to have been caused by CIA operatives—altered the tone but not the direction of Panama's political evolution. Despite the 1983 constitutional amendments, which appeared to proscribe a political role for the military, the Panama Defense Forces (PDF), as they were then known, continued to dominate Panamanian political life behind a façade of civilian government. By this time, General Manuel Noriega was firmly in control of both the PDF and the civilian government.

The U.S. government froze economic and military assistance to Panama in the summer of 1987 in response to the domestic political crisis in Panama and an attack on the U.S. Embassy. In April 1988, President Ronald Reagan invoked the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, freezing Panamanian government assets in all U.S. organizations. In May 1989 Panamanians voted overwhelmingly for the anti-Noriega candidates. The Noriega regime promptly annulled the election, and embarked on a new round of repression. By the fall of 1989 the regime was barely clinging to power, and the regime's paranoia made daily existence unsafe for American citizens.

On December 20, 1989, U.S. President George H. W. Bush ordered his military forces into Panama, allegedly to protect the lives and property of U.S. citizens (about 25,000 resided in the PCZ, both civilians and military personnel), to fulfill U.S. treaty responsibilities regarding the operation and defense of the Panama Canal, to assist the Panamanian people in restoring democracy, and to bring Noriega to justice. The U.S. troops involved in Operation Just Cause achieved their primary objectives quickly, and Noriega eventually surrendered to U.S. authorities on January 3, 1990; and he was immediately taken to Florida on a U.S. military airplane to face criminal charges in a U.S. Federal Court.

On December 22, 1989, the Organization of American States (OAS) passed a resolution deploring the U.S. invasion of Panama and calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops. On December 29, 1989, the UN General Assembly voted 75–20 with 40 abstentions to condemn the U.S. invasion of the Republic of Panama as a “flagrant violation of international law.”

Since the 1989–1990 U.S. invasion and occupation of Panama City and surrounding areas, which ended the 21-year Torrijos-Noriega military dictatorship, Panama has successfully completed three peaceful transfers of power to opposition political parties. Panama's political landscape is now dominated by two major parties and many smaller ones, which are driven more by individual leaders than by ideologies.

Guillermo David Endara Galimany, who won the 1989 presidential election that General Noriega annulled, was later declared the winner after the U.S. invasion and served as president from 1989 to 1994 with the support of a coalition of anti-Noriega parties. Ernesto Pérez Balladares (PRD), who was an ally of General Omar Torrijos, served as president from 1994 to 1999; since leaving office, he has been implicated in charges of corruption. Current President Martin Torrijos (PRD), the son of General Omar Torrijos, succeeded President Mireya Moscoso (1999–2004), the widow of former President Arnulfo Arias Madrid who founded the Panameñista Party (renamed the Arnulfista Party in 1990).

Missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church accompanied the early Spanish explorers and settlers, which led to the establishment of the first Catholic parish in Panama in 1510. This became the seat of the Diocese of Santa María La Antigua del Darién and was the first diocese formed on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere, when Bishop Juan de Quevedo Villegas (d. 1519) arrived with Governor Pedro Arias de Avila (also known as Pedrarias Dávila, ca. 1440–1531) in 1513. The name was changed to the Diocese of Panama in 1520, and this jurisdiction became an archdiocese in 1925.

Many of the colonial churches built by the Spanish were constant reminders of the wealth and power of the Catholic Church in Panama and its temporal powers. One of these colonial treasures, the Cathedral of Old Panama City, was ransacked and burned by Englishman Captain Henry Morgan (1635–1688) and his pirate band in 1671, but its ruins are still the centerpiece of Panamá Viejo and a major tourist attraction.

In 1911, Monsignor F. X. Junguito, S.J., who was appointed bishop in April 1901, resided in Panama City and was assisted by his vicar-general, his secretary, the priest of the parish of the Sagrario, and two other secular priests who labored to supply the spiritual needs of the 30,000 inhabitants, at least two-thirds of whom were Catholics. They were assisted by the resident Jesuit Fathers (seven priests), Lazarists (five priests), and the Discalced Augustinians (three priests and two lay brothers).

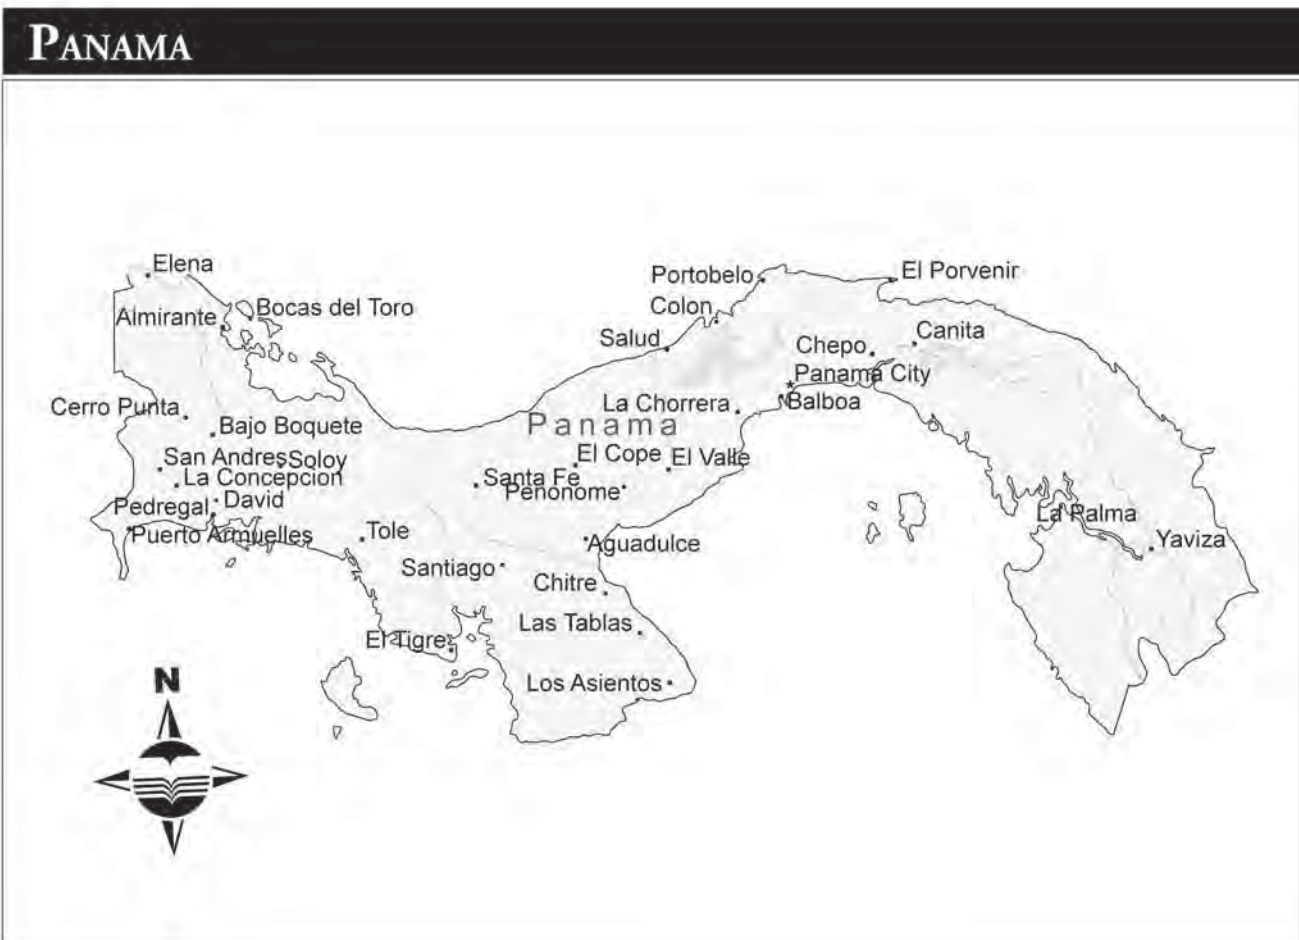

The Roman Catholic Church holds a respected, though not very powerful, position in Panamanian society and is a familiar facet of daily life. The Constitution of 1946 provides for freedom of religion, provided that “Christian morality and public order” are respected, and it recognizes that Catholicism is the country’s predominant religion, which is taught in the public schools. Such instruction or other religious activity is not compulsory, however.

The basic principles governing the church’s activities or its relationship with the government were not affected by the Constitution of 1946. From the early years of independence up until the late 1960s, the Catholic Church continued to emphasize its spiritual role and generally avoided involvement in secular affairs. However, since the Second Vatican Council in 1965 and the Conference of Latin American Bishops in Medellín in 1969, the Catholic Church has become more active in temporal matters, due to its increasing concern for, and commitment to, improving the social conditions of the impoverished masses in Panama and elsewhere.

Traditionally, Panama has had a very low percentage of native-born priests and nuns within religious orders. In 1970, more than 75 percent of the Catholic missionaries in Panama were foreigners, mostly coming from Spain, Italy and the United States, or from other Latin American countries. Present in Panama were religious orders and personnel from Catholic missions in North America that included 28 male religious orders representing the Vincentians (21), Benedictines (1), Holy Cross Fathers (1) and Sulpicians (1), plus 3 diocesan priests and 1 lay brother. In addition, there were 10 female religious groups representing the Maryknolls (6), Mercy of Brooklyn (1), Franciscans of Mary Immaculate (1) and St. Joseph of Medaille (1), as well as 1 lay sister. Also, the Scarborough Foreign Mission Society of Canada had 1 priest in Panama.

However, these religious orders and missionaries from North America represented a small part of the total number of Catholic mission workers in Panama in 1980. Most of the 209 religious priests, 490 sisters, and 58 lay brothers in Panama were from Europe or other Latin American countries. The Jesuits, Carmelites, Paulists, and La Salle Christian Brothers were the major groups represented in Panama, whereas the Visitation was the only order of cloistered nuns in the country.

In 1980, approximately 87 percent of the population was considered Roman Catholic and virtually every town had a Catholic church, although many towns did not have a resident priest. Due to the small number of Catholic clergy in Panama, only 1 priest for every 6,299 inhabitants in 1980, many rural Catholics received only an occasional visit from a busy priest who traveled among a number of parishes. While Catholicism permeates the environment of most Panamanians, its impact is not as pronounced as in many other Catholic countries of Latin America.

The Catholic Church in Panama, in 1980, consisted of one archdiocese, three dioceses, a vicariate apostolic in Darien, and a nullius prelate in Bocas del Toro. A papal nuncio also represented the Vatican. At that time, Panama was organized into 133 parishes. Catholic institutions included 70 elementary and secondary schools, a Catholic university, a seminary for training diocesan priests, and numerous charitable programs.

Monsignor Marcos Gregorio McGrath (1924–2000) was archbishop of Panama from 1969 to 1994, and he was succeeded by Monsignor José Dimas Cedeño Delgado in 1994.

Until September 2000, when Archbishop Cedeño declared Holy Mary of La Antigua to be the official patroness of Panama, the unofficial patron saint had been the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, whose feast day is celebrated nationally on December 8 (Mother's Day). Another important religious festival is celebrated annually in Portobelo, Colón province, dedicated to the Miraculous Black Christ, whose statue is paraded through city streets.

In 2004, the Archdiocese of Panama included 88 parishes that were served by 80 diocesan priests and 117 religious priests (a total of 197, or 1 priest for every 3,126 Catholics); in addition there were 161 lay brothers, 218 nuns, and 48 permanent deacons. However, these statistics do not include the dioceses of Chitré, Darién, David, Penonomé, Santiago de Veraguas, and Colón-Kuna Yala and Territorial Prelature of Bocas del Toro.

Since the 1950s, the Catholic Church has attempted to revive active interest in religious affairs, raise church attendance, and increase the number of church marriages. This has been a continuing effort since 1958, when a lay mission group, La Santa Misión Católica (The Holy Catholic Mission), arrived from Rome to stimulate and support the local clergy. Focusing first on the lower classes in the capital, the campaign soon spread throughout the country. It helped introduce church-sponsored social welfare projects, and served to rouse Catholics from the lethargy that had traditionally plagued the Catholic Church in Panama. However, the Panamanian Catholic Church continues to confront obstacles: a shortage of priests, the indifference of nominal Catholics, and the secular attitudes of a growing urban population, especially among the youth.

During the 1970s, the Catholic Church received moderate public support, which was bolstered at times by militant Catholic action groups, such as federations of Catholic doctors and lawyers, who campaigned for a more dynamic role for the Catholic Church in community life. A growing number of priests and nuns took a more active role in labor movements, in the formation of cooperatives, in concern for the poor, and in activities that sought to produce moderate reform within Panamanian society.

An added dimension during the 1970s was the birth and development of the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement, which began when a Spanish priest and a Panamanian nun were strongly influenced by Catholic Charismatics in the United States. The CCR was officially organized in the Archdiocese of Panama in September 1974, following a retreat led by Friar Alfonso Navarro Castellanos (1925–2003) of the Congregation of the Missionaries of the Holy Spirit in Mexico City, one of the early leaders of the CCR in Latin America. From the beginning, Monsignor Marcos Gregorio McGrath (1924–2000), archbishop of Panama, supported the CCR, which became known in Panama as Renovación Cristiana en el Espíritu Santo. The principal leaders of the CCR in Panama are Monsignor Alejandro Vásquez Pinto, Segundo Cano, David Cosca, Francisco Verar, Teófilo Rodríguez, Reynaldo Karamañites, and Rafael Siú.

Numerous Charismatic Bible study, prayer, and fellowship groups were organized in the early 1970s, along with Charismatic Masses and rallies. Soon, Protestant pastors and laymen were also participating in the Charismatic Renewal movement, which then took on an ecumenical flavor during the 1970s. This new openness and receptivity was most apparent among the middle and upper classes, where barriers between Protestants and Catholics became less important. This spirit of unity among Christians, regardless of church affiliation, became evident as scores of small Bible study and prayer groups developed spontaneously to meet the growing need for fellowship and spiritual nurture among new converts and revitalized older believers who experienced Charismatic renewal.

Parallel to this development, the work of the Assemblies of God in Panama began in 1967 under the leadership of missionaries Richard Jeffery and David and Doris Goodwin, who held extended evangelistic crusades, called “Gran Campaña de Sanidad Divina” (Great Campaign of Divine Healing), throughout much of Panama. The first such crusade was held on Calle Primera, Vista Hermosa, in Panama City. Some of the early converts in these crusades were Hermenia Villarreal and Carmen and Anita González, who began working with the Assemblies of God under the guidance of missionary Richard Larson, who arrived in Panama in 1969 and established a church in the Canal Zone.

Carmen González, a few months after her conversion, traveled to the United States and was strongly influenced by the CCR there. Upon her return to Panama, Carmen worked in an evangelistic ministry in the Province of Chiriquí in western Panama, where she met María Ramos. In 1973, Carmen and María returned to Panama City and became leaders in the early Charismatic Renewal movement there. They met with a large number of Charismatics in the Guadalupe Catholic Church and at Colegio Las Esclavas del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús until they were forced to leave and find another meeting place. In 1975, they began meeting at a house in Barrio San Francisco and became known as the “Interdenominational Charismatic Prayer Group.” Later, this group moved to Barrio Bella Vista and was organized as a church with María Ramos as pastor, under the name Christian House of Prayer (Casa de Oración Cristiana); it became affiliated with the Assemblies of God in 1977, under the pastoral leadership of Mario Vásquez.

By 1980, the Catholic hierarchy attempted to place restrictions on the CCR and to more strongly direct its course in order to avoid losing members to evangelical groups, which were seen as a threat largely due to widespread Pentecostal growth in the capital. The CCR had a considerable impact among members of the upper class, although relatively few became members of evangelical churches. However, a growing spiritual receptivity among the upper class was evidenced by attendance at ecumenical meetings sponsored by the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship (FGBMF) and Women's Aglow Fellowship during the 1970s.

The Roman Catholic Church dominated the religious life of Panama until labor opportunities in the PCZ brought many American citizens and other foreign nationals to the country. The rapid influx of thousands of Protestant immigrants to Panama in the early 1900s led to the construction of many Protestant chapels for the largely English-speaking population of the PCZ, which included many African Americans from the British West Indies. The U.S. occupation of the PCZ also provided an open door for many U.S. Protestant mission agencies to begin work in Panama, such as the Salvation Army, the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1904), the Southern Baptist Convention (1905), the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) (1906), the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana) (1906), and the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A. (1909).

By 1911 about 10,000 residents in the PCZ were being served by 39 Christian churches: Protestant Episcopal (13), nondenominational (8), Roman Catholic (7), Baptist (7), Methodist (3), and Adventist (1). Three additional Protestant groups arrived in the next decade: the Free Methodist Church of North America (1913), the Christian Mission of Barbados (1914), and the Christian Brethren (1918). Also in 1914, the Union Churches of the Canal Zone were organized as non-sectarian, interdenominational community churches. In 1935 the population of the PCZ numbered 14,816 and was served by 54 congregations.

However, the first Protestants to arrive in Panama were a group of 1,200 colonists from Scotland (some of whom were Presbyterian), who attempted to build a commercial colony on the Caribbean coast of the Darien Peninsula in 1698. However, the colony was abandoned in late 1699.

The next Protestants to arrive were Wesleyan (British) Methodists, who were among Afro-Caribbean immigrants to settle in the Bocas del Toro region of the Caribbean coast, beginning in the 1820s. The United Methodist Free Church of England (1870s), the Jamaican Baptists (1880s), and the Jamaican Wesleyan Methodists (1880s) also began work among West Indian immigrants in Panama.

The Church of England (through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts) arrived in the 1850s during the construction of the Panama Railroad. Company officials helped to finance the construction of the first permanent Protestant church building in Panama, Christ's Church-by-the-Sea in Aspinwall, built in 1864–1865. This was the second oldest permanent Protestant church in Central America, with the first being St. John's Anglican Cathedral in Belize City, built in 1825. However, occasional Anglican-Episcopal worship services had been held in Panama since 1849, conducted by clergymen en route to the gold fields in California, which led to the establishment of the first Episcopal congregation in 1851 in the port town of Taboga. An official Isthmian Mission of the Anglican Church was established in Panama in 1853, although missionary work was sparse until 1883.

Prior to the 1950s, Protestant missionary activities were largely centered in the PCZ, where many of the English-speaking people were concentrated. However, over time, some of the Protestant denominations began to evangelize and establish churches among the Spanish-speaking population, mainly in the urban areas adjacent to the PCZ and in the western provinces of the country.

Prior to the 1940s, Southern Baptist work in Panama was largely limited to North Americans and West Indians in the PCZ and in the port cities of Panama City and Colón. In the 1940s increased efforts were made by the Southern Baptist Home Mission Board to launch work in Spanish-speaking communities, and in the 1950s among the Kuna Indians on the Caribbean coast of northeastern Panama. Protestant efforts among the Kunas began in 1913, led by British and American independent missionaries under the sponsorship of the San Blas Mission. During the 1950s, the nondenominational New Tribes Mission and several Mennonite groups began work among Amerindian groups in Panama as well.

Pentecostal work in Panama began with the arrival of the Arthur Edwards family in 1928, sent out from the U.S.-based International Church of the Foursquare Gospel. Early evangelistic efforts by Edwards and his helpers proved quite successful among the Spanish-speaking population during the 1930s and 1940s, especially following revival meetings in the PCZ town of Frijoles, where supernatural “signs and wonders” were reported for several years in the mid-1930s. The mother church of the Panamanian Foursquare movement, the Calle Q Foursquare Church, was founded in 1937 in Panama City and became a training center for missionary efforts throughout the country. The Foursquare Bible School was established at the mother church in 1938. By 1981, the Foursquare Church had grown to include 21,700 baptized members, 206 organized congregations, and 201 preaching points in all nine provinces, with about 97 percent of the membership composed of Spanish-speaking Panamanians. At that time, the Foursquare Church was not only the largest Pentecostal denomination in Panama but also the largest Protestant denomination.

Other Pentecostal denominations in Panama include the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1935), the Evangelistic Doctrinal Church of Puerto Pilon (an independent group, founded in 1940), the Church of God of Prophecy (1946), the International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross (1950), the Pentecostal Church of God—International Mission of Puerto Rico (1956), the Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ (1960), the Church of God in Christ (1964), the New Life Evangelical Church (a 1967 split from the Foursquare Church in the Province of Chiriquí), the Assemblies of God (1967), the Pentecostal Christian Church of the World Wide Missionary Movement (1973) and Missionary Advance (1973), both from Puerto Rico, the Pentecostal Church of Jesus Christ (1974), the United Pentecostal Church (1980), and the International Pentecostal Holiness Church (1988). Also, the Maranatha

Panama Metropolitan Cathedral in Panama City was built between 1688 and 1796. (iStockPhoto.com)

World Revival Ministry (founded by Apostle Nahum Rosario in Chicago, Illinois) arrived in 2003.

Small, non-Pentecostal Protestant denominations include the following: the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod (1942, Iglesia Evangélica Luterana de Panamá), the nondenominational Central American Mission (1944), the independent Churches of Christ (1945), the New Tribes Mission (1952), the Gospel Missionary Union (1952), Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society (1952, renamed Mission to the Americas in 1994), the Church of the Nazarene (1953), the Society of Bible Churches (1958), the Mennonite Brethren Board of Missions and Services (1958), the Church of the Brethren (1958), the United Gospel Church (1961), the Evangelical Mission of Panama (1961), Baptist International Missions (1961), the Association of Lutheran Churches of Panama (1963), the Free Will Baptist Church (1964), American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A. (2001), and the Church of God—Holiness (2003). Also, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America is engaged in relief and development ministry in Coclé Province, which includes a “Ministry of Reconciliation” between Amerindian peoples (Ngöbe-Buglé) in Penonomé.

In 1980 the largest Protestant denominations in Panama were the Foursquare Church, the Episcopal Church (which assumed responsibility for the Anglican community in 1906 due to growing U.S. influence in the PCZ), the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and the Panamanian Baptist Convention (affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention).

By 2005, the Assemblies of God had become the largest Protestant denomination as a result of 38 years of strenuous evangelistic and church-planting efforts throughout the country, with 800 congregations (churches and missions) and about 50,000 members. Second largest was the Seventh-day Adventist Church, with 162 congregations and 40,600 members. The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel was third largest, with 415 congregations and 31,200 members. Other large denominations included the Baptist Convention (120 congregations with 12,100 members), the Evangelical Methodist Church and the Wesleyan Methodist Church (combined statistics were 257 congregations and about 12,000 members), the Pentecostal Church of God (103 churches and 154 missions with 8,134 members), the independent Churches of Christ (84 churches with 6,740 members), the New Tribes Mission-related churches (72 churches and 6,090 members), the Anglican-Episcopal Church (23 churches with 5,400 members), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) with 85 congregations and 5,200 members, the Evangelical Doctrinal Church Association (34 congregations and 4,060 members), and the United Pentecostal Church (77 congregations and 3,850 members). All other Protestant denominations had fewer than 3,000 members each in 2005.

Many of the more conservative Protestant churches are associated with the Panamanian Evangelical Confraternity (Confraternidad Evangélica Panameña [CONEPA]), which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. Members of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC), include the Episcopal Diocese of Panama, the Evangelical Methodist Church (affiliated with the United Methodist Church in the U.S.A.), the Wesleyan Methodist Church (affiliated with the Conference of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas), and the independent Lutheran Church (Diocese of Panama).

In the area of mass communication, evangelical radio station HOXO (AM transmitter) was founded in 1949 in Panama City, with financial help and technical assistance provided jointly by the Latin America Mission (LAM) in Costa Rica and World Radio Missionary Fellowship, operators of radio station HCJB in Quito, Ecuador. In 1971 an FM radio transmitter was added, called “Radio Vida,” and these two radio stations were incorporated in 1974 as the Tropical Broadcasting Association under a Panamanian board of directors. By 2005, at least 13 evangelical radio stations existed in Panama, 5 of which were owned and operated by the Assemblies of God, as well as a TV channel: “Hosanna Visión—Canal 37.”

The Ecumenical Committee of Panama (COEPA) is a fraternal association of churches, founded in 1986, which confess Jesus Christ as God and Savior and seek to fulfill their common calling to the glory of God while promoting greater unity, dialogue, and inter-religious activities. Its current members include representatives of the Evangelical Methodist Church of Panama, the Roman Catholic Church, the Episcopal-Anglican Church of Panama, Calvary Baptist Church, the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Russian Orthodox Church. The president of COEPA is Bishop Pablo Morales of the Evangelical Methodist Church of Panama.

Non-Protestant Christian groups present in the country include the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (1 temple, 93 congregations and 42,606 members in 2007), Jehovah’s Witnesses (235 kingdom halls with 11,704 members in 2005), Christadelphians, Voice of the Chief Cornerstone (from Puerto Rico), Mita Congregation (from Puerto Rico), Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (from Brazil, also called Strong Prayer to the Holy Spirit Church), God Is Love Pentecostal Church (from Brazil), Light of the World Church (from Mexico), Unity School of Christianity, Seicho-No-Ie, Philadelphia Church of God, and Evangelical Doctrinal Church of Port Pilon (founded in Panama).

Eastern Orthodox churches in Panama include a small Greek Orthodox community, affiliated with the Greek Orthodox Metropolitanate of Central America under Metropolitan Athenagoras in Panama City; the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of Three Saints founded in the United States in 1898, affiliated with the Moscow Patriarchal Parish; and the Russian Orthodox Church, affiliated with the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia—ROCOR.

Also, there are four independent Catholic denominations in Panama. The Apostolic Orthodox Old Catholic Church (under Monsignor Jorge Rodríguez-Villa) represents the Old Catholic Tradition. The Apostolic Community of Our Lady of Beautiful Love of Panama was founded by Friar Orlando Enrique Rojas Bonilla (located in El Común, Tolé Municipality of Chiriquí Province); it is affiliated with Our Lady of Guadalupe Community of Communities, founded in Costa Rica by Monsignor Higinio Alas Gómez in 2007 (previously this group was known as Reformed Apostolic and Catholic Church, 2000–2005). The Reunited Apostolic Catholic Church (Diocese of Central America, Panama and the West Indies) was founded in Costa Rica by Archbishop Monsignor Pablo José de Jesús María (secular name: Francisco Eduardo de la Espriella Torrens); it is affiliated with the Brazilian Apostolic Catholic Church (founded by Monsignor Carlos Duarte Costa, bishop of Maura), the Free Orthodox Church of Ibero-America, and the Byzantine Catholic Church, Inc. (under Patriarch Mar Markus I) of Los Angeles, California. The Ecumenical Catholic Church of Christ is affiliated with the Diocese of Our Mother of God in Costa Rica (under Monsignor Sebastián Herrera Plá) and is part of the Apostolic Administration of Central America, Panama and Cuba (under Monsignor Karl R. Rodig of Miami, Florida).

Today, there are a small number of Rastafarians (founded in Jamaica in the 1930s) and adherents of older African-derived religions, such as the syncretistic religion of the Negros Congos, Myalism, Obeah, “revivalistic sects,” and Kumina, almost exclusively among the Afro-Panamanian population. Historically, some of these religions were present in Panama from the beginning of the African slave trade in the Caribbean to the end of the British colonial period. The Negros Congos trace their ancestry to African slaves imported during the Spanish colonial period and speak an Afro-Hispanic Creole, especially on the Caribbean coast of Colón Province, centered in the colonial port city of Portobello. Present among the British West Indian Creole population were the Afro-Caribbean sects of Myalism (a syncretistic religion that appealed to all African ethnic groups in Jamaica and the West Indies) and Obeah (a religion probably of Ashanti origin, characterized by the practice of sorcery and witchcraft, which had been outlawed in the British colonies during the slavery period).

In addition, several “revivalistic” sects originated in Jamaica and the British West Indies during the 1800s: Native Baptists, Spiritual Baptists, and Zion Revivalism (modifications of Myalism, which inserted familiar elements of the Christian faith—the Bible, God, angels, archangels, saints, apostles, and prophets—into worship patterns characteristic of African religiosity); and Kumina (also known as Pukkumina or Pocomania), a post-Emancipation (August 1 is celebrated as Emancipation Day throughout the Caribbean) religious tradition traced to African indentured servants who were brought to Jamaica from Central Africa, in which “spirit possession,” ritual healing, and animal sacrifice were central features (similar to Santería in Cuba and Puerto Rico).

Other religions include traditional Amerindian belief systems (animistic) among the Guaymí (Ngäbe Buglé), Kuna, Choco (Wounaan and Emberá), Bribri, Teribe (Naso), and Buglere (Bokota); “popular religiosity” (syncretistic, practiced by a majority of the Hispanic population); traditional Chinese religions: Daoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism; Hinduism (including the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organization, and International Society of Transcendental Meditation—TM); Sant Mat (including ECKANKAR, the Path of Light and Sound, Sant Thakar Singh, Surat Shadd Yoga, Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission, Science of Spirituality, and Supreme Master Ching Hai Meditation Association); Sikh, Islam, and Subud; Japanese Buddhism (Soka Gakkai International of Panama—Nichiren Shoshu Temple) and Shinto; Judaism; Baha’i Faith; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC); Wicca; Superet Light Doctrinal Church (a U.S.-based Spiritualist community); New Acropolis Cultural Association; The God, Love and Charity Spiritist Fraternity (founded in 1982); Latin American Federation of Para-Psychological and Similar Sciences; the Saint Germain Foundation, Raelian movement; Ishaya Techniques; and the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, popularly known as the Unification Movement, founded in Korea by the Reverend Sun Myung Moon, which publishes the Spanish-language newspaper, Tiempos del Mundo, in Panama.

Beginning with the building of the Panama Railroad in the 1850s, many Chinese laborers arrived via Canada and Jamaica, mainly from Guangzhou Province but also from the British crown colony of Hong Kong. Along with the Chinese immigrants came some Buddhist, Daoist, and Confucian traditions that were centered on family altars where devotion was rendered to their ancestors; they include the Fa Yen Religious Society and Yan Wo Religious Society. There were several waves of Chinese immigrants whose descendants today number around 50,000. Since the 1970s, an estimated 80,000 Chinese have settled in Panama from other parts of mainland China: 99 percent are Cantonese-speaking, although Mandarin and Hakka speakers are represented among the newer arrivals. Over time, the older Chinese immigrants and their descendants began assimilating into Panamanian society and, often, that meant converting to Catholicism or Protestantism. The Sacred Heart Chapel in Ancon is now home to a Chinese Roman Catholic congregation, and there are a dozen or more evangelical Chinese churches, mainly located in Panama City and Colón. Some of the evangelical churches are affiliated with the Chinese Christian Mission of Petaluma, California; the Baptist Convention; the Christian and Missionary Alliance; or the Evangelical Free Church.

With independence came the North American canal-building effort, which in turn brought in an international labor force and greater religious diversity. Panama's Hindu and Muslim communities, which initially arrived by way of the British colonies of Guyana and Trinidad-Tobago, first came as canal workers between 1904 and 1913. Most of the Hindus trace their roots back to the states of Gujarat and Sindh, in India and Pakistan, respectively. Many ancestors of today's Muslim community also came from those same places, but this community has since been augmented by Arabs, who arrived via South American countries, and more recently as a result of home-grown converts. The Muslims live primarily in Panama City and Colón, with smaller concentrations in David and other provincial cities. The majority of today's Muslims are of Lebanese, Palestinian, or Asian Indian descent. As of March 1997, there were four Mosques (masajid) in the Republic of Panama. There are also a few Sikhs in Panama, almost all of whom trace their roots to the Punjab.

Some of the South Asian subcontinent organizations in Panama are the Sunni Muslim Religious Association, the Panama Muslim Mission (originally named the Sunni Indo-Pakistani Muslim Society, founded in 1929), the Islamic Foundation of Panama (Jama Masjid), the Panamanian Hindu Civic Association, the Krishna Radha Temple Society, the Hindustani Society of Panama (Templo Hindu de Tumba Muerto), the Hindustani Society of Colón, the Islamic Cultural Center of Colón, and the Guru Nanak Sahid Civic Society.

Also, about 10,000 Lebanese (some are Orthodox Christians and others are Muslim) live in Panama, including many investors who have businesses tied to the Colón Free Trade Zone, which re-exports an enormous variety of merchandise throughout the Americas. Begun in 1948, it is now the largest free trade zone in the Americas and second largest in the world.

The small Jewish community (about 9,000) dates from the middle of the 19th century, and includes 5 synagogues: Beth El Synagogue (Orthodox), Shevet Achim Synagogue in Panama City (Orthodox-Sephardic), Ahavat Sion Synagogue (Orthodox-Sephardic), Kol Shearith Israel Synagogue in Panama City (Reform), and Ahvat Ahim Synagogue in Colón. The Baha'i Faith maintains one of the world's seven Baha'i Houses of Worship.

Clifton L. Holland

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ, U.S.A.; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Christadelphians; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God in Christ; Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Brethren; ECKANKAR; Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod; Roman Catholic Church; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Evangelical Church, Soldiers of the Cross; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Latin American Council of Churches; Master Ching Hai Meditation Association; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Mita Congregation; New Acropolis Cultural Association; Nichiren Shoshu; Rastafarians; Ruhani Satsang; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; Sathya Sai Baba Movement; Seicho-No-Ie; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Sikhism/Sant Mat; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Spiritual Baptists; Subud; Unification Movement; United Methodist Church; Unity School of Christianity; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Brierly, Peter, ed. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1977.
- Catholic Encyclopedia* (1913). "Republic and Diocese of Panama." http://en.wikisource.org/wiki/Catholic_Encyclopedia_\(1913\)/Republic_and_Diocese_of_Panama/Republic_and_Diocese_of_Panama). Accessed March 1, 2009.
- Grimes, Barbara F., ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 12th ed. Dallas, TX: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1992.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC-World Vision, 1981.
- Jackson, Eric. "Holy Scriptures Month and Panama's Religious Heritage." The Panama News 13, no. 11 (May 20–June 2, 2007).
- PROLADES-Religion in the America Database: "Religion in Panama." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/cam/pan/pan-rd.htm>. Accessed March 1, 2009.
- Ravensbergen, Gerriejan Anna. "Protestantism in Panama and Why Middle Classers go Evangelical." Master's thesis in Latin American Studies, CEDLA Inter-university Centre for Latin American Research and Documentation, Amsterdam, 2008.
- Statistics for the Archdiocese of Panama. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/diocese/dpana.html>. Accessed March 1, 2009.
- U.S. Department of State, International Religious Freedom Report 2007: Panama. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90262.htm>. Accessed March 1, 2009.

Pangestu

Pangestu is one of the new spiritual religions of Indonesia. Its name, which means "blessing" in Javanese, is both an acronym for the organization named Paguyuban Ngesti Tunggal ("association focusing on union") and its common name. The organization was founded in 1949 but its origins lie in the revelation received by Raden Soenarto Mertowardojo (1899–ca. 1965), or Pakde Narto, on February 14, 1932. Pakde Narto was born near Boyolali in Central Java, then lived in Surakarta, where he worked as a clerk in a series of government offices, and died in the mid-1960s. Soon after his initial experience two close followers transcribed the teachings he received through the "True Teacher" (Sang Guru Sejati). These became Sasangka Jati (a text translated into English as True Light), which contains the core teachings of Pangestu.

Sasangka Jati begins with clarification of the three aspects of God: Suksma Kawekas (the source of life, or God the Father), Suksma Sejati (the True Teacher, messenger of God), and Roh Suci (the Holy Spirit). It proceeds with clarification on the five qualities essential to proper worship of God: non-attachment, acceptance, truthfulness, patience, and noble aspiration; then to five commandments (Paliwara); a version of Genesis (Gumelaring Dumadi); the One Teaching (Tunggal Sabda); the safe path (Dalan Rahayu); the "whence and whither" (Sangkan Paran); and prayer (Panembah).

Pakde Narto lived in a Surakarta world in which virtually all men of his position were involved in a variety of spiritual practices, often simultaneously. He was closely associated with the Mankunegaran, the lesser court of Solo, and through it also with Dutch Protestant missionaries and the Theosophical Society. It is emphasized that Pangestu is neither a new religion nor “mystical.” Those terms are disavowed in favor of the “spiritual” to stress that it involves no relations with ancestral spirits or occult powers. Even the term “meditation” is avoided, as in Pangestu this is associated mainly with Hindu and Buddhist philosophies that leaders believe do not focus sufficiently on God. At the same time teachings are presented as a newly received, direct transmission from God, which came without the mediation of an established religious system.

The organization became prominent in the 1950s, when Dr. Sumantri Hardjoprakoso, a Dutch-trained psychiatrist, became its leader. Since then Pangestu has particularly appealed to intellectuals with a modernizing agenda. Within the Javanist world of movements it could be described as the equivalent of Muhammadiyah, Indonesia’s leading modernist Muslim movement. It synthesizes many elements of traditional philosophy and literature into a clear system, which appeals strongly to educated Javanists. From the 1950s on, but especially during the Suharto era, it became especially strong within both the army and the civil service. It was estimated in 1970 that membership was around 50,000, but in recent years it has claimed a following of twice that. It has a clearly structured organization throughout Indonesia and lists branches in Europe, but most members everywhere are ethnic Javanese.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Meditation; Theosophical Society (Adyar).

References

- De Jong, Suffridus. Een Javaanse Levenshouding. Wageningen: H. Veenman & Zonen B.V., 1973.
- Hadiwijono, Harun. Man in the Present Javanese Mysticism. Baarn: Bosch & Keuning N.V., 1967.
- Hardjoprakoso, Sumantri. Indonesisch Mensbeeld als Basis ener Psycho-Therapie. Leiden, 1956.
- Mertowardojo, Soenarto. True Light. Pangestu, Jakarta, 1972. (English ed.)
- Sutrisno, Mudji. “Life Wisdom of ‘Sasongko Jati.’” <http://www.crvp.org/book/Series03/IIID-6/chapter-5.htm>. Accessed March 24, 2009.

Pantheism

Pantheism is a widely discussed philosophical position, but one that has rarely led to the formation of religious communities. It is the view that the universe is identical with God, and that God is identical with the universe. A slightly similar position, called panentheism, identifies the universe as divine but also assumes that God is more than the universe and hence remains an object of veneration and worship. Panentheism is often identified with the philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) and Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000).

Alasdair MacIntyre (1967) suggests that pantheism includes the belief that everything that exists constitutes an all-inclusive “unity” that is in some sense divine. The first prominent pantheist is generally identified as the Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza (1632–1677), and British freethinker John Toland (1670–1722) is credited with coining the term “pantheist,” which he used synonymously with “Spinozist.” However, a number of ancient philosophers, including Plato (ca. 428–348 BCE) and Plotinus (205–270 CE), are identified as pantheists, as are literary lights such as D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930), Walt Whitman (1819–1892), and Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882).

Various movements, such as Daoism, are often identified as inherently pantheistic, as is much mystical and scientific thought. One movement often accused of being pantheistic is the Church of Christ, Scientist, though its founder, Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), denied the charge. On the other hand, modern neo-Pagan groups often identify themselves, in their worship of nature, as pantheists.

Among the few groups identifying itself as pantheist is the Universal Pantheist Society, founded in 1975, which describes its beliefs as follows: “The cosmos, taken or conceived of as a whole, is synonymous with the theological principle of God. The Cosmos is divine, and the earth sacred. Pantheists do not propose belief in a deity; rather, they hold nature itself as a creative presence. Pantheism reconciles science and religion through ecology leading to strong environmental awareness” (<http://www.pantheist.net>). Another pantheist organization is the World Pantheist Union. The Union supports an Earth-honoring, life-affirming, naturalistic form of pantheism, which it hopes to make available as a religious option and a rational alternative to traditional religions.

Universal Pantheist Society
PO Box 3499
Visalia, CA 93278
<http://www.pantheist.net/>

World Pantheist Union
PO Box 55629
Riverside, CA 92517
<http://www.pantheism.net/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Christ, Scientist.

References

- Garrett, Jan. "An Introduction to Pantheism." <http://www.wku.edu/~garreje/panthesm.htm>. Accessed December 1, 2001.
- Harrison, Paul. Elements of Pantheism. London: Llumina Press, 1999, 2004.
- Levine, Michael P. Pantheism: A Non-Theistic Concept of Deity. London and New York: Routledge, 1994.
- MacIntyre, Alasdair. "Pantheism." In Encyclopedia of Philosophy, edited by Paul Edwards. New York: Macmillan and Free Press, 1967.
- Russell, Sharman Apt. Standing in the Light: My Life as a Pantheist. New York: Basic Books, 2008.

■ Papua New Guinea

The modern nation of Papua New Guinea brings together the eastern half of the island of New Guinea, the islands of the Bismarck Archipelago, the northern Solomon Islands, and a variety of other islands east of New Guinea. The western half of New Guinea, the second largest island in the world, is part of Indonesia. Papua New Guinea's 175,000 square miles of land is inhabited by its 5,932,000 citizens, which includes a variety of Melanesians, Polynesians, and Micronesians.

The modern state of Papua New Guinea was constructed in steps, beginning with the merger of the former British protectorate of Papua with the German colony of New Guinea after the Germans were displaced during World War I. The land was administered by Australia until independence was proclaimed in 1975.

The islands covered by Papua New Guinea have been inhabited by Melanesian peoples since at least 2000 BCE. They traditionally tended to live in small groups separated by dense jungle, and modern scholars have identified more than 700 Native languages and dialects. When Europeans made their initial contact with the island's inhabitants in the 20th century, many of these groups had only limited use of tools. Some had yet to discover the wheel.

The traditional religions of the Native population continue to be practiced by many of the islanders, but only a few (less than 5 percent) follow it exclusively. Native religion came under heavy attack by the missionaries, the first of whom, Samuel McFarlane (1837–1911), arrived in 1871. McFarlane, representing the London Missionary Society, was joined within a few years by W. G. Lawes (1839–1907), and together they pioneered work on Murray Island and Port Moresby. Their work would grow into the present United Church in Papua New Guinea.

Australian Methodists (now a constituent part of the Uniting Church in Australia) chose New Guinea as their first mission field and sent George Brown (1835–1917) and a team of native church workers from Fiji and Samoa. The mission grew to include the Duke of York, New Britain, and New Ireland Islands. The work was spurred by the 1878 death of four of the Fijians, who were killed by those among whom they were working. Work expanded to Papua in 1890. This work was later incorporated into the United Church of the Solomon Islands.

In 1886 German Lutherans working through the Neuendettelsau Mission Society began what would become one of the more successful missions in Papua New Guinea. Under the leadership of Johann Flierl (1858–1947), the German mission grew with a succession of mass movements early in the 20th century. After World War I, the Australian Lutherans became the dominant force in leadership, and the American Lutheran Church (now a constituent part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) added its resources to assist in recovery from the Japanese occupation.

A Protestant mission church in the mountains of Papua New Guinea. (iStockPhoto.com)

The church became autonomous in 1956 as the Evangelical Lutheran Church of New Guinea. The United Church in Papua New Guinea, the United Church of the Solomon Islands, and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea are all members of the World Council of Churches.

The last of the major Christian groups to enter New Guinea, also from Australia, were the Anglicans. Albert Maclaren (1853–1891) launched the Anglican mission at Dogura on the island’s northeast coast, and the Diocese of Papua New Guinea was erected in 1898. The diocese existed within the Church of England in Australia until the independent Province of the Church of Papua New Guinea was formed in 1977.

Roman Catholic missionaries actually found their way to the Bismarck archipelago in 1847 but had little effect until 1881, when representatives of the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart came. Thereafter, the work expanded rapidly and a vicariate of British New Guinea was established in 1889. The Roman Catholic Church experienced spectacular growth in Papua New Guinea in the 1960s, but it has had a continuing problem with the recruitment of indigenous priests; the first Native Papuan priest was not ordained until 1937. He later became the first Papuan bishop (1970). As the new century begins, there are 4 archdioceses and 20 dioceses.

Through the 20th century, a spectrum of Christian denominations launched missions in Papua New Guinea. Most of these originated in Australia, with a lesser number coming from the United States (including the Baptist Bible Fellowship International, the Church of the Nazarene, and the Salvation Army). Swedish and Finnish Pentecostals initiated work in the 1960s. The independent Bethel Pentecostal Temple, the first Pentecostal church in the state of Washington, started a small mission in 1948, which has grown to be

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Papua New Guinea

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,317,000	6,152,000	95.0	2.44	7,855,000	10,182,000
Protestants	913,000	3,840,000	59.3	3.00	4,850,000	6,300,000
Roman Catholics	607,000	1,830,000	28.2	2.47	2,450,000	3,200,000
Independents	23,200	315,000	4.9	2.85	480,000	750,000
Ethnoreligionists	114,000	208,000	3.2	2.27	240,000	290,000
Baha'is	9,300	57,000	0.9	2.64	85,000	120,000
Agnostics	2,000	40,000	0.6	11.08	70,000	110,000
Buddhists	2,000	10,500	0.2	2.49	14,000	19,000
Chinese folk	2,200	4,600	0.1	2.47	5,500	7,000
Atheists	0	1,900	0.0	2.48	3,000	5,000
New religionists	0	1,900	0.0	2.40	3,000	4,000
Muslims	0	1,800	0.0	2.55	3,000	4,500
Jews	300	700	0.0	2.49	700	700
Total population	2,447,000	6,478,000	100.0	2.47	8,279,000	10,742,000

one of the largest evangelical churches in Papua New Guinea, with almost 300 congregations.

The primary indigenous religious movements grew out of World War II and the use of New Guinea as a staging area for the U.S. armed forces. The so-called cargo cults originated from the experience among Native people of seeing cargo planes landing and leaving behind large amounts of supplies. In this context, a variety of local leaders, some with messianic pretensions, arose and began new movements. As the history of contemporary Papua New Guinea has been assembled, the cargo cults have been placed in the larger context of those movements, the first arising as early as the 1890s, through which the indigenous population attempted to respond to the coming of the Europeans. These movements fall in a spectrum, from dominantly Christian to dominantly traditional in belief.

Among the first of these new movements was the movement surrounding the Tokarau Prophet in 1893. Around the beginning of World War I, three new prophets appeared at Saibai on the southwest coast of Papua. However, during and in the years after World War II, more than 100 such groups have appeared, the large number due in part to the many different culture groups inhabiting the various islands. Each group has a rather limited following.

Other groups also operate in the islands. There is a small Buddhist community, primarily made up of Chinese expatriates. The Baha'i Faith has had a steady growth since the 1960s.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Church of England; Church of the Nazarene; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; United Church in Papua New Guinea; United Church of the Solomon Islands; Uniting Church in Australia; World Council of Churches.

References

Note: There are numerous anthropological studies of the indigenous people of Papua New Guinea, most of which concentrate observation on one of the many peoples who inhabit what is a very diverse land.

Alerts, Theo. Traditional Religion in Melanesia: Introduction. Port Moresby: University of Papua New Guinea Press, 1996.

Barth, Fredrik. Cosmologies in the Making: A Generative Approach to Cultural Variation in Inner New Guinea. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

- Jebens, Holger. Pathways to Heaven: Contesting Mainline and Fundamentalist Christianity in Papua New Guinea. New York: Berghahn Books, 2006.
- Kros, Peter. A Certain Foreign Cult Called Christianity: Do We Need It? Boroko, Papua New Guinea: Institute of Papua New Guinea Studies, 1975.
- Robbins, Joel. Becoming Sinners: Christianity and Moral Torment in a Papua New Guinea Society. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- Turner, Ann. Historical Dictionary of Papua New Guinea. Methuen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2001.
- Williams, R. G. The United Church in Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands: The Development of an Indigenous Church. Rabaul, Papua New Guinea: Trinity Press, 1972.

■ Paraguay

Paraguay is a landlocked South American country, about the size of California, and surrounded by Argentina, Bolivia, and Brazil. Its 406,752 square miles of territory is home to an estimated 6,163,913 people (2008), almost all of mixed Spanish and Amerindian heritage. East of the Paraguay River there are grassy plains, wooded hills, and tropical forests; west of the Paraguay River (the Chaco region) the terrain is low, flat, and marshy plain. The nation is divided administratively into 18 provinces, with the city of Asunción in the Central Province as its capital. The Greater Asunción Metro Area had a population of 1,659,500 in 2002.

Today, Paraguay is a nation of mestizos (about 95 percent), a result of the interbreeding of Amerindians with Spanish colonists and later immigrants from Argentina, Brazil, and Europe, mainly Swiss-Italians and Germans. Spanish and Guaraní are the national languages, with the latter being dominant: about 75 percent of Paraguayans speak Spanish (the language of business and government) and 90 percent speak Guaraní. Spanish is dominant in the capital city of Asunción and surrounding areas, while Guaraní is dominant in the interior. Also, German is still spoken among many Lutherans and Mennonites.

Paraguay is a developing country that ranked as the second poorest country in South America in 2007. Paraguay has a market economy marked by a large informal sector that features both re-export of imported consumer goods to neighboring countries, and thousands of small business enterprises. Paraguay's largest economic activity is based on agriculture, agribusiness, and cattle ranching.

Historically, Paraguay's economic potential has been constrained by its geography, but it does have access to the Atlantic Ocean via the Paraná River. Because it is landlocked, Paraguay's economy is very dependent on Brazil and Argentina, its major trade partners. Roughly 38 percent of Paraguay's GDP is derived from trade and exports to Brazil and Argentina. Paraguay, through various treaties, has been granted free ports in Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil through which its products are exported and imports are channeled.

Paraguay has a serious problem with poverty and inequality. According to government sources, approximately 2.1 million people (about 35 percent of its total population) are considered to be poor. In rural areas, 41 percent of the people lack an adequate monthly income to cover their basic necessities, whereas in urban areas the poverty level is estimated at 27.6 percent. The top 10 percent of the population earns 43.8 percent of the national income, while the lowest ten percent earns less than 1 percent. The current economic recession has worsened income inequality, notably in the rural areas.

Similarly, land concentration in the countryside is one of the highest worldwide: 10 percent of the population controls 66 percent of the land, while 30 percent of the rural people are landless peasants. This inequality has caused a great deal of social and political tension between the landless and the socio-economic elite who control the nation's business, industry, and government.

Religious affiliation in Paraguay today (2002 census) is dominated by the Roman Catholic Church (89.6 percent), with only a small representation of other religious groups: Protestants (6.2 percent), other religions (2.1 percent), none or undesignated (2.1 percent). However, by 2006, a new survey indicated that 84.7 percent of respondents considered themselves Catholic, a decrease of 5 percentage points from 2002.

Catholic cemetery with mausoleums in Asunción, Paraguay. (Imagebroker/StockphotoPro)

The Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and other laws and policies contributed to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors. The government generally respects religious freedom in practice; however, it occasionally has failed to enforce religious freedom laws when abuses have occurred.

From the 1870s to the present, Paraguay has experienced considerable social progress, mainly due to the arrival of waves of immigrants from neighboring Argentina, the Middle East, North America, and Europe. Some 40,000 new residents from Spain were mainly responsible for developing the livestock, agriculture, and forestry industries. The immigrants included about 5,000 Mennonites from Europe and North America who created agricultural colonies, schools, and small businesses.

Some of these early immigrants were members of Protestant congregations before their arrival in Paraguay: German Lutherans, German and French Calvinists, as well as German-Russian Mennonites during the early 20th century. During the 1930s and after World War II, Japanese Shinto and Buddhist immigrants arrived and settled in agricultural colonies near Asunción and Encarnación; by the 1980s, there were about 8,000 Japanese immigrants in these agricultural colonies. In the early 1970s, thousands of Brazilians began migrating to Paraguay, mainly because of the availability of cheap land; and, by the early 1990s, an estimated 300,000 to 350,000 Brazilians lived in the eastern border region.

Also during the 1970s, an estimated 30,000 to 50,000 immigrants (mainly Buddhists) from Korea, Hong Kong, and Taiwan began arriving in Paraguay. Many of these immigrant groups brought their own religious traditions with them, thereby enriching the religious diversity of Paraguay.

Before the arrival of Europeans, three Aboriginal peoples dominated the Paraguay River valley, which divides the territory into two regions. Upriver, the Guaraní were a settled agricultural people. Downriver, in what is termed the Chaco region, the more nomadic Guaycurús and Payaguás were hunters, gatherers, and fishers. Three other Amerindian groups, united by language, were differentiated into more than 100 subgroups.

The Spanish entered the region by following the tributaries of the large Río de la Plata, looking for mineral resources. Spanish conquistador Juan de Salazar (1508–1560) and his company of soldiers and colonists founded Fort Asunción in 1537 as part of a campaign to colonize and subdue an estimated 200,000 Amerindians, principally the Tupi-Guaraní. That fort would grow into the present-day capital of Paraguay, Asunción.

The purpose of the pacification of the Amerindians was to provide the Spanish colonists with a source of cheap labor for agricultural and commercial development. Within 20 years of its founding, Asunción boasted a Spanish population of 1,500, a Roman Catholic cathedral, a textile mill, and the beginning of the livestock industry. For more than two centuries, Asunción was a principal center of Spanish power in the Río de la Plata basin, and from Asunción the conquistadors launched expeditions to dominate and colonize the surrounding territories.

The early Spanish colonists failed to recognize the relative agricultural value of the region, and as a result the Amerindians suffered somewhat less than in other countries under Spanish control, at least in the beginning. However, in the late 18th century, many Amerindians were forced to become laborers on the developing cattle ranches and plantations. In 1811, the Spanish governor in Asunción was forced out when the region's planters demanded a free trade policy for their tea and tobacco. Officials of the new republican government established a relatively isolated position in an attempt to escape the chaos they saw in the surrounding Southern Cone countries.

In 1811, Paraguay declared its independence from Spain and from the newly independent government in Buenos Aires. However, the country's first president, Dr. José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia (1766–1840), established a cruel dictatorship that lasted from 1811 to 1840. Many Spaniards who were the owners of the best lands and businesses were jailed, murdered, or exiled, along with others who criticized his rule. Nevertheless, during this period, the nation prospered due to the hard work of its people and improved methods of agricultural and livestock production.

When Rodríguez de Francia died in 1840, the nation experienced six months of disorder until Carlos Antonio López (1792–1862) came to power and ruled despotically from 1841 to 1862. Carlos Antonio López died in 1862 and was followed in power by his 35-year-old son, Francisco Solano López (1826–1870), who ruled until 1870. The second López was responsible for plunging his weak nation into a savage and bloody war with the combined military forces of Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. In the disastrous War of the Triple Alliance (1865–1870), about two-thirds of Paraguay's adult males were killed and much of its territory (99 square miles) was lost to the victors. The country was politically and economically crippled for the next half century.

The country's isolationist policy worked for about two generations (1811–1865) but Paraguay had been involved for years in boundary and tariff disputes with its more powerful neighbors, Argentina and Brazil. The people of Uruguay also had struggled to achieve and maintain their independence from those same powers, especially from Argentina. In 1864, the government of Brazil helped the leader of Uruguay's Colorado Party oust his major opponent, whereupon the military dictator of Paraguay, Francisco Solano López, declared war on Brazil, believing that the regional balance of power was threatened. Paraguay's army numbered about 50,000 men, which was the strongest military force in Latin America at that time. López's action was viewed by many as aggression for self- and national aggrandizement but, as the war wore on, many viewed this as a war of conquest by Argentina. At that time, Paraguay's population was only about 450,000.

In response to López's declaration of war, the governments of Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay created a political and military alliance, backed by England, against Paraguay that led to the bloodiest conflict in Latin American history to date. The five-year War of the Triple Alliance (1865–1870) led to the deaths of 60 to 80 percent of the Guaraní people, and Paraguay lost almost half of its national territory. All the males who survived were sold into slavery. Those Amerindian groups in the more remote areas suffered fewer ill effects from the war, but to this day women greatly outnumber men in the entire country. As a result, family instability has contributed to the country's lack of stability overall.

The Colorado Party (officially, the National Republican Association [ARN]), nationalistic and ultra-conservative, was founded in 1887 by General Bernardino Caballero Melgarejo (1839–1912), a descendant of Spanish nobility who fought in the War of the Triple Alliance and served as president of Paraguay from 1881 to 1886. He was the virtual ruler of the country from 1887 until 1904. After Caballero rigged the 1886 election to ensure the victory of his chosen candidate—Patricio Escobar—some of the general's political opponents founded the Paraguayan Liberal Party (PLP). In response to this challenge, Caballero and his supporters proceeded to found the Colorado Party as a counter measure. Out of office, General Caballero maintained a large degree of political control as commander of the army. Since then, the Colorados and the Liberals have been competing for dominance of the country.

The PLP dominated the government from 1904 until 1936 (and again briefly during 1939 and 1940). In 1936, the PLP lost power largely due to the disastrous results of the Chaco War (1932–1935), which was fought to control the Chaco region's national resources; Paraguay defeated Bolivia at great cost. There were an estimated 100,000 casualties, of which more died from diseases (such as malaria and other infections) than from the actual fighting; about 57,000 of the total casualties were Bolivian. At the same time, the war brought both countries to the brink of economic disaster.

Since then, the Liberal Party has never recovered dominance, and the Colorado Party held power by means of military dictatorships until 1989, most notably the regime of General Alfredo Stroessner Mattiauda (1912–2006). By the end of the Stroessner regime (1954–1989), the Liberal Party no longer existed but its political successor, the Authentic Radical Liberal Party (PLRA), currently is the second largest political party in the country.

From 1947 until 1962, the Colorado Party ruled Paraguay as a one-party state; all other political parties were declared illegal. Finally, after 61 years in power, it was defeated in national elections held in April 2008. The Colorado Party lost the presidential elections to an opposition candidate from the center-left, Fernando Lugo Méndez (a former Roman Catholic bishop). This was a first on two accounts: the free election of an opposition candidate and of a Catholic bishop to the office of president of Paraguay.

The decades of poverty and instability led the way to the emergence in 1954 of General Alfredo Stroessner Matiauda (1912–2006), a Paraguayan military officer who created a corrupt and brutal regime (1954–1989), the second longest dictatorship of the 20th century, surpassed only by that of Fidel Castro, who ruled Cuba from 1959 to 2008. Between 1960 and 1980, an estimated one million Paraguayans migrated to Argentina to find work and to improve their lives. Stroessner himself was overthrown in a coup led by General Andrés Rodríguez Pedotti (1923–1997) in 1989, which resulted in an opening for democracy.

Some observers maintain that opposition from the Catholic bishops is the only reason that General Stroessner did not have absolute control over the country. After the destruction of Asunción University in 1972 by the police, Archbishop of Asunción Ismael Rolón Silvero excommunicated the minister of the interior and the chief of police, and prohibited the celebration of the Mass as a sign of protest against the brutal Stroessner regime. When Pope John Paul II visited Paraguay in 1988, his presence and message bolstered what was already a robust anti-Stroessner movement within the country.

The most serious charges against the Stroessner dictatorship concern Operation Condor, an official, organized, and secret campaign of political repression against alleged leftist dissidents conducted during 1975 and 1976 jointly by the governments of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay, with the collaboration of the American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). In 1992, archives of the operation were uncovered that contained information about the secret incarceration of an estimated 400,000 alleged subversives, of which about 50,000 were murdered and more than 30,000 were “disappeared” (called los desaparecidos), meaning that their whereabouts are unknown and they are presumed dead. These murders, assassinations, and disappearances carried out by national security agencies of the respective countries were categorized as “extra-judicial executions” by international human rights organizations.

General Rodríguez, once closely linked to Stroessner, launched a coup against the dictator in 1989. During his term as president (r. 1989–1993), Rodríguez abolished the death penalty, ended martial law, and tried, convicted, and imprisoned some of the leading members of the Stroessner regime. Also during his presidency, in 1992, the Paraguayan legislature approved a new Constitution that prohibited re-elections for executive positions, which required Rodríguez to relinquish power and hand over the presidency to civilian rule. Wasmosy, who was endorsed by Rodríguez as his successor in the 1993 elections, won with approximately 40 percent of the vote in what is generally acknowledged to be the first honest election in the country’s republican history. However, Wasmosy became very unpopular when he failed to continue the limited reforms implemented by Rodríguez. In 2002, after leaving office, Wasmosy was convicted for fraud and embezzlement ($40 million) and was sentenced to four years in prison; however, he appealed his sentence, paid a bond of $830,000, and was placed on parole.

In 1998, Raúl Cubas Grau (b. 1943) won the election; and his main campaign pledge was to free Oviedo. In 1999, Cubas’s vice president, Luis María Argaña, who had been named as Cubas’s running mate but who opposed him on some key political issues, was brutally murdered. Cubas was immediately implicated in the plot, and his resignation demanded. Cubas’s political support virtually evaporated and Congress voted overwhelmingly to impeach him. Faced with certain conviction and removal from office, Cubas resigned immediately and fled to Brazil. Cubas was replaced by the president of the Senate, Luis Ángel González Macchi, who completed Cubas’s term in office (1999–2003). Cubas returned to Paraguay in 2002 and was immediately arrested and tried for corruption and conspiracy to murder Argaña, but he was later cleared of all charges.

The nation’s current president is Fernando Arminio Lugo Méndez, formerly the Roman Catholic bishop of the Diocese of San Pedro, which has the nation’s highest poverty rate. Lugo resigned as bishop in 2005 after he had requested laicization (removal of the right to exercise the functions of the priestly office) in order to run for public office. However, the Holy See refused the request on the grounds that bishops could not undergo laicization, and also denied him the requested canonical permission to run for civil elected office. Subsequently, he resigned from the priesthood after announcing his candidacy for the nation’s presidency.

Lugo entered the national political arena by backing the peasants’ claims for improving land distribution. In October 2007, Lugo registered as a member of the Christian Democratic Party (PDC) in order to become qualified to run for office. In April 2008, he won the presidential election by a margin of 10 percentage points, although far short of a majority. Lugo’s swearing-in ceremony marked the first time since Paraguayan independence in 1811 that a ruling party had peacefully surrendered power to an elected member of the opposition.

Roman Catholic Church Iberian Roman Catholicism entered Paraguay with the Spanish conquistadors, and a papal decree created the Bishopric of Our Lady of Asunción in 1547, 11 years after the foundation of Asunción by Juan de Ayolas in 1536. The first bishop was Father Pedro de La Torre (d. 1573), a Franciscan, who arrived at Asunción in 1555 during the second administration of Martínez de Irala. The diocese was directly dependent upon the Holy See in Rome, and its jurisdiction extended over the whole Río de la Plata territory, which was divided into 102 parishes, 6 of which were located in the capital. The present Cathedral of Asunción was formally dedicated on October 27, 1845.

PARAGUAY

Most important for the development of the Catholic Church, after 1588 Jesuit and Franciscan priests began evangelizing among the Guaraní and other Amerindian groups along various rivers, including areas now part of surrounding nations, with the intent of pacifying and converting them. They developed a system of communal towns that closely paralleled the agricultural society that had previously developed among the Guaraní. They also developed a written form of the Guaraní language.

The Jesuits soon realized they had to protect the Amerindians from enslavement by Spanish and Portuguese colonists if they were going to convert them to the Catholic faith. From 1609 to 1767, the Jesuits established and maintained missions among the Guaraní and other tribes in the upper Rio de la Plata region, where the Natives were settled in a system of communal towns, called Reductions (reducciones), under Jesuit administration.

The Treaty of Madrid in 1750 transferred the territory occupied by the Jesuit-Guaraní missions from the jurisdiction of Spain to Portugal. Although Spain, at least officially, no longer permitted slavery, this inhumane practice was legal in the Portuguese territories. Shortly thereafter, the Spanish rulers ordered the Jesuit missions to be disbanded, and Pope Clement XIV (r. 1769–1774) suppressed the Jesuits, forcing the missionaries to abandon their work in approximately 100 Reductions in the Americas, including those in Paraguay. However, in 1754, the Guaraní Indians and a few dissident Jesuits refused to abide by the order to disband the missions and created a short-lived rebellion that was cruelly put down by the Spanish authorities.

The work of the Jesuits came into conflict with the growing desire of wealthy Spanish landowners to control Paraguay and this contributed to the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767 by Spain's King Charles III (r. 1759–1788). Many of the Paraguayan Indians were captured and sold into slavery, where they were gradually absorbed into mestizo society; however, those who escaped usually returned to their indigenous way of life in remote areas. After 1767, the spiritual administration of the Jesuit Reductions was transferred to the Franciscans and other religious orders, while the public administration was given to Spanish and Portuguese civil officials.

The church suffered greatly through the 19th century. It lost half its members in the War of the Triple Alliance (1865–1870) and never had enough priests. Catholicism still dominates throughout the land, but the church remains relatively poor, and the folk Catholicism that has arisen in various parts of South America, mixing Catholic faith with traditional animistic religions, is widespread in Paraguay.

For much of the 19th century, church-state relations ranged from indifferent to hostile. The state assumed the prerogatives of royal patronage that the Vatican had granted to the Spanish rulers and sought to control both the bishops and the clergy. President José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia (r. 1814–1840) was committed to a secular state; he was frugal and cruel beyond description; he hated all foreigners and was fearful of all foreign entanglements; and he was violently anticlerical. He suppressed monastic orders, eliminated the tithe, instituted civil marriage, and cut off communication with the Vatican. President Francisco Solano López (r. 1862–1870) used the church as if it were a branch of the government; he enlisted priests as secret agents to report on signs of disaffection and subversion among the populace.

Church-state relations worsened after the government executed the bishop of Asunción, Manuel Antonio Palacio, during the War of the Triple Alliance. When the war ended, there were only 55 priests left in the whole country, and the church was without a bishop for 11 years.

The modern Paraguayan Catholic Church was established largely under the direction of Monsignor Juan Sinfórano Bogarón, the archbishop of Asunción (r. 1930–1949), and his successor, Monsignor Aníbal Mena Porta (r. 1949–1969). Both envisioned a church whose role in Paraguay's political struggles was that of a neutral mediator among the various contenders for power. Monsignor Ismael Blas Roldán Silvero followed Porta as archbishop (r. 1970–1989) and was followed by Monsignor Felipe Santiago Benítez Avalos (r. 1989–2002). Contemporary archbishops have stressed the importance of respecting human rights, strengthening democracy, and encouraging political dialogue among all social sectors.

Beginning in the late 1950s, the bishops and priests were frequently at odds with the national government. Confrontations began with individual priests who preached sermons calling for political freedom and social justice. The political and human rights activities of the clergy and various lay groups, such as Catholic Action, pushed the church hierarchy to make increasingly critical statements about the regime of President Stroessner (beginning 1954), who was finally overthrown by a military coup in 1989.

Bible scholar José Luis Caravias has worked with the Christian Agrarian Leagues since the 1960s; he was the principal editor of Vivir como Hermanos (Live as Brothers), published in 1971, which is one of the most important documents produced in Paraguay by proponents of Liberation Theology, a socially and politically progressive Latin American Catholic movement.

Diverse tensions arose within the Paraguayan Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church's post-Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Paraguayan society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the right-wing military dictatorships and creating a Socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, church authorities criticized the lack of political freedom in Paraguay and the government's dismal human rights record, and there were sporadic student demonstrations against the government and its repressive countermeasures. The government expelled foreign-born clergy and periodically closed the Catholic University of Our Lady of Asunción, the Catholic news magazine, and the Catholic radio station. In response, the archbishop of Asunción excommunicated several prominent government officials and refused, along with other clergy, to participate in major civic and religious celebrations.

In the early 1990s, the Catholic Bishops Conference of Paraguay, in a pronouncement entitled “One Constitution for our Nation” signed by 14 bishops, stated: “If at other times this nation completely identified itself with the Catholic religion, it was logical to talk about an official religion. Now pluralism better characterizes the civil society and it does not seem justified to have one Church joined to the State that, for this reason, reflects something imposed by force upon the people. The [Catholic] Church does not want to confuse the people or to confuse itself with the State.”

In this way, the Catholic Church of Paraguay gave its unconditional support to establish a new era of religious liberty in the nation, which began with congressional approval of a new Constitution in February 1993.

Roman Catholicism still dominates the nation. About 5.3 million Paraguayans were Catholics in 2002 (or about 89.6 percent of the national population). The traditional animistic religions of the Paraguayan Amerindians have survived, although mixed with an overlay of Roman Catholicism during colonial times. This has created a Paraguayan “popular Catholicism” (syncretistic) among Amerindians and the Hispanic population. For many Paraguayans, affiliation with the Roman Catholic Church is more of a social obligation than a moral and spiritual commitment, with less than 20 percent of Catholics regularly attending Mass.

However, one of the main events in the Catholic calendar is the annual pilgrimage to the colonial city Caacupé (founded in 1770), the capital of the Province of Cordillera, in the southwestern region. There a major religious festival is held on December 8 in honor of the statuette of Our Lady of the Miracles. This statuette, carved in the 16th century by a devout convert, is believed to have curative powers (syncretism). An enormous basilica stands in the center of town, where an estimated 300,000 people gather annually for the festival.

In 2001, the Archdiocese of Asunción had only 774,000 Catholic adherents out of the city's total population of 1,602,173, or about 48 percent. However, the lowest percentage of Catholic adherents was registered in the Apostolic Vicariate of Polcomayo, with only 45.7 percent of the total population of 75,000 inhabitants. In the rest of the nation's dioceses, the Catholic population ranged in the 80 and 90 percentiles in 2001. Religious nominalism seems to be the dominant characteristic of Paraguayan Catholicism today.

In 2004, the Paraguayan Catholic Church reported one archdiocese (Asunción, established in 1929) and 13 dioceses with 358 parishes that were served by 355 secular priests and 428 religious priests (total of 783), assisted by 120 permanent deacons, 745 male religious and 2,132 female religious workers. The archbishop is Eustaquio Pastor Cuquejo Verga, C.Ss.R. (Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer), appointed in 2002.

The Protestant Movement The first Protestant work began in Paraguay in the mid-19th century with the arrival of agents of the American Bible Society (1856), followed by missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church (1886), the Church of England (1886), and the German Lutherans (1893, Evangelical Church of the Plata River). It was a North American Methodist who became the first resident missionary in Paraguay in 1886. Two years later, the Church of England arrived when the South American Missionary Society (SAMS) shifted its focus from the indigenous Patagonians of southern Argentina to the Chaco region of Paraguay. Among the Society's accomplishments were the development of a written language for the Lengua people and the production of a Lengua Bible.

During the early 20th century, dozens of other Protestant groups appeared among the growing immigrant population or as the result of missionary endeavors from Europe and North America, and a variety of Pentecostal and other non-Pentecostal groups have been founded in more recent times, especially during the 1950s and 1960s.

Notable among the groups to establish work in Paraguay after 1900 were the U.S.-based Seventh-day Adventist Church (1900), which was the first to arrive, followed by the New Testament Missionary Fellowship (1902), the Inland South American Missionary Society (1902), Christian Missions in Many Lands (1909), Christian Brethren, and the Salvation Army (1910), with most of the later groups from Great Britain.

In 1917, the United Christian Missionary Society (Christian Church [Disciples of Christ]) arrived and eventually took over the Methodist work. In 1919, the Argentine Baptist Convention began work in Paraguay, and they later appealed to the Southern Baptist Convention for assistance (1945).

In 1927, the first Mennonite colony was established among Russian immigrants, which led to the involvement of the Mennonite Central Committee in 1930. The New Testament Missionary Union arrived in 1931, followed by the Mennonite Brethren Church of America in 1935 that began work among the Lengua Amerindians. The Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod sent their first missionaries in 1938 to work among German immigrants.

The arrival of the first Pentecostal missions among European immigrants in 1938 (the Filadelfia Church of Stockholm and the Swedish Free Mission) led to the introduction of Argentine Assemblies of God in 1943 and the U.S. Assemblies of God in 1945, who came to assist their Russian colleagues. Since then, Pentecostalism has grown very well in Paraguay, and a number of autochthonous Pentecostal churches have arisen in recent years.

The impact of World War II was a further catalyst for the development of religion in Paraguay. The Society of Brothers (now the Church Communities International), a German communal group modeled on the Hutterites, escaped Germany and settled in Paraguay in 1941. They were joined by Russian and Ukrainian immigrants who also found their way to Paraguay during the early 1940s. Paraguay became a magnet for Mennonites, the first being refugees from the newly established Soviet Union. After getting settled, they began missionary work among the people of the Chaco region and appealed for assistance from North American Mennonites. As a result an extensive work was developed among a group of agricultural colonies that eventually became the Evangelical Mennonite Church in Paraguay.

A few other denominations also arrived during the 1940s: Full Gospel Grace Fellowship (1940), the Free Methodist Church of North America (1948–1952), the fundamentalist New Tribes Mission (1946), General Conference Mennonite Church (1952), Evangelical Lu-

Paraguay

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,434,000	6,164,000	95.4	1.96	7,588,000	9,242,000
Roman Catholics	2,305,000	5,613,000	86.9	2.18	6,590,000	7,644,000
Independents	8,400	330,000	5.1	3.21	535,000	780,000
Protestants	41,600	240,000	3.7	2.87	440,000	710,000
Ethnoreligionists	32,200	125,000	1.9	2.03	150,000	180,000
Agnostics	9,800	120,000	1.9	4.00	200,000	300,000
Buddhists	2,000	16,300	0.3	1.99	30,000	50,000
Atheists	3,000	14,600	0.2	1.99	24,000	35,000
Baha'is	2,100	13,500	0.2	2.11	25,000	45,000
New religionists	200	3,900	0.1	1.99	6,000	12,000
Jews	1,200	3,200	0.0	2.00	3,500	4,000
Total population	2,484,000	6,460,000	100.0	1.99	8,026,000	9,868,000

theran Church (1949), the Mennonite Mission Network (1952), the Church of God World Missions (1954, from Cleveland, Tennessee), and the Evangelical Mennonite Conference (1957, from Canada).

Historically, only 5 Protestant missions and service agencies arrived prior to 1900; 12 more arrived between 1900 and 1939; 20 additional groups arrived between 1940 and 1979; and since 1980, at least 30 new groups have begun work in Paraguay.

Prior to the 1950s, the total Protestant population in Paraguay was less than 10,000, but by 2002 had grown to 364,839, or 6.2 percent of the total population (2002 census). The largest Protestant denominations in Paraguay were the Evangelical Baptist Convention (10,500 adherents; Southern Baptist-related); the Assemblies of God (U.S.-related) and the Assemblies of God Evangelical Mission (independent) with a combined total of 9,879 adherents; the Evangelical Church of the Plata River (Lutheran, with 8,850 adherents); all Mennonites (8,850 adherents); the Seventh-day Adventist Church (7,800 adherents); Anglicans (members of the Anglican Church of the Southern Cone of America, about 1,900 adherents); and the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1,550 adherents). Also, there are 24 Mennonite denominations and service organizations that represent an estimated community of 70,000 (all ages), most of whom are found among the 17 agricultural colonies that are scattered across the northern and eastern regions of Paraguay.

There are no churches based in Paraguay that are members of the World Council of Churches. Conservative evangelical churches cooperate with the Asociación de Pastores del Paraguay, which in turn is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Additional Groups An estimated 2.1 percent of the population represented adherents of other religious groups in 2002. One of these was the Ukrainian Orthodox Church with about 500 adherents and another 975 Orthodox believers (unspecified) were reported in 2002 (census). Also present are the following non-Protestant marginal Christian groups: the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons, 9,374 adherents in 2002), Jehovah's Witnesses (11,805 adherents in 2002), the independent quasi-Pentecostal People of God Church (with about 12,000 adherents in 2002, although church officials claim 150,000 adherents), the God Is Love Pentecostal Church (1,300 adherents), the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (700 adherents), and the Voice of the Chief Cornerstone, among others.

Non-Christian Religions A variety of non-Christian religions have appeared, many since 1940, especially among immigrants from the Middle East (Judaism, Islam, and Baha'i) and Asia (Hindu, Buddhist, and Shinto sects). Animistic Amerindian religions continue to exist, especially in the western region of the Chaco, with an estimated 25,000 adherents in 2002 (census).

By 1912 enough Jews had migrated to Paraguay, primarily from Germany, to justify the organization of the initial Jewish community. Today, there are an estimated 1,100 Jews in Paraguay, whose primary structure is the Consejo Representativo Israelita del Paraguay, headquartered in Asunción. The capital city has three Orthodox Jewish synagogues: one Ashkenazi, one Sephardi, and one Chabad (Lubavitcher).

There is a small Muslim community in Paraguay (872 adherents in 2002), mainly in the provinces of Asunción and Alto Paraná, as a result of Middle Eastern immigration from Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine. The Subud Association is also present. The Baha'i Faith established its first local spiritual assembly in Asunción in 1944. It has spread among the Yanaigua, Chulupi, and Maka indigenous peoples.

Immigrants from Korea and Japan introduced Buddhism (about 2,000 adherents in 2002) and Japanese religions, including Seicho-No-Ie, Shinto, Soka Gakkai International, Reiyukai America, Nichiren Shoshu, Tenrikyo, and the Foguangshan Buddhist Order.

Hinduism is represented by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), the Transcendental Meditation (TM) movement (now organized as the Global Country of World Peace), and the Sathya Sai Baba movement.

Also present in Paraguay are religious movements representing the Western Esoteric tradition: Rosicrucians, the Grand Universal Fraternity (GFU; from Venezuela), the Center of Gnostic Studies of Anthropology and Sciences, New Acropolis Cultural Centers, and the Cafh Foundation; the Afro-Brazilian religions of Condomblé and Umbanda; and the Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age traditions: the Basilio Scientific School, Kardec Spiritualist Centers (Spiritism), the Paraguayan Center of Spiritualist Philosophy, and the Unification Church of Reverend Sun Myung Moon, among others. In 2000, officials of the Unification Church purchased 300,000 hectares of land in Paraguay for logging and timber exportation to Asia. The acquired land is the ancestral territory of the indigenous Chamacoco (Ishir) people, who live in the northern region of the country.

The population with no religion or no declared religious affiliation (includes atheists and agnostics) was 2.1 percent in 2002 (about 81,500 persons).

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Agnosticism; Anglican Province of the Southern Cone of America; Assemblies of God; Atheism; Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church Communities International; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Evangelical Church of the River Platte; Franciscans; Free Methodist Church of North America; Global Country of World Peace; Hutterites; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Jesuits; Lubavitch Hassidism; Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod; Lutheranism; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mennonite Church, USA; Mennonites; New Acropolis; Nichiren Shoshu; Paraguay, Mennonites in; Orthodox Judaism; People of God; Reiyukai; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Sathya Sai Baba Movement; Seicho-No-Ie; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shinto; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Spiritism; Subud; Tenrikyo; Ukraine Eastern Orthodoxy in; Umbanda; Unification Movement; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Browning, W. E. The River Plate Republics: A Survey of the Religious, Economic and Social Conditions in Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay. London: World Dominion Press, 1928.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/scpy1.html>.
- Herring, Hubert. A History of Latin America from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Huonder, Anthony. "Reductions of Paraguay." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 12. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1911. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/12688b.htm>.
- Introvigne, Massimo. "Controversial Pentecostalism: Paraguay's People of God." Center for Studies on

- New Religions (CESNUR). http://www.cesnur.org/2004/mi_pueblo.htm.
- Jaenike, William H. Black Robes in Paraguay: The Success of the Guarani Missions Hastened the Abolition of the Jesuits. Minneapolis, MN: Kirk House Publishers, 2008.
- Jetter de Walker, Luisa. Siembra y Cosecha: Reseña histórico de las Asambleas de Dios en Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay, Perú y Uruguay. Vol. 2. Deerfield, FL: Editorial Vida, 1992.
- Moreno-Lacalle, Julian. "Paraguay." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 11. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1911. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/11470b.htm>.
- Plett, R. El protestantismo en el Paraguay: su aporte cultural económico y espiritual. Asunción, Paraguay: Instituto Bíblico Asunción, 1987.
- PROLADES-RITA (Religion-In-The-Americas) database on "Religion in Paraguay." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/par/par-rd.htm>.
- PROLADES-RITA (Religion-In-The-Americas) website. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Paraguay." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/par/par-chron.pdf>.
- Stoesz, Edgar. Like a Mustard Seed: Mennonites in Paraguay. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 2008.
- U.S. Department of Commerce. International Religious Freedom Report 2008. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108535.htm>.
- U.S. Department of State, Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs. Background Note: Paraguay (August 2009). <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/1841.htm>.

Paraguay, Mennonites in

The Mennonite community of Paraguay is both one of the largest Mennonite communities outside of North America in the world and one of the largest non-Catholic communities in Paraguay. The movement of Mennonites to Paraguay began in 1926, when the first group arrived from Manitoba, Canada. However, what was to become the numerically stronger group, Russian Mennonites who had fled to Germany in 1929, arrived in Paraguay in 1930. They were able to settle in the country after the provisions of a special law passed for the Canadian group were applied to them as well. They established an initial settlement in western Paraguay called Colony Fernheim. In 1937 a second colony, named Friesland, was established in eastern Paraguay. An additional group of Russian Mennonites arrived after World War II.

The Russian settlers brought with them some of the divisions that had splintered the Mennonite community in their previous homeland. Some were affiliated with the Mennonite Brethren, a group that dated from a Pietist revival that had swept through the community in the 1860s. Other groups had been influenced by the attempts of Baptists from Germany to convert the Mennonites, leading to a difference of opinion on baptism. Although few became Baptists, some Mennonites accepted the idea that baptism should be by immersion, as Baptists taught, while most Mennonites continued to baptize by pouring. Once in Paraguay, language differences would also appear as some continued to use German, others adopted Spanish, and still others chose to use one of the Native languages (primarily Guaraní, which is spoken by more Paraguayans than Spanish, or Lengua).

All of the colonies established by both the Canadian and Russian groups were agricultural settlements, which prospered with little modern farming equipment. The colonies also attempted to rebuild the movement's social, cultural, and religious life (which operated as a German-speaking enclave in Russia), and Sunday schools, Bible study programs, and efforts to evangelize the Native peoples were launched. Although the very conservative Canadian groups have remained somewhat aloof, those groups originating in Russia have continued to work together while maintaining separate ecclesiastical organizations.

Of the several groups, the Mennonite Brethren (Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden von Paragua, or Hermanos Menonitas) is possibly the largest, with some 8,000 people affiliated. Some 4,600 are associated with the Convención de las Iglesias Evangélicas Unidas, which has adopted Lengua as its primary language. Some 3,000 people worship with the Convención Evangélica de Iglesias Paraguayas Hermanos Menonitas, who use Spanish and Guaraní. The remainder of the approximately 28,000 Mennonites (2008) in Paraguay is divided among more than a dozen smaller groups.

Mennonite Brethren
c/o Gerhard Ratzlaff
Casilla de Correo 1154
Asunción
Paraguay

Convención de las Iglesias Evangélicas Unidas
c/o Oficina ASCIM
Filadelfia, c.d.c. 984
Asunción
Paraguay

Convención Evangélica de Iglesias Paraguayas
Hermanos Menonitas
Juan Diaz de Solis 2150
C.C. 1154
Asunción
Paraguay

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mennonites.

References

- Dyck, Cornelius J. An Introduction to Mennonite History: A Popular History of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1967.
- Fretz, J. W. Pilgrims in Paraguay. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1953.
- Klassen, Peter P. Die Mennoniten in Paraguay: Reich Gottes und Reich dieser Welt. Bolanden Weierhof, Germany: Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, 1988.

Parham, Charles Fox

1873–1929

Charles Fox Parham, a Methodist local preacher and founder of a Bible school, is the founder of modern Pentecostalism. With his students, he developed the unique Pentecostal notion that speaking in tongues was the visible sign of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, which he tied to a belief that the gifts of the Holy Spirit were meant to operate in the contemporary Christian church.

Parham was born in Muscatine, Iowa, on June 4, 1873. He grew up as a Methodist in Kansas and became a Sunday school teacher. As a young man he was licensed to preach by the Methodist Episcopal Church (now an integral part of the United Methodist Church). After preaching for several years, he left the Methodists in 1894, and began life as an independent non-denominational Holiness evangelist. In 1896, with his wife Sarah Thistlewaite, he opened Bethel, a healing home, in Topeka, Kansas. He eventually lost control of his home, and in 1900 moved across town and opened a new Bethel, where students could reside and learn from his evangelistic experience.

In December 1900, on the eve of an evangelistic trip, he gave the Bethel students a new assignment. They were to study the New Testament for any references to the baptism of the Holy Spirit and anything associated with it. Methodist Holiness people generally associated the baptism of the Holy Spirit with the experience of sanctification, an act of grace that God worked on believers that made them perfect in love.

Upon Parham's return just as the year was ending, the students reviewed their findings. They had concluded that speaking in tongues seemed to be the sign of baptism with the Holy Spirit. Thus on New Year's Eve, the group gathered in Bethel's chapel and began to pray for the baptism. In the morning hours of January 1, 1900, one of the students, Agnes Oznam (1870–1937), became the first person in modern times to pray intentionally for the baptism and the accompanying speaking in tongues and to receive a positive answer to her prayer. The resultant uniting of the baptism of the Spirit with the accompanying phenomenon of speaking in tongues would become the distinguishing feature of a new movement among the Holiness people—Pentecostalism. As he remained an advocate of the Holiness movement, Parham presented the baptism of the Holy Spirit as a new work of grace available to those believers who had already experienced sanctification, the normative Holiness experience.

Parham initially presented this new teaching to Holiness revival meetings in Kansas and nearby states. Having raised the controversial issue, within a few years he relocated to Houston, Texas, where he opened another Bible school. While in Houston, he was, in 1905, approached by an African American preacher William J. Seymour (1870–1922), formerly with the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), who asked permission to sit in on the classes. In the segregated south of the period, such would not be allowed, but Parham did give Seymour permission to sit just outside the classroom door and listen.

Some months later, early in 1906, Parham assisted Seymour's move to Los Angeles. He had been invited to become pastor of a small African American Baptist church. Almost immediately, Seymour tried to introduce the new teaching to his congregation. In response, he was locked out of the church, but not before he had gained the attention of a few. With the several who wished to hear, he continued to preach and on April 9, 1906, the first member of the group spoke in tongues. The growing group soon moved to a building in Azusa Street where the revival services would continue for the next three years. Seymour adopted Parham's name for the organization that oversaw and facilitated the revival services, Apostolic Faith.

With some desire to see what was happening, Parham came to Los Angeles. He rejected the spontaneous excitement of people speaking in tongues mixed with the general informal ways of African American worship. Parham split from Seymour and condemned Azusa and spiritualism and hypnotism. However, while the revival continued, Parham developed a more serious problem. He was arrested for approaching two boys for sexual favors, and though the charges were later dropped and those close to him claimed them to be without foundation, the rumors cost him and the movement in the Midwest dearly. The mainstream of the rapidly growing movement was alienated from him.

Parham eventually settled in Baxter Springs, Kansas, and spent his time teaching in a small Bible school and traveling to nearby communities and preaching. A set of congregations grew out of his ministry and associated together as the Apostolic Faith. Parham died on January 29, 1929, all but forgotten by the movement he initiated. Subsequently, his wife defended him in her biography of him. In recent decades, mainstream Pentecostal historians have developed a new appreciation for him and his role at the beginning of their movement.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Holiness Movement; Pentecostalism; Seymour, William J.

References

- Goff, James. Fields White Unto Harvest: Charles Fox Parham and the Missionary Origins of Pentecostalism. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1988.
- Parham, Charles F. The Everlasting Gospel. Baxter Springs, KS: Charles F. Parham, 1911.
- Parham, Charles F. A Voice Crying in the Wilderness. 1944; rpt.: N.p.: Charles F. Parham, 1902.
- Parham, Robert L., ed. Selected Sermons of the Late Charles F. Parham and Sarah E. Parham, Co-Founders of the Original Apostolic Faith Movement. Baxter Springs, KS: Robert Parham, 1941.
- Parham, Sarah. The Life of Charles Fox Parham. Baxter Springs, KS: Sarah Parham and Tri-State Printing, 1930.

Paris Mission

The Paris Mission, officially the Société des Missions Evangéliques chez les peuples non-chrétiens à Paris, was the missionary arm of French Protestantism through much of the 19th and 20th centuries. It began with a number of prayer groups that had been established among Protestants (primarily members of the Reformed Church of France) in support of the Basel Mission and the London Missionary Society, both products of the Pietism and the evangelical Awakening that had spread through European Protestantism in the late 18th century. As one component, that Awakening had spurred an interest in world missions, and as it was perpetuated would turn the Protestant movement into a worldwide phenomenon in the 19th. The Paris Mission was formally organized in 1822 and soon established branches in Holland, Italy, and French-speaking Switzerland. The Mission originally assumed an interdenominational stance, but in fact was largely supported by members of the Reformed churches.

The first missionaries supported by the Mission were sent to South Africa in 1829. From that original base, work expanded into Lesotho and Zambia. Through the remainder of the century, the Mission grew primarily by assuming control of older missions established in what had become French territories. Various Congregational and Presbyterians missions turned work over to the Paris Mission in order to quiet the fears and prejudices of French colonial authorities directed to non-Catholic foreigners working among new French subjects. By this manner, the Paris Mission acquired work in Tahiti (and other South Pacific islands) and in Africa (Madagascar, Gabon, Togo, and Cameroon).

Through the decades following World War II, the Paris Mission oversaw the maturing of most of its missions into independent churches. The end of this phase of its work contributed to its voting itself out of existence in 1971 and contributing its resources to two new organizations, the Département Français d'Action Apostolique, a common mission board serving several French Protestant denominations, and the Communauté Evangélique d'Action Apostolique, an international communion of 47 churches working in French-speaking lands. Both organizations are based in Paris.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church of France.

Reference

Leonard, Jeanne-Marie. Mémoires d'évangile: les archives de la Société des missions évangéliques de Paris, 1822–1949. Paris, Défap, 2000.

Paryushana

Paryushana is a primary festival among the Jains of India. Its origin lies in the beginning of Jainism itself, which emerged as an order of monks. Practicing a form of nonattachment, the monks traveled about living from day to day on what was offered them. India has a rainy season (roughly June to September) in which travel is difficult, and it became common for monks to settle down in one place, usually at the edge of a city for the several months (a minimum of 70 days).

In the old Indian lunar calendar, Paryushana would begin on the fifth day of the waxing moon (shukla-paksha) half of the month of Bhadrapada. It would last from 8 to 10 days, depending upon which of the two main divisions of the Jains were holding it. The Svetambaras hold an 8-day festival and the Digambaras a 10-day event.

The festival is a time for reflection on one's life and actions during the past year, and a time to renew one's focus on what are considered the 10 cardinal virtues: forgiveness, charity, simplicity, contentment, truthfulness, self-restraint, fasting, detachment, humility, and continence. These virtues are embedded in a game that is played during the week called Gyanbazi, a game of chance in which morality is taught and the goal becomes enlightenment. The game was observed by the British and brought back to the West where it was secularized and marketed as "snakes-and-ladders" and in America as "Chutes and Ladders."

The festival is marked by several events, including recitation of the text of the Kalpa Sutra, the book that includes the earliest accounts of the Tirthankaras, the enlightened masters from whose teachings Jainism derives. Fasting is common among the monks during this time, and many laypeople, who already are vegetarians, deny themselves specific food items (much like Christians during Lent). The evening is spent in the practice of Pratikraman, a form of meditation that allows for stringent introspection, a review of one's life, a means of repentance for negative thoughts and actions, and a reminder not to repeat them. There are several types.

Pratikraman is practiced daily by devout Jains. Other forms are undertaken once every 15 days or once every 4 months. Samvatsari Pratikraman is done once per year—on the last day of the Paryushana festival. In a sense, the first days of the Paryushana are meant to lead up to the last, during which a most unique practice accompanies the Pratikraman. Those at the event ask forgiveness of every individual they may have offended during the past year. This becomes a time to forget old differences and renew the community. This act consists of folding one's hands before the person and requesting "Micchamidukadam" (May my bad deeds toward you be fruitless).

A form of Paryushana has been imported to the West though there are relatively few monks and the Indian rainy session does not exist. Westerners attending the event have been especially impressed by the acts of forgiveness on its final day.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Jainism; Lent; Meditation; Vegetarianism.

References

- Hynson, Colin. Discover Jainism. Ed. by Mehoool Sanghrajka. London: Institute of Jainology, 2007.
- Jain, Duli Chandra, ed. Studies in Jainism. 3 vols. New York: Jain Study Circle, 2004.
- Rankin, Aidan. The Jain Path: Ancient Wisdom for the West. Washington, DC: O Books, 2006.

Pashupata Saivism

The Pashupatas (Sanskrit: “adherents of Pashupati’s [that is, Siva’s] teaching”) are a sect of Saiva ascetics whose cult probably goes back to the second century CE. They trace their origin to Pashupati, who is said to have appeared on Earth as Lakulisha (b. ca. 150), the founder of the sect. According to this account, Lakulisha composed the Pashupata Sutra, the most authoritative work on this system. Together with the important commentary by Kaundinya (fifth century) and the Ganakarika, a text about the group’s rituals and worship practices, the Pashupata Sutra seems to be the only internal source for our knowledge of this group. But although important works are lost, external sources like the Puranas, the Tantras, and epigraphical records show that it was once widespread on the Indian subcontinent.

The religious observance of the Pashupatas presupposed access to the Veda—its practice being centered on the Vedic Mantras of the five faces of Siva—and was restricted to Brahmin males. It aimed at liberation through several stages. In the first, the ascetic was to dwell near a Siva temple, with his body smeared with ashes. He would worship the deity by meditating on the five mantras but also by imitating Siva’s boisterous laughter. The next phase served to purify the ascetic through a peculiar mechanism: leaving the temple without his sectarian marks, the Pashupata would pretend in public to be mentally deranged or play the lecher and thus invite the contempt of others. Through his initiation he was considered to have the power to transfer his bad karma to those who abused him. This he did until the purification was effected and he could devote the end of his life to meditation on the five mantras.

In a sense Pashupata Saivism stands between the Vedic and the Tantric Saiva religion, not only systematically but also chronologically. Using an older indigenous terminology, Alexis Sanderson (1990) has proposed to classify them as belonging to the atimarga, in contradistinction to the later Tantric Saivism (mantramarga) that built upon it. Within this atimarga would fall a further branch of the Pashupatas, namely, the Lakulas (also called Kalamukhas or Mahavratas), whose ascetic practice includes the “Observance of the Skull” (kapalavrata), by which practitioners imitate Siva’s penance by begging with a human skull as an alms bowl and vessel and by living in the impure cremation ground.

The Pashupata tradition spread to Nepal in the eighth century. The Pashupatinath Mandira along the banks of the Bagmati River in Kathmandu remains a primary pilgrimage site to this day. Today the followers of Pashupata Saivism may be found in all parts of India, but most are concentrated in Gujarat and the foothills of the Himalayas.

Jürgen Hanneder

See also: Asceticism; Meditation; Tantrism.

References

- Hara, M. “Materials for the Study of Pasupata Saivism.” Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1966.
- Sanderson, Alexis. “Saivism and the Tantric Traditions.” In The World’s Religions: The Religions of Asia, edited by Friedhelm Hardy, 32–135. London: Routledge, 1990.

Passover

Passover is the English name of Pesach, the Jewish Feast of Unleavened Bread. Pesach was commanded

An Ultra-Orthodox Jew collects matzohs (unleavened bread) at a bakery in Jerusalem for the Passover holiday. Passover celebrates the liberation of the Jewish people from slavery in Egypt. (AFP/Getty Images) to be an annual memorial festival among the Jewish people in Exodus 12, recalling God's deliverance of the Jewish people from slavery in Egypt. A key event in that deliverance was the plague in which God killed the firstborn of each Egyptian household, while passing over the homes of the Hebrews that had been marked with the blood of a freshly slaughtered lamb. This event was celebrated by a meal that included a lamb slaughtered in the Jewish temple and unleavened bread, bread taken on the trip out of Egypt prepared in haste with no time for the leaven to act. Each year, Jews would make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to celebrate Pesach.

The Christian appropriation began simultaneously with the formation of the Christian community. Among the early memories of the life of Jesus was a trip he made to Jerusalem with his parents to celebrate Pesach when he was but 12 years old. While in the city, he wandered from the family and was found in the temple speaking to the elders (Luke 2:40–52). Then, during his adult ministry, he would spend much of the year traveling through the countryside but always returned to Jerusalem for Passover. Traditionally, the length of his ministry was set at three years as the New Testament accounts of his life placed him at three different Passovers in Jerusalem (John 2, John 5, and Mark 7), prior to the one during which time he was arrested and executed.

On the last visit to Jerusalem, he celebrated the Passover meal with his disciples, the account of which became the basis of the future remembrances of that as the Eucharist or the Lord's Supper, regularly celebrated by Christians today (though in a variety of forms and occasions that range from daily to weekly to monthly to quarterly to annually). Following that last Passover supper, he was arrested, tried, and executed. As he died, it was reported that the veil separating the most holy space from the rest of the temple was rent in two.

That year, Passover was on Thursday. Christ was executed on Friday, and remained dead through the Sabbath. Christianity emerged after Jesus was reported to have risen from the dead on the first day of the new week, Sunday, and subsequently appeared to his disciples at various times and places.

The celebration of Easter (that is, Christ's resurrection) superseded Passover in the Christian church. However, it was tied to Passover in that the events of Christ's death and resurrection began with a Passover Seder (Luke 22:15–16) and were concluded during the Passover week. Jesus was likened to a Passover lamb sacrificed by God for the deliverance of humanity—the lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world. Jesus as the Passover lamb continues as one of the most central and powerful symbols within Christianity.

Beginning early in the fourth century, as the church moved from its outlaw status in the Roman Empire, and began to hold church councils for deciding basic questions, the question of dating Easter came to the fore. A method was adopted that followed the Jewish methods of determining the date of Passover, which, due to the use of the lunar calendar, fell on a different day each year on the Julian calendar used throughout the Roman Empire at the time. Easter was set as the first Sunday after the first full moon following the Spring Equinox (March 21). Passover/Pesach fell on Nissan 15, the first full moon after the Spring Equinox.

Because of the inaccuracy in the Julian calendar, the actual Spring Equinox began to drift away from March 21. A reformed Julian calendar continues to be used among Eastern Orthodox (a few even continuing to use the unreformed calendar), and their Easter celebration has become separated from that of the Western church, which adopted the Gregorian calendar that returned the Spring Equinox to March 21. That congruence remains in effect in the Common Era calendar.

Toward a Christian Passover In the 19th century, following the Great Disappointment, when Adventist Christians were questioning the non-appearance of Christ as William Miller (1782–1849) had proclaimed would occur in 1843–1844, some Adventist leaders turned to the Bible for new insights. Ellen G. White (1827–1915) was introduced to Sabbatarianism, which she accepted. The practice led to a new appreciation of Jewish law and undergirded her interest in health and diet reform. Among Adventist Sabbatharians not connected to White and the Seventh-day Adventist Church she founded, speculation led toward a new appreciation of the Jewish festivals, a celebration of which developed among some of the splinter groups of the Church of God (Seventh-day). The renewed interest in the Jewish festivals was also related to a critique of the celebration of Christmas and Easter as surviving Paganism.

From the Sabbatarian Church of God groups, the celebration of the Jewish festivals, especially the Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread, passed to Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986), the founder of the Worldwide Church of God. He tied the celebration of the Jewish feasts to a broad critique of holidays in general, both the uniquely Christian holidays and a number of widely celebrated secular holidays (Valentine's Day, Halloween) along with the idea of celebrating birthdays. Armstrong also believed in the practice of tithing and suggested that along with tithing a tenth of one's income to the Worldwide Church of God, members tithe a second 10 percent to be dedicated to celebrating Passover.

Still other Adventist groups, most notably the Jehovah's Witnesses, recognizing the Lord's Supper as having originated in a Passover Seder, adopted the practice of an annual memorial meal, sometimes called the Lord's Evening Meal, which is held on the first evening of Passover/Pesach each year. Witnesses do not use the modern Jewish calendar, and their dating will on occasion correspond more with the same full moon as the Jewish festival of Purim, which is celebrated on the 14th day of the Hebrew month of Adar (and hence usually occurs in mid-March on the Common Era calendar).

Jewish Christians Over the centuries, many Jews have converted to Christianity, but in the 20th century, a number of Jews who became Christians consciously decided to keep much of their Jewish culture, some to the point of founding and maintaining synagogues in which worship resembles that in a Jewish synagogue, as much as is possible without directly denying basic Christian affirmations concerning Jesus' divinity and his actions that bring salvation. Most Messianic synagogues continue to celebrate Passover but have poured new content into it. While adhering to many of the forms of the traditional Pesach meal, the Messianic practice centers on the concept that Jesus (whom they call in Hebrew Yeshua) was the sacrificial Passover lamb.

The Jews for Jesus, a group of Christians of Jewish background that originated at the same time as the Messianic movement, but do not believe in separate Christian synagogues, have developed a program for informing congregations of Christian believers about the Jewish background of their practices, especially Passover. Each spring, representatives of the movement will visit Christian congregations and offer a program demonstrating and explaining the Pesach meal and its role as background for the Christian communion service.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Great Disappointment; Jerusalem; Pesach; Sabbatarianism; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spring Equinox; White, Ellen G.; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Boston, Stephen. The Essential Teachings of Herbert W. Armstrong: His Teachings Focused on the Incredible Human Potential. Did He Solve the Mystery of the Ages? Lincoln, NB: iUniverse, 2002.
- Lipson, Eric. Passover Haggadah: A Messianic Celebration. San Francisco: Purple Pomegranate Productions, 1986.
- Sampson, Robin, and Linda Pierce. A Family Guide to the Biblical Holidays. Stafford, VA: Heart of Wisdom Publishing, 2001.
- Stallings, Joseph M. Rediscovering Passover: A Complete Guide for Christians. Searcy, AK: Resource Publications, 1994.

Pasundan Christian Church

The Pasundan Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Pasundan [GKP]) originated in missionary activity begun by the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging, an independent Reformed missionary agency in the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia). The agency entered western Java in 1863 but made little progress, partially because of the missionaries' very negative attitudes toward Islam, the dominant religion in the area, and the local culture. In the meantime, a second independent effort was begun by a Dutch layman who was a member of the Supreme Court of the Dutch Indies. He had notable success using methods that were considered by many to be unorthodox. The two works merged in 1885. Work was still slow, and in 1834 there were still only 4,000 Sudanese members. That year the churches joined together in a synod.

Missionaries remained in charge and chaired the synod until the Japanese arrived in 1942. The end of the war did not lessen the synod's problems, as the war for independence and a West Java Islamic revolt followed soon thereafter. It was not until the 1950s that stability returned to the area. The church was able to reorganize and settle into a quiet life that includes the sponsoring of a hospital and school system.

In 2005, the Pasundan Christian Church reported 33,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Pasundan Christian Church
Kompleks Bandung Textil Centre
Jin Kebonjsati No. 44-48
Bandung 40181
Indonesia
<http://www.gkp.or.id/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Patanjali

Patanjali (ca. second century CE) is the name attached to the unknown author of the Yoga Sutras, one of the classics of Hindu and Indian literature. The whole practice of yoga is ultimately traced to the Yoga Sutras, now dated to around 200 CE. Patanjali's name is also associated with another text, the Mahabhashya, a commentary on grammar, but it is dated to around 200 BCE, and hence by another author. In the absence of biographical data, the story of Patanjali has been integrated into Hindu lore. According to some stories, his origin has been pushed into the mythological past as he is the son of Angiras, one of the 10 sons of Brahma, the Hindu Creator deity, and of Sati, one of the consorts of Siva.

Elsewhere, Patanjali is seen as an incarnation of Adisesa, the serpent upon whom the deity Vishnu is seated. At one point, Vishnu became enthralled with the dancing of Siva. As he moved to the dance, Adisesa experienced great discomfort. When the dance ceased, Adisesa inquired into the reason for Vishnu's agitation. When informed of the dance, he asked how he could learn so he could eventually dance for Vishnu. Vishnu predicted that Adisesa would incarnate, during which time he would both learn the art of dance and shower humanity with blessings.

He then became aware of a childless yet virtuous woman named Gonika. As she prayed for a son, Adisesa presented himself to her in human form. Patanjali is often pictured with a human head and torso and the lower body of a snake. A canopy of five serpent heads is above his head.

In the 20th century, the study of the Yoga Sutras again became widespread. Not only has the study of yoga postures and their benefit become popular in the West, but a number of international yoga fellowships have emerged. In the last generation, a variety of yoga teachers have written and published commentaries on the Yoga Sutras.

The system described in the Yoga Sutras is often referred to as Ashtanga yoga, or "eight-limbed yoga." Practice involves eight steps, divided into two groups. There are five outer practices: yama and niyama (behavioral dos and don'ts), asanas (postures), pranayama (breath control), and pratyahara (sense control). There are three inward oriented practices: dharana (concentration), dhyana (meditation), and samadhi (bliss). Ashtanga yoga leads to a more focused sitting practice called raja yoga, which centers upon breathing. As one watches the breath, the practitioner is led to the development of additional means to concentrate and then control the mind. Patanjali's yoga, as do most forms of Hinduism, has as its goal liberation from the cycle of birth and rebirth, though it is particularly concentrated upon freeing the self (purusha) from its false attachment to the phenomenal world.

In the modern West, the asanas or postures have been somewhat separated from the whole of Patanjali's system and elevated to an independent practice valuable in its own right. The current popularity of hatha yoga obscures the fact that in the Yoga Sutras asanas are simply one of the eight "limbs" of yoga. Also, many (if not most) of the postures known today are later additions to the practice or represent practices developed elsewhere that have been integrated into Patanjali's system. Indeed, many of the contemporary yoga schools market themselves as possessing a unique and improved yoga system.

Constance A. Jones

See also: Hinduism; Meditation; Yoga.

References

- Feuerstein, Georg, trans. The Yoga-Sutra of Patanjali. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions, 1990.
- Iyengar, K. S. Light on Yoga: Yoga Pradipika. Boston: Unwin Paperbacks, 1979.
- Jopis, Sri K. Pattabhi. Yoga Mala. New York: North Point Press, 2002.
- Kielhorn, F. Katyayana and Patanjali: Their Relation to Each Other and to Panini. Varanasi: Indological Book House, 1963.
- Puri, Baij Nath. India in the Time of Patanjali. Bombay: Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, 1957.
- Whicher, Ian. The Integrity of the Yoga Darsana: A Reconsideration of Classical Yoga. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

Patotsav

Patotsav is a Hindu festival celebrating the anniversaries of the installation of the murtis (statues of the deities) at the temple. It is primarily a festival within the Swaminarayan movement. As murtis may be installed at various points during the year, the celebration for any given murtis may occur on any given day.

Swaminarayan devotees see Patotsav as a re-consecration ceremony. The practice was begun out of a widespread belief that murtis lose their divinity to some degree simply from the volume of maya (illusion) they must deal with in their assisting devotees. Swaminarayan leaders have emphasized that such is not the case; the divinity of the murtis is never dissipated. It is the devotion of followers that often decreases. Patotsav is intended to revive the sentiments that devotees have for the murtis and for their guru.

Besides the annual Patotsav festival for the murtis, in Swaminarayan temples there is a daily bhakti (devotional) observance that begins with washing the murtis, first with a mixture of milk, yogurt, ghee, honey, and saffron water (abbishek) and then with water. Then the deities are dressed in their appropriate clothing for public viewing. The bahishek is later made available to devotees for their consumption. A similar daily occurrence is found in Krishna temples of the Gaudaya Math tradition (including those of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness).

Constance A. Jones

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions.

Reference

Mukuncharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpath, 2005.

Paul

ca. 10–ca. 67 CE

Paul, the Christian Apostle most known for his pioneering work to carry Christianity to the Gentile world of the Mediterranean basin, is considered the major force in transforming the movement that had grown up around the belief that Jesus was the Christ (Messiah) and had been resurrected from the dead following his execution from another “way” within Judaism to a international movement that welcomed people of all ethnicities and backgrounds.

Statue of Saint Paul, first-century Christian convert credited with the spread of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire. (Corel)

Paul was born in Tarsus, Cilicia, a city on the southern coast of what is now Turkey sometime before 10 CE. His influential Jewish family named him Saul after the ancient Jewish king. His father was a Pharisee and he was brought up to strictly observe the Mosaic Law. He was also a free citizen of Rome. More than once his dual citizenship stood him in good stead as he faced harsh treatment at the hands of municipal authorities in Greece and Asia Minor. Anywhere in the empire, Roman citizens had the right to appeal directly to Rome when serious charges were laid against them.

Paul was also well educated and his schooling included some years of training in Jerusalem, where he studied with the noted teacher Gamaliel (d. ca. 50 CE), the grandson of Hillel (ca. 110 BCE–10 CE). He was taught the trade of tent making, which he pursued throughout his life as his means of support. Likely his father trained him, as was the custom. For Paul, tent making would prove to be a secure occupation that would provide well for him and give flexibility for his ministry. Made of either textiles or leather, tents were homes for many throughout the Mediterranean. Growing up in Cilicia, Paul may have worked particularly with cilicum, a goat's hair cloth woven in the district and favored by seamen and soldiers.

As a young man, Saul was given responsibility in the attempted suppression of the Christian community and he first appears on the scene when he witnessed the death of Stephen, the first Christian martyr, in Jerusalem, and he later assumed a leading role in the persecution of Christians. Subsequently, while traveling from Jerusalem to Damascus (ca. 35) he had a visionary experience in which Jesus appeared to him and spoke of his persecution work. Saul was converted to the faith he had once so strongly opposed and soon emerged as one of its most capable leaders. He began to call himself an Apostle (a leader who had seen Jesus in the flesh) out of season (1 Corinthians 15:8), a reference to his having seen Jesus in the flesh, but in his resurrected body. Three accounts of his conversion experience are recorded in the New Testament book of Acts (in chapters 9, 22, and 26).

Following his conversion, Saul began to refer to himself as Paul and engage in evangelistic efforts in Damascus. He made his first trip to Jerusalem three years later and went through a period of winning over the other Apostles, who hesitated to accept him because of his past. He began to preach among the Greek-speaking Jews and then focused his mission to the Gentiles. His real work awaited the developing consensus that Gentiles could become Christians without also becoming Jews, being circumcised, and following Jewish dietary laws.

Dates are notoriously difficult to fix for most of Paul's career because there are few allusions in Paul's letters to events in the contemporary political world. Still, we can date Paul's arrival in Corinth in 49. A year and a half later he appeared before the Corinthian proconsul Gallio and then left Corinth (Acts 18:12). An inscription discovered at Delphi dates Gallio's short tenure in 51.

Paul's letters show he responded to immediate opportunities, traveling as needs arose, instead of planning a campaign from start to finish. He found himself returning to Corinth and Ephesus more often than the supposed "headquarters" in Jerusalem. Still, many find it convenient to organize Paul's career around the scheme of three missionary journeys.

Around 47, Paul began the first of these missionary journeys. It was limited primarily to Asia Minor (Turkey), and culminated in Paul's return to Jerusalem for a council in which the issue of circumcision was discussed. It was decided that circumcision was not to be required of male Gentile converts. Returning to Asia Minor (ca. 49), Paul had a vision of a man beckoning him to Macedonia. In response, he subsequently carried the Christian message to Europe for the first time. His second missionary journey took him to the Greek peninsula, where strong centers would emerge in such places as Thessalonica and Corinth. In Athens, on the Areopagus (Mars Hill), Paul had his confrontation with the learned men of the city. Toward the end of his journey, he authored his first writings (that have survived), the two epistles to the Thessalonians.

After a period in Antioch, Paul began his third journey around 54. It included a three-year stay in Ephesus, during which time he wrote the several letters to the Corinthians concerning problems that had arisen in the church there. He would later arrive in Corinth (ca. winter 57–58), and while there write the lengthy letter to the church in Rome, which he had yet to visit. He then returned to Jerusalem by way of Philippi.

In Jerusalem, he became involved in a disturbance at the temple and was arrested. In the process of being examined, he asserted his Roman citizenship. However, facing a trial in Jerusalem, where those who opposed the Christian movement and him personally were strong, Paul used his prerogative as a citizen and appealed his case to Caesar (Acts 25:9–11). He was subsequently transported to Rome. He was imprisoned in Rome for two years (ca. 61–63), during which time he wrote several more of his letters—Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, Philemon. The primary account of Paul's life, the book of Acts, closes with him a prisoner in Rome.

According to the major traditions, Paul was eventually released (ca. 63) but remained in the city only to be rearrested around 67. In the meantime, the great fire broke out in Rome, and the emperor Nero (r. 54–68) blamed it on the Christian community. A general persecution of Christians followed. The tentacles of the persecution finally reached Paul and following his arrest he was executed, most likely by being beheaded. Convicted Roman citizens were commonly beheaded at a spot on the Ostian Way. Other traditions suggest that Paul went on to Spain and lived out the last years of his life there. It was Paul's stated purpose to move on to Spain by way of Rome (Romans 15:24–28), but after the Roman imprisonment recorded in Acts, we have no documentary evidence that he was able to fulfill these travel plans.

The martyrdom of Paul is believed by most to have occurred on the Ostian Way. He would afterwards be interred on the property of a lady named Lucina. This site was first marked by a simple shrine and then by a church constructed by the emperor Constantine. The emperor Theodosius I (r. 379–395) began and Pope Leo I (r. 440–461) completed the erection of the new church of St. Paul Outside-the-Walls, which most believe was constructed over the grave of the Apostle Paul. That church was destroyed by fire in 1823, but reconstructed. During the reconstruction a fourth-century tomb was discovered that carried the inscription in Latin, "To Paul, apostle and martyr." The new basilica was consecrated by Pope Pius IX (r. 1846–1878) on December 10, 1854.

In the second and third centuries, Paul's writings, his epistles sent to the various churches and to individuals he knew, were gathered and copied and became part of the normative literature of the Christian movement. As the New Testament canon was closed, he emerged as the author of more items (14) than any other of the Apostolic writers. Some contemporary biblical scholars have called Paul's authorship of several of the epistles traditionally attributed to him into question, noting the distinctive style, vocabulary, and doctrinal emphasis. They have suggested that the letters (to Timothy, Titus, and the Hebrews) were produced by one or more persons directly influenced by Paul in the decades following his death. These criticisms have not, however, affected the canonical nature of these works.

Paul's writings have repeatedly become the sources of revival and reform movement within the larger Christian movement. Protestants especially drew upon his letters for their emphasis upon the centrality of faith and grace in the Christian life. Other new movements have seen his standing up to Peter and the other Apostles on behalf of the Gentiles as a model for standing against entrenched and ossified church authority. Theologians have always seen him as the pioneering and model Christian thinker whom they hope to emulate.

Since the 1960s, many Protestant scholars have challenged the anti-Catholic context of the 16th-century Protestant writings on Paul and have begun to offer a "New Perspective on Paul," based upon a fresh look at the Jewish context of his writings.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Constantine the Great; Damascus; Jerusalem; Martyrdom; Rome/Vatican City.

References

- Dunn, James G. D., ed. Paul and the Mosaic Law. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2001.
- Durham-Tübingen Research Symposium on Earliest Christianity and Judaism, University of Durham, 1994.
- Harrington, Daniel J. Meeting St. Paul Today: Understanding the Man, His Mission, and His Message. Chicago: Loyola Press, 2008.
- Schnelle, Udo. Apostle Paul: His Life and Theology. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic and Brazos Press, 2005.
- Wright, N. T. Paul: In Fresh Perspective. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress Press, 2006.

Pentecost

Pentecost is the festival that marks the birth of the Christian church by the power of the Holy Spirit as recorded in the biblical book of the Acts of the Apostles 2:1–41. The word "Pentecost" means "50th day" and is celebrated 50 days after Easter. Because the timing of Pentecost is tied to the moveable date of Easter, it can occur as early as May 10 and as late as June 13.

The Christian feast of Pentecost originated in the Jewish festival that began on the 50th day after the beginning of Passover (Pesach). It is called the Feast of Weeks (Shavuot) and was originally an agricultural festival celebrating and giving thanks for the “first fruits” of the early spring harvest (Leviticus 23; Exodus 23, 34). By the early New Testament period, it had gradually lost its association with agriculture and became associated with the celebration of God’s creation of his people and their religious history. By the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE, the festival focused exclusively on God’s gift of Torah (the “Law”) on Mount Sinai.

According to the account in Acts, 10 days after Jesus ascended into heaven, the Apostles gathered together in Jerusalem for the Jewish harvest festival. The day has significance in the history of the Christian church, whose members began to see the events of the day as the time God sent the outpouring of the Holy Spirit promised through the prophet Joel (Joel 2:28–29).

Pentecost is also called “Whitsunday” or “White Sunday” because in ancient times it was customary to baptize adult converts on Pentecost. The catechumens would wear white robes on that day. Consequently, the present-day rite of confirmation is still often celebrated on Pentecost.

The feast of Pentecost is universally celebrated in the Christian church, though the liturgical practices are not as extensive and well known as the greater feasts of Easter and Christmas, for example. The church fathers Irenaeus and Tertullian attest to its celebration in apostolic times.

In Italy it is customary to scatter rose leaves from the ceiling of the churches to recall the miracle of the fiery tongues. In France celebrants blow trumpets during the service to recall the sound of the mighty wind that accompanied the giving of the Spirit. The Eastern Orthodox carry flowers and green branches in their hands to mark the day.

Red is the liturgical color for Pentecost. Red recalls the tongues of flame in which the Holy Spirit descended on the first Pentecost. The color red also signifies the blood of the martyrs who, by the power of the Holy Spirit, held firm to the true faith even at the cost of their lives.

Pentecost represents God’s gracious, enabling presence actively at work among his people, calling and enabling them to live out in dynamic ways their witness. For Christians, Pentecost Sunday is a day to celebrate hope evoked by the knowledge that God through his Holy Spirit is at work among his people. It is a celebration of newness, of re-creation, of renewal of purpose, mission, and calling as God’s people. It is a celebration of God’s ongoing work in the world. Yet, it is also a recognition that his work is done through his people as he pours out his presence upon them.

Kevin Quast

See also: Christmas; Easter; Pesach; Roman Catholic Church; Shavuot.

References

- Adam, Adolf. The Liturgical Year: Its History and Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy. New York: Pueblo, 1981.
- Harrington, Daniel J. “Pentecost Past and Present.” America, May 29, 2006.
- Holweck, Frederick. “Pentecost (Whitsunday).” The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 15. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1912.
- Stookey, Laurence Hull. Calendar: Christ’s Time for the Church. Nashville: Abingdon, 1996.
- Talley, Thomas J. The Origins of the Liturgical Year. 2nd ed. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991.

Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada

In November 1918, a meeting was convened in Mille Roche, a small town outside of Cornwall, Ontario. Its purpose was to begin to organize a cooperative fellowship and to obtain a government charter for Pentecostals in Canada. This action followed similar discussions in Montreal in 1917 and a previously failed attempt at Pentecostal union in 1909. Soon after the meeting, on May 17, 1919, the secretary of state of Canada signed the charter giving official sanction to Pentecostal leaders. They wished to organize on the basis of “fellowship, not doctrine” but agreed that “the baptism in the Holy Spirit with tongues as the initial evidence” was central to their identity. Thus Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (PAOC) was born.

Revival had characterized a number of sectarian movements from the beginning of the 20th century, a time of rapid urbanization and accelerated religious change. As in the United States, the Wesleyan Holiness denominations in Canada contributed significantly to the growth of Pentecostalism. So did the Salvation Army, with its appeal to the uprooted urban masses, as well as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ and the Christian and Missionary Alliance. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit in 1906 at the Hebden Mission in Toronto left its mark on Canadian Pentecostalism, just as the Azusa Street revival shaped Pentecostalism in the United States. Hebden was the first of six Pentecostal missions started before 1910. As people from different religious traditions experienced spiritual phenomena in a new way, they sought common fellowship and common structures.

In 1919 a group of western Canadian Pentecostal churches formed as a district of the Assemblies of God (AG). A year later the PAOC in the east voted to become the Assemblies Eastern Canada District Council. This structural arrangement continued until 1925, when the Canadian Pentecostals voted to become autonomous.

Because of doctrinal similarities, geographic proximity, and fraternal working agreements, the influence of the AG on the PAOC is unquestionable. The PAOC adopted the AG Statement of Fundamental Truths, a statement adhering to a finished work theory of sanctification. It also positioned the movement away from the Oneness tradition of Pentecostalism, reaffirming the Trinitarian view of the Godhead.

As the largest single group of Canadian Pentecostals, the PAOC grew rapidly after its formation in 1919. Two years after its inception it listed 23 assemblies in eastern Canada and 10 in western Canada. According to census figures, the Pentecostals and Apostolic Brethren accounted for approximately 8,000 believers and adherents in Canada at this time. In 1951 the total Pentecostal constituency in Canada numbered 95,000 compared to 57,742 10 years previously. In 1988 the PAOC General Conference reported 1,058 congregations with 189,753 church members and adherents in Canada. By 1994 that figure had risen to 231,000.

Identified with classical Pentecostals in the United States, the PAOC gained greater favor after the AG were accepted into the National Association of Evangelicals in the mid-1940s. Evangelicals extended further openness toward Pentecostals in the 1960s with the rise of the Charismatic movement. Today the PAOC is an active participant in the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, taking a leading role among its evangelical counterparts.

Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada
2450 Milltower Ct.
Mississauga, ON L5N 5Z6
Canada
<http://www.paoc.org/>

Irving A. Whitt

See also: Charismatic Movement; Pentecostalism.

References

- Atter, G. F. The Third Force. Peterborough, ON: College Press, 1965, 1970.
- Holm, Randall. “A Paradigmatic Analysis of Authority Within Pentecostalism.” Ph.D. diss., University of Lavel, 1995.
- Kydd, R. A. N. “Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada.” In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B. McGee. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.
- Miller, Thomas W. “The Canadian ‘Azusa’: The Hebden Mission in Toronto.” Pneuma 8, no. 1 (1986): 5–30.
- Miller, Thomas W. Canadian Pentecostals: A History of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada. Mississauga, ON: Full Gospel Publishing House, 1994.

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World

Claiming to be the oldest of the “Apostolic” or “Jesus Only” churches, the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World were organized as a loose fellowship by several people who had experienced the Pentecostal blessing (with the accompanying phenomenon of “speaking in tongues”) at the revival occurring at the Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa Street in Los Angeles. In 1913, at a Pentecostal camp meeting in Los Angeles, a Canadian minister, R. E. McAlister (d. 1953), talked about the belief he had arrived at from his study of the Bible, namely, that the commonly used Trinitarian baptismal formula was unbiblical. He asserted that baptism should be in the name of Jesus. Two prominent ministers, Frank J. Ewart (1876–1947) and John C. Scheppe, immediately accepted the idea. Soon other leading ministers such as Garfield Thomas Hayward (1880–1931), E. N. Bell (1866–1923), Glenn A. Cook, and H. A. Goss, signaled their acceptance of it.

The new perspective on baptism led to the development of a new form of Pentecostalism, which denied the traditional Christian idea of the Trinity with an understanding of Jesus as identical with God the Father and the Holy Spirit as the power of God/Jesus. Baptism by immersion in the name of Jesus was considered essential for salvation.

In 1914, a number of unaffiliated Pentecost leaders gathered in Little Rock to form the Assemblies of God. In the meantime, those who had allied themselves with the Pentecostal Assemblies had been holding their annual meetings in Indianapolis, where Thomas G. Hayward, an African American, had emerged as the popular leader. Over the next year the two organizations would go their separate way as the Assemblies of God adopted a Trinitarian position and the Pentecostal Assemblies moved into the Apostolic camp. The Pentecostal Assemblies also differed from the Assemblies of God in its inter-racial makeup. The Assemblies of God was, in fact, a fellowship of white Americans distinguished from the earlier predominantly African American group, the Church of God in Christ.

Through the decades of the 20th century, in spite of significant pressure to split along racial lines, Assemblies remained committed to its inter-racial character. A major challenge came in 1924, when many of the white members withdrew to form what became the United Pentecostal Church International. The remaining members reorganized with an episcopal polity and elected Hayward as the first presiding bishop. A second period of unrest followed Hayward’s death. However, in 1937, Samuel Grimes became the new presiding bishop. He would hold the office for the next three decades during which time the Assemblies experienced its greatest period of growth. It developed congregations across the United States and missions in Nigeria, Jamaica, the United Kingdom, Ghana, and Egypt.

The current presiding bishop is Reverend Horace E. Smith, who succeeded Norman L. Wagner in 2004. In 2005, the Assemblies reported 1.5 million members in 1,750 congregations. More than 1,000 affiliated congregations were located outside of the United States. Today work is now found in Germany, the United Kingdom, India, Togo, Nigeria, Liberia, Egypt, Sierra Leone, Zimbabwe, the Cook Islands, the Fiji Islands, Australia and New Zealand, Haiti, Jamaica, the Bahamas, and a number of the Caribbean islands. The church sponsors Aeon Bible School in Indianapolis, Indiana.

Pentecostal Assemblies of the World

3939 Meadows Dr.

Indianapolis, IN 46205

<http://www.pawinc.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Church of God in Christ; Pentecostalism.

References

- Dugas, Paul P., comp. The Life and Writings of Elder G. T. Haywood. Portland, OR: Apostolic Book Publishers, 1968.
- Golder, Morris E. History of the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World. Indianapolis, IN: the author, 1973.
- Golder, Morris E. The Life and World of Bishop Garfield Thomas Hayward. Indianapolis, IN: the author, 1977.
- Tyson, James L. The Early Pentecostal Revival: History of the Twentieth-Century Pentecostals and the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, 1901–30. St. Louis, MO: Word Aflame Press, 1992.

Pentecostal Church of Chile

The Pentecostal Church of Chile (Iglesia Pentecostal de Chile) was founded in 1945 by former members of the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile under the leadership of Bishop Enrique Chavez Campos. The church's strongest early presence was in the city of Curicó, some 150 miles south of Santiago. Like its parent body, the church experienced significant growth in the last half of the 20th century through its intensive evangelistic efforts among the poorer people of the country. By the mid-1980s it reported 90,000 members.

The church resembles the Methodist Pentecostal Church in doctrine, but it has a commitment to Christian unity and in 1961 joined the World Council of Churches, which has been considered a very liberal body by many Pentecostal churches. The highest legislative body of the church is its general assembly. It elects the bishops and an executive committee who lead the church between assembly meetings. The bishops appoint the pastors to their posts.

The church is committed to dealing with the problems of poverty in Chile and with the educational needs of the nation's youth. It supports the work of Evangelical Christian Aid in promoting social action programs among the poor, including providing agricultural education, skills training for women, and free-lunch facilities for the children of the poor.

In 2005, the church reported 125,000 members in 340 congregations.

Pentecostal Church of Chile
Calle Rodriguez 1177
Casilla 775
Curicó
Chile

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile; World Council of Churches.

References

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Pentecostal Church of God

John C. Sinclair, a former Presbyterian originally from Scotland who pastored the "first Pentecostal church in Chicago," went to the gathering of Pentecostal leaders held at Hot Springs, Arkansas, in 1914 and was appointed to the Executive Presbytery of the Assemblies of God, as was George Brinkman. Five years later, on December 30, 1919, seven ministers and a few church delegates met in Chicago to organize as the Pentecostal Assemblies of the U.S.A. Sinclair emerged as general chairman, Brinkman as secretary, and J. A. Bell as treasurer.

Brinkman owned and operated the Herald Publishing Company, which beginning in 1913 published a monthly publication called the Pentecostal Herald. The Pentecostal Herald was accepted as the official publication of the Pentecostal Assemblies. In 1922 the name Pentecostal Church of God (PCG) replaced Pentecostal Assemblies of the U.S.A. In 1926 the Messenger Printing Company was established in Ottumwa, Iowa, by A. D. McClure, who now edited the Pentecostal Messenger, which in 1927 became the church's official organ. Sinclair did not continue to associate with the church after its headquarters were relocated to Ottumwa.

In 1933 the PCG adopted a doctrinal statement. It had been previously thought that the 1914 meeting compromised the sovereignty of the local congregation and that the 1916 Assemblies of God Statement of Fundamental Truths was a move toward conventional ecclesiasticism. In 1950 the headquarters were moved to Joplin, Missouri. Across the street from the headquarters now sits Messenger College, which had opened in 1958 in Houston as Southern Bible College.

The PCG grants ordination to women ministers. Early on, the church adopted a view of divorce that allowed remarried people to become ministers, a position that barred the PCG from the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America (now Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America) and the Pentecostal World Conference. The PCG will give the full range of licenses—from exhorters to ordained ministers—to divorced and remarried people on three grounds: (1) the divorce occurred prior to the first conversion experience, (2) fornication was the grounds for divorce, or (3) desertion was the grounds for divorce. A 1997 review of this policy on credentialing ministers who are divorced and remarried suggested that naming desertion implies that the spouse was not a Christian. The first point was also debated because many people report their first conversion in childhood. The question was, should the adult conversion, after one “backslides,” be definitive in such cases? And if only adult conversion matters, at what age is one an adult? In 1993 the denomination started naming apostles in their official list of ministers.

Worshippers raise their hands in prayer during a service at the Wilmington Pentecostal Church of God in Wilmington, Ohio, on December 21, 2008. (John Moore/Getty Images)

J. W. May, general superintendent of the PCG from June 1942 to June 1947, had been present in the meeting held by Charles Fox Parham (1875–1929), the original Pentecostal minister, in Topeka, Kansas, in 1901. R. Dennis Heard (1953–1975) was instrumental in leading the PCG into the National Association of Evangelicals, the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America, and the Pentecostal World Conference. The current general superintendent is James D. Gee.

In 2007 the PCG reported 608,000 constituents, 4,823 churches and preaching stations, and 6,750 ministers in 58 nations. In the United States, the church reported 88,627 constituents (of which 40,000 were formally members), 1,158 churches, and 2,796 ministers. Its strongest missionary activity is in East Africa, Europe (especially Russia), East Asia, Mexico, Argentina, and the Caribbean.

Pentecostal Church of God
4901 Pennsylvania
Joplin, MO 64801
<http://www.pcg.org/>

Harold D. Hunter

See also: Assemblies of God; Parham, Charles Fox; Pentecostalism; Pentecostal World Fellowship.

References

- Martin, Larry. In the Beginning. Duncan, OK: Christian Life Books, 1994.
- Moon, Elmer L. The Pentecostal Church: A History and Popular Survey. New York: Carlton Press, 1966.

Pentecostal Mission Church

The Pentecostal Mission Church (Misión Iglesia Pentecostal) is one of more than 100 independent churches that originated with the Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile (MPCC), the largest of the Protestant/Free church communities in Chile. In 1933 the MPCC experienced its first schism, which led to the formation of the Evangelical Pentecostal Church. The Pentecostal Mission Church was formed in 1952 by 125 members of the Evangelical Pentecostal Church, second in Chile only to the MPCC.

The church manifested an immediate readiness to cooperate with other Christian groups in serving the needs of the poorer people of Chile, who formed its major constituency. It immediately began to work with Evangelical Christian Aid, best known for its food distribution program, but also branching out to provide a number of social services, from education to improving agriculture. The church was one of several Pentecostal churches in 1967 to cooperate with the Methodists and Anglicans to found the Evangelical Theological Community of Chile, an ecumenical training center.

Like the Pentecostal Church of Chile, the Pentecostal Mission Church placed an emphasis on Christian unity that led it in 1962 to affiliate with the World Council of Churches. The church has taken the lead in exploring innovative approaches to Christian education, theological reflection, and pastoral care. In 2005 it reported 9,000 members.

Pentecostal Mission Church
Santa Barbara 3613
Comuna of Recoleta
Santiago
Chile

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile; Pentecostal Church of Chile; World Council of Churches.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Pentecostal Mission, The

The Pentecostal Mission (TPM) was founded by an Indian later known as Pastor Paul (his surname is not found in any documents), a Hindu convert from the Ezhava caste, while employed in Sri Lanka in 1921. It was incorporated by an act of the Parliament of Ceylon in 1970 and originally called the Ceylon Pentecostal Mission (CPM) in India and Sri Lanka. The name of the denomination in India was changed in 1984 to The Pentecostal Mission probably to avoid any charge of extraterritorial affinity in the light of Tamil-Singhalese problems in Sri Lanka.

The denomination may be the only one of Indian origin that has both spread to different countries and established churches among the native residents. (The Indian Pentecostal Church of God, whose origins parallel this movement, is also worldwide, but its membership is limited to the Indian diaspora.) The Pentecostal Mission has centers/branches in Malaysia, Singapore, France, the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, the West Indies (Puerto Rico, Dominican Republic), Sierra Leone, Australia, Papua New Guinea, Nepal, Fiji, Mexico, El Salvador, Costa Rica, Kenya, and Switzerland. In each of these countries, it is known by a different name (for example, in the United States it is known as the New Testament Church).

Unlike most of the classical Pentecostal denominations contemporaneous with it, the Mission is very conservative and takes a literal approach to the Bible, which it interprets from a dispensational perspective. The movement strongly advocates an ascetic life for its workers that includes a very strict dress code and strict obedience and submission to the elders. All workers are subject to the authority of the chief pastor.

The international headquarters of the denomination in Chennai (Madras) is also the office of the chief pastor, who is considered to be the “supreme spiritual head of the Mission throughout the world.” The chief pastor “nominates a pastor to supervise the Church work in each country who shall carry out his function in consultation with the Chief Pastor.” The international annual convention held in Chennai (Madras) draws thousands from all over India and representatives from all over the world.

Paulson Pulikottil

See also: Asceticism; Pentecostalism.

References

- Martin, Paul C. “A Brief History of the Ceylon Pentecostal Church.” In Christianity Is Indian: The Emergence of an Indigenous Community, edited by Roger E. Hedlund, 437–444. Delhi: ISPCK, 2000.
- Pastor Paul*. Chennai: Pentecostal Press Trust, 1986.
- The Pentecostal Mission. Rules and Regulations of the Church. Chennai: Pentecostal Press Trust, n.d.

Pentecostal World Fellowship

After World War II many people wished to organize in some collective way the large amount of relief work and assistance being given to the suffering Pentecostal churches of Europe, and to carry out the further rehabilitation work still needed. Added to this were the continuing fight in some countries for full religious freedom for Pentecostal believers and the hope that a worldwide conference could speak and act with more authority and influence with the governments concerned.

In September 1946 it was decided to arrange a world Pentecostal conference in Zurich, Switzerland, from May 6 to 9, 1947. Leonard Steiner, the pastor of the Basel Church, acted as organizing secretary. Several European countries were represented.

Judging by the enthusiasm of the participants, the conference was a great success. Starting on May 5, large public meetings were held each evening in the Zurich city hall, which seated 2,000 and was packed night after night. On May 11, the closing meetings were held in the famous Congress Hall, and the crowd of about 3,000 was augmented by special trainloads of additional participants.

The work of the conference involved several key issues. First, it was agreed to appoint Leonard Steiner as the chairman, and he won quick approval because of his tact and unrivaled knowledge of the three official languages, English, German, and French. He was assisted by Donald Gee (1891–1966), Lewi Pethrus (1884–1974), K. Schneider, and Ernest S. Williams (1885–1981).

The conference was deeply moved by the reports from the needy European countries, but a serious division arose over the best method for helping. The large Scandinavian Pentecostal churches have always steadily opposed any organization beyond that of the local assembly. A compromise was found in recognizing the Basel Church as an international center for coordinating relief work. Leonard Steiner undertook supervision of this work. The Basel office eventually opened on December 1, 1947.

The conference participants also decided to establish a magazine. Donald Gee was asked to do the editing and publication. The first issue of the new world magazine appeared in September 1947 with the name Pentecost, which in 1970 became World Pentecost. The magazine was discontinued in 1998.

René Fauvel served as host for the second meeting, which met in Paris in 1949. The meeting was held in a building that had an upstairs hall to accommodate the business sessions and a downstairs hall with seating for 2,000 for public revival meetings. A key subject of discussion was the formation of some kind of world Pentecostal organization. The Scandinavians were there in force, and the Northern European bloc emphatically opposed any organizational steps such as a mutual declaration of faith, election of officers, or anything from the tradition of the old denominations. Yet with equal vigor, those from other parts of the world desired such steps.

It was a surprise, then, that when the proposals for organizing were brought forward they were accepted unanimously. These stipulated that a World Pentecostal Conference should be held every three years in different parts of the world. For each Conference, a secretary was to be elected, assisted by five advisors. It was emphasized that the committee should have no authority over individual movements or churches. South African minister David J. du Plessis (1905–1989) was unanimously elected as the first secretary.

At the London meeting of the Conference in 1952, the theme “Into All The World” welcomed, for the first time, participants from Asia and Africa. At the 1955 meeting in Stockholm, under the theme “The Pentecostal Movement: A Revaluation,” Lewi Pethrus and the Swedish churches extended this welcome: “All accredited Pentecostal ministers will be members of the Conference by virtue of their personal status. The purposes of the Conference are not legislative but spiritual.”

The theme “The Purpose of God in the Pentecostal Movement for This Hour” was used in the 1958 meeting in Toronto, which was hosted by W. E. McAlister. Demos Shakarian (1913–1993), founder of the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship International, was among the major speakers. The popular radio show Revivaltime was broadcast directly from the Conference by the program’s host, C. M. Ward (1909–1996). About 5,000 took part in a breaking of bread service, when Lewi Pethrus gave an address on the work of the Holy Spirit in the church.

Now called the Pentecostal World Conference, the group assembled in Jerusalem over Whitsuntide in 1961. The emphasis three years later in Helsinki was on world evangelization. Meetings were held in a “tent-cathedral” with a seating capacity of 15,000. Speakers were asked to avoid reference to political issues, as it was stressed that the purpose of the Conference was to “Magnify the Lord Jesus Christ.” A delicate matter occupying the minds of the leaders of the Pentecostal churches at the time was their relationship with the World Council of Churches (WCC). Two small Pentecostal groups in Chile had been received in the recent WCC meeting in New Delhi, but it was clear that the overwhelming sentiment of those present in Helsinki was against joining the WCC.

The keynote address at the Nairobi meeting in 1982 was brought by conference chair Thomas F. Zimmerman, who cited figures from David Barrett’s newly published World Christian Encyclopedia. Zimmerman claimed that there were 62 to 100 million Pentecostals in the world, making them the largest single family of churches in world Protestantism. The theme was “Alive in the Spirit in Today’s World.” Reflecting upon the approaching end of the millennium, speakers offered little hope that the world could be changed before the Second Coming of Christ.

The most controversial message of the week was delivered by James A. Forbes, Jr., professor at New York’s Union Theological Seminary, who chided the world Pentecostal movement for its “drift toward pride and institutionalism” while occasionally supporting the “status quo of oppression and exploitation.” Forbes called on attendees to be “prophets” and further challenged Pentecostals to be “ecumenical.” Forbes’s message, though warmly applauded by the crowd, received a frosty reception from the platform.

Subsequent meetings have been held in Zürich (1985), Singapore (1989), Oslo (1992), Jerusalem (1995), and Seoul (1998). Zimmerman chaired the Conference until 1989, when he was succeeded by Ray H. Hughes, who in turn was succeeded by Thomas Trask in 1998. A theology program track emerged at the 1995 gathering, which was augmented by a more substantive academic track during the sessions in 1998, hosted by the Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul, Korea, reportedly the largest Christian congregation in the world. The 2001 Conference, planned as a celebration of the Pentecostal centennial, was hosted by Frederick K. C. Price at the Crenshaw Christian Center in Los Angeles, the site of the revival that launched Pentecostalism as a world movement. Most recently the Pentecostal World Conference changed its name to Pentecostal World Fellowship.

Pentecostal World Fellowship
1445 Boonville Ave.
Springfield, MO 65804
<http://www.pentecostalworldfellowship.org>

Harold D. Hunter

See also: Pentecostalism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Gee, Donald. Wind and Flame. Croydon, UK: Heath Press, 1967.
- Robeck, Cecil M. "Pentecostal World Conference." In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B. McGee, 707–710. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1988.

Pentecostalism

The Pentecostal movement developed at the beginning of the 20th century, initially as a revitalization movement with the Holiness churches in the United States. The Holiness churches had placed a great emphasis upon the doctrine of perfection as derived from the teachings of John Wesley (1703–1791), the founder of Methodism. This doctrine teaches that it is possible for Christian believers to be made perfect in love by an act of God, often described as the baptism of the Holy Spirit. However, within the Holiness churches the living of the holy life and perfection in love were primarily the keeping of a strict set of moral and behavioral codes. Many complained that the Holiness movement had fallen into legalism.

The first event of importance in the founding of the Pentecostal movement occurred at a Bible school in Topeka, Kansas, under the direction of former Methodist minister Charles F. Parham (1873–1929). After assigning his students to research the baptism of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament, Parham accepted their findings: that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was always accompanied by the experience of speaking in an unknown tongue. He then led his students in prayer for such an experience, and speaking in tongues began to be experienced on January 1, 1901. Agnes Ozman (1870–1937) was the first to speak in tongues, but eventually Parham and the others also received the baptism.

Parham began to preach about the baptism of the Holy Spirit through the south-central states. Then in 1906, one of his students, an African American preacher named William J. Seymour (1870–1922), took the teachings to Los Angeles, where a revival took place at an independent mission on Azusa Street. From this mission, the Pentecostal movement would spread across North America, and within a decade it was found around the world.

The original Pentecostal teachings built directly upon Holiness teachings. Pentecostalism offered to Holiness believers—who had already experienced sanctification as a second work of God's grace (their initial experience of faith in Christ being considered the first experience)—the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the accompanying experience of speaking in tongues as a third experience with God. Among Holiness Pentecostals, the experience of Holiness was considered a prerequisite for experiencing the baptism of the Holy Spirit. This understanding continues among such groups as the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the Church of God in Christ, and the International Pentecostal Holiness Church.

Soon after the Pentecostal teachings emerged, a group of ministers dissented from the Holiness teachings and declared that the baptism of the Holy Spirit was available to every believer quite apart from the experience of sanctification. This perspective occasioned a split in the movement and resulted in new groups such as the Assemblies of God.

Several years later, still another dissenting opinion was developed by ministers who rejected the orthodox understanding of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. They placed a renewed emphasis on the Oneness of God and baptism in the name of Jesus, rather than in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which most churches follow. The Oneness or Apostolic churches are represented by such groups as the United Pentecostal Church International, and the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World.

A Nigerian man worships in a Pentecostal church in Port Harcourt, Nigeria. (Chris Hondros/Getty Images)

The Pentecostal movement would find notable response in Scandinavia, Africa, and Latin America, where numerous independent Pentecostal churches would emerge. The Danish, Finnish, Norwegian, and Swedish Pentecostals would come to form the largest segment of Christians in those countries, apart from the state churches. In Africa, the Zionist and Apostolic churches would take the lead in the spread of Pentecostalism from South Africa north to the Sahara. Mexican believers at the Azusa Street mission would take the movement to Mexico and Central America. In the last half of the 20th century, Pentecostalism would become the major movement contesting the hegemony of Roman Catholicism across South America.

Pentecostals have found some international fellowship through the Pentecostal World Conference. The largest Christian congregation in the world is the Yoido Full Gospel Church, a Pentecostal church in Seoul, South Korea. New life was given to Pentecostalism in the last decades of the 20th century by the Charismatic movement.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Charismatic Movement; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God in Christ; International Pentecostal Holiness Church; Methodism; Parham, Charles Fox; Pentecostal Assemblies of the World; Pentecostal World Fellowship; United Pentecostal Church International; Wesley, John; Yoido Full Gospel Church; Zionist and Apostolic Churches.

References

- Anderson, Allan. An Introduction to Pentecostalism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Eduard M. van der Maas, eds. The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.

- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Eugene, OR: Hendrickson Publishers, 1997.
- Hunter, Harold D. Spirit Baptism: A Pentecostal Alternative. Washington, DC: University Press of America, 1983.
- Kalu, Ogbu. African Pentecostalism: An Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Martin, David. Pentecostalism: The World Their Parish. New York: Wiley-Blackwell, 2008.
- Miller, Donald E., and Tetsunao Yamamori. Global Pentecostalism: The New Face of Christian Social Engagement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
- Studebaker, Stephen M. Defining Issues in Pentecostalism: Classical and Emergent. Eugene, OR: Pickwick Publications, 2008.
- Synon, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal, 1901–2001. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

Pentecostalism in Scandinavia

Pentecostalism, a Christian movement that emerged in the United States at the beginning of the 20th century, spread around the globe in its first decade and through the century became an important force within the larger Christian community. It was carried to Scandinavia in 1907, and its new home became an important launching point for its development not only throughout Europe, but in both Africa and Latin America.

In 1906 Thomas B. Barrett (1862–1940), a prominent minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) in Norway, visited the United States, where he came in contact with the burgeoning Pentecostal revival that had begun in Los Angeles. When he returned to Oslo, he became the voice of the revival there and of its keynote experience, the baptism of the Holy Spirit as evidenced by speaking in tongues. Barrett operated as an independent evangelist for the next decade, before formally resigning from the Methodist Church and founding the Filadelfia Church in Oslo.

In 1907 a youthful pastor from Stockholm, Sweden, Petrus Lewi Pethrus (1884–1974), traveled to Oslo to meet Barrett. He experienced the baptism of the Holy Spirit and returned home to share the experience with the Baptist church he pastored. His church eventually accepted the new teachings, and from Stockholm the movement spread to other churches in Sweden. However, the Baptist Convention expelled Pethrus and the congregation in 1913, though the reason was ostensibly their practice of open Communion rather than Pentecostalism.

