Pethrus's congregation, also called the Filadelfia Church, would be the largest Pentecostal church in the world until it was overtaken by several in the Third World, such as the Yoido Full Gospel Church in South Korea. Pethrus founded a number of publishing ventures and a Bible school, and he went on to become the most prominent Pentecostal leader in northern Europe. His Filadelfia Church became the center of the Pentecostal Revival movement (Pingstväckelsen), now the third largest religious group in Sweden. It commissioned missionaries who carried Pentecostalism to Africa and Latin America, where many churches developed under the name Assemblies of God (often confused with the American body of the same name). The Swedish Pentecostal assemblies have, like their American counterpart, evolved as a congregationally governed body.

Pentecostalism spread to Denmark as the result of the efforts of a prominent Danish actress, Anna Larssen (1879–1955). In 1908 she went to Oslo and under Barrett's preaching received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Upon her return to Copenhagen, she began to hold Pentecostal meetings in her large home. She gave up her acting career in 1909 and in 1919 married Sigurd Bjorner, at the time the general secretary of the Danish YMCA. They traveled the country as evangelists, and congregations began to emerge out of their efforts. Then in 1919, while in Sweden, the couple submitted to rebaptism, which led to their exclusion from the Church of Denmark. In 1923 they brought the association of churches that they had raised up into fellowship with the Apostolic Church, headquartered in England. They broke relations with the Apostolic Church in the 1930s, and the fellowship continued as the Pentecostal movement in Denmark (Pinsebevaegelsen).

Pentecostalism would spread to Finland within a few years, and the original groups, called the Pentecostal Revival of Finland (Helluntai Ystväät), were founded in 1911. Finnish Pentecostalism has become distinguished by the large number of missionaries it has commissioned and the exemplary role of women, with more than 600 serving as evangelists. The Finnish annual summer gatherings are year by year the largest Pentecostal events in Scandinavia.

Thomas Barrett introduced Pentecostalism to Iceland in 1920, and additional Swedish and Norwegian evangelists targeted the island through the remainder of the decade. What would become the largest congregation in the country, the Filadelfia Church, was founded in 1936 and has about 600 members. The Pentecostal movement is now the third largest religious group in Iceland.

Besides bringing Pentecostalism to Scandinavia, Thomas Barrett also influenced its emergence in other European countries. Among those who came to Oslo to meet Barrett was Alexander A. Boddy (1854–1930), a British Anglican priest who had been active in the Welsh Revival of 1904. After his 1907 visit, Boddy brought the Pentecostal experience to the United Kingdom and was later active in the formation of the Pentecostal Missionary Union, the first Pentecostal organization in the country. About the same time, two Norwegian women who had become Pentecostals traveled to Kassel, Germany, where they held meetings for the evangelical (Lutheran) congregation headed by Heinrich Dallmeyer. These meetings were widely reported in the press. Dallmeyer at first supported the revival that broke out but later renounced it. In spite of condemnation by Dallmeyer and other evangelical leaders, the revival spread and eventually led to the formation of a spectrum of German Pentecostal groups such as the Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships.

Barrett stands out as the fountainhead of the Pentecostal World Conference. In 1911 he wrote “An Urgent Call for Charity and Unity,” in which he sought a manifestation of the unity of the spreading Pentecostal movement. This call would lead to initial attempts at international fellowship gatherings that culminated in the European Pentecostal Conference held in Stockholm in 1939, on the eve of World War II. The effort led to the holding of the triennial gatherings of the World Pentecostal Conference, beginning in 1946.

Scandinavian countries have regularly taken their turn in hosting the Conference.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Apostolic Church; Mülheim Association of Christian Fellowships; Pentecostal World Fellowship; Pentecostalism; United Methodist Church.

References

- Bloch-Hoell, Nils. The Pentecostal Movement. Oslo: Oslo University Press, 1964.
- Bundy, David D. “Thomas B. Barrett and Byposten: An Early Pentecostal Leader and His Periodical.” In Pentecost, Mission and Ecumenism: Essays on Intercultural Theology, edited by Jan A. B. Jongeneel, 115–122. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1992.
- Burgess, Stanley M., and Eduard M. van der Maas, eds. The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2002.
- Elbert, Paul, ed. Essays on Apostolic Themes. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1985.
- Hollenweger, Walter J. Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide. Peabody, UK: Hendrickson, 1997.
- Lindberg, Alf. “The Swedish Pentecostal Movement: Some Ideological Features.” European Pentecostal Theological Association Journal 6, no. 2 (1987): 40–45.
- Matre, Frank. “A Synopsis of Norwegian Pentecostal History.” European Pentecostal Theological Association Journal 9, nos. 2–3 (1990): 53–62.
- Synan, Vinson. The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001.

People of God

The People of God is an indigenous (and somewhat idiosyncratic) form of Pentecostalism born in Paraguay and now present in several countries. Leonor Paredes (“Brother José,” 1898–1970) was born in Villarica, Paraguay, in 1898. He received the baptism of the Holy Spirit in 1940 and moved to Argentina, where he worked for 20 years as an independent Pentecostal preacher. Following a prophetic warning, in 1963 he returned to Paraguay, where he established the People of God (Pueblo de Dios) community in Repatriación, a village located some 150 miles from the capital city, Asunción. Initially, the community comprised 22 families. Brother José died in 1970; his successor as leading elder was Mariano Bobadilla (“Brother Luke,” 1915–1991), who had converted following a miraculous cure attributed to Brother José’s “key of prayer” in Laguna Blanca, Argentina, in 1946.

Brother Luke’s administration fell during a difficult time for Paraguay, then ruled by dictator General Alfredo Stroessner (1912–2006). The regime regarded the People of God as a “cult,” potentially “Communist” due to its communal structure. Persecution followed, and several leaders, including Brother Luke, were arrested. The group managed to survive, thanks particularly to Carlos Marcial Russo Cantero, a distinguished law professor at the National University in Asunción, lawyer, and politician who not only successfully represented Brother Luke and other leaders in court but was eventually so impressed by their message that he too converted to the People of God. He joined its Santo Domingo Libertador congregation in Lambaré (near Asunción), the largest in the country after the Central Congregation in Repatriación. It was in this same community of Lambaré that Brother Luke died in 1991.

His successor was Severiano Estigarribia (“Brother Elias,” 1931–1995), who managed to obtain legal recognition for the community in Paraguay according to Presidential Decree No. 14336 of July 28, 1992. Brother Elias died unexpectedly in 1995, and Andrés Fretes (“Brother Juan,” b. 1941) was recognized as leading elder in his place. Fretes had been a successful missionary to Brazil, which, together with Argentina, Uruguay, Colombia, and Italy, was the main missionary field for the People of God. In 1996 he supervised the establishment of COPROSA (Cooperativa Multiactiva de Producción, Servicios Públicos, Consumo, Ahorros y Crédito San Andres, Ltda.), a cooperative enterprise that oversees most economic activities of the People of God.

The People of God’s theology is basically Pentecostal, although with some distinctive features. More than the insistence on demons and demonization (not uncommon in contemporary Pentecostalism), what is unique to the People of God is the practice of celibacy by a number of its members, although by no means all. The People of God emphasizes miracles, prophecy, the prophetic value of dreams, and the charismatic mission of Brother José and his successors. An important practice is the “key of prayer,” whereby a prayer is repeated seven times while kneeling, followed by a spiritual conversation with God.

The daily life of the some 5,000 church members living in Repatriación’s Central Congregation includes communal singing, prayer, and work within a strict and rather austere lifestyle, often denounced by critics as “cultic.” The work is mostly agricultural; the congregation grows cotton, corn, sunflowers, and soy beans. The Central Congregation includes schools, from kindergarten to high school, artistic and cultural centers, hospitals, and sports facilities. The leading elder (also called the leading apostle) oversees a hierarchy including 12 elder apostles and 12 lesser apostles; “messengers,” or itinerant teachers, are also sent to the congregations in Paraguay and abroad.

People of God

2a Linea

Irrazabal Norte

Repatriación, Caaguazú

Paraguay

<http://congregacionpueblodedios.blogspot.com/>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Pentecostalism.

Reference

Cardozo Vera, Juan Diosnel. La Verdad sobre el Pueblo de Dios: Su historia, organización y doctrina. Asunción: Pueblo de Dios, 1999.

Peoples Temple

Peoples Temple was a multiracial utopian group that began in Indiana in the 1950s, flourished in California

Portrait of Jim Jones, charismatic leader of the Peoples Temple, a religious community he founded in 1960 in Indianapolis, Indiana. Facing intense controversy, Jones moved the group to a colony in Guyana, South America in 1977 and a year later the community committed mass suicide under his direction. (AP Photo)

in the early 1970s, and developed an agricultural project called Jonestown in Guyana, South America. Espousing a doctrine of “apostolic socialism,” the inter-racial group sought to create an integrated society of justice and equality. It is most known for the 1978 assassination of a California congressman and three reporters on a jungle airstrip, and the murders and suicides of more than 900 persons by ingesting poison-laced fruit punch in their jungle commune.

Led by a charismatic preacher, James “Jim” Warren Jones (1931–1978), Peoples Temple was originally incorporated in 1955 as Wings of Deliverance in Indianapolis, Indiana. An active social outreach ministry and an integrationist message attracted a large inter-racial congregation. A vision of nuclear holocaust prompted Jones to move his family to Brazil in the early 1960s and then to relocate the congregation to northern California in 1965. About 80 members followed Jones to Redwood Valley, where they ran homes for youth with mental disabilities, convalescent centers, and senior care facilities. From there the group evangelized the urban poor in San Francisco, opening a church in the heart of the black ghetto in 1972 and starting a third branch in Los Angeles the same year. The group officially joined the Disciples of Christ (Christian Church) in 1960, and by 1978 it was the largest congregational contributor in the denomination. At its height, the temple claimed to have 20,000 members, but 5,000 is a more realistic estimate. Although Jones preached a social gospel message in a dynamic Pentecostal style that attracted black churchgoers, a small cadre of young white leaders adopted a socialistic philosophy of egalitarianism and communalism.

In 1976 Peoples Temple signed a lease with the government of Guyana, a former British colony on the north coast of South America, to develop 3,852 acres of jungle in the interior. A small group of pioneers had already begun clearing land in 1974 in Guyana’s Northwest District, close to the Venezuelan border. Throughout 1977, large numbers of Peoples Temple members emigrated from the United States and resettled in the Peoples Temple Agricultural Project, which soon became known as Jonestown. The project boasted a school, a library, a furniture-making facility, and a basketball court, as well as a large farm and quarters for livestock. Despite the intensive investment of human labor and financial capital, however, the group was unable to become self-sufficient, and by 1978 it was importing rice and other food to supplement what it produced.

As the church grew in membership and influence in the 1970s, controversies began to grow along with it. Former members described all-night sessions of confession and punishment (called catharsis); gave accounts of phony faith healings and financial misdealing; and claimed that voter fraud, extortion, and even murder had occurred. Opposition to the temple was organized by a group of former members and relatives of members called the Concerned Relatives. This group focused its efforts on a custody battle over John Victor Stoen, the son of Grace Stoen and the presumptive son of Jim Jones, who was living in Jonestown. Throughout 1976, 1977, and 1978, the Concerned Relatives contacted state and federal government agencies, the news media, lawyers, and members of Congress with their fears about what was happening to relatives in Peoples Temple and in Jonestown. The most dramatic report came from former member Deborah Layton (Blakey) in June 1978, who said that residents of Jonestown were conducting suicide drills and planned to die in a collective ritual.

Layton's report prompted the visit of Congressman Leo J. Ryan to Jonestown in November 1978. Accompanied by news reporters and members of the Concerned Relatives, the congressman left Jonestown on November 18 with a generally favorable impression of the community. As he and a group of 15 defectors from Jonestown were preparing to depart from a nearby airstrip, however, a group of Jonestown residents opened fire, killing Ryan, 3 members of the media, and one defector. Back in Jonestown, Jones had assembled the community and, according to a tape made at the time, exhorted his followers to drink a mixture of cyanide, tranquilizers, and fruit punch. Although the tape reveals some opposition to the plan, there was a general consensus to go forward with the "revolutionary suicide," which would send the message that people would rather die than live in a capitalistic system. In all, 918 people died on November 18, 1978: 5 people at the airstrip, 909 in Jonestown, and 4 in Georgetown, Guyana, where a mother killed her 3 children and herself.

Questions remain about the deaths, including the extent to which coercion was involved and whether U.S. officials provoked the incident. A body of conspiracy theories has arisen to explain various gaps and discrepancies in the official story. The release of currently classified government documents may answer some questions, but the ultimate mystery will remain: How could people be persuaded to kill their parents and their children?

Rebecca Moore

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ).

References

"Alternative Considerations of Jonestown and Peoples Temple." Website sponsored by the Religious Studies Department at San Diego State University. <http://jonestown.sdsu.edu/>. Accessed January 15, 2009.

Hall, John R. Gone from the Promised Land:

Jonestown in American Cultural History. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 1987, 2004.

Moore, Rebecca. Understanding Jonestown and Peoples Temple. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2009.

Reiterman, Tim, with John Jacobs. Raven: The Untold Story of The Rev. Jim Jones and His People. New York: Dutton, 1982, 2008.

Stephenson, Denice. Dear People: Remembering Jonestown. San Francisco and Berkeley: California Historical Society and Heyday Books, 2005.

Perennialism

Perennialism is a historically self-conscious perspective that emerged among modern exponents of Western Esoteric thought. It is most identified with thinkers from the Traditionalist school of thought, such as René Guenon (1886–1951), Frithjof Schuon (1907–1998), Julius (Giulio) Evola (1898–1974), and Seyyed Hosseyn Nasr (b. 1933).

The perennial philosophy emerged during the Renaissance period, although there is evidence that the thoughts associated with the philosophy existed prior to this period. The term "philosophia perennis" was first used in the work of Augustinus Steuchius (1497–1548), a theologian and librarian of the Vatican, by Gottfried Leibniz (1646–1716), a German mathematician and philosopher. The coining of the term "perennial philosophy," however, is often attributed to Leibniz, as he was the first to use the term to connote a universal set of underlying truths common to all religions and the mystical elements associated with them. The term has since surfaced among various schools of thought. Scholasticism, a form of Christian philosophy and theology that flourished during the medieval period of European history, experienced a revival in the 16th century after a period of dormancy following the Middle Ages. Proponents of Scholasticism asserted a system founded on the notion of the perennial philosophy that attempted to integrate ideas from classical Roman and Greek writings, Christian scripture, and the writings of the patristic fathers preceding the medieval period. Aristotle's and Plato's views were also important in the formation of the system of the Scholastics.

The Traditionalists, initiated by René Guenon (1886–1951), also ascribe to philosophy of perennialism. The Traditionalists, however, assert that only the major world religious traditions are pathways to attaining an understanding of the transcendent source of reality. It is only through these religions that unity with the transcendent source may be achieved. Further, the Traditionalists believe that it is not the external structure and dogmatism of the religions that enable unity with the transcendent source. Rather, they believe that it is the inner mystical core of the major religions that rare individuals are able to acknowledge and comprehend that enables this unity. The Traditionalists assert that while there are many religions, only the major traditions contain all of the necessary elements to attain unity with the transcendent source while many new religious movements lead away from the transcendent source. The notion that there are many paths that lead to the summit of a mountain is an analogy used to describe the major religions as paths to the transcendent source. Religions that do not contain the necessary elements to reach the summit are envisioned by the Traditionalists as leading followers around and around the base of the mountain in circles. Thus, the Traditionalists believe in an elitist hierarchical system that designates the ability to achieve this unity.

The central tenets upon which the perennial philosophy rests require the ability to acknowledge a force, a transcendent source, beyond our human presence. The major world religions vary in their approaches in acknowledging this transcendent source. In the Abrahamic religions (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam) the transcendent source is called God. Religions such as Buddhism and Daoism portray the transcendent source quite differently, as they are non-theistic. Hinduism encompasses a variety of deities depicting various aspects of the transcendent source.

The tenets central to perennialism are based on the notion that there are universal truths that most religions are founded upon. Proponents of the perennial philosophy posit that our understandings of reality, the world, and the meaning and purpose of existence reveal commonalities across cultures and time, despite cultural and social variations of the presentation and perceptions of these truths. These truths are believed to be revealed by a transcendent source of Reality that we will never fully be able to know. The social and cultural variations of each religion are believed to reflect the many variations of the elements of the transcendent source and our different perceptions of this source. The world and our understanding of the world are only partial reflections of the transcendent source. Proponents of perennialism believe that all humans have the capacity to intuit the transcendent source, excluding the Traditionalists who believe this ability is available only to an elite few. While perennialists believe the fullness of reality and the transcendent source to be incomprehensible to humankind, cultivating our understanding of reality, the world, and achieving unity with the transcendent source is believed to be the ultimate purpose of our existence.

Wendy Mason

See also: Buddhism; Evola, Giulio; Hinduism; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Guenon, René. The Crisis of the Modern World. Hillsdale, NY: Sophia Perennis, 2004.
- Huxley, Aldous. The Perennial Philosophy. New York: Harper and Row, 1945.
- Lings, Martin, and Clinton Minaar. The Underlying Religion: An Introduction to the Perennial Philosophy. World Wisdom, 2007.
- Nasr, Seyyed Hosseyn. Religion and the Order of Nature. London: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Schuon, Frithjof. The Transcendent Unity of Religions. Rev. ed. Wheaton, IL: Theosophical Publishing House, 1993.
- Smith, Huston. The World's Religions: Our Great Wisdom Traditions. HarperOne. 1991.
- Toynton, G. Primordial Traditions Compendium 2009. Oxford: Twin Serpents Ltd., 2009.

Perfect Liberty Kyodan

Perfect Liberty Kyodan was founded in Japan in 1946, although its teachings reach back to 1912, when Toku-mitsu Kanada (1863–1919) founded Shinto Tokumitsu-Ko (the Divine Way), drawing on elements from both Shinto and Shingon Buddhism. He incorporated an emphasis on art and nature as well as a healing ritual called Ofurikae (the power of temporarily curing illness). Among those who received the benefits of this healing work was Miki Tokuharu (1871–1938), who joined Kanada’s movement and became a fervent disciple.

In the period immediately prior to his death in the early 1920s, Kanada urged Tokuharu to pray that the remaining precepts of the religion be revealed to him, and after receiving the revelation, to found a new organization that incorporated them. Tokuharu followed his teacher’s urging and in 1924 founded Tokumitsu Kyokai (in 1931 changing the name to Hitonomichi Kyokai).

In 1937, as World War II began, the Japanese government ordered Tokuharu to disband his religion, which conflicted with official Shinto beliefs at several points. Shortly thereafter, both Tokuharu and his son Miki Tokuchita (1900–1983) were arrested. Upon their release they revived and reorganized the religion under the name of Perfect Liberty Kyodan, or Church of Perfect Liberty. Observers have noticed that of all the new Japanese religions to emerge after World War II, only this one chose to be known by an English name.

The basic perspective of the church is simple. It advises members to create a way of living that embodies the precept “life is art.” The accomplishment of this way of living is a state of “perfect liberty,” or total mental freedom. Such a life is characterized by creativity, balance, and aesthetic expression on both a personal and a social level. The way to freedom is summarized in the Twenty-One Precepts and Twenty-One Principles received by Kanada and Tokuharu. The artistic life finds expression in the asamairi, a morning service in which the pledge to the artistic life is renewed. August 1, Founder’s Day, is the church’s major annual holiday, celebrated with massive displays of art in its various forms.

Perfect Liberty headquarters are located in Osaka, Japan. Nearby in the Habikino Hills is the 590-foot Perfect Liberty Peace Tower, memorializing those who have died as a result of war. The movement reports some 500 centers and 1 million members in Japan.

Churches are also found in the United States, Canada, Brazil, Paraguay, Argentina, Peru, France, and Australia. By far the largest overseas community (350,000) is found in Brazil.

Perfect Liberty Kyodan
2172-1 Shindou
Tondabayashi, Osaka 584-8651
Japan
<http://web.perfect-liberty.or.jp/>

J. Gordon Melton

References

- Bach, Marcus. The Power of Perfect Liberty. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1971.
- Clarke, Peter. A Bibliography of Japanese New Religious Movements with Annotations and an Introduction to Japanese New Religions at Home and Abroad. Richmond, Surrey, UK: Japan Library, 1999.
- Perfect Liberty: Guide to Perfect Liberty*. Glendale, CA: PL North American Headquarters, 1975.

■ Peru

Peru is located in western South America, bordered by the Pacific Ocean to the west, Chile to the south, Ecuador to the north, and Colombia, Brazil, and Bolivia to the east. The former home of the pre-Columbian Inca Empire, modern Peru includes 494,000 square miles of territory. The country has a varied geography divided by the Andean highlands in the center, the dry western coastal lowlands, and the eastern tropical lowlands, which are headwaters of the Amazon River. The total population of Peru (2007 census) was 29 million, making it the fourth most populous country in South America.

Racially, the population was classified as 45 percent Amerindian, 37 percent mestizo (mixed Amerindian and European), 15 percent white, and 3 percent black, Japanese, Chinese, and other races. Peru’s official languages are Spanish and, according to the Peruvian Constitution of 1993, the various Amerindian languages (such as Quechua, Aymara, and others) in areas where they are dominant. Spanish is spoken as the first language of 83.9 percent of Peruvians (over age 5) and Quechua is spoken by 13.2 percent of the population, followed by Aymara. Ninety-two languages are spoken in Peru, and in the Amazonian region alone there are 16 ethnolinguistic families and more than 65 distinct ethnic groups.

Peru is a multi-ethnic nation formed by a combination of different groups during the last five centuries. The Amerindian population decreased from an estimated 9 million in the 1520s to around 600,000 in 1620 due to warfare and infectious diseases. During Spanish colonial rule, Spaniards intermarried with Amerindian and African women, which produced new generations of mestizo and mulatto children. After independence on July 15, 1821, there was gradual immigration to Venezuela from England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain, followed by Chinese contract-laborers beginning in the 1850s and Japanese farmers in the 1890s. The Chinese and Japanese minorities have become a major influence in Peruvian society.

The 1993 Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and other laws and policies contributed to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors.

Article 50 of the 1993 Constitution establishes separation of church and state but recognizes the Catholic Church's role as "an important element in the historical, cultural, and moral development of the nation." The government acts independently of Catholic Church policy; however, it maintains a close relationship with the Catholic Church, and an agreement signed with the Vatican in 1980 grants the Catholic Church special status.

According to the 2007 Peruvian national census, religious affiliation was determined to be Roman Catholic 81.3 percent, Protestant-evangelical 12.5 percent, other religions 3.3 percent, and unspecified or none 2.9 percent. By comparison, the 1993 census reported the following: Roman Catholic 89.0 percent; Protestant-evangelical 6.7 percent; other religions 2.8 percent; and unspecified or none 1.4 percent. The decline in Roman Catholic adherents by 7.7 percent, and the increase in Protestant-evangelical adherents by 5.8 percent, is a significant shift in religious affiliation; the number of Protestant adherents increased by 87 percent in 14 years.

The land now demarcated as the nation of Peru has been inhabited for several millennia by various peoples; however, in the 12th century CE, a new empire arose out of the Peruvian highlands around Cuzco and began a process of unifying the inhabitants not only of Peru but also of neighboring regions in the Andes Mountains to the north (Ecuador and Colombia) and the south (Bolivia, Chile and Argentina). Similarities still shared by the Amerindian peoples of Peru are in part accounted for by the dominance of the Incan culture until the arrival of the Spanish Conquistadors in 1524.

When Francisco Pizarro (ca. 1475–1541) and his small army (just 180 men and 37 horses) reached Cajamarca, the capital of the Inca Empire located in the northern highlands, the Incas were in the midst of a leadership dispute, a fact that Pizarro utilized quickly to conquer the Incas during 1532–1537.

The Spanish Viceroyalty of Peru was established in 1542, but it took the next two centuries to completely pacify the lands due to Amerindian resistance. During the height of its importance, the Spanish Viceroyalty of Peru included much of South America apart from Brazil. It would be restructured by the creation of the Viceroyalty of New Granada (1717) in Bogotá (with jurisdiction over modern Panama, Colombia, Ecuador, and Venezuela) and the Viceroyalty of Rio de la Plata (1776) at Buenos Aires (with jurisdiction over present-day Argentina, Bolivia, Paraguay, and Uruguay). For nearly three centuries, Peru was ruled by viceroys, representatives of the king of Spain, who were vested with almost absolute power (including being the vice patron of the Catholic Church).

A parallel cultural development began in Peru as a result of the confrontation between the Spanish and the Amerindian inhabitants. The Inca language and cosmology were important elements of the Amerindian civilization in Peru when the Quechuas and other ethnolinguistic groups resisted colonization and Christianization by the Spaniards. The Quechua cultural strategy for survival in the aftermath of the Spanish conquest was based on adaptation, resistance, and exchange; it also led to the internal development of Quechua self-identity. In this process Spanish-European elements were incorporated into Quechua culture.

K'achampa dancers performing in the Fiesta Pentecostes in the Inca village of Ollantaytambo (Sacred Valley), Peru. (Rfoxphoto/Dreamstime.com)

The parallel development of Hispanic culture and society in Peru was initiated by the Spanish colonial government, which established its headquarters in Lima on the Pacific Coast, not in Cuzco in the central highlands in southern Peru where the capital of the Inca Empire was located. Citizens of Spanish descent (the colonizers) were considered to be members of the Spanish nation, while the population of Amerindian descent was considered part of the (colonized) indigenous nation. The members of these separate “nations” had different obligations to the Spanish Crown.

The country’s first accurate census (1791) showed the impact of Hispanic dominance over the Amerindians: the total population had declined to slightly more than 1 million, including Europeans, people of mixed ancestry (mestizos and mulattos), and black slaves. After independence in 1821, the nation’s population gradually increased, mainly as a result of high birth rates. By the mid-1960s, the population of Peru was about the same as at the height of the Incan civilization—in other words, it took more than 300 years to replace the population lost in the first century of Spanish domination.

The institution of slavery began in Peru in 1524. During the course of the slave trade, approximately 95,000 Africans were brought to Peru, with the last group arriving in 1850. Slaves were purchased in Panama or Colombia and transported to Peru.

The ruling Spanish and criollo (Peruvian-born of pure Spanish ancestry) elite resisted any changes that would affect their economic and political situation negatively, and only after Simón Bolívar (1783–1830) and José de San Martín (1778–1850) combined their armies (composed of Chileans, Argentines, and various soldiers of fortune) and marched on the country in 1824 were the Spanish colonial authorities driven out.

During 1810–1824, Peru achieved independence and created a new republican nation in which, at a theoretical level, the separate nations of Spanish and Amerindian would become integrated. In reality, the division between these two “nations” was maintained, but within a new social and political order. The population of Indians, mestizos, and descendants of African slaves constituted the marginalized sectors of Peruvian society, while the white Spanish population enjoyed all the privileges of higher status. At the same time, the several Constitutions adopted by Peru between 1824 and 1911 recognized Roman Catholicism as the official religion with the exclusion of any other.

The modern state of Peru was largely the product of Ramón Castilla y Marquesado (r. 1844–1863), the four-time president of Peru. Castilla’s second presidency was marked by the liberation of slaves and indigenous Peruvians, a new postal system, and a new Constitution (1860), which concentrated power in the hands of the president.

The Peruvian census of 1876 estimated the total number of inhabitants at 2,676,000. In 1906, it was estimated that the population had increased to 3,547,829. Of this total, 50 percent were Amerindians; 15 percent were whites, mostly Spanish descendants; 3 percent were black; 1 percent was Chinese and Japanese; and the remaining 31 percent were the offspring of different races (mestizos and mulattos).

The War of the Pacific (aka the Saltpeter War, 1879–1884), an armed conflict between Chile and the joint forces of Bolivia and Peru, centered on controlling substantial mineral-rich deposits in the Atacama Desert. Chile’s victory led to the annexation of the Peruvian territories of Tarapaca and Arica, and Bolivia became a landlocked country. The price of recovery for Peru was an influx of British financial investment and control.

After World War II (1939–1945), Peru’s mineral industry blossomed under the Mining Code of 1950, due primarily to sizable foreign investments, but also due to the development of the local medium-sized mining industry. Extensive exploration led to the discovery and development of many ore deposits. However, Peru’s mining development slowed drastically after 1968 as a consequence of the nationalization of foreign enterprises, more restrictive mining regulations, and the emergence of terrorism against foreign-owned companies.

The development of democratic government in Peru has been thwarted by the military on several occasions. The return to civilian government in 1978 was followed by regular democratic elections through 1990. However, President Alberto Ken’ya Fujimori (1990–2000), a Japanese Peruvian (b. 1938 in Lima) elected in 1990, abolished Congress in 1992, in what was termed a “self-coup,” while announcing that he would return to more democratic rule after the country’s economic conditions improved. During Fujimori’s first term in office, more leftist parties remained in control of both chambers of Congress, which hampered his ability to enact economic reforms and became an obstacle to combating the Maoist guerrilla organization Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso). In April 1992, President Fujimori, with the support of the Peruvian military, carried out a presidential coup, called a Fujigolpe. He shut down Congress, suspended the Constitution, and purged the judiciary of his opponents. Not only was the coup itself marked by favorable public opinion in several independent polls, but also public approval of the Fujimori administration jumped significantly in the wake of the self-coup. On April 7, 2009, he was convicted of human rights violations and sentenced to 25 years in prison by a three-judge panel. On July 20, 2009, a Peruvian court sentenced him to an additional 7 years for embezzlement.

The Roman Catholic Church The Spanish introduced Catholicism to Peru when they arrived in the 1520s. The initial diocese was erected at Cuzco in 1536, and the Diocese of Lima was established five years later, in 1541. Both of these dioceses were under the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan See of Seville, Spain. In 1546, the Diocese of Lima was elevated by Pope Paul III (r. 1534–1549) to the controlling metropolitan see (archdiocese) for the Pacific Coast of the Americas, between Costa Rica to the north and Chile to the south, which was under the Viceroyalty of Lima.

After completing the conquest of Peru in 1534, Pizarro appointed Father Vincente Valverde (1490–1543) as bishop of Cuzco and his jurisdiction extended over the whole territory of the newly conquered domain. Valverde was one of five Dominicans who accompanied the conqueror from Spain. After taking Cuzco, the capital of the Inca Empire, Pizarro established a municipal government (cabildo) in Cuzco and encouraged its settlement by Spaniards by providing liberal land grants. In September 1538, Bishop Valverde laid the foundations of the cathedral in Cuzco, and later a Dominican monastery was erected on the site of the Inca Temple of the Sun. Also, a nunnery was established, and several churches and other monasteries built in Cuzco.

Besides the priests that Pizarro was required to take with him from Spain to Peru in his own vessels, the succeeding ships brought additional missionaries, who devoted themselves to the task of “converting the natives.” The Dominicans, the Brothers of Mercy, and other missionary orders became actively engaged in propagating the Catholic faith among the Amerindians. The Franciscans were among the pioneer missionaries of Peru, and their labors reached to the remotest regions of South America. The Order of Saint Augustine is also prominent in the annals of Peruvian church history; the Church of Our Lady of Mercy is one of the most attractive Catholic churches constructed in Lima. In 1567, at the request of King Philip II, the first Jesuits were sent to Peru. The Jesuits built a convent, a seminary, and a church in Lima; and then they built churches and schools throughout Peru. However, the work of the Jesuits came to an abrupt end after King Charles III ordered their expulsion from the Spanish colonies in 1769.

Francisco de Toledo y Figueroa, the fifth viceroy of Peru (1569–1581), established in Lima the Permanent Tribunal of the Holy Office of the Inquisition in 1570, which was not abolished until 1820. The Inquisition, as an ecclesiastical tribunal, had jurisdiction only over baptized Christians. It was welcomed by conscientious bishops and viceroys who considered heresy a cardinal sin and the condoning of doctrinal error as an affront to God. This included those who practiced forms of Christianity other than Catholicism, and at the time were considered heretics by the Catholic Church in Spanish kingdoms. In general, the Spanish Inquisition sought to ensure the orthodoxy of recent converts, especially those Jews, Muslims, and others coerced on pain of death to adopt the Christian religion. In the Americas, the Inquisition became a sort of police court for tracking down bigamists, robbers, seducers of youth, and other undesirable people as well as heretics.

The Inquisition was mainly used to judge non-indigenous people who were accused of crimes against the church. These crimes included heresy, sorcery, witchcraft, and other superstitious practices. People accused of these crimes were generally from the lower status of Peruvian society. Among them were individuals of African descent, mestizos, and women, as well as Jewish or Protestant Europeans who were discovered in the Spanish colonies and considered heretics. However, during the 250 years of the Inquisition in South America, only 30 people were actually burned at the stake in Lima, although thousands of people were arrested and brought before the Tribunal. Torture was often used to extract confessions from the unfortunate ones who were imprisoned in the dungeons of the Inquisition in Lima.

Peru became an independent republic in 1824, but it was not until the 1867 Constitution that Roman Catholicism became the official state religion. The Catholic Church continued its hegemony over religion throughout the 20th century. It has been a conservative body, both religiously and politically, although amid the changes in the decades after World War II, it developed a noteworthy stance against a series of oppressive authoritarian governments that ruled Peru and neighboring countries.

Diverse tensions arose within the Peruvian Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, resulting from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the General Conference of Latin American Bishops in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal. These new movements polarized Catholic bishops, parish priests, religious workers, and the laity into various factions: traditionalists, who wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council; reformers, who supported the church’s modern stance; progressives, who sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Peruvian society and establishing social justice through peaceful democratic means; radicals, who adopted Liberation

PERU

Theology, based on Marxist ideology, and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the oligarchy and creating a socialist state that would serve the marginalized masses; and charismatic agents (priests, nuns, and lay members), who sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”).

The social and ecclesial context of Peru witnessed the emergence of the first clear articulation of Liberation Theology, as well as the backlash against that theology represented by the Catholic right-wing organization Sodalitium Vitae. All of this occurred in a broader political context disrupted by the violent tactics of the Maoist Shining Path guerrilla movement and the attempts of the Peruvian government to counter those tactics, to the point of violating the human rights of ordinary citizens not connected with the guerrilla movement. The so-called theology of reconciliation, developed by the founder of Sodalitium Vitae, was an attempt by conservatives to undermine the religious and political implications of Liberation Theology by linking it, falsely, with the Shining Path revolutionaries.

Among the many books and articles published on Liberation Theology in the 1970s, one of the most famous was written by a Peruvian Dominican priest, Gustavo Gutiérrez. In his groundbreaking book, A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics, Salvation (1971), Gutiérrez (b. 1928), now a professor at the University of Notre Dame in the United States, theorized that a combination of Marxist and Catholic social teachings had contributed to a socialist current within the Catholic Church. However, the Latin American bishops never supported Liberation Theology, which has also been frowned on by the Vatican. Top Catholic officials tried to slow its spread as it was considered antithetical to the Catholic Church’s global teachings.

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement, which began in Peru in 1970, is one of many ecclesiastical movements that form part of the Episcopal Commission of the Apostolic Laity of the Peruvian Episcopal Conference. The movement did not enjoy the same success it has had in other countries, however. According to a 2007 report, nationally, there were only 23,500 active participants.

During the 1990s, conservative Catholic priests, missionary brothers, and missionary sisters suffered persecution throughout Peru from the Shining Path, a Marxist guerrilla organization. Foreign-born priests and nuns were taking the brunt of the attacks against the Catholic Church. The Shining Path opposed the church’s many benevolent social improvement activities, as they tended to lessen revolutionary fervor.

President Fujimori put harsh anti-terrorist legislation in place to curb the violence of several leftist guerrilla groups throughout the 1980s and 1990s. Action to suppress the terrorists, however, affected hundreds of innocent men and women who were arrested, tortured, and sentenced to lengthy prison terms. Only a decade later were these convictions reviewed and the innocent pardoned.

Although Peru is considered overwhelmingly Catholic (81.3 percent in 2007), the church has suffered from an inability to recruit Peruvian priests since the 1960s. For example, the Archdiocese of Lima reported a total of 817 priests in 1970 and 613 in 2004; although the number of religious brothers increased from 933 in 1970 to 1,136 in 2004, the number of female religious (nuns) declined from 2,435 in 1970 to 1,755 in 2004. This decline in pastoral leadership and services has had a direct impact on the vitality of the Peruvian Catholic Church, which currently has a very low level of participation of its nominal membership. The Episcopal Commission for Social Action, a Catholic NGO, estimated that only about 5 percent of Peruvian Catholics regularly attend Mass.

In 2004, the Peruvian Catholic Church reported 7 archdioceses and 37 dioceses with 1,426 parishes, which were served by 2,472 priests (1,401 diocesan and 1,071 religious) and assisted by 47 permanent deacons, 2,195 male religious workers, and 5,156 female religious workers. The current archbishop of Lima, Cardinal Juan Luis Cipriani Thorne (ordained a priest of Opus Dei in 1977), was appointed in 1999 and named cardinal in 2001.

The Protestant Movement Between 1822 and 1888, the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) and the American Bible Society (ABS) engaged in sporadic pioneer efforts to distribute the scriptures in Peru. James Thomson (1788–1854), a Baptist pastor from Edinburgh, arrived in Lima in 1822 as a joint representative of the British and Foreign School Society (Lancastrian system of education) and the BFBS as a colporteur. He was invited to Peru by the Liberator José de San Martín for the purpose of establishing the first schools to provide general education for all classes with government sponsorship. Three schools were established by Thomson prior to September 1824 and 30 more were established before 1847 by Peruvians trained by Thomson.

Protestants were allowed to worship in Peru throughout the 19th century, but they were not allowed to proselytize. Members of the Church of England (now a part of the Anglican Province of the Southern Cone) began work in Peru in 1849 under these conditions by establishing chaplaincies among foreign residents in Lima and the port of Callao.

During 1859–1860, A. J. Duffield, an agent of the BFBS, operated out of Lima to supply Bibles, New Testaments, and scripture portions to colporteurs scattered among the nations on the Pacific Coast of South America. By July 1859, his sales in the capital and the interior reached 3,740 copies. Up to that date, the aggregate of scriptures provided to the agency amounted to 52,931 volumes.

In 1859, the American Seamen's Friend Society of New York City sent Methodist minister G. A. Swaney to Callao as a chaplain to merchant seamen and foreign residents, but he only stayed for a few years. In 1877, Methodist laymen William and Archibald Taylor arrived in Callao looking for opportunities to establish a self-supporting mission using the Lancastrian system of education, but both left the country after less than a year to seek better opportunities elsewhere.

Between 1884 and 1886, private religious services were held, in both English and Spanish, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Peterson (Swedish Lutherans) in Callao for foreign residents and visitors who were non-Conformists (non-Anglicans). One of the leaders of this small congregation was a Christian Brethren layman.

In 1888, an Italian-Uruguayan Methodist layman, Francisco G. Penzotti, established the Peruvian Bible Society in Callao (affiliated with the ABS), aided by another Uruguayan ABS colporteur, J. B. Arancet.

Penzotti actively engaged in preaching and evangelism wherever and whenever there was opportunity, such as in Callao at the Peterson home among foreign residents. However, Penzotti's activities were soon brought to the attention of the civil authorities, which led to his arrest and imprisonment for eight months during 1890–1891 for illegally conducting non-Catholic religious meetings.

When news of his plight reached the evangelical public in Europe and North America, there was a spontaneous response by some evangelical leaders to begin training and sending missionaries to Peru and other South American countries, which were perceived to be in "spiritual darkness" due to paganism among the Amerindians and idolatry among adherents to "popular Catholicism" among the Spanish-speaking population.

Penzotti's efforts resulted in the organization of a Methodist congregation in Callao with 31 members and 95 probationers in 1890. In 1891, the Methodist Episcopal Church Board of Foreign Missions sent the Reverend and Mrs. Thomas B. Wood to Peru to take over Penzotti's work in Lima-Callao so that he could continue his work elsewhere. Wood and his assistants were active in the distribution of the scriptures with assistance from the ABS. The Methodists also began establishing schools for Peruvians. The Woods remained in Peru until 1912. By 1914, there were 12 Methodist churches with 1,072 members and probationers in Peru.

In 1893, a congregation was established in barrio Chucuito de Callao by a Scottish Christian Brethren layman, Charles H. Bright, who built on the earlier work begun in the Petersons' home among non-Conformists. One of the first converts was Alfonso Muñoz, who later became an early leader in the Peruvian Evangelical Church (IEP).

In 1894, three young Englishmen arrived independently in Peru who had graduated from the Harley Bible and Missionary Training College in London, founded by Henry Grattan Guinness, who had also founded the Regions Beyond Missionary Union (RBMU) in 1898. Adam Robert Stark, John L. Jarrett, and Frederick J. Peters laid the foundations for RBMU's work in Lima, Cusco, and Trujillo; in 1911, the RBMU became part of the Evangelical Union of

South America (EUSA). The EUSA merged with World Team (formerly known as the West Indies Mission) in 1995.

In April 1896, Bright established a congregation on Calle Negreiros in Lima, which is considered the birthplace of the IEP. In 1906, John Ritchie, a Scottish Presbyterian, arrived in Peru under the sponsorship of the RBMU. Ritchie was assigned by the RBMU to work at the independent congregation on Calle Negreiros. At the beginning of 1920, at least 25 congregations had been formed in the highlands in connection with the Calle Negreiros church, and by the middle of 1924 the number of congregations had increased to 44.

In 1919, the first synod was held in Lima and a second synod was held at Muquiyauyo. The name Iglesia Evangélica Peruana (IEP) was approved at the later synod, along with a simple constitution based on Presbyterian polity. The IEP later became a cooperative venture between the EUSA, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, and the Presbyterians.

Additional Protestant groups arrived in the 1890s, including the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which was successful among the Aymara people in the Lake Titicaca region of southern Peru. In 1967, the Adventists reported almost 30,000 adherents among whom the Aymara people movement accounted for 50 percent. There have also been several schismatic movements among the Seventh-day Adventists. The largest of the independent groups is known as the Israelites of the New Universal Covenant, in both Peru and Bolivia, whose prophets wear long beards and white robes imitating the Aaronic priesthood of the Old Testament. Another group is called the Reformed Adventists.

Between 1900 and 1940, a host of additional denominations and mission agencies began to operate in Peru, including the Pilgrim Holiness Church (later affiliated with Wesleyan Church World Missions), the Church of the Nazarene (1914), the Free Church of Scotland (1915, Presbyterian), the Young Men's Christian Association (1921), the South American Mission (1921), the Association of Baptists for World Evangelization (1929), the Independent Board of Presbyterian Foreign Missions (1935), Baptist Faith Missions (1935), the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (1936), and Baptist Mid-Missions. In October 1915, Congress modified the Constitution in a way that opened the door to allow freedom of religion and worship, with certain restrictions not removed until 1933.

Early independent Pentecostal work began in Callao and Lima by Mr. and Mrs. Hubert W. Cragin, who only stayed eight months. They worked in Ecuador and Bolivia until 1925, when, now affiliated with the Assemblies of God, they returned to Peru. The Assemblies of God had first entered Peru in 1919 with the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Barker and J. Ramon Hurlburt who began missionary work in Macate de Ancash. In 1991, the Assemblies reported 1,511 churches with 75,833 members and 204,750 adherents, and at that time it was one of the largest Protestant and Free church groups in the country. Pentecostal growth was further accelerated in Peru by the arrival of a variety of other Pentecostal denominations.

In late 1940, facing the possibility that many missionaries might have to be withdrawn from Peru due to the hostilities of World War II, the National Evangelical Council of Peru (CONEP) was founded, composed of the following groups: the Christian and Missionary Alliance, the Church of the Nazarene, the Evangelical Union of South America, the Peruvian Evangelical Church, the Methodist Church, the Free Church of Scotland, the Peruvian Inland Mission, the Irish Baptist Church, the Assemblies of God, the American Bible Society, and the British and Foreign Bible Society. CONEP soon became the victim of a split, however, between evangelicals who were predominately focused on missionary activity, and members of older Protestant denominations who were interested in building stronger ecumenical relationships. The fundamentalist Independent Board of Presbyterian Foreign Missions (IBPFM), related to Dr. Carl McIntire (1906–2002) and the International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC), arrived in Peru in 1936 and cooperated with the IEP. It rejected CONEP, however, as it was strongly opposed to the ecumenical movement and the World Council of Churches. The IBPFM severed its ties to the IEP in 1944 and began to work independently. The Christian and Missionary Alliance withdrew from CONEP in 1954.

In spite of the loss of a few members, CONEP has steadily expanded its membership since its founding in 1940. In March 2009, it reported a total of 105

Peru

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	12,933,000	27,866,000	96.4	1.22	32,630,000	36,838,000
Roman Catholics	12,889,000	27,331,000	94.6	1.15	31,669,000	34,947,000
Protestants	295,000	2,250,000	7.8	4.82	3,300,000	4,300,000
Independents	68,400	1,300,000	4.5	2.93	1,800,000	2,300,000
Ethnoreligionists	160,000	385,000	1.3	1.24	400,000	380,000
Agnostics	39,000	350,000	1.2	1.23	700,000	1,250,000
New religionists	6,000	94,000	0.3	1.23	140,000	195,000
Buddhists	20,000	70,400	0.2	1.23	100,000	150,000
Atheists	12,800	55,300	0.2	5.00	75,000	100,000
Baha'is	13,500	42,800	0.1	1.23	65,000	90,000
Chinese folk	3,000	19,500	0.1	1.23	24,000	28,000
Jews	5,000	10,500	0.0	1.22	13,000	15,000
Muslims	300	800	0.0	1.21	1,500	2,500
Total population	13,193,000	28,894,000	100.0	1.23	34,148,000	39,049,000

member organizations. During the military regime of Velasco Alvarado (1968–1972), legislation was passed that required foreign missionaries and local congregations to be affiliated with a legally incorporated religious organization in Peru. As CONEP was able to provide this kind of legal status, many organizations affiliated with it. CONEP also assisted missionaries in obtaining legal residence to work in the country, exoneration from paying taxes on donations received from foreign sources, and letters of presentation that certified their membership in CONEP.

During the 1940s and 1950s, six additional mission boards began work in Peru. Seven North American mission agencies began work in Peru during the 1960s, 4 more during the 1970s, 10 more during the 1980s, and 7 more during the 1990s.

Overall, since 1960, the Protestant community has grown significantly. PROLADES (Programa Latinoamericano de Estudios Sociorreligiosos) estimated that the largest Protestant denominations in Peru in 2000 were the following, based on baptized church membership: (1) Assemblies of God, 265,000; (2) Seventh-day Adventist Church, 252,000; (3) Peruvian Evangelical Church (IEP), 80,200; (4) Evangelical Pentecostal Missionary Church, 31,600; (5) Christian and Missionary Alliance, 27,000; (6) Church of the Nazarene, 24,900; (7) Worldwide Missionary Movement, 18,500; (8) Evangelical Presbyterian-Reformed Church, 15,000;

(9) Independent Evangelical Pentecostal Church, 12,700; and the (10) Southern Baptist Convention, 10,400.

In 2000, the largest 25 Protestant denominations in Peru represented 822,990 baptized church members and approximately 2.1 million Protestant adherents, while the total Protestant population was estimated at 3.1 million in 2000, or 12.0 percent of the total national population of 26.1 million.

Many pastors and lay leaders of organizations that are members of CONEP are also affiliated with the Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA), which is associated with the World Evangelical Fellowship. The Methodist Church of Peru is the only denomination headquartered in Peru that is a member of the World Council of Churches (WCC). However, the membership of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), which is affiliated with the WCC, includes the following organizations in Peru: Iglesia Evangélica de los Peregrinos del Perú (Pilgrim Holiness), Diócesis Anglicana del Perú, Iglesia Evangélica Luterana de Habla Alemana, Iglesia Luterana Evangélica Peruana, and the Iglesia Metodista del Perú.

Other Christian Groups The only known Eastern Orthodox jurisdiction in Peru is the Greek Orthodox Church (Iglesia Ortodoxa de la Santísima Trinidad) in Pueblo Libre de Lima, affiliated with the Arquidiócesis

Ortodoxa Griega de Buenos Aires y Exarca de Sudamérica, with headquarters in Buenos Aires, Argentina, which is under the broader jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate. This archdiocese covers Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, and Uruguay. The Orthodox community in Peru includes immigrants from Greece, Russia, Romania, and Palestine, as well as Peruvian converts to Eastern Orthodoxy.

A variety of non-Protestant Christian groups exists in Peru today, including the following: the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons, founded in 1956; reported 1 temple and 751 churches with 462,353 adherents in 2008), Jehovah's Witnesses (1,136 churches with 105,422 members and 314,735 adherents in 2008), the Worldwide Church of God, the Philadelphia Church of God, the Light of the World Church (from Mexico), the Voice of the Corner Stone (from Puerto Rico), and Growing in Grace International Ministries (Miami, Florida).

In addition, the Evangelical Association of the Israelite Mission of the New Universal Covenant (AEMINPU) is considered a New Religious movement; it was officially founded in 1968 by Ezekiel Ataucusi Gamonal in Lima, and there was some initial influence on the founder while an active member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, although the beliefs and practices of this new movement are more in harmony with Pentecostalism, with an emphasis on signs and wonders, speaking in tongues, prophecy, faith healing, and ecstatic experiences. In 1985, there were an estimated 80,000 AEMINPU adherents in Peru. Also, there are several offshoots of this movement in various parts of Peru and Bolivia.

Additional Religious Groups Non-Christian religions include Judaism, Baha'is, Muslims, Hindus, and Buddhism (especially among the Chinese and Japanese populations). The Jewish community of Peru can be traced to Marranos who immigrated to Peru from Spain, but only in the last century did a visible Jewish community come into existence. It includes both Sephardic and Ashkenazi traditions. Most of the approximately 5,000 Peruvian Jews live in Lima, where there are orthodox synagogues for the Ashkenazi, the Sephardic, and Lubavitch Hasidism. There is also a small Jewish population in Cuzco.

The Baha'i Faith found its early success in the Cuzco area and in the 1970s expanded rapidly among the Quechua people in the central highlands. The small Muslim community (about 400) gathers at the Islamic Association of Peru in Lima; the Muslim community in Lima is mostly of Palestinian origin, and in Tacna it is mostly of Pakistani origin. The Subud Association also exists in Peru.

Among Chinese immigrants and their descendants in Peru (an estimated 870,000 in 2008) are adherents of traditional Chinese religions (including Ancestor Worship, Daoism, and Buddhism). Also, there are Buddhist adherents among Japanese immigrants and their descendants (an estimated 90,000 in 2008). In addition, some Peruvians and people of other nationalities practice Buddhism: Diamond Way Buddhism, Reiyukai America, Kagyu Dak Shang Choling, the Buddhist Center of Lima, Sakya Tashi Ling Buddhist Retreat Center (Sakyapa Tibetan Tradition), and the Buddhist Community of Seita Jodo-Shinshu Honpa-Honganji. Japanese immigrants have also established Soka Gakkai International and Perfect Liberty Kyodan, both of which engage in proselytizing outside the Japanese community.

Hinduism is represented by the International Society of Krishna Consciousness (ISKON), the International Sri Sathya Sai Baba Organizations, the Suddha Dharma Mandalam, the Transcendental Meditation (TM, now organized as the Global Country of World Peace), and the Vaisnava Mission in Lima. The Sant Mat tradition is present through the Sant Thaker Singh movement, now led by Baljit Singh, and the Sawan Ruhani Mission-Science of Spirituality.

The Western Esoteric tradition is represented by numerous Freemasonry orders: La Gran Logia Occidental del Peru (Ancient and Acceptable Scottish Rite), founded in Callao in 1817, now with eight lodges; The Great Northern Lodge of Peru, founded in Trujillo in 1883; The Grand Lodge of Central Peru, founded in Huancayo in 1885 (four lodges); and The Grand Lodge of Southern Peru, founded in 1971 in Arequipa (seven lodges). Also present are the following groups: the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC); the Grand Universal Fraternity, Order of Aquarius (from Venezuela); and the Christian Gnostic movement (from Colombia and Mexico); and Illuminati Order of Peru (Gran Oriente Illuminati), with headquarters in Lima, founded in 2009 by Víctor Flores Tantaleán; and followers of Wicca.

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age movements are represented by the St. Francis of Assisi Spiritist Brotherhood Center in Lima; the Spiritist Association; the Anthroposophical Society of Peru; New Acropolis Cultural Centers; Ishaya Techniques; the Silvan Method; Universal Life—the Inner Religion; and various UFO-related groups: Alfa and Omega Divine Revelation, the Peruvian Institute of Inter-Planetary Relations, the Rahma Mission, the Guimal Institute, and the Raelian Movement International.

The traditional Amerindian religions (animist) have survived in remote areas of Peru. Many of the Native communities practice various forms of their traditional systems, while others practice “popular Catholicism” (syncretistic) that blends Catholic and pre-Columbian beliefs, especially in the Andean highlands (Quechuas, Aymaras, and other groups), whereas the tribal peoples in the remote eastern tropical rainforests continue to practice traditional belief systems. Ninety indigenous languages are spoken in Peru. Mestizo folk healers (curanderos) and others have discovered the ritual use of hallucinogenic substances that some practitioners of traditional animistic religions have utilized for centuries in the Amazonian lowlands.

Those indigenous groups that want to resist efforts to convert them to Christianity have received massive support from Europeans and North Americans who have discovered and placed their own overlay of belief onto ancient Peruvian sites. In particular, the ruins of Machu Picchu near Cuzco have become a pilgrimage spot for New Age believers who see it as a power spot of great significance. The so-called Nasca lines in the Peruvian desert, along with a variety of other Peruvian archaeological sites and artifacts, are believed to be indicators of visitations to Earth by extraterrestrials, according to UFO enthusiasts who believe in regular contact with Earth by humanoid beings from outer space.

For a millennium, Lake Titicaca has held great religious and economic significance for the Amerindian peoples. The pre-Incan peoples believed the sun deity and the Sun itself had originally emerged from the lake; for the Sun-worshipping Incas, it was considered the birthplace of humankind, beginning with the mythical founder of the Inca Kingdom, Manco Cápac.

According to Incan mythology, Manco Cápac was a son of the sun god Inti and Mama Quilla (the moon goddess), the brother of Pacha Kamaq (the creator of the world) and the husband of Pacha Mama (mother earth). Manco Cápac himself was worshipped as a fire and a sun god. According to legend, Manco Cápac and his siblings were sent up to the Earth by the sun god and emerged from the cave of Pacaritambo carrying a golden staff, called “tapac-yauri.” They were instructed to create a Temple of the Sun in the spot where the staff sank into the earth; they traveled to Cuzco via underground caves and there built a temple in honor of their father, the sun god Inti. The indigenous religion centered in Pachamama is practiced currently in parallel with Catholicism, to the point that many people are simultaneously Catholic and pachamamistas (syncretism).

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Anglican Province of the Southern Cone; Anthroposophical Society; Baha’i Faith; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren; Church of England; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Nazarene; Diamond Way Buddhism; Dominicans; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Franciscans; Global Country of World Peace; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Jesuits; Lubavitch Hasidism; Methodist Church of Peru; Pentecostalism; Perfect Liberty Kyodan; Philadelphia Church of God; Raelian Movement International; Reiyukai; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Sikhism/Sant Mat; Soka Gakkai International; Southern Baptist Convention; Spiritism; UFO Religions; Universal Life; Wesleyan Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Fellowship; Worldwide Church of God.

References

Barrera, Saúl. Orígenes y Desarrollo de la Iglesia Evangélica Peruana: 100 Años de Misión. Lima, Peru: Centro de Estudios Pastorales del Perú (CEDEPP), 1993.

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischer, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Brierly, Peter. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Burgess, Stanley M., ed. "Peru." In the International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 2001–2002.
- Catholic Hierarchy website. <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/country/scpe1.html>.
- Consejo Nacional Evangélico del Perú. Directorio [de Denominaciones y Asociaciones de Iglesias Independientes del Perú]. Lima, Peru: PROMIES, 1993.
- Cronehed, Johan. Identity and Nationalism in Peru. <http://www.thegrammarofthehype.com/peru/Identity%20and%20Nationalism%20in%20Peru.htm>.
- Equipo de Investigación AMANECER-PERU. I Congreso Nacional Evangélico-Misionero "Perú para Cristo." Lima, Perú: AMANECER-PERU, 1993.
- Fleet, Michael, and Brian H. Smith. The Catholic Church and Democracy in Chile and Peru. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2000.
- Herring, Hubert, and Helen Baldwin Herring. A History of Latin America, from the Beginnings to the Present. 3rd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
- Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Peru: 1812–1995." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/per/per-chron.pdf>.
- Holland, Clifton L. "National Census Data on Religious Affiliation in Peru: 1993–2007." http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/per/polls_2008.pdf.
- Huertas, Pilar, Jesús de Miguel, and Antonio Sánchez. La Inquisición: Tribunal Contra los Delitos de Fe. Madrid, Spain: Editorial LIBSA, 2003.
- Kessler, J. B. A., Jr. A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile. Goes, The Netherlands: Oosterbaan le Cointre, 1967.
- Lewis, M. Paul, ed. Ethnologue: Languages of the World. 16th ed. Dallas, TX: SIL International, 2009.
- Moreno-Lacalle, Julian. "Peru." In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 11. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1911. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/11732b.htm>.
- Secretariado General de la CLAR. Estudio sociográfico de los religiosos y las religiosas en América Latina. Bogota, Colombia: Secretariado General de la CLAR (Confederación Latinoamericana de Religiosos), 1971.
- Scott, Kenneth D. "La Asociación Evangélica de la Misión Israelita del Nuevo Pacto," ca. 1990. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/per/israelitas-scott.pdf>.
- U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). World Factbook on Peru, 2009. <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/pe.html>.
- U.S. Department of State. International Religious Freedom Report, 2008: Peru. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108536.htm>.
- Weber, Linda J., and Dotsy Welliver, eds. Mission Handbook of U.S. and Canadian Christian Ministries Overseas (2007–2009). Wheaton, IL: Evangelism and Missions Information Service, 2007.

Peruvian Evangelical Church

The Peruvian Evangelical Church (Iglesia Evangélica Peruana [IEP]) traces its beginnings to the late 1880s, when private religious services were held, in both English and Spanish, in the home of two Swedish Lutherans, Mr. and Mrs. Peterson, for foreign residents and visitors who were non-Conformists (non-Anglicans). One of the leaders of this small congregation was a Christian Brethren layman. In 1893, a congregation was established in barrio Chucuito de Callao by Charles H. Bright, a Scottish Christian Brethren layman who built on the earlier work begun in the Petersons' home. One of the first converts was Alfonso Muñoz, who would later become an early leader in the Peruvian Evangelical Church. Bright refused to cooperate with the Methodists, the other Protestant group then working in Peru, because of the strong anti-denominational stance he possessed from his Christian Brethren background in Britain.

In 1894, three young Englishmen arrived independently in Peru who had graduated from the Harley Bible and Missionary Training College in London, founded by Henry Grattan Guinness (1835–1910), who also founded the Regions Beyond Missionary Union (RBMU) in 1898. Adam Robert Stark, John L. Jarrett, and Frederick J. Peters laid the foundations for RBMU's work in Lima, Cuzco, and Trujillo; in 1911, the RBMU became part of the Evangelical Union of South America (EUSA). The EUSA merged with World Team (formerly known as the West Indies Mission) in 1995.

In April 1896, Bright established a congregation on Calle Negreiros in Lima, which is considered the birth place of the Peruvian Evangelical Church; this congregation functioned at that location from 1896 to 1930. From this small congregation, unpaid lay evangelists traveled all over Peru to preach and teach the gospel in nearly 100 locations. In 1898, two Brethren missionaries from Scotland arrived, Thomas Cullen and James Watson, both for the purpose of assisting Bright at the church on Calle Negreiros in Lima. Cullen worked with Bright from 1898 until 1902, when Bright left to work in Ecuador, and in 1903 Cullen left Peru. Watson worked in Nazca until 1903, when he returned to Lima to pastor the church on Calle Negreiros after Cullen's departure; he remained there from 1903 to 1908. However, Watson had never fully mastered Spanish and his pastoral work in Lima was not prospering, so he requested help from the Regions Beyond Missionary Union (RBMU) in 1907. Watson left Peru in 1912.

In 1906, John Ritchie, a Scottish Presbyterian, arrived in Peru under the sponsorship of the RBMU. Ritchie was assigned by the RBMU to work with Watson at the independent congregation on Calle Negreiros in Lima from 1907 to 1912. After Watson's departure, Ritchie became the principal leader of the Calle Negreiros church, which further linked it with the RBMU-EUSA and later to the Peruvian Evangelical Church, founded by Ritchie and his Peruvian co-workers in 1919. In 1916, Alfonso Muñoz, who worked as an ABS agent in Lima, was called to pastor the Calle Negreiros church, which enabled Ritchie to give more attention to the expansion of the work in other regions of Peru.

By 1916, churches linked to the Calle Negreiros church had been established in Huantán, Morochocha, and Cedro de Pasco. After 1918, many new groups of believers started springing up but few trained pastors were available to assist them. It became clear to Ritchie and his associated national leaders that some form of organizational structure was needed for mutual support to these new congregations and preaching points scattered across the country. At the beginning of 1920, at least 25 congregations had been formed in the highlands in connection with the Calle Negreiros church, and by the middle of 1924 the number of congregations had increased to 44.

In 1919, the first synod was held in Lima with the participation of 11 delegates from local congregations associated with the work of the Calle Negreiros church. The second synod was held at Muquiyauyo in the central highlands with 11 churches represented and 19 delegates in attendance. The name Iglesia Evangélica Peruana (IEP) was approved at the later synod, along with a simple constitution based on Presbyterian polity. The IEP later became a cooperative venture between the EUSA, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, and the Presbyterians.

In late 1940, IEP became a founding member of the National Evangelical Council of Peru (CONEP). By 2000, the IEP had grown to be the third largest non-Catholic church in Peru with an estimated 80,200 members.

Iglesia Evangélica Peruana
Jr. Luis Gonzaga No. 709
San Juan de Lurigancho
Lima Peru

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren; Evangelicalism.

References

Barrera, Saúl. Orígenes y Desarrollo de la Iglesia Evangélica Peruana: 100 Años de Misión. Lima, Peru: Centro de Estudios Pastorales del Perú (CEDEPP), 1993.

Holland, Clifton L. "A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Peru: 1812–1995." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/per/per-chron.pdf>.
 Kessler, J. B. A., Jr. A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile. Goes, The Netherlands: Oosterbaan le Cointre, 1967.

Pesach

Pesach, the Hebrew name of what in English is termed Passover, is a major festival in the Jewish ritual year. Pesach calls to memory major events in the Exodus of the Hebrew people from Egypt and the establishment of Judaism. The events are recorded in the opening chapters of the book of Exodus in the Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament), but especially chapter 12. According to the story, Moses, who had escaped Egypt after killing a brutal Egyptian slave master, returned to Pharaoh's court with a demand that the Hebrews be allowed to leave Israel. When Pharaoh refused, he threatened calamities and successively a set of plagues hit the land.

Unmoved by the plagues, the still stubborn Pharaoh was struck with one final plague. God threatened to move among the Egyptians and kill the firstborn in each house, including the heir to the throne. Speaking on God's behalf, Moses then instructed the Hebrews to take a lamb free of blemishes and on the appointed day kill it. He then instructed that "they shall take of the blood, and put it on the two side-posts and on the lintel, upon the houses wherein they shall eat it. And they shall eat the flesh in that night, roast with fire, and unleavened bread; with bitter herbs they shall eat it. Eat not of it raw, nor sodden at all with water, but roast with fire; its head with its legs and with the inwards thereof. And ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; but that which remaineth of it until the morning ye shall burn with fire. And thus shall ye eat it: with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste—it is the LORD'S passover. For I will go through the land of Egypt in that night, and will smite all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgments: I am the LORD. And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are; and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and there shall no plague be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt" (Exodus 12:7–13).

In the wake of the deaths, Pharaoh relented and the Hebrews left Egypt, crossed the Red Sea, and found their way to Mount Sinai, where God gave them the law. Pharaoh's army being destroyed when it attempted to pursue the Hebrews, there was no attempt to return them to Egypt in the years ahead in the Sinai.

In the giving of the instructions for the Hebrews to kill the lamb, mark their homes with blood, cook the lamb, and consume it, Moses also underscored the importance of the events by telling the Hebrews to set up their calendar with these events marking the first month, to prepare to repeat the events annually forever as a means of remembering what had happened. After the Exodus had begun, the Hebrews were told that the annual remembrance of Pesach would be for seven days (Exodus 13:6). Further details would be added later.

And through the centuries, the events would be remembered. Throughout the Jewish Bible, God would be spoken of as the "the LORD your God, who brought you up out of Egypt." The events of the Exodus are recalled in the daily morning and evening prayers and tied to the prayer shawl and the tefillin worn on the Sabbath.

The celebration of Pesach carried with it the setting of the Jewish calendar to begin in the spring, in what is now termed the month of Nissan. However, in the sixth century BCE, during the Babylonia Exile, New Year's was moved to the fall. Today, some speak of the religious year beginning Nissan 1 and the civil year beginning Tishri 1. In either case, should Nissan 1 occur too early (before the Spring Equinox) an intercalary year is added immediately before the month of Nissan. Passover is a week-long festival (seven days for reform Jews and eight days for Conservative and Orthodox Jews) that begins on Nissan 14.

Pesach, along with Shavuot and Sukkot, was one of the three pilgrim festivals during which the entire Jewish community made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where access to the temple was available. The destruction of the temple and the scattering of the Jewish people thus have had a marked effect upon the way that the three festivals are celebrated. The Samaritans, a sect with Jewish origins, still make pilgrimages for these festivals to Mount Gerizim, though only males engage in public worship.

Russian Jews celebrate Pesach, illustration from about 1900. (Jewish Chronical/StockphotoPro)

In celebrating Pesach, Jews attempt to both remember the events and symbolically reenact them, and thus come from the festival feeling as if they had just been delivered from bondage. In preparation for the Pesach, houses will be cleaned to make sure that no leaven is in the home. During the week only matzoh bread, unleavened bread made simply and quickly, is an acceptable form of grain product for consumption. When the Exodus began, there was no time to wait for the bread to rise. For this reason, Pesach is often called the Feast of Unleavened Bread. Orthodox Jews will have a separate set of dishes for use during Pesach. Products for Pesach will be especially designated in stores that serve or sell Jewish “kosher” foods.

On the first two evenings of Passover (Nissan 15 and 16), a special ritual feast, the Seder, is held in the home. Guests are invited and included in the celebration where possible. The ritual for the occasion consists primarily of retelling the Exodus deliverance story, especially for the children, recalling Exodus 12:26–27. “And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you: What mean ye by this service? that ye shall say: It is the sacrifice of the LORD’s passover, for that He passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when He smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses.” At key points in the story, the children and youth take the lead in directing the story, and as it begins, the youngest child asks, “Why is this night different from all other nights of the year?”

The Seder service also includes the blessing and consumption of wine—four cups symbolic of the four-fold redemption recounted in Exodus 6:6: “I am the LORD, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will deliver you from their bondage, and I will redeem you with an outstretched arm, and with great judgments; and I will take you to Me for a people.” Also a fifth cup is poured symbolizing that God’s promise of returning his people to their homeland remains unfulfilled. Traditionally, the wine in this cup is not drunk. It is often called Elijah’s cup, as the prophet Elijah is supposed to usher in the messianic age. Since the founding of the state of Israel, many Jews look upon the cup as symbolic of a promise that is beginning to be fulfilled, and will sip from Elijah’s cup.

As recounted in the instructions instituting Pesach, bitter herbs are eaten with the meal, symbolic of the bitterness of slavery. A mixture of chopped nuts, apple, cinnamon, and wine symbolizes the mortar used in the building projects of the Pharaoh at which the Hebrews labored. A roasted shank bone is placed on the Seder table, but not eaten. It is a reminder of the temple, now destroyed, where the paschal lamb for the Passover meal was sacrificed. Since the destruction of the temple, no paschal lamb can be sacrificed. Thus the Seder thus ends with the proclamation, “Next year in Jerusalem!”

Contemporary Jews see the liberation from bondage theme of Pesach as having great relevance for the Jewish presence in the larger social realm. Jews were prominent through the 20th century in the struggles to free the Jewish community from the effects of prejudice and in the struggle generalized their condition to other groups with whom they share a history of slavery, persecution, and discrimination.

In Israel, Passover is observed as a seven-day holiday. The first and last days are recognized as legal holidays. Within the religious community, these days are considered holy days that should be marked by abstinence from work and religious services, especially those surrounding the Seder meals. The middle days of Pesach are known as Chol HaMoed, or festival days.

Passover and Christianity Of all the Jewish holy days, Pesach has had the most effect on Christianity. Jesus’ death was associated with Passover, and Christ was described as the paschal lamb. The setting of the dates of the Christian Holy Week culminating in Easter is based on the date of Passover. In the 20th century some Christian groups, primarily out of the Adventist tradition, began to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread as a primary Christian festival. In a different vein, Messianic Jews, consisting of Jews and others who follow Jewish culture, have also instituted the practice of celebrating a Christian Passover.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Gerizim, Mount; Jerusalem; Moses; Passover; Pilgrimage; Shavuot; Sinai, Mount; Spring Equinox; Sukkot; Temples—Jewish.

References

- Bloch, Abraham P. The Biblical and Historical Background of Jewish Customs and Ceremonies. New York: Ktav Publishing House, Inc., 1980.
- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher; Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

Philadelphia Church of God

The Philadelphia Church of God is one of the three largest offshoots of the Worldwide Church of God (WCOG), with an active television, magazine, book, and booklet outreach. The Philadelphia Church of God was founded in 1989 by Gerald Flurry (b. 1935), a pastor in the WCOG. Flurry was dismayed by the WCOG’s movement away from the teachings of its founder, Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986), after Armstrong’s death in 1986, and he was particularly worried by the decision of the new pastor general Joseph W. Tkach, Sr.

(1927–1995), to cease publication of Armstrong’s last book, Mystery of the Ages, about which Armstrong had said, “It may be the most important book since the Bible.” Tkach’s son Joe, Jr. (b. 1951) (himself later to be pastor general of the WCOG) told Flurry that the book was “riddled with error.”

Flurry left the WCOG to found the Philadelphia Church of God, which like most of the other offshoots of the WCOG, believes in seven Church Eras, of which the most faithful to God is the Philadelphia church, as described in the Bible: “for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name” (Revelation 3:8b). The WCOG, according to Philadelphia and most other offshoots, has become the Laodicean Church: “because thou art lukewarm . . . I will spew thee out of my mouth” (Revelation 3:16).

Flurry distributed copies of Mystery of the Ages to inquirers, and when the church ran out in 1997, he had further copies printed. The WCOG challenged this as a violation of its copyright. A landmark district court judgment in favor of the Philadelphia Church of God in 1997, which distinguished between a religion as believers and a religion as a corporation, was overturned by a court of appeals in 2000. Philadelphia COG were determined to gain the right to distribute the book, which they regard as fundamental to their ministry. Following further legal exchanges the matter was finally settled out of court in 2003, with WCOG selling Philadelphia COG the copyright to Mystery of the Ages and 18 other books that WCOG would never have published again, for a sum variously stated as $2 million or $3 million.

Like most of the offshoots of the WCOG, Philadelphia COG, which is Sabbatarian and millenarian, claims that its teachings are those of the WCOG at the time of Armstrong’s death. Unlike most of the other offshoots, it also claims new revelations that “prove” that it is the legitimate successor to the WCOG. The Philadelphia Church of God is the most hard-line of the three major offshoots of the Worldwide Church of God. It believes that Herbert W. Armstrong was the end-time Elijah as foretold in the Scriptures (Matthew 17:11), that the “apostasy” of the WCOG is also prophesied, and that so is the rise of the Philadelphia Church of God under Gerald Flurry, who claims that his own book about the “apostasy” of WCOG, Malachi’s Message, is the “little book” mentioned in Revelation 10.

Although the church is happy to send its literature to any inquirers, it is not favorably disposed toward researchers and academics. It is believed to have had around 7,500 members at its height, and although this has been reduced by the secession of several senior ministers because of Flurry’s perceived authoritarianism, with the subsequent formation of further offshoot churches, it is still possibly the second or more likely the third largest offshoot from the WCOG, with an estimated 4,000 to 5,000 members.

The church broadcasts the Key of David TV program.

Philadelphia Church of God
PO Box 3700
Edmond, OK 73083
www.pcog.org
www.keyofdavid.com

David V. Barrett

See also: Sabbatarianism; Philadelphia Church of God; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Barrett, David V. The New Believers. London: Cassell, 2001.
- Flurry, Gerald. Malachi’s Message to God’s Church Today. Edmond, OK: Philadelphia Church of God, 1990, 1995.
- Flurry, Gerald. Worldwide Church of God Doctrinal Changes and the Tragic Results. Edmond, OK: Philadelphia Church of God, 1994.
- The Journal: News of the Churches of God*. Big Sandy, TX: JMC Associates.
- Tkach, Joseph. Transformed by Truth. Sisters, OR: Multnomah Books, 1997.

Philippine Independent Church

In 1898 the United States took control of the Philippines from Spain. Some Filipinos, wishing for their country’s full independence, staged a revolt under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo (1869–1964). Agui-naldo in turn appointed Gregorio Aglipay (1860–1940) as a vicar general to head the Roman Catholic Church in the area of the country he controlled. In 1899 the archbishop of Manila excommunicated Aglipay, and he reorganized the church under his control as the Iglesia Filipina Independente (Philippine Independent Church [PIC]). Aglipay served as a leader in the rebel army and became a hero of the people in his failed endeavor to bring freedom to the country. After the revolt, he suffered another defeat when in 1906 the courts ordered most of the property being used by those loyal to him turned over to the Roman Catholic Church.

In spite of the loss of most of its property, the PIC survived in the atmosphere of religious freedom imposed on the islands by the Americans. In the meantime, Aglipay became influenced by Unitarian views, and the church opened itself to a rejection of its traditional Trinitarian theology. In 1939 Dr. Louis Cornish (1870–1950), president of the American Unitarian Association (now an integral part of the Unitarian Universalist Association), was named the honorary president of the PIC. Aglipay died in 1940 and was succeeded by Isebelo de los Reyes, who was unsympathetic to the drift into Unitarianism. When the church reorganized in 1947, he led it to adopt a new statement of faith that included a strong affirmation of the Trinity. The church also began to use the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed.

Reyes also led the church into a relationship with the Episcopal Church, the American representative of the Anglican Communion, which had established an Episcopal mission in the Philippines at the beginning of the century. In 1948 Episcopal bishops consecrated Reyes and two other PIC bishops, thus passing to them the Anglican lineage of apostolic succession. In 1959 the church followed members to the United States and, with the permission of the Episcopal bishop of Hawaii, opened their first foreign mission in Honolulu. As the church spread, its congregations met in local Episcopal parish facilities.

The church soon came into full relationship with the Episcopal Church, accepting the 1931 Bonn Agreement, which brought the Church of England into communion with the Old Catholic churches in Europe.

Through that action the PIC came into communion with the Episcopal Church in the Philippines and the other churches of the worldwide Anglican Communion. In 1999, the church signed a “covenant of partnership” with the United Church of Christ in the Philippines.

In 1985 the PIC reported 4.5 million members, most in the Philippines. More recent estimates acknowledge a far lower figure, approximately 2 million, with a constituency twice that number. The church is led by its supreme bishop, who is currently Most Reverend Godofredo J. David, elected in 2005. The church ordained its first female priest in 1997. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

In the 1970s, the church experienced problems growing out of the participation of its missionary bishop, Francisco Pagtakhan, and two other PIC bishops in the consecration of several individuals who had left the Episcopal Church to establish conservative Anglican churches in the United States. The first consecrations took place in 1978, and the new bishops went on to found the Anglican Catholic Church, the Diocese of Christ the King, and the United Episcopal Church of North America. The issues first raised by Pagtakhan's actions culminated with the refusal of the church to reelect Marcario V. Ga as the supreme bishop. As a result, Ga led his followers out of the church and reorganized as the autonomous Philippine Independent Catholic Church.

Philippine Independent Church
1500 Taft Avenue, Ermita
PO Box 2484
Manila
Philippines

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Episcopal Church; Episcopal Church in the Philippines; Roman Catholic Church; United Church of Christ in the Philippines; Unitarian Universalist Association; World Council of Churches.

References

Anderson, Gerald H., ed. Studies in Philippine Church History. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1969.

Deats, Richard L. Nationalism and Christianity in the Philippines. Dallas, TX: Southern Methodist University Press, 1967.

■ Philippines

The Philippines is a multi-island nation located in the Pacific Ocean north of Indonesia and west of Vietnam. The 7,000 islands of what is today the Philippines sprawl for approximately 1,000 miles from the north to the south. Of these 7,000 islands only about 1,000 are inhabited, and fewer than 500 are larger than one square mile. Its population of 92 million (2009) make it the 12th most populous country in the world.

Diversity is perhaps the Philippines' most striking characteristic; the variety found in the flora, fauna, and terrain of these islands hosts a cultural and ethnic mosaic, and the Philippines are seen as an exemplar of human diversity. Scholars generally hold that the archipelago was once connected to the Asian continent by land bridges that were submerged more than 7,000 years ago. It is believed that the proto-Malay people initially crossed over these bridges from Borneo. Although this is a matter of anthropological speculation, it is clear that successive migrations populated the islands as early as 15,000 years ago from the interior tribes of China.

Subsequent migrations from southern China and Vietnam brought stone and bronze tools and introduced rice farming and the water buffalo to the islands. These waves of early Chinese migrations settled in what is known today as Luzon, the northernmost island of the archipelago. Some 2,000 years ago, Malays from both Indonesia and the West Malaysian Peninsula made their way to the central islands known as the Visayans. They brought a fishing culture that was structured around a small clan led by the clan chief. The barangay, the boat that brought them, became the name of the extended family unit that forms the basic political structure of society today in the Philippines.

By the middle of the 14th century CE, Java, Sumatra, Malaya, Cambodia, Siam, and the Indochina states of Annam and Tonkin had entered into trade relations with the Philippines. The trade invariably left an imprint of Buddhist, Hindu, and Islamic religious culture on the Philippines. These traces can be seen in the Sanskrit loan words, such as dukkha for suffering, bodhi for soul, and katha for legend or story, which have been absorbed into the Tagalog language world. Recent archaeological evidence dated to the 10th century CE gives some credence to the arrival at that time of yet another culture—the Srivijaya Kingdom, a maritime power from Sumatra that dominated the Strait of Malacca.

The Romanesque-style Cathedral of Manila in the Philippines was built in 1958. (iStockPhoto.com)

Today Roman Catholicism is the dominant religion in the Philippines; it is claimed by about 80 percent of the population. The Roman Catholic Church was introduced in the islands in 1521, when Ferdinand Magellan (ca. 1480–1521), a Portuguese explorer, led a Spanish expedition to the islands and planted the cross there, starting the Christianization of the Native population. The systematic propagation of Roman Catholicism by missionaries from Spain eventually made the Philippines the only predominantly Catholic nation in Asia.

Well before Catholicism reached the Philippines, Arab missionaries had already introduced Islam among the inhabitants of the southern islands. It is claimed that Islam antedates Catholic Christianity by about three centuries, yet Islam remained principally confined to the Sulu Archipelago and some of the coastal areas of the island of Mindanao. After about seven centuries of existence in the Philippines, Muslims remain a numerically small portion of the religious population. Most Muslims follow the Sunni Shafiite School and are generally referred to as Moros (Spanish: Moors).

American Protestantism was brought to the country in 1898, when Spain ceded the Philippines to the United States in the Treaty of Paris. As the Americans began to assume dominance in the islands, they brought their new faith. The different Protestant churches divided the country among themselves to convert Catholics to Protestantism, just as the various Catholic orders had apportioned the territory during the 450 years of the Spanish regime. The difference, however, was that whereas the Catholic religious orders were converting the indigenous peoples to one church, Protestants wanted the Filipinos to choose among various denominations.

Among the more important denominations to arise from the Protestant effort are the United Church of Christ in the Philippines, the Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches, and the Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippines. The Episcopal Church also began work in the country and over the years developed a relationship with a group that had left the Catholic Church to form a Philippine Independent Church (PIC). With more than 2.5 million members, the PIC is the largest non-Catholic church in the country. It claimed almost 4.5 million members before a split in the 1980s produced the Philippine Independent Catholic Church.

Despite the coming of the world's religions through colonial powers and the significant conversion of the population to a variety of forms of Christianity, some indigenous, pre-Magellan religious elements continue to thrive in the culture. Sixteenth-century Spanish missionary records provide the best clues to the religious substrata that influence the contemporary religious landscape in the Philippines. Most of these records are taken from the central islands of the archipelago, the Visayans.

When the Spanish arrived, Bisayans, native residents of the Visayan Islands, worshipped nature spirits, gods of particular localities, and their own ancestors. Religious practitioners were male or female mediums who contacted spirit patrons in a state of trance to determine the cause and cure of illness. Sacrifices included foodstuffs, beverages, and live fowl, hogs, or human beings. The ancestor spirits and deities were invoked at feasts in which these sacrifices were offered up. Ancestor spirits were also invited to partake of any meal, and their well-being in the next world depended on sacrifices offered by their descendants both before and after their death.

Bisayans considered themselves vastly outnumbered by a variety of invisible beings. Gods and goddesses were called diwata, a word still in use among Bisayans living in the remote mountains of Panay. "Diwata" is a Malay-Sanskrit term for gods or godhead, and in the Bisayan language a maniwata or magdiwata is a shaman or human intermediary who invokes or defies the spiritual realm. The diwata were generally neutral and could be approached ritually for good crops, health, and fortune, but they also caused illness or misfortune if not given due respect. They thus functioned to sanction approved social behavior. Naturally, malevolent beings, ranging from the mischievous to the demonic, had to be avoided or fended off by precautionary acts. These beings had no single name as a class—Spanish lexicographers simply called them witches—brujas or hechiceros. Today Bisayans have supplied modern Spanish terms such as duende (goblin) and encanto (enchantment).

In some cases the diwata actually constituted a pantheon, with a hierarchy arranged by the specific roles each divinity played. Some were specifically connected with basic rights of passages such as birth, naming, marriage, death, and afterlife. Others were the patrons of specific human conditions, such as the Dalikmata, a diwata with many eyes, who was invoked in the case of eye ailments, or Makabosog, who moved a person to gluttony. The Cebuanos, the Natives of the island of Cebu who first encountered Magellan's

Philippines

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	34,354,000	83,151,000	89.4	2.09	103,588,000	125,252,000
Roman Catholics	30,860,000	72,065,000	77.5	1.25	84,595,000	95,103,000
Independents	7,053,000	19,500,000	21.0	1.38	25,400,000	31,500,000
Protestants	1,446,000	4,700,000	5.1	−0.42	7,000,000	9,000,000
Muslims	1,565,000	6,000,000	6.5	2.10	7,500,000	9,100,000
Ethnoreligionists	338,000	2,500,000	2.7	2.08	2,700,000	2,900,000
Agnostics	78,000	700,000	0.8	3.42	1,100,000	1,800,000
Baha'is	67,500	273,000	0.3	2.10	420,000	550,000
Atheists	20,000	175,000	0.2	2.10	280,000	450,000
Buddhists	50,000	111,000	0.1	2.10	160,000	250,000
Chinese folk	70,000	52,300	0.1	2.10	70,000	85,000
Sikhs	5,000	23,000	0.0	2.10	28,000	32,000
New religionists	2,000	9,000	0.0	2.10	20,000	30,000
Hindus	1,000	3,000	0.0	2.11	6,500	10,000
Confucianists	0	2,200	0.0	2.11	4,000	6,200
Jews	500	1,100	0.0	2.11	1,200	1,200
Total population	36,551,000	93,001,000	100.0	2.10	115,878,000	140,466,000

expedition, referred to the image of the Holy Christ Child as “the Spaniards’ diwata.” The Cebuanos supposedly rendered it homage after Magellan’s death.

The earliest known records of the diwata were written by Miguel de in Panay in 1582. His records identified Si Dapa as a diwata who was said to mark out one’s mortal lifespan on a tree trunk on Mount Madayaas at the time of birth. He also identified other beings, including Magwayen, who was said to ferry the souls of the deceased across to a kind of inferno, and Pandaki, a diwata who rescued the deserving for a more pleasant afterlife. Loarca showed the linkage between the diwata and natural phenomena by describing a fire-breathing goddess as Mayong, a diwata of the volcano in Ibalon that bears her name.

Later interpreters have classified the pre-Magellan gods into a three-tiered system. The first tier is composed of the gods of the heavens, such as Bathala, MayKapal, Kabunian, Maguayen, and Sidava. These deities were the source and creators of things in the world. Events in the world were ultimately traced to their agency. To reach the highest of the gods one had to go through channels or intermediaries—lesser gods. Thus, petitions and sacrifices were addressed to lesser gods.

A second tier of gods concerns those of the underworld, such as Sisiburnanen, Pandague, and Sumpay. These gods were connected with death. It was believed that when a person died, the soul, or élan vital, was brought to the underworld by one of the gods and would be kept there unless another minor underworld god would liberate it. The “liberator god” would act in response to sacrifices offered by the living for the dead. The liberated soul would then reside in the high mountains.

The third tier of gods, located between heaven and the underworld, consists of the deities and spirits of the Earth. The Spanish records refer to a goddess of harvest called Lalahon. Followers of Lalahon believed that as long as they pleased her, the fields would be fruitful and they would be assured of a bountiful harvest. If displeased, she would send swarms of locusts to destroy the crops. Hence, the people offered her sacrifices and invoked her blessings for a good harvest. The most widespread of the spirits in the middle tier is the anitos. Among the Tagalogs, natives of central Luzon, the anitos were considered agents of the high gods such as Bathala and could be found everywhere within the environment. The resources of nature thus belonged to the spirits, but humans might use them provided they made proper acknowledgment to the spirit owners.

Today, these Filipino indigenous religious beliefs and practices are incorporated into the world religions in a variety of regional folk practices. Once driven underground by colonial powers, these same beliefs and practices have re-emerged in the last 90 years in an environment of religious tolerance and nationalism.

Indigenous beliefs and practices have also contributed to the rise of many new religious communities in the Philippines. The rapid growth of the Iglesia ni Cristo (Church of Christ), established in 1914 by Felix Manalo (1886–1963), serves as the best illustration of the new indigenous communities. At the beginning of the 20th century the various factions of Christianity in the Philippines collided in the life of Felix Manalo. Baptized a Roman Catholic in 1886, he became a Methodist in 1904 and a Presbyterian in 1905. After years of disillusionment with a variety of Protestant churches and during a time when the nation hungered for political independence, Manalo established an independent church. The Iglesia Kristo reflected his particular charismatic teachings, which identify “true religion.” The Iglesia is considered a truly Filipino organization, drawing many indigenous beliefs and practices into its polity.

The rise of many new religions, coupled with the assault on the country by numerous Christian missionary agencies since World War II, has made the Philippines one of the most religiously pluralistic countries in the world.

Graham B. Walker Jr.

See also: Convention of Philippine Baptist Churches; Episcopal Church; Evangelical Methodist Church in the Philippines; Philippine Independent Church; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam; United Church of Christ in the Philippines.

References

- Anderson, Gerald H., ed. Studies in Philippine Church History. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1969.
- Blair, Emma, and James Robertson, eds. The Philippine Islands, 1493–1898. 55 vols. Cleveland: Arthur H. Clark, 1903–1909.

Demetrio, Francisco. Myths and Symbols in the Philippines. Manila: National Books, 1981.

Friend, Theodore, ed. Religion and Religiosity in the Philippines and Indonesia: Essays in State, Society, and Public Creeds. Baltimore: Southeast Asia Studies Program, Johns Hopkins University, 2006.

Scott, William H. Barangay: Sixteenth-Century Philippine Culture and Society. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press, 1994.

Shirley, Steven. Guided by God: The Legacy of the Catholic Church in Philippine Politics. Singapore: Marshall Cavendish Academic, 2004.

Silliman, Robert B. Religious Beliefs and Life at the Beginning of the Spanish Regime in the Philippines. Dumaguete City: Silliman University, 1964.

Pilgrimage

Although the English term “pilgrimage” derives from Latin and has close associations with Christianity, it represents universal themes relating to traveling to and performing acts of reverence at places with special resonance for the traveler. Normally this resonance is associated with notions of the sacred, with the site visited being the locus of some special event or events that mark it out from the ordinary world or a site where visitors can access some spiritual force. Thus places associated with seminal events in religious traditions (for example, places associated with the life of Jesus, with the Buddha’s journey to enlightenment, or with Muhammad’s final visit to Mecca) have become significant pilgrimage centers. Likewise, tales of miracle and apparition have helped make certain places into pilgrimage sites, as with the Marian apparitions and miracles that have sacralized Catholic sites such as Lourdes, Knock, Fatima, and Clearwater (in the United States), and similar phenomena associated with the Buddhist figure Kannon (Guan Yin), which have given rise to Japanese pilgrimage sites, such as the 33-temple Saikoku Kannon pilgrimage.

The traces of sacred figures, too, in reality or legend, also have been formative in the creation of pilgrimages. Santiago de Compostela, one of Catholicism's great pilgrimage centers, attained prominence because it was the (legendary) locale of the relics of Saint James, while the tombs of Sufis in Islam, of Catholic saints, and of Buddhist sect founders such as Kukai, whose mausoleum at Mount Koya remains a major pilgrimage site in Japan, have developed as pilgrimage locations because they are seen as possessing special power due to those interred therein. Similarly, places associated with important myths and legends relating to the deities of traditions and to important landscape features significant to religious traditions—for instance, Hindu sites such as Kedarnath in the Himalayas and Varanasi (Benares) on the River Ganges, both associated with Hindu myths and legends—are a recurrent feature of pilgrimage sites globally.

Pilgrims climbing to the Gateway to Heaven Temple atop Mount Tai Shan, China. (Corbis)

Ubiquity and the Secular Pilgrimage is ubiquitous, a prominent feature not just of older religious traditions but of the new as well. New religions frequently create their own sacred geographies and pilgrimages as part of their development process and to affirm the new spiritual frameworks and worldviews they propound. Thus Tenri, the birthplace of Miki Nakayama, the 19th-century founder of the Japanese new religion Tenrikyo, and which she taught was where humanity originated and where the divine and human worlds intersect, has become the sacred center for Tenrikyo. Pilgrimages there are a key Tenrikyo practice, one that asserts Tenrikyo's vision of the world. The New Age movement, too, has developed its own pilgrimage centers—such as Sedona in Arizona and Glastonbury in the United Kingdom, both geographically striking sites that were sacred to other traditions in earlier times, the former for Native Americans, the latter in medieval Christianity, and that have been appropriated as modern pilgrimage centers of the New Age.

In recent times, too, many places with no specific religious affiliation but often combining aspects of the factors cited above and holding special emotional significance for their visitors, have attracted visitors whose reverential behavior indicates that they, too, can be seen as modern manifestations of pilgrimage. War grave sites in Europe are the focus of organized pilgrimage tours for those who wish to commemorate the dead, while the Vietnam War Memorial Wall in Washington, D.C., receives visits from those who lost kin or comrades in the war and those seeking to commemorate the nation's loss. Vietnam veterans also perform an annual motorbike journey (which they view as a pilgrimage) from California to the memorial, involving commemorative rituals along the way. Furthermore, places associated with figures of popular culture, such as Graceland (home and burial place of Elvis Presley), receive numerous visitors whose demeanor and rituals resemble those of pilgrims at sacred places, especially during the annual Elvis Presley Memorial Week around his death anniversary, which includes candlelight vigils and prayers. As such, pilgrimage goes beyond the boundaries of the formally religious and is manifest in secular contexts as well.

Symbolism and Sacred Traces Pilgrimages may vary across different religions but there are a number of themes that are found widely enough to be regarded as normative. While pilgrimage usually involves a physical journey, this often is also symbolically a spiritual one, with the outer journey a physical manifestation of inner teachings. Buddhism's teachings about renunciation, for example, were enacted by the Buddha when he left home in search of enlightenment; his wanderings represented both a physical and a spiritual pilgrimage through life, and those who followed in his footsteps and renounced the world did likewise. Early Buddhist pilgrimages involved visiting sites in the Indian subcontinent associated with the founder's journey (his birthplace, Lumbini; Bodh Gaya, where he attained enlightenment; Sarnath, where he preached the first sermon; and Kushinagara, where he died); it was thus a journey that symbolically traced the Buddha's journey through life, and served as a template for the spiritual progress of his followers.

This symbolism of pilgrimage as a spiritual journey is often linked to the idea of following in the footsteps of founders and holy figures. Pilgrims in the Christian holy land thus walk in the places where Jesus was, while pilgrims on the Shikoku pilgrimage—an 88-temple Buddhist pilgrimage around the Japanese island of Shikoku—follow in the footsteps of the Buddhist holy figure Kobo Daishi (Kukai) who, according to legend, founded the pilgrimage. The pilgrimage is also symbolically a journey to enlightenment, and this motif also frames the pilgrim's path. A recurrent theme in pilgrimages—and evident in the above-mentioned Buddhist pilgrimages—is they enable the ordinary person to step outside the everyday world and enter into a special sacred realm; in Buddhist terms, the pilgrim temporarily becomes like a monk or nun, and may don special clothing to indicate this separation from the world. Indeed, wearing special clothes and insignia to indicate one stands apart from the mundane is widely found in pilgrimages, from the Muslims on the hajj, who wear special pilgrimage clothing denoting purity, to Shikoku pilgrims, whose white clothing both signifies purity and indicates that they are “dead to the world” during their pilgrimage.

The death symbolism of Shikoku pilgrims' clothes also implies rebirth and renewal—a common pilgrimage motif and a potent motivation for pilgrims, who believe that completing the journey implies being cleansed of sins and being reborn or renewed. For Japanese pilgrims, this incorporates also a motif of rebirth and salvation, with the widespread belief that performing pilgrimages such as Saikoku and Shikoku means that pilgrims will pass safely into the Pure Land at death. Such themes—the pilgrimage as journey to higher spiritual states, as a life journey, as encounter with the world beyond this, and as means of renewal—are found in numerous pilgrimage cultures beyond Japan. Thus the Christian pilgrimage to Jerusalem has traditionally been seen not merely as a physical journey following Jesus' footsteps, but as a spiritual journey to another realm, while Hindu pilgrimages to sacred crossing places such as rivers (a common location of pilgrimage sites) may be full of images and symbolic themes of transition from one realm to another and of renewal and reinvigoration for those who return home afterward.

The extraordinary and the miraculous are also recurrent themes in the formation of pilgrimage sites and in motivating pilgrims. The rumored apparition of a sacred figure such as the Virgin Mary or the occurrence of a miracle (for example, a cure for illness) may draw people to particular places and foment pilgrimage cults. Lourdes in France, for instance, developed as a pilgrimage center because of stories associated with the visions of Bernadette and the apparitions of Mary there and the belief that Mary's presence enabled miracles of healing to occur there.

Pilgrimage sites, in such contexts, are often seen as locales where sacred and human realms intersect and where humans can directly access the sacred and derive benefits from it. Although symbolically pilgrimages may be associated with journeys to higher realms, it is commonly such worldly concerns as healing and other practical benefits that most motivate pilgrims and make pilgrimage sites popular. Lourdes pilgrims travel in the hope of cures and other blessings, as do Japanese pilgrims in Shikoku, Hindu pilgrims in India who may travel to holy pilgrimage temples to seek boons from their deities, and Muslims who visit the graves of Sufis and other holy figures in their tradition for similar purposes.

Buildings and Landscape Pilgrimage sites often produce major physical constructions—temples, shrines, churches, statues, tombs—signifying the physical presence of the sacred and intended to inspire visitors. This is as true for the vast shrine buildings of Tenrikyo as for Catholic pilgrimage cathedrals at Chartres and Santiago and the Buddhist Mahabodhi temple at Bodhi Gaya, all of which speak of a grandeur that articulates in physical form the spiritual power they are believed to hold. Yet grandeur is not a necessary component of pilgrimage. Many of the Shikoku temples, for example, are not particularly striking; their significance relates to their legendary association with the footsteps of Kobo Daishi. Often more important is the landscape: the New Age sites of Sedona and Glastonbury owe much to their dramatic scenery, while features such as rivers and mountains are prominent in many pilgrimage contexts. In Hinduism, important life-giving rivers such as the Ganges (and crossing places on it such as Varanasi) are prominent as pilgrimage sites, while awe-inspiring mountains such as the Himalayas, often symbolically considered as the abode of gods, may become the focus of pilgrimage practices and sites.

Elsewhere, too, mountains have become pilgrimage centers, such as Croagh Patrick in Ireland, Mount Athos in Greece, Mount Kailas in Tibet, sacred for Hindus and Buddhists, and Japanese peaks such as Fuji and Ontake.

Places and Routes There is often a tension in pilgrimage between movement and place, and between route and site. Some pilgrimages (Santiago and Shikoku are good examples) focus on a special route that brings the pilgrim to one or more sacred sites. In such cases emphasis might be placed on the activities and practices engaged in while journeying to and between the sites. In other cases, however, the main emphasis is on activities at or around the site itself; Lourdes and Mecca are examples of such pilgrimages. However, this does not mean that the journey to these places is not important; pilgrims have provided rich accounts of the emotional feelings acquired through traveling from their homes to Lourdes with a group of fellow pilgrims, while for Muslims the processes of preparing for the hajj via their journey to Mecca, help heighten their sense of expectation as they approach the holy region itself. While different pilgrimages may emphasize different aspects of the process, both journey and place form parts of a wider whole and should be considered as parts of a unitary pilgrimage process.

Replication and Localization The notion that pilgrimage only involves journeys to distant places is erroneous; pilgrimages may also have highly localized dimensions. Many Shikoku pilgrims are local people, and the pilgrimage is very much part of regional folk belief. Likewise Saudi Arabians living close to Mecca also make pilgrimages there. Pilgrimages may also be replicated and copied, often in localized forms. In earlier times, making replicas of distant pilgrimage sites for the benefit of those who could not travel afar was common; Walsingham, in England, developed in the 11th century as a replica of the Christian Holy Land, while throughout Japan smaller-scale regional copies of the Saikoku and Shikoku routes flourished from the 17th century on. In more recent times, numerous copies of the Lourdes grotto have been built in Japan, in the United States, and in the United Kingdom; the English Catholic diocese of Lancaster, for example, has its own Lourdes replica, which is the focus of an annual diocesan pilgrimage. Diaspora communities often make replicas of sacred pilgrimage sites as a way of helping them settle in and create a new identity in their new homelands; Hindus in the United Kingdom and the United States, for example, have built replicas of prominent Hindu pilgrimage sites in these countries.

Tourism, Travel, and Modernity Pilgrimages are deeply associated with entertainment, escape, travel, and, especially in modern times, tourism. Always a way of stepping outside one's normal environment, they offered people in pre-modern times perhaps the only means of escape from the confines of feudal societies; it was often the only way they could gain permission to travel with any legitimacy. In pre-modern Japan, for example, travel permits were usually only granted for making pilgrimages to major sites, which meant that those wanting to travel dressed up their journeys in a religious guise as a result. It also meant that pilgrimage centers developed into tourist as well as religious locations. The same was true for medieval Europe. In both contexts it is clear that the earliest package tours (the staple of the modern tourist industry) grew out of pilgrimage. In medieval Europe, for example, as the overland journey to the Holy Land became increasingly difficult, the seafarers of Venice who controlled the Mediterranean sea lanes offered all-inclusive tours to the Holy Land for aspirant pilgrims. In Japan, similarly, guides from Ise, the country's main Shinto pilgrimage center, provided all-inclusive package tours from far villages to Ise, including lodging and religious services at the shrines. Pilgrimage centers generally provided the means for pilgrims to let off steam after performing their religious activities and provided entertainment to attract potential clients; it was a rare site that did not (like Ise) have plentiful bars and entertainment quarters to service those who had completed their religious devotions. Likewise, because many pilgrimage sites were also endowed with great architecture and were important cultural sites in their own right, they attracted visitors who came both as pilgrims and as tourists.

The links of pilgrimage and tourism have grown in the modern era, as mass transportation, modern infrastructures, and a moneyed economy have made it increasingly easy for greater numbers of people to travel. Modern transport, in making once distant places accessible, has stimulated a huge growth in pilgrimage; Lourdes, for example, benefited from the opening, not long after the 1858 apparitions, of a railway line that made it accessible to people from distant cities such as Paris. In the latter half of the 20th century, the advent of mass air travel made journeys to Mecca far quicker and less dangerous for people across the Muslim world and led to a huge rise in pilgrim numbers. In Japan, the rise of bus package tours in Shikoku pilgrimage—which until the mid-20th century could only be accomplished by foot—led to huge growth in pilgrim numbers. Pilgrims have always made use of whatever transport systems are available, and pilgrimages have commonly been boosted by economic advances and developments, so it is unsurprising that the modern day has seen immense growth in the numbers making pilgrimages; Lourdes gets more than 6 million pilgrims a year, while the hajj now gets 2.5 million pilgrims (compared to around 30,000 in the 1930s). Modernity has also expanded the pilgrimage clientele immensely. In earlier eras, the long and arduous journey to Mecca or to Shikoku would have defeated all but the hardiest, and few older people could have managed it. Nowadays even age and infirmity are no longer barriers to long distance pilgrimage.

All this has enhanced the tourist dimensions of pilgrimage. In Shikoku, for example, contemporary pilgrimage literature frequently emphasizes the cultural treasures and sights associated with the temples and route, along with the comforts available along the way. The huge growth in pilgrims has enhanced the commercial surroundings of many pilgrimage locations. While shops selling goods and souvenirs have been found at pilgrimage sites from the outset, the intertwining of marketplace and pilgrimage places has been pronounced in modern terms; one Muslim pilgrim, for example, commented that while on the hajj he felt that pilgrims oscillated between the mosque and the marketplace. Often, too, the commodities sold at sacred sites form a key motivation for visitors; pilgrims in Japan have reported in surveys that obtaining the scroll that signifies their completion of the pilgrimage is a prime reason for doing it in the first place, while pilgrims to Marian sites such as Lourdes are often motivated by the wish to acquire holy water and other such talismans from these sites.

However, while modernity has led to increasing numbers of pilgrims using motorized transport, the numbers of walkers on long-distance pilgrimage routes such as Shikoku and Santiago, have also increased. For such people, these pilgrimages offer a challenge and an alternative to the travails and rush of modern life; many, too, see these pilgrimages as offering a new way of self-development unconnected to organized religious traditions. Indeed, many such modern pilgrims appear to eschew religious faith altogether. Studies show that many walking the Santiago route do so not because of Catholic faith but as a challenge, and as a journey of self-discovery driven by individual spiritual motivations. The same is true in Shikoku, where the growing numbers of foot pilgrims in recent years are more motivated by challenge than by Buddhist faith. Even those on organized bus tours in Shikoku tend to cite searching for Japanese cultural heritage and identity as a key motivation, rather than religious faith. Likewise, now that modern medicine offers health solutions unavailable in earlier ages, there may be less emphasis on doing pilgrimages to seek miraculous healing and more on seeing it as a way of exercise that enables one to remain fit and healthy. Many Shikoku pilgrims, for example, cite fitness and health as motivations for doing it—including those on organized tours, who report that the activity keeps them mentally as well as physically healthy.

These patterns are evident also in the growing numbers of “non-religious” pilgrimages and sites with no particular religious associations, such as the aforementioned war grave pilgrimages in Europe and sites with resonances of remembrance for the dead such as the Vietnam Wall in Washington. Places such as Glas-tonbury or Graceland, or, indeed, places such as Disneyland in the United States (whose construction of an idealized image of “traditional main street America,” has caused some scholars to depict it as a form of American secular pilgrimage) have flourished in part because they offer people the means to engage in pilgrim activity combined with visiting interesting places, while not being tied to specific religious traditions. As such, pilgrimage—a practice deeply associated with the origins of religious traditions and with the miraculous—continues to flourish in modern contexts; it remains a basic and central feature in many traditions, while new places of pilgrimage, often of a modern secularized nature, continue to emerge to attract the interest of new clientele.

Ian Reader

See also: Athos, Mount; Benares; Bodh-Gaya; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Enlightenment; Fatima; Guan Yin’s Birthday; Ise Shrine, The; Jerusalem; Kedarnath; Koya, Mount; Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Kusinagara; Lourdes; Lumbini; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Mecca; Modernity; Muhammad; Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage; Sarnath; Shikoku Pilgrimage; Sufism; Tenri City; Tenrikyo.

References

- Coleman, Simon, and John Elsner. Pilgrimage: Past and Present in the World Religions. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Dubisch, Jill. “‘Heartland of America’: Memory, Motion and the (re)Construction of History on a Motorcycle Pilgrimage.” In Reframing Pilgrimage: Cultures in Motion, edited by Simon Coleman and John Eade, 105–132. London: Routledge, 2004.
- Frey, Nancy Louise. Pilgrim Stories: On and Off the Road to Santiago. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Gitlitz, David, and Linda Davidson. Pilgrimage: An Encyclopedia. 2 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Hammoudi, Abdellah. A Season in Mecca: Narrative of a Pilgrimage. Cambridge: Polity Press, 2005.
- Harris, Ruth. Lourdes: Body and Spirit in the Secular Age. London: Allen Lane, 1999.
- Kaufman, Suzanne K. Consuming Visions: Mass Culture and the Lourdes Shrine. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2004.
- Moore, Alexander. “Walt Disney World: Bounded Ritual Space and the Playful Pilgrimage Center.” Anthropological Quarterly 53, no. 4 (1980): 207–217.
- Reader, Ian. Making Pilgrimages: Meaning and Practice in Shikoku. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2005.

Reader, Ian, and Tony Walter, eds. Pilgrimage in Popular Culture. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave, 1993.

■ Pitcairn Island

The Pitcairn Islands group consists of four volcanic islands that are now a dependency of New Zealand. The islands are located in the South Pacific, halfway between Australia and the coast of Chile. The four islands have a total land area of but 16 square miles. The population has decreased markedly in recent decades, and today stands at less than 50 (2008).

Pitcairn, the only inhabited island of the four, became world famous as the site chosen as a refuge by the mutineers of the HMS Bounty, made famous in the novel by Charles Nordhoff (1887–1947) and James Hall (1887–1951) and later turned into several movies. Following the mutiny in 1790, the crew settled briefly in Tahiti. From there, most of them took wives from among the Natives and sailed to Pitcairn before the British could catch up with them. Though it had been discovered and named by Robert Pitcairn in 1767, at the time of the mutiny the island was not on the maps of the British navy.

Until the 20th century, the island's entire population (which peaked at 200 in 1937) consisted entirely of descendants of the Bounty crew. One of the Bounty mutineers, a devout member of the Church of England, organized an Anglican parish. However, in 1877 some literature from the Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived on the island. As a result, in 1887 the population converted to Adventism and the Seventh-day

Pitcairn Island

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	90	50	92.0	–2.79	50	50
Protestants	90	50	92.0	–2.79	50	50
Agnostics	0	10	8.0	–4.36	10	10
Total population	90	60	100.0	–2.92	60	60

Adventist Pitcairn Island Mission was formally organized in 1895. It is currently the only religion practiced on the island.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.

Kirk, Robert W. Pitcairn Island, the Bounty Mutineers and Their Descendants: A History. Jeffersonville, NC: McFarland & Company, 2008.

Plymouth Brethren (Exclusive)

See Christian Brethren.

■ Poland

Poland is an Eastern European nation on the Baltic Sea between Germany and the isolated enclave of Russian, Kaliningrad Oblast. It additionally shares borders with Lithuania, Belarus, Ukraine, Slovakia, and the Czech Republic. Its territory includes 117,600 square miles of land and a population of 38,500,000.

Christianized in the 10th century, Poland has had a long tradition of religious pluralism that existed even before the Reformation. Besides Catholics, there were a number of Orthodox, Jews, Pagans (in some remote regions of the country), and, later, Protestants and Muslims. The degree of religious and ethnic pluralism gradually declined after the 16th century due to migrations, changes of borders, and the Holocaust, and the proportion of the population being both Roman Catholic and ethnically Polish approached 100 percent after World War II.

As a result, the role of the Roman Catholic Church, with more than 90 percent of the Polish population as members, has become greater than before. The fact that Catholicism has been viewed as an antidote to Communism and as a defender of national identity against the danger of Sovietization also contributed to its growing importance. As a result, since the mid-1970s the surveys reveal a growing rate of participation in Catholic practices and a growing number of persons identifying themselves as believers and as firm believers. The election of Karol Wojtyła (1920–2005), a Polish national, as Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005), the appearance of the Solidarity movement, and the role of the church during the martial law period further contributed to the Catholic revival that continued to the end of the 1980s. At the beginning of the 21st century, this dominant form of religiosity is still widespread, and during the last decade it has remained almost at the same level as before, which places Poland among the most religious Christian countries (together with Ireland and the United States).

Other religions, either traditional or new, comprise about 2 percent of the population. The biggest groups are the Orthodox Church of Poland, concentrated mainly in the eastern parts of the country, the Jehovah’s Witnesses, and the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession, concentrated mainly in the southwest part of Poland.

An Orthodox celebration of the Feast of Jordan (Theophany) in St. Onuphrius Monastery in Jableczna, Poland. (Dariusz Majgier/Dreamstime.com)

The appearance of new religions in Poland provides some interesting patterns pertinent to theories of secularization. New religious movements (NRMs) seem to have emerged in Poland not on the ruins of a dominant religious tradition but parallel to it. The appearance of new religions in Poland in the 1970s may be seen as the reintroduction of religious pluralism, which had to a large extent vanished from Poland as an effect of World War II. The scale and character of the NRMs that began to appear at that time were, however, totally new. They usually represent more exotic and less established religious traditions, being often new not only in Poland but also throughout the West. Important changes in regulations concerning the freedom of religion were issued in 1989 that made the official registration relatively easy, but some groups still prefer informal ways of activity, being too small to be registered (initially, the law required a minimum of 15 persons for registration, and now it requires 100).

The largest proportion of membership in NRMs can be observed among movements growing inside the Catholic Church. Their number grew from about 20 in the early 1980s to more than 180 by 1994. Movements like the Apostles of Sobriety (present in 35.8 percent of the 7,579 Catholic parishes surveyed in 1988), Light-Life or Oases (present in 31.5 percent of parishes), God's Mercy Votaries (18.3 percent), Life and Family Apostles (9.4 percent), Family of Families (9.3 percent), Charismatic Renewal in the Holy Spirit (5.3 percent), Eucharist-Marian Crusade (4.1 percent), Maitri (2.1 percent), Neo-Catechumenal Community (1.9 percent), and others stress particular aspects of religious renewal and contribute to the growing endogenous pluralism of the Catholic Church (Firlit et al. 1990). The majority are of Polish origin but some international Catholic religious movements are also present.

The development of the intrachurch Catholic movements is one of the most significant factors of change in the Polish religious context in recent years. Some spectacular conversions of popular journalists and rock musicians have garnered much publicity in the media. Therefore, the growing number of movements and their members (now more than 1 million) constitutes, both quantitatively and qualitatively, perhaps the most effective alternative to the secularization trend mentioned earlier. These “small churches” inside “the big church” create possibilities for pluralism within the Catholic Church, which may be conducive to better fulfillment of individual religious needs and the higher commitment of its members. These groups are not negatively stigmatized as are some sects and cults, but they are to some extent, and contribute to better mobilization of resources within the church. According to some estimations, a large proportion (about 60 percent) of priestly vocations come from these movements. However, much of any group’s success depends on the

POLAND

Poland

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	29,633,000	36,523,000	96.4	–0.10	35,222,000	29,513,000
Roman Catholics	28,783,000	34,730,000	91.6	–0.21	33,500,000	28,000,000
Orthodox	532,000	578,000	1.5	0.01	600,000	550,000
Marginals	22,500	219,000	0.6	0.71	270,000	270,000
Agnostics	2,033,000	1,250,000	3.3	–0.67	1,000,000	650,000
Atheists	969,000	92,800	0.2	–0.12	70,000	45,000
Jews	8,000	9,600	0.0	0.65	9,600	9,600
Muslims	100	8,900	0.0	–0.12	12,500	15,000
Spiritists	0	7,600	0.0	–0.12	9,000	10,000
New religionists	20,000	7,400	0.0	–0.12	8,000	9,000
Buddhists	0	2,100	0.0	–0.13	4,000	6,000
Baha'is	100	1,000	0.0	–0.12	1,500	2,500
Total population	32,664,000	37,902,000	100.0	–0.12	36,337,000	30,260,000

attitude of the church hierarchy toward it. As a whole, the groups were supported by Pope John Paul II, who in a letter to the participants of the Congress of the Catholic Movements in 1994 stressed their significant role in religious renewal and compared them to the “spring in the Church.” His support may have changed the reservations of some bishops toward these movements.

Some of these Catholic communities, however, become too radical to remain within the Roman Catholic Church, either due to their own decisions or due to the decisions of the local bishop. After the bonds with the institutional church have been broken, they often register as separate religious bodies and define themselves within the Protestant tradition.

The largest group of newly registered religious bodies belong to the Protestant tradition, both mainline and marginal. They constitute a variety of movements that often cluster in distinct families (Baptist, Adventist, Pentecostal, and so on). At least one of the reasons for their growth is their tendency to organize themselves on the basis of locality and to register as separate religious unions. Many of the local religious unions belong to this category of “congregational revival” and represent various evangelical groups that are not significantly differentiated in doctrinal terms.

Among the most dynamically growing Protestant families are those emphasizing Pentecostal forms of piety. Although not all of them are quite new, in the 1990s their rates of growth were the most visible and contrasted with those of the major Protestant churches (Lutheran, Reformed, and Methodist), which were experiencing a period of decline. Doctrinal differentiation among the Pentecostals is usually greater than among other groups, manifested in Trinitarian or Unitarian theologies while also emphasizing different theological formulations such as “prosperity theology” or “eternal security.” The Pentecostal movement in Poland also includes some formerly Catholic Charismatic, or “Oases,” groups.

Possibly the most spectacular case of a marginal Protestant movement is the Jehovah’s Witnesses. Despite persecutions in former decades, it now constitutes the third largest denominational group in Poland. Although their appearance in Poland dates back to the beginning of the 20th century, the Jehovah’s Witnesses were officially registered in 1989, which has given the movement the principal impetus for growth (about 5 percent annually in the first years of the 1990s), most of the new converts having a Catholic background.

New Religious movements related to other traditions are much smaller. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness is perhaps the biggest among Hindu groups, and Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism is the largest among Buddhist groups. There are also a few NRMs of Polish origin. Together with movements that were born earlier and are now more respected denominations (such as the Polish Catholic Church and two Old Catholic Church of Mariavites), they are examples of religious creativity, which seems in Poland somewhat less vigorous than in neighboring countries like Russia and Germany, perhaps due to the strength of the dominant Catholic religious tradition. The most numerous among these are neo-Pagan groups, which have emerged as an attempt to reconstruct and revive old Slavonic religion from pre-Christian times. As part of the neo-Pagan revival in the region, groups such as the Clan of Ausrans have close relations with other neo-Pagan movements in neighboring countries, especially the Baltic countries and Ukraine.

The number of officially registered religious communities in Poland increased about 4 times in the last decade of the 20th century, now numbering more than 150, and a few have shown dynamic growth in membership. Recently, however, this growth has significantly decreased, due in large part to the growing social perception of religious minorities as a “sect problem” and to the resulting changes in legislation. The data on membership of particular movements that are registered as religious unions are gathered by the Main Statistical Office on the basis of annual reports presented by the movements themselves.

Thadeus Doktor

See also: Clan of Ausrans; Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Old Catholic Church of Mariavites/Catholic Church of Mariavites.

References

- Abramsky, Chimen. The Jews in Poland. New York: Wiley-Blackwell, 1991.
- Adamczuk, L., P. Ciecielag, M. Chmielewski, T. Doktor, and G. Gudaszewski. Wyznania religijne. Stowarzyszenia narodowosciowe i etniczne w Polsce, 1997–1999. Warsaw: GUS, 2000.
- Braun, J. Poland in Christian Civilization. London: Veritas Foundation, 1985.
- Doktor, Tadeusz. “Buddhism in Poland.” In New Religions and New Religiosity, edited by Eileen Barker and Margit Warburg, 83–94. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1998.
- Doktor, Tadeusz. State, Church and New Religious Movements in Poland. Krakow: Nomos, 1999.
- Kloczowski, Jerry. A History of Polish Christianity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Korbonski, A. The Church and State in Poland after World War II. Washington, DC: Council for Soviet and East European Research, 1994.
- Teter, Magda. Jews and Heretics in Catholic Poland: A Beleaguered Church in the Post-Reformation Era. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Zdaniewicz, W., and T. Zembrzuski, eds. Kosciól i religijnosc Polaków 1945–1999. Warsaw: Palotinum, 2000.

Polish National Catholic Church/Polish Catholic Church

The Polish National Catholic Church (PNCC; Kosciol Polskokatolicki) was founded by former Roman Catholic clergyman Franciszek (Francis) Hodur (1866–1953) in Scranton, Pennsylvania, in 1897. The immediate reason for the formation of a national church among Poles in America was a conflict about non-Polish priests assigned to predominantly Polish American parishes. The Polish immigrant members of the parishes resented the fact that the priests made use of parish funds without consulting the members. The reaction to the felt discrimination against Polish Catholics was addressed mainly to the predominantly Irish/German hierarchy in the United States. However, beginning in 1919, the church started to spread in Poland as well. In the early 1950s, the former missionary diocese of the PNCC in Poland became a separate denomination called the Polish Catholic Church (PCC).

The PNCC had a somewhat conflictual beginning, and the missionary church in Poland also encountered notable obstacles. Its petitions to be recognized as a full-fledged denomination were ignored by the government. The church was harassed by the local authorities, being charged with unauthorized use of Catholic liturgical vestments and furnishings and refused access to burial grounds that were under control of Roman Catholic parishes. Some local offices even refused to register births, marriages, and deaths of some Polish National Catholics.

Many years prior to Vatican II (1962–1965), the PNCC introduced the Polish tongue, as opposed to Latin, into rituals, catechism classes, and sermons. The General Synod in 1954 finally decided that Polish would be the sole language of the liturgy. However, English is now in more frequent use in worship in the United States. In doctrine, the PNCC is closest to the various Old Catholic churches with whom it has fraternal relationships. The church's major departure from the Roman Catholic Church, aside from breaking from its jurisdiction, has been discarding the dogma of papal infallibility. The PNCC recognizes Catholic teaching on the Highest Being, the salvation of the world, the work of the Holy Spirit, the responsibility of individuals for their actions before God, divine grace, and the need for a sacramental priesthood. Since 1909, however, the church has rejected the belief that people can eternally disappear or suffer in hell forever. More recently, the doctrines of original sin and the devil have been rejected as well. The year 1909 also marked the addition of a new sacrament, the Hearing and Announcing of the Word of God. In 1921 communal confession was introduced, and baptism and confirmation were joined into one sacrament. Celibacy was abolished in 1921.

In 1904 the church was given a synodal character, the Church Council was elected to exercise authority in the periods between synods, and the position of the elected bishop was introduced. The first bishop was consecrated in 1906. Since 1914, parishes cannot sell any of their estate without the consent of their bishop. They also cannot choose their pastor, though the bishop makes pastoral appointments only after consultation with the parish. In Poland, the parish council has less power than in the United States. Polish lay members have tended to be more subordinate to the clergy, as is the custom in the Roman Catholic parishes.

The highest authority in the PNCC is given to the Universal Synod (ordinary or extraordinary). The legislative authority in the diocese, limited by the requirements of the church constitution, belongs to the provincial synod, and in the parish it belongs to the parish assembly. When the synod is not in session, the responsible authority rests with the Church Council, chosen by the synod from among the priests and laymen. The executive authority covers church responsibilities as follows: the prime bishop with the Church Council has executive authority over the whole church, the diocesan bishop with the diocesan council has authority in dioceses, and parish committees have authority in parishes.

As of 2004, there were approximately 60,000 members in the PNCC. They were divided among 126 parishes and 37 missions, served by approximately 137 priests. There are four dioceses: Central, Eastern, Buffalo-Pittsburgh, and Western. Offspring of the church are the PNCC of Canada (previously an independent diocese consisting of six parishes and three missions) and the parishes in Brazil that remain a part of the church in the United States. The priests are trained in the Savonarola Theological Seminary in Scranton, Pennsylvania.

In Poland, the highest authority of jurisdiction and supervision rests with the General Polish Synod, which gathers every four years. The main executive body is the Council of Synod together with its president, who is both a bishop and the superior of the PCC. There are three dioceses in Poland: Warsaw, Wrocław, and Krakow. They cover 11 decanates. The PCC oversees 80 parishes. Some 20,000 members are served by 82 priests. The largest parishes and the largest number of parishes are to be found in the Province of Lublin and the area around Rzeszów. Both the PNCC and the PCC are members of the World Council of Churches, and maintain strong ties to the larger Old Catholic movement.

Polish National Catholic Church (U.S.A.)
1002 Pittston Ave.
Scranton, PA 18505
<http://www.pncc.org>

Polish Catholic Church (Poland)
Kosciol Polskokatolicki w RP
ul. Balonowa 7
02-635 Warszawa
Poland

Leslaw Borowski

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.
- Darczewska-Adamus, Krystyna. Kosciol Polskokatolicki. Warsaw: Instytut Filozofii i Socjologii PAN, 1968.
- Fox, Paul. The Polish National Catholic Church. Scranton, PA: School of Christian Living, 1955.
- Kubiak, Hieronim. The Polish National Catholic Church in the United States of America from 1897 to 1980. Warsaw and Krakow: Panstwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe, 1982.
- Wlodarski, Stephen. The Origin and Growth of the Polish National Catholic Church. Scranton, PA: The Polish National Catholic Church, 1974.

Polygamy-Practicing Mormons

When Wilford Woodruff (1807–1898) announced the Manifesto of 1890 it began the end of official sanctioned polygamy within the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. With that he drew a line that would be debated from that point forward about whether there was still authority to perform plural marriage. Within two decades those who continued in the principle and those who followed the Mormon church prophet's admonition to discontinue the practice of the polygamy became deeply divided. These were decades of significant confusion, as church-sanctioned marriages continued in some locations including in the Mexican colonies. Nevertheless, by 1904 and what was called the Second Manifesto, church policy was to excommunicate those who married additional women.

Many believed that the Manifesto was an accommodation to the government, a gesture designed to pave the way for statehood, and certainly not based on a revelation from God. The ambiguous language of the document seemed to prove this belief—leaving room for continuing polygamy outside the confines of the United States in Mexico or Canada.

Fundamentalism (a popular designation of those continuing to practice polygamy) as a movement began in the 1920s when some polygamists gathered around the charismatic personalities of Loren C. Woolley (1856–1934), John Y. Barlow (1874–1949), and Joseph W. Musser (1872–1954), among others. Excommunicated after 1904 for their disobedience to the Mormon prophet's Manifesto, fundamentalists settled in a small southern Utah town—Short Creek—and in various places around the Great Basin.

During the 1920s, Loren C. Woolley claimed that he had received the special commission to continue plural marriage in Centerville, Utah, in 1886. There he allegedly witnessed a visit of Jesus Christ and Joseph Smith, Jr. (1805–1844), to John Taylor (1808–1887), then prophet of the church in hiding from the federal marshals. Although many rejected this claim, the division between the official church organization and those who chose to continue in the doctrine was distinct—sealed by both official church policy and informal social division.

Distinguished first by the practice of plural marriage, the fundamentalists follow the teachings of the 19th-century presidents of the church, and some groups have established themselves communally in such organizations as the United Effort Firm of Short Creek. Separated from the Mormon church by excommunication, the fundamentalists believe they have continued priesthood to perform sacred marriage ceremonies, which they believe are binding through eternity.

It is estimated by the Utah attorney general's office that there are as many as 50,000 fundamentalists in Utah. While many of these belong to groups and live and worship together, there are also thousands of independent polygamists who practice the principle in isolation. What unites them is their continued belief that plurality is essential to their salvation, that it is a teaching of God, and that it is the best way to organize their family life.

In the 1940s and again in 1953, the government attempted to end polygamy in Utah and Arizona by arresting many of the men in the groups on a variety of charges other than polygamy. Typically these charges included cohabitation, violations of the Mann and Lindbergh statutes (designed to prohibit slavery and kidnapping), and statutory rape. More difficult to prove, polygamy was deemed justification for a community-wide roundup in 1953 under the auspices of the governor of Arizona, Howard Pyle. Since the 1950s Utah had an unofficial policy of leaving the polygamists alone until 2001, when independent polygamist Tom Green was tried for bigamy. Convicted because of his marriages to underage girls and problems in supporting his very large family of more than 20 children, Green became a self-designated spokesperson for the movement—appearing on numerous national television talk shows advocating his unusual lifestyle. More typically fundamentalists practice polygamy in private, separated from the mainstream, and avoid both publicity and public knowledge of the specifics of their family life.

A Mormon family of the 1870s, with a husband, two wives, and nine children. (Bettmann/Corbis)

Popular estimates suggest that polygamists may be 20,000 to 30,000 in number. Among the larger groups are the Apostolic United Apostolic Brethren, led by Owen Allred. They may be reached at 3139 W. 14700 S., No. A, Bluffsville, UT 84065. They report approximately 6,000 members. The United Order Effort, also known as the Fundamentalist LDS Church, is led by Rulon Jeffs and may be reached c/o Dan Barlow, Colorado City, AZ 86021. There are approximately 8,000 associated members. There are a variety of smaller groups located in Utah and adjacent states. One group, the Church of the First Born of the Fullness of Times, was decimated by violence when Ervil LeBaron (d. 1981), brother of founder Joel LeBaron (d. 1972), left the church, founded a rival group, and then masterminded a spree of violence at the church and other polygamy-practicing groups.

Leroy S. Johnson (1888–1986) led the group until his death in 1986. As the group's spiritual and temporal leader, he managed the financial affairs of the United Effort Firm and the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (FLDS). Before his successor, Rulon K. Jeffs (1909–2002), died in 2002, he turned much of the control over the church to his son Warren Jeffs (b. 1955). Under his administration the FLDS retrenched and became more exclusive and closed off from the world outside at the same time Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff began a period of increased prosecution of cases of alleged child abuse in the group. The principal focus was underage marriages. In perhaps the most notorious case since the 19th century concerning polygamy, Warren Jeffs was indicted by the state of Utah for his alleged involvement in the arrangement of underage marriages and on eight additional charges by Arizona. In May 2006, he was placed on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List because of his "unlawful flight to avoid prosecution" in Utah. He was arrested in August 2006 outside Las Vegas and tried in Utah in two separate cases in September 2007. He was found guilty on two counts of rape as an accomplice. In November 2007 he began serving a sentence of 10 years to life in the Utah State Prison.

Under Warren Jeffs the FLDS began building complexes of buildings in remote locations for members of the group. The most well known was the Yearning for Zion Ranch in Eldorado, Texas. The 1,700-member YFZ Ranch is found in Schleicher Co., in West Texas. On April 3, 2008, the Child Protective Services (CPS) Agency of Texas initiated a raid against the community in response to a phone call from an alleged 16-year-old girl, "Sarah," who said she was being held against her will. CPS considered the children to be the residents of a single household where they were exposed to polygamy and pressured into underage marriages. Judge Barbara Walther of the 51st District Court issued the order for the removal of all the community's children—462—under the age of 17 years. They were held at Fort Concho and at the Wells Fargo Pavilion in San Angelo, Texas. In May, the Third Court of Appeals ruled that the state had insufficient evidence that the children were in immediate danger. Within the year all the children were returned to their families, though litigation continues.

Martha Sonntag Bradley

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Smith, Joseph, Jr.

References

- Allred, Rulon C. Treasures of Knowledge. 2 vols. Hamilton, MT: Bitterroot Publishing Co., 1982.
- Bennion, Janet. Women of the Principle. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Bradley, Martha Sonntag. Kidnapped from That Land: The Government Raids on the Short Creek Polygamists. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1993.

Hardy, B. Carmon. Doing the Works of Abraham. Mormon Polygamy: Its Origin, Practice, and Demise. Norman, OK: Arthur H. Clark Company, 2007.

Musser, Joseph W. Celestial or Plural Marriage. Salt Lake City, UT: Truth Publishing Co., 1944.

Pomun Order of Korean Buddhism

Although the vast majority of Buddhist laity in the Republic of Korea are women, the largest and most influential Buddhist orders, the Chogye Order and the T'aego Order, are controlled by monks. The Pomun Order of Korean Buddhism is significant because it is the first organization in the Republic of Korea to be directed by and oriented toward Buddhist women. One of the primary purposes of the Pomun Order is to provide its members with ample opportunities to obtain merit that can be directed toward their ancestors and family members. So, aside from the traditional Buddhist observances of the day of the Buddha's birth, his leaving home, and his nirvana, the Pomun Order annually celebrates the Ghost Festival and commemorates their founder and monthly holds ritual services invoking the bodhisattvas Ksitigarbha and Avalokitesvara.

The origin of the Pomun Order of Korean Buddhist nuns is found in the establishment of the Yuji Chaedan Taehan Pulgyo Pomunwon, a Korean Buddhist foundation and support center, on August 5, 1971, by the nun Unyong. The next year, on April 20, 1972, the Pomun Order was officially organized, with Pomunsa, located in Seoul, Korea, as its headquarters. The nun Kungt'an (1885–1980) was named head of the order, and Unyong became the director of general affairs. By June 16 of that same year the nuns re-created the interior of the ancient Buddhist grotto of Sokkuram at Pomun Nunnery; by July 6 they were officially registered with the government as the Pomun Order.

The chapter titled "The Gateway to Everywhere of the Bodhisattva, He Who Observes the Sounds of the World" (Pomunp'um) of the Lotus Sutra, also known as the Avalokitesvara Sutra (Kwanum kyong), is the most important teaching of this religious group, suggesting that the nuns' activities are focused on developing compassion like that of Avalokitesvara, the Bodhisattva of Compassion. Other teachings and doctrines of the order are essentially the same as those of traditional mainstream East Asian Mahayana Buddhism and the Korean Chogye Order: they revere the Buddha Sakyamuni and encourage meditation and the study of the Diamond Sutra and Huineng's Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch. Special attention is given to the personal development of the three wisdoms (samhye): the wisdom that comes from hearing the Buddha's teaching (munhye), contemplating and reflecting upon it (sahye), and directly experiencing it in meditation (suhye).

As of 2008, the order reported a membership of 57,251 lay followers (18,801 males and 38,450 females), who are served by 204 religious specialists. The order operates a main nunnery and 35 branch nunneries, a nursing home, an orphanage, and 3 kindergartens.

Pomun Order of Korean Buddhism
Songbuk-ku Pomun-dong 3-ga 168
Seoul, 136-083
Republic of Korea

Richard D. McBride II

See also: Bodhisattva; Chogye Order; Korean Buddhism; Mahayana Buddhism; Wesak; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Samu Sunim. "Euyeong Sunim and the Founding of Pomun-jong, the First Independent Bhikshumi Order." Spring Wind Buddhist Cultural Forum 6, nos. 1–3 (1986): 129–162.
- Taehan Pulgyo Chinhungwon, ed. Han'guk Pulgyo ch'ongnam. 3rd ed. Seoul: Taehan Pulgyo Chinhungwon, 2008. s.v. Taehan Pulgyo Pomun-jong, 55–56.

Popocatepetl, Mount/Mount Iztaccihuatl

Mount Popocatepetl and Mount Iztaccihuatl are two volcanic mountains that were sacred to the Aztec people of Mexico. They are located some 45 miles southeast of Mexico City and what was the capital of the Aztec Empire, Tenochtitlan. Popocatepetl, the "Smoking Mountain," reaches upward some 17,800 feet. It has been active in recent history and frequently releases clouds of smoke from its summit. Iztaccihuatl, the "Sleeping Lady," is an extinct volcano some 17,400 feet in height. Historical records of the mountains and activity around them date to the arrival at the city of Cholula in 1519 by the Spanish conquistador Hernando Cortes (1485–1547) though evidence of human habitation in the area goes back to 700 BCE.

One pre-Spanish tale related to the mountains recounts the relation of the warrior Popocatepetl and his great love Iztaccihuatl. Their marriage depended on Popocatepetl winning an upcoming battle. He won, but while away, a rival spread a false rumor that he had died. Iztaccihuatl died of grief before he returned. Upon his return, Popocatepetl placed her body atop the mountain range west of the mountain named for his love, which now has the shape of a sleeping woman. Popocatepetl then climbed the mountain named for him where, torch in hand, he keeps vigil.

Both the height and the activity of Popocatepetl made it a object of attention. Bernardino de Sahagun, a Franciscan friar who observed and recorded the activities of Native Mexicans at the time of the Spanish conquest, noted that Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl derived some of their sacred status because rain clouds tended to gather around them. Believers would climb the mountains to venerate the water deities. Unfortunately, Sahagun failed to identify either the deities associated with the mountains or the mythology that surrounded them. At Chocula is a pyramid, Tlachihualtepetl (Man-made Hill), the largest in the Americas. It appears to have been constructed as a smaller Popocatepetl, possibly in reaction to the major eruption of 90 CE.

Volcanic eruptions have driven people away, while the rich soil around the mountain attracts people back. Traditional rituals designed to keep Popocatepetl calm were still being observed as late as the 1980s, but seemed to have disappeared as the 21st century began.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Franciscans; Mountains.

The snow-covered Popocatepetl volcano stands behind Los Remedios Church in the valley region of Puebla, Mexico. Popocatepetl, which means Smoking Mountain in Aztec, is located 34 miles east of Mexico City and is North America's second highest volcano and one of the most active in the Aztec territory. (Ulises Ruiz/epa/Corbis)

References

- Gruzinski, Serge. The Aztecs: Rise and Fall of an Empire. New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1992.
- Plunket, Patricia, and Gabriela Uruñuela. "Appeasing the Volcano Gods." Archeology 51, no. 4 (July–August 1998). <http://www.archaeology.org/9807/abstracts/volcano.html>.
- Pohl, John. Aztecs and Conquistadores: The Spanish Invasion and the Collapse of the Aztec Empire. Oxford: Osprey Publishing, 2005.

■ Portugal

Portugal, the westernmost country of continental Europe, has a lengthy western coast on the North Atlantic Ocean. It otherwise shares the Iberian Peninsula with Spain. Its 35,672 square miles of territory are home to its 10,707,924 people.

Portugal was imagined by the propaganda of the fascist regime (1926–1974) as a profoundly Catholic nation. The results of the 2001 census validate this notion inasmuch as 93 percent of the people who answered the question regarding religion declared themselves Catholics. This represented a 2 percent decrease since 1991, benefiting evenly the “irreligious” and “other Christians” categories. By 2001, the latter two represented, respectively, 4 percent and 2 percent of the population. Official statistics estimated the overall population in December 2007 at 10,617,575 people. Twenty-six percent of these lived on or, mostly, around the capital city of Lisbon. The former metropolis of the Portuguese Empire has witnessed many peoples come and go throughout the ages: pre-Roman Iberians, Phoenicians, Romans, Jews, Suebi, Vandals, Visigoths, Moors, and sub-Saharan Africans. All these were blended into the ethnic makeup of the Portuguese people. Still, the Roma constitute a centuries-old unassimilated ethnic minority. Recent migratory influxes originate in areas of the globe that were part of the former empire—Goa, several African countries, and Brazil, among others—and Eastern Europe. Portuguese idiom, a Romance language spoken by more than 240 million people in Portugal, its former colonies, and respective diasporas, binds most of these peoples.

Worshippers attend an international pilgrimage at Fatima Sanctuary in Fatima, Portugal, 2009. (Ruigouveia/Dreamstime.com)

Despite imperial expansion overseas, the frontiers of mainland Portugal have remained remarkably stable over time. The frontier municipality of Olivença/Olivenza—historically disputed with Spain, which exerts de facto control over the territory—is the sole contentious boundary in the last few centuries of Portuguese history. However, notwithstanding this overall picture of a homogeneous country, the scholars of the democratic period discovered several strata of religious syncretism. For instance, the extensive 1998 ISSP survey on religious beliefs and attitudes seems to corroborate that canonical and non-canonical beliefs and practices coexist effortlessly in Portuguese society. In this encyclopedia entry, we will mention both these strands but will give a special focus to those ideas and movements that belong to the Portuguese religious heterodoxy (for a recent history of the Roman Catholic Church in Portugal, see Azevedo, 2000–2002).

Prior to the founding of the Portuguese state in 1139 CE, the territory that corresponds to present-day mainland Portugal had already been subjected to a cross-pollination of religious influences by the ways of conquest, trade, and migration. However, the history of the region before the first Iron Age, which began as the Phoenician colonization of the Iberian Peninsula advanced, is shrouded because of the absence of thorough archaeological research. The Phoenicians brought not only the technology of iron and the first form of writing known in the peninsula but also new rites, gods, and ways of worship. Contemporary scholarship emphasizes the survival of these practices in Christian garb. An infernal god named Endovellicus, the most documented indigenous deity (with 70 inscriptions extant), provides an example of the survival of this ancient religious stratum; his cult not only thrived under the Roman Empire but is believed to have taken a later Christian shape in the cult of Saint Michael.

The story of Priscillianism, a fourth-century Christian heresy that emerged in the northwest part of the peninsula, also demonstrates that almost anything could happen religiously in Portugal. In the second half of the fourth century, an Egyptian named Marcus arrived in the peninsula preaching Gnostic and Manichean ideas. Several well-off laymen and laywomen paid him attention, and a religious movement began. Priscillian (ca. 340–385), a landowner, took leadership of the movement and used his rhetorical gifts in proselytizing. In 380, 12 Catholic bishops met in Saragossa to write 8 canons condemning Priscillianism. By 385 Priscillian and four of his followers were executed by decapitation in Treveros under accusations of maleficium, or malevolent magic. Their remains were carried back home and revered by their followers. The movement continued, stronger if anything, and dwindled only in the sixth century. Historian José Mattoso has suggested that the main characteristic of the movement was a certain doctrinal formlessness that facilitated its trickling down from the upper stratum of society and its blending with popular Paganism.

Arab Muslims, or Moors, invaded Portugal in the eighth century as part of their spread across the Iberian Peninsula, and Islam continued to dominate the region for the next three centuries. Beginning in the 11th century, a decades-long effort led to the expulsion of the Arabs and the virtual elimination of Islam from the country. Today, there is a small Muslim community, the Comunidade Islámica de Lisbon, that originated in the 20th century around expatriates from former Portuguese colonies.

The Knights Templar helped the first king of Portugal, Afonso Henriques (ca. 1109–1185), to conquer the southwestern part of the peninsula from the Moors, who had controlled it since 711. After the suppression of the order by Pope Clement V in 1312, King Dinis (1261–1325) renamed its Portuguese branch the Order of Christ and left it to go about its business as usual. Henry the Navigator (1394–1460), mastermind of the 15th-century discoveries, was himself leader of this order, and the ships that sailed off from Lisbon were flagged with the cross of the Order of Christ. These facts are the cornerstones of a vast literature of mystic nationalism that speculates about the real aim of the Portuguese discoveries.

In the beginning of the 14th century, Joachim de Fiore's (ca. 1132–1202) theory of the Three Ages began to permeate Portugal. Cistercian and Franciscan monks were the first to succumb to its charms, but the royal family itself would not be unmoved. This theory proclaimed the imminent rise of an Age of the Holy Ghost, following the Ages of the Father and the Son. In this new aeon, humanity would receive a Fifth Gospel by a ceaseless and direct dispensation of the Holy Ghost, and the ideal of universal brotherhood would finally become a reality.

The Festivities of the Holy Ghost began during the reign of King Dinis (1261–1325) and Queen Saint Isabel (1270–1336), circa 1305, and the massive popular adherence that followed quickly spread the festivities throughout the mainland and, later on, into Portugal's overseas possessions, thus constituting a phenomenon unparalleled in other Christian countries. The main features of these festivities were the coronation of a child or man of low social standing, symbolizing that the Empire of the Spirit belongs to the "simple and naive ones"; a collective banquet, symbolizing fraternity among men; and the unchaining of a prisoner, symbolizing the liberation of humanity.

The Counter-Reformation and, later, 19th-century liberalism contributed to the progressive deterioration of these festivities, which eventually almost disappeared from mainland Portugal. They are still very much alive in the Azores, in some parts of Brazil, and in some Azorean emigrant communities in the United States. The Empire of the Holy Ghost, as a concept, would re-emerge throughout the history of Portuguese mystic thought, under the guise of the Fifth Empire proclaimed by Sebastianism.

The Inquisition was established in 1536 and remained active until 1821, when it was abolished as a result of the liberal revolution of 1820. The estimates of the number of victims, mainly Jews, vary widely, but the national archive is reported to hold registers of 40,000 inquisitorial processes. Many scholars track Portugal's decadence, a recurrent theme in discussions of national identity, to this source. The persecution focusing on witchcraft happened later and was milder (12 casualties) than in the rest of Europe.

PORTUGAL

In 1578 the disappearance of King Sebastião (1554–1578) at the catastrophic Battle of Alcácer-Quibir, in Morocco, created one of the most serious succession crises in the history of the country, resulting in the appropriation of the Portuguese throne by King Philip II of Spain. During this national eclipse, a belief spread among the population that King Sebastião had not died in North Africa and would return to claim his throne and to reconstitute Portugal's independence and grandeur. This period constituted the so-called first stage of Sebastianism, when the still reasonable belief in the physical return of the monarch fostered the emergence of diviners, fake King Sebastiaños, and prophets, many of them newly converted Jews who saw in this new form of messianism a desperate solution for their miserable condition. Before the king's disappearance, Bandarra (1500–ca. 1556), a village shoemaker, had composed a set of prophetic verses that after the battle was readily spread around the country and interpreted within a Sebastianistic context. This enthusiasm was severely repressed by the Inquisition, which, in the following centuries, would continue to look at Sebastianism as an undesirable popular belief and, in its later configurations, as a dangerous Christian heterodoxy.

As time went by, dwindling hope in the king's comeback led to the second phase of Sebastianism, which was no longer the simple belief in the return of a particular savior. Instead, Sebastianism was now a political philosophy, of which the most influential figure is the Jesuit priest António Vieira (1608–1697). According to Vieira's comparative analysis of biblical texts and Bandarra's prophecies, the return of D. Sebastião, the Concealed One, will coincide with the advent of the Fifth Empire, a kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, that will establish a new ecumenical order upon Earth. From this point on, Sebastianism and Fifth Empirealism became, for many, a foundation of national identity, presenting Portugal with the role of future redeemer of the world, a chosen but yet unfulfilled nation.

As Sebastianistic theories were built, their antitheses inevitably arose as well. In the 18th and 19th centuries, bitter disputes were fought between Sebastianistic and anti-Sebastianistic politicians and scholars. Although popular belief in Sebastianism decreased until it disappeared, philosophy and literature continued to drink from this spring. In the 20th century, poets such as Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935) and Teixeira de Pascoaes (1877–1952), and philosophical movements such as Renascença Portuguesa, Integralismo Lusitano, and Filosofia Portuguesa, used Sebastianism in conceptualizing philosophical and aesthetic systems that were meant to reflect an idiosyncratically Portuguese vision and sensibility.

The hegemony of the Roman Catholic Church was severely disrupted by the rise of the liberal movement in the 19th century. Thus, 1834 saw the extinction of all male religious orders and the nationalization and auction of convents, monasteries, and colleges. Many holy days and religious processions were also abolished. This was not a mere action of secularization but a strong blow against the main pillar of absolutist rule, which relied on the male religious orders for the planning and development of the country's natural resources, the colonization of overseas possessions, and the management of education and culture. The Masonically inspired First Republic (1910) separated state from church, no longer recognizing Catholic Christianity as the nation's official religion.

It was in this context that Theosophy and Kardecian Spiritism rose and enjoyed some popularity among intellectuals, artists, and the military. The Portuguese Theosophical Society was founded in 1921 and the Portuguese Spiritist Federation in 1926. While the Theosophical movement never showed significant adhesion or social impact, the Spiritist movement gathered important public figures and physical resources. All this ended in 1953, when the then fascist regime's Ministry of Education ordered the Spiritist Federation to cease all activities. Portuguese Spiritists were thus driven underground up to the revolution in 1974. The same happened with other religious minorities, such as Jehovah's Witnesses. The Spiritist movement, which

Portugal

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	8,371,000	9,645,000	89.9	0.12	9,386,000	8,539,000
Roman Catholics	7,979,000	9,175,000	85.5	–0.05	8,800,000	7,846,000
Independents	10,900	240,000	2.2	2.18	320,000	400,000
Marginals	19,500	135,000	1.3	0.60	200,000	250,000
Agnostics	275,000	823,000	7.7	7.01	1,021,000	1,088,000
Atheists	30,000	134,000	1.2	2.16	150,000	160,000
Buddhists	0	60,000	0.6	0.58	70,000	90,000
Muslims	800	26,200	0.2	0.58	40,000	53,000
Chinese folk	0	22,000	0.2	0.58	25,000	26,000
Hindus	0	6,500	0.1	0.58	9,000	12,000
Spiritists	0	4,000	0.0	0.58	5,000	6,500
Baha'is	1,800	2,100	0.0	0.58	3,000	4,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	1,600	0.0	0.59	2,000	2,200
Jews	1,300	460	0.0	0.57	460	460
Sikhs	0	450	0.0	0.58	600	800
Total population	8,680,000	10,725,000	100.0	0.58	10,712,000	9,982,000

began as an elite group and integrated a society of psychological research in Oporto, never regained its original splendor, but the term espiritismo was appropriated by a wide array of healers and mediums, and evolved into a very popular form of religiousness revolving around the non-corporeal figures of Sousa Martins, a famous Portuguese medical doctor, and Padre Cruz, a pious Catholic priest.

Theosophy, on the other hand, has played an interesting if subtle role. Fernando Pessoa, whose monumental oeuvre also dwells on occult and Gnostic themes, acknowledged the influence of Helena Blavatsky and Annie Besant and was one of the first translators of their works. Much more recently, in 1988, the Centro Lusitano de Unificação Cultural, one of the most international of Portuguese New Religious movements (NRMs), was founded under Theosophical inspiration. Their books, usually “channeled” by figures of all times and cultures, explicitly utilize Theosophical terms and concepts.

By 1926 a military coup brought in 48 years of dictatorship. During this period the Roman Catholic Church would regain its hegemony. Thus, by 1929 the religious orders were allowed to return and in 1940 the Holy See celebrated a Concordat with the Portuguese state. This document, which would only be revised late in the new democratic period, gave the Roman Catholic Church exclusive privileges, including the right to celebrate marriages (which could not be terminated by a legal action of divorce); it also returned control over confiscated assets to the Roman Catholic Church and reintroduced Catholic religious education in public schools, which had been abolished by the First Republic. Although most of the non-Catholic denominations established prior to the military coup were not forbidden by the new regime, public visibility and proselytism were strongly discouraged and even repressed. Consequently, most religious minorities adopted a low profile during the dictatorship that, for some of them, proved hard to surpass even in the democratic period.

The 1974 revolution brought in a new Constitution that granted the right of religious association and freedom of religious choice, thus allowing foreign NRMs to establish themselves in Portugal. However, only in 1996 did a Law of Religious Freedom begin to be discussed in Parliament, a slow process that culminated in its approval in 2001. The new law enhances equality of rights for all faiths and creates the legal entity of Established Church, for which any religious community legally extant in Portugal for more than 30 years (or 60 years abroad) can apply. Despite this equalitarian and globally more favorable context for religious minorities, in 2004 a new Concordat was celebrated between Portugal and the Holy See, privileging the Roman Catholic Church in its relationship with the Portuguese state.

The total of individuals belonging to NRMs may be lower than 2 percent of the population, including older movements such as Jehovah's Witnesses and Seventh-day Adventists. NRMs have not raised much interest at the political or social level, with the exception of two Pentecostal movements, the Brazilian Universal Church of the Kingdom of God and the Portuguese Igreja Maná, which has had a significant expansion to African Portuguese-speaking countries.

Finally, one of the most polychromatic aspects of Portuguese religiosity lies in the seasonal religious festivities, most of them celebrated locally with particular variants. Many of these, blending religious-magical motifs, still present remains of ancient pre-Christian traditions while manifesting a creative syncretism with Catholic ceremonies and the cult of saints. In terms of popular religiosity, however, the pilgrimage to the Marian shrine of Fatima is the main seasonal event. The apparitions and other alleged miracles that occurred from May to October 1917, amid a period of social and political turmoil, not only helped the Roman Catholic Church to regain its local power but turned into an international religious phenomenon moving hundreds of thousands of pilgrims each year in search of healing or the payment of promises.

Tiago Santos, Pedro Soares, and Miguel Farias

See also: Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritism; Theosophical Society (America); Universal Church of the Kingdom of God.

References

- Azevedo, Carlos Moreira, ed. História Religiosa de Portugal. Lisbon: Círculo de Leitores, 2000–2002.
- Mattoso, José, ed. História de Portugal. Vols. 1–8. Lisbon: Círculo de Leitores, 1993–1994.
- Pais, José Machado, ed. Atitudes Sociais dos Portugueses 2. Religião e Bioética. Lisbon: Instituto de Ciências Sociais da Universidade de Lisboa, 2001.
- Vasconcellos, José Leite de. Religiões da Lusitânia. Vols. 1–3. Lisbon: Imprensa Nacional, 1878, 1905, 1913.
- Vilaça, Helena. Da Torre de Babel às terras prometidas: pluralismo religioso em Portugal. Oporto: Afrontamento, 2006.

Possession

Possessive phenomena are recognized broadly across all of the world's religions and also among the multitude of popular or folk religions on every continent (Holmberg 1993). Religious explanations of possessive phenomena include the idea that a spirit or spiritual being controls the body of a person or animal (the host) to the extent that it is the spirit being that determines some or all of the host's behavior. Alternate terms include "trance," "dissociation," and "ecstatic state." Because the central idea is that of control rather than ownership, the English term "possession" is somewhat of a misnomer. The type of control seen ranges from localized physical phenomena (uncontrolled limb movements) to complete control, in which case possession is an appropriate term.

Religious beliefs about the beings that possess people vary widely. They may be seen as gods, angels (good or evil), the dead who have returned to this world in some way, nature spirits, ghosts, or other spirit beings (Katz 1987). These beings may be perceived to be essentially good, in which case possession is a gift to be sought after (Pentecostal Christians being baptized by the Holy Spirit). They may be seen as neutral or having the same foibles as humans, depending on the circumstances in which they reveal themselves. In these cases possession can be a mixed blessing for the host—depending on the mood of the possessing being (African "living dead" possessing a descendant because they are being ignored). They may be understood to be vengeful, punishing individuals or whole communities for reasons not fully known (spirits causing epidemics among Chinese migrants who settled in Taiwan; Katz 1987). In the worst cases, the possessing beings are malevolent and their purpose is to torment—possibly even kill—their hosts. In such cases religious specialists are brought in to perform an exorcism if possible.

A Haitian woman is possessed by spirits while dancing during a Vodou ceremony in Soukri, Haiti. (AP Photo/Daniel Morel)

While possession of animals is always involuntary, people can become possessed through voluntary and involuntary means. Those who choose to become possessed do so through a variety of means. Typically this comes through specific ritual activity. Some engage in ceremonies that incorporate rhythmic dancing or other bodily movement, usually accompanied by percussive music and chanting (Walker 1972). Others pray special prayers while engaging in magical activities (blood-letting or sacrifices), designed to attract or bind the possessing being. This may also include endurance trials (sun dancing), self-mortification (Sutton 1990), intake of hallucinogenic drugs (such as peyote), and putting on or wearing spiritually powerful items (clothing, masks, rings, amulets, or accessories; Merrill 2004). People may seek possession out of devotion to the possessing spirit (McDaniel 1988), to help them face or overcome social tensions (reversing social bias, Kraemer 1979; witch hunts, Jones 1989), or to become specialized religious practitioners (Kawamura 2003).

A person or animal may also be involuntarily possessed. It may be manifest through certain disorders (epilepsy, certain types of schizophrenia), though the diagnosis is left to specialists (zar possession in Ethiopia, Natvig 1988). In some cases the reason for such possession is looked for in the community of the possessed since the possessed themselves may not have done anything to bring about the condition. They may be victims on behalf of the community for reasons that require the discernment of specialized religious practitioners. This is more often seen among certain types of vulnerable people (young children, pregnant women, those perceived to be mentally disturbed; Karim 1989, 287–288).

Because the beings that do the possessing are not physically seen, the sole evidence of possession comes through observation of the host: manifestations of anomalous states of being (trance, catatonic stupor or excitement, seizures), physical abnormalities (change of voice, agitation, facial expressions), unusual actions (self-mutilation, fainting, extraordinary strength or endurance), atypical verbal expressions (singing, glossolalia, prophesying, cursing, extreme vulgarity), and other peculiar phenomena (automatic drawing or writing, inexplicable knowledge, environmental changes around the host).

Wherever possessive phenomena are found, religious teachings give local practitioners a variety of means to deal with possession. In many traditional African settings possession is one type of sign that the host is to be set apart to become a religious practitioner such as a medium, shaman, or diviner. By way of contrast, African Christians believe that the possessed are to be set free through prayer (Laurent 2001). Religions in a variety of Asian settings teach that a person can be possessed because the spirits want to disclose a message or warning, and possessing a person is understood as an appropriate means of conveyance (McDaniel 1988). In Latin American settings, newer religious traditions incorporate spirit possession as integral to religious expression (Candomblé in Brazil; Van de Port 2007). It should be noted that many traditional religious adherents understand possession as evidence of sound—even exemplary—social, psychological, and spiritual health of the host. In contrast, secular social and psychological typologies almost universally cast possession as pathological (Smith 2001, 211).

In those societies most impacted by modernism and subsequent secularized orientations to life, newer and more secular sets of explanations for possession phenomena were developed, especially by those in social science and health-related fields. Anthropologists, sociologists, psychologists, and medical professionals generated explanations for possession phenomena framed in terms of social (ritual and culturally approved responses to social stress or lack of social power, Newell 2007), psychological (wish-fulfillment, dissociation resulting from trauma, hysteria, paranoia, or schizophrenia; Lietaer and Corveleyn 1995; Ward and Beaubrun 1980), and biological (asthma, epilepsy, hypnotic states, chemical or hormonal imbalance, shock) (Marayam 2001) sources.

Religious practitioners exposed to these more contemporary perspectives have been adept at incorporating the newer frames of reference into their own taxonomies without necessarily discarding religious explanations. For example, many Africans distinguish “Western” diseases—treatable through secular means—from “local” diseases, which are treatable only through traditional means (Oosthuizen 1988). They may also develop criteria to distinguish possessive phenomena that are fully explainable by secular approaches from those that are only explainable by spiritual causes. In such cases, the former are recognized as possessive-like behavior while the latter are still seen as genuine possession. For example, it is not unusual to find Christians in Western societies who incorporate sophisticated medical and psychological evaluations in their assessment and treatment of those who exhibit symptoms of possession (Augsburger 1988; Oger 1996; Peck 2005).

It appears that the extent of observable possessive phenomena does not lessen with the rise of anti-religious worldviews or secular education (Paper 1996). Traditional religious explanations, together with traditional approaches to ameliorate negative possessive behavior, will continue to serve in societies that rely on them. It is likely that newer syncretistic practices will arise as well (Mary 2001; Rich 2006). While in general the academic world has tended to treat such phenomena in secular ways, the ontological puzzle that possession phenomena provide has yet to be fully explained through such methods.

The rich variety of phenomena, the contrasting and ever-changing explanations, and the continuing stresses of societies around the world will continue to provide invaluable resources for ongoing religious study of the fascinating (and frightening) phenomena known as possession.

A. Scott Moreau

See also: Ancestors; Exorcism; Nepal, Indigenous Religions in; Pentecostalism.

References

- Augsburger, David. Pastoral Counseling across Cultures. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986.
- Caulder, Sharon. African Vodù: The Spirituality of a People. Carpinteria, CA: Pacifica Graduate Institute, 2000.
- Chajes, Jeffrey H. Between Worlds: Dybbuks, Exorcists, and Early Modern Judaism. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Cohen, Emma. The Mind Possessed: The Cognition of Spirit Possession in an Afro-Brazilian Religious Tradition. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Filan, Kenaz, and Raven Kaldera. Drawing Down the Spirits: The Traditions and Techniques of Spirit Possession. Rochester, VT: Destiny Books, 2009.
- Fjelstad, Karen, and Thi H. Nguyen. Possessed by the Spirits: Mediumship in Contemporary Vietnamese Communities. Ithaca, NY: Southeast Asia Program Publications, Southeast Asia Program, Cornell University, 2006.
- Herdero, J. M. The Dead Rescue the Living: Spirit Possession in a Gujarati Christian Community. Anand, Gujarat: Gujarat Sahitya Prakash, 2001.
- Holmberg, David. "The Shamanic Illusion." Journal of Ritual Studies 7, no. 1 (1993): 163–175.
- Jones, Gwilym I. "Recollections of the Spirit Movement in the Ibibio Area of Calabar Province." Africa (London, England: 1928) 59, no. 4 (1989): 517–527.
- Karim, Anwarul. "Shamanism in Bangladesh." Asian Folklore Studies 47, no. 2 (1988): 277–309.
- Katz, Paul R. "Demons or Deities: The Wangye of Taiwan." Asian Folklore Studies 46, no. 2 (1987): 197–215.
- Kawamura, Kunimitsu. "A Female Shaman's Mind and Body, and Possession." Asian Folklore Studies 62, no. 2 (2003): 257–289.
- Klass, Morton. Mind over Mind: The Anthropology and Psychology of Spirit Possession. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.
- Kraemer, Ross S. "Ecstasy and Possession: The Attraction of Women to the Cult of Dionysus." Harvard Theological Review 72, nos. 1–2 (1979): 55–80.
- Laurent, Pierre J. "The Faith-Healers of the Assemblies of God in Burkina Faso: Taking Responsibility for Diseases Related to 'Living Together.'" Social Compass 48, no. 3 (2001): 333–351.
- Lewis, I. M. Ecstatic Religion: A Study of Shamanism and Spirit Possession. London; New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Lietaer, Hugo, and Jozef Corveleyn. "Psychoanalytical Interpretation of the Demoniocal Possession and the Mystical Development of Sister Jeanne Des Anges from Loudun (1605–1665)." International Journal for the Psychology of Religion 5, no. 4 (1995): 259–276.
- Makris, G. P. Changing Masters: Spirit Possession and Identity Construction among Slave Descendants and Other Subordinates in the Sudan. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2000.
- Mary, André. "From One Syncretism to Another: Culture of Trance and Charisma of Deliverance." Social Compass 48, no. 3 (2001): 315–331.
- Mayaram, Shail. "Recent Anthropological Works on Spirit Possession." Religious Studies Review 27, no. 3 (2001): 213–222.
- McDaniel, June. "Possession States among the Śaktas of West Bengal." Journal of Ritual Studies 2, no. 1 (1988): 87–99.
- Merrill, Michael S. "Masks, Metaphor and Transformation: The Communication of Belief in Ritual Performance." Journal of Ritual Studies 18, no. 1 (2004): 16–33.
- Natvig, Richard. "Liminal Rites and Female Symbolism in the Egyptian Zār Possession Cult." Numen 35, no. 1 (1988): 57–68.
- Newell, Sasha. "Pentecostal Witchcraft: Neoliberal Possession and Demonic Discourse in Ivoirian Pentecostal Churches." Journal of Religion in Africa 37, no. 4 (2007): 461–490.

- Oesterreich, Traugott K. Possession: Demonical and Other: Among Primitive Races in Antiquity, the Middle Ages and Modern Times. London: Kegan Paul, 2002.
- Oger, Louis. "The Pastoral Approach to Spirit Possession: A Zambian Case." AFER 38, no. 5 (1996): 274–290.
- Oosthuizen, Gerhardus C. "Interpretation of Demonic Powers in Southern African Independent Churches." Missiology 16, no. 1 (1988): 3–22.
- Paper, Jordan D. "Mediums and Modernity: The Institutionalization of Ecstatic Religious Functionaries in Taiwan." Journal of Chinese Religions, no. 24 (Fall 1996): 105–129.
- Patil, S. R. Phenomenon of Possession: Psycho-Social Clinical Study of Spirits. New Delhi: Reliance, 2006.
- Peck, M. Scott. Glimpses of the Devil: A Psychiatrist's Personal Accounts of Possession, Exorcism, and Redemption. New York: The Free Press, 2005.
- Rich, Cynthia H. "Spirits and the Spirit: The Ministry of Madagascar's Healing Shepherds." Religion & Theology 13, no. 1 (2006): 54–71.
- Smith, Frederick M. "The Current State of Possession Studies as a Cross-Disciplinary Project." Religious Studies Review 27, no. 3 (2001): 203–212.
- Stoller, Paul. Fusion of the Worlds: An Ethnography of Possession among the Songhay of Niger. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Sutton, Donald S. "Rituals of Self-Mortification: Taiwanese Spirit-Mediums in Comparative Perspective." Journal of Ritual Studies 4, no. 1 (1990): 99–125.
- Van der Port, Mattijs. "Bahian White: The Dispersion of Candomblé Imagery in the Public Sphere of Bahia." Material Religion 3, no. 2 (2007): 242–272.
- Walker, Sheila. Ceremonial Spirit Possession in Africa and Afro-America: Forms, Meanings, and Functional Significance for Individuals and Social Groups. Leiden: Brill, 1972.
- Ward, Colleen A., and Michael H. Beaubrun. "The Psychodynamics of Demon Possession." Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 19, no. 2 (1980): 201–207.

Prambanan

Prambanan (Lorojonggrang) is the largest Hindu temple complex in Indonesia. It is located in the small Indonesian province of Yogyakarta in south-central Java. It was built following the rise of the Hindu Sanjaya dynasty, which replaced the Buddhist Sailendra dynasty that had controlled the southern half of the island of Java. Buddhists had constructed a large stupa complex at Borobudur north of Yogyakarta City. The Prambanan temple complex is only 25 miles from Yogyakarta City and about 12 miles from Borobudur.

Initial construction on Prambanan was begun by Rakai Pikatan (who had a Buddhist wife) about 850 CE. After he constructed the main temple, various groups of Hindu believers added additional buildings. The main temple was surrounded by a wall that both separated it from the other temples and allowed a nearby river to be diverted so it flowed along the temple's edge.

Saivism dominated Javanese Hinduism, and the Sanjaya dynasty closely aligned itself with the deity Shiva. Worship at Prambanan mixed the worship of Shiva and the other deities with acts of veneration to the ruler. At the same time, the lesser temples were built by lower-level royalty who attempted to assert their position in the emerging system that combined the creation of a new religious and a new political order.

Prambanan, like nearby Borobudur, was fated to pass from the scene. Java was conquered by Islam and the new rulers suppressed Hinduism. Any acknowledgment of previous rulers at Prambanan especially irritated the Islam leadership, as its smacked of idolatry. In a relatively brief time, the complex was abandoned and the jungle allowed to overrun it. Like Borobudur, its very existence was forgotten, and news of its existence came in 1733, at which time a Dutch explorer, C. A. Lons, rediscovered it. For various reasons, clearing of the site was delayed for more than a century and meaningful excavation only began in 1885. Real restoration waited until after World War I and then had to be abandoned by the advent of World War II. Today, restoration continues on the hundreds of temples at the complex, though in the meantime believers (firmly entrenched in the nearby island of Bali) have begun to utilize the site. The main Siva temple was rededicated in 1953.

Prambanan Temple Complex, Java, Indonesia. Built in the ninth century, it is the largest Hindu temple in Indonesia. (Yai/Dreamstime.com)

The focus at Prambanan is on the main Siva temple and 15 nearby slightly smaller temples dedicated to other important Hindu deities including Vishnu and Brahma, all located within the center square. Then outside the wall are 224 smaller temples. These temples are arranged in four rows with the temples shrinking in size (and status) the further from the main temple they are located. There is also a second wall that encompasses these smaller temples, and gates admit people to the various sections of the complex. The complex is now the primary temple complex for Java's Hindu minority and increasingly draws believers from the other islands. In 1991, Prambanan was named to the list of World Heritage Sites by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Borobudur; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Pilgrimage; Temples, Hindu.

References

- Bunce, Frederick W. The Iconography of Architectural Plans: A Study of the Influence of Buddhism and Hinduism on Plans of South and Southeast Asia. New Delhi: D. K. Printworld, 2002.
- Iyer, Alessandra. Prambanan: Sculpture and Dance in Ancient Java. A Study in Dance Iconography. Bangkok: White Lotus Press, 1998.
- Jipto, Moert, and Bambang Prasetyo. The Siwa Temple of Prambanan. Yogyakarta, Indonesia: Penerbit Kanisius, 1992.

Jordaan, Roy E. In Praise of Prambanan: Dutch Essays on the Lord Jonggrang Temple Complex. Leiden: KITLV Press, 1996.

Prana

See Energy.

Presbyterian Church in Cameroon

The Presbyterian Church in Cameroon (Église presbytérienne camérounaise) shares its early history with several churches, including the Evangelical Church of Cameroon, which have their roots in the original Baptist mission begun in 1845. The Baptists were forced out in 1884 when Germany gained hegemony over the region, and they were replaced with missionaries from the Basel Mission, most of whom were of the Swiss Reformed tradition. The Baptist members were upset with the very different system of church discipline introduced by the Basel missionaries and by their introduction of infant baptism (Baptists believe in the baptism only of adults who have made a profession of the Christian faith). Many left, but the missionaries continued to work with the remaining members and initiated their own new mission stations.

With the outbreak of World War I in 1914, the British and French moved into the region and divided the territory. The Basel missionaries turned over their 15 stations in French Cameroon to the Paris Mission. These eventually became the core from which the Evangelical Church of Cameroon would emerge. The remaining work was turned over to African leaders who headed the church for the next decade. Finally, in 1925, the missionaries from the Basel Mission were allowed to return to the British-controlled part of Cameroon. They continued to work with the church that they had nurtured through World War I but soon realized that it was time for the mission to become independent.

In 1957 the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon was constituted. It is organized with a presbyterial polity, with a synod as the highest legislative body. The Mission continues to support the schools and medical facilities, with both financial aid and staff. In 1968 the schools were turned over to the church. Among the schools now sponsored by the church is the Theological Seminary at Kumba.

In 2005, the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon reported 700,000 members in its 1,306 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church in Cameroon
PO Box 19
Buea
Cameroon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church of Cameroon; Paris Mission; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Lukunze, Edward Focrcha. Evangelistic Strategies for the Year 2000 and Beyond: Ruby Jubilee Historical Reflections of the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon. N.p., 1999.
- Matute, Daniel Lyonga. A Brief History of the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon, 1886–1986: A Centenary Souvenir. N.p.: the author, 1986.
- Nku, Nyansako-ni. Journey in Faith: The Story of the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon. Buea, Cameroon: Presbyterian Church in Cameroon, 1982.

Presbyterian Church in Canada

The Presbyterian Church in Canada (PCC) has its origins in the 16th-century Protestant Reformation in Europe and in the teachings of Reformers John Calvin (1509–1564) and John Knox (ca. 1514–1572). The Presbyterian presence in Canada began with the arrival of Scottish Presbyterians in the Maritime

Interior of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church in Toronto, Canada. (iStockphoto.com)

Provinces and Ontario in the late 18th century. The various locations and organizations of Presbyterians in Canada followed trends in immigration from Scotland, as well as mirroring the doctrinal disputes occurring in Scotland.

The 19th century, however, saw a slow unification of the various diverse Presbyterian denominations. In 1875 these unions culminated in the formation of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. By the end of the 19th century the PCC was “neck and neck” with the Methodists in the race to be the largest Protestant denomination in Canada. In 1925 about one-third of the PCC membership refused to join with the Methodists and the Congregationalists in the formation of the United Church of Canada, instead remaining autonomous as the PCC. The PCC experienced a significant decrease in membership at the end of the 20th century, with membership standing at around 135,000 in 1,000 congregations.

Many famous Canadians have been Presbyterians, including George M. Grant (1835–1902), principal at Queens University; Prime Minister William Mackenzie King (1874–1950); and Charles W. Gordon, known as a novelist by the name Ralph Connor (1860–1937).

The word “presbyterian” comes from the Greek word presbyteros, meaning “elder.” The PCC is governed by elders elected from each congregation. These elders, along with the ordained clergy, provide leadership in the church and at the various levels of church government: the session; the presbytery; the synod; and the general assembly, the highest court of the church, which meets once a year. The PCC teaches that the Bible is the most authoritative source for faith and practice, and its subordinate standards are expressed in the Westminster Confession of Faith and the statement of belief entitled “Living Faith.” Two sacraments are practiced: infant baptism and the Lord’s Supper, which is celebrated weekly, monthly, or quarterly.

Recent trends in the PCC include a growing ethnic diversity in the churches. Although still retaining much of its Scottish heritage, the modern PCC includes growing Korean, Chinese, Ghanaian, and other “ethnic” congregations. The church’s head office is in Toronto, Ontario. The PCC actively participates with the Canadian Council of Churches, the World Council of Churches, and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Presbyterian Church in Canada
50 Wynford Dr.
Toronto, ON M3C 1J7
Canada
<http://www.presbyterian.ca>

Gordon L. Heath

See also: United Church of Canada; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Congram, John. This Presbyterian Church of Ours. Winfield, BC: Wood Lake Books, Inc., 1995.
- Moir, John. Enduring Witness: A History of the Presbyterian Church in Canada Hamilton, ON: Presbyterian Press, 1987.

Presbyterian Church in Taiwan

The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan dates to the arrival of British Presbyterians in 1865. They were joined by their colleagues from Canada in 1872. The British started their mission work on the southern part of the island and the Canadians in the north. Both added medical work to their missionary enterprise.

In 1895 the Japanese invaded and occupied the island. After that date no new missions were allowed to enter, and thus the Presbyterian work developed without the competition that had characterized many early-20th-century settings. The mission continued to progress normally into the 1930s, but as war loomed and the authorities assumed a more militant stance, the missionaries withdrew and turned the church over to the Taiwanese leadership.

A young Paiwan aboriginal boy prays in a Presbyterian church during an evening youth service in Laolauran, southeastern Taiwan. (AP Photo/Wally Santana)

The missionaries returned after World War II. They picked up their work and in 1951 led in the uniting of the two missions under a single general assembly of what became the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan. The church now found itself in a radically changed environment. The population exploded, with thousands of refugees coming to Taiwan from mainland China. Not only did they bring new Christian movements with them, but a variety of missionaries from across the Protestant/Free church spectrum also founded new missionary efforts on the island. The church doubled its membership in the decade from 1955 to 1965. It has since focused on evangelism and continued to grow through the last half of the 20th century, though it is still very much a minority religion in a largely Buddhist country.

In 2005 the church reported 217,612 members in a country of 23 million. It has a presbyterial polity with a biennial general assembly as the highest lawmaking body. It adheres to the Heidelberg Confession and the Westminster Confession as its standards of doctrine.

The church has shown a self-conscious desire to become an indigenous body and has continually expressed its concern for the Republic of China and the future of the people of Taiwan. Beginning in the 1970s it has issued a number of official statements on Taiwan, beginning with "Our National Fate" in 1971. It followed with "Our Appeal" (1975); "On Human Rights" (1977); "Recommendations Concerning the Present Situation" (1990); and "On the Sovereignty of Taiwan" (1991). It has worked on a variety of social issues concerning the working classes and the plight of prostitutes. Continuing the early medical work of the missions, it now sponsors a set of hospitals. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church in Taiwan
3, Lane 269

Roosevelt Rd., Sec. 3
Taipei 106
Taiwan
<http://www.pct.org.tw/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Lin, Christian Louise. The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan and the Advocacy of Local Autonomy. Philadelphia: Department of Asian and Middle Eastern Studies, University of Pennsylvania, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea

The most liberal of the various Presbyterian churches in Korea, the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of [South] Korea originated in a controversy involving the Presbyterian Church in Korea in the years immediately following World War II. In 1938 the students and faculty of Chosun Seminary, then located in Pyongyang, Korea, refused to worship as ordered at the emperor's shrine. The seminary was closed down, and those associated with it scattered. A year later, they reopened the seminary in southern Korea. Its faculty adopted a liberal Protestant theological perspective.

In 1946 the reorganized Presbyterian Church of Korea recognized Chosun Seminary as its seminary. However, shortly thereafter, an intense theological debate developed over a document released by the president. Conservative members of the church accused the seminary of teaching heresy. One professor left and founded a new seminary, which the general assembly of the church also recognized.

In order to resolve its stance relative to the two seminaries, the assembly next withdrew its support from both schools and asked the leadership to resolve their differences. During the succeeding negotiations, however, it became obvious that the positions taken by the representatives of Chosun Seminary did not represent the stance of the church. In 1952 the seminary president, Dr. Kim Jae-Joon (1901–1984), was expelled from the church.

In 1953 the supporters of the seminary formed the Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea. Its appearance came just a few years before the Presbyterian Church of Korea would split into two factions—the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap) and the Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong). The Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea has aligned itself with the most liberal elements in Presbyterianism worldwide. It was the first of the Korean churches to invite females into the ordained ministry. In 1987 it adopted a new confession, similar in tone to the Confession of 1967 of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). It has backed efforts toward the reunification of North and South Korea.

In 2005 the church reported more than 334,000 members. The general assembly is the highest legislative body in the church. It supports Theological Seminary, Seoul, and HanShin University, Suwon. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church in the Republic of Korea
#1501 Korean Ecumenical Building
136-56 YunJi-Dong
ChongRo-Gu
Seoul 110-470
Republic of Korea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong); Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap); Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and

International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church in Trinidad

The Presbyterian Church of Trinidad emerged from the United Church of Canada in 1960. Nearly a century of mission work by Canadian Presbyterians in the community of indentured laborers from India resulted in the strong association between Indians and the church in the Caribbean today. Even though Presbyterians are only about 3 percent of Trinidad and Tobago's population today, the significance of the church lies in its unique role as the primary educator of ethnic Indians in Trinidad's colonial period.

The contemporary presence of the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad has its origins in the intertwined histories of the 19th-century British colonial economy and the evangelism of two Canadian missionaries: John (1839–1911) and Sarah Morton. Presbyterian churches in Trinidad are also called East Indian churches because of the close association between Canadian mission work and migrants from South Asia who were imported by the British to work on sugarcane plantations. Despite the fact that less than half of all Christian Indians are Presbyterian, Christian Indians and Presbyterianism have a strong association in Trinidad. Certainly this is the impression given by the preponderance of literature on Presbyterian (East) Indians, and the fact that 95 percent of the Presbyterian population is ethnically Indian. According to the 2000 census 36,710 people identified themselves as Presbyterian. Since the vast majority of Presbyterians are Indian, this would represent about 8 percent of the Indian population and 3.3 percent of the total 2000 population.

The Canadian mission began in the small village of Iere in south-central Trinidad. At the time, the village of Iere was surrounded by cane fields, and southern Trinidad had the highest concentration of South Asian Indians on the island. Most laborers were Hindu, and a smaller proportion were Muslim. Early in the 1860s, Canadians John and Sarah Morton visited Trinidad when their Barbados-bound ship was blown off course. They were distraught over the lack of mission work among the Indian laborers and decided to make this their life's work. After several failed attempts to gain support in Canada for their mission, they arrived in Iere, Trinidad, in 1868 in order to serve a small African population left by a failed American Presbyterian mission. As the Mortons did not have their own resources, the abandonment of the Presbyterian church in the southern sugar district proved to be serendipitous. Rev. Morton would make excursions into the village and to surrounding estate barracks, but he had little success at first. The Indians did not trust him, and they also were hesitant to mix with Africans, mainly for ritual and linguistic reasons.

Since Morton's goal was to evangelize among Indians and they were resisting his invitations to visit the church, he established a school on the church's doorstep within three months of arriving in Trinidad. The lessons were especially designed for the Indians and given in what was still broken Hindi. During his visits to Indians in their homes, shops, and estate barracks, Morton employed a number of techniques. These included learning Hindi, observing Indian religious life in order to converse freely with Indians, providing simple medical and legal assistance, denying caste, making a Hindi hymnal, and going anywhere to help Indians—the latter a practice that earned him both trust and respect. Sarah Morton gained the confidence of women and opened an orphanage for girls. The Mortons trained new converts as Native evangelists and teachers, and they took advantage of the East Indians' great pride in their ethnic cohesiveness by providing them with their own East Indian Church.

Finally, the Mortons provided the single most important means for Indians to gain an education. The Mortons' Hindi would improve and the number of schools would increase, eventually becoming the trademarks of the mission. Thus, the Iere village doorstep school was only the beginning of a process that would last for more than a century under Canadian leadership. By 1915 there were 97 preaching stations, of which 89 had a separate church structure. Over the years the number of preaching stations/schools varied, with a peak of 129 by 1967, when the Canadian missionaries began the process of creating the Presbyterian Church of Trinidad. During this period Trinidad and Tobago had achieved independence (1962), and all schools were subsumed under the central government, although they retained their sectarian identities.

To this day, small Indian communities who wish to hold Presbyterian services, yet are not formally recognized as a congregation, will meet in someone's home with a minister, just as John Morton visited barracks on estates to hold the first services. As the community is able to build a structure, the congregation becomes formalized. An active promotion of incipient congregations throughout Trinidad, some of them very small, means that the number of congregations tends to fluctuate between 90 and 100. The church is a member of the Caribbean Conference of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Council of Churches. It supports St. Andrew's Theological College, also located in San Fernando.

The dual function of the Presbyterian church as school and the Presbyterian school as church is as much a part of the contemporary identity of the East Indian Church in Trinidad as are its ethnic association and sectarian philosophy. Yet despite the success of the mission, as evidenced by the very existence of so many Presbyterian churches in Trinidad's landscape, it is also important to note that the missionaries converted only a small proportion of the Indian population, and the number of congregations has declined. Most Native ministers are responsible for several congregations each, and new missionaries (mainly American Pentecostals) have targeted Indian Christians, so the number of congregations continues to decline. Presbyterian schools continue to be highly regarded by Indians, but today few choose to convert to the faith. Thus, one must conclude that the mission was of limited success.

Presbyterian Church in Trinidad
Box 92
Paradise Hill
San Fernando
Trinidad

Carolyn V. Prorok

See also: United Church of Canada; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Doodnath, S. A Short History of the Early Presbyterian Church and the Indian Immigrant, 1845–1945. Trinidad, 1983.
- Hamid, I. A History of the Presbyterian Church in Trinidad, 1868–1968: The Struggles of a Church in Colonial Captivity. Trinidad: Privately published, 1980.
- Morton, S. E. John Morton of Trinidad. Toronto, 1916.
- Prorok, Carolyn V. “The Significance of Historical Geography: A Case Study of the Church as School in the Diffusion of the Presbyterian Mission to Trinidad.” Historical Reflections/Reflexions Historiques 23, no. 3 (1997): 371–388.

Presbyterian Church of Africa

The Free Church of Scotland began missionary work in South Africa soon after its formation in the 1840s. In 1898, on the eve of its merger with the United Presbyterian Church (now a constituent part of the Church of Scotland), six Free church African ministers under the leadership of Panibani Mzimba left the South African mission in a dispute that revolved around the use of the mission’s financial resources. With a number of lay supporters they organized congregations and continued their ministry. A century later the church had become one of the largest in South Africa, with a reported 3,381,000 members (2005).

The Presbyterian Church of Africa is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches, and it led in the founding of the African Independent Churches Association. Its membership is concentrated among the African Native peoples of the Eastern Cape and Natal, with a significant following also in Malawi. The church has accepted the Westminster Confession as its doctrinal statement. It began admitting females to the ordained ministry in the 1980s.

Presbyterian Church of Africa
PO Box 3939
Durham 4000
South Africa

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand

Settlers who had been members of the Church of Scotland in their homeland arrived in New Zealand in the 1830s. Their first church was founded in 1840 in Wellington. Meanwhile, back in Scotland, the church underwent a disruption that led many ministers and congregations to leave and found the Free church of Scotland, and it was from the Free church that ministers arrived to provide leadership for the New Zealand Presbyterians. The Free church prospered in New Zealand, with two separate churches developing, one on the north island and one on the south island. The two churches merged in 1901 to form the present Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand.

The church continues the doctrine and practice of the Church of Scotland. It affirms the Westminster Catechism and the Westminster Confession of Faith, but it has more recently composed its own contemporary statement, the “Faith We Affirm Together.” The church is headed by a general assembly, which meets annually. Within the church, there are a Maori Synod (Te Aka Puaho) that oversees ministry to the Maori people and a Pacific Islanders’ Synod. The church also admits women fully to every level of ministry and service.

In 2005, the church reported some 44,000 members. The church sponsors Knox Theological Hall (founded in 1876) and the Center for Advanced Ministry Studies. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Aotearoa New Zealand,
General Assembly
PO Box 9049
Wellington
Aotearoa
New Zealand
<http://www.presbyterian.org.nz/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Elder, John Rawson. The History of the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, 1840–1940. Christchurch, New Zealand: Presbyterian Bookroom, 1940.
- McEldowney, Dennis, ed. Presbyterians in Aotearoa New Zealand, 1840–1990. Wellington, New Zealand: The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, 1990.

Presbyterian Church of Australia (Continuing)

In 1977, the majority of the Presbyterian Church of Australia merged into the Uniting Church in Australia. Approximately 30 percent of the church, the more conservative wing, refused to join in the merger and reorganized to continue as a strictly Presbyterian church. The Westminster Confession was reaffirmed as the church's doctrinal standard and congregations were regrouped in new presbyteries, and nationally a General Assembly was organized to meet every three years.

The church has taken a number of steps to reaffirm its role as a traditional Presbyterian body, not the least being its withdrawal from the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and its joining the Reformed Ecumenical Council in 1982. A renewed interest in Reformed theology has been noticed and an emphasis on world missions has led to the sponsoring of missionaries in more than 20 countries in the South Pacific and around the Indian Ocean.

As the new century begins, the church has some 70,000 members in more than 400 congregations. In 1991, the General Assembly rescinded its approval of the ordination of women, though some parts of the church still recognize them. It supports 11 colleges, including 3 theological schools.

Presbyterian Church of Australia (Continuing)
PO Box 100
420 Elizabeth St.
Surry Hills, Sydney
NSW 2001
Australia
<http://www.presbyterian.org.au/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

References

- Breward, I. A History of the Australian Churches. St. Leonards, Australia: Allen & Unwin, 1993.
- Humphries, R. A., and R. S. Ward, eds. Religious Bodies in Australia: A Comprehensive Guide. Wantirna, Australia: New Melbourne Press, 1995.
- Ward, Rowland S. The Bush Still Burns: The Presbyterian and Reformed Faith in Australia, 1788–1988. N.p.: the author, 1989.
- Ward, Rowland S. A Witness for Christ: The Presbyterian Church of Eastern Australia: 1846–1996. N.p.: Presbyterian Church of Eastern Australia, 1996.

Presbyterian Church of Brazil

Reformed efforts to establish a presence in Brazil were initiated briefly in the 1550s and again in the mid-1600s, but it was not until the early 19th century and the introduction of a degree of religious liberty in the 1820s that permanent work could be established. In 1855, Robert Reid Kalley (1809–1888), a physician, settled in Rio de Janeiro. Out of his efforts the Igreja Evangelica Fluminense was founded. That congregation became the beginning of Congregationalism in Brazil. Asbel Green Simonton (1831–1867), a missionary from the American Presbyterian Church (now the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) arrived in 1859 and four years later organized the first Presbyterian church in

Rio. He and Kalley worked closely together, the latter supporting Green as he founded a Protestant periodical and opened a seminary to train church workers.

After the American Civil War (1861–1865), American Presbyterians from the two large Presbyterian churches in the United States supported Green's work and contributed both finances and personnel. The Presbyterian movement in Brazil became the largest of the several Protestant missions. The work prospered through the 19th century, but as the new century began it was hit with a major controversy over local autonomy, which many Brazilian leaders began to demand. That controversy expanded as one group began to denounce Freemasonry. The dissenting faction left to form the Independent Presbyterian Church.

The church that continued under the guidance of the missionaries weathered the storm and continued to grow. After World War II, the process of creating the Presbyterian Church of Brazil was formally completed. The church adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith as its doctrinal standard.

The church was hit with another controversy in the 1970s, when the more liberal wing of the church protested a set of doctrinal positions and the church's social stance. They joined with some ministers and congregations that had already left the Independent Presbyterian Church to form the United Presbyterian Church of Brazil. However, with some 40,000 members, the Presbyterian Church of Brazil remains the largest of the several churches of the Reformed tradition in the country, though its place as the largest of the non-Catholic bodies has been eclipsed by a number of Free church and Pentecostal movements. The church is a member of neither the World Council of Churches nor the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Brazil

Caixa Postal 17
Rua Silva Jardim 23
Centro, 20050-060
Rio de Janeiro RJ
Brazil

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); United Presbyterian Church of Brazil; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Cameroon

The Presbyterian Church of Cameroon grew out of the mission of the U.S. Presbyterians in Gabon. In 1875 a new missionary station was opened in Batanga, in southern Cameroon. A decade later Cameroon came under German hegemony. Subsequently, an agreement was reached to extend the Presbyterian work, including the formation of primary schools for the residents, farther into Cameroon. The government demanded that Gennan be used as a primary language.

In 1892 work was launched among the Bulu people that prospered through the rest of the decade. The first works in the Bulu language, the Bible and some hymns, were published in 1894. However, in 1898 a revolt developed among the Bulu directed at the German authorities who were interfering with the trade between Yaoundé and the port city of Kribi. In their effort to quell the uprising, the Germans seized the mission station that had been opened at Lolodorf in 1897. The Presbyterians demanded compensation, at which point the U.S. government became involved. The Presbyterians received compensation, but their relations with the German authorities were ruined. Although the church-sponsored schools employed German teachers, the students were denied the privilege of sitting for the German examination that was necessary for admittance to European universities.

German control in Cameroon ended during World War I. The Paris Mission came into Cameroon and took over the work of the Basel Mission. In 1902 it released that work, consisting of some 94 congregations, to the Presbyterian mission. It subsequently grew into one of the largest missionary enterprises in the country. In the 1950s the mission began the translation of the Bible (published in 1960) into the Bassa language used by many who had come to it from the Paris Mission.

In 1956 the mission was granted autonomy as the Presbyterian Church of Cameroon (Église presbytérienne camerounaise). It is organized with a presbyterial order, with congregations associated in five synods. Doctrinally, the church recognizes the Heidelberg Catechism and the Westminster Confession as its doctrinal standards.

In 2005 the church reported 1,800,000 members in 300 congregations. It sponsors Dager Theological School in Bibia and the Faculty of Protestant Theology at Yaoundé. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Cameroon
BP 519
Yaoundé
Cameroon

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; Paris Mission; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Nku, Nyansako-ni. Journey in Faith: The Story of the Presbyterian Church in Cameroon. Buea, Cameroon: Presbyterian Church in Cameroon, 1982.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Colombia

Henry Barrington Post, a missionary with the Presbyterian Church in the United States (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), arrived in Colombia in 1856 and settled in Santa Fe de Bogotá. Five years later he was able to open a church and begin a Protestant mission, which included a program of public education. He was assisted in this educational enterprise by Kate McFarren, who joined him in 1868. She founded a girls' school that later became known as the Colegio Americano. Additional schools were opened in Barranquilla, Bucaramanga, Ibagué, and Girardot. The mission grew slowly, the dominant Roman Catholic Church viewing it as an unwanted intrusion into its territory. Conditions changed only after the Second Vatican Council and the general improvement of Protestant-Catholic relations in the 1960s.

In the 1980s the mission, which had now become the independent Presbyterian Church of Colombia, experienced some internal turmoil over leadership. The issues were finally resolved by dividing the church and its properties between two jurisdictions. One, called the Presbyterian Synod, retained approximately one-third of the members in three presbyteries. The other, called the Reformed Synod, has four presbyteries. Apart from leadership personnel, the two synods are largely the same. Both have the Westminster Confession as their standard of faith. Both retain a presbyterial organization with a synod as the highest legislative body. Both recognize each other as parts of the same church.

In the mid-1990s, the Presbyterian Synod reported some 4,500 members in 35 congregations. It supports the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Barranquilla, originally set up to train ministers in Colombia, Venezuela, and Ecuador. In 2005, the church reported 12,000 members in 45 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and in 2005 joined the World Council of Churches.

In the mid-1990s the Reformed Synod reported 5,700 members in 15 congregations. It supports three schools: the Biblical Institute at Monteria, the Presbyterian Theological Faculty at Ibagué, and the Corporate Theological Faculty at Bogotá. In addition, the synod supports an extensive primary and secondary school system.

The Presbyterian Synod
AA 562 Carrera 46
No. 48-50
Barranquilla, Atlco
Colombia

The Reformed Synod
Carrera 4a #4-11
Ibangué, Tolima
Colombia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of East Africa

The Presbyterian Church of East Africa began in 1891, when a small group of independent Presbyterian missionaries initiated work at Kibwezi. Later in the decade they opened a second station at Kikuyu, the Kikuyu being the largest single group among Kenya's indigenous peoples. Through the Scottish Missionary Society, the Church of Scotland took responsibility for the mission in 1901. The Kikuyu proved a challenge, and only in 1907 was an initial baptism recorded. Only a few hundred became Christians in the first decades of the new century. In 1920 a presbytery was finally established, combining the mission with the church serving Scottish expatriates residing in what was then a British colony. Some progress was noted in 1926, when the first class of Kenyan pastors was ordained.

The upward trajectory recorded through the 1920s came to an abrupt end in 1929, when a controversy broke out in Kikuyu country over the practice of female circumcision. The presbytery issued a statement declaring the practice incompatible with Christian faith. The Kikuyu leaders declared that the church was against their culture and tradition. Only slowly, as the church passed to African leadership and the controversy died, did the church regain its initiative.

A new growth phase began in 1945, when the work of the Gospel Missionary Society, an independent U.S.-based missionary organization, merged into the presbytery. The Presbyterian Church of East Africa, as the mission had become known, became independent in 1956. At that time, the Overseas Presbytery of Kenya, a predominantly white body, including one congregation each in Tanzania and Uganda that had been constituted separately in 1936, merged into the new church. The first Kenyan general secretary, John Gatu, took office. The church admitted women to ordination in 1976.

In 2005 the Presbyterian Church of East Africa reported 4 million members. It supports the Reformed College of East Africa and, with the Methodist, Anglican, and Reformed churches, St. Paul's United Theological College. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church of East Africa
PO Box 48268
00 100 Nairobi
Kenya

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Macpherson, R. The Presbyterian Church in Kenya: An Account of the Origins and Growth of the Presbyterian Church of East Africa. Nairobi: Presbyterian Church of East Africa, 1970.
- Ogot, Bethwell A. My Footprints in the Sands of Time: An Autobiography. Victoria, BC: Trafford Publishing, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Ghana

In the 1820s, the Basel Mission, supported by Reformed and Lutheran churches in Germany and Switzerland, began one of its first Christian missionary efforts in what was then the Gold Coast among the Ga- and Twi-speaking peoples in the eastern part of the region. Stations were subsequently opened in other parts of the country. Some of the converts who showed promise were sent to Europe for training. One of these students, David Asante (1834–1892), who was trained at Basel, was in 1864 the first African ordained by the missionaries.

During World War I, German and Swiss missionaries had to leave the Gold Coast. In 1920 the Basel Mission turned its work over to the Scottish Mission. The mission matured into the Presbyterian Church of the Gold Coast in 1926. The Gold Coast became the independent nation of Ghana in 1957, and subsequently the Presbyterian Church changed its name.

The church has subsequently spread to all parts of the nation and has become one of the larger religious bodies in the country. Its 565,637 members (2005) are divided into 14 presbyteries. A synod serves as the church's highest legislative body. The church has also developed an extensive educational and medical program. Worship is now conducted in a variety of languages. Most recently, the church has experienced both the new life and the disturbances that have come as the Charismatic movement has spread through its ranks. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Ghana
PO Box 1800
Thorpe Rd.
Accra
Ghana

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and

International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Beeko, Anthony A. The Trail Blazers. Fruits of 175 Years of the Presbyterian Church of Ghana (1828–2003). Accra, Ghana: Afram Publications, 2005.

Hall, Peter. Autobiography of Rev. Peter Hall: First Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Ghana. Accra, Ghana: Waterville Pub. House, 1965.

Kpobi, David Nii Anum. Triple Heritage: Facts and Figures about the Presbyterian Church of Ghana. Accra, Ghana: Asempra Publishers, 1995.

Nkanse-Kyeremateng, K. The Presbyterian Church of Ghana and National Development. Accra, Ghana: Sebewie Publishers, 1995.

Presbyterian Church of India

The Presbyterian Church of India has its roots in the original Baptist mission that in 1813 had opened work in the area of the Kasai Hills, in the easternmost part of Bengal. Although there was some response to this work over the next two decades, in 1938 the mission was abandoned. In 1841 Thomas Jones (d. 1849) and his wife Anne (d. 1846), Presbyterians from Wales, arrived and started evangelistic work in the same area. They worked alone until they were joined by William Pryse. Their work had success over the next two decades, and in 1867 the first presbytery was formed. As the work continued to grow through the last half of the century, in 1895 it was divided into five presbyteries, and the following year a synod called the Assembly created.

At the same time, work began in Sylhet and Cachar in what is now Bangladesh, where in the early 20th century a second assembly developed. In 1894 missionary activity was extended to Mizoram in northeast India, growing rapidly through several mass movements of people into the church. Today the region is largely Christian. Early in the 20th century, the work extended into the area around the North Cachar Hills, leading in 1930 to the creation of another assembly.

In 1926 the various segments of the work that had been developed for almost a century were brought together as the Presbyterian Church of North India, and an assembly for the entire church created. The various geographic regions were reorganized as synods. The church had been extended to a number of Indian peoples speaking a variety of languages, and as the church continued to grow more than over 20 languages were in regular use.

The post–World War II era brought a number of changes. A significant part of the church operated in what became Pakistan in 1947, and the partition separated this group from the main body of the church. In 1959 a number of Christians in Manipur of different denominational and linguistic backgrounds were organized as Presbyterians and in 1959 were included in the church. The Manipur Synod was created in 1978.

In the late 1990s the Presbyterian Church of India reported 797,700 members. The church has been part of the larger Protestant community of northern India, but it stayed out of the several mergers that led to the formation of the Church of North India in 1970. It is not a member of the World Council of Churches, but it is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the National Council of Churches in India, and is a partner with the Council on World Mission.

Presbyterian Assembly House
Central Ward, OPP
State Library
Shillong Meghalaya, 793 001
India

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of North India; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Presbyterian Church of Korea (HapDong)

The Presbyterian Church in Korea was a united body until 1959, when a major split created the Presbyterian Church in Korea (HapDong) and the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap). Disrupted by the Japanese occupation and World War II, the Presbyterian movement was reconstituted as the Presbyterian Church of Korea (PCK) in 1949. During the 1950s the Korean War overshadowed a theological war that raged within the church, as some leaders associated with the newly founded International Council of Christian Churches, a fundamentalist body founded by associates of U.S. minister Carl McIntire (1906–2002), wooed the conservative leadership of the PCK. At issue were ecumenism, membership in the World Council of Churches, and the theological perspective of the church's seminaries.

Unable to arrive at an amicable solution, the church split into two bodies in 1959. The more conservative group aligned with the International Council of Christian Churches as the Presbyterian Church in Korea (HapDong). In subsequent years, it has had spectacular growth and is now the largest Presbyterian church in the country, with more than 2.1 million members.

Although the church has experienced growth, its history has had a tumultuous course. In 1961 a group withdrew to found the Bible Presbyterian Church (now the Presbyterian Church of Korea [Dae Shin]). In 1979 another fracture began when Kim Hee Bo, the president of ChongShin Seminary, became an advocate of the historical-critical approach to the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible. As the controversy raged, some attempted to find a way to heal the breach. Eventually both the group supporting the seminary and the group that had attempted to make peace broke with the larger body of the church.

The Presbyterian Church in Korea (HapDong) is organized presbyterially. The assembly is its highest legislative body. It adheres to the Westminster Confession of Faith. Though it retains its conservative theological stance, it is no longer associated with the International Council of Christian Churches.

Presbyterian Church in Korea (HapDong)
1007-3 DaeChi-Dong
KangNam-GU
Seoul
Republic of Korea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Council of Christian Churches; Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap); World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Ho, Sun-gil. The Church Preserved Through Fires: A History of the Presbyterian Church in Korea. Alberta, Canada: Inheritance Publications, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap)

The more liberal of the two large Presbyterian churches in the Republic of Korea, the Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap) is generally seen as carrying on the missionary tradition. The story of Presbyterianism in Korea begins in Manchuria, where a Korean, Suh Sang-Yoon, was converted in 1876 by missionaries of the Scottish Missionary Society (related to the Church of Scotland) and in turn assisted in the translation of the New Testament into Korean. Upon his return to his homeland in 1883, he gathered the first Protestant community. American Presbyterian missionaries of the United Presbyterian Church in North America (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) arrived in 1884, and Horace N. Allen (1858–1932) opened the first church-supported medical facility. The Americans were soon joined by colleagues from Australia and Canada. In 1893 the several Presbyterian groups organized a mission council for Presbyterian churches, the first product of their cooperation being the theological seminary located at Pyongyang.

The progress of the church was interrupted by the Japanese invasion of the country in 1910 and the subsequent invasion that lasted through World War II. Initially, the Presbyterian movement continued to grow, and in 1912 the missionaries and the Korean pastors established the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Chosun. In the 1930s, however, the church was continually faced with the issue of shrine worship. The Occupation authorities demanded that everyone, especially the Christians, acknowledge the Shinto shrine. In 1938, under extreme pressure, the general assembly approved worship of the shrine. Some Korean pastors and laypeople started a resistance movement, which led to their arrest and imprisonment. In 1941, as the war began, most of the missionaries were expelled. The general assembly was dissolved and its membership transferred to the newly founded Chosun Presbyterian Church of Christ in Japan.

After the war, momentous change ensued. The Japanese were expelled, but the country was divided. The People's Republic of Korea closed the Presbyterian Church and established an antireligious regime. In southern Korea, the Presbyterian Church was reconstituted at assemblies in 1946 and 1947, taking the name Presbyterian Church of Korea in 1949. A period of rapid growth followed. That growth has been attributed to the fact that people did not identify Christianity with the colonial government and to the lay-oriented evangelism that characterized the church.

During the period of reconstituting the church, many called for a cleansing from the church of those who had worshipped at the Shinto shrine. Resistance leaders organized a presbytery in 1945 and called for full repentance by those who did not resist. They founded a seminary in Pusan, but the new Presbyterian Church refused to recognize it. The core of the resistance movement refused to join with the larger body and now exists as the Presbyterian Church in Korea (KoShin).

Through the 1950s, the church faced the issue of participation in the ecumenical movement. One group favored membership in the World Council of Churches. The other leaned toward the fundamentalist International Council of Christian Churches. The issue came to culmination in 1959, when the church divided into two somewhat equal factions, both carrying the name Presbyterian Church of Korea (PCK). The PCK (TongHap) affiliated with the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Today, the PCK (TongHap) represents the more liberal wing of Korean Presbyterianism. In 2005 it reported 334,520 million members in 998 congregations. In 1984, in celebration of the 100th anniversary of Korean Presbyterianism, the church opened a new headquarters building in Seoul. Two years later it adopted a new confession of faith as a modern restatement of the Reformed theological position. It accepted the ordination of women in 1995. The church is led by its general assembly. It is one of the partner churches of the Council for World Mission (United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom) and the Global Ministries of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) and the United Church of Christ. The church supports a number of institutions of higher learning, and it now has a worldwide ministry among Koreans who left the country during and after the Korean War.

Presbyterian Church of Korea (TongHap)
PO Box 1125
135 YunChi-Dong
ChongRo-ku, Seoul 100-611
Republic of Korea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Church of Scotland; International Council of Christian Churches; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); United Church of Christ; United Reformed Church of the United Kingdom; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Park, Chung-Shin. Protestantism and Politics in Korea. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 2003.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Liberia

The Presbyterian Church in Liberia originated in the American Presbyterian support for the American Colonization Society (ACS) and its efforts to resettle free

Members of the Presbyterian church pose in front of their banner for the “Stranger Mission” in Liberia, about 1900. (Corbis)

African Americans in Africa. Modern Liberia was founded as a homeland for the ACS program. Presbyterian work in Liberia began in 1833 and over the next 50 years, the Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) recruited African Americans as missionaries.

In 1928, the presbytery of Liberia (now the Presbyterian Church of Liberia) became independent and over the next decades relations waned between it and its former American supporters. In 1980, the church developed a primary relationship with the continuing Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Most recently, in the wake of the Liberian civil war and subsequent period of unrest, the Liberian church moved to re-establish relationships with its parent body.

In 2005, the church reported 1,083 members in 13 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Liberia
c/o City Hall
PO Box 3350
Monrovia
Liberia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Mozambique

Reformed Christianity entered Mozambique through the preaching of Josefa Mhalamkala, who had discovered Christianity while visiting South Africa. In 1887 his work was picked up by Swiss Reformed missionary Paul Berthoud (1847–1930). The work concentrated in the southern provinces of Mozambique through the first half of the 20th century. In subsequent decades, the church started the process of becoming an independent body, and it also began to spread to other parts of the country.

In 1961 Eduardo Mondlane (d. 1969), an official with the United Nations and a member of the Presbyterian Church of Mozambique, came back to his native land and organized FRELIMO (Frente de Liberta Vão de Mozambique), the united front against colonialism. He led the group until his assassination in 1969. In 1972 the Portuguese colonial authorities moved against the church and arrested a number of its leaders. Synod President Zedekias Manganhela was tortured and killed in prison. Pressure on the church was relieved only by the end of colonial rule in 1975.

In 2005 the church reported 24,000 members. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It supports two theological schools, the Theological Institute of Ricatla and the Theological School of Khovo. The highest legislative body in the church is the general assembly. Doctrinally it adheres to the teachings in the Heidelburg Catechism. It has a continuing close relationship with the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Mozambique
Caixa Postal 21
Av. Ahmed Sekou Touré 1822
Maputo
Mozambique

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Nigeria

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria has its origins in the Scottish Missionary Society's work in Jamaica. The church worked among the Africans living in Jamaica and participated in the movement for the abolition of slavery during the 1830s. After abolition, the Presbyterians experienced an influx of members, and in the 1840s the first ministers graduated from the presbytery's school. The church developed a missionary perspective and in 1846 commissioned the first of its ministers as missionaries to Calabar on the Gulf of Guinea in present-day Nigeria. The first stations were established at Duke Town and Creek Town. A third station began at Old Town Calabar in 1847. The mission work gradually moved inland.

The Church of Scotland assumed responsibility for the work even before the British established their hegemony over the area. Work has concentrated among the Efik, Ibo, and Tiv peoples.

The church gained autonomy in 1954. It has a presbyterian polity and admits women to ordination. It is a member of both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Reformed Ecumenical Council. Numerous Presbyterian and Reformed churches, primarily in the early 20th century, began missions among one or more of Nigeria's 500 peoples/language groups. No less than 11 different Reformed/Presbyterian churches are now operating there; the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria is the oldest but by no means the largest. It is a member of the Reformed Ecumenical Council of Nigeria, which provides fellowship and coordination among the different churches.

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria reported 500,000 members in 2005. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1961.

The Presbyterian Church of Nigeria
PO Box 2635
26-29 Ehere Rd.
Ogbor Hill, ABA Abia State
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Johnston, Geoffrey. Of God and Maxim Guns: Presbyterianism in Nigeria, 1846–1966. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1988.
- Palmer, Timothy. The Reformed and Presbyterian Faith: A View from Nigeria. Bukuru, Nigeria: TCNN Publications, 1996.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Pakistan

The Presbyterian Church of Pakistan grew out of the original Protestant Christian work in that part of India that is now Pakistan. Missionaries initially arrived in the 1830s from the Punjab. The first appears to have been John C. Lowrie (1808–1900), who settled in Lahore in 1834, though he soon had to retire. Then in 1849 Charles W. Forman (1821–1894) opened the first permanent missionary station and went on to develop the impressive educational program that led to the founding of a string of elementary and secondary schools, several colleges, and a seminary. Forman led in the founding of the Lahore Church Council. In 1904 the Lahore Church Council joined the United Church of Northern India (a union of Congregational and Presbyterian missions that would later become part of the Church of North India).

A second missionary thrust began in 1855 under Andrew Gordon (1828–1887) of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). He began in Lahore and then expanded to Sialkot. Four years later the Presbytery of Sialkot was organized. In 1893 the Sialkot work incorporated as one presbytery in the Synod of the Punjab of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. In 1961 the synod became independent as the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. Seven years later the church experienced a severe split when representatives of the International Council of Christian Churches attempted to woo support to its fundamentalist position. Over the subsequent decades, the schism was largely healed.

In 1993 the Lahore Church Council and the United Presbyterian Church of Pakistan merged to become the Presbyterian Church of Pakistan. In the later 1990s it reported 400,000 members in 200 congregations. It sponsors the Gujranwala Theological Seminary. Though it stayed out of the merger that created the Church of Pakistan, it remains in close relationship with the latter and is also a member of both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. In 2005, the church reported 400,000 members.

Presbyterian Church of Pakistan
PO Box 13
2 Empress Rd.
Lahore 54000
Pakistan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of North India; International Council of Christian Churches; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Rwanda

The Presbyterian Church of Rwanda grew out of the work of the Bethel Mission, a German society created especially to evangelize the lands of the expanding German colonial empire. Germany was given hegemony over Rwanda by the Berlin Conference of 1885, and the Bethel Mission established its work in 1907. The Mission had hardly established itself when World War I began, and following Germany's defeat, the missionaries were forced out. Rwanda was reassigned as a Belgian protectorate, and the Bethel Mission's work was taken over by the Belgian Protestant Missionary Society. The missionary society remained in control until 1959, when the mission became independent as the Presbyterian Church of Rwanda.

For more than a generation the church experienced equal growth among the several major groups of Rwanda, Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa peoples. It created a system of primary and secondary schools and several professional schools and medical facilities. However, in 1994 when the tribal war began, the church faced severe disruption, as it had members among both the persecuted Tutsi and the persecutor Hutu. It lost 16 pastors and an uncounted number of members in the massacres. In the years since, the major work of the church has focused upon the necessary reconciliation, healing, and restitution for all of the killing that took place.

In 2005, the church reported 300,000 members. It is organized with a presbyterian polity, and the general assembly is the highest lawmaking body in the church. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Presbyterian Church of Rwanda
BP 56
Kigali
Rwanda

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa

See Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa.

Presbyterian Church of the Sudan

American Presbyterians entered the Sudan in 1901 and established their initial station at Omdurman in the southern part of the country. The north was not open to them at the time, and evangelization was directed toward people living in the province of the Upper Nile. There was a small educational effort in the north based in a community of expatriate Egyptians. It was connected with the Evangelical Church-Synod of the Nile, but it now exists as the independent Sudan Presbyterian Evangelical Church.

The work in the south spread among various peoples: the Shilluk, Nuer, Dinka, Anuak, and Murle. The work progressed slowly, but the first Sudanese pastor was ordained in 1942. Plans to unite the Presbyterian work with both the work in the north and the Anglican work were pursued but produced no positive results.

Since the time of national independence in 1956, the work of what became the Presbyterian Church of the Sudan has proceeded only under the most difficult of conditions. The country's Constitution failed to give the non-Muslim area in the south, consisting primarily of Africans, any guarantees against encroachment from the Arab north. A civil war began that lasted until 1972. Peace lasted 11 years, and then the government declared its intention of making Muslim law the law of the land. In 1983 war was renewed, and a state of hostility has continued to the present.

The Presbyterian Church is headed by a general assembly that meets quadrennially. The congregations are divided into two presbyteries, one serving the area controlled by the government and the other, the area controlled by the rebel forces. All growth is in the latter area. The church has experienced one major schism, in 1986, when the members among the Dinka people left to found the independent Trinity Presbyterian Church of Sudan.

In 2005, the Presbyterian Church of the Sudan reported approximately 1 million members in 500 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and operates the Nile Theological College in Khartoum.

Presbyterian Church of the Sudan
PO Box 3421
Khartoum
Sudan

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu

The Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu continues the missionary efforts established by the London Missionary Society (LMS) in 1938 on the South Sea islands of the New Hebrides, now the independent nation of Vanuatu. In 1838 the pioneer South Sea missionary John Williams (1796–1839) decided to expand the work of the LMS into the New Hebrides from his base on Samoa. Accompanied by three Samoan teachers and fellow LMS missionary James Harris (d. 1839), he arrived on Tanna Island, where he left the three Samoans while he and Harris moved on to Erromanga. Unfortunately, they were both killed.

On two occasions, in 1840 and 1845, missionaries had to leave Tanna when the locals blamed them for outbreaks of disease. This targeting of missionaries would continue as British and French slavers operated the islands—the residents blaming the missionaries, whom they identified with European authorities, for the loss of neighbors and loved ones. A significant number of missionaries were murdered.

At the end of the 1840s, the LMS work was superseded by the arrival of Presbyterians, most notably John Geddie (1815–1872) from Canada and John G. Paton (1824–1907), and a team of missionaries affiliated with the Church of Scotland. Their work was supplemented by William Witt and Peter Milne (1834–1908), who arrived in 1869–1870 from the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand. Finally, after the British and French decided to stop fighting over the islands and began to work out their unique cooperative administration, the Reformed Church of France began a small work.

All of the Presbyterian missionary activity was eventually united and reorganized as the Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu. At this time the church was transferred to local leadership from the foreign missionaries, by this time primarily from Australia and New Zealand. The church has had a significant role in the development of Bislama, a neo-Melanesian language that has subsequently become the official language of the new nation of Vanuatu. It promoted it as a common language through the development of a Bible translation that is used in worship throughout the islands. (Earlier, the church had supported the work of translating the Bible into more than 21 other languages that are still spoken throughout the islands.)

In 2005, the church reported 78,000 members. The largest religious group in Vanuatu, it is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Vanuatu Christian Council.

Presbyterian Church of Vanuatu
 Presbyterian Jyos Blong Venuatu
 PO Box 150
 Port Vila
 Vanuatu

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Scotland; London Missionary Society; Reformed Church of France; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church of Wales

The Presbyterian Church of Wales (Egiwys Bresbyteriaid Cynirn) grew out of the evangelical Awakening of the 17th century in Great Britain. The primary organizational expression of the awakening was the Methodist Church (U.K.), which developed under the leadership of John Wesley (1703–1791). Closely associated with Wesley was George Whitefield (1714–1770), a classmate at Oxford, who had encouraged Wesley to expand his work beyond London and had introduced the High Church–oriented Wesley to outdoor preaching. Although they were friends, Wesley and Whitefield had deep doctrinal differences, Whitefield leaning toward Calvinism and its emphasis on predestination while Wesley adhered to the theology of Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) and an emphasis on free grace and human response.

Around 1735 Whitefield became acquainted with Howel Harris (1714–1773), a Welshman who had begun an independent teaching mission following a deep conversion experience. Harris began to preach throughout Wales, and at times Wesley traveled through the country with him. In the 1740s Wesley and Whitefield parted over their doctrinal differences. About this same time, Harris introduced Whitefield to Selina Hastings, the countess of Huntington (1707–1791), who tried unsuccessfully to bring about a reconciliation. When that proved impossible, she sided with Whitefield, having already contributed generously to his orphanage project in the American colonies.

As a member of the royalty, the countess of Huntington also had the ability to appoint “chaplains,” ministers who had no Church of England parish but who could function as ministers of the established church. She encouraged the erection of chapels in various locations where her chaplains could preach. She also endowed a training college for young preachers at Trevecca in Wales. This informal network of preachers and chapels became known informally as the Countess of Huntington Connection. In 1779 a parish minister brought suit against the countess, and the authorities ruled against the growing work. It had to be reorganized as a dissenting movement, the Calvinist Methodist Connection.

The Presbyterian Church of Wales continues the Welsh branch of the Calvinist Methodist Connection. As an independent body, it held its first general assembly in 1864. In the 20th century it became known as the Calvinist/Methodist Church of Wales and then assumed its present name. In 1933 it adopted its present constitution and received the assent of Parliament for its promulgation.

In the 1990s, the Presbyterian Church of Wales reported 54,000 members. Its Confession of Faith places it in the Reformed theological tradition. The general assembly is the highest legislative body. The church is a member of both the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

The Presbyterian Church of Wales
 53 Richmond Rd.
 Cardiff/Cymru
 Wales CF2 3UP
 United Kingdom
<http://www.ebcpcw.org.uk/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Wesley, John; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), formed in 1983 by a merger of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the United States, is the primary body continuing the British and Scottish Presbyterian traditions in the United States. The United Presbyterian Church was itself the product of a variety of mergers, and its constituent parts include the very first Presbyterian synods founded during the American colonial era.

Presbyterians, who constituted one segment of the larger Puritan movement in Great Britain, began to move to the American colonies in the 17th century, especially after the end of the Commonwealth (1648–1660). Congregations were formed, especially in Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The first synod was formed in 1706. In the middle of the 18th century, the movement was split between those who supported the new revivalism, as proposed by the likes of independent Anglican George Whitefield (1714–1770) and Congregationalist Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758), and those who rejected it. Revivalism would be a continuing issue dividing Presbyterians through the 19th century. The main body of American Presbyterians held together until the end of the American Civil War, but then it split into two factions. The northern faction emerged as the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; the southern group as the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

After the American Revolution, the church had spread westward. During the early part of the 19th century, it made common cause with the Congregationalists, and the two groups developed a plan of union to cut down on competition as the two churches developed on the frontier. However, on the frontier, revivalism again divided Presbyterians as a new issue arose: the camp meeting. Those who supported camp meetings and revivalism on the frontier departed to form the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

In the decades prior to the American Revolution, Scottish Covenanters found their way to the colonies. Covenanters in Scotland had formed their own church in 1733 in protest against the authority of the established Church of Scotland. By 1773, several Covenanter ministers had arrived in the colonies and formed the Reformed Presbyterian Church. A second secession occurred in the 1700s among people who protested the patronage system of the Church of Scotland and its lack of spiritual fervor. Still a third schism occurred in protest of the burghers who took the oath of loyalty that allowed them to hold public office in Scotland. The anti-burgher faction opposed the oath and charged that taking it supported the episcopacy. People associated with the Covenanter and anti-burgher factions came to the colonies in the middle of the 18th century and in 1753 formed the Associate Presbyterian Church. In 1782, the Reformed Presbyterian Church and the Associate Presbyterian Church united to form the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church.

But some members of the Associate Presbyterian Church declined to join the merger and continued to exist under that name. In 1822, the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church split into two factions, one in the North and one in the southern part of the country. In 1858, the continuing Associate Presbyterian Church and the northern faction of the Associate Reformed

Interior of the Second Presbyterian Church in Chicago, a congregation established in 1842. (iStockPhoto.com)

Church merged to constitute the United Presbyterian Church of North America.

In 1906, the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church merged and continued under the name of the former body. Then, in 1958, that body merged with the United Presbyterian Church in North America to become the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. That merger brought most American Presbyterians into two organizations. These two groups, the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the United States, merged in 1983 to constitute the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.).

In 2000 the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) reported 2.56 million members. The church is organized on a presbyterial model. Its highest legislative body is the general assembly. Congregations are grouped into presbyteries and synods across the country. The church supports a number of colleges and theological seminaries. The constituent bodies forming the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) began ordaining women to the ministry in 1956.

In 1967 the United Presbyterian Church caused considerable controversy when it adopted a new Confession of Faith, which the church saw as a contemporary restatement of the Presbyterian tradition but which many conservatives saw as a marked departure from traditional standards. The church subsequently published a book containing the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, several Reformed confessions, the Westminster documents, and the new 1967 confession. It is generally understood that these statements of the Christian and Reformed tradition are to be understood both in the light of history and contemporary theology. Some church members and leaders, primarily from the Presbyterian Church in the United States, who rejected what they saw as the liberal theological tendencies in the church implied by the new confession, stayed out of the proposed merger and in the 1970s formed the conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) is ecumenically oriented, and its constituent bodies produced some of the outstanding ecumenical leaders of the 20th century. The church is a leading member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. In 2006, the church reported an inclusive membership of 3,025,740 members in 11,903 churches.

The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.)
100 Witherspoon St.
Louisville, KY 40202
<http://www.pcusa.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches;
World Council of Churches.

References

- Balmer, Randall, and Gerald L. Fitzmier. The Presbyterians. Westmont, CT: Praeger, 1994.
- Hart, D. G., and Mark A. Noll, eds. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Des Plaines, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Lucas, Sean Michael. On Being Presbyterian: Our Beliefs, Practices, and Stories. Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 2006.
- Patton, Jacob Harris. A Popular History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. Amsterdam: Fredonia Books, 2003.
- Weeks, Louis B. To Be a Presbyterian. Philadelphia: Westminster John Knox Press, 1987.
- Weston, William J. Presbyterian Pluralism: Competition in a Protestant House. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1997.

Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba

During the last decades of the 19th century, many Cubans found their way to Florida, where they encountered Protestant churches for the first time. In 1890 Evaristo Collazo, who in the 1880s had resided in Tampa, Florida, returned to Cuba and began to gather small groups in Havana, Santa Clara, and Placetas. He also came to Cuba to support the revolutionary struggle to free Cuba from Spain. Collazo later was ordained as a Presbyterian missionary and became a lieutenant in the revolutionary army in the Spanish-American War.

After the war, in 1902, Collazo reopened the church and was assisted by American Presbyterian missionaries. The communities they founded eventually constituted themselves as a presbytery of the Synod of New Jersey of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now a constituent part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]). The church experienced steady growth through World War II, and in 1945 it joined with the Methodists and Episcopalians in forming the Seminary of Matanzas.

In 1967 the Presbyterian mission became an autonomous body as the Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba (Iglesia Presbiteriana-Reformada en Cuba). In 1969 Fidel Castro overthrew the government and established the regime he still heads. The government adopted an antireligious policy, but the church survived through the next quarter of a century and then experienced a spurt of growth, as regulations on religion were loosened in the 1990s.

The church is organized presbyterially. Its highest legislative body is the national synod. It published its own confession of faith in 1968. It is a member of both the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. In 2005 it reported 15,000 members in 53 congregations.

Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba
Salud 222 E/Lealtad y Campanario
La Habana 10200
Cuba

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Young, David P. Cuba and the Presbyterian Church: More than One Hundred Years of Faithful Witness. Louisville, KY: Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), Global Mission Ministry Unit, 1991.

Presbytery of Liberia

Missionaries from the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (now an integral part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) arrived in Liberia in 1833. As mission work proceeded, they discovered that personnel, one by one, were falling victim to malaria. They instituted a policy of sending only African American personnel but soon discovered that these workers were just as susceptible to the disease. In spite of their problems, the missionaries were able to play an important role in the developing country, and one of their number signed the country's Declaration of Independence in 1847. Support in the form of missionary personnel continued through the 1880s.

The Liberian Presbytery was among the earliest of the Christian missions in Africa to move entirely under local control and then attain status as an independent church. It was also unusual in the African context in that it had been originally constituted by repatriated Africans who had been returned to Africa after their sojourn in the United States. The presbytery became independent in 1928. It also became one of the first churches to ordain women—as deacons in the 1940s and as elders in the 1950s.

In the late 1990s the presbytery reported 1,083 members in 13 congregations. It is a member of both the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. In the 1970s it developed a new relationship with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and in 1980s became a provisional presbytery in that church.

Presbytery of Liberia
PO Box 3350
Broad and Johnson St.
Monrovia
Liberia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Priory of Sion

The Priory of Sion is a secret society legally established in France in 1972 by Pierre Plantard (1920–2000), yet claiming great antiquity. Legends connected with the Priory of Sion have generated great interest through the years, particularly as a result of the publication in 1982 of The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail by British journalists Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln, a nonfictional book that is the basis for the international best-selling novel The Da Vinci Code (2003) by American novelist Dan Brown. The story starts with Father Berenger Saunière (1852–1917), who in 1885 became the parish priest of Rennes-le-Château, a small village in the French region of Aude, near the Pyrenees Mountains. Saunière, it seems, was a rather strange character, deeply interested in symbolism; he also had a penchant for building a number of constructions around his parish church, including a bizarre neo-Gothic “Tower of Magdala.” These construction projects obviously cost a good deal of money, while Saunière was known to come from a poor family, and one did not normally become rich in 19th-century France by being a parish priest in a mountain hamlet.

Rennes-le-Château lies at the heart of the area once inhabited by the Cathars, and rumors spread that Saunière had found a treasure buried in the Middle Ages by the persecuted heretics. The fact that Saunière was also an archaeology buff, and had found some old artifacts while digging in the vicinity of the parish church, added fuel to the fire of rumors. The priest did his excavations at night, in order to remain the sole owner of his findings (which, according to French law, he should have given to the state). This obviously did not endear Saunière to the municipality, and some villagers also suspected him of having an affair with his servant, Marie Denarnaud (1868–1953), who was undoubtedly fiercely loyal to the controversial priest.

The gothic “Tower of Magdala,” built by Berenger Saunière, the eccentric parish priest of Rennes-le-Château, a small village in southwest France. (Andreas Stecher/StockphotoPro)

These rumors could not have failed to attract the attention of the local Catholic bishop, and having investigated the matter he concluded that, rather than having found a Cathar treasure, Saunière had made his money from “trafficking in Masses,” a not uncommon wrongdoing among 19th- and early-20th-century priests. In the Roman Catholic Church, Masses can be celebrated for the benefit of a specific soul, in the hope of helping a deceased loved one to ascend from purgatory into heaven. Masses can also be said for a specific aim for the benefit of living persons (for instance, for healing purposes). Prior to Vatican II, priests received a stipend, that is, a fixed amount of money for each Mass they said. “Trafficking in Masses” meant, in practice, that priests advertised their willingness to celebrate a great number of Masses for both the dead and the living. Advertising in this way was regarded as a kind of unfair competition toward other priests, and was condemned by the Church as illicit. The matter became even worse, of course, when priests failed to celebrate the Masses requested, despite having received the appropriate stipend. The bishop traced advertisements placed by Saunière in Catholic magazines throughout France, and even abroad, and quickly determined that he could not possibly have celebrated all the Masses he had received payments for, thus in fact defrauding his “clients.” In 1909, the bishop asked Saunière to leave Rennes-le-Château; the priest refused and was suspended from his priestly duties and privileges (a lesser sanction than excommunication, but a painful sanction nonetheless, which ended Saunière’s ecclesiastical career). He decided to remain in Rennes-le-Château, however, and the ownership of his buildings (Tower of Magdala included) did not pass to the diocese, because Saunière had taken the precaution of transferring their ownership to Marie Denarnaud.

Although the bishop had concluded that trafficking in Masses was enough to explain Saunière’s suspicious wealth, rumors about buried treasures (and alleged contacts with the Paris esoteric milieu) continued until his death in 1917, and even in the years that followed. The rumors resurfaced again in the early 1950s, when Marie Denarnaud, who was still the owner of all the properties, in her old age, was trying to sell them. She probably thought that rumors of buried treasures would raise the value of the properties. One buyer was Noel Corbu (1912–1968), who in 1956 started spreading the Saunière treasure legend through the local press, in the hope of attracting clients to the restaurant he had opened in one of the buildings. The rumors did spread largely, thanks to friendly contacts between Corbu, some local reporters, and members of the Paris esoteric milieu.

Pierre Plantard, who had been the leader of a minor occult-political organization known as Alpha Galates, told an even taller story about Rennes-le-Château, firstly to selected friends from the late 1950s, then to the esoteric author Gérard De Sède (1921–2004), who in 1967 published a book entitled L’Or de Rennes (Rennes’ Gold). It was De Sède who in turn interested the three British journalists, Baigent, Leigh, and Lincoln, in the story, and they jointly saw to it that Rennes-le-Château became a household name throughout the English-speaking world, thanks to a BBC TV series based on their reports, as well as several popular books. In short, the story told by Plantard to De Sède, and later popularized by the British journalists, was that Saunière did indeed discover a buried treasure, and that it included much more than valuable antiquities. Buried in Rennes-le-Château were documents confirming the old southern French legends that Jesus Christ, rather than ascending into heaven, had come to live in France with his wife, Mary Magdalene. Plantard added that the divine couple did indeed have children in France and that they initiated a dynasty, which eventually became known as the Merovingian dynasty of France. This, Plantard suggested, was the true meaning of the Grail legends: the Holy Grail, in French Saint Graal, was in fact the Sang Réal, which in medieval French means “Holy Blood,” that is, the blood of Jesus Christ himself flowing in the veins of the Merovingians. When the Merovingian dynasty fell from power, Plantard continued, their descendants went underground and a secret organization, the Priory of Sion, has preserved their holy blood even since. Cathars and Knights Templar, as well as early Freemasons and various literary and artistic figures (prominent among them being the painter Nicholas Poussin, 1594–1655), were all said to be connected to the secretive Priory. Plantard gradually started to imply that he was himself not only the current Grand Master of the elusive Priory, but also the last descendant of the Merovingians and the current vessel of Christ’s holy blood.

Plantard’s tale, if true, would of course have turned Christianity on its head, and inspired a whole new interpretation of world history. Historians remain understandably skeptical, regarding the Priory of Sion as nothing more than a figment of Plantard’s imagination (although a Catholic order known as the Priory of Sion did exist in the Middle Ages, they note, it had nothing to do with the Merovingians, the blood of Jesus Christ, or Rennes-le-Château). Millions of readers of popular books about Rennes-le-Château, and more recently of The Da Vinci Code, took the story quite seriously, however, and many in the esoteric milieu were happy to join the Priory of Sion after Plantard legally established it in 1972. It is also not impossible (as reported by several journalists) that some people in the political, financial, and intelligence worlds also took a genuine interest in the Priory’s activities, seeing it almost as a more secretive and elite brand of Freemasonry, and some may even have joined it. Be that as it may be, the Rennes-le-Château saga became an integral part of international popular culture even before The Da Vinci Code through novels and movies; Preacher and The Magdalena (recently joined by Rex Mundi) were among the popular comic book series that also focused interest on the subject. The Priory remains an interesting organization, combining themes from several pre-existing occult orders, which even those who doubt that the Rennes-le-Château legends are factually true, may nevertheless be tempted to join. As a secret society, the Priory's address (in the Paris region) remains confidential, and the organization does not maintain a website. A number of organizations calling themselves "Priory of Sion" were established after 2003 by fans of The Da Vinci Code and occasionally surface on the Web, but they have no connection with Plantard's original French group.

Massimo Introvigne and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Baigent, Michael, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln. The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail. London: Jonathan Cape, 1982.
- De Sède, Gérard. L'Or de Rennes, ou la vie insolite de Bérenger Saunière, curé de Rennes-le-Château. 2nd ed. Paris: Julliard, 1967.
- Introvigne, Massimo. Gli Illuminati e il Priorato di Sion. La verità sulle due società segrete del "Codice da Vinci" e di "Angeli e demoni." Casale Monferrato (Alessandria): Piemme, 2005.
- Saul, John M., and Janice A. Glaholm. Rennes-le-Château: A Bibliography. London: Mercurius Press, 1985.

Progressive National Baptist Convention of America

Among the least known of the organizational remnants of the 1960s civil rights movement in the United States, the Progressive National Baptist Convention of America was formed in 1961 by Baptist pastors who supported Martin Luther King, Jr.'s nonviolent protests against laws and social patterns that allowed racial discrimination to persist in American life. The Convention grew out of the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., which at the time was the largest institution in the United States led and supported by African Americans.

Formed late in the 19th century, the National Baptist Convention represented a new attempt by African Americans to control their own religious organizations. Prior to its founding, most black Baptists were affiliated with the American Baptists (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.), many serving in its employ as writers, missionaries, and denominational agency workers. However, African Americans were largely excluded from the higher levels of control and decision making within the denomination. Soon after the formation of the National Baptist Convention, however, the African American community was confronted with a series of new laws that mandated a segregated society in the American South (where most African Americans resided).

Through the early 20th century, a long struggle for social equality took place, and many black leaders were prepared to continue that struggle long into the future. Observing the repressive responses to the occasional race riots that broke out in some U.S. cities, they concluded that attempts to change the situation by taking to the streets were counterproductive. Among those who believed it was futile to try to change racial patterns suddenly was Joseph H. Jackson (d. 1990), the pastor of a large Baptist congregation in the heart of Chicago's African American community and the powerful president of the National Baptist Convention.

Into this setting came Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), the pastor of a relatively small congregation in Montgomery, Alabama. King had been inspired by the example of Mahatma Gandhi and his successful efforts to free India from colonial rule. Utilizing the opportunity presented initially by the rude treatment of a black woman on a public bus in December 1955, he organized the African American community across the South in a protest against segregation laws. He impressed the example of Gandhi upon the protesters, giving a uniquely Christian twist to the idea of nonviolent moral challenge to the authorities. The idea caught the imagination of the younger generation, and a mass movement ensued.

In 1961 King's supporters in the National Baptist Convention demanded that the Convention, the most prestigious African American religious organization in the country, declare its support of King and the movement. They immediately faced opposition from President Jackson and others who feared that repercussions would be dire if King took to the streets. They refused the support. The demand for support of the civil rights movement was also tied to a challenge of Jackson's leadership of the Convention. He had been president for nine years in 1961. However, Jackson's commitment to the gradual elimination of racial discrimination still had the majority support of the Convention, and the challenge to his continued presidency by Gardner C. Taylor (b. 1918) in 1961 was defeated.

Following their defeat, Taylor and his supporters in the Convention decided that the best way to lead African American Baptists in a new direction was to issue a call to form a new association. In November 1961, 23 pastors answered and with the messengers (representatives) from their churches formed the Progressive National Baptist Convention. The news of the formation of the Convention was largely lost outside the African American community, as the nation's attention was on King and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which provided the direct guidance to the civil rights movement at the time. Among the bylaws accepted by the new Convention the following year was a provision limiting the length of the term of the president. The Convention grew quickly over the next years, as the movement culminated in the passing of the comprehensive Civil Rights Act in 1964.

In 2005 the Progressive National Baptist Convention reported a membership of 2.5 million in some 2,000 congregations. It cooperates with the other National Baptist conventions in the support of two theological schools. Cooperative action with other Baptist bodies has been a keynote of its national program. Among its earliest efforts was the Fund for Renewal, a program jointly sponsored with the American Baptists and designed to give new life to black Baptist schools. King and Ralph Abernathy (1926–1990), the American Baptist who succeeded King as leader of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference following King's assassination, lent their support to the fund. The Progressive National Baptist Convention is also a member of the Baptist World Alliance and the World Council of Churches.

Progressive National Baptist Convention of America
601 50th St., N.E.

Washington, DC 20019
<http://www.pnbc.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptist World Alliance; National Baptist Convention, U.S.A.; World Council of Churches.

References

- Avant, Albert A., Jr. The Social Teaching of the Progressive National Baptist Convention, Inc. Since 1961: A Critical Analysis of the Least, the Lost and the Left-Out. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Booth, William D. A Call to Greatness: The Story of the Founding of the Progressive National Baptist Convention. Richmond, VA: Brunswick Publishing Corporation, 2001.
- Fitts, Leroy. A History of Black Baptists. Nashville: Broadman Press, 1985.
- Payne, Wardell J. Directory of African-American Religious Bodies. 2nd ed. Washington, DC: Howard University Press, 1996.

Protestant Christian Batak Church

The Protestant Christian Batak Church (Huria Kristen Batak Protestan [HKBP]) dates to the arrival on Sumatra of Ludwig Ingwer Nommensen (1834–1918) as a representative of the German Rhenish Mission, a missionary agency associated with the German Lutheran Church. Nommensen initiated work among the Batak people who had settled on Sumatra in the ancient past. The Batak prospered, and over the centuries various Batak subdivisions appeared. Nommensen moved into the heart of Batak country and established a mission, and colleagues soon followed. The mission's work spread across the island.

In the 1920s the Sumatran Lutherans began to manifest signs of desiring independence. For example, they asked the German missionaries to relinquish control of the church. Formal independence was granted in 1930, though the German missionaries remained in place with a slightly altered status. The new church took the name Huria Kristen Batak Protestan, or Protestant Christian Batak Church, and is generally known by the initials of its Indonesian name (HKBP).

A Protestant Christian Batak church on Samosir Island, Lake Toba, Sumatra. (Valery Shanin/Dreamstime.com)

Then in 1940 Germany invaded the Netherlands. In response, the Dutch government on Sumatra interned all the German missionaries and did not allow anyone to use their homes or offices. The church was suddenly cut off from its financial resources. While the church was still trying to cope with this crisis, the Japanese invaded and tried to force some Shinto practices on the Christian community.

In the face of the wartime problems, the HKBP elected its first Indonesian endorus (bishop). In 1951 it issued a confession of faith that acknowledged the authority of the ancient ecumenical creeds, the Reformation confessions, and the Barmen Declaration (a statement against some of the religious claims of Nazism), but it also went on to create its own restatement of Christianity that spoke against a number of views that it opposed, such as Pentecostalism and nationalistic Christianity. The new confession did not choose between Lutheran and Reformed doctrine, but the newly autonomous church decided to continue its Lutheran associations and applied for membership in the Lutheran World Federation. It has subsequently become a member of the World Council of Churches and the Community of Churches in Indonesia.

In 1954 the church opened Nommensen University, currently with two campuses. The university's former theological school now exists as a separate institution. The church also maintains an extensive school system of elementary and secondary schools. Other ministries include a farming project, a youth center, an orphanage, and a center to assist the blind and crippled. The church also works with many of its poorer members to improve their skills as farmers and tradespeople. Deaconesses from Germany were introduced very early into the Sumatran mission, and the church has since developed its own deaconess program. Deaconesses work in the church-sponsored hospital and as community workers.

The HKBP has developed a modern denominational organization to facilitate its mission. It is led by its bishop and a general secretary. The major legislative body is the biennial synodical convention. Parishes are organized into resorts, and resorts into districts. Each district is led by a superintendent. Women have been admitted to the ordained ministry since 1982.

The church uses Toba Batak as its official language, but it has faced a severe problem concerning language because several other languages, including Bahasa Indonesia, compete as the primary language of its members. Many congregations, especially those located in urban areas, now conduct services in Indonesian.

The HKBP is the oldest and largest of the several bodies that have grown from the original Rhenish Mission. These several churches, which separated over the years either from the older Batak mission or from the HKBP after World War II, include the Batak Christian Community Church (GPKB), the Christian Protestant Church in Indonesia (GKPI), the Indonesian Christian Church (HKI), and the Simalungun Protestant Christian Church (GKPS).

In 2005, the HKBP reported 3.5 million members. It carries on missionary programs among modern Indonesia's three thousand islands and its many distinct ethnic and language groups.

Protestant Christian Batak Church
 Pearaja Tarutung 22413
 Tapanuli Utara
 Sumatra
 Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Pentecostalism; Rhenish Mission; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Christian Church–Angkola

The Protestant Christian Church–Angkola (Gereja Kristen Protestan Angkola [GKPA]) developed as the work of the Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP) spread among the Angkola people of Indonesia, one of the Batak subgroups. The HKBP began in 1861 at Sipirok, Sumatra, where the Rhenish Mission originally established a mission station. However, the Angkola language was distinctive enough that Angkola church leaders requested separation so they could pursue the development of an Angkola church. The HKBP acted favorably on that request in 1974, and the new church was set up. The formation of the GKPA motivated the completion of the translation of the Bible into Angkola.

Except for one parish in Jakarta, the parishes of the church are all in northern Sumatra. They are grouped into districts that operate under the synod, the highest legislative body in the church. The church opened a training center to facilitate the self-help and independence of people in the rural villages, where most of the church's congregations are located. The church is also ecumenically oriented and is a member of both the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches. It also carries on a program of Christian-Muslim dialogue. In 2005 the church reported 28,000 members.

Protestant Christian Church–Angkola
 Jalan Teuku Umar 102
 22722 Padangsidimouan
 South Tapanuli, North Sumatra
 Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Protestant Christian Batak Church; Rhenish Mission; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Christian Church of Bali

The Protestant Christian Church of Bali (Gereja Kristen Protestan di Bali [GKPB]) began in 1929 with the arrival on Bali of Tsang To Hang, a Chinese missionary with the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Bali was unusual among the Indonesian islands in that it had resisted the earlier incursion of Islam and had remained predominantly Hindu. In 1864 a representative of the Netherlands Reformed Church had established a mission. He had baptized only one convert as a result of his work. He was murdered in 1881 and as a result of his death, the Dutch authorities did not allow other missionaries to work on the island.

Tsang To Hang had better results. By 1931 he had baptized a group of Balinese and had established a church. However, he was banished in 1933. After a time, the Christian Church in East Java was permitted to assume the care of the small Christian community on Bali. Growth was slow and by 1949 when the church became independent, there were still fewer than 2,000 Balinese Christians. During the period since its independence, the church has been assisted by the movement of many Balinese throughout Indonesia, where they have encountered other Christian churches before returning to Bali to join the Christian church there.

The church has presbyterian polity and has adopted the ancient Christian creeds as its doctrinal standard. It operates a school system, a hospital, and several clinics. In the 1990s it reported 12,000 members in 72 congregations. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Protestant Church of Bali
PO Box 72
Jalan Dr. Sutomo 101A
Denpasar 80118
Bali
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian and Missionary Alliance; Netherlands Reformed Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Christian Church of Nias

The Protestant Christian Church of Nias (Banua Niha Keriso Protestan [BNKP]) dates to the arrival of missionaries from the Rhenish Mission, a German missionary society with roots in both Lutheran and Reformed traditions. The missionaries came to Nias, an island east of Sumatra that is now a part of Indonesia, because they had been expelled from Kalimantan (Borneo), another Indonesian island. They began to work among the various people of the island, each of whom spoke their own local languages. It was not until 1874 that a process of communication was established and the first convert was received and baptized. Some 20,000 Niassans had become Christians by the beginning of World War I.

In the years immediately after the war, the mission entered an unexpected growth phase, tripling in size within a few years. In 1936 the first synod of what became the Protestant Christian Church of Nias was convened. The present presbyterial church order was adopted in 1938, which is considered the church's official beginning. One of the German missionaries chaired the church meetings until 1940. The church continued to grow through the decades after World War II, but it also experienced a set of schisms related to traditional Niassan power structures. The church would eventually become the religion of the majority of the island's residents and would be credited with bringing a sense of unity to the island as it was thrust into the modern world. The Nias language spoken in the northern half of the island was chosen for a translation of the Bible, which was printed in 1913. It subsequently became the common language of the island.

In the late 1990s, the church reported 326,000 members, approximately 60 percent of the population. It was a member of the World Council of Churches, but in recent years has withdrawn.

Protestant Christian Church of Nias
Gunungsitoli 22813
Nias Sumatera Utara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Rhenish Mission; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Protestant Church in Indonesia

The Protestant Church in Indonesia is a unique body within the larger Indonesian Christian community, and dates to the years of the Dutch East Indies Company (established in 1602). During the two centuries that the company managed the economic and political affairs of the Indonesian islands, various Reformed and Lutheran churches had established congregations, primarily in Minahasa (northern Sulawesi), the Moluccas, and the Timor archipelago. Through the years, members of these three churches moved to western Indonesia; congregations were established to accommodate them. The Dutch East India Company went bankrupt in the 1790s; following its dissolution in 1800, the government of the Netherlands nationalized Indonesia as the Dutch East Indies. The government took responsibility for the Christian churches and organized them into the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies. It was led by a church board located in Batavia (now Jakarta). The government largely paid the church's bills.

As an institution of a religiously neutral government, the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies was supposed to care for its members, but not proselytize non-Christians. It grew in some places by incorporating the congregations that had been developed by the independent missionary agencies then operating in the country.

In 1935, the relationship between the church and the state was severed, a change that resulted in a variety of adjustments throughout the country. The church developed a presbyterian polity and adopted the Apostles' Creed as its doctrinal standard. The congregations in Minahasa and the Moluccas reorganized as autonomous bodies almost immediately and those on Timor and in western Indonesia soon after the end of World War II. Thus the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies (which became the Protestant Church in Indonesia) emerged as an ecumenical body through which its former congregations, now reorganized as four autonomous bodies, related to each other and cooperated on various issues. The church subsequently offered itself as the ecumenical organ for all of the Indonesian Protestant church to come together. That offer was, however, rejected in favor of a new Indonesian council of churches.

By the mid-1950s, the Protestant Church in Indonesia had largely lost its function and for a period virtually ceased to exist. In recent years, however, it has been revived as a structure through which a dozen autonomous churches, including the four original churches, now cooperate with each other and seek to manifest a sense of unity in the multi-island national state.

The Protestant Church in Indonesia is a member of the World Council of Churches. Four of its member bodies are also independently members of the World Council—the Evangelical Christian Church in Minahasa, the Protestant Church in the Moluccas, the Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor, and the Protestant Church in Western Indonesia.

As of 2006, the Protestant Church in Indonesia represented some 4 million Protestant Christians in its 12 member churches, about half of whom are in the church in Timor.

Protestant Church in Indonesia
Jion Medan Merdeka Timur 10
Jakarta 10110
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Protestant Church in the Moluccas; Protestant Church in Western Indonesia; Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church in Sabah (Malaysia)

Soon after World War II, the Seventh-day Adventist Church began a mission on the Kudat Peninsula in the state of Sabah in the Malaysian part of Borneo. Many who were ready to become Christian were not ready to accept some of the prohibitions demanded by the Adventists, including refraining from pork and alcohol. In 1951 the Rungus people approached the Basel Mission (now the Evangelical Missionary Society), requesting it to send missionaries to them. Heinrich Honegger arrived two years later. Along with his evangelistic work, he led in the foundation of an agricultural school. Growth was relatively quick and the church became independent in 1965, although it still utilized Basel Mission personnel. Four years later it faced a crisis when the country's Islamic government expelled all of the foreign missionaries and began a campaign to convert the Christians of Sabah to Islam.

Once the Islamization campaign ended in 1976, the church entered a new growth phase. It adopted a congregational form of church government, but it has a synod that is headed by a bishop or head pastor. The church ordains women.

In 2005 the Protestant Church in Sabah reported approximately 30,000 members in 307 churches. It has grown among the various groups indigenous to Sabah, extending also to mainland Malaysia as people from Sabah have moved around the country. The church now works among various Bornean people and in the Chinese community, and it is a member of the World Council of Churches. It has emphasized the Lutheran tradition of the Basel Mission (which represents both Lutheran and Reformed congregations in Germany and Switzerland) and has joined the Lutheran World Federation.

Protestant Church in Sabah
PO Box 69
Kudat, Sabah
Malaysia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Basel Mission; Lutheran World Federation; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi

The Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi (Gereja Protestan di Sulawesi Tenggara [GEPSULTRA]) originated when a Protestant church was established for government and military officials residing on the island of Sulawesi, now a part of Indonesia. In 1916 a missionary began to expand this work into the countryside, where Islam was dominant. The first Native baptism occurred in 1918. Congregations of Sulawesians were formed over the next two decades, but no ministers were ordained and the church property was not registered. This neglect caused the church severe problems when the Japanese invaded and the missionaries were no longer available. Attempts to reorganize after the war were slowed by unrest among Muslims, who were unhappy with the new Indonesian central government. In 1950 Muslim guerrillas killed a missionary and several church workers who had been traveling around the country to survey the church's situation.

Only in 1957 did the situation in the region stabilize enough for the church to meet and constitute itself as an independent body. It adopted a presbyterial government, with a synod as the highest legislative body. In the late 1960s the government began to move workers into southeast Sulawesi, a sparsely populated region, and the church began to grow among the new residents. Its membership currently includes more than 25 ethnic/language groups. Church membership has grown to more than 30,000 (2005), though it still constitutes a small minority in the predominantly Muslim culture.

The immigrants to Sulawesi brought with them a form of agriculture that threatened the local ecosystem. In the 1970s the church responded with a program in agricultural education that attempted to build a progressive view of farming combined with a spiritual worldview.

This small church supports a limited set of social programs, including two orphanages, an elementary school, and four secondary schools. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Protestant Church in Southeast Sulawesi
PO Box 3
Jalan Dr. Ratulangi 121
Kendari 93121
Sulawesi Tenggara
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church in the Moluccas

The history of the Protestant Church in the Moluccas (Gereja Protestan Moluccas [GPM]) goes back to the arrival of the Portuguese into the East Indies in the 16th century. A Catholic mission established in the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, baptized its first convert in 1538. Francis Xavier (1506–1552) visited the Christian community there in 1546. After more than 60 years of work, the Portuguese were driven out by the Dutch, who installed Reformed church ministers in place of the priests. The community went through a process of Protestantization. The first Protestant church service in Asia was held in the Moluccas on February 27, 1605.

A vital church was built throughout the islands from its center in Ambon. The Heidelberg Catechism was translated into Malay and published in 1625. The New Testament followed in 1668. The complete Bible (1733) was followed by a Psalm book (1735). Sermons in Dutch were translated and given to lay ministers for presentation in Malay worship services. Over the next century an indigenous Christianity was created in the Moluccas.

A wave of Pietistic fervor that had come to the church in Holland was imported to the Moluccas by a new missionary society, the Nederlandsche Gereformeerde Zendingsvereniging (NZG). Missionaries from this society arrived in Indonesia in 1815, among them Joseph Kam (1769–1833), who settled in Ambon, where he had a vital ministry for the next 18 years. He recruited numerous lay teachers, who were then deployed in missions throughout the Dutch East Indies.

After World War I the church was readied for autonomy, which occurred in 1935 when the GPM was established as a branch of what was called the Protestant Church in Indonesia, headquartered in Jakarta. Though the church was locally autonomous, important decisions were referred to Jakarta for final approval. This arrangement became increasingly dysfunctional, and after World War II the attempt to keep the churches in the different island groups united faded. The Protestant Church in Indonesia was transformed into an ecumenical council and then faded into obscurity.

The Protestant Church in the Moluccas suffered greatly during the Japanese occupation. No fewer than 54 church leaders were killed. In 1944 the church's archives, located in Ambon, were destroyed during Allied bombing of the city. In 1950 Ambon was also the site of heavy fighting when the government put down an insurrection by some who opposed the new government of Indonesia.

In the immediate aftermath of the founding of Indonesia in 1948, the church went through a period of self-reflection. It adopted a new church order with a presbyterian polity. It reflected on its relationship with Islam, an increasing factor in the religious life of the Moluccas and the dominant religion in Indonesia. A new emphasis was placed on ministerial education, and the church now supports a theological faculty at the Maluku Christian University in Ambon. The church is a member of both the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

In 2005 the Protestant Church in the Moluccas reported 575,000 members. Once the majority religion on the island, it has been challenged by the movement of so many Indonesians to the Moluccas. A branch of the church was established in the Netherlands by some 4,000 Moluccans who moved to Holland after World War II at the expense of the Dutch government.

Protestant Church in the Moluccas
Jalan Mayjend
DI Panjaitan 2
Ambon 97124
Maluku
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Enklaar, I. H. and Joseph Kam. "Apostel der." In Molukken. s'Gravenhage, 1963.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church in the Netherlands

The Protestant Church in the Netherlands (Protestantse Kerk in Nederland [PKN]) is the second largest Protestant church in the Netherlands with approximately 1.8 million members served by about 1,700 ministries in about 1,800 local communities (2006). The PKN is the combination of the Netherlands Reformed Church (De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk [NHK]), the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (De Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland [GKN]) and the Evangelical Lutheran Churches in the Kingdom of the Netherlands (ELK). The PKN was grounded on May 1, 2004, after many difficult years of fundamental discussions. A part of the right wing of the NHK, the Reformed Federation (Gereformeerde Bond) refused this combination and founded The Restored Reformed Church (De Hersteld Hervormde Kerk). A part of the GKN founded The Continued Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (De Voortgezette Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland [VGKN]).

The Netherlands Reformed Church (Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk) was at the beginning of the 21st century the oldest and largest Protestant church in the Netherlands with approximately 2 million members served by 1,750 ministers in 1,340 local communities. The church originated as the Dutch phase of the Reformation in the 16th century, and the history of Protestantism in the Netherlands was almost fully synonymous with the history of the church. In 1816 King William I (1772–1843) reorganized the church and gave it its present name. It was the national church until 1951. The Dutch Reformed Church has left its imprint on Dutch civilization and as an internationally influential body is the source for a number of contemporary Reformed churches, especially in Indonesia, South Africa, and the United States. An inclusive church, it includes a spectrum of theological perspectives, from very liberal to very strict and traditional.

The beginning of the Reformation in the northern Netherlands (the later Dutch Republic) is somewhat complicated. Sacramentalism, biblical Humanism, Anabaptism, and Lutheranism all played their part, but eventually Calvinism (Reformed Protestantism) found the largest constituency. Swiss Reformers Huldrych (Ulrich) Zwingli (1484–1531) and Heinrich Bullinger (1504–1575) influenced several Dutch theologians, including Cornelis Hoen (d. 1524), Johannes Anastasius Veluanus (1500–1575), and Hendrik van Bommel (ca. 1490–1570). At the beginning of the 17th century, the life of the church was marked by the conflict between the liberal theologian Jacob Arminius (1560–1609), the "grounding father" of the Remonstrant Brotherhood, and Franciscus Gomarus (1563–1641), a strict Calvinist. Arminius proclaimed that the practice of confession and the catechism should be revised. He taught that all people are included in God's reconciling act in Christ (though God ultimately chooses only those who turn in faith to him), that humans are not totally perverted by sin (that a part of God's image remains undistorted by sin), and that perseverance in belief is a matter of free will. The Synod of Dordrecht condemned these beliefs in its five articles against the Remonstrants (Canones synodi Dordracenae), which, together with the Dutch Confession of Faith and the Heidelberg Catechism, remain the doctrinal standard of the church. At the Synod of Dordrecht it was also decided to translate the Bible into Dutch. The Dutch Bible, called the Statenvertaling, became very important for the development of the Dutch language and is still used in a revised form in some of the more strict Reformed churches.

The Netherlands Reformed Church includes several recognizable movements or wings: a strictly orthodox one, a liberal one, and a moderate one. The strictly orthodox wing has several origins, the most important being the Nearer Reformation, which looks for the radical reformation of doctrine and life in a manner similar to the Puritanism of the Anglo-Saxon countries and the Pietism of Germany. This wing teaches that believers should seek a mystical experience of God and avoid worldliness. Believers affirm the need for a spiritual rebirth, the visible marks of faith, and the practice of a God-fearing life. They also believe in the strictest form of predestination. They look to the government to promote the Reformed religion and to banish every false religion. The Nearer Reformation supporters have also been the strongest critics of the move toward unity, called the Samen op Weg (Together on the Way), with the Reformed Church in the Netherlands (GKN), and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The perspective of the Nearer Reformation continues within the church through the Reformed Federation (Gereformeerde Bond), supported by some 400 ministers, 312 local churches, and 450 local parishes.

Netherlands Reformed church in Den Hoorn, Netherlands, built in the early fifteenth century. (iStockPhoto.com)

The Nearer Reformation perspective also underlies a small, very strict orthodox denomination founded in 1962 around the periodical Het gekrookte riet, a title borrowed from one of the important books of 145 sermons of Bernardus Smijtegelt (1665–1739). This group rejects television and radio and other forms of enjoyment and culture. Only those chosen by God are believed to come to real conversion. All believers must therefore doubt their eternal salvation. The denomination counts some 10 ministers. Finally, the Confessional Unity (Confessionele Vereniging), founded in 1864, emphasizes obedience to the holy scriptures and strict community within the confession of the church, and looks to the restoration of the church along biblical standards. It counts 165 active ministers and around 4,000 members.

The more progressive wing of the church has its origins in 19th-century theological liberalism. It also draws upon the tradition of free thinking in the Dutch Republic in the 16th and 17th centuries associated with the biblical Humanism of Erasmus (1467–1536), Sebastian Franck (ca. 1499–ca. 1542), Dirck Volkertszoon Coornhert (1522–1590), Baruch de Spinoza (1632–1677), and others. The most prominent representative of this wing is the Unity of Liberal Protestants (Vereniging van Vrijzinnig Hervormden), officially founded in 1913. The Unity advocates freedom of belief and confession and argues against the infallible authority of church and scriptures. The Unity was most significant in the decades prior to World War II. As the 21st century begins, it counts some 6,000 members.

The Zwingli-Unity (Zwingli Bond), founded in 1948, is the more radical modernist wing of the Netherlands Reformed Church. It advocates a Unitarian perspective that rejects the Trinity of God and therefore denies the divinity of Jesus and the Holy Spirit. It teaches that God is too great to be known and that Jesus is the ideal human being and our example in faith. The scriptures are not inspired by God but are only a collection of human writings that include all the aspects of human desire and passion. The Zwingli-Unity is a small group inside the church, with only 300 members.

The moderate wing of the church, called Midden-Orthodox, stands between the strict orthodox and the free-thinking wing. It advocates biblical preaching about subjects bearing on the problems of the modern society, such as homosexuality, abortion, euthanasia (active and passive), and racial questions.

The Walloon Churches (Églises Wallones) have had a special place in the Netherlands Reformed Church. They originated after the fall of Antwerp in 1585, when many Flemish- and French-speaking Protestants from the southern Netherlands (Belgium) fled to the northern Netherlands. The French-speaking believers organized their own denomination. Additionally, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, some 100,000 French Huguenots (Protestants) also fled to the Northern Netherlands. The denomination flourished through the 19th century, with 82 local parishes. In 2000 the French-speaking Églises Wallones, now one of the 54 classes of the Dutch Reformed Church, count 13 parishes, 12 ministers, and around 2,000 believers.

The Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (called the GKN for its Dutch name, De Gereformeerde Ker-ken in Nederland), not to be confused with the GKN (Liberated), founded in 1892, is the third largest Protestant church in the Netherlands. At the beginning of the 21st century, it had approximately 650,000 believers in 840 parishes served by 320 ministers. Though officially founded in 1892, its origins can be traced to the Separation movement in 1832 and the Dutch Non-conformism movement in 1886, both of which were separation movements from the Netherlands Reformed Church. The primary issue leading to the separations was the growing adherence to liberal theological thinking within the Netherlands Reformed Church, which had assumed an increasingly important role.

The father of the unity of the two separations was Abraham Kuyper (1837–1920), also the founder of the Free University (Vrije Universiteit) in Amsterdam (1880) and of the former Anti Revolutionaire Partij, an important Protestant party (now a constituent part of the Christian Party, the CDA). This kind of political activism remains significant in the GKN, and for many years, it has had an influence in the Netherlands beyond its direct religious influence upon its members. Doctrinally, however, the GKN is much like other Reformed church bodies in accepting the Heidelberg Catechism, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Dutch Confession as its standards of faith and practice.

Through the mid-1920s, the GKN developed its organized life, with many active believers founding Reformed schools, newspapers, political parties, clubs, and other groups. At the same time, it experienced a variety of theological disagreements, especially over the role of the government in answering questions of belief. Then an initial rupture came in 1926. Dr. Johannes G. Geelkerken (1879–1960) was condemned for his belief that the holy scriptures are not inspired by God. A second very important rupture occurred during the German occupation of World War II, with criticism of the teachings of Kuyper, the church's revered founder. Dr. Klass Schilder (1890–1952), a professor at Kampen, one of the church's ministerial training centers, criticized Kuyper's views on common grace, the nature of the soul, the covenant of grace, and rebirth. Schilder was condemned in 1944, and he left with many followers to found the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated).

In the late 20th century, the GKN experienced a new set of theological tensions. Important theologians such as Drs. Herman Wiersinga, H. M. Kuitert, and C. J. Den Heijer offered variant perspectives on the traditional Reformed teachings. Among other ideas, they have directly questioned belief in the divine inspiration of the Bible, the divine character of Jesus, and the nature of human reconciliation. Although the majority of the GKN has aligned itself with these theologians, an important part rejects them. The last-named group is united in the Society of Worried (Vereniging van Verontrusten) and in Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (affliction communities).

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands (Evangelisch-Lutherse in het Koninkrijk der Nederlanden) began with the arrival of Lutheran refugees in Amsterdam from the southern Netherlands (now Belgium), where Roman Catholic authorities had been unappreciative of attempts to spread Protestantism. Amsterdam was at the time (1566) the most religiously tolerant city in Europe. Continuing to worship in members' homes, the group adopted a confession and church order in 1588 at the time a church was formally organized. In 1600, Holland, which had become a Reformed Calvinist country, formally granted religious tolerance to both Roman Catholics and Lutherans. By 1605, no less than five congregations had emerged in Holland, and a synod was formed.

The toleration act allowed the Lutherans to own houses of worship, provided they did not look like churches. In 1633 the group purchased a former warehouse, which they converted into their main church building. Known as the "Old Church at the Spui," it remains the home of an active congregation today. During the century the group spread to England, and became the source of the first Lutheran congregation in New York.

The Dutch Lutheran community experienced one major schism, the result of a growing rationalist approach to theology in the 18th century. The more orthodox confessional wing of the church broke away in 1793 to form the Restored Evangelical Lutheran Church. It was 1952 before the two branches reunited. By that time, both had been changed by a new era of research on Lutheran roots and a new commitment to Lutheran theological basics. Three years after the union, a new hymnal and liturgy were published.

In 1986 the synods of the Netherlands Reformed Church and the Reformed Church in the Netherlands (GKN) declared that they were in a "state of union." They were soon joined by the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the kingdom of the Netherlands in what was termed the "Together on the Way" process. Early in the process, it was decided that a new church order was necessary, based on an ecclesiological vision rather than a collection of pragmatic arrangements. This church order was adopted in 2003. It declared that the church shares in the expectation of the people of Israel and therefore, as a Christ-confessing community of faith, seeks dialogue with Israel. It also expressed the church's place in the larger Christian fellowship or "oikoumene." It adopted the three ecumenical creeds (Apostles', Nicene, Chalcedonian), the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Canons of Dordt, the Unaltered Augsburg Confession, and Luther's Catechism as the doctrinal standards of the church.

The PCN adopted a presbyterian-synodal model of church governance with a board and a moderator and general secretary. It established its national office and service center in Utrecht. Its missionary and diaconal work is pursued in cooperation with several smaller churches in the Netherlands, under the banner of "Kerkinactie" (churches acting together). At the local level, the congregations have been invited to explore the options available to them, and some congregations have united while others have maintained a separate existence, often to keep alive the specific theological tradition they belonged to prior to the national union. The new church order grants space for local diversity while inviting the congregations to engage in discussions between different traditions and spiritualities, and thus discover what the Lutheran identity (now a distinct minority position in the united body) can offer to the larger church, and what the Reformed tradition can mean for the Lutherans.

The PCN is a member of the World Council of Churches, World Alliance of Reformed Churches, Lutheran World Federation, the Reformed Ecumenical Council, and the Community of Protestant Churches in Europe. The church maintains international relationships with many partner churches (products of the 19th-century missionary program of the church) in all parts of the world (including more than 30 denominations in Indonesia).

At the forefront of the agenda for the PCN has been a recognition of the extent of secularization in the Netherlands, which has led many to withdraw from organized religious life. At the same time, the church is challenged by the seemingly vibrant life of the congregations made up of migrants from the former Dutch colonies. They model a life of activity in mission and service. At the very first synod meeting of the PCN (May 2004), the representatives recognized their responsibility to work for renewal in culture, society, and nation. They believed that Dutch society cannot exist without a source of inspiration. They also saw a need to join the struggle against poverty and injustice.

Also, at present, an important work is being carried on by the Evangelic Work Organisation inside the Protestant Church in the Netherlands (Evangelisch Werkverband binnen de Protestantse Kerk in Nederland, EW). The EW, a movement to revive the whole church in its religious life, is a reaction to the evangelical movement outside the church. Since 1995 some ministers have developed models for renewing the life of the communities, and their plans have received many enthusiastic reactions. The EW has thus gained the support of many ministers and lay believers.

Protestant Church in the Netherlands

Synodsecretariaat
Postbus 8399
NL-3503 Utrecht
The Netherlands

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Anabaptism; Arminius, Jacob; Calvinism; Community of Protestant Churches in Europe; Lutheran World Federation; Lutheranism; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated); Reformed Ecumenical Council; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition; Remonstrant Brotherhood; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Augustijn, C., et al., eds., Reformatiorica. Teksten uit de geschiedenis van het Nederlandse prot- estantisme. Zoetermeer: Boekencentrum, 1996.

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Bakhuizen van den Brink, J. N., et al. Documenta reformatoria. Teksten uit de geschiedenis van kerk en theologie sedert de Hervorming. 2 vols. Kampen: Kok, 1960–1962.

Blei, Karel. De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk. Haar geschiedenis en identiteit, series Wegwijs. Kampen: Kok, 2000.

Crom, A. P., ed. Anderhalve eeuw gereformeerden in stad en land. 12 vols. Kampen: Kok, 1984–1985.

de Jong, O. J. Nederlandse kerkgeschiedenis. Nijkerk: Callenbach, 1985.

Endedijk, H. C. De Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. 2 vols. Kampen: Kok, 1990–1992.

Jaarboek van de Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland. Issued annually.

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.

Post, J. E. Gereformeerd zijn en blijven, een wankel evenwicht. Kampen: Kok, 1998.

Rasker, A. J. De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk vanaf. Kampen: Kok, 1795, 1986.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Protestant Church in Timor Lorosa'e

The Roman Catholic Church arrived on Timor around 1660, in the form of priests of the Dominican Order who came to the East Indies with the Portuguese. When the Dutch took over in 1613, they did not in fact take over nearly as completely as in much of the rest of their territory; they allowed the Portuguese to retain control of Timor and the Catholic Church to keep its mission on Timor. The Portuguese suppressed any attempt of Protestants to organize, and Roman Catholicism remains the dominant religious group. In East Timor Protestant churches began to appear only in the 20th century.

A Christian church in East Timor. Christianity is the majority religion in East Timor. (INSADCO Photography/StockphotoPro)

Protestantism had gained a following by 1975, when Portugal abandoned East Timor and it was annexed to Indonesia. There were some Protestants among the government officials who moved to the island in 1975, and they took the lead in forming congregations. Also, a number of nominal Roman Catholics identified with the new church. In 1979, the Protestant Church in Indonesia established the Coordinating Agency of Protestant Christian Congregations in East Timor. This agency moved to establish a regional church of the kind that operated on other Indonesian islands. The first synod of what became the Christian Church in East Timor (Gereja Kristen di Timor Timur [GKTT]) met in 1988.

The church adopted a presbyterian form of church order and followed other Protestant bodies in the country by making the ancient Christian creeds its standards of doctrine and not adding any of the 16th-century Protestant confessions. The church adopted an ecumenical stance, and in 1989 it identified with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1993.

The church has grown rapidly. It had less than 7,000 members when organized in 1979. In 1996 it reported 34,625 members in its 67 congregations. It oversees four maternity schools and one clinic as part of its commitment to the larger community in East Timor.

Protestant Church in Timor Lorosa'e
PO Box 1186
Jalan Martires de Patria
Dili 88110 Timor Timur
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dominicans; Protestant Church in Indonesia; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Protestant Church in Western Indonesia

As early as the 17th century, during the time that the Dutch East Indies Company controlled what is now

Indonesia, Protestant Christian churches were established on Timor, the Moluccas, and Minahasa (northern Sulawesi). These congregations were eventually organized as the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies following the Dutch government's takeover of the islands in 1800 after the company went bankrupt.

Through the 19th century, church members moved to the towns in the westernmost island of the East Indies. As churches were built to accommodate these members, the congregations were incorporated into the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies. The church served as the state church of the Dutch East Indies until the 1930s. In 1935, church and state were separated and the money that had been given the church annually was gradually withdrawn. After World War II, the Protestant Church of the Netherlands Indies became the Protestant Church in Indonesia. Simultaneously, the various segments of the church were organized into four autonomous churches. In 1948, the congregations in the west were organized into the Protestant Church in Western Indonesia. The Protestant Church in Indonesia, with whom the Protestant Church in Western Indonesia shares its national headquarters, has remained as a national structure through which the four widely separated churches have remained in relation to each other.

The Protestant Church in Western Indonesia is spread out over 25 of the 32 provinces of Indonesia, with congregations located in both the big cities and the remote rural countryside. As of 2006, it had some 600,000 members in its 280 congregations. It joined the World Council of Churches in 1991. The church's synod meets every five years.

Protestant Church in Western Indonesia
Jion Medan Merdeka Timur 10
Jakarta 10110
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Protestant Church in Indonesia; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and

International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church of Algeria

The Protestant Church of Algeria has inherited the traditions of 19th-century Protestant/Free church missionary activity in Algeria. After the call for French settlers to come to Algeria in 1873, Protestantism was offered an opening. The Reformed Church of France came to Algeria and established work there, primarily among French Protestants because the government frowned upon proselytizing within the Muslim community. Through the early 20th century, as the French expatriate community grew, the Reformed Church became the largest of the many non-Catholic church bodies in the country.

In 1908 two women who had been conducting an independent mission in Algiers since 1893 affiliated themselves with the Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church), and in 1909 the Methodist Episcopal Church's Woman's Foreign Missionary Society assumed their support. Other women were accepted to extend the work, though the first U.S. worker did not arrive until 1922. Work spread among the coastal cities and was based in medical and social services. In 1966 the Methodists opened a hospital in the northeastern city of Il Maten.

The independence of Algeria in 1962 deeply affected the Protestant community. The exodus of 500,000 people with French passports depleted many Christian groups of their support, especially the Reformed Church. Then the Methodist Church was hit by charges that their missionaries were agents of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency in 1969, and 10 percent (a significant percentage) were expelled from the country. The church's missionaries in Oran had withdrawn the year before for other reasons, and the church was left with 215 members.

In 1970 the French Reformed Church, the Methodists, and several other groups that had also lost significant resources since 1962 merged to become the Protestant Church of Algeria. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. The church acknowledges both Methodist and Reformed doctrinal positions. It also cooperates with the Roman Catholic Church in various social programs.

The actual membership of the church has always been difficult to count. There are some 5,000 core members with that many more constituent members, including some people who have never reported their conversion from Islam. In 2005, the church reported 14 “communities,” or parishes.

In March 2008, the government acted on a law passed in February 2006, which mandated non-Muslim religious centers to obtain a permit for gathering for worship from their regional prefecture and banned the production of any media intended to “shake the faith of a Muslim.” Thirteen chapels were ordered closed, including 11 in Tizi Ouzou, one in Bejaia, and one in Bouira (towns in the coastal region east of Algiers).

Protestant Church of Algeria

31 rue Reda Houhou
16000 Algiers
Algeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; United Methodist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Church of Senegal

One of the world’s smaller Christian denominations, the Protestant Church of Senegal began in the 19th-century attempts of the Paris Mission (affiliated with the Reformed Church of France) to build a mission among the Native people of Senegal. They had little success from their beginning in 1862 until after François Villegier translated a portion of the Bible into Wolof, one of the local languages, and Walter Taylor, a former slave who resided in Sierra Leone, joined the effort. Taylor concentrated his evangelistic activity among freed slaves residing in Khor, a small community near St. Louis.

A second church was opened in Dakar after it became the capital in 1904. However, the missionaries found the largely Muslim population unresponsive to their attempts to convert them. The church became independent in 1972 and is now completely in Senegalese hands, but the membership largely consists of expatriates. In the mid-1990s, the church reported 250 members in 2 congregations. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. It had been a member of the World Council of Churches in the 1990s, but has since withdrawn.

Protestant Church of Senegal
BP 22390
Dakar Ponty
Senegal

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Paris Mission; Reformed Church of France; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor

The Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor (Gereja Masehi Injili Timor [GMIT]) dates from the coming of the Dutch into Indonesia and specifically to the Timor archipelago in the second decade of the 17th century.

The Roman Catholic Church had previously established work, and in this area, unlike other islands, the Dutch allowed them to remain. Thus the Reformed Church mission developed beside that of the Catholic Church. The mission was centered on Kupang, and it grew slowly, except on the island of Rote, where a large number of people became Christian in the 1740s. Attempts to build a more effective mission in the 19th century failed.

Then early in the 20th century, after the Dutch government had finally established an effective administrative system, the Reformed Church missionaries launched a comprehensive program that utilized all they had learned from work on the other Indonesian islands. The year 1912 marked the beginning of a quarter century of growth, during which time the church grew ten-fold. The first steps toward an autonomous church were made in the 1930s, but interrupted by World War II. The church's synod met for the first time in 1947. After a period of stagnation, the church experienced a revival in the late 1960s, when in a few years' time the membership doubled. In the 1990s it reported 850,000 members in 1,500 congregations.

The church oversees a number of institutions, including kindergartens, hospitals, homes for the elderly, and orphanages. Ministerial education is handled through the theological faculty at the Artha Wacan Christian University in Kupang. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Protestant Evangelical Church in Timor
PO Box 85228
Jalan Perintis Kemerdekaan Walikota Baru
Kupang 85228 NTT
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

Reference

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.
The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Protestant Evangelical Church of Guinea

The Protestant Evangelical Church of Guinea is an evangelical Christian church that grew out of the efforts in West Africa of the Christian and Missionary Church (CMA). CMA missionaries entered Guinea early in the 20th century and founded the church in 1918. It was granted autonomy in 1962. It has subsequently been under local leadership and become self-supporting. Its first years of autonomy coincided with the rise of the country's president Ahmed Sékou Touré (1922–1984) to a position of dictator, operating from a Marxist perspective. In 1967, the government expelled almost all the Western missionaries from the country. It appears that in his younger years, Sekou Touré had positive contact with the CMA, and thus allowed eight CMA personnel to remain in Guinea, though their activity was severely restricted.

The church operates from an evangelical Protestant perspective and strongly affirms the authority of the Bible, the Trinity, salvation through Jesus Christ, and the necessity of personal conversion to faith in Christ. The church also limits baptism to those who make a personal confession of faith in Christ, and hence only about half of its members have been baptized.

The church has developed an expansive program in elementary education, medical clinics, and rural development projects. It also has promoted efforts to arrive at a deeper consciousness of its role in the post-Touré Guinea.

The church's highest legislative authority is its general assembly. It supports the church's biblical institute, at which ministers are trained. It has developed an ecumenical consciousness and works collegially with other Protestant bodies and the Roman Catholic Church on different concerns and projects. In 2005, it joined the World Council of Churches, and is one of the three groups that came together in 2001 to form the Christian Council of Guinea. Earlier, it joined the Christian Reformed Church, the French Assemblies of God, the World Evangelistic Crusade, SIM International and Mission Philafricaine in forming the Association of Evangelical Churches and Missions in Guinea (which is in turn affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance).

In 2005, the church reported 65,000 members and 550 congregations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

Reference

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Protestant Methodist Church in Cote d'Ivoire

See United Methodist Church in Ivory Coast.

Protestant Methodist Church of Benin

The largest non-Catholic church in the African nation of Benin, the Protestant Methodist Church was founded by missionary Thomas Birch Freeman (1809–1890), the son of an English mother and an African father. In 1838 Freeman returned to Africa from England as a representative of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (now an integral part of the Methodist Church) in Great Britain. He began work in Ghana, then known as the Gold Coast, before moving on to Benin, then known as Dahomey, in 1843. Freeman and his wife settled in Quidab on the Benin Coast and shortly thereafter traveled inland to Abomey to interview the king of the region, but they were unable to obtain his cooperation for the missionary work. The king was still involved in the slave trade, and Freeman had begun a program of employing freed slaves from the Americas to assist in the mission's leadership.

The work did not begin to grow until after the French protectorate was declared in 1851 and pacification occurred over the next decades. Noteworthy leadership was supplied later in the century by the Methodist African superintendent, Thomas Joseph Marshall. Along with the work in neighboring Togo, the mission remained a district in the British Methodist Conference until after Benin became independent in 1974 as a Marxist state. The Methodist mission subsequently became an independent body as the Protestant Methodist Church of Benin.

The church has continued to grow and by 2005 reported approximately 90,000 members. At the same time it has been an ecumenical church, supporting cooperative educational endeavors with several other churches. In 1965 it initiated a cooperative evangelistic endeavor that targeted the Fon people and included the production of a Bible in the Fon language. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches. Following the British lead, the church is led by a president rather than a bishop.

Protestant Methodist Church of Benin
01 BP 34
Cotonou
Benin

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Council of Churches.

References

- Harmon, Nolan B. Encyclopedia of World Methodism. 2 vols. Nashville: United Methodist Publishing House, 1974.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- World Methodist Council, Handbook of Information, 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2003.

Province of the Episcopal Church in Rwanda

Anglican work in Rwanda was launched in 1926 by the Rwanda General and Medical Mission, a group representing the most theologically conservative wing of the Church Missionary Society. Its early growth was spurred by a revival that swept through Rwanda in the later 1920s, and growth was remarkable through the 1930s, continuing for several decades. In 1968, the church reported 85,000 members.

The church also stepped into a unique situation relative to the indigenous population. The population was divided between two groups, the Tutsi (Watusi)

Pilgrims from Kenya, Tanzania, Sudan, Rwanda, and other African countries pray at the Catholic Basilica Church of the Uganda Martyrs a day before the Ugandan national Martyrs Day holiday on June 2, 2005, in Namugongo, Uganda. (AFP/Getty Images) and the Hutu, the latter constituting approximately 85 percent of the population. Though a distinct minority, the Tutsi were the ruling elite and remained so after colonization. In 1963, a year after the country gained its independence, a civil war broke out. Some 160,000 Tutsi were expelled, most relocating to Burundi. Relative peace followed for the next three decades, but in 1994, the president of Rwanda (a Hutu) died under mysterious circumstance in a plane crash. Subsequently, death squads were released throughout the country, and hundreds of thousands, the majority of the Tutsi, were killed. When a Tutsi army countered and took control of the government, some 200,000 Hutu fled the country. One Anglican Bishop Samuel Musabyimana (d. 2005) was among several church leaders from different denominations arrested for his reputed role in the genocide, but he died before his trial could take place.

Through the 1950s, the work of the church in Rwanda was under the direct jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. In 1961 he led in the formation of the Church of the Province of Uganda, Rwanda, and Burundi. The first bishop for Rwanda was appointed in 1965. In 1980, the Province of Uganda was set apart as an independent jurisdiction, and the new Church of the Province of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire constructed. This province was divided into three new provinces in 1992, and the present Province of the Episcopal Church in Rwanda emerged.

The Church of Rwanda is headed by its archbishop. That post, then held by Most Reverend Augustin Nshamihogo, was vacated in 1994, and remained vacant until 2000, when a new archbishop, the Most Reverend Emmanuel Mbona-Kolini (b. 1945), was selected to assume the post. Archbishop Kolini has become one of the more controversial bishops in the Anglican Communion for his effort to establish the Anglican Mission in America, a missionary diocese that aimed at competing for the allegiance of American Anglicans with the Episcopal Church. In 2000, he joined his fellow Rwandan, Bishop John Rucyahana, in consecrating two American Episcopalian priests as bishops who were to lead the Anglican Mission. He subsequently supported the movement of the mission into the new Anglican Church of North America.

In 2005, the Church in Rwanda reported 1 million members in its nine dioceses. It is a member of the worldwide Anglican Communion and since 1961 the World Council of Churches. Since 1994, the church has reoriented its program to deal with the trauma of 1994 and the poverty into which the country has been plunged. The church lost many clergy during the period of genocide and currently continues the effort to recruit and train replacements. It supports eight primary schools, Stanley Smith College, and United Theological College of Butare.

Province of the Episcopal Church in Rwanda
PB 2487
Kigali
Rwanda

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church of North America; Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; World Council of Churches.

References

- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- Hassett, Miranda K. Anglican Communion in Crisis: How Episcopal Dissidents and Their African Allies Are Reshaping Anglicanism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- Norman, Edward. Anglican Difficulties: A New Syllabus of Errors. New York: Morehouse Publishing, 2004.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

■ Puerto Rico

The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is located in the Caribbean Sea, east of the Dominican Republic and west of the Virgin Islands. Geographically, Puerto Rico is an archipelago that includes the main island of Puerto Rico and a number of smaller islands and keys, the largest of which are Vieques, Culebra, and Mona. Puerto Rico has a land area of 3,425 square miles and 1,900 square miles is marine area. It has a population of 3,994,259 (July 2007 estimate), mostly of European and African heritage. The main island of Borinquen is about 100 miles long by 35 miles wide.

San Juan is the capital and most populous municipality in Puerto Rico. The population of the San Juan Metropolitan Statistical Area (SJMSA) is about 2 million inhabitants. Today about half the country's population lives and works in the SJMSA.

According to the U.S. Census of 2000, 84 percent of Puerto Ricans described themselves as "White"; 10.9 percent as "Black or African American"; 8.3 percent as "some other race," 0.7 percent as "American Indian," and 0.5 percent as "Asian" (the total is more than 100 percent because individuals may have reported more than one race). Other ethnographical studies have found that 74 percent of the population is a mixture (mestizo) of white, black, and Amerindian (Taíno), and only 10 percent is white and about 16 percent is black.

Cathedral of San Juan Bautista, a Roman Catholic cathedral in San Juan, Puerto Rico. (Jose Oquendo)

The official languages are Spanish and English, with Spanish being primary. English is taught as a second language in public and private elementary and high schools, and in the universities.

Emigration has been a major part of Puerto Rico's recent history. Starting soon after World War II, a combination of poverty, inexpensive airfare, and hope for better economic conditions caused waves of Puerto Ricans to move to the continental United States. In 2003, the U.S. Census Bureau estimated that more people of Puerto Rican birth or ancestry lived in the United States than in Puerto Rico.

In addition, Puerto Rico has become the permanent home of more than 100,000 legal residents who immigrated from Spain and Latin America, mainly from Cuba (20,000 in 2000), the Dominican Republic, Colombia, Venezuela, and Argentina. An influx of Chinese immigrants began to arrive in Puerto Rico after the Chinese Exclusion Act was repealed in 1943, and in the 1960s when hundreds of Chinese fled Cuba after Fidel Castro came to power. However, in 2000, there were only 45,684 non-Hispanic residents in Puerto Rico, of which only 1,873 were Chinese and 4,789 were Asian Indian.

No information is currently available about religious affiliation in Puerto Rico based on recent census data or public opinion polls. However, the World Christian Encyclopedia (Barrett 2001) estimated that Roman Catholics represented 75 percent of the total population, Protestants and Independents 19.5 percent, Marginal Christians 2.5 percent, other religions 1.4 percent, and non-religious 1.6 percent in 2000.

In 1980, World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean (Holland 1981) estimated that 90 percent of the total population was Catholic, 8 percent Protestant, and 2 percent other/none. However, it was reported that 15 percent of those who lived in San Juan claimed to be Protestant, which indicates a higher percentage of Protestants in cities than in other areas of the country.

When Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) arrived in Puerto Rico on his second voyage to the Americas on November 19, 1493, the island was inhabited by a group of Arawak Indians, known as Taínos. They called the island Borikén or, in Spanish, Borinquen. Columbus named the island San Juan Bautista in honor of Saint John the Baptist. Later, the island took the name of Porto Rico (Spanish: Rich Port), while the capital was named San Juan. In 1508, Spanish conquistador Juan Ponce de León (1460–1521) became the island's first governor. Various forts and walls, such as La Fortaleza (the oldest executive mansion in continuous use in the Americas), El Castillo San Felipe del Morro and El Castillo de San Cristóbal, were built to protect the port of San Juan from European enemies.

The Taíno tribe was largely killed off by the combination of disease, violent warfare, and a high incidence of suicide caused by harsh conditions imposed by the Spanish colonial system. After the decline of the Amerindian population in the early 16th century, African slaves were brought to Puerto Rico to work on sugarcane plantations, which became the island's main industry. The number of slaves in Puerto Rico rose from 1,500 in 1530 to 15,000 by 1555. The vast majority of the slaves imported by the Spanish were Yorubas and Igbos from Nigeria. The slaves were stamped with a hot iron on the forehead, a branding that meant that they were brought to the country legally and prevented their kidnapping. During the 19th century, slave revolts attempted unsuccessfully to overthrow Spanish rule.

The French, Dutch, and English made several attempts to capture Puerto Rico but failed to achieve long-term occupancy. During the late 17th and early 18th centuries, Spain's colonial emphasis was on the more prosperous mainland territories, which left Puerto Rico impoverished of settlers. The island became primarily a garrison for Spanish ships on their way to or from richer Spanish colonies. In 1570, there were an estimated 1,000 whites and 10,300 black slaves and Amerindians. A Spanish edict of 1664 offered freedom and land to African people from non-Spanish colonies, such as Jamaica and St. Dominique (Haiti), who immigrated to Puerto Rico and provided a population base to support the Puerto Rican garrison and its forts. The freemen who settled the western and southern parts of the island soon adopted the language and customs of the Spaniards. However, in 1673, the estimated total population of Puerto Rico was only 820 whites, 667 black slaves, and 304 free nonwhites (included Amerindians).

During the 1800s, thousands of immigrants arrived from Spain (mainly from Catalonia, Asturias, Galicia, the Balearic Islands, Andalusia, and the Canary Islands), along with numerous Spanish loyalists from Spain's former colonies in South America. In addition, hundreds arrived from Corsica, France, and Portugal, along with settlers from Ireland, Scotland, Germany, Italy, and others who were granted land by Spain during the Real Cédula de Gracias de 1815 (Royal Decree of Graces of 1815), which allowed European Catholics to settle in Puerto Rico with a certain amount of free land. This mass immigration during the 19th century helped the population grow from 155,000 in 1800 to almost a million at the close of the century. The census of 1858 reported that the population included 300,430 identified as whites; 341,015 as free colored; and 41,736 as black slaves. Slavery was finally abolished in Puerto Rico on March 22, 1873.

French immigration to Puerto Rico came about as a result of the economic and political situations that occurred in various places, such as Louisiana (United States), Saint-Domingue (Haiti), and parts of Europe. Also, in 1815, the Spanish Crown decided that one of the ways to end the pro-independence movement in Puerto Rico was to allow Europeans of non-Hispanic origin who swore loyalty to the Spanish Crown to settle on the island. The decree encouraged slave labor to revive agriculture and attract new settlers. Therefore, the Royal Decree of Graces of 1815 was printed in three languages: Spanish, English, and French. The French who immigrated to Puerto Rico intermarried with the locals and settled in various places on the island. They were instrumental in the development of Puerto Rico's tobacco, cotton, and sugar industries and distinguished themselves as business people, politicians, and writers.

Contemporary Puerto Ricans date their independence from Spain to the unsuccessful revolt of 1868 led by Ramón Emeterio Betances (1827–1893), who proclaimed the island's independence prior to his defeat by Spanish military forces. The institution of slavery was finally abolished in 1873. Cuba and Puerto Rico were Spain's last colonies in the Americas in 1898 when, as a result of the defeat of Spanish forces by the U.S. military in the Spanish-American War, control of Puerto Rico passed to the U.S. government that year. English was imposed as the official language, and in 1917 Puerto Ricans became U.S. citizens but with limited control over local government. The governor and other key officials were not elected but appointed by the U.S. president, and the governor could veto any legislation.

After World War II, local rule was turned over to the island's residents. The new government, elected in 1948, moved to transform Puerto Rico into a commonwealth. The U.S. government retained power in foreign relations, defense, and some financial affairs; Puerto Ricans retained their U.S. citizenship. An ongoing debate over the island's status has been held in Puerto Rico, with some favoring statehood and others desiring full independence, but the commonwealth status continued to be supported by the majority of the population.

Today, Puerto Rico has a republican form of government, subject to U.S. jurisdiction and sovereignty. Its current powers are all delegated by the U.S. Congress and lack full protection under the U.S. Constitution. Puerto Rico's head of state is the president of the United States of America.

Luis Guillermo Fortuño-Burset (b. 1960) is the ninth and current governor of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Fortuño is also the president of the pro-statehood New Progressive Party of Puerto Rico (NPP) and a member of the U.S. Republican Party. Fortuño holds the distinction of being the first Republican to be elected governor of Puerto Rico since 1969, and only the second Republican governor since 1949. He began his term in office on January 2, 2009.

The Roman Catholic Church Historically, the Roman Catholic Church has been the dominant religion in Puerto Rico. The first ecclesiastical province was established in 1511 by Pope Julius II (r. 1503–1513) with three dioceses: two in Hispaniola (Santo Domingo and Concepción de la Vega); the third was in the island of San Juan (modern Puerto Rico). The new dioceses were made suffragans of the Province of Seville, Spain.

Father Alonso Manso (1460–1539), canon of the cathedral of Salamanca, was transferred to the newly erected See of San Juan, of which he took possession two years later. When he arrived in 1513, the island had only 2 European settlements, which were inhabited by approximately 200 Spaniards and about 500 native "Christians." According to a letter that this prelate addressed later to the Spanish monarch, he was the first bishop to reach the New World.

Bishop Manso became the first inquisitor general of the Indies, appointed in 1519 by Cardinal Adrian de Utrecht, who later became Pope Adrian VI (r. 1522–1523). The vice provincial of the Dominicans, Pedro de Cordoba, resided in Santo Domingo until the establishment in 1522 of the Convent of St. Thomas Aquinas, the first religious community in Puerto Rico.

The first Catholic church (building) was erected in 1511 at Caparra and dedicated to Saint John the Baptist. The edifice was a temporary structure, which fell into ruin after the capital was transferred to another location. In 1512 another structure was erected for the inhabitants on the southern coast at a point known as San German, some distance from the actual site of the town of that name. For many years the Diocese of Porto Rico had only these two centers of worship, with little increase in population.

The location of the actual cathedral of San Juan marks the site of the first church erected in 1520 or 1521 by Bishop Manso. This wooden structure was replaced by Bishop Bastidas, who began the work in 1543, and in the year following informed the king that the building was still unfinished for lack of funds; the same was true in 1549. Successive structures were destroyed by hurricanes, earthquakes, and foreign invaders, and were replaced by others.

The present cathedral, which is comparatively modern in its principal part, dates back to the early part of the 18th century. The rear portion, however, reveals a distinct style of architecture from a much more remote period. On August 12, 1908, the remains of Don Juan Ponce de Leon were solemnly conveyed from the Church of San José to the cathedral, where a suitable monument now marks the resting place of this “intrepid soldier and Christian cavalier.”

Iberian popular Catholicism was brought to Puerto Rico by the first Spanish settlers and inhabitants of the Island of Borinquen. Everyday life was governed by the church’s liturgical calendar and was organized in cycles or periods, namely, Advent, Nativity, Epiphany, Lent, and Easter.

When Africans were forcibly transported to the New World as slaves, they brought with them their ancient religious beliefs and practices. The Catholic Church, which had as its mission the evangelization and Christianization of indigenous communities since the beginning of Spanish colonialism, also proceeded to force African slaves to convert immediately to Christianity.

The effort of converting black slaves to Christianity commenced at the moment they came ashore on Borinquen. As soon as church authorities learned about the arrival of a slave ship, priests were assigned to visit the ship and screen the passengers to determine their religious traditions. Immediately after coming ashore, priests began teaching the Catechism to the newly arrived African slaves, educating them in the foundations of Catholic doctrine, which is the first step toward receiving the sacrament of baptism.

However, many black slaves resisted conversion to Roman Catholicism and devised diverse ways of hiding their allegiance to their traditional belief systems. Some of the African slaves brought to the New World had embraced Islam in their countries of origin, but most of them conserved elements of their ancient animistic beliefs and practices. Moreover, the language barrier hindered communication between Catholic evangelists and their potential converts.

Consequently, the black slaves had no choice but to go along with the outward expressions of the Catholic faith while secretly observing their African traditions. The rosaries were sung as promises to the saints or as pledges of gratefulness for the soul of the sick or the dead in the family, and this practice was used to conceal the chanting of prayers and promises to their ancient gods and goddesses when sung in their ancestral languages.

Although Catholicism grew in Puerto Rico, its leadership was all but wiped out late in the 17th century by a smallpox epidemic; only four priests survived and they were given little additional assistance during the early part of the next century. The Catholic Church was greatly strengthened in the early 19th century, when additional priests came to Puerto Rico from other regions in Latin America where wars of independence had put their lives in danger. Their loyalty to Spain did not go unnoticed when the various slave revolts began to occur.

In 1833, Bishop Pedro Gutierrez de Cos (1750–1833) died, leaving the diocese vacant until the nomination in 1846 of Bishop Francisco de La Puente (1779–1854). During this interval the Catholic Church was subjected to violent measures on the part of the governors of the island, who confiscated a great deal of the church’s property and disbanded the only two communities of religious men, the Dominicans and Franciscans, appropriating to the state their convents and other properties.

During the Spanish domination of the island the Catholic Church was under royal patronage and the civil and religious authorities were intimately associated. On the assumption by the U.S. of control over Puerto Rico in 1898, full justice and every consideration was granted by the new government, which even went to the extent of paying $300,000 for the church property previously confiscated by Spain.

PUERTO RICO

Under the U.S. occupation, the Catholic Church struggled to retain its traditional role and self-image as a Latin American institution while trying to remain relevant in the new U.S.-oriented world. The Catholic Church of Puerto Rico entered the 20th century without a single bishop, but new dioceses were created in 1924, 1960, and 1964. San Juan was elevated to archiepiscopal status in 1960.

In 1903, the Diocese of Porto Rico was severed from the province of Santiago de Cuba, and administered directly by the Holy See. All municipalities in Puerto Rico had at least one Catholic church (building), most of which are located at the town center or main plaza.

In 1910, the Diocese of Porto Rico was comprised of 78 parishes, which were mainly served by members of the religious bodies: the Lazarists, Augustinians, and Capuchins from Spain; the Dominicans from Holland; and the Redemptorists from Baltimore, Maryland. About 300 women belonging to the different religious communities were chiefly at work in the schools and hospitals. The Carmelites, Sisters of Charity, Religious of the Sacred Heart, and Servants of Mary were established in Spanish colonial times. Since the U.S. occupation, additional religious communities have arrived: the Mission Helpers of the Sacred Heart; the Sisters of Saint Francis from Buffalo, New York; and the Sisters of Saint Dominic from Brooklyn, New York.

Diverse tensions arose within the Puerto Rican Catholic Church during the 1960s and following years, which resulted from challenges posed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), the Conference of Latin American Bishops held in Medellín (Colombia) in 1968, Latin American Liberation Theology, and the Catholic Charismatic Renewal movement. These powerful new currents polarized Catholic bishops, priests (diocesan and religious), lay brothers and sisters (members of religious orders), and the laity in general into various factions. Traditionalists wanted the church to remain as it was prior to the reforms approved by the Second Vatican Council (mid-1960s), with an emphasis on apostolic authority, orthodox theology, the sacraments, and personal piety. Reformers generally supported the church's post-Second Vatican Council stance of modernization and toleration of diversity based on its official social doctrine. Progressives, inspired by reforms approved at the Second Vatican and Medellín conferences, sought to implement the new vision for “a preferential option for the poor” through social and political action aimed at transforming Puerto Rican society and establishing greater social justice through peaceful democratic means. Radicals adopted the Marxist-inspired Liberation Theology and advocated violent revolution by the people as a means of overthrowing the right-wing military dictatorships in Latin America and creating a socialist state that would serve the poor marginalized masses. Charismatic agents sought to transform the spiritual and communal life of Catholics by means of the power and gifts of the Holy Spirit (including the “baptism of the Holy Spirit and speaking in tongues”), rather than by political and social activism.

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal found strong support in Puerto Rico in the 1970s and has continued to attract a large number of participants. The majority of Puerto Ricans are still Roman Catholics despite the growth and development of the Protestant movement after 1898, and especially since the 1960s.

In 2002, the Puerto Rican Catholic Church consisted of one archdiocese, the Metropolitan See of San Juan de Puerto Rico, 5 dioceses (Ponce, Arecibo, Mayagüez, Caguas, and Fajardo-Humacao) and 354 parishes that were served by 365 diocesan priests and 367 religious priests (total of 752); 418 permanent deacons; 498 male religious and 1,152 female religious. The current archbishop of San Juan is Roberto Octavio González Nieves, who was appointed and installed in 1999. The previous archbishop, Cardinal Luis Aponte Martínez (b. 1922), served from 1964 until his retirement in 1999. He had the honor of being the first Puerto Rican to be appointed bishop in 157 years.

The patron saints of Puerto Rico are Saint John the Baptist (feast day celebrated on June 24) and Our Lady of Divine Providence (feast day celebrated on Saturday before the third Sunday of November). Our Lady of Guadalupe is the patron saint of the Diocese of Ponce, which holds a special celebration on December 12.

The Protestant Movement Protestantism was suppressed under the Spanish regime but was encouraged under U.S. occupancy and governance, making modern Puerto Rico interconfessional. The establishment of the Episcopal Church in Puerto Rico in 1872 heralded the arrival of missionaries from a number of other U.S. denominations between 1898 and 1900, beginning with the Northern Baptists, the Congregational Christian Church, the Christian Church–Disciples of Christ, the Evangelical United Brethren, the Evangelical Lutherans, the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Christian and Missionary Alliance, followed by the Seventh-day Adventist Church in 1901.

William Sloan, a minister in the Northern Baptist Convention (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.), made an initial tour of the island and made recommendations that led to the founding of Baptist work there. Following an agreement among the several denominations, the Northern Baptists focused their work in the north, between Ponce and San Juan. The first congregation was opened in Rio Piedras, a suburb of San Juan. The Convention of Baptist Churches of Puerto Rico was formed in 1902.

Lutheran work was initiated in 1898 by the Augustana Synod (now a constituent part of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) in San Juan. Five churches were founded during the first decade, and eventually responsibility for the work passed to the United Lutheran Church in America.

The first Presbyterian missionaries arrived (J. M. Greene and Milton E. Cadwell) in 1899 and concentrated their work in the area of Aguadilla and Mayagüez. The first church was organized in 1900 and a presbytery was established in 1902. In January 1973, the Boriquén Synod of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. was officially founded, which reported 71 congregations and 8,385 members in 1998.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) responded to the new situation in Puerto Rico by sending Charles W. Drees (1851–1926) to the island in 1900. Drees, who had previously been working in Uruguay, initiated both Spanish and English services in San Juan. The work remained attached to the United Methodist Church until 1992, when it was set apart as the semi-autonomous Methodist Church of Puerto Rico. It became fully autonomous in 2000.

Adventist work began in 1901 with the arrival of missionary A. M. Fischer in Mayagüez. The work was organized in 1909 into the East Puerto Rico Conference and the West Puerto Rico Conference, both of which are part of the Antillian Union Conference, which also includes work in the Dominican Republic. The Puerto Rican Union Conference reported 290 churches in 2007 with 36,442 members; in 1997, there were 256 churches with 30,087 members.

In 1931, the United Evangelical Church (UEC) was formed in Fajardo, Puerto Rico, by a merger of the United Brethren in Christ, the Christian Church–Disciples of Christ, and the Congregational Christian Church. In 1990, this denomination officially became part of the United Church of Christ in the U.S.A. In 1995, the UEC reported 61 churches, 42 preaching points, and 4,591 members.

The Evangelical Congregational Church of Puerto Rico (Iglesia Evangélica Congregacional de Puerto Rico) was founded in 1948 in Humacao, Puerto Rico. The original name of this denomination in Puerto Rico was the United Brethren in Christ (Los Hermanos Unidos en Cristo).

Throughout the 20th century, a variety of traditional Protestant and Free churches and service agencies initiated work in Puerto Rico: the Church of the Nazarene (1944), the Mennonite Board of Missions (1945), Child Evangelism Fellowship (1946), International Gospel League (1949), Wesleyan World Missions (1952), Baptist Bible Fellowship International (1955), Home Mission Society of the Southern Baptist Convention (1956), Baptist Mid-Missions (1959), Grace Ministries International (1963), Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Church (1963), Baptist International Missions (1965), Biblical Ministries Worldwide (1968), independent Christian Churches and Churches of Christ (1976), Macedonian World Baptist Missions (1981), Maranatha Baptist Mission (1983), UFM International (1986, formerly known as Unevangelized Fields Mission), Apostolic Christian Church (1989), InterVarsity Mission (1992), Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (1993), Open Door Baptist Missions (1995), and World Indigenous Missions (1996).

Pentecostalism, especially, had a significant role in the development of a variety of new Puerto Rican– initiated churches, many of which have spread throughout the Spanish-speaking world, including Hispanic communities in the United States.

The Pentecostal Church of God, International Mission (Iglesia de Dios Pentecostal, Misión Internacional [IDPMI]), was founded in 1916 by Juan L. Lugo and other Puerto Rican leaders in Arecibo, Puerto Rico. It was affiliated with the Assemblies of God in the United States from 1918 until 1956, when the two church bodies went their separate ways. In 1999, this denomination reported 2,123 congregations in 32 countries, with approximately 221,000 members. The current PCOG president is the Reverend William Hernández Ortiz, with offices in San Juan. Missionary work is conducted in many Latin American countries.

The Defenders of the Faith (Defensores de la Fe) was founded in 1925 in Kansas City, Missouri, by the Reverend Gerald B. Winrod. It began as a Fundamentalist denomination and became part of the Pentecostal movement in Puerto Rico through the ministry of Juan Francisco Rodríguez Rivera in 1934, with headquarters in Bayamón. This denomination has affiliated churches in Latin America and the Caribbean.

The Soldiers of the Cross of Christ International Evangelical Church (Iglesia Evangélica Internacional Soldados de la Cruz de Cristo) is a sabbatical Pentecostal denomination, founded between 1922 and 1925 in Havana, Cuba, by Ernest William Sellers (1869–1953), a Methodist layman and businessman from Wisconsin, who was known by his followers as “Apostle Daddy John.” Since the 1960s, missionary work has been conducted in many Latin American countries and Hispanic communities in the United States, from its international headquarters in Miami, Florida.

The Church of Christ in the Antilles (Iglesia de Cristo en Las Antillas) was founded in 1935 in Los Dolores del Río Grande, Puerto Rico, by Reverend Pablo Rodríguez García in 1934–1935 following evangelistic campaigns conducted by the Reverend Francisco Olazábal in the Caribbean. In 1938, when the name of the denomination was changed to Council of Missionary Churches of Christ (Concilio de Iglesias de Cristo Misionera), a small group of pastors retained the original name but later changed it to the Universal Church of Christ (Iglesia de Cristo Universal). The churches affiliated with this denomination are mainly located in Puerto Rico and the eastern United States.

The Council of Missionary Churches of Christ (Concilio de Iglesias de Cristo Misionera) was founded in 1938 in Los Dolores del Río Grande, Puerto Rico by Florentino Figueroa Rosa. This denomination resulted from a reorganization of the Church of Christ in the Antilles (Iglesia de Cristo en Las Antillas). The current name was adopted in 1987. Today there are affiliated churches in the United States, Canada, Mexico, the Caribbean (Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic, and Cuba), all of the Central American countries, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, and Paraguay. In December 2007, this denomination reported 771 organized churches and 274 missions, with an estimated total membership of 45,400. Whereas this denomination reported 96 organized churches in Puerto Rico, there were 309 affiliated churches in Honduras, 101 in the United States, 38 in the Dominican Republic, and 35 in Venezuela.

The International Council of Pentecostal Churches of Jesus Christ (Concilio Internacional de Iglesias Pentecostales de Jesucristo) was founded in Puerto Rico in 1938 by the Reverend Félix Rivera Cardona, who previously was a pastor with the Pentecostal Church of God in Mayagüez. In 1947, missionary work was begun in New York City by Juana Rivera, Félix’s sister. The international headquarters are located in Ponce, Puerto Rico. There are 110 churches in Puerto Rico and 10 in New York City, and missionary work is conducted in about 10 other Latin American countries.

The Church of God, Inc. (La Iglesia de Dios, Inc.) was founded in 1938 in Fajardo and Las Piedras, Puerto Rico, by Aurelio Tiburcio and Benito Cintrón, among others, in response to “a great Pentecostal revival within the traditional churches, especially among sugar plantation workers.” The central offices are now located in Caguas. As a result of emigration, affiliated churches were established in the United States (mainly in Chicago, Illinois, and East Chicago, Indiana), the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Honduras, El Salvador, and Panama.

The Assembly of Christian Churches (Asamblea de Iglesias Cristianas) was founded in 1939 in New York City by a group of Puerto Rican pastors—Carlos Sepúlveda, Felipe G. Sabater, Pedro Serrano, and Frank Hernández—who were marginalized by the Mexican-American leadership of CLADIC (Concilio Latino Americano de Iglesias Cristianas) in 1938, after the death of the famous Mexican Pentecostal evangelist Francisco Olazábal in Texas. Sepúlveda and his associates wanted to continue the legacy of Olazábal among Puerto Ricans. Today there are affiliated churches in the Caribbean and Latin America, principally in Puerto Rico.

The Samaria Evangelical Church (Iglesia Evangélica Samaria) was founded in 1941 in Puerto Rico by Pentecostal pastor Julio Guzmán Silva. It has affiliated churches in many Latin American countries.

The Worldwide Missionary Movement, Inc. (Movimiento Misionero Mundial, Inc. [MMM]), was founded in 1963 in Puerto Rico by the Reverend Luis M. Ortiz Marrero and his wife, Rebecca de Ortiz, who had served in the Dominican Republic and Cuba as missionaries with the Assemblies of God from 1944 to 1960. They returned to Puerto Rico in 1959 and organized the Worldwide Missionary Movement with headquarters in Trujillo Alto in 1963. After Ortiz's death in 1996, the Reverend Rubén Rosas Salcedo was named president of the association. In January 2003, this denomination reported 4,980 churches, 4,400 preaching points, and 3,949 pastors in 52 countries. Missionary work is conducted in most Latin American countries, in the United States and Canada, in Europe (England, Germany, Holland, Italy, and Spain), Africa, Australia, and Asia.

The famous Puerto Rican Pentecostal evangelist José Joaquín (Yiye) Avila founded the “Christ Is Coming Ministry” in 1967 in Camuy, Puerto Rico. Avila has celebrated divine healing and liberation campaigns throughout the Americas and in Spain. In 1988, he founded a television network called The Miracle Network (“La Cadena del Milagro”), which includes five channels that cover all of Puerto Rico and the Caribbean.

The International Council of Churches Freed by Jesus Christ, Inc. (Concilio Internacional de Iglesias Libres por Jesucristo, Inc.) was founded in 1974 in the Bronx, New York, by the Reverend Valentín Cruz Canales, who was born in Santurce, Puerto Rico. He also founded the Instituto Evangélico Elim in 1974 with extension programs in Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic. This Pentecostal denominational has affiliated churches in the United States, Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, and Colombia.

The Missionary Association of Pentecostal Churches, Inc. (Asociación Misionera de Iglesias Pentecostales, Inc. [AMIP]) was founded in 2003 by the Reverend José D. Muñoz in San Juan. The AMIP operates the Berea Bible Institute in San Juan and has extension programs in other countries via the Internet. There are affiliated churches in Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Panama, Colombia, Ecuador, Chile, and the United States.

In addition, Pentecostal denominations from the United States began work in Puerto Rico: the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (1930), the Church of God of Prophecy (1938), the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) (1944, known as the Church of God Mission Board [Iglesia de Dios Mission Board], with headquarters in Saint Just), the Assemblies of God (1957), Open Bible Standard Churches (1958), the United Pentecostal Church International (1962), and the Pentecostal Free Will Baptist Church (founding date unknown).

Other Protestant denominations include the Sociedad Misionera Internacional of the Seventh-day Adventist Church Reform Movement, General Conference, which has its Puerto Rican headquarters in San Juan; the Brethren Assemblies (Christian Brethren); the Church of the Brethren; the Christian Reformed Church; Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches; Free Methodist Church; National Association of Free Will Baptists; Southwide Baptist Fellowship; the Quakers; and The Salvation Army. Also, the Berachah Church (an independent fundamentalist church founded in 1935 in Houston, Texas, by C. W. Colgan and Robert B. Thieme, Jr.) claims to have mission work in Puerto Rico. The Maranatha World Revival Church (Iglesia de Avivamiento Mundial Maranatha) was founded in 1974 in Chicago, Illinois, by Nahum y Minerva Rosario. It now has more than 300 affiliated churches in the United States, Mexico, Costa Rica, Panama, Puerto Rico, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Argentina, Chile, Venezuela, Europe, and Africa.

In 1908, the Federation of Evangelical Churches of Puerto Rico was established, which was later known

Puerto Rico

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,673,000	3,918,000	96.6	0.56	4,139,000	4,182,000
Roman Catholics	2,586,000	2,865,000	70.6	0.63	2,888,000	2,800,000
Protestants	228,000	620,000	15.3	1.73	700,000	750,000
Independents	80,000	377,000	9.3	2.30	450,000	500,000
Agnostics	29,000	79,500	2.0	1.75	120,000	160,000
Spiritists	4,000	28,800	0.7	0.58	31,000	32,000
Atheists	5,000	15,800	0.4	0.58	18,000	20,000
Hindus	1,000	3,600	0.1	0.58	6,000	8,000
Baha'is	1,200	3,000	0.1	0.58	6,000	10,000
Jews	2,000	2,800	0.1	0.58	2,800	3,000
New religionists	1,000	1,500	0.0	0.57	1,800	1,800
Muslims	0	1,200	0.0	0.59	2,000	3,000
Chinese folk	0	730	0.0	0.57	800	1,000
Buddhists	0	600	0.0	0.60	1,000	1,500
Total population	2,716,000	4,056,000	100.0	0.58	4,328,000	4,422,000

as The Evangelical Union of Puerto Rico in 1916, the Association of Evangelical Churches of Puerto Rico in 1934, and the Evangelical Council of Puerto Rico (ECPR) in 1954. Current members of the ECPR are the Presbyterian Synod of Borinquen, the Christian Church–Disciples of Christ, the American Baptist Association, the Methodist Church, the Church of the Brethren, the United Evangelical Church, the First Union Church, and the Second Union Church.

Member organizations of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC), in Puerto Rico include the entire ECPR membership. Additional associate members include: Caribbean Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church and the Episcopal Church Diocese of Puerto Rico.

The Latin American Confraternity of Evangelicals (CONELA) is not associated with an interdenominational evangelical fellowship organization in Puerto Rico, but the CONELA representative was listed as David Casillas.

Other Religions The Puerto Rican National Catholic Church (independent of the Vatican) was founded in Puerto Rico in 1926 by Monsignor Héctor Gonzáles, loosely affiliated with the Polish National Catholic Church in the United States. In 1961, the former changed its name to the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Church of Puerto Rico and became affiliated with the Russian Orthodox Church in the Americas. In 1968 González withdrew from the latter and formed the Western Rite Vicariate with parishes in Puerto Rico, the Dominican Republic, Brazil, and the United States. The name was later changed to the United Hispanic Old Catholic Episcopate, but after several years of controversy the official name was changed again to that used today: Hispanic-Brazilian Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, Saint Pius X (headquarters in Brooklyn, New York).

Non-Protestant marginal Christian groups in Puerto Rico are: the Church of Christ, Scientist (Mary Baker Eddy, 1892; Boston, Massachusetts), Christadelphian Bible Mission, Growing in Grace International Ministries, Jehovah’s Witnesses, Light of the World Church (Mexico), Mormons, Mita Congregation, People of Amos Church, Philadelphia Church of God, Unity Church, Voice of the Cornerstone, and Universal Church of the Kingdom of God (also known as Oración Fuerte al Espíritu Santo, founded in Brazil in 1977 by Bishop Edir Macedo and arriving in Puerto Rico in 1993).

Gardner H. Russell began meetings affiliated with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS) in 1947 among U.S. military personnel stationed at Guajataca. He later opened a mission in San Juan. By 1987, membership had increased to 12,000. Despite the move of several military church members from Puerto Rico in 1993, membership had reached 19,700 throughout the island. In 1996, the number of LDS congregations had grown to the point that the San Juan Mission was formally recognized, with headquarters in Rio Piedras. In 2005, the LDS reported 43 congregations and 29,064 members. The Jehovah's Witnesses entered the country in the early 1930s. By 2005, there were 323 Witness congregations in Puerto Rico with 24,601 adherents.

Mita Congregation (Congregación Mita), established in 1940 in San Juan, was founded by Juanita García Peraza, who is known as "Mita" ("Spirit of Life"); her followers are called "los Mitas." She is believed by her followers to be the embodiment of the Holy Spirit and the "voice of God on Earth." After Juanita's death in 1970 at age 72, the new head of this movement became Teófilo Vargas Seín, who is called Aarón by his followers. There are affiliated churches in many countries of the Caribbean Basin, including the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, and Colombia. The original San Juan community serves as a developmental model for the newer congregations abroad which, in turn, communicate with the center through all modern media. Active members have swollen to more than 30,000 worldwide. The new San Juan temple alone seats 6,000, but actually the largest following is in Colombia, which has now surpassed Puerto Rico as a whole; the Dominican Republic ranks third, with 65 congregations.

After the death of Mita Congregation founder Juanita García Peraza in 1970, there was a power struggle between Teófilo Vargas and Nicolás Tosado Aviles (1919–2007) over who would be the leader of Mita Congregation, which resulted in Vargas winning that leadership position and Tosado being expelled from the movement. In 1972, Tosado left with a small group of followers and formed the People of Amos Church (Iglesia Pueblo de Amós), with "Amos" being Tosado's new spiritual name. Since 1991 its headquarters have been in Barrio Guzmán Abajo de Río Grande, Puerto Rico. From Puerto Rico this new movement spread to the United States (mainly in Texas, Georgia, and California), El Salvador (now with more than 20 congregations), Spain, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Mexico. Tosado, who was considered by his followers to be "a Prophet and Intercessor between God and men" and in whose body dwelt "The Divine Trinity," died at age 88 in December 2007 in Puerto Rico.

The Voice of the Cornerstone (Voz de la Piedra Angular) was founded in 1974 in Cayey, Puerto Rico, by William Soto Santiago, a disciple of the Pentecostal evangelist and faith-healer William Branham who founded a similar movement in Jeffersonville, Indiana, in 1955. Although there is no evidence that the two ever met, Soto borrowed much of the teachings of Branham and launched his own movement, calling himself the "Voice of the Chief Cornerstone" and the "Angel who opens the Seventh Seal" in the book of Revelation. There are affiliated groups in many countries of Latin America.

Non-Christian religions in Puerto Rico include Baha'i Faith, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, Ancient Wisdom, and Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age traditions.

Today, Puerto Rico is home to the largest and wealthiest Jewish community in the Caribbean, with more than 3,000 Jewish inhabitants, and is also the only Caribbean island in which all three major Jewish denominations are represented. Most of the Jewish community lives in San Juan, but there are also Jewish families in Ponce and Mayagüez. San Juan has three synagogues: Reform Congregation Temple Beth Shalom, established in 1967; Conservative Congregation Shaare Zedeck, established in 1953; and Chabad Lubavitch of Puerto Rico, established in 1997. In addition, there are a Satmar Community in the western part of the island in Mayagüez, known as Toiras Jesed; and a Reform synagogue and a Conservative synagogue in the city of Santruce.

In 2007, there were 5,119 Muslims in Puerto Rico, with 8 mosques spread throughout the island, with most Muslims living in the San Juan suburb of Rio Piedras.

Buddhism is represented in Puerto Rico by Mahikari de America, Centro Soto Zen de Puerto Rico, Rinzai-Ji, Centro de Meditación y Estudios Budistas del Caribe (Theravada and Mahayana traditions), and the Padmasambhava Buddhist Center (Tibetan Buddhism).

Hinduism is represented by the Krishnamurti Foundation (Hato Rey), International Society of Divine Love, International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), Sri Sathya Sai Baba International Organization, Sri Chinmoy centers, and the Transcendental Meditation (TM) movement (now known as the Global Country of World Peace).

Traditional Chinese religions include Daoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism; the only Japanese-origin religions are Mahikari (“Divine True Light”) and Sekai Mahikari Bunmei Kyodan.

The Western Esoteric tradition is represented by the Ancient Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC), which has lodges in Mayagüez (Font de la Jara Chapter), Ponce (Ponce Lodge) and San Juan (Luz de AMORC Lodge); Freemasonry; Gran Fraternidad Universal, Misión de Acuario (GFU, founded in Venezuela by Dr. Serge Raynaud de la Ferrière); and the Christian Gnostic Movement (founded by Samael Aun Weor in Mexico).

The Psychic-Spiritualist-New Age traditions include the Celicia Temple (also known as Las Profetas, founded in a slum area of Caguas, Puerto Rico, in 1953), the Spiritist Confederation of Puerto Rico (founded in 1903), the Movement for Inner Peace, the New Thought Development Foundation (founded in 1987 in San Juan), and the Church of Scientology.

Puerto Rico is one of several island nations where Afro-Caribbean religions have been very successful. Various African religious beliefs and practices have been present since the arrival of black slaves in Puerto Rico. In particular, the belief systems of Ifa from Nigeria (among the Yoruba people) and Palo Mayombe from the Congo River basin (among Bantu peoples) find adherence among those who practice some form of African traditional religion. In addition, Taíno religious beliefs and practices have been rediscovered or reinvented to a degree by a handful of advocates who practice Amerindian spirituality.

Santería, also known as Regla de Ocha, derived from Yoruban religion with an overlay of Spanish Catholicism, is very strong in Puerto Rico today. According to scholars, modern Santería was introduced into Puerto Rico by Cuban immigrants during the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. The popular Afro-Cuban-Puerto Rican religious tradition honors its deities and the dead with offerings of flowers, food dishes, the burning candles, ritual cleansing with rum, and other animistic practices. Also, Regla Arará, a variation of Haitian Vodou, is practiced in Cuba and Puerto Rico.

The belief in magic spells, male and female witches, disembodied spirits, the devil, and occult practices was neither in the past nor is today an exclusive patrimony of black Puerto Ricans. Because Santería identified Yoruban deities with Roman Catholic saints, initially as a means of retaining the African belief system while outwardly practicing Roman Catholicism, many Puerto Ricans identify with both religions.

Many Puerto Rican Catholics practice religious syncretism, which combines ancient animistic beliefs and practices of Amerindian and African-roots with a Roman Catholicism imposed on Native Americans and African slaves by civil and religious authorities during the Spanish colonial period. The result is a “popular Catholicism” that retains significant elements of African and Amerindian spirituality, which includes animistic beliefs and practices such as magic (white and black, good and evil), witchcraft (bujería), herbal healing (curanderismo) and shamanism (the shaman is an intermediary with the spirit world).

Clifton L. Holland and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Advent; American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Augustinians; Baha’i Faith; Baptist Bible Fellowship International; Capuchins; Cathedrals—Christian; Christadelphians; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Christian Brethren; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Christian Reformed Church in North America; Christmas; Church of Christ, Scientist; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church of the Brethren; Church of the Nazarene; Congregationalism; Dominicans; Easter; Eddy, Mary Baker; Epiphany; Episcopal Church; Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; Franciscans; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; Gnostic Movement; Ife; International Church of the Foursquare Gospel; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Krishnamurti Foundations; Latin American Council of Churches; Lent; Light of the World Church; Lubavitch Hasidism; Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Methodist Church of Puerto Rico; Mita Congregation; Palo Mayombe; Pentecostalism; Philadelphia Church of God; Reform Judaism; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Santería; Satmar Hasidism; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Seventh-Day Adventist Reform Movements; Southern Baptist Convention; Sri Chinmoy Centre; United Methodist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; Universal Church of the Kingdom of God; Vodou; Western Esoteric Tradition; Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod; Witchcraft; World Council of Churches.

References

- Carver, E. Earl. “Showcase for God: A Study of Evangelical Church Growth in Puerto Rico.” Unpublished master’s thesis, Fuller Theological Seminary, 1972.
- Cook, Scott. “The Prophets: A Revivalistic Folk Religious Movement in Puerto Rico.” In Peoples and Cultures of the Caribbean: An Anthropological Reader, edited by Michael M. Horowitz. Garden City, NY: The Natural History Press, 1971.
- Cruz, Samuel. Masked Africanisms: Puerto Rican Pentecostalism. Dubuque, IA: Kendall/Hunt Publishing Company, 2005.
- De La Torre, Miguel A. Santería: The Beliefs and Rituals of a Growing Religion in America. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Fernández Olmos, Margarite, and Lizabeth Paravini-Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Fundación Puerto Rico Evangélico. “100 años de protestantismo en Puerto Rico.” Presencia 1 (1998).
- Gutiérrez, Ángel L. Evangélicos en Puerto Rico en la época Española. Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Editorial Chari; Puerto Rico Evangélico, Inc.; and Seminario Evangélico de Puerto Rico.
- Holland, Clifton L., ed. World Christianity: Central America and the Caribbean. Monrovia, CA: MARC–World Vision International, 1981.
- Icken Safa, Helen. The Urban Poor of Puerto Rico: A Study in Development and Inequality. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc., 1974.
- Jones, William. “Porto Rico.” In The Catholic Encyclopedia. Vol. 12. New York: Robert Appleton Company, 1911. <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/12291b.htm>.
- Middledyk, R. A. The History of Puerto Rico: From the Spanish Discovery to the American Occupation. Charleston, SC: BiblioBazaar, 2006.
- Moore, Donald T. Puerto Rico para Cristo: A History of the Progress of the Evangelical Missions on the Island of Puerto Rico. Cuernavaca, México: Centro Intercultural de Documentación (Sondeos, Número 43), 1969.
- PROLADES. A Chronology of Protestant Beginnings in Puerto Rico, 1598–2003. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/caribe/pri/pri-rd.htm>.
- PROLADES. A Table of the Estimated Size of the Protestant Movement in Puerto Rico, 2000. <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/caribe/pri/pri-rd.htm>.
- Roman, Reinaldo L. Governing Spirits: Religion, Miracles, and Spectacles in Cuba and Puerto Rico, 1898–1956. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2007.
- Weber, Linda J., and Dotsey Welliver, eds. Mission Handbook of U.S. and Canadian Protestant Ministries Overseas, 2007–2009. Wheaton, IL: Evangelism and Missions Information Service (EMIS) and the Billy Graham Center at Wheaton College, 2007.
- Ziegler, M. O. The Origins and Growth of the Methodist Church in Puerto Rico, 1900–1970. Immaculate, PA: Immaculata College, 1988.

Pure Brightness Festival

The Pure Brightness Festival is one of the few Chinese festivals tied to the solar year rather than the lunar calendar. It is held 107 days after the Winter Solstice (and 15 days after the Spring Equinox); hence it is always April 4 or 5 on the Western or Common Era calendar. It is preceded by what is designated Cold Food Day.

As practiced, it has become another day to especially honor one's ancestors.

As the story told of Pure Brightness Day goes, a prince of the state of Jin, a power province in the feudal world of northern China's Spring and Autumn Period (722–403 BCE), neglected to reward one of the men who had stood by him in a time of exile prior to his attaining the throne. The man, Jie Zitui, had retired to live quietly on Mian Mountain. Realizing his lack of gratitude, the prince sought out his former companion, but was unable to locate him. A courtier suggested burning the mountainside to force him out, but no Jie Zitui appeared. Further searching found him, and his mother, dead beneath a willow tree. To commemorate his former companion, the prince ordered that the day would henceforth be remembered as the Hanshi Festival and ordered that no fires be kindled on that day—hence the eating of cold food. The tree under which Jie Zitui was found was named Pure Bright Willow and the day after the Hanshi Festival named the Pure Bright Day.

In China, including Taiwan, the Hanshi Festival has largely been neglected, but the Pure Bright Festival is widely celebrated and acknowledged as the first day of the year when one can leave the confinement of the house during the winter and enjoy the out-of-doors. It is also a popular time to acknowledge one's ancestors by going to their tombs, making necessary repairs, and cleaning them of any clutter or trash accumulated through the winter. Thus, Pure Brightness Day is often termed "Tomb Sweeping Day." Before leaving, people will also commonly burn what is called spirit money. Such money is printed especially for burning, hence sending into the spirit world, for the use of the spirits of the dead. It is also a day to think about willow trees. Some plant new willow trees. Others decorate them with model birds made of flour and dates, and called Zitui swallows.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancestors; Winter Solstice.

References

- Kaulbach, B., and B. Proksch. Arts and Culture in Taiwan. Taipei: Southern Materials Center, 1984.
- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.

Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Pure Land Buddhism

The Pure Land mythos, which eventually came to center upon the popular practice of invoking Buddha Amida's name with the intention of being born in his Pure Land of Bliss, the Western Paradise, was one of the most important variations of Mahayana Buddhism, and flourished in China, Korea, Japan, and Vietnam.

In the case of China, it was imported from northern India as early as the second or third century CE, as indicated by sutra translations. Subsequently, beginning at least with the monk Lu-shan Hui-yuan (344–416) its practices were adopted and spread widely in Chinese monasteries. Pure Land ideas never really formed an independent teaching lineage, however, and they instead coexisted with normal monastic lineages, especially the T'ien-t'ai founded by Chih-i (aka, Zhi Yi) (538–597). A key Chinese addition to the canon in the early period was the Kuan-ching (Visualization Sutra), which described nine detailed statuses of potential rebirth in the Pure Land realm.

Pure Land doctrine and practice have remained up to the present a standard aspect of the repertoire of Chinese Buddhism, whether in monastic practice or in monastically influenced lay practice. In the Tang period (618–907) Pure Land became subordinated to the authority claims of Chan lineages. Nevertheless, all later monastic Buddhism was normally characterized by the "dual practice" of both Chan and Pure Land, as represented by the teaching of Chu-hung (1535–1615). Indeed, up to the present, apparently more Buddhist practitioners have put their hopes in rebirth in the Western paradise than in the attainment of success in pursuing the official bodhisattva path.

Much of Pure Land tradition in China went outside official monasticism. The Kuan-ching text in particular opened the way to popularization because it appeared to promote the efficacy of religious routines as simple as the recitation of the Buddha's name, which alone might lead to the Pure Land at its lowest level. A key teacher who was regarded as having emphasized this aspect of the teaching was Shan-tao (or Shan Dao) (613–681). (His presentation of the Pure Land perspective would later influence the Japanese monk Honen [1133–1212], who altered the Japanese tradition by his unique emphasis on the vocal invocation of Amida’s name as the sole possible practice for his times.) Throughout the later Chinese imperial period (ca. 1200–1900), influential lay Pure Land movements flourished, sometimes supervised by the official monastic system and sometimes separate from it.

Temple of the Pure Land monastery in Buryatia, Russia. (Mikhail Markovskiy/Dreamstime.com)

Chinese religious traditions including Buddhism were severely damaged by 20th-century political disorder and by post–World War II Maoism. However, vigorous revival has been underway, stimulated significantly by developments in Taiwan. The revival has remanifested earlier relationships of complementarity and tension between Pure Land and Chan and between monastic and lay forms of organization. Nonetheless, the Pure Land “language” of Buddhism continues to be preferred to the Chan by more Chinese practitioners, as it was in the past.

In comparative context it is noteworthy that no version of Chinese Pure Land has ever taken root that has been philosophically rigorous but also fundamentally non-monastic in conception (as in the Japanese Jodoshinshu school). Whether monastic or lay, Chinese followers have remained oriented to an approach that strongly valorizes ritual asceticism and precept-keeping.

Galen Amstutz

See also: Honen; Jodo-shinshu; Mahayana Buddhism; Shan Dao; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zhi Yi.

References

Beginnings

Chappell, David W. “Chinese Buddhist Interpretations of the Pure Lands.” In Buddhist and Taoist

- Studies*, edited by David W. Chappell and Michael Saso, 22–53. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1977.
- Chappell, David W. “From Dispute to Dual Cultivation: Pure Land Responses to Ch’an Critics.” In Traditions of Meditation in Chinese Buddhism, edited by Peter N. Gregory, 163–198. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1986.
- Ch’ên, Kenneth Kuan Shêng. Buddhism in China, a Historical Survey. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964.
- Pas, Julian F. Visions of Sukhāvāṇī: Shan-tao’s Commentary on the Kuan Wu-liang shou-fo ching. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Tanaka, Kenneth K. The Dawn of Chinese Pure Land Buddhist Doctrine: Ching-ying Hui-yuan’s Commentary on the Visualization Sutra. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
- Zürcher, E. The Buddhist Conquest of China; the Spread and Adaptation of Buddhism in Early Medieval China. Leiden: Brill, 1959.
- Pre-modern Mature*
- Amstutz, Galen. “The Politics of Independent Pure Land in China.” Journal of Chinese Religions 26 (1998): 21–50.
- Getz, Daniel A. “Popular Religion and Pure Land in Song-Dynasty Tiantai Bodhisattva Precept Ordination Ceremonies.” In Going Forth: Visions of Buddhist Vinaya: Essays Presented in Honor of Professor Stanley Weinstein, 161–184. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2005.
- Getz, Daniel A. “Shengchang’s Pure Conduct Society and the Chinese Pure Land Patriarchate.” In Approaching the Land of Bliss: Religious Praxis in the Cult of Amitābha, edited by Richard K. Payne and Kenneth K. Payne, 52–76. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2004.
- Gregory, Peter N., and Daniel A. Getz, Jr. Buddhism in the Sung. A Kuroda Institute Book. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
- Hsu, Sung-peng. A Buddhist Leader in Ming China: The Life and Thought of Han-Shan Te-Ch’ing. University Park and London: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1979.
- Jones, Charles B. “Apologetic Strategies in Late Imperial Chinese Pure Land Buddhism.” Journal of Chinese Religions 29 (2001): 69–90.
- Sharf, Robert H. “On Pure Land Buddhism and Ch’an: Pure Land Syncretism in Medieval China.” T’oung Pao (Leiden) 88, nos. 4–5 (2002): 282–331.
- Shih, Heng-ching. The Syncretism of Ch’an and Pure Land Buddhism. New York: Peter Lang, 1992.
- Stevenson, Daniel B. “Death-Bed Testimonials of the Pure Land Faithful.” In Buddhism in Practice, edited by Donald S. Lopez, 592–602. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Stevenson, Daniel B. “Pure Land Buddhist Worship and Meditation in China.” In Buddhism in Practice, edited by Donald S. Lopez, 359–379. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Yü, Chung-fang. The Renewal of Buddhism in China: Chu-Hung and the Late Ming Synthesis. New York: Columbia University Press, 1981.
- Modern*
- Chandler, Stuart. Establishing a Pure Land on Earth: The Foguang Buddhist Perspective on Modernization and Globalization. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2004.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. Buddhism in Taiwan: Religion and the State, 1660–1990. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. “Foundations of Ethics and Practice in Chinese Pure Land Buddhism.” Journal of Buddhist Ethics 10 (2003): 2–20.
- Jones, Charles Brewer. “Transitions in the Practice and Defense of Chinese Pure Land Buddhism.” In Buddhism in the Modern World: Adaptations of an Ancient Tradition, edited by Steven Heine and Charles S. Prebish, 125–142. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Laliberté, André. The Politics of Buddhist Organizations in Taiwan: 1989–2003: Safeguarding the Faith, Building a Pure Land, Helping the Poor. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2004.
- Pittman, Don A. Toward a Modern Chinese Buddhism: Taixu’s Reforms. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2001.

Welch, Holmes. The Practice of Chinese Buddhism, 1900–1950. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967.

Purim

Purim is an annual Jewish festival that celebrates the deliverance of the Jewish people of the ancient Persian Empire from a plot to annihilate them. The story is recorded in the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament) in the book of Esther. In the past, the king Ahasuerus described in the story was believed to be either Artaxerxes I (r. 465–424 BCE) or Artaxerxes II (r. 404–358). More recently, scholars have been more skeptical of the historicity of the story and seen it more as a legendary tale.

The book of Esther begins with the account of a feast given by King Ahasuerus at which alcohol flowed freely. In a drunken state, the king ordered his wife Vashti, wearing her crown, to “display her beauty” before those in attendance. Her refusal to do so caused Ahasuerus to put her away and to choose a new wife and queen. He chose a young woman at the court named Esther, unaware that she was, in fact, a Jewish orphan named Hadassah now in the care of her cousin Mordecai. Soon afterward, Mordecai discovered a plot by several courtiers to kill Ahasuerus. He made the plot public.

Haman, the king’s highest official, came to despise Mordecai, for he refused to bow down to Haman. Haman discovered that Mordecai was Jewish and hatched a plot to kill not only him but the entire Jewish minority in the Persian Empire. After obtaining Ahasuerus’s permission to go ahead with his plan, Haman cast lots (purim) to choose the date for executing it. The lot fell on the 13th day of the month of Adar. When Mordecai discovered Haman’s plan, he informed Esther. She asked the Jewish community to engage in three days of fasting and prayer, and then requested an audience with Ahasuerus, even though to do so, without the king having summoned her, could have caused her death. But Esther found favor when the king saw her, and she invited the king and Haman to a feast. At this feast, she invited them to a second feast the next day.

Costumed players celebrate Purim, about 1657. Purim is a celebratory Jewish holiday in which plays and parodies are performed to commemorate the time when the Jewish people living in Persia were saved from extermination. (The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. Isadore Singer, 1901)

On the night between the two feasts, Ahasuerus had trouble sleeping, and he asked that the annals be read to him. Learning that Mordecai had foiled a plot against him and that he had received no honor in return, the king asked Haman how properly to reward a man the king wished to honor. Thinking it was he himself of whom the king spoke, Haman replied that the man should be dressed in a kingly fashion and paraded on the king’s horse. Haman, to his great despair, had then to do these things for Mordecai.

That evening, at the feast, Esther revealed that she was a Jew and informed the king of Haman’s plot. She pointed out that if his plot were carried out, she would be executed. Ahasuerus then turned on Haman and ordered him hung. But a problem remained. The decree allowing Haman’s action against the Jews had been signed; thus it could not be simply annulled—but it could be countered. Ahasuerus gave Esther and Mordecai leave to write a new decree allowing the Jews to defend themselves. When attacked on Adar 13, the Jewish community fought and triumphed over its enemies. Mordecai subsequently was given a prominent position in Ahasuerus's court. He initiated the annual commemoration of the Jewish people's deliverance.

Purim is celebrated on the 14th day of the Hebrew month of Adar (usually in mid-March on the Common Era calendar). In leap years, when a second month of Adar is added to the Hebrew lunar calendar (7 times in a 19-year cycle), so that holidays stay in their appointed seasons, Purim is celebrated during Adar II. This is the most unequivocally joyous of Jewish festivals, though it begins on Adar 13 with Taanit Esther, a fast (as Esther had asked the Jews to fast before she went to the king). If Adar 13 falls on a Sabbath, there will be further adjustment of the date.

Ritually, the service at the synagogue will feature a reading of the biblical book of Esther. This occurs twice, first after sunset when the new day begins on the Hebrew calendar, and a second time the next morning. In contrast to the quiet demeanor during the scripture readings at Sabbath services, during the reading of the book of Esther the congregation shouts and makes noise whenever Haman's name is read so as to blot out the sound of his name. Central to the day is a feast, which has been preceded by the sharing of gifts of food with others and the giving of money to the poor, with the understanding that joy is complete only when shared with the less fortunate. Additional customs have also developed above and beyond the guidelines of the biblical story, including the making of a particular dessert called hamantaschen (or "Haman's pockets"), a fruit-filled pastry. Purim is one day in which the drinking of alcohol in excess is acceptable.

The story of Esther is also commemorated as a teaching event. It reminds believers of the capricious nature of evil in the world and the need for action when it arises. It also builds confidence that God does not neglect his people.

From the Middle Ages to the present, Purim has, on occasion, been used, usually as part of a larger anti-Semitic attack, to charge the Jews with, on the one hand, the excessive use of violence, and, on the other, with the inability to respond to violence directed at them (as occurred in the Holocaust). Historic persecutions of the Jews and ongoing tensions with the Arab world since the founding of the state of Israel continue to provide occasions for Jews to construe anew the meaning of Purim and the tyranny of new Hamans who seek their destruction.

Purim is an official holiday in Israel.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Judaism.

References

- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Horowitz, Elliott. Reckless Rites: Purim and the Legacy of Jewish Violence. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2008.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher/Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

Putuo Shan

Putuo Shan is an island off the coast of Zhejiang Province in China, east of Ningpo and south of Shanghai. Mount Putuo, though rising only a few hundred feet above the surrounding sea, is one of the four sacred mountains of Chinese Buddhism, the mountain of the south.

The island was identified as the home of Guan Yin (Avalokitesvara, Kuan Yin, Kwan Yin, or in Japan, Kannon, and in Tibet, Chenrezig), the bodhisattva or goddess of compassion/mercy, toward the end of the first millennium CE. To this end, a story was related about a princess named Miao Shan who was an emanation of the bodhisattva, and who lived on the island in the seventh century.

Among the early stories that have accumulated about the island, one tells of an Indian monk who arrived on the island during the reign of Tang dynasty Emperor Xuanxong (847–860). According to the account, the monk not only attended lectures given by the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara, but was given a seven-hued stone. A half century later, an eminent Japanese monk named Huie was stranded on Putuo Shan while attempting to deliver a statue of Guan Yin to Japan from Wu Tai Shan. In his stress, he prayed to the goddess, who relieved his situation. Rather than continue his journey, he stayed on the island and saw to the construction of a temple in which he placed the statue he was carrying. This temple is now known as the Bukenqu (or Reluctant to Go) Guan Yin Temple (now evolved to become Puji Temple, the largest on the island).

Puji Temple, built in 916, is a Buddhist temple located on the island of Putuo Shan in Zhejiang Province, China. (Chen Kehai/Dreamstime.com)

Additional temples would be constructed over the succeeding centuries, of which some 20 remain today.

Of the 20, 3 stand out. Puji, Fayu and Huiji are each large temple complexes and known for their impressive architecture.

Puji Temple originated in 1080 and now covers some 45,932 square feet. In Great Yuantong Hall, there are a 21-foot-high statue of the goddess of mercy and small ones of her reputed 32 incarnations. The Fayu Temple's Yuantong Hall is known for the many dragons, a reminder of its origins as a gift from the emperor. Inside a large ball hangs from the ceiling. On each of eight surrounding vertical pillars is carved a dragon that rears its head as if in a scramble for the ball. A ninth dragon comes out of the ceiling. At the highest point in the Fayu complex one finds the Treasured Pearl Guan Yin Hall, dominated by a large Guan Yin statue made of pure gold with a large pearl shining in the middle of her chest.

The Huiji Temple is located at the crest of Mount Putuo and provides a broad view of the vast stretch of the sea. It is unique on the island as it is a temple focused on Gautama Buddha as the main object of worship rather than Guan Yin.

The main additional attraction on Putuo Shan is the Guan Yin mega-statue. The statue is 108 feet tall and weighs more than 77 tons. When erected it was the largest bronze Guan Yin statue in the world and has become the symbol of Putuo Shan. Its base is a museum; Gongde Hall houses one room with 500 small bronze statues of Guan Yin, each with a distinct posture, and another room with various relief sculptures on wood and jade.

Three days are celebrated most seriously at Putuo Shan—Guan Yin's birthday, the 19th day of the 2nd lunar month (March); her enlightenment day on the 19th day of the 6th lunar month (June); and her renunciation day—when she become a nun—on the 19th day of the 9th lunar month (September). On these days tens of thousands of pilgrims will arrive for celebrations at the main temples that generally last three days.

A more recent event added to the Putuo Shan calendar is the annual Guan Yin Cultural Festival each November, designed to celebrate and make known the Guan Yin culture of China's Buddhism. Events begin on the festival eve when the monks of Puji Temple light up 1,000 lotus-shaped lamps from the ever-lit lamp inside Yuantong Hall. Worshipers will pass the lamps from one to another symbolizing the Buddhist light spreading to every corner on Earth. The lamp-passing ceremony leads into a display of fireworks. On the second day of the festival, worship is focused at Huiji Temple. The path to Huiji Temple consists of 1,087 stone steps, and worshippers will follow the head priest to the top of the mountain. Every nine steps they will pause to bow toward the top of the mountain

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Guan Yin's Birthday; Mahayana Buddhism.

References

- Blofeld, John. Bodhisattva of Compassion: The Mystical Tradition of Kuan Yin. Boulder, CO: Shambhala, 1978.
- Isle of Mount Putuo. <http://www.mtputuo.com/>. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Karcher, Stephen. Kuan Yin. London: Time Warner, 2003.
- Palmer, Ramsey Kwok. Kuan Yin: Myths and Prophecies of the Chinese Goddess of Compassion. San Francisco: Thorsons, 1995.
- Yu, Chun-Fang. Kuan Yin. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Qadiriyya Rifa'i Sufi Order

The original Sufi teacher who established the Rifa'i Sufi Order was Ahmad al-Rifa'i (1118–1181), who was born in Basra, Iraq. Sheikh al-Rifa'i was a contemporary of Sheikh 'Abd al-Qadir Jilani in Baghdad, from whose teachings the Qadiriyya Sufi Order developed. Much of their theosophy focused upon the different stages (maqamat) and states (awhal) one needs to experience to touch God's beauty (jamal). "Love is fire" is a common phrase among the Rifa'i Sufis, who assert that love piety is essential for the mystical experience.

Egyptian Rifa'i Sufis have an intense veneration of the Prophet and his family; Central Asian Rifa'is are distinguished by the practice of piercing their skin with swords and eating glass during dhikr ("remembrance of Allah" devotional) sessions. The dhikr sessions include verd (spiritual readings) and practicing tesbih (repeating the names of God with the aid of a rosary). Today, the Rifa'i Sufis are located in Iraq, Turkey, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Lebanon, Central Asia, and Southeastern Europe.

A new lineage of the Rifa'iyya began early in the 20th century. It grew from the ruins of a prayer house (tekke) located in Kasimpasha, now a suburb of Istanbul, and the work of Sheikh Muhammad Ansari, an Iraqi who moved to Erzincan in northeastern Turkey in the early 1900s. A descendant of both 'Abd al-Qadir Jilani and Ahmad al-Rifa'i, he had become sheikh of the Rifa'i Order. In Turkey he met Sheikh Abdullah Hashimi, a Qadiri, and they worked together for many years. Eventually Sheikh Hashimi sent Ansari to Istanbul to establish the Qadiri Rifa'i Tariqa Order and revive the prayer house.

Sheikh Ansari headed the Qadiriyya Rifa'i Tariqa in Istanbul from 1915 until his death. His son, Sheikh Muhyiddin Ansari, succeeded him and spread the Order throughout Turkey, Germany, and the former Yugoslavia. He was succeeded in 1978 by Sheikh Nureddin Ozal. In May 1993, Sheikh Ozal passed away and Sheikh Taner Ansari became the new leader. Soon afterward, Sheikh Taner moved to the United States, where the center of the order is now located.

Qadiriyya Rifa'i Order
PO Box 833
Nassau, NY 12123
<http://www.qadiri-rifai.org/>

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Sufism.

References

- Blakney, Richard, trans. The Eye of the Heart. Istanbul: Redhouse Press, 1988.
- De Jong, Frederick. Turuq and Turuq-Linked Institutions in Nineteenth-Century Egypt. Leiden: Brill, 1978.
- Tanner Ansari er Rafai el Qadiri, Es-Seyyid Es-Shaykh. The Sun Will Rise in the West: The Holy Trail. Ansari Publications, 2000.
- Trimingham, Spencer. The Sufi Orders in Islam. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971.

Qadiriyya Sufi Order

The Qadiriyya Sufi Order, named after 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani (d. 1166), was founded in Mesopotamia approximately 800 years ago. It is one of the oldest Sufi orders in existence. Al-Jilani is considered to be one of the greatest Sufi teachers of his time, referred to as “sheikh of sheikhs.” The development of the Order and of its teachings is credited to his sons, ‘Abd al-’Aziz and ‘Abd al-Razzaq.

The Qadiri tradition includes philanthropic activities, meditative prayers to God called dhikr, specialized prayers, invocations, the use of music and poetry for spirituality, and special attention to studies in the Koran, law, and philosophy. The Sufi Order adheres to hierarchies of a Sufi society, where the elder Qadiri sheikh stands as the primary teacher and supervisor of all the disciples. Al-Jilani originally came from the Persian province of Gilan and settled in Baghdad. The Qadiriyya Order eventually spread to most major centers in the Islamic regions: Iran, Syria, Egypt, Spain, Lebanon, North and West Africa, South Asia, China, Turkey, Central Asia, eastern Africa, Bosnia, Macedonia, and Indonesia. Recently, the Order has established centers in many major cities in the Western world as well.

There is no central headquarters for the Order, but it may be contacted through Al-Baz Publishing, Incorporated.

Al-Baz Publishing, Inc.
1516 NW 38th Street
Oakland Park, FL 33334
<http://www.al-baz.com/> (Al-Baz Publishing website)
<http://www.al-baz.com/shaikhjilani.shtml> (information about al-Jilani)

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Qadiriyya Rifa’i Sufi Order; Sufism.

References

- Aini, Mehmet Ali. Un grand saint de l’Islam, ‘Abd al-Qadir Guilani, 1077–1166. Paris: Paul Geuthner, 1967.
- Chabbi, Jacqueline. “Abd al-Kadir al-Djilani, personnage historique.” Studia Islamica 38 (1973): 75–106.
- Petrushevsky, I. P. Islam in Iran. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1985.
- al-Tadifi, Muhammad ibn Yahya. Qala’id al-Jawahir, or Necklaces of Gems. N.p., n.d.

■ Qatar

Dawlat Qatar (the state of Qatar) is a small country of some 4,416 square miles, located on a peninsula that juts out from Arabia into the Persian Gulf. To the west is the island nation of Bahrain and to the south is Saudi Arabia. Long-standing border disputes with its neighbors were finally resolved in 2001. The original Arab population of the region received Islam in the seventh century CE and in successive centuries has also received significant numbers of immigrants, especially from Yemen, Palestine, Egypt, Pakistan, India, and Iran. Only 40 percent of the present population of 825,000 are native Qataris. Qataris are now the wealthiest per capita population in the world.

Qatar was conquered in 1076 by Bahrain and remained under Bahrain’s hegemony until the 19th century, when the al-Tani family rose to power and led the fight for independence, which was finally obtained in 1868. The wealth of the country was traditionally built on the very fine pearls that came from the coastal waters, but demand for Qatari pearls collapsed in the 1930s because of Japanese competition. Qatar switched to oil, which has made it a wealthy nation. It is currently headed by Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa th-Thani (b. 1950), to whom power passed in 1995.

Islam is the official religion of the country and any form of proselytization of Muslims is prohibited by law. Also, other religions are not allowed to construct and use church buildings. The majority of Qataris are Muslims and follow the strict Wahhabi School, which also dominates neighboring Saudi Arabia. However, the many immigrant groups that have moved into the country have brought other forms of Islam with them (for example, the Muslims from Iran tend to be Shias).

Christianity had spread across the Arabian Peninsula in the second and third centuries CE, but it was completely obliterated after the rise of Islam. The Roman Catholic Church attempted to rebuild a Christian presence in the area, beginning in 1841 in Aden. A vicariate was created in 1889, but it is now headquartered in Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates. There has been little response to the church in Qatar. A single priest resides in Doha.

Mosque outside the Khalifa sports stadium, Doha, Qatar. (Paul Cowan/Dreamstime.com)

Qatar

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	106,000	738,000	83.4	5.70	909,000	1,091,000
Christians	4,800	84,700	9.6	1.87	110,000	136,000
Roman Catholics	680	62,000	7.0	2.25	80,000	100,000
Anglicans	700	7,000	0.8	0.00	8,000	9,000
Independents	450	4,900	0.6	-1.90	7,500	9,500
Hindus	0	22,500	2.5	5.24	28,000	34,000
Agnostics	100	20,800	2.4	4.87	30,000	40,000
Buddhists	0	17,000	1.9	5.24	22,000	27,000
Baha'is	300	1,400	0.2	5.93	2,400	3,700
Atheists	0	600	0.1	5.24	1,000	1,500
Total population	111,000	885,000	100.0	5.24	1,102,000	1,333,000

Protestant and Orthodox Christians are represented among the expatriates working in the oil field. The Arab American Oil Company employs chaplains who hold services. The Christian Brethren, one branch of the Plymouth Brethren movement, has organized several congregations. An Anglican chaplain from the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East resides in Abu Dhabi and also visits Qatar to conduct services.

Since World War II, the Baha'i Faith has emerged in Qatar. It originated in nearby Iran, just across the Persian Gulf.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East; Roman Catholic Church; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Anscombe, Frederick F. The Ottoman Gulf: The Creation of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Horner, N. A. "Present-day Christianity in the Gulf States of the Arabian Peninsula." Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research 2 (April 1978): 53–63.
- Rahman, Habibur. The Emergence of Qatar. New York: Taylor and Francis, 2006.
- Vine, P., and P. Casey. The Heritage of Qatar. London: IMMEL Publishing, 1992.

Qigong

Qigong (also spelled Qi Gong and Chi-kung) is a Chinese tradition of mind-body training combining breath control, slow-motion gymnastics, and meditation. The term combines the Chinese characters qi (literally, "breath"; can also mean "vital breath" or "cosmic energy") and gong (literally "effort"; often understood as "discipline," "virtuosity," "spiritual power"). Techniques now known as qigong are mentioned in ancient Chinese texts from the sixth century BCE and earlier, including the Laozi and Zhuangzi, and became integral components of Chinese medicine, martial arts, and religion, notably Daoism and Chinese Mahayana Buddhism. A wide range of breathing, gymnastic, meditation, and visualization techniques, joined in an infinitely extensible array of combinations, could be used for the healing of illnesses, for nurturing health and longevity, or for spiritual transcendence and immortality.

The use of the term “qigong” as a single category covering all such techniques can be traced to the mid-20th century, and is the result of modernizing attempts to secularize useful Chinese traditions by extracting them from religion and superstition and reorganizing them into a scientific system. This project was carried out in the 1950s by the health authorities of the newly established People’s Republic of China. Qigong was applied in modern clinical settings, and disseminated on a wide scale following the model of mass calisthenics. Banned during the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), qigong reappeared in the late 1970s. Reports of healing through “external qi” (emission of qi without physical contact between a healer and a patient) caused a sensation in the Chinese press, while thousands of charismatic qigong healers attracted followings in the millions, and qigong became almost synonymous in popular discourse with paranormal phenomena and psychic powers. Some of China’s leading scientists and senior Communist Party leaders supported the movement and facilitated its expansion.

In the 1980s and 1990s, a time when most forms of religion had been destroyed or strictly controlled in mainland China for decades, qigong became the main legal outlet for a rediscovery of China’s spiritual traditions, and a mass movement within which hundreds of popular groups appeared. Many of these were full-fledged new religious movements with sophisticated China-wide or even global organizations—the largest of which, with tens of millions of practitioners, were Zhong Gong, founded by Zhang Hongbao in 1987, and Falun Gong, founded by Li Hongzhi in 1992. By the mid-1990s, the Chinese authorities, sensitive to accusations of quackery and pseudo-science being leveled at qigong by critics, and concerned about the growing influence of charismatic qigong masters, attempted to impose stricter regulations on qigong. Li Hongzhi immigrated to the United States in 1996 and Zhang Hongbao went into hiding (he reappeared on the American island of Guam in 2000). Most qigong groups declined or adopted a low profile. But Falun Gong, which, in addition to qigong exercises, had strongly moralistic teachings and a messianic, apocalyptic eschatology, continued to grow rapidly. Rejecting state regulations and criticisms from the official media, Falun Gong practitioners often staged protests and sit-ins. After 10,000 followers surrounded Zhongnanhai (the headquarters of the Chinese Communist leadership) in a silent protest on April 25, 1999, the government banned Falun Gong as an “evil cult” on July 22, 1999. Although other forms of qigong remained legal, in practice most other popular groups were dismantled, and only five sets of exercises, derived from the medical daoyin tradition, were authorized. Qigong ceased to exist as a mass movement in China, although the techniques continued to be practiced, under different names, in other contexts such as Daoism or Chinese medical health cultivation.

Most of the leading qigong masters of the 1980s and 1990s immigrated to North America, Europe, and Australia, contributing to the spread of qigong in Western countries. One of the first to introduce qigong to a Western audience, in 1979 as “Taoist esoteric yoga,” was Mantak Chia (b. 1944), a Chinese born in Thailand, who had settled in New York and founded an organization known as Healing Tao. His disciple Michael Winn became one of the leading advocates of qigong in the United States. In Western countries, qigong found a welcoming niche in the diverse milieu of New Age spirituality, alternative healing, and Chinese medicine/martial arts/Tai chi and Daoism.

David A. Palmer

See also: Daoism; Energy; Falun Gong; Healing Tao; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; New Age Movement; Zhong Gong.

References

- Palmer, David A. Qigong Fever. Body, Science and Utopia in China. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.
- Komjathy, Louis. “Qigong in America.” In Daoist Body Cultivation, edited by Livia Kohn. Cambridge: Three Pines Press, 2006.

Quanzhen Daoism

Quanzhen, which translates as “Complete Realization,” or “Complete Perfection,” is one of two schools that today represent the Daoist alchemical tradition, in contrast to the liturgical tradition of Zhengyi Daoism. Quanzhen is also sometimes erroneously known as

Daoist monks look after a shrine where Chinese faithful pray and burn incense at the White Cloud Temple in Beijing. (AP Photo/Elizabeth Dalziel)

Northern Daoism, and Zhengyi is called Southern Daoism. About 80 percent of organized Daoism in mainland China belongs to this sect, which also prevails in Hong Kong.

For all its importance, Quanzhen is almost completely unknown in the West, where there has been little academic study of it. Many of the newer Western Daoist groups (Taoist Chi Society, Healing Tao Centers) have some relation to Quanzhen, though the exact nature of these ties remains unclear.

Emerging out of the ashes of war-torn 12th-century China, Quanzhen became the most important religious movement in China during the Yuan dynasty. Quanzhen was founded by Wang Zhe, who was also known by his religious name as Wang Chongyang (1113–1170). After living in seclusion on Mount Zhongnan in Shaanxi Province, he received seven disciples, who spread the new teaching. The most famous of these disciples was Qiu Chuji (1148–1227), who in a celebrated account in Chinese history accepted an invitation in 1219 to teach the Mongol Emperor Genghis Khan (ca. 1162–1227) about longevity. Because of this, many early khans showered patronage on Quanzhen Daoism. Indeed, Quanzhen Daoists were tax exempt and became semiofficial government representatives.

In the Qing dynasty, Qiu Chuji was retroactively given credit for founding the Longmen Pai (Dragon Gate Branch) of Quanzhen Daoism, the dominant sect today. Actually, Longmen Pai can only be definitively traced to the founding of the famous Baiyunguan (White Cloud Temple) in Beijing in 1656. In the Qing dynasty, Baiyunguan became the center for all Daoist schools, overseeing ordination, and many schools officially subsumed themselves into Longmen Pai. Today, Baiyunguan is the headquarters for both Quanzhen Daoism and the Chinese Taoist Association.

Quanzhen is a monastic and celibate tradition. Monks and nuns wear blue robes and topknots. The main altars of Quanzhen temples traditionally enshrine the Three Pure Ones, the high gods of Daoism, emanations of Dao. They are seated in meditation, rather like Buddhas. Indeed, Quanzhen owes not only its iconography but its architecture and philosophy to Buddhism. It ascetically rejects daily comforts, and it believes in rebirth and karma. Its emphasis on quiet sitting (jing-zuo) was influenced by Chan Buddhism. Quanzhen is based on spiritual and moral cultivation, rather than on philosophical, scriptural, or ritual traditions.

That cultivation also incorporates much of “Inner Alchemy,” a tradition concerning personal transformation that has been preserved largely due to the efforts of Quanzhen. The patron saint of Quanzhen Inner Alchemy is Lu Dongbin, a Tang dynasty sage. Lu Dongbin is head of the eight immortals. Depicted as a scholar with a fly whisk and a demon-slaying sword, he is a common subject in Yuan dynasty drama and popular art.

One of Wang Chongyang’s aims was to bring the Three Teachings of China, Daoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism, into a single great system once more. Quanzhen borrowed not only from Buddhism but also from neo-Confucianism. In the 19th century, Quanzhen movements were popularized, particularly those involving the new divinatory craze of spirit writing, in which a sharp stick attached to a frame moved automatically over a planchette of sand. Many of these sects make up the current Hong Kong Daoist scene. Many temples there have a truly combinatory pantheon: Lu Dongbin, representing Daoism; the Jade Emperor, representing the celestial bureaucracy, hence Confucianism; and Guanyin, the Sinicized, feminized form of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion, representing Buddhism.

Baiyunguan
6 Baiyunguan Jie
Xibianmenwai, Xuanwu District
Beijing
China

Elijah Siegler

See also: Alchemy, Daoist; Daoism; Healing Tao; Monasticism; Taoist Tai Chi Society; Wang Chongyang; Zhengyi Daoism.

References

- Tsui, Bartholomew P. M. Taoist Tradition and Change: The Story of the Complete Perfection Sect in Hong Kong. Hong Kong: Christian Study Centre on Chinese Religion and Culture, 1991.
- Wong, Eva. Seven Taoist Masters. Boston: Shambhala, 1990.

R

Rada Religion

The Rada religion (variously referred to as Alladah, Arara, or Arada) is a Caribbean religion derived from the name of an African city located along the Mina coast on the Bight of Benin. The city of Arada served as an important religious and political center during the 17th and 18th centuries, and Rada spirits (lwa) occupy a central place in African-derived religions throughout the Caribbean. Rada spirits are especially prominent in Haiti, where all African spirits are grouped into families, pantheons, and/or nachons, and every lwa (whether a member of the Petro, Ibo, or Kongo nachon) is believed to have a Rada counterpart (Desmangles 1992, 94). Rada spirits are also present in the African-derived religions of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Jamaica, Barbados, St. Kitts, Grenada, Carriacou (the Grenadines), and St. Vincent.

The major Rada spirits include Dada Segbo (the creator), Daugbwe (the serpent), Elegba (spirit of the crossroads), Sakpata (an Earth spirit), and Ogou (the spirit of iron). Some observers associate Rada lwa with benevolent forces and contrast them with Petro lwa, who are seen as bitter and aggressive. This is an oversimplification. As Desmangles (1992) points out, the distinction is not one between good and evil. Rada lwa are often conceived as gentle guardians of the universe, but they too can be unpredictable and vindictive. For example, Elegba, who directs the course of human destiny, can also cause accidents altering that destiny. All lwa have complex personalities.

The purest form of Rada ritual was on the Caribbean island of Trinidad during the late 19th century (Carr 1953). In the 1860s a free Rada population from Dahomey (now Benin) settled in the Belmont section of Port of Spain, and Abojevi Zalwenu, an African-trained diviner and herbalist, came to Trinidad to meet the religious needs of this immigrant community. Zalwenu (also known by his Creole name Robert Antoine and more popularly as “Papa Nanee”) purchased acreage in Belmont, where he established a residential compound that remained a center of Rada ceremonial life until his death in 1899. In 1886, a local court convicted Zalwenu of practicing black magic (Obeah), but the conviction was overturned because Zalwenu’s lawyer successfully argued that the Rada leader did not perform Obeah for money and functioned as a religious leader according to the beliefs of his followers. This case established a much-cited precedent for the cause of religious freedom in Trinidad.

Under Zalwenu, Rada ceremonies were carried out in strict accordance with African calendar cycles, and new vodunsi (priests) were initiated on a regular basis. Unlike other Rada ceremonies in the Caribbean, Zalwenu’s Trinidad rituals closely followed 19th-century African practice. Elsewhere, however, Rada rituals contained a mixture of practices from a variety of African traditions (Petro, Kongo, and so on). These “mixed” ceremonies have preserved elements of 17th- and 18th-century Rada ritual that were lost in Africa and unknown to Zalwenu.

The Belmont place of worship, called a vodunkwe (house of the gods), survives, but Rada rituals have been greatly modified and the number of services, especially those involving animal sacrifices, have declined in recent years. (The author visited the compound with the late Andrew Carr in 1976, and again visited in 1985 and 1999.) In 1999 the site was used primarily as a panyard (musical shrine) and a center for Orisha devotees, but a number of vodunsi were in residence. In the 19th century, Zalwenu established different shrines (and stools) to the Iwa at various locations around the vodunkwe. Devotees continue to make fresh blood offerings at these stools.

Rada is one of the few African-derived religions in the Caribbean where men constitute the majority of adherents. But as older members have died, they have not been replaced by younger adherents. Many Trinidadians do not distinguish the Rada Iwa from other African-derived deities. Hucks (2001) suggested that Trinidadian Rada may eventually be absorbed into the more active Trinidad Orisha movement. This has not occurred. Interest in “pure” Rada continues, and Andrew Carr’s 1989 study is still widely consulted, suggestive of a possible resurgence of the Rada tradition in Trinidad.

The Belmont Vodunkwe
127-129 Belmont Circular Rd.
Port of Spain
Trinidad

Stephen D. Glazier

See also: African Traditional Religions.

References

- Adderley, Rosanne Marion. “New Negroes from Africa”: Slave Trade Abolition and Free African Settlement in the Nineteenth-Century Caribbean. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2006.
- Burton, Richard D. E. Afro-Creole Power: Opposition and Play in the Caribbean. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1997.
- Carr, Andrew T. A Rada Community in Trinidad. 1953; rpt.: Port of Spain: Paria Publishing, 1989.
- Desmangles, Leslie G. The Faces of the Gods: Vodou and Roman Catholicism in Haiti. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Glazier, Stephen D. Marchin’ the Pilgrims Home: A Study of the Spiritual Baptists of Trinidad. Salem, WI: Sheffield, 1991.
- Hucks, Tracey. “Trinidad, African-Derived Religions.” In The Encyclopedia of African and African-American Religions, edited by Stephen D. Glazier, 338–343. New York: Routledge, 2001.

Warner-Lewis, Maureen. Trinidad Yoruba: From Mother Tongue to Memory. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1996.

Radhasoami

The Radhasoami tradition was formally founded in 1861 in Agra, Uttar Pradesh, India, by Shiv Dayal Singh (1818–1878), who was associated with two Sant Mat gurus, Tulsi Sahib (1764–1848) in Hathras and Girdhari Das (d. 1861) in Agra. Shiv Dayal Singh, more popularly known as Soamiji Maharaj, advocated the practice of surat shabd yoga (union of the soul with the divine sound), a strict lacto-vegetarian diet, and devotion to a living guru who would guide initiates to higher regions of consciousness. The name Radhasoami (usually spelled as one word, with the variation Radhaswami) was apparently coined by one of Shiv Dayal Singh’s chief disciples, Rai Salig Ram (1839–1898), who elevated his guru to the highest divine status. In Salig Ram’s theology, Radha stands for soul and Soami for lord, and thus Radhasoami means “Lord of the Soul.” This interpretation has been shared by almost all practitioners of the faith. The phrase is also used as a greeting between members.

After Shiv Dayal Singh’s death in 1878, several disciples worked as his spiritual successors. This eventually led to a number of schisms, and it is now estimated that there are well over 100 different branches of the Radhasoami tradition worldwide. The most popular Radhasoami group in the world is the Radhasoami Satsang, Beas (Punjab), which has more than 4 million followers and centers in Europe, Africa, Asia, and North America.

Founded by Jaimal Singh (1838–1903) in 1891, the Beas Satsang (spiritual gathering) lineage of gurus have all been born Sikh. Since Radhasoami advocates devotion to a living human guru, this has naturally led to political and religious tension among orthodox Sikh groups in the Punjab.

The Radhasoamis are not a sub-sect of Sikhism, but they do share much of the Sant philosophy in common. The current leader of the Beas Satsang is Gurinder Singh Dhillon (b. 1954), who has been instrumental in expanding the property holdings of the group worldwide, including large estates in California, North Carolina, Hawaii, England, and South Africa.

Other important Radhasoami branches, each with their own unique guru lineages, include three founded in the city of Agra, India: Soami Bagh, Dayal Bagh, and Peepal Mandi. Each of these branches traces its lineage back to Shiv Dayal Singh through Rai Salig Ram (otherwise known as Huzur Maharaj). Unlike the Beas-related satsangs that advocate repeating the spiritual mantra of five holy names (panch nam), the Agra-related groups teach repetition of one holy name, Radhasoami. In addition, unlike the Beas satsangs, which argue that Radhasoami is simply a modern manifestation of Sant Mat, the “doctrine of the saints,” the Agra groups also believe that their founder, Shiv Dayal Singh, was a unique and supreme incarnation of the highest lord, Anami Purush, and presented a new and higher path to God.

There are at least 100,000 followers in each of the Agra schools, though most of the disciples are Indian-born.

Arguably the most controversial guru in Radhasoami history was Faqir Chand (1886–1981), founder of the Manvta Mandir branch in Hoshiarpur, Punjab, and disciple of Shiv Brat Lal (1860–1939), who taught that all gurus are “unknowing” and that whatever miracles or visions occur in a devotee’s life are directly due to his or her faith and devotion. The guru, in sum, has no paranormal powers whatsoever. Faqir’s views are generally viewed in Radhasoami circles as heretical and heterodox. However, Faqir’s writings have become increasingly more popular since his death.

The Radhasoami tradition has also influenced other new religious movements, including Ruhani Satsang (founded by Kirpal Singh [1894–1974], disciple of the Beas guru, Sawan Singh); ECKANKAR (founded by Paul Twitchell [ca. 1909–1971], former disciple of Kirpal Singh); Master Ching Hai Meditation Association, also known as God’s Direct Contact (founded by Ching Hai [b. 1929], one-time disciple of Thakar Singh); the eclectic Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness, founded by John-Roger Hinkins (b. 1934); Elan Vital (formerly the Divine Light Mission); and MasterPath, founded by Gary Olsen, who claims spiritual allegiance with Sawan Singh and was a former follower of ECKANKAR.

Because there are so many different gurus and branches in the Radhasoami tradition, there have been a significant number of succession disputes within the movement’s history. The most contentious fight was between Soami Bagh and Dayal Bagh and resulted in a decades-long legal battle over the worship and property rights at Shiv Dayal Singh’s samadh (burial site).

Despite these squabbles, Radhasoami is one of the fastest growing of the newer religious traditions in the world. The total number of followers worldwide (among all branches) is estimated to be well over 5 million.

David Christopher Lane

See also: ECKANKAR; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Master Ching Hai Meditation Association; Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness; Satsang Network; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David Christopher. The Radhasoami Tradition. New York: Garland Publishers, 1994.
- The Unknowing Sage: The Life and Work of Baba Faqir Chand*. Walnut, CA: MSAC Philosophy Group, 1993.

Raelian Movement International

The Raelian Movement International is the largest UFO religion in the world, currently claiming 80,000 members, or those who have undergone the “baptism,” called the “transmission of the cellular plan,” in which initiates acknowledge the extraterrestrials, the Elohim, as their Creator. The movement was founded in 1976 by Claude Vorilhon, known to his followers as Rael. He was born in Vichy, France, in 1946. He was a pop singer, a journalist, and for many years a race car driver, but has recently retired.

Rael’s charismatic claim is that he is a prophet chosen by the Elohim, extraterrestrials from another planet in our galaxy. His alleged encounter with the Elohim took place on December 13, 1973 (the day of Saint Lucie, whose name means “light”), in the mountains near Clermont-Ferrand in France. A green, child-like being emerged from their ship and invited Rael aboard for Bible instruction. During this time, it was revealed that Genesis was a starship's log account of the Earth colonization project of the Elohim scientists. Vorilhon learned that these scientists created the first humans in laboratories out of their own DNA. The Fall of Humanity was the consequence of forbidden science lessons taught to the little "Adams and Eves" born out of test tubes, and the casting out of Eden was the "grounding" of the original team of extraterrestrials as a punitive action, the result of a struggle between rival political factions on the home planet over the issue of whether or not earthlings should be given scientific knowledge.

Claude Vorilhon, a former French journalist, is the spiritual leader of the Raelians. (Christopher J. Morris/Corbis)

The Elohim gave Vorilhon the title Rael (from Is-Rael, meaning "bearer of light") and told him that he had been chosen to found a movement that would spread globally and would demystify the world's religions with the literal truth: the message of humankind's true origins and destiny. His mission is to arrange the construction of an embassy on neutral territory in Jerusalem, where the extraterrestrials could land and meet the representatives of all the nations and be filmed by television crews.

Rael founded MADECH (Mouvement pour l'Accueil des Elohim Créateurs de l'Humanité), the forerunner of the Raelian Movement, in 1974. MADECH published Rael's account of his extraterrestrial encounter: Le Livre qui dit la vérité: J'ai rencontré un extraterrestre (1974). The founding of the Raelian Movement International in 1976 made the transition from ufologist club to a distinct new religious movement.

Rael encountered the extraterrestrials again on October 7, 1975, a meeting described in They Took Me to Their Planet (Les Extra-terrestres m'ont emmené sur leur planète, 1997). While on their planet, he received the hospitality of six female biological robots, with whom he spent a night of lovemaking and who taught him the sensual awareness technique to activate his psychic potential and grow new neural pathways. Sensual meditation, described in his third book, Sensual Meditation, involves a relaxation exercise called harmonization avec l'infini, a mental-anatomical tour of the body that arrives eventually at the brain, a visualization of the planet of the Elohim, and an exercise in telepathic rapport.

On this same trip, he was introduced to the mysteries of cloning and watched his own double being formed in a vat. For Raelians, the hope of immortality will be fulfilled by regeneration through science. Hence, Rael established an initiation called "the transmission of the cellular plan," which formalizes members' recognition of the Elohim as their creators. They are also encouraged to sign a contract giving a local mortuary permission, upon their decease, to remove 0.39 square inch of the "frontal bone" to be stored in a bank in Switzerland, awaiting collection by the Elohim and future cloning.

In the 21st century, the movement has received considerable publicity due to Rael's support of human cloning. On March 9, 1997, Rael announced the creation of Valiant Venture, Ltd., a company that offers Clonaid to parents who wish to clone a child, for the fee of $200,000. Another service offered by the company is Insuraclone; for $50,000, the cell of a child can be stored to be cloned in the event of an untimely death. On Boxing Day, 2002, Dr. Brigitte Boisselier, a Raelian bishop, announced in a press conference the successful birth of the first human clone. This event was an international media event, allowing Rael to fulfill his divine mandate to “spread the message”—but the cloned baby never materialized.

Raelian membership is divided into two levels: the committed core group of Guides, who make up the group’s hierarchy, called the Structure, and the most recently joined members or loosely affiliated Raelians, who after baptism received the bulletin Apocalypse. The six levels in the pyramidal Structure are, from low to high, assistant animator, animator, assistant guide, priest guide, bishop guide, and finally, the planetary guide or Guide of Guides (Rael). The priest and bishop guides are empowered to transmit the cellular codes, or “baptize,” new members. The Guide of guides (Rael) is re-elected by the bishops every seven years. There is also a Council of Discipline with the power to excommunicate errant members, as well as an administrative body, the Council of the Wise.

Rael, called the “Last of Forty Prophets,” was born soon after the first atomic explosion in Hiroshima in 1945, when humanity entered the “Age of Apocalypse.” Raelians believe that during this age of scientific revelation, humanity will come to understand its true origins. “With the Elohim’s guidance and humanity’s right choices, this age holds marvelous potentialities: liberation, power, quasi-immortality, once the Elohim arrive and bequeath to their creations scientific knowledge that will enable humans to travel through space and colonize virgin planets in our own image.”

The group is known as the Raelian Religion in the United States, where it has won tax-exempt status. It is known as the Raelian Church in Canada, where it is seeking recognition as a religion. The Raelian movement was established in Quebec in 1976. The Canadian movement was the second of the international movements after France. By March 1995, the movement had acquired religious corporation status from the Quebec government. When the Raelian Church of Quebec applied for tax-exempt status, it was denied on the grounds that “the Raelian ‘gods’ did not meet the standards (as material rather than transcendent beings) of the loi d’impôt.”

The central headquarters of the international movement is in Quebec, at UFOland in Valcourt, where Rael resides, though the address of the international headquarters is formally listed Geneva, Switzerland. There is also a retreat, called Eden, in Alby, France. There are more than 5,000 Raelians in Canada, nearly all of them in Quebec. The movement has branches in 84 countries, though most members are found in French-speaking Europe, Quebec, and Japan.

The Raelians have four large gatherings annually on dates that commemorate Rael’s encounters with the Elohim. Members also participate in an annual one-week stage d’éveil in a rural setting, featuring daily lectures, sensual meditation, fasting, non-mandatory nudity, sensory awareness exercises, and sexual experimentation—the ultimate goal being to experience the “cosmic orgasm.”

Raelian Movement, International
PO Box 225
CH-1211 Geneva 8
Switzerland
<http://www.rael.org/> (multilingual)

Susan Palmer

See also: UFO Religions.

References

- Bouchard, Alain. “Mouvement Raelien.” In Nouvel Age . . . Nouvelles Croyances. Written under the direction of the Centre d’Information sur les Nouvelles Religions. Montreal: Editions Paulines & Mediaspaul, 1989.
- Palmer, Susan J. Aliens Adored: Rael’s Ufo Religion. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2004.
- Palmer, Susan J. Il Movimento raelieni. Torino, Italy: Editions Elle DiCi, 2000.
- Palmer, Susan J. “The Raelians Are Coming: The Future of a UFO Religion.” In Religion in a Changing World, edited by Madeleine Cousineau, 136–146. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1998.
- Vorilhon, Claude. Le Livre qui dit la vérité. Vaduz, Liechtenstein: Fondation Raelienne, 1974.

Vorilhon, Claude. Les Extra-terrestres m'ont emmené sur leur planète. Brantome, France: L'Édition du Message, 1977.

Vorilhon, Claude. La Meditation Sensuelle. Vaduz, Liechtenstein: Fondation Raelienne, 1980.

Ramadan

According to numerous accounts of the Prophet Muhammad, fasting was a regular part of his practice and he admonished his followers to follow his example as they were able. For him, a normal routine was to fast during the daylight hours and pray during the evening (his prayer time taking from his sleeping hours). For followers, these days of fasting through the years were seen as supererogatory acts, above and beyond the basic requirements of the faith. The fasting done by Muhammad, though not required of the faithful, set the pattern to be followed in the required month of fasting known as Ramadan.

One of the five pillars of Islam, Ramadan is an annual fast named for the ninth month of the Islamic calendar when it occurs. As the Islamic calendar is a strictly lunar calendar, Ramadan occurs at a different point in the Common Era calendar each year. Ramadan recalls the beginning of Muhammad's writing down the Koran. It is a requirement of all, and those who because of illness cannot fast, are required to make up the days once they again attain their health.

Fasting begins at daybreak, defined as the moment one can discern the first streak of dawn against the black horizon (usually an hour and a half before sunrise). The fast continues until sunset. The day of fasting begins with a predawn meal (sahur) and ends with a light fast-breaking meal (iftar) that is followed by a time of prayer. People may gather at the mosque at the end of the day to share the iftar and hold communal prayers (tarawih). Muhammad advised people to break the fast each day quickly; thus it became common to prepare food ahead of time and have it ready as soon as the sun descended beyond the horizon.

Thousands of devout Muslims congregate at the Jama Mosque in New Delhi, India, for prayers on the first day of the Eid celebration marking the end of Ramadan. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The practice of fasting is seen as one of the ways, if not the best way, to please God, though it is meant as a means of teaching self-discipline, not only about food and the body, but about life in general and relationships with others. Thus, during the fast, one takes pains not to use questionable language or show anger, and one responds to any screaming or shouting with the simple observation that she or he is fasting. Those who have taken up bad habits (such as the consumption of tobacco or alcohol) have Ramadan as a time to drop such practices.

Ramadan is also a time for additional prayer, the reading of the Koran, and the showing of generosity. Muslims are also required to pay a percentage of their income for the care of the poor (another pillar of the faith), and Ramadan is often chosen as the time to fulfill that obligation.

While Ramadan as a whole is considered a remembrance of the giving of the Koran, one night in particular, called Laylat al-Qadir, the Night of Power, is commemorated as the anniversary of the actual day that the Koran first began to be revealed to Muhammad by the angel Gabriel.

The Night of Power is usually observed on the 27th day of Ramadan, but it also carries with it a certain element of mystery. It is a night marked by the descent of angels from the heavens to the earthly realm. For those engaged in prayer it is a time to receive mercy and protection from every bad thing. Muhammad requested his followers to search for it and attempt to discern when it occurred, noting only that it was one night in the last 10 of the 30-day month. He noted that it was only one night and that the time of receiving its benefits lasted until dawn. Appropriate actions for the night include prayer, self-examination, the asking of forgiveness for oneself and all Muslims, listening to sermons and engaging in discussion concerning the Night of Power, and remembering Allah.

Ramadan is immediately followed by Eid ul-Fitr, the Festival of Breaking the Fast, a feast day that marks the end of the fasting period. It is the first day of the 10th month in the Islamic calendar (months being marked from new moon to new moon). The day is a truly festive occasion, being seen as a sign of God's blessing following the time of testing and discipline, and is marked by donning fresh (and/or new) clothes, donating food to the poor (Zakat al-Fitr), and visiting family, friends, and neighbors. The day begins early in the morning with prayers in the local mosque.

In countries in which Islam is the predominant religion, the society is organized to accommodate Ramadan. Muslims living in other countries have imported the practice and accommodate their lives so as to participate fully in the fast and other activities.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Islam; Mosques; Muhammad.

References

- Algül, Hüseyin. The Blessed Days and Nights of the Islamic Year. Somerset, NJ: Light, 2005.
- al-Jibouri, Yasin T. Fast of the Month of Ramadan: Philosophy and Ahkam. Falls Church, VA: International Islamic Society of Virginia, 1994.
- Budak, Ali. Fasting in Islam and the Month of Ramadan. Somerset, NJ: The Light, 2005.
- Robinson, Neal. Islam; A Concise Introduction. London: Curzon Press, 1999.

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment was founded in the late 1980s in Yelm, Washington, by JZ Knight (b. 1946), who was the most popular of a new wave of channelers that had emerged in the West along with the New Age movement. In 1977 the spiritual entity Ramtha appeared to Knight, then a housewife in Tacoma, Washington, and introduced himself as the Enlightened One. The next year, Knight began to channel Ramtha publicly. She initially held weekend sessions called Dialogues, where she would channel Ramtha. The Dialogues were held around the United States and increasingly in several foreign countries, and many of these sessions were later transcribed and published as books or made available on videotape. However, in 1988 the decision was made to discontinue the Dialogues and to concentrate on developing a body of students who wished to go more deeply into the process of actualizing the enlightenment about which Ramtha had spoken.

According to the channeled messages, Ramtha is a 35,000-year-old warrior who at the height of his power was almost killed. He found enlightenment during his time of recovery and eventually ascended to a spiritual realm. Once Ramtha's School of Enlightenment was formed, Ramtha began to teach a set of practices that would allow students to access and become directly aware of the spiritual realms. The basic practice, termed "energy and consciousness," involves controlled breathing and kundalini yoga, in which latent energy believed to be located at the base of the spine is allowed to rise up the spine and bring its energy and enlightenment to the self.

Ramtha describes the universe as divided into seven levels, at the center of which is the Void (Pure Potentiality) out of which the other levels are derived. The seventh level is the visible world, into which individuals as spiritual entities have come. The spiritual entities created this world, but then they became trapped in it and forgetful of their spiritual origin. Enlightenment comes as one is able to remember and experience one's spiritual origin and can freely navigate the several levels.

The school is organized as an Esoteric mystery school. Students initially pass through a graded curriculum before being admitted to the larger student body of those who continually work on their self-awareness as spiritual beings. The larger student body gathers at the headquarters twice each year for advanced retreats, at which time new teachings and perspectives are released by Ramtha.

Some 3,000 students are active in the school. During the 1990s, all events were held at Yelm, but at the close of the decade Knight began to travel again and introductory sessions concerning Ramtha are now being held annually by senior students at locations in Europe, South Africa, and Australia. Literature is published in Spanish, German, Italian, French, Japanese, and Norwegian.

During the early 1990s, Knight and the school passed through a period of intense controversy, much of which was related to the secretive Esoteric nature of the school's work. In the mid-1990s Knight opened up the school to a group of scholars, including several psychologists who ran a set of tests on Knight and some of her leading students. Their positive reports concerning her psychological health and the extraordinary nature of her channeling activity largely ended the attacks she had previously experienced.

At the beginning of the new century, one of Ramtha's students who was a filmmaker produced what became an award-winning movie, What the Bleep Do We Know, initially released in 2004. The movie, which stars Oscar-winning actress Marlee Matlin, explored the relationship between quantum physics, neurology, and molecular biology and the world of spirituality and Esoteric teachings, especially privileging Ramtha's teachings. JZ Knight (channeling Ramtha) and several of her students appeared in the movie and it quickly gained a following beyond the school's membership. The response prompted an expanded version with additional material dealing with questions raised by the original movie; it was released as Down the Rabbit Hole. The movie became a vital factor in the continued growth of the school.

Beginning in the 1990s, Ramtha began to train a set of teachers who now have assumed responsibilities for most of the introductory course for the school and have aided the global expansion that annually includes events at locations around the world. Coordinators for local activities have been appointed in some 35 countries.

Ramtha School of Enlightenment
PO Box 579
Yelm, WA 98597
<http://www.ramtha.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: New Age Movement; Western Esoteric Tradition; Yoga.

References

- Knight, JZ. A State of Mind. New York: Warner Books, 1997.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Finding Enlightenment: Ramtha's School of Ancient Wisdom. Hillsboro, OR: Beyond Worlds Publishing, 1998.
- Ramtha (through JZ Knight). A Beginner's Guide to Creating Reality. Yelm, WA: JZK Publishing, 2000.

Ramtha (through JZ Knight). A Master's Reflections on the History of Humanity. 2 vols. Yelm, WA: JZK Publishing, 2001–2002.

Ramtha (through JZ Knight). Ramtha. Ed. by Steven Weinberg. Eastsound, WA: Sovereignty, 1986.

Ramtha (through JZ Knight). That Elixir Called Love. Yelm, WA: JZK Publishing, 2003.

Simmon, Greg. These Things You Shall Do . . . And Greater: The Physics of Change. Rainier, WA: Mulai de Guise Publishing, 2006.

Rastafarians

Rastafarianism is a social, political, and religious movement that began on the Caribbean island of Jamaica in the late 1920s. Followers of the movement, sometimes called Rastas or Dreads, are best known as the originators of the popular musical style reggae, for their extensive ritual use of ganja (marijuana), and for wearing their hair in long, rope-like braids called dreadlocks. Since its emergence in the ghettos of West Kingston, the Rastafarian movement has transformed itself from an obscure religion of the oppressed into a dominant cultural force. Music has played a significant role in this transformation. Ganja has also played a significant and changing role. Following slavery, black Jamaicans used ganja as a palliative, but it is only in the 20th century that ganja assumed symbolic importance and began to be identified as a “holy herb.”

The name Rastafarianism is borrowed from Ras Tafari, a name for former Emperor Haile Selassie I of Ethiopia (1892–1975), who reigned from 1916 to 1974. Although a number of the founders of Rastafarianism (notably Leonard Howell [1898–1981] and Archibald Dunckley) preached that Haile Selassie was a Living God, Emperor Selassie himself remained a devout leader within the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo

Rastafari men play drums, Jamaica. Rastafari is a religious and political movement that began in Jamaica in the 1930s. (Bojan Brecej/Corbis)

Church. When Selassie visited Jamaica in 1966, he was greatly puzzled by Rastafarians, who seemed to be worshipping him.

Although there are many variants within Rastafarianism, the 1983 Rastafari Theocratic Assembly passed a resolution declaring a single variant—that associated with the House of Nyahbinghi—as the orthodox faith. The House of Nyahbinghi creed proclaims Haile Selassie a Living God and states that all African peoples are one and that the descendants of those who were taken from Africa to be slaves in Babylon will be repatriated. It is contended that all African people are descendants of the ancient Hebrews and that the reason Africans now live outside Africa is that their descendants disobeyed Ja (short for Jehovah, the God of the Hebrews), who then punished them by making them slaves to whites. Haile Selassie I was expected to arrange for the return of all people of African descent to Africa, but following his death in 1975, there has been less emphasis on a physical return to Africa and greater emphasis on a spiritual return.

Rastafarianism today is a worldwide movement with membership in Jamaica, other Caribbean islands, the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand (the Maori), South Africa, Ghana, Ethiopia, islands of the South Pacific, and parts of Western Europe (especially England, Holland, and Germany). Native Americans (the Hopi) have also been influenced by the group's theology. Although contemporary Rastas represent many races and nationalities, the religion began as an African American nationalist movement. Contemporary adherents stress that it is much more than a nationalist movement. It is a way of life. Many Rastas prefer to describe their religious involvement in terms of livity, the adoption of a lifestyle informed by strict theocratic principles.

One central Rastafarian ritual, called “reasoning,” is a group discussion and debate about the interpretation of biblical texts, local politics, predictions about the future, and commentary on world events. During these ceremonies Rastas also smoke ganja, which, many believe, brings them closer to Ja. For a majority of Rastas, smoking ganja is believed to have medicinal as well as spiritual benefits. But an increasing number of Trinidad Rastas no longer smoke ganja on a regular basis.

Rastafarianism is a highly successful religious movement that has persisted for more than 70 years. It continues to play a major part in the struggles of people of African descent for freedom and equality throughout the world. It is a very decentralized movement with a variety of organizations (mostly local), diverse publications, and self-initiated activities. In addition, the religion has a lively presence on the Internet.

Stephen D. Glazier and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church

References

- Bernard, Akeia A. “The Material Roots of Rastafarian Marijuana Symbolism.” History and Anthropology 18, no. 1 (2007): 89–99.
- Chevannes, Barry. Rastafari: Roots and Ideology. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1994.
- Edmonds, Ennis Barrington. Rastafari: From Outcasts to Culture Bearers. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Erskine, Noel Leo. From Garvey to Marley: Rastafari Theology. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2005.
- Mulvaney, Rebekah Michele. Rastafari and Reggae: A Dictionary and Sourcebook. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1990.
- Murrell, Nathaniel Samuel, William David Spencer, and Adrian Anthony McFarlane, eds. Chanting Down Babylon: The Rastafari Reader. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1998.

Rawze-e-Sharif

The story of Rawze-e-Sharif (the Blue Mosque) located in Mazari Sharif, Afghanistan, begins with the assassination of Ali ibn Abi Talib (ca. 597–661), the fourth caliph of the Muslim community. Ali had become the focus of the community's division, and his followers were at this time in the minority. He was buried in a secret location. In the eighth century, the leader of what became the Shia Islam community, Al-Shaykh Al-Mufid (the sixth Imam), claimed that he knew the location and that it was at Najaf. There a shrine and mosque would be built and a city emerged.

Some contend, however, that the story does not end with the Najaf burial. Rather they say, some of Ali's followers, concerned about the possible discovery and desecration of the body, removed it, placed it on a camel, and headed east. After several weeks, the camel dropped from exhaustion, and the men buried the body at that spot. In the following years, that location was lost.

However, early in the 12th century, a man living in the area had a dream in which Ali appeared to him and revealed the reburial site near the city of Balkh, in northern Afghanistan. The truth of the claim was investigated and after being confirmed, the local sultan ordered that a shrine be built and a city founded. Around 1220 that mosque and city were destroyed by Genghis Khan (ca. 1162–1227). Some rebuilding had occurred by the time Tamerlane (1336–1405) again laid waste to the region and annexed it to his regime based in Bukhara (Uzbekistan). A new mosque was finally built in the 15th century.

The present mosque has undergone various refurbishings and expansions over the intervening centuries. Many of the alterations were for the addition of tombs of various Afghan political and religious leaders whose bodies now rest within the mosque. Also within the mosque is the tomb chamber of Zarathustra (Zoroaster, the founder of the Zoroastrian religion, who was killed at Balkh by invading forces).

The region remained under the control of Bukhara until 1850, when it was returned to Afghanistan. In 1866, following a malaria outbreak, the regional capital was moved from Balkh to Mazar Sharif. In the late 1990s, Mazar Sharif became a battleground between the local Shia militia and the Taliban, who are Sunni Muslims. Several battles were fought over control of the city and several massacres are said to have occurred. It is currently (2009) occupied by NATO peacekeeping forces as the post 9/11 war in Afghanistan continues.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ali ibn Abi Talib; Bukhara; Mosques; Taliban; Zoroastrianism.

References

Ball, Warwick. The Monuments of Afghanistan: History, Archaeology and Architecture. London: I. B. Tauris, 2008.

Ewans, Martin. Afghanistan: A Short History of Its People and Politics. New York: Harper Perennial, 2002.

Reconstructionist Judaism

Reconstructionist Judaism developed in the United States, largely the product of the fertile mind of Mordecai M. Kaplan (1881–1983). Born in Lithuania, Kaplan came to the United States with his parents, attended the Jewish Theological Seminary, and subsequently became the rabbi of an Orthodox synagogue in New York. While there he became one of the founders of the youth movement that later matured as Young Israel.

Although Kaplan spent the vast part of his long career as a professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary, which trained rabbis for the growing movement of Conservative Judaism, and although he had also originally served as a rabbi in Orthodox synagogues, in 1922 he founded his own synagogue, the Society for the Advancement of Judaism. This became one of the settings in which Kaplan evolved his Reconstructionist Judaism, a very different approach to adapting Judaism to the modern world. His classic text, Judaism as a Civilization (1934), argues that Jews must make radical changes to their own social and organizational life in order to accommodate to each culture in which they reside. For Kaplan, Judaism constituted an evolving religious civilization, one that must be reconciled with contemporary forces. Kaplan's reconstruction of Judaism led him to reject the notion of a supernatural God and to redefine God as the power in the universe that makes for salvation. He rejected authoritarianism and supernaturalism in every aspect of Jewish religious life, abandoning the notion of the commandments and God's laws in favor of celebrating Jewish traditions as folkways, which the people could and should modify to meet their changed circumstances of contemporary life.

Kaplan's pragmatic approach to Jewish life centered on the community. His rejection of the divine origin of the Torah (the Jewish Bible) was but one issue that made for tense relations between Kaplan and his colleagues both in the Conservative movement and among the Orthodox, and eventually led to the development of Reconstructionism as a separate branch of American Judaism. As Kaplan and his colleagues concretized his ideas in a series of new prayer books, a group of Orthodox rabbis, in 1945, burned his Sabbath prayer book and formally excommunicated him..

Portrait of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, founder of Reconstructionist Judaism, the youngest and smallest of the four denominations of American Judaism. (American Jewish Archives)

The Reconstructionist movement evolved organizationally in stages. In 1935 Kaplan founded a periodical called the Reconstructionist. In 1940 the Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation was founded, and soon thereafter the first Reconstructionist synagogues opened their doors. The foundation was superseded in 1955 by a synagogue association, which went through several name changes before emerging in 1996 as the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation. Along the way it had absorbed many Jews who had participated in the havurot movement, a communal movement that developed in the 1960s. Rabbi Ira Eisenstein (1907–2001), Kaplan's son-in-law and the second prominent leader of the movement, took the lead in founding the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in 1968. The Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association was founded in 1974.

Reconstructionism is largely limited to the United States. It has steadily moved toward alliances with Liberal and Reform Judaism, with which it has now identified through its affiliation with the World Union for Progressive Judaism. As the 21st century begins, there are approximately 100 Reconstructionist congregations, including 3 in Canada, and some 50,000 members in North America. There is a single congregation in Curaçao.

Jewish Reconstructionist Federation

Beit Devora

101 Greenwood Ave. Suite 430

Jenkintown, PA 19046

<http://www.jrf.org>

Pamela S. Nadell and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Conservative Judaism; Kaplan, Mordecai Menahem; Orthodox Judaism; Reform Judaism; Satmar Hasidism; Young Israel.

References

- Alpert, Rebecca T., and Jacob J. Staub. Exploring Judaism: A Reconstructionist Approach. Elkins Park, PA: Reconstructionist Press, 2000.
- Eisenstein, Ira. Reconstructing Judaism: An Autobiography. Elkins Park, PA: Reconstructionist Press, 1986.
- Kaplan, Mordecai M. Basic Values in Jewish Religion. New York: Reconstructionist Press, 1948.
- Kaplan, Mordecai M. Judaism as a Civilization. New York: Macmillan Company, 1934.
- Scult, Mel. Judaism Faces the Twentieth Century: A Biography of Mordecai Kaplan. Elkins Park, PA : Reconstructionist Press, 1993.

Reform Baptists (Russia)

The Reform Baptists emerged in 1961 as a major schism in the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians–

Baptists of Russia in what was then the Soviet Union. In 1960 the union, which represented Baptists and Pentecostals in the Soviet Union, had been forced by the Khrushchev government to issue a letter of instruction to its member congregations. The letter ordered the congregations to hold back on their evangelistic efforts. Some leaders in the union rejected the letter and saw it as indicative of an unacceptable intimacy between the union and the state.

In 1961 a group left the union and formed an Organizing Committee, officially organizing in 1965 as the Council of Churches of Evangelical Christians–Baptists, commonly referred to as Reform Baptists. They chose as their first president Gennadii K. Kryuchkov. He was soon arrested and served time in prison. He then disappeared into the underground. The secretary, Georgi P. Vins (1928–1998), served two prison terms before being allowed to come to the United States, which became his base of operations for the continued advocacy for Russian Christians.

The schism between the union and the Reform Baptists continues. Only in 1988 with the beginning of reforms under Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931) did the Reform Baptists get some relief. By the end of the year, all the Reform Baptists in prison were released and the church launched a new evangelism campaign. In 1989 the Reform Baptists held their first congress unmolested by the authorities, with delegates representing its 42,000 members. By 1993 they had some 50,000 members.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptists.

Reference

Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman Publishers, 1995.

Reform Judaism

In the 18th century, Jewish scholars, most notably Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), began to advocate an acculturation of traditional Jewish life to modern European life. This advocacy also coincided with the integration of many Jews, especially in Germany, into the emerging post-Enlightenment secular culture. That integration was encouraged by the changes brought to Europe by the Napoleonic conquests.

Portrait of Moses Mendelssohn, eighteenth-century Jewish philosopher and the founder of modern German Judaism. (Library of Congress)

In the 19th century, the dialogue with non-Jewish culture would contribute to the development of a new movement within the Jewish community to develop a liberal and even rationalistic form of Jewish existence. Taking the lead would be German-speaking Jews in Central Europe and North America. The reforms began with the introduction of organ music, sermons delivered in German, and prayers in German rather than Hebrew. What began as simply an attempt to make the synagogue more appealing to “modern” Jews led to a new way of viewing Judaism. In Germany, the lead was taken by Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), who was chief rabbi of Breslau. Geiger argued that Judaism was always in a state of change and that God might demand at one time what at another time was inappropriate. Given the changes of the past, the rabbis of the present have leave to make changes as demanded by the times.

In the 1820s, younger members of a synagogue in Charleston, South Carolina, one of the early Jewish worship centers in the United States, also sought to implement reforms. When the congregation refused, some members left to found the Reformed Society of Israelites. However, Reform Judaism really developed in the United States in the last half of the century. Isaac Mayer Wise (1819–1900) emerged as Geiger’s American counterpart, and in America the program of Reform led to the creation of a set of structures to embody the movement’s ideals—the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (1873; today the Union for Reform Judaism), Hebrew Union College (1875), and the Central Conference of American Rabbis (1889). Cincinnati, Ohio, became the center of Reform Jewish life. (A Reform synagogue was opened in Canada, but until the last half of the 20th century the movement did not take hold there.)

The Reform movement’s challenge to traditional Judaism was qualitatively different from Jewish movements during the previous millennium. It questioned the necessity of a host of practices that had been considered normative for Jewish religious life. Kosher food practices were discarded, as was peculiar dress. All laws from the Jewish Bible and the Talmud (later writings of the rabbis that developed Jewish law) were examined in the light of modern needs and discarded if judged nonessential. Reform Jews were distinct from non-practicing traditional Jews in that they did not simply ignore the law but argued that in following the Reform path, one could be a complete religious Jew. This idea directly challenged traditional Judaism and the authority of traditional rabbis.

As the movement developed, most, but not all, Reform Jewish leaders initially opposed Zionism, although this opposition was thoroughly reversed after World War II. Reform Judaism has broken down the barriers between men and women in the synagogue, recognized Jewish lineage through both the father and the mother (whereas traditional Judaism is matrilineal), expressed a willingness to accept converts to the faith, and most recently accepted gay and lesbian Jews into the rabbinate.

The Reform movement spread to Jewish communities worldwide through the 20th century, moving in the 1930s to the Jewish community in Palestine. After several unsuccessful starts, Liberal Judaism in Israel experienced a new beginning in 1958, when the Harel Synagogue opened in Jerusalem. As other synagogues opened, they associated together as the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (incorporated in 1971), and their leadership formed the Council of Progressive Rabbis. The Israeli movement has differed from American Reform Jews in its retention of various Orthodox practices in recognition of their important role in Israeli life.

In Israel, Orthodox Jews challenged the status of Reform (and Conservative) Jews, and moves were made to prevent their spread and the construction of Reform synagogues. Many Orthodox Jewish rabbis consider Reform Judaism as a separate religion. As a result, marriages performed in Israel by Reform rabbis (and any non-Orthodox rabbis) are still not recognized by the civil authorities, and Reform couples must undergo a second wedding service to meet legal demands. The lack of official recognition has had an impact on the movement’s perceived lack of authenticity, has altered its relationship to the Israeli government, and has led many to treat it much like one of the various non-Jewish religious communities in Israel.

The Reform movement globally is represented by the World Union for Progressive Judaism. Approximately two-thirds of the world’s 1.5 million Reform and Progressive Jews reside in the United States. Other important Reform organizations include the Union for Reform Judaism and the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, which shares headquarters with the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

World Union for Progressive Judaism, International Headquarters
13 King David St.
Jerusalem, 94101
Israel
<http://wupj.org/>

World Union for Progressive Judaism, North American Headquarters
633 Third Ave.

New York, NY 10017-6778

<http://wupj.org/>

Pamela S. Nadell and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Conservative Judaism; Orthodox Judaism; Zionism.

References

- An Intimate Portrait of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations—A Centennial Documentary.* Cincinnati, OH: American Jewish Archives, 1973.
- Kaplan, Dana Evan. American Reform Judaism: An Introduction. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2003.
- Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1995.
- Plaut, W. Gunther. The Rise of Reform Judaism. New York: World Union for Progressive Judaism, 1963.
- Tabory, Ephraim. Progressive Judaism in Israel: Progress and Prospects. New York: American Jewish Committee, 1998.
- Warshofsky, Mark. Jewish Living: A Guide to Contemporary Reform Practice. New York: Union of Reform Judaism Press, 2000.

Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia

The Reformed phase of the Protestant Reformation reached Slovakia in the 16th century and found some immediate support from people already affected by the reforms attempted by Jan Hus (ca. 1373–1415) a century earlier. By 1564 enough congregations had been formed to designate four presbyteries. After the Hungarian takeover of the region, the presbyteries were incorporated into the Reformed Church of Hungary.

Although Hungary was primarily a Roman Catholic country, there were powerful Protestant royalty, especially among the Transylvanian princes, who used their influence to protect the Reformed faith. Repression in the mid-17th century led to what became known as the “Bloody Tribunal” at Bratislava in 1673. Pastors who refused to realign with the Roman Catholic Church were forced into exile, and a few were even sold into slavery. The repression was not relaxed until the Edict of Toleration in 1781, and Protestants were finally granted basic civil rights in 1791.

The church tended to be Hungarian in leadership, and especially after the country’s constitutional changes enacted in 1881, Slovak cultural peculiarities were largely eliminated from church life. Following World War I and the separation of Czechoslovakia from the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the Reformed Church of Slovakia was set apart as an independent body. It originally included some 235,000 members, approximately 20,000 of whom lived in nearby Ukraine. The next decades were filled with tensions, as the Hungarian minority objected to the changes in church life introduced by the new Slovak leaders.

World War II brought additional changes. During the Nazi regime, the church was once again merged into the Reformed Church of Hungary, though its independence was re-established soon after the war ended. The Ukrainian members were lost as the Ukraine was integrated into the Soviet Union. Then in 1951, the church adopted a new constitution. The synod was named the highest legislative body in the church, and a synodal council was organized as the synod’s executive arm. Further changes came in 1993 when Slovakia was separated from what is now the Czech Republic.

The Reformed Christian Church of Slovakia has approximately 120,000 members in more than 325 congregations. It supports the Theological Seminary located at Komárno. A Hungarian-speaking minority remains an important component of the church’s life. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the International Conference of Reformed Churches.

Reformed Christian Church of Slovakia
Jókaiho 34
94 501 Komárno
Slovakia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: International Conference of Reformed Churches; Reformed Church of Hungary; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Capek, D., ed. Fellowship of Service: Life and Work of Protestant Churches in Czechoslovakia. Prague: Ecumenical Council of Churches, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia

In the 16th century, the Reformed Church spread throughout Hungary and Hungarian-speaking converts formed the Reformed Church of Hungary. In 1920, as a result of settlements following World War I and the breakup of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, a section in the southern portion of the empire adjacent to Serbia was transferred to Serbian control. In 1933, those members of the Reformed Church who found themselves in a new country formed the Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia.

The new church also included several German-speaking Reformed congregations that had originated in the 18th century among people who had moved into the area from Germany. The Germans were forced out of the area following World War II. Atrocities committed by occupying German troops had made people of German background unwelcome in the new nation of Yugoslavia that was being formed.

The surviving church suffered suppression under the Marxist regime during the generation after World War II, and many members immigrated to Hungary. However, the church continued into the post-Marxist era. It experienced a major loss when Croatia separated from Yugoslavia as an independent country and the members residing there organized separately in 1993 as the Reformed Christian Church in Croatia.

The church has a Reformed theological stance, having adopted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Helvetic Confession as doctrinal standards. It has a presbyterial organization, with a synod as its highest legislative body. Worship is primarily in Hungarian and Czech. In 2002 the church reported approximately 17,000 members in 19 congregations, but it has been losing Hungarian-speaking members, as many have left the country seeking a more hospitable environment. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, World Council of Churches, and the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Serbia and Montenegro.

Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia

Ul. Bratstva 26

YU-24, 323 Feketic

Yugoslavia

<http://www.netministries.org/see/churches.exe/ch01797>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church in America

The Reformed Church in America is the primary bearer of the Dutch Reformed Christian tradition in the United States. The church traces its origin to the establishment of a colony on the eastern coast of North America at the beginning of the 17th century on Manhattan Island, today the heart of New York City. The first congregation was established in 1628 by Reverend Jonas Michaelius (1577–ca. 1633). Through the next century, the church spread through the Hudson River valley and then into the colony of New Jersey. Its growth was somewhat blunted by the British takeover of New Amsterdam (New York) in 1664, but Dutch migration to the colonies continued. As church members moved westward, the church established congregations in different parts of the country, though the strength remained in the East. Queens College (now Rutgers University) was established to provide college and theological training.

As the colonies' break with England became a possibility, in 1770 John Livingston (1746–1825), who had been in Holland completing his education, arrived back in New York with a plan of union for the scattered Reformed congregations. It was not until 1792 that a constitution was adopted. In 1819 the church incorporated under the name Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. It followed the beliefs and practices of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (now the Protestant Church in the Netherlands).

The church had a spurt of growth in the middle of the 19th century, when a new wave of immigration from Holland brought many Dutch settlers to Michigan, Iowa, and neighboring states as far west as South Dakota. A few congregations were founded in Canada. As it Americanized, the church adopted its present name in 1867. Through the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the church developed an extensive missionary program. It continues to sponsor work in Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, the Philippines, Venezuela, Ecuador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and India. The church sponsored the Arabic Mission, founded in the 1880s by Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), which was dedicated to spreading Christianity in the Muslim lands of the Middle East. The church continues to support the small congregations and social institutions the mission initiated in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Oman.

The church's headquarters are located in New York, in a building that also houses the offices of the National Council of Churches in the U.S.A. and a variety of organizations representing the various concerns of the more ecumenically minded churches in the United States. It is organized presbyterially. In 1999 it reported 299,000 members in the United States and 6,500 members in Canada. The highest legislative body is the annual general assembly. Its decisions are implemented by a 62-member executive committee. The church is divided into eight regional synods and further divided into two classes, or presbyteries. The church supports three colleges and two seminaries. The first women were admitted to the ordained ministry in the church in 1981. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Reformed Churches in America
247 Riverside Dr.
New York, NY 10015
<http://www.rca.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Protestant Church in the Netherlands; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches; Zwemer, Samuel Marinus.

References

- Hart, D. G., and Mark Noll. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999.
- Hood, F. J. Reformed America. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1980.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van Hoeven, J. W., ed. Piety and Patriotism: Bicentennial Studies of the Reformed Church in America. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1976.

Reformed Church in Romania

In the middle of the 16th century the ideas of John Calvin (1509–1564) were introduced into Transylvania (then connected with Hungary) and found their greatest acceptance among the Hungarian-speaking population, most of whom were formerly adherents of the Roman Catholic Church. Within a short time, as Calvin's perspective spread, a large number of Catholic monasteries would disappear.

Around 1530 Protestant preachers (both Calvinist and Lutheran) were active in the area of Satmar, Transylvania, where they operated under the protection of a powerful Romanian nobleman, Gaspar Dragfl. Later, Calvinism spread in the neighboring districts. By 1566 it had spread to Oradea and throughout the northern half of Transylvania. The synods of Abrud (1545),

A Romanian Reformed church in Sibiu, Romania.
(Constantin Sava/Dreamstime.com)

Debrecen (1567), Oradea (1567), and Satu Mare (1646) were held in order to determine the organization of mission and of religious life. Catholicism was a shadow of its former self in the region, with many deserted churches and a shortage of priests; indeed, no Catholic priests remained in the district by 1598. By 1609 the Catholic cathedral in Oradea, though not yet destroyed, no longer held the altar with the relics of Saint Ladislav (1040–1095). The cathedral was finally pulled down in 1618, and the stones were used to rebuild the city. At the same time, the statues of the canonized kings were melted, and the bronze was used for casting cannons.

The Calvinists separated completely from the Lutherans in 1564, and two subsequent synods in 1564 and 1567 set the organizational foundations for the Reformed Church in Transylvania. The church accepted the Second Helvetic Confession as its doctrinal standard at the synod in 1567. Somewhat of an anomaly in the Reformed tradition, the leaders retained the title of bishop, and the church's primary organizational units are termed dioceses. The Diet of Turda (1564) recognized the Calvinist church, and the Catholic monks and priests were banished from the areas inhabited by the Magyars. Protestantism became dominant in the region, and the conflict between Protestants and Catholics continued as the Protestant princes supported the conversion of the remaining Catholic element of the population to the new faith, sometimes even with the help of the military.

The Diet of 1572 slowed down the spread of the Reformed movement by granting freedom of expression to the Catholic Church. Under these circumstances, Catholicism survived and regained momentum in areas like Ciuc, Sfântu Gheorghe, Odorheiu, and Trei Scaune. During Michael the Brave's (Michael II Apafi, r. 1690–1697) short regime in Transylvania, attempts were made to consolidate the traditional churches. He restored the Orthodox bishop to his former rights, but this measure was ephemeral. Then, as soon as Transylvania became an archduchy under Austrian domination, Catholicism resumed its missionary activity. In 1691 the Leopoldine Diploma officially recognized and strengthened the rights of the Catholic Church. The Calvinists were obliged to return several places of worship to the Catholics, Catholic schools were re-established, and some landed properties of the former monasteries were restored. In 1697 the king of Austria, Leopold I (1640–1705, r. 1658–1705), appointed a Catholic bishop for Transylvania, but due to Calvinist opposition, he would not be installed until 1716.

As Transylvania was under foreign dominion, churches in this territory were subject to the general regulations concerning denominations. The Geley Canons, instituted in 1646, included the main rules of the Reformed Church and was in effect until 1949, when the new statutes of the Calvinist church were approved. The unification of Transylvania with Romania after World War I brought about several changes in the organization of the Reformed Church—most important, the separation of the work in Romania from the Reformed Church of Hungary. Dioceses, though disproportionate with respect to each other (as the Diocese of Cluj has almost twice as many members as the Diocese of Oradea), are organized in a similar manner and are autonomous. Each diocese is led by a general assembly (made up of 50 percent priests and 50 percent laypeople) and a consistory that includes the bishop, the primcurator, the church notary, the mission advisor, and the councilors.

The present organization retains the tradition of parish autonomy instituted by the Diet of Turda in 1564, in which the priest must be appointed by the believers of the parish. The Calvinist believers are organized in parishes, which are linked in districts under an archpriest for administrative reasons. The districts are included in the two dioceses (Oradea and Cluj).

The Reformed Church is found throughout Romania's most widely spread denominations. In 1930, 3.9 percent of the population declared themselves to be Calvinists (710,706 believers). At the end of the 1990s, the church reported 802,454 members. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Reformed Church in Romania

Diocese of Cluj
Str. C. Bratianu Nr. 51
Transylvanian District
3400 Cluj
Romania

Reformed Church in Romania

Diocese of Oradea
Str. Craiovei I Nagyvarad
3700 Oradea
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

See also: Calvin, John; Reformed Church of Hungary; Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church in Zambia

The Reformed Church in Zambia originated in the preaching of a 19th-century Native evangelist among the Ngoni people who lived in what is now eastern Zambia near the present-day city of Chipata. Chief Mpezeni of the Ngoni (ca. 1830–1900) was impressed and invited missionaries into his territory. Thus, in 1899 representatives from the Dutch Reformed Church (NKG), based in South Africa, arrived and founded their first mission. After a generation of activity, in 1929 the first Zambian national, Justo Mwale, was ordained.

In 1943 the mission was reorganized as the African Reformed Church, but white missionaries from South Africa continued to control the work. It was not until 1961 that a Zambian was elected as moderator. Zambia became an independent country in 1964, and two years later the African Reformed Church became independent. The church assumed its present name in 1968.

In the 1980s, as the policy of apartheid became an international issue and the Dutch Reformed Church identified itself with that policy, the Zambian church called the relationship to its parent body into question. In 1989 it threatened to sever ties to South Africa unless the church rejected apartheid. That did not occur, and in 1991 the Reformed Church of Zambia suspended all relationships with the Dutch Reformed Church.

In the mid-1990s the Reformed Church in Zambia reported 250,000 members in 131 congregations. The church is headed by a general synod that meets quadrennially and two regional synods, each of which meet biennially. The seminary at Lusaka is named for Justo Mwale. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches and both the Reformed Ecumenical Council and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Reformed Church in Zambia
Synod Office
Box 550100

Katete
Zambia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dutch Reformed Church; Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church in Zimbabwe

The Reformed Church in Zimbabwe began in 1891, when Andrew A. Louw (1862–1956), a missionary with the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa, assisted by several African workers, established an initial missionary station in the land traditionally inhabited by the Shona people. In the next century, work was extended to the Nyanja people and most recently among the Tonga.

Today, as an independent body, the 80,000-member church is organized with a mixed congregational and presbyterian polity. The synod is the highest legislative structure. The church recognizes the traditional Reformed doctrinal statements in the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of the Synod of Dort. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches, and it supports Murray Theological College.

Reformed Church in Zimbabwe
PO Box 670
62 Hughe St.
Masvingo
Zimbabwe

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dutch Reformed Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine

The Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine (a section of France bordering Germany) shares much of the history of the Reformed Church of France. As in the rest of France, the Protestant Reformed movement spread through Alsace and Lorraine in the 16th century, endured persecution in the decades prior to the Edict of Nantes (1598), and enjoyed toleration until Louis XIV (r. 1643–1715) revoked the edict in 1685. The church was almost destroyed by the migration of its members or their conversion to the Roman Catholic Church during the 18th century. After the French Revolution and Napoleon's rise to power, the Reformed Church was again allowed to operate openly, though Napoleonic restrictions limited church life, including the development of a representative national organization.

The Napoleonic structure regulating church life in France stayed in place until separation of church and state was adopted in 1906. However, by that time Alsace and Lorraine had been lost to France as a result of the Franco-Prussian War. They were returned to France at the end of World War II. Once back in relation to the French government, the churches of the region chose to retain the relationship they had had under the Napoleonic regulations. The church also decided to stay out of the merger that created the Reformed Church of France in 1938.

Although it maintains a close working relationship with the French Reformed Church, the Reformed Church in Alsace and Lorraine is administratively separate. It is represented in the National Assembly of the Reformed Church of France and has a close working relationship with the (Lutheran) Church of the Augsburg Confession in Alsace and Lorraine, the two churches sharing the same headquarters building in Strasbourg.

The Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine has a membership of approximately 33,000. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Protestant Federation of France.

Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine
1 quai St. Thomas
F-67081 Strassbourg Cédex
France

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of the Augsburg Confession of Alsace and Lorraine; Reformed Church of France; World Council of Churches.

References

- Annuaire de la France Protestante*. Paris: Fédération Protestante de France, issued annually.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria

The Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria was formed in 1973 as the Church of Christ in Nigeria by former members of the Christian Reformed Church in Nigeria ("Reformed" was added to the name in 1993). The majority of people originally constituting the new church were Kuteb people, but in succeeding years people from several other neighboring groups have affiliated.

There being little of a doctrinal element in the church's split with the Christian Reformed Church, the new church continued the parent body's commitments to the basic Reformed statements of faith, including the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of Dort. It also continued a Reformed polity in its organization. Congregations are organized into classes, and the 10 classes constitute the synod.

The church has experienced several decades of rapid growth and now reports 277,000 members in its 41 churches. It is a member of the Reformed Ecumenical Council, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, and the World Council of Churches.

Reformed Church of Christ in Nigeria
PO Box 42
Lupwe Road n 2 ussa, Takum
Taraba State
Nigeria

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Reformed Ecumenical Council; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church of France

The Reformed Church of France traces its origin to the spread of the Calvinist phase of the Protestant Reformation in France in the 1540s. Best estimates set the adherents of reform at approximately 10 percent of the population by the time of the church's first national assembly in 1559. Representatives at that assembly established the Gallican Confession as the doctrinal standard. Through the rest of the century, the Reformers experienced periods of persecution, highlighted by the Saint Bartholomew's Day Massacre in 1572.

Finally, in 1598, via the Edict of Nantes, the French government granted religious toleration. Then in 1685, Louis XIV (1638–1715) revoked the Edict of Nantes and asserted his right as ruler to name the religion of the people and demand uniformity. As a result, many Protestants (known as Huguenots) fled the country, and many others joined the Roman Catholic Church.

However, the Reformation survived in France as an underground movement. In 1789 King Louis XVI (r. 1774–1792) recognized its existence by allowing Protestants to register their births, marriages, and deaths apart from the Roman Catholic Church. The church was finally able to come out of hiding following the French Revolution. Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821) established a system that recognized both Lutheran and Reformed churches and governed their existence in France. Although not fully free, they were able to operate openly. In 1820, the Reformed Church manifested its openness to the growing world missionary movement by sponsoring a new missionary organization, the Paris Mission, which gradually established work in most French colonies (now overseas departments) around the world.

In 1906 the French government adopted a system of separation of church and state. Although churches no longer received government financial support, they were now free to operate as corporate entities and grow. Two new Reformed churches emerged, one more liberal and one more conservative. The more liberal church became intimately involved with the various ecumenical efforts that were leading to the formation of the World Council of Churches. In 1938 these two branches of Reformed life, along with the French Methodists and some Free churches, merged to create the present-day Reformed Church of France. A new Declaration of Faith was promulgated at this time.

The Reformed Church has congregations across France, though it is weakest in one part of eastern France, where Lutheranism has dominated. Also, following World War I, when France recovered Alsace and Lorraine, the Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine chose to remain corporately separate though in close communion with the Reformed Church of France.

The Reformed Church of France reports approximately 182,000 members in a population of 58 million. It is a member of the World Council of Churches and the Protestant Federation of France.

Reformed Church of France
47, rue de Clichy
F-75311 Paris
France

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheranism; Paris Mission; Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Annuaire de la France Protestante*. Paris: Fédération Protestante de France, issued annually.
- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Leonard, E. G. A History of Protestantism. Trans. by M. H. Joyce. London: Nelson, 1965.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Church of Hungary

It did not take long for the Reformation to spread from Germany and Switzerland to Hungary in the 16th century. The first wave was Lutheran, but a second wave of Reformed teachings also took hold, especially in Transylvania. During the 17th century authorities of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the Hapsburg Empire attempted various measures to repress Reformed congregations. These efforts culminated in what became known as the Bloody Tribunal, held at Bratislava in 1673. Pastors who refused to return to the Roman Catholic Church were banished, imprisoned, or in some cases sold as galley slaves. Protestants in the region did not receive toleration until 1791, although the church survived in spite of the persecution. A presbyterian system of church order was developed, and the office of bishop was retained as an administrative position.

Through the 19th century, Hungary was much larger than it is today. After World War I and again after World War II, significant segments of Hungary were separated and incorporated into neighboring states. Transylvania, for example, was transferred to Romania. As these lands were separated, Reformed churches in those lands were also separated from the parent body.

Following World War II, Hungary came under a Marxist regime that had an anti-religious bias. Although officially proclaiming religious freedom, the government imposed tight controls on religious organizations and confiscated much church property. The church survived until the end of Communist rule in 1989. Since that time, religious freedom has returned. The church has experienced a new burst of growth and has received back some of the property it had lost.

In the midst of its rebuilding, the Reformed Church of Hungary attempted in the 1990s to re-establish contact with Hungarian-speaking Reformed churches in other countries. In 1995 it hosted a consultative synod of Hungarian-speaking churches. Such churches can now be found in the Czech Republic, Slovakia, the Ukraine, Romania, Serbia, and Croatia. There are also Reformed churches of Hungarian heritage in the United States and several South American countries, although for the most part these abandoned the Hungarian language in the 20th century.

In the late 1990s the church reported 1.6 million members in 1,100 churches. It is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches. It oversees three theological schools.

Reformed Church of Hungary

PO Box 5

Abonyi-u 21

H-Budapest 1146

Hungary

<http://www.reformatus.hu/> (in Hungarian)

<http://www.reformatus.hu/english/english.htm> (in English)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds.

The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.

Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN)

See Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated)

The Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Liberated) (Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland [Vrijgemaakt]) has its origins in the separation of a number of ministers and members from the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN) (now an integral part of the Protestant Church in the Netherlands). Several professors, most notably Drs. Klass Schilder (1890–1952) and S. Greydanus, both of the Theological University of Kampen, expressed misgivings about the views associated with Abraham Kuyper (1837–1920), the founding father of the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands. They rejected his teachings on common grace, the nature of the soul, the covenant of grace, rebirth, and baptism, among others. The 1944 General Synod condemned Schilder and his associates. Some 77,000 Reformed believers left the mother church and founded a new one, with the same name, adding the word “liberated” for postal reasons.

The Liberated Churches, as they are also known, consider themselves to be the real continuation of the churches grounded in earlier movements of 1832 (the Separation movement) and 1886 (Dutch Nonconformism). As the 21st century begins, the denomination includes some 124,000 believers, with 260 parishes and 290 ministers. It has its own university in Kampen (Broederweg) and is active in foreign missions. It is a member of the International Conference of Reformed Churches and also has particular affiliations with the Free Reformed Churches of Australia, the Presbyterian Church of Eastern Australia, the Canadian and American Reformed Churches, the Free Reformed Churches of the Philippines, Eglise Réformée Évangélique, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Ireland, Gereja Gereja Reformasi di Indonesia N.T.T., the Korean Presbyterian Church, the Free Church of Scotland, the Reformed Church in the United States, Eglise Réformée Confessante au Zaïre, and Die vrije Gereformeerde Kerk in Suid-Afrika.

In the 1960s, the Liberated Churches experienced a serious problem. Some ministers wanted to establish formal communications with the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (GKN), for which they were condemned by the synod. Around 20 percent of the members and 30 percent of the ministers subsequently left the church. First they gathered in what were termed Home-Communities, and then in 1979 they became the Netherlands Reformed Churches.

Today the church has many internal problems, including the discussions about the arrangement of the Sunday services, the use of the new songbook of the churches, the new form of the wedding service, the Sunday's rest, and yes or no to cooperation with the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands.

Reformed Churches in the Netherlands

(Liberated)

Burgmeester Vos de Waelstraat 2
8011 AT Zwolle
The Netherlands
<http://www.gkv.nl/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: International Conference of Reformed Churches; Netherlands Reformed Churches; Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

References

de Roon, L. H., ed. Waar zijn wij en waar gaan wij heen? Kroniek van een verandering in de Gere- formeerde Kerken (vrijgemaakt). Rotterdam, 1993.

Deddens, D., and M. te Velde. Vrijmaking-wederkeer. Vijftig jaar vrijmaking in beeld gebracht 1944–1994. Barneveld, 1994.

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.

Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij Kok, 2000.

Reformed Denomination

The Reformed Denomination is a collective of small networks of congregations and many individual local congregations that make up the most conservative wing of Reformed Protestantism in the Netherlands. They are found in the so-called Bible Belt of the Netherlands—Zeeland, the isles of South Holland, along the great Dutch rivers and the Veluwe hills—and as the 21st century begins they count some 250,000 believers. The approximately 50 local congregations are the result of various schisms due to differences in belief, problems with ministers, and other organizational concerns.

The perspective of the Reformed Denomination is also found in the right wing of the Netherlands Reformed Church (now part of the Protestant Church of the Netherlands) (the Reformed Unity/de Gereformeerde Bond), the Reformed Congregations (Gereformeerde Gemeenten), the Reformed Congregations in the Netherlands (Gereformeerde Gemeenten in Nederland), the Old Reformed Churches (Oud Gereformeerde Gemeenten), the Old Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (Oud Gereformeerde Gemeenten in Nederland), and a small part of the Christian Reformed Churches in the Netherlands (De Christelijk Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland). The local churches, most originating in the late 19th century, have different names. Believers support their own political party, the Political Reformed Party (Staatkundig Gereformeerde Partij, SGP), which has three of the 150 seats in the Dutch Parliament.

The beliefs of the Reformed Denomination include (1) the doctrine of election, which states that before one's birth, God destined one's eternal salvation or damnation; (2) an emphasis on the need for personal conversion as a token of God's election; (3) a distinction between persons who are converted and those who are not; (4) a pietistic experience of God, with a strictly personal experience being the result of the personal conversion; (5) the popularity of the theologians of the 17th and 18th centuries, who emphasized the analysis of the soul and the essentials of truth belief; (6) the recognition that humans are unable to do anything to be saved; (7) resignation to the power of God's providence in the life of the believer; (8) the assertion that the holy scriptures are inspired by God; (9) the singing of the psalms in the rhymed version of Datheen and those of 1773; and (10) confidence that the Holy Spirit uses the Word of God in one's heart. Generally, the Bible is read in the Dutch translation of 1637.

The Reformed Denomination is served by several periodicals, including Reformatorsch Dagblad (newspaper), Standvastig, and Terdege.

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

References

- Brienen, T., et al. De Nadere Reformatie. Beschrijving van haar voornaamste vertegenwoordigers. s'Gravenhage: Uitgeverij Boekensentrum B.V., 1986.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.
- Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Wegwijs in religieus en levensbeschouwelijk Nederland. Handboek religies, kerken, stromingen en organisaties. Kampen: Uitgeverij, 2000.
- Jonkers, J. B. G. De gereformeerden. Kampen: Kok, 1997.
- Meiden, A. van der. De zwarte kousen kerken. Bevindelijk heroverwogen portret. Utrecht: Amboboeken, 1993.
- Zwemer, J. P. De bevindelijk gereformeerden. Kampen: Kok, 2001.

Reformed Ecumenical Council

The Reformed Ecumenical Council (REC) was founded in 1946 as the Reformed Ecumenical Synod. It adopted its present name in 1988. It includes in its membership a number of more conservative Reformed bodies, the most prominent being the Christian Reformed Church in North America. Many of the member churches were formed as missions of the Christian Reformed Church or in relation to the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands, the Dutch counterpart of the Christian Reformed Church.

Membership in the REC is based on doctrinal agreement, a shared confession of faith being a basis of the union. The member churches seek to present a unified witness to the world of the historic Christian faith. Member churches may adopt any one of the several historical statements of the Reformed faith as a basis of their doctrinal confession.

The churches of the REC meet in an assembly quadrennially. A permanent secretariat and an interim committee carry on the affairs of the REC between assemblies. The program is focused in theology, mission services, and youth activities.

The REC has 42 member churches from 26 countries (2009). As this encyclopedia goes to press, the REC has announced its intention to merge with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the resulting organization to be known as the World Communion of Reformed Churches. The two bodies have made significant progress on a constitution and resolved most of the issues between them, and could merge as early as 2010. The Council has, in the past, provided a conservative alternative to the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Currently, only one of its member churches, the Greek Evangelical Church, is also a member of the World Alliance and/or the World Council of Churches.

Reformed Ecumenical Council
2050 Breton Rd., SE, Ste. 102
Grand Rapids, MI 49546-5547
<http://www.recweb.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Reformed Church in North America; Greek Evangelical Church; Reformed Churches in the Netherlands; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Communion of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Handbook*. Grand Rapids, MI: Reformed Ecumenical Synod, 1997.

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea

The Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea (Iglesia Reformada de Guinea Equatorial) can be traced to the work initiated by American Presbyterian missionaries on Corisco, an island off the coast of Guinea, in 1840. In 1865 the work moved to the mainland, which was then under the control of the French. It moved quickly to develop indigenous leadership, ordaining the first native minister in 1870. In 1901 Spain took control of the mainland territory and periodically generally acted so as to suppress Protestant work.

In the period immediately after the founding of the Spanish Republic (1932–1936), the government's activity became less suppressive. In 1933 the World Evangelical Crusade (WEC), an independent evangelical missionary agency, opened work among the Okak people. In 1952 all Protestant churches in the region were closed and pastors were stopped from any religious activity. In spite of the suppression, both the WEC and the Presbyterian work continued to grow. In 1969, the year after the country became an independent nation, the two churches merged to become the Evangelical Church.

Independence did little to relieve the Protestants' situation. Spanish rule was followed by dictatorial regimes, first under the leadership of Macias Nguema (r. 1968–1979) and then his nephew Obiang Nguema (r. 1979–). Meanwhile, beginning in 1970, the Primitive Methodist Church in Great Britain (now a constituent part of the Methodist Church of Great Britain) had built the largest Protestant following of the several churches active in Equatorial Guinea. Much of its strength was on the island of Fernando Pó (now called Bioko). In 1973 the Evangelical Church and the Methodist Church united to form the Reformed Church of Equatorial Guinea.

The merger turned out to be an ill-advised enterprise, as there was no clear understanding as to how the new church would function and what authority it would have over its respective member bodies. Through the 1990s, it came to be seen as a federation of churches that functioned loosely while the two churches worked on the issues that blocked their merger. In the meantime, the former Evangelical Church has assumed a new existence as the Presbyterian Reformed Church of Equatorial Guinea.

In the 1990s the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea reported 8,000 members in a country that is predominantly Roman Catholic. Its membership is drawn primarily from the Fang, Ntumu, and Okak peoples. The church is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the World Council of Churches.

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Equatorial Guinea
Apdo Postal 22y
Bata
Equatorial Guinea

J. Gordon Melton

See also: World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition

The Reformed and Presbyterian churches trace their common history to the thought and ministry of John Calvin (1509–1564) and the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century. Calvin assumed a leadership position among French-speaking Protestants following the publication of his systematic theology, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536), and then took control of the Protestant cause in the Canton of Geneva in Switzerland, first for two years (1536–1538) and then more permanently in 1541.

In the Institutes, Calvin proposed the Reformed theology and a presbyterian organization. Theologically, Calvin was close to Martin Luther (1483–1546), their primary disagreement being about the nature of Christ's presence in the Eucharistic sacrament. Luther's view, termed "consubstantiation," held that Christ is truly present in the substance of the elements. Calvin's view was that Christ is present in the sacrament both symbolically and by the spiritual power that is imparted to the faithful by their faith. This basic theological difference also gave the Reformed church a distinctive stance toward reform. Lutherans tended to discard only those parts of the traditional Western Christian practice that were found to be in opposition to the Bible. The Reformed churches tended to discard anything that was not actually biblical. This more radical approach had concrete implications, making most Reformed church buildings more austere than their Lutheran counterparts, for example.

As the Reformed movement spread to the British Isles, first to Scotland and then to England, the issue of church organization came to the fore. Those who followed Calvin's lead tended to emphasize the presbyterian polity, which called for leadership by elders (presbyters) rather than bishops. Thus they became designated as Presbyterian churches rather than as Reformed churches, as those in continental Europe were generally called. In the British (and American) context, arguments over questions of polity in the 17th century tended to split the churches of the Reformed theological tradition, and both the Congregationalists and Baptists, who accepted a congregational form of church governance, dissented from the Presbyterian consensus.

In the 19th century, Congregationalists and Presbyterians cooperated to a significant extent in their world mission enterprise, especially through the work of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions and the London Missionary Society, though in each case the Congregationalists emerged as the dominant force. In the 20th century, the Presbyterians and Congregationalists formed several international cooperative agencies, especially the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, which includes Reformed, Presbyterian, and Congregational church bodies and has its headquarters in the same building that houses the World Council of Churches.

The Reformed/Presbyterian tradition found definitional expression in a set of confessions issued through the 16th and 17th centuries, most important, the Gallican (1559), Belgic (1561), Second Helvetic (1566), and Westminster (1647–1648) confessions and the Heidelberg (1563) and Westminster (1647–1648) catechisms. These documents affirmed the Reformed emphasis on God's sovereignty, an important element of which is his work of electing his people to salvation. Implicit in this emphasis is a belief in predestination. This element of Reformed theology was challenged by Dutch theologian Jacob Arminius (1560–1609), whose critique led to the writing of the other widely accepted Reformed doctrinal text, the Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619), which affirmed the traditional doctrines related to predestination.

In the 20th century, the Reformed tradition was challenged by the new historical-critical approach to the Bible and the scientific critique of biblical literalism. The Presbyterians were among the major bodies split by the Fundamentalist-Modernist debates in the 1920s and 1930s, with the Modernists taking control of the larger Presbyterian churches, especially what is now known as the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). That church accepts the Confession of 1967, promulgated by one of its constituent bodies, and has tended to see the other confessions as relativized by their historical context. More conservative Reformed and Presbyterian churches accept the authority of the older creeds as a valid contemporary interpretation of biblical teachings.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; London Missionary Society; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bauswein, Jean-Jacques, and Lukas Vischner, eds. The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1999.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. 2 vols. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Cochrane, Arthur C., ed. The Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966.
- Hart, D. C., and Mark A. Noll. Dictionary of the Presbyterian and Reformed Tradition in America. Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 2005.
- Leith, John H. An Introduction to the Reformed Tradition. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press, 1977.
- Lucas, Sean Michael. On Being Presbyterian: Our Beliefs, Practices, and Stories. Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 2006.
- McKim, Donald K., ed. Encyclopedia of the Reformed Faith. Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press/Edinburgh: Saint Andrew Press, 1992.
- McKim, Donald K., ed. Introducing the Reformed Faith: Biblical Revelation, Christian Tradition, Contemporary Significance. Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 2001.
- Nichols, James Hastings. Corporate Worship in the Reformed Tradition. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1968.
- Sproul, R. C. What Is Reformed Theology? Understanding the Basics. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 2005.

Reiha-no-Hikari

Reiha-no-Hikari, a Japanese new religion, was founded by Hase Yoshio (1914–1984) in 1954 under the name Reiha-no-Hikari Sangyo Kai. Suffering from illness, Hase undertook a religious pilgrimage at the age of 24.

At Mount Goken in Kagawa Prefecture he heard the voice of Kami (the divine) and miraculously recovered. He continued the religious pilgrimage. In 1954 he received a revelation from Kami, telling him to become the messenger of Kami at the top of Mount Goken. It is believed that Hase is a messiah, born to save human beings through the divine power of reiha (spirit waves) sent from Kami through Hase's body.

Over the next few years Hase surrounded himself with a small group, of some 40 people, who had been saved by his spirit waves. He founded the Hase Sensei Sankokai (Master Hase Adoration Association). Three years later the group was incorporated, and in 1969 the headquarters was moved to its present location in Noda. March 7, the day the founder realized his relationship as a child of the great cosmic god, is commemorated annually with a festival. After his death in 1984, its members came to believe that Hase became an eternal wave of spiritual energy.

In response to their beliefs about their founder, Reiha-no-Hikari's members recite the prayer "Goshugojin-sam [Guardian God of Humanity: the founder], Nidai-sama [the second and current leader], please help us follow the path to the salvation of humankind" to receive reiha. That text is printed on the Gosintai Ofuda (Divine Emblem Plaque) that is installed in the altar in each member's home. Reiha-no-Hikari's main scriptures are the Gosho (Writings) and the Seikun (Oath Instructions), written by the founder.

The current leader of Reiha-no-Hikari is Hase Keiji (b. 1948), the founder's son. As the 21st century began, the group claimed approximately 825,636 members.

Reiha-no-Hikari
2683-1, Yamasaki
Noda-shi, Chiba Prefecture 278-0022
Japan
<http://www.rhk.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

Keishin Inaba

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions.

References

- Inoue, Nobutaka, et al., eds. Shinshûkyo Kyodan Jinbutsu Jiten. Tokyo: Kobundo, 1996.
- Watanabe, Masako, and Midori Igeta. "Healing in the New Religions: Charisma and 'Holy Water.'" Journal of the American Academy of Religion 72 (2004): 103–22.

Contemporary Papers on Japanese Religion, 2: New Religions, 1991. <http://www.kokugakuin.ac.jp/ijcc/wp/cpjr/newreligions/igeta.html>. Accessed January 10, 2002.

Reincarnation

Reincarnation denotes the passage of a spiritual or non-material soul or life-force from a human body to a new body—usually human but not necessarily so. Many terms are employed to represent this process, among them metempsychosis, metensomatosis, palingenesis, and transmigratio. Etymologically, reincarnation (re-, “again”; incarnare, “make flesh”), metensomatosis (meta- [in conjunction with verbs], “change”; soma, “body”), and palingenesis (palin-, “again”; genesis, “birth”) refer to the act of re-embodiment, taking a (new) body, or rebirth; transmigratio (trans-, “across,” “over,” “beyond”; migrare, “move” [from one place or condition to another]) and metempsychosis (meta-, “change”; psyche, “soul”) refer to the passage or change (from one body to another) by the soul. What distinguishes reincarnation from resurrection is the inhabiting of different bodies by the soul as opposed to the invigoration of the same body in the act of resurrection. More important, however, is the question of personal identity: Is the newly reincarnated entity the same or different from the previous entity? This question will be discussed along with other questions that are pertinent to this subject: What reincarnates? What are the vehicles for the reincarnating principle? Is the process immediate, or is there an intermediate existence between death and rebirth? Do actions in the previous life have consequences in the future life? What evidence is there that reincarnation is a provable fact?

The acceptance of the teaching of reincarnation, as either a certainty or a possibility, is found throughout the world. It is accepted among many non-literate and tribal cultures, the South Asian religions, and a number of ancient cultures, including the Greeks, and mentioned and even accepted in elements of the Abrahamic religions. The literature on the subject of reincarnation is extensive, with Joel Bjorling citing 1,612 selected titles in his Reincarnation: A Bibliography, published in 1996. Gananath Obeyesekere (Imagining Karma) provides informative accounts of different types of reincarnation, emphasizing the Amerindian, Greek, and Buddhist types as do Antonia Mills and Richard Slobodin, who edited the book Amerindian Rebirth. The importance of these works indicates that reincarnation is not localized, nor is it necessarily derived from one culture, one people, or one region of the world.

Reincarnation is usually premised on the assumption that the reincarnating element is a non-material entity, thereby establishing a fundamental dualistic stance in the makeup of the individual. This is discussed especially in Greek and Hindu sources, examples being Aristotle (De Anima II.1: “the body cannot be soul”) and Upadeasahasri 12 (“I am different from the body”). Since the soul is separate from the body, it cannot be destroyed. Plato states that the soul existed before birth and will exist after (Phaedo) and that human rebirth comes about for the purpose of discipline, which in turn purifies the soul (Phaedrus). This establishes the immortality of the soul, which is discussed in Plato’s Phaedrus. If immortality signifies no end, eternity signifies neither a beginning nor an end. Furthermore, eternity implies pre-existence, for in the Phaedo, the teaching of knowledge as recollection implies a previous time in which we learn what we later recollect. Eternity and immortality of the soul also are discussed in India. The reincarnating entity (atman) was “one alone, in the beginning” (Aitareya Upanishad 1.1.1). That is, the atman is one with Brahman, the Supreme entity (Chandogya Upanishad 3.14.1).

The one notable exception to the teaching that the soul reincarnates is Buddhism. According to the Buddhist teaching, the individual is made up only of mental and material aggregates. What in fact reincarnates is the conditioned consciousness process impelled by karma, the force that leads to results for all actions (mental, physical, verbal) previously performed.

A question that often arises is whether only human bodies are subject to reincarnation. In this regard there are differences of opinion. Indeed, even the terms above are sometimes associated with one or the other point of view. R. W. Lowrie (Life and Afterlife, 92–93), for instance, distinguishes transmigratio and reincarnation by asserting that transmigratio refers to the entrance of “the soul into an animal body instead of human” (93) whereas reincarnation (and metempsychosis, 92) limits the process to a human body. The view that the soul can inhabit animal bodies may be traced to Pythagoras in the West, as noted by the Greek historian and traveler Diodorus Siculus (first century BCE), who records Pythagoras’s notion of “the transmigration of the soul into every living thing” (The Library of History, 1.98). The teaching that a human can reincarnate as an animal or insect is abundantly clear in the Book of Manu, the Hindu law book, especially chapter 12, verses 54f., and also among the Amerindians. Other forms of reincarnation exist: cross-sex reincarnation and multiple simultaneous reincarnation (that is, reincarnating as several people at once), the former among the Amerindians such as the Inuit, Kwakiutl, and Hopi and the latter among the Haida, Tlingit, Gitksan, and Kwakiutl.

The teaching on the intermediate existence, the period between death and rebirth, is an important topic in Tibetan Buddhism. This is a later development, however, since the early Buddhist attitude was that of an instantaneous rebirth of an entity that was neither identical with nor unrelated to the dying person. Differing accounts appear in the later Buddhist schools and traditions, but the teachings on the bardo, or intermediate state, in the Bardo Thodol (“The Great Book of the Liberation through Understanding in the Intermediate State”; popularly known as the Book of the Dead) give extensive descriptions of the reincarnating consciousness or life stream impelled by karma that will lead to a rebirth in one of the five or six realms of worldly existence (human, divine or heavenly, titan, animal, hellish, or sometimes the world of the hungry ghosts) or, if one keeps the bodhisattva or savior Kuan-yin or the Buddha Amitabha in mind, the Pure Land or the Heaven of Delight (tushita). An important factor in determining the quality of the rebirth is karma. In the religions of South India, karma plays an important role in determining the rebirth of the individual. It is viewed as a force that connects intended actions (verbal, mental, and bodily) to their consequences. Karma is intimately connected with the cycle of existence (samsara). As early as the Upanishads (4.4.5), karma is viewed as exhibiting not only causal powers but also ethical qualities associated with the consequences of actions. It is in this context that the quality of the rebirth is based upon one’s previous actions. Whether this ethical element in reincarnation is limited to Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism is a matter of interpretation (on which, see Mills and Obeyesekere), but there is no doubt that these South Asian religions introduce individual salvation as a consequence of destroying any karmic activity. Karma, therefore, depending upon the quality of action, leads to a better or worse rebirth by commensurate actions. Paradoxically, certain actions, usually equivalent to those that make up a spiritual path (yoga or the Middle Path, for instance), will lead to the destruction of karma and any form of rebirth.

The one exception to the dependency on karma for a continuance of the transmigratory cycle is the teaching of the so-called Living Buddhas, that is, bodhisattvas or beings who achieve enlightenment, thereby allowing them to enter nirvana, but who, out of a sense of compassion, instead decide to be reborn in order to aid all sentient beings gain emancipation. This is a rebirth, therefore, that is not fueled by intended actions or karma but rather through the impulse of compassion.

Although the teaching of reincarnation in the West is viewed as an exotic teaching, it has gained in awareness through the efforts of the Theosophical Society and its various offshoots and successors. Theosophists were cognizant of the Greek, Kabbalistic, and Hindu teachings and so devised a teaching that became an integral part of Theosophical teaching from the 1880s on. One modification was advanced by Theosophists that contradicts the Hindu and Buddhist progressive nature of reincarnation. Based upon this teaching, no human can be reborn as an animal or as any being lower than human. This teaching may be based upon Allan Kardec’s Le Livre des Esprits, considering reincarnation to be a progressive improvement of the soul until it reaches perfection and purification, illustrated in Annie Besant’s “Reincarnation”: “the object of reincarnation is to train the animal-man until it becomes the perfect instrument of the Divine” (45).

A collateral teaching that was popularized, if not invented, by Theosophists is the notion of “collective karma.” Karma may therefore apply to families, castes, nations, and races as well. No clear reference on collective karma in the literature of South Asian religions exists, so it is most likely that this is a Theosophical innovation. The implication for such a teaching is that the type and quality of reincarnation are based at least in part on external factors, not simply on the actions of the previously existent being.

After all is said and done, is there evidence that suggests reincarnation is a fact? This is a hotly contested issue with evidence presented on both sides. Ducasse offers a series of arguments pro and con, with the strongest evidence based upon the assumption and proof that “the mind of a now living person is the same mind as that of a person whose body died some time before” (304). If the surviving component is neither body nor soul (that is, if the soul is regarded as neither physical nor mental) but rather “psychological,” then it is possible that dispositions might retain life on the analogy of a person in deep sleep or in a faint, or some form of mental activity (Ducasse 1961, 127–128). Explanations are conjectural, but what is more compelling is the evidence that is being collected that however the phenomena are explained, there is something to explain. The work of the late Professor Ian Stevenson of the University of Virginia has provided considerable evidence that reincarnation should be seriously investigated. His earlier books, Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation and Cases of the Reincarnation Type (4 vols.), as also his later work (Reincarnation and Biology, Children Who Remember Previous Lives: A Question of Reincarnation, and European Cases of the Reincarnation Type) collectively make up the most impressive evidence as also the publication Parapsychology: Research on Exceptional Experiences. For a general overview, the Division of Perceptual Studies (University of Virginia Health System) offers an overview of the investigations that have gone on over the past half-century.

James A. Santucci

See also: Besant, Annie; Bodhisattva; Theosophical Society (Adyar); Yoga.

References

- Aristotle, On the Soul. Trans. by J. A. Smith. <http://classics.mit.edu/Aristotle/soul.1.i.html>.
- Besant, Annie. Karma. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1895.
- Bjorling, Joel. Reincarnation: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, Inc., 1996.
- Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life after Death. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 1961.
- Henry, Jane, ed. Parapsychology: Research on Exceptional Experiences. London and New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Judge, W. Q. The Ocean of Theosophy. 1893; rpt.: Los Angeles: The Theosophy Company, 1987.
- Kardec, Allan. Le Livre des Esprits, translated as The Spirits' Book. Sao Paulo, Brazil: Lake-Livraria Allan Kardec Editora Ltda., 1972.
- Lowrie, R. W. Life and Afterlife. Dade City, FL: Island Press Publishers, 2002.
- Mills, Antonia, and Richard Slobodin, eds. Amerindian Rebirth: Reincarnation Belief among North American Indians and Inuit. Toronto and Buffalo: University of Toronto Press, 1994.
- Obeyesekere, Gananath. Imagining Karma: Ethical Transformation in Amerindian, Buddhist, and Greek Rebirth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Olivelle, Patrick. The Early Upanishads: Annotated Text and Translation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Plato. Phaedo. Trans. by Benjamin Jowett. <http://classics.mit.edu/Plato/phaedo.html>.
- Plato. Phaedrus. Trans. by Benjamin Jowett. <http://classics.mit.edu/Plato/phaedrus.html>.
- Sankarâchârya, Srî. Upadeasahasri: A Thousand Teachings. Trans. by Swâmi Jagadânanda. Mylapore, Madras: Sri Ramakrishna Math, 1961.
- Stevenson, Ian. Cases of the Reincarnation Type. 4 vols. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1975–1983.
- Stevenson, Ian. Children Who Remember Previous Lives: A Question of Reincarnation. Rev. ed. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2001.
- Stevenson, Ian. European Cases of the Reincarnation Type. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2003.
- Stevenson, Ian. Reincarnation and Biology. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1997.
- Stevenson, Ian. Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation. 2nd ed. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1974.

Reiyukai

Reiyukai (Society of the Friends of the Spirit), a Japanese lay organization, derived from the tradition of Nichiren Buddhism and was founded between 1919 and 1925 in Tokyo by Kakutaro Kubo (1890–1944) and his sister-in-law Kimi Kotani (1901–1971). It arose out of Kubo's sense of apocalypse, which originated from the social and intellectual transformation of Japan during the Taisho period (1912–1926), combined with his understanding of Nichiren Buddhism and finally accentuated by the Great Tokyo Earthquake of 1923.

Kubo had received instruction in the nationalistic ideas of Nichiren Buddhism, but he was more interested in formulating a religious way for the laity to respond to the crisis of modern society. Kubo saw the sociopolitical upheavals of his time as evidence of ancestral distress caused by the neglect of ancestor worship by the laity, who had entrusted it to the Buddhist clergy. Therefore, he formulated lay rites of ancestral worship. In Reiyukai, the rite for ancestral worship is the twice daily recital of Aokyokan, or the Blue Sutra, which is an abridged version of Lotus Sutra, the doctrine of Nichiren Buddhism. The rite also involves the practice of venerating the sokaimyo, a tablet in which the posthumous names of all the ancestors of the husband and the wife are inscribed and enshrined in the domestic altar.

Although Kubo provided the doctrinal foundation for this lay movement, it was the organizational skill and charismatic healing powers of Kimi Kotani that drew the initial followers into Reiyukai. She proselytized by combining faith healing with teachings that claimed to improve living conditions as well as instill self-esteem in her converts, who were initially the urban proletariat but later small business owners and the self-employed.

The proselytization activity in Reiyukai is called michibiki. The proselytizer is called the “guide parent” (michibiki no oya) and the convert is the “guide child” (michibiki no ko). This “parent-child” link of proselytization is the organizational principle of Reiyukai. Another notable feature of Reiyukai is the hoza, a kind of group counseling circle, which is also the smallest unit of organization, formed by these links of proselytization.

In 1945 Reiyukai was one of the fastest growing new religions in Japan, but it suffered several setbacks, including financial scandals involving Kimi Kotani and the secessions of several groups, such as Rissho Kosei-kai, now the second largest new religion in Japan, Myochikai, and others. These problems have led to a decline in its membership. In 1999, Reiyukai had a membership of about 2 million in Japan and centers in 17 foreign countries. Since Kotani's death in 1971, faith healing-related practices have declined considerably. The emphasis has shifted to social welfare programs, youth activities, and overseas missions in North and South America and Asia.

Reiyukai has three major religious centers: Shakaden, the Tokyo headquarters of Reiyukai, enshrining the statue of Shakyamuni Buddha; Mirokusan, the youth training center dedicated to the Future Buddha Maitreya; and Shichimenzan, where pilgrimages are undertaken during equinox days. Reiyukai advocates traditional ethics in familial relationships and in politics, and it supports conservative political parties and causes.

Reiyukai

1-7-8 Azabudai, Minato-ku

Tokyo 106-8644

Japan

<http://www.reiyukai-usa.org/> (United States)

<http://www.reiyukai.org/> (Canada)

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

See also: Nichiren; Rissho Kosei-kai.

References

Hardacre, Helen. Lay Buddhism in Contemporary

Japan: Reiyukai Kyodan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.

Kotani, Kimi. A Guide to Reiyukai. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1958, 1972.

Reiyukai: Awareness, Action and Development.

Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997.

Relics

Strictly speaking, relics are the material remains of holy persons, most notably their bones, which are preserved in a sacred context for religious purposes. More broadly, the term “relic” may refer to clothing or other objects closely associated with them, items they used in their daily life such as a writing instrument or ritual object, or items associated with a particularly important event. Relics appear to have been an element in a wide spectrum of religions, but have emerged as an especially important part of Buddhism and Roman Catholicism.

Relic of part of the skull of Saint John the Baptist, decorated with gold and semiprecious stones. The inscription shows that the work is Bulgarian. (Werner Forman/Art Resource, NY)

Buddhist Relics The Buddhist interest in relics began soon after the death of Gautama, the historical Buddha, in 480 BCE. His body was cremated, and the remaining ashes contained pieces of bone and teeth. At this point several people of royal status expressed their desire to have the Buddha’s remains. A Brahmin priest named Drona stepped forward and divided the relics into eight equal portions. These were sent to the eight rulers desirous of having them. Each of the rulers had a stupa built to house the relics. The stupas were located in the cities of Kapilavastu, Bodhgaya, Mrigadava, Jetavananatha, Pindadarama, Vaisali, Rajagriha, Kanyakubja, and Kushinagara. It was later discovered that Drona had secretly set aside a ninth set for himself, but these were stone. He retained the vase in which the relics had been originally stored. At a later date, King Ashoka (ca. 304–232 BCE) brought all the lands where the relics had been sent into his kingdom. He regathered the relics and redistributed them to a variety of places throughout southern Asia from Sri Lanka to China, though details on the process and locations are scant.

Ashoka's kingdom stretched from southern India to what is now Afghanistan. While he does not seem to have ever left his kingdom, he sent missionaries far and wide. His two children were responsible for the first conversions in Sri Lanka. Missionaries went as far as Mongolia, Vietnam, and the Mediterranean basin. In the case of Southeast Asia, they began the conversion of Myanmar, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam, and set the stage for stories tying places in those countries to the early history of Buddhism elsewhere.

At the time of Buddha's death and the initial distribution of the Buddha's relics and even of Ashoka's redistribution of them several centuries later, Buddhism had yet to become a literary faith. It was not until the first century BCE that the teachings of the Buddha began to be written down, and with them the stories of his life and adventures with his companions committed to paper. There would be a further gap between the move to documenting the Buddha's life and the first accounts of the emergence of items that claim to be relics of the Buddha. Thus, the locations of where Ashoka distributed the relics he possessed remains unknown, and the obscurity that covers the fate of the relics provides fertile ground for a variety of stories of relics lost and found and carried by various personages to different parts of Asia. And items presented as relics are usually beyond the ability of modern researchers directly to study and evaluate; however, devout Buddhists believe them to be exactly what they claim to be, notwithstanding the obscurity of their origin and the gap between those items presently claimed to be genuine relics of the Buddha and the events reputed to have occurred immediately following his death and during the reign of Ashoka. Many Buddhists also believe that the relics had an ability to reproduce themselves.

For Buddhists, relics have primarily been those of the historical Buddha himself. Most of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of Mahayana Buddhism are believed to have had earthly lives (and their birthdays are celebrated), but those lives were lived in times and places difficult to document and the earthly bodies of the future bodhisattvas were never available to the Buddhist community. One notable exception to that lack of access concerns Manjushri. In the seventh century, the Korean monk Chajang spent a period of time at Wutai Shan, one of the Chinese mountains sacred to Buddhism. It is believed to be the home of Manjushri. According to the story, one day after chanting to Manjushri, Chajang was given a cryptic poem in a dream. Unable to understand the poem, he consulted a local monk who gave him several relics that he claimed to be those of Manjushri. A short time later, Chajang had a vision that informed him that the monk was in fact Manjushri. After his return to Korea, he built T'ongdo-sa Temple and placed the relics in a stupa behind the Great Hall, where they remain to this day.

As Vajrayana Buddhism developed, especially in Tibet, leadership was assumed by men assumed to be emanations of various Buddhas and bodhisattvas, who came to be described as Living Buddhas. Of these, the heads of the main branches of Tibetan Buddhism stand out. When they passed away, their relics also came to be venerated and would be installed in stupas in or near the temples over which they presided. The Potala Palace, in Lhasa, Tibet, for example, has eight stupa chapels that house the relics of a number of the Dalai Lamas.

Vajrayana practitioners also believe that when the body of a spiritually enlightened person is cremated, beautiful pearl-like crystals are often found alongside the unconsumed bone fragments among the ashes. These crystals are termed ringse, and Vajrayana Buddhists believe that those crystals manifest the person's inner purity and hold his or her living essence. In addition, they are thought to emit spiritual energy and even on rare occasions to multiply.

While almost all countries in which Buddhism maintains a significant presence have at least one relic of the Buddha, several countries have notable sets of relics.

Buddhism spread to Sri Lanka when Ashoka sent his son Mahinda to the island. After his conversion, the king donated land for the first Buddhist temple, the Mahavihara, at what was then the capital, Anuradhapura. Mahinda's sister Sanghamita then arrived with a cutting from the Bodhi tree, the fig tree under which Buddha was believed to have found enlightenment at Bodhgaya (India), which was planted at Anuradhapura.

Planted in 288 BCE, it is the oldest living human-planted tree in the world with a known planting date. Sri Lanka's Bodhi tree has been the ultimate source of all the many Bodhi tree leaves as well as the several existing Bodhi trees now found around the world, including the one presently at Bodhgaya, which replaced the original one that was destroyed in the second century BCE by a Hindu king.

Thuparama Dagabawhich, a stupa at Anuradhapura, houses what is said to be Buddha's alms bowl and his right collarbone. In Kandy, at the center of the island nation, one may visit the Buddha's tooth, now housed in a golden stupa, known as Malagawa Vihara (or Dalada Maligawa). In 1986, the president of Sri Lanka donated a true relic of the Buddha to the leader of the Japanese Buddhist group Agon Shu, for enshrinement in their temple near Kyoto.

The arrival of Buddha's relics in Myanmar is part of the legend of the famous Shwedagon Pagoda in Yangon. While archaeologists have dated the building of the monument to around the 10th century, possibly as early as the sixth century, many believers place its origins during the lifetime of Gautama Buddha. According to the story, two brothers, Taphussa and Bhalika, merchants from what is now Myanmar met with the Buddha, from whom they received eight of the Buddha's hairs to be enshrined in their homeland. The two brothers found the local ruler, King Okkalapa, and discovered Singuttara Hill, now in the midst of Yangon, where relics of other Buddhas preceding Gautama Buddha had already been enshrined. Here the hairs were enshrined in what became the Shwedagon Pagoda.

A second collection of Buddha's relics, each with its own story of how it was recovered at different times, is gathered in the Buddha Relics Chamber in Myingyan, in north-central Myanmar.

One of the more interesting relic stories from Myanmar begins in the 11th century when King Anawrahta of Bagan (1044–1077 CE), who founded the First Myanmar Empire, became desirous of worshipping Buddha's relics. He first asked the emperor of China for the Buddha's tooth he owned. He was given, instead, a jade image of the Buddha. He then asked for the tooth kept at Kandy, Sri Lanka. The king of Sri Lanka would not give up the tooth, but honored the request with a replica of it, which Anawrahta enshrined in the Shwezigon Pagoda he built at Nyaung Oo, near Bagan, Burma, in 1059. He also had four additional duplicates of this tooth made and placed in four pagodas in other parts of his kingdom. Another duplicate from Sri Lanka was sent in 1574 to King Bayint Naung (1551–1581 CE), the founder of the Second Myanmar Empire, who enshrined it in the Maha Zedi Pagoda in Bago. These duplicate relics remain important objects of veneration in the country.

In still another story, two monks, Gawunpadi and Kuthlayone, delivered one of Buddha's teeth (of which there were 40) to a monk named Buhala who brought it to Rakhine State (Arakan), now part of Myanmar. Here the Bagan Pagoda was built some 2,300 years ago near Mrauk-U. That pagoda collapsed in 1980 and an abbot of a nearby monastery discovered the Buddha tooth relic. That relic was subsequently given as a gift to the Golden Pagoda Buddhist Temple in Singapore. That temple's abbot, Venerable Shi Fazhao, had been in Bagan assisting in the rebuilding of Buddhist temples at the time of the find. He has most recently overseen the construction of a new temple just to house the tooth.

China is home to two of the most famous relics of the Buddha. In the present capital of China, Beijing, Ling Guang Si Monastery is home to one of Buddha's teeth, the same one the Burmese ruler attempted to obtain in the 11th century. Meanwhile, the medieval capital, Xian, had been the home to Buddha's finger bone, housed in Famen Si Monastery. According to the story told at Famen, Ashoka's emissaries ventured into China and left the emperor with four little bones, said to be finger bones of the Buddha. The emperor and his successors had vaguely heard of Buddhism, but knew little of it and were not impressed. Little notice of the relics was taken in the following centuries.

Only during the Tang dynasty (618–907 CE) did the issue of the bones arise. The government built an underground crypt beneath a high tower to house the bones. Once each 30 years the bones would be brought out for public viewing. Then, when the Tang dynasty fell, the crypt was closed up and over the next centuries the treasure it contained again forgotten. Only a local rumor of the crypt's existence persisted. Then in 1981, when a reconstruction of the collapsed tower was initiated, the underground crypt was rediscovered, its importance recognized, and the finger once again put on display.

Thailand traces its relic story to King Asoka, who sent two missionaries, Sona Dhera and Uttara Dhera, to Nakhon Pathom, which appears to have been the capital of Suwannaphumi (ca. 139 BCE–457 CE), a nation in what is today Thailand. Stories of the arrival of relics of the Buddha into Thailand generally begin with that event and the large stupa that is now one of the attractions of Nakhon Pathom. Over the centuries, additional stupas, called chendis in Thailand, have been erected across Thailand, many claiming to hold relics of the Buddha.

Through the last half of the 20th century, Thailand proved generous with its many relics. In 1994, for example, Thailand initiated a project at Kushinagar, where Buddha died, as part of a larger movement to re-establish Buddhism in the land of its origin. The Maha Chetiya, a shrine designed by the Thai King Bhumibhol Adulyadej, was included within the impressive monastic complex and here some of Buddha's relics formerly kept in Thailand were placed. Again, in 2008, Somdet Phra Nyanasaam Vara, the supreme Buddhist patriarch of Thailand, presented Sikkim with some relics on the occasion of their erecting a 130-foot statue of Buddha at Karma Thekchenling monastery in Rabong, Sikkim.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition moved forward with the Maitreya Project, an effort to create a 500-foot statue of the Buddha Maitreya in the mountains of northern India. As part of this effort, Lama Zopa Rinpoche has assembled a huge collection of Buddhist relics, mostly those of various Buddhist holy men, but some from Gautama Buddha. In 2007, he conducted a world tour with the relics, designed to both publicize the project and raise financial support. Subsequently, he has made the collection available to groups who wish to sponsor a display of the relics in their community.

Christian Relics The Christian attention to relics was generated in three stages. It initially emerged during the persecutions of the church within the Roman Empire. Among the early mentions of the use of relics are the reflections on the death of Polycarp in 156 CE.

Polycarp was the bishop of Smyrna (in what today is Turkey), and some who knew him circulated a letter concerning the aftermath of his death in which they note, “We afterwards took up his bones which are more valuable than precious stones and finer than refined gold, and laid them in a suitable place; where the Lord will permit us to gather ourselves together, as we are able, in gladness and joy, and to celebrate the birth-day of his martyrdom for the commemoration of those that have already fought in the contest, and for the training and preparation of those that shall do so hereafter.”

The first relics of the Christian movement thus became the bones of those who died as martyrs. They became increasingly important as an element in worship, and eventually a rule would be made that relics of martyrs should be incorporated into church altars where the Eucharist was celebrated. This notion evolved to the point where it was (and remains) forbidden for Roman Catholic priests to celebrate the Mass at an altar devoid of relics. The increasing emphasis on the relics of the martyrs was quite consistent with the worship gatherings of what remained a marginalized and sporadically persecuted minority, which at times had to meet in the catacombs amid the bodies of the dead.

In the fourth century, beginning with the victory of Constantine at Milvian Bridge (312 CE), the church went from being an outlawed and persecuted religion to legal religion to privileged religion in little more than a decade. Among the changes wrought by Constantine's conversion was the new access it gave to Palestine and the locations at which the seminal events in the founding of the faith occurred. Suddenly, it was possible to think about Jesus and the events and objects related to his life, death, and resurrection. While his bones had long since disappeared (and it was believed that following his resurrection, his body ascended into heaven), the list of objects possibly associated with him was lengthy. It could include any clothes he wore, pieces of the True Cross on which he was crucified, the crown of thorns he wore, the spear used to pierce his side, the cup from which he drank at the Last Supper, and other objects related to the biblical story. Toward the end of her life and her son's reign, Constantine's mother Helena visited Palestine and while there was presented with a spectrum of items that she believed to be true relics. Among the many items she had sent back to Constantinople was the True Cross. Many of the relics unearthed by Helena subsequently found their way to Rome.

Along with the relics of Jesus, and second only to them, were the relics of the Virgin Mary and the Twelve Apostles. As with Jesus, since the Virgin Mother was reputedly translated to heaven, no bodily remains were believed extant. The bodies of several of the Apostles, however, were claimed to have survived. Most notable among these were the bodies of Peter and Paul, believed to be in Rome, and that of James, which was believed to have been transported to Santiago de Compostela in northwest Spain. St. Peter's Cathedral is believed to have been built over the burial site of Peter.

Relics of various biblical characters would find their way to churches across Europe. Helena is, for example, supposed to have discovered the bones of the Three Magi who visited Jesus shortly after his birth. These bones were taken to Constantinople, but later found their way to Milan. From Milan, they were given to the cathedral at Cologne in 1154. Helena is also credited with finding the tunic worn by Jesus when he was crucified. That tunic, like the bones of the Three Magi, made its way initially to Constantinople and then to Trier, Germany, in the 12th century.

The more famous but less documented relics reputedly collected by Helena emerged at the end of the 11th century, a result of the new level of popularity given to them by the Crusades. Crusaders returned from the Holy Land with a host of new and exciting relics (from the blood of Jesus to the milk from the Virgin Mary). This new supply of relics from Palestine also paralleled a seeming multiplication of miracle stories centered on saintly people, from healings to the unusual preservation of their bodies. The rich and powerful emerged as collectors of relics or with public shows of piety in the form of endowing local churches with prominent relics.

Through the 16th century, the building of St. Peter's Cathedral occasioned the assembling of possibly the largest and most impressive collection of relics ever assembled within Christianity. Among the many treasures claimed to be found there are Veronica's veil, the cloth used to wipe the sweat from Jesus as he carried the cross, at which time an image of Jesus was transferred to it; the Spear of Longinus, with which Jesus was pierced while on the cross; and a piece of the True Cross. There are several rivals to both the Veronica's veil and the spear of Longinus now at St. Peter's.

At the same time that relics were being assembled for and installed at St. Peter's, Protestants launched a critique of relics. They challenged both their efficacy and the biblical basis of their use. The effect of Protestantism on the cult of relics is clearly seen in the life of Frederick, the elector of Saxony. An early defender of Reformer Martin Luther, the pious Frederick also owned one of the larger collections of relics in Germany. He would in the end give up his collection as incompatible with his Reformed faith.

Luther's initial attack on relics in the church evolved into broad attack upon relics in general. Protestants attacked the superstitious nature of beliefs in relics and publicized the problems that arose because of the gap between the time of Jesus and the Apostles and the initial appearance of any individual relic. The use of relics was largely abandoned in the various Protestant churches. Toward the end of the 16th century, the Council of Trent, called to respond to the losses suffered by the Catholic Church due to the Protestant movement, reaffirmed the legitimacy and role of relics in the church, but offered some criticism of the excesses of relic veneration.

In the 20th century, the growing body of knowledge relative to Western history and the new abilities of science to evaluate objects created a new historical criticism of relics. A number of relics have been tested using the techniques of modern chemistry, biology, and physics, in the context of critical historical examination of stories concerning their origin. The mass of evidence has found them, in many cases, to have originated at the time when they "reappeared" on the historical stage after a period of being lost. The critique of the historicity of many prominent relics, such as the Shroud of Turin or the crown of thorns now housed in Paris, France, has also been joined by the scientific critique of many extraordinary occurrences associated with different artifacts, such as the "supernatural" non-corruptibility of the body of different saints.

The Roman Catholic Church does not commonly attempt to speak officially relative to the authentication of relics, but does offer its general approval of some relics in its allowing the veneration of some objects, its inclusion of relics in prominent locations, and the necessity of relics to the celebration of the Eucharist. At the same time, it does make the acceptance of a particular relic a matter of compulsion, and maintains a conversation with scholars of the church on the issue.

Christianity, especially the Roman Catholic Church, more than Buddhism, draws a sharp distinction between the veneration appropriate to saints and the worship that is only offered to God. Further, it makes a distinction between the worship of God, during which the assistance of the saints is sought, and the honor paid to saintly individuals as exemplars of the faith. These distinctions can be obscured in practice in the case of relics, especially where supernatural powers and miraculous claims are attached to them.

Eastern Orthodoxy has a history of and belief in relics similar to Roman Catholicism. For example, the relics of martyrs and saints are included in the altar where the Eucharist is celebrated. When a new church building is consecrated, it is common for the local bishop to present a relic of a saint, which is then placed in or on the altar where the Eucharist is celebrated. In the Eastern church, there is also a piece of silk cloth, the antimins, used during the Eucharist which usually also contains one or more relics of a saint. There is likewise a sharp distinction between veneration toward relics and worship toward God. There are some differences in Orthodoxy, however, many deriving from the slightly different definition of who is a saint, others deriving from the differences in burial practices in Eastern and Western Europe.

The church believes all Christians who have made it to heaven are saints. At the same time, some people have been recognized as saintly persons during their earthly life, and the church has through an archbishop patriarch recognized that fact. The veneration of a saint usually begins locally and then spreads nationally and internationally. At some point, the veneration might lead to a worship service in which a particular person is formally recognized as a saint—a process called glorification. Prominent saints might have their stylized image placed on an icon. The ecumenical patriarch, who resides in Istanbul, on occasion distributes letters in which he names a saint and assigns a day on the church's calendar when they are especially honored.

Relics, to which miraculous powers have been ascribed, may support that person's being formally glorified.

Relics in Islam Given its concern to avoid anything that hints of idolatry, Islam places less emphasis on relics than does Christianity, but nevertheless, the relics associated with Muhammad and his companions are highly valued. No better collection of such relics is to be found than the one assembled in Istanbul at Topkapi Palace. The initial relics in the collection appear to have been acquired by Sultan Selim I (1465–1520). Following his incorporation of Egypt into the Ottoman Empire, his representative in Mecca sent him some relics of Muhammad.

As the collection in Istanbul grew, it came to include some hair from Muhammad's beard, a chip from one of his teeth, and a footprint preserved in porphyry. He is believed to have used other items—a cloak, a seal, and a bow. Muhammad's cloak, called Hirka-i Saadet, is kept in a solid gold box. There is also a letter he wrote. Among additional prized possessions at the palace museum are the oldest known copy of the Koran, two pieces of cloth formerly used to cover the Kaaba in Mecca, and a sword used by the first four caliphs, who have a special place in secular and sacred Muslim history. The sword is a symbol of the authority that each of the four caliphs exercised and passed on to their successors, and that was eventually assumed by the Ottoman emperors. This extensive collection of relics has made Topkapi not just a tourist destination, but a pilgrimage site.

It is to be noted that Muhammad's body was buried in a secret location, unknown today, and was neither cremated nor dismembered. Remains were limited to hair and fingernail clippings, but a number of examples are found around the Middle East, while footprints are found built into a number of mosques.

Relics and Unbelief The community of Unbelief, which includes atheists and a wide spectrum of religious skeptics, has been among the most vocal critics of relics, which they have seen as relics of a superstitious belief and an untenable supernaturalism, neither of which has a place in a modern scientific work. Some, such as scholar of the supernatural, Joe Nickel, have seen relics as a glowing symbol of religion's weak foundation. Such critics have marshaled the scientific critiques of popular relics, especially those now displayed in European churches, while conducting original research on contemporary objects with the potential of becoming relics, as part of a campaign both to refute and ridicule them. In this regard they have aligned themselves with the larger number of religious believers who have also done research that has led to negative observations on different relics.

The campaign against relics is part of a larger effort to deal with what skeptics have termed pseudoscience. Individual scholars and others, such as stage magicians, have attacked what they consider to be claims of “supernatural” phenomena, since the rise of materialization séances in 19th-century spiritualism. Their effort led to the formation of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP) by a group of Humanists in the 1970s. CSICOP has more recently evolved into the Committee of Skeptical Inquiry (CSI). CSI is a member of the International Humanist and Ethical Union and ascribes to the Amsterdam Declaration, a manifesto on Humanism. Through the Center for Inquiry, the Committee is related to the Council for Secular Humanism.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ashoka; Atheism; Buddhism; Constantine the Great; Council for Secular Humanism; Eastern Orthodoxy; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana Tradition; Helena, Flavia Iulia; Humanism; Luther, Martin; Mecca; Muhammad; Roman Catholic Church; Rome/Vatican City; Saints; Tibetan Buddhism; Unbelief.

References

- Bentley, James. Restless Bones: The Story of Relics. London: Constable, 1985.
- Fleet, J. F. “The Tradition about the Corporeal Relics of Buddha.” Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1907): 341–363. http://www.lightwatcher.com/old_lightbytes/buddha_on_tour.html. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- Gauthier, Marie-Madeleine. Highways of the Faith: Relics and Reliquaries from Jerusalem to Compostela. Trans. by J. A. Underwood. London: Alpine Fine Arts, 1983.
- Landes, Richard. Relics, Apocalypse, and the Deceits of History: Ademar of Chabannes, 989–1034. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Nickell, Joe. Looking for a Miracle. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1998.
- Nickell, Joe. Relics of the Christ. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2007.
- Rhys Davids, T. W. “Asoka and the Buddha-Relics.” Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1901): 397–410.
- Rufus, Anneli. Magnificent Corpses: Searching Through Europe for St. Peter’s Head, St. Claire’s Heart, St. Stephen’s Hand, and Other Saints’ Relics. Cambridge: Da Capo Press, 1999.
- Sora, Steven. Treasures from Heaven: Relics from Noah’s Ark to the Shroud of Turin. New York: Wiley, 2005.
- Standish, Russell R., and Colin D. Standish. Holy Relics or Revelation: Recent Astounding Archaeological Claims Evaluated. Rapidan, VA: Hartland Publications, 1999.
- Strong, John. Relics of the Buddha. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Wheeler, Brannon M. Mecca and Eden: Rituals, Relics and Territory in Islam. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006.

Religion-Government Relations

Across the globe there are a variety of relationships between religious groups and the governments of the states in which they are located—frequently for historical and cultural reasons—and these interactions are often underpinned by law (Robbers 2005). At a very general level four different types of relationships can be distinguished (Cranmer and Oliva 2009). The first two are characterized by the very close connection between the state and one or more religious communities. Such a relationship may be characterized by the control of religious matters by the state (Erastianism) or by the control of the state by a religious group (theocracy). The third is the converse situation: separation between the state and religion, typically in the form of a constitutional barrier forbidding financial support or the establishment of any particular religious group. The fourth, known variously as hybrid, cooperationist, or concordatarian systems, comprises those countries that fall between the extremes: a clear differentiation between religious communities and secular government, coupled with clear evidence of cooperation between the two.

American flag waves in front of a small church. (James Martin/Dreamstime.com)

The Erastian model is characterized by a close association between one or more religious groups and the state under which the secular authorities exercise supremacy over religion. Historically, this has been a common model in Europe (Cranmer and Oliva 2009), perhaps epitomized by the Henrician Reformation in England: an argument—to put it simply—over whether the pope or the king was going to make policy for the church. Although no modern state in Europe is Erastian in the full sense of that term, some churches are subject to a much greater degree of state supervision than others. Many Constitutions (such as those of the United Kingdom, Denmark, Greece, Finland, Malta and Bulgaria) continue to give a special status to one or more religious communities, which may be styled as a state, national, established, or folk church.

Perhaps the most striking modern example of quasi-Erastianism is the Church of Denmark. Its dignitaries are appointed by the Crown on the recommendation of the minister of ecclesiastical affairs, it has no synod or legal personality and it is not a corporate body. The Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs determines rules concerning membership and the creation of new parishes and approves the appointment and dismissal of clergy—who have the status of civil servants and who act as civil registrars for births. Though Denmark is the extreme case, there are many less overt instances of governmental involvement in church affairs. An obvious example is the United Kingdom, where bishops of the Church of England sit in the legislature and where church measures are part of the law of the land, requiring parliamentary approval before they can become law (Hill 2007, para 1.25; Hill 2009a).

The converse is theocracy, where the secular authorities are subordinate to the religious—the de facto situation in Geneva during Calvin's ascendancy. Iran under Ayatollah Khomeini exemplifies this approach, while several Islamic states have introduced overtly religious elements such as the sharia into their legal and political systems.

Both quasi-Erastian and theocratic religion-state relationships are extremely heterogeneous. For instance, although there are close ties between church and state in both Denmark and Greece, the high degree of state control over the Church of Denmark is not paralleled in Greece, where the Orthodox Church has its own status as a legal entity and where its self-governance is guaranteed by the Greek Constitution.

Moreover, close ties between religion and the state often have more to do with theory than with practice (Sandberg and Doe 2007). In many countries historically significant connections with religious communities have lessened. In some, such as Sweden and Wales, legislation has resulted in the disestablishment of a particular religious community. Moreover, even in those countries where one or more churches are established by law, to describe the situation as quasi-Erastian does not necessarily paint an accurate picture of the full interaction between religion and government, focusing as it does upon the relationship between one religious group and the state (Hill 2009b). Even in Finland (where there are two state churches—the Evangelical Lutheran Church and the Orthodox Church) other religious communities benefit from tax exemptions once they are registered under the Freedom of Religion Act 2003.

The third type of relationship is separation between the state and religion, usually in the form of a constitutional prohibition forbidding government intervention in religious affairs. Separation is the American solution: the “Jefferson Wall.” Famously, the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof” and, in principle, the secular and the religious are completely removed from one another. However, in practice separation between the two is not absolute. For example, the Supreme Court has allowed tax deductions for parental expenditure on tuition, textbooks and transport for those whose children attend church schools on the same basis as for those with children at the public schools thereby according to faith schools (and the parents of children attending them) federal fiscal advantages on like terms as non-sectarian public schools.

The same is true in the case of France, the European country seen as the separation system par excellence. Although the Constitution states that “The Republic does not recognize, remunerate, or subsidize any religious denomination” and “France shall be an indivisible, secular, democratic and social Republic,” there is much regulation of religion—and some special treatment of it. The Bureau des Cultes of the Ministry of the Interior plays an active role in ensuring religious freedom; religious groups enjoy special status as religious associations, diocesan associations, charitable and educational associations, religious orders, and new religious movements and sects; state subsidies are given to activities that have a general character despite having a religious setting, to religious ministers when they render services to the general public, and to fund repairs to Roman Catholic places of worship built before 1905. A similar picture can be found in Ireland (Colton 2006): though the Constitution provides that “The State guarantees not to endow any religion,” schools are organized predominantly on denominational lines and extensively supported by state funding. A recent amendment to the Irish criminal law will re-introduce the offense of blasphemy and accord protection from religious hate speech. In contrast, in Turkey the rhetoric of the Constitution declaring that Turkey “is a democratic, secular and social state governed by the rule of law” has led the Constitutional Court to close down two political parties on the grounds that their existence breached the principle of secularism—bans that were subsequently upheld by the European Court of Human Rights.

The separationist model, like the others, is characterized by diversity. However, in most countries in this category, separation is seen not as the pre-eminent goal but rather as the means toward a larger end of protecting religious freedom. This requires from the state not indifference, but positive action to facilitate religious freedom. In practice, therefore, in many separationist systems there is little to distinguish the relationship between the government and all religious groups from the relationship between the government and all religious groups other than the specially protected religion(s) in quasi-Erastian systems.

The cooperationist model is, on the face of it, the most problematic, comprising those relationships that cannot be fitted into the other categories—broad and imprecisely-defined though they may be. In theory, this type is characterized by even-handedness toward religious groups and the recognition of pluralism and cooperation on the part of the state. Legally, the state may recognize the value of religion in the form of an agreement, a treaty, or (as in the case of Spain and Italy) a Concordat. Alternatively, the state may regulate religious groups as voluntary associations in the same way as other voluntary bodies but, nevertheless, give a measure of direct or indirect financial support to some of their social and educational activities or may treat them on the same basis, as is the case in Belgium.

However, many of the apparent characteristics of countries in the fourth category—equality, cooperation, and recognition of pluralism—are characteristics of democracies generally (Sandberg 2008). The European Court of Human Rights has spoken of the state’s role as “the neutral and impartial organiser of the exercise of various religions, faiths and beliefs” (Leyla Şahin v. Turkey [2005], No. 44774/98 para 107) and stressed the state's duty of neutrality and impartiality. Many countries operate a system under which, in return for registering with the state, faith communities qualify for a range of benefits, such as the right to hold property as juridical persons, civil recognition of their marriages, and tax concessions as charitable institutions. However, these countries are not all to be found in the fourth type; examples can be found within all of them. Moreover, even within the third type, it is clear that states cooperate more with some religious groups than others, creating a closer connection with some of them that is not dissimilar from that found in the first type. Italy, Spain, and Belgium operate a three-tier distinction between the Roman Catholic Church, other religious communities with whom the state has made agreements, and all other religious groups with whom no agreement has been made. These countries seem to favor one religious denomination to the same extent (if not to a greater one) as do the countries found in the first type.

In conclusion, it is possible at a general level to categorize forms of religion-government relations into four different models in order to provide a convenient starting-point for comparative analysis. That said, however, such relationships differ from country to country and from religious group to religious group. Four important qualifications need to be kept in mind. First, it should be recognized that a great number of different laws affect the manifestation of religion; and it is important, therefore, not to confine discussion of religion-government relations solely to issues of constitutional law. Second, the regulation of religious manifestation is increasingly affected by international laws and norms, not least by human rights provisions; the result is a degree of homogeneity, particularly in relation to minimum standards, that should not be overlooked (Doe 2009). Third, though religious manifestation is undoubtedly affected by the governmental system of the nation-state, governance at the sub-national level is also important. Governmental relations with religious groups are not the sole preserve of central government (Oliva and Lambert 2009): for example, under Article 72 of the Swiss Constitution "the regulation of the relationship between church and state is a cantonal matter"—and different cantons have different arrangements. Fourth, the focus of any study should not merely be upon religious groups; secular policy and laws also impact upon individuals and many of the legal protections for religious activity are concerned with individual religious freedoms as well as belief systems (whether collective or individualistic) that fall outside of the traditional understanding of religion.

Russell Sandberg, Frank Cranmer, Javier García Oliva, Mark Hill, and Norman Doe

See also: Calvin, John; Church of England; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark; Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland; Finnish Orthodox Church; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Colton, Paul. "Religion and Law in Dialogue: Covenantal and Non-Covenantal Cooperation of State and Religions in Ireland." In Religion and Law in Dialogue: Covenantal and Non-Covenantal Cooperation between State and Religion in Europe, edited by R. Puza and N. Doe, 93–114. Leuven: Peeters, 2006.
- Cranmer, Frank, and Javier Oliva. "Church-State Relationships: An Overview." Law and Justice 162 (2009): 4–17.
- Doe, Norman. "Towards a 'Common Law' on Religion in the European Union." Religion, State and Society 37, nos. 1–2 (2009): 147–166.
- Hill, Mark. Ecclesiastical Law. 3rd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Hill, Mark. "Voices in the Wilderness: the Established Church of England and the European Union." Religion, State and Society 37, nos. 1–2 (2009a): 167–180.
- Hill, Mark. "Church and State in the United Kingdom: Anachronism or Microcosm?" ICLARS (2009b).
- Oliva, Javier, and David Lambert. "Regional Ecclesiastical Law: Religion and Devolution in Spain and Wales." In Law and Religion: New Horizons, edited by Norman Doe and Russell Sandberg, 219–243. Leuven: Peeters, 2009.
- Robbers, Gerhard. "State and Church in the European Union." In State and Church in the European Union, edited by Gerhard Robbers, 577–589. Baden-Baden: Nomos, 2005.

Sandberg, Russell, and Norman Doe. "Church-State Relations in Europe." Religion Compass 1, no. 5 (2007): 561–578.

Sandberg, Russell, and Norman Doe. "Church-State Relations in Europe: From Legal Models to an Interdisciplinary Approach." Journal of Religion in Europe 1, no. 3 (2008): 329–352.

Religious Freedom: Contemporary

The 21st century has inherited numerous public declarations supporting religious freedom as a fundamental human right; however, these declarations are frequently contradicted by government policies and social actions related to religious protectionism, extremism, and terrorism. Despite the many problems and challenges, the data indicate that religious freedom, when actually protected and practiced, is not only a benefit to religions themselves but is associated with better socio-economic outcomes for societies and is instrumental in lowering the level of religious violence.

Responding to genocidal atrocities such as the Holocaust of World War II, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted and proclaimed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on December 10, 1948. Article 18 of the Declaration states that "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance." The Declaration has been distributed in more than 330 languages and serves as the basis for numerous other international human rights declarations. The United Nations also appoints a Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Religion or Belief to continually monitor grievances and bring them to the attention of governments. Religious freedom also was positively impacted by the change in the official position of the Roman Catholic Church, the world's largest single religious body. As part of the Second Vatican Council reforms, Pope Paul VI (r. 1963–1978) promulgated the Declaration on Religions Freedom, Dignitatis humanae, on December 7, 1965. Dignitatis humanae specifically states that “the human person has a right to religious freedom. This freedom means that all men are to be immune from coercion on the part of individuals or of social groups and of any human power, in such wise that no one is to be forced to act in a manner contrary to his own beliefs, whether privately or publicly, whether alone or in association with others, within due limits. . . . This right of the human person to religious freedom is to be recognized in the constitutional law whereby society is governed and thus it is to become a civil right.”

Two women pray at a government-approved Catholic church in Beijing. The communist Beijing government ordered Chinese Catholics to break ties with the Vatican in 1951 and allows people to worship only in government-approved churches which do not recognize the Pope's authority. (AP Photo)

The advance of religious freedom's promise is also seen by the protections that now exist for religious freedom in many countries' Constitutions (or basic law). Recent research by the Pew Forum (2009) shows that 76 percent of the countries surveyed, large and small, promise religious freedom in their Constitutions, and an additional 20 percent protect at least some religious practices. Only 4 percent of Constitutions provide no protections for religious freedom or the freedom to engage in certain religious practices. This seemingly strong level of constitutional protection can be, however, misleading. In only 22 percent of countries does the Constitution of the country not go on to qualify or contradict religious freedom. In 26 percent of the Constitutions, there is some qualification placed on religious freedom, such as stipulating that religious freedom is subject to law and order. In an additional 48 percent of the Constitutions, only some religious practices are protected.

Constitutional promises of religious freedom do not, however, automatically translate into guaranteed protection or practice of religious freedom. In the closing years of the 20th century and first years of the 21st century, hundreds of thousands of people have been abused or displaced specifically due to their religious identity, and tens of millions more have been killed or displaced due to religion-related conflicts. While many of these deaths have occurred in religion-related violence such as the sectarian conflict in Iraq, the abuse and displacement are much more widespread, occurring at least to some degree in more than one in two countries. While religion-related abuse and displacement (or religious violence) occur across all major religious traditions and in all regions of the globe, there is important variation depending on the perpetrator of the violence (government versus social actors), the level of violence, and the majority religion of the country.

New research has indicated that the presence of religious freedom in a country not only reduces religion-related violence and physical persecution, but it mathematically correlates with the presence of other fundamental freedoms, including civil and political liberty, press freedom, economic freedom, and the longevity of democracy. This means that wherever religious freedom is found, these other freedoms tend to be found as well. Harvard Economist and Nobel Laureate Amartya Sen argues, however, that human freedom is not just the general opportunity for such freedoms, but also the specific processes within a country that result in better lives. Thus, if religious freedom is considered an integral part of the bundled commodity of human freedoms, religious freedom should be closely associated with the betterment of people's lives. The data show that wherever religious freedom is high, there tend to be fewer incidents of armed conflict, better health outcomes, better educational opportunities for women, and higher levels of earned income for women as well as for men. Moreover, religious freedom is associated with higher overall human development. The close statistical correlation between religious freedom and other positive socioeconomic and political outcomes suggests that religious freedom is an inseparable part of the bundled commodity of fundamental human freedoms. Thus, religious freedom cannot be peeled off without adversely affecting the entire bundle.

The association between religious freedom and human development can be seen, for example, by comparing the work experiences of many in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia with its immediate neighbor, the United Arab Emirates. In the Emirates, where many faiths are legal, people have many ways to contribute to society through religious associations as well as through other avenues. People tend to work hard and be involved in society. In Saudi Arabia, however, where all faiths but one faith are illegal, there is much less enthusiasm for work and many people express no real desire to contribute to society outside of work. These experiences, reported by many in both countries, suggest a connection between the level of religious freedom in each and the economic life of people in each. For instance, the 2007 per capita gross domestic product in U.S. purchasing power parity dollars (GDP-PPP) in the Emirates is $55,200, nearly triple the per capita GDP-PPP in Saudi Arabia, which is only $20,700.

The connection between religious freedom and human development can also be seen in China. During the Cultural Revolution, China repressed all public religious expression. From the early 1980s China left those dismal years of complete religious repression behind. Since then, China's economy has boomed, making it the rival of the West and the envy of many. Though the Chinese government continues to forcefully restrict religious groups operating without government approval, the comparative increase in religious freedom following the Cultural Revolution seems to have played a part in China's phenomenal development. It is reasonable to suggest that religious freedom's further expansion can help the Chinese make even greater social progress.

A growing body of research supports the proposition that the religious competition inherent in religious freedom results in increased and broad religious participation; concomitantly, religious participation can lead to a wide range of positive social and political outcomes. Furthermore, as a broad range of religious groups make contributions to society and become an accepted part of the fabric of society, religious freedom is consolidated. This can be conceptualized as a religious freedom cycle.

In recent years, many studies have looked at the benefits of the social and spiritual capital generated through civic and religious involvement. As more people actively participate in religion, religious groups engage in "processes," to use Amartya Sen's term, that bring tangible benefits ranging from literacy, vocational and health training, to marital and bereavement counseling, to feeding the hungry, clothing the poor, and caring for the sick. Research has found that faith-based organizations, for example, are the major providers of care and support services to people living with HIV/AIDS in the developing world, and there is growing scientific evidence of the health benefits associated with religious participation itself. Some studies suggest that the advent of new religious forms can help improve the lives of women and activate greater civic participation.

Sociologist Peter Berger, once a proponent of secularization theory, observes that we are in an age of explosive, pervasive religiosity. Berger and Anton Zijderveld further argue that the world is becoming increasingly pluralistic, and that when states try to impose limits on religious liberty, the growth of pluralism directly challenges state attempts to curtail religious freedom. Another eminent sociologist, N. J. Demerath, concludes that, given the global religious dynamics of today, the challenge for governments is to better understand cultural conflict and the impact of religious diversity. Thus, it is critical to understand how the affairs of nations and peoples are affected by religious freedom—in both its social and governmental aspects. The empirical data are clear on two points. First, religious freedom is part of the bundled commodity of fundamental and responsible human freedoms that energize broader productive participation in civil society by all religious groups, which arguably helps to stimulate the socioeconomic progress of women and men. Second, religious freedom reduces religion-related conflict and increases security by, among other things, removing grievances religious groups have toward governments and their fellow citizens. Furthermore, over the past 100 years, promises of religious freedom have been included in international declarations, country Constitutions, and laws. Despite the widespread religion-related violence that has marked the start of the 21st century, it is possible that the years ahead may see further advances of religious freedom in practice.

Brian J. Grim

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Violence, Religious.

Bibliography

Bates, M. Searle. Religious Liberty: An Inquiry. New York: International Missionary Council, 1945.

- Berger, Peter, and Anton Zijderveld. In Praise of Doubt: How to Have Convictions Without Becoming a Fanatic. New York: HarperOne.
- Demerath, N. J., III. Crossing the Gods: Worldly Religions and Worldly Politics. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University, 2002.
- Grim, Brian J. "Religious Freedom: Good for What Ails Us?" The Review of Faith and International Affairs 6, no. 2 (2008).
- Grim, Brian J. "Religious Freedom in the World." In Atlas of Global Christianity, edited by Todd M. Johnson and Kenneth R. Ross, 37–43. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2009.
- Grim, Brian J., and Roger Finke. The Price of Freedom Denied: Religious Persecution and Conflict in the 21st Century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, forthcoming.
- Grim, Brian J., and Roger Finke. "Religious Persecution in Cross-National Context: Clashing Civilizations or Regulated Religious Economies?" American Sociological Review 72, no. 4 (2007): 633–658.
- Marshall, Paul, ed. Religious Freedom in the World. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2008.

Religious Science

Religious Science is the youngest major tradition in the New Thought movement. It is also the second largest, with its two major groups, the United Church of Religious Science (UCRS) and Religious Science International (RSI), ranking second and third in size, respectively, behind the Unity School of Christianity/Association of Unity Churches. Both groups trace their origin to Ernest Shurtleff Holmes (1887–1960), one of the last students to study with the founder of New Thought, Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925). Holmes's classic New Thought text, The Science of Mind (1926), supplies the basis for the tradition's primary beliefs and healing practices. It is also widely studied in other New Thought communities and serves as the primary religious text for many independent groups, most notably the non-affiliated Science of Mind churches. Holmes began his work in Los Angeles, California, and although Religious Science is an international movement today, the largest concentration of its churches is still in that state.

Holmes, together with his brother Fenwick, was active in the mental healing movement even before his studies with Hopkins. His early influences were diverse, including Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), Henry Drummond (1851–1897), and especially Thomas Troward (1847–1916). The system he eventually developed is a synthesis of Christian Science and Troward's theories. He was ordained in Divine Science by Agnes J. Galer in 1917, when he was already attracting large crowds to his lectures on mental healing and a growing number of clients for his services as a practitioner. In 1925, the year after Ernest's studies with Hopkins, he parted from Fenwick on friendly terms; Fenwick went East, where he enjoyed considerable success as a New Thought author and lecturer, and Ernest settled in Los Angeles, where he began the work that grew into Religious Science.

The relationship of Hopkins to the formation of Religious Science is significant. It is notable that The Science of Mind was published two years after Holmes had studied with her. The following year (1927) he established the Institute of Religious Science and Philosophy, Inc., and began publishing Religious Science Monthly (by 1929 retitled Science of Mind). Holmes had previously written a book, established a religious Institute, and published a magazine, none of which had been particularly successful. After his studies with Hopkins, however, the same component elements came together to form the foundation of a religious movement. Holmes credited Hopkins with supplying what had been missing from his earlier endeavors—mysticism. Although Hopkins's mysticism is certainly a celebrated part of New Thought lore, her capacity to inspire persons to develop fully functional religious movements is probably more significant. She seems to have had provided some sort of inspiration to Holmes.

The emergence of Religious Science from Holmes's work in the late 1920s was gradual and can be measured in terms of several decisive turning points. In 1932 Robert H. Bitzer (1896–1994), who would later have a long tenure as president of International New Thought Alliance, started the Institute's second congregation. Others followed. In 1939 the Institute began to ordain ministers, and in the mid-1940s one of them, Carmelita Trowbridge, formed the first Religious Science church in Alhambra, California. She successfully resisted the Institute's efforts to prevent her from referring to her group as a "church." The church movement in Religious Science quickly gained momentum, and by 1949 the International Association of Religious Science Churches was formed.

The founding Church of Religious Science in Los Angeles, California. (J. Gordon Melton)

Tensions between the Institute and the Association led the Institute to establish an ecclesiastical organization in 1953—the Church of Religious Science. In 1954 Holmes proposed eliminating the Association and replacing it with the newly formed Church of Religious Science. Forty-six churches joined the church, but 19 refused. Churches that affiliated with the church went on to become the United Church of Religious Science (UCRS), adopting that name in 1967; those staying with the Association became Religious Science International (RSI), adopting that name in 1972.

Both groups accept Holmes's teachings as normative, follow Science of Mind as their primary religious text, and recognize two classes of religious professionals: ministers and practitioners. Practitioners in Religious Science have a function similar to that of Christian Science practitioners; they facilitate mental healing and administer "spiritual mind treatment" to individuals on a one-to-one basis. Of all New Thought groups, Religious Science has most faithfully maintained the tradition of mental healing and the role of professional mental healer. This is further revealed in the recognition of practitioner status as a prerequisite for ministerial training in UCRS and RSI.

The chief differences between the groups lie in their organizational structures and in their educational systems. Organizationally, both groups are governed by elected boards and presided over by presidents, who are elected by the boards. UCRS is more centralized and hierarchical, but both groups allow churches significant autonomy, and members of the governing boards are elected by representatives selected by the churches. Educational curricula are largely the same in both groups, although UCRS requires education of its ministers at regional schools, of which there are four, and RSI allows for training at local churches.

Each group publishes a representative periodical. Science of Mind (UCRS) has 44,000 subscribers and Creative Thought (RSI) has 11,000. In recent years the groups have had a good relationship, establishing policies for accepting each other's ministers and practitioners and working to develop stronger ties through a Committee of Cooperation, established in the late 1980s. The relationship between the two seems to be growing even closer at present. As of 2008, RSI legally changed its name to International Centers for Spiritual Living. UCRS is undergoing a similar name change, currently referring to itself as the United Centers for Spiritual Living. The shared name change is the result of official merger negotiations between RSI (now ICSL) and UCRS and is reflected in the websites of both groups. The push toward a closer integration is also mirrored in both UCRS's and ICSL's collaboration with the larger New Thought movement. Together with other movements under the New Thought banner (such as the Unity organizations), UCRS and ICSL organized themselves under the Association of Global New Thought to form a single cohesive delegation at the Parliament of the World's Religions (December 2009 in Melbourne, Australia).

As of 2008, UCRS had 190 churches, 60 study groups, and 24 teaching chapters. ICSL had 140 churches. The vast majority of centers for both groups are in the United States, with highest concentrations in California. UCRS has representative groups in 20 countries, and ICSL in 35. UCRS operates a Ministry of Prayer that averages about 100,000 contacts annually. In the early 1990s a small number of ICSL (then RSI) ministers left the organization and formed Global Religious Science Ministries (incorporated in 1993).

This group has experienced a similar name change, now referring to themselves as the Alliance for Spiritual Understanding. The group has 20 member churches and is headquartered in Richmond, Virginia.

As a branch of New Thought, Religious Science is an expression of popular religious idealism; as such it affirms that the basis of reality is mental, not material, and that mental states determine material conditions. As is characteristic of New Thought as a whole, Religious Science recognizes Mind as the Ultimate Reality, but unlike other New Thought groups its concept of God is far less anthropomorphic, with terms like Principle, Law, and Mind being more commonly used. It is also the least Christian of the groups, neither identifying itself with Christianity nor making any particular effort to retain elements of Christian doctrine. It accepts the perfection and omnipresence of the one Divine Mind and recognizes humanity's link with Mind through the "subjective" minds of individuals. "Spiritual mind treatment" consists of realizing the reality of the perfection of Divine Mind rather than an undesired condition. A typical treatment would include an affirmation, such as: "There is One Life, that Life is God, that Life is Perfect, that Life is my Life now."

United Centers for Spiritual Living/United Church of Religious Science
573 Park Point Dr.
Golden, CO 80401
<http://www.religiousscience.org>

Religious Science International International Centers for Spiritual Living
PO Box 2152
Spokane, WA 99210
<http://www.rsintl.org>

Global Religious Science Ministries
Alliance for Spiritual Understanding 12594 Patterson Ave.
Richmond, VA 23238-6415
<http://www.as-u.org/>

Dell deChant, Natalie Hobbs, and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eddy, Mary Baker; International New Thought Alliance; Unity School of Christianity/ Association of Unity Churches.

References

- Albanese, Catherine L. A Republic of Mind and Spirit. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2007.
- Braden, Charles. Spirits in Rebellion: The Rise and Development of New Thought. Dallas, TX: SMU Press, 1963.
- deChant, Dell. "New Thought." In World Religions in America, edited by Jacob Neusner. 4th ed. Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2009.
- Holmes, Ernest. The Science of Mind. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company, 1944.
- Holmes, Fenwick L. Ernest Holmes: His Life and Times. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company, 1970.

Remonstrant Brotherhood

The Remonstrant Brotherhood (Remonstrantse Broederschap), a liberal Protestant denomination, has its origins in the condemnation of the Remonstrants at the Synod of Dordrecht (1618–1619). This turn of events had been brought on by a theological struggle about the doctrine of predestination between Jacob Arminius (1560–1609) and Franciscus Gomarus (1563–1641), both professors at the University of Leiden. About 200 ministers supportive of Arminius were dismissed and removed from the Reformed Church of the Netherlands (the Nederduytsche of Gereformeerde Kerk, now an integral part of the Protestant Church of the Netherlands), at that time the privileged church. The Synod of Dordrecht issued the so-called Vijf Artikelen tegen de Remonstranten (the Five Articles against the Remonstrants, also known as the Confession of Dort), which today is still an element in Drie Formulieren van Enigheid (the Three Orders of Unity), the confession of faith in most of the orthodox Protestant Reformed Churches in the Netherlands.

The dismissed ministers fled to Antwerp and hoped that their condemnation would be repealed. The Remonstrant Brotherhood was founded in 1619, when their hope proved vain. A short time later, they returned to the Dutch Republic and created their first conventicle in 1631 in Amsterdam. Three years later, they founded a ministerial training college in Leiden, known since 1873 as the Remonstrant Seminary.

In the second part of the 19th century, the Remonstrant Brotherhood had its Golden Age. Its membership tripled because of the rise of modernism and the movement of more liberal church members into its ranks. In more recent decades, however, the Brotherhood has experienced a period of decline. Between 1966 and 1988, the number of believers sunk by approximately 50 percent. As the 21st century begins, the number of believers is about 7,000, in 46 communities served by 40 ministers. An additional community of about 3,000 is also served by the church. Individuals join the church on the basis of a personal confession. Local congregations identify themselves as Remonstrant Church or as Remonstrant-Reformed.

The Remonstrants' first confession was formulated by Arminius's student Simon Episcopius (1583–1643), and a more contemporary statement appeared in 1940. The Brotherhood believes that the phrasing of confessions is not perpetually valid, and their authority is not to be compared with that of the Bible and the Gospels. The confession is only "a token of time" and can be changed if the modern time makes it necessary; every time has its own needs and therefore its own answers.

The Brotherhood intends to be a community of faith, "rooted in the gospel of Christ and faithful to her principle of freedom and forbearance, and willing to adore God and to serve Him." It is not a confessional church, but an affirming church. The Brotherhood rejects the idea that its members are a "chosen" group, as is believed in most Reformed churches. Hence, everyone can take the holy Communion as long as they live in community with Christ.

Since 1989, every congregation in the Brotherhood has been independent, free to arrange its own spiritual and material affairs. Each congregation calls its own minister and has the right to represent itself at the Algemene Vergadering van de Remonstrantse Broederschap, the coordinating organization. Ongoing executive decisions are left to the Commissie tot de Zaken der Remonstrantse Broederschap (the Committee on the Affairs of the Remonstrant Brotherhood).

Laypeople play an important role in the direction of the Brotherhood. All offices are open to men as well as women. The Remonstrant Brotherhood was also the first church (1989) in the Netherlands to allow the blessing of non-marital communities and also homosexual and lesbian relationships.

The Remonstrant Brotherhood is active ecumenically and a member of the World Council of Churches, although it is critical of the Council's basic statement: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches that accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour." It is also a member of the Council of Churches (in the Netherlands); the Conference of European Churches (since 1959); the International Congregational Council (beginning in 1949); and since 1970, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, because of its acceptance of the same spirit of freedom and tolerance, and the same aversion to church discipline in matters of faith. In 1973 the Brotherhood signed the Declaration of Leuenberg, an agreement between Reformed and Lutheran churches. The Brotherhood is also active in several international liberal councils.

The Brotherhood welcomes ministers from the Protestant Church of the Netherlands, the Fellowship of Liberal Reformed Protestants (Verenging van Vrijzinnig Hervormden), the Liberal Communion of Faith NPB (Vrijzinnige Geloofsgemeenschap NPB), and the Mennonite Church in the Netherlands (Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit) to lead worship in Brotherhood congregations.

Remonstrant Brotherhood
Nieuwegracht 27a
3512 LC Utrecht
The Netherlands
<http://www.remonstranten.org/> (in Dutch)

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Arminius, Jacob; Community of Protestant Churches in Europe; Mennonite Church in the Netherlands; Protestant Church in the Netherlands; World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

References

- Cossee, E. H., Th. M. van Leeuwen, and M.A. Bosman-Huizinga. De remonstranten. 2nd ed. Published in the series Wegwijs. Kerken en groeperingen. Kampen: Kok, 2001.
- Drees, W. B., ed. Een beetje geloven. Actualiteit en achtergronden van het vrijzinnig protestantisme. Amsterdam: Balans, 1999.

Hoenderdaal, G. J., and P. M. Luca, ed. Staat in de vrijheid. De geschiedenis van de remonstranten. Zutphen, the Netherlands: De Walburg Pers, 1982.

Kuiper, J., and Th. M. van Leeuwen, eds. Als een vuurbaken. Teksten over de functie van belijdenissen naar remonstrants inzicht. Zoetermeer, the Netherlands: Meinema, 1994.

van Leeuwen, Th. M. Van horen zeggen. Geschiedenis en uitleg van de bijbel. 2nd ed. Amsterdam: Balans, 1999.

Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints

See Community of Christ.

Restored Church of God

See Living Church of God (plus Global Church of God, and Restored Church of God).

Restored Reformed Church

The Restored Reformed Church (Hersteld Hervormde Kerk) has its origins in the right wing of the former Netherlands Reformed Church, which in 2004 merged with two other churches to form the Protestant Church in the Netherlands. Rather than enter the merger, many members and some ministers objected to this fusion because of their fear that the traditional fundamental doctrinal points would get lost in the new church. Also, they disagreed with the new rules governing church life, principally those that differed from the traditional rules of the Dutch Reformed Church of 1951, based on those from the Synod of Dordrecht (1618–1619). Also they disagreed with the possibility of the solemnization of homosexual relations in the new church. Finally, they especially disagreed with the membership of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands in the new church, as it had a totally different doctrinal position

The Restored Reformed Church reported 126 parishes with 53 active and 18 retired ministers and about 60,000 members (2007).

Restored Reformed Church
Postbox 116
3930 EC Woudenberg
The Netherlands

E. G. Hoekstra

See also: Protestant Church in the Netherlands.

References

Kerkelijk Jaarboek. Veenendaal, 2008–.
Hoekstra, E. G., and M. H. Ipenburg. Handboek christelijk Nederland. Kerken, gemeenten, samenkomsten en vergaderingen. Kampen: Kok, 2008.

Reuchlin, Johannes

1455–1522

Johannes Reuchlin was an influential leader of the German phase of the Humanist movement that arose in the 15th century with a new appreciation of classical languages, especially those in which the biblical text was originally penned. A Hebrew scholar, he would work for understanding between Christians and Jews, and in the end emerge as an advocate of the mystical appropriation of the Jewish Kabbalah.

Reuchlin was born on February 22, 1455, in Pforzheim, Baden, Germany. He attended the universities at Freiburg, Paris, and Basel, and after completing his master's degree, he taught Greek and Latin at Basel. He later turned his attention to mastering legal studies and received his bachelor's degree at Orléans. He later received a licentiate of law at Poitiers in 1481.

In 1482 and 1490 he made trips to Italy, where he met various Italian scholars known for their support of the new intellectual currents grouped under the general label of Humanism, and found himself well accepted as a colleague. Following the initial trip, he put his legal knowledge to work in the court of Count Eberhard of Württemberg. During these years he began his study of Hebrew. When the count died, he left the court somewhat fearful of the count's successor, but was able to find a new home in Heidelberg, where he became the counsel to the elector Johannes Reuchlin, German humanist and theologian.

(Archive Photos/Getty Images)

His study of Hebrew culminated in 1498, when he visited Italy and had an extended visit with some learned Jews. His knowledge would be put to work after his becoming the imperial judge of the Swabian Confederation (1502–1512) at Stuttgart. He involved himself in a bitter controversy with the semi-literate Johannes Pfefferkorn (1469–ca. 1521). Pfefferkorn had been raised Jewish but converted to Catholicism. He subsequently published an anti-Semitic work and continued the crusade against his former community in 1509 by asking the Holy Roman Emperor to have all Jewish books burned. As a counselor to the elector, Reuchlin was among the persons from whom the emperor sought counsel. Though aware that the power of the Dominican Order that ran the Inquisition was backing Pfefferkorn, Reuchlin ventured into the debate. By this time he had used his influence to introduce Hebrew into Germany, and in 1506 had published a Hebrew lexicon and grammar. He defended Jewish literature and argued that only the few books that were directly against Catholic faith should be destroyed. Destruction should only follow judicial review and assessment.

The Dominican leader in Cologne called for Reuchlin to appear before the court of the Inquisition to defend his position. Reuchlin utilized his legal skills (and his position) to appeal directly to the pope. The pope, in turn, bypassed the Dominicans and established a special commission to examine the charges and found Reuchlin not guilty (1514). While his case was being adjudicated, Reuchlin published a Hebrew text of the Psalms with an accompanying Latin translation (1512).

After the public battle, Reuchlin assumed a semi-retired life for a few years, but in 1520 finished his outstanding career at Ingolstadt (1520–1521) and Tübingen (1521–1522) as a professor of Greek and Hebrew. In the meantime, as he mastered Hebrew he had been drawn to the Kabbalah, the Jewish mystical system often associated with the Hasidic movement. During his last years he wrote extensively on it, developing a Christianized version usually termed “Cabala” that could be accessed without also adopting Judaism. While finding few others who shared his interest during his lifetime, his writings would become important in later centuries as Christian Cabala found an audience among Western Esotericists.

Reuchlin also inadvertently contributed to the Protestant Reformation. His publications had made the Hebrew text of the Jewish Bible more generally available, at least in scholarly circles, and Martin Luther (1483–1546) would draw upon them as he bypassed the Latin Bible to create a new German translation. He would also find his greatest support from a young biblical scholar who joined him on the staff at the University of Wittenburg, Reuchlin’s nephew Philipp Melanchthon (1497–1560). Unfortunately for Reuchlin, as the Reformation gathered steam, the pope’s commission reversed its decision on him and ordered him silenced. The order had little effect, however, as Reuchlin died at Liebenzell on June 30, 1522.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Dominicans; Hasidism; Humanism; Luther, Martin; Roman Catholic Church; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References :

- Reuchlin, Johannes. On the Art of the Kabbalah (De Arte Cabalistica). Trans. by Martin Goodman and Sarah Goodman. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1993.
- Reuchlin, Johannes. Recommendation Whether to Confiscate, Destroy and Burn All Jewish Books: A Classic Treatise against Anti-Semitism. Studies in Judaism and Christianity. New York: Paulist Press, 2000.
- Rummel, Erika. The Case Against Johann Reuchlin: Social and Religious Controversy in Sixteenth-Century Germany. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002.
- Spitz, Lewis. “Reuchlin’s Philosophy: Pythagoras and Cabala for Christ.” Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte 47 (1956): 1–20.

■ Réunion

Réunion, an island and a French overseas department in the Indian Ocean west of Madagascar, proved a strategic part of France’s colonial empire through the mid-19th century. Its 968 square miles provided an important stopping point for ships traveling around Africa to India and points east. Its value was diminished considerably after the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869. Over the last two centuries the population expanded considerably, from the first settlement to its present 766,000 (2004).

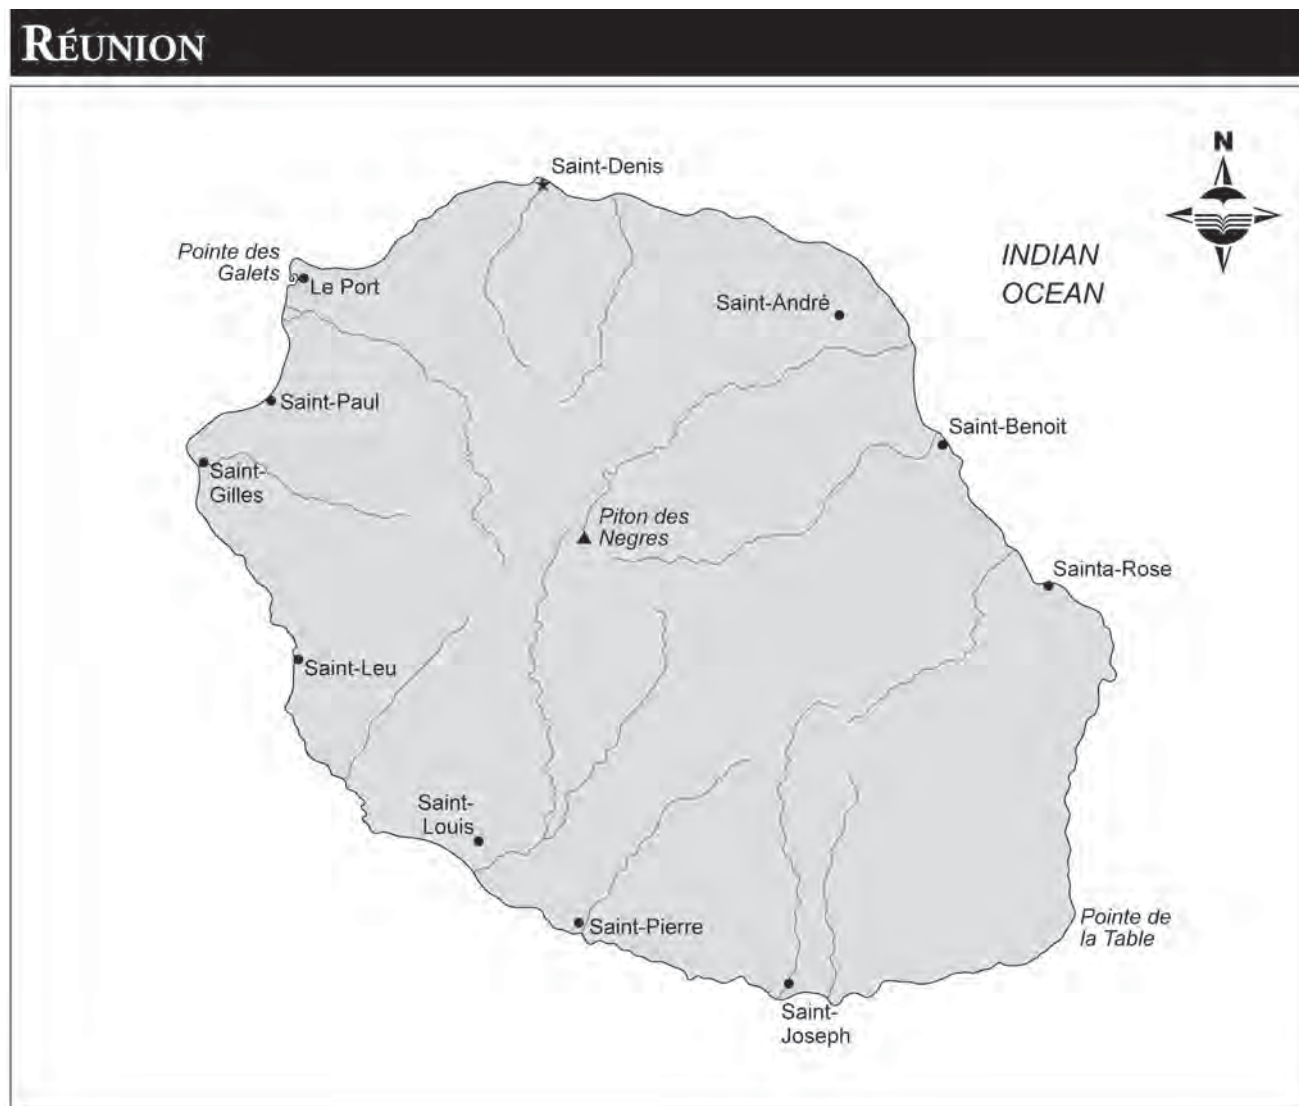

Réunion was uninhabited when Arab merchants discovered it in the 17th century, and remained as such when the Portuguese visited it at a later date. Finally, in the 18th century, the French established a settlement there and were able to assert their hegemony in the face of other European claims upon it. The French imported slaves to work the sugarcane and coffee plantations that the settlers created, and their descendants now form some 80 percent of the current population. The descendants of Chinese, Malaysian, and Indian laborers also reside on the island. Réunion’s colonial status was altered into that of a department in 1946. There has been continual unrest since 1978, when the United Nations pronounced its favor of the island’s independence.

Catholic church on the island of Réunion. (Yann Guichaoua/StockphotoPro.com)

Réunion

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	445,000	731,000	87.4	1.59	822,000	892,000
Roman Catholics	427,000	670,000	80.1	1.15	735,000	786,000
Protestants	2,200	48,300	5.8	2.45	70,000	90,000
Marginals	1,000	6,500	0.8	-0.59	14,000	19,000
Hindus	1,000	38,000	4.5	1.63	50,000	60,000
Muslims	10,900	35,000	4.2	1.63	41,000	50,000
Agnostics	1,000	16,400	2.0	3.55	30,000	40,000
Baha'is	1,200	7,200	0.9	1.93	10,000	14,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,000	3,500	0.4	1.63	4,000	4,000
Buddhists	0	1,600	0.2	1.63	2,400	3,600
Atheists	500	1,300	0.2	1.63	2,400	3,500
Jains	0	1,100	0.1	1.63	1,600	2,200
Sikhs	0	700	0.1	1.64	1,000	1,500
New religionists	100	300	0.0	1.57	500	800
Total population	461,000	836,000	100.0	1.63	965,000	1,072,000

The great majority of Réunion's residents are members of the Roman Catholic Church, which arrived with settlers in 1653. The first resident priest arrived in 1712. A new era began in 1817 with the arrival of the sisters of the congregation of Saint Joseph of Cluny, who used Réunion as the headquarters for efforts to evangelize East Africa. The Holy Ghost Fathers assumed control of the island in 1917. The Diocese of Saint Denis was established in 1966. It includes a Chinese mission that had been founded in 1951.

The Roman Catholic Church enjoyed a religious monopoly on Réunion until 1936, when the Seventh-day Adventist Church established work. The church's Réunion Conference, formally organized in 1947, is part of the Indian Ocean Union Mission. There is also some work by the Assemblies of God, the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Evangelical Church of Réunion, which grew out of the missionary efforts of the African Evangelical Fellowship.

Of religions other than Christianity, the Muslim community is the largest, though it is divided ethnically among Pakistani and Indian Muslims (mostly Shias) and East Africans (mostly Sunnis). There is a growing community of the Baha'i Faith, and a small Rosicrucian presence is supplied by the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis. Officially, Réunion guarantees freedom of religion.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Holy Ghost Fathers; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Eve, P. La religion populaire à la Réunion. 2 vols. Sainte-Clotilde, Réunion: Université de la Réunion, Institut de linguistique et d'anthropologie, 1985.
- Foulon, A. Les religions à la Réunion. Livry-Gargan, France: Editions Orphie, 1989.
- Ghasarian, Christian. "We Have the Best Gods! The Encounter between Hinduism and Christianity in La Réunion." Journal of Asian and African Studies 23, nos. 3–4 (1966): 286–295.
- Vaxelaire, Daniel. Le grand livre de l'histoire de la Réunion. Sainte Clotilde, Réunion: Orphie, 2003.

Rhenish Mission

The United Rhenish Missionary Society, now the United Evangelical Mission, headquartered in Barmen, Germany, and popularly known as simply the Rhenish Mission, was one of the most important Protestant Christian missionary sending agencies of the 19th century. Most of its missions matured into independent Lutheran churches. The society began with the effort of 12 German laymen who in 1799 met at Elberfeld, Germany, where they founded the Bergische Bible Society and the Wupperthal Tract Society. These two organizations merged with the Barmen Missionary Society (founded in 1815) to form the Rhenish Mission.

By the time of its creation, a new generation of leadership had recognized the opportunity for Protestantism on the world scene and had joined in what would become the movement's global expansion through the next century. The first commissioned missionary of the Rhenish Mission was sent to South Africa, though the center of the work became Namibia, where eventually 50 missionaries were supported. This work later matured into the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa.

While building the African work, the Rhenish Mission developed a second focus in Southeast Asia, and it opened work in the 1830s in Borneo. In 1846 its concentration shifted to China, where a large mission developed, though much of it was lost in 1951. The Chinese Rhenish Church–Hong Kong Synod (with congregations in Taiwan) is the primary surviving remnant of the Chinese mission, though some of the work survives through the congregations of the China Christian Council. One of the most successful missions was launched in 1861 in Sumatra, where the church continues today as the Batak Protestant Christian Church. The Rhenish Mission expanded further with the entrance of Germany into the world colonial enterprise in the 1880s and suffered exceedingly from the destruction of that enterprise at the end of World War I; its work in Asia was changed completely by the events of World War II.

Through the 20th century, the Rhenish Mission began the process of developing indigenous leadership and overseeing the transfer of power to local ministers and lay personnel. At the same time it watched the development of the Evangelical Church in Germany, whose members supplied most of its financial resources. In 1971 it merged with the Bethel Society, another German missionary organization, to form the United Evangelical Mission–Community of Churches on Three Continents. The new society became more closely affiliated with the Evangelical Church, and a new emphasis on social service ministries has developed.

Today, the Mission sees itself as an international communion of 34 churches in Africa, Asia, and Germany, and the von Bodelschwingh [Charitable] Institutions Bethel. Its administrative office is at the mission house in Wuppertal, Germany, with additional regional offices in Africa (Dar-es-Salaam), Asia (Medan), and Germany (Wuppertal).

United Evangelical Mission

Rudolfstr. 137

D-42285 Wuppertal

Germany

<http://www.vemission.org/> (in German and English)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelical Church in Germany; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa; Lutheranism.

Reference

Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Press, 1989.

Ridván, Festival of

Members of the Baha'i Faith consider the 12-day Festival of Ridván (Paradise) as pre-eminent among its various Holy Days. Ridván marks the inception of the Baha'i Faith as a distinct religion. It is observed from sunset on April 20 (marking the onset of April 21 in the Baha'i calendar) to sunset on May 2 but is punctuated with three Holy Days. On the 1st (April 21), 9th (April 29) and 12th (May 2) days of Ridván, work is suspended, as local Baha'i communities gather to commemorate the signal events of that historic occasion.

The Baha'i Faith was founded by Mírzá Husayn-'Alí Núrí (1817–1892), more popularly known by his spiritual title, Bahá'u'lláh (“Glory/Splendor of God”). It is also regarded as having been co-founded by Bahá'u'lláh's predecessor, Sayyid 'Alí-Muhammad of Shíráz (1819–1850), known as the Báb (the “Gate”).

The “Festival of Paradise” commemorates Bahá'u'lláh's private disclosure of his eschatological identity to a handful of his companions—around four years prior to his public proclamation to the rulers and religious leaders of the world (ca. 1867–1873). The unfolding of Bahá'u'lláh's prophetic mission was progressively revealed in a series of disclosures. To a select few Bábís, Bahá'u'lláh announced that he was the “Promised One” foretold by the Báb. Several years later (ca. 1867–1870), Bahá'u'lláh sent open epistles (called Tablets) to a select group of the world's most powerful potentates and clerics, proclaiming himself to be the “Promised One” foretold by the prophets of all past religions. In these Tablets, together with general Tablets addressed to kings and religious leaders collectively, Bahá'u'lláh stated that he was, inter alia, the long-awaited “World Reformer” who came to unify the world—a transformation that would, in the course of time, come about through the power of his universal principles and laws adapted to the needs of this day and age.

The history of Ridván begins during the afternoon of April 21, 1863 (around 3:00 p.m.), when Bahá'u'lláh arrived in the Najfbiyyih Garden, subsequently designated as the Garden of Ridván. Located on the east bank of the Tigris in Baghdad, Najfbiyyih was once a wooded garden, where Muhammad-Najf Páshá (Turkish: Mehmed Necib; d. May 1851), governor of Baghdad between 1842 and 1847, had built a palace and placed a wall around the garden. It is now the site of Baghdad Medical City (formerly known as Saddam Medical City), a large modern teaching hospital in Baghdad.

Bahá'u'lláh's entrance to the gardens signaled the commencement of his messianic announcement, first to his companions, and eventually to the world at large. Exactly what transpired, however, is shrouded in mystery, and accounts vary. Through the previous decade (1853–1863), Bahá'u'lláh had concealed his mission. This period of “messianic secrecy” has been referred to as the “Days of Concealment” (ayyám-i-butun—a term that connotes the image of embryonic development), although Bahá'u'lláh's writings in Baghdad during this period were rife with hints about his prophetic mission, especially in his pre-eminent doctrinal text, the Book of Certitude (Kitáb-i-Íqán), which was revealed in two days and two nights in January 1861.

Beyond the basic revelation that he was “He Whom God will make manifest,” Bahá'u'lláh also proclaimed three additional matters of great import to Baha'is. He (1) abrogated holy war (jihad); (2) asserted that no independent Messenger of God (literally, “Manifestation of God”) would appear for at least a full 1,000 years; and (3) dispensed entirely with the Islamic category of ritual impurity, or “uncleanness” (najis). Bahá'u'lláh later recounted this sweeping pronouncement in the Most Holy Book (the Kitáb-i-Aqdas): “God hath, likewise, as a bounty from His presence, abolished the concept of ‘uncleanness,’ whereby divers things and peoples have been held to be impure. He, of a certainty, is the Ever-Forgiving, the Most Generous. Verily, all created things were immersed in the sea of purification when, on that first day of Ridván, We shed upon the whole of creation the splendours of Our most excellent Names and Our most exalted Attributes.”

In 1869, as part of the subsequent public proclamation of his mission to the world's political and religious leaders, Bahá'u'lláh dispatched his second epistle (ca. 1869) to Napoleon III (d. 1873). In this Tablet (spirited out of Bahá'u'lláh's prison cell by a Baha'i pilgrim, who concealed the letter in the brim of his hat) to the emperor of France, Bahá'u'lláh announced: "All feasts have attained their consummation in the two Most Great Festivals, and in two other Festivals that fall on the twin days." Here, the two "Most Great Festivals" are the Festival of Ridván and the Declaration of the Báb (evening of May 22, 1844). The "twin days" refer to the Birth of the Báb (October 20, 1819) and the Birth of Bahá'u'lláh (November 12, 1817).

The Festival of Ridván is important for yet another reason: most Baha'i elections take place at this time. On the first day of Ridván (April 21), all local Baha'i councils, each known as a Local Spiritual Assembly, are democratically elected, in a "spiritual election" conducted prayerfully and meditatively.

The system of Baha'i elections is unique, both religiously and politically. Arash Abizadeh, assistant professor of political science at McGill University in Canada, notes that Baha'i elections are governed by formal institutional rules and informal norms that specifically prohibit such familiar features of the political landscape as nominations, competitive campaigns, voting coalitions, or parties. As an alternative model of democratic elections, Baha'i elections incorporate three core values at the individual, interpersonal, and institutional levels: (1) the inherent dignity of each person; (2) the unity and solidarity of persons collectively; and (3) the inherent justice, fairness, and transparency of elected Baha'i institutions. Baha'i elections thus serve four primary functions: (1) selection (electing representatives); (2) legitimation (authorizing Baha'i governing bodies in the eyes of the community at large); (3) education (cultivating the spirit of responsibility in each Baha'i voter); and (4) integration (fostering solidarity within the community as a whole).

National Baha'i conventions are also held during the 12-day Festival of Ridván for the purpose of electing national councils, each of which is called a National Spiritual Assembly. An exception to the timing of these conventions occurs once every five years, when the Universal House of Justice, the international governing council of the Baha'i Faith, is elected during the Festival of Ridván. The next is scheduled for Ridván 2013, with national Baha'i elections rescheduled for May.

The Festival of Ridván marks the inchoative establishment of the Baha'i religion as a distinct faith community through Bahá'u'lláh's disclosure of his divine authority. The Festival of Ridván also marks the progressive advancement of the Baha'i Faith as a distinct administrative order through the process of electing the faith community's governing authorities.

Baha'is believe that in a future Golden Age—in which a self-governing world commonwealth emerges as the fruit of social evolution enlightened by Baha'i socio-moral principles—the Festival of Ridván is destined to become the greatest celebratory event in the world, according to the teleological Baha'i vision of the inevitable course of human history.

Christopher Buck

See also: Baha'i Faith; Bahá'u'lláh; Birth/Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh; Birth of the Báb; Calendars, Religious; Temples—Baha'i Faith; World Religion Day.

References

- Abizadeh, Arash. "Democratic Elections without Campaigns? Normative Foundations of National Baha'i Elections." World Order 37, no. 1 (2005): 7–49.
- Bahá'u'lláh. The Summons of the Lord of Hosts. Haifa: Baha'i World Centre, 2002.
- Buck, Christopher. "The Eschatology of Globalization: Bahá'u'lláh's Multiple-Messiahship Revisited." In Studies in Modern Religions, Religious Movements and the Babi-Baha'i Faiths, edited by Moshe Sharon, 143–178. Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 2004.
- Buck, Christopher. Symbol and Secret: Qur'an Commentary in Bahá'u'lláh's Kitáb-i Íqán. Los Angeles: Kalimát Press, 1995, 2004.
- Keil, Gerald. Time and the Baha'i Era: A Study of the Badí' Calendar. Oxford: George Ronald, 2008.
- Phelps, Myron H. The Master in 'Akká. Los Angeles: Kalimát Press, 1985. Reprint of A Study of the Religion of the Babis, or Beha'is Founded by the Persian Bab and by His Successors, Beha Ullah and Abbas Effendi. New York & London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1903.

Walbridge, John. "Festival of Ridván." In Sacred Acts, Sacred Space, Sacred Time, 232–241. Oxford: George Ronald, 1996.

Rigpa Fellowship

Among the most popular books on Buddhism to be published in the West in recent years is Sogyal Rinpoche's work, The Tibetan Book of Living and Dying. When it was published in 1992, it introduced the author and his relatively new Tibetan Buddhist organization, Rigpa, to many people.

The Rigpa Fellowship was established in the United Kingdom in 1979 under the spiritual direction of Sogyal Rinpoche (b. ca. 1949). Born in Tibet in the late 1940s, Sogyal Rinpoche was brought up from an early age by his master, Jamyang Khyentse Chokyi Lodro, who recognized him as the incarnation of Tertön Sogyal (1856–1926), a teacher to the 13th Dalai Lama. In 1971 Sogyal Rinpoche moved to the United Kingdom in order to study comparative religion at Trinity College, Cambridge. Soon after, he moved to London, where he built up a small following of students and began to give teachings. In 1991 the present Rigpa Centre in north London was opened.

Eight international Rigpa retreats are held annually in various countries, drawing up to 3,000 participants overall. There are now 11 national centers around the world, in addition to retreat centers at Lerab Ling in the south of France and Dzogchen Beara in the southwest of Ireland. Buddhist teachers from a variety of traditions are invited to teach, as from the outset Rigpa has not relied exclusively on the teachings of Sogyal Rinpoche but has followed an ecumenical approach. International coordination takes place within three departments: finance and administration, teaching services, and executive directors. Though in each country there is a team responsible for running activities, the international staff offer support and are responsible for key strategic decisions in consultation with Sogyal Rinpoche and other lamas.

Rigpa has developed a graduated "study and practice" program that is delivered internationally, and that can take seven years to complete. It begins by introducing basic meditation practice, using samatha methods such as resting the mind on an object (usually a picture of Padmasambhava), mantra recitation, and watching the breath. Then the Mahayana compassion teachings of Lojong (Tibetan) are presented, together with the tonglen practice (giving and receiving). Next, students are introduced to the Vajrayana preliminaries, including "Going for Refuge" and bodhicitta (Sanskrit: "mind of awakening"). The main practice followed by committed students is the Longchen Nyingtik, which is based on the Dzogchen tradition of Tibetan Buddhism. In common with many other Buddhist groups, Rigpa does not rely on one sacred text but rather refers to a variety of Indian and Tibetan Buddhist texts.

Sogyal Rinpoche, founder of the Rigpa Fellowship, a Tibetan Buddhist organization. (Corbis Sygma)

In 1994 Sogyal Rinpoche was accused of fraud and assault. However these allegations were never proven. In response, senior students of Sogyal Rinpoche have said that they fear the lawsuit was part of a deliberate campaign to undermine the lama and his organization (Brown 1995). Sogyal Rinpoche, being from the Yogic tradition of the Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, is not a monk and is therefore not bound by the monk's rules. He is not celibate; indeed, he has a partner and a son.

In 2009, Rigpa reported 130 centers in 41 countries around the world.

Rigpa International
8 Rue de la Bouquerie
Lodeve 34700
France
<http://www.rigpa.org>

Rigpa USA, National Office
9540 Waples Street, Ste. A San Diego, CA 92121
www.rigpausa.org

Jamie Cresswell and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Nyingma Tibetan Buddhism; Padmasambhava; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Brown, Mick. "Scandal and the Living Buddha." Telegraph Magazine (London). February 25, 1995.
- Rinpoche, Sogyal. Glimpse after Glimpse. London: Rider, 1995.
- Rinpoche, Sogyal. The Spirit of Buddhism: The Future of Dharma in the West. New York: HarperOne, 2003.
- Rinpoche, Sogyal. The Tibetan Book of Living and Dying. London: Rider, 1992.

Rinzai (Japan), Lin-Chi (China), Imje (Korea), Lam-Te (Vietnam)

Rinzai, one of the five sects of Chinese Chan/Zen flourishing during the Sung period (960–1279), has survived until our times. It claims Lin-chi I-hsuan (Japanese: Rinzai Gigen; d. 866) for its founder, although it appeared as a distinct school a few generations after him. The pedagogical use of shouting that Lin-chi is credited for imprinted the sect with its roughness. After it split into two sub-sects, called Yang-chi (Japanese: Yogi) and Huang-lung (Japanese: Oryo), it became predominant when Chan/Zen was institutionalized during the Sung period.

Two figures stand out: Yuan-wu K'o-ch'in (Japanese: Enko Kokugon; 1063–1135) and his disciple Ta-hui Tsung-kao (Japanese: Daie Soko; 1089–1163). Yuan-wu, a fine representative of a learned Chan, compiled the "Blue Cliff Record" (Chinese: Pi-yen lu; Japanese: Hekiganroku), still an essential textbook for the sect. The Blue Cliff Record is composed of 100 "cases" or koan (Chinese: kung-an; Japanese: koan)—dialogues or blunt quotes—with commentary in prose and in verse.

With Ta-hui, the Lin-chi sect identifies with the method of "meditation that contemplates words" (Chinese: k'an-hua ch'an; Japanese: kannazen), in which the meditator concentrates on a key word (Chinese: hua-t'ou; Japanese: wato) taken from a kung-an (koan), in order to induce enlightenment (Japanese: satori). With the introduction of the koan, a new literature developed. Wu-men Hui-k'ai (Japanese: Mumon Ekai; 1183–1260) wrote a short compilation of 48 such kung-an called The Gateless Door (Chinese: Wu-men kuan; Japanese: Mumonkan), which had tremendous success in Japan.

The sect was introduced to Japan in the 13th century by a few Japanese and Chinese monks. Myoan Eisai (1141–1215), a Japanese monk who was made a Chan Master when visiting China, foreshadowed the interest in this tradition in Japan. He wrote a "Treaty on the Spreading of Zen for the Defense of the Country" (Japanese: Kozen Gokokuron), although he never tried to found a separate sect from Tendai Buddhism, to which he belonged. However, soon after it appeared in Japan, Rinzai experienced some success and quickly was institutionalized on the Chinese model. Its monasteries of Kyoto and Kamakura, known collectively as the Five-Mountains (Japanese: gozan), became important cultural, literary, and political centers in the 14th century, though lineages more intent on Buddhist practice remained somewhat independent of these more scholarly centers. Ikkyu Sojun (1394–1481) remains a popular figure of the sect. This uncompromising monk, close to the humble, embodied the saintly figure that mingles with the crowd of ordinary people. Like so many Japanese sects, Rinzai Zen knew a period of decline in the 16th and 17th centuries. It found its great reformer with Hakuin Ekaku (1685–1768), a sturdy and unconventional character.

Reikanji Temple in Kyoto, Japan, a nunnery of the Rinzai sect. (Jojobob/Dreamstime.com)

In Japan, Rinzai now exists through some 15 branches, which together include a few thousand monks and some 2.5 million followers. The majority of these developed from the primary lineage of Zen masters centered at the Myoshin-ji Monastery, established in the 14th century.

The Lin-chi sect has survived in China, where it crossed with elements of Pure Land Buddhism. In Japan, the Obaku sect, strictly separate from Rinzai, is a representative of this later form. Lin-chi Ch'an has also survived in Vietnam and Korea, although in syncretic forms. The Korean Chogye sect is thus a synthesis of the Lin-chi and Huayen sects. The work of Daisetsu T. Suzuki (1870–1966) introduced the Japanese sect to the West at the beginning of the 20th century. It has now settled in most continents, but compared to other Buddhist traditions, its impact remains relatively meager.

Eric Rommeluère
(English translation by Michel Proulx)

See also: Eisai; Kamakura; Pure Land Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Collcutt, Martin. Five Mountains: The Rinzai Zen Monastic Institution in Medieval Japan. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. 2 vols. Trans. by James W. Heisig and Paul Knitter. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1988, 1990.
- The International Research Institute for Zen Buddhism. <http://www.ijinet.or.jp/iriz> (Japanese and English). Accessed January 11, 2002.
- Two Zen Classics: Mumonkan and Hekiganroku*. Trans. with commentaries by Katsuki Sekida. New York: Weatherhill, 1977.
- The Zen Master Hakuin: Selected Writings*. Trans. by Philip B. Yampolsky. New York: Columbia University Press. 1971.

Rishikesh

Rishikesh, one of the most revered of India's religious sites, is located along the Ganges River as it flows through the Himalayan Mountains in the northern Indian state of Uttaranchal. The city is home to a spectrum of temples and an aura of sanctity sets the environment that attracts different Hindu religious functionaries and thousands of pilgrims. A variety of new religious movements have established their headquarters in or near Rishikesh.

Legends tie Rishikesh's origins to Lord Siva, a key Hindu deity. According to the Shrimad Bhaagavad, in the timeless past, the gods of the universe began a quest through the ocean of consciousness in search of amrit, the nectar of immortality. However, before the nectar could be found, a wave of deadly venom swept toward the gods. They were in a crucial situation as they came to understand that drinking the venom was a necessary step to get to the amrit. As the gods contemplated their dilemma, Siva volunteered to consume the venom. As it hit his throat, it stayed there and turned it blue. The Nilkanth Mahadeo Temple located about eight miles from Rishikesh is the traditional spot identified as the place where Siva stood to drink the venom.

In spite of the Siva tales, Bharat Mandir, built in the 12th century and Rishikesh's oldest temple, points people in a different direction. It is named after Bharat, the brother of Rama, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, to whom the temple is dedicated. The original temple was destroyed by Tamerlane (1336–1405), the Turkish conqueror who invaded the region in 1398, but was later rebuilt. Over the centuries, a number of famous sages lingered here to venerate Vishnu, some claiming to have been granted a vision of him.

Swami Sivananda (1887–1963) created Shiva Nanda Ashram, among the newer sites in Rishikesh; it is home to one of the most famous yoga schools in the world and the headquarters of the international Divine Life Society. Sivananda, who had wanted to be a physician in his younger years, transformed the image of Hindu monks (sannyasins) by advocating their adopting a life of service to the larger community. The original clinic founded by Sivananda evolved into one of India's largest charitable hospitals.

Hindu temple along the Ganges River in Rishikesh, India. (Federico Donatini/Dreamstime.com)

Equal in fame to Sivananda is Maharishi Melesh Yogi (1918–2008), who brought Transcendental Meditation to the West. Ved Niketan remains the main Indian center of the movement he founded (embodied by the World Plan Executive Council), though its importance has decreased from the 1960s, when, for example, it was the site for the meeting of the British musical group the Beatles with their guru. Today the ashram sponsors a large Ayurveda medical center and joins the other ashrams in the city to participate in the annual celebration of international yoga week (the first week of February).

Today, while pilgrims flock to Rishikesh's many temples, sadhus (ascetics) also gather there. These holy men will spend most of their days alone in the nearby forests but come to town periodically. Most often they head for the Triveni Ghat, a place along the river where pilgrims gather to gain the blessings available from bathing in the river, when they come to town.

The Ghat is the site for a ceremony called the Maha Aarti, which is performed each evening and includes the floating of flames on the river.

Rishikesh is only 15 miles from the equally holy city of Hardwar. Just across the river from Rishikesh is Tapovan, the site of additional temples worthy of the pilgrims' attentions, among the most famous being one dedicated to Lakshmana, who purportedly carried out penances there. In fact, the whole region is filled with temples and sacred sites. Within that larger environment, Rishikesh has functioned as the starting point for pilgrims wishing to gain access to the Char Dham and its four holy centers of Badrinath, Kedarnath, Gangotri, and Yamunotri, where they hope to achieve peace and harmony and rid themselves of their worldly pain and sorrows.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Asceticism; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Divine Life Society; Pilgrimage; Temples—Hindu; Yoga.

References

- Keemattam, Augusthy. The Hermits of Rishikesh: A Sociological Study. New Delhi: Intercultural Publications, 1997.
- Khullar, Reeta, and Rupinder Khullar. Gateway to the Gods: Haridwar Rishikesh; Yamunotri Gangotri Kedarnath Badrinath. New Delhi: UBS, 2004.
- Saltzman, Paul. The Beatles in Rishikesh. New York: Viking, 2000.
- Venkatesananda, Swami. Sivananda: Biography of a Modern Sage. Sivanandanagar: Divine Life Society, 1985.

Rissho Kosei-kai

Rissho Kosei-kai (Society for the Establishment of Righteousness and Friendly Intercourse) is a lay Buddhist new religion of Japan. It was founded on March 5, 1938, in Tokyo by Nikkyo Niwano (1906–1999) and Myoko Naganuma (1889–1957)—the result of a secession from another new religion called Reiyukai, a group in the tradition of Nichirenshu.

Rissho Kosei-kai, claiming a membership of about 6 million in 1999, is the second largest new religion in Japan. Its phenomenal growth, especially during the 1950s and early 1960s, is credited to its emphasis on traditional social values like filial piety and ancestor worship combined with faith in the Lotus Sutra. However, this movement faced a major crisis in 1956, when a Japanese newspaper, Yomiuri Shinbun, carried out a prolonged attack on its proselytization activities and financial deals.

In its initial phase, the movement greatly relied on shamanistic practices such as “bodily reading” (shiki-doku) of the Lotus Sutra by Naganuma and its interpretation by Niwano. After Naganuma’s death in 1957, the shamanistic practices ceased and the emphasis shifted to a more doctrinal approach. Although the doctrinal basis of Rissho Kosei-kai is the Lotus Sutra, what is original about its teachings is that it combines the emphasis on helping others achieve salvation, which is characteristic of the Lotus Sutra and Mahayana Buddhism, with the principle of the Four Noble Truths (shitai) of early Buddhism that emphasizes one’s own salvation. Rissho Kosei-kai preaches the practice of the Bodhisattva Way—that is, perfecting one’s personality through the realization and cultivation of the Buddha nature and saving others by leading them to the faith. One of the prominent features of Rissho Kosei-kai is its group counseling session, called the hoza. In hoza, members try to find solutions to their personal problems by applying the teachings of the organization. Since 1964, the Eternal Buddha Shakyamuni, whose image is enshrined in the Great Sacred Hall, has been declared as its focus of worship.

The proselytization activity of Rissho Kosei-kai is called the o-michibiki, which means “to guide.” In Rissho Kosei-kai, the leader-follower relationship is modeled after the parent-child (oya-ko) relationship; the senior member is referred as michibiki no oya (guide parent) and the new member is referred as michibiki no ko (guide child). Earlier this oya-ko relationship formed the basis of the branch organization, but since 1959 the parent-child branch system has been changed to a locality or diocese (kyoku)-based branch system. At present there are 239 branches in Japan and 6 branches overseas, mainly in the United States, Brazil, and Taiwan. In recent years Rissho Kosei-kai has distinguished itself in sponsoring inter-religious dialogue and international peace movements. Its social activities include sending blankets to the refugees in Africa and sponsoring the Donate One Meal Campaign. In 1969 it launched the Brighter Society movement for fostering community-based voluntary activities. It is also active in politics by supporting the candidates of conservative political parties.

Rissho Kosei-kai Headquarters

2-11-1 Wada, Suginami-ku

Tokyo 166-0012

Japan

<http://www.kosei-kai.or.jp> (in Japanese)

Ranjana Mukhopadhyaya

See also: Mahayana Buddhism; Nichirenshu; Reiyukai.

References

Dale, Kenneth J., and Akahoshi Susumu. Circle of Harmony: A Case Study in Popular Japanese Buddhism with Implications for Christian Mission. Tokyo: Seibunsha, 1975.

Morioka, Kiyomi. "The Institutionalization of a New Religious Movement." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, nos. 1–2 (1979): 239–280.

Niwano, Nikkyo. Lifetime Beginner, An Autobiography. Trans. by Richard L. Gage. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Co., 1978.

Rissho Kosei-kai. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Co., 1966.

Rodzima Wiara (Poland)

Rodzima Wiara (the Indigenous Faith Association, formerly Zrzeszenie Rodzimej) is a continuation of a neo-Pagan association called Zadruga, which was active in Poland before World War II and emphasized political more than religious goals. Rodzima Wiara was founded by Stanisław Potrzebowski and Maciej Czarnowski, a member of the original Zadruga, at the beginning of the 1990s and registered as a religious union in 1996. In contrast to its predecessor, the Rodzima Wiara offers not only right-wing politics, nationalism, and anti-Catholicism, but also a theology and some religious practices that are based on scarce remnants of Slavonic neo-Paganism.

The theology is polytheistic and related to the pantheon of Slavonic gods, with the Sun, Mother Earth, and the Universal Power of Nature mentioned as gods in the theological credo of the movement. The Sun is the principal god and the main object of religious ceremonies such as the Welcoming the Sun rite at dawn. The liturgical calendar is based on a solar rhythm, and collective rituals that take the form of a Greeting of the Sun are performed at the beginning of the astronomical spring, summer, and autumn. The most important of them is the Noc Kupały ceremony, celebrated at the beginning of the astronomical summer, during the shortest night of the year.

The membership of the movement had grown from 68 in 1996 to 143 in 1999, and it remains the most numerous in the western part of Poland. The five regional branches of the movement are relatively independent, and there are also informal groupings across the regional branches. One of them, perhaps the most nationalistic, is associated with the skinhead movement, and another, more individualistic, is associated with the Pagan Folk Music movement.

The movement has been active in the Union of Baltic and Slavic faiths and the World Congress of Ethnic Religions (the latter founded during the World Pagan Congress in Vilnius, Latvia, in 1998).

Rodzima Wiara
Pocztowa 16 / 15
53-313 Wrocław
Poland

Thadeus Doktor

Reference

Simpson, S. Native Faith: Polish Neo-Paganism at the Brink of the Twenty-first Century. Krakow: Nomos, 2000.

Roman Catholic Church

The term "catholic," from the Greek words meaning universal (katholikos), and according to the whole (kath'holou), was used in early Christianity to describe the nature of the church. The word "church" is also derived from Greek roots (ek kaleo; ekklesia), meaning “those who are called.” “Catholic” implied being “orthodox”—that is, possessing the fullness of truth and holding correct doctrines—and the term was used in opposition to those movements that were considered heretical or schismatic. Catholicity also includes an openness to or appropriation of all truth in all cultures, languages, theological traditions, and expressions of spirituality.

In early statements of the faith, especially in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (ca. 381 CE), a creed recited during the liturgy today, catholicity was noted as one of the marks of the church, along with unity, holiness, and apostolicity. After the growing divisions between the Eastern and Western churches, the term “catholic” began to be increasingly used as a title of the Western church, while the Eastern churches appropriated the name Orthodox Church. During the period of the Protestant Reformation, the additional title of “Roman” to Catholic was used to demarcate those in communion with Rome. Today the Catholic Church numbers approximately one billion faithful, with churches spread throughout the world, and it encompasses a number of distinct ecclesial traditions, which include the largest, the Roman, in addition to the Byzantine, Armenian, Maronite, East and West Syrian, Coptic, and Ethiopian rites. The name Roman Catholic specifically describes those in the Catholic Church who belong to the Roman tradition, while the other churches in this communion (Armenian Catholic Church, Bulgarian Catholic Church, Chaldean Catholic Church, Coptic Catholic Church, Ethiopian Catholic Church, Greek Catholic Church, Italo-Albanian Catholic Church, Maronite Catholic Church, Melkite Catholic Church, Romanian Greek Catholic Church, Ruthenian Catholic Church, Syrian Catholic Church, Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, and Ukrainian Catholic Church) have their own respective nomenclature and distinct liturgical and theological traditions.

The Roman Catholic Church traces its origins to the time of the Apostles, to those who were commissioned by Jesus Christ to preach his message of salvation (or eternal life). The church believes that it is a faithful and authoritative transmitter of the message of Christ. Of special importance in defining its apostolic character is the pre-eminence of its major see in Rome, the city in which the Apostles Peter and Paul preached and were martyred. From the early beginnings of the church, Rome has affirmed its special importance in being an ancient and authentic guarantor of the faith, a claim that developed over time into a theology that saw the pope (also called the Roman pontiff or the bishop of Rome) as primate of the universal church. Rome's formulation of a universal primacy, however, has never been fully accepted by the other early Christian tradition of the church—namely, the Orthodox Church, and churches that emerged out of the Protestant Reformation.

Pope John Paul II, head of the Roman Catholic Church, conducts the New Year's Day mass in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican, January 1, 1999. (AP Photo/Plinio Lepri)

The Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) has been the major defining moment for modern Catholicism, an event that moved the church beyond some of the more intransigent theological categories of the Council of Trent (1545–1563) and the First Vatican Council (1869–1870). This recent Council had a significant influence on the modern theology of the church, the laity, evangelization, and relations with other Christians and other faiths, as well as on issues of social, political, and economic justice, secular society and the sciences, and the role of the human conscience in moral decision making, to name a few.

Theological Emphases Catholic theology, and Christian theology for that matter, is rooted in the revelation of God in the Hebrew scriptures (the Old Testament), in the New Testament, and in the tradition of the church. Scripture and tradition form a unified common source for Roman Catholic theology. Continuity with tradition in worship and theology is an important characteristic of Catholicism.

Faith in God is based on the self-disclosure of God in history, through various events and persons, preeminently as transmitted in the church's canon of holy scripture. The scriptures are considered to be inspired by God, and thus are a normative and authoritative expression of the faith. In this approach, the New Testament, conveying the life and words of Christ and his Apostles, is seen as the fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies. A fuller knowledge of God was given through the revelation of the Son of God, or Jesus Christ, while the Spirit of God completes this transmission by making this revelation a continually living reality in the church throughout time. The public revelation of God is fulfilled in Christ and is concluded with the death of the last Apostle.

One may approach the knowledge of God through the use of reason, but only through revelation, and the corresponding response in faith, may one more fully apprehend the divine mystery. "Reason informed by faith" or "faith seeking understanding" implies the dialogue that occurs between faith (theology) and reason (the latter of which includes the modern sciences). All of humanity is called to respond to this revelation through the act of faith. The Second Vatican Council's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei verbum) reflects such a conception of revelation.

One should also note that three other texts of the Second Vatican Council—the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium), the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra aetate), and the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad gentes divinitus)—also provide additional themes on the notion of revelation. These texts address more explicitly the Catholic conception of the nature of revelation in the world religions, and they speak of Christ as the one who ultimately enlightens all nations. The mission of the church also includes mediating revelation for present times and cultures, where the official teaching body of the church, the magisterium, along with bishops and theologians, has a specific role in teaching and transmitting the faith. Doctrines are formal teachings of the church, and among them are included dogmas, which are teachings regarded as solemnly proclaimed and irreformable.

The Catholic Church holds a faith in one God, and so is monotheistic, but this monotheism is expressed in terms of a Trinitarian God, who is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Traditional Trinitarian theology has expressed such a God as three divine persons united by a common nature or essence. These divine persons are conceived of as analogically akin to human persons, with the qualification that human persons exist as individual centers of consciousness, while divine persons are defined in terms of persons-in-relation. This doctrine of the Trinity, although not explicitly contained in the scriptures, was developed in the early tradition in its reaction to various heresies, and it affirms that the three persons are distinct by saying that the Father is unbegotten, the Son is begotten, and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father (and/or through the Son). However, by virtue of their eternal communion or relationships, the three are simultaneously one. Perichoresis, or mutual indwelling, is the term used to express this inner-Trinitarian relationship. Sometimes their activity in the history of salvation is described as being Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, for Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, respectively. A number of theologians have used psychological analogies, which are not without their limits, to describe the unity and diversity of the three, and they speak of God as being the Mind, Word, and Will, or they use the analogy of love, speaking of God as Lover, Beloved, and Mutual Love. Language about the Trinitarian God is always qualified with the notion that created persons may not attain a full knowledge of the divine mystery by virtue of their created and finite natures, and so they rely on divine revelation in understanding how God is one, yet three. In Trinitarian theology, a methodological distinction is made between the immanent Trinity (God as mysteriously existing in the godhead) and the economic Trinity (God as active in the history of salvation), with the understanding that both ways of speaking about God refer to the same Triune God.

Very early in the tradition of the church, the notion emerged that God created the universe out of nothing (creatio ex nihilo) and that creation was good. These beliefs counteracted ideas that held that God created out of some pre-existent matter, a position that threatened the transcendence of God over created matter, or that creation was somehow accidental, which threatened the belief that God willed creation and had the absolute freedom to create. Creation in the book of Genesis is seen as good, willed by God, and a gift of God's love. There is linked to this protology (theology of first things) a rejection of any sort of dualism between good and evil in the material and spiritual realms. Such a God is Creator through the Son, who with the Spirit continually sustains and sanctifies creation. Of particular importance in such a cosmology is Jesus Christ, the Savior, through whom all of creation and humanity is renewed. Today's church seeks to correlate its fundamental theology of creation in the light of modern scientific discoveries, and it has become more sensitive to the crises existing in ecology.

Jesus Christ, as the second person of the Trinity, is seen as God who became incarnate in order for a fallen (sinful) humanity to attain salvation and in order for creation to be renewed. The incarnation is described by Saint Paul as a kenosis, which is literally a self-emptying or condescension of God's becoming human without thereby ceasing to be God. The name Christ means the anointed one—hence the related names of Messiah or Savior.

The classical doctrine in Christology (theology of Christ) is that Jesus Christ has two natures, both divine and human, which are united, without change, confusion, separation, or admixture, into one person. This doctrine, formulated very early on in the ecumenical councils, accounts for how Christ is Savior or Redeemer. As being fully God he is able to save, yet as also being fully human (of body and soul), he is able to freely accept the offer of salvation on behalf of humanity. Christ was like human persons in all things, except sin.

The Christ event, his incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension to heaven, are the components that form the basis of the theology of salvation (soteriology) wrought by Christ. The universal significance of this event is that Christ is the sole mediator between God and humanity. He is seen as mediator to God and as the head of the body (the church). In the latter aspect, the participation and life of the person and community occur in and along with Christ. This ongoing presence in the community comes through the Spirit of Christ, who forms the link between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. In this latter aspect, Christ becomes existentially relevant to each person's, and the church's, life—that is, in their personal and communal worship, prayer, and experience.

The theology of Christ is related to the theology of the Spirit (pneumatology), and one cannot be understood without the other. The Spirit is the one who descends upon Christ (at his baptism), anointing him for his mission to spread the gospel. Christ also sends the Spirit to be the ongoing life-giver and sustainer for the church (at Pentecost). This Spirit endows the church and persons with many charisms, or gifts of grace, allowing them to continue to spread the good news of salvation and to participate sacramentally in the life of Christ. This same Spirit is the one who inspires the prophets, ensures that the church will not falter in its faith, and is the principle of communion (unity) among persons and churches.

The Church, Ministry, and Magisterium Much of the modern theology of the church (ecclesiology) is contained in the Second Vatican Council's statements on the church, ecumenism, the church in the modern world, and the church's missionary activity. The Second Vatican Council variously described the church as the body of Christ, the people of God, and the temple of the Spirit. In its earliest beginnings, Christians saw themselves as being in continuity with the temple worship of Judaism. Only later, as the two faith traditions grew apart, did separate churches, in homes and designated buildings, begin to emerge.

The church is described as both an invisible and a visible reality. The visible church is the institutional and hierarchically structured community that exists in the created realm, while the invisible aspect accounts for the fact that the church is also a heavenly reality, in that it is a community that is the body of Christ that exists in communion with God. Both of these aspects refer to the sacramentality of the church—that is, its being a means of a life of grace or holiness. The term “communion of saints” expresses the holiness of the earthly and heavenly church. The church is also described as being both a universal and a local reality. The local church is the community of faithful in a given place (a parish, city, or region), while the universal church is the unity or communion of these local churches. There has been a tendency in Catholic theology sometimes to see each local church as a part of the universal church. Theologians such as Jean-Marie Tillyard, building upon the insights of the Second Vatican Council’s description of communion ecclesiology, have emphasized that each local church has to be seen as fully a church in order to affirm the fullness of life in Christ in each community, and that each local church simultaneously forms part of the universal communion of churches.

The church has from earliest times been characterized as having four marks: unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Unity is the oneness of life and doctrine in Christ and the Spirit. In modern times, there has been a concern for ecumenism, which is the dialogue that seeks unity between churches not in communion (or union) with each other. Major statements of agreement have come from dialogues with, for example, the Eastern Orthodox, Anglican, and Lutheran churches. Today’s churches realize that disunity is contrary to the will of God and threatens the effective witness of the church. As for the church’s holiness, it is primarily predicated on the notion that the church is essentially holy and lives a life of grace, despite its members at times being sinful. The previously mentioned etymology of the word “catholic” implies both a universality, but more important, a wholeness—the fullness of salvation is given in the church. The Second Vatican Council extended the notion of catholicity in its recognition that there are churches and ecclesial communities outside the Catholic Church that possess degrees of catholicity. The notion of apostolicity implies a continuity in the faith and ministry of the Apostles, and the authentic transmission of such faith in all times.

This mark of apostolicity is in part related to the institutional ministry, the latter of which is often described as safeguarding and transmitting Catholic doctrine, and as existing as servants to the faithful. The institutional church consists of a threefold ministerial structure of bishop, priest/presbyter, and deacon. The bishop is one who oversees each local community (diocese) but who is also entrusted with responsibility for the whole church. Each bishop is part of an episcopal college, whose head is the pope. This episcopal college formally meets either in conferences (of regions, countries) or in international bodies, such as in a council or synod. Priests and deacons are united to the bishop and pastorally minister to their respective local churches. Priests generally preside at the Eucharistic celebration, and when present, so do the bishops.

The notion of the Petrine ministry, the special commissioning of Peter to be the “rock” (foundation) upon which the church was to be built (Matthew 16:17–19), forms the basis of the claim of a universal primacy of the bishop of Rome, though each bishop in the church also shares this same Petrine vocation. Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) in his encyclical Ut unum sint (1995), called for a re-envisioning of the role of the papacy in order for it to be more ecumenically acceptable to other Christian churches.

Each pastor of the church and each member of the church are called to spread the gospel; however, a special responsibility to teach is entrusted to the bishops. Formal teaching authority in matters of the faith and morals was entrusted to the successors of the Apostles—namely, the bishops, who are to guard and explain the faith fully. The word “magisterium” (Latin: magister: master) refers to the teaching authority of the church, and it is generally used to describe two types of teaching: extraordinary and ordinary. One type of the exercise of extraordinary magisterium is a universal (ecumenical) council when it proclaims a doctrine to be definitively held—hence, to be infallible. The First

Vatican Council (1869–1870) also decreed that the pope, as the one speaking from the chair of the bishop of Rome (ex cathedra), when he teaches on matters of faith and morals a doctrine to be universally held by the entire church, can teach infallibly. There has been only one such explicit exercise of papal infallibility in the history of Catholicism (Mary's Assumption, 1950). Ecumenical councils and infallible definitions of the pope as such are regarded as teachings of the extraordinary magisterium.

Another distinction to the teaching authority in the church is that exercised by each bishop, the entire episcopal college, or the pope in teaching on faith and morals in their “ordinary” teaching. Papal encyclicals, letters, statements of the various curial offices of the church (for example, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith), or the bishops when teaching as individuals or as a collegial body, are examples of this aspect. Such a teaching function does not enjoy the charism of infallibility, but it is seen as authoritative and it does call for respect for the teaching (although infallible teachings may be contained in such an exercise of magisterium). According to canon law, dissent from ordinary magisterial teachings is theoretically possible, provided a number of strict conditions are met; however, dissent from infallible teachings is not permissible. The term “creeping infallibility” is used to describe the misconceived belief that all papal teachings are infallible. Another question in contemporary ecclesiology is to what extent the various curial offices can exercise magisterium outside of the college of bishops.

The distinction between extraordinary and ordinary magisterium is based on the theology of the development of doctrine. This notion of development essentially means that the church may explicitly teach a truth not explicitly contained in the Apostolic deposit of faith, or that the church may grow in its understanding of a doctrine, or that the expression of a doctrine may change in order to adapt to different languages and times, without the content of the doctrine changing. A further distinction is that the content of an infallible doctrine may not change, but doctrines not considered infallible may change. Changes in formal teaching in Catholicism have included the prohibition of slavery, religious liberty for all persons, and that there is the possibility of salvation outside the church. Another important doctrine is the sensus fidelium (sense of the faithful), which affirms that the Spirit of God has been bestowed upon the entire church, and not simply on the institutional ministries. The supernatural sense of the faithful can manifest an unerring quality when they reflect a universal consensus on faith and morals. The theological notion of reception is related to sense of the faithful when doctrines of faith and morals are received by the church as correct and authoritative, while non-reception would imply an ecclesial rejection of a teaching.

The College of Cardinals has a duty in assisting the papacy as a consultative body in governance of the universal church or in electing a new pope. The Roman curia is the formal ecclesial bureaucracy that assists in papal government through various congregations, councils, and commissions.

The ministry of the church is extended through various religious orders, special societies in the church whose members commit themselves to public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and life in community with fellow members. Such societies are generally dedicated to specialized service in the church, whether education (Marist Brothers, Jesuits), evangelism (Dominicans), publishing (Society of Saint Paul), service to the poor or ill (such as the Missionaries of Charity, Sisters of Saint Joseph), or a life of prayer and contemplation (Carmelites). A number of these orders have assumed a particular role in foreign missions and the spread of the church internationally, including the Benedictines, Dominicans, Franciscans, Holy Ghost Fathers, Jesuits, Salesians, Ursulines, and White Fathers. There are also many local and international lay communities or associations who share in the life and mission of the church. One can number among these the Catholic Worker Movement (committed to social justice and peace), L'Arche (communities for those with disabilities), and Covenant House (providing shelter for homeless youth).

Theological Anthropology, Nature, and Grace

Theological anthropology deals with issues of human nature, creation, the relationship with God, free will, sin, and redemption. Catholic theology sees the person as created in the image and likeness of God, and thus possessing freedom of determination. All persons are called to live in a relationship with God, through Christ and in the Spirit, and the ultimate destiny to which each person is called is eternal life in the Trinitarian God.

The relationship between God and humans is expressed in the classic Catholic formulation of nature and grace. Nature in the nature-grace categories refers to our human condition and innate capacity to desire and receive grace, grace being the gratuitous divine self-communication or divine presence. This formulation is meant to bring to light two important points. The first is that grace is a free gift of God to human beings, and that the person is called to freely accept this gift. This doctrinal area implies a relationship with God and a transformation, or sanctification, of the person that results from that relationship. The other part of the equation is that grace cannot be attained by our own actions, or, in other words, one cannot attain salvation through one's own efforts. The scriptural formulation of this relationship is best expressed by contrasting a life lived in grace with a life lived in sin. The Western Christian tradition has tended to see grace as healing one from sin, while the Eastern Christian tradition has generally seen grace as leading to a process of sanctification or divinization, and despite the different emphases, both aspects exist in each tradition. The sanctifying and transformative power of grace is also now being incorporated into a theology of grace that includes all of creation, and not just humanity.

A distinction is drawn between uncreated grace and created grace. Uncreated grace refers to the inner Trinitarian life of God, while created grace refers to the gift and effects of being sanctified and brought into communion with God. This grace is also a universal gift that allows for the possibility of those who do not explicitly know Christ or God to authentically respond to God's offer of grace. Theologian Karl Rahner (1904–1984) has characterized this as “anonymous Christianity.” This position still affirms that Christ is the unique or sole mediator of that divine grace. The Second Vatican Council's Declaration on Non-Christian Religions (Nostra aetate) addresses the church's relationship to Judaism, Islam, and other world religions. The text acknowledges the unity of humanity because of the creative work of God, and does not reject things that are true and holy in these religions. Dialogue and collaboration, as in the realm of ecumenism, is encouraged. The Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Church recognized that non-Christians may achieve salvation, despite not being members of the visible Church.

Man and woman are also seen as being affected by original sin and the sins of humankind. Modern theology of sin has moved beyond some of the problems associated with holding a doctrine of biological transmission of sin or the sins of the first humans, and has viewed original sin in terms of a primordial (first) sin and personal responsibility. In a literal interpretation of the Genesis creation account, sin could be envisioned in categories of biological transmission. However, in the light of modern anthropology, psychology, and biblical criticism, Adam and Eve can be seen as symbols of the whole human race, which would emphasize each person's individual responsibility for sin. Catholicism has spoken of the corporate nature of sin, and that such sin can be manifested in a distortion of certain relationships (whether these be ecclesial or social, for example).

The theology of sin also addresses two basic types of sin: venial or mortal. Venial sins are spoken of as immoral because of their matter or because of a defect in the knowledge and freedom of the one sinning. Mortal sins are more severe in their subject matter and because there is the added notion that those committing them manifested sufficient thought and consent. Mortal sins destroy communion with God, while venial sins mar, but do not completely destroy, this communion.

Saints and Mary The term “saint,” in common usage, refers to one who has been canonized by the church—that is, one who has been formally recognized to have lived a life of holiness or a life of grace. The numerous recognized saints witness to the diversity of lives and approaches to spirituality. An important part of ecclesiology and the theology of grace, though, is that all those who have attained salvation have become holy, or saints (both those canonized and those not). The communion of saints means that after death there still exist relationships between all Christians, both dead and alive. In Roman Catholicism, there is a formal process of recognition of sainthood that involves a number of criteria. A person is recognized by the church as blessed, then is beatified, and finally, is canonized. This process involves formal investigation of the person's life and attribution of miracles to a particular saint. Beatification allows a public veneration of the person, while canonization is a definitive belief that the person in question has indeed attained eternal life. Saints are not prayed to as if they are God, but rather, they are prayed to for their intercessory prayers—the grace and blessings always come from God. A distinction is made between the veneration of a saint and the worship (adoration) that is due to God alone. Veneration of saints, their images, statues, relics, or icons always leads to a worship of God.

Mary holds a special place of veneration among the saints, followed by the Apostles and early martyrs. Mary's particular importance within the cult of the saints stems from her sanctity of life and her accepting to be the mother of Jesus Christ. Mary is sometimes spoken of as the mother of God (Greek: Theotokos)—not of the divine nature of God, but of the incarnate Son of God. The theological understanding of Mary emerged alongside the early church's formal declarations on the nature of Christ. Mary is seen as being a virgin who conceived by the Holy Spirit, not by human procreation. Two other doctrines about Mary are important in Catholic theology—namely, the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption. The Immaculate Conception, a doctrine formalized in 1854, teaches that Mary, from the moment of her conception, by the grace of God and the merits of Christ's saving work, was free from original sin. The Assumption holds that Mary was taken up to heaven in body and soul. The Assumption witnesses to the fact that Christ's saving work will ultimately triumph over sin and death, and that all may hope for eternal life. The church does not require assent to apparitions of Mary (such as at Fatima and Lourdes).

Sacraments Sacraments, or mysteries, are means of the mediation of divine grace, signs of faith and acts of worship that are rooted in the ultimate mystery of the church being like a sacrament. Participants experience the grace and power of God, which is bestowed upon them gratuitously by virtue of Christ's suffering, death, and resurrection. The Christ event is thus the foundation for sacramental theology. The term in Greek, mysterion, connotes a broader understanding of God's grace to humanity, which is not limited to the number of sacraments. A trait of Catholicism is that it envisions itself as being sacramental—that is, as mediating communion with God. Modern theology after the Second Vatican Council has also emphasized the importance of the Christ event, as Christ being the first or primordial sacrament, and as the church also being like a sacrament. The number of formal sacraments, though, is seven: baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, reconciliation (penance), anointing of the sick, matrimony (marriage), and holy orders (ordination).

There are three sacraments of Christian initiation: baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist. Baptism is the incorporation of a person into the church, the body of Christ, and leads to the restoration of the imago in Christ of the one being baptized. The forgiveness of sins also forms part of the theology of baptism. Christian churches generally recognize the unrepeatable character of baptism, provided that the act is done with a Trinitarian formula—that is, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—and the use of blessed water. As an incorporation into the church, each person thus also enters into the “priesthood of all believers.” Baptism is thus seen as an ordination into the community, where the one baptized now forms part of the Eucharistic celebration.

Confirmation (chrismation) is an anointing with the holy oil of chrism whereby the initiate is sealed with the gift of the Spirit. Confirmation was initially practiced within the context of baptism, but it has become separated from this rite of initiation. Confirmation is celebrated as a second sacrament for baptized children who have reached the age of reason, and have thus undergone further catechesis, or it forms part of the rite of Christian initiation of adults. The Catholic Church, though, has in ecumenical dialogue with the Orthodox churches recognized the unity of the ancient rite of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist, which proffered all three upon the one being initiated.

The Eucharist is seen as the culminating point of the initiation process, preceded by baptism and confirmation. Eucharist is literally a sacramental “thanksgiving” and praise of God, and a remembrance of the past and recollection of what God will do in the future. In the Eucharist, through participation in the mystical Body and Blood of Christ, sacramentally represented by the bread and wine, the faithful are brought into communion (union) in the body of Christ through the descent of the Spirit.

The sacrament of reconciliation is a ritual in which sins of the baptized are forgiven, thus leading to a reconciliation between the person and God. In reconciliation, the church recognizes that sin has a social dimension that affects the community. This sacrament, echoing the New Testament's universal call to reconciliation, also includes a penitential act, of either prayer or good works. Prayer, as a reconciliation with God, forms an important part of this ritual. A number of rituals exist with regard to reconciliation, whether it be a communal act or private act, or a combination of the two, with reconciliation before imminent death another ritual.

Anointing of the sick is also part of the church's prayer services, and has since medieval times been largely administered to those who are gravely ill or dying. Extreme unction is a synonym for this sacrament. In recent times there has been a renewal of this sacrament also to include all who are ill or those in old age.

Marriage is seen as an indissoluble covenant between a man and a woman that is geared to the expression of love between the two, and is also naturally ordered to the procreation of children. This marriage covenant echoes the fidelity of the covenant of God to the people. The church does not dissolve marriages that are sacramentally valid and consummated. Marriages, though, are dissolvable under very specific conditions set out by church canon law and that are adjudicated by local diocesan marriage tribunals.

Holy orders are basically a sacrament of ordination into the institutional priesthood, diaconate, or episcopate. The church teaches that through ordination, one becomes united in the ministry of Christ and the Apostles. Ordained ministers serve the church in various ways and in various degrees, from safeguarding the deposit of faith, governing, and administering the sacraments, to sanctifying. Generally, ordained ministers are celibate men. The primary justification for this is based upon the prototype of the high priesthood of Christ. There has since the last century been a movement in the church to extend ordination to women, especially in view of the increase in their roles in areas traditionally exercised by men, such as chaplaincy, spiritual direction, and pastoral associateship.

The Kingdom of God and Eschatology Eschatology (theology of last things) addresses questions such as death (or the end of the world), judgment, heaven, purgatory, hell, the resurrection of the body, and the coming of the kingdom of God. As mentioned, the goal of human existence is eternal life in God, which is expressed in Catholic theology as the beatific vision, and through the notion of the coming of the kingdom of God, or the end times (the eschaton or parousia). The kingdom of God theologically means the rule or reign of God. The end of the world does not necessarily imply the end of created matter, however, for the cosmos could be mysteriously transfigured. In the church's vision, the kingdom of God is already mysteriously upon us, yet this eternal kingdom is still awaiting its final consummation. This is antinomically described as the "already but not yet." Eternal life is a vision of God, and living in an eternal relationship of love and knowledge of God.

The church has never formally taught that anyone is in hell, or that it is a place of punishment by God; rather, hell is the place of total absence from God for those who would reject the gift of eternal life. Purgatory is seen as an intermediary place of purification from one's sins in preparation for the beatific vision. Purgatory has been spoken of in terms of a penal process, but some modern theologians have tended to focus on this intermediate state as a place of preparation and sanctification for eternal life. The church's magisterium has generally held that the resurrection of the dead takes place at the end of time, but some theologians have left open the possibility of an individual resurrection immediately after death. The destiny of each Christian thus includes purgatory, the resurrection of the body and soul, and the beatific vision (eternal life).

The Roman Catholic Church has its headquarters in Vatican City, a five-acre sovereign nation (the smallest of all the world's countries). In stark contrast, the Roman Catholic Church is the world's largest religious organization, with slightly more than one billion members, or approximately 16 percent of the world's population. The Roman Catholic presence on the Internet is massive. The church has an official website at <http://www.vatican.va/>. In addition, many dioceses and religious orders also have web pages, and numerous sites of both a supportive and critical nature. <http://www.catholic.net/> is particularly helpful, with links to a variety of Catholic periodicals, papal encyclicals, and other church documents.

Jaroslav Z. Skira

See also: Armenian Catholic Church; Bulgarian Catholic Church; Chaldean Catholic Church; Coptic Catholic Church; Death; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Dominicans; Eastern Orthodoxy; Ethiopian Catholic Church; Franciscans; Greek Catholic Church; Holy Ghost Fathers; Italo-Albanian Catholic Church; Italy; Jesuits; Maronite Catholic Church; Martyrdom; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Melkite Catholic Church; Paul; Relics; Romanian Greek Catholic Church; Rome/Vatican City; Ruthenian Catholic Church; Saints; Salesians; Syrian Catholic Church; Syro-Malabar Catholic Church; Theology; Ukrainian Catholic Church; Ursulines; White Fathers.

References

- Annuario Pontificio*. Città del Vaticano: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, issued annually.
- Bokenkotter, Thomas A. A Concise History of the Catholic Church. Rev. ed. Garden City, NY: Image, 1990.
- Fiorenza, Francis Schüssler, and John P. Galvin, eds. Systematic Theology: Roman Catholic Perspectives. 2 vols. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1991.
- Flannery, Austin, ed. Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents. Rev. ed. Boston: St. Paul, 1992.
- Foley, Leonard. Believing in Jesus: A Popular Overview of the Catholic Church. 4th ed. Cincinnati, OH: St. Anthony's Messenger, 2001.
- Foy, Felician A., and Rose M. Avato. A Concise Guide to the Catholic Church. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1984.
- Hellwig, Monika K., ed. The HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Hellwig, Monika K. Understanding Catholicism. New York: Paulist, 1981.
- McBrien, Richard P. Catholicism. Rev. ed. New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994.
- Rahner, Karl. The Content of Faith: The Best of Karl Rahner's Theological Writings. Ed. by Karl Lehmann and Albert Raffelt. Trans. by Harvey D. Egan. New York: Crossroad, 1993.

■ Romania

The boundaries of the present state of Romania were essentially set after World War II, when Transylvania was taken from the defeated Hungary and made a part of Romania. As constituted, the newly reshaped country had some 91,700 square miles of territory. Today (2008) it has a population of 22,247,000.

The Romanian people can be traced to the ancient Dacians, who appear in history in the fourth century BCE, when several were sold as slaves in Athens. Their homeland was the Carpathian Mountains, which cut through what is now modern Romania. Rome conquered the region in 109 CE. The land north of the mountains, Transylvania, and south, Walachia, became Dacia Superior and Dacia Inferior, respectively. The Roman occupation, which lasted until 270, left a significant imprint on the region and gives the country its contemporary name. The withdrawal of Rome left the region open to successive waves of invading troops, though a somewhat stable period began in the seventh century with the incorporation of the area into the Bulgarian Empire.

Romania's history is marked by the invasion of the Mongols in 1241, when most of the records of its past were destroyed, and history essentially began anew in 1290 with the founding of the principdom of Walachia with headquarters at Curtea de Arges. At the same time, Hungary consolidated its control of Transylvania. Walachia struggled to remain independent from the more powerful Hungarians to the north and, increasingly in the 15th century, from the growing Ottoman Empire.

Roman Catholic Episcopal church and Holy Trinity monument in Timisoara, Romania. (iStockPhoto.com)

Wallachia became a Turkish province in 1417, but for the next century various attempts were made both to keep the Turks from occupying the land and to maintain the culture and religion of the people intact. Among the figures who came to the fore in the middle of the century was Prince Vlad (ca. 1431–ca. 1476), who became known for his efforts to unite the Wallachians and his battles against the Turkish armies. Considered a national hero by modern Romanians, he has become infamous in the West after his other name, Dracula (or son of Dracul, which in Romanian means “son of the dragon”), was given to the title character in Bram Stoker’s vampire novel.

Although the Turkish advance was checked in 1529 at Vienna, Turkish dominance of Hungary and Wallachia remained through the rest of the century. There was a brief respite from Turkish rule beginning in the 1590s, but the Turks came into power again in the 17th century. Wallachia remained under Turkish control until Russia became involved. In 1812, Russia took control of the southeastern part of Moldavia and continued to put pressure on the Ottomans in the region. Step by step, greater levels of autonomy were introduced. In 1859, Alexandru Ion Ciza emerged as the ruler of a united Wallachia and Moldavia, which was recognized as the independent country of Romania in 1878 following the Russian Turkish War of 1877. Then in 1916, Romania aligned itself against Hungary and Austria in World War I, and it was awarded Transylvania when the Austro-Hungarian Empire was dismantled in 1918.

Romania was occupied by Germany during World War II. After the war, the country came under Russian influence, and in 1946 the Communists took control of the government. In 1965, Nicolae Ceausescu (1918–1989) became head of the Communist Party and in 1967 president of the country. He began to pursue a policy somewhat independent of Russia, and emerged as a most brutal dictator. A combination of economic problems and government corruption led to massive discontent that culminated in the revolution of 1989 that drove Ceausescu from power and led to the establishment of a democratic government in the country.

ROMANIA

Christianity was introduced into the Danube region, according to legend, by the Apostle Andrew in the first century. Documents are scarce, but a bishop resided at Tomis by the fourth century, and a bishop from Banat-Marisena attended the Ecumenical Council of 787. In subsequent centuries, Romania was on the battle line between the Byzantine Greek and the Roman Latin churches. The swing of Wallachia and Moldavia into the Greek camp was solidified during the two centuries of Bulgarian control. The work of Cyril and Methodius in introducing the Slavonic liturgy also influenced the developing church.

When Wallachia was founded as a separate state, Orthodoxy dominated. In 1359 an Orthodox bishop sent from Constantinople settled at Curtea de Arges. A second diocese was erected at Severin in 1370. Although Orthodoxy was the dominant force in Transylvania, the Roman Catholic Church was on the ascendancy. Benedictines had established themselves in Cluj and Saniob in the 11th century, and Franciscans and Dominicans arrived in the 13th century. From the 14th century, Orthodoxy became increasingly established in Wallachia and Catholicism in Transylvania. A bishopric was established in Moldavia in 1401.

As Hungary became the dominant force in Transylvania, the Orthodox Church was suppressed. In 1279 the Orthodox were stopped from building new churches and the Orthodox faith prohibited. The dominance of Roman Catholicism was bolstered by the arrival of many Germans into Transylvania. The Orthodox Church survived through the 17th century, but once Austria gained dominance of the region in 1687, systematic efforts to convert the Orthodox began. As part of its missionary thrust, Catholics founded the Romanian Catholic Church, an Eastern-rite church. Under threat of the loss of civil rights, the head of the Orthodox Church agreed to unite with Rome in 1698.

Early in the 16th century, an additional factor was introduced into Romanian religious life with the arrival of Protestants, both Lutherans and Reformed, from German-speaking areas to the west. Although they initially had their greatest success in the German-speaking communities, both a Hungarian- and a Romanian-speaking Protestant movement emerged. Transylvania also became home to an important (and the surviving) wing of Unitarianism (non-Trinitarian Christianity), which had also emerged in the 16th century and established itself briefly in Poland.

The progress of Christianity was checked somewhat by the conquest of the Ottomans, dedicated Muslims. Muslims from the area north of the Black Sea had entered what is now Romania as early as the 13th century, but others moved into the region following the spread of Ottoman control across Romania and into Hungary. Muslim strength was concentrated in the Danube River Valley, west of the Black Sea.

Independence in 1878 set the stage for a set of changes in Romanian religious life. Most important, in 1885, Orthodox believers established the Romanian Orthodox Church as an autocephalous body no longer under the administrative jurisdiction of the ecumenical patriarchate in Constantinople. Second, various Protestant/Free churches, most prominently the Baptists, saw an opportunity to plant their brand of Christianity in Romania. The original Baptist community was founded in 1856, but after 1877, Baptist churches began to appear across the country. Initial growth was in the German-speaking and Hungarian-speaking communities, but by the turn of the century a significant Romanian Baptist church had been formed. In 1917 there were 23,000 Baptists, of whom 11,000 were Hungarian, 10,000 Romanian, and only 1,000 German. Other new groups entering at this time were the Church of the Nazarene, the Christian Brethren, and the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Pentecostalism began in Romania through a Romanian magazine published in the United States. The first prayer house opened in 1922, and in 1925 what became the Apostolic Church of God of Romania was organized. The Jehovah's Witnesses first appeared in 1912.

Religious life in Romania did not fare well through most of the 20th century, especially in the decades following World War II. The addition of Transylvania brought a score of new religions into Romania, where the Orthodox Church had a preferred role. Orthodoxy was hit with a schism in 1924, following its adoption of the Gregorian calendar, the Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church being set up by those who continued to adhere to the Julian calendar. A law on religious organizations passed in 1928 that both favored some groups—those Christian churches that had a long history in the region—and prohibited the activity of the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Pentecostals, the Nazarenes, and a number of other smaller groups. Following the change in government after World War II, authorities moved to merge the Romanian Catholic Church into the Romanian Orthodox Church. This unhappy union led to the arrest of many who refused to discontinue Catholic rites.

The primary losers in Romania through the 20th century, however, were the Jews. Following their expulsion from Iberia (1492–1493), many Sephardic Jews moved to Romania. They were not allowed to organize until 1730. In the 19th century, especially in Transylvania, the Jewish community divided along Reformed and Orthodox lines. Jews were officially recognized in 1894 in Transylvania and in 1923 and 1928 in Romania. The federation of the Jewish Communities of Romania accommodated units for its two branches.

Romania

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	16,841,000	20,883,000	98.8	–0.40	19,326,000	15,807,000
Orthodox	16,194,000	19,340,000	91.5	0.01	18,000,000	14,780,000
Roman Catholics	2,834,000	1,880,000	8.9	–1.01	1,700,000	1,400,000
Protestants	1,586,000	1,910,000	9.0	2.59	1,800,000	1,500,000
Agnostics	1,703,000	150,000	0.7	–5.07	80,000	50,000
Muslims	250,000	75,000	0.4	–0.46	65,000	50,000
Atheists	1,356,000	25,000	0.1	–8.50	10,000	8,000
Jews	100,000	6,500	0.0	–0.47	6,000	5,500
New religionists	3,000	3,700	0.0	–0.47	3,000	2,500
Baha'is	0	1,900	0.0	–0.46	2,000	3,000
Chinese folk	0	1,200	0.0	–0.46	1,200	1,200
Buddhists	0	500	0.0	–0.46	800	800
Total population	20,253,000	21,147,000	100.0	–0.47	19,494,000	15,928,000

There were an estimated half-million Jews in Romania at the beginning of World War II. The majority were killed during the Holocaust, but more than 100,000 survived. During the Ceausescu era the government adopted a liberal immigration policy, and the majority of the community moved to Israel. As the new century begins, only some 10,000 Jews remain in Romania.

Islam survived in southeastern Romania, and in 1928 the community was divided into four muftiates. The mufti from Tulcea was recognized as the chief mufti, the leader of the Romanian Muslim community. There were some 185,000 Muslims at the time, although the community has decreased to around 55,000 today. There is a single muftiate headquartered in Constanta.

Surviving the Ceausescu era, Romania began a new period of religious freedom in 1989. Romania became a major target for evangelizing groups from both East and West, and it quickly jumped into a new level of religious pluralism. Among the groups that opened centers were the Baha'i Faith, The Family International/Children of God, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the Unification movement, the International Zen Association, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness.

Since the revolution, 15 religious bodies have been recognized by the government. They are the Romanian Orthodox Church, the Romanian Catholic Church, the Roman Catholic Church (Latin-rite), the Reformed Church in Romania, the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania (Lutheran), the Evangelical Synodal Presbyterian Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania, the Unitarian Church, the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin), The Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church, the Muslim community, the Jewish community, the Baptist Christian Church, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Pentecostal church, and the Romanian Evangelical Church. Numerous newer groups operate as religious associations, thereby receiving a form of government recognition but no public funds to assist their activities. As have many countries from the former Communist world, in the last two decades, Romania has tested numerous laws designed to limit various, especially minority, religions and privilege specific older groups, especially the Orthodox Church.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Benedictines; Christian Brethren; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Nazarene; Dominicans; Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Romania; Family International, The; Franciscans; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; International Zen Association; Jehovah's Witnesses; Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness; Old Rite Romanian Orthodox Church; Reformed Church in Romania; Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Greek Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Unification Movement.

References

- Baron, Peter. Romania Hermitages, Monasteries and Churches. Royal Company, 1999.
- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Butnaru, I. C. The Silent Holocaust: Romania and Its Jews. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Clifton, Carmin. Come Lord, Come: A History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Romania. N.p.: AuthorHouse, 2002.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din Romania. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.
- Flora, Gravid, and Georgina Szilagyi. "Church and Society in Romania in the Period of Systemic Change." In Religion and Social Change in Central and Eastern Europe, edited by Irena Borowik and Miklos Tomka, 55–77. Krakow: Nomos, 2001.
- Stan, Lavinia, and Lucian Turcescu. Religion and Politics in Post-Communist Romania. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Talos, Vasile Alexandru. "Religious Pluralism in the Romanian Context." Religion in Eastern Europe 18, no. 4 (July 1998).

Romania, Islam in

The Romanian Muslim community has a variety of ethnic backgrounds, though most of Romanian Muslims are Turks and Tatars who came into what is now the easternmost part of Romania from the territory north of the Black Sea and later from the south as the Ottoman Empire expanded into Central Europe. Some of them came with the Petcheneg and the Cuman peoples, who settled in the area between the ninth and 12th centuries. A small number of Muslims are ethnic

King Carol I of Romania Mosque, built in 1910 in Constanta, Romania. Constanta is the center of Islam in Romania. (Gerald Kelsall/Dreamstime.com)

Albanians. Even Gypsies, known as kaapti, were converted to Islam. During several wars, Muslims from Crimea known as Circassians temporarily settled in the area and then moved to the south of the Danube.

Islam spread among the Petchenegs, Udis, Cumans, Tatars, and the Seljuk and the Osmanli Ottomans who originally resided in Central Asia. By the 10th century they were present north of the Black Sea and in Dobrogea. Islam gradually replaced the old religious practices, and the Uzbeks were the first to embrace the faith in Allah. During the reign of Khan Berke (1257–1267), the Turks from the north of the Black Sea and Dobrogea adhered to Islam. The subsequent waves of Turks coming from Central Asia and Anatolia formed large communities in what is now Romania, and Turkish geographical names have survived to this day (Babadag, Sarighiol, Medgidia, Techirghiol, Adamclisi, etc.). Gradually, the Muslim population increased in Dobrogea and in the towns along the Danube, which were exposed to the influence of the Muslim cultural centers from the south. Islam united the Tatar and Turkish populations and laid the foundations of several political and administrative institutions and an impressive culture. Islam brought about a spiritual revival for these populations and played an essential role in the preservation of the Turks' national identity.

As Islam pushed north into Hungary, the rulers of the Romanian countries, in an effort to preserve the independence of their principalities, attempted to limit the influence of Islam north of the Danube. For example, they were able to negotiate treaties with the sultans that allowed the Muslims who came to the area for trade to convert to Christianity. Thus, it was hoped that this would prevent the foundation of Muslim communities and the building of Islamic places of worship. In the 15th century, Dobrogea came under Ottoman administration and allowed the consolidation of Islam in the area. Mosques and meshids (smaller places of worship) were built during that time, and religious schools and courts were founded. The Sari Saltuk Mausoleum from Babadag, the Mischin Baba Mausoleum in Ada Kale (now moved to the Simian island), and several cheshemels (traditional wells) that have survived to this day date from the end of the 15th century.

Dobrogea was reintegrated into the Romanian state in 1878, and its particular cultural features as well as the political and administrative elements of the past were retained. The newspaper Ikdam reported in 1909 that the Turks from Dobrogea had 2 muftis paid by the government, 2 religious courts, more than 300 mosques, 107 mullahs, 100 imams, 81 muezzins, and 30 khaims. A law passed in 1880 to regulate Dobrogea's organization stated that the Muslim community was allowed to have two muftiates (Constanța and Tulcea), as well as several Islamic religious courts; these would remain in operation until around 1930. The Muslim judge (the cadi) had a special competence in matters regarding the family, such as marriage, divorce, parental authority, guardianship, succession, and wills. The law of cults passed in 1928 recognized the organization of the Islamic community in four muftiates (Caliacra, Constanța, Durostor, Tulcea). In Resolution 39818 issued by the Council of Ministers in 1937, the mufti from Tulcea was recognized as basmufti (chief mufti), the leader of all Muslims from Romania. In 1930 there were reported to be 185,486 Muslims in the country, many of them living in Durostor and Caliacra.

With funds from a donation by General Gazi Ali Pasa, a seminary for training Muslim clergy was founded in Babadag. In 1889 the Ministry of Cults and Public Instruction recognized and reorganized the Muslim seminary, which included also a Romanian language chair. Because of a drought and the consequent migration of people, the seminary was moved to Medgidia in 1901.

Through the early 20th century, many ethnic Turks residing in Romania returned to Turkey. Between the two World Wars, entire villages from Dobrogea were deserted. The number of places of Muslim worship also decreased. Of the 300 places of Islamic religious and cultural significance in existence by the turn of the 20th century, only about 80 have survived to this day. The Islamic community now has only one muftiate (in Constanța), led by the chief mufti and an ecumenical council (the surai islam, made up of 23 members). The 1992 census recorded 55,988 Muslims in Romania, 0.2 percent of the country's population. The majority live in Dobrogea, but there are smaller communities in the port towns along the Danube. The Muslim community in Bucharest (about 300 to 500 believers) provides personnel for some embassies.

Muslim Community in Romania

Bd. Tomas nr. 41
Constanța
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

See also: Islam; Sufism.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor si al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din România. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.

Romanian Greek Catholic Church

An Eastern-rite church in communion with the Roman Catholic Church emerged in the late 17th century in Romania following the retreat of the Turks from Transylvania in 1687. The new Hapsburg rulers of the Austro-Hungarian Empire encouraged the Orthodox faithful, the majority of Transylvanians, to change their allegiance to Rome and supported Jesuit missionaries to work toward that end. A combination of pressures, including the denial of full civil rights to Orthodox believers, led the head of the Orthodox church in Transylvania to agree to a union of his church with Rome in 1698. That agreement was approved at a synod two years later, and the Romanian Greek Catholic Church came into being.

The union held together until 1744, when a devout Orthodox monk began a revival of Orthodoxy and the government finally gave up its attempt to suppress it. In 1759 a new Orthodox bishop was consecrated for Transylvania. Two communities of about equal strength (the Romanian Orthodox and the Romanian Catholic) emerged, however, and some bitter feeling between the two groups remained. At the end of World War I, Transylvania was removed from Catholic Hungary and became a part of Orthodox Romania. By the end of the 1930s, there were 5 dioceses serving 1.5 million believers.

After World War II, the new Marxist government forced the Greek Catholics to break their ties to Rome and unite with the Romanian Orthodox Church. In 1948 the church was officially dissolved and its property turned over to the Orthodox officials. Shortly thereafter, all of the Catholic bishops were arrested. Five died in jail, and the sixth died in 1970 under house arrest.

The Romanian Greek Catholic Church was not able to revive until 1990, when the 1948 dissolution decree was rescinded after the fall of the Ceausescu government. Suddenly, three bishops who had been operating underground emerged. Pope John Paul II (1920–2005) immediately appointed bishops for all the vacant dioceses. The re-emergence of the church set off a continuing confrontation with the Romanian Orthodox Church. Greek Catholics demanded the immediate return of all the property seized in 1948. However, the Orthodox patriarch has been slow to turn over the property, as he insists that it is now serving members who have become Orthodox in faith. The church has been able to recover most of its former property, but a fight continues over disputed parishes. Some progress was noted following the visit of Pope John Paul II to Romania and his meeting with the Romanian Orthodox patriarch in 1999.

The Romanian Greek Catholic Church, United with Rome, is led by Metropolitan Lucian Muresan (b. 1931), who also serves as archbishop of Făgăraș and Alba Julia. On December 16, 2005, Pope Benedict XVI raised the Romanian Greek Catholic Church to the rank of Major Archepiscopal Church. With this act he also designated Metropolitan Muresan as Major Archbishop of Făgăraș and Alba Julia. In 2006, the church reported 764,000 adherents, with 1,225 worshipping communities served by 791 priests. There is one diocese located outside the country, St. George's Diocese based in Canton, Ohio.

Romanian Greek Catholic Church
Str. P. P. Aron 2
RO-3 175
Blaj AB
Romania

Constantin Cuciuc

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religi case din România. Bucharest: Editura Onosis, 1996.

Romanian Orthodox Church

Christianity reached the area west of Black Sea along the Danube River as early as the second century CE. Christian communities to the north of the Danube (present-day Romania) had close relations, including administrative relations, with the churches to the south (present-day Bulgaria), which were better organized and received pastoral guidance from the patriarch of Byzantium. In 535, Emperor Justinian (483–565) established the See of Tauresium in his native town (now the town of Taor, in the former Yugoslavia), and the see had jurisdiction over some Romanian Christian communities. Although documents are rare, an episcopal office is mentioned as existing in Tomis (fourth–sixth centuries), and in 787, a bishop from Banat-Mariseena (today Cedad in Timis County) attended the seventh ecumenical council at Nicaea. The conversion to Christianity of people in Romania’s neighboring countries had a great influence on the spread and consolidation of Christianity in Romania.

View of Sf. Mihail si Gravril, a Romanian Orthodox church in Braila, Romania. (Nicu Mircea/Dreamstime.com)

In 973 the new Hungarian state concluded an alliance with the powerful Catholic, Emperor Otto I (912–973), after which missionaries from the Roman Catholic Church were sent to the country to replace those from Byzantium. As a result of the influx of Roman Catholics into the region, the Balkans became one of the places where the line was drawn between Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism in 1054, when the two churches formally separated.

In the meantime, the conquest of Bulgaria (1018) by the Byzantine King Basil II Bulgaroctonus (ca.

958–1025) allowed Byzantium to gain religious and political power over Romania. In succeeding years, the Orthodox Church was supported by the political authorities. The first centralized Romanian state, with its capital in Curtea de Argeş, was established in 1324 by Prince Basarab (d. 1352), the founder of Wallachia. His son adopted the Orthodox Church as a spiritual support for political life and asked that a bishop be sent from Constantinople. In 1359, Bishop Lachint from Vicina was accepted at Curtea de Argeş, and his jurisdiction also included Transylvania. A second episcopal see was established in Severn in 1370.

Romanian princes coming from Maramureş in 1350 organized the religious life of Moldavian locals, and during the reign of Prince Alexandru cel Bun (1400–1432), the patriarchate from Constantinople recognized Bishop Losif of Suceava (1401). In 1632 the capital of Moldavia (and the bishopric) was moved from Suceava to Lasi. While the Orthodox Church was spreading through Wallachia and Moldavia, its development in Transylvania was hindered when Hungary conquered the region and, with German backing, forced people to accept Catholicism. A Roman Catholic council in Hungary (1279) forbade Orthodox believers to build churches or to perform worship services according to Orthodox principles.

Pressure on both Roman Catholic and Orthodox believers followed the arrival of Calvinist Protestantism. Calvinist princes from Transylvania asked Orthodox believers to accept the Reformed faith, and some Orthodox bishops left as the Reformed Church in Romania grew in strength. Catholic authority was re-established after 1687, and again Catholic missionaries organized the conversion of Orthodox believers. The heightened pressure to convert was backed by the political authorities, leading to the acceptance of unity with Rome (1698–1701) and the foundation of the Romanian Greek Catholic Church. Orthodox converts were allowed to keep their Greek liturgy, but they acknowledged the authority of Rome. Forced conversions continued through the 18th century.

When Romania fell under Turkish rule in 1417, some semblance of local control remained and Christianity was left undisturbed. The Turkish hegemony was thrown off in the 1590s, but it returned in the next century. At about the same time, Russia began to meddle in the region as part of its drive for an ice-free port. The struggle to emerge as a nation free from the control of both Russia and the Ottoman Empire led to Romania's full independence in 1877.

After independence, the Romanian Orthodox Church proclaimed itself autocephalous, and in 1885 its independence was recognized by the Ecumenical Patriarchate. Following World War I, Transylvania was again united with Romania (1918), and the Orthodox Church was presented with a new opportunity. It considered Orthodox believers who had previously united with Rome to be still part of the Orthodox Church, and efforts were expended to reintegrate them back into Orthodoxy. The Romanian Constitution adopted in 1923 did not distinguish between the Romanian Greek Catholic Church and the Romanian Orthodox Church. The conflict between these two church bodies continues to the present.

Also following the war, steps were taken to unify the administration of the Romanian Orthodox Church. In 1920 a board was established to draw up the regulations of the church. The new "law and regulations of the organization of the Romanian Orthodox Church" appeared in 1925. The leading bishop was for the first time given the title of patriarch. The first Romanian patriarch, Miron Cristea (1868–1939), held the post from 1925 until his death in 1939. The church survived the upheavals of the 20th century, including the very repressive Marxist regime that exercised power from the end of World War II until 1989.

Today the Romanian Orthodox Church is organized according to its own regulations, drawn up by the synod and modified according to sociopolitical circumstances. Though independent administratively, it is one in faith and belief with the rest of the Orthodox world. The head of the Romanian Orthodox Church is the patriarch, and the Romanian Orthodox Patriarchate includes metropolitan bishoprics, archiepiscopates, and bishoprics.

In 1998 the church was divided into 10 archdioceses and 13 diocesan bishoprics. In 2006, it reported 18,806,000 members, 13,500 parishes, and 12,855 priests. The church also has canonical oversight of the Vicariate of the Serbian Orthodox Church in Romania, with 26,000 believers, and the Vicariate of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, with 52,000 believers. Outside of Romania, there are bishops in Germany, France, and the United States who lead Romanian Orthodox believers who remain in communion with the Romanian Patriarchate residing in Western Europe and North America. The Orthodox Church oversees 14 theological institutes, most of them founded after 1989, with hundreds of students. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Romanian Orthodox Church

Aleea Patriahiei 2
70526 Bucharest, 4
Romania

http://www.patriarhia.ro/bor_eng/index_eng.htm

Constantin Cuciuc

See also: Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Reformed Church in Romania; Romanian Greek Catholic Church; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Branzea, Nicolae I., and Stefan Ionita. Religious Life in Romania. Bucharest: Editura Paideia, 1999.
- Cuciuc, Constantin. Atlasul Religiilor și al Monumentelor Istorice Religioase din România. Bucharest: Editura Gnosis, 1996.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Rome/Vatican City

Rome, Italy's largest city and capital, is located along the Tiber River some 30 miles from its mouth on the Tyrrhenian Sea. The city emerged to prominence as the center of the Roman Empire, and while serving that role became the setting for a number of foundational events in the establishment of the Christian church in the first century CE.

The Roman conquest of the Eastern Mediterranean provided the conditions in which Jesus was born and raised, and which then overshadowed his mature life and shaped his death. Following his arrest in Jerusalem, the Apostle Paul pleaded his case as a Roman citizen and was sent to Rome as a prisoner. He arrived around 60. Christianity likely had been established in the city earlier, as it caught the attention of the Emperor Nero, who in 64 targeted the church and attacked its members, who became scapegoats for the fire that swept through the city.

Saint Peter's Square in Vatican City. (Photka/Dreamstime.com)

Both Rome and Christianity survived the first century, and the Christian movement continued to interact with events of the city. The second century would, for example, see the martyr's death of Bishop Ignatius, an act of suppression that like the others only seemed to spur Christianity's growth. The life of the church would be completely altered by the rise of the emperor Constantine (r. 305–337). Over the more than three decades of his rule, the persecutions ended and Christianity was first legalized and then privileged throughout the empire. Then, after Constantine shifted the center of the empire to Constantinople, the Western Latin-speaking church, slowly transforming into the Roman Catholic Church, would emerge as the major power structure permeating Western Europe. Simultaneously, the pope emerged as the temporal ruler of the Papal States, a country carved out of central Italy. The Papal States, with its capital in Rome, lasted until the unification of modern Italy in the 19th century. A remnant of the Papal States survives as the modern Vatican City, now consisting of a mere five acres of territory. It is the world's smallest country.

Prior to the Christian era, Rome was, of course, home to numerous Pagan temples. Rome's original ruler Servius Tullius (r. 578–534 BCE) integrated religion into the Roman civilization he helped establish. He is particularly credited with the rise of the cult of Diana on Aventine Hill. Her main temple has survived to the present. Most of the Pagan temples were either pulled down or transformed into Christian churches, but hundreds of the former temples survive, scattered about the city in various states of ruin. The most impressive of the surviving temples is the Pantheon, which was dedicated to the 12 Olympian gods, the main deities of the official Roman religion. The dome that spans some 142 feet in the central room was erected around the year 125 CE, then a major engineering accomplishment. It remained the largest dome in the world until the 15th century, when the Duomo in Florence, Italy, was constructed. The Pantheon has replaced previous temples on the same site, both of which had been destroyed by fire.

The earliest Christian sites in Rome were the catacombs, the places for the burial of the dead, which became home to the earthly remains of many Christians, including many later designated as saints. The catacombs contain more than 500,000 bodies in the more than 60 miles of their underground network.

As he began to privilege Christianity, Constantine also became the major force behind the transformation of Rome from a primarily Pagan to a primarily Christian city. He ordered the construction of the Church of Saint John Lateran, the first large basilica in the Christian world, which served as headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church and the center of papal authority for many centuries. In the Middle Ages, Saint John Lateran would be the site of some of the most important councils held by the Catholic Church. In spite of its being destroyed several times, it was on each occasion rebuilt, most recently in the 17th century.

Numerous Christian relics also survived through the centuries and are now located in Rome, some of the earliest dating to the initial gathering of artifacts by Constantine's mother, Helena (ca. 248–ca. 329). Among the more significant items, to be seen today at the Church of Saint John Lateran, is a staircase from Jerusalem that tradition suggests was walked upon by Jesus during the week between his grand entrance into Jerusalem (Palm Sunday) and crucifixion. In former years, the stairs functioned to connect the church with what was then the papal residence. Saint John Lateran's private papal chapel, the Sancta Sanctorum, also houses additional key relics, which, to believers, tie Rome to Christian origins in the Holy Land, for example, a portion of the True Cross, a lock of hair from the Virgin Mary, a fragment of bread from the Last Supper, and some bones from the two Johns (John the Baptist and John the Evangelist) for whom the church is named. Finally, the church also houses a set of Jewish artifacts originally brought to Rome by Vespasian following his sacking of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

The Church of Saint Mary Major is the first major church in Christendom dedicated to the Virgin Mary. According to legend, it originated from a vision of the Virgin in the fourth century during the reign of Pope Liberius (r. 352–366). In the middle of one of Rome's very hot summers, a wealthy Roman resident was told in the vision to build a church where he found snow falling the next morning. Simultaneously, the pope received a similar message in a dream. The next morning, to everyone's amazement, snow covered the Esquiline Hill, where a church was soon erected. That church would then be replaced in the fifth century with a large basilica dedicated in 435 in response to the proclamation of Mary as the Mother of God by the church council at Ephesus (431). The image of Mary in the church is referred to as Our Lady of the Snows.

The churches of Saint Mary Major and Saint John Lateran became the lead churches of the growing Christian community in Rome and the mothers of many congregations in the Archdiocese of Rome. They were also connected through the medieval era through a relic believed to be a full-length image of Jesus that dated to the Apostle Luke. It would periodically be carried in procession from the Lateran to Saint Mary's, where its arrival was seen symbolically as a reuniting of Jesus with his mother.

Christian life in Rome is also tied to the arrival of two of the most famous of Jesus' Apostles: Peter and Paul. Paul came to Rome around 60. Following his execution, he was reputedly buried outside the city walls in a cemetery belonging to a Roman lady named Lucina. During his reign, Constantine ordered the erection of a large basilica at this site. It came to be known as the Church of Saint Paul Outside the Walls. Peter is regarded by Roman Catholics as the first bishop of Rome. Also executed in the city, he was buried on the site of the present Vatican City. Constantine also built a large basilica over Peter's burial site. His basilica fell into disrepair during the period when the popes left Rome to live at Avignon, France (1309–1377). It was Pope Nicolas V (r. 1447–1455) who suggested rebuilding rather than repairing the old church. He was not aware that the effort would take a century and a half and be tied to demands from across Western Europe for church reform. Efforts to raise money to support the construction of Saint Peter's would occasion the emergence of Protestantism early in the 16th century and the eventual loss of most of northern and western European countries from the Catholic camp. The present St. Peter's Cathedral building was finally dedicated in 1626.

Saint Peter's dome is slightly larger than that of the Pantheon, but smaller than the Duomo in Florence, which had just been completed when the new Saint Peter's was originally conceived. The overall surface area of the interior is impressive at more than 160,000 square feet (compared to the 90,000 square feet covered by the cathedral in Milan, Italy, and the 84,000 square feet of Saint Paul's in London). The church houses a number of relics, many tracing their history to Saint Helena's search of the Holy Land in the fourth century, and has become the place where many of the church's most impressive services occur, including the canonization of saints and the coronation of successive popes.

Work on Saint Peter's was delayed occasionally by other projects. Pope Sixtus IV (r. 1471–1484), for example, directed his attention to the construction of a new chapel for the papal residence (the Vatican palace). Construction commenced in 1473 and over the next eight years the pope hired several famous Renaissance artists to decorate the walls, including Raphael, Bernini, and Sandro Botticelli. The work was, of course, capped by the paintings of Michelangelo, which cover some 12,000 square feet of the chapel. The Creation and The Last Judgment are generally judged the best work he ever completed.

With the establishment of Christianity's dominant religious role throughout Europe, Rome became a focus of pilgrimage. Three additional churches—Saint Lawrence Outside the Walls, the Holy Cross, and Saint Sebastian—would join Saint John Lateran, Saint Mary Major, Saint Paul Outside the Walls, and Saint Peter's Basilica as primary objects for visitation.

Today, on the streets around Vatican City, one finds the offices of the curia, the international administrative offices of the Catholic Church, numerous colleges and seminaries, the international headquarters of many ordered communities, and the offices of an uncounted number of official and unofficial Catholic organizations.

Twelve buildings within Rome but not in the city, including, for example, the churches of Saint John Lateran, Saint Mary Major, and Saint Paul Outside the Walls, have been granted extraterritorial rights. They are exempted from either expropriation or taxation by the Italian government.

The importance of Rome as a world religious center was underscored in 2005, when following the death of Pope John Paul II (1920–2005), millions of television viewers watched the broadcast from Rome/Vatican City of the deceased pope's funeral services and the immediately following meetings at which his successor, Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger (b. 1927), who took the name Benedict XVI, was elected. That election occurred in the church in the Sistine Chapel, while the major public ceremonies were conducted in the single most important religious site in the city: Saint Peter's Cathedral.

Vatican City is considered to be a separate country, though, like a number of small countries, a variety of affairs generally conducted by a sovereign state are handled by Italy's government. Vatican City issues its own currency and stamps, has its own flag, and has its own police force. The complex political relationship between the governments of Vatican City and Italy, and the Roman Catholic Church, has led to an equally complex set of relationships between the Vatican and other governments and ecclesiastical entities worldwide.

In 1980, Vatican City and the church buildings granted extraterritorial status in Rome were included in the designation of the historic center of Rome as a World Heritage Site by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Constantine the Great; Helena, Flavia Iulia; Martyrdom; Pilgrimage; Relics; Saints.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Hager, June. Pilgrimage: A Chronicle of Christianity through the Churches of Rome. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1999.
- Hebblethwaite, P. In the Vatican. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Introvigne, Massimo, Pier Luigi Zoccatelli, Nelly Ippolito Macrina, and Verónica Roldán. Enciclopedia delle Religioni in Italia. Leumann (Torino): Elledici, 2001.

Tylenda, Joseph N. The Pilgrim's Guide to Rome's Principal Churches. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1993.

Romuva

Romuva (Lithuanian: sacred place, shrine) is a Lithuanian neo-Pagan movement that builds its faith and practice on Lithuanian folklore and other sources of pre-Christian belief. It is so far the only significant Lithuanian origin religious movement to arise at the turn of the 21st century, with 1,270 inhabitants of Lithuania identifying with it according to the census of 2001. In 2008, the Romuva movement had eight officially registered communities in Lithuania, most of those them united in the Old Baltic Faith Association. In 1997 Romuva initiated the World Congress of Ethnic Religions to facilitate ties with ethnic religions (surviving or reborn) of other countries around the world.

Early attempts to reconstruct the religion of pre-Christian Lithuania are to be found in Lithuania's national awakening movement of the 19th century. The most prominent promoters of the pre-Christian tradition were poet Andrius Vištelis (1837–1912) and Domas Šidlauskas (1878–1944); the latter also established a pagan shrine called Romuva and propagated a reconstruction of pre-Christian faith that he called Visuomybė (Lithuanian: universal faith). After the 1940 Soviet occupation, the movement was persecuted and disbanded. In 1967 Romuva was organized as a cultural society by Jonas Tinkūnas (b. 1939), who is also a prominent leader in the Romuva movement today. The new Romuva movement had no institutional ties with the pre-Soviet Visuomybė, and its main activities were the celebrations of folk holidays with the Christian elements removed, relying heavily on Lithuanian ethnic heritage and folklore in a belief that the pagan content is easily uncovered by removing the Roman Catholic veneer.

The neo-Pagan movement, persecuted in the Soviet period, was revived in 1988, and Romuva congregations were established in 1992 in Vilnius (the capital city of Lithuania) and Kaunas, with 10 communities registered in all by 2008 as well as among Lithuanians living in Chicago, Boston, and Toronto. Currently there are about 100 to 200 members and many more sympathizers, since Romuva's focus on the ethnic origins of Lithuania and on the propagation of ethnic culture makes the religion attractive and easily acceptable in the Lithuanian context. Romuva titles itself an "ethnic religion of Lithuania," is not conversionist, and has not spread beyond Lithuania except among the communities of ethnic Lithuanians in North America.

The beliefs of Romuva are not clearly and dogmatically defined and have peculiar interpretations within the different communities in the Romuva movement. Romuva claims to be a continuation of the pre-Christian (Pagan) religion of Lithuania and attempts to avoid inventions, which makes it difficult to define the doctrine or practice of the movement since no written scriptures or sources of the pre-Christian religion have survived. The movement largely depends on the ethnic culture, songs, ethnological myths, and anthropological reconstruction as the sources for its practices, and this leads to a plurality of perspectives within the movement. Generally, the concept of Darna (Harmony) is emphasized as the basis of morality and values, and ancient holidays are celebrated and ethnic particularities are observed in the belief that they facilitate the experience of the ancient religion. Different gods and goddesses of the pre-Christian pantheon (such as Dievas, Perkunas, and Laima) are invoked. They are often conceived as dependent realities, subordinate to the symbols they embody as well as the expressions of the sacredness that permeates all living and nonliving things. Celebrations of ancient holidays are the main activities within Romuva, usually held at ancient castle-hills or other sacred pre-Christian sites, like stones, hills, trees, groves, and rivers. None of the ancient shrines have survived and no shrines have been built by the movement, though building projects do exist.

Currently Romuva is trying to get state recognition as one of the traditional religions in Lithuania, along with the larger ones that have existed in the country for the last three centuries. The extent of Romuva's continuity with the pre-Christian faith of Lithuania is debated by scholars, who point to the existing differences from what is known of the pre-Christian religion as well as the impossibility of reviving a religion without any written sources or continuing priestly practice, which in Lithuania was discontinued a few centuries ago.

Despite the loose structure of the movement and undefined beliefs, the beginning of the 21st century saw some attempts at formalization: most independent communities were united into the Old Baltic Faith Association, which consequently consecrated a krivis (Lithuanian: high priest). There have also been attempts to express the beliefs of Romuva in a common creed.

Romuva (informal address)

A. Vivulskio St. 27–4

Vilnius LT-03114

Lithuania

<http://www.romuva.lt/> (in Lithuanian)

Donatas Glodenis

References

Giedraitis, Liudvikas, ed. “Vaikštantys vandeniu.”

Liaudies kultūra 3 (2000): 1–7.

Trinkūnas, Jonas. Baltų tikėjimas. Lietuvių pasaulėjauta, papročiai, apeigos, ženklai. Vilnius: Diemedžio Leidykla, 2000.

Trinkūnas, Jonas, ed. Of Gods and Holidays: The Baltic Heritage. Vilnius: Tvermė, 1999.

Rosh Hashanah

Rosh Hashanah is often referred to as the Jewish New Year though it is observed on the first day of the month of Tishri, which is the seventh month in the Hebrew calendar. It occurs at some point between September 5 and October 5 on the Common Era calendar. It starts the civil year in the Hebrew calendar, and is considered the new year for people, animals, and legal contracts. Rosh Hashanah may be adjusted a day, as it cannot fall on Sunday, Wednesday, or Friday.

Tradition acknowledges Rosh Hashanah as the point from which new calendar years as well as the sabbatical (shmita) and jubilee (yovel) years are designated. The dating of Rosh Hashanah was traditionally done by observing the Moon, which marked the move from one month to the next. Due to the difficulty in observing the Moon in some years, and to getting the word out to the areas farthest from Jerusalem, it became common to celebrate Rosh Hashanah for two days, a practice continued in today’s Orthodox and Conservative Jewish communities. The two-day Rosh Hashanah is an official holiday in Israel.

The observance derives from the Torah (the Five Books of Moses, in which the Jewish law is laid down), and specifically from Leviticus 23:23–25, which reads, “And the LORD spoke unto Moses, saying: Speak unto the children of Israel, saying: In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall be a solemn rest unto you, a memorial proclaimed with the blast of horns, a holy convocation. Ye shall do no manner of servile work; and ye shall bring an offering made by fire unto the LORD.” From this verse comes the practice of the blowing of the shofar, a trumpet made from a ram’s horn. Its sounding is meant to awaken those within its reach from their soulful slumber. Rosh Hashanah are days of rest; hence many of the prohibitions on activity of the Sabbath are in effect.

The Talmud speculates that creation began on what would be the 25th day of the Hebrew month of Elul. Six days later, the first day of Tishri, humans were created. Thus Rosh Hashanah, among other things, commemorates the creation of the human race.

Ritually speaking, Rosh Hashanah serves the important function of initiating the High Holidays, the high point in the annual calendar of Jewish observance. The first 10 days of Tishri are a time for self-reflection, confession, and repentance, all leading to the last day, Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The elements for the observance of Rosh Hashanah were spelled out in the Oral Law, which were subsequently written down in the Mishnah, a late-second-century attempt to commit the Oral Law to written form so it would not be lost in tumultuous times, and which became one of the two main parts of the great body of Jewish law, the Talmud.

On the day of the eve of Rosh Hashanah, the last day of the month of Elul, known as Erev Rosh Hashanah, Jews seek to end vows they have made that have not been fulfilled. If one has made a vow to do something, the individual (a male) may gather a small group of cohorts and ask them to nullify the vow. The individual then joins in nullifying the vows of the others. This action is seen as part of starting the New Year with a blank slate.

Ultra-Orthodox Jews pray at the Western Wall in Jerusalem's Old City before the start of the holiday of Rosh Hashanah. (Andrea Basile/Dreamstime.com)

On Rosh Hashanah, Jews worship together in the synagogue, using a special liturgy that includes scriptural readings, as on the Sabbath, and which emphasizes God's sovereignty. Worshippers greet each other with good wishes for the coming year. In their homes they eat festive meals that typically include apples and honey to symbolize hopes for a sweet year, and many homes display the New Year's cards that modern Jews have come to send to one another. Later in the day, some will walk to a nearby stream and throw in the contents of their pockets, symbolically casting off the sins of the old year. This ritual, called Tashlikh, points out one of the differences with the Sabbath. If Rosh Hashanah falls on a Monday, Tuesday, or Thursday, Tashlikh is observed on the afternoon of that day. If however, it falls on Saturday (the Sabbath), then Tashlikh is observed on the following Sunday afternoon, the second day of Rosh Hashanah, to avoid the prohibition against carrying on the Sabbath, which is considered work.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Conservative Judaism; Days of Awe; New Year's Day; Orthodox Judaism; Yom Kippur.

References

- Cohen, Jeffrey M. 1,001 Questions and Answers on Rosh HaShanah and Yom Kippur. New York: Jason Aronson, 1997.
- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.

- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher/Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

Ruhani Satsang

Ruhani Satsang (Science of Spirituality) was formally founded by Kirpal Singh (1894–1974) in 1950 in Delhi, India. According to Kirpal’s own published accounts, he was chosen to be the spiritual successor of his guru, Sawan Singh (1858–1948) of Radha Soami Satsang, Beas. As Kirpal explains: “My Master, Hazur Baba Sawan Singh Ji Maharaj, a perfect Saint, had a great desire to form a common forum or platform, Ruhani Satsang [spiritual gathering], at which all persons, even though professing different faiths and religious beliefs, could be imparted the principles of Spirituality.”

Kirpal’s claims, however, were met by sharp resistance from the majority of Sawan Singh’s following and blood relatives, who supported Jagat Singh (1884–1951) as the rightful successor at Radha Soami Satsang, Beas. This led to a distinct break between the two groups, and today they have no formal connection with each other beyond sharing a similar philosophy. This philosophy includes: (1) belief in a living human guru, (2) a strict vegetarian diet, (3) daily shabd yoga meditation, and (4) a high moral life, which includes abstaining from drugs and alcohol and sex before marriage.

Kirpal Singh initiated more than 80,000 people worldwide to the movement during his tenure and established Ruhani centers throughout India, Europe, and North and South America. He was also instrumental in establishing the World Fellowship of Religions in Delhi and in promoting other humanitarian projects. He authored a number of influential books on shabd yoga, including The Crown of Life and Naam or Word. His teachings were also highly influential among other new religious leaders, including Paul Twitchell (ca. 1909–1971), the founder of ECKANKAR, who was initiated by Kirpal Singh during his first tour of the United States in 1955.

Kirpal’s death in August 1974 left his organization in disarray. Several disciples claimed to be his spiritual successor, and this led to the formation of a number of rival factions. Today several separate religious satsangs claim spiritual ties to the late Kirpal Singh. The Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission was founded by Darshan Singh (1921–1989), Kirpal’s eldest son, who was succeeded after his death by his eldest son, Rajinder Singh (b. 1946). Kirpal Light Satsang, formed by Thakar Singh (1929–2005), a disciple of Kirpal Singh and a close ally of Madam Hardevi, has been the subject of intense controversy in Germany and the United States due to widely reported allegations of sexual misconduct and child abuse on the part of the guru. Thakar Singh was succeeded by Baljit Singh in perhaps the clearest succession in the history of modern Sant Mat–related movements. Thakar Singh publicly announced Baljit as his successor before a large audience and videotaped the proceedings.

Sant Bani Ashram was established by Ajaib Singh (1926–1997), a disciple of Kirpal Singh and a former follower of Charan Singh (1916–1990) of Radha Soami Satsang, Beas, who recently died without formally appointing a successor. However, Sadhu Ram has emerged as one of Ajaib Singh’s spiritual heirs and has gathered a core following. Of these groups, Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission is by far the largest and most successful in terms of a global following, with well more than 200,000 followers.

Sawan-Kirpal Ruhani Mission

c/o Kirpal Ashram

2 Canal Rd.

Vijay, Magar, Delhi 110 001

India

<http://www.sos.org/nc/main.htm> or <http://skrm.sos.org/>

Kirpal Light Satsang

c/o KTS-NE P.O. Box 302

Kinderhook, NY 12106

<http://www.santmat.net/>

Sant Bani Ashram
 Sanbornton, NH 03269
<http://members.iex.net/~naam/>

David Christopher Lane

See also: ECKANKAR; Radhasoami; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Chadda, H. C., ed. Seeing Is above All: Sant Darshan Singh's First Indian Tour. Bowling Green, VA: Sawan Kirpal Publications, 1977.
- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David C. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.
- Scotti, Juliet, and Ricki Linksman. Kirpal Singh: The Story of a Saint. Delhi: Sawan Kirpal, 1977.
- Singh, Kirpal. Surat Shabd Yoga: The Yoga of the Celestial Sound Current. Introduction for Western Readers. Ed. by Robert Leverant. Berkeley, CA: Images Press, 1975.
- Singh, Kirpal. The Teachings of Kirpal Singh. Ed. by Ruth Seader. Bowling Green, VA: Sawan Kirpal Publications, n.d.

Russell, Charles Taze

1852–1916

Charles Taze Russell was a Congregationalist church layman who became the founder of the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, the organization that would become publicly known as the Jehovah's Witnesses. He not only organized thousands of Bible students, but authored a number of books predicting the dawn of the biblically prophesied millennium of peace on Earth.

Russell was born February 15, 1852, in Allegheny, Pennsylvania. He was still a teenager when in 1869 he forsook the Congregational Church of his youth because his minister proved unable to answer the religious questions and doubts that had come to dominate his consciousness. During the 1870s, he began to read Adventist literature and in 1876 found himself drawn to the writings of Adventist writer/publisher Nelson

Barbour (1822–1906), who convinced Russell that humanity was then living in a transition period that he termed the harvest time that heralded the imminent end of the age. Barbour suggested that the end of the Gentile times would be in 1914. Russell subsequently paid for the publication of Barbour's book Three Worlds and the Plan of Redemption, which appeared in 1877. Russell developed a chronology of the last days and released his own booklet, The Object and Manner of the Lord's Return.

In 1878, Russell discovered what he believed was a basic flaw in his thinking relative to the Greek word parousia. This word is most commonly translated "coming," as in the phrase "Jesus' second coming." Russell came to believe that parousia was better translated "presence." Having reworked the chronology essentially detailed by William Miller a generation earlier, Russell now asserted that Christ had become "present" in 1874. His new perspective led to his severing relations with Barbour and indeed with the larger Adventist community. Meanwhile, he had developed an Arian view of Christ, which affirmed Jesus as the Son of God and savior, but denied his full divinity. He also abandoned the idea of hell as a realm of eternal torment.

In 1879 he published the first issue of a new periodical, Zion's Watch Tower and Herald of Christ's Presence, through which he initiated a ministry to disseminate his new perspective. Two years later he founded Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society as a corporate home for his ministry, much of which consisted of publishing and distributing his books that presented a more systematic version of his revised theological position and informed the public of what was about to happen in human history. The first of a six-volume set of books that would announce the Dawn of the Millennium appeared in 1886. His followers would initially be called Dawnites.

Russell slowly built support from which he recruited agents (called colporteurs) to distribute both the periodical and his books. The colporteurs lived off the commissions from the literature they sold. In 1900 Russell opened an office in London from which the distribution of literature throughout Europe proceeded. His writings were soon being translated into all the major European languages. In 1908 he moved his American headquarters to Brooklyn, New York. He was becoming well known and his speeches would be reprinted in newspapers even as reporters sought him out to ask his opinions.

World War I broke out after Russell had been at work for more than 30 years. He had great expectations that his followers would live through the transition period. Many of his followers quickly concluded that the massive conflict heralded the end of the Gentile times just as Russell's book had suggested. Before the war ended, however, Russell died, on October 31, 1916, while traveling home from a speaking engagement in Los Angeles.

In the wake of his death, several different people vied for control of the Watch Tower Society. Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1869–1942), who spent time in prison during the war for his pacifist stance, emerged as the new president of the corporation. Reacting to the disappointment that the Gentile system was still in place after the war, Rutherford would begin the reorganization of the movement that included the imposition of a number of his own unique ideas, and in 1931 announced a new name for the movement, Jehovah's Witnesses. In the decade after the war, many of the Bible students who considered themselves orthodox students of Russell and his ideas broke with Rutherford and founded a set of different Bible student groups, some of which continue to exist. While the Witnesses continue to acknowledge Russell as their founder, the much smaller Bible student groups continue to publish and revere his writings.

Because of his theological divergences, more than his predictions of the end-times, Russell's contemporaries in the more mainstream Protestant churches denounced him. Conservative Protestants especially criticized him (and continue to criticize him) for his denial of the Trinity and with it the deity of Christ. His contemporaries were equally angered by Russell's role in popularizing the notion that those who did not accept Christ would after death be destroyed, rather than remain alive to experience eternal torment in hellfire. Many Protestants have, however, over the last century, also abandoned the idea of hell, and criticism of Russell for his opinion has diminished considerably in that regard. Russell has also been more positively evaluated on his support of Zionism. Not a popular opinion when he initially voiced support for a Jewish homeland, his opinions have been adopted by a number of evangelical Christians in the years since the establishment of the state of Israel.

Russell oversaw a relatively small, loosely organized group to which few saw any future at the time of his death. However, the long and dynamic leadership by Rutherford and the continued evangelical activity by his successors have turned the Jehovah's Witnesses into a global religion that has almost a million adherents in its homeland, is the second or third largest religious group in most European countries and has a measureable presence in more than 200 countries.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Adventism; Arius; Congregationalism; Jehovah's Witnesses; Zionism.

References

- Bergman, Jerry, Jehovah's Witnesses and Kindred Groups: A Historical Compendium and Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1984.
- Horowitz, David, Pastor Charles Taze Russell: An Early American Christian Zionist. New York: Philosophical Library, 1986.
- Penton, M. James, Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. 2nd ed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Russell, Charles Taze. The Divine Plan of the Ages. Studies in the Scriptures. Vol. 1. 1886; rpt.: Rutherford, NJ: Dawn Bible Students Association, n.d. Reprint of original 1886 volume.
- Russell, Charles Taze. Pastor Russell's Sermons. A Choice Collection of His Most Important Discourses on All Phases of Christian Doctrine and Practice. Brooklyn: International Bible Students Association, 1917.
- Russell, Charles Taze. What Pastor Russell Said: Charles Russell Answers Hundreds of Questions Regarding His Faith. Rpt.: Scotts Valley, CA: CreateSpace, 2009.

■ Russia

Russia is a name commonly applied to successive geo-political entities—Kievan Rus, which was the early

In a scene from the late-fifteenth-century Radziwill Chronicle, Russia officially becomes a Christian nation with the conversion of Vladimir I, prince of Kiev, about 988 CE. (Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY) state of the Eastern Slavs; the Duchy and later the Czardom of Muskovy; the Russian Empire; the Soviet Union; and currently the Russian Federation. Russia's current territory (10,610,162 square miles) extends over Eastern Europe and Northern Asia (or Eurasia). It borders 14 other countries with diverse cultural and religious traditions, including Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Protestant, Muslim, Confucian, and Buddhist. Its population (ca. 142 million, according to the 2002 census) comprises around 100 different ethnic groups. Ethnic Russians make up around 80 percent of the country's population and Russian is its official language. Eastern (Russian) Orthodoxy has long been Russia's dominant religious tradition, although all world religions have coexisted in the country—Christianity in all its major forms, Islam (both Sunni and Shia), Judaism, and Buddhism.

While having many features in common with other European countries, Russia's history has been marked by dramatic changes, in particular, the demise of the Russian Empire after the 1917 February and Bolshevik revolutions, the establishment of the Soviet Union in 1922, and seven decades of one-party rule and highly centralized state Socialism. The Soviet Union collapsed in December 1991, bringing about systemic political, economic, and social transformations. These changes had definitive effects on the religious history of the country, including its religious composition, on church-state relations, and on religious freedom. In addition, there are considerable differences between Russia's regions in terms of their religious composition, degree of diversity, history of church-state relations, and religious freedom.

Religion in Pre-Soviet Russia (before 1917) According to archaeological and anthropological research, a variety of pre-monotheistic beliefs and practices existed among Neolithic farming and hunting communities of Northern Eurasia. More specifically, although the prehistoric religion of Eastern Slavs remains under-researched, there is abundant evidence of developed nature and ancestor worship among them well before the emergence around the ninth century CE of their earliest state, which modern historians refer to as Kievan Rus.

With the adoption of Christianity by Grand Prince Vladimir (ca. 956–1015) in 988, Kievan Rus became part of Christendom, although vestiges of the earlier beliefs and practices long survived alongside the new faith in many parts of Russia.

From its beginning, the Russian Orthodox Church was linked to Byzantine (Eastern) Christianity. It thus inherited a rich and elaborate religious culture that emphasized aesthetic and ritualistic aspects of the faith and the preservation of tradition over reflective theology.

Byzantine Christianity developed the idea of symbiophony, that is, a symbiotic relationship between the secular and the ecclesiastical authorities. Unlike their Western counterparts, the Eastern churches did not have a central ecclesiastical authority; they were instead autonomous (autocephalous) and coterminous with each country.

Originally, from the 10th century, the Eastern Slavic lands came under jurisdiction of the metropolitans of Kiev, who were designated by the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople. Subsequently, in 1299, the seat of the Metropolitan moved to the northern principality of Vladimir and in 1325 to Moscow, following the ascendance of these cities as centers of political power. In 1589, the Russian Orthodox Church achieved formal independence from Constantinople. It founded the Moscow Patriarchate, which existed until 1721, when Peter the Great abolished it and replaced with the Holy Synod.

In the first half of the 13th century, Kievan Rus was successfully invaded by Mongolian tribes from the east, while Western Crusaders of the Teutonic Order alongside the Swedish army attempted to capture the northern city-states of Novgorod and Pskov. The next two centuries are often referred to as the “Tatar-Mongolian Yoke.” During this time, Eastern Orthodoxy supplied the basis of a common identity among the otherwise disunited and politically subjugated Slavic population, distinguishing them from the Golden Horde (the Russian name for the Mongolian proto-state) that adopted Islam in the early 14th century, and from the Roman Catholic lands on the western frontiers.

Throughout the 14th and 16th centuries, the rulers of the Grand Duchy of Moscow appealed to the long-standing Orthodox tradition, utilizing the church’s religious authority and symbolic power for the Russian Reconquista: the consolidation of eastern Slavic lands, their liberation from the Golden Horde, and the annexation of the khanates that emerged in the wake of its fragmentation. The historical coincidence of the fall of the Byzantine Empire (1453) with the ascendance of the Grand Duchy of Moscow gave rise to the concept of the Third Rome (first formulated by Abbot Filofey of Pskov in the early 16th century). This ideological construct encouraged the Moscow rulers to see themselves as legitimate heirs to the Roman and Byzantine empires. The expanding state regarded itself as having a mission to assert the true Orthodox faith among the colonized populations. The notions of Russia, Russian state, and Russian Orthodoxy were increasingly synonymous from the late 15th century on.

In the mid-1600s, however, the unity within the church as well as that between the ecclesiastical authority and the autocracy was interrupted by a major schism and conflict. Patriarch Nikon (1605–1681) introduced an ambitious reform that attempted to create uniformity in Russian liturgical books and rites by bringing them back in line with Greek (Byzantine) canons. The unintended consequence of the reform was a major split (raskol) within the church and the emergence of the Old Believers tradition in Eastern Orthodoxy. Soon after Nikon challenged monarchical authority, demanding that it defer to ecclesiastical authority. This led to Nikon’s downfall, with the triumphant czar, Alexey Mikhailovich (1645–1672), making an important step toward establishing the church as politically subordinate to regal autocracy and reinforcing its crucial role of legitimizing that autocracy.

Russia’s religious history reflects the distinctive features of the country’s modernization, usually introduced “from above,” and causing fears and anxieties about the potential erosion of the Orthodox ideological foundation of the autocracy. The modernizing and Westernizing reforms of Peter the Great (1682–1725) included changing ecclesiastical authority to approximate Protestant European models. In 1711 the Most Holy Synod, which was run by secular officials, replaced the Moscow Patriarchate in the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. The czar (who adopted the title of emperor in 1721) became “Head of the Church and Defender of the Faith,” clergy were made state officials, and meticulous state control was imposed on congregational and parish life.

The Synodal period, which lasted until the 1917 February revolution, had mixed effects on the church and, more generally, on the relationship between religion and society. On the one hand, the Most Holy Synod was part of the state apparatus and as such was obliged to cooperate with the police in matters such as “subversive activities,” censorship, adultery, and divorce. On the other hand, the church was fully protected by the state against competition with other faiths and had a monopoly on proselytizing. Furthermore, in the 19th century, when the ideological foundations of the autocracy seemed increasingly threatened by liberal ideologies, revolutionary movements, and the growing self-awareness of, and demands for, civil rights among ethnic minorities, the state proposed “the inseparable unity of Orthodoxy, the Autocracy, and the People.”

This unity ideal was first formulated in 1832 by Minister of Education Count Uvarov.

The territorial expansion of the Russian Empire, as it was officially called between 1721 and February 1917, led to the inclusion of a variety of ethno-religious groups.

The 1897 census, the first and the only before 1917, indicated that 87 million out of 125 million, or 70 percent of the population, were Russian Orthodox, comprising predominantly ethnic Russians, the majority of Ukrainians and Belorussians, and many other smaller ethnic groups. Islam represented the most numerically significant religious minority, accounting for nearly 14 million (11 percent), according to the census. It must be noted, however, that this figure included Muslims of Central Asia and South Caucasus (Azerbaijan), which are not part of the post-Soviet Russian Federation, where the significant ethnic Muslims groups are mainly in the Middle Volga and Northern Caucasus areas. Additionally, Islam in Russia did not represent a single entity, but comprised a variety of different ethno-linguistic groups as well as internal divisions (both Sunni and Shia).

With the partitions of Poland in the late 18th and 19th centuries, Roman Catholicism became the third largest religion in the empire (around 11.5 million, or 9 percent of the population, according to the 1897 census), including most Poles, Lithuanians, and large proportions of Germans and Latvians. The inclusion of Poland also accounts for the fact that for more than a century the Russian Empire hosted the largest Jewish population in the world (6 million, or 5 percent in 1897), mainly concentrated in the western provinces (Poland, Ukraine, and Byelorussia). In addition, there were a considerable number of Protestants (around 4 million in 1897, mainly in the Duchy of Finland and the Baltic Provinces, also including German Mennonites but excluding Russian Protestant sectarians); Armenian Apostolics (more than a million); Buddhists (more than 430,000; mainly in Southern Siberia and Kalmyks in the Northern Caucasus); and shamanists in Siberia and in the Middle Volga region.

In the eyes of many, if not most, Russians, territorial expansion meant the extension of both Russian Orthodox territory and of the Orthodox state. Thus, Russia came to be seen as a vast contiguous Orthodox Empire with some enclaves of ethno-religious minorities. Russia's religious identity was of crucial political significance, meaning that religious dissent among ethnic Russians was a highly sensitive political issue.

Before the end of the 18th century, considerable efforts were made to convert colonized non-Christian populations to the Russian Orthodox faith, which at times involved coercion and violence. However, the state's overriding practical interest was in economic returns and social stability, which, by and large, made maintaining the religious status quo more desirable than missionary zeal. While continuing with aggressive efforts to convert Muslims in newly annexed territories, Peter the Great (1682–1725) guaranteed religious tolerance to foreigners willing to contribute to his reformist efforts. In the spirit of the “enlightened absolutism,” Catherine the Great (1762–1796) favored more sophisticated methods of missionary work and government control over non-Orthodox minorities, introducing, among other things, semi-autonomous religious authorities for Muslims in the European part of the country. Little attempt at conversion was made with respect to Protestants. However, although they belonged to a variety of different groups, in 1832 all of them, except those who resided in the provinces of Poland and Finland, were placed under the jurisdiction of the Lutheran Church of St. Petersburg.

Two ethno-religious groups were subject to special policies. Separation was the preferred policy in relation to the Jewish population, although at times this was combined with attempts at assimilation and conversion to Orthodox Christianity. Catherine the Great, the “enlightened empress,” still regarded the Jews as a potential threat to the Empire. She introduced the Pale of Settlement, a region along Russia's western borders outside which Jewish people were not allowed to settle. Generally, coercive attempts to convert non-Orthodox inhabitants never fully disappeared, and at times re-emerged with vengeance, in particular, toward those who were seen as “naturally Orthodox,” such as the Uniates, the Slavic population of Western Ukraine and Byelorussia who retained Eastern Orthodox beliefs and practices, but accepted the papal authority of Rome.

In spite of the Orthodox hold on the land, a variety of alternative religions were introduced and coexisted over the centuries. A prominent source of religious diversity in Russia was schismatic movements, the most significant of which were the Old Believers. The 17th and 18th centuries saw the growth of the Russian sectarian traditions of the Faith of Christ (or Believers in Christ; Russian: khristovshchina) and the Spiritual Christianity (Dukhivnoe Khristianstvo). These traditions gave rise to Russian Christian sects, such as the Flagellants (Khlysty), the Castrates (Skoptsy), the Doukhobors (Fighters for Spirit), the Molokan (Milk-Drinkers), and Subbotniks (Sabbath Observers). The teachings and practices of these sects suggest a degree of affinity with Western Protestantism and aspects of Judaism, or perhaps some more direct influence of these religions.

RUSSIA

Freemasonry became popular among Russian nobles in the late 18th century and achieved particular prominence in the first two decades of the 20th century; almost all members of the Provisional Government (February–October 1917) were Free Masons. At different times, German Pietism and Spiritualism found a considerable following among Russian nobles and the intelligentsia. Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), co-founder of the Theosophical Society, and Georges Gurdjieff (ca. 1872–1949), whose work continues through the Gurdjieff Foundation, came from Russia, although they mainly developed their teachings outside the country. The late 19th century was marked by active and often successful proselytizing by Western missionaries from groups such as the Baptists, Pentecostals, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Seventh-day Adventist Church.

It is important to note that much innovative philosophical thinking about religion took place outside the formal structures of the church. From the mid-19th century on in particular, writers such as Lev Tolstoy (1828–1910) and Fyodor Dostoevsky (1821–1881), and philosophers such as Vladimir Soloviev (1853–1900) and Nikolai Berdyaev (1874–1948), created intellectual and civic arenas for religious reflections and debates on politics, society, and moral issues.

Given the significance of Russian Orthodox identity to the empire, it is not surprising that, until the beginning of the 20th century, this enormous diversity was widely managed in a highly controlled manner. However, some important accommodations were made toward the major religious minorities and occasional privileges were given to some groups for pragmatic reasons. Thus, German Lutherans and Dutch Calvinists were offered guarantees of free practice of their faiths (on the condition of not proselytizing); the Mennonites were given religious freedom by Catherine the Great in exchange for their willingness to cultivate vast wastelands in the Southern European part of the empire. Religious affiliation defined the major legal categories and civil rights, with the primary division between those belonging to the Russian Orthodox Church (pravoslavnye) and people of “alien faiths” (inovertsy). Before 1905, proselytizing among ethnic Russians as well as their voluntary conversion to alien faiths were punishable as criminal offenses. There were also preventive measures, for instance, a ban on conducting Lutheran services in the Russian language.

Religious minorities were divided into three categories: (1) “recognized and tolerated,” that is, ethnic religious groups who could practice their religions freely but not proselytize; (2) “tolerated and unrecognized,” that is, major sects who were allowed to practice their religion with some restrictions on their civil rights; and (3) “tolerated and persecuted,” that is, those who were seen as presenting particular dangers to the state and were subject to administrative exile and severe restrictions of civil rights. After the introduction of the Pale of Settlement for the Jewish population, czarist policy fluctuated between relative tolerance and severe repression. Consequently, the Pale of Settlement regulations were either inconsistently enforced or were reinforced by other highly restrictive laws, in particular, under Czar Alexander III (1881–1895). Laws such as the “May Laws” (1882) and the Edict of Expulsion (1886) enacted restrictions and bans on settlement, professions, economic activities, and education. In addition, the government at the very least condoned popular anti-Semitism (“Jews as Christ-killers”), the most violent expression of which were the pogroms, in particular, in the 1880s and 1900s.

The general situation with religious freedom began to change in the early 20th century with the introduction of the Edict of Toleration by Czar Nicolas II amid the popular uprising of 1905. This gave certain religious and civil rights to religious minorities and legitimized the freedom of individual religious choice. However, by that time, the state-church symbiosis had already produced its counter-image: Russian militant secularism and atheism.

Religion in the Soviet Union (1917–1991) During the Soviet period, the imposition of secularism and atheism by the Communist state over seven decades was a unique historical experience. This policy partly stemmed from the Marxist concept that religion was a “metaphysical vision” of class-divided and oppressive societies, and that Communist modernization would lead to religion withering away and being replaced by the materialist scientific outlook.

The actual Communist policy, however, was much more complicated and involved attempts both to eradicate religion and to manipulate it for political purposes. Immediately before and after the revolution, the general anti-religious stance was played down, with the Bolshevik government seeking allies among religious minorities, low-rank clergy, and ordinary believers (as they were oppressed in imperial Russia) against the hierarchy of the official church (as the main supporter of the oppressor). The 1918 Constitution of the Soviet Federal Socialist Republic stipulated the separation of the church from the state and the educational system from the church; it also guaranteed religious freedom, including the right of both religious and anti-religious meetings and propaganda. Ordinary Orthodox believers could continue worship and association, but the institutional structure of the church was considerably undermined by confiscations of property, although the clergy could still use church buildings. The church was formally allowed to engage in missionary work but it could no longer compete with virulent anti-religious campaigns conducted by the Communist Party and supported by the government.

By the end of the 1920s, however, the Bolsheviks had established a comprehensive machine for propagating atheism (for example, the Propaganda and Agitation Department in the Communist Party, the League of Young Communists, and the League of Militant Godless) and began an all-out war on religion, religious minorities included. This aimed at institutional destruction of the Orthodox Church and other religions and involved mass closures of churches, mosques, and other places of worship and repression of clergy, religious professionals, and activists. The 1929 Law on Religious Associations imposed severe restrictions and government control on religious activities and forcibly relegated religion to the private domain.

At the same time, the Communist government sought to socialize and re-socialize generations of Soviet people into atheism as part of a “political religion,” that is, a set of prescribed Communist ideas, values, symbols, and rituals designed to unite people and provide a basis for their behavior. However, with the passage of time, the Soviet regime sought a degree of accommodation with religious institutions and believers; for instance, during the Great Patriotic War (1941–1945), the Moscow Patriarchate was restored together with some churches and monasteries. Nevertheless, up to the end of the Soviet regime, temporary thaws were followed by anti-religious campaigns, often launched by the same leaders. Even in the late 1980s, immediately before the collapse of the Soviet system, the Communist leadership still officially regarded atheist propaganda as one of its priorities.

During the seven decades of Communist modernization there remained some limited channels for transmitting religious culture. Although severely undermined and restricted, the Orthodox Church and other religious institutions continued to operate. In certain periods they were used for propagandist purposes both internally (in order to boost patriotic feelings), but mainly externally (to demonstrate Soviet achievements in guaranteeing human rights and freedoms). In search of historical continuity and moral examples, Soviet educationists increasingly turned to pre-revolutionary high culture, in particular, Russian classical literature with its wealth of religious themes, imagery, and symbols. Some elements of religious culture were preserved within émigré circles, and these were available to a very limited extent inside Russia. Finally, the generation of people brought up before the official assault on religion continued to have some influence in Soviet society.

The issues of incidence, dynamics, and forms of religious beliefs and practices during the different periods of the “construction of Communism” and among different sections of the population require further research. Nevertheless, there is much evidence to suggest that, while institutional forms of religion were significantly weakened, a considerable proportion of the population continued to regard themselves as religious even after the vicious anti-religious campaigns between 1918 and 1937. Thus, according to the 1937 census, the results of which remained unpublished until 1989, around 56.7 percent of those who provided answers claimed they were religious—at the time when Stalinist repressions were at their worst. In addition, some groups continued actively to practice their faith despite the government's attempts to suppress them and often at the risk of losing their freedom; the most conspicuous example of this was the group of the Initiativniki (Initiators) that emerged among Russian evangelical Christians in the late 1950s.

The deepening crisis of the Soviet system from the 1970s on was accompanied by a growing interest in religion, including in the links between ethnicity and religion, and between religion and nationhood. Among other things, this interest showed itself in the activities of the All-Russian Society for Preservation of Historical and Cultural Monuments (VOOPIK), which in many cases was a code name for attempts to preserve and restore Russian Orthodox churches. It also expressed itself in the growing salience of religious themes in cinema, fine arts, and literature. At the same time, alternative religious thinking became increasingly popular in urban centers. From the 1970s on a range of grudgingly tolerated semi-underground and underground groups, activities and teachings emerged, such as the Agni-Yoga, practiced by the followers of Helena Roerich (1879–1955) and Nicholas Roerich (1874–1947); renewed interest in Nikolai Fyodorov's (1827–1903) ideas about immortality; and the first devotees of Hare Krishna.

The nationwide celebration of the millennium of Russian Orthodox Christianity in 1988 symbolized the beginning of the U-turn in the official policy toward religion. Immediately before the dissolution of the Soviet Union in December 1991, the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions was passed by the Soviet Supreme Council (Parliament), which for the first time in Russia's history treated religious freedom as an "unalienable right of Russian citizens" and extended these rights to all those residing in Russia. The law contained strong clauses designed to prevent state agencies from interfering in religion and to guarantee the legal equality of all faiths.

Religion in Post-Soviet Russia The 1990s were characterized by the increased public prominence of religion that manifested itself in its high profile in the mass media, its engagement with politics, and the ubiquitous public display of religious symbols, in particular, those associated with the Russian Orthodox Church nationwide and with Islam in the regions with predominantly Muslim population (Tatarstan in the Volga area; Dagestan and Chechnya in the Northern Caucasus). How this increased visual prominence of religion is related to changes in religious affiliation and individual religiosity is much harder to assess, as polls yield different results, depending on their conceptualization of affiliation and religiosity and on the methodology employed. However, without doubt, there has been a considerable change in the number of religious communities, both registered and unregistered. The number of registered religious associations has risen from around 3,900 in 1991 to 21,000 in 2008. There have also been considerable changes in the composition of the Russian religious landscape. In 1991, out of officially registered associations, 78 percent were Russian Orthodox, 10 percent Muslim, and 3 percent Protestant. The figures for 2008 were 51 percent, 16.5 percent, and 21 percent, respectively.

Based on self-reporting, most polls indicate that since 1991 the number of those claiming to be religious has risen considerably, from around 40 percent to around 70 percent in 2000–2008. Up to 70 percent of respondents, or around 90 percent of all ethnic Russians, consider themselves Russian Orthodox, followed by those claiming affiliation with Islam—from 4 percent in 1991 to between 8 and 15 percent in different surveys, depending on the methodology employed. However, the incidences of active engagement with religious groups and of religious practice have remained low, with, for instance, between 2 and 7 percent of the nominally Russian Orthodox attending religious services on a weekly basis. With some regional exceptions, the figures for the other major religions are quite similar or even lower (in particular, for Judaism). In some statistical reports, however, figures for religious affiliation are based on ethnic criteria, according to which, for example, all Russians are considered Russian Orthodox and all Tatars are counted as Muslims, which results in very high figures for religious affiliation. This approach raises a range of methodological objections (for example, there is a considerable number of non-Orthodox ethnic Russians; at least 100,000 Tatars are Russian Orthodox, etc.). However, it also reflects ethno-religious politics in contemporary Russia, in particular, claims of its historic religions on representing core aspects of ethnicity and nationhood.

Since 1991, the ethno-religious religious structure of Russian society has been changing dramatically, largely following socio-demographic and cultural changes. Thus, immigration of ethnic Muslims from other parts of the former Soviet Union, combined with internal migration, led to an increased presence of Islam in Russia. On the other hand, between 1989 and 2008, the Jewish population has decreased by more than 50 percent (from an estimated 500,000 to 225,000), mainly following emigration and ethnic assimilation. Similar processes have occurred among ethnic Germans, resulting in the decreased numbers of Lutherans and Mennonites. There has been a growing interest in pre-Christian ethno-religious roots among some ethnic minorities, such as Mordvinians and Mari in the Middle Volga area, or Yakuts in Siberia and Adygs in the Northern Caucasus. Interest in shamanism has been growing among Buriats and Tuvinians. At the same time, the greater emphasis on individual religious choice and the immensely increased availability of spiritual alternatives have led to the growing numbers of those who opt out of their ethnic faiths.

We can discern three major trends that have simultaneously occurred and defined the distinctive scenario of religious life in post-communist Russia. First is the marked resurgence of the Russian Orthodox Church and its increasing prominence in Russian society and politics. Second, religions of ethnic minorities, such as Islam, Judaism, and Buddhism, have re-emerged as important aspects of identities of their constituent ethnic groups, with their professionals making considerable claims to represent these groups in Russian society and politics. Finally, increasing diversity has been caused by various new religious phenomena. These include more established groups from abroad, mainly Protestant and in particular, Pentecostal, and those that are usually defined as New Religious movements (NRMs). In addition, several Russian indigenous NRMs became prominent, such as the Mother of God Centre, and the Great White Brotherhood, and the Church of the Last Testament (the Vissarion movement). This increasing diversity touches on one of the most sensitive issues of the transitional period. On the one hand, in a post-Communist society such as Russia, religion is often seen as the most significant marker of national and ethnic identity, even as a reversal to the 1917 notion of the Russian Orthodox Land, and thus new and, by implication, “foreign,” religions are given less legitimacy. On the other hand, the concept of a civic nation, with the accompanying recognition of the right to choose and practice religion freely, is embedded in the 1993 Constitution of the Russian Federation and shared by a considerable section of Russian society.

The resulting tensions were reflected in the introduction of the new 1997 Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Associations. While formally recognizing the basic religious freedoms and equality of all religions, the preamble to the law emphasized the historical role of Russian traditional religions as affiliated to major ethnic groups (Christianity, Islam, Judaism, and Buddhism) and in particular, the role of Russian Orthodoxy. At the same time, the Law differentiated between religious organizations that enjoy the full rights of a legal entity, and religious groups that can practice their faith freely but are institutionally severely restricted (they cannot own property, have educational establishments, publish literature, etc.). In order to obtain the status of a religious organization, an association has to provide evidence of its legal existence in the Russian Federation for 15 years prior to its application for registration. Given that most of the newer religious associations, in particular, those from abroad, would be very unlikely to have been able to legally exist in the Soviet Union, the law places serious restrictions on their activities and development.

So far, the 1997 law has had mixed effects. Although most religious associations, including NRMs, have been registered under the law, some were refused registration, and others, such as the Salvation Army

Russia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	50,000,000	115,120,000	82.0	1.73	108,137,000	91,117,000
Orthodox	38,788,000	110,904,000	79.0	1.76	103,626,000	86,964,000
Independents	1,769,000	1,500,000	1.1	1.37	1,600,000	1,700,000
Protestants	928,000	1,300,000	0.9	0.02	1,400,000	1,250,000
Agnostics	36,629,000	6,500,000	4.6	-13.84	2,410,000	1,378,000
Muslims	10,100,000	15,400,000	11.0	0.41	15,500,000	13,500,000
Atheists	30,483,000	1,500,000	1.1	-10.24	400,000	200,000
Ethnoreligionists	535,000	980,000	0.7	-0.45	900,000	700,000
Buddhists	475,000	570,000	0.4	-0.48	600,000	650,000
Jews	2,168,000	180,000	0.1	-0.48	150,000	150,000
Hindus	0	46,000	0.0	1.16	60,000	80,000
Baha'is	2,000	17,000	0.0	-0.40	30,000	50,000
Sikhs	0	2,900	0.0	-0.47	3,000	3,000
New religionists	400	1,000	0.0	-0.49	1,200	1,400
Chinese folk	0	1,000	0.0	-0.47	2,000	3,000
Total population	130,392,000	140,318,000	100.0	-0.48	128,193,000	107,832,000

and the Moscow Branch of the Jehovah's Witnesses, were banned altogether following court decisions. In some cases the Russian Constitutional Court has interpreted the 1997 Law in favor of minority religions and overturned administrative decisions that had previously denied registration to them. Also, some groups (including the Salvation Army) have won cases against Russia in the European Court of Human Rights.

In the post-Soviet situation, many, including in state agencies, have turned to the Russian Orthodox Church as an important source of moral authority and social cohesion against what they perceive as the socially disruptive and morally corrosive forces of market economy, political instability, and geopolitical conflicts. In its turn, while remaining largely uninvolved in formal politics, the church draws on its considerably increased institutional strength and impact to reinforce its presence in major institutions such as the army and education. One expression of this has been a rapprochement between the church and the state agencies, which was achieved through official and semi-official agreements, and informal connections. On a more extreme side, political and ideological movements have appeared that promote their versions of Russian Orthodoxy as foci of their nationalist agendas (for example, the Eurasianists, the Orthodox Rus', the Great Russia). At the same time, certain new trends within minority religions have also found appeal among ethno-nationalist or trans-national political movements, such as new versions of Islam in the Northern Caucasus. Finally, the sharply enhanced political profile of religion, in particular, of the Russian Orthodox Church, has caused concern in some quarters about the secular nature of Russian society and government.

Marat S. Shterin

See also: Baptists; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Great White Brotherhood; Gurdjieff Foundations; Jehovah's Witnesses; Molokans; Mother of God Centre; Old Believers (Russia); Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Theosophical Society (America).

References

Anderson, John. Religion, State and Politics in the Soviet Union and Successor States, 1953–1993. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

Billington, James H. The Icon and the Axe: An Interpretative History of Russian Culture. New York: Vintage Books, 1966.

- Ellis, Jane. The Russian Orthodox Church: Triumphalism and Defensiveness. Basingstoke, NY: Macmillan, 1996.
- Knox, Zoe. Russian Society and the Orthodox Church: Religion in Russia after Communism. London and New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Lane, Christel. The Rites and Rulers: Ritual in Industrial Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Steinberg, Mark, and Catherine Wanner. Religion, Morality and Community in Post-Soviet Societies. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 2008.
- Witte John, Jr., and Michael Bordeaux, eds. Proselytism and Orthodoxy in Russia: The New Wars for Souls. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1999.

Russia, Islam in Contemporary Russia (or the Russian Federation) has the largest number of Muslims in Europe, with estimates ranging from 15 to 20 million people, or between 12 and 14.5 percent of the population. Muslim communities have been present in the country for more than 1,000 years and their histories are inextricably linked to that of the country as a whole. Most of Russia's Muslims live either in the Middle Volga region, mainly in the autonomous republics of Tatarstan and Bashkortostan, or in the Northern Caucasian republics of Dagestan, Chechnya, and Kabardino-Balkaria. Large groups of ethnic Muslims also reside in Russia's capital Moscow (between 1.5 and 2 million, according to different estimates), St. Petersburg, and many areas of Siberia. Islam in Russia comprises 38 ethnic groups with different languages, folk traditions, and historical legacies. The largest Muslim ethnic groups are Tatars (5,500,000), Bashkirs (1,600,000), Azeris (1,500,000), Chechens (1,300,000), Avars (800,000), Kazakhs (680,000), and Kabardinians (530,000). Most Russian Muslims are Sunni (90 percent) and 10 percent are Shia. Many Muslim ethnic groups have their politico-administrative homelands: Ingushetia, Dagestan, Chechnya, Kabardino-Balkaria, Karachaevo-Cherkessia, Tatarstan, and Bashkortostan.

The Kul Sharif Mosque and old kremlin, Kazan, Republic of Tatarstan, Russia. The original mosque was destroyed in 1552 when Russian forces, under Ivan IV ("The Terrible"), stormed Kazan. (Natalia Pavlova/Dreamstime.com)

Muslim communities first appeared in what is now the Russian Federation in the seventh century, when Arab Sassanids (from the area that is modern Iran) conquered the northeastern parts of the Caucasus Mountains (contemporary Dagestan), spreading the Shafii madhhab, one of four judicial schools within Sunni Islam. However, it was only in the early 19th century that Islam became the majority religion among the peoples of the Northern Caucasus. Its beliefs and practices coexisted for many centuries with pre-monotheistic religious cultures that included magic and worship of ancestors and deities of nature. Additionally, there was rivalry between Shafii and Hanafi madhhabs, with the former eventually prevailing among the Chechens and Ingushes in the 19th century.

The Middle Volga and the Western Urals constituted another area strongly influenced by Islam. From the eighth century on, they had trade connections with, and received missionaries from, Central Asian Muslims, and in 922, Islam became the official religion of the Kingdom of Volga Bulgars. Islam in this region survived the conquest of the Volga Bulgars by the Mongolian warriors in 1236, who initially tended to be tolerant toward religions of the subjugated populations.

Sufism began to proliferate in the Northern Caucasus as early as in the 12th century. By the early ninth century, brotherhoods of its Naqshbandiyya Order (tariqa) had assumed a significant role in the local social organization. From the 18th century, Naqshbandiyya Sufism became widespread also among the Volga Tatars, but its prominence never rivaled that of its Northern Caucasian counterpart; from the late 19th century, it began to wane in the face of the emerging Islamic renovation movements.

Interactions with its eastern Slavic Christian neighbors had a formative influence on the development of Muslim communities of northern Eurasia. Initially, they had only sporadic encounters with Kievan Rus, the early eastern Slavic state, which adopted Christianity in 988. However, following the Mongolian conquest in the 13th century, the situation changed dramatically, especially after 1313, when Khan Ozbek made Islam the official religion of the Golden Horde. Henceforth, the struggle against the “Mongolian Yoke” could be seen as synonymous with liberating Russian Orthodox lands from the Islamic Golden Horde. This association persisted in Russian culture for centuries and was reinforced by subsequent encounters with the Muslim world. Simultaneously, however, this perception was somewhat mitigated by collective memories of peaceful coexistence between ethnic Muslims and Russians in a single state over many centuries.

From the 14th century on, the geopolitical situation steadily reversed in favor of the expanding Russian state. In the 16th century, the Muscovite state conquered the descendants of the fragmented Golden Horde—the Khanates of Kazan in the Middle Volga (1552) and Astrakhan in the Volga delta (1556). Later, the rising Russian Empire (proclaimed in 1721 by Peter the Great) engaged in territorial expansion. It entered into a series of geopolitical conflicts with the Muslim powers on its southern borders, in particular, the Ottoman Empire and Iran. This resulted in annexation of the Crimean Khanate in 1783, the conquest of the Northern and Southern Caucuses (1780s–1850s), and the inclusion of the vast territories of Central Asia (1820s–1890s). By the end of the 19th century, at least 14 million (13 percent) subjects within the empire were Muslims, with some estimates putting their number as high as 20 million (following the argument that the 1897 census, the only one in Russian imperial history, tended to underestimate numbers of non-Russian ethnic minorities). Muslims belonged to a vast variety of cultures, languages, and versions of Islam, and had developed different historical memories of their relationships with the Russian Empire. The imperial policies toward Muslims, too, varied across different regions, groups and historical periods.

In the common spirit of the time, the conquest of the Khanates of Kazan and Astrakhan in the 1550s was followed by attempts to destroy Islamic institutions (for example demolition of mosques and confiscation of waqf [charitable property]), by brutality toward the local Muslim population and subsequent virulent efforts at Christianization. Occasionally, the government showed limited flexibility, in particular, toward local elites, preferring to co-opt them into the Russian nobility. In most cases, this advancement was conditional on conversion to the Russian Orthodox Church. However, and in general, the government pursued colonization of the majority Muslim regions by ethnic Russians. These policies of destruction and assimilation were largely driven by the fear that the inclusion of massed numbers of Muslims would corrode the Orthodox Christian identity of the expanding empire and the socio-political cohesion based on it. For their part, Muslims responded by occasional resistance and continuing migration from their ancestral territories, frequently to the Ottoman Empire.

However, Catherine the Great (1762–1796), influenced by the European Enlightenment and facing growing numbers of Muslim subjects, adopted a considerably more accommodating policy toward Islam. Christian proselytism among Muslims was banned, their landed nobility in the conquered Crimea retained their property, and permissions were liberally given to build new mosques and Koranic schools. In addition,

Catherine decreed the establishment of the Muhammadan Spiritual Assembly, a semi-autonomous administrative body to regulate Muslim activities in the European part of Russia. Rather than reflecting the empress's personal sympathies, this policy was designed to control Muslim population through more sophisticated means of co-opting the loyalty of Muslim nobility and clergy, encouraging them to follow what the Russian "enlightened" elite saw as the European way of life.

This approach was only partly institutionalized in the subsequent imperial policies in the 19th century, in particular, in the North Caucasian Mountains. Here the Russian conquest encountered strong resistance in which the organization, beliefs, and practices of Naqshbandiyya Sufi brotherhoods played a crucial role. Through the successive leaderships of Sheikh Mansur, a Sufi mystic and war leader (late 18th century); Ghazi Muhammad, a Dagestani Avar Koranic scholar (early 19th century); and, most important, Imam Shamil, also an Avar (1825–1859), a strong network of devoted Murids emerged. By the late 1850s, the Murids were defeated, but the tradition of Muridiyya had been established in the Northern Caucasus. A movement of committed Sufi warriors engaged in a battle for Islam and against the infidels emerged, for either the liberation of Muslim lands from non-Islamic invaders or the removal of "pagan" influences.

In late imperial Russia (late 19th through the early 20th centuries), the government's primary concern was the economic returns from Muslim territories, in particular, from Central Asia and the Caucasus, and consequently about maintaining a degree of stability in those areas. Traditional Islamic practices were more tolerated; educational establishments were allowed to function; and aggressive Orthodox Christian proselytism was often frowned upon by the Russian colonial authorities, more sophisticated missionary methods being preferred. Before 1917, there were around 26,000 functioning mosques in the Russian Empire. However, concerns about Muslim loyalty to the Orthodox Empire persisted. The government attempted to limit connections between local Muslims and their co-believers in the rest of the Islamic world. At times it outlawed certain versions and practices of Islam regarded as threatening. For example, in the 1850s–1860s, members of the (new) Qadiriyya Sufi Order gained a large following among Chechens and Ingushes. Also known as Zikrism (from zikr; its central practice of loudly exclaiming the name of Allah while dancing in a circle), the Order refused to obey the Russian authorities' demands for moderation. As the result, zikr and other key practices were banned. (It is interesting to note that Ramazan Kadyrov, the current president of Chechnya, comes from this Order. He is engaged in suppressing new and rival Islamic groups in the republic on the grounds of their extremism and threat to ethno-national cohesion.)

Even more significant were effects of wider socioeconomic trends and policies. Russification continued, encouraging ethnic Russians to emigrate to the Muslim territories and imposing Russian as the official language. Consequently, traditional Islamic learning and education in local languages came to be associated with inferior social status and limited opportunities. In turn, this encouraged Muslim youth, particularly from more privileged backgrounds, to be educated in Russian, thus contributing to their increasing cultural separation from the Muslim world and diminishing their interest in Islamic thought.

However, the second half of the 19th century saw an emergence of new movements within Russian Muslims, in particular, among ethnic Tatars. Baha al-Din Vaisov, a Sufi mystic, led a radical revivalist movement that called Muslims to restore Islam to its pristine state as a community of devout equals, to purify it from Christian-style hierarchal authorities, and to terminate its subordination to the infidels' government. Popular mainly among rural Muslims, the movement was suppressed by the Russian authorities in the early 20th century. Also in the 1880s, a more significant movement—Jadidism (from Arabic jaded, "new")—emerged among Tatar intelligentsia. It rapidly spread among Central Asian and Crimean Muslims. The movement represented an innovative attempt to modernize Islam by introducing progressive educational methods and science into Islamic curriculum on the one hand, and liberating it from obscurantist accretions not rooted in the Koran on the other. The movement encountered hostility from Islamic conservatives of the Qadimiyya tradition (from Arabic qadim, "old") who saw it as a threat to the established Muslim authorities and ways of practicing the faith. At the same time it was treated with hostility by Russian officials who feared the prospect of the internal modernization and, by implication, increasing appeal of Islam at the expense of the Russification of Muslims. The beginning of the 20th century was also marked by growing political involvement of Muslims in the Russian Empire, which included formation of ethno-nationalist parties based on Islamic identity, Muslim factions in democratic and socialist movements, and pan-Islamic projects of creating supra-ethnic Islamic political entities.

The seven decades of the “construction of Communism” (1917–1991), and specifically, the antireligious policies and secularist and atheist ethos of the time, had major effects on Russia’s Muslims. However, at certain periods the official policy also included pragmatic considerations, such as searching for political support from ethnic Muslims or the simple recognition of the role of Islam in local traditions. Initially, during the first decade after the 1917 Bolshevik revolution, the new government sent a signal that it regarded Muslims as a previously suppressed ethnic minority and therefore as potential allies. Some sections of Muslims responded positively, or pragmatically, by, for instance, forming regional Muslim Communist governments, Muslim Communist parties, and even a Muslim Red Army. However the Bolsheviks found more hostility in the mountainous regions of Chechnya and Dagestan.

The all-out assault on Islam began in the late 1920s. With the Stalinist policy of a “breakthrough” in the construction of Socialism, Islam was declared the major obstacle to the Socialist modernization of the traditionally Muslim regions and to the prosperity of individual Muslims. This accusation translated itself into mass closures and demolitions of mosques, repression of Islamic religious professionals, and banning of Islamic education and training. In 1929, Arabic script was abolished and replaced by Latin and later by Cyrillic, thus effectively separating Soviet Muslims from their religious heritage and increasing their political separation from the major centers of Islamic scholarship and culture. In the 1930s, a total ban was introduced on publication of Islamic literature, including the Koran, and on pilgrimages to Mecca (hajj), with only limited reversal of this policy after World War II.

The Soviet assault on Islam was particularly harsh in the mountains of Chechnya and Dagestan, where Naqshbandiyya Sufi brotherhoods led irreconcilable guerrilla fighting against Bolshevism well into the 1930s. Following the eventual Soviet victory, Sufi brotherhoods were banned, their leaders executed or exiled, and properties confiscated. By 1948, even after the relative relaxation of anti-religious policies during World War II, only 416 mosques officially remained in the Russian Federation (1.5 percent of the 1917 figure), mainly in the Volga area. A single madrassa, Mir-Arab, in the entire Soviet Union was reopened in 1952 in the Uzbek city of Bukhara, later complemented by the Imam Al-Bukhari Institute in Tashkent. At the same time, the Communist government created four official administrations for Soviet Muslims, two of them in the current Russian Federation—the Spiritual Directorate of the Muslims of European Russia and Siberia and the Spiritual Directorate of the Northern Caucasus and Dagestan. These bodies were supposed to demonstrate to the outside world the freedom Islam enjoyed in the Soviet Union, and to secure loyalty of Muslims to the Soviet leadership. However, in reality they could only control a small section of Muslims, as Islamic practice does not require leadership by professional clergy to the same extent as in Orthodox Christianity.

The institutional destruction of Islam was compounded by the Soviet nationality policy. In the early years of the Bolshevik rule, some Islamic activists saw the apparent sympathy of the new government toward Muslims as an opportunity to realize their pan-Islamic ideas of creating large Muslim/Islamic political entities in Central Asia, Northern Caucasus, and the Middle Volga-Urals areas. Despite some initial success, these hopes proved to be short-lived. In the 1920s, Soviet “nationality policy” was informed by fears about political entities and loyalties developing based on Islam. Instead, it aimed to divide ethnic Muslim groups through drawing artificial administrative boundaries that split these groups and included mixed ethnicities. For instance, in the 1920s a considerable proportion of ethnic Tatars found themselves outside the Autonomous Republic of Tatarstan, becoming 30 percent of the population of Bashkortostan. The anti-Muslim stance of the Stalinist government showed itself most harshly in 1944, when between 600,000 and 800,000

Chechens, Ingushes, Crimean Tatars, and a number of smaller ethnic groups were accused of treason and collaboration with German armies and deported from their homelands to Siberia and Kazakhstan.

Although the most repressive aspects of Stalinism, such as the deportations, were rectified under the rule of Nikita Khrushchev (1954–1964), Islam as a faith remained a primary target of Khrushchev's anti-religious campaign, with particularly severe persecutions of Sufi brotherhoods, further closures of mosques, and enforced reduction in the number of clergy. However, in the late period of the Soviet Union (1970s–1980s), anti-religious campaigns subsided. The official stance was affected by the expediencies of foreign policy, oscillating between ideological recognition of the anti-imperialist potential of Islam (for example, in the 1979 Iranian Revolution) and reversal to the rhetoric about its backwardness (as a source of resistance to the 1979–1989 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan). At the same time, these events activated Islamic movements in the Soviet Union. Disillusioned by Socialism and influenced by the Afghan mujahedin, small underground fundamentalist groups emerged in Central Asia, and Sufi brotherhoods were increasingly influential in Chechnya and Dagestan.

Following the general liberalization under Mikhail Gorbachev (r. 1985–1991), restrictions on religious practice were considerably relaxed, and Soviet Muslims had better opportunities for reconnecting with their co-believers in other countries. In 1985 in the Russian Federation, in addition to around 190 officially registered mosques there were perhaps more than 300 unregistered ones; in the Chechen-Ingush Republic the proportion could be at least 10 times the official number. While Soviet secularization had considerable impact in some Muslim regions, in particular, in the Middle Volga-Urals and in Northwestern Caucasus, in other areas, such as Dagestan and Chechnya, the Sufi networks proved tenacious and contributed to Islam's continuing vitality. According to some estimates, by 1990, half of all Chechens belonged to Muridiyya brotherhoods. The fledgling Islamic revival was further reinforced by incipient financial and logistical support from the rest of the Muslim world, in particular, Saudi Arabia and Turkey.

The results of the Soviet anti-Islamic policy were somewhat paradoxical. The institutional devastation in the previous decades mainly undermined “high” Islam—the development of Islamic knowledge, thought, professional education, and culture. However, being less conditional on formal organization and professional clergy, Islam retained its vitality outside its institutional structures. Its role as a marker of ethnic identity was preserved—and in many aspects and places reinforced—through surviving folk practices (such as celebration of Uraza-bairam and Kurban-bairam) and family socialization.

With the adoption of the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religions and following the end of the Soviet Union in December 1991, Islam in Russia entered what is often referred to as a period of resurgence. The number of registered Muslim communities grew dramatically: from around 100 in 1991 to around 3,800 in 2008. With inclusion of unregistered groups, the figure is likely to be much higher. Although the estimates vary widely, the number of mosques (both registered and unregistered) rose from a few hundred to at least 7,000. The acute need for religious professionals triggered a surge in Islamic educational establishments, although initially the demand was met more quantitatively than qualitatively. Recognized centers of high Islamic learning now include the Higher Islamic College in Moscow, the Russian Islamic Institute in Tatarstan, the Rizaetdin Fahreddin Institute in Bashkortostan, and Imam ash-Shafii Islamic University in Dagestan. In addition, an Islamic cultural milieu emerged, with organizations, services, and interest groups ranging from incipient Islamic banking and halal food outlets to Islamic fashion and film festivals, and from Muslim women's groups to Islamic political parties. Some developments resulted from the re-establishment of connections with the rest of the Islamic world: the flow of funds and missionaries from Islamic countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and Turkey on the one hand, and Russian Muslims visiting and studying abroad on the other. In 2006, 18,000 Russian Muslims performed hajj in Mecca. Nevertheless, the incidence of Islamic practice among ethnic Muslims remains relatively low, with only between 2 and 9 percent attending evening Friday prayer weekly, though it tends to be higher in some regions of the Northern Caucasus and among some immigrant Muslim groups in large cities. According to the 2008 Gallup Poll, around 15 percent of Russian Muslims never obey salat (the call to prayer), only 28 percent fast during the month of Ramadan, and around 50 percent drink alcohol.

In the 1990s, centralized administrative authorities of the Soviet period collapsed and were replaced by dozens of administrative structures claiming that they represent particular Muslim ethnic groups or visions of Islam. In reality, however, many of them are based on personal loyalties and commitments. The most influential administrative bodies are the Central Spiritual Directorate of Muslims, the Coordinating Committee of the Muslims of the Northern Caucasus, and the Council of Russia's Muftis.

The post-Soviet situation and profiles of Muslim communities were deeply affected by a number of interrelated processes, such as migration, ethnic revival and associated ethno-political conflicts, geopolitical issues, demographic and generational changes, and globalization of Islam.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, large numbers of ethnic Muslims moved from their homelands in the Northern Caucasus and Central Asia to big cities, such as Moscow and St. Petersburg, in most cases trying to escape economic impoverishment or ethno-political conflicts. For instance, according to some estimates, at least 1,500,000 ethnic Muslims now live in Moscow and 200,000 in the largest Siberian city of Novosibirsk. One result of this was the formation of significant Muslim minority communities in major urban centers. Within some sections of ethnically Orthodox Christian majorities, this process caused anxieties about the changing ethno-demographic balance and fears of impending "Islamization."

In several regions, ethno-religious activists pressed for recognition of the central role of Islam in the cultural and social life of ethnic Tatars, Bashkirs, Chechens, and other communities. This open-ended trend manifested itself in demands for a greater role for Islam in social institutions and daily life, such as education, public morality (demands for Islamic censorship in Dagestan), the family (attempts at legalization of polygamy in some regions), and gender roles. In some cases, attempts were made to introduce elements of or the entire body of Sharia jurisprudence (in the village of Belozerye in Mordovia, and in parts of Dagestan and Chechnya). In some instances, ethno-religious identity became connected to claims for more political autonomy or even independence from the Russian Federation, for instance, the Ittifik movement in Tatarstan in the 1990s and the separatist groups in Chechnya. At the same time, some activists adopted Islamic agendas that transcended ethnic divisions. Some intended to unite and religiously educate all of Russia's Muslims (the Nur movement and the Union of Muslims of Russia in the 1990s). Others had pan-Islamic agendas that extended beyond the Russian Federation. Such activities considerably heightened the political profile of Islam and at times contributed to tensions and conflicts. A curious attempt at modernizing Islam has been made by Raphael Hakimov, an academic and presidential aide in the Republic of Tatarstan, who has been promoting "Euro-Islam," a liberal version of the religion suitable for modern European Muslims and reflecting a higher level of integration of the Tatar Muslims in European culture.

Geopolitical tensions and conflicts involving Islam had profound effects on Russia's Muslims and their communities, specifically after 9/11 and other terrorist acts. As elsewhere in Western countries, the extremist rhetoric and activities of some groups and networks outside Russia that declared a global jihad against the enemies of the faith anywhere in the world backlashed on ordinary Russian Muslims by provoking doubts and fears about their loyalty. What was earlier seen as a specific case of Chechen Islamic extremism, was now attributed to global trends in the relationships between "Islam" and "the West." The Chechen conflict itself began as predominantly ethno-political and only acquired the Islamic dimension as it unfolded, to some extent reflecting the later involvement of some international jihadists. Jihadist rhetoric found a receptive audience among a very small number of younger Russian Muslims, and those almost exclusively in regions already experiencing social tensions and political grievances, such as in Chechnya and elsewhere in the Northern Caucasus. Several terrorist acts in Russian cities, in particular, the 2004 tragic school siege in Beslan, Northern Ossetia, contributed to creation of a negative image of Islam, amplified by the mass media.

Generational differences and demographic changes also contributed to the new profile of post-Soviet Islam. Younger Muslims make up a growing proportion of the population both in several traditionally Muslim regions and also among immigrants in large urban centers. They tend to be attracted to socially, and at times, politically, transformative forms of the religion, such as those offered by various groups within the Salafi strand of Sunni Islam, or what in Russia is often seen as an offshoot of Wahhabi Islam. Such groups commonly put emphasis on the transformation of the whole individual through a return to the “pure Islam” of the days of the Prophet. In practical terms, this means rejecting the traditional “ethnic” forms of Islam, living according to the prescriptions of sharia law and original Sunna, and studying the Koran in Arabic. These groups are particularly prominent in Dagestan and other parts of the Northern Caucasus but can also be found elsewhere in the Russian Federation, in particular, in large cities. Although most of them do not show politically extremist intentions, their existence has given rise to fears about terrorist networks covering the entire country. Many other Muslims often meet these groups with hostility, particularly those from more traditionally inclined Sufi brotherhoods, such as the Qadiriyya and Naqshbandiya Sufi orders. In the Northern Caucasus, some of the new groups became entangled with the Chechen rebels and engaged in armed conflicts involving Russian Federal forces (1999 in Dagestan and 2005 in Kabardino-Balkaria).

There have also emerged a variety of other new Islamic groups representing different currents and dimensions of contemporary Islam. These range from the highly politicized Hizb-Ut-Tahrir to the largely apolitical Tablighi Jamaat. Some are well known in both Muslim and Western countries and were introduced by missionaries. Examples are the Güllen movement of the followers of the Turkish Islamic thinker, Fethullah Gülen; Ahmadiyya Islam; and the new Sufi orders of Subud and Nimatullahi. There are also homegrown new groups, such as those led by Faisarhman Sattarov and Nurulla Moflukhanov in Tatarstan.

Many of these groups, in particular, those of foreign origins, have encountered considerable animosity from both more traditional Russian Muslims and the Russian authorities. Many of these reactions are affected by a shared discourse on Islamic extremism, often fueled by the mass media and the inflammatory politicized rhetoric that they spread. In this rhetoric, all foreign Islamic groups, particularly those connected to the Middle East and Turkey, tend to be seen as part or offshoots of a single extremist Islamist network. Almost invariably, these groups attract the attention of the Security Services, which use the 2002 law “On Fighting Extremist Activity,” which contains loose definitions of religious extremism. The adoption of this law by the Duma (Lower House of Parliament) signified an important change in the official approach to Islamist extremism, which was now seen as a global phenomenon, with Russia as one of its main targets. In 2003, the Supreme Court banned 15 different international Islamic groups with records of violence or incitement of violence; however, the presence of most of them in the country is doubtful. Among these groups was Hizb-ut-Tahrir, the violent nature of which was never proven, its ideologically extreme aims notwithstanding. Since 2003, the police and security services have raided many new Islamic groups. In addition, in 2007, the Supreme Court began publishing “The Federal List of Extremist Materials.” Among inflammatory and violence-inciting contemporary works, it also lists the books of Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab (1703–1792), founder of Wahabiyya Islam, which are favored by contemporary jihadists, and of Said Nursi (1878–1960), a widely respected Turkish Islamic thinker.

At the same time, the Russian government consistently declared its support for Russian Muslims and its anti-Islamophobic credentials. In some situations, Russian Muslims found official support for expressions of their religious identity. Since 2003, the Russian government has repeatedly referred to its sizable Muslim minority as the basis for its intention to join Organization of Islamic Conference. However, inside the country, Islamophobia shows itself not so much in direct opposition to the religion but more in racist attitudes of some sections of society toward ethnic Muslims, which results in occasional racist attacks, in particular, by neo-Nazi style skinheads, and in harassment by the police.

Marat S. Shterin

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Bukhara; Globalization, Religion and; Hanafite School of Islam; Mecca; Moscow; Mosques; Muridiyya; Naqshbandiya Sufi Order; Pilgrimage; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Ramadan; Russia; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Shia Islam; Subud; Sufism; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Hunter, Shireen T. Islam in Russia: The Politics of Identity and Security. New York and London: M. E. Sharpe, 2004.
- Malashenko, Alexei V. Islamic Rebirth in Contemporary Russia. Moscow: Carnegie Centre, 1998.
- Pilkington, Hilary, and Galina M. Yemelianova, eds. Private and Public Faces of Islam in Russia. London and New York: Curzon, 2003.
- Ro'i, Yaacov. Islam in the Soviet Union: From the Second World War to Gorbachev. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
- Yemelianova, Galena. M. Russia and Islam: A Historical Survey. London: Palgrave, 2002

Russia, Protestantism in

Protestantism has been present in Russia in a variety of forms for nearly five centuries. It is currently the second largest and the fastest growing strain of Christianity in the country. Although Russia never had anything comparable to the Protestant Reformation in the West, some of its homegrown sectarian movements espoused ideas and practices that had a degree of affinity with those articulated in the antecedents and by the founders of Protestantism. Western Protestantism came to Russia in three different ways: through territorial expansion of the empire westward and northward; through voluntary settlement of Protestant groups, ethnic and otherwise; and through missionary activities among ethnic Russians.

Russian Sectarianism Long before the first Lutherans reached Russia in the 1520s, some Russian sectarian movements sought unmediated spiritual enlightenment and connection with God over and above the official dogma and church authority. These movements tended to emphasize direct mystical experience rather than rational thought, which can be partly explained by a lack of a developed theological tradition in pre-modern Russia. In the 1370s–1450s, the Strigol'niks (“Shearers,” or “shorn-heads”) attracted a large following in the northwestern cities of Novgorod and Pskov. They protested against the corruption and materialism of the official Russian Orthodox Church, called for a return to the pristine Christianity of the Apostles, and denounced priesthood. In the late 15th century, a diverse group of dissenters, named the Judizers by the Church, emerged in Novgorod and Moscow. Although some evidence suggests a Jewish influence, many of their diverse ideas, such as the rejection of the sacraments, monasticism, and professional clergy, were in tune with those of European pre-Reformation thinkers.

Evangelical Lutheran church in St. Petersburg, Russia. (Maxim Toporskiy/Dreamstime.com)

In the 17th and 18th centuries, when sectarianism flourished in Russia, followers of the Faith of Christ (Christovshchina) believed in personal experience of God through continuous recitation of the Lord's Prayer until their hearts received the Holy Spirit, which manifested itself in dancing, singing, glossolalia, and prophesying. They believed that their leaders spiritually embodied Christ and that, therefore, the kingdom of God was already spiritually present. While formally belonging to the official church, they held secret meetings and observed severe asceticism. Perhaps partly due to severe persecutions, some groups began to advocate and practice extreme forms of devotion to God through flagellation (the Flagellants; Russian: Khlysty) and later castration (the Castrates; Russian: Skoptsy).

The second half of the 18th and the 19th centuries saw the proliferation of Spiritual Christianity, in particular, the Dukhobors ("Spirit-wrestlers"), and the Molokans ("Milk-drinkers"). Both groups rejected Orthodox icons, sacraments, and hierarchy, and emphasized personal devotion and connection to God. In addition, a group of Molokans developed strong apocalyptic expectations, similar to those found in some Western Protestant sects.

Western Protestantism in Russia In the early 16th century, the rise of the Muscovite Czarism and its intensified trade connections coincided with the proliferation of Reformation movements in Western Europe. In the 1520s, the first German and Swedish Lutheran merchants came to Moscow and the northern city of Novgorod, followed by English and Dutch Calvinist traders, who were invited by Grand Prince Vasili III (1500–1533) and particularly his son Ivan IV ("The Terrible"; 1533–1582) to serve as specialists—builders, doctors, barbers, military advisors, and the like. Ivan IV's attitude to Western Protestants displayed a mixture of curiosity, tolerance, and suspicion, which was common in early Russian encounters with Protestantism. For example, he guaranteed English Protestants protection from coercive conversion to Russian Orthodoxy and allowed the building of a Lutheran church and a Reformed Calvinist church near the Kremlin. However, having grown suspicious of a possible heretical influence, he later had the churches demolished and segregated foreigners in a special German District in the outskirts of Moscow. However, settlement of foreign specialists and merchants continued: contemporary sources refer to at least 18,000 Protestants living in Russia in the mid-17th century.

Following Peter the Great's (1682–1725) extensive "Europeanizing" reforms, thousands of German and other European Protestants settled in the country and many became Russian subjects. This was further facilitated by Peter's legalization of mixed Orthodox-Protestant marriages and guarantees of free practice of Protestant faiths. In addition, by arranging numerous marriages with the German dynasties, Peter the Great paved the way for the German Lutheran nobility's settlement in Russia throughout the 18th century. Some of Peter's reforms themselves had an imprint of Protestantism, especially when he replaced the Patriarchate with the Most Holy Synod headed by a secular official, a form of ecclesiastical administration that was prompted by Peter's visit to England in 1698.

However, the numerical growth of Protestantism in Russia in the 18th century mainly resulted from territorial expansion to the northwest. Following its victory over Sweden in the Northern War (1700–1721), Russia annexed the Baltic lands and southern Finland with their predominantly Lutheran populations. In addition, thousands of Lutheran hostages were captured and settled throughout the Russian Empire. The Protestant population further increased after the inclusion of the rest of Finland (1809) and Poland (1815).

In the late 18th century, a new wave of Protestants came to Russia, invited by Catherine the Great to cultivate the wastelands in the Southern Ukraine, Volga, and Northern Caucasus regions. The majority of these new settlers were Lutherans, but a considerable proportion were Mennonites. Among the privileges granted to them by the empress was the freedom to practice their faith, declared by a special 1787 imperial decree. By the end of the 19th century, 1,800,000 Germans lived in Russia and around 75 percent of them were Lutherans. They created a distinctive ethnic group that shared many key elements of Russian culture, including the Russian language, but were distinguished by their faith. Many of the Lutherans and their families eventually became Russian Orthodox; some—or their descendants—made a considerable contribution to Russian culture and society (for example, Vitus Bering, the navigator; Sergey Witte, the statesman; and Alexander Blok, the poet).

Protestant Missionaries and New Russian Protestant Groups before 1917 In the 19th century Protestantism became increasingly prominent among ethnic Orthodox Russians. In the early 19th century, German Pietism became popular among the St. Petersburg nobility, with Czar Alexander I (1801–1825) being its major proponent. In addition, Alexander I favored the establishment in 1812 of the Russian Bible Society (RBS), an inter-denominational group devoted to the translation of the Bible into vernacular languages and its distribution among Russians and other ethnic groups. Between 1813 and 1826 (when the RBS was banned), many parts of the Bible were translated in Russian theological academies. The work was resumed in the 1860s under the editorship of Metropolitan Philaret of Moscow and was completed in 1876 when the Russian Synodal Bible was published. Subsequently, it became an important proselytizing tool of Western Protestant missionaries as well as a source of religious dissent among ethnic Orthodox Russians.

In the 1820s–1830s, German and English Pietists were proclaiming the Gospels in the German colonies in the South of Ukraine, in particular, introducing the practice of meeting for an hour of personal prayer and Bible study, or Stunde (German: “an hour”). From these colonies the practice spread to neighboring Ukrainian and Russian villages, giving rise to the movement of Russian Stundists in the 1850s–1860s. Initially Russian Stundists formally remained within the Russian Orthodox Church, but, faced with denunciation by the official church, some of them turned to Baptist missionaries; in the late 1860s, some Russians and Ukrainians accepted baptism by immersion. However, Russian Protestants share the view that the first Russian convert to baptism was Nikita Voronin from the Molokan background, who was baptized by a German missionary and later formed the first Russian Baptist community in Tiflis (modern Tbilisi, Georgia). In the 1860s and 1870s, together with the Ukraine, the Caucasus was the second Russian region where baptism enjoyed considerable success.

Another center of evangelical Christianity in the late 19th century was St. Petersburg, the imperial capital, where Lord Granville Radstock, an English aristocrat and evangelical missionary, introduced the Plymouth Brethren (the Christian Brethren) to members of the Russian nobility, such as Count M. Korf, Colonel V. Pashkov, and Count A. Bobrinski (the then railways minister). The strenuous missionary activities of this group, known as the Russian Evangelical Christians, soon resulted in a considerable number of converts among the urban intelligentsia, students, urban artisans, and lower-rank military. In 1884, the Union of the Russian Evangelical Christians and Baptists was formed. By 1917, Baptists and evangelical Christians were among the fastest growing movements in Russia.

The last two decades of the 19th century saw missionary activities by a range of other Protestant groups. The Seventh-day Adventists, mainly from Germany and the United States, first attracted Russian converts in German colonies in the Caucasus and Ukraine, and later in the Baltic countries, Moscow and St. Petersburg. By 1917, there were around 7,000 Adventists in Russia. The first ethnic Russians converted to the Pentecostal Church in 1911 in Finland and then enjoyed rapid growth in the Caucasus, Ukraine, Estonia, Latvia, Moscow, and St. Petersburg; however, it became particularly successful in the first decade after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. There were also smaller groups of Presbyterians, Anglicans, Methodists, and Quakers.

In the late 1880s–1890s, newer Protestant groups, such as the Latter-day Saints (the Mormons) and the Salvation Army established their first missions in Russia. At the same time, Jehovah’s Witnesses began to distribute Russian editions of their periodical The Watchtower; their founder Charles Taze Russell (1852–1916) visited Russia in 1891. In the same year one of the first Russian converts, Semyon Kozlitsky, was exiled to Siberia for his missionary activities.

Some wider historical developments contributed to the proliferation of Russian Protestant groups in the last five decades of the Russian Empire (1861–1917). The abolition of serfdom in 1861, followed by other reforms in the 1860s and 1870s, delivered millions of peasants who were losing their traditional ties with rural communities dominated by the Russian Orthodox Church and engaging in new economic activities. In addition, the Russian Orthodox Church was also losing its grip on the more educated classes who were becoming more open to spiritual alternatives. This created fertile soil for Protestant missionaries. On the other hand, the waves of Protestant spiritual revivals in the 19th-century United States and Western Europe produced a pool of missionaries eager to spread their faiths throughout the globe, in particular, taking advantage of the improved means of travel.

The official policy toward Russian Protestants in pre-1917 Russia was largely determined by the significance accorded to the Russian Orthodox identity of the empire on the one hand, and by the necessities and attractions of socio-economic and cultural exchange with the West on the other. On the most fundamental level, all Protestants were in the category of inovertsy (“people of alien faith”), which placed them below pravoslavnye (Russian Orthodox). However, some of them, such as German Lutherans, English Anglicans, and Dutch Calvinists, were associated with countries whose economic, military, and cultural achievements Russian Europeanizing elites sought to emulate and could offer skills and knowledge they were interested in using. In addition, Eastern Orthodox and Protestants shared an animosity to Roman Catholics. However, the freedom of worship by foreigners was strictly conditional on their non-proselytizing among ethnic Russians, even if the latter showed interest in the Protestant faith. One way of protecting them from the temptations of “alien faiths” was the spatial separation of Protestant foreigners from ethnic Russians, such as the German District in Moscow in the 16th and 17th centuries. This was relaxed under the “enlightened” monarchs of the 18th century, who even allowed Lutheran churches to be erected in central areas of Russian cities. However, the state never ceased to exercise political control of Protestant groups. In 1832, a decree by Nicolas I established a single state-controlled administration in St. Petersburg, which had jurisdiction over all Protestant groups in Russia (except Finland and Poland), irrespective of their differences. On the other hand, in different periods of Russian history, bans were introduced on anti-Lutheran propaganda and enforced conversion of Lutherans to other faiths (with the notion of Lutherans commonly applied to other established Protestant denominations, such as the Dutch Reformed Church).

In the last three decades of the 19th century, the proliferation of actively proselytizing Western Protestant groups presented a challenge to the imperial authorities, as it was seen as a threat to the unbreakable link between the Russian people and the Russian Orthodox Church. Torn between competing categorizations, the imperial authorities engaged in a flurry of legislative activities that oscillated between guaranteeing the freedom of worship to the traditionally respected Protestants and restricting the spread of undesirable sectarian groups. Konstantin Pobedonostsev, the highly influential ober-procurator (head) of the Most Holy Synod between 1880 and 1905, favored strict state control and persecution of “sectarian activities,” first of all the Baptists and evangelical Christians, whom he officially declared the most dangerous anti-state and anti-church sect. Some Western missionaries, such as Lord Radstock, were banned from entering Russia, and their Russian co-believers, such as M. Korf and V. Pashkov, were forced to emigrate. However, the 1905 Edict of Toleration issued by Nicolas II legalized missionary activities and facilitated the organizational development of Protestant groups. The period of toleration was partially reversed immediately before and during World War I (1914–1918), as some influential czarist officials grew suspicious of the pro-German sympathies of Russian Protestants, which resulted in new restrictions and bans on their activities and exiles of their leaders.

Protestantism under the Soviet Regime (1917–1991)

The first years after the Bolshevik Revolution (1917–1920s) are often referred to as the “golden decade” of Russian Protestantism, in particular, of Baptist and evangelical groups. Despite their militant atheist stance and early anti-religious campaigns, initially the Bolsheviks treated the sectarians favorably as victims of persecution by the czarist state and church. The overall membership in these groups grew rapidly to at least 600,000 by 1929 (about 90 percent Baptists and evangelicals). Together with ethnic Protestants, the number of Russian Protestants was around a million (ca. one percent of the population). In an apparent show of affinity with the ethos of the new regime, Baptists and evangelicals set up their collective farms, cooperatives, and youth leagues (such as the Baptist Socialist Youth League). Ivan Prokhanov (1869–1935), the prominent leader of Christian evangelicals, promoted the ideas of Christian Socialism and even attempted to establish Socialist Evangelical Christian communities. Within the first post-revolutionary decade, Seventh-day Adventist membership nearly doubled and reached 12,000. Pentecostalism, too, was growing rapidly, establishing a particularly strong presence in the Ukraine, where it had at least 25,000 members in about 400 communities. In 1929, Soviet Pentecostals formed the Union of Christians of the Evangelical Faith, which was affiliated with the international Assemblies of God.

However, these good fortunes were reversed from the mid-1920s on, particularly in the wake of the 1929 Law on Religious Associations. The official Soviet ideology began to present Baptists, evangelicals, and other groups as archenemies of the emerging “Communist society.” Their categorization as “sectarian” was back in use in official propaganda and policy, this time in the service of state atheism. Their communities came under special surveillance by the security services, their members arrested and imprisoned and prayer houses shut down, their periodicals banned and educational activities terminated. After a short period of relative relaxation during and immediately after World War II, persecutions resumed in the mid-1950s, targeting Pentecostals, Adventists, and Baptists. Part of the Soviet-style control of the sectarians was destruction of their independent voluntary associations, such as the Union of Russian Baptists and Union of Evangelical Christians, and their replacement with state-controlled bodies, such as the Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia (UECBR), founded in 1944. However, in the late 1950s–early 1960s a group that came to be known as the Initiativniki (“the Initiators”) broke away from the UECBR, denouncing its politically subservient stance and forming an underground movement, the Council of Churches of Evangelical Christian Baptists. Jehovah’s Witnesses suffered severe persecutions, in particular, during and after World War II. In 1949–1951 whole communities were sent to exile in Siberia, the Far East, and Kazakhstan, an inadvertent consequence of which became their particularly strong presence in these regions.

Protestant groups, ethnic and otherwise, enjoyed relatively more freedom and vibrancy in the Baltic

Republic of Estonia. However, Lutheran Germans suffered a dramatic decline throughout the 20th century, as the two World Wars, famines, Stalinist repression, and economic disadvantages caused mass emigration, loss of life, and destruction of established communities. Overall, during the Soviet period, the profile of Russian Protestantism changed dramatically from being rooted in ethnic identity to becoming a matter of individual choice. This trend continued in the post-Soviet period.

Protestantism in post-Soviet Russia The introduction of the 1990 Law on Freedom of Religion and the collapse of the Soviet Union created favorable conditions for the proliferation of Protestant groups in post-Soviet Russia. The overall number of their communities grew from an estimated 510 in 1992 to around 4,000 registered communities in 2008, or ca. 20 percent of all registered religious organizations of the Russian Federation, with an estimated 2 million members. These figures are likely to be much higher if unregistered religious groups are accounted for. In some regions, particularly in Siberia and the Far East, the proportion of Protestant communities exceeds that of the Russian Orthodox Church. It has to be noted that Protestant communities normally use criteria of membership that are different from those of ethnic religions and tend to include only active and committed members.

Protestantism became highly visible in post-Soviet Russia, as Protestant communities tend to expect and encourage a high degree of religious commitment and social activism. In addition, newer Protestant groups tend to attract younger and more educated people, which imparts further vigor to their expression of faith and social activities. In some regions, these groups became actively involved in political life, mainly favoring politicians with democratic credentials.

In the post-Soviet era, Russian Protestantism became increasingly diverse. There was a revival of ethno-religious links, such as between remaining Russian Germans and Lutheranism, or between Finns and the Ingrian Lutheran Church. However, in some cases, ethnic Russians joined these groups too. Russian Baptists and evangelicals reconstituted their Union of the Evangelical Christians–Baptists of the Russian Federation and now have around 100,000 members in 1,400 local communities, slightly more than half of which are registered. Other communities, such as the Seventh-day Adventists, Methodists, the Quakers, the Presbyterians, the Anglicans, and the Mennonites also have between a few hundred and a few thousand members each. Most of these communities emerged as the result of missionary work of diverse groups of evangelizers and reflect their different versions of the Protestant tradition. For instance, there are quite different groups established by a range of Korean and American Methodists, Presbyterians, and others.

The proliferation of Charismatic and Pentecostal Christianity represents perhaps the most significant change in Russian Protestantism. Beginning from just dozens of unregistered communities in 1990, there were more than 1,500 registered Charismatic and Pentecostal communities in 2005, and perhaps an equal number of unregistered groups, with an estimated total membership ranging from 300,000 to 900,000, depending on the criteria of membership and statistics provided by their leadership. All Russian Pentecostal and Charismatic Christians share the beliefs in the “first blessing” of conversion; the “second blessing” of baptism by the Holy Spirit, evidenced in speaking in tongues; progressive sanctification; and individual holiness. However, three different strands can be identified among them, which in many ways reflect three generations of Russian Pentecostalism. The first, represented by the Christians of the Faith Union (or Fedotovtsy, after their leader Bishop Ivan Fedotov), is rooted within the generation of Pentecostals who resisted and survived Soviet persecutions and now tend to be more conservative, rejecting innovation, such as overt manifestations of miraculous healing, Western-style exuberant music and emotional worship, and personal prosperity theology. They are also distinguished by the practice of foot washing, symbolizing purity and humility. The second strand, represented by the Union of Evangelical Pentecostal Christians (led by Bishop Sergei Ryakhovskii), remains relatively conservative but is more accommodating toward contemporary Western-style music and emotional forms of worship; however, they, too, dismiss the gospel of prosperity. Finally, the Russian adaptations of Charismatic Pentecostal Christianity are represented by the Word of Life Church founded by the Swedish Preacher Ulf Ekman, the New Generation Church movement, and the offshoots of the Embassy of God Church, originally established by the Nigerian evangelist Sunday Adelaja in the Ukraine.

The exponential growth and social activism of Protestant groups in post-Soviet Russia alarmed the Russian Orthodox Church and more nationalist factions of Russian society. The 1997 Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Associations was designed to restrict their growth by introducing a requirement for religious associations to provide a proof of lawful existence in Russia more than 15 years prior to application for registration as a full legal entity, unless they are part of a nationwide religious organization. Given that many Protestant groups were recent arrivals in Russia, they proved most vulnerable to this requirement. Some of them chose to join the Union of Evangelical Pentecostal Christians while others operate without registration, which places considerable restrictions on their activities. Another way of controlling the growth of Protestant groups was attempts to outlaw them through legal actions. In December 2001, a Moscow court banned the Moscow branch of the Salvation Army on the grounds that it was involved in unlawful activities as a “paramilitary organization.” In October 2006, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) dismissed this decision. In 2004 another Moscow court banned the activities of the Jehovah’s Witnesses in the city and ruled that they be “liquidated” as a legal entity. This was followed by several decisions against Jehovah’s Witnesses in other Russian regions, one of which was successfully challenged in the ECHR in January 2007 (Kuznetsov and Others v. Russia). Although there is no evidence of a consistent anti-Protestant policy in Russia, there have been numerous decisions and actions by local authorities against them, such as restrictions on renting property, police raids and harassment, and visa restrictions for their pastors. These actions were often prompted by the renewed prominence of the anti-sectarian rhetoric, which portrays Protestant minority faiths as anti-social, anti-Russian, and morally corrosive. This rhetoric is echoed in some official and semi-official documents, such as the Doctrine of the National Security of the Russian Federation (2000), which sees missionary activities as part of the expansionist agendas by other states.

Russian Protestantism continues to play a considerable role in the country's religious life and society. It does this both directly (by introducing new forms of worship and social activism, emphasizing individual choice, and demanding more religious freedom) and indirectly (through challenging established assumptions about religious commitment and state management of religion).

Marat S. Shterin

See also: Assemblies of God; Atheism; Baptists; Calvinism; Christian Brethren; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints; Doukhobors; Jehovah's Witnesses; Lutheranism; Mennonites; Molokans; Pentecostalism; Russell, Charles Taze; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Union of Evangelical Christians–Baptists of Russia.

References

- Billington, James. Icon and the Axe. New York: Random House, 1966.
- Coleman, Heather J. Russian Baptists and Spiritual Revolution, 1905–1929. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2005.
- Heier, Edmund. Religious Schism in the Russian Aristocracy, 1860–1900: Radstockism and Pashkovism. The Hague, Netherlands: Nijhoff, 2005.
- Nielsen, Niels C., Jr. Christianity after Communism: Social, Political, and Cultural Struggle in Russia. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.
- Sawatsky, Walter. Soviet Evangelicals since World War II. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1981.

Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)

The Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) is the primary representative of Eastern Orthodoxy in Russia. It is the largest Christian communion in Russia and additionally has a large following among the Russian diaspora internationally.

The newly installed Russian Orthodox Church patriarch Kirill, bottom center, conducts the enthronement service in Moscow's Christ the Saviour Cathedral, Russia, February 1, 2009. (AP Photo/Alexander Zemlianichenko)

Orthodox Christianity took root in what is now the Russian Federation long before Russia's emergence as a unified state. Originally, Orthodoxy had become the state religion of Kievan Rus in 988 CE, when Grand Prince Vladimir of Kiev (ca. 956–1015) decided to convert from traditional Pagan beliefs to the religion of Greeks, the Christianity of the Byzantine rite. From then Byzantine Christianity became the faith of the three peoples who trace their origins to the Rus of Kiev: Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians.

The principdom of Kiev entered a period of decline that culminated in 1240, when the city was destroyed during the Mongol invasion. By the 14th century, a new political center grew up around the principality of Moscow, and the head of the church, the metropolitan of Kiev, took up residence there. Later, Moscow was declared the metropolitan see in its own right. Gradual centralization of political power in Moscow paved the way for the final formation of what would become the Russian Orthodox Church (ROC).

Initially, the ROC came under the titular jurisdiction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Constantinople, which appointed the Russian metropolitan and bishops. However, Russia gained more political power while Constantinople experienced gradual decline and finally fell to the Turks in 1453. In 1448, Grand Duke Vasily of Moscow (1415–1462) bade the Council of Russian Bishops to designate Bishop Jonas to the position of metropolitan. Not only was the Moscow metropolitan now independent, but henceforth the czar (and later the emperor) would be considered the champion and protector of the Orthodox faith in Russia. In 1589, the ROC achieved its full canonical independence (the so-called autocephaly), when Metropolitan Job (d. 1607) was enthroned by Ecumenical Patriarch Jeremiah II (r. 1585–1595) as the first Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia. It has become common to speak of Moscow as the “Third Rome,” the first Rome being said to have fallen into heresy and the New Rome—Constantinople—having fallen under the Turks.

From the baptism of Kievan Rus and through most of the 17th century, relations between the Orthodox Church and the state in Russia were regulated by a concept developed in the Byzantine Empire. Its focal point was the idea of harmony between two collateral powers: the church (sacerdotium) and the monarchy (imperium). Each was considered supreme in its own sphere of life. The long-lasting administrative and, to a certain degree, political independence of the Orthodox Church from the Russian state also had a strong economic basis, given that about one-third of Russian lands were owned by monasteries.

In the early 16th century, the ROC became divided into two different camps: the monastic movements of “grabbers” (stjazhateli) led by Joseph Volockij and the “non-grabbers” (nestjazhateli) led by Nil Sorskij. The non-grabbers criticized the practice of extensive land ownership by monasteries. By contrast, the grabbers argued that lands (and other properties) owned by the church serve charitable purposes. The grabbers and non-grabbers also held different positions on the relationship between church and state. The non-grabbers believed in a clear-cut division between what “belongs to Caesar and to God.” The grabbers instead backed strong union between church and state. While non-grabbers held the vision of the universal Orthodox Church, the grabbers promoted the national character of the ROC. The party of grabbers eventually won and the close union between the Orthodox Church and the Russian state was established.

In the mid-17th century a schism occurred in the ROC when Patriarch Nikon (1605–1681) initiated and resolutely enforced a number of church reforms. He introduced many elements and traditions of Greek Orthodoxy into ROC and changed prayer books so that they were in accordance with the original Greek texts. His actions resulted in the split of the ROC and emergence of the dissident Orthodox Old Believers movement, those who resisted reforms. Originally, Patriarch Nikon was supported by Czar Alexey, but by establishing “Greek Orders” in the ROC Nikon also pursued a political goal, namely, to achieve the supremacy of the church over the state. The confrontation between patriarch and monarch ended with the decisions of the Church Council of 1666–1667. The Council approved Nikon’s reforms, but deposed him from the position of patriarch and sent him into exile.

The period of harmony and mutual independence in the relations between the church and the state came to an end under the reign of Emperor Peter the Great (1672–1725). In 1721, he abolished the position of patriarch as the head of the ROC and instituted instead the Holy Synod. All 12 members of the Holy Synod (3 bishops and 9 monastic or married clergy) were appointed or dismissed at the emperor’s discretion. The Holy Synod was presided over by a secular official. The fundamental church reforms initiated by Peter the Great continued under the Empress Elizabeth (r. 1741–1762) and Catherine the Great (r. 1762–1796), who confiscated most of the church lands and enterprises (thus depriving the church of its economic independence) and closed more than half of the monasteries. From now on, the clergy of the ROC were regarded as the state’s employees.

Through the Russian Empire, the ROC operated as the exclusive state church, and Orthodoxy came to be seen as emblematic of Russian statehood. Orthodox Christianity also played an important role in the geographic expansion of the Russian state. In fact, the state's cultural unity and integrity were based on three major premises: the influx of ethnically Russian colonists, the forced cultural-linguistic Russification, and the inclusion of new lands into the canonical territory of the ROC. The territorial growth of the Russian Empire resulted in the growing religious diversity of Russia's population. The ROC did little to convert the representatives of the other religions to the Orthodox faith. However, voluntary conversion to the Orthodox faith was socially rewarded by the state through much better career opportunities in any state institutions, including the army, education and administration. On the contrary, it was a crime for an Orthodox Christian to convert to any other religion. Marriages between Christians and non-Christians were forbidden. While followers of most of the non-Orthodox Christian churches were tolerated in terms of personal freedom to exercise their beliefs, only the ROC had the right for missionary activities and only ROC was present in the school system (the lessons on "God's order" were mandatory).

According to the 1897 census, of the Russian Empire's 125 million residents, 72 percent were Orthodox, 9.2 percent were Catholics, 3 percent were Protestants, 11.1 percent were Muslims, 4.2 percent were followers of Judaism, and 0.4 percent were Buddhists.

In August 1917, during the first stage of the Russian Revolution (after the abdication of the Emperor Nikolai II in February 1917), a synod of ROC bishops reestablished the patriarchal structure of the ROC and elected Metropolitan Tikhon (1865–1925) to the position of patriarch. The Communist revolution in October 1917, however, brought sweeping changes in the religious life of Russian society. Among the first laws adopted by the new Bolshevik authorities in January 1918 was a "Decree about separation of church from State and the school from the church." Originally, Patriarch Tikhon was an outspoken critic of the new Communist government, but he moderated his position after time spent in prison. His successor, Patriarch Sergius (1867–1944), created a model in church-state relations that would persist through almost 70 years of Communist rule in Russia: the ROC publicly supported government on all issues, while the state agreed to allow ROC a very restricted sphere of activity limited solely to liturgical worship.

In general, in the Soviet Union—the state that was declared atheistic—religion was effectively marginalized and ousted from public life in spite of the fact that the legislation of the Soviet Union formally always provided for freedom of conscience. The major target of the anti-religious policies of the Communist state was the ROC because it was directly associated with demolished Russian monarchy. By the mid-1930s, under Joseph Stalin's dictatorial rule, any forms of organized religious activities had become effectively illegal. Thousands of clergy had been arrested, put into concentration camps, expelled, or executed. The number of functioning parishes of the ROC dropped from 54,000 in 1914 to only 200 to 300 by the beginning of World War II. The majority of surviving parishes were located in Moldova, western Ukraine, and western Belarus—territories annexed to the Soviet Union only in 1939–1940. By 1939, only four of the Orthodox bishops that remained were free of arrest and continued to serve.

The policy of the outright persecution of the ROC changed significantly at the height of World War II. In September 1943, upon the personal initiative of Joseph Stalin, the Council of Bishops of the ROC was called and it elected a new patriarch. Several reasons contributed to the changes in the state policies toward ROC: usage of the social authority of the church in the political mobilization of the population in World War II; demonstrating to Western allies, most notably the United Kingdom and the United States, that religious freedom existed in the Soviet Union. It should also be noted that German military authorities allowed and even encouraged the restoration of the church's life in the occupied Russian territories, a policy that urged Stalin to take some steps toward winning the sympathies of believers.

The legalization and some restoration of the ROC in the late 1940s did not make the church free from the Communist rule. In fact, Stalin largely copied and rebuilt the system of state religious control that had existed in the Russian Empire. In 1943, the Council for the Affairs of the Russian Orthodox Church was founded, which was part of the Soviet government.

The Council for the Affairs of the Russian Orthodox Church and its successor (since 1965), the Council for Religious Affairs, not only controlled, but in many cases also administered the internal affairs of the ROC. Although Orthodox priests were appointed by the bishops to serve in the local parishes, they also needed to get permission from the Council for Religious Affairs. Similarly, the consecration of the new Orthodox bishops required the Council's approval. The ROC was allowed to engage in only one type of activity: the conducting of worship services. Neither church-based social work nor religious education of children was permitted. In exchange for their toleration on the part of the state, the leaders of the ROC were expected to publicly support and praise the Communist regime both domestically and abroad. Further, the ROC was expected to make regular financial "donations" to the state "Peace Foundation." Socially, both clergy and openly practicing lay members continued to suffer considerable civil discrimination. The Council for Religious Affairs ceased to exist only in 1991, the year of the breakup of the Soviet Union.

Beginning in the mid-1980s, Mikhail Gorbachev's (b. 1931) policy of political liberalization (commonly known as "perestroika") was accompanied by the gradual lifting of restrictions on religious activities. In 1988, the celebration of the Millennium of the Baptism of Russia was declared a national festival and was sponsored by the state. Gorbachev's reforms created the conditions for the dynamic development of the ROC. By 1988, the ROC had 6,893 active parishes divided into 67 dioceses and served by 6,700 priests. There were also 21 monasteries, 2 theological academies, and 3 theological seminaries. As of December 2008, the ROC counted 29,263 parishes divided into 157 dioceses and served by 27,216 priests. The church also has 804 monasteries and 87 educational institutions (including 5 theological academies, 38 theological seminaries, 39 theological schools, 3 Orthodox universities, and 2 theological institutes).

The early and mid-1990s witnessed the growth of the conservative wing and the rise of anti-ecumenical attitudes among church leaders. During two consecutive all-church Council of Bishops meetings in 1994 and 1997 the issue was raised to withdraw participation of the ROC from all ecumenical organizations including the World Council of Churches. These initiatives were turned down by the majority of the ROC bishops, but, at the same time, it was decided (at the 1997 Council of Bishops) to begin pan-Orthodox discussions and consultations on the advisability of continuing WCC membership. Both in 1994 and 1997, the Council of Bishops paid significant attention to the activity of the various foreign religious missionary groups working in Russia.

The perceived threat from foreign religious missionaries led the ROC to support a new national law "About freedom of conscience and about religious associations," which was adopted in September 1997. While this law acknowledges the equality of all religions in Russia, its introductory section emphasizes the special role of the Orthodox Church in Russian history, spirituality, and culture. Further, this law defined Orthodoxy, Islam, Judaism, Buddhism, and generally Christianity as "traditional religions," while restricting the activity of the new—for Russia—religious groups by imposing 15-year waiting period for their state registration. Effectively, it limits the activity of the unregistered groups to informal, private practice, and imposes many restrictions on the work of foreign missionaries.

The ROC enforces a strict ban on the participation of clergy in politics. Yet, in many ways, the ROC has significant influence on life in today's Russia. In August 2000, the all-church Council of Bishops approved the "Bases of the social concept of the Russian Orthodox Church," which articulated the church's relations with Russian society and state. This document emphasized the idea of collaboration between church and state in the various areas.

A number of agreements about cooperation have been signed during the past 15 years between the ROC and various Russian governmental agencies (including the Ministry of Internal Affairs in 1996, the Ministry of Defense in 1997, and the Ministry of Education in 1999). At the regional level, similar agreements on cooperation have been concluded between many individual dioceses of the ROC and the authorities of the Russian administrative provinces. In 1995, a special department of the ROC was established to maintain permanent contacts with the Russian military forces. By 2007, 2,072 military units had Orthodox chaplains.

The ROC is also acquiring more presence in the Russian public schools. In 1999, in a letter addressed to diocesan bishops, Patriarch Alexi II asked them to “pay special attention to the organization of the Orthodox education of children studying in state schools.” By 2004, the subject of “The basics of the Orthodox culture” was included in the curricula of the state schools in more than 20 (out of 89) administrative regions of the Russian Federation. The “Coordinating Council for Cooperation” was created by the ROC and the Ministry of Education of Russia.

The 2000 all-church Council of Bishops also adopted the “Basic Principles of the Attitude of the Russian Orthodox Church toward the Other Christian Confessions.” It asserted that Christian unity can only occur in the “bosom of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church.” Therefore, it could not recognize the equality of the different (especially Protestant) denominations. In spite of this stance, the ROC has remained a member of the World Council of Churches (WCC). In 2002, an agreement was reached between the ROC and the WCC to replace the WCC’s parliamentary voting procedures with a consensus model of decision making, to more clearly distinguish between “confessional” and “inter-confessional” worship, and to create two models of WCC participation: “members” and “churches in association.”

The last decade witnessed a sharp decline in relations between the ROC and the Roman Catholic Church. In 2002, the establishing of the four Catholic dioceses by the Holy See in Russia was perceived by the ROC as aggressive Catholic proselytism among the Russian Orthodox. The regular semiannual meetings between representatives of the ROC and Vatican officials have been broken. The ROC continues to object to a visit by the pope to Russia, insisting that any such visit must take place only after agreement between the ROC and the Catholic Church on issues related to Catholic proselytism in Russia and on relations between the Russian Orthodox and Greek Catholics (“Uniates”) in western Ukraine.

The disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991 had significant implications for the ROC. Indeed, in the Russian Empire and in the Soviet Union the ROC was a predominantly national church whose borders largely corresponded with the state borders. Quite differently, after the breakup of the Soviet Union, the ROC has become a transnational religious organization that extends far beyond the borders of the present Russian state. The headquarters of the ROC are still in Moscow, but 70 out of 157 dioceses and more than half of its parishes and clergy are not in Russia, but in the other former Soviet republics that now exist as independent countries. The branches of the ROC outside of the Russian Federation are given different measures of autonomy.

In some post-Soviet states, ROC dioceses and parishes remain under the direct supervision of the Moscow Patriarchate. There is one diocese in Lithuania and one in Azerbaijan. Kazakhstan is divided into three dioceses. The predominantly Islamic Central Asian post-Soviet states—including the republics of Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and Tadjikistan—are united into one diocese headquartered at Tashkent, Uzbekistan. There are no parishes of the ROC in Georgia, where the Georgian Orthodox Church is autocephalous. The dioceses of the ROC in Byelorussia form the Byelarussian Exarchate—a regional grouping of dioceses united for purposes of day-to-day administration.

The Ukrainian, and Latvian Orthodox churches, the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, and Orthodox Church of Moldavia have the status of the “autonomous and self-governing Churches.” Yet, in many ways they remained linked to Moscow. In Ukraine, Byelorussia, Kazakhstan, and Moldova, the branches of the ROC are today the largest religious organizations of these independent states. In other former Soviet republics, especially in the Baltic and Central Asian states, the parishes and dioceses of the ROC serve as important ethno-cultural centers that consolidate the minority Slavic Russian-speaking population.

Outside the borders of the former Soviet Union, there are seven dioceses of the ROC in Western Europe (in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Netherlands, France, United Kingdom, Belgium). The South American diocese unites ROC parishes situated in Panama, Argentina, Colombia, Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Costa Rica. Although most North American parishes of the Russian tradition are part of the Orthodox Church in America, the smaller patriarchal parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church (31 in the United States and 25 in Canada) are in direct subordination to the Moscow Patriarchate, without local diocesan structures. There are also individual parishes of the ROC in Australia, the Czech Republic, Finland, Iran, Mexico, Mongolia, Morocco, Norway, Sweden, South Africa, and Tunisia. Two other national Orthodox Churches can be considered as “daughter churches” of ROC. The Orthodox Church of China was granted autonomy in 1957, and the Orthodox Church in Japan became autonomous in 1970.

The new situation of the ROC in today’s Russia created conditions for reconciliation with the so-called Russian Orthodox Church outside of Russia (ROCOR) that had broken away from the ROC after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. At that time, more than a million Russians found themselves in exile in many countries, and a significant number of Russian Orthodox clergy came with them. In 1920, a meeting of more than 20 Russian Orthodox bishops in Istanbul created an autonomous church with the goal to serve the Russian emigrants. In 1928, the Bishops’ Synod of the ROCOR refused to accept the call of Metropolitan Sergius, the temporary head of the ROC, for all Russian Orthodox bishops to refrain from political activity. Sergius also ordered that ROCOR be dissolved. By the mid-1930s, the ROC and ROCOR finally severed all relations. The headquarters of ROCOR originally located in Karlovci (Yugoslavia) moved in 1950 to New York City in the United States. The ROCOR, both lay members and clergy, was reinforced after World War II by a new wave of Russian emigrants—mostly displaced persons and those who had collaborated with Nazis in the occupied regions of the Soviet Union and who subsequently fled the country.

By the mid-1990s, several proposals and initiatives for a reconciliation between the ROCOR and the ROC led to an establishment of an official bilateral commission to examine the ways of reuniting the two churches. In May 2007, the full communion was re-established between the ROC and the ROCOR (which at that time had about 400 parishes and a number of monasteries spread worldwide). While the ROCOR remains independent in its internal affairs, it is also considered an indissoluble part of the ROC, and the election of the new ROCOR bishops and its head must be confirmed by the patriarch and Holy Synod of the ROC. The reunification of ROCOR and the ROC further expanded the global presence and influence of the ROC (especially in North America and Western Europe).

The complicated composition of the ROC makes it difficult to enumerate accurately its total membership. The estimates vary greatly between 90 and 120 million followers worldwide, thus making ROC the largest of all the Eastern Orthodox churches worldwide.

In Russia, according to the May 2008 national survey conducted by the All-Russia Public Opinion Research Center, 73 percent of respondents self-identify as followers of Orthodox Christianity as compared with only 49 percent in a similar survey administered in June 2001. The figure of 73 percent would mean that almost 110 million Russian citizens are Orthodox Christians. Yet, in the post-Communist Russian society there is a wide gap between regular religious participation and practice, on the one hand, and simply social-cultural identification with Orthodoxy, on the other hand. Indeed, the same May 2008 survey revealed that only 10 percent of Russians participate in the church’s life regularly and follow religious requirements and practices. With the exception of the few traditionally Islamic and Buddhist administrative provinces of Russia, Orthodox Christianity is the predominant religion across the country.

Similarly, there is also no reliable information about Orthodox membership in the other Soviet republics. It is roughly estimated that the number of persons who identify themselves with the ROC is about 9 to 10 million in Ukraine, 8 million in Byelorussia, 7 to 7.5 million in Kazakhstan, 4 to 4.5 million in Moldavia, 2 million in Uzbekistan, and 1 million in Kyrgyzstan.

The Russian Orthodox Church has a hierarchical structure of governance. The supreme bodies of church authority are the Local Council (Pomestny Sobor), the Bishops’ Council and the Holy Synod chaired by the Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia. The Local Council consists of the entire episcopate and representatives of the clergy, the monastic community, and the laity. It interprets the teaching of the Orthodox Church and deals with most important internal matters of church life, canonizes saints, elects the Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia, and establishes the procedure of such elections.

The Bishops' Council consists of all diocesan bishops and the bishops who direct Synodal departments and theological academies. The Bishops' Council must convene at least every four years. Its responsibilities include, among other things, preparation for a Local Council and monitoring the implementation of its decisions. It also adopts and amends the Statute of the Russian Orthodox Church; resolves basic theological, canonical, liturgical, and pastoral issues; defines the nature of relations with governmental bodies; maintains relations with other national Orthodox churches; and establishes, re-organizes, and dissolves dioceses and Synodal institutions.

The Holy Synod, chaired by the Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia, is the governing body of the ROC between Bishops' Councils. It is composed of the patriarch and six diocesan bishops: three of them permanent and three temporary members. His Holiness Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia is the first in honor among the bishops of the ROC. He governs the church together with the Holy Synod as its chairman. The patriarch is elected for life by the Local Council.

Today, ROC is headed by His Holiness Patriarch Kirill of Moscow and All Russia (b. 1946) who was elected patriarch of ROC in January 2009 after the death of Patriarch Alexy II, the head of ROC during 1990–2009. Prior to his current position, from 1989 to 2009, Metropolitan Kirill served as the head of the Department for External Church Relations of the Moscow Patriarchate.

Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate)
Department of External Relations,
Danilov Monastery, Danilovsky Val 22
115191 Moscow, Russian Federation
<http://www.mospat.ru> (in Russian)
<http://www.mospat.ru/?lng=1> (in English)

Alexei D. Krindatch

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church; Estonian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Istanbul; Old Believers (Russia); Orthodox Church in America; Orthodox Church in China; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia; World Council of Churches.

References

- Baltaden, S. K. Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1993.
- Krindatch, Alexei. Geography of Religions in Russia. Decatur, GA: Glenmary Research Center, 1996.
- Polonsky, A. 1998. "The Orthodox Church and Society in the Post-Communist Russia" (in Russian). In Factor etnoconfessionalnoj samobytnosti v postsovetskom obshestve. Moscow: Karnegi Center, 1998.
- Pospelovsky, D. The Russian Church under the Soviet Regime, 1917–1982. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1984.
- Roberson, R. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 7th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, 2006.
- Schmemmann, Alexander. The Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1977.
- Ware, Timothy. The Orthodox Church: New Edition. London: Penguin Books, 1997.

Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia

In the years following the 1917 Russian Revolution and the defeat of the anticommunist White Armies, a first wave of emigration drove up to 2 million people into exile. A majority of them were members of the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), who now needed to organize their religious activities in new circumstances because communication with the Mother Church in Russia was difficult. Already cut from contact with the Moscow Patriarchate during the Civil War in Russia, hierarchs in the southern Russian zones under the control of the White Armies had created in May 1919 a Provisional Supreme Administration of the Church for South Russia. This move was approved by the church in November 1920, when a decree (ukaz) from Patriarch Tikhon (1865–1925) gave to bishops deprived of contact with the central administration of the church the right to organize themselves into a higher entity of ecclesiastical authority.

In November 1921 a council of Russian Orthodox emigrants gathered in Sremski Karlovci (Serbia). There were 13 bishops in exile among the 100 participants. Probably under pressure from the Soviet authorities, Patriarch Tikhon dissolved the Provisional Administration in 1922. The church in exile obeyed, but it immediately reorganized itself again in accordance with the patterns set in the 1920 decree: the Synod of Bishops would serve as the central church authority among the emigrants. This marked the beginning of what is known today as the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia (ROCOR), also called the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad. Intermittent contacts with Moscow continued for a few years, insofar as the circumstances of those difficult times allowed, but a complete break came in 1927, when Metropolitan Sergius (1867–1944), administrator of the Moscow Patriarchate, requested a written expression of loyalty from the clergy in exile to the Soviet regime.

The Russian church in exile at first presented a united front, but soon divisions intervened, and large groups of Russian clergy and faithful in France (a stronghold of the emigration) and in the United States left the Russian Synod. In addition, during World War II and immediately following it, the ROCOR saw the loss of the numerous parishes in Eastern Europe and China, with emigrants resettling a second time in the West or in Australia. The headquarters of the synod had to leave Serbia, and finally relocated in 1949 in the United States. Due to the new geopolitical environment and the efforts of the Russian Orthodox Church under Soviet control to reinforce its links with the other Orthodox churches as well as other Christian denominations, active relations between the ROCOR and other religious bodies gradually decreased, although friendly contacts persisted with some, especially the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem and the Serbian Orthodox Church. After the 1960s, the ROCOR itself also became increasingly critical of the involvement of Orthodox churches in the ecumenical movement. On the other hand, during the Soviet period, the ROCOR was held in high esteem by the believers of the so-called Catacomb Church, who led a clandestine religious life in Russia.

After the fall of the Soviet Union, some people or groups in Russia asked to be accepted into the jurisdiction of the ROCOR and formed a Free Russian Orthodox Church, but the movement did not grow very large and suffered divisions. In addition, some people in the ROCOR questioned those moves and pleaded for talks with the Moscow Patriarchate in order to find ways to restore the unity of the Russian Church. This created increasing tensions within the ROCOR between those open to a dialogue with the Patriarchate of Moscow and those who rejected entirely such overtures. This led to a first break within the ROCOR, when the aging Metropolitan Vitaly Ustinov (1910–2006), who had presided over the ROCOR since 1985, decided in 2001 to retire; very soon, however, he came to regret his decision and resumed his responsibilities, becoming the figure around whom people opposed to reunion with the Moscow Patriarchate rallied. The group following Metropolitan Vitaly took the name of the Russian Orthodox Church in Exile, but very soon became divided into competing factions.

In October 2000, the ROCOR Council of Bishops had decided to establish a committee to study the questions of unity of the Russian Church. Official visits to Russia and a formal dialogue soon started, with open encouragements from President Vladimir Putin—a fact that did not make opponents of reunification less suspicious. In May 2006, the IVth All-Diaspora Council of the ROCOR that took place in San Francisco agreed that a reunion was desirable, while a number of participants saw in the Russian Orthodox participation in the World Council of Churches a matter of concern, and would have expected an explicit renunciation of “Sergianism” (that is, the policy of allegiance to the state of Metropolitan Sergius); the Council of Bishops was entrusted with the task to assess how to proceed next. From that point, the pace toward reunion accelerated. The Act of Canonical Communion was solemnly signed in Moscow on May 17, 2007. According to the Act, the ROCOR is “an indissoluble, self-governing part of the Local Russian Orthodox Church,” “independent in pastoral, educational, administrative, management, property, and civil matters, existing at the same time in canonical unity with the Fullness of the Russian Orthodox Church.”

A majority of the ROCOR clergy and parish accepted the union. However, groups as well as entire parishes in various parts of the world (especially on the American continent) seceded from the ROCOR in repudiation of the move. Some of the dissenters have joined a group called the Russian Orthodox Church Abroad–Provisional Supreme Church Authority (ROCA-PSCA), under Metropolitan Agafangel Pashkovsky of Odessa, who was suspended from the ROCOR in 2007 “for disobeying lawful authority and inciting schism.” Others joined Greek Old Calendarist or other Orthodox conservative groups. The ROCA-PSCA itself has entered into communion with one of the Greek Old Calendarist groups.

Although precise statistics are not available, it was estimated before the 2007 reunification that the ROCOR probably numbered less than 150,000 faithful, including converts of non-Russian origin.

Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia

75 E. 93rd St.

New York, NY 10128

<http://www.russianorthodoxchurch.ws/> (in Russian and English)

<http://rocorstudies.org/> (in Russian and English)

<http://directory.stinnocentpress.com/> (ROCOR parish and clergy online directory)

Jean-François Mayer

See also: Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Serbian Orthodox Church.

References

- Antić, Oxana. “The Russian Orthodox Church Abroad.” In Eastern Christianity and Politics in the Twentieth Century, edited by Pedro Ramet, 135–145. Durham, NC, and London: Duke University Press, 1988.
- Seide, Georg. Verantwortung in der Diaspora: Die Russische Orthodoxe Kirche im Ausland. Munich: Kyrill & Method Verlag, 1989.
- Young, Alexey. The Russian Orthodox Church Outside Russia: A History and Chronology. San Bernardino, CA: Borgo Press, 1993.

Ruthenian Catholic Church

The Ruthenian Catholic Church is a Greek Byzantine church that has its base in the Carpathian Mountains of southwestern Ukraine, Slovakia, and southeastern Poland. Ruthenians speak a Ukrainian dialect but identify ethnically as Rusyns, not Ukrainians. Christianity began to be propagated late in the first millennium CE, and following the break between the Roman Catholic Church and Eastern Orthodoxy in 1054, the Ruthenian church adhered to Eastern Orthodoxy. At about the same time, the area came under Hungarian control.

In the centuries after Hungary, a Roman Catholic nation, established its rule in Slovakia and western Ukraine, priests began to agitate for the Orthodox Church to come into communion with Rome. In 1646, 63 Orthodox priests, primarily from what is today Slovakia, entered the Roman Catholic Church. The act of receiving them, called the Union of Uzhorod, occurred at a town on the Ukrainian-Slovakian border. Two additional acts of conversion to Roman Catholicism occurred in the Ukraine in 1664 and 1713. As a result of these events, Eastern Orthodoxy all but disappeared from the region.

Through the 18th century, a battle for control of the Ruthenians ensued between local bishops, who followed the Latin rite, and those priests who represented the Orthodox converts and continued to use a Slavic rite. Then in 1771, a Ruthenian bishop was elected and made the head of a Ruthenian eparchy (diocese). A Ruthenian seminary was established in 1778 at Uzhorod. Thus, the Ruthenian Catholic Church (also known as the Byzantine Catholic Church) emerged as a distinctive ethnic church that continued a variety of Eastern Orthodox traditions (including a married priesthood) and strongly identified with the Rusyn people of Transcarpathia.

Following World War I and the breakup of the Hungarian Empire, the region was incorporated into the new nation of Czechoslovakia, and in the 1920s one group left the church and returned to Orthodoxy. Then following World War II, the area east of Uzhorod became part of the Soviet Union. Pressure was exerted in the Ukraine to force the church back into Orthodoxy, and its parishes were placed under the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate) and its patriarch in Moscow. In like measure, an effort was made to destroy the Ruthenian church in Poland and Czechoslovakia. In the meantime, more than 500,000 Rusyns had migrated to the United States. However, they found that the American Roman Catholic hierarchy was opposed to the continuance of the traditional practices of the Ruthenian Church, especially the married priesthood. The majority of Rusyns in the United States reverted to Orthodoxy, and a few became Protestants.

The revival of the Ruthenian Catholic Church began after the disruption of the Soviet Union. In January 1991 the Vatican reestablished the Eparchy of Mukachevo (Ukraine) and appointed a new bishop. An estimated 500,000 Rusyn Catholics remained in the region. The seminary was reopened in Uzhorod in 1992. The status of the church in the Ukraine remains open, as both the Ukrainian Catholic Church and the Ukrainian Orthodox Church have been re-established in the now independent nation.

The first eparchy of the Ruthenian Catholic Church was established in the United States in 1924. There are now four American dioceses, with national leadership provided by the metropolitan, who resides in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Some 200,000 Ruthenian Catholics reside in the United States. Ruthenian Catholics also reside in Australia and Western Europe, but the members are largely integrated into the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Today, there are three distinct Ruthenian Catholic jurisdictions: (1) the eparchy of Mukačevo in Ukraine, which is immediately subject to the Holy See; the bishop of Mukačevo, currently Milan Šašík (b. 1952), is considered the head of the whole Ruthenian Catholic Church, but he exercises no authority over the other two jurisdictions; (2) the Ruthenian Byzantine Catholic Metropolitanate in the United States; and (3) the Apostolic Exarchate in the Czech Republic. The exact relationship between the three is still a matter of dispute.

In 2008, the membership of the three jurisdictions together was 598,000.

Ruthenian Catholic Church
Zakarpatska 18
294017 Uzhorod

Ukraine

<http://www.byzcath.org> (website of the Byzantine Catholic Churches in America)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate); Ukraine, Eastern Orthodoxy in; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

References

- Liesel, N. The Eastern Catholic Liturgies: A Study in Words and Pictures. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Roberson, Ronald G. The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey. 5th ed. Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1995.

■ Rwanda

Rwanda is a small country in the heart of the Great Lakes Region in Africa, just south of the equator. Rwanda became an independent nation in 1962, when Belgium handed over political authority to a democratically chosen government under Grégoire Kayibanda (1924–1976), Rwanda's first president. At the time, it counted 3.5 million inhabitants, of whom 95 percent were subsistence farmers who lived on the hills that are for the greater part covered with fertile soil.

By then, more than one-third of the population had been converted to Christianity, and particularly the Roman Catholic missionaries counted as the most successful in the world. The genocide of 1994, through which more than 800,000 people were slaughtered within less than 4 months, was a great disillusionment.

In 1885–1886, the Conference of Berlin allotted Rwanda to the German Empire, but only in 1896 did troops start to impose German authority. Before that date, the dreaded spears of the Rwandese kings had been able to keep slave traders from the coastal area and European explorers at a distance. The oral history of the kingdom was well recorded by the court aristocracy, and modern historians trace it back to the 14th or even the 10th century.

Rwanda

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	2,292,000	8,390,000	79.1	2.53	12,444,000	18,985,000
Roman Catholics	1,684,000	4,846,000	45.7	2.81	7,150,000	10,694,000
Protestants	332,000	2,060,000	19.4	1.95	3,200,000	5,100,000
Anglicans	162,000	1,150,000	10.8	4.56	1,680,000	2,500,000
Muslims	312,000	1,345,000	12.7	2.46	1,900,000	2,800,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,165,000	825,000	7.8	1.86	800,000	700,000
Agnostics	0	21,000	0.2	2.46	45,000	80,000
Baha'is	5,500	19,000	0.2	2.46	30,000	60,000
Hindus	1,000	500	0.0	2.47	1,000	2,000
Atheists	0	30	0.0	2.59	100	200
Total population	3,776,000	10,601,000	100.0	2.46	15,220,000	22,627,000

In the 18th century, anthropologists saw the Rwandese kingdom, in which the minority of Tutsi dominated the majority of Hutu and a small minority of Batwa, in the light of the Hamitic hypothesis, according to which the Batutsi belonged to the Nilo-Hamitic race. According to this hypothesis, the Batutsi had entered the country with their great herds of cattle in several stages in the 12th and 13th centuries. In the course of the last few centuries they had gradually subjected the Hutu agriculturalists of the Bantu race, who themselves had steadily deforested the hills since their arrival between the seventh and 10th centuries. These Bahutu had driven into the remaining forests the original pygmoid race of the Batwa, who were hunters.

Modern Rwandese historians and some Western scholars consider the Hamitic hypothesis as a way for European scholars to explain how highly developed cultures and organizations could be discovered in black Africa, where the “backward” Negro could not have created such civilizations. They claimed, therefore, that the Hamitic race was of Asian or even European origin (Sanders 1969). The fact is that the Rwandese oral history does not say anything about invading cattle farmers who gradually took the dominant position. The Banyarwanda (people of Rwanda)—the Tutsi, Hutu, and Twa—speak one language (Kinyarwanda, classified within the Bantu languages), share the same religious concepts and costumes, and have the same family traditions. The Hamitic hypothesis leaves unexplained why 15 out of the 18 Rwandese clans show a mixture of Batutsi, Bahutu, and Batwa.

Some lineages within the Batutsi group created their own identity, which in the 19th century strengthened the kingdom under the leadership of the Banyiginya clan, which is exclusively Batutsi. The kingdom developed an expansive power and gained hegemony over the greater part of Rwanda. This development created a growing tension between Bahutu and Batutsi, who were more and more seen as representing exclusive classes, although there always remained Batutsi without political influence and Bahutu who took leading positions in the Banyiginya kingdom. Until the beginning of the 20th century, a number of small more or less independent monarchies subsisted with a king (mwami) who belonged to the Bahutu group.

After World War I, the League of Nations conferred Rwanda to Belgium as a trustee area. The Belgian regime introduced an administrative reform in which leadership was exclusively given to Batutsi people. Thus, the distinction between Hutu and Tutsi was rigidified. The antagonism between classes turned into a struggle between what were considered different races, leading to a bloody social revolution in 1959 and continued turmoil within the Hutu-dominated government that assumed control from Belgium in 1962. At that point, some 10,000 Batutsi, many of them of the former ruling class, sought refuge in neighboring countries.

Denied the right to return, a second generation of these refugees, organized in the Rwandan Patriotic Front (FPR), attacked the country in 1990, heightening tensions between the two groups, now called Hutu and Tutsi, and culminating in the genocide of April–June 1994, in which more than 500,000 Tutsi and a considerable number of moderate Hutu were assassinated. Out of fear for the strong Tutsi-dominated invasion army, between 2 and 3 million Hutu then fled the country and stayed in refugee camps in Zaire/Congo and Tanzania until they were forced to return in 1996–1997. Upon their return they found a disrupted society of 8 million people, characterized by hatred, mistrust, grief, and mourning.

A government of national unity under the leadership of the FPR, carries out administrative reforms, and makes it illegal to speak of Hutu or Tutsi as different ethnic groups. Inspired by the autocratic leadership of Paul Kagamé, chosen as president in 2002, the nation experienced rapid economic development and radical social changes: an active policy of birth control, a transparent combat against HIV-AIDS, and national health insurance were introduced. Rwanda is characterized by a high participation of women in public affairs. In 2009 the shift from French to English was carried through as the basic language in administration and education.

From ancient times, the Rwandese people have been characterized by a religious consciousness that permeates all life—procreation, cattle breeding and agriculture, and the building of a homestead. They feel a strong relationship and even kinship with nature, which explains their respect for the environment. Humans are surrounded by an invisible world of spirits who influence human life. To this spiritual world belong the spirits of the ancestors (abazimu), who for some generations after their death participate in the life of the family. These ancestors need not be feared if people live in harmony and according to the rules of life that the forebears left as their testament. Illness, barrenness, and misfortune may be interpreted as punishment or revenge of the ancestors, reminding their offspring of the proper behavior. Ancestors are to be distinguished from bad spirits or malevolent forces (amahembe or ibitega), often of unknown origin. Bad forces may be used by personal enemies who act in a hidden way, only known and influenced by sorcerers (abarozi). In case of illness or misfortune, diviners (abapfumu) are consulted in order to detect the character and the meaning of the spiritual force behind it.

The idea of relations between human beings and God are fundamental notions in Rwandese religion. Humans are seen not as isolated persons but always in relationship to fellow humans and nature. The closest relationship is with the members of one's family, which includes several groups: the inzu, or minor lineage, one's father, mother, brothers and sisters; the umuryango, or major lineage, one's family in a larger sense; and the ubwoko, or clan, a broader entity of families, the membership of which is decisive for the rules of marriage. Individuals may enter into relationship with the spiritual world, enjoy the blessings from that world, and participate in its forces.

God, or Imana, is creator (Rurema) of the Earth and of the humans who reside there. Christian theologians have depicted Imana as transcendent, fitting the basic concept of God according to Christianity. Anthropologists have tended to describe Imana as the sacred dimension of life as it determines human destiny, gives fecundity, and yields wealth or poverty. According to some well-known myths, Imana once lived very close to people, and his most favorite activity was the cradling of babies. However, one day a young couple discovered Imana in their compound. They saw him as an intruding stranger, with their child in his arms. In defense the man aimed his arrow in the direction of Imana, who, since this unhappy misunderstanding, has never been seen again. According to an oft-cited proverb, Imana dwells all over the Earth during the day, but prefers to spend the night in the beloved Rwanda.

Traditional Rwandan religious consciousness involves no specific cultic manifestations of worship but is manifest in the celebration of the rites of passage, specifically the cults of Ryangombe, or kubandwa, and the cult of Nyabingi. Ryangombe is a mythical hero who died a tragic death. Before he died, he appealed in agony to the Batutsi, Bahutu, and Batwa peoples to be initiated into societies that honor him. The Ryangombe rite consists of cult sessions with dancing and singing, through which people are initiated into kubandwa societies. Initiates (imandwa) receive their own new secret name. Misfortunes, such as barrenness and illness, and natural disasters, such as drought, may intensify the Ryangombe cult sessions. Giving honor to Ryangombe provides protection against evil spirits. The Ryangombe cult has its parallels in other parts of the Great Lakes region. Traditionally, as Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa participated together in it, the cult created social cohesion. Only the sacral king (mwami) could not participate in the initiation.

In the northern part of the country the cult of Nyabingi has a greater popularity. According to the myth, the woman named Nyabingi did not become a normal spirit (umuzimu) after her death, but instead she turned into a medium by whom one can be possessed through trance. Women may be cured from barrenness if they “have Nyabingi” (bagirwa, being possessed).

The first Christian missionaries to arrive in Rwanda were the White Fathers. This order of the Roman Catholic Church worked according to clear-cut missionary principles: gaining a deep knowledge of the people, establishing a four-year catechism according to the model of the ancient church, and trying to convert first the supreme political authority, who then will help with the conversion of the great masses. Rwanda, with its well-organized society headed by a king as absolute ruler, was an ideal place to apply these principles. Eager to precede Muslims and Protestants, the White Fathers quickly established parishes in all parts of the country, ten having been opened by the time the Germans were expelled in 1916.

In 1907 the first Protestant missionaries, German Lutherans, arrived as representatives of the Bethel Mission (the Evangelical Mission Society for German Eastern-Africa, or Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft für Deutsch-Ostafrika). One of their prominent missionaries, Ernst Johanssen (1864–1934), saw the African religion as a human answer to the divine revelation of the one God who communicates with all humankind. He studied Rwandese customs and religion in order “to trace the radiation of God’s Glory hidden in the African religion.” The German Lutherans founded eight missionary stations, along with two commercial missions to compete with the Muslim traders. When forced to leave in 1916, the Lutherans had already edited a translation of the four Gospels and a textbook in the Rwandese language.

The White Fathers continued their missionary work into the 1920s and provided the new patterns for structuring the Rwandan society. Missionaries became advisors to Belgian authorities, and Vicar Apostolic Léon Classe (1922–1943) especially promoted the influence of the Tutsi, being convinced that they were born to rule. By 1944 the Roman Catholic Church controlled more than half of all primary and secondary schools and sponsored a large number of hospitals.

In 1931, after King Yuhi V Musinga (1883–1944) refused to convert, Monseigneur Classe advised that he be dismissed and sent into exile. His successor, King Mutara III Rudahigwa (1913–1959), was baptized in 1943, and three years later he allocated his country to Christ. Prompted by the king’s action, almost all the aristocracy presented themselves for baptism, and the Hutu were encouraged to do the same. People spoke of the Tornado of Mission. From that time on, Christianity, and especially the Catholic Church, saw tremendous growth. In 1950, 25 percent of the population were counted as belonging to the Catholic Church, increasing to 34 percent in 1961 and 50 percent in 1988.

Crowd listens to American evangelist Billy Graham during his African crusade in Rwanda, 1960. (James Burke/Time Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Only after World War II did leaders perceive the weakness of the missionary strategy. A new generation of priests, influenced by the ideas of Catholic Action and social democracy, saw the injustices of Rwandese class society. Previously, the rigid classification of the Rwandese as either Tutsi or Hutu resulted in their identification with the oppressors and the oppressed, respectively. Unfortunately, the new message of the equality of all people worked only to strengthen the identity of individuals as either Hutu or Tutsi, resulting in an even more rigid division of the population.

Catholic missionaries then began to promote the interests of the majority Hutu. On the eve of independence, the Hutu, supported by the church, started a social revolution. Under Rwanda's first president, Grégoire Kayibanda, the ruling party pursued a policy of ethnic equilibrium, through which jobs and positions were divided according to the percentage of Hutu (85 percent) and Tutsi (15 percent). This policy was continued by the successor government, led by General Juvénal Habyarimana (1937–1994), who took over power in a nearly bloodless military revolution in 1973.

After 1921 the Belgian Protestant Missionary Society (Société Belge des Missions Protestantes au Congo) continued the work of the German Lutherans, thus accounting for the existence of a strong Presbyterian Church (rather than Lutheran) in the country. The Society represented a minority faction in Belgium, and its progress was initially hampered by lack of finances and personnel. In the course of time other Protestant missionary organizations followed: the Seventh-day Adventist Church from the United States (1916), Anglicans of the Church Missionary Society (1921), Danish Baptists (1938), Swedish Pentecostals (1940), and the Free Methodist Church (1942) from the United States. In 1994 the Union of Pentecostal churches outnumbered the mainline Protestant churches.

Within the Church Missionary Society, a revival movement developed that, in the 1930s and 1940s, exercised great influence among Protestants in neighboring Burundi, Uganda, Tanzania, and Kenya. This movement, called the East African Revival, typically sponsored “conventions,” large meetings where people gathered for praying and singing, hearing sermons, and giving testimonies. The 1945 Kabale Convention attracted an international audience of 15,000. Devoted members of the movement, called abake (people on fire), or abalokole (those who are saved), experienced a heightened joy, visions and dreams, and an absence of any color bar between white and black. The abake struggled for equality between Hutu and Tutsi, promoted strong participation by women, and placed African leadership at the head of the movement. The movement led to independent churches in other countries, and in Rwanda it remains an influential movement within the Anglican community.

Around 1959–1962, the Protestant missions were transformed into independent church organizations, which then collaborated in founding the Conseil Protestant du Rwanda (CPR). From then on, an emancipation of the Protestants from foreign control became evident. The theological school in Butare, founded in 1971, developed into a Theological Faculty in which most mainline Protestants (including the Pentecostals) participate. In 1988 all Protestants together represented 20 percent of the population, less than half of that of Catholics. Today there are two ecumenical organizations serving the Protestant community, the Alliance Évangélique du Rwanda, which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance, and the Protestant Council, which is affiliated with the All African Conference of Churches (AACC) and the World Council of Churches. The genocide of 1994 left all the churches in deep crisis. Almost one-third of the clergy had been Tutsi, of whom a majority were murdered. Those who had held leading positions, mostly Hutu, fled the country. Returning Tutsi refugees added to the controversy by attempting to seize leading positions. Past racial ideology and present internal problems prevented the churches from becoming healing communities. The Catholic Church was singled out for criticism by the new Tutsi-dominated government, which derided the church’s assumed policy of divisionism, seen as the ultimate cause of the genocide.

After 1994 a number of new African Initiated Churches were created, most of them at the initiative of Tutsi returnees who did not want to reintegrate into the older churches that had been associated with the genocide. Thus, inadvertently and for the first time in Rwandese history, churches were founded on an ethnic basis. Most of these new communities participate in the Charismatic/Pentecostal movement, which is also influencing the older mainline churches. This new charismatic wave is characterized by strong eschatological preaching, baptism by immersion, and long sessions of ecstatic prayer. The Restoration Church, founded in 1994, is moreover characterized by a prosperity gospel. The Zion Temple Celebration Centres, founded by Apostel Paul Gitwaza in 1999, has created branches in Tanzania, Burundi, Congo, Denmark, Belgium, and the United States.

After 1994, Islam was no longer considered by the government and by the public news agencies to be an inferior religion. Muslims had been present in Rwanda since the beginning of the 20th century, the first being African soldiers serving in the German colonial army. The Germans also promoted the immigration of merchants and craftspeople, some of whom were Muslims, but at the same time they took measures to prevent any spread of Islam among the population.

The marginal position of Muslims in Rwanda was accentuated under Belgian rule, the Muslims being viewed as German partisans. Muslims were denied permission to create their own associations, and only in 1964 did Rwandese authorities recognize the Association of Muslims in Rwanda (AMUR). In 1970 about 8 percent of the population was Sunni Muslim. Then in 1994, Muslim Tutsis returning from their exile gave the community a new self-consciousness, claiming that Muslims had not participated in the genocide. Muslim missions began to attract great audiences. Schools were installed, and the end of Ramadan became an official national holiday. At his installation in January 2001, Sheikh Saleh Hategekimana claimed that Muslims, with about 120 mosques scattered throughout the country, represent 18 percent of the population.

Since 1996, the Centre for Theological Education and Documentation (CFD), related to the Presbyterian Church of Rwanda, has developed a dialogue program in which Protestants, Catholics, and Muslims participate. On a regular basis the Center organizes seminars where prominent leaders of these communities discuss together the social problems of the country.

Gerard van't Spijker

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Traditional Religions; All Africa Conference of Churches; Church Missionary Society; Free Methodist Church; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Berger, Iris. Religion and Resistance: East African Kingdoms in the Precolonial Period. Tervuren, Belgium: Musée Royal de l'Afrique Centrale, Serie IN-80, no. 105, 1985.
- Gatwa, Tharcisse. The Churches and Ethnic Ideology in the Rwandan Crises 1900–1994. Bletchley: Regnum, 2005.
- Kasule, O. H. "Muslims in Rwanda: A Status Report." Journal of the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs 3, nos. 1–2 (1982): 133–144.
- Mamdani, Mahmood. When Victims Become Killers. Colonialism, Nativism, and the Genocide in Rwanda. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.
- Sanders, Edith. "The Hamitic Hypothesis: Its Origins and Function in Time Perspective." Journal of African History 10, no. 4 (1969): 521–532.
- van't Spijker, Gerard. "Religion in Rwanda after the Genocide." Studies in Interreligious Dialogue 9, no. 2 (1999): 165–177.

Religions of the World

Second Edition

A COMPREHENSIVE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

S

Sabbatarianism

Within Christianity, Sabbatarianism is the belief that the seventh-day Sabbath of Judaism as a day of worship has not been replaced by first-day or Sunday worship, observed by the great majority of Christians. Jewish law stipulates that from sundown on Friday evening until sundown on Saturday, Jews should be in a state of observing and remembering the Shabbat, the Hebrew term for the Sabbath. Observing the Shabbat is rooted in the book of Genesis in the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament). The creation story tells of God's activity for six days, followed by a seventh day of rest. This fact is then cited in the Ten Commandments as the reason for the Jewish people to keep the Sabbath, meaning that one remembers God's creation and, like God, observes a day of rest every seven days. Rest is equated with refraining from doing various prohibited activities and engaging in prescribed activities such as worship and study of scripture.

The major prohibited activity, work, was defined and described in some detail by rabbis. It included the preparation of food to be consumed on the Shabbat on the previous day, and a provision to set aside observation of the day if a human life was at stake.

Christianity was born within Judaism. Jesus was a Jew, as were the 12 Apostles. Jesus' teachings include his reflections on Sabbath activity, and as the church grew and non-Jewish membership became dominant and then overwhelming, the designation of the primary day for worship and the nature of Christian observance of the Jewish law, including provisions for rest on the Sabbath, were much debated. Crucial to decision making was an assumption by Christians that Christ's resurrection occurred on a Sunday morning. As a result, the day for weekly worship was Sunday, and the command to keep the Sabbath reinterpreted as now applying to Sunday. As the Julian calendar replaced the Jewish calendar, the beginning of Sunday was at midnight rather than sundown on the previous day.

For those who read the Bible literally and attempted to live by its precepts, the command to keep the Sabbath became a recurring and periodically nagging question. Most accepted the dominant interpretation that Sunday had become the new Sabbath due to the resurrection. However, a minority reached an alternative conclusion.

A new Sabbatarian impulse began, for example, among Anabaptists in 16th-century Europe. Oswald Glait and Andreas Fisher, both former Catholic priests, began to propagate Sabbatarianism around 1528 in Moravia, Silesia, and Bohemia. Glait wrote a booklet on the subject, known today only from the refutation of it by Caspar Schewenckfeld (1487–1581). By mid-century in England, as the Reformation spread, individual believers felt a freedom to ask a variety of questions that arose from their reading of the Bible. The viability of keeping the seventh-day Sabbath, the proper behavior for a Sabbath rest, and the role of government in enforcing the Sabbath came under consideration. Given the heightened authority of the scriptures within Protestantism and the accompanying diminution of church tradition by the Reformers, those who defended the centrality of Sunday were often baffled by the lack of any mention of Sunday worship in the New Testament.

The first Christian congregation organized to keep a seventh-day Sabbath arose in 1617 in London under the leadership of John Trask. It was an independent Baptist church whose Sabbatarianism further called the public's attention to its many departures from the norms of the Church of England. However, the movement started by Trask survived, and by the end of the century some 15 Sabbatarian congregations existed. Meanwhile, Stephen Mumford (ca.1639–1707) traveled to the American colonies and in 1664 joined the Baptist Church in Newport, Rhode Island. Through the rest of the decade he raised the Sabbath question among his brethren but finally became frustrated with their disinterest. In 1671 he opened the first Seventh Day Baptist church in the British American colonies. Others followed Mumford's example in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The Sabbatarian issue slowly gained traction, primarily among Baptists. It had its most unique embodiment in the cloistered communal Ephrata Society formed in rural Pennsylvania by Conrad Beissel (1690–1768), who also led in the spreading of Sabbatarianism among German Pietists in southeastern Pennsylvania. A small German-speaking Seventh Day Baptist work continued into the 20th century, though it never consisted of more than a few congregations.

A national organization for English-speaking Sabbatarian Baptists emerged in 1801 with the formation of the Seventh Day Baptist General Conference. In 1843, a missionary society was formed, and sent its first missionaries into a newly opened China. As the movement spread internationally through the 20th century, a World Federation of Seventh Day Baptist Conferences was formed in 1965. Everywhere it exists, it is a minority movement among Baptists.

The most important development in Sabbatarianism occurred in the 1840s, when Joseph Bates (1792–1872), a Seventh Day Baptist, introduced the practice to the Adventist movement, then reeling in disappointment over Christ's failure to visibly return in 1844. The practice of keeping the Sabbath spread through Adventism and became a matter of extreme controversy through the 1850s and 1860s. Reaction to it divided the movement into three segments. One group rejected the idea and continued to worship on Sunday. One group accepted it and founded the Church of God (Seventh Day). When prophetess Ellen G. White (1827–1915) had a confirmatory revelation about Sabbath observance, the group around her accepted the Sabbath.

Since that time, the Seventh-day Adventist Church has been the major organization spreading Sabbatarianism worldwide.

By the end of the 20th century, the Seventh-day Adventists had spread into more than 200 of the world's countries. From it a number of smaller Sabbatarian Christian groups would emerge. Additional Sabbatarian groups emerged from the Church of God (Seventh Day) including the Worldwide Church of God, which by the 1980s had become the second largest Sabbatarian group in the world. However, in the 1990s, under the leadership of the successors to founder Herbert W. Armstrong (1892–1986), the Worldwide Church repudiated all of Armstrong's unique ideas, including his Sabbatarianism. As a result the church splintered with those continuing to worship on Saturday forming three larger groups—the Living Church of God, the United Church of God, and the Philadelphia Church of God—and a host of smaller groups.

The Church of God (Seventh Day) also nurtures what became known as the Sacred Name movement, which replaced the Greek translations of the Hebrew names of God and Jesus with transliteration of the Hebrew—Yehweh and Yhoshua. By the time of the emergence of the Sacred Name movement, some in the Church of God (Seventh Day) tradition had been exploring the Hebrew feast cycle and had concluded that the obligation to keep those holy days mentioned in the Hebrew Bible were equal to those for keeping the Sabbath. The Sacred Name groups, like the splinter groups of the Worldwide Church of God, continue to keep the Sabbath and observe the Hebrew feast days.

With the multiplication of Sabbath-keeping groups, each facing problems existing in a culture whose legal structures recognized the dominant usage of Sunday as a day of worship, Sabbatarians banded together in 1943 to form the Bible Sabbath Association. It offers smaller Sabbatarian groups, especially independent congregations, support and works to end discrimination against Sabbatarians in the workplace.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptists; Bible Sabbath Association; Church of England; Seventh-day Adventist Church; White, Ellen G.; Worldwide Church of God.

References

- Armstrong, Herbert W. Which Day Is the Christian Sabbath? Rev. ed. Pasadena, CA: Worldwide Church of God, 1989.
- Bacchiocchi, Samuel. From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity. Berrien Springs, MI: Biblical Perspectives, 1977.
- Bennett, Todd D. The Sabbath—Scriptural Truth Concerning the Sabbath and Christian Sunday Observance. Herkimer, NY: Shema Yisrael Publications, 2005.
- Carson, D. A. From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical and Theological Investigation. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2000.
- Directory of Sabbath-Observing Groups.* Fairview, OK: Bible Sabbath Association, periodically updated.

Sacred Texts

As verbal communication is important for promoting religious doctrines, many religions give attention to the transmission of (sacred) texts in written form. In this way, religions build themselves on the idea of “holy scriptures.” One of the earliest occurrences of the term “holy scriptures” can be found in the New Testament (Romans 1:2), when the Apostle Paul refers to the Hebrew prophets and the “holy scriptures.” Texts from classical antiquity also refer to “holy words” (Greek: hieroi logoi) that can be transmitted in written form. From a historical point of view, the Bible as the “holy scripture” for Christians fostered the idea of “sacred texts” as the center-point for religions. In the study of religions, Friedrich Max Müller (1823–1900) can be seen as the “founding father” of the theoretical importance of the study of sacred texts as core topic for gaining ideas about the origin, purpose, and doctrine of religions. Studying and comparing religions for him depended mainly on the accessibility and translation of sacred texts. For this reason, in 1879 he launched the publication of the Sacred Books of the East series. Texts from the Hindu and Buddhist tradition as well as classical Chinese texts were incorporated in this undertaking, next to these translations of the Zoroastrian textual tradition and the Koran. Because of opposition from Christian theologians, the Bible could not be included in this series. Jewish texts as well as texts from minor or recent religions like the Sikh tradition or the Baha'i Faith are also missing.

The impact of the idea to use sacred books for the study of religions had two consequences: it fostered the idea of a hierarchy of religions with those religions that have “written texts” at the upper end; and it led scholars in religion to concentrate on textual studies and early periods of historical developments of religions as shown by these texts, thus partly neglecting aspects of rituals, practice, and social involvement of religions. Therefore one has to keep in mind that religions in general refer to written tradition, but for some religions the idea of “sacred texts” as exclusive and authoritative texts has only come up in modern times either as a result of the contact with Western scholars and their preconceptions, which are at least indirectly based on the Bible (and the Koran) as a canonical and sacred text, or as a reaction to Christian and Muslim theological conceptions of a “holy book” as the center of religious tradition, in order to identify books within their own traditions as (exclusively) “holy scripture.”

Textbooks for the study of religion generally present sections on “sacred texts” for each religion, or some monographic or collective works focus on “sacred books” exclusively, to give an introduction and overview of such texts, for example, books published by Harold Coward, Frederick M. Denny and Rodney L. Taylor, Rein Fernhout, Kenneth Kramer, and Udo Tworuschka. Recently the Verlag für Weltreligionen (Publishing House for World Religions) has started a series of German translations of sacred books of living religions to make them available for a widespread audience to improve religious knowledge.

To give a short overview of the most well-known sacred texts, one can rely on the idea of canonical texts. The Greek word kanon means “principle” or “guide-line”; thus canonical texts are reckoned as sacred texts that cannot be changed or neglected. In Islam we surely find the most elaborated understanding of canonicity, as the Koran is not only thought to be an earthly copy of the heavenly “mother book” (umm al-kitab), but is also the unchangeable word of God. Thus it is the sacred book par excellence, and the concept of a comparable holy book is also applied to other religions, when Islam judges adherents of Judaism, Christianity, and Zoroastrianism as “people of the book” (ahl al-kitab). The respective book for Jews is the Hebrew Bible, but regarding sacred texts it is necessary to take into account that Jewish tradition gives importance to both the “written” and “oral” Torah; this makes clear that even if the “oral” Torah can be transmitted in written form in later times, orality is on a par with sacred texts. Regarding both the Hebrew Bible and the Christian Bible (the Old Testament and the New Testament), the decision to regard such texts as sacred scripture within the religious community has been a long historical process, only at the end leading to a normative and absolute holy book, to which further additions or expansions are no longer theologically possible. It is quite possible that the canonization process of the Avesta as a sacred book of the Zoroastrians is dependent on the pattern of the Koran as a holy book for Muslims, as Zoroastrians had to present a copy of a “book” in a dominantly Islamic society to become acknowledged as “people of the book.” Worth mentioning is also the case of the Baha’i Faith, whose adherents regard all books published (or theologically: revealed) by Bahá’u’lláh, the founder of that faith, as canonized sacred books that cannot be altered. As these examples make clear, we find sacred texts for monotheistic religions originating in the Middle East. Such texts are compulsory sources of religious doctrine for their believers and all reform or religious change has to be reconcilable with these texts as the basis of the religions.

Turning to the religions of South and East Asia, the situation regarding sacred texts gets more complex, as a concept of canonicity as mentioned above is widely missing. Even if it has become customary in religious studies to speak of the “Pali canon” of Buddhism, this “canon” is less absolute than in the cases mentioned before. The Pali canon offers a “guideline” to Theravada Buddhists, but it is not absolutely compulsory for all Buddhists, as different Buddhist schools or traditions can focus on their own “sacred texts”; a famous example is the so-called Lotus Sutra, which is a highly esteemed text among the Tiantai/Tendai school in Chinese/Japanese Buddhism or among Nichiren

Buddhists, but the sutra is downgraded by the Huayan/Kegon School in Chinese/Japanese Buddhism, which gives the Avatamsaka (or Flower Garland) Sutra the highest rank as sacred text. In Buddhism we observe a wide range of literary texts that can gain different status of sacredness, with the consequence that not all sacred books of the Buddhists are authoritative sources for all Buddhist schools.

We find a similar situation in Hinduism with a traditional differentiation between texts characterized as sruti or smṛti. The first category comprises the Vedic texts (for example, Vedic hymns, Brahmanas, ritual texts, early Upanishads), while epics like the Mahabharata or the Ramayana and the Puranas are only reckoned as smṛti. While this is true in general, we also find Vaishnavite schools in Hinduism, who also take the Ramayana or the Bhagavadgita as sruti or Shaivite Hindus, who view their agama texts as sruti—that is, preferring these texts as sacred texts by downgrading or even eliminating others.

While both Buddhism and Hinduism thus show a broad context related to sacred texts, the Sikh tradition defines it in a much narrower way; the Adi Granth Sahib is the sacred text for Sikhs, which is both the center of cultic reverence and source of Sikh doctrine, giving canonicity to this text comparable to the relationship of Christianity or Islam to their sacred texts.

To Chinese religions (mainly Daoism and Confucianism), the notion of sacred texts can be applied only in a broad sense, namely, texts that people read with reverence, because these texts are either part of the classical literary heritage of China (Liji, Shiji, Yijing) or they are attributed to masters like Laozi (Daode jing) or Confucius (Lun-yu). Even though both in Daoism and Confucianism there are sets of literary texts labeled a “canon,” this does not mean an exclusive authority of these.

To summarize: sacred texts are a wide and diverse category in religions. What they have in common is their relevance for the devotional and spiritual life of the adherents of the respective religion; generally speaking, sacred texts in monotheistic religions are the normative and authoritative source of doctrine and religious law. One additional aspect of sacred texts worth mentioning is the fact that they—despite their diversity—always have been an inspiring source of literary achievements in the given cultures, and also a deposit of ideas that had a considerable influence upon the visual arts in most of the cultures.

Manfred Hutter

See also: Baha'i Faith; Bahá'u'lláh; Confucianism; Confucius; Daoism; Laozi; Nichirenshu; Sikhism/Sant Mat; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zoroastrianism.

References

- Coward, Harold. Sacred Word and Sacred Text: Scripture in World Religions. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1988.
- Denny, Frederick M., and Rodney L. Taylor, eds. The Holy Book in Comparative Perspective. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1985.
- Fernhout, Rein. Canonical Texts. Bearers of Absolute Authority. Bible, Koran, Veda, Tipitaka. A Phenomenological Study. Amsterdam: Editions Rodopi B.V., 1994.
- Girardot, N. J. "Max Müller's Sacred Books and the Nineteenth-Century Production of the Comparative Science of Religion." History of Religions 41 (2001–2002): 213–250.
- Kramer, Kenneth. World Scriptures: An Introduction to Comparative Religions. New York: Paulist Press, 1986.
- Tworuschka, Udo, ed. Heilige Schriften. Eine Einführung. Frankfurt: Verlag der Weltreligionen, 2008.
- Van der Kooij, Arie, and Karel van der Toorn, eds. Canonization and Decanonization. Leiden: Brill 1998.
- www.verlagderweltreligionen.de

Sahaja Yoga

Sahaja Yoga was founded by Sri Mataji Nirmala Devi (b. 1923). She was the eldest daughter of an Indian barrister and enjoyed an affluent childhood in a Protestant family before marrying a successful diplomat, Sir C. P. Srivastava. In the late 1960s she became a follower of Osho Rajneesh, but left his circle and was highly critical of him thereafter. In 1970, we are told, she became "fully realized," simultaneously enabling others to achieve spiritual "realization" effortlessly. She then began to attract followers herself, initially in India, then in London, where she was based, and in increasing numbers throughout the world. Nine years later she revealed her divine identity as the Adi Shakti (primordial creatrix), and to committed followers she is the Goddess, returned to save the world. Sri Mataji travels widely in order to spread her "global religion." Her movement now claims a presence in 75 countries, each with its own national leader, and has approximately 20,000 converts.

Sahaja Yoga practices combine principles of Tantra with rituals and symbols from other traditions, especially from South Asia, and the majority are performed to banish negativity or to purify. Meditation is described as the raising of the spiritual energy of kundalini, usually dormant at the base of the spine, through chakras, spiritual centers in the body, which are cleansed of impurities as it passes. When the process is complete, spontaneous union with "The All Pervading Power" is achieved, and individuals experience a cool breeze on the palms of their hands and the tops of their heads. This union is said to cure serious illnesses, to leave practitioners feeling relaxed and balanced, and to lead to increasing sensitivity, to both their own spiritual vibrations and those of others. Sri Mataji's image is felt to be particularly purifying, and members cherish photographs of her surrounded by miraculous light or accompanied by deities. Sahaja Yoga pujas involve the worship of Sri Mataji in her different divine aspects.

Sri Mataji promotes arranged marriages between devotees of different nationalities, and these take place, in groups of up to 120 couples, either at international pujas or on the annual India Tour. She advises women to act as the "heart" of their families, and men as the "head," and the vast majority of the leaders in Sahaja Yoga are men. There are two Sahaja Yoga schools, in Rome and Dharamsala, where children of members board. Additionally, the movement runs a number of nongovernmental organizations, including a hospital dedicated to healing according to the principles of Sahaja Yoga. Notwithstanding Sri Mataji's teaching that "truth cannot be owned," her tax-free annual income from Sahaja Yoga activities has been estimated at more than $2 million, and devotees have subsidized the purchase and renovation of a number of properties where she lives, including castles outside Poona, India, and Cabella, Italy, as well as a chateau in France. In the past, concerns have been voiced over her at times authoritarian treatment of her followers and for the welfare of the children in Sahaja Yoga schools.

The international headquarters of the movement is now in the United Kingdom and may be contacted through its Internet site at <http://sahajayoga.org>.

Judith M. Fox

See also: Rome; Tantrism; Yoga.

References

Coney, Judith. Sahaja Yoga: Socializing Processes in a South Asian New Religious Movement. Richmond, UK: Curzon 1999.

Sri Mataji Nirmala Devi. Meta-Modern Era. North Wales, PA: Vishwa Nirmala Dharma 1997.

■ Sahara

The Sahara (aka Western Sahara), officially known as Al-Jumhuriyah as-Sahara al-Arabiyah as Dimuqratiyah, or the Sahara Arab Democratic Republic, is a sparsely populated country with approximately 405,000 people as of 2009. Its 103,000 square miles of territory is located on the Atlantic Ocean south of Morocco, most of the land being the westernmost segment of the Sahara desert.

The land was originally populated by Moors, Tubus, and Tuaregs (by the fifth century CE). Several centuries later a number of Yemenites moved into the area and intermarried with the residents, thus producing the dominant Sahrawi people who reside in the country. In the 11th century the first Sahara confederacy emerged, and in future centuries it would be incorporated into the territory of different kingdoms based in neighboring countries.

Arab forces reached the Atlantic coast of North Africa in the first decade of the eighth century, and Islam spread among the people of North Africa over the next few centuries. Here the Kharijite movement that challenged the authority of the Arab caliph was strong. In later centuries, the Sunni Malikite School would come to dominate North Africa, including Sahara and its neighbors.

Spain established a settlement (Dakhla) on the Saharan coast, primarily to protect the far more valuable Demonstration at a refugee camp in Algeria. Western Sahara's government was forced into exile in Algeria by Morocco in 1991. (Miunicaneurona/Dreamstime.com)

Canary Islands, but in the 1880s began to plan to place the region under Spanish hegemony. Then in 1904, the European powers split Western Africa into four segments, although France (which had established a colony that bounded Sahara on the east and south) was the only other country to show any real interest in the western Sahara. The Sahwari opposed any incursions into their land by Europeans. Through much of the 20th century, Spain, France, and Morocco vied to wrestle control from the Native forces.

After World War II, Spain began to mine phosphate, Sahara's major mineral asset. In the meantime, the United Nations pressed for Saharan self-determination, and Morocco reasserted its claims to the land. In 1975, Spain conceded its interest to Morocco and

SAHARA

Mauritania, but almost immediately the Sahwari proclaimed the establishment of an independent republic. War with Morocco and Mauritania followed. Although Mauritania pulled out after a few years, the war with Morocco continued through the 1980s. A ceasefire was finally arranged in 1991 that left Morocco in control for all practical purposes; the Saharan Republic's government was forced into exile in Algeria (though recognized by a number of countries).

The Polisario Front, the groups that continued to contest Moroccan sovereignty in Sahara, accepted a UN-negotiated cease-fire. In April 2007, both Morocco

Sahara

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	45,000	527,000	99.4	6.91	770,000	930,000
Agnostics	0	1,600	0.3	7.26	3,500	5,000
Christians	31,600	750	0.1	6.24	800	900
Independents	0	620	0.1	8.78	700	800
Roman Catholics	30,000	130	0.0	−1.37	100	100
Atheists	0	510	0.1	6.88	1,000	1,500
Baha'is	100	240	0.0	6.84	200	300
Total population	76,700	530,000	100.0	6.91	775,000	938,000 and the Polisario Front presented autonomy plans for the territory to the UN, and subsequently the two sides have had face-to-face meetings, but the status of the territory remains very much in doubt as of 2010.

Meanwhile, as Spain asserted its hegemony over Sahara in the 20th century, the Roman Catholic Church began to move beyond its service to the minuscule Spanish expatriate community at Dakhla. Only in 1954 was prefecture designated, the work being delegated to two religious orders, the Oblates of Mary Immaculata and the Salesian Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. The Catholic presence peaked in the mid-1970s (with 6 parishes), but it has now diminished to fewer than 500 believers.

Protestant presence has been even smaller. The primary attempt to establish a mission was by the Seventh-day Adventist Church, but it did not succeed. There is a small Baha'i Faith community of some 100 members, but virtually the entire citizenry remain Muslim.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Malikite School of Islam; Roman Catholic Church; Salesians; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Hodges, Tony. Western Sahara: The Roots of a Desert War. Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill, 1983.

Saicho

767–822 CE

Saicho (Dengyo Daishi), the son of a Chinese family that had settled in Omi, Japan, became a student of the Tian Tai School of Chinese Buddhism, which he transmitted to Japan, where it spread as Tendai Buddhism. Saicho entered the religious life as a child of 11. He was ordained as a novice priest at the age of 14 and fully ordained 4 years later in Nara at Todai-ji, the most important temple of Japanese Buddhism at the time. Japanese Buddhism was still a relative small religion in Japan and very much under imperial control.

Following his ordination, Saicho left Nara and made his home on Mount Hiei, a spot north of the imperial city and relatively close to his family's home. There he built a small hermitage and made a set of vows about his own search for purification and enlightenment. He concentrated his study on several Buddhist sutras, such as the Lotus Sutra and the Perfection of Wisdom Sutra, and the Tian Tai writings attributed to Zhi Yi, which seemed especially to resonate with him. Zhi Yi extolled the virtues of the Lotus Sutra.

In 797, shortly after the imperial court was moved from Nara to Heian (Kyoto), Saicho was asked to serve as the court priest. As a result he was frequently away from Mount Hiei, though his contacts and influence grew in the powerful circle around the court. The emperor's favor was manifest when, in 804, Saicho was sent to China to study and observe Chinese Buddhism. Kukai (774–835), a younger contemporary, accompanied him on the same mission. While in China, Saicho was exposed to the Vajrayana (esoteric) tradition, but also receiving transmission from Tian Tai masters, who facilitated the accumulation of copies of hundreds of the Tian Tai books. He brought these to Japan. Soon after resettling at Mount Hiei, Saicho set about the process of spreading Tian Tai (which would be called Tendai in Japan) teachings throughout the country. Again his contacts at court benefited him, as he was able to successfully petition for permission to ordain priests. He also enlarged the small hermitage on Mount Hiei, which evolved into Enryaku-ji, the temple that would serve as the headquarters of the new Tendai School.

As his work and importance grew, Saicho engaged in an important debate with a leader of one of the other Buddhist groups based at Nara over the nature of Buddhahood. They argued over whether only some or all beings had the innate potential for enlightenment. Saicho argued for the universal nature of potential enlightenment. The debate would lead to an important decision. In 818, he renounced his Todai-ji ordination (a symbolic break with the Buddhist leadership at Nara), and then petitioned the emperor for the privilege of ordaining Tendai priests separately from the ordination platform at Nara.

Those who sought ordination from him had to undergo a strict regimen he had devised for prospective priests built around 12 years of strict practice at Enryaku-ji. He impressed upon the future Tendai priests that they engaged in spiritual work not just for their own salvation. They had to come to view themselves as similar to bodhisattvas, and understand that in helping others find enlightenment, they would also be helping themselves.

Saicho spread Tendai teachings with the assistance of the close relations he continued to nurture with the imperial court in Kyoto. He argued that Mahayana Buddhism in general, and, of course, Mount Hiei in particular, were “the protector of the nation,” an idea that would be periodically revived throughout his life. He eventually used the favor he had developed at court to make his most audacious petition—that he and his students be given separate status as an independent sect. He died in 822 before the emperor ruled on his petition. A favorable response came the following year. Included in the set of decrees made by the emperor, his temple on Mount Hiei was officially named Enryaku-ji.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Mahayana Buddhism; Nara; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism; Zhi Yi.

References

- Groner, Paul. Saicho: The Establishment of the Japanese Tendai School. Berkeley, CA: Berkeley Buddhist Studies Series, 1984.
- Kashiwahara, Yūsen, and Kōyū Sonoda. Shapers of Japanese Buddhism. Trans. by Gaynor Sekimori. Tokyo: Kōsei Pub. Co., 1994.
- Takeshi, Umehara. “Saicho.” In Buddhist Spirituality: Later China, Korea, Japan, and the Modern World, edited by Takeuchi Yoshinori, 164–173. New York: Crossroad Publishing, 1999.

Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage

The Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage is the most famous pilgrimage in Japan. It is dedicated to Kannon, the bodhisattva of compassion (also known in China as Guan Yin or Avalokitesvara), possibly the most famous and ubiquitous of the Mahayana Buddhist deities. Out of her compassion, she has become a worker of miracles. As in China, sites at which people had miraculous encounters with her would become sites for temples. Each temple of the Saigoku Kannon Pilgrimage is associated with a miracle attributed to Kannon.

According to the Avalokitesvara Sutra, there are 33 specific forms that Kannon may take to save people according to their different conditions in life. The 25th chapter of the Lotus Sutra, one of the more popular Mahayana scriptures, also mentions 33 forms of Kannon. One form Kannon might assume is that of Juichimen Kannon, depicted with 11 faces/heads to denote a sending out of sweetness and mercy in all directions. Senjyu Kannon, also known as the 1,000-arm Avalokitesvara, symbolizes her ability to embrace Earth and alleviate the suffering of all people. The Bato or Horse-headed Kannon offers protection to cattle and horses. The pilgrimage, which may be made by Buddhists at any time of the year, consists of visits to 33 temples. To make the entire pilgrimage, moving from one temple to the next in order, would involve the individual in a 1,500-mile journey. Most of the temples are in southwest Japan within a day's journey of Kyoto, but will take the pilgrim as far west as the Sea of Japan and eastward to the Pacific Ocean.

The first temple in the sequel is Seigantoji, located near Nagao (some 50 miles south of Osaka). It faces Nachi Falls, the highest in Japan, and is next to the Kumano-Nachi Shrine, a temple of a Japanese syncretistic Buddhist-Shinto sect. The temple possesses a Kannon statue that dates to the seventh century, the time of Buddhism's entrance into Japan, but the main statue is of Nyorin Kannon, one of the different forms assumed by Kannon that the pilgrim will encounter. A Nyorin Kannon that dates to the eighth century is located at Okadera (or Ryugai-ji), the seventh temple of the Kannon Pilgrimage. The second temple is located to the west near Wakayama. After visiting the all temples, the final stop is at Gifu, north-east of Kyoto.

Pilgrims generally carry with them a nokyochō, a pilgrim's book with a page for each temple. Each temple has a pilgrim's office that will, for a small fee, inscribe and stamp the book. This will become a record and memento of the pilgrimage. Worshippers will also locate the main Kannon statue at each temple. An act of veneration consists of making a monetary offering, ringing a bell three times acknowledging the Three Jewels of Buddhism—the Buddha, the Dharma (teachings), and the Sangha (community). Many will also light three incense sticks.

The popularity of the Kannon Pilgrimage led to its being copied in other parts of Japan. Through the centuries more than 200 variant duplicate pilgrimages to 33 Kannon temples appeared in every part of Japan, the Bando route that begins at Kamakura being considered the most important after the original Saigoku pilgrimage circuit. It appears to have originated in an encounter with Kannon in a dream of the Emperor Kazan who was told, "I have divided into 33 bodies throughout the 8 provinces of the Bando area, and a pilgrimage to these 33 sites will bring release from suffering." Soon afterward, in 988 CE, the emperor designated Sugimoto-dera in Kamakura as the first temple on the Bando circuit. Centuries later, the Saigoku and Bando pilgrimages were formally linked to a third circuit, the Chichibu Pilgrimage, which included 34 sites sacred to Kannon. The three pilgrimages together became the Kannon 1000 Circuit.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Kamakura Pilgrimage; Shikoku Pilgrimage; Temples—Buddhist.

References

- Mutsu, Iso. Kamakura: Fact and Legend. Rutland, VT: Tuttle Publishing, 1995.
- Readicker-Henderson, Ed. The Traveler's Guide to Japanese Pilgrimages. Trumbull, CT: Weatherhill, 1995.
- Schumacher, Mark. A to Z Photo Dictionary/ Japanese Buddhist Statuary. "Kannon." <http://www.onmarkproductions.com/html/kannon.shtml>.
- Statler, Oliver. Japanese Pilgrimage. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1985.

■ St. Helena

St. Helena, the South Atlantic island made famous as the site of Napoleon's exile from 1815 to 1821, is a British Overseas Territory in the mid-Atlantic Ocean. Besides St. Helena proper, the territory includes the island of Ascension and the island group of Tristan da Cunha. Although separated by hundreds of miles of water, the three islands are tied together by their strategic military placement in an area where land is sparse. Together, the islands have 165 square miles of territory. St Helena was uninhabited prior to its discovery by Portuguese sailors in 1502. The British settled St. Helena in 1659, and it has been a British colony ever since. Today (2008) the islands have a total population of 7,600.

Members of the Church of England arrived with the first British settlers, and today the great majority of the islanders are Anglicans. The church, formally established in 1851, is now attached to the Church in the Province of South Africa. There is one diocese, serving St. Helena and Ascension. Tristan de Cunha is under the oversight of the Diocese of Cape Town (South Africa).

ST. HELENA

Over the course of the 20th century, other Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic Church developed congregations. They include the Baptists, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Salvation Army, and Jehovah's Witnesses. Each counts its membership in the low hundreds. The Baptists are affiliated with the Baptist Union of South Africa. The SDAs are attached to the Southern Africa Union Conference.

There is one small group of the Baha'i Faith; on St. Helena, it is the only non-Christian group that has become visible.

J. Gordon Melton

St. Helena

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,100	6,500	95.7	1.30	7,300	8,000
Anglicans	4,000	4,800	69.9	1.29	5,300	5,800
Protestants	360	520	7.6	−2.33	500	500
Marginals	100	300	4.4	−2.73	450	550
Agnostics	10	230	3.4	7.21	390	500
Baha'is	20	60	0.8	1.65	70	100
Atheists	0	10	0.1	0.00	10	20
Total population	5,100	6,800	100.0	1.47	7,800	8,600

See also: Baptist Union of South Africa; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of England; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Cannan, Edward. Churches of the South Atlantic Islands, 1502–1991. Oswestry, UK: Anthony Nelson, 1992.
- Royle, Stephen A. The Company's Island: St. Helena, Company Colonies and the Colonial Endeavour. London: I. B. Tauris, 2008.

■ St. Kitts-Nevis

St. Kitts-Nevis (more formally, the Federation of Saint Christopher and Nevis) are two of the Windward Islands in the Lesser Antilles on the northeast edge of the Caribbean Sea. They are east of Puerto Rico and west of Antigua. Together the islands have 101 square miles of land and a population of 39,800 (2008).

St. Kitts-Nevis was originally settled by the Carib people, who were first visited by Christopher Columbus in 1493. The Caribs were left alone until Thomas Walker established what was the first English settlement in the Caribbean in 1623. The initial settlement on nearby Nevis was made in 1628. The Caribs were soon eliminated, and slaves from Africa were brought in to work the expanding plantations. For the next century, France and England vied for control of the islands, but they were awarded to England by the Treaty of Versailles of 1793.

In 1816, St. Kitts was included in a single colony that included the Virgin Islands and Anguilla. The Virgin Islands were separated in 1871, and St. Kitts became the center of the remaining colony. After World War II, it was incorporated into the Associate States of the West Indies and developed local autonomy. Anguilla moved to disassociate itself in 1980. Religious freedom is guaranteed in St. Kitts-Nevis.

The Church of England arrived with the first British settlers and for more than 100 years was the only religious organization on the islands. In 1824 the bishop of London handed over control of the parishes to the bishop on Barbados. That same year an archdeaconry of Antigua, which included St. Kitts-Nevis, was established. The archdeaconry became a diocese in 1842 and has since become a diocese of the Church in the Province of the West Indies, headquartered at Nassau, the Bahamas.

Daniel Gottwald and James Birkly, missionaries of the Moravian Church, arrived in 1777 to found the first Protestant mission. They had been invited by John Gardiner, a planter, to evangelize the slaves under his care. They and their successors were soon visiting more than 50 different plantations. When the Methodists arrived in 1787, the two churches cooperated in evangelistic efforts and the building of churches. Methodism was introduced to St. Kitts by Lydia Seaton, formerly a servant who had been converted by Nathaniel Gilbert while living on Antigua. The Reverend Thomas Coke, the associate of Methodist founder John Wesley, visited St. Kitts for the first time in 1787 and later sent Thomas Hammett there to head the work. The Methodists later affiliated with the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas and the Moravian work assigned to the Moravian Church in Jamaica. Both churches are now members of the World Council of Churches.

ST. KITTS-NEVIS

The Roman Catholic Church established work in 1861. It was included in the Diocese of Roseau (Dominica) until 1971 and then placed in the Diocese of St. John's (Antigua).

During the 20th century, a variety of churches targeted St. Kitts-Nevis for missionary activity, including the Seventh-day Adventist Church, the Pilgrim

St. Kitts-Nevis

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	44,400	49,500	94.5	1.27	57,500	64,600
Protestants	25,900	23,700	45.2	0.06	27,000	29,600
Anglicans	17,500	16,800	32.1	1.04	19,000	21,400
Roman Catholics	4,000	5,100	9.7	0.00	5,900	7,000
Hindus	0	790	1.5	1.30	1,000	1,200
Agnostics	60	850	1.6	3.83	1,400	1,700
Spiritists	0	670	1.3	1.30	800	900
Baha'is	200	260	0.5	1.29	350	450
New religionists	210	150	0.3	1.23	180	200
Muslims	0	140	0.3	1.35	200	300
Total population	44,900	52,400	100.0	1.31	61,400	69,300

Holiness Church (now an integral part of the Wesleyan Church), the Church of God of Prophecy, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), the Christian Brethren, the Churches of Christ, and the Salvation Army. At the same time a number of indigenous churches such as the Antioch Baptist Church, the Assemblies of the First Born, the Evangelical Faith Church, and the Spiritual Baptists have arisen.

There is little evidence of organized religion apart from Christianity, the most prominent group being the Baha'i Faith. There are also some followers of Islam, Afro-Caribbean religions, and the Rastafarians.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Christian Brethren; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of England; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Churches of Christ; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Moravian Church in Jamaica; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritual Baptists; Wesleyan Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Dyde, Brian. Out of Crowded Vagueness: A History of the Islands of St. Kitts, Nevis and Anguilla. Northampton, MA: Interlink Publishing Group, 2006.

Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's, 1968.

■ St. Lucia

St. Lucia, one of the Windward Islands of the Lesser Antilles, is located at the western edge of the Caribbean Sea between Martinique and St. Vincent. It was originally valued for the fine harbor at its capital, Castries. It has 238 square miles of territory and a population of 160,000 people, the majority of African descent.

St. Lucia was originally settled by the Arawak people, who around 800 CE were conquered and replaced by the Carib people. The latter group inhabited the island when Christopher Columbus arrived in 1502 and gave it its present name. Both the British and Spanish vied for the island, but neither could defeat the local resistance to their settlement.

Then, in 1660, the French settled on the island, and it became one object in the ongoing British-French conflict over the course of the next century. Finally, in 1814, the British received control as one item in the Treaty of Paris. The British quickly developed the sugarcane industry on a set of plantations built upon slave labor. The present population largely derived from the mixing of the former master/slave population. St. Lucia was incorporated into the Colony of the Windward Islands. It was included in the West Indies Federation

ST. LUCIA

St. Lucia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	102,000	164,000	95.9	1.07	186,000	205,000
Roman Catholics	92,500	124,000	72.5	0.32	135,000	145,000
Protestants	6,500	43,200	25.3	3.38	49,800	54,500
Anglicans	3,000	3,300	1.9	0.00	3,600	4,000
Spiritists	1,500	2,900	1.7	1.09	3,300	3,600
Hindus	0	1,600	0.9	1.09	2,000	2,300
Muslims	0	780	0.5	1.08	1,000	1,300
New religionists	0	650	0.4	1.09	750	850
Baha'is	170	400	0.2	1.12	600	800
Agnostics	0	660	0.4	10.74	1,000	1,600
Atheists	0	60	0.0	1.11	100	200
Total population	104,000	171,000	100.0	1.09	195,000	216,000

View of the fishing town of Soufriere on Saint Lucia, 2009. (Samuel Strickler/Dreamstime.com)

(1959–1962) and received the right of self-government as one of the Federated States of the Antilles in 1967. It became a fully independent country in 1979, though it remains part of the British Commonwealth.

The Roman Catholic Church came to St. Lucia with the French and became fully established in 1719. The Diocese of Castries, initially erected in 1956, was elevated to an archdiocese in 1974. Serving more than 90 percent of the population, it remains by far the largest religious grouping on the island.

Anglicanism entered with the British and claims the largest percentage of the non-Catholic community. The churches were under the Diocese of Barbados prior to the creation of the Diocese of the Windward Islands in 1878. That diocese, headquartered on St. Vincent, is now part of the Church in the Province of the West Indies. The Methodists arrived in St. Lucia in 1809, part of the early expansion of British Methodism through the Caribbean following the American Revolution. The Methodist work is now part of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. In the mid-19th century, the Moravians, who also had been expanding through the Caribbean with a mission devoted to the plantation laborers, arrived. Their work is now incorporated into the Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province, headquartered on Antigua. All three churches are now members of the World Council of Churches.

Over the course of the 20th century, a spectrum of churches representative of Evangelical, Holiness, and Pentecostal perspectives arrived on St. Lucia, primarily from the United States. Each has had modest success. Among the more successful have been the Evangelical Church of the West Indies and the United Holy Church of America. The Seventh-day Adventist Church arrived in 1926 and the Jehovah’s Witnesses in 1963.

Several movements that have arisen in the Caribbean and subsequently spread through the islands have found their way to St. Lucia. The Rastafarian movement spread from Jamaica in the 1950s and 1960s. In like measure, the Spiritual Baptists have arisen as a popular indigenous church, and the Yoruban religion, also known as Santeria, has gained some degree of popularity. The Baha’i Faith has a small following on St. Lucia.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha’i Faith; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Evangelical Church of the West Indies; Holiness Movement; Jehovah’s Witnesses; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Moravian Church, Eastern West Indies Province; Pentecostalism; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; Santeria; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritual Baptists; World Council of Churches; Yoruban Religion/Spirituality.

References

Gachet, C. A History of the Roman Catholic Church in St. Lucia. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Key Caribbean Publications, 1976.

Jesse, C. Outlines of St. Lucia’s History. Castries: St. Lucia Archeological and Historical Society, 1964.

■ St. Pierre et Miquelon

St. Pierre et Miquelon is an archipelago of eight islands off the southern coast of Newfoundland (Canada), a remnant of French North America. The islands have a combined land area of 93 square miles and a population of 7,000 (2008). The British pushed a claim to the islands through the 1700s, but they relinquished the claim in 1804. The islands were until 1946 a French possession, afterward designated an overseas territory, and since 1975 are an overseas department of France.

The Roman Catholic Church came to the island with its early settlers in 1668. It remains the only Christian church on the islands and claims the great majority of citizens as members. It has been constituted as a vicariate attached to the Episcopal Conference of France. There are some professing Protestants among the residents, but no organized work. There is, however, a spiritual assembly of the Baha’i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha’i Faith; Roman Catholic Church.

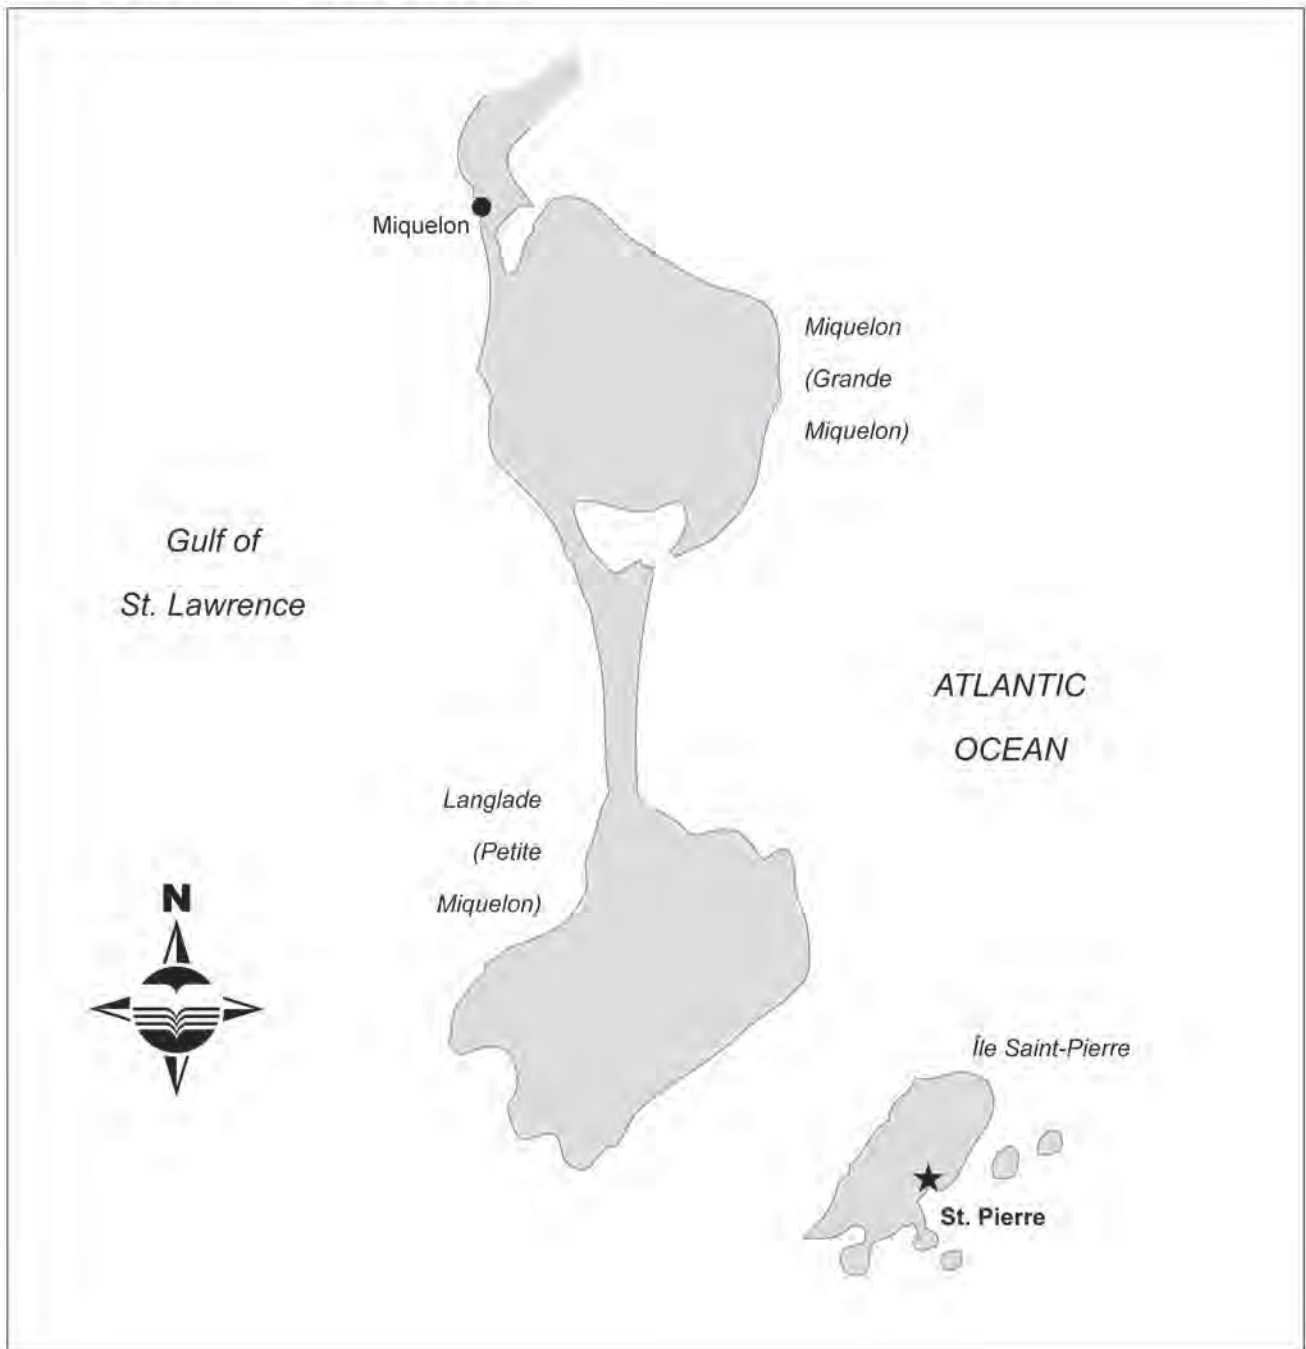

References

Hansen, Bent. St. Pierre and Miquelon. Halifax, Nova Scotia: Nimbus Publishing, 1994.
 Rannie, W. F. Saint Pierre and Miquelon. Beamsville, ON: Rannie, 1963.

St. Pierre et Miquelon

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	5,400	6,000	94.5	−0.03	5,900	5,800
Roman Catholics	5,300	5,900	92.7	−0.03	5,700	5,600
Protestants	50	70	1.1	1.61	100	150
Marginals	0	40	0.5	0.00	50	100
Agnostics	40	250	3.9	2.78	350	500
Baha’is	50	90	1.4	0.24	130	200
Muslims	0	10	0.2	2.13	20	40
Total population	5,500	6,400	100.0	0.07	6,400	6,500

ST. PIERRE ET MIQUELON

■ St.Vincent

St. Vincent, one of the Windward Islands, is located on the southeastern edge of the Caribbean Sea between St. Lucia and Grenada. Since being granted independence as a member of the British Commonwealth in 1979, its territory of 150 square miles has included not only the main island but also the northern part of the Grenadine Islands immediately to the south. The islands have a combined population of 118,000 (2008).

St. Vincent

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	87,700	108,000	88.4	0.47	106,000	83,600
Protestants	17,400	58,000	47.5	1.68	60,000	50,000
Independents	2,600	27,000	22.1	2.66	30,000	27,000
Anglicans	30,000	19,200	15.7	-0.61	19,000	16,000
Hindus	0	4,100	3.4	0.54	5,000	6,000
Agnostics	400	3,200	2.6	3.56	5,000	6,000
Spiritists	1,800	2,200	1.8	0.55	2,300	2,000
Muslims	0	1,900	1.6	0.54	2,500	3,000
Baha'is	600	1,800	1.5	0.54	3,000	4,000
New religionists	0	640	0.5	0.52	700	800
Ethnoreligionists	0	250	0.2	0.51	250	250
Atheists	0	60	0.0	0.39	100	300
Total population	90,500	122,000	100.0	0.54	125,000	106,000

St. Vincent was originally settled by the Arawak people, who were in turn conquered and replaced by the Caribs. These were the people that Christopher Columbus found when he arrived in the area in 1498. The Caribs were left alone until 1783, when England was given hegemony over St. Vincent in a treaty with its European neighbors. They sent a force to defeat the Caribs, who had been joined by some slaves that had escaped from other nearby islands. They were largely defeated and eradicated by 1796. A set of plantations soon emerged, and a large number of Africans arrived to work them.

St. Vincent was incorporated into the Colony of the Windward Islands in 1833. It received some degree of autonomy in 1960 and became a self-governing state in 1969. It became fully independent in 1979. Following the first elections of the new government, members of the Rastafarian movement on Union Island led an armed rebellion that had to be put down by troops brought in from Barbados.

The Church of England came to St. Vincent with the first British settlers. It has remained the largest religious body in St. Vincent, and its largely black membership reflects the island's population. Today, the Diocese of the Windward Islands, a diocese within the Church in the Province of the West Indies, is headquartered on St. Vincent.

Methodism spread through the Caribbean from England in the years immediately after the American Revolution. It reached St. Vincent in 1787, a direct result of the Reverend Thomas Coke's visit to Antigua and the birth of his enthusiasm for missionizing the Caribbean in 1786. The Methodist work is now a part of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas.

Through the course of the 20th century, an array of Protestant/Free church bodies have found their way to St. Vincent from both England and the United States. These include Adventism, Holiness, Pentecostal, Baptist, and independent evangelical bodies. The mission of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada has grown to become the Pentecostal Church of the West Indies. Among the more interesting bodies is the Christian Pilgrim Church of St. Vincent, an indigenous Christian denomination. The Spiritual Baptists, a movement that has spread through many of the Caribbean Islands, was banned in St. Vincent between 1913 and 1965.

In 1964 the Anglicans, Catholics, Methodists, and the Salvation Army founded the Christian Council of St. Vincent, now known as the Saint Vincent and the Grenadines Christian Council. It is closely related to the World Council of Churches.

The Baha'i Faith has spread on St. Vincent in the years since World War II. At the same time, Yoruban religion, popularly called Santeria, has emerged to visibility among the descendants of Africans. It includes elements brought to the islands from Africa, revitalized by a new influx of those teachings made possible by modern communications. Santeria operates as a semi-secret religion, and the estimate of support is difficult to make.

ST. VINCENT

St. Vincent

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Adventism; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of England; Holiness Movement; Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas; Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada; Pentecostalism; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Santeria; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Spiritual Baptists; World Council of Churches, Yoruban Religion/Spirituality.

References

- Fraser, Adrian, and Keith Joseph. Our Country—St. Vincent and the Grenadines. Oxford: Macmillan Caribbean, 1993.
- Young, V. H. Becoming West Indian: Culture, Self, and Nation in St. Vincent. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1993.

Saints

The word “saint” is derived from the Latin sanctus (Greek: hagios), literally meaning “holy.” In Christianity it refers to someone who has manifested a holiness of life or someone who has been martyred for the faith, and whom the church believes is now enjoying eternal life with God. In Roman Catholicism, holiness of life is spoken of in terms of “heroic virtue.” A saint is someone who has “heroically,” or to an exceptional degree, exhibited the supernatural virtues (since they are gifts of God’s grace) of faith, hope, and charity and the moral virtues of prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance.

In its broader meaning, “saint” can be used to corporately designate all the faithful, both the living and the dead, particularly when describing the church as a “communion of saints.” The Second Vatican Council uses similar language in describing the church as a “holy nation” in its theology of sainthood (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, no. 50). In such a theology of holiness, the church recognizes that God alone is holy. God calls all persons to a life of holiness with a hope of sharing in eternal divine life. Holiness or sanctity is not something the church bestows on the individual, but is a gift given freely by God that the church subsequently formally recognizes in the individual. All the faithful are called to a life of imitation of these saints, and through a special devotion, or veneration, of such saints can seek their intercessions through prayer since saints enjoy a more perfect relationship, in heaven, with God. A distinction is drawn between the veneration of, or devotion to, saints and the worship that is due to God alone.

History In the early church, the term “saint” was most commonly used to describe those who believed in Christ and who were called to follow him (1 Corinthians 1:2; Romans 1:7). The church pre-eminently recognizes the sanctity of the Apostles of Christ and the Blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ. The term “saint” was also used to describe those who were martyred for their faith during the persecutions of the first three centuries. The memory of these martyrs, their date of martyrdom, their place of burial, and their relics were venerated in this early period. The term “saint” was later also applied to monastics, who renounced the world and lived lives of asceticism and prayer; to early theologians, who defended and explicated the faith; and to those who were zealous in their preaching of the faith (like missionaries). Miracles were often attributed to such saints.

In its modern usage, canonization refers to the culmination of a process in which someone is declared a saint and is added to the canon, or list, of saints. However, in the early church period the declaration of sainthood could be effected in a number of different ways, the most common being by popular acclamation by the people, or later, by the declaration of a bishop, pope, or synod (or council) of bishops. The synodal process has remained the normal avenue for canonization in the Eastern Orthodox churches. The Roman Catholic tradition gradually developed a more formal process, beginning around the 13th century. Various revisions to the process of canonization followed, with the most recent protocols being announced in 1983. These recent changes were in part occasioned by the demands of modern historical and scientific inquiry.

Indian Catholics walk in a procession, holding a portrait of Sister Alphonsa to celebrate her canonization as a saint, Calcutta, India, October 12, 2008. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Canonization in the Roman Catholic Tradition In 1983, in the Apostolic Constitution, The Divine Teacher and Model of Perfection, Pope John Paul II established new procedures for canonization. There are two phases on the path toward canonization: the diocesan and the Roman. Normally, the process of initiating a case for the canonization of a person is done at a local level by a diocesan bishop, either Roman Catholic or Eastern Catholic, or by the bishop through a request of an individual or group of faithful. The local bishop appoints a postulator, who directs the investigation process at the local diocesan level. In the language of the constitution, those for whom canonization is sought are initially referred to as “venerable servants of God.” Local bishops are to inquire about the life of this person, his or her heroic virtues, orthodoxy, or, in certain cases, martyrdom. An examination is also done of any published or unpublished writings (like diaries or letters), and any living witnesses are interviewed. The bishop is also to submit a declaration that no cult around the postulant has arisen. These reports and eyewitness accounts (the “acts”) are then gathered and submitted to the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints, which then initiates the Roman phase of the investigation.

In the New Laws for the Causes of Saints (1983), the Congregation distinguished between ancient cases and recent cases, with the major difference being whether or not witnesses can give an oral deposition. Recent cases are normally not brought before the Congregation until at least five years after the death of the person, although the pope may unilaterally expedite this process by dispensing with the waiting period. For the latter case, the two most recent examples under consideration are Mother Teresa (1999, by Pope John Paul II) and Pope John Paul II (2005, by Pope Benedict XVI).

Within this Congregation exists a College of Relators, which is specifically entrusted with studying the cases for canonization and preparing reports (or “positions”) of its findings and its reviews of the diocesan reports. This College of Relators can also draw upon consultants, that is, other experts in history, theology, and spirituality. A promoter of the faith oversees this process in its various phases.

Miracles Miracles are seen as divine interventions by God, and thus by extension as confirmations of the sanctity of an individual. The revised constitution makes clear that an inquiry into alleged miracles is conducted separately from the examination of the life of holiness or martyrdom of a servant of God. The Sacred Congregation has a board of medical experts or physicians, who discuss cases of alleged miracles dealing with healing. These experts do not produce a theological judgment that a miracle has occurred, but are only asked whether or not there exists a medical or scientific reason for a miracle or physical cure. No miracles are required for a martyr to be declared a saint.

During this process, relics (such as hair, bone fragments, pieces of clothing) of the servant of God may be collected. The authenticity and preservation of relics is relegated to the Congregation. Relics are used in the church as a means of remembrance and devotion to a particular saint, and are especially kept in places of pilgrimage or as part of an altar.

At the culmination of the entire examination process, the Sacred Congregation, with its member bishops and cardinals, examines the final reports or votes of the relators, expert consultants, physicians, and the promoter of the faith and issues a report to the pope.

There are two distinct levels, the one preceding the other, of the formal recognition of the sanctity of an individual: beatification and canonization. Beatification requires the verification (or “instruction”) of one miracle attributed to the servant of God. If authentic, then the pope can declare the person as “Blessed,” wherein the church recognizes that this person is a model of heroic virtue. The person is given the title of Blessed, and a limited cult of veneration of this person is permitted at the local level, in a region or in a religious community. The process from beatification to canonization requires the authentication of a second miracle. Once a second report is submitted and a second miracle verified, the pope can proceed to a declaration of sainthood. This is a definitive declaration by the pope that the saint is enjoying eternal life in God and that a cult of veneration is to be extended to the universal church. Both beatification and canonization normally take place in St. Peter’s Basilica in Rome, during a pontifical Mass, and are done solely through a decree of the pope. Those designated with the title saint are assigned a particular feast day, which is commemorated by special prayers in the church’s liturgical calendar.

Jaroslav Z. Skira

See also: Eastern Orthodoxy; Francis of Assisi; Helena, Flavia Iulia; Ignatius of Loyola; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Relics; Roman Catholic Church.

Resources:

Cunningham, Lawrence S. The Meaning of Saints. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1980.

Hawley, John Stratton, ed. Saints and Virtues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

Woodward, Kenneth. Making Saints: How the Catholic Church Determines Who Becomes a Saint, Who Doesn’t and Why. New York: Touchstone/Simon and Schuster, 1996.

Sakyapa

The Sakyapa Order of Tibetan Buddhism has a long history and has produced many renowned scholars and meditators, and Sakya lamas have played leading roles in Tibetan history and politics. Today it is the smallest of the four major traditions of Tibetan Buddhism, but maintains a strong reputation for learning and religious practice. Its major leaders were forced to flee Tibet following the Chinese invasion in the 1950s, and its main center today is in Dehradun, India.

The Order derives its name from Sakya (Gray Earth), the area in central Tibet in which its main monastery is located. Sakya Monastery was founded in 1073 by Konchok Gyelpo (1034–1102) and later became one of the great monastic centers in Tibet after the Sakyapas came to supremacy following Sakya Pandita's (1182–1251) appointment as regent by Gushri Khan in 1245. This followed a visit by Sakya Pandita to the Mongol court to surrender Tibet to the Mongols. Traditional histories report that the khan was so impressed by Sakya Pandita that he converted to Buddhism, and rather than impose direct Mongol control over Tibet appointed Sakya Pandita to rule in his stead. Sakyapa overlordship continued with Sakya Pandita's successors, but it declined in the late 14th century when Mongol power waned.

The most distinctive Sakyapa meditative practice is called “path and result” (lamdre), which is a comprehensive system of practice based on the Hevajra Tantra. Following the Hevajra's doctrine of “the undifferentiability of cyclic existence and nirvana,” the lamdre system views the path and its result as being inseparable and mutually implicative. Path cannot legitimately be distinguished from result because the former leads to the latter. And result subsumes path. From the standpoint of Buddhahood, all dichotomies vanish, and meditators in this system are trained to view all distinctions as merely projections of mind. Mind in turn is said to have an essence of luminosity and emptiness.

An important tenet of the path and result system is the similarity of the “triple appearance” (nangsum) and “triple continuum” (gyüsum). The first consists of (1) the appearance of phenomena as impure error; (2) the appearance of experience in meditation; and (3) pure appearance. These are said to be fundamentally the same; the only difference lies in how they are perceived. The first refers to how ordinary, unenlightened beings perceive reality, while the second refers to the perceptions of advanced meditators—who have removed some of the mental defilements that cloud the perceptions of ordinary beings. The third aspect is known by buddhas, who have removed all defilements and perceive the true nature of reality.

The triple continuum consists of (1) basis; (2) path; and (3) result. As with the triple vision, the three are said to be undifferentiable. The basis is the two truths (conventional and ultimate truths). The path consists of cultivating method and wisdom. The pure vision is the result and represents the attainment of Buddhahood.

The leadership of the Sakyapa Order is held by male members of the Khon family. According to traditional Sakyapa histories, the Khons were originally adherents of the Nyingmapa Order but split from it when Sherap Tsultrim witnessed a public display of esoteric Tantric rituals at a Nyingmapa monastery and decided that this violated Tantric injunctions concerning secrecy. This attitude continues in the Order today, and Sakyapas tend to be the most secretive of all schools of Tibetan Buddhism, particularly with respect to Tantric teachings and practices. As a possible result of that attitude, Sakyapa is also the smallest of Tibetan Buddhism's four orders (though its literature, philosophical systems, and meditative practices are widely influential). The head of the Order is the “Throne Holder of Sakya” (Sakya Tridzin), who fled to India in the 1950s and founded the Order's current headquarters.

Sakya Centre
187 Rajpou Rd., PO Rajpou
District Dehra Dun
Uttar Pradesh
India

John Powers and J. Gordon Melton

See also: Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Davidson, Ronald. Tibetan Renaissance: Tantric Buddhism in the Rebirth of Tibetan Culture. New York: Columbia University Press, 2005.
- Deshung, Rinpoche. The Three Levels of Spiritual Perception. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1995.
- Gyaltzen, Sakyapa Sonan. The Clear Mirror: A Traditional Account of Tibet's Golden Age. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion Publications, 1996.
- Powers, John. Introduction to Tibetan Buddhism. 2nd ed. Ithaca, NY: Snow Lion, 2007.
- Stearns, Cyrus. Luminous Lives: The Story of the Early Masters of the Lam 'Bras in Tibet. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2002.
- Stearns, Cyrus. Taking the Result as the Path: Core Teachings of the Sakya Tradition. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2006.

Salesians

The Salesians, officially the Order of Saint Francis de Sales, is an ordered community of the Roman Catholic Church, founded in 1859 by John Bosco (1815–1888) with an original intention of emphasizing the Christian education of youth. It has both lay and clerical members. It and its various divisions are named for Francis de Sales (1567–1622), a saint of the church, known for his writings on spiritual devotion. Bosco also founded the Salesian Sisters (the Daughters of Mary Help of Christian) with a similar purpose. The Salesian Sisters has grown into one of the largest religious orders for women in the world.

In his 26th year, Bosco befriended an orphan whom he began to instruct in the faith. This relationship led to his founding an oratory in Turin, Italy, that became the motherhouse of his order. The order was formed with recruits from the youth he had been instructing. There were 17 in the original group that constituted the Salesian Order. He received papal approval in 1864 and approval of the constitution of the Order in 1874. Expansion began after official approval, and in 1875 the first missionaries were commissioned. They settled in Argentina. They were led by Giovanni Cagliero, the first Salesian to become a bishop and cardinal.

At the time of Bosco's death, in 1888, the order had spread in Europe to Spain, France, and England, and in South America to Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil. Growth continued at a spectacular pace through the next century, and the order spread to more than 70 countries. In some cases, they were invited to countries in which Italian communities had emerged where they developed work among both adults and youth.

The Salesian Sisters developed a mirror educational program for girls. Its co-founder with Bosco, Mother Maria Domenica Mazzarello (1837–1881), would later, like Bosco, be canonized. The lay affiliate group, called the Cooperators, focuses its efforts on charitable activities toward youth.

The Salesian Order's work is found around the world. Its more than 2,700 houses are organized into 8 geographical regions and then into provinces. Two provinces serve the western and eastern United States. With more than 20,000 individual members, it is the third largest missionary organization in the world.

Statue of John Bosco, founder of the Salesians, Turin, Italy. (J. Gordon Melton)

Salesian Order
Via della Pisana 1111
CP 9092
I-00163 Roma-Aurelio
Italy

<http://www.sdb.org/SDBWEB/index.asp> (in Italian)

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Ceria, Eugene. The Salesian Society: Foundation, Organization, Expansion. Paterson, NJ: Salesiana, 1955.
- Wirth, Morand. Don Bosco and the Salesians. New Rochelle, NY: Don Bosco, 1982.

Salt Lake City

Salt Lake City, Utah, in the western United States, is the spiritual center and site of the international administrative offices of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The settlement of the Latter-day Saints in the Salt Lake Valley in 1847 was prompted by the assassination of the church's founder and prophet, Joseph Smith, Jr. (1805–1844), in Carthage, Illinois. Smith's death led to a disruption of the Saints' community in Nauvoo, Illinois, and prompted their move to the West, beyond what at the time was the boundary of the United States. The Saints' leadership had become aware of the valley from the early report of explorers.

View of downtown Salt Lake City, Utah, at dusk. (Vlad Turchenko/Dreamstime.com)

The development of the city was punctuated by several occurrences. Around July 22, 1847, Orson Pratt (1811–1881), one of the church's apostles, led the advance party of the original group to migrate from Iowa into the valley. They dammed up the most significant source of freshwater, City Creek, and began planting crops. Church president Brigham Young (1801–1877) arrived on July 24 and on the 28th designated the spot between the two branches of the creek where the new temple would be erected. That site would, for the next generation, become the center of the Latter-day Saint community, around which a vibrant commercial urban area developed, spurred by the 1870 completion of the Utah Central Railroad.

As the city grew, it was divided ecclesiastically into what were termed wards (comparable to a Protestant parish), and in each ward a meetinghouse was constructed. Originally, Young designated a 40-acre site as the grounds for the temple (and later to be known as Temple Square). The site was later reduced to 10 acres. The groundbreaking of the temple, which is used for several special events for church members, would be held on February 14, 1853. A decade later, in 1863, the construction of the tabernacle, a large auditorium for important gatherings, including the annual conference of the church's leadership, was begun. It was completed in 1867, but not dedicated until 1875. The temple was not completed and dedicated until 1893.

Already by the 1870s, Temple Square became a site for tourists and visitors to the city; the appointment of an official guide in 1875 signaled the beginning of the use of visits to Temple Square as an occasion to explain the beliefs and practices of the church to non-members. Today, the Square hosts thousands of visitors monthly, and two visitors centers have been placed just inside the Square at the north and south entrances.

Integral to understanding the uniqueness of Salt Lake City is the Latter-day Saint concept of the gathering of Israel. They believed that there would be a

New Jerusalem that would supersede the old Jerusalem, and that it would be on the American continent. That gathering place would ultimately be Independence, Missouri. But the members of the church were and still are locked out of access to the designated temple site in Independence, which is under the control of the small Church of Christ (Temple Lot). One of the purposes of establishing a gathering place was for the erection of a temple and the delivery of temple ordinances to the members. The Salt Lake temple was completed in the 1890s and through the 20th century numerous other temples would be completed. By the middle of the 20th century, the need to gather membership in Salt Lake City had been completed and policy about drawing members to Utah gradually reversed. Members are now encouraged to remain in their home communities and temples have been erected to provide them the ordinances.

In the light of the explosive growth of the church, the uniqueness of Salt Lake City somewhat changed through the last decades of the 20th century. It became the center of the Latter-day Saint West, an area along the Rocky Mountains from Phoenix, Arizona, to Boise, Idaho, in which the Latter-day Saints formed the majority of the religious community and also tended to dominate the political scene. Given the peculiar nature of the American government, it also tended to give the sparsely populated Rocky Mountain states significant political clout in Washington, D.C.

While gradually assimilating into the major currents of American life, Salt Lake City remains peculiarly Latter-day Saint in many ways, with mainstream Catholic, Protestant, and Free churches forming a distinct minority community. Evangelical churches have also made it a center for proselytizing Latter-day Saints, who are viewed as following a different, non-Christian religion, while Latter-day Saints have emphasized their Christian credentials and have sought acceptance within the larger ecumenical scene, with very mixed results. One symbol of its assimilation has been the changing laws concerning the serving of alcoholic beverages in restaurants. The hosting of the Olympics in 2002 became the occasion for ending many of the restrictions that limited the serving of alcohol to restaurants designated as private clubs, and the adoption of laws more consistent with the rest of the country.

Most recently, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has completed a large new church headquarters building complex just north of Temple Square, which further asserts its role in the city's life while providing more adequate facilities for serving its global membership.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Independence, Missouri; Jerusalem; Smith, Joseph, Jr.; Temples—Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

References

- Alexander, Thomas G., and James B. Allen. Mormons and Gentiles: A History of Salt Lake City. Boulder, CO: Pruett Publishing Company, 1984.
- Huffaker, Kurt A. Salt Lake City Then and Now. San Diego, CA: Thunder Bay Press, 2008.
- McCormack, John S. Salt Lake City: The Gathering Place. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 2000.
- Tullidge, Edward W. History of Salt Lake City. Salt Lake City, UT: Star Printing Company, 1886.

Salvadoran Lutheran Synod

Lutheranism emerged in El Salvador only in the middle of the 20th century. In the early 1950s, the newly formed Lutheran World Federation made contact with expatriate German communities in El Salvador. An initial congregation was founded in 1954. The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod (not associated with the Lutheran World Federation) took the lead in developing a church. The church grew beyond the German community, especially in the 1970s, when congregations arose across the country. The church, however, entered a period of instability following the military coup in 1979 and the division of the country into warring factions through the 1980s. As a result of the existence of armed insurrectionists, death squads, and the resulting deaths of some 50,000 people, some 500,000 people fled to the United States and another quarter of a million to neighboring countries during the early 1980s.

As work related to the Missouri Synod spread through Central America, the various churches were united into the Council of Lutheran Churches in Central America and Panama. Of the several churches, the Salvadoran Church is the largest. In 1972 the church began work among the poor of El Salvador, but as civil unrest increased, they found themselves presented with a situation far beyond their means. In 1983 the president of the synod and the physician in charge of its mobile clinic were arrested and deported. At the next synod meeting, in January 1984, the church, independently of the Missouri Synod, formally applied for membership in the Lutheran World Federation. The Federation had already entered the country with assistance for displaced persons.

By the mid-1980s the synod had only two ordained ministers left, the remainder either having been killed or having fled. The church survived the era of terror through the effort of a group of lay preachers, who remain important to its life. By 2006, the church had recovered and some 17 pastors were serving its 68 congregations and 15,000 members. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches.

Salvadoran Lutheran Synod
Calle 5 de Noviembre 313
Barrio Sam Miguelito
San Salvador
El Salvador

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod; Lutheran World Federation; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Salvation Army

The Salvation Army is an international movement—an evangelical part of the universal Christian Church, with roots in Methodism and the Holiness movement. Its bases its message on the Bible, sees its ministry as motivated by love for God, and accepts a basic mission to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ and meet human needs in his name without discrimination. Although the Army is distinctive in government and practice, its doctrines follow the mainstream of Christian belief and teaching, and its 11 articles of faith emphasize the primacy of scripture, the need for personal salvation, and the possibility of living a Christlike life. The objects of the Army, outlined in the Salvation Army Act of 1980, include “the advancement of Christianity and, pursuant thereto, the advancement of education, the relief of poverty, and other charitable objects beneficial to society or the community of mankind as a whole.”

The Salvation Army began as a revivalist mission in East London (United Kingdom), founded in 1865 by William Booth (1829–1912), a former minister in the Methodist New Connexion. The mission adopted the name the Salvation Army in 1878 and is now at work in more than 100 countries, its activities radiating from its International Headquarters in London. The military style of the organization, which promotes mobility and discipline, proved to be an effective stimulus in the Army’s fight against evil, and the Army has used to advantage its military features—such as uniforms, flags, and ranks—to identify, inspire, and regulate its endeavors.

In the early 1880s, Salvationists often faced brutal and determined opposition from publicans and brothel keepers who were losing trade and influence. The sight of Salvationists taking the Christian gospel onto the streets, marching with brass bands, uniforms, and banners, often aroused the protesters’ anger, and in 1882, some 669 Salvationists were knocked down, kicked, or otherwise assaulted on the streets of Britain alone.

Leadership in the Salvation Army is provided by commissioned officers who are recognized ministers of religion. Full-time officers and employees, as well as soldiers, adherents, and friends who give voluntary service, maintain a wide variety of evangelistic and social programs, under the authority of the General, the Army’s international leader, who is elected by a High Council convened for that purpose. The Army also

A World Health Organization official speaks with a Salvation Army member about the condition of the local people and the supplies needed following the December 26, 2004, tsunami that devastated the island of Sumatra in Indonesia. (U.S. Navy) benefits from the support of many generous donors and friends, including a number who serve on advisory boards. Internationally, there were 16,910 active officers, 9,122 retired officers, 1,109,249 senior soldiers, 181,738 adherents, and 376,905 junior soldiers as of January 1, 2008.

Administratively, the Salvation Army is divided into more than 50 territories and commands, each led by a territorial commander, or officer commanding. Territories are divided into divisions, with a divisional commander leading a team of administrative staff. Each division includes a number of corps and other Salvation Army centers, each with its own commanding officers or managers. Officers from Britain pioneered the Army's work in many countries during the early years, but the aim has always been to develop local leadership and membership; indigenous leaders are now taking increased responsibility in their own countries. The considerable movement of officers between territories is a vital factor in maintaining the Army's internationalism.

The corps is the local Salvation Army center, established both to disseminate the Army's Christian teachings and to serve the needs of the local community. There are currently 14,869 corps throughout the world, where a variety of people meet for worship, fellowship, musical activities, and other events. The corps program will also usually include community activities such as lunch clubs, parent and toddler groups, and advice and counseling services. All are welcome at Salvation Army meetings, which are characterized by lively singing and enthusiastic participation, including spontaneous personal Christian witness and extempore prayer.

Unlike most other Christian denominations, the Salvation Army does not use the sacraments in its worship, not because of opposition to the sacraments, but because Salvationists believe that the sacraments are not essential to becoming a Christian, and that it is possible to live a holy life and receive the grace of God without the use of physical signs and symbols. Salvationists accept a disciplined and compassionate life of high moral standards that include abstinence from alcohol and tobacco. From its earliest days, the Army has accorded equal opportunities to women, every rank and service being open to them. From childhood, young people are encouraged to love and serve God.

Raised as an evangelistic mission, the Salvation Army also spontaneously embarked on schemes to improve the social conditions of the poor, and it has established social service centers, hospitals, clinics, and schools in many parts of the world. Wherever the Army operates, facilities such as thrift stores, eventide homes, hostels, and children's homes have developed to meet local needs, as an expression of practical Christianity. The Army, with other agencies, is also involved widely in providing emergency relief wherever disasters occur, whether through famine, flooding, hurricanes, earthquakes, or war. The Salvation Army was for a time a member of the World Council of Churches but withdrew over the Council's involvement in various intense political issues.

Gordon Taylor

See also: Holiness Movement; Methodism; World Council of Churches.

References

- Coutts, Frederick. No Discharge in this War: A One Volume History of the Salvation Army. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1975.
- The Salvation Army Act of 1980*.
- The Salvation Army Year Book*. (Published annually.)
- Sandall, Robert Arch Wiggins, Frederick Coutts, and Henry Gariepy. History of the Salvation Army. 8 vols. London: Thomas Nelson/Hodder and Stoughton, 1949–2000.

Samantabhadhara's Birthday

Samantabhadhara (also known as the bodhisattva Universal Worthy or in Japan as Fugen-bosatsu and China as Puxian) is one of the primary bodhisattvas in the Mahayana tradition and appears as one of the prime characters in the Avatamsaka or Flower Garland (Adornment) Sutra, along with Guatama Buddha and Manjushri. Toward the end of the sutra, he makes the 10 vows common to the bodhisattva path: to worship and respect all Buddhas; to praise all the Buddhas; to make abundant offerings (that is, give generously); to repent of all karmic hindrances; to rejoice in others' merits and virtue; to request that the dharma wheel continue to be turned (that is, that teaching activity continue); to request the Buddhas to remain in the world; to follow the teachings of the Buddhas at all times; to accommodate and benefit all living beings; to constantly transfer all merits and virtues to benefit all beings.

From these vows, Samantabhadhara is often associated with dharma practice, most notably, the effort and focus required to follow one's religious obligations. He is often pictured seated on a white elephant with six tusks and is said to reside on Mount Emei in Sichuan Province, one of the four sacred mountains of Chinese Buddhism, and noted as its patron. Veneration of Samantabhadhara/Puxian dates to the third century CE, when Chinese monk Huichi built the Puxian Temple (now known as Wannian Temple) there. Then in 964 the Song Emperor Taizi (927–976) sent a large Buddhist mission of some 300 people under the leadership of a monk named Jiye to India. Upon their return, the emperor authorized Jiye to construct several temples on Mount Emei and to cast a bronze statue, some 62 tons in weight and 28 feet high, of Puxian. The statue now resides in the Wannian Temple.

Samantabhadhara has a special role in the groups of the Nichiren tradition who privilege the Lotus Sutra above all Buddhist writings. In the 28th chapter of the Lotus Sutra, he emerges as the protector of its disciples. He tells the Buddha, "if there is someone who accepts and upholds this sutra, I will guard and protect him, free him from decline and harm, see that he attains peace and tranquility, and make certain that no one can spy out and take advantage of his shortcomings.” He emphasizes this vow with another: “I now therefore employ my transcendental powers to guard and protect this sutra. And after the Thus Come One [the Buddha] has entered extinction, I will cause it to be widely propagated throughout Jambudvīpa [a continent surrounding the mythical mountain Sumeru] and will see that it never comes to an end.”

Statue of Samantabhadra on Mount Emei, China.
(Waveone/Dreamstime.com)

The Universal Worthy Sutra, seen by Nichiren Buddhists as an epilogue to the Lotus Sutra, describes Samantabhadra’s beneficence and power, how believers can meditate on him, and the benefit they gain from their meditations.

In the Chinese tradition Samantabhadra’s birthday is celebrated on the 21st day of the 2nd month, 2 days after Guan Yin’s birthday. Because of Samantabhadra’s association with Mount Emei, it is one focus of celebrations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhisattva; Mahayana Buddhism; Nichirenshu; Soka Gakkai International.

References

- Boheng, Wu, and Cai Zhuozhi. 100 Buddhas in Chinese Buddhism. Trans. by Mu Xin and Yan Zhi. Singapore: Asiapac Books, 1997.
- “Emei Shan.” Sacred Destinations. <http://www.sacred-destinations.com/china/emei-shan.htm>. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- The Flower Adornment Sutra*. http://www.cttbusa.org/avatamsaka/avatamsaka_contents.asp. Accessed May 15, 2009.
- The Seeker’s Glossary of Buddhism*. New York: Sutra Translation Committee of the United States and Canada, 1998.
- The Soka Gakkai Dictionary of Buddhism*. Tokyo: Soka Gakkai, 2002.
- Vessantara. Meeting the Buddhas: A Guide to Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric Deities. Birmingham, UK: Windhorse Publications, 1998.

Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches

The Samavesam of Telegu Baptists Churches is one of two large Baptist groupings in India, the country with more Baptists than any other, apart from the United States. American Baptists initiated work in South India in 1836, the first missionaries finally settling in Nellore in 1840. The first church, and for many years the only center of activity, was founded in Nellore in 1844. A second station was opened in Ongole by James E. Clough. It grew rapidly as a number of Madigas, an outcast group, affiliated with the mission. Then in 1876, following a local famine, almost 10,000 joined. As much as possible, Clough encouraged the converts to remain in their former social setting rather than, as occurred elsewhere, to form separate Christian communities. The church subsequently spread among the outcasts in the Telegu-speaking areas through the rest of the century.

Beginning in 1925, there was a measurable movement of caste Hindus into the church, notable in that the evangelists were outcasts. The church also built a strong educational program, providing primary education and technical training that offered a wide range of employment opportunities for the poorer element in Telegu society. Two important institutions for higher education, Madras Christian College and the Women's Christian College of Madras, were also supported, and the first seminary was opened in the 1870s. By 1920, seven hospitals had been built.

After World War II and India's independence, the Telegu mission began the transition to autonomy, a process that took some time and included a period of litigation over church property. Following the transition, the church has continued as an expanding body. In 2006, it reported 844,000 members in 1,214 congregations, approximately two-thirds of all Baptists in South India. The church has taken an ecumenical stance. It is a member of the World Council of Churches, the Baptist World Alliance, and a variety of regional and national ecumenical structures.

Samavesam of Telegu Baptist Churches
C.M.A. Compound, Nellore 524 003
Andhra Pradesh
India

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; World Council of Churches.

References

- Clough, John E. From Darkness to Light: A Story of the Telugu Awakening. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society, 1882.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Wardin, Albert W., ed. Baptists around the World. Nashville: Holman, 1995.

■ Samoa

The present state of Samoa (or Western Samoa) consists of those islands of the Samoan archipelago in the South Pacific west of the 171st meridian. Samoa is sandwiched between the nations of Tonga and the Tokelau Islands. The islands together have 1,137 square miles and a population of 217,000 (2008).

The Samoan islands were inhabited by Polynesians by at least 1000 BCE. They were first visited by Europeans (the Dutch) in 1722, but it was almost another century before Europeans began to settle in the islands in any number. After Germany occupied the islands in 1855, merchants concentrated on the lucrative copra business. However, both the British and the Americans continued to express claims for the land, and in 1899 the islands east of meridian 171 were given to the United States. In 1919, following World War I, New Zealand took control of Western Samoa.

After World War II, Western Samoa became a UN trusteeship. In 1962, following a plebiscite on the issue, independence was achieved and a constitutional monarchy in line with traditional social structures in Samoa was established in power. Throughout the 20th century there was significant European/Polynesian intermarriage in Samoa, and a recognizably new group, the Euronians, have become a measurable part of the population.

Christianity arrived in Samoa at a particularly propitious time, immediately following a popular revolt that had overthrown an unpopular autocratic ruler, Tamafaiga. The first missionary was a Samoan who had found Christianity while among the Methodists in Tonga in 1828. The first churches emerged from his preaching when he returned home. Then in 1830, John Williams, a missionary with the London Missionary Society (LMS), and a team of eight Tahitian teachers visited. The eight remained behind after Williams left. By 1835 there were some 2,000 Christians, and by 1837 some 13,000. By the end of the decade, the overwhelming majority of the islanders had identified with the church, and within a generation the traditional religion had all but disappeared.

In the process of the Christianization of Samoa, the Congregationalists of the LMS and the Methodists, without consulting the Samoans, agreed not to compete with each other in the area; the Methodists agreed to withdraw in favor of the LMS. The Samoans, however, rejected the decision, as the original work in the islands had been Methodist-related. The Samoan Methodists became an independent body. In 1855, the Australian Methodists became autonomous of the

A church in Samoa, where most citizens are Christians. (Martin Krause/Dreamstime.com)

British Methodists and re-established relationships with the Samoans. The Samoan work became first a district and then a conference in the Methodist Church of Australia. It became independent in 1964 as the Methodist Church in Samoa.

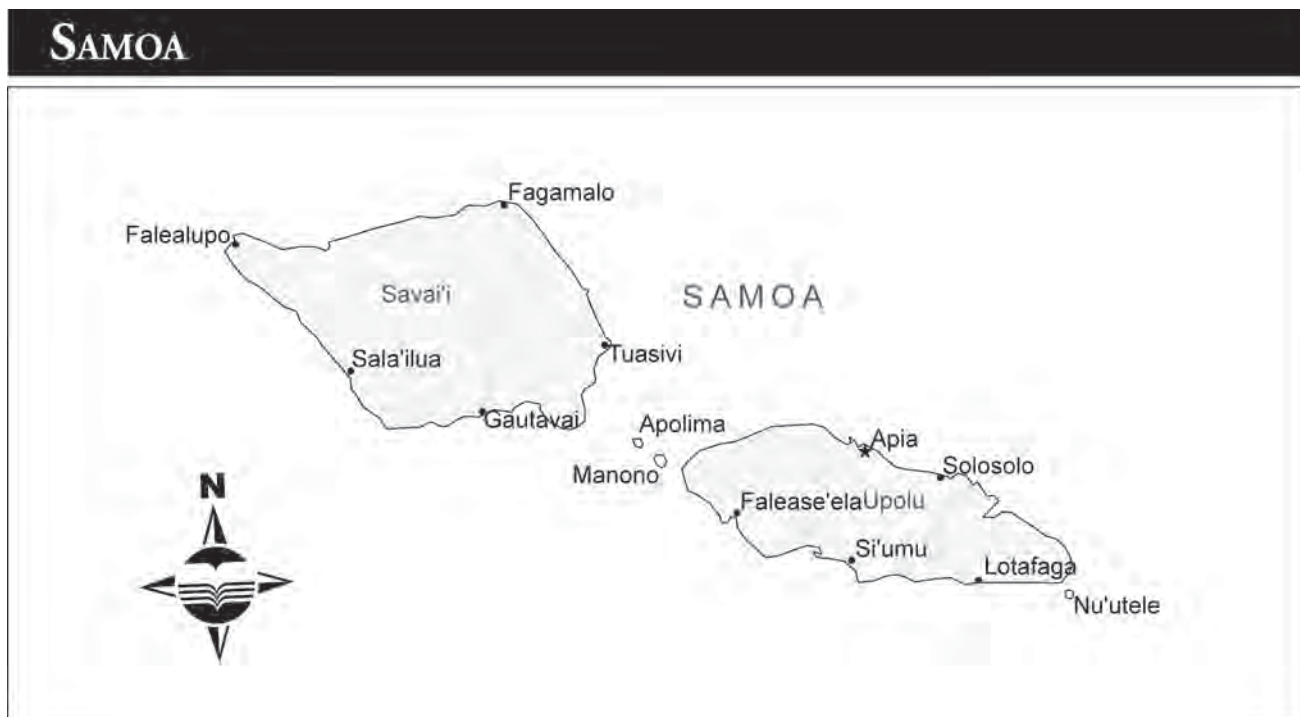

At the same time, the work of the LMS prospered and matured into the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa, which became independent of its missionary oversight in 1962. Originally this church covered both Western Samoa and American Samoa, but in 1980 the churches in American Samoa separated to form the Church of Tutuila and Manua, now the Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa. The LMS work also gave birth to an independent congregation in Apia that originated in an English-speaking seamen's church. Although it retains strong relations with the Congregational Christian Church, the small Apia Protestant Church remains an independent body.

These churches contain the majority of Christians in Samoa and form the backbone of the ecumenical community. They are members of the Samoa Council of Churches, and the two larger bodies are members of the World Council of Churches. Historically, both churches have been missionary churches and have supported Samoan missionaries across the South Pacific.

The Roman Catholic Church came to Samoa in 1845 from the Wallis and Futuna Islands. It grew steadily in the face of the Protestant establishment and by the 1960s claimed more than 20 percent of the population. A vicariate that included Samoa and the newer work in the Tokelau Islands was established in 1957. That vicariate was elevated to a diocese in 1966. The present diocese (of Samoa-Apia) was divided in 1982 by the separation of the work in American Samoa and again in 1992 of the work in the Tokelau Islands.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints arrived in Samoa in 1863 in the person of two missionaries, Kimo Pelia and Samuela Manoa. Their commission to begin work, however, had been made by an excommunicated leader, Walter Murray Gibson, who

Samoa

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	140,000	190,000	98.8	0.69	208,000	211,000
Protestants	82,500	114,000	59.4	0.85	123,000	125,000
Marginals	21,700	70,000	36.5	1.48	76,000	75,000
Roman Catholics	29,800	35,900	18.7	2.43	40,000	40,000
Baha'is	1,800	950	0.5	-0.18	1,000	1,000
Agnostics	0	1,300	0.7	3.88	2,000	3,000
Muslims	0	70	0.0	3.37	100	200
Atheists	0	20	0.0	0.00	50	100
Buddhists	0	20	0.0	0.00	40	60
Chinese folk	0	20	0.0	0.00	40	60
Total population	142,000	192,000	100.0	0.71	211,000	215,000

had built an independent mission in Hawaii. His church lasted into the 1880s, and Gibson went on to become the prime minister of Hawaii. When official missionaries of the church arrived in 1888, Manoa quickly brought the work under their care. The work grew slowly, being somewhat hindered during the years of German control (1899–1914), but it was aided by the publication of the Samoan edition of the Book of Mormon in 1903.

The Mormon work in Samoa was so successful that in 1977 the church announced plans to build a temple (to be used for weddings and other special ceremonies) in Apia. It was finished and dedicated in 1983. By the end of the 1990s the church claimed more than 50,000 members, approximately one-fourth of the country's population.

The other church to reach Samoa in the 19th century was the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which arrived in 1895. It too has experienced steady growth. The Samoa mission was formally organized in 1921 and now exists as part of the Central Pacific Union Mission.

Pentecostalism entered the islands in 1928 through missionaries from the Assemblies of God. It was subsequently joined by the United Pentecostal Church International (a Oneness body), the Church of God of Prophecy, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), and two indigenous churches, the Makisua Church and the Samoan Full Gospel Church. The Church of the Nazarene, the Christian Brethren, and the Jehovah’s Witnesses are also present. Anglicans are represented by several parishes now part of the Diocese of Polynesia of the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia.

The Baha’i Faith, the only major non-Christian community on the island, received a significant boost in 1973 when the king of Samoa announced his conversion. Subsequently, Apia became the location of the world’s seventh Baha’i temple.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Baha’i Faith; Christian Brethren; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Nazarene; Congregational Christian Church in Samoa; Congregational Christian Church of American Samoa; Jehovah’s Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Methodist Church in Samoa; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Pentecostal Church International; World Council of Churches.

References

Franco, R. W. “The History, Role, and Function of the Contemporary Catholic Church in Western Samoa.” M.A. thesis, California State University, 1976.

Herman, Bro, and C. Stubel, eds. Tala O Le Vavau: The Myths, Legends, and Customs of Old Samoa. Auckland, NZ: Polynesian Press, 1989.

Setu, F. “The Ministry in the Making: A History of the Emergence of the Ministry of the Church in Samoa, 1830–1900.” Th.M. thesis, Pacific Theological College, 1988.

Tuimauluga, L. “The Ministry of the Congregational Christian Church in Samoa in a fa’a-Samoa (Samoan Custom) Framework.” B.D. thesis, Pacific Theological Seminary, 1977.

■ San Marino

San Marino is a republic organized in 1866, as the process of Italian unification was rapidly moving forward. According to local mythology, San Marino had existed as an entity since the fourth century CE and is named for a third-century brick mason who moved onto Mount Titano after helping rebuild the walls of Rimini. He later became known as a man of prayer and was canonized. The territory named for him was formally recognized as a separated nation by the pope in 1831. Today it is the smallest republican state in the

San Marino

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	18,400	28,900	91.9	2.25	29,700	28,200
Roman Catholics	18,200	27,900	88.5	2.28	28,500	26,800
Marginals	30	300	1.0	0.00	500	800
Agnostics	500	1,700	5.4	3.39	2,200	2,800
Atheists	200	550	1.7	2.34	700	900
Baha’is	70	300	1.0	2.34	500	700
Muslims	0	10	0.0	3.71	30	60
Total population	19,200	31,500	100.0	2.32	33,100	32,700

SAN MARINO

world, being only 23.6 square miles in area, with a population of 30,000 (2008). It is completely surrounded by Italy and located on Mount Titano, above the Adriatic port city of Rimini. It became well known in the mid-20th century for its elegant postage stamps, which became prized items in collections worldwide.

San Marino is located at the border of two Italian provinces, Romana and Marca, and its Roman Catholic churches are divided between the two dioceses of Rimini and Montefeltro. Roman Catholicism dates to the fifth century, when a Christian hermitage was erected on what is now San Marino.

The only visible dissent from the Roman Catholic Church in San Marino are a small gathering of Jehovah's Witnesses that emerged in the mid-1960s and a single spiritual assembly of the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church.

La Guaita, the main fort built to guard the ancient city-state of San Marino. (Corel)

References

- Eccardt, Thomas M. Secrets of the Seven Smallest States of Europe: Andorra, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, and Vatican City. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2005.
- Leckey, Colin. Dots on the Map. London: Grosvenor House Publishing, 2006.
- Rossi, G., ed. A Short History of San Marino. San Marino: C. N. Packett, 1979. <http://www.sanmarinosite.com>.

Sanbo Kyodan

The Sanbo Kyodan (Fellowship of the Three Treasures), an international Zen Buddhist organization, was founded on the teachings of Harada Dai'un Sogaku Roshi (1871–1961). Harada did not teach in the traditional Soto Zen style in which he had been ordained as a priest and authorized as a Zen master. He taught both Soto and Rinzai meditation techniques (having also received transmission in the Rinzai tradition); he treated monastics and lay practitioners as equals; and he developed introductory talks for novice monks, rather than leaving them devoid of verbal instruction, as was the way in Soto Zen.

In 1954, Harada's successor, Yasutani Haku'un Ryoko Roshi (1885–1973), formally separated from the Soto lineage in which he had been ordained and founded a new organization, the Sanbo Kyodan, based on Harada's teachings. The Sanbo Kyodan is considered an independent lay stream of Soto Zen that incorporates aspects of Rinzai Zen. Having established the Sanbo Kyodan in Japan, Yasutani initiated its spread internationally.

Yasutani's successor, Yamada Koun Zenshin Roshi (1907–1989), came to lead the Sanbo Kyodan in 1973. He continued to internationalize the organization, and differentiated the Sanbo Kyodan from the majority of Japanese Zen organizations by dissolving distinctions between monastic and lay practitioners; emphasizing the social dimension of human existence; and continuing to break the traditional sectarian barriers that separated Buddhists and Christians. By the end of Yamada's life, approximately one-quarter of the participants at his sesshins were Christians. Kubota Akira Ji'un-ken Roshi (b. 1932) succeeded Yamada as head of the Sanbo Kyodan in 1989.

The majority of Sanbo Kyodan adherents practice the Rinzai Zen meditation method of koan practice, although some practice the Soto Zen meditation technique of shikantaza (just sitting). A range of activities are available at Sanbo Kyodan centers, including group zazen (sitting meditation) periods totaling two hours, half- or full-day periods of Zen practice on weekends, and week-long meditation retreats (sesshins). The student-teacher relationship is essential to practice, and private meetings of the student and the Zen master, called dokusan, occur regularly.

At least 40 people have been authorized as Zen masters in the Sanbo Kyodan lineage, most of whom are not Japanese. Robert Aitken, founder of the Diamond Sangha, is one of the best known. Sanbo Kyodan Zen masters are not necessarily Buddhists, and they include ordained members of other religious traditions.

Sanbo Kyodan has more than 40 affiliated centers in Japan, India, the Philippines, Singapore, Australia, Canada, the United States, England, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Spain, and Switzerland. The Sanbo Kyodan has more than 2,500 registered followers in Japan and approximately 3,000 in other countries.

The Secretariat of the Sanbo-Kyodan Society
The Center for Health Care and Public Concern
Kudan-minami 4-8-32
Chiyoda-ku, Tokyo 102-8288
Japan
www.sanbo3a@mbp.nifty.com

Michelle Barker

See also: Diamond Sangha; Meditation; Zen Buddhism.

Reference

Ciolek, T. Mathew. "Harada-Yasutani School of Zen Buddhism." <http://www.ciolek.com/WWWVLPages/ZenPages/HaradaYasutani.html>. Accessed March 15, 2009.

Sanchi

Sanchi is a small town in central India, near the city of Vidisha in the state of Madhya Pradesh. It is a unique Buddhist site, which though unrelated to an event in either Buddha's life or Buddhist history, became possibly the best preserved center of Buddhist architecture in the country. The village was seemingly selected by the Emperor Ashoka (273–236 BCE) as the ideal site to place a large Buddhist monastery. It was a quiet place suitable for meditation, but close enough to the city of Vidisha, which could support the begging of the monks.

Along with the monastery, Ashoka erected a giant stupa in which he placed some of the relics of the Buddha he had recovered. He also erected a monolithic pillar and seven additional stupas on the Sanchi hilltop. Over the next 150 years, the monastic community would flourish and several dozen additional stupas and religious structures were added to the growing complex. A century after Ashoka, a ruler named Pushyamitra (184–148 BCE), known for his hostility to Buddhism, emerged. Speculation centered upon him as the instigator of the large-scale destruction the stupa undertaken at this time. After his rule ended, the stupa was reconstructed, possibly by his successor, Agnimitra. The stupa was expanded and the dome flattened near the top. The dome now rested on a high circular drum that could be accessed via a double staircase. Access to the dome made it an excellent object for circumambulation, the favored activity relative to a stupa. A second pathway for circling the stupa was created at the foot of the stupa. At a later date, four gateways, each facing one of the cardinal directions were added.

Buddhism declined dramatically in India following the invasion of Muslim forces in the 12th century.

Buddhist stupa on a hill in Sanchi, India. (iStockPhoto.com)

The monastery was abandoned and the site fell into disrepair. Only in 1818 was interest renewed, following its rediscovery by a British officer who wrote a description of it. Unfortunately, the initial reactions to the report were a series of visits by would-be archaeologists and treasure hunters who caused much destruction. Finally in 1881 restoration began, culminating in the efforts of Sir John Marshall (1876–1958), who headed the Archaeological Survey of India for many years (1902–1928).

Sanchi was listed as an UNESCO World Heritage Site in 1989.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ashoka; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Monasticism; Relics.

References

Dhavalikar, M. K. Sanchi. Monumental Legacy Series. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Marshall, John. A Guide to Sanchi. Calcutta: Superintendent, Government Printing, 1918.

Mitra, Devala. Sanchi. Delhi: Director General, Archaeological Survey of India, 1978.

Sant Mat

See Radhasoami; Sikhism/Sant Mat.

Sant Nirankari Mission

The Sant Nirankari Mandel (or Mission) was founded in 1929 by Baba Buta Singh Ji (1873–1943), who was raised as a Sikh in the Punjab and as a young man found himself on a quest to know God. He also developed a talent for reciting Gurbani (the holy verses from the Adi Granth, the Sikh holy book). His search led him to an encounter with Bhai Sahib Kahan Singh Ji, who taught him a secret of receiving Brahm Gyan, or God Knowledge. Subsequently, Buta Singh began sharing the secret with whosoever showed an interest, the result being that the Sant Nirankari Mission was founded in May 1929. Joining Buta Singh in this effort was Baba Avtar Singh Ji (1900–1969), who would later succeed him as the organization's guru (teacher)/leader.

After receiving knowledge in a manner that remains confidential among members, they are taught to remember God at all times through repeating “Ik Tu Hi Nirankar” (“Thou Formless One”), from which practice the group receives its name. They also are encouraged to follow five principles: (1) since all assets belong to God, one should not feel proud of their possessions; (2) one should not take pride in one's caste, creed, race, faith, or other similar distinctions, and not hate others on that account; (3) one should not look down on others because of their mode of dress, diet, or living; (4) one should not renounce the worldly life to become a recluse or ascetic; (5) one should not divulge the divine knowledge bestowed by the satguru to others without his permission; at the same time, one should not take pride in being enlightened.

The orientation toward the satguru who imparts knowledge relates the Nirankaris to the Radhasoami Sant Mat tradition, which also differs from orthodox Sikhs, who no longer have a living guru and no confidential teachings. Baba Avtar Singh Ji was succeeded by Baba Gurbachan Singh Ji (1930–1980) and the present satguru, Baba Hardev Singh Ji Maharaj (b. 1954). During the 1970s the Nirankaris came into open conflict with the Sikh community, especially those elements who were working for the separation of the Punjab from India. Violent clashes included the attack upon Nirankaris at their worship center, the Baisakhi Samagam, in Amritsar in 1978. When police tried to quell the violence, they opened fire and 18 people were killed. Two years later, Gurbachan Singh was assassinated.

Baba Hardev Singh Ji Maharaj succeeded his father as the new satguru. His leadership has been marked by a number of tours to Nirankari centers across India and around the world. The Sant Nirankari Mandel has its headquarters in Delhi. It established itself there soon after the country became independent, a fact that led to some criticism by the larger Sikh community in the Punjab. There are more than 100 branches of the mission outside India, in 27 countries worldwide (2009).

Sant Nirankari Colony

Delhi-110 009

India

<http://www.nirankari.org>

<http://www.nirankari.net>

<http://www.nirankari.com>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Sikhism/Sant Mat.

References

- Chugh, J. S. Fifty Years of Spiritual Bliss: Commemorative Souvenir on the Golden Jubilee Nirankari Sant Samagam, November 6–10, 1997. Delhi: Sant Nirankari Mandal, 1997.
- Joshi, Nirmal, and Bhupender Bekal, eds. Salvation Tours (1995–96). Delhi: Sant Nirankari Mandal, 1997.

Santeria

Santeria is the common name given to West African, especially Yoruban, religion as it manifested among African residents forcefully brought to the Spanish-controlled islands of the Caribbean during the 18th and 19th centuries. African religion survived in part by adopting a Roman Catholic overlay. Its name derived from the identification of various African deities, the Orishas, with Catholic saints. Practitioners thought of their faith as the Reign of the Orishas (Regla de Ocha). White people, seeing what they considered an undue emphasis on and devotion to the saints, called the religion Santeria. Santeria is also known as La Regla Lucumí (from Lucum, the Yoruba language as it is spoken in Cuba and the United States).

Among the Yoruban and related peoples, the pantheon of divinities is headed by Olorun, the High God. As he is a somewhat remote deity, more attention is directed to the Orisha, who are seen as the creators of the Earth and responsible for planting human life here.

A Santeria priest, or babalawo, ministers to a follower in Cuba. (Francoise de Mulder/Corbis)

Among the Orisha are Ogun, the god of metals, and Esu, generally associated with divination. In addition, some ancestors have attained popular status as divine beings, such as Sango (or Chango), and are popularly thought of as identical with the Orisha. In the Santeria system, Sango was identified as Saint Barbara, Babalzá Ayi became Saint Lazarus, and Elegua or Elegba became Saint Anthony (the identification being based upon realms of human life with which the saint was associated). The Orisha are seen as sources of power; they are often approached in ceremonies in which people become possessed with the deity, and their spoken words are seen as communications from that particular deity.

Santeria operated as a clandestine religion during the slave era, and only in the last half of the 20th century did it publicly claim the primacy of its African roots. (It was additionally suppressed during the first decades of the Castro regime in Cuba, though it enjoyed a relaxation of restrictions on religion in the 1990s.) At the same time, while affirming its African heritage, it has retained elements of popular Roman Catholic piety, most noticeably the burning of candles with the saints' pictures on personal altars.

Leadership in Santeria is decentralized. Male leaders (priests) are known as santeros (or babalochas), and females (priestesses) as santeras (or iyalochas). There are no schools or seminaries, training being conducted on a tutorial system with a knowledgeable satero/santera. Prior to initiation into the priesthood, individuals enter a period of solitude.

Through the 20th century, with the movement of West Indians to North America, Santeria appeared in many urban centers—its presence being visible in the many botanicas, stores that sell the religious supplies used in the practice of the religion that can be found in Spanish-speaking communities. Also, in North America, in the climate of religious freedom and pluralism, more public centers of the Orisha faith have become public. Possibly the most visible American Santeria center is the Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, which became the subject of a 1993 Supreme Court case over the church's practice of animal sacrifice, which had been outlawed by the city of Hialeah, a Miami suburb.

The African Theological Archministry, based in South Carolina, has become an important pilgrimage site for African Americans but has increasingly stripped itself of its Santeria past and emerged as a Yoruban religious outpost.

The number of followers of Santeria is unknown, its semi-secret nature, its decentralized organization, and the complex way it mixes with Roman Catholicism making it difficult to make any estimation. It has its strongest centers in Puerto Rico and Cuba, but has a significant following in the United States, especially in Miami, New York City, and Southern California. While it undoubtedly has tens of thousands of adherents in North America, estimates ranging as high as a million remain unsubstantiated. A similar practice is found in Brazil under the name Candomblé and in Haiti as Vodou.

Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye
PO Box 22627
Hialeah, FL 33002
<http://www.church-of-the-lukumi.org/>

African Theological Archministry
Oyotunji African Yoruba Village
Box 51
Shelton, SC 29941
<http://www.cultural-expressions.com/oyotunji/default.htm>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Traditional Religions; Candomblé; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Roman Catholic Church; Saints; Vodou.

References

- Adefunmi I, Oba Efuntola Oseijeman Adelabu.
Olorisha: A Guidebook into Yoruba Religion.
Shelton, SC: privately printed, 1982.
- Canizares, Paul. Cuban Santeria: Walking with the Night. Rochester, VT: Destiny Books, 1999.
- De la Torre, Miquel A. Santeria: The Beliefs and Rituals of a Growing Religion in America. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2004.
- Gonzalez-Wippler, Migene. Santeria. New York: Julian, 1973.
- Murphy, Joseph. Santeria: African Spirits in America. Boston: Beacon, 1992.

Santi Asoka, The

The Santi Asoka is a new “unorthodox” Buddhist movement in Thailand initiated by Bodhirak (b. 1934), a Buddhist monk. It reacts against some wayward practices of Thai Buddhist monks and laity. Also, it attempts to preserve the Thai traditional ways of life and authentic Buddhist life. Vegetarianism is strongly promoted. The establishment of the Santi Asoka is a significant phenomenon of the anti-Sangha movement in Thailand (which includes, for example, the rejection of the Sangha Act of Thailand and the acceptance of ordination of female monks).

The Santi Asoka was founded in 1973. Bodhirak, formerly Rak Rakpong, was a television entertainer and songwriter with some interest in magic and supernaturalism. After his ordination as a Thammayut monk in Wat Asokaram in 1970, he abandoned his supernaturalistic beliefs and practices and received the ordained name of Phra Bodkirak (The Preserver of Enlightenment). His strict observance of the Buddha’s doctrine attracted a considerable number of faithful Buddhists who began congregating in Wat Asokaram, his monastic residence. There, he formed a religious group called the Asoka. Since the group was composed of both Thammayut and Mahanikai Buddhists, the abbot was not allowed to stay permanently in the monastery. Bodhirak then had to move to Wat Nongkratum, a Mahanikai monastery, where he was ordained as a Mahanikai monk in 1973. Because of their controversial unorthodoxy in beliefs and practices, their religious propagation was obstructed by the established Thai Buddhist Sangha and self-styled orthodox Buddhists. Bodhirak declared his resignation from the authoritative power of the Sangha administration on August 8, 1975. Bodhirak’s challenge to the Sangha led to his disrobing and the end of his monastic status in 1989.

The Santi Asokan Buddhists strictly follow their way of life, which includes adherence to Buddhist precepts and discipline as (they believe) originally taught by the Buddha; they live in the Asokan commune in order to help one another to attain their final goal (the end of suffering, or nirvana). The Santi Asokan Buddhists earn their living through sufficient economy and sustainable development. They make and sell many name brand products, including liquid soap, shampoo, and herbal medicine.

The Asokans are differentiated into ascetics (ordained people) and laypeople. Ascetics are composed of the male ordained, the female ordained, and novices. In other words, Asokan ascetics are composed of “monks,” “female monks” or nuns, and novices both male and female. The process of ordination is more difficult to follow and to pass than that of other Thai monastic lineages. The Asokan ascetics, unlike other Thai monks and novices, do not shave their eyebrows and follow their own monastic rules and practices. Generally, the Asokans live in strict discipline based on chastity, poverty, and spiritual purification. They are strict vegetarians and abstain from sexual lives.

Their minimal requirement is to adhere to the Buddhist Five Precepts and to work hard in their self-reliant commune.

Formerly, the Asokans rejected the worship of the Buddha images and other traditional symbols of Buddhism. However, since 2004, Bodhirak, their leader, has supported the worship of the Buddhist image constructed in their hermitage and the veneration of the Buddha relics brought by some faithful followers. At present, the Asokans who assert the participation in all socio-political movements have their own political party and openly join in many political movements against the Thai government.

The Asokan community has been the subject of considerable controversy. The Asokans deny the authority and the supremacy of the Sangha Supreme Council, which charged that Bodhirak had transgressed the law by forming hermitages and giving ordination to his disciples. Thus, Bodhirak is accused by other “orthodox” Thai Buddhists of having formed his own teachings and interpretations of Buddha’s words regardless of normative meanings of the Theravada canon (the Tripitaka)

The leadership and organization of the Santi Asoka are in the sole hands of Bodhirak. Membership numbers are unknown. The Asokan headquarters is in Bangkok, and there are five additional branches in the country’s other provinces. There is no center abroad.

Santi Asoka Monastery
67/30 Soi Tiam Porn
Nawamin Rd., Klong Koom
Bung Koom, Bangkok 10240
Thailand

Pataraporn Sirikanchana

See also: Asceticism; Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Bodhirak. Bodhirak and Religion: The Problem of the Buddhist Messiah (Phee Boon). Bangkok: Samakkee Sarn, n.d.
- Payutto, P. A. For the Understanding of Bodhirak’s Problems. Bangkok: Buddha Dharma Foundation, n.d.
- Sirikanchana, Pataraporn. “Santi Asoka: Its Rise and Religious Roles in Thai Society.” Journal of Buddhist Studies, Chulalongkorn University 8, no.1 (January–April 2001): 6–68.

Swearer, Donald K. The Buddhist World of Southeast Asia. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Santo Daime

Santo Daime, one branch of the Ayahuasca movement, is a new religion founded in Brazil at the beginning of the 20th century after Raimundo Irineu Serra was introduced to its use. Ayahuasca is a powerful hallucinogenic brew used by many Native peoples across South America. Over the course of the 20th century it became an integral element in various Brazilian religious movements that, toward the end of the century, spread to North America and Europe. Ayahuasca (or vine of the dead) is also known as yage (Colombia) and caapi (Brazil). It is prepared from the vine Banisteriopsis caapi by boiling vine segments with various other plants. The resulting drink contains several hallucinogenics, including harmilne and/or N,N-dimethyltyptamine. Archaeological evidence strongly suggests that ayahuasca has been used for centuries. It became known outside Brazil from the description of the experiences of Manuel Villavicencio, published in 1858. Adding to Villavicencio’s account were the notes of British explorer Richard Spruce, published in 1908. Then in the 1960s, ayahuasca was rediscovered in the context of the wave of interest in LSD and other hallucinogenics throughout the West. In his 1968 paper “The Sound of Rushing Water,” Michael Harder, for example, described his experience with the drug in Ecuador in 1961.

South Americans utilize ayahuasca as a healing substance. They gather, prepare, and consume it with proper ceremony and reverence. In the Upper Amazon, Banisteriopsis caapi is mixed with another plant, Psychotria viridis, and boiled for a full day and then stored until needed. The drug is believed to connect the individual with the force that ties all things together.

At the beginning of the 20th century, while under the influence of ayahuasca, Raimundo Irineu Serra had a vision of the Virgin Mary who, as Our Lady of Conceição, gave him many new teachings. Out of this experience, he constructed a new religion, Santo Daime, the Religion of the Rainforest. Slowly growing at first, following World War II, it spread across Brazil and then overseas as members have migrated. The appearance of ayahuasca as a sacramental substance by an ethnic religious community has presented legal authorities with a spectrum of problems. At the beginning of 2000, members were arrested in Spain, and the movement has begun an effort to have the drug legalized in the United States and several countries of Western Europe.

Soon after his initial encounter with the Virgin, Mestre Irineu (as the founder is known today) received the text of several new songs that now make up a hymnal for the movement. He also received instructions for three dances, with very simple steps, which were believed to facilitate the flow of divine energy. Additional hymns have been received through the years. As the movement spread to other countries, members received new hymns in languages other than Portuguese, and the movement has accepted these for use during worship.

Santo Daime rituals begin with the separation of the men and women into two groups in the meeting hall. Two lines are formed and the ayahuasca received. As the hymns are sung, some begin dancing. Different songs have different purposes (healing, communicating with spirits, celebration). Additional sips of the sacramental substance are handed out every few hours, and the ceremony may last as long as 8 to 12 hours.

Mestre Irineu was succeeded by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo, who was in turn succeeded by his son Padrinho Alfredo Gregóno de Melo, the present international leader. A second, smaller group is headed by Padrinho Alfredo's brother, Paulo Roberto de Melo. The larger group was incorporated in Brazil in 1974 as the Eclectic Center of the Universal Flowing Light, the term "Eclectic" referring to the mixing of Christian and traditional beliefs within the church. It is headed by a Spiritual Council and is headquartered at Céu do Mapiá, a community created by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo. Céu do Mapiá is located in the jungle on the Purus River, a tributary of the Amazon. The branch of the movement led by Paulo Roberto has established centers in Hawaii, California, and the Netherlands.

During the 1990s, the use of ayahuasca spread through North America and Europe and subsequent arrests by drug enforcement officials led to a variety of court cases. In 2006, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in favor of União do Vegetal, one branch of the larger movement based upon a 1990 decision that had made an exception for the use of psychedelic substances in religious contexts. Earlier, in 2001, a Dutch court had ruled in favor of the Santo Daime Church, saying that it was a bone fide religion and that its use of ayahuasca was not a threat to the public. That same year, Portugal restructured its drug laws and decriminalized most psychedelic substances, including ayahuasca.

Centro Eclético da Fluente Luz Universal Virgem da Luz
c/o Ricardo Tadeu dos Santos
Rua Arniando Santos
240-Recrejo dos Bandeirantes, 22.790-330
Rio de Janeiro
Brazil
<http://www.santodaime.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions.

References

- Alverga, Alex Polari de. Forest of Vision: Ayahuasca, Amazonian Spirituality, and the Santo Daime Tradition. Rochester, VT: Park Street Press, 1999.
- Dawson, Andrew. New Era—New Religions: Religious Transformation in Contemporary Brazil. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2007.
- Metzner, Ralph, ed. Ayahuasca: Human Consciousness and the Spirits of Nature. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1999.

■ São Tomé and Príncipe

São Tomé and Príncipe are two islands off Africa in the Atlantic Ocean south of Nigeria. After more than 500 years as a colony of Portugal, they became an independent republic in 1975. Together they have 372 square miles of territory and a population of 206,000 (2008).

São Tomé, Príncipe, and the neighboring islands were among the first colonized by the Portuguese in the 15th century. They had a fine port and were an ideal location for the establishment of a processing center where slaves could be brought from the coast of Africa and dispatched to various locations in the Americas.

The main cathedral in São Tomé, built in the 16th century during Portuguese colonial times. (Inna Moody/Dreamstime.com)

The islands are now inhabited by the Tongas, the original inhabitants found by the Portuguese, as well as other peoples who came to the island during the days of the slave trade or who arrived after the slave trade was abolished. Although most came from the nearby West African coast, a number derive from the people of the former Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique.

Although most Africans passed through São Tomé on their way to the Americas, some were brought to work the plantations that were created on the islands. After slavery was officially abolished in 1869, a system of indentured servitude was put in place, eventually leading to revolts and repressive actions by the government. The revolution in 1974 in Portugal set the stage for the independence of São Tomé and Príncipe the following year.

During the years of the slave trade and throughout the 1800s, members of numerous African peoples were brought to the islands; though the Roman Catholic Church was established on the islands in 1534, little attempt was made to convert them. At the beginning of the 20th century, most of the residents of African descent retained their traditional religion. However, intense evangelization efforts were made, and by the 1970s most signs of traditional African religions had disappeared.

In 1534, Pope Paul III (r. 1534–1549) created a diocese for São Tomé and the territory being explored and colonized along the African coast. It was originally attached to the ecclesiastical province of Funchal (Madeira) but later was attached as a suffragan diocese to more established dioceses. Since 1940 it has been attached to Luanda (Angola). The church spread quickly once it turned its attention to the Africans, and by the mid-1970s more than 90 percent of the total population (now some 112,000) had been baptized.

For many years, São Tomé served as the penal colony for Angola. In the 1930s an Angolan who had

São Tomé and Príncipe

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	71,600	158,000	95.7	1.67	203,000	273,000
Roman Catholics	62,700	140,000	84.9	1.74	181,000	239,000
Independents	2,000	12,800	7.8	2.01	19,000	29,000
Protestants	1,000	5,900	3.6	8.73	8,000	14,000
Baha'is	50	4,400	2.7	1.72	7,000	12,000
Agnostics	0	2,300	1.4	6.73	5,000	10,000
Ethnoreligionists	2,000	400	0.2	1.67	500	600
Muslims	0	70	0.0	1.73	100	200
Total population	73,600	165,000	100.0	1.72	216,000	296,000

SÃO TOMÉ AND PRÍNCIPE

São Tomé and Príncipe

been exiled to São Tomé, and who also happened to be a Protestant Christian, began a Protestant movement that became the Igreja Evangélica (Evangelical Church). He supplied the first scriptures and hymnbook for his converts by writing down the passages and hymns he had memorized. His effort was assisted by two African Christians sent from Angola, one by the Evangelical Alliance of Angola in 1957 and one by the Evangelical Church of Central Angola in 1960. Today, Protestantism is also represented by the Seventh-day Adventist Church, which arrived in 1938, and the Assemblies of God. There is also a small community of the Baha'i Faith on the islands.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Garfield, R. A History of Sao Tome Island, 1470–1655: The Key to Guinea. San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1992.
- Hodges, T., and M. Newitt. São Tomé and Príncipe: From Plantation Colony to Microstate. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1988.

Sapta Darma

Sapta Darma is one of a spectrum of new spiritual movements to arise in Indonesia in the 20th century. The founder of Sapta Darma (the seven teachings) was originally named Hardjosapuro. He lived in Pare, in East Java, and began to experience direct contact with God in December 1952. This came in the form of automatic movements, which became the basis for the spiritual practice. Particularly notable experiences continued for several years and included not only the movements he experienced physically but also reception of teachings (some of which appeared on the wall of his home), changes in his name, and finally of a name for the practice. His name changed first to Brahmono, then to Rodjopandito, and finally to Sri Gotama. Teachings continued to flow through Sri Gotama until his death in December 1964.

As the name of the group suggests, there are seven points to the central teaching; some of them are ethical imperatives, others are statements of ontological conviction. In Sapta Darma, however, focus is on spiritual practice rather than theory or philosophy. Practice in Sapta Darma is called sujud (Arabic: surrender). Members experience the same movements experienced spontaneously by the founder. Men sit cross-legged, women with feet tucked under them; all report experiencing an awakening of inner energy originating near the base of the spine. This then moves up the spine, leading to an automatic bow, until the forehead touches the floor.

Women wear a white headdress and robe similar to but not the same as those worn by Muslims. The resonances of Sapta Darma names, practice, and theory with Islamic and Indic teachings are not seen as an indication of influence from them. Followers emphasize that their founder did not receive inspiration from, or even know about, other religious teachings. Sapta Darma holds that its theory of talirasa (the rope of feeling) is original. It details the network of energy points in the body related to pathways of life energy and linked to practice of sujud.

Sapta Darma, almost alone among Javanese movements, has argued consistently that it ought to be acknowledged as a “religion.” During the Suharto era, that term was reserved for five “world religions.” From the 1970s until her death in 1996, Sri Pawenang, who led the Yogyakarta-based organization, was bolder than most Javanists in arguing for legitimacy of its practice. As a lawyer she was able to maintain her argument actively in contexts where others had capitulated. Sapta Darma has been prominent as one of the largest Javanese mystical organizations. It once claimed a membership of around 100,000. It has a stronger village following than most Javanist movements and is also exceptional for having attracted a strong ethnic Balinese following.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions.

References

- Hadiwijono, Harun. Man in the Present Javanese Mysticism. Baarn, the Netherlands: Bosch and Keuning N.V., 1967.
- Pawenang, Sri. Wewarah Sapta Darma. Yogyakarta, n.d.

Sarnath

Sarnath, a town in central west Bihar state, India, has joined Lumbini, Kusinagara, and Bodhgaya as one of the four important sites directly connected to the origins of Buddhism. Here, in around 528 BCE, Gautama Buddha (ca. 563–ca.483 BCE) gave his first presentation concerning what would become known as Buddhism. That initial sermon, entitled Dharmachakra-pravartana, or Turning of the Wheel of Law, focused on the way to end suffering and gain enlightenment, a very basic theme of Buddhist thought. Buddhism really began before Buddha arrived in Sarnath, when he found enlightenment at a place later called Bodhgaya (in central Bihar), as he meditated under a tree. It would be in Sarnath, however, that a following emerged. Many Buddhists consider Sarnath to be the birthplace of their faith. Sarnath is also called Deer Park, the name of the specific place where the first group of Buddhist monks gathered and initiated the sangha, the Buddhist monastic community. Sarnath is only a few miles from Benares (also known as Varanasi and Kashi), the Hindu holy city.

In the third century BCE, the Emperor Ashoka converted to Buddhism and subsequently threw his resources behind expanding the monastic life at Sarnath. The local community soon grew to include more than 1,000 monks, and would thrive for a millennium. It began its decline with the establishment of Muslim rule in the area, and it took only a few centuries for everything Buddhist to be destroyed and the sites lost to local memory.

The rediscovery of Sarnath followed the British launching archaeological work in the area in the late 19th century. Archaeologists initially uncovered a spectrum of old Buddhist sites. In the 20th century, the Mahabodhi Society, founded by Sri Lankan activist Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933), assumed control of the Buddhist ruins. At the beginning of the 1930s, the Society erected a new modern temple at Sarnath, the Mulagandhakuti Vihara, decorated with scenes of the Buddha's life. Its main attraction is a silver casket found in Punjab in 1913. An inscription dated to 79 CE claims that the casket holds relics of the Buddha. After being given to the Society in 1935, it was taken to Sarnath.

Sarnath is the deer park where Gautama Buddha first taught the dharma and where the Buddhist sangha came into existence through the enlightenment of Kondanna. (Yuliya Kryzhevskaya/Dreamstime.com)

As archaeological work in the area continued, the Dharmarajika Stupa built by Ashoka to hold some relics of the Buddha was identified, though the location of the casket that contained the relics was never discovered and no one knows if it still exists. A set of carvings on the stupa have survived and may be seen. The Nulghandhakuti Shrine, an elaborate building used by the Buddha for meditation, was also identified.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ashoka; Benares; Bodhi-Gaya; Kusinagara; Lumbini; Maha Bodhi Society; Monasticism; Pilgrimage; Relics; Temples—Buddhist.

References

- Majupuria, Trilok Chandra. Holy Places of Buddhism in Nepal and India: A Guide to Sacred Places in Buddha's Lands. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1987.
- Panabokke, Gunaratne. History of the Buddhist Sangha in India and Sri Lanka. Dalugama, Kelaniya, Sri Lanka: Postgraduate Institute of Pali and Buddhist Studies, University of Kelaniya, 1993.
- Tulku, Tarthang, ed. Holy Places of the Buddha. Vol. 9, Crystal Mirror. Berkeley, CA: Dharma Publishing, 1994.

Sarvodaya

Sarvodaya (the awakening of all), which celebrated its 50th anniversary in 2008, with its community empowerment programs that support millions of people in 11,600 villages, is undoubtedly the foremost lay Buddhist movement in Sri Lanka, with a strong and active program for the uplifting of human life both materially and spiritually combined with a proven record of strong commitment to nonviolence, service, and compassionate action. Although its Buddhist roots are explicit in both doctrine and practice, its outlook bears witness to the perspective of its founder and his philosophy of “active social engagement,” put into practice in rural Sri Lanka and transcending both ethnic and religious boundaries.

On December 7, 1958, the Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana movement was born, with a commitment to the idea that things can be changed for the better. Its single and unique practice was the implementation and the exercise of the idea of the “gift of labor” (sramadana). Sarvodaya began implementing its ideal with a two-week social work camp for schoolchildren held in an underdeveloped, neglected, untouchable Candala village named Kantoluva, Bingiriya; its goal was to alleviate poverty and social backwardness among the villagers. On January 1, 1958, Ahangamage Tudor Ariyaratne (b. 1931), the founder of Sarvodaya, had accepted the appointment as a teacher of biology and mathematics at Nalanda College, a prominent Buddhist school founded during the Buddhist revival of the late 19th century. The aim of the grade 10 students' work camp led by Ariyaratne was to provide an opportunity for urban youth to understand rural life and the problems in poor societies in order to enable the students as well as the villagers to see the importance of standing on their own feet.

Although Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) had used the term sarvodaya to mean the “welfare of all,” Ariyaratne reinterpreted it in Sri Lanka as the “awakening of all,” in the light of his own reading of the teachings of the Buddha. Ariyaratne believes that the four Sublime Abodes (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity) and the four Modes of Social Conduct (the absence of desire, hatred, fear, and delusion) taught by the Buddha can help the process of personality awakening. For Ariyaratne, Sarvodaya is an activity of “awakening all” from an individual perspective to a wholesome state that embraces all of humanity. This awakening process works on “spiritual, moral, cultural, social, economic, and political” levels.

One crucial term—sramadana—characterizes Sarvodaya's contribution to social development as a movement inspired by Buddhist ideas of social well-being. Sramadana is the selfless act of sharing one's labor with others. This is an act of charity that Sarvodaya broadly defines as “an act of sharing one’s time, thought, effort, and other resources with the community” for the sake of awakening oneself and others. Sarvodaya’s interest is in the inculcation of values inspired by Buddhist teachings and these are used as a vehicle for development and social mobility. Sarvodaya seeks to affirm the social dimensions of Buddhism and the way in which Buddhist teachings can be applied to daily contexts in community development settings. Sarvodaya has criticized materiality when the aggressive accumulation of wealth destroys the values of an unsophisticated rural community.

Within the last five decades, Sarvodaya’s contribution to community development is extensive: it built 4,300 village roads, constructed 8,000 wells and water systems, provided facilities for 373,322 people to have access to safe drinking water, installed 15,800 toilets, educated 135,000 children, established 7,600 pre-schools, trained 120,000 members of a youth peace brigade and 200,000 health workers, and is proud to have one million volunteers who are committed to pursue the community development projects.

The Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana Sangamaya has an American affiliate, Sarvodaya USA. That organization is dedicated to building a North American community that expresses the holistic community development vision and ideals of Sarvodaya.

In recent years, Sarvodaya has been increasingly attacked both in Sri Lanka and abroad for alleged implementation of urban, bourgeois, middle-class values and ideals among rural people. In the early 1990s, it faced severe political threats, to the point of extinction, from the Sri Lankan government of President Ranasinghe Premadasa (d. 1993). In the last few years, as a non-governmental organization (NGO) heavily dependent on foreign aid, its identity and integrity have been subject to serious criticism and debate.

Nevertheless, the objective of the Sarvodaya movement has been the generation of a “nonviolent revolution toward the creation of a Sarvodaya Social Order that will ensure the total awakening of human personalities.” Using Buddhist philosophical insights, the traditional values and aspirations of Sri Lankan culture, and Gandhian ideas, Ariyaratne was able to propose and develop a sustainable, nature-friendly alternative development strategy. In Sarvodaya’s five decades of village community development work, four values—truth, nonviolence, self-denial, and charity—dominate the scene and determine its success as a grassroots Buddhist movement.

Lanka Jatika Sarvodaya Sramadana Sangamaya
Damsak Mandira
98 Rawatawatta Rd.
Moratuwa
Sri Lanka
<http://www.sarvodayausa.org/>

Mahinda Deegalle

See also: Theravada Buddhism.

References

- Ariyaratne, A. T. Collected Works. 7 vols. Ratmalana, Sri Lanka: Sarvodaya Vishva Lekha, 1978–1999.
- Bond, George. Buddhism at Work: Community Development, Social Empowerment and the Sarvodaya Movement. Sterling, VA: Kumarian Press, 2006.
- Bond, George. “Sarvodaya’s Pursuit of Peace.” In Buddhism, Conflict and Violence in Modern Sri Lanka, edited by Mahinda Deegalle, 226–232. London and New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Gombrich, Richard F., and Gananath Obeyesekere. Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Perera, J., C. Marasinghe, and L. Jayasekera, eds. A People’s Movement under Siege. Moratuwa, Sri Lanka: Sarvodaya Book Publishing Services, 1992.

Satanism

Satanism refers to the worship of Satan, the Christian devil. While posed as an idea in the Middle Ages, when people accused of being witches were charged with worshipping the devil, self-avowed Satanists do not appear to have arisen prior to the time of Louis XIV. At that time, a group practicing the black Mass (a parody of the central act of worship of the Roman Catholic Church) and the ritual killing of infants was uncovered operating in Louis’s court. Satanism, when it has subsequently appeared, has manifested as an attack upon a dominant Christianity and the society it has supported.

Accounts of actual Satanism prior to the 1960s are quite rare. Satanists produced almost no literature, the 1891 volume La Bas by French Esotericist Joris Karl Huysmans (1848–1907) being notable by its uniqueness. Each new Satanist group came into existence without reference to prior groups, and each was unable to pass along Satanism to a second generation. Satanism differs from every other religious ideology in that the understanding of what Satanism is and what Satanists do was almost totally the product of the vivid imagination of Christian writers who had never met a Satanist and had had no direct encounter with or information about any actually existing Satanist group. The majority of Satanist groups were created by people who had decided to create something that conformed to a conception about which Christian writers had previously fantasized.

Through the mid-20th century, a variety of cases appeared in which small groups of teenagers assembled in informal Satanic groups, which subsequently became known when they were discovered breaking into churches to steal Communion wafers or vandalizing a graveyard. On occasion the mutilated body of a dog or cat was seen as the remains of a Satanic ritual. Very rarely, murders are tied to Satanism, in most cases Satanism being an excuse for murderous actions that would have been taken in any case.

The perception of Satanism changed significantly in 1968 when Anton Sandor LaVey (1930–1997) announced the formation of the Church of Satan. This unique organization became the subject of much media coverage and even attracted several celebrities. Interest in Satanism, both pro and con, was also stimulated by Rosemary's Baby, a 1968 movie about a Satanist cult, and the publication in 1971 of William Blatty's The Exorcist. The movie version of Blatty's book (1973) would set off a wave of interest in exorcism, and lead to a fresh set of Christian anti-Satanism texts.

Although various reporters projected exorbitant figures for membership in the Church of Satan, it never had more than a few thousand members, most of whom consisted of people who paid a modest membership fee and received the organization's periodical. By 1974, however, the core of the Church of Satan had been splintered by a schism among a number of the church's leaders, including Michael Aquino, LaVey's capable assistant. With the exception of the Temple of Set, founded by Aquino, most of the splinters survived only a short time, and interest in Satanism waned significantly.

A new wave of interest in Satanism emerged in the mid-1980s around two phenomena. First, several women, initially Michelle Smith and Loren Stafford, published books describing their reported lives as members of a Satanist group when teenagers. In each case they reported that they had forgotten their involvement and remembered their experience only later during counseling. Although both the Smith and Stafford cases would later be exposed as hoaxes, in a short time additional women came forth with similar stories. Second, a variety of cases appeared in which young children accused adults of having forced them to participate in Satanic rituals as members of ongoing Satanic cults, the most famous case involving multiple accusations directed at the teachers/administrators of a day school in Manhattan Beach, California. The McMartin case lasted for three years and resulted in acquittals of the accused. The turning point in the case came with revelation of the manner in which many of the children had been coached to produce negative testimony.

The second wave of interest in Satanism supplied by the forgotten memory cases and accusations rose as literally hundreds of accusations of Satanic activity were registered during the late 1980s and early 1990s. Government officials and psychological counselors came forward with words of support. The interest passed, however, as a variety of hoaxes and false accusations were uncovered, as the forgotten memories were understood to be cases of what psychologists now call "false memory syndrome," and as no Satanic activity was uncovered that could have been responsible for so many accounts. As in the past, the stories of Satanism in the 1980s proved to be the product of vivid imaginations. While some continue to suggest that a large Satanic movement still exists in North America with ties to Europe, they have been unable to bring forth convincing evidence to back their claims.

What remains of Satanic activity is the spectrum of small groups that have grown out of the Church of Satan and sporadic, short-lived teenage experiments with the dark side of occultism and malevolent magic. On rare occasions, those experiments, especially when carried out with the use of mood-altering drugs, has led to the death of one or more of the participants.

It should be noted that members of modern neo-Pagan and Wicca groups, because they often describe themselves as witches, are frequently labeled Satanists. This connection between witchcraft and Satanism was made in Europe in the Middle Ages by Christian leaders, many of whom were connected with the Inquisition. From Catholic leaders, the idea passed to Protestant ministers and from them into the popular consciousness. Contemporary neo-Pagans, who have a positive spirituality built around a oneness with nature, have attempted to dispel any association between themselves and Satanism.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Satan; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Gilmore, Peter H. The Satanic Scriptures. Baltimore: Scapegoat Publishing, 2007.
- Kelly, Henry Ansgar. The Devil, Demonology, and Witchcraft. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974.
- Lanning, Kenneth V. Investigator's Guide to Allegations of "Ritual" Child Abuse. Quantico, VA: Behavioral Science Unit, National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, Federal Bureau of Investigation, FBI Academy, 1992. <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/4979/lanning.9201.html>.
- Lewis, James R., and Jesper Aagaard Petersen, eds. The Encyclopedic Sourcebook of Satanism. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Press, 2006.
- Lyon, Arthur. Satan Wants You. London: Rupert Hart-Davies, 1970.
- Nathan, Debbie, and Michael Snedeker. Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of a Modern American Witch Hunt. New York: Basic Books, 1995.
- Richardson, James T., Joel Best, and David G. Bromley, eds. The Satanism Scare. Hawthorne, NY: Aldine de Gruyter, 1991.

Smith, Michelle, and Lawrence Pazner. Michele Remembers. New York: Congdon and Lattes, 1980.

Stratford, Lauren. Satan's Underground. Eugene, OR: Harvest House, 1988.

Sathya Sai Baba Movement

The Sathya Sai Baba movement originated in India but is represented today in 114 countries. The movement has held particular appeal for members of the cosmopolitan elite, who have contributed to its wealth and strength. The nature of this core membership means that the movement constitutes an influential, politically well-connected global network.

According to the organization's website (<http://www.sathyasai.org/>) there are today more than 1,200 Sathya Sai Baba centers throughout the world. Although the movement is focused upon the Indian guru, Sathya Sai Baba, it claims to be ecumenical in character. Membership of the organization, the website explains, is based upon "a common bond—love of God—and a common goal—spiritual growth." The activities of the centers include study of Sathya Sai Baba's teachings and literature from all world religions, group devotional singing, meditation, and community service. Although the centers charge no official membership fees, many members in fact make donations to their Sathya Sai Baba Centre.

The spiritual leader of the movement, Sathya Sai Baba, is a living Indian guru who was born to a non-Brahmin kshatriya family on November 25, 1926, in the village of Puttaparthi in Andhra Pradesh, India. He was named Sathya Narayana Raju. As a child he became renowned for materializing sweets for his friends and for locating things they had lost. At the age of 14 he had a seizure that may have been related to a scorpion bite. Shortly after it he called his family and neighbors to his bedside and declared that he was Sai Baba. In so doing he was claiming to be the reincarnation of the miracle-working Maharashtran saint Sai Baba of Shirdi (ca. 1856–1918). The new Sai Baba, Sathya Sai Baba (Sai Baba of Truth), now claimed to be the second of three Sai Baba incarnations. According to the current Sai Baba, his successor will be born in 2030 and will be called Prema Sai Baba (Sai Baba of Love).

Indian spiritual guru Sri Sathya Sai Baba, right, blesses his disciples as he arrives on a modified vehicle at an event to celebrate his 78th birthday at Puttaparthi, India. (AP/Wide World Photos)

After his declaration of identity, Sathya Sai Baba began performing miracles and delivering teachings and he soon gathered a following in India. Gradually word spread abroad, and people began flocking to Sai Baba in the hope of being helped by one of his miracles. Devotees' publications describe extraordinary cures, resurrections from the dead, materializations of religious trinkets, mind reading, and astral travel. Sathya Sai Baba's most common miracle, however, is his manifestation of ash known as vibhuti, performed by waving his right hand in a circular motion. Usually he gives the ash to devotees, often with instructions to use it medicinally. Above all, it is conviction about Sathya

Sai Baba's paranormal powers that is the hallmark of a devotee.

The movement has great appeal to the cosmopolitan middle classes, particularly among diasporic Indian communities, Europeans, and North Americans. In Puttaparthi various institutions have been established with funds raised by the organization: a school, a college, and a hospital. The global organization is administered pyramidally, structured with regional, national, and local chairmen. A registered center must have a chairman, secretary, and treasurer, and must provide three activities—worship, spiritual education, and charity.

The organization is supported through anonymous donations, and there are no membership fees. The total number of devotees is difficult to estimate since many worship Sathya Sai Baba without registering as members or even attending the centers. Devotees have developed an extensive Internet presence.

The movement follows the style of Hindu bhakti devotionism. It emphasizes the individual's personal commitment to Sathya Sai Baba himself as incarnation of divinity. Love of God is emphasized over scriptural learning or renunciation, and the worshipper is encouraged to transcend desire from within the world. Selfless love and charitable service are promoted over withdrawal from the world. The teachings are ecumenical and stress a single godhead as the essence of all religious traditions. Sathya Sai Baba insists that the true devotee is one who learns to practice his own religion well rather than converting to another.

Sathya Sai Baba education promotes a set of "universal human values" emanating from the Hindu principles of prema, shanti, ahimsa, sathya, and dharma (love, peace, nonviolence, truth, and duty) but these are said to underlie all religions. The symbol of the Sathya Sai Baba organization is a lotus flower in whose five petals these Sanskrit terms are written. Sathya Sai Baba altars often include a range of godforms from several of the world religions, usually with a picture of Sathya Sai Baba or his feet in the center. Worship is structured along the lines of Hindu puja worship and usually includes offerings of flowers to the image of Sathya Sai Baba, chanting of Sanskrit mantras, singing of devotional songs (bhajans) in Sanskrit and other languages, recitation of prayers, and the offering of burning camphor (arathi) to the altar. Prasad, or offerings, obligatorily including vibhuti are then distributed to the congregation. At some centers individuals will recite personal experiences of miracles to the audience or deliver messages taken from the Sathya Sai Baba literature. The literature used by the movement is not written by Sathya Sai Baba himself but consists of his numerous speeches, written down and published by devotees. Sathya Sai Baba also makes frequent reference to the Bhagavadgita, and even makes unsystematic references to other texts from both Hinduism and other world religions.

The Sathya Sai Baba movement has stimulated considerable controversy. At least one organization in India has launched a crusade against Sathya Sai Baba and other miracle workers. Video films of Sathya Sai Baba performing "faked" materializations have been released and there are publications that offer evidence to debunk some of the devotees' claims of miracle experiences. Stories have also circulated about sexual harassment of boys at the Sathya Sai College, sponsored by the organization and located close to the ashram in Puttaparthi.

Sexual abuse is not the only controversy tainting the godman's reputation. On June 6, 1993, four young male devotees broke into the guru's quarters at night, armed with knives. Their motives are unclear. They were stopped by four of Sathya Sai Baba's attendants. A struggle ensued in which two of the young men were killed and two badly injured. They were then bound with ropes and beaten by others who had heard the commotion. When the police later arrived they shot all four. Investigations were marked by cover-up and the case has never been resolved. Generally, though, the movement has been largely unaffected by the controversies and it continues to attract influential members to its following.

Sathya Sai Baba
Prasanthi Nilayam
Dist. Anantapur
Andhra Pradesh 515134
India
<http://www.sathyasai.org/>

Alexandra Kent

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions.

References

- Kasturi, N. Sathyam, Sivam, Sundaram: The Life Story of Bhagavan Sri Sathya Sai Baba. 3 vols. Prasanthi Nilayam, India: Sri Sathya Sai Books and Publications Trust, 1973–1975.
- Kent, Alexandra. Divinity and Diversity: A Hindu Revitalization Movement in Malaysia. Copenhagen: NIAS Press, 2005.
- Klass, Morton. Singing with Sai Baba: The Politics of Revitalization in Trinidad. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.
- Manual of Sri Sathya Sai Baba Dal and Guidelines for Activities*. Bombay: World Council of the Sri Sathya Sai Organizations, 1979.

Sandweiss, S. Sai Baba: The Holy Man and the Psychiatrist. New Delhi: M. Gulab Singh and Sons, 1975.

Satmar Hasidism

The Satmar, one of the newer Hasidic communities, has become known as one of the few anti-Zionist groups operating in the Jewish community. Members believe that the present state of Israel is illegitimate and that efforts to set up a Jewish state in Palestine are contrary to Jewish teachings. The group was founded by Rebbe Yoel Teitelbaum (1887–1979), the younger son of the Rebbe for Szigetzer Hasidim. Following his father's death, he moved to Satu-Mare (Hungary), where he was eventually named chief rabbi. His charisma and allegiance to tradition brought him a large following. Although he opposed the Zionists, they were the ones who in 1944 saved him from the Holocaust. After living out the war in Switzerland and a visit to Palestine, he came to America in 1947. He set about the task of re-creating a community similar to the one that had existed prior to the war. Many Hungarian Americans flocked to his cause.

Teitelbaum settled in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, New York, and soon several hundred families had associated with him. The community adopted the distinctive clothing of the Old World communities and a variety of practices peculiar to ultra-Orthodox life. The establishment of the state of Israel became a problem of major proportion. A few Orthodox had opposed Zionism, a program initiated by liberal and secular Jews, out of a belief that only the Messiah could bring the rebirth of Israel. Although the vast majority of Orthodox groups accommodated to or became avid supporters of Israel, the Satmar continued in their opposition and found support in what it perceived to be the new government's anti-religious policies. The Satmar who resided in Palestine organized rallies against the new state. They also refused to serve in the Israeli army or participate in elections. Following the liberation of Jerusalem in 1967, the late Rabbi Joel Teitelbaum, the Satmar Rebbe, forbade his followers from visiting the Western Wall because it had been regained not by divine miracles but by Israel's army, the military arm of a "regime of heretics."

Teitelbaum was able to rally Orthodox and anti-Zionist Jews, especially those of Hungarian extraction, and the Satmar emerged in Jewish communities in Europe (Belgium, United Kingdom) and South America (Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay). In 1968, Rebbe Yoel had a stroke that hobbled him for the rest of his life. He died in 1979, and after a year of mourning was succeeded by his nephew Rebbe Moshe Teitelbaum (1914–2006).

The Satmar developed a relationship with the Neturei Karta (Guardians of the City), an Israeli-based anti-Zionist group, which placed itself under the Satmar's care and guidance. In 1965, Rabbi Amram Blau, the founder of the Neturei Karta, married a divorced convert to Judaism (formerly a Roman Catholic). As a result, the Satmar forced his ouster from leadership.

Following the death of Rabbi Moshe in 2006, his son Aaron Teitelbaum was declared his successor and installed as the leader of the community at the center in Kiryas Joel. However, his leadership was challenged by his two brothers and his brother-in-law. Each of them is in control of a segment of the movement, and as of 2009, there was no sign of reconciliation between the various factions.

There are approximately 100,000 Satmar in the United States (2009), a little more than half of the estimated 200,000 Satmar worldwide. Most live in Brooklyn (70,000), but some have moved to the Satmar community, Kiryas Joel, established in 1974 in Monroe, New York, about an hour outside of Manhattan. Most outside the United States reside in Israel, the United Kingdom, and Belgium.

Satmar Hasidic Community
c/o Congregation Yetev-Lev
12 Garfield Rd
Monroe, NY 10950

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hasidism; Orthodox Judaism.

References

Mintz, Jerome R. Hasidic People: A Place in the New World. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Rubin, Israel. Satmar: Two Generations in an Urban Island. New York: Peter Lang, 1997.

Weiss, Maud B., and Michael Neumeister. The Challenge of Piety: The Satmar Hasidim in New York. Munich: Gina Kehayoff, 1995.

Winson, Hella. Unchosen: The Hidden Lives of Hasidic Rebels. Boston: Beacon Press, 2006.

Satsang Network, The

This loosely organized new religious phenomenon, which appeared in the beginning of the 1990s, reflects several contemporary popular religious trends, mixing different traditions, emphasis on inner experience, and egalitarianism. The network is focused around several dozen Westerners, announced as enlightened or awakened, who travel around the world to give satsang, or meetings aimed at helping others to make the transition to enlightenment. Besides the activity of satsang and the core teaching of enlightenment, most of them share reference to one or, more commonly, at least two out of three Indian gurus: Osho (1931–1990), Poonjaji (1910–1997) (with connections to Ramana Maharshi [1879–1950]), and Sri Swami Hans Raj Maharaj in Rishikesh (b. ca. 1925). Another key spiritual master, often referred to, is Sri Nisargadatta Maharaj (1897–1981). The Satsang network has thus come into being at the intersection between several different Indian religious traditions. Another common feature holding the network together is the followers, who often accept several of the Westerners as enlightened teachers and visit satsang given by all of them.

Many of the satsang givers have a history of intense involvement with the Osho movement. After the death of Osho in 1990, several of his disciples started visiting Poonjaji. Vasant (male), from Norway, was the life guard of Osho for several years, before he met Poonjaji in the middle of the 1990s. Arjuna (male), from the United States, and Rahasya (male), from Germany, have similar stories. Thus, the Satsang network could partly be considered a post-Osho development. However, there are also satsang givers without connections to Osho, such as Shantimayi (female, the United States), a disciple of Sri Hans Maharaj with a background in Buddhism, and Gangaji (female, the United States), a disciple of Poonjaji, also with a background in Buddhism. Both of the latter have disciples of their own who in turn are considered enlightened.

The core teaching of the Satsang network is that enlightenment is here for everyone at the present moment. To become enlightened one should just drop all concepts, ideas, and beliefs. A consequence of this teaching is that other ideological traits are downplayed. As in the Osho movement, the world is seen as divine, and there is no need for renunciation. Although no techniques are explicitly recommended to realize enlightenment, sometimes, as in the Osho movement, different kinds of personal growth and therapeutic work are practiced.

Satsang is a traditional activity in the Indian spiritual context, meaning “being together with truth.” In the Satsang network, satsang is characterized by active participation of the audience, music, dance, and high spirits. The focus in satsang is on enlightenment and how to drop the thinking that one is not enlightened. The satsang givers clearly occupy a special position in the movement, but at the same time they are conceived of in a much more egalitarian way than Eastern spiritual teachers normally are.

The Satsang network has no central organization, no name, and no membership; it could be considered a conglomeration of several interconnected networks. Some of the satsang givers have their own enterprises or foundations for personal and spiritual development. Some examples include Ganesh Foundation (1750 30th Street, PMB #137, Boulder, CO 80301), Internet site at <http://www.shantimayi.com/>; the organization of Shantimayi; The Living Essence Foundation (13215 Red Dog Road, Nevada City, CA 95959), Internet site at <http://www.livingessence.com/> by Arjuna; Eckhart Teachings (PO Box 93661, Nelson Park RPO, Vancouver, BC, Canada V6E 4L7), Internet site at <http://www.eckharttolle.com/>, the organization of Eckhart Tolle; and The Gangaji Foundation (2245 Ashland Street, Ashland, OR 97520), Internet site at <http://www.gangaji.org/>.

The Satsang network is global, satsang givers of different national origin traveling mainly in Europe, the United States, Australia, South America, Japan, and India. Because of the lack of organization, it is difficult to estimate the number of persons engaged. Sat-sang givers number several dozen, and satsangs must regularly reach several thousand. The level of engagement is, however, often quite low.

Liselotte Frisk

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Enlightenment.

Reference

Frisk, Liselotte. “The Satsang Network: A Growing Post-Osho Phenomenon.” Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 6, no. 1 (2002): 64–85.

■ Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia is an Islamic nation whose territory includes most of the Arabian Peninsula. Most of the country’s 830,000 square miles of territory is desert, but that desert covers extensive oil deposits. The majority of its 26,000,000 citizens live near the Red Sea or Persian Gulf coasts, though the capital, Riyadh, is in the center of the country. The eastern section of the country, bordering Yemen and Oman, is the most sparsely populated.

The story of the emergence of Saudi Arabia is intimately connected with the rise of Islam. At the time when Muhammad appeared on the stage of history (ca. 570–632 CE), the Arabian Peninsula was home to a variety of groups, many headed by their own sheik and following a traditional polytheistic religion. Around 610, Muhammad began to preach the message he had received from God (later written down in the Koran). He attacked the image worship of his neighbors and called for the destruction of the idols. He also called upon the rich to give assistance to the poor. Muhammad was of the Hashim people, who had risen to dominate Mecca, where a worship center, the Kabah, had been a source of pilgrimage. The Hashimites were in charge of the Kabah, which at the beginning of the seventh century housed hundreds of deity images. One of the commands in the Koran instructed Muhammad and his followers to purify the Kabah.

In 622, Muhammad was invited to Yathib (Medina) to arbitrate the feuds that were dividing its people. Islam is usually dated from that move, called the

Muslim pilgrims in Medina, Saudi Arabia. (Aidar Ayazbayev/Dreamstime.com)

Hegira. Muhammad soon proclaimed the rightness of going to war against Islam’s enemies, especially the Meccans, and by 629 he was in command in the city of his birth. He smashed the idols at the Kabah and made it a place of pilgrimage for Muslims.

With the conquest of Mecca, Muhammad emerged as the strongest person on the Arabian Peninsula, and many of the sheikdoms sought an alliance with him. Subsequently, they and their people became Muslims. These alliances both created a new political community and ended much of the fighting between the different groups.

The expansion of Arab power came during the rulership of Umar (634–644): the Arabs moved outward to take control of Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Persia (Iran). Interestingly, the Arabs were not seafaring people and made no move across the Red Sea to Ethiopia or the Sudan. A hereditary monarchy (the Umayyad Caliphate) would be established in 661 by Mu’awiya I

SAUDI ARABIA

(d. 680). Under him and his successors, the Arab Empire would reach from Morocco and Spain to what is today Pakistan. However, the empire's capital was moved to Damascus, and Arabia proper retained its place primarily as the point of origin of Islam and the site of the hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca required of each Muslim at least once in a lifetime.

Life in Arabia continued at a slow pace oriented on the trade in the cities and the agriculture and sheep-herding in the rural areas. Although nominally a part of successive Muslim empires, the most important being the Abbasid (beginning in 750 CE) and the Ottoman (beginning in the 13th century), many parts of Arabia operated for long periods as semiautonomous regions, of peripheral concern to the rulers of the empire.

Change began to take place with the rise of the Saud family in the 18th century. As the Ottoman Empire was losing its ability to govern so large a territory, the Saudis established the independent Emirate of Najd in the center of the peninsula, with their capital at Riyadh. Forced out of power for a period at the end of the 19th century, they regrouped in Kuwait and re-established themselves at the end of World War I, with British assistance. In 1926 they moved on Mecca and, following its conquest, Abd al-Aziz ibn Sa'ud, the head of the family, was proclaimed king of Hijaz and sultan of Najd. Six years later this kingdom became the modern nation of Saudi Arabia. He adapted the old structures of the land to his rule, assigning the emirs the leadership of districts, and local chiefs and their armies control on the local level. The government continues as an absolute monarchy with no elective political offices.

The rise to power of the Saud family is intimately connected with the Wahhabi movement. Muhammad ibn Walihab (d. 1787) was a Muslim leader who attacked the Ottoman leadership for their lax manner, especially in their observance of the law. He in effect revived the Hanbalite School of Islam, which had largely died out. The Hanbalites had rejected the various methods of expanding the law by using analogy and reason, and felt that the law as handed down in the Koran should be observed as literally as possible. The Saud family found their greatest allies in the Wahhabis, and both of their fortunes rose together. Sunni Islam is the state religion of Saudi Arabia, and the Wahhabi School the dominant form.

The king of Saudi Arabia is considered the spiritual leader of all Muslims. That is recognized in several ways, including his role as guardian of the shrine in Mecca. Each year, following the Aid El Kebir, the Feast of the Sacrifices, he enters the Kaaba, the black cubic shrine at the center of the mosque in Mecca. He washes its interior and changes the black cloth that encloses it. He is the only person allowed to enter the shrine.

A form of Muslim devotion is a common part of Saudi life. The sharia (Muslim law) operates throughout the culture (including the school system), and five times daily other matters come to a halt as a brief time is taken for prayer.

Other forms of Orthodox Islam are tolerated in Saudi Arabia. Sunnis of the Shafiite School of Islam are strong in the western part of the country, the region along the Red Sea, and there are pockets of both Hanafite and Malikiite believers, especially at al-Hufuf, inland from the Persian Gulf. There are some 60,000 Ismailis at Ahsa, and a small number of Zaydites in the area near the border with Yemen. Through the 10th century, Sufism spread through most of the Islamic Empire, including Arabia, from its main center in Baghdad.

The Muslim establishment in Arabia has several organizations of international importance. In 1963, the Muslim World League was created and remains headquartered in Mecca. It is the Muslim equivalent of the Christian World Council of Churches; it attempts to bring a greater sense of unity to the Muslim world. It also assists Muslims in countries in which they are the minority, and to that end it has opened numerous national offices around the world. The Organization of the Islamic Conference, with headquarters in Jeddah, was established in 1969 during the first Conference of the Muslim World, which was held in Rabat, Morocco. The occasion of its formation was the burning of the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. It includes representatives of the majority of nations in which Muslims are the dominant faith, who consult together to promote cooperation and mutual assistance in various fields of interest. Its Triennial Conferences bring together the heads of some 55 nations.

Through the government's Ministry of Education, a number of Muslim institutions of higher learning, which have influence far beyond the border of the country, have been established. Included among these schools are the Faculty of the Sharia and Islamic Studies (Mecca), the Islamic University of Medina, the Higher Institute of Judiciary (Riyadh), and the Islamic Jurisprudence College (Mecca). The annual visitation of pilgrims to Mecca is overseen by the government's Department of Hajj.

According to tradition, Christianity was brought to Arabia by Bartholomew, one of the original 12 Apostles.

Saudi Arabia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	5,688,000	24,514,000	92.8	2.56	31,882,000	40,911,000
Christians	26,600	1,182,000	4.5	2.60	1,800,000	2,530,000
Roman Catholics	2,600	1,000,000	3.8	2.81	1,500,000	2,100,000
Independents	13,000	77,000	0.3	2.57	140,000	200,000
Orthodox	2,000	51,000	0.2	0.18	70,000	100,000
Hindus	1,000	300,000	1.1	2.56	410,000	550,000
Agnostics	20,000	180,000	0.7	2.56	350,000	500,000
Buddhists	5,000	86,800	0.3	2.56	120,000	160,000
Sikhs	0	51,400	0.2	2.56	80,000	150,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	48,000	0.2	2.56	60,000	75,000
Chinese folk	4,000	24,600	0.1	2.56	34,000	50,000
New religionists	0	15,000	0.1	2.56	35,000	60,000
Atheists	0	8,500	0.0	2.56	18,000	30,000
Baha'is	400	5,400	0.0	2.56	8,000	14,000
Total population	5,745,000	26,416,000	100.0	2.56	34,797,000	45,030,000

Christians did find their way to the peninsula over the next centuries, and by the sixth century a variety of churches could be found. These were completely submerged into Islam from the seventh century. Christianity did not return until the 19th century. The Roman Catholic Church established work at Aden (Yemen) in 1841. A vicariate of Arabia was formed in 1889 and is administered from Abu Dhabi (United Arab Emirates). Work in Dhahran is limited to expatriates, though it has grown in recent years because of the expansion of the oil business.

In 1890, Samuel Zwemer, representing the American Arabian Mission, opened a center in Aden and began an effort to create a Christian presence in the area, but he was never allowed to evangelize in Arabia. During the early 20th century, two churches, one affiliated with the Christian Brethren and one with the Churches of Christ, emerged in Dhahran, but were limited to serving expatriates. Several additional churches have appeared in recent decades, including Unitarian congregations and some small evangelical groups. There are also small numbers of expatriates connected with the Orthodox churches (Greek, Coptic, and Syrian). Officially, all religions other than Islam are prohibited in Saudi Arabia (a fact that became an issue for Americans stationed there during the Gulf War), and attempts at proselytization are dealt with severely by the authorities. Churches are permitted only as private affairs among noncitizens.

As the presence of Christians is limited to expatriates, so there are small numbers of Buddhists and Hindus from China and India, respectively, and the Baha'i Faith has developed several groups.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Christian Brethren; Churches of Christ; Hanafite School of Islam; Hanbalite School of Islam; Ismaili Islam; Malikite School of Islam; Muslim World League; Roman Catholic Church; Shafite School of Islam; Wahhabi Islam; World Council of Churches.

References

- Al Saud, T. "Permanence and Change: An Analysis of the Islamic Political Culture of Saudi Arabia with Special Reference to the Royal Family." Ph.D. diss., Claremont Graduate School, 1982.
- Al-Yassini, A. Religion and State in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1985.
- Alshamsi, Manso. Islam and Political Reform in Saudi Arabia: The Quest for Political Change and Reform. New York: Routledge, 2008.
- Barrett, David, ed. The Encyclopedia of World Christianity. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

- Commins, David. The Wahhabi Mission and Saudi Arabia. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Delong-Bas, Natana. Wahhabi Islam: From Revival and Reform to Global Jihad. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Erlich, Haggai. Saudi Arabia and Ethiopia: Islam, Christianity, and Politics Entwined. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.
- Peters, F. E. The Hajj: The Muslim Pilgrimage to Mecca and the Holy Places. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Pullapilly, Cyriac. Islam in the Contemporary World. Notre Dame, IN: Cross Roads Books, 1980.
- Weston, Mark, and Fowler Wyche, Jr. Prophets and Princes: Saudi Arabia from Muhammad to the Present. New York: Wiley, 2008.

Savonarola, Girolamo

1452–1498

The charismatic Italian priest Girolamo Savonarola was one of several Catholic leaders who attempted to institute reform in the church in the generation prior to the Protestant Reformation. He initially rose to an influential position in the Dominican Order and then became a controlling church authority in his native Tuscany. At the height of his power, however, both church and state authorities turned on him.

Savonarola was born in 1452 into a well-to-do family in Ferrara (northern Italy). As young man (1474) he joined the Dominican Order at Bologna. People began to take notice of the young monk as he approached his 30th year as a preacher in Florence. He responded by leaving the city and taking a post as the priest for a convent in Brescia. In 1489 he returned to Florence, where this time his extraordinary oratorical skills found an audience and he became a popular speaker. He spoke eloquently against the sins of his day and the apostasy he saw everywhere around him.

Savonarola's preaching seemed headed for a confrontation with the powerful de Medicis, who ruled the city. Lorenzo, who embodied the Medici wealth, culture, and humanist spirit, however, chose to leave Savonarola alone. A year after Lorenzo passed away (1492), the pope gave his support to Savonarola's being named the vicar general of the Dominican Order in Tuscany (the Italian region of which Florence was the capital), the task being assigned in order to reform the region.

Savonarola concluded that reform was contingent upon a change of regime, and he suggested that Charles VIII (r. 1483–1498) and the French just might be the divinely appointed instrument to carry out the necessary adjustments in the ruling authorities. A short time later, the French overran the city, but their stay was brief. Charles was on his way south to take control of the Kingdom of Naples. After the French departed, Florence was declared a republic, and Savonarola and his followers took control. He named God the controlling force of a new theocracy and instituted a variety of puritanical reforms.

A crisis developed in 1495. Savonarola's followers considered him a prophet, which occasioned his critics charging such claims constituted heresy. When he refused to show up in Rome and respond to the charges in 1497, he was excommunicated. As his situation deteriorated, in 1498, the people threw their support behind some of the Medici's supporters in the city's elections. The new authorities ordered Savonarola not to preach and he found himself denounced publically by a member of the rival Franciscan Order. The public turned against him and his reforms. Arrested on a laundry list of charges, he was tortured and made a variety of confessions. He later withdrew them, but it was too late. He was convicted, and Rome agreed with the verdict. He and two close followers were hung and their bodies burned on May 23, 1498. In spite of what had just happened to them, they maintained their loyalty to the church and the faith right up to their death.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Erlanger, Rachel. The Unarmed Prophet: Savonarola in Florence. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1988.
- Martines, Lauro. Fire in the City: Savonarola and the Struggle for the Soul of Renaissance Florence. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.
- Olin, John C. The Catholic Reformation: Savonarola to Ignatius Loyola. New York: Harper & Row, 1969.

Savonarola, Girolamo. Selected Writings of Girolamo Savonarola: Religion and Politics, 1490–1498.

Ed. by Donald Beebe, Anne Borelli, and Maria Pastore Passaro. New Haven CT: Yale University Press, 2006.

Savonarola, Girolamo. The Triumph of the Cross.

Trans. by John Procter. London: Sands and Company, 1901.

Seward, Desmond. The Burning of the Vanities: Savonarola and the Borgia Pope. Charleston, SC: The History Press, 2006.

Science and Religion: The Contemporary Scene

Since Charles Darwin's publication of Origin of Species in 1859, debates between science and religion that assumed a conflict model turn out on closer inspection to be debates in which rival claims are made for the "correct" meaning to be attached to scientific theories and theological claims. The publication of John Draper's History of the Conflict between Science and Religion in 1874 and Andrew Dickenson White's two-volume A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom is the source of this idea. The "Draper-White Thesis," as it is now known, originated in the view of 18th-century philosophers like David Hume and John Locke that the church was an institution whose ignorance and intolerance had hindered human progress, while science was a force of cultural and intellectual liberation. For the past century this has been the predominant view of the relation between science and religion among laypeople and scientists alike. It brings together a triumphalist view of science and a patronizing view of religion that does not square with the historical facts past and present. While it cannot be denied that in some cases real conflict existed, as in the cases of Galileo and Darwin, the notion of a state of "warfare" between science and religion is simplistic and mostly wrong. The relation between science and religion in the Middle Ages was neither suppression nor support, but a complex mixture of conflict, compromise, understanding, misunderstanding, accommodation, dialogue, alienation, and the going of separate ways. This same pattern continues today, even as the warfare model remains strong in popular understanding and the views of many scientists and conservative Christians.

There are several issues around which a real or imagined conflict revolves. The earliest issues were epistemological: can scientific knowledge be integrated into religion? From the Copernican displacement of the Earth from the center of the solar system to Darwin's theory of evolution, which displaced human beings from the center of the universe, theology was forced into rethinking Christian tradition in light of what the sciences revealed about nature. Epistemological issues remain primary in the contemporary dialogue between science and religion. A second area of contention is methodological and involves the duality between science based on "physical facts" and theology derived from "faith," or between a naturalistic and a religious worldview. Scientific naturalism since Darwin denies the church's right to interfere in the progress of science by introducing theological considerations into scientific debates. Today, among liberal theologians and some evangelicals, any appeal to divine purpose as an explanation of physical processes is rejected as a "god of the gaps" explanation, the assertion of which creates real science-religion conflict that is often heated, as well as incoherent theology. A third area of contention is in the field of ethics. Most recently, the issues have focused on genetic engineering, nuclear power, and medical procedures like birth control and abortion. Past debates focused on such medical procedures as vaccination and anesthesia. In the 18th century, one of the more serious reasons for opposing Darwin was fear that the theory of evolution would lead to the abandonment of ethical constraints in society. With these issues, it is not so much science as its applications that are of major concern. Finally, much of the conflict between science and religion has arisen from issues involving social and political power. This is reflected in conflict between progressive science-based ideologies and conservative and ecclesiastical forces.

These issues are at the forefront of the contemporary academic field of "science and religion," the historical roots of which lie in the 1960s, when scholars began developing constructive methodologies for relating science and religion. Scientist-theologian Ian Barbour is generally regarded as the "founder" of the field with the publication of his Issues in Science and Religion in 1971, which was revised in 1990 as Religion and Science: Historical and Contemporary Issues. Drawing on the work of Alfred North Whitehead, Thomas Kuhn, Michael Polanyi, Stephen Tomlin, Mary Hesse, Frederick Ferré, and Norwoon Hanson, Barbour's insight was the recognition of the similarities between the methodologies and epistemological structures of science and theology: Both employ metaphors and models in their claims about the world, and both use hypothetical and deductive methods within a revisionist, contextualist, historicist framework. Barbour called this common epistemological framework "critical realism."

Critical realism was pursued in England by physicist-theologian John Polkinghorne and biologist-theologian Arthur Peacocke, who died in 2006. In Germany, Wolfhart Pannenberg brought Karl Popper's understanding of theories as revisable hypotheses into the discussion in his Theology and the Philosophy of Science (1976). Nancy Murphy, from the perspective of the philosophy of religion, employed Imre Lakatos's notion of a "scientific research program," which includes a central commitment to a theoretical "hard core," a surrounding belt of ancillary hypotheses, and criteria for choosing between competing research programs. John B. Cobb, Jr., Philip Clayton, Niels Gregersen, Thomas Torrance, and Wentzel van Hysussteen made additional important contributions.

The chief concern of these scholars was to create a methodological framework for dialogue that allows for methodological reductionism (studying wholes in terms of their parts, referred to as "bottom-up causation") as a legitimate method in scientific research while respecting the irreducibility of "top-down" causal processes and properties referred to by theology, philosophy, and other higher-level disciplines. While some postmodernists and anti-realists criticize this approach by pointing to the difficulties that confront realist interpretations of scientific and theological concepts and by questioning the "metanarrative" role of science, critical realism is the predominant view of most scholars participating in the science-religion dialogue.

In numerous ways, the contemporary natural sciences challenge as they reshape theological reflection on the God-nature relationship. In physics, Albert Einstein's theories of special and general relativity challenge our ordinary sense of time's flow and the assumption of a universal present moment. This makes problematic the idea that God experiences and acts in the world in the flowing "now." Just as challenging is the relation between divine action and natural causality. Since Newtonian mechanics pictured nature as a closed machine-like system, divine action was either understood in terms of interventionism or reduced to human subjectivity. But developments within the philosophical interpretation of quantum theory, cosmology, chaos theory, and the neurosciences may provide a foundation for new theories of noninterventionist, objective, special providence. In cosmology, scholars like Robert John Russell, William B. Drees, George Ellis, Ted Peters, Mark Worthing, and William Stoeger focus on the consonance between theological notions of the universe as a creation and features of standard Big Bang theory, including the apparent beginning of the universe at $T = 0$ and the "anthropic principle," quantum indeterminacy, and the odd fact that the physical constants of nature have precisely the values they need for the emergence of life.

In dialogue with evolutionary theory, Arthur Peacocke and process theologians like John B. Cobb, Jr., Ian Barbour, David Griffin, and John Haught have in their distinctive ways written about "theistic evolution," which is the view that what science describes in terms of evolutionary biology can be meaningfully affirmed as God's action in the world. This is not another version of the intelligent design argument because billions of years of natural disaster, suffering, death, and extinction, plus the overall lack of directedness in evolutionary change raises serious challenges to any notion of divine action in nature. Barbour, Peacocke, Cobb, Haught, and Griffin, along with Holms Rolston and Thomas Tracy, center their discussions of theistic evolution on the complex "values" in nature. Evolutionary and ecological thought also plays a central role in Sallie McFague's model of the world as the "body of God" and Rosemary Ruether's discussion of the Gaia hypothesis and God.

Further areas of discussion are how genetics, sociobiology, the neurosciences, and computer science will affect the way we understand the human person. Fruitful theological insights into these issues come from scholars like biologist Francisco Ayala, Ted Peters, Denis Edwards, Anne Forest, Philip Hefner, and Nancy Murphy. Peters also draws together scientific and religious perspectives on ethical issues involving genetic discrimination, gene patenting, cloning, stem cell research, and human freedom. Several of the sciences challenge the notion of redemption, which in Christian tradition focuses on the doctrines of incarnation, Christology, resurrection, and eschatology. The very size and complexity of the universe force us as scientists, persons of faith, or both to look beyond concern for humanity and the Earth to the destiny of the universe as a whole.

Finally, important areas of research are now cutting-edge concerns in contemporary science-religion dialogue. Science itself is recognized as a thoroughly human endeavor open to the investigations of gender analysis. The work of Nancy Howell, Evelyn Fox Keller, and Helen Longino provides a good source for gender analysis of the science-religion dialogue itself. Additional voices from the world's religious traditions are increasingly participating in the science-religion dialogue. These voices include Muslim, Jewish, and Buddhist scholars. Muslims and Jews have always been engaged with the natural sciences, but the participation of Buddhists in this dialogue is a relatively recent phenomenon. The Dalai Lama, B. Alan Wallace, David Galan, and José Cabézon are among the important writers in this field. Generally, Buddhists assert that the natural sciences pose little threat to Buddhism's non-theistic worldview and practice traditions. Indeed, Buddhist dialogue with the biological sciences focuses mainly on the neurosciences because Buddhists tend to claim this branch of the sciences supports Buddhist traditions of meditation. Paul O. Ingram has written about a Buddhist-Christian-Science "trilogue" as part of the focus of the Society for Buddhist-Christian Studies. Other important areas include the history of science, the theological critique of "scientism" and scientific materialism, the relation of science to spirituality, and the roles of philosophy and theology in scientific research programs.

Paul O. Ingram

See also: Science and Religion: History of the Relationship.

References

- Ayala, Francisco, ed. Studies in the Philosophy of Biology: Reduction and Related Problems. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.
- Barbour, Ian G. Religion and Science: Historical and Contemporary Issues. San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1990.
- Birch, Charles, and John B. Cobb, Jr., eds. The Liberation of Life. Denton, TX: Environmental Ethics Books, 1990.
- Clayton, Philip. Mind and Emergence: From Quantum to Consciousness. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Cobb, John B., ed. Back to Darwin: A Richer Account of Evolution. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2008.
- Drees, William B. Beyond the Big Bang: Quantum Cosmologies and God. La Salle, IL: Open Court, 1990.
- Edwards, Denis. The God of Evolution: A Trinitarian Theology. New York: Paulist Press, 1999.
- Ellis, George F. R. Before the Beginning: Cosmology Explained. New York: Bowerdean, 1993.
- Goodenough, Ursula. The Sacred Depths of Nature. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Haight, John F. Deeper than Darwin: The Prospect of Religion in the Age of Evolution. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2003.
- Haight, John F. Science and Religion: From Conflict to Conversation. New York: Paulist Press, 1995.
- Hefner, Philip J. The Human Factor: Evolution, Culture, and Religion. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.
- Howell, Nancy R. A Feminist Cosmology: Ecology, Solidarity, and Metaphysics. New York: Humanity Books, 2000.
- Ingram, Paul O. Buddhist-Christian Dialogue in an Age of Science. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2008.
- McFague, Sallie. The Body of God: An Ecological Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.
- Murphy, Nancy C. Theology in the Age of Scientific Reasoning. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1990.

- Nasr, Seyyid Hossein. Knowledge of the Sacred. Albany: State University of New York, 1989.
- Nasr, Seyyid Hossein. Religion and the Order of Nature. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Numrich, Paul D., ed. The Boundaries of Knowledge in Buddhism, Christianity, and Science. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 2008.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart. Theology and the Philosophy of Science. Trans. by Francis McDonagh. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1976.
- Peacocke, Arthur. Theology for a Scientific Age. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.
- Peters, Ted. Playing God? Genetic Determinism and Human Freedom. New York: Routledge, 1997.
- Polkinghorne, John. Belief in God in an Age of Science. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Rolston, Holmes, III. Science and Religion: A Critical Survey. Philadelphia: Templeton Foundation Press, 2006.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Gaia and God: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing. San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1992.
- Ruse, Michael. The Darwinian Revolution: Science Red in Tooth and Claw. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.
- Russell, Robert John. Cosmology from Alpha to Omega: The Creative Mutual Interaction of Theology and Science. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2008.
- Torrance, Thomas. Theological Science. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1969.
- Wallace, B. Alan, ed. Buddhism and Science: Breaking New Ground. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Wallace, B. Alan, ed. The Hidden Dimensions: The Unification of Physics and Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.
- Van Huyssteen, J. Wentzel. Theology and the Justification of Faith: Constructing Theories in Systematic Theology. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1989.
- Worthing, Mark W. God, Creation, and Contemporary Physics. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1996.

Science and Religion: History of the Relationship

Popular generalizations about the relationship between science and religion, whether couched in terms of war or peace, do not stand up to serious historical investigation. There is no such thing as the relationship between science and religion. It is what different individuals and communities have made of it in a wide variety of different historical and cultural contexts. Science as we understand it today began with the Greeks, who designated study of the natural world “natural philosophy.” The main recurrent issues discussed among pre-Socratic Greek philosophers were the nature of causality, the role of deities in natural processes, the nature of matter, the nature of the body and the soul, and the place of human beings in the cosmos. In the works of the Greek atomists, and later Lucretius in the first century BCE, a case was made for a naturalistic philosophy in which worlds came into and passed out of existence as the result of the chance collision of atoms. There might be life on other worlds, and natural processes did not depend on the intervention of gods. Other second-century CE thinkers, like the physician Galen, were more responsive to the appearance of what is now called “intelligent design,” particularly in anatomical structures. The Epicureans countered that the appearance of design in nature was an illusion and reflected the fact that nature had experimented with every possible combination of organs and limbs, the nonviable combinations having perished long ago. Hipparchos discovered the precession of equinoxes, Archimedes analyzed the lever, Aristarchus of Samos proposed a heliocentric picture of the universe, while Ptolemy’s Earth-centered universe dominated European thought until Nicolaus Copernicus in the 16th century. Aristotle set the stage for future developments in biology, physics, and metaphysics, all celebrating human rationality. The relationship between sacred and secular knowledge and the relation between divine power and the natural processes governing the world were important issues faced by early Christian theologians, among whom a diversity of views were held. Although Tertullian (160–220) proclaimed rhetorically, “what has Athens to do with Jerusalem,” indicating the independence of Christian theology from Pagan philosophy, Saint Augustine (354–430) focused on the question of whether biblical exegesis should reflect contemporary secular knowledge, concluding that too tight a dependency on scripture could prove embarrassing when the state of knowledge changed. His declaration that science and philosophy should be welcomed handmaids to theology culminated in the Middle Ages with the “two books doctrine,” according to which the book of nature reveals God as a creator and the book of scripture reveals God as redeemer.

In both Islamic and Christian cultures the problem of assimilating knowledge of nature was greatly stimulated by different reactions to Aristotle’s conception of a world that has existed from eternity. In fact, in Islamic cultures science was practiced on a scale unprecedented in earlier history and played a decisive role in the history of science in medieval Christian Europe. Examples of the continuity of Islamic research traditions include the reform of Ptolemaic astronomy that started in the 11th century; the science of linguistics; the preservations of Greek and Roman learning, particularly the works of Aristotle, in Arabic translations in centers of learning in Baghdad and Spain; mathematics and mathematical geography; engineering and technology; plant biology; and medicine.

The study of nature in Islamic society is based on the Koran’s call to study nature as a means of surrendering to God’s will, since nature itself models the divine will. Although Islam played a role in defining the position of science in Muslim societies, it did not define the cognitive content of the sciences. For this reason, Islamic discourse on the sciences normally advocated its separateness from religion. As a result, according to Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406) in his Muqaddima (Introduction [to the science of history]), a concept of value-free or ethically neutral scientific knowledge that is not specific to any one particular culture was developed. In distinction from “religious knowledge,” Islamic scholars called the natural sciences “the sciences shared among all the nations.” Christian and Jewish theologians eagerly embraced this knowledge as it was transmitted into Europe.

Thomas Aquinas’s appropriation of Aristotle’s metaphysics in his Summa Theologica Christianized Aristotle’s natural philosophy by bringing it into critical dialogue with natural theology, meaning conclusions rationally drawn about God based on the observation of natural processes coupled with exercise of reason. This dialogue is illustrated in Aquinas’s treatment of the doctrine of creation, which affirms the continual dependence of all that exists on a transcendent being. Such a world is capable of either the eternalist position of Aristotle or with the conception of a definite beginning in Genesis. Reason alone cannot decide the issue, in which case, the scriptural portrayal of creation in Genesis 1–2 takes precedence as revealed truth. Aquinas also appropriated Aristotle’s emphasis on primary or final causation (goals inherent in nature) in governing physical processes because this makes it possible to ask deeper questions about the coordination of the physical processes that constituted the visible world.

Page from a 16th-century copy of Marvels of Things Created and Miraculous Aspects of Things Existing, by al-Qazwini. (National Library of Medicine)

Portrait of 16th-century Polish astronomer Nicolaus (Nicholas) Copernicus. Copernicus was the first scientist to publish the idea that the Sun, and not the Earth, was the center of the universe, a finding that dramatically changed both science and religion. (Library of Congress)

For Aquinas, the natural philosophy of Aristotle was incomplete without the postulation of a “Being” who is ultimately responsible for the coordination of these processes, a conclusion that underlies his five arguments for the existence of God. Aquinas’s reliance on Aristotle as the philosophical foundation of Christian theology was challenged by the Copernican revolution in astronomy and the Protestant Reformation. Nicolaus Copernicus (1473–1543), who was a cathedral canon in Cracow, Poland, challenged the Ptolemaic world-view that dominated the Latin church, which held that the Earth sits unmoving at the center of the solar system, with the Sun, Moon, and stars revolving around it. Relying on his own empirical observations and mathematical calculations, he argued in De revolutionibus orbium coelestium libri sex (Six Books on the Revolutions of the Celestial Orbs) that the Earth rotates on its axis and the other planets of the solar system orbit the Sun. The removal of the Earth from the center of the Ptolemaic world system seemed heretical to many Catholic theologians because Ptolemy’s Sun-centered cosmology seemed to give scientific support for literal readings of the Genesis creation stories, particularly the centrality of the Earth and human beings in God’s created order. Martin Luther heard tales of Copernicus’s new astronomy, but did not seriously engage it, devoting his energies to the interpretation of scripture, challenging the role of Aristotle in theology, and reforming the church. But one of Luther’s reformation colleagues, Andreas Osiander, in 1543, the year Copernicus died, contracted with Copernicus to publish his De revolutionibus. Copernicus saw his published book for the first time on his deathbed. For the most part, Copernicus’s new cosmology elicited very little theological attention, and certainly no discernible religious excitement, until Galileo Galilei (1564–1642) provided empirical evidence in support of Copernicus’s theory through telescopic observations of sunspots, the mountains of the Moon, and the rings and moons of Saturn and the moons of Jupiter. The central issues had to do with interpretations of biblical passages such as Psalm 104:4 and Joshua 10:12–14, which pictured a world with a stable Earth and movements by the Sun and other heavenly bodies around the Earth. The authority of the Bible and the authority of the papacy to interpret the Bible seemed to be at stake, not loyalty to Ptolemy as such. Galileo defended Copernicus against Ptolemy in his Dilogo sopra i due massimi sistime del mundo (Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief Systems of the World) in 1632. Galileo was condemned by the Inquisition to house arrest for the rest of his life because of his defense of Copernicus’s De revolutionibus, which was placed on the Index Expurgatorius in 1616. After Galileo, a discourse involving theological elements in the promotion of the sciences and technology began to develop. Francis Bacon (1561–1625) argued that empirically based knowledge when applied for altruistic purposes must have a religious sanction and could even restore human domination over nature, which had been lost at the Fall. Robert Boyle (1627–1691) found evidence of divine craftsmanship in the structures of minuscule creatures revealed by the microscope. Isaac Newton (1642–1727) wrote three scientific works that established the foundations for the mechanical worldview that dominated science until the publication of Albert Einstein's theories of special and general relativity in 1905: Philosophia naturalis principia mathematica (1687), Optics (1704), and Arithmetica universalis (1707). In these works Newton unified the laws of mechanics and the law of gravity by invoking the idea that all bodies everywhere operate with mutual gravitation. On this principle, he ascertained that the forces that keep the planets in their orbits must be reciprocally the inverse squares of their distances from their centers. At the same time, Newton believed that gravitational force could not be explained by reference to the innate properties of matter. In a controversy that took place in the second half of the 18th century, Newton's defender Samuel Clarke (1675–1729) and the German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716) debated the question of how a divine being might act in the world. Clarke argued that the laws of nature defined the way God normally chooses to act, but there was nothing in the laws themselves that prevented other sorts of divine action in the world. By contrast, Leibniz argued that the best of all possible worlds that God created needed no maintenance and emphatically did not require God's actions in the "reformations" of the solar system that Newton thought necessary to keep the laws of motion governing planetary motions from decaying. Newton accepted the doctrine of the passivity of matter and argued that the radical sovereignty of God required the animation of nature to come from God alone and not from matter. Newton exemplified the atomist approach to natural philosophy that dominated natural philosophy in Europe until the mid-19th century. It was part of the business of natural philosophy to discuss the question of God's attributes and relation to the natural world. Because elements of theology were incorporated into natural philosophy, the word "science" did not take on its modern specialized meanings until the mid-19th century. In France, Voltaire (1694–1778) popularized Newton's natural philosophy as part of his attack on the power of the Catholic Church. In Germany, Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) exposed the logical weakness of attempts to argue for a deity on the basis of what is known of natural processes. In Edinburgh, David Hume's (1711–1776) Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion exposed the incoherencies of analogies on which the design argument rested. Even if the natural world did resemble a human artifact, such as a clock or a ship, it did not follow that it was made by only one artificer, and certainly not one whose attributes necessarily coincided with those assumed by Christian interpretations of Genesis 1 and 2. The final separation between theology and science as intellectual disciplines occurred in Charles Darwin's (1809–1882) Origin of Species, in which he theorized that all living organisms share common descent. The process driving evolution is natural selection contextualized by environmental factors over great lengths of time, which, because of the work of Gregor Mendel (1822–1884), is known to be rooted in the genetic structure of all living organisms. Darwin's theory of evolution is in direct opposition to the design arguments of William Paley's Natural Theology (1803), in which he argued that the design of organisms in the natural world must be accounted for by positing a divine designer, which was the dominant conclusion of natural philosophy before Darwin. But Darwin's theory of evolution is a totally natural explanation of the history of life's origins as well as the evolution of species that does not require God as an explanatory factor. The separation of science from natural philosophy and theology begins with Darwin's theory of evolution. Several aspects of Darwin's theory of evolution challenged the theological assumptions of Christian theology: (1) the nature of biblical authority; (2) the historicity of the Genesis creation narratives; (3) the meaning of Adam's fall from grace; (4) the meaning of Christ's redemptive mission, particularly the meaning of the doctrine of the resurrection; (5) the nature and scope of God's activity in the world; (6) the persuasive force of the argument for design; (7) what it means for human beings to be made in the image of God; and (8) the nature of moral values. Because it was easy to set up a contradiction on each point between ostensibly "scientific" and ostensibly "religious" points of view, Darwin's theory soon came to symbolize the conflict that militant secularists as well as militant fundamentalists still like to swell. On the other hand, more liberal forms of theological reflection have continued to incorporate evolutionary theory into their own specific versions of "evolutionary theology." In other words, while some evangelical and fundamentalist Christians still assert conflict between science and religion, liberal theological traditions have sought to bring Christian faith and practice into dialogue with the natural sciences.

Paul O. Ingram

See also: Luther, Martin; Science and Religion: The Contemporary Scene.

References

- Appleman, Philip, ed. Darwin: Texts, Backgrounds, Contemporary Opinion, Critical Essays. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1979.
- Astore, William J. Observing God: Thomas Dick, Evangelism, and Popular Science in Victorian Britain and America. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2001.
- Blackwell, Richard J. Galileo, Bellarmine, and the Bible. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1991.
- Bowler, Peter J. Reconciling Science and Religion. London: SCM Press, 2001.
- Brooke, John Hedley. Science and Religion: Some Historical Perspectives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Brooke, John Hedley, and Geoffrey Cantor. Reconstructing Nature: The Engagement of Science and Religion. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Browne, Janet. Charles Darwin. 2 vols. New York: Knopf, 1995.
- Eisley, Loren. Darwin's Century: Evolution and the Men Who Discovered It. Garden City, NY: Doubleday and Company, 1958.
- Ferngren, Gary B. Science and Religion: A Historical Introduction. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Gilbert, James. Redeeming Culture: American Religion in an Age of Science. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Grant, Edward. The Foundations of Modern Science in the Middle Ages: Their Religious, Institutional, and Intellectual Contexts. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Heatherington, Norris S., ed. Cosmology: Historical, Literary, Philosophical, Religious, and Scientific Perspectives. New York: Garland, 1993.
- Lindberg, David C. The Beginnings of Western Science. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2007.
- Lindberg, David C., and Ronald L. Numbers, eds. God and Nature: Historical Essays on the Encounter Between Christianity and Science. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1986.
- Lindberg, David C., and Ronald L. Numbers, eds. When Science and Christianity Meet. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Russell, Colin A., Hooykaas Reijer, and David Goodman. The Conflict Thesis and Cosmology. Milton Keynes, UK: Open University Press 1974.
- Sardar, Zaiuddin, ed. The Touch of Midas: Science, Values, and Environment in Islam and the West. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 1984.
- Thompson, Keith. Before Darwin: Reconciling God and Nature. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2005.

Scientology

See Church of Scientology.

Scottish Episcopal Church

During the Reformation of Christianity in the 16th century, Protestants of the Reformed tradition fought with Scotland's rulers, who were Roman Catholics, for control of the country. In 1560 the Scottish Parliament rejected papal authority and reformed the church along Presbyterian lines. A Reformed liturgy was introduced in 1564. The Church of Scotland became a Presbyterian establishment. However, a nominal episcopacy remained in place, protected by some powerful people who adhered to a more Roman approach to Christianity. James IV (who in 1603 also became James I of England) favored the bishops, and as soon as he felt secure on the throne, he began to pick away at the Presbyterians' establishment. In 1610 he secured orders from the Church of England for the Scottish bishops. Two years later he reinstated them in their dioceses and slowly reintroduced other changes.

Charles I (r. 1625–1649) asserted the supremacy of the Crown in Scotland and in 1634 tried to impose a Book of Canons that would bring the Church of Scotland closer to the Church of England. Through the new archbishop of Canterbury, William Laud (1573–1645), he enforced a High-Church approach to worship. In 1637 he imposed a new liturgy on the Scottish church that was like the one used in the Church of England. His attempt to enforce his will on a rebellious nation actually led to his downfall, the establishment of the Commonwealth in England under Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), and the abolishment of the episcopacy in both England and Scotland. The monarchy was re-established in 1660. Both Charles II (r. 1660–1685) and James II (r. 1685–1688) were Catholics.

St. Andrew Episcopal Church in Turriff, Aberdeenshire, Scotland. (James Kelly/Dreamstime.com)

In 1661, after Charles II ascended to the throne, Parliament annulled all acts affecting religion passed since 1633 and restored the episcopacy as it had been under Charles I. Four new bishops were appointed for Scotland and consecrated by bishops of the Church of England. The Presbyterians were now disenfranchised. After the Glorious Revolution that brought William II and Mary (r. 1689–1702) to the throne, the religious order changed again. Presbyterians were again placed in charge of the established Church of Scotland, which once again became a Presbyterian Church. It has remained such to this day.

Those who favored the Episcopal order protested. They were especially strong in the more northern part of Scotland. They finally won some toleration in 1712 and, while never reinstated, continue to this day as the Scottish Episcopal Church. Supporters suffered somewhat during the period 1745–1792, when a set of penal laws made it illegal for Episcopalians in Scotland to possess church buildings or to hold public services. Ministers were not allowed to minister to more than five persons at any one time.

The Scottish Episcopal Church is at one with the belief and practice of the Church of England. It would be to this church that former members of the Church of England in the newly formed United States would turn when the British bishops initially refused to consecrate a bishop for the now independent American colonies. In 1874 the Scottish bishops consecrated Samuel Seabury (1729–1796), who had been elected as a bishop by Anglican clergymen in Connecticut. His agreement with the consecrating bishops led to the inclusion of some distinctive elements of the Scottish liturgy into the American liturgy.

After the penal laws were repealed, the church experienced a growth phase and began to acquire buildings, many of which are still in use. In 1982 it modified its form of governance. A general synod composed of three houses (bishops, clergy, and laity) is now the highest legislative body.

The church is led by its primus, one of the bishops who is selected by the House of Bishops. There are currently seven dioceses. The church has experienced some membership losses in the 1990s to the present. In 2006, it reported 44,000 members in 310 parishes. It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Scottish Episcopal Church
21 Grosvenor Crescent
Edinburgh EH12 5EE
United Kingdom
<http://www.scotland.anglican.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of England; Church of Scotland; Roman Catholic Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Van der Bent, Ans J., ed. Handbook/Member Churches/World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.

Wingate, Andrew, et al., eds. Anglicanism: A Global Communion. London: Mowbray, 1998.

Secular Humanism

See Council for Secular Humanism.

Secularization

The spirit and movement of separating public life from religion and faith is known today as secularization. Secularization is the process of drawing something or someone away from a religious orientation or religious loyalty. In this way, secularization, far from being an inevitable or linear consequence of modernity, is a dynamic and changing historical movement, led by individuals and groups who seek to differentiate religion from culture, state, and society. This article is a basic introduction to and historical review of the movement, the theoretical understanding of the process, and the contemporary responses of religion to secularization.

The term “secularization” comes from the Latin saeculum, which in the early Christian period meant “era” or “world.” Early Christians separated what they called the kingdom of God from the earthly world. The world was thought to be an established space separated from God’s province—an idea that modern thinkers suggest facilitated the planting of the “seeds” of secularization within the religion of Christianity. And indeed, the tension between medieval Christendom and empire was a difficult and troubled relationship, with each party pushing back and forth over questions of authority and power. These tensions escalated and eventually provoked the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century. The Reformation created a space where Christians expressed multiple approaches to the world, whether in withdrawal (the Mennonites and Anabaptists); the more neutral arrangement with the state found in the Lutheran communion; or in a form of theocracy as was found in the Reformed tradition, expressed variably in John Calvin’s Geneva, the English Puritan Revolution, and the American Boston Puritan Commonwealth of New England.

An elderly Turkish woman holds a national flag during a pro-secularism rally in Istanbul, Turkey, on April 29, 2007. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In the 17th century, secularization took a new and even revolutionary turn with the Enlightenment. Secularists, led by David Hume (1711–1776) in England and Voltaire (1694–1778) in France, sought intentionally to attack Christianity and to remove its power from public life. Intellectual and political leadership advanced the French Revolution (1789), putting forward a universalist vision of reason that would deter and displace religion, unseating the clerics, vanquishing superstition, and bringing forward a secular and, therefore, rational government and culture. The displacement of religious authority was paramount to and motivated by the hope of progress for all humankind. This movement cannot be underestimated; it blossomed into the development of a secularized elite that shaped the political, cultural, and social structures of modern European nations.

The English and American revolutions of 1642 and 1776 matched the power of the French Revolution in many ways. Some claim that these revolutions generated an equal and perhaps more powerful Anglo-American DNA of modernity, whereby universal reason was mixed with religion; religious liberty partnered with democracy, while Christianity would have no state monopoly. Nevertheless it thrived. After the separation of church and state, primarily expressed in the American experiment, the open cultural and religious markets created not only economic and political liberty but also religious liberty that clerical entrepreneurs would exploit. This experiment in democracy and open religious markets was the engine of the intense American engagement with religion in general and with Christianity in particular.

These were unique trajectories in the Anglo-American and European religious evolutions. European nations have consistently expressed greater secularity; religious membership has declined and the importance of religion in the lives of Europeans has continued to decrease. Some explain this phenomenon as a result of the sponsorship of religion in many European states. The conjecture is that bureaucracies have undercut the motivations of religious leaders. In the United States, because of an open religious market, religions could not depend upon the state but had to make it on their own. Nonetheless, one of the most recent trends in American religious life is the doubling of those who self-identify as claiming no religion, a number that has reached as high as 15 percent of the U.S. population in recent surveys. In general, however, the American experiment in religious freedom has tended to create a much more religious society than its European counterparts.

Theories and Responses to Secularization Max Weber, the German sociologist of the early 20th century, argued that secularization was a function of rationalization. This rationalization of human consciousness created disenchantment—the withdrawal of belief in the divine causality of the universe. That is, moderns (and here he meant Europeans) had lost confidence and belief in invisible agents that would answer prayers or direct human destiny. Emile Durkheim, the French sociologist at the turn of the 20th century, argued that the process of differentiation in modern life separated various spheres of culture and society so that religion no longer impacted or regulated education, social welfare, health, economic behavior, or even family life to the extent that it had in the past. This process undercut the authority of religious figures and their traditions. Religion had become privatized, impacting only the interior lives of individuals rather than shaping their broader public life. This description of the effects of modernity on religion were not so much based on empirical evidence but on prescription, indeed, advocacy for the compartmentalization of religion and its marginalization from culture. The 19th-century French intellectual Auguste Comte (1798–1857), who coined the term “sociology,” posited three stages of humanity: the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. Comte advocated for a new Religion of Humanity, based on scientific positivism that could and would elevate humanity beyond the earlier more primitive stages of development. Few sociologists took him up on his scientific utopianism but many concurred that religion should be superseded by a more rational science of human morality.

The 20th-century thinking in the sociology of religion was deeply shaped by Peter L. Berger, the Austrian émigré to the United States. In the 1960s, Berger’s theory of a passing sacred canopy set the dialogues on secularization in the second half of the 20th century. Berger suggested that the pluralism of modern culture, a result of rationalization and differentiation, undercut the plausibility structures of religious belief and practice. Berger suggested that without a sacred canopy to legitimate religious belief, moderns would turn away from faith and belief in God. Secularization, as a function of modernity, became an established theory to explain secularization in modern religious life. Other theorists, such as Thomas Luckman, suggested that moderns had “an invisible religion,” by which they pursued a private orientation of personal purpose and meaning.

In the 1990s, however, scholars such as Jose Casanova, began to question the applicability of secularization theory and whether it was a plausible explanation for modern religious life. Indeed, Casanova argued for the de-privatization of religion, such that religion had once again become a definitive characteristic shaping culture and political life. Some suggested that after the fall of the Iron Curtain, religions were no longer under the coercive force of the Cold War and, therefore, could engage more freely in politics. Others suggested that religion was, in fact, key to many of the recent liberation movements: the fall of the Iron Curtain; the overthrow of apartheid in South Africa; and the American civil rights movement, which was led by African American religious figures. Thus, secularization appears as an inadequate explanation for modern religious life; religion continues to have enormous impact on both private purpose and political actions.

In the contemporary era, three important trends in religion further challenged the inevitability of secularization. First, the rise of religious extremism over the last 20 years presents a challenge to secularization and its core claim that religion and public life are separated in modern life. Religious extremists, in all the major world religions, have used violence to make their points to address social and political grievances. Second, the Southern Hemisphere has witnessed an explosive growth of Charismatic and Pentecostal forms of Christianity in Asia, Latin America, and Africa. David Martin has suggested that global Pentecostalism is the religion best adapted to globalization. It is an egalitarian religion, enabling entrepreneurial agents everywhere to start ministries wherever they live; as a pneumatic and anti-intellectual form of religion, it can adapt to nearly every cultural form, particularly among dispossessed communities that benefit from the promise of healing miracles and the growing emphasis on prosperity; and finally, it is a movement that readily uses modern technology to appeal and communicate its message.

What we have found is that secularization is neither an inevitable nor linear process. There is a formidable array of cultural and intellectual advocates who claims that secularization is a natural result of modernity. But even as intellectuals, like Sam Harris and Christopher Hitchens, and scientists, like Richard Dawkins and Daniel Dennett, describe secularization, they are also its advocates. Evidence shows that, especially in the United States, their campaigns have made a dent in decreasing the percentages of Americans who claim to be Christian; the numbers reflect a decline from 85 percent 20 years ago to 75 percent today. Nonetheless, the spread of cultural pluralism in Western cultures has created a multiplication of open religious markets that allows religious entrepreneurs to communicate their messages and fight for their causes. Today, secularism is very much a live option; the idea that it is more present today than in the past is probably true. But as to its inevitability, we know that far from being a natural conclusion to an inevitable modern process, it is in fact a function of historical, cultural, and political activists who seek to secularize culture and society with mixed results.

James Wellman

See also: Anabaptism; Calvin, John; Globalization; Mennonites; Modernity; Reformed/Presbyterian Tradition.

References

- Berger, Peter. The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1969.
- Bruce, Steve. God is Dead: Secularization in the West. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2002.
- Casanova, Jose. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Martin, David. On Secularization: Towards a Revised General Theory. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2005.
- Smith, Christian. The Secular Revolution: Power, Interests, and Conflict in the Secularization of American Public Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Swatos, William H., Jr., and Daniel V. A. Olson, eds. The Secularization Debate. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000.
- Wellman, James K., Jr., ed. Belief and Bloodshed: Religion and Violence across Time and Tradition. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2007.

Sedevacantism and Antipopes

In the wake of the Second Vatican Council, several arch-conservative Roman Catholic groups began to adopt a critical attitude toward the hierarchy. The largest of these groups later became the Society (or Fraternity) of Saint Pius X, under the leadership of French archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991). Lefebvre, however, never questioned the legitimacy of Pope Paul VI (1897–1978), or that of his successors. Lefebvre's view was that they were leaders of dubious doctrines and actions (thus justifying Lefebvre in promoting what, according to Rome, amounted to a schism), but did not conclude that such wrongdoings should automatically invalidate their papal canonical role. Inside and outside the Society of Saint Pius X, more radical groups emerged, each concluding that, after the Second Vatican Council, the popes had lost their legitimacy as a result of their heretical teachings; this implied that the Holy See of Rome (Latin: Sedes) was technically “vacant”—that is, there was no legitimate pope. Hence the name of Sedevacantism was given to the movement, which was vehemently critical of Lefebvre and his Society. The latter, in fact, although critical of the pope, continued to pray for him in its Masses with the ritual formula una cum Pontifice nostro (in unity with our pope). Sedevacantists regarded what they called the una cum Masses as ipso facto invalid, just as both Sedevacantists and members of the Lefebvre movement regarded Masses celebrated according to post–Second Vatican Council liturgical renewal as invalid.

Sedevacantism was never a well organized movement, consisting as it did of several small groups, often divided on questions of leadership and on the finer points of how non–una cum Masses should be celebrated. The very fact that they considered the Holy See to be vacant meant that Sedevacantists by definition could not recognize an international authority, and it kept the movement divided. Some influential centers did emerge, however. Many Sedevacantist leaders were consecrated as bishops in the late 1970s and early 1980s by arch-conservative Vietnamese archbishop Pierre-Martin Ngo-Dinh Thuc (1897–1984). Those consecrations, not authorized by the Vatican, were, according to Roman Catholic canon law, illicit but not invalid (and they led ultimately to Thuc’s excommunication). That meant that Thuc’s consecration of the Sedevacantist leaders as bishops was regarded as valid, although they were automatically excommunicated. They were, however, according to Roman Catholic canon law, “real” bishops, with the power to consecrate other bishops in turn and to ordain priests (forthwith excommunicated by virtue of the fact of their ordination by an excommunicated bishop). The question is quite important in Catholic canon law and doctrine, which states that a validly ordained priest (although excommunicated), when pronouncing the words of the consecration in the Mass, really does convert the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ (something an invalidly ordained priest is not empowered to do). Thus, thanks mostly to Archbishop Thuc (who died in 1984 fully reconciled with Rome) and to more than 100 “Thuc bishops” ordained directly or indirectly by him, Sedevacantists could rightly claim to have “real” priests and to be able to offer “real” Masses to their followers.

Among those consecrated by Thuc was Father Michel Guérard des Lauriers (1898–1988), who prior to the Second Vatican Council had been a respected Catholic Dominican academic theologian and had joined Lefebvre in 1970 and left him in 1977. Guérard was initially regarded as a leading intellectual light in the international Sedevacantist network. He insisted, however, that he was not technically a Sedevacantist and that his position was slightly different. In his Cassiciacum theory (originally expounded in 1979 in the journal Les Cahiers de Cassiciacum), Guérard explained that the Holy See was vacant only “materially”; “formally” Paul VI (as, later, his successors) could still be regarded as pope. Only if a significant number of cardinals and bishops were prepared to start a canonical process against the pope would he cease to be the “real” pope also “formally” (and not only “materially”). Guérard criticized both Lefebvre (who regarded Paul VI as pope both formally and materially) and the Sedevacantist majority (for which Paul VI was not the pope, neither formally nor materially). Guérard’s complicated theory succeeded in rallying only one section of the Sedevacantist network around him. The Cassiciacum theory is currently promoted by the Italian-based Mater Boni Consilii Institute and by a number of U.S. groups, in part originating from former Dominican bishop Robert McKenna (b. 1927), who was consecrated bishop by Guérard himself in 1986. Among them are the Saint Dominic Chapel in Highland, Michigan (www.stdominicchapel.com), founded by Robert L. Neville (b. 1972), ordained to the priesthood into the Society of Saint Pius X in 1996, who was consecrated a bishop by McKenna in 2005; and the Most Holy Trinity Seminary, founded in September 1995 and directed by Donald J. Sanborn, also a former member of the Society of Saint Pius X, who in 2002 was also consecrated a bishop by McKenna.

Sedevacantism (not connected with the Cassiciacum theory and regarding the Holy See as vacant in both the formal and the material sense) has its main centers in Mexico, thanks in particular to the activities of a “Thuc bishop,” Moisés Carmona-Rivera (1912–1991), who, together with Adolfo Zamora Hernandez (1910–1987, yet another “Thuc bishop”), founded the Union Católico Trento and the Seminar of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary in Hermosillo (Sonora, Mexico). In the early 1980s, a popular Sedevacantist leader in the United States was Francis Schuckhardt (1937–2006), who in 1967 had founded the Congregation of Mary Immaculate Queen (CMRI, from its Latin name) at Mount Saint Michel near Spokane, Washington, and subsequently broke with Rome in 1970. Schuckhardt, however, was accused of a number of personal wrongdoings and had to leave his own community in 1984; in 1987 he was found in possession of illegal drugs and arrested in California. After his release from jail, he established a semi-clandestine organization known as the Oblates of Mary the Immaculate (not to be confused with the Roman Catholic religious order of the same name). Some former members also claim that Schuckhardt was preparing to declare himself Pope Hadrian VII and had begun dressing as a pope (a website by his supporters is available at <http://www.bishopshuckhardt.com>). CMRI survived, however, and even prospered in its post-Schuckhardt phase, with the help of the Mexican Sedevacantists and under the leadership of Bishop Mark Anthony Pivarunas (b. 1958), consecrated by Carmona-Rivera in 1991. In 1993, Pivarunas in turn consecrated as bishop Father Daniel L. Dolan (b. 1951), who converted his parish of St. Gertrude the Great in Cincinnati from a Society of Saint Pius X Mass center to the central point of a network of priests following the Cassiciacum theory extending to several nearby states. Loyal to a “pure” form of Sedevacantism (as opposed to the Cassiciacum theory) is, on the other hand, the Society of St. Pius V, established in New York in 1983 by nine priests who left the Society of Saint Pius X. The majority of them later adopted the Cassiciacum theory and left the Society of St. Pius V, which currently continues its activities under the leadership of Father Clarence Kelly (b. 1941), who was ordained a bishop in 1993 by Mons Alfredo Méndez-Gonzalez (1907–1995), retired bishop of Arecibo, Puerto Rico, at that time a Roman Catholic bishop in good standing.

There may be some 10,000 Sedevacantists throughout the world, with the most important centers in the United States, Mexico, France, Italy, Germany, and the Czech Republic. The small Japanese group Seibo no Mikuni, founded in 1970 by Yukio Nemoto (1925–1988), remains largely isolated because of its peculiar millennial beliefs. Most of them believe that forming a central organization would be tantamount to establishing a schismatic alternative to the Roman Catholic Church. They prefer to remain a network of small groups and see themselves as the only surviving remnant of the one true post-Second Vatican Council Catholic Church. One of their main problems is how to respond to the issue of the future of Catholic authority. By definition, they regard the pope as essential for the church’s very survival and infallibility, but, at the same time, they maintain that there is no (legitimate) pope in Rome at present. A large majority of Sedevacantists dismiss as non-canonical, and even ridiculous, the very idea that they could convene a conclave and elect a pope of their own; they prefer to wait for a solution to come directly, and perhaps unpredictably, from God, whose ways, they say, are after all not human ways. A few Sedevacantists, on the other hand, are “conclavist”—that is, they believe a conclave should be called (composed of all, or at least most, Sedevacantist bishops) and a new pope duly elected. Conclavists realize nonetheless that, should a conclave be organized, the majority of the Sedevacantist bishops would refuse to attend it, and that some groups (such as the Italian Association of St. Mary Salus Populi Romani, headquartered in Turin, Italy) regard a conclave as certainly desirable but, at least for the time being, impracticable. Attempts have been made to organize a conclave, however: in 1994, for example, some 20 Sedevacantist bishops from 12 different countries met in Assisi, Italy, and elected as pope a South African priest (and former student at Lefebvre’s seminary), Victor Von Pentz (b. 1953), under the name of Linus II. He currently resides in the United Kingdom and maintains but a limited following.

Some conclavists have, on the other hand, joined other alternative popes (“antipopes,” according to Roman Catholic theology), who, even before the full development of the Sedevacantist network, had claimed that their role was based both on the alleged heresies of the Second Vatican Council and on mystical visions calling them to the pontificate without the need of any conclave or election. One of the earliest “pretenders” was a French priest, Michel-Auguste-Marie Collin (1905–1974), who claimed to have been called by heaven itself to become Pope Clemens XV during the Second Vatican Council, in 1963. Collin established an alternative Vatican in Clémery, Lorraine, where he also founded a Renewed Church of Christ, known outside France as the Church of the Magnificat. After Collin’s death in 1974, his church nearly collapsed entirely, and it is now reduced to a small remnant of what it once was. One of Collin’s followers, however, the Québec priest Gaston Tremblay (b. 1928), had already ceased to recognize the French claimant in 1968 and had proclaimed himself Pope Gregory XVII. His movement is called the Apostles of Infinite Love.

Tremblay’s main competitor was Clemente Domínguez y Gómez (1946–2005), one of the seers in the alleged Marian apparitions of Palmar de Troya, Spain (1968–1976), and later a “Thuc bishop,” consecrated by the Vietnamese archbishop on January 11, 1976. In 1978, Domínguez (in the meantime blinded in a car accident in May 1976) revealed that he had been mystically designated by Jesus Christ as the new pope in a 1976 vision, and his followers confirmed his election as Pope Gregory XVII (the same name adopted by Tremblay in Québec). His Catholic, Apostolic, and Palmarian Church (named after the town of Palmar de Troya) is probably the single largest organization bowing to the authority of an “alternative” pope, with more than 1,000 followers in Spain and several hundreds more internationally. In the 1990s, however, Domínguez was accused of sexual immorality with several nuns of the order he had established in the meantime; in 1997 he admitted his sins and asked for his community’s forgiveness. Most followers remained loyal to Domínguez and, after his death in 2005, to his hand-picked successor, former lawyer and “Thuc bishop” Manuel Alonso Corral, who became Pope Peter II. Others, however, have both doubted the sincerity of Domínguez in his apology and questioned his decision to appoint a successor rather than leave this choice to a conclave including the many cardinals he had in the meantime appointed from among his bishops. At the end of 2000, 17 bishops with a couple of hundred followers left the Palmarian Church and formed a splinter movement known as The Tribe.

Other claimants to the role of pope have included Father Gino Frediani (1913–1984), the parish priest of Gavinana (province of Pistoia, Italy), who in 1973 claimed to have been mystically consecrated by Jesus Christ and several Old Testament prophets as Pope Emmanuel I. He gathered several hundred followers; after his death, a hundred have remained active in his New Church of the Holy Heart of Jesus under the leadership of his successor, Father Sergio Melani (who, however, makes no claim to being the new pope). A couple of dozen rival “antipopes” operate in several countries, but none of them have more than a handful of followers. Among them are Father Lucian Pulvermacher (b. 1918), who in 1998 proclaimed himself the new pope under the name Pius XIII (<http://www.truecatholic.us>); and David Allen Bawden (b. 1959), living in the Kansas countryside, once a seminarian with the Society of Saint Pius X (where he had never been ordained to the priesthood), who on July 16, 1990, was elected by a group of six laypeople (including three women) as Pope Michael.

A special position is nonetheless maintained by William Kamm (b. 1950), a German-born Catholic lay preacher living in Australia and known as “Little Pebble.” It is claimed that the Virgin Mary has revealed to Kamm that the post–Second Vatican Council popes, including John Paul II and Benedict XVI, are indeed legitimate (contrary to the Sedevacantist thesis). On the other hand, heaven has designated Kamm as a future pope under the name Peter II. Kamm gathered more than 1,000 followers in several countries, some of them living communally and most of them members of a religious order known as the Order of Saint Charbel (named after the popular Catholic Lebanese saint Charbel Maklouf [1828–1898]). The Australian Catholic bishops, despite his protests, have repeatedly branded Kamm’s organization as schismatic and not a legitimate part of the Catholic Church. Their position seemed vindicated when in 2005 and 2007 Kamm was sentenced to two jail terms for sexual relations with two minor girls. Kamm did not deny the relations, but claimed that the Virgin Mary in an apparition had authorized him to take as many as 84 “mystical wives.” Kamm is now in jail and will not be eligible for parole before 2013. Many followers have left the Order of Saint Charbel and only a handful remain loyal to Kamm.

Mater Boni Consilii Institute
Località Carbignano 36
10020 Verrua Savoia (Torino)
Italy
<http://www.sodalitiumpianum.com>

Most Holy Trinity Seminary
1000 Spring Lake Highway
Brooksville FL 34602

St. Gertrude the Great
4900 Rialto Road
West Chester OH 45069
<http://www.sgg.org>

Our Lady of the Rosary Chapel
15 Pepper Street
Monroe, Connecticut 06468
<http://www.rosarychapel.net>

Seibo no Mikuni
33-2 Aza Ubasaku Oaza
Matuzuka, Sukagawa-shi
Fukushima 969-04
Japan

Catholic, Apostolic, and Palmarian Church
Abad Gordillo 5
Apartado 4058
41080 Sevilla
Spain

Congregation of Mary Immaculate Queen (CMRI)
Mount St. Michael
8500 N. St. Michael's Road
Spokane, WA 99217-9333
<http://www.cmri.org>

St. Pius V Church
Eight Pond Place
Oyster Bay Cove, NY 11771
<http://www.sspv.net>

One Holy Catholic Church Inc. (Pope Michael)
Box 74
Delia KS 66418-0074
www.vaticaninexile.com

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Apostles of Infinite Love; Fraternity/
Society of Saint Pius X; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Cekada, Anthony. The Nine vs. Lefebvre: We Resist You to Your Face. 2008. www.traditionalmass.org/images/articles/NineVLeFebvre.pdf.
- Cuneo, Michael. The Smoke of Satan: Conservative and Traditionalist Dissent in Contemporary American Catholicism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Delestre, Antoine. Clemens XV: prêtre lorrain et pape à Clémery. Metz, France: Serpenois, 1985.
- Des Lauriers, Michel Guérard. "Le Siège Apostolique est-il vacant?" Cahiers de Cassiciacum 1 (1979). Historia Sagrada o Santa Biblia Palmariana de Grado Superior según el Magisterio Infalible de la Iglesia. 3 vols. Seville, Spain: Santa Sede Apostolica, 2001.
- Le ultime volontà di Dio per la Terra nascoste nei Profeti dell'Antico e del Nuovo Testamento*. Gavinana, Italy: Aggeo, 1984.
- Paladino, Francesco Maria. Petrus es tu? Chateaufort, France: Delacroix, 1997.
- "The Little Pebble": The Last Pope: A Man of Contradiction: Petrus Romanus, Sinner or Saint? Nowra, New South Wales: William Kamm, 1999.

Seicho-No-Ie

Seicho-No-Ie (SNI; House of Life) is one of the older of the many so-called new religious movements (shinshukyo) of Japan, emerging (unlike so many of the others) prior to World War II. It is also one of the most successful at recruitment and self-propagation and one of only a relative handful of recently founded Japanese religions to have headquarters in North America, Oceania, Europe, and South America. Indeed, only a little over 40 percent of its 1.8 million followers (SNI's official estimate) are Japanese.

SNI was founded in 1930 by a charismatic individual, Masaharu Taniguchi (1893–1985), who, after many early personal setbacks and disappointments, managed to educate himself by reading a spectrum of Eastern and Western philosophical, psychoanalytic, and spiritual texts. Additionally, his early adult life and thought were especially shaped by his four-year participation in Omoto-kyo, a recently founded faith that practiced healing and taught a Gnostic-like synthesis of monotheism and spiritualism. He also believed himself to have healed his young daughter of a serious illness through affirmations and meditative prayer, and reported at least one mystical experience. On the basis of such experiences and influences, including the writings of Ernest Holmes, founder of the Religious Science movement, Taniguchi launched his religious movement with the publication of a magazine. Two years later he published the first installment of what would evolve into the 40-volume scripture of SNI, Seimei no Jisso (Truth of Life), more than 16 million copies of which have now been sold.

For anyone familiar with the American New Thought tradition, there is little that appears original in Seicho-No-Ie's doctrine, for metaphysically the extreme idealistic monism of the latter clearly reflected that of the former. Accordingly, Taniguchi taught that: (1) only God and God's manifestation as the spiritual "World of Reality" (Jisso) are real; (2) humanity is essentially a part of that world and therefore perfect, though ignorant of that truth; (3) the entire material, phenomenal world is insubstantial and illusory, the product of thought, and therefore malleable by the mind and words; and (4) the proper goal of the religious or spiritual life is to awaken to the truth about one's infinite nature and innate perfection, and thus to realize and manifest such things as wisdom, love, joy, prosperity, and (perhaps above all) health. Taniguchi expressed these convictions in his more than 400 books as an eclectic mixture of Christian and Buddhist language and concepts, slightly tinged with Shintoist beliefs. Although a prolific writer and effective synthesizer and popularizer of existing ideas, he was hardly an original thinker. Indeed, he always insisted that he was merely presenting the essential core of truth common to all the world's religions.

His one unique contribution to the New Thought tradition was in the area of spiritual practice, for it appears that he alone within that movement actually presented a technique by which adherents could access the inner and essential divinity they claim to possess. He proposed a type of daily meditation, shinsokan, which involves a kneeling posture, palms pressed together at eye level, the recitation of a sutra, an empowering shout, focused meditation, and some closing affirmations. In addition, he recommended chants and slogans, the most common being expressions of gratitude, which Taniguchi regarded as the most healing mindset of all.

Seicho-No-Ie's organization is patriarchal and centralized. Since Taniguchi's death, it has been under the leadership of his son-in-law and adopted son, Seicho, a strong leader and prolific writer in his own right. The ruling body, the Hombu, operates out of the headquarters, from which it oversees all training events, rallies, seminars, and conferences. Beneath the governing body are regional, prefectural, and local centers. The last of these, called soai-kai (mutual love societies), comprise all adult male members plus three affiliate societies for women, youth, and young adults. The soai-kai generally meet monthly for scripture reading, lecture-style teaching, testimonials, and fellowship. Most of this takes place in private homes, though there are a modest number of churches scattered over Japan, as well as two temples in the Nagasaki and Kyoto prefectures.

Ever since its inception, SNI has struggled internally, and occasionally under governmental pressure, over whether it constituted a publishing concern, an organized religion, a spiritual movement, or simply a way of life. In addition, it has experienced some controversy from its ultraconservative political stance, first manifested as an extreme dedication to the emperor in the 1930s and blossoming into outright militarism during World War II. As a result Taniguchi was officially silenced during the American occupation, and the membership declined. After the ban was lifted, he began to promote a renewal of national pride and patriotism. He and the organization also took strong positions against abortion and for education, advocating traditional values, constitutional revision to restore the emperor's sovereignty, and the revival of the use of the national anthem, flag, and holidays.

Seicho-No-Ie spread internationally, initially through the Japanese diaspora, but increasingly via an intentional, though not terribly aggressive, missionary impulse. The official estimate of SNI members mentioned above is probably much more realistic than the 4 to 5 million sometimes claimed by enthusiastic adherents. The Japanese headquarters maintains an Internet site in Japanese and English at <http://www.sni.or.jp/>. The American headquarters in California sponsors an English-language site at <http://www.snitruth.org/>.

Seicho-No-Ie Foundation
266, 3-chome, Harajuku
Shibuya-Ku, Tokyo
Japan

Paul Alan Laughlin

See also: Religious Science.

References

- Clarke, Peter B., ed. Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective. London: Curzon, 2000.
- Ellwood, Robert S. The Eagle and the Rising Sun: Americans and the New Religions of Japan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974.
- Gottlieb, Nanette, and Mark McLelland, eds. Japanese Cybercultures. London and New York: Routledge, 2003.
- McFarland, Neill. The Rush Hour of the Gods. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Taniguchi, Masaharu. Truth of Life. Tokyo: Seicho-No-Ie Foundation, 1961.

Sekai Kyusei Kyo

Founded in 1935 by Okada Mokichi (1882–1955), a former associate of Omoto (Great Origin), Sekai Kyusei Kyo, or the Church of World Messianity (referred to henceforth simply as Messianity), is concerned primarily with performance of the johrei ritual, which consists of the transmission of divine light for the purpose of constructing an earthly paradise. Johrei is administered by a member who, wearing an amulet, or ohikari, raises the palm of her or his hand over the recipients, who may or may not be believers, and imparts to them the divine light of healing.

Okada developed a causal theory of illness that linked it to spiritual clouds that could be dispersed not only by the practice of johrei but also by the use of herbal remedies. He was also persuaded that certain kinds of illness are beneficial. For example, the common cold serves to cleanse the body, which would otherwise be rendered dysfunctional by toxic substances. Shizen noho, or natural farming, is also a fundamental part of Messianity's teachings and practices.

There are various views among followers as to whether Okada is divine or human. For example, some members, particularly in Brazil, equate him with Jesus; others see him as the Messiah of the present age. Initially Okada proclaimed himself to be the Bodhisatva Kannon, long venerated in Japan as the very essence of compassionate mercy, and later as the Messiah of the New Age. Regardless of whether they regard him as divine or human, all refer to him as Meishu-sama, sama being an honorific such as sir or lord or senhor.

Messianity, as is the case with many other new Japanese religions, is emphatically millenarian and preaches the coming of an earthly paradise resulting from an ever-increasing outpouring of divine light by means of johrei and shizen noho, which is essentially agriculture without the use of toxic chemicals. This approach to agriculture is based on the belief that nature possesses its own intrinsic resources, which are sufficient in themselves to bring forth wholesome crops and plants in abundance.

The movement has an estimated 900,000 members in Japan and is present in many parts of the world. It is particularly strong in Brazil and Thailand, where the membership in both countries is more than 300,000. Messianity is inclusive where belief and practice are concerned. It does not demand of new members who belong to another faith that they abandon it upon joining. The movement has sympathizers and practitioners among some of the Catholic clergy of, for example, Brazil and Bolivia, and in recent times it has attracted some 300 Theravada Buddhist monks in Sri Lanka who now both receive and transmit johrei.

Messianity consists of two main institutions, the Church of World Messianity and the Mokichi Okada Foundation, the former focusing on spiritual matters and the latter on cultural activities including sangetsu, or flower arranging and horticulture. Differences between the two branches are becoming increasingly blurred as the leadership attempts to present johrei not as the core practice of the Church of World Messianity as such but as a nondenominational healing ritual that can be effectively administered by any religious or secular institution that has the necessary “faith” in its curative powers. “Faith” here does not mean a belief in a non-empirical, supernatural order, for in the case of johrei the recipient is provided with proof of its beneficial effects before being asked to accept that it has the power to produce them.

Although at present united, Messianity has experienced serious internal divisions, and this has meant the establishment of a number of different branches, each with its own headquarters. Today the main headquarters are at Atami, and the world president is the Reverend Tetsuo Watanabe. Among those who hold the highest positions of spiritual leadership is the grandson of Mokichi Okada, the Reverend Yoichi Okada. The Mokichi Okada Foundation has an extensive Internet site in both English and Japanese at <http://www.moa.or.jp/n>.

Sekai Kyusei Kyo
Izunome Kyodan
26-1 Momoyama-cho
Atami, Shizuoka
Japan
<http://www.moa-inter.org.jp/> (site for Mokichi Okada Foundation)

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Omoto; Shinto.

References

- Clarke, Peter B. “Modern Japanese Millenarian Movements: Their Changing Perception of Japan’s Global Mission with Special Reference to the Church of World Messianity in Japanese New Religions.” In Japanese New Religions in Global Perspective, edited by Peter B. Clarke, 129–182. London: Curzon, 2000.
- Ellwood, Robert S. The Eagle and the Rising Sun: Americans and the New Religions of Japan. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974.
- Foundations of Paradise*. Los Angeles: Church of World Messianity, 1984.
- Teachings of Meishu-Sama*. 2 vols. Atami, Japan: Church of World Messianity, 1967–1968.

Self-Realization Fellowship

The Self-Realization Fellowship (SRF) was founded in 1935 by Paramahansa Yogananda (1893–1952), a Hindu swami (monastic) who first came to the United States in 1920 to lecture to the International Congress of Religious Liberals meeting in Boston and sponsored by the American Unitarian Association. Yogananda was the disciple of Swami Sri Yukteswar (1855–1936), a guru with a concern to reconcile science with the spiritual knowledge of India. Yogananda was college educated and fluent in English. In 1922 he founded a center in Waltham, Massachusetts. In 1924 he embarked on a speaking tour of the United States, attracting large audiences in urban areas. In 1925, Yogananda established his headquarters on an estate on Mount Washington in Los Angeles. He continued lecturing to large crowds. In 1935 his organization, formerly known as the Yogada Satsang Society, was incorporated as the Self-Realization Fellowship. The SRF has a hermitage in Encinitas, a temple in San Diego, and the Church of All Religions in Hollywood, and in 1950 the Lake Shrine complex was dedicated at Pacific Palisades, California.

After Yogananda’s death, the SRF was led by James J. Lynn (1892–1955), who after taking sannyasa (monastic renunciation) was known as Rajarsi Janakananda. Following his death in 1955, Sri Daya Mata, an American woman, has served as president of the SRF.

Yogananda is the author of the well-known Autobiography of a Yogi, first published in 1946 and translated into 18 languages. His account of his meetings with Eastern and Western mystics is intended to demonstrate that spiritual truth is found in all religions. Yogananda is regarded by his devotees as a premavatar, an incarnation of divine love. He taught that it is possible to realize the experience of oneself as being one with God through yogic and meditative techniques. The SRF exists to propagate Yogananda’s teachings, and it offers a home-study course based on Yogananda’s lessons that culminates in initiation into a technique called kriya yoga, which the disciple pledges not to reveal. The SRF sponsors a monastic order for men and women and operates a publishing house. SRF altars include images of Krishna and Christ, who are regarded as the two ultimate sources of SRF doctrines. As of 1992 there were several hundred thousand initiates into SRF kriya yoga with varying levels of commitment to the organization.

Shrine of the Self-Realization Fellowship, Encinitas, California. (J. Gordon Melton)

Controversies have surrounded leading teachers' splitting away from the SRF and establishing their own organizations. J. Donald Walters, known as Kriyananda, formerly a minister of the Church of All Religions and a vice president of the SRF, separated from the SRF in 1962 to launch his own teaching career. In 1968 he founded Ananda World Brotherhood Village in Nevada City, California. He is a popular speaker on the New Age circuit and offers his own home-study course along with other published materials.

The SRF oversees more than 500 temples and meditation centers now located in 54 countries. In India, SRF is still known as the Yogoda Satsanga Society. It has its national headquarters in Dakshineswar (near Calcutta). It oversees 90 meditation centers and 21 educational institutions.

Self-Realization Fellowship
3880 San Rafael Ave.
Los Angeles, CA 90065-3298
<http://www.yogananda-srf.org/>

Catherine Wessinger

See also: Meditation; Yoga.

References

- Thomas, Wendell. Hinduism Invades America. New York: Beacon Press, 1930.
- Wessinger, Catherine. "Hinduism Arrives in America: The Vedanta Movement and the Self-Realization Fellowship." In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, 173–190. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Yogananda, Swami Paramahansa. Autobiography of a Yogi. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1970.

Selwyn, George Augustus

1809–1878

George Augustus Selwyn was the first Anglican bishop of New Zealand. Consecrated as one of the youngest bishops in the Church of England, he reordered the church in his assigned territory and then spent the next quarter of a century pioneering Anglican work throughout Melanesia, where churches retain a primal relationship to the New Zealand diocese to the present. In the process he also pioneered the mobilization of lay leadership in Anglicanism.

Selwyn was born at Hampstead, England, on April 5, 1809. Showing some promise as a student in his youth, his parents sent him to preparatory school at Ealing, and then to Eton College. He completed both his bachelor's degree (with honors, 1831) and master's degree (1834) at St. John's College at Cambridge University. Meanwhile, he decided to enter the ministry and was successively ordained as a deacon (1833) and a priest (1834) in the Church of England. In 1839, he married Sarah Harriet Richardson.

The church initially turned to Selwyn's older brother William in their search for someone both capable and willing to undertake leadership of the emerging Anglican Church in New Zealand, then little known and located halfway around the world. When William turned down the offer, the opportunity to become the first bishop of New Zealand was presented to Selwyn and he accepted. He was still in his 30s when he was consecrated as a bishop in October 1841. Before departing, he stopped at Oxford and Cambridge universities, both of which gave him honorary doctorates in divinity. Selwyn occupied himself on the long voyage by studying Maori, the language of the Native New Zealanders. Once in the islands, he became a fluent speaker and discovered an ability to use his knowledge of Maori in picking up the related languages used on other islands. Also during the voyage he developed a friendship with William Martin (1807–1880), the first chief justice for New Zealand. That relationship would continue for the rest of his life.

Selwyn and his wife arrived in Auckland on May 30, 1842, and took up residence at the Bay of Islands station of the Church Missionary Society (CMS), one of the two missionary agencies overseeing much of the Anglican global missionary program. Over the next years, he traveled widely and encouraged the development of the congregations of his diocese. He also led in the organization of the diocesan synod and the laying out of parish boundaries.

As he began to impose the parish structure on New Zealand, the emergent church assumed authority that for a generation had been in the hands of the CMS. He eventually broke off relationships with the CMS and as a result was forced out of the CMS facilities where he had lived. He moved the headquarters of his diocese to Auckland. At issue in the break with the CMS was his refusal to divide the church's work into two separate divisions, one among the Native people, over which the CMS would retain hegemony, and one that was to work among the European settlers, of which his diocese would consist. He refused to segregate the Maori people, a choice that became evident when the Native students at the College of St John the Evangelist (commonly known as St John's College) shared in all classes and other activities with the European students. Selwyn's policy angered many European settlers and clergy who subsequently boycotted the college, but he carried most of the church with him.

In 1857, after more than a decade of work and extensive consultations, Selwyn led a conference that created a Constitution of the Church of the Province of New Zealand. The constitution offered both laity and clergy equal rights in managing the affairs of the church in New Zealand, a most novel idea in its time. In preparation of this act, Selwyn had led in the formation of a second diocese (the Diocese of Christchurch, 1856) and the selection of its first bishop, Henry John Chitty Harper. Two years later, he set up a third diocese based in Wellington, Waiapu, and Nelson. With three dioceses in New Zealand, it was possible to organize a province, and in 1859, Selwyn became its first primate/metropolitan. He presided over the first General Synod meeting in Wellington that same year.

In addition to New Zealand, Selwyn assumed hegemony for the church throughout Melanesia (seemingly assigned to him due to a clerical error back in England). When first imagined, the northern boundary of the New Zealand diocese was designated as the 34th parallel "south" of the equator, however, when the document finally defining the diocese was published, "south" was replaced with "north." Selwyn never questioned the document; he simply acted as if no error had been made. In the 1850s he began to travel among the scattered islands. Among his self-assigned tasks, he sought out capable young people in the congregations and brought them to New Zealand to attend St. John's College. By 1861, he was able to enlarge his province and consecrated John Coleridge Patteson (1827–1871) as the first bishop of Melanesia.

Selwyn proved immensely valuable as a force moving the Anglican cause forward in New Zealand and Melanesia, but in the process made a number of long-term critics. They were finally, in the mid-1860s, able to gain the audience of the church's leadership in England. Thus it was that in 1867, when Selwyn visited his homeland to attend the conference of bishops at Lambeth Palace, he was "asked" to settle in England and become the next bishop of Litchfield. After a brief trip back to the islands, he left for good on October 20, 1868. Chief Justice Martin retired at the same time and also moved to Litchfield, where their friendship continued.

The return to England had significant consequences for the Church of England. Selwyn introduced his idea concerning lay leadership in his new the diocese, and through that act presented it to his episcopal colleagues. He also accepted additional responsibilities for the international church, which led to several trips to North America, where he negotiated the changing relationship between the American and Canadian churches and the archbishop of Canterbury.

Selwyn died at Litchfield, on April 11, 1878, and was buried at Litchfield Cathedral. He was later memorialized in the founding of Selwyn College at Cambridge University (1882) and the naming of the theological college in Dunedin, New Zealand, after him.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand, and Polynesia; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Lambeth Palace.

References

- Boreham, F. W. George Augustus Selwyn, D. D. Pioneer Bishop of New Zealand. London: S.W. Partridge, 1911.
- Davidson, Allan K. Christianity in Aotearoa: A History of Church and Society in New Zealand. Wellington, New Zealand: Education for Ministry, 1997.
- Limbrick, W. E. Bishop Selwyn in New Zealand 1841–68. Palmerston North, New Zealand: Dunmore Press, 1983.
- Taylor, H. W. Memoir of the Life and Episcopate of George Augustus Selwyn, D. D. Bishop of New Zealand, 1841–1869; Bishop of Litchfield, 1867–1878. 2 vols. London: William Wells Gardner 1879.

■ Senegal

Senegal is an African nation on the Atlantic Ocean between Mauritania and Guinea Bissau. It also shares borders with Guinea and Mali. The long, narrow nation of Gambia occupies the Gambia River valley and sits on the Atlantic coast, but is otherwise completely surrounded by Senegal. Senegal's 12,850,000 people, consisting of multiple African peoples, occupy the 74,000 square miles of land.

Senegal has been inhabited since prehistoric times. At the time of European contact, it was home to the Wolof, Fulani (with many subgroups), Serer, and Tukeler, among other peoples. The French colonized the area in the 17th century and took from it many people who were then enslaved in their American colonies. Slavery was abolished in 1848, but France faced continual opposition to its rule through the end of the century. In the 18th century, an Islamic kingdom had been established by Abdel Kader Torodo. In 1776 he adopted the title almany (prayer leader) and created a strong theocratic system that proved quite resistant to French control. Senegal obtained its independence in 1960. It had a relatively prosperous two decades under its democratic government, but has been hard hit by the encroaching Sahara desert since the drought of 1983.

Traditional religions remain alive among Senegal's peoples, but they have been steadily replaced over recent centuries by Islam. Less than 10 percent of the population still adhere to the faith earlier identified with their people, the majority residing among the Diola and Serer. Islam first arrived in the area in the 11th century. Some Berber leaders had traveled to Mecca and returned with a young scholar who was given space for a learning center on the Senegal River. An exponent of the Malikite School of Islam, he attracted many followers later known as Almoravids, who developed an army and eventually established a large kingdom that reached to the Mediterranean. In the 12th century, the capital was moved to Marrakesh (Morocco). Today, the West African office of the World Muslim Congress resides in Dakar.

An important aspect of Islam in Senegal involves the prominent Sufi brotherhoods, the first to arrive being the Qadiriyya, said to have been founded by 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani, who died drumming; their 300,000 members have become known by the publication and international circulation of some of their drumming music on compact discs. Larger than the Qadiriyya, with some 400,000 members, are the Muridiyya, founded toward the end of the 19th century in Senegal by Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba (ca. 1853–1927). Their name means those who seek after progress on Street in Saint-Louis, Senegal. The city, founded by the French in 1659 as a slave-trading center, sits near the mouth of the Senegal River. (iStockPhoto.com)

Islam's mystical path. Still larger is the million-member Tijaniyya Sufi Order, who look to Shaykh Ahmad al-Tijani (1737–1815) as their founder. The order has spread throughout West Africa. The orders tend to be exclusivist, an aspect of their life that was opposed by Shaykh Touré and some Muslim intellectual colleagues who founded the Union Culturalle Musulmane in 1953. As the new century begins, more than 85 percent of the Senegalese profess Islam.

Christianity came to Senegal in the 15th century with the arrival of the Portuguese. In the 1480s, a Senegalese chief named Behemoui traveled to Lisbon, where he underwent baptism in 1486. Subsequently, in the 1490s, the first Christian centers were opened in Ziguinchor, just north of the present-day border of Guinea Bissau. Senegal was included in the diocese of Funchal (headquartered on the island of Madeira) in 1514.

Early in the 19th century, the French Catholic Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny launched a new era of growth for the Roman Catholic Church. The Vicariate of the Senegambia was erected in 1863. In 1955 Dakar was named an archdiocese, and the first African archbishop was consecrated in 1962. Since that time, a push has been made to create a more Africanized priesthood.

Protestantism came to Senegal with members of the Reformed Church of France under the auspices of the Paris Mission. However, few of the missionaries could handle the environment, and most died before any productive work could be established. It was not

Senegal

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	3,838,000	11,757,000	88.3	2.66	16,168,000	23,035,000
Ethnoreligionists	332,000	810,000	6.1	2.26	820,000	800,000
Christians	230,000	664,000	5.0	2.73	880,000	1,216,000
Roman Catholics	183,000	610,000	4.6	2.42	800,000	1,100,000
Independents	5,100	20,000	0.2	7.23	30,000	45,000
Protestants	4,100	12,300	0.1	3.59	20,000	32,000
Agnostics	0	43,400	0.3	2.64	70,000	110,000
Baha'is	2,400	25,400	0.2	2.64	45,000	70,000
Atheists	0	8,800	0.1	2.64	12,000	20,000
Buddhists	0	1,600	0.0	2.63	2,000	2,500
New religionists	100	1,000	0.0	2.66	1,500	3,000
Total population	4,402,000	13,311,000	100.0	2.64	17,999,000	25,257,000

until 1936 that they were joined by the Worldwide Evangelism Crusade. Since World War II, a variety of Protestant and Free church groups have arrived, all limited by pressure from the Muslim community against proselytizing activities. The most response by the Senegalese has been to the New Apostolic Church (which reports some 10,000 members), the Lutheran Church (of Finnish origin), the Assemblies of God, and the Jehovah's Witnesses. Some of the conservative evangelical churches are associated in the Evangelical Fellowship of Senegal, which is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance. There is no Senegal-based church that is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Senegal defines itself as a secular country with freedom of religion, in spite of the Muslim majority. This unusual situation was highlighted by the election of a Catholic to the presidency of the country in 1962. No Hindu or Buddhist groups have been visible in Senegal, though there is a small presence by the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Malikite School of Islam; Muridiyya; New Apostolic Church; Paris Mission; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Reformed Church of France; Roman Catholic Church; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; World Muslim Congress.

References

- Babou, Cheikh Anta. Fighting the Greater Jihad: Amadu Bamba and the Founding of the Muridiyya of Senegal, 1853–1913. Columbus: Ohio University Press, 2007.
- Behrman, L. C. Muslim Brotherhoods and Politics in Senegal. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970.
- Callaway, B., and L. E. Creevey. The Heritage of Islam: Women, Religion and Politics in West Africa. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1994.
- De Dianoux, H. J. "La christianisme au Sénégal." L'Afrique et l'Asie modernes 4 (1981): 3–22.
- Delcourt, J. Historie Religieuse du Sénégal. Dakar: Clairafrique, 1976.
- Diouf, Mamadou, and Leichman, Mara A., eds. New Perspectives on Islam in Senegal: Conversion, Migration, Wealth, Power, and Femininity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.
- Mbacke, Khadim. Sufism and Religious Brotherhoods in Senegal. Princeton, NJ: Markus Wiener Publishers, 2005.

■ Serbia

The present state of Serbia emerged in 2006 as the remnant of the former Federated Republic of Yugoslavia, which step by step broke apart between 1991 and 2008. The most recent loss of the Province of Kosovo left Serbia with 29,900 square miles of territory and 10,200,000 citizens (2008). Landlocked, Serbia is surrounded by Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Hungary, Kosovo, Macedonia, Montenegro, and Romania.

The former Federated Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) emerged out of World War II and the defeat of the occupying Germans. It broke apart, and Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia declared their independence. The continuing FRY included Serbia and Montenegro. Meanwhile, Serbia's President Slobodan Milosevic (1941–2006) launched a campaign to unite all the ethnic Serbians into a larger Serbia. Through the first decade of the new century, the Federated Republic of Yugoslavia disintegrated. In 2003, the FRY changed its name to Serbia and Montenegro, the name change reflecting a loosening of the federation binding the two republics. Three years later, Montenegro seceded from the federation and subsequently declared itself an independent nation. Serbia responded by declaring itself the successor state to the former union of Serbia and Montenegro and hence the FRY. Continuing hostilities in Kosovo led the province to declare its independence from Serbia in 2008.

In the second century BCE, Rome conquered the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea and established the province of Illyria over its people. As its territory expanded, it founded a number of cities, including Belgrade. When the Roman Empire was divided into eastern and western regions, the border between the two halves ran through Yugoslavia. Roman control gave way to a variety of invading peoples who moved into the area from the north and west. The last were the Slavs, who eventually dominated the region. The Byzantine Empire moved in to take control of the Slavic population.

Serbia became independent of the Byzantine Empire in the 12th century. Then, in the 14th century, the Turkish Ottoman Empire began its push up the Danube River. Much of Serbia fell to the Turks following the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, and by the end of the century Serbia had disappeared as a political entity. In 1690 the Serbs revolted, and after the revolt was crushed, the Turkish authorities relocated thousands of

Neogothic cathedral of the city of Novi Sad in Serbia at dawn, 2008. (Netfalls/Dreamstime.com)

Albanians to the Kosovo region in the southern part of Serbia.

Turkish authority began to weaken noticeably late in the 18th century. In 1829, Serbia emerged as an autonomous province within the empire, though it was not until 1882 that Serbia became an independent nation. In 1905 neighboring Montenegro became independent. World War I brought an end to the Austro-Hungarian Empire that had gained hegemony over former Ottoman territories north and east of Serbia (Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia, Herzegovina), and in the 1920s, Yugoslavia was formed as an attempt to assert the unity of the southern Slavic peoples. Not included at first, Slovenia was added after World War II.

Postwar Yugoslavia was seen as a federation of republics, and its many ethnic groups were held together for many years by strongman and dictator Marshall Tito (Josef Broz) (1892–1980). The federation fell apart at the beginning of the 1990s as Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia withdrew and established independent states, though Montenegro remained united with Serbia until 2006.

Serbia inherited a large, heavily armed military from the federation's breakup. Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic launched a campaign to bring those areas of the new independent nations that were dominated by ethnic Serbs back into Serbia. As a result war erupted, first in Croatia, then Bosnia and Herzegovina, and eventually in Kosovo (where a large number of ethnic Albanians resided). Kosovo existed as an autonomous province of Serbia, and Milosevic attempted to end their independent status. To accomplish his goal, Serbian troops attempted to kill or drive out the ethnic Albanian residents. The war was brought to an end only with the intervention of U.S. and European armed forces. Milosevic was subsequently arrested for his role in war crimes committed in Kosovo, but died before his trial could be brought to a conclusion.

In spite of the presence of United Nations troops, violence again erupted in Kosovo in 2004. As new negotiation on the province's future proceeded, at the beginning of 2006, Montenegro seceded from the federation and declared itself an independent nation. Two years later Kosovo declared its fully independent status relative to Serbia.

Christianity had entered Serbia during the Roman period and had become a dominant force by the time the empire withdrew. The various peoples who flowed into the territory in succeeding centuries brought new forms of Paganism, but eventually, by the ninth century, Christianity had reasserted itself. The church came under the authority of the Ecumenical Patriarchate during the years of Byzantine rule, but following the establishment of an independent Serbian nation declared its independence from Constantinople. The break with Constantinople was further emphasized in 1346, when the Serbian archepiscopacy at Pec was elevated into a patriarchate. When the Turkish Ottoman Empire conquered the Balkans in the 14th century, the new authorities suppressed the Serbian Patriarchate and placed the church under the archbishop of Ohrid (Macedonia). The Serbian Patriarchate was not re-established until 1557, but it was again suppressed in 1766 and the Serbian church again placed under the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The struggle for the re-emergence of Serbian Orthodoxy began in 1832, when some degree of autonomy was granted. However, it would not be until after World War I that a united Serbian Orthodox Church was created (1919) and the following year the Serbian Patriarchate once again allowed to exist. It was not named the official state church, but it enjoyed a number of prerogatives as the church of the ruling elite. Its favored status and financial benefits were dropped by the Marxist government that came to power in 1945.

In 1919 the Macedonian Orthodox Church had been integrated into the Serbian Church, but it became independent in 1967. Meanwhile, the movement of various ethnic peoples during the era of Turkish rule is manifest today in the congregations of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the Romanian Orthodox Church, and the Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania, still found in Serbia.

Although the Roman Catholic Church was the majority faith in neighboring Croatia, it was very much the minority in Serbia. Nevertheless, it has had a presence through the centuries. In the 16th century, an Eastern-rite Catholic Church developed in Croatia as a Roman counterpart to the Serbian Orthodox Church. From headquarters at the Marcha Monastery, efforts were launched to convert members of the Serbian Church to Roman Catholicism. The church was given its own diocesan bishop in 1777. When the 20th-century nation of Yugoslavia was created, the Diocese of Krizevci was extended to include all of the country, and it drew members from a variety of predominantly Orthodox ethnic groups (Ukrainians, Serbians, Macedonians, Romanians). Its status as a multinational diocese is presently under consideration. Since the breakup of Yugoslavia, Latin-rite Catholics are under the archbishop of Belgrade (named a metropolitan archbishop in 1986).

Protestants came into Serbia during the 16th century. The autonomous Province of Vojvodina (the northernmost part of Serbia) became the center of Lutheran congregations among Hungarian, Slovak, and German ethnic groups. In the 20th century, two separate churches emerged, the Evangelical Church in the Socialist Republics of Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the Autonomous Province of Vojvodina, the primary German-speaking church, and the Slovak Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Yugoslavia. The former church was at one time a large body, the overwhelming majority of its members being relocated outside Yugoslavia after World War II. The far larger Slovak Church had been connected with the Lutheran Church in Hungary, but it became autonomous in the 1920s following the formation of Yugoslavia.

The Reformed Church also established itself in Vojvodina and Croatia, and like the Lutherans was structurally part of the Reformed Church of Hungary. This church survived through World War I and became autonomous in 1933 as the Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia.

Following World War II the German members left, and under the persecution of the Tito regime, many Hungarians returned to Hungary. In the 1990s, the Croatian membership was set apart as an autonomous church. Through the decade, as the wars continued, many Serbians came to Vojvodina, and many Hungarian-speaking people decided to leave. Both the Reformed and Lutheran churches in Vojvodina are

SERBIA

Serbia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	4,621,000	6,329,000	80.7	-0.82	6,866,000	6,876,000
Orthodox	3,848,000	5,406,000	69.0	-0.82	5,854,000	5,820,000
Roman Catholics	546,000	380,000	4.8	-1.31	400,000	420,000
Independents	31,200	120,000	1.5	0.93	200,000	240,000
Agnostics	1,224,000	740,000	9.4	-1.22	400,000	200,000
Muslims	200,000	540,000	6.9	-0.91	500,000	470,000
Atheists	906,000	224,000	2.9	-1.78	90,000	50,000
Jews	7,000	3,000	0.0	-0.91	3,000	3,000
New religionists	1,200	2,000	0.0	-0.90	3,000	5,000
Ethnoreligionists	500	1,600	0.0	-0.91	1,800	2,000
Baha'is	200	1,500	0.0	-0.90	3,000	5,000
Total population	6,960,000	7,841,000	100.0	-0.91	7,867,000	7,611,000 members of the World Council of Churches, and they form the backbone of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Yugoslavia.

The Baptist Church in Yugoslavia began in 1875 when Heinrich Meyer, the German Baptist leader from Budapest, baptized the first three members of the congregation at Novi Sad. These three people and many of the other early members had been associated with the Nazarenes, a Baptist-like pacifist movement that had previously spread through the region. This original work was primarily among the German-speaking residents of the Yugoslav nations, and it collapsed after World War II. However, in 1898 a second work was initiated among the Slovak-speaking population that developed into a Baptist conference in 1918. Two years later work began among Hungarian Serbians.

In 1924 the Baptist Union of Yugoslavia was formed. It was disrupted by the breakup of the federation in 1990, and Baptist congregations in each of the new countries organized separately. A new Baptist Union of Yugoslavia was organized in 1992. It includes a number of small congregations in Serbia and one in Montenegro. The Methodist Episcopal Church (now a constituent part of the United Methodist Church) began work in Vojvodina in 1898 among German-speaking residents in Bachka. It later spread in the Hungarian-speaking community. These churches were the heart of the Yugoslavia Mission Conference, created in 1922. Methodism grew in spite of its not receiving official recognition by the government. The church suffered first by a drop in support from the United States during the Great Depression, and then the loss of the majority of its German-speaking members following World War II. It survives as a very small body whose members are part of the United Methodist Church's Macedonia-Serbia Annual Conference, which is part of the larger Central Conference of Central and Southern Europe.

Through the 20th century a variety of Protestant and Free church groups established work in Yugoslavia. The missions begun by both Pentecostals and the Seventh-day Adventist Church have survived and are now among the most substantive churches in the country. The largest Pentecostal church is the Evangelical Church. Several Evangelical sending agencies continue work in the new century that was launched prior to the breakup of the federation, including the Pocket Testament League and Campus Crusade for Christ.

There is a small Jewish community in Yugoslavia centered on Belgrade, which continues a Jewish community in the region that dates to the Roman period. The community that survived the Holocaust is centered on Belgrade, and it includes some 2,000 members. Members are united by the Federation of Jewish Communities of Yugoslavia.

The Muslim community of Yugoslavia was strongest in Kosovo, and Kosovo Muslims, many of Albanian ethnicity, were among the people targeted by Serbian forces during the civil war in the 1990s. Many died, and others were forced to leave the country. The community reorganized in the aftermath of the war, before which they represented between 15 and 20 percent of the population. In breaking with Serbia, Kosovo has left the country with only a miniscule Muslim community in Turkey. The remaining Muslims are primarily Sunnis of the Hanafite School.

Several Eastern religions were established in Yugoslavia as the Marxist regime came to an end. Most prominent among them are two Buddhist groups, the Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhists and the Kwan Um Zen School. Hinduism is represented by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. There are also a small number of members of the Baha'i Faith.

As this encyclopedia goes to press, Serbia remains in transition. Many of the church communities are in the process of changing their names to reflect the country's name changes.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Bulgarian Orthodox Church; Ecumenical Patriarchate/Patriarchate of Constantinople; Hanafite School of Islam; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Karma-Kagyupa Tibetan Buddhism; Kwan Um School of Zen; Lutheran Church in Hungary; Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia; Roman Catholic Church; Romanian Orthodox Church; Serbian Orthodox Church; Slovakia; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Broun, J. "Religion in Yugoslavia: The Background." America 165 (November 30, 1991): 414–416.
- Cox, John K. The History of Serbia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.
- Dirizings, Ger. Religion and the Politics of Identity in Kosovo. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- Flere, S. "Denominational Affiliation in Yugoslavia, 1930–1989." East European Quarterly 25 (June 1991): 145–165.
- Frid, Z., ed. Religions in Yugoslavia: Historical Survey, Legal Status, Church in Socialism, Ecumenism, Dialogue between Marxists and Christians, etc. Zagreb, Croatia: Binoza, 1971.
- Norris, H. T. Islam in the Balkans: Religion and Society between Europe and the Arab World. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.
- Perica, Vjekoslav. Balkan Idols: Religion and Nationalism in Yugoslav States. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Shenk, N. G. "The Social Role of Religion in Contemporary Yugoslavia." Ph.D. diss., Northwestern University, 1987.

Serbian Orthodox Church

The Serbian Orthodox Church traces its roots to the missionary work launched from Constantinople in the second half of the ninth century CE, which produced a Christian Byzantine-Slavonic culture in the region. Serbia became independent of Constantinople toward the end of the 10th century, and its ruler, Steven Nemanja (1168–1196), worked to suppress non-Christian religion in his realm. The first partial ecclesiastical independence of the Serbian land was soon established under the country's first archbishop, Saint Sava (1176–1235). The year 1217 is generally seen as the founding date of the Serbian Orthodox Church. From that time, worship has followed a Serbian liturgy. In 1375 a local patriarchate was established.

This autonomy was gradually suppressed under centuries of Turkish domination that began after the Battle of Kosovo in 1389. Serbia ceased to exist as a separate political entity in 1463. It became the target of both Russia and the Austro-Hungarian Empire toward the end of the 18th century, and while still a part of the Ottoman Empire, it began to re-emerge as a state early in the 19th century. In 1878, as Turkish power waned, the Congress of Berlin recognized Serbia as an independent country.

The restoration of the patriarchal office occurred in 1879, the year after Serbia gained its independence. In the last half of the 20th century, the Serbian Orthodox Church was subject to countless persecutions, first from the Croatian nationalist regime during the years of World War II, and then by the Yugoslavian government that came to power after the war. After the fall of the Communist regime at the beginning of the 1990s and the dissolution of Yugoslavia, the Serbian Orthodox hierarchy did not hesitate to condemn the atrocities committed by members and representatives of its own people. Moreover, the Serbian church, alone among the Orthodox churches in the former Communist countries, has witnessed a complete reconciliation with its members abroad, especially in North America, who had left the patriarchate during the years of Marxist rule.

Candles in Serbian Orthodox monastery, Kakovo, Greece. (Zoran Simin/Dreamstime.com)

The Serbian Orthodox Church is noted for a very conservative position within the Orthodox world. Along with the Monastic Republic of Mount Athos, it is the only canonical Orthodox jurisdiction in the Balkan area that did not accept the adoption of the Gregorian calendar. The Serbian Orthodox Patriarchate has also offered the most consistent and articulate criticism of the ecumenical involvement of sister Orthodox jurisdictions.

The church is Eastern Orthodox in belief and practice. A unique aspect of the Serbian church is the Slava, a celebration of the patron saint of a family, which takes the place of the usual Orthodox nameday feast. The patron saint of a family, handed from father to son and never changed, has been traced to the times of the first Serbian Christians; it is an example of enculturation of the Christian faith into an ancient Pagan practice (the veneration of Pagan family idols) that was not suppressed but transformed by Christian piety.

The Serbian Patriarchate has more than 8 million faithful in the former Yugoslavia, with a diaspora all over the Western world (particularly in Germany, North America, and Australia). Dioceses may now be found in Romania, Bosnia, Croatia, France, Germany, Sweden, the United States, Canada, and Australia. The Cathedral of St. Sava in Belgrade is one of the largest church buildings in the Orthodox world. The Serbian Orthodox Church may also be credited with a certain success in evangelizing the Gypsies. The church is, in spite of its criticisms of some forms of ecumenism, a member of the World Council of Churches.

Serbian Church
ul. Kralja Petra Br. 5
PO Box 182
FRY-110 01
Belgrade
Serbia

Andrea Cassinascio

See also: Athos, Mount; Cathedral of St. Sava; World Council of Churches.

References

- Spasovoc, Stanimir. The History of the Serbian Orthodox Church in America and Canada, 1941–1991. Trans. by Nedeljko Lunich. Belgrade: Printing House of the Serbian Patriarchate, 1998.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.
- Velimirovich, Nikolai. A Treasury of Serbian Orthodox Spirituality: The Serbian People as a Servant of God. Trans. by Theodore Micka and Steven Scott. Grayslake, IL: Free Serbian Orthodox Diocese of the United States and Canada, 1988.

Serpent Handlers/Signs Following Movement

Serpents have been a source of mystery and great symbolic significance in human cultures for thousands of years, frequently playing a role in religious ritual. Spiritual leaders have handled snakes for a variety of purposes. Handling poisonous serpents as an expression of faith, and as a focal point of worship, emerged only in the early 20th century as the Holiness movement was giving birth to Pentecostalism. Nearly a century later, the taking up of serpents remains among the most enigmatic developments in the chronicling of religious movements.

The practice of handling serpents in worship services probably began in 1908. A few years later the practice was occurring in church services in the Appalachian region of east Tennessee. So too was the practice of drinking poison (usually strychnine). Why did people engage in such seemingly bizarre and dangerous practices? From their perspective the answer was simple: the Bible commanded that believers do so. Mark 16:18 says: “They shall take up serpents; and if they drink anything deadly, it will by no means hurt them.”

Passages from sacred texts can go virtually unnoticed for long periods of time and then, seemingly, appear suddenly and become the basis for a schism or a significant movement. Such was the case with these verses about handling snakes and drinking poison.

The enigma surrounding this practice is not so much the fact that a group of people decided to take this verse of scripture literally. Rather, the mystery is the fact that this verse is encased in three additional verses that would become the core of the 20th-century Pentecostal movement (Mark 16:15–18). The first verse is Christ’s commandment to preach the gospel to every creature on Earth (usually referred to as the Great Commission). Then, on either side of the verse about serpent handling and drinking poison, is the promise that those who believe in Christ and are baptized will (1) cast out demons; (2) speak with new tongues; and

(3) lay hands on the sick and they will recover. The beginning of this scripture reads: “And these signs will follow those who believe.”

The nascent Pentecostal movement in Appalachia believed that all five of these “signs” were both the promise of God and a commandment that was to be obeyed. The churches they founded often contain “signs following” in their name. The broader Pentecostal movement readily embraced tongues, healing, and the casting out of demons, but it did not act upon the references to snakes and poison without controversy. In Appalachia, the emerging Pentecostal tradition entertained these controversial ideas for some years before “signs followers” were marginalized.

George Went Hensley was probably the first to take up the practice of handling serpents in religious services; there is little question that he popularized the practice (Kimbrough 2002, 192). But it was A. J. Tomlinson, the leading figure of the issuant Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), who popularized and lent a measure of legitimacy to serpent handling. Tomlinson invited Hensley to preach in his church in 1914 and later that year wrote enthusiastically about snake handling in the Church of God Evangel. Four years later, Tomlinson asked Hensley to join the denomination, and he accepted.

Serpent handling spread rapidly during the second and third decades of the 20th century, and the Church of God clearly lent legitimacy to this development. In 1928, following a near fatal snakebite, the practice was formally banned in the Church of God. Thereafter, serpent handling would find its niche on the margin of society, where it has remained for the better part of a century. Reports of occasional deaths from snakebite aroused public indignation. During the 1940s the practice was outlawed in Kentucky, Georgia, and Virginia, but that seemed only to reinforce the commitment of the faithful to practice their beliefs.

Although systematic data about how many people participate in serpent handling have never existed, it seems clear that their number has never been very large. Current estimates by scholars who study snake handlers range from about 2,500 down to no more than a few hundred.

For its size, there is probably no other religious movement that has been the subject of more writing and investigation. Journalists and scholars alike have frequently focused on sensationalist themes and characterization of the snake handlers as “bizarre,” “exotic,” “eccentric,” and “grotesque.” No small number have found significance in the snake as a phallic symbol. More serious scholarly literature has focused on psychopathology. Appalachia has been viewed as a culture under tremendous stress, and participants in snake handling have been seen as suffering both economic and cultural deprivation.

During the 1990s a group of scholars moved beyond sensationalizing and interpreting serpent handlers’ behavior as an indicator of pathology or deprivation. Rather, they found patterns of behavior that are both functional and readily understandable within the context of normal behavior. As with all religions, the faith of the serpent handlers provides communal solidarity (Kimbrough 2002). Their faith gives meaning to their lives as well as spiritual integration (Hood 1998). There is a substantial literature that indicates that serpent handlers are not very different from their community peers (Burton 1993). Finally, contrary to the presumption of most who wrote about snake handlers for most of the 20th century, the new breed of scholars are skeptical about the prospects of this sectarian movement disappearing anytime soon.

Jeffrey K. Hadden

See also: Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Holiness Movement; Pentecostalism.

References

- Brown, Fred W., and Jeanne McDonald. The Serpent Handlers. Winston-Salem, NC: John F. Blair Publishing, 2007.
- Burton, Thomas. Serpent-Handling Believers. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Covington, Dennis. Salvation on Sand Mountain. New York: Penguin, 1995.
- Hood, Ralph W., Jr. “When the Spirit Maims and Kills: Social Psychological Considerations of the History of Serpent Handling Sects and the Narrative of Handlers.” International Journal for the Psychology of Religion 8, no. 2 (1998): 71–96.
- Kimbrough, David L. Taking up Serpents. Athens, GA: Mercer University Press, 2002.

Servetus, Michael

1511–1553

Michael Servetus was a physician and intellectual who became a martyr for Unitarianism. His persecution and execution with the consent of John Calvin entirely on the ground of his having advocated unorthodox religious opinions is seen five centuries later as the major blot on Calvin’s otherwise distinguished career.

Servetus was born at Villanova, Spain, and later studied law in France at Toulouse. He developed an interest in theology during his student years, and as early as 1530 expressed his skeptical opinions and doubts about the Trinity to Protestant Reformer Johann Oecolampadius (1482–1531). His publication of his views in a book, Concerning the Errors of the Trinity, occasioned his moving first to Lyon, where he assumed a low profile as an editor and proofreader, and then on to Paris, where he studied medicine under a pseudonym. While in Paris he appears to have come to an understanding of the circulation of the blood a century ahead of its formal discovery by William Harvey. He left Paris in 1538, due to conflict over his lecturing on astrology.

Servetus returned to Lyon and then in 1544 was offered a position as the personal physician to the archbishop of Vienna. During these years he operated under several pseudonyms. As Villeneuve, for example, he carried on a confidential correspondence with Calvin. As early as 1546, he sent Calvin the manuscript of his book Restitution of Christianity, which was eventually published in 1553. When it was discovered that Servetus had actually authored this later book, he was arrested in Vienna. He escaped, however, and headed for Italy. On his way he stopped in Geneva, where he was recognized and again arrested.

Servetus’s own theological reflections were grounded in an awareness that both Muslims and Jews considered the doctrine of the Trinity as an attack on the unity of God. He also turned his attack on the Trinity into a defense of God’s unity. He concluded with what had been the major dissenting view on the Trinity, that God was One, that Christ was not divine, and that the Holy Spirit was simply the name of God’s power. Pursuing his theological interests in the atmosphere of the Reformation, however, he also concluded, in agreement with some of the Anabaptist themes, that the church (then generally seen as including all people) should be reorganized as a community limited to those who believe and that infant baptism should be replaced with believer's baptism. He developed a rather mystical approach to the Eucharist, believing that believers could partake of divinity and participate in God. Such beliefs were considered heretical by both Protestants and Catholics.

Once arrested, Servetus became the subject of a lengthy trial during which all of his heretical opinions were aired. The court did not miss the fact that his opinions not only attacked Christian orthodoxy, but also supported the opinions of Muslims and Jews. He was condemned and burned at the stake in Geneva on October 27, 1553. Though not directly involved in the proceeding, Calvin is held responsible for Servetus's death considering his power at that time in Geneva.

Servetus did not raise up a community of believers nor did he participate in one, but in more recent years he has been seen as aligned with the Unitarian phase of the Reformation more commonly associated with Socinius. He is also seen as a pre-eminent example of a person persecuted for his beliefs alone, and has been viewed as a martyr for the cause of religious freedom.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anabaptism; Astrology; Calvin, John; Socinianism; Unitarian Universalist Association.

References

- Bainton, Roland H. Hunted Heretics. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953.
- Hillar, Marian. The Case of Michael Servetus 1511–1553: The Turning Point in the Struggle for Freedom of Conscience. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.
- Hillar, Marian, and Claire S. Allen. Michael Servetus: Intellectual Giant, Humanist, and Martyr. Latham, MD: University Press of America, 2002.
- Servetus, Michael. Two Treatises on the Trinity. Ed. by Earl Morse Wilbur. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1932.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and Its Antecedents Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1945.

Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1992.

Servites, Order of

The Servites, officially the Order of Friars Servants of Mary, was the last of five mendicant orders designated in the Middle Ages. Mendicant orders are forbidden to hold property in common, are not tied to a particular monastic center, and must make their living by either working or begging. Prior to the Servites, the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and the Hermits of Saint Augustine had been the only groups so organized recognized by church authorities.

The Servites trace their history to seven young men of Florence, Italy, originally related to each other through the cloth trade. While still in their youthful years, these rather prosperous young men began meeting together as a religious society established to honor the Blessed Virgin Mary. As their devotion grew, the seven abandoned their comfortable homes, fine clothes, and possessions and found a dilapidated building outside the city in which to take up residence. People noticed what they were doing and an increasing number began to visit them. Desiring a contemplative life away from much human contact, the group moved again, this time to a nearby mountain, Monte Senario.

The new religious order, which had adopted the Rule of Saint Augustine, evolved as others joined the original seven on Monte Senario. Original recognition was given to the Friar Servants of Mary by the bishop of Florence in the 1240s. Initial actions approving the group were made in Rome in the 1250s. However, controversy swelled around the mendicant orders and the challenge their unpropertied existence exerted. In 1274, a church-wide gathering, the Second Council of Lyons, implemented Canon 13 of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), which forbade the foundation of any more new religious orders. The bishops at Lyons went further and moved to suppress the half dozen mendicant order that were yet to receive their final approval by the pope. The Servites were on their list. The Council's action was noted by Pope Innocent V, who during his brief reign in 1276 declared the Order suppressed. Fortunately, Pope John XXI, the third pope to take office in 1276, took favorable notice of the Servites. Opinion remained divided for the remainder of the century and only in 1304 did Pope Benedict XI (r. 1303–1304) issue an official approval.

Of the original group that started the Order—Buonfiglio Monaldi, John Buonagiunta Monetti, Bartholomew Amidei, Ricovero Ugguccioni, Benedetto dell' Antello, Gherardino Sostegno, and Alessio Falconieri (d. 1310)—only one lived to celebrate the pope's action. Eventually the group came to be known as the Seven Holy Founders. They were canonized as saints in 1888 and given a common feast day, February 17.

The Servites spread rapidly. By the time the Order was officially approved, it already had centers in Germany, France, and Spain. Through the next century it spread across Europe and even had work in the Philippines and India. It suffered its first major setback in the 16th century in Germany with the rise of Protestantism. From then on it suffered ups and downs as countries changed their attitudes toward Rome. Meanwhile, its largest presence remained in Italy.

The Order was brought to the United States in 1852, when an Austrian priest, Father Antoninus Grundner, began working among the German-speaking Catholics in New York City and Philadelphia. Then in 1870, while in Rome for the First Vatican Council, Bishop Joseph Melcher (1806–1876), of Green Bay, Wisconsin, asked the Servites to begin work in his diocese. That act led to the Order's invitation to Chicago four years later. Chicago soon became the center of the Servites' activity in North America. By the beginning of the 20th century, the work in Europe had become concentrated in Italy and Austria-Hungary, where 36 and 17 of the 62 monasteries were located. There were also monasteries in England (four), Belgium (one), and the United States (four).

The Servites are led by their general, who is elected for a six-year term. Members profess a special devotion to the Virgin Mary that is regularly manifest in the meditation on the Seven Dolors (Sorrows) of Mary, especially on the annual commemoration in honor of the Seven Sorrows on September 15, first granted to the Servites in 1688 and later made a general feast in the church. The Servites also have affiliated an order of cloistered nuns, a third order of secular lay associates, and a lay confraternity of the Seven Dolors.

As the new century begins, Servites are found in almost all the countries of North and South America, across Europe, and in Africa, Asia, and Australia.

UNIFAS (Unio Internationalis Familiæ Servorum)

Segretaria UNIFAS

Sr. Gina Casumaro

Via Giuseppe Luigi Lagrange, 3

00197 ROMA RM

Italy

<http://www.servidimaria.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Benedictines; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Dominicans; Mary, Blessed Virgin; Roman Catholic Church; Saints.

References

- Benassi, Vincenzo. A Short History of the Servite Order. Rome: General Secretariate for the Servite Missions, 1987.
- Do Whatever He Tells You: Reflections and Proposals for Promoting Marian Devotion*. Rome: General Curia ISM, 1983.
- Ferrazzi, Thomas M. Servite Anthology: Variety of Subjects. Chicago: Pro Manuscripto, 1987.
- Servite Fathers, comp. The Servite Manual: Behold Thy Mother, a Collection of Devotions Chiefly in Honor of Our Lady of Sorrows. Servite Fathers, 1947.

Setsubun

The Japanese adopted a lunar calendar with 12 months each with 2 parts related to the new and full moon, thus giving it 24 segments. The end of each segment and the division marking it from the next segment was termed the Setsubun (or seasonal division). Over time, the term “Setsubun” began to particularly refer to the division at the end of the year and hence immediately before the lunar New Year. The New Year came as winter ended and spring began, which was believed to be the first week of February. Today the Setsubun festival is held in Japan on February 3 or 4, the day before the start of spring. The spring Setsubun festival came to be associated with rituals for chasing away evil spirits.

Revelers dressed as the devil during the Japanese festival of Setsubun. (Kingyo/Dreamstime.com)

The practices of the spring Setsubun appear to have originated in folk traditions, but over the centuries were adopted by both Shinto and Buddhist temples. By the 13th century, for example, people attempted to drive away evil spirits by mixing the stench of burning dried sardine heads and wood with the noise of drums. This custom survives in the use of fish head shapes as house decorations, the intention being to keep spirits away from the home.

Today, the most common practice of Setsubun is the throwing of roasted soy beans. They may be thrown around one's house or at temples and shrines, or at people. The act of throwing is accompanied by shouts of "Oni wa soto! Fuku wa uchi!" ("Devils out! Happiness in!").

Tied to the tossing of the beans is another custom, eating the number of beans corresponding to one's age. This is particularly a practice of people whose age is a multiple of 12, meaning that the year is the same as the year in which they were born (according to the Chinese zodiac). Local news coverage will feature stories on celebrities at different temples consuming beans. In the home, one person, usually the male head of the household (or a male who is celebrating one of his 12th anniversary birthdays), will put on a demon mask and the other family members will toss soy beans at him as they chant the traditional "Oni wa soto! Fuku wa uchi!"

In a secularized culture such as Japan, variant celebrations of Setsubun are widespread. Disbelief in the existence of evil spirits is widespread and many Buddhists offer demythologized explanations for Setsubun celebrations. At the same time, both Shinto shrines and Buddhist temples will sponsor ritualized bean-tossing events.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Astrology; Calendars, Religious; New Year's Day; Shinto; Spring Equinox.

References

- Carlquist, Helen, and Sherwin Bauer. Japanese Festivals. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle, 1965.
- Erskine, William Hugh. Japanese Festivals and Calendar Lore. Tokyo: Kyo Bun Kwan. 1933.

Seventh Day Baptist General Conference

Sabbatarianism, the belief that Saturday rather than Sunday is the proper day for Christian worship, arose among Protestants in 17th-century England. They had a basic agreement with Baptists concerning the autonomy of the local church, believer's baptism, and the authority of the Bible as the only source of faith and practice. The latter belief became crucial, inasmuch as in their reading of the scriptures they found no basis for Sunday worship. As early as 1650, a Sabbath-keeping congregation was founded in London.

In 1664, Stephen Mumford, a Baptist from Tewkesbury, moved to Newport, Rhode Island, and associated with the Baptist church there. Over the next seven years he convinced others of his Sabbatarian ideas, in 1671 establishing the first Seventh Day Baptist church in the American colonies. Those who formed the new church did not condemn those who continued Sunday worship, and they were able to maintain friendly relationships over the years. A second congregation formed in Philadelphia around 1800, and a third in New Jersey five years later. The Philadelphia group influenced some German-speaking Free church believers in the Philadelphia area, who would later create a separate German Seventh Day Baptist Conference.

Through the 18th century, Sabbatarian Baptist congregations spread across the United States. In 1802 representatives of several churches formed the General Conference. A strong emphasis on local autonomy was retained, but the Conference was given the power to carry out special tasks. Publication of Sabbatarian materials was given high priority. A missionary society was formed in 1843, and it opened work in China four years later. It subsequently began work at selected locations around the world, in most cases in response to communications from small groups of Sabbatarians asking for help.

Seventh Day Baptists formed several schools in areas devoid at the time of public education. Three of those schools became colleges. The college at Alfred, New York, became Alfred University, and in 1871 a seminary was located at the school.

In the 1850s some Seventh Day Baptists influenced Ellen G. White and her husband, James White, the founders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church. That church has become the largest Sabbatarian Christian body in the world. Through the 20th century, various groups that have separated from the Seventh-day Adventists have subsequently identified with the Seventh Day Baptists.

The General Conference was ecumenically oriented and became a founding member of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. and the World Council of Churches. However, it withdrew from both of those organizations in the 1970s, as it felt that some of their policies infringed upon congregational autonomy. However, the Conference has remained active in the Baptist World Alliance.

Late in the 20th century, after many years in Plainfield, New Jersey, the headquarters of the General Conference moved to its present location. In 2006 it reported 5,200 members in 96 churches in the United States and Canada. The Conference meets annually and elects a general council that manages its affairs.

Through the 20th century, the General Conference has nurtured Seventh Day Baptist churches in such places as Jamaica, Guyana, Malawi, Ghana, India, Burma (Myanmar), the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand. Most of those efforts have grown into autonomous conferences. In 1965 the General Conference took the lead in the creation of the World Federation of Seventh Day Baptist Conferences. By 1993, some 17 conferences from around the world were affiliated.

Seventh Day Baptist General Conference

PO Box 1678

Janesville, WI 53547-1678

<http://www.seventhdaybaptist.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baptist World Alliance; Baptists; Free Churches; Sabbatarianism; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches.

References

Sanford, Don A. A Choosing People: The Story of Seventh Day Baptists. Nashville: Broadman, 1992.

Sanford, Don A. Conscience Taken Captive: Short History of Seventh Day Baptists. Janesville, WI: Seventh Day Baptist Historical Society, 1992.

Seventh-day Adventist Church

The Seventh-day Adventists trace their roots to the activity of William Miller (1782–1849), a Baptist preacher and farmer in New York State. Miller, based on his particular interpretation of biblical passages and after several date changes, predicted the second advent of Jesus for October 22, 1844. When the final predication failed to materialize, the Millerites split into several groups led by various charismatic leaders, one of whom was Ellen G. White (nee Harmon, 1827–1915), the primary force behind the Seventh-day Adventists.

Ellen came to the Millerite movement as a teenager and began doing itinerant preaching. After the Great Disappointment, as the failure of Miller's prediction came to be known, she gathered with friends for a prayer session. During this session she had the first of approximately 2,000 visionary experiences. These experiences came to be accepted as authoritative by Seventh-day Adventists. Many of Ellen's visions form the basis of Seventh-day Adventist tenets, or confirmed tenets decided upon by the less spiritually adept members of the group. Today Ellen retains her status as a prophet in the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

Ellen eventually came to advocate the shut door policy, the idea that the October 22 date signified the entry of Jesus into the heavenly sanctuary to begin its cleansing, and that anyone who had not heard and heeded Miller's message was denied salvation. Under the influence of a Millerite preacher named Joseph Bates, Ellen also began to advocate the observance of Saturday Sabbath and a bland vegetarian diet modeled after that of the popular 19th-century health reformer Sylvester Graham (1794–1851). The policies were confirmed during visionary experiences. These two developments are the beginning of what one Seventh-day Adventist scholar refers to as restoration themes: the idea that the return of Jesus depended upon humans returning to proper observance of biblical laws.

In 1845, Ellen married another itinerant Millerite preacher, James White. Together they began earnestly working on spreading the new message. As their married life progressed, some of their stances, again legitimated by Ellen's visions, moderated. For instance, by 1851 the shut door policy became much less strict, admitting children born after 1844 and those who had not outright rejected Miller's message. By 1851 the Whites had two sons. In 1855 the Whites moved to Battle Creek, Michigan. There Ellen's interest in health and diet fully developed. Eventually, Battle Creek became the home to a massive sanitarium run by another influential Seventh-day Adventist, John Harvey Kellogg (1852–1943). Kellogg was also an advocate of dietary reform, and part of the institution's menu was a sort of dried and crumbled bread accompanied by milk and taken as a breakfast food. Kellogg's brother, Will Keith (1860–1951), took this idea and created the Kellogg's Cereal Company.

The Seventh-day Adventists are much like any mainline American Protestant denomination. However, a few unique features should be highlighted. The authority of Ellen G. White's prophecy has already been mentioned, along with observance of the Saturday Sabbath. The Great Controversy is the Adventist idea that all of humanity is now involved in a struggle between Christ and Satan about God's laws and sovereignty. Seventh-day Adventists therefore believe that they are part of a remnant church specifically called to keep the commandments and the faith of Jesus. Seventh-day Adventists teach that Christian behavior includes adequate rest and exercise, avoidance of foods identified as unclean in the Old Testament along with alcohol and tobacco, and a prohibition of "irresponsible" use of drugs and narcotics. The idea that Jesus is now ministering in the heavenly sanctuary is still an official part of Adventist belief. Seventh-day Adventists also still expect the imminent return of Jesus, but set no specific date.

The name Seventh-day Adventist was chosen in 1860; however, the denomination was not officially organized until 1863. Today the denomination is organized into four representative levels: the local churches; local conferences made up of the local churches in a state or territory; the union conference, made up of conferences in a larger territory or group of states; and the General Conference, made up of all the unions in all parts of the world. The General Conference is the highest authority for the church. An elected Executive Committee holds power between sessions of the General Conference. The General Conference is made up of 12 divisions, each with responsibility for a specific geographic area. The divisions represent every major populated area of the world.

Seventh-day Adventists emphasized missionary work from their early years. The first missionary was J. N. Andrews (1829–1883), who traveled to Switzerland in 1874. In 1890 missionary work began in the Pacific islands. The year 1894 saw Seventh-day Adventist missionaries enter Africa and South America, and in 1896 they traveled to Japan. The church now has established work in 209 countries. Although the website cites publication and distribution of Seventh-day Adventist literature as the prime factor in its worldwide success, Seventh-day Adventists have always made health and education a major part of their missionary efforts.

The church boasts 5,846 schools worldwide, along with 166 hospitals and 371 clinics. The founding of hospitals, clinics, and schools has done much to aid the global spread of Seventh-day Adventism. As reported in 2006, there were 4,820 Seventh-day Adventist churches with a membership of 980,551 in the United States. In 2007, the church reported 64,017 churches and 15,660,347 members worldwide.

Seventh-day Adventist Church
12501 Old Columbia Pike
Silver Spring, MD 20904-6600
<http://www.adventist.org>

Jeremy Rapport

See also: Adventism; Sabbatarianism; Vegetarianism; White, Ellen G.

References

- Damsteegt, P. Gerard. Foundations of the Seventh-day Adventist Message and Mission. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1977.
- Land, Gary, ed. Adventism in America: A History. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1986.
- Maxwell, C. Mervyn. Tell It to the World: The Story of Seventh-day Adventists. Rev. ed. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press, 1977.
- Numbers, Ronald L. Prophetess of Health: Ellen G. White and the Origins of Seventh-day Adventist Health Reform. Rev. ed. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Seventh-day Adventist Reform Movements

The Seventh-day Adventist Reform movements are traditionalist splinter groups that separated from the Seventh-day Adventist Church in the 1920s.

A Reform movement emerged within the Seventh-day Adventist Church during World War I, following controversies surrounding conscientious objection. The latter was a position initially advocated by the Adventist Church. Faced with the imminent threat of persecution and of the church's being banned in several countries, however, the leader of the European Division, Louis Richard Conradi (1856–1939), reversed the earlier viewpoint and asked European Adventists to serve in the military forces of their countries (even on the holy day of Saturday). Several young Adventists rejected this decision, however, and decided to defy their governments by going underground. They were supported by roughly 2 percent of German Adventists and by similar percentages in other countries.

The Reform movement originated from local initiatives and initially had no international coordination. The Adventist Church, in order to avoid problems with governments, quickly expelled the Reformists. At the end of the war, the international Adventist leadership tried to heal the division, finally firing Conradi from his position in 1922. Reconciliation, however, proved impossible. In a conference held in Friedensau, Germany, in 1920 and at the General Conference of the Adventist Church of 1922, held in San Francisco, the Reformists' requests were rejected, and separation followed. A Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement was formally incorporated during a conference held in Gotha, Germany, on July 14–20, 1925. A missionary expansion of the newly independent movement followed in the United States, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, Australia, South Africa, and what was then Rhodesia. During World War II, the Reform movement reiterated its conscientious objection position and again underwent persecution. Persecutions also continued after the war in the Communist countries of Eastern Europe.

The Reform movement is today divided into two main branches, as a consequence of a 1951 split. Although the two branches relate different versions of the same events, it seems that at the General Conference of the Reform movement held in Zeist, The Netherlands, in 1951, the main controversial questions were personal rather than doctrinal. Dumitru Nicolici (1896–1981), a Romanian leader who had moved to the United States in 1948, led the branch known as the Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement, while those loyal to the president, Karl (Carlos) Kozel (1890–1989), kept the name International Missionary Society–Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement. Kozel’s branch remained strong in Europe, particularly in Germany, while Nicolici’s branch drew the majority of members from Australia, Brazil, and the United States. Its leadership later passed from Nicolici to Andrei Lavrik (1902–1976), Clyde Thomas Stewart (1902–1992), and Alfredo C. Sas (b. 1932).

During the 1960s, controversies erupted within the Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement between the United States and the international chapters, but they were satisfactorily resolved in 1967. In the same year, a “peace dialogue” was started between the Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement and the International Missionary Society–Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement. Negotiations for a merger failed at that time, but they were started again in the 1980s and the 1990s with encouraging but non-definitive results. The Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement remains to this date the larger organization, with 27,840 members in 90 countries. The International Missionary Society–Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement has some 15,000 members throughout the world and is headquartered in Germany.

Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement
PO Box 7240
Roanoke, VA 24019-0240
<http://www.sdarm.org>

International Missionary Society–Seventh-day Adventist Reform movement
PO Box 1310
74803 Mosbach/Baden
Germany
<http://www.imssdarm.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

- Balbach, Alfons. The History of the Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement. Roanoke, VA: Seventh Day Adventist Reform Movement, 1999.
- Kramer, O. Rise and Progress of the Reform Movement: My Personal Experience. Huntington Park,

CA: International Missionary Society–Seventh-day Adventist Reform Movement, 1994.

The Principles of Faith of the Seventh-day Adventist Church “Reform Movement” and Her Church By-Laws. Mosbach/Baden, Germany: General Conference Seventh-day Adventist Church Reform Movement, n.d.

■ Seychelles

The islands of the Republic of Seychelles, located in the Indian Ocean northwest of Madagascar, were populated in the 1760s by African slaves under first the French and then the British. The French organized a colony in 1768, but it was replaced by British rule in 1794. In 1903 it was named a British Crown Colony; it was granted self-rule in 1970 and complete independence in 1976. The great majority of the 70,000 residents occupy the largest of the islands, Mahe.

The French established the Roman Catholic Church, which remains the dominant religious force of the land with some 90 percent of residents being baptized members. The Diocese of Victoria (formed in 1890) is attached to the Kenya Episcopal Conference. It operates a string of parochial schools. The first indigenous bishop was named in 1975. There is also an indigenous order of nuns, the Sisters of St. Elizabeth.

The Church of England did not arrive until 1843 and remained the church of the British leadership. Diversity in the religious community was added by the arrival of Indians and Chinese attracted by the strategic position of the islands for trade between eastern Africa and southern Asia. Most Indians were Hindus, but there were also a small number of Muslims, Jains, and Zoroastrians. The Chinese (with a population of less than 100) practice a form of the Buddhist/Daoist amalgam popular in their homeland.

In the 20th century, both the Seventh-day Adventist Church (1929) and the Jehovah’s Witnesses (1960) opened work, as did a group of the Baha’i Faith. One evangelical congregation has been formed by the International Christian Fellowship, a British organization. Of more importance, in 1972 the Far East Broadcasting

A beach in the Seychelles. Roman Catholicism is the majority religion in this country. (BanoI2007/Dreamstime.com)

Seychelles

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	51,500	84,300	96.2	1.02	89,000	92,100
Roman Catholics	46,000	71,100	81.2	0.87	74,400	76,100
Anglicans	3,900	5,400	6.2	0.38	5,700	5,900
Protestants	250	3,600	4.1	3.90	5,000	6,000
Agnostics	230	2,000	2.3	2.99	3,500	5,000
Hindus	310	470	0.5	1.08	600	800
Baha'is	150	380	0.4	1.07	600	1,000
Muslims	170	190	0.2	1.13	250	300
Atheists	0	130	0.1	1.04	200	300
Chinese folk	20	50	0.1	1.36	70	100
Jains	10	40	0.0	1.18	60	80
Zoroastrians	10	30	0.0	1.61	50	50
Total population	52,400	87,600	100.0	1.06	94,300	99,700

SEYCHELLES

Association established a radio station that targets programming to both Africa and India.

The New Religions have yet to find their way to the Seychelles, in large part because of the out-of-the-way location of the islands.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of England; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church.

References

Bradley, J. T. The History of the Catholic Church in Seychelles. Victoria, Seychelles: Clarion, 1940.

Metz, Helen Chapin. Indian Ocean: Five Island Countries. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Service, 1995.

The Seventh-day Adventist Mission in Seychelles: A Review of Events from Years 1930–1980. Victoria, Seychelles: The Mission, 1981.

Seymour, William J.

1870–1922

African American preacher William Joseph Seymour led the revival at the small mission on Azusa Street in Los Angeles from which modern Pentecostalism emerged and spread globally. Due to racism, for almost a century his role in the founding of the movement was overlooked but has in recent decades been recovered and acknowledged.

Seymour was born on May 2, 1870, in Centerville, Louisiana. Little is known of his life prior to his moving in 1890 to Indianapolis, where he associated with the African Methodist Episcopal Church and then the Holiness movement, as he came to accept the Holiness emphasis on sanctification, an experience of God that allowed believers to be free of outward sin and perfected in love. The Evening Lights Saints also had a strong emphasis on the imminent return of Christ.

While residing in Cincinnati with the Saints, he contracted small pox, which he survived but at the cost of one eye. He also decided to become a minister. He was ordained by the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana). His travels led him in 1903 to Houston, Texas. There, in 1905, he learned of the arrival of Charles Fox Parham. He asked Parham permission to attend the latter's Bible school at which he learned about Parham's approach to the baptism of the Holy Spirit (a staple concern of Holiness people) and the new teachings of the baptism's tie with speaking in tongues, which Parham asserted was the visible evidence of the baptism. The baptism of the Holy Spirit was an empowerment for the sanctified.

Early in 1906, Seymour moved to Los Angeles to pastor a small church. He almost immediately injected the new ideas about the baptism of the Holy Spirit into his sermons. The church's leaders rejected Seymour and the message and proceeded to lock him out of the church primacies. He met together with the few who still wanted to learn about the new teachings in the home of Richard D. and Ruth Asberry on Bonnie Brae Avenue.

On April 9 Jennie Evans Moore (1883–1936) (whom Seymour later married) and Edward Lee began to speak in tongues. Seymour received the experience a few days later on April 12. As news circulated about what had happened, crowds began to gather in front of the small home. New facilities had to be found. They were obtained by renting an old building on Azusa Street (formerly the First African Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles), then being used as livery stable. The building was quickly refurbished with benches and a pulpit made from two boxes. Seymour lived on the second floor.

On April 18, an initial newspaper article presented a negative picture of the gathering on Azusa Street. That same day, however, San Francisco was destroyed by an earthquake. Within a week, thousands of copies of a tract tying the earthquake to the revival were distributed. The earthquake served to more clearly focus the millennial elements of Pentecostal thought, which saw the new outpouring of the Spirit as a sign of the approaching end times. The millennialism gave the movement an urgency that might otherwise not have been present.

Hundreds began to find their way to the small Apostolic Faith Mission, as Seymour called it, borrowing a name Parham had used. Over the next three years, Seymour led three services a day. Most of the leaders of what would become the national and international Pentecostal movement would make the pilgrimage to Los Angeles, where they received the baptism. Those in attendance included African Americans, Mexican Americans, and whites.

Seymour married Moore in 1908. Shortly thereafter, Clara Lund and Florence Crawford (1872–1936), two white women who worked at the mission, took the mailing list and moved to Portland, Oregon, where they founded a rival Apostolic Faith Mission and began issuing a new periodical, The Apostolic Faith. Seymour never recovered from the defection, and while he continued to pastor the community that had developed on Azusa Street, he lost touch with the larger movement and was able to work only among African Americans. The larger movement would gradually divide into several segregated congregations, the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World alone able to maintain a working interracial membership.

Meanwhile, in Los Angeles, in 1911 William H. Durham (1873–1912), a white Baptist minister from Chicago, drove a further wedge in the Pentecostal community by his proclamation of the so-called Finished

Work position that limited the baptism and tongues experience to only those who had previously been sanctified. The resulting controversy took a sizable proportion of the Mission's constituency—some 600 believers. Then in 1913, the Mission faced a new controversy. At a camp meeting, several ministers proclaimed the “Jesus Only” message that rejected the traditional doctrine of the Trinity and demanded that Christian baptism be practiced in the name of “Jesus only.” Many African American believers found themselves attracted to the “Jesus Only” position.

By 1915, Seymour and the Mission had only a remnant following, but large enough to justify his publication of a church manual, The Doctrines and Discipline of the Azusa Street Apostolic Faith Mission of Los Angeles. He assumed the title of bishop and began to travel about the countryside, occasionally in the company of Charles Harrison Mason (1866–1961), the founder of the Church of God in Christ. During these years Seymour founded a number of congregations. While some later joined the Church of God in Christ, some constituted themselves the Apostolic Faith Church (with congregations primarily in Virginia). Seymour's actual role as the leader of these congregations is vague. What is known is that the congregations would associate together in a small denomination, eventually split into several denominations, and more recently come together in the United Fellowship of the Original Azusa Street Mission.

Seymour died of a heart attack on September 18, 1922. His widow succeeded him as head of the Los Angeles congregation and pastored it for several years. A major disruption hit the congregation in 1931, after which its story becomes nebulous. The church building was eventually torn down and no visible remnant of Seymour's work survived in Los Angeles. Jennie Seymour died in 1936.

White Pentecostals wrote often about Azusa Street, but ignored its African American roots and largely wrote Seymour out of the story until the late 20th century. An important step in reclaiming knowledge of Seymour was made by D. J. Nelson, a student of British church historian Walter J. Hollenweger, who in 1981 wrote a dissertation on Seymour at the University of Birmingham (United Kingdom). Since the 1980s, Pentecostal scholars have emphasized Seymour's importance to the Pentecostal global endeavor. In his preaching, he emphasized the imminent end of this present eon and the need for foreign missions to spread the Pentecostal message. He also exercised a style of leadership that allowed broad participation in the Azusa Street revival by all who attended, including women and non-whites, both of whom would become essential in shaping the course of the movement.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Church of God (Anderson, Indiana); Church of God in Christ; Holiness Movement; Parham, Charles Fox; Pentecostal Assemblies of the World; Pentecostalism.

References

- Connelly, James T. “William J. Seymour.” In Twentieth-Century Shapers of American Popular Religion, edited by Charles H. Lippy, 381–387. New York: Greenwood Press, 1989.
- Martin, Larry. The Life and Ministry of William J. Seymour: And a History of the Azusa Street Revival. Christian Life Books, MO, 1999.
- McRobert, Iain. The Black Roots and White Racism of Early Pentecostalism in the USA. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- Nelson, Douglas J. “For Such a Time as This: The Story of Bishop William J. Seymour and the Azusa Street Revival: A Search for Pentecostal/Charismatic Roots.” Ph.D. diss., University of Birmingham, 1981.
- Robeck, Cecil M., Jr. The Azusa Street Mission and Revival. Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2006.
- Sanders, Cheryl J. Saints in Exile: The Holiness-Pentecostal Experience in African American Religion and Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Sanders, Rufus G. W. The Seymour Papers: Theological Beginnings of the Modern Pentecostal Faith. Princeton, NJ: Xlibris, 2008.

Shadhiliyya Sufi Order

The Shadhiliyya Sufi Order is named after Abu al-Hasan al-Shadhili (d. 1258), who is buried at Humaythra near the coast of Egypt's Red Sea. These sufis are found mainly in northern Africa and in Egypt. They have traditionally espoused a nonsectarian view toward Sunni Islamic law schools in order to have a balanced mystical and worldly life. A person's knowledge ('ilm) is revealed and understood through one's actions ('amal) on earth. The sainthood (walaya) in the Shadhiliyya Sufi Order is significantly tied into the experiences of other members in the sufi order. The Shadhili sufis emphasize that each moment is in front of the divine, and there is a constant calling to return to the holy.

The Shadhiliyya Order derives from Abu Madyan Shu'ayb (d. 1198), whose primary disciple, Muhammad 'Alī Ba-'Alawi, contributed to the 'Alawiyya Sufi orders in Yemen, South Asia, and Myanmar. Al-Shadhili's famous disciple was Abu-l 'Abbas al-Mursi (d. 1287), whose shrine is in Alexandria, where thousands of sufis still conduct their religious activities publicly.

Leadership of the order has passed to Sidi Shaykh Muhammad Sa'id al-Jamal ar-Rifa'i ash-Shadhuli, al-Qutb, al-Gawth, now seen as the "Guide" of the Shadhiliyya Path. He resides on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem as the imam of the Masjid al-Aqsa (the Dome of the Rock). The Dome of the Rock is related to the tradition of the Night Journey of the Prophet Muhammad, who is believed to have traveled from Mecca to al-Aqsa and from there to heaven. Since 1993 the shaykh has traveled widely, teaching the Shadhiliyya path to all who wish to learn it. The strength of the order is in Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco.

In North America, the Order may be contacted through the Shadhiliyya Sufi Center in Pope Valley, California. Publications are handled through Sidi Muhammad Press in Napa, California.

Shadhiliyya Sufi Center
PO Box 100
Pope Valley, CA 94567
<http://www.suficenter.org/>

Shadhiliyya Sufi Order
c/o Sidi Muhammad Press
2656 First St., #413
Napa, CA 94558
<http://www.sufimaster.org/tariqa.htm>

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Islam; Sufism.

References

- Buckman, David. "The Underground Friends of God and Their Adversaries: A Case Study and Survey of Sufism in Contemporary Yemen." Update 39 (1997): 21–24.
- Cornell, Vincent. Realm of the Saint: Power and Authority in Moroccan Sufism. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.
- Danner, Mary Ann Koury, trans. The Key to Salvation: A Sufi Manual of Invocation—Miftah al-Falah. Cambridge, UK: Islamic Texts Society, 1996.
- Ibn al-Sabbagh. The Mystical Teachings of al-Shadhili. Trans. by Elmer H. Douglas. Ed. by Ibrahim M. Abu-Rabi. Albany: State University Press of New York, 1993.

Shafiite School of Islam

The Shafiite School of Islam is one of the four madhabs (schools) of jurisprudence deemed orthodox within the world of Sunni Islam. The school traces its origin to the career of one man, Muhammad ibn Idris ibn al-Abbas ibn Uthman ibn Shafi (767–820), a Palestinian raised in Mecca who then widely traveled in the Islamic world. As he began to teach and write, he was presented with the task of synthesizing and reconciling the competing schools of legal interpretation represented by the Hanafite and Traditionalist schools. Toward the end of his life, he dictated his most famous book, Al-umm, in which he laid out his own perspective and left behind a record of the differences between the other schools.

Shafi was writing as the process of defining the traditions relative to the Prophet Muhammad and his companions (hadith) were being compiled and assessed, and he placed great importance on the authentic traditions, as opposed to the legal consensus of the scholars (ulama) that had been reached in the leading centers of Islamic learning—Baghdad and Medina.

Shafiite teachings took root in Persia (Iran) in the ninth century, during the years of the Abbasid Empire, and they remained the most influential school of thought into the 13th century. In addition, Shafi spent his last years in Egypt, and his teachings took root there, becoming the official school during the Ayyubid dynasty (1167–1252) and remaining of continuing importance until the rise of the Fatimid dynasty (which established a non-Sunni Shia Ismaili government). The adoption of the Hanafite School of legal interpretation by the Ottoman Empire, however, pushed the Shafiite School out of the centers of Islamic power in the Middle East. It had become the dominant school among the trading classes and through them was taken to Indonesia (now the most populous predominantly Islamic nation in the world) and to the Muslim communities along the east coast of Africa whose most famous center was Zanzibar.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hanafite School of Islam; Islam; Muhammad.

References

- Bakhtiar, Laleh, and Kevin Reinhart. Encyclopedia of Islamic Law: A Compendium of the Major Schools. Chicago: Kazi Publications, 1996.
- Coulson, Noel J. Conflicts and Tensions in Islamic Jurisprudence. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- Coulson, Noel J. A History of Islamic Law. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Hallaq, Wael B. A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Horrie, Chris, and Peter Chippindale. What Is Islam? London: Virgin, 1998.
- Schacht, Joseph. An Introduction to Islamic Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- Watt, Montgomery. The Majesty that Was Islam. New York: Praeger, 1974.

Shah Faisal Mosque

The Shah Faisal Mosque, the largest mosque in the world at the time of its construction, is located near Islamabad, Pakistan. It is the product of the founding of the new nation of Pakistan (1947). As the violence in which the nation was born died out, a proposal for a new national mosque was assembled and a site selected. The proposal was then offered to King Faisal of Saudi Arabia (1906–1975) on the occasion of his 1966 visit to Pakistan. King Faisal reacted favorably to the proposed mosque and offered to support it financially. The Pakistanis reacted to his generosity by naming both the mosque and the main road from the mosque to the city in his honor. They selected Turkish architect Vedat Dalokay to design the new worship center.

A decade later, by the time the cornerstone of the mosque was laid in October 1976, King Faisal had been assassinated. King Khalid, who had succeeded to the throne of Saudi Arabia in 1975, attended the ceremonies. Work on the building would continue for another decade and was finally completed in 1988. The resulting complex covers 47.87 acres, while the covered area of the prayer hall encompasses 1.19 acres. It accommodates some 100,000 worshipers in the prayer hall and an additional 200,000 in the grounds just outside the prayer hall at any given time.

The Faisal Mosque remained the largest mosque in the world only a few years. It was superseded in 1993 by the completion of the Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca, Morocco. More recently, two Saudi Arabian mosques, the Al-Masjid al-Har (or Grand Mosque) in Mecca and the Al-Masjid al-Nabawi (or Prophet's Mosque) in Medina, have eclipsed even the Hassan mosque in size.

The Faisal Mosque serves as the national mosque in Pakistan. Among the first uses made of it following its completion was as the site of the funeral of General Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq (1924–1988), who served as the country's president for 11 years (1977–1988) until his assassination. He was subsequently buried in a tomb adjacent to the mosque.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Mecca; Mosques.

References

- Serageldin, Ismail, and James Steele, eds. Architecture of the Contemporary Mosque. London: Academy Editions, 1996.
- Shaw, Isobel. Pakistan. Lincolnwood, UK: Passport Books, 1996.

Shaivism

In the broadest sense, Shaivism refers to ritual and theological traditions that focus on the worship of Shiva or his consort Shakti as the supreme divinity from which the universe emerges and into which it is eventually absorbed. Like Vishnu, Shiva is part of the pantheon of the Rig Veda, where he is known by the name Rudra. From these early references, it is clear that Shiva-Rudra's character is ambiguous and paradoxical. Rigvedic poets praised Rudra as the lord of medicine and simultaneously asked not to be harmed by his arrows. This aspect of Shiva's personality continues throughout the Puranas, where he encompasses the central paradox of the Hindu tradition, the tension of dharma and moksha, as he is simultaneously the renouncing, meditating ascetic and the ideal husband and family man to his wife Parvati and his two sons, Ganesha and Karttikeya/Skanda. As Ardharanishvara, the Lord who is half woman, he encompasses and transcends the opposition of sex/gender. As Nataraja, the Lord of the dance enshrined at the great temple at Cidambara located in Cuddalore District of the east-central part of the Tamil Nadu, his dance creates, maintains, and destroys the universe. As he dances samsara and maya into being, he also is the source of liberation (moksha) for his devotees. The linga, the aniconic representation of Shiva, unmistakably expresses Shiva nature as a deity who encompasses and overcomes opposition. The linga, which at one level has sexual significance, symbolizes the creative potentiality of Shiva (his dharmic nature) at the same time as it represents the power of restraint and renoucement (his ascetic dimension). The earliest conceptualization of Shiva as a deity that represents totality is found in the Shvetashvatara Upanishad, where he is identified with atman.

Shaivism developed in the medieval period in two distinct traditions. Puranic Shaivism formed within the context of the smarta brahmin householder. Smarta brahmins broadly refers to the living brahmanic tradition that integrates Vedic orthopraxy as elaborated in smirti and ritual practices of the Puranic texts, including the performance of Vedic domestic rituals and the observance of varnashramadharma, with the ritual practices of puja of the Puranas, which focus on the worship of Shiva using Vedic mantras. Non-puranic

Shaiva sadhu (holy man) seeking alms in front of a temple in Pashupatinath, Nepal, 2008. (Zzvet/Dreamstime.com)

Shaivism consisted of primarily exclusive groups that required initiation (diksha) into their ritual traditions and whose aim was primarily to obtain liberation (moksha). These traditions were further classified in Shaiva Tantras into two divisions: path of mantras (mantramarga) and the higher path (atimarga). Atimarga traditions stressed the search for liberation, while the mantramarga focused on liberation as well as the attainment of supernatural power (siddhi) and pleasure (bhoga) as part of the initiate's spiritual journey. The atimarga is represented by the Pashupata tradition, the oldest Shaiva group, which is mentioned in the Mahabharata (ca. 500 BCE–500 CE). The mantramarga tradition is found in the numerous shaiva tantras, which are connected to a variety of Shaiva ritual traditions.

Shaiva traditions are broadly divided into Shaiva Siddhantas and Shaiva non-Siddhantas or Kapalikas.

The Shaiva Siddhanta tradition that had developed in Tamil Nadu by the 11th century was heavily influenced by devotional poetry composed by the 63 Nayanars (ca. 500–750), Tamil Shaiva saints from all segments of Tamil society whose devotional fervor toward Shiva was expressed through poetry, worship of Shiva, and service to his devotees. Shaiva bhakti stresses the emotional dimension over the realization of the non-distinction of self and Lord. The aim of devotion to the Lord is to attain a direct, unmediated relationship with Shiva, in which the devotee became mad with love manifested in the transgression of social norms and personal behavior. The Shaiva Siddhanta is a strictly dualistic system of thought in which there are three distinct ontological categories: Shiva, the supreme lord (pati), the self (pashu), and the world, which binds (pasha) the self. Shiva and the self are eternally distinct, but the self is bound within the cosmos by ignorance (avidya), impurity, and karma illusion (maya), the substratum of the cosmos. The initiate (diksha) can only achieve liberation by means of Shiva's grace channelled through the body of the teacher (shivaguru), in whose form (murti) Shiva has been established. Through service, worship, and meditation, the soul is purified of the impurities that cover it. Upon liberation, the soul becomes omniscient and omnipotent like Shiva, but remains eternally distinct from Shiva. Although the Siddhanta path is open to all varnas, it is not open to children, women, the old, the mentally ill, or the physically disabled.

Kapalikas or non-Siddhanta Shaivas get their name from the great vow (mahavrata) that they undertake. They carry a skull-topped staff (khatvanga) and a skull begging bowl in imitation Shiva's great penance for the sin of killing a Brahman (brahmahatya). Shiva cut off Brahma's fifth head, after the latter attempted to have sexual relations with his own daughter. As a result, Brahma's skull became permanently stuck to Shiva's hand until he reached Kapalamocana, one of the sacred tirthas of Varanasi. These ascetics lived in cremation grounds and engaged in activities that from an orthodox brahmanic perspective are considered to be highly polluting, such as offering blood, meat, and alcohol to fierce deities including Bhairava and Kali.

In Kashmir, the Kaula tradition of Shaivism, which developed during the medieval period, incorporates the cremation-ground asceticism of the Kapalikas into the traditional orthodox life of the householder. The Trika School of Kashmiri Shaivism articulates a complex theology whose aim is the realization of the identity of all manifestations, including the self, with the pure consciousness (caitanya) of Shiva. Liberation in the Trika system is achieved through the realization of the nondistinction of self and Shiva or Kali.

The Pashupata Shaivas, perhaps dating back to the second century CE, aimed at transcending varnashramadharma in order to attain a higher, perfected (siddha) stage beyond the fourth Vedic ashrama (sannyasin). To achieve this goal, the initiate (sadhaka), a Brahmin male who had undergone the upanayana ceremony, the traditional high-caste initiation, undertook a vow (vrata) of spiritual practice (sadhana) that progressed in three stages. Initially, the ascetic initiate took on the physical marks of a Pashupata: avoiding bathing in water and instead covering himself in ashes and engaging in the worship of Shiva through dancing, singing, laughter, and repetition of the sacred mantras. During this stage, the sadhaka lived in or in the vicinity of a Shaiva temple. In the second stage, the initiate left all physical signs and markers of his vrata, including the temple, and publicly engage in antisocial behaviors, such as acting as if he was crippled, make lewd gestures toward women, and generally acting as if out of his mind. Such behavior was meant to incur the anger of passers-by and the subsequent loss and transfer of their merit to the sadhaka. At the same time, the sadhaka's papa (evil) was transferred to the abuser. In the final stage, the initiate completely renounced society and withdrew to an isolated place to meditate on the five sacred mantras and OM. Upon completion of third stage, the ascetic became a permanent dweller of the cremation ground and lived on whatever was available as food until his death. Liberation was achieved upon death, when union with Shiva was achieved through Shiva's grace. The Pashupata traditions seems to have died out around the late 15th century, but their doctrines have been preserved in various texts and subcommentaries.

Carlos Lopez

See also: Asceticism; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Hinduism; Meditation; Tantrism; Temples—Hindu; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Chitgopekar, Nilima. Encountering Shaivism: The Deity, the Milieu, the Entourage. New Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal Publishers Private, 1998.
- Dyczkowski, Mark S. G. Doctrine of Vibration: An Analysis of the Doctrines and Practices Associated with Kashmir Shaivism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987.
- Fürlinger, Ernst. The Touch of Shakti: A Study in Non-dualistic Trika Shaivism of Kashmir. New Delhi: D. K. Printworld, 2009.
- Lorenzen, David N. The Kapalikas and Kalamukhas: Two Lost Shaiva Sects. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.
- O'Flaherty, Wendy Doniger. Shiva: The Erotic Ascetic. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Shakta Movement

The Shakta movement (Shaktaite, Shaktism, Shakti movement, sometimes without the “h” in the spelling) is one of the major theological dynamics in Hinduism. Its ideology is essentially a supreme Mother-Goddess phenomenon common in many primal religions. The Shakta movement has ties to other Hindu movements, such as Shaivism; it flourished in India under the Maurya, Sunga, and Satavahana dynasties.

Proponents of the Shakta movement are predominantly Hindu with some following in Buddhism. They begin with the assertion that the Ultimate Divinity is female, not male. The male deities are subservient to Shakti (shakti is also another term for feminine spiritual energy and is also a separate name for a female Hindu deity). The Devi Mahatmya, a major Shakta text, retells many traditional Hindu myths, but portrays the feminine deities with new superior positions. Most Hindus do not object to the Shakta movement and have even incorporated Shakta teaching into their own belief systems. There are also multiple groups of Shakti followers in Hinduism, some being liberal with others being Shakti exclusive.

Hinduism is currently undergoing a major renaissance worldwide, and the Shakta movement is a part of that renaissance. In addition to the revival of Hindu tradition, a new appreciation for civil and women's rights is also coming into play. The Shakta movement is a direct recipient of these new allowances. More female gurus are being revered by Hindus as reincarnations of holiness and enlightenment, whereas in the past only men were viewed with such reverence. Female deities are being studied and exalted along with, and in some cases even more than, male divinities.

The Kali followers, Shaivites, and the Brahma Samaj are helping to lead the way for the Shakta movement. Some Hindu holy men, such as Vivekananda (1863–1902), Sri Ramakrishna (1836–1886), and Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950), helped to assist the cause of the Shakta movement. Many women have claimed to be direct reincarnations of Shakti, thus attributing to themselves great reverence. Such women include Sarada Devi, Ramakrishna's wife (1853–1920); Mira Richard, Aurobindo's companion (1878–1973); and the renowned Anandamayi Ma (1896–1982). Despite the fact that these women are all deceased, they all have followings within the Hindu community and in the Shakta movement today. Many Shakta movement Hindus actually have pictures of these women as objects of worship that they revere as much as an icon of Shiva, Durga, or Vishnu.

The Shakta movement has had an effect upon Hinduism and Jainism. Both religions have their own religious orders exclusively for women. Buddhism, in particular, has elevated the status of the feminine divine. Avalokitesvara, the prominent Bodhisattva in Mahayana Buddhism, has been represented in many female forms as well as male forms. Many Buddhist mudras (hand gestures) represent union between a deity and his corresponding Shakti. Some Buddhist groups have incorporated Tantrism into their Shakta movements. The sexual aspect of this are seen more in old Tibet and Nepal than in India and Khmer.

Kumar Jairamdas

See also: Brahma Samaj; Hinduism; Mahayana Buddhism; Tantrism; Yoga.

References

- Coburn, Thomas. Encountering the Goddess: A Translation of the Devi-Mahatmya and a Study of Its Interpretation. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.
- Hawley, John, and Donna Wulff. Devi: Goddesses of India. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1996.
- Kinsley, David. Hindu Goddesses. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1988.
- Vanamali. Shakti: Realm of the Divine Mother. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions, 2008.

Shaktism

In the broadest sense, Shaktism refers to the worship of shakti, the primordial feminine power that creates, maintains, and re-absorbs the universe in the form of a personal supreme Goddess, who is understood to encompass all. The supreme Goddess takes many forms, including Amba, Durga, Kali, Lakshmi, Parvati, or Tripurasundari, all of which are understood to be a manifestation of one great Goddess, simply called Devi. Shaktism incorporates various ritual and theological traditions that have developed with one form of the divine feminine as the cultic focus.

A tradition of goddess worship may be traced as far back as the Indus Valley, where the presence of numerous terra-cotta female figurines found at all levels of excavation suggests a general concern for fertility and that the worship of female divinity was a popular feature of Indus religiosity. In the early Vedic texts, female deities are mentioned, but for the most part they play a minor role in the mythology and religious system. The Rig Veda mentions a few goddesses, the most prominent being Ushas (Dawn), to whom 20 hymns are dedicated, and who is vividly described. Other goddesses such as Prithivi (Earth), Ratri (Night), Nirriti (complete annihilation), Shraddha (confident intention), and Vac (sacred speech) represent natural phenomena or abstract or ritual concepts. However, it is clear that nothing akin to the later Hindu cult of a Great Goddess is to be found in the Vedic texts. Goddesses figure more prominently in the Ramayana and Mahabharata, where they appear as consorts of a male deity. Sarasvati, a river that figures prominently in the Rig Veda, is transformed through a series of identifications with the goddess Vac into the goddess of wisdom and the consort of the creator, Brahma. Parvati and Lakshmi are identified as consorts of Shiva and Vishnu, respectively. In the Mahabharata, Arjuna praises Durga, who is identification with the terrifying aspect of Parvati or Uma before the great battle for the explicit purpose of defeating the Kauravas. In Krittivasa's Ramayana (15th century), Rama performs a puja to Durga before going to battle with Ravana.

It is in the Puranas that the Goddess attains her prominence in the Hindu tradition. Goddesses are portrayed not simply as active consorts but as independent agents in the cosmic battle between the gods and the demons (asuras). The Devi Mahatmya of the Markandeya Purana (fourth century) presents the Devi, who is identical with Durga, as the ultimate source and reality of the universe. The story of the Goddess is told in the context of the central Vedic myth, the battle between the gods and the asuras in three episodes.

The first episode is clearly cosmogonic. At the moment just before the universe has been created, when Vishnu lies asleep on Shesha, who floats on the cosmic waters, Brahma, seated on the lotus that emerges from Vishnu's navel, sees two demons, Madhu and Kaitabha, who have fallen out of Vishnu's ears. As he is being attacked by the two demons, Brahma praises the Goddess as Yoganindra (the cosmic sleep of the yogic state of absorption) to enliven Vishnu by departing from his body, so that he can engage in his dharma-supporting activity and defeat the two demons.

The second episode consists of the battle against Mahisha, the buffalo demon, who the gods are unable to defeat. Out of anger at their inability to defeat Mahisha, the gods emit their great brilliance (tejas), which coalesces into the shape of a beautiful woman to whom each god respectively gives his weapon, emblem, or ornament. After defeating Mahisha, the gods praise Devi as the supreme protector and savior of the world and ask her to return whenever they remember her.

The third and longest episode takes place in the liminal space between heaven and Earth, the Himalayas, where two demons, Shumbha and Nishumbha, have stolen the three worlds and the gods' share of the sacrifice. As the gods are worshipping Vishnumaya,

Roadside temple dedicated to the goddess Kali in Tiruvannamalai, India. (Aravind Teki/Dreamstime.com)

the Goddess who exists in all beings, Parvati approaches that spot to bathe in the Ganga. Upon being praised, Ambika emerges from Parvati's body and thereupon Parvati became the dark one, Kali. Seeing Ambika on the battlefield, Shumbha sends a marriage proposal to her, which she refuses, saying that she may only marry a man who would defeat her in battle. Shumbha sends the demons Canda and Munda to capture her, but that only triggers Ambika's anger, which is manifests in the form of the goddess Kali. By means of Kali and various other shaktis that manifest on the battlefield as the Seven Mothers (saptamatrikas), Ambika defeats the demonic army and finally destroys Shumbha and Nishumbha.

Theologically, the Devi Mahatmya and the slightly later Devi Bhagavata Purana present the Goddess as the supreme source of all divine power, both male and female. In the matmya episode, the Goddess as Yoganindra becomes the supreme agent, by whose power Vishnu is able to act and defeat Madhu and Kaitabha. It is the great male god Vishnu who is subject to the power and authority of the Goddess. In the Devi Gita, a section of the Devi Bhagavata Purana, the Goddess is addressed as Female Ruler of the Universe (Bhuvaneshani) and identified as the impersonal brahman, which is infinite being, consciousness, and bliss (sat cid ananda).

Like Vaishnavism and Shaivism, Goddess traditions have been influenced by tantric rituals and ideologies. Shakta traditions influenced by tantra are broadly divided into the "family of the Black Goddess" (Kalikula) and the "family of the auspicious Goddess" (Shrikula).

The Kalikula school stresses the mythological narratives and rituals connected with terrifying (ghora) aspects of the Goddess, including Kali, Candi, and Tara. Like other tantric mantramargas, the Kalikula's goal is to gain power (siddha) through ritual practices that transgress orthodox brahmanic norms and embrace impurity. Texts of the Kalikula tradition conceive of the ferocious Kali, often depicted as standing on Shiva's corpse, as transcending male form and as the light of pure consciousness from which the universe emerged and into which it is reabsorbed. Historically, shakti traditions focused on Kali have been found primarily in North Indian, especially in Assam, Bengal, and Orissa.

The Shrikula traditions emphasize the gentle and motherly aspect of the Goddess, such as Lakshmi, Parvati, and Durga. The Shrividyā tradition of South India and Kashmir is the cult of Lilata Tripurasundari ("the beautiful playful Goddess of the three cities"), which falls under the mantramarga focusing on external rituals and their magical effects, as well as the esoteric understanding of the shricakra. The shricakra is a sacred diagram formed by five downward-pointing triangles that intersect four upward-pointing triangles, the intersections of which form 43 triangles. The downward-pointing triangles represent Shakti, while the upward-pointing ones represent Shiva. The shricakra is the aniconic representation of the Goddess, which represents the union of Shiva and Shakti and thus the manifestation and contraction of the absolute as sound (shabda). The Goddess is supreme and transcendental, whose manifestation is the cosmos. She is the active power that unfolds and contracts the universe during the cosmic cycles.

Shrividyā theology conceives of the human body as the gross manifestation of the supreme or causal body. Liberation (moksha) is achieved by retracing the manifestations of the supreme body back to its source, the Goddess. As in other tantric systems, this spiritual journey is achieved through the realization of the hierarchical correspondences between the human body and the cosmos. The goal is to incite the goddess Kundalini, the shakti that dwells at the base energy center (cakra) of the human body, to unite with Shiva, who is located at the crown of the head.

The theological notion of the Goddess as all encompassing is expressed at the level of practice through the system of "seats of the goddess" (shaktapithas) that identify the Goddess with the sacred landscape of India. The mythological foundation of the identity of the mythic landscape of India as the Goddess is found in the story of the dismemberment of Sati, Shiva's first wife. Sati's father, Daksha Prajapati, was celebrating a great sacrifice to which he did not invite Shiva. Outraged and insulted by her father's failure to invite the great god Shiva to his sacrifice, Sati immolates herself in Daksha's sacrificial fire. When Shiva learns that Sati has killed herself, his anger manifests as Virabhadra, who destroys Daksha's sacrifice and kills Daksha. Most versions of the myth then tell about how the sacrifice was reinstated, with the inclusion of Shiva along with the other gods. However, in some versions, Shiva discovers Sati's body and is overwhelmed by grief and despair. He picks her up and begins to wander throughout the universe with Sati's body in his arms. The gods become concerned that Shiva's grief threatens the stability of the cosmos and the world will deteriorate into chaos. The gods conspire to deprive Shiva of the source of his grief, Sati's body. Vishnu secretly follows Shiva around the universe gradually slicing off bits of her body until Sati's body has disappeared. When Shiva realizes that there is no body, his grief ends, and he returns to the mountains to carry out his ascetic mediation.

The pieces of Sati's body fall to earth and become the sacred seats of the Goddess (pithas). The four most important pithas are at Jalandhara in the Punjab, Udayana in the Swat Valley, Purnagiri in the state of Uttarakhand, and Kamarupa in Assam. In these important places of pilgrimage (tirtha), the tongue, nipples, and vulva of the goddess are said to have fallen. The network of pithas serves to sacralize the land and the geography of India. India is understood as the body of the Goddess herself and as being inherently sacred. In this manner, the all-encompassing Goddess becomes localized and accessible to her devotees.

Carlos Lopez

See also: Asceticism; Devotion/Devotional Traditions; India, Hinduism in; Modern Period; Pilgrimage; Shaivism; Tantrism; Vaishnavism; Women, Status and Role of.

References

Apffel-Marglin, Frédérique. Rhythms of Life: Enacting the World with the Goddesses of Orissa. New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2008.

Brooks, Douglas Renfrew. Auspicious Wisdom: The Texts and Traditions of Shrividyā Shakta Tantrism in South India. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

Kinsley, David. Hindu Goddesses: Visions of the Divine Feminine in the Hindu Religious Tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Pintchman, Tracy. Seeking Mahadevi: Constructing the Identities of the Hindu Great Goddess. Albany: State University of New York, 2001.

Shambhala International

Shambhala International is a reformed version of a Tibetan Buddhist organization initially known as Vajradhatu. Vajradhatu was founded in Boulder, Colorado, by an exiled Tibetan lama of the Kagyu lineage, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche (1939–1987), in 1973. Chogyam Trungpa was a flamboyant character who, after giving up his monastic vows, gained a reputation as a bon vivant, though his writings on spiritual themes attracted an audience that reached well beyond his personal following.

A major center was founded in Nova Scotia, Canada, in 1983, where the movement's international headquarters are currently located. The headquarters serve more than 100 Shambhala Centers throughout the world in the United States (79), Canada (21), Europe (38), New Zealand (1), Australia (1), and Japan (1). In the mid-1990s the movement claimed a total paid membership of around 4,500.

Chogyam Trungpa developed an eclectic form of Tibetan Vajrayana Buddhism, incorporating elements drawn from the Japanese Zen tradition, Japanese arts, and Western psychology. He attracted followers among artists and writers such as the poet Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997). Ginsberg was particularly associated with the Naropa Institute, an accredited university that Chogyam Trungpa founded in Boulder in 1974. Its curriculum continues to stress the arts, philosophy, and psychology.

Chogyam Trungpa appointed his American disciple Osel Tendzin (Tom Rich) as his successor, but in 1988 it was revealed that he was HIV-positive and that he had passed the condition on to one of his disciples. The revelations led to serious disruptions within the movement that were eventually to be addressed by the creation of a new leadership under the authority of Chogyam Trungpa's eldest son, Osel Rangdrol Mukpo, in 1991. In 1992 he announced his plans to amalgamate all Vajradhatu activities under the new title of Shambhala International.

Shambhala International began formally in 1976 as Shambhala Training, the secular arm of Vajradhatu. The name is drawn from a Tibetan myth that features a kingdom of enlightened beings ruled by sagacious monarchs. The intention of the training is to create people capable of establishing a society that mirrors the Shambhala kingdom in this world. Although Shambhala International's programs include the teaching of meditation practices and deploy Tibetan Buddhist concepts, Shambhala International presents itself as a secular organization. Participants can adhere to their own religious preferences and do not have to think of themselves as Buddhists. Nevertheless, the movement continues to support contemplative centers such as Gampo Abbey in Nova Scotia and conducts weddings and funerals. At the same time, it promotes education and training programs aimed at business corporations as well as individuals.

All of these activities are intended to contribute to Shambhala International's goal of creating what is described as an "enlightened society." For many members, however, the most significant aspect of their participation remains rooted in their personal practice based on Chogyam Trungpa's eclectic interpretation of Vajrayana Buddhism.

Shambhala International
1084 Tower Rd.
Halifax, Nova Scotia B3H 2Y5
Canada
<http://www.shambhala.org/>

Sandra Bell

See also: Enlightenment; Karma-Kagyupa, Tibetan Buddhism.

References

Bell, Sandra. "'Crazy Wisdom,' Charisma, and the Transmission of Buddhism in the United States."

Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 2, no. 1 (1998): 55–75.

Dawson, Lorne, and Lynn Eldershaw. “Shambhala Warriorship: Investigating the Adaptations of Imported New Religious Movements.” In Croyancees et Societes, edited by Bertrand Ouellet and Richard Bergeron, 199–231. Montreal: Editions Fides, 1998.

Trungpa, Chogyam. Born in Tibet. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1966.

Trungpa, Chogyam. Cutting through Spiritual Materialism. Berkeley, CA: Shambhala, 1973.

Shan Dao

613–681 CE

Master Shan Dao, though not the founder of the Pure Land Tradition in China, was its great popularizer. He was born in Lin Zi, Shang-tong Province, almost three centuries after Hui-Yuan (334–416) the founder. Shan Dao was but 10 when he became a monk and began his study of the Buddhist sutras. His further study of the Meditation on the Buddha Infinite Life Sutra led him to embrace the Pure Land teachings, which focus upon the calling upon the name of Amitabha Buddha in the faith that Amitabha will carry the believer to the Western Paradise upon his or her earthly death. In 641, at the age of 28, he visited the Pure Land teacher Tao-ch’o at Hsyan-chung-ssu Temple, and was further influenced deeply by Tao-ch’o’s lecture on the Meditation on the Buddha Infinite Life Sutra.

Several years later, Shan Dao moved to Ch’ang-an, the capital of China under the Tang dynasty (618–970), and began his life of disseminating the practice of invoking the name of Amitabha Buddha. He authored The Commentary on the Meditation on the Buddha Infinite Life Sutra, in which he divided Buddhist practices into two categories. Those practices directed toward Amitabha Buddha were correct and all the rest he considered of a lesser nature. The correct practices he listed as invoking the name of Amitabha, chanting sutras, meditating on the Buddha, worshipping images of Amitabha, and singing the praises of the Buddha, the first of the five being the essential one. Importantly, Shan Dao lifted up the vocal invocation of Amitabha while de-emphasizing the visualization of Amitabha in the Western Paradise that Hui-Yuan had seen as a second practice beside calling upon the name of the Buddha. Though placing visualization practices in a secondary level in his writings, he taught visualization, which Hui-Yuan had advocated, to his followers.

Through his many years, Shan Dao is said to have copied by hand more than 100,000 scrolls of the Amitabha Sutra, the main Purer Land text, and produced some 300 mural paintings on Pure Land themes. A legend grew around him which claimed that while he invoked Amitabha, a ray of bright light poured forth from his mouth.

Honen (1133–1212), who founded Pure Land Buddhism in Japan, was converted to his belief and practice from reading the writings of Shan Dao. Honen came to believe Shan Dao was an incarnation of Amitabha and treated his writings as scripture. Subsequently, Honen’s student Shinran (1173–1262) listed Shan Dao as one of the three Chinese Pure Land patriarchs and within his own writings quoted Shan Dao extensively.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Honen; Pure Land Buddhism; Shinran.

References

“Commentary on the Meditation Sutra.” Jodo Shu

Research Institute. <http://www.jsri.jp/English/Pureland/SUTRAS/kammuryoju-kyo/Zendocom.html>. Accessed May 15, 2009.

The Seeker’s Glossary of Buddhism. New York: Sutra Translation Committee of the United States and Canada, 1998.

Shan Tao, and Julian F. Pas. Visions of Sukhavati: Shan-Tao’s Commentary on the Kuan Wu-Liang Shou-Fo Ching. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

The Soka Gakkai Dictionary of Buddhism. Tokyo: Soka Gakkai, 2002.

Sharad Purnima

Sharad Purnima is a Hindu harvest festival celebrated on the evening of the full moon of the Hindu lunar month of Ashwin (September–October). The month of Ashwin comes after the annual rainy season. Its major observances are in rural communities.

The celebration is especially directed to Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth and consort of the god Vishnu, who is said to move around in the night asking, “Who is awake?” To those she finds awake, she bestows gifts of wealth.

The origin of the celebration appears to come from Bihar state, where a story is told of a relatively poor brahmin named Valit who left home in disgust with his wife, who was known for her quarrelsome nature. His leaving was occasioned by her disturbing a ritual honoring Valit’s ancestors. On his trip he ran into some young girls who were descendants of Kailiya Nag, the giant venomous snake that Krishna had subdued. Valit began gambling with the girls by the light of the full moon and lost what little money he had with him.

At that moment, however, Lakshmi and Vishnu were passing by. Lakshmi graced Valit with a handsomeness similar to that of the god of love. The girls with whom he had been gambling now fell in love with him and gave him all their riches. He returned home and lived happily ever after.

On the night of Sharad Purnima, Dudha-Pauva, a mixture of parched rice made from the recently harvested crops, soaked in cold milk, will be offered to Chandra, the moon deity, and then passed to gathered devotees. Devotees of Durga think of her as having gone into an extended rest following her nine-day war with Mahishasura. On this night, in Durga temples she will be awakened with music and drumbeats and taken in a torch-lit procession around the temple. Devotees of Krishna look upon this night as the anniversary of Krishna’s divine play with Radha and the Gopis (cow girls).

Constance A. Jones

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Hinduism.

References

- Mukuncharandas, Sadhu. Hindu Festivals (Origin Sentiments & Rituals). Amdavad, India: Swaminarayan Aksharpith, 2005.
- Pattanak, Devdutt. Lakshmi: The Goddess of Wealth and Fortune—An Introduction. Mumbai, India: Vakils Feffer & Simons, 2003.

Shasta, Mount

Mount Shasta is an extinct volcano in northern California’s Cascade range, near the Oregon border. It rises more than 14,000 feet above sea level, but possibly more important, it stands some 10,000 feet above the surrounding area. It is physically unconnected to the other mountains in the region, thus rising abruptly amid miles of relatively flat ground that encircles it, giving a spectacular view from most directions.

Early on, it became integral to the creation myth of the resident Native Americans of the area, most notably the Modoc and Shasta peoples. They tell of the Great Spirit creating the mountain by cutting a hole in the sky and forming the mountain of ice and snow. The Great Spirit used the mountain to step onto the Earth. He created the forests and the animals that inhabited them (especially the grizzly bear) and commanded the Sun to melt the snow, thus providing water for rivers and streams and the fish that fill them. The Great Spirit resided on the mountain. His daughter fell off the mountain. Grizzly bears raised her, and she subsequently married one of them. Her children were the first humans. Their marriage violated the Great Spirit’s authority, for which the grizzly was condemned to walk on four legs and their human children were scattered around the world. The mountain also plays a role in a large number of Native stories.

Native Americans still live in the area and continue rituals oriented on the mountain. Each year, for example, members of the Wintu conduct ritual dances aimed at ensuring the continued flow of several sacred springs.

In the 20th century, European Americans inspired by the mountain began to create their own stories of its significance. As early as 1908, an article in the Overland Monthly tied the mountain to Lemuria, the lost continent initially hypothesized in the late 19th century to balance speculation on Atlantis, the ancient lost continent believed to have existed in the Atlantic Ocean. California was seen as a remnant of Lemuria, an idea that would then be picked up and popularized by H. Spencer Lewis (1883–1939), the founder of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC) and the author of Lemuria, the Lost Continent of the Pacific, a 1931 book that has remained in print to the present. As the Lemurian legend evolved, it incorporated the idea of a hollow mountain in which surviving Lemurians continued to reside and from which they occasionally emerged to interact with the current inhabitants of the surface world.

Mount Shasta in northern California. (Brian Longmore/Dreamstime.com)

Just weeks before the publication of Lewis's book, Guy Warren Ballard (1878–1939) walked the slopes of the mountain where he met a person whom he later identified as Saint Germain, an ascended master from the Great White Brotherhood, a spiritual fraternity believed by many in the Western Esoteric tradition to guide the destiny of humankind. Saint Germain commissioned Ballard as his official Messenger to herald a coming Golden Age. After leaving Shasta and returning to Chicago, Ballard founded the I AM Religious Activity and the Saint Germain Foundation. Both AMORC and the I AM Religious Activity opened centers in Mount Shasta, the community at the base of the mountain, and to the present the I AM movement sponsors an annual pageant on the life of Christ, as interpreted by Ballard. The unique perspective offered on Christ was that he did not die at the end of his earthly existence but simply ascended into heaven to assume his place in the heavenly hierarchy. Ballard, and later his wife, Edna Ballard (1886–1971), communicated numerous messages from the hierarchy.

The AMORC and I AM accounts of Mount Shasta were bolstered by the sightings of flying saucers that began in the later 1940s and the subsequent reports of contact with the extraterrestrial beings who reputedly inhabited the saucers. Most contactees, the people claiming such contacts, channeled messages from the Space Brothers in the same way that mediums channeled messages from the spirit world. The most famous of the UFO contactees to be identified with Shasta was Dorothy Martin (1900–1992), who moved to Shasta in the 1960s. She took the religious name Sister Thedra and headed the Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara. Martin had previously gained some fame when she and her small following became the subject of a classic text of sociology, When Prophecy Fails (1956), written by Leon Festinger, Henry W. Riecken, and Stanley Schachter.

With the emergence of the New Age movement in the 1970s, Mount Shasta was designated as a modern sacred site and a power spot, a special place where psychical and spiritual energies were concentrated. The mountain began to attract psychics, channelers, and people engaged in various forms of spiritual healing. An active New Age community appeared and swelled every summer. Peter Caddy (1917–1994), one of the founders of the original New Age community at Findhorn, Scotland, moved to Mount Shasta and founded the Gathering of the Way.

Besides those mentioned above, a variety of new Esoteric organizations have come and gone from Shasta over the years. Among those still to be found there are Ascended Masters Teaching Foundation and the Mount Shasta Trinity Center. A spectrum of groups not headquartered in the town hold annual events there. The round of Esoteric spiritual activities and services are covered by the quarterly Mount Shasta Magazine.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; I AM Religious Activity; Mountains; New Age Movement; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Andrews, Richard. The Truth behind the Legends of Mount Shasta. New York: Carlton Press, 1976.
- Beckely, Timothy Green. Mysteries of Mount Shasta: Home of the Underground Dwellers and Ancient Gods. New Brunswick, NJ: Inner Light/Global Communications, 2008.
- Cerve, Wishar S. [H. Spencer Lewis]. Lemuria: The Lost Continent of the Pacific. San Jose, CA: Supreme Grand Lodge, AMORC, 1931.
- Chaney, Earlyne. Secrets of Mount Shasta. Anaheim, CA: Stockton Trade Press, 1953.
- Clark, Ella Elizabeth. Indian Legends of the Pacific Northwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953.
- Holsinger, Rosemary. Shasta Indian Tales. Happy Camp, CA: Naturegraph Publishers, Inc., 1982.
- Marcus. Celestial Raise. Mount Shasta, CA: Association of Sananda and Sanat Kumara, 1986.
- Mazariegos, Darla Greb. Mount Shasta. Mount Pleasant, SC: Arcadia Publishing, 2007.
- Melton, J. Gordon. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.
- Walton, Bruce, ed. Mount Shasta: Home of the Ancients. Mokelumne Hill, CA: Health Research, 1985.

Shavuot

Shavuot is a Jewish holiday that celebrates God's giving the Torah (or Law, the first five books of the Hebrew Bible). It is also a spring festival that celebrates the first harvest and with it the ripening of the first fruits. Shavuot is known as the Feast of Weeks or of the First Fruits. Christians have an analogous holiday called Pentecost. Shavuot is a two-day holiday that begins at sundown on the fifth day of the Hebrew month of Sivan (usually May or June on the Common Era calendar). It is one of three pilgrimage holy days in the Jewish calendar, when, in the days prior to the destruction of the temple, Jews would normally travel to Jerusalem for the observance. It appears that the shift of emphasis from the harvest to the remembrance of the giving of the Torah occurred at the time of the Jewish exile in Babylon.

The date of Shavuot is tied to Pesach, which celebrates God's freeing of the Jewish people from their enslavement to the Pharaoh. They traveled into the Sinai desert and on Shavuot God gave them the Law. The people committed themselves as a group to be loyal to God. Shavuot is a national holiday in Israel, which sets aside one day for its observance. Outside Israel, it is generally a two-day celebration, except among Reform Jews, who celebrate only one day. While Pesach and Shavuot acknowledge the Exodus events, their dating was also tied to the harvest cycle in Palestine, which began with the harvesting of the barley around Pesach and ended with the harvesting of wheat around Shavuot. Shavuot was the first opportunity each year to bring the bikkurim (first fruits) to the temple in Jerusalem. The first fruits would include offerings from the seven main plants grown as crops in the region: wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates (Deuteronomy 8:8).

There are no specific rituals commanded for Shavuot, but a variety of practices have emerged over the centuries. The main event is a service at the synagogue in which the receiving of the Torah is re-enacted. It begins with the chanting of a seventh-century prayer, the Akdamut (Introduction), followed by the reading of the account of the events at Mount Sinai. The prayer calls upon the Jewish community to remain loyal to their faith. As the Torah reading concludes, the congregation rises and reaffirms their acceptance of it. An important event on the second day of Shavuot is the reading from the book of Ruth, which tells a story that took place at harvest time. Ruth was a non-Jew who accepted the faith.

In remembrance that at the time of the events at Sinai, the people did not yet know the soon to be observed laws concerning the ritual process for killing animals for food, milk-based foods are the main foods served at meals during Shavuot.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Judaism; Pesach; Reform Judaism; Sinai, Mount.

References

- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

Shemini Atzeret

See Sukkot.

Shia Islam

Over the first centuries of its existence, Islam was divided into two main communities, the Sunni and the Shia. The split emerged slowly in the years after the death in 661 CE of Ali ibn Abi Talib, the son-in-law of Muhammad (ca. 570–632) and husband of Fatimah (ca. 605–633). Some among the Muslims developed a special veneration for the physical family of Muhammad. However, after Ali's death, the caliphate (the political leadership of the Arab Muslim community) passed to the Umayyads (that is, caliphs drawn from the clan of Umayyad).

The Shias came to believe that Ali had been the best qualified to succeed Muhammad, rather than the three people chosen as caliph between the Prophet's death and the designation of Ali in 656 as the fourth caliph. Over time, they came to believe that Muhammad had chosen Ali as his successor. The Shias also came to believe that Islam needed an imam (or guide) as a guardian of Islamic revelation and the bearer of the Prophet's authority. Hence the need for those in the Prophet's family to lead them. Gradually, "those of the Prophet's family" came to be seen as Ali, Fatimah, and their progeny.

One center of the Shias (literally, partisans of Ali) was Kufa in Iraq, where Ali had briefly resided. There, followers claimed al-Husayn (d. 669), Ali's son, as the successor. After his death, attention turned to his brother, al-Husayn (d. 680). He eventually came to Kufa to assume the leadership of the Shia community. Al-Husayn died in a failed attempt to overthrow the Umayyads. His defeat briefly focused attention on his half-brother, al-Hanafiyya (d. 700).

During the eighth century, various Shia groups with authority placed in varying lines of descent from Muhammad and Ali came to exist, many extinguishing themselves in political opposition to the caliphate. One group, the Imamiyya, traced its lineage through al-Husayn's surviving son, Ali, better known as Zayn al-Abidin (d. 714), and his son, Muhammad al-Baqir (d. ca. 732). The latter was a jurist of note who more clearly articulated the role of the imam as community guide. He also left the community to his learned son, Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765), who worked during the turbulent period that saw the Abbasids overthrow the Umayyad caliphate. The various Shia groups supported the Abbasids, but then became the objects of persecution by the new caliphate. Many in Iraq rallied to the side of al-Sadiq, who went on to develop the idea of a sinless and infallible imam as the authoritative spiritual guide needed by humanity. The imam has the knowledge of the Koran, both its exoteric and esoteric teachings, and obedience is properly due him.

As the majority Shia lineage was developing, one problem of note arose when Zayd b. Ali (d. 740), the son of Zayn al-Abidin, was named the new Shia imam. He, however, soon rejected his role and the idea of a physical lineage of imams. He quickly lost the support of the majority, who quickly gave their allegiance to his brother Muhammad al-Baqir, and soon deleted any mention of Zayd as ever having held the office. Zayd found his support in Yemen and a line of imams, each successor chosen for his demonstrated ability rather than parentage, and continued to lead the community of Zaydites.

Following al-Sadiq were seven additional imams, beginning with Musa al-Kazim (d. 796/797), the younger son of al-Sadiq. During al-Kazim's time of leadership, a dispute developed over whether he or his older brother, Ismail (d. 762), was the rightful imam. Ismail had died prior to his father, and the main body of Shias accepted his younger brother as the seventh imam. Some, however (the followers of Ismaili Islam), looked to Ismail as the proper imam and adopted his descendants as their new imams. The Ismailis have splintered into a number of groups, the largest group being the Nizari Ismailis, led by the Aga Khan and organized around His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council, and the Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra. Both groups now have their largest followings in India.

The main body of Shias, continuing to recognize the descendants of Musa al-Kazim, eventually came under the leadership of the 12th imam, Muhammad al-Muntazar (d. ca. 879), who had become imam at the age of four in 873. Within a few days, however, the youthful imam disappeared and was never found. He had no brothers, and to all appearances the lineage had died out. A crisis of authority emerged. The leaders of the community proposed a novel hypothesis. They suggested that al-Muntazar had assumed a concealed presence in the world, invisible to humanity. However, he will appear at some point in the future as the chosen one whom the Koran suggested would appear shortly before the end of the world. There was an early expectation that the appearance would occur at some point in the next century.

To continue leadership in the Shia community, a Council of Twelve, the ulama, moved into the vacuum created by al-Muntazar's disappearance. They selected one of their number to possess at any moment the authority once held by the imams in Ali's lineage. The ulama assumed more authority century by century as al-Madhi, the Hidden Imam, failed to manifest.

The Shias grew slowly through the 15th century, but in the wake of the Mongol invasion of Persia (Iran) and the rise of the Safawid dynasty at the beginning of the 16th century, Shia Islam became Persia's state religion. The Safawid ruling family claimed a direct lineage from Musa al-Kazim, and Shia Islam subsequently spread throughout the Safawid Empire, which stretched from India to Syria. At the height of its power, the ulama began to appoint judges, ayatollahs, who formed their own courts and had the power of judgment.

Today the Shias, also known as the Twelvers or Ithna-Ashariyah, are the dominant group in Iran, Yemen, and Azerbaijan, and have a slight majority in Iraq. There is a significant Shia minority in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia, while smaller Shia communities exist in the other Middle Eastern states and a number of African countries; through the 20th century, they developed in the West.

In Iran, the ulama remains the chief judicial body for the Shia community and the state. It appoints from among its members a single person to be al-Madhi's representative on Earth. One of these representatives, the Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–1989), became world famous when he was at the focus of the Iranian Revolution in 1979. The worldwide Shia community currently (as of 2010) looks to the spiritual leadership of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei (b. 1939), who resides in Tehran.

The Shia community has given birth to a variety of movements. In Iran and Iraq, for example, the community is divided into two major legal schools, the Usuli and the Akhbari. The smaller group, the Akhbaris, found primarily in the southern parts of the two countries, has the more strict interpretation of the law. The larger Usuli School has the more liberal legal perspective and permits some latitude in the interpretation of the law in reaching legal decisions.

In Iran, the hope of the appearance of al-Madhi supplied the base upon which two popular movements developed in the 19th century. The first was led by Sayyid Ali Muhammad Shirazi (1819–1850), known as the Bab, or the Gate. The Babi movement then gave birth (after the Bab's execution by the Persian authorities) to the Baha'i Faith, which looked to Mirza Husayn Ali (1817–1892), known as Bahá'u'lláh, or the Glory of God, as the one predicted by the Bab. Even though the Babi movement remained relatively small and confined to Persia, the Baha'i Faith has become an important global religion that understands itself as fully independent of Islam.

Through the centuries, the Shia community has been the source of numerous dissenting groups, more than 70 of which have been identified. Though small, they continue to exist throughout the entire Muslim world (from North Africa to Indonesia). Like the majority communities, they accept the basics of Islam, but they have varying opinions concerning the specifics of eschatology, generally revolving around their belief about the manifestation of the Hidden Twelfth Imam. Additional distinctive groups have emerged out of the Ismaili community around the same set of issues.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ali ibn Abi Talib; Baha'i Faith; Bahá'u'lláh; His Highness Prince Aga Khan Shia Imami Ismaili Council; Ismaili Islam; Muhammad; Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra; Zaydites.

References

- Bakhash, Shaul. The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution. New York: Basic Books, 1984.
- Dadary, Farhad, and Zulfikar Hirji. The Ismailis: An Illustrated History. London: Azimuth Edition/Institute of Ismaili Studies, 2008.
- Halm, Heinz. Shiism. Trans. by J. Watson. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1991.
- Khomeini, Ruhollah. Islamic Government. New York: Manor, 1979.
- Tabataba'i, Sayyid Muhammad Husayn. Shi'ite Islam. Trans. and ed. by S. H. Nasr. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1975.
- Ul-Amine, Hasan. Shorter Islamic Shi'ite Encyclopedia. Beirut: n.p., 1969.
- Yann, Richard. Shi'ite Islam. Oxford: Blackwell, 1995.

Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra

The Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra are the largest of the several branches of the Bohras, Ismaili Muslims who in the 11th century acknowledged the authority of al-Mustali (caliph in Egypt, 1094–1101) and later al-Tayyib, the infant heir to the caliph's throne who had disappeared in 1130. They believe that al-Tayyib was not killed, as most have concluded, and now exists as the Hidden Imam. The leadership of the community was eventually placed under the care of an administrator, who has the title al-mutlaq, who possesses all the authority of an imam, as he acts in the absence of the Hidden Imam. Leadership in the al-Tayyib community had arisen in Yemen after being suppressed in Egypt, but in 1517, when the Ottoman Empire extended its boundaries to include Yemen, it moved to Gujarat, India. It later moved to Surat, north of Mumbai, and more recently to Mumbai (Bombay).

The Bohra community went through a crisis of succession in 1589 when the majority party accepted Daud Burhan al-Din (d. 1612) as the new al-mutlaq. Since that time, the position has remained in the family of Daud (or Dawoodi). It continues under the authority of the current al-mutlaq, His Holiness Dr. Syedna Muhammed Burhanuddin, who is aided by a chief assistant (often the designated heir), the ma'dhun, and a second assistant, the mukasir. Local leadership is provided by priests known as shayikhs or amilis.

When they reach the age of 15, each Bohra takes an oath of loyalty to the community and its leadership. That oath is renewed annually. The Bohras recognize seven (two more than most Muslims) essential pillars of their faith: walayah (devotion to Allah, the Prophets, the imam [al-Tayyib], and the al-mutlaq); taharah (purity/cleanliness); salah (prayers); zakah (religious dues); sawn (fasting); the hajj (pilgrimage to Mecca); and jihad (holy war).

The Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra has a college for the training of amils at Surat. Dawoodi Bohras have approximately one million adherents. The majority reside in India, with smaller communities in Pakistan, other Middle Eastern countries, East Africa (since the 18th century), and the West (since the 1950s). Adherents can be recognized by their appearance. Men have beards and wear white, gold-rimmed caps; women wear a colorful dress, the rida.

Shiah Fatimi Ismaili Tayyibi Dawoodi Bohra
c/o Dawat-e-Hadiyah

Administration of the 52nd al-Dai al-Mutlaq
His Holiness Dr. Syedna Muhammed
Burhanuddin

Mumbai

India

<http://www.geocities.com/huzefadiwan/index.htm>

<http://www.torontojamat.com/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Ismaili Islam; Shia Islam.

References

- Amiji, H. M. "The Bohras of East Africa." Journal of Religion in Africa 7 (1975): 27–61.
- Daftary, Farhad. A Short History of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Marcus Wiener, 1998.
- Davoodbhoy, T. A. A. Faith of the Dawoodi Bohras. Bombay: Department of Statistics and Information, Dawat-e-Hadiyah, 1992.
- Roy, Shibani. The Dawoodi Bohras: An Anthropological Perspective. Delhi: B. R. Publishing, 1984.

Shikoku Pilgrimage

The Shikoku Pilgrimage is a pilgrimage primarily associated with Shigon Buddhists of Japan, so named as it occurs on the island of Shikoku, the smallest of the four main islands of Japan. The island is particularly associated with Kukai (774–835) (aka Kobo Daishi), the founder of Shingon Buddhism, who was born and spent much time of his life on Shikoku. During his early life he spent a period as a mountain ascetic, spending his quiet time in Shikoku's more secluded holy places.

The pilgrimage includes visits, in memory of Kukai, to 88 of the islands' hundreds of temples. There are claims that he had visited all of them, but records verify his presence at only a very few. In the days before modern transportation, a pilgrimage would take the pilgrim to every segment of the island and take between 50 and 60 days to complete. Today most people use automobiles, though they still wear the traditional white pilgrim's garb.

Traditionally, the pilgrims begin their trip at Kukai's mausoleum located at the Shingon headquarters on Mount Koya near Wakayama (on the main island of Honshu). While there, the pilgrim seeks Kukai's guidance and assistance. A quick boat trip across the Kii Channel takes pilgrims to Tokushima on the island's northeast shore. Generally, the island was walked around the coast with side trips to visit the mountain temples in the interior.

For those unable to make the entire pilgrimage, the most important sites include Zentsuji, where Kukai was born; Shosanji, the mountain temple, where he is known to have performed various rites and austerities; and Cape Muroto, where he meditated and many believe found his religious awakening.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Koya, Mount; Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Pilgrimage; Shingon Buddhism.

References

- Readicker-Henderson, Edward, ed. The Traveler's Guide to Japanese Pilgrimages. Trumbull, CT: Weatherhill, 1995.
- Schumacher, Mark. A to Z Photo Dictionary/ Japanese Buddhist Statuary. "Kannon." <http://www.onmarkproductions.com/html/kannon.shtml>.
- Statler, Oliver. Japanese Pilgrimage. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1985.

Shin Buddhism

See Pure Land Buddhism.

Shingon Buddhism

The Shingon (or True Word) sects of Japanese Buddhism look to Kobo Daishi (literally, “great teacher”), born Kukai (774–835), as their founder. Kukai arose out of obscurity as a religious seeker at the beginning of the ninth century CE. In 804, he traveled to China, where he studied esoteric Buddhism with Hui-kuo (746–805). He was ordained in 805 and returned to Japan. He spent the next 30 years propagating Shingon and died at Kongobu-ji Temple on Mount Koya in 835.

As in Tibetan Buddhism, Shingon Buddhism teaches that there are three modes of manifestation (the three bodies) of the Buddha, the Enlightened One: dharmakaya (truth body), sambhogakaya (enjoyment body), and nirmanakaya (manifestation body). The dharmakaya is Buddha as unchanging and eternal existence, which Shingon names the Mahavairocana Buddha, the primary object of veneration within the community. Buddha may also manifest as a bodhisattva, such as Amida Buddha of the Pure Land tradition.

The dharmakaya is that aspect of the Buddha that has eternal and unchanging existence. This is the foundation of being of all things in the universe. It is also the underlying foundation of being of the two other bodies of the Buddha. In the Shingon tradition, the dharmakaya Buddha is given the name Mahavairocana. Finally, there is the more limited form that Buddha might take in order to deliver instruction to sentient beings such as humans. Such a form was assumed by the historical Buddha Sakyamuni. The focus on Mahavairocana does not limit the attention that a Shingon believer might give to other Buddhas.

Kukai taught that Mahavairocana Buddha was responsible for generating all life in the cosmos and the universe embodies his teachings. The deeds performed by humans, with their physical bodies, their words, and their spirituality, are those of the Buddha. Once aware of this fact, humans are able to enter a state of Buddha consciousness and attain enlightenment. Through the use of mudras (meaningful signs/gestures made with the hand), vocalizing a mantra (mystical sounds/words), or contemplating one of the Buddhas, a person can enter the highest states of Buddha consciousness. These practices can all be found in the fire rituals for which Shingon temples have become known. These teachings are found in the primary sacred texts of Shingon, the Dianichi Sutra (Mahavairocana-sutra) and the Kongocho Sutra (Vajrasekhara-sutra).

Narita-san Shinsho-ji (Narita Mountain New Victory Temple) is one of the greatest temples in the Kanto area around Tokyo in Japan. It belongs to the Shingonshu Buddhist sect and contains a vast complex of buildings and grounds. (Mihai-bogdan Lazar/Dreamstime.com)

In the 12th century, the Shingon movement divided into two major branches. Kabukan (1095–1145) revived some neglected aspects of Shingon and mixed it with Pure Land emphases such as the repetition of the Nimbutsu mantra and hope of enlightenment in this life and movement into the Pure Land after death. Kabukan's new doctrine, Shingi, was opposed to the traditional or old doctrine, Kogi. Both branches of Shingon would later divide into a number of sub-branches. Some seven sub-branches of the Kogi and two branches of the Shingi were forced to merge in 1941 as World War II began. Most of these sub-branches as well as new ones would reappear after 1945.

The primary bearer of the Shingon tradition is the Koyasan Shingonshu. It and no less than 16 other branches of Shingon are members of the Japan Buddhist Federation. Koyasan Shingonshu has its headquarters at Kongobu-ji Temple where Kobo Daishi is buried. Besides temples across Japan, Koyasan Shingonshu has temples in the United States (17), of which 13 are in Hawaii (2009), and South America (18). In America, the Shingon Buddhist International Institute has been formed to research and promote Shingon thought.

Koyasan Shingonshu
132, Oaza Kotyasan
Koya-cho
Ito-gun, Wakayama
Japan
<http://www.koyasan.org/>

Koyasan Shingon Mission North America
342 E. 1st St.
Los Angeles, CA 90012

Shingon Buddhist International Institute
PO Box 3757
Pinedale Station
Fresno, CA 93650-3757
<http://www.shingon.org/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Japan Buddhist Federation; Kukai (Kobo Daishi); Pure Land Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Arai, Abbot Yusei. Shingon Esoteric Buddhism: A Handbook for Followers. Fresno, CA: Shingon Buddhist International Institute, 1997.
- Buddhist Denominations and School in Japan*. Tokyo: Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai, 1984.
- Hakeda, Yoshito. Kukai: Major Works. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.
- Kiyota, Minoru. Shingon Buddhism, Theory and Practice. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International, 1978.
- Light of Buddha*. Los Angeles: Koyasan Buddhist Temple, 1968.
- Murthy, K. Krishna. Buddhism in Japan. Delhi: Sundeep Prakashan, 1989.

Shinnyoen

Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality, a new religion, or shin shukyo, based on the esoteric Shingon School of Buddhism, was founded in several stages by Ito Tomoji (1912–1967) and her husband, Ito Shinjo (1906–1989), beginning in 1936 in the Tachikawa suburb of Tokyo; at that time, it was known as the Riss-hohaku Association. To ensure legal recognition, the movement was affiliated with a well-established Shingon sect, Shingonshu Daigoha, and in 1948 it became a legal religious organization in its own right, using the name Makoto Kyodan, which it changed to Shinnyoen in 1951. Shinnyoen became a religious juridical entity in 1953.

Prior to founding Shinnyoen, Ito Shinjo studied the science of divination known as Byozeisho and also trained at the Daigo School of Shingon esoteric Buddhism, where he received the title of Great Master (Acharya); his wife inherited an important spiritual gift referred to as reino, or spiritual faculty, from her aunt. Believing themselves to be suitably trained and endowed, they together took on the role of “mediums of salvation” for all who were concerned to know their destiny or have their fortunes told.

The tragedy that struck them as parents when their two sons died from an incurable illness in childhood was to be imbued with deep spiritual significance and value. The death of the two brothers, the holy brothers, or ryodoji sama, as they are known, was interpreted to mean that the spiritual path uniting this world and the invisible world had been opened, and the Bakku Baiju, or the great power of salvation, had been unleashed.

Shinnyoen stresses its Buddhist credentials and, by contrast with Agonshu, claims to be new and even unique by being the only religion to base its doctrines on what it claims to be the last teachings of the Buddha, Siddhatta Gotama, the Mahaparinirvana, or Great Nirvana, Sutra. Buddha, according to Shinnyoen, revealed that this sutra contained the essence of all his previous teachings. Like so many other Japanese new religions and new, new religions based on one or another of the Buddhist sutras, Shinnyoen is also eager to stress that the teachings of Mahaparinirvana Sutra are open to all to know and understand, and not the exclusive preserve of a few dedicated Buddhist clerics.

There are several levels of spiritual development in Shinnyoen. There is the lay order of monks, which consists of those who have undergone special training and taken formal vows. In addition, there are the four levels of daijo, or Mahayana; of kangi, or happiness; of daigangi, or great happiness; and of reino, or spiritual faculty. Practice of the faith, service to the movement, and engagement in activity to spread the movement constitute the criteria for a member moving from one stage to another.

Like Tenrikyo, Shinnyoen operates on the basis of a lineage system, in the sense that all new members have what is referred to as a “guiding parent,” that is, the person who introduced them to the movement. That person continues to assist the new follower, or “guided child,” with understanding of the doctrines and with their practice. The doctrines, or “secrets of Buddhism,” are derived in the main from esoteric Buddhism and are revealed to followers by mediums—all followers can with appropriate training eventually become mediums—who are believed to receive support from the members of the founders’ family, now existing in the spirit world. Mediums are highly regarded as true disciples of Buddha.

Sesshin, or spiritual guidance, is an important part of Shinnyoen practice and is provided with the help of spiritual mediums, or reinosha, who act as mirrors for trainees. Such mediums provide four kinds of spiritual guidance (sesshin), two of which are for the general improvement of members—kojo sesshin and sodan sesshin—and two of which are for the resolution of specific problems—sodan sesshin and kantei sesshin. Special meditation sessions known as eza are provided for those who aspire to higher levels of enlightenment.

Shinnyoen encourages all followers to carry out the Three Practices, which are kangi, or joyous offerings leading to the purification of the mind; gohoshi, or service leading to the purification of the body; and otasuke, or the purification of speech, which consists essentially of sharing the teachings with others and bringing them to the Buddha.

The movement’s present leader is Ito Shinso, called by followers Kyoshu-sama, a daughter of the founders. Today there are an estimated 650,000 Shinnyoen members in Japan, and the movement has established centers in the United States, in several European countries, and in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore. In all of those countries the following is relatively small: for example, there are no more than 1,000 members in Europe.

Shinnyoen, Garden of Absolute Reality
Grand Temple at 1-2-13 Shibazaki-cho
Tachikawa, Tokyo 190-0023

Japan

<http://www.shinnyo-en.or.jp/> (in Japanese)

<http://www.sef.org/> (in English)

Peter B. Clarke

See also: Agonshu; Shingon Buddhism; Tenrikyo.

References

- Nagai, Michiko. “Magic and Self-Cultivation in a New Religion: The Case of Shinnyoen.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 22, nos. 3–4 (1995): 301–321.

Sakashita, Jay. “Shinnyoen and the Transmission of Japanese New Religions Abroad.” Ph.D. diss., University of Stirling, Scotland, 1998.

Shiramizu, Hiroko. “Organizational Mediums: A Case Study of Shinnyoen.” Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 6, no. 3 (1979): 70–82.

Shinran

1173–1263

Shinran, the son of Hino Arinori, a low-ranking courtier in Japan, was the founder of the Japanese Jodo Shinshu tradition, which grew to be the largest branch of Pure Land Buddhism in Japan. Pure Land Buddhism seeks to facilitate the salvation of its members through the simple practice of calling upon the name of Amitabha Buddha (known as Amida Buddha in Japan).

Little is known about Shinran’s life prior to his becoming a monk in 1181. He settled in the Tendai monastic complex on Mount Hiei not far from Kyoto. After 20 years of discipline and study, however, he left Mount Hiei. He expressed disenchantment with the monastic life, but had also been drawn to the teachings of Honen (1133–1212), founder of the Jodo-shu, the first of the Japanese Pure Land sects. Shinran studied with Honen from 1201 to 1207 and became an exponent of his belief that anyone who recites the nembutsu (that is, repeats Amida Buddha’s name “Namu Amida Butsu”) and simultaneously entrusts himself or herself to Amida Buddha’s vow of compassion (to save all beings at all times and in all places without any discriminations) would attain rebirth in the Western Paradise (the Pure Land). The Pure Land was not the ultimate goal, but it would be a fitting environment where the devotee would be able fulfill the practices that led to Buddhahood.

Honen proposed that the universality of Amida Buddha’s vow did not make distinctions between good and evil persons. He also discounted any necessity for long years of study and practice. His ideas were attacked from all elements in the Buddhist community and various leaders petitioned governmental authorities to censure Honen and stop his nembutsu teachings. This pressure, bolstered by the unfortunate action of two disciples who violated a prohibition that had been put in place in 1207 and converted devotees to the Pure Land teachings, prompted the emperor to action. He banished Honen and seven of his leading disciples, among whom was Shinran, from the capital. Honen, now 76 years old, was sent to Shikoku, while Shinran was exiled to Echigo (present-day Fukui and Toyama prefectures) on the Japan Sea coast. The penalties included the loss of their Tendai ordinations. They were, in the eyes of society, mere laypeople.

Accepting his fate, Shinran assumed the name Fuji’i Yoshizane and married. He and his wife had six children. In 1214, Shinran moved with his family to Hitachi (present-day Ibaraki Prefecture) in the Kanto region, where he quietly but actively began to build a large following, primarily among the farmers and trade persons. He established Pure Land meeting centers, which he termed dojos. In 1234 Shinran turned the dojos and their respective congregations to his followers and moved to Kyoto with his family.

Shinran would spend much of his life in Kyoto revising the Kyagyo shinshu (the full title in English reads A Collection of Passages Revealing the True Teaching, Practice and Realization of the Pure Land Way) and writing a variety of essays. The Kyagyo shinshu consists almost wholly of passages drawn from the Chinese Pure Land sutras with short commentaries inserted by Shinran. The finished product articulates the spiritual vision of the several Pure Land sutras. The first and most important, the Larger Pure Land Sutra, lists the 48 vows that Dharmakara undertakes to fulfill his quest to become Amida Buddha and establish a Pure Land with the intent to save all beings. Of these 48 vows, Shinran asserted that the 18th is most crucial. It states, “If I were to become a Buddha, and people, hearing my Name, have faith and joy and recite it for even 10 times, but were not born into my Pureland, may I not gain enlightenment.”

Over the course of the development of Pure Land thought, the idea of reciting Amida’s name evolved to mean uttering the Amida’s name in the form “Namu Amida Butsu”—“I take refuge in the Buddha Amida.” Invoking the name of the Buddha is now an integral part of the Pure Land devotee’s ritual and spiritual life.

In the place of rigorous spiritual discipline, a traditional theme in Buddhist thought, Shinran advocated the centrality of shinjin, true or sincere faith, which he found in the writings of the Seven Patriarchs: Nagarjuna (ca. 150–250) and Vasubandhu (ca. fourth century) of India; Tan Luan (476–ca. 542), Dao Cho (562–645), and Shan Dao (613–681) of China; and his fellow countrymen Genshin (942–1017) and Honen (1133–1212). In asserting that faith is central, and echoing themes that would later emerge in Christian Protestant thought, Shinran assumed that the believer possesses nothing true or absolute. Spiritual release comes when the devotee perceives his or her inadequacies and surrenders to the absolute Other Power (tariki) of Amida Buddha. Amida Buddha's compassionate efficacy is the source of salvific power. Even shinjin or faith, the prime condition for birth in the Pure Land, emerges as a gift; and the sincere utterance of the nembutsu is an invocation of gratitude and joy for Amida's compassion.

In 1256 Shinran's wife returned to Echigo with three of their children to oversee property that she had inherited. The youngest daughter, Kakushinni, remained in Kyoto to care for her aging father. Following his death, she established the gravesite and chapel that would evolve into the Honganji, the main temple of the Shin tradition.

Over the next centuries, the Shinshu tradition would become the Buddhist tradition with the largest following in Japan. It finds its main expression in its two main divisions, the Honpa Honwanji and Higashi Hongwanji. Pure Land thinkers argued that it is not possible for the laity to engage in long years of discipline and study required by the other sects, and further, the universal accessibility of enlightenment offered through the Pure Land teaching more closely approximated the Mahayana ideal of universal salvation. Many Buddhists came to agree.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Honen; Jodo-shinshu; Jodo-shu; Nagarjuna; Pure Land Buddhism; Tian Tai/Tendai Buddhism.

References

- Dobbins, James C. Jodo Shinshu, Shin Buddhism in Medieval Japan. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Kasahara, Kazuo. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Kosei Publishing Company, 2001.
- Matsunaga, Alicia, and Daigan Matsunaga. Foundation of Japanese Buddhism. Vol. 2. Los Angeles: Buddhist Books International, 1976.
- Nakasone, Ronald Y. Ethics of Enlightenment: Essays and Sermons in Search of a Buddhist Ethic. Fremont, CA: Dharma Cloud Publishers, 1990.
- Ueda, Yoshifumi, and Dennis Hirota. Shinran: An Introduction to His Thought. Kyoto: Honganji International Center, 1989.

◆ Shinto

Shinto (the Divine Way), the traditional religion of Japan, is today represented by a spectrum of religious groups in the land of its birth, the largest segment of the movement being Shrine Shinto, which finds embodiment in the thousands of public shrines that dot the landscape. Shrine Shinto was the state religion of Japan in the decades prior to World War II. Sect Shinto designated the 13 Shinto organizations (Kurozumikyō, Shinto Shuseiha, Izumo Oyashirokyō, Fusokyo, Jikkokyo, Shinshukyo, Shinto Taiseikyo, Ontakekyo, Shintotaikyo, Misogikyo, Shinrikyo, Tenrikyo, and Konkyoko) recognized by the government during that period. In addition, there are more than 100 new Japanese religions, some founded before 1945 and suppressed by the government and others founded after 1945, which draw primarily on Shinto themes.

Early in Japan's history, numerous extended family groups (clans) developed, each of which developed religious practices largely tied to its land. There was no central political structure or unified culture. By the third century CE an agriculturally based religion had become prominent, and over the next centuries Japan would come together as a nation around the prominent Yamato clan (the source of the later imperial family). During this formative period, two of what would become leading Shinto shrines, Ise and Izumo, were created.

Crucial to the creation of a national Shinto religion (which incorporated the many local variations) was the introduction of Confucianism and its emphasis on ethics and social order, the spread of the cosmology that divided the world into ying-yang polarities, and later the arrival of Buddhism. Each challenged the elite elements of Japan to create a uniquely Japanese faith comparable to that of neighboring states. One result was the compilation of the Kojiki (712) and Nihon Shoki (720), the two sacred texts of Shinto that describe the overarching myth out of which the many local cults would operate.

Shinto temple in Japan. (Corel)

Shinto views the world as alive with divinity. The term kami refers to the many deities of heaven and Earth who may include among them some human beings and an array of natural objects (birds, plants, and natural features). Anything above the ordinary or that might awaken a sense of awe or mystery in the human mind may be listed as a kami, including the succession of emperors who have led the country.

Although kami of local significance are acknowledged at different shrines, some kami gained a significance as part of the national myth of Japan's origin. The deities Ame-no-mi-naka-nushi-no-Kami (Kami Master of the Center of Heaven), Taka-mi-musubi-no-Kami (High Sacred Creating Kami), and Kami-masubi (Sacred Creating Kami) are seen as the primordial dei-ties who were present when nothing but the primal chaos existed. They were responsible for the formation of the Earth and the deities who were later to create Japan and its people.

The High Kami in heaven sent the primal parents—Izanagi (male) and Izanami (female). Their interaction gave birth to numerous islands and other deities. Then Izanami was burned as the fire-god was given birth. She descended into the underworld, where she was trapped after eating of its food. In his attempts to free Izanami, Izanagi bathed in the ocean as a cleansing act. His ablutions also resulted in the appearance of Amaterasu, the goddess who is seen as the ancestress of the Japanese imperial family. While at a festival, another kami held a mirror up for Amaterasu to gaze upon herself. She would later give this mirror to her grandson, who was sent from heaven to establish the Japanese royal lineage. The mirror is now said to be residing hidden in the Ise shrine.

Shinto has an essential communal element, and much of its activity occurs in the many shrines that are found throughout Japan. The shrines, abodes of the kami, are generally located in spots of particular natural beauty or some noteworthy geographical feature. The site itself is marked off with a fence, and the entrance with the distinctive gate (torii) to which a sacred rope (shimenawa) is attached. At the shrine, the kami are invoked on a cycle that follows the agricultural seasons and that affirms the myth of national origins. Many shrines are located at the foot of a mountain, which has the effect of marking the land of death and renewal (the mountain) from the plains, the land of life and activity. Others may be found at the point where two streams merge.

Common elements in Shinto rituals are the offering of foods, which in turn has had a profound influence on the Japanese diet, and purification, harkening back to the baths taken by Izanagi in his attempts to free his wife from the underworld. Food offerings may be classified by type (animal, vegetable, fish), style of preparation (raw or cooked), mode of offering, or whether it is to be viewed by the deities or eaten by them. Frequently the offered food becomes part of a banquet consumed later by the worshippers.

Purification rites have been developed in response to a variety of life's setbacks, from the sickness and death of a loved one to natural calamities and national disasters. They came to include reactions to forms of ritual impurity (from menstruation to sexual activity) and to symbolize the hope of renewal.

After 538, Shinto developed in dialogue with Buddhism, the latter becoming an increasing part of Japanese life. Shinto and Buddhist temples were often constructed adjacent to each other, and they found a common ground in their esoteric element. Buddhists came to accept Shintoism as a lesser form of itself, and locally, syncretistic Buddhist/Shinto cults developed that centered on specific shrines and local deities. Shugendō became one of the more interesting new religions drawing deeply from both Buddhist and Shinto sources.

Shintoism experienced a revival in the 15th century after many shrines were destroyed in the Onin War (1467–1477). Out of the ashes emerged Yoshida Kanetomo (1435–1511), who dedicated his life to their reconstruction (especially those most associated with his prominent family), the return of Shinto supremacy in the land, and the re-establishment of imperial authority. He recast Shintoism as the original faith and the source of Daoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism. He expounded a new theology built around an exoteric teaching (as found in the Kojiki and Nihon Shoki) and esoteric teachings that he claimed had been revealed by deities to his family (resulting in additional scriptural texts). Kanetomo became the leading figure in Shintoism, and his school would dominate the religion during the next centuries.

The work of Kanetomo and his successors would during the Edo period (1600–1868) lead to a shift in Shinto away from a primary dialogue with Buddhism to one with Confucianism. At the same time a new scholarly movement, called kokugaku (national learning), attempted to redefine Japanese tradition and self-identity. Hayashi Razan (1583–1657), who led the new trend, emphasized the immanence of the Absolute as the divine within the inner life of the individual, the divine life expressed in ethical behavior, and, most important for Japan's future, the primary manifestation of divine virtue in the imperial government. During the Edo period, especially in the writings of Yoshikawa Koretari (1616–1694), the deity Kuninotokotachi no

Mikoto, identified with the primal chaos, emerged as the central figure in the Shinto pantheon.

The continued development of Shintoism in the 18th century set the stage for major developments in the 19th century. The variety of Shinto groups, later to constitute Sect Shintoism, began to emerge. Most of these new groups were the result of the activity of a creative founder who was also responsible for the composing or receiving by revelation of a distinctive new scripture. These groups were later classified by the major themes they developed. Some emphasized attachment to traditional texts (Kojiki and Nihon Shoki), Confucian ethical principles, or purification rituals. The Fuji and Ontake sects emphasized the longstanding worship at sacred mountains. Spiritual healing, utilizing Shinto rituals, became the center of Tenrikyō and Konkōkyō.

A new era for Shinto came in 1868 with the emergence of the Meiji government. The new government brought to the fore a form of Shintoism usually referred to as State Shinto. It combined the thought of Hirata Atsutane (1776–1843) with the cult that had grown up around the imperial family. Atsutane had been an effective propagandist of the return of Japan to imperial rule and the establishment of Shinto as the sole religion of the land. State Shinto propagated the belief in the divinity of the emperor and sanctified Japan's national political policies. It proposed as its idea saisei itchi, the unity of religion and government. Students of Atsutane were recruited to head a revived Office of Shinto Worship whose initial mandate was the separation of Shintoism from Buddhism and Christianity. As a result, Shinto shrines were stripped of all Buddhist and Christian symbols, and the imperial palace was denuded of the heretofore dominant Buddhist altars and symbols.

In the 1870s, step by step, the government asserted its authority over the Shinto shrines and leadership. The Agency for Spiritual Guidance was given authority over all Shinto priests and designated their place of appointment. The national rituals to be performed at each shrine were also prescribed. The emperor was declared sacred and inviolable in 1889, and, in 1900, Shinto's special place was re-emphasized by its being placed under the Bureau of Shrines in the Home Ministry, while Buddhism and Christianity were relegated to a separate Bureau of Religion in the Ministry of Education. In the meantime, Sect Shinto had an intermediary position. The sects were treated much like Buddhism and Christianity, being seen as private religious organizations under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Religion. Most important, they were not allowed to create shrines or to copy shrine architecture in their worship centers, including the use of a torii as a gateway entrance.

Increasingly, Shinto was seen as an arm of the state. In 1911 it ordered all schools (including private religious schools) to take their pupils to shrines for nationally directed ritual events. In 1932 a Catholic school refused to comply with the regulation on grounds of religious freedom. Students at one Catholic school had been asked to visit a shrine particularly associated with Japan's military history. As a result of the protest, the government declared the shrines "nonreligious" sites whose task was to foster national loyalty. Shintoism was thus redefined in such a way as to be compatible with any particular religious affiliation; the inclusion of Shinto ritual into both private and public life became a sign of loyalty as Japan went to war. Amulets from the Ise shrine became ubiquitous.

The loss in World War II affected Shintoism most of all. The coming of religious freedom gave Sect Shinto a new life, and several sects emerged as popular movements whose adherents numbered into the tens of thousands. Then, on December 15, 1945, General Douglas MacArthur (1880–1964) issued the "Shinto Directive," which ordered the separation of State Shinto from the government. Most important, the government was to end its support of the shrines. This mandate was embodied in the Constitution of 1947.

In the late 1940s, State Shinto evolved into what is today known as Shrine (jinja) Shinto. The formerly government-supported shrines were reorganized into a private religious corporation, the Association of Shinto Shrines, with which the great majority of shrines affiliated. There were more than 100,000 such shrines in 1945. By the beginning of the 1980s, some 79,000 shrines were maintained as part of the new system of voluntary support. Two seminaries, one at Kokugakuin University in Tokyo and the other at Kogakukan University in Ise, train Shinto priests. The Association represents Shintoism in various interfaith activities, including the World Conference on Religion and Peace. It also accepts women into the priesthood.

In spite of the proliferation of Shinto sects, the Association includes the majority of the 2 to 3 million Japanese who identify themselves as Shintoists, the number of whom is somewhat difficult to assess, as many people carry dual affiliations, a continuing result of Meiji era practices. Support for Shintoism in Japan pales next to that for Buddhism, which now commands the allegiance of more than half the population. The special Shinto of the Imperial House (koshitsu) also survives in a variety of practices associated with the emperor and his family, the shrines at the royal palace, and the Grand Shrine at Ise. The most important rite is Niinamesai, the annual offering of the first fruits of the grain harvest, which includes a thanks to the deities for their blessing and a sharing of the food with the deities, especially Amaterasu.

The Grand Shrine at Ise, now a popular tourist attraction, includes two shrines. One is dedicated to Amaterasu and, as the shrine of the legendary ancestress of the emperor, has a special relationship to the imperial family. Traditionally, the emperors would make reports to the goddess at the shrine, which was believed to hold the fabled mirror she had passed to her grandson. A second shrine is dedicated to Toyouke, the goddess of food. Every 20 years, new shrines replicating the old ones are erected. Upon their completion, as part of a ceremony of renewal, the ritual objects in the old shrines are transferred to the new ones, and the old shrines are then completely dismantled.

Shinto, as the religion of the Japanese people, has been largely confined to that country. However, early in the 20th century, it was established among Japanese immigrants in Hawaii. Although largely suppressed during World War II, it slowly revived after the war as questions of the loyalties of Japanese Americans were resolved. Shinto has subsequently appeared, in small numbers, in diaspora communities in Canada and South America.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Buddhism; Confucianism, Daoism; Ise Shrine, The; Izumo Ōyashirokyō; Konkyoko; Kurozumikyô; Ontakekyo; State Shinto; Tenrikyo; World Conference on Religion and Peace.

References

- Bocking, Brian. A Popular Dictionary of Shinto. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1997.
- Breen, John, and Mark Teeuwen, eds. Shinto in History. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 2000.
- Hardacre, Helen. Shinto and the State, 1868–1988. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Kasulis, Thomas P. Shinto: The Way Home. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2004.
- Nelson, John K. A Year in the Life of a Shinto Shrine. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1996.
- Ono, Sokyo. Shinto: The Kami Way. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle, 1967.
- Yamakage, Motohisa. The Essence of Shinto: Japan's Spiritual Heart. Tokyo: Kodansha International, 2007.

Shri Ram Chandra Mission

The Shri Ram Chandra Mission is one of the several neo-Hindu movements that became popular both in India and in the West in the 20th century.

Shri Ram Chandra (“Lalaji,” 1873–1931) was born in Fatehgarh (Uttar Pradesh, India) in 1873. In 1908 he returned to Fatehgarh from Kaimganj, where he had lived for several years, and started tutoring a small number of pupils who accepted him as their spiritual master. In 1914 he established his first regular satsang, or group meditation, and from 1929 on he consecrated his whole life to teaching and commenting on the Vedas. He died in 1931. His successor, also called Shri Ram Chandra (1899–1983), although not a relative, was born in Shahjahanpur and was known in the movement as Babuji. In 1945 he incorporated the Shri Ram Chandra Mission (named after his master and not himself). Originally a civil clerk (hence the name Babuji, from the word babu, meaning clerk), he decided in 1954 to devote himself full-time to the work of the mission and went on to supervise its worldwide expansion. He died in 1983 and was, in turn, succeeded by Shri Parthasarathi Rajagopalachari, born in Madras-Chennai in 1927 and known in the mission as Chariji.

The mission teaches a system of yoga called Sahaj Marg. This is a variety of traditional Raja yoga (royal yoga), modified in accordance with modern lifestyles. Although other Raja yoga schools have rather complicated and lengthy trainings, Sahaj Marg is basically simple and includes no secret rituals, names, or mantras. New pupils immediately start meditating with the help of a “preceptor” for 30 minutes (later, when they are more experienced, one hour), simply sitting and focusing their attention on the “Divine Light,” which is supposed to be already present in their hearts. The mission recommends another 30 minutes of “purification” at the end of each day, in order to clear the mind of the distractions accumulated throughout the day. A short prayer is also suggested before going to bed. This process is known as the “inner trip,” or yatra, through a number of spiritual realms moving gradually closer to the Center. During this process, the pupil receives help from the transmission of the master’s own energy, a “force without force,” or without qualification, also known as pranahuti, or the gift of life (after prana, life; and huti, gift). It is possible to achieve a state of union with the divine at the end of the process, and it is this that is regarded as the ultimate aim of true yoga.

In 1967 the Shri Ram Chandra Mission established the Sahaj Marg Research and Training Institute, with headquarters at Chennai (India) and Lausanne (Switzerland) as an international yoga research center. There are more than 50 ashrams in India, the largest of them in Manapakkam, seven miles from Chennai; there are also two ashrams in the United States, and others in Europe, the largest being in Augerans (France) and Vrads Sande (Denmark).

Shri Ram Chandra Mission (Shahjainpur U.P.)

Manapakkam

Chennai 600 116

India

<http://www.srcm.org>

Massimo Introvigne and PierLuigi Zoccatelli

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Yoga.

References

- Chandra, Ram. Truth Eternal. Chennai, India: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1973.

Complete Works of Ram Chandra. 2 vols. Pacific Grove, CA: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1989–1991.

Rajagopalachar, Parthasarathi. My Master. Chennai, India: Shri Ram Chandra Mission, 1975.

Shugendo

Shugendo, literally the Way (do) of practicing or acquiring (shu) magico-religious power (gen), is the name given to a broad range of beliefs and practices associated with sacred mountains in Japan. It has no actual founder but grew out of loose organizations of people who entered mountains either temporarily or permanently in order to attain the power of the divine forces (kami, hotoke) associated with them. Stories of ascetics and esoteric practitioners, such as Shugendo's legendary founder En no Gyoja, share motifs of immurement in mountains, restricted diet or fasting, the recitation of mantras, and contemplation. The growing formalization of mountain practices and the incorporation of regional sacred mountains and their practitioners—particularly under Buddhist auspices—led, by the 13th century, to the emergence of two dominant streams of Shugendo, one affiliated with the shrine-temple complex at Yoshino and the other with that at Kumano. By the 17th century, the main streams were Honzan-ha and Tozan-ha, centered on Yoshino-Kumano and affiliated with Tendai and Shingon, respectively; Haguro-ha in northern Japan; and Hikosan in Kyushu. The former two looked on En no Gyoja as their founder, while Haguro and Hikosan maintained local traditions. Shugendo was banned in 1872 as part of the Meiji government's policy of creating Shinto as a state ideology and suppressing all signs of syncretism. Shugendo was particularly vulnerable, because it had developed as an admixture of Japanese beliefs about mountains and their kami (deities), esoteric Buddhist practices and doctrines, shamanistic and medumistic understandings of the relationship between the human and the divine, and Chinese ritual and divinatory techniques. Shugendo sects mushroomed after freedom of religious association was legalized in the postwar constitution.

The practice most associated with Shugendo is that of the Ten Realms. Mahayana Buddhism postulates Ten Realms of rebirth: hells, hungry spirits, beasts, ashuras, human beings, heavenly beings, shravakas (disciples of the Buddha), pratyeka-buddhas (self-enlightened buddhas), bodhisattvas, and buddhas. Shugendo practice in the mountains incorporates the idea of progressing through these realms of enlightenment, combined with an earlier, shamanistic pattern of death and rebirth. Medieval records suggest that this pattern was once widespread; now, however, it survives only at Hagurosan in Yamagata Prefecture.

The Akinomine (Autumn Peak) of Hagurosan, originally lasting more than a month, has gradually been condensed to the present seven days (August 24–September 1). Practitioners divide their time between making pilgrimages to sacred places in the mountains during the day, to access sacred power, and reciting sutras for two sessions of around two hours every night. Six specific practices associated with the first 6 of the 10 realms are carried out in conjunction with symbolic rituals centering on death and rebirth. The hells are represented by a ritual called nanban ibushi, in which pungent smoke is fanned through the hall at the end of the sutra-recitation sessions on the first three nights. The hungry spirits are symbolized by fasting on the first three days; the beasts by complete abstinence from the use of water (other than drinking); the ashuras by Tengu-zumo (wrestling); human beings by repentance (repeated prostrations while reciting the names of the deities and buddhas of the mountain); and heavenly beings by ennen (sacred dance), though now Noh chants have been substituted. The underlying theme of death and rebirth is symbolized, sometimes in multiple forms, by an initial funeral service (prior to entering the mountain); conception (throwing a pole up the steps of the temple, the touching of blazing torches together); growth in the womb (ceremonies to “pacify the spirit,” altar decorations); and birth (uttering the birth cry on the final day, running down the mountain, jumping over flames).

Shugendo doctrine traditionally has borrowed much from Buddhism and has been concerned with esoteric explanations of the meaning of terminology, ritual, and dress. It does not have scriptures as such. In recent years Shugendo centers have made much of the contribution that Shugendo can make to ecological understanding. Although it is traditionally a male preserve, women shugen are active in all centers, though they are still banned from entering the region around Sanjogatake (Yoshino), the most sacred peak of Kumano-Yoshino Shugendo. Full female participation is a continuing controversy here, though in other centers, such as Hagu-ro-san, women have begun to occupy senior positions formerly restricted to men.

Gaynor Sekimori

See also: Birth; Fuji, Mount; Mahayana Buddhism; Mountains; Pilgrimage; Shingon Buddhism; Tian Tai/ Tendai Buddhism; Women, Status and Role of.

References

- Earhart, H. Byron. A Religious Study of the Mount Haguro Sect of Shugendo: An Example of Japanese Mountain Religion. Tokyo: Sophia University, 1970.
- Miyake, Hitoshi. Shugendo: Essays on the Structure of Japanese Folk Religion. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2001.
- Sekimori, Gaynor. "The Akinomine of Haguro Shugendo: A Historical Perspective." Transactions of the International Conference of Eastern Studies, no. 40 (1995).
- Swanson, Paul L. "Shugendo and the Yoshino-Kumano Pilgrimage: An Example of Mountain Pilgrimage." Monumenta Nipponica 36, no. 1 (1981): 55–84.
- Tyler, Royall, and Paul L. Swanson, eds. "Shugendo and Mountain Religion in Japan." Special issue of the Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 16, nos. 1–2 (June–September 1989).

Shwedagon Pagoda

Shwedagon Pagoda, the most sacred Buddhist site in Myanmar, is a stupa designed to hold Gautama Buddha's relics located in Yangon, Myanmar's capital. The founding of Shwedagon seems to harken back to the beginnings of Yangon itself, which prior to the middle of the 18th century was but a small fishing village named Bagan. The village has probably been inhabited since the sixth century BCE; since the area was then

The Shwedagon Pagoda in Yangon, Myanmar. The pagoda was a Buddhist shrine built to house relics of saints. (Corel) marshy the Singuttara hill may have been a more inviting location, rising above the surrounding marshy land. Also, it may at that time have been associated with a community of people from Orissa, in India.

According to one story, in the fifth century BCE, just as the land was emerging out of prehistory, two Burmese merchants visited Gautama Buddha at Bodhgaya in India. They found him sitting under the Bodhi tree, just seven weeks after he attained enlightenment. Buddha gave the merchants eight strands of his hair, which the two men brought with them when they returned home. The hairs were subsequently enshrined in a casket on Singuttara hill. Reportedly, there was already a shrine housing relics of three earlier enlightened ones. Over the shrine, a stupa was erected. Other stories relate a visit by Ashoka (ca. 304–232 BCE), the Indian king and staunch supporter of Buddhism, who repaired the shrine.

There is actually no written evidence of Shwedagon and the shrines located there until the 15th century, when an inscription telling of a trip by Burmese monks to Sri Lanka for ordination mentions the hill. The inscription is in both the Mon and Burmese languages.

The present stupa, the centerpiece of the complex, was erected in the 1770s. It rests on a raised platform and reaches some 321.5 feet into the air. It is plated with 53 tons of gold. At the very top of the stupa's spire is the "diamond bud" (sein-bu), which holds an orb encrusted with 4,351 diamonds—including one measuring 76 carats. Around its base are four large devotional halls, called tazaung, in the center of each of the four sides surrounding the stupa. There are an additional 64 smaller shrines, called zeidi-yan, between each of the tazaung. These smaller shrines were added in the early 1900s.

The British turned Yangon into the capital of the country (then called Burma) in 1885. During the British era, which ended in 1948, it was known as Rangoon.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Ashoka; Bodhgaya; Enlightenment; Relics.

References

- Aung, Myint, Thaung Wai, and U Kyi Win, eds.
Shwedagon: Symbol of Strength and Serenity.
 Yangon, Myanmar: Yangon City Development Committee, 1997.
- Moor, Elizabeth, U Win Pe, and Hansjörg Mayer.
Shwedagon: Golden Pagoda of Myanmar.
 London: Thames & Hudson, 1999.
- U, A. Than. Shwedagon. Rangoon: Government of Burma, 1957.

Siddha Yoga

Siddha Yoga is a registered trademark of the SYDA Foundation, which was established in 1974 to support the teaching work of the Hindu monk Swami Muktananda (1908–1982), who considered himself to be a spiritual successor to Nityananda (1897–1961), an ecstatic believed to have magical powers and who spent the later years of his life bathing in the hot springs in Ganeshpuri Village about 50 miles northeast of Mumbai. Each of them attracted a following that included leading members of government and the finance and film industries in India. With considerable help from New Age sages Richard Alpert (Baba Ram Dass) (b. 1931) and Werner Erhard (born John Paul Rosenberg, 1935) and from New Journalism writer Sally Kempton, after 1970 Muktananda was able to extend his own following to affluent and elite sectors of society in Los Angeles, New York, and beyond.

Muktananda described Siddha Yoga as a spiritual path based on grace. It is a devotional movement in which the master or presiding guru is believed to function as a channel of grace for the benefit of the devotee. While spiritual disciplines or practices are strongly recommended to followers, the sine qua non is the presence of the person and the awakening of the inner spirit of the master. Recommended practices include a vegetarian diet, a daily routine that includes singing Hindu religious songs and chanting prescribed traditional texts, donating time and money to service of the guru, and silent meditation. Although this can be done alone at home, attendance at programs periodically scheduled at a local Siddha Yoga mediation center and on special occasions at a more distant gathering place or ashram is encouraged, too. However, with the availability of streaming video and digital recordings, the experience of the guru's presence increasingly is virtual rather than literal.

There is no universally agreed founding date for the movement. It may have had its starting point in Muktananda, who repeatedly said that Nityananda initiated him and ritually installed him as a guru in his own right on August 15, 1961. But before that, as early as 1956, Muktananda had begun to attract followers to his small Gavdevi Ashram, later enlarged and renamed Gurudev Siddha Peeth, just outside Ganeshpuri. Later, in three so-called world tours during the 1970s, he visited Australia, Europe, and the Americas, where he was lionized as "the guru's guru" perhaps due to endorsements by Alpert, Erhard, and others or else the celebrity bestowed by an influential article in New York magazine written by Sally Kempton, who soon after became a press agent and editor for the guru. She continued to serve as a very influential member of the movement's small monastic order until her departure from the organization in 2002.

Muktananda's reputation declined in the final years of his life due to allegations of secret sexual activities with young female devotees. Although he made oblique reference to the allegations in an open letter that was distributed before he died, the SYDA Foundation has refrained from making any official response to the reports. The way in which Muktananda arranged for two co-equal successors to assume leadership after his passing was almost as controversial, and within three years produced a schism in which Swami Chidvilasananda (born Malti Shetty in 1955) was successful in retaining the full resources of the Foundation while her younger brother, Swami Nityananda (born Subash Shetty in 1962), carried few followers away when he established his new organization called Shanti Mandir.

Siddha in its Hindu context may mean complete, perfected, or fully realized, and the movement takes it to mean that the sources, methods, and goals affirmed in its devotional theology of grace are indeed perfectly capable of completely transforming the devotee into a liberated being. Nityananda of Ganeshpuri, Swami Muktananda, and Swami Chidvilasananda are represented as illuminating models of the archetype of the Siddha in a personal form and as mediators of an invisible transcendent realm called Siddha Loka, which is functionally similar to the realm of ascended masters found in I AM, Theosophy (Theosophical Society), and similar modern revivals of ancient teachings. Many Siddhas are likely to be alive on the planet at any time, but only a highly evolved being can discern them. By definition each guru in the lineage of masters in the Siddha Yoga movement is such a being. The guru is assumed to be a capable guide for devotees in two basic ways: as an instructor and as a transmitter of enabling power for complete spiritual development.

Siddha Yoga teachings are drawn from many kinds of written and oral sources, mainly Hindu, but without limitation to any single sector of the tradition. They come from texts of the Veda, Advaita Vedanta, Saiva Agama, and Tantra, and give special prominence to Kashmir Saivism and to devotional texts that honor the role of the guru and that praise Hindu goddesses. Siddha Yoga seems to have an open or an emerging canon of scripture that is determined by the presiding guru's assessment of what the devotees need. Devotees, in turn, can practice Siddha Yoga at home, in groups, or by enrolling for fee-based short courses without relinquishing the religion of their birth or family. From a devotee's point of view, the key feature of Siddha Yoga is a relationship to the guru as a spiritual catalyst, expressed through affiliation rather than membership.

Siddha Yoga
PO Box 600
371 Brickman Rd.
South Fallsburg, NY 12747-5313
<http://www.siddhayoga.org/>

Gene R. Thursby

See also: I AM Religious Activity; Kashmir Saivism; Meditation; Tantrism; Theosophical Society (Adyar); Vegetarianism; Yoga.

References

- Altglas, Veronique. "The Global Diffusion and Westernization of Neo-Hindu Movements: Siddha Yoga and Sivananda Centres." Religions of South Asia 1, no. 2 (2007): 217–237.
- Caldwell, Sarah. "The Heart of the Secret: A Personal and Scholarly Encounter with Shakta Tantrism in Siddha Yoga." Nova Religio 5, no. 1 (2001): 9–51.
- Pechlis, Karen. "Gurumayi, the Play of Shakti and Guru." In The Graceful Guru: Hindu Female Gurus in India and the United States, edited by Karen Pechlis, 219–243. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Williamson, Lola. "The Perfectibility of Perfection: Siddha Yoga as a Global Movement." In Gurus in America, edited by Thomas A. Forsthoefel and Cynthia Ann Humes, 147–167. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.

■ Sierra Leone

Sierra Leone is an African nation situated on the Atlantic Ocean between Guinea and Liberia. A variety of African peoples, including descendants of people freed from slavery by the British and deposited at Freetown, make up the present population of 6,300,00 people who inhabit the country's 27,700 square miles of land.

SIERRA LEONE

Sierra Leone was originally settled by a spectrum of peoples, the Temne (in the north) and Mende (in the south) being the largest. From the 15th to the beginning of the 19th century, the coast was visited by the Portuguese and other slavers, gathering people to ship to the Americas, but settlements were sporadic.

A new era for Sierra Leone began in the 1780s. British abolitionists purchased a small tract of land for the settlement of repatriated former slaves. The first settlers arrived in 1787, and their numbers grew in 1792 with a group from Nova Scotia. Following the America Revolution, former slaves who had sided with the British on the promise of freedom after the war were relocated to Nova Scotia. Many, uncomfortable with the climate, accepted the offer of British abolitionists for relocation to Africa. The former Nova Scotia residents landed at what in 1792 would become known as Freetown. A third group (the Maroons) would arrive from Jamaica in 1800, and the population would grow with other former slaves as well. But also, within a generation, the settlement would be co-opted by the British government as its drive to control Africa emerged. The repatriated Africans, known as Creoles, would become a distinct group, identified by their adoption of European ways and their feeling of superiority to the Native peoples.

The small Freetown settlement became the capital of the new colony of Sierra Leone, and the British took control of the inland areas over the course of the 19th century. In 1960, Sierra Leone became an independent state, but in 1971, after several years of instability, it broke ties with England and declared itself a republic. However, poverty, corruption, and unrest have continued to the present and culminated in a decade-long civil war (1991–2001). An unstable condition remains from the war years, and UN peacekeepers continue to monitor the situation.

Among the former slaves who settled in Nova Scotia were Methodists and Baptists. Upon their arrival in Freetown, they founded the first Christian churches. David George (1743–1810) was the leader of the Nova Scotian Baptists and became the pastor of the Freetown Baptist Church, the first Baptist congregation on the African continent. Prior to the American Revolution, he had formerly been a member of the all-black Baptist church in Silver Bluff, South Carolina. It was to be a generation before a second congregation would be established. The work struggled through the century, aided briefly by the Southern Baptists in the 1850s. The Baptist Convention of Sierra Leone was founded in 1974, but by the end of the century it still had only about 6,000 members.

The Methodists who arrived in 1792 were some 200 strong. After opening the first Methodist church in Africa, they sought assistance from their co-religionists in England, but the British conference was slow to develop a missionary consciousness; it was not until 1811 that they recruited a missionary, George Warren, to assist with the work. He died after only eight months, and his successors quarreled with the congregants and split the work into several factions. In the middle of the century, the United Brethren in Christ (now a constituent of the United Methodist Church) began a separate work, and later in the century the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (now an integral part of the Wesleyan Church) and the African Methodist Episcopal Church assumed support for missionary efforts. At the end of the 20th century, all of these works continued, with the original Methodist Church of Sierra Leone being the largest. It is the only Sierra Leone-based church that is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Men who had been active in creating Freetown were among the founders of the Church Missionary Society (1799). As might be expected, the Church Missionary Society turned its attention to Sierra Leone as one of its first missionary targets. They hoped to convert the Creoles and to use them to missionize the continent. The climate took its toll on the British missionaries, and many died, but along the way they founded two schools that became important in the colony's development, Fourah Bay College (for men) and Annie Walsh Training Institution (for women). As quickly as possible, they trained African priests. A diocese was erected in 1852, thus allowing for the ordination of African clergy without the necessity of their traveling to England. A European held the episcopal chair until the middle of the 20th century.

In 1951, Sierra Leone was one of five Anglican dioceses that merged to form the Church of the Province of West Africa. Moses Scott, the African bishop of Sierra Leone, was the first archbishop of the new province. There are now two dioceses in Sierra Leone.

Roman Catholics made initial efforts to reach the people of Sierra Leone over the centuries since the first European contact, but it was not until the 19th century that permanent missions and churches were established. The vicariate of Sierra Leone was designated in 1858 and assigned to the Lyons Fathers and the Holy Ghost Fathers. The church experienced slow growth during its initial century. The first Sierra Leone priest was ordained in 1939. In 1950, Rome assumed direct responsibility for the work and established the dioceses of Freetown and Bo. In the 20th century, the Roman Catholic Church became the largest religious group in the country.

A variety of Protestant and Free church groups arose in Sierra Leone over the course of the 20th century. As early as 1905, two young women who had been influenced by the Pentecostal revival in Los Angeles began a small mission in Freetown, and then directed work among the Kru people and other groups (Kissi, Limba, Loko) in the extreme eastern part of the country. This work was later assumed by the Assemblies of God. The New Apostolic Church, which began work in the 1960s, has also enjoyed great success.

The original Methodist Church, though not from any desire of its own, became the first of African Initiated Churches, both in Sierra Leone and the whole of the continent. A number of independent churches arose in Sierra Leone during the 20th century, including some from other countries, such as the Church of the Lord, Aladura and those indigenous to Sierra Leone, such as the National Pentecostal Church.

While Christianity entered from the coast, Islam entered from the interior. Sunni Islam of the Malikite School had been established in West Africa in the 11th century. It found a response in the northern and western parts of the country among the Susu, Vai, Bullom, Yalunke, and Temne. During the 20th century, many Mende became Muslim. Unlike some nearby countries,

Sierra Leone

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	1,011,000	2,887,000	46.7	4.32	4,200,000	6,805,000
Ethnoreligionists	1,466,000	2,421,000	39.1	3.84	3,003,000	4,164,000
Christians	218,000	767,000	12.4	5.94	1,232,000	2,151,000
Protestants	97,800	328,000	5.3	1.92	480,000	800,000
Independents	19,000	175,000	2.8	2.23	315,000	600,000
Roman Catholics	47,500	227,000	3.7	22.25	400,000	700,000
Agnostics	0	90,000	1.5	4.32	170,000	350,000
Baha'is	750	14,700	0.2	4.32	25,000	40,000
Hindus	1,400	3,200	0.1	4.32	6,000	8,000
New religionists	100	1,400	0.0	4.31	2,600	5,000
Atheists	0	200	0.0	4.26	500	1,000
Total population	2,697,000	6,185,000	100.0	4.32	8,639,000	13,524,000

such as French-speaking Senegal, the Sufi brotherhoods are not very active in Sierra Leone.

Sierra Leone has been especially responsive to the Ahmadiyya Muslim movement, which many Muslims consider sectarian and even heretical. The Ahmadiyyas began work in 1957 and have found their best response among the Mende people (now comprising 90 percent of the Ahmadiyya membership). The Baha'i Faith has also had considerable response and now reports more than 10,000 members.

The liberal Protestant churches in Sierra Leone are associated together in the Council of Churches in Sierra Leone, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. More conservative bodies are associated with the Evangelical Fellowship of Sierra Leone, which is an affiliate of the World Evangelical Alliance. The Interreligious Council of Sierra Leone (IRCSL), a broad-based organization representing the major Christian and Muslim organizations in the country, has been active in the search for peace in the war-torn land.

The violent situation in Sierra Leone during the 1990s has not been conducive to the influx of new religions, and the country's religious pluralism remains confined to the traditional religions of the native people, Islam, and Christianity. There is a small Hindu presence among Indian expatriates and a small group related to the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Church Missionary Society; Church of the Lord; Church of the Province of West Africa; Holy Ghost Fathers; Malikite School of Islam; Methodist Church of Sierra Leone; New Apostolic Church; Roman Catholic Church; United Methodist Church; Wesleyan Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

Fisher, H. "The Ahmadiyya in Sierra Leone." Sierra Leone Bulletin of Religion 2, no. 1 (1960): 1–10.

Hanciles, Jehu. Euthanasia of a Mission: African Church Autonomy in a Colonial Context. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2002.

Olson, G. W. Church Growth in Sierra Leone: A Study of Church Growth in Africa's Oldest Protestant Mission Field. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1969.

Sierra Leone Studies Association. Islam and Trade in Sierra Leone. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1997.

Skinner, D. E. "Islam in Sierra Leone during the Nineteenth Century." Ph.D. diss., University of California, 1971.

Sikh Dharma

Sikh Dharma, an outgrowth of—and successor organization to—the Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization, was founded by Yogi Bhajan (1929–2004) in 1969. Bhajan was a well educated Sikh and former customs officer from Delhi, India. He moved to Toronto, Canada, in 1968, where he initially taught hatha yoga classes. From Toronto he moved to Los Angeles in December 1968, and the next year he founded an ashram and the Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization (3HO). People were attracted to 3HO by Bhajan’s classes in Kundalini Yoga and Mahan Tantric Yoga, previously a secret practice. Yogi Bhajan’s teachings, which initially focused on yoga disciplines, gradually changed to emphasize an increasingly orthodox form of Sikhism, the religion in which Bhajan was raised. This new focus was reflected corporately when 3HO was supplanted by Sikh Dharma. 3HO was retained as Sikh Dharma’s educational wing.

Like many of the other Eastern religious groups that took root in the West during the later years of the 1960s counterculture, 3HO initially attracted disaffected young people. As a consequence, individuals associated with Bhajan’s Sikh Dharma are usually Westerners rather than Punjabis. (Punjab, a province in northwest India, is the Sikh homeland.) They take formal initiation into the Sikh faith by joining the Khalsa, the Brotherhood of the Pure Ones, a fellowship begun by Guru Gobind Singh. Members of the Khalsa are required to keep the traditional practices introduced by Guru Gobind Singh that became the distinguishing marks of the Sikh community, known popularly as the five k’s: kesh, long hair, a sign of saintliness; kangh, a comb for keeping the hair neat; kach, short pants, for quick movement in battle (later interpreted as the admonition to wear underwear, which in South Asia is associated with sexual control); kara, a steel bracelet signifying restraint; and kirpan, a sword of defense (it later became acceptable for Sikhs to carry a sword symbolically).

3HO Sikhs are vegetarians, usually preferring natural foods. Fish, meat, alcohol, and drugs are prohibited. They also prefer natural methods of healing. Additionally, the traditional religious practices and holidays of Sikhism are observed by 3HO Sikhs. These holidays include Balsakhi Day, the birthday of Khalsa (April); the Martyrdom days of Guru Tegh Bahadur (November) and Guru Arjun Dev (May); and the birthdays of the 10 gurus.

There has been a good deal of controversy with respect to Sikh Dharma’s relationship with the older Punjabi Sikh community. American Sikhs criticized Punjabi Sikhs for becoming lax in their discipline, especially in their adherence to the five k’s. Additionally, in the 1970s, Sikh leaders in Amritsar took the unprecedented step of giving Bhajan administrative authority over Sikh affairs in the Western Hemisphere, an appointment that carried with it the title Siri Singh Sahib. Some Punjabi Sikhs living in the West were outraged by this appointment. Rather than challenging Amritsar, however, they responded by criticizing Bhajan on such issues as his emphasis on yoga and diet—an emphasis that is not part of traditional Sikhism. Other Sikhs in India echoed this line of criticism. Although these issues were never resolved, Bhajan’s emphasis on orthodoxy was supported by Amritsar. New controversies arose following the upheavals that took place in the Punjab in the 1980s, with Bhajan coming under attack from Sikh nationalists for his refusal to support an independent Sikh homeland.

Sikh Dharma centers may be found in more than 20 countries around the world, including Taiwan, Australia, South Africa, Brazil, and many of the European nations.

Sikh Dharma
Rt. 3
Box 11 32D
Espanola, NM 87532

Sikh Dharma International Secretariat
PO Box 351149
Los Angeles, CA 90035
<http://www.yogibhajan.com>
<http://www.3ho.org>

James R. Lewis

See also: Guru Gobind Singh’s Birthday; Martyrdom of Guru Arjan; Martyrdom of Guru Tegh Bahadur; Meditation; Nanak, Guru; Sikhism/Sant Mat; Summer Solstice; Vegetarianism; Yoga.

References

- Dusenbery, Verne A. "Punjabi Sikhs and Gora Sikhs: Conflicting Assertions of Sikh Identity in North America." In Sikh History and Religion in the Twentieth Century, edited by Joseph T. O'Connell, Milton Israel, and Willard G. Oxtoby, 334–355. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books, 1988.
- Elsberg, Constance Waeber. Graceful Women: Gender and Identity in an American Sikh Community. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2003.
- Jakobsh, Doris. "3HO/Sikh Dharma of the Western Hemisphere: The 'Forgotten' New Religious Movement?" Religion Compass 2 (2008).
- Khalsa, Kirpal Singh. "New Religious Movements Turn Towards Worldly Success." Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 25 (1986): 233–245.
- Khalsa, Shanti Kaur. The History of the Sikh Dharma of the Western Hemisphere. Española, NM: Sikh Dharma Publications, 1995.
- Laue, Thorsten. Kundalini Yoga, Yogi Tee und das Wassermannzeitalter. Religionswissenschaftliche Einblicke in die Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization (3HO) des Yogi Bhajan. Münster, Germany: LIT, 2007.
- Tobey, Alan. "The Summer Solstice of the Healthy-Happy-Holy Organization." In The New Religious Consciousness, edited by Charles Y. Glock and Robert N. Bellah, 5–30. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

◆ Sikhism/Sant Mat

Sikhism was founded by Guru Nanak (1469–1539) in 16th-century India. Nanak was born into a Hindu family in Punjab, a province in northern India. Although Hindus constituted a majority of the population, in Nanak's time Muslims ruled most of the subcontinent. He took instruction in Hindu lore from a village teacher and also attended a Muslim school. Although certain older interpreters of the Sikh tradition asserted that he was attempting to reconcile Hinduism and Islam by forming a syncretism of the two, the consensus of more recent scholarship is that Nanak saw himself as founding a completely new religion superseding both Hinduism and Islam.

Sikh men bathing in the holy pool at the Golden Temple of Amritsar in Punjab, India, 2007. (Jeremy Richards/Dreamstime.com)

Sant Mat, by way of contrast, is a sampradaya—a school of religious teaching transmitted through a line of gurus—that, at least traditionally, did not seek to establish itself as a separate religion. The Sant teacher Ramananda, for example, stayed within the Hindu fold, while Kabir, perhaps history's most famous Sant master, remained identified as a Muslim. Although Sant Mat arose in North India during the late Indian Middle Ages, the core meditation technique of the school, Surat Shabd Yoga, or Nad Yoga, appears to be much more ancient.

Sikhism and Sant Mat have been associated with each other for a number of different reasons. These include their common location and period of origin, the many shared themes in their teachings, similar conceptions of the divine, and the fact that the majority of contemporary Sant Mat teachers are Sikhs. Some early 20th-century scholars went so far as to claim that Guru Nanak was actually a student of Kabir—a speculative assertion with no documentable historical basis. Mainstream Sikhs do not practice Surat Shabd Yoga and would adamantly reject any suggestion that Nanak and the other Sikh gurus were part of the Sant Mat tradition. The following discussion will survey first Sikhism and then Sant Mat.

At about the age of 16, Guru Nanak became an accountant in the household of an important Muslim official in the town of Sultanapur. He began to gather a group of followers who bathed together in a river before dawn every day and met in his home in the evening to sing religious songs. One day he failed to return from his morning swim. His friends found his clothes on the banks of the river and dragged the waters in an unsuccessful attempt to recover his body. Three days later, Nanak reappeared. He is said to have stated at the time: “There is neither Hindu nor Muslim, so whose path should I choose? I shall follow God’s path. God is neither Hindu nor Muslim and the path which I follow is God.”

Later he explained that during the time he was missing he had been carried into God’s presence, where he had received a cup of nectar and a message from God to go forth into the world to teach the repetition of the name of God and the practices of charity, meditation, and worship.

Nanak traveled widely to spread his religious message. According to tradition, he made four journeys, visiting Assam in the east, Sri Lanka in the south, Ladakh and Tibet in the north, and Mecca, Medinah, and Baghdad in the west. Nanak’s followers began to call themselves sikhs, which means students or disciples.

In 1504, India was invaded by a Muslim conqueror from Central Asia. By 1525 the sultan of Delhi had been deposed and the Mogul Empire established in its place. During this time of upheaval, Nanak looked for a place of refuge and stability. He and his family established a religious center at Kartarpur, a village built on land donated by a wealthy member of the new faith.

Nanak stressed that there is but one God. Although he regarded his revelation as transcending both Islam and Hinduism, his teachings also embodied certain traditional South Asian ideas, such as karma, reincarnation, and the transitory nature of the world. He emphasized the unique role of the guru as necessary to lead people to God. He urged his followers to meditate, worship God, and sing devotional hymns.

According to Sikhism, the ultimate purpose of religion is union with God through his indwelling presence in the human soul. Receiving divine grace in this way, human beings are freed from the cycle of birth and rebirth, and then pass beyond death into a realm of infinite and eternal bliss. Nanak’s teaching offered a clear and simple path to this goal. By meditating on the divine name, human beings are cleansed of their impurities and enabled to ascend higher and higher until they achieved union with the eternal one. Sikhs hold that suffering in the world arises as a result of humanity’s separation from God.

Toward the end of his life, Nanak ensured that his teaching would not die but would survive and become a new religion. He appointed a successor, Lehna, passing over his own two sons, whom he did not regard as suitable. Nanak gave Lehna a new name, Angad, meaning “limb.” Lehna would become a “limb” or a part of Nanak. After Guru Nanak’s death in 1539, Angad became the second of what would become 10 Sikh gurus. He compiled a hymnal of Guru Nanak’s compositions, to which he added his own.

The third guru, Amar Das, served from 1552 to 1574. He dug a well with 84 steps at Goindwal that became a place of pilgrimage and a focus of special rites and festivals. Amar Das nominated his son-in-law Ram Das Sodhi as the fourth guru. Thereafter the guship remained in the Sodhi family. The fourth guru, Ram Das, began the Golden Temple of Amritsar, the present headquarters of the world Sikh community. He nominated his son Arjan as the fifth guru.

Arjan completed the Golden Temple, which is still Sikhism’s central shrine, with four doors on four sides to indicate that it was open to all castes. He also installed the Adi Granth (First Book), the collected writings of Nanak and the other gurus, within it. Arjan was eventually tortured and executed by the Mogul emperor. His martyrdom ended the first phase of Sikhism. Before his imprisonment, Arjan had nominated his son Hargobind as the sixth guru and girded him with two swords, symbolizing spiritual and temporal power. He left instructions that his son should “sit armed upon the throne and maintain an army to the best of his ability.”

The sixth guru, Hargobind, established a group of horse and foot soldiers. He was imprisoned by the Mogul emperor for several years, but upon his release he regrouped and fought against the Moguls. The seventh guru was Hargobind’s grandson Har Rai. The eighth guru was Har Rai’s son Harikrishan, who died as a child. Upon the death of the young eighth guru, the Mogul emperor nominated a successor. The Sikhs, however, acclaimed Tegh Bahadur as their ninth guru. Guru Tegh Bahadur traveled through the Punjab preaching. His popularity prompted the Mogul emperor to have him arrested and beheaded in 1675.

The 10th guru, Gobind Singh, completed the Adi Granth and further militarized the Sikhs by forming the Khalsa, the Community of the Pure. Members of the Khalsa were initiated by a baptism in which they drank and were sprinkled with sweetened water stirred with a sword. They added Singh (Lion) to their name and adopted the five k’s: kesh, long hair, a sign of saintliness; kangh, a comb for keeping the hair neat; kach, short pants, for quick movement in battle; kara, a steel bracelet signifying sternness and restraint; and kirpan, a sword of defense. The Khalsa was open to men and women of all castes. Members were admitted only after an initiation ceremony at which they pledged themselves to an austere code of conduct. Each morning they were to bathe at dawn and spend time in meditation. Liquor, tobacco, and narcotics were forbidden. They pledged loyalty to the teachings of the gurus. Sikhs who did not accept baptism into the Khalsa fraternity came to be known as Sahajdhari.

After all four of his sons died in fighting the Moguls, Guru Gobind Singh proclaimed that the line of the gurus would come to an end with himself. After Gobind Singh’s death, the Adi Granth—subsequently referred to as the Guru Granth Sahib—was established as the guru, and no further human gurus were allowed. Subsequently, the Guru Granth was installed upon a throne and treated as a living presence in every Sikh temple.

Following Gobind Singh’s death, the Khalsa became a military and political power in Punjab. Conflict between the Sikhs and the Mogul Empire continued. In 1799 the Sikhs captured Lahore and made it their capital. The Sikh kingdom of Ranjit Singh dominated the Punjab and other areas of northwest India. This kingdom granted religious freedom to the Hindus and Muslims. During the rule of Maharajah Ranjit Singh, from 1799 to 1839, large numbers of peasants converted to the Khalsa.

During the 19th century, the Sikhs fought against British invaders. The army of Ranjit’s successor was defeated in 1849, and the Sikh kingdom was annexed to British India. Partially because the British administration was perceived as being generally fair and evenhanded in Punjab, the Sikhs remained loyal to the British during the Great Mutiny of 1857 and afterward became preferred recruits to the British army. The Sikhs continued to increase in numbers under British rule, largely because of the special favors accorded to the Khalsa in the army and the civil services.

In 1931 leading Sikh authorities and associations in India held a meeting at Amritsar and drew up a document called the Rehat Maryada (Guide to the Sikh Way of Life) that all Sikhs are expected to follow. In this document, a Sikh is defined as anyone who believes in one God, the 10 gurus and their teaching, and the Guru Granth. Every Sikh is expected to serve the community of the faithful, lead a life of prayer and meditation, and recite or read a prescribed number of hymns each day.

The British withdrew from the Indian subcontinent in 1947. When the British decided to partition the Punjab between the new states of India and Pakistan, the Sikhs were bitterly disappointed. Many places sacred to them, such as the birthplace of Guru Nanak, were in the western section of Punjab, which was given to Pakistan. East Punjab remained in India. Eventually 2.5 million Sikhs were forced to immigrate to East Punjab.

In the Indian census of 1971, the number of Sikhs (both Khalsa and Sahajdhari) was more than 10 million, which was still less than 2 percent of the population of India. About 85 percent of the world’s Sikhs live in Punjab, northern India. There are also significant diaspora communities in the United Kingdom and Canada.

There are several Sikh sects. The Udasi, or “detached,” are followers of Sri Chand, the ascetic elder son of Guru Nanak. They did not convert to the Khalsa started by Guru Gobind Singh. During the period of Sikh persecution by Mogul rulers, the Udasi took over the management of several Sikh shrines and introduced Hindu icons and rituals into Sikh temples. This met with the disapproval of orthodox Sikhs, who divested the Udasi of their control of the temples in the 1920s. Most Udasi today observe Hindu customs and pay nominal homage to the Adi Granth.

The Nirmala, or “unsullied,” are a sect of theologians started by Guru Gobind Singh. The guru had a group of scholars study Sanskrit and the Vedas to be better equipped to interpret the writings of the gurus, which make frequent allusions to Hindu mythology and sacred texts. Nirmala wear white clothes and are vegetarians.

The Namdhari, or “adopters of the name,” are a sect founded by Balak Singh, who criticized the rich lifestyle of the Sikh aristocracy and preached the virtues of poverty. He exhorted the Sikhs to practice no ritual except repeating God’s name. The Namdhari dress in white handspun cloth, abstain from liquor, and are vegetarians. Their gurdwaras are free of ostentation, and their wedding ceremonies are performed in austere simplicity.

The Nihangi, or “crocodiles,” are a militant order of Khalsa. They wear blue clothes and always carry weapons. Today they live mostly on alms and are notorious for their addiction to hashish. The Nirankari believe in the succession of gurus continuing after Guru Gobind Singh and pay homage to a living guru. They include persons of all religions without requiring conversion to Sikhism.

If one considers Sant Mat to be a Sikh sect, it is easily the largest. The most prominent contemporary Sant Mat lineage is the Radha Soami (or Radhasoami) movement. The Radha Soami Satsang, Beas is one of a number of movements flowing from the teachings of Param Sant Soami Ji Maharaj (Soami Ji). Soami’s successors quarreled and split over succession to leadership of the movement he created. Radha Soami Satsang, Beas developed from the teachings of Baba Jaimal Singh. The successor to Baba Jaimal Singh, Maharaj Sawan Singh, spread the teachings throughout India and, eventually, to the West. Under the leadership of Sawan Singh’s grandson, Charan Singh, the Radha Soami Satsang, Beas became the largest of all of the Sant Mat groups in the world.

The notion that God is light and sound is a core doctrine of the Sant Mat tradition. Rather like Western Gnosticism, Sant Mat teaches that the cosmos is a multilevel emanation in which human souls are trapped, and that the spiritual aspirant needs a series of words or names keyed to each of the lower levels in order to move through these levels and reach the divine source. There are five lower levels, for which one therefore requires five words. A sound current (a “river” of vibration; alternately pictured as a ray of light) from the higher levels—an emanation from the high God—flows down through all of the lower levels. A living guru imparts five secret names (the simram) to the aspirant at the time of initiation. Contemplating the sound current and the inner light (the visual aspect of the divine sound) with the master’s guidance allows the individual to follow the sound back to the source from which it emanated (the Supreme Being), resulting in spiritual liberation. Those who follow the system must live according to a code of behavior that includes vegetarianism, abstinence from alcohol, and high moral character. Two and a half hours per day are to be set aside for meditation.

Radha Soami has also been the source of a number of new religious movements. For example, the father of Maharaj Ji, the current leader of Elan Vital (formerly the Divine Light Mission), was originally a disciple of Sawan Singh. New splinter groups have often arisen out of disputes over who should be the new leader following the death of a guru. One of the more important splinter groups was Kirpal Singh’s Ruhani Satsang, which was formed in the wake of the passing of Sawan Singh. Kirpal Singh’s followers, in turn, have splintered repeatedly following his death. Kirpal Singh was also one of Paul Twitchell’s teachers, and a number of outsiders have pointed out Kirpal Singh as likely the source of ECKANKAR sound current practices. ECKANKAR itself has influenced or given rise to a number of other new spiritual groups.

James R. Lewis

See also: Celebration of the Guru Granth Sahib; ECKANKAR; Elan Vital/Divine Light Mission; Energy; Gnosticism; Golden Temple; Guru Gobind

Singh's Birthday; Martyrdom of Guru Arjan; Martyrdom of Guru Tegh Bahadur; Meditation; Nanak, Guru; Radhasoami; Ruhani Satsang; Sikh Dharma; Vegetarianism.

References

- Barrier, N. Gerald, and Verne A. Dusenbery. The Sikh Diaspora: Migration and the Experience Beyond Punjab. Delhi: Chanakya, 1989.
- Cole, W. Owen. Popular Dictionary of Sikhism. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1990.
- Fripp, Peter. The Mystic Philosophy of Sant Mat. Punjab, India: Radha Soami Satsang Beas, 1978.
- Grewal, J. S. The Sikhs of the Punjab. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008.
- Juergensmeyer, Mark. Radhasoami Reality: The Logic of Modern Faith. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Lane, David Christopher. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. New York: Garland, 1992.
- McLeod, William Hewat. Historical Dictionary of Sikhism. Methuen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 2005.
- Nesbitt, Eleanor. Sikhism: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Rai, Priya Muhar. Sikhism and the Sikhs: An Annotated Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1989.
- Singh, Harbans. The Message of Sikhism. Delhi: Delhi Sikh Gurdwara, 1978.
- Singh, Khushwant. A History of the Sikhs. New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Takhar, Opinderjit Kaur. Sikh Identity: An Exploration of Groups Among Sikhs. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2005.
- Tatla, Darshan Singh. Sikhs in North America: An Annotated Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession

The first Lutheran congregations in Silesia began to emerge in the 1620s, and by the middle of the century the Protestant Reformation had celebrated its victory in this region. In 1568 the first rules for worship services in this locality were published, which have been regarded as a legislative ground for the Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession (Slezská církev evangelická augsburského vyznání) up to present time. With the end of the period of the Counter-Reformation and the re-Catholicization, Silesia witnessed another growth of Lutheranism after the issuing of the Edict of Toleration by Joseph II. In 1861, following the issuance of the so-called Protestant Edict, the first Lutheran congregations became part of the Evangelical Church of Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria-Hungary, having formed the so-called Seniorate of Silesia. After the fall of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the foundation of an independent Czechoslovak Republic, a self-governing seniorate was founded in Czechoslovakia under the name of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Eastern Silesia. Since 1948, the church has used its present name.

The character of the church is regional and national—it operates in the region of Silesia, and many of its members are of Polish nationality. That is also the reason why, apart from Czech, one of its official languages is Polish.

The church follows the Augsburg Confession of 1530 and the doctrine of Martin Luther. In its religious practice, it keeps the traditions of baptism and the Lord's Supper, while at the same time rejecting the notion of transubstantiation. However, it acknowledges the presence of Christ's Body and Blood in the Sacrament of the Altar during the moment of holy Communion. Its basic forms of liturgy are two Sunday services, carried out in Czech and Polish. Organizationally, it follows a Presbyterian structure. The synod is the highest legislative body.

The church numbers its members at approximately 30,000 (2006). It is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Silesian Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession/Slezská církev evangelická augsbur-ského vyznání

Na Nivách 7
CZ-737 01 Český Těšín
Czech Republic

Dusan Lužný

See also: Evangelical Church of the Augsburg and Helvetic Confessions in Austria; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Simalungun Protestant Christian Church

The Simalungun Protestant Christian Church (Gereja Kristen Protestan Simalungun) was established in 1961, when the Simalungun-speaking congregations in the Protestant Christian Batak Church (HKBP) requested autonomy so they could develop a ministry especially for their people. Simalungun is a Batak dialect with some similarity to Sanskrit. The people are concentrated in rural Sumatra in a mountainous region near Lake Toba.

The church traces its history to 1903. The first sermon was preached in Simalungun country by Theophilus Pasaribu, an evangelist from among the neighboring Toba people, who accompanied a Rhenish Mission evangelist into the region. G. K. Simon, a missionary who settled in the region, translated portions of the New Testament into the Simalungun language. The mission began just as a feeling of nationalism had arisen in Sumatra, and the church was identified with the Dutch authorities. Growth was slow.

During World War II, the church was able to keep some of its work going because of its knowledge of the Japanese Christian Toyohiko Kagawa, with whom the Japanese occupation forces were familiar.

The HKBP had formed the Simalungun District in 1940, and in 1950 it established a school for the training of Simalungun pastors. The assignment of several of the pastors from the first graduating class away from the Simalungun area first prompted talk of separation of the district.

The new church continued the organization and beliefs of the parent body. It is led by a synod, but congregations have a high level of autonomy. An executive council administers the church's affairs between synod meetings. The church ordained the first female pastors in 1988, and it has a strong cadre of female evangelists.

The church reported 201,000 members in some 600 congregations in 2006. It sponsors the Bethesda Hospital in Sardok Dolok and an educational center at Sondi Raya. It is a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Council of Churches.

Simalungun Protestant Christian Church
PO Box 101
21142 Pematangsiantar
North Sumatra
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Lutheran World Federation; Protestant Christian Batak Church; World Council of Churches.

References

- Bachmann, E. Theodore, and Mercia Brenne Bachmann. Lutheran Churches in the World: A Handbook. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1989.
- Van Beek, Huibert. A Handbook of the Churches and Councils: Profiles of Ecumenical Relationships. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 2006.

Simchat Torah

See Sukkot.

Simeon Stylites

The monk Simeon (or Simon) Stylites (ca. 390–459) became one of the most noteworthy characters in Christian history by his adoption of an extreme form of asceticism that church members of the fifth century accepted as a sign of sanctity. He began his adult life in a monastery, which he left after nine years to become a hermit. Ten years later he sat down on a column, the top of which was a mere 40 inches in circumference.

Portrait of Simeon Stylites, a Christian ascetic who took up residence atop a series of pillars in the fifth century CE. (Bettmann/Corbis)

He would remain on that column located near Aleppo, Syria, for a quarter of a century, dependent upon those who knew of him to bring him food.

Once seated in place, Simeon's fame spread quickly as did his reputation for holiness. Those who observed him understood him to be trying to lift himself above mundane concerns and successfully resisting the downward tug of his human nature. He stayed in place for seven years, on what was a relatively short column. The column was then raised some 65 feet into the air.

He would remain on that heightened place for two decades. During this time, he gained a reputation as a miracle worker. Many of the rich and powerful came to see him. His status in the church was no better demonstrated than when the Roman Emperor Theodosius II (r. 408–450) visited to seek out his counsel.

Following his death in 459, a large procession formed to take his body to Antioch (Syria). His body was preserved for a time, and as late as 580, Evagrius (ca. 536–ca. 600), who left one of the most important accounts of Simeon in his Ecclesiastical History, reported having seen Simeon's head, still considered a most sacred relic.

A variety of stories began to be told about Simeon—that he ate only once a week and not at all during Lent, or that he spent the last year of his life standing on one leg. While most of these stories are now discounted, he did begin a new practice, living on a pillar, which remained popular for several centuries. Among his more well-known successors were a disciple named Daniel (d. 493) and a saint who took Simeon's name (and is generally referred to as Simeon the Younger [d. ca. 596]).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Asceticism; Relics.

References

- Challoner, Richard. Life of St. Simon Stylites (389–459). Willets, CA: Eastern Orthodox Books, 1977.
- Doran, Robert. The Lives of Simeon Stylites. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications, 1992.
- Evagrius Scholasticus. The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius Scholasticus. Trans. by Michael Whitby. Liverpool, UK: Liverpool University Press, 2000.
- Torrey, C., and F. Lent. The Letters and Life of Simon Stylites. Maidstone, UK: Oriental Orthodox Library, 2007.

Sinai, Mount

Mount Sinai, also called Mount Horeb, is the place where Moses received the Law from God. In the ancient accounts of the receiving of the Law, Moses and the people of Israel are said to have crossed the Red Sea to the Sinai Peninsula. Three months after their departure from Egypt, they arrived at the mountain (Exodus 19:1–2), and the Israelites camped at its base. The description of the location of the mountain in the text of the book of Exodus (and the added material in Deuteronomy) make finding the exact location difficult. That spot was not marked by the Israelites in later centuries, though the prophet Elijah was noted for having retreated to Horeb, the journey described as taking him a long way, that is, the proverbial 40 days and 40 nights (1 Kings 19:8). Post-exilic Israel lost its knowledge of Judaism's birthplace.

Pilgrims on Mount Sinai in Egypt. (Mangojuicy/Dreamstime.com)

The story of Sinai began with Moses, born into slavery in Egypt at some point in the 12th or 13th century BCE. Moses' birth coincided with the Egyptian Pharaoh decreeing that all male Hebrew infants were to be drowned at birth. He was saved when the Pharaoh's daughter found him floating in a basket in the Nile and adopted him. Raised among royalty, he was 40 before learning of his Hebrew heritage. He later killed a cruel Egyptian slave overseer and had to flee into the Sinai in exile. Absorbed into the nomadic society of Sinai, he found himself grazing sheep on the edge of Mount Sinai when he had an extraordinary experience. He saw a bush burning that was not being consumed by the flames (Exodus 3:1–13). God spoke out of the bush and commanded Moses to return to Egypt, mobilize his people, and bring them out of Egypt and back to the mountain.

When the Israelites arrived, Moses climbed the mountain, this time for a lengthy stay—40 days and 40 nights (Exodus 24:16–18). Here he received the two stone tablets upon which God inscribed the Ten Commandments, as well as instructions for the construction of the ark of the covenant that would hold the tablets. Once it was ready, the Israelites departed from Sinai.

While the events of Sinai were told over and over again, the location of Sinai was not a major topic in writings for a number of centuries. Thus in the first century, the Christian Apostle Paul located it in Arabia (Galatians 4:25), and subsequently in his work “Against Apion,” the historian Josephus located Sinai as a mountain lying between Egypt and Arabia.

Today, most people when attempting to locate Mount Sinai look to Jebel Musa (or Mountain of Moses), a 7,497-foot-high mountain in the middle of an otherwise mountainous region of the south Sinai Peninsula. It is near the city of Saint Katherine and next to Jebel Katerina (aka Mount St. Catherine, the tallest peak on the peninsula). Other mountains surround Jebel Musa on all sides. The current identification of Jebel Musa with the biblical Mount Sinai seems to date to the third century. Hermits took up home in the mountain’s caves and came to the conclusion that their new home was the ancient holy mountain. That claim was and still is unsupported by any archaeological evidence (a characteristic also shared by all the other suggested alternative sites).

Jebel Musa’s status as the biblical Mount Sinai was confirmed by Helena, the mother of the Emperor Constantine, who shortly after he had made Christianity the privileged religion of his empire traveled to the Holy Land (330) in search of relics and knowledge of the founding events in the new faith. She designated the site where Moses saw the burning bush and the plant that burned. The shrub plant still grows at the site. Finding confirmation of her choice of Jejel Musa in a dream, Helena had a tower and a small chapel erected there and by the end of the decade monks began to gather around the bush, tower, and chapel. The monks were subject to raids by the Bedouins who inhabited the region, and in 542 the Byzantine Emperor Justinian I (483–565) built a basilica that replaced Helena’s chapel. The basilica, named the Church of Transfiguration, memorialized Jesus’ transfiguration in the presence of Moses and Elijah on Mount Tabor (Matthew 17). Around the church he built a large wall that served to protect it and the monks who lived at what now became the Monastery of the Transfiguration.

The Monastery of the Transfiguration is generally called St. Catherine’s Monastery after an early Christian martyr, Dorothea of Alexandria (b. 294), who was tortured and beheaded by Emperor Maximus (r. 383–388) after she criticized his Pagan worship. According to the legend that developed around her, her body vanished and was miraculously taken to the peak of Jebel Katerina by a band of angels. Equally miraculous, three centuries later, that is after the wall built by Justinian, monks discovered her body, which remained in an incorrupt state, and carried it to the monastery. Her relics remain at the monastery.

The monastery has the status of an autonomous jurisdiction in the Eastern Orthodox world. Its abbot is an archbishop, and the monastery the only parish of the Orthodox Church of St. Catherine. The archbishop is usually consecrated by the head of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Traditionally a male enclave, the only door was an elevated opening through which monks and other male believers could enter and leave and food could be brought in. It is also home to some 3,000 ancient manuscripts. Here in 1853, Count Constantin von Tischendorf (1817–1874) discovered the Codex Sinaiticus, the oldest complete copy of the Christian New Testament, dating to the fourth century. The codex also contained two popular early Christian works, the “Epistle of Barnabas” and most of the “Shepherd of Hermas.”

Muslims revere Mount Sinai as the place where God handed down his Law. In 623, the prophet Muhammad signed the Actiname (Holy Testament), which exempted the monks of St. Catherine’s from the usual taxes (jizya) and military service required of non-Muslims in Muslim territory. It also provided for Muslims to assist the community as needed. At a later date (some point between 1101 and 1105), the monks permitted a small chapel within the monastery to be transformed into a mosque. It was used regularly for several centuries and then largely abandoned until restored in the early 20th century. It is used occasionally in the present era.

Pilgrimages to Sinai were popular until the era of the Reformation. They remained low in numbers until the 1950s, when the Egyptian government paved roads leading down the western coast of the Sinai Peninsula in order to gain access to the oil fields in the area. They added a dirt road to Jebel Musa, which was paved in the 1980s (following the return of the area to Egyptian control by Israel). Since 1986 regular tourist service to St. Catherine's has been available.

Today's pilgrims are invited to the peak of Jebel Musa, where they can see a small chapel constructed in 1934. It was built over the ruins of an earlier church constructed over the rock that tradition identifies as the very rock from which God carved the Tablets of the Law. A cleft in the rock of the chapel's western wall is identified as the site where Moses hid himself as God's glory passed by (Exodus 33:22). On the way to the top stands a chapel on what is known as Elijah's Basin, identified as the spot where Elijah spent time with God in the cave. Nearby is the spot reputedly where Moses' brother Aaron and 70 elders remained during the time Moses received the Law. Better documented, to the northwest is Jebel Safsaafa, where various Byzantine figures such as Saint Gregory of Sinai (1265–1346) resided. If Jebel Musa is the place where the Law was given, then the Plain of ar-Raaha, at the foot of Jebel Safsaafa would have been the place where the Israelites camped out while in the area.

Pilgrims of both genders are welcomed to St. Catherine's today and a more convenient entrance has replaced the traditional one. In the church, they may view one of the world's finest icon collections. In the library (a modern building erected in the 1930s) they may view the ancient manuscripts and books. The Chapel of the Burning Bush, the most sacred spot in the complex, is found below and behind the altar of the church. The bush itself is protected by a stone wall.

In 2002, St. Catherine's Monastery and the area around it were named as a World Heritage Site by UNESCO. In the immediate surrounding area are a variety of sites that are designated as the places where various events associated with the giving of the Law are said to have occurred. These have all been designated through the centuries since Helena's visit.

The primary site challenging the identification of Jebel Musa as the biblical Mount Sinai is Jabal al Lawz in Saudi Arabia, a site championed by adventurers Robert Cornuke and Howard Blum.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Constantine the Great; Helena, Flavia Iulia; Monasticism; Moses; Muhammad; Paul.

References

- Baddeley, Oriana, and Earleen Brunner, eds. The Monastery of St Catherine. London: Thames & Hudson, 1997.
- Blum, Howard. The God of Exodus—The Discovery of the True Mount Sinai. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.
- Cornuke, Robert, and David Halbrook. In Search of the Mountain of God: The Discovery of the Real Mt. Sinai. Nashville: Broadman & Holman Publishers, 2000.
- Manley, Deborah. Travelling Through Sinai: From the Fourth to the Twenty-First Century. Cairo: AUC Press, 2007.
- Paliouras, Athanasios. The Monastery of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai. St. Catherine's Monastery at Sinai, 1985.

■ Singapore

Singapore, literally the city of the lion, received its name from a vision that came to a visiting prince many centuries ago. It is a large island, some 263 square miles, separated by a narrow causeway from mainland Malaysia. More than 75 percent of its 4,600,000 people are of Chinese heritage.

Singapore was originally inhabited by Malaysians, and much of its history has been tied to its northern neighbor. In 1824, Singapore and several adjacent islands were purchased by the British from the sultan of Johore. The British began immediate improvements of the port and brought both Chinese and Indians in to work. Along with the Chinese were significant numbers of Indians, Pakistanis, and Sri Lankans.

A view of Singapore's business district and harbor. The island of Singapore has become an economic hub in Asia due in part to its advantageous location at the tip of the Malay Peninsula. (Corel)

The British incorporated Singapore into a colony called the Straits Settlements. After World War II, the ports of Penang and Melaka, the other major parts of the colony, became part of the Malayan Union, and Singapore became a crown colony. Internal autonomy was granted in 1949. It later became part of the Malayan Federation, but in 1965, under the leadership of Prime Minister Lee Quan Yew, it withdrew and became an independent country within the British Commonwealth. Yew continued to lead the country, now an economic enigma in Southeast Asia, until his retirement in 1991. He was succeeded by Goh Chok Tong.

Although Singapore has been accused of passing a set of laws restrictive of personal freedoms, and even of human rights abuses in the 1980s, the small nation with an extremely diverse religious community has been a model of religious freedom and interfaith harmony and cooperation. The Islamic community is based upon the original Malayan inhabitants, while the Chinese brought Buddhism and related Chinese religion. The British initiated the Christian community, and there are distinct smaller communities of Sikhs, Hindus, and Jews.

The Muslim community in Singapore is quite diverse. It consists of Malaysians, most of whom adhere to the Shafiite School, but with a component of Shias with roots in India and Pakistan and others from China and Indonesia. The government recognizes (in part) the validity of Islamic law (the sharia), and the Majlis Ugama Islam (Islamic Religious Council) cooperates with the government in regulating the community according to Muslim rules.

Many of the Chinese in Singapore came from the Chinese community in Malaya, and as such they adhere to Theravada forms of the faith rather than the Mahayana forms that dominated in China. Also, Buddhist missionaries from Thailand have been active in the Chinese community, further strengthening the Theravada base. The primary Buddhist organizations are the Singapore Buddhist Federation and the Singapore Buddhist Sangha Organization. There is also an important regional center of the World Fellowship of Buddhists headquartered at the Buddhist Union.

SINGAPORE

It is estimated that approximately 30 percent of Singaporeans are Buddhist; another 20 percent are identified as Daoist and followers of Chinese religion, mixing Daoist, Buddhist, and Confucian elements. The boundaries between Buddhism and Daoism, in practice, are at best fuzzy.

Although most Buddhists are of Chinese heritage, a minority of Buddhists with roots in Sri Lanka are found in the Singapore Sinhala Buddhist Association, and both Thais and Tibetans (Kagyü Dharma) have opened centers. The True Buddha School, a Chinese group following Vajrayana (Tibetan) practice, has multiple centers in the country.

Hinduism was brought to Singapore by Indians, primarily Saivites from Tamil, in southern India. They have built a series of temples in the city according to traditional style and standards. The entire community is invited to their major celebrations. Between 3 and 4 percent of Singaporeans are Hindus.

The Jewish community in Singapore traces its beginnings to around 1840. A synagogue, Maghain Aboth, was opened in 1878, but services had previously been held in a private home on a street known today as Synagogue Street. Most Jews were from Baghdad (Iraq), but the population became more diverse over the course of the 20th century. There are now two synagogues serving several hundred Jewish families.

Christianity arrived on the Malayan Peninsula when Catholic priests set up a mission in the wake of the Portuguese conquest in 1511. The Diocese of Melacca (including Singapore and the portion of Malaysia immediately to the north) was established in 1557 and flourished for almost a century. However, the Dutch took over in 1641, and they suppressed Catholicism in favor of the Reformed Church (but made little attempt to convert the indigenous population). Following the British purchase of Singapore, a degree of religious freedom returned, and the Roman Catholic Church entered a growth phase, finding marked response among the Chinese. In 1841 a vicariate covering Singapore and Malaysia was re-established, and in 1888, Singapore became the seat of a revived Diocese of Malacca. Since 1953, it has been an archdiocese. The Malaysian area was separated from the archdiocese in 1972. In the meantime Singapore became the residence of an apostolic visitor (a representative of the Vatican) charged with coordinating the church's work among the Chinese outside of the People's Republic of China.

In 1814 a representative of the London Missionary Society, a Presbyterian, opened work in education in Singapore but had little success in converting people. In 1846 the missionaries withdrew, but a small church continued under local leadership; soon other Presbyterians (including some Chinese immigrants) arrived. The Presbyterian work, long tied to work across Malaysia, separated from the Malaysian jurisdiction in 1975. The majority of Presbyterian churches in Singapore reorganized as the Presbyterian Church in Singapore and created both an English-speaking and a Chinese-speaking presbytery.

In 1826 the East India Company appointed an Anglican chaplain to serve the Europeans then residing in Singapore. The first Anglican church, St. Andrew's, became the base of missionary activity in 1856 with the arrival of missionaries from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts from England. Work was pursued in several different languages, and by 1909 it had grown to the point that appointment of a bishop seemed appropriate. The Diocese of Singapore was separated from Malaysia in 1970. The present Anglican Diocese of Singapore has charge of work in Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Indonesia. It is an integral part of the Council of Churches in East Asia, which includes several extra provincial Anglican dioceses and provides some of the structure of a province. Currently, the bishop of Singapore is also the chairman of the council.

The South India conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church (U.S.A.) expanded their work into Malaysia and Singapore in 1885 and three years later set Malaysia (including Singapore) apart as a separate mission. Work was pursued in four languages (English, Chinese, Tamil, and Malaysian) and spread through Malaysia, Burma, and present-day Indonesia. In 1936 two conferences were created, one for Chinese-speaking members and one for English-speaking. In 1968, three

Singapore

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Chinese folk	1,125,000	1,788,000	38.9	1.19	1,771,000	1,516,000
Muslims	373,000	856,000	18.6	1.50	950,000	935,000
Christians	162,000	740,000	16.1	2.30	895,000	963,000
Roman Catholics	80,000	230,000	5.0	2.58	280,000	300,000
Protestants	35,500	209,000	4.6	2.44	270,000	300,000
Independents	15,700	183,000	4.0	1.65	221,000	245,000
Buddhists	200,000	660,000	14.4	1.50	800,000	880,000
Hindus	120,000	226,000	4.9	1.50	252,000	250,000
Agnostics	62,000	215,000	4.7	1.50	300,000	350,000
New religionists	10,200	70,000	1.5	1.50	90,000	82,000
Sikhs	20,000	20,300	0.4	1.50	22,500	20,000
Baha'is	700	6,900	0.2	1.50	10,000	13,000
Atheists	2,000	6,400	0.1	1.50	8,000	12,000
Shintoists	0	1,200	0.0	1.49	2,000	2,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	1,000	0.0	1.50	1,500	2,000
Jews	400	850	0.0	1.50	1,000	1,000
Zoroastrians	150	250	0.0	1.45	300	300
Total population	2,075,000	4,592,000	100.0	1.50	5,104,000	5,026,000

Methodist churches in the United States merged to found the United Methodist Church, and the Singaporean Methodists became part of a new autonomous body, the Malaysia and Singapore Methodist Church. The work that had developed among the Tamil-speaking people was set apart as a Tamil Provisional Conference. In 1976 the Malaysian and Singaporean elements of the church divided, resulting in the present Methodist Church in Singapore, the largest Protestant body in Singapore.

In spite of its diminutive size, Singapore became home to an amazing array of other Christian churches over the course of the 20th century. Many of these were brought to Singapore by and operate within an ethnic expatriate community. Members of the Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin) arrived as early as 1850. A variety of missionary-minded Protestant churches from England and the United States have opened churches, and a spectrum of Chinese indigenous churches have appeared. Among the latter, the True Jesus Church is among the most interesting and successful. Recently, the International Churches of Christ have made Singapore an important base of operations for its expansion throughout southeastern Asia. There are four Lutheran denominations represented in Singapore, all headquartered in neighboring countries (Malaysia and Indonesia).

The Jehovah's Witnesses, who established work in 1912, were stripped of their legal status by the independent Singaporean government because of their stand against universal military service. They no longer have kingdom halls in Singapore but continue to proselytize on the island from a base across the causeway in Malaysia. The first congregation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was opened in 1968. The Singapore Mission is one of eight missions in the Asia Area of the church.

Above and beyond the large Buddhist, Christian, Hindu, and Muslim communities, there is also a Sikh community consisting of Punjabis and a set of spiritual assemblies of the Baha'i Faith. A number of the so-called new religions from Japan, Taiwan, and the United States have attempted to start work, and groups such as the Soka Gakkai International (a Nichiren Buddhist lay movement) and the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis can be found. The large number of different groups in Singapore means that the great majority are limited to a small membership.

The government in Singapore encourages religious harmony and supports the activity of the Inter-Religious Organizations Council. Also, the larger religious communities have established cooperative councils. Among Christians, the National Council of Churches of Singapore, which grew out of the former Council of Churches of Malaysia and Singapore, founded in 1948, is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Other denominations are members of the Chinese Church Union, the Singapore Council of Christian Churches, and the Association of Bible Believing Churches. The Evangelical Fellowship of Singapore is affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance, whose international headquarters is split between Singapore and the Philippines.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin); Baha'i Faith; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; International Churches of Christ; Jehovah's Witnesses; London Missionary Society; Roman Catholic Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; Soka Gakkai International; True Buddha School; True Jesus Church; United Methodist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; World Fellowship of Buddhists.

References

- Abdullah, T., and S. Siddique, eds. Islam and Society in Southeast Asia. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1986.
- Cheu, Tony Hock, ed. Chinese Beliefs and Practices in Southeast Asia: Studies on the Chinese Religion in Malaysia, Singapore and Indonesia. Selangor, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications, 1999.
- Chinese Customs and Festivals in Singapore*. Singapore: Singapore Federation of Chinese Clan Associations, 1989.
- Clothey, Fred W. Ritualizing on the Boundaries: Continuity and Innovation in the Tamil Diaspora. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2006.
- Elliott, Alan J. A. Chinese Spirit-Medium Cults in Singapore. Darby, PA: Diane Publishing Co., 1990.
- Kim, Khoo Kay, Elinah Abdullah, and Wan Meng Hao, eds. Malays/Muslims in Singapore: Selected Readings in History, 1819–1865. Selangor, Malaysia: Pelanduk Publications/Singapore: Centre for Research on Islamic and Malay Affairs, 2006.

- Kuo, Eddie C. Y. Religion in Singapore. Singapore: Census of Population, Monograph #2, 1990.
- Mialaret, J. Hinduism in Singapore: A Guide to the Hindu Temples of Singapore. Singapore: Donald Moore for Asia Pacific Press, 1969.
- Sng, B. E. K. Church and Society: Singapore Context. Singapore: Graduates Christian Fellowship, 1989.
- Suyadinata, Leo, ed. Ethnic Chinese in Singapore and Malaysia: A Dialogue Between Tradition and Modernity. Singapore: Marshall Cavendish Academic, 2002.
- Tai, Kao Keng, Dorothy Kao, and Grace Tan. Singapore Church Directory. Singapore: Singapore Every Home Crusade (issued annually).

Singapore, Buddhism in Buddhism in Singapore is made up of migrant populations that arrived during the early 19th and the 20th centuries. When these migrants arrived, they brought along their cultures and reproduced them in a colonial environment. Chinese migrants brought along a syncretic Chinese religious belief system. Chinese religion is a composite mixture of Buddhism, Daoism, and Chinese folk beliefs. There was also a small group of Singhalese migrants during this period that brought Theravada Buddhism into Singapore.

With independence and the formation of the Singapore nation-state in 1965, the syncretic Chinese religion has undergone various changes. Along with a rise in education and social status, many Chinese have started to reassess their religious affiliation. This results in a separation of Buddhism from a syncretic Chinese religious belief system. The 1990 Singapore Census of Population showed that 31 percent of the total population of approximately 3.1 million (approximately 970,000) are Buddhists, and that Buddhist adherence is spread evenly among all age groups.

Today, Buddhism in Singapore can be divided into several types. Mahayana Buddhism includes elements of Daoism and Chinese folk beliefs. It is commonly practiced by the majority of the Singapore Chinese. Theravada Buddhism is practiced primarily by the Singalese, but there are also a sizable number of Chinese Theravada Buddhists. From the 1980s on, both Tibetan Buddhism and Japanese Buddhism (represented by the Singapore Soka Association) have made their presence known in Singapore. At the same time, Buddhism was also undergoing modernizing changes and secularization. A growing group of Buddhists who called themselves Reformist Buddhists emerged in the 1980s. Reformist Buddhism is a lay movement that does not recognize traditional boundaries and focuses on scriptural teachings and interpretation of the Buddhist texts. The Reformist Buddhists refer to their approach as the Buddhayana tradition.

Buddha Tooth Relic Temple in Singapore. (Ints Vikmanis/Dreamstime.com)

There are more than 100 Buddhist and Buddhist/Daoist temples in Singapore, with many temples practicing a combination of Buddhist and syncretic Chinese religion. The largest is the Phor Kark See Temple. Among the several Theravada temples, the popular Mangala Vihara Buddhist Temple is representative.

Lay Buddhists have organized several organizations, such as the Cheng Beng Buddhist Temple, the Singapore Buddha Sasana Society, and the Singapore Buddha Yana Organisation. All these Buddhist temples and associations are members of the Singapore Buddhist Federation, an umbrella body that provides leadership for the Buddhist community in Singapore. The Federation was formed in 1949. Since then, it has expanded on its activities to include not only the dissemination of Buddhist teaching but also education, social welfare, and charity work. Today there are six Buddhist clinics, one secondary and two primary schools, and homes for the elderly under its supervision. Apart from these activities, individual temples and lay organizations are also involved in active dissemination of Buddhist knowledge to the public and are involved in welfare and charity work. Some temples house a home for the aged, while others house a home for children with physical disabilities.

The Buddhist Sangha is represented by a large majority of Mahayana monks and nuns, with a small number of Theravada and Tibetan monks. There are also a few monks who do not want to be associated with these traditional Buddhist labels. At present there are more than 100 monks and 50 nuns in Singapore. The Sangha Council of Singapore governs their social and religious behavior.

From the 1990s on, Buddhist organizations in Singapore have taken on the role as a welfare provider and have increasingly become involved in the provision of various types of welfare and social services to the general public. In addition to the provision of education facilities and welfare homes, it has also become involved in the provision of health and medical needs for the general public. One key example is the Ren Ci Hospital and Hospice Care run by the Foo Hai Monastery, which provides free medical care for the poor.

As Buddhism moves into the 21st century, its role as a welfare provider has become fully entrenched within the Singapore society and embraced by the Singapore state and the population at large.

Khun Eng Kuah

See also: Mahayana Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism.

References

- Kuah, Khun Eng. "Maintaining Ethno-Religious Harmony in Singapore." Journal of Contemporary Asia 28, no. 1 (1998): 103–121.
- Kuah, Khun Eng. "State and Religion: Buddhism and Nation-Building in Singapore." Pacific Viewpoint 32, no. 1 (1991): 24–42.
- Kuah-Pearce, Khun Eng. State, Society and Religious Engineering: Towards a Reformist Buddhism in Singapore. Singapore. Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 2009.
- Kuo, Eddie C. Y., and Tong Chee Kiong. Religion in Singapore. Singapore: Census of Population, 1990.
- Ling, T. "Religion." In Management of Success: The Moulding of Modern Singapore, edited by K. S. Sandhu and P. Wheatley. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1989.
- Wee, V. "'Buddhism' in Singapore." In Singapore: Society in Transition, edited by R. Hanssan. Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Sivananda Saraswati, Swami

1887–1963

Swami Sivananda Saraswati was one of the most famous of the Indian spiritual teachers of the 20th century. The founder of the Divine Life Mission, an international organization with a number of offshoots, Sivananda was a yoga teacher who authored more than 200 books on various aspects of Hindu thought and practice.

Sivananda (also spelled Shivananda) was born Kuppuswami Iyer, the son of a pious Hindu government official. Desiring to be a doctor, he attended college and then medical school. His father died, however, before he completed his medical training, and as the eldest son, Kuppuswami was forced to leave school to assume his father's duties until his younger siblings were established. He was able to continue his interest in medicine during these years by editing a journal that specialized in preventive medicine and the Indian Ayurvedic approach to wellness. He eventually landed a job as the administrator of a hospital in Malaysia, where he met a wandering holy man who led him into beginning a spiritual search.

Having completed his family responsibilities, he returned to India and began a pilgrimage around the country. Shortly after his arrival in the holy city of Rishikesh, Swami Viswananda Saraswati initiated him into sannyas (the renounced life) and gave him his religious name. He took up residence at the Swargashram, on the Ganges River at Rishikesh. He spent his time in meditation and study, and given his background progressed swiftly. In a short time he was giving spiritual guidance to a growing group of disciples to whom he taught bhakti yoga (devotion) and karma yoga. He also opened a medical dispensary to serve the residents of the ashram.

In 1934 he moved across the river from Swartgashram and established his own ashram that included the Ananda Kutir, “abode of bliss,” with a dispensary and meditation rooms for silent retreats. Two years later he founded the Divine Life Trust (a legal entity) to facilitate the enlarged vision of spiritualizing all of India. The Divine Life Society began as an auxiliary to the trust. Through the Society Sivananda launched a monthly periodical and then the Forest Academy, where he offered yoga training to his students.

Swami Sivananda never visited the West, but his many students who did come transformed him into one of the most influential people in the Western Hindu community and a major force in the dissemination of yoga throughout the world. Two of his students, Swami Vishnu Devananda (1927–1993) and Swami Satchidananda (1914–2002) founded the Sivananda Vedanta Yoga Centers and Integral Yoga International, respectively, both with multiple centers in the United States and Canada. As early as 1959, Swami Chidananda (b. 1916), who eventually succeeded Sivananda as head of the Divine Life Society, organized the Society in the United States. Another student, Swami Jyotirmayananda (b. 1931), founded the Yoga Research Foundation in 1962. Inspired by him, Swami Sivananda Radha (Sylvia Hillman, 1911–1995) founded the Yosodhara Ashram Society based in Vancouver.

Swami Sivananda died July 14, 1963.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Integral Yoga International; Meditation; Rishikesh; Vedanta Societies; Yoga.

References

- Fornaro, Robert John. Sivananda and the Divine Life Society: A Paradigm of the “Secularism,” “Puritanism” and “Cultural Dissimulation” of a Neo-Hindu Religious Society. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1969.
- Krishnananda, Swami. Swami Shivananda and the Spiritual Renaissance. Rishikesh, India: Shivanandanagar, 1959.

Life and Works of Swami Sivananda. Freemantle, Western Australia: Fremantle Branch, Divine Life Society, 1985.

Shivananda, Swami. Sadhana. Rishikesh, India: Shivanandanagar, 1958.

Shivananda, Swami. Science of Yoga. 18 vols. Durban, South Africa: Divine Life Society, 1977.

Shivananda, Swami. Yoga Asanas. Rishikesh, India: Shivanandanagar, 1969.

Venkateshananda, Swami. Gurudev Shivananda. Rishikesh, India: Shivanandanagar, 1961.

■ Slovakia

Slovakia, a relatively new nation, formed in 1993 with the peaceful division of the former Czechoslovakia. Located in Central Europe, the completely landlocked country is surrounded by the Czech Republic, Austria, Hungary, Ukraine, and Poland. Its 5.5 million people reside on its 18,860 square miles of territory.

Slovakia was settled by Slavic tribes during the fifth and sixth centuries CE. Their Pagan religion belonged to the West-Slavic sphere, and it survived until the coming of Christianity in the ninth century. Also, at the beginning of the ninth century, an independent duchy spread through the territory of Slovakia with its center in Nitra. During the reign of the Earl Pribina, in the year 830, the first Christian church was constructed in Slovakia. At the time, Christian influence was conditioned by political loyalty to the German town of Salzburg, and this church was therefore consecrated by Adalram, the archbishop of Salzburg. Nevertheless, the Slavs in Nitra had as yet not converted to the new faith. Despite the work of missionaries from Ireland, Scotland, Germany, and Wallachia, neither inhabitants nor ruling elites converted to the Christian belief.

After the year 833, under the reign of the Earl Mojmir, the territory of Slovakia became part of the first state of the western Slavs named Great Moravia. Aiming to oppose the political expansion of his powerful neighbor, Rastislav, the ruler of Great Moravia, asked the pope to establish an independent church province. The pope refused, and therefore the following year,

Old Castle, Banská Štiavnica, Slovakia. (Richard Semik/Dreamstime.com)

Rastislav, based primarily on a political rationale and the idea of independence, asked the Byzantine emperor Michal III to send Christian teachers. In 863 Michal III sent the missionaries Constantinus (826–869) and Methodius (d. 885) from Thessalonika to Great Moravia. The two mastered the local dialect of the Aegean Slavs and then played an important role in the process of Christianization, especially as related to church administration and the education of clerical elites. They also translated the most important sacral books into the Slavic language and introduced Slavic into the liturgy. When, in 867, Constantinus (or Cyril) and Methodius planned to visit Constantinople, they received an invitation from the pope, who, despite their alignment to Eastern Orthodoxy, wished to control their activities in Great Moravia. Pope Hadrian II subsequently gave the missionaries an audience, sanctified the holy books in the Slavic language, and ordained the first Slavic clerics.

For the first time in Europe, the pope agreed to a liturgy in a national language other than Greek or Latin. Unfortunately, Constantinus died in Rome; thus Methodius returned to the territory of Great Moravia as the first Slavic archbishop. He brought with him a copy of the papal bull Gloria in altissimis Deo, which confirmed the use of Slavic liturgy. Soon after his establishment in Great Moravia, Methodius again traveled to Rome in the name of the Earl Kocel. While there he received the resolution establishing the independent church province, the Pannonian see (archprovince), and was named the official papal representative (legatus). The position of Methodius as archbishop and the use of the Slavic liturgy was further reconfirmed by the pope in 880 in the bull Industriae tuae, issued on the occasion of Methodius's attestation of the Nicene Creed and of Roman orthodoxy. This act eventually led to the end of the use of the Slavic liturgy in the Byzantine rite in Great Moravia. The Romanization of the Slavic church was intensified by the actions of the German bishop Viching in Nitra, the main enemy of Methodius. After Methodius's death in 885, Viching took the initiative in disbanding his school and dislodging all its pupils. Subsequently, Slovakia naturalized the German clerical hierarchy.

After the battle at Bratislava in 907, which started the period of destruction of Great Moravia by the Magyars, the territory was in total chaos. By the end of the 10th century, the eastern part of Great Moravia (now the majority of the territory of Slovakia) became a duchy of the Hungarian kingdom, while the western part was transformed into the Czech state. The Hungarian earl, Gejza I, accepted Christianity in 997 under the ministrations of Bishop Vojtech of Prague. The Hungarian (Magyar) state organized the political and church administration at Slovakia after the fall of Great Moravia. It continued the orientation toward Western (or Catholic) Christianity, but the process of Christianization of the Hungarian nomads as well as the native Slavic inhabitants proceeded slowly. In the centuries of political chaos, many of the Slavs in the south had been assimilated by the Hungarians, while in the north they sought the security of inaccessible places (such as mountains). Under the new political order, the See of Nitra was re-established by the year 1115. In addition, a new see was created in Jager, though the head of the hierarchy of the Hungarian state was the archbishop in Ösztergom.

SLOVAKIA

Through the Middle Ages, the territory of Slovakia was fixed on Western Roman Catholicism. Many monasteries were established, and the number of holy orders operating in Slovakia increased. Catholicism became part of the national culture until the time of the Protestant Reformation. In the second half of the 16th century, Reformed and Lutheran doctrines were disseminated through Slovakia, and by the beginning of the 17th century some 90 percent of the inhabitants of Slovakia had become Protestants. This fact explains why the subsequent re-Catholization at the instigation of the Habsburg rulers of Hungary in the 17th century was so difficult. Jesuits in Trnava and Bratislava proved very effective. It was the period of repression of local nobility, confiscations of the properties of Protestant churches, and forced mass conversions to Catholicism throughout the countryside. As a result, Protestantism survived only among the Slovak middle class and in a small number of villages. The development of Slovak culture up to the beginning of the 20th century followed two independent lines, Catholic and Protestant. Only in 1781, as a result of the tolerant policies of Emperor Joseph II, were Protestants granted equal rights with the Catholic majority. Paradoxically, it was from the Protestant, rather than the Catholic, circles that the majority of dominant personalities of Slovak culture of the 19th century arose, including, for example, Ľudovít Štúr, the creator of the Slovak literary language. Through the upheavals of the modern world, somehow or other, the majority confession in Slovakia remained Roman Catholicism.

As of 1991, around 60 percent of the citizens belonged to the Roman Catholic Church. Only 8 percent of Slovaks belong to one of the Protestant churches, the largest being the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg

Slovakia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	3,880,000	4,609,000	85.4	0.10	4,684,000	4,218,000
Roman Catholics	3,533,000	4,020,000	74.5	1.61	4,060,000	3,576,000
Protestants	816,000	510,000	9.5	−0.72	550,000	570,000
Orthodox	216,000	51,000	0.9	0.08	50,000	50,000
Agnostics	393,000	603,000	11.2	−0.73	500,000	360,000
Atheists	250,000	180,000	3.3	0.00	120,000	80,000
Jews	4,000	2,500	0.0	0.00	2,500	2,500
Baha'is	0	700	0.0	0.00	1,000	2,000
Muslims	500	550	0.0	0.00	700	1,000
Total population	4,528,000	5,396,000	100.0	0.00	5,308,000	4,664,000

Confession in the Slovak Republic, whose adherents include approximately 6 percent of the population. From the other confessions in Slovakia, only two groups have as much as 1 percent of the population: the Greek Catholic Church (3 percent) and the Reformed Christian Church of Slovakia (Calvinist) (1.5 percent). Among the other churches, the Orthodox Church, with 0.5 percent, also plays an important role in the life of Slovakia. In the year 1977 the pope established the independent province of the Slovak Catholic Church through his bull Qui divino.

In spite of it, during the whole atheistic regime (1948–1989), Christianity in Slovakia (Catholic, Protestant, or other) suffered repression. Church life was formally tolerated by the state, but in fact church members were discriminated against in education and social status. Activists were arrested, and, unlike the situation in other Communist regimes, played an important role in the Catholic Church. From its circles came the core of dissidents who organized the resistance and the so-called Tender Revolution (1989) in the Slovakian part of the former Czechoslovakia. After the fall of Czechoslovakia and the formation of independent Slovakia in 1993, Catholicism's influence on the public and cultural life of the country dramatically increased.

Milan Kováč

See also: Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in the Slovak Republic; Greek Catholic Church; Reformed Christian Church in Slovakia; Roman Catholic Church.

References

Dekan, Ján. Moravia Magna. Bratislava, Slovakia: Tatran, 1980.

Poláčik, Stefan, ed. Atlas der Religionen, Religiöser Gemeinschaften und Religiosität in der Slowakei. Bratislava, Slovakia: Chronos, 2000.

Vanco, Martin. "The Beginning of the Great Moravian Empire: Christianization." In Medieval Rotundas in Slovakia, edited by Martin Vance. Bratislava, Slovakia: Chronos, 2000.

■ Slovenia

Slovenia, a product of the breakup of the former country of Yugoslavia, lies south of Austria between Italy and Croatia. A largely mountainous country, it has a small outlet on the Adriatic Sea. Its 2 million people reside primarily in the river valleys of its 7,780 square miles of territory.

The Slovenes, a southern Slavic people, settled in what is now the Republic of Slovenia in the seventh century CE. However, in 743 the area was conquered by the Bavarians, and the Slovenes began a long period of subjugation to various Germanic powers. The Slavs who lived north of the Drava River were Germanized, but those to the south were able to retain their identity as Slovenians. Beginning in the 13th century, Austria became the dominant influence in the region. Austrian rule continued throughout the 19th century, except for a brief period during the Napoleonic era.

Churches in Ljubljana, Slovenia's capital. (iStockPhoto.com)

During the late 19th century, Slovenians began to identify with the pan-Slavic movement but had to settle for the union of the Slavic regions of the Austro-Hungarian Empire into an autonomous political area within the empire in 1917. After World War I and the fall of the empire, the region was assigned to Austria. Following World War II, Slovenia became one of the six republics within the Federation of Yugoslavia. It prospered as one of the country's most industrialized areas.

In 1990 a move to separate from Yugoslavia became noticeable, and the following year Slovenia declared its independence. That independence was recognized by the countries of Western Europe, and, fortunately, Slovenia was able to stay out of the war in the 1990s that ravaged its former comrades in the other Yugoslavian republics.

The Roman Catholic Church established itself very early among the Slovenian people, and the work of native priests and monks (who constituted the great majority of the Slovenian intelligentsia during the Middle Ages) is credited with the southern Slovenes' retaining their identity as a people. It also separated them from the Orthodox-dominated regions farther south and the Croatian Catholics, who had been heavily influenced by Italian leadership. The church was supported by the Austrian Catholic hierarchy through Slovenia's many centuries under Austrian control, but it suffered under the secularization that occurred in the postwar period (1945–1991). Today the church is led by the archbishop of Ljubljana and the Slovenia Episcopal Conference. They command the loyalty of the majority of the 2 million citizens.

Protestants came into Slovenia as the Reformation spread through German lands in the 16th century. The Lutheran Church suffered losses during the Counter-Reformation, and many Lutherans found refuge in the Prekmurje region, where the church is still strong. It was able to recover somewhat during the period of religious tolerance that began with Joseph II. Lutherans were incorporated into the Hungarian Lutheran Church but emerged as the Evangelical Christian Church in Slovenia after World War II. Today, as the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession in Slovenia, it is the largest Protestant body in Slovenia and a member of the Lutheran World Federation and the European Council of Churches, though it has not joined the World Council of Churches. The large Reformed presence in Hungary spilled over into Slovenia, and, early in the 20th century, some 800 Reformed church members, mostly of Hungarian ethnicity, formed 3 congregations in Slovenia. They became independent in 1921 as the Reformed Church in Yugoslavia. It developed a relationship with the Reformed Christian Church in Yugoslavia. In 1993 the Reformed Christian Church in Slovenia was established, and the Reformed Church of Hungary accepted responsibility for providing pastoral oversight. It currently has a close working relationship with the Slovenian Lutheran Church. Protestants in Slovenia cooperate in the Council of Christian Churches in Slovenia.

SLOVENIA

The Seventh-day Adventist Church entered the region in 1909, and in 1925 it organized the Croatian-Slovenian Conference (reorganized in 1992). The work is headquartered in Zagreb, Croatia. Baptists came into the area in the person of Martin Hiastan, an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in the years prior to World War I. His first convert, Jurij Carter, began holding meetings in his home in 1923. The little church became associated with the Baptist church in Zagreb. It was not until 1938 that there was enough Baptist strength for a Slovenian conference to be organized.

The Italians who occupied Slovenia during World War II closed the Baptist churches and imprisoned some of the Baptist leadership. Following the breakup of Yugoslavia, the four surviving Baptist churches formed the Union of Baptist Churches in Slovenia.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints had initiated work in Slovenia in 1899 through the efforts of Mischa Markow, a Hungarian who had previously

Slovenia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,550,000	1,813,000	90.6	0.14	1,764,000	1,545,000
Roman Catholics	1,477,000	1,622,000	81.1	−0.03	1,569,000	1,369,000
Orthodox	30,200	58,000	2.9	2.09	60,000	65,000
Protestants	35,400	29,000	1.4	1.15	30,000	35,000
Agnostics	69,000	105,000	5.2	0.50	100,000	85,000
Atheists	50,000	45,800	2.3	0.16	40,000	30,000
Muslims	1,000	37,000	1.8	0.16	36,000	33,000
Baha'is	0	350	0.0	0.19	600	900
Jews	100	120	0.0	0.17	120	120
Total population	1,670,000	2,001,000	100.0	0.16	1,941,000	1,694,000

settled in Salt Lake City, Utah. He was banished after only a month of work. His effort was not revived until the 1970s, when the LDS were able to establish themselves as a legal entity in Yugoslavia. The first meetings were held in Ljubljana. In 1993 the first full-time elder from Slovenia arrived in Salt Lake City for training. Jehovah's Witnesses came into Yugoslavia in 1925 and continued to work quietly in the decades after World War II, even though officially banned. They emerged quickly after the breakup of Yugoslavia and can now be found in various locations across Slovenia.

Various religions have come to Slovenia since its independence in 1991. They include the Unification Movement, Sahaja Yoga, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. Several Esoteric groups such as the Theosophical Society and the Ordo Templi Orientis had been able to function quietly even earlier. The small Jewish community in Slovenia was ravaged first by the Holocaust and then by the movement of members to Israel. Fewer than 100 remain today.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Lutheran World Federation; Ordo Templi Orientis; Roman Catholic Church; Sahaja Yoga; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Theosophical Society (America); Unification Movement; World Council of Churches.

References

- Benderly, Jim. Independent Slovenia: Origins, Movements, Prospects. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1996.
- Cox, John K. Slovenia. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Flere, S. "Denominational Affiliation in Yugoslavia: 1930–1989." East European Quarterly 25 (June 1991): 145–165.
- Frid, Z., ed. Religions in Yugoslavia: Historical Survey, Legal Status, Church in Socialism, Ecumenism, Dialogue between Marxists and Christians, etc. Zagreb, Croatia: Binoza, 1971.
- Ramet, R. "Religion and Nationality in Yugoslavia." In Religion and Nationalism in Soviet and East European Politics, edited by R. Ramet. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1989.

Smarta Tradition

The Smarta tradition is a living Hindu tradition whose origins can be traced back to the classical age of Hinduism. This tradition was derived from Puranic traditional practices. The Smartas combined the concept of varnashramadharma (social organization around castes) with puja (worship) to a few select major deities. The Smartas get their name from the sacred smriti texts. This class of texts are "things that are remembered," or secret oral teachings passed down from generation to generation. Many teachings are still secrets disclosed only among devout Smartas. As the Smarta size grew smaller and smaller, the teachings were written down for the sake of future preservation. Smarta teaches its adherents that they are the true root of Hinduism.

The Smartas revere and worship five principal deities—Vishnu (preserver god), Shiva (destroyer god), Surya (sun god), Ganesha (remover of obstacles), and Durga (warrior goddess). Smarta puja perpetuates rites from the Vedas (mainly the Rig Veda) and the repetition of many mantras (secret meditative incantations). Smarta worship is more of a solemn duty than a devotional part of life, thus communion with the divine or eternal salvation is rarely the focal point or even an important aspect in Smarta worship rituals.

The Smartas consider themselves a Hindu subgroup, and the predominant Smarta population consists primarily of wealthy Indians. Today, wealthy Hindus tend to practice Smarta-style Hinduism rather than Vaishnava or Saivite styles.

Kumar Jairamdas

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Hinduism; Meditation.

References

- Basham, A. L. The Origins and Development of Classical Hinduism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Eck, Diana. Darsan: Seeing the Divine Image in India. 3rd ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Smith, Joseph, Jr.

1805–1844

Joseph Smith, Jr., was the founder of the 19th-century Christian restoration movement popularly known as Mormonism, most commonly connected to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, now based in Salt Lake City. The multi-million-member Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is one of the 10 largest religious groups in North America, but it is but one of some 50 groups that also claim Smith as their founder, including the Community of Christ (Independence,

Portrait of Joseph Smith, Jr., founder of the Mormon Church. (Library of Congress)

Missouri) and the polygamy-practicing Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Colorado City, Arizona).

Smith was born in Sharon, Vermont, on December 23, 1805, but he moved with his family to New York State in 1816, settling in Palmyra, southeast of Rochester. He claimed that he received a divine visitation from God the Father and Jesus in 1820, an episode known as the “First Vision.” Smith also said that on September 21, 1823, an angel named Moroni told him of gold plates buried in the hill Cumorah near Palmyra. Smith married Emma Hale (1804–1879) in 1827, the same year that Smith claimed to discover the gold plates. He translated the plates into the Book of Mormon. That work was printed in March 1830, and a new church was founded by Smith on April 6.

Joseph and a small group of followers moved to Ohio in 1831. A mission to Missouri was launched in 1832 but resulted in ongoing persecution, including deadly mob attacks. Smith himself was jailed in Missouri for six months in 1838–1839. After escaping from custody Smith moved the Mormons to Commerce, Illinois. He renamed the city Nauvoo and lived there until his death. Nauvoo prospered and the Latter-day Saints erected a large temple. As the city grew to be the largest in Illinois, Smith became deeply involved in the state's politics, one of several issues leading to the development of heightened hostility against the Mormons both in the county and throughout the state.

In the summer of 1844, dissenting residents of Nauvoo printed a newspaper challenging Smith's leadership. After the press that printed the paper was destroyed, Smith and several compatriots were arrested and taken to the county seat at Carthage. There, Smith and his brother Hyrum were killed by an angry mob on June 27, 1844.

The teachings of the Book of Mormon conform in large measure to classical Christian doctrine, setting aside the issue of its historical integrity. The work purports to tell the history of Jewish groups who immigrated to the Americas before the time of Christ. Smith's own direct revelations appeared first in the Book of Commandments in 1831 and then as the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835. Other revelations were canonized in The Pearl of Great Price in 1851, seven years after Smith's death. Smith's most controversial work is probably the Book of Abraham, which was his translation of Egyptian documents that came into his possession in 1835. Smith claimed that the papyri were actually from the ancient patriarch.

By all accounts Smith was a charismatic figure who was able to draw people into his religious vision. He was also maligned for his views and subject to intense criticism, most notably over his later teachings and adoption of polygamy, the latter as early as 1841. Smith advanced novel understandings of salvation, including baptism for the dead, and advocated a plurality of gods as of 1842. The earliest criticisms of him had to do with advocating extra-biblical revelation, his claims of private encounters with God, and the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. Under Smith's successor, Brigham Young (1801–1877), the church he founded went on to advocate the practice of polygamy, leading the national government to act against it, but renounced it, in stages, beginning in 1890. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints spent much of the 20th century attempting to separate itself from the idea.

James A. Beverley

See also: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Community of Christ; Martyrdom; Polygamy-Practicing Mormons; Salt Lake City; Temples—Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

References

- Arrington, Leonard. The Mormon Experience. New York: Knopf, 1979.
- Brodie, Fawn M. No Man Knows My History. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1977.
- Bushman, Richard. Rough Stone Rolling. New York: Knopf, 2005.
- Compton, Todd. In Sacred Loneliness. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature, 1997.
- Huntress, Keith. Murder of an American Prophet: Events and Prejudices Surrounding the Killing of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, Carthage, Illinois, June 27, 1844. San Francisco: Chandler, 1960.
- Marquardt, Michael. The Rise of Mormonism: 1816–1844. Longwood, FL: Xulon Press, 2005.
- Shippo, Jan. Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.
- Vogel, Dan. Joseph Smith: The Making of a Prophet. Salt Lake City, UT: Signature, 2004.

Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG) is the older of the two Anglican missionary organizations that contributed substantially to the spread of the Church of England internationally in the 19th century and led to the formation of numerous Anglican churches that currently exist around the globe. The Society, formed in 1701, originated from a survey of conditions among the settlers in the British American colonies by Thomas Bray (1656–1730). Early discussions resulted in two goals for the new society: the serving of the religious needs of English settlers far from Britain (primarily in North America and the Caribbean) and the conversion of the Native populations in British colonies.

Although established as an independent body with private funds, it quickly bound itself to the established church, beginning with its royal charter and the convening of its first meeting at Lambeth Palace under the chairmanship of Archbishop Thomas Tenison (1635–1715). Work was confined to North America and the Caribbean during its first century, among the first people commissioned being a teacher for African American children in New York City. However, as the British Empire expanded during the 19th century, the SPG followed. The independence of the American colonies freed resources to be used in other parts of the world.

At the beginning of the 19th century, the SPG was joined by a second Anglican missionary organization, the Church Missionary Society. The latter, a product of the Evangelical Awakening in England in the previous century, was decidedly Low Church in its sympathies, while the SPG had been very much identified with the High-Church wing of Anglicanism.

Work began in India in 1818, and that in Africa and the Middle East soon followed. The SPG extended its concern to Malaysia in the middle of the century, and later in the century opened missions in Japan and Korea.

In the 20th century, the SPG adjusted to the maturing of the missions into the new independent Anglican churches that now constitute the worldwide Anglican Communion. In many areas they continued to support missionary personnel, especially among those churches still struggling for financial independence. However, the change in the missionary thrust in the years after World War II also cost the SPG popular support, and its income suffered accordingly. In 1965 and 1968, the SPG merged with two other organizations, the Universities' Mission in Central Africa and the Cambridge Mission to Delhi, to produce a new organization, the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The United Society continues to support personnel in more than 20 countries and works with more than 50 churches worldwide.

United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel Partnership House
156 Waterloo Rd.
London SE1 8XA
United Kingdom
<http://www.uspg.org.uk/>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; Church Missionary Society; Church of England.

Reference

Dewey, M. The Messengers: A Concise History of the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. London: Mowbray's, 1975.

Society of Saint Pius X

See Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X.

Socinianism

Socinianism, an anti-Trinitarian movement that emerged within the larger Protestant Reformation of the 16th century, derives its name from two Italian Reformers, Lelius Socinius (1526–1562) and his nephew, Faustus Socinius (1539–1604), both natives of Siena, Italy. The movement began as a secret society in the Diocese of Venice (which for a period in the 1530s was a haven for Italian Reformers) that met to discuss the doctrine of the Trinity. (Most Christians believe that God is one but expressed in three persons of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.) Among the members was Lelius Socinius, a Catholic priest and acquaintance of other Reformers: Heinrich Bullinger, John Calvin, and Philip Melancthon. When the opposition of the society to Trinitarian belief became known, it was disbanded and its members quietly departed to Poland, where they discovered they were also not welcome. Lelius finally found a haven in Zurich, from where he stayed in contact with a group of non-Trinitarian believers in Krakow. The Polish anti-Trinitarians survived through the years, though suffering some division following Lelius's death in 1562. In 1574 they were able to issue a catechism.

Meanwhile, Giorgio Biandrata (1515–1590), one of the leaders of the Venetian society, had moved to Transylvania (then under Turkish Ottoman control), where he became the court physician to Transylvania's ruler, Hungarian King John Sigismund, who had championed the Transylvanian Diet's adoption (1564) of Calvinism as the state religion. Biandrata proceeded to win the leader of the Reformed (Calvinist) Church, Francis David (1510–1579), to his non-Trinitarian position. David thus became head of a Unitarian church centered in Transylvania.

Meanwhile, Faustus Socinius, who was able to remain behind and unite the Polish Unitarians, was called to Transylvania to assist David, who had been imprisoned for his Unitarian views that denied both the Trinity and that Christ was an entity worthy of worship. The Transylvanian Unitarians also worshipped on the Sabbath. In contrast, Socinius believed that Christ was the Promised Man and the Mediator of creation and thus the author of regeneration. Though he was not God, Socinius believed that Christ was worthy of adoration. David could not accept Socinius's views, and ultimately died in prison.

Meanwhile, the new European focus for Socinianism at Racow, Poland, flourished. Among Faustus's last acts was the drawing up of a new catechism, which was published in Polish the year after his death (1605) and then in Latin four years later. In a relatively protected situation, even as the Catholic Counter-Reformation gained strength in Poland, the Socinians established schools, held synods, and produced numerous pieces of literature from their own printing presses.

With Socinian literature and influence being felt throughout Europe, in 1638 the Catholic authorities called for the banishment of all Unitarians, and on this issue Protestants were in hardy agreement. One by one, the various European countries, even Poland, moved to suppress the movement. Additional animus was attached to them as their theology was examined. Not only did they deny Christ's divinity, they also denied the real presence in the sacraments (especially the Roman Catholic idea of transubstantiation), original sin, hell, and infant baptism. They taught that the Holy Spirit was to be seen not as the third person of the Trinity, but as an operation of God, the power for sanctification.

Socinianism was stamped out in Poland and other Catholic countries by the Counter-Reformation. Protestants in England and Holland, where Socinians briefly emerged, were hardly kinder, though in England, a thin lineage of Socinian thought survived to inspire what would become British Unitarianism in the 18th century.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church; Unitarian Universalist Association.

References

- Hillar, Marian. "From the Polish Socinians to the American Constitution." A Journal from the Radical Reformation. A Testimony to Biblical Unitarianism 3, no. 2 (1994): 22–57. http://www.socinian.org/polish_socinians.html. Accessed July 15, 2009.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Unitarianism. Vol. 1, Socinianism and Its Antecedents. Boston: Beacon Press, 1945.
- Williams, George H. The Polish Brethren: Documentation of the History and Thought of Unitarianism in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and in the Diaspora, 1601–1685. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1980.

Soka Gakkai International

Soka Gakkai is the largest Buddhist sect in Japan. With 8 million members or more, Soka Gakkai members represent at least 6 percent of the Japanese population and 14 percent of Japan's 56 million Buddhists. Another 4 million members worldwide, consisting of Japanese emigrants and sizable numbers of converts, make Soka Gakkai Japan's most successful 20th-century export religion. It has an organized presence in Africa (South Africa), Asia (Hong Kong, India, Japan, Korea, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Taiwan, Thailand), Europe (Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom), North America (Canada, the United States), Central America (Costa Rica, Panama, Mexico), Oceania (Australia, New Zealand), and South America (Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela).

Soka Gakkai believers chant prayers to start an evening gathering at a small apartment in Tokyo in 2004. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Soka Gakkai was founded in Japan in 1930 by an educator, Tsunesaburo Makiguchi (1871–1944), who organized the Soka Kyoiku Gakkai (Value Creation Education Society) in an attempt to give the Japanese educational system a more Humanist focus. Shortly before Japan’s entry into World War II, Makiguchi and his protégé, Josei Toda (1900–1958), converted to Nichiren Shoshu Buddhism—a sect that claims to teach the “true Buddhism” as taught by Nichiren (1222–1282). Zealous converts, Makiguchi and Toda were imprisoned on charges of lese majesty for their refusal to cooperate with the Religious Organizations Act (1940), which created a three-religion establishment, centered on State Shinto and designed to promote patriotism and loyalty to the increasingly militarist regime.

Following Makiguchi’s death in prison and the end of World War II, Toda, the movement’s second president, reorganized Soka Gakkai as a lay association of Nichiren Shoshu. In the chaotic aftermath of the war, Soka Gakkai grew rapidly, mostly among the displaced residents of urban environments. However, Toda’s zeal, and the zeal of new converts, attracted public suspicion. New converts sometimes destroyed ancestral altars as an expression of exclusive devotion to their new religion; indeed, they may have been encouraged to do so by the movement’s leadership. The practice of shakubuku, an aggressive and argumentative means of recruitment, also set the movement at odds with established religions and led to accusations that Soka Gakkai brainwashed its members. Massive rallies and parades sponsored by Soka Gakkai reminded onlookers of the demonstrations of Fascist regimes during World War II. Together, these features gave Soka Gakkai in Japan the image of a dangerous “cult,” whose leaders had ulterior and untoward motives.

Daisaku Ikeda (b. 1928), Soka Gakkai’s charismatic third president, led the international growth of the movement. Although Ikeda and his successor, Einosuke Akiya, have gone to great lengths to improve the movement’s public image, suspicion remains. Soka Gakkai’s political involvement through the organ of the Komeito, a political party founded by the Soka Gakkai, and the near godlike reverence that members have for President Ikeda have tended to perpetuate public distrust. Although it has been subject to a generalized suspicion toward Eastern religious movements in the United States, Europe, and South America, the movement’s history outside of Japan has been tranquil by comparison to its Japanese history.

Belief and Practice Nichiren was a 13th-century monk who taught that all individuals contain within themselves the potential for enlightenment and that this potential can be unlocked by exclusive devotion to the Lotus Sutra. The Lotus Sutra is understood to be the most perfect expression of the Buddha’s wisdom. By chanting the title of the Lotus Sutra, Nam-Myoho-Renge-Kyo, one forms a connection with the ultimate reality that pervades the universe—the karmic law of cause and effect. In common with other followers of Nichiren, Soka Gakkai members chant this phrase, along with portions of the Lotus Sutra and prayers for world peace (collectively called Gongyo), in front of a copy of the Gohonzon, a mandala originally inscribed by Nichiren that features the title of the Lotus Sutra surrounded by characters representing the 10 realms of consciousness.

The 10 realms refer to 10 basic life conditions, which everyone possesses and experiences—hell, hunger, animality, and belligerence, through tranquility, rapture, learning, and realization, to bodhisattva, and ultimately Buddhahood or enlightenment. These “life conditions” are not understood as external circumstances imposing upon the individual but rather as modes of being. Thus, one’s external circumstances are but a reflection of one’s inner life condition, and by changing one’s way of being in the world, one can improve the external circumstances of one’s life.

Soka Gakkai, furthermore, promotes the belief that individual enlightenment is the first step toward world peace. As individuals become enlightened, they can work together to raise awareness of issues of intercultural understanding and tolerance, issues of the environment, and the threat of military technology. As an organization, therefore, Soka Gakkai sponsors a variety of educational, cultural, and political projects and participates in the United Nations as a nongovernmental organization. The organization, for instance, has founded a major university as well as primary and secondary schools in Japan. It also sponsors art museums, a concert association, retreat centers, and research associations, both in Japan and in Europe and America. Every year members submit a peace proposal to the United Nations on behalf of President Ikeda.

The Schism of 1991 For more than 50 years, Soka Gakkai existed as a lay movement affiliated with the Nichiren Shoshu sect. But latent tensions between the Soka Gakkai and the Nichiren Shoshu leadership came to a head in 1990, when the high priest accused Daisaku Ikeda, who remains the movement’s primary spiritual figurehead, of slandering Buddhism by asserting that the priests and laity are equal before the Gohonzon. Although a formal apology was issued by the Soka Gakkai leadership, and apparently accepted by the priests, tensions between Soka Gakkai leaders and the priests continued to grow. When the priests raised obligatory fees for funerary and other ritual services, Soka Gakkai leaders objected that the priests had become greedy and authoritarian. In reply, the priests accused Soka Gakkai leaders, primarily Ikeda, of slandering the priesthood. In November 1991, the high priest of Nichiren Shoshu ordered the Soka Gakkai to disband and issued a writ of excommunication for all members who remained affiliated with the Soka Gakkai.

Ironically, in many countries Soka Gakkai seems to have benefited greatly from that split. The schism served to enhance the autonomy of the various national organizations, making it easier for these organizations to adapt to the circumstances in their immediate environments. To fill the gap left by the priests, Soka Gakkai developed roles for voluntary “ministers of ceremony,” who now preside over weddings, funerals, and other ritual services.

Although Soka Gakkai’s growth worldwide slowed during the 1990s, it remains steady. The organization thus appears to have successfully weathered its developmental challenges, and its future appears secure. Soka Gakkai International has regional and national offices serving the movement worldwide and an extensive Soka Gakkai Internet presence.

Soka Gakkai International Headquarters
Office of Public Relations
15-3 Samon-cho
Shinjuku-ku, Tokyo 160-0017
Japan
<http://www.sgi.org>

Phillip E. Hammond and David W. Machacek

See also: Nichiren Shoshu.

References

- Eppsteiner, Robert. The Soka Gakkai International: Religious Roots, Early History, and Contemporary Development. Cambridge: Soka Gakkai International, 1997.
- Hammond, Phillip, and David Machacek. Soka Gakkai in America: Accommodation and Conversion. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Machacek, David, and Brian Wilson, eds. Global Citizens: The Soka Gakkai Buddhist Movement in the World. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Metraux, Daniel A. The International Expansion of a Modern Buddhist Movement: The Soka Gakkai in Southeast Asia and Australia. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001.
- Metraux, Daniel A. The Lotus and the Maple Leaf. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1996.
- Seager, Richard Hughes. Encountering the Dharma: Daisaku Ikeda, Soka Gakkai, and the Globalization of Buddhist Humanism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
- Wilson, Brian, and Karel Dobbelaere. A Time to Chant: The Soka Gakkai Buddhists in Britain. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994.

Solar Temple, Order of the

This defunct movement was founded by a French citizen, Jo Di Mambro (1924–1994). Di Mambro had previously been a member of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC) from 1956 to the late 1960s. During that period, he apparently also developed his first contacts with French groups interested in launching a Templar “resurgence.” In 1973, Di Mambro became president of a Center of the Preparation of the New Age, and in 1976 he organized a community called the Pyramid. In 1978 he settled with his followers in Geneva, where he created the Golden Way Foundation. This Foundation developed cultural activities attracting outsiders, too, but at the same time it sheltered esoteric rites of Rosicrucian and Templar inspiration for those intensely engaged in the work. A community always remained the core of the various groups led by Di Mambro.

In the early 1980s, a Belgian homeopathic physician, Luc Jouret (1947–1994) joined the group and, being a gifted speaker, became its main propagandist. He soon became well known in the New Age and Esoteric circuit in French-speaking countries. Cultural clubs named Archedia were launched and functioned as an exoteric counterpart to the Esoteric order, then called the International Order of Chivalry, Solar Tradition. However, while hundreds of people sometimes attended Jouret’s lectures, the membership of the Order remained more modest, apparently peaking at around 500 members. People forming the core community did not necessarily belong to the order. The name the Order of the Solar Temple is being used here in a generic way, since the movements became famous under that name; there were, however, several simultaneous or successive groups with different names, and reorganizations were frequent.

The ideological sources of the movement were eclectic and reflected many of the ideas common in the occult subculture. However, its message put an unusual emphasis upon imminent apocalyptic turmoils, as a prelude to the passage to new conditions for those people who would manage to survive and become the seeds of the new Solar Race: In case there would not be a sufficient number of people answering the call of the Temple for staving off global disaster, at least there would be “enough survivors to carry the species toward the evolutionary blueprint intended for mankind.” During the 1980s, there was a clear survivalist orientation.

For a number of reasons, including internal dissent, survivalism on this planet was abandoned by Di Mambro and a core group around him from the early 1990s; the mood turned increasingly pessimistic. The leaders of the Solar Temple decided that the only way was a “transit” toward another world. That was accomplished in October 1994. Some left willingly, but a number of members apparently did not realize that their “transit” involved being killed; others, considered traitors, were assassinated, including a couple and their baby child savagely slaughtered in Quebec. Most of the other 50 victims died in Switzerland, including the leaders. In December 1995, 16 members lost their lives in France and, in March 1997, 5 people in Quebec.

Although some people continue to believe in some of its doctrines, the Solar Temple no longer exists as a group. But the impact of the repeated “transits” created an aftershock extending well beyond the Solar Temple: for instance, it contributed to the radicalization of the campaign against “cults” by authorities in countries such as France.

Jean-François Mayer

See also: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis; New Age Movement; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

- Delaforge, Gaetan. The Templar Tradition in the Age of Aquarius. Putney, VT: Threshold, 1987.
- Hall, John R., and Philip D. Schuyler. “The Mystical Apocalypse of the Solar Temple.” In Apocalypse Observed: Religious Movements and Violence in North America, Europe, and Japan, edited by John R. Hall, 111–148. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Lewis, James R., ed. The Order of the Solar Temple: The Temple of Death. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2006.
- Mayer, Jean-François. “‘Our Terrestrial Journey Is Coming to an End’: The Last Voyage of the Solar Temple.” Nova Religio: The Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions 2, no. 2 (1999): 172–196. http://religioscope.info/article_172.shtml.

■ Solomon Islands

The Solomon Islands are a set of islands northwest of Australia in the South Pacific, the most famous of which is Guadalcanal. Some 581,000 people are scattered among the 10,600 square miles of land. Most of the islands’ residents are Melanesians, but minorities from Europe, China, and Polynesia settled there over the course of the last century.

The Solomons have been inhabited by Melanesians for some 4,000 years. Europeans first discovered the islands in 1567, when the Spaniard Alvaro de Mendaña landed. Beginning in the 18th century, slavers raided the islanders and transported captured islanders to Fiji and Australia to work the sugar plantations.

Only after World War I did England move to establish a colony over the Solomons. The Japanese invaded and held the islands until recaptured by Allied forces. Following World War II, the archipelago was divided into two parts. The western half was later annexed to Papua New Guinea. The remaining portion became a British colony until granted independence in 1978. During the 1990s, the country was beset with problems of crime and corruption so severe as to threaten the country’s existence. In 2002, an Australian-led multinational force entered the country on a mission to restore order, assist in reorganizing the government, and disarm some local militias that had arisen. Their effort, which continues, has been deemed largely successful.

Traditional religion has survived in the Solomons. The dominant faith at the time the first Christian missionaries arrived was a polytheistic system that recognized a somewhat remote supreme being who went under different names on the different islands. The more operative concept, made famous by anthropological description, is mana, the impersonal power that pervades the cosmos at every level. Mana is a comprehensive concept that explains a variety of phenomena, and it can be used by religious practitioners to heal and work magic. Following long-term contact with Europeans, a number of new variations of the traditional religion appeared. The best known of these new traditional religions were the “cargo cults” based around the airplanes that brought unfamiliar objects to the islands during and after World War II.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

The Roman Catholic Church arrived in the Solomons when Marist priests opened a mission in 1845. It was later abandoned, but by that time the Anglican Church in New Zealand had launched a mission to Melanesians. In 1861, John C. Patterson, designated the missionary bishop for Melanesia, began a decade of leadership ended by his untimely death at the hands of residents of the Santa Cruz Islands. Patterson was succeeded by John Selwyn, who continued Patterson’s policy of gathering the most talented among the converts and sending them to New Zealand for formal training. The Anglican work on the Solomons grew as a missionary diocese in the Province of New Zealand.

In 1970 it was set apart as the Church in the Province of Melanesia. It is the largest church in the islands, including some 30 percent of the 320,000 citizens.

Roman Catholics soon re-established work, and by 1897 a prefecture was erected that grew into a vicariate in 1912. In 1916 the islands were divided into two dioceses, one for the western Solomons and one for the southern islands, the latter based on Guadalcanal at the capital, Honiara. Approximately 20 percent of the population are professed Catholics.

Methodists from Australia came to the Solomons in 1902 and brought Native workers from Samoa and Fiji with them. In 1922 the New Zealand Church assumed responsibility for what had grown into a district, but the church was largely destroyed by the Japanese; it was rebuilt, however, in the years immediately after hostilities ended. In 1968 the Methodist Church of the Solomons participated in a merger with the Congregationalists on New Guinea to form the United Church in Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, now

Solomon Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	151,000	506,000	95.3	2.58	675,000	917,000
Protestants	46,800	220,000	41.4	2.38	290,000	380,000
Anglicans	50,000	171,000	32.2	2.48	200,000	270,000
Roman Catholics	30,800	105,000	19.8	2.28	150,000	205,000
Ethnoreligionists	9,000	16,500	3.1	2.60	16,000	15,000
Baha'is	400	3,300	0.6	2.75	5,000	8,000
Buddhists	0	1,700	0.3	2.61	2,500	3,600
Agnostics	300	1,500	0.3	3.96	3,500	7,000
Muslims	0	1,700	0.3	9.92	2,400	3,600
Atheists	0	250	0.0	2.82	500	1,000
Total population	161,000	531,000	100.0	2.60	705,000	955,000

divided into the United Church in Papua New Guinea and United Church of the Solomon Islands, separately.

In 1904 the South Seas Evangelical Mission, a faith mission based in Australia, grew out of the older Queensland Kanaka Mission. Its first missionary was Florence S. H. Young. She was followed by 13 members of the family of Dr. Northcote Young, who opened work on Guadalcanal, Malita, and Makira. Their work grew into the South Sea Evangelical Church, which became an independent body in 1963. By 1970 it had 285 congregations affiliated with it.

The older mission churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, formed the ecumenical Solomon Islands Christian Association in 1967. It includes the several churches that are also members of the World Council of Churches, the Anglican and the United churches. The South Seas Island Church has identified with the World Evangelical Alliance and participates in the Evangelical Alliance of Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church contributed to the expanding array of churches in the Solomons in 1914. Its very successful mission is now a part of the Western Pacific Union Mission that includes Vanuatu and New Caledonia. Several indigenous churches have arisen over the years, including the Remnant Church and the Christian Fellowship Church. The latter, the largest of such independent churches, was founded in 1959 by Silas Eto in a schism of the Methodist Church on the island of New Georgia.

The various world religions have only begun to discover the South Sea Islands in general and the Solomon Islands in particular. By 1970s there were small groups of Buddhists, Hindus, and Baha'is.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church in the Province of Melanesia; Methodist Church; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; United Church in Papua New Guinea; United Church of the Solomon Islands; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Burt, Ben. Tradition and Christianity: The Colonial Transformation of a Solomon Islands Society. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Forman, Charles H. The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1982.
- Laracy, H. Marist and Melanesians: A History of Catholic Missions in the Solomon Islands. Canberra: Australian National University Press, 1976.
- Naban, J. The History of the Work of the Anglican Church in the Solomon Islands. Suva, Fiji: Pacific Theological Seminary, 1976.
- O'Brien, Claire. A Greater than Solomon Here: A Story of Catholic Church in Solomon Islands 1567–1967. Catholic Church Solomon Islands Trust Board, 1995.

Tippett, A. R. Solomon Islands Christianity: A Study in Growth and Obstruction. New York: Friendship, 1967.

Worsley, Peter. The Trumpet Shall Sound: A Study of Cargo Cults in Melanesia. New York: Schocken, 1968.

■ Somalia

The history of Somalia was given a new and determinative direction by the entrance of Islam in the eighth century. The land had been home to several ethnic groups for a number of centuries, but they were tied together by a common language and culture. They had been producers of incense and had developed trade with the ancient Egyptians and the Roman Empire. Their ancient religion, however, was gradually replaced by Islam, and the people had become thoroughly Islamized by the 13th century.

Following their conversion to Islam, the Somalis founded a new political entity, the state of Ifat. It was able to sever its subservient relationship to Ethiopia, transformed into the sultanate of Adala, and grew prosperous as it began to trade with the Islamic states along the eastern coast of Africa. Adala was brought down, however, in 1541 when Portugal, which had developed an alliance with Ethiopia, attacked and laid waste to Somalia’s coastal cities. The Portuguese presence in the area prevented the sultanate’s recovery, and Adala was divided into a set of smaller sultanates. By the time the Portuguese were driven from the area in the 17th century, the Ottoman Empire had moved into the region and established its hegemony over northern Somalia while the sultanates in the south sought a relationship with the sultan in Zanzibar.

Europeans reappeared in the area in the 19th century, and French, British, and Italian forces established their countries’ presence. The British and Italian area became independent in 1960 and merged to form the present state of Somalia. The French territory is now the country of Djibouti.

A parliamentary government assumed control of the country but failed to perform, and in 1969 a military coup under General Siad Barre occurred. It gained popular support as it moved to correct some of the country’s problems, not the least being illiteracy. It brought the country almost to ruin, however, by attempting to lay claim to the Plateau of Ogaden just across the border in Ethiopia. Increasing opposition to the Barre government led to civil war in 1991. The forces of the United Somalian Congress succeeded in driving Barre from power, but then divided into two factions that have since vied for control of the country. In the midst of the struggle, the United Nations and the United States attempted to intervene, unsuccessfully. As of the beginning of the new century, there is as yet no central government in the country.

Islam in Somalia was somewhat reshaped during the years of the Ottoman Empire. That part of the

Somalia

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	2,220,000	5,334,000	98.7	2.88	7,757,000	11,860,000
Christians	4,200	59,200	1.1	1.33	66,200	78,300
Orthodox	200	55,000	1.0	1.36	60,000	70,000
Independents	60	1,000	0.0	0.00	2,000	3,000
Protestants	550	1,100	0.0	1.67	2,000	3,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	7,000	0.1	2.86	9,000	13,000
Agnostics	2,500	2,300	0.0	2.12	6,000	12,000
Hindus	500	2,000	0.0	2.86	4,000	8,000
Baha’is	700	1,400	0.0	2.89	3,000	8,500
Atheists	1,000	800	0.0	2.89	1,400	4,600
Total population	2,229,000	5,407,000	100.0	2.86	7,847,000	11,984,000

SOMALIA

country formerly under Ottoman rule is largely of the Hanafite School, while the part that was related to Zanzibar is primarily of the Shafiite School. There are a small number of Shias, mostly of Pakistani origin. The capital, Mogadishu, has been the site of the East Africa regional office of the World Muslim Congress.

Christianity was introduced into Somalia in 1881 but greatly expanded after the Italians took control of the southern coast, including Mogadishu. However, it has had very little success, even prior to the independent government's prohibition of proselytizing activity, and its several thousand members are still primarily expatriates. In 1972 the government nationalized all of the Catholic church's property. However, in spite of the changes in the church's status and the resultant departure of much of its personnel, a Diocese of Mogadishu was created in 1975.

Lutheran missionaries from the Church of Sweden came to Somalia in 1898. They opened a set of educational and medical facilities and engaged in evangelistic outreach, but they had their greatest success among a group of Bantu-speaking former slaves. The mission was disrupted when Italian authorities expelled the missionaries in 1935. The work was revived after World War II by Mennonites and the Sudan Interior Mission, but it was hurt by the same nationalization of church property that destroyed so much of the Catholic work in 1972. Most Sudan Interior Mission missionaries left soon afterward. By 1976 all foreign missionaries had left the country. Two groups of Somali nationals, one formerly associated with the Mennonites and one with the Sudan Interior Mission, continued to meet after the missionaries left. In the 1980s, a few Mennonites were able to return.

There are also a few Hindus (expatriate Indians) and Baha'is in the country. The Baha'i Faith had some success in the 1970s, and at one point a member of the Barre government was a member. It has had some initial success among the Iranian expatriate community, but in 1975 the Iranians were expelled.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha'i Faith; Church of Sweden; Hanafite School of Islam; Shafiite School of Islam; World Muslim Congress.

References

- Bayne, E. A. A Religious Nationalist in Somalia: A Comment on Modern Nationalism Allied with Islam as a Unifying Dynamic. New York: American Universities Field Staff, 1966.
- Lewis, I. M., ed. Islam in Tropical Africa. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Miller, F. "Sufi Influences on Somali Society." M.A. thesis, Duquesne University, 1973.
- Trimingham, J. S. The Christian Church and Mission in Ethiopia (including Eritrea and the Somalilands). London: World Dominion Press, 1950.

Song Shan

In Daoist thought, there were five directions. Along with the north, east, south, and west, the center was also considered an additional direction. This idea is amply illustrated in the concept of the five sacred mountains, which were looked upon as pillars supporting the heavens. Song Shan, in Henan Province, was the Daoist mountain of the center. Song Shan stretches for 40 miles between the cities of Luoyang and Zhengzhou. Luoyang, the ancient capital of China, is the site of the White Horse Temple, the first Buddhist temple in China, built in 68 CE.

The most important Daoist site on Song Shan is Zhongyue Temple at the foot of and on the south side of Taishi Hill. It originated as the Taishi Shrine in the Qin dynasty (220–207 BCE). Emperor Wudi (r. 141–87 BCE) greatly expanded it in 110, and it was largely rebuilt during the Ming dynasty. The current complex was rebuilt following the design of the imperial palace in Beijing during the reign of Manchu Emperor Qianlong (r. 1736–1795) of the Qing dynasty. It is larger (with some 400 structures) and better preserved relative to the similar complexes found on the other four sacred mountains.

While the Daoist history on Song Shan is impressive, the Buddhist presence rivals it. For example, the Songyue Pagoda, a sixth-century pagoda, is the earliest known Chinese brick pagoda. It was constructed in 523 CE adjacent to Songyue Monastery on Mount Song. Even more famous is the legendary Shaolin Temple, near Zhengzhou City. It is to this temple that Bodhidharma, the reputed founder of Chan/Zen Buddhism lived and at which he developed what became a new martial art, kung fu. In 495, he also built the Shaolin Pagoda adjacent to the temple. Today, about 984 feet to the west of the Shaolin Pagoda is the Pagoda Forest, home to some 240 pagodas erected since the days of the Tang dynasty (618–907).

Fawang Temple is a Tang dynasty Buddhist temple located northwest of the town of Dengfeng and at the bottom of Song Shan's Yuzhu Peak. This temple's grounds include a set of Tang Dynasty pagodas, the most prominent being a 131-foot-tall stone tower that enshrines a jade statue of the Buddha given to the temple in 1409 by a member of ruling family of the Ming dynasty (1386–1644) who resided in Luoyang.

Monk at Shaolin Temple of Song Shan, China. (Linqong/Dreamstime.com)

The tallest peak of Song Mountain rises some 4,900 feet above the landscape. In 2008, the mountain and its temples and pagodas were named a United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) World Heritage Site.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Bodhidharma; Daoism; Heng Shan; Hua Shan; Tai Shan; Temples—Buddhist; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Einarsen, John, ed. The Sacred Mountains of Asia. Boston: Shambhala, 1995.
- Geil, William Edgar. The Sacred 5 of China. London: John Murray, 1926.
- Hahn, Thomas H. "Daoist Sacred Sites." In Daoism Handbook, edited by Livia Kohn, 683–708. Leiden: Brill, 2004.

"Sacred Mountains of China." Places of Peace and Power. http://www.sacredsites.com/asia/china/sacred_mountains.html. Accessed May 15, 2009.

Songgwangsa

Songgwangsa, or Spreading Pine Temple, is a large Son (Zen) Buddhism center founded by the Master Chinul (1158–1210) on Songgwang Mountain in Jeollanam-do Province in the southwest corner of the Republic of (South) Korea. It is designated one of Korea's Three Jewels Temples, each temple representing either the Buddha, the Dharma, or the Sangha. Songgwangsa represents the Sangha, that is, in Korean Buddhism's understanding, the Buddha's followers, both monks/nuns and laity. For this reason, the temple complex has some unique aspects.

By 1190, Master Chinul had begun the mature phase of his career. He had rejected the lax Buddhism of the city (in Seoul) and had moved to Kong Mountain, where he formed a new retreat society based upon his belief that each person was already an enlightened Buddha and what was needed was the recovery of his or her pristine enlightened state. A growing number began to find their way to his small center on Kong Mountain, which soon outgrew its facilities. By around 1197 he had selected the present site in southern Korea, which became the setting for his new temple complex. One legend that has been told over the centuries is that in order to find the right place, he carved a crane out of wood. It flew off and landed when it located the correct place on Songgwang Mountain.

On his journey to take up residence in the new temple, Chinul and his companions made a retreat on Chiri Mountain to consider the direction to be taken with the new community. During this retreat, they experienced a variety of supernatural events that were subsequently interpreted as confirmation that Chinul had realized a final and higher state of enlightenment. Once installed at Songgwang Mountain, Chinul became the dominant voice in the Korean Son community.

Chunil initially built a small hermitage on Mount Chogyesan, but quickly expanded the site to accommodate the growing community. The Masters' Portrait

Hall was reputedly built where the crane bird actually landed. It is this hall that came to represent the followers of the Buddha. It houses a large collection of stele and pagodas containing the ashes of some of the many masters who have lived here, including Master Chinul.

Songgwangsa reached the height of its glory in the 16th century, but through the rest of millennium was largely destroyed on several occasions. On each occasion it was repaired and/or rebuilt, but never to its former completeness. Master Kusan (1901–1983), one of the energetic young teachers to arise in the decades following the end of the Korean War (1950–1953), was able to attract a number of non-Korean students and in 1973 established an International Zen Center at Songgwangsa. He also launched the restoration effort at Songgwangsa, which his successor carried to fruition. Through the last half of the decade, the residents were able to restore the site according to its original plans. From this effort, 14 buildings were reconstructed, most notably the Main Hall, which houses the monastery's three main statues of the three Buddhas—Dipankara, the primordial Buddha; Sakyamuni, the historical Buddha; and Maitreya, the future Buddha.

It is usual for the Main Hall to be the highest building in Korean monastic complexes, but Songgwangsa manifests one of its unique aspects in this regard. Here, the Teaching Hall, the Masters' Portrait Hall, and the residence of the spiritual leader are in the highest positions, due to Songgwangsa being one of the Three Jewels Temples. Of interest, adjacent to the spiritual leader's residence is his assistant's house, a small structure that has survived since the 15th century. It is the oldest building at Songgwangsa and one of the oldest living quarters in Korea.

Songgwangsa currently serves as the head temple for the 21st district of the Chogye Order, the largest of Korea's Buddhist groups.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinul; Chogye Order; Haein-sa Temple; Korean Buddhism; T'ongdo-sa Temple; Zen Buddhism.

References

Buswell, Robert E., Jr. "Songgwang-sa: The Monastery of the Sangha Jewel." Korean Culture 10, no. 3 (Fall 1989): 14–22.

Buswell, Robert E., Jr. Tracing Back the Radiance: Chinul's Korean Way of Zen. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1991.

Buswell, Robert E., Jr. The Zen Monastic Experience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993.

Kusan Sousa. The Way of Korean Zen. New York: Weatherhill, 1985.

Soto Zen Buddhism

Soto Zen Buddhism is the largest school of Zen in Japan, with more than 17,500 temples at its peak in the 18th century. Today, the school maintains approximately 15,000 temples in Japan. Several hundred affiliated temples exist in Europe and the Americas, transmitted by both Japanese immigrants in the late 19th century and by European and American converts during the 1960s and 1970s.

This school was originally developed in China by Tung-shan Liang-chieh (807–869) and became one of five Chinese Chan (Zen) lineages. It was transmitted to Japan by Dogen Kigen (1200–1253). The Soto Zen School emphasized the practice of "silent illumination" Zen meditation (Japanese: shikantaza) and the observance of strict monastic codes as the path to enlightenment. These practices were detailed in Dogen's seminal text, the Shobogenzo.

Especially under the influence of the so-called second founder of the Japanese Soto School, Keizan Jokin (1268–1325), the organization also incorporated devotional forms of worship to numerous local deities, adopted esoteric Buddhist rituals, and received patronage from local lords to grow into a major force in Japanese religious life. Its temples offered healing, rain-making, and funerary rituals, among others, that attracted numerous adherents. The sect's head temples of Eiheiiji and Sojiji have acted as priestly training centers for the school in Japan.

Soto Zen in the West among Japanese immigrants has served as a repository of Japanese culture and Buddhist ritual, especially funerary and ancestral rites. Among converts, on the other hand, it has focused on the primacy of meditation and its application in daily life, with a particular emphasis on involvement of the laity.

Pagoda of a Japanese Buddhist temple in Kyoto. (Till Scheel/Dreamstime.com)

Eiheiji
Eiheiji-cho
Yoshida-gun, Fukui-ken 910-12
Japan
<http://global.sotozen-net.or.jp/eng/>

Sojiji
2-1-1 Tsurumi-ku
Yokohama-shi, Kanagawa-ken 230-8686
Japan

Duncan Williams

See also: Dogen; Enlightenment; Meditation;
Monasticism; Zen Buddhism.

References

Bielefeldt, Carl. Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation.
Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Bodiford, William. Soto Zen in Medieval Japan.
Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1993.

LaFleur, William, ed. Dogen Studies. Honolulu:
University of Hawaii Press, 1985.

Williams, Duncan. The Other Side of Zen: A Social History of Zen in Tokugawa Japan. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.

■ South Africa

South Africa is the southernmost country of the continent of Africa. Off its southern coast, the Atlantic and Indian oceans meet and its coastal cities, especially Cape Town, were for centuries stopping points for ships sailing between Europe and Asia. To the north lie Namibia, Botswana, Zimbabwe, and Mozambique. The country of Lesotho is completely surrounded by South Africa and Swaziland is almost in a similar position. South Africa is now home to more than 49 million people. It encompasses some 471,000 square miles.

European settlement of South Africa began with the arrival of the Dutch in 1652. Settlement radiated from Capt Town over the next centuries. Meanwhile, what would eventually be carved out as the modern country was home to a variety of Native people, including the Khoi and San.

The British seized the area in 1806, prompting many of the Dutch settlers to move inland. Significant population growth followed the discovery of diamonds (1867) and gold (1886). The Boer War (1899–1902) was fought as the Dutch settlers resisted the extension of British hegemony over their settlements. The British won and subsequently set up a coalition white power structure that left the Native population in subjugation. The Union of South Africa was formed in 1910. It evolved into the present Republic of South Africa in 1961. Following the election of the National Party to power in 1948, a system known as apartheid was put in place, which called for the separate development of the races—not just African and European but also the Asians, who would become a significant if minority part of the population. Significant world opposition to apartheid developed through the 1970s and 1980s and eventually led to its destruction. The first elections in the new desegregated South Africa occurred in 1994 and ushered in a black majority government under the African National Congress (ANC), which has since ruled the country, though not without a significant and growing minority opposition. For many years a prisoner due to his anti-apartheid activism, Nelson Mandela became the first African president of the country.

The oldest sign of religion in South Africa comes from Ingwavuma in northern Kwa Zulu/Natal at a place called Border Cave, where there is evidence of Middle Stone Age occupation. Some of the human remains found there show affinities to the later Khoi and San populations of the western parts of South Africa. Particularly fascinating are the remains of the body of a child that had been covered in red clay before burial, which suggests an understanding of a reality that transcends earthly existence. These remains are dated to about 100,000 years ago and are some of the oldest indications of religious activity in the world.

The oldest piece of rock art in southern Africa dates from 27,000 years ago and was recovered from the Apollo 11 Cave in Namibia. Burial remains indicate, however, that people who strongly resemble the contemporary San were present in the southern African region as early as 12,000 years ago. Their famous rock engravings, which are scattered over large parts of South Africa, were numerous up until 2,000 years ago. At that time changes in lifestyle took place, and from that point on the religious activities of the Khoi and San are reasonably well documented.

The culturally distinct Khoi (sometimes referred to as Khoikhoi or Hottentot) and the San (Bushmen) evolved from the same genetic stock, referred to as Khoisan. In prehistoric times they were probably spread over most of the southern African region, but by the time the colonists arrived in the 17th century they were confined to the southwestern parts of the country.

The San were hunter-gatherers who relied on fruits and vegetables of the veldt as well as game for their diet. The movement of game and the sparse rainfall of the region controlled their lives, and they were socially organized into small roving bands that traversed the desert in search of water and food. They recognized the existence of a greater as well as a lesser god. The greater god resided in the eastern sky and the lesser in the western sky. These gods were whimsical and were capable of sending good or bad fortune to people. Of much importance in San mythology is the unpredictable divine trickster figure Kaggen, who could change his appearance at will and who played pranks and upset the normal order of things. The only defense humans had was to intensify the supernatural energy that they possess, called n/um. This was accomplished through communal dancing in which the rhythm of the dance would induce an altered state of consciousness in the healer. Through the dance, singing, trance, and fire, the n/um of the dancer-healer was brought to “boil”; it overflowed in sweat and nose bleeding, which in turn repelled evil.

For the San all of nature was invested with a numinous quality, and their attitude toward the world was one of deep reverence and respect. Animals such as the eland and the mantis manifested divine qualities, and the stars were said to be the eyes of dead ancestors or great hunters. These people lived in a delicate balance with the natural environment, and their only defense against the expansionist activities of the colonists was to retreat from their preferred territory to the Kalahari Desert. Today there are no more than about 50,000, and many live in the neighboring countries of Namibia and Botswana. No common body of beliefs has survived among the small groups.

South African church. (Monkey Business Images/Dreamstime.com)

The Khoi people were nomadic pastoralists who settled mainly in the western Cape and moved only when water and pasture were needed for their animals. They had developed the ability to smelt iron and used it to fabricate weapons and implements. When their pastoral activities encroached on the hunting area of the San, it was the San who were forced to abandon the territory and move farther northward.

The Khoi believed in a cosmic duality of spirit. Tsui/Goab was the benevolent giver of rain and all things good, and Guanab was the evil god who brought misfortune, illness, and death. These gods would, however, sometimes inexplicably go against their own nature and bring about the opposite qualities. Whereas these gods influenced only the communal life, it was the ancestral cultural hero Heitsi-Eibib who was invoked for individual success and healing. There are many stories about his exploits, particularly about his many deaths, which are attested to by his many gravesites, where offerings or stones were left for good luck.

With the arrival of the colonists, the Khoi culture crumbled in the face of superior weapons and missionary efforts to Christianize them. Eventually all Khoi were exterminated or incorporated and absorbed into the various groups in the Cape.

While the Khoi and the San inhabited the arid western parts of the country, the black African peoples, or Bantu-speaking people, inhabited the eastern and central parts of the country. Those parts consisted of rolling grasslands toward the coast as well as a vast inland plateau west of the Drakensberg. Different lifestyles developed among these people, varying with the climate, altitude, and soil. The lush, mountainous eastern parts of the country allowed for small self-sufficient and independent settlements (usually on a ridge), within hailing distance of neighbors. West of the Drakensberg, in the interior, the land is flat and rainfall inconstant. There the people needed larger tracts of land to sustain living, and the population was divided into very large centrally located settlements.

In the early 19th century, violent clashes between the people of different settlements led to the merging of groups into powerful nation-states, complete with their own royal houses. These groups were categorized by early ethnographers as the Nguni-speaking group (Xhosa, Zulu, and Swazi) and the Sotho-Tswana group (Northern Sotho, South Sotho, and Western Sotho or Tswana), the Venda and the Shona.

Although the religious practices of these groups differed notably, the main features show remarkable congruence. All the beliefs and practices are centered on the cardinal belief that there should be harmony between the natural and the spirit worlds. If human beings behaved with due deference toward the ancestors, and in accordance with prescribed social convention, everyone would prosper and flourish. If anyone misbehaved in any way, the harmony would be disturbed and the protection of the ancestors lifted, so that misfortune would strike the offenders.

It is therefore clear that the main element of all the religious practices of the Bantu-speaking people was ancestor veneration. Each homestead had its own ancestors, who were included in the celebrations and decision making of everyday life and were looked to for protection and prosperity. On a larger scale, every tribe or nation also had its own ancestors who were responsible for the welfare of the nation. Specialists in the form of diviners, by virtue of their ability to mediate in the spirit world, were on hand to help seek out the cause of suffering and misfortune and to help restore the order with prescribed sacrifices and purification rituals.

On the whole, scholars of African traditional religion agree that there was a belief in a Supreme Being or Creator who was so powerful and detached that human beings could not approach him. There are, however, also dissenting voices who maintain that this is a Western and Christian interpretation that was thrust upon a discrete religious system.

In South Africa today there are many who still abide by the old ways, and although it is estimated that more than 70 percent of black South Africans profess to be Christians, their Christianity is often more influenced by the traditional religion than African religion is influenced by Christianity. It is safe to say that many of the African Initiated Churches in South Africa today are not only influenced by traditional religion but that they also represent a synthesis of traditional religion and Christianity.

When the Dutch came to South Africa in 1652 they brought Reformed Christianity with them, and all other forms of religion were prohibited. Islam had been brought to the Cape as early as 1658 by slaves who were imported from the East Indies, but it was only in 1804, when the Dutch government granted religious freedom to all people, that they could establish their first mosque. Because Islam did so much to address the social and educational needs of the community, the religion attracted people from all classes and races and became a center of resistance against slavery and social injustice. From 1860 on, Islam was also established in Natal, when Indian laborers were brought to the province. From there it quickly spread to the Transvaal, and today there are an estimated half-million Muslims in South Africa and the number is growing.

The Reformed faith was originally brought to South Africa by members of the Netherlands Reformed Church, but following the British takeover of the Cape Colony, Presbyterians from the British Isles, especially adherents of the Church of Scotland, expanded the Reformed community. Through the 20th century, these several churches splintered and reunited and today exist as more than 15 different denominations, including the Dutch Reformed Church, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa, the Presbyterian Church of Southern Africa, the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa, the Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa, and the Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa. The last named was formed by a merger in 1999. Two years later it selected the Reverend Diane Vorster as the new moderator of its general assembly, the first time a woman has headed a major South African Christian denomination.

SOUTH AFRICA

Over the course of the 19th century, the major Protestant traditions brought to South Africa included the Anglicans (now included in the Church in the Province of South Africa), Methodists (Methodist Church of South Africa), Baptists (Baptist Convention of South Africa), and Moravians (Moravian Church in Southern Africa). Pentecostalism spread to South Africa soon after its establishment in America, the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa being its earliest representative. It has continued as an important segment of the Christian community, and South Africans have participated fully in the Charismatic movement. Several new South African Charismatic churches, such as the International Fellowship of Charismatic Churches, have now become global bodies.

A number of the Protestant churches are members of the South African Council of Churches, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Many

South Africa

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	17,181,000	40,260,000	81.7	1.17	42,593,000	44,672,000
Independents	4,616,000	19,050,000	38.7	2.16	20,883,000	21,755,000
Protestants	6,463,000	10,039,000	20.4	0.41	10,100,000	10,680,000
Roman Catholics	1,589,000	3,250,000	6.6	0.52	3,510,000	3,820,000
Ethnoreligionists	4,308,000	4,350,000	8.8	0.32	3,500,000	3,000,000
Agnostics	150,000	1,530,000	3.1	1.47	2,220,000	3,000,000
Muslims	270,000	1,240,000	2.5	1.10	1,600,000	2,000,000
Hindus	433,000	1,175,000	2.4	1.10	1,500,000	1,800,000
Baha'is	15,300	223,000	0.5	1.10	300,000	400,000
Atheists	5,000	170,000	0.3	1.10	215,000	300,000
Buddhists	2,200	158,000	0.3	1.10	180,000	200,000
Jews	120,000	80,000	0.2	-0.05	80,000	80,000
Chinese folk	1,600	33,900	0.1	1.09	36,000	42,000
New religionists	10,000	22,600	0.0	1.09	30,400	40,000
Confucianists	0	20,000	0.0	1.09	25,000	30,000
Sikhs	4,000	11,000	0.0	1.10	14,000	17,000
Spiritists	2,000	3,000	0.0	1.10	4,000	5,000
Jains	0	2,000	0.0	1.10	3,000	4,000
Total population	22,502,000	49,278,000	100.0	1.09	52,300,000	55,590,000

of the more conservative evangelical groups are associated with the Evangelical Alliance of South Africa affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

The first priests of the Roman Catholic Church settled in the Cape in 1805 but were not allowed to begin missionary work until 1820. A vicariate was established in 1837. The first black bishop was consecrated in 1953. The church is currently led by the Episcopal Conference of South Africa.

It was only after 1804, when religious freedom came to the Cape, that practicing Jews came to settle in South Africa. The first synagogue (the Tikvat Israel—Hope of Israel) was established in 1841 in Cape Town. Today about half of the estimated 100,000 Jews in the country live in and around Johannesburg, where they are involved mainly in trade and the professions. Many Jews played leading roles in the struggle for freedom in this country, and today many still continue to make important contributions to public life.

Hinduism, the last of the great world religions that have a major presence in this country, first came to Natal in 1860 with Indian indentured laborers. More laborers as well as many merchants followed soon afterward, and today South Africa has a vibrant Indian community of about one million people, 60 percent of whom are Hindus. Most Hindus belong to the Sanath-anist, or ritualistic, tradition, but there are also three streams of neo-Hinduism present in South Africa—Arya Samaj, neo-Vedanta (for example, the Rama-krishna Centre and the Divine Life Society), and Hare Krishna (the International Society for Krishna Consciousness).

According to 1991 census figures (the last census that included compulsory questions on religious affiliation), about 67 percent of the population adhered to Christianity (33 percent to various African Initiated Churches, 18 percent to the Reformed family, 11 percent Roman Catholic, 9 percent Methodist, 6 percent Anglican, and 4 percent Lutheran). About 2 percent of the population belonged to Islam, 1.5 percent to Hinduism, and 0.2 percent to Judaism. Approximately 30 percent of the population did not fall into any of these categories, and that probably accounted for adherents of African traditional religion and a nonreligious component. According to the 1996 census (in which questions on religion were optional), only 54 percent of South Africans followed Christianity, but 34 percent had no religion or did not state one. Some 13 percent stated that they did not belong to any religion. As there was no way of indicating adherence to African traditional religion, one may assume that the 34 percent who claimed no religion or declined to answer the question included a strong component of adherence to African religion. At present there is a strong movement by adherents of African religion to return their religion to its ways and practices prevalent before colonialization, and to imbue it anew with dignity, honor, and acceptability within the South African cultural milieu.

In 1994 the long agonizing chapter of apartheid in the history of this country came to a close when the first democratically elected government took office under the presidency of Nelson Mandela. During the apartheid era many religious leaders in this country were involved in either the promotion of, or the resistance to, the system. Although the names of those who had sought to promote apartheid on biblical grounds will sink into oblivion, others, such as that of Anglican archbishop of Cape Town Desmond Tutu, Nobel Laureate for Peace, will go down in history as powerful and compelling examples of agents for justice and transformation.

H. Christina Steyn

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Traditional Religions; Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa; Arya Samaj; Baptist Union of South Africa; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of Scotland; Divine Life Society; Dutch Reformed Church; Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Methodist Church of South Africa; Moravian Church in Southern Africa; Netherlands Reformed Church; Pentecostalism; Roman Catholic Church; United Congregational Church of Southern Africa; Uniting Presbyterian Church in Southern Africa; Uniting Reformed Church in South Africa; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

Chidester, David. Religions of South Africa. London: Routledge, 1992.

Krüger, J. S. Along Edges: Religion in South Africa: Bushman, Christian, Buddhist. Pretoria: Unisa, 1995.

Krüger, J. S., G. J. A. Lubbe, and H. C. Steyn. The Human Search for Meaning: A Multireligious Introduction to the Religions of Humankind. Pretoria: Via Afrika, 1966.

Prozesky, Martin, and John De Gruchy. Living Faiths in South Africa. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Spong, Bernard, and Audrey R. Chapman, eds. Religion and Reconciliation in South Africa: Voices of Religious Leaders. West Conshohocken, PA: Templeton Foundation Press, 2003.

Villa-Vicencio, Charles. The Spirit of Freedom: South African Leaders on Religion and Politics. Perspectives on South Africa, 52. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Southern Baptist Convention

The Southern Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant/Free church body in the United States, was founded in 1845 as a result of a deep controversy within the larger American Baptist fellowship. Baptists, based as they were in the local church, had been slow to organize. In the early 19th century, they formed a set of organizations (societies) designed to assist the congregations in presenting a united voice, publishing religious materials, and expanding through home and foreign missions. Each society had its own rules and membership. The controversy over slavery presented it with the necessity of making some unforeseen decisions.

In the decades following the American Revolution, Baptists spread to every corner of the United States as then constituted. The southern half of the nation had developed around a system of agriculture that depended on slaves, and Baptists had found an opening for missions among the slave population. At the same time, many slave owners and their friends had become Baptists. And American Baptists, even in the South, were aware of the problem raised by the demands for freedom that undergirded the American Revolution, coupled with the ambiguous nature of the Bible's discussion of the subject. The early Christians, most notably the Apostle Paul, had made no direct challenge to the slavery then operative in the Mediterranean Basin.

As the slavery controversy that would lead to the American Civil War (1860–1865) deepened, the Baptists found it increasingly difficult to remain neutral, and the issue continued to be raised in different forms. For example, many southern delegates who supported the American Baptist Home Missionary Society came to believe that a disproportionate number of home missions were being established outside the South. The issue came to a head in 1845, when Georgia delegates proposed a man for appointment as a home missionary. The board turned him down by refusing to act on the matter. Then the Alabama delegates sent an inquiry to the Triennial Convention overseeing foreign missions and asked if slaveholders could be appointed as foreign missionaries. The Convention's reply included a statement that it would not act so as to give the appearance of approving of slavery.

These two actions were enough for some, and in 1845, Baptists in the South met and approved the plan for the formation of the Southern Baptist Convention. Unlike the American Baptists, the Convention would unite all of the missionary functions into a single organization. A foreign mission board and a home mission board were established immediately, and plans were projected for future educational and publications work. Because of the devastation of the American Civil War, plans for further expansion had to be postponed to the end of the century. To avoid too much centralization, the foreign missions board was established in Richmond, Virginia, where it remains to this day. The home missions board was opened in Marion, Alabama, and later moved to Atlanta, Georgia, where it now is located.

After the Civil War, Southern Baptists also passed through a significant controversy that contributed to their unique place in the Baptist world. Advocates of the so-called Landmark position, most notably James R. Graves (1920–1993), argued that Baptist churches are the only true churches in the world, that the true church is a local, visible organization, and that Baptist churches and the kingdom of God are coterminous. Graves insisted that Baptist churches had existed at every age, and hence the contemporary Baptist movement could be traced to the time of Christ (rather than to the independent movement in 16th-century England). Among the implications of the Landmark position were that Baptists should have no pulpit fellowship (that is, should not exchange ministers to lead worship) with other Protestant groups, and that Baptist congregations should limit Communion to members of Baptist churches. Although the Landmark position was ultimately rejected, it deeply influenced Southern Baptist life into the mid-20th century. It eventually would become the established position of the American Baptist Association.

After the Civil War, slowly, step by step, Southern Baptists built their denominational life. In 1888 the Woman's Missionary Union was created. The Sunday School Board appeared three years later. Several Baptist institutions for higher education existed in the South prior to the Civil War, but as a whole, Baptists were suspicious of colleges and seminaries; it would be the 20th century before the great expansion of Southern Baptists into higher education would occur.

In the new century, concern turned to the increasing problem of coordinating the growing Convention and its boards and agencies. In 1917 the Convention revised its constitution and created an executive committee assigned the task of directing all the work being nurtured by the Convention. The executive committee became the primary agent for carrying out the will of the Convention as expressed in its annual meetings. The committee as it developed included the officers elected by the Convention, a representative from each of the boards, and a representative from each state.

Through the 20th century, the Southern Baptists expanded throughout the United States and became both a national body and the nation's largest Protestant group. With the opening of a church in Vermont in 1964, it finally had churches in all 50 states. Although membership is still concentrated in the South, its greatest expansion in recent decades has occurred outside the South. Through the first decades of the 20th century, Southern Baptists operated under a comity agreement with Northern Baptists to limit competition. However, in 1942 such comity came to an end. Both Northern Baptists (now the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.) and Southern Baptists realized that, given the congregational nature of their movements, they could exercise little control over the movements, or the desire for affiliation of local Baptist churches. It was also the case that the two groups were developing distinct theological differences with the Southern group assuming a distinctly more conservative stance.

During its first generation, Southern Baptist missionary activity was concentrated in China and Africa. The expansion of work into Roman Catholic Italy in 1870 signaled the beginning of an era of growth. Through the rest of the century, missions were opened in Mexico, Brazil, and Japan. Through the 20th century, work expanded into more than 90 countries worldwide. In the decades since World War II, the Convention has also faced the problems of the ending of colonialism and the growth of former missions into autonomous churches. In many cases these changes have led to a reorientation of Southern Baptist participation with former mission churches in new partnership relations. However, the commitment to global evangelism remains, and in 2005 the Convention supported 5,100 full-time missionary personnel overseas.

The Convention did not found seminaries, but gradually adopted seminaries founded independently by Southern Baptists. As of 2000 it supported six seminaries in the United States. It also sponsors 52 colleges and universities and provides support for more than 100 colleges and seminaries overseas.

Like Baptists in general, Southern Baptists accept the Bible as their definitive creed, but they have periodically published summaries of the major beliefs that focus their faith. In 1925, in the midst of attacks on the Convention by its most fundamentalist wing, the convention adopted a doctrinal statement called "The Baptist Faith and Message" (revised in 1963). This statement served through most of the 20th century. In the last half of the century, however, Southern Baptists became increasingly embroiled in a controversy between its more conservative evangelical wing and its more moderate wing. This controversy threatened to split the Convention, and in the 1990s several structures, such as the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship and the Alliance of Baptists, were established to consolidate the interests of the moderates, who had become a minority within the Convention. Much of the controversy has swelled around the seminaries, whose professors have continually been the source of liberal theological perspectives. The primary issue has been biblical authority: conservatives have tended to make affirmation of the inerrancy of the Bible (the belief that the Bible is without error on all matters about which it speaks) a test for holding a leadership position within the Convention. The controversy also led the Southern Baptists to withdraw from the World Baptist Alliance.

The Southern Baptists grew spectacularly through most of the 20th century. That growth was in part due to their decision to follow members from the South who had migrated to other parts of the United States and become a national church. Aggressively evangelistic, Southern Baptists experienced membership increases that steadily pushed it to the front of the Protestant community and eventually ahead of the Methodists to become the largest Protestant church in the United States, second only to the Roman Catholic Church (which has been the largest American Church since the mid-1840s). In 2006 it reported 16,300,000 members in more than 44,000 churches.

Southern Baptist Convention Executive Committee
901 Commerce St., Ste. 750
Nashville, TN 37203

Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board
PO Box 6767
Richmond, VA 23230

Southern Baptist Home Missions Board
1350 Spring St., NW
Atlanta, GA 30367
<http://www.sbcnet.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: American Baptist Association; American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A.; Baptists; Cooperative Baptist Fellowship.

References

- Baker, Robert A., ed. A Baptist Source Book. Nashville: Broadman, 1966.
- Dockery, David S. Southern Baptist Consensus and Renewal: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Proposal. Nashville: B & H Academic, 2008.
- Encyclopedia of Southern Baptists*. 4 vols. Nashville: Broadman, 1958–1971.

Fletcher, Jesse C. The Southern Baptist Convention: A Sesquicentennial History. Nashville: Broadman, 1994.

Hastings, C. Brownlow. Introducing Southern Baptists: Their Faith and Their Life. New York: Paulist, 1981.

Sutton, Jerry. The Baptist Reformation: The Conservative Resurgence in the Southern Baptist Convention. Nashville: Broadman & Holman Publishers, 2000.

■ Spain

Spain is located at the southwestern corner of Europe and, together with Portugal, forms the Iberian Peninsula. Part of the Spanish territory, however, is extrapeninsular—namely, the Balearic Islands, the Canary Islands, and the autonomous cities of Ceuta and Melilla, at the northern coast of Africa. The capital city is Madrid, at the center of the peninsula; it is also the largest city in the country and an important economic and industrial center. Politically, Spain is organized as a regional state, not equivalent to but in practice not very dissimilar from a federal state. There are 17 autonomous regions (comunidades autónomas) with their respective legislatures and executive powers, as well as with their respective capital cities; to them we should add Ceuta and Melilla, two autonomous cities with a special status and lesser competences than ordinary regions.

The population of Spain is estimated at approximately 46 million, and according to the National Institute of Statistics (www.ine.es) approximately 10 percent are immigrants, especially from Latin America, Eastern Europe, and Northern Africa. There are no official statistics about religion in Spain, but questions about religion or belief are included in the monthly surveys (barómetros) performed by the Center of Sociological Research (a public agency: www.cis.es). The figures of the last surveys show that between 75 and 80 percent of Spaniards recognize themselves as Catholic; around 17 to 20 percent declare themselves atheists or agnostics, and less than 2 percent as faithful of other religions.

The official and dominant language is Spanish, which is spoken by the virtual entirety of the native population and legal aliens; there is bilingualism in some regions that possess a historical autochthonous language, especially Catalonia, Pays Basque, Galicia, Balearic Islands, and Valencia. Ethnically Spain has been traditionally quite uniform (white Caucasian, to follow the usual North American terminology), with the exception of a small percentage of Gypsy population, especially abundant in the south, Madrid, and Barcelona, with a total estimated population of 650,000 (data provided by the Spanish Ministry of Education and Culture; <http://www.mepsyd.es/politica-social/inclusion-social/poblacion-gitana.html>, accessed March 11, 2009). Although white predominance still clearly subsists, the panorama has changed with the increasing immigration coming from Latin America and Africa (especially Morocco), which has introduced a relatively large population of Andean, Afro-American (above all from Dominican Republic), and Arabic ethnic origin; the change is particularly visible in the large cities. Spain is economically a well developed country and possesses a diversified economy in the three sectors (but tourism is definitely a major source of income for the country). The unemployment rate has dramatically increased recently—in March 2009 it got close to 3.5 million, that is, around 15 percent.

Religion in the History of Spain: 1st–15th Centuries

When Christianity began, the Iberian Peninsula was already part of the Roman Empire; with the exception of some northern territories, Spanish people had been deeply Romanized. An old tradition affirmed that the Peninsula was evangelized by Apostle Saint James the Greater (this tradition was the basis for the development of the Way of Saint James, or Camino de Santiago, in the Middle Ages). Although historical research has cast serious doubts on the reliability of this tradition, it is certain that conversion to Christianity was a relatively rapid process in Roman Hispania, notwithstanding the persecutions of Christians ordered by different Roman emperors. By the late third century Christianity was deeply rooted in the population and Spain was producing mature theologians.

Since 409 Spain was invaded by different “barbaric” peoples from Central and Northern Europe. By the fall of the Western Roman Empire, in 476, the Visigoths constituted the dominant kingdom in the Peninsula; Visigoths were a minority in comparison with Hispano-Roman population but they were the rulers of the territory. The kingdom's religion was a matter strongly controlled by the king. In the late sixth century the Visigoths converted from Arianism—a Christian heresy—to Roman Catholicism. The initiative was taken by King Reccared, and the Third Council of Toledo (589) was the instrument for the conversion of Arian bishops and the integration of both ecclesiastical hierarchies. The councils of Toledo, convoked by the king but presided by an archbishop, dealt both with religious and political issues, and were an important means to organize the coexistence between Visigoths and Hispano-Romans. During the seventh century, the Catholic Church gave political cohesion to the Visigothic monarchy and made significant contributions to the Spanish cultural development, with Saint Isidore of Seville as the central figure of that period.

In 711 the Visigothic Kingdom of Spain fell under the Muslims' invasion. The Muslims conquered almost the whole Iberian Peninsula—which they called Al-Andalus—in an astonishingly rapid military campaign. The Islamic rulers substituted for the Christian rulers. In the 750s an Umayyad emirate, independent from Damascus, was established in Cordoba; the golden age of Islam in Spain came when the Cordoba emirate was transformed into a caliphate in 929. From the early eighth century, the Spanish political history is, to a great extent, the history of the struggles between Islamic kingdoms and Christian kingdoms. The latter finally took over the entire Peninsula in the late 15th century; this was the end of the eight-century period called the Reconquest (Reconquista). In those centuries, the degrees of religious tolerance, or intolerance, in Christian and Islamic territories, respectively, varied according to political and cultural circumstances. Overt persecution of the faithful of the other religion was not the rule but rather the exception. However, despite some recent idealization of the coexistence of the three monotheistic religions in Islamic territories, there was nothing comparable with a contemporary notion of religious freedom. To be Christian in a territory governed by Muslims (mozárabe), and vice versa (mudéjar), usually entailed remarkable discrimination with regard to the people's legal and economic status. This fact often stimulated conversions on both sides, although coerced conversion was rare.

On the other hand, there were important settlements of Jewish people in Spain at least since the late first century, after the great diaspora following the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 CE. Significantly, the Hebrew name of Spain, Sepharad, gives name to the Jewish branch of Sephardim. Their relationships with the Catholic Church do not seem to have been friendly, as demonstrated by some anti-Jewish provisions of the Council of Iliberis (Granada) in the early fourth century. The Arian period of the Visigothic monarchy opened a period of tolerance and an amelioration of the situation of Jews. However, shortly after the kingdom's conversion to Roman Catholicism in 589, new persecutions and measures against Jews came. During the first period of the Islamic domination in Spain (8th to 11th centuries) Jewish people could live and develop peacefully, particularly in southern Spain.

After the fall of the Caliphate of Cordoba, which disintegrated into taifas, or petty kingdoms, at the end of the 1020s, and especially after Northern African peoples (Almoravids and Almohads) took control of the Muslim territories in Spain in the late 11th century, there was a massive immigration of Jewish population to the Christian kingdoms, where they could find better living conditions. Some Jews fled out of Spain, including Maimonides, who was one of the leading philosophical figures of the 12th century. In Christian territories, until the late 15th century, the situation of Jews oscillated between tolerance and persecution. More often than not, they were subject to discriminatory measures, but it was frequent to find Jewish people occupying important positions in the world of culture, finance, and—sometimes—politics, as had happened also in the Cordoba caliphate. They played a central role in the School of Translators of Toledo, which constituted, in the 12th century, a unique environment of intercommunication between Christian, Islamic, and Jewish cultures, and contributed substantially to the rediscovery of ancient Greek philosophy in medieval Europe. However, ecclesiastical pressure determined that, in the long run, anti-Semitic policy prevailed in Spain. The paradox is that the Catholic Church that urged the persecution of Jews was the same church that promoted the mendicant orders; built the magnificent Romanic and Gothic cathedrals, so full of spirituality; and impelled the foundation of the great European universities in the Lower Middle Ages, which paved the way for the Renaissance (Salamanca was one of the first and most significant European universities).

Good Friday procession with people in traditional hooded dress, Malaga, Spain. (Thomas Payne/Dreamstime.com)

Religion in the History of Spain: 15th–20th Centuries It is usually assumed that the constitution of Spain as a modern state and nation began in the late 15th century. In 1492, Queen Isabella of Castile and King Ferdinand of Aragon, married in 1469, conquered the Nasrid kingdom of Granada, thus making a unified kingdom of Spain (in reality it was a plurality of kingdoms with a common monarch until the Decree of Nueva Planta in 1716). Significantly, Isabella and Ferdinand are known as the “Catholic monarchs” (reyes Católicos), because the spreading and strengthening of Catholicism formed one of their main goals in politics, both within the territory of the Spanish Peninsula as well as in the subsequent Spanish expansion in America. With them, the idea that Catholicism was part of the Spanish national identity became firmly established and remained—with manifold consequences and only a few breaks—until the late 20th century.

1492 was also a decisive year because of two other reasons: the first expedition of Christopher Columbus to America, which marked the beginning of the Spanish expansion in the New World and permitted the spreading of Christianity throughout an immense continent; and the expulsion of Spanish Jews, shortly followed by the expulsion of Muslims, in 1502. Jews, like Muslims, had to choose between conversion to Catholicism or exile. This led to a new diaspora of Sephardim Jews (around 200,000 people left the kingdom); some of them immigrated to America, but the largest part spread all over the Mediterranean countries. Most Muslims remained in Spain and converted—sincerely or insincerely—to Catholicism.

For Queen Isabella, like for the Emperor-King Charles I (1516–1556) and his son Philip II (1556–1598), religious unity was an essential element of political unity in Spain. In their foreign policy, as in their domestic policy, they were endeavoring to build a great Catholic empire. This idea led them to fight for the purity of Catholic doctrine in the Iberian Peninsula, to urge an intense and prompt evangelization of indigenous peoples in America, and to fight against the advance of Protestantism in Europe. Indeed, the support of Charles I and Philip II, as well as the contribution of a considerable number of Spanish bishops and theologians, were essential for the development of the Council of Trent.

The main instrument utilized by the Spanish monarchy to guarantee the kingdom's religious unity was the Spanish Inquisition, founded in 1478 by Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand with papal approval. Since the very beginning the institution was controlled almost entirely by the Spanish monarchy, which put the Inquisition in the hands of the Dominican Order. Initially, the Spanish Inquisition's main goal was to discover and punish insincere converts from Judaism (contemptuously called marranos) or from Islam. After the Lutheran Reformation, the extirpation of the first Protestant cells in Spain was also a main objective. The Spanish Inquisition was particularly active during the 15th and 16th centuries (although it was abolished only in 1848). It conducted its procedures against heresy often with extreme harshness and sometimes cruelty, although seemingly with no more cruelty than the Anglican and Calvinist institutions. The Spanish Inquisition's procedures always followed the same pattern and were carefully recorded. They frequently ended with an auto de fe—a public ceremony, presided over by ecclesiastical and secular authorities, in which humiliated repentant sinners acknowledged their mistakes and pertinacious heretics were severely punished, sometimes publicly burned to death at the stake. The purpose of autos de fe was to show the power of the Inquisition (also called Holy Office) and to deter people from incurring heretical beliefs.

The Inquisition's activity impeded the development of Protestantism in Spain. In the mid-16th century there were Lutheran communities of some significance in Seville and in Valladolid (the former gained a certain momentum among popular classes, the latter involved rather the social and intellectual elites). The nobility of the Kingdom of Navarre received the influence of Calvinism—with some episodes of intolerance toward Catholic practices—especially during the second half of the 16th century. However, the Inquisition repressed steadily and efficiently their activities and proselytism; the autos de fe celebrated in Seville and Valladolid in 1559 were particularly famous and important, but there were many others through the rest of the century. This fact determined that Protestantism was virtually nonexistent in Spain from the late 16th century or the early 17th century until the 19th century.

A similar inquisitorial policy was applied in the vice kingdoms of America. However, we must not forget that the Inquisition was an instrument of the monarchy and was not representative of the Spanish church's attitude as a whole. On the contrary, there were frequent conflicts and tension between the Spanish Inquisition, run by the Dominicans, and the rest of ecclesiastical institutions—including the popes. On the other hand, it was due to the influence of the Catholic Church that the Spanish colonization of America was probably the most humane of all the enterprises of the kind developed by other European kingdoms at that time (the so-called black legend has emphasized the negative aspects of Spanish intervention in the New World; but the fact is that, in comparative terms, no other colonization in history has produced such interracial societies as the ones existing in Latin America). The church was sincerely interested in the evangelization of the new continent. Most of the evangelists were members of religious orders and many of them—like Bartolomé de las Casas—defended vigorously the in-indigenous peoples' rights. In particular, the "reductions" established by Jesuits reached the very heart of numerous indigenous civilizations and, along with evangelization, performed a cultural and educational work of extraordinary efficiency; indeed, the expulsion of Jesuits from Spanish territories, decreed in 1767 by King Charles III, did a serious harm to the indigenous cause. The School of Salamanca, and particularly Francisco de Vitoria, a Dominican himself, who is considered the founder of international law, provided an important philosophical and theological support for the Indians' rights, and consequently for the spiritual and cultural work of religious orders in America.

The evolution of Christianity in Spain and Spanish America was, therefore, fundamentally Catholic. The religious unity of Spain received an additional impulse in 1609 with the expulsion of moriscos, Moors apparently converted to Catholicism but who, in a considerable percentage, had preserved their tradition, culture, and beliefs. Around 400,000 people left the country. This fact, as with the expulsion of Jews in 1492 (and like, probably, the prohibition and persecution of Protestantism), caused irreparable damage to the Spanish economy and culture.

From the late 15th century until 1978, Catholicism was the official religion of the Spanish state, with only two ephemeral interruptions. The Catholic Church was never a state church in the technical sense, but Spain was a confessional state. Through the 19th and 20th centuries, almost all the numerous Spanish constitutions proclaimed Catholicism as the official religion of the country (including the Constitution of 1812, which introduced the principles of liberalism in Spain). The two exceptions were the Constitution of 1869 (derogated in 1876) and the Republican Constitution of 1931 (derogated in 1939).

As in other European Catholic states, Spain's consolidation as a modern state and an absolute monarchy was accompanied by the typical characteristics of regalism. There was a reciprocal support and concession of privileges between church and state. Essentially, the state guaranteed the Catholicism of the country and granted certain economic privileges to the church, which enjoyed an enormous social and cultural influence in the kingdom and in the American territories. In turn, the monarchy obtained political support from the ecclesiastical authorities and benefited from certain prerogatives on ecclesiastical matters (iura maiestatica circa sacra), especially the power to control the appointment of bishops as well as the ecclesiastical laws to be applied in its territory. On the other hand, we must not lose sight that in Spain, until the second half of the 20th century, the ecclesiastical institutions took care, to a great extent, of some assignments that are considered today part of the welfare state's typical competences, in particular education, charity, and hospitals. The cooperation between church and state was materialized in the Concordats of 1717, 1737, 1753, 1851, and 1953.

In the long run the state became the strongest part of this bilateral relationship, as occurred in other European regalist states and in other analogous regimes in Protestant areas. This produced an increasing tension between secular and ecclesiastical authorities. The penetration of Enlightenment ideas in Spain reinforced the position of the monarchy and led to the expulsion of Jesuits under Charles III in 1767 (supported by most Spanish bishops). A similar attitude, together with obvious economic interests, inspired the state's massive confiscation of a great part of the immense ecclesiastical properties in Spain in the 19th century (desamortización, or confiscation of mortmain property), which was particularly intense between 1834 and 1855. In addition, ecclesiastical taxes—another important source of income for the Catholic Church—were suppressed in 1841. As a consequence, the church became economically dependent on the state, a fact that modified substantially their relationship in the future.

From the Second Republic to General Franco's Regime The status quo experienced a dramatic change in 1931, when the Second Republic was declared. The 1931 Constitution proclaimed formally the freedom of religion and conscience, but the Constitution itself and the subsequent legislation adopted a markedly hostile regulation of religious institutions, which severely restricted the Catholic Church's freedom without actually creating an environment of freedom for other religious denominations. Hostility replaced cooperation. The dominant sentiment in some Republican governments—particularly at the beginning and at the end of the Republic—was not freedom but rather revenge, with the explicit intention of terminating the Catholic Church's mighty social and cultural influence on Spanish life. The excessive anti-ecclesiastical reaction led to opposite reactions on the other side. Spanish society became divided in two halves from the religious perspective. This fact seriously disturbed social peace—above all when the radical leftist parties formed the government in 1936—and was one of the main causes of the Civil War (1936–1939). Thus, the effects of the Second Republic experience were not limited to merely constituting a parenthesis in the Catholic tradition of the Spanish state; the intransigence of the main political forces and their inability to agree on a common project paved the way for a three-year civil war, which led to the dictatorship of General Francisco Franco, who ruled the country until his death in 1975.

Francisco's regime returned to the confessional state—in a “hard” version—and was decidedly supported by the Catholic hierarchy until the 1960s. This new age of church-state close collaboration, expressed in the 1953 Concordat with the Holy See, has been often called “National Catholicism,” for the identification between nation and religion was again a substantial part of public policies, especially inside the country; of course, Catholicism was not the only element of ideological cohesion in Franco’s regime, but religion provided a sort of “historical legitimacy” to the dictator. The natural consequence was intolerance of other religions, stimulated or consented by the Catholic Church, whose official doctrine still proposed the confessional state as the ideal regime; religious non-Catholic worship was permitted only in private. In practice, the effects of this religious intolerance were particularly detrimental for other Christian churches. Spaniards of the Islamic and Jewish religions resided mainly in the Spanish territories in Northern Africa (Protectorado Español de Marruecos), where they enjoyed a specific legal status, more favorable than that of the non-Catholics living in the Peninsula.

The paradox is that the first manifestation of religious tolerance by Franco’s regime—the 1967 Law of Religious Freedom—was impelled by the Catholic Church, which had changed some of its basic views on church-state relations in the Second Vatican Council’s Declaration Dignitatis humanae. In addition, in the late 1960s some influential Spanish bishops were overtly willing to create a new framework for the relationships between the church and Franco’s dictatorship, which was noticeably in the latter’s final stage. The 1967 law put an end to religious intolerance in Spain and provided real legal status to non-Catholic religious denominations; it was certainly based upon a restrictive notion of religious freedom, but probably no more restrictive—and perhaps less—than the concept of other fundamental rights and public liberties in the Spanish political context of the time.

Present-day Situation: Religion in Spanish Society

From a sociological perspective it is difficult to provide precise numbers, for in Spain there are no official statistics about religion, and the estimations of the adherents to the different religions are based on non-official surveys or on the data provided by the religious denominations. In any event, it is undisputed that the Catholic Church is the religion of the vast majority of the Spanish population. As indicated before, and taking into account the average results of the surveys conducted by the Center for Sociological Research, about 80 percent of the Spanish population recognize themselves as Catholics, while less than 2 percent identify themselves as members of other religions, and 18 percent declare not to have any religion. The Spanish cities of Ceuta and Melilla, located on the coast of Northern Africa, constitute a particular case because of the clearly more visible presence of an Islamic population. In these enclaves a systematic calculation was done in 1986 by the National Institute of Statistics, with the result that the percentage of Muslims was 18 percent in Ceuta and 32 percent in Melilla (12,000 and 17,000 people, respectively—these are small cities); current non-systematic estimations, based on names registered in the city census and in schools, usually provide a percentage of nearly 40 percent of adults and 60 percent of minors. The overall figures about the percentage of Catholics in Spain correspond by and large to other data concerning the religious choices of citizens. Thus, approximately 75 to 80 percent of parents demand Catholic instruction for their children in pre-university schools, and this percentage has been stable in the last years (these data combine the information related to public and private schools; source: Spanish Bishops Conference, www.conferenciaepiscopal.es). The percentage of Catholic marriages, instead, has been experiencing a decline in recent years: from 76 percent of the total number of marriages in Spain in 2000 to 63 percent in 2004, and 55 percent in 2007 (last available data; source: National Institute of Statistics, www.ines.es); data concerning marriage, however, must be interpreted in the light of the indissolubility of Catholic marriage—after a civil divorce, a Catholic cannot remarry before the church unless an ecclesiastical court declares that his or her previous canonical marriage was null and void according to canon law.

The Catholic Church still retains a powerful social influence, although public morals are much less rooted in the Catholic doctrine than in the past. Like in other European countries with a traditional majority church, there is an increasing trend in Spain—even among people who define themselves as Catholic—toward living openly according to ethical rules not entirely coincident with official Catholic morals, and toward a less close relationship with the ecclesiastical establishment. The number of clergymen and members of religious orders has decreased in comparison with the 1960s, but the figures seem stabilized since the mid-1980s (around 20,000 priests and more than 200 ordinations per year). At the same time, there is a remarkable number of charitable institutions and NGOs of Catholic inspiration, with numerous young volunteers.

With regard to the number of faithful of other religions, there is no doubt that religious pluralism has been increasing in Spain in the last decades. However, the numbers provided by sociological surveys do not correspond so closely to the data offered by religious denominations, and this suggests that either some of the latter figures may be somewhat higher than reality, or the surveys are not precise enough, or some people of religions other than Catholic feel reluctant to give true answers in officially conducted surveys. The number of Jews is deemed to be between 30,000 and 40,000. The Evangelical Federation, which is supposed to gather the most significant Protestant communities in Spain, counts 1.2 million members according to their own estimations; many of them are permanent residents that came from other European countries. The Islamic leaders claim that the current Muslim population is close to 1 million, most of them immigrants from Islamic countries. An imprecise, but not insignificant, number of Muslim communities are not integrated into the Islamic Federation that signed a cooperation agreement with the state in 1992, and the same happens with Jewish and Protestant communities. In addition, the Christian Orthodox population has noticeably risen in the last years, especially because of emigration from Eastern European countries with religious Orthodox predominance; Orthodox sources maintain that their faithful in Spain exceed 1 million; in any event, the number of legal immigrants from predominantly Orthodox countries is currently estimated around 700,000 (of which Romanians are, by far, the largest community). Jehovah's Witnesses claim to be 200,000, including active members as well as "sympathizers," and the Mormon Church affirms to have around 40,000 faithful. The number of Buddhists is, according to the Buddhist Spanish Federation, in the range of 60,000.

The Legal Framework of Religion in Spain The current legal and political framework of religion in Spain was designed by the Constitution promulgated in 1978, which transformed the preceding regime into a democratic state that meets entirely the standards of freedom characteristic of Western democracies and international law. In the years that followed, the Spanish state signed the most relevant international documents regarding human rights, including the European Convention of Human Rights. Spanish society, in its largest part, accepted rapidly and enthusiastically the new model of political life. The increasing religious pluralism of society is no longer seen by Spaniards as a negative reality, or as contrary to the Spanish traditional identity, but rather as the normal effect of freedom. Religion has ceased to be, for the first time in centuries, a source of social and political conflicts.

The 1978 Constitution abandoned the traditional confessionality of the state. The constitutional framework of religion is now based upon four fundamental principles: religious freedom, equality, neutrality, and cooperation. The state protects the exercise of freedom of religion and conscience by every individual and group. All citizens are equal before the law and therefore no one can be subjected to discrimination on the ground of his or her religion or beliefs. Neutrality determines that the state has no official religion and is not competent to evaluate the different religious groups according to their doctrines or tenets; it may only judge their social effects. However, there is no strict separation between state and religion; on the contrary, the Constitution provides that "the public authorities shall take into account the beliefs of Spanish society and maintain the consequent relationships of cooperation with the Catholic Church and the other religious denominations."

The constitutional right to religious freedom was developed by a statute enacted in 1980, the Organic Law on Religious Freedom (Ley Orgánica de Libertad Religiosa), which contains the basic legal framework for religious freedom and for the legal status of religious denominations. One of the declared legislative projects of the current government (2009) is the reform of this law, after the experience of almost 30 years, and following an ongoing process of consultation with the main religious denominations operating in Spain.

State cooperation with religious communities has been channeled especially through formal agreements that are aimed at providing a specific legal status for the most significant religions in Spain. Thus, in 1979 the old Concordat was replaced by a set of four agreements with the Holy See that, in fact, altogether constitute a Concordat and are assimilated to international treaties under Spanish law. The purpose of those agreements was to preserve those benefits that the Catholic Church had traditionally enjoyed and were deemed compatible with the new constitutional principles: for example, civil effects of canonical marriage, religious education in public schools as an optional subject for students, but mandatory for the schools, financial support and tax exemptions, protection of the clergy-communicant privilege, religious assistance in the military, and hospitals or penitentiaries. Many of these benefits have been subsequently granted also to some of the main religious minorities in Spain, in particular to those of more historical significance, when the Spanish state signed, in 1992, three agreements of cooperation with the federations, respectively, of evangelical churches, Jewish communities, and Islamic communities (note that these were the very same religions persecuted by the Spanish monarchy five centuries ago). The possibility of such cooperation agreements, until then reserved for the Catholic Church, was opened by the 1980 Organic Law on Religious Freedom.

If we leave aside state cooperation, which is at the moment restricted to religious denominations with a cooperation agreement, all religious groups are recognized the same basic freedom once they have acquired legal identity in Spanish law through registration in the Registry of Religious Entities. The procedure of registration is, in principle, quick and simple. No minimum number of faithful or minimum number of years in Spain is required, just some essential identification data and expression of the “religious purpose” of the applicant group. However, some groups have experienced difficulties being accepted by the Registry as properly religious in nature, and have had to resort to the courts to be granted access to registration. This has occurred in particular with the Unification Church and the Church of Scientology, whose access to registration, denied by the administrative authorities in charge of the Registry, was granted by the courts, respectively, in 2001 and 2007; these judicial decisions have made the registration procedure even easier than it was before.

Registration as such, however, does not entitle a group to state cooperation, which, as indicated above, is currently restricted to the Catholic Church and to those other religious denomination that, after being recognized by the public authorities as having “well-known roots” in Spain, have reached a formal agreement with the state, that is, the three aforementioned federations of Protestant, Jewish, and Islamic communities. On the other hand, these federations, together with the Catholic Church, represent a high percentage of the Spanish population, and this is one of the reasons why the present state of things is often considered satisfactory, in the sense that—it is said—state cooperation with religion reaches the vast majority of the population. This being true, the problem is that the sociological situation has kept changing over the years, and the percentage of the population represented by religious denominations left out of the agreements system—and therefore out of all state cooperation—has rapidly increased. According to the figures indicated before, if we take together the ever-growing Christian Orthodox community, the Jehovah’s Witnesses, the Buddhists, the Latter-day Saints, as well as the Protestant, Jewish, and Muslim communities not integrated into the federations with formal agreement, we observe that there are denominations representing at least a population of 1 million that are totally excluded from state cooperation.

It is undeniable that, viewed in the context of Spanish history, the existing problems are relatively unimportant but, still, we can say that the current Spanish system of relations between state and religion can be perfected. This is, indeed, the opinion of the religious denominations themselves. The Catholic Church sometimes argues that the Spanish state does not fulfill adequately some of its obligations derived from the 1979 Concordat (its contribution to preserve the historical property of ecclesiastical origin, which is immense and precious, or the implementation of the provisions regarding Catholic instruction in public schools). However, the main claims are those relating to the consequences of the constitutional principle of equality. Thus, the Evangelical, Jewish, and Islamic federations

Spain

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	33,017,000	40,871,000	90.6	1.32	41,302,000	40,460,000
Roman Catholics	33,596,000	41,630,000	92.3	0.90	41,454,000	40,345,000
Independents	37,100	295,000	0.7	2.35	400,000	450,000
Marginals	40,900	210,000	0.5	0.87	280,000	320,000
Agnostics	605,000	3,050,000	6.8	3.63	3,820,000	4,213,000
Atheists	140,000	490,000	1.1	1.19	550,000	600,000
Muslims	5,000	620,000	1.4	6.95	850,000	1,000,000
Buddhists	0	47,000	0.1	4.19	60,000	75,000
Jews	8,500	15,000	0.0	1.53	15,000	15,000
Baha'is	3,900	14,000	0.0	1.35	25,000	35,000
Sikhs	0	1,400	0.0	1.53	1,800	2,500
Total population	33,779,000	45,108,000	100.0	1.53	46,623,000	46,401,000

that signed the 1992 agreements aspire to obtain a complete equalization with the Catholic Church's legal treatment, particularly with regard to the state's financial support, and also to ameliorate their legal status in other areas such as religious education in public schools, access to public mass media, or religious assistance in military centers, hospitals, and detention centers. Three other significant religious minorities—Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Buddhists—have recognized “well-known roots” in Spain but do not have the hope of being accepted to a negotiation process leading to a cooperation agreement with the state in the next years; consequently, they claim that the state should, at least, grant them some of the legal and economic benefits already at the disposal of the denominations with a cooperation agreement. Finally, the religious denominations registered in the Registry of Religious Entities argue that they are totally excluded from any possibility of state cooperation and that the effects of the legal personality recognized to a religious denomination do not differ much, in practice, from the legal personality recognized to ordinary associations. These are some of the reasons that have led to the current governmental project (2009) to reform the 1980 Law on Religious Freedom. At this time, the result of this legislative project is still uncertain.

Javier Martínez-Torron

See also: Arius; Jehovah's Witnesses; Roman Catholic Church; Spanish Evangelical Church; Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church.

References

History:

- Cuenca Toribio, José Manuel. Relaciones Iglesia-Estado en la España contemporánea (1833–1985). 2nd ed. Madrid: Alhambra, 1989.
- García Villoslad, Ricardo, ed. Historia de la Iglesia en España. 7 vols. Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1979–1982.
- Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino. Historia de los Heterodoxos Españoles. 3 vols. 3rd ed. Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1992.
- Meyerson, Mark D., and Edward D. English, eds. Christians, Muslims, and Jews in Medieval and Early Modern Spain: Interaction and Cultural Change. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Payne, Stanley G. Spanish Catholicism: An Historical Overview. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.
- Religion in Spain at Present:*
- Ferreoro, Juan. State-Religion Relations in Spain: Legal and Constitutional Framework. In Legal Aspects of Religious Freedom. Ljubljana: Office of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Religious Communities, 2008.
- Ferrer Ortiz, Javier, ed. Derecho Eclesiástico del Estado español. 6th ed. Pamplona, Spain: Eunsa, 2007.

Garcimartín Montero, Carmen. "Direct Financing of the Religious Denominations in Spain." Journal of Church and State 48, no. 1 (2006): 175–196.

General Directorate of Relations with Religious Denominations (Dirección General de Relaciones con las Confesiones), Ministry of Justice, Spain. http://www.mjusticia.es/cs/Satellite?c=OrgPaginaMJ&cid=1213946265540&pagename=Portal_del_ciudadano%2FOrgPaginaMJ%2FTpl_OrgPaginaMJ.

Hera, Alberto de la. "Relations with Religious Minorities: The Spanish Model." Brigham Young University Law Review (1998): 387ff.

Lopez Garcíá, Bernabé, et al. Arrraigados: minorías religiosas en la Comunidad de Madrid. Madrid: Icaria 2007.

Mantecón, Joaquín. Islam in Spain. In The Legal Treatment of Islamic Minorities in Europe. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, 2004.

Martínez-Torrón, Javier. "Religious Freedom and Democratic Change in Spain." Brigham Young University Law Review 777 (2006).

Morán Garcíá, Gloria. "The Spanish System on Church and State." Brigham Young University Law Review 535 (1995).

Oliva, Javier G. "Religious Freedom in Transition: Spain." Religion, State and Society 36, no. 3 (2008): 269ff.

Rstruch, Joan, et al. Las otras religiones: minorías religiosas en Cataluña. Madrid: Icaria, 2007.

Seglers, Alex. "Religious Education in the Spanish School System." Journal of Church and State 46, no. 561 (2004).

tionals of the Union Ibero-Evangelists, it adopted the present designation. In 1953 the Methodist Church of Catalonia and Balears (which had resulted from the activity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now an integral part of the United Methodist Church) joined the Spanish Evangelical Church. The Spanish Evangelical Church follows the pattern of democratic structure and has a presbyterian-synodal model for administration. The local church or congregation is the basic unit or cell of the Spanish Evangelical Church. Its organization comprises, among others, an elders council for each local church or congregation, a presbytery for each region, and regional synods. Every two years a General Assembly or Synod of the entire church in Spain is held.

Presently, the Spanish Evangelical Church has 58 places of worship (38 churches and 20 missionary centers) in 22 Spanish cities, which gather some 3,000 believers. Local communities meet around the reading and teaching of the Word of God (the Bible) as the central element of the service. The Last Supper and baptism are considered sacraments that help the believer in the expression and comprehension of the spiritual realities of the Christian faith. In addition, the Spanish Evangelical Church celebrates pastoral ordination, confirmation, marriage blessing, and burial as rites of religious significance.

For state legal purposes, the Spanish Evangelical Church is integrated in the Federation of Religious Evangelical Entities of Spain (FEREDE), which signed an Agreement of Cooperation with the Spanish government in 1992. The purpose of that agreement is to facilitate the exercise of religious freedom to the signatory religious entities and to establish mutual cooperation between the state and signatory religious entities.

The Spanish Evangelical Church runs several religious-oriented entities, among them the Seminary SEUT (Seminario Evangélico Unido de Teología), several evangelical schools (El Porvenir and Juan de Valdés), and elders houses in Santa Coloma de Gramanet (Catalonia), Madrid, and Palma de Mallorca.

In 1992 the FEREDE, on behalf of various Christian denominations in which the Spanish Evangelical Church is included, signed an Agreement of Cooperation with the Spanish government. That agreement has helped to ameliorate and regularize the legal status of

Spanish Evangelical Church

The Spanish Evangelical Church derives its doctrinal tenets from the 16th-century Protestant Reformation movement (Martin Luther and John Calvin) and from the Pietist movement of the 19th century (John Wesley). The first Assembly of the Church took place in 1869. It is one of the most ancient Protestant entities located in Spain.

In 1871 the name Spanish Christian Church was adopted. Subsequent to merging with the Congrega-the Evangelical Church and its sociological reputation after years of subtle misunderstandings and social prejudice.

The church is a member of the World Council of Churches.

Spanish Evangelical Church
Noviciado 5
E-28015 Madrid
Spain

Rafael Palomino

See also: Calvin, John; Luther, Martin; United Methodist Church; Wesley, John; World Council of Churches.

References

- De la Hera, Alberto, and Rosa M. Martínez de Codes. Spanish Legislation on Religious Affairs. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
- Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos. Guía de entidades religiosas de España. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 2004.
- Spanish Evangelical Church. <http://www.iee-es.org>. Accessed December 1, 2008.
- Vidal Regaliza, Daniel. La Iglesia Evangélica Española. Madrid: Centro Ecuménico Misioneras de la Unidad, 1976.

Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church belongs to the Anglican Communion and preserves the ancient Christian liturgy of the Visigoths and Mozarabs. It is the original Spanish expression inside the Anglican Communion.

The Spanish Reformed Church began in 1868 in Gibraltar, headed by Juan Bautista Cabrera, who was exiled from Spain during the reign of Isabella II, queen of the Spaniards (r. 1833–1868). After Isabella was ousted by the revolution of 1868, Cabrera returned to the country and founded the church in Seville. Between the years 1868 and 1880, the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church was associated with the wider Protestant movement (Spanish Reformed Church). In 1880, in a synod held in Seville, an autonomous and independent Episcopalian Church took shape. Bishop Cabrera was consecrated in 1894 through the cooperation of the Church of Ireland.

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church belongs to the worldwide Anglican Communion (since 1979) and to the World Council of Churches. The Spanish Episcopal Church holds a national biennial synod. It has published its official journal, La Luz, since 1869.

The Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church runs several religious-oriented entities, including the Seminary SEUT (Seminario Evangélico Unido de Teología), the Ecumenical Centre Villa Adelfos (Castellón), and Agrupación de Mujeres de la Iglesia Catedral del Redentor. The church oversees places of worship in 14 Spanish cities with approximately 1,500 members.

The church is currently led by the Right Reverend Carlos Lopez-Lozano. In 1992 the Federation of Religious Evangelical Entities of Spain, on behalf of various Christian denominations in which the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church is included, signed an Agreement of Cooperation with the Spanish government that facilitates the development of the church in Spanish society.

Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church
Calle dela Beneficiencia 18
E-28004 Madrid
Spain

Rafael Palomino

See also: Anglican Communion/Anglican Consultative Council; World Council of Churches.

References

- Andrés Puchades, Antonio. La Iglesia Española Reformada Episcopal. Madrid: Centro Ecuménico Misioneras de la Caridad, 1976.
- The Church of England Yearbook*. London: Church Publishing House, published annually.
- De la Hera, Alberto, and Rosa M. Martínez de Codes. Spanish Legislation on Religious Affairs. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 1998.
- Dirección General de Asuntos Religiosos. Guía de entidades religiosas de España. Madrid: Ministerio de Justicia, 2004.
- Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church. <http://www.anglicanos.org/>. Accessed December 1, 2008.

Spirit Possession

The concept of spirit possession is based on the belief that a human being can be entered by a nonmaterial entity endowed with a distinct identity, intellect, and will; the entity can make use of any and all of the faculties of the person's body. Typically, the entity will speak in its own voice using the vocal apparatus of the possessed person. However, other actions can also be attributed to the entity rather than to the "host." Effects of the phenomenon are received in a variety of ways by human cultures. In general, spirit possession is regarded as pathological, but in the case of deity oracles, possession can be placed at the service of the community.

Oracular possession is reported in a wide spectrum of cultures. The entity in these cases speaks through a medium on a more or less regular basis. Associated phenomena, implying varying degrees of "possession," may include the inspirational influence of deities such as the Muses on the creative arts, or prophetic inspiration, or frenzies and "enthusiasm." The Delphic oracle was a woman, the Pythia, who would sit within the temple of Apollo to be regularly consulted in all matters of importance. Apollo, though not alone among gods speaking through oracles, was particularly esteemed for this phenomenon. He would speak through the medium-oracles of Delphi, Didyma, Claros, and other places, who would go into a trance in order to channel the cryptic messages of the god. During the Persian Wars, for example, the Athenians were advised by the Delphic oracle to seek refuge in their "wooden walls"—which meant that they would be victorious against the Persians at sea with their ships. In the legends of the House of Atreus, the Delphic Oracle revealed that the sacrifice of Iphigenia, child of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, was required to calm the adverse winds stirred up by Poseidon so that the Argive fleet could attack Troy. In China and in some Indian Tantric lineages, oracles may be channeled by children over whom certain prayers are said; the child goes into a trance and delivers the message of the deity in the manner of a medium. It seems that the phenomenon of child oracles is related to the notion of a child chosen to embody a deity, such as the Kumari in Kathmandu; a child of a high-caste Newari family is chosen at an early age and only ceases to embody the goddess at the onset of menstruation.

The Tibetan state oracles are an excellent example of deity possession phenomena. There are at least two state oracles currently consulted by the Tibetan government in exile: the well-known Nechung Oracle and the lesser known Ga' Dong Oracle. Both of these oracles are still active at Dharamsala, the seat of the Tibetan government in exile. In each case, a monk is the regular medium or host for the deity. The monk, who wears an elaborate and extremely heavy set of vestments for the occasion, goes into a formal trance as the entity takes over his body. The Nechung Oracle delivers his messages in a very high-pitched, whispering voice; senior monks tape record the messages, which are quite long. In addition, other monks take notes of the messages, which are above all directed to His Holiness the Dalai Lama and are meant to guide official policy. For the benefit of the crowd, the deity disperses blessed barley grains that have been dyed red; these are especially valued for placement in luggage and shipping packages to protect from thieves and customs officials. After about 20 minutes, the trance ceases and the monk, exhausted by the ordeal, is carried out on the shoulders of a group of monks. The Ga' Dong Oracle goes into a trance after the Nechung, in a different location. The Ga' Dong is much more energetic and even wrathful in manifestation. The voice is deeper and more urgent, and the entire performance resembles the sacred dances of such deities as Mahakala. Barley grains dyed a deeper shade of red are dispersed to the crowd. Other auspicious rites accompany the manifestation of the oracles, such as the free distribution of sutra texts printed up by a donor.

Prophetic Possession Being seized or used by a deity is known in the Bible; Jeremiah uses very dramatic and even erotic language to describe the prophetic experience of divine "seduction" (Jeremiah 19:7). However, prophetic possession, similar to that recorded for other ancient cultures, is recorded in several passages of the Bible such as Judges 6:34, 2 Kings 3:15–16, and 1 Samuel 10:5. The Hebrew prophets were more usually allowed to ascend in spirit before the heavenly throne, there to hear the deliberations of the heavenly court in the presence of the God of Israel (1 Kings 22:19–23). The verdict of the court on the people, their rulers, and their times was handed over to the prophet to be delivered to the people regardless of the consequences as a “word of the Lord.” Thus ancient Israelite prophecy is typically presented as direct revelation given in a visionary experience rather than possession or frenzy. However, the Deuteronomist redactor of the Hebrew scriptures (Deuteronomy 18:10–11) is most likely the source for those passages that augment the differences between Israelite prophecy and prophecy in the cults of other local deities (1 Kings 18:20–40).

Mateena Shakyas, four, locally known as Kumari and considered a living goddess, looks on as she is carried on a palanquin escorted by priests and devotees to attend the horse race festival in Kathmandu, Nepal, March 26, 2009. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Shamanic possession trances, however, emerge within the repertory of healing performances typical of these “chosen” human beings with access to preternatural entities. The shaman is believed to be able to diagnose and cure illnesses using powers acquired from spirit guides, sometimes in animal form. The shaman (male or female) enters the “other world” in a state of trance (empowered by mind-altering drugs or rhythmic drumming) in order to encounter spirit guides and gain knowledge for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment. As in the case of prophets, the typology resembles inspiration or revelation more than possession. However, at times the shaman’s performance is that of an entranced, possessed person being used by deities or spirit guides to deliver a message. One of the more elaborate forms of the descent of a deity into the personality of a sacred reciter is the recitation of the Tibetan Epic of Gesar. In this case, the “deity” is Gesar or Vajrasattva, who descends (lha bab) into the body of the “singer of tales” in order to give the reciter the sacred words of the epic. Thus, an entire recital of the multivolume epic can take place over a period of more than a week. I was able to observe a small portion of such a recitation in eastern Tibet in 2000; in that case the chief lama of a remote monastery recited the epic in trance from a small booth equipped with loudspeakers; monks from his monastery performed the epic as a kind of drama, with makeup and elaborate costuming, some of which resembled the vestments of the state oracles. Since the Tibetan belief in reincarnate lamas implies a kind of “possession” of a body by a previously incarnated, enlightened master for a series of lifetimes, we might wish to mention it here as a form of lifelong possession at the service of a particular community.

Healing Practices Connected with Spirit Possession

Obeyesekere (The Medusa’s Hair) reports on possession phenomena in Sri Lanka, where marginalized women become mediums for deities that communicate messages to inquirers, particularly about divination and healing. The sign of a possessed person is one or more “dread locks” (jati), each of which represents one of the deities that descends into the medium from time to time to deliver messages. The phenomenon of marginalized people becoming mediums for deities is widespread, and seems to follow the ancient pattern of the “chosen one” who begins life as an ordinary or even low person, but by the power of a particular deity is “lifted up” to become an instrument by which the deity influences the lives of others, including more powerful others. There is therefore a strong socio-political component to these forms of possession.

Channeling and Mediumship In every civilization, including modernity, there have been mediums who perform so as to be believed in as channels for a variety of entities. In the United States, a number of mediums claim to be channeling ancient souls who have a message for modern times. Mediumship, particularly with regard to communication with the dead, has found a place in the “mass media” representing the latest expression of Spiritism, which grew in popularity in the United States during the 19th century, when even President and Mrs. Abraham Lincoln hosted séances at the White House during the Civil War years. In Italy, an association of laity with Catholic connections attempts to contact the dead in order to comfort the bereaved. The Institute of Noetic Sciences (IONS) has sponsored scientific research on channeling at its center in Petaluma, California.

Demonic Possession Demonic possession is reported in most human cultures. Typically, it is the result of a curse or spell, or of mediumship gone awry. Other explanations for demonic possession include the claim that the possessed person is a victim of some previous crime or sin; thus possession is a form of punishment, brought on by the spiritual vulnerability of an impure person. There are also instances of voluntary possession, in which a spiritual aspirant desires to acquire the power to overcome demons through undergoing the trial of possession. However, traditional exorcists in almost all world religions vigorously oppose the practices of mediumship and acquired possession. The reason for this is that demonic entities can interfere with the procedures followed by mediums, and there is no guarantee of a sound result of voluntary possession. As a result, the entities that are said to have been contacted are not in fact the beloved dead or purported “higher powers,” but demons imitating other entities. In time, these entities can bring deception, disease, financial ruin, mental confusion, possession, and death. In some instances, powerful demonic entities seem to have captivated the attention of large numbers of persons, only to disappear completely after a certain amount of harm was done. An example seems to have been the “Michael” entity of the 1970s in the New York City area. In Italy, the traditional practice of Christian exorcism has never completely died out and there are still experienced exorcists active within the Catholic Church. Research among these priests suggests that demonic possession is a distinct phenomenon, discernibly different from forms of mental illness.

Possession brings with it violent trance states, undiagnosable physical illnesses, imitations of mental illness, bodily deterioration, family discord, sexual dysfunction, and other destructive phenomena. The typical method for diagnosing possession is to engage in prayer in the presence of the victim; usually a trance state followed by various violent reactions is the response to simple prayers, even without the use of the formal Rite of Exorcism. The tradition insists on a number of criteria such as preternatural knowledge on the part of the demonic entity in order to authorize the use of the Rite of Exorcism. In practice, not all demons know multiple languages, nor do they all practice preternatural knowledge (prophecy or mind reading). It is crucial to have a good diagnostic survey done by an objective mental health specialist because some forms of psychosis also induce trance, changes of the voice, bodily distortions, and the like. The exorcist develops certain intuitive abilities over time that make it possible to detect a demonic presence even in the midst of chaotic performances that mimic other forms of dysfunction. Demonic possession is overcome through the spirituality of the exorcist, spiritual growth on the part of the possessed person, and the proper use of the Rite of Exorcism. The priest-exorcist works under obedience to the bishop or bishops who have appointed him to the task. Usually a network of prayer and spiritual support is necessary. It is also extremely helpful to instruct the victim in Christian doctrine because the victim's cooperation with the process of liberation is indispensable; often the experience of possession and liberation brings about a rapid development of holiness in the victim. Untreated possession, however, can lead to bodily death and spiritual collapse, since the goal of demonic entities is to degrade the human person.

In the case of Hindu and Buddhist exorcists, one notes a considerable body of convergence in diagnosis and methods of liberation with the traditional Christian, Jewish, Egyptian, shamanic, and Babylonian practices, even though the explanatory theological systems are divergent. Buddhists insist on a compassionate approach to the entities, knowing that sooner or later these beings will be reborn in the human condition and will be seeking liberation, whereas the Christian exorcist believes that these entities are eternally damned. Thus, the Christian exorcist is often more violent in the approach to the demons than is actually necessary. With experience, one learns to dominate the entities with prayer, and not to rely on overly dramatic confrontations. A strong, subtle, persistent approach shows greater reliance on divine providence, in harmony with the spiritual teachings of all the great saints.

Anyakayapravesha Anyakayapravesha is the practice of entering a recently deceased body. Hindu and Buddhist Tantric texts speak of the possibility of a spiritually advanced practitioner developing the ability to enter and operate within the body of a recently deceased person. Why would anyone need to do this?

In the Tantric systems, full realization of enlightenment and the acquisition of spiritual skills or powers (siddhis) are accomplished by lengthy repetitions of rituals and mantras. Should a practitioner reach the time of death without completing all the recitations, it might imperil the accumulated merits of a lifetime of spiritual discipline. For this reason, a yogin who is aware of imminent death should know how to find the fresh body of a young, healthy person and enter it so as to continue with spiritual practice. Rogue practitioners are said to do this in order to make illicit use of a corpse for sexual activities, theft, and the acquisition of magical powers.

Francis V. Tiso

See also: Exorcism; Modernity; Possession.

References

- Balducci, Corrado. Gli Indemoniati. Rome: Coletti Editore, 1959.
- Eliade, Mircea. Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964.
- Flint, Valerie, et al. Witchcraft and Magic in Europe: Ancient Greece and Rome. London: The Athlone Press, 1999.
- Gauccio, Francesco. Compendium Maleficarum. Milan, 1635.
- Heinze, Ruth Inge. Trance and Healing in Southeast Asia Today. Bangkok: White Lotus Publishers, 1988.
- Hitchcock, John T., and Rex L. Jones. Spirit Possession in the Nepal Himalayas. Warminster, UK: Aris and Phillips, 1976.
- Levack, Brian P., ed. Articles on Witchcraft, Magic and Demonology. Vol. 9, Possession and Exorcism. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.
- Loewe, Michael, and Carmen Blacker, eds. Oracles and Divination. Boulder, CO: Shambhala, 1981.
- Lord, Albert B. The Singer of Tales. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1960.
- Obeyesekere, Gananath. Medusa's Hair: An Essay on Personal Symbols and Religious Experience. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- Parke, H. W. Greek Oracles. London: Hutchinson, 1967.

Rowland, Christopher. The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity. New York: Crossroad, 1982.

Svoboda, Robert E. Aghora: At the Left Hand of God. Albuquerque, NM: Brotherhood of Life Publishers, 1986.

Spiritism

Spiritism is based on the work of Hippolyte Léon Denizard Rivail (1804–1869), who began to explicate his teachings in 1854 under the pseudonym Allan Kardec. Kardec was among the first people attracted to the Spiritualist movement that spread to France in the 1860s. He developed his own teachings from his contact with mediums and published several books. Translated into Portuguese, the books spread his particular form of Spiritualism, which included a belief in reincarnation, an idea anathema to British and American Spiritualists at the time.

In Brazil his concepts were adopted, elaborated, and sometimes reinterpreted by various authors, especially Chico Xavier, currently the most prominent representative of Brazilian Spiritism. He emphasizes, as do some other authors, the religious character of Spiritism. The doctrine of Spiritism centers on the idea of a continuous evolution of the individual soul in various manifestations. Death is considered an intermediate state between two lives in visible material form. Kardec taught that contact can be made with the spiritual world. This explains the important role of mediums in the local centers of Kardecism, which regularly become locations where people seek to communicate with deceased relatives. The worldview of Kardecism contains basic ideas of Christianity and intends to complete or fulfill them. Especially in terms of ethics, Spiritism is clearly Christianity-oriented, which leads Kardecists to engage in a wide range of charitable activities.

The history of institutionalized Kardecism in Brazil began in 1865, with the first official group of Spiritists in Salvador, Bahia. From 1873 on, Rio de Janeiro witnessed a wave of foundations of Spiritist circles and centers. In 1884 the Federação Espírita Brasileira was established as a national umbrella organization of local groups. At the end of the 1880s and in the following decades, umbrella organizations emerged at the state level. As for local centers, there was already a saturation by the 1950s. Official statistics for 1956 counted 2,950 local Brazilian groups, each with an average of 318 members. Kardecism's character as an urban phenomenon that attracts mainly middle-class, more erudite Brazilians has continued to this day.

In the national censuses, which have included Kardecism as a separate religious category since 1940, Spiritists never exceeded 2 percent of the population. In 1991 only 1.12 percent of the population declared themselves Kardecist, and only 3.6 percent of those lived in rural areas. The Datafolha study of 1994 confirmed not only the concentration of Spiritism in urban surroundings but also the high level of education of most adherents. According to the survey, 89 percent of Kardecists lived in large or medium-size cities, with concentrations in Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro. In each of those two cities, Kardecists made up 8 percent of the population.

The Internet site for the Federação Espírita Brasileira includes the text of Kardec's two primary works, The Spirit's Book and The Medium's Book. Centers of the Federação can now be found across South America and in Portugal.

Brazilian scholars treat Kardecistic Spiritism as one of several "mediumistic religions." In 1991, some 1,644,354 Brazilians, or 1.12 percent of the population, declared themselves Kardecists, while the Datafolha study of 1994 identified 3 percent of the adults entitled to vote as adherents of Kardecistic Spiritism. This number is less surprising if one recalls the campaign of Pentecostal churches against Afro-Brazilian "cults" and the social pressure that led practitioners of Candomblé and Umbanda to associate themselves with the less controversial category of "Spiritism."

Federação Espírita Brasileira, National Headquarters
SGAN 603 Conjunto "F"

Av. L-2 Norte
Brasília, DF
Brazil

Federação Espírita Brasileira, Regional Headquarters
Avenida Passos, 30, downtown
Rio de Janeiro, RJ

Brazil

<http://www.febrasil.org.br/>

Frank Usarski

See also: Candomblé; Spiritualism; Umbanda.

References

Kardec, Allan. The Medium's Book. Trans. by Emma E. Wood. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Kardec, Allan. The Spirit's Book. Trans. by Anna Blackwell. Sao Paulo: Livaria Kardec Editora, 1972.

Spiritual Baptists

The Spiritual Baptists are a rapidly expanding international religious movement with congregations in St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago, Grenada, Guyana, Venezuela, London, Amsterdam, Toronto, Los Angeles, and New York City. Like other religions of Caribbean origin, the Spiritual Baptists seem to have started out as a “religion of the oppressed.” In recent years, however, congregations in Trinidad have attracted membership among wealthy East Indians, Chinese, and Europeans. Nevertheless, the religion is still overwhelmingly black, with Asians and whites constituting less than 5 percent of the total membership.

The central Spiritual Baptist rite is called “mourning.” Spiritual Baptists participate in mourning ceremonies for a variety of reasons: to cure cancer, to see the future, or to communicate with the deceased. For most participants, however, the major reason for participating in the rite is to discover one’s “true” rank within an elaborate 23-step church hierarchy. Every Baptist is expected to mourn often, and all Baptists desire to advance within the church hierarchy.

The 1990s ushered in a period of increasing respectability and visibility for the faith. In 1996 a general conference of Spiritual Baptist bishops was held at the Central Bank Auditorium in Port of Spain, Trinidad. Archbishop Murrain’s address to the conference called for: (1) building a new cathedral that would include a library for researchers who want to “make a history” of the Spiritual Baptist faith; (2) the establishment of a trade school; and (3) construction of a “Spiritual Baptist Park” that would serve as a pilgrimage site for Spiritual Baptists in the Caribbean and throughout the world. A seminary—the Southland School of Theology—has been established, and a comprehensive Spiritual Baptist minister’s manual was published in 1993. In addition, the day of the repeal of the Shouters Prohibition Ordinance (shouters being a derogatory name for the Spiritual Baptists) in 1953 is now a national holiday in Trinidad and Tobago. An African Spiritual Park and meeting hall have been established at Maloney, Trinidad.

In 2007, Spiritual Baptists from throughout the Caribbean gathered in Maloney for the 12th anniversary of Shouter Baptist Liberation Day. Speakers included President George Maxwell Richards, former Prime Minister Basdeo Panday, and Archbishop Barbara Gray-Burke. All praised what they saw as a close and productive relationship between the government and the Spiritual Baptists. But all recognized that there was still work to be done.

Nevertheless, it is difficult to gauge the impact of these changes on rank-and-file believers. Thus far, the impact has been minuscule. Southland School of Theology has few full-time students, the Spiritual Baptist ministers’ manual is rarely consulted, and construction has yet to begin on the trade school or the cathedral. The majority of Spiritual Baptist churches in the Caribbean remain small and lack a solid financial base.

The Spiritual Baptists are led by the Council of Elders, which includes individuals (both male and female) who have been consecrated as archbishops. For the average Caribbean church member, things continue very much as before. There has, however, been tremendous church growth outside the Caribbean. Today, the largest and most prosperous Spiritual Baptist churches are located in Great Britain, Canada, and the United States. A number of Caribbean Baptist leaders have become associate pastors of churches in Europe and North America.

Council of Elders Spiritual Baptist Shouters Faith of Trinidad and Tobago
2A-2B Saddle Rd.
Maraval
Trinidad and Tobago
West Indies

Stephen D. Glazier

See also: Rastafarians.

References

- Duncan, Carol B. This Spot of Ground: Spiritual Baptists in Toronto. Waterloo, Canada: Wilfrid Laurier Press, 2008.
- Gibbs de Peza, Hazel Ann. My Faith: Spiritual Baptist Christian. St. Augustine: The Multimedia Production Centre School of Education/Faculty of Humanities and Education/University of the West Indies, 1999.
- Glazier, Stephen D. Marching the Pilgrims Home: A Study of the Spiritual Baptists of Trinidad. Salem, WI: Sheffield, 1991.
- Gray-Burke, Archbishop Barbara. "A Brochure for Teachers on Spiritual Shouter Religion in Trinidad and Tobago." <http://www.n2consulting.com/brochure.html>. Accessed December 1, 2001.
- Hackshaw, John Milton. The Origin of the Christian Religion, the Baptist Faith, the Independents, and Spiritual Baptist Churches. Trinidad, West Indies: Citadel, 2000.
- Laitinen, Maarit. Marching to Zion: Creolisation in Spiritual Baptist Rituals and Cosmology. Helsinki: Research Series in Anthropology, 2002. <http://www.thesis.helsinki.fi>.
- Lum, Kenneth Anthony. Praising His Name in the Dance: Spirit Possession in the Spiritual Baptist Faith and Orisha Work in Trinidad, West Indies. New York: Harwood, 2000.
- Stephens, Patricia. The Spiritual Baptist Faith: African New World Religious Identity, History, and Testimony. London: Karnak House, 1998.

Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church

According to an official history of this Oneness Pentecostal denomination, the Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual (IECE; Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church) was founded in Tampico, Tamaulipas, Mexico, by an independent Irish missionary, Joseph Stewart (1871–1926), in 1926. Stewart was born on September 9, 1871, the 10th son of Joseph Stewart Sloan and Jane Hall, in the village of Rosedernate, near Cloughmills, County Antrim, Northern Ireland. The family was dedicated to working in agriculture, which was the only means of subsistence in the region.

All the Stewarts were faithful members of a local Presbyterian church but the surprise visit by "two missionaries" to their village in 1893 had a disruptive impact on the family. The missionaries found lodging with the Stewart family and were invited to preach at the Presbyterian church in Clough. The two missionaries are not identified by name or organization, but what they preached and taught is known today as the Oneness Pentecostal doctrine, which was rejected as heresy by the local pastor and most of his church members.

The two missionaries gave a message that the people in this rural Irish congregation were not accustomed to hearing but that greatly impacted Joseph Stewart. The message, in a direct and clear manner, urged the congregation to live a holy life, full of the fear of God, and stated that baptism should be conducted only in the name of Jesus. This message, with a frontal attack on sin, was backed up by alleged manifestations of the Holy Spirit, including the gift of tongues (glossolalia). This deeply moved 22-year-old Stewart, who was "filled with the power of God and had the good fortune to speak in tongues, being sealed by the baptism of heaven" (the baptism in the Holy Spirit). According to the denominational history, Stewart was an energetic young man, very spiritual, and a good singer, and played several musical instruments.

In early 1894, Stewart made a decision to leave his family to go preach the gospel with the message of the "apostolic doctrine" that he had received. First, he joined the Faith Mission of Edinburgh and engaged in missionary work in rural Scotland for a few years before returning home to rest and recuperate for a season. Second, during the period 1897–1903, Stewart served as a missionary with the British-based nondenominational Christian Soldiers Association in Egypt and South Africa, where he ministered to British troops. After he resigned from the Christian Soldiers Association in March 1903, he worked on the family farm in Ireland, which was a blessing because the abundant harvest made it possible for him to carry out his previous plan to go to South America as a missionary. He had been preparing for this by studying Spanish.

Stewart's third missionary adventure took place during the period 1902–1912 in Argentina, where he served with the Christian and Missionary Alliance (CMA), a non-Pentecostal Trinitarian organization of the Holiness tradition. Stewart and David Buchanan soon became friends, and the latter, after coming to an understanding of the Oneness Pentecostal doctrine preached by Stewart, began to experience a radical change as he adopted and supported Stewart's doctrinal position: water baptism (or rebaptism) in the name of Jesus, personal holiness, and the gift of tongues as evidence of the baptism in the Holy Spirit; as well as denouncing fornication, adultery, and all other vices.

During his eight years (1904–1912) of missionary service in Argentina, serious problems began to emerge within the CMA missionary family in Argentina because of the Oneness Pentecostal doctrine preached by Stewart. While most of the CMA missionaries rejected this doctrine, a few accepted it, including Stewart's wife, Genoveva Harrison Stewart, along with David Buchanan, Alberta Bachelor, and two other Irish missionaries whose names are unknown.

When this situation was brought to the attention of CMA officials in New York, it was decided to dismiss those who espoused the Oneness Pentecostal doctrine due to conflicts with the CMA's official doctrinal position. Their dismissal occurred on December 9, 1911. The stated reason for their dismissal was "owing to their difference of conviction on questions relating to Restorationism and the future life" (CMA Annual Report for 1912). Restorationists sought to re-establish, renew, or restore the Christian church on the pattern of primitive Christianity as set forth in the New Testament—specifically regarding the charismatic gifts, such as speaking in tongues, miraculous healing, and prophecy. The CMA stance was both a rejection of Pentecostalism in general and a rejection of the Oneness doctrine in particular.

After they had been dismissed by the CMA, Stewart and his family, and David Buchanan and his wife, left Argentina. The Stewarts went to Northern Ireland and the Buchanans to the United States, where they settled in San Diego, California. After spending some time with his family in Ireland and visiting his wife's parents in Boston, the Stewarts traveled across the country from east to west, arriving in California and settling in Santa Barbara in 1914, where Stewart's fourth missionary adventure began. During that year and the next, Joseph preached the gospel among Mexican immigrants between Santa Barbara and San Diego with his friend David Buchanan. The turmoil produced by the Mexican Revolution brought tens of thousands of Mexicans to Southern California during the period 1910–1920.

Due to a lack of gainful employment and the economic recession in the United States in 1915, Stewart and his family traveled to Canada, where he ministered with the Christian Workers' Church of Canada (later reorganized under the name of Associated Gospel Churches in 1925) for about three years. In 1919, the Stewarts returned to California, first to Santa Barbara and then to San Diego, where they worked with David Buchanan again as missionaries among the Spanish-speaking population for several years.

However, in February 1923, the U.S. government decided to deport Stewart as an "undesirable alien" and put him on a ship headed to Northern Ireland, while his children remained in the United States under the care of his wife's parents in Indiana. Previously, Stewart's wife became ill with meningitis and died in June 1922. He arrived in Ireland in March 1923, extremely sad and enormously concerned about his children.

During the nine months that he stayed on the family farm, he worked diligently plowing the fields, and once again the land provided him with sufficient income to afford to set out to find his children; this time he headed to Mexico on his fifth missionary adventure. While processing his passport and respective permits to leave the country, he headed to the port of Glasgow, Scotland, where he boarded the British ship Diplomat on December 1, 1923, and sailed to the port of Tampico, Tamaulipas, on Mexico's Caribbean coast, where he touched Mexican soil for the first time on January 6, 1924.

Mexican Apostolic church historian Manuel J. Gaxiola (1994) states that Stewart visited several Protestant churches in the port of Tampico after his arrival in 1924, where he met Ireneo Rojas Castillo, who later became president of the IECE after its formal establishment in 1926. Together, Stewart, Rojas, and other leaders established the first of many "spiritual churches" that later became associated with the IECE.

Stewart traveled to other places in northern Mexico between 1924 and 1926, and when he returned to Tampico in January 1926 he discovered that the first church he helped establish had grown to about 200 members. Later in 1926, some of the small congregations established by Stewart and his associates in northern Mexico were organized under the name Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual with headquarters in Tampico. Stewart ordained Juan Carreón Adame for the ministry of elder (Gaxiola 1994, 165) prior to leaving Tampico in 1926 and traveling to the city of Guadalajara, Jalisco, where he became seriously ill and died later that year.

Many of the early converts to Stewart's brand of Oneness Pentecostalism had previously been associated with non-Pentecostal Protestant denominations in northern Mexico. These included Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), and the Friends Church (Quakers); some were converts from Roman Catholicism.

Concurrently with these events, some members of the early Apostolic Faith movement (churches associated with the Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ of Mexico or its sister denomination in the United States, the Apostolic Assembly of Faith in Jesus Christ) were drawn away by the prophetic witness of two charismatic leaders, known as Saul and Silas, whose real names were Antonio Muñoz and Francisco Flores, respectively, who appeared in northern Mexico in 1924. The bearded and unwashed prophets, with similarities to the biblical John the Baptist, preached a message of repentance and faith, which required people to denounce their old religion and material possessions, and to be rebaptized in the "Name of Jesus." Their "authority" was derived from "special divine revelation" through their own prophecies, dreams, and visions, rather than from the Bible, which was a relatively unknown and unread book in those days in northern Mexico, according to Gaxiola.

The Saul and Silas movement produced a great deal of confusion and dissention within the churches associated with the Apostolic Church of Faith in Jesus Christ in northern Mexico during the decade 1925–1935, which caused some Apostolic pastors and members—including entire congregations—to leave the Apostolic Faith movement.

Such was the case of Felipe Rivas Hernández's (1901–1983) home church in Torreón, Coahuila, where Saul and Silas caused much conflict among Apostolics in 1924–1925. The result was that some Apostolic leaders and church members decided to form another organization in December 1927, known as Consejo Mexicano de la Fe Apostólica (Mexican Council of the Apostolic Faith), under the leadership of Francisco Borrego as pastor general. This group later became affiliated with the IECE with headquarters in Tampico, Tamaulipas, founded by Joseph Stewart in mid-1926.

After the death of Stewart in late 1926, the first pastor general of the IECE was Francisco Borrego of Torreón, followed by Ireneo Rojas Castillo in 1934 and continuing until his death in 1954, according to Gaxiola. In 1993, the president of the IECE was Félix Moreno Hernández, who registered this denomination with the Mexican government's Secretaría de Gobernación under the Department of Religious Associations. As of April 2008, Félix Moreno Hernández was still the president, according to a local press report.

Overall, the IECE is considered to be socially very conservative and apolitical in terms of its religious practices and its relationship with the larger society. Its other-worldly orientation is said to offer its adherents a retreat from the world's problems ("a refuge for the masses") while providing them with a strong sense of community. According to several reliable sources, some of the unique characteristics of this Oneness Pentecostal denomination are as follows.

It only uses the Reina Valera 1602 version of the Spanish Bible as holy scripture.

Members are taught that all the other churches (Protestant, Catholic, or whatever) are erroneous, while the IECE doctrines and practices represent the True Gospel. Members are not allowed to visit or have fellowship with believers of other denominations, although since 1972 there have been a few exceptions to this rule. Its leadership tends to be authoritarian and hostile to other denominations, but the denomination is missionary-minded and seeks to plant new churches where needed, both nationally and internationally.

The traditional Protestant Trinitarian doctrine is rejected as being unbiblical and polytheistic. Believers must be baptized (or rebaptized) in Jesus' name in order to experience True Salvation based on the Oneness doctrine (Acts 2:37–42).

The pastor functions as a type of priest before whom church members have to confess their sins; he is a disciplinarian who is in charge of maintaining proper order and decorum with the congregation; and he has the authority to remove rebellious members from the fellowship of the church (the practice of shunning or excommunication).

Members are prohibited from earning a living from sports activities, which are considered to be worldly pursuits.

Women are prohibited from cutting their hair, using makeup, using jewelry, and wearing slacks; their skirts and dresses must be less than 8 inches above their shoes. Men are prohibited from wearing shorts in public places. Women must cover their heads with a scarf while praying. Women and men must be seated on opposite sides of the sanctuary during religious services.

Not much is known about the historical development of this denomination since 1926, but it has been reported by Gaxiola and other sources that the IECE has experienced several notable organizational splits due to leadership conflicts during the past decades. Nevertheless, the denomination has experienced geographical expansion within Mexico as well to other Latin American countries, as well as membership growth in many of the existing congregations. In 1994, Gaxiola reported that the IECE had an estimated 14,000 baptized church members in Mexico, and that it had expanded its work into the United States, Central America, and South America.

According to a later source (date unknown), there were 362 IECE congregations and 578 missions (campos de evangelización) in Mexico, as well as an unknown number of associated churches in other countries: the United States, Argentina, Colombia, Paraguay, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Peru, and the Philippines.

In July 2005, IECE held its 79th Annual Convention in its own installations in San Luís Potosí, Mexico, with the participation of an estimated 18,000 people from many parts of Mexico and several other countries. In the city of San Luis Potosí alone, the work of IECE is organized in 4 districts, with an estimated 3,000 adherents, according to a local press report.

Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual
Avenida Carlos Salazar No. 2008 Oeste
Colonia Obrera
Monterrey
Nuevo León, CP 64010
Mexico

Clifton L. Holland

See also: Christian and Missionary Alliance; Pentecostalism.

References

- Castillo de La Torre, J. Pablo. "Historia de la Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual." http://members.fortunecity.es/castillojp/iece_historia.html. Accessed June 15, 2009. English version translated from Spanish by Linda J. Holland on June 17, 2009, "History of the Spiritual Christian Evangelical Church." San Pedro, Montes de Oca, Costa Rica.
- Castillo de La Torre, J. Pablo. "¿Que es la I.E.C.E.?" http://members.fortunecity.es/castillojp/iece_o_que_es.html. Accessed June 15, 2009.
- Christian and Missionary Alliance. Annual Report, 1912. <http://www.cmalliance.org/resources/archives/downloads/annual-report/1911-1912-annual-report.pdf>. Accessed June 15, 2009.
- Gaxiola-Gaxiola, Manuel J. La Serpiente y la Paloma: Historia, Teología y Análisis de la Iglesia Apostólica de la Fe en Cristo Jesús de México (1914–1994). 2nd ed. Nacaulpan, Mexico: Libros Pyros, 1994.
- Hernández Arroyo, Benjamín, Baltazar Cuevas Hernández, Josué Silva Ibarra, Josué Zamarripa Araujo, and Raúl Castañón Santana, eds. Historia de la Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual. Monterrey, Mexico: Iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual (IECE), 1992.
- "Las características de la IECE son." <http://www.foroekklesia.com/showthread.php?t=45374>. Accessed June 15, 2009.
- Martínez Saldierna, Hortencia. "Actividades iniciadas desde el jueves atraen a creyentes de otras entidades y extranjeros." La Jornada, San Luís Potosí, Mexico (July 25, 2005). <http://www>

.lajornadasanluis.com.mx/2005/07/25/politica5.php. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Salmerón Hernández, Angélica. “La iglesia Evangélica Cristiana Espiritual ha adoptado una forma de vida recatada.” El Mundo de Córdoba, Veracruz, México (April 6, 2008). http://www.elmundodecordoba.com/index.php?command=show_news&news_id=70398. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Spiritual Churches (Ghana)

The prophet-healing African Initiated Churches (AICs) in Ghana are now popularly known as the “Spirit churches” (Akan: Sunsum Sore). Liberian prophet William Wade Harris (Harrist Church) preached in western Ghana for only a few weeks, but his influence remained, particularly in the first Spirit church to be formed there: the Church of William Wade Harris and His Twelve Apostles (later the Church of the Twelve Apostles). Harris’s converts, Grace Tani and Kwesi John Nackabah, founded this church in 1918 following Harris’s instruction that 12 apostles be appointed in each village to look after his flock. Tani was a traditional priestess when she was converted by Harris and became one of his assistants. When Harris was deported from the Ivory Coast, Tani returned to Ghana, fell ill, and called for Nackabah to pray for her healing. Nackabah was also a diviner until baptized by Harris and given the emblems of authority: a cup for holy water, a calabash with which to beat out evil spirits, a staff cross, and a Bible. Tani, now Madame Harris Grace Tani, remained the spiritual leader of the church, with Nackabah administrative and public leader. This dual arrangement was a convenient method used by several AICs to overcome traditional male resistance to female leadership.

The new church followed the Harrist tradition by emphasizing healing through faith in God and the use of holy water. Similarly, the Bible was placed on people’s heads and gourd rattles were used to drive out demons and heal people. Polygyny was permitted, and new members were first ritually purified through washing. The healing was administered in healing gardens (communal dwellings), and the holy water was usually kept in basins under a wooden cross in the gardens. Nackabah died in 1947, to be succeeded as bishop by John Hackman. After the death of Hackman in 1957 and Tani in 1958, schisms occurred, largely along ethnic lines. The church is now divided into several groups, the most prominent being the Nackabah People, the William Wade Harris Twelve Apostles Church, and the Twelve Apostles Church of Ghana.

The most prominent churches in Ghana are the Musama Disco Christo Church, the Twelve Apostles Church, and the African Faith Tabernacle, with about 125,000 affiliates each in 1990. The African Faith Tabernacle was founded by Prophet James Kwame Nkansah in 1919, a movement influenced in doctrine and practices by the form of North American Fundamentalism from which it originated. The prophet Charles Kobla Wovenu, a former Presbyterian government clerk, commenced the Apostolic Revelation Society in 1939, consisting mainly of Ewe, with a holy city at Tadzewu. He left the Presbyterian church in 1945 when he was told to stop praying for healing.

In 1963 the Eden Revival Church (now known as the F’Eden Church) was commenced by a Presbyterian schoolteacher, Charles Yeboa-Korie (b. 1938), when he received visions that he was to become a healer. He used prayer with accompanying liturgical objects such as Bibles, blessed water, handkerchiefs, olive oil, candles, and incense in order to bring healing from sickness and deliverance from demons. Later, modernization and contact with Western Christianity caused the candles and incense to disappear, and Yeboa began to see his church as forming a bridge between the AICs and the “mainline” churches. In 1970, F’Eden was the first AIC to be admitted to the national Ghanaian Christian Council.

Aladura Churches from Nigeria (such as the Christ Apostolic Church, the Cherubim and Seraphim, the Celestial Church of Christ, and the Church of the Lord, Aladura) have come to Ghana and have significant followings. Several of the spiritual churches in Ghana formed an ecumenical cooperative organization in 1962, the Pentecostal Association of Ghana, the name chosen to illustrate the self-identity of the “spiritual churches” of Ghana as “Pentecostal.” Another ecumenical organization, called the Council of Independent Churches in Ghana, has also been formed. Observers estimated that in 1996 there were more than 3,000 AICs in Ghana.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Aladura Churches; Celestial Church of Christ; Cherubim and Seraphim/Eternal Sacred Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim; Christ Apostolic Church; Church of the Lord; Harrist Church; Musama Disco Christo Church.

References

- Anderson, Allan H. African Reformation: African Initiated Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 2001.
- Bakta, G. C. Prophetism in Ghana: A Study of Some "Spiritual" Churches. London: SCM, 1962.
- Beckman, David M. Eden Revival: Spiritual Churches in Ghana. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1975.
- Consultation with African Instituted Churches, Ogere, Nigeria, 9–14 January 1996*. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1996.

Spiritual Churches (Kenya)

The first African Initiated (Independent) Churches (AICs) to emerge in Kenya were the “spiritual churches” that began among Luo Anglicans around Lake Victoria. The Roho (Spirit) movement commenced in 1912, first as a popular charismatic movement among young people within the Anglican Church. Afterward, its best known founders, Anglican deacon Alfayo Odongo Mango (1884–1934) and his nephew Lawi Obonyo (ca. 1911–1934), began a prophetic ministry around 1933, when several remarkable healings and other miracles were reported.

In spite of the opposition by Anglican authorities, Mango installed new rites of baptism and Communion, and his home became a center to which people came and then fanned out. Mango began to prophesy the end of colonial rule and predicted future development in Kenya. The Roho were accused of acts of violence and banned from the local Anglican church.

Mango, Lawi, and seven of their followers were murdered by a mob of several hundred, as Mango’s house was set alight. The Roho thereafter began a vigorous missionary expansion movement called Dini ya Roho (Religion of the Spirit), emphasizing the power of the Spirit and dressing in white robes with red crosses. The Roho churches say that Mango’s sacrificial death atoned for their sins and opened heaven to Africans. Mango is prayed to as “our Saviour,” and he has inaugurated a new era of the reign of the Holy Spirit in Africa. These churches enjoin monogamy on their leaders, and they are known for their processions through the streets of towns and villages. The Roho movement now has several schisms and has spread to Tanzania.

A Holy Spirit movement among the Abaluyia emerged after a Pentecostal revival in a Friends/Quakers mission in 1927, also called Dini ya Roho. The movement resulted in the Holy Spirit Church of East Africa and the African Church of the Holy Spirit. All these Roho churches do not have sacraments of baptism and Communion, but they do have rituals for purification before church services, before meals, and before entering and leaving houses. In common with other spiritual and prophetic churches, these churches reject the use of medicines; their members wear white robes with a red cross, turbans, and beards and remove shoes during services. Church meetings have ecstatic phenomena, especially prophecy, speaking in tongues, the interpretation of dreams, and healing. One of the most prominent spiritual churches in western Kenya is the African Israel Church, Nineveh.

The Arathi (Prophets), also known as Watu wa Mungu (People of God), or, as now better known, Akurinu, is a spiritual church movement among the Gikuyu of central Kenya. It started in a Pentecostal revival in 1922, when manifestations of the Spirit—including speaking in tongues, prophecy, visions, and other ecstatic phenomena—were present, and in which there was an emphasis on prayer and the confession of sins. Joseph Ng’ang’a received a divine call in 1926 and, after a four-year seclusion, began preaching the downfall of European colonialism. His followers wore long white robes and expected a new golden age for the Gikuyu. When the Spirit came on them they roared and shook violently, a practice that continues today. The movement spread throughout the Gikuyu region, and the colonial authorities became increasingly nervous about what they saw as a religious expression of African nationalism. The Akurinu were banned, and Ng'ang'a and five other leaders were arrested.

Worshippers with the African Israel Church, Nineveh, march through the streets in the Kibera slums February 10, 2008, in Nairobi, Kenya. (Getty Images)

Later in 1934, Ng'ang'a and two followers were killed by a police contingent. The repression of the movement increased, and many Akurinu were arrested and imprisoned. Others fled to other parts of Kenya, where the movement spread farther, setting up communities and living together wherever they went. Schisms began to appear in 1949, and there are now more than 30 Arathi churches in Kenya, nearly all of which use "Holy Ghost" in their church title. Like the Roho churches, they do not baptize with water but practice a "baptism of the Holy Spirit" by a threefold shaking of hands and laying on of hands. Despite the similarities with the Roho movement, the Akurinu movement was formed with little or no contact with Western missions or spiritual churches elsewhere. It has consciously attempted to form a radically African type of Christianity, in which the pattern of the mission churches plays no significant role, and that may make the Akurinu churches unique.

Allan H. Anderson

See also: African Church of the Holy Spirit; African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Israel Church, Nineveh; Friends/Quakers; Pentecostalism.

References

- Githieya, Francis K. The Freedom of the Spirit: African Indigenous Churches in Kenya. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1997.
- Hoehler-Fatton, Cynthia. Women of Fire and Spirit: History, Faith and Gender in Roho Religion in Western Kenya. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Rasmussen, Ane Marie Bak. Modern African Spirituality: The Independent Spirit Churches in East Africa, 1902–1976. London: British Academic Press, 1996.

Spiritual Healing Church (Botswana)

The Spiritual Healing Church is properly described as a “child” of the independent church movement in South Africa. It was founded by Jacob Mokgwetsi Motswasele (1900–1980), who was born to Israel and Kiole Motswasele in 1900 in Thaba Nchu, South Africa. Motswasele belonged to the Barolong clan and Seleka tribe and was raised a Methodist. As a young man he migrated to Matsiloje, in the Tati District of Botswana, then known as the Bechuanaland Protectorate. There he began to experience religious dreams, which intensified in 1923 when the Prophet Harry Morolong came to Matsiloje from Thaba Nchu, Bloemfontein, South Africa, to lead a revival mission. Prophet Morolong had been inspired by Walter Matitta (1885–1935), founder of the Church of Moshoeshoe in Lesotho. After Morolong’s visit, Motswasele and others who continued to gather for prayer experienced the spiritual phenomena of trembling and speaking in tongues.

Between 1930 and 1948, Motswasele was a migrant worker in Johannesburg, South Africa. There he was influenced by Christinah Nku, a prophetess of the St. John’s Apostolic Faith Mission, and he became a member of the Bantu Methodist Church. Upon returning to Matsiloje, he began a ministry of prayer and healing. He was seen as a man who possessed many gifts: healing, “sight” (diagnosing illness, interpreting dreams, foretelling the future), preaching, rain-making, and simply having power from God. Around that time he became known as the Prophet Mokaleng. In 1952 he founded the Apostolic United Faith Coloured Church, which after numerous name changes is now known as the Spiritual Healing Church. The first baptism was held April 16, 1953. In 1955 construction on a church building was begun. In 1966, Israel Motswasele (1934–1999) replaced his father, Mokaleng, as head of the Spiritual Healing Church. Mokaleng remained a prophet until his death in 1980. Although Israel was certainly seen as having power from God, his gifts were more administrative.

Forming a new African Initiated Church (AIC) in the 1950s was difficult in the Bechuanaland Protectorate, as both British authorities and local tribal leaders (dikgosi) vigorously sought to restrict such “dissident” and “unwelcome” movements. Although most AIC leaders were harassed and persecuted, Mokaleng was allowed to operate in a low-key manner. Perhaps his relative freedom was due to the fact that Matsiloje was in a remote and generally neglected district, and that local subchiefs were not very powerful. By the late 1950s, Mokaleng was allowed to travel, starting “prayer groups” in other areas. By the late 1960s, and with independence in 1966, restrictions against AICs began to loosen. In 1966 a congregation was formed in Gaborone and by 1968 this congregation was allowed to erect a building—the first AIC building in the capital. Although the Spiritual Healing Church has often been viewed as a member of the Apostolic family of AICs from South Africa, when it was allowed to register in 1973, the government requested that the word “Apostolic” be removed from in front of “Spiritual Healing Church.”

At least four unique features characterize the Spiritual Healing Church. First, while most AICs are suspicious of other Christian organizations and churches, Israel Motswasele took the bold step of inviting Mennonite workers into the midst of the church in the mid-1970s to provide Bible and leadership training. Second, this church places uncommon emphasis on the presence and appearance of church buildings. Third, as AICs are often differentiated by unique dress codes, the church uniform robes for the Spiritual Healing Church are blue and white, and they are worn by baptized members only. A final unique feature is that while many AICs crumble or stagger because of poor management, the Spiritual Healing Church is recognized as being uncharacteristically well run and organized.

Part of the reason that the Spiritual Healing Church is well run is that beginning in 1966 with Israel Motswasele and his father, Jacob, roles for administration and prophecy have been separated. In 1984 the administrative head became known as the “archbishop.” Prophets are chosen by the Holy Spirit, who is free to choose family members to this ministry, such as Israel's brother Joseph. The archbishop is now elected, but charisma and appointment by the predecessor are still very important factors. As with the Methodist Church in Africa, other roles in the church include, in order of increased authority, preachers, deacons, evangelists, and full ministers. Women's voices in the church are increasingly being heard, although women are still permitted to participate only on lower levels of the hierarchy, primarily as deacons. There are quarterly meetings for leaders in each of the district conferences: Gaborone, Mahalapye, Francistown, and Maun.

Despite being well-organized, the Spiritual Healing Church has not been able to avoid splits and secessions. In 1973 a conflict arose between Mokaleng and Matlho Kapaletswe, the latter seceding to form the Revelation Blessed Peace Church. Other splits have been more peaceful, and the following AICs are better described as "daughter churches": St. Faith Holy Church, Saints Gallery Church, St. Philip's Faith Healing Church, and the Lesidi Church.

The Spiritual Healing Church has grown rapidly since the late 1960s, due largely to its healing ministry. The most recent available statistics, from 1990, indicate that there were 26 congregations in Botswana with approximately 16,000 members, and the numbers are undoubtedly higher today. Growth is especially strong in urban areas, where the church attracts young people who have moved to the city to find employment. There is a branch of the Spiritual Healing Church in Namibia, and some church planting efforts have also been under way in South Africa.

Some practices that characterize the Spiritual Healing Church include prohibitions against tobacco, alcohol, and eating pork, nonscaly fish, and animals that are already dead. The Spiritual Healing Church has its own service book, which it published in 1977, and includes litanies for a variety of services. Although the church generally recognizes and takes seriously traditional African spirits, ancestors, and other forces, it has its own way of dealing with those entities and the crises they bestow. Three festivals are especially important in the Spiritual Healing Church. Easter is the highlight of the year, and every third year all congregations gather in Matsiloje for a celebration that lasts four or five days. In the two intervening years, district churches meet together. On January 25, a memorial service is held for the founder, Mokaleng, marking the date of his death. Each August an all-night festival is held to celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

Although there is a high reverence for the scriptures, because of illiteracy, traditional African approaches to authority, and an overall emphasis on pneumatology, there is little perceived need to expand Bible knowledge beyond the limited number of passages that the present leaders are familiar with and commonly preach upon.

The Spiritual Healing Church has its headquarters at Matsiloje, Botswana.

Andy Brubacher Kaethler

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Church of Moshoeshoe; Methodism.

References

- Amanze, J. N. Botswana Handbook of Churches. Gaborone, Botswana: Pula, 1994.
- Boschman, Don. "The Conflict between New Religious Movements and the State in the Bechuanaland Protectorate prior to 1945." Th.M. thesis, Harvard Divinity School, 1989.
- Friesen, Rachel Hilty. "A History of the Spiritual Healing Church." M.A. thesis, Toronto School of Theology, 1990.
- Friesen, Rachel Hilty. "Origins of the Spiritual Healing Church." In Afro-Christianity at the Grassroots, edited by G. C. Oosthuizen et al., 37–50. Leiden: Brill, 1994.
- Rantsandu, B. "The Conflict between the Spiritual Healing Church and the Authorities before Independence." In Afro-Christianity at the Grassroots, edited by G. C. Oosthuizen et al., 51–54. Leiden: Brill, 1994.

Spiritual Human Yoga

Spiritual Human Yoga (SHY) was originally known as Universal (and) Human Energy; today it uses the name of Mankind Enlightenment Love (MEL) as well. It was founded by a Vietnamese émigré, Luong Minh Dang (1942–2007). Data about his biography are controversial. Between 1961 and 1975 he apparently served as an officer in the South Vietnamese navy; after the Communist takeover, he immigrated to the United States, becoming a U.S. citizen in 1985. He gained rapid recognition as a healer in St. Louis, Missouri, first among Vietnamese immigrants and later outside the Vietnamese community. The movement was established in 1989, and from the United States it expanded into Mexico, Brazil, Western and Eastern Europe, Turkey, Israel, and Thailand.

By 1998 some 10,000 students had reached Level 6, at that time the highest in the movement. According to Dang, his teachings derive from Dasira Narada (1846–1924), a Sri Lankan master on whom information independent of SHY literature is not available. According to SHY, Narada initiated Dang in Vietnam in 1972, and died in Sri Lanka in 1980. SHY teaches that a Universal Energy permeates the universe and (having entered through the chakras) flows through the cells of the human body. SHY's techniques claim to enable its followers to control the Universal Energy and to use it for the well-being of humanity in general. SHY students are taught how to direct the Universal Energy toward those who most need it, thus (inter alia) healing the sick. SHY's techniques are introduced as being faster and easier to master than others, such as Reiki, which also involves the flow of a universal energy. Up to Level 5 inclusive, the Universal Energy is transmitted through the practitioner's hands; at higher levels, at which small pyramids are also used to store Energy, transmission is telepathic. Master Dang developed his teaching up to Level 20.

SHY does not have any common religious structures. There are no rituals or rites of passage. Master Dang's teachings, on the other hand, include a spirituality, particularly at Level 4 and higher. This spirituality is eclectic: Dang quoted Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), an early exponent of the Energy so important to the SHY perspective, and Edgar Cayce (1877–1945), whose teachings are spread through the Association for Research and Enlightenment, and he encouraged his students to read The Grail Message, written by Abd-rushin (Oskar Ernst Bernhardt, 1875–1941), the founder of the Grail movement. Buddha and Jesus are also revered as spiritual masters, although a certain critique of more traditional religions is inherent in SHY teachings, and Dang certainly believed that his regular contact with the Higher Beings allowed him to receive more updated information.

In Europe, Dang became a target of the anti-cult crusade, and he was arrested in Belgium in January 1999. After 65 days of imprisonment, he was released on bail and allowed to leave the country. He was arrested again in October 2005, and then transferred to Switzerland, where he was kept in jail before being released on bail. He was sentenced in absentia in Brussels to four years in jail (half of the term as a suspended sentence), being accused of swindle and teaching illegal medical practices—the exclusive use of which led to the death of a baby.

Although the Belgian accusations concerned mostly finances and controversial healing techniques, the media tended to stress SHY's most apocalyptic elements at the time of the 1999 controversy. In fact, Dang believed that the 21st century would prove to be a great divide in the history of humanity, and he expected crucial events to take place sometime soon. SHY is a millenarian movement in the sense that it anticipates that in the not-too-distant future there will be the advent of a new heaven on Earth, culminating in the final defeat of illness and death itself.

After Master Dang passed away unexpectedly in Australia, where he had settled in 2000, Theresa Thu-Thuy Nguyen (b. 1957), whom he had married in 1998, claimed to take over Master Dang's mission as “the Ambassador and leading instructor of the Universal Energy School,” using the global name of Academy of Human Universal Energy and Spirituality (HUESA). But the founder's son, Luong Minh Trung, relocated with his family from Australia back to St. Louis, stating that the Master's soul continued to transfer energy for the higher-level seminars (thus not endorsing the role claimed by Theresa Thu-Thuy Nguyen). Students of Universal Energy are now split between those following either Theresa Thu-Thuy Nguyen or Luong Minh Trung, but some have not taken sides and prefer to wait and see.

Mankind Enlightenment Love (MEL)
4448 Telegraph Road
St. Louis, MO 63129
<http://www.mel-hq.com/>

Academy of Human Universal Energy and Spirituality (HUESA)

6 St. Johns Avenue
Springvale, Victoria 3171
Australia

<http://www.huesa.org/>

<http://www.ue-global.com> (independent forum, with participants from the different wings of Universal Energy)

Jean-François Mayer, PierLuigi Zoccatelli, and Massimo Introvigne

See also: Association for Research and Enlightenment; Energy; Grail Movement.

References

Mayer, Jean-François. "Healing for the Millennium: Master Dang and Spiritual Human Yoga." Journal of Millennial Studies 2, no. 2 (Winter 2000).

http://www.mille.org/publications/winter2000/winter2000.html or http://www.bu.edu/mille/publications/winter2000/winter2000.html.

Nguyen, Tri-Thien. L'Energie Universelle et Humaine: Une méthode naturelle de guérison énergétique. Romont, Switzerland: Editions
Recto-Verseau, 2001.

Spiritualism

Spiritualism is a 19th-century movement that emerged in the United States around the belief that its leaders, called mediums, could contact and speak to the spirits of the deceased. Arising in an atmosphere in which many traditional religious beliefs, especially survival of death, were being questioned, Spiritualism claimed to be able to demonstrate the reality of the survival of death. Crucial to such demonstrations were the mediums, individuals who had the special ability to interact with the spirit world, often while in a trancelike state, and bring meaningful messages to people from deceased relatives and friends.

Spiritualists date their movement from March 31, 1848, when Kate Fox (d. 1892) and her two sisters, Leah and Margaret, began to converse with what they believed was the spirit of a deceased individual who formerly resided in their home. Communication was established through strange rapping noises that they had heard. Once they perceived that the rappings had a rational content, they worked out a code to begin communication.

The interest shown by neighbors in the phenomenon led no lesser a person than newspaper editor Horace Greeley (1811–1872), famed editor of the influential New York Tribune, to investigate and report on it. News reports led others to attempt such communications, and within a few years a wide variety of modes of communication were being reported. Spiritualism spread quickly through the 1850s, and parties at which attempts to communicate with spirits were made became a popular form of entertainment. On a more serious level, books advocating the Spiritualist hypothesis—that humans survive death in a spirit existence and that communication through a medium is possible—were published, lecturers advocated Spiritualism, and mediums gave public demonstrations. A more sophisticated direction to the new movement was offered by Andrew Jackson Davis, a prominent trance medium, who wrote extensively about his spirit contacts and the afterlife that he and other Spiritualists referred to as Summerland.

Spiritualism also drew upon earlier demonstrations of Mesmerism, a movement that grew out of the work of French physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), who claimed to have found a subtle force underlying the universe that could be used to produce altered states of consciousness. Mesmerism would lead to the discovery of hypnotism in the 19th century. Spiritualists claimed that mediums could demonstrate “scientifically” the reality of life after death.

Crucial to the development of Spiritualism in the late 19th century was psychical mediumship, the claimed ability of some mediums not just to speak to and relay information from the spirits of the deceased but also to produce an array of phenomena. These, such as the levitation of objects, the materialization of spirits, and photography of the dead, appeared to go far beyond the phenomena discovered by mundane science. By the end of the 19th century, physical phenomena had become the most spectacular claim undergirding belief in Spiritualism.

Medium holds a séance, ca. 1920. In the early 20th century, Spiritualism captured the popular imagination. (Library of Congress)

In the 1880s, a group of scientists and others organized to investigate the claims being made in Spiritualist phenomena and to speculate on the nature of a universe that allowed such phenomena to exist. The investigations of the Society for Psychical Research in Great Britain and similar societies in continental Europe and North America, although initially hopeful, eventually drastically reduced the claims of the kinds of psychic phenomena for which there was some modicum of evidence. Psychical researchers almost completely destroyed the claims of physical phenomena, the great majority of which rested upon fraud. Through the 20th century, parapsychology, a new approach to psychic phenomena centered upon laboratory research, replaced psychical research, which had focused its attention upon the observation of mediums and psychics.

In the United States, the Spiritualist movement was given some structure by the organization of camp meetings, popularly modeled on the camp meetings being perpetuated among evangelical Protestants and associations of spiritualists at the state level. It grew as a secular movement based around the demonstration of phenomena, but it developed a religious dimension as those convinced of the truth of the phenomena began to speculate on the nature of reality in light of the afterlife.

Through the last decades of the 20th century, three factions appeared. One group saw Spiritualism as a secular movement limited to the production of demonstrable phenomena. A second group saw it as a religious group based upon the ongoing contact with the spirits of the deceased (and other spiritual beings such as angels) and the information about the afterlife derived from such contact. This second group was divided over Spiritualism's relation to traditional Christianity. The larger groups saw Spiritualism's differences with Christianity, while a smaller group attempted to interpret Spiritualism as a Christian movement. In the 1890s, the first attempt to organize a national Spiritualist denomination resulted in the 1893 formation of the National Spiritualist Association, later renamed the National Association of Spiritualist Churches.

Spiritualism spread to England in the 1860s and soon thereafter to continental Europe. In England a spectrum of Spiritualist organizations emerged, including the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain and the London Spiritualist Alliance. In the 20th century, the Greater World Christian Spiritualist League and the Church of the White Eagle Lodge joined the community as significant organizations. As it developed in France, Spiritualism found a popular leader in the person of Allan Kardec (1804–1869). From France the movement was exported to South America, where it found particular success in Brazil. Kardec was an advocate of reincarnation, and his teachings, known as Spiritism, were alienated from Christianity. They found expression in the Federação Espírita Brasileira, based in Brazil.

In America, Spiritualism spread through the 1920s, but by mid-century it began to decline under criticism of Spiritualist phenomena and in the face of competition from a growing Esoteric community. Always considered a fringe element in the religious community in America, it became more established in Great Britain, especially after repeal of the archaic Witchcraft Laws in the 1950s that had occasionally been used to charge mediums with fraud. It enjoys its greatest success today in Brazil.

Although the emphasis of Spiritualism was always spirit contact for the purpose of demonstrating life after death, another phenomenon that in the late 20th century came to be known as channeling also had a role in the Spiritualist community. Some individual spiritualists, including many mediums, made contact with what were considered wiser and more evolved spirit beings not particularly connected with the families of those who came to the Spiritualist demonstrations. These evolved beings talked of the nature of the afterlife and expounded on a wide range of philosophical and theological concepts. The teachings of such spiritual beings were later collected and published. Given the widely divergent opinions expressed by the entities who spoke in channeled material, such channelings would occasionally be the basis of new separate movements, such as the Universal Faithists of Kosmon, the Grail Movement, and Universal Life.

In the late 20th century, channeling became an essential element of the emerging New Age movement. As a whole, Spiritualists watched the New Age movement from the sidelines and were noticeably absent for New Age conventions and events. Even though movement called the general public's attention to a variety of spiritual realities usually the central focus of Spiritualism, Spiritualists were not attuned to other New Age emphases, and in the end did not benefit significantly from the New Age's popularity.

Spiritualism now exists in a number of small associations, each with a small number of congregations and one or more camps. Camps in southern states stay open all year, while those farther north tend to be purely summer affairs. The largest association is also the oldest, the National Spiritualist Association of Churches, which has 85 congregations (2008) scattered across the United States.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Church of the White Eagle Lodge; Grail Movement; National Spiritualist Association of Churches; New Age Movement; Universal Faithists of Kosmon; Universal Life.

References

- Buescher, John B. The Other Side of Salvation: Spiritualism and the Nineteenth-Century Religious Experience. Boston: Skinner House Books, 2004.
- Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Cassell, 1926.
- Gauld, Alan. Mediumship and Survival: A Century of Investigation. London: Heineman, 1982.

Kerr, Howard. Mediums, Spirit Rappers, and Roaring Radicals. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1972.

Leonard, Todd Jay. Talking to the Other Side: A History of Modern Spiritualism and Mediumship: A Study of the Religion, Science, Philosophy and Mediums that Encompass this American-Made Religion. New York: iUniverse, 2005.

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology. 5th ed. Detroit, MI: Gale Research, 2001.

Nelson, Geoffrey K. Spiritualism and Society. New York: Schocken, 1969.

Owen, Alex. The Darkened Room: Women, Power, and Spiritualism in Late Victorian England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

Spring Dragon Festival

The dragon is a ubiquitous symbol throughout China and traditional Chinese lore. The dragon was seen as a positive creature, or more precisely as an auspicious creature, and served as a symbol of the emperor. The basis of the Spring Dragon Festival is the dragon's association with water, as the bringer of rain. The festival is based upon an ancient belief that on the second day of the second lunar month (generally in early March on the Common Era calendar) the dragon raises its head. In agricultural areas, it was hoped that the dragon's action would lead to large barns being full and small ones overflowing.

A popular Daoist legend recounts the coming of Wu Zetian, a Tang dynasty queen to the throne. In his anger, the Jade Emperor ordered the four dragon gods to withhold the rain for three years. One dragon took pity and allowed it to rain. The Jade Emperor punished the dragon by hiding him away in a mountain for 1,000 years, or until “golden beans give birth to flowers.” The people went searching for the golden beans, which they discovered to be popping corn. When the Jade Emperor saw that the people had in fact met his conditions, he called the dragon back to heaven to oversee the rains for the growing season. Since this time, popped corn is one of the three foods most associated with the festival. In addition to popped corn, Spring Dragon foods include noodles, symbolic of the dragon’s lifting his head, and fry cakes, associated with the dragon’s gallbladder, the gallbladder being associated with courage.

Chinese young men perform the dragon dance during the Spring Dragon Festival, 2010. (Donkeyru/Dreamstime.com)

The Spring Dragon Festival was celebrated in northern China, where the spring rains (monsoon season) tended to start after the second day of the second lunar month.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Chinese Religions; Daoism; Dragon Boat Festival.

References

- Latsch, Marie-Luise. Traditional Chinese Festivals. Singapore: Greaham Brash, 1984.
- Liming, Wei. Chinese Festivals: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals. Hong Kong: China International Press, 2005.

Spring Equinox

The Spring, or Vernal, Equinox was one of four points in the year (the others being the Winter and Summer solstices and the Fall Equinox) discovered and marked by ancient peoples who observed the heavens. At the Winter Solstice, from the viewpoint of an observer in the Northern Hemisphere, the Sun rises at a point farthest to the south and is in the sky the least amount of time. As the days pass, the Sun rises at a point slightly farther north each day and finally reaches a point, 3 months later, around March 21, when it is in the sky for 12 hours and below the horizon for 12 hours. That point is the equinox. Viewed from above Earth, the equinox is that point where the center of the Sun passes through the plane created by the Earth’s equator. Following the Summer Solstice, the Sun will appear to be moving south and again reach a point where the day and night are equal—the Fall Equinox. In the Southern Hemisphere, the Vernal Equinox is September 21.

Both the Spring and Fall Equinox were important dates in the ancient calendars, the latter being the time for the end of harvest festival for a wide variety of peoples in the temperate and northern climate zones. As the modern calendar began to be developed, however, the Spring Solstice assumed a far more important role. First, in the Middle East, as the Zodiac was developed, the Spring Solstice, defined as when the Sun moved from the sign of Pisces into Aries, was the beginning of the year and the moment for the annual adjustment of the calendar. As the Zodiac was passed from nation to nation, the Spring Equinox maintained its importance. It then became crucial to Julius Caesar whose new Roman calendar posited two crucial events—the beginning of the year on January 1 and the Spring Equinox in March. Thus for much of the world, the Spring Equinox became either the beginning point of the year or a major supplement marker and time for celebration. Among the major calendars that begin on the Vernal Equinox is the new Saka calendar adopted by the postcolonial government of India. The calendar begins with New Year’s Day on the Vernal (Spring) Equinox, March 21 or 22, on the Common Era calendar. The Baha’i Faith’s Bodi calendar also begins on the Spring Equinox (March 21). The last of the Baha’is 19 months, which occurs just prior to the Spring Equinox, is a month of fasting.

In the mid-19th century, Persia (Iran), where the Baha’i Faith originated, extensive use began of the Zodiacal or Borji calendar, which begins the new year on March 21 when the Sun enters the sign of Aries. Each remaining month was begun on the day the Sun entered a new sign. The 12 months had either Arabic or Parsi names. In 1925, the shah of Iran replaced the Borji calendar with an Iranian solar calendar. It also followed the 12 Zodiacal signs but gave them their Persian names. Thus the New Year begins on Farvadin 1 (or March 21 in the Common Era calendar). The years are counted from 622, the year of the Prophet Muhammad’s hegira.

Farvadin 1–4 (March 21–24) is celebrated as the Iranian New Year.

The Spring Equinox remains an important moment for Western astrology, but has otherwise been a non-entity on the calendars used by Jews, Christians, and Muslims. The major spring festival of the Jews, namely Passover, is calculated on a lunar calendar and thus moves significantly from year to year, as does the Christian Easter celebration.

The primary groups that celebrate the Spring Equinox in the West currently are the closely related neo-Pagans and Wiccans. Both use the modern Common Era calendar and meet for the eight equally spaced dates that include the Summer and Winter solstices, the Spring and Fall equinoxes, and the four dates halfway between them. For Wiccans and Pagans, the Spring Equinox begins the planting season, often for the urbanized, a time to plant flowers or a small garden. It is also seen as a time to plant new seeds symbolically in the sense of planning new projects that will produce results at a later date.

One interesting if obscure religious acknowledgment of the Spring Equinox originates within the Jewish community. The Talmud, the volumes of Jewish law written down in the second century BCE, suggests that an individual should make a special blessing when the Sun reaches its “turning point,” that is, the Vernal Equinox. Further, it notes that the Sun returns to this position every 28 years. Writing in the 11th century, the great French rabbi Rashi (1040–1105), who authored a commentary on the Talmud, taught that the Sun, which according to the book of Genesis was created on the fourth day of creation, was placed by God in the sky at the exact position it reaches at the Vernal Equinox. That moment in time every 28 years provides a unique glimpse of the creation and an opportunity to the one who is thus aware to bless the Creator for his work. This blessing, which a person has the opportunity to offer once every generation, is termed the Birkat HaHammah. This event most recently occurred on April 8, 2009.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Baha’i Faith; Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Fall Equinox; New Year’s Day; Summer Solstice; Wiccan Religion; Winter Solstice.

References

- Crowley, Vivianne. The Principles of Paganism. London: Thorsons, 1996.
- Farrar, Janet, and Stewart Farrar. A Witches Bible Complete. New York: Magickal Child, 1984.
- Parise, Frank, ed. The Book of Calendars. New York: Facts on File, 1982.
- Waskow, Arthur. “Blessing the Sun: Looking Backwards.” Birkat HaHammah. <http://www.blessthesun.org/tiki-index.php?page=Articles+and+Divrei+Torah>. Accessed June 15, 2009.

Sri Aurobindo Ashram

The Sri Aurobindo Ashram (SAA) in Pondicherry (Tamil Nadu, South India) derived from the presence and ideas of Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) since 1910 and from the presence and work of the Mother (Mira Richard, 1878–1973) since 1920. Sri Aurobindo was born in Calcutta and educated in Great Britain, and after his return to India in 1893, he was involved with the Indian independence movement. Because of those activities he was jailed for a year in 1908. While in prison he had a religious experience and, according to the records, achieved a state of samadhi (deep contemplation) through the practice of yoga. Upon his release, he went to Pondicherry. There he developed a system inspired by the Indian philosophies of Samkhya, yoga, Vedanta, and Tantra, to which he added some integrating elements of Western philosophies. He called his system Integral Yoga.

In November 1926, Aurobindo withdrew to his room in order to intensify his inner work. The whole material and spiritual management of the ashram devolved on the Mother. This was the desire of the disciples, then about 25 in number, who had gathered around Aurobindo to practice yoga under his direction. The ashram members devoted their lives to the ideal of Integral Yoga, the spiritual philosophy and practice of Aurobindo, which was published in a huge number of articles and books. The central idea is that of evolution, directed both at the evolution of nature/matter, society, and individuals toward their spiritual perfection and realization of the divine consciousness, and at the devolution of the spirit in order to manifest the divine in the world and to create a divine life in matter, society, and man. There is no need for asceticism or retreat from the world, and meditation alone is not enough; knowledge as well as determination and power of action and creation are also necessary for spiritual growth.

The organization of the SAA provided various facilities for members to fulfill this ideal, including small-scale industries, trade, sports, education, libraries, and studios for dance, music, painting, and so forth. The core of the SAA is the Sri Aurobindo International Centre of Education, established in 1951 and renamed in 1959. In 1960 the Mother set up the Sri Aurobindo Society (SAS) for the realization of harmony in the world. The SAS was also necessary for managing the SAA, including its funds. SAA enjoys United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) support. In 1968 the international city of Auroville came into existence as a place where the divine could be realized in the physical. People from all over the world and from many parts of India live and work there, engaged in ecology, city planning, education, and culture. The spiritual center of Auroville is a large structure, the Matrimandir. In September 2001, some 1,680 Aurovillians lived in the city, coming mainly from India, France, and Germany.

There have always been controversies among the SAA, SAS, and Auroville over understanding and living the principles and conflicting ideas of individual freedom and self-realization, as well as over the need for social cooperation requiring structure and organization, administration, and leadership. In 1980 the Indian government took over the responsibility of Auroville; the SAA now is run by the SAA Trust.

Striving for the divine consciousness is regarded to be beyond religious, national, or racial boundaries. Although no missionary work is carried out in India or abroad, a number of branches were established in India as well as in France, the United States, Canada, Germany, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, and Great Britain. These branches publish the works of Aurobindo and the Mother and organize seminars and conferences to disseminate the idea of human unity through the practice of Integral Yoga. The SAA and Auroville organize and participate in international projects.

Sri Aurobindo Society
c/o Bureau Central
3 Rangapillai Street
Pondicherry–605001
Tamil Nadu
India
<http://www.sriurobindoashram.org>
<http://www.auroville.org>

Melitta Waligora

See also: Meditation; Yoga.

References

- Ghose, Aurobindo. The Life Divine. Pondicherry, India: Sri Aurobindo Ashram, 1973.
- Ghose, Aurobindo. Synthesis of Yoga. Pondicherry, India: Sri Aurobindo Ashram, 1972.
- Kluback, W. Sri Aurobindo Ghose: The Dweller in the Lands of Silence. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.
- McDermott, Robert, ed. Six Pillars: Introductions to the Major Works of Sri Aurobindo. Chambersburg, PA: Wilson, 1974.
- Minor, Robert N. The Religious, the Spiritual, and the Secular: Auroville and Secular India. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

Sri Chinmoy Centre

Sri Chinmoy Centre is an international organization of individuals in more than 60 countries who claim Sri Chinmoy (1931–2007) as their spiritual leader, guide, and exemplar. Centre members aspire to world peace and harmony by means of serving humanity in a variety of ways, especially through offering instruction in meditation and exercise.

Sri Chinmoy was born Chinmoy Kumar Ghose in what is now Bangladesh. He was placed in the ashram of Sri Aurobindo in Pondicherry when he was orphaned at the age of 12 and spent 20 years at the ashram, achieving great states of enlightenment. Sri Chinmoy came to New York City in 1964, where he began organizing a following throughout the United States, including Chicago, Seattle, and Washington, D.C.

Sri Chinmoy advocated a method of guru devotion as the fastest means by which one can attain spiritual progress toward realization of what he called the Supreme (that is, God). Guru devotion requires the guru to formally accept and initiate the disciple, while the disciple must serve the guru, make the guru's needs and desires his or her own, and obey the guru implicitly. By meditating on the guru or on his image—which is the central practice of the group—the disciple is actually serving the Supreme that resides in the guru. Sri Chinmoy called this the path of love, devotion, and surrender, by which the disciple realizes the Supreme through the grace of the guru. Critics, however, claim that this practice led to sexual abuse and intimidation by Sri Chinmoy.

Peace leader Sri Chinmoy plays an esraj during an outdoor concert in Jamaica, Queens, a borough of New York City, on August 15, 1997. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Sri Chinmoy was a lifelong advocate of fitness as a spiritual goal, as well as an accomplished athlete himself. In 1977 he inaugurated a series of marathon and endurance races, and promoted ultra-marathons to publicize the need for world peace. The peace runs raised controversy at times, when American public school children were encouraged by local school boards to participate in races sponsored by a Hindu group. The athletic guru, who played tennis daily well into his seventies, received ridicule for his claim to raise 7,063.75 pounds in a one-arm overhead lift. He said that he performed other miraculous feats, such as lifting entire football teams, elephants, or one-ton pickup trucks on a single platform. Despite such claims, the guru was well respected for his peace efforts by world leaders, with former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev and Archbishop Desmond Tutu speaking of his dedication to world peace at the time of the guru's death. Sri Chinmoy conducted twice-weekly prayer and meditation sessions for staff at the United Nations Headquarters in New York for 37 years, and more than 700 UN dignitaries, members of the U.S. Congress, and world religious leaders attended his memorial service. His followers claim that he wrote 1,500 books and 115,000 poems, composed 20,000 songs, created 200,000 paintings, and performed at almost 800 peace concerts around the world.

Although Sri Chinmoy did not charge for his services as guru, a network of "Divine Enterprises" sells numerous items produced by the guru himself, including paintings, books, and tapes and CDs of his flute, esraj, and cello playing, as well as his devotional songs. The enterprises include vegetarian restaurants, boutiques, health food stores, printing shops, flower shops, and sporting goods stores. Devotees have continued to promote extreme sports and endurance races after the guru's death and maintain Divine Enterprises around the world.

Sri Chinmoy Centre
PO Box 32433
Jamaica, NY 11432
<http://www.peacerun.com/>
<http://www.peacerun.com/>

Rebecca Moore

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; Meditation.

References

Madhuri [Nancy Elizabeth Sands]. The Life of Sri Chinmoy. Jamaica, NY: Sri Chinmoy Lighthouse, 1972.

Sri Chinmoy. The Master and the Disciple: Insights into the Guru-Disciple Relationship. Jamaica, NY: Aum, 1985.

Sri Chinmoy. The Wisdom of Sri Chinmoy. San Diego: Blue Dove, 2000.

<http://www.srichinmoy.org/>

<http://www.srichinmoycentre.org/>

■ Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka (until 1972, Ceylon) is a multiethnic, multi-religious, and multilingual (Sinhalese, Tamil, and English) country of 21 million people (2009). At a rough estimate, there are 74 percent Sinhalese (low-country and Kandyan) and 18 percent Tamils (both Lankan and Indian). Important minorities are Moors, Malays, and Burghers (of mixed origin: Dutch, British, Ceylonese). On the basis of the 1981 census (total population, 14.8 million), religious populations are as follows: (Theravada) Buddhists, 10.3 million; Hindus, 2.3 million; Christians, 1.1 million; Muslims, 1.1 million; other faiths, 8,300. There is a close association between Buddhism and Sinhalese, and Hinduism and Tamils; Sinhalese, Tamils, and Burghers are Christians (Catholics and diverse Protestant groups); Moors and Malays are Muslims.

Buddhism was transferred to Sri Lanka by Mahinda (son of Aśoka) in the time of King Devanampiya Tissa (ca. 250–210 BCE). The Sinhalese tradition (Mahavamsa—that is, The Great Chronicle) sees in the events (the rejection of South Indian invaders) of the reign of King Dutthagamani (161–137) a confirmation of an intimate connection between national aspirations and the Buddhist cause, a tendency that revived in history several times. For several reasons, Sri Lanka became important for Theravada Buddhism: in the Alu-Vihara (2 miles from Matale) the Pali canon

Ancient Buddhist temple, Sri Lanka. (Corel)

SRI LANKA

Sri Lanka

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Buddhists	8,287,000	13,315,000	68.0	0.39	13,662,000	12,443,000
Hindus	1,970,000	2,550,000	13.0	0.43	2,600,000	2,350,000
Muslims	906,000	1,870,000	9.6	0.43	1,950,000	1,800,000
Christians	1,088,000	1,714,000	8.8	0.75	1,942,000	1,911,000
Roman Catholics	954,000	1,410,000	7.2	0.98	1,600,000	1,550,000
Protestants	65,100	200,000	1.0	2.08	230,000	240,000
Independents	21,200	170,000	0.9	2.92	230,000	250,000
Agnostics	40,000	90,000	0.5	0.43	120,000	140,000
Baha'is	6,700	15,000	0.1	0.39	25,000	35,000
Atheists	16,000	14,000	0.1	0.43	20,000	25,000
Sikhs	25,000	2,800	0.0	-5.19	3,000	3,000
Zoroastrians	1,800	2,400	0.0	0.42	2,400	2,400
Ethnoreligionists	1,000	1,000	0.0	0.43	1,000	1,000
New religionists	0	1,000	0.0	0.41	1,500	3,000
Chinese folk	500	800	0.0	0.42	1,200	1,500
Shintoists	0	160	0.0	0.40	400	500
Total population	12,342,000	19,576,000	100.0	0.43	20,328,000	18,715,000

was written down for the first time (in 80 BCE); in the fifth century CE, the great commentator Buddhaghosa composed highly important works (Visuddhimagga) that later became “norma normans” of Theravada Orthodoxy. Different Buddhist schools struggled to gain predominance in Sri Lanka, although only King Parakramabahu I (1153–1186) established the Mahavihara-tradition (of Buddhaghosa) as “orthodox.” In this regard Sinhalese Buddhism became standard for all South Asian Buddhism.

In addition to (Hinduistic) influences from India, which distracted Sri Lankan Buddhists for centuries, Muslim traders settled down along the coasts of Sri Lanka (but never became really influential). In the early 16th century the Portuguese started Catholic missionary work in Sri Lanka. Following colonial powers (Dutch, 1640; British, 1798–1956) promoted their preferred religion. In British times the Anglicans (now included in the Church of Sri Lanka, a union of several Protestant churches) and the Methodist Church, Sri Lanka gained ground. But the Roman Catholic Church has continued to be the largest Christian community.

Traditional Buddhism regained strength by the import of new ordination lines from Thailand (Siyam-Nikaya, 1753) and Burma (Amarapura-Nikaya, 1803; Ramañña-Nikaya, 1865). These constitute the Ma-hasangha (established order of monks) up to today. In the late 19th century a “new” Buddhism developed, which is to a certain extent the result of the encounter and confrontation with Protestantism. Scholars call this form either Protestant Buddhism or Buddhist Modernism. A mythic starting point of this development was one of the debates between low-land Buddhists and Anglicans/Methodists in Panadura (1873). Influenced by a publication of this famous debate, the Theosophical Society (through its president Henry S. Olcott) started to assist the “new” Buddhists in their emancipatory struggle. One of the most influential Buddhist figures in recent times, the anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933), founder of the Maha Bodhi Society, worked in that fashion.

Heinz Mürmel

See also: Ashoka; Church of Sri Lanka; Maha Bodhi Society; Methodist Church, Sri Lanka; Roman Catholic Church; Theosophical Society (Adyar).

References

Bartholomeusz, Tessa J. In Defense of Dharma: Just-War Ideology in Buddhist Sri Lanka. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.

Bechert, Heinz. Buddhismus, Staat und Gesellschaft in den Ländern des Theravada-Buddhismus. Bd.

I: Allgemeines und Ceylon. Frankfurt: Alfred Metzner Verlag, 1966.

Gombrich, Richard, and Gananth Obeyesekere.

Buddhism Transformed: Religious Change in Sri Lanka. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Manogaram, Chelvadurai, and Bryan Pfaffenberger, eds. The Sri Lankan Tamils: Ethnicity and Identity. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1994.

Peebles, Patrick. The History of Sri Lanka. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2006.

Seneviratne, H. L. The Work of Kings: The New Buddhism in Sri Lanka. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999.

Smith, Bardwell L., ed. Religion and Legitimation of Power in Sri Lanka. Chambersburg, PA: ANIMA, 1978.

Wickremeratne, Ananda. Buddhism and Ethnicity in Sri Lanka: A Historical Analysis. Kandy, Sri Lanka: International Centre for Ethnic Studies, 1995.

Sri Lanka, Hinduism in

In Sri Lanka there are two main representations of Hinduism: the Sri Lankan Tamil Hindus, who live mainly in the northern and eastern provinces, and the Indian Tamil Hindus, who live in the central highland on the island, especially in the area around Kandy and Nuwara Eliya. The Indian Tamil Hindus are mostly low-caste people. They came to the island in the 19th century from Tamil Nadu, imported by the British to work on their tea, coffee, and rubber plantations. The Sri Lankan Tamil Hindus are mostly from farming and fishing castes. They trace their roots back to the kingdoms prior to the time when King Elara (king of the damilas) was defeated by Dutthagamani (161–137 BCE)—the beginning of a Buddhist era as described in the Sinhalese chronicle Mahavamsa, written in the sixth century CE. The Tamil Hindus count, in all, 1.7 million—or around 8.5 percent of the Sri Lankan population of 21 million (2009). (The remaining Tamils, some 26 percent, are either Muslims or Christians.)

Both groups are mostly Shaivites, with a strong affiliation to the worship of Shakti and Shiva's two sons, Ganesha (Pillaiyar or Vinayakar in Tamil) and Karttikeya (Murugan in Tamil). Both groups practice a similar form of Tamil Shaivism rooted in the Shaiva Siddhanta tradition, a tradition that became vitally important in Tamil Nadu from around the seventh century and that is based on the smṛiti collection Tirumurai and the 28 Agamas considered as being shruti texts. The Tirumurai, a collection of 12 books written by the 63 bhakti poets called the Nayanmars, presents a strong bhakti devotion to Shiva and his manifestations. The Agamas describe the practice of the religion, including descriptions of how to practice yoga, when to conduct the daily puja (worship) and festivals, descriptions of how to install the god statues in the temples according to the four points of the compass, and the like. The Agamas also have an implicit theology with a monistic ontology, in which creation is seen as the radiations of God (Shiva), and in which mukti, or release from samsara (cycle of rebirth), is described as being identical to God, not as being a part of God. There will always be a distinct difference between Shiva and the devotees.

The combination of this theology and the bhakti-devotion is manifested in the temple worship, where the way of attaining mukti is possible through the darshanas (sights) of God, in which Shiva's arushakti (the energy of grace) will be shown to the devotee who is clean in body and mind.

In spite of these similarities, the two groups do not seem to go to the same temples for puja, even if they live in the same neighborhood (exceptions are pilgrimage sites such as Kataragama or Kathiraman in Tamil—the most important pilgrimage site on the island after the troubles started between Hindus and Buddhists in Jaffna). This is not only an issue of caste; it is also caused by differences in history and worship.

The reformist Arumuga Navalar (1829–1879) plays an especially important role in Sri Lankan Tamil Hinduism. He emphasized the difference between the secular sphere and the religious sphere, a distinction that made him emphasize the religious institution as the basis for the religious life, and as the only place in which one can cope with the limits of human behavior. Here, in the right atmosphere, human desires will be kept under control, because the puja will engage the body, mind, and voice. This distinction has two major outcomes visible in the Sri Lankan Tamil Hinduism of today: (1) an awareness of orthopraxis, when it comes to temple worship; and (2) an adjustment of tradition, when it comes to the secular working sphere.

Painted figures on a Hindu temple in Sri Lanka. (Corel)

Since the beginning of the 1980s, when the violent conflict between the Sinhalese and the Tamils escalated, Tamils fled the island to South India and the West. There are currently more than 150,000 Tamils in Canada and some 200,000 in Europe living as refugees. Wherever they settle, they have established their temples and socio-cultural institutions to maintain their tradition.

Marianne Qvortrup Fibiger

See also: Reincarnation; Tamil Shaivism; Yoga.

References

Bandage, Asoka. The Separatist Conflict in Sri Lanka: Terrorism, Ethnicity, Political Economy. London: Routledge, 2008.

Bartholomeusz, Tessa J. In Defense of Dharma: Just-War Ideology in Buddhist Sri Lanka. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2002.

Carter, John Ross, ed. Religiousness in Sri Lanka. Colombo, Sri Lanka: Marga Institute, 1979.

Dubey, Ravi Kant. Indo-Sri Lankan Relations: With Special Reference to the Tamil Problem. New Delhi: Deep and Deep, 1989.

Manogaram, Chelvadurai, and Bryan Pfaffenberger, eds. The Sri Lankan Tamils: Ethnicity and Identity. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1994.

“Religions in the History of Yalppanam.” Lanka 5 (December 1990): 3–223.

State Shinto

Modern State Shinto (Kokka Shinto), the official religion installed in Japan following the Meiji Revolution

(1868), harkened back to the earliest version of government-supported Shinto (seventh century CE) but also included many modern innovations. It evolved through the Meiji period (1868–1912) as a means to supply religious justification for the revival of the emperor’s social standing. Just three years after coming to power, the government issued an edict, which directed that shrines were to be used for state ritual, though as yet no official body had been created to oversee Shinto. (The Jingikan, a traditional government office which had been re-established in 1868, oversaw the kami, or gods, in general, but not Shinto specifically.) The government also did not want to allocate funds for the upkeep of most shrines—only the most famous ones such as Ise received support. The government’s relation to Shinto was vague and conflicted until 1900, when the Jinjakyoku, or Shrine Bureau, was established.

The establishment of the Jinjakyoku as a unit of the Home Ministry indicated the state’s new and stronger role relative to Shinto. In preceding decades, yet another bureau, the Bureau for Shrines and Temples (Sajikyoku), had hegemony over both Buddhist temples and Shinto shrines. But beginning in 1900, Shinto was managed by its own bureau, and all other religions were overseen by the newly established the Bureau for Religions (Shukyokuyoku). State Shinto became a separate reality.

In 1906, the government moved to ensure funding to Shinto shrines from local government budgets. With funds secured, the national government went on to dictate rules for shrines in a variety of areas, including etiquette and ritual (1907), finance (1908), and rites (1914). In the process authorities promulgated three separate laws prescribing garb and ritual at the main imperial shrine at Ise. As these laws were put in place, the government also emphasized the non-religious functions in which the Shinto shrines engaged. Authorities assumed that visiting the shrines and paying obeisance to both the kami and the emperor was simply each citizen’s civic duty. They saw this as a patriotic task transcending any particular religious beliefs, an observation that directly affected Christians and Buddhists, who were expected to perform rituals at the shrines alongside their Shinto neighbors. It was also common for school classes to visit Shinto shrines several times each year. Besides performing these so-called non-religious functions, the average shrine also continued to perform the variety of traditional religious practices it had always done, such as selling charms and performing funerals.

The Meiji emperor died in 1912 and his widow two years later. The construction of a shrine to honor them was initiated immediately after World War I. The national project to build the shrine had the effect of also highlighting the importance of the local shrines during the post-Meiji or Taisho era (1912–1926); however, at the same time, most shrines were under-funded and neglected by the government. The government acted in a somewhat “opportunistic” manner toward the Shinto shrines. On the one hand, it affirmed their integral role in the perpetuation of a pro-Japanese ideology that included veneration of the imperial family, while on the other hand it neglected their continuing religious functions. Government officials seemed to lack an understanding of the religious sentiments of those citizens who self-identified as Shintoists.

Through the era between the two World Wars, the Japanese Diet increasingly managed the Shinto shrines and deities in a way simply to increase social solidarity in the face of forced changes. Events such as the Kanto earthquake of 1923, new movements like Socialism, and the realities of Japanese life with the ups and downs of economic life kept the Diet under intense pressure through the 1920s. Meanwhile, a rising level of criticism of life at the shrines finally forced the government to establish a Commission for Shrine Research in 1929. The new Commission was charged with investigating the shrines’ legal status and economic resources, ranking them, and reviewing their ritual practices. Through the 1930s, the level of criticism did not abate as the government continued to be accused of ignoring the religious issues of shrine life.

In 1940, with the country at war on several fronts, the cabinet moved to set up yet another new bureau, the Office of State for Deity Affairs (Jingiin). The new bureau was not to simply oversee state ritual, but given powers to manage the entire shrine network. The Jingiin assumed responsibility for the Ise shrines, all other shrines, all priests and shrine officials, and ultimately anything regarding “reverence” paid to deities. The government upped its involvement in shrine life by directly assuming the duty of spreading the ideology of State Shinto as an institution. The Home Ministry now took charge of maintaining as well as promoting State Shinto.

The system of state-supported Shinto was among the big losers of World War II. Within months of assuming control of the government, the occupation forces forbid the government to continue any support for the Shinto shrines. They also directly attacked the underlying assumption of the emperor's divinity. He was but a mortal person. The ties between modern Shinto and the Japanese state abruptly ended. The shrines had to reorganize, and today they operate under the umbrella of Shrine Shinto, offering Shinto religion to those who claim it as their personal faith.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Ise Shrine, The; Meiji Jingu; Shinto.

References

- Kasahara, Kazuo, ed. A History of Japanese Religion. Tokyo: Dosei Publishing, 2001.
- Korematsu, Sakamoto. "The Structure of State Shinto: Its Creation, Development and Demise." In Shinto in History, edited by John Breen and Mark Teeuwen, 272–294. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press, 2000.

Statues—Buddhist

Buddhism was initiated by Siddhartha Gautama the Buddha (563–483 BCE), and for its first centuries, representations of the Buddha were discouraged. This lack of "pictures" of the Buddha seems to be in line with the early Buddhist scripture called the Digha Nikaya (a collection of discourses by the Buddha included in the Sutta Pitaka), one of the "three baskets" of the Pali canon from which Theravada Buddhism finds its authority. The Digha Nikaya contains sayings in which the Buddha specifically discourages the making of representations of himself after the death of his human body. As Buddhist art, especially sculptures, emerged in the third century BCE, the Buddha tended to be represented by a symbol rather than by a human body.

The Buddha's presence could be suggested by images of the Bodhi tree (Ficus religiosa) under which he attained enlightenment, the cushion on which he sat when he attained enlightenment, the stupa representing his passing from this life, or paranirvana, his footprint(s) signifying his presence, or the Dharma Wheel representing the first sermon. At times the Buddha is presented as part of a trident, a symbol of the Buddhist's Triple Jewels—Buddha (the teacher), Dharma (the teaching), Sangha (the community)—the essential core of the faith.

It is suggested that sculptors hesitated to portray the Buddha in human form because the qualities of transcendence, purity, and spirituality can be more effectively conveyed symbolically. It was believed by many that having achieved paranirvana, Siddhartha had ceased to exist and since he was not of this world, one could not depict the Buddha's spiritual accomplishments. This condition of non-existence became an obstacle to the artist who wished to present visually the formless and transcendental Buddha.

The development of iconic representation of the Buddha coincided with the rise of Mahayana Buddhism and the popularity of devotionism built around bodhisattvas that emerged in prominence during the first and second centuries CE. The heroic and sacrificial character of the bodhisattva, the evolved being who vows to save all beings by sharing the merits she or he has accumulated, is an outgrowth of the idealization of the historical Buddha, though some scholars have suggested that it intruded in Mahayana Buddhism from the outside. Importantly, Mahayana ideals differed from Theravada teachings that understood the historical Buddha as an exceptional individual and teacher. With the spread of the new perspective among the population, more readily accessible images of the Buddha were needed to replace the highly abstract notions of enlightenment and presence represented by footprints and other symbols. The development of the Buddha image was one response.

When the first images of the Buddha finally appeared in the first century CE, the artists showed no intention to sculpt either an anatomically correct human Buddha or a historical likeness of Siddhartha Gautama. The idealized images that appeared in Mathura in northern India followed a tradition of presenting the human form composed of a set of 32 major and 80 minor lakṣana, or marks associated with manly beauty and heroic ideals. Thus the Buddha came to possess a smooth and perfectly proportioned body, with every aspect of the image seen as representing an ideal found in nature—ears like mangos, thighs like a gazelle, and limbs like a banyan tree. Long arms allow the Buddha to embrace all beings. The ear lobes recall the nobility who wore heavy ear ornaments. The golden body gives off a wondrous scent. On the palms of his hands and/or the soles of his feet one finds the dharma wheel or Buddhist form of the swastika.

As in Christian art representing Jesus, the image of the Buddha image is often surrounded by a halo and/or aureole (circles of light), symbolic of the Buddha's immeasurable brilliance of truth and wisdom. The Buddha's wisdom is seen in the ushnisha, a “bump” or extracranial protrusion.

The carefully constructed Mathuran images contrast sharply with those that appeared about the same time in Gandhara, in what today is Pakistan and Afghanistan. Here the Hellenistic tradition brought by Alexander the Great was still alive and art followed very different standards. Sculptors crafted Buddhist images with anatomical accuracy, spatial depth, and foreshortening. The straight sharply chiseled Apollonian noses, brows, and mustaches capture a “frozen moment.” The Gandharan artists also transformed the ushnisha into a topknot or turban and adorned the body with a diaphanous (thin), toga-like robe.

These two early images of the Buddha would over the next centuries merge to create synthesized images and be carried far and wide as Buddhism spread where they would develop into the many schools of Buddhist art that would appear throughout Asia to the present. Over the centuries, especially after the destruction of Buddhism in India following the Muslim invasion of the 11th century, two very different traditions of Buddhist sculpture can be seen in the Theravada and Mahayana lands.

The Mathuran tradition of picturing an idealized Buddha image came to predominate in Theravada lands. It was also the case that, while developing different nationalistic variations, Theravada sculptors in southern Asia limited their work to the portrayal of the historical Buddha and the events related to this life. In visiting a temple in Sri Lanka, Thailand, or Myanmar, one will tend to find the central worship area dominated by a single statue of the historical Buddha carved or molded from costly materials—marble and gold being most evident, but occasionally other precious substances like jade.

In Theravada lands, the Buddha seated in a meditative pose is seen most often, but a standing Buddha is a popular alternative and in Thailand and Myanmar the reclining Buddha is a unique form of representation. In viewing the Buddha, the placement of the hands is most important. The hand positions, termed mudras, convey meanings well known throughout the Buddhist world. For example, the sitting Buddha is often shown with his left hand resting in his lap and the right hand over the thigh with the palm facing forward and the fingertips touching the Earth. This form, called the Bhumisparsa mudra, symbolizes the Buddha's renunciation of worldly attachments, a key moral precept for Buddhists. Equally popular, the Buddha will be seen with both hands lying in his lap with both palms facing upward, the Dhyana mudra, symbolizing the disciplined mind seeking enlightenment. The reclining Buddha is usually seen as a representation of the Buddha's state of enlightenment just prior to his mahanirvana (death).

This tradition of picturing primarily the historical Buddha is also alive and well in the meditative forms of Mahayana Buddhism—Chan, Son, and Zen—outside of Theravada lands. Meditation halls, if they have any representation of the Buddha at all, will tend to have but a single statue of the historical Buddha.

In sharp contrast to Theravada lands, the artists of the main Mahayana lands, especially those of the Vajrayana and Pure Land traditions, from China and Tibet to Korea and Japan, have sought not only to picture the historical Buddha, but all of the many celestial Buddhas and bodhisattvas and the transcendental lands they inhabit. The Pure Land sutras, for example, describe in exquisite detail the “other world” of the Western Paradise that is reigned over by Amitabha (or Amida) Buddha. Maitreya, the future Buddha, emerged as a popular figure during the Kushan Empire (first–third centuries CE) period, soon to be joined by the likes of Vairocana, the universal Buddha, Bhaisajyaguru, the Medicine Buddha, and Kshitogarbha, Earth repository Buddha. These “other” Buddhas, especially Amitabha, the central figure in Pure Land Buddhism, often assume the central position in Buddhist temples and shrines and will either push the historical Buddha to a subordinate position or even completely replace him. Outside the Buddhist community, especially in material written for consumption by modern tourists, statues of the various male Buddhas and bodhisattvas tend to be confused with images of the historical Buddha.

No figure is more popular than the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara, who also appears as the female bodhisattva Guan Yin (aka Kwan Yin or Kannon), possibly the most ubiquitous figure throughout the Mahayana world. Guan Yin transcends even the Buddhist context and appears among the Daoist deities of the popular Chinese religions.

Buddhist Mega Statuary These celestial beings and their realms pictured in Mahayana literature have inspired the creation of monumental images and spectacular symbolism. This trend to build mega statues (usually defined as those twice the size of normal humans) was especially noticeable in the 20th century, but appeared quite early. Toward the beginning of the fifth century CE, for example, the 175-foot-tall Vairocana Buddha, the universal monarch, was hewn into a cliff at Bamiyan in Afghanistan. This was the statue that was destroyed by the Taliban (along with the smaller but also impressive 120-foot-tall accompanying Buddha) in 2001. In 752 CE a 53-foot-tall seated Vairocana Buddha was cast and erected in the Todai-ji Temple in Nara, Japan. It would become the model for the giant Amida Buddha at Kamakura, Japan, constructed early in the 13th century. Theravada Buddhists did not escape the notion of building mega statues, and impressive representations of the historical Buddha may now be seen across southern Asia.

Mega statues come in all shapes and sizes; most assume a sitting (meditative) or standing position, but statues of the historical Buddha in southern Asian assume the reclining position. The statues may be roughly divided between those of the historical Buddha and those of the other Buddhas and bodhisattvas. The various statues are also distinguished by the material from which they are constructed—stone, wood, concrete, bronze, or steel. Statues made of more mundane material may be covered with valuable metal (most commonly gold) and/or jewels. Among the more impressive of the mega statues are the following.

Standing Buddhas The Vairocana statue, in Bamiyan, Afghanistan, when destroyed in 2001, was cited as the largest Buddhist statue in the world, though it was actually somewhat smaller than the statue at Leshan, China. It was the biggest for several centuries after it was carved out of the cliff's stone in the fifth century. Plans have been announced to reconstruct it, but the continued war in the region has delayed any action.

Spring Temple Buddha, a copper statue of Vairocana Buddha, in Lushan County, Henan, China, is one of several prominent mega statues that have been erected in the People's Republic of China (and signifying a new more positive attitude of the government toward Buddhism). Erected in 2002, it stands at 420 feet with a 66-foot lotus pedestal. It is the tallest statue in the world. The announcement that the statue was being planned followed the destruction of Bamiyan statue and the beginning of the proposed giant statue of Meitreyia Buddha by the followers of the Dalai Lama.

The Gautama Buddha statue in Monywa, Sagaing Division, Myanmar, which stands 380 feet on a 44-foot base, is the second-tallest statue in the world and the tallest in southern Asia. It was completed in 2008 and stands behind a 295-foot-long statue of the reclining Buddha.

The Ushiku Daibutsu, a statue of Amida Buddha, is located in Ushiku, Ibaraki Prefecture, Japan. Completed in 1995, it is the third-tallest statue in the world and the largest statue in Japan. Its 394-foot height includes a 33-foot base and 33-foot lotus platform. Visitors inside the statue may take an elevator to the observation floor located 279 feet above the surrounding land.

The Guan Yin statue at Sanya on the island of Hainan, off the coast of China, was completed in 2005. The inaugural service for the 591-foot statue was led by 108 prominent Chinese Buddhist monks. It is now the fourth-tallest statue in the world.

Seated Buddhas The Leshan Giant Buddha of Leshan, Sichuan Province, in the People's Republic of China, depicts Maitreya, the future Buddha. Begun in the year 713, it took almost a century to carve out of the hillside. Its scenic location is above the spot where three rivers converge. At 233 feet, it is the largest stone Buddha statue in the world. The fingers on each hand are about 11 feet long.

Sitting Buddha, Penang, Malaysia. (J. Gordon Melton)

The Kannon statue, Usami, in Shizaoka Prefecture, Japan, sits outside the Usami Kannon Temple. At 164 feet, it is the tallest sitting Kannon (Guan Yin) statue in the world. It was completed in 1981.

A statue of the historical Buddha at Dickwella, Sri Lanka, on the grounds of the Wewurukannala Temple is the largest Buddha statue in Sri Lanka. At 164 feet it rivals the Kannon statue at Usami.

The statue of Amitabha Buddha on Lantau Island has become one of the symbols of Hong Kong and one of its major tourist attractions. At 85 feet, it is surpassed in size by a number of seated Buddhas, but all are of stone or concrete. The Hong Kong Buddha is now described as the largest seated outdoor bronze Buddha statue in the world.

A similar statue, though made of concrete, of a seated Amitabha is located in Pukuashan, Changhua, Taiwan. It reaches 86 feet in the air and is the largest seated Buddha statue in Taiwan. In 2006, a 236-foot standing Maitreya Buddha was erected at Ermei Township, Hsinchu County, Taiwan, as the centerpiece for the recently opened Maitreya Holy Land.

Reclining Buddhas The largest image of the reclining Buddha exists as a relief carved from the stone at Yiyang County, Jiangxi Province, in the People's Republic of China. As with all reclining Buddhas, it pictures the historical Buddha. The image is 1,365 feet long (and 223 feet high), but is not freestanding.

Reclining Buddha mega statue, Penang, Malaysia. (J. Gordon Melton)

The largest freestanding reclining Buddha is located at Monywa, Myanmar, close to the Kyauktawgyi Pagoda and in front of a recently completed standing mega statue. It is 295 feet in length. Myanmar is home to the five largest reclining Buddha statues, including the largest one located indoors.

The largest reclining Buddha in Thailand is located indoors at Wat Pho in Bangkok. It is 151 feet in length and covered in gold leaf.

The largest Buddha statue in Korea is a statue of the Medicine Buddha located at Donghwas Temple at Tongilyak-sa. Donghwas was dedicated to the cause of the reunification of the Korean Peninsula. It rises almost 100 feet into the air, though a third of that height is supplied by its large pedestal. Two pieces of Buddha's bones presented by the government of Myanmar rest in the body of the statue, believed to be the largest granite Buddha statue in the world. It is the largest statue of the Medicine Buddha.

Other Mega Statues The founder of the reformed or Gelugpa School of Tibetan Buddhism, Tsong Khapa, is often honored with statues. The largest is at Gongsa Monastery, Qingha, China. It has been recognized by the Guinness Book of Records as the largest indoor gold-plated Buddha statue.

A notable standing Guan Yin statue is located at a temple complex northeast of the Chengde Imperial Palace in Chengde, Hebei Province, China. It is 73 feet tall and is believed to be the highest and largest wood statue in the world. In the Yong-He Gong Temple, the Tibetan temple in Beijing, however, there is a standing Maitreya statue that had been presented by the Dalai Lama to the Emperor Qianlong, the son of Emperor Yongzheng. The entire statue is carved from a rare sandal tree. It is 85 feet in height and 26 feet in diameter, with 26 feet buried under the ground. The Guinness Book of Records lists it as the largest wooden statue.

The Maitreya Project Before his death, Lama Thubten Yeshe (1935–1984), the founder of the Foundation for the Preservation of the Mahayana tradition, the primary organization promoting the Gelugpa School of Tibetan Buddhism, and supporting the Dalai Lama, expressed the idea of creating a large statue of Maitreya, the future Buddha, in the Himalayan Mountains of northern India. The idea has been carried forward by his successor, Lama Thubten Zopa Rinpoche (b. 1946).

As developed, the project aims at the erection of a 500-foot bronze statue of Maitreya to be built at Kushinagar, Uttar Pradesh, India, where the historical Buddha lived his last days on Earth. The statue, when completed, would become the largest statue in the world. The Maitreya figure would be seated on a throne, and the building constituted as the throne is designed to house several temples, an exhibition hall, a museum, a library, an audio-visual theater, and various hospitality services. It will be surrounded by a landscaped park with places for meditation, fountains, and tranquil pools. The buildings and grounds of the project will contain a remarkable and inspiring collection of sacred art.

As the project will take some time to finance and complete, a portion of the funds being raised is being siphoned off to initiate immediately some of the public services envisioned as an integral part of the overall effort. Those services began with an educational fund that annually provides free education to around 500 students at a project-supported school at Bodhgaya, India.

Edward A. Irons

See also: Bodhisattva; Gelugpa; Guan Yin's Birthday; Kamakura; Kushinagara; Mahayana Buddhism; Mudras; Pure Land Buddhism; Statues—Christian; Theravada Buddhism; Tibetan Buddhism; Tsong Khapa.

References

- Fisher, Robert E. Buddhist Art and Architecture. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1993.
- Saunders, E. Dale. Mudra, a Study of Symbolic Gestures in Japanese Buddhist Sculpture. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1960.
- Sechel, Dietrich. The Art of Buddhism. New York: Crown Publishers, 1963.
- Tobu Museum of Art, et al. Buddha the Spread of Buddhist Art in Asia. Tokyo: NHK, 1998.

Statues—Christian

Christianity emerged into prominence in the fourth century after years of existence as an underground and somewhat clandestine movement. Prior to the various steps taken by Constantine the Great (272–337) to first legalize and then privilege Christianity, art consisted of drawings and paintings at sites used for worship. Beginning in the fourth century art and architecture in the Christian world flourished and developed in various directions, most notably in the construction and decoration of the interior of church buildings. Images of Christian scenes and Christian heroes proliferated. As a cult of saints emerged, questions were raised about the use of images in Christian life and worship, and in the eighth and ninth centuries an intense controversy ensued over the use of what was termed “graven images,” strictly forbidden in the Ten Commandments. For two periods (730–787 and 814–842) the emperors of the Byzantine Empire backed the iconoclasts, who condemned the making of any images (either paintings or statues) that intended to represent Jesus or one of the saints.

Those who opposed and finally won over against the iconoclasts argued that the appearance of Jesus overrode the second commandment as he was the visible image of the invisible God. They also contrasted Christian icons and statuary over against idols. The latter picture things/persons who were unreal, while Christian art pictures real persons.

The victory in Constantinople by those opposed to iconoclasm led to the development of a Western Catholic position on sacred images. Church leaders around the Emperor Charlemagne (747–814) had erroneously come to believe that the Byzantines had approved the worship of images. In countering this opinion, they approved the veneration of images as the representation of the reality of the divinity of Christ and sanctity of the saints. More substantively, they rejected the Orthodox position that icons (images of Christ or one of the saints) partook in some degree of the nature of the thing they represented. Catholics understood images (be they icons or statues) to be simply objects made by artists that stimulated the senses of the faithful. They had no inherent spiritual value, but were to be respected solely for what they represented.

In the medieval period, Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy began to be distinguished on a variety of issues, but one was the continuance of the use of statuary in Christian worship, both inside and outside of church buildings, in the West. In the East, where the iconoclastic controversy had been focused, the iconoclastic position was reinforced by the conquering Muslims. Once Islam gained political hegemony, icons survived much easier as part of religious life, whereas statues practically disappeared. In the West, Christ was widely represented in statues, as was the holy family and the saints.

The use of statues within the Roman Catholic Church would be called into question by the Protestant Reformation. While Lutherans were less intense on the issues of religious statues, the Reformed movement led by John Calvin (1509–1564) made a point of condemning Rome of idolatry. Calvinists removed all statuary from their churches. Most churches growing from the Reformation have continued the stance against statuary.

Christian Mega Statues The creation of mega statues (usually defined as statues larger than twice normal human size) within the Christian (Catholic) community was a 20th-century phenomenon. Most statuary, even at shrines, tend to be life size or smaller. Through much of the century, the model for the Christian mega statue was the statue of Christ the Redeemer that stands atop Corcovado Mountain 2,300 feet above the city of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. With its pedestal, it stands 120 feet tall. Its extended arms spans 98 feet. After nine years of work, it was completed in 1931, and until the 1980s was the largest Christian statue in the world. A chapel is located in its base.

Completed in 1994, the statue of Cristo de la Concordia, a statue of Jesus Christ, located on San Pedro hill in Cochabamba, Bolivia, is now the tallest statue of Christ in the world. It stands 112.2 feet tall and rests on a pedestal that adds an additional 20.5 feet. Its total height of 133 feet makes it larger than Rio's Christ the Redeemer, if only by a few feet.

In recent decades, a third statue entered the scene as a Christina mega statue. Cristo del Otero, located in Palencia, Spain, is a 98-foot statue of Christ designed by Víctorio Macho. It is almost equal in size to the Christ the Redeemer statue, making it the third-tallest statue of Christ in the world.

One Christian mega statue of note is found in Asia. The Cristo Rei (Christ the King) statue located at Dili, the capital of Timore Leste, was the gift of Indonesia's then-president Suharto (1921–2008) in 1995. Timore Leste, then known as East Timor, was a part of Indonesia. In 2002 it became an independent country. The statue depicting Christ with open arms and standing on a globe was located at the end of a peninsula and faces outward toward the rest of Indonesia.

A decade prior to the completion of the Cristo de la Concordia, in 1983, the devotees of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Trujillo, Venezuela, completed a statue in her honor on the hills above the city. At 153 feet, the Virgen de la Paz is now the tallest statue in Latin America and the tallest Christian statue in the world. The statue, designed by Manuel de La Fuente, was placed on a hill above the site where Mary was said to have appeared on occasion and where to this day devotees gather to pray and place flowers (a sign of thanksgiving for favors granted). Visitors to the statue may climb within its hollow interior to points that provide views of the surrounding countryside.

Second only to the Virgen de la Paz is La Virgen de Quito located on the Panecillo, a hill just south of Quito, Ecuador. The Panecillo stands at some 9,840 feet and is visible from the center of the city. The statue is approximately 148-feet, including the 36-foot base upon which it rests. The statue, commissioned in 1976, copies an 18th-century statue in a church in Quito that is unique in that the Virgen is given a set of angel's wings.

The third-largest statue of the Virgin Mary appears to be the one designated as Our Lady of the Rockies located on the continental divide overlooking Butte, Montana. Completed in 1985, it stands 90 feet in height with a base located 8,510 feet above sea level.

Prior to the 20th century, the largest Marian statue overlooked the city of LePuy, France. The bronze statue of the Virgin and child, named Notre-Dame de France, was made from 213 Russian cannons taken following the Siege of Sevastopol (1854–1855), a major battle in the Crimean War. It was completed and dedicated in 1860.

Frequently cited among the mega statues of Mary is the one of the Madonna and child in Khaskovo, Bulgaria. In fact, the Khaskovo statue is only 46 feet high, though it rests on a 56-foot platform. The statue was granted a Guinness Book of Records certificate, though with the qualifying statement that it is a statue of the Virgin with child. It is the largest Marian statue in the Eastern Orthodox world. It was officially completed and dedicated in 2003.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calvin, John; Constantine the Great; Eastern Orthodoxy; Istanbul; Roman Catholic Church; Statues—Buddhist.

References

- Christie, Yves, and Velmans Christi. Art of the Christian World, A.D. 200–1500. New York: Rizzoli International Publications, 1982.
- “In Focus: The World’s Largest Religious Statues.” <http://www.bravenewtraveler.com/2009/04/10/happy-easter-the-worlds-religious-statues-in-photographs/>. Accessed March 25, 2009.
- McClinton, Catherine Morrison. Christian Church Art Through the Ages. New York: Macmillan, 1962.

Steiner, Rudolf

1861–1925

Rudolf Steiner, one of the most impressive of the late 19th- and early 20th-century Western Esoteric scholars, was also the founder of two Esoteric communities, the Anthroposophical Society and the Christian Community.

The Austrian philosopher of religion and writer Rudolf Steiner. (Getty Images)

Steiner was born February 27, 1861, in Kraljevic, Hungary (now Croatia), the son of a railroad worker. His father’s job took the family to Pottshach, Austria (1863), then to Neudoerfl, Hungary (1869), and finally to Vienna in the 1870s. At the age of 18 he entered the Technical University in Vienna with the idea of eventually going to work for the railroad like his father. His life, however, now began to move in other directions. He had been a very sensitive child and had had various experiences with a supersensible reality. These experiences exerted considerable influence on Steiner, who gravitated toward studies in the humanities and the arts. He eventually transferred to the University of Vienna, where he was introduced to the work of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832).

In 1883, Steiner was invited to edit the scientific writings for the Kuerschner edition of Goethe’s works and write the introduction. He would spend more than a decade on the task, during which time he would become well known for his scholarly accomplishments. In 1888 he was offered a position at the Goethe Archives at Weimar. Between 1890 and 1897 he worked on the Weimar edition of Goethe's works. He completed his doctoral degree in 1891.

While in Weimar, he had time to pursue what would become the dominating concern of his life, bridging the gap between the world of sense experience and the invisible spiritual world. He published his first major exploration of the spiritual life, The Philosophy of Spiritual Activity, in 1894, in which he offered his initial reflections on the role of thinking as a spiritual activity and conscience as a moral reality.

In 1897, Steiner moved to Berlin as the editor of a literary magazine. Here, he encountered the newly opened chapter of the Theosophical Society, which soon provided the environment for his future work. He began to lecture for the Society regularly. He also went through an intense period of inner struggle that culminated in a visionary experience of witnessing the crucifixion of Christ on Golgotha. This experience led him to conclude that he had gained a true Esoteric understanding of the meaning of Jesus' mission and Christianity.

Steiner now entered a new phase of his intellectual work and during the first decade of the new century would write a number of books sorting out his Esoteric perspectives. His new approach to Christianity was presented in Christianity as Mystical Fact (1901). He followed with Knowledge of the Higher Worlds and Its Attainment (1904), Theosophy (1904), and Occult Science: An Outline (1909).

With some hesitancy, in 1902 he became the head of the German section of the Theosophical Society. He disliked their emphasis on Eastern philosophy, preferring a Western Esoteric approach to the spiritual life. His concerns came forward in 1909, when he publicly disagreed with Annie Besant, the international president of the Society, at one of their conventions. She gave a talk in which she spoke of Buddha's superiority over Christ, while Steiner responded with a talk about Buddha as a precursor of Christ. The following year, Besant announced the formation of the Order of the Star of the East to prepare the way for Jiddu Krishnamurti, whom Besant believed to be the coming World Savior. Steiner refused to promote either the Order or Krishnamurti.

As the Order gained prominence in the program of the Society, Steiner proposed that Anthroposophy be formed as a section within the Society for those who did not wish to follow the Society's Oriental drift. That proved a short-term solution, and the following year he resigned from the Theosophical Society and formed the Anthroposophical Society.

As part of his work with Theosophical Society, Steiner had written and produced several mystery plays. In fact, his second wife was an actress. The break with Theosophy spurred him to design a building in which what he saw as the proper atmosphere for the drama would be present. The infant Anthroposophical Society found the resources to build the proposed structure in Dornach, Switzerland, just as World War I was begun. He named it the Goetheanum.

Steiner spent the war years in relative quiet, but during the decade after the war he vigorously promoted Anthroposophy and laid the ground work for the future application of his work in some prominent areas. In Stuttgart, for example, he opened the first Waldorf School to explore his ideas about education. Society members would subsequently found similar schools wherever the organization spread. In 1922, he responded to some religious leaders within the Society by sanctioning the founding of the Christian Community, which embodied his approach to theology and worship. In 1923–1924 he reformed the Anthroposophical Society and added an Esoteric section for primary explorations in self-development through what he termed spiritual science.

When Steiner died at Dornach on March 30, 1925, the Society was still largely confined to German-speaking Europe. It made its way to the German American community in the mid-1920s and soon spread across Europe. The practical application of his ideas would lead to the formation of structures to practice biodynamic agriculture, Anthroposophical medicine, and the new art of eurythmy.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Anthroposophical Society; Besant, Annie; Krishnamurti Foundations; Western Esoteric Tradition.

References

Easton, Stewart C. Rudolf Steiner: Herald of a New Epoch. Spring Valley, NY: Anthroposophic Press, 1982.

Hemleben, Johannes. Rudolf Steiner. East Grinstead, UK: Henry Goulden, 1975.

Shepherd, A. P. Rudolf Steiner: Scientist of the Invisible. Rochester, VT: Inner Traditions/Bear & Company, 1987.

Steiner, Rudolf. Christianity as Mystical Fact. West Nyack, NY: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1961.

Steiner, Rudolf. Cosmic Memory. West Nyack, NY: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1959.

Steiner, Rudolf. The Life, Nature and Cultivation of Anthroposophy. London: Rudolf Steiner Press, 1963.

Steiner, Rudolf. Rudolf Steiner: An Autobiography. Trans. by Rita Stebbing. West Nyack, NY: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1977.

Welburn, Andrew. Rudolf Steiner's Philosophy. Edinburgh: Floris Books, 2004.

Wilkinson, Roy. Rudolf Steiner: An Introduction to His Spiritual World-View: Anthroposophy. East Sussex, UK: Temple Lodge, 2001.

Stella Maris Gnostic Church

The Stella Maris Gnostic Church, one of a number of South American Gnostic sect groups, emerged from obscurity in the summer of 1999, when reports circulated that its members had disappeared into the mountains, ready to commit suicide. The story later proved to be a hoax.

Modern Gnosticism emerged in 19th-century Europe as part of the occult milieu. It was then taken to South America early in the 20th century by German teacher Arnoldo Krumm-Heller (1876–1949), who had been given authority to carry the movement to Latin America at a conference in Germany in 1907. At about the same time, he was also consecrated as a bishop in the Gnostic Catholic Church by H. C. Peithman. The Stella Maris Gnostic Church was founded in 1989 by Rodolfo Perez and former members of the Universal Christian Gnostic movement. It is headquartered in Cartagena, Colombia.

In June 1999, the mother of one of the church's members complained about the group and asked the local authorities to assist her in removing her daughter from it. They did not feel it was their responsibility to act. A month later, the group left Cartagena for its annual retreat. The day after the small group (with fewer than 100 members) departed, Colombian papers carried stories that the group had headed for the Sierra Nevada Mountains, where they expected to meet a spaceship that would take them to another world. The Sierra Nevada has been the focus of UFO reports, and many flying saucer buffs believe it to be a place where direct contact with extraterrestrials is possible.

The story was picked up by newspapers internationally and tied to memories of the suicide of the members of the Heaven's Gate group. However, the next day, Perez and several members of the group went on Colombian television to point out their lack of interest in UFOs. They emphasized that they would return home when their retreat was over. The retreat was not taking place in flying saucer country, but San Pedro, Colombia. The media had been routinely informed of the facts concerning the retreat, but the leading Colombian daily, El Tiempo, ran the initial story without referring to the facts that they had at hand.

The story of the group press conference was carried by the Colombian media, but no follow-up appeared in the international media for almost a year. In the spring of 2000, however, an obscure British magazine, Fortean Times, finally printed the story of the hoax in its May issue. Very quickly, the small church returned to obscurity. A variety of Internet sites have posted the stories from 1999, but the church has not been in the news since.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Gnostic Catholic Church; Gnosticism.

Reference

Murdie, Alan. "The Stella Maris Cult." Fortean Times 133 (May 2000): 66.

Sthanakavasi Jain Tradition

The origins of the Sthanakavasi (literally, hall-dweller) Svetambara Jain tradition can be traced to the Gujarati Jain reformer Lonka Sah, Lunka or Lumpaka (ca. 1415–1489), who protested against the laxity of the contemporary Tapagaccha Murtipujak Svetambara Jain mendicants, because their conduct did not match the prescriptions of the oldest canonical texts. Lonka was the first layman who started a new religious movement within the Jain tradition. Because he copied manuscripts for Jain monks, he had unique access to the Jain scriptures and noticed that the oldest Svetambara scriptures do not mention the practice of merit-making by giving money as religious gifts (dana) for the construction of temples, nor the performance of image-worship (murti-puja) or similar ostentatious rituals involving the breaking of flowers and other acts of violence. On the contrary, the scriptures prescribed possessionlessness and strict asceticism: nonviolence, self-restraint, and penance. Lonka, therefore, rejected both image-worship and the authority of 14 (or 15) of the 45 canonical texts that contain references to it. He also denounced the legitimacy of the existing image-worshipping monastic orders and started to live as an uninitiated ascetic, following the oldest textual prescriptions himself.

The surviving original sources for Lonka's biography and doctrine are not entirely reliable. But most texts agree that, in contrast to common practice, Lonka accepted alms from all castes but no money, that he did not possess a mouthmask (mukhavastrika), a stick (danda), or a broom (rajoharana), and that he practiced neither image-worship nor the Jain rites of purification (pratikramana and posadha), which also involved elements of image-worship. Lonka quickly gained a large following among the Jains in Gujarat. Although he did not create a monastic order himself, he laid down instructions for his followers. The original texts were thought to be lost until 1964, when D. D. Malvaniya claimed to have rediscovered them in the L.D. Institute library in Ahmedabad in the form of two anonymously written manuscripts: Lunka Na Saddahiya Ane Karya Athavan Bolno and Lunka Na Hundi.

The Lonkagaccha mendicant tradition was formed by Lonka's first disciple, Bhana, who apparently initiated himself and 45 followers of Lonka's doctrine sometime between 1471 and 1476 by accepting the five great vows of the Jain ascetics (mahavrata). In the first decades of the 16th century the Lonkagaccha split into several more or less organized regional or revisionist Lonkagaccha groups, most of which comprised lay-ascetics, or yatis, who did not accept all of the five great vows or reverted to image-worship. In the mid-16th century, the Lonka tradition was split into more than 13 independent branches, which further divided into separate subgroups. Until the demise of the Lonkagaccha yatis in the 19th and 20th centuries, only four branches survived: the Lahauri Lonkagaccha (founded ca. 1504); the Nagauri Lonkagaccha (ca. 1528); the Gujarati Lonkagaccha Mota Paks (Varsinha Paks or Kesav Paks) (ca. 1555); and the Gujarati Lonkagaccha Nana Paks (Kumvar Paks) (ca. 1555).

In protest against the renaissance of image-worship and the renewed laxity of conduct of most Lonkagaccha (lay) ascetics, five reformers—the so-called panca muni—split off from the Kesav Paks, the Kumvar Paks, and the Ekal Patriya Panth (a lay movement of unknown origin) in the early 16th century and founded the principal Sthanakavasi mendicant traditions, which still exist today. The five traditions share three doctrinal characteristics: (1) rejection of image-worship, (2) strict ascetic conduct in accordance with the prescriptions in the 32 accepted Jain scriptures, and (3) compulsory use of a mouthmask to prevent the swallowing of living beings such as insects and dust. The square white mouthmask is now the principal external feature of all Sthanakavasi mendicants (the Terapanth Svetambara mendicants use a rectangular blue mask). Sthanakavasi laity generally reject material forms of worship (dravya) and practice only asceticism (tapas) and inner forms of worship (bhava), such as meditation (dhyana) and study (svadhyaya). Instead of images, they venerate the mendicants as living symbols of the Jain ideals.

They also practice daya dharma, the religious work of compassionate help (dana) for animals and human beings, in order to accumulate merit (punya) and thus to advance on the path of salvation. These three typical forms of ritual practice are known under the titles guna puja, deva guru, and dana-daya. In 1760, Muni Bhikhan, the founder of the Terapanth Svetambara Jain tradition, severed himself from the Dharmadasa Sthanakavasi tradition because he rejected merit-making as such, in favor of a purely salvation-oriented ascetic style of life.

The Sthanakavasi Jain tradition is presently divided into 26 mendicant orders whose origins can be traced to one or more of the five principal reformers (kriya uddhara) of the aniconic Jain tradition, although the available sources are inconsistent: (1) Jivaraja has been acknowledged as the initiator of all crucial innovations of the Sthanakavasi tradition, though some sources give priority to Lava. He lived sometime between 1524 and 1641 (probably having been born in Surat) and separated himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1551, 1609, or 1629. Apparently it was he who selected the 32 Svetambara scriptures that are now accepted by all Sthanakavasis (possibly by adding the Vyavaharasutra or the Avasyakasutra or both to Lonka's list, but there is no compelling evidence), and who introduced the mouthmask (muhapatti), the rajo-haran, and other paraphernalia used by present-day Sthanakavasi mendicants. (2) Dharmasimha (1599–1671) severed himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1628, 1635, or 1644 in Dariyapuri in Ahmedabad and founded the Ath Koti (eight class) tradition. He was a scholar and wrote vernacular commentaries (tabbo) on the Prakrit Jain scriptures. He introduced a special pratikramana rite for his lay followers and taught that there is no accidental death, because the lifespan of a living being is determined by its own karma. (3) Lava or Lavji Rsi (ca. 1609–1659), the founder of the Dhundhiya (seeker) tradition, also known under the name Rsi Sampraday, was born in Surat and split from the Kesav Paks in 1637, 1648, 1653–1655, or 1657. (4) The founder of the Baistola (22 schools) tradition, Dharmadasa (1645–1703) from Ahmedabad, was originally a member of the Ekal Patriya Panth, but under the influence of Lava and Dharmasimha founded his own tradition in 1660 through self-initiation. (5) Hara, the ancestor of the Sadhumargi tradition (a branch of the extinct Kota Sampradaya), separated himself from the Kumvar Paks in 1668 or 1728.

The name sthanaka-vasi (hall-dwellers), though in evidence in a text written in 1630, was not regularly used as a common designation for all five traditions until the unification movement of the early 20th century. Doctrinally, only Dharmasimha's Ath Koti tradition in Gujarat differs significantly from the other four schools, which disagree only on minor points of philosophy and ritual. The Sthanakavasi traditions as a whole nowadays are divided along regional lines between the Gujarati and the non-Gujarati (North Indian) traditions. The non-Gujarati traditions are further subdivided into those who joined the reformist and centrally organized Sramanasangha, which was founded in 1952 in Sadari in Rajasthan in a merely partially successful attempt to unite all Sthanakavasi groups, and those who remained outside or left the Sramanasangha. Both the Sramanasangha and the independent traditions include mendicant orders that derive from four of the five main Sthanakavasi traditions (the exception is the Ath Koti traditions), which were split into some 33 different organized groups at the beginning of the 20th century. Although they are nominally under the command of one single acarya whose consent is essential for all initiations and excommunications (at present, Acarya Dr. Sivmuni), the original 22 founding traditions of the Sramanasangha continue to operate within its framework more or less independently.

Some monastic orders never joined the Sramanasangha, among them all Gujarati Sthanakavasi traditions, the Jnanagaccha of the Dharmadasa Ramratna tradition (founded by Jnanacandra, Ujjain, 1732) and the Nanagaccha of the Jivaraja tradition (Nanakram, eighteenth century). Because of perpetual discord between the founding traditions, many disappointed senior ascetics left the Sramanasangha again and established their own independent groups: Muni Hagamilal and the modernist Arhat Sangha (Susilkumar, 1926–1994, New Jersey, 1974) of the Jivaraja tradition; the Mayaram Sampradaya (Mayaram, 1854–1912) of the northern Lava tradition; Acarya Nanalal of the Hara Sadhumargi tradition (Hukmicand, early 19th century); and four groups of the Dharmadasa tradition: the Jaymalgaccha (Jaymal, 1708–1796; Rajasthan, 1748 or 1783); the Ratnavams (Ratnacandra, Rajasthan, 1796); the Dharmadasa Sampradaya (Umesmuni, late 20th century); and Upadhyay Amarmuni (1901–1992), the inspirational force behind the modern Virayatan Order, which was founded by Sadhvi Candana in Ragriha, 1974.

None of the Gujarati groups joined the Sramanasangha, which is essentially a Hindi-speaking order. With the exception of the Khambhat Sampradaya (Lava, Ahmedabad, 1648) and the three Ath Koti traditions—the Dariyapuri Ath Koti Sampradaya (Dharmasimha, Ahmedabad, 1628); the Kacch Ath Koti Mota Paks (Krsna, originally Dharmadasa Sampraday, Kacch 1715–1782); and the Kacch Ath Koti Nana Paks (Jasraj, Kacch, 1786)—the majority of the independent Sthanakavasi traditions in Gujarat descend from Mulacandra (1651–1725), one of Dharmadasa’s 22 leading monks. Mulacandra’s main disciples formed separate local groups after a dispute at a mendicant assembly in 1788 in Limbdi. Not all of the emerging Gujarati Dharmadasa traditions survived, and some of them split further into subgroups labeled great (mota) and small (nana). The seven principal orders of today are all named after the place of origin that is also their main seat: Limbdi Cha Koti Mota Paks (founded by Ajramar, Limbdi, 1788); Limbdi Cha Koti Nana Paks (Hemcand and Gopal, Limbdi, 1859); Gondal Mota Paks (Dungarsi, Gondal, 1788); Gondal Sanghani (Ganga Svami, Gondal, 1794); Barvada (Mota Kahan, Barvada, 1788); Botad (Jasa, Botad, ca. 1850); and Sayala (Naga, Sayla, 1772–1812). They are not led by an elected administrator cum teacher (acarya), like the independent traditions outside Gujarat, but by the male ascetic with the highest monastic age, or diksa paryaya, which may or may not be called acarya. His main decisions have to agree with those of the often hereditary leader (sanghapati) of the lay community.

The overall number of Sthanakavasi mendicants is much higher than generally assumed. In 1999 there were 3,223 mendicants, 533 sadhus, and 2,690 sadhvis—that is, 27.5 percent of all Jain mendicants, distributed in roughly equal proportions among the Sramanasangha (1,096), the 12 Independent traditions (967), and the 13 Gujarati traditions (1,160). The nationwide umbrella organization of the Sthanakavasi laity, the All India Svetambara Sthanakavasi Jain Conference, the motivating force behind the movement toward unity, was founded in 1906 in Morvi in Gujarat, but it split in 1984 into two independent organizations because of the irreconcilable differences in ritual culture and language between Gujarati- and Hindi-speaking Sthanakavasi traditions.

Akhil Bharatvarsiya Svetambara Sthanakavasi Jain Conference (Hindi)
Jain Bhavan
12 Sahid Bhagat Singh Marg
New Delhi 101001
India

Akhil Bharatvarsiya Svetambara Sthanakavasi Jain Conference (Gujarati)
1 Vijay Vallabh Cauk
Paydhuni
Mumbai 400 002
India

Peter Flügel

See also: Asceticism; Jainism; Monasticism; Terapanth Svetambara Jain Tradition.

References

- Flügel, Peter. “Protestantische und Post-Protestantische Jain Reformbewegungen: Zur Geschichte und Organisation der Sthanakavasi I.” Berliner Indologische Studien 13–14 (2000): 37–103.
- Flügel, Peter. “Protestantische und Post-Protestantische Jain Reformbewegungen: Zur Geschichte und Organisation der Sthanakavasi II.” Berliner Indologische Studien 15–16 (2002).
- Hastimal, Acarya. Jain Dharma Ka Maulik Itihas. Vol. 4. Jaipur, India: Jain Itihas Samiti, 1987/1995.
- Hastimal, Acarya, comp. Pattavali Prabandh Sangraha. Ed. by Narendra Bhanawat. Jaipur, India: Jain Itihas Nirman Samiti, 1968.
- Jnanasundara, Muni. Srimad Laumkasah. Phalodi, India: Sri Jnana Puspamala, 1936.
- Malvaniya, D. “Lokasah Aur Unki Vicar-Dhara.” In Gurudev Sri Ratna Muni Smrti-Granth, edited by Vijay Muni Sastri and Harisankar Sarma, 365–383. Agra, India: Gurudev Smrti Granth Prakasak Samiti, 1964.
- Manilal, Muni. Sri Jaindharmano Pracin Sanksipt Itihas Ane Prabhu Vir Pattavali. Amadavad, India: Jivanlal Chaganlal Sanghvi, 1934.
- Stevenson, Sinclair. Notes on Modern Jainism, with Special Reference to the Svetambara, Digambara and Sthanakavasi Sects. New York: Barber Press, 2008.

Stonehenge

The intriguing mysterious prehistoric stone circle known as Stonehenge is one of the world’s oldest and most famous holy sites. It is the most outstanding of several prehistoric monuments located in Wiltshire,

View of Stonehenge, Neolithic monument on the Salisbury Plain near modern-day Wiltshire, England. (Corel)

England, including Avebury and Silbury Hill. While much about Stonehenge remains unknown, it is best understood as the culminating product of the stone-building culture that produced these many monuments across the British Isles.

Archaeologists have been able to put together an account of the several distinct stages of Stonehenge's construction. The oldest part of the monument was a large, circular earthwork consisting of a ditch, a bank, and holes dug in the underlying Wiltshire chalk. This initial phase of Stonehenge can be roughly dated to the third millennium BCE. Around 2100 BCE, the builders brought a set of stones from the Preseli Mountains in Wales. Popularly termed the blue stones, some weighed as much as four tons each and were brought to their new home by a route that covering some 250 miles over land and via two rivers. At the site, the builders lifted the 82 stones to an upright position in a semi-circle. At about the same time, the entranceway to the site through the outer earthworks was widened, and two heel stones were located outside the central site.

The largest stones at Stonehenge (weighing up to 50 tons) were brought in from the northern part of Wiltshire possibly a century later. The builders placed them upright in a circle around the blue stones and topped them with lintel pieces. As part of this construction phase, five stones were placed in the center of the site in a horseshoe shape. A final construction phase was completed around 1500 BCE, when the blue stones were rearranged into a circle and horseshoe. At this same time, the Stonehenge Avenue, a pair of ditches and banks tying the site to the nearby River Avon, was constructed. A similar "avenue" also leads from the river to Durrington Walls.

Stonehenge's builders, at every stage, as with the other stone monuments across Great Britain, were a pre-literary people who left no written record of their life and only scant representational artwork. Over the centuries, as the many sites across Great Britain were abandoned, understanding of the use for which they had been built was lost. Later residents in their area raided the sites for building materials. Archaeologists have most recently tried to reconstruct picture of the ancient society that built Stonehenge, while many intrigued by the ancient site have produced a broad range of speculations about its exact purpose.

Stonehenge had been neglect for centuries when, in the 18th century, a few people turned their attention to it and the associated Wiltshire sites. Speculation in the 19th century tended to tie Stonehenge to the ancient Druids, known primarily from the writing of Julius Caesar. However, little real progress in understanding the stones was not made until the latter half of the 20th century, when more systematic archaeological work was concentrated on the megalithic culture. That work pushed the dating of Stonehenge to the Neolithic peoples who inhabited the British Isles prior to the Druids, Romans, and Danish folk, when written documents first appear.

Insights into Stonehenge occurred in the 1960s, when some students of the stones with astronomical knowledge discovered that the placement of some of the stones, including those in the center and the heel stones outside, were arranged in such a way as to indicate the occurrence of different astronomical phenomena, especially the movement of the Sun in the sky between the Summer and Winter solstices. This discovery raised the question of whether the builders had used them to plan planting and harvesting activity and possibly integrated such knowledge into setting dates for religious observances.

The modern neo-Druids who saw Stonehenge as a Druid worship site immediately seized upon the new astronomical speculations and added them to their arguments for continued use of Stonehenge for religious services. For many years, the Druids, with a small number of worshipper-spectators, had been admitted to the site for celebrations at the beginning of the day on the Summer Solstice. The establishment of rights of access for the Druids has been heightened in recent decades.

The most extensive recent work on Stonehenge is being done by the Stonehenge Riverside Project, an archaeological study led by a cadre of scholars from several British universities led by Mike Parker Pearson of Sheffield University. The project has focused upon Stonehenge within the larger context of the other nearby monuments and land features in Wiltshire. The research, with extensive time in the field by the scholars, graduate students, and other interested helpers, began with a suggestion of Ramilisonina, an archaeologist from Madagascar, that Stonehenge was built not for the builders themselves, but their ancestors. Also, he saw the site tied to River Avon via the Avenue, and hence tied to additional monuments upstream (Woodhenge and Durrington Walls), all of which might be part of a funerary and processional route. While still in progress, the project has already gathered some evidence supportive of the hypothesis.

As Stonehenge became a major tourist site, significant damage was done by souvenir hunters, and the site itself is now fenced off. In 1986, Stonehenge was added to the list of World Heritage Sites designated by the United Nations.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Avebury.

References

- Burl, Aubrey. The Stone Circles of the British Isles. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1976.
- Hawkins, Gerald S., and John B. White. Stonehenge Decoded. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1993.
- Mohen, Jean-Pierre. The World of Megaliths. New York: Facts on File, 1990.
- Newham, C. A. The Astronomical Significance of Stonehenge. Leeds, UK: John Blackburn, 1972.
- Souden, David. Stonehenge Revealed. London: Collins & Brown, 1997.

Subud

Subud is an association of men and women from various religions who worship God through a spiritual practice called latihan. Although the beliefs related to Subud are infused with religious ideas and terminology, members do not consider that it is a religion or even a teaching. It is described, rather, as “a symbol for the possibility for mankind to follow the right way of living.”

Subud was founded in Indonesia around the late 1920s by a Javanese Muslim named Muhammad Subuh Sumohadiwidjojo (1901–1987), whose followers call him “Bapak,” an Indonesian term of respect and affection, meaning “father.” From the age of about 16, Muhammad Subuh received a number of spiritual messages. He worked as a bookkeeper and studied with several spiritual masters (kiai) before receiving the latihan kejiwaan, the spiritual exercise of Subud, as a revelation in 1925. Around 1933 some of Bapak's friends received the latihan, and the practice slowly spread throughout Java. A small group, guided by Bapak, started an organization called Ilmu (esoteric spiritual knowledge) Kasunyatan (emptiness). Subud has been established in the West since the late 1950s, when it attracted the attention of some followers of George I. Gurdjieff (ca. 1866–1949).

The name Subud, introduced by Bapak at the inaugural meeting of a new organization in 1947, is derived from three terms: susila (which is translated as “the good character of man in accordance with the Will of Almighty God”); budhi (meaning “the force of the inner self within man”); and dharma (meaning “surrender, trust and sincerity towards Almighty God”). Taken together, Susila Budhi Dharma is understood as: to follow the will of God, or the power of the life force that works both within us and without. Bapak emphasized that Subud has “no holy book, no teaching, no sacred formula. In Subud the members only surrender with patience, trust, and sincerity to Almighty God.” Subud is a “process,” a “receiving.”

The latihan, which is seen as a form of pure worship in which one comes into direct, personal contact with the Grace and Power of God, lasts about half an hour and may be practiced by oneself. However, members are encouraged to attend a group latihan twice a week. It starts by standing with the group (men and women practice separately) with one's eyes closed; some then feel a vibration; most begin to feel a spontaneous impulse to move, dance, cry, laugh, or sing. This is experienced as an inner cleansing and a receiving of divine guidance, which spills over into the participant's everyday life. Practitioners report feeling happier, enjoying improved personal relationships, health, and work experiences. For some, however, the process of purification brings out problems that have to be dealt with—an experience that can be difficult and painful.

Only members may attend the latihan; newcomers have to wait about three months before being invited to join. Then, with the assistance of a “helper,” they can be “opened” by partaking in their first latihan.

Members of many different religions, or no religion at all, may practice the latihan. Bapak instructed his followers that there should be no proselytizing or advertising in Subud. He also recommended that there should be no membership fees, although donations are welcomed to cover expenses. Membership of Subud does not entail any special lifestyle or activities beyond practicing the latihan. However, it is believed that the practice can lead to guidance on personal matters, and most members drink little or no alcohol and are unlikely to eat pork.

Worldwide, there are an estimated 10,000 members in some 385 groups in more than 70 countries, with about 2,500 in the United States and 1,000 in the United Kingdom. Although some have left at various periods, numbers have been sustained, with some second-generation members requesting to join when they reach the minimum age of 17. The association has helpers at various levels and is divided into geographical zones that send representatives to international Subud organizations. Throughout the years, several Subud businesses have been established, not all of which have been financially successful. Nonetheless, Subud has sustained various charitable projects under the name of Susila Dharma International, which has UN-affiliated status.

International Subud Committee
839 Arbor St.
Wooster, OH 44691

Eileen Barker

References

- Geels, Antoon. Subud and the Javanese Mystical Tradition. Richmond, UK: Curzon, 1997.
- Lyle, Robert. Subud. Kent, UK: Humanus, 1983.
- Sullivan, Matthew Barry. Living Religion in Subud. London: Subud Publications International, 1990.
- Sumohadiwidjojo, Muhammad Subuh. Susila Budhi Dharma. Loudwater Farm, Rickmansworth, UK: Subud Publications International, 2001.
- Webb, Gisela. “Subud.” In America's Alternative Religions, edited by Timothy Miller, 267–273. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

■ Sudan

Sudan is a large African country (965,000 square miles) located immediately south of Egypt along the Red Sea. Its western border with Libya and Chad is in the Sahara Desert. To the south, it shares borders with the Central African Republic, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Uganda, and Kenya, and to the east with Ethiopia and Eritrea. Sudan is home to 40,200,000 people.

Settlement of the lands adjacent to the Upper Nile River and the associated rivers that feed into it occurred in prehistoric times, and as early as 3000 BCE this territory came under the control of Egypt. It was thus not until the eighth century BCE that an independent state, Napata, came into existence. In 730, Napata conquered Egypt, and for several generations its leaders ruled as pharaoh. After the fall of Napata in the seventh century, three states emerged that would continue for the next two millennia. These three states, Nobatia, Dongola, and Alodia, formed important functions in the trade between the Middle East and sub-Saharan Africa.

These states came under Christian influence in the fourth century CE. Then, in the seventh century, Muslim Arabs entered Dongola. In exchange for retaining the territorial integrity of Dongola and Alodia, the two states allowed Islamic proselytizing in the area. Egyptians invaded in the 14th century. Their influence led to the destruction of Dongola and the emergence of new Islamic states. Then in 1820, Egyptian forces under Muhammad Ali, the Albanian who had come to rule Egypt, occupied Khartoum. Over the next year, they unified the several countries and created the modern state of Sudan. As British influence grew in Egypt, further changes were introduced, including the abolishing of slavery.

Foreign rule led to revolution. Muhammad Ahmad raised an army in 1881 that led to British intervention in 1882. The revolt climaxed with the defeat of the British at Khartoum in 1885 and the establishment of an independent government. His victory was short lived, however, and with French assistance, Ahmed's rule was overthrown in 1898.

The independence of Sudan was finally accomplished in 1956, but civil war ensued between the predominantly Arab Muslim north and the African Christian south. The coup d'état by Gaafaral-Nimeiry in 1969 led to the end of the war but did not solve the problems between north and south. In a last attempt to retain power, in 1983 he imposed Islamic law on the whole country. Opposition organized in the south. Over the course of the next two years, a liberation movement in the southern region asserted its autonomy. War developed between the movement's guerrilla army and Sudanese forces. The many different peoples of the south, some Christians and some followers of traditional African religions, have been caught in the middle. The continued warfare in the south of Sudan has been the source of numerous atrocities and much suffering.

Until the fourth century CE, traditional African religions dominated across what is now Sudan. There are more than 570 ethnic groups that have been identified, each at one time having its own religion and dialect. In the fourth century, Orthodox Christianity from Egypt found its way up the Nile. In the fifth century, Orthodoxy split between those who supported the Orthodox statement expounded at the Council of Chalcedon and the Monophysite perspective that dominated in Egypt. Both opinions gained a following in the Sudan. The following century, the Ethiopian Church (which favored the Monophysite position) was introduced from the east and found a following. Much of the initial Christian following was lost to Islam—especially in the former Dongola and Alodia (the northern two-thirds of the present country)—over the next centuries. Variant forms of Islam emerged, some related to changes in the Egyptian leadership, but, as in the Muslim countries to the west, the dominant form had been the Sunni Malikite School.

When Muhammad Ali invaded the country, he attempted to impose a strict Sunni Hanafite interpretation of Islam. This imposition was part of the cause of the revolt under Muhammad Ahmad, proclaimed by his followers to be al-Mahdi, the leader and prophet who, many Muslims believe, will emerge to rescue and unite Islam at some time in the future. After the defeat of al-Mahdi, a legal system that mixed Hanafi and British elements was introduced, and the Malikite School reasserted its dominant role. However, through the 20th century, a very diverse Muslim community arose that

SUDAN

Sudan

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	10,041,000	29,313,000	71.1	2.04	38,840,000	52,220,000
Christians	1,169,000	6,788,000	16.5	2.15	10,174,000	14,855,000
Roman Catholics	690,000	3,700,000	9.0	1.44	5,400,000	7,500,000
Anglicans	300,000	2,350,000	5.7	0.98	3,500,000	5,000,000
Protestants	59,500	1,400,000	3.4	4.80	2,200,000	3,600,000
Ethnoreligionists	3,154,000	4,630,000	11.2	1.95	4,500,000	4,800,000
Agnostics	100,000	425,000	1.0	1.45	650,000	1,000,000
Atheists	30,000	69,000	0.2	2.04	95,000	140,000
Baha'is	500	2,600	0.0	2.04	5,000	10,000
Jews	50	1,700	0.0	2.04	1,700	1,700
Hindus	0	800	0.0	2.06	1,200	1,800
Total population	14,495,000	41,230,000	100.0	2.04	54,267,000	73,029,000

includes numerous large Sufi brotherhoods and the continued followers of al-Mahdi, the Ansars (some 3 million strong). Among the Sufi brotherhoods the Khatimiyya are the largest, but the Qadiyya, Shadhiliyya, and Tijaniyya are also prominent.

The Ahmadiyya Muslim movement has attempted to spread through Sudan but has been outlawed as heretical. The Baha'i Faith entered Sudan in the 1890s but has not shown much success for over a century of effort.

A small Ethiopian Orthodox community has survived in Sudan, and Greek Christianity survives under the jurisdiction of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa. The Monophysite perspective survives in the Coptic Orthodox Church and the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, both of which have established dioceses in Sudan.

These three churches dominated the Christian community until after the defeat of al-Mahdi by the British in 1898. The next year the Church Missionary Society introduced the Church of England into the Sudan, the first center being at Omduman. In 1901, American Presbyterians from the United Presbyterian Church (now part of the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]) entered from their base in Egypt. The Anglican work has matured as the Church of the Province of the Sudan. The Presbyterian mission has resulted in two churches, the Presbyterian Church of the Sudan (in the south) and the Sudan Presbyterian Evangelical Church (earlier existing as the Sudanese presbytery of the Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile as its Sudanese presbytery).

A variety of Christian groups attempted to open work in the Sudan through the 20th century, among the most successful being the Sudan United Mission (1913), whose work led to the present Sudanese Church of Christ, the Africa Inland Mission (African Inland Church, 1936), and the Sudan Interior Mission (Sudan Interior Church, 1937). Several African Initiated Churches have arisen, including the Eternal Life Church and the Evangelical Revival Church, both schisms from the Anglicans.

The Roman Catholic Church also entered Sudan following the British victory in 1898. The first Sudanese priest was ordained in 1944, but growth was stymied by the war that followed independence. All of its seminaries and many church buildings were destroyed. However, with the reorganization that occurred at the beginning of the 1970s, including the elevation of the vicariates and prefectures into diocese in 1972, Catholicism has grown into the largest Christian body in the country. It grew from 600,000 members in 1970 to 2.7 million by 1995. As with other Christian churches, its strength is in the southern region. One can only speculate as to the extent of growth had the continuing warfare of the last generation not occurred.

Islam, with 70 percent of the population, and Christianity, with 16 percent, dominate the religious life of the Sudan. Traditional African religions survive among the Didinga, Ingressana, Meban, and a variety of other ethnic groups. They constitute about 1 percent of the population and reside primarily in the south. The liberal Protestant community has joined together to form the Sudan Council of Churches, affiliated with the World Council of Churches. The more conservative churches have combined to form the Sudan Evangelical Christian Association, which is associated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Baha'i Faith; Church Missionary Society; Church of England; Coptic Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church; Evangelical Church–Synod of the Nile; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa; Hanafite School of Islam; Malikite School of Islam; Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.); Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Roman Catholic Church; Shadhiliyya Sufi Order; Sudan Interior Church; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Both, Peter Lam. South Sudan: Forgotten Tragedy. Bloomington, IN: 1st Books Library, 2003.
- Holt, P. M., and M. W. Daly. A History of the Sudan: From the Coming of Islam to the Present Day. London: Longman, 2000.
- Hunwick, J. O. Religion and National Integration in Africa: Islam, Christianity, and Politics in the Sudan and Nigeria. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1992.
- Jok, Jok Madat. Sudan: Race, Religion and Violence. Oxford: Oneworld Publications, 2007.
- Karrir, Ali Salih. The Sufi Brotherhoods in the Sudan. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1992.
- Simone, T. Abdou Maliqalim. In Whose Image?: Political Islam and Urban Practices in Sudan. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
- Vantini, G. Christianity in the Sudan. Bologna, Italy: EMI, 1981.
- Warburg, Gabriel. Islam, Sectarianism, and Politics in the Sudan since the Mahdiyya. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002.

Werner, Robert, William Anderson, and Andrew Wheeler. Day of Devastation, Day of Contentment: The History of the Sudanese Church across 2,000 Years. Nairobi: Paulines Publications Africa, 2000.

Wingate, F. R. Mahdism and the Egyptian Sudan: Being an Account of the Rise and Progress of Mahdism, and of Subsequent Events in the Sudan to the Present Time. 2nd ed. London: Cass, 1968.

Sudan Interior Church

The Sudan Interior Church is the product of the missionary activity of the Sudan Interior Mission (SIM), now known as the Society for International Ministries. SIM was founded in 1893 by Canadians Walter Gowans (1868–1894) and Rowland Bingham and American Thomas Kent (d. 1894) as an independent missionary society dedicated to the evangelization of the Sudan, then one of the few countries without a single Christian missionary. The three arrived in Nigeria in December 1893, where Bingham fell ill. The others pressed inward, where Gowans and Kent died early in 1894. Bingham returned to Toronto and organized a support council and began to rebuild the effort. However, the first mission station would not be opened until 1902.

Work began in Nigeria (rather than the Sudan) and spread from Patigi to Bida (1903) and Wushishi (1904), and it became the core of the present Evangelistic Church of West Africa. Prior to its finally reaching the Sudan, work would spread to Niger (1924), Ethiopia (1927), and Upper Volta, now Burkina Faso (1930). The work in the Sudan would actually be a result of the work in Ethiopia, and it began in 1936 after its missionaries were expelled from that country. They had initiated work among the Dinka people.

Work in the Sudan prospered for a generation, but in 1961, three of the four stations were closed by the government. The following year, the Sudan passed the Missionary Societies Act, which placed a number of restrictions on the mission. In 1964 the process of missionary expulsion began, actions that marked the heightening of the civil war that continues in the southern part of the Sudan. Through the 1960s the number of missionaries dropped from 36 (serving at 9 stations) to 5, those last leaving in 1970.

The Sudan Interior Church has emerged as an autonomous body out of the pressure placed on the former mission in the 1960s. The church is a member of the Sudan Council of Churches, which unites the minority Christian community. It is a conservative evangelical body that affirms the major Christian beliefs shared by all Protestants.

In the 1980s the Sudan Interior Mission merged with three other similar missionary agencies that had work in Asia and South America to form SIM. SIM has no international headquarters but operates through national councils that can now be found in a number of countries. In 1980 the Sudan Interior Church and other autonomous churches that grew from the missions founded by the Sudan Interior Mission and the three other agencies now a part of SIM created the Evangel Fellowship, an association of 12 churches. In 1996, the Evangel Fellowship formed the Evangelical Fellowship of Missions Association to coordinate their mutual missionary efforts.

Sudan Interior Church
PO Box 220
Khartoum
Sudan

SIM U.S.A.
PO Box 7900
Charlotte, NC 28241
<http://www.sim.org>

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Evangelicalism.

References

- Bingham, Rowland. Seven Sevens of Years and a Jubilee: The Story of the Sudan Interior Mission. Toronto: Evangelical Publishers, 1943.
- Fuller, W. H. Run While the Sun Is Hot. New York: Sudan Interior Mission, 1967.
- Society for International Missions. <http://www.sim.org/>. Accessed November 15, 2001.

Sufi Movement, The

See International Sufi Movement, The.

Sufi Order in North America, The

The Sufi Order in North America is a branch of the Sufi Order International, a religious organization whose primary aim is to promote the spiritual teachings of Hazrat Inayat Khan (1882–1927) and his son, Pir Vilayat Khan (1916–2004). The Order is not recognized as a traditional Islamic Sufi order because its membership is open to people of all faiths and it does not promote traditional Islam. Most of its members are white, middle-class Westerners, many of whom have been affiliated with the Order since the 1970s. The Order is a prototypical New Age religion, with its eclectic embrace of traditional religious practices, its desire to synthesize science and religion, its expectation of a dawning New Age of spiritual unity, and its interest in both Eastern and Western methods of psychological, physical, and spiritual healing. The group has been one of the most visible transmissions of Sufi spirituality to the West over the past 100 years.

Hazrat Inayat Khan was a renowned Indian musician who became a disciple of Hazrat Abu Hashim Madani, a Sufi master from a branch of the famed Chisti Order in India. Before his death, Madani asked Khan to bring Sufism to the West. Khan arrived in the United States in late 1910. He taught Sufism and performed music on the East and West coasts before traveling to Europe and Russia to organize formal Sufi centers. The seeds of future division were sown at this time, as different disciples (murids) were placed in charge of national centers in Europe and North America.

In 1926, Khan named his 11-year-old son, Vilayat, to be his successor as head of the Sufi Order. Following his father's death in 1927, Vilayat studied philosophy, psychology, and music in Paris and Oxford and began intensive meditation training under various Sufi masters in the Middle East and India. He emerged as a legitimate successor to his father's work and reinstated the Order in the United States during the 1960s. His efforts in California were helped by Murshid Samuel Lewis (1896–1971), an eclectic teacher who had received initiation into several Sufi orders during a lifetime of spiritual seeking. Lewis brought his group of students into the Sufi Order in 1968, but some of those students later left the Order in 1977 over disagreements with Vilayat's regulations and formed the Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society.

During the late 20th century, Pir Vilayat Khan became an internationally recognized spiritual teacher who gave frequent public lectures and participated in various religious congresses, interfaith dialogues, meditation camps, and New Age expositions in the United States, Western Europe, and India. Pir Vilayat and Pir Zia, his son and successor, were invited to attend the United Nations Peace Summit for world spiritual and religious leaders in 2000.

The Sufi Order International's teachings generally consist of the writings of Hazrat Inayat Khan and their further elaboration by Pir Vilayat and Pir Zia. All three khans teach the essential unity of spiritual ideals across religious traditions. Pir Vilayat sought to establish in his initiates a "stereoscopic consciousness" that cultivates simultaneous awareness of everyday human reality and the most elevated levels of the Divine Being. He emphasized that the realm of ordinary perception both reveals and veils a sublime reality that is unfolding itself within and through human life. The universe is evolving, in other words, toward a Chardin-like Omega point. In books such as Toward the One and Awakening: A Sufi Experience, Pir Vilayat synthesized prayer, meditation, and breathing methods from different spiritual traditions with traditional Sufi practice in order to foster the disciple's experience of the underlying unity of all things in the Divine Ground. All of Pir Vilayat's teachings were a natural outworking of his father's intention to foster tolerance and mutual understanding between East and West and between the different branches of the Beni Israel traditions.

The teaching work of the Sufi Order International includes seminars and retreats that focus on spiritual healing arts, meditation practices, the spirituality of music, esoteric studies, and universal dances of peace. Although the Sufi Order International is headquartered in France, the Sufi Order in North America is headquartered at the Abode of the Message, a residential Sufi community founded in 1975 in New Lebanon, New York. The former Shaker colony houses Omega Publications and its retailing outlet, Wisdom's Child Bookstore, and Sacred Spirit Music. The Abode hosts an annual program of spiritual retreats, the Healing Arts center, and ongoing classes in dhikr (a traditional Sufi chanting practice), dervish whirling, and Universal Worship. This latter liturgy was developed by Inayat Khan and draws on elements of the world's major religions. Teaching centers exist in large cities throughout the United States and Europe, with centers and branch leaders appointed by the president of the order.

On February 4, 2000, Pir Zia Inayat Khan received the teaching mantle of Pir Vilayat in an investiture ceremony at Hazrat Inayat Khan's tomb in Delhi, India. He was also elevated to the presidency of the Sufi Order in North America, although Pir Vilayat remained chairman of the board of directors until his death in 2004. Pir Zia divides his time between the Abode, India, and Europe. He is particularly interested in creating stronger ties with established Sufi orders in the Middle East and Asia and with helping Sufism as a tradition to move in a more universal direction. Pir Zia is committed to his grandfather's vision of building Universal temples that honor all religions. The Order is currently developing an institute designed to promote and implement its vision of a humanity that is tolerant, just, and unified in spirit, if not in the particulars of traditional beliefs and practices. Zia has adopted modern communications media and authors a blog available on the Internet.

Sufi Order International
North American Secretariat
5 Abode Rd.
New Lebanon NY 12125
<http://www.sufiorder.org/>

Phillip Charles Lucas

See also: Devotion/Devotional Traditions; International Sufi Movement; Meditation; New Age Movement; Sufism.

References

- Khan, Pir Vilayat Inayat. Awakening: A Sufi Experience. New York: Jeremy P. Tarcher/Putnam, 1999.
- Khan, Pir Vilayat Inayat. The Message in Our Time: The Life and Teaching of the Sufi Master, Pir-o-Murshid Inayat Khan. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978.
- Khan, Pir Vilayat Inayat. Toward the One. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.
- Khan, Pirzade Zia Inayat. Pearl in Wine. New York: Omega Publications, 2006.

Sufism

The inner esoteric spiritual dimensions of the Islamic religious tradition is commonly referred to as Sufism (Arabic: tasawwuf). Since the time of the Prophet Muhammad, Muslims have contemplated the existence of God and meeting the divine in the hereafter. However, practitioners of tasawwuf, or Sufis, have focused on encountering the divine in the present lifetime. The earliest scholars of the tradition—such as Hasan al-Basri, Rabi'a al-Adawiya, Bayazid Bistami, and Mansur al-Hallaj—had stressed various components of leading an ascetic life and defining technical terms that came with the inner journey (tariqah) toward Allah. To access a closeness with God, Sufis developed a wide body of literature that discussed the spiritual experiences of the traveler, especially detailed accounts of consciousness or unconsciousness experienced on the journey.

To earn the intimacy of God, Sufis have relied on learning the direct knowledge of the divine (al 'ilm al-laduni) through the rigorous spiritual training by a Sufi shaikh who had already been enlightened by the knowledge of God (ma'rifa). According to the classical Sufi scholars, the primary theological premise in Sufism is that Prophet Muhammad was trained by God himself so that the Prophet would embody these inner practices and beliefs and teach his followers. A common private conversation between God and the Prophet, or hadith qudsi, stated: “I was a hidden treasure and I loved that I be known, so I created the creation in order to be known.” For Sufis, since the moment of creation human beings have been working toward being nearer to God. The human heart has a natural tendency to feel incomplete until it dwells in the presence of God (hulul).

For Sufis there is an outer (zahir) and inner (batin) reading of the world, particularly in the interpretation of the Koran and the customs of the Prophet (sunnah). For those who truly desire to understand and experience the inner dimensions of God's speech, Sufis have argued for studying the hidden and inner meanings of the Koran, or batn al-qur'an. The realization of God in the journey ('irfan) was not exclusively for select human beings, but as the Prophet Muhammad had an intimate dialogue with God in his heavenly ascension (layla mi'raj wa isra), Sufis claim this event laid down a mystical paradigm for others to follow. Sufi Muslims begin with the fundamental profession of Islamic faith: “There is no God but God, and Muhammad is the messenger of God.” The first part reinforces the oneness of God at all times, while the second part speaks of the Prophet's special status as the messenger of God. For Sufis, Prophet Muhammad is the mystical exemplar and major focus for meditations, veneration, and invocations.

The Sufi tradition rapidly developed manuals as a form of religious learning ('ilm) alongside of the normative religious sciences of law and the customs of the Prophet. During the classical period of Sufism, mystical knowledge was understood as superior to the traditional knowledge taught in the colleges. By the early 11th century, Sufi scholars and Muslim intellectuals like Ibn Sina (or Avicenna, d. 1037) incorporated Sufi knowledge ('irfan) with metaphysical studies of Greek philosophy into the traditional curriculum. The discrepancies between the mystical path (tariqah) and the education in the colleges (madrasa) began to be minimized with Ahmad al-Ghazzali (d. 1111), who advocated a balanced approach to Islamic spirituality and orthopraxy. Mainstream scholars and religious authorities accepted Sufism as Sufis themselves were able to accommodate them with a refined theology that moved beyond personal ecstasy and was based on reason, critical self-reflection, and analysis of the soul's journey.

Sufis organized themselves into orders that were highly structured for the disciples to be trained in the mystical journey. Unlike Christian monastic orders, such as the Franciscans and the Jesuits, Sufi orders did not have to take vows of celibacy, nor were they under the supervision of a central authority like the pope. Each Sufi order was based upon the teachings and authority of the Sufi teacher, who needed to have a lineage to the Prophet Muhammad. The Sufi orders established lodges (khanaqah) in which disciples lived and were taught by their respective teachers, but not all disciples lived in the lodges. There was a master-disciple (pir-murid) relationship within the orders, and disciples needed to pass initiation in order to be a member. The institution of Sufism meant that it was accessible to anyone who wanted to reach God from the mystical path; it also gave distinct identities to each of the Sufi orders. Sufi disciples were given specific instructions on how to pray with more attention, to bring more love to their lives, to direct their wealth toward the poor, and to learn detailed spiritual exercises for enlightenment.

Whirling dervishes integrate music and dance into their solemn religious rituals. (Corel)

Sufi orders are found throughout the Muslim world. Among the more prominent Sufi orders to emerge out of Mesopotamia (Iran/Iraq) are the Rifaiyya, Suhrawardiyya, and Qadiyya. These are among the earliest of the Sufi orders. Rifaiyya was founded in Basra, Iraq, in the 12th century, soon spreading from Iraq into Syria and Egypt. The Suhrawardiyya formally established themselves in the early 12th-century Iraq and spread westward into India. The Qadiriyya Sufis originated in Iran in the 12th century and spread both eastward and westward into India and North Africa.

Sufism continued to grow in popularity in North Africa as the Rifaiyya Order expanded into Syria and then Egypt. Shortly thereafter it spread to Northwest Africa, where it gained the support of the ruling Almohad dynasty (1130–1269), whose territory included Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Muslim Spain. The Shadhiliyya developed in the 13th century in Tunisia and continues to flourish in contemporary Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco.

In Central Asia and Anatolia (equivalent to modern-day Turkey), a number of major Sufi orders emerged between the 12th and 17th centuries in Turkey and Central Asia. The Yasawiyya, originating in Turkestan, led in spreading the movement among the Turkish tribes of Central Asia. Among the important Central Asian orders is Chistiniyya, the foundation of which is generally ascribed to Mu'in al-Din Chishti (ca. 1142–1236), a native of Sijistan. The Order spread into India, where it became that land's largest Sufi order. It split into several factions and has a high profile in the West, through two branches of the work founded by Hazrat Inyat Khan, the Sufi Order International and the International Sufi Movement. Yasawiyya appears also to have given birth to the Bektashi Sufis, who continue strong in Albania and nearby Balkan countries.

The Mevlevi Sufi Order derives from the experience, work, and writings of Turkish poet/mystic Jalal ud-din Rumi (1207–1273); they are famous as the “whirling dervishes.” The order is based on Rumi’s place of burial, Konya, Turkey. Along with the other Turkish orders, it was suppressed when the secular government assumed authority in 1925. It declined for several decades but experienced new life in the West at the end of the 20th century. Equally hurt by the formal abolition of Sufi groups in Turkey were the Naqshbandiyya; however, they survived through their non-Turkish centers and have enjoyed more success. The Order was founded by Baha al-din Naqshband (d. 1389) near Bukhara in Central Asia, and subsequently it spread from India to Turkey. It flourished under the Ottomans and Mughals, and after a setback in the mid-20th century, it too has found new life in the contemporary West and in Islamic nations.

In the 18th century, the Wahhabi movement attached to Islam many popular practices that had entered through Sufism—including the veneration of saints and pilgrimages to their gravesites, while encouraging a strict adherence to Islamic law. In Africa the spirit of reform contributed to the establishment of several new orders, such as the Tijaniyya, founded in the 1780s by Ahmad al-Tidjani (d. 1815) and, in the same spirit a century later, the Muridiyya. Both have spread across North Africa and western sub-Saharan Africa, and since World War II into the West.

More extreme was the Sanusiyya, founded in Cyrenaica (eastern Libya) in the 1840s by Muhammad b. ali Sanusi (1787–1859). The Sanusiyya rejected all forms of luxury. Like other African orders, it included a strong sense of veneration for the Prophet Muhammad. They were a critical resistance group fighting against French colonial rule, and they took the lead in creating the modern state of Libya. Overthrown in 1969 by Colonel Muammar al-Qaddafi, they have been an important element in the opposition to his regime.

<http://www.arches.uga.edu/~godlas/Sufism>
<http://world.std.com/~habib/sufi.html#resources>
<http://www.sufibooks.com/>

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Bektashi Sufi Order; Chistiniyya Sufi Order; International Sufi Movement; Mevlevi Sufi Order; Muhammad; Qadiriyya Sufi Order; Qadiriyya Rifa’i Sufi Order; Sufi Order in North America, The; Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order; Tijaniyya Sufi Order; Wahhabi Islam.

References

- Chittick, William. The Sufi Path of Knowledge: Ibn ‘Arabi’s Metaphysics of Imagination. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989.
- Chittick, William T. Sufism: A Beginner’s Guide. Oxford: Oneworld Publications, 2007.
- Ernst, Carl. The Shambhala Guide to Sufism: An Essential Introduction to the Philosophy and Practice of the Mystical Tradition of Islam. Boston: Shambhala, 1997.
- Lewisohn, Leonard, ed. The Legacy of Mediaeval Persian Sufism. New York: Khaniqah Nimatullah, 1992.
- Lings, Martin. What Is Sufism? Cambridge: Islamic Texts Society, 1993.
- Nasr, Seyyed Hossein. The Garden of Truth: The Vision and Promise of Sufism, Islam’s Mystical Tradition. New York: HarperOne, 2008.
- Rizvi, Syed Athar Abbas. A History of Sufism in India. 2 vols. New Delhi: Manoharlal, 1978.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: North Carolina Press, 1975.
- Trimingham, Spencer. The Sufi Orders in Islam. Oxford: Clarendon, 1971.

Suhrawardiyya Sufi Order

The Suhrawardi Sufis were recognized as an important Sufi order with its founder, Shaikh Abu’Najib al-Suhrawardi (d. 1168), the uncle of Abu Hafs ‘Umar Suhrawardi (1144–1234). Abu’Najib al-Suhrawardi was originally from the town of Suhraward, which is west of Sultaniyya, in the province of al-Jibal, Iran. Abu’Najib was the rector of the Nizamiyya Academy and an authority on hadith (the sayings of the Prophet Muhammad). He also wrote a famous Sufi treatise on etiquette and Sufi practice.

Equally profound was Shihab al-din Yahya Suhrawardi (1170–1208), a mystic-philosopher who expanded upon the School of Illumination (Hikmat al-Ishraq), which used rational discourse as a basis for experiential wisdom. The Ishraqi School was a coherent and philosophical system of inquiry into knowledge, symbolism, and wisdom.

Later, Shaikh Abu Hafis ‘Umar al-Suhrawardi consequently wrote an equally profound Sufi text called the ‘Awarif al-Ma’arif (Knowledge of the Spiritually Learned), which is still used in the Sufi world for spiritual lessons. Al-Suhrawardi was designated as the shaikh al-Islam, or supreme Islamic religious authority, under Caliph al-Nasir (1179–1225); he preached the importance of adhering to Islamic law, customs of the Prophet, and the Koran.

The Suhrawardis professed intense studies of law, Koranic studies, philosophy, theology, and the complete adherence to Islamic customs set by the Prophet Muhammad. Knowledge of the divine is attainable through constructive reasoning and contemplation; the mystical way meant living moderately and not being lost in complete poverty or asceticism. The Suhrawardi Sufis can be found in South Asia, Iran, Syria, Central Asia, Europe, and North America.

The Suhrawardi Foundation in Lahore, Pakistan, publishes materials on Sufism and the modern world. The elder Sufis continue the Suhrawardi tradition of mystical studies and practice. The Suhrawardi Foundation of North America holds conferences and poetry meetings to better understand the Sufi journey.

Qamar-ul Huda

See also: Muhammad; Sufism.

References

- Huda, Qamar-ul. Striving for Divine Union: Spiritual Exercises of the Suhrawardi Sufis. Surrey, UK: Curzon, 2002.
- Razavi, Mehdi Amin. Suhrawardi and the School of Illumination. Surrey, UK: Curzon, 1997.
- Thackston, William. The Mystical and Visionary Treatises of Shihabuddin Yahya Suhrawardi. London: Octagon, 1982.
- Walbridge, John. The Leaven of the Ancients: Suhrawardi and the Heritage of the Greeks. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.

Wilson, M. A Sufi Rule for Novices: Kitab Adab al-Muridin of Abu-Najib al-Suhrawardi. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973.

Ziai, Hossein. Knowledge and Illumination: A Study of Suhrawardi's Hikmat al-ishraq. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990.

Sukkot

The Festival of Sukkot, or Booths, is a 7-day holiday period that begins on the 15th day of the month of Tishri, only 5 days after the conclusion of the 10 Days of Awe that begin with Rosh Hashanah and culminate with Yom Kippur. Sukkot represents quite a drastic transition, from the most solemn holy days in the Jewish year to one of the more joyous. Sukkot is immediately followed by two additional holidays, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

Sukkot has a double thrust, in that it functions as a harvest festival, but also remembers the 40 years that the Israelites lived a nomadic life in the Sinai desert after leaving Egypt but before they made a home for themselves in the land of Canaan. During this time, believers build a temporary shelter, a booth called a sukkah (sukkot, pl.), in which they reside, a shelter that recalls the temporary homes in which the Israelites resided during the wandering.

The basic parameters and timing of the holidays are laid out in the Torah, in the book of Leviticus (23:33–44): “And the LORD spoke unto Moses, saying: Speak unto the children of Israel, saying: On the fifteenth day of this seventh month is the feast of tabernacles for seven days unto the LORD. On the first day shall be a holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work. Seven days ye shall bring an offering made by fire unto the LORD; on the eighth day shall be a holy convocation unto you; and ye shall bring an offering made by fire unto the LORD; it is a day of solemn assembly; ye shall do no manner of servile work. These are the appointed seasons of the LORD, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, to bring an offering made by fire unto the LORD, a burnt-offering, and a meal-offering, a sacrifice, and drink-offerings, each on its own day; beside the sabbaths of the LORD, and beside your gifts, and beside all your vows, and beside all your freewill-offerings, which ye give unto the LORD. Howbeit on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruits of the land, ye shall keep the feast of the LORD seven days; on the first day shall be a solemn rest, and on the eighth day shall be a solemn rest. And ye shall take you on the first day the fruit of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, and boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook, and ye shall rejoice before the LORD your God seven days. And ye shall keep it a feast unto the LORD seven days in the year; it is a statute forever in your generations; ye shall keep it in the seventh month. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; all that are home-born in Israel shall dwell in booths; that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God. And Moses declared unto the children of Israel the appointed seasons of the LORD.”

Orthodox Jews preparing for Sukkot. (Odelia Cohen/Dreamstime.com)

The sukkah may be built in one’s yard according to particular specifications. It must be large enough to fulfill the requirements for the week’s activity and have no less than two and a half walls made of material that will not blow away in a high wind. The roof or covering must be made of something that has grown in the ground; tree branches, corn stalks, or bamboo reeds are often used. The covering materials should generally make the dwelling shady, but are left loose, neither bundled together nor tied down. They allow rain in, and those inside can see the stars. If it is raining, rain-proof material may be put over the booth to protect its inner contents, but it must be removed as soon as the rain ceases.

In the modern world, quickly assembled sukkot are available for purchase, or they may be made from scratch. Canvas is often used for the walls. One should spend as much time as possible in the booth during the seven days. The first two days of the festival are treated as Sabbaths, and no work is allowed. Though the Bible calls for one day of rest, due to the problems inherent in observing the Moon (by which the timing of the holiday and getting the word out to people in the countryside was determined), two days would often be observed to make sure the holiday had been observed correctly. Such two-day observance had become a custom among Jews outside Israel, and continued even after later sages fixed the Hebrew calendar for the future based on mathematical calculations.

The first and last (Hoshana Rabbah) days of Sukkot include gatherings at the synagogue, while the five middle days include special prayers that are read by the family within their booth. The first day and the second day of the festival in the lands of the diaspora are treated as Sabbath days of rest. The middle days are less than a Sabbath, but distinct from normal workdays. One may engage in work necessary for getting through the days, including food preparation, but nothing that interferes with the holiday spirit. This time is often treated as a vacation and a time to entertain friends and visit with neighbors, and enjoy festive meals.

Integral to Sukkot is the invitation of symbolic guests to the family booth each day. These spiritual guests, or ushpizin, are traditionally seven biblical heroes—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Joseph, and David. Among the Hasidic Jewish communities, there are seven Hasidic heroic figures who accompany the seven traditional heroes, and in the contemporary post-feminist world, seven women are also included in the invitations. It is thought that one of the traditional heroes of the faith visits the sukkot each day.

Also integral to the festival are the materials (called the four species) that are held during the Sukkot blessings in synagogue. The four species are an etrog (citron), a citrus fruit native to Israel, and three kinds of branches—one palm, two willow, and three myrtle branches—which are bound together and are called the lulav. The citron is held in one hand and the lulav in the other. As one repeats the blessing over these, the four species are waved in six directions (north, east, south, and west, and up and down), in acknowledgment that the Almighty is everywhere. Some see the four species as four types of Jews and the Sukkot blessing reminds everyone that all four are important to the community.

Closely associated with Sukkot are two adjacent but quite separate holidays, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah. Because they immediately follow Sukkot, they are often incorrectly thought of as part of Sukkot. Shemini Atzeret is observed on the 22nd day of the month of Tishri, and everywhere but Israel, Simchat Torah is observed the following day. In Israel, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah are observed on the same day, Tishri 22. During the two holidays, one no longer resides in the booths, although outside of Israel, some continue to reside in the sukkah on Shmini Atzeret but not on Simchat Torah. Also the four species are not used on these holidays.

Shemini Atzeret is the “assembly of the eighth day.” It is explained as a time for the Jewish people to have a more intimate and exclusive celebration with the Almighty. They think of it as if God has been their host and they the guests through Sukkot. But as the time of visiting comes to an end, God asks the guests to stay an extra day, to extend their time together. The day is observed as a Sabbath, and those observing it do no work.

Simchat Torah is a day for “Rejoicing in the Torah,” the first five books of the Hebrew Bible (also known as the Five Books of Moses). Through the year, at synagogue services, one reads through the entire Torah, a few chapters each week. This cycle is completed on Simchat Torah, and on that day, the last chapter of the Torah (in Deuteronomy) is read to be immediately followed by the reading of the first chapter of Genesis. The completion of the cycle is an occasion for rejoicing that occurs as people process around the synagogue carrying Torah scrolls. The service includes spirited singing and dancing in the synagogue with all the Torah scrolls, which are removed from the ark in which they normally rest.

The first day of Sukkot and the joint celebration of Shemin Atzeret and Simchat Torah are official public holidays in Israel. In the days prior to the destruction of the temple and the diaspora of the Jewish people through the Middle East and around the Mediterranean Basin, Sukkot was one of three major holidays (along with Passover and Shavuot, or the Festival of Weeks), during which Jews made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the celebration.

Christian Appropriation The Hebrew Bible was incorporated into the Christian Bible as the Old Testament, and is held in high esteem by most Christian denominations. In North America in the 19th century, from their reading of the books of Moses, a new appreciation of the Jewish festival cycle appeared among a small group of Christian denominations, most notably those that had emerged from the disappointed expectation of the Second Coming of Christ announced by William Miller in the 1830s. Initially, some groups adopted the seventh-day Sabbath. In the 20th century, some groups that grew out of the Church of God (Seventh-day) began to follow the Jewish liturgical year, the most notable being the Worldwide Church of God. For these groups, what they termed the Feast of Tabernacles (“tabernacle” being the common translation of sukkot in English-language Bibles) became the most important event of the year. Members of the Worldwide Church of God would save 10 percent of their income to enjoy a week of feasting with fellow church members at campgrounds around North America and increasingly other countries to which the church spread. The money would be spent on fine camping equipment and fine food and given in offerings at the church meetings.

In the 1990s, the Worldwide Church of God went through a radical change of belief and practice that included the abandonment of its belief in the Old Testament festival cycle. It lost most of its members to several splinter groups such as the United Church of God and the Philadelphia Church of God, and an uncounted number of smaller groups, which continue this Christianized version of the Feast of Tabernacles.

Sukkot is also celebrated among the different Messianic Jewish groups that emerged in the 1970s. These groups consider themselves to be Jews who have discovered that Jesus Christ (whom they refer to by his Hebrew name Yashua) to be the Messiah, a claim rejected by all mainstream Jewish groups. Messianic Jews continue as much of Jewish culture, including synagogue ritual, that they find compatible with their Christian faith and reinterpret Jewish holidays as heralding Christianity. They also invite Gentile Christians to celebrations as a means of educating them about their Jewish heritage.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Days of Awe; Hasidism; Judaism; Rosh Hashanah; Worldwide Church of God; Yom Kippur.

References

- Eckstein, Yecheil. What You Should Know About Jews and Judaism. Waco, TX: Word Books, 1984.
- Greenberg, Irving. The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. New York: Jason Aronson, 1998.
- Posner, Raphael, Uri Kaploun, and Sherman Cohen, eds. Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages. New York: Leon Amiel Publisher/Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House, 1975.
- Schauss, Hayyim. The Jewish Festivals: A Guide to Their History and Observance. New York: Schocken, 1996.

Sukyo Mahikari

Sukyo Mahikari is a Japanese new religion founded in 1959 by Okada Yoshikazu (1901–1974), a former member of the imperial guard who suffered for many years from physical afflictions and economic misfortunes.

On the night of February 27, 1959, Okada received a vision of God, who called him with the words: “Get up. Change your name to Kotama [Jewel of Light]. Raise your hand. Trials and tribulations are coming.” This experience marked the beginning of the movement that was called Sekai Mahikari Bunmei Kyodan. Okada came to be called Sukuinushisama (Lord Savior) and assumed a divine status in the movement as the original mediator of the saving and healing light of God. Between 1959 and 1967, Okada is said to have received a series of 57 revelations that were collected and published for the first time in Japanese in 1969 as the sacred scripture of the movement, called the Goseigen. From the end of the 1960s, Mahikari underwent a rapid growth in Japan, and in the early 1970s the first centers were opened outside of Japan. In 1972 a center was opened in Paris, and from there missionaries spread all over Europe, North and South America, and Africa. After the founder died in 1974, the movement split. One group continued the original name of the movement and was led by one of the closest disciples of Okada, Sekiguchi Sakae (1909–1994). The other group followed the leadership of the adopted daughter of the founder, Okada Keiju (Sukuinushisama), and took the name Sukyo Mahikari. The latter has become the larger of the two groups and is usually the organization generally associated with the name Mahikari. The exact number of members in the movement is kept a strict secret, but it may be between 500,000 and 1 million. The movement claims about 1,200 centers in 80 countries.

The central focus of the movement is the practice of okiyome, which consists of the transmission of divine light through the palm of the hand of an initiate to another person or to any animate or inanimate object in need of purification or protection. This practice was largely inherited from Sekai Kyusei Kyo, another 20th-century Japanese religion of which Okada had previously been a member. At the basis of this practice lies the belief that most afflictions and misfortunes are caused by spirit possession, resulting from negative karmic actions in this or in a past life. It is the forehead that is regarded as the seat of possessing spirits and that is the main focus of the practice of okiyome. The power to transmit the Light resides in an amulet, called the omitama, which is formally received at the end of the initiation course and which is surrounded by numerous taboos.

Besides okiyome, which can (and should) be practiced at any time and place, members are also enjoined to participate in monthly rituals, called mimatsuri, and in yearly spring and autumn festivals. The latter take place at the central shrine (the Suza) in Takayama, Japan, and members are encouraged to make the pilgrimage to the place of birth of the movement and if possible participate in these events. Since spirit possession is the origin of all evil, another important ritual practice in the movement consists of the worship of ancestors every morning and evening at a private altar in the home.

The teachings of Sukyo Mahikari are transmitted in three initiation courses, each requiring an increasing commitment to the movement. The elementary teachings, which constitute the heart of the movement, focus on the etiology of diseases and misfortunes. Although the emphasis is on the notion of possession, ethical principles (mostly of Confucian origin) are inculcated as a means to avoid spirit possession. The advanced courses focus mostly on sacred history and on the millenaristic and nationalistic beliefs of Mahikari. Within the pantheon of Gods and spirits of Mahikari, one God, called Mioyamotosumahikariomikamisama (or Su-God), is worshipped as the origin of creation and salvation. It is to this God that most prayers are addressed.

Sukyo Mahikari is organized as a theocracy, with the leader, called Oshienushisama, as its absolute authority. The world is organized in different regions (Sidobus) encompassing centers of different sizes, from a small local center called han, to a fully developed dojo. The movement is supported by an elaborate system of donations: monthly donations to the center, donations for particular projects undertaken by the movement, and donations in thanksgiving for particular blessings or for receiving light at every visit to the dojo.

Sukyo Mahikari
2-596-1 Kamiokamoto-machi
Takayama City
Gifu Prefecture
Japan

Catherine Cornille

See also: Sekai Kyusei Kyo.

References

- Cornille, Catherine. "The Phoenix Flies West: The Dynamics of Inculturation of Mahikari in Western Europe." Japanese Journal for Religious Studies 18, nos. 2–3 (1991): 265–285.
- Davis, Winston. Dojo: Magic and Exorcism in Modern Japan. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1980.
- McVeigh, Brian. Spirits, Selves and Subjectivity in a Japanese New Religion: The Cultural Psychology of Belief in Shukyo Mahikari. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.
- Tebecis, Andris. Is the Future in Our Hands? My Experiences with Sukyo Mahikari. Sandy, UT: Sunrise Press, 2004.

Young, Richard. "Magic and Morality in Modern Japanese Exorcistic Technologies." Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 17 (1990): 29–50.

Suleiman I

1494–1566

Suleiman I, known in the West as Suleiman the Magnificent, ruled the Ottoman Empire for almost half a century (1520–1566), during which time it greatly expanded through North Africa, across the Middle East, and into Central Europe. He proved a wise and knowledgeable ruler, whose broad talents manifested in his military prowess, the rewriting of the Ottoman legal system, his attempts to rule with justice and equity, his empire's patronage of the arts, and his own writing of poetry. The Ottoman Empire he built would last for another four centuries and revive the glories of the Islamic Califa originally established in the seventh century.

Suleiman was born in Trabzon, most likely on November 6, 1494, the son of Selim I (ca. 1470–1520) and grandson of Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512), then the sultan of the Ottoman Empire. His grandfather abdicated in favor of his father in 1512. As a child, Suleiman had begun the broad studies that would prepare him to rule. He served as a governor in his father's empire from the age of 17 and became the sultan following his father's untimely death in 1520. Suleiman was but 25 years old.

Once on the throne, Suleiman prepared to move against Belgrade (Serbia), left in Christian hands by Mehmed II (r. 1451–1481), who had turned from interest in Europe after two defeats in 1462 and 1475. Belgrade fell to Suleiman in August 1521. He next moved against Hungary, which was finally defeated in 1526 at the Battle of Mohács. War continued, with the Hapsburgs of Austria forming the front line of defense of Europe. After briefly relinquishing control of Hungary, in 1529, Suleiman retook it and marched on Vienna, the last major obstacle to Western Europe. He was unsuccessful in 1529 and again in 1532, after which, like his grandfather, he turned his attention elsewhere.

The Safavid rule in Persia (Iran) represented the Shia Muslim community over against the Hanafite

Portrait of the Ottoman sultan Suleiman I, also called Suleiman the Magnificent. (Time & Life Pictures/Getty Images)

Sunni Islam that held sway in the Ottoman Empire. A source of tension through the early years of Suleiman's rule, in 1535, Suleiman moved against it and quickly took Bagdad. He would spend the next two decades fighting the Safavid ruler, slowly taking possession of Georgia, Azerbaijan, Iraq, and southern Persia, but unable to finally bring an end to the Safavid rule.

Simultaneously, Suleiman also moved to dominate the waters of the eastern Mediterranean. He placed his navy in the hands of Admiral Khair ad Din, better known as Barbarossa. Suleiman's treaty with Francis I of France and Barbarossa's victory over Spain at the Battle of Preveza secured Ottoman control in the eastern Mediterranean for the remainder of Suleiman's rule.

Suleiman supported France in its 1544 war with Spain, which occasioned Suleiman's consolidation of power across the northern coast of Africa. Barbarossa also led forces against Spain, from whom his combined army and navy forces took Naples.

Suleiman's empire was structured around shariah, the law derived from the Koran; however, there was a large body of law that operated in areas not specifically covered by shariah. Through the 1530s, Suleiman collected all the legislation issued by his predecessors who had established the empire. He completely revised the legal system and issued a unified code for the empire. Included in his edicts were statutes raising the status of his Christian subjects. He also expanded the education system built around schools attached to the larger mosques. Suleiman's reforms remained in place through the remaining centuries of Ottoman rule.

Suleiman also left his mark architecturally. He oversaw renovations of the Dome of the Rock and the Kaaba, Islam's most holy site at the mosque in Mecca, and promoted the building of two new major mosques—the Selimiye Mosque in Edime (Turkey) and the Suleymaniye Mosque in Istanbul.

At the end of his life, Suleiman again turned his attention to Hungary, but died in 1566, just two days before his army won the Battle of Szigetvar (Hungary). He was buried in a mausoleum adjacent to the Suleymaniye Mosque, near the tomb of one of his wives, the mother of his son and successor, Selim II (r. 1566–1574).

At the time of Suleiman's death, the Ottoman Empire stretched from Algeria along the coast of North Africa to Eritrea. It included Palestine and much of present-day Saudi Arabia. It extended northward through the Balkans into Hungary and eastward around the Black Sea through the Caucasian Mountains into northern Persia (Iran).

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Istanbul; Mecca; Mosques.

References

- Bridge, Anthony. Suleiman the Magnificent, Scourge of Heaven. New York: F. Watts, 1983.
- Clot, Andre. Suleiman the Magnificent. London: Saqi Books, 2004.
- Downey, Fairfax Davis. The Grand Turke, Suleyman the Magnificent, Sultan of the Ottomans. New York: Minton, Balch & Company, 1929.

Greenblatt, Miriam. Süleyman the Magnificent and the Ottoman Empire. New York: Benchmark Books, 2003.

Sulpicians

The Sulpicians, or the Order of Saint Sulpice, is a Roman Catholic organization that resembles a religious order but is in fact a society of apostolic life, an association whose members come together for a specific purpose. It differs from religious orders in that members (especially those in the priesthood) do not take additional vows, and priests remain under the primary jurisdiction of their diocesan bishop rather than the organization. In the Sulpicians, members typically do not join at the beginning of their priesthood career, but after some time serving in the priesthood and gaining experience.

The Sulpicians trace their beginning to France in the 1630s and the work of Jean Jacques Olier (1608–1657). Olier, a well-educated man from a well-to-do family, experienced a miraculous healing of an eye condition. Already headed for the priesthood, he forsook his aristocratic position in favor of service to the poor. He subsequently became involved with a church renewal movement led by people such as Vincent de Paul (1581–1660), later canonized as a saint; theologian Charles de Condren (1588–1641); and Mother Agnes of Jesus (Saint Agnes of Langeac, 1602–1634). Olier saw a need for the development of a sound spiritual life and better educational level among the clergy and to that end in 1641 he established a seminary. Shortly thereafter he was assigned as the parish priest of the Church of St. Sulpice in Paris and he relocated his seminary at the church. The Order of Saint Sulpice began with his inviting several priests to join him and assist in his work.

Olier announced the Society of the Priests of the Seminary of Saint Sulpice to the French bishops, who were informed that the group stood ready to educate and provide spiritual formation (training in the spiritual life) to candidates for the priesthood. They would train the priests and then return them to their home dioceses. This new seminary thus varied from the standard program of diocesan seminaries, which accepted teenagers who had as yet not decided to enter the priesthood. The Sulpicians were now dedicated to their narrow but crucial task, and proved themselves capable. Their work steadily expanded.

As early as 1657 Olier sent four priests to Montreal, then still a miniscule community with an uncertain future. Almost immediately, they assumed leadership of the town and the surrounding countryside and began, along with their religious work, directing settlers arriving in the slowly growing community. They encouraged settlers to create new villages at spots around the city in the hope that they would serve as a first line of defense, the surrounding land being inhabited by hostile Native Canadians. The Canadian work was supplemented by priests who fled France in the wake of the French Revolution (1789–1799). Meanwhile, the work in France suffered greatly, but survived,

In 1790, Bishop John Carroll reached out to the Sulpicians to assist building the church in the United States. In the wake of the American Revolution, he had only 35 priests to serve some 30,000 laypeople in his diocese. The Sulpicians arrived in 1791 to open what was to become St. Mary's Seminary. It was the first institution of higher learning sponsored by Roman Catholics in America. The seminary, relocated to Emmetsburg, Maryland, would later provide a nurturing environment for Sister Elizabeth Seton (1774–1821) as she founded Saint Joseph's Academy and Free School and then her own order, the Sisters of Charity. The order has continued to work at St. Mary's, which during the pontificate of Pope Pius VII was the first American school with a pontifical faculty (with the right to grant degrees in the name of the Holy See).

In the second decade of the 19th century, Mary Elizabeth Lange (1784–1882), an African from Haiti, settled in Baltimore as a refugee. Here she met the Sulpician priest Father James Hector Joubert. Joubert worked with Lange, who had a small inheritance, in the founding of a community of African American women to provide education for African American children. The result was the formation of the first order founded and led by African American women, the Oblate Sisters of Providence.

The work of the Sulpicians is anchored in a spiritual life originally given shape by Charles de Condren, which attempts to integrate attention to the Eucharist, liturgical prayer, meditation, and the daily routine of prayers in the Divine Office with the vow taken by priests to live a life of celibacy, obedience, and simplicity of life. At the various seminaries where the Sulpicians work, they live among the seminarians and attempt to make themselves available for teaching spiritual formation by both instruction and the example of their own lives.

Today, the Sulpicians are organized into three provinces: France, Canada, and the United States. The French provincial house remains in Paris, and the Sulpicians still oversee the parishes of Saint Sulpice and Notre Dame de Pauvres, and members are scattered among various French catholic seminaries. In Canada, the Order operates primarily out of the seminaries in Montreal and Edmonton. In the United States, the Order oversees St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, Maryland; St. Patrick's Seminary in Menlo, California; and the Theological College, Washington, D.C., and administers the continuing education programs in spiritual formation through the Center for Continuing Formation at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore and the Vatican II Institute at St. Patrick's Seminary in California. Individual Sulpicians are at work in a number of diocesan seminaries and around the world in Brazil, Colombia, Japan, Vietnam, and various French-speaking African nations. There are at present more than 300 priests who are full members of the Order.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Hebermann, Charles George. The Sulpicians in the United States. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Library, 2009 (originally published 1916).
- Kauffman, Christopher J. Tradition and Transformation in Catholic Culture: The Priests of Saint Sulpice in the United States from 1791 to the Present. New York: Macmillan, 1988.
- Thompson, Edward Healy. Life of M. Olier: Founder of the Seminary of St. Sulpice. London: Burns and Lambert, 1861.

Sumarah

Sumarah is a Javanese word referring to the condition of total surrender. Thus the name Paguyuban Sumarah, for the Indonesian spiritual association, is also a description of its practice. The aim of meditation, termed sujud in Indonesia, is to surrender every aspect of personal being so the self functions as a vehicle for God's will. Sumarah is currently an association of about 6,000. The seat of the organization, the Dewan Pimpinan Pusat (DPP), is in Jakarta. Regional centers exist in all major Javanese cities, and in a few regions, notably Madiun, a large number of villagers have joined. Sumarah is not identified with any religion. Although most members are Muslim, there are also Buddhist and Christian followers.

Sumarah is a practice. It has no canon of teachings, no sacred texts, and no sacred sites or buildings. There is no "guru," and the direction of attention in meditation is "inward"; the authority that meditators are meant to attend to is that of the "true teacher" (guru sejati or hakiki) inside. Nevertheless, guidance (tuntunan) within weekly group sessions is a critical vehicle for practice. Guides, termed pamong, speak spontaneously through attunement to those participating. All Sumarah members lead normal working and family lives. The aim of practice is not isolation from society but a balance of outer (lahir) and inner (batin) being in every moment.

The origins of Sumarah lie in the revelatory experiences (wahyu sumarah) of Sukinohartono in 1935. Pak Kino, as he was called, was born at the turn of the century near the court city of Yogyakarta. He worked as a court attendant and bank clerk until his death in 1970. After his revelation a circle of friends began to share the practice, so that by 1940 the seeds of an organization had been sown through most of Central and East Java. Those seeds germinated during World War II under Japanese occupation. During the revolutionary struggle of the late 1940s, an influx of many new and younger members gave rise to the need for a formal organization.

Just as Indonesia gained independence, the association crystallized into what is now Paguyuban Sumarah, usually referred to as just Sumarah. From 1950 until 1966 the formal organization was led by Dr.

Surono and centered in Yogyakarta. From 1966 until his death in 1997, the most important leader was Ary-murthy in Jakarta. Throughout the period since independence, Sumarah has been one of the several dozen most prominent national movements within the sphere of Javanism (kejawen, earlier also termed kebatinan). Although not one of the largest movements, it has been especially important nationally because its leaders have been simultaneously active in umbrella organizations that represent kebatinan on the national scene.

Although there have been several hundred international practitioners since 1971, there is no international organization.

DPP Paguyuban Sumarah
Yayasan Sukino
Pendopo Sumarah
Gang Setiyaki, Wirobrajan
Yogyakarta
Indonesia

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Islam; Javanism; Meditation; Sufism.

References

- Howe, David. "Sumarah: A Study of the Art of Living." Ph.D. diss., University of North Carolina, 1980.
- Stang, Paul. "Inner Dimensions of the Indonesian Revolution." In Autonomous Histories, Particular Truths, edited by Laurie Sears. Madison: University of Wisconsin/Center for Southeast Asian Studies, 1993.
- Stang, Paul. Politik Perhatian: Rasa dalam Kebudayaan Jawa. Yogyakarta, Indonesia: Lembaga Kajian Islam dan Sosial, 1998.

Summer Solstice

The longest day of the year, Summer Solstice, along with the related Winter Solstice, was among the earliest astronomical phenomena observed by people observing the sky and relating what they saw to the changing weather and agricultural seasons. In the Northern Hemisphere, if one observes the rising Sun in the spring, it appears to rise a little bit farther north day by day until it reaches a point in the last half of June where the northern drift stops. After what appears to be a pause, it begins to rise bit by bit farther south each day. In the Southern Hemisphere, of course, the drift is exactly opposite. The Summer Solstice is the point at which the drift stops and pauses before starting in the opposite direction. The Summer Solstice, usually June 21 on the Common Era calendar, occurs in the midst of the northern growing season—after planting has been completed but prior to the beginning of the harvest.

People dance at Stonehenge in southern England, June 20, 2008, in anticipation of the moment when the sun rises over the stones for the Summer Solstice. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Summer Solstice was celebrated in most ancient cultures. However, most of these celebrations were abandoned as the major world religions spread and absorbed the thousands of indigenous religions. Christianity designated June 24 (the Summer Solstice on the old Julian calendar, and six months prior to Christmas) as the birthday of John the Baptist, who was believed to have been born six months prior to the birth of Jesus. John's birthday, or Midsummer Day, is observed by the Roman Catholic Church, the Eastern Orthodox churches, and a few Protestant churches. Midsummer Day, blending Christian themes and Pagan practices, is celebrated across Europe and is an official holiday in several countries, including Latvia and Estonia.

The last half of the 20th century saw the founding of the neo-Pagan movement, which has as its largest visible segment the Wiccan or Witchcraft movement. This movement was inspired by the ancient Paganism of Northern and Western Europe and posed eight equally positioned holidays that anchored its liturgical year. The Summer Solstice was one of the eight Pagan/Wiccan festivals. For modern neo-Paganism (and accompanying Pagan revivalist movements in Europe), the Summer Solstice has become one of its most important holidays and a time for large outdoor gatherings. As relatively little is known about either the practices or the details of belief of the ancient Pagans, a non-literary people, the new Pagans have been able to pour content into their ritual and practice from a variety of sources, most notably Western Esotericism.

In the 18th century, England saw the founding of two organizations that became precursors of the modern neo-Pagan movement, the Druids. As early as 1649, John Aubrey (1626–1697) suggested that the ancient Druids discovered by Julius Caesar when he came to Briton, oversaw the building of Stonehenge, a view later championed by William Stukeley (1687–1765), who it appears founded the first modern Druid revivalist group in 1717. A more permanent group, the Ancient Order of Druids, was founded in 1781 by Henry Hurle. Over the years, several additional Druid groups were formed and died. By 1955 only one group, the British Circle of the Universal Bond, survived. It claimed to be the true descendant of the 18th-century groups, and thus inherited the right to conduct the Summer Solstice celebrations that had become an annual event at Stonehenge.

The claims of the Druids were caught up in the breakthrough archaeological work on Stonehenge in the 1960s, when some scholars discovered that the placement of some of the stones, including those in the very center and the heel stones far outside, were arranged in such a way as to point to major astronomical occurrences, most notably the apparent movement of the Sun in the sky between the Summer and Winter solstices. This discovery raised questions of how Stonehenge functioned in the ancient agricultural cycle of the British Isles and especially how the knowledge of the solstices and equinoxes were integrated into the religious thinking of British Pagans. Druids and Wiccans immediately seized the new archaeological insights and began using them as foundational information for their practice. The Druids saw it as further confirmation of their claims to use Stonehenge for religious rituals.

As Stonehenge passed into the care and control of the British government, and was fenced off from visitors to prevent further damage, the Druids have been the only outsiders to gain access to the site, each year on the morning of the Summer Solstice, when they ritually greet the rising Sun. Access to Stonehenge was withdrawn in 1985, when revilers and police clashed, but was reinstated in 2000. In 2009, some 35,000 people showed up for the Summer Solstice celebration.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Calendars, Religious; Common Era Calendar; Eastern Orthodoxy; Roman Catholic Church; Stonehenge; Wiccan Religion; Winter Solstice.

References

- Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, UK: Element, 1991.
- Crowey, Vivianne. The Principles of Paganism. London: Thorsons, 1996.
- Farrar, Janet, and Stewart Farrar. A Witches Bible Complete. New York: Magickal Child, 1984.
- Hawkins, Gerald S., and John B. White. Stonehenge Decoded. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1993.
- Matthews, John, ed. The Druid Sourcebook. London: Blandford, 1887.
- Matthews, John, ed. The Summer Solstice: Celebrating the Journey of the Sun from May Day to Harvest. Wheaton, IL: Quest Books, 2002.

Sunni Islam

See Islam.

■ Suriname

The South American nation of Suriname (formerly known as Dutch Guiana) is located along the Atlantic Ocean between British Guyana and French Guinea. Its southern border is shared with Brazil. The country includes 62,323 square miles of territory. It is the smallest sovereign state in South America in both area and population. Its 480,000 citizens (2009) have tended to concentrate along the narrow coastal plain rather than the remote interior region. The capital of the Republic of Suriname is Paramaribo (population 240,000), where half of the population resides; it is located in the northern part of the country on the Atlantic coast.

Suriname is famous for the outstanding biodiversity of its pristine Amazonian rainforests in the southern region of the country. The Central Suriname Nature Reserve, noted for its flora and fauna, is the biggest and one of the most popular reserves. The Brownsberg Nature Park overlooks the Brokopondo Reservoir, one of the largest man-made lakes in the world.

Surinam is one of the most ethnically diverse nations in South America. The official language of Suriname is Dutch, but most Surinamers can communicate with one another through the use of the lingua franca, Sranantongo, a local language originally spoken by the Creole population. Other languages spoken are Hindi, Javanese, Chinese (Hakka and Mandarin), English, and other tribal languages of the Amerindians and the Bush Negroes (Maroons).

There is a strong correlation between ethnicity and religious faith in Surinam. Many political parties, including six of the eight governing coalition parties, have strong ethnic ties, and their members tend to adhere to or practice a single faith. For example, within the governing coalition, the majority of members of the mostly ethnic-Creole National Party of Suriname (NPS) are Moravian, members of the mostly ethnic-Indian United Reformed Party are Hindu, and those of the mostly ethnic-Javanese Pertjaja Luhur Party tend to be Muslim. It is also the case that political parties have no requirement that party leaders or members adhere to a particular religion. The nation's president, for example, is both the leader of the NPS and a practicing Roman Catholic.

Based on the 2004 census of population, religious affiliation is distributed as follows: Hindu 27.4 percent, Protestant 25.2 percent (predominantly Moravian), Roman Catholic 22.8 percent, Muslim 19.6 percent, and other religions/none 5 percent. The Constitution provides for freedom of religion, and other laws and policies contributed to the generally free practice of religion. The law at all levels protects this right in full against abuse, by either governmental or private actors.

The Surinamese population is composed of many ethnic and religious groups, each of which has contributed to Surinam's unique cultural heritage. The largest ethnic group is the Hindustani, which makes up 27 percent of the population; it is composed of descendants of contract-laborers from India (1873–1916, about 34,000 arrived in 64 shiploads) and is predominantly Hindu with a minority of Muslims.

The Creoles (also known as Afro-Surinamese), about 18 percent of the population, are the descendants of African slaves (250,000 were imported between 1612 and 1818) and European settlers, mainly of Dutch origin, and reside on the northern coast. They are largely Christian (both Catholic and Protestant) but also practitioners of the Winti religion and/or Myalism-Obeah, which are folk religions of West African origin, similar in some respects to Vodou in Haiti and Santería in Cuba and Puerto Rico, but are less syncretistic with Christianity. These so-called slave religions were considered subversive in colonial times, because they served as the inspiration and catalyst for revolt against slave owners and colonial authorities in an oppressive slavery system.

The Bush Negroes, or Maroons, about 15 percent of the population, are descendants of run-away African slaves who fled the coastal plantations in the 1660s and took refuge in the dense tropical forests, where they continue to live in relative isolation and preserve their ancient culture and religious traditions. They are grouped in six politically distinct peoples (Aluku-Boni, Kwinti, Matawai, Ndjuka, Saramaka, and Paramaka). The Maroons have an extremely elaborate ritual life that is totally integrated with their matrilineal social organization.

The Javanese, about 15 percent of the population, are descendants of contract-laborers from the Dutch East Indies (about 33,000 between 1890 and 1939) and are predominantly Muslim. Like the Chinese and Hindustanis, most of them left the plantations after their labor contracts ended and started small farms, at a time when the plantations were declining in importance for the nation's economy: the number of sugar plantations decreased from 80 in 1863 to only 4 in 1940.

Amerindians are 3.7 percent of the population, Chinese are 1.8 percent, and the remaining 12.5 percent are of mixed race: all of the ethnic groups described above mixed with descendants of Europeans and Middle Easterners—Dutch, Portuguese (mainly from Madeira), Lebanese, Syrian, and Jewish immigrants.

A large number of faiths, including U.S.-based church groups, have established missionary programs throughout the country since World War II. It is estimated that nearly 90 percent of the U.S. missionaries are affiliated with Baptist church associations. The Inter-Religious Council (IRC) was formed in 1989 in Paramaribo, composed of representatives from various groups, with monthly meetings to discuss and plan ecumenical activities. The IRC is also a member of the Religions for Peace Caribbean Inter-religious Network, which is a coalition of national inter-religious councils and regional religious organizations in the Caribbean region, dedicated to inter-religious cooperation for conflict transformation, peace building, and sustainable development.

Suriname was originally settled around 3000 BCE by the Arawak and later by the Carib Amerindian peoples, who had developed a culture based on hunting, fishing, and gathering by the time that Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) navigated the coastline in 1498. The territory was formally claimed by Spain in 1593, but the first European settlement did not take place until 1616, when the Dutch arrived at the mouths of several rivers between present-day Georgetown, Guyana, and Cayenne, French Guiana. The first Dutch settlement began in 1616 in this region.

In 1667, by the Treaty of Breda that ended the Second Anglo-Dutch War (1665–1667), Suriname became a Dutch colony, at about the same time that the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam (founded in North America in 1625) was ceded to the English (1664–1674) and was renamed New York City. However, the territory of Suriname was contested by Britain, who claimed settlement rights; in 1651, about 100 Englishmen from Barbados arrived with their slaves to establish a plantation colony, which was the first permanent settlement in the territory.

During the Dutch and English colonial periods, the colonists developed an agricultural economy that produced sugar, coffee, cacao, and cotton on more than 400 plantations. In the beginning, manual labor was provided by Amerindians and after 1640 by African slaves. After the final abolition of slavery by the Dutch in 1863, many former Negro slaves abandoned the plantations and the owners were faced with a shortage of manual labor. Consequently, the Dutch colonial authorities approved the importation of Chinese contract-laborers in 1853, followed by East Indians (from India) as “indentured servants” between 1873 and 1916, and, later, by Javanese from the Dutch East Indies (now, Indonesia) between 1894 and 1939. The contract-laborers had to work for five years to pay plantation owners for the cost of their ship fare to Surinam. After the Chinese, East Indian, and Javanese laborers were free of their contract obligations, they were able to return to their home countries or renew their contracts to work in Surinam for real wages. About one-third of the East Indian laborers returned to India after their initial five-year contract ended. Those who chose to remain in Suriname were given land, a bonus payment from the government, and special loans to assist them in beginning a new life as independent farmers. In 1922, Suriname became part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands; and, in 1927, the contract-labor immigrants became eligible for Dutch citizenship.

By the beginning of the 20th century, Suriname was home to a complex mixture of ethnic groups and religious traditions. These various ethnic groups tended to remain separate, divided both by ethnic tradition and by language. The divisions became important as the country moved toward independence, and they served as an obstacle to the development of a sense of national consciousness that delayed the move from colonial status until 1975.

Following independence, approximately one-third of the population took the opportunity to move to the Netherlands, taking advantage of their Dutch citizenship. After a period of government instability in the 1980s, including several coups, a democratic system was put in place in 1990. It is estimated that around 250,000 people of Surinamese descent currently live in the Netherlands, while thousands more live in the Dutch West Indies, the United States, and countries neighboring Suriname.

The importation of East Indians to Suriname further complicated the nation’s social stratification system, in which “whites” (plantation owners and overseers, owners of merchant houses, and administrators), Creoles (in a variety of intermediate occupations), and former Negro slaves (mainly agricultural workers or peasants) formed a hierarchy in that order. The East Indian contract-laborers (mostly lower-class and “untouchables”) also were placed at the lowest level of the social order, because they occupied agricultural jobs vacated by freed slaves.

East Indian immigrants in Suriname, called “coolies” by the larger society, tended to maintain their ancient cultural values brought with them from India (mainly from the United Provinces of India, West Bihar, and the Ganges Plains of North India), although they had different linguistic, caste, socio-economic, ecological, cultural, and religious traditions. However, their ethnic identity as Hindustanis was based on a concept of “Mother India,” which the East Indian immigrants to Suriname considered the place of origin of their common cultural and religious traditions. Consequently, in Surinam, they formed a new ethnic group within a pluralistic society and developed a new consciousness as “Hindustanis,” which enabled them to effectively resist the process of cultural and racial syncretism later. However, all East Indians, whether or not they were born in Suriname, were considered aliens until granted citizenship in 1927.

The historical ethnic division of labor broke down during the 20th century, especially after World War II (1939–1945) and the achievement of independence (1975). New avenues of economic competition have emerged in business, the government bureaucracy, and the professions. However, the stereotypes originally derived from the ethnic division of labor and internalized by the subjugated groups, and the attitudes associated with it, are still prevalent. Nevertheless, the considerable wealth of many East Indians in Suriname today attests to their success in overcoming social discrimination and political alienation and achieving upward social mobility and a higher standard of living than their predecessors. The pressure to maintain traditional marriage and family values is very strong among the Hindustanis, but intermarriage with other ethnic groups has resulted in an erosion of those values.

Language is an important element of ethnic identity. Therefore, the efforts by Suriname's Hindustani community to revive the Hindi (also called Sarnami) language, beginning in the 1950s, were viewed as a conscious attempt to recover its distinctive ethnic heritage. Several religious and cultural organizations have played an important role in this revitalization process.

Christianity Christianity was introduced to Suriname in 1683 with the arrival of several Roman Catholic priests. However, they stayed only for four years. Priests came again in 1786, but again for only a brief stay. Then in 1735, permanent Christian work was launched by the German Moravian Brethren. The Moravian Church in Suriname now includes more than 10 percent of the country's 476,000 people.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands (now the Protestant Church in the Netherlands) established work in 1741 and 1750, respectively, but primarily served the white residents and lost many members after independence in 1975. A variety of other Protestant and Free churches have established work in Surinam, but none have more than a few thousand members each.

The Suriname Committee of Christian Churches dates to 1960. It is affiliated with the World Council of Churches (WCC) and includes the Moravian, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran, and Roman Catholic churches.

After two Catholic priests from the Netherlands settled in the colony in 1817 and established the Prefecture Apostolic of Dutch Guyana-Suriname, the Roman Catholic Church soon had a large following among the general population. The Vicariate Apostolic of Dutch Guiana, with its seat at Paramaribo, was established in 1842 and missionary work was assigned to the Redemptorists (Congregatio Sanctissimi Redemptoris) by the Holy See. In 1842, there were only about 13,300 Roman Catholics in Suriname.

The first bishop of the Diocese of Surinam was consecrated in 1958. In 1950, there were only 5 parishes that were served by 42 religious priests, in addition to 91 male religious and 181 female religious workers. Only five bishops (all Dutch) have headed the Diocese since 1907, and the current leader is Bishop Wilhelmus Adrianus Josephus Maria de Bekker (appointed in 2004).

The Diocese of Surinam is a jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of Port of Spain (Trinidad). Today, about 23 percent of the population is Roman Catholic. In 2004, there were 31 Catholic parishes in Suriname, served by 6 diocesan and 16 religious priests, assisted by 20 male religious and 11 female religious workers. There has been a serious decline in the quality of pastoral care given to the Catholic community as a result of the decline in the number of Catholic priests since the mid-1960s (from 57 priests in 1966 to 22 priests in 2004) and religious workers (from 98 male and 201 female religious in 1966 to 20 male and 11 female religious in 2004).

Traditionally, Catholic religious devotion in Suriname is a sphere of activity dominated by women and children, whereas men were not expected to show much concern about religion. This trend has been strengthened by the role of church-run public schools administered by the Roman Catholic Church in partnership with the government.

Prior to independence in 1975, most of the religious schools in Suriname were operated by the Roman Catholic Church, which provided all the needed funding with the exception of teachers' salaries and a small maintenance stipend that was provided by the government. The government educational system subsidized many of the primary and secondary schools established and managed by religious organizations; these were considered public schools and the teachers were considered public servants. Consequently, the Roman Catholic Church played an important role in the socialization process by providing religious and moral instruction to a diversity of ethnic groups. School attendance is compulsory for all children until 12 years of age.

SURINAME

Particularly influential has been the important role played by the Roman Catholic Church in preparing leaders of the nationalistic movement in the post-World War II period. The influence of Roman Catholic social thought has continued to affect Surinamese political life until the present, mainly through church-run primary and secondary schools.

The Protestant movement in Suriname is composed of about 20 denominations, the oldest of which is the Dutch Reformed Church, founded in 1668, now called the Reformed Church in Suriname. At the beginning it was a church for the Dutch colonists and most church activities took place in Paramaribo and around the various plantations in the countryside. Until the 1850s, Surinam (Dutch Guiana) was a Dutch-speaking state church, with the state paying for pastors and church upkeep, and existed almost exclusively for the elite class. After the 1850s this denomination opened itself to the lower classes and to the African slaves; the latter used a Pidgin English in worship services. The central church building in the capital city still serves as the auditorium of the University of Suriname, and it was there that the first president of the country took the oath of office when Suriname became an independent state in 1975.

The German Moravian Brethren (Unitas Fratrum) arrived in 1735 to conduct missionary work among the Arawak Indians near Saron on the lower Saramacca River. Between 1762 and 1813, they also engaged in missionary work among the Maroons (Saramakas) in the headwaters of the Gran Rio and, after 1830, among African plantation slaves, with whom they previously were prohibited from evangelizing. In 1851, they abandoned their work among the Saramakas due to the unhealthy climate and few conversions; then they turned their attention to another Maroon group, the Ndjukas, who were living near Koffiekamp on Sara Creek in the interior.

The Moravian missionaries received only enough money from the mother church in Germany to take them to their port of departure in Europe and had to work for their ocean passage. After arriving in Suriname, they worked at whatever occupation would provide their necessary food and clothing: picking coffee, repairing shoes, dressmaking, gardening, and working in construction. These lay missionaries were successful in establishing many local congregations among the lower classes and the slave population. Today, the Moravian Church is the largest Protestant denomination in Suriname in terms of adherents.

The Dutch Evangelical Lutherans arrived in 1741, mainly to serve the small white population of plantation owners, administrative officials, and merchants. The Anglican Church arrived during the British occupation of 1799–1816 to serve English colonists and other international residents. Congregations are now included in the Diocese of Guyana as part of the Church in the Province of the West Indies.

All of the other Protestant groups present today arrived after World War II, mainly from the United States, to serve the general population: Pilgrim Holiness Church (now Wesleyan Church) in 1945; the Seventh-day Adventists, 1945 (increased from 14 to 17 churches between 1997 and 2007; and from 2,677 to 3,616 members); West Indies Mission, 1954 (now WorldTeam); the Assemblies of God, 1959; International Missions, 1961; Independent Faith Mission, 1967 (Baptist); the Southern Baptists, 1971 (United Baptist Church, formed in 1991); Fellowship International Mission, 1972 (independent); the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), 1982; the Church of the Nazarene, 1984; the Mennonite Board of Missions, 1985; the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1987; the Christian and Missionary Alliance, 1987; the Church of God of Prophecy, 1992; and the United Pentecostal Church, 2003.

Other Protestant and Free church denominations are also present (founding dates unknown): Evangelical Methodist Church, African Methodist Episcopal Church, Evangelical Congregational Church, Church of Christian Liberty (“reformed fundamentalist”), Association of Baptist Churches, and the Pentecostal Mission Church.

In 2000, according to Brierly (1997), the largest Protestant denominations in Suriname were estimated to be the following: the Moravian Church (46 churches and 29,000 members), the Seventh-day Adventists (18 churches and 3,400 members), the Dutch Reformed Church (6 churches and 3,100 members), the Lutheran Church (6 churches and 2,050 members), the Evangelical Church of the West Indies (20 churches and 1,600 members), all Pentecostal denominations (18 churches and 1,330 members), and all other Protestant denominations (about 70 churches and 3,770 members). The total Protestant membership in Suriname was estimated to be less than 50,000 among fewer than 200 congregations.

Islam In the 1890s, the Dutch began the transporting of Javanese (mostly Muslim) to serve as indentured laborers on sugar plantations to replace the freed slaves. By 1940 about 33,000 Javanese immigrants had arrived in Suriname. With the closure of many of the sugar plantations in the middle of the century, the Javanese began to establish themselves as small-scale farmers, as did the Chinese and Hindustanis. Most Javanese preferred to live close together in family units or villages in rural areas, where they could maintain their culture, language, and religious practices.

Islamic mosques in Suriname are led by maulanas (Muslim priests), who also function as traditional healers. Most Javanese villages have two mosques, which represent two groups within the Islamic community: the East prayers and the West prayers. The latter also believe in Agama Djawa, in which ghosts and their ancestors play an important role. When important events happen, there is always a sacrificial meal in which only the men take part. The dukun, a traditional healer in Javanese communities, serves as a midwife and prepares natural medicines from a variety of herbs, leaves, rhizomes, flowers, and fruits.

Most people of Javanese ancestry in Suriname are Muslims today, and very few have converted to other religions. About 20 percent of the Surinamese population is culturally Javanese and religiously Muslim. The majority of the Javanese are Sunni Muslims of the Shafiite School, whereas there are a small numbers of other Islamic groups. The Ahmadiyya movement in Islam (founded by Mirza Ghulam Hazrat Ahmad [1835–1908] in the 1890s in the Punjab of India), which was declared apostate and non-Muslim by orthodox Muslims in India and Pakistan during the 1980s, has a small following in Suriname, as does the Bazuin of God movement. The World Islamic Call Society, which works to convert the world to Islam (founded in 1972, with headquarters in Tripoli, Libya) has an office in Paramaribo.

Hinduism About 80 percent of the Hindustani immigrants were Hindus. Some of them eventually returned to India, but those who remained in Suriname and their descendants constitute a “diasporic community” that, in 2004, constituted approximately 27 percent of the total population. However, far fewer claim to be adherents of Hinduism.

Hindus have remained faithful to their ancient traditions, language, and beliefs, which sets them apart in this multicultural society. Hinduism is a family and home religion that is characterized by many rituals and religious festivals, which can be performed at home or in community halls rather than in the Hindu temples. Within their own community, Hindustani music, dance, art, images, and literature are very important for maintaining cultural cohesion.

There are five known Hindu groupings in Suriname today: the Shri Sanatan Dharma Mahasabha (the “eternal religion” of orthodox believers, the majority group); the Arya Samaj (a 19th-century liberal reform movement from North India, known as the “society of nobles,” with about 16 percent of the Hindu population, which arrived in Suriname in 1928); the Sri Sathya Sai Baba movement (followers of Sathya Sai Baba); the Transcendental Meditation movement (followers of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, now organized within the Global Country of World Peace); and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), followers of A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977). Although Hinduism is limited largely to the East Indian immigrant population and their descendants in Suriname, where it provides social cohesion, some of the Hindu-based religious groups mentioned above seek to gain followers among the non-Hindu population.

Judaism The Jewish community dates to the arrival of Sephardic Jews in the mid-1600s, following the Dutch abandonment of their land in Brazil. Presumably some Ashkenazi Jews arrived from England a short time later. A Portuguese Jewish Congregation of Suriname was founded in 1661–1662, and a first synagogue was completed in 1667 at Jodensavanna. The

Suriname

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	184,000	232,000	50.0	0.79	238,000	207,000
Roman Catholics	80,000	144,000	31.0	4.45	157,000	145,000
Protestants	74,200	82,500	17.7	0.65	82,000	72,000
Marginals	1,000	5,300	1.1	0.80	8,000	10,000
Hindus	87,000	95,000	20.4	0.72	98,000	86,000
Muslims	50,000	73,500	15.8	0.72	75,000	63,000
Agnostics	3,600	22,900	4.9	0.05	25,000	25,000
Spiritists	11,000	16,500	3.5	0.72	17,100	15,100
Ethnoreligionists	30,000	9,700	2.1	0.72	9,000	8,000
New religionists	100	3,800	0.8	0.72	5,000	6,000
Baha'is	3,000	4,500	1.0	0.73	6,500	7,500
Buddhists	1,000	2,800	0.6	0.72	3,500	3,500
Jains	500	1,300	0.3	0.72	1,500	1,700
Chinese folk	600	1,200	0.3	0.73	1,300	1,200
Jews	650	860	0.2	0.71	900	900
Atheists	0	550	0.1	0.70	700	800
Total population	372,000	465,000	100.0	0.72	482,000	426,000

congregation followed the practice of the Congregation of Amsterdam. Today, there are two synagogues in Paramaribo, both Sephardic, which serve an ethnic community of about 700 people.

Buddhism There are a small number of Chinese, whose ancestors, unlike the East Indians and Javanese, began arriving in Suriname prior to the abolition of slavery; the first shipload of Chinese contract-laborers arrived in 1853. Some of their descendants have retained their Buddhist faith (or folk religions), while others have converted to Christianity.

Other Religious Groups Indigenous religions are practiced by the Amerindian and Afro-descendant Maroon populations. The surviving Amerindian groups (Akuriyo, Arawak, Carib-Kaliña-Galibi, Trío, and Wayana) are concentrated principally in the interior and to a lesser extent in coastal areas. Most Amerindians adhere to traditional animistic beliefs and practices such as magic (white and black, good and evil), witchcraft (bujeria), herbal healing (curanderismo), and shamanism (the shaman is an intermediary with the spirit world). Those of Amerindian, Creole, or Maroon origin who identify themselves as Christian often simultaneously observe animistic religious traditions.

The Bush Negroes (Maroons) of the interior region practice an animistic religion that has been labeled by anthropologists as the “most African of all religions in the Americas.” However, the Maroon religion is similar in some ways to the Winti religion that is practiced by the Creoles.

The Afro-Surinamese Creole population (not to be confused with the Maroons) of the northern coast practices the Winti religion, brought to the Americas by their African ancestors, which developed among the slaves during the colonial period. Winti (meaning “wind”) is derived from a traditional African polytheistic belief system of West African origin. It acknowledges many gods and ghosts with each one having their own myths, rites, offerings, taboos, and magical forces.

Myalism and Obeah is reportedly practiced in secret by some Creoles, even among adherents of Christian churches. Myalism is an African-derived belief system (from Central and West Africa) that developed among blacks in the British West Indies during the slavery period. Obeah is the specific practice of “black magic” or witchcraft by priests, known as “obeah-men” or “obeah-women,” although most sorcerers are male and most folk healers are female.

After World War I, a new wave of Chinese (largely Buddhist), Lebanese and Syrian (Muslim and Eastern Orthodox Christians), and Portuguese (mainly Madeira islanders who were Roman Catholic) immigrants arrived in Suriname, as well as Portuguese-speaking migrants (Roman Catholic) from neighboring Brazil. After World War II, several marginal Christian groups arrived: Jehovah's Witnesses (45 churches with 2,317 members in 2007) and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons, founded in 1830; 7 churches with 1,057 members in 2008). There are also small groups of Baha'i, the United Ancient Order of Druids (1996–1998, two lodges established), Freemasons (Provincial Grand Master of the Regular Freemasons in Suriname), the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), and the Worldwide Extraterrestrial Phoenix Movement of Surinam (which calls itself, "Ambassador of the Golden Age and the Second Coming of Christ to the World").

Brazilian anthropologist Livio Sansone reports that large numbers of Surinamese in the Netherlands (mainly in Amsterdam) have adopted the beliefs, practices, music, and dress of the Rastafarians by contact with Jamaicans. More recently, Rastafarians have established themselves in Suriname.

J. Gordon Melton and Clifton L. Holland

See also: African Methodist Episcopal Church; Ahmad, Mirza Ghulam Hazrat; Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Arya Samaj; Assemblies of God; Baha'i Faith; Christian and Missionary Alliance; Church in the Province of the West Indies; Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee); Church of God of Prophecy; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of the Nazarene; Druidism; Evangelical Church of the West Indies; Freemasonry; Global Country of World Peace; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Moravian Church in Surinam; Protestant Church in the Netherlands; Rastafarians; Roman Catholic Church; Santeria; Sathya Sai Baba Movement; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Shafiite School of Islam; Southern Baptist Convention; United Pentecostal Church International; Vodou; Wesleyan Church; Witchcraft; World Council of Churches.

References

- Brierly, Peter. World Churches Handbook. London: Christian Research, 1997.
- Catholic-Hierarchy website. "Diocese of Paramaribo." <http://www.catholic-hierarchy.org/diocese/dpara.html>.
- Dryfoot, Arthur Charles. The Shaping of the West Indian Church, 1492–1962. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1999; published jointly with The Press University of the West Indies in Jamaica.
- Fernández Olmos, Margarite, and Lizabeth Paravisini-Gebert, eds. Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah and the Caribbean. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Gautam, Mohan K. "The Construction of the Indian Image in Suriname: Deconstructing Colonial Derogatory Notions and Reconstructing of the Indian Identity." <http://www.saxakali.com/indocarib/sojourner7a.htm>.
- Glazier, Stephen D. Encyclopedia of African and African-American Religions. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Hamilton, J. Taylor, and Kenneth G. Hamilton. History of the Moravian Church: The Renewed Unitas Fratrum, 1722–1957. Bethlehem, PA: Interprovincial Board of Christian Education, Moravian Church in America, 1967.
- Hoefte, Rosemarijn. In Place of Slavery: A Social History of British Indian and Javanese Laborers in Suriname. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1998.
- Hoefte, Rosemarijn, and Peter Meel, eds. Twentieth Century Suriname: Continuities & Discontinuities in a New World Society. Kingston, Jamaica: Ian Randle Publishers, 2001.
- Horowitz, Michael M., ed. Peoples and Cultures of the Caribbean: An Anthropological Reader. Garden City, NY: The Natural History Press, 1971.
- Kranenborg, Reender. "Winti: A New Witchcraft Religion in the Netherlands." Journal of Contemporary Religion 9, no. 1 (1993): 10–16.
- Maynard, G. O. A History of the Moravian Church: Eastern West Indies Province. Port of Spain, Trinidad: Yuille's Printerie, 1968.

Orna, Hanan. "A Brief History of East Indians in Suriname," chapter 6 of Sojourners to Settlers: The Indian Migrants in the Caribbean and the Americas, by Mahin Gosine and Dhanpaul Narine. <http://saxakali.com/indocarib/sojourner6.htm>.

Price, Richard, and Sally Price. Stedman's Suriname: Life in an Eighteenth-Century Slave Society, an abridged, modernized edition; originally published in 1796. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.

The PROLADES-RITA (Religion-In-The-Americas) Database. "Religion in Surinam." <http://www.prolades.com/cra/regions/sam/sur/sur-rd.htm>.

Sansone, Livio. "Ethnicity and Leisure Time among Surinamese Adolescents and Young Men in Amsterdam." In Bonoeman, rasta's en andere Surinamers, edited by Paul Van Gelder, 185–218. Amsterdam: University of Amsterdam Press, 1984.

Stephen, Henri J. M. Winti Culture: Mysteries, Voodoo and Realities of an Afro-Caribbean Religion in Suriname and The Netherlands. Amsterdam: the author, 1998.

Suparlan, Parsudi. The Javanese in Suriname: Ethnicity in an Ethnically Plural Society. Tempe: Arizona State University Press, 1995.

Taylor, Patrick, ed. Nation Dance: Religion, Identity and Cultural Difference in the Caribbean. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

U.S. Department of Commerce. International Religious Freedom Report, 2008. <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108540.htm>.

U.S. Department of State, Bureau of Western Hemispheric Affairs. Background Note: Suriname (June 2009). <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/1893.htm>.

Van der Berg, C., and P. van der Veer. "Pandits, Power, and Profit: Religious Organization and the Construction of Identity among Surinamese Hindus." Ethnic and Racial Studies 9, no. 4 (1986): 514–528.

Van Velzen, M., with U. E. Thoden, Ineka Van Wetering, and W. Van Wetering. In the Shadow of the Oracle: Religion as Politics in a Suriname Maroon Society. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press, 2004.

■ Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands

Svalbard (literally, cold coast) and the Jan Mayen Islands form an overseas territory of Norway located in the North Sea, north of the European mainland. Together they consist of some 150 islands, with 23,559 square miles of land, most of which is within the four main islands. As of 2008, only 2,165 people live in the largely inhospitable environment sandwiched between the Norwegian Sea and the Arctic Ocean.

These previously uninhabited islands were discovered in 1596 by Jacob Heemskerck, a Dutchman on a whaling expedition. They were claimed by the Dutch until granted to Norway in the Treaty of Spitsbergen (1920). In the meantime, in 1713 the Russians established a presence.

Today the few residents on the islands are mostly engaged in mining or in running various weather and research stations. In the summer there is some tourism.

Svalbard and Jan Mayen Islands

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	1,300	2,400	59.8	1.61	2,800	3,600
Protestants	1,000	1,400	33.7	1.28	1,600	2,000
Orthodox	300	880	21.5	2.23	1,000	1,300
Agnostics	400	1,600	38.9	0.05	1,800	2,300
Buddhists	0	60	1.3	0.85	70	100
Total population	1,700	4,100	100.0	0.98	4,700	6,000

SVALBARD AND JAN MAYEN ISLANDS

The only visible religious life on the island is the Church of Norway (Lutheran), which sends chaplains to conduct worship for the people stationed there (most clergy coming on temporary assignment). The territory is assigned to the Roman Catholic Church's Vicariate of North Norway, headquartered at Tromsø, but there is little Catholic presence amid the residents and there are no Catholic services.

The islands have been a source of conflict between Norway and both Denmark (with hegemony over Greenland) and Russia.

J. Gordon Melton

A Russian church in Barentsburg, Svalbard. (Dusko Matic/Dreamstime.com)

See also: Church of Norway; Roman Catholic Church.

References

- Arlov, T. B. A Short History of Svalbard. Polarhåndbok no. 4. Oslo: Norsk Polarinstitut, 1989.
- Dowdeswell, Julian, and Michael Hambrey. Islands of the Arctic. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Lundgre, Stefan, and Olle Carlsson. Svalbard: The Land Beyond the Northcape. Arlov: Berlings Grafiska, Sweden, 1997.

Swaminarayan Hinduism

Swaminarayan Hinduism is one of the fastest-growing Hindu groups in the first part of the 21st century. Prosperity in its home state of Gujarat has propelled growth and building of extensive temple and social institutions as part of a Hindu revival; and the growth of non-resident Gujarati populations abroad, especially in the East Africa in the early 20th century and in the United Kingdom, North America, and parts of Europe and Australasia more recently, have created significant transnational networks that are shaping Gujarati ethnic identity and Hindu self-awareness in India and abroad.

Swaminarayan Hinduism began as an early 19th-century reform movement in Gujarat. The founder, Sahajanand Swami (1781–1830), became an important religious teacher and reformer in Gujarat during the period of political disunity and social upheaval that coincided with the imposition of British rule in Gujarat.

Sahajanand Swami attacked three social evils: female infanticide, widow burning, and opium addiction. He opposed the British trade in opium and the pernicious effects of drug addiction on the peasants. He also advocated the protection and social uplift of women by opposing large dowries, establishing separate precincts in the temples for women, and permitting some celibate women to reside in temple precincts.

Swaminarayan temple, suburban Chicago. (J. Gordon Melton)

Sahajanand Swami preached against the practices of corrupt sadhus and lax discipline among householders. The major reform he instituted was a strict discipline for his sadhus, including five primary vows: (1) celibacy and strict separation from women; (2) renunciation of all family ties; (3) avoiding attachment to the objects of the senses; (4) holy poverty; and (5) overcoming ego. Although the sadhus renounced the world, they lived in towns and cities to organize social and religious affairs. Sahajanand Swami established a strict householder discipline that did not require renunciation of the world. His followers took five vows: not to eat meat, not to take intoxicants, not to commit adultery, not to steal, and not to defile oneself or others.

Nonviolence, vegetarianism, and freedom from addictions were stressed. As the group grew, Sahajanand Swami himself soon became the object of veneration. Vaishnava theology teaches that when human plight is great, Vishnu appears to bring true religion and salvation. Krishna was the most prominent deity in Gujarat, and images of Krishna and his consort Radha were placed in Swaminarayan temples, but Sahajanand Swami came to be worshipped as Lord Swaminarayan. The theology of the group presents him as the manifestation of the highest reality, Purushottam; supports worship of his image in temples; and describes his heavenly abode as Akshardham. Swaminarayan established major temples at Vadtal and Ahmedabad and appointed his brothers' sons to be acharyas and administrators of two Swaminarayan dioceses that divide all Gujarat and India north and south.

Swaminarayan Hindus accept the Vedas and other basic sacred Hindu scriptures and doctrines, and they preserve four additional texts that are attributed to Swaminarayan's inspiration. The Sikshapatri contains rules for sadhus, householders, women, and acharyas. The Vachanamritam is a collection of philosophical sermons given by Swaminarayan. The Satsangijivan is a five-volume Sanskrit compendium of all the teachings, history, and legends from the life of Swaminarayan. The Lekh is more narrowly focused on regulations about the succession of the acharyas of Ahmedabad and Vadatal.

A major division occurred in 1906 when a sadhu named Swami Yagnapurushdas (1865–1951) split from the Vadatal Temple to establish his own group with a few sadhus and a small number of householders. The doctrine of the Bochasanwasi Akshar Purushottam Swaminarayan Sanstha (BAPS) is that Yagnapurushdas and his successors are the human abode (askhar) of Purushottam. The current leader, Narayanswarupdas Swami, popularly known as Pramukh Swami (b. 1921), presides over a rapidly growing institution. The number of BAPS sadhus has risen to 800.

A smaller group was founded by Muktajivandas Swami, a sadhu who left the Ahmedabad Temple in the 1940s and set up a new institution at Maninagar. In 1972 he revealed that he was the personification of the Swaminarayan Gadi, and thereafter he received divine honors. He died in Bolton in 1979 while on tour to visit his disciples in Great Britain.

Gujarati emigrations and rapid modern mobility and communication established Swaminarayan Hinduism as a growing transnational religion. Gujarati workers in British East Africa built temples that are still active in Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda. After the independence of African countries, many immigrated to Britain. Significant Gujarati immigration to the United States followed liberalization of the immigration laws in 1965. BAPS alone has more than 800 temples and 3,300 centers, including 56 temples in the United States. Two international organizations have been formed by followers of the two original dioceses of Ahmedabad and Vadatal: the International Swaminarayan Satsang Organization (ISSO) and the International Swaminarayan Satsang Mandal (ISSM). Each group is building temples in India and abroad, and BAPS has been especially successful in building large traditional temples and cultural complexes at Gandhinagar and Delhi in India, and abroad in Nairobi, London, Toronto, Chicago, Houston, and Atlanta. BAPS is noted in the Guinness Book of Records for the largest Hindu temple and the most temples (713) dedicated by a single person (Pramukh Swami).

Swaminarayan Hinduism continues to be a significant force in the preservation of personal and group identity for many Gujaratis in India and in the contemporary diaspora.

BAPS
Shree Swaminarayan Mandir, Shahibaug
Amdavad-380 004
Gujarat
India
<http://www.swaminarayan.org>

ISSO and ISSM
Shree Swaminarayan Mandir
2114 Pine St.
Grand Prairie, TX 75050

ISSO and ISSM
Shree Hari House 99B
Cobbold Rd.
Willesden
London NW10 9SL
United Kingdom
<http://www.swaminarayan.nu>

Raymond B. Williams

See also: Vegetarianism.

References

- Dave, H. T. Life and Philosophy of Shree Swaminarayan. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1974.
- Williams, Raymond Brady. An Introduction to Swaminarayan Hinduism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Williams, Raymond Brady. Religions of Immigrants from India and Pakistan: New Threads in the American Tapestry. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Williams, Raymond Brady. Williams on South Asian Religions and Immigration. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2004.

■ Swaziland

Swaziland, an African kingdom of some 6,642 square miles now ruled by King Mswati III, its absolute monarch, is largely surrounded by South Africa, but shares a short border with Mozambique. Its 1,129,000 citizens are almost all drawn from the various southern African peoples, some very different, who united to oppose Zulu expansion from Natal and the Transvaal. Sobhuza, the head of the Dlamini, who had brought about the union, died in 1839. His son, M'swazi, would rule for the next three decades, during which time the primary force threatening the nation became the Boers. The nation is named after M'swazi.

In 1867, Swaziland, a relatively small land, became a British protectorate and remained administratively separate as Great Britain established its control over all of South Africa. The drive to full independence was accelerated by the break between South Africa and the United Kingdom in 1960. The country was granted internal autonomy in 1967 and full independence the next year. It adopted a parliamentary monarchy, and King Sobhuza II was the first ruler of the independent nation. In 1973 he dissolved Parliament and proclaimed himself the absolute monarch. He instituted a new Constitution that included a legislature consisting of members elected by the public and those appointed by the king. The prime minister and the queen mother both held important leadership responsibilities.

The death of King Sobhuza in 1982 led to a power struggle within the royal family. In 1986, 19-year-old prince Makhosetive assumed the throne as Mswati III, and he continues to lead the country. He has adopted a conservative stance that continues the country's strong ties to South Africa, upon which it is economically dependent.

Traditional religion in Swaziland has revolved around the royal family, and the welfare of the state was seen as a reflection of the king's well-being. He

SWAZILAND

Swaziland

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	308,000	1,021,000	88.0	1.42	1,111,000	1,234,000
Independents	86,500	556,000	47.9	1.94	600,000	660,000
Protestants	65,300	120,000	10.3	2.46	150,000	170,000
Roman Catholics	34,000	56,000	4.8	0.70	60,000	70,000
Ethnoreligionists	139,000	110,000	9.5	-0.39	90,000	70,000
Agnostics	0	14,000	1.2	1.22	20,000	27,000
Muslims	300	7,500	0.6	1.22	9,000	12,000
Baha'is	7,000	5,300	0.5	1.22	8,000	12,000
Hindus	0	1,800	0.2	1.23	3,000	4,000
Atheists	0	300	0.0	1.24	600	800
Total population	454,000	1,160,000	100.0	1.22	1,242,000	1,360,000

and his mother were revered as the makers of rain. The royal ancestors are also seen as having an intercessory role with Umlhulumcandi, the First Being. Traditional religionists also have a strong belief in the phenomenon of possession, and possession by spirits, ancestors, and animals is a common part of religious practice. Approximately 10 percent of the people continue in their traditional belief system. That number dropped steadily, however, through the 20th century.

The Swaziland king invited Methodist missionaries from South Africa into his realm in 1825. However, that and several other attempts to evangelize the nation over the next several decades ended in failure. Permanent work really began in 1881 with the arrival of the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to build the Church of England. Their work was constituted a diocese of the Church in the Province of South Africa in 1968. In 1887, German Lutherans began work that has matured into a diocese of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa. Methodists made a new beginning in 1895 and finally built a substantial work integrated into the Methodist Church of South Africa.

As the major Protestant churches came into Swaziland from South Africa, so also was the country invaded by African Initiated Churches, originally formed in their larger neighbor. Possibly the first independent church to arrive was the Independent Methodist Church (a schism from the African Methodist Episcopal Church). Between 1906 and 1936, some 20 indigenous groups established work, the largest being branches of the Zionist and Apostolic Churches, the Christian Catholic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, the Christian Apostolic Church in Zion of South Africa, and the Swazi Christian Church in Zion of South Africa.

In 1939 the king of Swaziland attempted to unite all the small independent churches operating in the country into a national church. Although his success was only partial, the United Christian Church of Africa did come into being, and the king is still considered its leader. A cathedral was erected in 1970 and opened in 1979 as the National Swazi Church. It is the site of special Easter services attended by the royal family.

The Roman Catholic Church arrived rather late, when brothers with the Order of the Servants of Mary opened their initial mission in 1913. The work was freed from the Vicariate of Natal in 1923 with the creation of the Prefecture of Swaziland. In 1961 the new suffragan diocese of Swaziland was attached to the diocese of Pretoria. The erection of the diocese was a result of two decades of rapid growth following the end of World War II.

The Swaziland Conference of Churches, which includes not only the older missionary churches but also the Roman Catholic Church, the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and a number of new conservative evangelical churches, was formed in 1965. In 1976 the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Mennonite, and African Methodist churches founded the Council of Swaziland Council of Churches, which is affiliated with the World Council of Churches. Many of the African Initiated Churches are united in the League of African Churches in Swaziland, and conservative Evangelicals have established the Association of Evangelicals of Swaziland, affiliated with the World Evangelical Alliance.

Islam and Judaism have made little impact on Swaziland, and there are no visible communities of Buddhists or Hindus. The primary non-Christian community to arise in the 20th century was the Baha'i Faith.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: African Initiated (Independent) Churches; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Baha'i Faith; Church in the Province of South Africa; Church of England; Evangelical Lutheran Church in Southern Africa; Methodist Church of Southern Africa; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Council of Churches; World Evangelical Alliance; Zionist and Apostolic Churches.

References

- Armitage, F. L. "Abakamoya: People of the Spirit: A Study of the Zionist Movement in Swaziland with Special Reference to the Swazi Christian Church in Zion of South Africa and the Nazareth Branch." Ph.D. diss., University of Aberdeen, 1976.
- Booth, Alan R. Historical Dictionary of Swaziland. Methuen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2000.
- Byaruhanga-Akilki, A. B. T. Religion in Swaziland. Kwaluseni, Swaziland: University of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland, 1975.
- Cazziol, Roger C. The Swazi Zionists: An Indigenous Religious Movement in Southern Africa. Kwaluseni: University of Swaziland, 1987.
- Kasenene, Peter. Religion in Swaziland. Braamfontein, South Africa: Skotaville, 1993.
- Ndlovu, H. L. "The Royal Easter Ritual and Political Action in Swaziland." Ph.D. diss., McMaster University, 1993.
- Perkins, F. J. "A History of Christian Missions in Swaziland to 1910." Ph.D. diss., University of Witwatersrand, 1974.
- Sowazi, Eunice N. Mingling with the Mud of Humanity: A Celebration of the First Twenty Years of the Council of Swaziland Churches. Manzini, Swaziland: Ruswanda Publishing Bureau, 1996.

■ Sweden

One of the Scandinavian countries, Sweden is located between Finland and Norway, with its coastline bordering the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Bothnia to the east. To the southwest, Sweden borders the narrow passage between the Baltic and North seas. The long, narrow country reaches into the Arctic and includes 173,700 square miles of land. In 2009, the population was just over 9 million.

Megalithic monuments, rock-carvings, and grave-mounds bear witness to prehistoric religion during the Stone, the Bronze, and the Iron ages. In one of the earliest written sources about religion in Swedish territory, Adam from Bremen, in a report to his archbishop in 1070, speaks about a Pagan temple in Uppsala, where the gods Thor, Woden, and Frej were worshipped through sacrificial rituals every ninth year. Most probably Sweden shared the Old Norse mythology and cosmology described in the Icelandic literature (the Eddas).

Christian missions began in Sweden in the ninth century. A small congregation was founded in 830 by Ansgar, a Frankish-German monk considered the "Apostle of the North." Through Viking settlements and trading, the impact of Christianity increased. Olof Skötkonung, considered the first king of Sweden, was probably baptized in the year 1000. In 1164, Uppsala was designated as the see of the archbishop. Saint Bridget (Birgitta) of Sweden, known for her visions and revelations and the founding of an order, lived in the 14th century. At the time of the Reformation, in the 16th century, the Church of Sweden switched its allegiance from the Roman Catholic Church to Lutheranism, and now exists as an evangelical Lutheran church. During the following centuries the position of the church as a state church was strengthened, and Swedish citizenship implied church membership. Adopting or giving expression to a faith that was not strictly in accordance with the teachings of the church became a penal offense and could lead to exile.

The religious currents of the 18th century, such as Pietism, also spread in Sweden. Later on, Methodism, the Baptists, the Holiness movement, and other revival movements were brought to the country from England and North America. In Sweden these revival movements turned into popular movements (folkrörelser), in opposition to the Church of Sweden and to a society with a state church system. Moreover, the liberal ideas of the 19th century contributed very significantly to breaking the religious hegemony of the church. During the second part of that century, a number of denominations were acknowledged and given permission to act as Free churches alongside the state church. Also the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was by then established in this country. During the first decades of the 20th century, the Jehovah's Witnesses became noticeable; Pentecostalism had also gained adherents.

A view across an open field to the historic Gudhem Church and monastery ruins in Sweden, 2009. (Patrik Gunnari/Dreamstime.com)

Swedish people had to wait until 1952 to obtain full freedom of religion, even the right to reject any religious affiliation whatsoever. Today, however, the once homogeneous country of Sweden has turned into a pluralistic and a multicultural society. This change has been mainly due to labor immigration and the influx of refugees. Sweden has a population of 8.8 million, and of those, 12 percent are immigrants. All this has, of course, meant changes in the field of religion. The year 2000 was a memorable year in that the state church system as such was abolished. The full impact of that event on the religious community as a whole still remains to be seen.

Today, 7.4 million Swedes, or 83 percent of the population, are members of the Church of Sweden. In 1975, 10.8 million church attendances for the Sunday-morning service were reported, and among 15-year-olds, 63 percent had been confirmed; in 2000, the corresponding figures had fallen to 6.6 million and 43 percent. On the other hand, during the same period, attendance at music services/concerts (musikgudstjänster) has increased from 1.4 to 2.4 million people. These data may serve as examples of religious change in Sweden. In 1960, the first ordination of woman priests took place. Today, of those in the ministry, almost one-third are women, two of whom are bishops.

The once rebellious Free church denominations are today well integrated into Swedish society, and they participate in ecumenical work. As far as membership within these denominations is concerned, the trend is one of decline, from 255,500 in 1985 to 216,000 in 1999. The largest is the Pentecostal movement (Pingströrelsen), with 90,000 members. The Pentecostals reach out to immigrants, and meetings, though small, are held not only in the common Western languages but also in Amharic/Tigrinya, Arabic, Persian, and Romanity for the Roma (Gypsies). The Mission Covenant Church of Sweden (Svenska Missionsförbundet), having originated from a Low-Church movement, has 67,000 members. It accepts both infant baptism and believer's baptism, and is a member of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. InterAct (Nybygget), with 28,800 members, is the only denomination that has had a small but distinct membership increase. It was established in 1996 through a union between three Baptist denominations founded in the 19th century. It is a member of the World Evangelical Alliance. Also present are the Baptist Union of Sweden (Svenska Baptistsamfundet); the Swedish Alliance Mission (Svenska Alliansmissionen); the Salvation Army; the Methodist Church; a branch of the U.S.-based United Methodist Church; and the Seventh-day Adventist Church. All these churches are organized in the Swedish Free Church Council (Sveriges Frikyrkosamråd).

The Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox and Oriental churches in Sweden have some characteristics in common, though their histories differ. They are churches with many immigrants, their growth is strong, and they are primarily found in the big cities. The Catholic Church has 150,000 members, indicating that the membership has more than doubled since 1975. The church is probably the most multicultural organization in Sweden. Apart from the congregations, there are the so-called national groups, the largest being the Polish community (30,000 members) and the Spanish-speakers (20,000 members). Mass is celebrated regularly in Arabic, Croatian, Hungarian, English, French, Gheez, Italian, Portuguese, Slovene, and Vietnamese. The Orthodox and Eastern churches have altogether 100,000 faithful, a figure that has doubled since 1975. The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East is the largest, with 28,000 members. The Serbian Orthodox Church has 23,000 members. Many of the Greek Orthodox Church members, who came to Sweden as labor migrants, have returned to Greece. Then there are the Bulgarian, Estonian, Finnish, Macedonian, Rumanian, Russian, Armenian, Coptic, and Ethiopian Orthodox churches, plus the Apostolic Catholic Assyrian church of the East. There is also a Swedish Orthodox deanery.

Among the Protestant foreign churches, the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church is the biggest (12,000 members), followed by the Hungarian Protestant Church (6,000). All churches and denominations mentioned above are members or observers in the Christian Council of Sweden (Sveriges kristna råd).

The Faith Movement (Trosrörelsen) was established in Sweden in the early 1980s, when Ulf Ekman, once a priest in the Church of Sweden but later influenced by the teachings of Pentecostal teacher Kenneth Hagin in Tulsa, Oklahoma, founded a congregation in Uppsala, the Word of Life (Livets Ord). There are now some 40 congregations with 6,000 members affiliated to the Word of Life. In the beginning the growth of the Faith Movement caused conflicts with the surrounding religious society. The Word of Life pursues an extensive missionary work, particularly in the former Soviet Union, where quite a number of congregations and Bible schools have been founded. In recent years India has been at the focus of this kind of activity. The Vineyard also has some propagation in Sweden, with 1,000 members in 10 congregations and house groups. The International Churches of Christ have one congregation in Stockholm, with some 150 members.

Up to the beginning of the 20th century, almost 8,000 Mormons had left for Utah. Today the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Sweden numbers 8,500, which implies an increase of more than 50 percent since 1975. Almost half of the members belong to congregations in the three big city areas of Stockholm, Malmö, and Gothenburg. In 1985 a temple was built in a suburb of Stockholm. The Jehovah's Witnesses have also increased by more than 50 percent, and there are now 23,500 members or publishers; at the memorial in 1999, some 36,000 individuals were present. In contrast to the Latter-day Saints, their congregations are more evenly distributed throughout the country. To a higher degree than the Pentecostals, the Jehovah's Wit-

SWEDEN

Sweden

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	6,022,000	6,101,000	66.0	0.15	5,913,000	5,934,000
Protestants	8,830,000	7,489,000	81.0	−0.96	7,400,000	7,241,000
Orthodox	31,500	132,000	1.4	−0.03	155,000	165,000
Roman Catholics	58,900	152,000	1.6	8.61	180,000	200,000
Agnostics	1,197,000	1,683,000	18.2	1.16	2,158,000	2,542,000
Atheists	799,000	1,095,000	11.8	0.36	1,265,000	1,400,000
Muslims	2,400	250,000	2.7	0.96	380,000	450,000
Buddhists	300	40,000	0.4	0.60	55,000	60,000
New religionists	5,800	16,300	0.2	0.14	18,500	20,000
Jews	15,000	16,000	0.2	0.38	16,000	16,000
Hindus	0	13,500	0.1	3.17	17,000	21,000
Ethnoreligionists	0	9,600	0.1	0.38	10,000	11,000
Baha'is	1,500	6,500	0.1	0.86	8,000	10,000
Confucianists	0	6,000	0.1	0.38	7,000	9,000
Chinese folk	0	4,800	0.1	1.21	6,000	8,000
Spiritists	0	20	0.0	1.09	30	50
Total population	8,043,000	9,242,000	100.0	0.38	9,854,000	10,481,000

nesses have gained adherents among immigrants. Taken together, immigrants make up 10 percent of the members; there is even an Arabic congregation. Denominations like the Liberal Catholic Church, the New Apostolic Church, and the Church of Christ, Scientist may have roughly 2,000 members among them, including adherents of the Swedenborgian movement.

Among the non-Christian world religions, the Jews were given special permission to settle in Sweden, and to practice their religion, as early as the end of the 18th century. Today there may be 16,500 Jews, of whom 8,000 are members of a community, a figure that has been fairly constant. The big waves of immigration in recent years account for the enormous growth of Muslims in Sweden. The number of regular attendants at the different mosques in Sweden can be estimated at 100,000, though the number of immigrants and refugees with Muslim backgrounds (“ethnic” Muslims) may amount to 300,000 or even more. A big mosque, which can accommodate 1,500 people, is located in Stockholm. Other mosques—buildings that have been established and built for the sole purpose of being a mosque—can be found in Malmö, Trollhättan, and Uppsala. In Gothenburg there is a mosque of the Ahmadiyya movement in Islam. The Baha'i Faith, with 900 adherents, is a middle-class phenomenon consisting of Iranians, but with many Swedish converts as well. The Hindus can be estimated at some 3,000 to 5,000, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness included. The Sikhs number about 800. Further, there are some 8,000 to 10,000 Buddhists in Sweden, among them a number of Western converts, Zen and Tibetan Buddhists in particular.

Of course a number of new religions have established themselves, even in Sweden. There are formations such as the Church of Scientology (in 2000 they were granted permission to conduct marriages), a few adherents of the Raelian movement, and the Church Universal and Triumphant, but also a number of neo-Hindu and neo-Pagan groups, including Wicca and neo-shamanism. Tentatively, the number of regular and active members within these movements may be estimated at 10,000—and some 500 of those hold to the Æsir cult. This figure has not changed very much in recent decades. Closely related to these religions and movements are the large number of loosely organized, New Age-inspired groups. If belief in reincarnation would do as a criterion of susceptibility to these kinds of new religiosity, they may involve some 400,000 individuals (the Hindus and the Buddhists excluded). Finally, Humanisterna (The Humanists), promoting Humanism as a philosophy of life and affiliated with the International Humanist and Ethical Union, has some 700 members.

A study from 1999 including all religions showed that, during a September weekend, one million people, or 12 percent of the population, took part in a religious event either by attending services or through media religion (or both). That is a result which, when all religions and different faiths are considered, questions the picture of Sweden as a highly secularized country.

Margareta Skog

See also: Ahmadiyya Movement in Islam; Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; Church of Scientology; Church Universal and Triumphant; Churches of Christ; Eastern Orthodoxy; Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church; Free Churches; Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East; Humanism; International Churches of Christ; International Humanist and Ethical Union; International Society for Krishna Consciousness; Jehovah's Witnesses; Liberal Catholic Church; Mission Covenant Church of Sweden; New Apostolic Church; Pentecostalism; Raelian Movement International; Roman Catholic Church; Salvation Army; Serbian Orthodox Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; Swedenborgian Movement; United Methodist Church; Wiccan Religion; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Evangelical Alliance.

References

- Skog, Margareta, ed. Det religiösa Sverige: Gudstjänst-och andaktsliv under ett veckoslut kring millennieskiftet. Örebro, Sweden: Libris, 2001.
- Tegborg, Lennart, ed. Sveriges kyrkohistoria. 8 vols. Stockholm: Verbum, 1998–.
- Turville-Petre, E. O. G. Myth and Religion of the North: The Religion of the Ancient Scandinavia. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964.

Swedenborg, Emanuel

1688–1772

Emanuel Swedenborg, scientist and seer, was a prominent Swedish intellectual and expert in the field of geology and mining, who left his science behind to pursue conversations with angels that led to his writing spiritual commentaries on the Bible that revealed what he proposed was the scriptures' deeper spiritual meaning. He later proposed a new vision of the church that became the basis of several ecclesiastical bodies in the years following his death.

Portrait of Emanuel Swedenborg, 18th-century Swedish intellectual. (Library of Congress)

Swedenborg was born in Stockholm, Sweden, on January 29, 1688, and was the second son and third child of Jesper Swedberg (1653–1735) and Sara Behm's (1666–1696) nine children. His mother and older brother died in Uppsala in 1696 in an epidemic. His father was a Lutheran priest who was elevated to the position of bishop of Skara in 1702. His mother's family had extensive mining interests. Today Jesper Swedberg is remembered for his hymns and his influence on education, while his mother was known for her sweet disposition and her piety. After his mother's death his father remarried in 1697.

Swedenborg was educated at home until he entered Uppsala University at the age of 11 in 1699. He graduated in 1709 with a focus on the classics. A year later he sailed to London and remained abroad until 1715, absorbing the wealth of information concerning modern science and technology found in England and continental Europe. Prior to returning home to Sweden, he summarized what he had learned, and he wrote down an extensive list of his own inventions: among them were an airplane, a steam engine, and a submarine.

He was a polymath who was initially intrigued with universal quantifiability and science. He founded and published Sweden's first scientific journal, Daedalus Hyperboreus, in 1716–1717. He was appointed an assessor on the important and prestigious Board of Mines by King Karl XII (r. 1682–1718), and he served Sweden in that capacity for a quarter of a century, when iron constituted 70 percent of Sweden's exports. He also found time to explore and publish works on cosmology and anatomy during the 1730s and early 1740s; eventually he felt he was called by the Lord to reveal the internal sense of the Bible. He labored in the realm of spirit for 27 years and during that time he wrote and published 18 different titles in Latin, some of them multivolume works. From 1749 until 1768 he published his religious writings anonymously. He claimed authorship of his last four works, including his crowning work of theology, True Christianity (1771), which he signed "Emanuel Swedenborg, servant of the Lord Jesus Christ."

He published his eight-volume opus, Secrets of Heaven, between 1749 and 1756. This work unveils the inner meaning of Genesis and Exodus through the use of correspondences. According to Swedenborg, the story of creation is the story of human regeneration—a lifelong process that is essential for salvation. The seven days of creation correspond to that inner spiritual process. An individual must move from the state of self love depicted as the void and darkness found in the beginning on the first day, to later states in which living affections and truths are kindled in the human heart, found on the fifth day, represented by the all the living creatures, each created according to their kind; and finally to the creation of a living soul, male and female, that looks to the marriage of wisdom and love, that alone can generate states of useful service to the neighbor and the Lord.

Heaven and Hell, published in 1757, has been and remains his most popular work. It has been continuously available since publication and has been translated into at least 25 languages. It has inspired artists and writers around the world as well as ordinary people. The writers include William Blake (1757–1827), Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849), Honoré de Balzac (1799–1850), Feodor Dostoevsky (1821–1881), August Strinberg (1849–1912), Howard Pyle (1853–1911), and Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1986). Swedenborg's rich depictions of the spiritual world have satisfied many people seeking knowledge of the after-life, and his discussion of the nature of life after death has brought comfort to countless people confronting the loss of a loved one.

Reality, according to Swedenborg is both spiritual and natural. The spiritual world is the world of causes, and the natural world is the world of effects. He claimed that he was eyewitness to the long-awaited apocalypse, which took place in the spiritual world in 1757. This event constituted the last judgment, and it re-ordered the spiritual world, thereby increasing freedom in the natural world. From a Swedenborgian perspective, the vast changes that have taken place in the world, both good and evil, can be traced to this spiritual event.

Swedenborg's religious writings gradually became known during his lifetime and generated a range of responses, negative to positive, from philosophers like Immanuel Kant (1724–1804); religious figures like Friedrich C. Oetinger (1702–1782), Johann A. Ernesti (1707–1781), Gabriel A. Beyer (1720–1729), and Thomas Hartley (1708–1784); and ordinary people. Swedenborg felt he was called only to write and publish and never attempted to found a church.

While he was open about discussing his spiritual experiences and his writings with people who were genuinely interested, he never attempted to convince or convert. In True Christianity he proclaimed in number 508 that "Now it is permitted to enter with understanding into the mysteries of faith." He died in London on March 29, 1772. A church was founded based on his writings or the "charisma of the book" in England in 1787 by a group of individuals who had never personally known Swedenborg. These writings are the founding teachings of several New Christian religious organizations.

The religious works of Emanuel Swedenborg have also been read by, and perhaps have influenced, to some degree, the founders of several new religious movements: Joseph Smith, Jr. (1805–1844), founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1830; Thomas Lake Harris (1823–1906), founder of The Brotherhood of the New Life in 1861; Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), founder of Christian Science in 1879; Madame Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891), founder of Theosophy in 1875; Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925), founder of Anthroposophy in 1913; the Reverend Sun Myung Moon (b. 1920), founder of the Unification Church in 1954; and Michael Zaharakis, member of The Saint Thomas Christians, who introduced his church to Swedenborg’s teachings after which Swedenborg was canonized by the Saint Thomas Christians in 1982.

D. T. Suzuki (1870–1966) is generally credited with bringing Zen Buddhism to the West; what is less known is that he brought Swedenborg’s writings to Japan. He translated four of Swedenborg’s works into Japanese and in 1913 he wrote a book about Swedenborg in Japanese, convinced that “Swedenborg’s theological doctrines greatly resemble Buddhism” (Suzuki 1996, 6). He wrote: “Revolutionary in theology, traveler of heaven and hell, champion of the spiritual world, king of the mystical realm, clairvoyant unique in history, scholar of incomparable vigor, scientist of penetrating intellect, gentleman free of worldly taint: all of these combine to make one Swedenborg” (Suzuki 1996, 3).

Jane Williams-Hogan

See also: Blavatsky, Helena P.; Eddy, Mary Baker; General Church of the New Jerusalem; Moon, Sun Myung; Smith, Joseph, Jr.; Steiner, Rudolf; Swedenborgian Movement; Unification Movement; Zen Buddhism.

References

- Acton, Alfred. The Letters and Memorial of Emanuel Swedenborg. 2 vols. Bryn Athyn, PA: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1948.
- Rose, Jonathan, Stuart Shotwell, and Marylou Bertucci, eds. Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg’s

Life, Work, and Impact. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation. 2005.

Sigstedt, Cyriel O. The Swedenborg Epic: The Life and Works of Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Bookman Associates. 1952.

Suzuki, D. T. Swedenborg: Buddha of the North. Trans. by Andrew Bernstein. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation. 1996.

Williams-Hogan, Jane. “Swedenborgian Traces in Modern Religious Movements Old and New.” In Croyance et societies, edited by Bertrand Ouellet and Richard Bergeron. Quebec, Canada: Éditions Fides, 1996.

Swedenborgian Church of North America

The Swedenborgian Church of North America, one of several churches to grow out of the teachings of Swedish visionary and theologian Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), was established in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1817 as the General Convention of the New Jerusalem Church. Boston, Massachusetts, however, has long been the organizational center and spiritual home of the church. At the time of the founding of this organization, there were already 17 different societies in the United States with approximately 360 members. The purpose of the organization was threefold: (1) to lay the foundation for permanent organization and central control of the church; (2) to regularize ordination; and (3) to support missionary efforts. Although the founding generation of this organization theoretically considered an episcopal form of church government, they opted for the more democratic congregational form. It suited the spirit of the times, as well as the previous history of the church.

The Swedenborgian Church of North America has a “congregational” governmental structure. It holds an annual convention in which delegates from the various congregations assemble to conduct the business of the church. These annual meetings have been held since 1817 without interruption. At these meetings decisions are made regarding ordination, the by-laws, and the overall policies of the church. At the meeting, the administrative offices of the church are also filled. The offices are president, vice president, recording secretary, and treasurer. The president is elected for one three-year term and may be elected to serve an addition three years. After serving two terms, he or she is not immediately eligible to run again. The other administrative officers of the church serve for terms of one year and are eligible for re-election without limit. The president and other administrative officers, along with three ministers and six laypersons, form the General Council, which constitutes the governing body of the church. One minister and two laypersons are elected annually to serve terms of three years. The General Council is assisted in its work by Support Units that are specifically focused on functional areas, such as communications, education, ministry support, and so forth. The chairs of the Support Units form the cabinet, which is chaired by the president. There is also a Council of Ministers that oversees the pastoral and theological matters of the church.

The Swedenborgian Church of North America reported in its journal, for the year 2008, that it has a total membership of 1,608, of whom 1,197 are listed as active members. This is almost a 25 percent decrease in active membership since 2000. The journal listed 36 churches, 31 in the United States and 5 in Canada, 59 active ministers, and 7 authorized lay leaders. While the actual membership and the number of active churches have decreased recently, the number of active clergy and lay leaders has increased. There has been a large increase in the number of ministers working as chaplains, and efforts have been made to begin ministries where there have been no previous Swedenborgian churches. Congregations are being established in Silver City, New Mexico, and Lansing, Michigan, and the San Diego church is doing outreach in Mexico. The General Convention highlights ecological and environmental awareness because of their commitment to being good stewards of the world. Many of the members are active in Eco-Justice programs. General Convention Swedenborgian churches are located in the United States, Canada, and Guyana.

In recent years the Swedenborgian Church has attempted to move beyond external criteria for membership and leadership roles in the church. In the case of the ministry, the church developed a “Statement of Inclusiveness,” preferring to make decisions regarding ordination based on “the quality of ministry that it believes the individual is capable of providing.” Women have been ordained into the ministry since 1975, and there are currently 27 listed on the roll, comprising 46 percent of the ministry. Since 1997 a person’s sexual orientation is no longer regarded as an impediment to ordination. In 2004 the denomination selected the first non-clergy, non-male president, Christine Laitner.

There are two patterns of worship in the Swedenborgian Church, traditional and contemporary. The traditional format is similar to Low-Church Episcopal. A liturgy is used with opening responses, chants that are sung, two readings from the Word (Bible) separated by an anthem or solo, a sermon that is extemporaneous or read from a manuscript, pastoral prayer, affirmation of faith, hymns, offertory, and a benediction. Some of the churches that use this format have incorporated children’s talks into it.

There are also contemporary services in the Swedenborgian Church. Although they vary greatly, a consistent feature is extensive lay participation. Sacred dance and skits have been incorporated into these services, as well as contemporary music. They also involve sharing on the part of the congregants. There has been some controversy surrounding both of these styles of worship, because the church membership has strong preferences. But there has also been some movement toward a middle position, as societies that favor traditional forms have incorporated some more contemporary aspects in recent years. Both styles of worship require careful thought and planning if they are to be effective.

The Convention theological school, the Swedenborg School of Religion, was closed in 1999, after 135 years as a free-standing school, and the property in Newton, Massachusetts, was sold. Early in 2001 the Swedenborg School of Religion formed a partnership with Pacific School of Religion (PSR) in Berkeley, California. The Swedenborg House of Studies was established that year. It offers an ordination program leading to a master’s of divinity degree, as well as a certificate of theological studies in conjunction with PSR. Distance education is a prominent feature of the new program with most of the 10 students, 8 women and 2 men, currently in the ordination track receiving their education at a distance. The library is housed on the PSR campus and is electronically integrated with that of the Graduate Theological Union. This makes the resources of the Swedenborg House of Studies accessible worldwide through an interlibrary database.

The central office of the Swedenborgian Church of North America is located in Massachusetts in a church building designed by the noted architect Ralph Adams Cram. The Wayfarers Chapel in Southern California is the national monument of the Swedenborgian Church to their founder, Emanuel Swedenborg. It is often called the “Glass Church,” and it attracts more than a quarter of a million visitors annually. The Swedenborgian Church in San Francisco is more than 100 years old and is a beautiful example of the Arts and Crafts School of architecture.

Swedenborgian Church of North America
11 Highland Ave.
Newtonville, MA 02460

Swedenborg House of Studies
Pacific School of Religion
1798 Scenic Ave.
Berkeley, CA 94709
<http://www.swedenborg.org/>

Jane Williams-Hogan

See also: General Church of the New Jerusalem; Swedenborg, Emanuel; Swedenborgian Movement.

References

- Block, Marguerite Beck. The New Church in the New World. New York: Octagon, 1968.
- Journal of the Swedenborgian Church, 2008*. Newtonville, MA: Swedenborgian Church of North America, 2008.
- Swedenborg, Emanuel. True Christian Religion. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 1996.
- Williams-Hogan, Jane. “Institutional and Communal Response to the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg in Britain and the United States.” In Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg’s Life, Work, and Impact. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 2001.
- http://www.swedenborg.org/documents/2008Journal_Web.pdf

<http://www.swedenborgiancommunity.org/files/messenger>

Swedenborgian Movement

Swedenborgian churches are founded upon the theological writings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). Swedenborg was born in Stockholm and died in London. A scientist, philosopher, and civil servant, he published an extensive theological corpus from 1749 to 1771. He stated in True Christianity that “the Lord [Jesus Christ] manifested himself before me, his servant, and sent me to this office,” in order “to receive the doctrines [of the new Jerusalem] in [my] understanding [and] to publish them by the press.” From the time of his call in 1744 until his death, he wrote and published 18 different titles in 30 volumes. All of his theological writings were written in Latin. His first theological work, Arcana Coelestia (Secrets of Heaven) (1749–1756), was published in eight volumes. It presents the spiritual or internal sense of the biblical books of Genesis and Exodus. Also included in his corpus are works entitled Heaven and Hell (1758), The Last Judgement (1758), Revelation Unveiled (1766), Divine Providence (1764), Love in Marriage (1768), and True Christianity (1771).

Swedenborg called his theology a “new” Christianity. It emphasizes the oneness of God, who is the Lord Jesus Christ; the reality of the spiritual world and how it operates; the spiritual nature of the last judgment, which he claimed took place in 1757; the essential spiritual nature of human beings; the correspondence between the spiritual world and the natural world; human freedom in spiritual things; the marriage of love and wisdom in the Lord; the partnership of faith and charity leading to a life of use; and the sacred nature of marriage.

Swedenborg himself never attempted to found a church based upon the revelation he was given. He saw himself as a spiritual explorer and scribe. There were only a handful of people who claimed allegiance to his teachings at the time of his death, but groups of followers emerged in Sweden and England almost immediately afterward. His followers in Sweden belonged to the elite and well-educated circles of society. In England they came from more diverse social backgrounds, and a significant number of readers and followers emerged among the artisans in Lancashire. Conflicts with the Crown and the Lutheran Church in Sweden impeded development of a legally organized New Church until 1874. In England, however, a church was organized to promote New Church worship as early as 1787.

There are two well-established Swedenborgian organizations incorporated in the United States. One is called the Swedenborgian Church of North America; the other is the General Church of the New Jerusalem. The Swedenborgian Church, also called the General Convention, is the more liberal of the two organizations. Its church government is democratically organized. It is a member of the National Council of Churches and sees itself as an advocate for liberal political causes in the United States and the world. The Convention advocates group diversity and environmentally aware thinking as part of its spirituality. The General Church is more conservative and does not feel that the church should take stands of political issues, leaving such activism up to the individual. Its church government is hierarchically organized. Although not advocating diversity per se, the membership of the General Church is racially and ethnically the most varied of any Swedenborgian organization worldwide.

The Swedenborgian movement from the beginning has been international in character. In the 18th century readers of Swedenborg's religious writings were found in Sweden, England, Germany, France, and America. Readers formed themselves into groups in Skara, Gothenberg, and Stockholm, Sweden; London, Manchester, and Birmingham, England; Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, the United States; Tübingen, Germany; and Strausborg, France, among other places.

The General Conference of the New Church was first organized in Great Britain in 1787, and by 1815 it had instituted a congregational structure. Church business was to be conducted at an annual conference, which has been held yearly since that time up to the present. In 2004–2005 the General Conference had 741 adult members in 26 societies and 8 circles and 2 overseas societies, one in Mauritius and the other in New Zealand. The membership figure represents a 56 percent decrease over 6 years. These congregations are served by 12 active ministers in the United Kingdom and one in New Zealand. The General Conference has recently opted to ordain women and has begun a dispersed learning program in conjunction with its theological school, the New Church College, Radcliffe, Manchester.

The General Conference was supportive of the development of the New Church in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Today there are independent Swedenborgian New Church organizations in Australia, South Africa, and Nigeria that were at one time closely associated with the General Conference. The developments in South Africa and Nigeria are particularly worthy of mention, because Africans have been particularly responsive to the religious writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. The roots of the New Church of Southern Africa go back to the discovery of a copy of Swedenborg's True Christian Religion by David W. Mooki in 1909. He found a copy in a used furniture store, bought it, read it, and decided that its message concerning the one God, the Lord Jesus Christ, was true. He wished to found a church based upon this truth. Certain that there were more books and an organization already in existence somewhere in the world, he converted the members of his African Holy Catholic Church congregation to the teachings of the New Church. He made contact with the British Conference in 1917. As a result, his church became a missionary church of the General Conference. His efforts thrived, and by 1960 the church had 25,000 members, 39 churches, and 114 ministers. They became independent in 1969, under the leadership of David Mooki's son Obed, and took on the name cited above. The New Church of Southern Africa is congregationally organized, and church business is addressed annually in a conference and then supervised by a president for the remainder of the year. Given the strong leadership style of Obed Mooki, his death in 1990 created problems for the organization. A schism that had occurred shortly after Mooki's death had been healed by 2005. In September 2009, a centennial celebration was held.

Currently the church is opening and dedicating one new church building every year, and is looking toward the construction of new administrative center in Orlando, South Africa, adjacent to their theological training college. In 2000 the membership of the New Church of Southern Africa stood at about 15,000 adult members. They had 41 ministers, 50 evangelists, and more than 80 societies. The resolution of the schism strengthened the church and its church building program indicates a growing membership.

The New Church in West Africa developed in Nigeria within the same time frame as the New Church in South Africa, with a similar story of development. Africanus Mensah bought copies of Swedenborg's religious writings through an advertisement, and upon reading them he became convinced of their truth. He made contact with the General Conference, and his organization was recognized by them in 1939. When Mensah died in 1942, there were approximately 1,000 adult members in 13 societies. The church is congregational in structure, and in 1981 it became an organization independent of the General Conference in the United Kingdom. In 2005 the year book of the General Conference lists two independent Swedenborgian organizations in Nigeria, one headquartered in Ondo State called the New Church in West Africa, and the other found in Akwa Ibom State called the Church of the New Jerusalem in West Africa.

A European Association of the New Church is headquartered in Switzerland. This is an umbrella organization for groups located in France, Germany, Italy, and other countries in Europe. There are also independent Swedenborgian New Church organizations in, among other countries, the Czech Republic, India, Kenya, Korea, the Philippines, Russia, the Ukraine, and Sri Lanka.

General Conference of the New Church
20 Bloomsbury Way
London WC1A 2TH
United Kingdom

New Church of Southern Africa
PO Box 592
Orlando East 1803
Soweto
South Africa

New Church in West Africa
PO Box 22
Owo
Ondo State
Nigeria

Church of the New Jerusalem in West Africa
PO Box 68
Etinan
Akwa Ibom State
Nigeria

European Association of the New Church
Buchholzstrasse 141
CH-8053
Zurich
Switzerland

Jane Williams-Hogan

See also: Church of Sweden; General Church of the New Jerusalem; Swedenborg, Emanuel; Swedenborgian Church of North America.

References

- Spaulding, John Howard. Introduction to Swedenborg's Religious Thought. New York: Swedenborg Publishing Association, 1977.
- Williams-Hogan, Jane. "Institutional and Communal Response to the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg in Britain and the United States." In Scribe of Heaven: Swedenborg's Life, Work, and Impact, edited by Jonathan Rose, Stuart Shotwell, and Mary Lou Bertucci, 245–335. West Chester, PA: Swedenborg Foundation, 2001.
- Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, PA: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

■ Switzerland

With the advent of the Reformation, the Swiss Confederation became a religiously mixed country. Under the influence of theologians such as Huldrych Zwingli (1484–1531) in Zurich, John Oecolampadius (1482–1531) in Basle, Guillaume Farel (1489–1565) in Neuchâtel, and John Calvin (1509–1564) in Geneva, several Swiss cantons turned to Protestantism; others continued their prior alignment to the Roman Catholic Church. One split into two half-cantons, and both religions were tolerated in some territories jointly owned by several cantons. Up to the 19th century, religious fault lines would have lasting consequences for

Old church near Brig, Switzerland. (Corel)

Switzerland also at the political level: there were several internal conflicts related to religious differences.

The next step was the making of the federal state in the 19th century. Liberal political circles, eager to modernize the country, saw the conservative and hierarchical spirit of the Roman Catholic Church as an obstacle, in opposition to democratic aspirations. In addition, while the Protestant churches in Switzerland were cantonal ones, easily controlled by local authorities, the Roman Catholic Church formed a supra-national religious organization, and its faithful were obedient to a spiritual power located abroad. This led to several clashes; as a result, a secret, separate alliance (Sonderbund) was concluded by seven Catholic cantons in order to help each other in case of an aggression. This was unacceptable to the other cantons, and a brief military campaign in November 1847 led to the defeat of the Sonderbund.

In 1848 the first federal Constitution was adopted and ushered in Switzerland's modern political system.

Another federal Constitution came into force in 1874, and remained in force (with amendments) until 2000. The 1874 Constitution affirmed the inviolability of freedom of conscience and belief, but some passages showed a clear suspicion toward possible infringements by the Roman Catholic Church. In addition, it was forbidden to create new dioceses in Switzerland without the permission of the federal government, or to establish new convents or religious orders; the Jesuits (seen at that time as the spearhead of Roman Catholicism) were not allowed to operate on Swiss territory. The articles banning the Jesuits and the foundation of new convents or religious orders were taken out of the Constitution in 1973; they had not been enforced for many years. But it was not until 2001 that the obligation to get approval from the federal government for the creation of new dioceses disappeared from the Constitution.

The 19th century also saw the emergence of religious pluralism. There had already been people outside the mainstream previously. At the time of the Reformation, radical trends emerged with the Anabaptists (Zurich, 1525), who were severely persecuted; some managed to survive in isolated places—the Mennonites still exist today. Jews were present too, but it was only during the second half of the 19th century that they came to enjoy equal rights with other residents, including the right to settle at any place in Switzerland. About the same time, additional religious groups appeared in Switzerland. Among Protestants, a number of ministers and laypeople became influenced by revivalist ideas and felt unsatisfied with the control exercised by the civil authorities upon churches in their respective cantons. This gave birth to Free churches in a few cantons, especially the Canton of Vaud, where a number of Protestant ministers, influenced by the ideas of theologian Alexander Vinet (1797–1847), resigned from the state church in protest against political intrusions in church life.

Beside the Free churches, other small, independent Christian communities, now known as the Christian Brethren, emerged at various places, among them the followers of John Nelson Darby (1800–1882), who spent several years in Switzerland (especially in the areas of Geneva and Lausanne). On the Catholic side, groups of Catholic liberals separated from Rome and created the Old Catholic Church in Switzerland after the First Vatican Council. The first Russian Orthodox church in Switzerland was consecrated in 1866. Finally, emergent new religious movements also set foot in Switzerland during that period: representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints reached Switzerland as early as 1850; and the first European converts to the Seventh-day Adventist Church were baptized in 1866.

With the exception of Jews, however, religious pluralism remained confined to the Christian heritage. Inasmuch as Switzerland never did consider itself a country of immigration (although that comes to be increasingly challenged today) and never was a colonial power, extra-European, non-Christian populations were virtually nonexistent in Switzerland until the second half of the 20th century. Especially impressive has been the rapid development of the Muslim community, built upon immigration. According to the national census, which is conducted every 10 years and includes a question on religious affiliation, there were fewer than 3,000 Muslims in Switzerland in 1960, more than 16,000 in 1970, more than 150,000 in 1990, and more than 310,000 in 2000. The Swiss Muslim community consists primarily of Sunnis of the Hanafite School who came to the country from Turkey and the Balkans.

As in other European countries, the increase of the Muslim population led in recent years to some debates. Using one of the resources of the Swiss democratic system (popular initiatives forcing a national vote requesting a change in the federal Constitution, provided the initiative gathers enough citizens' signatures), an alliance of right-wing and evangelical activists managed to collect by the summer of 2008 more than 114,000 signatures asking to introduce a constitutional article banning the building of minarets (of which there are only a handful in Switzerland, none of them used for calling to prayer). Minarets are seen as a physical expression of Islamic power and conquest. In a November 2009 referendum, a constitutional amendment banning the construction of new minarets was approved by 57.5 percent of the participating voters. Only 4 of the 26 Swiss cantons, mostly in the French-speaking part of Switzerland, opposed the initiative.

Orthodox churches have also grown in Switzerland, mostly through immigration, especially from Serbia. According to the 2000 census, they made up 1.81 percent of the population (up from 0.33 percent in 1970). While Greek and Russian parishes had already a stable organization in Switzerland, both the Serbian and the Romanian patriarchates have developed efforts to organize parishes in the country in recent years. Oriental Orthodox (Copts, Ethiopians, Erythreans, Syrians) have also established parishes, beside the already existing (but small) Armenian community.

Although the Reformed churches had been the largest religious group until the national census of 1960, the Roman Catholic Church took the lead after the 1970 census, on account of a higher birthrate as well as a higher percentage of Roman Catholics among immigrants (who came from Southern Europe: Italians, Spanish, and Portuguese came to work in Switzerland). The difference between the two confessions has increased over the years: in 2000, Roman Catholics constituted 41.82 percent of the Swiss population, while

SWITZERLAND

Reformed were down to 33.04 percent (compared with 46.42 percent in 1970). Roman Catholicism, however, is far from being homogeneous. Many Swiss Catholics have imbibed Protestant principles and the democratic spirit; inasmuch as the rules in several cantons give a high level of control to laypeople in church affairs, there are possibilities for pressure. It would be difficult for a bishop on a very conservative line to affirm his authority over all parts of his diocese: in 1997 the bishop of Chur, Wolfgang Haas, had to be transferred by Rome to a newly created archbishopric in Liechtenstein because many parishes in his diocese had gone into open revolt and refused to accept him (or pay their contributions) on account of his conservative views. On the other hand, it was in Switzerland that the late ultraconservative French archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (1905–1991) came to create the Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X and a seminary for the training of traditionalist Catholic priests in 1969. Since 1970 the seminary has been located at Ecône, in the Canton of Valais; the Catholic traditionalist movement has found an especially strong local following in that area. It was at Ecône that Archbishop Lefebvre consecrated four bishops in 1988.

There are other important trends in the religious life of Switzerland, which affect the established churches. As in several other Western European countries, the number of those claiming affiliation to one of the mainline churches has been decreasing. The unaffiliated may actually be the fastest growing group on

Switzerland

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Christians	6,074,000	6,230,000	82.3	0.11	6,280,000	6,479,000
Roman Catholics	2,861,000	3,282,000	43.4	0.55	3,296,000	3,471,000
Protestants	2,808,000	2,486,000	32.9	-0.52	2,530,000	2,534,000
Independents	95,800	160,000	2.1	1.05	200,000	220,000
Agnostics	46,800	836,000	11.1	2.94	1,113,000	1,332,000
Muslims	16,400	315,000	4.2	0.44	351,000	350,000
Atheists	20,000	110,000	1.5	3.00	150,000	180,000
Buddhists	2,000	26,000	0.3	0.44	32,200	36,000
Hindus	2,000	24,200	0.3	0.44	26,600	28,500
Jews	20,700	18,000	0.2	0.44	16,000	16,000
Baha'is	3,100	4,200	0.1	0.44	5,500	7,500
New religionists	2,000	3,400	0.0	0.44	4,000	5,000
Total population	6,187,000	7,567,000	100.0	0.44	7,978,000	8,434,000

the religious map of Switzerland: from 3.8 percent in 1980, this group had reached 11.11 percent of the population in 2000. In a city like Basle, the percentage of unaffiliated people now constitutes the largest single group in the population, accounting for more than a third of the local population. “Unaffiliated” does not necessarily mean “nonbelieving” or “nonreligious,” however; but up to now, it does not seem that minority religions have significantly gained from the weakening of traditional religions, since affiliation to religious groups outside of the historical religions (Catholicism, Protestantism, Orthodoxy, Judaism, and Islam) remained in 1990 less than 3 percent of the population. The largest of those latter groups is the New Apostolic Church, with about 27,000 faithful (down from 37,000 10 years earlier). Non-mainstream Protestants (evangelicals) have progressed and were 1.44 percent in 2000 (up from 0.42 in 1970), not including people of evangelical persuasion still affiliated with the mainstream Reformed churches, which means that the actual percentage of evangelicals in Switzerland is probably double that number. In the 1,500 evangelical congregations in Switzerland (including Methodists, 0.12 percent), 1,200 belong to some 40 different denominations, while 300 are independent.

As everywhere in the world, the Roman Catholic Church in Switzerland is organized into dioceses. Except for the Diocese of Lugano, whose boundaries correspond to those of the Italian-speaking Canton of Ticino, other dioceses do not strictly correspond to cantonal borders or cover several cantons, although there is in most cantons a cantonal Catholic corporation for administrative purposes. Most of the Reformed churches, on the other hand, are organized along cantonal lines and are regrouped together within the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches. Despite a significant statistical decline, the established churches still keep a strong position in Switzerland, since they do enjoy an official status. Religious affairs are a prerogative of the cantons; there is no federal agency dealing with those issues. Of the 26 cantons, only 2 have a regime of separation between state and religion, and even in those cases, the formerly established churches still enjoy a special status. This means that, in 24 cantons, people affiliated with the recognized churches (usually the Roman Catholic Church and the canton’s Reformed Church, but in some cases also the Jewish community and the Old Catholic Church) will pay church taxes (as in Germany). It is important to understand that the recognition is a cantonal one, not a national one, and it is possible that some cantons will sooner or later choose the way of separation. The fact that only some religious communities enjoy a public law status does not mean that the others are discriminated against or prohibited from operating: there are few problems of religious freedom in Switzerland, where even emergent, fringe groups are usually able to function without any hindrance. In 2000 the federal government clearly rejected a request from a group of members of the federal Parliament asking the federal authorities to introduce a nationwide policy on “cults.”

The headquarters of the World Council of Churches, as well as those of the Lutheran World Federation and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, are located in Geneva. In addition, several movements have established their international headquarters in Switzerland, such as the Anthroposophical Society in Dornach (near Basle) and the Moral Re-Armament (renamed CAUX-Initiatives for Change in August 2001) in Caux (near Montreux).

Jean-François Mayer

See also: Anthroposophical Society; CAUX-Initiatives for Change; Christian Brethren; Fraternity/Society of Saint Pius X; Jesuits; Lutheran World Federation; New Apostolic Church; Old Catholic Church in Switzerland; Roman Catholic Church; Seventh-day Adventist Church; World Alliance of Reformed Churches; World Council of Churches

References

- Baumann, Martin, and Jörg Stolz, eds. Eine Schweiz—viele Religionen. Bielefeld, Germany: Transcript, 2007.
- Bovay, Claude. L'évolution de l'appartenance religieuse et confessionnelle en Suisse. Bern: Office Fédéral de la Statistique, 1997.
- Bovay, Claude. Le Paysage religieux en Suisse. Neuchâtel, Switzerland: Office Fédéral de la Statistique, 2004.
- Kraus, Dieter. Schweizerisches Staatskirchenrecht. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1993.
- Mayer, Jean-François. “La liberté religieuse en Suisse.” Conscience et Liberté 55 (1998): 6–37.
- Vischer, Lukas, et al. Ökumenische Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz. Freiburg-Basel: Paulusverlag-F. Reinhardt, 1994.

Synagogues

“Synagogue” is a Greek term for the main gathering place in the Jewish community for Sabbath worship, which also serves as a place through the week for study of the scriptures and spiritual fellowship. A variety of names are used for the synagogue including bet knesset (house of assembly), bet tefillah (house of prayer), and the Yiddish term, shul (school). Shul emphasizes the idea of the synagogue as a place of study. Reform Jews also name their synagogue either temple or congregation.

Some trace the synagogue back to the time of Moses; however, the oldest documented synagogue, known from some dedication inscriptions stones, was located in Egypt in the third century BCE. The oldest known synagogue building belonged to the Samaritan sect and is located on the Greek island of Delos. The oldest mainstream Jewish synagogue is found in Jericho and dates between 70 and 50 BCE. That being said, most scholars see what is today called the synagogue as originating in the Babylonian Captivity (586–516 BCE) as assemblies where Jews could perpetuate their faith; after the return to Jerusalem, religious life was reorganized. Ezra and his successors not only revived temple ceremonies, but nurtured Sabbath worship with prayer and readings in gatherings analogous to modern synagogues. Such assemblies were termed knnesets. The earliest mention of an assembly in a document comes from Alexandria (Egypt) in the third century BCE. Once the temple in Jerusalem was destroyed in 70 CE by the Romans, the synagogue became the center of Jewish religious life.

The synagogue emerged as simply a place for gathering, but over the centuries attained a level of sanctity. Buildings began to be constructed specifically for the weekly gathering. Where possible, the sanctuary of the synagogue, where the main weekly service is held, is oriented so that worshippers can face Jerusalem. Some prayers are supposed to be said while facing the city.

In the front of the room is the ark, a cabinet that holds the scrolls of the Torah, the five books of Moses (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy), the most holy books of the Hebrew scripture. Inside the doors of the ark is a curtain, the parokhet, recalling the curtain that was in the sanctuary of the temple. The parokhet is opened or closed as the service proceeds, depending upon which prayers are being said. A member of the congregation is chosen to open and close the doors and curtain during the Sabbath service, a duty considered an honor. Slightly above the ark is the ner tamid, the eternal lamp, so placed as to honor an ancient commandment (Exodus 27:20–21) to keep a light burning in the tabernacle that held the ark of the covenant. Many synagogues also have a menorah (an eight-armed candelabrum). The menorah recalls the one in the temple, but has a different number of arms so as not to duplicate it.

Jewish synagogue, Old Town Tbilisi, Georgia. (Corel)

Either in the center of the room or in the front, there is a raised dais called the bimah. The bimah is used when reading the Torah scrolls and it is often from the bimah that the service is led. Leading the service is the rabbi and, if available, the cantor.

Orthodox synagogues divide the sanctuary into two spaces, one for men and one for women. The sections are separated by a wall or a curtain. The ark, Torah scrolls, and bimah are in the section for the men. Reform synagogues removed the division in the sanctuary.

In the era between the World Wars, American synagogues began to participate in a larger movement called the institutional church. During this time, urban congregations began to develop as community centers and added space for sports activities (most notably a gymnasium) and artistic and cultural programs. In general, synagogues strive to create an aesthetically pleasing environment without appearing ostentatious.

The largest synagogue in the world, seating some 6,000 worshippers, is Belz World Center in Jerusalem, Israel, dedicated in 2000. It serves as the gathering place for the Belzer Hasidim. Another Hasidic group, the Satmar, have built the second largest synagogue as their center in Kiryas Joel, New York. The largest synagogue in Europe, again a Hasidic synagogue, is the Bratzlav Center located in Uman, Ukraine, near the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Bratzlav (1772–1810) and the cemetery where more than 20,000 Jewish victims of the Haidamak massacre of 1768 are buried. There are a variety of synagogues that have become famous due to their outstanding architecture or the history associated with them.

J. Gordon Melton

See also: Hasidism; Moses; Orthodox Judaism; Reform Judaism; Satmar Hasidism.

References

- Assis, Yom Tiv. And I Shall Dwell Among Them: Historic Synagogues of the World. New York: Aperture, 2005.
- Gruber, Samuel D. Synagogues. New York: MetroBooks, 1999.
- Kee, Howard Clark, and Lynn B. Cohick, eds. Evolution of the Synagogue. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 1999.
- Levine, Lee. The Ancient Synagogue—The First Thousand Years. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Levy, Isaac. The Synagogue: Its History and Function. Edgware, UK: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1964.

■ Syria

Syria is a Middle Eastern country on the Mediterranean Sea south of Turkey. It also shares borders with Lebanon, Iraq, and Jordan, and a small but very important border with Israel. The Golan Heights, a militarily strategic highland immediate east of the Jordan River, the original border between Israel and Syria, was seized by Israel in 1967 and remains a matter of dispute between the two countries. Syria is now home to 19,748,000 people, plus an additional 40,000 people residing on the Golan Heights. The country includes 70,622 square miles of territory plus the 436 square miles of the occupied territory.

Syria's prehistory begins with the invention of writing, which took place in southern Babylon perhaps around 3000 BCE and evolved into cuneiform script. Israelites and other Semitic peoples had migrated there and settled near Jerusalem around 1400 BCE. The Hebrew Bible tells some of their stories of war, the development of monotheism, and territorial expansion. Boundaries have changed throughout the centuries because Syria was once denoted to be the entire region between the peninsulas of Anatolia and Sinai. A variety of Pagan faiths flourished there, and King Hammurabi is remembered as a noted lawgiver.

As intriguing as it is, Syria's ancient history lies beyond the parameters of this encyclopedia, which begins with the empire of Alexander the Great, dating between 356 and 323 BCE.

The Hellenistic era was a time of change, following the death of Alexander, when the Seleucids, named for Alexander's general Seleucus, controlled the region. After their demise, the Ptolemies of Egypt reigned for 100 years until Antiochus the Great defeated Ptolemy and took over southern Syria. By then Greek culture, the hallmark of those regimes, had cross-fertilized the region. Later, about 31 BCE, Syria was a significant province of the Roman Empire. Roman rule undermined the Syrian social structures and eroded the cohesiveness among indigenous groups. Syria was later divided into two provinces, Syria Coele in the north, with two Roman legions garrisoned there, and Syria Phoenice, which had one.

By the fifth century CE, Syria had been partitioned into five provinces. The city of Antioch was the seat of the governor and the cultural center for developments in art, medicine, law, and philosophy, and, most important, for the development of Christianity. According to Christian tradition, the followers of Jesus were first called Christians at Antioch (Acts 11:26), and Antioch became the center of one of the ancient patriarchates. The actions of the successive patriarchs of Antioch helped shape the doctrinal aspects of the Christian religion.

After the Roman Empire crumbled, Syria became wedged into the Byzantine Empire with Constantinople as headquarters, but during the first half of the seventh century, Syria was one of the first regions incorporated into the Muslim Caliphate. In 633–634, a decisive and vigorous campaign won the territory for the Arabs. In 636, the capital, Damascus, finally surrendered to the new authority. Conversions to Islam followed the Muslim victory, though Christians and Jews were generally treated with tolerance. From 639 to 750, the Umayyad dynasty reigned with Damascus as its capital. When the Arabic Abbasids defeated the Umayyads in 750, they moved the center of power to Baghdad (which in Arabic is known as the city of peace), where for several centuries their caliphate ruled in splendor. The flowering of Islamic culture proceeded, committed to the arts as well as warfare, while providing the infrastructure for the early schools of Islamic jurisprudence.

Aleppo, Syria, one of the oldest inhabited cities in the world. (iStockPhoto.com)

The Fatimid dynasty, a Shia sect named for the daughter of Mohammad, wrested control from the Abbasids. For a time during the eighth and ninth centuries, the Fatimids dominated much of the Mediterranean areas of northwest Africa. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher, a pivotal Christian holy site, was destroyed in 1010. Their use of mercenaries became their downfall, however. In 1020 their leader Hakim (996–1021) proclaimed that he was a reborn God. Some Syrians accepted his claim, and today they are identified as the Druze. A rival group, the Assassins, in 1130 killed Amir, the last able Fatimid caliph who ruled from Egypt. Consequently, anarchy followed. In 1171 the last of the Fatimid rulers died. A group of ruthless mercenaries dedicated not to religion but power by assassination seized control.

The Assassins, a neo-Ismailite order named for their use of hashish, minimized religious instruction, fostered murder, and spread terror through the land (1090). For nearly two centuries they operated as professional executioners. The Mongol invasions halted their reign of terror in 1272, when the Syrian stronghold at Masyad was destroyed. A sprinkling of the descendants of the Assassins, known as Ismailis, remain in Syria today. The Aga Khan, based in Bombay, India, is their spiritual leader, with 140,000 adherents scattered throughout India and now dispersed worldwide.

Arabs form the Sunni majority, including the Bedouins (who constitute about 7 percent of the population) and the Kurds (also with 7 percent). Armenians (a small 2 percent) are generally the descendants of early settlers who follow Arab customs or those latecomers who arrived after the persecutions of World War I and maintain their Armenian language and identity.

Today, Syria is a Muslim state. Approximately 85 percent of the population practices Sunni Islam of the Hanafite School. The largest Shia sect, the Alawis, are

Syria

Religion	Followers in 1970	Followers in 2010	% of Population	Annual % growth 2000–2010	Followers in 2025	Followers in 2050
Muslims	5,684,000	19,803,000	92.4	2.73	25,423,000	32,117,000
Christians	621,000	1,174,000	5.5	2.19	1,356,000	1,605,000
Orthodox	414,000	640,000	3.0	0.91	700,000	800,000
Roman Catholics	179,000	465,000	2.2	4.45	550,000	650,000
Protestants	20,900	40,000	0.2	1.02	55,000	70,000
Agnostics	50,000	425,000	2.0	4.46	700,000	1,100,000
Atheists	12,000	25,000	0.1	2.73	40,000	65,000
Jews	4,000	90	0.0	-7.17	90	90
Baha'is	100	180	0.0	2.87	300	500
Zoroastrians	0	40	0.0	2.86	50	60
Total population	6,371,000	21,428,000	100.0	2.73	27,519,000	34,887,000

concentrated near Latakia in the northwest province. The Syrian Alawis are not to be confused with the Alawis of neighboring Turkey. The Syrian Alawis make up about 13 percent of the population. The Druze are a minority, with about 380,000 adherents, though they are a dominant majority in the southwestern province of Suwayda. Ismailis are found in very small numbers near Hama and in Homs. A small number of Twelver Shiites are grouped near Aleppo, and they make up 1 percent of the population. The Yezidi, whose religion combines elements of Islam, Judaism, Nestorian Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and Manicheanism, was founded in the 12th century by Shaikh Adi. It has some 19,000 adherents, most in Djebel Sinjar near Aleppo. The Baha'i Faith, with roots in Iranian Islam, initially tried to missionize Syria in 1892. They were not accepted, and to the present, the Baha'is have only a minuscule presence in Syria.

Judaism has an ancient presence in Syria, much of the Jews' history being recorded in the Jewish Bible (which Christians call the Old Testament). It was swelled by the addition of Jews expelled from Spain and Portugal in the 1490s. During the early 20th century the population was more than 20,000, but given the events since the rise of the state of Israel, only some 4,000 remain.

Prior to the advent of Islam, Syria also had a strong Christian heritage that had initially established itself in the Antiochian Jewish population. The city of Antioch had a large church where the Apostle Paul was headquartered. Antioch became a major spiritual epicenter as its theologians hammered out doctrines pertaining to the nature of Christ. After the Council of Chalcedon in 451, Eastern Orthodoxy predominated. Only in the 16th century did the Roman Catholic Church gain a foothold, when at various times Orthodox Christians found it convenient to form Eastern-rite dioceses in communion with Rome. Among them, the Maronite Catholic Church can be traced to the Crusader Kingdom of Antioch in the 12th century. Between the 16th and 18th centuries, additional Eastern-rite churches developed, most important, the Melkite Catholic Church and the Chaldean Catholic Church.

Christians make up about 8 percent of the inhabitants of Syria. The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East has the largest congregations, which are deeply rooted in an Arab identity. They are Greek in that they follow Byzantine traditions. The Greek Orthodox became the mother church for the Jacobites (Syriac Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East) who broke away in the sixth century as a result of the Monophysite controversy concerning the nature of Christ. The patriarch lives in Damascus and maintains friendly relations with other Orthodox congregations, particularly the Russian Orthodox Church (Moscow Patriarchate), who supported the quest for a Syrian to be appointed as patriarch of Aleppo. The Armenian Apostolic Church (Holy See of Echmiadzin) forms the third major Christian community in Syria based near Aleppo, with about 300,000 followers.

Six Roman Catholic groups exist in Syria today. The Melkites, with their main strength in Aleppo, are a predominant group. Their patriarch, who resides in Damascus, has an extensive jurisdiction that includes Jerusalem (Israel) and Alexandria (Egypt). There is an enclave of Maronites near Aleppo, but their numbers are few, as most reside in neighboring Lebanon. Latin Catholics also live near Aleppo, where their vicar dwells. Aleppo played an important geographical role in the transmission of Christian principles beginning in the 13th century, when Crusaders headquartered there. Chaldeans inhabit eastern Syria near the Iraqi border, with 1,500 people near Aleppo and another 500 near Damascus. The Holy See has a nuncio residing in Damascus serving as liaison with the Syrian government.

SYRIA

Early missionary reports frequently merged activities in Syria and Lebanon. This is because the two countries were, at one time, a single geographical area, until separated by the French Mandate in 1918 for administrative reasons. Initial missionary activity from Western nations centered around Beirut, which is now in Lebanon. Joseph Wolff of the London Jews Society visited Syria in 1822–1823 looking for converts to Christianity from among the Jewish population.

Representatives of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions arrived in the Middle East and traveled extensively in Palestine and Syria. Missionaries Pliny Fiske and Levi Parsons stirred religious unrest within the Catholic and Orthodox communities while being largely ignored by the Muslim community. The American Board left Syria and Iran in 1870 and turned their work over to the United Presbyterian Church (now the Presbyterian Church [U.S.A.]), which has a medical and educational focus in the Middle East. Aleppo College is an outstanding institution, which is supported by the Armenian Evangelical Union, The National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon, the American Presbyterians, and the United Church of Christ.

The National Evangelical Synod, founded in 1823, is one of the oldest missionary groups. The National Evangelical Christian Alliance of Syria, established in 1921, has about 1,000 members. The Church of the Nazarene has existed since 1970 and has seven churches. The Diocese of Jerusalem of the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East governs the small Anglican presence of 3,000. In the 1990s, Pentecostal/Charismatic renewal movements spread through the Christian community in Syria, with more than 100,000 people participating. In the wake, new Pentecostal congregations have appeared, but as in earlier generations, converts to this latest form of Christianity have come primarily from previously existing Christian communities within Syria, rather than from Islam.

Islam's place in Syrian society has changed during the past 100 years. Under the rule of the Ottoman Empire (1517–1918) and during the early years of the 20th century, legal scholars (ulama) advocated strict adherence to Muslim jurisprudence traditions, three being operative in Syria today. The court systems follow the Hanifite School, while the Shafaiite School is more likely to govern family issues in both Syria and Lebanon. There is a small minority that support the Hanbalite tradition, closely associated with the conservative Wahhabi school identified with the royal family of Saudi Arabia.

Syria has an innovative history associated with its use of the several legal traditions. Syrian religious scholars have tended to study with teachers of each school of jurisprudence, thus yielding a pluralistic approach to the Muslim community. This pluralism has facilitated a level of acceptance of the various Sufi orders and other minority groups. In the early years of the 20th century, the Syrians rejected the ultraconservative Wahhabi movement, partially because of their spirit of judicial tolerance, their allegiance to the system of jurisprudence reflected by the Ottoman Empire, and their history of diversity in beliefs.

However, problems arose in the early 20th century when reformers clashed with Sufi orders. Controversy developed over the Sufi love of visits to shrines and the tombs of saints, which is in direct conflict with Sunni doctrine. Most important, reformers challenged the rules so dear to the Shafite and Hanafite jurists. The resultant religious instability contributed significantly to the collapse of the Ottoman Empire after World War I. Amir Faysal of the Meccan Hashemite clan briefly seized control of Syria but was ousted by the French in 1916. The League of Nations mandated a French protectorate in 1918. Syria mobilized against Western hegemony, and even the marginalized Druze and Alawi communities combined forces with mainstream Muslims.

In 1949 a new nonreligious civil code based on an Egyptian model was adopted. Four years later, Islam's legal arm recognized a Law of Personal Status that governed family matters for Sunnis, Alawis, and Ismailis. In contrast, the Druze (not considered true Muslims), the Jews, and the Christians each have their own codes of jurisprudence to govern their members.

In 1963 a military coup brought the socialistic Ba'ath Party into power. In 1970, Hafiz al Assad began his three decades as president. Upon his death in 2000, his son Basher Assad succeeded him. Missed by most Western observers, Assad was a member of the minority Alawi community, as is his son. Their rule has given the Alawis a significantly higher profile in Syria, though some Sunnis still reject the idea of a president from what they see as a heretical minority tradition. The Syrian president appoints his cabinet. However, 250 members of the People's Council (the legislature) are elected from cities and rural areas within Syria. The country, except for a brief period during 1974–1975, has been under martial law because of constant warfare coupled with internal dissention. Today, secular and religious ideologies are flashpoints fueling human rights violations for dissident groups.

The rise of the Muslim Brotherhood, initiated in Egypt soon after the end of World War II but allied with the Wahhabi leadership in Saudi Arabia, was a reactionary backlash to the quest for secularism, and because of the furor, the Syrian cabinet established a law that the head of state must be a Muslim. However, ongoing clashes continue with the Brotherhood over the place of religion in affairs of state.

For a brief time, Syria was united with Egypt in the United Arab Republic (1958–1961) and participated in the Arab-Israeli wars of 1967 and 1973. Syrian troops intervened in Lebanon in 1976, fearing an Israeli-backed political takeover. However, Syria did not support Iraq during the Gulf War in 1990–1991, partially because the countries are ruled by rival Ba'ath parties.

